BASHAN (בשן), always in prose [except 1 Ch. 5.34], and sometimes also in poetry, with the art. bāshān; the appellative sense of the word, bāshān, from the Arab. bathnāṭan, was probably 'fertile, rich and stoneless soil'; see Wetstein, in Del. Hibb. [App.], 550 f.; Basan or ḥapṣā'āle, the name of the broad and fertile tract of country on the E. of Jordan, bounded (somewhat roughly) on the S. by the Yarmuk and a line passing through Edrei and Salehah (mentioned as border cities in Dt. 3.10), on the E. by the imposing range of extinct volcanoes called the Jebel Haurān, on the W. by Geshur and Ma'acah (see Josh. 12.5), and on the N. stretching out towards Hermon (cp. Dt. 33.22; see further, on the limits of Bashan, Guthe, ZDP¹, 1890, pp. 231-4). The name (in its Gk. form Baravaia,² and its Arabic form *Bathaniyeh*³) was, however, afterwards restricted to the southern portion of the area thus defined, other parts of the ancient 'Bashan' being distinguished as TRACHONITIS (9.7), i.e., the remarkable pear-shaped volcanic formation in the NE, now called the Lejā - Auramitis (probably the Jebel Haurān and its environs in the SE.), and Golanitis (which, however, may have included parts of Geshur and Ma'acah, beyond the limits of Bashan proper) in the West. The principal part of the Bashan of the OT must have been the broad rolling prairie now called by the Bedawin en-Nukra, a word properly denoting the 'hollow hearth' dug by the Bedawin in the middle of his tent, and applied to this great plain because, though it is some 1800-2000 ft. above the level of the sea, it forms a depression between the hilly Janin (across the Naher-Rukād) on the W., the Zinnich range on the S., and the Jebel Haurān and the Lejā on the E.; the S. and SE. part of en-Nukra also bears the special name of HAURAN (9.7).

Bashan, as defined above, is distinguished geologically from the country S. of it. The Yarmuk forms a natural dividing line, on the S. of which the limestone comes to the surface, while on the N. it is covered by volcanic deposits. Jebel Haurān, on the SE., is simply a range of extinct volcanoes; volcanic peaks extend from N. to S. in Janin, along the edge of the Jordan valley, on the W.;² and there are isolated volcanic hills in other parts of the country. The Lejā, that strange 'petrified ocean' NW. of the Jebel Haurān, which measures some 25 mi. from N. to S. by 10 from E. to W. (see TRACHONITIS), owes its origin entirely to streams of basaltic lava emitted from the Gharārat el Kablyeh, a now extinct volcano at the NW. corner of the Jebel Haurān. The soil both of the slopes of the Jebel Haurān and of the Nukra is a rich red loam,³ formed by the lava scoria, which has become disintegrated under atmospheric action. The soil thus constituted is celebrated for its fertility; the best corn grows upon it, and in summer time the plain is covered far and wide with waving crops. The country is, however, in general almost entirely destitute of trees; only on the slopes of Jebel Haurān, especially in its central and southern parts, are there abundant forests of evergreen oak* (cp. the allusions to the 'oaks of Bashan' in the OT: Is. 2.1; Zech. 11.2 Ez. 27.6, also Is. 34.1 ḥapṣā'āle) [B], Nah. 1.4). In ancient times, also, it must have supplied rich pastures; the strong and well-nourished herds of Bashan are mentioned in Is. 22.14 (12) (G omits) Am. 4.1 Ez. 39.6 (G omits) Dt. 32.14 (G raṣṣān); cp. also Mic. 7.14 Jer. 50.6 (G omits). The lofty conical summits of the volcanoes forming the Haurān range (cp. Porter, ES, 186, 189, 227-254) are no doubt the 'mountains with peaks,' which the poet of Ps. 68.16 f. [15 f.] pictures as looking enviously at the comparatively unimposing mountain of Zion.

The principal towns of Bashan mentioned in the OT are the two royal cities of 'Og (Dt. 14 Josh. 12.4 basar [B]), ASHURATH, now probably either Tell Ashtara or Tell Ash'ari, in the middle of en-Nukra, and Edrei, now Der'at, on its S. border, GOLAN (Dt. 1.43), somewhere in the W., and SALEHAN (Dt. 3.10), now Salehad, a frontier-fortress in a commanding position overlooking the desert in the SE. corner of Bashan, S. of Jebel Haurān. Basra, between Edrei and Salehah, though not mentioned till 1 Macc. 5.26 ff. (Basor ANV*); but see Basor), also was, no doubt, an important place; the site is still marked by extensive remains belonging to the Roman age. Threescore fenced cities, with high walls, gates and bars, forming the kingdom of 'Og, are likewise mentioned in Dt. 34 (cp. 1 K. 1.13) as situate in the 'region of Argob,' in Bashan. The position of Argob, and, consequently, the positions of those cities as well, are uncertain (see ARGOB, 1); but there are remains of many ancient towns and villages in these parts, especially in the Lejā, and on the sloping sides of the Jebel Haurān; according to Wetstein, for example (Hauran, 42), there are 300 such ancient sites on the E. and S. slopes of the Jebel Haurān alone.

The dwellings in these deserted localities are of a remarkable character. Some are the habitations of Troglodytes, being caverns hollowed out in the mountain-side, and so arranged as to form a series of small villages. Others are the remains of the dwellings of the ancient inhabitants, who, like the Troglodytes, were nomadic, and so arranged as to form a series of small villages. to form separate hamlets; these are found chiefly on the E. of the Jebel Haurān. Others are subterranean abodes entered by shafts invisible from above; these are frequent on the W. of the Zunleh range, and at Edrei the dwellings thus constructed form quite an underground city. Commonly, the dwellings are built in the ordinary manner above ground; but they are constructed of massive well-hewn blocks of black basalt, the regular and indeed the only building material used in the country, with heavy doors moving on pivots, outside staircases, galleries, and roofs, all of the same material; of this kind are, for example, the houses at Burāk, on the N. edge of the Lejā, at Sawarrah, El-Hazm, Deir Nīleh, Hiyāt, Hāt, Bahaniyeh, Shakk, Shubba, E. of it, Kanawāt and Suweideli, on the W. slopes of Jebel Haurān, Adhād, Kureiyeh, and doṣra, on its S.E. slope, and Neirām, Ezra, Kinkadi, Dūmā, and Mismeivēh, within the Lejā itself.³ Many of these cities are in such a good state of preservation that it is difficult for the traveller to realise that they are uninhabited, and in the Lejā especially, where the ground itself is of the same dark and scabrous hue, unrelieved by a touch of green, or a single sign of life, a feeling of weiness comes over him as he traverses their desolate and silent streets.

The architecture of the buildings contained in these cities (comprising temples, theatres, aqueducts, churches, etc.) stamps them as belonging to the Graeco-Roman age, and is such as to show that between the first and the seventh centuries A.D. they were the home of a thriving and wealthy people. May any of these cities date from a remoter antiquity, and be actually the fortified places pointed to with wonder in Dt. 34 f. and 1 K. 41? The question was answered in the affirmative by Porter⁴ and by C. R. Graham,⁵ who believed that they had really rediscovered the cities 'built and occupied some forty centuries ago' by the giant race of the Rephaim; but this view cannot be sustained. The best authorities are unanimous in the opinion that, though in some cases very ancient building materials may be preserved in them, the extant remains are not, as a rule, of a date earlier than the first century, A.D.⁶ Dt. 34 f. and 1 K. 41 are sufficient evidence that in the seventh century B.C. there were in Bashan strongly fortified places which were popularly supposed to have belonged to the ancient kingdom of Og; but none of the existing deserted cities can be as ancient as this. At the same time, it is not improbable that some of the cities built during and after the reign of Herod may have stood upon the sites of cities belonging to a much earlier age, and that in their construction the materials employed in building the more ancient cities may in some cases have been utilised and preserved.

As regards the history of Bashan, it is stated in Nu. 21:33-35 that the Israelites after their conquest of Sihon, king of Heshbon, turned in the direction

4. History. Bashan, defeated Og its king, who came out to meet them as far as his frontier fortress of Edrei, and took possession of his territory. The passage is in the context of JE; but it agrees so closely, in form as well as in substance, with Dt. 31-33, that Dillmann and other critics consider this to have been its original place, supposing it to have been inserted afterwards into the text of Numbers for the purpose of supplying what seemed to be an omission.

All other notices of the same occurrence in the historical books are Deuteronomic (or later): Israel's ancient victories over 'Sihon king of the Amorites and Og the king of Bashan' being two national successes, to which, especially, the writers of the Deuteronomic school were never weary of referring (Dt. 14:31 ff., 4:7, 29:6-7, 31:4, Josh. 2:10, 9:10, 12:4 f., 13:11 f., 1 K. 4:19; see also, later, Nu. 32:33 [R], Neh. 9:22, Ps. 135:11, 139:10 f.).

The territory of Bashan fell to the possession of the half-tribe of Manasseh (Dt. 3:14, 4:43, Josh. 13:20-31 [Jahveah B 7, 30]). Golan and Ashteroth are stated in P to have an Levitical city (Josh. 21:27, cp. 1 Ch. 6:56 [71]); the former also is named as a city of refuge (Dt. 143, Josh. 20:21-27).

Bashan played no prominent part in the history; and it is rarely mentioned in a historical connection. In 1 K. 4:13 it forms one of Solomon's commissariat districts; and in 2 K. 10:3 it is included in the enumeration of trans-Jordanic regions which were 'smitten' by Hazael. Its inhabitants may be presumed to have suffered, like their neighbours, in taking on other occasions during the Syrian wars, and finally to have been carried into exile by Tiglath-pileser in 734 (2 K. 15:29); but in neither connection are they expressly mentioned. Apart from the prehistoric 'threescore cities' of the Argob, settled civilisation appears to have begun for the region of Bashan about the time of the Christian era, when its Semite inhabitants first fell under Greek and Roman influence. The most important event in the history of the country, however, was its incorporation by Trajan, in 106 A.D., in his newly-founded province of Arabia. Then it was that Roman culture impressed itself visibly upon both the surface of the country and the character of its inhabitants; and towns, with great public buildings, of which the remains, as described above, survive to this day, sprang up in every part of it and continued to thrive for many centuries.¹

BASHAN-HAVOTH-JAIR (בָּשָׁן הָהוֹת יַעֲרֵי) occurs in Dt. 3:14 (בָּשָׁן הָהוֹת יַעֲרֵי וְאֶשְׁתְּרוֹת) [B¹]. בָּשָׁן הָהוֹת יַעֲרֵי [B²], where AV renders, 'and (Jair) called them after his own name, Bashan-havoth-jair.' This version does justice to the present text, but certainly does not represent the mind of the original writer. The awkward (indeed, impossible) expression Bashan-havoth-jair can be accounted for only on the hypothesis that the first element in it (Bashan) is a misplaced gloss from the margin. RV seeks to evade the difficulty by rendering, 'called them, even Bashan, after his own name, HAVOTH-JAIR.' On the geographical difficulty which still remains, see HAVOTH-JAIR.

BASILISK, RV rendering of בַּעַל (Is. 14:29), בַּעַל (Is. 11:1), for which AV has COE MATRICE [q.v.].

BASKETS of various kinds were used by the Hebrews, and were doubtless not unlike those which are often found depicted upon Egyptian monuments—large open baskets for fruit etc. (cp illustration, Wolk. Im. Egypt. 37), which could be borne upon the head (ib. 33, cp Gen. 40:17), baskets to collect earth in the manufacture of bricks (on a supposed reference to which in Ps. 81:6, see Bahr— or deep wicker ones slung upon a yoke (ib. 380). I specially noteworthy is the large carpenter's tool-basket made of rush (a kind common throughout W. Asia), a specimen of which is now in the British Museum (cp ib. 401). The references to baskets in many points of interest; suffice it to refer to the difficult saying in Prov. 25:11, which RV renders, 'A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in baskets' (AV 'pictures'; RVmg. 'filigree work') of silver,' where the implied notion is that the golden-hued apples look all the more beautiful in silver baskets. But (1) golden, not golden-hued apples (quinces) must be meant, if the text be correct; 'gold' and 'silver' must both be taken literally. (2) 'Baskets' is an impossible rendering, and 'filigree work,' though more plausible, is still hypothetical. (3) 'Pity' has no sound linguistic basis. This is a case in which no weak emendation, affecting one or two letters, suffices.

Frankenberg has tried such a one; the sense produced is—

Golden graces (זָהָב) on silver chased work,
(So in) a word of gold.

(So is) a word spoken to the trustworthy (עַל־אֵזְרָאֵל, cp C), i.e., a word spoken to the receptive is as ineffaceable as the phased work referred to. Not very natural, and not a good parallel to 7, 12.

By emending the text more boldly (but avoiding arbitrary guessing, and following parallels found elsewhere) it is possible to reach this excellent sense¹—

A necklace of pearls in sockets of wreathen gold,
(S) is a word of the wise to him who hears it.

It is really only a slightly different version of the first proverb:

A ring of gold and an ornament of fine gold,
(So is) a word of the wise to a hearing ear.

Of the other Hishrew words rendered 'basket,' diat (דִּיַּת), tene (תֵּנֶה), and sal (סַל) were used for general purposes, see Cowling

8. 2. Nowack (Die alt. u. lat. W.) suggests that these were similar in character to the clay cooking trivet trivet of the modern fellahin. The former may perhaps denote loosely any pot or jar, since we find it used for cooking in 1 S. 2, 22 (cf. 1 S. 2, 22). The last-named (אֶרֶב), a vessel (equivalent to the Gr. ἀράβη) which it is rendered) and Lat. canistrum,² has been brought into connection with the reduplicated form אֶרֶב אֶרֶב, Jer. 39 (EV 'grape-gatherers' baskets'; ἡ κάλαμος).³ This, however, is doubtful, and indeed the text is uncertain (cp Pesh.). RVGK renders 'shoots'; but this is אֶרֶב; cp VINE. For אֶרֶב (Am. 8:1; ἀγγος 4 [B]), used also of a bird-cage, see CAGE.

2) מִן הַיָּם evidently conceals the name of some precious stone or the like. If so, there is but one possible explanation: מִן הַיָּם comes from מִן הַיָּם (just as מִן הַיָּם , Gen. 36:39, comes from מִן הַיָּם , see BELA, 2), which means 'pearls strung together' (see NECKLACE). Lastly, מִן הַיָּם probably comes from מִן הַיָּם (string or necklace). This is in correspondence closely to מִן הַיָּם , consequently מִן הַיָּם must correspond to מִן הַיָּם , 12, where, with lit. (Prov. 2), we should read מִן הַיָּם (see 6); מִן הַיָּם is based on מִן הַיָּם , מִן הַיָּם might come from מִן הַיָּם , 'for its purpose', but more probably comes from מִן הַיָּם , which is equivalent to מִן הַיָּם (cf. 126) מִן הַיָּם above, and cp Gouh.

In the NT mention is made of (a) σάβανον, a basket of braided work (used especially of fish-baskets), in which Paul escaped from Damascus (2 Th. 1: 9, 1 Th. 2: 15, 1 Cor. 16: 25, however, the word is (b) σύνταξ (WH prefer σύνταξις), the basket, in the miracle of the πῶς (Mt. 15: 37 et. al.). Both were probably σάβανον (the σύνταξ is), in the miracle of the πῶς (Mt. 14: 29 et. al.). The σύνταξ is a σάβανον joined was an essentially Jewish article (quoniam cophynum vocatur pellex, Iux. 8: 14), whose size (size perhaps determined from 2 gallons (vrie *C. Corp. EASON (Amer. RV BASIN). That all the words (one Greek and four Hebrew) denote hollow vessels adapted to receive and contain liquids is certain; but what was the general form, and wherein the peculiarity of each consisted we have no means of determining. This uncertainty is sufficiently proved by the frequent variations in the EV renderings. On the whole suggest see BOWL, CUP, GOBLET, and cp. ALFAR, & TO; COOKING UTENSILS, FOOD, MEALS, & DR. POTTERY.

1. $\beta\delta$, aggin (see BDB; Zer. Sci.; καρπύη BDBet.), a large basin (EV) or bowl used in the temple ritual (Ex. 24c). In Is. 24-25 EV, 'cups' (am. $\beta\delta\alpha\theta\lambda$, ayawath [Theol. Qmg.]). On a count of its shape, it is employed in Cant. 7:2 as a simile in the eulogy of the bride (EV 'goblet'); see Che, ad loc. p. 15v. April 18-19.

2. 2PES, kyōr (p. BASTARD (בָּסֵטֵר). The mamzer is mentioned along with the Ammonite and Moabite as excluded from the congregation ³ (Dt. 23: 2-3). The Heb. word is of uncertain derivation, and the EV rendering is based upon the Vss. ἐκ πατρὸς [Bth. mg. et sup. ras. A¹⁴], l'É om.). More probably the word means one of mixed or alien birth (so Zech. 9: 6, ἀλλογενὲς [HNAQ]), and among the Rabbins it was the term applied to relations between whom marriage was forbidden (cp. Mish. Yebam. 1: 5). It is presupposed by ג in Nah. 3: 17 (ὁ σκάνδαλός σου [HNAQ]), where MT has בָּסֵטֵר (EV 'thy crowned ones'), and is rather infelicitously accepted by Wellhausen who thinks that the reference is to the mixed population of Nineveh. BAT clerks' (see SCRIB). For hasty, in its religious connection, cp COUNCIL, of JERUSALEM, § 10.

BAT (בַּת) lit. 'night-flier' ¹ NYCTOPUS; vespertilio; ² Lev. 11:19 Dt. 14:18 Is. 29:1, also Bar. 6:20. The bats form a well-defined and very numerous order of mammalia termed by naturalists the Chiroptera. The position of the name at the end of the list of unclean birds, and immediately before the list of reptiles, accords with the universal opinion of antiquity that the bat, in Aristotle's words, 'belonged both to birds and to beasts, and shared the nature of both and of neither';³ nor is it in any way surprising to find them included, apparently, amongst birds, for bats alone amongst mammals have developed the faculty of true flight and have become so modified by their aerial habits that their power of progressing on the ground is markedly inferior to that of most birds and insects. They show, in fact, a strong aversion to being on the ground, and, as a rule, at once try to leave it, by crawling up some wall or tree from which they can take their flight.

The nature of their food (either insects or fruit) makes it necessary for these bats which inhabit temperate climates either to migrate at the approach of winter or to spend the cold months in a long winter sleep for which purpose they often collect in large colonies in caves, ruins, or disused buildings. As a rule the bats of the Old World choose the latter alternative, and this seems to be the case with many of those found in Palestine. When food again becomes abundant, they as a rule sleep during the day suspended head downwards by their feet, and leave their homes only to search for food at the approach of twilight. The majority of the bats of Palestine (and they are very numerous) inhabit caves, caverns, tombs, ruins, and disused buildings of all kinds, where they can avoid the light, a fact referred to in Is. 22:5f.

As many as seventeen distinct species of bats, belonging to four different families and eleven different genera, have been described by Canon Tristram. Two or three of these may be mentioned by name. The only representative of the fruit-eating bats (Megachiroptera) is Xanthopygia (Cynomys) egyptiaca, a species which is elsewhere arboreal in its habits, but in Palestine is found living in large colonies in caves and tombs. A further peculiarity of this species is that individual specimens from different localities vary markedly in size, those from Karn in the plain of Acre being much smaller than those from the hills near Tyre, which resemble in size the variety found in Cyprus and Egypt. This species is very commonly found inside the Pyramids of Egypt and is believed to be the one so often figured in Egyptian frescoes.

The horse-shoe bat Rhinolophus ferrugineus is the commonest bat in Palestine, swarming in immense numbers in the caverns along the Jordan and the Red Sea. It has a wide distribution, extending from England to Japan and all over Africa. It collects in large colonies (300 have been found together) in caves and ruins for its winter sleep, and these colonies are peculiar as they are exclusively of one sex.

Another British bat very common in the hill country about Bethlehem, Jerusalem, and the Sea of Galilee, is the long-eared bat, Plecotus auritus, usually found in caverns. It is always very late in leaving its resting-place, not appearing till twilight has changed to night; but it continues to hunt for the insects on which it feeds the whole night through. N. M. —A. E. S.

² The Peshitta has in Leviticus and Deuteronomy the curious rendering 'peacock', but in Is. 2:20 Bar. 6:21 employs the proper Syriac word for 'bat'; the Arabic version has 'bat' in Leviticus and Deuteronomy, but (like the Targum) goes astray in a mistaken paraphrase of Is. 2:20.

BATHSHEBA

BATH (בַּת), deriv. uncertain; cp BDB 1:18, 500. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BATH-RABBIM (בֵּית־רַבִּימִים, 'daughter of multitudes,' [BDB]; ὁπαγοῦς ποταμῶν [BNA]; hater multitudinis; Cant. 7:4; [BDB]) The eyes of the bride are likened to the 'pools in Heshbon by the gate of Bath-rabbim.' With true insight, Grotz in 1871 recognised the impossibility of the reading Bath-rabbim; he suggested Kabbath Annon. Certainly this is possible; and NW. of Heshbon, in a lateral valley of the Wady Heitan, old reservoirs have been found. We cannot, however, suppose that these reservoirs were so famous as to be celebrated in a popular song beside Carmel and the Tower of Lebanon. 'Heshbon' as well as 'Bath-rabbim' must be wrong. Winkler's suggestion 'Heshbon' (Job 1:13; 14) fits in with the mention of Lebanon, but has no other recommendation. Considering that there is a despicable commentary in the next verse (see HAIR, GALLERY, 2), we are justified in making an emendation which might otherwise seem too bold. The most famous pools in Palestine, outside of Jerusalem, were no doubt those known as the Pools of Solomon (see CONDUITS, § 3). In the long green vale of 'Acre' so unusually green among the rocky knolls of Judaea, Solomon, according to poetic tradition, 'planted him vineyards, and made him gardens and paradise . . . and made him ponds of water, to water therefrom the forest where trees were reared' (Eccl. 2:46). Probably it is this scenery that has suggested several descriptive passages in Canticles (Stanley; Del.); it was worthy to be mentioned beside Carmel and Lebanon. Read בֵּית־רַבִּימִים for בֵּית־רַבִּי, and (with W.) 22 for 23, and render

Thine eyes are like Solomon's pools
By the wood of Bath-rabbim.

Beth-cerem, 'place of a vineyard,' was probably the name of some part of the garden-land referred to in Eccl. 2:46. See QRB, April 1869. Cp BATH-HACEREM. L. K. C.

BATHSHEBA (בֶּת־שֶׁבַע, 'daughter of the oath' [BDB], § 48; in 1 Ch. 3:5 בֶּת־שֶׁבַע, where the pointing should be corrected to בֶּת־שֶׁבַע; in Ch 3:5, by a strange confusion, Beersheba = Beersheba, wife of Uriah the Hittite, afterwards wife of David and mother of Solomon 2 S. 11:12-24 (Beersheba [A]) L. K. 1 f. (Beersheba in Text). Some think that she was a granddaughter of Abimelech (1 S. 16:1).

When David first saw Bathsheba, Joab was engaged in the siege of Rabbath Ammon. The king himself was resting, after his period of hardship, at Jerusalem. The story (which is omitted in Chronicles) is that, walking one evening on the flat roof of his palace, David saw a beautiful woman bathing in the court of a neighbouring house. He asked who she was, and, learning that her husband Uriah was away with the army, sent messengers and took her' (2 S. 11:4). To avert the shock which an open act of adultery would have caused to the ancient Israelitish sense of right, he devised the woful expedient related in 2 S. 11:6-25. First he had Uriah sent to him, ostensibly with a message from the camp. He dismissed him to his house with a portion from the royal table; but Uriah remained with the guard of the palace; he scrupled, if Robertson Smith may be followed (Rel. Sem. 215, 484), to violate the taboo on sexual intercourse applied to warriors in ancient Israel. The next night the king plied him with wine; but still Uriah was obstinate. Driven desperate, his master sent the brave soldier back to Joab, bearing a letter ordering his own destruction. Uriah was to be set in the place of danger and then abandoned to the foe. The cruel and treacherous plan was carried out, and, when Bathsheba's mourning for her husband was over, David made her his wife.

The story of the rebuke of Nathan, of the revival of the king's better self, and of the sickness and death of the child of Bathsheba, is well known. It is a question, however (see Schwally, Z. f. d. l. w. 12, 131 ff.), but SRÖF 12, 131, whether, in the original form of the narrative, 2 S. 12:13 did not follow on 12:17, which means treating the most edifying part of the story as a later amplification (see DAVID, § 11). Considering what we know of the gradual idealisation of the life of David (which culminates in Chronicles and the titles of the Psalms), this appears far from impossible. The story gains in clearness by the omission. At any rate, Wellhausen is right in regarding 12:13 as an interpolation in the narrative of the colloquy between David and Nathan. It was suggested by an intelligent reading of the subsequent history. David's evil example was imitated in exaggerated form by Amnon; and Amnon's sin was fruitful in troubles, which culminated in Absalom's rebellion, and darkened all David's remaining years.

We meet Bathsheba for the last time, just as David's end was at hand, in the full glory of a queen-mother. Solomon rises to meet her, bows down before her, and sets her on a seat at his right hand. She gained her object, and it is interesting of Nathan really took the part assigned to him in 2 S. 12:13 to notice that Nathan was one of her chief supporters.

BATHSHUA (בַּת־שֵׁוּאָה, § 48). 1. See BATHSHEBA. 2. The words בַּת־שֵׁוּאָה rendered 'daughter of Shua' in Gen. 38:12 (šava, omitting בַּת [AD. L.]) are treated in RV of 1 Ch. 2:17, šav, šava [B¹ A¹]; τ. θ. šavas [B¹]; šoue [L.] as a proper name, Bathsheba. See SHUA.

BATHZACHARIAS (Βαθζαχαρίας [A]). 1. Marc. 6:21. See BEREZACHARIAS.

BATTERING RAM (כִּרְיִם [plur.], Ez. 4:21, 22 [27]). See WAR.

BATTLE AXE. The tendering is not very happy, as will at once be seen.

1. כִּרְיִם, māphē Jer. 51:20 (διασκορπιστὴς στ [B¹ A¹ Q¹ P]); or כִּרְיִם, māphē (Prov. 24:13 μαχαλόν [B¹ A¹]-μαχόν [A¹]). RV's rendering 'mail' introduces an arbitrary distinction. Better, 'battle hammer,' or 'club' (עֵקֶב [עֵקֶב]). In Ezek. 9:2 כִּרְיִם (עֵקֶב) should possibly be corrected into כִּרְיִם, 'his destroying weapon' (Che.); 'battle axe' (RVing), 'slaughter weapon' (EV), 'a weapon of his breaking in pieces' (AVing) are all difficult to justify.

2. כִּרְיִם Ps. 133 RVing. The usual rendering (Del., B¹, etc.), accepting M^s's vocalisation [כִּרְיִם] and Vers. 1 is 'stop the way' (שִׁטְמוֹתָם). This involves a double ellipsis—'shut up [the way] 1.12 against my pursuers.' It is improbable, however, that כִּרְיִם means 'battle axe'; šayāpā may mean the battle axe used in upper Asia; but this does not justify the inference of critics (D¹, G¹, K¹, L¹, etc.). šayāpā may mean the battle axe used in upper Asia; but this does not justify the inference of critics (D¹, G¹, K¹, L¹, etc.). The text needs emendation (see J. A. L. 18, 7).

BATTLEMENT. For כִּרְיִם, mā'akēh, Dt. 22:8 EV, see HOUSE, § 4. For כִּרְיִם, šimā'āh, 2 Ch. 26:15 Zeph. 1:16 36 RV, and כִּרְיִם, šimā'āh (plur.), Is. 54:12 SRÖF, RV 'pinnacles' (60) šimā'āh P. 84:12 (B¹), see EUGENIUS, § 5. כִּרְיִם, kāmāph, in Dan. 9:27 RVing is rendered 'battlement.' It is better to read כִּרְיִם, kāmāph (see Bevan, ad loc.).

BATUS (Βατος). Lk. 16:6 AVing; RVing. BATU. See WIGATUS AND MASTIGUS.

BAYITH (בַּיִת), Is. 15:2 RV; AV BAYITH.

BAY TREE (בַּיִת), Ps. 37:33, or, more plausibly, as

1. כִּרְיִם, 'destruction,' we know; but כִּרְיִם, 'breaking in pieces,' is unattested elsewhere. Co. recognises that the closing words of 1 Ch. 9:1 are no part of the true text, but represent a variant to the equivalent words in 7:2.

2. š has no rendering of כִּרְיִם in this passage, since for כִּרְיִם it reads כִּרְיִם (ὡς τὰς κερύβους τοῦ Αὐδίου [B¹ A¹ Q¹ P]). Ap. Symm., and Edition Sexta all render in the sense of 'indigenous tree'; and neither Pesh. nor Targ. supports the rendering of AV or that of RV.

BDELLIUM

RV, 'a tree in its native soil.' The word בִּדְלִיּוֹן, 'native born,' however (from the root בָּדַל, 'to arise,' 'spring forth' [Barth, 152, 1, 1, cannot be applied to a tree whence Celsius (Hedych. 1, 104) supposed the phrase to mean ἀνὰ τὴν ἐκχυσίαν).

As Hb., Gr., Che., B¹, We., Dr. agree, the right reading is בָּדַל 'cedar.' On the (probably) correct words בָּדַל (Dr. 'putting forth his strength') and בָּדַל (Dr. 'spreading'), see Che. Psalm 2.

BAZLUTH (בַּזְלוּת, 'stripping?'; Βαζαλωθ [NA]).

BDELLIUM (בִּדְלִיּוֹן; Gen. 2:12 ἀνθραξ [AEL]; Nu. 11:7 κρυσταλλοειδής [BAEL]).

1. Bēdhōlāh (ONYS) as a characteristic product of the land of Havilah; whilst in Nu. 11:7 its 'appearance' (so RV, lit. 'eye,' not Color [Z. v. § 3], as AV) is likened to that of manna—a comparison the appropriateness of which is obvious if, as is in all probability the case, the OP Bēdhōlāh is the resinous substance known to the Greeks as βδέλλιον, μάδελον, μαλγύον (Hoscar, 180) or βδέλλα (Peripl. Mar. Erythr., §§ 37, 39, 48 f.).

Peiser identifies בִּדְלִיּוֹן with Bab. biddi, a spice obtained in Babylonia, and often mentioned in contract-tablets (Z. f. d. l. w. 17, 317 f.); this is important in connection with the Eden-story (see PARADISE). As closer has shown (Syriaca, 2, 364 f.), bdellium was distinct from storax (Agabus, Hommel, ibid. 611 n. 1). Bochart, identifying Havilah with the Arabian coast opposite Bahrain, in the Persian Gulf, naturally explained בִּדְלִיּוֹן as meaning pearl (Hieroz. ii. 55). This view, however, lacks the support of any ancient version, and, though upheld by several Jewish authorities (e.g. Lag. ibid. 2, 44), has no solid foundation. The renderings of βδέλλιον and μαλγύον point to some kind of precious stone; but, as Dr. remarks, βδέλλιον is prefixed to בִּדְלִיּוֹן, the word following, and not to בָּדַל. The Pesh. Bēdhōlāh (in both places) seems to be due to a mere scribe's error; β for δ. It cannot be supposed to be a genuine Aramaic word.

Bdellium is described by Dioscorides (i.e.) as δάκρυον δένδρον ἀραβικόον, the best sort being 'bitter in taste, transparent, gelatinous (ταρρακωδές).

2. Descriptions of βδέλλιον. lit. 'like bull's hide glue', only throughout and easily softened, mixed with chips or dirt, fragrant when burnt as incense, resembling onyx; it also asks also of a black sort found in large lumps, which is exported from India, and of a third kind, brought from Petra. Pliny (N.H. 12, 6) gives some further details; the best sort grows in Batraina (N. Afghanistan), on a 'black' tree 'of the size of an olive, with a leaf like the oak and fruit like the wild fig'; it also grows in Arabia, India, Media, and Babylon, that of India being softer and more gummy, while that brought through Media is more brittle, crustal, and bitter. The author of the Peripl. Mar. Erythr. speaks of it as growing largely in Gedrosia (Beluchistan) and Barygaza (Gujarat), and as exported westwards from the mouth of the Indus. In the older classical literature bdellium appears to be mentioned only in Plinius (Curc. 101), in a list of perfumes.

Two of the kinds of bdellium described by Dioscorides are generally identified by the authorities with the two substances described as follows, which are still met with in commerce:—

3. Various kinds.

1. In both places of Λοιστοί, i.e., Ap., Syriac, and Th., have βδέλλιον, so Ag. bdellium. Cp. ibid. iii. 16.

2. The exact form of these two words is uncertain. Pliny (12, 6) has māthōn, brachon. On the connection of this group of names with bēdhōlāh, see Del. Par. 15 f., 101. Pott in H. Z. M. 7, 93 f.

3. The rendering of this word is uncertain.

4. Perhaps a 'mail' or 'hoof'.

5. Tu mibi stante, in cinnamon, in rosa, Tu mibi stante et c. 15, 4, to bdellium.

BEACON

1. Ordinary Beldilium (African). "The drug is exported from the whole Somali coast to Mokha, Jidda, Aden, Makulla, the Persian Gulf, India, and even China" (Flückiger and Hanbury, Pharmacopoeia (9) 145). Hanbury says he had it sent him from India in London from China; but he notices of this that the immediate port of origin is often substituted for the ultimate source.

Dymock (Pharmacopoeia, 1st ed. 1860) says: "From Berbera also comes Beldilium." Further on he explains that "to a certain extent" it resembles myrrh, but that it is darker, less oily, and "strongly bitter" and has hardly any aroma. According to Mohammedan writers (loc. cit. 112), "Good Beldilium should be clean, bright, sticky, soft, sweet-smelling, yellowish, and bitter." Its botanical source is Balsamodendron africanum (see Key Bull. 1865, p. 17).

2. Indian Beldilium.—Dymock (loc. cit. 112) describes this as somewhat resembling the African drug, "but the colour is lighter, often pinkish." Dioscorides, therefore, must have had a very dirty sample, a not infrequent experience still. Its source is Balsamodendron Mukul, a plant the botanical distribution of which—NW. India, Beluchistan, and possibly Arabia—exactly agrees with the statements of the old authors. The only difficulty is the description of Pliny, which it does not fit very well, as it is a small tree; but Pliny's statements cannot be pressed from the botanical point of view; Lemaire (Revue de l'Égypte, 1875) calls Dioscorides "bien préférable à Pliny."

As to the third kind of Beldilium spoken of by Dioscorides, Dymock (310) conjectures that it was probably a kind of myrrh. N. M. W. T. 1-10.

BEACON (בֵּיטָח), perhaps for בֵּיטָח, see ASH; (בֵּיטָח [BISMAQIT]), or rather, as in LYONS, MASS (cp. Is. 33:2; Ez. 27:5), employed in Is. 30:17 as a simile of nakedness and desolation. The reference is to the poles, etc., erected in prominent places for signalling purposes; cp. ENGLISH § 21.

BEALOTH (בֵּיטָח, Josh. 15:24. See BALATH HERE.

BEAN, or rather Bēan (RV), The children of (βίαιον BAION [ANV]; βίαιον [Vg.]; βίαιον, BAION, IOS, IOS, xii. 8), an otherwise unknown tribe or community, who in the pre-Maccabean period were a 'snare and offence' to the Jews 'in that they lay in wait for them in the ways.' Their robber castles or 'towers' lay, apparently, somewhere between Idumæan and Ammonite territory. This would suit the Beon of Nu. 32:2 (see BAY, MI ON). In one of his warlike expeditions against the unfriendly surrounding peoples after the reconsecration of the temple, Judas the Maccabee utterly destroyed the children of Bean and burnt their towers (1 Macc. 5:4 f.; cp. 2 Macc. 10:13 ff.).

BEANS (βίαιον, κγῶμος BAL, 28. 17:28 Ez. 16) are twice mentioned as material for food, along with wheat, barley, and lentils; in the second passage Ezekiel is instructed to make bread of a mixture of wheat, barley, beans, lentils, millet, and spelt. The Hebrew name is found also in post-biblical Hebrew, Jewish Aramaic, Arabic, and Ethiopic. Beans are the seeds of Vicia faba (Linn.), the cultivated plant—not certainly known in the wild state, but in all probability a domesticated form of *Vicia narbonensis*²—which is a native of the whole Mediterranean region and extends eastward to N. India. It was the κγῶμος of the Greeks, which is mentioned as far back as the Iliad (ἀνὰ μοῖς κγῶμος, 14:29). Virehow found the seeds in the excavations at Troy, and the plant was cultivated in Switzerland and Italy in the age of bronze. Beans are, without doubt, one of the earliest articles of vegetable food among the European races of mankind. Cp. FOOD, § 4. COOKING, § 7. N. M. W. T. 1-10.

¹ Flückiger and Hanbury say (loc. cit. 110) that it is regarded both in London and in India as a very inferior dark sort of myrrh.

BEAR

BEAR. 1. (27) The name, common to Heb.

1. Name. Aram. Ar. and Eth. is from a root signifying to move slowly and softly¹ and thus befit the bear, which has a sluggish tread.

The Heb. word is generally used, even when the she-bear is intended, thus 'a bear reared of her whelps is alone' (27:22). On the other hand, the pl. 27:22 takes a form verbally from K. 2:21, and the singular appears from 1:117. The word renders apok [E. M.], but in Prov. 17:12, 17:13, 17:14, 17:15, 17:16, 17:17, 17:18, 17:19, 17:20, 17:21, 17:22, 17:23, 17:24, 17:25, 17:26, 17:27, 17:28, 17:29, 17:30, 17:31, 17:32, 17:33, 17:34, 17:35, 17:36, 17:37, 17:994, 17:995, 17:996, 17:997, 17:998, 17:999, 17:1000.

The animal is frequently mentioned in OT in the Apoc. in Wisd. 11:7 Eccl. 25:17 [ANV], but σάκκος [B] and 17:1 and once (Rev. 13:1) in NT. No difficulty arises in connection with any of the OT passages; the attacks of the lion and the bear on David's flock (1 S. 17:34-36), and of the she-bear² on the children who mocked Elisha (2 K. 2:24), accord with the ravenous habits of the animal; 'a bear robbed of her whelps' (2 S. 17:34 Prov. 17:12 Hos. 13:8) or 'a ranging bear' (1 Ch. 12:8) is naturally regarded as the most dangerous possible object to encounter; one of the signs of profound peace in the Messiah's kingdom is that the cow feeds side by side with the bear, its natural enemy (Is. 11:7). The σάκκος, or rather σάκκος, of the bear is well expressed by the verb σάκκος (Is. 59:1) σάκκος σάκκος, which is applied also to the howling of a dog, the cooing of a turtle dove, the sighing of a man, and the moaning of the sea. The stealthiness of a bear's attack is mentioned in 1 Ch. 3:1. By the likening of the second probably the Median kingdom in Dan. 7:5 to a bear, which 'was raised up on one side, and three ribs were in his mouth between his teeth,' and they said thus unto it, 'Arise, devour much flesh,' the extreme destructiveness of the Median conquests is probably indicated (see further Reynolds Daniel, in loc.). In Am. 5:17 'as if a man did flee from a lion, and a lion met him,' we have, as Berhan remarks, a Hebrew equivalent to the classical:

In the combination of the 'feet of a bear' with the body of a leopard and the mouth of a lion in Rev. 13:2, we have an instance of the characteristic recombination of elements borrowed from OT apocalyptic. The hyperbolical treatment of old history in later Jewish literature is illustrated by the mention in Wisd. 11:7 of wild beasts, such as lions and bears, among the plagues sent upon the Egyptians, and by the statement about David in Eccl. 17: that 'he played (Heb. לָחַם LAHAM, לָחַם LAHAM, 'he mocked at . . .') among lions as among kids, and among bears as among lambs of the flock.'

Finally, we notice the interesting reading of σάκκος in Eccl. 25:17.

A woman's wickedness altereth her visage.

If this reading be correct, the verse will allude to the tristitia or moroseness often attributed to the bear, which several ancient writers speak of as expressed in its countenance. On the whole, however, it is more probable that σάκκος (supported by the Syr. and Ar. versions) is right in reading.

And maketh her face dark like sackcloth (ὡς σάκκος).

The Syrian bear, sometimes called Ursus syriacus, is not specifically distinct from the brown bear, Ursus.

3. Natural history. Although somewhat lighter in colour and smaller than the typical varieties, it has a wide distribution.

¹ The other meaning of the Ar. verb, 'to have a bristly skin,' is probably, as Ges. thinks, secondary, and derived from the main σάκκος.

² It was a common opinion in antiquity that she-bears were fiercer than the males; thus Pliny (11:40), 'Mares in omni genere ferarum potiorum pantheris et tigris.'

being found in several parts of Europe, - formerly all over that continent, - and throughout Asia N. of the Himalayas. It is unsocial in its habits, though sometimes male and female are seen together, and the cubs accompany their mother. Bears are omnivorous, killing and eating other animals, but they have a vegetable diet also. They are particularly fond of fruit and honey. In cold climates they hibernate during the winter months, and during the period of hibernation they subsist on the stored up fat. The young are generally born towards the end of this period. They are now probably extinct in S. Palestine, but are still to be met with in the Lebanon and Hermon districts.

BEARD. The importance attached by the Hebrews to the beard is fully borne out by the many references to it found in the O.T.

⁷ Two words are thus rendered: (a) ἡ ἀρχὴ τοῦ ἀνδρὸς καὶ τῆς
γυναικός (of the head proper), viz. 2 S. 10:4 f., 1 Th. 1:6 f., Ps. 7:20 13:2 (cf. 18:37) etc.; and (b) also of the church (in Lev. 19:20 f., 14:9 of both man and woman). (c) ἐξ ἀρχῆς, ἀφ' ἁρχῆς (from ἀρχή 'hip'), i.e. rendered 'head' in 2 S. 10:4 [25] is more properly the mountain or 'upper hip' (so AV; μνηστῆς; EV Lev. 13:45, and AV Gen. 24:17 & Mic. 3:7 where LXX 'hip').

The beard was, and still is, in the East, the mark of manly dignity. A well-bearded man is looked upon as honorable, and as one who in his life 'has never hungered' (Doughty, Id. 166, 1250). By touching the beard, or by swearing by it, a man's good faith was assured (cp. 171, 1265) – a fact which may possibly throw light upon foals' treachery towards Amasa (2 S. 20₉). To cut it off wilfully was an insult (2 S. 104₇, cp. Is. 16), and to cut it ceremonially was strictly forbidden; see CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH, § 3. To shave it was an outward sign of mourning (Is. 15₂, Jer. 41₅ 48₇, cp. Ep. Jer. [Bar. 6: 30]; see MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 1²).

Although barbers are mentioned only in a late passage (Ez. 51, לְבַרְבֵּרִים לְחַלֵּשׁ, 'to shave,' on the other hand, is frequent, Gen. 11:14 [E], 2 S. 10:4 Judg. 16:17, etc.), they were doubtless in great request.³ In Egypt the barber is described as industriously journeying from place to place seeking employment, carrying in an open-mouthed bag the tools of his craft – a small short hatchet or curved knife (cf. ḤP 27:314). The razor is frequently mentioned in the OT, where it is called קַרְנִי, hār (Nu. 6:5 7:2 Ps. 52:3 [4]; but 'sheath' or 'scabbard' in S. 17:51 2 S. 20:8 Ez. 21:4 [9] etc.), or בִּקְרָה, birḥ (Judg. 13:5 16:17 1 S. 11:1); see KNUFF.³

In Egypt, apart from priests (and high officials, Gen. 41 14), the practice of shaving the hair does not seem to have been very general (cf. Leviticus, § 30). On the other hand, the beard was regularly shown, and only the shepherds and foreigners let it grow, apparently to the disgust of the cleanly Egyptians. Hence the negligence of Ramesses VII. is caricatured in his tomb at Thebes wearing a uniform beard of two or three days' growth. Nevertheless, the beard was looked upon as a symbol of dignity, and on solemn occasions the want was supplied by an artificial one. Such beards were made of a piece of hair tightly plaited and fastened by two straps behind the ear. The king wore a longer beard, square at the bottom; one even longer and curled at the end was the distinguishing mark beard untrimmed.

⁴ For 𐎶𐎵𐎶 (We, TR 146f): hence both names are from the same root, 𐎶𐎵, 'to lay here.'

of a girl.¹ The people of Punt followed the Egyptians in all such customs. Canaanites, Assyrians, and Babylonians, on the other hand, wore long hair and plumed headdresses, and in strong contrast to these are the monumental representations of the desert nomads with pointed moustache (p. 111, cf. n. 1 and fig. 2, cf. 1).²

BEAST. For (1) Behemoth (בְּהֵמוֹת) and (2) Leviathan (לִוְיָתָן), 'living creatures' including ayy and seey, Gen. 8:17 (P), 1 more particularly wild beasts, Gen. 7:14 (P) 37:33 (V), see CATHE. § 2 (2). For Esau (עֵשָׂו) 'wild beast of the rocks' [RV], see CROMBIE, Isaiah. For (1) Levi (לֵוִי), 'beast of burden', see CATHE. § 2 (2). For (2) 13:22 (C²N²) 'wild beasts of the islands' [AV] see JAKOB (2), WINT. For (3) 15:13:21-24 Jer. 50:49 (C²N²) 'wild beasts of the desert' [AV], see CAT. end.

(3) ḥay ʾelz, 'wild beasts' [AV] Ps. 50.11 [r.] 80.11[14] is more scrupulously rendered 'that which moves (or roams)' by Dr. Hastings, We. [SHU1]. If ḥay recognizes ʾayin 'to move', 'small creatures' would also be possible; cp. Talm. guy 'a worm', Ass. zardim, an animal like a horse. The probal only of such a word in bibl. Heb., however, is and green. The two passages have to be considered separately. 5 gives different readings: Ps. 49 supra uorot (cp. r. Is. 40.1), Ps. 80 uor ayyos [H], uor ay [H] uor ay [R. 4A], uor ay [R]. The Tag. [H] (both pass.) is thus a reference to the uor in the uor ay. See further, [H] 4A, 1, and (on the text, which is corrupt) the Psalmist, 1. 47. For Rev. 11.7 c. 131 etc. (the two mystical ḥayot) see ABDALYAH, §§ 40-13-47. ASCTURIST, § 47 and cp [H] 4A. MOTH AND LEVIATHAN, § 2; DRAGON, § 2. For Rev. 12.9, the four 'living creatures' see THE HEB., § 3. For Rev. 12.14, etc. (ayyos) cp. CATTLE, § 2, (2), (3).

An undentified place mentioned with Cinobai and Cin-y (251), Judah 134 (βιβαι [V], αββαί *κ *κ*¹) perhaps a petition of the following name Cin-bai (B) and Vg. cinai; if a reading of *κ *κ*¹ be considered trustworthy, Cin-bai such a locality not otherwise improvable, may be intended.

BECHER (כְּבֶר, 'first born'; § 61, or cp. perhaps, Beḥker, Ar. b-kr, 'camel'; [so Beḥer Lev. 1].) A Benjamite clan, Gen. 46:21 (כְּבֶרֶשׁ [V], כְּבֶרֶשׁ [L], כְּבֶרֶשׁ [p]) and 1 Ch. 7:68 (כְּבֶרֶשׁ [V], כְּבֶרֶשׁ [L]); אֶפְרַיִם 7:6, omitting all mention of Beḥer and אֶפְרַיִם, אֶפְרַיִם [כְּבֶרֶשׁ p]. The name is wanting in Nu. 1:18, but it is possible that the name Beḥer (=גֵּרֶם) BECHERITE, RV Becherite in the Ephraimite list, Nu. 25:35 (גֵּרֶם, om.) was originally a marginal addition to the Benjamite clans, which after being displaced has crept into the text (cp. Beḥer, it). The clan Becher (gentile) Beḥer [כְּבֶרֶשׁ] belonged to the Beḥer (gentile) Beḥer [כְּבֶרֶשׁ] (cp. Beḥer, it). If we adopt two very delicate emendations (see Beḥer (gentile), Beḥer (gentile)), the cognate name Beḥer (gentile) (but see Beḥer (gentile)) is possible that the name recurs under the form Beḥer [כְּבֶרֶשׁ]. See also Beḥer (gentile), § 9.

The sculptures represent, however, not only eunuchs, but what seem to be the people of the lowest rank - peasants,urers, and slaves - without beard. In the oldest Babylonian pictures, on the other hand, the head is completely bare, ancient custom was perhaps given up through the bearing a sign of the military caste (see Perrot and Chipiez, in Chald. 213).

the son of AVIHAI [p. 1], an ancestor of Saul, 1 S. 9:1 (BAHEI [B], BEΛΩPAΘ [V], MAΨEP [L]). The name is really to be read as BECTILETH [q v.], it is the name of Saul's clan. Cp Kto, on 1 S. 9:1 and Marq. Fund. 14.

BECTILETH (BAIKTICΛAIΘ [B], BECTILEΘ [V], BAKTIAAI [V], BAITOTIAIA [S¹], BECTILEΘ [S²]; Beth Letheth, 'house of slaughter' [Syr p.], TUL PLAIN ON, three days' journey from Nimveh, 'near the mountain which is at the foot of upper Euphrat' (Judith 2:1). Various have suggested Ptolemy's βακταίη in Syria (177 d. x. 1516), or the Bactria of the Tib. Trav. 21 K. m. from Am. (p. 1), but this does not agree with the situation as named in the text. The name of the mountain is given as Ange, Agge by It. Vg. and as Agge by the Syr. (so Lag.). For the Tiber without gives Agge (mountain of pots), which suggests that the name may have arisen from reading Agge, 'polished', for an original Agge, or Agge, which actually occurs as a place-name. See 111-HARSHA.

BED. Oriental beds in the older nune cannot always have been so simple as we are led to suppose that they generally are today. Both the frame-work and the coverings of the bed were sometimes richly ornamented. Of course, manners changed and luxury grew. Egypt was perhaps in advance of other nations; but even in Egypt the priests were wont to use beds of a very simple kind. If they had any frames at all, they were wicker-work of palm branches, resembling the kafas of the modern Egyptian (cp Wilkinson, Proc. Eg. 1885, 497 f.).¹ The early Israelites were naturally slow in their material progress. Shepherds, for example, sleeping in the open air (cp Gen. 31:4), would wrap themselves in their umish or rug² (Ex. 22:26[25]), and, if need were, used stones for their head-rests (Gen. 28:11). Tent dwellers too would be content with that useful article, the umish, and this was probably what Sisera was wrapped in when he lay down to sleep³ (Judg. 4:1). Those who dwelt in the house were protected from the weather, but knew no luxury. Great persons had special sleeping-chambers. Ishbaid for example, was murdered in such a room (שִׁבְדִּים 2 K. 2:47; cp Ex. 8:1[7:2], 2 K. 6:12; also 2 S. 13:15; 1 K. 1:5 Ps. 105:36 (corr. text); and in the highly civilised period represented by Ecclesiastes it was perhaps the usual arrangement (Eccles. 10:26). Considering, however, how rare special bedrooms are in Eastern houses now, and also the poor construction of the houses in ancient Palestine, we can hardly venture to suppose that a 'chamber of beds,' (שִׁבְדִּים 2 K. 11:2 2 Ch. 22:11) was common among the Israelites. Guests, however, enjoyed privacy in the so-called upper-story (ὑπερῶς in G and N¹), which was on a part of the flat roof, where coolness could be enjoyed (שִׁבְדִּים 2 K. 4:11 Kto 2:2, 1 K. 17:19 23). And in such rude houses as may still be seen in parts of Palestine, and were doubtless common in antiquity, the upper chamber would necessarily be the sleeping-room of the family, as long as the weather permitted (see Horst, § 26). During the have shown their perplexity in the former passage by giving three alternative renderings.

Of pillows we hear nothing in OT. In Mk 1:7, 8, 9 have $\pi\phi\delta\alpha\tau\epsilon\phi\alpha\lambda\alpha\iota\omega\tau$ (cp Lch 1:10) ϕ .

4. Pillows. RV pillow, but it was an improvised pillow, RV better cushion.

RV even sometimes does not assume the use of pillows. Thus (a) $\pi\phi\delta\alpha\tau\epsilon\phi\alpha\lambda\alpha\iota\omega\tau$ (with suffix) is rendered 'bolster' by AV in 1 S 19:11, 16, 26, 31, 32, and by AV in 1 K 16:10; and 'pillow' by AV in Gen 28:11, 13. The word, however, denotes properly 'the parts about one's head, and is thus rendered by RV everywhere (2 S 1:10, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000).

It is impossible to separate the subject of beds from that of couches or divans. Amos, as a dweller in the country, directs his scorn against the luxury of the rich grandees: 'that sit in Samaria in the corner of a couch, and on the silken cushions of a bed' (Am 3:12, RV). The rendering of RV is indisputable. Damascus and damask have no connection (see DAMASCUS, § 6 n.). The passage has been cleared up with an approach to certainty by critical conjecture: it should run thus: 'that sit in Samaria on the carpet (עֲרִיצָה) of a couch, and on the cushion (עֲרִיצָה) of a divan.' From another passage, which also can be restored very nearly to its original clearness (see DAVID, § 12 n.), we learn that the couches of the great were richly adorned. The selfish grandees are described as those 'that lie upon couches for beds, עֲרִיצָה, of ivory' (Am 6:4). Such couches were sent as tribute by Hezekiah to Nineveh (2 K 18:16), and the Amirai Table (2 K 25:18) speak of 'beds' (עֲרִיצָה) of ivory, gold, and wood sent to the king of Egypt. So too in Esther (1:10; cp 1 Esd. 3:6) we read of couches adorned with gold and silver, and covered with rich tapestry and deckings from Egypt (cp Prov. 7:16). Some of the couches would of course be used as beds. Such, at any rate, was the gorgeous bed (עֲרִיצָה) in the tent of Holophernes. The description of it contains the first mention of a canopy (καταπαύση, Judith 10:13) (Pim, originally a fly-net) - one of the results of Greek influence;

The name is seemingly a corruption of Bir-dadda - i.e., probably, Bir is Dadda (two names of the storm-god best known as Rammān - cp with this Bir-zur (בִּרְזֹר, Panammu mscr. from Zengirli, 1:31. Waddi, the 'king of Arabia' conquered by Aūr-kamp-pal, had for his father Bir-dadda (2 K 25:18), a name which answers to the Assyrian name Bir-ramman (the eponym for 848 B.C.). Hommel (Monat. Ztsch., 1897, p. 270) derives from B (Hadad - i.e., by Hadad; -cp

EDAN (עֲדָן; ADAN, or [Cod. Am.] ADAN),

1. In an address ascribed to Samuel we find Bedan mentioned between Jerubbaal and Jephthah as one of the chief deliverers of Israel (1 S. 12:11 MT). No such name occurs in the Book of Judges, however, and the form of the name is suspicious.

I w. supposed that the initial letter had been dropped, and but this particular one is improbable.¹ 'Lord of flies' (could we assume that this was the original meaning) was itself, as a title, bad enough; nor would the people, who feared the demons so much, have ventured to speak too disrespectfully of the archdemon (cp Ashmedai or Asmodeus, which to a Hebrew ear meant the 'destroyer' not a disrespectful title); lastly, on Lightfoot's theory the name ought to be Beel zebel: it is shown elsewhere that a late editor detected the new Hebrew word zebel, 'dung,' in the name I-zebel (Jr 14.22). Lightfoot's theory, then, must be abandoned, as Baudissin holds. But Baudissin's own theory (adopted from Hitzig) is not really more satisfactory. He thinks that Baal-zabal is simply a euphonic modification of Baal-zebub, the consonant which closed the first syllable being repeated at the close of the second part of the word.²

This, however, leaves Baal-zebub unexplained, for Baudissin's theory of the name is scarcely admissible.

See Schell, Die Hb. Spr., 26; Lightfoot, Horae Hebraeae, on Mt 12.24 Lk 11.15; Movers, Die Phönizier (41), 1.20f.; Kuhn's article in III Z.³ The latter revives an old theory of Storr and Doderlein that be'el dibaba in Aramaic might mean either 'lord of flies' or 'an enemy,' ἐχθρὸς ἀνθρώπου (Mt 13.2) = δαίμονος. This is doubtless plausible. We must at least admit that the common people cannot without instruction have attached a meaning to zebel. But how has Beelzebub (half Hebrew, half Aramaic) fixed itself in the Gospel tradition? Pesh. too retains Beelzebub. Baudissin's article in Herzog, *PAW*⁴ (learned and thoroughly adopts the ordinary view, as far as Baal-zebub is concerned.

BEER (בַּיִר, 'well', § 101).

1. (בַּיִר) Beir (B.T.). A station of the Israelites, apparently between Heshbon and the Arnon (Nu 21.16 [L.]). See NAHAI-EL; WANDERING, § 8; and cp. below, BEER-ELIM. The interest of Beer is not geographical but literary. The discovery of the well was commemorated (the narrator gives us to understand) by a song. The song with its context runs thus, according to MT.

And from there to Beer: that is the well whereof Yahweh said unto Moses: A scum the people, and I will give them water. Then sang Israel this song:

Spring up, O well; meet ye it with a song.

Well, that the princes have dug,

The nobles of the people have loved,

With the sceptre with their slaves.

And from Mahbar [i.e. the wilderness] to Mattanah; and from Mattanah to Nahal-el; and from Nahal-el to Bamoth.

The historical character of this statement has generally been assumed. Ewald, however, is on the road to a very different theory when he remarks that such a well-song was to become a source of joy to the labourers who thenceforward used it (Hitzig, 2.204). He sees, in fact, that it is essentially a popular song. Robertson Smith, too, truly speaks of 'the exquisite song in which the Hebrew women, as they stand round the fountain, waiting their turn to draw, coax forth the water which wells up all too slowly for their impatience.' We should not expect the origin of such a song to be remembered; nor is there anything in the words to suggest the occasion ascribed to it in H. More probably it arose in the dry country of the south of Judah, where springs were the most valued possession (cp Judg. 1.15 Josh. 15.1 Gen. 26.19). The 'princes,' 'nobles,' and 'captains' (for בָּרִיִּים we read בָּרִיִּים; cp Judg. 5.9-14) referred to are the sheikhs of the clan. When a fresh well has been found, the sheikhs go through the symbolic form of digging for it with staves, and the poets of the clan greet the well with a song.

² Hitzig (Krit. Proleg., by Steiner, 272) compares Be'elzebub (Habbukuk); Baudissin adds Babel-mandel for Babel-mandib, § 3. The Poetry of the O.T. Brit. Quart. Rev. Jan. 1877, p. 132-135. The expression 'coax forth' was suggested by Herder. The fountain is credited by primitive races with personality.

Does MT give us the whole of the song? Can Mahbar be used as a proper name? Surely not. And, when we examine the MSS of G, we find some justification for the hypothesis of Budge, that the text of the literary originally ran, 'And from there to Beer; and from Beer to Nahal-el and from Nahal-el to Bamoth,' and that an editor who knew the song of the well, and desired to do it honour, inserted it between the first and the second items in the list, with the additional line, 'Out of the wilderness a gift' (see MATANAH). See Budge, New World, March 1895; Proc. Soc. Anthropol., 1895, p. 41 ff.; Franz Del. ZATW, 1882, p. 449 ff.

2. A place to which JOTHAM [1] fled from his brother Abimelech, Judg. 9.1 (Beir [1], Beir [1], Beir [1]). In OS (23871; 1062) it is identified with a village called Beir, 8 m. N. of Eleutheropolis. The context, however, gives us no data for determining the site of the 'well' in question.

BEEROTH (בְּרֹת) and even Beer-sheba have been suggested. Kh. el-Bereh, W. of 'Ain Shems, is considerably more than 8 m. N. of Beir Jabin.

F. K. C.

BEERA (בְּרָא, 'well'; בְּרֵאִיאָה [1], בְּרֵאִיאָה [1], om. L.), b. Zophai, in genealogy of ASHER (1 Ch 7.37).

BEERAH (בְּרָה, 'well'), a Reubenite prince, son of Baal, carried off by Tighath-pileser, 1 Ch. 5.6 (בְּרָה [1], בְּרָה [1], BAPA [1]). He is mentioned by the rabbins with Beeri, the father of the poet Hosea.

BEER-ELIM (בְּרַעַלִּים, 'well of terebinths' (2) or 'of sacred trees'; φερεαρ του αιλιου [1], BAPA [1], BAPA [1]). A place apparently on the northern border of Moab, answering to ELIM on the south (Is. 15.1). It is generally identified with the B. E. of Nu 21.16. Some identify it also with the Amana of 1 Mac. 5.29; but see ALMA.

BEERI (בְּרִי, 'belonging to the well' or 'Beer', § 76; cp above).

1. A Hittite, the father of IEDITH (6.1), Esau's wife, Gen. 26.4 (Bep [1], Bep [1], Bep [1]). It is impossible to reconcile this description with that of Ash in the genealogy in Gen. 26.2, for which see BASHMEATH, 1.

2. The father of HOSEA, Hos. 1.1 (Bep [1], Bep [1]).

BEER-LAHAI-ROI (בְּרַעַלִּי רֹאִי, a well in the Negeb, famous in Hebrew tradition as the scene of Hagar's theophany (Gen. 16.1), and no doubt connected with a sanctuary (St. Z. 17.11; 1.19 [81]). Beside this sacred well was the altar of Isaac (Gen. 21.62; 25.11).

1. Name. The name is mentioned only by J; E, who gives nearly the same account of the theophany (21.7, 8), speaks simply of 'a well.' According to RV, Beer-lahai-roi means 'well of the living one who sees me.'

So the Version, (16.14) Beir al-hayy al-roi [1], (21.7) Beir al-hayy al-roi [1]. Pesh. in all these: Beir al-hayy al-roi. This rendering, however, is inconsistent with that given of El Roi in 16.13, 'A God that seeth'; we should expect, not Beir al-hayy al-roi, but Beir al-hayy al-roi, and even apart from this, Beir cannot be equivalent to 'God' (the phrase Beir al-hayy al-roi is late). Probably, therefore, we should render with We. Beir al-hayy al-roi, 'living is he who sees me,' and explain this by the H. of H. 16.13 words in 16.13, which, as they stand, are unintelligible, but may, by the correction of Beir into Beir al-hayy al-roi and the insertion of Beir al-hayy al-roi (the resemblance of these three words accounts for the omission of one), be interpreted thus: 'Beir al-hayy al-roi' (God of vision) will then mean 'the God who is seen by' (Gen. 21.14).

These explanations of El-Roi and Beer-lahai-roi are too plainly not original. According to analogy, Beir (wrongly vocalised zebel) ought to be a noun in the construct state. Instead of Beir we should doubtless vocalist lhi, 'jaw-bone'; roi (?) is some animal's name, not known in the later Hebrew, and perhaps of Arabic origin. The name instead Lahai-roi should, therefore, be rendered 'Antelope's (?) jaw-bone.'

Another explanation is proposed by Hommel (IBH 209). Adhering to the points as regards the syllable hai, he compares the S. Ar. name Luhai-sath. He does not account for roi. Should roi be lee? (see Kt 11)? Sunson's Lehi, however, supplies a more obvious clue.

Lehi, 'jaw-bone,' was a name given to any prominent crag, from a fancied resemblance to a jaw-bone. See LIII; and cp Onomastichos (ὄνομαστικός), a promontory on the coast of Iaconia, and 'Camel's jaw-bone' (an Arabic name, Yakū, iv. 353n ff.; cp We. Vakida, 298, n. 21).

According to E, the well was in the wilderness of Beersheba (Gen. 21:14); I, more precisely, states that it was 'on the way to Shur' (167), 'between

2. Site. Kadesh and Bered' (71, 14). Jerome knew of a 'well of Hagar' (ὁ ὕδωρ Μαρκελλῆ); does he mean the traditional well in the Hadyel-Muscelleh? This strangely formed wady is at the foot of mountains of the same name, and Palmer thinks that there was once a large city here (perhaps one of the 'cities of the south'). One of the wells has special sanctity, and is connected by the Bedouin with Hagar. Two caves appear to be ancient. The smaller, at the upper end of the wady, on the right hand, was apparently a Christian chapel; the other, on the opposite side, seems to have served as the hermitage (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 234). As to the 'jaw-bone' rock no positive statement can be ventured. On the geographical statement in 71, 14, see BIII 11, i. To the suggestions there made it may be added that the 'way to Siter' (72, 1) would be one of the regions called by the Assyrians Misri. According to the original tradition Hagar seems to have fled, not to Egypt, but to a N. Arabian district called by a name which was confounded with Mizraim (Egypt). This, and not Egypt, was really her native country; this too was the country from which, according to E, she took a wife for her son Ishmael (21, 1). So Wl. 101 301. BEEROTH (בְּרֹת; בְּרֹת [P.N.A.]), a city of Benjamin.

In Josh. 18:25, Beeroth [B], Beeroth [L], 2 S. 12:14 [A omits]; gentile Beerothite (בְּרֹתִי; Beerothites [B.A.], 2 Sam. 4:7 59; Beeroth [B.A.], Beeroth [L], 2 Sam. 23:37; Beeroth, 1 Ch. II 39; Beeroth [B], Beeroth [A], Beeroth [L].

According to Josh. 9:17 (Beeroth [B⁹], Beeroth [Babylon]), it belonged originally to the Gibeonite confederation; and, according to 2 S. 13, there was at one time a migration of its inhabitants to Gittaim (see ISRAEL, 1). Men of Beeroth are mentioned in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii. § 6, § 8 c); EZRA 2:25 = Neh. 7:29, Beeroth [B], Beeroth [L] = 1 Esd. 5:19 (Beeroth [B], Beeroth [A]). It is named by Eas. (cp Reland, 618-19), and is now represented by the modern El Burch (which still owes its name to its abundant supply of water), a village of about 800 inhabitants, in a poor district, about 6 m. N. from Jerusalem, on the Shechem road. Tradition assigns it as the place where Joseph and Mary missed Jesus from the company of returning pilgrims (Lk. 24:45).

An account of the origin of the name and the planting of the sacred tamarisk of Beersheba is given in the story of Abraham (Gen. 21:22 ff. 13); but another story belonging to another document (1) assigns the origin of the well and its name to Isaac (Gen. 26:33 ff.). It was the scene of more than one theophany in patriarchal times. It was an important sanctuary frequented even by N. Israel in the time of Amos (5:5 Beersheba to the spring [B.A.]), who refers with disapproval to those who swear by the life of the divine patron² of Beersheba (8:14). It was in Beersheba that the two sons of Samuel are said to have exercised their judgeship (1 S. 8:2), and a day's journey thence into the wilderness is placed the incident of the 'juniper' tree in the life of Elijah (1 K. 19:1 ff. Beersheba [A]). Beersheba was the birthplace of the mother of King Josiah (2 K. 12:13; 2 Ch. 24:1). In post-exilic times it was inhabited by men of Judah.

The ruins at Beersheba belong apparently to early Christian days. The Onomastichos describe it as a large place with a Roman garrison (106:23 ff.). In the time of Jerome the place was of some importance; but it became an episcopate; and by the fourteenth century it had become deserted and ruined.

It is represented by the modern El Burch, on the W. es-Sheba, 23 m. SW. from Hebron (Kol. RR 1:39).

2. Identification. Whist the arable land of Palestine virtually comes to an end with Beersheba, and the country to the south of it is usually barren, there are, for nearly 30 m. S. of Beersheba, ruins of old villages gathered round wells; they evidently date from Roman times.

On Josh. 19:2, 'Beersheba and Shela,' see SHULMA (i.). [WRS (R. L. Sem. 131) remarks: 'The sanctuary of Beersheba properly consisted of the "Seven Wells," which gave the place its name.' Among the Arabs a place called 'Seven Wells' is mentioned by Strabo (164-4). Robertson Smith has also given abundant evidence of the sanctity attaching to the groups of seven wells among the Semites. Even to-day seven wells or cisterns seem to have the power of undoing witchcraft (101 73 ff.). This view is due to Stade (Gench. i. 127), who thinks that the postposition of the numeral was Canaanitish; but, as in the case of Kirjath-arba (see HEBRON, i.), the theory is doubtful. 'Well of Seven' is not inexplicable. 'Well of (the) Seven' of the south land.¹ This is the heading of a short fragmentary passage of prophecy, and refers to the description of Egypt at the end of 7, 7 as 'Rahab the unbelled one' (see RAHAB, II, #1). 'The south-land' (Negeb) is here, as in Dan, 9, 11 ff., designation of the second of the two empires which endanger Palestine, i.e., Egypt, the other being Siphon, the northland (Jer. 15, 12; 26, 10) — i.e., in a large sense, Babylonia. See Deh. The heading in 7, 6 may be very late.

Delitsch's finding in 7.6 may be very late, but Delitsch lists bilichent also in (4) TS, 73.22, 'As for me, I was a bilichent and ignorant, I was a bilichent toward thee' (Del., Nowak). This rendering is correct, if the text is sonnet and if the speaker is an individual. If, however, the speaker is to be understood as a community, we may perhaps render, 'I was (like) the least(s) toward thee.' So far, but the absence of the particle of comparison is a difficulty. If we compare 49 [13] 12-17 it becomes plausible to read, with Gratz, וְהָיִיתִי כְּלֵבִי, 'I was devoid of understanding toward thee.'

ing itself in folds'; or perhaps of Bab. origin) is

2. Of Leviathan. designation of a mythic serpent in all the passages in which it occurs, unless Job 41: be an exception.² See below.

It is formed (a) in Job 41: (40/25), "Canst thou draw up [Leviathan] like a book, and press down his tongue with a reed?" (c) Job 33: "And thou shalt say upon the sea 'Ere I curse thee, (those) who are appointed to raise up Leviathan';" (f) Ps. 74: 13, "In that day shall Yahweh arise to smite Leviathan the fugitive serpent, and Leviathan the coiled serpent shall be taken up by the head of Leviathan, and givest his [Leviathan] to be food for the heads of the dragons;" (g) Ps. 74: 14, "Thou didst smite the heads of the dragons;" (h) Ps. 104: 26, "There do the dragons move along, (there is) Leviathan whom thou didst firm to be its ruler." To these references, two supplied by apophryal writers may be added: (i) Gen. 60: 29, "And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die; and ye shall bury me; and ye shall say, Amen;" (j) Apoc. Bar. 29: 4.

In the present article we shall desert the zoological explanation of Behemoth and Leviathan, leaving the field open to another writer to represent the more generally received opinion (see Hippopotamus, Crocodile). Strong reason will have to be shown for not interpreting these strange forms with some regard to mythology. No one would assert that the author of Job had an altogether distinct mythological conception; but modern commentators who disregard the mythic basis of the descriptions make a serious mistake.

It was natural in 1887 to look for illustrations of the passages, (d) and (e), to Egypt,⁷ though reference could have been made, not to the fantastic griffins on certain wall-paintings, but to the idealisation of the ordinary monsters of the Nile in the mythic narratives of Ké and Osiris. "There are supernatural as well as natural hippopotamuses and crocodiles, and it is a criterion of these which the poet has given us. The descriptions are hyperbolic and unpleasing, if referred to the real monsters of the Nile; they are not so if planned of the "children of defeat," with the dragon-hopi at their head," which the poet, by a fusion as follows: (1) the final φ in Bēhēmōt is unaccounted for (Leippsin). (2) The Egyptians had several names for the hippopotamus (e.g., peret, 'a beast that rolls itself in the mud'); but the texts nowhere mention peret. (3) The form, if it existed, would be ma-eh (L. C. Cook). It is strange that Jablonski, who died in 1757, and could know only Coptic, and who, after supposing himself to have found the preference to Birch, original of Bēhēmōt in Behemota, discovered afterwards, that the name was really kheh (Renouf, 1 xp after, July 1897). BEHEMOTH historically most justifiable,¹ identifies with the monsters of Babylonian origin called elsewhere Rahab and his helpers (Job 9: 11). And even in the uncorrected but still more in the corrected text there are expressions and statements which are hardly explicable except on the mythological theory. How, for example, can the hippopotamus and the crocodile be said to be, not merely dangerous to approach, but beyond the range of hunters? There is evidence that even in early times the Egyptians were skilled in attacking and killing them. How, too, can the ordinary hippopotamus be called 'the firstling of the ways of God' (Job 10: 19), and the ordinary crocodile be said to be feared by all that is lofty, and to be king over all the sons of pride? (Job 41: 34 [26]).

The Babylonian elements in Behemoth and Leviathan, however, are more important than the Egyptian. They have been pointed out, though with some exaggeration, by Gunkel, who also noticed how much the text of the accounts of Behemoth and Leviathan has suffered in transmission. It may be hoped that by the light of the mythological interpretation the corruptions may be partly removed. For example, Job 11: 11 [1: 3] may be plausibly emended thus (see JAL, April, 1897):—

Surely thy self-confidence proves itself vain;
Even divine beings the fear of him lays low;
An angel shrinks when he would arouse him;
Who then (among mortals) would dare meet him as a foe?
Who ever confronted him and came off safe?
Under the whole heaven, not one!

The un-emended form of this passage, it is true, does not favour a mythological interpretation; but it is very difficult to give it any plausible meaning, whereas the emended text is in perfect harmony with all that we hear of Leviathan elsewhere. One more proof of the helpfulness of the new theory may be given. No passage has puzzled interpreters more than Job 40: 15. The RV renders this, 'He (only) that made him can make his sword to approach (unto him)'. ² ³ ⁴ ⁵ ⁶ ⁷ ⁸ ⁹ ¹⁰ ¹¹ ¹² ¹³ ¹⁴ ¹⁵ ¹⁶ ¹⁷ ¹⁸ ¹⁹ ²⁰ ²¹ ²² ²³ ²⁴ ²⁵ ²⁶ ²⁷ ²⁸ ²⁹ ³⁰ ³¹ ³² ³³ ³⁴ ³⁵ ³⁶ ³⁷ ³⁸ ³⁹ ⁴⁰ ⁴¹ ⁴² ⁴³ ⁴⁴ ⁴⁵ ⁴⁶ ⁴⁷ ⁴⁸ ⁴⁹ ⁵⁰ ⁵¹ ⁵² ⁵³ ⁵⁴ ⁵⁵ ⁵⁶ ⁵⁷ ⁵⁸ ⁵⁹ ⁶⁰ ⁶¹ ⁶² ⁶³ ⁶⁴ ⁶⁵ ⁶⁶ ⁶⁷ ⁶⁸ ⁶⁹ ⁷⁰ ⁷¹ ⁷² ⁷³ ⁷⁴ ⁷⁵ ⁷⁶ ⁷⁷ ⁷⁸ ⁷⁹ ⁸⁰ ⁸¹ ⁸² ⁸³ ⁸⁴ ⁸⁵ ⁸⁶ ⁸⁷ ⁸⁸ ⁸⁹ ⁹⁰ ⁹¹ ⁹² ⁹³ ⁹⁴ ⁹⁵ ⁹⁶ ⁹⁷ ⁹⁸ ⁹⁹ ¹⁰⁰ ¹⁰¹ ¹⁰² ¹⁰³ ¹⁰⁴ ¹⁰⁵ ¹⁰⁶ ¹⁰⁷ ¹⁰⁸ ¹⁰⁹ ¹¹⁰ ¹¹¹ ¹¹² ¹¹³ ¹¹⁴ ¹¹⁵ ¹¹⁶ ¹¹⁷ ¹¹⁸ ¹¹⁹ ¹²⁰ ¹²¹ ¹²² ¹²³ ¹²⁴ ¹²⁵ ¹²⁶ ¹²⁷ ¹²⁸ ¹²⁹ ¹³⁰ ¹³¹ ¹³² ¹³³ ¹³⁴ ¹³⁵ ¹³⁶ ¹³⁷ ¹³⁸ ¹³⁹ ¹⁴⁰ ¹⁴¹ ¹⁴² ¹⁴³ ¹⁴⁴ ¹⁴⁵ ¹⁴⁶ ¹⁴⁷ ¹⁴⁸ ¹⁴⁹ ¹⁵⁰ ¹⁵¹ ¹⁵² ¹⁵³ ¹⁵⁴ ¹⁵⁵ ¹⁵⁶ ¹⁵⁷ ¹⁵⁸ ¹⁵⁹ ¹⁶⁰ ¹⁶¹ ¹⁶² ¹⁶³ ¹⁶⁴ ¹⁶⁵ ¹⁶⁶ ¹⁶⁷ ¹⁶⁸ ¹⁶⁹ ¹⁷⁰ ¹⁷¹ ¹⁷² ¹⁷³ ¹⁷⁴ ¹⁷⁵ ¹⁷⁶ ¹⁷⁷ ¹⁷⁸ ¹⁷⁹ ¹⁸⁰ ¹⁸¹ ¹⁸² ¹⁸³ ¹⁸⁴ ¹⁸⁵ ¹⁸⁶ ¹⁸⁷ ¹⁸⁸ ¹⁸⁹ ¹⁹⁰ ¹⁹¹ ¹⁹² ¹⁹³ ¹⁹⁴ ¹⁹⁵ ¹⁹⁶ ¹⁹⁷ ¹⁹⁸ ¹⁹⁹ ²⁰⁰ ²⁰¹ ²⁰² ²⁰³ ²⁰⁴ ²⁰⁵ ²⁰⁶ ²⁰⁷ ²⁰⁸ ²⁰⁹ ²¹⁰ ²¹¹ ²¹² ²¹³ ²¹⁴ ²¹⁵ ²¹⁶ ²¹⁷ ²¹⁸ ²¹⁹ ²²⁰ ²²¹ ²²² ²²³ ²²⁴ ²²⁵ ²²⁶ ²²⁷ ²²⁸ ²²⁹ ²³⁰ ²³¹ ²³² ²³³ ²³⁴ ²³⁵ ²³⁶ ²³⁷ ²³⁸ ²³⁹ ²⁴⁰ ²⁴¹ ²⁴² ²⁴³ ²⁴⁴ ²⁴⁵ ²⁴⁶ ²⁴⁷ ²⁴⁸ ²⁴⁹ ²⁵⁰ ²⁵¹ ²⁵² ²⁵³ ²⁵⁴ ²⁵⁵ ²⁵⁶ ²⁵⁷ ²⁵⁸ ²⁵⁹ ²⁶⁰ ²⁶¹ ²⁶² ²⁶³ ²⁶⁴ ²⁶⁵ ²⁶⁶ ²⁶⁷ ²⁶⁸ ²⁶⁹ ²⁷⁰ ²⁷¹ ²⁷² ²⁷³ ²⁷⁴ ²⁷⁵ ²⁷⁶ ²⁷⁷ ²⁷⁸ ²⁷⁹ ²⁸⁰ ²⁸¹ ²⁸² ²⁸³ ²⁸⁴ ²⁸⁵ ²⁸⁶ ²⁸⁷ ²⁸⁸ ²⁸⁹ ²⁹⁰ ²⁹¹ ²⁹² ²⁹³ ²⁹⁴ ²⁹⁵ ²⁹⁶ ²⁹⁷ ²⁹⁸ ²⁹⁹ ³⁰⁰ ³⁰¹ ³⁰² ³⁰³ ³⁰⁴ ³⁰⁵ ³⁰⁶ ³⁰⁷ ³⁰⁸ ³⁰⁹ ³¹⁰ ³¹¹ ³¹² ³¹³ ³¹⁴ ³¹⁵ ³¹⁶ ³¹⁷ ³¹⁸ ³¹⁹ ³²⁰ ³²¹ ³²² ³²³ ³²⁴ ³²⁵ ³²⁶ ³²⁷ ³²⁸ ³²⁹ ³³⁰ ³³¹ ³³² ³³³ ³³⁴ ³³⁵ ³³⁶ ³³⁷ ³³⁸ ³³⁹ ³⁴⁰ ³⁴¹ ³⁴² ³⁴³ ³⁴⁴ ³⁴⁵ ³⁴⁶ ³⁴⁷ ³⁴⁸ ³⁴⁹ ³⁵⁰ ³⁵¹ ³⁵² ³⁵³ ³⁵⁴ ³⁵⁵ ³⁵⁶ ³⁵⁷ ³⁵⁸ ³⁵⁹ ³⁶⁰ ³⁶¹ ³⁶² ³⁶³ ³⁶⁴ ³⁶⁵ ³⁶⁶ ³⁶⁷ ³⁶⁸ ³⁶⁹ ³⁷⁰ ³⁷¹ ³⁷² ³⁷³ ³⁷⁴ ³⁷⁵ ³⁷⁶ ³⁷⁷ ³⁷⁸ ³⁷⁹ ³⁸⁰ ³⁸¹ ³⁸² ³⁸³ ³⁸⁴ ³⁸⁵ ³⁸⁶ ³⁸⁷ ³⁸⁸ ³⁸⁹ ³⁹⁰ ³⁹¹ ³⁹² ³⁹³ ³⁹⁴ ³⁹⁵ ³⁹⁶ ³⁹⁷ ³⁹⁸ ³⁹⁹ ⁴⁰⁰ ⁴⁰¹ ⁴⁰² ⁴⁰³ ⁴⁰⁴ ⁴⁰⁵ ⁴⁰⁶ ⁴⁰⁷ ⁴⁰⁸ ⁴⁰⁹ ⁴¹⁰ ⁴¹¹ ⁴¹² ⁴¹³ ⁴¹⁴ ⁴¹⁵ ⁴¹⁶ ⁴¹⁷ ⁴¹⁸ ⁴¹⁹ ⁴²⁰ ⁴²¹ ⁴²² ⁴²³ ⁴²⁴ ⁴²⁵ ⁴²⁶ ⁴²⁷ ⁴²⁸ ⁴²⁹ ⁴³⁰ ⁴³¹ ⁴³² ⁴³³ ⁴³⁴ ⁴³⁵ ⁴³⁶ ⁴³⁷ ⁴³⁸ ⁴³⁹ ⁴⁴⁰ ⁴⁴¹ ⁴⁴² ⁴⁴³ ⁴⁴⁴ ⁴⁴⁵ ⁴⁴⁶ ⁴⁴⁷ ⁴⁴⁸ ⁴⁴⁹ ⁴⁵⁰ ⁴⁵¹ ⁴⁵² ⁴⁵³ ⁴⁵⁴ ⁴⁵⁵ ⁴⁵⁶ ⁴⁵⁷ ⁴⁵⁸ ⁴⁵⁹ ⁴⁶⁰ ⁴⁶¹ ⁴⁶² ⁴⁶³ ⁴⁶⁴ ⁴⁶⁵ ⁴⁶⁶ ⁴⁶⁷ ⁴⁶⁸ ⁴⁶⁹ ⁴⁷⁰ ⁴⁷¹ ⁴⁷² ⁴⁷³ ⁴⁷⁴ ⁴⁷⁵ ⁴⁷⁶ ⁴⁷⁷ ⁴⁷⁸ ⁴⁷⁹ ⁴⁸⁰ ⁴⁸¹ ⁴⁸² ⁴⁸³ ⁴⁸⁴ ⁴⁸⁵ ⁴⁸⁶ ⁴⁸⁷ ⁴⁸⁸ ⁴⁸⁹ ⁴⁹⁰ ⁴⁹¹ ⁴⁹² ⁴⁹³ ⁴⁹⁴ ⁴⁹⁵ ⁴⁹⁶ ⁴⁹⁷ ⁴⁹⁸ ⁴⁹⁹ ⁵⁰⁰ ⁵⁰¹ ⁵⁰² ⁵⁰³ ⁵⁰⁴ ⁵⁰⁵ ⁵⁰⁶ ⁵⁰⁷ ⁵⁰⁸ ⁵⁰⁹ ⁵¹⁰ ⁵¹¹ ⁵¹² ⁵¹³ ⁵¹⁴ ⁵¹⁵ ⁵¹⁶ ⁵¹⁷ ⁵¹⁸ ⁵¹⁹ ⁵²⁰ ⁵²¹ ⁵²² ⁵²³ ⁵²⁴ ⁵²⁵ ⁵²⁶ ⁵²⁷ ⁵²⁸ ⁵²⁹ ⁵³⁰ ⁵³¹ ⁵³² ⁵³³ ⁵³⁴ ⁵³⁵ ⁵³⁶ ⁵³⁷ ⁵³⁸ ⁵³⁹ ⁵⁴⁰ ⁵⁴¹ ⁵⁴² ⁵⁴³ ⁵⁴⁴ ⁵⁴⁵ ⁵⁴⁶ ⁵⁴⁷ ⁵⁴⁸ ⁵⁴⁹ ⁵⁵⁰ ⁵⁵¹ ⁵⁵² ⁵⁵³ ⁵⁵⁴ ⁵⁵⁵ ⁵⁵⁶ ⁵⁵⁷ ⁵⁵⁸ ⁵⁵⁹ ⁵⁶⁰ ⁵⁶¹ ⁵⁶² ⁵⁶³ ⁵⁶⁴ ⁵⁶⁵ ⁵⁶⁶ ⁵⁶⁷ ⁵⁶⁸ ⁵⁶⁹ ⁵⁷⁰ ⁵⁷¹ ⁵⁷² ⁵⁷³ ⁵⁷⁴ ⁵⁷⁵ ⁵⁷⁶ ⁵⁷⁷ ⁵⁷⁸ ⁵⁷⁹ ⁵⁸⁰ ⁵⁸¹ ⁵⁸² ⁵⁸³ ⁵⁸⁴ ⁵⁸⁵ ⁵⁸⁶ ⁵⁸⁷ ⁵⁸⁸ ⁵⁸⁹ ⁵⁹⁰ ⁵⁹¹ ⁵⁹² ⁵⁹³ ⁵⁹⁴ ⁵⁹⁵ ⁵⁹⁶ ⁵⁹⁷ ⁵⁹⁸ ⁵⁹⁹ ⁶⁰⁰ ⁶⁰¹ ⁶⁰² ⁶⁰³ ⁶⁰⁴ ⁶⁰⁵ ⁶⁰⁶ ⁶⁰⁷ ⁶⁰⁸ ⁶⁰⁹ ⁶¹⁰ ⁶¹¹ ⁶¹² ⁶¹³ ⁶¹⁴ ⁶¹⁵ ⁶¹⁶ ⁶¹⁷ ⁶¹⁸ ⁶¹⁹ ⁶²⁰ ⁶²¹ ⁶²² ⁶²³ ⁶²⁴ ⁶²⁵ ⁶²⁶ ⁶²⁷ ⁶²⁸ ⁶²⁹ ⁶³⁰ ⁶³¹ ⁶³² ⁶³³ ⁶³⁴ ⁶³⁵ ⁶³⁶ ⁶³⁷ ⁶³⁸ ⁶³⁹ ⁶⁴⁰ ⁶⁴¹ ⁶⁴² ⁶⁴³ ⁶⁴⁴ ⁶⁴⁵ ⁶⁴⁶ ⁶⁴⁷ ⁶⁴⁸ ⁶⁴⁹ ⁶⁵⁰ ⁶⁵¹ ⁶⁵² ⁶⁵³ ⁶⁵⁴ ⁶⁵⁵ ⁶⁵⁶ ⁶⁵⁷ ⁶⁵⁸ ⁶⁵⁹ ⁶⁶⁰ ⁶⁶¹ ⁶⁶² ⁶⁶³ ⁶⁶⁴ ⁶⁶⁵ ⁶⁶⁶ ⁶⁶⁷ ⁶⁶⁸ ⁶⁶⁹ ⁶⁷⁰ ⁶⁷¹ ⁶⁷² ⁶⁷³ ⁶⁷⁴ ⁶⁷⁵ ⁶⁷⁶ ⁶⁷⁷ ⁶⁷⁸ ⁶⁷⁹ ⁶⁸⁰ ⁶⁸¹ ⁶⁸² ⁶⁸³ ⁶⁸⁴ ⁶⁸⁵ ⁶⁸⁶ ⁶⁸⁷ ⁶⁸⁸ ⁶⁸⁹ ⁶⁹⁰ ⁶⁹¹ ⁶⁹² ⁶⁹³ ⁶⁹⁴ ⁶⁹⁵ ⁶⁹⁶ ⁶⁹⁷ ⁶⁹⁸ ⁶⁹⁹ ⁷⁰⁰ ⁷⁰¹ ⁷⁰² ⁷⁰³ ⁷⁰⁴ ⁷⁰⁵ ⁷⁰⁶ ⁷⁰⁷ ⁷⁰⁸ ⁷⁰⁹ ⁷¹⁰ ⁷¹¹ ⁷¹² ⁷¹³ ⁷¹⁴ ⁷¹⁵ ⁷¹⁶ ⁷¹⁷ ⁷¹⁸ ⁷¹⁹ ⁷²⁰ ⁷²¹ ⁷²² ⁷²³ ⁷²⁴ ⁷²⁵ ⁷²⁶ ⁷²⁷ ⁷²⁸ ⁷²⁹ ⁷³⁰ ⁷³¹ ⁷³² ⁷³³ ⁷³⁴ ⁷³⁵ ⁷³⁶ ⁷³⁷ ⁷³⁸ ⁷³⁹ ⁷⁴⁰ ⁷⁴¹ ⁷⁴² ⁷⁴³ ⁷⁴⁴ ⁷⁴⁵ ⁷⁴⁶ ⁷⁴⁷ ⁷⁴⁸ ⁷⁴⁹ ⁷⁵⁰ ⁷⁵¹ ⁷⁵² ⁷⁵³ ⁷⁵⁴ ⁷⁵⁵ ⁷⁵⁶ ⁷⁵⁷ ⁷⁵⁸ ⁷⁵⁹ ⁷⁶⁰ ⁷⁶¹ ⁷⁶² ⁷⁶³ ⁷⁶⁴ ⁷⁶⁵ ⁷⁶⁶ ⁷⁶⁷ ⁷⁶⁸ ⁷⁶⁹ ⁷⁷⁰ ⁷⁷¹ ⁷⁷² ⁷⁷³ ⁷⁷⁴ ⁷⁷⁵ ⁷⁷⁶ ⁷⁷⁷ ⁷⁷⁸ ⁷⁷⁹ ⁷⁸⁰ ⁷⁸¹ ⁷⁸² ⁷⁸³ ⁷⁸⁴ ⁷⁸⁵ ⁷⁸⁶ ⁷⁸⁷ ⁷⁸⁸ ⁷⁸⁹ ⁷⁹⁰ ⁷⁹¹ ⁷⁹² ⁷⁹³ ⁷⁹⁴ ⁷⁹⁵ ⁷⁹⁶ ⁷⁹⁷ ⁷⁹⁸ ⁷⁹⁹ ⁸⁰⁰ ⁸⁰¹ ⁸⁰² ⁸⁰³ ⁸⁰⁴ ⁸⁰⁵ ⁸⁰⁶ ⁸⁰⁷ ⁸⁰⁸ ⁸⁰⁹ ⁸¹⁰ ⁸¹¹ ⁸¹² ⁸¹³ ⁸¹⁴ ⁸¹⁵ ⁸¹⁶ ⁸¹⁷ ⁸¹⁸ ⁸¹⁹ ⁸²⁰ ⁸²¹ ⁸²² ⁸²³ ⁸²⁴ ⁸²⁵ ⁸²⁶ ⁸²⁷ ⁸²⁸ ⁸²⁹ ⁸³⁰ ⁸³¹ ⁸³² ⁸³³ ⁸³⁴ ⁸³⁵ ⁸³⁶ ⁸³⁷ ⁸³⁸ ⁸³⁹ ⁸⁴⁰ ⁸⁴¹ ⁸⁴² ⁸⁴³ ⁸⁴⁴ ⁸⁴⁵ ⁸⁴⁶ ⁸⁴⁷ ⁸⁴⁸ ⁸⁴⁹ ⁸⁵⁰ ⁸⁵¹ ⁸⁵² ⁸⁵³ ⁸⁵⁴ ⁸⁵⁵ ⁸⁵⁶ ⁸⁵⁷ ⁸⁵⁸ ⁸⁵⁹ ⁸⁶⁰ ⁸⁶¹ ⁸⁶² ⁸⁶³ ⁸⁶⁴ ⁸⁶⁵ ⁸⁶⁶ ⁸⁶⁷ ⁸⁶⁸ ⁸⁶⁹ ⁸⁷⁰ ⁸⁷¹ ⁸⁷² ⁸⁷³ ⁸⁷⁴ ⁸⁷⁵ ⁸⁷⁶ ⁸⁷⁷ ⁸⁷⁸ ⁸⁷⁹ ⁸⁸⁰ ⁸⁸¹ ⁸⁸² ⁸⁸³ ⁸⁸⁴ ⁸⁸⁵ ⁸⁸⁶ ⁸⁸⁷ ⁸⁸⁸ ⁸⁸⁹ ⁸⁹⁰ ⁸⁹¹ ⁸⁹² ⁸⁹³ ⁸⁹⁴ ⁸⁹⁵ ⁸⁹⁶ ⁸⁹⁷ ⁸⁹⁸ ⁸⁹⁹ ⁹⁰⁰ ⁹⁰¹ ⁹⁰² ⁹⁰³ ⁹⁰⁴ ⁹⁰⁵ ⁹⁰⁶ ⁹⁰⁷ ⁹⁰⁸ ⁹⁰⁹ ⁹¹⁰ ⁹¹¹ ⁹¹² ⁹¹³ ⁹¹⁴ ⁹¹⁵ ⁹¹⁶ ⁹¹⁷ ⁹¹⁸ ⁹¹⁹ ⁹²⁰ ⁹²¹ ⁹²² ⁹²³ ⁹²⁴ ⁹²⁵ ⁹²⁶ ⁹²⁷ ⁹²⁸ ⁹²⁹ ⁹³⁰ ⁹³¹ ⁹³² ⁹³³ ⁹³⁴ ⁹³⁵ ⁹³⁶ ⁹³⁷ ⁹³⁸ ⁹³⁹ ⁹⁴⁰ ⁹⁴¹ ⁹⁴² ⁹⁴³ ⁹⁴⁴ ⁹⁴⁵ ⁹⁴⁶ ⁹⁴⁷ ⁹⁴⁸ ⁹⁴⁹ ⁹⁵⁰ ⁹⁵¹ ⁹⁵² ⁹⁵³ ⁹⁵⁴ ⁹⁵⁵ ⁹⁵⁶ ⁹⁵⁷ ⁹⁵⁸ ⁹⁵⁹ ⁹⁶⁰ ⁹⁶¹ ⁹⁶² ⁹⁶³ ⁹⁶⁴ ⁹⁶⁵ ⁹⁶⁶ ⁹⁶⁷ ⁹⁶⁸ ⁹⁶⁹ ⁹⁷⁰ ⁹⁷¹ ⁹⁷² ⁹⁷³ ⁹⁷⁴ ⁹⁷⁵ ⁹⁷⁶ ⁹⁷⁷ ⁹⁷⁸ ⁹⁷⁹ ⁹⁸⁰ ⁹⁸¹ ⁹⁸² ⁹⁸³ ⁹⁸⁴ ⁹⁸⁵ ⁹⁸⁶ ⁹⁸⁷ ⁹⁸⁸ ⁹⁸⁹ ⁹⁹⁰ ⁹⁹¹ ⁹⁹² ⁹⁹³ ⁹⁹⁴ ⁹⁹⁵ ⁹⁹⁶ ⁹⁹⁷ ⁹⁹⁸ ⁹⁹⁹ ¹⁰⁰⁰ unconvincingly connect with בֶּקַח (comparing Dudael, Enoch 104, which is certainly not a mere 'fiction of the author'). The view here taken is, of course, quite consistent with Charles's theory (ibid. 53) that the writers of 4 Esd. 6:1-7:25 and Bar. 27-30 both used the text of an earlier work which contained the story of the six days of Creation. This lost hexahemeron, just as much as 4 Esd. 6:1-64, represents not a homogeneous tradition, but a medley of notions derived from different sources, Jewish and Oriental.

BEL (בֶּל; 𐎠𐎼𐎷𐎡𐎴 BHALOC), Ass. Bēlu, like בֶּל (Baal), is a simple appellative meaning 'lord' quite as often as it is a proper name (see PHENICIA). In the Assyrio-Babylonian pantheon it is borne by two deities (see BABYLONIA, § 26), the younger of whom, identified with Marduk (see MERODACH), finds mention in writings of the Babylonian and Persian periods (Is. 46:1 Jer. 50:2 [57:7], 51:44 (G omits)).

The extent of the cultus of this god in later times appears from the many proper names compounded with Bel in Phoenician, and more especially in Palmyrene inscriptions.² Jacob of Serap states that he was the god of Edessa (AG 29 130).

BEL AND THE DRAGON. See DANIEL, ii. § 21, and cp §§ 10, 19.

BELA (בֶּלָא; 𐎠𐎼𐎷𐎡𐎴 BALAL), -AAAL [E in Gen. 14:2], cp Jer. 51:41; BALAK [A 21], -AAAL [E in Gen. 14:2], one of the five royal cities in the vale of Siddim at the time of the invasion of CHORLOMER (ibid. § 2), Gen. 14:2-8, where the name receives the geographical explanation, 'that is Zoar.' In fact, in Gen. 19:20-21 we hear of a small city near Sodom, the name of which was called ZOAR (ibid.), to commemorate the escape of Lot from the catastrophe of Sodom and the other 'cities of the plain.' The writer of the explanation in Gen. 11:28 evidently means us to suppose that the original name of Zoar was Bela. The author of Gen. 19 (J), however, does not appear to have known this. In 19:10 the same writer speaks of Zoar as bearing that name before the catastrophe of Sodom, and a comparison of the phraseology of 25:10 makes it probable that the etymological myth in 19:20-22 does not really presuppose a change of name. It is probable that, had the name of Bela been known in the comparatively early period when Gen. 19 was written, an etymological myth would have grown up to account for it. Therefore that region is called Bela, because the ground opened her mouth and swallowed it up' (cp Num. 16:30).

Such a myth did, as a fact, spring up, but long afterwards, and not as a fruit of the popular imagination. In the Targum of Jonathan the phrase 'the king of Bela' (Gen. 14:2) is paraphrased as 'the king of the city which consumed its inhabitants.' The same interpretation was given by R. Meir and his contemporary Joshua b. Karcha (Bacher, Die Agadä der Tannaiten, 33), and is repeatedly given on the authority of 'the Hebrews' by Jer. (Quaest. in Gen. 14:2 19:10; Comm. in Jer. 15:5); it has also naturally enough found a place in the Midrash (Ber. rabba, par. 42). Hommel (AHT 195-198) boldly identifies Bela with the ancient city of Malkā, which he surmises to have been in the trans-Jordanic region; but his authority for giving this situation to Malkā is a tablet which refers not to Malkā but to Melkart (Julius, Z. f. Agypt., Aug. 1873, p. 100).

It is remarkable that no name is given to the king of Bela. When we consider the (probable) corruption of other names in the passage, it is reasonable to suppose that the name, being unorthodox, early dropped out of the text. To supply 'Bela,' with Bishop Hervey (Smith's DB), is unnatural.

BELA (בֶּלָא; 𐎠𐎼𐎷𐎡𐎴 BALAL), -AAAL [E in Gen. 36:43]. The first Edomite king, son of Beor (or perhaps Achbor; see BAAL-HANAN [1]), of the city of Dinhalah (Gen. 36:42 f. 1 Ch. I 43 f.). It is singular that a divine name in legend was called 'Bilam' (Balaam) son of Beor. With Noldeke (Uebersicht, 87) and Hommel (AHT 153) we may venture to identify Bela' and Bilam, and all the more confidently if Bilam belonged to a region adjoining Edom (see 14 THOR). Obviously the temptation which the name presented to an imaginative narrator must have been irresistible. Targ. Jon. and Targ. 1 Ch. 144 had already suggested the identification. The list which contains the name Bela ben-Beor is regarded by Sayce as a piece of an Edomite chronicle. It comes before us, however, as a thoroughly Hebrew document, and is correlated with the history of the line of Israel (Gen. 36:43-46; probably JE). Certainly it is no spot of the idealistic imagination; a true interest in the fortunes of a kindred people prompted its preservation. It may be incomplete, or it may have had some lacunae filled up ignorantly, not to speak of the undeniable corruptions of the text. Let us take the list as it stands, and see what we can gather from it.

The list contains eight names (or rather seven, for Baal-hanan has come in through a scribe's error). Four kings have their fathers' names given; six are distinguished by the name of their city, and one is described as of a certain region (HUSHAM). The names both of the cities and of the persons (or apparent persons) are not all correct. HUSHAM, MAIRID, and AL-ALAH are corrupt, and the corruptions efface the important fact that Bela (whose city was not Dinhalah but Rehoboth; cp 17:37) and Mehetabel came from the N. Arabian Land of Musri or Musur (see HIRZAH, § 28). It will be noted that one of the names occurs twice (in 17:30, 'Hadar' is certainly a wrong reading); it is properly the name of a god—of the Aramean god Hadad. From this name, and from two other items—'Bela the son of Beor' and 'Saul of Rehoboth by the river'—Bishop A. C. Hervey inferred (Smith's DB, 2, 27, 28) that there had been an Aramean conquest of Edom. The references to Bela and Saul, however, are not really in point (cp BALGAM, § 3), and all that the doubly attested HADAD, 3 [ii. 2]—together with BEDAD—can be held to suggest is that Aramean influence was early felt as far south as Edom.

More important is the historical notice connected with the name of Hadad, son of Bedad (see also HUSHAM). It tells us of the early occupation of what afterwards became the land of Moab by the Midianites, whom the Edomites under H. dad defeated. We can understand this notice in the light of Gideon's defeat of the same plundering hordes, described in Judg. 7. To make the two events contemporary, with Kautzsch in Rehm's AHT (part. 'Midian'), seems needless and hazardous.

Our most interesting as well as most certain result, however, is the antiquity of regal government among the Edomites; and, from the fact that there is no trace of dynasties, and from the continual references to the cities of the respective kings, we may probably infer, with Winckler, that the kings were of the type of Abimelech, or at the most of Saul, and that their rule, except in time of war, was little felt save by their own tribe. It is true that this will not apply to Saul of Rehoboth of the River, for this place seems to have

justice as to the origin, or at least the nature, of the word. G. F. Moore (on Judg. 19) gives a better rendering of הַבְּלִיַּל than most commentators, viz., 'the scoundrels'; this recognizes the fact that 'to suppose' is not merely worthless, as of ordinary viciousness, but gross wickedness. He also describes the different etymologies of Belial as extremely dilatory, and cannot find in the Hebrew language any analogy for the word. In fact the seemingly compound word הַבְּלִיַּל (Job 26) is primary; it is a compound of בָּלַע , 'utter vainly,' but Moore passes over Lagarde's acute suggestion in Poet. Chald., p. 47, cp. Lev. 130, that הַבְּלִיַּל is Ps. 11 [4] cp. 2) singe is an etymology (a popular one) from הַבְּלִיַּל , 'rising up.' In Lev. 1924 [1924] the present writer sought to show that Belial (הַבְּלִיַּל) is found in the OT in three senses: (1) the subterranean watery abyss, (2) hopeless man, (3) great or even extreme wickedness. The third meaning is common; the first and second are rare, and found only in late passages (see Ps. 184 [5] 28 22; P. 118 [6] 101 3 [5] 3 הַבְּלִיַּל , so read, 'deeds of detraction'] Nth. 11 15 [21], but should, if naturalness of development is to count for anything, be more nearly original than the third. It is only in Ps. 184 [5] that Belial is used to denote the abyss, and it may be objected to the view that this is the primary meaning that in Job, Job, 42, Job, 42, Samuel in Job, appears as an angel of the torment (cp. 1 Ph. 2). However, as Hensley has shown, the eschatological tradition of ANTI-MISER [21, § 337] one of whose names is Belial, is derived ultimately from the old Babylonian dragon myth, and we know that the mythic dragon has for his proper sphere the sea, though in some mythic developments he appears as a temporary inhabitant of heaven, from which at last he and his angels are cast out (Rev. 127-9). It is, therefore, in perfect harmony with the old myth to suppose that Belial may have been originally an angel of the abyss, not of the firmament.

We now come to the origin of the word. Babylonia seems to be a Hebrew indication of some earlier word, planned so as to suggest a popular etymology, בְּלִילִי belili, 'from which one comes not up again' (cp מִן הַתֵּבַת, the Ass. equivalent of a Sumerian tale of the underworld meaning 'the land without return,' Jensen, König, 218, 222). This earlier word was most probably borrowed from the Babylonian mythology of the underworld. The original word, which was Hebrewised just as דִּבְלִי 'dibge,' was Hebrewised (see DIBLU, § 7), may very possibly have been Belili,³ which is the name of a goddess of vegetation, and hence of the underworld, the sister of Du'uzu or TAMMUZ, from whom she suffers in לֵב 'able to ascend again to earth' (see Thesaur of R. 51 in Jeremia's, Biblische, Versteht, 23; and cp Jensen, Königol, 228, 272, 273). There may have been a middle form between Belili (which appears to be Sumerian—i.e., non-Semitic) and Babylia which has been lost; cp NIRUM (ib., § 2). The Canaanites and Israelites probably took the name (which three times [Is. 25, 23 28. 16, 7 K. 21 c] has the article) as a synonym for the abyss of Sheol. Afterwards it seems to have become a symbol of insatiable and malignant destructiveness (cp אָבְדָה, and hence the phrase 'sons (son, daughter) of Belial'; but the older meaning was not forgotten, as we see from Ps. 184, 3). The adoption of Baudissin (Hefzog,⁴ s.v. 'Belial'), that 'streams of the under-world' (Ps. l.c.) would be a unique phrase, is of no moment, for the whole context is in some important respects unique. It is not a flood from the sky that overwhelms the speaker; it is a flood from below—i.e., the 'waters of death,' which are

Both for the sake of exegesis and on account of the importance of Jewish semi-mythological modes of thought, it is needful to be clear as to the course of development of the meanings of Belial, and to form a probable con-

a primitive element in Babylonian mythology (see CAINUS, § 6).

Hommel, while accepting this identification, proposes a modification of the theory. He thinks that the Assyrian-Babylonian phrase quoted above was simply translated by the Canaanites, from whom the name was borrowed again by the Babylonians as Belhi (Eup. Times, 8472). This is plausible; but we should like to know how far this theory would lead us.

In Eup. Times, 940 ff., Bandissin returns to the subject. He still maintains the derivation of Belshazzar from Bel and Shazzar, and thinks that some of the occurrences of the word may possibly be due to editorial manipulation, and that the word explained as 'worthlessness' 'wickedness' does not look very ancient. He also quotes a communication of Jensen, which Cheyne in his answer regards as favourable rather than otherwise to the new theory, though Jensen himself expresses his agreement with Bandissin. See Eup. Times, ix, 8, and also Che. Paras., 2, on Ps. 1845 (popular etymology from שָׁזַר, 'to swallow up'; שָׁזַר, however, is intensive, cp König, Lebrigh., ii, 1402).

BELLOWS (שָׁזַר), properly 'instrument for blowing'; פְּנֵיחָתֵר, mentioned only in EV of Jer. 6, 29¹ in connection with lead-smelting; see MEALS, § 2.

In Egypt bellows were used as early as the time of Thutmose III. A leather bag was fitted into a frame from which extended a long pipe to the fire. Two bags were used, upon each of which the operator placed a foot, pressing them alternately, while he pulled up each exhausted skin with a string that he held in his hand (Wilk. Ann. Eg., 2112 ff.). In one illustration Wilkinson notes that when the man left the bellows they were raised as if full of air, thus implying a knowledge of the valve. The earliest forerunner of the bellows seems to have been a mere reed or pipe, which was used by smiths in the age of Useresen (2214, illustration p. 11, fig. 3).

Whether hand-bellows were used by the Hebrews for domestic purposes is quite unknown; for a description of a primitive kind still used in Egypt see Wilkinson (ii, 313).

BELLS, in the modern sense of the word, though used as ornaments at the present day in Syria, do not seem to have been known to the ancient Hebrews. The words so rendered require examination.

1. שֹׁמֵר (šomer), used of the golden ornament worn alternately with פִּתְיוֹת (šifot), were worn upon the ephod (Ex. 28, 33 ff., 39, 25 ff., šomer); cp also in the Heb. of Eccles. 49, 2 and šomer, and see Cowley and Neubauer ad loc.. Their purpose is related in Ex. 28, 35.

2. שֹׁמֵר, šomer (šomer), 'cymbals', upon which were inscribed the words, 'Holy unto Yahweh', were worn by the horses in Zechariah's prophecy (Zech. 14, 20, AVwg. 'bridles'; so ἵππων and Vg. ferunt).

In both cases small discs or plates are meant, the שֹׁמֵר being possibly similar to the שֹׁמֵר or crescents (see NECKLACE) of Judg. 8, 26.

BELMEN (RV Belmain) is mentioned, in connection with the defensive measures of the Jews against Holofernes, in Judith 4, 47. The readings are ΒΕΛΜΑΙΝ [A], ΒΑΛΑ [B], ΔΒΕΛΑ [N]; Syr. ܒܠܡܝܢ (Abel-meholah); Vet. Lat. Abelmin. Belmen would thus appear to be the same as the Belmain [EV] (ΒΕΛΒΑΙΝ [BA], ΔΒΕΛΑ [N], Syr. ܒܠܒܝܢ). Vg. Belma, Vet. Lat. Abelma of Judith 7, 2, which, obviously, is regarded as lying near Dothan, and therefore cannot be the Abel-mann of 2 Ch. 16, 4, nor perhaps the ΒΑΛΑ-HAYON of Ct. 8, 11. The place meant is probably Abelmin (modern Bir Bel'min), a town of strategical importance. In Judith 8, 3, this place is probably intended by BALAMO RV BALAMON (βελανων [BA], Syr. ܒܠܡܝܢ), and if we might assume that the translator had a correct text and understood it rightly, we should be justified in restoring βελανων for βελανων in 4, 4. Certainly none of the readings in 4, 4 can be accepted as reproducing the original name. T. K. C.

BELSHAZZAR, or, as, following the Greek form, he

is called in Barnab. 11, 7, Balthasar, RV Baltasar (Βαλθασαρ), or, less correctly, Βαλθασαρ; Βαλθασαρ [ἔ], which is also used as the equivalent Βελθασαρ, Belshazzar,¹ see DANIEL ii, §§ 2, 13, was according to the Book of Daniel, a son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. The length of the reign of Belshazzar is not given; but we read in Dan. 8, 1 of 'the third year' of his reign. In Dan. 5, 30, [1 ff.] it is stated that he was slain, and that on his death the empire passed into the hands of Darius the Mede. All references to Belshazzar in other authors, including that in the apocryphal Book of Barnab. (11, 7), appear to have been suggested by the passages in Daniel; and, since it is now recognised that the Book of Daniel was composed in the second century B.C., the narrative is open to question.

Till quite lately it was the fashion to follow Jos. (Ant. x, 112) in identifying the Belshazzar of Daniel with the last Babylonian king, Nabonassar, whom Jos. elsewhere calls Nabodonosor (in a citation from Herodotus; see Ant. 1, 204); in Herod. 1, 77, 138 this king appears as Ναβονοσος, and in Abydenus (quoted by Euseb. Pr. 1, 941) as Ναβαριονος. Against the identification of Belshazzar with Nabonassar it was urged that the latter, according to Herodotus, was not even a relation of Nebuchadnezzar, but 'a certain Babylonian' who usurped the throne in consequence of a revolution; nor was Nabonassar slain, like the Belshazzar of Daniel, on the overthrow of the Babylonian empire, but is stated to have been sent to the province of Carmania (the modern Kirman). These objections were so serious that a few writers, in their anxiety to defend the narrative of Daniel, identified Belshazzar with Evil-merodach (2 K. 25, 27).

The discovery of the Babylonian inscriptions has refuted both of the above-mentioned theories, and has at the same time confirmed the opinion that the narrative in Daniel is unhistorical. An unhistorical narrative, however, is not necessarily a pure fiction, and in this case it appears probable that the author of Daniel made use of a traditional story. It is now known that Nabonassar, the Nabū-nā'id of the inscriptions, who reigned from 555 to 538 B.C., had a son called Bēl-sar-usur (i.e., 'Bel, preserve thou the king'), a name of which Belshazzar is evidently a corruption. In a celebrated inscription Nabū-nā'id offers up a prayer in behalf of 'Bēl-sar-usur, the exalted (or, my first-born) son, the sprout of my body (lit. heart)'; see Schr. COT 2, 131, and also Kt 36, 30 ff. Moreover, in certain contract-tablets, dating from the first, third, fifth, seventh, eleventh, and twelfth years of Nabū-nā'id, Bēl-sar-usur, the son of the king, is expressly named. Several other tablets of the same reign speak of a 'son of the king'; but whether in all these cases Bēl-sar-usur is meant cannot be determined, since Nabū-nā'id appears to have had at least one other son.² It is, however, generally believed that Bēl-sar-usur must be identical with the prince mentioned in an inscription of Cyrus, which informs us that in the seventh, ninth, tenth, and eleventh years of the reign of Nabū-nā'id, 'the son of the king' was at the head of the army in Akkad - i.e., Northern Babylonia. Unfortunately, this very important inscription is mutilated, so that we learn nothing of the years twelve to fifteen of Nabū-nā'id, and in the account of the sixteenth year only a few words are legible. Of the seventeenth and last year of Nabū-nā'id there is a long account; but it would seem very doubtful whether 'the son of the king' is mentioned

² Darius Hystaspis tells us in one of his inscriptions (Spiegel, Alters. Keilinschr., 10, 1, 134) that early in his reign a rebellion was raised at Babylon by an impostor who professed to be 'Nabukkadrezzar, son of Nabonassar' - i.e., Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabū-nā'id. This proves, at least, that at the time in question Nabū-nā'id was believed to have had a son named Nebuchadnezzar. See Che. Journ. Rel. 1, 6, 1, 1, 1.

The other fact consisted in his slaying a 'Misrite' (2 S. 23:21) i.e., a man of Musr or Musri (see MIZRAIM, § 2). This hero is twice mentioned in a list of no value in 1 Ch. 27 (37-38). Each time there is an inaccuracy. again.¹ In any case, it is implied that Nabū-nā'id, not Bēl-Sar-nūr, was at this time commander of the army in Akkad (see ZSR 17 139-170, KR 3 6 132-137, and O. E. Hagen, 'Keilschrifturkunden zur Geschichte des Königs Cyrus' in the Beiträge zur Assyriologie [ed. F. H. Schmidt and Haupt] 2 214-225 [1911]). We possess, moreover, another inscription of Cyrus, describing the conquest of Babylonia at considerable length and expressly mentioning King Nabonid, but without any reference to a 'son of the king' (see JAL, new series, 127-37, KR 3 6 132-137, and Beiträge zur Assyriologie 22 1-133). Hence there is nothing to prove that Bēl-Sar-nūr played any important part at the close of his father's reign, and it is even possible that he may have died some years earlier.

This it will be seen that, apart from the similarity of names, the historical prince Belshazzar bears but a very slight resemblance to the Belshazzar of Daniel. The one is the son of the usurper Nabina'id; the other is the son of Nebuchadnezzar. The one is, at the most, heir to the throne; the other is actually king, for documents are dated from the year of his accession (Dan. 7:1-8:1). Moreover, if the ordinary rendering of Dan 5:7-18:20 be correct, Belshazzar is represented as sole king, for a man who can of his own authority make any one he pleases 'third ruler in the kingdom' must clearly be supreme in the state. Since, however, the word translated 'third ruler' occurs nowhere else, and is of very doubtful meaning, it would be unsafe to press this argument.

In order to prove that Bel-Sar-usur reigned conjointly with his father, it has sometimes been asserted that king Marduk-šar-usur, who is mentioned on certain Babylonian tablets, must be identical with Bel-Sar-usur; but Assyriologists now admit that king Marduk-šar-usur reigned before Nabonid, and identify him with Nergal-šar-usur (550-555 B.C.; see ISRL 1.6.16), and the identification of Bel-Sar-usur with Nabonid is untenable. It has likewise been urged that, though Bel-Sar-usur was the father of Nebuchadnezzar, he may have been a grandson of Nebu-bel-shar-usur through his mother; but the theory that Nabonid married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar rests upon no evidence whatever.

It remains, therefore, altogether uncertain how the story in Daniel really originated; but, besides the similarity of the names Belshazzar and Bel-Sar-usur, there is at least one reason for thinking that King Belshazzar was not invented by the author. Herodotus, as has been mentioned, calls the last Babylonian king Labynētus, representing him as the son of an earlier Labynētus, the famous Nebuchadnezzar. Further, in a Chaldean legend related by Abdenus, the last king of Babylon seems to have figured as a son of Nebuchadnezzar (see Schr., "Die Sage vom Wahninn Nebuchadnezzar's," in the JPT, 1881, pp. 613-629). The date of the historian Abdenus is indeed doubtful; but he can hardly have borrowed either directly or indirectly from the Book of Daniel, so that the agreement of these three accounts in wrongly describing the last Babylonian king as a son of Nebuchadnezzar must be due to their having followed some popular tradition. BEN (12, § 6f), a Levite, enumerated between Zechariah and Jazziel (1 Ch. 15:13f). G^h renders 'Ζαχ. ιδὸς Ιαζζιζ', but G^{ms}, no doubt rightly, omits. The name is wanting in the parallel list in 1 Ch. 15:20. Cp JAZZIEL.

bane of karach [Vg. 1; 𐤁𐤏𐤍𐤕𐤕𐤁]. It appears in Ass. (upon a inscription of Sennacherib) as karitibarka (p. A 11, 172). Jerome mentions a village Pirra, which was situated near Aedusa. The name (properly a clan name) may be paraphrased, 'Sons of the storm god' (Kinnun or Rimmon) (who was sometimes called Rimmon-laki, see HARRAK), and is thus of interest as a survival of the old Canaanite religion.

1. Name. to the letter K at the end of the name. The divine name Br was confounded by a Hebrew scribe with the Aramaic bar, 'son,' and translated into Hebrew as Bar (𐤁𐤓 bar), and Br was (unwritten text); hence arose the wrong form Ben Hadad. The name in Assyrian is rdā IM-ḫī, where the ideograph IM is most naturally read Rammān (the Assyrian thence got, cp P's RIMMON, but may of course be read and probably was read also) Br or Bar (cp the name Ben ḫadīn, and see B. 114, 115). The meaning is 'Br is my glory.' See W. Alt Ugarit, 18 ff., who controverts Schr. and Del.; but cp Schr. A 172 200, Del. et Ugarit, Lex 2 97, and Hupprecht, Lex. ugaritica, 70-71.

The name Ben hadad is used as a general name for the kings of Damascus in Jer. 49: 23; but as this passage

2. Benhadad I occurs in a very late oracle, made up of borrowed phrases, the use of is of no historical significance. In fact, Amos, from whom the author of Jer. 49, borrows the phrase 'the palaces of Benhadad,' means most probably by Benhadad (Am. 14) the first king of Damascus who bore that name; he speaks, in the parallel line, of 'the house of Hazeel,' Hazeel was certainly a historical person; he was the successor of Benhadad I. (others say Benhadad II). Consequently, Benhadad 'in Amos's phrase 'the palaces of Benhadad'—cannot be a merely typical name, as in the imitative passage, Jer. 49 7. There are two (some, however, say three) Benhadads in the Books of Kings, just as there are (really) two Hazeels (see HAZEEL).

1. BEN-YASAD I., son of Tadmunn, was the ally of ASA (q.v.), 1), king of Judah, against Baasha, king of Israel (1 K. 15 13 ff.). He was an energetic king, and constantly involved in warfare, not only with Ahab of Israel, whom he appears to have besieged in Samaria (2 K. 6 f.), but also with Shalmaneser II. of Assyria. In 854, at the head of a Swo-Palestinian league which included Israel, he opposed Shalmaneser, not without success. For, though Shalmaneser claims to have been victorious at Karkar (near Hamath), he certainly had to return to Assyria to prepare for a more decisive campaign. Again in 849 and in 848 Shalmaneser, though normally victorious, had to return. Convinced that he had no ordinary opponent, the Assyrian king entered on his next campaign with a much larger force than before. Ben-Yasadi, however, had taken his precautions, and again it was only an inconclusive victory that was gained by Shalmaneser. On the relations between Benhadad and Ahab, in which there was apparently a change for the advantage of Israel, see AUBB. § 4 ff. Benhadad is sometimes referred to, not by name, but as 'the king of Syria'; see 1 K. 22 2 K. 5 63 ff. Some unnecessary trouble has been produced (1) by the supposition that the period between 'Benhadad's' assistance to ASA and 'Benhadad's' death (which occurred between 845 and 842) was too long to be assigned to a single king of Damasci, and (2) by the reading of the name of the opponent of Shahrnām as Dad'idri, which, again, is supposed to be equivalent to Hādīd cār. On the first point it is enough to remark (after W.) that Bar ḥimmon may (Kerouān et Hezroun not being identical) have been for a long time contemporary of Khāshā and Asā, so that only about forty years may have elapsed between Bar ḥadād's war with Khāshā and his death. On the second point, it may be doubted whether the reading Dad'idri is tenable; the equation IM (Kamian or Bīr) appears to have been made out (see above), and even were otherwise, it could hardly be held that 'idri is 'the Aramaic form of cār' in 82278 (Sayce, Iran and Assyria), for an 'g' would have made the alteration of 'idri into 'cār impossible. 'Idra (Idrara, whence 'idri ('my ...'), seems in fact to be derived from 'adri 'to be wide, grand' (778, cp. Heb. 778). On the narrative of the death of Bar ḥadād (cf. K. Sayce, Iran and Assyria), see also the note on p. 100.

3. Benhadad II. but the son of Hazael (possibly the grandson of Benhadad I.). The oppression of Israel, begun by Hazael,

3. Benhadad II. (probably = Mari). But the son of Hazael (possibly the grandson of Benhadad I.). The oppression of Israel, begun by Hazael, was continued by this Benhadad (2 K. 13: 3). But was his name really Benhadad? Kamman-nirari III. (see ASSYRIA, § 32) mentions a king of Damascus named Mari, whom he besieged in his capital, and compelled to pay tribute. This event must have occurred between 806 or 805 and 803. Now Benhadad II. is represented as a contemporary of Jehoshaphat, son of Jehoi, who probably reigned (see CHRONOLOGY, § 34) from 844-793. It is difficult to suppose that another king named Mari came between Hazael and Benhadad. More probably Mari, and not Benhadad, is the right name of the son of Hazael. This king may have sought to compensate himself for the blow inflicted by Assyria, by exercising his power over Israel. (For a different view of the Benhadads see DAVIES, op. cit. § 7.)

BEN-HAIL בֶּן-חַיִל, 'son [mnm] of might', one of Jehoshaphat's commissioners for teaching the Law (2 K. 17: 7). The name, however, is suspicious. Berthelm quotes Ben-hosed ('son of lovingkindness'), 1 K. 14: (MT), but the reading there is doubtful (see B. Alt, Test. D. § 3). GEM and Pesh. read בֶּן-חַיִל (בֶּן-חַיִל τῶν ἀνδρῶν; but G. adds τὸν νόμον αὐτοῦ); cp Gray, III-A 65 n. 2. If the story of Jehoshaphat's commission is only 'ideal,' we may surmise that the name Ben-hail is equally unhistorical.

BEN HANAN (בֶּן־חָנָן) —i.e. 'son of a gracious one'—a patronymic; ΥΙΟΣ ΦΑΝΑ [B], Υ. ΑΝΑΝ [A], -NN. [1.], a son of SHIMON (y.v.), a Judahite (1 Ch. I 20).

1. Prefect of Hebron of the prefect whose name precedes his in the list, we shall think of one of the two southern Socohs mentioned in Joshua, either that in the mountains near Hebron, or that in the Shēphelah, SW. of Jerusalem. If, on the other hand, we consider the northern Socoh, which is whose names follow his, a northern Socoh, which is possibly referred to in early Egyptian name-lists (see

BEN-HESED

Socoth, 2), will be more suitable. The decision must be in favour of one of the two southern places of the name, because otherwise the land of Judah will have had no prophet. Which of the two southern Socoths is the right one? Probably that in the rich, irrigated country of the Shephelah, because the prophets had to supply provisions for the court. The whole land of Ephraim also fell to this lot. There are traces of this name in the N. (Hithir, 1, 2; cf. Ephraim, Hapharaim). But if this place is the only southern one, we must expect the land of Ephraim to be some large district (this, indeed, is implied by 'the whole land'). In 1 Ch. 11, 17 we hear of a Heber (הֶבֶר) who was the father of Socoth. Plainly this Heber is closely connected with Hebron (as the hebr. ḥayyūnān), and ה are easily confounded from a phonetic cause: we should, therefore, probably read הָבֶר הָבֶר, 'the whole land of Heber,' or, better, 'of Hebron' (הֶבְרֹן).

2. His place of residence is in MF called Ammbath. Arab in Josh. 15:2 (see Klo.) does not help us. (55)

2. Residence

2. Residence at Mareshah? ^{applied} cut the knot by reading מֶרֶשָׁה for מֶרֶשָׁת. Analogous phenomena elsewhere suggest that מֶרֶשָׁת should be מֶרֶשָׁה, and that it has been misplaced, מֶרֶשָׁה (מֶרֶשָׁה) in 7: 8 [H.], perhaps for 'Beth-horon' (comb'd, of course, be only a mutilated form of a name). To read 'Bethlehem' would be much too bold, and Beto-gabrah (mod. Bet fibrin) would not suit, since the name occurs late, and (as Huhl points out, Zhl. 192) the description of the battle of Mareshah in 2 Ch. 11:2 is opposed to the assumption that there was a town on the site of Beto-gabrah in early times. It is quite possible, however, that the neighbouring town of Mareshah had a second name – surely Beth-gabrim, but perhaps Beth-horn, 'place of ewes' – that has been corrupted into Arul-poth. מֶרֶשָׁה may have been partly mutilated and partly corrupted in the re-ec into מֶרֶשָׁת, whence מֶרֶשָׁה, especially if מֶרֶשָׁת was written with the mark of abbreviation (מֶרֶשָׁת or מֶרֶשָׁת). The conjecture is geographically plausible. At the present day Bet fibrin is rightly described as 'the capital of the Shephelah';² this is set forth more fully elsewhere (see E. E. C. H. R. O. 181). Suffice it to remark here that if Bet fibrin became the 'centre of the district' after the fall of Mareshah, the earlier city cannot have been less important in the time of Solomon. If Tannach and Megiddo are mentioned in the record of the prefectures, surely Mareshah, under this or some other name, must have been mentioned too. Now, Bet-fibrin is only 20 min. N. of Merfash (Marehash).

We have spoken of Bethorim as possibly an early name of Mareshah. This designation would harmonise excellently with the natural features of the neighbourhood of Mareshah and Betogabra. The excavation of the caverns which now fill the district must have begun in ancient times. The Christian and Islamic marks and inscriptions which are sometimes found do not oppose this obvious supposition. See BETHURIM, p. 2.

We now turn to consider Ben-hesed's real name. Klostermann has made it probable that the first two

3. Real name

3. Real name
Ahijah? Prefects were described a sons of Zadok, the priest, and Shisha (Shavsha), the secretary, respectively (cp 2. 2 f.). It is very possible that אֲחִיָּה should be read אֲחִיָּהָה, 'son of the secretary,' and that the prefect was in fact the Ahijah mentioned in 2. 3. This is slightly favoured by אֲחִיָּהָה, but really rests on internal probability (cp BUDAKI). The misreading אֲחִיָּהָה is touching, as a

¹ Beth-horim, 'place of caves,' would naturally come to be explained 'place of the Horites' (see ELIYAHU ROPINSKY, § 3); the Horites were no doubt regarded as giants (gibbôr - γίγας 98), like the Anakim. Hebron is called in Targ. Jon. Gen. 12: 'the city of the giants.'

Though popularly explained as meaning the propitiator or sturdy tribe¹—the son of my right hand²—Ben-

1. Name.

1. Name. Tēman was probably at first a geographical name for the people of the southern portion of the highland district called Tēphaim (cp the expression תְּפַיִם in the old narrative 1 S. 9-10 a), just as a district of Gilead (Gad) seems to have been called Sāton, 'North' (see Zēnon; cp also Tēman, Tēmeni, Yēmen, and on the other hand eph-shaw).

It is not impossible indeed that this district was already known to the Canaanites as 'the South'; but there is nothing to suggest that it was. Indeed, it is a good deal more probable that the name means 'south of Joseph,' the Hebrews who settled in the highlands of Ephraim being known as 'the house' or 'sons' 'of Joseph,' a designation which retained this general sense till quite a late date. The question is rather whether Benjamin, at first a distinct tribe, afterwards became the southern part of Joseph (e.g., by the energy and success of Saul; as Winckler supposes), or whether it was not rather the southern part of Joseph that, under the influence of forces immediately to be described, came gradually to be distinguished from the rest of the highlanders of Ephraim by the special name of Ben-jamites, 'men of the south,' the S. part, as being the smaller upland, the receiving the distinguishing epithet.

² In the uncertainty how the present text of Judg. 20:16 arose (cp Moore, ad loc.), there is perhaps hardly sufficient ground for connecting with this etymology the story of the 700 left-handed warriors. Cp, however, also Exod. 17 and the story of the Benjamite deserters to David, who could use the bow and the sling with either hand (1 Ch. 12:2).

BENJAMIN

It is not difficult to conjecture how this would naturally come about. The platform of Benjamin Franklin

2. Land. As we have seen, historically connected with Joseph, is hardly divided physically from Judah. Indeed, although no one in country (στρωματες de p̄ a Nip̄os aitos h̄u d̄ia t̄os t̄os d̄m̄tos Jos. 14. 6, 22), it differs materially in its physical features from the northern part of Ephraim, being sterner and less fruitful in fact, more hilly etc. Moreover, valleys, running down to the Jordan (Shechem, Kelt) and to the sea (Merj ibn 'Om̄ir), exposed it to attack from the E. (Moab) and from the W. (Philistines), while a line of strong Canaanite fortress-cities (Gibeon, etc.) constituted an additional source of danger to its highland peasants. That these southerners had a certain traditional hereness¹ (Blessing of Jacob)² was, accordingly, only a natural result of their position and history. We cannot be surprised, then, that they won the right to a special name and place.

It is thus hardly necessary to assume, with Stade (ZITB 17 (4) [81]), some specific attempt or series of attempts to overcome by force the Canaanites of the cities (Jericho, Ai), perhaps under the leadership of the clan of Joshua, in order to account for the origin of a separate tribe: the general situation might be sufficient.

Mixture of race may, however, have helped to differentiate the tribe, although at least the Canaanite elements took a very long time to become thoroughly amalgamated, as we see from the story of Gibeon (Josh. 9; St. Gen 161), and still more from the hints about BEROUTH (Gen. i.),⁴ which appears to have retained its distinctively Canaanite population at least till the time of Saml: indeed, even the radical policy of the latter seems to have been only partly successful (see ISRAHAEL, I.). If the name CHER-BAK-HANIMON (Gen. i.) indicates the presence of immigrants from across the Jordan we must look for the explanation to much later times (Josh. 18:24 P.). The position of Benjamin on the marches of Joseph, however, doubtless provided opportunities for mixture also with other tribes.

Benjamin is, i.e., explicitly brought by E (Gen. 35.13) into connection with a tribe called IN SARA (7.7.), while the first least etymologically, with the disappearance of RAHUB (7.7.). If SARA is really temporarily settled in this neighbourhood before making his way south (cf. ISRAEL, § 7), it is at least worthy of note that in a Simeonite list we find a clan name, JAMIN (2.1 Ch.). It is impossible to find suggestions of some connection with his name (Lundmark on the borders of Benjamin is perhaps not beyond question). As is also BILHAI (7.7.), the hand-maid of Rachel. In Bilhau, on the other hand, to which the Chourider in his first genealogy assigns a prominent place (1 Ch. 7.10), we cannot safely see the remains of a Bilhah clan (cf. BENJAH, for the name may have been taken from the Hittite genealogy, as Jewish was taken from the Edomite (below, § 6.1a)). Historical probability is certainly in favour of the idea that, after DAN failed to establish himself, Benjamin eventually spread westwards—although some of the apparent actual traces of this are not to be trusted (see HUSCH, Gen. 46.23 [Danite]; see, however, DAN, § 8) compared with 1 Ch. 7.11 [Benjamite]; ALJAHU (1 Ch. Josh. 14.42 [Danite] compared with Judg. 1.35 [house of Joseph] 1 Ch. 8.13 [Benjamite]; see BERVIL, 31). The confused connection with Manasseh, however, that seems to

⁴ 'Son (子) of Reuben' may be a corruption of 'stone (石) of Reuben,' which may be not an alternative name of the stone, but an alternative reading for 石 (石).

The memory of the derivative or at least secondary character of Benjamin still lived in the earlier days.

4. Age. the monarchy, as we see from 2 S. 19.25-26 (cp also 20.1) with 20.21 and apparently from Judg. 1.22,¹ and seems to be reflected in the patriarchal story (FF) which tells how, last of all, Benjamin was born in Canaan.² That the differentiation of Benjamin was relatively ancient, however, we should be prepared to believe from the fact of the other branches of Joseph being called not 'brothers' but 'sons'.³ The reference in the Song of Deborah is too obscure (not to speak of its perplexing connection in some way with Hos. 5.3) to be of much use as positive evidence; while the story of Ehud, if it is perhaps hardly necessary, with Winkler (ibid. 1.138), to regard the single explicit reference to Benjamin as an interpolation (see below, § 5), may perhaps reflect the conditions of an age when no very clear line was drawn between Benjamin and the rest of Joseph (Judg. 3.27) – the men of the south and the men of the more northern highlands. At all events, by the time of David Benjamin was, owing to the energy of Saul, a distinct political element to be reckoned with, although we must not forget that, e.g., in the story of the first appearance of Jeroboam, the 'house of Joseph' is an administrative unit (1 K. 11.22).⁴

The peculiar condition of the legends relating to this tribe provokes an attempt to explain it. This must take account of two inconsistent tendencies—a tendency in favour of the tribe (Judg. 3 15 1 S. 11 21 1 K. 3 4 9 2), and a tendency against it (Judg. 19 12). When we bear in mind the central position of the tribe, and the abundance and importance of sanctuaries within and near its bounds (see below, § 9), it cannot surprise us that there were many traditions of incidents in which the tribe played a part. It is, however, remarkable that some of these have no special reference to sanctuaries.

We can hardly suppose this due to contending political interests (those of Ephraim and Judah) leading to a sort of diplomatic flattery of the boundary tribe with a view to securing its adhesion—just as there evidently was rivalry of a less open peaceable kind (e.g., 1 K. 15. 17-22). A. Herstein, who worked out this view in great detail in his able, if unequal, essay (Ursprung der Sagen vom Ephraim, Isachar, Simeon, 1871 especially 61), does not take account of the stories unfavourable to Benjamin outside of Genesis; and it seems clear that Benjamin was naturally a part of the northern kingdom (1 K. 12. 21 belongs to a much later date than 7. 20). The later history of the tribe, especially after the fall of Samaria (see below § 7), would go a long way towards accounting not only for the preservation but also for the mixed character of much Benjaminite tradition. If we wish any further explanation, it seems reasonable to seek it in a natural interest, friendly or otherwise, in the great tribal hero, the mysterious Saul and his house.

The interest in the tribe is undeniable. Israel will run any risk rather than that of losing Benjamin (Gen. 42:37); the narrative delights in detailing the various signs of special affection on the part of "Joseph," and even Judah offers himself as surety for him (Gen. 43:9). For, according to E. Reuben the first-born offers his two sons (Gen. 42:37). On the other hand, all the tribes led by Joseph reprove and chastise Benjamin, but relent and find a substitute in Jachin Gilead.

time Benjamin was a powerful tribe, and that the rise of the story of its late origin (as also Judg. 19:21) is to be accounted for similarly.

⁴ It has been argued by St. from 1 K. 4:18 [et] that it did not include Benjamin (2:17¹ 4:15 n.), but could we argue from 4:8 that it did not include Ephraim?

BENJAMIN

(Judg. 19-21), a story that is strangely parallel to Joseph's accusing Benjamin (Genesis 44). The others interceding, and Judah offering to become substitute (Gen. 44:18). What historical information may underlie this tribal story we have not the means of determining. It is far older than its most-worthiness in representing a story which appears in it, practically wiping out the tribe that was not so very long after it, to give its first order to a united 'Israel' (see also below, § 7, end, on post-exilic interest in Benjamin).

Benjamin was in a sense at the centre of the religious life of the land. What the religious history of

6. Religious position.

ANATHOTH (cp. 1) may have been we can only guess; but there were sacred missiles and trees that bore the names of DIBBATH (Gen. 35:8; Judg. 4:1) and RABATH (Gen. 35:16; Jer. 31:15), and Ramoth, Gaba, Gabaah, Mizpah, Gibeon, Gilgal,² not only were Canaanite sanctuaries but also continued to be of importance as such in Israel; indeed, Gaba, which or perhaps it was the neighbouring Gibeon (one writer calls 'Gibeon of God' (1 S. 10:5), was perhaps selected by the Philistines as the site of their idol because of its sanctity (1 S. 13:1) and especially 10:5; cp. SAM. II, § 2 n.) as well as because of its strategic position.³

More important still, perhaps, Bethel itself, the famous royal sanctuary (Am. 7:13), where, according to the story, Israel encamped after crossing the Jordan (see BETHEL), is said by P to have belonged to Benjamin (Josh. 18:21). No doubt the Chronicler afterwards (1 Ch. 7:28) assigns it to Ephraim; but (though it may well have been a border town with connections on both sides) that is perhaps only because he could not conceive of Benjamin, a tribe that he regarded as belonging to the southern kingdom, extending so far north. At all events, there was reason enough for the words used of Benjamin in Dt. 33:12 (cp. Dt. 28:14, and see below, § 8).

He (i.e., Yahweh) encompasseth him all day;
And between his shoulders shall he dwell.

It seems, therefore, not unfitting that this tribe, martial though it was, should for all time, whatever view we take of the character of Saul, be associated with two of the greatest names in the history of Hebrew thought and religion, representatives of two of the greatest of religious movements: Jeremiah, who was a native of a Benjamite town, and Paul, who at least believed that he was sprung from the same tribe (Rom. 11:1; Phil. 3:5; cp. Test. xii. Patr., Benj. ch. 11).

Saul's career ended in gloom; yet his work was not entirely undone. It was, therefore, a matter of course that the men of Benjamin (especially the Bichrites, see below, § 9 ii, β), even more than the rest of the house of Joseph, should dislike being subordinated to the newly-risen house of Judah (SHIMON, 1), and should embrace any good opportunity to assert their claim (SHERA, ii, 1), and that, along with the rest of the house of Joseph, they should throw in their lot with HERODAS (1). We have, accordingly, no reason to question the accuracy of the statement in 1 K. 12:20: 'there was none that followed the house of David, but the tribe of Judah only' (cp. Ps. 80:1 [3] and Hos. 5:8 with We's note, and see ISRAEL, § 28; Jericho is regarded as north-Israelite in 1 K. 15:27-16:15 ff.). However, as Jeroboam was not a Benjamite, and the capitals of the northern kingdom were always in the northern parts of Joseph (cp. ZAKETHAN II), Benjamin does not appear to have

³ We have even tried to show that Gibeon was believed by some to have been the seat of Israel's famous shrine, the 'ark'; but he takes no account of the discussion of KOSTERS (ThP 27:11-1781 and; cp. Aek, § 5).

⁴ Note the Arabic metaphor, WRS, Ara, 46 (600).

⁵ We cannot argue from 2 Sam. 21:9, for 'Judah' here means, not, as the Chronicler (1 Ch. 21:6) oddly supposed, a tribe, but the southern kingdom (the Chronicler thinks it necessary to try to explain away the attempts of Shimon to understand him why Benjamin and Levi were not numbered).

really gained by this step. In fact, it seems to have eventually gravitated more and more southwards. Indeed, lying on the border between the two kingdoms, it was important strategically rather than politically; and, although we cannot very well follow the detail of the process, some of its steps seem to have been at one time or another, and more or less permanently, incorporated in the southern kingdom. The story that the northern kingdom received in 722 was favourable to this process, and in another sense the sack of Jerusalem in 586. Thus in Jer. 31:1 the land of Benjamin is included in an enumeration of the various districts of the territory of Judah: viz. the Shephelah, Negbe, etc. (just as in 2 K. 23:13 from Gaba to Beersheba). Like other Gaba to Ramoth in Zech. 14:1 stands for the whole land of Judah, and in Jer. 41: Jeremia's captives are living in Jerusalem, and so in the century following the rebuilding of the temple, Benjamin is regularly mentioned alongside of Judah, the combination of names appearing often to mean the families that were not taken to Babylon (cp. KOSTERS, Herodotus, p. 100), and the Jews came to believe that Rehoboam's kingdom had from the first consisted formally of these two tribes (cp. Ps. 68:1 [2] Chon. psalm and a late writer in 1 K. 12:20). Hence we need not be surprised at the fitness with which Benjamin, as compared with the other Joseph tribes, is treated in the book of Joshua (Dt. 27:12), or at the frequent and copious Benjamin lists in the Chronicler (see § 8 f.). Only we must remember that these tribal distinctions were in later times theoretical. Simon (2 Mac. 3:4), Menelaus, and Tysimachus were Benjamites; for the explanation of Menelaus' mythic genealogy (Shimon, Kish, Benjamin, see ISRAEL, § 2 f.).

(a) Although the priestly writer's conception of the frontier of Benjamin is not even self-consistent, the Arabian, a point in Judah N.

8. Late Writers' statistics: geographical. boundary (Josh. 15:6), being assigned first to Ben to Judah and then (1 S. 3:20) if the text is correct; see BATH. ARABAH, 1) to Benjamin, it can be identified roughly.

From the Jordan near Jerich, he makes it pass up to Beheaven and Bethel (Bethan), where it turns S. to Anathoth (possibly Thana) and thence W. to Bethel on the border (Bethel), returning by Kirjathsemm and Neptah (Z. 14:4), circling round the south of Jerusalem through the vale of Hinnom and the plateau of Kaphum, and by the spring of Rogel, and finally returning by Enshelem (1 S. 3:20) and the valley of Achor to the Jordan at Bethel (Josh. 15:6) or Kaphum (Josh. 15:6).

What led P to fix on this line, the southern stretch of which he repeats with greater fitness in the delineation of Judah (Josh. 15:6), we cannot say; nor can we say why he makes the boundary run south of Jerusalem. The 'Blessing of Moses' has indeed been taken to imply (Dt. 33:12; see above, § 6) that in the latter part of the eighth century Jerusalem was held to be inside the boundary of Benjamin; but 'by him' in the first line is probably due to a clerical error, and line 3 is quite indistinct; nothing points specially to Jerusalem. Stade (GHV 1:122) proposes Gibeon; perhaps Winckler would suggest Gibeon; Gori, however (ThP, 1880, pp. 297-300), pleads vigorously for Bethel, and nothing could be more appropriate in a poem so markedly north-Israelitish. It is plain enough, on the other hand, that Jerusalem is assigned to Benjamin by P (though he avoids giving the name of the town, speaking simply of 'the Jehusite'), and, if we do not know precisely why he does so, we can at least see that he has a purpose of some kind, for in Jung I am it is quite clear that the editor has for the same reason twice substituted 'Benjamin' for the original 'Judah', which we find in the otherwise identical Josh I. 1. 1. We must conclude that, whatever conceptions prevailed in later times, in the days when tribal names were really in harmony with geographical facts of one kind or another, Jerusalem was located to Judah.

(6) Many late lists of Benjamin towns have been preserved. The only one is the rhetorical enumeration of twelve places on the path of the Assyrian invader (Is 10: 1-6).

Of the six names in it which are not mentioned in any of the other lists, two are those of towns the sites of which are known with certainty: MICHIMASU (Miyama) and KOKIM (Kokim).

2. P's list (Josh 18:23) comprises, in eastern and a western group, viz., a group of twelve (to which he adds in 21:18 two others) and a group of fourteen towns.

Of these twenty-eight the following sixteen may be regarded as identified, some with certainty, others with a high degree of probability: BAHARI, BAHIR, BAHIR HODAN, ZEMZEMAN, BAHIRI, PAKHAN, GADIA, GIMGOS, RAMAN, BERECH, MIZIR, TIRI, PIRKAN, GOR, THE SETHI, LURBATH, KORDATH, ANATHOTH, ALMOG (see ARAMOTH).

3. Noh. II p. 13 contains a list of some sixteen towns alleged to be settled by Benjamites. The list, which may be incompletely preserved, is more and more assigned, by scholars of various schools, to the time of the Chronicler (see Tourey, Comp. and Hist. Value of Ezra-Neh. 42; Mey. Leutsch, 107, 189); at all events, it cannot be early.

On the eleven new names (unless the Via of p, q be the Assim of Jish, 182.) not in the Jish lists, four may be regarded as phonetic beyond dispute: HAYIN, SEHMAI, LOP (see LIVRO, 11, 10).

§ 4. In the list Nov. 7, Ez. 2, 1 listed 5 (see Ezr. v. ii. § 2, vi. 2, 7, 14 and 176-22 respectively, seem to indicate the places, apparently places where members of Ezra's congregation were resident, mostly within old Babylonian territory rather than old Judean territory.

For the purpose of N. 1, we have still five other new names, of which, however, some seem to be spurious, and only N. 10, 11, 12, and 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839,

Other places perhaps in Benjamite territory are BAYL-HAZOR (2 S. 13:24) and NUTAL (see Moore, loc. cit., 443).
Eisd. also adds a CHADVAS and AMMIDOR (CHAD-ASAL).

9. Genealogical. Lists of Benjamite clan or personal names (sometimes, of course, including plur. names) are many. They have mostly, however, suffered much at one stage or another in transmission.

(i.) It's two (Gen. 46 = Nu. 26) etc., as usual, different versions of the same list.

They probably contain two triplets (x) BuA BuA BuA - Ashb₁, and (y) BuA Naom₁ Mhr₁ and a third triplet, not quite so certain, (z) Shp₁ Hap₁ Ard₁.

(ii.) The Chromides two (t Ch. 7 and t Ch. 8) are more difficult to understand, but are constructed more or less on the same scheme.

(b) In (1) Ch. 7, v. 2, sons of the first triplet of which, however, Ashbel, 'Man of Beel', is the most 'familiar' of E132. Certain post-heraldic heralds appear to be double-symmetrical, to suppose that the symmetry was once even made it plausible a name that occurs elsewhere in the Chironides genealogy. In the post-heraldic heralds, 'father' should perhaps be read 'the father of' (cf. 'father' in Ch. 1, v. 1). In that way the two places Anathoth and 'Amenoth' would be assigned to the last mention of son of Beier, as in 7.12 Shuppim and Huppim are ascribed commemoration). We can hardly argue from the Ashbel or Ashbel of the Peshitta that the change of Ashbel to Jehiel is due to an accident; for in the Peshitta 1 Ch. 76 simply substitutes the corrupt Genei list (462) of nine names (with its 'Eli and Kashi Mappan' for 'Ahiran Sauppin') for the Chronicler's list of three sons.

in 1Ch 1:38 is in part the appearance of being constructed by a very schematic form through efforts to detect a genealogical scheme have not been markedly successful, and this seems to warrant the conviction that the present obscurity is due to textual corruption. For remedying that some help can be had from the versions; but it is not sufficient. Certain suggestions (see an article by the present writer in JChO 11 (1964) 25) suggest to reduce the disorder that now prevails that there seems to be reason to believe that the genealogy was originally in all respects regular in structure, and that considerable difficulties to explain have the last mainly implied but legitimate claims, the fact of Saul and Sheba (viz., Becher), and that of Shinar (viz., Tera) are subordinated in this extra-ordinary genealogical list (as appear to be omitted altogether in 2Ch 23:29, however, Becher). It is probable that the subordination is due to corruption of the text. When emended in the way already referred to, 1Ch. 1:7-9 is reduced to P's three triplets (viz., the additional statement that Tera was the father of [Heber, Shinar] and Shinar), a rather, as statement acutely suggests (Smith (2) 2; p 100 [Heb. & Aram.]). What follows is also a reconstruction proposed in JChO, 11, in parts not a minor but a guess, but it seems extremely probable that the sons in 2Ch. 27, beyond P's three triplets, were originally (1) to Tera through Abshar (once corrupted, multiplied, and see above, [Jah] and Hushim), (2) being an intrusion of a later part of the list. Then 2Ch. 28:2 gave the pedigree of the Bihrites (for 28:27-28), and his firstborn (for 28:27-28), and the sons of the Bihrite (1; 28:28) perhaps a marginal gloss due to some backward reader of 2Ch. 28 (in their new position after the intrusion of 2Ch. 28:27 in chap. 9). Maryart then suggests that these nine verses are the result of the memory of the sons of Heber. For fuller details, see [Jah] 2. It is difficult to avoid the conviction that some reconstruction is necessary.

iii) In Neh 11:7 f. and 1 Ch. 9:7-9 we have two versions of a list of Benjamite inhabitants of Jerusalem, the original of which it is more probable that the

The names are grouped in the form of genealogies of a few persons; for which, among other reasons, Meyer proclaims the list an invention of the Chronicler (Uebers., 123). Koster, however, suggests that the genealogical form is not original (ib. etc.), and that the authority was a list of Jerusalem Beniamites living in Jerusalem before the arrival of Ezra.

of the sons of Levi is in a most unsatisfactory state is evident from a comparison with Ex. 6:17 ff. which 6:17[2] $\not\subseteq$ 20 f. [14] and 23:21 $\not\subseteq$. The MT is most obscure, and, according to Kittel, vv. 20-31 are one of the latest additions; one rendering is to take v. 20 f. as follows: "Of Jaaziah, his (Menari's) son, (even) the sons of Menari through Jaaziah his son, etc."

rightly interpreting the mind of the writer, the first name of BEN-JAMES (§ 3), given to her new-born child by the dying Rachel (Gen 35:18). Ben-on must, however, have been an early tribal name. We find the clan-names OSAM and OSAN (both in Judah; the former also in Dan), also a Benjamite city (see), nor can the existence of an ancient city called BEN-AVEN (Beth-on?) be denied. To assume, however, with Prof. Sayce (Patriarch. Hist. 1911), first that Beth-el was also called Beth-on, and next that the names Beth-on and Ben-on imply that the name of the god was dropped at Luz was On, and next that this divine name was derived from On, Heliopolis in Egypt, is purely arbitrary. Cp BEN-AVEN, AVEN (3). L. K. C.

BEN-ZOHEH (בֶּן־זֹהֵה), etym. doubtful, probably cognate with Ben-Zohel and Ben-Zohel are mentioned in 1 Ch. 4:20 (בֶּן־זֹהֵה [B]); cf. זֹהֵה [B], cf. זֹהֵה [B], among the sons of Issa of Judah.

BEON (בֶּעֹן), Num. 32:1. See BAEAL-MEON.

BEOR (בֵּי־וֹר), possibly miswritten for Achior, see BAEAL-HANAN [1]. Beor [B]; WH in 2 Pt. 2:13; 1. Father of the Edomite king BOZRA [B]; cf. Gen. 36:2 (בֵּי־וֹר [B]); 1 Ch. 1:3 (בֵּי־וֹר [B]); 2 Pt. 2:13 (בֵּי־וֹר [B]).

2. Father of BAEAL (Nu 22:5, 6; cf. בֵּי־וֹר [B], except in Dt 23:1 [B]; Josh. 1:13 [B]; in Josh. 24:9 [B] omits), called Beorak in 2 Pt. 2:13 (בֵּי־וֹר [B], following AV); Vg. Beorak; cp the Vulgate reading בֵּי־וֹר [B]; RV Beorak (בֵּי־וֹר [B]). In Nu 22:5 B. reads בֵּי־וֹר (בֵּי־וֹר [B]) for Heb. בֵּי־וֹר.

BERA (בֵּרָא), scarcely, 'with evil,' cp BERSA, these, like other names in Gen. 11, may be mutated and corrupted forms; BAAHA [B]; BAPA [1]; BAAHA [B]; Int. 1:1, king of Sodom, who joined the league against Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:8). See CHORLAOMER § 2, end.

Βερχεια [B]; ΒΑΡΑΧΙΑ [B]; a Benjamite, David's warriors (1 Ch. 12:11). See DAVID § 11, 12.

BERACHAH (RV Beracah), VALLEY OF (בֵּרְכָה, כוֹלְכֵה עֵלְיוֹתָיִם [B]), the scene of the great thanksgiving of Jehoshaphat and his people (2 Ch. 20:26). In 2 Ch. 20:26 (בֵּרְכָה, כוֹלְכֵה עֵלְיוֹתָיִם [B]), cf. כוֹלְכֵה עֵלְיוֹתָיִם [B]. The geographical knowledge of the narrator was evidently good, but that, of course, does not make his narrative any more historical (see JAHU-UMPHAL). At no great distance from Jericho there is a broad open wady, on the west side of which are extensive ruins named Bereket. Just opposite the ruins the wady itself is called the Wady Bereket (Roh. ERK. 275). From the form Bereket we gather that the true ancient pronunciation was probably Berachah, 'reservoirs.' T. K. C.

BERACHIAH (בֵּרְכִיָּה), 1 Ch. 6:24 [39], RV BERECHIAH, 5.

BERAIAH (בֵּרְיָה), § 31, 'Yahweh creates'; ΒΑΡΙΑ [1]; ΒΕΡΙΔΑ [1] B. [B]. A Benjamite, assigned to the tribe SIMEON (8); 1 Ch. 8:1. The name is probably post-exilic, 'creation' being one of the great exilic and post-exilic religious doctrines.

2. See BETH-IAH.

BEREA, 1. An unknown locality in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, where Bacchides encamped before the battle in which the Jews were defeated and Judas the Maccabee was slain (Apr. 161 B.C.). The camp of Judas was at Elasa, Eleasa, or Alasa, also unknown, but probably Ala, Ala between the two Beth-horons on the main road from Sharon to Jerusalem (1 Macc. 9:4 f.). The best reading seems to be Berea [B]; but there is MS authority also for Berea [B] and

That is בֵּרְיָה; cp 1 Ch. 7:30.

BERED

Bered (Beret) has Beredim, Josephus, Ant. vii. 10:1 has Βηρεθίμ, or, in some MSS, Βηρεθίμ. I would think of the modern Beret (Z. 1:1) in NW. from Judea to the north of the Jordan.

2. RV Beret, Βηρεθ [B], the name of the death of MISTIA, the modern Aleppo (2 Macc. 14:1).

3. Βηρεθ [B], WH in some MSS, Βηρεθ [B], or Βηρεθ [B] in Lower Macedonia, at the foot of Mt. Bermus, 5 m. above the left bank of the Hecemon (Hecemon). It has a splendid view over the plains of the Hecemon and the Axios, pine-trees and abundant olive and in the most desirable town of the district. Yet it did not lie on the main road; which perhaps accounts for its being chosen as a place of refuge for Paul and Silas in their midnight escape from Thessalonica (Acts 17:1).

A common parallel is found in Cyprian's speech against Pisco, 1. able to face the church of Thessalonica, Pisco to the east of the city of Beret (Cyprian's Epist. 1:1).

In the apostolic age Beret contained a colony of Jews, and a synagogue (Acts 17:1). They were of a 'noble' spirit (ἐξ ἑστρατίας) than those of Thessalonica — possibly because they did not belong to the purely mercantile class. Not only were many of the Jews themselves converted, but also not a few of the Greeks, both men and women (καὶ ἄνδρες καὶ γυναῖκες τῶν ἑσθρατίων καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν ἑσθρατίων, Acts 17:1). The imagery seems to indicate that the apostle was here dealing with an audience at a higher social level than elsewhere. Paul's stay here seems to have been of some duration (several months, Rams. Paul. 241), partly in order to allow him to watch over the converts of Thessalonica, only 50 m. distant, he may have been still at Beret when he made those two vain attempts to visit them to which 1 Thess. 2:12 alludes, and Timothy may have been sent to them from Beret, and not from Athens, on the occasion mentioned in 1 Thess. 3:1. The apostle was at length obliged to quit the town, as the Jews of Thessalonica had of his work, and resorted to their usual tactics of meeting to meet (παρονομήσαντες ἑαυτοὺς, Acts 17:1). Silas and Timothy were left in Macedonia, but Paul was escorted by certain of the converts to the sea and as far as Athens (Acts 17:14 f.). This hurried departure (ἐκταχθέντες, 14) may have been by the road to Dium.

The omission of the harbour is given in Acts 17:14 f. The omission, however, affords no proof that the journey to Athens was performed by land — a view which has no colour from the AV 'to go as it were to the sea' (RV 'as far as to the sea').

Possibly one of his escort was that Sopater, son of Pyrrhus, a Berean, who is mentioned in Acts 20:4 as accompanying Paul from Corinth to Macedonia. The Sopater of Rom. 16:1 is probably another person. We read in Acts 20:4 that the escort from Corinth preceded Paul to Troas; this may have been partly due to his making a detour in order to revisit Beret. W. W.

BERECHIAH (בֵּרְכִיָּה), in Nos. 4 f. בֵּרְכִיָּה § 28, 'Yahweh blesses'; BERECHIAH, ΒΑΡΑΧΙΑ [B]; ΒΕΡΙΑ [1].

1. Son of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch. 3:20 (ΒΑΡΑΧΙΑ [1], cf. [B]). 2. One of the Levites that dwelt in the villages of the Neophylites, 1 Ch. 9:16 (ΒΕΡΙΑ [1], cf. [B], not included in Nos. 11). Probably the same as the doorkeeper for the Ark, 1 Ch. 15:18.

3. Father of Meshullam in list of wall-builders (see NEMIVYU, § 1 f., Ezra, ii. 38 [1], 15 f.), Neh. 3:4 (ΒΕΡΙΑ, cf. [B]).

4. Father of the prophet Zechariah, Zech. 1:7 (ΒΕΡΙΑ [1], cf. [B]).

5. Father of the prophet Zechariah, Zech. 1:7 (ΒΕΡΙΑ [1], cf. [B]).

6. Meshullam (cf. one of the chief men of the line Ephraim, temp. Ahaz, 2 Ch. 28:2 (ΒΕΡΙΑ [1], ΒΑΡΑΧΙΑ [B])).

BERED (בֵּרֶד; ΒΕΡΑΔ [B]; ΒΑΡ [1], ΒΕΡΑΔ [B]; [Vg.]). A place in S. Palestine, or perhaps rather

8. Arabia, between which and Kadesh lay BUKR-TAMAR [77] (Gen. 16:4). Three identifications deserve mention. (1) The Tarimus, regnum

(1) The Targums represent it by the same word as that given for Shur in 7: 7. Onk, by 8275 Haggai, and Jer. Targ. by 8285 Halmus. The former word, however (cp Ar. ḥam, 'a wall, enclosure'), seems to be meant for a translation of the name Shur, not for an identification of the place. The second name is clearly the First of Heb., which is now probably ḲḲ, ḲḲāḏāḏ, in the Wady 'Ashū, about 12 m. from Beersheh, on the way to Rahubeh or Rehoboth (see Palmer, FEH 19, 1871, p. 35; Guerin, Indes, 2, 280-281).

(15) (a) identify a certain 'well of judgment' with the well of Jordan in the Terrestrial country (in which Be'er Sheva also is placed). This 'well of judgment' seems like a confirmation of the existence of Lamshepat, i.e., Kadesh (Gen. 31:38). Is this Jordan the same spot which Jerome (1810) calls Bar-el, where, he says, a well of Agur was shown in his day? (b) If, with Rowlands, we find Be'er el-Ahmar-Rot (i.e., Lat 'Ash Mirwedeh, Be'er) may be some place in the Wady esh Sheraf, on the E. side of the Jebel Dattā'a (see Palmer's map).

BERED (772), an Ephramite clm. (Ch. 7.0) (BAPAM [A], PAAM [H], om. [B]), apparently called in Nu 26.1, BICHIK, a well-known Benamite clm name. When we consider the close relation between the two tribes, the occurrence of Becher in Ephraim seems not unnatural (cp BIKHIT, 2 f.). See, however, BICHIK.

BERI (72, prob. = 782, § 7n, 'belonging to the well' [or to a place called Beri]); the name occurs twice in Phoenician, e.g. $\text{Beri}(\text{t})[\text{B}], \text{Bari}[\text{A}], \text{Beri}(\text{t})[\text{L}]$, an Ashtart family name (Cf. 73b).

BERIAH בִּרְיָה, perhaps 'prominent,' § 7; cp the play on the name in Eccl 7:3 with the play on the name BERA [7:] in Lang. ps.-Jon.: Βαρεῖα [BALE].

According to the Chronicler, Benah was a son of Ephraim, born after his brother had been slain, and he was called Benah because 'it went evil with his [father's] house' (note the assonance בִּנְיָהּ בִּנְיָהּ). This notice of the conflict with the men of Gath is enigmatical; were there family reminiscences of the border states of the early Israelites which were recorded in documents distinct from their canonical books and accessible to the Chronicler?

We preserve a sceptical attitude (Proleg. 214); Portheau and Kittel, however, think that there is here a genuine tradition, and that, on the destruction of the clans Ezer and Elad, the Ephraimites of the border districts agreed for help to the Benjamin clans, Shema and Bithai (4 Ch. 8:14). According to S. A. Tims, the basis of this story is an early tradition dealing with a raid made by Ephraimites into Palestine from the land of Goshen-2 in the wilderness which Hummel and he himself give to this tribe (see Goshen 5).

It would be unsafe to use these unsupported statements of the Chronicle as historical material. See below.

BERITES, THE (הכריתים), appear through a corruption of the text, in 2S. 20:1 (A1), where Klostermann, Kautel, Budde, and (with some hesitation) Driver, read הכריתים, 'the Berchites' (see BUDDE). The consonants כרית are, in fact, presupposed by the strange rendering of $\kappa\alpha\iota$ (καὶ παρὶς) ἐν χαλκῷ, $\kappa\alpha\iota$ $\mu\alpha\delta\alpha$ $\mu\alpha\delta\iota$. The description of the progress of SUIRA (שׂוּרָא, ii.) now first becomes intelligible.

BERNICE (ΒΕΡΝΙΚΗ [Ti. WH] for ΒΕΡΕΝΙΚΗ, the Macedonian form of ΦΕΡΕΝΙΚΗ), eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I., and sister of the younger Agrippa (Acts 25.13-26.6). She was married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis; and after his death she lived, not without suspicion of incest, with her brother Agrippa. She next became the wife of Polemon, king of Cilicia. This connection being soon dissolved, she returned to her brother, and afterwards became the mistress of Vespasian and Titus (Jos. Ant. xix.54; xx.7-8; Tac. Hist. ii.84; Suet. Ios. 74; cp Sch. GLT), and see HERODIAN FAMILY, n.

BEROTHAN (ברותח), a place mentioned by Ezekiel

BEROTHAN (בִּרְתָּן), a place mentioned by Ezekiel (17:6; אֲבוּרָא [Bṛ], יִסְרָאֵל [Y. Yisra'el], [Cṣ] in defining the ideal northern frontier of the Holy Land. It is apparently the same as Berothra (q.v.), and may be regarded as a lengthened form of Beroth. Beroth, 'wells'. As yet it has not been certainly identified. Ewald (l. c. 3, 180) connected it with the well-known Bervus (the Bervta and Bervus of the Amarna letters, the Bervtus of the List of Thmes III, [so W. M. Müller], and the mod. Bervat); but it seems clear that a maritime city would not suit Ezekiel's description. Fonkims would, therefore, place Beroth in the neighbourhood of the black brown inscriptions in the Harz Priyat, NW. of Biallee, down which wady a stream is marked in the Carte de Luban as flowing to the Orontes (PEEP Ap. 1885, p. 1081; but his philological argument seems unsound. Fauré (PEEP 8, 34), Socin (Palst.^h, 300), and v. Kiess (Zib. 121) have thought of Berothia, a village not far to the S. of Biallee; but this is only a plausible conjecture, and must be judged in connection with Fauré's general theory of the frontier (see Har, Mount 1, RUAH; ZIBADÉ. Cf. ARAM, § 6.

BEROTHAI (בִּרְתִּי, Kto. would read בִּרְתִּי), a town belonging to Hazabazer, king of Zedai, 2 S. 8:3 (אֲשֶׁר לְהַזְבָּאזַי מֶלֶךְ זִדְאִי אֲשֶׁר לְבִרְתִּי), perhaps reading בִּרְתִּי from בִּרְתִּי, to separate, shat' [so Kto.], possibly another form of the form of BEROTHAI (see, however, Klo. and the article THAI). In 1 Ch. 18:4 (where CS has the same transcription), which is parallel to 2S.8.8, for Berothai we find the name CHUS, which must be a corruption, either of the first three letters of Berothai (i.e., בֵּרוֹתַי in one of the earlier alphabetic stages, or of some other name which the Chronicler found in his copy of the old narrative.⁴ For a suggested emendation see M. ROM, op. cit.

¹ The reading $\gamma\eta\eta$ is probably supported by Θ in 1oth places, and by the $\kappa\alpha\lambda\upsilon\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$ (= $\kappa\alpha\lambda\epsilon\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$ of Θ BMJ) of Jac. Int. vii. 14. The latter's text, however, must have represented a conflated reading, for he reads Μαχωνι(σ) , which points to $\gamma\eta\eta$ 'from Cim.'

BEROTHITE (75 27), 1 Ch. 11 99. See BEROTHE.

BERYL. The Beryl as a mineral species¹ includes, besides the common beryl, the aquamarine or precious beryl, and the emerald.

1. Description.

The similarity between the beryl and the emerald was pointed out by Fluky (1972-9); the only points of distinction are the green colour of the emerald and the somewhat superior hardness of the beryl (7.5 to 8 in the mineralogical scale; specific gravity from 2.67 to 2.732).

If we leave out of account the emerald, the colours of the beryl range from blue through soft sea-green to a pale honey-yellow, and in some cases the stones are entirely colourless. The aquamarine is so named on account of its bluish-green colour, "aqua marina or pari maris imitator" (Pliny, l.c.). The beryl crystals are six-sided prisms with the crystals often deeply striated in a longitudinal direction. The great abundance of aquamarine and other forms of beryl in modern times has very much depreciated its value; but it is still set in bracelets, necklaces, etc., and used for seals.

That the beryl was known to the ancients there can be no doubt. Some of the finest examples of ancient Metals*, p. 132): the Romans cut it into six-sided prisms (agathos) and mounted them as ear-rings. It is de-enriched and decorated monas earrings. It is also clear from the evidence of Phryx (i.e., beryls) that, in later times, at least, beryl was called by the same name as now, though apart from G (see below) the name does not appear in any Greek writer till considerably after Phryx's time.² It appears, however, to have been called also αυράργος; Theophrastus seems to know three kinds of smaragdos, which may well be our true emerald, our aquamarine, and our common beryl (ibid. 24). In Herodotus, too, smaragdos is the material not only of the gem engraved for the ring of Polykrate's (344), but also of the pillar in the temple of Herakles at Lyce (244), which cannot have been of true emerald, as the noble kinds of beryl are never found of large size.

The Hebrews must be presumed to have known the beryl. We may perhaps identify it with the shikim

name.

3. Hebrew name. (272); for P tells us that the ornaments on the high priest's shoulder (Ex. 28:43-45; 39:27) were of chekem, and G renders this σφαγαιδός. We cannot always trust G's rendering of stone names (see Priester's Steine); but in this case the identification seems suitable. We are told that on each sh'ham stone were inscribed the names of six of the tribes of Israel, for which purpose a natural hexagonal cylinder of beryl would be admirably fitted it, as has been suggested, the six names were inscribed longitudinally on the six faces. The sh'ham stones mounted in circles of gold were probably therefore beryls pierced or simply mounted at the end with bosses (umbilici) of gold, like the beryl cylinders described by Pliny.

The importance given to the beryl among the Babylonians and the Phoenicians (see above) makes it all the more probable that the Hebrews would specially value it. From Gen 2:12 (later statim of J 2) it would appear that the chayim was known in Judah before the exile, and believed to abound, with good gold and bellum, in HAVILAU. The Chronicler brings chayim-stones into connection with the construction of the pre exile temple (1 Ch 29:2; but the reading may be incorrect, see ETOBY, c), while the writer of Job 28:6 classes it with gold of Ophir and other precious substances.

and versions, while Haupt, connecting it with the Assyrion samm, renders 'poem.' Deimrich, however, argues that samm means a 'dark-colored object' (Colo. Heb. Lex. v. 10 p. 10, to z. 11 c.), and Halévy connects Ass-am with Syr. šam rather than Heb. šam (Rev. Crit. 1. 34, p. 17 c.).

There is not, therefore, any reason to doubt that Ag. and Pch. are right in understanding something to sweep away with the metaphor in Is. 30. 8 [seevex], on which see A. R. C. (1911, § 10). The person of death is not unknown to mythology (cf. Die Himm. Am. Rhyn. Die Teufelsche Todkugel,²¹ pp. 147; but the figure hardly needs any mythological warrant (cf. ibid., ad. loc.).

ever, reads Tebah, and this is also favoured in 2 S. 1. c. by Θ ($\mu\alpha\sigma\beta\alpha\kappa$ [B], $\beta\alpha\chi$ [A], $\mu\alpha\tau\epsilon\beta\alpha\kappa$ [L]), where $\mu\alpha$ arises from a corrupt repetition of the preceding letter in this translator's Heb. text). Cp Isr. Hist. 315, and see TETRA.

BETANE (ΒΑΙΤΑΝΗ [B], ΒΑΤ. [N], ΒΑΙΤ. [A]), one of the places to which, according to Judith 19, Nebuchadnezzar sent his summons. The BETH-ANATH (q.v.) of Josh. 15:59 appears to be meant.

BETEN (בֵּתֵן — i.e., 'vale' or 'hollow'; — ΒΑΤΝΗ [A], ΒΑΙΘΟΚ [B], ΒΕΤΕΛ [L]), an unidentified site in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:25) called ΒΕΘΒΕΤΕΝ by Eusebius (OS 236 41), who places it 8 R. m. to the E. of Acco.

BETH (בֵּית, st. constr. of בֵּית, see BDB); the most general term for a dwelling; used of a tent in Gen. 27:15 33:17, but generally of houses of clay or stone; also of temples (cp ΒΑΪΤΗ, Beth-Bamoth [MI, L. 27]). Combinations of Beth with other words are frequent in Hebrew place-names (see NAMES, § c). In Assyrian, compounds with Bit are used as names of countries: e.g., Bit-Humri = the kingdom of Israel; Bit-Yakin (i.e., Babilonia, the country of Merodach-Baladan).

Among other interesting compounds with Beth are BEESITERRAH (C), Beth-ecked, Beth-haggan, Beth-lehem, Beth-meon (see BAAL-MEON), Beth-peor.

BETHABARA (ΒΗΘΑΒΑΡΑ [C² KT^b UAH]), Jn. 1:28 AV, is the place where John baptized, according to the reading which became widely current through the advocacy of Origen, who could find no Bethany across the Jordan, but found a Bethabara with a tradition connecting it with the Baptist. Origen, however, admitted that the majority of MSS were against him. See BETHANY, 2. Origen was followed by Chrysostom; Epiphanius, like Ann. (Lagarde), has Βηθαβα. In the present text of Origen the form varies between Βηθαβα, Βαθαβα, Βηθαβα, and Βηθαβα (the latter also in A. b. v. r. h. e. l. (mg.), arh.; see WH 2 74); in OS 210 12 108 6 we find Βηθαβα, Bethabara.

The traditional site of the baptism of Jesus is at the Makhadet Hajla (see BETHABARA, 2, where, too, it is suggested that we should read Bethabarah in Josh. 18:22). The two monasteries of St. John attest the antiquity of the belief in this site.

Couder suggests the Makhadet 'Abāra, NE. of Beisān, partly because of the nearness of this ford to Galilee and Nazareth, and partly because the river-bed is here more open, and the banks of the upper valley more retired (PEF 1875, p. 73).

Another suggestion of the same explorer (ib., 1877, p. 185) is philologically weak.

As stated elsewhere (BETHANY, 2), the true reading in Jn. 1:28 was probably Βηθαβαβα — i.e., BETH-NIMRAH, now Tell-Nimrin, NE. of Jericho.

BETH-ANATH (בֵּית אֲנָת — i.e., 'temple of Anath'; in Josh. ΒΑΙΘΑΜΕ [B], ΒΑΙΝΑΘΑΘ [A], ΒΗΘΑΝΑΘ [L]; in Judg. ΒΑΙΘΑΝΑΧ [B], ΘΕΝΕΘ [BAI], ΒΕΘΕΝΕΚ [A]), an ancient Canaanite fortress, with a sanctuary of ANATH (cp BETH-ANATH), Josh. 19:38. It is mentioned unmistakably by Thothmes III., Seti I., Rameses II., and Rameses III. in the lists of places conquered by these kings (see RP 2 552 6 13; Sayce, Pal. Pal. 160, 236, 239; WMM, Is. u. Eur. 193, 195, 220). According to Judg. 1:31, it adjoined Naphtalite territory, but (like Beth-shemesh) remained Canaanitish down to the regal period, subject only to the obligation of furnishing labour for public works. Eus. and Jer. (OS 236 45 105 20) inappropriately refer to a village called Batanara, 15 R. m. E. from Caesarea, possessing medicinal springs. But the site now most in favour — Amtha, in a valley 6 m. WNW from Kedesch — is hardly strong enough to have been that of such a fortress as Beth-anath (Buhl, P. 232; but cp Couder, PEF Mem. 1 200).

BETH-ANOTH (בֵּית אֲנוֹת; ΒΑΙΘΑΝΑΜ [B], ΘΑΝΩΝ [A], ΒΗΘΑΡΩΘ [L]). A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:59), towards the eastern border of that region, identified by W. M. Müller with the

BETH-ARABAH

Bi-t'nat of the list of places conquered by Shishak (J. u. Eur. 162). If the form Beth-anath be correct, it may be explained as = Beth-anath, 'house of ANATH' (q.v.; cp $\beta\alpha\chi$ (Josh. 21:11) and $\beta\alpha\chi$ and $\beta\alpha\chi$). To suppose a popular etymology 'place of answering' (i.e., an echo?), with Kamptfmeyer (ZDPV 163; cp J. 10 30, SB 17), is needless.

But is the form correct? Couder and Kitchener (PEF Mem. 3 11 351) identify Beth-anath with Beit 'Ain 5 m. N. of Hebron, near the sites of H. m. t. and BETH ZUR (cp BETHANE). This appears reasonable, and suggests a doubt whether the ancient name may not have been בֵּית עֵינָן, Beth-enun. It is true that Θ favours $\beta\alpha\chi$ and $\beta\alpha\chi$ (in the first syllable being unexpressed); but the case of Anem (see EN-GANNIM, 2) shows that the absence of β both in MT and in the text implied by Θ is not decisive. A spring is mentioned to the west of the ruins of Beit 'Ainūn.

BETHANY (ΒΗΘΑΝΙΑ [Ti. WII]). 1. A small village first referred to in the Gospels, 15 furlongs to the E. of Jerusalem on the road to Jericho (Jn. 11:18 Lk. 19:29, cp z. 1), and commonly identified with the Beth-Hini of the Talmud. It is no doubt the mod. el-'Azariyeh (from Lazarus or Lazarium — the l wrongly taken as the article). El-'Azariyeh lies on a spur SE. of the Mt. of Olives (cp Mk. 11:1 Lk. 19:29). Its fig, olive, and almond trees give one at first a pleasant impression; but a nearer inspection of the few houses is disappointing.

There are various romantically interesting spots connected by old tradition with Lazarus (cp the Im. Hieros. ed. Wessel, 596, the Bordeaux Pilgrim, and OS 108 3 239 10). The Castle of Lazarus (based on castellum, the Vg. translation of the Gr. καστελ) is a ruined tower, presumably anterior to the time of the Crusaders, and hard by is the tomb of Lazarus; the house of Simon the Leper also is shown.

2. The Bethany where John baptized (Jn. 1:28, Ti. WII after Ν¹ΒΑΥ, edd., RV) is distinguished from the Bethany mentioned above by the designation 'across Jordan' ($\pi\epsilon\rho\alpha\nu\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \iota\omicron\pi\omicron$); its exact situation is unknown. The reading of TR and of AV is ΒΗΘΑΒΑΡΑ (q.v.). Another suggestion is that Bethabara ('house of the ford') and Bethany (= בֵּית אֲנָת, 'house of the ship') are one and the same place (see GASM. IG 542, n. 12). The analogy of some corrupt OT forms (cp KISTION) suggests, however, that the true reading in the traditional source of Jn. 1:28 would be one combining in the second part of the name the letters N, B, and R — such a name as Βηθαβαβα. We actually find Βαυθαβαβα in OS Josh. 13:27 for the Bethnimrah of the Hebrew text. Now, the site of BETH-NIMRAH [q.v.] is well known. It is accessible alike from Jerusalem and from the region of Jericho (cp Mt. 3:5), and the perennial stream of Nahr Nimrin, which flows into the Jordan, would supply abundance of water. This theory belongs to Sir George Grove; it has been adopted by Sir C. W. Wilson (Smith's DB, 2 572, 'Bethnimrah'), and has strong claims to favourable consideration. Of course, the insertion of the words $\pi\epsilon\rho\alpha\nu\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \iota\omicron\pi\omicron$ would be a consequence of the faulty reading Βηθαβα. T. K. C.

BETH-ARABAH (בֵּית אֲרָבָה or בֵּית עֲרָבָה; once, Josh. 18:18, by a scribe's error [see Θ] simply עֲרָבָה). Josh. 18:18, ΒΑΙΘΑΡΑΒΑ [BAI]; 18:61 ΘΑΡΑΒΑΑΜ [B], ΒΗΘΑΡΑΒΑ [AL], 18:22 ΒΑΙΘΑΡΑΒΑ [B], -ΑΡΑΒΑ [M]. 1. One of the six cities in the 'wilderness' of Judah (Josh. 15:61), mentioned also as on the boundary lines of Judah and Benjamin (15:6 [Βαυθαβαβα BA; Βηθαβαβα

1 We may therefore dismiss the interpretation 'place of the wretched one' (cp the play upon Anathoth, Is. 10:34 MT). Beth-Hini is generally explained 'place of unripe fruit' (cp $\beta\alpha\chi$, 'unripe fruit,' esp. of figs). The Talmud, however, says that figs ripened better at Beth-Hini than anywhere else (Neft. Gog. Palm. 150). If so, these figs may have led to the name ΒΗΘΑΡΑΒΑ — i.e., possibly, 'house of young figs' — but the name Beth-Hini remains unexplained. Another form of the name is Beth-oni (בֵּית אֲנִי).

BETH-ARAM

L. 1818; see also BETH-BASI. The reference in 1822 must be considered separately (no. 2). The wilderness of Judah in 1561 is the deep depression adjoining the Dead Sea, together with the overhanging mountains and the barren country beyond, including probably a district in the neighbourhood of Arad (see SALT, CITY OF). Beth-arabah may have been the first or principal settlement in that desolate corner of the Arabah or Jordan valley which forms the N. end of the Dead Sea. Though mentioned twice, if not thrice, with Beth-hoglah, it must have been considerably to the S. of that place, for unless, with Knobel, we put it at Ksar Hajla (which seems rather to have been Beth-hoglah), there is no other suitable site for it till we come to the copious fountain of 'Ain el-Fishkha, near the NW. corner of the Dead Sea (31° 43' N., 35° 26' E.). The name Beth-arabah ('the house, or homestead, in the Arabah') has, therefore, a special significance (cp that of BETH-JESUTHOTH, q.v.). This indication of the site was made in writing by Robertson Smith. Perhaps, however, it is best to suppose that there were two settlements: one near the fountain (viz., Beth-arabah), the other (see MIDDIN) at the fountain.

2. It will be still easier to adopt this identification if we may follow $\mathfrak{B}^w$ in reading not 'Beth-arabah' but 'Beth-abarah' in Josh. 1822. The ford ('abarah) referred to in the name ('house or place of the ford') might then be the famous Makhadet Hajla near the mouth of the Wady el-Kelt, the bathing-place of the pilgrims, where tradition places the baptism of Jesus Christ. Such a Beth-abarah would be more naturally mentioned between Beth-hoglah and Zemaraim than a place situated at 'Ain el-Fishkha. The confusion of the two names was very easy (note the variant $\mathfrak{B}^w$ - $\alpha\pi\alpha\beta\alpha$ in Jn. 128). Cp BETH-ABARA. T. K. C.

BETH-ARBEL (בֵּית אֲרֵבֶל; $\epsilon\kappa\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma\ \omicron\upsilon\kappa\omicron\varsigma\ \iota\epsilon\rho\omicron\beta\alpha\alpha\lambda$ [B]. . . $\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma\ \iota\epsilon\rho\omicron\beta\alpha\alpha\lambda$ [Q¹]. . . $\iota\epsilon\rho\omicron\beta\alpha\alpha\lambda$ [A]. $\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma\ \iota\epsilon\rho\omicron\beta\alpha\alpha\lambda$ [Q¹]. Syntm. $\tau\omicron\phi\ \sigma\acute{\alpha}\kappa\omega\ \tau\omicron\varsigma\ \alpha\pi\kappa\epsilon\tau\eta\lambda$), a place cruelly destroyed by 'Shalman' (Hos. 1044; שְׁלֹמָן , Baer שְׁלֹמָן ; $\alpha\lambda\mu\alpha\mu\alpha\lambda$ [BAQ]). Robertson Smith in 1881 (*EB*⁹ 12206) favoured an identification of Beth-arbel with the trans-Jordanic Arbela (see OS²¹ 21172 880), now Irbid, in which case there might be a reference either to Shalmaneser III. or to a Moabite king Shalmanu mentioned in an inscription (AB 220) as a tributary of Tiglath-pileser III. Schrader (*KAT*²¹ 440-442) argues ably for identifying Shalman with the latter king, who very probably made an incursion into Israelite territory. The combination of Beth-arbel with the trans-Jordanic Arbela (Irbid), however, is improbable: Shalman should be a more important king, and Beth-arbel (if this compound phrase may be accepted) a more important fortress, than Schrader's theory supposes. Wellhausen and Nowack think that Shalman may be Shalmaneser IV.—the first Shalmaneser known to the Israelites. If so, the latter part of Hos. 1011 will be a later insertion. The reference to Beth-arbel, however, remains a difficulty. Surely the reading must be corrupt.

$\mathfrak{B}^w$ suggests a correction. Read בית ירבעם, and, as a consequence, for שְׁלֹמָן read יִרְבֵּעַם . The murder of Zechariah, son of Jeroboam II., by SHALUM [q.v., 1] is probably referred to (שָׁר , or שָׁר ?, points to a late like that of Siera; cp שָׁר , Judg. 527). A reader of Hosea justly assumed that Zechariah was not the only person who was murdered, and took the massacre of the royal family to be a fulfilment of the stern prophecy in Am. 15, which ends: 'in a storm (בְּסֻר , We.) the king of Israel shall be cut off.' The words 'mother and children were dashed to pieces' may, however, refer to the cruelty of Menahem to the women of TAPPUAH

[q.v., 2], as related in 2 K. 1516. If so, the interpolator combines two striking events which equally formed part of the divinely threatened judgment upon Israel. See Che. Expos. Nov. 1897, p. 304.

For a new but difficult theory of Hos. 1011 see Herz, Amer. J. Sem. Lang. 14207 121. The versions give little help except as to 'Arbel' (Q¹). $\mathfrak{B}^w$ preserves a trace of a theory that the reference is to the slaying of Zalmonna by Gideon, in which case Ps. 811 (12) would be parallel. $\Sigma\alpha\lambda\mu\alpha\lambda$ [B¹⁰], it is true, does not accord with this theory; but Syro-Hex. points to שְׁלֹמָן ; $\Sigma\alpha\lambda\mu\alpha\lambda$ is $\mathfrak{B}^w$'s rendering of Zalmonna, and has some authority in Hosea. Vg. gives sicut vastatus est Salmana a domo eius qui induxit Baal. The conclusive exegetical objections to this view need not here be stated. See also Field's Hexapla. T. K. C.

BETH-AVEN (בֵּית אֲוֵן, cp. Benj. 'ben-Oni'), a place to the E. of Bethel near Ai (Josh. 72, $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\upsilon$ [A], $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\upsilon$ [L], from which, indeed, it has been proposed, following $\mathfrak{B}^w$, to eliminate the name, but on insufficient grounds¹), and to the W. of Michmash (1 S. 135; where Βαιθαρων [B¹], Βαιθω [B¹⁰] are obviously wrong; 1 S. 1123 $\Sigma\alpha\omega\omega\theta$ [B], $\text{τ}\eta\theta\alpha\upsilon\gamma\eta$ [for $\text{τ}\eta\ \theta\alpha\upsilon\gamma$, A¹⁰], Βαιθαρων [L]). The site has not been identified;² but it must have been the last village on the edge of the desert country, for to this it gave the name Wilderness of Beth-aven (Josh. 1812 $\beta\alpha\theta\alpha\upsilon$ [A]; $\theta\omega\upsilon$ [B]; $\theta\alpha\omega\upsilon$ [L]). All the data point to the neighbourhood of Deir Diwan—either that village itself, or K'h. Hadyin, immediately to the S. For the rest see BETHUEL, § 4. G. A. S.

BETH-BARAH (בֵּית בָּרָה, Βαιθαρα [BA], -Βηρα [L]; the form of the second part of the name is obscure) is not to be identified with the Bethahara of Jn. 123 (R¹); it occurs only in the story of Gideon (Judg. 724), who sends to his fellow-tribesmen in the hill country of Ephraim, bidding them cut off the Midianites' retreat by holding against them 'the waters as far as Beth-barah, and (also) the Jordan.' The latter words (וְהַיַּרְדֵּן) seem to be a gloss on 'the waters' (וְהַמַּיִם). By 'the waters,' however, are really meant, not the Jordan, but the streams emptying themselves into the Jordan which the Midianites would have to pass. Beth-barah must have been situated somewhere in the wady formed by one of these streams, and there are points in the narrative which suggest locating it near the mouth of the Wady Firi'ah, between which and the Jordan the Midianites would find themselves in a cul-de-sac (Moore).

BETH-BASI (Βεθβασι [A], Βαιθβασι [N], -Bacc. [NV], -Baci [V], בֵּית בַּסִּי [Pesh.], Beth-bessuren [Vet. Lat.]), a fortified city in the desert (ἐν τῇ ἐρημῳ), the ruinous parts ($\tau\acute{\alpha}\ \kappa\alpha\theta\eta\eta\mu\epsilon\upsilon\alpha$) of which Jonathan and Simon repaired, when menaced by Bacchides (1 Macc. 9664). The Syriac (see above; cp Vet. Lat.) reads Beth-yashan (cp JESHANAN). This is probably correct; the corruptions can be easily accounted for. Jos. (Ant. xiii. 15) calls the place Beth-alaga (i.e., Beth-hoglah), which is too far from the MS readings, but may be a correct identification, though BETH-ARABAH also suggests itself. G. A. Smith, however, thinks that the second b in Beth-basi may be correct. 'In the wilderness of Judea, E. of Tekoa, there is a Wady el-Bassah, which name as it stands means "marsh," an impossible

² Possibly it was early destroyed. This, as Muhlau remarks, would account for the disparaging transformation of the name Bethel into Beth-aven (Riehm, *HWB*² 1213).

BETH BIREI, RV Beth-biri (בֵּית בִּירָא), 1 Ch. 4.31. See BETH-BIRIAH.

BETH-CAR (בֵּית קָר), Βαιθαρορ [BL.], Βελαχ. [AL.], [μεγαρ] koppaiow, Jos. Ant. vi. 2.1; [בֵּית קָר] [Targ. J.], a place, presumably in the district of Mizpah, to which the Israelites pursued the defeated Philistines (1 S. 7.11 [10.]). The phrase 'under Beth-car' is remarkable. Does it mean 'under the gates of Beth-car' (so We, IBS 68)? or does it mean 'to the foot of the hill on some part of which Beth-car stood'? No such name as Beth-car is mentioned elsewhere; hence it is at first sight too bold to identify it as PEK, not disapproved by GASn. HG 22.11 with 'Am Karim, the name of a flourishing village a good way to the S. of Nebi Samwil, and W. of Jerusalem. The name Beth-car, however, is self-evidently corrupt, and if we may amend it into 'Beth-hacerem' the identification with 'Am Karim' becomes probable (see BETH-HACEREM). Only 1½ m. to the N. of 'Am Karim is Der Vasin, not improbably to be identified with the Jashan or Jeshanah of 2 S. 12 (see Stu 8), which need not be the same as the Jeshanah of 2 Ch. 13.19.

The alternative is to read 'Beth-horon' (Klo.); 2 and 7 were, from phonetic causes, easily confounded. 'Under Beth-horon' would be a very intelligible expression; but Beth-horon is certainly too far north. The reading 'Beth-jashan' quoted from Pesh. (not 5) by G. A. Smith (IBS 224), is no reading at all, but a corruption of the text of 1 S. 7.11, as We. has pointed out.

BETH-DAGON (בֵּית דָּגוֹן), § 95, 'house of Dagon,' Βηθδαγων [AL.], 1. A city of Judah, enumerated in the third group of 'lowland' towns (Josh. 15.41, βαγαδηλ [13]). The list is so scattered and irregular that nothing can with certainty be inferred from it as to the site of Beth-dagon; but MAKKEDAH (2.7.1), which is mentioned in the same verse, must have lain off the mouth of Ajalon (Josh. 10.28). Here we find, 6 m. SE. from Joppa, a Bet-Dejan, and, 1½ m. farther S., Damm. Each of these has been identified with Beth-dagon (see Rob. BR 3.293, Clermont-Ganneau, PEFQ, 1874), and one of them (the former, according to Friedr. Del.) is probably the Beth-daganna mentioned in Sennacherib's prism-inscription (col. 2.7.64; KB 2.92). It must be remembered, however, that the name occurred in several places through Palestine. Bet Dejan nearly 7 m. E. of Nablus (see PEFmap), and, according to Jos. Ant. xiii. 8; Pl. 2.3), Dagon near Jericho, each on an important trade route from Philistia to the Jordan Valley. There may, then, have been more than one Beth-dagon on the borders of Philistia, and it ought not to be overlooked that neither Dajun nor Bet Dejan lies in the Shephelah proper. On the doubtful phrase 'land of Dagon' in Eshmunazar's inscription, and on the god Dagon, see DAGON, § 1. On Dajun see especially Cl. Ganneau, Arch. Rev. in Pal. 126 ff.

2. A locality not yet identified (but cp Gander, Hdbk. to the Bible, 68), on the border of Asher (Josh. 12.27; βαθραγαν [BL.]).

3. The temple of Dagon in Ashdod (1 Macc. 10.83, Βηθδαγων [AR.], βεθδαγων [K]).

BETH DIBLATHAIM (בֵּית דִּבְלַתַּיִם), cp Ass. dablai, 'foundation'; but see NAMTS, § 107, a town in Moab mentioned along with Dibon [1] and Nebo [iii.] (Jer. 48.22 = 31.22; εἰς οἶκον διβλαθαιμ [BL.], εἰς διβλαθαιμ [AL.]), evidently the same as ALMOUS DIBLATHAIM, which also occurs in connection with 1 (Nu. 33.40 ff.). This place (called בֵּית דִּבְלַתַּיִם, Mela. i.11), and Bēl'al Mo'on are stated by Meshia on his stele to have been fortified by himself (Z. 30).

BETH-EDEN, Ἀνὰ, EV 'house of Eden' (בֵּית עֵדֶן) εἰς ἀνὰδρων χαρραν [BAVQF], an Aramaean city or land, with a ru' o. s. own, but presumably allied to Damascus. No satisfactory identification of this place has been made. The vocalisation (בֵּית עֵדֶן not בֵּית עֵדֶן) forbids us to see in it the Παράδεισος of Strabo and Ptolemy, and equally forbids us to regard it with Wetzstein (Del. loc. 702; cp Vg. de don. vauipatio) as a poetical name of Damascus. The view, however, adopted by Schrader (A. T. 17.32 327) and favoured by GASn (see above), that Beth-eden is the Beth-eden of the inscriptions (see Edin), is not less inadmissible for this is too far to the N. of Damascus, and had in the time of Amos, long been subject to Assyria (W. A. T. Unters. 183; cp Nold. ZDMG 33.126 [70]). No doubt there were other places called Beth-eden. There is equal uncertainty as to the name Beth-eden (see AVEN, 3), which corresponds to Beth-eden in the parallel line.

BETH-EKED (בֵּית עֵקֶד), EV 'shearing house'

RV 'house of gathering', where Jehu met Amaziah's brethren, is either a place-name or (more probably) the designation of an isolated house used on certain occasions by the shepherds of the district (2 K. 10.12 14; Βαιθακαδθ [BL.]; but in 2.14 εἰς τὴν σκακκὴν [BAVQF] = καδθ [AL.]; Pesh. has 'and he was casting the altars that were on the way' [2.12], and 2.14 עֵקֶד בֵּית עֵקֶד cp Cod. Vind. of Vet. Lat. Bethuaria).

BETH-EL (בֵּית אֵל), §§ 1. 10, always the word [BL.], on Gen. 128 Josh. 7.2, RV wrongly with a hyphen.

1. Site. 'house of God' — i.e., ΒΑΙΤΥΛΙΟΝ — (cp ΒΑΙΤΥΛΙΑ, ΒΑΙΤΥΛΙΑ; see IUD. ATRV, § 2. MASSILIA; ΒΑΙΘΑ [BADEL.]; but Gen. 35.7, ΒΕΘ. [D.]; gentile Bethelites, see HULL.). 1. A town on the border between Benjamin and Ephraim, W. of the wilderness of Beth-aven (Josh. 18.12; on 12.16, where 5 omits the clause, and 5^{BE} has ΗΛΑΣ for Bethel or Makledah, see TARTARU, 2), without doubt the present Bethin (from Beith, by the common interchange of l and n), a small village (said to have 400 inhabitants), with ruins of early Christian and Crusaders' buildings, about 10 m. N. of Jerusalem. It lies on the back-bone of the central range, a little E. of the watershed, and 2800 ft. above the sea. From the village itself the view is confined to the plateau, which, like most of the territory of Benjamin, presents a bleak prospect of gray rocks and very stony fields, relieved by few trees and a struggling cultivation. A few minutes SE., however, lies one of the great view-points of Palestine, the Burj-Beitun or Tower of Bethel (probably the ruin of an early Christian monastery), supposed to mark a traditional site of the tent and altar of Abraham 'to the E. of Bethel' (Gen. 128), and of Lot's view of the 'Circle of Jordan' (13.15). Four good springs and a great reservoir amply certify the present village as the site of the city, which 'was called Luz at the first' (Gen. 28.11; οἶκος θεοῦ [ADEL.]). The sanctuary, 'God's house,' the 'place' (as it is called in Gen. 28.11, where it is distinct from the city) which grew famous enough to absorb the city's name in its own, may have lain either on the site of the Burj-Beitun, or on one of the neighbouring slopes, where there is a natural stone circle (PEFQ, 1881, p. 255); and the curious formation of the rocks in terraces and ramparts has been taken as the material suggestion of the 'flight of steps' (see LABBE) which Jacob saw in his dream (Gen. 28.10 ff.).² There he raised a pillar, or masseloh, to Yahweh, and afterwards is said (Gen. 35.1-2) by the same narrator, E (it is J who gives the previous story of Abraham's altar), to have built an altar and called the 'place' (not yet 'city') 'God of Bethel' (for which 5^{BE} has Pesh. and Vg. read 'Bethel'). Here Deborah, Rebekah's

1 Cp the Targ. בֵּית בְּנֵי שֵׁן, 'place of the gate of 2 together of the shepherds.' For eked, however, we should perhaps read u'kedim (עֵקֶדִים), and omit the next word (in 2.12, not in 2.14) ha'edim (עֵדִים) as a gloss; u'kedim was a less common word for 'shepherds' than edim.

2 Schlatter (Our Topog. 230) infers from Gen. 128 Jos 7.2 (om. 5A) that the sanctuary lay E. of the town, in Deir Dejan.

A later (perhaps post-exilic) narrative records a prophecy as made by a prophet from Judah, by which Jeroboam was judged according to the Deuteronomic standard, and Yahwé's overthrow of Bethel was predicted (1 K. 13; cp 2 K. 10.20). There was no such feeling of guilt or foreboding of doom, however, among the prophets of the northern kingdom, for we find a company of them settled in Bethel, and the place visited by Elijah and Elisha (2 K. 2.27; 23).

For a national sanctuary the position was convenient. The present village lies about a furlong off the most easterly of the three parallel branches into which the great north road here divides, very near its junction with the road by Michmash to Jericho, and not many miles from the heads of those two other roads which come up from the coast by the Beth-horons, and by Gophna, respectively, to meet the north road just mentioned. That is to say, the main lines of traffic N. to S. and E. to W. crossed at the gates of Bethel. Like other ancient sanctuaries, it must have had a market; its mercenariness and wealth are implied by Amos (84, etc.). Moreover, Bethel lay upon the natural frontier between the two kingdoms on the plateau between the passes of Beth-horon and Michmash (on the Chronicler's story of its capture by Sijah of Judah, see Amos, 1). The prophets Hosea and Amos appear in opposition to Bethel, not on the ground (taken by the later Pentateuchonomists) that it was the seat of a schism, but because of the superstitious and immoral nature of its cult, even though the object of this was Yahwe himself. They regard it as apostasy from Yahwe (Am. 4. 4. 'Come to Bethel and revolt', 5. 5 [בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים אֲפֹסֶף], 'Seek to Bethel, seek Yahwe'), and its crimes culminate (Am. 7. 13) in the silencing of his prophet Amos by his priest Amaziah (see Amos, § 20). It shall, therefore, bear the brunt of the impending doom (Am. 3. 14. Hos. 10. 15 יִסְּאוּ רֹאשׁ אֲפֹנֶהָן BAC[¹]). In seven Amos had said 'Bethel shall become AVEN', i.e., vanity, falsehood, false worship, idolatry (5. 5); so Hosea calls it Beth-aven (1. 5-6 Hos. 10. 5) oftener than he calls it Bethel. The nickname was the reader because of the actual BETH-AVEN (7. 13), which once stood, and perhaps in the eighth century still stood, in the neighbourhood. After the fall of the northern kingdom the heathen colonists naturally adopted the cult of the 'god of the land', and Bethel retained its importance as a religious centre (2 K. 17. 29). Isaiah and Micah do not mention Bethel; it is very doubtful if Jeremiah does (see Gesenius' loc. cit. on Jer. 18. 14). The frontier of Judah, however, must have been gradually pushed N. so as to enclose it, for when Josiah put down 'the high places in the cities of Judah' he destroyed the altar at Bethel and desecrated the site (2 K. 23. 15). The city itself must have been inhabited by Jews, for its families are reckoned in the great post-exilic list (see Ezra, ii. §§. 9, 8 c; Ezra 2. 3 [בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים B]) = Neh. 7. 32 [בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים B] = 1. 15 c; 2. 21 [בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים B], 3. 7, 4. 1]. It was the most northerly site reoccupied by Jews (Neh. 11. 3; בֵּית־אֱלֹהִים [B] = 1. 15 c; 2. 21, 3. 7, 4. 1]. We hear nothing more of Bethel till it is described as one of the strong places of Judah which Baalache, reformed in 160 B.C. (1 Macc. 9. 5; Jos. Ant. xiv. 13), and then it disappears from OT history.

5. Post-biblical. put there to intercept Jewish fugitives (Midrash, Levitic, ii, 3; Sanh., treg. Talm., 115). The Bordeaux Pilgrim (1331) gives it as Beuthar 12 R. m. from Jerusalem (see ibid., 133).

Kilduff's theory (ZKR, 270), founded on the evidence of the Itinerarium of Adam of Bremen, Eusebius, and Jerome call it a village; the Itinerarium adds (under Azzad) that where Jacob dreamed there was built a church – perhaps part of the ruins at Burj-Beitun. The Crusaders exhibited the rock under the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem as Jacob's Stone; but the 'Catalary of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre' gives Bethel as a castle added to that of Jerusalem, the site of a castle and chapel built by Hugh of Le Puiset (1105–21). See Gieseler, op. cit. 2, 239; Revue d'histoire, 2295 ff. 205 ff.; Stanley, N° 212; C.A.S.M. III, chap. xii, and pp. 283 ff. 285.

BETH-FMEK (בֵּית פֶּמֶךְ, z. q. 'house in the valley'), a place on the boundary of Ashter (Josh. 19:27).

Before Παθημεν some words appear to have dropped out: perhaps they are represented by ὁς καὶ ἐπιστήσεται [τα] ὅρια. After ὅρια ὁς continues: συνδραβαίμεν, where συνδρα seems to be a corruption of συνδραβή [συνδραβή], prefixed wrongly to βαίμεν [-βαίμεν]; ασφαθὶ Βηθανίαν [Α], σάρᾳ Βηθανίαν [Ε]; Συμὸν, ἐκ τῆς κοιλίας. The description in 27: 27 f. is not clear; there would seem to be two descriptions of the northern boundary (if 'on the left hand', 27: 28, means 'northward', 28: 1 f. the equivalent of καὶ εἰς ἐκτ., ὅρια is to be inserted before 'northward', 27: 27).

of Jerusalem), which stands on the slope of a steep projecting hill between the Wady Bithur and a smaller valley. If we ascend higher we shall reach a site admirably adapted for a fortress, where there are still some ruins connected by popular legend with the Jews. On the E. side are chambers in the rock and old cisterns. Neubauer (Géog. Pal., 103-114, pp. 50) and Guérin (Ind. 237-245) had all but demonstrated that this was the Bether (בֵּתֶר) or rather Beth-ter (בֵּתֶרֶת), within whose walls Bar Cochba so obstinately resisted the Romans under Julius Severus (A.D. 134-5). The proof has now been completed by the discovery of an inscription setting which divisions of the Roman army were stationed there.¹ It is, therefore, no longer possible to maintain with Gratz (Hist. 247) that the Beth-ter of Bar Cochba was identical with the Bethar of the itineraries, which was situated between Antipatris or Diospolis and Cesarea (see ANTIPATRIS, § 2, end). See GIBGAL.

Only two ancient statements respecting the position of Bether need be here quoted. Euseb. (It. 36) describes βῆθηρα in these terms: πρὸς τὴν τοῦ ἁγίου ὁρους τῶν ἱεροσολύμων οὐ σφοδρὰ πόρρω διεστῶσα, and the Talm. of Jerus. (Taanith, 42), 'If thou thinkest that Beth-ter (spelt with two ת almost always in this section) was near the sea, thou art in error: truly it was 40 m. away from the sea.'²

BETHER, The mountains of (בֵּתֶר בְּתָר). Cant. 217 EV, following Vg. (Bether). The word Bether, however, all recent critics agree, is not a proper name: it qualifies the preceding words. Putting aside the old, forced explanations of the phrase, such as 'mountains of ravines' (ἄρκα δὲ καὶ κοιλώματα—i.e., 'בְּתָרִים בְּתָרִים'; cp BETHRON), and 'mountains of separation' (between the lovers), one might conjecture that 'Bether' was the Syrian plant manolathron, from which a costly oil was procured, used in the toilet of banqueters (Hos. Od. ii. 77), and also in medicine (Plin. NH xiii. 448). So Symm. (Field. H., on Cant. 217). RV¹⁹⁰⁴; Wellh. Prod. 399; ET 391. Others emend בְּתָרִים to בְּתָרִים, 'spices', in conformity with 814 (so Pesh., Theod., Meier, Gratz). The best solution, however, has yet to be mentioned: בְּתָרִים is miswritten for בְּתָרִים, 'cypresses'; cp 117 (Che.). 'Mountains of cypresses' is an appropriate term for Lebanon; cp 'mountains of panthers' (18). See JQR 10571, and cp CANTICLES, § 15 n.

BETHESDA (ΒΗΘΕΣΔΑ [colloid]—i.e., בֵּית הַקְּדָשׁ, 'house of mercy'; ΒΗΘΣΑΘΑ [Ti. VII]), the reading of TR in Jn. 5, for which the best authorities have BETHZATHA or BETHSaida. On the topographical question, see JERUSALEM.

BETHEZEL (בֵּית הָאֵל; ΒΗΘ ΕΙΛΩΝ ἐχόμενον αὐτῇ, i.e., אֵלָה, 'near her'), an unidentified place in the Shephelah mentioned by Micah (111), who foresees the captivity of its noble ones (עֲצֵי, emended from עֲצֵי, G's reading [שְׁמֵרָה], where MT has עֲצֵי; so Che., JQR, July '08). It is scarcely the same as Azel (cp AZEL).

BETH GADER (בֵּית גָּדֶר; Βαιθγαδω [B], βαιθγαδω [A], Βηθγαδω [L]), a town, whose 'father' Hareph was of Canaanite origin (1 Ch. 2511); the genealogy seems to represent post-exilic relations. On the analogy of the other great divisions Shobal, abn Kirjath-jerim and Salma abn Bethlehem, Beth-gader was perhaps no unimportant place, and we may possibly identify it with Gader, i. 2. It is noticeable that the further divisions of Hareph are not enumerated, as they are in the cases of Shobal and Salma.

BETH-GAMUL (בֵּית גַּמּוּל, 'place of recompense'?) [cp Gamaliel, גַּמְלִיאל; ΟΙΚΟΝ ΓΑΜΩΛ [B], Ο. ΓΑΜΩΛΑ [A], Ο. Α [Q], Ο. ΓΑΒ [N¹], om. N²]. In Moab on the table-land E. of the Jordan (Jer. 4823), identified by some with K'h. Jemil, which lies to the east of the known DIBON; according to others, it finds its most representative in Umm el-Jemil, about five hours from Bosra.

BETH-GILGAL (בֵּית הַגִּלְגָּל). Neh. 1229 RV¹⁹⁰⁴; GILGAL, § 6 (5).

BETH-HACCEREM, AV Beth-Haccherem (הַכֶּרֶם, § 103, 'vineyard place'), is expressly called a town, but a 'district' (קֶרֶת), near Jerusalem, Neh. 1229 (BΘΔΧΑΜ [B], ΒΑΧΧΑΡΑΜ [A], ΒΑΧΑΜ [S], ΒΑΧΑΜ [L]). From Jer. 61 it appears to have included a conspicuous height to the S. of Jerusalem which was used as a beacon-station (Βαθβαχάρμα [B], Βαθβα [A], Βαθβαχάρ [A]).

Jerome (in his comment on the latter passage) says that it was one of the villages which he could see every day with his own eye from Bethlehem, that it was called Beth-haccherem, and that it was on a mountain. Hence, many since Brooke have placed it in the so-called Euphrates or 'Frank Mountain' (2437 ft. above sea-level), between Bethlehem and Tekoa, and very near latter (so even Gieseler). Jerome's statement we are not to criticise; but there is now no name near the 'Frank Mountain' which confirms this theory, and the special fertility which the name Beth-haccherem implies to have characterised the district suggests looking elsewhere. After all, it was rather hasty to infer from Jer. 61 that Beth-haccherem was bound to be near Tekoa.

Since we have found reason elsewhere (BETH-EMAN) to correct 'Beth-car' in 1 S. 711 into Beth-haccherem, and to identify this with the beautiful village of 'Ain Kārim, about an hour and a half W. of Jerusalem, it becomes difficult to resist the conclusion that the h. referred to by Jeremiah was the Jebel 'Ali, at the foot of which lies the village in question. The beautiful olive groves and vineyards of 'Ain Kārim are watered from a superb fountain, and would justify the name Beth-haccherem. The summit of the Jebel 'Ali commands a view of the Mediterranean, the Mount of Olives, and part of Jerusalem (Baed. 112). Conder mentions that there are still cairns on the ridge above 'Ain Kārim which may have served as beacons (PEFQ, 1881, p. 271). One is 40 ft. high and 130 ft. in diameter, with a flat top measuring 40 ft. across.

Two more references to Beth-haccherem may be indicated. In the Mishna treatise, Middoth 3 4, it is stated that the stones for the great altar in the second temple came from the valley of Beth-ezer, which Adol. (JQR 8399) identifies with Beth-haccherem and 'Ain Kārim; and among the eleven towns which G¹ has (but not MT) in Josh. 1559 occurs Karem (Καρεμ), which, from the context, can only be 'Ain Kārim. (Cp TAICHEMONITE. For another (probable) Beth-ezer, see BATH-KARIM.)

BETH-HAGGAN (בֵּית הַגֶּן, domus horti [Vg.], EV 'the garden-house'; better in G as a proper name, ΒΑΙΘΑΝ [B], ΒΑΙΘΑΓΑΝ [A¹], sup. ras., ΒΑΙΘΑΡΩΝ = Beth-horon [L]), a place, apparently to the S. of Jericho, on the road to which Ahaziah fled in his chariot when he saw Jehoram slain by Jehu (2 K. 927). Jennm, the first village which one travelling southwards would encounter, may very well be Beth-haggan (= Beth-haggannim, 'place of gardens'), i.e., EN-GANNIM (p. 21, 2). If, however, we hold with Conder that Megiddo, which Ahaziah reached at last to die—was Mageddai at the foot of Gilboa, a little to the S. of Beisan, it will become natural to identify Beth-haggan with a northern Beth Jann, between Mt. Tabor and the S. end of the Lake of Gennesaret (Beth Jann is, in Arabic nomenclature, a favourite name). Against this view of the flight of Ahaziah, see GASM. JIG 387, n. 1.

BETH-HARAM, AV incorrectly BETH-ARAM (בֵּית הָרָם; ΒΑΡΑΡΑ, or perhaps ΒΑΡΑΜ [B], ΒΗΘΑΡΑΜ [A¹], Josh. 1327 [P]). For the true form of the name, see BETH-HARAN.

BETH-HARAN

BETH-HARAN (בֵּית הָרָחַן, probably 'house of HARAN', ΒΑΙΘΑΡΑΝ [B], -αρα [A], -ן [F.L.], Nu. 32:26 [L.]), the correct and original pronunciation of the name of the place also called BETH-HARAM (cp GERSTHOF for GERSTON). The place thus designated was an ancient Amorite city, founded by the conquering Gadiates. The site is occupied by the modern Tell er-Rameh, which stands up in a wady of the same name, between Heshan and the Jordan, at no great distance from the river. The objection to this raised by Guthe (ZDP 23, n. 1) is not decisive.

Râmeh does indeed imply a form, Beth-harâmeh; but this form is vouched for by the existence of the Aramaic Beth-harâmeh (see below). It arose out of BETH-HARAM (phonetic modification of Beth-haran) when the older and correct form of the name had passed out of use, and so the later form, Beth-haram, came to be misinterpreted. Moreover, Lénormand's discovery of a 'non-phonetic monoid' (called Beth-Harâmeh (Land of Moab, 192) has not been verified by subsequent travellers,¹ though it is still recognised in Baed.² (map of Peraea), and the identification (which stands in Di's comm.) is retained by von Kriess in Bibel-Herab., on the assumption that Beth-Harâmeh (or Harâm) is nearer to the outlet of the wady than Tell er-Râmeh.

The really conspicuous mound is simply that of Tell er-Râmeh which is 673 ft. above the sea-level, and certainly marks the site of an ancient town of importance (Conder, P.E.F. Mem., L. Pal., 1237). Such a town was the Beth-râmeh of the Talmud (Nabhaner, Gloss. Talm., 247), the name of which is attested by Josephus, Eusebius, and Jerome.³

Herod had a palace here (Jos. Ant. xvii, 106; Rf ii, 42); Herod Antipas walled it and called it Julius after the wife of Augustus, at the same time that Herod Philip rebuilt Bethsaida and gave it the same name after the emperor's daughter (Jos. Ant. xviii, 24; Rf iii, 91). Jerome, however, enables us to correct this statement (CS 1017). The older name of the city was Livia; the name was changed to Julius when Livia was received into the gens Julia by the emperor's testament (see Schurer, Hist. ii, 142). Euseb. (CS 234-235) and Theodosius (CS 110) also call it Livia; the latter (De Situ Terre Sancte, 66) describes it as 12 R. m. from Jericho, near warm springs that were efficacious against leprosy.

BETH-HOGLAH, once (Josh. 156) AV Beth-hogla (בֵּית הַחֲגֹלָה, § 104, 'place of partridge,' cp HOGLAH),³ a Benjamite city on the border of Judah (Jos. 156, ΒΑΙΘΑΓΛΑΑΜ [B], -αα [L.], -θαλα [A]; 18:21, ΘΑΛΑΑΑΑΑ and ΒΕΘΕΓΑΙΩ [B], ΒΑΙΘΑΛΑΓΑ [A], ΒΗΘΑΓΛΑ [L.], and A in 21). It is the modern 'Am (and Kasr) Hajla, a fine spring and ruin situated between Jericho and the Jordan S. of Gilgal (cp Di. on Gen. 111 and Baed.² 154). Under the form Beth-alaga it is, according to Jos. (Ant. xiii, 15), the place to which Jonathan fled before Baechides, 1 Mace. 9:63 (but see BETTIBAST). The Onom. erroneously identifies Beth-hoglah with Atad (see ABU-MIZRAIM, end). The interpretation 'Bethagla, locus gyri' of Jer., according to WRS (Rel. Sem. 191, n. 1), may rest upon a local tradition of a ritual procession around some sacred object there (cp Ar. hajla, 'holah, hop')—similar perhaps to the Ar. ceremonial faraf (for which see We. Heid. 110).⁴ The form hajla survives also in Makhlâlet Hajla (see BETH-ARABAU, 2), a noted bathing-place for pilgrims at the mouth of the Wady el-Kelt (Baed., 169).

BETH-HORON (בֵּית הָרוֹן, also בֵּית הָרֹן and בֵּית הָרֹן, and in Ch. הָרוֹן; ΒΑΙΘΩΡΩΝ or Βεθ. [B.M.],

1. Site. Βεθωρα, Βαιθ, -ωρα, ΒΗΘ. in Jos. [cp the modern form Beit 'Ur], probably 'the place of the hollow' or 'hollow way' was the name of two neighbouring villages, upper Beth-horon (בֵּית הָרוֹן, Josh. 16; Βεθωρα [L.]) and lower Beth-horon (בֵּית הָרוֹן, Josh. 16; but in 2 Ch. 85 הערלין and

² Jos. gives the name as Βηθαραμ and Βηθαραμφθα; once (Ant. xvii, 106) the text gives αμαμθα. Euseb. (CS 234-235) Βηθαραμφθα, with a fragmentary reference to the αμαμθα. Jer. (CS 251; 10316), 'Betharam domus sublimium vel montium'; 'que a Syris dicitur Betharam'.

בֵּית הָרוֹן—hence the dual form preserved by αμαμφθα [B]; but Βεθωρα [A], Josh. 10:11), near the head and the foot, respectively, of the ascent from the Maritime Plain to the plateau of Benjamin, and represented to-day by Beit 'Ur el-hajla and Beit 'Ur el-hajla (large P.E. Surv. Map, Sheet xvii). The road leaves Beit 'Ur in which some see ezzen-shorah, see SHIR KATH, 810 ft. above sea level, on the high road. plain of Ajalon; climbs up the spur of the Benjamite hills in about 50 minutes to the lower Beth-horon, 1230 ft., and thence, dropping at first for a little, ascends the ridge, with the gorges of Wady Selman to the S., and Wady es-Sant and Wady el-Tamish to the N., to the upper Beth-horon, 1710 ft. from its fellow and 2022 ft. above the sea; and thence, still following the ridge, comes out on the Benjamite plateau about 4½ mi. farther on, to the N. of el-Jib (Jablon), at a height of about 2300 ft. The ascent or descent to Beth-horon (Josh. 16) may be the road towards the upper Beth-horon from Gibeon; it does not at first from the plateau before descending; the ascent or descent to the two Beth-horons (Josh. 10:11, 15) is the whole road from the edge of the plateau. More probably, the two are the same taken from opposite ends. This Beth-horon road is now no longer the high road from Jerusalem and the watershed to the Maritime Plain; but it was used as such from the very earliest times to at least the sixteenth century of our era, and indeed forms the most natural, convenient, and least exposed of all the possible descents from the neighbourhood of Jerusalem to the plain of Sharon. The line of it bears many marks of its age and long use. Carried for the most part over the bare rock and rocky debris, it has had steps cut upon it in its steeper portions, and has remains of Roman pavement. Standing as they do upon mounds, the two Beth-horons command the most difficult passages of this route and form its double key.

The constancy with which the Beth-horons appear in history is, therefore, easily explicable (they do not occur, however, in either the lists of the conquests

3. Military history. According to JE, after Joshua had won for Israel a footing on the Benjamite plateau and made peace with Gibeon, the latter was threatened by the Canaanites. Joshua defeated them at Gibeon, and pursued them all the way down by the Beth-horons (Josh. 10:11 ff.). In the days of Saul the Philistines must have held the pass from their camp at Michmash (1 S. 13:8).² Solomon fortified Beth-horon the nether, along with Gezer, on the opposite side of Ajalon (1 K. 9:17 [om. B.], Jos. Βεθωρα; in 1 K. 2:35 Βαθωρα, A); 2 Ch. 85 adds Beth-horon the upper [Βεθωρα, B].

During his son Rehoboam's reign Shishak or Sothen of Egypt invaded Judah by the Beth-horon passage, it would appear, for both Ai-yu-ru-u (Ajalon) and Bi-ti-ha-ru-u (Beth-horon) occur in his lists of the towns he conquered (Nos. 26 and 24; see WMM, As. u. Eur. 166).

In the Syro-Maccabean wars, Seron, a Syrian general, advanced on Judah by Beth-horon; Judas with a small force met him on the ascent, defeated him, and pursued him out upon the plain (1 Mace. 3:13-24 [CS 116, Βεθωρα; Jos. Ant. xii, 71). A few years afterwards, Nicanor having retired from Jerusalem upon Beth-horon, Judas attacked and slew him, and routed his army as far as Gezer (1 Mace. 7:30 ff.; Jos. Ant. xii, 105). Beth-horon was among the places fortified by Baechides (1 Mace. 11:5 [Βεθωρα, V*]). Jos. Ant. xiii, 131. See also Judith 44 (Βεθωρα [A]).

² It was probably by the Beth-horons that the Philistines were routed by Saul (1 S. 13:14) and 'from Gibeon south to Gezer,' by David (2 S. 5:23).

BETH-JESHIMOTH

In 65 A.D. a Roman army under Cestius Gallus, ascending by Beth-horon, laid siege of Jerusalem, and the Jews, and after a same way. Josephus describes the difficulties of the ground in haste cannot have kept to the high road, but the Romans in their were swept down the gorges on either side (Ant. vi. 413). Beth-horon, but he is not in this experience. Thus, in his advance upon Jerusalem mentioned in the military history of Palestine.

to Ephraim (Josh 21:25). They remained part of the N. Kingdom; and we do not read of any Jews settled there in post-exilic times. That is to say, they were held by the Samaritans. Sanballat, one of the chief foes of the Jews in Nehemiah's day, is called 'the Horonite' (Neh 2:10, qanah [cf. BA], qanayeh [Svd., qanayeh [L.] to B22, om. BA, qanayeh [S.-mg.], etc.). Schlatter (Zur Topogr. u. Gesch. Pal. 4, 'Wahr Beth-horon = Wohnort Sanballat's?') seeks to prove that Horonite means 'from Horonaim,' the town in S. Judah (Is. 15 Jer. 48:34, and Moabite Stone), partly on the ground that Sanballat is associated with Tobiah the Ammonite; but Ammonite may mean 'from CHEPHTAR-AMMONI' (a town of Benjamin, Josh. 18:21); and Hülst (Geog. 160) points out that Qs form of Beth-horon (Hē-beu [Josh. 10:13], cp 2 S. 13:34) confirms the possibility of Hōron meaning 'from Beth-horon.' By 161 B.C. Beth-horon had become a city of Judaea (1 Macc. 9:50; Jos. Ant. xiii. 1, cp 71).

According to the Talmud, it was the birthplace of many rabbis (Senh. legg. Talm. 154). Jerome gives it in the itinerary of S. Paula, who came to it from Nicopolis (Ap. S. Paul. Her. Op., ed. Migne, i. 883). There are the ruins of a medieval castle.

remains of a medieval castle in upper villages are probably in error, but the substrations in both few medieval travellers (Itinerarium, ch. 9). The name is given by early and not at all, it would appear, by the Arab geographers – unless the French mentioned by Yāqūt, but not located, be the same place. The medieval pilgrims went to Jerusalem, be the same and the present line of road. In 1507 Dr. Clarke (Travels, pt. II, vol. 1, 928) rediscovered the name. BETH-JESHIMOTH

BETH-JESHIMOTH. ^{G. A. S.} once (Nu. 33.49). AV Beth-jesimoth בֵּית הַיְשִׁמוֹת, Bēth-jesimōth [AV], is assigned in Joshua (12.24) ἀρεῖς ἡμῶν [BAV], αἰετῶν [Ew], Βηο-ἀρεῖ τῶν [L], 13.22 Βαηοῦ ἀρεῖων [B] to the Remhentes (cp. Nu. 33.41, ἀρὰ μὲν αἰετῶν [BE]). A. W. AC. [M]; but probably it was, like most of the neighbouring places, in the possession of the Moabites during a considerable period of the Hebrew monarchy. We know that it was Moabite in the time of Ezekiel (Ezek. 25.9, οἰκὸν βασιμῶν [B], ο. βελασ. Brev. etc.), ο. βαβίλ. [G*], ο. βαβὶ λασ. [G4], who speaks of it along with Baid-meon and Kirathaim as 'the glory of the country.' As Βηομαθ is it mentioned by Josephus (Biv. 7.5) as having been taken by Phadaius; Eus. vi. 1. 15. Βηομαθ (OSB 296.27) and Βηομαθ (233.51); Jerome (ib. 103.4), writing Bethimoth, describes it as a village bearing in his day the name Lamuth, opposite Jericho at a distance of 10 R. m. 'in meridiana plaga, juxta mare mortuum.' The name and description point to the modern Khisbet es-Suweimeh. The name Jeshimoth may be compared with the Jeshimon 'on the face' of which 'the headland of Pisgah looked down' (Nu. 21.20); for probably this Jeshimon ('-desolation') is not the Jeshimon of Judah, but the barren land off the N.E. end of the Dead Sea. With this name Hommel (AHF 197) compares Yasamenu, the name of a Palestinian district mentioned by an early Assyrian king, Cp G. A. S. IB 564, n. 1.

The site is with springs (the nearest being one 800 yards S.E. of town, and others at ARTAS 1½ m. away), but never water from an aqueduct from the Pools of Sodom (CONDEVIS, § 3) compassing the S.E. end of the sp and from many cisterns of which the greatest is three in front of the great basilica; there are the others from 12 to 21 ft. deep, on the N., called B. It was his home (1 S. 20.6-22, very early), for the war of which, when it was occupied by the Philistines, he expressed so great a longing—probably as a pledge of his fatherland's enfranchisement—that his three captains broke the enemy's lines, and drew water from the eastern 'in the town's gate' (2 S. 23.14 ff., from the same early source), which tradition has identified with the Beer David (but Guerin, Jud. 1.106 ff., following Qureshmis, prefers those in front of the basilica). Other references to Bethlehem as David's home are 1 S. 16.14-17.12-15-33 (from later strata). Asahel, brother of Joab, was buried in Bethlehem in his father's grave (2 S. 2.32). Thus, Joab, like his leader, was a Bethlehemite. BETHLEHEM

The name Ephrathah or Ephrath of this passage is assigned to Bethlehem also in Mic. 5:1 (the reading

3. Ephrath. עֶפְרַתָּה or עֶפְרַת is not certain; but the reference to Bethlehem is clear, in Ru. 1:1, virtually in Ru. 1:1 (1. om.) in 1 S. 17:12 (B om.), and probably also in 1 S. 13:26. Apart from Micah, the documents in which Ephrath[ah] occurs are probably so late that we might reasonably suppose that Bethlehem was the earlier name of the town. On the other hand, these documents are probably based on very early material. Micah (cf. Mic. 5:2 in his work) takes the name as well known. It is possible to argue from 1 Ch. 2:49-54 (גִּבְעַת אֶפְרַתָּה [B], גִּבְעַת אֶפְרַתָּה [A]), that Ephrath[ah] was the name of the whole district in which Bethlehem lay.

Bethlehem is not mentioned by Josephus after Solomon's time, nor in the Books of Maccabees; which proves how insignificant it continued to be. As the place commanded the fertile wadies and water-supply around it, the Philistines had deemed it important enough to occupy; this silence is very remarkable.

4. Christian times. Bethlehem reappears in Mt. 2:1 k. 2 as the birthplace of Jesus, distinguished still as Βηθλεὲμ τῆς τοῦ δαυὶδ (Mt. 2:1 k. 2, cp. 6:50), 'the city of David' (Lk. 2:415 cp. Jn. 7:42). Lk. describes the new-born child as having been laid in a manger (ΜΑΡΒΛΕ) omit the definite article of ZK), 'because there was no room for them in the Khan'; they had retired then 'to a stall or cave where there was room for the mother and a crib for the babe.'

It is significant that Bethlehem appears to have been chosen, along with the sites of the crucifixion and the resurrection, for special treatment by the Emperor Hadrian. As he set up there an image of Jupiter and an image of Venus, so he devastated Bethlehem and planted upon it a grove sacred to Adonis (Jer. 1st. ad Paul., 583). This proves that even before 132 A.D. Bethlehem was the scene of Christian pilgrimage and worship, as the birthplace of Jesus. (The Talmud also admits that from Bethlehem the Messiah must come: Berachoth, 50.) About 150 A.D. Justin Martyr (Phil. c. Tryph. 70-73) describes the scene of the birth as in a cave near the village. This tradition may be correct; there were many ancient cave-stables in Palestine (Conder, Tent Work, chap. 10), and caves are still used as stables. In 315 A.D. the site of Bethlehem was still 'a wild wood' (Cyr. Jorns, Catech. 1220). Constantine cleared it and built a basilica. Soon after, in Jerome's time, a cave in the rock near the basilica was venerated as the stable, and in a neighbouring grotto Jerome himself prepared his translation of the Bible. From that day to this the tradition has been constant.

The centre of interest in modern Bethlehem is, therefore, the large basilica S. Maria a Præsepio, surrounded and fortified by the Latin, the Greek, and the Armenian monasteries. Although the architecture is mixed and of many periods, the bulk of the church is that built by Constantine. Cp. De Vogüé, Églises de la Palestine, 46 ff.

Eny-chius (circa 937, quoted by Guérin, 2161) asserts, indeed, that the church is a building of Justinian, who pulled down Constantine's as too small and raised a grander edifice. Procopius, however, in his De Edific. Justin., whilst recording that this emperor built the walls of Bethlehem (53), does not mention any basilica there of his construction, as, had there been one, he must have done. Probably Justinian only added to Constantine's church, and the building is, therefore, the most ancient church in Palestine and one of the most ancient in the world. The fine mosaics are from the court of the Emperor Manuel Comnenus (circa 1162 A.D.), and the rafters by Philip of Burgundy (in 1452).

In the latter two passages Ephrathite means, of course, 'of Ephrath[ah]'. Bethlehem. It is interesting that in PLPQ, Jan. 1893, Schick attempts to prove that Ramallah-a-qubla, the town of Samuel 'an Ephrathite', was in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem. 'Ephrathite' in 1 S. 11 probably means Ephraimite (cp. Judg. 12:5 where for עֶפְרַתִּי is Εἰς Εφραθιτῶν καὶ Εὐλά του Εφραϊμ).

BETH-MERH

Under the church is the Grotto of the Nativity, called also the Milk Grotto and the Grotto of our Lady, 'Migharet el habb' and 'Migharet es Sayde'. We have seen the precautions of the tradition which sanctifies it: it is only probable that Jesus was born in a cave, and there is nothing to prove that this was the cave, for the site lay desolate for three centuries.

Among recent works, consult Tobler's monograph, Bethlehem in Palestina, and Fahn, 'Das jetzige Bethlehem', ZDPV 17: 176, with map and named lists.

2. Bethlehem of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15, Βηθσαι [B]), now Bait Lakm, 7 m. NW of Nazareth, 'a miserable village among oak woods' (Guérin, Gallide, 1: 34; Robt. BA 3:11). In the Talmud it receives the designation בֵּית נָזָרִית, perhaps a corruption for בֵּית נָזָרִית, 'of Nazareth' (Neubauer, Gloss. Talm., 189 f.). The combination of two names so famous in the Gospel history is remarkable. Most scholars take this Bethlehem to have been the home and burial-place of the judge Hozai (Judg. 12:31). Josephus and Jewish tradition assign him to Bethlehem Judah (Ant. v. 713). G. A. S.

BETH-MARCABOTH (בֵּית הַמַּרְכָּבוֹת, § 6, i.e., 'the house of chariots') and HAZAR SUSAN (חֲצֵר סוּסָה, i.e., 'station of horses') are mentioned together in Josh. 19:5 f. in the list of Simeonite towns.

The B readings are 1 for Bethmarcaboth: in Josh. 19:5 Βηθμαρκάβοθ [B], Βηθμαρκάβοθ [L]; in 1 Ch. 4:11, where the B reading is omitted, Βηθμαρκάβοθ [B], Βηθμαρκάβοθ [L], Βηθμαρκάβοθ [A]. For HAZAR-SUSAN: in Josh. 19:5 Βηθμαρκάβοθ [B], Βηθμαρκάβοθ [A], Βηθμαρκάβοθ [L]; in 1 Ch. 4:11, Βηθμαρκάβοθ [B], Βηθμαρκάβοθ [A], Βηθμαρκάβοθ [L].

The names seem to indicate posts of war-horses and chariots, such as Solomon is said to have established (1 K. 9:25). The two places may possibly be identical respectively with MADMANNAH and SANSANNAH, 'cities' in the Negeb towards Edom. The latter are the older names; for Madmannah, at least, appears in 1 Ch. 2:40 (which belongs to the list of pre-exilic settlements of the Calebites), whilst it is impossible to assign a very early date to 1 Ch. 4:11, where Bethmarcaboth and HAZAR-SUSAN are mentioned as Simeonite towns 'before the reign of David.' That the two places actually were regular stations for horses and chariots may be taken for granted; but it may be questioned whether they were so before post-exilic times, when the Persians established post-stations on the route from the Shéphelah into Egypt (by Gaza to Pelusium). On this view Samsannah may very well be the modern Samsim, a village in an olive-grove on the road from Eleutheropolis to Gaza (6½ m. NE. from the latter town), and Madmannah may be conjectured to be the modern Khan Yunus, 14 m. SW. from Gaza (so Guérin, Jud. 2:241). Khan Yunus has always been an important station. It may be noted that in the time of Micah (1:1) Lachish (about 8 m. from Samsim) also was a chariot city. Cp. MARCABOTH. W. R. S.

BETH-MEON (בֵּית מֵעוֹן), Jer. 48:21. See BAAL-MEON.

BETH-MERHAK, AV 'a place that was afar off,' RVmss 'the Far House,' בֵּית הַמֵּרְחָק. ΕΝ ΟΙΚΩ ΤΩ ΜΑΚΡΑΝ [BM], procul a domo. Beth-merhak is either the proper name (so Ges.¹³, BDB doubtfully),—in which case the name is Beth hammerhak, like Beth-hacezeret,—or a description (Ew., The., Ke., Kan. HS, 'the last house') of the place outside Jerusalem where David waited with his attendants until the people and the body-guard had passed, 2 S. 15:17 (on the text, which is doubtful, see Dr. HSm, and Klo. ad loc.).

It is evident that chariots went down to Egypt by this way at least as early as the eighth cent. B.C. Cp. Gen. 46:5 Mic. 1:13.

BETH-MILLO

BETH MILLO (בֵּית מִלּוֹ), Judg. 9:6 RV^{ms}; see JERUSALEM.

BETH NIMRAH (בֵּית נִמְרָה) perhaps 'place of pure water'; cp. Ar. nimra, Ass. nimri, 'transparent'; but see NIMRIM and NIMRI, § 104; Nu 32:6 נַמְרָא [N] אַמְרָא [N], [N] אַמְרָא [N]; Josh. 13:27 ΒΑΙΝΘΑΝ-ΑΒΡΑ [H], ΒΗΘΑΝΑΒΡΑ [I], ΒΗΘΑΜΝΑ [A], or Nimrah (Nu 32:6 נַמְרָא [H], אַמְרָא [N], אַמְרָא [N], אַמְרָא [N]), one of the Amorit cities which were afterwards 'built' by Israel (Nu 32:6), is the Βηθανιά and Bethannan of Eusebius and Jerome (OS² 241; ib. 102), a village still extant in their day, about 5 R. m. N. from Laviat (H. H. HAVAN, q. v.), the modern Amman, a well-watered oasis on the bank of the Jordan valley some 14 miles E. of Jordan (cp. Baed. Palest. 102). Beth-nimrah is nowhere mentioned under this name in OT outside of Numbers and Joshua, but it is identified by many modern cities with the waters of NIMRIM (q. v.), and, as stated elsewhere (BETHANY, 2), Beth-nimrah may be the original of the variants Bethany, Bethabara, in Ju. 1:8.

BETHORON (Judith 14), RV BETH-ORON (q. v.).

BETH PALET, or (Neh. 11:26) BETH-PALITE, RV always Bethpelet (בֵּית פֶּלֶט, 'house of escape'), an unknown Caldean town (cp. PILET [1], 1 Ch. 2:47), on the Edomite border of Judah, Josh. 15:27 (ΒΑΙΦΑΛΑΔ [H], ΒΑΙΦΑΛΕΘ [N], ΒΗΘΦΕΛ [I]), mentioned in the list of Judahite villages (see EZRA, II, § 5 [6], § 15 [11]; Neh. 11:26 (ΒΗΘΦΑΛΑΤ [N] anac), ΒΗΘΦΑΛΑΤ [I], om. BN^a A). For the gentile Palite (פֶּלֶט), corruptly PILETITE (1), see PALITE.

BETH PAZZEZ (בֵּית פֶּצֶץ), an unknown point on the border of Issachar, Josh. 19:21 (ΒΗΡΑΦΗΝ [H], ΒΑΙΦΑΡΗΝ [N], ΒΗΘΡΑΦΗΝ [I]). Compare the equally obscure name HAPPAZZEZ.

BETH-PEOR (בֵּית פְּעוֹר), ΒΗΘ ΠΟΡΩ [BAFL], a place named in Dt. 3:29 4:46 31:6 Josh. 13:20. In Josh. 13:20 (ΒΗΘΠΟΡΩ [H], ΒΕΘ [N]) it is enumerated among the cities of Reuben; in Dt. 3:29 4:46 the ravine (פְּעוֹר) in front of (פְּעוֹר) it is mentioned as the place where Israel was encamped when the Deuteronomy discourses were delivered; and in Dt. 3:16 the same ravine is mentioned as the place of Moses' burial. The exact site is uncertain; but it seems clear that it cannot have been very far from the Pisgah ridge. Eusebius states (OS² 233*) that Βηθφοργ was near Mount Φοργ (cp. 'the top, or head, of Peor,' ראש פְּעוֹר, Nu. 23:28), opposite to Jericho, 6 m. above Livias (i. e., Tell er-Rameh; see BETH-HAKAN); and (OS² 21347) that Mount Φοργ was opposite to Jericho, on the side of the road leading up from Livias to Heshbon, a part of it being 7 m. from the latter place (1151-2). If we may judge from the map in the Survey of P. Palest., the ascent from Livias to Heshbon would be made naturally either along the Wady Heshbon (cp. Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 525 f.; Tristram, Arab. 346) or along the more circuitous road N. of this, said by Tristram (p. 343) to be the one ordinarily used. The statements of Eusebius, if correct, would thus point to a site near one of these two roads, some four or five miles N. of Nebi. The 'head of Peor' (Nu. 23:28) might be an eminence in the same locality. The opinion that this was the site is supported by the mention, in Josh. 13:20, of Beth-peor next to the 'slopes' (רָמֹת) of Pisgah, i. e., in all probability, the declivities on the S. side of the Wady 'Ayin Musā. The 'ravine in front of Beth-peor' might thus be the Wady Heshbon. Conder (PEPQ 1882, p. 85 f.; Heth and Arab. 146 f.) suggests a site farther to the S.—e. g., on the crest of a hill above 'Am el-Minyeh, 8 m. SW. of Nebi, commanding (see Nu. 23:28; and 24:2 compared with 25:1) an extensive view of the lower valley of the J. Peor, however, the spot at which kind of Peor worshipped (which can hardly have been far from Beth-peor), would seem (Nu. 25:1) to have been readily accessible from the plain of Shatim (the Es-Sasbeh) than 'Am el-Minyeh would be; Nu. compared with 25:14 makes it probable also that it is less distant from Pisgah; whilst, as we have seen, ever other indications we possess point to a site on the N. side of the Pisgah ridge (the modern Nebi, Ras Sāgh, rather than to one S. of it. Until, therefore, it has been shown that there is no eminence in the neighborhood of the Wady Heshbon commanding the plain, as implied in Nu. 23:24 and 24:2 (cp. 25:1), it is here the ancient Beth-peor must be sought. Travellers perhaps explore this region with the view of ascertaining whether there is such a height. (p. 140) A. R.

BETHPHAGE (ΒΗΘΦΑΓΗ [Ti. WH]), Βηθφαγή a locality near the Mt. of Olives, on a small hill or road from Jerusalem to Jericho. It is mentioned together with BETHANY (2:1, 1), and probably in the E. of it (Mt. 21: Mk. 11: Lk. 19:29). Chrysostom (vol. xvi. chap. 17) describes it as a place of pilgrimage (cp. OS² 18879). According to various passages in the Talmud, Beth-phage was the name of the district extending from the base of Olivet to the walls of Jerusalem, and, according to the Talm. Bab. (Men. x. 78 b), Beth-phage was one of the limits of the Sabbath zone around Jerusalem (cp. T. T. K.), whence (I. Guttman) would identify it with Kefr et-Tur (see PEPQ 1882, p. 60; but see BETH-ZUR).

The current explanation of the name is a little more plausible than that of BETHANY (2:7). Βηθφαγή (cp. Men. x. 78 b) would naturally mean 'place of young figs'; cp. 22 in Cant. 2:13 with Dehitzeli's u. This, however, may be no more than a popular etymology. Nestle (Phil. Sac. 1896; cp. W. F., etc. 148) is convinced that the narrative of the barren fig tree, which in Mt. 21:17-19 Mk. 11:12-14 is localised at Bethphage. It has often been remarked that this is a startling peculiarity in this narrative as compared with the other evangelical traditions. See also Meyer, Jesus Mattersprache, 166.

The mediæval Bethphage was discovered by Guillelmus and Clermont-Ganneau in 1877 between the Mount of Olives and Bethany. In his account of this discovery the latter scholar offers the suggestion that the 'Village of the Mount of Olives' (K'fr et-Tur), which admittedly stands on the site of some important ancient village, may be the Bethphage of the Gospels and of the Talmud. This view would clear up the Talmudic statement respecting the Sabbath zone already mentioned. See PEPQ 1878, pp. 51-61.

BETH-RAPHA (בֵּית רָפָא), in an obscure genealogy of Cheleb (= Caleb), 1 Ch. 4:12 (ΒΑΘΡΑΙΑΝ [H], -ΡΕΦΑ [N], ΒΗΘΡΑΦΑΝ [I]). No place of this name is known; Rapha appears to be a clan-name, unconnected of course with 'Raphaiah.' RAPHA [2] appears to occur as a name in BENJAMIN (§ 9, in. β).

BETH-REHOB (בֵּית רְהוֹב), ΒΗΘΡΑΒ [BAFL], an Aramaean town and district, which with ZORAN and MIVAT sent men to the help of Ammon against David (2 S. 10:6, 7, 8; R. H. H. [p. 23 A]; ΒΑΙΘΡΑΒ [I], in both).² See ARAM, §§ 5, 6. It is stated in Judg.

1. In the Talmud, רָהַב also means a jaw or cheek, and פֶּסַח 183 we learn that the cheeks (Syr. has רָהַב) belonged to the portion of the priests (cp. Rehob, 6:3). Hence, on the supposition that Beth-phage meant 'place of cheeks,' it was presumed that there was a school of priests here.

2. A reference to a similar defeat at the hands of Saul in 1 S. 14:7 (cp. Βηθφαγ [H], Βηθφαγ [I], Bethphage [A]) is open to suspicion; see SAUL, § 3, and cp. W. F. 144-5.

BETHSAIDA

1822 that Laish-Dan was in 'the valley that lieth by Beth-rehob' (אֵלֶּיךָ בְּרֵחַב [B], o. בְּרֵחַב [L], o. בְּרֵחַב [M]). Beth-rehob is doubtless the Rehob of Nu 13:21, which, according to P., was the most northern point reached by the spies (בְּרֵחַב [B], בְּרֵחַב [L]). A connection with the Asherite Rehob (1, 2, 3) is improbable (though not impossible, see ARAM, § 5).¹

The exact site of Beth-rehob is uncertain. It can hardly be the Jebel Hanni, finely situated above the great plain of Huleh to the W. of Minias, and remarkable for the remains, partly ancient of a fortress (so Rob. BAR 4:37 f.). Others have thought of K. el-Hana, about 1 hour N. of Dan; but may not the site of the heron Beth-rehob be placed quite as reasonably at Minias itself (see C. S. ARAM, § 7 f.)?

BETHSAIDA (ΒΗΘΣΑΙΔΑ [L], ΒΗΘΣΑΙΔΑ [M]); Syr. ܒܝܬܫܝܕܐ; place of fishing or hunting). Josephus tells us (Ant. xviii, 21) that the Tetrarch 1. Julias, Philip raised a village (κώμη) Bethsaida on the lake of Tiberias to the rank of a city, and called it Julias, after Julia the daughter of Augustus. There, where he describes Julias as in the lower Gaulonitis (Ant. 9:1), close to the Jordan (Ant. 7:2), near where the latter runs into the lake (Ant. 10:9). Philo (x, 14) and Jerome (Comm. Mt. 16:9) also place it E. of Jordan. In conformity with these data, the site has been fixed on the fertile and very grassy plain El-Buteiha, in the NE. corner of the lake, either at et-Tell, a mound with many ruins, close to the Jordan where the latter issues from the hills, or at Mas'adiyah, by the mouth of the river (to which Thomson [Land and Book, ed. 1877, 350] heard the name Bethsaida attached by Bedouins). Fish abound on either side of the Jordan's mouth and (presumably) in the river itself. There can be little doubt that this was the 'city called Bethsaida' (Lk. 9:10; εἰς τὸν ἑρῆμον πόλεως καλουμένην βηθ). εἰς τὸν ἑρῆμον, etc., which reads εἰς πόλιν καλουμένην βηθ; so Th. W. H., etc.) to which Jesus withdrew, as being in Philip's jurisdiction, when he heard of John's murder by Antipas (cp Mt. 14:13). Lk. places near it the feeding of the five thousand, which Mt. (14:14 ff.) and Mk. (6:31 ff.) describe as in a desert (i.e., uninhabited) but grassy place (Mt. 14:19 Mk. 6:39 'green grass,' such as grows in the Buteiha, in contrast to the paler herbage of the higher and drier parts), to which Jesus proceeded by boat, followed by multitudes on foot. J. also describes the scene on the E. shore of the lake (6:1), and says 'there was much grass in the place' (v. 13). A site on the Buteiha suits also the Bethsaida of Mk. 8:22, for Jesus was already E. of Jordan (v. 13) and went thence to the villages of Caesarea Philippi (v. 27). All interpreters of the Gospels are virtually agreed about this.

The question has been raised, whether there was not a second Bethsaida. After the feeding of the five thousand, Jesus, it is said, constrained his

2. Mk. 6:45, disciples to go before him to the other side to Bethsaida (Mk. 6:45, εἰς τὸ πέραν πρὸς βηθ). This has forced some scholars, one or two much against their will (Rehml, Pal. 653 ff., Herderson, Pal. 150 ff.), to conclude that there was a Bethsaida to the W. of Jordan, either a suburb of Julias, separated from it by the river, or at 'Ain Tihigha (Rob. BAR 3:58 f.), 4 m. along the coast, where there is a bay containing fish in abundance, and the modern shrine of Sheikh 'Ali (cp Leid. 'Aly of the Fishermen, and strong streams flowing). But, in the first place, the phrase 'to go to the other side' does not necessarily imply the passage from the E. to the W. coast of the lake, for Josephus speaks of 'sailing over' (διεπαραώθη) from Tiberias to Taricheus.

(Ant. 19), though these towns lay on the same side; and, secondly, Jesus would not seek again the territories of Herod Antipas so soon after leaving them for those of Philip, but would most probably return to what Lk. tells us he had just chosen as his headquarters. We may be certain, then, that the Bethsaida of Mk. 6:45 is still Bethsaida (here).

Now need we seek for another in the 'Bethsaida of Galilee' to which the Fourth Gospel (4:44 [40] 12:21) says that Andrew, Peter, and Philip belonged.

3. John 1:44 In the time of the Great War (66-70 A.D.) [1] 12-1 the name Galilee appears to have been extended round the Lake. Josephus calls Galilee of Gamla the Galilee (Ant. xviii, 10), and at Caesarea the jurisdiction of the ruler of Galilee may have comprised part of the E. coast (cp Ant. x, 14). Besides, a town which lay so immediately on the Jordan might easily be reckoned to Galilee. In any case, by 81 A.D. the E. coast was definitely attached to the province, and Ptolemy (v, 13), writing about 140, places Julias 'in Galilee'. That being so, it is somewhat meant that it is only the Fourth Gospel that speaks of 'Bethsaida of Galilee'. There is, therefore, as held by Wilson, Revol. of Jesus; Thomson, Land and Book, ed. 1877, 372 ff.; Holtzmann, NT, 1876, 496; ARAM; Turner, ZEPH 266 ff.; Socin and Benzinger in Buhl, ed. 1891, p. 256; G. ARAM II 457 ff.; Buhl, Pal. 241 ff.) no reason compelling us to the theory of a second or western Bethsaida. It is interesting that the disciple of Jesus called Philip should come from Philip's Julias.

Early Christian tradition and the medieval works of travel agree in showing no trace of more than one Bethsaida. The site shown for it, however, is uncertain, and may have varied from age to age. Eusebius and Jerome define it only as on the lake (178). Epiphanius (Haer. i, 51 f.) merely says it was not far from Capernaum. Willibald's day (722 A.D.), which place it on his journey between Capernaum and Chorazin, suit the E. bank of the Jordan (in spite of what Robinson says) even if Chorazin (q.v.) be Kerāzēl, but Gergesa (Kheresa) may be meant.

In all probability Bethsaida remained locally distinct from Julias after the erection of the latter by Philip. The custom of Jesus was not to enter such purely Greek towns as Julias must have been; yet, according to Mt. 11:21, he did many 'wonderful works' in Bethsaida. Julias had fourteen villages round about it (Jos. Ant. xx, 84). Schumacher suggests for Bethsaida some ruins on the lake called el-'Ataj, which were joined with et-Tell (Julias) by a Roman road (ZEPH 919).

san (1 Macc. 5:52 12:40; Isbora [A] f.), mod. Beisan, 320 ft. below the sea-level, was finely situated on a low table-land above the Jordan valley, at the mouth of the W. Jāhid, which leads gently up from the Jordan to Zer'in (Jezreel). The Jordan itself is three miles off (cp ZAKUTHAN, § 1); but Beth-shean was unusually well supplied with water, being intersected by two streams. Amid the extensive ruins rises the tell of the ancient fortress, 'a natural mound, artificially strengthened by scarping the side' (PEF. Mem. 240-8).

The illustration given in the Memories of the Survey will enable the reader to divine the grandeur of the prospect from this eminence. The eye sweeps from four to ten miles of the plain all round, and follows the road westward to Jezreel, covers the thickets of Jordan where the fords lie, and ranges the edge of the eastern hills from Gadara to the Jabbok (G. ARAM, II 457).

This 'farthest-seeing, farthest-seen fortress' must have been hard for the Israelites to conquer, yet

2. History. till it was in their hands they were excluded from one of the main roads between western and eastern Palestine, and from the occupation of a coveted portion of the Jordan valley. That Bethshelem was included in one of the prefectures of Solomon's kingdom is certain (1 K. 12, ô akatay hay and šayakayur [12], š'ô š'ô [10], ô akatay šay and šakayur [X], ô akatay šay and šakay [1, 12]). On the death of Saul, on the other hand, we find it in the hands of the Philistines (1 S. 31, šayakay [10], š. š. šayakay [B], 2 S. 21, šay [10]); and, though both shelem may be one of the cities of the Jordan (1 S. 17, šay text) which the Israelites deserted after the battle of Gilboa, it is equally likely that it was still a Canaanish city when captured by the Philistines. We know at any rate, that it retained its Canaanite population for some time after the Israeliite occupation of Palestine (Judg. 12, šayakay [10], šakayur [1, 1], Josh. 17, šakayur [10], šakayur [10], š. š. šayakayur [B]). It may possibly have been as late as the time of David that this great fortress fell into the hands of the Israelites. Standing on the road from Damascus to Egypt and also from Damascus by Shechem to Jerusalem and Hebron, it had a commercial as well as a military importance which would have attracted the notice of such a keen-sighted king as David.

From the Mueoumian period onwards Bethshean bore the strange Greek name Seuthopolis (see Judg. 127, בֵּית שֵׁט Seuthōp π. Se; 2 Macc. 129-11, etc.), which probably records the fact (or belief) that some of the Syrian invaders of the seventh cent. B.C. (see SEUTHANS) had settled here. In N.E. times it was one of the most important cities of the Decapolis (p. 2), ΠΟΛΙΣ CAMEE [VI], ΠΟΛΙΣ CANNAAE [B], a Levitical city (Josh. 21: 6, ΒΕΘΟCAMEE [-A], ΤΗΝ CAMEE [-L], 1 Ch. 16: 7 [VI]). BACAMYE [B] on the borders of Judah (Josh. 15: 3), ΠΟΛΙΣ ΗΛΙΟΥ [HAI], lost assigned to Dan (Josh. 19: 4), is the modern 'Am Sheims, 917 feet above sea level, on the south side of the broad and beautiful and still well-cultivated W es-sarâr, opposite Zorah and two m from it, 'a noble site for a city; a low platform at the junction of two fine plains' (Robinson). It is a point in the lowland on the road from Philistia (Ekron) to the hill-country of Judah (Simeon's camp) (1 S. 19: 30) Βεθσαμει [-A], 1 S. 23: 34 Βεθα [-A], and probably was an ancient sanctuary, since the field of Joshua the Beth shemite may for some time during the Philistine domination the resting-place of the ark. In truth, it is difficult not to identify it with the Šimāšna of the Palestine lists of Rameses II. (KAT² 627; WMF Pl. n. Fur. 166) and Rameses III? (KAT² 639), whose sanctuary may be presumed to be connected with the myth of SAMSON (Judg.). It was at Bethshemesh that Amniah of Judah was defeated and made prisoner by Iehozab, king of Israel (2 K. 11: 16, 1 S. 31: 2) Αμφαμει [-A], 1 S. 31: 2 [-A]. According to the Chronicler it was one of the cities in the lowland of Judah taken by the Philistines from Ahaz, 'king of Israh' (2 Ch. 28: 2). The place was still shown in the days of Eusebius and Jerome, who give its position as to Km. E. of Eleutheropolis on the road to Nicopolis, a statement which suits the identification given above. There are many traces of ancient buildings.

2 An unidentified city within the territory of Naphtali, apparently in its northward portion (Josh. 19:2, ḥaṣṣa [18], ḥaṣṣa [A], ḥaṣṣa [14]). From Judg. 1:27, ḥaṣṣa [A] we learn that, along with Bethanath, its population continued to be chiefly Canaanite.

3 An unidentified city on the border of Issachar (Josh. 19:22, ḥaṣṣa [A], ḥaṣṣa [14]), perhaps = (2), if the latter lay in the extreme south of Naphtali.

4. A city of Egypt, mentioned in Jer. 43:14. וְהָיָה יְהוֹשָׁפָט 'he shall break the obelisks of sheshem in the land of Egypt'. It is commonly supposed by Griffith in Hastings Thes. that what is meant is Heliopolis, the city of the sun (see 198); but it is simply photographed from יְהוֹשָׁפָט in 1926. We read וְהָיָה יְהוֹשָׁפָט 'pillars of the sun or obelisks' J.T. Unter, 80 f., 1, he, ibid., p. 192, n. 29.

BETH SHITTAH (בֵּית שִׁיטָּה, 'place of acacia') is mentioned in Judg. 7:22 (BALETTA [V], BAIOACETTA [I]) as a point to the pine-stricken Muhannites (but before Unleaven) was on the way toward ZERIKAH (see ZARU, Agur), but has not been identified; probably it well down in the Jordan valley, at the mouth of wady where acacias flourish. The identification Shitta on the north side of the W. Jabbul, c. 10 N. Beisan and 6 m. E. of Zer'in (cp. Kob., Conder), has little to recommend it. It has much too been supposed scene of the surprise. More, perhaps, c. be said for Beisan. Others compare el-Meshitta (AMPP, 1895, pp. 81 ff., Schumacher, ED 159) with meschatta 14 m. SSE. of Joghbeh, whole narrative is, however, composite (see It. 1895), and the Heb. construction favours the assumption Zerarah does not belong to the same source as B. Shittah. In J. Mulan (lies east from Shechem to other side of the Jordan, whereas from 7:23 it appears in E's narrative they turn S. into Zerathim) through the Jordan valley, where they are intercepted by Ephraimites (cp. Moore, Judg., 212).

2 Macc. 11:5 RV Bethsauron See Beth SUR,

BETH TAPPUAH (בֵּית תַּפּוּחַ), § 103 = ע.ר., 'city of apples' (אֵפֶל, apple), a town in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. 15:11. ΒΑΙΘΑΧΟΥ [13]. ΒΕΘΘΑΠΦΟΥΕ [14]. ΒΗΘΘΑΦ, [14]), having a traditional connection with greater neighbour Hebron (1 Ch. 24; see TAPPUAH, and very possibly identical with the fortified town called TAPPUCH (19.7.) in 1 Macc. 9:53. If the similarity of names, the vicinity of Hebron, and the fruitfulness of the district prove anything, the modern Tuffah is the ancient Beth-tappuah. The village so named is 4½ m. W by N from Hebron, and stands on a high hill, the slopes of which are planted with aged olive-trees; indeed, the whole of the Hady Tuffah abounds in fruit-trees of all kinds. Traces of old buildings remain, and there are two ancient wells (Rob. LEPK 248; Vuclm. Judae, 3:174). Several ancient sites named Tuffah have lost this prefix. Thus the בֵּית תַּפּוּחַ of Nu. 32:36 is modern Nimria.

The notices of Eus. and Jer. (OS 235 is 104 17; cp. 156 m) are of interest only as showing that there was another place on the confines of Palestine and Egypt bearing the same name. Whatever the fruit called lappinā was (see APP 1), it was a common one in Palestine as quinces and apricots are now.

BETHUEL (בְּתוּאֵל, for בְּתוּאֵל, 'man of El' = cp Methushael, and see CAINITES, § 7; hardly for אֵל, bit il, 'house of a deity'; ΒΑΘΥΛΛΑ [ΒΕΤΙΛ])
 1. B. Nahor: father of Laban.

22:24; 21:5 [1]). In Gen. 25:20-23 [1'] he is called an 'Aramean,' as is also his son Laban in 31:2-24. See AKAM, § 3.

2. Not Built.

BETHUL (בֵּתוּל), a Simeonite town (Josh. 19:4. Βεϋλα [B]. Βαθυλα [A.], called בֵּתוּלָה [B]. HAMEL. It is doubtless the BETHEL (בֵּתְאֵל, בֵּתְאֵלָה [A.], Βεϋλα [L.], Beth-zur [B])¹ of 1 S. 30:27, mentioned along with latter and other places in the Negeb, but the site has not yet been identified. There was probably a Bethel near Gaza.¹

BETHULIA (ΒΕΤΟΥΛΙΑ [B¹⁸N]). [the preferable reading, but ΒΑΙΤΗΥΛΙΑ [B¹⁸N], ΒΑΙΤΟΥΛΙΑ [B¹⁸N], are also found]; ΒΗΘ-ΛΕΛ [B¹⁸g]; بيت حوله], the centre of the action in the book of Judith (2, 21 [B¹⁸g] 16 [N], ΒΑΙΤΟΥΛΙΑ 2, 20 f. 1, 7 ff.). In the shorter version of the narrative its place is taken by Jerusalem, and there is little doubt that Bethulia (properly Baitelia) represents שָׁרָא, ² the house of God, viz., Jerusalem (see [L¹⁸g], n. 1). So already Reuss who, however, together with Wette, derived the name from שָׁרָא נָצַר. Bertholdt's conjecture שָׁרָא, 'virgin of Yahweh,' may be worth noticing.³

According to the representations of the book (p. 167), Bethulā lay near Jezreel, upon a rock by a valley, commanding the passes to the S. (so Buhl, Pal. 201, n. 927). Various identifications have been suggested.

Some have caught for it near the modern Kfar Kold, formerly Capthoroth, NE. of the plain of Dothan (Hil., op. cit.); Kildun, other suggestions are the fortress Samir (Gross in Smith's EDS, K. 1), Karkel-Mellah (Marta, quoted in DDP 12113, p. 40) (K. 2), Karkel (Schulze), and possibly in DDP 12114, and ibid. 12115, often confounded), Mithlath or Misila (Gouda; ibid.), Samir, also inclines to this view, ibid. 12115, 256). More recently, Torrey (Journal, Am. Or. Soc., 29 (1907), 199) argues ably in favour of Shechem.

So large and important a place as Bethulia—with its rulers and elders (6.14.16), its streets and towers (7.2.12), and its siege, lasting for four and thirty days, by an immensely superior army (7.2)—cannot reasonably be identified with any small and insignificant locality. It remains to be added that the mention of Jerusalem and Bethulia as two distinct places (cp 16.15.5 f.) is probably to be assigned to a time when the identity of the ideal Bethulia with Jerusalem was forgotten.

BETHZACHARIAS. AV (by misprint?) BATHZACHARIAS (ΒΕΘΖΑΧΑΡΙΑ) [N. BATH, (N)] ; Jos. 8:092, BETHZ., the scene of the defeat of Judas the Maccabean by Lysias, and of the death of his brother Eleazar (1 Mac. 6:12 f.). Its position is defined by Josephus (Ant. xii. 94) as 70 stadia (N.) from Bethsur ; it is thus represented by the modern Bet-Sakana (described by Robinson¹² 1233 f. and PEF. Mem. 345, note).

BETHZATHA (ΒΗΘΣΑΘΑ), the reading adopted by T¹WH in Jn. 52, where T¹R has ΒΗΘΣΑΔΑ. For the evidence, see WH, ii, App. 76; perhaps the purest form would be Βηθζαθά, 'the place of the olive' (cp P¹LA, III).

BETH ZUR (בֵּית צֻר). Beθōzūr [AL], § 96, 'house of rock,' or, on the analogy of Beth-el, 'house of Zur'—a thymic name. Nestle, Eigennamen, 47, n 1; Hommel, IEHT 319; see ZUR), a city in the hill-country of Judah, mentioned between Mahal and Gedor⁴ (Josh. 15:3, βαιθזור [B]; cp 1 Ch 24:5, where Bethzur = βαιθזור [B], βηθזור [M]; is the 'son' of Maon), is stated in 2 Ch 11:7 (βαιθזור [B], την βαιθ, [M], την βαιθזור [L]) to have been fortified by Rehoboam. It was head of a district in Nehemiah's time (Neh 3:16, βαιθזור [NS], βηθזור [M]). Frequently an object of struggle in the Maccabean wars (1 βαιθזור, τα β, [SV], η βαιθ, τα β, [AN], 1 Mac 3:2, 3:4, 6:2, 7:1, 40:5, 9:5; 10:14 βαιθזור [V*]; 11:5, 11:7, etc.).⁵ It was in the time of Josephus (Int. xii. 56) 'the strongest place in all India, and was still an inhabited village (Tibetans) in the days of Tachibana and before (1818-1819) (p. 260). It is represented by Red Sun (ling) Sun, and occupies a position of strategic importance, commanding the road from Jerusalem to Tethouan, 4½ m. N. from the latter city. The modern village has a ruined tower, and there are broken stones scattered about, as also some fragments of columns, and many foundations of buildings. It must have been a small place (Tibetans).

If the statements in 2 Mac. 11:13-14a are reliable there must have been a second Beth-zur in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. Given since the time in the modern village of Beit-She'an, half an hour SE from Jerusalem. Such a, with more probability, identifies it with the modern Beit el-Jar (the Ar. form of Beth-zur) on the central height of the Mount of Olives (PT 14, Jar. 1933, p. 37, see Camb. Jour. on 2 Mac. 11:13). See, however, the Introduction.

BETROTHAL. The Heb. verb is נָשָׂא nasa (נָשָׂא nasa), on which see MARRIAGE, § 4. In 2S. 3:14, RV rightly has 'betrothed' instead of 'AV' 'espoused.' So also in Mt. 1:18, 1:22, 1:24, 1:25, 1:26, 1:27, 1:28, 1:29, 1:30, 1:31, 1:32, 1:33, 1:34, 1:35, 1:36, 1:37, 1:38, 1:39, 1:40, 1:41, 1:42, 1:43, 1:44, 1:45, 1:46, 1:47, 1:48, 1:49, 1:50, 1:51, 1:52, 1:53, 1:54, 1:55, 1:56, 1:57, 1:58, 1:59, 1:60, 1:61, 1:62, 1:63, 1:64, 1:65, 1:66, 1:67, 1:68, 1:69, 1:70, 1:71, 1:72, 1:73, 1:74, 1:75, 1:76, 1:77, 1:78, 1:79, 1:80, 1:81, 1:82, 1:83, 1:84, 1:85, 1:86, 1:87, 1:88, 1:89, 1:90, 1:91, 1:92, 1:93, 1:94, 1:95, 1:96, 1:97, 1:98, 1:99, 2:1, 2:2, 2:3, 2:4, 2:5, 2:6, 2:7, 2:8, 2:9, 2:10, 2:11, 2:12, 2:13, 2:14, 2:15, 2:16, 2:17, 2:18, 2:19, 2:20, 2:21, 2:22, 2:23, 2:24, 2:25, 2:26, 2:27, 2:28, 2:29, 2:30, 2:31, 2:32, 2:33, 2:34, 2:35, 2:36, 2:37, 2:38, 2:39, 2:40, 2:41, 2:42, 2:43, 2:44, 2:45, 2:46, 2:47, 2:48, 2:49, 2:50, 2:51, 2:52, 2:53, 2:54, 2:55, 2:56, 2:57, 2:58, 2:59, 2:60, 2:61, 2:62, 2:63, 2:64, 2:65, 2:66, 2:67, 2:68, 2:69, 2:70, 2:71, 2:72, 2:73, 2:74, 2:75, 2:76, 2:77, 2:78, 2:79, 2:80, 2:81, 2:82, 2:83, 2:84, 2:85, 2:86, 2:87, 2:88, 2:89, 2:90, 2:91, 2:92, 2:93, 2:94, 2:95, 2:96, 2:97, 2:98, 2:99, 3:1, 3:2, 3:3, 3:4, 3:5, 3:6, 3:7, 3:8, 3:9, 3:10, 3:11, 3:12, 3:13, 3:14, 3:15, 3:16, 3:17, 3:18, 3:19, 3:20, 3:21, 3:22, 3:23, 3:24, 3:25, 3:26, 3:27, 3:28, 3:29, 3:30, 3:31, 3:32, 3:33, 3:34, 3:35, 3:36, 3:37, 3:38, 3:39, 3:40, 3:41, 3:42, 3:43, 3:44, 3:45, 3:46, 3:47, 3:48, 3:49, 3:50, 3:51, 3:52, 3:53, 3:54, 3:55, 3:56, 3:57, 3:58, 3:59, 3:60, 3:61, 3:62, 3:63, 3:64, 3:65, 3:66, 3:67, 3:68, 3:69, 3:70, 3:71, 3:72, 3:73, 3:74, 3:75, 3:76, 3:77, 3:78, 3:79, 3:80, 3:81, 3:82, 3:83, 3:84, 3:85, 3:86, 3:87, 3:88, 3:89, 3:90, 3:91, 3:92, 3:93, 3:94, 3:95, 3:96, 3:97, 3:98, 3:99, 4:1, 4:2, 4:3, 4:4, 4:5, 4:6, 4:7, 4:8, 4:9, 4:10, 4:11, 4:12, 4:13, 4:14, 4:15, 4:16, 4:17, 4:18, 4:19, 4:20, 4:21, 4:22, 4:23, 4:24, 4:25, 4:26, 4:27, 4:28, 4:29, 4:30, 4:31, 4:32, 4:33, 4:34, 4:35, 4:36, 4:37, 4:38, 4:39, 4:40, 4:41, 4:42, 4:43, 4:44, 4:45, 4:46, 4:47, 4:48, 4:49, 4:50, 4:51, 4:52, 4:53, 4:54, 4:55, 4:56, 4:57, 4:58, 4:59, 4:60, 4:61, 4:62, 4:63, 4:64, 4:65, 4:66, 4:67, 4:68, 4:69, 4:70, 4:71, 4:72, 4:73, 4:74, 4:75, 4:76, 4:77, 4:78, 4:79, 4:80, 4:81, 4:82, 4:83, 4:84, 4:85, 4:86, 4:87, 4:88, 4:89, 4:90, 4:91, 4:92, 4:93, 4:94, 4:95, 4:96, 4:97, 4:98, 4:99, 5:1, 5:2, 5:3, 5:4, 5:5, 5:6, 5:7, 5:8, 5:9, 5:10, 5:11, 5:12, 5:13, 5:14, 5:15, 5:16, 5:17, 5:18, 5:19, 5:20, 5:21, 5:22, 5:23, 5:24, 5:25, 5:26, 5:27, 5:28, 5:29, 5:30, 5:31, 5:32, 5:33, 5:34, 5:35, 5:36, 5:37, 5:38, 5:39, 5:40, 5:41, 5:42, 5:43, 5:44, 5:45, 5:46, 5:47, 5:48, 5:49, 5:50, 5:51, 5:52, 5:53, 5:54, 5:55, 5:56, 5:57, 5:58, 5:59, 5:60, 5:61, 5:62, 5:63, 5:64, 5:65, 5:66, 5:67, 5:68, 5:69, 5:70, 5:71, 5:72, 5:73, 5:74, 5:75, 5:76, 5:77, 5:78, 5:79, 5:80, 5:81, 5:82, 5:83, 5:84, 5:85, 5:86, 5:87, 5:88, 5:89, 5:90, 5:91, 5:92, 5:93, 5:94, 5:95, 5:96, 5:97, 5:98, 5:99, 6:1, 6:2, 6:3, 6:4, 6:5, 6:6, 6:7, 6:8, 6:9, 6:10, 6:11, 6:12, 6:13, 6:14, 6:15, 6:16, 6:17, 6:18, 6:19, 6:20, 6:21, 6:22, 6:23, 6:24, 6:25, 6:26, 6:27, 6:28, 6:29, 6:30, 6:31, 6:32, 6:33, 6:34, 6:35, 6:36, 6:37, 6:38, 6:39, 6:40, 6:41, 6:42, 6:43, 6:44, 6:45, 6:46, 6:47, 6:48, 6:49, 6:50, 6:51, 6:52, 6:53, 6:54, 6:55, 6:56, 6:57, 6:58, 6:59, 6:60, 6:61, 6:62, 6:63, 6:64, 6:65, 6:66, 6:67, 6:68, 6:69, 6:70, 6:71, 6:72, 6:73, 6:74, 6:75, 6:76, 6:77, 6:78, 6:79, 6:80, 6:81, 6:82, 6:83, 6:84, 6:85, 6:86, 6:87, 6:88, 6:89, 6:90, 6:91, 6:92, 6:93, 6:94, 6:95, 6:96, 6:97, 6:98, 6:99, 7:1, 7:2, 7:3, 7:4, 7:5, 7:6, 7:7, 7:8, 7:9, 7:10, 7:11, 7:12, 7:13, 7:14, 7:15, 7:16, 7:17, 7:18, 7:19, 7:20, 7:21, 7:22, 7:23, 7:24, 7:25, 7:26, 7:27, 7:28, 7:29, 7:30, 7:31, 7:32, 7:33, 7:34, 7:35, 7:36, 7:37, 7:38, 7:39, 7:40, 7:41, 7:42, 7:43, 7:44, 7:45, 7:46, 7:47, 7:48, 7:49, 7:50, 7:51, 7:52, 7:53, 7:54, 7:55, 7:56, 7:57, 7:58, 7:59, 7:60, 7:61, 7:62, 7:63, 7:64, 7:65, 7:66, 7:67, 7:68, 7:69, 7:70, 7:71, 7:72, 7:73, 7:74, 7:75, 7:76, 7:77, 7:78, 7:79, 7:80, 7:81, 7:82, 7:83, 7:84, 7:85, 7:86, 7:87, 7:88, 7:89, 7:90, 7:91, 7:92, 7:93, 7:94, 7:95, 7:96, 7:97, 7:98, 7:99, 8:1, 8:2, 8:3, 8:4, BEULAH (צִיּוֹן, 'married'; אֶרֶץ מְנוּחָה [EṢṢAḤ], 'Aq. עֲשׂוּמְנָה, Symm. Theod. CYNGIKIEMENO, the symmetrical name (Is 62) by which Zion may ultimately be called when her land is 'married' (Sggs²; cp BAVT). Two primitive and related ideas underlie the expression. The first is that the people of a land, as well as all other 'fruits' (Dt 28⁴), arise from the fertilising influence of the land's Bad or divine Husband (cp ḲṢ² 107 f.); the second, that a people which remains faithful to the land's divine Husband is sure of his protection. The former is merely limited by means of the contrast of the two names 'Desolate' and 'Married' (Is 62¹); in Is. 54-6, on the other hand, it engrosses the mind of the prophetic writer. It is on the latter, as the context shows, that the writer of Is. 62 (who is not the author of Is. 54) wishes to concentrate our attention. Zion is at present despoiled (v. 7), and her harvests are plundered by the heathen (v. 8 f.); but when her land is once more 'married,' she will be entitled to the protection of the God of the whole earth.

The sense of the passage has been obscured by an error in the ovel points. For 725, 'thy sons' (725), read 732 'he who milderth thee up' (p. 54 in CL, p. 147 in ES). See Ding, Che, SROF, and on the other side Ding, who gives no parallel, however, for the startling play upon meanings which he assumes. T. K. 1

BEZAAANANNIM (בִּזְאָאָנָנִים) occurs in Josh. 19:11 LXXB: 'the oak of Bezaananim,' where EV has 'oak' in ZAANANIM, 'a view of the text now pretty generally abandoned.' The 'oak' (oak of Bezaananim) is a landmark on the W. border of Naphtali, following Heleph and preceding Adinn-nekel and Abneel, and is usually identified with 'the oak of Bezaanum' (בִּזְאָנָנִים) following the pointers, or of 'Bezaanum,' or of 'bezaanannau' (בִּזְאָנָנָא) in Judg. 4:6, where RV has 'the ark in Zaananim,' and has inconsistently omitted to record the modern view of the text in the margin. In Josh. 1:11 it has καὶ μὲλα καὶ βεβαιῶναι [B], καὶ μὲλα καὶ βεβαιῶναι [A], καὶ μὲλα καὶ βεβαιῶναι [I]; in Judg. 1:11 it has ὡς ὅπου πλεονεκτήσῃ [B], so Theod., πρὸς ὅπου ἀνατασσέσθαι [A]; see Field's Hesychia. The difficulty, connected with the text, is that the

The difficulty connected with the phrase is twofold. (1) In Joshua 15, this famous tree is placed on the border of Naphtali; but Judges 9:6, read in the light of Judg. 1:7-9, makes the tree much nearer to the battle-field, which, according to Judg. 5:21, was by the stream Kishon. (2) The name is inexplicable, whether we read כִּנְעָנִים (Bezannim?) or כִּנְעָנִים (Bezannim?). If, however, several times in Judges (see KAHN 510), and once in Judg. 1 (see HAKOSHIM), the name כִּנְעָנִים = קִישׁ has been correctly restored, it is plausible to suppose that the incomprehensible name, pronounced sometimes Bezannim or (better) Bezannin, sometimes Bezannamin, may conceal the same old name, especially as in Judg. 1:7 the words 'which is by Kedesh' are added. It is extremely probable that both in the far north (see KADESH, 2) and in the territory of Issachar there was a place which bore the name of Kadesh (Kishon); the people of either place could be called Kishonim (Kishonim). Nor need we hesitate to emend כִּנְעָנִים (the form which the best critics prefer) to כִּנְעָנִים, a form which should be restored, as the present writer has sought to show, in Judg. 5:25 (see KAHN 511). It is easier to suppose that the 'oak' or 'sacred tree' which forms the subject of this article was near the Kishon (Kadesh) of Issachar than to follow the Priestly Writer in Joshua, who places it on the border of Naphtali. The error of the latter seems to have arisen from the statements in Judg. 16:9 f., which place the murthering of the Israelitish warriors at Kadesh-Naphtali. The error of the scribe who wrote כִּנְעָנִים was facilitated by an unfortunate recollection of the term כִּנְעָנִים Kēn'anim (Canaanites). Whether he also thought of the new field, כִּנְעָנִים 'ditch, dike, pond' (עֵץ = 'marsh,' Job 8:11-12), cannot be determined (cp. Neub. Gen., Psalm, 225).

An identification of 'Bezuman' with Khir¹ el-Bessim, E. of Tyber, on the plateau of the Sea of Galilee, was proposed by Goulder in JTS 77, p. 25 (See Tent Work, 2: 101, 102). Goulder, ibid. 77, p. 25 (See Tent Work, 2: 101, 102) says: 'But we must first of all be clear of the meaning of the name. It is remarkable that tradition still affirms that the "look of . . ." which was a fixed element in the story, was "by Kedesh". Of course, קדש Qadosh is not required when we read קדשן קדשן, 'In the sacred tree of the Kiddshoun.'

BEZAI (צָבַי, § 52; Halprecht has found the Jewish name Baisan on a tablet from Nippur [ZFAK, Jan. 1808, p. 55]). The line Bezai, a family in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii., §§ 9, 36), EZRA217 (BACQY [B]. cc. [A], BACQ [L]). Neh. 7:23 (BCCI [B]). BAC [A]. COH [1].) and 365 BASSA, RV BASSAI (BACCAI [B]. COCA [A]. CCCI [L.]); represents (among the signatures to the covenant see EZRA, i. § 7). Neh. 10:18 [w] (BCCI [B]). BCCI [S]. BCCI [L.]).

BEZALEEL, RV Bezalel (Gen. 35: 29, 29, 'in the shadow of God'), cp. Hebrew בְּזַלְלֵל [BAZ.L]. The form is improbable. Sd Hcl. Read שֶׁזַלְלֵל 'God rescues', and cp. the Phoen. names שֶׁזַלְלֵל. The number of the artificial religious names of later times has been exaggerated.

BEZEK (712, cp § 100, 'gravel'? cp Syr.; B [H1]; BEZ). 1. A place at which Saul was the fourth he had raised for the relief of Jabesh-gad 18.118 (ap̄heke ep̄ šaul [1]; cp šr̄yā [V], šāpā [1]). Eusebius (18.2237.2) locates two neighbouring villages of this name 17 K. m. from Neapolis on the road to Scythopolis; beyond them Khirbat 14 Eng. m. from Nabulus and nearly opposite the 14 Eng. m. from Vabz., with which Elishon Tarchi 13.222 identified it. See PLF Mem. 223.217. 2. A place of which the name is not known.

2. A place at which Judah and Simeon, in invading the S. of Palestine, encountered and routed Candidates under Adoni-bezek; Judg. 14 f. (3 [A], cm. B* in r. s.). Many scholars, from Eusebius downwards, identify this with No. 1; but this is admissible.

Judah and Simeon set out from the neighbourhood of G (Judg. 1.16, 2.1) to invade the region in which they afterwards settled; the end of the story of Adoni-bezek conducts him to Jerusalem, which was ruled by his own city (Adoni-zedek, i.e. of Jerusalem; see Adoni-bezek and Adoni-zedek); he is wholly out of this sphere of action and in a quite different direction.

The Bezek of Judy. I must be sought much further south. Conder would find it at Bezek, 6 m. S. of Lydda (FEF.M. 319), but this view is somewhat probable. In view of the change which the name of king has suffered, it may be questioned whether the name of the place has been correctly preserved.

BEZER (752, § 100, 'fortress'; Bœcap [Bœal] [Levitical city and city of refuge, Dt. 34; Josh. 20.2] (con. MT; Bœcap [L-], 1 Ch. 6.78 [con. the Bœcap] (7522) and Jer. 48.24 (C¹ boozar) is described in Josh. 20 as lying in the wilderness on the (Amorite) 'Mishor' of Leliland, and is usually identified with the modern Keser of Bechar (or Bechar), about 2 m. SW. of Dabab and about the same distance N. of Aroer. King Mesha of Moab in his inscription (cf. 27) says: 'I built Bezer, my ruins had it become.' With this place some have identified Bœcap (cf. 2).

The readings of MS and Syr, in this passage (βηθ [Jes. I.eg. II.] point to an original Beth-zuth (house of the olives). Hence it is possible that Bezeth may be the later Beth-zuth ('place of olives'), the name given to the N. end of the plateau, on the S. part of which lay Jerusalem. See RE. BETHATHA, JERUSALEM, OLIVES, MOUNT OF.

t. The 'mother' of the tribes Dan and Naphtali, according to J; also represented as the maid of Rachel (mother of the house of Joseph) and concubine of Jacob and his eldest son Reuben.

We have now unfortunately, the means of determining how far we are warranted in regarding these relations as representing traditions of fact, and how far they may be imaginative incidents of the story. Was Bilhah, e.g. a tribe (Canaanish? Aramian?), elements of which were taken up into some of the clans of the house of Joseph (the first Israel) in the earliest days after their arrival in W. Palestine before they crystallized into the three well-known branches (Manasse-Machir, Ephraim, Benjamin)? Or does the name, which occurs nowhere outside of Genesis and the equivalent (Gen. 7:14), simply indicate that not only Dan but once also Naphtali tried unsuccessfully to settle somewhere in the Highlands of Ephraim before taking itself to the extreme north? Or, once more, is this title only of Dan, the inclusion of Naphtali being then due simply to its geographical nearness to Dan in its later seat, and to its willingness to stand by the side of the noble Rachel tribes (Gen. 50:22)? Again, is the Kuben story (Gen. 35:22 f. Gen. 50:2) to be brought into connection with the other places of the extension of the house of Joseph (see above), Kuben's interest in the ketenes of Joseph (Gen. 35:7 f. Gen. 41:2) beyond Jordan (MAVHAL, 1. THURAM, 350ff.), or is it to be explained, as Stade (op. cit. 1. line) explains it, as a memorial of the primitive society that survived E. of the Jordan when there had been a change in W. Palestine? Or, let us give serious consideration to a combination (G. H. B. Wright) with the story of BUBAN (p. BUBAN, 21) the son of Reuben (Josh. 15:6 f. 17), an indication that Reubenite elements were once actually to be found W. of the Jordan in that land? (Gen. 35:22 f.) That there really was contact between Benjamin and the Bilhah tribe Dan was a matter of course, and indeed had ultimately become Benjamite (p. B. STAMM, § 34 W. Zeitschr., 42 n. 13). It was Rachel, however, not Bilhah, that died when Ben-on was born.

A name in the great post-exilic list (see 1 Esd., n. 3 q), borne by one of the ten (Javan, or eleven (Neh., 1 Esd.), persons who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon (see 1 Esd., n. 8 q) = 1 Esd. 2:2 בַּלְשָׁרֹוּר [1], בַּלְשָׁרֹוּר [M], בַּלְשָׁרֹוּר [1 b] Neh 7:7 בַּלְשָׁרֹוּר [8], בַּלְשָׁרֹוּר [M], בַּלְשָׁרֹוּר [1 b] = 1 Esd. 2:2 בַּלְשָׁרֹוּר [1], בַּלְשָׁרֹוּר [M], בַּלְשָׁרֹוּר [1 b]. If Bel-Sar is correct, may not this be the Shattar of Zech. 7:2 (see SHATTAR, 2 K, 2)? This undesigned coincidence (if accepted) may have important bearings on criticism. L. K. C.

 1 Ch 7 : (מַבְהַל [15], בַּמַּבְהַל [A], בַּמַּבְהַל [L]).

BINDING AND LOOSING (Mt. 16:19-18:18). The explanation given under MAKOT (§ 3 [4]) may account for the origin of the Jewish phrase 'binding' (עֲבָרָה) and 'loosing' (פְּטָרָה); but in usage 'to bind' and 'to loose' mean simply 'to forbid' and 'to permit' by an indisputable authority, the words of authoritative prohibition and permission being considered to be as effectual as the spell of an enchanter (עַרְסָה, Large Ps. 58:1-3). The wise men or rabbis had, in virtue of their ordination, the power of deciding disputes relating to the Law. A practice which was permitted by them was said to be 'loosed' (פְּטוּרָה), and one which was forbidden was 'bound' (עֲבוּרָה). Such pronouncements were made by the different schools; hence it was said, 'The school of Shammai binds; the school of Hillel looses.' Theoretically, however, they proceeded from the Sanhedrin, and there is a Talmudic statement that there were three decisions made by the lower 'house of judgment' to which the upper 'house of judgment' (i.e., the heavenly one) gave its supreme sanction (Middot, 23b). Probably, therefore, Jesus adopted a current mode of speech when he said to the disciples that what soever they bound or loosed on earth (i.e., in expounding the new Law) should be bound or loosed in heaven (Mt. 18:18). Probably, too, it is a less authentic tradition which makes Jesus give the same promise to Peter individually (Mt. 16:19). Nowhere is it recorded that the great Teacher made Peter the president (כֹּהֵן) of his council of wise men. The words which immediately precede Mt. 16:19 — self-evidently taken by the editor from another context — represent Peter, not as an expounder of the new transfigured Law, but as a practical administrator (cp Is. 22:22). It is in favour of the view here adopted (viz., that the words on 'binding' and 'loosing' were addressed to the disciples in general and not to Peter individually) that in Jn. 20:23 the power to remit and to retain is granted to the disciples collectively, not to any one of them individually. Though the use of κράτειν in that passage has no exact Hebrew or Aramaic equivalent, the saying is not a new one, but a paraphrase of Mt. 18:18.

Food, § 8); the Torah divides them into clean and clean (Lev. 11:13 Dt. 14:15; see CLEAN and UNCLEAN § 9). Many contrivances for capturing birds were common use (Ps. 91:1 1217 Prov. 1:17 6:5 7:23 Am. Eccl. 9:12 Jer. 5:27 Hos. 7:12 9:8 Eccl. 11:30). Torah protects them against cruelty (Dt. 22:6). Sometimes the captives were tamed and treated as (Job 1:3 [10:24], Bar. 3:17 Eccl. 27:19 Jas. 3:7). C. in cases of extreme poverty does the Torah allow birds to be used for sacrifice (see SACRIFICE). Natural common small birds, on account of their abundance were of little value; they were probably so numerous to prove a nuisance (Mt. 10:29 31 Lk. 12:6 f.; cp L. and Book, 43). To what extent — if any — birds were studied for omens in Israel as in Babylonia (see BABYLONIA, § 32, MAGIC, BABYLONIAN, § 3) it is difficult to determine (see Lev. 19:26 Dt. 18:10 2 K. 21:6 2 Ch. 33:1 K. 1:3 [5:13], and cp DIVINATION, § 2, leg., a Schultz, OT Theol. 1:250 ff. ET).

Allusions to their habits in metaphors, similes, and proverbial expressions prove how prominent they were in the life and thought of the people (cp L. and Book, 43).

3. Literary and popular allusions. Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, Lect. vii, vol. i, ET 1787.

They were evidently observed with the keenest interest as being links between earth and heaven, and regarded with a certain awe (Job 12:7 28:21 35:11 Eccl. 10:20). It was noticed how they cared for and protected their young (Dt. 32:11 Ex. 19:1 18:31 5 Mt. 23:37); how and where they made their nests (Ps. 101:12 17 Ezek. 31:6) — sometimes according to a pleasing but very doubtful interpretation in the very temple itself (Ps. 84:3 [4]); in what sad plight they wandered alone when cast out of the nest (Prov. 27:8 Is. 16:2 Ps. 102:7 [8]); how eagerly they returned to their nest (Hos. 9:11 Ps. 11:1); how free from care they were (Mt. 6:26); how regularly they migrated (Jer. 8:7 Prov. 26:2); how voracious they were (Gen. 40:17 Mt. 13:4 Mk. 4:4 Lk. 8:5); how they descended from the clouds in a bevy (Eccl. 13:17), and with what delight they gathered in a leafy tree (Dan. 4:9 [12] Eccl. 27:9 Mt. 13:32 Lk. 13:19); how sweetly they warbled (Eccl. 12:4 Wisd. 17:18 Cant. 2:12 [see, however, VINI, Ps. 104:12]); how God recognises and protects them (Ps. 50:11 Lk. 12:24); and how they praise and reverence him (Ps. 118:10 Ezek. 38:20). Further, Israel's enemy is often pictured as a rapacious bird that sights its prey afar off and swoops down upon it (Is. 46:11 Jer. 12:9 Dt. 28:49 Rev. 19:17 21). Thus, 'to destroy' is to give a man's flesh to the birds of the air for meat (Gen. 40:17 Dt. 28:26 1 S. 17:44 46 1 K. 11:11 16:4 21:24 Ps. 79:2 Jer. 7:3 16:4 19:7 31:20 Ezek. 29:5). A place is desolate when its only inhabitants are the birds of the air (Jer. Ezek. 31:13 32:4 Is. 18:6), and an utter desolation when even these too have perished (Jer. 4:25 12:4 Hos. 4:3 Zeph. 1:4). The saying in Mt. 8:20, where Jesus contrasts himself with the birds which have nests, has not yet been made perfectly clear (but see SON OF MAN).

1 Cp WRS Rel Sem. 2:160, and Che's note, Psalm 104. The common view of the meaning is untenable on all grounds — exegetical, historical, metrical. 2. No natural exegesis can be given, if בִּרְשָׁא 'thine altars' has any relation to the birds. 3. The sanctity of the temple proper would certainly have excluded the winged visitors; Jos. Ant. 3:16 speaks of pointed spikes on the top of the (Herodian) temple to prevent birds from sitting even on the outside. This seems to have been generally overlooked. 4. The psalm consists of long verses (lines) divided by a caesura into two unequal parts. 'Thine altars, my King and my God,' is too much to form the second and shorter portion of one of these verses. See Che, Psalm 104, and cp Baethgen, ad loc., who attempts an exegetical compromise. 5. Read this, 'Do I count my heritage a carcass torn by hyenas (בִּרְשָׁא בִּרְשָׁא; ὁ σπηλαιον θάινης = γ τ-τ-τ)? Are vultures round about it?'

BIRTHDAY (יּוֹם הַחַיָּיָה, ΗΜΕΡΑ ΓΕΝΕΣΕΩΣ [ADE], γ. Η. [L], Gen. 40: 20; ΓΕΝΕΣΙΑ [Ti. VII], Mt. 116 Mk. 6: 21). The only express mention of the celebration of the anniversary of birth in OT or NT is in connection with kings: Pharaoh's birthday (Gen. 40: 20), when the 'chief butler' was restored to his office and the 'chief baker' hanged; Antiochus Epiphanus' birthday (2 Macc. 15: 7); and Herod's birthday (Mt. 14: 6 Mk. 6: 21), when Herodias's dancing was the occasion of the execution of John the Baptist. When it is said in Job 1: 4 that Job's sons 'were wont to go and feast in the house of each one upon his day,' 'his day' denotes a weekly and not an annual feast; and in Hos. 7: 1 'the day of our king' may refer to the anniversary of his accession quite as well as to a birthday. However, this silence on the subject is no warrant for us to conclude that the Israelites did not follow the general custom of observing birthdays, especially those of kings (see, for Egypt, K¹ 477, and for Persia, Herod. 9: 10). The curses invoked by Job (31: 12) and Jeremiah (20: 14) on the days of their birth imply that under happier conditions these days would have been remembered in more cheerful fashion.

Doubts have been raised as to whether Herod's γενεσῖα meant his birthday or the anniversary of his accession. The Mishna (Aboda Zarra, 1: 3) mentions as heathen festivals, calends, saturnalia, κρατήσεις, kings' days of γενεσῖα (יְנִיסָא), and the day of birth and the day of death. It is probable that the last two mean the actual days and not the anniversaries; the κρατήσεις would naturally be the anniversaries of accessions and the יְנִיסָא the birthday. So Talm. Jer. Aboda Zarra, 1: 3a takes יְנִיסָא as יְנִיסָא (birthday), but Bab. Aboda Zarra, 10a understands יְנִיסָא as anniversary of accession. γενεσῖα is used as birthday in Late Greek (in classical Greek it is anniversary of death) and never as anniversary of accession; thus the sense of birthday seems well established. Cp Schürer, Hist. 2: 26, and the Talm. Lexx. of Levy and Jastrow on יְנִיסָא; also Gratz, MGH 20: 230 [71]. See also LORD'S DAY, § 2.

BIRZATH (בִּרְזַת, Kt. γ. ΒΙΡΖΑΤΗ [L], in genealogy of ASHER (§ 4 n.), 1 Ch. 7: 31). The name (בִּרְזַת, 'well of the olive tree') seems to suggest a locality.

BISHLAM (בִּשְׁלָם; ΕΝ ΕΙΡΗΝΗ [BA], ΕΝ ΕΙΡΗΝΗ ΡΕΟΥΜ ΒΕΛΤΕΕΜ [L], Ezra 4: 7, for which 1 Esd. 2: 16 has ΒΕΛΛΕΜΕΣ [ΒΗΛΕΜΟΣ [BA] or ΒΕΛΛΕΙΜΟΣ [L]), the name of a Persian officer of unknown origin, who joined with others in writing a letter of complaint against the Jews. Es¹ takes the name as descriptive of the tranquil state of the writers of the letter (ἐν εἰρήνῃ); but Bishlam is clearly a proper name. It either means 'in peace,' cp BIZALLEL, BIRSHA, or, more probably, like those names, it is a corruption. The true name may be Babylonian. It may perhaps be recovered if we start from one or the other of the forms presented in the MSS of 1 Esd., where the proper names are sometimes more accurately preserved. Ball (Var. Apoc. ad loc.), adopting βήλεμος, supposes a corruption of Bab. Bel-sham—i.e., 'Bel made.' It would seem, however, that the βελισμος of Es¹ must be more original, and this form may have arisen from Bel-sham-iskun—i.e., 'Bel made a name' (Nestle, Marg. 23: 29).

BISHOP

The elder of the church, summoned from Ephesus to Miletus to receive Paul's farewell charge (Acts 20: 17), is thus addressed:

1. Occurrence of name in NT. It is not clear from this passage whether the word is used as a definite title, or merely as a description implying that ἐπίσκοπος, oversight or superintendence, was a function of the presbyterate. In the address of the Epistle to the Philippians, however, we have 'bishops and deacons' formally mentioned; it is difficult, in view of the later usage of the words, to suppose that this is merely a general description of 'those who rule and those who serve.' In 1 Tim. 3: 1 ff. the bishop and the deacon are again brought together. The qualifications of a bishop are enumerated: δὲ οὗν τὸν ἐπίσκοπον κ.τ.λ., where the article is commonly regarded as generic, or at least as not implying that there was only one bishop in the Ephesian church. In Tit. 1: 5 ff., in connection with the duty of appointing presbyters in the towns of Crete, a similar description of a bishop's qualifications is given (δὲ γὰρ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον κ.τ.λ.); but no reference is made to deacons. The only other occurrence of the word is in 1 Pet. 2: 25, where it is applied to Christ himself, 'the shepherd and bishop of your souls.' It is not necessary to interpret these titles as metaphors drawn from the Christian ministry.

We note, then, that the word is found in all cases on Greek ground, and it would seem as if those who in the Palestinian churches were called 'presbyters' were in the Greek churches spoken of at first as 'bishops' and then indifferently as 'presbyters' or as 'bishops.' This view, however, assumes that ἐπίσκοπος was already at this time in use as a title of office; and the assumption requires a careful examination. It will be best to begin such an examination with what is admittedly the latest portion of the NT evidence.

1 Tim. 3: 1 ff. 'If a man: keth ἐπίσκοπὸν he desireth a good work. The bishop, therefore, must be without

2. (a) Pastoral Epistles. ὁρᾶται καλὸν ἔργον ἐπιθυμεῖ δὲ οὗν τὸν ἐπίσκοπον ἀνεπιληπτὸν εἶναι κ.τ.λ.). The whole conception of the function of an ἐπίσκοπος, as it is here described, suggests that the authority which he wields is independent, not merely that of a member of a governing board. To begin with, ἐπίσκοπος does not give any idea of assessors; it is distinctly personal. It is a position of independent importance and control, such as a man may naturally desire. Secondly, the epithet 'given to hospitality' (φιλόξενος) suggests a personal responsibility; the Church's duty of showing hospitality to Christians from other parts seems naturally to centre in some one person; we could scarcely have had 'Presbyters must be given to hospitality' (δὲ οὗν πρεσβυτέρους φιλόξενους εἶναι). In like manner, 'apt to teach' (ἱδοδακτικός) would scarcely be a qualification for a member of the presbyteral body as such; and the same may be said of the epithets μὴ πάροινος, μὴ πλῆκτης, 'not passionate or ungoverned in temper.' The control of his own house, again, gives the thought of independent jurisdiction in the case to which it is made a parallel—'how shall he act as ἐπιμελητής of the church of God?'

The singular noun with the article may, according to Greek usage, be taken generically; but we must observe that in the writer passes on to give a similar list of qualifications for a deacon the plural is used: 'Deacons in like manner . . . Women in like manner . . . Let deacons be husbands of one wife' [διακονοῖς ὡσαύτως . . . γυναῖκες ὡσαύτως . . . διάκονοις ὡσαύτως] (m. the last case the use of the singular with the generic article would have avoided an awkward phrase). (2) in 1 Tim. 3: 17, we have an exact parallel: δὲ γὰρ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον κ.τ.λ., where we might easily have had δὲ γὰρ ἐπισκόπους κ.τ.λ.; (3) the usage of the article in the Pastoral Epistles is a further reason for hesitating to explain it here as generic, for the article is very sparingly employed, and there seems no example at all parallel to these in any of the three Epistles.

The difficulty is to some extent met by insisting on the use of ἐπίσκοπος as a descriptive epithet rather than as a formal title: 'He who exercises ἐπισκοπή.' In so far as his status in the Church is dwelt on, such a man would be spoken of most naturally as 'one of the elders'; but here the subject in hand is the function to be exercised by him individually. That function is ἐπισκοπή: in the exercise of it he is ἐπίσκοπος. The watchful oversight which is regarded as 'an excellent work' is not an eminent position, but a responsible activity. He who is to exercise it needs to have certain special qualifications. We feel the contrast when we come to διακόνους ὑποτάκτως, which introduces in an ordinary way the members of a large and subordinate class.

The passage in Acts 20 is, as we have seen, quite indeterminate. If ἐπίσκοπος can be shown to be a title in use at the time in question, we may

3. (A) Other NT writings. render the words, 'hath set you as bishops.' Otherwise we should perhaps render them, 'hath set you for oversight.' The phrase in the Epistle to the Philippians, if taken quite by itself, would, in the light of later history, be naturally rendered 'with the bishops and deacons' (σὺν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνις), notwithstanding the absence of the definite article. If, however, ἐπίσκοπος be not yet found as a title, a less definite interpretation may be allowed. The decision between the two views must depend on a further consideration which shall include the use of the term διάκονος at this period (see Deacon, § 6), and the use of ἐπίσκοπος outside the NT, in other than Christian contexts, and in the earliest Christian writings.

In the use of ἐπίσκοπος, ἐπισκοπεῖν, in other than Christian contexts, a great width of meaning is noticeable, due, no doubt, to the original signification which fitted the words for application to any person who exercised an office of superintendence. The commissioners who superintended Athenian colonies, various other commissioners or inspectors, magistrates who regulated the sale of provisions, and, apparently, financial officers of a temple or of a guild (Lightf. Phil 95; Hatch, Organisation of Early Christian Churches, 37 f.)—all these are spoken of as ἐπίσκοποι, or are said ἐπισκοπεῖν. Nor was this the only term which had a similar largeness of reference: quite parallel is the usage of ἐπιμελεῖν and ἐπιμελητής (Hatch, see above).

In the LXX the word ἐπίσκοπος is equally wide in the persons and offices which it embraces. Taskmasters, captains or presidents, and commissioners, are in turn so entitled; and as a synonym in the list of these cases we find also ἐπιστάται (Lightf.; see above).

All this evidence points to the fact that ἐπίσκοπος and ἐπισκοπεῖν were words which naturally offered themselves as descriptions of any persons charged with responsible oversight, and were the more available in that they had no predominant association with any one class of officers in particular. The words were, as far as possible, colourless, much as our words 'preside' and 'president' are to-day.

Hatch's position, adopted by Harnack, in reference to ἐπίσκοπος is as follows:—The most important corporate function of the earliest Christian communities

5. Hatch's theory. was that of providing for their poor and sick members. They were, in fact, benevolent societies, and as such they had parallels all around them in the heathen world, in the countless clubs and guilds which combined social purposes with certain religious practices. The finance officers of these heathen societies were called ἐπίσκοποι. Now, the duties which the Christian ἐπίσκοπος had to perform are described as intimately connected with the care of the poor, with hospitality to travelling brethren, and with the management of the common fund which was devoted to and similar purposes. It is probable, therefore, both the title and the functions of the Christian ἐπίσκοπος are directly derived from his heathen counterpart.

The best examination of this theory is that by Harnack (Geschichte der Christenheit, 21).

6. Criticism of it. After pointing out the very general signification of the word ἐπίσκοπος in heathen literature—a signification which could not be applied to any person in authority for whom there was no fixed title already, and so to be used with great freedom by the LXX as a rendering for various officers mentioned in the OT—he takes up the evidence of the inscriptions on which Hatch's theory mainly rests. They fall chronologically into two classes. The first class is pre-Christian: one inscription of the Macedonian period in the island of Thera, which contains a designation of certain ἐπίσκοποι to receive moneys and render them; and two inscriptions of the second century B.C. in the island of Rhodes, relating to municipal officers, not further defined. Those of the second class belong to the second and the third century A.D., and are found in a district E. of the Jordan. They are ten, and refer to municipal officers. In one case the officers are charged with some responsibility for the moneys of a temple. In this district they seem to have formed a kind of municipal board, chosen from various trades or divisions of the community. Further, in a Latin inscription of the fourth century certain episcopi regulate prices in the market.

This appears to be the whole of the evidence on which the statement that ἐπίσκοποι were the finance-officers of clubs and guilds is found to rest. In Loening's opinion it points exactly in the opposite direction.

As to the other part of the argument,—viz., that the Christian ἐπίσκοπος is, as a matter of fact, a financial officer,—that is no peculiarity of function linking it especially to the title. To the presbyters at Jerusalem gifts are brought; and presbyters are warned not to exercise their office 'for filthy lucre' (E.V.; ἀσέβην ἔργον, 1 Pet. 5.3); moreover, in Polycarp's letter to the Philippians (chap. 11) presbyters are charged with duties towards the poor and are warned against covetousness. The word ἐπίσκοπος in itself suggests a far wider responsibility than the mere charge of finance: it implies superintendence of persons as well as of things.

Loening even goes so far as to suggest that the word ἐπίσκοπος was chosen just because it had no heathen associations either in the Jewish or in the Greek world, and was, therefore, free to be used in a community which stood in contrast to all other communities surrounding it.

In the extreme scarcity of evidence, we may be content to say that the theory that the Christian ἐπίσκοπος derived his title and functions from those of the officers of the Greek guilds or of the Greek municipalities has not been established.

We may say, then, that the NT evidence seems to point to the existence in the apostolic age of two classes of administration—a class of rulers and

7. General conclusions. a class of humbler ministrants who acted under their orders. As far as the first of these has a distinctive official title its members are called Elders; but, since their function was summed up in the general responsibility of oversight (ἐπισκοπή), they could be spoken of as 'overscers' (ἐπιστάται), a term which was already passing from a mere description of function into a definite title. The men of the second class added those of the first in the humbler parts of their ministrations. They were naturally described by the general designation of 'servants' (διάκονοι); but this term too is passing in the apostolic age into a recognised title. On the whole, it seems simpler to suppose that the latter stage has been reached in Phil 1.1 and in the Pastoral Epistles; but the decision of this point is not a matter of serious importance.

BISHOP

In the later history, the second class retains its designation, which in some localities comes to be a title of considerable dignity. The first class, on the other hand, presently undergoes a subdivision: one member comes to stand out above his fellows, and, whilst all continue alike to be Elders, the title of ἐπίσκοπος, which in itself connotes an individual responsibility and importance, is not unnaturally appropriated as the designation of the one who has come to be the supreme officer of the community. The causes which led to a monarchical development are still wrapped in obscurity, but the appropriation of the name ἐπίσκοπος to the chief ruler is not hard to understand. We are fortunate in possessing a document of the last decade of the first century, by which we can, to some extent, test the position which we have taken up. The Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians was occasioned by the ejection from their office of certain Elders of the church in Corinth. As the writer may quite well have had personal knowledge of one or more of the apostles, his evidence is of high importance, not only for determining the existing organisation of the church in Corinth (and probably in Rome as well) in his time, but also as indicating the belief that this organisation was instituted by the apostles themselves.

First let us consider the use of the designations in question in the most important passage.

(§ 42) The apostles . . . appointed their first fruits (cp. 1 Cor. 16:13), having tested them by the Spirit, to be ἐπισκοποι and διακονοι (eis ἐπισκοπὴν καὶ διακονίαν) of them which should believe. The words have clearly become titles, and their use as such is justified as being not new, but foretold in Is. 61:1. It is curious that ἐπίσκοπος in this citation is an insertion of Clement's, and is not found in the LXX. He is clearly quoting from memory, and his memory has played him false. (§ 44) 'The apostles foresaw that there would be strife about the title for "office" of oversight (περὶ τοῦ ὀνόματος τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς). Hence they appointed the aforesaid and provided for successors to them. It is a sin to turn such, if they have discharged their ministry blamelessly, out of their ἐπισκοπή. "Blessed," he goes on at once, "are the Elders who have gone before," and are safe from such treatment. In § 47 we have the offence described as a revolt "against the Elders"; in § 54 we read: "Let the flock of Christ be at peace along with the appointed Elders"; and in § 57, "Do ye who began this sedition submit yourselves to the Elders."

It is plain, then, that the persons whom the apostles 'appointed as ἐπίσκοποι,' and as their successors, are spoken of also as 'the appointed Elders.' These Elders are not to be rashly ejected from their λειτουργία or ἐπισκοπή.

The difficulty which Clement's epistle presents in the matter of these designations belongs to the earlier chapters, before he has come to speak definitely of the Corinthian disorders: he seems to use the term 'elders' as though he referred not to an office, but only to a grade of persons dignified by that name in contrast to the young (οἱ νέοι).

In the first of the passages in question (§ 1) he praises their former orderliness, 'submitting yourselves to your rulers (or "leaders," τοῖς ἡγουμένοις ὑμῶν), and paying the due honour to the elders that were among you; and on the young ye enjoined modesty and gravity; and on the women' certain appropriate duties. Similarly, in § 21 we leave, 'let us reverence our rulers (τοῖς προηγούμενοις ὑμῶν), and let us honour our elders, let us instruct the young . . . let us guide our women aright.' Here we seem to have a contrast between 'rulers' and 'elders'; and it has been held (e.g., by Harnack) that the 'rulers' are a class of persons whose authority came from their possessing the charisma of teaching (cp. Heb. 13:7-24), whilst the Elders are an undefined grade of senior members of the Church to whom honour is due on account of age and length of discipleship. But the word ἐπίσκοπος, occurring in both passages (not ἡγουμένης as elsewhere so often), is an important clue, which has not been sufficiently attended to. Clement is in fact alluding to a passage of Isaiah, which he cites with some additions in § 31: 'so, he says, 'of old the mean rose up against the honourable,' the young against the elder (οἱ ἥλικες ἐπὶ τοῖς νεωτέροις), Is. 33. It would be possible to interpret 'the rulers' as the civil rulers to whom Clement several times applied the term ἡγουμένοις (§ 37); but on the whole it seems most natural to suppose that at first he is carefully avoiding definite references to the Corinthian revolt, and only preparing the way for its direct rebuke. Thus he speaks in the most general terms of 'the rulers,' and passes rapidly away from the word 'elders,' just introducing it as a hint beforehand, but dwelling on the root-meaning which was still strongly felt in the word, and contrasting it with ἐπίσκοπος in accordance with the OT passage which is in his mind.

No argument, therefore, can safely be based on the rhetorical use of the word 'elders' in the opening part of the letter. No doubt the Elders were elder men; and no doubt the revolt came from some of the younger men; this was a part of its heroism, and the covert allusion would be understood by those to whom the letter was addressed.

The development of the monarchical episcopate lies outside the limits of the NT, but even within the Canon we find indications of a tendency which the later history enables us to interpret as moving in this direction.

We have noticed that all passages which describe the functions and responsibilities of Elders speak of them as a class and in the plural number; whilst, on the other hand, where the duties of oversight (ἐπισκοπή) are portrayed, the ἐπίσκοπος is spoken of as a single person, charged with responsibility—and this in one place in sharp contrast to the διακονοι, and in the other immediately after Elders have been mentioned in the plural number. From this we may gather that, in as far as a member of the ruling class was thought of as ἐπίσκοπος, it was natural to consider him by himself as exercising an independent control and holding a position of eminent authority.

As far as terminology then, is concerned, the way was prepared for the distinction that presently came into being.

10. 'Episcopos' easily individualised. The word ἐπίσκοπος suggests an individual, just as the word πρεσβύτερος suggests the member of a ruling class, or the word διακονος the member of a serving class. The class of rulers, however, did not need two designations, and when the course of development led to a supreme officer it was easy and natural to appropriate to him the word ἐπίσκοπος, while his inferior colleagues were simply termed πρεσβύτεροι.

But this consideration does not really give us any guidance as to the causes of the change from government by a body of co-ordinate ἐπίσκοποι or πρεσβύτεροι to government by a single ἐπίσκοπος with a consultative college of πρεσβύτεροι, among whom he is πρῶτος or inter pares.

11. Change foreshadowed in NT. The apostolic age, however, presents us with several foreshadowings of the monarchical rule which presently became universal. In the church in Jerusalem the position of James, the Lord's brother, was one of real if undefined authority, and, though not marked by any special title, it closely resembles that of the Bishop of the second century. We have the statement of Hegesippus that on the death of James his cousin Symeon was appointed by general consent to fill his place (Eus. HR iii. 11). Here, then, was a monarchical type of government, naturally evolved and continuously recognised; and such an example could not fail, as time went on, to exercise an influence on other communities.

In the Greek world the churches of Paul's foundation were from the first controlled by the strong hand of their founder. It is true that he urged them to corporate action of their own in the exercise of jurisdiction and discipline; but he himself commanded them with an authority beyond challenge, and his commands were obeyed. In certain cases he transferred this his apostolic authority to delegates, such as Timothy and Titus; but only, it would seem, for a period, and in order to cope with special needs. Still, in doing this, he had given a practical proof of the advantage gained by the presence in a community of one who could rule with supreme authority; and this temporary sway would doubtless help in determining the tendency of subsequent development.

These examples, however, would have been powerless

Two passages may be cited which point in the 15. Eastern Church.

15. Eastern Church. In the direction for the eastern side of the terranean. 1. In the Didache (chap. 13) the prophets are spoken of as 'giving thanks' in reference to the eucharistic position of special importance in reference to the eucharist. They are not bound by the prescribed formulae of thanksgiving, but may 'give thanks as they will.' This implies that, if present, they naturally take a prominent part in the service. They may order an anaphora (ἀνάφωρη) to be given, 'for they are your chief-priests' (chap. 13). The same document declares, however, that the ministry of the prophets and teachers was likewise exercised by the bishops and deacons (chap. 15). It is safe to suppose that if no prophet were present, the conduct of the service would be in the hands of the permanent local ministry, although in this case there would be no exemption from the duty of using the prescribed formulae.

2. The Ignatian Epistles, as is well known, present the completed development of the three orders in certain Asiatic churches at a comparatively early period. It is noteworthy that the one bishop is expressly connected with the one eucharist (for references see ECHCHRIST). No eucharist is to be held without the bishop, or some person deputed by him to celebrate it. There is "one bishop, one altar, one eucharist" (ἐὺς ἐπίσκοπος, ἑὺς θυσιαστήριον, μία εὐχαριστία).

We may feel confident, then, that in the development of the eucharistic service we have an element, perhaps the most important element—of the development of monarchical episcopate.

As soon as this monarchical rule had been established in a church various sacred parallels which would be taken as confirmatory of the divine origin of the institution, would be observed.

stage. Bishop and his presbyters might be compared with Christ and his apostles. Or again, the orders of the Christian Church—bishop, presbyters and deacons—would find a ready analogy in the priest, priests, and Levites of the Jewish ritual. These parallels would serve to confirm the validity of the institution, and would facilitate its adoption in localities.

Meanwhile, the extraordinary ministry of apostles and prophets had passed or was rapidly passing away. Some of the functions which they had exercised were essential in the Church; and these devolved as a heritage upon the permanent ministry. The prestige which had been attached to their exercise passed over in the main to the chief officers of the community, who thus came to be regarded, with a large measure of truth, as successors of the apostles, wielding apostolic authority as the rulers of the Church and the defenders of its Christian faith.

ΘΟΥΙΑ [L], *daughter of Pharaoh, and wife of Menelaos, in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Ch 1:7). The assumption that *Pharaoh (פַּרְעֹה) is correctly read Bithiah (which might be explained *daughter = בַּת, worshipper of Yahweh = יָהוֹוִה [Osh. § 277 A]) might be a Hebraised form of an Egyptian name such as Bint Anu, *daughter of Anta (= Anuth), to indicate that the bearers of the name had entered the Israelish community.

This, however, does not accord with the view implied in the vowels of the name of Bithai's husband. Mered apparently means 'rebellion,' and suggests a war in which the wickedness of taking foreign wives is in question (cf. Ezra 9:1, and cp 2 Ch. 24:26). It would be in accordance with this that Mered's wife should bear the honourable name 'daughter of Yahwé': we should expect to find the old heathen name retained. Perhaps, then, Bithiah is not the right name; Θ 's $\gamma\epsilon\lambda\alpha$ suggests to Kittel $\gamma\epsilon\lambda$, and Θ 's $\gamma\alpha\lambda\theta\alpha$ may conceivably be based on $\gamma\epsilon\lambda$, which in turn may have sprung from $\gamma\epsilon\lambda$, producing a description of Mered's non-Jewish wife as 'a young Egyptian princess' (Mered's other wife 'the Jewess' [יְהוּדִיָּה] is not named). However, the corruption is antecedent to Θ , and the whole story (half-told, half-implied, by the text as it now stands) is imaginary. The idea of the double marriage of Mered had not occurred to the original compiler; the true text conveys no warning against mixed marriages. Four at least out of the five names, Mered, Bithiah, Pharaoh, Jehudijah, and Hodiah, are corrupt; perhaps indeed all five are. Mered, or, more strictly, M-R-D, has probably come from M-R-T-H, which is an incorrect form of R-M-T-H—i.e., Ramoth—or rather of Jarmuth (see M. R. D.). 'Bithiah' is not improbably a corruption of 'Beahah' (בְּעִיָּה, 1 Ch. 12:5 [G. B. 6]). Pharaoh should rather be פִּרְעֹה, a clan name (cp PIRAHOS), H-Jehudijah (RV's) and Hodiah are plainly the same name (in 7:19 read בְּעִיָּה, 'his wife'). Accepting this view, we have two accounts of the family of Mered. It is not quite certain, however, that the person mis-called Mered is represented as having two wives. Hodiah may have been deliberately substituted for Beahah from a dislike to the first element in that name.

We are now rid of the only case in the OT of a name compounded with lah (לָה) — of such names there are 157 — being borne by a foreigner (cp Gray, Heb. V 158). Next, another mistake has to be noted. It is plain that 1 Ch. 17 as it stands is not right. The remedy is (with Birch and Kitt.) to transpose 7:15b to the middle of 7:17, inserting of course בְּעִיָּה after פִּרְעֹה. This gives us, as the children of Bithiah or Beahah, Manai (2), Shammai, and Ishbah the father of Eshlema. Eshlema also occurs (together with Keilah) in the list of the children of Hodiah (7:10), while Gedor, Soco, and Zanoah are connected with Mered through Hodiah's double, H-Jehudijah — an important notice (see M. R. D.). It is perhaps sad to have lost what was supposed to be an early testimony to the presence of an Egyptian element at and about Eshlema, as contrasted with the more purely Jewish character of Gedor, Soco, and Zanoah; but we gain an attestation of the traditional importance of Jarmuth. It may be added that in Jewish legend Bithiah becomes the foster-mother of Moses (Ugriktu, R., par. 1).

אֵלֶּם בֵּית־חֹרֹן, BETH-HORON) 'the groove' or 'cleft' for excellence situated between the Jordan and Mahanaim (2 S. 22:9), and possibly to be identified with the H. 'Ajlun, along which, though at a later time, ran a Roman road from 'Ajlun to Mahanaim (Buhl, Pal. 121); see EPHRAIM, WOOD OF. For the sense of Bithron cp Θ 's rendering of בֵּית in Cant. 2:17 ($\delta\eta\eta$) $\kappa\alpha\lambda\omega\mu\acute{\alpha}\tau\omega\sigma$ (like $\kappa\alpha\lambda\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$ in Θ for $\pi\epsilon\tau\epsilon$). The reading Bithron is not certain, and the Vss. give little help, although Vg. (cp also Aq.'s $\gamma\epsilon\lambda\theta\alpha\pi\omega\sigma$) suggests that there was another Beth-horon E. of Jordan (see HOROSAIM). Theodorus's conjecture, BETH-HARAM, is improbable.

Asia Minor, extending from the mouth of the Rhyndacus (Edrenos Çay) eastwards to that of the Sangarius.

The boundary between Bithynia and the province of Asia coincided, not, as might have been expected, with the line of the Rhyndacus, but with that of the range of the Mysian Olympus (Gyeshish Dagh) lying N. of the river (Pliny, HN 5:142). The eastern frontier is often made to coincide with the Bikanis or with the Partheidos, i.e. to extend beyond the latter river. In spite of Strabo's statement that the montes of the Sangarius marked the boundary (C. 1, 791 Bithynia $\delta\eta\eta\sigma\alpha$ $\pi\alpha\pi\epsilon$ $\nu\alpha\sigma$ $\kappa\alpha\lambda\omega\sigma\alpha\sigma$). Indeed, it cut out for E. of the river; but the line is indeterminate. According to Pliny (HN 5:142) the Helles or Sibiros separated Bithynia from the province Galatia; but the boundary fell some 12 m. E. of that stream (Rous, Hist. Geogr. of A. 1: 195), whence it ran W. between the Sangarius and its tributary the Lemnos.

The will of Nicomedes III., the last of its kings, left Bithynia to the Romans in 74 B.C., but it was not until

2. History. 64 B.C., when the sultan of Pontus had been finally expelled from Asia, that Pompeius could undertake the organisation of the province (cp Plin. Ep. ad Trai. 79). With it was now combined the whole of the kingdom of Pontus, with the exception of those districts towards the E., as well as those in the interior (Paphlagonia), which were assigned to native dynasts in recognition of their services to Rome (Str. 541). See Niese in Thom. 130, and Rhein Mus. 38: 57 [83]. Amisos, which lay immediately E. of the Helles (Kizil Irmak), was the most easterly community of that part of Pontus which was combined with the old kingdom of Nicomedes to form the Roman province.

This dual origin of the province was recognised in its official title, Pontus et Bithynia (so generally in inscriptions, both Lat. and Gr.; cp Agrippa, Mon. 121, 1 IL 13: 1348, CH 13: 2302). The reverse order is perhaps upon the whole later, encouraged by the gradual growth in importance of the western section. Either name, apparently, might be used to denote the entire province (cp Tac. Ann. 12:1 with Dio Cass. 49:13 CH 2302, Bull. Hell. 11:21). In administration also the two parts retained a certain degree of formal independence, each having its own metropolis and Diet (concilium).

In the distribution of provinces by Augustus in 27 B.C. Pontus-Bithynia remained senatorial, i.e., its

3. Post-Apostolic. governors, who were of Praetorian rank, bore the title 'proconsul' (Str. 849, Tac. Ann. 17:161).

The official residence was Nicomedia. Under the metictive supervision of the Senate the province gradually became disorganised; its finances fell into disorder, and unregulated collegia gave birth to turbulence and faction. In order to carry out the necessary reforms, the younger Pliny was sent into the province in 112 A.D. His importance arises from his official contact with Christianity (Ep. ad Trai. 96 and 97. See Hardy, Pliny's Correspondence, 51 f., Rams. Church, 196 f., and cp CHRISTIAN, § 6 f.).

In the early period of post-apostolic history Bithynia is illustrious; but it has little connection with the apostles themselves. The salutation of 1 Pet. 1:1, where Pontus and Bithynia are mentioned separately, bears witness to the rapid evangelisation of the province. Before 112 A.D. Christianity had made such progress in Bithynia that pagan ritual was interrupted and the temples in great part deserted (Pliny, Ep. ad Trai. 96). We get a hint that there, as in Ephesus, trade interests were at the bottom of the attack then made upon the Christians. The contagio istius superstitionis (superstitio prava immoliva), as Pliny calls the faith, would most easily enter the province by way of Amisos, along the route leading from the Cilician Gates by T'iana and Caesarea Mazaea in Cappadocia. Ramsay (Church, 225) conjectures from Pliny's letter that its introduction must fall about 65-75 A.D.

Amisos is now Samsun. Even in Strabo's time it was gradually displacing Sinope (Sinub) as the great harbour on the north coast. The route from Caesarea Mazaea northwards via Aqua Saravene, Edizina, and Amaseia, to Amisos, is even today 'the only road practicable for arables, and must always have been a great trade-route' (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of A.M., 273).

The interpretation of the word Bithynia in Acts 16:7 is connected with the question concerning the Galatian

4. Acts 16:7. churches (see GALATIA). On the N. Galatian theory, the object of Paul's vain attempt to enter Bithynia must have been to reach either Amisos or Amastris; for a design of preaching in the barbarous interior is improbable. The direct route to Amastris went, it is true, by way of Ancyra in Galatia;

but on the other hand no such route could have brought the apostle 'over against Mysia' (so RV; κατα την Μυσίαν). Further, both in Roman and in ordinary usage Amastrius, and still more Amisus, was a city of Pontus, not of Bithynia; and only the word Pontus could have been allowable as a single term to express the dual province to which it belonged (as is clear from Str. 541 compared with 543, in speaking of Heraclea). The expression 'to go into Bithynia' can only be taken to imply W. Bithynia i.e. the district round Nicæa and Nicomedia, where the wealth and administrative machinery of the province were centred. Dorylaeum (Δόρυλαιον), only a few miles S. of the Bithynian frontier, was the point to which all the roads from the south converged; Paul and his companions must have been somewhere in this neighbourhood when they were suddenly diverted westwards (Acts 167). BITTER HERBS, BITTERNESS (כִּרְסִים)

כִּרְסִים. Intest. agrestis, Ex 128 Nu. 91; πικρία, amaritudines, Lam. 315; in Mishna also in sing.) are twice mentioned along with כִּלְכִּיל as the accompaniment of the paschal feast. Probably such herbs—whether separately or mixed—as lettuce (Lactuca Scariola, var. sativa), chicory (Cichorium Intybus), and endive (Cichorium Endivia) are meant. Doubtless they originally came into use simply as a relish or salad,¹ though the prescription of them in the Law may have to do with the atoning significance of the Passover; their association with the sufferings of the people in Egypt is probably a later view (Nowack, II. 1 217). See, further, PASSOVER.

'Bitter herbs,' rather than 'bitterness' (G, EV), seems to be the proper rendering in Lam. 315, where כִּרְסִים answers to עֵשֶׂה 'wormwood,' in the parallel clause.

BITTERN. RV Porcupine (תִּבְּרָה, εχίνο, erichon; Is. 1123 311 Zeph. 2141). The identity of this animal (Heb. ḥap̄s) is far from certain; opinions of great variety have been held.

The ancient versions unanimously render 'Hedgehog' (or 'Porcupine'), the two were scarcely distinguished, and this is generally supported by Jewish tradition, though Rashi thinks that in Is. 3411 Zeph. 214 a bird is meant, and D. Kimhi interprets 'Tortoise' in all three passages (see their commentaries in loc.). Of modern Bibles Weyl's has in all three places 'Urchin,' and so Luther (followed as usual by the Dutch, 'Ezel,' Junius and Tremellius in their Latin OT-renderer terrena 'duck-ragle'); Coverdale, followed by the Great Bible, has 'Otter' in Is. 1423 and 'Stork' in Is. 3411 Zeph. 214, while the Geneva Bible has in Is. 1423 'Hedgehog' (1423 mg., or 'tortoise'), and in Zephaniah 'Owl' (mg., or 'hedgehog'). The French Protestant version seems alone to have anticipated AV in the rendering 'loutre' (mg., or 'bécote'). The Roman Catholic Bibles follow the Vulgate.²

It is derived from a verb which in Assyrian means 'to plot,' transitively (Sargon, KTB 2 667), and in Arabic (1) 'to inflict a blow on the neck of another'; (2) 'to have a thick or loose neck.' The original sense is perhaps better seen in Syriac, where the same verb means 'to gather into a heap or ball (trans. or intrans.); the sense of drawing together also underlies the Assyrian use (cp. 'intrigue,' intarsare). The verb occurs but once in OT Hebrew (in Piel form), Is. 3812—'I have rolled up (or possibly 'shortened,' see Dillmann ad loc.) like a weaver my life,' a simile referring to the treatment of the finished

² Vegetable food with meat is a dietetic necessity, and would naturally be eaten raw until it was discovered that certain kinds were best cooked. It is a matter for curious inquiry why so many salad herbs were bitter, at any rate in their feral form. Dandelion is a striking example.

⁴ Which he wrongly supposes to be the meaning of Ar. kenfeth.

web; the use of the noun ḥap̄s in Ezek. 725 accords with this derivation.

Kenfeth is equivalent in form to Aram. Ar. kenfeth,² and that these are the words for 'hog' in their respective languages is made clear (622) by Tamm's account (History of the Language, edition, ii. 216) and for Aram. by the Syr. ḥap̄s (Land's Ancient Syriac, 411).³ The instance of ḥap̄s in late Heb. and Aram. prove the post-biblical Jewish usage (see Lowysohn, Zool. Palæont., 1900).

Whilst the philological evidence is thus entirely in favour of the rendering 'hedgehog' or 'porcupine,' must be admitted that 'zoolo-

there are considerable difficulties. The animal is always spoken of in connection with water, and once in relation to pools of water, whilst both these conditions would be natural habitat of the Bittern, they have no particular connection with either the Hedgehog or the Porcupine. In Is. 3411, the ḥap̄s is mentioned among birds, and in Zeph. 214 it is prophesied that the Pelican (ḥap̄s) shall lodge together in the capitals of Nineveh, while 'a voice' (if the text may be trusted) shall sing in the windows. The answers must be made to these objections—that the Porcupine or Hedgehog was regarded as an unfriendly, desert animal on account of its formidable equipments; we can find parallels to the mention of a least a birds in such enumerations as Lucian's 'Luge over horses, and eagles, and bears, and lions'; and the capitals on which the animal is to sit may be the fallen columns—are ingenious, but perhaps unsatisfying. It has been suggested that the translation 'loutre' may be reconciled with the etymology considering the fact that this bird has the power of drawing in its long neck so that its head almost upon its breast.⁴ Still, it is not easy to set aside argument derived from the meaning of the word in cognate languages.

The Bittern, Botaurus stellaris, is found in the reedy places throughout Europe, Asia (including India), and Africa. Canon Tristram records its occurrence in the marshes of Huleh. It is a nocturnal of considerable size, and is remarkable for its booming note. Formerly a common bird in suitable localities in Britain, it is now but a winter visitor, is grouped with the Herons in the family Ardeidae (cp. also CORMORANT and PELICAN.)

² So ḥap̄s kenfeth. It seems more probable that the Arabic word is a loan-word from Aramaic, than that ḥap̄s is borrowed. Fränkel, however (Aram. Fremdw. xiv), holds the latter is the case.

³ Cp. for Syriac, the other references cited by P. Smith. Kappitha appears to be used for the 'owl' in Kil. ix. 10 (197).

* 'Euphemism (of the verb) to 'blame': Rumanian blasamari, cf. blasamarii, and see Murray, et al., however occurs in the EV as a neutralising of the following words: 722 Rk, 210114 WK, 1949 e, 1 RVog, 1 Rumanian, 1 p, 124 Rk, 131; 722 e, 2 K, 1622 EV, 1, 375, 21 EV, 1, 262, 202 EV, N, 6, 1530 RV (EV 'republic'), Ps. 117:17 EV; (22) 778: 275 EV, 1 RV, (3) 275 e, 16 EV, and the Gk. blasphémia (Mss. 10, 4) (not V 1214 14, 275 e, Mk. 3, 2) (followed by to blaspheme thou), Rev. 10, 1 Pet. 4, 7.

In 1 Macc. 7.33 'blasphemies' is the rendering of δυσφημαίαι; in 2.41 'to blaspheme' represents the related verb δυσφημεῖν; the object of the blasphemies is the temple. It is important to determine the sense of βλασφημῶν accurately, because the sense of 'to blaspheme' in 1V follows this exactly. In a word, the conception of 'blasphemy' in current English is narrower than the conception that we find in this supposed pattern of English speech, which includes all moors of reviling or humiliating God or man (see ES on 2 K. 19c [Heb. 122c] 134 [Heb. 122c] and 1s. 52.5 [Heb. 122c uncertain con], and ep. 3. NT. of blasphemy—claiming to be the Christ, the Son of God—that Jesus was found worthy of death (Mk. 14:61-64 Mt. 26:63; cp. Jn. 10:33), and for blasphemous words against 'the holy place and the Law' Stephen was condemned to be stoned (Acts-6:13, 7:50 ff.). See SILENT. By blasphemy against the Holy Spirit in Mk. 3:29, Mt. 12:32, was meant originally a definite offence of the scribes and Pharisees, who had ascribed Jesus' cures of demons to a power derived from the prince of the demons. This was blasphemy against the divine power which had come upon Jesus at his baptism (Mk. 1:10 Mt. 3:16 Lk. 3:22). In Mt. 12:32, however, a later interpretation is given, which implies that the disciples of Jesus had thoroughly absorbed the idea of the indwelling Spirit. The Holy Spirit is put in antithesis to the 'Son of Man.' One who fails to pierce below the humble exterior of Jesus may be forgiven. One who not merely rejects, but openly disparages, that great gift which 'the Heavenly Father will give to those who ask him' (Lk. 11:13) cannot be forgiven; the inward impediment in the man himself is too strong. The idea of the original distinction was suggested by that in the Law (Num. 15:27-30). A parallel to it will be found in the Mishna (Sanhedr. 10:1)—'He who says that the Law is not from Heaven has no part in the world to come' (825f. Engl.). The later interpretation, however, has no parallel, and is a

1 The entering of קָרַע is very doubtful; but it is quite possible that in passages like Job 15:1, Kt. 21:12 a later editor substituted קָרַע for קָרַע or קָרַע . In Ps. 103 we may even have side by side the correction קָרַע and the original reading קָרַע .

'slime') in Gen. II: 14 to Ex. 23: 7; but also (2) of רָפֶס, which, like its Aram. cognate, is an Ass. loan-word (EV Pict II) in Gen. 6: 14, where its occurrence furnishes one of the proofs of the Babylonian origin of the Deluge-Story (see Dittol., § 13). In the Heb. Deluge-Story six 'trees' of קִפְרִי (רָפֶס, 'bitumen') and three of לִדְדָּא (naphtha; Jenson) are poured upon the outer and inner sides of the ship, respectively. לִדְדָּא, 'naphtha', is a word used in the legendary account of the infancy of Aaron I. (3 R. 458a; קִפְרִי 55b): '—she placed me in a basket of reeds, with לִדְדָּא my door she shut' — in the similar story of Moses the words רָפֶס, 'bitumen,' and רָפֶס, Pict II (23), are combined (18: 2); דִּקְאֵנוֹס מִסְסָא [13^b], but דִּקְאֵנוֹסִיסָא [18^a M.]. The origin of bitumen, or asphalt, and naphtha need not delay us long. Together with petroleum and mineral tar, they form a series of substances which are the result of certain changes in organised matter. These substances merge into each other by insensible degrees, and it is impossible to say at what point mineral tar ends and asphalt begins.

Naphtha, which is the first of the series, is in some places found flowing out of the earth as a clear, limpid, and colourless liquid. As such it is a mixture of hydrocarbons, some of which are very volatile and evaporate on exposure; it takes up oxygen from the air, becomes brown and thick, and in this state it is called petroleum. A continuation of the same process of evaporation and oxidation gradually transforms the material into mineral tar, and still later into solid glassy asphalt.

Asphaltic deposits are widely diffused throughout the world, more especially in tropical and sub-tropical regions—for example in the basin of the Dead Sea (173, § 6). The asphalt of the Dead Sea (which was very well known to the ancients) is not at present of commercial importance; but the sources of the supply of ancient Babylon, the bitumen springs of flin (the Is. of Hemed. 179), are still used. At this very old city on the Euphrates the shipwrights adhere to the ancient fashion of boat-building. Tar-mastik and mullerry branches form the substratum, which is covered with mats and thickly besmeared with bitumen (cp Ex. 23).² Bitumen was much used in architecture (see Gen. 113). Unburned bitumen protected by a plaster of bitumen proved the most indestructible of materials (see ASSYRIA, § 6. BABYLONIA, § 15, and cp Peters, Nippur, 216). Bitumen was used in ancient times as a fuel (Verg. Ecl. 833), for medicinal purposes (Jos. Ant. iv, 84) and for embalming (see EMBALMING).

The root in Arabic means blackness; and the Heb. word thus describes a blackening (almost burning) process which is regarded as due to a severe wind—a sense which is expressed by the various renderings of BLAST. The word is in each passage coupled with BLAST 'mildew.' Nevertheless, it is doubtful whether wind is in itself sufficient to account for such a blackening. In the British Islands wheat when young assumes a yellow colour from cold, a well-known physiological effect. Under a burning drying wind, it might turn brown, but scarcely black. Further, it must be noted that in Gen. 11:6 the corn was in ear; it had made its growth, but the ears were thin, i.e., diseased. It seems probable, then, that the effect conceived in the dream was that produced by 'corn-smut,' Ustilago tritici and that this is the real meaning of בִּלְשָׁן. 'Mildew' is the other common disease of corn, Puccinia graminis.

Gen. 27:20 Dt. 11:20 Josh. 8:14 etc.).

B represents בָּרַךְ by εὐλογεῖν, barak by εὐλογεῖν (also NT words). In Hebrew for 'cursing' we find also (a) קָלַל (prop. to belittle) frequently, (b) אָרַר, verbal and noun, cp. שָׁפַת 'oath of cursing' Nu. 5:21 (RVog 'adjuration'), rendered 'execration,' Jer. 42:18 44:22, and RV only Jer. 29:13; its derivative קָלַל occurs in Lam. 3:63. (c) רָמַס see BAN. (d) רָמַס only in the Balaam stories (Nu. 22:11 23:24 24:10) and possibly to be connected with רָמַס (prop. 'to pierce' rendered in Lev. 24:16 'blaspheme'). From the Jewish tradition which explained it to mean 'pronounce, speak aloud' arose the deep-rooted belief that the divine name was not to be uttered under any circumstance (see NAMES, § 10 n.). In HALAKA, § 8. (e) שָׁפַת, Is. 65:15, EV 'curse,' properly 'oath' as in RVog; see OATH and cp. COVENANT, § 5.

The NT words are (a) ἀναθεματίζω Mk. 14:71 (in B for κατακαίω); κατακαίω [αἰσ], Mt. 26:74 Rev. 22:3; see BVS. (b) κατακαίω [αἰσ] Rom. 12:14 [αἰσ], 3:1 (in B for κατακαίω Gal. 3:10 13 and κατακαίω (RVog 'anything cursed') Rev. 22:3, cp. also ἐκατακαίω 'under a curse,' Gal. 3:10, (c) κατακαίω Mt. 15:4 Mk. 7:10, RV 'speak evil of' (in B for κατακαίω); see OATH.

In the primitive sense of the word, a blessing or a curse was a spell, pronounced by 'holy' persons, and containing a divine name, or divine names, which drew down the divine favour or disfavour (i.e., prosperity or adversity), as the case might require, on certain other persons. It was a consequence of the hardness of life that curses were more frequently in demand than blessings. Thus (a) the breaking out of hostilities between states naturally led to the solemn utterance of formulae of cursing against the enemy. These invocations would be uttered at the opening of a campaign, and especially when the warriors were on the point of advancing against the foe. Goliath, we are told, 'cursed David by his gods' (1 S. 17:41). The battle-shout certainly had a religious character; and, if it did not always devote the enemy to destruction, at any rate it invoked a blessing on the national side. Cp. 2 S. 68:1-3 and the story of BALAAM [p. 7]. (b) The laws too had sometimes an increased sanction through the formulae attached. Thus A/IV, mentions a respecting the maintenance of boundaries, w. enforced by a curse on any one who should violate. To this category of curses belong those in Dt. 28.

It is true that a series of blessings is attached to series of cursings. Moses, from his close connection with the Deity, had a special power of blessing and cursing. After him the priests had a similar power, which exerted in the interests of the faithful community. URM AND THE MOUNT, § 6. The uplifted hands of the priest drew down (as it were) a blessing on Israel. Lev. 9:22 Nu. 6:23-27 and a curse on Israel's enemies. So potent, indeed, were the blessings and the curses of the founder of Israel that they could be applied to the two sacred mountains which enclosed the original centre of the people—the valley of Shechem ready to descend, as the case might be, with retributive punishments (Dt. 11:20).

Within the family it was the father who (according to primitive ideas not unconnected with the worship of ancestors) had the mystic privilege of determining weal or woe of his children (Gen. 9:25 ff.), and especially when his days were manifestly numbered (Gen. 49:1-27, 49:28, 49:33, 49:34, 49:35, 49:36). Nor does it appear that the early Israelites limited this power by moral considerations (see Gen. 27:35). Obviously, however, a limitation was a necessary consequence of a monotheism. The post-exilic writers declare that the offspring of the righteous can be blessed (Ps. 135:3) and that the observance of God's laws ensures his favour without the aid of priests or enchanters. Fear, then, said the later sages to their pupils, if thine enemies curse thee: 'the curse causeless shall not come' (1 S. 26:2).

Still, even in post-exilic time we sometimes find strange half-consciousness that curses had an immense power. It was worth while to curse a bad man to ensure his full punishment—such is the idea of 109—a strange survival of primitive superstition.

In the discourses of Jesus we find blessings and curses. They are, however, simply authoritative declarations of the eternal connection between right-doing and happiness, wrong-doing and misery (e.g., in the case of Judas).

Parallels to the Israelitish view of blessings and cursings outside of the Semitic peoples hardly need to be quoted. The objective existence of both, but especially of curses, was strongly felt by the Assyrians and Babylonians, as the magical texts show. The Arabic beliefs on the subject are also very suggestive. Goldziher has pointed out. See MAGY, § 2 n. 1, on the 'curse-bringing water' (Nu. 5:18 ff.) see J. H. M. O'S. WATER OF.

'Blue' is employed in L.V. of Esai. 1:6 to distinguish certain kinds of stones. Thus for blue we have AV 'blue marble' [L.V. blue].

1 The blessing and the curse referred to were those attached to the fulfilment and the non-fulfilment of the commands of the Law. They were 'laid before' Israel by Moses, and were to be 'laid' by them on their arrival in the promised land, probably by solemn proclamation, on Mount Gerizim and on Mount Ebal respectively. In Dt. 27:12 ff. we have a later writer's interpretation of this command. See Kue, ThT, 1878, pp. 297 ff.

There is an early testimony to the form Bekoth in Mic. I. 1, if 1232^W 1231^V (weep not at all) may be emended into 1220 1232 (weep) [1231] phay-mi, in Bek-ur [Bekothum] weep (I thirst, We, Now, I, then, continuing the intensive phay-mi, not, I, up the Le'el, July 1904). So the active call Bekoth near Micah's native town is known to us. This causes no difficulty. There may have been many places where Bek trees grew. It is a distinctive characteristic of the Arvo weep not (Reind, Hitt., etc.), is geographically inadmissible. We cannot well suppose a Philistine city of this name (cf. Smith), nor does Micah come in himself with Philistines (p. 101).

Butch is a name commonly, and with the definite article placed, given to plague in the Elizabethan and the Stuart periods. In the Edinburgh treatise on plague by Th. Gilbert (Plague, 1625) it occurs in the form of 'butche'. In the Lexicon of Generic Cures and lexica and brunnaria occurs a specific probable etymology is fr. poche, meaning pocket, poche (as in poche, a bubble), and applied in the plural, poches, about 1500, and epidemics of the plural, poches, like the Spanish las bubas, to epidemics of bubonic plague, the translators of the AV seem to have meant by 'bub' the fraudulent bubo plague of their time. Milton also says, of the sixth plague (1629-30) 'bubonic' and blains must all plague from Britain attend' (17, 1245). With the disappearance of plague from Britain attend, the word lost its technical meaning.

appears to be based on a folk-tale; the designation which it gives to Job's malady is, therefore, general, not technical. We must remember, however, that in Lev. 13:45 the qay is the forerunner of leprosy, and that in the speeches of Job the symptoms of his malady, the high, reddish swellings, 41 The text is disfigured by two errors due to ditto-graphy. One is the word 'not' before 'upon them,' repeated from v. 17; the other is 'the nations that' repeated from v. 17. B has simply sai em routou.

thinking of the 'batch of type'. The reference in Am. 11, 1, however, may possibly be to some attack in the last-19 of the northern kings etc. The 'p' in the number of type may well be equivalent to the power of 10, 2^8 , which should mean some specific size to the 'marks' (i.e. 'monies', or 'plagued' or 'p' etc.) which it is compiled, certainly means. As the sixth is specially called one of 'bols and foms', it may stand for some definite length of use of type.

We must now consider which of the four types of gaya is meant by gaya. It is stated that might be entirely excluded. On the other hand, anthrax might be entirely described as the kind of epidemic excluded, inasmuch as in man it is epidemic, but only sporadic. It was thought that the narrative, or (as the editors say) the informative, of the plagues to be based on a narrative, or simpler narratives, which would be treated as matter-of-fact description, we might find in the original narrative the sixth plague sent the plague proper (dubio plague), which killed to man, whilst the fifth stood for epizootic in general.¹

Certainly the special association of hulub phrase and 1 Egypt is historically correct, so that the 'h-h' in the AV is a happy chance (p. 8). Besides the constructive evidence as to the d which is said to have been in Semitic before Ptolemaic (see PESTER-SMITH, and, on the last point, HIEZKIAL, 4), there is, indeed, no external testimony to hulub phrase in 1 Egypt other than 3000 BC, and even this testimony has been only indirectly preserved.

Orbasius, who was physician to the Emperor Julian, passage from Rufus of Ephesus, a physician in the Taurus, where he describes a plague occurring in the district of the Taurus, as Poreus, a physician with singular authority, a distinctive mark of the plague, to find in it. He says that the disease is most common in Egypt, in Libya, Egypt, and Syria. He adds that Proserpine, Poseidonios had enlarged upon pestilential buboes in upon the pestilence which at that time ravaged Italy, which is mentioned by Livy, Julius Obsequens, and Rufus further says that the pupils of one Theonius, the maker mention of these pestilential buboes. An account of the Vatican codex of Greek manuscripts explains that the above surname (Humbilis) comes from the geography of Hieronimus. This would fit his date in 280 A.D.

Whilst the batch of Egypt cannot, upon independent testimony, be traced farther back than 300 B.C., it is highly probable that it was last seen there.

Farmer points out, the endemic influences favour plague in Egypt, depending upon the peculiar alterations of wet and dry soil (caused by the periodic and fall of the Nile), were there long before.

Paris) (Cases de la Peste, etc., Paris, 1872) has, with great cogency, that the elaborate system in the use of ancient Egypt to preserve the soil from putrefactive matters, human and other, were inspired by the plague, and must have been in a high degree effective. It is clear, however, that any failure of the sanitary code would, in a climate of hydrology being constant, and that such failure, from the time that the ancient civilisation, with sanitation enforced by religious sanctions, was a principal part of it, be an inquiry as permanent.

without the negative particle, but it has the second insert. A critical edition should give the text thus: 'And if I Egyptian people go not up nor come, upon them will the stream with which Yehwe will strike.' . . . The close of the sentence may only have become eternal. The plague it is, was, at any rate, not that of the other nations, which was of man.]

The qualification ('in general') is designed. What is of the 'mimra' upon the horses, camels, asses, even a sheep is expressed in a sense too comprehensive for any specific zoonotic malady (e.g., anthrax is a disease that even sheep suffer from in common, but not horses, not so far as is known of asses and camels).

BOILS, PLAGUE

That the sanitary precautions did utterly break down under Mohammedan conquest, and that habea plague did become for fourteen centuries the standing pestilence of Egypt, we know as matter of fact. We know also that it was from Pelusium that the great plague of Justinian's reign (542-50) started, to overrun the whole known world. It is probable, further, that the pestilence in Lower Egypt at the time of the massacre of Christians in the episcopate of Cyprian included habea plague. The valuable testimony preserved by Oribasius as to Egyptian typhus, and Syrian pestilential habea, as early as 400 B.C., has been already cited. If beyond that date we are left to conjecture, there is still a high probability that the plague was known in Egypt at a much earlier date.

This historical bulbo plague of Egypt answers best to the sixth plague. The bull breaks out in the amplified, gums, and the sides of the neck, and it consists of one (or of a packet) of the natural lymphatic or absorbent glands of those regions enlarged to the size of a hen's (or even a turkey) egg, often of a livid colour, hard, tense, painful, or attended with inflammatory swelling of the skin for some distance around it. Just as in Asiatic cholera and yellow fever there are 'explosive' attacks so suddenly fatal that the distinctive symptoms have hardly time to develop, so there may be death from plague without the 'subor' or the 'bub'. Still the latter is the distinctive mark of plague, the same in all countries and in all periods of history.

Other signs of plague were found or not found in the spots of the skin called "the ticks" or "highly prominent, large carbuncles (especially in the fleshy parts), and blains" (752228), which were really smaller carbuncle-like formations of a core with a collection of fluid on their summits. Besides the pain of the ticks and the blains, there were often a delirium, gentle or violent vomiting, spitting up of mucus like thick gel, and speech, and many other symptoms it is hard to describe. About three days was perhaps the average duration of fatal cases.

4. Mortality. Presumably half the attacks were mortal. In the beginning of the epidemic there would be but few recoveries, while at the end of it as many as four out of five might recover. Because the likely when the bullocks barked and ran, sometimes the suppuration, especially in the groin, would continue for months, the victims being able to go lambling in the streets. In the history of plague in London, which is continuous from the Black Death of 1348 to 1666, the great epidemics came at intervals, and, in those for which we have the statistics, carried off from a fifth to a sixth of the population, including but few of the richer class. With a population of nearly half a million in 1665, the highest mortality from plague was 7105 in the week 12th-19th September. Sometimes for a succession of years the deaths from plague kept at a high annual level, especially during the summer and autumn months. During the whole three centuries of plague in London there were few years which did not have some deaths in the warmer months. From what is known of the mediæval history of plague in Cairo (from Arabic annals; cp von Kremer in SIU III, Phil. Hist. Class. Bd. xvi.), and of its modern history (cp Pruner, Krank. des Orients), it appears to have come, as in London, in terrific outbursts at intervals of years, and to have been at a low level or apparently extinct in the years between.

The plague season in Egypt, within the period of exact records, has begun as early as September and as late as January, has reached its height in March and April, and has ended with great regularity, almost suddenly, about St. John's day (24th June), the height of the epidemic corresponding with the lowest level of the Nile. There has been no plague since 1844. The last great epidemic was that of 1835, described by Kinglake in 'Eothen.'

Galaaditis, however, was the name of the country N. of Moab (GASM II: 549, n. 5), and the campaign in which Judas took Bosor was waged in the latitude of the Yarmūk. If Bosora (p. 27) be the present Basra, Bosor may be the present Basra-el-Hariri, in the SE. corner of the Laja, which the Arabian geographer Yāqūt in 1225 A.D. BOTCH (בֹּתַח). Dt 28:27 is AV; RV Bott. (g. v., § 2 f.).

BOTTLE. The statement that 'what we call bottles were unknown to the Hebrews' (Richm, *1747*²⁰, art. 'Flasche') needs qualification. It has long been known that the Egyptians manufactured glass from an early period. The Phoenicians and the Assyrians were well acquainted with glass (see the relative volumes of Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. de l'Art, etc.), that manufactured by the former being of special repute in antiquity (see GLASS). It is impossible, therefore, that among the imports from Phoenicia, glass bottles should have had no place. They must always, however, have been a luxury of the rich (cp Job 28:17 [RV]).

The 'bottles' of Scripture fall into two very different classes: (1) leather skins for holding and carrying water, wine, and other liquids, and (2) earthenware jars for the same and other purposes.

For the Hebrews in the nomadic stage of civilisation, as for the Bedouin of the present day, the skins of beasts of their flocks supplied the readiest and most efficient means of storing and transporting the necessary supply of water

1. Skins as bottles. in the camp and on the march. This method was found so simple and so satisfactory that it was retained in a more settled state of society, and, indeed, has prevailed throughout the East until the present day. The writers of classical antiquity, from Homer downwards, contain many references to this use of the skins of domestic animals. The skins used by the Hebrews for this purpose, as in modern Syria and Arabia, were chiefly skins of the goat and of the sheep. When a smaller size than ordinary was required, the skin of a lamb or of a kid sufficed; for larger quantities there was the skin of the ox,¹ and, perhaps, of the camel (Herod. 39). Among the Hebrews the pig-skin was, of course, excluded.

The method of preparation varied in complexity and efficiency according as the peasant prepared his own skins (cp Doughty, Ar. Dec. 1227) or employed a professional tanner. The head and the lower part of the legs are cut off (such is the method at the present day), and the animal is skinned from the neck downwards, somewhat as one removes a tight-fitting glove, care being taken that no incision is made in the skin of the carcase. When the tanning process is completed (cp Tristram, Arabia 92, Rolinson, RR 312 44-6), all other apertures, having previously been closed, the neck is fitted with a leather thong, by means of which the skin is opened and closed (cp L. A. V. n. 1).

Such are (1) בֹּתַח, hometh Gk. (AVD), the water-skin (probably of a kid) which Abraham put upon Hagar's shoulder (Gen. 21:19 D). The Bedouin name is gubbi, i.e., kubbar (Doughty, op. cit. inf.). In Hos 7:5 (RV 'heat'), and in Hab. 2:15 (RV 'venom', mg. 'lute'), the RV more advisedly binds another word of similar sound (בֹּתַח). (2) בֹּתַח, boith, like the remity (remitylary) of the modern Bedouin, is the milk-skin of the nomad lael (Judg. 1:9; cp Doughty op. cit. passim). It also occurs frequently as a wine-skin—Josh. 9:11 18, 10:2. As a water-skin it is used metaphorically in Ps. 105:14 (cp 'tear-bottles', so called, and where the text is doubtful (see Q). The exact sense of Ps. 119:83, where the poet himself to a 'bottle' (RVmg. 'wine-skin') in the small doubtful (see the comm. in loc.) (1) בֹּתַח, boith, and (2) בֹּתַח, boith, are frequently of the ordinary wine-skin (gubbi [BM] 10, 11, 12, 67) 278, 280, has the same signification in Job, where we read of 'new bottles', i.e., 'ready to burst'. (3) בֹּתַח, boith, renders 'skins with new (wine)', which gives us a parallel to the familiar passage in the NT (Mt 9:17—'Mk. 6:47 L'). 'Neither do men put new wine in old skins, etc., where the RV has rightly discarded the misleading rendering 'bottles.' In Judith 10:5 we have the word ἀσκονιστῆς [BA], RV 'a leathern bottle' of wine.

Vessels of earthenware also are mentioned in the as receptacles for wine. Such was (1) the בֹּתַח, boith.

2. Earthenware bottles. בֹּתַח, boith, made by potter, perhaps with a narrow neck, which caused a gurgling sound (kakbakath) when the jar was being emptied. It also used to hold honey, 1 K. 11:4 (ἀραιαὶ [M], 1 B); EV Crt st. g. v., 2). (2) The name בֹּתַח was also given to wine-jars or ampullae of earthenware, as clear from Is. 30:14 (EV 'potters' vessels', AVmg. 'potters'), and Lam 1:2 (EV 'pitcher'). In these passages Q has ἀγγύων. We have no indication of the size or even of the shape of the earthen boith (see POTTERY; also CRT ST).

1. בֹּשֶׁת, gubbi (2 K. 9:13; RV and in 1 S. 10:6, AV 'vial'; Q φάκος). Shape and material are both uncertain.
2. For the 'alabaster box' (ἡ ἀλαβαστῆρα) of Mk. 14:3, etc. AV (RV 'alabaster cruse'), see CRT st. 4, ALABASTER.
3. In RV of Lu. 12:43 29, where EV has box, the Q suggested as an alternative rendering of γλασσιναι, which originally and etymologically signified a case in which the maria (pieces of γλασσιναι) of wind instruments were kept. Later it assumed a more general significance and denoted any similarly shaped box or case. Q seaph employs it to indicate the chest (178) set up by Josiah in the Temple (2 Ch. 24:8 ph), which Josephus uses it of the coffer (178 1 S. 68 ph EV; see CRT st. 4), or small chest, in which the Philistine princes deposited the golden mice. In the Mishna it is used to signify a coffer (books (בִּשְׁבָּתִים in Lexa.) and even a coffin (cp the coffer of Isidore); in the latter sense also in Aquila (Gen. 50:2, of Joseph's mummy-case; see CRT st. 18). Thus it would appear that the preferable rendering in John (2:2) is that of RV.

BRAMBLE

Kimhi, however, obtained much the same sense by connecting קִרְיָה with קָרַן , 'ornament.' The Targum on 2 S. 110 renders by קִרְיָה , which is usually applied to the phylactery (Du. 68). A phylactery was, however, also worn on the left arm. קָרַן is apparently connected with קָרַן (occurring only in 1 S. 32-3), into which We. & emendation reduces קָרַן . If the arrangement in 1 S. 318-23 is suggested by the natural order of the parts of the body, קָרַן may be an ornament rather of the arm than of the leg. Barth, AV 151, compares Ar. qadul, 'arm,' which removes some of the difficulty presented by the usual derivation from קָרַן , to step or walk. See, however, ANKLETS.

BRAMBLE has in EV three meanings.

1. קִרְיָה (qirya, rhannus); Gen. 50 10 f. (EV ATAD as in Q), Judg. 9 14 f., RV 'brambles,' and Ps. 58 9 (10), EV 'thorns.' It is a genuine Semitic word, found also in W. Aramaic as קִרְיָה or קִרְיָה in Syriac as qirya (? qirya), in Arabic as atad (qirya rhannus nigra, Fr.), and in Assyrian as qirya, qirya (Ges.-Bu., 527). The root with which it appears to be connected (קָרַן) has in Arabic the sense of 'uttering a rasping, though not loud, sound'; and the possibility of a connection with the sense of pricking or tearing like a thorn is apparent. There is general agreement that rhannus was about equivalent to the modern botanical genus Rhamnus. Dioscorides¹ distinguished three sorts (cp. Fraas, Syn. Plant. Flor. Class.); while in modern times Tristram (FFP 264 f.) has enumerated sixteen species of Rhamnus as found in Palestine.

Perhaps the most likely identification for קִרְיָה is with Rhamnus palaestina (Boiss.), which represents in Syria the R. oleoides of Greece and S. Europe.

2. קִרְיָה , qirya, very frequent; EV usually 'thorn' or 'thistle,' AV once (Is. 34 13) 'bramble.' It denotes a plant of the thorn or perhaps of the thistle kind; see THORN.

3. בִּרְיָה , which occurs seven times in Q (in six of these as the rendering of בִּרְיָה) and five times in NT, is once (Lk. 6 44) rendered 'bramble bush,' elsewhere Bush (qirya, § 1 (1)). N. M.—W. T. T. -D.

BRAN (טַר פִּיתָרָא [BAQ]). The 'burning of bran for incense' (θυμωσαι τ. π.; to Mylitta?) is mentioned in Bar. 6 (Ep. Jer.) 41 [42]† as one of the incidents in the unchaste idolatrous worship of the women of Babylon. See INCENSE, § 8.

BRASEN SEA (יָם הַבְּרָשִׁית), 2 K. 25 13; see LAVER; SEA, BRAZEN.

BRASS, or BRASEN, EV's rendering of נְחֹשֶׁת , nehosheth (Gen. 4 22 and often), נְחֹשֶׁת , nehosheth (Job 6 12 f.), נְחֹשֶׁת , nehosheth (Lev. 26 19, etc.), נְחֹשֶׁת , nehosheth (Dan. 2 32 etc.), χαλκος (Mt. 10 9, 1 Cor. 13 1, Rev. 18 12), and χαλκίον (Mk. 7 4).

EV invariably renders thus except in Ezra 8 27 AV (see COPPER), in 2 S. 22 15 AV, where נְחֹשֶׁת , nehosheth, is rendered 'steel,' and in Jer. 15 12 AV has 'steel,' see IRON, § 2; cp. 2 Tim. 4 14, where χαλκός is 'coppersmith.' In Gen. 4 22 RV⁹⁶ gives 'copper,' and so elsewhere² as a note on 'brass.' In Ezek. 17 5 נְחֹשֶׁת is rightly rendered 'burnished brass' ($\text{ἑξαστράπτων χαλκός}$; Tg. below), as also is χαλκοβαρύς in Rev. 15 21. In Ezra 8 27 נְחֹשֶׁת is qualified by the epithet נִרְצָה (RV 'bright'), which we should probably point נִרְצָה = נִרְצָה , 'glittering' (in Tg. Ezek. 17 for נִרְצָה , 'polished'). נִרְצָה , which follows (1 V 'fine'), arises out of dittography, and should not be rendered (Che.).

That copper is meant is shown by the words, 'out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass' (Dt. 8 9); cp. the chapter in Holland's Pliny (1601), headed 'Mines of Brass.' See COPPER and cp. EGYPT, § 36 end.

² From the absence of loudness in the sound is derived the sense of Heb. נְחֹשֶׁת —properly a 'whisper,' and thence 'softness,' 'stillness.' See also DIVINATION, § 4. IV.

BREAD

BREAD. From the earliest times of which we any record, bread was the principal article of among the Hebrews, a fact which custom of making the ears of wheat and barley palatable by the simple process of roasting (בֵּרֶךְ , 'pan corn'; 1 S. 17 17, etc.) was still common in historic times. For the preparation of bread, however, ears must be crushed or ground so as to admit being kneaded into a paste. In early times the was produced by crushing the ears between two stones (see illustrations of these primitive 'corn-grinders' found in Palestine in Bliss, Mound of Many Cities, a process common in Egypt under the Old Empire later (see Erman's Egypt, 190), and still practised the East. The mortar and pestle were a later development. The preparation of flour by pounding the in a mortar (בֵּרֶךְ , Nu. 118) is a familiar scene Egyptian monuments. The flour obtained by these processes must have been of a coarser grain (בֵּרֶךְ) than procured by the use of the handmill (בֵּרֶךְ ; see MT A still finer quality than the ordinary בֵּרֶךְ was named בֵּרֶךְ (see FOOD, § 3 [d]).

1. Preparation. explains the use of בֵּרֶךְ both for bread for food in general. The pri-

In the earliest times bread was entirely unleavened. The requisite quantity of flour or barley-meal, which varied, naturally, according to the size of the household, was placed in a shallow wooden basin (בֵּרֶךְ ; Ex. 7 —earthenware, for obvious reasons, is little used by nomads—well mixed with water and kneaded. Salt was no doubt added when procurable (cp. Lev. 21 3). When the kneading was completed, the dough (בֵּרֶךְ) was ready for the firing. Cakes thus prepared were named בֵּרֶךְ , 'unleavened cakes,' and these still form the usual bread of the Bedouin. In a more advanced stage of society, the bread was made in this way on cases of emergency (Gen. 19 3), or for purposes ritual, as at the Passover. The ordinary bread of the Hebrews was made lighter by fermentation. A small piece of to-day's 'batch' was laid aside, and when the time for the next baking arrived this piece of leaven (בֵּרֶךְ) was broken down into the water in the בֵּרֶךְ , the flour was mixed therewith, and the whole thoroughly kneaded and allowed to stand 'till the whole was leavened.'

The next stage is the process of firing, or rendering the dough more digestible by the application of heat. Three modes of firing are found in the OT, as in the East at the present day.

2. Firing: kinds of cakes. The three modes of firing are found in the OT, as in the East at the present day.

(a) The simplest method is that still in use among the Bedouin. A fire of wood, or of wood mixed with camel's dung, is kindled on the sand, or on extemporised hearthstones. When these have been well heated, the embers are raked aside, and the flat pieces of dough laid on the hot stones and covered with the ashes just removed. After a few minutes, the ashes are again raked aside, the cakes turned, and the ashes replaced. In a few minutes more the cakes are ready (see Rob. BR 246 f., Doughty, Arab. Des. 1 131 etc.). Such 'a cake baked on the coals' was termed בֵּרֶךְ (1 K. 19 6; cp. Gen. 18 6 Hos. 7 8, ἑκατόφας , by the Vg. correctly rendered panis submeritatus, 'ash cakes').

(b) A second mode of firing bread is one much in vogue at the present day among Bedouin and fellahin alike. A girdle or thin iron plate (בֵּרֶךְ ; Lev. 25 Ezek. 43, ἑκατόφας), slightly convex in shape, is laid over a small fire-pit, in which a fire has been kindled as before, and on this plate or girdle the cakes are fired. Its Syrian name is siḡ (Landberg, Proc. et Dict. du Peuple Arabe, 14). Cakes baked in this way seem to have been called by the Hebrews חֲבֵרִים (1 Ch. 9:31).

(c) The most usual mode of firing, however, especially in towns, was no doubt by means of the oven (אִנְיָה). The tannur, then as now, was a large earthenware jar in the bottom of which the fire was placed. As represented on Egyptian monuments, the cakes were fired by being applied to the outside of the jar (Wilkinson 234; Erman, Egypt, 191). The usual method at the present day, however, is to allow the fire to burn down, and, while the embers are still glowing, to apply the cake to the inside of the jar. The dough is first pressed into flat round cakes (like a Scotch kannock); each of these in its turn is made to revolve by a rapid movement of the hands, till it has expanded to a diameter of about 18 inches, and become as thin as a sheet of thick paper. It is then laid on a cushion, by means of which it is applied to the wall of the tannur. These thin wafer-cakes are called in the OT פַּתִּינָה (in Syria, markûš). The tannur may be larger, and consist of a pit, wider at the bottom and narrowing towards the top, plastered with clay. The ovens used by the bakers of the street in Jerusalem named after them (Jer. 37: 21) were probably of this sort. (For further details see FURNACE, c).

The preparation of the daily supply of bread for the household was essentially the care of the women (Gen. 186 1 S. 28.4 etc.). In the wealthier households this duty would devolve on slaves, male and female (1 S. 8.13). In later times baking became a special trade in the cities (Jos. Ant. xv. 92), and especially in Jerusalem (see above and cp the 'oven tower,' Neh. 3.11 12.3), where the large influx of pilgrims at the great festivals would promote the industry.

It is impossible now to identify the various species of cakes mentioned in the O.E. To those mentioned in the course of this article we add 𐌹𐌺𐌰 the ordinary round cake or pannek (I.S. 236), and 𐌹𐌺𐌰𐌹𐌸𐌰 the etymology of which points to its being pricked or perforated, like the modern passover cakes, we have exhausted the varieties that can be identified with any approach to certainty. BREASTPLATE, COAT OF MAIL (יִרְיֵן יִרְיֵן)

1 K. 22:34 [s. 59:17], קריון or קריון Jer. 46: 51:3, Syr. קריון. We find the קריון mentioned as part of the defensive armour of Goliath and David. That it was commonly worn by Israelite kings is evident from 1 K. 22:34 (2 Ch. 18:33). In the description of Goliath's armour in 1 S. 17:5 ('coat-of-mail' EV) the addition of the word קריון to קרעו gives a valuable clue: Goliath's coat of mail was covered with bronze scales.

This meaning is certified by Dt. 149 (Lev. 119), where קִשְׁקֹשׁ denotes the scales of a fish. Moreover, it is derived from a root קָשַׁף, that signifies rubbing or peeling off. Ar. kaṣafa in conj. iv. expresses the peeling off of skin during recovery from disease.

The weight of Goliath's armour, according to 1 S. 17:5, was 5000 shekels, which may be roughly computed as about 200 lbs. The close intercourse that there was between Egypt and Philistia² makes it not improbable that the heavy coat of mail worn by Goliath resembled the Egyptian cuirass worn by a royal personage, in which yellow, blue, red, and green metallic scales were tastefully arranged in symmetrical rows (Weiss, Asienkunde, Alth. 159). Wilkinson has described the Egyptian cuirass as consisting of about 'eleven horizontal rows of metal plates well secured by bronze pins.' At 'the hollow of the throat a narrower range of plates was introduced. The breadth of each plate or scale was little more than an inch, twelve of them sufficing to cover the front of the body, and the sleeves, which were sometimes so short as to extend less than half-way to the elbow, consisted of two rows of similar plates.'

The Assyrian warriors in earlier times wore a heavy coat of mail covering the entire body with the exception of the arms. Occasionally the coat of mail did not reach farther than the knees. In later times the leading warriors were protected by jackets made of leather or of stout material, on which metal plates were sewn or rivetted (or they were provided with iron or bronze studs). Broad girdles were used for tying in the long coats of mail. Upon a bas-relief, from Nimrud, portrayed in Layard's work we see an Assyrian chariot in which the Bowman is mail-clad even around his neck and ears. It is not improbable that Amib wore a heavy coat of mail somewhat resembling the Assyrian (but shorter), as we know that he took every precaution for personal protection.

The statement that he was mortally wounded by an arrow which pierced 'between $\delta\epsilon\psi\tau\tau$ and the coat of mail' has been variously interpreted. $\delta\epsilon\mu\lambda\alpha$ $\mu\epsilon\sigma\omega\tau\epsilon\upsilon$ $\tau\omicron\upsilon$ $\pi\epsilon\tau\epsilon\mu\alpha\tau\omicron\varsigma$ $\kappa\tau\lambda\alpha$ does not yield any satisfactory sense. The use of $\delta\epsilon\psi\tau\tau$ in Is. 417, point to 'fixes' as a product. Thiemus and other authorities follow further in holding that what is meant here is an attachment or appendage to the coat of mail. The coat of mail protected the breast, whereas the appendage guarded the lower portion of the body, and the arrow penetrated at a point through the interval that separated them (see Richter, HHTh). This appears to be the only intelligible explanation, and etymology would confirm the rendering of the word $\delta\epsilon\psi\tau\tau$ by 'attachments' or 'appendages' ($\delta\epsilon\psi\tau\tau$, to the embrace).

Respecting the coats of mail or corslets with which Uzziab is said to have provided his troops (2 Ch. 26¹⁴) we have not definite information, or any sufficient clue to guide us. The corslets (AV 'bagandines') which Jeremiah (46⁴) lends the cavalry of Pharaoh Necho put on may have consisted of some thick woven material covered with metal scales; but here, as in the case of Neh. 4¹⁶ [10], we are left in much uncertainty. For Neh. 4¹⁶ [1] a useful hint may be derived from Herod. 7⁶³, where we learn that the Syrian (or Assyrian) contingent of Xerxes' army wore ἀμφοῖς ὁπώρητες, which were probably close-fitting sleeveless jackets of coarse felt. Probably the tabra (תַּבְרָא), AV 'halbergeon,' RV 'coat-of-mail,' of Ex 28¹⁷ ver 39²³, both passages from P), was a corslet of this character.

Etymology here does not help us as the word is from the Aramaic root ḥm ('to fight') and therefore means simply 'fighting garb'. Targ. Onk. renders it ḥm, 'breast-plate.' ḥm (Ex. 18:9) is based on another text. Kiblah is on the right track when he says (i) his comment (cited by ib. ad loc.): 'We are reminded of the ἀσπίς of the Greeks (Is. 25:23). ḥm excelled in its manufacture.'

In the Greek period (300 B.C. and later) the ordinary heavy-armed soldiers wore coats of fine iron chain-mail (θώραξ ἀντισιδωτός) a series of links connected into a continuous chain (k.k.h.).

It is significant that Σ gives this interpretation in 1 S 17, and we may conclude from 1 Macc. 6.13 that during the entire Greek period this was the kind of cuirass usually worn. What form of breast-plate was pictured before Paul's imagination as a symbol for the righteousness of a Christian warrior (Eph. 6.14, cp 1 S. 50.17 and 1 Macc 5.8)—whether a corset of scale armour (column of Antoninus), or a cuirass of broad metal plates across the chest and long flexible bands (laminae) of steel over the shoulders' (depicted on the column of Trajan)—can only be conjectured. Excellent woodcuts representing both may be found in Rich's Dict. of Roman and Greek Antiquities. Compare also Warre-Cornish's Concise Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiquities.

G¹ has ΠΟΔΗΡΗC where MT has כִּתְיֹוֹת or BREAST-PLATE OF JUDGMENT (כִּתְיֹוֹת כִּיפֻיִּם, Ex. 28:15; Λ. ΤΩΝ ΚΡΙCΕΩΝ [BAL]; often in G), an object worn on the ephod of the High Priest. It seems to have been a square piece attached by its corners to the shoulder-straps of the ephod (see EPHOD, § 3) and of like material—probably a species of pocket whose outer side was adorned with precious stones. The etymology of the word is uncertain.

Di. rejects the probable derivation from the root hasuna, 'to be beautiful,' and would prefer to connect it with [87, sinus or 'fold' in which something is carried; cp Ewald, Alterth. 300.

BREECHES, in the proper usage of the word, denotes the divided garment reaching from the waist to just below the knees, equivalent to the lat. feminalia and Gr. ΠΕΡΙCΚΕΛΗ, v. distinguished from braca (bracae) or ΑΝΑΖΥΡΙΔΕC, which reached to the ankles
—the garment ordinarily denoted by the word 'hosen' at the time when the AV was made. The earliest form of the garment seems to have been simply a loin cloth (cp GIRDLE, 1). Generally, however, the long mantle worn in the East made a special covering for the legs unnecessary, and even the warriors who are depicted upon the monuments with their short tunics have the leg below the knee wholly bare with the exception of sandals. Noteworthy, on the other hand, are the haicings which protect the thighs and knees of the follower of Ashur-hani-pal (Per. and Chip. Art in Chald.
ii. pl. x.); see further STIRTS. Breeches, in fact, seem to be a distinctly Persian dress (see Herod. 1:71 76), and do not appear to have been known among the Israelites—at all events not before the exile.¹ Apart from the characteristic priestly כִּסְיוֹת (see below, 3), garments of this nature are mentioned only in Dan. 3:21
[EV].

1. כִּסְיוֹת, sarbil (Dan. 3:21 27+), RV 'hosen,'² supported by a consensus of opinion (Theod., Ag., Sym.
Pesh., Hi., Ew., Behrmann, etc.).

In this case the word is derived from Gr. σαράβατα, σαράβαλλα (Lang. Gra. Abb. 207, Fra. Aram. Lexicon 48), probably of Pers. origin (cp mod. Pers. shabwār). In Targ. and Talm., on the other hand, ס (originally not connected with the above) denotes a 'mantle'; so Jewish exegetes (Aben-Ezra, etc.) and AV ('coats,' mg. 'mantles') in this passage.

For more than one reason the AV is probably better. 'Coats' or 'mantles' suits the climax in 27, which describes the powerlessness of the fire over the Three, better than RV—their bodies were uninjured; nor was their hair singed; their mantles (flowing loose robes, easily inflammable) were unchanged, nor had the smell of fire passed on them.

2. כִּסְיוֹת, patil, in כִּסְיוֹת (or rather כִּסְיוֹת [Ba. Gi.]), Dan. 3:21, is an exceedingly obscure term for which are offered such diverse renderings as 'hosen' (AV), 'tunics' (RV), 'turbans' (RV mg.).

¹ Turbans may be safely dismissed as nuphilological and improbable (see TURBANS); for the rest cp Syr. قَبْلَا (a) Persian tunic (cp RV) (b) breeches, also a kind of leggings (cp AV); see Payne Smith, Thes. The Jew. Aram. כִּסְיוֹת occurs in only one passage independent of Dan. 3:21, and apparently denotes some-

² Much later, in the Roman period, braca, feminalia, and
Juden, 87).

³ Evidently retained in its older sense. The modern 'hosen' is applied to stockings.

thing worn upon the feet; but the text is probably corrupt.
Levy, NHW 2, 275 (כִּסְיוֹת), although Kohut (Leb. Comp.
275) argues for its authenticity. It is not improbable that כִּסְיוֹת is a gloss on כִּסְיוֹת; this is indirectly suggested by philological evidence and the versions (כִּסְיוֹת reads only three times), and is directly supported by quotations in the Latin fathers. For a discussion of כִּסְיוֹת and כִּסְיוֹת, see Journ. Phil. 20:307 ff. (1904).

3. The priestly linen breeches (כִּסְיוֹת; כִּסְיוֹת hide), ΠΕΡΙCΚΕΛΗ Ἀνά, feminalia, Pesh. translatπερίCκωμα) were to be worn along with the holy coat, the linen girdle, and the linen turban by on the Day of Atonement as he entered the holy within the curtain (Lev. 16:4 [P]). It is prob-ly an oversight that they are specially mentioned Ezek. 44:18 along with the long robe and ephod rather the kathemeth and me'il; so Heb.) as part of 'apparel of honour.' Ordinary priests also wore on sacrificial occasions (Ex. 28:42 39:28 Lev. 6:10 [P] P), Ezek. 44:18 (the linen Zadok).

According to Jos. (Ant. iii. 71) the μαλακτῆρον (Niese) was girdle (μαλακτῆρον) of fine twisted linen. It was the under-of the priestly garments and possibly the most primitive.
the older law of Ex. 29:30 (1E according to Bacon, E) seem imply that the wearing of the garment was not origi-compulsory for priest or layman. The change seems to be to a primitive conception of holiness. Clothes which had in contact with a holy place or function became taboo (hasan), and therefore useless in ordinary life. The law avoid this misfortune was to perform holy ceremonies in (just as the Pelonians made the sacred circuit of the Kaaba Mecca in a nude condition), or in holy vestments borrowed the priests (cp 2 K. 10:22). The law of Ex. 29:30 is apparently against the former custom (for which see further W.
RS 2:451 f.). See DRESS, PRIEST.

BRETHREN OF JESUS (Mt. 12:47 Mk. 3:32 Lk. 8:19
See CLOPAS, § 3 ff., JAMES, § 3, SIMON, 4).

BRICK (בִּרְכָּה), derived by Ges. from לבן, 'to white,' as if bricks were originally made of a white clay; but this is a forced etymology.

1. Of the Hebrews ΠΑΙΝΘΟC.² The Hebrew word for brick is not limited to sun-dried bricks. There is no doubt, however, that the Israelites, like in Eastern nations, used this kind almost exclusively; Gen. 11:3 burning bricks is mentioned as a foreign custom, analogous to the use of asphalt (see BITUMEN for mortar, and we may safely disregard EX's render-'brickkiln' in 2 S. 12:31, Nah. 3:14.³ Sun-dried bricks of a very early period have been found in Palestine, but burnt bricks seem to date generally from the Roman period. It will be remembered that the houses of the mass of the Israelites were made of sun-dried clay (2 HOUSE); it was of the same material that their bricks were composed.⁴

The true countries of brick-makers and brick-builders were Egypt⁵ and Mesopotamia. In Egypt, not only all houses, but also all palaces, many tombs (including several of the small pyramids), and some temples, were constructed of Nile-mud bricks.

The representations of brick-making which are to be found in Egyptian wall-pictures are very instructive.

2. Brick-making. They not only show the process with great clearness, but also illustrate most vividly the servitude of the Israelites on Egyptian ground. The most famous picture, for example, represents foreigners—chiefly of a Semitic type—at work.

evolved from the simple umr; see GUMMEL, 1.

² Some scholars consider ΠΑΙΝΘΟC, the Greek term for brick, to have been borrowed by the Greeks from the Phoenicians, who the form phinth. [225] Ass. phintu, seems to come from phintu, 'to throw down flat'; see EUBAN, and cp Del. phintu 93 f.

2 S. 12:31, and on the whole passage see DAVIN, § 11:3, n. RV, 1
Jer. 43:9 alters the unintelligible 'brickkiln' of AV into 'furnace' work.

⁴ Altars, also, were made of earth; cp the obscure Is. 1:11
(see SYRIAC). On the law in Ex. 20:25 (EV) see ALFORD, 1.

⁵ Cp the fact that the Eg. word for brick, dobet, Copie made, took root in Asia; cp Arabic fub (whence Ethiopic fub, Span.

superintended by Egyptian 'task masters' armed with sticks.

The analogy to the labour of Israel as described in Ex. 1 is so striking that many writers have ventured to regard the picture as referring to the circumstances with which that record deals. The scene, however, represents 'brick-making for the great magazine in Eastern Thebes' (Opst. mod. Karnak), and the explanatory legend states that the labourers are 'captives brought by his majesty (Thutmose or Thutmose III.) for work on the temple of Amun'; many (not the majority) of the working men seem to be African captives.

We see the labourers hoeing the ground with the wooden Egyptian hoe (see ADDUCTION, fig. 3), carrying the black earth Nile-mud deposited at the annual inundation in baskets to a clean (sandy) place, moistening it with water taken from small ponds, evidently at some distance from the Nile, and kneading it with their feet. The wooden moulding-frame is filled with material of the right consistency, and emptied on the ground; two or three square heaps of mud, placed in rows side by side, are left to dry.

These Egyptian bricks were usually twice the size of our modern ones. Many of them (from dynasty 18 onwards) were stamped with the name of a king, to show that they belonged to public buildings; sometimes the stamp shows the name of the building, and sometimes in addition to this the name of the officer charged with the construction of the building.¹ Stamps as well as moulds have been preserved to modern times, and bricks with the name of Rameses II., 'the Pharaoh of the oppression' (but see EXPL. § 58 ff.), are shown in our museums. We often find chopped straw or reed mixed with the mud to make it more consistent and to prevent cracking during the drying. According to Ex. 1:13 the pharaoh showed his malice by doubling the work of the Israelites. Apparently we are to understand that, instead of furnishing straw from the royal domains and from the magazines of a fifth part of the other fields, he forced the oppressed strangers to gather the straw from the fields themselves. This, however, they could not well accomplish during their scanty leisure time; besides, the stalks were used (and are still used) as fodder, especially when not quite dry. Nor is it any easier to see how they could get old straw of the previous year (from the refuse heaps of farmyards, etc.) in quantities sufficient for their 'tale of bricks.' For the rest, we frequently find not only foreign captives, but also the Egyptian serfs, referred to in Egyptian texts as making bricks under constraint.

We now turn to the second brick-making country—Mesopotamia. Owing to the scarcity of stone in

4. Babylonian. Babylonia proper, brick was the only building material, stone being reserved for the ornamentation of edifices, and the construction of certain parts, such as the threshold (see BABYLONIA, § 15). Whilst in Egypt rain is so scarce that buildings of sun-dried brick have a certain durability, the climate of Babylonia is less favourable. The Babylonians, accordingly, made their constructions more solid. They built walls of an enormous thickness: for example, the great enclosure of Babylon which Nebuchadnezzar erected with the clay dug from the ditch of the city (cp BABYLON, § 5). Moreover, their unfavourable climate forced the Babylonians, though wood was at least as scarce in their country as in Egypt, to use burnt bricks, especially for the outer layers of their thick walls. This led to a high development of the art of glazing and colouring bricks. We find large walls covered with elaborate paintings, whilst in Egypt such enamelled

³ It has been inferred from this stamp that the government manufactured bricks for sale, and even that it had a brick-monopoly; but this is very improbable.

tiles were used much more rarely and always on a smaller scale. Crude bricks, however, sometimes of enormous size and always without straw, were the common material, especially in the earlier times. Hence we have brick stamps with, for example, the name of such old kings as Sargon of Agade and Narām-sin.

In Nineveh, sun-dried bricks seem to have been the building material in general use. On Ezek. 4:1, which mentions Ezekiel as portraying the siege of Jerusalem on clay-tiles, see Ezek. SPOT (Eng.), p. 98 f.

BRIDLE. The various Heb. and Gr. words will be found dealt with in the articles specified below.

1. מִנְיָה, minyah (φάλαξ, Is. 29:14) V. 1 V. 2 'muzzle' (cp CAT. 1). Most inappropriate; read מִנְיָה 'a guard' (Is. 11:3) H. Herz, Che.

2. מִנְיָה, minyah, Zech. 11:25 AV. RV bit (cp CAT. 1).

3. מִנְיָה, minyah, 2 K. 19:22 (חֲלָצִים) Is. 37:22 (חֲלָצִים), Prov. 26:3 (חֲלָצִים). RV is no doubt correct. Cp the place-name in 2 S. 8:1, מִנְיָה-אֲמִינִי.

4. מִנְיָה, minyah, Is. 30:5 (δ. donkey), Job 30:11 (חֲלָצִים), Ps. 32:1 (חֲלָצִים), Job 41:13 (3) V. 1 (חֲלָצִים). Perhaps 'bit' would be a better rendering.

5. חֲלָצִים, chalatzim, RV, AV 'bit'; Rev. 14:20. EV (cp Eur. Alceste, 492); cp H. Herz, § 2.

BRIER. Six Hebrew words have to be considered.

1. מִנְיָה, minyah (Judg. 5:7), is mentioned along with 'thorns of the wilderness' as the instruments with which Gideon 'taught,' or rather 'threshed' (7:7); cp Moore's comm. ad loc., the men of Succoth. The etymology of the Hebrew word being unknown and its occurrence so rare, it is scarcely worth while to speculate as to the kind of thorn intended.

We may notice that according to Boissier, 362 (quoted by Therson in Low, 424), berkan is in modern times an Arabic name for Phacelia scoparia, Boiss. The parallelism with 'thorns of the wilderness' in both places is enough to give the absurd idea invented by Michaelis and adopted by Cassini that מִנְיָה meant 'threshing-wins.' The method of torture alluded to is that of carding (see Moore).

2. מִנְיָה, minyah, occurs eight times in Is. (56:7, 24:25, 9:3 [17], 10:17, 27:4, 32:1),¹ in seven of these along with מִנְיָה, a word of similar meaning. מִנְיָה is a genuine Semitic word, and Cassini (21:3 cp Frankel, 86) pointed out its affinity with Ar. minyah, some kind of thorny plant. The Hebrew word seems a general one for thorny plants, of which there are many kinds in Palestine (Tristram enumerates sixteen species of Rhamnus, LEP. 293 ff.). The ancient versions give no help towards a nearer determination of the species.

3. מִנְיָה, minyah (καρδία [Syn. καρδία] Is. 55:13), a wilderness-plant, probably of the nettle kind, as its name is apparently connected with מִנְיָה 'to burn.'

4. מִנְיָה, minyah (καρδία, the 'nettle'; Sym. and V. 2, the 'nettle'; Pesh. renders gahar, 'paddy'; 'savory'. Any of these will suit the passage well enough; under the new dispensation this plant was to give place to the myrtle.

5. מִנְיָה, minyah (καρδία, the 'nettle'; Sym. and V. 2, the 'nettle'; Pesh. renders gahar, 'paddy'; 'savory'. Any of these will suit the passage well enough; under the new dispensation this plant was to give place to the myrtle.

6. מִנְיָה, minyah (καρδία, the 'nettle'; Sym. and V. 2, the 'nettle'; Pesh. renders gahar, 'paddy'; 'savory'. Any of these will suit the passage well enough; under the new dispensation this plant was to give place to the myrtle.

According to the testimony of all the ancient versions, the word is almost certainly to be read as the participle (מִנְיָה) of a verb common in Aramaic, 'to gain say falsely' or 'to lie'; and the

1. It merely transliterates; in 27:4 V. 2 renders καρδία and Sym. καρδία (see F. H. 11, ad loc.).

2. In the other three places where מִנְיָה occurs (Jer. 17:1, Ezek. 39:7, Zech. 7:1) it is rendered 'diamond' or 'adamant' (see ADAMANT, § 2).

BRIGANDINE

following word, כְּלִיטָה, is perhaps a mistake for כְּלִיטָה ('despising') or some such word, so that the clause would read 'though they ginsay and condemn thee' (see Co. ad loc.). There is no support anywhere for a word כְּלִיטָה meaning 'briers.'

5 כְּלִיטָה, silhou (σουλός, Ezek. 28:24),¹ is connected with Jewish Aram. כְּלִיטָה, Syr. silhou, Ar. sullā, Mand. כְּלִיטָה (Lew. 159), all of which mean a 'thorn' or 'pricking point.'

6 כְּלִיטָה, hēlek (ἐλεῖν, Prov. 15:19 [where EV 'thorns'] Mic. 7:4), is by Wellhausen (Kt. Proph. 149) connected with Ar. hadikā, an enclosed garden or orchard; he reads in Micah כְּלִיטָה כְּלִיטָה ('ihr Bester ist aus der Dornhecke und ihr Grader aus dem Gestrüpp'), thus producing a good parallelism. On the other hand, Low (147), following Celsius (ii. 35 ff.), explains the word by reference to Ar. hadikā, which, according to Lane (i. 71), is Solanum cordatum. Tristram (FFP, 368) identifies it with Solanum sanctum, L. (sometimes called the apple of Sodom: see Bnl. 152). We may at all events gather from Prov. 15:19 that a thorny plant capable of forming a hedge is intended. For Heb. 68 AV [τρίδοσις], see THISTLE [4]. N. M.

BRIGANDINE (כְּלִיטָה), Jer. 46:4, RV 'coats of mail'; see BREASTPLATE (i.).

The passages are Gen. 19:24 Dt. 29:23 [22] Job 18:15 Ps. 116 [7] Is. 30:33 34:9 Ezek. 38:22 Lk. 17:2 Rev. 17:1 14:10 19:20 20:10 21:8. Gophrith is apparently connected with כְּלִיטָה 'bitumen' (cp the Aram. and Ar. forms with initial k), but surely not of Basma origin, as Lagarde⁴ supposed.

Almost invariably the passages in which brimstone is mentioned relate to divine judgments; there is no direct statement of any use to which sulphur was put by the Hebrews. They cannot have known anything of the industrial uses of that mineral, which have so largely added to the wealth of the regions where it is most easily obtained (e.g., Sicily). The only objects to which it was applied by the ancients, according to Plin. HN 35:15, are the making of lamp wicks (ellichnia), the fumigation and cleansing of wool, certain medical remedies, and, lastly, religious purifications⁵ (cp Od. 22 481 483; after the slaughter of the suitors).

It may be conjectured, however, that sulphur was used in the so-called Tophet (i.e., of the Valley of Hinnom (cp Is. 30:33), and one conclusion may safely be drawn from the many descriptions in which brimstone is referred to—that the Israelites were not unacquainted with the volcanic phenomena known as 'solfataras' or those known as 'fire-wells' (as emanations of carburetted hydrogen, when they take fire, are frequently called). These 'fire-wells' occur in many of the districts where mud-volcanoes appear, in Europe, Asia, and N. America.⁶ Reminiscences of phenomena of this kind apparently underlie certain parts of the account of the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah in Gen. 19 and the other passages (see above) where the same narrative is directly or indirectly alluded to.

It is probable that the Hebrews, like the Greeks (see Il. 14:45 Od. 12:47) and the Romans (Plin. HN 35:15),⁷ associated the ozonic smell which often so perceptibly accompanies lightning discharges with the presence of sulphur. This may help to explain the passages which describe or allude to the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah as having been brought about by a rain of fire and brimstone from heaven (Job 18:15? Gen. 19:24 Ps. 116 Ezek. 38:22 Lk. 17:29).

BROOK. The Hebrew word usually thus rendered is נַחַל, nahal (נַחַל, cp in NT Ju. 18:1), like the Ar. nahal, denotes not only the flowing itself (cp נַחַל, Am. 5:24), but also, like the nahal, the dried-up river bed¹ (cp the term נַחַל, 15:18). Hence Job likens his unstable brethren to a brook whose supply of water cannot be counted (Job 6:15).

In Is. 19:6, נַחַל מִצְרַיִם, 'the brooks of Egypt' (so RV), which bears resemblance both to the Eg. nahal, 'river', the Ass. nahal, 'stream', is applied usually to the Nile.

נַחַל, nahal, in Job 1:13, nahal mayim, 'water-course' (cp Joel 1:20 (נַחַל, nahal), which bears resemblance both to the Eg. nahal, 'river', the Ass. nahal, 'stream', is applied usually to the Nile. It is otherwise rendered 'river', 'waters', etc., and occurs in various involved meanings, in Job 12:21 (AV 'the mighty'), 40:18 (AV 'pieces'), 41:15 17 (AV 'scales').

נַחַל, nahal, rendered 'brook' in 2 S. 17:20, is a word known etymologically history (for Fr. Del.'s identification with Ass. nahal, 'a canal', cp Dr. ad loc. and Z. f. d. l. u. l. 40:724) word, if not corrupt (We. conjectures some such word) or out of its place, is quite unknown.²

BUCKLE. 1. According to some authorities the (βραχιόλια, armillas) of Ex. 35:22 was a buckle 'bracelets', RV 'brooches'. See RING.

2. So, too, the מַצְיָה of 2 S. 1:10. See BRACELET (5).

3. σπόρη (1 Macc. 10:89 11:53 14:44) was a buckle, bestowed in one instance as an honour distinction on Jonathan by king Alexander Balas, the use is to give to such as are the kindred of the king (1 Macc. 10:89).

Such buckles or brooches formed the fastenings of the garment on the breast or over the shoulder. They were various shapes, the commonest being a flat circular ring with a pin passing through the centre (Rawlinson). The use of buckles (like that of the purple robe) was reserved to mention (see passages cited, and cp Livy, 39:31); see CROWN.

1. Said to have been the fourth in descent from Aaron in line of Eleazar: 1 Ch. 6:51 [5:31 6:36] (cp 5 Bue [B], weau).

2. בִּקְיָה is accordingly sometimes rendered 'valley': cp, e.g., 2 Ch. 2:13 20:16 33:14 in RV.

3. The בִּקְיָה identifies בִּקְיָה with the Jordan. No help can be obtained from the Versions, unless the δυναμὶς ἀποκαλύπτει be correct, in which case בִּקְיָה may be a corruption of some such word as בִּקְיָה or בִּקְיָה (elsewhere 100). See also H. P. Smith, ad loc.

BURDEN (מַשָּׂא), massā—i.e., 'lifting up'; hence either 'burden' or 'utterance' ['to utter' is 'to lift up the voice']. 'Burden' in EV, when used of a prophetic revelation, should rather be 'oracle' (as RV¹⁹⁰² 2 K. 9.25 etc.). Cp PROPHECY. The term massā became a subject of popular derision in the time of Jeremiah, owing to its double meaning (see above), so that Jeremiah pronounces a divine prohibition of its use (Jer. 23.33 ff.). It continued, however, to be used in the headings of prophecy. As to the application of massā, once only it denotes divine judicial sentence (2 K. 9.25; cp Jer. 23.36); elsewhere there is no such limitation of meaning. In Prov. 30.1 beyond doubt מַשָּׂא should be amended to מַשָּׂא in 31.1 to מַשָּׂא (see AGUR, LEMUEL).

בִּרְיָה renders variously ἀλμα (in the Minor Prophets regularly) ῥῆμα (Is. 15.17; 22.1 and 21.1 [QD], ῥῆμα [Is. 21.1 also Is. 15.1 [A], 22.1 [A], and 23.1 [MAQMS-L], and ῥῆμα [Is. 19.30]).

denotes a rough thorny bush—which is the original sense of our 'bramble'—as is shown by the use of the same word in later Hebrew, in Aramaic, Arabic, and Assyrian, and confirmed by the rendering of the ancient Versions, Low (275), following Forskål (Flor. Aq. A. cxi.), identifies it with Rubus fruticosus. Some, on the ground that the bramble is not found on Sinai, assume that a kind of acacia is referred to. These Hebrew and Greek words are used in OF and N¹ respectively only in connection with the theophany to Moses in Horeb (Sinai), except in Lk. 6.44. In OF (Ex. 32.4 Dt. 33.16), and in Acts 7.35, the term refers to the actual bush; in Mk. 12.26 = Lk. 20.37 (see RV) to the section of Exodus containing the narrative (see below, § 2).

2. שֹׁכֵךְ, shōkēk (paros, rubus; Ex. 32.4 Dt. 33.16 Mk. 12.26 Lk. 6.44 [EV 'bramble bush'] 20.37 Acts 7.35†) is in Gen. 2.5 probably used in a general sense of any wild-growing shrub; in the other passages the reference may be more specific. Low (78), who cites the Syriac and Arabic equivalents—shōkēk and shōkēk—identifies it with Artemisia judaica L., but allows that the Arabic word is used by Syriac lexicographers for various species. See also Wetzstein, Reisner, 41.

3. נֶחֱלִים, nahālīm (pagas, foramina, AV 'bushes,' RV 'pastures,' mg. 'bushes,' Is. 7.19†) is almost certainly connected with the root נָחַל, Ar. nahala (see Barth, AV 215), whose proper sense is that of leading cattle to the drinking-place. The noun, therefore, means 'drinking-places'—like Ar. manhal or manrid. This is better than the more general rendering 'pastures.' 'Clefts' (G. Vg.) rests on a false etymology; and 'bushes' (Saad. etc., AV) is seemingly due to conjecture (Ges. Thes.).

The theophany in the bush (Ex. 32.4) is remarkable. Elsewhere the 'angel of Yahwe' is a theophany in human form; but here apparently (note Ex. 23.3) the only special appearance is that of fire. The nearest parallel is Judg. 13.20, where the angel ascends in a flame of fire; but the human form of the appearance is there unmistakable. The story in the form which it assumes in Exodus appears to have resulted from a fusion of two widely current beliefs—that fire indicated the divine presence (see THEOPHANY, § 5), and that certain trees were the permanent abodes of deities. It seems probable from the character of the reference in Dt. 3.16 that there was current a different form of the story, according to which the bush was Yahwe's permanent dwelling; for the phraseology (שָׁכַן, 'who dwelt in the bush') indicates the same permanency of the divine presence as was subsequently supposed to characterise the temple. Renaud, however, would read שָׁכַן, 'who dwells in Sinai' (cp Ex. 23), and certainly in Exodus the fiery appearance is clearly regarded as, like other theophanies, temporary. Robertson Smith (Rel. Sem. 193 f.) cites some parallels from non-biblical sources, and argues that 'the original seat of a conception like the burning bush, which must have its physical basis in electrical phenomena, must prob-

1. שֹׁכֵךְ occurs also as the proper name of a Rock, 1 S. 14.4 (see Michal).

BUZ (בִּז) 1. Second son of Nahor, Gen. 22:21 (Barz [A] 1.1). As Buz is mentioned in connection with Dedan and Tema in Jer. 25:23 (Pwz [B] 2:10), it must have been an Arabian people. Buz and HAZO (q.v.) are connected by Del. (Pier. 307; Richer's III B 124) with the Bazu and Hazu of the annals of Esarhaddon (Budge, Hist. of Assyria, 59-61, AB. 2:30 f.), two districts not to be exactly identified, but evidently in close proximity to N. Arabia. Esarhaddon's description of the land of Bazu is not an inviting one; it was a desolate, snake-haunted

To complete this theory Elihu it would seem, to be David's brother. Unfortunately 'Elihu' in 1 Ch. 27:1 is most probably corrupt, even if not, 'brethren' is a vague and uncertain (see ELIUT, 2). Moreover, dramatic propriety suggested the description of Elihu as an Aramæan. RAM (q.v., 2) is probably a fictitious name, like and Barachel.

C

CAB, RV Kab (כַּב; καβου [BAL]), 2 K. 6:25†, a dry measure, one-sixth of a seah (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES). So at least Jewish authorities (see Buxtorf, s.v. כַּב); but in this passage כַּב ('cab') is probably a scribe's error for כֶּרֶךְ ('cor'). See DOVE'S DUNG, HUSKS.

CABBON (כַּבֹּן, καβρα [BA], καββω [L]), an unidentified city in the lowland of Judah, mentioned between Eglon and Lahmas (Josh. 15:43). It is possibly the same as the MACUBENA—AV MACUBENAH (מַכּוּבֵנָה; μαχαβηνα [B], -αμνη [A], μαχβανα [L])—mentioned among the Calebite towns enumerated in 1 Ch. 24:9, and may perhaps be represented by the present el-Kubeibeh, lying between Kh. 'Ajlān and Kh. el-Lahm, sites that have been proposed for Eglon and Lahmas.

CABUL (כַּבּוּל; καβω [MACOMEA] [B], καβωλ [A], κα. [L]), a town in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:27), the καβωλ (variants -[v], -βωλ., -βαλ., γαμαλων) mentioned by Josephus (It. 43, 44, 45) as a village on the confines of Ptolemais, 40 stadia from Jotapata (modern Jéfât), may safely be identified with the modern Kābul, 236 ft. above sea-level, 9 m. SE. from Acco. It is probably the καβωλ (but other codd. read γαβωλων), which Josephus (B/33) gives as on the sea coast of Tyre and forming the E. frontier of Lower Galilee. The name was current at the time of the Crusaders as Cabor or Cabour, a fief presented in 1186 to Count Joscelin by King Baldwin IV., and it gave its name to a family (Rey, Colonies Franques en Syrie).

In 1 K. 9:11-13 it is told how Solomon, on the completion of his buildings in Jerusalem to which Hiram contributed, gave to the latter 'twenty cities in the land of Galilee,' but Hiram was dissatisfied with them and 'they were called the land of Cabul unto this day' (1 K. 9:12-13, GREEK δῶρον for δῶν; Jos. Ant. viii. 53, καβαλων, described as bordering on Tyre; c. AF, καβωλων, 'a piece of land in Galilee').¹ For the statement of Josephus that in Phœnician the name means 'unpleasing' (οὐκ ἀρεσκον) there is no evidence, the true explanation ought not to be far away. It could recover if we should see that the popular wit not so poor as Heller, Ewald, and Thénius supposed (כַּבּוּל = כֶּרֶךְ, 'as nought'). Cheyne (PSB. 1, 217) [99] would correct 'land of Cabul' into 'Land Zebulun'; καβω may have been written καβω, and the mark of abbreviation had been lost, some learned scribe may have corrected καβω into καβω. The writer would be like that which explained Beelzebul as 'the of dung,' and 'Izebel as 'what dung' (see BEELZEUL, JEZEBEL); it would be a new popular etymology, Zebulun. The 'twenty cities,' on this hypothesis, were in the lower part of the Gālil, which, in the time of Josephus, and probably also when 1 K. 9:11-13 was edited, extended as far as Καβωλων or Cabul. Of course the writer does not mean to say that the name Zebulun was now given for the first time; he only offers a new justification for the name. For a less probable view (כַּבּוּל corrupted from כֶּרֶךְ; cp כֶּרֶךְ, 'dung'), Klostermann. (Cp also Bottg., Topogr.-hist. Lex., Josephus, s.v. 'Chalabon'). By its own evidence (in this day) the story, in its present form, is by no means contemporary with the events with which it deals.

The Chronicler, whose views would not allow him to regard the cession of a part of the Holy Land to the Gentile, sought the story as to make it appear that it was Hiram who 'gave' cities to Solomon' (2 Ch. 9:2). The AV translators have attempted to reconcile this with the story in Kings by rendering 'gave' 'restored' (RV 'had given').

CÆSAR (καίσαρ [Ti. WH]) is used in the NT as a title of Augustus (Lk. 21) and Tiberius (Jb. 31). The latter emperor is, moreover, the 'Caesar' of Mt. 22:17 ff. Mk. 12:14 ff. Lk. 20:22 ff. (cp 23:2) and Jn. 19:1 ff. (Claudius Caesar is named in Acts 11:23 (AV, but RV om. Caesar with Ti. WH), and is alluded to in Acts 17:7. The 'Caesar' of Paul (Acts 25:3 ff. 26:12 27:24 28:19) is Nero, whose 'household' is mentioned in Phil. 4:22 (οἱ ἐκ τοῦ Καίσαρος οἰκίας). The reference here is hardly to members of his family, but, as in the case of Stephanas in 1 Cor. 16:15, to the familia or household slaves. See further APOCALYPSE, § 43 ff. ISRAEL, §§ 87-115.

CÆSAREA. 1. Cæsarea Palestine (καίσαρεια [Ti. WH], -εία [Jos.]; in Talm. כֶּסְרִי, mod. Arab. Kaṣariyyeh), the only real port south of Carmel, was built by Herod the Great (on the name, see § 3) in time for it to become the capital of the Roman province of Judaea, and to play the great part in the passage of Christianity westward from Palestine which is described in Acts. The site was that of a Phœnician (cp Jos. Ant. xiii. 15:4) settlement with a fortification called the Tower of Straton (Στρατωνος Πύργος) - a Hellenic form of a Phœnician proper name, Astirytaton (Pletschmann, Gesch. der Phön. 81; Hildesheimer, Beitr. 2. Geogr. Palest. 4 ff., where the variant reading ἑρ ὁ πύργος or ἑρ, 'Devil's Tower,' given in Talmud B Shebi'ith, vi. 136, and in Talmud B Megilla is explained as a Jewish nickname for a town called after a worshipper of Astarte. There was, according to Strabo, a landing-place (πρόσφορον ἔχων). At the end of the second century B.C., the town was under a 'tyrant,' Zoilus (Jos. Ant. xiii. 12:2); but Alexander Jannæus took it for the Jews, along with the other coast towns (ib. 13). These were enfranchised by Pompey and made subject to the province of Syria (ib. xiv. 14). After the Battle of Actium they were presented to Herod the Great along with Samaria and other places by Augustus (ib. xv. 73). Up to this time Herod had confined his building designs to the E. side of the Central Range. Now, however, in alliance with Rome, he came over the watershed, and out of Samaria built himself a capital which he called after his patron, Sebaste. Requiring for this a seaport that should keep him in touch with Rome, he chose Straton's Tower as the nearest suitable site to Sebaste. He laid the lines of a magnificent city, which took him twelve years to build (ib. xv. 96; 'ten years,' xvi. 51).

Josephus describes the thorough and lavish architecture. In the usual Greek fashion, there were palaces, temple, theatre, amphitheatre, and many arches and altars. There were also vaults for draining the city - as carefully constructed as the buildings above ground. A breakwater 200 ft. wide was formed in 20 fathoms depth by dropping enormous stones. The south end was enclosed by a mole with the shore, and the mouth of the harbour looked N., the prevailing winds on this coast being from the SW. (ib. xv. 96; Rf. i. 215-8). Today the remains of the breakwater are 100 yards from shore, and the mouth of the harbour measures 180 yards (ib. Mem.). Herod called his city, like Sebaste, after Augustus, Καίσαρεια Σεβαστή, and his harbour Λιμὴν Σεβαστῶν. When Cæsarea Philippi was built (see below, § 2), Herod's seaport came to be distinguished from it by the names Καίσαρεια παραλία, K. ἡ ἐπὶ θαλάττῃ, and even K. ἡ πρὸς Σεβαστίῃ Λιμὴν (on a coin of Nero, De Saulh'y, Numism. de la Terre Sainte, 110), and Cæsarea Palestine. The name of Straton survived long (Jos. Ant. xvii. 11:4, Strab. xv., Epiphanius De pond. et mens. 125, Phil. v. 16). The Talmud calls the city after the harbour, Linnah. Cæsarea became the virtual capital of all Palestine.

'Cæsarea Junæ caput est,' says Tacitus (Hist. 2:73).

4. A Roman city. It was thoroughly Roman; the Talmud (ib. Megilla, bat) calls it daughter of Edom, the mystic name for Rome. The Procurator lived there; there was an Italian garrison (Acts 10:1; cp CORNELIUS, § 1), and in the temple there were two statues - of Augustus and of Rome. Though there were many Jews (Jos. Ant. xv. 870; Rf. i. 13-14; m. 91), the inhabitants were mainly Gentile.

Here, then, very fitly, was poured out upon the Gentiles the gift of the Holy Ghost (Acts 10:45). There had been a Christian congregation from the earliest possible time. Philip, one of the seven Deacons, took up his residence there (Acts 21:8). About 41 A.D. there came to a Roman centurion CORNELIUS a divine message to send to Joppa for Peter, who was prepared for this by a vision which taught him that God would make clean all that the Jewish law had hitherto prohibited as unclean. Peter came to Cæsarea, made the profound and decisive acknowledgment that God accepts in every nation him 'that feareth him and worketh righteousness,' preached Jesus, saw the descent of the Spirit upon the little Gentile company, and baptized them (Acts 10). This proved the turning-point in the opinion of the church at Jerusalem (chap. 11), and prepared the way for the acceptance of the missionary labours of Paul, to which from this stage onwards the Book of Acts is devoted.

5. NT references. Cæsarea is next mentioned as the scene of the awful death of Herod Agrippa I. (12 A.D.), to whose government it had been given over; some of its coins bear his superscription (Madden, Coins of the Jews, 133, 136). After him it passed again to the Roman procurator of Judaea, and became the chief garrison of the troops under him. Paul arrived at Cæsarea on his voyage from Ephesus (Acts 18:22), and there he was tried with a fairness and security that were impossible in Jerusalem (chap. 25). The contrast between the two cities, which is so evident in this story, proves how thoroughly Roman and imperial Cæsarea was. Besides receiving so far a trial, Paul, during his two years of residence in the town, was not threatened by the Jews, as he had been in Jerusalem. From the harbour of Cæsarea Paul sailed on his voyage to Italy (27:1).

The subsequent history of the town is soon told. Contests between its Jewish and Gentile inhabitants led to, and were among the first incidents of, the great revolt of the Jews against Rome, 66 ff. A.D. (Jos. Ant. xv. 879; Rf. i. 13-14; 181 vii. 87). Vespasian made the town his headquarters, and was there proclaimed emperor in 69. He established there a colony, but without the 'Jus Italicum,' under the title Prima Flavia Augusta Cæsarea, to which, under Alexander Severus, was added Metropolis Provincia Syria Palestine (Pliny, IIA v. 136; and coins in De Saulh'y, Num. de la T.S. 112 ff. pl. vii.). This determined the rank of Cæsarea in the subsequent organisation of the Church. Its bishop became the Metropolitan of Syria; Eusebius occupied the office from 313 to 315. Origen had made it his home. 'Procopius was born there.' When the Arabs came it was still the headquarters of the commander of the imperial troops; in 638 it was occupied by 'Ala' Obeid. Like all the coast towns, it lost under Arab domination the supremacy which the Greek masters of Syria, in their necessity for a centre of power on the sea, had bestowed upon it. It became a country town, known only for its agricultural produce (Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems, 474). The advent of a western power with the Crusaders revived it for a little; Baldwin II. took it in 1100, and rebuilt it; the present ruins are mostly of Crusader's masonry. Saladin took it in 1187, Richard I. in 1192; and St. Louis added to its fortifications. It was finally demolished by the Sultan Bibars in 1291, and since his time has lain in ruin. (See further on details Rehd., Pal. 670 ff.; Schürer, Hist. 484 ff.; G.Asm. HGA 13 ff.).

6. Later history. 2. Cæsarea Philippi (καίσαρεια ἡ φιλιπποῦ, both in NT [Ti. WH] and Jos.), so called after its founder, PHILIP (see HERODIAN FAMILY, Philippi. 6) the tetrarch, son of Herod, to whom the district was granted in 4 B.C., occupied a site which had been of the utmost religious importance. Philo, Legat. ad Cajum, 38, mentions the Σεβαστήριον.

7. Site of C. 6) the tetrarch, son of Herod, to whom the district was granted in 4 B.C., occupied a site which had been of the utmost religious importance. Philo, Legat. ad Cajum, 38, mentions the Σεβαστήριον.

and military importance from remote antiquity. Just under the S. buttress of Hermon, at the head of the Jordan valley, about 1450 ft. above the sea, is a high cliff of limestone (from 100 to 150 ft.). Rolenson, IBR 409f. rendered by the writer, infused with iron, that oozes over it from above. A cavern occupies the lower part of the cliff filled with the debris of its upper portion, and from this debris there breaks one of the sources of the Jordan. It is probably the sanctuary known as BAAL-GAM (277) or Baal hermon¹. Close by is a steep hill, crowned with the ruins of a medieval castle, Kal it es Subelch, and at its foot the miserable village of Binnas. Probably here (GASm. HB 480), rather than at Tell el-Kadi, the site favoured by most authorities, lay the city of Laish that was afterwards DAN (277).

The place must have been early occupied by the Greeks, both because of its sanctity, and because of its strategic position. Polybius (1613 281) mentions it as the scene of the great battle in which Antiochus the Great won Palestine from the Ptolemies. The Greeks displaced the worship of Baal by that of Pan.

The cave, in which there is still legible an inscription, Havi te me Nou me, was called ra Hareion (Jos. Ant. xv. 103, BJ i. 214 (in 97), a name afterwards extended to the whole hill (Jos. HB 717). The village and the country around were designated by a feminine form of the same adjective, Hannas or Horeas (Jos. Ant. xviii. 21; Ant. xviii. 81, etc.; Philo, v. 1874).

In 20 B.C. Herod, having received the district from Augustus on the death of Zenodorus, the previous lord of these parts (Ant. xv. 103 BJ i. 214), built a temple to Augustus and set in it the emperor's bust. The first year that it came into his possession, 3-2 B.C., Philip the Tetrarch founded his new town, and called it Caesarea after Augustus (Ant. xviii. 21 BJ ii. 91); coins in De Saulley, Vom de la T. S. 313 ff. pl. xviii. So it came to be known as Philip's Caesarea (Ant. xv. 91), or as Caesarea Panias (see the coins). When Philip died the Romans administered the district directly, both before Agrippa I. to whom it was given, and in the interval between him and Agrippa II., who embellished it and changed the official designation to Nepanias in honour of Nero (Ant. xv. 94). The town's full title was 'Caesarea Sebaste. Sacred and with Rights of Sanctuary under Pantheon' (De Saulley, pl. xviii. 8). Later the name Caesarea was dropped and Panias survived, the Arabs when they came changing it to its present form of Binnas. A shrine of El-Khidr (= Elias = St. George) now occupies the site of the temple to Augustus.

Jesus is said to have come not to the town itself, but to the parts (τὰ μέρη, Mt. 16:13) or villages thereof (Mk. 8:27). Probably he avoided it as he avoided other Gentile centres

(e.g. Tiberias) established by the Herods, but in the great saying which he is said to have uttered in this neighbourhood, 'Thou art Peter and on this rock will I build my church,' it is possible to see some reference by contrast to the heathen worship founded upon that cliff of immemorial sanctity above the source of Jordan.

In the Jewish war Vespasian rested his troops in Caesarea (Jos. BJ iii. 97), and in celebration of the close of the war Titus and Agrippa II. exhibited shows on a large scale (ib. vii. 21). In Christian times Caesarea Philippi was the seat of a bishop; and Eusebius (HE 6:35) relates that the woman whom Christ healed of an issue of blood (Lk. 8:43) was a native of the town, where a statue commemorated her cure. Castle and town were the subject of frequent contests by both sides during the Crusades. For further details see Rol. Tal. 'Panias'; Schurer, Hist. iii. 132; Stanley, SP 391; GASm. HB 473 ff.

CAGE Cages (or rather wicker-baskets, cp Am. 8:2) for confining birds in are mentioned twice in EV (see FOWLS, § 101): (1) in Jer. 5:27 the houses of the wicked are as full of (the grains of) deceit as a cage (עֵרֶב erib = אֶרֶב ereb, AV^{ms} 'עֵרֶב', πᾶρες [BNAQ]) is full of birds; and (2) in Eccles. 11:30 the heart of a proud man is like a decoy partridge in a cage (or basket, עֵרֶב erib [BNA], cp Ar. kerib [כֶּרֶב], a fruit-basket), cage (עֵרֶב) for lions also is mentioned in Ezek. 19:6 (see 1:105).

CAIN (קַיִן; [za]kanacim [B], [zanaw] aketi [C], קַיִן: קַיִן [A], [zanaw] aketi [1.], a town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:35), may possibly be the mod. Yaken, 3 m. S.W. from Hebron (PEF PA 314, 371; but see GASm. HB 473). Cp AMALIK, § 1.

CAIN (קַיִן: קַיִן [ADEL], 1:17). In Gen. 4 have accounts of two different Cains, linked together by the editor. The proof of this will be briefly indicated below (§§ 2-4); it will be convenient to treat first more ancient and simpler of the two stories.

1. Cain is the name of the hero who in Gen. 4:1-8 is represented as the founder of the city of Enoch¹ (Hannok). The name of Cain

Gen. 1:7 ff. 50 ff. evidently comes from an early, though not a genuine Hebrew, tradition; an old document (50 ff.) gives it as CAINAN (277). Its native meanings are 'smith', 'artificer' (Ar. kinan, Arak, kinana);² for the connection with kānāh, 'to produce' (also 'to acquire'), suggested in Gen. 4:1,³ is philologically difficult. The more general sense 'artificer' suits best for Cain the city-builder, and the more special 'smith' for the second part of the compound name Tubal-cain. Both these names are attached to heroes who at the outset of the tradition must have possessed a divine character (see CAIMUS, §§ 5, 10).

2. The central figure of the narrative in Gen. 1:26-7 is also called Cain.

2. The nomad of Gen. 4:2-16. The story has come to us in a somewhat abbreviated form. Its substance is as follows. Once upon a time Cain and his brother Abel sacrificed to Yahwe. Cain, being a husbandman, brought of the fruits of the ground; Abel, as a shepherd, offered the fat parts of some of his first-born lambs (cp Nu. 18:12). Both, as was usual in ancient religion, looked for a visible sign that their gifts were accepted. What the expected sign was the summary to which they resorted, we are not told (cp WRS Rel. Sem. 217), and we may pass over later conjectures. At any rate, we learn that only Abel's sacrifice was accepted (cp Am. 4:1-3). Now Cain, had he been wise, would have demeaned himself humbly towards Abel, for who can say to God, 'Who dost thou?' (Job 9:32). Instead of this, he cherished evil thoughts, as an oracle, perhaps sought by Cain, warned him: 'And Yahwe said to Cain, Why art thou wrath? and why is thy countenance fallen? Surely, if thou dost well, thou shalt be accepted; but if thou dost not well, thy sin must cause thee to fall: from irritating words abstain, and thou shalt be thyself.' And Cain quarrelled with his brother Abel, and when they were in the open country, Cain and Abel assaulted his brother Abel, and slew him. Then follows a fresh oracle, containing a curse upon Cain, who is condemned, not only to banishment (cp Rom. 11:26), but also to a life of restless wandering. The curse, however, is mitigated by the promise of protection against outrage, by means of a 'sign' which will indicate that Cain is under the care of Yahwe.

According to the older commentators, with whom

where a better reading is עֵרֶב 'his helmet' (Kau. HB 1, P. H. P. Smith, after Khe.).

3 For exclaims, עֵרֶב עֵרֶב עֵרֶב עֵרֶב, 'I have wrought, I produced, a man with the help of Yahwe.' This can hardly be right; עֵרֶב is too vague, and the variations of the commentators prove their dissatisfaction with the text. On Marti's view considering that עֵרֶב is one of the words meaning 'to create' (see Qol Qol, § 30), we may assume that Cain in the pride of her motherhood, likens herself to her God and says, 'I have created a man even as Yahwe.' Targ. Onk. reads עֵרֶב

even Delitzsch must be grouped, this is the same Cain as the founder of the first city, and he is also the first-born son of the first man.

This view is critically untenable (see KINSHIP, § 2), mainly on account of the improbability of the course of events which it assumes.

The first man lies here, as we know, driven out of Paradise for disobeying his divine command. According to the traditional view, however, his first-born son Cain is so little impressed by the punishment that he murders his own brother. More than this, he becomes the direct ancestor of another murderer, who apparently goes unpunished, and who is also contrary to the spirit of Gen. 4 a polygamist. Now note another point. The original dwelling of Cain is not, as we are to suppose was that of the first man and his wife after their expulsion from Paradise, in the east of the garden of Eden (see 3.4), but in a cultivated and well-peopled land where Yahweh is worshipped with sacrifices, and holds familiar intercourse with men (even with Cain).

Apparently S. Paley (see 1.16) is right. Nor is there any curse upon the ground which Cain tills; it is his own self, banished from the land, who drives him unwiltingly into the land of wandering, i.e., into the desert. There, however, without any explanation, he gives up his unsettled life, and advances further in civilisation than before. He builds a 'city.' This is no less to be explained by the ingenious remark that even nomads in Arabia have central market-stations (Ar. karyā, plur. kharā), for 'city' is evidently used as a general term; Cain is as much a city-builder as Nimrod, and only as such, for, upon Budge's theory, as the father of a city-builder) could he hold a place in the Hebrew legend of civilisation. How are these inconsistent statements to be reconciled? Every possible way has been tried and has failed. It was high time to apply the key of analysis; and no one who has once done this will wish to re-imagine past theories (see KINSHIP, § 2).

It may be assumed, then, that the story of Cain and Abel once had an independent existence, and circulated at one of the sanctuaries of Southern Palestine. It is probably not a borrowed

4. Origin of story. Canaanite myth, but an independent Israelitish attempt to explain the strange phenomena of nomad life—the perpetual wandering in the desert and the cruelly excessive development of the custom itself a perfectly legitimate one, according to the Israelites) of vengeance for bloodshed. As Robertson Smith (following Wellhausen) rightly remarks, Cain is the embodiment of 'the old Hebrew conception of the lawless nomad life, where only the blood-fend prevents the wanderer in the desert from falling a victim to the first man who meets him,' and the mark which Yahweh sets on Cain's person for his protection is 'the short or tribal mark' (cp 27.1), without which the ancient form of blood-fend, as the affair of a whole stock, however scattered, and not of near relatives alone, could hardly have been worked' (cp KINSHIP, § 1 f., and CURTIS, § 1). Now we can guess why the nomad of the story is called Cain; Cain is the eponym of the Kenites

5. Source of name. (who are in fact called Ken; but cp AMALEK, § 6 f.), whose close alliance with the Israelites and location in the wilderness of Judah are well known. That the Kenites should be so well acquainted with a more civilised mode of life, and yet adhere to their nomadic customs, was a surprise to the Israelites,¹ and the story of Cain and Abel grew up to account for it. Nothing but a curse seemed to explain this inveterate repugnance to city life, and a curse implied guilt; while the unbridled vindictiveness of the nomads (see Gen. 4, § 2 f.) was explicable only by a compassionate command of Yahweh, who after all was the God of the Kenites as well as of the Israelites, so that the distinguishing mark of this tribe was also a sign that its members worshipped Yahweh and were under his protection. Cain, then, represents the nomad tribe best known to the Israelites. He is contrasted with Abel (i.e. the 'herdman'; see ABEL [i.]), because the pastoral life, when combined with a fixed domicile, seemed to the Israelites the ideal one. That the Kenites themselves would have sanctioned this portrait of their eponym is not probable. They presumably represented him with some of the noble features attributed to a hero of solar origin. We cannot, therefore, say with Wellhausen (PSRL 1122) that the story of Cain and Abel is a fragment of Kenite folk-lore.

To the number of the Yahwist circle who worked up the two (not to say three) Cain stories together we may ascribe 4.1-23, and the words 'on the east of Eden' in 4.16. The addition of the latter words converts 23 in the poetical phrase 23.178, 'land of wandering'—derived presumably from the old tradition—into a prosaic proper name, which is boldly identified by Sayer and Boscawen with the land of the Mandae or nomads (see 1.1), the mountain ranges of Kurdistan and Turanistan. The original narrator meant presumably the land between Judah and Edom, where the Kenites lived.

The above contains some of the points of Stade's essay, 'Der Kenitismus' (Z. f. d. L. u. v. d. A. 1877 ff. 1. 187-241), which is the most complete critical treatment of the subject. Cp Hausman, 'Israel und Kenan' (ibid. 76, pp. 2-23).

CAINAN. or rather, as in 1 Ch. 12 and RV, KENAN (17.1), KAINAN [RAI] p. 1. The son of Enosh (Gen. 5.14). That Kenan is a humanised god has been shown already (see 1.16, § 11). Cain and Kenan are forms of one name (Ken and Kenan). 27.1 or 27.2 may be added, the name of a god in Hittite inscriptions (Z. f. d. L. u. v. d. A. 3186, Z. f. d. L. u. v. d. A. 3243).

2. A son of Arphaxad in AV 9.1 of Gen. 10.24 (Kainan 10.11), and therefore in RV 9.1. The name is due to an interpolation, made in order to bring out ten numbers in the genealogy of Gen. 11.1-26. The real tenth from Noah, however, is Lamech, the father of Abraham.

CAINITES, the name generally given to the descendants of Cain mentioned in Gen. 4.1-24. Tradition, as Ewald said long ago, is the commencement and the native soil of all narrative and of all history, and its circle tends continually to expand, as the curiosity of a people awakens to fresh objects, and as foreign traditions are intermixed with those of home growth. Questions about the origins of things are especially prone to crowd into the circle of tradition, and, when the various traditions respecting remote antiquity come to be arranged, it is natural to connect them by a thread of genealogy. There is a real, though but half-conscious, sense among the arrangers that what is being produced is not history but a working substitute for it, and so there is the less scruple in taking considerable liberties with the form of the traditions, many of which indeed, being of diverse origin, are inconsistent. The Hebrew traditions, in particular, were evidently filled with a desire to bring the traditions into harmony with the purest Hebrew spirit. In minor matters they agree with the traditionalists of other nations; in particular they limit the superabundant material for genealogies by the use of round numbers, especially ten.

Much progress has been made in the study of Gen. 4 and 5 since Ewald's time; but that profound critic has

1. Hebrew Tradition. the credit of having already noticed that the story of Cain and Abel is not as early as the genealogy which follows. This conclusion may now be taken as settled; Gen. 4.1-24 and 17.24 are, generally speaking, derived from separate traditional sources.¹ Both sections are indeed Yahwistic; but the tone and character of their contents is radically different.

The true meaning of Gen. 4.17-24 was seen first by Wellhausen. The section contains relics of an Israelitish legend which made no reference to the destruction of the old order of things by a deluge, and traced the beginnings of the existing civilisations. The legend is partly based on nature-myths, for the Hebrews were not as unmythological as Renan once supposed. Their myths, however, were to a large extent borrowed when the Hebrews stepped into the inheritance of Canaanite culture, they could not help adopting in part the answers which the Canaanites had given to the question, 'Whence came civilisation?'

The Canaanite culture-legend is unhappily lost, but the fragments of Philo of Byblus (Miller, Fr. Hist. Gr. 3 260 f.), when critically treated, reveal some of the elements of two Phoenician culture-legends, in one of which the invention of the useful arts and of occupations was ascribed to divine beings, whilst in the other it was ascribed to men (Günther, Die griech. Kultur u. Mythen, I 27 ff.; cp PROPERTIUS). Berossus, too, as far as we can judge from fragmentary reports, appears to have accounted for knowledge of the arts by a series of manifestations of a divine being called Oannes, which took place in the days of the first seven antediluvian kings of Babylon (Lenormant, Les Origines, I 388 f.). This substantially agrees with the statements of the tablets that the bringers of culture were the great gods, such as Ea, 'the lord of wisdom,' and his more active firstborn son Marduk (Merodach), the creator. A striking confirmation of this is supplied by the mythic story translated by Pinches (see CHATTON, § 16 (1)), where Marduk is said to have made, not only the Tigris and the Euphrates, but also cities and temples.¹ City-building is in fact everywhere one of the characteristic actions of humanised nature-deities (Osiris, Jemshid, etc.), and it would be inevitable that the civilised Canaanites should trace the origin of cities to semi-divine heroes (ἡρώων γένος ἀνδρῶν, II, 12 (1)), if not to the creator himself. Still, though the Canaanitish culture-myth is lost, we may be sure of one point, viz., that it was largely influenced by Babylonian myths, the supremacy of Babylonian culture in Palestine at a remote age being amply proved by the Amarna tablets.

When, therefore, we find in Berossus² a list of ten antediluvian kings at the head of the mythic history of Babylonia, it is not unnatural to suppose that the genealogy of the ten patriarchs in Gen. 5, to which the shorter one in Gen. 11 is so closely allied, is derived from it, and to attempt conjectural identifications of the Hebrew and of the Hellenised Babylonian names. This course, which has been adopted by Hommel, the present writer does not think it prudent to take, (1) because we are ignorant of the phases through which the Berossian list has passed, and (2) because of the violent hypotheses to which this course would often drive us.

By taking the Hebrew names, however, one by one, and using Babylonian clues it does not seem hopeless to reach probable results. CAIN, for instance, the name which meets us first, means 'artificer.' Can we avoid regarding this as the translation of a title of the divine demigod, borrowed from Babylonia through the medium of the Canaanites?

Moreover since ENOCH, the son of Lamech, evidently belongs to the same legend, and indeed shares with his father the honour of the foundation of the first city³ (to which his own name is given), we cannot hesitate to regard Enoch too as of divine origin. This view, indeed, is as good as proved if the statements

² Lamech constructed the house, he built the city, he built the city of Nether, he built E-kara the temple, he built the city Enoch, he built E-sanna the temple.

in Gen. 5:22-24 (P) are traditional! We are told Enoch lived 365 years (a solar number) 'that he was with God, and (then) disappeared, for God had taken him.' The number is attested alike by the Hebrew Sam. and the LXX text, and even if we lay but stress on that, the phrases quoted seem unmistakably primitive, and imply that, in the original form of the story, Enoch was a semi-divine hero who at the end of his earthly days was taken to the paradise of Eden. When, too, we consider the clear parallelism between Enoch and Noah, and between Noah and Nimrod (Patriarchism), the hero of the Babylonian Flood story (see DEUGÈ, § 2), it becomes reasonable to identify Enoch with Par-napistim's great visitor in Paradise, who went there to obtain healing for his leprosy, whose name is perhaps most correctly read Gulganes, 'the game,' like Enoch is a divine being — whether regarded him as a hero who becomes a hero, or (more plausibly) as a god who becomes a hero, is a matter of indifference. And like Enoch he is associated with a sun.⁴ As Enoch in the Hebrew tradition is the ancestor of Noah, so (inverting the relation) Par-napistim the Babylonian Noah, is the ancestor of Gulganes. The latter is said to have crossed the 'waters of death' to pay a visit to Par-napistim in Paradise, and we may presume that, in the earlier form of the Hebrew narrative, his counterpart (whose original name was certainly not Noah) received the same reward as Enoch — 'walking with God.' Both Par-napistim and Enoch are also Enoch (as we may infer from the emended text Ezek. 28), and as is expressly stated in the Book of Enoch, which has a substitution of gemme, even though, tradition⁵ has been initiated into secret lore and knows both the past and the future. Lastly, Enoch gave his name to the city of Enoch, which at any rate implies lordship (cp 'city of David,' 2 S. 5:7; 'house of Sennacherib,' KB 239; and see 2 S. 12:25); and perhaps in the primitive myth was even represented as a builder. So Enoch, of which the ideographic name is Uruk or Uruk i.e. the dwelling, is incidentally called in the epic 'the city of Gulganes,' Gulganes being at once its king and (according to an old text) a builder.⁶ Why the Hebrew compiler did not adopt Gulganes as well as Uruk from his Babylonian informant,⁷ we cannot tell. The foundation of the

² The Chaldeans at first estimated the duration of the astronomical revolution of the sun at 365 days, afterwards at 360 days. To this they accommodated their civil year of 360 days by means of an intercalated cycle (Lenormant, Les Origines, I 380). Cp YERGEN, § 5.

should be noticed that rain in Tubal-cain is wanting in U. 10. 3. 1 [AEL. 1]. Probably it was added to explain why the hero was regarded as the father of smiths. Tubal is, in fact, probably a pale form of the god of the solar fire, Gibil or Nusku; but, of course, he is not only a fire god. Like Gibil and like Hephaistos (see Roscher, Lex.), he is the heavenly smith (U. 10. 1 calls him yaAvee, a term which in U. 15. 10 is applied to Hephaistos), and was perhaps once addressed in the words of a famous Babylonian hymn:—

"Gibil, renowned hero in the land, — valiant, son of the Abyss, exalted in the land, — Gibil, thy char' d'ne breaking forth, — when it lightens up the darkness, — assigns to all that bears a name its own destiny : — the copper and tin, it is thou who dost mix (?) them, — gold and silver, it is thou who meltest them, —"

We may well suppose that in the earliest form of the Hebrew legend Tubal was the instructor of men in the art of getting fire. According to Philo of Byblos, fire was discovered by three 'mortal men' called Light, Fire, and Flame, and was produced by rubbing two pieces of wood together. 'This,' remarks Robertson Smith,² 'is the old Arabian way of getting fire, and indeed appears all over the world in early times, and also in later times in connection with ritual. Probably some ritual usage preserved the memory of the primeval fire stock in Phœnicia.' 'There was no such ritual usage among the Israelites, and so the legend of the invention of fire disappeared.

Jabal and Jubal have names descriptive of occupations, and evidently of Palestinian origin. The former is

11. Jabal, Jubal. וַיִּבְרָא אֱלֹהִים אֶת-יָבָל וְאֶת-יֻבָל [A]. וַיִּבְרָא אֱלֹהִים אֶת-יָבָל וְאֶת-יֻבָל [I]. וַיִּבְרָא אֱלֹהִים אֶת-יָבָל וְאֶת-יֻבָל [E]; Jabal: Gen. 1.24) is the reputed ancestor of tent-dwelling Jubal, is the reputed ancestor of tent dwelling shepherds. His name describes him, not as a 'wanderer' (Dilm. very questionable), but as a herdsman (cp. Heb. ṣṣṣ, Phoen. ṣṣṣ, 'ram'); it is another form of the name Ami (ṣṣṣ, end). The latter, Jubal (ṣṣṣ); ṣṣṣ[Ami]; Jubal; Gen. 4:21), is the 'lather' of the guild or class of musicians (cp. ṣṣṣ, Ex. 19:13, 'ram's horn'). That the inventor of the kinor and the ugab should be the younger brother of the first shepherd, is certainly appropriate. One of the thirty-seven 'Ami, or Asiatics, represented in the tomb of Immi-hotep (see Musie, § 8, JORRIN, § 10) as describing admission into Egypt, carries a lyre. (We must not quote the parable of David, for Ami, 16:14-23 does not recognise him as a shepherd; see DAVID, § 10, not.) Jubal, however, is less appropriate in this company, partly because of his lofty origin, partly because smiths belong more naturally to agricultural and city life.

The three names Jalah, Juhah, and Tuhah stand outside the genealogy proper, just as Shem, Ham, and the genealogical thread the editor indicates that a new and broader development is about to begin (Ewald). How is it, then, that the Camite genealogy as it stands contains but six names? The parallel table in chap. 5, which has virtually all these names, adds three to them at the beginning, and one at the end. Now it is remarkable that the three pre-ved names are also given in 1.25 f. It is not improbable (cp. 6) that this passage in a simpler form—omitting 'again,' 'another,' and 'instead of Abel,' etc., and adding 'and Enos begat a son, and called his name Cain'—once stood before 4.17, and that Noah, who is the son of Lamech in 5.28 f., once took the place of Tubal, Jubal, and Tubal. This would make the table begin Adam, Seth, Enos, Cain, and close Lamech, Noah. We might also restore it thus,

Enos (= Adam), Seth, Kenan . . . Lamech, Japheth, Noah. This would have the advantage of retaining the founder of the pastoral mode of life as the father of founder of agriculture, but seems to involve the exclusion of Jubal and Tubal. We might, more naturally perhaps, suppose that Jubal and Jubal were additions from another cycle of legends, and that earliest genealogy began with Cam and ended with Tubal, both originally divine beings. We should then get a genealogy of seven. In any case we must retain the common view that 1 Es. 5. is a fragment of a Yahwist table which traced the genealogy of the Sethtite side of the first family, and that the Sethtites, according to Yahwist, were good, the Camites bad. There is valid evidence that the genealogist wished to represent any of the Camites as wicked, or that culture was opposed to religion. Cam, the city-builder, was worthy son of Enos, who was the first to use forms of worship (see Enosis). For there was no more tripartite religious act, from a primitive point of view, than the building of a city. (For the continuation of this subject see SETHTITES.)

CALAH (כַּלַּח; χάλαιχ [-], -κ [EL], καλαχ [P]; 12 χάλεκ [I]; Chaleh; Ass. Kalnu, Kalah) is named in Gen. 10:11*f.* as one of the cities originally founded by Nimrod in Assyria. Ashūr-nāṣir-paḏ, king of Assyria, ascribed its high standing, at any rate as a capital, to Shalmaneser I. (KRI 1:16 ff. 132-135). Layard, Rassau, and G. Smith proved by their excavations of the mounds of Nimrod 20 m. S. of Nineveh (Kuyunjik) that the city lay in the fork between the Tigris on the W. and the Upper Zab on the E. Protected on two sides by these rivers and on the N. by hills, fortified by a long N. wall with at least eight towers, it was a strong city.

The town was an oblong, well supplied with water by a canal led through a covered conduit from the Upper Zib, and richly planted with orchards and gardens. At the S.W. are the remains of a platform, built of sun-dried bricks faced with stone, 600 yards from N. to S., by 400 yards wide, and 13 feet above the level of the Tigris, which once washed its western face. On this platform stood palaces built or restored by the kings Shalmaneser I., Ashurnisir-pal, Shalmaneser II., Tiglath-pileser III., Sargon, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal. At its NW corner stood the zikkuratu or temple-tower, 107½ feet square at the base and still 140 feet high. Next to it was the temple of Nebo, but in the Sargonic period Nimip was the town-god (AB 4 133, no. 1, l. 10).

Of municipal history, apart from the history of the country, we know little.

Calah was faithful to Shalmaneser II. during his son's rebellion (AB 1 176, ll. 45-50), but revolted from Ashurnipal in 746 B.C. (AB 1 172). It was clearly the court residence under the above-mentioned kings; but in the official lists it never stands first (cp. Eponym lists AB 1 208 ff.). As a centre of population it evidently was inferior to Assur, and totally eclipsed by Nineveh. When Ashurnipal rebuilt the town and palace, finished the great wall, and endowed Calah with its canal, he populated it with captives.

Like other great cities of Assyria and Babylonia, Calah probably had its archives which, with the literary collections of the kings, formed the nucleus of a library.

Few tablets have hitherto been found at Nimrud, and it is inferred that Sennacherib removed the Calah library to Nineveh. Many astrological and omens tablets in the Kuyunjik collection were executed at Calah for Nabu-zakopkeni, 'principal librarian' (AB 1 176, ll. 1-3). For explorations and identification of site cp. Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, G. Smith's Assyrian Discoveries. For further discussions respecting library, see G. Smith, Chaldean Genesis,² C. H. W. J.

CALAMOLALUS (καλαμολαλος [N]), or Calamocalus (κακαλος [B]), 1 Esd. 5:2, represents the 'Levi' (see LXXIII HANNU' of Ezr. 2:33). Neh. 7:37. ² has ἀγγελοφύλαξις.

CAL (כַּל) occurs in Cant. 4:14 Ezek. 27:10, and 'sweet calamus' in Ex. 30:23 Is. 43:24 (RV^{ms}; but EV 'sweet cane' in Is.), for the usual RE D (q.v., 1 f).

CALCOL (כַּלְכָּל; on the name see MAHOL; χαλχαλ [A]), a son of Zerub. b. JUDAH, 1 Ch. 26 (χαλχαλ [B], χαλχαλ [L]) clearly the same as the son of Mahol of 1 Ch. 4:31 [51], AV CHALCOL (χαλκαλ [B], χαλκαλ [L]). See MAHOL.

CALDRON. AV rendering of the following words:—כַּלְדָּן 1 S. 2:14 Mi. 3:3, so RV; כִּי־יִרְדֹּם 2 Ch. 35:14, so RV — for all of which see COOKING, § 5; and אֲנָשִׁים Job. 41:25 [12]. RV RUSHES (q.v., 2).

CALEB (כִּלְבִּי, § 66; on the meaning see below; χαλεβ [BAL]; gent. כִּלְבִּי, 'Calebite,' EV 'of the house of Caleb,' 1 S. 25:1 Kt. [ΚΥΝΙΚΟΣ (BAL)], see NABAL; Kt. reads כִּלְבִּי; cp. the similar variant in Judg. 1:15 ² BAL. χαλεβ κατα την καρδιαν αγνης).

No. 17166 40:164, n. 1, (86), finds the sense 'raging with canine madness,' objecting to Robertson Smith's identification with כִּלְבִּי, 'dog' (see J. Ph. 989; Kin. 203, 206).

1. Name. Dog-totems, nevertheless, were not impossible in the ancient Semitic world (see DOK, § 4), and a connection with כִּלְבִּי was early surmised (see NABAL, n.). We find the name Kalbā in Babylonian contract-tablets as late as the times of Nebuchadnezzar II. and Cambyyses (AB 4 109 20 f.). Hommel (AHT 115) makes kalbu or kalabu mean 'priest'; while Sayce (Early Hist. Heb. 206) compares kalbu as used in Am. Tab. (e.g., 54, 18) for 'officer, messenger' (but this is improbable). The name seems to be primarily tribal.

Caleb was a Kenizite clan which at, or shortly before, the Israelite invasion of Western Palestine established itself in Hebron and the region south of it, and in the course of time

2. Early History. coalesced with its northern neighbour, the tribe of Judah (naturally, not without admixture of blood; cp. Maaseh, Caleb's concubine, 1 Ch. 24:8). The line KENAZ, to whom Caleb and OPHNI belong (Nu. 32:12 Judg. 1:13 f.), were of Edomite extraction, and the Calebites were nearly related to the nomadic Jerahmeelites in the south-eastern quarter of the Negeb (1 Ch. 2, etc.); see JERAHMEEL. (On the Kenites, see below, § 4.)

How Caleb came to be settled in what was regarded as the territory of Judah, is variously described (Josh. 15:13, cp. 116 f. 12, etc.). According to Josh. 15:1 f. (cp. Judg. 1:10 f.), Caleb invaded from the N., in company with Judah, the region which he subsequently occupied (see ASAK); but in the story of the spies, in the oldest version of which Caleb alone maintains the possibility of a successful invasion of Canaan from the S. and receives Hebron as the reward of his faith¹ (see NUMBERS), we seem to have a reminiscence of the fact that Caleb made his way into the land from that quarter. In David's time Caleb was still distinct from Judah (1 S. 30:14 γαλαδ [B], χαλχ [L]); for the conjecture that David was a Calebite prince, see PAVIN, § 4, n.).

On the other hand, in the list of the spies (Nu. 13:6 f.), and in the commission for the division of the land

3. Pre-exilic. (Nu. 31:10 f.), Caleb the JEPHTUNITE appears as the representative of Judah, a chief (emir) of that tribe;² and in the post-exilic genealogical systems, Caleb and Jehuamel, 'sons of JHIZON' (q.v., n. 1 f.), are great-grandsons of the patriarch Judah (1 Ch. 2:4 f. JEPHTUNITE 1 Ch. 1:1, CALEMIT [L], 12 f., 42 [χαλχαλ, A] f.), whilst Kenaz becomes a son of Caleb (1:13).

These representations reflect the fact that, in uniting with Judah, Caleb became the leading branch of that exceedingly mixed tribe. The Chronicler indeed hardly knows any other Judahite stocks than these Hezronites.

The seats of the Calebites in pre-exilic times are to be learned most fully from 1 Ch. 2:42 f., where we find set down as sons and grandsons (branches) of Caleb the well-known cities and towns, Zaph, Mareshah (so read for MISHA), Hebron, Lappath, Jokbeah (so for JOKBEAM), Maon, Beth-zur; for Maon and Carmel cp. also 1 S. 25:2 f. The clan had possessions also in the Negeb (1 S. 30:14).

After the fall of their old territory was chiefly in the possession of the Edomites, and the Calebites were pushed northwards into the old seats

4. Post-exilic. of Judah. This situation is reflected in another stratum of the composite genealogy (1 Ch. 2:18-24, 50-55, cp. 10), where Caleb takes Ephraim (the region about Bethlehem) as a second wife (observe the significant name of the former wife AZUBAH [q.v.]; cp. also JEROTAH). Through his son Hur the clan falls into three divisions: Shobai, Salmai, and Hareph, the fathers of Kijath-parim, Bethlehem, and Bethgader. The further notices of the subdivision of these clans are fragmentary and complex (see BETHGADER, JAMUZ, SHOBAL). It is at all events noteworthy that the passage concludes with the end of a list of Kenites, and a connection between these and the Calebites becomes plausible if CHUTTER and RECHAB in 1 Ch. 4:11 f. are indeed errors for Calel and Rechab (cp. Meyer, Entsch. 147).³

It is not improbable that the names Azbuk, Colhozeh, Rephaiah b. Hur (temple-repairers, etc., temp. Nehemiah) are of Calebite origin (ib. 147, 167).

See further KENAZ; also Kienien, Bibl. Ist. 1:135 ff., 175 ff., Gratz, Die Kehniten oder Kalebiten, MGGW 25:461-492, and especially We. De Gent. 1: CH 337 f.

CALEB-EPHRATAH, RV Caleb Ephrathah (כִּלְבִּי עִפְרַתִּי), is mentioned in 1 Ch. 2:4 f. as the place where Hebron died. Wellhausen and Kittel, after ² BM (καλ μετὰ τὸ ἀποθανεῖν εφρων [εφρων, A; -ν, L.] ὁ καλεῖται ἐν εφραθὰ [L. εἰς ὁδὸν χαλχ εἰς εφραθὰ]), read: 'after the death of Hebron, Caleb came into Ephraim the wife of Hebron his father' (⁴ We. De Gent. 1:1). Jostermann (Gesch. 112) thinks it more natural to read STEGEN (for Caleb).

⁴ I.e., כִּלְבִּי for כִּלְבִּי; אֵבִי, (4), thus disappears.

CALF (כֶּלֶב, Ex. 32, etc.; מֹדֶסֶס, Rev. 47). See CATTLE, § 2 a-c.

CALF, GOLDEN. Portable images of a bull overlaid with gold occupied, down to the time of the prophets, a prominent position in the equipment of the Israelitish sanctuaries. We hear of them in the great sanctuaries of the northern kingdom; in Dan¹ and Bethel, where they are said to have been set up by Jeroboam (1 K. 12:28 ff. 2 K. 10:29 Hos. 10:5); in Samaria, the capital of the kingdom (Hos. 8:5 f.); and perhaps also in Gilgal (Am. 5:4 f. Hos. 4:15 9:15 12:11 [12]). On the other hand, there were none in the temple of Jerusalem (which had the brazen serpent; see NECHESITAN), and, strange to say, we do not find any allusion to such images as existing in the other sanctuaries of Judah—either in 1 K. 14:21-24, where such reference would have been apposite, or in Amos or Hosea. The list named in particular, who pursued the calf-worship of the northern kingdom with such bitter invectives (8:5 f. 10:5), would hardly have been silent on the subject had the same worship prevailed in Jerusalem also. Though Judah appears to have participated, more or less, in the cultus at Bethel, the worship of such images seems to have been confined chiefly to the northern kingdom.

The bulls belonged to the class of images called כֶּלֶב ('molten images'; see Idol., § 1 c), which might be either solid or merely covered with a coating of metal. To the latter class the golden bull of Jeroboam (Hos. 13:2) probably belonged (see Idol., § 4 f.). Because of the value of the metal it is not probable that the images were of great size. Hence we can understand the choice of the word כֶּלֶב, 'calf': not the youth but the small size of the animal represented is the point to be conveyed—not perhaps without an implication of contempt.

As for their origin, these images were originally foreign to the Yahwé religion. To the nomads of the wilderness, who did not breed cattle, the idea of choosing the bull as an image of divinity could hardly have occurred. On this ground alone the narrative of the golden calf made by Aaron in the wilderness (Ex. 32 JE) can prove nothing for the origin of this form of worship in Mosaic times. Apart from the impossibility of making such an image in the wilderness, the narrative seems rather to be intended as a scathing criticism on the absurdity and sinfulness of bull-worship as viewed from the prophetic standpoint. According to the Deuteronomist, Jeroboam was the originator of bull-worship; but it is hardly likely that he would have introduced an entirely strange image into the sanctuaries of his kingdom. Probably the older Decalogue (Ex. 31:17; cp 20:21), in speaking of 'molten images' as distinguished from plain wooden images, referred to images of this description, which also are intended perhaps by the images of Micah (Idol. 18).

It has often been held (e.g. by Renan and Maspero, and doubtfully by Koenig) that bull-worship may have been an imitation of the worship of Apis at Memphis or of Mendes at Heliopolis; but the Egyptians worshipped only living animals, and in any case the adoption from Egypt is unlikely. The nomad inhabitants of Goshen took over from the Egyptians hardly anything of their culture and religion. On the other hand, the religion of Israel shows the strongest evidence of Canaanite influence. Among the Canaanite bull was the symbol of Baal; the cow, the symbol of Astarte; and these symbols were taken over from the Phoenicians by the Greeks. Thus the probability that the Israelites derived the practice from the Canaanites. They changed the significance of the symbol, seeing in them a representation of Yahwé and conquering might and strength (Nu. 23:22 24:8). This in the time of Jeroboam such worship was regarded allowable, the so-called older decalogue certainly forbids all idolatrous worship of Yahwé. Hosea rails the worship of the bull (8:5 10:5). The Deuteronomist, too, in the Book of Kings regards the calf-worship of Jeroboam as an apostasy to idolatry. He emphatically describes bull-worship as 'the sin of Jeroboam, wherewith he made Israel to sin' (1 K. 11:16 15:26 1 2 K. 10:29 etc.). To the Apis-worship of Egypt have but one reference—in Jer. 46:15, where we should probably read 'Why hath Apis fled? (why) hath the stealer not stood firm?' See ARIS.

CALNEH (כַּלְנֶה). 1. (χαλάννη [AD³¹], γαλάννη [E]). A city included in the earlier kingdom of Nimrod (Gen. 10:10 [J]). See NIMROD, § 1, SHINAR. Rawlinson (Anc. Monarchies, 118) identifies it with Nippur, supposing that the Talmudic statement, 'Calneh means Nippur' (Jerusa. 104), represents a genuine tradition. The context, however, shows that it is a pure guess; כַּלְנֶה is connected with כַּלְנֶה, a Greek loan-word (καλνή) meaning 'bride,' and כַּלְנֶה with כַּלְנֶה, the old Hebrew for 'bride' (see Levy). Pressel (PR 1:2) claims a consensus of critics for identifying Calneh with Gesehon NE. of Babylon, on the left bank of the Tigris (see Targ. Jer., Ephr. Syr., Euseb., Jer.), which Pliny (6:30) places in the province of Chalonitis. This conjecture, too, may be dismissed.

The inscriptions alone should be consulted; and, since none of the ordinary names of the Babylonian cities resembles Calneh (or Calno), we are justified in examining the non-Semitic (ideographic) names. Among these we find Kul-nun ('dwelling of offspring'), which, in Assyrian times, was pronounced Zar-la-ba or (in an inscription of Hammur-rabi) Za-ri-lab. The situation of Zarlaba is uncertain (see Del. Par. 2261); but the fact that Sargon mentions Zarlaba at the end of a list of Babylonian cities which apparently proceeds from south to north (AB 2:52 f.) suggests to Hammett that it was not far from Babylon (Die semit. Völker, 12:4 f.). To Fried. Del. in 1876 (Chald. Gen. 203) this identification appeared certain. It is, indeed, not improbable, especially if we may point כַּלְנֶה (cp C as above, and כַּלְנֶה); but we should like some fuller evidence that Kul-nun was really remembered as the old name of Zarlaba.

2. (καλὸν πάντες, as if כַּלְנֶה), a N. Syrian city, conquered by the Assyrians (Am. 6:2, on which see ARIS, § 6 [A]). See CALNO.

AMOS, § 6 [6]) and CANNER [צנר]—(rather Calneh) in Ezek. 27:23.

It confounds it with CALNEH [1], and connects it with the building of the 'tower', which, since Babylon is mentioned just before, can only mean the tower of Babel (see BABEL); it is not improbable that it identifies Calneh with Borsippa, according to the Talmudic tradition that the tower of Babel was at Borsippa. This is, of course, worthless. The Hebrew text was corrupt; צנר was misread צנר, 'fort'; צנר became צנר, 'Arabia'.

Doubtless Calno is Kullani, a place near Aipad, conquered in 738 by Tiglath-pileser III. (Tiele, Wi., Fried. Del., Ch., Kittel).

phetic passages; Mt. 34 Mk. 16 etc.; see also DROMEDARY). The Hebrew name¹ is common to all the Semitic languages, which proves that the animal was known before the parent stock divided—one of the facts from which Hommel and others have inferred that the original home of the Semitic race was in Central Asia.² The name was borrowed by the Egyptians; it passed also into Greek and Latin, and most modern languages. The origin of the word is uncertain; von Kremer (Sem. Cultur-ethnogen. 4) connects it with Ar. jamaḥa, 'to heap,' as meaning the 'humped animal'; whilst Lagarde (U. chers. 49) follows Bochart in his etymology from צמל, 'to require,' the name thus indicating the revengeful temper often shown by the animal.

In the frequent mention of the camel in the historical books of the OT there can be little doubt that Camelus dromedarius is meant (see below, § 6), though an Israelite ambassador may conceivably have seen a two-humped camel at Nineveh or Babylon.³ We naturally expect to hear of its use by the Arabian⁴ and other nomad tribes; and accordingly the Ishmaelites (Gen. 37:25 [1]), the Midianites (Judg. 6:3), and the Amalekites (1 S. 15:3 27:1) all turn up before us as possessors of camels. The mention of them in connection with Job (Job 1:3), and with the Queen of Sheba (1 K. 10:2), also needs no comment. David's camels (1 Ch.

¹ צמל, kīrāh, like the Ar. bakr (Lane, 1246) and Ass. bakru (Del., Ass. Dict.) denotes the 'young camel,' 1 S. 10:6 Jer. 22:3 (RV 10:6). EV renders less aptly DROMEDARY (27:3). The word צמל, ahāstērānū (Esth. 8:10 14, AV 'camels,' RV 'swift steeds'), is rather an adj. qualifying 'swift steeds'; so RV 'swift steeds that were used in the king's service' (cp Pers. kishatā, realm; BDB Lex.). The reading, however, is disputed. See Hulse, § 2.

⁵ Both they and their cattle were numberless, says the narrator. So too the Reubenites carry away 50,000 camels from the Hagrites (G. Ch. 521). Precisely so Tiglath-pileser II. states that he had taken 30,000 camels as prey from the Arabs (6 p. Hommel, B. R. 1 663), and Assur-bani-pal says that he took so many camels from the Kedarites that camels were sold in Assyria for from 14 (silver) shekels to half a shekel (AB 2225). 27:3) may have been kept for purposes of trade; they were put under the charge of an Ishmaelite, who from his calling bore the name of Othel. Other kings may have followed David's example; Hezekiah's camels were carried away by Sennacherib (Is. 37:36). That Syrians should have used them (2 K. 8:9) is natural; but in the hilly region of Palestine the camel cannot have been a common quadruped. It is true this animal appears again and again in the patriarchal story, and there is no difficulty in supposing that Jacob acquired camels in Mesopotamia. There is, however, great difficulty in the statement (Gen. 12:16) that camels formed part of a present given to Abraham by the pharaoh (see below, § 3 f.).

The camel's saddle is mentioned only once, Gen. 31:34 (צמל צמל, ṣāḥmāra, EV 'the camel's furniture'), and derives its name from its round basket-shaped form. See LITTER, SADDLE.

The flesh of camels was unclean food to the Israelites (Dt. 17:1 Lev. 11:4). By the Arabs, on the other hand, camels were both eaten and sacrificed (WRS Rel. Sem. 218).

[The assertion that the ancient Egyptians knew the camel is unfounded. The picture of a camel on one of the (Ethiopian) pyramids at Meiræ (Lepsius, Denkm. 3:25) and on Greek terra-cotta figures—e.g., of a travelling Arab (not, as has been supposed, an Egyptian) in Mariette (Monum. 2:14)—and the references in Greek papyri, prove nothing more than that the animal was known in Egypt in Roman times. It is surprising that it never appears earlier—e.g., in representations of battles with the nomadic Semites who rode on camels. The Egyptian artists evidently disliked to represent the animal not because of its ungainly appearance, for they have rather a fancy for delineating strange creatures, but out of religious antipathy (WMM 1. c. u. Eur. 142). The statement that the camel is mentioned in Papi. Anast. i. 235 is groundless. The passage contains an evaluation of the Asiatic princes, awe-struck at the bravery of an Egyptian soldier—

'a-ba-ta ka-ma 'd-ṣa-lā-ma-sha-ra n'-nu, which seems to mean, 'Thou art lost (צמל צמל) like God (צמל צמל) a hero (צמל) indeed (Ar. nd'ām). Even if this explanation³ be rejected, the idea of Chabaz (Forage, 220) that the Asiatics are here calling for 'camels' meat' is most ridiculous. The other passages appealed to refer not to the camel (the pretended kamaly) but to a large species of monkey (kap, kr), which is said to come from Ethiopia (where there were no camels in 1300 B.C.; see above), and is described as docile—learning an amusing kind of dance, and carrying its master's walking-stick. See the passages collected by WMM (1. c. u. Eur. 370), and the judicious remarks of Wiedemann, SB. I 13 (2). Even the Egyptian name of the camel צמל (plural צמל) is foreign (not from gamel [Lagarde, U. chers. 49] but from an original ga* ṣab), and does not seem very old. W. M. M.]

[The difficulty of the narrative in Gen. 12:16 is very great so long as it is assumed that it correctly represents the Hebrew tradition. Supposing, however, that the mention of the pharaoh were due to a misunderstanding, and that the early Hebrew tradition knew only of a visit of Abraham

1 Roman period? Even in Persian times orthodox Ethiopians were apparently deterred from using the animal by fear of contracting ceremonial defilement. The more southern tribes had no camels; see, e.g., Mariette, Mon. de l'Égypte 14, 87. The animal can hardly live in the regions S. of Meiræ.

² E.g., in Grenfell, Greek Papyri (245 etc.), camels appear frequently in the Fayum, about 100 A.D. It is, however, significant that they sometimes bear 'Arabia' as brand-marks (1. c. 50 c.). The camels on the roads to the Red Sea (Petrie, Koptoi, 27, 21; Strabo, etc.) were driven by the desert-tribes.

to the land of Musri (see MIZRAIM, § 2 [3]), the difficulty arising from the mention of camels in Gen. 12:16 would disappear. The difficulty of Ex. 9:3 (J), where a murrain is predicted on pharaoh's cattle including 'the camels,' cannot, however, be removed by such an expedient. Here it appears simplest to suppose that the narrator gave a list of those kinds of animals which, from a Palestinian point of view, would be liable to the murrain.

Two proverbial expressions about the camel occur in the Gospels (the one in Mt. 19:24 Mk. 10:25 Lk. 18:25, the other in Mt. 23:24). The reading καμήλος (a rope?) for καμήλος has been suggested for the former. It is as old as Cyril of Alexandria and is evidently the conjecture of a non-Semitic scribe (see Nestle, Exp. T. 9:174). καμήλος is correct. Analogous proverbs can be quoted—e.g., 'In Media a camel can dance on a bushel' (Jeham. 4:5 a)—i.e., all things are possible.

As has been indicated above there are two species of camel. One, the Camelus dromedarius, is found in SE. Asia ranging from Afghanistan and Bokhara through NW. India, Persia, Arabia, Syria, and Asia Minor, and in N. Africa; this species reaches its most southern point in Somaliland. The second, or Bactrian, camel, C. bactrianus, lives in the high plateaus of central Asia. Both species are said to exist wild, but it is generally thought that the herds found in a state of nature are descended from domesticated animals and are not truly feral. This view is supported by the recent observations of Sven Bedin. They have been introduced into many parts of both the Old and the New World, and where the climate has proved suitable have been very useful as beasts of burden.

Numerous breeds of the C. dromedarius are found in the East, and show as great diversities in character and use as do the various breeds of horse. The breeds, many of which are distinguished by a complex system of branding, may be roughly divided into two classes: the riding, called in Egypt and Arabia Haghi and in Indian Savari, and the baggage animal, called respectively the Camel and Unt. The word dromedary is often restricted to the former animal, which often maintains a pace of 8-10 miles an hour for a long period, whereas the baggage camel rarely exceeds 3 miles an hour. Riding a camel for any length of time usually induces sickness, the movement of the two legs of each side together producing a most unpleasant swaying motion. Enormous herds, such as we read of in the OT, are still kept by the natives both of the Sudan and of NW. India, and breeding stables exist in many parts of the East. Camels produce but one young at a time and the period of gestation is twelve months; the young are suckled for a year or longer. The average length of life seems to be considerable—from forty to fifty years—and if well treated the camel will continue to work hard until well over thirty.

The power which it undoubtedly possesses of doing without food is to some extent dependent on the hump; when the animal is underfed or overworked this structure begins to disappear and the condition of the hump is thus an unfailing sign of the state of its health. Similarly the power of doing without water is due to a structural peculiarity of the two first compartments—the rumen and reticulum—of the complex stomach of the camel. Each of these chambers has its wall pitted into a series of crypts or cells which are each guarded by a special sphincter muscle, and in these crypts a certain amount of water is stored—perhaps two gallons at most. The fluid can be let out from time to time to mix with the more solid food. Camels ruminate, and their masticated food passes straight into the third division of the stomach. In spite of this provision for storing water, no opportunity should be lost of watering camels, as it is most inadvisable to trust to this reserve, and they are apt to overdrink themselves if kept without water for too long a time. The stories about travellers saving their lives by opening the stomachs of camels when dying of thirst are probably imaginary; the camel exhausts its own supply of water, and even if a little be left it is quite undrinkable. Their flesh is eaten at times by natives, who consider the hump a delicacy. Their dung is used for fuel in the desert.

From the earliest times the hair of the camel has been woven into fabrics. The hair from the hump and back is torn or shorn and woven into a tough, harsh cloth; but a finer, softer material is also prepared from the under-wool. The milk is consumed by the natives, who both drink it and convert it into butter and cheese.

Although the camel has been domesticated from a very early date, and although, without its aid, vast regions of the world would prove untraversable, and consequently it has always been the servant of man, there is considerable divergence of opinion as to the real character of the animal. Perhaps the latest writer, Major Leonard, may be quoted as one who has had sixteen years' practical observation and experience of camels in India, Afghanistan, Egypt, and the Sudan; he says, 'To sum up the average specimen of a camel. He can abstain from any water—the latter more especially—longer than any animal. He is stupid and patient to excess, submissively tenacious to a degree, docile and obstinate to a certain extent, vindictive and passionate when roused, not easily excited, usually alarmed, though at times liable to a panic or stampede—in an animal in fact whose characteristics are every way peculiar as his structural peculiarities. CAMON (כָּמוֹן; פֶּאֶרְמֹוֹן [3], -מָוֹן [A].

כָּמוֹן [1]), an unknown locality in Gilead; the place of JAIR (q.v. 1) (Judg. 10:5). It was doubtless of the HAVVORH-JAIR (q.v.). Reland (674) rightly combines it with the Καμὸν which, in 217 Antiochus III, the Great captured along with Pella, Gefran (Polyb. v. 70:12). To the W. of the place identified by Buhl with the ancient Gefran or Efron (q.v. i. 2) in N. Gilead, and 1 m. S. of the high road from Irbid (Arbela) to the Jordan, lies a village with name, Kameim, 'little summit,' is doubtless a corruption of the ancient Kamōn.

Eus. and Jer. (25:22-26 110:20) identify Camon with a place in the 'great plain' called καμμόρα, Camora, situated 6 R. N. of Legio, on the way to Ptolemais. This καμμόρα, however, which is evidently Tell Kaimin (see JORNEAN), is clearly on the wrong side of the Jordan.

CAMP (מַחֲנֶה; ΠΑΡΕΜΒΟΛΗ [BADEFI], G. 32:13 Ex. 14:19 11:13 13:11). A camp is so called from the camping of the tents over their own

1. Military. the camping of the tents over their own pants (צָנָה; cp. מִלְחָמָה).² The term (מַחֲנֶה) is applied primarily to an assemblage of tents, nomads (Gen. 32:1[24], EV 'company'; Nu. 13:16 EV 'camps'). Of the early Israelitic nomad camp we have no contemporary records; Doughty (1. 12: 1221 2305) observes that some Bedouin tribes pitch dispersedly and without order; others in a circle, to protect the cattle. The latter style is that of the מַחֲנֶה (duwair), of which we hear in Gen. 25:16 Nu. 31:10 1 Chr. 6:39 [54] Ezek. 25:4 (AV 'castle,' but in Ezek. 'palaces' RV 'encampment').

The military camps of a later age are referred to elsewhere (see WAR). Suffice it to remark here (1) that the encampments of the Hebrews were probably nomadic rather than square: this was a legacy from their nomadic state (see above); the barricade which surrounded the camp was called מַחֲנֶה (1 S. 17:20 26:5, AV 'trench,' RV 'place of the wagons,' mg. 'barricade'; in 17:20 G¹ and in 26:5 Aq. and Sym. or Theod. στρογγύλας Tg. מַחֲנֶה—i.e., χαλκικαία—i.e., a 'round' line of defence, cp. מַחֲנֶה 'round').⁴ Also (2) that their camps have left no impress on names of places, as the Roman castra has on English place-names. MAHANAH DAV [q.v.] owes its name to a misunderstanding. We do find, however, the strange archaizing phrases, 'the camp of Yahweh' (2 Ch. 31:2) and 'the camp of the Levites' (1 Ch. 9:13; cp. Nu. 2:17 P), in connection with the description of the temple services. Is. 29:1 has been thought to describe Jerusalem as the camp—i.e., dwelling—of David (so BDB); but this is far from certain; the prophecy of Yahweh's encampment against Jerusalem is thereby obscured.

This leads us to speak of the camp in the wilderness, as conceived by P (Nu. 1-11). Of course, it must be historically true that there was a sacred

2. In the wilderness (P). tent in which the ark or chest containing the sacred objects of the Israelitic nomads was placed when the Israelites halted in their wanderings (see ARK, 4). This tent, glorified into the so-called Tabernacle (see TABERNACLE), forms the

The positions of the various tribes are given in Nu. 2, on each side of the tabernacle, but separated from it by the Levites, three tribes encamp – a leading tribe flanked by two other tribes, with their ensigns (770). Thus on the E. is Judah flanked by Issachar and Zebulun; on the S. Reuben flanked by Simeon and Gad; on the W. Ephraim flanked by Manasseh and Benjamin; and on the N. Dan flanked by Asher and Naphtali. It has generally been held that the four leading tribes were distinguished by the possession of large standards (77), whereas the other tribes had only smaller ensigns (770); but this rests perhaps on a misinterpretation of 77, which, as the contexts and, in part the versions show, means a company; see the discussions in JOR 11 (193) 210–11, and in Exodus.

The Eastward is manifestly regarded as the superior position; the relative importance of the remaining three positions is less obvious; but it may be observed that the E. and S. sides are occupied by the children of Leah (exclusive of Levi) together with Gad; the W. by the children of Rachel, and the N. by the children of the handmaids (exclusive of Gad).

the modern Kefr Kennā, a hamlet almost 3½ m. NE. of Nazareth, with a fine spring, and Khirbet Kana or Kana't el-Gelil, on a promontory of Gelil Kana over the plain of Baitan, about 8 m. N. of Nazareth, with ruins, tombs, cisterns, and a pool.

The name Kanat el-Gheil is not above suspicion; it may be the creation of an early ecclesiastical tradition, just as Robinson himself points out that an attempt has been made by the native Christians in the present century to transfer it to Ketr Kemna. On the other hand, Josephus resided for a time in a village of Galilee, called Cana (174, 16); if this be the same as his residence in the plain of Asochis (id. 41), he means Kanat el-Gheil.

As a geographical term Canaan shares the infiniteness that characterises much of the OT, and is used of all ancient, geographical names.

the identification of Canaan with Phœnicia, which is also in accord with the usage of the term Kana'ani in the Amarna Tablets (§ 10 below), the term Canaanite comes to be associated with the mercantile activity of Phœnicia, and in consequence appears occasionally—as, e.g., in Hos. 12:8 15:21²—in the general sense of merchant. According to Lagr. and many moderns, it has this sense likewise in Zech. 11:1; Wellhausen and Nowack would add, emending in accordance with Qv, Zech. 11:7 n.

The indefiniteness and the shifting character of both the geographical and the ethnical terms point to political changes in which were involved the people to whom the term Canaanites was originally applied;

3. Geographical inference.

indeed, the indefiniteness is the direct outcome of these changes. Analogy warrants us in assuming as the starting-point a more limited district, and that with the extension of Canaanitish conquest or settlement the term became correspondingly enlarged, though it is not necessary to assume that the correspondence between actual settlement or possession and the geographical application of the term Canaan must have been complete. The predominance of Canaanites in important sections of the W. Jordan lands would have sufficed for imposing their name on the whole district.

The Egyptian inscriptions come to our aid in enabling us to determine where to seek for the origin of the term.

4. Egyptian evidence.

In the accounts of their Asiatic campaigns, which begin about 1800 B.C., the rulers of the Nile restrict the name Ka-n'-n to the low strip of coast that forms the eastern limit of the Mediterranean; and, since it is only the northern section of this coast that affords a sufficiency of suitable harbours for extensive settlements, it is more particularly to the Phœnician coast-land that the name is applied. From the Phœnician coast it naturally came to be extended by the Egyptians to the entire coast down to the Egyptian frontier, the absence of any decided break in the continuity of the coast leading to the extension of the nomenclature, as it led in later times to the shifting character of the southern boundary of Phœnicia proper. The name of Philistia for the southern part of the coast does not occur in the

5. History of Name.

Egyptian inscriptions. It was from the coast, therefore, that the name was extended to include the high lands adjacent to it; and it is interesting to note that, whilst the geographical term never lost its restricted application to the coast strip, the ethnographical term Ka-n'-ne-nu—i.e., Canaanites—embraces for the Egyptians, according to Müller (J. S. u. Eur. 206 f.), the population of all of Western Syria, precisely as in biblical sources. The combination of the Egyptian with the OT notices seems to justify the conclusion that the coast population sent into the interior offshoots which made permanent settlements there. In this way both Canaan and the Canaanites acquired the wide significance that has been noted, whilst the subsequent tendency towards restricting the name to the sea-coast is an unconscious return to the earlier and more exact nomenclature.

The etymology of the term Canaan bears out these historical and geographical conclusions. In the Egyptian inscriptions (cp. also above, § 11: the word appears with the article—'The Canaan'—which points to its being a descriptive term; and, even though we agree with Moore (P. IOS. 1800, pp. lxxv-lxx) that the testimony is incomplete, the use of the stem gn in Hebrew in the sense of 'to be humbled' suggests the possibility that this stem may, in some other Semitic dialect, have been used to convey the idea of 'low,' even though that may not have been the original sense of the stem. If we keep in view the prefixing of the article to the term, and its original application to a strip of land between the sea and the mountains, no more appropriate designation than 'the lowland' can well be imagined; and this exp. of Canaan, though not unanimously accepted, is at least provisionally tenable.¹ Certainly it seems to be an ancient one; for when it is said that the Canaanite is the one who dwells by the sea and along the side of Jordan (Nu. 13:29) i.e., in the two 'lowland' of Palestine—the very artificiality of the indicated suggests that it was the etymology of the word led the writer to such a view in contradiction to some other passages where Canaanites are spoken of as occupying mountainous districts also.

By the side of the term Canaan, however, there is the OT another which is used, especially by the LXX, to cover precisely the same population, namely, 'the land of the Amorites' (Gen. 15:2). The merit of Steinthal (Z. f. Psychologie, 12:207) and of E. Meyer (Z. f. Phil. [81]) to have definitely demonstrated this important point. See AMORITES. At the same time, it is borne in mind that when the coast-land is specifically referred to, the term Canaan for the coast or Canaan for the northern and Philistia for the southern. Whether the Yahwist (J) is equally consistent, as Meyer claims, in using 'Canaanite' for the pre-Israelitish population of the W. Jordan land open to question. The theory cannot be carried through without a certain amount of arbitrariness in the distinction of the verses belonging to J and E respectively. McChesney's note, Hist. Proph. Mon. 14:6-8.

7. Amorites in OT.

Moreover, the cuneiform documents and Egyptian inscriptions furnish an explanation for the difference in nomenclature that places the two terms on a somewhat different light. From the Egyptian side it is clear that the term 'Amorite' was limited to the mountain district lying to the east of the Phœnician coast-land but extending across Jordan to the Orontes (WMM, J. S. u. Eur. 217). The southern and the eastern boundaries are not sharply defined. The former is placed by Müller, on the basis of Egyptian inscriptions, at the entrance of the plain of the so-called Be'el—between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanus, and, whilst the Orontes might seem to furnish a natural eastern boundary, it would appear that the early Egyptian conquerors extended the limit still further to the east. At the time of Thothmes I. the Hittites had not yet made their appearance. Later, in the days of Ramesses III., when the Hittites for the most serious menace to Egyptian supremacy in Western Asia, the Orontes becomes a more definite boundary of the 'Amorite' district, while as the Hittites encroach upon the territory of the Amorites the term Hittite begins to displace 'Amorite' for the northern mountain district of Palestine. This process is completed about 1000 B.C. At the same time, however, the term 'Amorite' has already been extended to the southern range of Palestine—not by the Egyptians, but by the Babylonians and Assyrians. It is in cuneiform documents of (about) the twelfth century that we first come across the term 'land of A-mur-ri' (as the sign must be read, instead of A-har-ri, as was formerly supposed). Nebuchadnezzar I., king of Babylon, whose date is fixed at circa 1127, calls himself the conqueror of the 'land of Amor'; and Tiglath-pileser I. of Assyria, whose reign coincides in part with that of Nebuchadnezzar, names the great sea of the Amorite land as the western boundary to his conquests.

Long ere this, however, as the use of the Babylonian language in the Amarna tablets (circa 1400 B.C.) shows, the term 'Amorite' had already been extended to the southern range of Palestine—not by the Egyptians, but by the Babylonians and Assyrians. CANAAN, CANAANITE

Babylonia had come into close contact with the Phoenician coast and the interior. As a matter of fact, one of the earliest rulers in Southern Babylonia of whom we have any record, Sargon I., whose date is fixed at 3800 B.C., is declared, in a tablet presenting a curious mixture of 'omens' and historical tradition, to have penetrated beyond the western sea (i.e., the Mediterranean), and there are indications that he actually set foot on the island of Cyprus (see Max Olmefalsch-Richter, Kipros, 83). Sargon speaks only in a general way of having proceeded to the 'west' land; but the ideographic designation in the text in question—MAR.TU—is the same as that which the later Assyrian rulers employ for the territory which includes Canaan in the proper sense. The same compound ideogram is the ordinary term for 'west' in the legal literature of Babylonia; and the suggestion that it is also to be read Amurru—MAR being a playful acrologism of Amur and TU, indicating perhaps direction—is plausible. In any case there appears to be some close connection between MAR.TU and the name Amurru.¹ The text in which Sargon's western conquests are spoken of is probably of a very much later date than Sargon himself; but the value of the tradition, and at all events of the geographical nomenclature, is unimpaired by this fact. The Amarna tablets, which constitute the remains of Egyptian archives of the fifteenth century B.C., confirm the great antiquity of the term Amurru. In the letters to their royal master written by officers under Egyptian suzerainty, the term is of not infrequent occurrence, and an examination of the passages proves that it is applied, just like the corresponding term in the Egyptian inscriptions, to the mountainous district lying immediately to the east of the coast-land of 'Canaan' in the Egyptian sense—i.e., of Northern Palestine. The eastern limits are again not sharply defined. In the period to which the Amarna tablets belong, the Hittites are beginning to extend their settlements beyond the Orontes; but between 'Hatti' and 'Amur' land there was a district known as Nahāsi, which reached to Damascus. This may, roughly, be regarded as the eastern frontier of the 'Amurru' district. The agreement between the Egyptian and the Amarna nomenclature extends to the term 'Canaan,' which, under the form Knāhhi, is found in the Amarna tablets to the northern 'lowland' or sea-coast. It was quite natural that, from being applied to the interior district of Northern Palestine, the term 'Amurru' should come to be employed for the interior of Southern Palestine as well, just as the Egyptians extended the application of 'Canaan' to the entire Palestinian coast. When the Assyrian conquerors in the ninth century begin to threaten the Hebrew kingdoms, they include the dominion of the latter under the land of 'Amurru.' The term 'land of Israel' occurs only once in Assyrian inscriptions, and even this passage is not beyond dispute. Again, since the 'Amurru' district in the proper sense was the first territory that the earliest Babylonian and Assyrian conquerors set foot in after crossing the Orontes, it also happens that the term becomes for them the most general designation for the 'West.' On the other hand, it must be noted that this development in the use of 'Amurru' is directly due to Babylonian influence, and forms part of the heritage bequeathed to later times by the period of early Babylonian control over the land lying to the west of the Orontes.

10. In Amarna tablets.

The comparatively late period when Assyria, usurping the place formerly held by Babylonia, begins her conquests, the 'Amurite' power in Northern Palestine was seriously threatened by the Hittites (p. 75). In extending their settlements beyond the Orontes they encroached upon 'Amurite' territory. The distinct traces of this westward movement of the Hittites are to be found in the Amarna tablets already mentioned. Indeed, the movement forms the key to the political situation of Palestine in the fifteenth century B.C. The Assyrian conquerors accordingly, when proceeding to the West invariably began their campaigns by a passage of arms with the Hittites. This, taken together with the waning strength of the 'Amurites,' led to another change in the geographical nomenclature—the extension of the term Hatti or Hittite to Northern Palestine as far as the Mediterranean, so as to include, therefore, Phoenicia proper. For Southern Palestine the older designation 'Amurru' held its own, and the differentiation thus resulting between 'Hatti' and 'Amurru' assumed a practical significance which was quite independent of the original application of the two terms.

It will have become evident from this sketch of the early fortunes of Palestine that care must be exercised in drawing conclusions from geographical nomenclature. The Hittite power does not extend to the sea-coast because of the extension of the geographical term, and so the ethnographical application of Amurite cannot be determined from the geographical usage.

That 'Amur' originally designated a particular tribe, or possibly a group of tribes, settled chiefly in the Anti-libanus district, is one of the few facts to be deduced from the early Egyptian monuments. These Amorites of Northern Palestine are frequently represented by the Egyptians as a blond people with a cast of countenance that marks them off from what are generally considered to be Semitic traits (see Petrie, Racial Types from the Egyptian Monuments). It would be hazardous, in the face of our imperfect knowledge, to enter upon further speculations as to their origin. There are good reasons for believing that already at a very early period the population of Palestine presented a mixture of races, and that through intermarriage the dividing lines between these races became fainter in the course of time, until all sharp distinctions were obliterated. Hence the promiscuous grouping—so characteristic in the Hexateuch—of Amorites with Perizzites, Hivites, Hittites, etc., of northern and southern Palestinians, without any regard to ethnic distinctions. The problem of differentiating between these various groups whom the Hebrews encountered upon settling in Palestine is at present incapable of solution. Future discoveries will probably emphasise still more strongly the heterogeneous character of the tribes. Their unorganised condition made them a comparatively easy prey to conquerors and yet difficult to exterminate. The early Babylonian and Egyptian conquerors were content with a general recognition of their supremacy on the part of the inhabitants. Native Palestinians were retained in control, and all that was demanded was a payment of tribute from time to time. When, however, the Hebrews permanently settled in Southern Palestine, about 1200 B.C., the early inhabitants lost much of their political prestige. In the course of time, also, many of the groups were reduced to a state of subjection, varying in degree, but in all cases, except in the case of the inhabitants of the coast, sufficiently complete to prevent any renewal of former conditions. With the successful establishment of the Kingdom of Israel in the lands to the west of the Jordan, the history of the pre-Israelitish inhabitants comes to an end in Southern Palestine, except so far as the influence of these Canaanite groups upon the religious life of the Israelites is involved. The Hittites in the north, of course, survive; but the other groups, including the Amorites, gradually disappear, either sinking into a position of utter insignificance or amalgamating with the Hebrew tribes (see GOVERNMENT, § 15 f.; ISRAEL, § 3). The frequent injunctions in the Hexateuch warning the people against intermarriage with these conquered groups are clear indications that such intermarriages must have been common.

A new element in the ethnographical environment of Palestine that appears simultaneously with, or shortly before, the invasion of the Hebrews is represented by the Philistines, who, coming (it would appear) from some island or coast-land to the west of Palestine, succeeded as a sturdy seafaring nation in making settlements along the inhospitable southern coast of Palestine. Their non-Semitic character has been quite definitely ascertained; but, once in Palestine, they appear to have exchanged their own language for one of the Semitic dialects spoken in the land to which they came. It is rather curious that these Philistines, who generally lived in hostile relations with the Hebrews, and at various times threatened the existence of the Hebrew settlements, were eventually the people to give their name to a district which they never possessed in its entirety. In the latest Assyrian inscriptions, however, Philistu still appears in its restricted application to the southern coast-land, and it is not until the days of the Roman conquest that the equation 'Palestine = Philistia + Canaan' becomes established.

On the basis of the Egyptian and the Assyrian inscriptions and of the OT, the history of Canaan may be divided into three periods: (a) the pre-Israelitish period, from about 3800 B.C. to the definite constitution of the Israelitish confederacy; (b) the Israelitish supremacy from circa 1100 B.C. to circa 740; (c) decline of this supremacy, ending with the absorption of Canaan by Assyria and Babylonia 587 B.C. After the return of the Hebrews from the so-called Babylonian exile, the history of the north and south becomes involved in the various attempts to found a universal empire, undertaken in succession by Persia, Macedonia, and Rome.

The characteristic note in the history of Canaan down to the period of Persian supremacy is the impossibility of any permanent political union among the inhabitants. Even the Hebrews, united by a common tradition and by religion, yield to the inevitable tendency towards political division instead of union. This tendency stands in close relationship to the geographical conditions (see G.A.Sm. Hist. Geogr.). The land is split up into coast-land, highland, and valleys; in consequence of which, it presents climatic extremes sufficient to bring about equally sharp contrasts in social conditions. The resulting heterogeneous disposition of the population appears to have rendered united action (except in extreme necessity) impossible even among those sections most closely united by blood and traditions. [For further details regarding these three periods of Canaanitish history see the articles ISRAEL, § 6, HITTITES, PHILISTINES, etc.]

CANALS (כְּנָעִים), Ex. 7:19 Nah. 3:8 RVmg. See EGYPT, § 6. The Hebrew word denotes the arms or canals of the Nile (כְּנָעִים). On artificial water-courses in Palestine see CONDUITS.

CANANÆAN (ὁ ΚΑΝΑΝΑΙΟΣ [Ti. WH]), cananæus [Vg.], כְּנָעִי [Pesh.], the designation applied to Simon the apostle (Mt. 10:4 Mk. 3:18 RV; mg. 'Zealot'). The word does not mean an inhabitant of Canaan (so AV CANANITE, based upon TR κανανιτης), which in Gr. is usually expressed by χαναναίος (χ 21); nor has it anything to do with Cana. It is a transliteration of כְּנָעִי, the pl. of כְּנָעִי (cp Bib. Heb. כְּנָעִי), which in Lk. 6:15 Acts 1:13 is represented by the Gr. equivalent ζηλωτής, ZEALOT (q.v.).

CANDACE (ΚΑΝΔΑΚΗ [Ti. WH]), queen of Ethiopians (Ἀθιοπῶν), is incidentally mentioned in Acts 8:27. For the kingdom of Ethiopia which continued to maintain its independence against the Roman empire see ETHIOPIA. Its queen was often called Candace, this seems, indeed, to have been regarded as an official title, somewhat like 'Pharaoh' (or rather 'Phobmy' in Egypt). The name occurs in hieroglyphics on a ruined pyramid near ancient Meroë: see Lepsius, Denkmaler, v. pl. 47 (pyram. 20 of Begeraunh). There the queen is called Ammentaryt and Khetke. It is difficult to say which of the two or three queens called Candace was buried in that tomb.

1. Strabo (820; see also Dio Cass. 53:2; 54:5) speaks of one-eyed virago Candace (της βασιλίσσης . . . Κανδακῆς, ἡ ἥσας ἔφευγε τὸν Αἰθίοπων, ἀνδρική τις γυνὴ πεπηρωμένη τὸν ὄφθαλμόν) who in 22 B.C. attacked Egypt, overpowered three cohorts of Roman soldiers stationed at the first cataract, and devastated the Thebaid, but was easily defeated by the legate Petronius, and pursued to her northern capital, Napata, which was destroyed. 2. Pliny (6:35) seems to refer the reign of Candace ('regare fermam Candacem') to the time when Nero's explorers passed through Nubia; his assertion that the name had become somewhat common among the queens of Meroë ('modis uenit, jam omnis ad reginas transit') usually pushed much too far against the monumental evidence.

The Ethiopian officer of Acts 8 cannot well have had any connection with the Candace of Strabo; but his mistress may not improbably have been the contemporary of Nero.

Nero's explorers reported the southern capital as in ruins, consequence of internal wars between the Ethiopians; most likely, the royal residence had already been shifted S. to Wad-es-Sofra and Soba, where ruined palaces and temples of the Late style have been found, but the kingdom appears still to have taken its name from the capital Meroë where the kings were, at least, buried.

For the condition of the Meroitic kingdom at that time and the part played by the queens (or rather kings' mothers), see ETHIOPIA.

CANDLE (ῥ; ἄγνυος). Job 18:6 Mt. 5:15 etc.; cp below, and see LAMP.

CANDLESTICK, the EV rendering of (1) מְנֹרָה Ex. 25:31 etc. (ἄγνυς), the well-known candlestick of the temple, and (2) Aram. nebrastā נְבִרְסְתָּא (deriv. uncert.). Dan. 5:5 (ΛΑΜΠΑΔ [Theod.], φῶς [G.]), to the former of which the present article will confine itself, leaving to the articles LAMP and TYPHON further remarks upon the use of lights in temples or shrines, and of lights (and 'candlesticks' or rather 'lampstands') for secular purposes.

There is no critical evidence to support the supposition that the temple candlestick described by Pin Ex. 25:31 ff.

1. Not pre-exilic. 37:17 ff. existed before the Exile. On the contrary, an old passage 1 S. 31:11 (written, perhaps, at the beginning of the seventh century B.C. [Bu.], SBOT; cp SAMUEL, i. § 3 (a)) speaks only of a 'lamp' (ῥ) which seems to have burnt from night-fall until the approach of dawn. Solomon, it is true, is said to have had ten golden menoroth in his temple, five on either side (1 K. 7:49 ff. 1, 2) but they are not mentioned in 2 K. 25:14-17 (in the Jer. 52:19 their introduction is due to a glossator), nor do we find any trace of them in the temple described by Ezekiel (Ezek. 40:6 ff.), or in the restoration of temple-treasures by Cyrus (Ezra 1:6 ff.).³ These facts, as well as internal evidence, support Stade's conclusion that the passage in 1 K. is an interpolation (ZATW³ 3:162 ff. [83]. OT 1:230; cp Now. HT 2:40 n. 2, and Benz. ad loc.). The ten candlesticks of the temple of Solomon have probably been evolved from the imagination of a later scribe, who seems to have adopted the number ten to agree with the ten 'bases' (7522); cp 1 K. 7:49. Obviously it is no real objection to our view of the critical value of 1 K. 7:49 that the Chronicler mentions candlesticks of gold and silver among David's gifts to Solomon in 1 Ch. 28:15. That this verse in its present form has suffered amplification appears from a comparison with 6.

Tradition held that these ten candlesticks (Jos. augments the number to 10,000; 1. Ant. viii. 37) either were already present along with the Mosaic candelabrum, or were exact copies of it (cp 2 Ch. 17, 25:22). Naturally Solomon's great wealth was considered a sufficient explanation of the otherwise curious fact that, whereas he employed ten candlesticks, the Mosaic tabernacle and the second temple were content with one. Pamudbar Rabbah, 15, adds that the candlestick was one of the five things taken away and preserved at the destruction of Solomon's temple.

The candlestick of gold, called also the 'pure candlestick' (Lev. 24:4), is described at length by 1 in Ex.

2. Description. 25:31 ff. (= 37:17 ff.) It was placed outside the veil, in front of the table of shewbread (see the Vg. addition to Nu. 8:2). The menorah comprised the 77 (AV shaft), 77 (branch, καλαμίσκος), 77 (AV bowl, RV cup, κρατήρ, zyphus), 77 (knop, σφαίρωτήρ; Targ. Pesh. 'apple'), 2 and 77 (flowers, κρίνον [similarly Targ. Pesh. Vg. 'lily']), perhaps collectively 'ornamentation.' The workmanship was 77 (beaten-work) or ronpessé (so 8 τοπετός; but στέρεός in Nu. 8:4 Ex. 37:14 ff.); Jos., on the other hand, has κεχαιρωμένος, 'cast'. From an upright shaft three arms projected on either side. Each branch comprised three cups described as 77, 'shaped like [or ornamented with] almonds' (ἐκτετυγμένον καρίσκον — see Atmnd), together with kistur and perah. Under each pair of branches was a kistur (Ex. 25:35), and four sets of kistur and perah were to be found 'in the candlestick' (77, i.e., on the shaft, v. 34). These four may have included the three of v. 35, in which case the fourth was between the base and the lowest pair, or near the summit. Possibly, however, the four sets came between the topmost pair of branches and the summit (cp the illustration in Rehnd De Spolius Templi, facing p. 35). The centre shaft in Zechariah's vision was surmounted by a bowl (4:2 Σ2 καυράδιον).

From Jos. (Ant. iii. 67) we learn that the candelabrum was hollow, and comprised σφαίρα, κίρα with πόσκει and κρατήριον, seventy ornaments in all.³ It ended in seven heads 'καταλαλαί', and was situated obliquely (ἀνὰ ὄψιν) before the table of shewbread, and thus looked E. and S. S's version of Ex. 37:17 ff. (differing widely from the present MT) supplies the interesting statement that from the branches (καλαμίσκος) there grew three sprouts (θαλασσοί) on either side 'ἐξισομενοί ἀλλήλοις'. Rabbinical tradition (cp Talm. Menaḥ. b. 28A, Alar-

1 77 (Ex. 25:31 37:17 Nu. 8:4) is difficult. RV renders 'base'; so Pesh. (77 [i.e., βάσις], 77); but AV finds support in 8 Vg. (caulode, hastile, stipes), and in Ex. 37:17 correctis (used also of the 77 'staves' for carrying the ark). 77 when used of inanimate objects denotes the 'stalk' (cp Ex. 40:22 24 Lev. 1:11 Nu. 32:35 2 K. 10:14). The specific mention of the 'base' of the candlestick accordingly seems uncertain, unless perhaps we should read 77, 'stand', 'base' (cp 2 Ch. 6:13), instead of 77. On the other hand, the candlestick may have had originally no base (cp above, § 4).

3 It is difficult to see how he obtains this number. Six branches each with 3 sets of gobit, kistur, and perah (32 ff.), including the shaft with 4 similar sets (v. 34) and the 1 kistur (v. 35), amount to 63 (34+12+1). Perhaps to this we must add the figure at the summit of the central shaft (possibly ornamented in a different manner). The artist in a Hebrew MS. of the first half of the thirteenth century (Brit. Mus., Harley, 5710, fol. 136A), following a different interpretation of 1x. 25:33, assigns only one perah and kistur to each branch, including the shaft. Each of the seven branches has 3 gobit in, and at the extremity a lamp (77). Below the kistur joining the lowest pair of branches the artist has drawn (reckoning downwards) a perah, a kistur, and a gobit.

Israel, Rashi, etc., on 1x. 2x.) maintained that the candelabrum stood three ell in height and measured two ell between the outer lights; and that it stood upon a tripod (M. Menah. b. 28A; cp Comius, Epist. fac. vi. 22 ff.). The seven lamps were provided with pure olive oil (Ex. 27:20 f.), and for the general service were supplied 'bongs' (77), 'small dishes' (77), and various 'oil vessels' (77).

77. The lamps were to be tended daily (Ex. 30:7 f.); but tradition varied as to how many were kept lit at one time.⁴ The light was never allowed to be extinguished, and tradition relates that the approaching fall of the temple was prognosticated by the sudden occurrence of this mishap (Talm. Yoma, 37 ff.; cp the lament in 4 Esd. 10:22 (written after the fall of Jerusalem), lumen candelabri nostri extinguitur).

It was forbidden to reproduce the candlesticks exactly (cp Onias and the temple of Leontopolis, R/V vii. 10 f.), but this law could be evaded by making them with five, six, or even eight arms (1b. Zara, 43a).

The holy candelabrum is referred to comparatively seldom in subsequent writings.⁵ It forms the motive in

3. History. Zechariah's vision (Zech. 1, cp Rev. 11:4). In B.C. 170 Antiochus I Epiphanes carried it off along with the golden altar etc. (1 Macc. 1:21, ἡ Ἀρχία τοῦ φωτός [AN], om V); but a fresh one (tradition relates that it was of inferior material) was reconstructed by Judas after the purification of the temple (163 B.C., 1 Macc. 1:22). Jesus the son of Sirach employs the Ἀρχία καλαμῶν ἐπὶ Ἀρχίας ἀγίας as a simile for beauty in ripe old age (Ecclesi 26:17). The same is doubtless the Ἀρχία ἵστα seen by Pompey (Ant. xiv. 14), which, with its seven Ἀρχία, was one of the three famous objects in the temple of Herod (R/V v. 50). Its fate at the fall of Jerusalem is well known. The holy candelabrum, or, more probably, a copy of it, was carried in the triumph of Titus (R/V vii. 53), and was depicted upon the famous arch which bears his name. Vespasian deposited it in the temple of Peace, and after various vicissitudes (see Smith, DDB, s.v.) it was placed in the Christian church at Jerusalem (533 A.D.). All trace of it has since been lost. Possibly it was destroyed or carried off by Chosroes II. of Persia, when, in 614, he took an ill-fated Jerusalem (see Levesque in Vigoutoux, DDB, s.v.).

Curiously enough, Josephus, in his account of the triumph of Titus, states that the workmanship (ἐργον) of the candlestick was not the same as that which had been in the temple.⁶ As was the case with other objects in the triumph, it was probably constructed from the descriptions of the captives; besides, such conventional candlesticks were not unknown at that time.⁷ The griffin-like figures depicted upon the base of the candelabrum may be possibly ascribed to the artist; so far as can be judged, they do not resemble the mythical symbols from Palestine or Assyria. Consequently, in endeavouring to gain an idea of the original seven-branched candlestick, one must not adhere too strictly to the representation upon the Arch of Titus.

The language employed to describe the sacred menorah shows that it must have closely resembled a tree.⁸ Seven-branched trees are frequently met with in sculptures, etc., from the E.⁹ and, as Robertson Smith observes, 'in most of the Assyrian examples it is not easy to draw the line between the candelabrum and the sacred tree crowned with a star or crescent moon' (R/V 488). Since it is only natural to look for traces of Assyrian or

1 Zech. 1:12 mentions also 77, 'pipes', for conveying the oil (καταστήσεις).

2 Cp Ex. 27:20 f., 2 Ch. 13:11 and Jos. Ant. iii. 83. Rabbinical tradition held that only one was lit by day. This, it has been suggested, was the lamp upon the central shaft (called sema 77).

3 Thus, e.g., in the Feast of Tabernacles (see Maccab. 5:2).

4 The evidence for the existence of more than one in post-exilic times rests only upon Jos. R/V vi. 83. With Ant. xiv. 54 (1 Macc. 1:21) contrast ib. 7:6.

5 R/V vii. 55 [ed. Nicē]. The passage is not free from obscurity. Noteworthy is the remark that slender arms (καλαμίσκος) resembling the form of a midew were drawn forth. (See § 4.)

6 Cp their use as symbols in Rev. 1:12 f. 2:1 ff. 4:5.

7 Cp similarly the candelabrum in the temple of the Palatine Apollo (Pliny, 34:8).

CANDLESTICK

Babylonian influence in the second temple, it is not improbable that the menorah was originally a representation of the sacred seven-branched tree itself, possibly indeed the tree of life.¹ The six arms, instead of coming up and forming a straight line with the top of the central shaft, probably tapered off, the extremities of each pair being lower than those of the pair above it, thus presenting more accurately the outline of a tree. Examples of candelabra with the arms thus arranged are not unknown.²

It is not impossible that the ethrog and Lulab ('citron' and 'palm branch'; cp. Apoc. § 2 [3] of the Feast of Tabernacles (wherein candlesticks played so important a part) are to be connected also with this sacred seven-branched tree, from which, it has been suggested, the menorah has been evolved. The specific tree represented was one which, for various reasons, was considered the most unique and valuable. The choice may have depended more strictly upon the belief that it was supposed to represent the tree of temptation in the Paradise myth (so at all events in Christian times; cp. Didron, Manuel d'iconographie chrétienne, 80).

Cornill even reads 'Canneh' (כנח), appealing to a single Heb. MS which reads this, and to variants of Q—viz. χανααν [V]. But the name is really not existent; words rendered 'and Canneh and Eden' should rather be 'and the sons of Eden.'

Everywhere else we read either of Beth-Eden or of 'the Eden' it is not probable that there is an exception here. χανα [B], or χανααν [AQ] of Q, is not כנח, but כנע or כנז where Q or Y is a relic of י or י, and כנע a corruption of כנז. MSS of Q give only two names, and the second name is Canneh (as Smith's 1762), but a corruption of the Eden, discovery (for such it seems to be) is due to Mez (Gen. 4, Stadt Harran, 1892, p. 34).

The word canon is Greek; its application to the Bible belongs to Christian times; the idea originates in Judaism.

1. Greek terms.

The Greek ὁ κανὼν (allied to κάρνα, κάρνη, 'a reel'; borrowed from the Semite; Heb. 72) means a straight rod or pole, a rod used for measuring, a carpenter's rule; and, by metonymy, a rule, norm, or law, a still later meaning is that of catalogue or list.

As applied to the books of Scripture κανὼν is first met with in the second half of the fourth century—thus, καὶ ἡ κανονία (as opposed to ἀκανονία) in ca. 59 of the Council of Laodicea (circa 360 A.D.), and καὶ κανονισμὸς in Athanasius (ep. fest. 39; 395 A.D.); κανὼν for the whole collection is still later. The original signification is still a question. Did the term mean (a) the books constituted into a standard; or (b) the books corresponding to the standard (i.e. of the faith; cp. κανὼν ἐκκλησιαστικὸς, κ.

2. Early usage.

1 Perhaps originally a symbol of the universe—the tree of life being viewed as distinct in its origin from the sacred mountain of Elilim with which in a later myth it was combined. (Cp. JACOB and BOYD.) It is noteworthy that a seven-branched palm is represented by the side of an altar on an old Greek vase (Ohnefalsch-Richter, Kypros, pl. 105, fig. 1).

2 Cp. PEF Twenty-one Years' Work in the Holy Land, 184, the representation upon an amethyst reproduced in Reland, De Spol., facing p. 35, also ib. facing p. 42. The older form may in time have tended to approach the conventional form represented upon the arch of Titus, which agrees with later Jewish tradition. This form, resembling a trident in its outline, is especially noted by Jos. as a novelty (BJ vii. 35). For illustrations of the latter variety see Martigny, Dict. Ant. Chret. (77) 113; the plates in Calmet's Dictionary; and one at Tabariyeh (Perrot-Chippiez, Art in Jud. 1250).

τῆς ἀληθείας, κ. τῆς πίστεως) and measured by it (cp. καὶ κανονισμὸς in Ptolemy's Letter to Flora, circa 200 A.D. in Holtzmann, p. 115 f.), or perhaps underlying it, (c) the books taken up into the authoritative catalogue or into the normal number? The subject is discussed with full references to the literature in Holtzmann, pp. 112 ff. It is not improbable that the word passed through various phases of meaning in course of time.

The idea involved is clearly fixed; θεωρησάτω γράμματα (Amphilochius, ad 395), κατεστημένα θεὰ εἶναι δεύσαντα (Athanasius, ut sup.) are expressions concurrently used to convey the same meaning. It was, as we saw above, a loan from Judaism, and within the Christian domain originally applied only to the sacred books of the synagogue—the OT. So already in the NT (1 Th. 5:22 Tit. 3:16). The doctrine of the synagogue was that all the writings included in its canon had then origin in divine inspiration, and that it was God who spoke in them (Weber, § 20 f.). "is canon, with the doctrine attached to it, passed over to the Christian church and became its sole sacred book," until new writings of Christian origin came to be added, and the Jewish canon, as the Old Testament, was distinguished from the New.

The composite expression 'canon of books' has an analogue in the usage of the synagogue. From the first century A.D. such books are designated

7. Uncertain order. Comparative and threefold division of the canon are already taken as fully settled in a very old and authoritative passage in the tradition of the synagogue, viz. the Berakhot Baba

7. Uncertain order.

of the books within their several divisions the same passage gives a decision for the first time. The explanation of this is that in the oldest times the sacred writings were not equid into continuous codices. Each book had a separate roll to itself.² Accordingly, in the preceding Barutha (Haiba Rether 196), we find the question started whether it be permissible to write the entire Holy Scriptures, or even the eight prophets, on a single roll. On the strength of some precedent or other the question is answered in the affirmative; and this leads up to the further question as to the order in which the single books in the second and the third divisions ought to be written. This plainly shows that there was as yet on the subject no fixed tradition, and therefore too great importance ought not to be attached either to the Mishnaic determination of the question or to the departure from Mishnaic usage which we meet with.³ Both, however, are worthy of attention.

The order of the prophets proper, according to our passage, ought to be: Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, the

8. Prophets. The position of Isaiah seems to have struck even the teachers of the Gemara as remarkable, and is explained by them in a fanciful way. The Massora gives Isaiah the last place, and in this it is followed by the MSS of Spanish origin (as by the printed texts), while the German and French MSS adhere to the Talmudic order. Just because of its departure from strict chronology, we are justified in assuming that the Talmudic order rests on old and good tradition. We may safely venture, therefore, to make use of it in the attempt to answer the question of the origin not only of the individual books but also of the canon.

For the first books of the Hagiographa, the order given in our printed texts—Psalms, Proverbs, Job—

9. Hagio-grapha. which is that of the German and French MSS. gives place in our passage to this order: Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs. Supposing this to be the original place of the Book of Ruth, it might account for its later change of position by desire to group together the five biblical rolls. This explanation, however, is impossible for the reason that the Massora and the Spanish MSS put Chronicles instead of Ruth in the first place and before the Psalter. Of course, the same purpose is served by either arrangement; each of them prefixed to the (Davidic) Psalter book which helps to explain it. The Book of Ruth informs this service inasmuch as it concludes with David's genealogical tree and closes with his name; and the Book of Chronicles does so in a still higher degree, inasmuch as, in addition to the genealogy (1 Ch. 29 ff.), it gives an account of David's life, particularly of his elaborate directions for the temple service and temple music. Thus the claim of the Psalter to the first place

Baraytha (87-27) is a Mishna tradition which has not been taken into the canon of the Mishna, but comes from the same tradition about 200 years later. On the very important passage referred to by Marx, Tradition etc.

The Law was an exception; its five books as a rule constituted but one roll, although the five books (pentateuch) were to be kept with also separately (cp. Margolis, 27a).

8. No. of 'books.'—The extent of the OT canon, so far as the synagogue is concerned, is exactly what we find in our Hebrew printed texts and in the Protestant translations. 'The original reckoning of the synagogue, however, does not regard the books as thirty-one. The twelve minor prophets count as one book called 'the twelve,' ספר שנים עשר (so already in Baba Bathra, 14b, 15a text), Shodeket prophetim; so also Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles; whilst Ezra and Nehemiah form one book of Ezra. Thus $11 + 3 + 1 = 15$ have to be deducted from our 30, leaving only 24.³ See § 11 ff.

The twenty-four canonical books fall into three main divisions: תורה (the law) with five books, נביאים (the Classification. prophets) with eight, and ספרים (the writings, Hagiographa) with eleven.⁴ The prophets consist of four historical books (Isaiah, Judges, Samuel, Kings) and four prophetic (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve Minor). Since the Masoretic period (cp Strack, *PREZ*⁵ 7439) the first group has borne the name of נביאים (‘former prophets’) to distinguish it from the second, כתובים (‘latter prophets’). Among the Hagiographa a distinct group is formed by the five (festal) ‘rolls’—מגילות

See WRS, Rev. Sem., 161, 452. He well adds that the high priest on the Day of Atonement washed his flesh with water, not only when he put on the holy garments of the day, but also when he put them off (Lev. 16 24; Yoma, 7 4).

With this corresponds the Mishnic name of the canon כְּתָבֵי הַכֹּהֵנִים, while the names כְּתָבֵי הַכֹּהֵנִים tacitly supplement the idea of holiness. To these exactly answer the NT expressions γραφαὶ ἁγίας, ἡ γραφή, αἱ γραφαί. For other names see below, and for fuller details cp Sirac. k, 43 f.

Hence a very common old name for the collection, still frequently in use: 'the twenty-four books,' ספרים וארבעה עשר, often also ספרים.

is only confirmed by both variations (that of the Palimpsest and that of the Massora) from the usual order.¹ On the other hand, the Massora and the Spanish MSS support the order, Psalms, Job, Proverbs (Job before Proverbs), which therefore must be held to be the older arrangement, the other being explained by the desire to make Solomon come immediately after David.

The arrangement of the five 'rolls' in the order of their feasts is supported only by the German and the French MSS. The Massora and the Spanish MSS have—Ruth, Cant. Eccl. Lam. Esth., whilst Baba Bathra, after transposing Ruth in the manner we have seen, gives the order—Eccl. Cant. Lam., then introduces Daniel, and closes the list with Esther. We may venture to infer from this (1) that the arrangement of the Megilloth in the order of their feasts in the ecclesiastical year is late and artificial; (2) that about the year 200 A.D. they had not even been constituted a definite group; (3) that the inversion of the order of Daniel and Esther, and the removal of Ruth from the head of the list, were probably designed to effect this, the position of Daniel before Esther having thus a claim to be regarded as the older;² and (4) that the original position of the book of Ruth is quite uncertain, because the first place among the rolls may have been assigned to it by the Massora simply because it had been deposited from the first place among the Hagiographa. We may, further, regard it as probable that Proverbs was originally connected, as in Baba B., with the other Solomonic writings. Finally, it may be taken as perfectly certain that Ezra and Chronicles closed the list.³

The definition, division, and arrangement of books as given above, which rests on real tradition, and must constitute the basis for our subsequent investigations, is violently at variance with that of the LXX. It will be sufficient merely to indicate the differences here, for, as compared with the canon of the synagogue, that of the LXX represents only a secondary stage in the development.

(1) The arrangement of the LXX is apparently intended to be based on the contents of the books. The poetical books are, on the whole, regarded as didactic in character, the Prophets proper as mainly predictive, whilst the Law leads up to the historical books and is closely connected with the Former Prophets. As the Prophets are placed at the end, the progress of the collection is normal—from the past (historical books) to the present (didactic books) and the future (books of prophecy).

Certain, however, of the miscellaneous collection in which forms the Hagiographa—those, namely, that are historical—are transferred to the first division, where a place is assigned them on chronological principles. Ruth (p. 11) is inserted immediately after Judges, whilst Chronicles, Ezra, and Esther are appended at the end. Lamentations, on the other hand, regarded as the work of Jeremiah (cp. 2 Ch. 35.25 and the opening words of the book in 5), is transferred to the third division (prophetic books) and appended to Jeremiah; whilst Daniel closes the entire collection. Lastly, Job, regarded as a purely historical book,⁴ serves to effect the transition from the historical to the didactic writings.

Of the prophetic books, the Deuteroprophets head the list (in a somewhat varying order of the individual books), presumably on account of the higher antiquity of the writings which open it.

(2) Samuel and Kings together are divided into four books of Kings. Chronicles is divided into two books, as is also (subsequently) Ezra. (3) In varying degrees new writings unknown to the Hebrew canon are interpolated.

² This is supported by Jerome in Prolog. Gal. (cp. the text in Kyle, 287 ff.). Other variations, it is true, occur in the same author.

⁴ There is, however, considerable vacillation as to its position. For other variations, which are very numerous, cp. Kyle, 213 ff., and the table appended to 281.

The very various arrangements of the Hebrew canon which have been adopted in the Christian Church all be traced back to the LXX, more or less far-reaching corrections based on the canon of the synagogue.

11. Ruth and Lam.

Among all the divergences of the LXX from the synagogue arrangement, there is only one concerning which it is worth while considering whether it may not possibly represent the original state of things as against the synagogue tradition: Ruth is made to follow Judges, and Lamentations Jeremiah. If the actual state of the canon be that these two books ranked originally among the prophets, but were afterwards transferred to the Hagiographa, the historical value of the threefold division of the canon is very largely impaired. Now, this order of the books is supported by the oft recurring reckoning of twenty-two books instead of twenty-four (cp. above § 2), a reckoning which can be explained only on the assumption that Ruth and Lamentations were counted separately, being regarded as integral parts of Judges and Jeremiah.

Our sole Jewish witness to this is Josephus (Ap. l. 8; c. 100 A.D.). He gives the total as twenty-two, made out as follows: Moses, 5; Prophets, 13; hymns to God and precepts for men, 13. The last named category doubtless means the Psalms and the three Solomonic writings. Thus Daniel, Esther, Ezra, Chronicles, and even Job, are, as historical books, reckoned with the prophets, and Ruth and Lamentations are not counted at all, that is to say, they are included in Judges and Jeremiah. Here clearly a compromise has been struck between the threefold division of the synagogue, which places the prophets in the intermediate position, and the division of the Alexandrians, which arranges the books according to subjects. The Alexandrian canon is obviously in view also in the pointed addition [δεξιὰ τὰ δέκατοι πενταετηρίδα],² by which the books not contained in the canon of the synagogue are excluded. We may conclude, therefore, that also the reason why Ruth and Lamentations are not reckoned as separate books is that the LXX is followed; and thus we have no fresh testimony here. There is a further remark to be made. That the seven books just mentioned should be removed from the prophetic canon, if they were there, to a place among the Hagiographa, could be explained only by a desire to have the total rolls beside one another. In the oldest tradition, however, there was no such group of rolls (see above, § 6).

13. Origin of No. 22.

The supposed motive, therefore, could not have been operative. On the other hand, the number twenty-two has an artificial and external motive, not indicated by Josephus, but mentioned by all the Church fathers from Origen downwards: there is thus one book for each letter of the Hebrew alphabet. This childish fancy is carried to an extreme point when the books are reckoned as twenty-seven (an alternative which is offered by Epiphanius and Jerome) to do justice to the five final letters also; the books of Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra are divided, the fifth being supplied in Epiphanius by Judges and Ruth, in Jerome by Jeremiah and Lamentations. That this is mere arbitrary trifling is obvious.

On the other hand Jerome gives also the number twenty-four (Prolog. Gal.), cautiously describing it as a reckoning accepted by 'nomini' Ruth and Lamentations thus being

To this question the tradition of the synagogue actually offers an answer,—in the same Ravatha Bata (145-152) in which the order of the Prophets and the Writings is determined. The passage proceeds thus:—‘And who wrote them?’—and names the writers of the several books in exact chronological sequence. The last of them is Ezra. With him, therefore (i.e., according to traditional chronology, about 444 B.C.), the canon closed.²

17. 4 Esdras. orderly closing. The oldest form of this kind of tradition, so far as known to us, goes back earlier by a whole century than the tradition of the synagoge. It is to be found in the passage of 4 Esdras (chap. 14) that has been referred to already.³ Ezra (v. 18 ff.) prays God to grant him by his Holy Spirit that he may again write out the books

The real date of Ezra and the promulgation of the law related in Neh. 8-10 will be considered elsewhere (see CHRONOLOGY, § 14; NEHEMIAH). The results of the present article would not be altered essentially by fixing it, e.g., in the year 457 B.C. or year 397, instead of 444. In what follows, therefore, the date of Neh. 8-10 will be taken as 444. A full discussion of the point and a survey of the literature will be found in C. Kent, A History of the Jewish People, from the Babylonian Exile to the Present Time, 2 vols. (London, 1890), I, 257-260, 262-263, 265-266, 268-269, 271-272, 274-275, 277-278, 280-281, 283-284, 286-287, 289-290, 292-293, 295-296, 298-299, 301-302, 304-305, 307-308, 310-311, 313-314, 316-317, 319-320, 322-323, 325-326, 328-329, 331-332, 334-335, 337-338, 340-341, 343-344, 346-347, 349-350, 352-353, 355-356, 358-359, 361-362, 364-365, 367-368, 370-371, 373-374, 376-377, 379-380, 382-383, 385-386, 388-389, 391-392, 394-395, 397-398, 400-401, 403-404, 406-407, 409-410, 412-413, 415-416, 418-419, 421-422, 424-425, 427-428, 430-431, 433-434, 436-437, 439-440, 442-443, 445-446, 448-449, 451-452, 454-455, 457-458, 460-461, 463-464, 466-467, 469-470, 472-473, 475-476, 478-479, 481-482, 484-485, 487-488, 490-491, 493-494, 496-497, 499-500, 502-503, 505-506, 508-509, 511-512, 514-515, 517-518, 520-521, 523-524, 526-527, 529-530, 532-533, 535-536, 538-539, 541-542, 544-545, 547-548, 550-551, 553-554, 556-557, 559-560, 562-563, 565-566, 568-569, 571-572, 574-575, 577-578, 580-581, 583-584, 586-587, 589-590, 592-593, 595-596, 598-599, 601-602, 604-605, 607-608, 610-611, 613-614, 616-617, 619-620, 622-623, 625-626, 628-629, 631-632, 634-635, 637-638, 640-641, 643-644, 646-647, 649-650, 652-653, 655-656, 658-659, 661-662, 664-665, 667-668, 670-671, 673-674, 676-677, 679-680, 682-683, 685-686, 688-689, 691-692, 694-695, 697-698, 699-700, 702-703, 705-706, 708-709, 711-712, 714-715, 717-718, 720-721, 723-724, 726-727, 729-730, 732-733, 735-736, 738-739, 741-742, 744-745, 747-748, 750-751, 753-754, 756-757, 759-760, 762-763, 765-766, 768-769, 771-772, 774-775, 777-778, 780-781, 783-784, 786-787, 789-790, 792-793, 795-796, 798-799, 801-802, 804-805, 807-808, 810-811, 813-814, 816-817, 819-820, 822-823, 825-826, 828-829, 831-832, 834-835, 837-838, 840-841, 843-844, 846-847, 849-850, 852-853, 855-856, 858-859, 861-862, 864-865, 867-868, 870-871, 873-874, 876-877, 879-880, 882-883, 885-886, 888-889, 891-892, 894-895, 897-898, 899-900, 902-903, 905-906, 908-909, 911-912, 914-915, 917-918, 920-921, 923-924, 926-927, 929-930, 932-933, 935-936, 938-939, 941-942, 944-945, 947-948, 950-951, 953-954, 956-957, 959-960, 962-963, 965-966, 968-969, 971-972, 974-975, 977-978, 980-981, 983-984, 986-987, 989-990, 992-993, 995-996, 998-999, 1001-1002, 1004-1005, 1007-1008, 1010-1011, 1013-1014, 1016-1017, 1019-1020, 1022-1023, 1025-1026, 1028-1029, 1031-1032, 1034-1035, 1037-1038, 1040-1041, 1043-1044, 1046-1047, 1049-1050, 1052-1053, 1055-1056, 1058-1059, 1061-1062, 1064-1065, 1067-1068, 1070-1071, 1073-1074, 1076-1077, 1079-1080, 1082-1083, 1085-1086, 1088-1089, 1091-1092, 1094-1095, 1097-1098, 1099-1100, 1102-1103, 1105-1106, 1108-1109, 1111-1112, 1114-1115, 1117-1118, 1120-1121, 1123-1124, 1126-1127, 1129-1130, 1132-1133, 1135-1136, 1138-1139, 1141-1142, 1144-1145, 1147-1148, 1150-1151, 1153-1154, 1156-1157, 1159-1160, 1162-1163, 1165-1166, 1168-1169, 1171-1172, 1174-1175, 1177-1178, 1180-1181, 1183-1184, 1186-1187, 1189-1190, 1192-1193, 1195-1196, 1198-1199, 1201-1202, 1204-1205, 1207-1208, 1210-1211, 1213-1214, 1216-1217, 1219-1220, 1222-1223, 1225-1226, 1228-1229, 1231-1232, 1234-1235, 1237-1238, 1240-1241, 1243-1244, 1246-1247, 1249-1250, 1252-1253, 1255-1256, 1258-1259, 1261-1262, 1264-1265, 1267-1268, 1270-1271, 1273-1274, 1276-1277, 1279-1280, 1282-1283, 1285-1286, 1288-1289, 1291-1292, 1294-1295, 1297-1298, 1299-1300, 1302-1303, 1305-1306, 1308-1309, 1311-1312, 1314-1315, 1317-1318, 1320-1321, 1323-1324, 1326-1327, 1329-1330, 1332-1333, 1335-1336, 1338-1339, 1341-1342, 1344-1345, 1347-1348, 1350-1351, 1353-1354, 1356-1357, 1359-1360, 1362-1363, 1365-1366, 1368-1369, 1371-1372, 1374-1375, 1377-1378, 1380-1381, 1383-1384, 1386-1387, 1389-1390, 1392-1393, 1395-1396, 1398-1399, 1401-1402, 1404-1405, 1407-1408, 1410-1411, 1413-1414, 1416-1417, 1419-1420, 1422-1423, 1425-1426, 1428-1429, 1431-1432, 1434-1435, 1437-1438, 1440-1441, 1443-1444, 1446-1447, 1449-1450, 1452-1453, 1455-1456, 1458-1459, hood of the humanists and of the reformation of this as well as many other legends;² but if the old legend disappeared, it was only to make way for a modern one, not mystical but rationalistic in character. This latter idea had evidence from Thos Leavitt, who says³ that Ezra and the men of the great scribes (1833), among other things, had in one volume the twenty-four books (which had been translated separately) and had classified them into the three divisions above mentioned, determining the order of the Prophets and the Writings only; it is true, from the Talmudic doctors in Jericho.⁴ This assertion satisfied the craving of men for a duly constituted body, proceeding in a state manner. Accordingly the statement of Thos Leavitt, especially after it had been homologated by J.

 Buxton the elder in his Liberator (1826), became the authoritative doctrine of the orthodoxy of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. To it were added, as self-evident, though Leavitt said nothing of them, the authoritative decrees (Hottelinger), and the repetition of the non-canonical writings (so already Buxton), and after him

It is vain to seek for the tradition on which Elias Levita based his representation. The Talmud, which says a great deal about 'the men of the great synagogue,' has not a word to say about this action of theirs with reference to the whole body of Scripture. The Mekhilah and Seder 'Olam also touch on the matter but lightly. We conclude therefore that, to suit the needs of his time, Levita merely inferred such an action from the existence of the body in question.⁵

The evidence for the very existence of a body of the kind required, however, is extremely slender. From the middle of the seventeenth century it was continually disputed anew. It even we moderns must admit that there was a body of some kind, the kind of existence that we can accord to it supplies the strongest refutation of the statement of Elias Levita. 'The question as to what we are to understand by "the men of the great synagogue" (or

Compare the passages quoted in Kyle, 251 ff. It should be added that the same step had been taken already in the hup post-Edmudic tractate Aboth de R. Nathan (chap. I), where it is said of 'the men of the great synagogue' that they decided on the reception of Proverbs, Canticles, and Ecclesiastes, against objections that had been urged (see the passages in C. H. H. Wright, op. cit.). We shall see below that an artificial antedating can be clearly demonstrated here.

2 When Levita points out that the order of the Prophets and the Writings, as fixed there, was different from that in Palea Fi, his only goes to show that the sages of the Mishna still found nothing for them to give decisions about. ¶ Elia § viii. f. 60^a but these sages found the books written on separate rolls, and that, therefore, there was not yet any order to fix. ¶ Cpaboe § 7.

rather 'assembly') in the sense in which the expression was originally used, may be regarded as now fully cleared up. If a brilliant application and criticism of all that tradition had to say and all the work of his modern predecessors, Knaben¹ demonstrated that this 'synagogue' is no other than the great assembly at Jerusalem described in Neh 8.10, the assembly in which the whole body of the people, under the presidency of Nehemiah and through the signatures of its representatives, pledged itself to acceptance of the law book of Ezra. This assembly, as the latest authority mentioned in the OT, was afterwards, by the tradition of the synagogue, made responsible for all those proceedings of a religious nature not referred to in the OT, which, nevertheless, so far as known, dated from a period earlier than the tradition laid down in the Talmud. Since this last, however, with its most ancient (and almost mythical) authorities, the tve 'pasas' and Antigonus of Socho, does not go back farther than the second century B.C., there gradually grew out of the assembly, whose meetings began and closed within the seventh month of a single year, a standing institution to which people in that later time, each according to his needs and his chronological theories, attributed a duration extending over centuries. This was made all the easier by the chronology of the Talmud bringing the date of the Persian ascendancy too low by some 150 years, and thus bringing the beginning and the end closer together.²

The activity as regards the canon, then, which Elias Levita and his followers ascribe to 'the men of the great synagogue', implies for the most part a comparatively late and false conception of the character of that supposed body. What ancient tradition has to say about it remains well within the limits of time assigned to it by criticism. In Raba B. 14b 15a, 'the men of the great synagogue' have assigned to them a place immediately before Ezra; they wrote Ezekiel, the Docecapropheton, Daniel, and Esther. When, therefore, Ezra had contributed his share (Ezra and Chronicles), forming the closing portion of the series of the twenty-four books, the canon was forthwith complete. It is evident (1) that here the activity of 'the men of the great synagogue' does not extend below Ezra's time; and (2) that it extends only to four books, not to the whole canon. Therewith the absolute untenability of Levita's assertion becomes apparent. Expedients have been resorted to in vain; as, for example, that 282, 'to write,' means in the Baraita to 'collect,' or to 'transcribe and circulate,' or both together (cp. Marx, 41). 'The writer' of the Mishna most certainly means the author of the books—so far as there can be a question of authorship where, in the last resort, the author is the Holy Spirit. Of authorship nothing but writing is left. This, accordingly, is the sense assumed by Gemara and by rabbinical exegesis. What we are told concerning 'the men of the great synagogue' is not more startling than it is to learn that Hezekiah and his companions wrote Isaiah, Proverbs, Canticles, and Ecclesiastes, books of which tradition is unanimous in saying that the last two were wholly, and the second in great measure, written by Solomon two centuries before Hezekiah. Here, in it is the miraculous that is deliberately related, meaning is that Solomon had only spoken (cp. 1 K. 5. 12), divine inspiration enabled the men of Hezekiah to write it out, and so make it into canonical books, exactly the same operation 'the men of the great synagogue' were enabled to write out what an Amos, a Hosea, a Micah and a Nahum, and so forth had spoken in the name of God. There is nothing to surprise about such a view as this, if we remember what we already found in connection with 4 Esdras (above, § 1). In the present instance, indeed, it is only a portion of the OT that comes into question, not the whole mass in 4 Esdras; but, on the other hand, in 4 Esdras only the reproduction of books that had been lost is spoken of, whilst here it is their very composition.

That stories such as these should ever have passed current as real historical tradition resting upon fact is surprising enough. Almost more astonishing is it that such baseless fancies should not yet have been abandoned, definitely, for good, by the theology of the Reformed Churches.

Whether the tradition is genuine need no longer be asked. The only question is, How was it possible that the Mishna doctors, and perhaps those who immediately preceded them, arrived at such a representation? This question in some cases already greatly exercised the exegetes of the Gemara, and even led them to attempted corrections; and Rashi (op. cit. 1105) gives a solution of some of the knottiest points which, if we are to believe Strack,² represents the view of the Rabbis. According to this explanation, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Esther did not write their own books, because they lived in exile, and outside the borders of the Holy Land it was impossible for any sacred book to be written. Even, however, if this view had some element of truth in it, it hardly meets the main point. The writing of each book the scribes, as was natural to their order, sought to assign to a writer like themselves, a sofer (see Strack), and attributed the authorship of any book only to one to whom writing could be assigned of the authority of a proof text. In the case of books whose reputed authors could not be shown to have been soferim, the authorship was attributed to the writers of such other books as stood nearest to them at point of time.

That Moses was a scribe was held to be shown by De. 31. 9 (the Book of Job also was attributed to him on account of its supposed antiquity), and the same is true of Joshua (Josh. 24. 26). Similar proof was found for Samuel in 1 S. 10. 25, and to him accordingly was assigned, not only the book that bears his name, but also Judges and Ruth. In the case of David, if the words 7228 in 2 S. 1. 18 were not enough, there was at all events sufficient proof in 1 Ch. 23. 32 and especially in 2 S. 1. 1, where were found also for reconciling the tradition that he wrote the whole Psalter with the tradition (oral or written) that he assigned certain psalms to other authors. It was declared that he wrote the psalms, but 7229 of those other writers of Solomon all that was said in 1 K. 5. 12 was that he spoke, not that he wrote; but no one felt at any loss, for in Prov. 25. 1 the production of a portion of his Book of Proverbs is attributed to the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah. These great scribes were utilised to the utmost. They had ascribed not only all the Solomon books, but also the book of the contemporary Isaiah, although Is. 8. 1 might well have been taken as saying something for the prophet himself. Whether in this instance some special cause contributed to the result, or whether it was merely that prophet and scribe had at any one time kept separate, it is impossible to say. For Jeremiah, too, one prophet in the narrower sense of the word amongst those who are named, Jer. 30 spoke too distinctly to be ignored, that Kings also should have been attributed to him is at once completely explained by 2 K. 24. 18, and chap. 25 compared with Jer. 52. Next in order as biblical authors come 'the men of the great synagogue,' who, as contemporaries of Ezra the scribe, are regarded (themselves also one of them numbered) but at the same time also as signatories of the act in Neh. 10, were expressly called to this. Why Ezekiel (the scribe, if any scribe there was among the prophets), to whom the act of writing is repeatedly attributed (cf. ibid. 40.1), should not have been credited with his own book, may perhaps be rightly explained by Rashi. The twelve prophets could not have written severally their own books, because all the books together form (see § 6) but one book; for a somewhat different turn is given to this in Rashi, and as the latest of them belonged to the period of the great synagogue, and, indeed, according to tradition, were actually members of that body, the assignment of the authorship to it presented no difficulty. Finally Daniel and Esther, regarded as books of the Persian period, easily fell to their domain. Ezra, with his account of his own time, closes the series. Some explanation is needed of the fact that whilst 'the genealogies in Chronicles down to himself' (this is no doubt the easiest explanation) also are assigned to Ezra, no account is taken of the remainder of that work. The most likely reason is that the main portion of Chronicles was regarded as mere repetition from Samuel and Kings, the origin of which had been already explained.

² Knaben's proof has, in Great Britain, been accepted (among others) by Robertson Smith (OT, 1876, 77), Driver (Introduct. 1891), and (at least in essentials) by Ryle, to whose very careful Exegeticon (1892, 272) the reader (especially referred). It has indeed found an uncompromising opponent in C. H. Wright (Kohleth, 5. p. 475 ff.), whose arguments, however, amount to little more than this: The necessity (which in fact produced the legend) for some corporate body by whom the religious duties of that time could have been discharged. This, however, cannot convert what is demonstrably legend into history. What ever has to be conceded is granted already by Knaben (loc. cit. 1136, 1138), and writers like Strack (PRF, 2. 1839, footnote*) are skilful enough to reconcile the demand for such 'organised powers' between Ezra and Christ with Knaben's results. The most recent apology for the tradition is that of S. Krauss ('The Great Synod,' JPR, Jan. '98, p. 307 ff.). Of course he does not defend the theory of Elias Levita.

It is not of the slightest importance to consider how far this attempted explanation of the origin of the various books is in agreement with the real thought of the Rabbis; in any case it remains pure theory, the product of rabbinical inventiveness, not of historical tradition. Apart from a lived general opinion about certain individual books and about the Pentateuch, the tangible outcome of the beliefs of the whole period with which we are dealing is that the canon was held to have been closed in the time of Ezra. The theory upon which this belief proceeded will occupy us later (§ 44 f.).

As against this congeries of vague guesses and abstract theories, science demands that we should examine each book separately, and endeavour, with the evidence supplied by itself, and with continual reference to the body of literature as a whole, to ascertain its date and to fix its place in the national and religious development of the Jews. This is the task of 'special introduction'; but its results must always have a direct bearing on the history of the canon. This history must give close attention also to all the external testimonies relative to the formation and to the close of the canon, and, after weighing them, must assign to them their due place. Above all, it must trace out all general opinions and theories, such as we have been considering, ascertain their scope and meaning, and satisfy itself as to the period at which they arose, and as to their influence on the formation of the canon. In so far as we succeed in these endeavours, we shall arrive at a relatively trustworthy history of the canon.

III. HISTORY OF THE OT CANON. (1) *The first canon: the Law.*¹—Whatever difficulties we may have

¹ W. J. Beecher (see below, § 75) offers a solemn protest against the fundamental proposition of this article (as of all modern discussions of the subject): a triple canon, collected and closed in three successive periods. He denies that there is any evidence of a time when the Law and the Prophets stood in authority above the Writings. He denies that the other OT writings were originally regarded as less authoritative than the Pentateuch. He sees in the canon of the OT an aggregate of sacred books growing gradually and continually to a definite time when the part written latest was finished and the collection was deemed complete. Law for father, Messiahs, Prophets, and Writings are nothing but three different names for the same books—etc., the prophetic writings. We are not to add how these terms came to be the names of three different parts of this collection. The fundamental fact that the Law alone was promulgated and made authoritative by Ezra and Nehemiah, is obscured by Beecher by the statement that the term 'book of Moses' is applied to an aggregate of sacred writings including more than the Pentateuch. His only proof is Ezra 7.18, where 'we are told that the returned exiles set up the courses of the priests and Levites, "as it is written in the book of Moses." The Pentateuch contains nothing in regard to priestly or Levitical courses. Possibly the reference is to written precepts now found in 1 Chronicles.' Beecher does not translate accurately. The text runs: 'They set up the priests in their courses and the Levites in their divisions.' This means that the priests and the Levites are set up 'as it is written in the book of Moses'; but it does not necessarily mean that their courses and divisions were based on the same authority. Beecher never mentions the fact that the Samaritans accepted only the Law (see below, § 25), nor does he investigate what grain of truth is contained in the same statement as to the Sadducees in dealing with the later stages of the history of the canon and with its close; there is no obscurity about its contentment. It was indeed by those

23. The Torah. 'men of the great synagogue,' to whom orthodoxy assigns the close of the canon, that its foundations were laid, in the clear daylight of well-authenticated history. From the twenty-fourth day of the seventh month of the year 444 B.C. onwards, Israel possessed a canon of Sacred Scripture. It was on this day that the great popular assembly described in Neh. 9.7, solemnly pledged itself to 'the Book of the Law of Yahweh their God' (9.1), which had been given by the hand of Moses the servant of God' (10.1), and had been brought from Babylon to Jerusalem shortly before by Ezra the scribe (Ezra 7.6-11; Neh. 8.1-4). In virtue of this resolution the said law book at that time became canonical; but only the law book.

Already, indeed, in the eighteenth year of King Josiah, between 623 and 621 B.C., there had been a solemn act, of a similar character, when the king and people pledged themselves to the law book that had been found in the temple, the 'book of the covenant' (2 K. 23.1). The entire editorial revision of the Books of Kings, and especially the express references to the law book (2 K. 24.2 K. 23.25, and above all, 2 K. 14.6 compared with Dt. 24.16), clearly prove that it had canonical validity during the exile period, whilst the book of Malachi (cp. esp. 2.4 ff. 3.5 ff. 2.2) shows that also in the post-exile period down to the time of Ezra it continued to hold this place in Jerusalem.¹ The critical labours of the present century, however, have conclusively established that this first canonical book contained simply what we now have as the kernel of our Book of Deuteronomy.

The law canonised in 444 was a very different document. The only possible question is whether it was the entire Pentateuch as we now have it, or only the Priestly Writing, the latest and most extensive of the sources which go to make up the Pentateuch. The latter is, so far as we can at present see, the more likely hypothesis. In that case what happened in 444 B.C. was that the Deuteronomistic Law, which had until then ruled, was superseded by the new Law of Ezra. A determination of this kind, however, was unworkable in view of the turn place which the older book that had been built up out of JE and D² had secured for itself in the estimation of the people. Accordingly, the new law was revised and enlarged by the fusing together of which our Pentateuch, the canon of the Law, was the result.

This last stage was most probably accomplished in the next generation after that of Ezra, and completed before 300 B.C. We have evidence of this in the fact that the Samaritan community of the Samaritans accepts the entire Pentateuch as sacred. It is true that the solitary historical account we possess (Jos. 20.7, 8.4) places the separation of this community from that of Jerusalem as low down as the time of Alexander the Great (about 330 B.C.); but the cause that led to (see below, § 28), or consider the reason why the Law is wanting in Mal. 2.1 (see below, § 27). On the other side, it may be hoped that he will find the difficulty caused by the Book of Joshua, a difficulty greatly exaggerated by himself, removed (in fact turned into a help) in § 28.2 of this article, written two years before his paper was published. This is only one of many instances. The theory of the triple canon of the OT, based on incontestable facts, is not as mechanical as Beecher represents it. It is able to satisfy every demand for organic growth in the collection of OT writings. Beecher's paper, for all failure it seems to the present writer, in the main point may do much good in convincing against the mechanical conception, but it did not furnish to the present writer any occasion to alter the views developed in this article.

the separation—the expulsion of the high priest's son, the son-in-law of Sanballat, who founded the community and sanctuaries of the Samaritans—is rather, according to Neh. 13:28, to be referred to the period of Nehemiah (about 430 B.C.). It has already been mentioned (§ 19) that Jewish chronology has dropped a whole century and a half, so bringing the periods of Nehemiah and Alexander into immediate juxtaposition; and this is the explanation of the confusion found in Josephus. We may suppose that before the final separation of the Samaritans there elapsed an interval of some decades which would give ample time for the completion of the Law.¹ This does not exclude the possibility that adjustments may have been made at a later date between the Samaritan Pentateuch and that of Jerusalem, or that later interpolations may have found their way into the Samaritan Law. The compass of the work, however, must have remained (to speak broadly)² a fixed quantity, otherwise the Samaritans would not have taken it over.

At the same time the Samaritan canon, which contained nothing but the (complete) Law, is our oldest witness to a period during which the canon consisted of the Law alone, canon and Law being thus coextensive conceptions.

If alongside of the Law there had been other sacred writings, it would be inexplicable why these last also did not pass into currency with the Samaritans. There are other witnesses also to the same effect. The weightiest lies in the simple fact that the name 'Torah' or 'Law' can mean the entire canon, and be used as including the Prophets and the Writings. We find it so used in the NT (Jn. 10:34; 12:14; 15:25; 1 Cor. 14:21), in the passage already cited from 4 Esdras (11:20), and, at a later date, in many passages of the Talmud, the Midrashim, and the Rabbins (cp. Strack, 439). This would have been impossible if the words 'canon' and 'Law' had not originally had the same connotation, other books afterwards attaining to some share in the sanctity of the Law.

27. 2 Macc. The same thing is shown by an often quoted passage in 2 Macc.

2:13. There we read that Nehemiah, in establishing a library, brought together the books concerning the kings and prophets (τὰ πρὸς τοὺς βασιλεῖς καὶ προφητῶν) and the (poems) of David (τὰ τοῦ Δαυὶδ) and the letters of kings concerning consecrated gifts (to the temple: ἐπιστολὰς βασιλέων περὶ ἀθυσιασμάτων). The passage occurs in a letter from the Jews of Palestine to their compatriots in Egypt, and is an admitted interpolation in a book which is itself thoroughly unhistorical; it is thus in the highest degree trustworthy (cp. Macc. viii. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). As evidence of what could be believed and said at the time of its composition, however, in the first century B.C., it is unimpeachable. When we find the Former and Latter Prophets and the Psalms catalogued as forming part of a library, and, alongside of them and on the same level, letters of kings (the other kings of course), it is clear that there is no idea of sacred sanct books. The Law is not mentioned in the same connection; as the sacred canon, it receives a place of its own and has nothing to do with the library. Whether all the contemporaries of this author shared his view is another matter; in any case, the possibility of such a view being held is proof of the original isolation of the Law. Moreover, it appears from this passage that at the time when it was written, or within the writing circle, the legend of the closing of the canon by Ezra had been prevalent only in the (narrower and historical) circle, the legend of the closing of the canon by Ezra had received its validity as such by Ezra's action. The fact, moreover, that in the LXX the version of the Law appears to be distinctively an official work, not the result of private enterprise, confirms the inference already drawn from the exclusive attention given to the Law in the period represented by Ezra.

¹ This explains why the Book of Nehemiah closes with the expulsion of the son-in-law of Sanballat, but says nothing as to the setting up of the temple and church of the Samaritans. There is no occasion for scepticism as to the entire story in Josephus (cp. Kautsch, PKZ, 2, art. 'Samaritaner', 34-37).

³ Against the completion of the law at this date Duhn (Zeits., 1, 2, p. 5) urges objections. He thinks that, since as the time of the Chronicler (fourth century B.C.) the so-called Priestly Document had not yet been used with J E and D; for the intention of the Book of Chronicles is, in his opinion, to continue the Priestly Document (which comes down only to the end of Joshua), not the older work embracing the Book of Kings, which indeed is sought to supersede. Neither criticism, however, can be attributed to the Chronicler. In fact he begins with the creation, his method being to write out at full length the genealogies from Adam downwards, taking them from the work that lay before him (J E D P). Since, however, he is writing a history only of Jerusalem and the temple, he passes over all that does not relate to this. At the same time, even if the Chronicler had used nothing but P, this would not prove more than that, after its first use with the other sources, P continued to be used also separately for a long time.

(2) The second canon: the Prophets.—The nucleus for a second canon was laid to the hand of the scrib-

28. J E D. of the fifth century in the very fact that the canon of the Law had been set apart to place by itself. It is one of the certain results of the science of special introduction that the Priestly Document on which Ezra's reform rested, followed the history of Israel, including the division of Canaan, down to the end of the Book of Joshua; the portions derived from it can still be distinguished in our present Book of Joshua. The same holds good for J E D. We can go further. It may still be matter of dispute, indeed, whether the material for the subsequent books (Judges, Samuel, Kings) also was derived from J and E; but so much is indisputably certain, that the Deuteronomistic redaction embraced these books also, in fact, the whole of the Former Prophets, and that at the end of Kings the narrative itself is from Deuteronomistic hands. As even now each of these books is seen to link itself very closely to that which precedes it, it follows that J E D, ultimately at least, in the form in which the work was used in the fifth century, included the Law and the Former Prophets. That the Law might attain a sacred

29. Penta-teuch. form as a separate unity, therefore, it was not enough that P and J E D should be worked up into a single whole. This whole must be separated from the history that follows it. How and when this was effected we can imagine variously. According to the view taken above, what is most probable is that in 444 the entire Priestly Writing, including the closing sections relating to the entrance into Canaan and the partition of the country, was already in existence and canonized in its full extent. Not until its subsequent amalgamation with the corresponding sections of J E D did the hitherto quite insignificant historical appendix to the 'Law,' strictly so called, acquire such a preponderance that the division was found to be inevitable. It was made at the end of the account of the death of Moses, and thus, even of the Priestly Writing also (as well as of J E D), severed from the body to which it belonged. In any case, however we may reconstruct the details, the fact abides that, after the Law had been separated, the compactness of writings which afterwards came to be known as the 'Former Prophets,' a body of literature which from the very first could not fail to take an exceptional position from the scriptural point of view, had once been connected with the sacred canon, and must necessarily have been prized by the community as a possession never to be lost.

Equally certain is it that by far the larger proportion of the 'Latter Prophets' was already in the hands of the scribes of the fifth century. In fact, the books of the Latter Prophets, almost without exception, by the mouth of his prophets, in fact reason enough for assigning to them the attribute of holiness. If, nevertheless, the books were not reckoned to the canon, the explanation is to be sought in the practical character of the first canon: Ezra gave to the community in the canon of the Law all that it required. It was not me, when he gave it, he only gave over again what God had once already given through Moses to the people as his one and all. If the people had remained true to this Law, not only would they have escaped all the disasters of the past, but also they would never have needed new revelations from God through his prophets. These prophets contributed nothing new; they were sent only to admonish the unfaithful people to observe the Law, and to announce the merited punishment of the impenitent. The Law thus had permanent validity, whilst the work of the prophets was transitory; the Law addressed itself to all generations, the prophets each only to his own, which had now passed away. The generations that had sworn obedience anew to the Law under Ezra, therefore, had no need for the prophets. Should similar circumstances recur, it might be expected that God would send prophets anew; but the prevailing feeling was, no doubt, that the time of unfaithfulness, and consequently of the prophetic ministry, had gone for ever.¹

30. 'Former Prophets.'

CANON

32. Provisional.

The view here set forth is that of the OT itself, pre-eminently that of the Deuteronomistic school, where it is constantly recurring.² Indeed, since the Deuteronomie and the Priestly Laws alike, each in its own way, had assimilated the results of the work of the prophets, this view must be called, from then point of view, the right one. Accordingly it has throughout continued to be the view of the synagogue, as can be proved from many passages in the Talmud and the Midrashim.³ It explains at the same time why it is that the historical books (Joshua-Kings) are called 'prophets.' They speak just in the manner of the prophets of the unfaithfulness of past generations to the law, and of the divine means, chiefly the mission of prophets, used to correct this. Both relate in a similar way to the past. For the same reason the prophets, conversely, are called 'history'; for 'tradition' in the sense of 'history' is what is meant by ספרות (sepharut), the Massoretic term for the canon of the prophets, the ספרות (sepharut), as a whole (p. further, Strack, 439f.).

We can thus very easily understand how it was that the Prophets could not be canonized simultaneously with the Law. To pledge people to the obligation to the Law would only have been obscured and weakened by a canonization of the Prophets at the same time. The idea of canonization had first to be enlarged, it had to be conceived in a more abstract manner, on the basis of a historical interest in the past, before the canonizing of the Prophets—that is to say, their being taken in immediate connection with the Law—could become possible.⁴

Of course a considerable period of time must have been required for this; and the same result follows from the established facts of 'higher criticism.' The idea of canonization had first to be enlarged, it had to be conceived in a more abstract manner, on the basis of a historical interest in the past, before the canonizing of the Prophets—that is to say, their being taken in immediate connection with the Law—could become possible.⁴

² Compare also, however (especially), the confession of sin in Neh. 9:2, which precedes the taking of the covenant (particularly 26 ff., 28:20 ff., 34).

³ See Weiser, 18 f., 28 f.

⁴ Cf. the passage (2 Marc. 2:13), already spoken of, in which such a historical interest appears, but leads only to the foundation of a library, not to the canonizing of its contents.

CANON

evidence of a secondary literary activity.¹ These phenomena are so manifold, and there are traces of periods so widely separated, that we must believe not a few generations to have borne a part in bringing the prophetic books to their present form. Yet these extensive additions and revisions, at least most of them, must of course have taken place before the canonization.

This obvious conclusion is indeed contradicted by the tradition of the synagogue, which tells us that the books of the prophets were written by 'the men of the great synagogue' on which view the canon of the prophets was already complete in 444 B.C.

36. Gap in tradition.

Nor does this assertion, the baselessness of which we have already seen, stand alone. It is backed by others. Josephus (c. 1 p. 18) says expressly that it was down to the time of Antiochus, the successor of Nereus (Ant. 12.18), Longimanus, 495-424 that the literary activity of the prophets continued. The passage in the Mishna in which the unbroken chain of tradition is set forth (Trakt. Aboth. 1:1) represents the Law as having been handed down by the prophets to the men of the great synagogue; which again brings us to the same date, and dispenses with the need of any further testimony.

It is exactly this chain of tradition, however, that supplies the interval of time that we need. The passage goes on to say: Simon the Just was one of the last survivors of 'the men of the great synagogue'; he handed on the tradition to Antiochus of Socho, by whom² in turn it was transmitted to Jose b. Joezer and Jose b. Jochanan, the first of the so-called 'sages.' That the chronology of this section leaves much to be desired is clear.³ It seems to be as good as certain, however, that the fourth of the five parts lived about 50 B.C., the third about 200 B.C. The same ratio would bring us to somewhere about 100 B.C. for the first 'sage,' whilst the time of Antiochus and Simon would fall about 200 B.C., or a little earlier. In that case Simon the Just would be the high priest Simon II, b. Onias who is briefly mentioned by Josephus (Ant. 12.18). The cognomen of 'Just,' however, is given by Josephus (Ant. 12.18) to Simon I, b. Onias, who lived almost a century earlier, soon after 300. If we must consider that he is the Simon who is meant, it is clear that the alleged chain of tradition is defective in its earlier portion, only a single name having reached us for the whole of the third century. Further, Simon the Just is the connecting link with the great 'synagogue,' and as the assembly that gave rise to this name was held in 444, there is again a gap, this time of a century, even if we concede that Simon reached a very advanced age. The long interval between Simon the Just and 444 B.C., however, is not to be held as arising from a different view about the synagogue; it is to be accounted for by the hiatus already referred to, §§ 10, 23 in the traditional chronology between Nehemiah and Alexander the Great, similar to that which brings Zerubbabel into immediate relation with the time of Ezra.⁴ It is within this vacant period that we must place those redactions, the fact of which has been so uncontestedly proved by critical inquiry. The main reason why the synagogue has no recollection of this period, is that during this time the activity of the scribes (with the history of which alone the chronology bases itself from Ezra onwards) had no independent life, but devoted itself almost exclusively to the sacred writings of the past, and left its traces only there, so that whatever it accomplished was put to the credit of the earlier times. This holds good, in the first instance, of the Law, to which considerable additions were still made as late as the third century (see above, § 25). Still more extensive was this activity in the case of the prophetic books; it was now that they took their final literary shape.¹ The additions naturally corresponded to the thoughts and wishes of the age in which they arose; on the lines of older models, the elements of hope and of comfort received a much fuller development, and thus the prophets were made of practical interest for a present time that, contrary to expectation, had turned out badly.²

It is possible that we even possess a proof that the canonization of the prophets did not take place quite without opposition and dispute, a thing in itself not improbable. In the Church fathers we meet with the very definite assertion that the Sadducees had scruples about acknowledging any sacred writings (especially the Prophets) in addition to the Law.³ It cannot be supposed that there is here any confusion with the Samaritans, who are expressly named along with them as sharing the same view; a somewhat easier view is that what is referred to is their rejection of the oral legal tradition.⁴ Let it be borne in mind, however, that we here have to do with our best Christian authorities on matters Jewish—Origen and Jerome, the former of whom was contemporary with the period of the Mishna. That neither the Mishna itself, nor yet Josephus, has a word to say on such a dangerous subject, is intelligible enough. It is, of course, not for a moment to be supposed—even though this is suggested by some of the passages cited—that the Sadducees rejected the prophets, or, in other words, refused to recognise them as having been channels of divine communications. On the other hand, it is not difficult to believe that these conservative guardians of the old priestly tradition should have resisted the addition of a second canon to that of the Law, which until then had held an exclusive place. In doing so, they would only have been maintaining the position of 144 B.C., whilst in this, as in other matters, the Pharisees represented the popular party of the time. The controversy

1 Cp. Weitz, Die 155 ff. and ed. 169 ff.; M. Hershkov, Origines et Growth of Rabbinic Religion (Hob. Inst. 189.), 41 ff. The fact that it was expressly prohibited to commit to writing the traditional law cannot of course be taken too literally; he maintained (cp. Strack, art. 'Thalmud' in REJ 833 ff.) that it is not impossible that there lies at the basis of a still reminiscence. Hardly, indeed, such a one as Strack suggests (p. 373 f.); but rather this: that the addition of all sorts of novelties to the canonical law was definitely put a stop to, and thus a reaction against this tendency to add, there arose, some time (say) in the course of the second century, a certain reluctance to write the further developments of the law – the Halakoth – until at last the codification of the Mishna put an end to this.

² Ryle's conjecture (p. 117) that the gradual admission of the Prophets to a place in the public reading of the synagogue preceded and led to their canonization, rests unfortunately on a precarious foundation, as we do not know whether the Haphtarā goes back to a sufficiently early date. The first mention of the public reading of the Prophets is in the NT (Lk. 4:16 f.; Acts 13:1-27), the next, in a very cursory and obscure form, is in the Mishna (Megilla, 4:6), and, very full and clear, in the Tosephta (Megilla, 4:3f., ed. Zuckermann, 225 ff.). This much may be taken for certain, that the reading of the Prophets came in very considerably later than that of the Law. That what led to it was the destructive search after copies of the Law in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. 1:57) is pure conjecture, even if proved it would be insufficient for Ryle's purpose. For the age of the H. piphārā, see Zimm., z. f. N. B., 116 f.; and on the Haphtarā in general, see Schurr, z. f. N. B., 237 f. It is necessary to add a note of warning as to 1 Macc. 1:56 f.

older and much more extensive than 4 Esdras I-aspis, namely the hymn to the great merit of past with which Jesus b. Sira (Ecclesiastus), in c. 44-50, concludes his didactic poem. From I downwards all the righteous are portrayed exactly in the order in which they occur in the Law and Former Prophets. The kings are treated quite on heteronormative lines: David, Hezekiah, and Josiah receive unqualified praise. Solomon is commended half heartedly whilst Rehoboam is spoken of as a fool and Jeroboam as a scoundrel. Elijah and Elisha and their place in the series immediately after these kings, whilst between Hezekiah and Josiah comes Isa. Of him we are told in one and the same sentence we read in chaps. 36-39 (cf. 2 K 18-20), and that his mighty inspiration he foresaw the future and comforted them that mourn in Zion (cp. 40). This part not only chaps. 36-39, but also chaps. 40-66, all were parts of the Book of Isaiah, and thus that the essential steps to its final redaction had been made (cf. Int'r. Lx. xviii.). Still more significant is that after Jeremiah (who is associated with Josiah, as I have shown with Hezekiah) and after Ezekiel, the twelve prophets of δωδεκα προφηται are mentioned, and disposed collectively in a single panegyric. Here already it is to say, we have the same consolidation as we have seen (§ 21) in the Mishna (where a single authorship of the persons of 'the men of the great synagogue' has been found for the one book of the twelve). We may surmise that Jesus b. Sira found the twelve books already grouped upon a single roll, and thus in their final form by his time the prophetic canon had been closed.

The conclusion of this hymn (chap. 50), answers the question as to the date of its author. It is the praise of Simon b. Onias who was high priest in Jesus b. S. 300 A.D. day. In this instance, it is certainly not Simon b. Just (cp § 36) that is intended, if it were only on account of the absence of the surname distinctively given to Josephus and the Mishna. The question is decided for Simon H. (ibid 200) by the prologue of the translation of the author, who made his version later than 132 B.C. (see ECCLESIASTICS, § 8).⁴ We there-

² The procedure here given him has no bearing on the place assigned to his book in the Prophetic canon (cf. above, § 1). It is the chronological succession of the persons that is being dealt with.

217¹ The doubt raised (not for the first time) by Bohm (loc. cit. 17, 230 ff.) against the genuineness of 1 Th. 1, 10, where the $\chi\lambda\iota\varsigma$ is referred to, was excellently disposed of by N. Loh (Z. N. T. 8, 1914, 18 ff.) by the evidence of the Syriac tradition (which rests immediately on the Hebrew), and by showing that in 1 Th. 1, 10, according to Cod. A and others, the correct reading is the plural $\mu\alpha\pi\epsilon\upsilon\lambda\epsilon\gamma\alpha\iota$ (followed by $\gamma\alpha\rho$ in Cod. B and $\epsilon\gamma\gamma\alpha\gamma\alpha$ in Cod. A), so that 10⁶ refers not to Ezekiel but to the XII. Another circumstance ought to be noted. If the phrase is exactly that of Jeremiah in Jer. 7, with that of II Th. 2, 13 (part from Isaiah) in Jer. 21, 6, and finally with that of the XII, it is 10⁶ is taken as applying wholly to them. To pass, then, before us as Zöckler (Die Apokryphen des N. T., 1894, p. 348 f.) silently does is quite inadmissible. I all the more now be added the testimony of the lately discovered Hebrew. The genuineness of 1 Th. 1, 10 is doubted by Bohm (loc. cit. 17, 230, p. 31), but without any reasons being given. On p. 31, he appears to be able to accept the genuineness.

4 The arguments by which I. Halevy (Étude sur la partie du texte Hébreu de l'Éclésiastique, rev. ed., Paris, 1897) endeavored to prove that Simon I. the Just is the author of chap. 50, have failed to convince the present writer. Still it should be kept in mind that even if Halevy were right in conclude—and the conclusion agrees with the course of the development traced above—that the prophetic collection already existed as such, pretty much in its present form, about the year 200 B.C.¹

Notable reasons for the same conclusion are supplied by the Book of Daniel (written about 164 B.C.). In the first place there is a reason of a positive character. In 9:2 we find Jer. 25:13 cited as דברי ירמיהו (in the [Holy] Scripture). Of greater weight, however, is a negative reason—the Book of Daniel itself found a place, not among the Prophets, but among the Writings. Other reasons for this might be conjectured,² but the most probable one still is that at the time of its recognition as canonized the canon of the Prophets had in current opinion been already definitely completed. The time of canonization, however, must be taken to have been considerably later than the date of composition (164 B.C.), and so this reason does not go for much. Still less important is the further fact, that the work of the Chronicler composed during the first half of the third century is not included among the Former Prophets. Its special character as a Midrash to already accepted biblical books must long have precluded its attaining the dignity of canonization; but a further circumstance helped to impede its recognition. The immediate integrity of the Former Prophets and the books of Jeremiah and Ezekiel (the right to their final form at an early date) had comparatively soon come to be regarded as fixed and unalterable,³ whilst, on the other hand, to append Chronicles to the later prophets was plainly impossible.

It remains, then, that the canonization of the Ketuvim we might almost say was of the second order of the Prophets.

41. Prophetic canon subordinate. Thus, however, does not yet bring us to an altogether unambiguous finding, with reference to either canonization or canon. It is only misleading if we allow ourselves, without justification, to carry back the idea of 'canonization' to the fully-developed form which it finally reached, to the earliest beginnings of the formation of a canon. It was impossible for the Jewish people to receive a 'canonical value in the same sense in which this was given to the Law—the subordinate character of the Prophetic canon remains fixed for all coming time.⁴ Holiness was, and continued to be, a relative conception, and we do not need to give to the designation דברי ירמיהו in Dan. 9:2 the same fullness of meaning that it has in the Talmud. The gulf between the Law and all the remaining books could be bridged only artificially, and we know with certainty that the bridging idea—the idea of a property common to all holy books, that of 'defining the hands'—was an invention of Pharisaic scholarship, withstood by the Sadducees even after the destruction of Jerusalem (Fad. 4:3). Until this bridge had been securely constructed there was no idea of a canon which included all three portions equally. This is proved by a fact to which we have already referred,—the Sadducean recognition of nothing but the Law. Before a definitive union of the Prophetic canon with that of the rate of Ecclesiasticalism ought not to be pushed back more than fifty or sixty years. The author may be descending in fact to the reminiscences from his early youth. See Kautsch in SVT, 1, p. 108 f.

The possibility of much later additions to the books admitted to the canon is unfortunately by no means excluded, as is sufficiently evident from the simple fact that even the Pentateuch continued to be added to long after its canonization (see § 32). This is not in the nature of the canon, but prevents us from attaching the appendices to Zephaniah (chaps. 9-11), the later Malachi period, as W. (H) 228, n. 2, and ed. 24, n. 1, appears to do (cp. Zephaniah 1:1), or admitting the two passages in Isaiah (already enlarged by the addition of chaps. 40-66) as indicated by Duhm's results. In these cases, however, we are justified in demanding very conclusive arguments.

Law could be effected the way had to be prepared by a continually rising appreciation of the prophetic literature, and by an ever-growing conception of its sanctity. To this result the Maccabean period must unquestionably have contributed much. Such passages as 1 Macc. 4:49, 9:27-11:4, and the Song of the Three Children (12:14, cp. Ps. 71:6) show not only how far people then felt themselves to be removed from the prophetic times, but also how highly those times were thought of. Still we must bear in mind the passage in 2 Macc. (12:1) already referred to (§ 27), which seems to show that even in the first century B.C., it was still possible to speak of the Prophets and of prophetic writings, in the same breath, as parts of the same library.

On the other hand it can be shown that there was once a time in which the Prophets, but not the Hagiographa, could be spoken of along with the Law as included among the sacred writings.

42. Prophets preceded Hagiographa. As the name of the Law can be used to designate the whole tripartite canon (see above, § 26), so also can the double name 'the Law and the Prophets' (cp. in N.T. Mt. 23:35; Lk. 16:17; Acts 28:23), and, in the tradition of the synagogue Kosher ha-shema, 16; Talm. B. 8:14; Talm. J. H. d. B. also Talm. B. 13:4). It may also be pointed out that the name Ketuvim (Hagiographa) includes the Prophets and the Writings (cp. the numerous passages in Lev. 44:1-3, but the synonymous expression Libri (see above, § 30), if we are correctly informed (Strack, 490), the 12 books only).

(3) The third canon, the Hagiographa. Here, again, there is no possibility of doubt that, at the time when the prophetic collection was closed, much of what we now find in our third canon was already in existence, and yet it did not gain admission into the canon and found no place in the canon of that day.

At bottom the reason is self-evident: it was a collection of prophets that was being made, and not that it is to say, of writings in which God himself spoke, employing the Law by the mouth of his prophets. Such other writings were then extant did not need to be included in the canon of Yahweh (the Law, the Prophets), the inner utterance of the God of Israel. One of them, indeed, the earlier nucleus of the Psalter, was in use as the hymn book of the Temple services, but to have admitted it into the canon on that account would have been very much the same as it now a Christian church were to place its hymns among its sacred books. There is no necessity, accordingly, of a further expansion of the canon. Sacred Writings, or thus the word with the canon of the canon of the canon, and also to say a reduced intensity, before any further books could find admission, not of course into either of the canons already existing, but into a third, subordinate rank to these. It is obvious, further, that age, or a considerable period must have elapsed before this extension of the idea could make way and thus render possible the admission of books which, at the time when the prophetic canon was closed, were still unwritten.

Besides the (obvious) condition of a book's having a religious character, the only remaining condition demanded by the test implied in the expanded idea of canon is the condition of date. These books were accepted which were considered to have been written during the prophetic period.

43. End of prophetic period. The passage already referred to in § 15, after some further explanation of the sacred writings (cp. 1:24), goes on to say: ἡ ἀρχὴ τῆς προφητείας ἐστὶν τὸ κατὰ θεὸν ἄρρητον ἔργον τοῦ θεοῦ, πρὸς τὸν ὅποιοις ἀνθρώποις ἀποκαλύπτει τὸν θεὸν, καὶ τὸν θεὸν ἀποκαλύπτει τὸν θεὸν, καὶ τὸν θεὸν ἀποκαλύπτει τὸν θεὸν. This is now the prophetic period, closes with Antiochus (167) and Nehemiah.

44. Exclusion of the Hagiographa in both cases. It must be recalled that the evidence for their inclusion is regarded as being so certain in the case of the Law and the Prophets as it is in that of the Law alone.

and canonicity (even in the case of non-prophetic books) is guaranteed only by contemporaneity with the continuous series of the prophets. This view is confirmed by the Talmudic tradition. Tos. Yadayim, 2:3 (p. 63) rules that 'books such as Ben Sira [Ecclesiasticus] and all books written לפניו [before] do not defile the hands'. This לפניו —i.e., 'from that time forward'—is the standing expression for the cessation of the prophetic period. Corresponding with it is the other phrase מעתה ('until then'), denoting this period. Further confirmation is found in Sav. 28a: 'Books like Ben Sira and similar books written from that time onwards may be read as one reads a letter' (cp on this, Bahl, § 2). The point of time is fixed by a passage in Seder olam raba, 13, as the time of Alexander the Macedonian; 'The rough legend (Dan. 8:21) is Alexander the Macedonian, who reigned twelve years; until then the prophets prophesied by the Holy Spirit; from that time forward incline thine ear and hearken to the word of the wise'.¹ If Alexander the Great here takes the place of Artaxerxes in Josephus, the explanation is simply that, according to the Jewish chronology and conception of history, Haggai and Zechariah, Ezra and Malachi all lived at the same time, which is contiguous with that of Alexander.²

We now know, therefore, that it is not out of mere caprice, but in accordance with a settled doctrine, that 4 Esd. 14 and Riba Rikra 1:51 declare all the canonical books to have been already in existence in Ezra's time. The time limit was a fixed one; difference of view was possible only with regard to the person of the author. From this doctrine we deduce the proposition: Into the third canon, that of the Hagiographa, were received all books of a religious character of which the date was believed to go back as far as to the Prophetic period, that is, to the time of Ezra and the Great Assembly.

The reason for the setting up of such a standard is easily intelligible. Down to the time of the Great 45. Reason of limit.

Assembly, the Spirit of God had been operative not only in the Law but also outside of it, namely in the Prophets, but 'from that time onwards' the Law took the command alone. 'Until then' it was possible to point to the presence of the factor which was essential to the production of sacred writings, but 'from that time onwards' it was not. Hence the conviction that the divine productive force had manifested itself even in those cases where the writing did not claim to be an immediate divine utterance; but only down to the close of the prophetic period. The proposition we have just formulated is sufficient to explain the reception or non-reception of all the books that we now have to deal with. Job was received as, according to general belief, a book of venerable antiquity; Ruth as a narrative relating to the period of the judges, and therefore (as was invariably assumed as matter of course in the case of historical narratives) as dating from the same time; the Psalms as broadly covered by the general idea that they were 'David's Psalms'; Proverbs, Canticles, and Ecclesiastes as resting on Solomon's name; Lamentations as resting on that of Jeremiah; Daniel as a prophet of the Persian period (which in its whole extent was supposed to fall within the prophetic age) overlooked in the earlier collection. The same consideration held good for Esther, regarded as a history book. At the close comes the Book of Ezra—separated from the general work of the Chronicler³—which, in its account of the Great Assembly, contained the original document on the close of the Prophetic period and so, as it were, puts the colophon to the completed canon. Had what we now call Chronicles—i.e., the first part of the Chronicler's work—been incorporated with the canon simultaneously with the incorporation of its second part, the Book of Ezra, the two would never have been separated, and even arranged in an order contrary to the chronological (cp LIT. CRIT., § 15). We may therefore say with all confidence that Chronicles did not come in till afterwards, as an appendix to the canon. The reason for its original exclusion was no doubt the consciousness, strictly, it was but a Midrash to other canonical books. The second part of the Chronicler's work, once canonized, tended to take the other along with it; possibly the Book of Chronicles may have been helped by the necessity with which it goes into the temple service—a factor to which at a later date, in the Massoretic arrangement (see above, § 8), it was indebted for a first place among the Hagiographa. From this one certain case, the inference may be inferred the possibility that other books, especially the immediately preceding ones (Ezra, Esther, Daniel; perhaps also Ruth; see above, § 9), were gradually added, one by one, to the third canon in way of appendices. At least, they all of them have the appearance of being, as to their contents, appendices to the two halves of the Prophetic canon, whilst the remaining six books form a class by themselves. We are, however, in a position to speak with certainty here.

Conversely, all other writings, so far as not excluded by reason of their language or some exception relating to their contents, may safely be supposed to have been excluded either because manifestly and on their own confession they did not go back to the Prophetic time, or because their claim to do so was not admitted.¹ The first mentioned reason must have been what operated in the case of works of so high a standing as 1 Mace. and Ecclesiasticus; as instances of the application of the same principle, we may take (in contrast to Daniel) the books of Baruch and Enoch.²

The attempt to determine the date at which the canon of the Hagiographa, and with it that of the entire OT, was finally closed, is again surrounded with the very greatest difficulty. Let us, to begin with, fix a terminus ad quem. It is given us in the passage frequently referred to already, in Josephus (c. 1.5) and 4 Esdras (chap. 14), where the entire corpus of the OT Scriptures, in twenty-two or twenty-four books, is set apart from all other writings. As to the extent of the canon, unanimity had been reached by at least somewhere about the year 100 A.D.

For a superior limit we shall have to begin where our investigation as to the prophetic canon ended—viz., as the son of Sirach. In his hymn he commemorates, as the last of the heroes of Israel, Zerubbabel and Joshua as well as Nehemiah, thereby conclusively showing that he was acquainted with the work of the Chronicler (19.11 ff.). Moreover, he makes use of passages from the Psalms. Neither fact proves anything for a third canon; the fact that he found his ideal and pattern in the prophets is rather against this (21.33: $\text{ἐν τοῖς διδασκαλῶν ὡς προφηταὶ ἐκχρῶ}$). The prologue of his descendant (after than 132 B.C.) shows still more unmistakably that no definite third canon was then in existence, even although already a certain number of books had begun to attach themselves to the Law and the Prophets. Three times he designates the whole aggregate of the literature which had been handed down, to which also his ancestor had sought to add his quota, as $\text{ὁ νόμος καὶ οἱ προφῆται καὶ τὰ ἄλλα τὰ κατ' αὐτοῖς ἠκολούθησαν}$; $\text{ὁ ν. κ. οἱ πρ. κ. τὰ ἄλλα πατρια βιβλία}$; $\text{ὁ ν. κ. αἱ προφητίαι οἱ προφῆται}$ (C); $\text{κ. τὰ λοιπὰ τῶν βιβλίων}$. What is thus designated by three different indeterminate expressions cannot have been a definite collection. That of these books, in whole or in part, there were already Greek translations we can gather from the Prologue; but we get no help either from this or from the LXX generally.

¹ Some found their way in, others not, on grounds of taste or the taste of the period, says Wellhausen (U. 2. 146), c. 1. 1. ed. 512). No doubt considerations of taste must have had influence on the decision whether the books in question came up to the standard; but it was the doctrine that formally decided.

CANON

In 1 Macc. 7:16 f. we find Ps. 79:2 f. cited with the formula κατὰ τὸν λόγον ὅτι (τοῖς λόγοις οὖν) ἐγραψέ. In other words, as Holy Scripture. In 259 f. Daniel and his three friends are named as patterns in immediate connection with Elijah, David, Caleb, and others; 1:54 seems to quote Daniel's prediction (Dan. 9:27). We here see, somewhere about the close of the second or the beginning of the last century B.C., the Book of Daniel for the first time coming into evidence as a fully accredited authority—we could not possibly have expected so to find it at any earlier date.

Unfortunately these testimonies, such as they are, are followed by a very wide hiatus. Philo (op. cit. 50

60. Philo. A.D.) is our next resort; but, great as is the extent of his writings (all proceeding uncompromisingly on the allegorical method of biblical interpretation), they do not yield us much that is satisfactory in our present inquiry.¹ Nowhere do we find a witness to a tripartite canon.² Of the canonical books he nowhere quotes Ezekiel, any of the five Megilloth, Daniel, or Chronicles.³ The blank is a great one. Still we may find some compensation in the fact that at least the Book of Ezra is cited with the solemn formula applicable to a divinely inspired writing.⁴ A certain conclusion as to the incompleteness of the canon cannot be drawn from this silence regarding many books. On the other hand, real importance attaches to the following piece of negative evidence: Philo, although (as an Alexandrian) he must have been acquainted with many non-canonical books, and indeed actually betrays such acquaintance, in no instance uses them in the same way as the canonical. This allows as probable the inference that a definitely closed canon was known to him; only we are not able to say from any data supplied by him what was the extent of that canon in its third part.

Our next witness is the NT. In Lk. 24:44 we have evidence of the tripartite division, for 'the psalms' probably stands a priori for the whole of the

61. NT. third canon. Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Esther, and Ezra are not referred to at all. Of course here again nothing certain is to be inferred from the silence; but, if other considerations came into play, this fact also ought to be taken into account. On the other side, the certain reference to Chronicles in Mt. 23:35, Lk. 11:51⁵ is entitled to have weight. The quotation of Dan. 7:22 in 1 Cor. 6:2 also must be referred to.⁶

There thus remains a space of something like two centuries—say from the end of the second century B.C.

¹ Cp Hornemann (Observationes ad illustrationem doctrinae de canone V.T. ex Philone, 1775, copious extracts from which are given in Eichhorn's Einl. (4) 123 ff.). Till the appearance of Prof. H. E. Ryle's Philo and the Holy Scripture (1855), the statements of Hornemann had never been verified with sufficient care; though, on the other hand, they had not in any point been shown to be inaccurate. Prof. Ryle's results do not, however, differ much from those of Hornemann.

² Apart from De Vit. Contempl. § 3, probably a work of a much later time. Cp Lucian, The Theraputen, 1870, and Schreier's review of Cyprian's Philo about the Contemplative Life, TLZ, 20th July 1895.

to about 100 A.D.—within which we are unable to point out any sure indications of the close of the third canon.

62. No decision. Ryle (p. 173 ff.) thinks it can be made out with a very high degree of probability that the close took place as early as the second century B.C., between 106 and 105, the year of the death of John Hyrcanus II. His one positive reason¹ is that the civil wars and scholastic controversies of the last century B.C. must have withdrawn interest from such things and made impossible any union of schools or any public step that could alter the status quo. That there ever was a union of schools, however, we have every reason to deny; the extension of the canon was in all probability only one of the internal affairs of the Pharisaic school (cp above, § 37). From this it necessarily follows that there is no question about any public step being taken—say a deliberate decision, reached once for all, or a decree of any authoritative assembly.

We actually have express information, however, of such a decision at a much later time. It is obvious

63. Mishna. that no such thing would have been necessary if a binding decision had already been long in existence. We refer at present to the controversy of which we read in the Mishna (Tract. Shab. 35; cp 1. Shab., 51).

The general proposition there laid down runs as follows: 'All holy scripture (תנ"ך) defile the hands' (cp above, § 9); next follows the particular: 'Canticles and Ecclesiastes defile the hands.' Then we have the controversy. 'R. Juda said: Canticles indeed defile the hands; as regards Ecclesiastes opinion is divided.' R. Jose said: 'Ecclesiastes does not defile the hands, but as regards Canticles opinion is divided.' R. Simon said: 'About Ecclesiastes the school of Shammai gives the laver, the school of Hillel the severer decision; therefore compare the elucidation in 1. Shab., 51, that according to the latter [Shammai] Ecclesiastes does not defile the hands, according to the latter it does.' R. Simon b. Azai said: 'To me it has been handed down from the mouth of the seventy-two elders that, on the day on which R. Elizer b. Azai was made supreme head, it was decided that (both) Canticles and Ecclesiastes defile the hands.' R. Akiba said: 'God forbid that there should ever have been difference of opinion in Israel about Canticles, as if it did not defile the hands; for the entire world, from the beginning until now, does not outweigh the day in which Canticles was given to Israel.' For 1. Shab. (2) all Scriptures (כ"ת) are holy (קדש), but Canticles is holy of holies (קדש קדש). If people were divided in opinion, it was as to Ecclesiastes alone. R. Johanan b. Johanan, the son of R. Akiba's father-in-law, said: 'As the son of Azai says, people were thus divided in opinion, and it is thus that the matter has been decided.'

It has been contended that the dispute here was not about the question of canonicity, both books being clearly

64. Meaning of dispute. included in the opening sentences under the category of holy, and that the word

קדש, 'to preserve, lay aside, hide,' the technical expression for the treatment with which the books in question were threatened, does not mean 'to pronounce apocryphal' but only something like 'to exclude from public reading.'² Both contentions are incorrect. The word in question is not used with reference to Ecclesiastes or other apocryphal works, simply because no one had ever spoken of canonizing them, and thus there could not possibly be any question about doing away with them or removing them. And that our passage certainly is discussing the question whether the two books are Holy Scripture or not, is

² By this we are certainly, in accordance with § 2, to understand the entire canon. On the other hand, the כ"ת mentioned later on may mean in reality the Hagit gratia.

⁴ The tract, 1. Shab. de R. Nathan (chap. 1, as we saw above (§ 18), takes this decision back, as also in the case of Proverbs, to the time of the Great Synagogue.

made unmistakably evident by the words of R. 'Akiba. In this final stage of the development the question cannot possibly be whether perhaps, though integral parts of Holy Scripture, they nevertheless do not defile the hands: it is established that 'all Holy Scriptures defile the hands.' Then follows the Mishmic decision that the books of Canticles and Ecclesiastes also belong to this class; after this, the discussion which preceded the decision, and the grounds on which it was reached, are given.

In this connection the precise fixing of the day on which this decision was arrived at is important: the day 55, 100 A.D. on which at Jamnia (Yabna) R. Gamaliel II. was incidentally deposed from his place as president of the court of justice, an incident for which we have also other early testimonies.¹ This event certainly falls within the decades that immediately followed the destruction of Jerusalem—whether so early as 90 A.D. (the usual assumption) is questionable, but 100 A.D. will not in any case be very wide of the mark. This period, then, saw the settlement of a twofold controversy, which, as regards one half of it at least, had already occupied the schools of Hillel and Shammai about a century before. This last point is conceded even by a zealot like R. 'Akiba: his unrestrained exaggeration as regards Canticles is only a veil to cover the weakness of his position.² We hear nothing of any decision of the question preceding that of Jamnia. That, after the proceedings of that stormy day, the question should have been discussed again some decades later (R. 'Akiba ib. 135), need not surprise us. No new decision is arrived at: the question is answered by a confirmation of that of Jamnia.³

Thus, then, about the year 100 A.D. there was still, as an unsettled controversy, the same question as to the canonicity of two books, which as regards one of them (Ecclesiastes; see ECCLESIASTES, § 3) had been a notorious point of difference between the two great schools of the Pharisees.⁴ By that time, however,

² The remark has a wider application to rabbinical Judaism generally and the other Megillah: cp We. Int. 554, 6th ed. 514.

³ The reader is referred to Buhl (28 ff.), Willeboer (38 ff.), Kyle (192 ff.), and the articles PERIM and NUSKOR for the later and less amply attested disputes about Esther, Proverbs, Ezekiel, and Jonah (mentioned in the order of the degree of their attestation). It is only in the case of the Book of ESTHER (277, § 12) that such disputes can have been really serious. In the case of Ezekiel, there may be a genuine reminiscence of the embarrassment caused to the scribes by the discrepancies between the Law and Ezek. 40-48, perhaps also of the objections raised by the Sadducees on this account. In part at least, we must admit the truth of Strack's remark (p. 429) that 'in many cases the discussions leave one with the impression that the objections were raised merely that they might be refuted.' This impression, however, in no way impairs that of the real seriousness of the decision of Jamnia. That the four books mentioned above are not named in Int. 35 proves in any case that at that time serious objections to them were no longer entertained, and as we are here dealing only with the close of the canon, not with the individual books of which it was composed, this fact must suffice for us.

He represents the one side of the case. The subject is one that belongs to 'special introduction'; but, in passing, the present writer may be allowed to express the view that, in the present text of Ecclesiastes, traces are to be clearly found of the assistance which it was found necessary to give, in order to secure for this book a place in the canon. In 12 it is testified of the preacher (288) that he was a well-meaning and respectable man (of course otherwise unknown). The contradiction to 17, where he is represented as being 'the son of David,' king in Jerusalem, is glaring. These words, as also 112 (v), a good deal in 247, and perhaps also 713a and certainly 1213-14 are interpolations, by means of which, alone the reception of the book into the canon was rendered possible. It is self-evident that Canticles also was a part of the canon, only by virtue of its super-cription which ascribes it to Solomon. A valuable light is thrown on R. 'Akiba's assertion that Canticles had never been disputed, and at the same time a trustworthy evidence, the question had long been (substantially) a settled one as is shown by the passages quoted from Josephus 4 Esdras; settled, however, not by any single decision but only by the gradual clearing up of public opinion. Of other books in addition to the twenty-four there is no question whatever, and as regards those two at which alone any difficulty is possible, common opinion came to be so decidedly in favour of what claimed to be the stricter but in reality was the looser opinion that the zealot R. 'Akiba comes forward fanatically to the side of Hillel.

We may now venture to figure to ourselves what the probable course of the development, and what attitude assumed by various sections of the community towards the decisive question.

56. Result. It is probable that among the Sopherim (professional students of Scripture) of the last century B.C., without the co-operation of the Sadducean priesthood, there was gradually formulated a scholarly doctrine as to which of the many religious writings then current could establish a just claim to a sacred character. We have already seen by what standard the writings were judged. As this doctrine gradually to shine, unanimity was reached on every point except on a dispute with reference to two minor books in which, as was natural, the victory was ultimately gained by the more liberal view. This doctrine of the Sopherim, as being the view of those who were the unqualified judges on the special subject, readily gained admission amongst such as were in doubt and sought to inform themselves.¹ Thus the learned Philo, though living in Alexandria, takes very good care not to contravene the stricter practice; what we know about the opposition offered to the books of Ecclesiastes, Canticles and Esther, even suggests the possibility (unacceptable course of proof) that his silence about certain books (cp above, § 50) really arises from a still greater shyness. As a convert to Pharisaism, Josephus probably shared the true of his teachers with an emphasis on the greater because his own personal leanings were (perhaps) against such exclusiveness. On the other hand, though the doctrine made way, yet the majority of the people betook themselves quite naturally to the mass of apocalyptic and legendary literature, which in the century immediately before and after the birth of Jesus, exercised a very great influence, and did much to prepare the way for Christianity. The formulated theory possessed obvious advantages, however, and the Jewish war and the destruction of Jerusalem left the Pharisees in sole possession of the leadership of Israel. This is shown most clearly by 4 Esdras. Against his will, the author of that book is constrained to acknowledge the divine authority of the canon with its twenty-four constituent parts. Being, however, a thoroughgoing partisan of the apocalyptic literature, he outdoes the Pharisees. To the seventy books² which they exclude he attributes a still higher authority, placing them in an esoteric as distinguished from an exoteric canon.

By the end of the first century the scribes had settled the last of the questions controverted in the schools, and not long after the beginning of the second century (R. 'Akiba ib. 135), to refer to the decision of Jamnia is decisive. Later, following in 'Akiba's footsteps, the scribes succeeded, not only in obliterating every trace showing how long its true character still continued to be, but is conveyed by the information that R. 'Akiba himself had an anathema against those who sang the Song of Songs in a wanton voice in houses of public entertainment (100 Sanh. chap. 12; cp WBS, Int. 276).

² If, as we have conjectured, the Sadducees were not opposed to, or suspicious of, the resurrection of the dead, and besides the Law, there would be an additional reason for a view like that of the Pharisees, which took a much more endless multiplication of religious literature.

of variations in the text, but also in driving from circulation the whole body of extra-canonical literature.¹

Christianity, however, in the vigour of its youth, emancipated from the authority of the scribes, continued to pursue the old ways. In the rejected literature it discovered prophecies of the appearing of Jesus, and what the Pharisees destroyed in the original language it eagerly handed down in translations and revisions to succeeding generations. The NT writers show no scruple in quoting extra-canonical books as sacred, and we find ascribed to Jesus some expressions quoted as Holy Writ (Lk. 11.17, Jn. 7.38) which are not contained in the OT.²

What is more, examples of this form of Jewish literature used with Christian elements, or worked over from the Christian point of view, have found their way into the canon of the NT itself—a fact which only lately has begun to receive the attention it deserves.³

This independent drift of tendency within the Christian Church greatly increases the difficulty of estimating the so-called 'canon of the Alexandrians'.⁴

As is well known, even the oldest extant MSS of the LXX contain, in addition to the canonical books, a greatly varying number of writings which are not recognised in the canon of the synagogue, and indeed in some cases were not even originally written in Hebrew. On the other hand, the oldest of these MSS are several centuries later than the Christian era, and are the work of Christian copyists. It becomes a question, therefore, which is the earlier: the finer gravis of the Alexandrian Jews or that of primitive Christianity; whether the greater compass of the LXX canon of the Alexandrians influenced the view of the Christian communities or whether the influence flowed the other way.⁵

The probability is that, in fact, the influence worked both ways. What principally concerns us here, however, is this. About the middle of the first century A.D., when the Greek-speaking Christian community began to break entirely with Judaism, the narrow Pharisaic doctrine of the canon had certainly not as yet penetrated into the domain of Hellenistic Judaism so deeply as to delete completely, or to exclude from the MSS of the LXX, all the books that Pharisaism refused to recognise. The vacillation in individual MSS must at that time have been even greater than it is in those which have reached us; although on this point definite knowledge is unobtainable. It is certain, however, that to some extent precisely those books belonging to this category which lay nearest to the heart of the Christian community in its most primitive days (especially Enoch and 4 Esdras) have come down to us in no Greek MS. The conclusion is that the additions to the LXX are for the most part older than Christianity.

The doctrine of the Pharisees, however, ultimately won the day also in its proper home. Not only did

1 Indeed it was supposed, until the recovery in 1866 of part of the Peshitta, that they had actually succeeded in extirpating it so far, that is, as it was not able to hide itself under the veil of exegesis in the Haggada, Midrash, and Talmud (We. 190, 192, 200 and ed. 287).

2 Even Ecclesiastes would be no exception if we could admit the mention of D. S. Margolin (The Origin of the 'Original Hebrew' of Ecclesiastes, 1890). In his opinion the 'Original Hebrew' is a bad translation from the Syriac version and a Persian translation of the Greek made after 1000 A.D. by an Arian-speaking Jew for Christians who were taught Hebrew by a Jew with a pronunciation similar to that of the Christians of Urmia. The reader will probably hesitate to accept this theory; still it cannot be denied that Margolin has availed himself with great skill of many weak points of the Hebrew text, which in any case need a thorough revision.

4 In fact, the book strictly, there never was such a canon. The Alexandrian Canon (H. 1) books never underwent that revision in regard to the Pharisaic conception of 'definitive canon' which finally fixed the Hebrew canon.

5 In this point there seems to be some well-founded opinion in that if we compare pp. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

Meanwhile a similar process had been going on in regard to other writings of the apostolic age. These

62. Epistles. were for the most part letters, written in many instances to particular churches, and designed to meet special needs. The writers betray no consciousness that their words would come to be regarded as a permanent standard of doctrine or of action in the Christian Church: they write for an immediate purpose, and just as they would wish to speak, were they able to be present with those whom they address. In their absence, and still more after their death, their letters were cherished and read up and again by the churches which had first received and by others who naturally welcomed such precepts as relics of the apostolic age. For the apostles were the authorised instructors of the Christian Church. In the age which succeeded them, 'the Lord and the apostles' became the natural standard of appeal to which reference was to be made in all matters of faith and practice. For some time 'the tradition of the apostles,' as handed down in the churches of their foundation, was regarded as the test of orthodoxy. Oral tradition, however, is necessarily variable and uncertain. It was natural that, when actual disciples of the apostles were no longer living, appeal should more and more be made to their written words, and that these should be set side by side with the Gospels as the primary documents of the Christian faith. Here again the same elements as before come into play, though probably at a slightly later period—viz., the liturgical use of the epistles, and the necessity of maintaining them intact against the mutilations or rejections of heretical sects.

In the collection which was thus gradually being formed by the pressure of various circumstances and with no distinct consciousness of the creation

63. Other books. of a canon, a place was found beside the Gospels and the epistles for two other books. The Apocalypse of John opened with the salutation of an epistle, and, even apart from this, its apocalyptic character claimed for it a special and abiding sacredness; moreover it contained an express blessing for those who should read and listen to it, and a warning against any who should presume to alter or add to it. The Acts of the Apostles would find an easy entrance, partly as an authorised account of the deeds of apostles written by one who had contemporaneous knowledge of them, and still more as being in form the second part of the Third Gospel and properly inseparable from the earlier book.

Thus side by side with the old Jewish canon, and without in any way displacing it, there had sprung up a new Christian canon. Although its exact limits were not yet precisely defined, and local variations of opinion were to be observed with regard to the acceptance of particular books, the idea of such a new canon

64. A new canon. was in full play in the writings of great representative men of the period from 180 to 200 A.D.—of Irenaeus speaking for Asia Minor and Gaul, of Tertullian in N. Africa, and of Clement in Alexandria. The Church is by this time fully conscious that she is in possession of written documents of the apostolic age; documents to which reference must be universally made, as to a final court of appeal, in questions of right faith and right action. The authority of Jesus and his apostles is, in the main, embodied for her in writings which she reads together with the OT in her public services, quotes as Scripture, and regards as the inspired revelation of divine truth. Of the stages by which this result has been reached the writers referred to have nothing to tell us. It was, as we have seen, the issue of an unconscious growth, natural and for the most part unchallenged, and so leaving no recorded history behind it. If the Church was awakened to a consciousness of her great possession, and to the importance of maintaining its integrity, by the attempts made by heretics to debrand her of portions of it there is no evidence of deliberate efforts on her part to build up the concept of a new canon in opposition to them; much less any formal declarations, such as those of later times defining what books should or should not be included in it. In the stress of controversy she fell back on treasures which she possessed, and realised that in books which she was accustomed to read for the instruction of her children she had, on the one hand, full and harmonious expression of all those positive truths whose isolation or exaggeration formed the groundwork of the several heretical systems; and, on the other hand, the decisive contradiction of negations in which their capricious selections involved those who rejected any part of the common heritage.

2. That the sketch given above of the gradual growth of a new canon with its twofold contents, in the period anterior to Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Clement, is justified not only by intrinsic probability but also by references of early Christian writers to books of the NT, may be seen by consulting the collections of such references assembled in modern treatises upon the canon. Here a brief outline of the evidence must suffice.

65. Evidence of orthodox writers: Clement, etc.

In the Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians (circa 95) we have two precepts introduced by a command to 'remember the words of our Lord Jesus' (Acts 20:35); in neither case do they exactly agree with the language of our Gospels; they may be a result of a fusion due to citation from memory, or they may possibly be derived from oral tradition. The epistle is saturated with the phraseology of the Pauline Epistles (Rom., 1 Cor., Eph.; less certainly 1 Tim. and others) and of the Epistle to the Hebrews; but these are not directly cited, and the expressions 'Scripture' and 'it is written' are applied to the OT alone.

In the genuine Epistles of Ignatius of Antioch (shortly after 110 A.D., Lightfoot) the direct citation of words of Jesus ('I lay hold on handle me and see that I am not a spirit δαιμόνιον without body,' Ad Smyrn. 3) is possibly derived from an apocryphal book or from an oral tradition. The language of these Epistles shows traces of acquaintance with Mt. and Jn. and with several of the Pauline Epistles. The Epistle of Polycarp (circa 110 A.D., Lightfoot) is largely composed of quotations from NT books (especially Mt., Lk., 1 and 2 Jn., 1 Pet., and the Pauline Epistles). There is but one (somewhat uncertain) instance of the citation of NT words as Scripture.

The Epistle of Barnabas (circa 98 A.D., Lightfoot) though most scholars place it later) prefixes to the saying 'Many called but few chosen,' the formula 'it is written.' If this be cited from Mt. 22:14—and a later reference makes it not improbable—then we have here the earliest use of this formula in reference to a book of the NT.

The Teaching of the Apostles (date uncertain; perhaps 110-130) introduces a form of the Lord's Prayer, which has variants both from Mt. and Lk., by the words, 'as the Lord commanded in his Gospel, so pray ye' (chap. 8, cp. chap. 11, 15). It clearly presupposes a written Gospel, and shows acquaintance with Mt. and Lk. It has embodied an ancient (perhaps Jewish) maxim, 'The Two Ways' (used also in Ep. Barn. and elsewhere), and also certain early Christian prayers which incorporate the language of Jn.

The Apology of Aristides, the Athenian philosopher (circa 125-130 A.D.), addressed to the emperor Hadrian (acc. to Euseb. and the title of Arin. vers.; the title of the Syr. vers. would place it a few years later, under Antoninus Pius), twice refers expressly to writings of the Christians; in the first instance, after enumerating the main events of the life of Jesus—including his birth 'from a Hebrew virgin' and his ascension—distinctly appeals to the written Gospel for corroboration. It also embodies language from the Epistle to the Romans.

The Shepherd of Hermas (date uncertain: 110-140) betrays a close acquaintance with many NT books, though it makes no direct citations either from OT or from NT. The language of our four Gospels (even of the Appendix to Mk.) of the Pauline Epistles including the Pastoral Epistles, of 1 Pe., Acts, Apoc., and above all of Jas., is adopted by the writer; and even 2 Pe. seems to have been used.

Before we come to the fuller testimonies of Justin Martyr and subsequent writers it is necessary to examine the evidence to be derived from Papias.

66. Papias. His date and the interpretation to be placed on his fragmentary remains have been the subject of much criticism (see esp. Lightfoot, Notes on Supernatural Religion, 142-216). He was the hearer of at least two personal disciples of Jesus, and his great work may be placed about 130-140. It was entitled Λόγια ἀποστόλων ἐξηγήσεις, 'Expositions of the Oracles of (or 'concerning') the Lord'. As Λόγια is a term used in the NT of the OT writings, the title of the book naturally suggests some kind of commentary on the writings relating to Jesus; i.e., on written Gospels which held a recognised position of sacredness in the Christian Church. It is probable that similar commentaries on one or more of the Gospels had already been composed by Gnostic writers; thus Basilides is said to have written twenty-four books on 'the Gospel' (ibid. 117-138). Such books are disparaged by Papias as wordy and misleading; he prefers to fall back on the testimonies of the living disciples of those who had seen the Lord. He gives accounts, not free from difficulties, of the composition of Gospels by Matthew and Mark. On the whole, the facts seem to be most readily accounted for if we suppose that Papias in his five books expounded and illustrated by traditional stories the four Gospels as we at present know them. Eusebius further expressly informs us that Papias used 1 Jn. and 1 Pe. There can be little doubt that his chiliastic views were based on the Apocalypse.

Justin Martyr (circa 152), when mentioning the words of the institution of the Eucharist, says: 'So the apostles handed down in the Memoirs made by them, which are called Gospels' (ibid. 166).

67. Justin. In describing the Sunday worship, too, he refers to 'The Memoirs of the Apostles' (ibid. 167; see Lord's Day), and these Memoirs (ἀπομνημονεύματα) are placed on a level with the 'Writings of the Prophets' as an alternative means of edification in the gatherings of the Christian Church. Justin's use of them, here and in his Dialogue with the Jew Trypho, is conditioned by the necessities of his argument. In themselves they would have no weight with heathen or Jewish opponents. The OT prophecies, however, could be freely appealed to in either case, as the argument rested on their fulfilment rather than on their sacredness. Justin accordingly uses 'The Memoirs of the Apostles' as historical documents in proof of the fulfilment of Messianic predictions in the recorded events of the life of Jesus. Twelve times he refers to them directly in the Dialogue—all the instances being in connection with his exposition of Ps. 22. In every case, both here and in the Apology, the reference is fully accounted for by the supposition that these 'Memoirs' were our four Gospels, the phraseology of each of which can be traced in his writings. Where he most carefully describes them, after referring to an event recorded only by Lk., he says that 'they were compiled by Christ's apostles and those who companied with them.' This exactly agrees with the traditional authorship of our Gospels, as written two by apostles (Mt., Jn.), and two by followers of apostles (Mk., Lk.). Justin likewise refers for corroboration of his statements to official Acta Pilati; he may perhaps have been acquainted with a more primitive form of the apocryphal materials still surviving under that designation. There is, however, no satisfactory evidence that he used any apocryphal Gospel (unless perhaps a Protevangel or Gospel of the Infancy). He refers directly to the Apocalypse as written by the apostle John (ibid. 81), and shows acquaintance with most of the Pauline Epistles.

From Justin we pass to his pupil Tatian (circa 150-160 A.D.), who helps to confirm our conclusions as to 68. Tatian. Justin himself by his use of our four Gospels and no other in his Diatriakon.

This remarkable book, which for a long period must have been the only Gospel of many Syrian churches, is known to us mainly through a commentary upon it written by Ephraim, and preserved to us in an Armenian translation, and also through an Arabic version of the Diatriakon itself—made, however, after the later text of the Peshitta Syriac had been substituted for Tatian's own text, which had many interesting variants of an early type. The two sources of evidence supplement each other, and make it certain that Tatian's Gospels were none other than our own. There is some reason for thinking that Tatian also introduced into Syria a collection of the Pauline Epistles.

Although Tatian adopted heretical opinions after the death of his master, his great work on the Gospels appears to be quite independent of these

69. Unorthodox: Basilides, etc. and was accepted without question by the Syrian Church. It will be well, however, to notice at this point the evidence to be derived from other heretical leaders in regard to the estimation in which various books of the NT were held by those who were dissatisfied with the teaching of the main body of the Church. It will suffice to take three writers of whom we have a considerable amount of information preserved to us. Basilides of Alexandria flourished in the reign of Hadrian. His Expositions on the Gospel, in twenty-four books, have already been mentioned. Accepting, with Hort, the account preserved in the Refutation of Heresies (generally ascribed to Hippolytus) as representing portions of this work, we meet with the striking fact that quotations from the NT introduced with the words 'The Scripture saith,' and 'as it is written,' are found in a heretical writer at a period at which they cannot with certainty be said to be so introduced by any writer within the Church. Several passages from the Pauline Epistles are so cited by Basilides. He also used Mt., Lk., Jn., and apparently 1 Pe.

Marion (circa 140) undertook to restore the simplicity of Christianity on the basis of Paul, whom he regarded as the only true apostle. He rejected the OT and retained of the NT only Lk. in a mutilated form, and ten Epistles of Paul; the Pastoral Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews not being included in his canon. There is no indication that he applied any other standard than that of correspondence with his own dogmatic position, in making what must be considered the earliest attempt at the conscious definition of a NT canon.

Heracleon (circa 170, or earlier), a disciple of Valentinus, wrote a Commentary on Jn., of which considerable fragments are preserved by Origen. His system of interpretation shows that he held the exact words of the Evangelist in the highest veneration, as distinct with spiritual meaning. He also commented on Lk., and shows acquaintance with Mt., Heb., and the Pauline Epistles including 2 Tim.

Thus the first certain citations of NT writings with the formula familiarly used of the OT, the first attempt at defining a NT canon, and the first commentary on a NT book, come to us not from within but from without the Church. These are striking evidences of the authority generally accorded to the NT writings; in the words of Irenaeus (iii. 27): 'So strong is the position of our Gospels, that the heretics themselves bear witness to them, and each must start from these to prove his own doctrine.'

reason for believing that the translation of parts at least of both these versions must be placed not much later than the middle of the second century (see Text, §§ 20, 32). The Old Latin version seems to have been made in N. Africa, and to have included, probably before the time of Tertullian, all the books of the later canon, excepting Jas., 2 Pe., and possibly Heb. When the Scillitan Martyrs (N. Africa, 180 A.D.) were examined as to what was contained in their book-chest, their brief recorded reply was 'Books and Epistles of Paul, a just man.' Such was their description of the writings which, doubtless, were used by them in their services. It is conditioned by the circumstance of its utterance before heathen judges; it would be wrong to conclude from it that the Pauline Epistles were placed by them on a different level from the other sacred writings. The Old Syriac of the Gospels has till lately been known only from Cureton's imperfect MS; but the palimpsest recently found at Mt. Sinai enables us to reconstruct this version for the most part with approximate certainty. A selection of comments by Ephraim on the Acts of the Apostles, and his Commentary on the Pauline Epistles, preserved in Armenian translations, point to an Old Syriac version of these books also. The older MSS of the revised Syriac version (the Peshitta) do not contain 2 and 3 Jn., 2 Pe., Jude, and Apoc.

We have been concerned hitherto with tracing the growth of the conception of a NT canon, without considering, except incidentally, the range of writings included in it. The influence of the main body of the NT literature upon the writers of the period with which we have been dealing cannot be at all fully appreciated from our scanty analysis. Their writings must themselves be studied line by line, if we are to understand the debt which they owed, as regards both ideas and phraseology, to the documents of the apostolic age. In that age new conceptions had been given to the world, and a new terminology had been formed for their expression. The next age reproduced these; but it was not itself creative. This is seen, for instance, in the technical terms of even the boldest of the Gnostic speculations. Whatever may have been men's conscious attitude towards the NT writings, it is clear that they are dominated by them from the very first. Gradually they come to recognise them more and more as their masters; and then, both within the Church and outside it, we find them definitely declaring the limits of the canon to which they owe this allegiance.

Marcion's list of sacred books has already been noticed. The next list of which we have any knowledge is unfortunately a fragment, and tells us neither its date nor its author's name or locality. It was published in 1740

by Lodovico Antonio Muratori, the librarian at Milan. Hence it is known as the Muratorian canon. It is in barbarous Latin, in a seventh or eighth century MS; but its original must have been Greek, and it is generally agreed that it was written in the West (perhaps at Rome) towards the close of the second century. Lightfoot conjectured that it was a portion of the 'Verses on all the Scriptures' assigned to Hippolytus. The fragment commences with the end of a description of Mark; it goes on to speak of Luke and John, and refers to the different beginnings of the four books of the Gospel. After Acts come the Epistles of Paul; the seven churches to which he wrote being paralleled with the seven of the Apocalypse, and enumerated in the following order—Cor., Eph., Phil., Col., Gal., Thess.,

CANON

Rom. Then come four private letters—Philemon and the Pastoral epistles. Two other epistles are declared forgeries—viz., those to the Laodiceans and to the Alexandrians. Then we have Jude, two epistles of John (1 Jn. has been quoted from at an earlier point, so that these may perhaps be 2 and 3 Jn.), and the Wisdom of Solomon, 'written in his honour.' Then the 'Apocalypses of John and Peter alone receive, which (sing.) some among us will not have read in the church.' The Shepherd of Hermas 'ought to be read,' but not reckoned either with the prophets or with the apostles. After a few more lines, as rejected books, the text being very corrupt, the fragment suddenly closes. The omissions are deserving of notice: nothing is said of 1 and 2 Peter, James, and Hebrews; but the omitted epistles were undoubtedly (if we except 2 Peter) known at this time in the Roman church. It is difficult, therefore, to draw conclusions from this omission in a fragment of whose history so little can be ascertained and whose text is so obviously corrupt. The Muratorian canon is fully discussed by Zahn, History of the Canon (1900) 214; quite recently Dom Amelli of Monte Cassino has published fragments of it from other MSS (Misc. Cassin., 1897).

5. The inclusion (though with an expression of variance of opinion) of the Apocryphal Peter in the 'Muratorian Fragment' leads us to say something of books which for a time claimed a place in the canon, but were ultimately excluded.

The Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, and the Homily, mis-called his 'Second Epistle,' are contained after the Apocalypse, in Cod. A (the great Greek Bible of the 5th cent. in the Vat. Mus.). The Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas hold a similar place in the Sinaitic Bible (N. 4th cent.). The latter books are occasionally cited as Scripture in patristic writings, and this is the case also with the Teaching of the Apostles.

Of apocryphal Gospels two deserve special notice. The Gospel according to the Hebrews is known only by a few fragments, which show that it bore a close relation to our First Gospel. Clement of Alexandria and Origen quote from it, although they insist on its sole authority of our four Gospels. The Gospel according to Peter, a considerable fragment of which was published in 1892 from a MS found in Egypt, is known to have been used in the church of Rhossus near Antioch. Serapion, Bishop of Antioch (190-203), at first permitted its use, but subsequently disallowed it on the ground of Docetic errors. The extant portion embodies the language of all our four Gospels, though it often perverts their statements. There is no trace of the use of any other Gospel in its composition, though certain phrases may possibly be borrowed from some earlier apocryphal book. Its composition may with probability be assigned to circa 105. Its testimony to the canon is thus somewhat parallel in date and extent to that of Tatian's Diatessaron.

The Apocalypse of Peter, of which a fragment was recovered at the same time, was an early book which powerfully influenced subsequent literature of a similar kind—e.g., the Apocalypse of Paul. It seems to be responsible for much of the medieval conception of heaven and hell. It presents curious coincidences with 2 Peter. It is quoted as Scripture by Clement of Alexandria; and as late as the fifth century it was read on Good Friday in certain churches of Palestine.

6. Our inquiry has revealed to us that towards the close of the second century, by the time of Irenaeus,

74. Result. Tertullian, and Clement—writers whose testimonies are so abundant that we need not dwell upon them here—the Church had attained to a conscious recognition of a canon of the New Testament. Three classes of books have come into view: (1) the main bulk of the NT books, as to which (1) doubt; at all is expressed by writers within the Church; (2) books whose position in the canon was challenged in certain quarters, although they ultimately were included; (3) books which were read in certain churches, but were ultimately classed as non-canonical. With regard to books of the second of these classes the later history of their reception will be found under the special articles devoted to them, and in the works to which reference is made below. With regard to the third it may suffice to say that the verdict of the Church has been fully justified by the fact that no serious effort has ever been made to restate them.

ii. NT Canon.—A brief outline of a subject of the highest importance, which bristles with points of controversy, has necessarily passed over in silence a large portion of the evidence, and needs to be supplemented by a list of books in which the various topics are treated in detail and, in some cases, from a different point of view. The following will prove most useful to the modern student:—

Westcott On the Canon of the NT (7th ed. 1896), a mine of information on the early Christian writings; Lightfoot's Essays on Supernatural Religion (republished 1896), specially important for Papias and other early writers; Salmon's Historical Introduction to the NT (5th ed. 1897), a vigorous examination of adverse criticism; Sanday's Hampton Lectures on Inspiration, a careful and sympathetic account of the present position of controversy; Weiss's Introduct. to the NT (1886; ET, 1882), a clear exposition of the NT history; Zahn's Gesch. d. NT Kanons (1888-92), together with his Forschungen (a five parts, 1883), by far the most exhaustive treatise that has appeared; Harnack's examination of vol. i. pt. 1 of this work in Das NT im Jahr 200 (80), a severe criticism; his own position is stated positively in his Dogmengesch. (1885; 2nd ed. 1888, pp. 10-32); Jülicher's Einl. in das NT (90), an able statement of a position intermediate between Weiss and Harnack. Harnack's preface to his Chronologie der altchr. Literatur (97) is a noteworthy interlude, indicating the abandonment of the Füllgen positions in regard to the dating of NT documents.

Holtzmann may also be mentioned as an eminently fair-minded guide, and abundant in literary references (Einl. in das NT, 1894). Among older books, see Credner, Zur Gesch. des Kanons (47), and his Gesch. des NT Kanons; edited by Volkmar (70), important for the history of the study of the canon; also Hilgenfeld's Einl. in das NT, 1875.1

CANTICLES. We have before us a book which has suggested as many problems as Shakespeare's Sonnets. The name which we give to it, therefore, should not be a question-begging name. We will call it in this article neither 'Canticles' nor 'Song of Solomon,' but, following the best interpretation of 11, 'Song of Songs'—the choicest of all songs (like 'servant of servants,' Gen. 9.25 i.e., 'lowest of servants').

The first difficulty arises when we seek to determine precisely the subject of the Song (§§ 2-4); the next, when we investigate its poetical form (§§ 5-11), and seek to fix its date (§§ 13-15). We will consider these difficulties in order; but the first cannot be treated completely (§§ 16-17) until we have overcome the second.

1. Subject (preliminary). Jewish tradition had down very positively that, both as a whole and in its several parts, the Song describes the phases of a spiritual (not merely an earthly) love. The bride was the symbol of Israel, the bridegroom that of its divine king; and by the labours of countless homilists the Song became a lyric record of the intercourse between the Lord and his people from the Exodus (Jer. 2.2) to the Messianic time. Of those exalted labours, or rather poetical broodings, we have a summary in the Mishnah (Shir (transl. Wünsche, Biblioth. Kabbala, 1. f. 66), with which the not less fervently-written Targum (ed. post Talmudic origin) may be compared.¹

This theory was introduced in a modified form into the Christian Church mainly through the influence of Origen, of whom Jerome says that, 'while on the other books he surpassed all others, on the Song of Songs he surpassed himself' (Origen, Op. 3.11). This theologian treated the bride as being either the Church or (an important variation) the soul of the believer. The boldly avowed heterodoxy of Theodore of Mopsuestia, who interpreted the Song solely as relating to the Egyptian marriage of Solomon, was fruitless. Its condemnation at the second council of Constantinople (553 A.D.) postponed the acceptance of the literal interpretation in the Church for a thousand years. The great St. Bernard wrote eighty-six sermons on Song 1 and 2 alone, and his example fostered similar mystical studies in the Latin Church. Only among Jewish commentators was a natural exegesis not wholly unrepresented.² Ibn Ezra, in particular, is so thorough in his literal exegesis that it is doubtful whether he is serious when he proceeds to allegorise. Though Luther was moving in this direction, no Christian scholar before Sebastian Castellio (1544) ventured to maintain the purely secular character of the poem, and all that medieval mysticism could do was to exercise its right of selection from the two allegoric views. The idea that the bride was the Christian soul became the favourite; partly because it seemed to promote edification, and partly because it commended itself to the romantic spirit of the young western nations. Thus, Dante surprises us when (Convivio, 2. 15, end) he identifies the bride with Heavenly Wisdom.³

Even in the time of the Reformation we find the evangelical 'Horace of the cloister,' Fray Luis de Leon, translating the Song mystically in 'ottava rima'; and in our own day Bishop Alexander, though a Hebraist, has made an earnest poetic protest in favour of a mystic and against a dramatic theory (Poems, 1886, pp. 26-51). Grammatical exegesis, however, destroys the basis of the old verse-by-verse allegorical interpretation. The only question possible is, whether a general allegory of subject may have been intended by the poet—whether he considered the earthly love that he described to have a true symbolic resemblance to the spiritual love.⁴ The answer is, that such a symbolic resemblance is inconsistent with the spirit of Hebraism. It is true that the relation between Yahwe and his people is described in the prophets by the symbolism of wedlock (Hos. 1-3; Jer. 2-3; Ezek. 16; Is. 50; 51-56). It is true, also, that the phrase 'to love' (אהב) Yahwe occurs frequently in Deuteronomy and (less often) in the Psalter, and that the word אהב (used in the Song) is applied once by Isaiah (51) to Yahwe. Still, the notion implied by the prophetic allegory of wedlock, as well as by the phrase 'to love God,' is not that of free inclination on Israel's part towards the All-beautiful One, but rather of an obedience which is in the first instance the condition of divine protection, though, as favours multiply and the essential goodness of the divine commands appears, it becomes a habit and a passion. In Deuteronomy, therefore, the love of Yahwe is prescribed as a duty not invited or presupposed; and even in the Psalter, where devotional feeling finds the freest expression, there are only three passages in which the phrase 'to love Yahwe' occurs (Ps. 31:23, 97:10(12), 115:2), and in the first of these it occurs in the imperative mood. It is in harmony with this that three other passages (Ps. 51:6, 69:6, 119:132) contain the fuller phrase 'to love Yahwe's name,' which appears to mean (see Is. 56:6) the performance of religious duties with a certain fervour. Such a conception of the love of God we find in the Koran (Sur. 3:29; cp. 19:6). It was one of the Jewish elements in Mohammed's teaching, and failed to satisfy later generations of Moslems. In Syria and in Egypt, and still more in Persia, arose a mystic type of devotion, which sought by contemplation to lift the veil between man and God. The mystic love-songs of the Cairo dervishes, and the fine love-poems of the Sati-poet Hafiz, have been compared by Orientalists with the Song of Songs; but it has been forgotten that, fervid as the love of God became among the later Jews, it never divested itself of the chastening restraints of legalism, and that, in Persia at least, mystic poetry is one of the fruits of a national reaction against the aridity of Islam. It is still stranger that Sir William Jones and Sir Edwin Arnold have compared the Gitagovinda of the admired Indian poet Jayadeva (14th cent. A.D.), in which it would appear (but may we not suspect an afterthought of the poet?), 'from the few stanzas scattered through the poem where the author speaks in his own person, that he means his verses to be taken' in a mystic sense—Krishna symbolising the human soul, the shepherdesses the allurements of sense, and Rādhā the knowledge of, or meditation on, divine things. Surely the pantheistic atmosphere in which Jayadeva lived, and the excessive imaginative fervour of the Indian genius, are altogether unlike the conditions under which the Song of Songs must have been penned.

How came it, then, it may be asked, that the Jews of a later time, in their exegesis of the Song, adopted a theory which is, strictly, contrary to the spirit of Hebraism? Probably thus. We know from the Mishna (Taanith, 4a) that, before the destruction of the temple, passages from the Song were sung at certain popular yearly festivals. We know, too, that after the great catastrophe all expression of exuberant joy was forbidden. Now, what in those gloomy days was to be but also to the analogy of Ps. 45 and (more safely) to passages in the prophets. Such a position, however, was tenable only provisionally. The Bishop expressly rejects the most poetic form of the allegorical theory, for which alone most Christians have cared—it was defended by Bossuet—that which explains the Song of the loving intercourse between Christ and the soul. Surely the election of a Gentile Church ('dark but comely') might have been fore-shadowed at a less expenditure of poetry. Rightly, therefore, did J. D. Michaelis and the acute Hn. Warburton criticise Lowth for not going further. Lowth answered that without allegory the place of the Song in the canon could not be justified. All his literary taste could not dissolve his narrow notion of the authority of the canon.

done with the Song, which tradition already ascribed to Solomon? The answer was ready:—Consecrate it by allegorical interpretation. This course corresponded to the change which had passed upon the national character. The enthusiastic element in Jewish piety was becoming, in adversity, more intense. This element needed the expression which it found in the Song of Songs (see Berachoth 57b, where אהבה is ascribed to the Megilla of the Song of Songs as well as to the Book of Psalms). It should be added, however, that even after 70 A.D. the natural interpretation found some supporters. At the synod of Jamnia (90 A.D.) R. Akiba had still to defend the sacredness of the Song of Songs (Mishna, Adarayim, 35), and in Sanhedrin, 101a, we find a sol' ann anathema on those who treat the Song ha-Shirim as a secular song (שיר עממי). The grounds on which this secular character was asserted may be guessed from the Aboth de R. Nathan, chap. 1, which states that 'formerly' some counted the Song 'apocryphal' (אפוקריפ), quoting in support of this, not 7:1-6, but 7:11 f.

It is about, or soon after, 90 A.D. that we find the first traces of the allegorical view (see 4 Esdras 5:24-26, 7:1-2, and R. Simeon ben Gamliel's allegorical interpretation of Song 3:11 in Taanith 48). Before that time Jewish teachers seem to have shrunk from quoting the Song, even Philo neglects it. Nor is any use made of it (not of Köheleth) in the NT. Eph. 5:27 alludes perhaps to Ps. 45:1, but certainly not to Song 4:7; and the parallelism between Rev. 3:20 and Song 5:2-6 (Trench, Sacred Churches, 225 f.) is incomplete. This silence on the part of early Jewish and Christian writers shows the weakness of the argument from tradition adduced by the allegorists.

11. Poetical form. Is the Song of Songs a drama or a bundle of loosely connected songs? The earliest advocate of a definite dramatic theory was the learned Jesuit, Cornelius a Lapide († 1637), who, like Ewald, divided the poem into five acts. Our own Bishop Lowth takes up a middle position. He finds no trace of a regular plot, and only one thing in which the Song closely resembles the Greek dramatic models—the chorus. He allows, however, that the Song may be classed with imperfect dramatic poems, such as the Eclogues of Virgil and some of the Idylls of Theocritus. The first scholar to adopt the second solution of the problem was Richard Simon; but the first to make it plausible was Herder.¹ Influenced partly by the disintegrating tendency of the newer criticism, but still more by an irresistible impulse to search for traces of old popular poetry, he boldly denied the continuity of the poem, dividing it into about twenty-one independent songs (with a fragmentary conversation for an appendix), threaded like so many pearls on a necklace. These songs are sometimes very short; but brevity, Herder thinks, is the soul of a love-song; nor is it important to determine the exact number of songs.

Herder does not deny a certain pleasing appearance of unity, but ascribes this to the collector, who wished to show the gradual growth of true love in its various nuances and stages, till it finds its consummation in wedlock. In its present form the Song may be taken to consist of six 'scenes'; but the critic apologises for the term, and insists that the poem was intended to be read, and, as it stands, is neither a theatrical piece nor a cantata. Herder's 'exquisite little treatise'² could not fail to make an impression. It gained the approval of Eichhorn and Goethe; but, without a more thorough justification than Eichhorn gave, it could not permanently subvert the rival theory. Apart from its eloquent defence of the literal interpretation, its chief contribution to biblical study is perhaps this: that it has unintentionally proved the impossibility of recovering the original songs (if songs there were) and of retracing the plan (if plan he had) of the hypothetical collector. Goethe appears to have felt this. Tempted himself, as he tells us in the Hesiodischer Dorian, to select and arrange some of 'these few leaves,' he took warning from the failure of previous efforts, and left the poem in its hopeless but lovely confusion.

Hayn's Herder, 217, where it is shown that it was really Bishop Percy's Reliques which opened Herder's eyes to the element of folk-song in the OT. Herder, however, came to recognise that this element was somewhat modified in the Bible by a certain inherent and distinctive sanctity.

A first step in the criticism of the Song was taken by Ewald in his early commentary (1826). He did not as yet venture to suppose that the 'cantata' was really acted on the stage; but from the first he asserted its genuinely dramatic character, and in 1830 he repaired his original omission (Die poet. Bücher des AT, Bb. i.). Was this a step backward? Only in appearance. Until the necessity of disintegration had been convincingly proved, Ewald was always on principle opposed to it. The cleverness and moderation of his critical theory, aided by his growing reputation for broad and deep scholarship, led to a very general adoption of the dramatic hypothesis, though the names of De Wette, Gesenius, Bleek, and Magnus may be quoted on the other side. The last-named scholar, however, did not effect much for his cause. His theory 'involved the assumption that the editor often displaced part of a song, sacrificing the unity of the original lyrics to an artificial composition of the whole.' It is only fair to add that in 1850 Bottecher did his best to make the opposite view absurd by introducing into the supposed Hebrew drama 'the complexities and stage effects of a modern operetta.' In 1860 Renan observed, with truth, that the dramatic theory had become 'almost classic,' and in 1891 and 1893 it was put forward as correct in the Introductions of Driver and König. Other eminent defenders of this theory are Hitzig (1855), Ginsburg (1857), Kuenen (1865), Delitzsch (1875), Robertson Smith¹ (1876), Kaenpf (1877), Kohler (1878), Stöckel (1888), Oettli (1889), Bruston (1891), Martineau (1892), and Rothstein (1893).

By degrees, however, the theory of the separatists recovered from the effects of Magnus's imprudence. It began to pass into a new phase, and to exercise a stronger attraction. Diestel (art. 'Hohes Lied,' Schenkel's Bib. Lex. iii. [71]); Reuss ('70, in La Bible, etc., also Gesch. der Schriften des AT 2^e [90], 231-230; Stade (GIT, 2107 [88]); Cornill (Einl. [91], pp. 236-240); Budde (New York, March '94, pp. 56-77); Kautzsch (HS, '94; Lit. of the OT, 148-151), and Siegfried (Hohes Lied, '98) have done much to show that the view of Heider had not yet been adequately considered. Among these Budde deserves prominence for being the first to utilise adequately the information respecting Syrian marriage customs given by Consul Wetzstein in 1873.

Before reviewing this theory ourselves, we shall do well to examine the dramatic hypothesis more attentively.

(1) The forms which it has taken are by no means unanimous.² According to Reuss, this wide divergence is fatal to the hypothesis. It seems fairer to admit that if it could be made out (1) that there is a plot, and (2) that there is any reason to

i. First, then, is there any plot? The dramatists (as we may call the defenders of this theory) answer that there is. Stöckel even discovers two plots, developed by distinct pairs of lovers: the Shulammitte (who is a vine-dresser) and her 'friend' (17:7), and a shepherd and shepherdess of Lebanon (besides the royal suitor, Solomon). The two latter are introduced in three scenes, 1:7-8 1:15-4 1:7-5 1:1. They know nothing about the Shulammitte and her 'friend.' The poet has interwoven the two movements to amuse the audience and produce a pleasing contrast between the different fortunes of the two pairs of lovers. All very conceivable! Double musical themes can be treated in figures; why not also in Hebrew drama, granting that a regular Hebrew drama ever existed, and that Stöckel's view of the text is justified? However, all that this critic has shown is that 1:7, 15 and 1:1, 17 are out of connection with the previous verses; and in the case of the latter passage an easy emendation¹ enables us to recognise a continuous speech of the bride in 1:12-21.

Most critics, on the other hand, are content with one plot, and approach more or less closely to the dramatic scheme of Ewald, according to which the heroine is a maiden of Shulen or Shinnim in Issachar (see Sin. St. M., who has two lovers, the one at a distance, the other (till he finally disappears) near at hand; the one poor but favoured, the other royal but treated with disdain. In chap. 14*f.* we find the maiden, who makes no secret of her country origin, in the 'chambers' of the king among the 'daughters of Jerusalem' (the ladies of the palace); but in 8:5 she suddenly appears, approaching her mountain home on the arm of her betrothed. From the context it is thought to be clear that the suitor whose riches are contemned (8:7, cp. 11*f.*) is King Solomon, to whom the flattering compliments offered to the maiden in previous chapters must be assigned. How, then, came 'the Shulammitte' to exchange her free country life for the irksome splendour of the court? It is inferred, from 6:11*f.*, that she had been surprised by Solomon's courtiers (who had often been employed, no doubt, in similar abductions) on a royal progress in N. Israel. She 'had gone down into the nut-garden to look at the green things of the valley,' when 'suddenly,' she says, 'my desire brought me to the chariots of my noble people' (Ewald). It is some excuse for Solomon that, if Ewald may be followed, 'the Shulammitte' had not even been betrothed to the shepherd when she was carried off. (R. Martineau, however, thinks that between the third and the fourth scene—i.e., between the 36-11 and 1:7-16—the Shulammitte and the shepherd lover have been formally betrothed.) Then, how came the girl to be delivered from her royal captor? Renan has offered a very modern solution of the problem; but it is one which has no basis in the text, and may be safely neglected. Most have supposed (cp. 8:9*f.*) that the escape of 'the Shulammitte' was due, not to any favourable combination of circumstances, but to the effect produced upon Solomon by her own frank and loyal character; 'all the actors,' says Ewald, 'recognise the restraints of the true religion.' Will this view hold? Is it conceivable that the luxurious Solomon should have been represented by any popular poet as releasing one of the 'maidens innumerable' in his 'chambers'?² Is it probable that such a maiden would have had, in the poet's fancy, the liberty implied in the early scenes of the 'drama,' or that she would have met Solomon's advances in that extraordinarily absent manner which Ewald's view of 10-26 supposes? Why should the recurring phrase 'daughters of Jerusalem' (cp. 'daughters of Zion', 311) have such a limited reference as the dramatic theory requires? Then, as to the Shulammitte and her abduction. Theory apart, what right have we to assume that the intercourse implied in the poem between the girl and her lover was prior to marriage? To this point we shall have to return. Can we safely infer from the title that Shulem or Shunem was the girl's home? The title occurs in a single passage (611 [71]); but there is no allusion elsewhere to confirm this supposition. Next, how can Ewald base such a romantic story simply on the very obscure passage, 611 f.? Lastly, how do we know that the Solomon of history or legend plays any part in the poem? As Castelli, himself one of the dramatisers, has well pointed out, Solomon is mentioned by name only in some simile or figurative contrast.¹ Thus in 15 the heroine likens herself for comeliness to the curtains of the pavilions of Solomon (but we should rather read with Brüll, We., and Wl., שִׁמְשֹׁן, the name of a nomad Arabian tribe; see SALMUT, 2). In 37-11 Solomon's litter is spoken of jestingly; and so, in 811, 'to the costly vineyard of Solomon the heroine prefers her own symbolic one, which does not require the anxious supervision of others.' There is a fourth passage in which, according to an extremely probable correction of the text, Solomon is named, — 63 f.:

'Sixty queens had Solomon, and eight concubines, and maidens innumerable. One is my dove, my spotless one.'

Here again there is a contrast between Solomon's large harem and the speaker's single incomparable bride.

Can we, then, be sure that where the phrase 'the king' occurs alone, it is not a honorific designation of the bridegroom? And this suggests the question, which Castelli, however, does not raise, whether the term 'the Shulammitte' is not as purely figurative as 'the king'? Several writers (e.g., Klostermann) have conjectured that the story of Abishag the Shunammite (1 K. 13 f.) supplied the plot of the supposed drama; but considering the difficulty of making out any plot at all, and the fact that 'the Shulammitte' is referred to only in one passage, we may ask whether it is not more probable that the term is applied metaphorically, and is equivalent to 'the fairest of women' (18 59 61)? If we omit 611 f. as misplaced (doubtless a correct view), and read 610 and 13 [71] together, we shall see how natural it was for the poet to seek out some striking variation on the rather hackneyed purport just mentioned. The passage will run thus:

'Who is she that looketh down as the dawn, fair as the moon, clear as the sun? Turn, turn, thou Shulammitte, that we may look upon thee.'

It is usual to assume that the spectators, being ignorant of the heroine's name, address her with blunt directness as a girl of Shunem, and that she answers by the modest question, 'What do you see in the simple Shulammitte girl?' It is much more natural to suppose that 'the Shulammitte' (Shunammite) is a term not less complimentary than 'fair as the moon' in 1: 10, and points back to the Abishag of tradition.² And should it be asked why Abishag's name is not mentioned, we may venture to express the opinion that when the song was written there was probably in the Hebrew text of 1 K. 13 15, 1 Sam. etc., not שִׁמְשֹׁן, but a very different word (see SHULAMMITTE).

There are many other difficulties of interpretation which might be mentioned. For example, how are we to understand the movements of 'the beloved'? Are all the meetings of the lovers, except the final reunion, in reminiscence or in sleeping or waking imagination only? Can we conceive of a drama in which each of the actors seems almost if not quite uninfluenced by the speeches of the other? Not so did the Yahwist and the Elohist and the author of the Prologue of Job manage their dialogues. Less important is the difficulty which arises from the changes of scene, a weakness which need not surprise us in primitive plays. We must be careful, however, not to attach too much importance to European parallels. Renan, for example, goes too far when he refers to the comparatively elaborate pastoral play called Le Gueux de Robin et de Marion, or Le Jeu du Berger et de la Bergère, composed in 12. by Adam de la Halle for the diversions of the court.³ It would be more natural, with R. Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam), to compare the simple pastorals of the Troubadours; but even that might be misleading.

ii. We have now to ask, further, Have we a right to expect a Semitic drama, however primitive in form?

7. No Semitic drama. That Semitic nations are not at all devoid of general dramatic capacity may be granted. In Mohammedan countries the na'at ('recreation') still displays all the faculties of an actor, and stirs his hearers to the depths as he tells the story of 'Antar or the tales of the Arabian Nights; and there is an unmistakably strong dramatic element in Arabic works such as the 'Sessions' of Hariri. It cannot have been otherwise with the Israelites. They too must have laughed and wept as they listened to their story-tellers. At all events, the relics of their literature contain genuinely dramatic passages; see, for example, the stories of Jacob and Samson (evidently of traditional origin), of Ruth and Job. Even in the psalms and prophecies we have pieces like Ps. 2 21 7-10 Is. 63 1-6 28 8-11 Mic. 6 6-8, and the colloquies in the Book of Job have at least a distant affinity to the drama of character. Still, there is no evidence that the transition to a drama was ever made by a Semitic people. We have an Assyrian epic, but no Assyrian drama. Least of all can we reasonably expect to find one in the OT. Theatrical performances were not known at Jerusalem before the time of Herod, and to all good Jews such heathenish practices were detestable (Jos. Ant. xv. 81; cp. BJ i. 27 8). Hence the dramatic theory of the Song is plausible only if the composition of the poem be placed at Alexandria (during the Greek period). Why, upon this supposition, did not the dramatist write in Greek, as did Ezekiel, the author of the drama on the Exodus called 'Ἐξάγωγῆς? In a word, the difficulties of the dramatic theory are insuperable.

(b) The Israelites, however, had a still more characteristic gift — that of lyric poetry. Singing and dancing formed essential parts of their festivities, as they still do among the Bedouins; and when these festivities were occasioned by some great local or national event, a dramatic element would naturally infuse itself into the popular songs, and this all the more easily because the custom of alternate song, which is in its nature dramatic, was very ancient (cp. Ex. 15 21 1 S. 21 11). I would think that the Song (which is, according to him, a cantata) was originally intended for a festival of the independence of the N. kingdom, and that it was performed in five days, an act in a day. This view suits his theory of the 'plot' of the Song; but it is no longer tenable — we have seen that the references to 'Solomon' are figurative, and that 'the Shulammitte' is also a mere eulogistic term.

Why should not we take up again the suggestive idea of Bossuet and Lowth that the Song was intended for use on the seven days of the marriage festival (cp.

Gen. 29:27 Judg. 14:12 Tob. 11:17)? On such occasions there would, of course, be alternate songs by the bridegroom and the bride, and to this Jeremiah refers when, describing the calamities of invasion, he says that God will 'cause to cease from the cities of Judah and from the streets of Jerusalem the voice of mirth and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride' (Jer. 7:34 25:10). There is also an allusive passage in the Mishna (Ta'mith 42, already referred to), and the strangeness of the notice affords the best guarantee of its truth. It was customary at the 'Wood Festival' (ἑρκοφῆρα) on the 15th of Ab (August) and at the close of the Day of Atonement¹ for the 'daughters of Jerusalem' (cp Song 1:5, etc.) to go out and dance in the vineyards, and whoever had no wife went thither also. (Was it a relic of marriage by capture? Cp Judg. 21:21.) There was also alternate singing, and the youths were wont to use the words of Song 3:11. See DAVIS, § 6.

It is from Syria, where so many odd customs have survived, that we get the fullest confirmation of Bossuet's idea. Let us turn to Song 36-41 (translated by the present writer in JQR, July 1899), where the words referred to so strangely in the Mishna occur.

9. Syrian wedding festivities.

Solomon is here introduced riding in his palanquin 'with the crown with which his mother crowned him on his wedding-day,' escorted by sixty warriors 'with the hand on the sword.' What this means we can tell from von Krieger's account of the marriage processions in Moslem villages in the Lebanon.² The procession goes from the house of the bridegroom to that of the bride, and in it there is a band of youths armed with long poles, which they keep striking together, and hold in such a way as to form a kind of roof over them. The poles were probably in olden times lances; the open country was not secure from bandits (Hos. 6:6; cp Ps. 103:1).³ The 'crown' is, of course, that of the bridegroom (cp Ps. 68:10); 'in the war with Vespasian,' says the Mishna (Sota, 31a), 'the crowns of bridegrooms were forbidden.' The Solomon of 3:11, then, is not the Solomon who made himself a state-litter, but a happier though a humbler mortal. It is, in sooth, a pretty jest to liken the bridegroom to his nuptial crown and the sixty 'companions' (Judg. 1:11) who rode him over with their poles to the luxurious Solomon in his gorgeous palanquin with his martial bodyguard around him; and the jest has a wholesome moral.

A much fuller account of the customs of the Syrian peasants in the month of weddings (March) is given by Wetzstein.⁴ During the seven days after a wedding, high festivity, with scarcely interrupted singing and dancing, prevails. The bridegroom and the bride play the parts of king and queen (hence the week is called the 'king's week'), and receive the homage of their neighbours; the crown, however, is at present in Syria (as in Greece) confined to the bride (contrast Song 3:11). The bridegroom has his train of 'companions' (to borrow the ancient term, Judg. 14:11), and the grander the wedding the more of these there are. The bride too has her friends (cp 'daughters of Jerusalem,' Song 1:5, etc.), the maidens of the place, who take an important part in the reception of the bridegroom (cp Ps. 15:14 Mt. 25:1-13). In the evening of the great day a sword-dance is performed. In the Arabian desert it is the young men of the tribe who thus display their agility (Doughty, Ar. Des. 2:117); but in the Syrian wedding it is the sword-dancer is the bride. When taken in connection with another Syrian custom and with the passage of the Mishna mentioned above, this may be thought a relic of primitive 'marriage by capture.' The connected custom referred to is this: that when, on the morning after the wedding, the road-seat has been erected, a crier comes forward declaring that the 'king'—the bridegroom—has made a campaign against a hitherto impregnable fortress, and calls upon him to say whether he has succeeded or not. The 'king' answers in the affirmative, and upon this the seven days of rejoicing begin.⁵ However this may be, the sword-dance at the Syrian weddings has a significance of its own. It not only displays the physical gifts and capacities of the bride, but also symbolises her womanly self-respect, which keeps all intruders afar off (cp Song 8:6). 'The figure of the dancer, her dark waving hair, her serious noble bearing, her downcast eyes, her graceful movements, the quick and secure step of her small naked feet, the lightning-like flashing of the blade, the skilful movements of her left hand, in which she holds a handkerchief, the exact keeping of time,' form a scene which contrivances not a little to make the 'king's week' the happiest in a Syrian peasant's life. The description throws a bright light on Song 6:1-6 (which forms a connected passage).⁶

The opening verse is probably spoken by the chorus of neighbours on the approach of the bride with the sword; it abounds with respectful compliments suitable to the occasion. 'The ṭawf also belongs to the neighbours, who call to the bride to turn that they may see her better. Then, to draw out their admiration further, the bridegroom asks them why they are gazing as fixly at this paragon of beauty—this second Shulamite—at the dance of warlike hosts,' i.e. at the war-dance, or sword-dance (שִׁיר הַמִּלְחָמָה; ὡς χοροὶ τῶν παραμάχων; so Budde). It often happens in the Syrian desert, says Wetzstein, that when a woman performs this dance on occasion of a victory of one tribe over another, and some young man shows special admiration of the dancer, he is called upon to fight unarmed, according to certain rules, with the dancer, and may chance to pay for his boldness with his life. To this the question in Song 6:13⁷ may allude. Song 7:1-9 (which is in a different metre from 6:1-13) exactly answers to the Syrian ṭawf (i.e., 'laudatory description') sung during the sword-dance by the leader of the chorus. We must not criticise it too severely. The tone is that which popular taste required and (to judge from the ṭawf quoted by Wetzstein) still requires in Syria.

On the day after the wedding, when the 'king' has announced his 'victory' over the 'fortress,' another ṭawf is sung. This time the attractions of the lady are described with less reserve, in deference to wily dignity. Such a ṭawf we seem to have in Song 4:1-7. Is the bridegroom, then, exempt from laudation? Not in modern Syria, nor in the Song. True, in Song 36-41, sung (it would seem) during the procession from the bridegroom's house to that of the bride, flattery goes no further than to liken the crowned bridegroom to Solomon. The young wife naturally goes further. The ṭawf itself is found in Song 5:1-16. Prefixed to it is a speech of the bride describing a weird dream that she has had, in which she believes so firmly that she begs for the help of the 'daughters of Jerusalem' in restoring her to her beloved. These are the chief songs of this class; but in Song 6:4-7 we have at least a fragment of a laudatory description of the bride, part of which is an ill-connected quotation from 4:1-7. Wetzstein assures us that the ṭawf-passages are the weakest part of the wedding-songs, and accordingly, he adds, the ṭawf-portion of the Song of Songs is much inferior poetically to the rest. Certainly the most striking part of the Song of Songs is the passage which contains 711-87 (excepting the interpolated verses 83-84). It is a song such as might have been sung on the evening of the wedding-day. The opening description is true in idea, though imaginary in its incidents. It is true in idea; for every marriage, according to the poet, should arise from the free affection of one man and one woman. It is imaginary in its details, for the incidents are inconsistent with what was allowable in courtship. For real songs of courtship such as an Israelite might have used, see Ruckert's Hamans, bk. iv. 1. The closing eulogy of love as 'strong as death, nuxible as Shool, whose flashes are flashes of fire, [whose flame is] a flame from heaven'² (85), is noble.

The poetical form, and therefore also the origin, of the Song of Songs seems to be no longer doubtful.

Fully twenty years ago (1879) the present writer rejected the interpretation of Song 6:11, but still thought it possible, by omitting interpolations and transposing certain misplaced passages, to restore something like the original sequence, and to recognise a more imperfect plot such as quick-witted hearers and spectators might have divined. He saw also that the poem was based on popular songs,³ and admitted the critical significance of the information furnished by Wetzstein. 'When we consider,' he then wrote, 'that processions and the choral performance of lyric poems were familiar to the Israelites from Sammel downwards, it becomes a highly probable conjecture that this custom of the Syrian peasants was already in vogue in the times of the Old writers. This is confirmed by the remarkable coincidence between the time when the incidents of the Song are supposed to take place (see Song 2:11-13) and the time of the peasants' weddings in Syria (March is the most beautiful time of the Syrian year). He farther noticed 140 or three of the wayf-passages in the Song, and (after Kohler) the implied reference to the sword-dance in Song 6:10-11 (75, 117, being misplaced). He was far, however, from realising the extent to which the Hebrew songs were analogous to the traditional Syrian, and thought that a part of the Song related to the happy courtship of the rustic lovers; nor did he understand the reference to Solomon or the meaning of 'the Shulammité.' To Budge he owes it that he has adopted a more consistent theory.⁴

The book is an anthology of songs used at marriage festivals in or near Jerusalem, revised and loosely connected by an editor without regard to temporal sequence; in saying which, we do not deny that the kernel of the work may have been brought from some other part of the country, perhaps in the north.

What of the supposed indications of unity? These are found partly in the phraseology ('Solomon,' 'the king,' 'daughters of Jerusalem,' 'my beloved,' 'my friend,' the seeming refrains in 27:35-84; as well as in 2:17a 46a; and in 2:17b 8:14b), partly in the poetical colour, partly in the feeling or spirit, and of course in the circumstances. This agreement between the several parts of the poem is not as great as has been supposed. As Bickell observes, 'Generatim omnia verbotenus repetita series inserta sunt'; in G such repetitions are even more plentiful than in MT. The genuine points of phraseological agreement are quite accounted for by the traditional conventions of these love songs. That the feeling, the poetical colour, and the circumstances are the same, harmonises with the assumed origin of the songs. The prominence of the mother (16:34 82:5) is to be explained not (with Ewald, 334) by 'the Shulammité's' supposed loss of her father, but as a vestige of the matriarchate (Mutterrecht). With regard to Song 14 and Song 8:10, which, taken together, may seem to show that the heroine had been placed in a royal palace but had 'compelled her assailant to leave her in peace'

1 These verses are not in the metre of the rest of the passage; the two former come from 26:5 (cp 3:5), while the last has been suggested by 3:5.

2 Or, 'a most vehement flame.' The final ay may be simply an affirmative (Jäger, Jastrow).

3 See Daughters of Ophrah (1893), 750.

4 Budge's attempt (New World, March 1894) to show that some of the less poetical passages are due to the collector and reviser of the songs, who now and then misunderstood the texts, cannot here be considered.

13. Present writer's relation to Wetzstein. based on popular songs,³ and admitted the critical significance of the information furnished by Wetzstein. 'When we consider,' he then wrote, 'that processions and the choral performance of lyric poems were familiar to the Israelites from Sammel downwards, it becomes a highly probable conjecture that this custom of the Syrian peasants was already in vogue in the times of the Old writers. This is confirmed by the remarkable coincidence between the time when the incidents of the Song are supposed to take place (see Song 2:11-13) and the time of the peasants' weddings in Syria (March is the most beautiful time of the Syrian year). He farther noticed 140 or three of the wayf-passages in the Song, and (after Kohler) the implied reference to the sword-dance in Song 6:10-11 (75, 117, being misplaced). He was far, however, from realising the extent to which the Hebrew songs were analogous to the traditional Syrian, and thought that a part of the Song related to the happy courtship of the rustic lovers; nor did he understand the reference to Solomon or the meaning of 'the Shulammité.' To Budge he owes it that he has adopted a more consistent theory.⁴

(Robertson Smith's paraphrase of 8:10), we should hold that the 'chambers' of 14 are those of the crowned bridegroom, and that the 'peace' of 8:10 belongs to the characteristic figure of the 'fortress' (see above).

Historically, the Song would gain, could it be shown to be pre-exilic. What would not one give for the light hitings of ancient Hebrew maidens?

13. Date. and for a noble popular protest against the doubtful innovations of the impatriotic Solomon? Robertson Smith in 1876 held that the Song of Songs was just such a protest. 'The conservative revolution of Jeroboam was,' he remarks, 'in great measure the work of the prophets, and must therefore have carried with it the religious and moral convictions of the people. An important element in these convictions, which still claims our fullest sympathy, is powerfully set forth in the Canticles, and the deletion of the book from the Canon . . . would leave us without a most necessary complement to the Judean view of the conduct of the ten tribes which we get in the historical books.' The reference to the harem life of Solomon, however, is confined to two verses (Song 6:8 f.); it is rather sportive than polemical, and, attractive as the protest-theory is, it is opposed to a sound exegesis (see above).

For a pre-exilic date there is no solid argument, (a) The title, which is not by the author (note שיר השירים).

14. Not pre-exilic. is of course not more trustworthy than the headings of the 'Solomonic' psalms.

(b) The points of contact with Hosea (cp Song 2:13 4:11 6:11 with Hos. 14:6-9) and Prov. 1:9 (cp Song 4:11 14 f. with Prov. 5:3 7:17 5:13-17) prove only that different poets used similar (conventional) images. Moreover, recent criticism tends to show that Hos. 14:2-10 and Prov. 1:9 are post-exilic. (c) The phrase שיר השירים 'going down) straight,' used of wine, in Song 7:9 Prov. 23:1, is indecisive, whether Prov. 23:1 is early or late. (d) The mention of Tirzah beside Jerusalem (Song 6:4) need not point to 'the brief period when that city was the capital of the dynasty of Baasha' (but see TIRZATH, for (if MT is correct) it is the beauty of the site of Tirzah that is referred to—a beauty which could not pass away with a dynasty. Most probably, however, we should emend the text thus, 'Thou art beautiful as the narcissus, comely as the lily of the valleys' (cp 2:1). If so, Tirzah is not mentioned. (e) That the references to Solomon prove nothing, we have seen already. It will, therefore, be absurd to base an argument on the comparison of the lady in Song 1:9 with one of Pharaoh's maids. If the bridegroom could be likened to Solomon, the bride could be likened to one of Solomon's finest Egyptian horses, especially if the songs were written while Palestine formed part of the Greco-Egyptian empire (cp Theocr. Id. 15:52 f.). Whether Solomon really obtained horses from Egypt, is a question which need not be discussed here (see MIZRATH, § 2a).

For a post-exilic date the main arguments are these:

(a) The position of the book among the Hagiographa.

(b) The beauty of Jerusalem is mentioned late (Ps. 132 502 Lam. 2:15). (c) The absence of striking archaisms of thought and expression. CANTICLES

לֵךְ), נֵד (also לֵד), and, following Grätz, נָדִים (for the tautological נָדִים), new Heb. for 'roses.'¹

The foolishness of the post-Canticles for spices led the ancient scribes into some very strange textual errors—viz., (1) l₁, (1) 16, 'the mountains of myrrh (רִמְמוֹת) and the hill of frankincense' (רִמְמוֹת), where רִמְמוֹת should be רִמְמוֹת, 'Hermion', and רִמְמוֹת should be רִמְמוֹת (רִמְמוֹת); very probably, also, the correct reading in l₁, 8 is 'from the hills of the cedars, from the mountains of the cypruses' (רִמְמוֹת רִמְמוֹת רִמְמוֹת רִמְמוֹת); (2) 8, 14, in the 'mountains of spices' (רִמְמוֹת רִמְמוֹת רִמְמוֹת רִמְמוֹת), to which, if We's view of רִמְמוֹת רִמְמוֹת, 'mountains of malolabron' (We, Procl. (2) 4, 2), was that of the early scribes, we may add 27 where we should read רִמְמוֹת רִמְמוֹת, 'mountains of cypruses' (see BETHUR).

Add park=new Heb. פארק, 6 in, and perhaps כפר=ai'pos, 1 in 4 in (plur.). Last, not least, we have the Persian loan-word for plantation or park, פארק, 4 in; elsewhere only Noh. 28 Eccl. 25, though the exact history of the form is doubtful.

One Greek loan-word has been found in פֶּזֶן, 'palanquin,' 39. šupin (see 30; but see LITTER). In the Midrash 'ק' is explained by פֶּזֶן, i.e., šupina. In Sota par. it is said that the use of the bridal litter (פֶּזֶן) was forbidden by the Jewish authorities during the Bar-Cochba war. On the gorgeous šupina of the Syrian ladies under Antiochus Epiphanes, see Polybius (op. Athn., 522). The only doubt can be whether 'ק' is not a gloss. Metrical reasons suggest its exclusion (the

(c) Among the distinctly late words are חֶסֶד 31a 76⁴ (for Judg. 8:22-27 is not, as it stands, ancient; see Budde); חֶסֶד 5:15 Esth. 16; חֶסֶד (plur.), 6:11 Job 8:12; חֶסֶד, 4:1 6:5; חֶסֶד, 1:18 3:5 11:1; חֶסֶד, 1:18 (Aram. and new Heb.); חֶסֶד, 'to glance,' 2:9; חֶסֶד, 1:12; חֶסֶד, 'snack-holes,' 2:9; חֶסֶד, 1:12; חֶסֶד, 2:14 Esth. 38:25 (Aram. חֶסֶד 'a stop'; חֶסֶד, 2:13 15 7:12 and perhaps Is. 16:3 (for חֶסֶד see SHOT, ad loc.); cp Duval, RAE 11:277); חֶסֶד, 'winter,' 2:11; חֶסֶד, 5:11; חֶסֶד, 5:2; חֶסֶד (plur.), 3:2 Prov. 7:8 Eccl. 12:45 (cp Gratz, 49); חֶסֶד (Phel), 5:3; חֶסֶד (to spring), 2:8; חֶסֶד, 'to keep,' 1:6 8:11; חֶסֶד, 'enclosed,' 7:3. (g) Grammatical forms. Note חֶסֶד, 1:15, etc.; חֶסֶד, 1:17; חֶסֶד, 'where,' 1:7 (cp חֶסֶד, Dan. 7:28); חֶסֶד, 'how?' 5:3, Esth. 8:6. Also חֶסֶד 22 times. חֶסֶד, 1:7, like חֶסֶד, Jon. 1:7, and חֶסֶד, Eccl. 8:17, חֶסֶד, Dan. 1:10. חֶסֶד, 1:6 8:12; חֶסֶד, 3:7 (exactly the Mishna usage). (g) חֶסֶד, 4:4, for חֶסֶד, may perhaps point to the post-exilic period (see Bond, ZATW 11:277).

The preceding list of arguments, though not exhaustive, should be sufficient. Linguists, such as Greenius among Christians and M. Sachs among Jews, long ago recognised the modern character of the Hebrew. The question, however, was a complicated one, and ingenuity did its best to save an early date, and with it (it appeared) the historical value of the Song. It is time for critical students to look at the facts more frankly. We can now show that this anthology of songs is post-exilic, and may conjecture that it is nearly contemporary with that 'song of love' (and of spices), Ps. 45. It is not easy to find a period more suitable to all the data than one of the early and fortunate reigns of the Ptolemies (cp. Founders, 353). A still later date is suggested by Winkler (Alt.-Forschungen, 295).

16. Text. Like the other poetical books, the Song of Songs suffers from many, often most unfortunate, corruptions of the text; some dislocations of passages have added to the difficulties of the interpreter. Gratz was the first to recognise the bad state of the text. Among recent scholars Bickell and Biddle have done most; Bickell's chief results have been incorporated in Biddle's excellent commentary. Perles, in his Anleitung (95), has considered about ten passages, and the present writer has endeavoured to correct some of the chief errors (UW and Usp Times for 1898-99 and Uspcher, Feb. 1899, 145 ff.). Among these corrections it may be mentioned that, according to Bickell, 'the Shulammite' in 71 is due to corruption; against this view, however, see Biddle, who points out that, since the phrase 'the Shulammite is not tantamount to a declaration that the bride is a Shulammite damsel, and only means 'one who is as far as Abishag the Shulammite,' it is urgent to the adherents of the dramatic or idyllic theory to have the correctness of ~~שולמית~~ assured to them. Contrary to Perles (who on this point is an adherent of Gratz), Bickell further thinks that שולמית in 612 (see AMINATING also) is not the true reading. The correct reading is שולמית.

² He was anticipated by Field (Orig. Her. 2:45), who gives the rendering of Sexta as $\mu\alpha\lambda\alpha(\beta\alpha)\theta\rho(\nu)$. 'Dat et malobathron Syria' says Pl. (H.N. 12:1).

The regulars לִבְיָדָם בְּיָדָם derived from לִבְיָדָם in לִבְיָדָם (which is corrupt) as a doublet of לִבְיָדָם in לִבְיָדָם, and renders 'my noble kinswoman'; humble prefers to wait for more light. Bibles has pointed the way to a better solution by grouping 612 and 72 with 77. Here, the present writer thinks, we should read לִבְיָדָם לִבְיָדָם, 'loved one, Shulamite himself,' and, consequently, makes the same restoration in 612 and 72—לִבְיָדָם לִבְיָדָם. Certainly Bickell is right in refusing to have anything to do with the 'chariots' of which MT and therefore also EV speak in 612. The whole story of the Shulamite's having been surprised in the nut-orchard by the king's retinue (cp Driver, Introd., 412, 416) breaks down, when strict criticism is applied to the text. On Cant. 30-11, which is disfigured by curious corruptions (one of which is the famous פָּאָרָה, RV 'palaujan'), see LETTER.

We must now endeavour to estimate the value of the Song. We shall not be ungrateful for the material

17. Value. which it supplies to students of numbers,¹ but it is much more important that it opens a window into the heart of ordinary Israelites. (a) The Song reveals a very pure conception of true love, as springing out of a free inclination of one man and one woman,² and rising into a passionate and indestructible union of hearts. If the songs were written (or even if they were only edited, revised, and supplemented) in the early Greek period, what a contrast they offer to much that was current at the luxurious court of the Ptolemies! (b) The Song shows also a genuine love of nature. The writer inspires us with his own delicate joys. The breath of spring still breathes through his words. Its scents, its fresh moist greenness, the old hopeful spring notes heard in the woods, again are all here.³ There is nothing more lovely than the spring of Palestine, and this old poet felt it. Where the images are bi-arré, we need not put it down to him. The tyzif-songs were, and still are, governed by strict convention (cp Wetz. in Del. 174-177). Ovid and Theocritus are not without some of these strange love images.⁴ (c) 'Race-psychology' also may gather something. Twice the heroine falls into a perplexing confusion between dreamland and reality (Song 3:1-4 5-7). This can be paralleled from Arabic love poetry, in which the dream-form of the beloved receives an objective existence, and lovers even give their respective apparitions a rendezvous (see Hamasa, Froytag, 22; Iyall, Translations, 12).⁵ (d) If the poem is post-exilic, it shows us that there were times and seasons (cp Eccl. 3:4) of which legalism could not overshadow the joyousness.

In this and in other respects our notion of the post-exilic period may perhaps need revision.

Is this, then, the whole worth of the Song for us? Being a musical, must it not have some subtle religious value which has been overlooked?¹

The answer is (1) that we have no right to assume that R. Akiba's well-known saying about the Song at the Synod of Jamnia (see CANON, § 53) represents the point of view of those who first admitted this popular and supposed Solomonic work among the Ketubim; and (2) that the mistake of a Jewish Synod cannot be perpetually endorsed by Christian common-sense and scholarship. We have therefore to revise our conception of the word 'canonical' in its application to the OT writings.

CAP (ΠΕΤΑΧΙΟ [AV]); according to one view it has been borrowed in Aramaic under the form ܥܦܪܢܐܘܡ Dan. 3:21; but see BREECHES, 2; TURBAN, 2; and cp Journ. Phil. 26 (1897), the Greek broad-brimmed dr. πετάριον felt hat which Jason made the Jewish youth wear (2 Macc. 1:12 RV; AV 'hat'). It was worn (originally) chiefly by shepherds and hunters, was an attribute of Herms,² and so became the badge of the palestra.

This assumes that the text is genuine (note that ἐπιταχισσών in 2A precedes). The Syr. reads ܥܦܪܢܐܘܡ (cp 2S. 12:31 (Pesh.), where MT has ܥܦܪܢܐܘܡ). Did the translator think of ἐπιταχισσών? Equally obscure is the origin of the Vg. in hymenibus, though the intimacy and vice of the later gynasia, the fact that the Epheia were celebrations of a more or less free and unrestrained character, and the allusion to vicious practices in 2 Macc. 1:12 make it possible that a genuine tradition has been followed.

CAPER-BERRY (קַפְרִי, ΚΑΠΠΑΡΙΟ [BNAC]), Eccles. 12:5f RV. That the Hyssop (g. r.) is the caper-plant (Capparis spinosa, L.) is a favourite theory. Still more prevalent is the view that the word rendered 'desire' in AV RV^{mg} of Eccles. 12:5 ('the almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail') denotes the berry of the caper-plant.³ The difficulties of translation are as great in the third of these clauses as in the others (ALMOND, GRASSHOPPER). The Revisers of OT changed 'desire' into 'the caper-berry,' but could not determine on a satisfactory verb; 'fail' therefore remains, with 'Or, burst' in the margin. Thus much at any rate is plain: the noun in this clause must denote some object in the physical world.

The rendering 'the caper-berry' (G. Ap. Vg.)⁴ has been adopted by nearly all moderns, among whom G. F. Moore⁵ deserves special mention because of the fresh light which he has brought from Mishnic and Talmudic sources. The rendering 'desire' (Abulwalid; Parchon) is a worthless modern guess.

In spite of the agreement of scholars, the clause remains obscure, mainly from the difficulty of interpreting the predicate קַפְרִי. (1) Plutarch (Symp. 62) speaks of the caper being used as a relish to induce appetite for food; medieval Arabic writers mention its effects

³ That this fruit, and not the berry-like bud familiar in modern times, is intended appears clearly from the Talmudic references (see Löw, Flora, 294), and the exhaustive discussion in Moore's art. referred to below.

in stimulating sexual impulse (Wetz. in Del. Abh. 452);¹ and it was in traditional use (especially the fruit) in the middle ages as a stimulant in senile disorder. It has been sought, accordingly, to explain קַפְרִי as meaning 'fail of effect' (so RV text), and this will do as a makeshift, when even the caper fails, nothing is left to try. Unfortunately, it is difficult to believe that the Heb. verb can have this meaning. Dehitch's explanation of it as a case of internal Hiphil ('produces failure'—i.e., 'fails') is most unlikely.

(2) Others have thought of the bursting of the ripe berry and the scattering of its seeds as a synonym for death (so RV^{mg}); but this is quite untenable, (a) because of the fact that the root קַפְרִי is nowhere used in a physical sense in Hebrew,² (b) because the context requires a phrase descriptive of old age rather than of death, and (c) because of the botanical impossibility of the interpretation, there being no evidence that the fruit of Capparis spinosa is dehiscens.

Unless, therefore, we give the Heb. verb the very unusual sense of 'fail' we can only say that probably, as in the other clauses, the metaphor indicates some feature in the old man's appearance or physical state, and Moore's suggestion, to emend קַפְרִי into some derivative of קַפְרִי appears a good one.

CAPERNAUM is the transliteration of the Text. Rec. ΚΑΠΕΡΝΑΟΥΜ; but NHM, followed by Tisch.

1. Name. Treg., WH, etc., read ΚΑΦΑΡΝΑΟΥΜ (so Pesh. and Jos.). The original was, therefore, כַּפְרִי נָחֻם, village of Nahum. It is not mentioned before the NT, and this, coupled with the fact that קַפְרִי prevails in the composition only of comparatively late names, is proof of an origin shortly before the time of Jesus. Whether by Nahum is meant the prophet, we do not know. In Jerome's time it was another Galilean town that was associated with him (GASM, Trist. de Proph. 279).

Capernaum became the home of Jesus (ἐν οἴκῳ ἑστίν, Mk. 2:1) and 'his own city' (Mt. 9:1) after his rejection by the townsfolk of Nazareth.

2. References. Here he preached (Mt. 8:5 Mk. 1:21 Jn. 6 etc.); did many wonderful works, healing Peter's mother-in-law and many others (Mk. 1:31-41), a paralytic (Mt. 9 Mk. 2 Lk. 5:1-13), a centurion's servant (Mt. 8:5 Lk. 7:1), a man with an unclean spirit (Mk. 1:21 Lk. 1:13), and (by a word from Cana) a nobleman's servant (Jn. 4:46); and called the fishermen Peter and Andrew (Mk. 1:16), and Matthew or Levi, who sat to receive toll (Mt. 9:8 Mk. 2:14 Lk. 5:27). In spite of all this, the body of citizens remained unmoved, and Jesus pronounced woe upon the place (Mt. 11:23 Lk. 10:13, RV). These passages imply that Capernaum was a πόλις, with a Roman garrison, a synagogue (built by the centurion), and a customs-station; and that it lay down in the basin of the lake (Jn. 2:12 Lk. 1:13), and on the lake shore (Mt. 1:13), and (presumably from the customs station) on the great high road from Damascus past the N. end of the lake to the Levant (cp topog. of the sea quoted in Mt. 1:15 f. from Is. 9:1 [23]). A comparison of Jn. 6:17 with Mt. 11:34 would seem also to imply that it lay on or near the plain of Gennesaret at the NW. corner of the lake.

The name has entirely disappeared, and amid the scattered evidence of writers since the NT and the

3. Suggested identifications. various groups of ruin which strew the lake shore between Gennesaret and the mouth of the Jordan, diversity of tradition and of modern opinion has naturally arisen. Two sites divide the authorities—Khirbet el-Minyeh (several mounds with indistinguishable ruins and an old Khān also called Minyeh on the N. corner of Gennesaret); and Tell-Hifm, a heap of black basalt ruins.

¹ It should, however, be noted that neither Dioscorides (2:24) nor Pliny (13:127 20:165 ff.) mentions either of these effects.

² So Tragus (De Stirp. Hist. Comm. 1552, 360) writes of the effect that, cooked, and taken with oil and vinegar, it is used with benefit in cases of psys, gout, 'phlegm,' 'spleen,' sciatia, in urinary troubles, and as an emmenagogue.

³ Even if it were, the Hiphil would not mean 'to burst.'

with the remains of a white marble edifice and a curious tomb two miles and a half further west, and two miles and a half from the mouth of the Jordan. Between these two the evidence is not quite conclusive.

For Tell-Him there is usually quoted the evidence of Josephus, who says that, having been thrown from his horse in a skirmish with the Roman forces

4. Josephus. in Jordan, he was carried to a village called Κεφαρναῦν (ibid. 72), and thence to Taricheae. Even if this reading were correct, Josephus, with injuries so slight as he reports, might as easily have been carried the 5 m. to Gennesaret as the two and a half to Tell-Him, especially as his desire seems to have been to get to Taricheae. It is suspicious, however, that he calls the place a village (κωμή), and Niese fixes the proper reading as κεφαρναῦν. The only other evidence Josephus gives favours Khān Minyeh. He describes (R in 108) the plain of Gennesaret as watered by 'a most copious fountain' called by the people of the country Capernaum. This Robinson believes to be the 'Am et-Tin, close by Khān Minyeh; more probably it was the 'Am et-Talagāh, whose waters were conveyed in an aqueduct past the site of Khān Minyeh into the plain. Tell-Him, on the other hand, has neither fountain nor spring.

The Christian and the Jewish traditions are divided. Jerome places Capernaum 2 R. m. from Chorazin, a

5. Christian and Jewish traditions. datum which, if Chorazin be Korazeh, agrees with Tell-Him. So do the data of Theodosius (it 530), who, working from Magdala round the N. end of the Lake, places Capernaum 2 R. m. on the other side of Heptapogon, presumably 'Am et-Talagāh. Isaac Chilo in 1334 (Carmoly Itinéraires, etc., la Terre Sainte des chrétiens, 260) came to Kefar Nachum from Irlud, and found it in ruins with the tomb of Nahum. In 1561 the Itinerarium ha-Padikim (ib. 385) mentions Tanchum with the tombs of Nahum and Rabbi Tanchum (cp Itinerarium ha-Padikim ib. 418). Taking Kefar Nachum and Tanchum as identical, some find in 'Tell-Him' a corruption of 'Tanchum'. This is the case for Tell-Him. It really rests on the evidence of Jerome and Theodosius (for it is not certain either that Kefar Nachum and Tanchum were identical or that 'Tell-Him' is derived from 'Tanchum'); and it is opposed to the evidence of Josephus. Yet in recent times it has received a large increase of support (Dr. Wilson, Lands of the Bible, 219-149; Thomson, Land and Book, ed. 1877, 352-356; Sir C. Wilson, Recovery of Jerusalem, 375-387; Guérin, Galilée, 1227 ff.; Schaff, ZDP 124 ff.; Furrer, ib. 263 ff., and in Schenkel's Bib. Lex. 3495; Frei, ZDP 2115; van Kasteren, ib. 11210 ff.; Schürer's Hist. 171; Fulst, Pal. 224 ff.).

On the other hand, Arenulf's description of Capernaum (670 A.D.), as being on 'a narrow piece of ground between the mountain and the lake' suits Khān Minyeh, but not Tell-Him. Arenulf adds that it lay on the shore non longo circuitu from the traditional spot on Gennesaret where the loaves were blessed. He did not visit it, but saw from a distance that it had no walls. Willibald's data (722 A.D.) suit any point between Mejeel and Bethsaida, and equally indefinite are all other references till Isaac Chilo in 1334 states that the town is now in ruins, but was formerly inhabited by Minim—i.e., Jews who had become Christians—all sorcerers (cp Neubauer, Géog. du Tabu. 221). Many find Minim in Minyeh. In answer to objections to this (Furrer, ZDP 233 ff.), another derivation has been suggested through the older Arabic spelling el-munya, common in Egypt and Spain for 'villa,' 'steading,' 'hamlet,' etc.—Lat. mansio, Gr. μονή—from which it is said to be derived (Gildemeister, ZDP 4194 ff.). In any case, a place lay here in the eleventh century called Manyat Hishāmī (Kazwini's Lexicon), and in 1430 El-Munya, a village so large that the whole lake was called after it. (Tristram gives the form 'Minyeh,' which Dehtsch derives from Minch, harbour). And Quatremere in 1806 26 (Hand. Jour. Sin. 290) says that by the site of Capernaum there was in his time a Khan called by the Arabs Minyeh. Ruins have been found both on the plain, by Robinson (ibid. 348-358) and Merrill (ib. of London, 301 f.), who found a city wall, and on the hill by Schumacher (ib. 1374).

On the whole, the balance of opinion is in favour of Khān Minyeh. So Robinson, Conder, Henderson

6. Probably Khān Minyeh. (Pal. 158 f.), Keim (ibid., Engl. ed., 297 ff.), Stanley (ibid. 384), G. A. Smith (ibid. 605, 156 f.), Fwing (in Hastings, ibid.). The site suits the biblical data, is required by the data of Josephus, and has tradition in its favour from the seventh century onward.

CAPHARSALAMA (CAPHARSALAMA [N.V.]; so SVT, KAF, [Jos.], ΦΑΡC, [N.], CAPHARSALAMA [V]), the scene of Nicomachus' unsuccessful attack upon Judas, 1 Mac. 7:1 (cp Jos. ibid. xii 104). The name is obviously כפר סלמא, which is met with in the Talmud also. Most commentators (Michaëlis, Grimm, Keil) seek the site somewhere to the S. of Jerusalem, on the ground that Nicomachus' subsequent movements were first to Jerusalem and then further northwards to Beth-leonai. Ewald and Schürer, however, prefer to identify it with the Carva Salim mentioned in a pilgrimage of the year 1095 as near Ramleh and not far from Lydda (cp ibid. 524, Schür. GIP 190 n., cp Le Strange, Pal. under Moslems, 471 f.). In the time of the crusaders 'Caparsala' is again mentioned as a casale of the Knights Hospitallers. Mikaddasi's location of it 'in the district of Casirea on the high road from Ramleh northwards' agrees with the data in 1 Maccabees. In that region we find at the present day a village Selmei 3 m. E. of Joppa and Khirbet es-Salimiyeh 6 m. farther N. across the 'Aijeh. Kh. Der Sella, 12½ m. W. of Jerusalem and 1 m. S. of the present high road to Joppa, suits the Maccabean, but not the medieval data. The same remark applies to the other Kh. Der Sella 4 m. N. of Jerusalem. Cp also the important W. Selman up which runs one of the main roads from the Maritime Plain to Jerusalem.

CAPHENATHA, RV CAPHENATHA (CAPHENATHA [ANV], כפרנאטה [Lag.], but כפרנאטה [Walton]), a locality on the E. of Jerusalem, which Jonathan the Maccabee repaired (ἐπεσκεύασεν), 1 Mac. 12:17. The reading is uncertain, and the etymologists' attempts of the older Lightfoot and others (καφες, 'unripe dates,' καπες, from silversmiths or some treasure house) are best avoided. Sepp and Furrer (FLZ, 1899, col. 470) identify the place with the Taborion valley (see JERUSALEM), in which case ἐπεσκεύασεν (ἐπεσκεύασαν [V]) will have to be emended.

CAPHTOR (כַּפְתּוֹר; Dt. 2:23 Am. 9:7, CAPHTHOR ΔΟΚΙΑC [BAQL], CAPH, [I]; Jer. 17 [C] 29) 41, om.

1. Not Crete. כַּפְתּוֹר occurring in plural form Caphtorim (כַּפְתּוֹרִים; CAPHTHORIM [L], om. B; Gen. 10:14 [C] AE) = 1 Ch. 1:10 W. Caphthorim; CAPHOR [A]; Dt. 2:23 (AV Caphthorims, CAPHTHORIM [BAFL]); the land and properly the people whence came the Philistines. In Gen. 10:14 (see below)¹ and Dt. 2:23 Caphthorim is a synonym for Philistines. Caphthor is now generally identified with Crete, an important island of which the mention is perhaps to be expected; see GEOGRAPHY.

§ 15(7). In Jer. 47 it is expressly called an 'island' (יְבֵלָהּ), and the Philistines (פְּלִשְׁתִּים) are sometimes called 'Cherethites' (כְּרֵתִים). The Zeno Cretagenes in Gaza may also suggest a connection of the Philistines with Crete. These are Dillmann's arguments. But (1) 'rete' does not appear to be mentioned in the Assyrian or the Egyptian monuments; (2) the sense of 'island' is not to be limited to 'island' (HAB, 'coast, border, region'), and (3) in Jer. 47: 20 gives τοὺς καταλοιποὺς τῶν ῥήτων—i.e., the text which it followed was without 'Caphtor', the 'lands' or 'coast-lands' might be the Phoenician colonies (WMM). As for 'Cherethites', the current explanation, 'Cretans' (so too G. Pesh.), is very uncertain; cp ῥῆς probably = Philasati (Pharasati), which is the name of one of the tribes of seapirates from the coasts of Asia Minor which harassed Egypt under Rameses III. The probability is that ῥῆς is a slightly modified form of the name of another such tribe. Now, the tribe which is constantly coupled with the Ph-rs-s-t in the Egyptian inscriptions is that of the Ta-k-a-ra or Ta-ka-ra-y. It is reasonable to infer that ῥῆς is a form of Takaray, which was Hebraised in two ways: (1) by placing the first consonant third instead of first (ῥῆς, as if = ent off?), and (2) by omitting the first syllable (ῥῆς; but see CARITES). We look to Egyptology, therefore, for light on this problem.

According to Ebers,¹ Caphtor is the Egyptian Kaft-ur, 'Great Kaft'. This scholar held that Kaft was the name current in Egypt, first of all for the populous Phoenician colonies in the Delta, and then, more widely, for the Phoenicians of Phoenicia and their colonies. Kaft-ur would therefore mean 'Great Phoenicia' (cp Magni Gherard). This view, however, though not without plausible justification, is no longer tenable, as W. M. Müller has fully shown (U. u. Eur. 117 ff.).

Keftō is the name of a country which, together with Asi (the Alašia of Am. Tab.)—i.e., Cyprus—represents the western quarter of the world in the age of Thothmes III. No doubt it is Cilicia that is meant; hence in Lepsius's Denkmäler, 63, it is mentioned with Mannus (= Mallus, a region of silver mines) as inhabited by the same people. E. Meyer (who himself, however, still inclines to identify Caphtor with Crete) writes thus² of the land of Kaft (i.e., Müller's Keftō): 'The inhabitants of this land, the Kafti (formerly wrongly read Kafu) carried on a sea trade, and possessed a richly-developed decorative art which is closely related to the Mycenaean. Upon the Egyptian monuments they present throughout, in contrast with the inhabitants of the Phoenician seaports, a wholly non-Semitic type of features, and appear in the inscriptions as a western people outside the pale of the Semitic world. Rightly, therefore, have Pietschmann, Steindorff, and W. M. Müller rejected the equation Kaft = φωκική of the bilingual decree of Canopus and sought for Kaft in Asia Minor, perhaps in Cilicia.'

Now, when we consider that the sea-pirates called Purasati and Takaray are stated to have come from the 'islands' (i.e., coast-lands), it is obvious that 'if Purasati (at any rate) has been rightly identified in Hebrew literature, Caphtor, whence the Pēlišṭim (Philistines) came, must be a name for some part of the sea-board of Asia Minor, and we may expect to find its original in the Egyptian inscriptions. That original must surely be Keftō (or Kaft), which appears to have been Hebraised as Caphtor. That Caphtorim should be called a son of Mizraim (Gen. 10: 14) is not surprising, for Caphtorim here, as well as in Dt. 23, means, not the people of Caphtor (the coasts of Asia Minor) but the Philistines, who, as Müller has shown, were subject to Egypt in Shishak's time and earlier (cp DAVID, § 7). It is indeed doubtful whether either Amos or the Yahwist (J) can be presumed to have known the true meaning of Caphtor, for as early as the fourteenth century the name Keftō had passed out of general use. As a name for Cilicia it was superseded by Hilakku (see CILICIA, § 2). Hence the false tradition, identifying Caphtor with Cappadocia, could easily arise, just as another incorrect tradition identifying the Cherethites with the Cretans (on the other side see CHERETHITES) arose. See WMM, As. u. Eur. 347, 399, to whom this (probably) right explanation of Caphtor is due. That the final r in Caphtor still needs to be accounted for is admitted.

CAPPADOCIA (ΚΑΠΠΑΔΟΚΙΑ [T. WH] Acts 2: 9, 1 Pet. 1: 1). Cappadocia, from a similarity of sound, was wrongly identified by the translators of G with CAPHTOR (see readings in previous article). It is allowable, however, to find it in the Gomer (see GEOGRAPHY, § 20, 1) of Gen. 10: 2; certainly the region called Gimir by the Assyrians was in or near Cappadocia. A still older name for Cappadocia seems to have been Tahad (see TIBAL); the Talutians were scattered abroad on the invasion of their lands by the Gimirai. The connection of Cappadocia with the early Hittites can only be mentioned here (see HITTITES).

Cappadocia is mentioned twice in the NT: Cappadocian Jews listened to Peter's sermon (Acts 2: 9), and his first epistle is addressed to Christian residents in the province (1 Pet. 1: 1). Jews must early have found their way into this part of Asia Minor, which is intersected by the commercial highways leading to Amisus on the Euxine and to Ephesus on the Aegean.

Strabo (534) sketches the area included under the name of Cappadocia. In the earliest times it embraced the entire neck of the Anatolian peninsula. Subsequently it was split up into the two independent monarchies of Cappadocia Proper (ἡ πρὸς τῷ Ταύρῳ, ἡ μεγίστη) and Pontus (ἡ πρὸς τῷ Πόντῳ Κ.), separated from each other by the broad irregular elevation of the Tchamlı Bel and Ak Dagh (Strabo, 540; Rams. Hitt. Geogr. 315). In the south the Pyle Cilicic and the ridge of Taurus marked the frontier against Cilicia. Lake Tatta was part of the western boundary. In the SW, Cappadocia merged into the vast level plains of Lyconia and South Galatia; eastwards it extended to the Euphrates. The frontier varied greatly, however, at different epochs, especially towards the N and the E. Cappadocia is a cold elevated table-land, intersected by mountains, deficient in timber, but excellent for grain and grazing (Str. 73, 539). Its chief export seems to have been slaves (Hör. Ep. 1, 639: Mancipii locuples eget ante Cappadocum rex); but they were not of much account (Cic. Post Red. 614). Red ochre (Σαρωπία μίτρος; Str. 540) of good quality was exported: the emporium was Ephesus—not Tarsus, as we might have expected. Several monarchs of Cappadocia Proper bore the name Armarathes (cp 1 Macc. 15: 22). Its last king, Archelaus, was deposed by Tiberius, who reduced the country to the form of a province, in 17 A.D. (Tac. Ann. 2: 42; Jos. Ant. xvi, 46).

In Imperial times the Cappadocian roads fall into three groups:—(1) those on the north, and (2) those on the south, of the river Halys, in both cases leading eastwards to the heads of the upper Euphrates; (3) transverse roads leading northwards from the Cilician Gates: one of the chief among these last was that which afterwards became the pilgrims' route to the Holy Land (Rams. op. cit. 255). The capital, Mazaca (Μαζακα, from Mosch, the ancestor of the Cappadocians; Jos. Ant. 1, 61, Gen. 10: 2), occupied a central position actually upon the Euphrates trade-route, at the northern foot of Mt. Argæus. It was refounded by Claudius, who gave it the name Cæsarea, about 41 A.D. Because of the strength of the new religion in it, Julian expunged it from the list of cities. By his time the whole town had been christianized (ἡ πόλις Χριστιανισμένη) and its great temples of Zeus Polichius and Apollo Patroüs had long been destroyed (Sozom. HE 5: 4; Rams. op. cit. 303). This is the more remarkable as southern Cappadocia was the stronghold of the worship of Ma (Enyo), whose priest rivalled the king himself in power (Str. 535). At the time of Strabo's visit the Hieroduli of the temple numbered over six thousand, and goddess ATARGATIS (7.17). G. Smith's words are (see Del. Par. 266 f.). 'Grand site [i.e. vast walls and palaces—monads 8000 feet round], many sculptures and monoliths with inscriptions [i.e. site of Carchemish]'. Some of the sculptures and inscriptions are now in the British Museum. The ruins extend half a mile from N. to S. by a quarter of a mile from W. to E. (Pococke, LC 1).

Carchemish was the northern capital of the Hittite empire, the Assyrian mat Hatti, clearly a great trade centre, and seems to have been a fortress-city commanding the principal ford of the Euphrates on the trade route from the Mesopotamian plains into Syria. As the mounds lie between Berejik and the junction of the Sajur with the Euphrates, it is certain that a strong force at Carchemish could block the route of an Egyptian army into Assyria. About 1600 B.C. the army of Thutmose III. had to meet the people of Kar-ka-ma(2)-Sa (WMM, Isin, 263); and the Egyptian captain Amenemheb took some of the inhabitants prisoners. Tiglath-pileser I. (c. 1100 B.C.) says that he defeated and plundered people belonging to the city of Carchemish, and when the rest fled and crossed the Euphrates he sent his troops across on floats of inflated skins and burnt six cities at the foot of Mount Bišn (KBI 10, I. 49 ff.). It is clear that his victory did not give command of the ford and that he did not take the city itself. Ash-nāsir-pal (c. 880 B.C.) received from Sangara, king of (mat Hatti) the Hittites, in the neighbourhood of Carchemish, tribute, the magnitude and variety of which attest the wealth and prosperity of the land (KBI 160, I. 65 ff.). Shalmaneser II. about 825 B.C. defeated an alliance of Sangara with his neighbours and received an enormous tribute from him (KBI 162, I. 27 ff.). On the bronze gates of Balawat a picture of the fortress is twice given in relief. Sargon II. in 717 B.C. totally captured the city, took its king Pishris prisoner, deported its people, and settled Assyrians in it (KBI 18, II. 10, 22; Wi. Sarg., passim). From this time it was the capital of a regular province of Assyria, and had its own saknu or governor, who took his place among the Eponyms (702 B.C.). A strong proof of its commercial importance is afforded by the fact that by far the most common unit of monetary value in Assyria down to the last was the maneh of Carchemish. On the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C., see EGYPT, § 68; ISRAEL, § 40.

CARIA (τὴν καρίαν [NV], τ. -ιδά [V]), the southern part of the Roman province of Asia, mentioned as one of the countries to which a Roman note in favour of the Jews was sent in 130 B.C. (1 Macc. 15.23); see MACCABEES, FIRST, § 9. At that date Caria was autonomous. Previously the greater portion had been assigned to Rhodes (in 189 B.C.), but after the war with Persens (198 B.C., cp 1 Macc. 8.5 Pal. 79c) it was declared free. After 129 B.C. Caria was part of the province of Asia (Cic. Pro. Flac. 65). Jews were settled in many Carian towns—Cnidus, Halicarnassus, Myndus, Miletus—and in the islands off the coast—Cos, Rhodes, etc.

acquaintance with the western part of Asia Minor. The name may have meant little more than foreigners. (For another view see CAPHTOR, § 2.) I. B.

CARMANIAN, RV Carmonians (Carmonii [ed. Bently], mint [A*], -ne [A]), for which some MSS read Armeni, on the principle of substituting the unknown for the known, a people, mentioned in the 'vision horrible' (4 Esd. 15.40), who were to go forth 'as the wild boars of the wood' and 'waste a portion of the land of the Assyrians with their teeth' (so RV); see SWINE. They are probably the inhabitants of Kerman, a province on the N. shore of the Persian gulf, lying to the W. of Gedrosia. Kerman is now the name of a province in the SE. of Persia.

In language and customs they were akin to the Persians. They were not unknown to ancient classical authors (cp. Nearctus, Arrian Ind. 10; Strabo, Ec 27, the latter of whom gives a very gruesome account of some of their customs).

The events hinted at in the vision probably refer to the conquests of the Sassanides, more especially of Shapur or Sapor I. (242-273 A.D.), and to their expeditions against 'Alerian (258 A.D.) and other generals. We may thus see in the wasting of a 'portion of the land of the Assyrians' (v. 30) Sapor's expedition towards the NW. where he overran Syria and destroyed Antioch. The dragons of Arabia (v. 29; cp. the 'fiery flying serpents' of 1s. 30e) would then be the Arabian forces of Odenathus and Zenobia, who drove him back beyond the Euphrates; and the retaliation described in v. 33 would refer to the repulse of the Palmyrene troops, their dislodgment from the banks of the Orontes, and the fall of Zenobia at the hands of Aurelian (272 A.D.).

See ESDRAS, FOURTH BOOK OF, § 5 (B). [For the history of this period cp WRS, 'Palmyra', and No. 'Persia', FB 30.]

CARME (χαρμη [BA]) 1 Esd. 5.25, AV = Ezra 2.1, HARM, 1.

CARMEL (קרמל or הרמל — i.e., 'the garden-land', καρμηλός [BA], 1. (Sometimes also קרמל, 2.

1. Name and position. opoc to καρμηλίων.) The name Carmel, which is properly a common noun meaning a plantation of choice trees (cp Span. carmen), is employed both with and (Josh. 19.26 Jer. 46.18 Nah. 1.4) without the article as the proper name of a mountain. The reference is to the richly wooded character which Mt. Carmel had anciently and possesses still in a large degree (cp 'The Black Forest').

It is convenient to distinguish three separate applications of the name: (1) as denoting the range of hills extending for some 12 or 13 miles from the sea coast in the NW. to the W. el-Milhi in the SE.; (2) as including also the farther prolongation (called er-Ruhah) of this range for other 12 or 13 miles in a south-easterly direction, as far as to the neighbourhood of Jeon; (3) as designating the promontory or head-land in which the range ends at its northern extremity, leaving only a narrow passage between the mountain and the sea. The range and the promontory combine to form a striking feature in the configuration of Palestine. The symmetrical arrangement by which the country as a whole falls into longitudinal sections, running north and south, distinguished as the littoral zone, the hill-country, and the zone of the Ghôr (see PALESTINE, § 9. f.), is broken by Carmel alone, intruding into the Mediterranean plain, and interrupting the continuity of the mountain zone so as to form the plain of Jeon. Topographically it is thus important; and, though Carmel is not often expressly named, the presence of this natural barrier and the adjoining plain had a considerable influence on the course of immigrations or invasions from the time of the Philistines and Phoenicians down to that of Bonaparte.

The eastern slope of Carmel falls sharply towards the plain of Esdraelon; but westward its declivity towards the Mediterranean is gentle. On this side its configuration presents a series of divergent buttresses separated by valleys and opening up like

2. Nature. a fan towards the coast. This western region, properly, belongs to the massif of Carmel, and Conder says, quite rightly, 'Carmel is best described as a triangular block of mountains.' From the summit of the main range and, indeed, from almost every point along the ridge extensive views to south and north are obtained, and Carmel in turn is visible and conspicuous from a great variety of distant points. The range reaches a maximum elevation of 18 to feet a little to the south of the village of 'Ishiyeh.

Geologically it is a tuffaceous and micaceous limestone, containing fossil echinoderms and 'geodes'. The siliceous concretions known as apophyses or vulgarly as 'cat heads', called by the ancient pilgrims kapdes yodan or Elisha's melons (Loet, La Vie de S. Elie, 172). There are many caves, and some volcanic rocks. The fauna includes the roebuck, the leopard, and the wild cat. The flora, which is luxuriant, is wholly wild. The most common trees are the pine, oak, lentisk, carob, olive; traces of modern agriculture are to be found only in the neighbourhood of the villages and of the sea-coast. It was otherwise in ancient times, as is shown by the very name (phor, § 1). At various points in the range ancient vine and oil presses have been discovered, and traces of Roman roads have been pointed out to the present writer by Dr. Schumacher.

There is every ground for believing that formerly Carmel was covered much more luxuriantly than it is now. Hence the comparison in Cant. 7 (6)

3. OT ref. ('thine head is like Carmel'), and the allusion to the 'splendour of Carmel' in Is. 35:2. Its prominence is related to in Jer. 46:18, where it is said that the king of Babylon will come 'like Labor among the mountains and like Carmel by the sea'. In conjunction with Sharon, Lebanon, and Bashan, Carmel serves as a type for a land that has been singularly blessed by God (Jer. 50:10 Mic. 7:14). The devastation of Carmel implies the severest chastisement for Israel (Is. 33:9 Jer. 1:6 Am. 1:2 Nah. 1:4). Its thick woods offered shelter to the fugitive, as Amos (9:1) indicates in an allusion that admits of explanation without supposing that the mountain was held to give protection against Yahweh (for the Deut. Ps. 139:7-14). The passages which assign to Elisha an abode on Carmel do not necessarily mean that he was compelled to seek an asylum there (2 K. 2:25-26). In the time of Strabo Carmel was still a place of refuge for the persecuted (16730).

We cannot say with certainty to which tribe Carmel belonged.

The one reference in this connection (Josh. 19:26) in the delineation of Asher is somewhat enigmatical (see Asm. n. § 3), and in any case can relate only to the extreme headland. The tribes of Manasseh, Issachar, and Zebulun must all have touched on Carmel. Doubtless the tribal limits varied from age to age, and there must have been periods of Phoenician ascendancy.

In later times Carmel belonged now to Samaria, now to Galilee, sometimes even to the province of Tyre.

In Ahab's time it certainly formed part of the dominions of that monarch, and it became the scene of the memorable contest between Elijah and the prophets of Baal.

Tradition places the scene, and the altar of Yahweh which Elijah repaired, at a point called El-Mohraka ('place of burning'), where there is a Roman Catholic sanctuary 1700 feet above the sea-level, two hours south from 'Ishiyeh. Beneath this spot, at the base of the mountain, near the Kishon, there is a hillback, the so-called Tell-el-Kissis ('hill of the priest,' not 'of the priests'), which is pointed to—but, of course, with no historical certainty—as the place where the prophets of Baal were put to death.

There are no data for fixing the scene of 1 K. 18 in one locality more than another, and 773 41-45 leave us as much in the dark as the rest of the narrative. Some interpreters take the 'mountain' in 2 K. 19:15 to be Carmel; but it is natural to look for it somewhere on the coast between Samaria and Ekron. It has also been supposed to be intended in Dt. 33:14 ('Issachar and Zebulun . . . shall call the peoples unto the mountain'); but 'what mountain is meant is quite indeterminate. There may have been more than one mountain sanctuary in Zebulun and Issachar; and the reference may be to these generally' (Dr. ad loc.).

CARMI

Carmel had a widespread reputation for sanctity. Thotmes III. has been quoted as a witness. Maspero, in fact, thinks that he can recognise

4. Other ref. the 'holy headland' (277 288) of Carmel in the name Ru-si-kds, no. 48 in the Palestinian place-list of Thotmes III. (A. P. 275 47); but this is uncertain.¹

Jaubert (U. P. 179, 3) asserts that Pythagoras sojourned on Carmel. Tacitus (Hist. 2:7) speaks of it as a place consecrated by the presence of an oracle, beside an altar that was unadorned by any image of the deity. Suetonius (Cl. 68, 5) relates that Vespasian sacrificed at this spot, and so and from the poet is the prophecy of his greatness. Among

5. Later times. Mohammedans the memory of Elijah is indissolubly associated with Carmel, which the Arabs to this day call Jebel Mar Elias, Mount St. Elias, where they have set up ways and mosques in his honour.

Still greater has its importance been in the Christian world. Many anchorites established themselves there from the earliest times. In 1156 St. Berthold of Calabria founded the order of Carmelites and built their first monastery at the north western extremity of the range near 'Ishiyah's grotto.

In 1552 the monastery was visited by St. Louis (Louis IX.) of France, who is sanctified, but wrongly, represented as its founder. Dedicated to Our Lady of Mount Carmel, it has had a very chequered history. The Carmelites were often persecuted; and their house was destroyed or turned into a mosque. In 1799 it was used as a hospital for the sick and wounded of Napoleon's army. In 1830 it was destroyed by Abdallapasha; but a Carmelite friar, Giovanni Battista di Tarsani, successfully undertook to collect funds for its restoration. The present building, erected above the sea-level, is due to his efforts; by its side stands a lighthouse. 'Ishiyah's grotto' forms the crypt of the church; another grotto near, which formerly belonged to the Christians but has now been taken by the Moslems, is represented as having harboured a school of the prophets in Elijah's time, and as having given shelter to the Holy Family on their return from Egypt.

A little way above the monastery, on the crest of the hill, a large sanatorium (Lufkurhaus) has been built by the German colony in Haifa.

These colonists pursue agriculture on the slopes of Mount Carmel, and, by their success in vine-culture especially, have demonstrated the possibility of bringing back to the scene of their labours some portion of its ancient prosperity.

2. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. 15:55) (קָרְמִי [BAAL]), the scene of incidents in the life of Saul (1 S. 15:32) and David (1 S. 25:2 ff.).² The gentile קָרְמִי, Carmelite (καρμιελίτης), is applied to David's wife Abigail (2 S. 1:1) (2 S. 2:2 καρμιελίτης [A], etc.) and to HIZRO (1 Ch. 11:37). The town is mentioned (קָרְמִי, Carmeli) by Eus. and Jer. (OS 110, 127270 f.) as situated 10 m. from Hebron, and as having a Roman garrison. It is the modern Karmel, 2887 ft. above the sea-level, about 8 R.m. SE. from Hebron (according to Robinson, who thinks Eusebius and Jerome have exaggerated the distance; see also Palestine Survey map, sheet xxiv). Robinson speaks of the ruins as 'extensive'; the principal ruin is that of the castle, which he assigns to Herod or the Romans, but Conder to 12th century A.D. The site is upon the edge of the wilderness of Judaea; but to the west the land is broad and fertile, not unlike scenes of upland agriculture in Scotland. The name Carmel is therefore suitable. There are many remains of vineyard terraces, and a reservoir.

CARMI (כַּרְמִי, § 701 קָרְמִי [BAAL]), apparently shortened from Beth-hae-cerem³ or Beth-hae-carmi [see FAUCHI MONTH], and note in Josh. 15:59 the name Carmi (קָרְמִי [BAAL]).

CARPENTER (כרפי, 2 Sam. 5:11; ΤΕΚΤΩΝ, Mt. 13:55). See HANDICRAFTS, § 2.

CARPUS (ΚΑΡΠΟΣ [Ti. WH]) appears to have been Paul's host at Troas; it was with him that the apostle left the cloak and books mentioned in 2 Tim. 4:13. He is named in the lists of 'the seventy disciples of our Lord' compiled by the Pseudo-Dorotheus and Pseudo-Hippolytus (see DISCIPLE, § 3) as bishop of Berœa in Thrace.

CARRIAGE. This English word, which has elsewhere in EV, with various special applications as indicated by the context, the obsolete sense of 'something carried,' is found in the sense of 'vehicle' in Lev. 15:9, RV^{mg} (see SADDLE), and perhaps in 1 S. 17:20 2 S. 7, AV^{mg} (see CAMP, § 1, WAR).

The other renderings are based on the connection of כרספ with כסף 'silver, money,' Ezra 8:17 (ἀργυρίω τοῦ τόπου [BA]) = 1 Esd. 8:45 [47]. EV 'the place of the treasury' (τῷ τόπῳ [τοῦ] γασφραλαίου [BA], τ. τ. τῶν κίων [L], τ. τοῖς ἐν τ. τ. γασφραλαίῳ [BA]). It is doubtless the same as the Caspis. These data suit the present el-Muqairib, the great station on the Hajj road, which is not identified with any other OT name (but see ASHTAROTH, § 2), and in antiquity must have been a place of importance; its ancient name has not been recovered.

The identification of Casphon with Khisfin (see Furrer, in Richm's HB 1:24 A) is philologically improbable, and has no

CASSIA represents two Hebrew words. 1. קסיה (Ex. 30:24 Ezek. 27:19†) appears, along with myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and olive oil, as an ingredient of the holy anointing oil. It is mentioned, along with bright iron and calamus, among the wares brought into the Tyrian market. The origin of the word is unknown, nor is it found in any of the cognate languages; some have thought that it reappears in the קיטו spoken of by Dioscorides (112) as one species of cassia.

G^{AL} renders קסיה in Ex. 30:24, where קסיה, קסיה, and קסוס are mentioned in other MSS as alternative renderings; in Ezek. 27:19, where קסיה omits, Vg. has σπασίον, Sym. σπαστή, and Theod. καδδα. Pesh. and Targ. identify it with the קסיה or 'cassia' of Ps. 45:8 (see below).

Scholars are agreed that probably what is intended is some kind of cassia.

Celsius (2186) notices the mention in Mish. K'Z i. § 3 of קסיה, 'white cassia,' as cultivated in Palestine; but this, according to Low (340), must have been quite a different plant.

2. קסיה Ps. 45:8 (9), the word which passed into Greek as *κασία*¹ and thence into other languages, is almost certainly a derivative of the root קסח (= Ar. kaḥa'a), to 'scrape'—properly 'to reduce to fine dust' (WRS in J. Phil. 1671 f.). A 'powdered fragrant bark' is thus indicated. The word is too general to allow of certain identification with any particular species; but probably what is intended is something akin to the modern 'cassia bark' (i.e., the bark of other kinds of Cinnamomum than that which yields the true cinnamon). The use of the Heb. plural to denote a substance of this kind is natural.² The word in the singular is found as a female name; see KEZIAH.

Fl. and Hanb., Pharm. (2) 519, say: 'That cinnamon and cassia were extremely analogous is proved by the remark of Galen, that the finest cassia differs so little from the lowest quality of cinnamon that the first may be used for the second, provided a double weight of it be used.'

A very probable source of cassia is Cinnamomum zeylanicum, Pl. The Pharmacopœia indica says: 'May be used as a substitute for Cinnamon, to which it can hardly be reckoned inferior.' C. zeylanicum occurs in S. India and throughout the Malayan region. It yielded the 'cassia bark' once so largely exported from N. Canara. See CINNAMON. N. M.—W. T. T. D.

CASTANETS (כרספיה), 2 S. 6:5† RV. See MUSIC, § 3 (3).

CASTLE. Two buildings are distinguished in AV by this title: (1) the 'city [rather, citadel] of David' in 1 Ch. 11:5 (כרספיה) 7 (כרספיה), where RV harmonizes with 2 S. 5:7 by rendering 'strong hold,' and (2) the barracks (lit. camp) attached to the fort Antonia (Acts 21:34-37; παρεμβολή). See JERUSALEM, TEMPLE.

3. RV also gives the title to the ḥirsh (כרספיה) of Susa (AV 'palace'). See PALACE, SHUSHAN; also FORTRESS, TOWER.

4. The word is also used in AV, quite wrongly, for כרספיה, which is rather a nomad 'encampment' (so RV), Gen. 25:16 etc. (distinguished from כרספיה 'villages'). See CAMP, § 1, CAHIL, § 1 D.

CASTOR AND POLLUX. RV The Twin Brothers (Διοσκουροί [Ti. WH]; so RV^{mg}: 'Dioscuri'), the sign (παρασηύον) of the Alexandrian ship in which Paul sailed from Melita to Puteoli (Acts 28:11). Castor and Pollux, the sons of Zeus and Leda and brothers of Helen, appear in heaven as the constellation Gemini.⁴ See STARS, § 3 f. They were the tutelary deities of sailors, and (it may be interesting to note) were held in especial veneration in the district of Cyrene, near Alexandria (Schol. Pind. Pyth. 56). Catullus (127)

⁴ On their mythological forms see more fully EB 9:272, and Roscher s.v. 'Dioskuren.'

speaks of a boat dedicated to the same deities, and for other examples of names of ships see Smith's Class. Dict., s.v. 'Insigne.' It is probable that images of Castor and Pollux were fixed at the bow of Paul's ship, since it was customary for a ship to carry at the bow a representation of the sign which furnished the name (the insigne), and at the stern a representation of the tutelary deity (the tutela). Herod. (337) makes reference to the Pataikoi (origin doubtful), figures of hideous muscular dwarfs which the Phoenicians stuck up on the bows of their galleys (cp PHOENICIA, and see Perr. Chp. Phoen. 217 f., and note the illustration of such a galley, ib. 19).

CAT. Cats (EV) or rather WILD CATS (αἰγιοῖποι)—for the context requires us to take αἰγ. in this sense—are mentioned in the 'Epistle of Jeremy' (Bar. 622) with hats, swallows, and birds, which alight upon the bodies and heads of idols. Wild cats (קִטָּה) are recognised by the Tg. of Is. 1322 (for קִטָּה, see JACKAL) 3414 (for קִטָּה, see JACKAL [4]), but not of Hos. 96 (where 'קָט' is a faulty reading for קִטָּה, 'thistles'). We must not infer from the lateness of these words that it was only at a late date that the Israelites became acquainted with wild cats. They no doubt knew the felis maniculata (the original of our own domestic cat), which to-day is very common on the E. of Jordan (though it is scarce on the W. side), and is found, indeed, throughout Africa, Arabia, Syria, and Palestine (Tristram).

We need not wonder that no reference is made in the OT to the domestic cat. The Egyptians themselves had probably tamed the wild cat only to a certain extent; it accompanies the fowler on his expeditions (see woodcuts in Wilk. Ant. Eg. 1236 f.). The stories of Herodotus (266) are absurd. Bastit, the goddess of Bubastus, was 'a cat or a tigress' (Maspero).

The rendering 'wild cats' in Tg. of Is. (see above) is not adopted by modern translators. All that we can be sure of is that the writers of the descriptions referred to had in view some definite wild animals. Wolves, hyenas, jackals, and wild cats (including 'martens') were in their minds; but it is not easy to distribute them among the various Hebrew terms. Many commentators, after Bochart (Hieroz. 862), give 'wild cat' for Heb. קִטָּה (Is. 1321 3414 Jer. 5039 Ps. 7414 [text doubted]). Certainly EV's 'wild beasts of the desert' (as if from קִטָּה) is inappropriate; the etymology assumed also is very doubtful. The ancient versions are inconsistent, and the Heb. writers would not have condemned them. See JACKAL, WOLF.

CATECHISE (קָטַח) Prov. 226 AV¹⁹⁰⁸; EV 'train up,' with which cp Lk. 14 u.g., 'the things which thou wast taught (κατηχήθης) by word of mouth'; Acts 1825 nig. 'taught by word of mouth (κατηχήμενος) in the way of the Lord.' That oral instruction is meant by κατηχεῖν is undeniable; cp Jos. Ant. 65, 'when thou meetest me, καὶ αὐτὸς σε πολλὰ κατηχήσω, 'I will inform thee of many things.'

The Revisers of the OT seem to have thought that such a peculiar word as קָטַח may have had a technical meaning such as κατηχεῖν at length acquired. In MH a derivative of קָטַח (קָטַח) means the 'gradual introduction of children into religious practice'; e.g., 'Wherein consists the child's training (קָטַח), Yoma 52a, with reference to the fasting on the Day of Atonement. Certainly the word קָטַח elsewhere always has a technical meaning. It seems to mean religious initiation or dedication, whether of a person (so perhaps קָטַח Gen. 1414) or of a building (see DEDICATE; cp קָטַח, Enoch). The first part of Prov. 226 is very obscure, and probably corrupt (see Ch. Exa. 7: Sept. 1209). Oral instruction there doubtless was in the post-exilic period to which Proverbs seems to belong (see EDUCATION, § 1); but קָטַח is not one of the technical words of the wise men for communicating instruction.

CATHUA (ΚΟΥΑ [B], ΚΑΘΟΥΑ [A], ΓΕΔΔΗΛΑ [I.]), a family of NETHINIM in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii. § 9) 1 Esd. 530, unmentioned in 1 Ezra 247 Neh. 749, unless the name may be identified with GATHAR (גָּתָר for גָּתָר?), or perhaps with GIDUR. [777].

CATTLE ¹ The nomad origin of the Semites is plain from the fact that numerous words relating to the life and associations of nomads (e.g., ox, sheep, etc.) are common to all the dialects. In the case of the Bine Isard, not only idioms and figures of speech, but also old traditional names and even direct statements, confirm the view, which is in itself highly probable. Note, for example, the name KACUEI, 'the ewe' (WRS Rev. Sem. 311), and the description of Abram as a 'nomad Aramitean' (רֹמֵם דִּי אֲרָמָא Di. 265). A still earlier ancestor, JABAL (the name is again significant), is called the 'father'—i.e., founder—of nomadic life (Gen. 420; cp CAINITES, § 11).

It is important at the outset to bear in mind the difference between nomads ('tent-dwellers,' Gen. 12c) and those who have settled down as agriculturists. Of the constantly recurring struggle between these two classes a vivid picture is presented in the narrative of Zebul and Zalmunna (Judg. 8), chiefs of the Midianites, a people which, as depicted in the OT, may serve as a good illustration of the nomad class. The difference between the two classes may not be complete; for traces of nomadic origin will continue to be visible, even after the shepherd's tower, or the cattle kraal, with its nucleus of tents, has developed by successive stages into the fortified city (עִיר קְרָאָה; see 2 K. 179 188 and cp Benz. HA 125 f.). It is equally important to remember that the state of civilisation of a settled people is not readily assimilated by those on a lower grade. The importance of this in its bearing on the early history of Israel can hardly be exaggerated²; with the Bine Israel the transition from the nomadic to the settled state was a long process. The compilers and expanders of the patriarchal legends shrink from representing their heroes as pure nomads: they feel that, if so represented, these heroes would be grossly inadequate types of their far-off descendants. We have, however, evidence that the later Israelites had, in the more northern parts of their own land, representatives of the old nomadic life in all its simplicity (see REUBENITES).

The words commonly employed in Hebrew to denote cattle in general are:

1. מִקְנֵה, mikneh (cp מִקְנֵה, 'property'), EV usually 'cattle' (so Gen. 4032), a term denoting 'possession,' comprising, therefore, the things which are the usual and almost peculiar property of nomads.

2. Names for cattle. It is used, accordingly, in a much wider sense than קָרָא (EV 'flock'; but AV 'cattle,' Gen. 3040 etc.), which denotes the small cattle, sheep, and goats, or sheep alone (cp 1 S. 252). Mikneh does not include, however, servants; not, as a rule, horses or asses (but see Ex. 93 Job 13).

2. קָרָא, qara, includes all the larger domestic animals: in Neh. 212 14 it means a saddle-animal. It is usually contrasted with man, wild beasts (בְּהֵמָה, behemah), birds, and crawling things (cp Ps. 14810). The word is not, however, free from vagueness, for it may be applied to wild animals, and even (in plur. form) to an imaginary animal (see BEHEMOT, §§ 1, 3).

3. בְּהֵמָה, behemah ('cattle' Nu. 204 Ps. 7848), 'beast,' used

³ Houbert (III 208) remarks on the resistance to Babylonian civilisation displayed by the nomad Aramean tribes mentioned in the Ass. inscriptions of the eighth and seventh centuries. Strong historical evidence would have to be shown to justify the conclusion that the Israhel nomads were essentially different from these.

of beasts of burden (Gen. 45:17 (p. 44:13) and of cattle generally. The Ar. ba'ir is used of both the camel and the ass.

4. מִלְכָּהּ, milkhah 'property' (cp Ex. 22:7 [6], 10 [9]), used of cattle in Gen. 33:14 and, as including them, in 1 S. 15:9.

5. מִרְרָה, mirrah 'fat cattle,' 1 K. 19 (RV fattening, cp μῆλας στέαρως); generally used with שׁוֹר or צֶמֶד.

6. צֶמֶד, seh, rendered 'small cattle' or 'cattle' in Is. 43:23 Ezek. 34:17, is the nom. unitatis to צָמִיד, see SUTHER.

7. אֶלֶפֶת, alaphim (pl.), 'oxen'; cp Prov. 14:4 Is. 30:24, etc.

To denote the animals of the bovine kind the Hebrews used:

(a) בָּקָר, bakar, a generic word, which frequently occurs in parallelism with אֶמָּה. It is often used individually (cp בָּקָרִים, a single ox or calf; see Gen. 18:7), and frequently employed to define a word more closely—e.g., with שׁוֹר Lev. 9:2, בָּקָר Ex. 20:1. Its usual nom. unit. is בָּקָרָה, bakar, used without reference to age or to gender, to denote an ox or cow. It is used of a young calf in Ex. 22:30 [29], Lev. 22:23, and is once collective, Gen. 32:5 [6]. (b) שׁוֹר, shor, fem. שׁוֹרָה, sharah, bull, cow, defined by בָּקָר Ex. 20:1 and used of a seven-year-old, Judg. 6:25. (c) צֶמֶד, seh, fem. צֶמֶדָה, sehah, a calf, used of a three-year-old (Gen. 15:9 cp Is. 15:5), and also of a young cow that already gives milk (Is. 7:21); see HENKEL. (d) אֶבְרָה, abrah 'mighty,' used poetically of oxen (Is. 34:7), but also of horses (Jer. 8:16, etc.).

With regard to the practices of ancient nomadic pastoral peoples we are but ill-informed. It is probable that formerly (as now in Arabia) the same

3. Breeding. clan would not breed more than one kind of domestic animal. There is still a broad distinction between the camel-breeding tribes of the upland plains and the shepherd tribes of the mountains (WRS Rel. Sem. 311). The steppes of Palestine have always been more suitable for sheep and goats, and the northern mountains for oxen. E. of the Jordan, however, cattle were turned loose,¹ and, becoming wild, acquired a name for their ferocity and from their habit of gathering in circles round any object that attracted their attention (Ps. 22:12 [13] f.). At the present day shepherds frequent the cool mountain-heights in the summer, and find late in the autumn an abundant supply of green leaves and twigs for their sheep and goats in the cedars round Lebanon and Baalbek.

The parts of Palestine which were most suitable for the pasturing of herds—the parts which deserve the name of אֶרֶץ בָּקָר (Nu. 32:14)—were those situated to the E. of Jordan (the modern region of Belkā) and in the S. plains of Judah. The enormous tribute paid annually by Meša, 'the shepherd' (22), attests the richness of the country (cp Nu. 32:1). Places specially mentioned in connection with herds and flocks are Carmel (1 S. 25:2), Shechem (Gen. 37:12), Dothan (Gen. 37:17), Shaon (1 Ch. 27:29 Is. 65:10, Tekoa (Am. 1:1), Gedor (1 Ch. 4:30), Bethlehem (1 S. 16:11), Midian (Nu. 31:32 cp 17:8 f.), Edom (Is. 34:6), and Kedar (Ezek. 27:21).

In prehistoric times there were several kinds of oxen, all wild: a European bison, Bison bonasus, Linn., still

4. Species. preserved in the forests of SE. Europe; the Urus, Bos primigenius, and Bos longifrons, now extinct, probably belonging to the same race as our Bos taurus or domesticated oxen. Our modern cattle are derived from the last-named. In Palestine at the present day horned cattle are found only where fresh pastures are easily accessible. In the wilderness S. of Judah horned cattle of a rather undersized kind may be seen in great numbers. Further to the N. there is a larger and better bred race, used for tilling. These, as a rule, belong to the same species as our cattle, the Bos taurus. N. of Esdraelon there is a light-coloured and stalwart variety usually known as the Armenian. In the valley of the Jordan, especially towards the N., there is a species of Indian buffalo, Bos bubalis (Ar. gāmus), a clumsy animal with remarkably long horns (generally flattened and angulated). From its size and general appearance the species has been confounded with the ancient el'ebu (see UNICORNS); but it belongs to comparatively recent times. It has been introduced into several of the Mediterranean countries—e.g., Egypt, Asia Minor, and Italy. E. of the Jordan horned cattle are rare (Tristram, Moab, 251), although the best country for them is said to be there (cp Buhl, Pal. 60).

Cattle-breeding holds a large place upon the Egyptian monuments; their evidence goes to show that the so-called Zebu was most common, and that several species of it were bred. The long-horned kind generally had their horns bent like a lyre or, less commonly, in the shape of a crescent. Short-horns appear rarely in the Old Empire, but are more frequent in later times. Another kind was hornless, it is never represented as ploughing and threshing, and hence may have been regarded as belonging to a 'fancy' class.

A new kind appears in the New Empire. It has horns somewhat wide apart, and bears a big hump.

We have no means of ascertaining any of the ancient methods of breeding (a certain kind of which is prohibited by the law in Lev. 19:10) or of rendering horned cattle tractable. They were the earliest of domesticated animals. They preceded by a long time the domestication of the sheep.

5. Cattle-rearing. The bones of one species, the Bos primigenius or Urus, have been found in the remains of the neolithic Swiss lake-dwellings.

The pastures were probably free to all comers, since in primitive times there was hardly any property in land. A pasture is useless without a watering-place (cp Judg. 1:5, where the importance of the possession of water is clearly shown; see Moore, ad loc.), and property in water is doubtless older and of more importance (cp WRS Rel. Sem. 104 f.). The right to a pasture was obtained by digging a well; and, among the Hebrews as among the Arabians, the wayfarer was always allowed to water his beasts so long as he did not hinder the owners of the water.¹ See SPRINGS. The district upon which cattle pastured is called בִּרְקָה, lit.

'place for feeding.' Cp בִּרְקָה 1 K. 4:23 [3]; בִּרְקָה 'a broad pasture' (Is. 30:23) is doubtful (STR.); בִּרְקָה (EV 'desert,' 'wilderness') denotes properly a pasturing ground where herds are driven, from דָּרַב 'to drive (herds)'; cp BDB Lex. s.v. דָּרַב.²

Other words to denote the pasturing ground are שָׂדֶה, lit. the pastoral abode (gen. rendered 'pasture,' or 'sheep-pen,' once 'stall,' Ezek. 35:5 EV). Similarly שֹׂמְרֵי שָׂדֶה 'sheep-folds' (Jer. 50:6 (17) Prov. 24:15 of an abode of men). To denote more narrowly confined areas, we find מְרִיטָה sheep-folds (1 S. 24:3 Zeph. 2:6, etc.), מְרִיטָה an enclosure (Mi. 2:12), מְרִיטָה (Gen. 33:17) 'booths,' temporary night-shelters (see below).

When required to be specially fattened, cattle were withdrawn from the open pastures and kept in a stable. See Am. 6:4 1 S. 28:24 Jer. 46:21 Mal. 4:2 (3:4); 'stall,' lit. a place for tying up; cp also מְרִיטָה (Hab. 3:17) and מְרִיטָה (Hab. 3:17 Ps. 50:9 78:7) 'fold.'

The pens³ are called מְרִיטָה (Ps. 68:13 [14] RV 'sheep-folds,' AV 'pens'), מְרִיטָה (Judg. 5:16 Gen. 49:14), properly perhaps 'double-pens.' Moore (on Judg. 4:2) and Che. (on Ps. 68:13) prefer the sense 'dung-heaps.'

The manger or epib is אֶמְסָה (Is. 1:3 cp Lk. 27:13 15 φάτνη), whence the denominative אֶמְסָה 'fattened.'

² Similarly, מְרִיטָה, the common-lands of a city (especially a Levitical one), in Nu. 35:2 'suburbs' [EV], is perhaps originally 'place of driving' (BDB); cp RV 'pasture-lands.' Che. doubts the sense of 'driving' and proposes a fresh explanation, making the word practically syn. with מְרִיטָה 'field.' Hence the applied sense 'reserved land'—i.e., belonging to the community or to the sanctuary. See JQR, July 1892, p. 566.
³ מְרִיטָה wall, like the Ar. galliratum, denotes the fold. Here may be added מְרִיטָה, which may originally have meant a 'cattle-yard'; cp BDB, s.v.

⁴ מְרִיטָה (cp BDB, s.v.) 'stall' is used generally for horses, but also for other animals; cp 2 Ch. 32:28.

applied to oxen (Prov. 15:17; and also lards 1 K. 4:23 [5:1]). To eat the 'stalled ox' (which was locked upon as a luxury; cp Prov. 15:17) is termed a reproach by Amos (Am. 6:4)—himself once a herdsmen.

Apart from the ordinary herbage (רֶבֶךְ, Nt. 224 227), cattle had special food (רֶבֶךְ), which was either chopped straw (רֶבֶךְ) or 'mixed fodder' (רֶבֶךְ); cp Job 6:5 made more palatable by the addition of salt, or a salt herb (רֶבֶךְ, Is. 30:24).

From the references in the OT we are able to gain a fairly clear idea as to the duties and customs of those who had charge over cattle.

6. Shepherds, etc.

The usual word to denote such an occupation is רֹעֶה (or רֹעִי, less frequently שֹׂמֵר, and רֹעִי (for the last see Sumer). By the greater number of references deal, as we should naturally expect, with the tending of sheep and goats, and the specific word for a 'cattle-man' (רֹעֶה) occurs only once (Amos 7:14).

The shepherd, clad in a simple garment (Jer. 43:12) like the mod. Ar. burnus, goes forth at the head of his flock (רֹעֶה; cp Jn. 10:4), all of which know his voice and respond to the name he gives them (ib. 10:3). He takes with him his shepherd's bag (רֶבֶךְ, Is. 17:49) or wallet (רֶבֶךְ, ib. 1 V. 8:11), staff (רֶבֶךְ, see esp. Gen. 32:10 [11]; and cp רֶבֶךְ, Ps. 23:4), and, as a means of defence, a sling (רֶבֶךְ, Is. 17:49). He 'gently leads' his flocks (רֹעֶה, Is. 40:1 Ps. 23:2) to the best pastures, where he makes them lie down by streams (Ps. 23:2);² though it must be admitted that the reading in Ps. 23:2 is uncertain (see Che. Ps. 23). The dangers from wild beasts³ (e.g., 1 S. 17:34) and nomadic marauders (Job 1:17) were very real. No doubt there was the solace of the pastoral reed⁴ (see Judg. 5:16, and cp Job 21:12 Is. 16:13), and later writers speak of the sheep-dog (Job 30:1 Is. 56:10 f., see Doct. § 1), well known to the Assyrians. By night the shepherd had to keep watch in the open air (Lk. 28, cp Nah. 3:18); but sometimes a temporary shelter was made (Ass. tarbahu—רֶבֶךְ and mayallu are so explained), whence 'shepherd's tent' (רֶבֶךְ, Is. 38:12; cp קִשְׁתֵּי רֶבֶךְ, Cant. 1:8) becomes the type of an uncertain dwelling-place.⁵ In other cases towers were built for the shepherds (cp Gen. 35:21, and see 2 Ch. 26:10); traces of them are to be found at the present day. The 'duars' in the Sinaitic peninsula consist of stone towers put together without mortar, and bear a striking resemblance to the 'Talayôt' of the Balearic Isles, and to the beehive-shaped houses of Scotland. They are enclosed by low walls of massive rough stones, and are occupied by cattle (cp Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 352 f.; see also Doughty, J. R. Des. 1:13). The sheepfolds also, as their name implies, were surrounded by walls (cp Jn. 10:1).

When the shepherd returned to his master the sheep were carefully counted by being made to pass under the staff (cp Lev. 27:32 Jer. 33:13 Ezek. 20:37)—a representation of the shepherd 'telling his tale' is not infrequent on Egyptian monuments. As for wages, it may be doubted whether the practice described in Gen. 30:28 ff. was usual: possibly the usual reward was the milk of the flocks (see 1 Cor. 9:7—cp, on the other hand, Zech. 11:3, which speaks of a money payment).

³ Similarly in Assyria; cp Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 377 f.

⁴ Cp the illustration from Assyria, Maspero, ib. The shepherd seated plays upon a reed to the delight of his dog.

⁵ At the present day a sheep-pen is made of boughs. It is called hazra (see HAZOR), and the trail of boughs in the sandy desert is always a sign of the nomad manzil (encampment); cp Doughty, J. R. Des. 2:220 f.

CATTLE

The status of the shepherd varies according to the society in which he lives. Among primitive pastoral peoples the sheikh himself, or even his daughters, tend the flocks (cp Gen. 29:9 Ex. 2:16 11:642), as is the case at the present day in various parts of the Sinaitic peninsula (see Kn. 10:1, ad loc.). The early kings of Israel owned large flocks, and the post of chief shepherd (cp Gen. 47:6, also 1 Ch. 27:20 1 Pet. 5:4, ἀρχιποιῶν, and magister pecoris, Lev. 14) was important and full of dignity. Hence the designation 'shepherd' (רֹעֶה) was a noble one and was used of the kings of Israel (Jer. 23:4 cp רֹעֶה 'to rule' 2 S. 5:2) as well as of those of Assyria, and becomes the origin of the beautiful NT phrase 'the good shepherd.' Perhaps it is inevitable that the adoption of a more settled mode of life should be unfavourable to the repute of the shepherd. To the Egyptians, for more than one reason, shepherds were an 'abomination' (Gen. 46:34; cp ABOMINATION, 41; 'Asiatic' (i.e., barbarian) and 'shepherd' were to them synonymous terms (see Egypt, § 31). Similarly in Palestine, as the Jews advanced in prosperity, the prestige of the shepherd's calling diminished. In Rabbinical times a shepherd was precluded from bearing witness, because one who must have fed his flocks upon the pastures of others would naturally be dishonest (cp Sanh. 25:2, Jos. Ant. xvii. 107).

Besides the use to which cattle were put in ploughing and threshing (see AGRICULTURE, § 8), they were also used as draught animals (cp Is. 67:1). Their MILK (רֶבֶךְ) formed one of the main articles of diet, and their skins were used for clothing (see LEATHER, WOOL). Pastoral life probably meant usually a diet of milk and game; and the use of cattle for food was somewhat restricted (see Rel. Sem. 296 f.). The young animal was, however, preferred and considered a special dainty. At the present day, it is said, the sheep is eaten only at festivals, and goat-flesh is not used as food save by the very poor. In sacrifices cattle were frequently used, and huge hecatombs are mentioned in connection with the temple services¹ (cp 1 K. 8:63 2 Ch. 5:6 7:5 29:33 etc.). Cattle, being almost the only property of nomads, become, among primitive people, a medium of exchange. When the first coins were made in Greece, this was commemorated by stamping the head of an ox upon the ingot. Cattle and wealth are, therefore, almost synonymous terms.

Cp רֶבֶךְ 'possession' and Ass. sugullatu 'herd'; רֶבֶךְ 'cattle,' and רֶבֶךְ; רֶבֶךְ and Syr. ܪܥܝܐ: raia orig. an animal for riding (Nestle, 2D.M.G. 33. 707 [791]; pecus and pecunia; κτήνος and κτήμα).

The earliest legislation (Ex. 20-23) was intended for a people who, having advanced beyond the pastoral stage, were occupied chiefly in agriculture. The prominence given to the ox, the sheep, and the ass is as noticeable as the absence of all reference to the horse and the camel. Remarkable also is the humanity which characterises these regulations. Cattle are not to be muzzled (רֶבֶךְ, cp רֶבֶךְ while threshing (Dt. 27:4)—a law which holds good to the present day (cp Dr. ad loc.), and was in vogue in Egypt, where one sees representations of an ox and an ass threshing unmuzzled (cp Erm. Eg. 432, and see AGRICULTURE, § 8). According to another enactment, oxen were not to work upon the sabbath (Ex. 23:12). Notwithstanding the strictness of the sabbath, it was customary to water the cattle on that day (Lk. 13:15). Other laws respecting cattle-stealing and damages caused by oxen are given in Ex. 21:28 ff.; cp ib. 22:10 [9] ff. The law dealing with the case in which a beast entrusted to one's care has been maimed or torn (Ex. 22:10 [9] ff.) provides that the production of the maimed part is to suffice as a guarantee of good faith and that no restitution is to be required (see DEPOSIT). It was, therefore, to the advantage of the shepherd to be able to produce a leg or a piece of an ear as a proof (cp. Am. 3:12). Jacob, however, declares to Laban that instead of producing 'that which was torn of beasts' (עֲרֵב) he has made good the loss himself (Gen. 31:19).

The early Semites, like other pastoral peoples, paid great reverence to cattle, their kinship with whom they long continued to recognise. This gives additional point to Nathan's parable: the ewe lamb was, to a poor man who nourished it, more nearly a daughter¹ than it could be in later times. No doubt the special veneration for cattle was connected with the idea that man owes his food in large measure to them (cp. WRS L.c.).

A full treatment of this subject would lead us too far. Nor can we consider here the Israelitish form of the legend of the 'Golden Age' (cp. Hesiod, Works and Days, 109 ff.), and the contrast between J's description of the peace between man and the lower animals (cp. Is. 11:6 f.) and P's representations of man as their lord and master. The worship of the domestic animals is another subject which invites attention. The most ancient evidence for it is supplied by the Babylonian zodiacal mythology.² In Egypt, too, the worship of sacred animals takes us back to an incalculable antiquity. Witness, for example, the bull-worship of Memphis and other cities (see EGYPT, § 14), which has been connected with Israelitish idolatry. Notice, too, the worship of the cow Hathor, the 'lady of heaven,' which reminds us of the cow-headed Ashtoreth of Sidon. See further CALE, GOLDEN; ASHTORETH; AZAZEL; CLEAN, § 17.³

CAUDA (καυδά [Ti. WH]), Acts 27:16. See CLAUDA.

CAUL (properly a close-fitting cap or net-work), as applied to an article of dress, occurs as the EV rendering of עֵשֶׂתִּים Is. 3:13 (mg. 'networks,' as though = עֵשֶׂתִּים; cf. εὐπλοκία). To complete the parallelism of the verse, we should read, with Schroeder and others, עֵשֶׂתִּים, 'little suns'; see NECKLACE, n.

In its anatomical sense, 'caul' in Hos. 13:8 (עֵשֶׂתִּים קָרְדִּים; σπλῆγος καρδίας) apparently refers to the pericardium. It is used similarly in Ex. 29:13 Lev. 3:10, 15 etc. to render קָרְדִּים 'lit. excess'; cf. σπλῆγος, an uncertain expression which has occasioned difficulty from the earliest times. It denotes probably 'the fatty mass at the opening of the liver which reaches to the kidneys, and becomes visible upon the removal of the "lesser omentum," or membrane extending from the fissures of the liver to the curve of the stomach' (Dr. Lev. SBOT, ET.). On the Vss., and various interpretations, cp. Di. Rys. on Lev. 3:1; and, on the probable reason of the choice of this particular part on the body for offerings, see LIVER.

CAVES (עֲוֵה, m'ar'ih; σπηλαιον; spelunca). The limestone strata of Syria and Palestine readily lend themselves to the formation of caves and ravines. The springs issuing from limestone rock generally contain carbonate of lime, and most of them yield a large quantity of free carbonic acid upon exposure to the air. To the erosive effect of water charged with this acid, combined with the mechanical action of the sand and stones carried along by the currents, the formation of caves and ravines in such rocks is chiefly to be ascribed.

⁴ The old view that yārhereth was the greater lobe of the lung has nothing in its favour.

What are now ravines have in many cases originally been subterranean watercourses, which have been unroofed by the degradation of the rock. Some of the Syrian caverns are of great size; Strabo, for example (756), speaks of the σπηλαία παθιστοῦα of Iunana, and mentions one capable of holding 4000 men. Books of travel, from William of Tyre and Quaresmius onward abound with references to such caves and the local traditions respecting them (Favre, Maundrell, Shaw, Robinson). Those of Palestine are frequently mentioned in the Bible as places of refuge and shelter for the terror-stricken (Is. 2:19 Rev. 6:1; cp. Zech. 14:5), the outlawed (David), the oppressed and the persecuted (Judg. 6:2 Is. 13:6 1 K. 18:13 19:13 Ezek. 33:27 2 Macc. 6:11 Heb. 11:38), and the criminal (Jer. 7:11 Mk. 11:17 and 11:18) and as places of sepulture (Gen. 23:16 Jn. 11:38). Whether the word Horite means 'cave-dwellers' has been questioned; yet that in many parts of Palestine the earlier inhabitants continued to use caves not only as storehouses but also as dwelling-places cannot be doubted. Of their connection with worship in pre-Christian times there is little or no direct evidence. Still, it appears safe to hold that the oldest Phœnician temples were natural or artificial grottoes, and that the sacred as well as the profane monuments of Phœnicia, with their marked preference for monolithic forms, point to the rock-hewn cavern as the original type that dominated the architecture of the region' (WRS R. Sem. 197), and it is probable that the Greek μέγαρον was borrowed from the Phœnician מֵגָרָה (ib. 200). The association of so many of the Christian sacred sites in Palestine (e.g., Birth of Mary, Annunciation, Meeting of Mary and Elizabeth, Birth of the Baptist, Transfiguration and Agony of Christ, Repentance of Peter) with grottoes is the arbitrary invention of legend-mongers. See, further, MASAATH, MEARAH, HEBRON (Machpelah), MAKKEDAH, ETAM, ELEUTHEROPOLIS; also ADULAM (where it is shown that 'cave' ought to be read 'hold'), and (on the grotto of the Nativity) BETHLEHEM, § 4.

CEDAR (עֵדֶן; кедрος [BAL.], Cedrus Libani Loud., bears in Heb. a name which is found also in Aramaic, Arabic, and Ethiopic, and is probably derived from a root signifying 'to be firm' or 'well-rooted,' of which another derivative might be the עֵדֶן² of Job. 27:24. It appears that Aram. 'arad and Ar. 'arz, like кедрос, may denote not only the cedar, but also the juniper (Juniperus Orientalis), and, possibly, pines of various sorts.³ It may be, then, that עֵדֶן is not to be strictly confined to Cedrus Libani,⁴ but it is highly probable that this tree, which has been associated with Lebanon from early times, is the one usually intended, and in such a passage as Is. 41:19 the cedar is expressly distinguished from other conifers. OT writers employ the cedar as a type of beauty (Nu. 24:6), majesty (2 K. 14:9), strength (Ps. 29:5), and loftiness (2 K. 19:24). The wood, which was much more precious than that of common trees like the sycamore (1 K. 10:27), was largely used in the construction of great buildings like the temple (see also ALTAR, § 8) and Solomon's palace; cedar

³ On this see the Index to Schneider's Theophrastus, s.v. кедрос.

⁴ So in modern times we are told of 'el-'Arz—'in the mouth of the uneducated Syrians it designates one of the pines, Pinus halepensis, which grows in great numbers on the mountains' (Journ. Linn. Soc., 18247).

⁶ Hooker, however, regards it as 'an open question whether the C. Libani is one of those which supplied most of the timber employed in building Solomon's temple' (Nat. Hist. Rev., 1875, p. 14), and there seems to be a general consensus of opinion that the wood used for purification (Lev. 14 Num. 19) was the juniper.

leaves were most highly esteemed for covering interiors (Cant. 1.7 Jer. 22.14). The use made of this wood in the ceremony of cleansing the leper (Lev. 14.4 f.) or the person rendered unclean by contact with a dead body (Nu. 19.6), seems to be due to the esteem in which it was held for durability and incorruptibility (see Th. on Lev. 14. Nowack, HAL 289). See CLEAN, § 16 f.

Of the existing cedars of Lebanon the first accurate account was that given by Sir J. D. Hooker in Nat. Hist. Rev., 1862, pp. 11-18. The group which he visited was that in the Kadisha valley, N. of Beirut, near the summit of Lebanon (Dahr el Kaddis). He found there about 400 trees, disposed in nine groups — the trees varying from about 18 inches to upwards of 50 feet in girth.

Another interesting account is that of Dr. Leo Anderlind, who visited them in 1881. He speaks of three groups: one at Baruk, a second 4 m. ESE. of Bshre, and the third 13 m. N. of that place. It is the second of these, the same that Hooker visited, which he particularly describes. The greatest height of any of the trees, he says, is about 82 ft.; but the majority are between 46 and 72 ft. The oldest of them were the strongest trees he had ever seen.

According to Tristram (NHB 344), 'at least nine distinct localities are now ascertained.'

According to Dr. Post (Hastings' DB 2364), it is uncertain what tree is meant by cedron in Nu. 24.6. He remarks that 'the cedar of Lebanon does not grow in moist places, but seeks the dry sloping mountain side, where nothing but the moisture in the clefts of the rocks nourishes it.' He concludes, therefore, that 'unless we suppose that the location of the cedron is poetic licence, we must suppose some water-loving tree to be intended in this passage.' It was well to bring forward this difficulty, which is overlooked by Dr. The remedy lies close at hand. Usage requires that the 'cedars' should be described as the trees which Yahweh planted. We have to read in סֵדְרִים 'like cedars' and in בְּרִיטִים 'like poplars' (Che. L.A.T. 10.401 b [June '99]).

CEILING, in modern house-architecture, means the covering of a room which hides the joists of the floor above, or the rafters of the roof. Down to the seventeenth century, however, the word was applied also to the inner lining of the walls of a room, and in modern shipbuilding it still denotes the inside planking of a ship's bottom (see New Eng. Dict. s.v.). The Hebrew words (see below) rendered 'ceil,' 'ceiling,' in EV are to be taken in this more extended sense. See further, CHAMBER, HOUSE, TEMPLE.

2. In 2 Ch. 3.5 כִּסְיָם עֵץ means 'he covered' (or panelled) [the greater house] 'with fir.'

3. סִפְיָן, siphon, Ezek. 41.16, a word otherwise unknown. Co. proposes to emend עַץ סִפְיָן to עַץ עֵץ; see 2 Ch. 3.5 as above, and cp the עֵץ of Nu. 17.3 f. [18.38 f.]; a 'covering' of the altar.

CELLS (תִּכְיֹתִים), Jer. 37.16. AV. AV 'cabins,' a questionable rendering of a Hebrew word which is probably corrupt. The words 'and into the cells' are quite unnecessary after 'into the dungeon house' (אֶתְּחַבֵּא, 'I will hide'), and may be a gloss. See PRISON.

CELOSYRIA (κοιλὴ κυρία [BAL]), 1 Esd. 2.17, RV CELESYRIA.

CENCHREA, or rather RV, ΚΕΝΧΡΕΑ (ΚΕΝΧΡΕΑ [Ti. WII]). A town and harbour on the Saronic gulf, now marked by the village of Kenchree. It served as the eastern port of Corinth, which lay about seven miles (Str. 380, says 70 stadia) to the west, just as Lechaion was the port for the Italian trade. Strabo calls Cenchrea a village (αἶμα), which indicates its subordination to Corinth: it was, in fact, merely a landing-place for goods and passengers.

About 4 m. to the north, at Schermis (modern Kalamaki), was the διοκοῖα or tanway upon which vessels of small tonnage made the passage from the one sea to the other (το στεινωτήριον τὸν Ἰσθμὸν; Str. 315, 392; cp Thuc. 8.7, Pol. 4.1, Dio Cass. 51.3). The idea of substituting for it a canal cut through the Isthmus was very ancient. The scheme was entertained in turn by Periander, Demetrius Poliorcetes, Julius Caesar, Caligula, Nero, and Herodes Atticus. Nero actually began the work in 67 A.D., but the time of Paul's final visit to Corinth, Vespasian sent him six thousand Jewish prisoners from Galilee (Jos. B. iii. 10.16). Traces of this cutting were to be seen on the line which has been adopted by the modern engineers who have brought this χωρὸν μετὰ ἀγώνισμα to completion (1881-1893).

Half a mile to the SW. of the Saronic entrance to the canal are the remains of the Isthmian sanctuaries and Stadium which furnished Paul with the imagery of 1 Cor. 9.24-27.

The pines from which were cut the victor's garlands are mentioned by Strabo (3.5) and Pausanias (ii. 17). The road to Corinth led through groves of pine and cypress, and was bordered with tombs — among them those of the Cyprii Diogenes and the conitrozan Las (Paus. ii. 2.4). Coins of Antoninus Pius give a representation of the harbour of Cenchrea flanked on either side by a temple, and containing a standing bearded colossus of Poseidon (Paus. ii. 2.3) and three ships. Coins of Hadrian show the two harbours, Lechaion and Cenchrea, as nymphs turned opposite ways, each holding a rudder, marked ΚΕΝΧΡΕΑ and ΛΕΧΑΙΟΝ.

It was from Cenchrea that Paul sailed at the close of his first visit to Achaia (Acts 18.12 cp 20.1). The voyage between Greece and Asia took a fortnight in Cicero's case (Lp. ad. At. 5.13.69); but he sailed slowly (cp Thuc. 3.3). Phoebe, a deaconess of the church at Cenchrea, 'carried under the folds of her robe the whole future of Christian theology' (Roman, Saint Paul, 219), for to her, on the eve of her departure to Italy on her private affairs, Paul entrusted his letter to the church at Rome (Roma 16.1.2). See TRISTRAM, Pausanias, 37 f. Good map of the Isthmus in Baedeker's Greece, E.F. 229.

CENDEBEUS, RV Cendebeus (ΚΕΝΔΕΒΕΙΟΣ [ANV]; but ΚΕΝΔΕΒΕΙΟΣ [A once], ΔΕΒΕΙΟΣ [N*V once], and ΔΑΙΒΕΙΟΣ [N once]), the general left by Antiochus VII. in command of the sea-coast, who 'provoked the people of Jamnia,' and also fortified Kidron for the purpose of invading Judaea. He and his army were put to flight, near Modin, by Judas and John, the two sons of Simon the Maccabee (1 Macc. 15.38-16.16). According to Zockler, he is the condit of the Arabian legends, a N. Ar. prince hostile to the Jews (cp Blau, ZDMG 25.57). Schürer (GI 1 I, § 7, n. 31), however, derives Cendebeus (as also καυδὲβας) from the Lycian town καυδὲβας.

CHAFF (חִבְּ etc.). See AGRICULTURE, §§ 9, 15.

CHAINS is the word used in EV in translating Hebrew terms which signify (1) ornaments and insignia, and (2) means of confinement and punishment. Though chains were no doubt well known to the early Semites, it is chiefly the latter variety that we find depicted upon the monuments; actual remains, moreover, have been found in excavating (Place, Vineta, iii. pl. 70). Chains for confinement consisted of rings around each foot joined together by a single link; the arms were similarly treated (see Botta, Monuments de Ninive, i. pl. 82).

1. Chains were worn as article of adornment upon the foot (חֲבִיטָה, see ANKLETS, BRACELET, 5. arm (חֲבִיטָה, see BRACELET, 4), and neck (חֲבִיטָה, see NECKLACE). For chains such as were worn by Joseph and Daniel, as expressive of rank (חֲבִיטָה, and Bibl. Aram. חֲבִיטָה, see NECKLACE. To denote some kind of architectural ornamentation we find חֲבִיטָה, 1 K. 621 (Kr. 727; Ezek. 723, doubtful), and חֲבִיטָה, 1 K. 717 2 Ch. 316cp 2 Ch. 35), see PILLAR, TEMPLE. Of these Heb. words the former is used in Is. 4019 (חֲבִיטָה, text doubtful) of the chains fastening an idol, the latter denotes the chain worn upon the high-priest's ephod (חֲבִיטָה, Ex. 2822, חֲבִיטָה, 3015; κροσός [BAF], κροσός [L]; also Ex. 2814 κροσός [BAF], see BREASTPLATE, II, EPHOD, OUCHES. For chain-armour see BREASTPLATE, I.

2. As a means of confinement, ropes or cords were perhaps more commonly employed. For chains the general term is חֲבִיטָה Nah. 319, etc., or, with closer reference to the material, חֲבִיטָה 'fetters of iron' (Ps. 1498)—both, in parallelism, in Ps. 10518. Other terms are חֲבִיטָה (COLLAR, 3) and חֲבִיטָה 'brass' (Lam. 37). The use of the latter in the dual (חֲבִיטָה, Judg. 1621 2 S. 234, etc.) does not necessarily imply the binding of both hands and feet by these bronze fetters. The Greek words are δεσμός (Jul. 6), σφαίρα (2 Pet. 24), πέδη and αλυσίς (in parallelism, Mk. 54 Lk. 829); the last-mentioned term is used in Acts 126, where the Roman custom of chaining a prisoner to two wailers is exemplified. See PRISON.

CHALCEDONY. What the ancients understood by

² The RV 'chains' for חֲבִיטָה 2 Ch. 3311 is too bold. See MANASSEH.

CHALDEA, CHALDEAN

the word is uncertain. 1. It is met with only once in the Bible (Rev. 2119; ΧΑΛΚΕΔΩΝ [Ti.], ΧΑΛΚΕΔΩΝ [WH]; others, ΚΑΡΧΗΔΩΝ; carphadonia). In modern mineralogy chalcedony is a variety of amorphous quartz 'semi-transparent or translucent; white, gray, blue, green, yellow, or brown; stalactitic, reniform, or botryoidal, and in pseudomorphs or petrifications' (Encyc. Brit. 16380). The word chalcedony is usually applied to the white or gray variety, the brown chalcedony being known as the sard (SARDIUS), the red as the carnelian (see SARDIUS). The chalcedony also occurs in striated forms; when white layers alternate with black it is called onyx (see ONYX). When the white alternate with others of red or brown colour it is called sardonxy (see SARDONYX). Pliny, who lived not far from the time when the Apocalypse took shape, does not speak of the chalcedony as a distinct stone, but only of 'Calchedonum [or 'carched'] smaraghi' as an inferior kind of emerald, mentioning that the mountain in Chalcedon where these stones were gathered was in his day known by the name of 'Smaragdites' (HN 37273). Symmachus, on the other hand (circa 200 A.D.), gives καρχηδόνιον for חֲבִיטָה in Is. 5112 (AV 'agates,' RV 'rubies'). This rendering suggests an original חֲבִיטָה (cp the reading καρχος [B], καρχος [A] for חֲבִיטָה in Ezek. 2719 (AV 'agate,' mg. 'chrysoprase,' RV 'rubies'). See PRECIOUS STONES, RUBIES.

2. Chalcedony (carphadonia) is the usual Fesh. rendering of חֲבִיטָה (āḥārṭān, achates, 'agate' of Ex. 2811 3912). Notwithstanding the reference in Ezek. 2722 to the precious stones imported from Sheba² we can hardly connect the stone חֲבִיטָה with the country called Sheba. As Friedl. Del. points out (Heb. Lang. 36) it is the Ass. ṭabu—i.e., the shining or precious stone ṭabnu nishṭar (akru), κατ'ἔξοχον. This stone occurs among others in a list of stones encased in gold for the royal breastplate. On Delitzsch's suggested identification with the diamond (Prot. 84 ff.)³ or the topaz (Heb. Lang. 36) cp what is said under PRECIOUS STONES, DIAMOND, TOPAZ. Tradition is in favour of the rendering 'agate'. Agate, so named, according to Theophrastus, from the river Achates, in Sicily, is one of the numerous modifications of form under which silica presents itself, almost in a state of purity, forming 68 per cent of the entire mineral. The silica particles are not so arranged as to produce the transparency of rock-crystal, but a semi-pellucid, sometimes almost opaque substance, with a resinous or waxy fracture; and the various shades of colour arise from minute quantities of iron. The same stone sometimes contains parts of different degrees of transparency, and of various shades of colour; and the endless combination of which, together with the high polish they are capable of receiving, agates acquire their value as precious stones. Agates are usually found in detached rounded nodules in that variety of trap rock called amygdaloid or mandelstein, and occasionally in other rocks. The varieties of the agate are numerous, and are now, as in the time of Pliny, arranged according to the colour of their ground.

3. It is not apparent why RV^{ms} should suggest 'chalcedony' for חֲבִיטָה in Ex. 2820 (EV 'beryl'). See TARSHISH, STONE OF.

Yakin; its usual name in the Assyrian inscriptions was not Tadmūt, the Sea-land. H. Delitzsch (Jour. 128, etc.) is correct in his derivation of the name from the Kassite people, the wider application to Babylonia may have been a legacy from the Kassite dynasty there. On the other hand, the Kassites (Del. calls them Kassari) had a language quite distinct from that of the Kaldū, who spoke Semitic. The Kaldū are carefully distinguished by Sennacherib both from the Arabs and from the Arameans. Merodach-baladan, the usurper in Babylon during Sargon's reign, and the inveterate foe of Assyria till Sennacherib hunted him from Babylon to Bit-Yakin and thence to exile, was a Kaldū. There is no reason to think he had any right in Babylon; on the other hand, nothing shows him to have been more foreign than were the Assyrians. In fact, the Chaldeans not only furnished an early dynasty of Babylon, but also were incessantly pressing into Babylonia; and, despite their repeated defeats by Assyria, they gradually gained the upper hand there. The founder of the New-Babylonian kingdom, Nabopolassar (circa 626 B.C.), was a Chaldean, and from that time Chaldean meant Babylonia.

The use of the term Chaldee, introduced by Jerome to distinguish the language of certain chapters in

2. 'Chaldee,' Daniel and Ezra (עֲרֵם כְּתָבִים; Dan. 14), etc. is incorrect. The only correct expression is Aramæe (see CHALDEA, § 2; DANIEL, § 12; ARAM, § 2; ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, § 1 ff.). Another peculiar usage must be mentioned. We find 'Chaldeans' used in Dan. as a name for a caste of wise men. As Chaldean meant Babylonian in the wider sense of a member of the dominant race in the times of the New Babylonian Empire, so after the Persian conquest it seems to have denoted the Babylonian literati and become a synonym of soothsayer or astrologer (see DANIEL, § 11). In this sense it passed into classical writers. Whether any association of sound with kallā, the specific name for magician in Assyrian, helped the change of meaning is difficult to decide. The modern so-called Chaldees have no racial claim to the name, and it is very questionable whether the traces of alleged Chaldean culture discovered at Tellou are correctly assigned to this people.

CHALPHI (חַלְפִּי [V.A.]), 1 Macc. 11:70 RV, AV CALPHI.

CHAMBER. Of the structure of the chamber of the ancient Hebrew house we know but little; it would naturally depend upon the style of the rest of the building. In modern Syria, floor, wall, and ceiling are commonly made of beaten clay (cp חֲפִי Ezek. 13:12), which is often coloured with ochre. Wood, nevertheless, is not rare. The ceiling, if of wood and flat, is of curious and complicated joinery; or, if vaulted, is wrought into many coves and enriched with fretwork in stucco; the walls (חֲפִי) are adorned with arabesques, mosaics, and the like, which, set off by the whiteness of the stucco, present a brilliant effect. Enamelled inscriptions, specimens of the most intricate Arabic calligraphy, originally intended to keep off harmful *jinn*s, surround the walls. On the number and arrangement of chambers, see HOUSE, 1.

Of the various Heb. words for 'chamber' חֲפִי and חֲפִיָּה (cp hypocor) are used of rooms in private houses; see B.D., § 1. חֲפִיָּה is used particularly of the nuptial chamber; see TENT, § 4. Other terms are used especially of rooms in a temple or palace. חֲפִיָּה (1 Ch. 9:26 Jer. 35:24, etc.) or חֲפִיָּה (Neb. 3:30 12:44 13:7), a room in the temple occupied by priests and temple-servants; also a room in the royal palace, Jer. 36:12 20; and (once) a meal-chamber in a Bamah (1 S. 9:22 AV 'parlour'); see HUB.

1 Or, 'feasting hall.' For another probable instance see 2 K. 10:22 emended text (see VESTRY). WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 253 n. suggests that ḥofḥ, club-room, is derived from ḥ; but see Lewy, Die semit. Fremdw. im Griech., 94.

CHAPTER

PLACE, § 3. חֲפִי (1 K. 6:7 Ezek. 41:5 ff.) and חֲפִיָּה (1 K. 14:24 2 Ch. 12:11 Ezek. 10:7 ff.) are similarly used of temple-chambers. In the case of two words the suggested rendering, 'chamber', is certainly incorrect; חֲפִיָּה (1 K. 6:7 AV) means properly a 'story,' as in RV (see TEMPLE), and חֲפִיָּה (Ezek. 10:24 11:34 RV) 'vaulted-chamber', in parallelism with חֲפִיָּה, refers evidently to some mound for illite worship (EV better 'eminent place').

CHAMBERLAIN. In Esth. 1:10 12 etc., EV uses 'chamberlain' (for חֲפִיָּה, perhaps as a more English-sounding title than ΕΥΝΟΥΧ [7.7]). On Jer. 51:59 (AV) 'chamberlain' see SERAIAH [1].

Βαστα, in Acts 12:25, is a court officer in charge of the king's bed-chamber (ὁ ἐπὶ τοῦ κοιτῶνος τοῦ βασιλέως); but in Rom. 16:23 οἰκονόμος (AV 'chamberlain') is used in a wide sense (RV 'treasurer'); cp Lat. ararius, and a gloss of Philox., ὁ ἐπὶ τῆς δημοσίας γραμματεῖς. The same title occurs in inscriptions (cp Marini, Chron., 85, ed. 1742; Νεώτερον οἰκονόμος 'Atticus'; see W. A. Wright in Smalley's Diogenes, etc.).

CHAMBERS OF THE SOUTH (חֲפִיָּה דְּיָמִין), Job 9:9, and probably 37:9 (emended text). See STARS, § 3 c. EARTH, FOUR QUARTERS OF, § 2 (17).

CHAMELEON. 1. RV LAND-CROCODILE (כַּמְלֵאֵוֹן, etc., uncertain), one of the reptiles mentioned as unclean in Lev. 11:16. Καμαίλειον [F.L.], καμη, [B.V.] and Vg. (chamaelon) have the same rendering as AV; the Arabic version has hardawān, which means probably a species of land-crocodile. Bochart (Hieroz. 4) argues from the Hebrew name, which is the same as the word for 'strength', that what is meant is the Arabic asral, the largest and most powerful sort of lizard. The Talmudic references, on the other hand, seem to point to a smaller animal; but they are too general to convey any definite information (Lewysohn, Zoologie des Talmuds, 223 f.).

2. AV MOLL. (כַּמְלֵאֵוֹן) in the same verse. See LIZARD, 6.

CHAMOIS (כַּמִּי), derivation uncertain, cp Levy; καμηλοπαρδαλις [B.A.F.L.], Dt. 11:31, a clean animal, mentioned along with the fallow-deer (שָׁפָר), the roebuck (צִבְּרִי and צִבְרִי), the wild goat (קָדָשׁ), the addax (אֲדָקָה), and the antelope (אֲנָקָה); see CLEAN, § 8. Many ancient interpreters (G. Vg., Arab., Abulw., Kimhi, etc.) thought that what was meant was the giraffe; but the home of the giraffe lies far away from Palestine. A more probable rendering is the gazelle or 'wild goat' of the Targums, which suits the context better. The chamois (Rupicapra tragus) extends from the Pyrenees to the Caucasus, but is not known to have ever inhabited Palestine, whereas of mountain sheep and goats there have been found three kinds. Tristram and Post think that zemer may be the wild sheep (Ovis montanus); but, though that sheep lives in Northern Africa, and an allied or identical species occurs in Arabia, it is doubtful whether it has lived in Palestine. Fig. 2.—Ancient Egyptian conveyance (4th dyn.) After Wilkinson.

It should be remembered that in the East camels, asses, and mules are more convenient and general as a means of transport, both for burdens and for human beings, than are wheeled vehicles; and this was specially true of ancient times.

3. War-chariots: introduced late.

The subject of the present article, however, is mainly the striking fact that the ancient Hebrews for centuries refused to employ so valuable a military aid as the chariot, in their encounters with the Canaanites was due to several co-operating causes.

First among these was the nomadic origin and character of early Israel. The Canaanites, like the Egyptians, may have borrowed the form of their chariots from their northern neighbours, the Syrians or Hittites. This, however, is by no means certain, for among the Amarna Tablets, we have a despatch to the Egyptian monarch from one of his vassals in Canaan, in which the latter, in anticipation of an invasion by the Hittites, requests the aid of chariots and troops from the king of Egypt.¹ Not improbably, therefore, Egypt may have been the proximate source whence Canaanite civilisation borrowed the chariot. From Josh. 17:16 Judg. 4:1, however, we learn that the Canaanite war-chariot was plated or studded externally with iron, a feature which seems to be more probably Hittite than Egyptian.²

4. Hill country unsuitable.

A second reason why Israel remained destitute of this important adjunct is to be found in the physical configuration of Canaan. During the earlier period of the Hebrew occupation, the district seized by the sons of Jacob was the central or mountainous region, where chariots and cavalry could not easily operate. Interesting illustrations of this difficulty in employing chariots may be derived from the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser I. (circa 1100 B.C.). In Prism Inscr. col. ii. 70-74 we read: 'mighty mountains and difficult country I passed through—so far as it could be traversed, in my chariot; and that which could not be traversed, on foot. By the mountain Arimat, unsuited for the advance of my chariots, I left my chariots behind . . . (Winckler in AB 1; cp. also col. iii. 47-49). How difficult the Canaanites found it to make effective use of them against the Israelites, may be inferred from the later experience of the Syrians, who attributed their constant defeats to the fact that the deities of the Hebrews were potent in the mountainous country (1 K. 20:23) whilst their own operations, which were largely carried on with cavalry and chariots (cp. 7:21 and Shalmaneser II.'s Obelisk Inscr. 65; Monolith Inscr. col. ii. 90), would be successful only in the plains. It can readily be understood, therefore, how the Hebrew race, by clinging to the central mountainous region and not venturing too far into the Shephelah or low country, as well as by dint of sheer bravery and the skilful use of bow, sling, and spear, were able, down to the time of David, to defy successfully the armies of Canaan and Syria.

5. Religious conservatism.

A third reason was that religion—in its tendency, ever conservative of a nation's past—sanctioned the ancient custom of warfare, and regarded horses and chariots as a foreign innovation corrupting Israel's allegiance to Yahvé. This view, constantly reflected in prophecy (Hos. 17:14 [1 Mic. 5:6] Zech. 9:10), became embedded in the Deuteronomistic legislation (Dt. 17:16), and expressed in song (Ps. 20:7). When, however, under David, Israel became an aggressive state and entered into conflict with Syrian and Hittite cavalry and chariots in the plains, the stress must have been severely felt by the Hebrews, and it is not surprising that chariots and horsemen were gradually introduced into Israel's military service. This is clear from 2 S. 8:4, where, following Q, we should restore as ('for himself'); omitted in MT from religious scruples; the passage means that David reserved 100 chariots and horsemen for his own use. His successor, Solomon, is said to have purchased Israel with 1400 war chariots, which were quartered in special cities (1 K. 9:19, 26; see BEUTHAMER 1901). In his reign the purchase of horses and chariots became an organised trade; they were imported (though Winckler denies this; see MIZRAHI, § 2 [17]) from Egypt, at the cost of 600 shekels, or about £80 for each chariot¹ (17:23 f.). From this time onwards we constantly read of chariots and horsemen both in the northern and in the southern kingdom (1 K. 16:22-4 2 K. 8:2 13:7 Is. 27 Mic. 5:9 [Heb.]). In col. ii. 91 of Shalmaneser II.'s great monolith inscription we are startled to find that Ahab's contingent of chariots, 2000 in number, largely exceeded that of any other state in the confederacy that encountered the Assyrian army at Karkar in 854 B.C. (cp. ATAB, § 7). From Is. 30:16 31:1 36:9 we may infer (with Kamphausen) that the supply of chariots and horses from Egypt was one of the grounds of alliance between that power and Judah.

Since Egypt was the land from which the Hebrews obtained their supply of this arm, we turn to its monuments for illustrative material; and this we obtain in abundance from the eighteenth dynasty onwards (vol. vi. in Lepsius' Denkmäler).

6. Egyptian chariots.

Before the eighteenth dynasty (1800 B.C.) chariots and horses were unknown in Egypt, and there is good evidence to show that they were borrowed from the North Palestinian race called Rutennu.² The Egyptian chariot usually contained two persons. Nowack (HA 1:367), however, is wrong in his assertion that this was invariably the case. In Lepsius' Denkmäler (Abth. iii. Bl. 157 f.) we have numerous illustrations of chariots with three figures. According to Sir Gardner Wilkinson, however, this was not common, except in triumphal processions, 'when two of the princes or noble youths accompanied the king in their chariot, bearing the royal sceptre, or the tabella, and required a third person to manage the reins.' On the other hand Hittite chariots frequently contained three occupants (see below, § 6). Lepsius (Denkmäler, Abth. iii. Bl. 160) exhibits figures of Egyptian chariots in which the right-hand warrior bears the bow while the left carries the shield. Here, as in many other cases, we find the reins tied round the body of one of the combatants while he is engaged in action. On another page (Bl. 165) we have a chariot with the solitary royal occupant, Rameses II, drawing the bow, while the reins of his two horses are tied around his middle. Indeed, one of the most striking features in these vivid scenes of combat, is the multiplicity of functions discharged by the chariot rider.

¹ In 1 K. 10:28 (2 Ch. 1:16) the text is very uncertain in the latter part of the verse. In MT of 1 K. 10:28 we read וַיִּקְרָא הַמֶּלֶךְ לְבָנָיו וְלָאֲשֵׁרָתָיו וְלָאֲשֵׁרָתָיו וְלָאֲשֵׁרָתָיו. It seems simplest with Kamph. (in Kan. ZS) to cancel the first וְלָאֲשֵׁרָתָיו and to render the whole verse 'And the export of the horses of Solomon was from Egypt, and the royal merchants used to fetch a troop for payment.' This is certainly preferable to the other suggestion, to which Kl. in his note on 2 Ch. 1:16 (SZOT) refers—viz., to make a transposition and read . . . וְלָאֲשֵׁרָתָיו וְלָאֲשֵׁרָתָיו וְלָאֲשֵׁרָתָיו 'the king's traders getting every time a troop . . .'. This use of the distributive construction is very forced. Kl. himself finds a reference in וְלָאֲשֵׁרָתָיו to Kue—i.e., E. Cilicia. See the note referred to and cp. MIZRAHI, § 2 (a).

The accompanying figure (fig. 3) exhibits an archer in the act of drawing his bow with the right hand. A whip consisting of a stick handle with leather thong attached, is suspended from his wrist, while round his waist are fastened the horses' reins.

It is obvious from the representations which portray the manufacture of different portions of the Egyptian chariot, that it was almost entirely constructed of wood. It was light and open from behind, so that it could be easily mounted, and consisted of 'a wooden framework, sometimes strengthened and ornamented with metal and leather binding. The flat bottom was formed of a kind of network, consisting of interlaced thongs or rope, which gave it elasticity and mitigated the jolting' (Wilkinson).

The occupants of a chariot nearly always stood. In rare instances the car was provided with a seat in which the royal personage sat. The furniture consisted of a bow-case, which was placed in a slanting position pointing forwards, and was often ornamented with the figure of a lion. There were also receptacles for arrows and spears, which, as a general rule, slanted backwards (see fig. 4).

The diameter of the wheel was a little over three feet. The felloes were in six pieces and the tire was fastened to it by bands of hide passing through long narrow holes. The yoke fitting upon a small saddle, was inserted into a groove of metal, and the saddle, placed upon the horse's withers, and furnished with girths and a breastband, was surmounted by an ornamental knob; and in front of it a small hook secured the bearing rein. The other reins passed through a thong or ring at the side of the saddle, and thence over the projecting extremity of the yoke, and the same thong secured the girths. Further details may be found in Sir Gardner Wilkinson's exhaustive work, from which the above description has been borrowed.

The chariots of the Assyrians were of stouter and more solid construction than those of the Egyptians, since the former were intended to sustain the wear and tear of rough and rugged paths in distant campaigns. Thus we often find that the tires and felloes of the wheels amounted together to as much as eight or ten inches in thickness. In the early part of the ninth century B.C. we find chariots of this description employed by Asur-nāsir-pāl. Upon the obelisk of this monarch we find the archer standing on the right hand and the driver on the left, and these are their respective positions in nearly all the examples depicted on the Assyrian monuments. We observe, moreover, in all the portrayals belonging to the ninth century and the early part of the eighth, that the two receptacles for arrows are placed on the right side, and are disposed crosswise over one another, and in a slanting position as in the Egyptian examples. We notice, in one case depicted in Asur-nāsir-pāl's obelisk, an attendant on foot bearing a shield and holding the reins. This meets us again on one of the monuments of Tiglath-pileser III.

Vivid representations of the chariots of this period may be found in the reliefs of the Nimrud gallery in the British Museum. One excellent example reproduced in the accompanying figure (fig. 5), is borrowed from a hunting-scene in which the monarch Asur-nāsir-pāl is engaged. Note that we have here, as in many other instances of this period, three horses—a contrast with Egyptian usage, in which the number never exceeded two. The pole of the chariot is fixed to the base of the body, to the upper part of which is fastened, on the left, a large heavy shaft attached to rings upon the shoulder-pieces of the central as well as the outer horse on the left side. The rein on the right hand steed passes through a ring on his shoulder, and is attached to the bit. The use of bits with ancient Egyptians, as well as Assyrian, war-horses can admit of no doubt. As in other examples, the two receptacles for arrows cross each other slantwise on the right side of the chariot—for that was obviously the side on which the archer most conveniently stood, thus preserving his right hand and side unencumbered by his companion in the use of the bow. A battle-axe stands among the arrows in one receptacle, whilst an extra bow is inserted among those in the other. We notice in this example, as in all others portrayed on the monuments of this period, that the axle of the wheel, as in the Egyptian chariot, is placed under the hindmost extremity of the body of the vehicle, in order to ensure more steadiness; consequently part of the weight of the chariot and its occupants rested on the horses. In another specimen on the reliefs of this period we again observe three steeds harnessed to the chariot, while in this case the driver holds a whip. Near the front of the chariot, between the two occupants, rises a pole surmounted by a symbolic device, from which hang ornamented tassels. In other examples a spear may be seen in the receptacle that slopes backwards. Often the horses are richly ornamented with crests, sometimes with a necklace or collar. Leather straps pass beneath and in front of the animal. We find tassels hanging down apparently from a metal boss on its side. Otherwise the animal is unprotected.

Among the reliefs of Tiglath-pileser III, we observe a state-chariot with two horses and three occupants. There is no archer. The king stands on the right and the driver on the left. The driver has three reins in each hand, a whip in his right. In front stands an attendant holding the reins. The monarch is shaded by an umbrella. We notice two new points. The receptacle for arrows stands upright. Also the wheels are now much enlarged, being about 4½ feet in diameter, with tire and felloes of considerable thickness. Mr. T. G. Pinches is disposed to think that the inner rim of the wheel was of metal, and appearances would seem to justify this conclusion. It is possible, however, that we have here plating, not solid metal.

² Not improbably this contained amulets or charms, like the crescents on the camels' necks in Judg. s. 21. See Whitehouse, Primer of Hebrew Antiquities, 50f. and footnote.

The state chariot of Sennacherib, which we here reproduce (fig. 6), exhibits wheels at least 4½ feet in diameter, with eight spokes. We notice the thickness of the tire and felloes, and the metal studs or nails on the outer circumference. A large umbrella is fixed in the chariot. Here the driver is on the right hand, the king on the left. We also observe no receptacle for arrows, bow, or battle-axe; from the close of the eighth century onwards the archers become dissociated from the chariots; in the time of Ashur-bani-pal they usually constitute a separate corps.¹

Of the Hittite chariot we obtain the clearest conception from Egyptian portrayals, and a special interest belongs to it because it is probably to be regarded as the prototype from which the Egyptian was derived, and the Israelite vehicle was ultimately, if not proximately, borrowed.

9. Hittite chariots. In one case, however (as), we have a single-horse chariot carrying two archers with quivers on their backs. Moreover, the large upper shaft to which reference has been made disappears altogether from the time of Sennacherib onwards. Not more than two horses are harnessed to the chariot. Also it becomes simpler in form, while the wheels become larger. In the representation of Ashur-bani-pal's war against Elam (Nimrud gallery 48, 49) we observe that the wheels have as many as twelve spokes. In some cases there is only a single occupant. In others there are several occupants, and an umbrella is fixed in the chariot when it conveys a royal personage or some nobleman of distinction.

CHARIOT

In one respect it differed from the Egyptian, viz. in carrying three, not, as a rule, two occupants. It is important as it seems to throw light upon Hebrew usage, to which we shall presently refer. The ordinary weapons of the chariot fighter were bow and arrows. In the annexed figure (fig. 7) it will be observed that the two-horsed chariot has among its three riders a shield-bearer, who apparently occupies the central position. The driver on the left holds only a single rein in each hand, though he is driving two steeds, which are held together by a strong collar and halbrights. Simplicity and strength combined with lightness are the chief characteristics of the Hittite chariot.

Among the ancient Hebrews, as among the Assyrians, Egyptians, Hittites, and Greeks, the horses were always arrayed side by side, never one behind another. Moreover, with the Assyrians and the Egyptians the chariot usually held two persons. This was the case perhaps occasionally in Israel, but various considerations lead to the inference that the chariots as a rule held three, as among the Hittites, the occupants being the driver, the bowman, and the shield-bearer. In the case of Jehu, he himself handles the bow, 2 K. 9. 24. It is therefore as something peculiar and exceptional that we find Jehu recalling to Baasha that they were riding in pairs behind Abiah, as his body-guard, when the latter was confronted by Elijah near Naboth's vineyard (2 K. 9. 25). This Hebrew Hittite usage may explain the word shālîḥ (שָׁלִיחַ), see ARMY, § 4, which, in its origin, signified one of the three occupants of the royal chariots that accompanied the king to battle. The word is used during the regal period in the sense of a distinguished attendant of the king who accompanied him in his chariot. This is evident from 2 K. 9. 25 where Baasha holds this position in relation to Jehu. It is significant that in 1 K. 9. 22 the shālîḥ (שָׁלִיחַ) are placed in close connection with captains of chariots (צָבָא), and formed a special corps, commanded by a special officer, 'chief of the chariots' (רֹאשׁ הַצָּבָא).

1 Ch. 11. 11 [2 S. 23. 8]. Compare also the position of shālîḥ in 1 K. 11. 17. 15. That the shālîḥ held a position is clearly shown in 2 K. 7. 27, where he is described as one of those on whose hand the king leans. (Probably the term is used here as equivalent to שָׁרֵי הַצָּבָא.)

In addition to the shālîḥ the king was frequently accompanied by 'runners' (רָצָא), who were prepared to render assistance when the king dismounted from the chariot, or to hold the reins (as in the reliefs of the Assyrian kings to which we have already referred), or to discharge any other duty in the king's service, 2 S. 15. 1 K. 15. 2 K. 10. 11 (see ARMY, § 4). In the time of David there was a special body of fifty men detailed for this special function.

We know that the Persian kings took with them on their expeditions ἀρμαμαχας—four-wheeled carriages covered with curtains, specially employed for the conveyance of women and children, as may be inferred from Herod 7. 41.

11. Persian chariots. Xenoph. Cyrop. vi. 4. 11. Probably these closely resembled, or were identical with, the ἀρμαματα ἐνὸς ὄρου adapted for sitting or lying down. According to 2 Ch. 35. 23 J. Josiah, when mortally wounded, was removed from his war-chariot into a reserve chariot (שָׂרֵי הַצָּבָא) which was probably regarded by the Chronicler as partaking of this character.

In later times chariots were provided with scythies (ἀρματα δρεπανηφόρα, Xenoph. Anab. i. 7. 6 Diod. Sic. 17. 51). This device does not meet us among the ancient Egyptians and Assyrians;² but we know that scythed-bearing chariots were employed by the Persians and later still by the Syrians (2 Macc. 132). It was probably the Persians who introduced this formidable addition to the war-chariot: (Cp Xenophon, Cyrop. vi. 130.)

² CHAL. makes צָבָא the object of the participle.
³ Against the view that scythies are referred to in Nah. 2. 11: 2. 11: 2.

The different portions of the chariot receive special names in the Heb. of the OT. 'Wheels,' עֲרֹכָה, are mentioned in Nah.

12. Parts of chariot. 3:2 (cp Is. 28:27 Prov. 20:26). Another name, more descriptive, was 'rollers,' עֲרֹמְרוֹמִים (Is. 6:28 Ezek. 10:26 23:24 26:10). The 'spokes' of the wheel were called הַשִּׁיטִים, while the 'felloes' had the name גְּזֵיִם or גְּזִיתִים. The wheel revolves by a nave (הַשִּׁיטָה), round an axle (רֶדֶף). See WHEEL. All these terms are to be found in the locus classicus, 1 K. 7:12f.

The pole of the chariot, Sp, was attached to Mish, Kelin 14a 24 b) fastened below the middle of the axle, passed under the base of the 'body' of the chariot, and then, curving upwards, ascended to the neck of the horses. To this, draught-animals were fastened by means of the yoke, assisted by cords or wide leather straps. Beyond these broad features it is doubtful how far we are justified in following the details contained in a treatise of the Mishna composed centuries after the latest OT literature.

That the chariot, which was so closely associated with the public functions of Oriental monarchs, both in war and in peace, entered into the religious conceptions as an indispensable portion of the paraphernalia of divinement, is 13. Religious conceptions.

13. Religious conceptions. and in peace, entered into the religious conceptions as an indispensable portion of the paraphernalia of divine monarchy, cannot awaken surprise. The chariot, therefore, has its place in ancient Semitic religion. Just as the Hellenic religions imagination endowed Helios with horses and chariot (as the Homeric Hymn clearly testifies), so Canaanite religion endowed the Sun-god Šemeš with the same royal accessories (cp HORSE, § 4). This feature in the cultus of the Sun the Hebrews blended with the worship of Yahwē in the precincts of the sanctuary at Jerusalem, in the days that preceded the Reformation of Josiah (2 K. 23 11). The combination of Yahwe, the God of Israel's armies and of the sky, with the Sun was not unnatural to the Hebrew mind, as their literature testifies both early and late. Cp 1 K. 8 12 f. (an old fragment of the Book of Jashar restored by We. from ^{6A} in 1 K. 8 50; Ps. 19 1 7 8 11 [12] f. Yahwē, as Lord of hosts, has chariots among his retinue. These were the 'chariots and horses of deliverance' whereon Yahwē rode forth to conquer and deliver Israel's foes in the days of the Exodus (Hab. 3 8 f.). With this graphic totem in the Prayer of Habakkuk we may compare the fiery chariots of 2 K. 2 11 6 17 13 11² as well as a phrase occurring in the magnificent triumphal ode, Ps. 68 18. O. C. W.

In the thirteenth year, however, they rebelled, and in the fourteenth year they were defeated by the Elamite and his allies. In the sequel of the story (77, 12-24) we are told how Abram with his own servants and some allies pursued the victorious army and rescued not only the captured kings but also his nephew Lot (see ABRAHAM, § 2). The question whether this narrative is trustworthy, and whether the Chedor-Neisser of the story and his allies are historical personages, is ruled by the other, as to the date of the chapter containing it.

2. Its date.

2. Its date. That the chapter is quite an isolated piece, and formed no part of the writings from which the Hexateuch was composed, may be considered as certain. Some scholars, however, (e.g. Kittel) assign it to the eighth century B.C., and are of opinion that the author had an older writing before him; according to others, it is not older than the fourth century B.C.² The former hold that the antiquity and the authenticity of the story are attested by the following facts:—(1) that at least the name of the chief king is purely Elamite; (2) that the Rephaim, the Zuzimmim (= Zuzim), and the Enaim really occupied in ancient times what afterwards became the dwelling places of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites, whilst the Horites (Gen. 36.20), according to Dt. 2.10, 7. and 20. ff., were the oldest inhabitants of Seir; (3) that AMORITES (7.11), the name of the people established, according to 7. 7, in Hazazon-tamar (= Engedi, 2 Ch. 20.2), is the ancient name of the people of Canaan (Gen. 15.16 48.2 Am. 2.9), and that several names (En-mishpat, Holiab, Shavech), words, and expressions not occurring anywhere else, as well as the exact description of the campaign (7. 5-7), bear the impress of antiquity and trustworthiness.

The arguments of those who ascribe the narrative to a post-exilic Jew, whose aim was to encourage his contemporaries by the description of Abram's valour over the great powers of the East, his unselfishness, piety, and proud magnanimity towards heathen men, mostly take their starting point in the second part of the chapter.

It is pointed out that the names of Abram's allies, Mamre and Ischcol, occur elsewhere (Gen. 13:18, 23:17 to 24:33, 25:14, 26:14, 28:12) as place names; that Melchizedek (Melchisedech) and Abram are represented as monotheists; and that the patriarch pays tithes to the priest-king, a duty not prescribed at all in Dt. 18:1-2, 26:12 ff., but characteristic of the post-exilic sacerdotal law (Nu. 18:21-24).

The criticism extends also, however, to the first part.

with which we are here chiefly concerned. It is remarked that there is no evidence of the historicity of the campaign in question, which is, in fact, as closely as possible connected with a view of Abraham which we know to have been post-exilic (cf. ELLIOT, 1). Moreover, it is difficult to resist the impression that the names of the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, viz., Bera' and Birsha' (compounds conveying the idea of 'evil,' 'badness')—and the name given in the narrative to the town of Zoar—viz., Bela' = 'perdition' (see BELA)—perhaps also that of the king of Zebulun, which the Samaritan text gives as Sheu-elad = 'slave-name'—are, some of them at least, purely symbolical and therefore fictitious. (See, however, in each case, the special article.)

What is certain is this: Chedor-lamer, = Kudur-lagamar, is a purely Elamite name, which is not, indeed, found as a royal name on the monuments, but is of the same type as

3. Name Chedor-lamer.

Kudur-nahhundi (Kutir-nahhunte in Old Sasanian), the name of a king who in the beginning of the twenty-third century B.C. conquered the whole; and Kudur-mabuk, the name of another king, who, probably later, was master of a part of Babylonia. Lagamar(u) (Lakamar) occurs as the name of an Elamite deity, not only in 5 R (p. vi, coll. 6, 33), but also in the inscriptions of Anzan-Sinim, and seems to be the same as Lagamal, the queen of the town of Kisurru (2 R p. ix, 15a = 14b). Hence the name cannot be the invention of a Hebrew writer. It can hardly be doubted, either, that Arioch, king of Elasar, is really no other than Eri-aku (i.e., servant of the Moon-god), the well-known king of Larsa, son of Kudur-mabuk.²

These discoveries have opened a wide field for ingenious combinations. It has been observed that Kudur-mabuk is called in one of the inscriptions of his son by the name Adda-marti, 'Father of the West.' Now, the word Martu being commonly used, at least in later times, to designate Western Asia, especially Canaan (mat Martu), or perhaps better mat Amurru, the land of the Amorites, Adda = Father has been interpreted to mean conqueror, and this has been taken as evidence that, in a very remote period, Canaan fell under Elamite dominion. It is a pity that we must call attention to a weak point in this theorising. Kudur-mabuk is not the same as Kudur-lagamar, and Adda-marti seems to be only a synonym of Adda-yammalaka, a title which the same king, as ruler of a western province of Elam, bears in other inscriptions (see Tiele, B. II, 123 f.).

The attempts to make out the two other Eastern kings to be historical personages must be considered failures. According to Jos. Halevy,

4. Amraphel Tidal.

Amraphel is the famous Babylonian king Hammurabi himself, whose name is explained in Semitic as Kimtu-rapaltu Cam - kimtu, rapaltu = rapaltu - rapaltu; whilst, according to Hommel (GLA 394 ff.), he is Hammurabi's father Sin-muballit, because Sin is sometimes named Amar and muballit may conceivably have been condensed into pal (phel). (See also AMRAPHEL.) With more confidence Shin'ar is stated to be a Hebraised form of Sumer (see Schr. A 17). Unfortunately, this is by no means certain. Though Hammurabi was king of Babylon, and therefore of Akkad, he was not king of Sumer so long as Eri-aku was king of Larsa. Not till he had put an end to the Elamite dominion in Babylonia could he be called king of Sumer, and then neither Eri-aku nor an Elamite king could join with him in the conquest of Canaan. As to Tidal, king of Goyim, we may read his name Thargal, following Schr.; we may identify the Goyim with the people of Gutium; we may even go so far as prudently permit in theorising on the latest discoveries; but all this does not make TIDAL (q.v.) historical. All that we can say is that the writer of than those of Chedor-lamer and Arioch; the former are very possibly corruptions of the names of historical personages whom we are as yet unable to identify. Nor do we assert that the whole story is the product of the inventive faculty of the author. That in very remote times, Babylonian kings extended their sway as far as the Mediterranean, is not only told in ancient traditions (e.g., of Sargon I.), but has also been proved by the Amarna tablets. From these we learn that as late as the fifteenth century B.C., when the kings of Babylon and Assyria had no authority beyond their own borders and Egypt gave the law to Western Asia, Babylonian was the official and diplomatic language of the Western Asiatic nations. Hence it is not impossible, it is even probable, that a similar suzerainty was exercised over these nations by the Elamites, who were more than once masters of Babylonia. Our author, whether he wrote in the eighth century B.C., or, which is more probable, in the fourth, may have found this fact in some ancient record, and utilised it both for the glorification of the Father of the Faithful and for encouraging his contemporaries.

So much appears to be all that can be safely stated in the present state of research. Scheil, however, is of opinion (1896) that the Ku-dur-la-g-ga-mar (?) whom he finds in a cuneiform tablet was the Elamite king of Larsa who was conquered by Hammurabi and Sin-muballit, and, therefore, cannot have been any other than the son of Kudur-mabuk, who, as king of Larsa (Ur), had adopted the name of Kim-sin (Eri-aku?). Pinches has discovered a cuneiform tablet in the Brit. Mus. collection which has naturally excited great hopes among conservative critics. It is sadly mutilated; but it is at least clear that names which may be the prototypes of Arioch, Tidal, and possibly Chedor-lamer, were known in Babylonia when the tablet was inscribed. The tablet dates, probably, from the time of the Arsacids; but it is tempting to assume that the inscription was copied from one which was made in the primitive Babylonian period. It should be noticed, however, that the form of the first name is not Eri-aku but Eri-(D)E-ku, and that the third name is not read with full certainty, the second part being -mal, which is only conjecturally made into lah-mal. There is also a second tablet on which two of the names are mentioned again. Pinches reads the one Eri-ku (possibly Eri-ku-a), and the other Ku-dur-lah(?) -gu-mal. In a third inscription the name Ku-dur-lah(?) -gu-[mal] appears. The second of the three names is mentioned only in the first tablet as Tu-ad-hul-a, where, since the Babylonian answers to the Hebrew p in קניז, Pinches and Schrader agree in recognising the Tidal of Gen. 11. But not by a single word do these inscriptions confirm the historicity of the invasion 'in the days of Amraphel.'

[The doubts here expressed are fully justified by L. W. King's more recent investigations. Both Scheil's and Pinches' readings of the respective inscriptions are incorrect, and 'though Ku-dur-ku-ku-mal (Kudur-KU-KU-mal) is styled (in Pinches' inscriptions) a king of Elam, there is no reason to suppose that he was a contemporary of Hammurabi. He might have occupied the throne at any period before the fourth century B.C.]

CHELAL (חֶלֶל), one of the b'ne Pahath-moab in the list of persons with foreign wives (see EZRA, i. § 5 emf), EZRA 10.30 (ס) has joined Chelal with the preceding name Adna (אֲדָנָא) and reads Αἰδαινε Χαηλ [B]; with Εδαινε Βαβ[β] Εδενουχ' [H] 88. Εδνε και Χαηλ [A], Αναστανιε Χαλμανα [L]. The 1 Esd. 9.31 has quite different names – 'and of the sons of Adai; Naathus, and Moossias, Laccumus,' etc. (Cf. The Hallpil of Josh. 15:3 may be meant; but the reading $\chi\epsilon\sigma\lambda\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ suggests rather $\chi\epsilon\sigma\sigma\epsilon\lambda\lambda\omicron\upsilon\pi$ or $\chi\epsilon\sigma\sigma\omicron\tau\iota\iota\text{-}\tau\alpha\upsilon\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$, which is given by Jerome and Eusebius as Chesulus or $\chi\alpha\epsilon\sigma\lambda\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ ($\mathcal{O}^2$, 914, etc., 30264). See $\chi\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\lambda\alpha\varsigma$. Another identification should be mentioned. Chellus is perhaps the same as the place which in Jos. Vet. Lat. has Chellenth, and Syr. has 'against the Chaldeans.' One very improbable conjecture is that χαλων (CALWŌN) is intended; another, hardly less unlikely, is that the word is the Hebrew חֲזָרִי ('weasel'), and that by the opprobrious designation of 'children of the weasel' are meant the Syrians (Ew. GI 3 543).

The original Heb. word appears also in 2 K. 23.5, where EV gives 'idolaters priests', and in Hos. 10.5, where EV has 'priests.' It is also highly probable that in Hos. 4.4 we should read, with Hock 'for my people is like its Chemarim' (1 Q. however, as ἀντίκλητοι ἐπεὶ, perhaps an error for -οὐ ἐπέστος ('schleusner')) EV transliterates, Χεμαριμ (HBA 2 K. loc.); but epetis is also supported, see Field (loc. cit.); it apparently omits in Zeph.; (in Hos. it had a different Heb.). Vg. varies between asuripes (2 K.) and seditus (Zeph. Hos.). Arg. between צִמְרִים (2 K. Zeph.) and צִמְרֵת 'the ministers thereof'; Pesh. adheres to צִמְרֵת.

As to the meaning, if we appeal to the versions, we find only the dim light which an unassisted study of the context can supply. Evidently the term was applied to the priests of Baal, who served at the high places under royal authority, but were put down by Josiah. But what special idea did the word convey? In itself it meant simply 'priests'; in Zeph. 14 Kēmārīm and Kēmūrim are put side by side to express the idea of a priesthood of many members; and in Hos. 34 (if the view proposed above be adopted) we have kēmārīm used of the priests of N. Israel, when these are spoken of objectively, and ḥōhēn, when the priests are addressed as an organic unity. But the word kēmārīm probably also conveyed the idea of a worship which had Syrian affinities. Certainly it cannot be explained from Hebrew; קָמַר does not mean 'to be black' (cp. E. LIPSE), and even if it did, the 'black-robed ones' is a most improbable designation for ancient priests.² The word is no doubt of Syrian origin (see the Aram. inscriptions in CIS 2 nos. 113-130). The primitive form is kamar, whence Aram. kāmār (never used in an unfavourable sense) and Heb. kēmārīm; are normally formed. Lagarde (Aram. Stud. 238b) compared Aram. chamar; but it is more obviously reasonable to compare the Assyrian kummaru, which is given as a synonym of lubarū zaḥu — i.e., 'a clean vesture' (Del. Ass. III B 337 k., cp. 254 k.). The term kēmārīm probably described the Syrian and Israelitish priests in their clean vestments (cp. 2 K. 10.22, the Baal festival) when ministering to their God. To derive it from an Aram. root meaning, 'to be sad' is much less natural.

Delffisch compares Ass. kamrā, 'to throw down'; the term, he thinks, describes the priests as those who prostrate themselves in worship (Ass. and Heb., 41, 42; so Che. Hib. 103, 111). Finally, Robertson Smith, noting that the word belongs to a race in which the mass of the people were probably not circumcised (Herd. 2104, cp. Jos. Ant. vii 103, c. Ap. i. 22) while the priests were (Pho Cassius, 7911; E. Ep. Arab. 96; cp Chwolson, Savher, 2114), conjectures that kumrī means 'the circumcised' (Ass. kamrā, 'glans penis'). T. K. C.

CHEMOSH (כִּמּוֹשׁ, in MT כִּמְשִׁי; on name see § 4, end; χαμωσ [B⁹NAFLI], ΔΑΜΩΣ [B⁹ Judg. 11:24], Chamos), the national god of the Moabites (1 K. 11, 17, Jer. 48:13). Moab is the people of Chemosh; the Moabites are his sons and daughters (Nu. 21:29; cp. the relation of Yahwè to Israel, Judg. 5:11 Nu. 11:29 Judg. 11:24 Is. 45:11, etc.). A king of Moab in the time of Sennacherib was named Chemoshnadiab (Κημοσναδιab;⁴ cp. Jehonadab); the father of Mesha was Chemoshmелеch;⁵ a gem found near Beirat is inscribed יְהוֹנָדָב⁶ (cp. Heb. יְהוֹנָדָב, Phoen. יהונדב). The state of Mesha king of Moab, contemporary with Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram of Israel (2 K. 1:3), in the middle of the ninth century B.C. (see MESHA), was erected to commemorate the deliverance which Chemosh had wrought for his people.

CHENAANAH

The inscription tells us that Omri had oppressed Moab for a long time because Chemosh was with his land (ll. 4-5); the Israelites had now restored it to Moab (ll. 7-9); Chemosh drove out the king of Israel before Moab from J. haz (ll. 12-21); at the bidding of Chemosh, Mesha fought against Nebo and took it (ll. 14-17); at his command, he made war on Horonaim, and Chemosh restored it to Moab (ll. 31-33); the inhabitants of captured cities were slaughtered, 'a spectacle (?) for Chemosh and Moab' (ll. 11-13); men, women, and children were devoted to Ashtar-Chemosh (ll. 15-17)—the 𐤇𐤍𐤔 (see BAV); the spoils of Israelite sanctuaries were carried off and presented to Chemosh (ll. 12-17, 17-18).

The religion of Moab in the ninth century was thus very similar to that of Israel: the historical books of the OT furnish parallels to almost every line of the inscription.

We learn from the OT that human sacrifices were offered to Chemosh, at least in great national emergencies; the king of Moab, shut up in Kir-hureseth and unable to cut his way out, offered his eldest son upon the wall; the effect of this extraordinary sacrifice was a great outburst of Chemosh's fury upon Israel, which compelled the invaders to return discomfited to their own land (2 K. 3:27). Priests of Chemosh are mentioned in Jer. 48:7; the language of Mesha, 'Chemosh said to me' (ll. 14, 32), supposes an oracle, or perhaps prophets.

The worship of Chemosh as the national god did not exclude the worship of other gods; Mesha's inscription speaks of Ashtar-Chemosh (ll. 17).

2. Other Moabite gods.—that is, most probably, an 'Ashtar (Astarte) who was associated in worship with Chemosh,' perhaps at a particular sanctuary. The worship of Baal-peor (Nu. 25, cp Hos. 9:10) was probably a local Moabite cult—there is no ground for identifying the god with Chemosh. (See BAAL-PEOR.) [Both] Baal-meon (Mesha, ll. 9, 30; OT) was, as the name shows, the seat of another local Baal cult. Monst Nebo may have received its name in the period of Babylonian supremacy; but we do not know that the worship of the Babylonian god was perpetuated by the Moabites. Cp XLIII.

The statement of Eusebius (OS 228 ff. 575, 'Araia') that the inhabitants of Areopolis in his day called their idol 'Araia,' because they worshipped 'Ares,' seems to be the product of a complex misunderstanding.

In Judg. 11:24, in the argument of Jephthah with the king of the Ammonites, 'Chemosh thy god' is set over against 'Yahweh our god' in such a way as to imply that Chemosh was the national god of Ammon. From many passages in the OT we know, however, that the national god of the Ammonites was Milcom (see MILCOM) while Chemosh was the god of Moab.

3. Chemosh outside of Moab. The hypothesis that Chemosh and Milcom are but two names of the same god (Milcom originally a title) is excluded by the contexts in which they appear side by side (e.g., 1 K. 11:33). Nor is it sufficient to suppose that Chemosh in Judg. 11:24 is merely a slip on the part of the author or a scribe for Milcom; closer examination shows that the whole historical argument applies to Moab only, not to Ammon. Whatever explanation may be given of this incongruity (see Moore, Judg., 233; Bu. Richter, 80 f.), the passage cannot be taken as evidence that Chemosh was the god of Ammon as well as of the sister people Moab. The statement of Snelas (v. 1, Xaḡaḡ) that Chemosh was a god of the Tyrians and Ammonites is, as the context shows, a confused reminiscence of 1 K. 11:57.

From the name Χημωσθολος, the so-called mythical Babylonian ruler after the flood (Gen. 10:10; Gen. 2:5), it has been surmised that the worship of Chemosh was of Babylonian origin; the name of the city Carchemish on the Euphrates has been explained as 'City of Chemosh'; neither of these theories has any other basis than a fortuitous similarity of sound.

Solomon built a high place for Chemosh on the Mount of Olives (1 K. 11:7a), where, according to 2 K. 23:13, it stood until Josiah's reform—more than three hundred years.

During the long reign of the theory—not yet universally abandoned—that all the gods of the nations were heavenly bodies or meteoric phenomena,

4. Nature of Chemosh; representations. Chemosh was by some thought to be the sun, by others identified with Milcom. Moloch-Satan; the one opinion has as little foundation as the other. In Roman times Rabbath-moab, as well as the more northern Ar-moab, was called Areopolis, and this name—perhaps originally only a Grecising of Ar (Jerome)—was understood as 'City of Ares.' Coins of Rabbath-moab in the reigns of Geta and Severus (Eckhel, iii. 504; cp Mionnet, v. 591, Suppl. viii. 388) exhibit a standing warrior in whom the type of Mars is to be recognised; but even if we were sure that the old Moabite god of the city is represented, and not the Nabataean Dusares, we could learn nothing about the nature of Chemosh in OT times from so late and contaminated a source. Confusion of Chemosh with Dusares is probably to be assumed in the statements of Jewish writers that the idol of Chemosh was a black stone—the same which is now adored by Moslems in the Gaba at Mecca.¹

The etymology of the name Chemosh is quite unknown; a fact which gives good reason to believe that he is one of the older Semitic gods.

CHERETHITES (כֶּרֶתִּים, קֶרֶתִּי, ⚔ in Sam. and K. ο χερεθθαι; or [by assimilation to Pelethites] ο χερεθθαι; Vg. Cerethi; ⚔ in Prophets κρητες), a people in the south of Palestine. In the days of Saul and David a region in the Negeb adjoining Judah and Caleb bore their name (1 S. 30:14 χολθει [B] χερθηαι [A] χορη [L]). From 2. 16 it appears that the inhabitants of this region were reckoned to the Philistines; in Zeph. 2:5 and Ez. 25:16 (AV Cherethims), also, Philistines and Cherethites are coupled in such a way as to show that they were regarded as one people. Finally, in the names mentioned in the prophecy against Egypt in Ez. 30:5, where AV gives, 'the men of the land that is in league,' we should restore 'the Cherethites' (קֶרֶתִּי; so Cornill, Toy). It is to be inferred that the Cherethites were a branch of the Philistines; or, perhaps, that they were one of the tribes which took part with the Philistines in the invasion of Palestine, and that, like the latter, they remained behind when the wave receded (see PHILISTINES, § 2, CAPHTOR, § 2). The ⚔ translators of Zeph. and Ez. interpreted the name by Cretans; and in this, although they may have been guided only by the sound, they perhaps hit upon the truth.² An early connection between Gaza and Crete seems to be indicated by other evidence (see GAZA).

Except in the three passages already cited, the name occurs only in the phrase, 'the Cherethites and Pelethites' (קֶרֶתִּי וְכֶרֶתִּי ⚔ gen. φελεθθαι) as the designation of a corps of troops in the service of David—his body-guard (2 S. 8:18 15:18 20:7 23 Kr., 1 K. 1:38 44 1 Ch. 18:17; σωματοφύλακες Jos. Ant. vii. 54, etc.).³ They were commanded by BENAIAH, 1, and remained faithful to their master in all the crises of his reign (2 S. 15:20 1 K. 1).

Only the strongest reasons could warrant our separating the Cherethites of David's guard from the people of the same name spoken of in the same source (1 S. 30:14). There are no such reasons: קֶרֶתִּי has the regular form of a gentile noun; and, although much ingenuity has been expended on the problem, all attempts to explain the word as an appellative have failed. The name Pelethite, which is found only coupled with Cherethite in the phrase above cited, also is a gentile noun; the etymological explanations are even more far-fetched than in the case of the Cherethites. The presumption is that the Pelethites also were Philistines;⁴ and this is confirmed by the passages cited from Zeph. and Ez.; קֶרֶתִּי is perhaps only a lisping pronunciation of קֶרֶתִּי, to make it rhyme with קֶרֶתִּי.

It need not surprise us that David's guard was composed of foreign mercenaries. The Egyptian kings of the nineteenth dynasty recruited their corps d'élite from the bold sea-rovers who periodically descended on their coasts; Rameses II. displays great pride in his Sardinian guards, and Sardinians and Libyans are the flower of the army of Rameses III.¹ The Philistines were more skilled in arms than the Israelites, and doubtless liked fighting better: cp 1 SAM. the Gittite, and see ARMY, § 4. It is the opinion of some recent scholars that where David's gibbōrim (EV 'mighty men') seem to be spoken of as a body, the Cherethites and Pelethites are meant; see especially 1 K. 18:10 compared with 2. 38. This is, however, not a necessary inference from the verses cited; and conflicts with 2 S. 20:7 (cp 15:18 ⚔). More probably the gibbōrim were the comrades of David in the days of his outlawry and the struggle with the Philistines for independence. See DAVID, § 11. In 2 S. 20:23 for 'Cherethites' the Heb. text (Kt.) has Carites (כָּרִיתִּים).² In 2 K. 11:419, where this name again occurs, it probably means 'Carians.' The Carians were a famous mercenary folk, and it would not surprise us to find them at Jerusalem in the days of Athaliah (see CARITES). That the soldiers of the guard in even later times were usually foreigners has been inferred from Zeph. 18 f. and from Ez. 44:6 f.; see WRS OTT²⁵ 260 ff., but also THRESHOLD. For mercenary troops in post-exilic times see ARMY, § 7.

CHERITH (כֶּרֶתִּי, χερραθ [BAI.]; χερρα [Onom.]), ELIJAH (q.v.) has just informed Ahab of the impending drought, when we are abruptly told that 'Yahwe's word came unto him, saying, Get thee hence' (i.e., presumably from Samaria), 'and turn to the east (מִזְרָח) and hide thyself in the torrent-valley of Cherith which is before (פְּנֵי) Jordan' (1 K. 17:35). This occurs in the first scene of the highly dramatic story of Elijah. In the second he appears in the far north of Palestine—at Zarephath, which hardly suits Robinson's identification (BR 1558) of Cherith with the Wady el-Kelt (which is rather the Valley of ZEBORIM [q.v. 1.]), at least if these two scenes stood in juxtaposition from the first. Besides this, the two names Kelt and Cherith begin with different palatals and since the expression 'before Jordan' is most naturally explained 'to the E. of the Jordan,'³ it is plausible to hold with Prof. G. A. Smith that the scene of Elijah's retreat must be sought in Gilead (HO 580).

Let us, then, look across the Jordan eastward from Samaria (where Elijah may have had his interview with Ahab). The Wady 'Ajlun and the Wady Rājib have been proposed by Thénius; the Wady el-Yābis by Mühlau. But, as C. Niebuhr (Gesch. 1291) points out, Elijah would certainly go to some famous holy place. Of the burial-place of Moses (Niebuhr) we know nothing; but 1 K. 19:39 suggests that the sanctuary was in the far south. It is true, Eus. and Jer. (OS 30269 11328) already place Cherith (Chorra, Chorath) beyond Jordan. Josephus, however, makes Elijah depart 'into the southern parts' (Ant. viii. 132). What we have to do is to find a name which could, in accordance with analogies, be worn down and corrupted into רְהוֹבוֹת. Such a name is Rehoboth. The valley of Rehoboth (the Wady Ruhaibeh) would be fitly described as עֵינֵי מִצְרַיִם, 'fronting Misraim' (see MIZRAIM); cp Gen. 25:18. The alteration of מִצְרַיִם into רְהוֹבוֹת was made in order to suit the next story, in which ZEPHATH (ז. פ.) had been already corrupted into ZAREPHATH.

T. K. C.

CHERUB, plural form Cherubim (כְּרוּבִים, כְּרוּבִים; κερουβ. κερουβιμ [ε]. α. [ε] α. [α]); etymology disputed; Ps. 104:1 may allude to a popular [post-exilic] identification of כְּרוּב and רְכוּב, but kerub being, like כְּרוּב, a loan-word, a Hebrew etymology is inadmissible. In the composite system of Jewish angelology the cherubim form one of the ten highest classes of angels, while another class is distinguished by the synonymous term 'living creatures' (חַיִּימוֹת). These two classes, together with the 'ophannim' or 'wheels,' are specially attached to the throne of the divine glory, and it is the function of the cherubim to be bearers of the throne on its progresses through the worlds. The Jewish liturgy, like the 'Te Deum,' delights to associate the 'praises of Israel' (Ps. 22:34) with those offered to God by the different classes of angels, and singles out for special mention in a portion of the daily morning service the 'ophannim, the חַיִּימוֹת, and the שרפים. We find an approach to this conception in the Apocalypse, where the four ζῶα (Rev. 4:6-8), though—like the twenty-four πνευματικοί—they are always mentioned apart from the angels, and discharge some altogether peculiar functions, are yet associated with the angels in the utterance of doxologies¹ (Rev. 4:8; 11:14; 19:1-7).

A similar view is suggested in the 'Similitudes' in Enoch, in one passage of which (61:10-11) the cherubim, seraphim, and 'ophannim, and all the angels of power' are combined under the phrase 'the host of God,' and unite in the ascription of blessedness to the 'Lord of Spirits,' while in another (chap. xl.) the 'four faces on the four sides of the Lord of Spirits' (a reminiscence of Ezek. 16) are identified or confounded with the arch-angels. Elsewhere, however, a somewhat different view is presented of the cherubim. They are the sleepless guardians of the 'throne of His glory' (71:7); they are the 'fiery cherubim' (14:1), and together with the seraphim (exceptionally called 'serpents,' ὀφιδόμορφοι) are closely connected with Paradise, and placed under the archangel Gabriel (20:7). From these facts we gather that in the last two centuries B.C. there were different ways of conceiving the cherubim. Some writers had a stronger sense of the peculiarity of the nature of the cherubim than others, and laid stress on such points as their connection with the divine fire, and with Paradise and its serpent-guardians. Whence did they derive a notion so suggestive of mythological comparisons?

The most reasonable answer is, From the earlier religious writings, supplemented and interpreted by a not yet extinct oral tradition. A tale of the serpents by the sacred tree (once probably serpent-demons) may have been orally handed down, but the conception of the fiery cherubim in God's heavenly palace is to be traced to the vision in Ezek. 1, and to the account of the 'mountain of God' in Eden, with its 'stones of fire' and its cherub-guardian, in Ezek. 28:13-16. These two passages of Ezekiel form the next stage in our journey. The latter must be treated first, as being evidently a faithful report of a popular tradition. Unfortunately the received Hebrew text is faulty, and an intelligible exegesis of the passage is rarely given. Keil, for instance, admits some reference to Paradise, but feels

1 The differences between the ζῶα of Revelation and those of Ezekiel, both as to their appearance and as to their functions, are obvious. But without the latter how could the former have been imagined? The traditional Christian view that the apocalyptic ζῶα symbolise the four Gospels can hardly be seriously defended.

obliged to infer from the epithet 'that covereth' (מִכְשֵׁל) that 'the place of the cherub in the sanctuary (Ez. 28:20) was also present to the prophet's mind.' Nor is the difficulty confined to this epithet, and to the equally strange word (מִכְשֵׁל) which Vg. renders 'extensus,' and EV 'anointed' (so Theodot.); the opening phrase אֲנִיכִי, whether rendered 'thou wast the cherub' or (pointing differently) 'with the cherub,' baffles comprehension. It is necessary, therefore, to correct the text of Ez. 13:16b; we shall then arrive at the following sense:—

'Thou wast in Eden, the divine garden; of all precious stones was thy covering: cornelian, etc.; and of gold were thy . . . worked; in the day when thou wast made were they prepared. To be . . . had I appointed thee; thou wast upon the holy, divine mountain; amidst the stones of fire didst thou walk to and fro.' Then wast thou dishonoured (being cast) out of the divine mountain, and the cherub destroyed thee (hurling thee) out of the midst of the stones of fire.'

The sense now becomes fairly clear. We have here a tradition of Paradise distinct from that in Gen. 2 and 3. Favoured men, it appears, could be admitted to the divine garden, which glittered with precious stones (or, as they are also called, 'stones of fire') like the mythic tree which the hero Talgames saw in the Babylonian epic,² or like the interior of the temples of Babylon or Tyre,³ or like the walls and gates and streets of the new Jerusalem in the Apocalypse. But these privileged persons were still liable to the sin of pride, and such a sin would be their ruin. This Ezekiel applies to the case of the king of Tyre, who reckoned himself the favourite of his god, and secure of admission to Paradise.

The idea of the passage is closely akin to that expressed in Is. 14:13-15. The king of Babylon believes that by his unique position and passionate devotion to the gods he is assured of entering that glorious cosmic temple of which his splendid terrace-temples are to him the symbols. Towards Marduk he is humility itself, but to the unnamed prophet of Yahvé he seems proud even to madness. From that heaven of which in his thoughts he is already the inhabitant, the prophet sees him hurled as a lifeless corpse to an ignoble grave. This is just what Ezekiel holds out in prospect to the king of Tyre, and the destroying agent is the cherub. How different this idea of the cherub from that of the apocalyptic ζῶα!

We have again a different conception of the cherubim in Ezekiel's vision (Ez. 1:5). The prophet has not the old unquestioning belief in tradition, and modifies the traditional data so as to produce effective symbols of religious ideas. Out of the

3. Ezek. 1:5 symbols of religious ideas. Out of the elaborate description it is enough to select a few salient points. Observe then that the one cherub of the tradition in ch. 28 has now become four cherubim (cp Rev. 4:6-8), each of which has four faces, one looking each way, viz. that of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle, and human hands on his four sides. They are not, however, called cherubim, but חַיִּימוֹת.

1 So Co., following ΣΒΑ2, Sym., but in other respects reading ε, 14 as above.

2 According to the ordinary view which makes the Tyrian prince a cherub, the plumage of the cherub of Ezekiel's tradition was resplendent as if with gold and precious stones. But surely it was not merely as a griffin, nor as a griffin's fellow, that the Tyrian prince was placed (as the prophet dramatically states) in Paradise, but as one of the 'sons of Elohim'; and the covering spoken of is a state-dress besprinkled with precious stones. 'Stones of fire' means 'flashing stones,' like the Assyrian aban šatti, 'stone of fire,' one of the names of a certain precious stone (Friedr. Del. Par. 117).

3 Tablet IX. See Jeremias, Israhel und Ninurad, 20. For Babylon see Neuhard, Reichsinschriften, RIH 2:3104 ff., where he describes the beautification of the temple Esagila at great length. Gold and precious stones are specially mentioned. For the temple of Tyre see Herod. 2:44 (the two brilliant pillars). Gold was also lavishly used in the temple of Solomon.

5 There is a second description in 10:8-17, but it is the attempt of a later writer to improve upon Ezekiel's account, and to prepare the way for ε, 20. 17:14 should be omitted as a very careless gloss. See Cornill, and on 17:14 cp Davidson.

('living creatures'), until we come to 9, and Ezekiel tells us (10.20) that he did not 'know that they were cherubim' till he heard them called so by God (10.2). By this he implies that his own description of them differed so widely from that received by tradition that without the divine assurance he could not have ventured to call them cherubim. Sometimes, however, he speaks of them in the singular ('the living creature,' 1.20-22; 'the cherub,' 9.1, 10.24, if MT is correct), apparently to indicate that, being animated by one 'spirit,' the four beings formed but one complex phenomenon. The fourfold character of the cherub is caused by the new function (relatively to the account in ch. 28) which is assigned to it; in fact, it has now become the bearer of the throne of God (more strictly of the 'firmament' under the throne 1.22-26). But the whole appearance was at the moment bathed in luminous splendour, so that the seer needed reflection to realise it. We will therefore not dwell too much on what must be to a large extent peculiar to Ezekiel and artificially symbolic, and in so far belongs rather to the student of biblical theology. All that it is important to add is that the divine manifestation takes place within a storm-cloud, and that a fire which gives out flashes of lightning burns brightly between the cherubim; also that there are revolving wheels beside the cherubim, animated by the same 'spirit' as the living creatures, as brilliant as the chrysolith or topaz; and that in his vision of the temple Ezekiel again modifies his picture of the cherubim, each cherub having there but two faces, that of a man and that of a lion (41.18 f.).

Another group of passages on the cherubim is found in the Psalter, viz. Ps. 18.10 f. [11 f.], 80.1 [2], 99.1, and to the latter we may join not only Ps. 22.3 [4], but phrases in 1 S. 4.4 2 S. 6.2 1 Ch. 13.6 2 K. 19.15 (= 1 S. 37.16).

4. Some post-exilic passages. In the first we read, 'He bowed the heavens and came down, and thick clouds were under his feet; he mounted the cherub and flew, he came swooping upon the wings of the wind.' That there is a mythical conception here is obvious, but it has grown very pale, and does not express much more than Ps. 104.3. The conception agrees with that of Ezekiel; the cherub (only one is mentioned, but this does not exclude the existence of more) is in some sense the divine chariot, and has some relation to the storm-wind and the storm-clouds. The other psalm-passages appear at first sight to give a new conception of the cherubim, who are neither the guards of the 'mountain of God,' nor the chariot of the moving Deity, but the throne on which he is seated. It may be questioned, however, whether the phrase 'enthroned upon the cherubim' is not simply a condensed expression for 'seated on the throne which is guarded by the cherubim.' Both in the Psalter and in the narrative-books it is the heavenly throne of Yahwé which is meant, the throne from which (as is implied in Ps. 80.1 [2] 99.1 and 2 K. 19.15) he rules the universe and guides the destiny of the nations. That is the only change which has taken place in the conception of the cherubim; they have been definitely transferred to heaven, and, strictly speaking, their occupation as bearers of the Deity should have gone, for the 'angels' are sufficient links between God and the world of men. Or rather there is yet another point in which the cherub idea has been modified; it is indicated in Ps. 22.3 [4] where, if the text is correct,² Yahwé is addressed as 'enthroned,' not upon the cherubim, but 'upon the praises of Israel.' The idea is that the cherubim in heaven have now the great new function of praising God, and that in the praiseful services of the temple, where God is certainly in some degree present, the congregation takes the place of the cherubim. This at any rate agrees with later beliefs, and may be illustrated by the direction in Ps. 27.20 (1°) that the faces of the cherubim on the ark shall be 'towards the mercy-seat' (kapporeth). The meaning of the priestly theorist (for the description is imaginary, the ark having long ago disappeared) is, that the cherubim are a kind of higher angels who surround the earthly throne of Yahwé and contemplate and praise his glory. It is also stated that their faces are to be 'one to another,' and, if we add to this that they have to guard, not Yahwé, but the sacramental sign of his favour, we get three points in which the cherubim of the priestly writer are closely analogous to the seraphim of the vision of Isaiah (Is. 6).

We now come to the cherubim in the temple of Solomon. Carved figures of cherubim were prominent in the decoration of the walls and the doors, and two colossal cherubim stood

5. Solomon's temple. in the debir or 'adytum,' where they formed a kind of dais, one wing being horizontally stretched towards the lateral wall, whilst the other overshadowed the ark, a felicitous arrangement resulting in charming effects¹ (see 1 K. 6.23-25). Obviously they are the guards of the sacred ark and its still more sacred contents. Cp TEMPLE.

There is no record of any myth which directly accounts for the temple-cherubim. But an old tradition

6. Paradise story. said that after the first human pair had been driven out of the divine garden, Yahwé 'stationed at the east of the Garden of Eden the cherubim and the blade of the whirling sword,'² and the function of these two allied but independent powers was 'to guard the way to the tree of life' (Gen. 3.24). Neither in this case, nor in the preceding one, is any account given of the physiognomy of the cherubim. In the height of the mythological period no such account was needed.

We see therefore that the most primitive Hebrew myth described the cherubim as beings of superhuman

7. Development. power and devoid of human sympathies, whose office was to drive away intruders from the abode of God, or of the gods.

Originally this abode was conceived of as a mountain, or as a garden on the lower slopes of a mountain, and as glittering with a many-coloured brightness. But when the range of the supreme god's power became wider, when from an earth-god he became also a heaven-god, the cherub too passed into a new phase; he became the divine chariot. We have no early authority for this view, but the age which produced the story of Ehjád's ascent to heaven in a fiery chariot (2 K. 2.11) may be supposed to have known of fiery cherubs on which Yahwé rode. At a still later time, the cherubim, though still spoken of by certain writers, were no longer indispensable.³ The forces of nature were alike Yahwé's guards and his ministers. Mythology became a subject of special learning, and its details acquired new meanings, and the cherub-myth passed into an entirely new phase.

There is much that is obscure about the form of the primitive Israelitish cherub. It was in the main a bird-animal, but it had wings. That is all that we know, though a probable conjecture (see below) may lead us further. As to the meaning of the cherubim, they have been thought to represent the storm-clouds which sometimes hang around the mountain peaks, sometimes rush 'on the wings of the wind,' sending forth arrows like flashes of lightning. This theory is consistent with the language of Ps. 189 f. Ez. 14 f. 24, and the passages in Enoch, but hardly explains the symbolism of the

² The sword is not the sword of the cherubim but that of Yahwé; it is the same with which he 'slew the dragon' (Is. 27.1). Marduk, too, has such a sword (see Smith, Chaldean Account of Genesis, 86 f. 87, and the illustration, opp. 114).

8. Origin. cherub in its earliest historically known form. At any rate, we can affirm positively that the myth is of foreign origin. Lenormant thought that he had traced it to Babylonia,¹ on the ground that kirabu occurs on a talisman as a synonym for tidu, a common term for the divine bull guardian of temples and palaces. This theory however is not confirmed as regards the derivation of cherub (see Z. I. 168 f. [86]). We may indeed admit that Ezekiel probably mingled the old Palestinian view of the cherub with the analogous Babylonian conception of the divine winged bulls. But, so far as can be seen at present, the early Hebrew cherub came nearer to the griffin, which was not divine, but the servant of the Deity, and the origin of which is now assigned to the Hittites of Syria.² The idea of this mythic form is the combination of parts of the two strongest animals of air and land—the lion and the eagle, and a reminiscence of this may perhaps be traced in the reference to these animals in Ez. 10. It was adopted by various nations, but to understand its true significance we must go, not to Egypt nor to Greece, but to the Hittites, whose originality in the use of animal-forms is well known. The Hittite griffin appears almost always, in contrast to many Babylonian representations, not as a fierce beast of prey, but seated in calm dignity like an irresistible guardian of holy things. It is only on later Syrian monuments that the Sun-god is represented in a chariot³ drawn by griffins, which agrees with a statement respecting the Indian sun-god in Philostratus's Life of Apollonius (342). The Egyptian imported this form, probably from Syria or Canaan at the beginning of the New Empire, but the griffin never acquired among them the religious significance of the sphinx.⁴ The Phoenicians, and probably the Canaanites, and through them the Israelites, evidently attached greater importance to the griffin or cherub, and it is said that among the discoveries at Zenjirli in N. Syria (see ARAMIC LANGUAGE, § 2) is a genuine representation of this mythic form as described in Ez. 1113 f.⁵ Whether the sculptured quadruped with a bearded human head, Assyrian in type, discovered by M. Clermont-Ganneu in the subterranean quarries in the north of Jerusalem,⁶ is rightly called a cherub seems very doubtful.

Most probably his real name was Ahinoam (אֲחִינוֹם); note the ה in Jer.'s form, the ה in 2 S., the Gr. forms with $\alpha\chi$ and ν , and the Egyptian form (? see below) with n-nu (Che.). Following Fw. (Hist. 3:205), Deans Stanley and Plumstre have supposed that he carried on the family tradition of hospitality by erecting at Bethlehem a khan or hospice for travellers (see Jer. 41:17, גִּתֵּי בִּתְלֵם, RV אֶת־הַגִּתִּים, 'lodging-place of Chinham'). This view, however, is based on the faulty reading גִּתֵּי. This should be corrected into גִּתֵּי, which is the reading of Jos. (see Ant. x. 95), of Ap., and of the Hexaplar Syriac (see Field), and has been adopted by Hitzig and Giesebrecht. In the text represented by S [see Swete] the ה in גִּתֵּי had become a ה. Gidroth-chimham—i. e., 'the hurdles, or sheep-pens, of Chinham'—seems a probable name for a locality in a pastoral district. 'Chimham' (or Ahinoam?) is appended to distinguish this Gederoth from other places of the same name. It is just possible that the family of Chimham or Ahinoam had property there. Among the names of the places in Palestine conquered by Seti I. we find Ha(?)-ma-he-mu, 'the city of Kaduru in He(?)-n-mā,' which may possibly belong to the same place (WMM As. u. Eur. 193, 202), viz., Gidroth-chimham (Aycce, Pal. Pal. 157), or rather Gidroth-Ahinoam.

Possibly it is also referred to in 1 K. 15:20, where we should perhaps read 'and Abel-beth-maacah, and Chinneroth, and all the land of Naphtali.' It is of great antiquity, for it occurs under the form kn-na-ra-tu in the list of places conquered by Thothmes III., n. 34 (RP² 545; WMM As. u. Eur. 84). It is also given (1), with the prefix 'sea of,' to the Galilean lake (Nu. 34:11 [$\chi\epsilon\eta\alpha\rho\alpha$ BF, $\epsilon\eta\theta$ AL] Josh. 13:27); (2) to the same inland 'sea' without that prefix (Dt. 3:17, cp. Josh. 11:2 and see below). The site of the town can no longer be identified.

Jerome identified it with Ilibaris (OS 11229); some rabbins with a town at the S. of the lake called Beth-jerach (probably the Tarrhara of Josephus). Others included Sanhari (the Sennabris of Jos., H/bi. 97) under the designation; a third extended the application of the name to Beth-shean (Rev. rabba, par. 58, Wünsche). This vagueness sufficiently shows that nothing was known as to the site of the ancient town. Cp. Niebauer, Gleg. Palen. 214 f.

CHISLOTH-TABOR

CHINNEROTH ([Gins.] כִּנְרֶת or [BL] כִּנְרֶת, the 'pluralis extensus' of CHINNERETH) is the name applied (1), with the prefix 'sea of,' to the Galilean lake in Josh. 12:3 ($\chi\epsilon\eta\epsilon\rho\epsilon\theta$ [BFL], $\chi\epsilon\eta$, [A]), (2), without this prefix (cp. Dt. 3:17), to the same lake in Josh. 11:2 ($\chi\epsilon\eta\epsilon\rho\omega\theta$ [B], $\chi\epsilon\eta\epsilon\rho\theta$ [A], $\epsilon\theta$ [FL]), (3), in the spelling CHINNEROTH (AV only), to a district (?) in Naphtali laid waste by Benhadad king of Damascus (1 K. 15:20, $\chi\epsilon\eta\epsilon\rho\theta$ [AL], $\chi\epsilon\eta\epsilon\rho\theta$ [B]). See CITY, § 2 (f), n. The second and third passages need a brief comment. In 1 K. 15:20, Ewald (Hist. 2:299, n. 6) explains 'all Chinneroth' to mean the W. shore of Lake Merom and the Sea of Galilee and of that part of the Jordan which flows between those lakes; Thémis, the basin which extends from Lake Merom to the upper point of the Sea of Galilee. Such a large extent of meaning, however, is improbable. Unless we adopt the correction suggested above (CHINNERETH) it is best to suppose Chinneroth to mean here the shores (or the W. or E. shore alone) of that famous lake. In support of this explanation, the second passage mentioned above (Josh. 11:2) may be appealed to.

The text, however, is not quite correct. The rendering 'in the Arabah south of Chinneroth' (RV) can hardly be defended. The difficulty lies in 22, for which it is better with Di. to read 22 (22, ἀντίκρου); we shall then get the phrase 'in the Arabah over against Chinneroth.' This may be a designation of the fertile plain called el-Chawir, the GENNESARET of the Synoptic Gospels, in which the town of Chinnereth was presumably situated. Cp. GENNESARET, and JUDAH UPON JORDAN.

CHIOS (χίος [Ti. WII]; Chios), the beautiful and fruitful Scio, the central member of the triad of large islands lying off the coast of Asia Minor. It has little connection with biblical history, but the solitary mention of it (Acts 20:15) very clearly indicates its geographical position. Paul returning from Macedonia, to keep Pentecost at Jerusalem, touched at Mitylene in Lesbos; next day he was 'over against' Chios (κατὰπαραπλευρὰν τῆς Χίου); probably somewhere about Cape Argemum mod. Asprokari, which was a place of anchorage (Polyb. 168). On the third day at Samos. The ship evidently anchored each night and sailed with the early morning breeze, which prevails generally in the Aegean during the summer, blowing from the N. and dying away in the afternoon. The run from Mitylene to Chios is something over 50 m. Herod's voyage as related in Jos. Ant. xvi. 22, in the reverse direction, illustrates the apostle's journey.

Strabo describes the town as having a good harbour with anchorage for eighty ships (645). Paul possibly lay becalmed in the channel (about 7 m. wide), and may not have landed. The island was noted for its wines (Strabo, 647, 657). W. J. W.

The position of the place on the main road N., in the pass between Tabor and the hills of Nazareth, explains its strategic value, as witnessed in its various appearances in history.

1. Identifi- cation. סִכּוּת, 'the idolastrale (of)'. These words have long been a puzzle to scholars. The primary question is, whether they should be considered appellatives or proper nouns. The problem is ancient, as appears from the phenomena of the versions (see below, § 2). Into the syntactical and exegetical difficulties of 2:26, taken with its context, we cannot here enter; our object is to consider the explanation of the above-mentioned words offered by Schrader (St. A. 324 ff. [74]), and COT 2:24 f.), which, though widely accepted, fails to satisfy some good critics. According to Schrader's theory סִכּוּת is to be pointed סִכּוּת and כִּיּוֹן, the former representing the divine name Sak-kut, the latter Kaiwan. Oppert had already recognised in Chiun the Babylonian Kaiwan, and this identification may be regarded as almost certain. The word is of frequent occurrence in Babylonian mythological and religious texts as the name of the planet Saturn. It is of uncertain meaning and etymology.

Other Semitic peoples have preserved the same name, probably as loan words, for Saturn is called by the Mandaeans ṣṣṣ, by the Syrians ṣṣṣ, and by the Persians Kaiwan (for references to the occurrence of the word in Babylonian texts, see Jensen, Kosmos, 111 ff.).

The name Siccuth presents much greater difficulties. Schrader has shown that the name Sak-kut, which is probably the same as the Siccuth of the text, is used in a Babylonian list as a name, or an ideographic writing, for the god Ninib (2 R. 57:40). Ninib, however, appears to be the god of the planet Kaiwanu or Saturn (see Jensen, Kosmos, 136 ff.; Lotz, Quest. de hist. Sabbati, 27 ff.). We seem, therefore, to be brought to the conclusion that Sakkuth and Kaiwan are the same (which would be still more clear if it could be shown with certainty that SAG-UŠ, 2 R. 32 no. 3 l. 25, might be read Sak-kut, as Oppert and Schrader believe). Not all the steps in the argument made to connect Sak-kut and Kaiwan are perfectly clear. Still, indirect confirmation of the correctness of the result has lately come to hand, the two words having been found together in a mythological text. In the Sûrpu texts Sak-kut and Kaiwan are invoked together (4 R. 52 col. 4 l. 9; ep Zimmern, Beit. zur Kenntnis der Bab. Rel., 1306, p. 10 l. 179). In this text at least the two words Sak-kut and Kaiwan appear together as they do in Amos.

[Not improbably, according to Che., there is a reference to Saccuth-Kaiwan in 2 K. 17:30 (see Siccuth-Bisorn) and another to Kaiwan in a passage of Ezekiel. 'The image of jealousy' in Ezek. 8:35 is not a possible title; ṣṣṣ seems to be a corruption of ṣṣṣ. The word for 'image' is ṣṣṣ; it was probably a statue of Kaiwan which Ezekiel saw (in ecstasy) 'northward of the altar gate' in the outer court of the temple, unless indeed ṣṣṣ (ibid., § 14) should rather be ṣṣṣ—i.e., tanian, one of the names for the colossal winged bulls which guarded the entrances of Assyrian and Babylonian palaces and temples (cp Ezek. 8:35 where, however, read ṣṣṣ, 'at the entrance,' with Grä. f. ṣṣṣ). At any rate, we now seem to know the period to which the interpolation of Am. 5:26 refers (see further Che., E. J., Times, 10:14, Dec. '93).

The connection of Siccuth and Chiun with the Babylonian name and the ideographic value for the planet Saturn agree well with their juxtaposition in Am. 5:26, and if ṣṣṣ and ṣṣṣ are transposed, the verse becomes at least intelligible (see Schr. ib., and cp Orelli, ad loc.). The phenomena of Q's text, however, and also those of the MT, suggest the inference

2. Text. that there may be a more deeply-seated corruption (see AMOS, § 13). Whether she belonged to Ephesus or to Corinth, who the members of her household were, whether even she was a Christian or not, are questions on all of which only conjectures can be offered. It is possible, but hardly probable, that Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (1 Cor. 16:17) may have been servants of Chloe.

CHOIR. The subject of the hereditary choirs, or better, guilds of singers is considered elsewhere (see

1. Members. PSALMS). We content ourselves here with the Talmudic statements relative to the Temple choir in the narrower sense of the word, postponing, however, the question of choral psalms. The Talmud affirms that the choir in the Second Temple consisted of not less than twelve adult Levites, nine of whom played on the instrument called the Kinnor (lyre?), two on the Nehel (hute?), while the remaining one beat the ṣelselim (cymbals). This number might, however, be exceeded on the occasion of festivals (Mish. Erach. 2:3-5). No statement is made as to the number of the singers whom these musicians accompanied, from which Gratz infers that the instrumental and the vocal music were performed by the same persons. This seems to illustrate Ps. 92:1[2] 3[4] (Che.)—

Good is it to give thanks to Yahvé,
To make melody to the name of the Most High,
To the sound of the horn and the lute,
To the sweetly sounding notes of the lyre.

Certainly the most important duty of the choir of Levites was the service of song. The Talmud also states that boys' voices were called in to modify the deep bass of the men's voices. The choir-boys did not stand on the platform with the Levites, but lower down, so that their heads were on a level with the feet of the Levites. They were sons of persons of rank in Jerusalem ('ṣṣṣ', Talm. Erach. 136). See Gratz, Parthen. 65 f.; Del. Ps. 26 f., 372; and cp MUSTI, § 13 f.

The duty of the choir is briefly summed up in Neh. 12:4 2 Ch. 5:13. It is ṣṣṣ, i.e., to raise the strain of praise (Hallelū=praise ye) and thanksgiving (Hōdū=give ye thanks). See HALLEL, CONFESSION, § 3. The formula of 'thanksgiving which served as a refrain in the later eucharistic songs was, 'For he is good, for his loving-kindness is for ever' (2 Ch. 5:11; 7:36; Ezra 3:11; Jer. 33:11)—the last passage has been expanded by a late writer—and (p the psalms beginning 'Gave thanks unto Yahweh'). Were there any female singers in the temple choirs? From Neh. 7:67 Peritz infers that there were ('Women in the Ancient Hebrew Cult.' JBL 17:148 [98]).

Strange to say, the word 'choirs' occurs but once, and only in RVing. Mattanah (if this mg. is right) was 'over the choirs' (MT מַטָּנָה, Neh. 12:4. Del. (Psalmen 26), Ry., and Kan. (HS), however, give 'choir' as the rendering of מַטָּנָה in Neh. 12:4, where RV has 'companies that gave thanks.' This may be accepted, but the mg. 'choirs' in 12:4 is but a confession of the great improbability of MT. Neither מַטָּנָה nor מַטָּנָה (which Ry. and Kan. prefer) can be naturally defended. Read מַטָּנָה, 'over the thanksgiving' (Blotch, Ol., Guthe). RV in Neh. 12:4, therefore, virtually corrects the text. ἡ ἐν τῶν εὐχαριστίας; ἡ ἐν τῶν εὐχαριστίας (ἐν τῶν εὐχαριστίας). CHORAZIN (חֹרָזַיִן [Ti. WH]) Mt. 11:21 Lk. 10:13. RV (Ch. A) 30:377 (Ch. A). In these two passages Jesus calls upon Chorazin and Bethsaida (and immediately after on Capernaum) as towns in which his wonderful works have produced no effect. From his direct address to all three, they appear to have lain together within his sight. Jerome (OS 11:17 (Chorazin)) places Chorazin 2 R.m. from Capernaum (Euseb. 12 R.m., but this seems a copyist's error). In his commentary on Is. 9:1 Jerome describes the town as on the shore of the lake—like Capernaum, Tiberias, and Bethsaida. From this Robinson (BA 3:359 f.) argues for the site at Tell Hām. But about 1 m. N. of Tell Hām, in a shallow wady running from the Lake into the hills, there are black basalt ruins, including those of a large synagogue, with Corinthian columns, which bear the name Kerazeh (PEF. Mem. 14:102). Now, Willibald (722) says that he went from Capernaum to Bethsaida, thence to Chorazin, and thence to the sources of the Jordan—a course which, in spite of what Robinson asserts, suits Kerazeh as it does not suit either Tell Hām, or any other site on the Lake. Accordingly, most moderns, since Thomson discovered the site in 1857, agree that Kerazeh is Chorazin, and take Jerome's statement as either vague or inaccurate. (Robinson thinks the name may have drifted from Tell Hām to Kerazeh.) Jesus calls Chorazin a city and treats it as comparable with Tyre and Sidon. The ruins are extensive, and there are traces of a paved road connecting the site with the great trunk road from Capernaum to Damascus.

The Bab. Talmud (Menahoth 85a) praises the wheat of Chorazin (cp. Neubauer, Gloss. Palm. 70). In the days of Eusebius and Jerome (10 and 40 A.D.) the place was in ruins. Willibald found a Christian Church there. G. A. S.

Possibly in a poor MS only the final 7 of Malluch and the third name Shemariah were legible, and out of these the scribe made Choshamiah (Ball, Par. Apoc.). Otherwise the name has arisen from Hashum (חֹשָׁמָאוֹס, 2:33; but the Syr. חֹשָׁמָאוֹס still remains a difficulty.

CHRISTIAN, NAME OF

CHRISTIAN, NAME OF. We can readily understand that the followers of Jesus confessed to the name of their Master whenever occasion arose. On the other hand, the time, the place, and the circumstances of the origin of the name Χριστιανός as a specific designation are obscure. According to Acts 11, the matter seems a simple one; but, with this passage before us, it is

1. Infrequency. remarkable how seldom the name occurs elsewhere in the records of early Christianity. In the NT the only other places where it is found are Acts 26:28 and 1 Pet. 4:6. It is certainly not alluded to in Acts 5:4; for 'the name' on account of which the apostles here suffer dishonour was, as we are expressly told in 7:42, the name of Jesus. This passage, accordingly, belongs to the same category as Mk. 9:17 ff. where, besides, the words 'because ye are Christ's' after ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι μου (so Ti.) may be merely the explanatory marginal gloss of some early reader—and Mk. 13:12. In Ja. 2:7 also, the 'honourable name' by which the readers are called is not the name 'Christian,' but the name of Christ himself as their Lord; for the expression is to be explained in the same sense as Am. 9:12 ('the heathen, which are called by my name')—viz., by reference to 2 S. 12:28 ('lest . . . it be called after my name'). All passages of this class must here be left out of account, inasmuch as they do not presuppose the specific name 'Christian.' The name is presupposed, as far as the NT is concerned, only in Lk. 8:22 (τὸ ὄνομα ὁμοῦ).

Outside of the NT, according to the exhaustive searches of Lipsius, the name does not occur in either of the epistles ascribed to Clement of Rome; it is absent from Barnabas, Hermas, Polycarp, the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies, Tatian, and the Cohortatio ad Graecos. The Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions, as also the Catholic Acts of Peter and Paul, have it only in a few passages of later insertion; so also with the Gnostic writings. As a word in regular use it makes its earliest appearances in the Apologists—Justin, Athenagoras, Theophilus, Minucius Felix—and in the 'Epistle to Diognetus,' in Ignatius, who uses also the word Χριστιανισμός, in the 'Martyrdom of Polycarp,' in the Catholic ἑκκλησιαστικὴ Πίστις, in the letter of the churches of Lugdunum and Vienna (Eus. HE 5:1 f.), in Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria. To this list must be added the passage in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (124), discovered after the publication of Lipsius's essay.

Lipsius, it is true, points out allusions to the existence of the name 'Christian' in older writings. As far as Hermas, however, is concerned, the only valid passage is Sim. ix. 174.

The phrase is ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ καλεῖσθαι. Such expressions as τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ φορεῖν (ix. 132 f., 145 f., 163) or ἀμφιβαλεῖν (ix. 137) or φορεῖν (Polycarp, 6:1) do not necessarily presuppose the word Χριστιανός, and the simple phrase τὸ ὄνομα φορεῖν (Sim. ix. 132 f.), or παύσαι διὰ τὸ ὄνομα, or εἶναι τοῦ ὀνόματος (ix. 283 f.; 1 Tr. iii. 102 f.), in several places is clearly in juxtaposition to the words τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ or τοῦ κυρίου (Sim. ix. 133 f., 282 f.; 1 Tr. iii. 53).

Even 1 Clem. 11:1 f. cannot with certainty be taken in the sense which is so abundantly plain in Justin (1 Tr. 14): Χριστιανοὶ εἶναι κατηγοροῦμεθα· τὸ δὲ ἡμεῖς μαρτυροῦμεν οὐ δικαίον. This play upon words seems, besides, to be sufficiently explained by the consideration that χρηστὸς had at that time the same pronunciation as χριστός. Tertullian (Ap. 3; Ad Nat. 1), however, expressly says that the Gentiles perperam or concrepente pronounced it Christiani. Χριστιανοὶ is the reading in all three NT passages of the uncorrected S., it preponderates in the inscriptions; and Justin, according to Blass (Hermes, 1895, pp. 465-470), associates this word with χρηστὸς in his Apologie (i. 446 f.; ii. 6, where, as he says, καυχῆσθαι ought to be read), just as in his Dialogue with Trypho he associates it with χρίμα. Blass con-lectures from this that the Pagans to whom the Apology is addressed had derived the words 'anointed,' followers of the anointed,' which were mysterious to them, by a popular etymology from χριστός and Justin, for simplicity's sake, accepted the derivation without seeking to correct it.

We have thus seen that the name was left unused by a series of Christian writers at a time when it was already familiar to the younger Pliny (Epist. 10.96 [97]) in 112 A.D., to Tacitus (Ann. 15.44) in 116-117 A.D., and to Suetonius (Nero, 16) in 120 A.D. The plain fact is that they did not need it. For designating their community there lay at their command an ample variety of expressions, such as 'brethren,' 'saints,' 'elect,' 'called,' 'that believed,' 'faithful,' 'disciples,' 'they that are in Christ,' 'they that are in the Lord,' 'they that are Christ's,' and 'many' of the way' (1). It follows that, notwithstanding its absence from their writings, the name of Christian may very well have originated at a comparatively early time.

It can hardly, however, have been current at so early a date as that indicated in Acts 11.26.

The famine predicted at that time, according to Acts 11.28, occurred in Palestine between the years 44 and 48. (The belief that it extended over the whole of the habitable world is a mistake.) The prediction itself must, of course, have been earlier. Indeed, the expression, 'which came to pass in the days of Claudius,' may be held to imply that it was made before the accession of that emperor—that is to say, before 41 A.D. With this it agrees that the death of Herod Agrippa I. (44 A.D.) is mentioned in the following chapter (12).

Some fifteen years later, or more, the claim to be 'of Christ' was made by a single party in Corinth (1 Cor. 1.12).

Presumably certain personal disciples of Jesus had first applied this designation to themselves, whilst denying to Paul the right to be so called, as also his right to the apostleship (2 Cor. 10.7). Paul, on the other hand, takes great pains to establish the right of all believers in Christ to the designation (1 Cor. 1.3-2.3; also 7.24-10.23; Rom. 8.1 Gal. 3.27-2.24).

Thus it can hardly have been already a current name.

As for Jesus himself, it is permissible to doubt whether he used in their presence such expressions as we now find in Mk. 9.37-41. 31-34—that is to say, with the emphasis upon his own name. The theory that he presupposes the currency of the name 'Christians' in Lk. 6.22 is absolutely excluded by the consideration that, according to the same gospel, he does not himself lay claim to the name of Christ till later (9.20), and even then wishes it to be kept secret, and further that, according to the same author (Acts 11.26), the name 'Christians' did not arise till a considerable time after his death.

All this makes it more than doubtful whether the writer had even here any trustworthy authority for assigning the occurrence to so early a date. His reason for doing so may have been simply that the founding of the first Gentile Christian church seemed to be the most likely occasion for its coming into use.

The suddenness with which the name 'Christian' becomes one of frequent occurrence in the writings of the apologists shows that the word first became necessary for Christians in their dealings with Pagans. In speaking to the latter, such periphrases as 'those of Christ' were found to be inadequate; a definite name was wanted.

In fact, it is probable enough that the name came from the heathen themselves in the first instance. With such a view of its origin Acts 11.26 fits in very well. At all events, the name did not come from the Jews. These were still looking for their Messiah. By using a name which signified 'those of the Messiah,' they would by implication have justified the sect that regarded Jesus as such, and so have stultified themselves. Even Herod Agrippa II. notwithstanding his Greek training and the indifference towards his ancestral religion which this carried with it, could not have gone so far; moreover, he still held by Judaism to the extent at least that he insisted upon King Azizus of Emesa and King Polemo of Cilicia being circumcised before being allowed to marry his sisters Drusilla and Berenice (Jos. Ant. 18.7-11. 84-139, 145-7). If, accordingly, the saying attributed to him in Acts 26.28¹ is authentic, the name 'Christian' must by that time have become so thoroughly established that its etymological meaning was no longer thought of.

The whole scene, however, is in full accord with the tendency of Acts (see Acts, § 51) to set forth Paul's innocence and at the same time the truth of Christianity, as accepted by the Roman authorities, and this of course is more effectively done by the mouth of a Jew. An obvious parallel is the statement of Herod Antipas in the gospel by the same author (Lk. 23.6-11), but its historicity is open to grave suspicion, both in view of what we know of Herod's relations to John the Baptist and in view of the fact that the story is absent from the other gospels. Even if Paul's meeting with Herod Agrippa II. is historical, the word Χριστιανός may very easily have come into the narrative out of the author's own vocabulary. We are informed by the same writer (Acts 21.39) with much greater precision that 'a sect of the Nazarenes' (οἱ καὶ τῶν Ναζωραίων) was the name given by the Jews to the Christians, as we learn also from Tertullian (Adv. Marc. 1.1) and Jerome (encl. 5.4. 497-525). It was not till afterwards that the expression was restricted to a particular sect of Christians—a fact by which Ippolitus allowed himself to be misled. He tells us (Adv. 29.4) that the Jews, in their public prayer, which were offered three times daily in their synagogues, pronounced a solemn curse upon this sect, a curse which, as we learn from Justin (Dial. 16 and elsewhere), and indeed as we see from the nature of the case, applied rather to all Christians.² Its Hebrew name, Bakat has Minin, shows that the Jews had still another name for the Christians—and this name could also be traced into Mevana.

As for the place where the name 'Christian' arose, the apparent Latin termination used to be thought to point to a western, indeed to a Gallic (Ann. 15.44) or a Roman, origin; but that it was there that the name first came into use is by no means said by Tacitus, whilst in such a word as Herodian, Ἡγεμόνας (Mk. 3.6 and elsewhere), we have evidence that in the Greek-speaking domain this colloquial Latin formation of personal names (e.g., Cæsarion), in innumerable instances of forms like Pompeianum (where the n is part of the root), was not unknown. The ancient Greek grammarians recognise the termination -ανός for derivatives from town and country names, and even designate it specially as the τοπος Ἀσιατικός, as being met with, not in Greece itself, but in Asia (Bauermann, Ant. Gr. Sprachlehre, § 119.51; many examples in Lapsus, 13-16). In this matter, therefore, Acts 11.26 is not open to criticism (yet see above, § 2).

The time at which the name arose could not with assurance be placed earlier than 70 A.D., even if a certain inscription (which disappeared soon after its discovery) at Pompeii, on the wall of a building at first supposed to have been a Christian meeting-house, had actually contained the letters ΧΡΙΣΤΙΑΝΕ.

This reading might very well have been a derivative from the relatively frequent proper name Christus (see above, § 10); but, in point of fact, the reading is only a conjecture, and, according to Kiehl's original transcription (which is still extant), the word really was evangelica—whatever that may mean.

The architecture of the house shows it to have been an 'inn' (κατακλιτήριον), provided even with a cella mensæ tricla, where, accordingly, it is hardly likely that Christian

¹ The best-attested reading, ἐν δόξῃ με περὶ τοῦ Χριστιανισμοῦ ποιεῖται unless we are to read, with TK, γενεθαι or, with A, περὶ or, to conjecture with Hort, πεποιθας (instead of με περὶ) is perhaps most easily explained as a Latinism: 'you are persuading me somewhat to act the part of a Christian' (Christianum agere; so Potwin, *Bibl. meetings would have been held, in fact, the inscription, which begins with the words, 'Vine Nervii,' was probably an advertisement of wines.¹

An answer to our question can therefore be hoped for only from examination of the history of the Christian persecutions.

6. Early persecutions.

The character of these has been placed in an entirely new light by the proposition of Mommsen in 1835 (Röm. Gesch. 5, 29, n. 1) which has since then been more fully and elaborately developed by him in Schell's Hist. Latine 34 (1842) [90], and accepted by C. J. Neumann (Der röm. Staat u. d. Ant. u. Kr. des 1, 6 [90]) and by Ramsay (chap. 10, § 5) —that 'the persecution of the Christians was always similar to that of robbers.' On this view, every provincial governor had, without special instructions, the duty of seeking out and bringing to justice latrones, raptoribus, phrygionibus (kidnappers), and heretici (Aug. 1, 18, 1, 134) and for this end was invested, over and above his ordinary judicial attributes, with a very full power of material coercion, which was not limited to definite offences, or to a regular form of process, or to any fixed scale of punishments. Only, as far as Roman citizens were concerned, flogging was forbidden, and the capital penalty was reserved for the judgment of the emperor.

1. Legal Status of Christianity. — While actually throwing into still further obscurity the date of the origin of the Christian name, this discovery of Mommsen's (above, § 6) sheds much light upon the question of legal position. The points on which the scholars differed, as well as others, are agreed are, briefly, these. — Among the duties of a Roman citizen a fundamental place was held by that of worshipping the ancestral gods. By these in the earliest period were meant only those of the city of Rome; but subsequently those of Latium were included, and finally all those of Italy and Greece, as soon as they had been formally recognised by the senate. Non-citizens were forbidden by decree of the senate to worship strange gods but not to worship them, so far as this did not appear to be of danger to the state. The Christian religion, however, was held to be dangerous in this way, as denying the existence of the gods of the state. The Jewish religion was, strictly, under the same ban; and, therefore, circumcision was laid under severe penalties by Hadrian, and, as far as non-Jews were concerned, by Antoninus Pius and Septimius Severus also.

For themselves, however, the Jews, apart from the prohibition by Hadrian just mentioned, possessed religious freedom on the ground of special privileges conceded to them, particularly by Julius Caesar and Augustus, in accordance with the favoured position they had enjoyed, long before the Roman rule, in Egypt and elsewhere in the East. These privileges included exemption from military service, which would have interfered with their strict observance of the sabbath, and exemption from the obligation to appear before the courts on that day. When Caesar, on account of suspected political activity, suppressed cuncta collegia praeter antipatras constituta (Suet. Cæs. 42), the Jews were expressly exempted. New corporations in the older (i.e., senatorial) provinces required the sanction of the senate; in the imperial provinces still under military government that of the emperor himself was doubtless sufficient. It is probable that burial societies had a general sanction from the senate. Apart from these, however, there were many societies which had never obtained any special concession. They were left alone if they did not appear to be dangerous; but at any moment they could be oppressed by the police. In the cases of those which had been sanctioned by the senate, suppression was illegal.

only by a new senatorial decree. Now the Christians could never have obtained such a concession for their religion did not belong to the class of permitted religions. In their case, accordingly, the well-known rule (Aug. 1, 18, 22) did not apply: permitteretur componibus stuprum menstruum confere, dum tamen senes in mensa coeant (i.e., sed) religionis causa non prohibetur, dum tamen per hoc non fiat contumacia, consultum, quo dicitur collegia arcetur. They had, therefore, to hold their meetings simply on sufferance, and were never for a moment free from the risk of police interference. Still, they did not expose themselves to persecution or to death merely by holding unauthorised meetings. For such an offence the penalties were much too severe. When a collegium of this sort was broken up, unless its object had been in itself criminal, the members were subjected only to a mild punishment. In fact, they were allowed to divide among themselves the funds of the society, which were confiscated in the case of all capital offences.

Persecution and capital punishment fell to the lot of the Christians, therefore, only because their religion was regarded as criminal. In the case of Roman citizens it implied a violation of the duty to worship the gods of the state; in the case of provincials who were not citizens, atheism as against the local gods of the place was in like manner implied. In a (legally) very lax sense they were accused of incelestium, which originally meant only theft of sacred objects. Over and above this, all Christian subjects were chargeable with the offence of refusing to worship the Emperor, an offence legally construed as maiestas, or crimen lese majestatis—more precisely, as maiestas imperatorum—the maiestas populi Romani not being touched by this class of offences. Thus, either as sacrilege or as maiestas, Christianity could at all times be prosecuted, and—certainly in the case of non-citizens, probably also in that of citizens—by the mere exercise of arbitrary coercive power. The penalties under either charge were, approximately, the same.

ii. Correspondence of Pliny and Trajan. — Thus we gain a new light on the correspondence between Pliny and Trajan (see above, § 2). Let it be premised that by the legisla (2), as may be gathered from the allusion in the words abom. promiscuum et immor. (7), were certainly intended the epulae Thyestae and the convivium Oedipolei, which, as we learn from Justin (Apol. 1, 6, 212) and other writers of the second century, were laid to the charge of the Christians. A. 1820 already appears to be intended to meet the familiar accusation. The story ran that before the beginning of these orgies all lights were put out. Pliny's question, then, whether the mere fact of being Christian (Christianus), or whether only the crimes associated therewith ought to be punished, is, from what we have seen, already answered in the first sense, and is so decided by Trajan also. On the other hand, Trajan's injunction, conferendi non sunt, with which also is to be associated his order to disregard anonymous letters of accusation, is an important mitigation of the law, as is his other direction that a Christian who formally renounces his Christianity by sacrificing to the images of the gods shall be exempt from punishment. Such a degree of favour could, from the nature of the case, never be shown to the robber or to the thief, with whom, nevertheless, the Christian is classed. Let it be noted, also, that Pliny had no difficulty in deciding on his own responsibility the earlier cases that came before him (1-4). His reference of the matter to the emperor was first occasioned by the largeness of the number of those who ultimately came to be denounced, and by certain leanings, on grounds of policy, towards clemency (4, 9, f.), to which Trajan gives his sanction by both of his decisions.

We must, therefore, no longer hold to the view that in this rescript (which, although originally intended only for Phry, was shortly afterwards published, along with the whole correspondence, and taken as a norm by other provincial governors) the persecution of the Christians was now for the first time authorized. Accordingly, we must proceed to investigate such notices as we have of earlier persecutions, and especially to discuss the question whether in these cases the nomen christianum was known to the authorities and constituted the ground of accusation.

iii. Claudius.—Of Claudius we are informed by Suetonius (ibid. 25) that Iudaea imperatore christi a seculis tumultuantes Roma expulsi. It is quite impossible, however, to determine whether by christi (in the form of the name, see above, § 1) we are here to understand Jesus, the preaching of whom by Christians divided the Jews in Rome into two parties, or whether Suetonius conceived him to have been personally present in Rome, or whether we should take him to be a Jewish agitator of whom nothing further is known. Acts 18.2 is by no means decisive for the first or the second alternative, even if we are to suppose that Aquila and Prisca were already Christians when they came to Corinth.

iv. Pomponia Gracina.—Of Pomponia Gracina we learn from Tacitus (Ann. 13.42) only that in 57 A.D. she was accused superstitiosis externis, and that she was acquitted of the charge by her husband, the consular A. Plautius, before whom she had been brought for trial. At that time, however, the Jewish and Egyptian religions were regarded as foreign, just as much as the Christian, which has been supposed to be meant in her case (Fac. Ann. 2.85; Suet. Tib. 36). For full details see Hasenclaver, JPT, 1882, pp. 47-64.

v. Neronian Persecution.—The notices we have of the Neronian persecution are very obscure.

Tacitus (Ann. 15.44) says: 'abolendo rumor (of having planned the burning of Rome) Nero subdidit res et quæstibus penis affect, quos per tacita invidios vultus Christiani appellabant . . . primum corrum, qui favebant, deinde ad totam multitudinem hominum primum in crimine accendit quam odio generis humani contineri solent. Cognosce hanc could mean only that the ingens multitudo was added to the primum corrupti (Ramsay, chap. 11, § 1); the reading cognosce for connotis is a conjectural emendation almost universally adopted.

At the outset the only thing quite clear is that the Christians were from the first accused not as Christians, but as incendiaries. Otherwise Nero could not have been freed from the suspicion of being the guilty party. The Christians, however, were innocent (subditi); and the ground on which they were condemned, accordingly, was not so much (hanc proinde) the evidence that they had been incendiaries as the odium generis humani. By this expression there cannot be understood a hatred of which they were the objects; Roman society, which alone could be regarded as cherishing it, cannot possibly have been spoken of as genus humanum by Tacitus. Still, understood as cherished by the Christians, 'hatred of the human race' is no less an idea foreign to all legal conceptions, nor could it be supposed to represent another ground of accusation against them, over and above that of incendiarism.

Weizsäcker (Ap. Zeitsch. 478, 2nd ed. 462; ET 2143) and Ramsay (chap. 11, §§ 2-4) try indeed to make out that this actually was brought as a charge against them by referring to Suetonius (Nero 16): *apliciti supplicio Christiani, genus hominum superstitionis nove ac malefice, holding that by magic, witchcraft and poisoning are meant, and that it was precisely for these offences against society that the two punishments bestia obici and crucibus affigi were threatened, and (according to Tacitus) inflicted. These same punishments, however, were attached to many other crimes also. Suetonius says nothing about the conflagration as having occasioned the accusation against the Christians. In other words, he follows an entirely different account, and we are not justified in seeking to explain Tacitus by referring to Suetonius. The two authors agree only in believing that the occurrence in question was confined to Rome.*

The main question, then, in the case of Tacitus, is as to what it was that the persons first accused made confession of (fatebantur). The answer seems to be to our hand: se incendium fecisse. Such a confession may very well have been made by them, though innocent, under torture. As regards the ingens multitudo nothing more was required than merely some vague suspicions, or a few false witnesses, to whom the judges, on account of the commonly assumed general perversity of the Christians (their odium generis humani), were only too ready to give credence. There remains, therefore, a possibility that the religion of the accused did not come into question at all, and that Tacitus and Suetonius have, unhistorically, carried back the name christiani from their own time into that of Nero. Were this not so, the reader, moreover, would expect to find in Tacitus a name indicating the characteristic attribute of those denoted by it, after *quos per se, ut in istis legibus, one would expect not christianos but some such expression as flagitiosus appellabit.*

Another interpretation of fatebantur is not less possible. It is that at first only those who had already voluntarily confessed themselves liable to be burnt (fatebantur) were taken into account, and that only afterwards, on the evidence obtained from these in the course of the legal proceedings, a great number (ingens multitudo) of those who had not hitherto made any such public profession shared the same fate. The Christians were laid hold of because it was hoped that popular belief would readily attribute the incendiarism to them. Although, on this supposition also, their religion constituted no ground of accusation, it was recognised as distinct from the Jewish, whereas if the other interpretation of fatebantur is adopted the Christians may have been regarded simply as Jews. Tacitus (Hist. 5.5) attributes adversus omnes civitates to the Jews also.

Clement of Rome further (i. 5.6-11) tells us only that the Christians suffered, without informing us why; and Paul's trial in Rome could throw light upon the question before us only if we knew what was its result. Calpurnius was not led by the accusation, as cited in Acts 18.12, to suppose that Paul taught a religion dangerous to the state. The representation, too (though not necessarily the fact), is open to suspicion on account of the 'tendency' observable in Acts (see Acts, § 511). In a word, the little that we really know of the Neronian period does not enable us to come to a decision on the question as to the date and origin of the name 'Christian.'

Ramsay, however (chap. 11, §§ 26-27), considers that in the second stage the Neronian persecution was permanent, otherwise than in the first stage. As the persecution is mentioned by Suetonius along with other measures of justice which must have been of a permanent nature, he holds that it must have had the same character; in the second stage, of course, the persecution was not on account of incendiarism, but on account of alleged witchcraft and other flagitia. Tacitus, Ramsay believes, also gives proof of this permanence of the persecution under Nero when he says, unde . . . miseratio oritur tanquam in nuntiatu publico sed in servitium unius a sumerantur; and Sulpicius Severus (ii. 293) is understood to speak to the same effect—hoc inter Christianos servitium capium: post etiam datis legibus et legibus palamque edictis propositis Christianum esse non licebat. Immediately upon this, however (ii. 121; 3rd ed. pp. 244, 255), Ramsay explains that the word post refers to other emperors than Nero, and also concedes that the expressions edicta and leges are 'loosely and inaccurately' employed by Sulpicius. Further, the note in Tacitus traces the miseratio to the horrors of the public celebration of the exco and Nero's personal participation in them—incidents which were, of course, not of constant recurrence. The argument based on the content in Suetonius is too precarious to rest history upon, even apart from the doubtful interpretation of ma.

vii. Titus and Vespasian.—We read in Sulpicius Severus (ii. 306.8) that, in a council of war, Titus finally decided on the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem quo plentius Iudæorum et Christianorum religio tolleretur: quippe has religiones fidei contrarias sibi, isdem tamen (ibi) archibus protectas; Christianos ex Iudæis exstitisse: radice sublati stritem facile perituros. Now, even were we to reject, as a falsification of history from motives of complaisance, the very different statement of Josephus, an eye-witness (B. J. vi. 43-7), that Titus wished the temple to be preserved, and were we to carry back the words of Sulpicius Severus to Tacitus, whom he elsewhere always follows, we should still be a long way from having proved the account of Severus to be historical. It is in the highest degree improbable that Titus had such erroneous ideas as to the dependence of the Christians on the temple, while attributing to them such dangerous qualities and so great a degree of independence as apart from the Jews. Even Mommsen (Röm. Gesch. 539; ET Provinc., 220 f.), on whose authority Ramsay relies, detects here traces at least of a Christian editor. Ramsay, however (chap. 12 f.), regarding the speech as a programme for treatment of Christians, holds it to be 'a historical document of the utmost importance,' and further assumes that the programme was actually carried out by Vespasian. For this he has not a word of proof to allege apart from the statement of Suetonius (l.c. 15)—neque eorum usquam unquam letatus est et (by the three last words he conjecturally fills a hiatus) iustus supplicis illicrimavit etiam et v. emittit—which, he considers, we are entitled to interpret as referring to processes against Christians. Were this the case, it would be natural at least to expect that these should have begun immediately after the destruction of the temple; but, according to Ramsay, they did not begin till towards the end of the reign of Vespasian. As far as the documents are concerned, this last hypothesis finds still less support than that of Vespasian's Christian persecution as a whole. All that can be said for the hypothesis is that it is requisite in order that, by the shortness of the persecution under Vespasian, the silence of Christian writers respecting them may be explained (see below, § 10).

vii. Domitian.—With regard to Domitian, Suetonius (Dom. 15) tells us that eight months before his death Flavianum Clementem patrem suum contemptissimè invertebat . . . repente a tenuissima suspitione tantum non in ipso ejus conspectu interemit. Cassius Dio (lxvii. 14 f.), according to the excerpt of the monk Xiphilinus, adds that at the same time his wife, Flavia Domitilla, was banished to the island of Pandataria: ἐπὶ τὴν δὲ ἀφῶν ἐγκλῆσα ἀπὸ τῆς ἡμέρας ἧς καὶ ἄλλοι ἐς τὰ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἤθη ἐξέκειντο πολλοὶ κατεδικάζονταν. Now, Christian legend, and in particular the Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions and Homilies, speak of Flavia Clementis as Bishop of Rome, and of his father as, like the consular in Suetonius, related to the imperial family; the daughter of his sister (also called Flavia Domitilla) became involved in a Christian persecution, and was banished to Pontia (the island adjacent to Pandataria). This last statement is all the more important because Eusebius (Chron. ann. 2110, 2112 Abrab.; HE iii. 184) takes it from a heathen chronographer, Bruttius or Bruttius, who wrote before 221 A.D. For further details see Lipsius, Chronol. d. röm. Bischöfe, 152-161. It is alike natural and difficult to assume that Clement and Domitilla represent each only one person, and that person a Christian. The charges in Cassius Dio, taken by themselves alone, show either that the question was one not of Christians but of Jews, or that Christians at that time still remained undistinguished from Jews. The view that they were Jews can hardly be maintained.

In the heathen writer Bruttius, Domitilla figures expressly as a Christian, and in all later Christian writings Domitian is represented as a violent persecutor of the faith (see, e.g., Melito ap. Euseb. HE iv. 260). He is called by Tertullian (Apol. 5) fortio Veronis de crudelitate; and though the heathen Juvenal (137 f.) it is true, says something to the same effect, the Christian bases his accusation expressly upon the persecution of his brethren in the faith.

We are, then, left with the second interpretation of the words of Cassius Dio, that they relate to Christians. Ramsay's method of evading this (chap. 12, § 4) is surely forced—that in Dio's time (211-222 A.D.) it was 'a fashion and an affectation among a certain class of Greek men of letters to ignore the existence of the Christians and to pretend to confuse them with the Jews.' Further, in the collection of temple money

(now a state tax) from the Jews, according to Suetonius (Dom. 12), those also were taken account of qui vel improfessi Iudaeum viderent vitam (or: Iudaeum fidem simulum creverent vitam) vel dissimulato origine imposta genti tributa non pendissent. As at that time the Iudaeus fidei acerbis sume actus est, it would be very remarkable if here we were not intended to understand both the Jewish Christians regarded as circumcised persons and the Gentile Christians regarded as proselytes. The Roman officers, we know from Suetonius, in cases where it was necessary, satisfied themselves as to the fact of circumcision by inspection. Even though greed may well have been a motive for conniving at the profession of the Christian religion, it is plain that the danger to the state presented by the Christians cannot have been taken very seriously.

We are led to the same conclusion by the story (as far as it can be believed) of Hegesippus (in Euseb. HE 312 f.) that Domitian released the grandchildren of Jude, the brother of Jesus, as not being dangerous persons, although they confessed themselves to be not only descendants of David, but also Christians. It was not till the end of his reign that the persecution began.

viii. Nerva.—As far as the accusations under Domitian had reference to Christians they are covered by the regulations of Nerva (Cassius Dio, lxviii. 12, after Xiphilinus).

Tertullian (Apol. 5) and Hegesippus (Euseb. HE iii. 20-5) erroneously attribute the regulations to Domitian himself. The text of Cassius Dio is: τοὺς τε κραιόμενους ἐπ' ἀρετῇ ἀφῆκε καὶ τοὺς θεοφρονεῖς καταργᾷ . . . τοὺς δὲ δὴ ἄλλους οὐτ' ἀσβεστῶς οὐτ' Ἰουδαίου βίου κατατάσσεται τινας συνεχωρήσεν.

The preceding discussion of the Christian persecutions makes it evident that the grounds upon which these were conducted were by no means clearly set forth, and that (partly on this account, but mainly from want of information) we can hardly venture to suppose the persecutions to have been of so great frequency as we should have expected on the principles laid down by Mommsen and Ramsay. In particular, had they been so frequent, the hesitation of Pliny—or, at all events, that of Trajan—would be quite inexplicable. Ramsay's answer (chap. 10, § 6), that Trajan's words neque enim in universum aliquid quasi certam formam habet constitui potest—refer to Pliny's doubt whether or not the question of age should be allowed to make a difference in the punishment, is quite inadmissible. Neque enim does not refer to the decision upon a matter which was still in question. It refers, in commendation, to a judgment which Pliny had already taken: actum quem debuisti . . . servatus es. Thus Ramsay's conjectures of some archive which Trajan caused to be searched for the decisions of his predecessors upon previous references by other procurators must also be rejected. Whatever the principles of the government, and however strongly they may have led, if rigidly interpreted, to attempting search for and punishment of Christians once these had been definitely distinguished from Jews, they can have been carried into practice only in an intermittent way. In the conditions of privacy in which, as we know, the Christians carried out the exercises of their religion, no direct danger to the state can have manifested itself. In Pergamum Antipas was the only martyr (Rev. 213).

Therefore, Trajan's conquerendi non sunt was a mitigation in principle, indeed, but not necessarily in practice. If only parties could be found to denounce, persecutions could be instituted, after Trajan's time, on a much greater scale than before under the influence of the stricter—but seldom used—principle of conquerere. Such, according to all documents, was in reality the case.

For the period before Trajan we know of persecutions only under Nero and Domitian. Tertullian, for example, was not aware of any others (Apol. 8), and Melito in his Apology (1) Antoninus Euseb. (ap. Euseb. HE iv. 260) expressly says that only Nero and Domitian (πονοὶ παλαιῶν Νερού καὶ Δουνατιανού) had given up the Christians to the slanders of denouncers. For the same purpose we have the statement of Origen (C. Cel. 38) that ὁμοῖοι κατὰ καιροὺς καὶ σφόδρα ἐναρπάζοντο . . . τῆς ἐκείνης over against which the πολλὴ πλῆθος ἐκκλησίαν spoken of by Clement of Rome (i. 54) in the reign of Nero, and the μεγίστη μὲν πλῆθος of Tacitus, must, of course, not be overlooked.

In view of such definite statements as these, it is not possible to explain the silence of our authors—especially that of Christian authors—on the persecutions which Ramsay infers to have been instituted under Vespasian and Titus, as being due only to the shortness of those reigns—or rather the shortness of the portions of them in which persecutions occurred (above, § 6, vi, end)—or to the fact that the Christians had no eyes for anything except the imminent end of the world (Ramsay, chap. 12, § 2).

Ramsay, it is true, finds support by assigning 1 Pet. to about the year 80 A.D.—that is to say, the reign of Titus (chap. 13, 13)—or to 75-79 A.D., in the reign of Vespasian (Expositor, Oct. 1893, p. 286). He does so, however, on grounds the validity of which depends on that of his hypothesis. He shows with truth that the epistle presupposes persecutions on account of the mere nomen Christianum (4.15 f.), and that it was composed at the beginning of a persecution (1.2, 3.14, 17, 2.14). It has also been rightly noted that there is no reason for assigning it to the year 112 on the mere ground that then for the first time a persecution of Christians over the whole οικουμένη (5.9) became possible. On the other hand, before that date there had been no persecution which had touched or threatened the provinces named in 1.1 and gave cause to anticipate its extension over the whole habitable world.

When the contents of this letter are considered, no one who can be reached by critical considerations will unreservedly maintain its genuineness, containing as it does so little that is characteristic of Peter and so much that is reminiscent of Paul. The presence in 1.17 of the words διεσπορά and δοκιμὴ, which here are superfluous and disturbing, and have their appropriate place only in Ja. 1.13, shows its dependence on that epistle, which in its turn depends not only on the Epistles of Paul but also on that to the Hebrews (11.3, cp. Ja. 2.25). Dependence on James is shown also in 1 Pet. 5.5 f., which is borrowed from Ja. 1.6 f. In the latter passage the ὄψις is logical (ὁδοὶ 4.1 . . . ὁδοί), and in the former, therefore, in like manner, the ἀλλήλοις of 2.5 should have been followed by some such expression as 'submit yourselves one to another,' if the writer had been following a natural and not a borrowed train of thought.

As for the word ἀλλοτριοπισκόπος, the only satisfactory explanation of its use in 1 Pet. 4.15, to denote a criminal of the same class as φονεὺς and ἀνέμους, is that of Hilgenfeld, according to whom what is intended is the class of ἀνιχνεύς, who made a trade of denunciation, which was first made criminal by Trajan (Plin. Panegy. 34 f.). By ἀλλοτριοπισκόπος Ramsay understands people who stir up strife between members of the same family, or between servants and masters. This accusation could be very easily brought against Christians, as soon as they began to attempt conversions. Ramsay's assertion, however, that Nero gave power to the courts of justice thenceforward to regard such persons as magicians and to punish them as criminals (chap. 151), rests upon no documentary evidence; it proceeds solely upon his own interpretation of the malefactor of Suetonius (above, § 6, v.). Nor has Ramsay made out (chap. 8, §§ 1, 2, pp. 280 f., 290) that 1 Pet. presupposes search for Christians to have been made by the state.

Were this so, the epistle could, of course, have been written only either before Trajan's decision, conquiescenti non sunt, or after the re-enactment of conquisitio by Marcus Aurelius; but here again it has to be remarked that, if only there were denunciations on—Ramsay himself (chap. 10, § 2) is aware how readily these could at any time appear among the class of sellers of sacrificial animals (Pliny to Trajan, 10), or among people in the position of Demetrius (Acts 19.24-25), or of the masters of the household with the spirit of divination (1 Pet. 3.15-16) become intelligible enough, even after the publication of Trajan's conquiescenti non sunt.

We may still hold, therefore, that 1 Pet. was written in 112 A.D.

The one new thing we have learned is that, when 1 Pet. touches upon the subject of punishment for the mere name of Christian (1.16), it is describing not a new attitude of the authorities but one that they have been taking for some time. This very fact makes it impossible to use this passage as Ramsay does as fixing the date of the epistle for the transition period during which punishment of Christians only for flagitia was giving place to a system of persecution for the mere name. Ramsay (chap. 13, § 1) argues that this last mode of persecution must have been new to the author, and that at the same time his language constantly presupposes the continuance of the old state of things; that the exhortation 1.15 that none should suffer as a Christian is present is not in any case out of place, even if flagitia had not theretofore been the only ground on which the punishment of Christians proceeded; against such flagitia Paul also constantly warns his readers (Gal. 5.19-21; 1 Cor. 6.9 f.; 2 Cor. 12.21; Rom. 13.13), and that at a time when there was no thought of Christian persecution. Further, the hope of being able by 'seemly behaviour' and 'good works' to convince the secular power of the injustice of persecution (1 Pet. 2.12, 13, etc.) is one that Christians can never have wholly abandoned, and it found a reasonable justification in the plea of Pliny (27.10) for mild treatment of those who had been denounced. We can understand its persistence most easily on the assumption, as made above, that persecution was only then beginning.

The very positions argued for by Mommsen (and accepted by Ramsay) make it clear that there never had been a period during which

9. Conclusion. Christians, although recognised as a distinct religious society, were punished for flagitia merely, and not on account of the nomen. The strength of Mommsen's view lies precisely in this: that the name, as soon as it was known, also became punishable. According to Mommsen, we must also conclude, conversely, that where flagitia alone are punished the nomen is not yet known. Even for the time of Nero this argumentation would be conclusive, had he not wanted incendiaries. But if, as Ramsay says, Christians under Nero were already recognised as distinct from Jews, then flagitia other than fire-raising—as, for example, witchcraft—cannot, even in the second stage of the Neronian persecution (on the assumption of there having been such a stage at all), have been the sole ground on which condemnation proceeded. On the question as to the date at which Christianity first began to be recognised as a distinct religion we must confess ourselves completely at a loss. Only this much is certain: that it had come about before the time of Pliny's governorship. From what has been said above, the view of Neumann (and Lipsius) appears the most plausible: the view, namely, that the distinction first received recognition under Domitian, and, more precisely, in the last year of his reign. To this Weizsäcker and others object, with good reason, that it is highly improbable that Christians should have passed for Jews so long. The simple facts that they did not accept circumcision, and frequented, not the synagogues but meeting-places of their own, and more often came into conflict with the Jews, made the recognition of a distinction inevitable—especially as the Roman authorities, most notably in matters affecting societies, were wont to take careful cognisance of even the minutest trifles, and of course, in a formal investigation, had means readily at their disposal for eliciting every detail. If we had nothing but Suetonius's account of Nero to go upon, these considerations would certainly be held to be conclusive even for the time of Nero; but we have Tacitus, who makes us hesitate; and what is said about Domitian goes against Weizsäcker's conclusion. Christian sources give no hope of a decision. Ramsay's citation of 1 Pet. does not hold good, that of the Apocalypse is worthless as long as the unity and the date of the book continue to be as questionable as they are; and the Pastoral Epistles are too doubtful. Moreover, it is not at all certain that they speak of flagitia as the ground of persecution, so as to necessitate their being assigned to the period of Nero, even if Ramsay's view is adopted as correct; for 2 Tim. 29 does not necessarily mean that Paul suffers because he is regarded as a κακοῦργος—it can just as well mean that he suffers the same penalties as those to which a κακοῦργος is liable, but that the cause of them is in his case his preaching of the gospel (ἐν ᾧ)—in other words, his Christianity. In like manner, it is quite as conceivable in 2 Tim. 3 that the women is the cause of the sufferings of all Christians as that flagitia are. As for the Third Gospel and Acts, according to what has been said above (§ 2), they show only that their author, about 100-130 A.D., was acquainted with the name, and knew nothing as to its origin that rendered it impossible for him to place its date about the year 40. All that the present discussion can be regarded as contributing towards the solution of the question is the conjecture that the Pagans, in as far as they knew the true character of Christianity at a time before that which we have definitely ascertained, hardly took any cognisance of it—on account of the infrequency with which it came under public notice.

CHRONICLER (כְּרוֹנִיזֵר) 2 S. 8:16 20:24, 1s. 36:3, RV¹⁹⁰¹; EV R¹ECORDER (1901).

CHRONICLES (דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים) 1 K. 14:19. See HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 13 f.

CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF. In the Hebrew canon Chronicles is a single book, entitled דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים, Events of the Times.

The full title would be כְּתָב דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים, Book of Events of the Times; and this again appears to have been a designation commonly applied to special histories in the more definite shape—Events of the Times of King David, or the like (1 Ch. 27:24, Esch. 10:1 etc.).

1. Name. The Greek translators divided the book into two, and adopted the title ἱστορίαι, Things [often] omitted (scil. in the other historical books); cod. A adds ἱστορίαι respecting the kings or τὰ βασιλείων λόγια; see Bacher, Z. N. T. 13:365 ff. (1901). Jerome, following the sense of the Hebrew title, suggested the name of Chronicon instead of Paralipomenon primum et secundum. Hence the English Chronicles.

The book of Chronicles begins with Adam and ends abruptly in the middle of Cyrus's decree of restoration.

2. Connexion with Ezra-Nehemiah. The continuation of the narrative is found in the Book of Ezra, which begins by repeating 2 Ch. 36:22 f., and filling up the fragment of the decree of Cyrus. A closer examination of those parts of Ezra and Nehemiah which are not extracted word for word from earlier documents or original memoirs, leads to the conclusion that Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah was originally one work, displaying throughout the peculiarities of language and thought of a single editor (see § 3). Thus the fragmentary close of 2 Chronicles marks the disruption of a previously-existing continuity. In the gradual compilation of the canon the necessity for incorporating in the Holy Writings an account of the establishment of the post-exilic theocracy was felt, before it was thought desirable to supplement Samuel and Kings by adding a second history of the pre-exilic period. Hence Chronicles is the last book of the Hebrew Bible, following the book of Ezra-Nehemiah, which properly is nothing else than its sequel.

Whilst the original unity of this series of histories can hardly be questioned, it will be more convenient in the present article to deal with Chronicles alone, reserving the relation of the several books for the article HISTORICAL LITERATURE (1901, § 14 f.). The author used a different class of sources for the history of the pre-exilic and the post-exilic periods respectively; and thus the critical questions affecting Chronicles are for the most part quite distinct from those which meet us in the book of Ezra-

CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF

Nehemiah. Besides, the identity of authorship cannot be conclusively demonstrated except by a comparison of results drawn from a separate consideration of each book.

Of the authorship of Chronicles we know only what can be determined by internal evidence. The colour

3. Date. of the language stamps the book as one of the latest in the OT (see § 11); but it leads to no exact determination of date. In 1 Ch. 20:7, which refers to the time of David, a sum of money is reckoned by darics (but see DRAM), which certainly implies that the author wrote after that Persian coin had long been current in Judea. The chief passage appealed to by critics to fix the date, however, is 1 Ch. 3:1 ff., where the descendants of Zerubbabel seem to be reckoned to six generations (so Ewald, Bertheau, etc.).

The passage is confused, and G reads it so as to give us many as eleven generations (so Zunz, Nöldk., Kuen., § 203; cp. Kuen., § 24 f.); whilst on the other hand those who plead for an early date are disposed to assume an interpolation or a corruption of the text, or to separate all that follows the name of Jedaiah in v. 21 from what precedes (Movers, Keil). It seems impossible, however, by any fair treatment of the text to obtain fewer than six generations, and this result agrees with the probability that Hattush (v. 24), who, on the interpretation which we prefer, belongs to the fourth generation from Zerubbabel, was a contemporary of Ezra (Ezra 8:2).

Thus the Chronicler lived at least two generations after Ezra. With this it accords very well that in Nehemiah five generations of high priests are enumerated from Joshua (12:10 f.), and that the last name is that of Jaddai, who, as we know from Josephus, was a contemporary of Alexander the Great. That the Chronicler wrote after the period of the Persian supremacy was past has been argued by Ewald (Hilf, 1:171) and others, from the use of the title King of Persia (2 Ch. 36:23).

The official title of the Achemenids was not 'King of Persia' but 'the King, the Great King,' i.e. 'King of Kings,' the 'King of the Lands' (see R¹⁹⁰¹ 1:111 ff. 5:13 ff. 30:1 ff.); and the first of these expressions is that used by Ezra (7:27, 8:1 etc.), Neh. (1:11 2:1 ff.), and other Jews writing under the Persian rule (Hag. 1:13 Zech. 7:1 Ezra 4:8 11:56 ff. etc.).

What seems to be certain and important for a right estimate of the book is that the author lived a considerable time after Ezra, probably indeed (Nöldk., Kuen.) after 300 B.C., and was entirely under the influence of the religious institutions of the new theocracy. This standpoint determined the nature of his interest in the early history of his people.

The true importance of Hebrew history had always centred in the fact that this petty nation was the people of

4. Character: Yahwe, the spiritual God. The true interest which distinguishes the annals of Israel from the forgotten history of Moab or Damascus, lies wholly in that long contest which finally vindicated the reality of spiritual things and the supremacy of Yahwe's purpose, in the political ruin of the nation which was the faithless depositary of these sacred truths. After the fall of Jerusalem it was impossible to write the history of Israel's fortunes otherwise than in a spirit of religious pragmatism. Within the limits of the religious conception of the plan and purpose of the Hebrew history, however, more than one point of view might be taken up. The book of Kings looks upon the history in the spirit of the prophets, in that spirit which is still echoed by Zechariah (1:8 f.): 'Your fathers, where are they? and the prophets, could they live for ever? but my words and my statutes, which I commanded my servants the prophets, did they not overtake your fathers? so that they turned and said, Like as Yahwe of Hosts thought to do unto us . . . so hath he dealt with us.' Long before the Chronicler wrote, however, there had been a great change. The new Jerusalem of Ezra was organised as a municipality and a church, not as a nation. The centre of religious life was no longer the living prophetic word, but the ordinances of the Pentateuch and the liturgical service of the sanctuary. The religious vocation of Israel was no longer national, but ecclesiastical or municipal, and the historical continuity of the nation was vividly realised only within the walls of Jerusalem and the courts of the temple, in the solemn assembly and stately ceremonial of a feast day.

These influences naturally operated most strongly on those who were officially attached to the sanctuary. To a Levite, even more than to other Jews, the history of Israel meant above all things the history of Jerusalem, of the temple, and of the temple ordinances. Now the author of Chronicles betrays on every page his essentially levitical habit of mind. It even seems possible, from a close attention to his descriptions of sacred ordinances, to conclude that his special interests are those of a common Levite rather than of a priest, and that of all levitical functions he is most partial to those of the singers, a member of whose guild Ewald conjectures him to have been.

To such a man the older delineation of the history of Israel, especially in Samuel and Kings, could not but appear to be deficient in some directions, whilst in other respects its narrative seemed superfluous or open to misunderstanding, as for example by recording, and that without condemnation, things inconsistent with the pentateuchal law. The history of the ordinances of worship holds a very small place in the older record. Jerusalem and the temple have not that central place in the Book of Kings which they occupied in the minds of the Jewish community in post-exilic times. Large sections of the old history are devoted to the religion and politics of the northern kingdom, which are altogether unintelligible and uninteresting when measured by a strictly levitical standard; and in general the whole problems and struggles of the earlier period turn on points which had ceased to be cardinal in the life of the new Jerusalem, which was no longer called upon to decide between the claims of the Word of Yahweh and the exigencies of political affairs and social customs, and which could not comprehend that men absorbed in deeper spiritual contests had no leisure for such things as the metics of levitical legislation.

Thus there seemed to be room for a new history, which should confine itself to matters still interesting to the theocracy of Zion, keeping Jerusalem and the temple in the foreground, and developing the divine pragmatism of the history, with reference, not so much to the prophetic word as to the fixed legislation of the Pentateuch (especially the Priest's Code), so that the whole narrative might be made to teach that Israel's glory lies in the observance of the divine law and ritual.

1. Outline of Chronicles. The book falls naturally into three parts. 1. Introductory résumé (1 Ch. 1-9).—

2. Contents. For the sake of systematic completeness the author begins with Adam, as is the custom with later Oriental writers. He had nothing, however, to add to the Pentateuch, and the period from Moses to David contained little that served his purpose. He, therefore, contracts the early history (1 Ch. 1-9) into a series of genealogies,¹ which were doubtless by no means the least interesting part of his work at a time when every Israelite was concerned to prove the purity of his Hebrew descent (see Ezra 2:59-62, and cp. GEN. 10:1-11:32). The greatest space is allotted naturally to the tribes of JUDAH and LEVI (cp. 1 Ch. 2:3-1:23 [5:27-6:66]); but, except where the author derives his materials from the earlier historical books (as in 1 Ch. 1:1-10 [5:27-6:66]), his lists are meagre and imperfect, and his data evidently fragmentary. Already, however, the circumstances and interests of the author betray themselves; for even in these chapters his principal object is evidently to explain, in a manner consonant with the conceptions of his age, the origin of the ecclesiastical institutions of the post-exilic community.

Observe that 1 Ch. 9:2-17 is excerpted (with merely clerical differences) from Neh. 11:3-19a (on the passage see Ezra, ii. § 5 [6], § 15 [17]); and that the age to which the genealogies in 1 Ch. 3:17-24 and 3:33-40 (cp. 9:35-44, and see BRS. JAMES, § 9) are carried, shows that their purpose is to give the pedigree of post-exilic families who traced their descent from David and Saul respectively. In ch. 2 We. (De gent.; cp. more briefly Prod. 205 ff. [1:1 ff.]) has shown that 2 Ch. 25:31-42:50a, forming the kernel of the chapter, relate to pre-exilic Judah, whilst 25:10-17 [18-24] 34:41 50b-55 (like the greater part of 4:1-2) have reference to the circumstances of the post-exilic community; the chief aim of ch. 2 is to explain how the Gileadites, who before the fall of Jerusalem had their home in the S. of Judah, had in post-exilic times to find new homes in the more northerly parts of Judah (see CAL. ii. § 17).

2. Israel before the schism (1 Ch. 10-2 Ch. 11).—From the death of Saul (1 Ch. 10) the history becomes fuller and runs parallel with Samuel and Kings. The limitations of the author's interest in past times appear in the omission, among other particulars, of David's reign in Hebron, of the disorders in his family and the revolt of Absalom, of the circumstances of Solomon's accession, and of many details as to the wisdom and splendour of that sovereign as well as of his fall into idolatry.

3. The Southern Kingdom (2 Ch. 12-36).—In the later history the northern kingdom is quite neglected, and political affairs in Judah receive attention, not in proportion to their intrinsic importance, but according as they serve to exemplify God's help to the obedient and his chastisement of the rebellious. That the author is always unwilling to speak of the misfortunes of good rulers, is not to be ascribed with some critics to a deliberate suppression of truth, but shows that the book was throughout composed not in purely historical interests, but with a view to inculcate a single practical lesson.

4. Additions to Kings. 1. The more important additions which the Chronicler makes to the old narrative consists of (a) statistical lists (1 Ch. 12, see DAVID, § 11, m.); (b) full details on points connected with the history of the sanctuary (see HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 15) and the great feasts (see 1:1-2:18), or the archeology of the Levitical ministry (see LEVITES, 1 Ch. 13-15-16) (these three chapters expanded remarkably from 2 S. 6:1-22 [29-31] 35:1-17 etc.); and (c) narratives of victories and defeats, of sins and punishments, of obedience and its reward, which could be made to point a plain religious lesson in favour of faithful observance of the Law.

See the following passages:—2 Ch. 13-14 (Aliahah), 14:9-15 (Zerah), 15:1-15 (Asa and the prophet Azariah), 16:7-10 (Asa and Hanani), 19:1-13 (Jehoshaphat and the prophet Jehu), 20 (Jehoshaphat and Moadab, etc.); 21:1-17 (Jehoram), 25:1-10 (Amaziah) etc.

These narratives often include prophetic discourses, inculcating the same principle of the theocratic conditions of success and failure, with much uniformity of expression, and in a tone very different from that of the prophets who appear in Samuel or Kings.

2. Attention should be directed also to the short insertions, introduced often into the narratives excerpted from the older historical books, for the purpose of supplementing them at some point where they appeared to the author to need explanation or correction.

Such are the notes on ritual 1 Ch. 15:27a-28b (David); 2 Ch. 5:11b-13a 6:13-17 8:13-15 (Solomon); 22:6-13 (midde) 18 (from 2:2) 14 (disposition of Athaliah); 34:9 ('the Levites') 12 (from 1:1) 14, etc.; the reflections in 1 Ch. 21:6 ff. (David's census); 2 Ch. 31:16 (Solomon's wife's palace); 12:12 (Rehoboam humbling himself); 18:21b (Yahweh delivers Jehoshaphat); 22:36-46 (cause of Athaliah's wickedness); 27:2-4 (to 'Yahweh', cause of plot against Amaziah); 36:21 (midde) 23 (midde); consequences of Uriah's leprosy); 27:5 (effects of Jotham's piety); 33:23 (character of Amos).

The minor variations of Chronicles from Samuel and Kings are analogous in principle to the larger additions and omissions, so that the whole work has a consistent and well-marked character, presenting the history in quite a different perspective from that of the old narrative.

Here, then, a critical question arises. Is the change of perspective wholly due to a different selection of

6. Sources. items from authentic historical tradition? May we assume that everything which is new in Chronicles has been taken exactly from older sources, or must we judge that the standpoint of the author has not only governed the selection of facts, but also coloured the statement of them? Are all his novelties new data, or are some of them inferences of his own from the same data as he before us in other books of the OT?

To answer these questions we must first inquire what were the materials at his command. The Chronicler makes frequent reference to earlier histories which he cites by a great variety of names.

1. The Book of the Kings.—That the names 'Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah,' 'Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel,' 'Book of the Kings of Israel,' and 'Affairs of the Kings of Israel' (2 Ch. 33:12, Heb.) refer to a single work is not disputed. Under one or other title this book is cited some ten times (1 Ch. 9:1; 2 Ch. 16:11; 25:26; 27:7; 28:26; 33:18; 35:27; 36:3, also 20:34; 32:32, noted below).

That it is not the canonical Kings is manifest from what is said of its contents.

It must have been quite an extensive work, for among other things it contained genealogical statistics (1 Ch. 9:1), as well as other particulars not mentioned in the existing Book of Kings (see 2 Ch. 27:7; 33:14; 36:1); and it incorporated certain older writings of (or about) prophets, in particular the Dēbārīm (Words, or rather Matters, i.e., History) of Jehu ben Hanani (1 Ch. 20:34, where read with RV, 'which is inserted in') and the Vision of Isaiah (2 Ch. 32:32).

Now it is noticeable that, where the Chronicler does not cite this comprehensive work at the close of a king's reign, he generally refers to some special authority which bears the name of a prophet (1 Ch. 29:29, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad; 2 Ch. 9:29, Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo; 12:15, Shemai, and Iddo; 13:22, Iddo; 26:22, Isaiah). Never, however, is the Book of the Kings and a special prophetic writing cited for the same reign. It is therefore highly probable that, in other cases as well as in those of Jehu and Isaiah (see above), the writings cited under the names of various prophets were known to the author only as parts of the great Book of the Kings.

Even 2 Ch. 33:13 (cp. 17:13), where AV departs from the received Hebrew text, but probably expresses the correct reading, seems rather to confirm than to oppose this conclusion (which is now disputed by very few scholars) except in the case of Isaiah's history of Uzziah (2 Ch. 26:22), where the form of the reference is different.

The references to these Dēbārīm will thus not imply the existence of historical monographs written by the prophets with whose names they are connected; they will merely point to sections of the Book of the Kings, which embraced the history of particular prophets, and were hence familiarly cited under their names.

2. The Midrash of the Book of the Kings.—Whether the Book of the Kings is identical with the Midrash (RV, badly, Commentary) of the Book of the Kings (2 Ch. 21:27) is not certain. On the one hand, the peculiar title would suggest a distinct work; on the other hand, it is not apparent why, if (as its title shows) it was a comprehensive work, dealing with the kings generally, it should be cited for only one reign. The term 'Midrash,'² moreover, from מִדְרַשׁ to search out, investigate,—as applied to Scripture, to discover or develop a thought not apparent on the surface,—denotes a didactic or homiletic exposition, or an edifying religious story (such, for instance, as that of Tobit or Susannah); the Midrash here referred to will thus have been a work intended to develop the religious lessons deducible from the history of the kings. This, however, is just the guiding motive in many of the narratives, peculiar to Chronicles, for which the author cites as his authority the Book of the Kings; the last-named work, therefore, even if not identical with the Midrash of the Book of the Kings (as Ew. We. Kue. with much probability suppose), will nevertheless have been similar in character and tendency (cp. below, § 9, end).

The Midrash of the prophet Iddo (2 Ch. 13:22) will have been either a particular section of the Midrash of the Book of the Kings, or, more probably, perhaps, a separate work of the same character, which was attributed to Iddo as its author, or in which the prophet Iddo played a prominent part. For allusions to other authorities, see 1 Ch. 5:17; 23:27; 24:24; 2 Ch. 35:25.

3. Conclusion.—All these writings must have been post-exilic works; nor is it probable that, except for some of his statistical information, the Chronicler had access to any sources of early date other than the canonical histories of the OT. The style (see below, § 11) is conclusive evidence that no part of the additional matter¹ peculiar to Chronicles is an excerpt from any pre-exilic writing.

The general conclusion is that it is very doubtful whether the Chronicler used any historical work not accessible to us, with the exception of this lost Book of the Kings. Even his genealogical lists may have been derived from that work (1 Ch. 9:1), though for these he may also have had other materials at command.

4. Sources of the Canonical Kings.—Now we know that the two chief sources of the canonical book of Kings were entitled Annals ('events of the times') of the Kings of Israel and Judah respectively. That the lost source of the Chronicles was not independent of these works appears probable both from the nature of the case and from the close and often verbal parallelism between many sections of the two biblical narratives. Whilst the canonical Book of Kings, however, had separate sources for the N. and the S. kingdoms, the source of Chronicles was a history of the two kingdoms combined, and so, no doubt, was a more recent work, in great measure extracted from the older annals. Still it contained also matter not derived from these works, for it is pretty clear from 2 K. 21:17 that the Annals of the Kings of Judah gave no account of Manasseh's repentance, which, according to 2 Ch. 33:17, was narrated in the great Book of the Kings of Israel.

5. Dependence of Chronicles on Kings.—It was formerly the opinion of Bertheau, and other scholars (e.g., Keil), that the parallelisms of Chronicles with Samuel and Kings are sufficiently explained by the ultimate common source from which both narratives drew. Most critics hold, however, that the Chronicler also drew directly from the canonical Samuel and Kings, as he unquestionably did from the Pentateuch. This opinion is probable in itself, as the earlier books of the OT cannot have been unknown to the author; and the critical analysis of the canonical Book of Kings shows that in some of the parallel passages the Chronicler uses words which were not taken from the annals but written by the author of Kings himself. In particular, Chronicles agrees with Kings in those short notes of the moral character of individual monarchs which can hardly be ascribed to a hand earlier than that of the latter author of the latter book (cp. e.g., 2 Ch. 20:32 f. [Asa] with 1 K. 22:43; 24:2 [Joash], with 2 K. 12:3 [2] [Joash], 25:1-4 [Amaziah], with 2 K. 11:2 f. 5 f., etc.). It is, of course possible, as Bertheau (Altv. f.) and Kuenen (§ 3217) suppose, that the author of the chief source of Chronicles had already incorporated extracts from our canonical book of Kings; and in general the connections of the successive historical books which precede the present canonical histories are sufficiently complex to make it unwise to indulge in positive assertions on a matter in which so many possibilities may be suggested.

² Though common in Rabbinical literature, it occurs otherwise in the OT only in 2 Ch. 13:22.

Another principle traceable in the Chroniker's additions is the tendency not merely to lay stress upon the doctrine in divine retribution, but also to represent it as acting immediately (see especially below [4]). To the earlier

The prophets the retributive justice of God is manifest in the general course of the history—the fall of the Hebrew nation is the hint of sin and rebellion against Yahweh's moral commands—but God's justice is mingled with long-suffering, and the prophets do not suppose that every sin is punished promptly, and that temporary good fortune is always the reward of righteousness. The aim of very many of the additions made in Chronicles to the old history, is to show that in Israel retribution followed immediately on good or bad conduct, especially on obedience or disobedience to prophetic warnings.

(b) In 2 K. 3 we read of a war with Moab in which Jehoshaphat was associated with the wicked house of Ahab, and came to a shameful end. In Chronicles this war is entirely omitted, and in its place we have (2 Ch. 20) an expedition of Jehoshaphat alone against Moab, Ammon, and Edom, in which the Jewish king, having opened the campaign—with the assistance of the Levites—with suitable prayer and praise, has no further task than to "spoil the spoil of the enemy who have fallen by one another's hands."

(6) In Kings, Asa, who according to 1 K. 15:24 was a good king all his days, had in his old age (75-23) a disease in his feet. With the help of his attendants, of accounting for this, the Chronicler explains (2 Ch. 16:1-7; cp. the addition in 75:2-5) that three years previously he had shown a distrustful spirit by contracting an alliance with Benhadad (which is mentioned in 1 K. 15:17-22, without any mark of disapproval on the part of the narrator). The singular dates in 2 Ch. 15:16-18 (which place Baasha's invasion at a period which, according to 1 K. 15:33-36, was ten years after his own death) are most naturally explained as an attempt to bring the final sufficiently near the punishment, (68) Spitteler, op. cit. 122-8, 37, 1.

All this is entirely in the style of the Jewish 'Midrash'; it is not history, but 'Haggidā', moralising romance attaching to historical names and events. The Chronicler himself, it will be remembered (see above, § 6 [2], gives the name of 'Midrash' to two of the sources from which his materials were derived. There need be no uncertainty, therefore, as to the nature of his work when it is seen to be derived from the older narratives of S. and K.

Another peculiarity of the Chronicler is to be found in the incredibly high figures with which he deals.

David (1 Ch. 22.14) amasses 100,000 talents of gold and 1,000,000 talents of silver for the temple (contrast the much more modest estimate of even Solomon's revenue in 1 K. 10.14.7.); the army of Abijah numbers 400,000 men, that of Jeroboam 800,000, of whom 500,000 perish in one day (2 Ch. 13.17); Asa musters 500,000 soldiers, Zerah 1,000,000 (14.89), Jehoshaphat 1,100,000 (17.14-15), although in 20.12 he complains that he has 'no might'; Uzziah 927,500 (20.13); of the army of Ahaz 120,000 are slain in one day, while 200,000 women and children are taken captive (28.6-8).

Manifestly such figures cannot be historical. The past was magnified, as it was also idealised. The empire of David and his successors was imagined on a scale of unsurpassed power and magnificence; pre-exilic Judah was pictured as already in possession of the institutions, and governed—at least in its greater and better men—by the ideas and principles which were in force at a later day. The past was read in the light of the present, and the history, where necessary, re-written accordingly. No doubt in many instances a traditional element lies at the basis of the Chronicler's representation; but this element has been developed by him, and embellished with fresh details, for the purpose of giving expression to the ideas which he had at heart, and of inculcating the lessons which he conceived the history to teach. It is probable that the new conception of Israel's past history, and the characteristic didactic treatment of it, did not originate with the Chronicler himself, but had already appeared in the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah or the Midrash of the Book of Kings, which he so frequently cites as his authorities (cp Be. xxxvii.).

A usage, not peculiar to the Chronicler among OT writers, which must be carefully taken into account by the historical critic, is that of giving information that is really statistical in the form of a narrative. This is the principle which underlies many of the OT statements of genealogical relationships, and which alone explains the variations between different accounts of the genealogy proceeding from a single ancestor: information as to the subdivisions of clans, the intermingling of populations, and the like, is thrown into a genealogical form (see GENEALOGIES, § 1). The most striking example of the application of this principle is the ethnographical table of Gen. 10 (cp also 22.20-24 25.1-4 13.16, and parts of 36); but these instances by no means stand alone; there are many in 1 Ch. 1-9.

Thus it is avowedly the intention of 24.42-45 46-55 42-5 11-14 17-23 to indicate the origin of local populations: 'in 24.3 Hebron, the town, has 'sons'. Several of the names in 24 are also those of Edomite clans (Wellh. De Gentibus ch. 38.7); these came gradually to be treated as belonging to Judah, and the connection was afterwards exhibited artificially in a genealogical scheme. Caleb and Jerahmeel were not originally Israelites; Caleb belonged to the Edomite clan (Gen. 36.11) of the Kenizites (Jos. 14.6-14); and clans bearing the name of Caleb and Jerahmeel are in David's time (1 S. 27.10, cp 30.29; note also the terms of Jos. 14.15a) still distinguished from Judah: in course of time, however, they were regarded as an integral part of the tribe, and a genealogy was formed (1 Ch. 2.18-25) to give expression to the fact.¹

A different application of the same principle seems to be in the account of the institutions of Levitical service which is introduced in connection with the transference of the ark to Jerusalem by David. The author is not concerned to distinguish the gradual steps by which the Levitical organisation attained its full development. He wishes to describe the system in its complete form, especially as regards the service of the singers, and he does this under the reign of David, who was the father of Hebrew psalmody [cp OT 10.12 223 f.] and the restorer of the sanctuary of the ark.

The style of the Chronicler has remarkable peculiarities. It is not merely that it presents characteristically late linguistic novelties (which are not confined to the vocabulary, but, as König's Syntax der hebr. Sprache fully shows, extend to the syntax), but it has also a number of special mannerisms. Even the reader of a translation can see that this must be the case. Modern words, often with Aramaic affixes, inelegant syntax, embrocated and uncouth sentences, in strongest possible contrast to the ease and grace of the earlier Hebrew historical books,—these are the predominant marks of the Chronicler's style; and so constant are they that there is hardly a sentence, not excepted from Samuel or Kings, in which they are not observable.¹ For details we must refer to the introductions and commentaries (see e.g., Be. xiv.-xviii.; Dr. Introd. 535-540; E. Brown, Hastings' DB 1.36-38). It might be thought by those unacquainted with the Chronicler's manner, that the speeches in Chronicles might form as a whole an exception to what is here stated, and that they might conceivably be based on some special sources of older date. But this would be a great mistake. The tone and literary style of the speeches which have parallels in Samuel and Kings are both very different from those which have been added by the Chronicler. The latter not only reflect, almost uniformly, the ideas and point of view of the Chronicler himself, but also exhibit frequently the same literary peculiarities. There can be no reasonable doubt that they are, one and all, his own composition.²

His work in the König's Hdb. (ed. 2, 1273) is still a most helpful commentary; see also Keil (C70); Zöckler in Langes Handw. (74); Oehler, Kgl. Konig. (80); Kautzsch, Speaker's Comm. (73); Hall (deceased), Ellicott's Comm. (73); Bennett (suggestive), Expos. Bib. (74). ¹ The peculiarities in question may often be observed even in the short sentences which the Chronicler sometimes introduces into a narrative otherwise executed without material alteration from Samuel or Kings; e.g., 1 Ch. 21.1 (22.2), 1 Ch. 22.2 (22.2), 2 Ch. 23.2 (23.2), 2 Ch. 23.2 (23.2), 2 Ch. 23.2 (23.2), etc.

A. OLD TESTAMENT.

The advantages afforded by a fixed and uniform chronological system of dating historical events seem so evident that one might expect to find some such method of determining dates in use from the very earliest times.

1. No fixed era.

History, however, shows that a long development was needed to lead to this simple result. Only in connection with a universal history did the desire for a uniform and comprehensive method of determining dates spring up. The impulse towards a real universal history and a general chronology came, not when the attempt was made to collect and record all human events, but when men learned to look at them from a single point of view and to comprehend them in a single plan. The roots of such a universal history lie in the prophets of Israel, who regarded the plan of Yahweh as realising itself in the experience of the nations of the earth as well as in the history of Israel; and its actual beginnings, strange as it may seem, are to be found in the Apocalyptic writers, who regarded history as a comprehensive whole (see APOCALYPTIC, § 2). This mode of regarding history was continued by Christianity. It is not strange, therefore, that Christianity felt the need for a universal chronology and found a way of meeting that need, thus proving its own world-embracing significance. This is not the place to enter upon the long and involved history of the adoption of the Christian era, which, after its author, the Roman abbot Dionysius Exiguus of the first half of the sixth century, is also called the Dionysian era. In order, however, to obtain a fixed starting-point from which to reckon, we must simply state here that the year 1—i.e., the year of the birth of Christ—is equivalent to the year 754 of the era of Varro—i.e., the era of the city of Rome,—and to the first year of the 195th Olympiad; and, also, that King Herod died in the year 750 of the city of Rome, and so in the year 4 B.C. (cp Schürer, GH I 313-315).

The same phenomenon of gradual arrival at a satisfactory chronological method is repeated in the narrower sphere of the national history of the several nations. We never find a settled era, a definite date from which years were counted, at the very beginning or even at an early period of a nation's history. If anything of this kind has seemed to appear in early times, it has always turned out to be in the highest degree uncertain, or really to rest on later calculations. Nor is the

OT any exception to this rule. Only once had the Jews before Christ a national era, and that was for a very short time. When Simon the Maccabee had obtained from the Syrians complete freedom from taxation along with the acknowledgment of the political independence of Judea, documents and contracts were dated by years of Simon, the High Priest and Prince of the Jews, the first year of Simon the High Priest (1 Macc. 13:11-12) representing the 170th year of the era of the Seleucides (= 143-142 B.C.).¹

On the other hand, since the time when the Jews fell under the dominion of Syria, they had used the so-called era of the Seleucides (Βασιλεία ΤΕΛΕΦΑΡΩΝ, 1 Macc. 1:11; Βασιλεία ΑΣΣΥΡΙΑΝΩΝ [Assyrian = Syrian], Jos. Ant. xiii. 6:7; אֵרָא חֲמִשָּׁה עָשָׂר שָׁנִים amongst the Jews, and year ד'תקנ"ה amongst the Syrians). This era has for its starting-point the defeat of Nicanor, the general of Antiochus, by Scaurus Nicenter, and the final establishment of the dominion of the Seleucides in Syria and Babylonia in the year Ol. 117, i.e., 312 B.C. It is used in the Books of the Maccabees, but there, it would seem, with this difference, that in the first book it begins, not, as was usual elsewhere, in the autumn, but in the spring of 312, thus about half a year earlier.² This era reached in general as far as the Syrian power, and although, usually, where states were able to obtain freedom they introduced new eras of their own, none was able to maintain itself so long as that of the Seleucides. It remained in use, indeed, among the Syrians for centuries alongside of the Arabic era, which counts from the Hegira (hijra, flight of Mohammed), 16th July, 622 A.D.

Real eras are not met with in the OT in earlier times. We cannot cite as an exception the practice of the Jews during the Exile, of counting the years since they were carried away from their land (שְׁנֵי מֵאוֹת, Ezek. 33:1 and 40:1; שְׁנֵי מֵאוֹת, 2 K. 25:27; also Jer. 52:31, and Ezek. 1:2, and, without mention of the point from which the reckoning is made, Ezek. 8:1, 20:1, 29:17). In truth, they desired nothing more eagerly than to be delivered from the need of counting in this way. Besides, there was along with it a reckoning from the final fall of Jerusalem (Ezek 40:1, while Ezek 1:1 (if the text has reached us intact) must rest on still a third mode of reckoning.¹ It is, moreover, a very unsafe hypothesis which ventures to return in the case of the statement of 2 Ch. 16:1 (as a whole clearly untenable) at least the number 36 as based on trustworthy tradition, and proposes to find therein a trace of a Judean era, thought to date from the division of the kingdom (Sharpe, Chronology of the Bible, 29; cp Brandes, Abhandl. 62). Nor, lastly, are we any more justified in finding any trace of a real era counting from the Exodus i.e. the late passage (K. 6:1, where the building of Solomon's temple is assigned to the 480th year after that event. This number does not rest on tradition; it has been reached by calculation based on some hypothesis. No corroboration can be obtained from the numbers in the late Priestly Code: if the passages containing them are original even there—numbers which date the events of the journey through the wilderness by years from the deliverance out of Egypt (אֲנִי בְּיָמֵי מֹשֶׁה בְּיָמֵי מֹשֶׁה בְּיָמֵי מֹשֶׁה; cp Ex 16:19; Nu. 1:9; 33:38). Nor can any support, in fact, be found for the notion that the Jubilee period was turned to chronological purposes. There is not the slightest trace of a real carrying out of the regulations concerning it mentioned in Lev. 25:9 ff.; even the Books of the Maccabees speak only of Sabbatic years, never of Jubilee years (1 Macc. 6:49-51; cp Jos. Ant. xiv. 162).

² Cp Schürer, op. cit. I 131. We, however (170, 129 ff. 202), regard this assumption as unnecessary (cp YEAR, § c).

In spite of this lack of a proper era, the OT is not without notes and data intended to serve as a means of fixing events chronologically. In addition to isolated observations (more the less important that they are incidentally setting an occurrence in relation to another prominent event (e.g., to the death of the king, as in Is. 61:1-2, or to an important expedition, as in Is. 20:1, to the building of a city, as in Nu. 32:2, or to an extraordinary natural phenomenon, as in Am. 1:1), we generally find, in the case of any important OT personage, the year of his life or his reign specified; and in the books edited during the Exile the date of the events narrated begins to be given by years of the reigning king. Besides, there are the various synchronistic data often supplied by headings of books (e.g., in the case of certain of the prophets), and by the Books of Kings, which have a complete synchronistic record for the time of the coexistence of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Finally, the evidence of the contemporaneity of certain events furnished at times by the historical narrative itself is of the highest importance.

The weightiest question, however, is, to what degree of credibility this chronological material can lay claim.

Before undertaking the examination of this question for the several points of the history, we must premise some general considerations that thrust themselves on our notice. First of all, there is the remarkable fact that these chronological notes are to be found in greatest abundance in those parts of the historical books that are confessedly to be regarded as the youngest. In the Pentateuch they belong to the post-exilic Priestly Code or to additions of even later date; in the other historical books into which the older sources have been worked, they are due, in the main, to the latest exilic editors. Then, it must be regarded as proved that the superscriptions of the prophetic books containing detailed information concerning the time of the respective prophets do not come from the prophets themselves, but are much younger additions, such as the emendation of later ages delighted in. This appears from the inexplicable double date (by kings of Judah and of Israel) found in Hosea and Amos, as well as from the macrama, or the crowding, of the data in Is. Jer. and Ezek. Nor is the remarkable addition in Amos 1:1, 'two years before the earthquake,' any exception to this rule: the fact that a later event is employed to define the date shows that the statement is a subsequent addition, and it is therefore very probable that it rests on the exegesis and calculation of the scribes (cp Hoffmann, ZITW 3:12 [83]). Lastly, it is remarkable that the text presents no uniformity of reading in the matter of recording dates; nay, that there are even to be found in filled blanks. Thus in 1 S. 13:1 the numbers have been omitted from the formula giving the age of Saul and the length of his reign, and in 2 S. the whole verse is omitted.¹ There are also other places in the LXX where such chronological data are lacking (e.g., Jer. 47:1 [BAX]) and elsewhere in the old versions we come on considerable variations from the traditional Hebrew text. All these are marks that indicate a late origin for the chronological numbers and warn us in the most emphatic way to submit them to a thorough examination.

¹ In that case nothing would meet the requirements of the passage but a reckoning that counted from the reform of Josiah (622). Of any such mode of reckoning we know nothing, any more than we do of a reckoning by Jubilee periods, or of a Babylonian era meeting the requirements of the text (cp Kne. Ant. 260 n. 4). W. (AT Unters. 94-6) therefore alters the text, and reads Ezek. 1:1 thus: וְהָיָה בְּשָׁנָה הַשְּׁמִינִי עָלֵינוּ מִלְּפָנֵי יְהוָה, or וְהָיָה בְּשָׁנָה הַשְּׁמִינִי עָלֵינוּ מִלְּפָנֵי יְהוָה, which must be understood like 8:1, and give an earlier date than 8:1. It would be better, however, to assume the original reading to have been 'in the fifth year' (cp the following verse)—i.e., הַחֲמִישִׁי—, and that from the fact of Jeremiah's having predicted seventy years for the Exile (25:11, cp 29:10) while Ezekiel gave only forty (1:1), a later writer drew the inference that Ezekiel prophesied thirty years after Jeremiah, and accordingly inserted as a date in Ezek. 1:1 the thirtieth year of the Exile (Duhm).

As regards the oldest period, with which Genesis deals, the time down to the Exodus, it is known that the numbers supplied by the Samaritan and the LXX texts, and even by the Book of Jubilees (dating from the last century A.D.), differ in many points from those of the Massoretic text.

The divergence will be made most plain by a comparison showing the sum of the years according to each tradition. In Gen. 5 the period from the creation of the world to the beginning of the flood is, according to the Hebrew text, 1656 years; according to the Samaritan, 1307; and, according to 2 S. 22:2, 1110 ff. the interval from the birth of Slem to the birth of Abraham is, according to the Hebrew text, 300 years; according to the Samaritan, 1040; and, according to the text of 2 S. 22:2, 1110. In this no account is taken of the variations exhibited by the other MSS of 2 S. itself, nor is it inquired whether the tradition represented by any one given text is free from internal inconsistency (cp, e.g., Gen. 11:10, 'two years after the flood,' with Gen. 11:32 74, and Gen. 11:104; further Gen. 12:4 with Gen. 11:26, 32).

This state of matters shows, what was indeed probable to begin with, that there was no fixed tradition concerning the early history of Israel; that, indeed, even at so late a time as that of the LXX and the Book of Jubilees, there was no clear idea of how the period in question should be measured. Thus the numbers of the Hebrew text, since they are not earlier than the Priestly Code, go back at the best only to the fifth century B.C., and do not rest on tradition, but have been reached by the application of some artificial theory. Since they are useless, therefore, at least for chronology (if indeed one could ever have hoped to obtain such a thing for those earliest times), it is unnecessary to attempt to discover what the actual theory underlying them is.

It will be enough to mention that v. Gutschmid observed that 2666—the number of years resulting from the summation of the Massoretic numbers for the period (Gen. 5 to Ex. 12:4) from the creation of Adam to the Exodus² is exactly two-thirds of 4000 years. These 4000 years he took to represent a period of 100 generations of 40 years each) assigned for the duration of the world. In this way he sought to explain the artificial origin of the system (cp Nöld. Untersuch. zur Krit. des AT Dr. FBS).

² The number 2666 results from the addition of 1656, the number of years from the creation of the world to the beginning of the flood (cp Gen. 5), + 300, the sum of the years from the flood to the birth of Abraham (cp Gen. 11:10 ff.) + 75 to the departure of Abraham from Haran (Gen. 12:4) + 15 to the departure of Jacob for Egypt (= 25 to the birth of Isaac (Gen. 25:1) + 60 to the birth of Jacob (Gen. 25:26), + 100 years of Jacob's life (Gen. 47:28), + 430 years of stay in Egypt (Ex. 12:40).

CHRONOLOGY

It is worth while, however, making the relation in which, according to Oppert (1887, pp. 200-21), the Chaldean numbers for the first ages in Genesis and the statements in Genesis stand to each other. The Chaldeans reckon from the beginning of the world to Alexander 24 myriads of years, of which 17 my. represent the time from the first man to Alexander. This they allow for the creation 100 myriads of years. Now, the 7 days of the biblical account of the creation give 168 hours. This in the creation age a myriad of years is represented in the biblical account by an hour. Again, for the time of the first ten men down to the flood, the Chaldeans reckon 412,000 years (Genesis 1656). If both numbers be divided by 7, we get 60,000 and 24 respectively, and 24 years = 7.68, 24 x 10 days = 192 weeks, while 60,000 years is 5 times 12,000 years. Hence the Chaldeans seem to have reckoned 5 years (i.e. 60 months) as a myriad hour, where Genesis has reckoned 1 week (Genesis 72 x 24 years = 72 x 12 x 24 = 1,728, 1,728 weeks = 412,000 years (Chaldean) 86,400 hours). This remarkable relation, which can hardly rest on pure accident, presupposes a complicated calculation, and a very late origin for these numbers. Whenever be the theory underlying the numbers of Genesis, one thing, therefore, is certain: for a sine chronology of the times before the Exodus, the 61 numbers, appearing as they do for the first time in the youngest sources of the Pentateuch, afford no security.

The case is no better with the chronology of the interval that extends from the Exodus to the building of the temple of Solomon. We have here, indeed, a lack in 1 K. 6:1 which makes the building of the temple begin in the 480th year after the Exodus, but this number did not make its appearance till a time when the temple of Solomon was no more (cp. above, § 1). It bears, moreover, the clear impress of being artificial; for it plainly counts from Moses to David twelve generations of forty years each, which we can easily identify as follows: Moses, Joshua, Othniel, Ehud, Deborah, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, Eli, Samuel, Saul, and David. This explanation of the origin of the number 480 is corroborated by the fact that the five "little" Judges in Ju. 10 and 12 appear to have been inserted into the Deuteronomistic Book of Judges later on the object of their insertion, see Judges, § 91. Nor can anything certain be obtained from the individual numbers, since they are neither quite clear nor free from gaps.

It remains obscure, e.g., how the numbers relating to the supremacy of the Philistines and the judgeship of Samson (13:1-14:1 and 16:31) are related to each other; how the twenty years from the arrival of the ark at Kirjath-jearim to the victory of Samuel over the Philistines are to be fitted into Samuel's history (1 S. 7:5); and how the ninety-four years of foreign oppression are to be combined with the data concerning the length of rule of the individual Judges.²

The tradition also presents gaps, however, since it does not mention the time during which Joshua was the leader of the Israelites, and in 1 S. 13:1 the numbers for Saul are entirely wanting. Finally, 2 Sam. allows Eli in 1 S. 4:18 only twenty years instead of the forty of 1 Pt.; and the frequently recurring round numbers, such as 40 for Moses, Othniel, Deborah-Barak, Gideon, Eli (2 S. 20) and David; 80 (= 2 x 40) for Ehud; and 20 (= 2 x 10) for Tola (23), and Jair (22)—go to set in still clearer light the unhistorical character of the data.

The matter may rest, then, as Noldeke left it at the end of his chronology of the period of the Judges (op. cit. 197), with the verdict that 'neither for the several divisions of the period of the Judges nor for its whole duration

² If we reckon together the numbers for this period, we get as follows:—40 (stay in the wilderness) + 40 (Othniel, Ju. 3:11) + 20 (Ehud, 3:30) + 40 (Deborah-Barak, 3:1) + 40 (Gideon, 8:18) + 23 (Tola, 10:2) + 22 (Jair, 10:3) + 6 (Jephthah, 12:7) + 7 (Ishai, 12:9) + 10 (Eli, 12:11) + 8 (Abdon, 12:14) + 20 (Samson, 16:31) + 40 (Eli, 1 S. 4:18) + 20 (Samuel, 1 S. 7:2) + 40 (David, 1 K. 2:11) + 40 (Solomon, 1 K. 6:1) = 400 years. If we deduct the 'little' Judges (Tola, Jair, Ithai, Abdon, and Abdon = 70), we shall have a total of only 330 years. For Joshua and Saul, for whom the numbers are lacking, there still remain, to complete the 430 years, according to the first calculation 40 years, according to the second and third 110. If, however, we are to insert between the periods of the several Judges the 94 years of foreign oppression (3 [Cushan Rishathaim, Ju. 3:8] + 13 [Ishai, 3:14] + 20 [Ishai, 4:1] + 7 [Mithianes, 11:3] + 3 [Ammoleth, 9:22] + 18 [Ammoleth, 10:1] + 20 [Philistines, cp. 13:11-20 and 16:31]), we get 334 or 424 years—according to the first reckoning already 34 years too many, with nothing left for Joshua and Saul; according to the second, only sixteen years for these two together, a period far from sufficient for the deeds of both.

is a chronology any longer attainable.' It is, therefore, also useless to seek, by calculation from these numbers, to ascertain the time of the leadership of Joshua and the reign of Saul. The best we can go is to conclude, from passages like Am. 2:10-23, that an old tradition estimated the journey through the wilderness at forty years. (On the chronology of the Book of Judges, see Judges, § 15.)

It is much harder to deal with the chronological dates for the period from the building of the temple by

6. Temple to Nebuchadnezzar.

Solomon to the conquest of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. In various important instances we now meet with statements concerning the year of the reigning king to which the event narrated belongs. Thus in regard to events of war we read: 'In the fifth year of King Rehoboam Shishak King of Egypt came up against Jerusalem' (1 K. 11:25), and 'In the ninth year of Hosai the king of Assyria took Samaria' (2 K. 17:6). So also in regard to home affairs: 'In the thirteenth year of King Jehoshaphat the priests had not repaired the breaches of the house' (2 K. 12:7). Clear as such passages seem to be, we need to know which year of a given king was called the first, the year in the course of which he ascended the throne or the first complete year at the beginning of which he was already seated on the throne. Sound information on this point is still more indispensable, however, for the understanding of the further data for our period supplied by the Books of Kings. These give the sum of the years of reign of each several king. If, however, for any interval that can be defined by means of events related, we add together these amounts, the totals for the parallel kingdoms of Judah and Israel do not agree. The question becomes very complicated when at each accession the date is regularly defined synchronistically, by years of the contemporary ruler of the neighbouring kingdom of Israel or Judah. This synchronism again leads to a reckoning of its own. What we have first to do is to estimate the value of the various chronological data which form a sort of framework for the whole history of the period. Then we can determine the importance and range of the individual dates assigned by means of accession.

The statements concerning the duration of a reign as well as the synchronism of its beginning form parts of the brief reviews which pass judgment on each king from the standpoint of the Deuteronomistic law (see Kings, Books on, § 1 ff.). The two chronological elements, however, have a diverse origin; for the synchronistic notes betray their character as 'subjective additions of the Epitomator.' It is clear to begin with, that this noting of synchronism was not in actual use during the existence of the two kingdoms: apart from dates of accessions, we find it only once—at the fall of Samaria (2 K. 17:6), the point where the system comes to an end.

It would be natural to maintain that the very construction of the chronological notes reveals their diverse origin: the verb haya has in the same sentence one meaning for the words that precede, and another for those that follow. It is to be construed as intransitive ('he became king') as well as progressive ('he reigned'). For instance, in 2 K. 11:23 'In the fifteenth year of Amaziah the son of Joash, king of Judah, Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel haya (= became king, and also reigned) forty-one years in Samaria.' If here and there (1 K. 15:25 16:29 22:52; 2 K. 3:1 13:13) haya is added to haya, this only proves, it would seem, a sense of the irreconcilability of expressing both the date of accession and the duration of the reign by the simple verb haya. The double sense of this verb, however, is peculiar to such annals, and is to be explained by the activity of the style. Exactly so in the list of kings of Tyre given by Josephus (c. 116.112) from Menander of Ephesus, hastatē is used in both senses at the same time: 'he became king' as well as 'and he reigned.'

The decisive proof, however, of the secondary character of the synchronistic numbers is reached only when we compare them with the years of reign. It then appears that the former has been attained by calculation from the latter, although the method that has been followed cannot in all points be discerned.¹ A tabular exhibition of the data will be the best way to make this clear. In the first column we give the date reckoned from an imaginary era of the division of the kingdom, and in the last the references from the Books of Kings.

This table shows that at the end of the 258th year after the division of the kingdom, there had elapsed 258 synchronistic years, 241 1/2 years of reign in Israel, and 260 such years in Judah; and we have thus the singular equation $258 = 241\frac{1}{2} + 260$. The result is even more singular, however, when we examine separately the parts before and after the first point of coincidence obtained through a contemporaneous accession in both lines. Before the year of accession of Jehu and Athaliah there were only 88 years according to the synchronisms for 98 years of reign in Israel and 95 in Judah; but for the second part there are 170 years according to the synchronisms for only 143 1/2 years of reign in Israel and 165 in Judah. Whilst thus, in the first period, the number, according to the synchronistic calculation, is smaller than the sum of the traditional years, in the second period, which is longer by about a half, it exceeds the traditional years not inconsiderably. Similar variations for smaller periods can easily be proved by a glance at the table. Nor can we equalize the synchronistic and the traditional numbers by assuming that the latter represent a popular way of counting according to which from the middle of the first to the beginning of the third year was considered three years, as in the case of the siege of Samaria (2 K. 18:10). The excess of the traditional values in the period before Jehu could perhaps be thus explained, but not their defect in the following period. Nor is it possible by altering the individual numbers to bring the synchronisms into harmony with the years of reign; even were one to alter all the synchronistic statements, this would do nothing towards removing the differences between the numbers for Israel and those for Judah. Thus, almost along the whole line, the discrepancy between synchronisms and years of reign is incurable.

We must not fail, however, to appreciate a remarkable agreement. The sum of the synchronistic years is very nearly equal to the sum of the years of reign for Judah (258 = 260). The slight difference of two years can have no weight, and can perhaps be entirely removed. In the surprising statement of 2 K. 13:1 that the accession of Jehoash of Israel happened in the 37th year of Jehoash of Judah, we may follow 37:1 and change 37 to 39; for, according to that verse, Jehoahaz, who had reigned in the 23rd year of Jehoash of Judah, reigned 17 years. In this way the sum of the years of reign in the lines of Israel and Judah according to the synchronisms, would be increased in each case by two years—for Jehoahaz would have reigned, according to the synchronism, 16 years instead of 14, and Jehoash 30 instead of 28, while the traditional numbers would undergo no alteration. Even without this slight emendation—adopted in the Jahne edition of the LXX, and demanded by Thoms, Klostermann, and Kamphausen—it is apparent that it is the sum of the Judean years of reign that forms the basis on which the synchronistic numbers are calculated. In this process, however, though the individual sums have not been disregarded, it has been impossible, especially in the case of the kings of N. Israel, to avoid important variations.

¹ It has recently been shown by Benzinger (Comm. zu den Königen, 1^{ste} Aufl., pp. xxiv-xxvi.) that the synchronisms start from two different points and proceed upon two distinct methods of reckoning, one of which is followed by preference in the Hebrew text and the other in Φ .

Care, however, has been taken not to alter the synchronism of events. It is worthy of note that the following requirements are satisfied: Jeroboam's reign runs parallel with those of Rehoboam and Abiah (1 K. 14 to 15:2); Baasha is king during the reign of Asa (1 K. 15:16); Jehoshaphat survives Abiah and Ahaziah, and reigns contemporaneously with Jehoram of Israel (1 K. 22:2 ff., 2 K. 3:7 ff.); the deaths of Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah fall in the same year (2 K. 9); Amaziah and Jehoash of Israel reign contemporaneously (2 K. 14:2 ff.); and Pekah is a contemporary of Jotham and Ahaz (2 K. 15:37 to 15:40).

Although the synchronistic dates have thus not been attained without regard to tradition, they are obviously, as belonging to the youngest parts of the text, not a standard for chronology. They apply to the past a method of dating with which it was quite unacquainted. This is true not only of the practice, which could never be carried out in actual life, of connecting the years of one kingdom with reigns of kings in a neighbouring kingdom, but also of the methodical practice, presupposed in such a custom, of indicating in an exact and regular way the years within one and the same kingdom, by the years of reign of its king for the time being. In such texts as we can, with any confidence, assign to pre-exilic times, we find nothing but popular chronologies associating an event with some other important event contemporary with it (cp. 1 K. 6:1 11:22² 20:1). The few dates according to years of kings given in the older history (as, e.g., 1 K. 11:23; 2 K. 12:7) may be ignored. They are too isolated, and must rest (e.g., in the writings and portions which treat of the latest pre-exilic times) on subsequent calculation, or be due to interpolation (cp. also the dates introduced by the Chronicler in deference to the desire felt at a later date for exact definition of time, of which the Books of Kings still knew nothing; 2 Ch. 13:23 15:10-19, and especially 16:1) though it is perhaps possible that, even without there being a settled system, some prominent events might, occasionally and without set purpose, be defined by years of reign. In any case, dating by native kings must be regarded as at least older than the artificial synchronism between Judah and Israel.

Dating by the years of kings was thus never systematically used by the Hebrews so long as they had national kings. They learned this useful method from the Babylonians, and then introduced it into their historical works compiled during the exile (cp. W. 47¹ Untersuch., especially pp. 87-94). Thus the question how the Hebrews dealt with the year of a king's death (i.e., whether they reckoned the fraction of a year that remained before the beginning of the next year to the deceased king, or made the first year of the new king begin at once—disappears. There can be no doubt that the synchronisms, as well as the dates and years of reign in general, presuppose the Babylonian method (the only satisfactory one), according to which the rest of the year in which any king died was reckoned to the last of his reign, and the first year of the new king was the year at the beginning of which he already wore the crown.

¹ We need take no account of the independent narratives of CHRONICLES (2:13, § 2); they do not agree even with the traditional years of reign.

CHRONOLOGY

By giving up the synchronisms we are thrown back for the chronology of the monarchy on the sums of the years of reign of the individual kings.

10. Years of reign.

The hope of finding in these numbers trustworthy material for chronology, and thus solving the singular equation $200 \text{ Judean years} = 242 \text{ Israelish years}$ represent 200 Judean years could be realised only on one condition. One might simply subtract the 242 Israelish years from the total for Judah, and regard the excess of 18 years as falling after the conquest of Samaria. Nor is there anything in the synchronism to prevent this operation, for that may have started from an incorrect calculation in putting the fall of Hoshai as late as the reign of Hezekiah. A de facto veto, however, is laid on this procedure on other grounds. If we subtract the supposed 18 years (6 years of Hezekiah and the last 12 of Ahaz) from the total for Judah, a total is left of Ahaz's reign parallel with the Israelish years of reign is the first 1 years. Therefore Pekah, who was murdered nine years before the fall of Samaria (2 K. 17:6), must, at the accession of Ahaz, have been already 6 years dead, which is impossible, since, according to 2 K. 16:5 ff., this king was attacked by him. The expectation of simple subtraction, therefore, fails; the embarrassing equation remains, about 242 Israelish years = 200 Judean years, since no objection can be raised against the contemporaneity of the deaths of Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah, 144 Israelish years = 105 Judean.

If the totals are thus unequal, very great inequalities appear, naturally, in the details. Efforts have been made to remove them; but this has not been achieved in any convincing way.

2 K. 1:3, e.g., states that during the attack of leprosy from which his father, Ahab, suffered in the last years of his life, 'Jehoram was over the palace, and ruled the people of the land'. Even were we to found on this statement the theory that the years of reign of father and son began parallel to each other, were counted year over in the numbers 52 and that, since to their respective deaths, and at the same time, during all these 49 years the father was still alive, there would still remain 144 Israelish years = 142 Judean.

Mistaken attempts of this kind are, moreover, the less to be taken into consideration that, as will appear (§ 35), even the lowest total of 144 years for the interval from Jehu to the fall of Samaria is more than 20 years too high. From all this it results that the individual numbers of years of reign, as well as the totals, are untrustworthy and useless for the purposes of a certain chronology, even if it be admitted that, within certain limits or in some points, they may agree with actual fact.

11. Basis of calculation. The untrustworthiness of the numbers becomes plainer when the principle according to which they are formed is clearly exhibited.

In 1877 E. Krey (see below, § 85) argued that, at least in the case of the Israelish kings, the several sums assigned to the respective reigns rest in general on an artificial fiction. He drew in this light that the series of kings of Judah, and indeed those also of the house of Jehu, 'show no such artificiality'; but (cp. to Bleek-We, Leitf. 265) he soon observed a playing with figures also in the items for Judah. To begin with the kings of Israel down to Jehoram, we find an exact reign of 12 years. In the case of Omri and Jehoram this is the exact number, whilst for Jeroboam, Baasha, and Ahab we have 22 (i.e., in round numbers 20-22), and for the rest—Nadab, Elah, and Ahaziah (the immediate successors of the king provided with the double period)—3 years each. This is as if we had 3 kings with 12 years each, making a total of 36—more exactly 35 years. Moreover, the totals for the first and the last four of these are each almost exactly 43. In the next part of the series, as we emphasised, we have for the 6 kings from Jehu to Hoshea a total of 144 years, which makes an average of 15 for each. One might also note the remarkable fact that, even as Jehu with his 28 years reigned about as long as his two successors, so the 40 years of Jeroboam II. also exactly equal the sum of the reigns of his successors. In the Judean line, on the other hand, a similar role is played by the figures 49 and 60. Thus, down to the destruction of Samaria in the 6th year of Hezekiah, we have from Jehu to Ahaziah 243 years, and from Ahaziah to Josiah 144 years.

CHRONOLOGY

1. Jehoiakim + Abiathar + Athaliah 40. Jehoshaphat 40. Amaziah + Azariah 41. Josiah + Manasse + Hezekiah 40 years, and from this point onwards till the last date, the 37th year of Jehoiachin, we have Hezekiah, Manasse, Azariah, and also Josiah's father Jehoram + Jehoshaphat 74 years. It would, of course, be a coincidence if the total of all these reigns should be 400 years. It would, of course, be a coincidence if the total of all these reigns should be 400 years. It would, of course, be a coincidence if the total of all these reigns should be 400 years.

There is, in fact, then, no mistake about the authenticity of the total as well as of the various items. If we take the origin of the present numbers for the years of reign of the individual kings, on which the synchronistic notices are founded, must fall in a period later than the victory of Cyrus over Babylon, and chronology cannot trust to the correctness of the numbers.

For all that, it may be conjectured the numbers in individual instances are correct. But which are such cases, can be known only in some way independent of the numbers. Sometimes, indeed, the narrative of kings or a prophetic writing can decide the point, but without help from outside we could not go far. In itself it cannot be more than probable that the last kings of Judah appear with the correct numbers. These numbers give Hezekiah 29 (2 K 18) + Manasse 55 (214), Azariah 1 (215), Josiah 31 (221), Jehoiakim 1 (232), Jehoiachin 11 (233), Jehoiachin 1 (213), and Zedekiah 11 years (214); thus, 141 years in all, embodying an estimate of 133 years from the fall of Samaria to the conquest of Jerusalem.

Thus, the earliest date that the dates according to years of kings can lay claim to consideration is in Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Here grave mistakes in retrospective calculation (for even they rest on that) seem to be excluded by the nearness of the time. Naturally no account can be taken of the statements of the Book of Daniel, which did not originate till the second century B.C.; it knows the history of the fall of the kingdom of Judah and of the return, and only from tradition, and cannot be accused of grave mistakes (see DANIEL, in § 9 f.).

For the last period, reaching from the fall of Jerusalem to the beginning of the Christian era, we have in the Hebrew OT itself but few historical records.

13. From Fall of Jerusalem onwards.

Beyond the introduction of the law in the restored community the historical narrative does not conduct us. For the short interval preceding it we are referred to the statements in the prophets Haggai and Zechariah and in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. These, however, show that the Jews had learned in the interval how to date exactly by years of reign. The writings mentioned give dates by years of the Persian kings. All difficulties in the way of a chronology of this period, however, are not thus removed. The names Darius and Artaxerxes leave us to choose between the several bearers of these names among the Persian kings. Hence both the first and the second of the three Dariuses have been regarded as the Darius mentioned in the OT, and even all three Artaxerxes have been brought into connection with the Artaxerxes of Ezra-Neh. Then, again, the transpositions and actual additions that the Chronicler allows himself to make increase the difficulty of knowing the real order of events. In the case of Darius, indeed, only the first can, after all (in spite of Havet and Imbert), be seriously considered.

The chief interest, accordingly, lies in deciding as to the date in Ezra 7 f. which sets the return of Ezra in the seventh year of Artaxerxes. It is to be noted that this passage (7:1-10) has been revised by the Chronicler (see EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, Books of), and in both verses the date is open, from its position or lack of connection to the suspicion of not being original. K. is accordingly, leaving this datum wholly out of account, maintained (Hebr. l. op.) that Ezra made his first appearance in Jerusalem with the Gola (see ISRAEL, § 47) immediately after Nehemiah's second arrival there, while Artaxerxes I. was still on the throne, and introduced the law then. Van Hoonacker, on the other hand, accepted the datum of Ezra 7 f., but believed that it had reference to Artaxerxes II., and accordingly set down the date of Ezra's arrival as in the seventh year of that king (see p. 100). [Marquart, Die Organisation der jüd. Gemeinde nach dem sogenannten Exil, Grundriss der bibl. Arch. 1901] thinks that the careers of Nehemiah and Ezra can fall only a few decades earlier than the reported deportation of Jews to Babel under Artaxerxes III., claims Nehemiah's Artaxerxes was, he thinks, Artaxerxes II. Mnemon. He finds no trace of Ezra's presence in Jerusalem during the twelve years' governorship of Nehemiah, the reference to Ezra in Neh 12:16 is an addition of the Chronicler, Nehemiah, too, is nowhere mentioned in Ezra (Neh. 8:9-10) are interpolated. Internal evidence alone can determine the date of Ezra. Neh 13 is connected naturally with Ezra 9:10-14. Ezra's arrival then follows in the time after Nehemiah's return to Susa, the text of Ezra 7 (which belongs to the redactor) has suffered in transmission; 368 or 365 was the original date reported. Nehemiah's second arrival, at any rate, fell after the promulgation of the Law (Neh 13:1), Marquart proposes to read in Neh 13:6 'at the end of his days' (etc.) implying a date between 367 (364) and 359. Cheyne, in a work almost devoid of notes, but called the provisionally summing up of special researches, differs in some respects in his chronological view of the events alike from the scholars just referred to, and from Ed. Meyer, who is about to be mentioned. (See his Hebrew Religious Life after the Exile, 1898, translated, after revision by the author, by H. Stocks under the title Das religiöse Leben der Juden nach dem Exil, 1901.) Like Marquart he doubts the correctness of the text of Neh 5:14; but he is confident that the Artaxerxes of Ezra-Nehemiah is Artaxerxes I., and that Nehemiah's return to Susa precedes the arrival of Ezra with the Gola. The incapacity of Nehemiah's successor (the Firshatha?) probably stimulated Ezra to seek a man from the king, though the terms of the supposed man in Ezra 7 cannot be relied upon. Ezra seems to have failed at the outset of his career, and it was the news of this failure, according to Cheyne, that drew Nehemiah a second time from Susa. Klostermann's treatment of the chronology in Herzog cannot be here summarised. Etc.]

Ed. Meyer's thorough discussion (Entst. '90), however, has convinced the present writer that we are not entitled to call in question the arrival of Ezra before Nehemiah, and consequently that the datum of Ezra 7 f. may be right after all. If so, Ezra returned to Jerusalem with the Gola in 458 B.C., having it for his object to introduce the law there. In this, however, he did not succeed. It was not until after Nehemiah had arrived in Jerusalem in 445 B.C. clothed with ample powers, and had in the same year restored the city walls with his characteristic prudence and energy, that Ezra was at last able to come forward and introduce the law under Nehemiah's protection (445 B.C.). From this date onwards till 433 B.C. (cp. Neh. 13:6) Nehemiah continued in Jerusalem. Shortly after 433 B.C., perhaps in 432 B.C., he obtained a second furlough. How long this lasted we do not know; but its importance is clear from Neh. 13:4.

15. Later times. The OT offers no further chronological material for determining the dates of the last centuries before Christ.

chronological data, we have to inquire whether the foreign nations, which so often come through the events of history into contact with Israel, can help us. In so doing we must consider in the first place the Egyptians. It is to Egypt that the narrative of the origin of the people of Israel points; thither escaped the remnant of the community of Gedaliah; and in the interval between these times, as also later, the fortunes of Palestine were often intertwined with those of Egypt.

The Egyptians themselves possessed no continuous era: for the quite unique monument, on a stèle from Tanis, of the 26th year of the king Nubti (according to Steindorff probably none other than the god Set of Fins), is too obscure and uncertain, and would not help us at all even were it more intelligible. Nor yet does the Sethi-period help us much. This was a period of 1461 years, at each recurrence of which the last days of the solar year and of the ordinary year of 365 days once again coincided for four years, or, what amounts to the same thing, the Dog star, from whose rising the solar year was reckoned, again appeared on the 1st of Thoth. The period was never used for chronological purposes.¹ Nor have the monuments fulfilled the expectation, not unreasonable in itself, that by the help of inscriptions giving dates according to two methods it would be possible, by calculation, to reach a more exact chronology for Egyptian history. The most learned Egyptologists, indeed, can themselves determine Egyptian chronology only through combination with data from outside sources. The conquest of Egypt by Cambyses in the year 525 B.C. furnishes their cardinal point. From this event, the years of the reign of the kings of the 26th dynasty may be fixed with certainty by the help of the data supplied by the monuments, Herodotus, and Manetho. What lies before Psamtik I., the first pharaoh of this dynasty, however, is in the judgment of Egyptologists more or less uncertain, and therefore for other chronological determinations the records of that earlier time are either not to be used at all or to be used with the greatest caution.

Still, even this short period, from 664/3 (the accession of Psamtik I.) to 525 B.C., is a help to us by supplying points of reference. Through synchronisms of Egyptian and Jewish history several events of the time are to a certain extent fixed. Thus Necho II. (middle of 610 B.C. to beginning of 594 B.C.) is admitted to be the king who fought the battle at Megiddo that cost Josiah his life. So mention is made in the OT of Hophra (Apries), who reigned 588-569 B.C., and was even down to 564 nominally joint ruler with Amasis (see EGYPT, § 60). Thus we get fixed points for the contemporaries of Necho II., Josiah, Jehoahaz, and Jehoiakim;—and for the contemporaries of Hophra, Jeremiah, and the Jews in Egypt (Jer. 41-45)—although neither for the battle of Megiddo nor for that of Carchemish can the year be determined from Egyptian data. On the other hand, these Egyptian data are sufficient to prove that the astronomical edifice of Mahler is quite impossible.

For the time before Psamtik I., the rulers of the 25th dynasty may be fixed approximately. Tanutamon ruled alone only a short time, and therefore may fall out of account. The data for his three predecessors do not agree (cp EGYPT, § 60 f.). Taharqa reigned, according to the monuments, 26 years; according to Manetho, 12 (var. 8-9). Sabako reigned, according to the monuments, was uncertain; according to Manetho it was 14 (var. 12).

The confirmation that Mahler (op. cit., p. 56 ff.) seeks for 1135 B.C., as the date of the Exodus in the statement that under Menephthah, whom he holds to be the pharaoh of the Exodus, was celebrated the beginning of a Sethi-period, which may have happened in the year 1138 B.C., is certainly weak, since the pharaoh who according to Ex. 11 was drowned could not have reigned after that for 17 years. See EXODUS.

See EXODUS.

CHRONOLOGY

Sabako reigned, according to the monuments, 12 years; according to Manetho, 8 (var. 12).

If we assign to Sabatoko Manetho's number of years (fourteen) and take, as our basis for the rest, the numbers of the monuments, we get the following: Taharka, 690-664 B.C.; Sabako, 704-690 B.C.; and Sabako, 716-704 B.C. Still, according to the view of Steindorff, to whom we are indebted for these data, Taharka may have reigned even longer than twenty-six years, perhaps along with Sabatoko. Since, however, Ed. Meyer gives Sabako 728-716, Sabatoko circa 704, and makes Taharka as early as 704 real master, although not till 689 official ruler, of Egypt (cp Gesch. Altg. 343 ff.), all sure support is already gone. Besides, although according to Meyer (op. cit. 344) the identity of Sabako with the Assyrian Sabai and the Hebrew שבו (So', or, more correctly, Sava' or Seweh) in 2 K. 17.4 is indubitable, Steindorff has grave doubts as to the phonetic equivalence of these names, and finds no Egyptian datum for the battle of Altaku. It is, therefore, very difficult to get from Egyptian chronology any certain light on two OT statements relating to Egypt—viz., that Sennacherib sent messengers to Hezekiah when he heard of the expedition of Taharka (2 K. 19.4; Is. 37.9), and that Hoshea of Israel had dealings with שבו of Egypt, and was therefore bound and put into prison by Shalmaneser (2 K. 17.4).

For the chronology of the OT in still earlier times, there is, unfortunately, nothing at all to be gained from Egyptology. According to 1 K. 11.42-43 (cp 2 Ch. 12.1), Shishak (Sheshonk) was a contemporary of Solomon, and in the fifth year of Rehoboam went up against Jerusalem.

In spite, however, of the Egyptian monument at Karnak bearing the list of cities conquered by him, his date cannot be determined on Egyptological grounds (on biblical grounds it is usually given as about 930 B.C.). As to 'Zerah the Cushite' (2 Ch. 11.9 ff.), we need not expect to find any mention of him in Egyptian sources (Zerah).

The clay tablets found at Tell el Amarna (see ISRAEL, § 61), indeed, make some important contributions to our knowledge of the relations of Palestine to Egypt; but for the chronology they afford nothing certain. We must get help from the chronology of Babylonia before we can, even approximately, determine the date of the correspondence. Then it seems probable that Amen-hotep III. and Amen-hotep IV. reigned in Egypt either about 1450 B.C. or about 1380 B.C., at which time, therefore, Palestine must have stood under the sceptre of Egypt; the contemporaries of Amen-hotep III. — Burnaburias I. and Kurigalzu I. of Babylon—are assigned by Winckler to 1493-1470 and 1475-1457 B.C. respectively, and the contemporary of Amen-hotep IV. — Burnaburias II. — to 1456-1422, whilst R. W. Rogers, on the other hand (Outlines of the History of Early Babylonia, 1895, p. 56), gives 1397-1373 as the probable date of Burnaburias II., and C. Niebuhr (Chronol. der Gesch. Syr., Altg., Bab. u. Assy. von 2000-700 v. Chr., untersucht, 1806) accepts only one Burnaburias and places him and his contemporary Amen-hotep IV. in the beginning of the fourteenth century B.C. As in these tablet inscriptions the name of the Hebrews has not so far been certainly discovered, so, in the Egyptian monuments generally, we cannot find any reminiscence of a stay of Israel in Egypt or of their departure. Theories about the pharaoh of the oppression and the pharaoh of the Exodus remain, therefore, in the highest degree uncertain. Neither Joseph nor Moses is to be found in Egyptian sources; supposed points of contact (a seven years famine, and the narrative of Manetho about Osarsiph Moses in Josephus, c. Ap. 1. 1-28; on this cp Ed. Meyer, Gesch. Altg. 276 f.) have proved, on nearer examination, untenable.¹ Apart, therefore, from the dates of the rulers of the twenty-fifth and the twenty-sixth dynasties, there is very little to be gained for OT chronology from Egyptology. On Egyptian Chronology see also EGYPT, § 11.

Assyriology offers much more extensive help. It is much better supplied with chronological material, since

23. Help from Assyriology. It possesses, for a series of 228 years, inscriptions containing careful lists of Eponyms, lists, that is, giving the name of the officer after whom the year was called, and mentioning single important events falling within the year. These brief notes alone are quite enough to give the lists an extraordinary importance. Their value is further increased, however, by the fact that the office of Eponym had to be held in one of his first years, commonly the second full year of his reign, by each king. Hence the order of succession of the Assyrian kings and the length of their reign can be determined with ease, especially as names of kings are distinguished from those of other Eponyms by the addition of the royal title and of a line separating them from those that precede them (cp ASSYRIA, § 19 ff.). The monumental character, too, of these documents, exempting them, as it does, from the risk of alteration attaching to notes in books, gives assurance of their trustworthiness. Nor is the incompleteness of the list supposed by Oppert a fact. In regard to the order of succession no doubt is possible.

The establishment of this uninterrupted series of 228 years can be accomplished with absolute certainty (as

24. Method. we shall see below) by the help of an eclipse of the sun assigned by the list to the Eponym year of Pur Sugal of Gozan.² In order to be able to determine the eclipse intended, however, and thus to fix the year astronomically, we have first to bring into consideration the so-called Canon of Ptolemy³—next to these Assyrian Eponym lists, perhaps the most important chronological monument of antiquity. This Canon is a list giving the names of the rulers of Babylon, Babylonian, Assyrian, and Persian from Nabonassar to Alexander the Great (the Egyptian Ptolemies and the Romans are appended at the end), with the number of years each of them reigned, and the eclipses observed by the Babylonians and the Alexandrians—the years being reckoned according to the era of Nabonassar, i.e., from that prince's accession. The trustworthiness of this document is proved, once for all, by the astronomical observations it records,⁴ from which we learn that the beginning of the era of Nabonassar falls in the year 747 B.C.⁵

The Canon can be combined with the Assyrian Eponym lists, and the establishment of the latter with certainty effected in the following way. On the one hand, the Ptolemaic Canon assigns to the year 30 of the era of Nabonassar, 700 B.C., the accession of Arkeanos (= Sargina on the fragment of the Babylonian list of kings); and, on the other hand, Assyrian clay tablets identify this year, the first of the rule of Sarrukin (i.e., Sargon or Arkeanos) over Babylon with the

⁵ More exactly (since the dates are reduced to the common Egyptian year) on the first of Thoth (= 29th Feb.), not (as according to Babylonian official usage might have been expected) on the 1st of Nisan (= 21st March) (cp Henrich, GR I, 488, and see below § 26).

CHRONOLOGY

Eponym year of Mannu-ki-Ašur-lī' (Schr. KAT 7², 491) the thirteenth of Sargon's rule in Assyria.¹ Hence we may identify this Eponym year of Mannu-ki-Ašur-lī' (the thirteenth year of Sargon's reign in Assyria) likewise with the year 700 B.C.; and, as the series is uninterrupted, all its dates become known. We can, then, obtain astronomical confirmation of the correctness of this combination (and so also of the trustworthiness of the Ptolemaic Canon and the Assyrian Eponym lists) in the way hinted at already. For, if the Eponym year of Mannu-ki-Ašur-lī' is the year 700 B.C., the Eponym year of Pur Sugal, to which, as we saw above, there is assigned a solar eclipse, must be the year 763 B.C.; and astronomers have computed that on the 15th June of that year a solar eclipse occurred that would be almost total for Nineveh and its neighbourhood. Thus the Assyrian Eponym list may safely be used for chronological purposes.

On the ground of the statements of this list, then, we have, for the years 893-666 B.C., fixed points not to

25. Result. be called in question by which to date the events of this period in Israel; for the Assyrian inscriptions not only supply direct information concerning certain events in Israel's own history, but also in other cases fix the date of contemporaneous events which the narrative of the OT presupposes. Then the Ptolemaic Canon, which from 747 B.C. onwards accompanies the Assyrian Eponym list, continues when the Eponym list stops (in 666 B.C.), and conducts us with certainty down to Roman times.

We are thus enabled to determine beyond all doubt the background of the history of Israel and Judah from 893 downwards, and obtain down to Alexander the Great the following valuable dates:—

893 B.C. TO ALEXANDER THE GREAT

893-885	Taklat-Adar.
884-880	Asim-er-pal.
885-882	Shalmaneser III. (Salma-nu-uššir)
884-882	Samši Kammān.
881-884	Rammān-nirari (III.).
882-881	Shalmaneser III. (Salma-nu-uššir)
882-881	Asur-dan III. (Asimdan III.)
881-880	Asur-nirari.
880-877	Tiglat-pileser III. (Taklat-habal-Sarra)
877-875	Shadnam-er III.
875-873	Sargon (Arkeanos, 700-805, king of Babylon).
873-871	Sennacherib (Sin-a-bi-ib).
870-868	Esarhaddon (Asarhaddon, Asur-ah-iddin = Asaridinos in Pt. Can.).
667	first year of the reign of Asur-bani-pad, who perhaps reigned till 626.
The continuation is supplied by the Ptolemaic Canon which specifies the rulers of Babylon:—
667-648	Saodmehinos (= Samsa-Sum-ukin).
648-646	Kinilamallanos.
646-605	Nabopolassar (= Nabū-bahal-ussin).
604-562	Nabokollasros (= Nabū-kudurri-ugur, נְבוֹכַדְנֶצַּר and נְבוֹכַדְנֶצַּר).
562-560	Illoardamos (= Avil-Marduk, אֲוִיל־מַרְדֻּךְ).
560-556	Nerikasolassros (= Ningal-Sar-ugur).
556-549	Nabonahos (= Nabū-nā'id).
549-540	Kyrus (= Kuruš, כּוּרֻשׁ).
540-532	Kambyses (= Kambuyija).
532-486	Darius I. (= Dārayavus, דָּרְיָוֶשׁ).
486-485	Xerxes (= Khšayārša, חִשְׁתִּישָׁרְשָׁא).
485-474	Artaxerxes I. (= Artakšastā, אֲרַתַּחְשַׁשְׁטָא).
474-465	Darius II.
465-459	Artaxerxes II.
459-448	Ochus.
448-437	Artabanos (= Arsēs).
437-424	Darius III.

Here follows Alexander the Great, who died in 323 B.C.

With regard to this summary it is to be noted that (as is a matter of course in any rational dating by years of reign) it is certainly the case in the Ptolemaic Canon the actual considered as the first of any king is the earliest year at the beginning of which he was already really reigning; in the preceding year he had begun to reign on his predecessor's death. Short reigns, accordingly, which did not reach the beginning of the new year, had to remain unnoticed, as that of Labrosar-chad (Labasi-Marduk) in the year 556, which, according to Berossus, lasted only nine months. It is further to be noted that the beginning of the year did not fall in the two lists on the same day. The Eponym lists make the year begin on the first of Nisan, the 21st of March, while the Ptolemaic Canon follows the reckoning of the ordinary Egyptian year of 365 days, the beginning of which, as compared with our mode of reckoning, falls one day earlier every four years. Thus, if in the year 747, as was indeed already the case in 748, the beginning of the year fell on the 20th of February, the year 744 would begin on the 25th. For a period of a hundred years this difference would amount to twenty-five days. Thus the beginning of the year 747 B.C. would fall on the 1st of February; and so on. Therefore for the period 747-723 B.C., the beginning of the year would always fall somewhat near the beginning of ours.

¹ From the thirteenth year of his reign down to his death in the seventeenth (and so, as the Ptolemaic Canon states, for five years) Sargon must have reigned over Babylon also.

CHRONOLOGY

If, then, the chronological data of the OT were trustworthy, as soon as one cardinal point where the two series

27. Care necessary.

—that of the OT and that just obtained—came into contact could be established with certainty, the whole chronology of the OT would be at once determined, and the insertion of the history of Israel into the firm network of this general background would become possible. In the uncertainty, however, in which the chronological data of the OT are involved, this simple method can lead to no satisfactory result. All points of coincidence must be separately attended to; and, although we may start out from a fixed point in drawing our line, we must immediately see to it that we keep the next point of contact in view. Unfortunately, in going backwards from the earliest ascertainable date to a remoter antiquity such a check is not available.

The earliest date available, as being certain beyond doubt, for an attempt to set the chronology of the OT on a firm basis is the year 854 B.C., in which Ahab king of Israel was one of the confederates defeated by Shalmaneser II. (859-825) at Karkar (Schr. KGF, 356-371 and *K. 17*², 193-200). Since, however, the OT contains no reference to the event, it is of no use for the purpose of bringing the history of Israel into connection with general history till we take into consideration also the next certain date, 842 B.C., in which year presents were offered in the same Assyrian king, Shalmaneser II., by Jehu (*K. 17*², 208-211). Within these thirteen years (854-842) must fall the death of Ahab, the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, and the accession of Jehu. Of this period the most that need be assigned to Jehu is the last year, which may have been at the same time also the year of Jehoram's death; for it may be regarded as quite probable that it would be immediately after his accession that Jehu would send presents to the Assyrian king to gain his recognition and favour. On the other hand, the traditional values of the reigns require for Ahaziah two years (1 K. 22:52), and for Jehoram alone twelve years (2 K. 3:1); so there appears to be no time left for Ahab after 854. The death of Ahab, however, cannot be assigned to so early a date as 854.¹ The reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, therefore, must be curtailed by more than one year. The course of events from 854 to the death of Ahab in the struggle with the Syrians has, accordingly, been ranged in different ways.

Wellhausen (*Ug*², 71) supposes that, in consequence of the universal defeat in 854, Ahab abandoned the relation of vassalage to Aram that had lasted till then, and thus provoked a Syrian attack on Israel. Then, by the victory at Aphek in the second year and the capture of Benhadad, he compelled the Syrians to conclude peace and to promise to deliver up the Gileadite cities they had won from Israel (1 K. 20). As the

CHRONOLOGY

Syrians did not keep their promise, he undertook in the third year of the peace the infamous expedition for the conquest of Ramoth-gilead, in which he met his death (1 K. 22). Thus the death of Ahab would fall about the year 851. Schrader, on the other hand, sees in Ahab's taking part in the battle of Karkar a consequence of the conclusion of peace with Aram that followed the battle of Aphek, and finds it thus possible to assign Ahab's death to so early a date as 851. Even if we inclined to follow the representation of Schrader (Wellhausen's is much more attractive), the Assyrian notice of the battle of Karkar in 854 establishes at least one point, that the beginning of Jehu's reign cannot be earlier than 842, and the traditional numbers must be curtailed. On the question just discussed see also Ahab.

The year 842 B.C. may, therefore, be assigned as that of the accession of Jehu. In the same year also perished Jehoram, king of Israel, and Ahaziah, king of Judah, whilst Athaliah seized the reins of government in Jerusalem.

If from this date, equally important for both kingdoms, we try to go back, we can determine with approximate certainty the year of the division of the monarchy. The years of reign of the Israelitish kings down to the death of Jehoram make up the sum of ninety-eight, and those of the kings of Judah down to the death of Ahaziah the sum of ninety-five; whilst the synchronisms of the Books of Kings allow only eighty-eight years. Since the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram of Israel must be curtailed (§ 28), if we assume ninety years as the interval that had elapsed since the partition of the kingdoms this will be too high rather than too low an estimate. The death of Solomon may, accordingly, be assigned to $\pm$ 930 B.C. Wellhausen (*Ug*², 9 f.), indeed, raises an objection against this, on the ground of a statement in the inscription of Mesha; but the expression in the doubtful passage is too awkward and obscure to lead us, on its account, to push back the death of Solomon to 950 B.C., or even farther.¹

In this connection it is not unimportant that the statements of Menander of Ephesus in regard to the

30. Menander. Tyrian list of kings confirm the assignment of 930 B.C. as the approximate date of the death of Solomon.

According to the careful discussion that Franz Rühl has devoted to this statement (see below, § 85 end), preserved to us in three forms (first, in Josephus, C. Ap. 1.8; second, in the Chron. of Euseb., and third, in Theophilus ad Autol. iii. 100-102), we may, assuming v. Gutschmid's date of 814 B.C. for the foundation of Carthage, fix on 960-936 as the period of reign of Eriamos or Hiram, and on 878-866 B.C. as that of Eithobalos or Ethba'al. Now, Ahab was son-in-law of Ethba'al (1 K. 16:13) and since Ethba'al at his accession in the year 878 B.C. was thirty-six years old, he could quite well have had a marriageable daughter a few years later, when Ahab, who according to 1 K. 16:29 reigned twenty-two years (about 872-851 B.C.), ascended the throne. Moreover, Menander mentions a one-year famine under Eithobalos, which even Josephus (Ant. viii. 132) identifies with the three-year famine that, according to 1 K. 17, fell in the beginning of the reign of Ahab. Further, Eriamos (or 936) may be identified with Hiram, the friend of Solomon (cp. 1 K. 5:18 24 f. 32 39 to 46), and, whether we adopt the opinion that Hiram, the contemporary of David (2 S. 5:11), was the same person as this friend of Solomon's, or suppose that the name of the better-known contemporary of Solomon has simply been transferred to the Tyrian king who had relations with David, the year $\pm$ 930 B.C. for the death of Solomon, agrees excellently with this Phoenician synchronism.

¹ We translate lines 7-9 thus:—'Omri conquered the whole land of Medaba, and Israel dwelt there during his days and half the days of his son, forty years, and Kamos recovered it in my days.' He thus arrives at an estimate of at least sixty years for Omri's and Ahab's combined reigns, since only by adding the half of Ahab's reign to the part of Omri's reign during which Moab was tributary, is the total of forty years attained. It is to be noted, however, that 'Israel,' which We. (scilicet) Smeil and Socin, Die Inschr. des K. Mesa von Moab, 1886, p. 13) supplies as the subject to 'dwelt' (229), is lacking in the inscription, and that even with this insertion the construction is not beyond criticism. Is it, in the undoubted awkwardness of the passage, not possible to translate thus:—'Omri conquered the whole land of Medaba, and held it in possession as long as he reigned, and during the half of the years of my reign he held it in all forty years.' But yet in my reign Kamos recovered it. In that case there is no ground for ascribing so many as sixty years to the reigns of Omri and Ahab. Nay, the possibility is not excluded, that 2 K. 3:5 is right in making the revolt of Moab follow the death of Ahab, and then the futile expedition of Jehoram of Israel and Jehoshaphat of Judah against Moab could be taken as marking the end of the forty years.

If it has been difficult to attain sure ground in the early period of the divided monarchy, it is even less possible to determine anything with certainty about the period preceding Solomon's death. If the data of the OT concerning the reigns of Solomon and David (40 years each, 1 K. 2:11-1142) have any value, David must have attained to power about the year 1000 B.C. Concerning Saul, even 1 S. 13:1 gives us no real information, and regarding the premonarchic period the most that can be said is that, according to the discoveries at Tell-el-Amarna the Hebrews were, about the middle of the fifteenth century B.C., not yet settled in Canaan.¹

For the time, therefore, from the partition of the kingdom down to the year 842 B.C., we must be content with the following estimate:—

32. Schism to Jehu.

From 842 B.C. onwards, there is no fixed point till we come to the eighth century. Then we have one in the eighth year of the Assyrian king 33. Certain dates 842–721.

Tiglath-pileser III. (745–727) loc. cit. 738 B.C. In that year, according to the cuneiform inscriptions, this king of Assyria received the tribute of Menahem of Israel. When the OT tells of this (2 K. 15:19 ff.) it calls the Assyrian king Pul; although elsewhere (2 K. 15:29, 16:10) it uses the other name, Tiglath-pileser. Of the identity of the two names, however, there can be no doubt (K. 17¹² 223 ff., COT, 1210), and we are not to think of the reference being to a Babylonian king, or an Assyrian rival king, or to assume that Tiglath-pileser himself, at an earlier period, twenty years or more before he became king over Assyria, while still bearing the name of Pul, made an expedition against the land of Israel (so Klo. Sam. u. Kd. [87] p. 496). If we add that Ahaz of Judah procured for himself through a payment of tribute the help of Tiglath-pileser against the invading kings, Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus; that, accordingly, the Assyrian king took the field against Philistia and Damascus in 734 and 733; and that in 732, after the conquest of Damascus, Ahaz also appeared in Damascus to do homage to Tiglath-pileser, there remains to be mentioned only the equally certain date of the beginning of the year 721 B.C. (Hommel, GB. I 676) for the conquest of Samaria, to complete the list of assured dates between 842 and 721.

The attempt to arrange the kings of North Israel during this period is hampered by fewer difficulties in the interval 842–738 than are to be found in that between 738 and 721. If we assume that Menahem died soon after paying tribute, we shall still have in the 113 years reckoned by the traditional account from the accession of Jehu to the death of Menahem a slight excess, since for the period 842–738 we need only 104 years. Still, we can here give an approximate date for the individual reigns. The latest results of Kautzsch (in substantial agreement with Brandes, Kamphausen, and Riehm) are the following:—Jehu 841–815, Jehoahaz 814–798, Jehoash 797–783, Jeroboam II. 782–743 (or before 745), Zedekiah and Shallum perhaps also in 743, Menahem 742–737 (or $\pm$ 745 to after 738). For the last period, on the other hand, from the death of Menahem to the conquest of Samaria, the traditional reckoning gives thirty-one years, whilst from 737 to 721 we have hardly sixteen. The necessary shortening of the reigns is accomplished by Kautzsch in this way: Pekahiah 730, Pekah 735–730, Hoshea 720–721. Wellhausen has abandoned his former theory that Pekahiah and Pekah are identical, and makes the latter begin to reign in $\pm$ 735. To Hoshea, the last king of Israel, he assigns an actual reign of at least ten years, although he assumes that according to 2 K. 17:4 ff. he came under the power of Assyria before the fall of Samaria.

For the Judæan line of kings the starting-point is likewise the year 842 B.C., in which Ahaziah of Judah met his death at the hand of Jehu, and

Athaliah assumed the direction of the government. On the other hand, we do not find, for the next hundred years, a single event independently determined with perfect exactness by years of the reigning king of Judah. We must come down as far as 734 B.C. before we attain certainty. We know that at that time Ahaz had already come to power, and we can only suppose (according to 2 K. 15:37 ff.) that he had not long before this succeeded his father, during whose lifetime Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus were already preparing for war. The presents of King Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser in the year 734 B.C. delivered Judah from the danger that threatened it, and in 732 B.C. in the conquered Damascus the same king did homage to the victorious Assyrian, and offered him his thanks (cp 2 K. 16:7 ff. and Schröder, KAT² 527 ff.). It is still difficult, however, to allot the intervening time to the several kings of Judah; for the traditional values for the reigns require no less than 143 years from the first year of Athaliah to the death of Jotham, whilst between 842 B.C. and 734 B.C. there are only 108 years at our disposal. It is, therefore, necessary to reduce several of the items by a considerable amount, and it is not to be wondered at that different methods of adjustment have been employed. The synchronism of events between the history of Israel and that of Judah is too inadequate to secure unanimity, and the mention (not quite certain) of Azariah of Judah in Assyrian inscriptions for the years 742–740 (cp Schr. KAT², 217 ff.) does not make up the lack. On one point, however, there is agreement: that it is in the cases of Amaziah, Azariah (Uzziah), and Jotham that the deductions are to be made.

The years 841–830 B.C. for Athaliah are rendered tolerably certain by the data concerning Jehoash, the infant son of Ahaziah (2 K. 11:1 ff. 4 ff.). Then we need have no misgivings about giving Jehoash, who was raised to the throne at so young an age, about forty years. If we take these years fully, we obtain for the reign of Jehoash 835-796 B.C. The date of his death may, indeed, be pushed still farther back; but in any case his time as determined by these data cannot be far wrong, for he must have been a contemporary of Jehoahaz the king of Israel (814-798), and, according to 2 K. 12:18 ff., also of Hazael of Aram (acc. to Winckler 841-about 804 [?]). From 795 to 734 there are left only 61 years, and in this interval room must be found for Amaziah with twenty-nine years, Azariah with fifty-two, and Jotham with sixteen—no less than ninety-seven years. Even if we allow the whole sixteen years of Jotham, who, according to 2 K. 15, conducted the government during the last illness of his father, to be merged in the fifty-two years of Azariah, we do not escape the necessity of seeking other ways of shortening the interval. Amaziah's reign is estimated too high at twenty-nine years. The only thing that is certain about him is that he was a contemporary of Jehoash of Israel (797-783; cp 2 K. 14:8 ff.). It is pure hypothesis to assign him nine years (We.), or nineteen years (Kamph. and Kau.), instead of twenty-nine. The smaller number has the greater probability, since the defeat that he brought on himself by his wanton challenge of Jehoash of Israel best explains the conspiracy against him (2 K. 14:12 ff.), and he would therefore hardly survive his conqueror, but much more probably meet his death by assassination at Lachish not long after 790 B.C. (cp also St. GIJ, 1559). From the death of Amaziah to 734 reigned Azariah and Jotham. To discover the boundary between the two, we must bear in mind the Assyrian inscriptions already mentioned, which apparently represent Azariah as still reigning in the years 742-740, and must keep in view that Isaiah, who cannot be thought of as an old man when Sennacherib marched against Jerusalem in the year 701, received his prophetic call in the year of the death of Uzziah (Isa. 6:1). Accordingly, we cannot be far wrong in assigning the death of Azariah and the accession of Jotham as sole ruler to 740 B.C. More than this cannot be made out with the help of the materials at our disposal up to the present time.

If now the year of the conquest of Samaria (721 B.C.) were fixed with certainty according to the year of the king then reigning in Judah, this would appear the next resting-point after 734 B.C. The data of the OT do not agree, however, and none of them is to be relied upon. This is true even of the datum in 2 K. 18:13, lately much favoured by critics, that Sennacherib's expedition against Palestine in the year 701 B.C. was in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah (so We. DIJ [75] p. 635 ff.; Kamph. Die Chronol. der Hebr. Könige [83] p. 28; Guthe, Das Zukunftsbild des Jec. [85] p. 37, and St. GIJ, 1666 f.). In order to maintain the datum, it is not enough to say, 'The people of Judah are more likely to have preserved the year of Hezekiah in which their whole land was laid waste and their capital, Jerusalem, escaped destruction only through enduring the direst distress, than to have preserved the year of Hezekiah in which Samaria fell.' The unusual (cp 2 K. 18:19) prefixing of the numeral before 722 (cp Duhm, Jesaja, 235) of itself indicates a later origin, and this is confirmed by what we have already found as to these chronological data not belonging to the original narrative. The number fourteen is based, not upon historical facts, but upon an exegetical inference from Is. 38:5, and a consideration of the twenty-nine years traditionally assigned to Hezekiah, and must therefore rank simply with the scribe's note Am. 1:1: 'two years before the earthquake.'¹

Even when we come to the seventh century, the expectation that at least the death of Josiah in the battle of Megiddo would admit of being dated with complete accuracy by material from inscriptions is not fulfilled. From Egyptian chronology, which does not mention the date of the battle, we gather only that it must have been after 610 B.C., since the conqueror, Necho II., did not begin to reign till that year. There is, therefore, nothing left but to take as our fixed point the conquest of Jerusalem in the nineteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar—i.e., 586 B.C. (2 K. 25:18). For the intervening time we have to take into consideration, besides the death of Josiah, the data supplied by Assyriology, which place Sennacherib's expedition against Hezekiah in 701 B.C., and imply Manasseh's being king of Judah in the years 681-667 (cp Schr. *KAT*², p. 466).

¹ This is forcibly urged by Kau. (cp. Kamph. op. cit. 64) and has received the assent of Duhm (loc. cit.) and Cheyne (Introd. Is. 218).

For the whole time from the death of Jotham to the conquest of Jerusalem, tradition requires 155 years of reign, whilst from 734 B.C., when Ahaz was already seated on the throne of Jerusalem—which year, if not that of his accession, must have been at least the first of his reign—to 586 B.C., we have only 148, or, since we may reckon also the year 734 B.C., 149 years. The smallness of the difference of seven years, however, shows that we have now to do with a better tradition. Where the mistake lies we cannot tell beforehand. All we can say is that it is not to be sought between the death of Josiah and the fall of Jerusalem, since for this interval twenty-two years are required by tradition, and this agrees with our datum that Josiah must have died shortly after 610 B.C.

Let us see whether another cardinal point can be found. In 701 Hezekiah was reigning in Jerusalem. When it was that he came to the throne, whether before or after the fall of Samaria (721 B.C.), is the question. In Is. 14:28 we have an oracle against Philistia, dated from the year of the death of king Ahaz,—a chronological note which, like Is. 6:1, may have importance, if the oracle really belongs to Isaiah. Winckler and Cheyne (Int. cp Isaiah, SBOT, Adhenda) regard it as possible that the oracle may refer to agitation in Syria and Palestine, in which the Philistines shared, on the accession of Sargon (721 B.C.), when Hammur, king of Gaza, induced them to rebel, in reliance on the help of Sile'e, one of the Egyptian petty kings (cp above on Sile'e, Sab'i, So', Sewch, § 21). On this theory the death of Ahaz would have to be set down about the year 720 B.C. As, however, the authenticity of the oracle is not certain,—in fact hardly probable (cp Duhm, who even conjectures that originally there may have stood, instead of Ahaz, the name of the second last Persian king, Arsēs [= Arogos]) it is not safe to take it as fixing the death-year of Ahaz. Of greater value is the section relating to the embassy of Merodach-Baladan of Babylon to Hezekiah (2 K. 20=Is. 39). Merodach-Baladan was king of Babylon from 721 to 710. When, later, he attempted to recover his position, he held Babylon for so short a time that an embassy to the west would be impossible. Thus, Merodach-Baladan must have sought relations with Hezekiah between 721 and 709. The beginning of the reign of Merodach-Baladan, when in the year 721 or 720 he obtained possession of Babylon and held it against Sargon, commends itself as the point of time most suitable. After the battle of Dūr-ilu, which both parties regarded as a victory for themselves, it must have seemed natural to hope that the overthrow of the Assyrian kingdom would be possible, if the west joined in the attack. Moreover, Sargon once describes himself (Nimrud inscr., 18) as 'the subduer of Judah,'¹ which seems to mean that, on the suppression of the revolt in Philistia, Hezekiah resumed the payment of the tribute that had been imposed. In view of this, Winckler seems to be justified in placing the appearance of the embassy of Merodach-Baladan before Hezekiah in the year 720 or 710. Approximately, then, the year 721 may be regarded as assured for the year of the death of Ahaz.

The first year of Hezekiah's reign is thus 720 B.C., rather than 728 (Kau.), or 711 (We., and others). The discrepancy of four years, which in all that now remains between the sum of the years of reign from the death of Ahaz to the conquest of Jerusalem, and the interval 720-586 B.C. — i.e., between 130 years of reign and 135 actual years — cannot be removed otherwise than by shortening the reign of one or more of the kings. The account of the closing portion of the line of kings has already been found to merit our confidence. The shortening must therefore be undertaken somewhere near the beginning of the line of kings from Hezekiah to Josiah. The most obvious course is to reduce the long reign of Manasseh from fifty-five years to fifty-one (We., indeed, assigns him only forty-five). This, however, may seem arbitrary, and it will be simpler as well as less violent to divide the shortening among all the four reigns. If, that is to say, in the case of the years of reign of the kings from Hezekiah to Josiah, tradition included (according to popular practice) the year of accession and the year of death, we may reduce the numbers for Hezekiah, Manasseh, Amos, and Josiah by one each, and assign them twenty-eight, fifty-four, one, and thirty respectively. Thus we get the following series:—Hezekiah 720-693 (28 years), Manasseh 692-639 (54 years), Amos 638 (1 year), Josiah 637-608 (30 years), Jehoahaz 608 ($\frac{1}{2}$ year), Jehoiakim 607-597 (11 years), Jehoiachin 597 ($\frac{1}{2}$ year), and Zedekiah 596-586 (11 years). The control over the date of the death of Josiah from Egyptian history which is to a certain extent possible turns out to be not unfavourable to our results, since Pharaoh Necho II. began to reign in 610 B.C., and, as early as the end of 605, or the beginning of 605, encountered the crown prince Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish (cp. on the date of this battle which, in Jer. 46.2, is inaccurately assigned to the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Winckler, AT Untersuch., 81). Hence the year 608 B.C. for the battle of Megiddo possesses the greatest probability. That, among the numerous dates for the last decades of the kingdom of Judah which the OT furnishes, little inaccuracies, such as that in the passage (Jer. 46.2) just cited, appear, is intelligible on the ground (apart from others, as, e.g., in the case of Ezek. 33.21) of their being the result of later calculation. At all events, these variations are not to be accounted for, with Hommel (GBI 755), by the supposition that the Jews reckoned the years of Nebuchadnezzar, as well as those of their own kings, from the day on which they ascended the throne to the corresponding day in the following year. The Jews, in adopting the exact Babylonian chronological system, and applying it to their own past history, did not mutilate it and render it futile.

Beyond the points already referred to (§ 13 f.), the chronology of the times after the conquest of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. presents no difficulties worth mentioning. The Canon of Ptolemy supplies an assured framework into which the data that have been preserved can be fitted without trouble.

The tabular survey on the preceding page gathers together the dates we have established. At the end is appended a continuation indicating the most important dates down to the last century B.C. K. M.

B. NEW TESTAMENT.

The chronology of the New Testament is of great (subsidiary) importance for the study of the origins of Christianity. From the order of the events in the primitive period it will be possible to draw conclusions with regard to the influence of one event upon another; the rapidity of the historical development will enable us to measure the power of the original impulse; and only when the events have received their place in contemporary history can they be fully understood.

39. NT chronology: importance.

CHRONOLOGY

Unfortunately, the task is attended with serious difficulty, the causes of which need to be briefly described.

40. Difficulty. (1) The first Christians themselves had no interest in chronology, whether with reference to events concerning them as Christians, or with reference to events of secular history. This was due not only to their separation from the world and their limited horizon, but also, and still more, to their sense of superiority to the world (Phil. 3.20), which seemed to them already in process of dissolution (1 Cor. 7.31), and to their feeling that they had already begun to live in eternity. (2) The historical traditions of the Christians were formed wholly with the purpose of promoting Christian piety, and were therefore restricted to a small number of events, the choice of which was often, as it were, accidental, and the arrangement according to subject rather than to time. Our chronological interest was, accordingly, to be satisfied with inferences and combinations which often remain, after all, very problematical; and the gaps in the traditions prevent us from constructing anywhere a long chronological sequence. (3) Of at least a part of the traditions the historical trustworthiness is subject to such grave doubt that we can venture to use them only with great reserve, if at all. (4) In the NT, apart from some vague notices in the Fourth Gospel, the only writer who professes to give chronological data is the author of the Third Gospel and Acts. He gives no account, however, of the means by which he obtained these data. We are, therefore, unable to check his statements, and can treat them only as hypotheses. As far as we know, the old Catholic fathers—Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Julius Africanus, and Hippolytus—were the first to make chronological calculations. Whether they based them on any independent tradition or limited themselves to inferences from our Gospels is uncertain; the latter is the more probable view. Their data can receive only occasional mention here.¹ (5) It has not yet been found possible to give exact dates to certain of those events of profane history which come into question. (6) Further difficulty is caused by the complicated nature of the ancient calendar, and by the different usages in reckoning time and in beginning the year. Side by side with the various eras we have various methods of reckoning by the years of reigning monarchs.²

In the following article the years are designated by the numbers of our current Dionysian era, on the origin of which see Ideler (Handb. 2.65 ff.). By this reckoning the year 1 B.C. coincides with the year 753 A.U.C., and the year 1 A.D. with the year 754 A.U.C. The years are treated as beginning on 1st Jan., as was the case according to the Varronian reckoning in the period under consideration.

² An excellent guide through this labyrinth is Ideler's Handb. abridged and in part improved in his Lehrb. (see below, § 13). The most important tables (of the sun and moon, and of eras) are brought together from astronomical works by Gumpach, Hilfsmittel d. rechnend. Chronol., 1853. See further Bouché, Histoire de l'astronomie, 1763; E. Müller in Pauly's Realencyc. d. class. Alt. 2.2, Astr.; Matrat, Revue Chronol., two vols., 1852. Special service to NT chronology has also been rendered by Clinton, Fasti Hellénici, 1829, 2 ed., 1851; Fasti Romani, 1829-50; and by J. Klein, Fasti Consulares, Leipzig, 1881. Further bibliographical notices, and many original contributions to the subject, are to be found in Schürer, GPB, i. (1890), where, in an appendix, is given a table (taken from Clinton) of parallel years by Olympiads, and by the Seleucid, Varronian, and Dionysian eras. The third appendix discusses the months of the Jewish Calendar, and on p. 630 f. a bibliography of the very large literature of that subject is to be found.—Important for the chronology of the NT are also Wieseler, Chronol. Syn. d. vier Evangelien, 1843; Chronol. d. ap. Zeitalters, 1843; and an 'Zeitrechnung' in PKF., 1866; Beitr. zur richtigen Würdigung der Evangel., 1869; Lewin, Fasti Sacri, 1865; Lightfoot on 'The Chronology of St. Paul's Life and Epistles' in *Eccl. had lived quietly at Nazareth? We have to consider only two passages:—(1) In S. 57. If the foolish question, 'Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham?' were authentic, it would only give a superficial hint, plainly put as high as possible on the ground of the general impression from Jesus's appearance. From this no inference as to any definite number could be drawn, for among the Jews a man began to be elderly at fifty years, and the remark would merely have meant, 'You are still one of the younger men'. If the question is not authentic, it either testifies to the impression made by the account of Jesus in the tradition, that he was in the best years of life (cp. Nu. 40, 84; v. 1, or else the half-century, as an age which he had not yet attained, is intended to form an unusual contrast to the many centuries from Abraham to the then present time. In the ancient church, Irenæus (in 22) is the only writer to make use of this passage for chronology; he remarks that the presbyters in Asia Minor had on the ground of it ascribed to Jesus an age of forty to fifty years.

(2) Lk. 2:23. "The text is here not quite certain, and the sense of the most probable reading is obscure. (What does ἀρροῦμενος mean? In the Sin. SM. it is omitted from the translation.) In any case, the presence of ἀρτι ('about') forbids us to use the number as if it were exact. It merely tells us that Jesus stood in the beginning of adult manhood, and leaves undecided the question whether he had just entered on his thirtieth year or was already over thirty.

Moreover, whether the number comes from actual historical recollection at all is made uncertain by the fact that, according to No. 439, from thirty to fifty was the canonical age for certain ritual acts. It is significant that these two gospels, from Asia Minor, in so many points similar, give for the age of Jesus in these two passages the two limits of this canonical term of years.

44. Public Ministry.

designate a short period or are to be connected with the fact that the fig tree commonly bears fruit in three years (for the opposite view, see Wieseler, Synops., 202 ff. 1). The 'three days' of Lk. 13.32 express only a proverbial number both brief time and fixed limit for the opposite view, Weizsacker, Untersuchungen, 191). From Mark and Matthew we get no light, because of the arrangement of the material by subjects. The plucking of the ears in Mk. 2.23 may indicate the time when the grain was ripe; but that must have been between the middle of April and the middle of June, before which time the harvest in Galilee is not ended. Thus, if the incident was in the early months of Jesus' ministry, it does not imply a duration of more than one year. One year seems to have been the idea of the third evangelist, who, like all the writers of the second century except Irenaeus, and like many Fathers of the third century, may very well have understood literally the notation from Is. 61.1f. which he puts (Lk. 4.19) into the mouth of Jesus.

In my case, a place can be found without difficulty within the limits of one year for the entire contents of the Synoptical gospels, while to fill out several years the material is rather meagre. The feeling, shared (for instance) by Beyschlag (Leben Jesu, I 133), that it is 'violent and unnatural process' to crowd the whole development into the space of one year, is balanced by a feeling of the men of the second and third centuries, when repeated visits to Jerusalem, if the Synoptical spels really imply them, are, in view of the nearness of Galilee to Jerusalem and of the many feasts (esp the spels of John), easily conceivable within one year. The early Christian Fathers were not disturbed in their summation of a single year by the Fourth Gospel with its journeys to the feasts.

In the Fourth Gospel, apart from 6.4, if we accept the most common interpretation of ἐορτή (Jn. 51) as meaning Pentecost, the feasts group themselves into the course of a single year: 213 Passover; 51 Pentecost; 72 Tabernacles; 1022 Dedication; 1155 Passover. Irenaeus alone (ii. 223) finds three passovers mentioned in the public life of Jesus; and, since he takes the second not from 64 but from 51, he, as well as Origen (on Jn. 435 tom. 1412), must have had at 64 a different text from any known to us. The Abbot, also, according to Epiphanius (Her. 5122), found mentioned in Jn. only a passover at the beginning and one at the end of the ministry. Positive ground for assuming the later interpolation of 64 (which could well have been suggested by the substance of the following conversation) may be found in the designation of the feast there, which is different from that in 213 and 1155, a designation combining (so to speak) 51 and 72. So also the introductory formula ἦν δὲ ἔγγυς ('was at hand') is suitable only in 213 72 1155, where a journey to the feast, which does not here come in question, is to be mentioned.

Moreover, the meagreness of the narrative in Jn. is much more comprehensible if the writer thought of the whole ministry as included between two passovers. He can hardly have regarded the narrative in chaps. 3-5, and again that in chaps. 7-11, as sufficient to fill out in each case a whole year. Otherwise, if the saying with reference to the harvest (Jn. 135) is to be regarded as anything more than a proverbial phrase (used for the purpose of the figure which Jesus is employing) there would be a period of nine months for which nothing would be told but the conversation with Nicodemus and the baptizing work of the disciples, and a stay of six months in Galilee for which we should have nothing but chap. 6. If, on the other hand, only one year elapsed from the purification of the temple to the destruction of the 'temple of his body,' we should have: 213-51, only fifty days; 51-72, perhaps 127 days; 72-1022, perhaps fifty-eight days; 1022-121, perhaps 119 days. In reality, however, even this year will have to be shortened somewhat at the beginning; for the purification of the temple, which the Synoptists likewise connect with a passover (but with the last one), cannot have happened twice, and while it is incomprehensible at the beginning, it cannot be spared at the end of the ministry. Whether, then, the baptism of Jesus was before a passover, or whether the journey to John in the wilderness may have followed a journey to the passover in Jerusalem, it is wholly impossible to decide. In the latter case the complete absence from the narrative of the baptism of all recollection of such a connection would be singular; in the former it would be strange that Jesus stayed away from the passover in Jerusalem. On the other hand, since the forty days of the temptation are surely a round number drawn from OT analogies, they may safely be somewhat reduced; and the walk with the disciples through the ripe cornfields in Galilee on the sabbath is then chronologically quite possible, even if the baptism was not until immediately after the passover.

46. One year. nothing but chap. 6. If, on the other hand, only one year elapsed from the purification of the temple to the destruction of the 'temple of his body,' we should have: 213-51, only fifty days; 51-72, perhaps 127 days; 72-1022, perhaps fifty-eight days; 1022-121, perhaps 119 days. 3. The Year of the Public Appearance of Jesus.—(1) In Lk. 31 f. we have, as the last of Lk.'s several chronological notes (15 26 21 f.), a notice of the date of the public appearance of the Baptist. This notice is clearly the product of careful investigation, and it is extremely unlikely that the evangelist would have taken so much pains about fixing this date if he had not supposed himself to be at the same time fixing the year (for the Christian, the only year of real importance in the history of the world) of at least the beginning of the Messiah's ministry, which last, together with the baptism of Jesus, Lk. regarded, as appears from the whole tenor of his narrative, as the immediate consequence of the appearance of the Baptist. Whether he was right in this short allowance of time for the preaching of the Baptist we need not decide; if the ministry of the Baptist really did last longer, it is easily comprehensible that the previous time should have escaped his knowledge. What year, then, does Lk. mean? Following previous writers on the life of Jesus, B. Weiss and Deyschlag have taken as the starting-point for Lk.'s reckoning the year 12 A.D., in which Tiberius was made co-regent with Augustus. There is no proof, however, that such a method of reckoning was ever used. Neither the consuls, to which Wieseler¹ appealed, nor the great dignity of Tiberius, adduced by Schegg,² which is in any case to be ascribed to flatterers, can establish this hypothesis; and we shall have to take the death of Augustus as the starting-point. Now, Mommsen³ has proved that until the time of Nerva the reckoning usually employed was by consuls, but that when for any reason a reckoning by the years of the emperor's reign was desirable, the years were counted from the exact date of the beginning of the reign.⁴ Accordingly, Lk. must have reckoned the years of Tiberius as beginning with 19th August, 14 A.D.⁵ The fifteenth year ran from 19th August 28 A.D. to 18th August, 29 A.D. Although we cannot connect the sources from which Lk. derived his information,⁶ it is plain from the table of dates given above that the notices in Lk. 31 do not contradict one another, and we have no reason to doubt Lk.'s information. We say this in spite of the fact that in one point he shows himself not perfectly well-versed in Jewish affairs: the Roman custom of having two consuls has perhaps led him to misinterpret the fact that in the time of the high-priest Caiaphas (from about 18 A.D. to Easter 36 A.D.), the latter's father-in-law, Annas, who had been high priest in 6-15 A.D., was the real leader of the Sanhedrim. Lk. has taken this to mean that the tax were high priests at the same time (cp the same error in Acts 46).

(2) In Jn. 220, forty-six years are said to have elapsed from the beginning of the building of the temple to the beginning of Jesus' ministry and the

48. The temple. cleansing of the temple. If the forty-six years are treated as already past, this brings us to A.D. 28. Everything, however, is here uncertain—the position of the cleansing of the temple at the beginning of the ministry, and the authenticity of the conversation, as well as the evangelist's method of reckoning (on the supposition that the number comes from him).⁷

⁶ Keim assumed without any foundation, that Lk. had Josephus (Ant. xviii. 3) before him, and that he supposed the two revolutions there mentioned as occurring in the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate, which began in the twelfth year of Tiberius, to have been in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Tiberius, and so hit on the fifteenth year for the Baptist. This is, however, in contradiction with the fact of the large number of single notices in Lk. 31, which implies careful investigation, and is in itself impossible, since Josephus first mentions the Baptist in xviii. 52, and has already related the death of Philip, which happened so late as the twentieth year of Tiberius.

CHRONOLOGY

temporaneous with the imprisonment of the Baptist

49. The Baptist. (Mk. 1:14 = Mt. 11:2; Mk. 6:17 f. = Mt. 11:3 f.; cp. Lk. 3:18-20.) Jesus was baptized shortly before that (Mk. 1:12 f. and parallels), and the execution of the Baptist happened in the course of Jesus' public ministry (Lk. 7:33 f. = Mt. 11:10 f.; Mk. 6:16-29 = Mt. 11:15-17; with Mk. 6:14-16 = Lk. 9:7-9 = Mt. 11:1 f.).

The execution is related also by Josephus (Ant. xviii. 5 c. 7.4), who does not give the exact date, but is led to mention the matter in connection with the defeat of Antipas by Aretas (in the summer or autumn of 36 A.D.), which the nation believed to be a judgment of God for the murder of John. Aretas's reasons for making the war are said to have been two: (1) the divorce of his daughter by Antipas in order that the latter might marry Herodias; (2) boundary disputes. From this Keim, Holzmann, Hausrath, Schenkel, and Sevin have inferred that this divorce, to John's death, must have been not long before 36 A.D. A judgment of God, however, may well be delayed for six years, provided the crime which the people believe to be punished by it is not forgotten; whilst a favourable moment for executing human vengeance does not always arrive immediately. Moreover, it appears that boundary disputes were finally needed to bring about the actual conflict.¹

From this war, therefore, we can draw no inferences about the date of the Baptist's martyrdom. As to the marriage itself, there is, in the first place, no reason to doubt the synoptical tradition that the Baptist's contage occasioned his imprisonment. The account of Josephus neither excludes the assumption that the tetrarch waited for a good pretext before arresting John nor makes it impossible that his arrest and execution should have been separated by a short imprisonment (cp. Mk. 6:20; Mt. 11:2). That Herodias's daughter was too old to dance at the feast is shown by A. von Gutschmid (Literarisches Centralblatt, 1874, p. 522) to be wholly undemonstrable, and a banquet at Machaberis is not inconceivable. That, according to Josephus, Machaberis should have been at one time in the possession of Aretas and shortly afterwards in that of Antipas, we cannot indeed explain (cp. Schurer, 1:365); but since Josephus finds no difficulty in it, it has no force as an argument. Since, however, we cannot fix the date of the marriage, the whole matter does not help us much,² and we can only say that there is no sufficient evidence that the journey to Rome, on which Antipas made the acquaintance of his brother's wife, and his return to the tetrarchy, soon after which the marriage occurred, were not between 27 and 30 A.D.

The history of the Baptist presents, therefore, no insuperable obstacle to the view that the fifteenth year of Tiberius = 29 A.D.

4. The Year of Jesus' Death. Since the crucifixion certainly happened under Pontius Pilate, its earliest possible date is 26 A.D., the latest 35 A.D.

The complete publicity of Jesus' death and its character as a civil event, its well-understood importance as the starting-point of Christianity, its unique impressiveness, and its connection with the Jewish passover, must have made it a chief object of the awakening chronological interest of the early Christians, and at the same time have given ground for believing that the date could be fixed with reasonable certainty.

(a) This suggests that probably the chronological interest of the third Evangelist (Lk. 3:1 f.) was engaged as for little for the first public appearance of Jesus as for that of the Baptist: that it was directed towards the date of the Lord's death. He preferred, however, not to interrupt his narrative of the Passion by a chronological notice, and therefore worked back from the date of the crucifixion to the date of the beginning of Jesus' ministry, and so to that of the beginning of the ministry of the Baptist. This is confirmed by the fact that the date in Lk. 3:1 f. is, with the exception of the 'acceptable year of the Lord' in 49, the latest date that Lk. gives. If, as we have concluded above, Lk. really had a whole year in mind, he must have put the death of Jesus into the next (the sixteenth) year of Tiberius—that is, at the passover of 30 A.D.³

² Clemens, Chron. der Paul. Briefe, thinks otherwise, and reckons out 33 A.D.; but, as argument is wholly unconvincing.

³ A different view is held by Hase, Stud. u. Krit., 1837, who holds that Lk. regarded the fifteenth year of Tiberius as

CHRONOLOGY

That Lk. had worked back one year from the sixteenth year of Tiberius was the view of Julius Africanus.¹ On the other hand, Clement of Alexandria took Lk.'s fifteenth year of Tiberius as the year of Jesus' death; as did probably Tertullian, whose statement that Christ was crucified in the consulate of the two Censorius (30 A.D.) doubtless rests on Lk. 3:1 f., and was perhaps made on purpose to avoid confusion from the later method of reckoning (cp. above, § 47) which would have led him to the year 28 A.D. The statement in the revised text of Tertullian that Jesus revealed himself 'anno xvi. Tiberii Censorii' cannot be harmonised with Tertullian's other notices, and looks like an ancient correction intended to combine the statement in the text that Jesus was crucified in the fifteenth year of Tiberius with the later traditional view of a three year ministry.

(b) The theory explaining the conduct of Pilate at the trial of Jesus by the consule received from Rome

52. Pilate. Between 31 and 33 A.D. lacks all foundation; and so does the theory (Sevin, p. 135) that the hostility between Pilate and Herod (Lk. 23:12) was possible only after the complaint against Pilate (as to the date of the complaint, cp. Schurer 1:40), in which Antipas had a share. Hostility between the Roman procurator and Herod's heir must have been the rule, not the exception.

(c) If, in spite of what has been said above, the fourth Evangelist counted three passovers in the public life of Jesus (cp. above, § 45), and the period of forty-six years from the beginning of the building of the temple is to be taken seriously (cp. § 48), his chronology also would yield the year 30 for the death of Jesus.

(d) A final decision cannot be reached from the Jewish Calendar. On the one hand, the Synoptists put

54. Day of Crucifixion. the crucifixion on Friday, the 15th Nisan, John on Friday, the 14th (Mk. 15:42, Lk. 23:54, Mt. 27:62, Ju. 19:14).² On the other hand, although the astronomical new moons have been computed for the possible years with a difference of but a few minutes between the computation of Wurm and that of Oudemans, and the days of the week can be found,³ difficulty is caused by various

55. Jewish Calendar. irregularities in the Jewish calendar-system. First, the beginning of the month was determined, not by the astronomical new moon, but by the time when the new moon was first visible, which depends partly on the weather and on the season of the year, and is always at least from twenty-four to thirty hours later than the astronomical new moon. In order to prevent too great divergence of the calendar, it was prescribed, however, that no month should in any case last more than thirty days, and that no years should contain less than four or more than eight such 'full' months. Secondly, the intercalary years create complication.

A thirteenth month was added to the year whenever on the 16th Nisan the barley was not yet ripe; but this was forbidden in the sabbatical years, and two intercalary years in succession were not allowed. The only sabbatical year in our period (computed by the aid of Maasch. 6:4-5, and Jos. Ant. xiv. 10-2; cp. Ex. 12) was, according to Schurer, 1:431 A.D.; according to Sevin and others,⁴ 34-35 A.D. Any one of the six preceding years identical with the 'acceptable year,' and put the death of Jesus into that year, 29 A.D. Arguments similar to Frakes's are to be found in Sanchoniate, De vulgaria orre emendatione, 1793, and in Caspari, Chronologisch-geographische Einleitung in das Leben Jesu, 1869.

CHRONOLOGY

might have been an intercalary year. At the end of 28-29 A.D., however, there was no need of an intercalated month, because the 15th Nisan fell on 16th April 28 A.D., and on 5th April 29 A.D. (so according to Wurm; according to Traut and Schwarz one day later). At the end of 29-30 there may have been an intercalary month, for the 15th Nisan would otherwise have fallen on 26th or 27th March, 30 A.D., but with an intercalary month on 24th April. In 30 A.D. the 15th Nisan fell on 12th April; in 31 A.D. on 2nd April. If, however, 31-32 was a sabbatical year, an extra month would have led to the intercalated at the end of 32-33, and then the 15th Nisan would have fallen on 1st May, 33 A.D., and 21st April, 34 A.D.; whereas if 32-33 was the sabbatical year, the extra month would not have been inserted until the end of 33-34. Thus, in 33 A.D. the 15th Nisan would have remained 2nd April. The Jewish empirically determined dates all fell, however, one or two days later than these astronomical dates.

If we take the days of the week into account, in the years 29, 32, and 35 A.D., neither the 14th nor the 15th Nisan could possibly have fallen on Friday.

56. Days of week.

On the other hand, if 33-34 was not a sabbatical year (and so 32-33 not an intercalary year), the 14th Nisan may have been celebrated on Friday, 4th April 33, which would correspond to the view of the Fourth Gospel. This year, however, is excluded if Jesus died on the 15th Nisan, and it is impossible in either case if, as is more likely, 33-34 was the sabbatical year, and so 32-33 had thirteen months.¹ There is, therefore, no great probability on the side of 33 A.D. On the other hand, the 15th Nisan may have fallen on Friday, 23rd April 34 A.D. This is hardly possible for the 14th Nisan, as the astronomical new moon occurred at 6.42 p.m., 7th April, so that the 1st Nisan can have been put at the latest on 6th April (so Sevin, 144). No other line of evidence, however, points to the year 34, and this reckoning by the calendar suits just as well the year 30 of Lk. 31 f., for in that year the astronomical new moon occurred at 8.03 p.m., 22nd March, so that the 1st Nisan may have been put on Friday, 24th March, and the 15th have fallen on Friday, 7th April.²

5. The Year of Jesus' Birth.—Dionysius Exiguus, according to the proofs given by Sanelemente (l.c. 42) and confirmed by Ideler (Handbuch, 2383 f.), started in his reckoning from the incarnation, and followed the common method for the years of reigning monarchs.

His view was that Jesus was born on the 25th December, 754 A.U.C., and so he counted the whole year 754 as 1 A.U. The view defended by Noris and Pagi, that he assigned the nativity to 25th December 753, and ignored the five following days, is wrong.

In this reckoning, which gradually came to be universally accepted, Dionysius departed from the dating for which Irenaeus (Adv. haer. iii. 25) and Tertullian (Adv. Jud. 8) are the oldest witnesses; which dating, based only on the information given in the Gospels, put the nativity in 751 A.U.C. = 3 B.C. Dionysius, perhaps because he had no means of fixing the date of the census under Quirinus in Lk. 2, or the death of Herod in Mt. 2, seems to have reached his result by putting the public appearance of Jesus one year later than that of John (15th year of Tiberius, Lk. 31 f.), and reckoning back thirty years. Since we have seen that the thirty years of Lk. 31 f. is a round number, perhaps drawn from the O.T., we are thrown back on the narratives of the nativity.

(2) Lk. gives two points. (i.) He says (136) that Jesus was six months younger than the Baptist, whose

58. The Baptist. conception happened under Herod (15). It does not, however, follow that the birth of Jesus fifteen months later was also under Herod, and, even if the evangelist thought so, his view cannot have rested on documentary evidence. Perhaps Lk. may have drawn his inference from the fact that the Baptist died six months before Jesus (11.) Lk. says (21-3) that Jesus was born at the time when a census ordered by Augustus for the

CHRONOLOGY

59. The Census. empire, was being taken in Judaea, Galilee, and that this was while Quirinus (undoubtedly Publ. Sulpicius Quirinus) was king in Syria.¹ Such a census, however, was legally possible in the reign of Herod, and a governor Quirinus in Syria before Herod's death is chronologically impossible, since at the time of Herod's death Quirinus Varus (who put down the insurrection of that event) was still governor in Syria, whose predecessors were Sentius Saturninus (9-6 B.C.) and Tiberius (attested for 10 B.C.). Josephus, who relates the last years of Herod in much detail, has no knowledge of such a census, but says that the census of 7 A.D. was the first, and something altogether novel for the East. It may be that Quirinus was governor of Syria for a short time (3-2 B.C.) as successor to Varus, as is attested by the fact that he was afterwards from 6 A.D. until (at the latest) 11 A.D.; but in his first (problematical) governorship in Syria, which had fallen to the share of Archelaus, is likewise impossible. On the other hand, the census in Judaea under Quirinus in 6-7 A.D. after the deposition of Archelaus, is well attested (cp. Jos. vii. 125 xviii. 1 and 21 xx. 52, BJ, xi. 14, Acts 18: 12) and may have been in fulfilment of a general imperial command intended to be executed as occasion should arise in the several provinces. This could, however, have applied only to imperial provinces (including Judaea), not to senatorial provinces; that would not be universal. Further, (1) even this census could not have included the Galileans, who were subject to a poll and property tax, at the actual, not the ancestral, home of the subject, for the latter was in most cases hard to determine, and such a procedure was in general impracticable. (2) More Mary could not possibly be affected by it, because she was not of the lineage of David (cp. GEN. 22: 10-18), and in such cases the authorities dealt with the representatives of the women.

The account in Lk. rests, therefore, on a series of mistakes, and the most plausible view is that the evangelist, or the tradition which he followed, has for some reason combined the birth of Jesus with the census under Quirinus, and assigned the latter a wrong date.²

60. Lk.'s method. Perhaps Lk. simply confused Archelaus with his father, for the former was very probably, like Antipater, occasionally called Herod. This confusion of the Herods would have been all the easier if after Herod the Great's death Quirinus really was for a while governor of Syria. The same confusion may have caused Irenaeus and Tertullian to adopt the year 3 B.C. for the birth of Jesus. The imperial census of 6 A.D. perhaps a confusion of the census under Quirinus, incorrectly into the year 3 B.C., with the remembrance of the census of Roman citizens throughout the empire, which was actually ordered by Augustus in 6 B.C., the two events lay only two years apart. Lk., who (cp. § 47 above, on the two high priests in Lk. 3) was none too well informed on Jewish matters, may have inferred from 'the family of David' that Joseph's home was really in Bethlehem, and have supposed the fact to be the true means of combining the above current tradition of the birth in Bethlehem with the incontestable tradition that Jesus was a Nazarene.

1 See the conclusive investigation by Schürer, 1441 ff.

2 A chronological error is not without analogies in Lk. The case of Theudas (Acts 21: 38) is well known, and the confusion for the poor in Acts 11: 28 f. is perhaps confused with that in Acts 21, whilst the combination of the various famines in the time of Claudius into one world-wide famine (Acts 11: 28) is very closely analogous to the case of the census.

CHRONOLOGY

these suppositions are admissible, the kernel of truth in the narrative would be that Jesus was born not far from the end of the Herodian period and that the Roman rule was set up in his earliest childhood. In both these political occurrences an inner connection with the events which brought in the Kingdom of God was doubtless observed in very early times, and the interest in making the closeness of this connection as clear as possible may have led to the enrichment of the narrative.

(b) From Mt. we have as chronological evidence the star and the slaughter of the innocents. Rationalising attempts, however, to subject this star to astronomical laws do violence to the idea of the narrative. The star moves in its own free path, appears and disappears, travels and stands still. Even if the evangelist is wrong, and a conjunction or a comet lies at the basis of the story, it is impossible to determine from what phenomena astrologers of 'the East' supposed themselves able to draw such inferences. The star shines only in the legend, and derives its origin from Mt. 21:7 and the apocalyptic imagery (cp. Rev. 12:1). It has been matched by similar legendary stars at the birth and at the death of many of the great men of the heathen world.

As to the murder of the innocents, if it were a historical fact, Jesus must be supposed, since the male children were killed 'from two years old and under, to have been not less than a year old, even if the murder was just before Herod's death; and in that case, since Herod died shortly before the Passover of 4 B.C., Jesus must have been born at the latest in 5 B.C. Josephus, however, although he narrates with the most scrupulous exactness all the horrors of Herod's last years, has no knowledge of the murder of the children. On the other hand, he gives almost exactly the same story as relating to Moses (Ant. vi. 9, 2).

All the other suspicious circumstances in the narrative in Mt. 2 cannot be set forth here. In view of the natural tendency of legends to connect important events with one another and to mirror their mutual relations, we cannot infer from Mt. more than that Jesus was probably born shortly before or after the death of Herod—the same result that we reached from Lk.

The only results which have a very high degree of probability are the date 30 A.D. for the death of Jesus, and the period of about one year for the length of his public ministry. Besides this, it is also probable that Jesus was born in the agitated times when death was snatching the sceptre from the hand of Herod the Great, and when with his successors the Roman rule in Judaea was coming again in sight.

CHRONOLOGY

Albinus succeeded Festus, and for the events related of Festus's term of office one year will suffice. The objection to an earlier date is that it might not leave room for the events of the life of Paul, and that, according to Acts 24:10, at the imprisonment of Paul, Felix had already been in office 'many years' (καταλλὰ χρόνια). (That the count Josephus casually mentions Poppaea as Nero's wife, which she did not become till several years later, cannot be adduced as a serious argument in the same direction.)

By the side of this commonly received date, however, a much earlier one has been advocated recently.

Thus Kellner proposes Nov. 54 A.D., Weber and O. Holtzmann, the summer of 55, Blass and Harnack, 56 (Harnack, 55). Whilst O. Holtzmann takes his start from Tacitus, Harnack starts from the chronology of Eusebius, the claims of which to our confidence his labours have materially enhanced. He shows that there is no ground for the common supposition of the dates given by Eusebius for the procuratorships preceding and following that of Festus.

Eusebius's date for the year preceding the accession of Felix differs from that of Tacitus by only one year. Now is the difference any greater in the date of his removal. According to Tacitus, Pallas fell into disavour a few days before the fourteenth birthday of Britannicus, which fell in the middle of Feb. 55 A.D. According to Josephus, Felix obtained of Nero an acquittal for his brother Lix from an accusation made by the Jews after his recall. Now, as Nero ascended the throne on the 10th Oct. 54 A.D., the time left him by these two dates is hardly too short for the events narrated by Josephus. Two solutions are possible. Tacitus may be wrong by a year in the age of Britannicus; it may have been his thirteenth birthday, so that it was not till 10th Feb. 55 that Pallas fell into disavour, or else even after his fall Pallas may still have had access to the Emperor. Now, Eusebius in his Chronicle supports the year 55 as that of the accession of Festus, since he assigns it to the second year of Nero (Oct. 55 to Oct. 56), on the textual certainty of this date see Harnack, 26, n. 2). If Felix entered on his office, as according to Eusebius he did, between Jan. 55 and Jan. 56 (according to Tacitus between Jan. 54 and Jan. 55), he could in the summer of 56 be described in case of need, if we compare the average length of procuratorships, as having been in office καταλλὰ χρόνια.

Any objection, in fact, to this number 56 for the accession of Festus, supported by Tacitus and Eusebius, could come only from the requirements of the life of Paul. We shall, therefore, leave the question open for the present.

From the date thus obtained for the relegation of the prisoner to the tribunal at Rome, let us in the first place make our way backwards.

If, as we shall see to be probable, Paul carried out the plan mentioned in Acts 24:16, his arrest must have been at Puteoli under the procurator.

66. Felix. Felix, who (24:27) prolonged the proceedings for two years until his retirement from office. This mention of Felix and the two-years imprisonment in Caesarea are, indeed, regarded as unhistorical by Straatman (Paulus, 1874), van Maanen (Paulus, I, De handelingen der Apostelen, 1890), and especially by Weissacker (Ap. Zeittafel, 1880, pp. 433-461). But the improbability of certain details, on which they rely, is not conclusive, and, on the other hand, the rise of this circumstantial narrative cannot be explained on the ground that it is a doublet to Acts 25:1. That Felix should hold over the prisoner for the chance of a change of sentiment in Jerusalem, and, this change not having come about, should finally leave him in prison in the hope of leaving one popular deed to be remembered by, agrees with his character and the habit of procurators. That Acts tells nothing about these two years is much less surprising than its silence about the year and a half in Corinth and the three years in Ephesus. That a provisional imprisonment of two years could be imposed even on a Roman citizen is shown by the two-year imprisonment in Rome. It is likewise obvious that Paul would not have had his case transferred to Rome except in dire necessity. The dry notice in Acts 21:27 is, therefore, without doubt trustworthy, and the arrest of Paul is to be put two years earlier than the arrival of Festus, that is, at Pentecost 54 or 55.

For the events before the arrest in Jerusalem we give the dates in two numbers: one on the assumption that this happened at Pentecost 54, the other, that it was in 58. The journey to Jerusalem from Philippi (Acts 20:1-21:10), which is related, with the exception of the episode at Miletus (20:17-18), from the two sources, was begun after the days of unleavened bread, and there is no reason for supposing that Paul did not carry out his plan of arriving at Jerusalem by Pentecost. The itinerary from the beginning of the Passover is given us as follows: At Philippi (Passover) seven days, to Troas five days, at Troas seven days, to Patara eight days, in all twenty-seven days. This leaves twenty-two days before Pentecost, which was ample for the journey to Jerusalem except in case of a very exceptionally unfavourable passage from Patara to the coast of Syria. Of these twenty-two days twelve were occupied as follows: At Tyre seven days, to Ptolemais one, to Caesarea one to Jerusalem two to three, so that ten days remain for the voyage from Patara to Tyre (which in ordinary weather required four to five days) and for the stay at Caesarea, the duration of neither of which is stated. From the stops, which in view of the brisk coasting-trade were surely not necessary, we may infer that satisfactory progress was made by the travellers. The departure from Philippi, which was the conclusion of Paul's missionary career, is, therefore, to be put just after the Passover of the year of the arrest.

For the dates earlier than this point, the chronologist would be wholly at sea without Acts; and no good reason appears for not trusting the information which it gives. On the great journey which ended at Jerusalem, Paul had started from Ephesus (1 Cor. 16:8 f.; Acts 19), and journeyed by way of Troas, where he carried on his work for a short time (Acts 20:6 does not mention Troas at all), to Macedonia (2 Cor. 2:13 f. 7:5). That he stayed there long is not likely; for, if he had done so, the length of his stay would probably have been given as in the case (Acts 20:1) of Greece (Corinth). Moreover, the plans made in Ephesus (1 Cor. 16:5; 2 Cor. 1:15 f.) had in view only a short stay in Macedonia, for (1 Cor. 16:8 ep. 6) Paul expected to leave Ephesus after Pentecost (which fell somewhere between 15th May and 15th June) and to be in Corinth so early that, even if he should not decide to pass the winter there, his visit should, nevertheless, not be too short. This would allow at most three months on the way. Now, he may have waited rather longer in Macedonia, in order to learn the impression made by Titus (the bearer of 2 Cor. 1); but, even so, we cannot reckon more than from four to five months for the whole journey. In Corinth itself he stayed (Acts 20:1) three months, and then returned to Macedonia, where he surely did not stay long, since he had been there just three months earlier. Moreover, he had, no doubt, formed in Corinth his plan of being in Jerusalem by Pentecost, and the additional time which the unexpectedly long journey (occasioned by Jewish plots, Acts 20:7, which made the direct route impossible) must have cost him would of itself have forbidden an unnecessarily long stay. He probably, therefore, reached Philippi but little before the Passover; and we have for the whole journey from Ephesus through Troas, Macedonia, Greece, and back to Macedonia perhaps eight to ten months—namely, about the space of time from Pentecost 53/57 to Passover 54/58. In the summer¹ of 53/57 in Macedonia

CHRONOLOGY

Paul wrote 2 Cor. 1, at the end of this year or the beginning of the next in Corinth, Romans, and the letter of introduction for Phoebe to the Christians at Ephesus (Rom. 16:1-20). About this time may belong, too, the undoubtedly authentic note Tit. 3:12-14, in which case the Macedonian Nicomedia is meant, in the plan for the winter was not carried out.

The stay in Ephesus had lasted, according to Acts 19:8-12, over two years and a quarter (Acts 20:1 speaks of three years), so that Paul must have come to Ephesus at Pentecost or in the summer of 50/54. From there, after he had already sent one letter to Corinth (1 Cor. 5:9), he wrote in the beginning of 54/57 our 1 Cor., and later had occasion to write to Corinth for yet a third time (2 Cor. 7:1). The letter is perhaps preserved in 21 or 16 B.C.

From this long stay in Ephesus, which doubtless formed the second great epoch in Paul's missionary activity in the Greek world, we go back to the first, namely, the first visit to Corinth

(Acts 18:1-18, cp. 1 and 2 Cor.). This appears to have lasted about two years, since to the one year and a half of 18 Cor. it be added, in case 18 Cor. refers only to the time spent in the house of Titus Justus, the previous time, in which Paul was trying to work from the synagogue as a base, as well as the later κατα τα εσθια of 18:15. How much time lay, however, between the departure from Corinth and the arrival at Ephesus in 50/54 we cannot tell, although the very sketchiness of our only authority (Acts 18:1-19:1) makes it easier to believe that the author is drawing here (except for the words, τὸ ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ) from a written source than that he relies on oral tradition or his own imagination. Oral tradition would either have omitted the journey altogether, or have narrated what happened at Jerusalem in some detail. All suspicion of 'tendency' is excluded by the brevity and obscurity of the passage. For the journey thus barely mentioned in Acts one year would be ample time. In that case Paul would have left Corinth in the summer of 49/53, having arrived there in the summer of 47/51. In the beginning of this period of two years 1 Thess. was written. (The genuineness of 2 Thess. must be left undetermined.)

Before the long stay in Corinth falls the Macedonian mission, with the necessary journeys, which, however, occupied but one day each (Acts 16:11-18:1). For the whole journey from Troas to Corinth a few months would suffice. It is, therefore, possible that Paul set out at the opening of navigation in March of the same year in the summer of which he arrived for his long stay in Corinth.

Up to this point the probability of the chronology is very considerable. The results may be

71. Results. summarised as follows:—

TABLE VIII.—LIFE OF PAUL: ENTRANCE INTO EUROPE TO IMPRISONMENT AT ROME.

Spring 47/51. Departure from Troas, followed by mission in Macedonia.
Summer 47/51–Summer 49/53.—Corinth and Achaia. (1 Thess.)
Summer 49/53–Summer 50/54.—Visit to Jerusalem and Antioch; journey through Asia Minor to Ephesus.
Summer 50/54–Pentecost 53/57.—Ephesus.
Pentecost 53/57–Passover 54/58.—Journey by way of Troas and Macedonia to Achaia and return to Philippi.
Passover–Pentecost 54/58.—Journey, with the contribution, from Philippi to Jerusalem.
54/58–56/60.—Imprisonment in Caesarea.
Autumn 56/60–Spring 57/61.—Journey to Rome.
57/61–59/63.—Imprisonment in Rome.

Passing now to the period before 47/51 A.D., we find that Acts supplies us with far less trustworthy accounts and is wholly without dates; nor have we any Pauline epistles written in these years.

Highly probable, nevertheless (just because of the peculiar way in which it is given), although not without editorial additions, is the representation preserved in Acts 15:41-48, that Troas was the goal of a zigzag journey from Antioch in Syria through the interior of Asia Minor. The seeming restlessness (Acts 16:7-12) at any rate in the latter part of the inland journey may imply that the time occupied was comparatively short. In that case, the start from Antioch might fall in the year 48-50; but even that is very problematical. We are, therefore, thrown back for the chronology wholly 73. Gal. 1 ff. on Gal. 1:7. Here, however, is not perfectly plain whether the fourteen years in 2:1 include or follow the three years in 1:18. For the former view may be added the change of prepositions meta ('after') and dei ('in the course of, RV 1:18, but this can be explained better thus. An hiera ('then') having been introduced in 1:12 between the two hiera of 1:18 and 2:1, dei was used, in stead of meta, in order not to exclude the space of time between the two hiera of 1:18 and 2:1—namely, the fifteen days in Jerusalem. (Perhaps, also, in 2:1 the three years had completely elapsed before the first visit, whereas the second visit may have been made in the course of the fourteenth year.) On this view seventeen years would have elapsed from the conversion of Paul to the conference in Jerusalem, out of which time he had spent three years in Arabia and fourteen in Syria and Cilicia (1:27-28). The latter period was certainly, the former (at least for Damascus) probably, occupied in the work of an apostle (Gal. 1:21-27). After the conference in Jerusalem followed a stay in Antioch (2:14-25). Since 3:1 ff. is introduced without any sign of transition, the simplest supposition is that this peripatēsis (3:1; RV 'open setting forth') and its results (that is, the mission in Galatia) come chronologically after, but not too long after, the events narrated previously. This would agree, also, with the most natural interpretation of Gal. 2:5.

If we look now at the parallel narrative in Acts, there is, in the first place, no doubt that in 15:35 we have

74. Acts. Acts, as in Galatians, Paul and Barnabas come with others in their company to Jerusalem, and return to Antioch after arriving at an understanding with the church in Jerusalem. To Antioch come also, in both cases (although in Acts no mention is made of a visit of Peter), members of the Jerusalem church, who, in Acts also, just as in Galatians, have been said to come from James. In Acts 11:27-30 12:24 ff., however, we find, besides, mention of another earlier journey of Paul and Barnabas from Antioch to Jerusalem and back again, after the journey from Damascus to Jerusalem (Acts 9:26-30 = Gal. 1:18). Since Gal. 1:20-21 makes this impossible as a separate visit to Jerusalem, the two visits from Antioch (Acts 11 ff. and Acts 15) must have been really one, and this would explain the further points of resemblance that on both occasions (in one case after, in the other before, the journey of the apostles) prophets come from Jerusalem to Antioch (11:27 15:32), and that both times, although in different ways, a contribution of money plays a part (Acts 11:28 ff. Gal. 2:10). It is also 'to the elders' (Acts 11:30 15:2). Now, although this visit is in general more accurately described by Acts 15, there are many reasons for thinking that it is chronologically placed more correctly by Acts 11:27 ff.

The insertion by mistake at the end of chap. 14 is easy to understand, for whilst large parts of chap. 14, and the whole of chap. 15, are certainly the work of the final author of Acts (once the style is the same as in Acts 1-12), at the same time the 'we source' can be detected (as is now more and more widely held) as far back as 13:1, and we can ascribe to it the return to Antioch (14:26-28) as well as the later departure for the journey of 14:28 ff. (without the intervening narrative), although we can no longer restore the original connection. Accordingly, since the author had not been able to use Acts 13:1 to give a correct account of any Gentile mission, an undated account (perhaps not perfectly accurate) of a conference in Jerusalem (to which the missionaries came from Antioch) which treated the subject of Gentile missions could be inserted after 13:1 better than earlier. The author may have had some reason to suppose that the contribution of money (the fact that the date of which he had learned: it was not mentioned in his source as the occasion of the last visit of Paul to Jerusalem, Acts 15) had been brought on the occasion of the earlier stay in Antioch. We can see how in consequence of the two visits to Antioch, he was led to suppose that the two visits to Jerusalem had occurred in contradistinction to 14:28. All this becomes still more probable if the date of the visit in Acts 14:27 could be dated earlier by Paul, a possibility which can now be regarded as probable, even the more so, since Paul should have reached Jerusalem (14:27) after the visit to the other hand, it can be seen in Acts 15:1-2 that at the conference the great question was about the Syrian Churches, not about those whose conversion is related in Acts 14:27.

If these hypotheses are correct, between the conference in Jerusalem (Gal. 2:1 ff.) and the journey from Troas to Macedonia (Acts 16:1-17) lie the missionary journey (Acts 14:1-15) begun and ended at Antioch, and the zigzag tour through Asia Minor (Acts 15:16-18), the beginning of the original account of which has been, doubtless, somewhat confused by the insertion of Acts 15:1-2. One year, however, is not enough for these sojourns. The hindrance hinted at in Acts 16:6 ff. may perhaps have been connected with the winter season, if the date (March 47-48) which we have ventured to give above for the passage from Troas to Macedonia is correct. In that case the missionary would perhaps have passed the preceding winter in Antioch (Acts 14:1-2), the missionary journey of Acts 14:27 would then fall in the open season before this winter, and thus the departure from Antioch related in Acts 14:27 would have been two years before the passage from Troas to Europe (that is, in the spring of 48-49), and the conference in Jerusalem immediately before (perhaps at we may infer from analogies) at the time of the Passover. The conversion of Paul would fall (Gal. 1:21-22) fourteen or seventeen years earlier—that is, in the year 34, 35 or 28-32. When Gal. was written is for the general chronology a matter of indifference.¹

75. Results. To the table given above should therefore be prefixed—

Three further passages can perhaps serve as proof of the results reached above.² The first (Acts 11:27-30) concerning the famine under

76. Famine. Claudius loses, indeed, its significance, if the visit there mentioned had as its object the agreement about the mission-fields, not the bringing of a contribution; but it perhaps explains the mistaken combination (Acts 11:30 12:1) of this journey (of 45/49 A.D.) with the death of James the son of Zebedee, which happened (Acts 12:19-23) between 42 and 44. Josephus tells (J. Ant. xx. 5, 2 and 26 m. 15) of a famine in Judea, which can well be put in one of these years, and so could have been foreseen in the preceding year (cp. Schürer, 1:474, n. 8). By a singular coincidence there was in 49 also one of the alternative years for the journey of Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem, a much more widely extended famine (see, for authorities, Schürer, ib.). It is possible, then, that the author knew that the conference was in a famine year, but connected it by mistake with the famine of 44 instead of that of 49, and that this assisted the confusion which resulted in the creation of an extra visit to

² We can make nothing of the statement in Acts 11:38. Even were its authenticity beyond dispute, we have no means whatever of determining the year of the famine referred to, and Wieseler's choice of 36 or 37 A.D. (Chron. 79) is devoid of any solid foundation. Nor is it possible to infer any date from the account in Acts 25:1 of Agrippa and Herod's presence in Caesarea at the time when Paul's case was decided.

CHRONOLOGY

Jerusalem. The confusion of the two famine years is the more pardonable because both fell under Claudius; the transformation of the two local famines into one which affected the whole empire is easily explicable.

All this, however, is simply a possibility. If the year of the conference was 45 A.D., the two journeys distinguished by I.k. would fall so close together that we can easily understand their being regarded as distinct, on the supposition that I.k. knew nothing of the raising of a collection and its delivery on the occasion of Paul's last journey to Jerusalem, but did know of a famine about the time of the conference and of succour given to the primitive church through Paul.

The second notice is that of the expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius, which was (Acts 18:17).

77. Expulsion of Jews.

before Paul's arrival at Corinth. The year, however, of this edict, which Suetonius (Claud. 25) also mentions, is not certain. Wieseler (Chronol. 120-128) conjectures, without conclusive arguments, that it was issued in the year of the expulsion of the mathematici (i.e. Ann. xi. 32; Dio Cassius 606) that is, in 52 A.D. — whilst Orosius (76, 15 ed. Zangemeister, 1882) gives as the date, on the authority of Josephus (in the existing text of whose writings we find no mention of the matter), the ninth year of Claudius, 49 A.D. a date not favourable to the earlier alternative reached above for the year of Paul's arrival in Corinth, the summer of 47/51. Orosius's statement, however, cannot be verified.

Finally, from Acts 19:4 ff. and 2 Cor. 11:32 ff., it appears that Paul's first visit to Jerusalem was occasioned by a persecution at a time when a viceroy of Aretas, king of the Nabateans, resided at Damascus. The latest Damascene coins with the head of Tiberius (which form one of the proofs brought together by Schnurr, 1615 f. n. 14, to prove, against Marquardt and Mommsen, that Damascus was not all the time under Arabian rule) belong to the year 33-34, and it is in itself not probable, though it is possible, that Damascus was given to Aretas by Tiberius, who died in March 37 A.D., while under Caligula such favours are well known. If Caligula's reign had already begun, the flight of Paul would have fallen at least two years later than all but one of the dates assigned for it above. However, the argument is uncertain. Nothing known to us makes the possession of Damascus by Aretas in the last years of Tiberius actually impossible. If that should be excluded by discoveries of coins or other new evidence, we should then (the often assailed genuineness of 2 Cor. 11:32 ff. being presupposed) have to combine the numbers in Gal. 1:13-21 so that there would be only fourteen years between Paul's conversion and the conference in Jerusalem, or to shorten the time estimated for the mission in Asia Minor and Europe, or else to omit from the life of Paul the two-year imprisonment in Caesarea under the procurator Felix.

At the same time, the coins of Tiberius for the year 33-34 exclude the year 28 as that of Paul's conversion. If we assign the imprisonment to 51, the date of Gal. 1:1 must be explained as referring to the total of fourteen years, so that Paul's conversion would fall in 31. In favour of this is its nearness to the death of Jesus. For 1 Cor. 15:1 ff. does not well permit an interval of any length between Jesus' death and Paul's arrival at Damascus. Conversely, the same consideration demands that, if we regard 58 as the date of the imprisonment, we should calculate from the statements in Gal. 1:1 a period of seventeen years, so that 32 would be the year of Paul's conversion. Neither series, accordingly, conflicts with what we know of those times; but it may readily be asked: Are we warranted in casting discredit on the statements of Eusebius?

How now stands the case with reference to the close of Paul's life? The travellers set out for

CHRONOLOGY

Rome in the autumn of 56 or 60, and arrived in the spring of the subsequent year (Acts 27:1). For the next two years Paul was kept in ease imprisonment, and to this period belong Colossians and Philemon, though some assign them to the Caesarean imprisonment.

After the lapse of the two years began the trial, about which we have some information from a note to Timothy now incorporated in 2 Tim., and from Philippians. Of its duration and issue we know nothing. The prediction that Paul would the without meeting his friends again (Acts 20:35-38), the sudden breaking off of Acts, and the utter absence of all trace of any later activity on the part of the apostle, will always incline one to believe that Paul's presentment was fulfilled, and that his trial ended in a sentence of death. If so, the great apostle died in the course of the year 59 or 63. In either case his martyrdom was before the persecution of Nero, and had no connection with it.

Nor does any of the older narratives conflict with this. When Eusebius in his Chronicle assigns the death of Peter and Paul to the fourteenth or thirteenth year of Nero (the number varies in different texts) — i.e., 68 or 67 A.D. — he is in conflict with himself, for he elsewhere sets this event in the beginning of the persecution of Nero, which beyond all question was in the summer of 64; and moreover, as Harnack insists (l.c. 241 f.), his date lies under the suspicion of being occasioned by the legendary twenty-five years stay of Peter at Rome, in combination with the story that the apostles left Jerusalem twelve years after the death of Jesus: 30 + 12 + 25 make 67.

But neither is the tradition of the contemporaneous death of the two apostolic leaders by any means so well grounded as Harnack assumes (l.c.). In Eusebius, the contemporaneousness lies under the same suspicion as the date. Clem. Rom. chap. 5 gives no hint of it, and the summary introduction of other sufferers in chap. 6 gives us no right, in face of the enumeration of the sufferings endured by Peter and Paul during the whole of their apostolic activity, to apply all that is said in chap. 6, and therefore the death of these apostles, to the persecution of Nero. The testimony of Dionysius (Eus. HE ii. 25:8, ἀμφω εἰς τὴν Ἰερουσαλὴμ διώσει διδάξαντες ἐπαγρότησαν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν ('After both teaching together as far as to Italy, they suffered martyrdom at the same time') is to be taken cum grano salis. If the two great apostles died a violent death for their faith in Rome under Nero, it is easy to see how tradition might lose sight of the interval of one year or five years, and bring the two martyrdoms together. The rapidity with which in the popular memory Paul receded behind Peter, a phenomenon already noticeable in Clem. Rom. and Ignat. (ad Rom. 4), admits of a peculiarly simple explanation if Paul was withdrawn from the scene so much sooner.

first imprisonment at Rome has been collected anew by Spitta (Zur Gesch. u. Lit. des Christ. 1). In truth, all that can be taken account of before Eusebius is the apostle's intention intimated in Rom. 15:24 and mentioned in the Muratorian fragment (except that the apostle's plans were so often upset by events), the Pauline fragments of the Pastoral Epistles (if they ought not also to be brought within the period of missionary activity known to us, since otherwise they would present the post-captivity labours as a strange repetition of what preceded the captivity), and the expression τοῦα τῆς ἀνατολῆς 'boundary of the west' in Clem. Rom. It is only the last that we can take seriously. Since, however, Ignatius speaks of Rome as δύσις ('west', ad Rom. 2), and Clement himself has immediately before opposed δύσις to ἀνατολή ('east'), meaning therefore at least Rome among other places, it is not at all difficult, especially keeping in view the Pauline metaphor of the ἀγών (contest), to suppose that it is this ἀγών, (i.e., Rome) that is indicated as τελευταία. If, in spite of this, the hypothesis of the liberation of Paul should be accepted, we should have to add to our chronological table: 59/63.—Liberation of Paul; July-Aug. 64.—Martyrdom. The apostle's eventful life would thus end with a period completely obscured in the popular memory, a period the events of which have not left a trace behind.

III. CHRONOLOGY OF THE CHURCHES IN PALESTINE.—1. If the dates so far accepted are correct, the whole Palestinian development described by the author of Acts (almost our only authority for this period) between the death of Jesus and the conversion of Paul, finally culminating in the death of Stephen and the dispersion of the church in Jerusalem, must be crowded into the limits of two years, or possibly even of a single year.

The traditions are, however, very scanty. According to 1 Cor. 15:1-7 there happened in this space of time the appearance of Jesus to Peter and the twelve (as to the time and place of which it is not possible to reach a certain conclusion, but with which the return to Jerusalem is most clearly connected), his appearance to the brethren (perhaps to be identified with the occurrence narrated in Acts 2, which in that case was in Jerusalem, and, if Acts 2 is correct, fifty days after the death of Jesus), the conversion of him who afterwards became head of the church in Jerusalem, James the Lord's brother (since this beyond doubt happened at the time of the appearance to him mentioned in 1 Cor. 15:7), and the conversion (by the same means) of many who afterwards became missionaries. The necessity of a representation of the Hellenists (Acts 6:1-6) suggests that from the return of the twelve until that time a considerable period had elapsed, which is, however, very insufficiently filled out by the narratives in chaps. 3-5.

2. As to the later events, in the narratives in Acts 8:4-9:30-10:9-11:13-11:22-11:23-11:24 illustrating the geographical extension of Christianity, the author plainly does not mean to assert that the events described followed one another in mutually exclusive periods of time. If the accounts are historical, the missionary operations of Philip and Peter were undertaken while Paul was working in Damascus and Antioch (including Syria) in 31/35 or 32/36 A.D. The anonymous beginnings of Christianity in Damascus and Antioch belong, of course, to the time before Paul took hold in those places. If the recollections lying at the basis of Acts 11:22-26 are approximately correct, Barnabas must have left Jerusalem finally for Antioch not very long after Paul's first visit to Jerusalem in 34/38 or 35/39 A.D., and Philip may by that time have already removed to Caesarea (Acts 8:40).

3. After these events we hear nothing until the death of James the son of Zebedee between 41, the year in which Herod Agrippa I. began to rule over Judaea, and 44, the year of his death (Acts 12:1-13). If the account in Acts is correct, about this same time Peter left Jerusalem permanently (Acts 12:17), and James the Lord's brother must have already become the leader of the church (Acts 12:17). With this agrees excellently the abundantly attested old Christian tradition that the twelve left Jerusalem twelve years after Jesus' death (see, e.g., in Harnack, Chronologie, 243). It may be in error simply in transferring to the twelve what applied only to their head, Peter. At all events, Acts tells us nothing of the ten left after the death of James. The twelfth year would be 42 A.D. In that case Herod must have sought, immediately after his accession, by his proceedings against the Christians to secure the confidence of the Jews.

4. If the results reached above with reference to what we read in Acts 15:11-27 ff. and 13:1, are right, our next information relates to the year 45 or 46, when Peter, Paul, and Barnabas gather again at the conference round James, at whose side (Gal. 2:9) appears John, the son of Zebedee. Paul and Barnabas return to Antioch; Peter leaves Jerusalem again very soon, and lives for a while among the Christians at Antioch (Gal. 2:11 ff.).

5. In 54/58, when Paul comes to Jerusalem with the contribution, James is master of the situation (Acts 21:17). This is the last information from the N.T. about the church in Palestine.

6. According to the received text of Josephus (Ant. xv, 91), James suffered martyrdom in 62—that is, under the high priest Ananias (son of the high priest of the same name known to us from the Gospels). But before the arrival in Judaea of Ananias, the successor of the procurator Festus. (After Festus's early death Ananias had been appointed high priest by Agrippa II.) The passage is not free, however, from the suspicion of Christian interpolation. Hegesippus (Eus. HE ii, 23:1-6) seems to have put the death of James somewhat nearer to the destruction of Jerusalem.¹

Shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) the Christians removed to Pella in Ptolemaea. The year is not certain, but was probably 67, when, after the downfall of Festus, Jewish fanaticism overreached itself.

IV. OTHER DATES IN THE HISTORY OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.—Here can be mentioned only those few points on which a stray ray of light happens to fall. In the nature of the case, detailed discussions can be given only in the special articles.

1. Peter. That Peter, the last trace of whom we found in A.D. 45/46, or somewhat later, at Antioch, was later a travelling missionary after the manner of Paul, is to be inferred from the allusions to him in 1 Cor. 1:12-13:22 ff. (1 Pet. 5:1 ff.), even if the epistle was not written by Peter, implies his intimate association with Paul's former companions Silvanus and Mark, and 1 Pet. 1:17. His missionary activity in the provinces of Asia Minor. For this latter there was room at any rate after the imprisonment of Paul in 54/58, and for most of the provinces even before that time; namely, from the moment when Paul transferred his chief activity to Macedonia, Achaia, and Asia. In regard to Peter's stay in Rome, for which 1 Pet. 5:13 is an argument (it is certainly to be put later than the end of Paul's trial), and in regard to the question whether it was in the persecution after the fire in Rome (July 64) that he suffered martyrdom (cp. Clem. Rom. 5), see PETER. The assumption of a contemporaneous martyrdom of Paul and Peter finds no support in the earliest documents; see above, § 79.

2. John. As to John's residence in Ephesus and his end, see JOHN.

3. Whilst the persecution under Nero was doubtless in the main limited to Rome, the last years of Domitian, especially in Asia Minor, in consequence of the insistence on the worship of the Emperor, may have been a period of many conflicts with Christianity.²

To this time (say 93-96) many scholars assign Hebrews and 1 Peter (while others carry them down to the reign of Trajan), as well as the A. apocryse of John (see the special articles). Not much later, perhaps about the end of the first century, were written Ephesians, the Third Gospel, and Acts. Our Gospel of Mark must, apart possibly from some later additions, have been written before this; there is no need to suppose a much later date than 70. The Fourth Gospel, after which, probably, came the Johannine epistles, can well, by reason of its near relation to Lk. and for other reasons, have been written at the same time as, or not long after, the Third Gospel. The first third of the second century best suits the latest books of the NT—Matthew, the Pastoral Epistles, and James, all of them doubtless products of the Roman church. Jude may have been written somewhat earlier, 2 Peter somewhat later. See the Introductions to the NT and Harnack, Chronologie, 246-50, 245 f., 451-64, 475-91, 651-81.

CHRYSOLE (χρυσολίθος), one of the foundations of the wall of the New Jerusalem in the Apocalypse (Rev. 21.10). It is not improbable that in ancient times the term was applied to a particular shade of BERYL (q.v.). See PRECIOUS STONES. In modern usage Chrysolite is the name generally given to the yellow or yellowish-green varieties of olivine, the transparent varieties being known as peridot (cp TOPAZ).

χρυσόλιθος in Θ is used to translate תַּרְשִׁי in Ex. 28.20 30.31 Ezek. 28.13 (cp Ezek. 1.16 Aq [BAQ transliterated], Dan. 10.6 Theod. [see SW.]). In Ezek. 28.13 AVmg. has 'chrysolite', but elsewhere EV 'beryl', which more probably represents יהואב; see BERYL, § 3. TARGUMS, STONE OF.

CHRYSOPRASE, CHRYSOPRASUS (χρυσοπρασός), one of the foundations of the wall of the New Jerusalem in the Apocalypse (Rev. 21.10). In ancient times the term was perhaps applied to a shade of BERYL; cp PRECIOUS STONES.

The word does not occur in Θ; but AVmg. has 'chrysolite' for ἡμέτερος, καὶ ἡμέτερος in Ezek. 27.16 where AV has 'agate' and RV 'ruby' (see CHALCEDONY); and has 'chrysolite' also for ἡμέτερος, καὶ ἡμέτερος in Ezek. 28.13, where EV has 'emerald' and AVmg. 'carbuncle' (see CARBUNCLE, EMERALD). In mod. mineralogy the chrysolite is an agate coloured apple-green by the presence of oxide of nickel.

CHUB, RV CUB (212; AV, Sym., Theod. χοῦβαλ), if correct, is the name of a people (Ezek. 30.5†); but Θ has ΛΙΒΥΕΕ, and Cornil is doubtless right in regarding 222, Chub, as a corruption of 222, Lub, which occurs repeatedly in the plural form LUBIM (q.v.). See also MISGILD PEOPLE.

CHUN, RV CYN (312, 1 Ch. 188), an Aramæan city identified by Ges. Buhl (following ZDF 8.34) with the modern Kuna (Rom. Cannus) between Laodicea and Hierapolis. The reading Chun is, however, certainly corrupt (cp KI. in SBO).? See BEROETHAI, and, for a suggested emendation, MEROM.

CHURCH (ΕΚΚΛΗΣΙΑ). 1. Name and Idea.—The word Ecclesia has an important history behind it when it first appears in Christian literature. It

1. History of word. It was the regular designation of the assembly of the whole body of citizens in a free Greek state, 'called out' or summoned to the transaction of public business. It had then been employed by the Greek translators of the OT as a natural rendering of the Hebrew קָהָל (see ASSEMBLY), the whole 'congregation' of Israel, regarded in its entirety as the people of God. A less technical Greek usage, current in the apostolic age, is illustrated by the disorderly assemblage in the theatre at Ephesus (Acts 19.32-41), where we find also by way of contrast a reference to 'the lawful assembly' (19.39, ἐν τῇ ἐννόμῳ ἐκκλησίᾳ). The Jewish usage is found in Stephen's speech when he speaks of Moses as having been 'in the church in the wilderness' (7.38). Thus the traditions of the word enabled it to appeal alike to Jews and Gentiles as a fitting designation of the new people of God, the Christian society regarded as a corporate whole.

In this full sense we find it in Jesus' declaration to Peter, 'I will build my church' (οἰκοδομήσω μου τὴν ἐκκλησίαν; Mt. 16.18). Here it is re-

2. NT usage in Gospels. regarded as the divine house that is to be builded, 'the keys' of which are to be placed in the apostle's hands; see BINDING AND LOOSING. It is thus equated with 'the kingdom of heaven' which Christ has come to establish, each of the designations being derived from the past history of the sacred commonwealth. The force of the phrase, as well as the emphasis given by the position of the pronoun in the original, comes out if for a moment we venture to substitute the word 'Israel' for the word 'church' (Hort); and the thought thus finds a parallel in the quotation of Amos 9.11 f. in Acts 15.16 f., 'I will build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down.'

The only other passage where the word occurs in the Gospels is Mt. 18.17, where 'the church' is contrasted with the 'one or two more' whom the erring brother has refused to hear. We are here again reminded of the whole congregation of Israel from which offenders were cut off: the delinquent becomes henceforth as one who belongs to the 'nations' outside, and as a traitor to the chosen people (ὡς περὶ ὁ ἐθνικὸς καὶ ὁ τελώνης). It is possible indeed that the primary reference in this place may be to the Jewish ecclesia; but if so, the principle remains unchanged for the Christian ecclesia; and in either case, while some local embodiment of the Church is thought of as the means by which action is taken, the meaning is that the whole weight of the divine society is to be brought to bear upon the offender.

1 Though ο ΛΙΘΟΣ ὁ πράσινος represents עֶזְרָא (H. RVL) in Gen. 21.2.

While the Christian society is still confined within the walls of Jerusalem, 'the church' is the designation of the whole body of the believers, as contrasted with the other residents in the city (Acts 5:42 cp 8:13); but it is possible that the appellation is here due to the historian himself, recounting the events many years later. When, as the result of Stephen's testimony and death, believers are to be found in all parts of Palestine, they are still summed up in the same single word: 'the church' (RV; not 'the churches,' AV) throughout the whole of Judea and Galilee and Samaria had peace, being builded' (Acts 9:31; cp 21:16-18 as above). The same full sense of the word is found in Paul's epistles at a time when Christian communities were established in various cities of Asia Minor and of Greece; apostles, prophets, and teachers are set 'in the church' by God (1 Cor. 12:23); 'the church of God' is contrasted with Jews and Greeks (10:32).

The Church is thus the new chosen people; it is 'the Israel of God' (cp Gal. 6:16). Jews and Gentiles who enter it are merged into unity; the two are made one (Eph. 2:14-16). It is 'the body of Christ,' and as such inseparable from him. Christ and the Church are not two, but one—as it was written of earthly marriage, 'they twain shall be one flesh' (Eph. 5:31 f.). The main practical anxiety of Paul's life appears to have been the preservation of the scattered communities of Christians, which had sprung up under his preaching, in a living unity with the earlier communities of Palestine, so as to form with them a single whole, the undivided and indivisible representative of Christ in the world.

It is noteworthy that Peter never uses the word ecclesia. Yet, in spite of the absence both of this word and of the Pauline metaphor of 'the body,' no writer displays such a wealth of imagery in describing the holy society. Once he speaks of it as 'a holy nation' (1 Pet. 2:9), twice as a 'people' (2:10), twice as a 'house' (2:5, 17), twice as a 'flock' (5:2, 3), twice as a 'priesthood' (2:5, 9), and twice again, in a word wholly his own, as a 'brotherhood' ('Love the brotherhood,' 2:17; 'your brotherhood which is in the world,' 5:9).

Side by side with the full sense of the word ecclesia we find another and a wholly natural use of it, which seems at first sight to conflict with the conception of unity which is dominant in the passages we have hitherto examined. The new 'Israel of God,' like its predecessor, was scattered over a wide area. Wherever Christians were gathered as such, there was the Church of God. Hence we find such an expression as 'at Antioch, in the church, there were prophets and teachers' (κατὰ τὴν οἶκον ἐκκλησίαν, the participle throwing emphasis upon the noun, 'in what was the church,' Acts 13:1); and again, 'the church of God which is in Corinth'; and even, 'the church that is in their house' (Rom. 16:5). In all these cases the sense of unity may be felt: it is the one Church, thought of as existing in various localities. From this, however, it is an easy passage to speak of 'the church of the Thessalonians' (1 Thess. 1:1, 2 Thess. 1:1); and even to use the word in the plural, 'the churches of Galatia' or 'of Asia' (1 Cor. 16:19), 'the churches of God' (2 Thess. 1:4). The transition is naturally found on Greek ground, where the use of ecclesia in the plural would be helped by its common employment for the ecclesiae of Greek cities; whereas in Palestine, where the Jewish connotation of the word was more sensibly felt, it was more natural to speak of the local representative of the ecclesia under the designation of synagoga (cp Jas. 2:2).

The churches, then, are the local embodiments of the Church: the distribution of the one into many is purely geographical. The unity remains unaffected: there is no other Church than 'the church of God.' When we pass outside the canon we find the same conception of the Church both as a living unity and as the divinely pre-ordained successor to the ancient Israel. Thus in the Shepherd the Church appears to Hermas as an aged woman, even as Zion had appeared to Edras as a barren woman (4 Esd. 9:3, 10:4). She is aged, 'because she was created first of all things, and for her sake the world was made' (Herm. Vis. 2:4). Again, in the ancient homily formerly ascribed to Clement of Rome (chap. 14), we read of the pre-existent, spiritual Church, 'created before sun and moon,' and manifested at length in the flesh. In the Valentinian system, moreover, Ecclesia appears as one of the aeons. (Cp. too, Clem. Alex. Protrept. 8, Strom. iv. 8. The earliest use of the term 'the Catholic Church' (Ignat. Smyrn. 8; cf. 117, 118, 119) emphasises the unity and universality of the whole in contrast with the individual congregations; not, as in the later technical sense, its orthodoxy in contrast with heretical systems: 'Wherever Jesus Christ is, there is the catholic church' (ἐκεῖ ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία).

7. Outside Canon.

The primitive conception of the Church thus regards it (a) as essentially one, admitting of no plurality except such as is due to local distribution, and (b) as succeeding to the peculiar position of privilege hitherto occupied by the sacred Jewish Commonwealth, so that even Paul in writing to Gentiles thinks of it as 'the Israel of God.' In correspondence with the two parts of this conception it is natural to expect in the development of its organisation (a) a general unity in spite of local and temporary variety, and (b) a tendency, both at the outset and from time to time afterwards, to look back to the more prominent features of Jewish religious institutions. Weekly gatherings for liturgical worship, the recognition of holy seasons and holy books, are examples of elements of religious life which passed over naturally and at once from the Jewish to the Christian Church; and these were elements which the experience of the scattered Judaism of the Dispersion had proved and warranted as amongst the strongest bonds of practical unity.

Had the apostles separated immediately after Pentecost for the evangelisation of the world, it might easily have happened that, while the general needs of the societies founded by their labours were, to a large extent, the same in various districts, the institutions developed to meet those needs might have presented a most astonishing variety. As a matter of fact such a mode of procedure on their part was impossible. The direct command of Christ had indicated Jerusalem as the first scene of their work; but, even apart from this, the very clearness with which from the first they recognised the new society to be the divinely appointed issue and climax of the old, must have hindered them from perceiving at once all that was involved in the complementary truth of its universality. As a matter of fact they clung to the sacred centre of the old national life until the development of events gradually forced them into a wider sphere. Hence a period of years was passed within Jerusalem itself, and in the most intimate relation with the religious institutions of the Jewish people, of whom, at that time, all the believers formed an integral part. Accordingly the new society had time to grow into a consciousness of its own corporate life within a limited area; the pressure of practical difficulties led to the experiment of institutions specially designed to meet them; and, when the earlier limitations began gradually to disappear in consequence of Stephen's wider conceptions and the crisis which they brought upon his fellow-believers, and the society was now scattered like seed over the country, this corporate life had already given signs of an organised growth, and the home church at Jerusalem had become in some sense a pattern which could not fail to influence all subsequent foundations. These first years in Jerusalem, then, demand careful study, if the development of Christian institutions is to be securely traced.

The brotherhood which was formed by the baptism of the earliest converts was, at the outset, practically a guild of Judaism, faithful to the ancient creed and worship, and with no thought of a severance from the religious life of the nation. Its distinctive mark was not the neglect of Jewish ordinances, but the adherence to new duties and privileges of its own. They were continuing steadfastly in the teaching of the apostles and the fellowship, the breaking of bread and the prayers' (Acts 2.42). The temple worship was not forsaken (3.1); but it was supplemented (2.46) by the 'breaking of bread at home.' The first note of this brotherhood was its unity: 'they had one heart and soul' (4.12); they claimed nothing that they possessed as their private right, but held all as a trust for the good of the whole; they would even on occasion sell their property and bring the proceeds to the apostles for distribution to the needy (4.32-35). As the numbers increased, these simple and extemporaneous methods were found to be inadequate. Thus the common tables, at which the poorer dependants received their daily provision, proved an occasion of friction between the two elements of Hebrew and Greek-speaking Jews, of which the brotherhood, from the outset, was composed. Organisation was necessitated, if the unity of the body was to remain unimpaired, and seven men were accordingly appointed to 'serve tables' (6.1-6). [On the criticism of these narratives cf. COMMUNITY OF GOODS.]

This was made the first essay in providing for the discharge of the functions of the whole body through representative members. No distinctive title is given by the historian to these seven men. Their office was to serve (διακονεῖν); in respect of it, therefore, they could be termed servants (διδάκοντες); but it is probable that the word 'deacon' remained for some time a mere description of function, rather than a title such as it afterwards became. The naturalness of this institution—the response to a new need which was certain in some form or other to recur, wherever the society was planted—is a most important feature of it. There is no reason to suppose that it was suggested by any Jewish institution. The number of the persons chosen was a natural number in a community consisting of Jews; but the institution itself was a purely spontaneous development, designed to meet a necessity which was wholly new.

Thus far we find but two kinds of distinction which in any way mark off individual members of the society from the general mass. The apostles are the natural leaders; to them all look, both for religious teaching and for practical guidance; through their discipline on one memorable occasion is enforced; it is they who suggest a remedy for the first difficulty which was occasioned by increasing numbers; and their hands are laid on the seven men whom, at their bidding, the whole brotherhood has selected to serve on its behalf. The seven, on the other hand, are ordained to humble duties; their function is not to rule, but to serve; through them the society fulfils its common responsibility of providing for the needs of its poorer members.

The dispersion after Stephen's death distracts our attention from the Church in Jerusalem for a while. Some years later, when the apostles had begun to evangelise other parts of Palestine, we get another glimpse of it at a time of threatened famine. Contributions are sent from the disciples at Antioch to aid the poorer brethren in Judea; it is not to the apostles, however, that the gifts are brought, but to 'the elders' (Acts 11.30), a class of which we now hear for the first time in the Christian Church. Thus it would seem that the necessity of leaving the apostles free for wider work had issued in a further development of organisation in Jerusalem; but it is only incidentally that we learn that a new step has been taken. We have no indication in Acts of the relation of 'the seven' to these 'elders.'

Peter's imprisonment, which immediately follows, is the occasion of a further notice bearing on the practical government of the church in Jerusalem. 'Tell these things to James and to the brethren,' says the apostle after his release (12.17). The position of prominence thus indicated for 'the brother of the Lord' prepares us for the leading part which he subsequently takes in the conference of the apostles and elders, when a question of vital importance has been referred from Antioch to Jerusalem (15.1). Many years later, when Paul arrives on an important errand, his first act is thus described by an eye-witness: 'On the morrow Paul entered in with us unto James, and all the elders came together' (21.18). It is clear, then, that James had come to occupy a unique position in the church at Jerusalem—a position gained, it may be, by no formal accession to power, resulting rather from his relationship to Jesus and his well-known sanctity of life; yet a position clearly recognised by the apostles, and foreshadowing the climax of a series of developments in the universally established rule of the monarchical episcopate.

We have thus, in the early history of the church in Jerusalem, notices, for the most part merely incidental, of the gradual development of organisation in response to the growing necessities of a corporate life. The humblest offices of the daily service (ἡ καθημερινὴ διακονία) by which the bodily needs of the poorer members were supplied, are discharged by the church through seven representatives. The guidance of the whole body is found to have devolved upon men whose title of 'elders' reminds us of the elders of the Jewish people; and in this case there is no reason for doubting that the new institution was directly suggested by the old. These elders are the medium by which the church in Jerusalem holds formal intercourse with the church elsewhere. Lastly, at the head of all, but acting in close concert with the elders, we see James holding an undefined but unmistakable position of authority.

We must be careful to avoid a confusion between this development of administrative organs of the body and that other form of service, rendered to it by those who discharged the various functions of evangelisation, exhortation, and instruction (ἡ διακονία τοῦ λόγου, Acts 6.4). The two kinds of service might often meet in the same persons: thus, at the outset, the apostles themselves were, necessarily, at once the instructors and the administrators of the society—at their feet, for example, gifts for the community were laid, as at a later time they were brought to the elders—and, on the other hand, we read of 'Philip the evangelist, who was one of the seven' (21.8). Quite apart from these, however, we have a mention of 'prophets,' of whom Agabus is one, as coming from Jerusalem (11.27).

The incidental nature of the references to those who discharged these functions of administration and instruction prevents us from knowing to what extent the church in Antioch resembled in its organisation the church in Jerusalem. We only learn that it contained prophets and teachers (13), we hear nothing of its elders or other officers. When, however, Paul and

17. Paul's churches. Barnabas, going forth from the church in Antioch, founded communities in various cities of Asia Minor, they appointed, we are expressly told, elders to administer them (14.23). In this they probably reproduced an institution already known at Antioch, with which both of them had together been brought into contact in Jerusalem (11.30).

As Paul travelled farther west, and Christian societies sprang up in a more purely Greek soil, the Church's independence of Judaism became continually clearer; and we might reasonably expect to find elements of Greek social life exerting an influence upon the development of Christian organisation. At the same time we must bear in mind that Paul himself was a Jew, that to the Jews in every place he made his first appeal, that his epistles indicate that there was a considerable Jewish element among those to whom he wrote, and that we have clear evidence that, at first, at any rate, his organisation of administration was based upon a Jewish precedent. In his earliest letters to a European church Paul urges the recognition and esteem of 'those who labour among you and preside over you in the Lord, and admonish you,' thus implying a local administration, though not further defining it (1 Thess. 5.12); but at the same time he demands absolute obedience to the injunctions which he sends them in the joint names of himself and Silvanus and Timotheus (2 Thess. 3.4).

If we try to draw from the study of Paul's epistles a picture of a Christian society in a Greek city, we may start by observing that the members of it are distinguished one from another mainly by their spiritual 'gifts' (χαρίσματα). Of these the highest is prophecy, which is freely and sometimes distractingly exercised, by any who possess it, in the ordinary meetings of the society. Other gifts too, such as those of healing, give a certain natural pre-eminence to their possessors. Over all we recognise the undefined but overshadowing authority of the apostolic founder. Such is the most elementary stage, and we cannot sharply distinguish it from that which immediately follows. Leading men fall into classes, with obvious divisions (not in any sense stereotyped orders) separating them from the general mass: apostles, prophets, teachers, clear grades of spiritual prestige, though by no means marked off as a hierarchy. The teachers are mainly local in the exercise of their functions; the prophets are local to some extent, but moving from church to church, and recognised everywhere in virtue of their gift; the apostles are not local, but essentially itinerant, belonging to the whole Church.

This ministry expresses the more distinctly spiritual side of the Church's activities. But the community needs, besides, to be governed; and discipline must be exercised in the case of unworthy members. It must have representatives who can formally act on its behalf, either in dealing with individuals or in carrying on communications with sister communities.

Again, there are other functions of the Church's life which call for executive officers. The care of the sick and the poor was a primary duty; so, too, was the exercise of the Church's hospitality to travelling brethren. These duties involved an administration of the common funds collected for such purposes, and generally of corporate property. Servants of the Church were thus called for to perform these humble but necessary functions, and responsible superintendents to see that they were duly performed. This class of executive ministers we find in the 'bishops and deacons' (ἐπίσκοποι καὶ διακονοὶ) whom Paul greets in the opening words of his epistle to the Philippians; and the qualifications demanded of them in the Pastoral Epistles afford valuable indications of the nature of their service.

All these elements of moral or formal authority would be more or less distinctly present in every community, expressing the activity and life of the community itself in various forms. In different localities development would proceed at different rates of progress; but in all, the same general needs would have to be met, and inter-communication would help towards a comparatively uniform result. The earlier and the more rapidly developing societies would serve as a natural model to the rest.

In speaking thus we do not lose sight of the controlling inspiration of the divine Spirit promised by Jesus to be the Church's guide. We rather recognise the presence of a continuous inspiration, developing from within the growth of a living organism, not promulgating a code of rules to be imposed from without upon each community at its foundation.

The scanty and scattered notices of church organisation in the NT need, for their interpretation, all the light that can be thrown upon them by the practice of Christian communities, so far as it can be ascertained from the remains of their earliest literature. Here again, however, the evidence is still sparse and incidental, though of late years it has been increased, especially by the recovery (1883) of the Teaching of the Apostles. The date of this book is quite uncertain. It is of a composite nature and preserves very early documents in a modified form. There is no agreement among scholars as to the locality to which it belongs. It may represent a community lying outside the general stream of development and preserving, even to the middle of the second century, a primitive condition which had elsewhere, for the most part, passed away. This view does not materially lessen its value as an illustration of an early stage of Christian life; but we must be careful not to generalise hastily from its statements when they lack confirmation from other quarters.

In the Teaching (chaps. 7 ff.), then, we have instructions relating to BAPTISM (9.7), § 3), fasting, and the Eucharist (9.7.1). The following chapters introduce us to apostles and prophets; they provide tests for their genuineness, and instructions as to the honour to be paid to them. The apostles travel from place to place, making but the briefest stay; the prophets appear to be the most prominent persons in the community in which they reside (see PROPHECY). In comparison with them, bishops and deacons seem to hold but a secondary place. The community is charged to appoint fit persons to these offices, and not to despise them; 'for they too minister the ministry of the prophets and teachers.' There is no mention whatever of presbyters. In all this we seem to be on the verge of a transition. The ministry of extraordinary gifts is still dominant; but the abuses to which it is liable are keenly felt; the humbler local ministry, though despised by comparison, has the future before it.¹

Other illustrations from the early literature will be found under BISHOP (§ 14 f.). It must suffice here to say in conclusion that, before the close of the second century, the long process of development had issued in a threefold ministry—a bishop, presbyters, and deacons—being at length generally recognised in all Christian churches. In point of time, as well as of method, we have an exact parallel to this development both in the settlement of the canon and in the formulation of the Apostolic Creed. The more abundant literature of the end of the second century shows us a generally accepted standard of ministry, of canon, and of creed. In each case the need of definiteness and of general uniformity had gradually made itself felt, and the Christian consciousness, guided and expressed by eminent leaders, had slowly solved the problems presented to it. In each case we have evidence of that growth which is the

1. Physical. direction to the sea, reaching it in a complex of mountains constituting that projection of coast which divides the bay of Issus (Skanderin) from that of Pamphylia. The Cilicians extended partly over the Taurus itself, and partly between it and the sea (Strabo, 668), thus bordering upon Pamphylia in the W., and Lycania and Cappadocia in the N.; in the E. the lofty range of Amanus separated them from Syria. The country within these boundaries falls into two strongly marked sections.

Of Cilicia beyond Taurus a part [W.] is called Tracheia (rugged), and the rest [E.] Pedias (plain). The former has a narrow seaboard, and little or no level country; that part of it which lies under Taurus is equally mountainous, and is thinly inhabited as far as the northern flanks of the range—as far, that is, as Isauria and Pisidia. This district bears the name Tracheioris. Cilicia Pedias extends from Soli and Tarsus as far as Issus, and as far N. as the Cappadocians on the N. flank of Taurus. This section consists for the most part of plains and fertile land (loc.).

Four considerable streams—Pyramus, Sarus, Cydnus, and Calycadnus—descend from Taurus to the bay of Issus. For a long time the ride W. district remained practically outside the pale of civilisation; we are here concerned only with the eastern part, Cilicia Pedias or Campestris. Difficult passes, of which there are only a few, lead through the mountains into the neighbouring districts. The famous Pyle Cilicior, some 30 miles N. of Tarsus, gave access to Cappadocia and W. Asia Minor; in the other direction the Syrian Gates and the pass of Beilan communicated with Syria; through these two passes ran the E. trade route from Ephesus. The military importance of the Cilician plain thus included within the angle of the Taurus and Amanus ranges is finely expressed by Herodian (34).

Owing to the barriers of Mount Taurus, the geographical affinity of Cilicia is with Syria rather than with Asia

Minor. It would be only natural, therefore, that there should be references to it in OT (cp also ASUR-BANI-PAL, § 4, end). Nor are these wanting. Archaeological criticism indicates three OT names¹ as more or less certainly meaning Cilicia.² The first is CAPHTOR (g. v., § 4), which, however, probably had a more extended application, and referred to coast-regions of Asia Minor besides Cilicia. Caphtor was the first home of the Philistines; it probably represents the Egyptian Keftu. The second is Kue or Kuah (כִּיּוּ), i. e., E. Cilicia³—from which Solomon imported horses, as we learn from the emended text of 1 K. 10²³ (see HORSE, § 3, n.). The third is Helak, the Ilakkku

² The land of Musri also, which adjoined Kue (W. Geogr. Bab. u. Ass. 175), must have included a part of Cilicia (cp MIZRAIM, § 2 a).

of the Assyrians, which has been restored by Halévy (Mélanges, 74, p. 69), Gieger (Jud. Zt. 11242), and Lagarde (Mittheil. 1211) in Ezek. 27¹¹ (MT has the impossible חֲזִי 'thine army'; read 'the sons of Arvad and of Helak'). The same name probably occurs in Egyptian inscriptions under the form Ka-ra-ki-Sa, originally Kilakk(u).¹ It follows from Halévy's restoration that there was, according to Ezekiel, a Cilician as well as a Phœnician and a Syrian element in the garrison of Tyre in 586 B.C.

The close physical relation of Cilicia and Syria explains their political connection during the early Roman Empire. Cilicia was usually under the legatus of Syria (Dio Cass. 51¹² where Coele-Syria, Phœnicia, Cilicia, Cyprus are ἐν τῇ τοῦ Καίσαρος μερίδι; cp Tac. Ann. 278). Cilicia is found under a separate governor, however, in 57 A.D. (Tac. Ann. 13¹¹), perhaps as a temporary measure after the disturbances of 52 A.D. (Ann. 12⁵⁵). Vespasian is credited with its reconstruction as a distinct province, in 74 A.D.; but his action was apparently confined to the reduction of part of Cilicia Tracheia to the form of a province, which was united with that of eastern Cilicia (Suet. Vesp. 8). In 117-138 A.D. Cilicia, including Tracheia, was certainly an imperial province, under a praetorian legatus Augusti; but in what year this state of things began is not known. No inference can be drawn from the use of the word 'province' (ἐπαρχία) in the question of Felix (Acts 21³⁴).

The connection between Cilicia and Syria is illustrated in the NT by such passages as Acts 15²³ Gal. 1²¹, where 'Syria and Cilicia' are almost a single term; and conversely the omission of Cilicia from the superscription of 1 Pet. 1¹, where the enumeration of provinces sums up all Asia Minor N. of the Taurus, is based upon the close connection between the churches in Cilicia and the church of Antioch in Syria.

The presence of Jews in Cilicia must date principally from the time when it became part of the Syrian kingdom (cp Jos. Ant. xii. 34). It must have been the hill-men of Cilicia Tracheia that served in the guard of Alexander Jannæus (Jos. Ant. xiii. 115, Ant. 13). In apostolic times the Jewish settlers were many and influential (Acts 6⁹).

Paul visited his native province soon after his conversion (Acts 9³⁰ Gal. 1²¹), and possibly founded then the churches of which we hear in Acts 15²³ 21³⁴. It is probable that in his 'second missionary journey' he followed the usual commercial route across the Taurus to Derbe (Acts 15⁴¹; cp Str. 537).

One article of Cilician export is interesting to the student of the NT. The goats'-hair cloth called Cilicium was exported to be used in tent-making (cp Varro, R. R. 211). Paul was taught this trade, and supported himself by means of it in the house of Aquila at Corinth (Acts 18³ and elsewhere; cp Acts 20³⁴) (See Sterrett, 'Routes in Cilicia,' in Arch. Inst. Amer. 36.) W. J. W.

CINNAMON (כִּינָמֹן; KINNAMOMON [-oc] [BS. MT. Ti. WII]; Ex 30²³ Pr. 7¹⁷ Cant. 1¹⁴ Rev. 18¹³) bears the same name in Hebrew as in Greek and English, and this is almost certainly a word borrowed from the farther East.² Lagarde (Ubers. 199) maintains that Hebrew borrowed the name from Greek; but against this there is the statement of Herodotus (311) that the Greeks learned the word from the Phœnicians.

Kinnamon is the fragrant inner bark of Cinnamomum zeylanicum. Nees that is now called cinnamon. As is correctly stated by Fluck. and Hanb. (520), however, 'none of the cinnamon of the ancients was obtained from Ceylon.'³ and 'the early notices of cinnamon as a product of Ceylon are not prior to the thirteenth century' (ib. 462). Accordingly, it is probable that, as these writers suggest, the cinnamon of the ancients was Cassia lignea, which was obtained, as it is still, from S. China.¹ The source of this is Cinnamomum Cassia, Bl., as has been shown by Sir W. Thibault-Dyer in Journ. Linn. Soc. 20, 13 ff. The name cinnamomifera regio, given to the district W. of Cape Good Hope, must be taken in a loose sense as referring to the commerce of the Erythraean Sea. Like lign-aloes, cinnamon was thus brought along the regular trade-route from E. Asia. See Atoks, § 3.

From whatever source cinnamon was obtained, it appears thrice in the OT among aromatic spices, and in Rev. 18.13 among the merchandise of the apocalyptic Babylon. Thus the Jews must have been tolerably familiar with it. See CASSIA, INCENSE, § 6.

CIRCUMCISION (כְּתִיכָה, περιτομή), the cutting away of the foreskin (קְטִיעָה, ἀκροβυστία). For surgical and other details of the operation as practised in later Judaism, reference may be made to the Mishna (Shabb. 19.2 Tôre d'Ed., § 264) and to the literature cited at the end of this article. It was performed not only on the (male) children of the Israelites, but also upon all slaves (as being members of the household and sharers in its worship), whether born within the house or brought in from abroad (Gen. 17.22 ff.)—a usage which plainly points to a great antiquity. In P it is enjoined that all aliens (גרִים) who desire to join in the Passover shall be circumcised (Ex. 12.48; in the Graeco-Roman period it was also the condition for the admission of proselytes).

The age for receiving the rite is fixed by the Law for the eighth day after birth (Lev. 12.3, cp. Gen. 21.4 [P], etc.); even on the sabbath the sacred ordinance had to be observed (Jn. 7.22 Shabb. 19.2 ff.), although in case of sickness of the child a short delay was permitted (cp. ZDMG 20.529 [66]). For the performance of the office all adult male Israelites were fully qualified; but customarily the duty fell to the head of the house (Gen. 17.23 ff.). That in the earlier times it could be performed (of course only in exceptional cases) by women appears from Ex. 4.25; but this was not allowed by later custom. According to Josephus (Ant. xx. 2.4) it was not unusual to employ the physician; at the present day it is the business of a specially-appointed official, the mshel.

At the close of the first century B.C. the naming of the child accompanied his circumcision (cp. Lk. 1.59 2.21); but there is no indication of any such usage in the OT; indeed, in the older times, the two things were wholly dissociated, the child receiving its name as soon as it was born (cp. for example, Gen. 21.3 29.31 ff. 30.6 ff. 35.13 38.23 ff., etc.).

The origin of the rite among the Hebrews is obscure. One of the views represented in the OT is that it was introduced by Joshua (Josh. 5.2 ff.), who, at the 'Hill of the Foreskins,'² by divine command circumcised the people with knives of flint, and thereby rolled away 'the reproach of Egypt,' 'wherefore the name of that place was called Gilgal i.e. "rolling"') unto this day.' Verses 4-7 are an interpolation designed to bring the narrative into conformity with the view of P that circumcision had merely been in abeyance during the years of wandering; cp. Hollenberg in St. Kr., 74. 493 ff., St. in ZATW 6.132 ff. ('86), and see JOSHUA, § 7. The 'reproach of Egypt,' unless we are to do violence to the narrative, can only be interpreted as meaning that in that country the children of Israel had been uncircumcised, and therefore objects of contempt and scorn. It is impossible, however, to regard the narrative in Joshua as strictly historical; it belongs rather to the category of etymologizing legend, being designed to explain the name and origin of the sanctuary of Gilgal. Possibly Stade is right in his conjecture (see above) that the legend arose from the circumstance that in ancient times the young men of Benjamin or of certain Benjamite families were circumcised on the Hill of the Foreskins at Gilgal. See GILGAL.

Another view of the origin of the rite is given in the account of the circumcision of the son of Moses (Ex. 4.25 ff. [J]), for here also the intention manifestly is to describe its first introduction among the Israelites; there is no suggestion of any idea that it had been a long-standing Hebrew custom. The general meaning of the story is that Moses had incurred the anger of Yahwé, and made himself liable to the penalty of death, because he was not 'a bridegroom of blood'—i.e., because he had not, before his marriage, submitted himself to this rite. Zipporah accordingly takes a flint, circumcises the son instead of her husband, and thereby symbolically makes the latter a 'bridegroom of blood,' whereby the wrath of Yahwé is appeased (see We. Prot. 345).

Both narratives notwithstanding, it is necessary to carry back the origin of this rite among the Hebrews to a much earlier date. True, it is no sufficient proof of this that P (Gen. 17) carries it back to Abraham, and that everywhere in the Law the custom is assumed to be of extreme antiquity. More to the point are the facts that Gen. 31 also represents it as pre-Mosaic, while the use of knives of flint (which was long kept up; see Ex. 12.5 Josh. 5.2 ff.) also indicates a high antiquity. What most of all compels us to this conclusion, however, is the well-ascertained fact that circumcision was in no way a practice peculiar to the Israelites. It was common to a number of Semitic peoples in antiquity: Edom, Ammon, Moab all were circumcised (Jer. 9.25 [26]); of the nations of Palestine the Philistines alone were not (cp. for example, Herod. 2.6 f. 104); the Arabs also practised this rite, which, in the Koran, is taken for granted as a firmly established custom. Nor is it less widely diffused among non-Semitic races.¹ Of special interest for us here is its existence among the Egyptians; for from a very early period we meet with the view that, within the lands of the ancient civilisations, circumcision had its native home in Egypt, from which it had spread not only to the other peoples of Africa, but also to the Semites of Asia (so Herod. 2.6204 Diod. Sic. 3.31 Strabo 17.241). It certainly was known in Egypt from the earliest times (Ebers, Egypt. u. d. Bk. Mss. 1.233), and we have the express testimony of Herodotus (2.36) and Philo (2.21, ed. Mangey) that all Egyptians were circumcised (cp. Josh. 5.2 ff.), where the same thing is presupposed; Erman, Egypt. 32 f., 539; Ebers, op. cit. 278 f.), although, it is true, their testimony has not been allowed to pass wholly unquestioned. One piece of evidence for the Egyptian origin of the rite would be the fact that to the Semites of the Euphrates, who had no direct contact with Egypt, circumcision was unknown. In any case, however, it would be illegitimate to suppose that it was borrowed from Egypt directly by the Hebrews—say, for example, at the time of the sojourn in Egypt; for the nomads of the Sinaitic peninsula appear to have practised it from a very remote period.

As to the original meaning of the rite equally divergent views have been held. The explanations offered fall in the main into two groups—(1) The sanitary: Herodotus asserts that the Egyptians had adopted it simply for the sake of cleanliness, whilst other ancient writers regard it as a prophylactic against certain forms of disease (Phil. de Circumc. 2200, ed. Mangey; Jos. c. Ap. 213). A similar theory is still put forward here and there by various nations (cp Ploss, op. cit.), and it was in great favour with the rationalists of last century (see, e.g., Michaelis, Mon. Kecht, 1186; also Saalschütz, Mon. Kecht, 1246). Recent anthropologists, such as Ploss, give greater prominence to the fact that with many peoples (if not with most) circumcision stands, or originally stood, closely connected with marriage, and regard it as an operation preparatory to the exercise of the marital functions, suggested by the belief that fruitfulness is thereby promoted (so already Philo, ib. cit.; cp CUTTINGS OF THE FLINT, § 4). (2) The religious: It is impossible to decide the question by mere reference to the present conditions, or to the explanation which ancient or modern peoples themselves give. On the one hand, it is not to be expected that the original meaning of the act should be permanently remembered, on the other hand, evidence can be adduced in support of either theory. There are broad general considerations, however, which lead inevitably to the conclusion that, in the last resort, the explanation is to be sought in the sphere of religion. All the world over, in every uncivilised people, whether of ancient or of modern times, practices such as this are called into existence, not by medical knowledge, but by religious ideas. It is to the belief about the gods and to the worship of the gods that all primitive ethics must be traced. In this there is nothing to prevent practices, grown unintelligible through the religious motives having gradually faded into the background, being supplied with other reasons, in this case, sanitary. On the other hand, inasmuch as, to judge by its wide diffusion, circumcision must have arisen spontaneously and independently in more places than one, there is nothing to exclude the possibility of diverse origins.

¹ The facts of its present diffusion have been collected most fully by Ploss, Das Kind in Brauch u. Sitte der Völker, 1. 342 f. [22].

The primarily religious nature of circumcision being granted, we must nevertheless be careful not to carry back to the earlier times the interpretation put upon it by later Judaism. According to P the rite is a symbolical act of purification (in the ritual sense); the foreskin represents the unclean. This conception of circumcision is presupposed in the symbolical applications of the expression to be met with in the discourses of the prophets (see below, § 7). For the earlier period, however, we have no evidence of the presence of any such idea, nor is there any analogous conception to make its existence probable. The notion so frequently brought forward in explanation of the idea,—that the sexual life, as such, was regarded as sinful,—is in truth nowhere to be met with in the OT. The ancient conceptions of clean and unclean are all of them of a wholly different nature; see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

In general, circumcision is to be regarded as a ritual tribal mark. This view is favoured by several considerations. Not only among the Jews,

5. A tribal badge.

but also among the Egyptians and most other peoples by whom circumcision is practised, the uncircumcised are regarded as unclean—i.e., as aliens from the tribe and its worship—and as such are looked upon by the circumcised with contempt. Among peoples who do not practise circumcision we find analogous tribal marks; biting or removal of teeth, special tattooings, in some cases still more drastic mutilations of the sexual organs (semi-castration and the like). Finally, with most peoples, circumcision used to be performed at the age of puberty. By its means the grown-up youth was formally admitted among the men, received all the rights due to this position, and, in particular, the permission to marry (hence the frequent connection already alluded to between circumcision and marriage). The full-grown man becomes for the first time the fully-invested member of the tribe, and, in particular, capable of taking part in its religious functions. It is fitting then that he should wear the badge of his tribe.

Such a badge has always a religious significance, since membership of a clan carries with it the right to participate in the tribal worship (see GOVERNMENT, § 8), and, for early times, to be outside the tribe and outside its worship meant the same thing. Thus the act of circumcision had, in the earliest times, a sacred meaning. Like all other initiation ceremonies of the kind in the Semitic religions, circumcision had attributed to it also the effect of accomplishing a sacramental communion, bringing about a union with the godhead. To this extent the explanation of circumcision as of the nature of a sacrifice (Lwald) is just, originally circumcision and sacrifice served the same end.

For the old Israelite, in particular, the view just stated is confirmed by the identification of the two conceptions

6. In early Israel.

'uncircumcised' and 'unclean'; see especially, in this connection, Ezek. 31:18-22:32, where in the under-world the uncircumcised have assigned to them a place by themselves, away from the members of the circumcised people. The receiving of the tribal mark is a condition of communion (Gen. 34). Among the Israelites also it was the marriageable young men who were circumcised (Josh. 5:2 ff., see above, § 2). In like manner, as already noticed, in Ex. 4:25 circumcision, as a token of marriageability, is brought into connection with marriage itself; cp the expression 'bridegroom of blood.' The same narrative also explains the circumcision of young boys as a surrogate for that of men (cp We. Prot. 345 f.). This custom—of circumcising boys when quite young—may have arisen very early, as soon as the political aspects of the rite fell into the background. When the rite loses political significance, and becomes purely religious, it is not necessary that it should be deferred to the age of full manhood; indeed the natural tendency of pious parents will be to dedicate their child as early as possible to the god who is to be his protector through life' (WRS Rel. Sem. 328). This last general statement is particularly apposite in the case of circumcision.

No mention of circumcision is made either in the decalogue or in any other of the old laws. This silence cannot be explained on the ground merely that as a firmly established custom the rite did not require to be specially enjoined; rather does it prove that, for the religion of Yahwé in the pre-exilic period, circumcision had ceased to possess the great importance which we are compelled to assume for it in the old Semitic religion; nor was the same weight assigned to it which it subsequently acquired in Judaism. In particular the prophets took up towards it the same attitude as they held towards sacrifice, that is to say, they looked upon it as of no consequence so far as the worship of Yahwé was concerned. Such a prophet as Jeremiah, for example, sets himself in the most marked manner against the high appreciation of circumcision still prevalent among the masses in his day, when he places the circumcision of the Israelites exactly on the same level with that of the Egyptians, Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites, and threatens all alike with the divine judgment as being 'circumcised in uncircumcision' or as 'uncircumcised'—that is, as not having the circumcision of the heart (Jer. 9:25 [24] f., cp 14:6-17, 26:41). By this very fact—that they contrast with the circumcision of the flesh that of the heart, the ears, the lips—the prophets gave the first impulse to the later symbolical interpretation of the rite as an act of purification.

This last, as already stated, is dominant in Judaism. In the post-exilic period the rite acquired a quite different position from that which it had previously held. As substitutes for the sacrificed worship, no longer possible, the sabbath and circumcision became the cardinal com-

She was driving before an ENE. wind (τ. 14), which caught her between Cape Lithinos (called also Cape Matala) and Lutro harbour (see PHOENIX, 2). Hence Clauda must be the small island now called Gavdhonisi (Γαυδονήσι) or Gavdo, lying about 20 m. due S. of Lutro. Its only (int. 17 α) has Κλαύδιος νῆπος ἐν τῇ πόλει, and remains of a small town are found on the island. There is some variety in the ancient appellation (Κλαυδία, Stud. m. m., § 328; Gaudos, Pomp. Mela, 2:104; Pliny, Pl. v. 12 61). It became the seat of a bishop (cp Theor. Syn. p. 14. CLAUDIA (κλαυδία [Ti. WH]) unites with Paul at Rome in sending greeting to Timothy at Ephesus (2 Tim. 4:21). Nothing further is known concerning her.

For the ingenious but unconvincing argument by which it has been sought to identify her with the Claudia who marries Pudens in Martial's epigram (4:16), and to prove her the daughter of the British king Venerius Claudius Cogidubnus, see Alford, NT, vol. iii, Prol. to 2 Tim.

CLAUDIUS, the fourth emperor of Rome (41-54), was the son of Nero Claudius Drusus and the successor of Caius Caligula. His advancement to this position came chiefly through the energies of Herod Agrippa I., whom he rewarded with consular honours and the enlargement of his territories by the addition of Judea, Samaria, and certain districts in Lebanon. For the history of the Jews during his reign, see ISRAEL. Claudius is twice mentioned in the NT. In Acts 11:28 the famine foretold by AGABUS is said to have been in the time of Claudius Caesar (cp Κλαύδιον [Ti. WH]; AV after TR, ε. K. α. Καίσαρος; but see CAESAR), and in 18:1 f. reference is made to the expulsion of the Jews from Rome which he was induced to order (as Suet., Claud. 25 tells us) on account of their tumults; 'Judaeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit.' The precise dates of both famine and expulsion have been disputed; see CHRONOLOGY, § 76 f.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS (κλαυδίου λυσίας [Ti. WH], Acts 23:26), 'chief captain' (military tribune, or chiliarch) in command of the Roman garrison of Jerusalem in the governorship of Felix (Acts 21:1 ff.).

CLAY is derived mostly from the decomposition of felspathic rocks (especially granite and gneiss) and of

In Palestine, and indeed throughout the E., clay is used chiefly (1) in building, either retained in its natural state (for ceilings and floors) or manufactured into bricks (see BABYLONIA, § 15, BRICK, CHAMBER, HOUSE); (2) in the manufacture of utensils (see POTTERY); (3) in providing a material for documents public and private and a means of safely preserving them. Very many deeds and other records have been found in the form of inscribed clay tablets in Assyria and Babylonia. The deed or record was first written on a small tablet, or block, of clay, with the names of the principals, witnesses, etc., appended. This tablet was then enclosed in an envelope of clay, on which was written, apparently from memory, the contents of the document, the names of the witnesses, etc. (letters). In Palestine, where, so far as we know, clay tablets were not customary in the historic Israelitish period, clay, instead of wax, was used for sealing. So e. besnes, Job 38:14 14:7, where AV's 'sewest up' should rather be 'sealed' (clay) over '—parallel to 'sealed up' in 17:17. In Egypt jars, mummy-pots, etc., were frequently sealed with clay.

The Heb. and Gr. word, which are rendered 'clay' are (1) עֶפֶר homer, Gen. 11:3, etc.; (2) עֶפֶר homer, used of the mire of streets, also of brick (Nah. 3:14) and potter's clay (Is. 11:2); (3) the biblical Aram. representative עֶפֶר hānaph (Dan. 2:33); and (4) πηλός, Rom. 9:21; see further POTTERY. עֶפֶר meret, Jer. 47:1 AV (RV 'mortal') is uncertain (cp propheta [BAL] ἐν τῇ πηλῶν [Quesd]). A possible meaning is 'earth' (Gieseler); but it may be a corruption for עֶפֶר 'secretly'; see Gen. 4:10.

CLEAN and UNCLEAN, HOLY and PROFANE. Of the Heb. terms which convey the idea of cleanness or holiness the most prominent is טָהוֹר of the Terms. טָהוֹר (טָהַר, טָהַר, etc.), the original meaning of which is not clear. Smend in AT Rel.-gesch. (1) 334 (cp, however, 2nd ed. 150, 223, 325), expresses the common uncertainty of the moment. The older view of Ges. (Theol.), appended now only in a much modified form, is that the root means 'clear', 'brilliant'. Bandissin,² writing in 1878, finds the fundamental idea in 'separation,' a view which is still widely held.

Bandissin says, 'A comparison with טָהוֹר makes it natural to conjecture that טָהַר meant from the first "to be separated" "to be pure"—i.e., that טָהַר was from the beginning synonymous with טָהוֹר; cp טָהַר, "pure," from טָהַר, "to cut," "cut out." It is certain, too, that Yahweh's holiness and his glory are correlative ideas (as, in the Araya, Alph. Mazhar). In Is. 6:3 this is very clearly indicated, and in 7:5 the thought of Yahweh's holiness suggests to Isaiah that of his own (mortal) unholiness (cp Is. 6:3, 7:5). May there not have been a time when טָהַר suggested the idea of purity without any moral reference? Zimmern, followed by Whitehouse (Thinker, July 1892, p. 50), connects טָהַר with Ass. ṭāhu (Rasspalmen, 37, p. 11; Beitr. zur. Assyriol., 1:105; Palst. Schol. Fürsprecher, 11, p. 3), which means 'bright,' 'pure,' or, more precisely (recluse), 'bright,' 'pure' (very frequently), 'illustrious,' 'holy' (so Sayce, in a private letter). According to Abel (in Bandissin, etc.) words which originally denoted 'purity' are used in Coptic to denote the divine or the consecrated. This is quite in accordance with the spirit of the old Egyptian religions and with that of the Semitic religions. If, however, this tempting comparison is accepted, we must frankly admit that the original meaning had become forgotten, or was but obscurely felt, by the OT writers. Only once is 'the Holy One' distinctly parallel to 'holy' (Is. 10:15); but the ideas are, at any rate, implicitly synonymous, in Is. 31:6 33:14 f. In usage, as Davidson (Exek. xxxv), remarks, the term 'holy' expresses, not any particular attribute but rather the general notion of godliness. In a secondary though still early sense, it is applied to that 'which belongs to the sphere of deity, with his near God's presence or has come into it (Ex. 35 Nu. 16:17 f. [17:2 f.]), or which belongs to him, whether as part of himself or as his property.' Davidson also remarks that the root 'probably expressed some physical idea, though the idea is not now reasonable.' See also WRS Proph. 224, who points out (after Noldeke) that the Arabic evidence for the supposed red idea of purity will not hold. In RV 2:130, the so-called 'scholar finds 'some probability' that the original meaning was 'separation' or 'withdrawal'.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, HOLY AND PROFANE

Other less prominent terms are ḥṣṣ (22), ṣāḥḥ (23), and ṣāḥṣ (24), all of which are rendered indifferently by 'clean' and 'pure.' (2) Of these the most definitely religious in its application is ṣāḥṣ. No doubt gold may be ṣāḥṣ, i.e., refined (Ex. 25:11; Job 28:19); so also a turban (Zech. 3:5), vessels (Lev. 19:15), etc.; but the levitical sense is specially prominent (Lev. 7:19 Nu. 9:14, etc.). The eyes of God also can be ṣāḥṣ (Hab. 1:13); therefore he cannot be unclean. Similarly innocence in man: Job 17:9 Ps. 61:12 [11]. God's promises are ṣāḥṣ, i.e., perfectly veridical (Ps. 125:1).

(3) ṣṭ ṣṭ, also means refined (as oil, Ex. 27:25) incense (Ex. 30:34), morally pure, 'upright' (Job 22:17 Prov. 2:11; 21:6). It is used of a prayer (Job 16:17), of the heart (it has to be made or kept 'pure' or 'clean,' Ps. 73:13 Prov. 20:9 [27:2]), or the conduct (Ps. 139:4).

(4) ṣṭ ṣṭ, 'separated'—i.e., 'pure' (cp (1) above). Some Rabbins interpret ṣṭ in Ps. 2:12, 'selected'—ṣṭ; but it would be easier (though not the best solution) to read ṣṭ—ṣṭ. In a physical sense ṣṭ is spotlessly beautiful (Cant. 6:7 f.). Spotless purity belongs to God's commandments (Ps. 19:9). It is used of moral purity (Job 11:4 Ps. 24:7 f.).

The NT terms which have to be noticed are (1) ṣṭ 'pure' (= ṣāḥṣ), in a physical sense of modesty or chastity (2 Cor. 11:2 Tit. 2:3 1 Pet. 3:2); sacred, for ceremonial use (2 Mac. 13:19); pure—ethically—of men (2 Cor. 7:13 Phil. 1:10 1 Tim. 5:22), of God (1 Jn. 3), and of his wisdom (1 Jn. 3:3).

(2) ṣṭ, worthy of veneration, whether of things connected with God (1 K. 14:14 Heb. 9:24) or of persons (e.g., John the Baptist, Mk. 6:2); Christian disciples, Acts 8:14, etc.). Thus the church—like Israel (Tit. 2:14; see PULCHER PRIDE)—is called ṣṭ ṣṭ (cp 1 Th. 5:5, ṣṭ ṣṭ). ṣṭ stands in the same relation ṣṭ as ṣṭ (see LOVING-KINDNESS and CP ASSISTANCE) to ṣṭ (see Thayer, loc. cit. NT, ṣṭ ṣṭ).

(3) ṣṭ corresponds chiefly with ṣṭ; see (6) above; (so also in (5)). It is used of men (Tit. 1:14 Heb. 7:26) of the Messiah (Acts 2:27 13:35), of Abissianic blessings (Acts 13:14 ṣṭ ṣṭ David), and of God (Rev. 15:4 16:5 cp 1 Th. 3:24 Heb. 7:26).

(4) ṣṭ, consecrated to the deity, belonging to God, used of the 'sacred' writings (2 Tim. 3:15 RV, AV 'holy'). In 1 Cor. 15:24 ṣṭ means all the sacred objects pertaining to the worship of God in the temple. For the negatives of these qualities, see COMMON, PROFANE.]

Baudissin's view (above [1]) suits many passages: the holiness of the Ṣāḥṣ and the Ṣāḥṣ! (see IDOLATRY, § 6), who were certainly found in Israel very early, can have consisted only in their separation either they were dedicated to foreign gods, or perhaps they were set apart at puberty from the households in which they grew up, according to a custom which ranges from the Gold Coast to Tahiti (see Frazer's Golden Bough, 225 ff.), and never returned to them or entered others. The fate of the 'harlot' Tyre (Is. 23:18) is to be 'holiness unto Yahweh,' not because the reviving trade of Tyre is to be conducted in a better spirit than before, but because it is to be taxed at the new Jerusalem (which is presumably to be a staple town of the wool and spice trade) in a way to absorb all its profits. Again (Zech. 14:20 f.), everything in the new Jerusalem after its last great trial is to be so holy, so perfectly the property of God, that the very horse-bells will bear the same motto as the High Priest's mitre; the pots in which the sacrificial flesh is boiled for priests are to be as holy as the bowls which hold the sacrificial blood reserved for God; the common cooking pots of Jerusalem are to be holy enough for pilgrims to boil their sacrifices in. Jerusalem (Joel 3[4]:17) is to be 'holy'; no stranger is to pass through. There is to be through the wilderness of Judah a 'holy' way (Is. 35:9), in which no unclean shall walk.

So far it seems as if holiness might be explained as a rule or rather than a quality. The flesh and blood of the sacrifice are holy because they belong to God; the pots and bowls have to be holy that they may hold the flesh and blood. So, too, the vessels (the bodies) of the wallets of David's followers (1 S. 21:5 f.) have to be holy that they may receive the shewbread, which is holy because it is set before God. David (whom all the writers who speak of him regard, from their several points of view, as a model of wisdom and piety) comes for the negative holiness of his men, and any accidental defilement which he does not know will have had time to wear off—he appears to think that the shewbread will sanctify their 'vessels,' and implies that if they had been specially sanctified, as for a holy war or a pilgrimage, they might have eaten the shewbread though they were not priests.

The 'sanctification' of persons and things falls under the same notion. 'Holiness,' as Robertson Smith observed (RS² 440 ff.), is contagious:

2. Contagion of holiness.

Whatever a 'holy' thing or a 'holy' person touches becomes holy. When Elmhurst his mantle over Elisha, the latter has to follow till Elijah releases him; the worshippers of Baal, whose ordinary dress might 'profane' the house, are provided with special vestments from the stores of the house of Baal; otherwise, when they came outside, their ordinary dress would make whatever it touched 'holy to Baal,' and unavailable to the former owners. The priest on the great Day of Atonement (the rule is older than the days to take off the holy linen garments and leave them in the holy place, and to wash his flesh in water lest any of the contagion of holiness should cling to him). In a text which, though belonging to the main stock of P, seems to represent a later state of the law, the consecration of Aaron and his successors seems to consist in their investiture with the hereditary state dress of Ex. 28; cp Nu. 20:25-28. According to another view, which is older than Zech. 4:14, the consecration consists in the anointing (cp ANOINTING, § 3, c). The doctrine of the contagion of holiness is at its height in Ezek. (16:24), who provides special kitchens where the priests are to cook the most holy things, and special chambers in which they are to eat them, without bringing them forth into the outer court to sanctify the people (who are eating their own sacrifices). Otherwise, they might become the property of the sanctuary, or at least would be subject to the same obligations as the priests. For the same reason, it is expressly stated, they are to leave the holy garments in the holy place, though all the top of the mountain is most holy. So, too, a little later, the profane sacrificers² of Is. 66:5 either threaten to sanctify the poor who approach them, or claim to be too holy to be approached. In Hag. 2:12 f. we find a distinct change. The contagion of uncleanness is stronger than the contagion of holiness. A garment in which holy flesh is carried does not sanctify; a garment which has touched the dead pollutes (cp EGYPT, § 19, and so DRESS, § 8). The stricter view is still presupposed, at least for the 'most holy' things; any garment sprinkled with blood has to be washed in the holy place (Lev. 6:27 [28]);³ otherwise it would sanctify. For the same reason the earthen pots used in cooking are to be broken; brass pots (too valuable to break) may be used, but only after having been rinsed and scoured—obviously to remove the last vestige of the

¹ Everybody dedicated a new house (Dt. 20:1); was it ever a custom to dedicate vessels?

³ Is this the reason why the holy garments are of linen? Woollen garments would naturally be sent to the fuller at long intervals.

holy food. The rank of the priests is determined by their right to eat of both the holy and the most holy, which are often cited as if they were known, and never described, though we are told that the 'sin' and the 'trespass' offering are most holy and must be eaten in the holy place, and hence could not be eaten by the households of the priests. Why these special offerings are specially holy is discussed elsewhere (see SACRIFICE). The scribes, to whom we owe this law, are the fathers of those who decided that a book was or was not canonical according as it did or did not 'defile the hands'. After touching a really holy book, a man had to wash before touching common food lest his hands should sanctify it (cp CANON, § 4). In the oldest practice, it would seem, it is the contact with the holy flesh that is the essence of the consecration of priests: the sacrificer who wishes to institute a priest 'fills his hand'.¹ As sacrifice and slaughter are nearly synonymous (as here in Is. 34:6; EXOD. II, § 14), we seem to find in one of the stories of the golden calf that the share of the Levites in the slaughter of the worshippers is virtually their consecration. 'They have filled your hand for Yahweh' (i.e., 'Ye have been to-day appointed priests'), 'for every man was against his son and his brother' (EX. 32:26).² In 1 K. 13:31 Jeroboam fills the hand for the priests of the high places; in 2 Ch. 13:6 each candidate brings a bullock and seven rams to fill his hand.³ This seems an echo of old tradition, for in EX. 29:19, Moses takes only two rams and a bullock when he fills the hand of Aaron and his sons: the blood of the ram of the 'fill offering' is put on the right ear, the right thumb, the right great toe, of each priest; the pieces, which as a rule are burnt, and one of those which in ordinary sacrifices fell to the priest as his fee, are both laid with cake on the hand of each priest and waved before God (to assert the priest's right to the 'wave-breast' and the 'heave-shoulder') and then burnt. There seems to be an afterthought (v. 26) in which Moses as the officiating priest takes the wave-breast to himself; the priests eat the rest of the sacrifice (which in ordinary cases the worshipper would eat) in the holy place. The idea seems to be that just as the worshipper in the old profession (Dt. 26:3) declares 'I have put away the holy out of my house,' so the sacrificer passes on the dangerous holy food to a priest who will take the risk and the privilege of sharing the table of God, and bear the iniquity of the people in their holy things. Possibly the Levites in EX. 32:26 ff. may point to a time when the priest was not chosen by the sacrificer, but handed his office by laying hands on the holy flesh.

The question whether 'holiness' to begin with is nothing more than 'separateness' bears very directly on the 'holiness' of God. If holiness is originally a relation rather than a quality, if things and persons are holy to God as persons and acts are righteous before him, then God himself is holy simply as the centre of the circle of sanctity; if all that belongs to the sanctuary is holy, how much more he who dwelleth between the cherubim, who inhabiteth the praises of Israel (Ps. 22:3[1])? He is the object of worship whom his worshippers 'sanctify.' He is the 'Holy One': 'I am God and not man, the Holy One of Israel in the midst of these' (Hos. 11:9 cited Is. 12:6: 'Rejoice and shout, O inhabitant of Zion, for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of these'). Yahweh is the God, the Holy One of the prophet (Hab. 1:12). So Jacob (Gen. 31:42, cp 28:22) [1] swears by the fear of his father Isaac—i.e., the God whom his father feared.

¹ If Micah (Judg. 17:6) had begun with the Levite we might suppose that the filling of his hand consisted in his salary. He is not likely to have given his son a salary; yet he 'filled his hands.'

There are other texts, however, in which holiness seems to be absolute. The men of Beth shemesh (1 Sam. 6:2) ask, 'Who can stand before Yahwe, this holy god?' In Am. 4:2 Yahwe swears by his holiness. Does that mean his character? or the reverence due to him? The answer will govern the sense in which his name is holy in 27. In Is. 5:16 (authoritative enough by whomsoever written) God's being exalted through judgment and sanctified through righteousness are closely parallel. The song ascribed to the mother of Simeon (1 S. 2) is an unambiguous echo of the song of the seraphim (Is. 6:3): 'Holy, holy, holy is Yahwe. Salath, the whole earth is full of his glory,'—where holiness and glory are clearly parallel. See too in Jer. 17:12, 'a high throne is the place of our sanctuary,' and in Ex. 15:11, 'Who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful to praises, doing wonders?' the holiness, the praises, the wonders, seem to belong to God's external majesty. Throughout the OT God's worshippers rehearse his acts much oftener than his attributes. We find his 'righteous acts' as early as the song of Deborah (Judg. 5:10); but not till Jer. 12:1 do we read, 'righteous art thou, Yahwe, when I plead with thee'; where the sense is still half forensic, as in Ex. 9:27 (JE) Ps. 51:4-6]. In Ps. 117 we have 'The righteous Yahwe loveth righteousness.' The parallel between holiness and glory is reinforced by the contrast between holy and profane, for profane certainly seems to mean what is cast down to be trodden under foot (Ezek. 28:16, 'Cast thee as profane out of the holy mount'; Ps. 89:9[4]). 'Thou hast profaned his crown to the ground' (cp 143). Israel, again (Dt. 26:6), is made high above all people, that it may be a holy people.

The demand that Israel shall be holy is common to every stage and aspect of the Law. In Ex. 22:31 (LXX)

5. Of Israel.

(JE) and Dt. 14:21, it is the ground on which Israel is to abstain from all meat not killed by men for human food; in Dt. 14:17, Israel as a holy people is forbidden to make to the dead blood- or hair-offerings, intended, doubtless, to keep up a physical communion with them (cp EX. 14:17, 18, 19). The spiritual tie between God and his peculiar people who are his children is not to be impaired by a rite the sense of which was still clear when the book which Hilkiah found was written, though in Jer. 16:6 the rite seems harmless and unmeaning. Again, the title of the third year is profane if any of it has been 'eaten in mourning' or 'given for the dead' (Dt. 26:14). As we to think of the mere unheekiness of any thing connected with the dead (Hos. 9:4) or of some form of worship, as in Is. 8:19? Consecration for one mode of worship would be a defilement for another. In Lev. 19:27 (cp 21:5) we have the law against cuttings for the dead preceded by a law against an Arab totem, which probably marked consecration to an Arab god. This might go back to Hezekiah, who, according to Sennacherib (AR. 204), entertained Arab mercenaries. Glaim adopted the dress of his Alan guard. If we suspect with Robertson Smith² an invasion of Arab totemism in the time of Ezek. (87-93), Lev. 19^d will forbid the tattooing of totem marks.

² Here, therefore, we have a clear case of the re-emergence into the light of day of a cult of the most primitive totem type which had been banished for centuries from public religion, but must have been kept alive in obscure circles of private or local superstition, and sprang up again on the rising of the national faith, like some noxious weed in the courts of a deserted temple' (RS², 357). See the context, and cp Che. Intr. in 308 ff.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, HOLY AND PROFANE

In the Book of the Covenant and in Deuteronomy the holiness of the covenant people is demanded, so that speak, incidentally, and without express reference to the holiness of the covenant God. If one were to try to find a keynote for the older book it would be 'Justice'; for Deuteronomy perhaps 'Loving kindness, hevel, the dutiful love of the worshipper to his God, which includes kindness for God's sake to men (see also LOVINGKINDNESS). 'Holiness' is certainly the keynote of the oldest stratum of the Levitical law (see LAVERGNE).

Deuteronomy is clearly a development, as compared with the Book of the Covenant; a deeper insight into the vocation of the chosen people has been gained. Is the Law of Holiness a development in the same sense, compared with Deuteronomy? The interval between Ezekiel and Jeremiah is shorter than that between Deuteronomy and the Book of the Covenant; yet Ezekiel is almost as full of the ideas of H (i.e., the Law of Holiness) as Jeremiah of those of D. Has he inherited a relatively old tradition? Short as H is, it is full of variations and repetitions. Would not an elder or a younger contemporary of Ezekiel, giving expression to a new religious movement that had grown out of Jeremiah's covenant, have imparted more unity to his work? Again in more than one way H seems to be older. No reader of Frazer (see especially Golden Bough, 1279 n. 2) would think the law which forbids the reaping of corners later than the law against gleanings (Lev. 19a f.). Nor is the holiness required of priests yet extended to the whole people; thus if a layman eats ²² he is defiled for the day and must wash his clothes; but for priests the prohibition is absolute. There seems, too, to be a recognition of other gods (Dt. 213 f.); if a man curses his own god he shall bear his iniquity (i.e., he must not come to the priest of the God of Israel to make atonement for him). Certainly in D the demand for 'holiness' is based on the more characteristic demand for monotheism, whilst in H, though the demand for monotheism is not superfluous—Israel, we are told, went after the Shulim (see DEMOS, § 4) in the wilderness (Lev. 17 f.)—it is not fundamental. The giving of the seed to Moloch is treated as analogous to the moral abominations of the nations, for which the land spewed them out, rather than to turning away to idols or making molten gods. It was a profanation of God's holy name just because those under his wrath (Ezek. 2025 f.) regarded it as part of his service. Upon the whole, the demand for holiness in H seems to be an intensification of the demand that worshippers shall sanctify themselves, which we may suppose the better priests to have insisted upon as long as there were feasts in Israel. In many ways the holiness is still external; 'Ye shall be holy, for I Yahweh am holy,' appears (Lev. 2026) as a sanction for the law against abominable food (cp 1144 f.); in 192 218 the context takes off nothing from the text. These passages mark the culmination, not the starting point, of a line of teaching. Generally the sanction of the precept is, 'I am Yahweh,' 'I am Yahweh your god,' 'I am Yahweh your god who brought you out of Egypt,' 'I am Yahweh who sanctify you.' Logically and theologically God's holiness is the source of all others; he is holy in himself and therefore what he takes for his must be holy too; but possibly, as Robertson Smith held, holiness may in the beginning have been regarded as a mysterious virtue inherent in things external to the worshipper—in trees, in waters, in stones, in the mysterious animal life of well-wooded and well-watered spots,—each of which may have served to suggest a higher power beyond the phenomena in which it was first recognised. Historically, however, the evidence that holiness is an attribute of the object of worship is neither so early nor so copious as the evidence that holiness is a relation bringing the worshipper and his holy things into a new sphere with something worshipped at its centre.

Obviously 'holy and profane,' 'clean and unclean,' is a cross division; holy things and persons are, or may be, as uncleanable for common life as if they were unclean, though, on the other hand, holiness necessarily presupposes and includes cleanness. Again, uncleanness often seems, like holiness, to have something supernatural about it: unclean animals often seem to be 'abominable,' like idols; the uncleanness of the dead, and of women at certain times, is as likely to savour of awe as of disgust.

In historical times clean and unclean beasts are those which are fit or unfit for food rather than for sacrifice.

8. Quadrupeds. The law (cp below, § 113) but the law of clean and unclean animals is puzzling.² The law forbids the eating of quadrupeds to the ordinary Israelite, with the exception of the camel, which is clean on the hygienic point of view. If the law, it must be an observation.

may have noted that camels graze in the pastures of the Israelites, and that they are as fit for food as the other animals. The patriarchs have camels (Gen. 3032), the teraphim have camels (Judg. 188), more horses and camels than oxen and asses (cp GEN. 3032, 3033). The camel is the only of clean (Judg. 188) and the necks of the camels are the only ones of the oldest stratum of the story (Gen. 3032) and the Amalekites escape on camels (Gen. 3032). Camels have always killed and so, then camels, though the meat is not to be eaten and mutton. Possibly the camel was unclean because it was the domestic animal of alien nomads. If so, the rule 'whatsoever divideth the hoof and cheweth the cud shall be clean' may have been settled before the question of eating camels became practical. This question was decided by the observation that the camel does not strictly divide the hoof, or at least rests part of its weight on an unhooved pad.

The express prohibition of eating hares, rock badgers, and swine, as food, is curious. No reason except a possible connection with totemism has yet been suggested why the rock badger was forbidden; and for the prohibition of the hare we have only guesses—perhaps it is worth while to mention the idea that hare's flesh is unhealthy. The uncleanness of swine is (its height when they are kept in sties and left dirty; but in OT and NT times they seem to have fed in herds out of doors. Compared with sheep and goats, they are fond of mud—but so are buffaloes in modern Palestine, which are not regarded with the same horror as swine. On the other hand, tribes of herdsmen and shepherds have much more in common with each other than with swineherds, and if we are to look for a natural explanation of the abhorrence of swine we may look for it here: the droves of swine of the alien were abominable to the flocks and herds of the Hebrew. As for the actual feeling, whatever its cause, it is significant that in Harran, traditionally the last station of Abraham on his way to Canaan and the land to which Jacob returned, the land where he won his wives and his wealth, swine were sacrificed once a year and eaten only then. A sacrifice which is, for whatever reason, rate, is also mysterious, awful, and potent. Dogs too were sacred in Harran; and both swine and dogs seem to figure in the profane sacrifices of Is. 65 and 66.¹ See Doi, § 4.

¹ With regard to sacrifices it is men that are clean or unclean. When men sacrifice of the flock and the herd, only the clean may eat (when Saul misses David at table the first thought that occurs to him is 'he is unclean'); that was the common law till slaughter without sacrifice was allowed in D in the interest of the one sanctuary. Of game, on the other hand, of the roebuck and the hare the clean and the unclean may eat alike—though possibly there is a trace of a blood-offering by hunters in the rule in H (Lev. 1713) that the blood is to be not simply poured out but covered with earth—a prescription which might be either a survival or a development.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, HOLY AND PROFANE

Whatever the reason for the express prohibition of camels, hares, rock badgers, and swine, the prohibition is as old as any part of the law which we can trace; but the list of prohibited animals in Lev. 11 29 ff. (P) has integral relation to the rest of the law; the weasel, the mouse, and different kinds of lizards are 'the uncleanest with you of swarming things'; except dry sowing seed, everything that comes into contact with their carcase is unclean.

The rule is meant to work; one of these abominations does not defile a whole cistern or fountain; every earthenware vessel which they touch is to be broken; other vessels are to be washed in water and to be unclean until even; the water which washes the vessels pollutes all meat on which it falls; any drink in the polluted vessels is of course unclean.

Two questions arise: Why should people wish to eat weasels, mice, and different kinds of lizards? and why are these charged with special uncleanness? The traditional answer to the second is that they are in a sense domestic vermin which hunt houses and are always getting into whatever is stored there, and so are worse than vermin out of doors; but, as most commentators think that one of the lizards enumerated is an iguana or a land crocodile 3 or 4 ft. long (see LIZARD [1]), the explanation has to bear a heavy strain. If Robertson Smith's theory of totemism is established, much will become clear.² The elders of Israel who worshipped 'creeping things' in 'chambers of imagery' (Ezek. 8 10 ff.) made it necessary to cultivate a special religious horror of their low-class totems; they were at the same stage as the Harranians, who are said to have worshipped field mice. Indications of high class totems, however, are not wanting; see LEOPARD, WOLF.

There is neither a category nor a list of clean birds; of the unclean, as enumerated, most are uncleanable.

9. Birds. Either birds of prey or feeders on carrion. The lawing is especially forbidden; the only possible reason yet discovered is that it haunts marshy places and that its flesh has sometimes a bad smell. Nothing is said one way or other of doves or pigeons, — which is remarkable, as they do not appear at Solomon's table, and, though they are the only birds which, as far as we know, were sacrificed, they were used for sacrifices of which the worshipper at least did not eat. In Syria, at any rate, they were always associated with the worship of Astarte, and wherever that worship spread to the West, they went with it, and according to Lucian (Dea Syria, 14, 54) none of the worshippers at Hierapolis ventured to eat or touch them — they were too holy, — and whoever touched them was évayēs or 'unclean' for a day, and it was a question whether swine were 'holy' or 'abominable.' Probably the question of clean or unclean birds was only of secondary importance; it was not easy to keep ducks or geese; there were no cocks (see COCK) or hens; the 'fowls of heaven' generally appear as feeding on sacrifices or corpses; the 'fowler' (who appears as early as Hos. 9 8) probably caught small birds for the rich.³

The prohibition of 'flying swarming things that go on all fours' looks as if at first it included locusts, the only insects which anybody could wish to eat;

10. Insects. if so, subsequent scribes discovered that, as they leap on their hind legs and do not strictly go on

Smith's hypothesis has the special merit of explaining why certain animals are sacred, and why certain kinds of flesh may not be eaten. The theory that these animals were regarded as the property of the Godhead only throws the question back. For how came people to embrace such a remarkable theory?' For Nowack's view see his H. I. 1 181.]

all fours, they might be eaten in all stages of their growth.

The law of aquatic food is clear: 'whatever hath fins and scales' is clean; this limits the dietary to true fishes,

11. Fish. and, among these, excludes eels and shads, — popular and common articles of food in Egypt, Greece, and Italy. According to Pliny (IV 88 xii. 104), Numa thought fish without scales unfit for funeral banquets; Planktū Meri-Amen thought well of a king of Lower Egypt who ate no fish; according to Lucian (Dea Syria, 54), fish in general is forbidden food. The Law knows nothing of sacrificial fish. Perhaps the prohibition of fish was general, and the permission of what had fins and scales an exception; see FISH, § 8 ff. There is certainly a tendency to identify what is clean and what is fit for sacrifice. Thus Hosea (9 4) regards food eaten

12. Plants. out of the land of Israel as unclean, because it cannot be purified by acceptable sacrifice to the God of Israel; in Amos 7 17 a foreign land is polluted for the same reason — and in II the fruit of all trees is to be unencumbered the first three years (i.e., the fruit is to be picked off as fast as it forms while the trees are establishing themselves); for the fourth year the whole crop is to be holy to praise Yahwe withal (i.e., to be used for sacrificial feasts). There is no distinction anywhere between clean and unclean herbs; the first fruits of all are to be offered, though only corn and wine and oil figure in sacrifice. In P (Gen. 1 29) every herb

13. Different periods. and tree that yieldeth seed is given for meat from the first; so after the flood is all animal food; as sacrifice was instituted (according to P) for the first time at Sinai, the distinction between clean and unclean animals was still in abeyance. The distinction between clean and sacrificial animals, which is presupposed throughout D is perhaps to be explained by the transition from the nomadic state. If Levi the sacred tribe be a metonymic formed from Leah the wild cow, wild animals must have been sacred once (see 1 10).

The Law of clean and unclean meats obtained special prominence in the Greek period; the first proof of the religious fidelity of Daniel and his companions is their resolution not to defile themselves with the king's meat; when Antiochus Epiphanes resolved to abolish 'Jewish particularism' eating swine's flesh was the test of conformity. If we go back fifty or seventy years, Joseph, the enterprising revenue farmer, whom his namesake idealised (Jos. Ant. xii. 1 10) as Machiavelli did Caesar Borgia, had clearly no scruple of the kind; ² yet even he, though his kindred in the next generation (ib. 5 6) were prominent on the heathen side and he himself fell in love with a pagan (ib. 8), was heartily thankful when his own niece was substituted for her in order to save him from polluting his seed among the heathen. A psalmist (see Ps. 111), who still instinctively draws his imagery from a time before the institution or revival of the evening burnt sacrifice, may be an older witness for the view (hardly to be traced in Ezra or Nehemiah) that the Law of clean and unclean meats is given to separate Israel from the heathen; he appears to be thinking simply of fellowship at the table, not, like the author of Is. 65, of sacrificial communion. If so, a Maccabean editor may have revived a psalm which suited the times. Probably older psalms from 1 S onwards lay the stress rather on cleanness of hands and innocence; in Is. 65 the unclean lips of prophets and people are generally explained as relating to sins of speech, after the analogy of Zeph. 3 4 13. After the destruction of the temple, and still more after Palestine ceased to be the centre of Jewish life, the law of clean and unclean was less zealously observed, though portions of it prove still to be of considerable sanitary value. See FOOT, § 10 ff.

Human uncleanness¹ is of two kinds. It may arise from external contact, or from something in the man or woman who is unclean. The uncleanness of death falls under both; the dead is unclean and makes others unclean.

14. Human uncleanness.

Diseases like leprosy or issues, natural processes like menstruation and probably copulation, cause uncleanness too. If, as Wellhausen holds (JH 151; but cp JH 108), Lev. 12 implies Lev. 15, the law of uncleanness after childbearing might be an extension by analogy of the older law of the uncleanness of menstruation.² If so, as the Vendidad has much to say respecting the uncleanness of childbirth, we might suspect Persian influence; the rather that there is no hint of it in the older Hebrew literature, while the 'menstruous cloth' appears (Is. 30.22) in a passage still generally assigned to the Assyrian period. Cp LAMITY, § 11.

Perhaps a common element in all cases of uncleanness not caused by external contact is that the unclean in some way is disgusting or alarming. The law of leprosy is not to be explained from the risk of contagion; ordinary sickness, even pestilence, does not occasion uncleanness; the leper is 'unclean' because he is smitten of God, just as the madman in Moslem countries is 'holy,' and epilepsy was the tepa poros in Greece. In general, persons who are in a state to make ordinary people shunk from them, because their neighbourhood is uncomfortable or terrifying, are unclean.

Casual uncleanness, according to P in its final state, does not require an offering for its removal. It is enough to observe the prescribed term of seclusion, generally 'until the even,' and the prescribed washing; if either be neglected and the unclean negligently or ignorantly intrude among the clean, a 'sin-offering' is necessary. This is Dillmann's inference from Lev. 5.2. According to Nu. 5.2, the unclean is excluded not only from 'the congregation,' but also from 'the camp,' i.e., not only from the temple, but also from, at any rate, walled towns. No offering is prescribed for the menstruous woman; but after childbirth and after issues a 'sin-offering' is prescribed, whilst the leper has also to bring a 'trespass' offering before he can come into 'the congregation,' though he is admitted to 'the camp' after the performance of an (older?) rite with two birds, running water, cedar, hyssop, and scarlet. After he comes into the camp he must still wait several days before he comes to his 'tent.' Here it is hard to doubt that the law has a sanitary purpose; it imposes a short quarantine to make sure that the cure is complete, and not improbably to guard against the hereditary transmission of the disease. The 'trespass' offering of the leper looks like a 'development'; it is necessary to assert expressly that it belongs to the priest (Lev. 14.33); the leper is anointed with the blood and oil of the trespass offering, exactly as Aaron and his sons (Lev. 8.22) are anointed with the blood of the ram of consecration, whose flesh is boiled for Aaron and his sons to eat, while the 'wave breast' falls to Moses as the sacrificer's fee. Possibly the re-consecration of the leper as one of the holy people by sacrificial blood is older than the theory that he was not to eat of the sacrifice. The sin and the burnt-offering prescribed after all the graver kinds of uncleanness are to 'make an atonement,' which may imply that the uncleanness was a penal infliction, though this is nowhere stated. The (older?) rite, which readmits the leper to the camp, is the only one prescribed for the cleansing of a house from the plague of leprosy, whilst leprosy in a garment, if it ceases to spread, is sufficiently purged by two washings.¹ Much of the rite is still transparent. One of the birds is to be held over an earthen vessel full of living water into which the blood of the dead bird falls; the living bird, the cedar, the scarlet, and the hyssop are to be dipped in the water and blood; the leper who is to be cleansed is to be sprinkled with both; and then the living bird is to fly away with the plague of leprosy, as the women with the wind in their wings (Zech. 5.4) fly away with the wickedness of the land of Israel, or as the goat for Azazel (see AZAZEL) carries away the sin of the congregation into the wilderness. Probably the living bird is dipped in the blood and water to establish a kind of blood brotherhood between it and the leper. If the blood and water were on the leper alone, the release of the living bird might symbolise that he who was hitherto shut up in Israel was now free as the fowls of the air. Living water is, of course, a natural element of all purifications; Hyssop (JH 2.1), certainly a popular means of purification (Ps. 51.7 [9]), according to Phry (JH XVI, 76) is good for the complexion, and according to others is a saponeaceous herb. What are the cedar and the scarlet for? Cedar wood is aromatic; the bright colour of scarlet may betoken strength and splendour. In the ancient domestic rites of India (SHR 30.2-4) children are made to touch gold and ghae, that when they grow up they may have riches and food. Remote as the analogy is, we may ask, Is the leper, in virtue of the rite, to dwell in cedar and be clothed with scarlet? See CHADAR.

The cedar, hyssop, and scarlet appear again in the mysterious rite of the Red Heifer whose ashes are used for the water of separation. It had a whole treatise to itself in the Mishna, where its qualifications were elaborated to such a point that at last R. Nism said that no one since the days of Moses had been able to find one fit to be slain. There is an analogous rite in D (Dr 21.7). When the land is defiled with blood the ordinary way of putting away bloodguiltiness is to shed the blood of the slayer. If he cannot be found the land is made clean again with the blood of an invoked heifer killed, either by beheading or by breaking the neck (the meaning of the verb h'ch is not clear), in a barren valley with a running stream in it, where the elders of the city nearest the place where the dead man is found wash their hands of bloodguiltiness over the heifer. A barren valley is chosen, according to Dillmann, Ewald, and Keil, in order that the polluting blood may not be uncovered and lose its virtue; according to Robertson Smith (Rel. Sem. 371), to avoid all risk of contact with sacrosanct flesh. We might ask, Would running water in a fertile valley used for such a rite pollute the fields of offerings? The goat for Azazel is sent into the wilderness. If the heifer is beheaded, her blood is almost certainly intended to 'cover' the blood of the slain. If not, are we to think of Sam's first muster (JH 14.7)? Do the elders by implication invoke on themselves the doom of the heifer if their protestation is false? What is the meaning of the obviously popular rite (see COVENANT, § 5) of dividing victims when a covenant is made (Gen. 15.6 [Jer. 31.18 f.]? The rite of the Red Heifer is more general in its intention. Its principal use is not to do away bloodguiltiness, but to cleanse those who are defiled by contact with the dead. Incidentally we learn that it was required for the purification of the vessels of all spoil which will not ate to the fire (Nu. 31.23); and the Levites on their consecration are to be purified by what is probably the same, 'the water of sin' (JH 8.7). [Aaron and his sons (Ex. 29. and parallels) are washed at their consecration with common

17. Red Heifer, etc.

Neither of these laws belongs to the main stock of P, though, if they were later developments, we should expect that the cleansing of a house, at any rate, would have required an offering. In D the dedication of a house has all the look of a survival, and was probably accomplished at one time by sacrifice.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN

water.] Both texts are late, and represent the views of antiquaries rather than the claims of legists with practical interests to satisfy. The tendency to ascribe the whole law to Moses naturally brought with it an increasing zeal for the oldest rites that could be recollected; it does not follow that the water of separation was invented in or after the Exile, because the occasions for its application were prescribed then. Possibly, as the Persians removed the uncleanness of the dead by elaborate ceremonies with šmē, the priests thought that in similar cases water hallowed with the ashes of a cow would be specially efficacious. The law of a purification on the third and the seventh day (Nu. 19:11-13 or 13-16?) looks older than the original law of the Red Heifer, which seems to end at v. 13; in v. 17 ff. we have the rule for its application.

The rite itself is as obscure as its history. For one thing, at every stage its ministers must be clean, and they become unclean by their ministry; the priest who superintends the burning is unclean till the even; so is he who burns; he who collects the ashes (though they must be laid up in a clean place) is unclean; so is he who sprinkles or even touches the water, which is the one means which can make those defiled by contact with the dead clean. Naturally, we suppose that those who were 'unclean' at the stage of the law implied in our records were 'sanctified' at an earlier stage. Twice the heifer (12:9-17) is called a sin-offering. The ritual has interesting analogies with, and differences from, that of other sin-offerings. Like the sin-offering for the priest's own sin, and that for the sin of the congregation, it is to be burnt outside the camp—hide, dung, and all. Unlike them it is to be killed, not in the place of the burnt offering, but without the camp. There is another contrast. The blood and fat of all sin-offerings, including the sin-offerings for priest and congregation and the bullock offered at the consecration of Aaron, is presented in the sanctuary; the blood seems specially used there, as in the ritual of the Day of Atonement, to re-hallow the altar profaned by sin. The heifer's blood is not brought into the sanctuary; it is sprinkled towards it seven times. But for this we might suppose that the uncleanness of death was driven away from the camp or the city and burnt with the heifer; but her blood is hallowing—else why is it sprinkled toward the holy place? Are all these rites compromises between the old custom of worshipping outside the city, which maintained itself as late as David (2 Sam. 15:32), and the new custom of hallowing the city by a sanctuary? As late as the Assyrian period (Is. 33:14, if this be Isaiah's), the close neighbourhood of an ever-burning altar made many uncomfortable.¹ For this reason, among others, the rarer and more solemn sacrifices were still performed outside. Then perhaps the old rite in the old place took on a new meaning. Kings were, as a rule, buried in the city, and it was customary (Jer. 34:5) to make a burning for them.² In 2 Ch. 16:14 we read of a very great burning for Asa; the Chronicler, who may be quoting a relatively old authority, thinks of perfumes, at which Jeremiah does not hint. Were valuables burnt in honour of kings? Have the cedar, the hyssop, and the scarlet burnt with the heifer any analogy to such burnings? Is the putting away of the heifer with something of a royal funeral an almost unconscious reminiscence of a well-nigh forgotten cultus of sacred animals? Is the red heifer the last trace of a cow goddess (see CAUL, GOLDEN)? There are, of course, many instances of mortal representations of the Godhead, honoured for a time, and then ceremoniously put away. In any case, the efficacy of the heifer's ashes seems to lie in the fact that they reconsecrate rather than purge the unclean. All Israel were originally hallowed (Ex. 24:8 JE) by the blood of the covenant; so the priests are hallowed by the blood of the 'fill offering'; so the blood of the atonement re-hallows the holy place and the altar that has been profaned; so the leper is re-hallowed after his uncleanness with blood, and the ashes of a peculiar sin-offering serve the same end. On the other hand, water and fire (except in Is. 65 ff.) seem simply to remove external pollutions, not to renew communion with a holy life. Robertson Smith (Kinship [83], Rel. Sem. [94]), and Wellhausen (Reite Arab. Heid. [37]) are the best authorities for the Semite world. The subject is best studied from a comparative point of view, for which Frazer's Golden Bough (90) is indispensable. The critical treatment of the subject is of recent growth and is capable of further development. Cp. I. C. Moulton, 'The begripnen reit en omen in het O.T.' Th. T. Tijdschr. 1931, 1, 20. CLEMENT (ΚΛΗΜΕΝΣ [Ti. W11]), a Philippian Christian who had taken an active part in building up the church at Philippi, in which he had the co-operation of Enoch and Sentyche (Phil. 4:3). In the allusion to him there is nothing to imply that he was a companion of Paul in his journeyings, or to justify his traditional identification (in the Western Church) with the Roman Clement.

In the list of the 'seventy disciples' compiled by the Pseudo-Dorotheus he is spoken of as having been the first of the Gentiles and Greeks to believe in Christ, and as having afterwards become bishop of Sardica. The Pseudo-Hippolytus has Sardina, for which, however, we should probably read sardica.

CLEOPAS (ΚΛΕΟΠΑΣ [Ti. W11], abbrev. from ΚΛΕΟΠΑΤΡΟΣ), according to Lk. 24:18 the name of one of the two disciples who accompanied the risen Jesus to Emmaus. The narrative in question, however, is one of the latest of those which attached themselves to the accounts of the resurrection of Jesus. Paul, who had spent fifteen days in the society of Peter (Gal. 1:18) and was strongly interested in establishing the fact of the resurrection, knows nothing of it. By εἶρα . . . ἐπειρα . . . ἐπειρα . . . εἶρα . . . ὁμοῦ of 1 Cor. 15:8 he unquestionably intends to enumerate exhaustively all the appearances of the risen Lord which were known to him; and he had the most urgent occasion to do so, for the resurrection of Jesus had been brought in question at Corinth. The narrative of the third evangelist conveys in a highly concrete form the thought that it is from Jesus himself we receive the knowledge that his Passion and Resurrection had been foretold by Moses and all the prophets (24:25-27). In reality, however, this conviction must have been gradually reached as the result of a prolonged and ever-deepening study of the OT by the whole church. That it is in the Eucharist that his presence is made known to the church is, in like manner, an experience still renewed in every renewal of the act. Here too, accordingly, the thought, that in the person of Christ as experienced in the sacrament which commemorates his death we have our most convincing assurance that he truly lives, finds concrete expression.

After what has been said, it becomes a question whether Cleopas is a historical person at all, though there is nothing in the mere name to suggest that he is not. There is no sufficient ground, philological or other, for regarding him as a veiled representation of the apostle Paul.

Several MSS of the Itala and Vg., as also the Coptic and the Armenian versions, read ΚΛΕΩΠΑΣ or ΚΛΕΩΠΑΣ in Jn. 19:3 also; but if this were the original reading, the substitution of the more difficult form ΚΛΩΠΑΣ would be incomprehensible. For the evidence that different persons are intended in Jn. and in Lk., and that the confusion of the two is due to later writers, see CLEOPAS, § 5 f.

CLEOPHAS (κλωπᾶς [Ti.WH]). Jn. 19:25 AVF, AV¹⁹²⁵ and RV Clotas (q.v.).

CLOAK (CLOKE).

For ῥάβδος, rod, in Ls. 50:17 see TENTE. In this passage the rod was a military over-garment, and cloak well expresses this.

For ῥάβδος (see especially Mt. 5:40; in Jn. 19:25, AV 'robe,' RV 'garment'), the outside mantle (paludamentum), as distinguished from the χιτών or tunic, representing the Hebrew kuttoneth, see MANTLE.

Other garments rendered cloak are the Macedonian λαμός, or military cloak of 2 Macc. 12:15, RV (Cosa' AV), and the φελανς, or travelling cloak of 2 Tim. 4:13. See MANTLE.

CLOPAS (κλωπᾶς [Ti.WH]). This name cannot be derived from the same Hebrew (Aramaic) word as ΑΛΦΑΙΟΣ.

In the first place, the vocalisation is not the same: Clotas would require some such form as ῥάβδος, while Alphaeus pre-

1. Name supposed ῥάβδος or ῥάβδος (see ΑΛΦΑΙΟΣ). In the second place, as regards ρ, all that is certainly known is that it becomes κ at the end and in the middle of certain words (2 Ch. 30:1 Neh. 3:6 [φασίς], Gen. 22:1 [φασίς], Josh. 10:6 [φασίς]). True, it has been conjectured that the same holds good at the beginning of words (H. Lewis, The Sem. Frontiers in Greek, 1895, pp. 37-47, 51-110, 119-137; add, conversely, ῥάβδος as transliteration of κλωπᾶς). This hardly comes into consideration, however, in the present case, for a Hebrew (or Aramaic) derivation is never probable in the case of a word beginning with two consonants. In Greek transliteration of Hebrew names, initial ῥ is always represented by a full vowel (e.g., ῥαββί, ῥαββί); the opposite instances given by Lewis (11:3, 34, 45, 54, 59, 69, 78, 105, 118, 122, 129, 206, 211, 246, 247) are more or less doubtful, and relate to words which were susceptible of such a modification in the transliteration as was hardly possible in the case of biblical proper names. Further, the Syrian versions of the NT betray no consciousness that both names are derived from a common Semitic source: with them the initial letter of αλφαιος is always η (or κ), of κλωπᾶς invariably ρ.

It is not likely that κλωπᾶς is derived by metathesis from κρῖν ('chib'); nor is there the least certainty that κλωπᾶς is a contraction from κλωπᾶς.

On purely Greek soil, at any rate, κλωπᾶς when contracted would become either κλωπᾶς (e.g., κλεικρῆς, especially in Doric) or κλωπᾶς (as θεοδωρος becomes θωδωρος; see Meisterhans, Gramm. d. attischen Dialect. § 19, and cp. THEODOROS). At the same time, the contraction of κλωπᾶς into κλωπᾶς must be admitted to be at least possible, inasmuch as we know of no Greek word from which the syllable κλωπᾶς can come. In this case the original form of the name will be κλωπᾶς. For this reason, the accentuation κλωπᾶς is preferable to κλωπᾶς, especially as the accent is allowed to retain its original place in κλωπᾶς.

In Jn. 19:25, the only place where the name occurs in NT, Clotas is mentioned as somehow related to a certain Mary.

2. Mary of Clotas probably not = Jesus' mother's sister. Hegesippus (Eus. HE III. 11:32-6 iv. 22:4) informs us that Clotas was the brother of Joseph the father of Jesus. Whether this is the Clotas referred to in Jn. 19:25 depends, in the first instance, on the answer to the question, who is intended by the 'Mary of Clotas' there. As there is no 'and' before her name, she would seem to be identical with the sister of the mother of Jesus who has been referred to immediately before, but it is quite improbable that two sisters alive at the same time should have borne the same name, at least in a plebeian family.

With a royal house the case is somewhat different. Of the sons of Herod the Great, two who never attained royal dignity bore the name of their father; one by his marriage with the second Mariamne, and one by his marriage with Cleopatra of Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. xvii. 1:1 RV 1:284, § 562). There was, besides, his second son by Malthake, who, however, as far as we know, took the name only as a reigning prince (see Lk. 3:1 and frequently), whilst before his accession he is in Josephus invariably designated by his other name, Antipas. His first son by Malthake, too, whom Josephus always names Archelaus, is called Herod on coins and in Cassius Dio (60:27; 1:180 Ant. 6:11 1:375, 1:14, 2:30). Thus the name Herod seems already, to some extent, to have acquired the character of a family name.

If κλωπᾶς be the correct reading in Mk. 6:17 (so also in Mt. 13:55, though not according to the western group), the son of Mariamne just mentioned, who, in point of fact, was the first husband of Herodias, must have borne the name Philip also, in addition to that of Herod, while at the same time this name, Philip, was borne by his brother, who is known to us from Lk. 8:1 as the tetrarch of N. Palestine. As we are without evidence that the former Herod was called Philip, doubtless we must here conclude that Mk. and Mt. have fallen into an error, which, however, has been avoided by Lk. (8:1).

Again, according to Jos. (Ant. xii. 5:1 xv. 3:1 xiv. 6:2), not only Onias III (high priest till 174 B.C., died 171 B.C.) and Jesus (Jason) his successor (high priest 174-171 B.C.), but also Onias (usually known as Menelaus) who came after Jason, were sons of the high priest Simon II (2 Macc. 6:4 4:2), however, which is here very detailed, expressly speaks of Menelaus as brother of a Benjamin, named Simon, whilst the high priest Simon II. was of the tribe of Levi.

It, accordingly, one is determined to hold by the identity of Mary of Clotas with the sister of the mother of Jesus, this must be on the assumption not only that she and the mother of Jesus were not children of the same marriage, but also that they had neither father nor mother in common—that, in fact, each spouse had brought into the new household a daughter by a former marriage, named Mary.

It is no argument to the identity of the two to allege that we are not at liberty to find more women mentioned in Jn. 19:25 than in Mt. 27:56 Mk. 15:41 (16:1) and Lk. 24:10, for John mentions the mother of Jesus, though she does not appear in any of the synoptists. In other words, he did not hold himself bound by what they said, though, according to all scholars, their narratives lay before him.

The only point on which he is distinctly in agreement with them is as to the presence of Mary Magdalene. If we will have it that he enumerates also the Salome of Mark (whose identity with the mother of James and John the sons of Zebedee cannot seriously be doubted), we can find her only in the sister of the mother of Jesus. Mary of Clotas must in that case be distinct from the latter, and may possibly be identical with the Mary who in Mt. is called the mother of James and Josias (or Joseph), in Mk. the mother of James the Less and Josias, or, more briefly, Mary [the mother] of Josias (so 15:47) or Mary of James (so 16:1 and Lk. 24:10). In this case, however, not only is it remarkable that the relationship of the apostles, James the Greater and John, with Jesus—as children of sisters—is nowhere mentioned or in any way alluded to; but also it is almost unthinkable that the fourth evangelist presupposes the presence of the mother of John when in 19:25 he proceeds: 'when Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he saith, etc.' As far as the fourth evangelist is concerned, this scene furnishes a clear motive for thinking not only of the mother of Jesus as present, but also of the mother of John as absent. Lk. 24:13 (at the sepulchre) puts in the place of the mother of John a certain Joanna. It, as he often does, the fourth evangelist is here taking Lk. rather than Mt. or Mk. for his guide, it would be impossible to identify Mary of Clopas with the sister of the mother of Jesus, whose name on this assumption must be taken to be Joanna. It is certain, however, that in Lk. this Joanna is identical with the Joanna who is mentioned in 8:1 as the wife of a certain Chuza and not stated to have been related to the mother of Jesus. Thus we may take it that it was not she, any more than any of the others, that was intended by the fourth evangelist, and that most probably his reason for mentioning the sister of the mother of Jesus is that, according to Lk. 23:49, 'all his acquaintances' (γυναικες) are standing by the cross. There is no evidence of any allegorising intention that he could have had in the enumeration of these four (or three) women. Apart from the mother of Jesus and her sister, therefore, the names of the women seem simply to have been taken over from the Synoptists.

1 [The name is possibly the same as the Palm. ῥάβδος (Chabot, no. 12). In MH the name 'Cleopatra' usually appears under the form ῥάβδος].

2 For a somewhat different account of these relations, see ONIAS.

Who was the mother of James and Joseph, with whom, according to this view, Mary of Clopas would have to be identified?

3. Clopas = Alphæus?

It is supposed to be the second James in the list of the apostles. With this it seems to agree that Mk. calls him James the Less. Now, this James was a son of Alphæus. Thus Alphæus would appear to be the husband of the Mary mentioned by the Synoptists as present at the cross. From this it is not unusual to proceed to the further combination that in Jn. Clopas is named as the husband of Mary and that he is identical with Alphæus. Philologically the names are distinct (see above, § 1); but the identification is possible if, according to a not uncommon Jewish custom (Acts 13:12; 13:16; Col. 4:10), Clopas had two names. A further step is to bring in at this point the statement of Hegesippus that Clopas was a brother of Joseph the father of Jesus. Over and above this, many proceed to the assumption—shown above (§ 2) to be untenable—that his wife Mary was identical with the sister of the mother of Jesus.

In this case two brothers would have married two sisters, and the second James in the list of apostles would be a cousin of Jesus, and that both on the father's and on the mother's side. Even, however, if we regard Mary of Clopas as a different person from the sister of the mother of Jesus, her son, the second James, as long as he is regarded as the son of Clopas the uncle of Jesus, remains a cousin of Jesus, whilst, according to the identification of the sister of the mother of Jesus with the wife of Zebedee (spoken of above, § 2), this honour would belong rather to the first James and John the sons of Zebedee as being sons of the aunt of Jesus.

The next question that arises is, Who was Joseph, the second son of Mary, according to the Synoptists?

4. The sons of Mary = Brothers of Jesus?

In Mk. 6:3 a Joseph is named, along with James, Judas, and Simon, amongst the brethren of Jesus. This has given occasion for crowning the series of combinations which has been already explained, and completing it with a hypothesis whereby it becomes possible to deny the existence of literal brethren of Jesus, and to affirm the perpetual virginity of his mother. Once it is admitted that James and Joseph were sons of Clopas (= Alphæus) and if Mary his wife, the same seems to be of good of all the 'brethren of Jesus'. In that case they would be 'brethren of Jesus' only in the sense in which 'brethren' (ἀδελφοί) is used instead of ἀνέτεροι (children of two brothers or sisters) in 2 Co. 13:12 (cp. 17:13).

Finally, to this is added, not as a necessary but as a welcome completion of the hypothesis, the suggestion that of the 'brethren of Jesus' not only James but also Simon and Judas were among the apostles.

Both names, in point of fact, occur, at least in Lk. 6:15 & Acts 1:13 (Simon alone in Mk. 3:18 & Mt. 10:4). With regard to Joseph, the fourth of the 'brethren of Jesus', and having in mind (bearing out the same hypothesis) that it was he who, according to Acts 13:27, was nominated (though not chosen) as successor to the vacant place of Judas Iscariot. It is true that all the better authorities here read Joseph, not Joseph (see BARSABAS); but, on the other hand, this reading being accepted, it can be pointed out that according to the better MSS (at least in Mt. 13:55) Joseph, not as in Mk. 6:3 Joseph, is the name of the fourth 'brother' of Jesus.

This whole identification of the 'brethren of Jesus' with apostles or aspirants to the apostleship, however, is quite untenable. According to Mk. 3:23 & Mt. 12:46-7, Lk. 8:19 & Jn. 7:5, the brethren of Jesus disbelieved his Messiahship while he was alive, and in Acts 1:14 & Cor. 9:5 they are distinctly separated from the apostles.

Even if we give up the identification with apostles, Mary cannot be the mother of the cousins of Jesus.

Had she then so related to Jesus, Mt. and Mk., in seeking to indicate her with precision, would have named not two sons but four; or rather they would have mentioned no names at all, but simply said 'the mother of the cousins of Jesus'. Moreover, it is only of Symeon, the second 'bishop' of Jerusalem, that Hegesippus says he was son of Clopas and cousin of Jesus. If Hegesippus had regarded the four 'brethren of Jesus' as his cousins, he would surely have designated Symeon's predecessor also (James the 'brother' of Jesus) as son of Clopas, and Symeon himself, by whom in this case the Simon of Mk. 6:3 & Mt. 13:55 would be meant, he would have designated as brother of James. This, however, is what he does not do; he calls James simply 'the Just' (ὁ δίκαιος), and says (Eus. HE iii. 32) that men 'of the race of the Lord' (ἀπὸ γένους τοῦ κυρίου) had presided over the church (in Palestine) in peace until Symeon the son of Clopas, the uncle of Jesus, was arraigned and crucified; cp. iii. 20:4.

Lastly, it is idle to deny the existence of actual 'brethren of Jesus': that is distinctly vouched for by the πρωτοτοκον of Lk. 2:7—an expression all the weightier because it has been already suppressed in Mt. 1:25.

If James and Joseph, the sons of Mary according to the synoptists, are thus no cousins of Jesus, we could all the more readily believe that they were really apostles or at least constant companions (Acts 1:2) of Jesus.

Such an assumption, however, is not borne out by a single hint, and at the stage of the discussion we have now reached it has no more interest than the other which makes Clopas identical with Alphæus and regards him as the husband of Mary.

The Mary in question, we are forced to conclude, was simply a woman not known otherwise than as the mother of a James and a Joseph. Why is it, then, that the fourth evangelist designates her, not by reference to these sons of hers, but by calling her 'of Clopas'? That he here intends the Clopas of Lk. 24:13 is quite imputable (see CLOPAS); but neither is it likely that he can have meant a man named Clopas who was wholly unknown to his readers. His allusion must rather have been to the Clopas whom we know from Hegesippus as the brother of Joseph. There is no trace of any allegorising intention in this; we may take it that the evangelist is following tradition. It is possible, therefore, that Clopas was the husband of Mary, in which case James and Joseph are cousins of Jesus, but not to be identified with his brothers of the same name, nor yet with the apostle James and the Joseph (or Joseph) Barsabas of Acts 1:23. It is more probable, however, if the prevailing avay loquendi is to be taken as a guide, that Cleopas is designated as the father of Mary. In this case it is Mary herself who is the cousin of Jesus. In either case it is remarkable that in the synoptists she should be characterised not by her relationship to Jesus, but simply by mention of her sons; and this on the assumption that it is the uncle of Jesus who is intended, suggests a doubt as to whether the mention of Cleopas in this connection is correct.

The apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, following a combination mentioned above (§ 4), for the most part identify Symeon, son of Joseph, with the second bishop of Jerusalem, spoken of by Hegesippus, with the apostle Symeon the Cananean (AV, the Zebedee), who gave him in addition the name of Indas, and who some make the name of Isathier his own proper name, as, but in the form of Leopros of Cephalos, so that he is identified also with the disciple mentioned in Lk. 24: 35. He is at the same time enumerated among 'the Seventy' of Lk. 10: 1 (Ephesus, Isakros, Agathos in 2: 142 f.). According to the Travels and Habits (ed. Bezold, 1888, p. 269, § 5; see Index), ed. Payne-Smith, col. 2, p. 1, a Syrian collection of legends dating to the sixth century, he was brother not only of Nicodemus a sinner mentioned in the apoc. Indas, also in Latin list of apostles given in Ephesus, 1: 69 f., but also of Joseph of Arimathea (Lk. 24: 54).

CNIDUS (ΚΝΙΔΟΣ [c. ANV: 14 WH]), a city on Cape Crio (anc. Troipum) in the extreme SW. of Asia Minor between Cos and Rhodes. It was originally built upon the rocky island (ἡ νῆσος ἐν ᾗ ἀεὶ παρῳεῖται, Strabo, 656) forming the cape, united to the mainland by a causeway — thus making two harbours, one on the N and the other on the S. of the isthmus (cp Mitylene and Myndus).

The inhabitants soon spread eastwards over the neighbouring part of the peninsula. The moles of the large south port are still in existence, as well as much of the ancient city. The situation of Cnidus was eminently favourable to its development as a commercial and naval power; but, curiously like Cos in this respect, it played no part as a naval state – probably owing to the repressive influence of Rhodes.

The commercial importance of the city was inevitable. It lies upon the maritime highway (cp. Thuc. 8.35, πῶς Ἰσθμίου τὰς ἀπ' Αἰγύπτου ὁδὰς ἀπὸς προσηλασμένους ἐν Λαλασίαν). Very early it had trade with Egypt and shared in the Hellenism at Naucratis (Herod. 2.17). At least as early as the second century B.C. Cinchus had attracted Jewish settlers, for in a Macc. 15.2 it appears in the list of places to which the circular letter of the Roman senate in favour of the Jews (min. 130-8 B.C.) is said to have been addressed. Paul must have passed the city on his way to Caesarea (Acts 21.6 f.); but a name occurs only in Acts 27.1: Ἰσθμίουσιτες καὶ μὲν ἡγεμὲνος κατὰ τὴν Κίον) after Myra had been

The Hebrews doubtless used timber as great variety of woods as the modern Syrians now use.

2 Fuel. Most of the fuel used in the country is obtained from the following sources: (1) The burning of coals of lignum (עֵצִים) a desert shrub which, when reduced to charcoal, throws out an intense heat (on the text see Lk 12:40). (2) The references to thorns as fuel (סִבְכָּה , סִבְכִּי) are many. A particular mention is made of the buckthorn or perhaps brambles (עֲגֹרֶת Ps. 58: [1] of chaff + chopped straw (חִלְבָּה), the refuse of the threshing-floor (Mt. 13:30) and of wasted herbage (Mt. 6:9 Lk 12:28). At the present time the favorite fuel of the Bedouin is the dung of camels, cows (cf. Ezek 4:13 asses etc.), which is carefully collected, and after being mixed with חִלְבָּה or chopped straw, is made into flat cakes, which are dried and stored for the winter's use. We may assume that this sort of fuel was not so much required before the comparative depopulation of the country. Though Ezek. 12-13 certainly suggests that it was not altogether unknown.

The charcoal was burned in a brazier (גִּזְיָה Jer. 36. 7; AV 'hearth' RV 'brazier') or chafing-dish (גִּזְיָה Jer. 36. 7; AV 'hearth' RV 'brazier') or chafing-dish (גִּזְיָה Jer. 36. 7; AV 'hearth' RV 'brazier').

1. ḥṣṣ, 'colic' (Al. ḥṣṣ 200) is to be taken as a ḥṣṣ 'pavement' (cp. ḥṣṣ in Cantabrigia), which corresponds Al. ḥṣṣ 200. The strange suffix -ṣṣ is also in Hr. ḥṣṣ 231.

COASTLAND

In the houses of the humbler classes, the hearth (הֶחָרִיץ, only of altar-hearth Lev. 6:2 [9]; mod. Ar. marḥiḍa) was probably a mere depression in the floor, the smoke escaping, as best it could, through the door or the latticed window (שַׁחֲמַח, Hos. 13:3, EV 'chimney'). See LATTICE. Chimneys there were none; the AV rendering, 'ere ever the chimneys in Zion were hot' in 4 Esd. 6:4, is based on a corruption of the Latin text (RV 'or ever the foot-stool of Zion was established').

Coal and coals supply a variety of metaphors. Thus 'to quench one's coal' (הִכְבִּית אֶת-חַיְתוֹ 28.147; cp the classical

4. Metaphors. ῥῶπιον, and see Dr. ad loc.) is a pathetic figure for depriving a person of the privilege of posterity, otherwise expressed as a putting out of one's candle (rather, 'lamp')—Prov. 13:9 etc. To heap 'coals of fire,' or glowing charcoal, on an enemy's head must, it would seem, be to adopt a mode of revenge calculated to awaken the pains of remorse in his breast (Prov. 25:22¹ (MT), Rom. 12:20). Again, 'kindle not the coals of a sinner'—that is, do not stir up his evil passions—is the sage advice of the son of Sirach (Ecclus. 8:1); cp Ecclus. 11:32, 'from a spark of fire a heap of many coals' (ἀνθρακία) is kindled, which finds an echo in Job. 35. COCK (ἀλεκτωρ). Mt. 26:34 74. N. 35. 11:30 72 Lk. 22:34 60 Jn. 13:38 18:27. On the 'cock-crowing' (ἀλεκτοροφωνία) spoken of in Mk. 13:35 information is given elsewhere (see DAY, § 4). Mt., Lk., and Jn. speak of only this cock-crowing. The tradition preserved in Mark, on the other hand (though the text in the MSS differs), refers to a second. Thus the cock had completed its journey to Palestine. Its home was in India; thence it came to Babylonia² and Persia. Homer indeed gives Ἀλεκτωρ as the name of a man; but Aristophanes (Av. 438) considers the cock the 'Persian bird.' To the Jews, too, as well as (presumably) to the Egyptians, it was a Persian bird, even though the Targumic and Talmudic word for cock (שִׁטְרִי) may have a Babylonian origin.³

Not improbably we have in Prov. 30:31 a reference to the impression which it produced not so long after its introduction into Palestine. The evidence of the versions⁴ in favour of the rendering 'cock' cannot be regarded lightly, and there is no proof whatever of the sense of 'well got up' for שִׁטְרִי, or for the application of the term to the greyhound. The Talmudic שִׁטְרִי also certainly means some bird (a kind of raven)⁵ 'The key to the difference of usage is supplied by Ar. ḡarsara, 'to make a shrill noise'; hence ḡarsara is used in Arabic for both the cricket and the cock. The kindred Hebrew word also might be widely used: (1) for the cock, (2) for the starling. The second element in the phrase שִׁטְרִי שִׁטְרִי is seemingly a difficulty. The word is no doubt corrupt. Dyscrinck and Gratz would read שִׁטְרִי; cp ἑνπεριπτωτων. To keep nearer to the Hebrew and to find a more striking phrase, it is better to read שִׁטְרִי and render 'the cock who loves to take up a quarrel.' EV rather uncritically gives GRIV-TOURD (q.v.); cp Fowl, § 2.

There is a word in Job 38:36 (Vg.) which Vg., the two Targs., and Delitzsch render 'cock' (AV 'heart,' RV 'mind,' mg. 'meteor'). As, however, it is evident that some sky-phenomenon is meant, we should almost certainly read for שִׁטְרִי, שִׁטְרִי, 'the low star,' to correspond to שִׁטְרִי (so read for שִׁטְרִי, 'the lance star,' 'The low star is Sirius, the lance star Antares. See Che. JBL, 1898. T. R. C.

COCKATRICE is an archaic English word, derived or corrupted from the medieval Lat. cabatrice [see the New Eng. Dict., s.v.], but often confounded with 'crocodile'; the form of the word suggested the fable that the animal was hatched by a cock from the egg of a viper. For Pr. 23:32 AV (EVmg. ADDER; RVmg. 'basilisk') and Is. 11:8 59:5 Jer. 8:17 AV (RV 'basilisk,' EVmg. 'or adder'; שִׁטְרִי, ḡarsara) see SERPENT, § 1 (7). For Is. 14:29 (שִׁטְרִי, ḡarsara, EV as before, Vg. regulus) see SERPENT, § 1 (6). ḡ has ḡarsara in Is. 59:5 (EV VULG. Heb. ḡarsara) and in Ps. 90[91] 11 (EV ADDER, Heb. ḡarsara). Horapollo (11) identifies the basilisk with the Egyptian uræus, a golden image of which is the usual ornament of the divine or royal head-dress. Probably this was the kind of serpent meant by ḡ; the uræus, being divine, had of course extraordinary powers (see SERPENT, § 1, nos. 6 and 7).

According to Firetère, the cockatrice (cockatrice) is a kind of basilisk which haunts caverns and pits. The name cabatrice, however, properly means the ichneumon. Under the fam Chalcadri, we find in the Slavonic Scripta of Isidore (121 f.), where, however, the writer may be thinking of the crocodile. See CROCODILE. T. R. C.

COCKLE, EVmg., better 'noisome weeds' (שִׁטְרִי, ḡarsara; שִׁטְרִי, ḡarsara), Job 31:40. The cognate verb means in Hebrew 'to stink'; but the primary sense of the root, according to Noldeke (ZDMG 10:727 [80]), is the more general one of badness or worthlessness. A kindred substantive is שִׁטְרִי, 'wild grapes' (Is. 52:4). As שִׁטְרִי occurs only once in Hebrew and is unknown to the cognate languages, there is no evidence to justify the identification with a particular plant, such as the 'cockle' of EV; still, as etymology seems to point to some 'stinking weed,' there is something to be said for the suggestion of Sir Joseph Hooker, that perhaps the reference is to the stinking arums.

Several of the arums are plentiful in Syria—e.g., Arum Dis-cordis, Sibth., Arum Palestineum, Boiss., and species of Helio-phylum (cp Trisram, NHB 439). The ancient versions, in supposing that a thorny plant is intended, were no doubt guided by the parallelism of the verse. The older English Versions use 'cockle' as the rendering of שִׁטְרִי in Mt. 13. See TARI.

enēpa 7. war, in Ezra 4.30 [BA]. With this we may compare the ṣepar Ešparow, which, with ra ṣarw ṣar 'Assac ṣepar (Asia Minor, cf. W. of Taurus) appears in the famous Gadatas (Description of a War, cf. Bull. Corr. Hell. 13.521 (89), 14 n.8; cf. Meyer, Entst. 173). The same Aramaic designation is found upon a coin of the Persian period 'Maḏal . . . who is over ṣar ṣar' (cp. Hal. Jhd. Epf. 6, 1 f.), and seems to be the origin of the name of the Persian province Ašpaša (for another well-supported view, see AGNES, § 2). Ṣar and Ašpaša can in together as one township in the epilogue to the Indatus (see Marq. Hand. 31 f.). That the Mosaic ṣar ṣar is to be connected with ṣar, Ašpaša, though affirmed by Hartmann (ZfH 114), Meyer (ib. 327), and Marq. (op. cit. 74 f., cp. Entst. 1), is strenuously denied by Glaser (cf. ZfH 7, 1507, 3 f.); see Hammil. JfH 324 ff.), who is, however, perhaps too strongly prejudiced in favour of an exceedingly remote date for the ascriptions in question.

Caesarea is, strictly, the designation applied since the time of the Seleucids to the depression between the two Lebanons, otherwise known as the

2. Extent. biḡ'ah of Lebanon (cp Josh. 11 17 127), the mod. Bekī'; cp LABANUS.² In the Grecian period the term includes all E. Palestine. Thus, according to Josephus (Ant. i. 11 5), the seats of the Ammonites and Moabites were in it, and among its towns he mentions Scythopolis and Gadara (ib. xiii. 132 f.). In its widest sense it included Raphia (so Polyb. 5 20), and stretched 'as far as the river Euphrates and Egypt' (Ant. xiv. 15). In 1 Esd. and Maccabees (see below) these are its limits; and, roughly used, rather in a political than in a geographical sense, it and Phœnicia constitute the more southerly part of the kingdom of the Seleucids. At this period the districts referred to appear as one fiscal domain, under the suzerainty of one governor (viz. Apollonius [2 Macc. 35] Ptolemy [88] Lysias [10 11]). Under the Romans the term was again restricted, and Caesarea (with Damascus as its capital; cp Ant. xiii. 152 Bt. 13) was officially separated from Phœnicia and Judaea (Ant. xii. 4 1 and 4; Philo, 57). When, therefore, in 47 and 43 B.C., Herod, in command of Caesarea, seems to have possessed no authority over the southern province,

The foreign-looking but really corrupt word argiz illustrates the need of a more correct Hebrew text (see TEXT, § 44 f.).

We cannot take the far-fetched etymology of Lag. (Ullrich, 85) and Kbo. (Sam., ad loc.). The τ probably sprang out of a 'final nün' (η), which was attached as a correction to an ordinary nün—thus $\eta\eta\eta$ (cp. $\eta\eta$ [B]). In this case the 'lover' was thus not distinguished in name from the ark ($\eta\eta\eta$). Or $\eta\eta$ $\theta\eta\eta\eta$ (θ , cp. Ex. 21:1) = $\eta\eta\eta\eta$ —'in a place, may represent the true text; but more probably $\theta\eta\eta\eta$ $\theta\eta\eta\eta$ 'box'. See (e.g. E. J. P. 7, 10:51f. Meineke 1903), or Μασσώα (Polyb. 5.45), a name which may be derived from a hypothetical PIE mās-* 'depression': cp. /mā-/ mām 'sink'.

As misleading a name as Eulathim and/or as Haldolish. A claim of 'seers' at this period would of course be interesting; but the name is miswritten for חלְהֹזֶר (L.V. 'Haldolishesh'), probably under the influence of the name Hazzaiah, which follows in Neh. 11.5. חלְהֹזֶר itself is miswritten. See HALLOHESH. L. K. C.

COLLAR. 1. 'Collars' in AV Judg. 8:26 become in RV 'pendants' (J15222). See Rtno., § 2.

2. 'Collar' is also applied, inappropriately, to the round hole (𐎧𐎫𐎼𐎿) for the head and neck in a garment. So in Job 39:2, 'It bindeth me about as the collar of my coat' (RV), and in Ps. 134 (RV^{mg}), 'that flows down to the collar of his robes' (Kay). 'Collar' here should be 'opening'.

In Ps. 74, however, it is thought that the border of the opening, rather than the opening itself, must be introduced, & sym. have set the gar-za, the Lambskin trimming or edging on the neck-opening (ḥit ṭal; כְּסוֹתָם "fringe"). IV, however, ventures on "skirts (skirt) of their garments"; the revisers felt that, even if AV gave an impossible rendering, they had nothing better to set in its place. The text can perhaps be corrected (see Che. Ps. 74); it is certainly not right as it stands. In Job 24, Biddle and Duhm prefer to render "even as my time"; but this does not make the passage logical. There is reason to think (Che. E. p. Imms), by גַּם ("May"), that we should read עֲדָה in v. 24a (עַד אֶחָדָה) and עַד and וְיָמָא in v. 24b, and render

By (his) great power he takes hold of my garment,
By the opening of my tunic he grasps me.

The word rendered in those two passages 'collar' becomes 'hole' in EA of Ex. 28.2; the context suggested this. The 'hole for the head' (RV) in the priestly mit (robe) was to have a 'binding (lit. lip) round about'; the material cut out was to be folded over, and so to make what might fairly be called a collar. In later Heb. we find the terms פתע (opening) or צוואר (neck) (receptacle of the neck).

3. RV¹⁹² gives 'collar' for a certain instrument of punishment (192, twick, Jer. 29:26, AV 'stocks'; RV 'shackles'). The root (like 192) in Aramaic and Talmudic means to bind, to confine. Kimhi takes it to be a manacle for hands, not a collar. Onelli, on the other hand, compares Arab. simāḥ (necklace). ἄστρον εἰς τὸν καταπατήρη represents 192 and can scarcely be correct.

COLLEGE, RV SECOND QUARTER (קִיסָה; Vg. Saund.) as if the 'new town' of Jerusalem (2 K. 22:14 = 2 Ch. 34:22; Zeph. 1:10). The rendering 'college' is due to Tg. Jon. 2 K. 22:14 חֵלְסָנָא בְּבֵית ה', 'in the house of instruction.' See DEUSACUM.

The text is, however, plainly corrupt. In Zeph. 1:10 the natural parallel to the 'fish gate' is the 'gate of the old city' (see Neh. 12:9, where these gates are mentioned together). For מִן הַשְּׁעָרֵי הַדָּוָה therefore, read מִן הַשְּׁעָרֵי הָעִיר הַקְּדוּמָה 'from the gate of the old city'. Similarly in K, and C Ch. 6, see H. G. HOLLAND. See also HANSEN, op. cit., p. 78, § 2.14, puncta [H], וְיָרָא [L]. AVWc: 'second part'; RVWc: [Heb., 3rd c.] et. In 2 Ch. 34, 2, puncta [L], accusative [M] Μεγαρίται [L], VWc: 'in the school'; or 'in the second part'; RVWc: [Heb.] Mischneh.' In Zeph. 1:19, τῆς δευτέρας [BHQ]; AV: 'the second,' writers, and some mod. edd.: the latter form was possibly the native pronunciation¹).

1. Description. a town on the S. bank of the Lycus (Churuk Su), a tributary of the Meander, in that part of the Roman province of Asia which the Greeks called Phrygia. In the neighbourhood of Colosse were Hierapolis and Laodicea (cp Col. 2: 13-15). As those two cities rose in importance, Colosse seems to have continuously declined (cp Rev. 1: 11, 14, where the church in Laodicea ranks among the seven great churches of Asia). Herodotus (7: 10; cp Xen. Anab. 1: 26) speaks of Colosse as 'a city of great size'; but in Strabo's time Laodicea is numbered among the greatest of the Phrygian cities. Whilst Colosse, although it had some trade, is only a πόλις (Strabo, 576, 578). In Paul's time Pliny (HN 5: 41) enumerates it among the liberrima oppida of the district; but that is merely historical retrospect. Its geographical position, on the great route leading from Ephesus to the Euphrates (it was passed, e.g., by Xerxes in his march through Asia Minor, Herod. l.c.), was important. Hence arises the question as to whether the place was ever visited by Paul.

On his third journey Paul 'went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order' (Acts 18: 23), and, 'having passed through the upper coasts (τὰ ἀνω-περὶὰ μέρη) came to Ephesus' (Acts 19: 1).

2. Paul's connection with it. The natural route would certainly be that followed by commerce, which would pass through Colosse, though travellers might, as Ramsay suggests (Ch. in R. Emp. 94), take a road to the northward, avoiding the Lycus valley entirely. It is, however, open to us to admit that the apostle may have passed through the town without making any stay. It seems distinctly to follow from Col. 2: 1 ('as many as have not seen my face in the flesh') that at the date of writing Paul was not personally acquainted with the Colossian church; but it would be unsafe to argue that he had not seen the town itself. If he did no missionary work there on his third journey through Asia Minor, it is impossible to assign his assumed activity at Colosse to the second journey on the strength of the expression 'gone throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia' (Acts 16: 6): on that occasion he diverged northwards from the eastern trade route leading by way of Colosse to Ephesus, and ultimately reached Troas (17: 7 f.). Further, although ethnologically Colosse ranked as a Phrygian town, politically it belonged to Asia, a province which was altogether barred to missionary effort on the occasion of the second journey (Acts 16: 6; see ASIA, PHRYGIA).

It would still be possible to argue that Paul established the Colossian church on an unreciprocal visit made from Ephesus during his three years' stay there (cp Acts 19: 10, 'so that all they which dwell in Asia heard the word'). Nevertheless, Col. 1: 4 ('since we heard of your faith') 18: 21 are opposed to the idea of personal effort on his part, especially when we trusted with such passages as Gal. 1: 1 Cor. 3: 1-10, where we have positive claim to the foundation of the churches addressed. Nor is it allowable to insist that Epaphras and Philemon, who were certainly Colossians (Col. 1: 12), must necessarily have been converted by Paul at Colosse itself. The Colossian church was an indirect product of the apostle's activity at Ephesus. To whom, then, must the actual foundation be ascribed? Probably to Epaphras, who is called 'a faithful minister of Christ' for the Colossians (πιστὸς λειτουργὸς, so AV: better πιστὸς ἡγούμενος, 'on our behalf,' RV), and their teacher (Col. 1: 7, cp 4: 2-11), although the honour has been claimed for Timothy, on the ground that his name is joined with that of Paul in the Salutation (Col. 1: 1).

COLOSSIANS AND EPHESIANS

It is clear from Philem. 22 that Paul looked forward to visiting Colosse after his first imprisonment at Rome: whether he effected his purpose is not known (but cp 2 Tim. 1: 24).

3. The Colossian Church. Among the members of the Colossian church, besides Epaphras, Philemon with his wife Archippa and slave Onesimus (Philem. 2: 10¹), we hear of Archippus, perhaps son of Epaphras (Philem. 2: 10, Col. 4: 17). With regard to the composition of the church, we may say that it consisted chiefly of Gentiles, in this case the descendants of Greek settlers and native Phrygians, deeply imbued with that tendency to mystical fanaticism which was characteristic of the Phrygian race. Very soon, therefore, they fell away to angel-worship and a misdirected asceticism (Col. 2: 16-18, 21-23). The former heresy is illustrated by the famous πᾶς ἀρχαγγέλους or πᾶς τοῦ Ἀρχιπατριάρχου (church dedicated to Michael) mentioned by Nicetas Choniates as standing at the chasm of the Lycus. The tradition is that the archangel opened the chasm and so saved the Christians of Thomas from destruction by an inundation. In the fourth century a Council at Laodicea condemned this angel-worship. Theodoret also speaks of the existence of the heresy in this region, Cp ANGEL, § 9.

The construction of a strong castle at Choni (mod. Chünak), 3 m. S. of Colosse, was perhaps the work of Justinian. During the seventh or eighth century A.D., under the pressure of Arab incursions, the town in the plain was gradually deserted and forgotten. Hence Nicetas says that Choni (his own birthplace) and Colosse were one and the same place (ed. Rom. 491). The idea even arose that the Colossians of the epistle were the Rhodians (cp Rams. Cit. and Bish. 1: 214). The Colossians of Col. 1: 758 are the Paulicians of the Church of Anganos in Armenia.

COLOSSIANS² AND EPHESIANS.³ Epistles to the. These two epistles are related so closely that they cannot without disadvantage be considered separately.

Colossians consists of two distinct portions, the one didactic and polemical, the other practical and hortatory, the whole being rounded off by

1. Contents of Col. the superscription (1: 1-2) at the beginning, and by commendations (1: 3-11) the bearer, greetings and other messages, and the writer's autograph greeting at the close (4: 7-18).

In the introduction, 1: 1 ff., Paul, as his custom is, gives thanks for the conversion of those whom he is addressing, and expresses the wish that they may continue to grow in all wisdom.

At 1: 11, by a gentle transition, he passes over into a Christological discourse setting forth the transcendent glory of the Son, and how he is head of the universe and of the Church, in whom all heaven and the whole earth are reconciled to God (1: 11-13); in 1: 21-23 the readers' personal interest in Christ's work of reconciliation is affirmed, and in 1: 24-25 Paul goes on to say that he has had it committed to his special charge to proclaim the great secret of the universality of salvation, whence it is that he labours and cares so specially for the interests of his readers. In 2: 1-23 the main business of the epistle is entered upon: an earnest warning against false teachers, who, holding out hopes of an illusory perfection, wish to substitute all sorts of Gentile and Jewish religious observances in the place of 'Christ alone'.

With the exhortation (3: 1-4) to live their lives in the heavenly manner, and conformably to the new life, the apostle passes to the practical portion of the epistle. Here in the first instance (3: 5-17) the sins of the old man that are to be laid aside and the virtues of the new man that are to be put on are indicated somewhat generally; then (3: 18-4: 4) the duties of wives, husbands, children and parents, servants and masters are specially described, with (4: 5) an urgent call to continual prayer (including prayer for the success of his own mission) and to wise and discreet employment of speech in their dealings with the unconverted.

The contents of Ephesians are, on the whole, similar to those of Colossians, but the polemical part and especially accessories are given much more fully.

2 Contents of Eph. (only a superscription 1: 1-2), and in the first sentence elevated to the bearer of the epistle, with parting good wishes, whilst all the rest treated with greater amplitude. The doctrinal portion extends from 1:1 to 3:1. Here it cannot be said that any one has as yet quite succeeded in pointing out any very clear and consecutive process of thought, or methodical elaboration of debatable themes. To find, for example, in 1:3-14 'the operations of divine grace,' and, more explicitly, in 1:7-3:1 'what God the Father,' in 1:7-7:1 'what God the Son,' and in 1:13-14 'what God the Spirit has done,' is to force the text into moulds of thought that are foreign to it. Strictly, this part of the epistle is simply a parallel, carried out with unwonted fulness, to the thanksgivings with which Paul is accustomed to introduce all his letters. An act of praise to God who has wrought for all mankind deliverance from sin and misery through Christ and his gospel, and who has made the Church, of which Christ is the head, to be the centre of a new and glorious world.

In 1:3-14 Paul begins, then, with praise to God who from all eternity has graciously chosen his people to salvation; in 1:15-3:1 he expresses his special joy that his readers are among those who have thus been chosen. 2:1-10 brings into a strong and vivid light the absoluteness of the contrast between their former and their present state, and the fact that the happy change is due to divine grace; done, further, it is taught that the distinction between the unconverted and the converted people of the promise has been obliterated by the blood of Christ (2:11-14), and that, in the new spiritual building, where Christ is the chief corner stone, those who were afar off are incorporated as well as those who were nigh (2:14-22); there are no more strangers and foreigners. To proclaim the full and unimpaired interest of the Gentiles in the gospel has been the noble function divinely assigned to Paul (3:1-12); his readers must not allow his present tribulations to shake their confidence in any way (3:1-3). His prayer (3:14-17), closing with a doxology (3:16), is that they may ever go on growing in faith, in love, and in knowledge, until at last nothing more is wanting in them of all the fulness of God.

4:1-16, at the beginning of the practical section, urges the readers to give practical effect to the motto that has thus been brought about, to walk worthily of the Christian vocation, and so to take his part in the common task according to the measure of his power, so that the whole may ever grow up more fully into Christ. What yet remains of the old man and heathen life must be sedulously put away (4:17-24); truthfulness, uprightness, and kindness of speech and of mind must be cultivated as the true leaves of social life (4:25-32); of these we have the best examples in the love of God and Christ (3:12). In 5:1-6 personal holiness and the walk of believers as wise and pure children of light are further described. In 5:2-6 the duties of members of households in their several places and relations are treated in the same order as in Col. 3:18-4:1; and the very elaborate figure of the Christian panoply in 6:1-10, with the exhortation to carry on the warfare against the powers of evil with courage and boldness—a warfare in which he too would be so glad to join them as a free man—forms a fine close.

COLOSSAE (7:7) lay not far from the larger cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis, with the churches of which the Colossian Christians, it is clear, had kept up intimate relations from the first (Col. 2:1, 13, 15, 17). These churches were not among those which had been directly founded by Paul; according to 2:1, 12-13 they had not yet seen him personally; their founder, according to 1:12-17, had been a certain Epaphras. The fact that at the time when the epistle is being written Epaphras is with Paul of itself goes far to prove that he stood to him in the relation of a disciple, in any case Paul recognises the gospel proclaimed by him as the true one and not requiring correction. When these churches were founded is not said; but they do not seem to have had a long history; we may venture to fix the date somewhere between the years 55 and 60 A.D. As, according to 1:13-14, their founder was a Gentile Christian, we may take it that the great majority of the members at Colossae were Gentile Christians, an inference that is confirmed by 1:12-13-20. This Paul has a double right to regard them as belonging to his missionary field.

EPHESUS (7:7) was the city in which, according to Acts 19:36 (cp. 20:1), Paul spent more than two years.

4. Of Ephesus. approximately between 52 and 55 A.D. (see CIRCUMSTANCES § 637). The truth of great hindrances (cp. 1:10-12) had hindered with unwonted success in the cause of the gospel, which, until his arrival, had been practically unheard of there. At last the riot stirred up by Demetrius the silversmith, described in Acts 19:23-41, exposed his life to each serious danger (21:10-14), so that he was compelled to abandon the city for good and to take refuge elsewhere—to Macedonia, in the first instance (Acts 20:1). The events of that period did not prove fatal to the church at Ephesus; in Rev. 2:1-7 it stands at the head of the churches in Asia, and it is highly probable that Rom. 16 is a fragment of a letter addressed to it by Paul (Aquila and Prisca, 16:3-5), as well as Epigenetus, 'who is the first-fruit of Asia unto Christ,' 16:5, are among the saluted). In any case the apostle kept up a lively interest in this church, and maintained intimate relations with it. The writer of the 'we-source,' however, in Acts 20:17-18, describes a most affecting leave-taking between Paul and the elders of Ephesus, whom the former had asked to meet him at Miletus as he was on his way to Jerusalem, and plainly he regards it as having been final. Of what elements the Ephesian church was composed we have no means of judging, apart from Rom. 16; the probability is that the majority were converted pagans; but it is nevertheless certain that the Jews in Ephesus were numerous, and we can well suppose that others of their number besides Aquila and Prisca had joined themselves to the company of believers in Jesus as the risen Messiah. In fact, when Paul, in Acts 20:29-35, in looking forward to the time after his departure, speaks of the appearance of false teachers and ravening wolves in Ephesus, Jews may very well have been meant. Unfortunately the references to Ephesus in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim. 1:3, 2 Tim. 1:18, 3:10, 4:12) throw no light on the subsequent history of Christianity there. All we can be sure of is that the apostle, after so long a residence, must have become acquainted in a very special manner with the peculiarities of the situation.

Even without any special occasion, perhaps, Paul might very well have written an epistle to the church of Colossae at the time he did. Its founder had informed him of the orderly walk and steadfastness in the faith of its members, and doubtless also of their sympathy with himself. It was natural enough, therefore, that he should at least assure them of his gladness over the good beginnings they had made, all the more as a suitable opportunity had offered itself for communicating with them. Onesimus (14) was being sent back to his master, Philemon, with a short letter. Tychicus, a member of the Pauline circle, was accompanying him, and it was almost a matter of course that he should be entrusted with letters of introduction to the churches whose hospitality he expected to enjoy. The epistle to the Colossians, however, is more than a mere occasional writing. The probability is that Paul's determination to write it was formed immediately on receiving the communication from Epaphras as to the condition of Christianity in the Lycus valley; false teachers had made their appearance in Colossae, and Epaphras himself felt unable, single-handed, to cope with their sophistries. To deal with these is the writer's main object, even where he is not expressly polemical, as in chaps. 1 and 3, his aim is to establish a correct understanding of the gospel as against their wisdom, false so-called.

If the nature of the Colossian false teachers does not present such well-marked features as that of the Galatian

False apostles, there is no occasion for surprise, for Paul knew the latter personally, the others only by hearsay. As to the Colossian agitators must have belonged to the same class as others that we read of in other places is too much to assume. Many of the observations of Paul would apply well to Jews—as for example the marked emphasis with which it is said (2:11) that the Colossians were circumcised with a circumcision not made with hands, and (214) that the handwriting against us has been nailed to the cross and so cancelled. In particular the exhortation of 216, 'Let no man judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of a feast day or a new moon or a sabbath day,' seems decisive as to the Jewish character of the new teachers, in this connection the question of 220 (cp 23) cannot fail to suggest Vid. 41-9, and one is strongly inclined to presume the condition of matters in Colossae to have been similar to that in Galatia. Only, it is commands and precepts of men that are being imposed with a 'touch not, taste not, handle not' (222), it is an 'arbitrary religion' (ἰδὲ νόθη θρησκεία) that is being thrust upon the Colossians (223)—in such terms Paul could hardly have described a return to compliance with the injunctions of the OT law.

As the ascetic interest (221, 'severity towards the body'; 228 23, 'humility') has a foremost place with the false teachers, many take them to have been Christian Essenes or ascetics of an Essene character (cp ESSEES, § 3, f.). But it has to be remembered that ascetic tendencies were very widely spread at that time, and that they first came into Judaism from without.

According to 28 the agitators gave themselves out to be philosophers. Paul indeed regards their wisdom as 'vain deceit'—according to 218 they 'are vainly puffed up by their fleshly mind,' and with deceiving speeches seek to lead their hearers astray—and when he so strikingly emphasises that in Christ Christians already possess the 'truth' ('all wisdom and spiritual understanding,' 'all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge,' 169 176 ff., 21), and so zealously points out what is the right way to perfection (128 314 42), all that we can infer from this is, that the innovators in Colossae came forward with a claim to be able to lead their followers from faith to knowledge, true wisdom, and a perfect Christianity. In doing so they appealed to visions they had seen (218); their knowledge of the celestial world entitled them, they contended, formally to set up a worship of angels, by which, however, Christ was thrust out from his central position as the only redeemer (219). Paul supplies no details of their speculations as to the powers and functions of these celestial spirits; but any such theosophy as this cannot be called Jewish in any specific sense. How far a religiously objectionable dualistic view of the universe lay at the bottom of the peculiar doctrines and precepts of these men will probably never be known; but that Paul should raise his voice so earnestly against them while taking up an attitude so different towards the 'Essensising' weak brethren in Rome (Rom 11 f.)—although they do not appear to have attacked him personally at all—shows that he, for his part, discerned in them a spirit that was foreign to Christianity and hostile to it. As their philosophical tendencies and their worship of angels do not fit in with the theory that they were Jews there Alexandrianism helps us no better than Essenism, it will doubtless be best to regard these Colossian false teachers as baptised 'mysteriesophists,' who sought to bring their ascetic tendencies with them into the new religion, and had found means to satisfy their polytheistic instincts by the terms of a newly-invented worship of angels. In doing so they prided themselves on their compliance with all the demands of the OT, though in detail they of course interpreted these in an absolutely arbitrary way. It was this method of an affected interpretation of the OT, claimed by them to be a guarantee of wisdom, that gave them something of a Judaising appearance; but in so far as their ideas had any individuality (as, for example, the notion that between man and the extra-mundane God there is a series of intermediate beings, and that the thing of essential importance is to secure the favour of these mediators or to know how to avoid their evil influences) they were of heathen not Jewish origin.

The Pauline authorship of Colossians has been denied in various quarters since Meyerhoff (1830), and, in particular, by the Tübingen School en masse. The external testimony to its genuineness is the best possible

—ever since a collection of Pauline letters existed at all, Colossians seems to have been invariably included. In form, nevertheless, the epistle presents many striking peculiarities. It contains a large number of words which Paul nowhere else uses—amongst them, especially, long composites such as παραβολοῦν (24), ἐκπαινεῖν (218); and on the other hand many of the apostle's most current expressions, such as ἐν, διό, ἀρα, are absent, and in the structure of the sentences there are fewer anacolutha than elsewhere in Paul, as well as a greater number of long periods built up of participial and relative clauses.

These 'other'—however, apply only to the first half of the epistle, even here the genuine Pauline element is still more in evidence than the peculiarities just indicated; the difficulty and obscurity of the style, so far as old age or passing ill-health may not be regarded as sufficient explanation, can be accounted for on the ground that Paul had not so lively and vivid a realisation of the exact opponents with whom he had to do, as in the case of those of Galatia or Corinth. But in substance also the

8. Ideas. Epistle has been held to be un-Pauline. It has been held to represent the transition stage between the Pauline and the Johannine theology.

A further development of the Pauline conception of the dignity of Christ (115 ff.), in the direction of the Alexandrian Logos-doctrine, according to which he is regarded as the first-born of the cosmos, the first-born of all creation (115), no longer as the first-born among many brethren only (Rom 8 29). Formulae like that in 29, 'in him dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily,' it is urged, have a somewhat gnostic ring; the representation of the Church as being the body of Christ (124 214), further, is said to be post-Pauline, whilst Paul himself never gave ethical precepts in such detail as we find in 313 ff.

In answer to all this, it can hardly be denied that Colossians exhibits a new development of Pauline

9. Genuineness not disproved. Christology; but why should not Paul himself have carried it on to this development in view of new errors, which demanded new statements of truth? The fact is, that in some cases, probably, he has simply appropriated and applied to Christ formulae (as, say, in 29) which the false teachers had employed with reference to their mediating beings; and his theology as a whole never became fully rounded and complete in such a sense as to exclude fresh points of view or new expressions.

Unmistakable traces of an undoubtedly later age cannot be shown in the epistle, while whole sections, such as chap. 4, can hardly be understood as the work even of the most gifted imitator. None of the gnostic systems of the second century known to us can be shown to be present in Colossians, whilst the false teachers with whom the epistle makes us acquainted could have made their appearance within the Christian Church in the year 60 A.D. just as easily as in 120.

There seems no cogent reason even for the invention of a mediating hypothesis—whether that of Ewald, which makes Timothy, joint-writer of Colossians, responsible for certain un-Pauline expressions, or that of Holtzmann, according to which an epistle of Paul was gone over in the second century by the author of Ephesians. With the one hypothesis it is impossible to figure clearly to oneself how the work of writing the letter was gone about; and the other it is impossible to accept unless we choose to admit irreconcilable traits in the picture of the false teachers—as, perhaps, that Paul himself wrote only against 'Essensising' ascetics, whilst the theosophic angelology was due entirely to the interpolator, who had other opponents in his mind. Even in its most difficult parts, however, the connection in the epistle is not so loose as ever to force upon one the impression that there must have been interpolation; and, as regards certain of the difficulties raised by criticism, it is to be remarked that caution is always necessary in dealing with literary productions of a period so obscure. Colossians may be Pauline quite as well as Philippians or 1 Thessalonians. The number of those who doubt its genuineness does not grow.

Colossians was written in captivity (130-135), at the same time as Philémon, probably from Rome (not from Caesarea), about 63 A.D. The apostle is surrounded by friends—Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, Luke, Jesus Justus. Whether Philippians was written before Colossians and Philémon, or whether Philippians should be regarded as the apostle's last writing is difficult to decide, quite apart from the question of a second captivity. The Christological portion of Philippians (24 ff.) has much in common with Colossians.

If Ephesians also is really the work of Paul (see below, § 15 f.), it must have been written almost contemporaneously with Colossians. It is true, indeed, that in Col. 1:1, as in Phil. 1:1,

Timothy is named as joint-writer, while he is not mentioned in Ephesians. From this, however, it cannot be argued that the situations were materially different, any more than it could be argued that Colossians and Philémon must be of different date because in the list of those who send greetings in Philém. 21 f. we do not find the Jesus Justus named in Col. 1:1, or because, in Philém. 21 f., Epaphras is called a fellow-prisoner and Aristarchus a fellow-worker, whilst in Col. 1:13 ff. Aristarchus, as a fellow-prisoner, heads the list of those who send greetings, and Epaphras seems to be regarded as one of the fellow-workers. In Eph. 3:13-14 also Paul is a prisoner, yet as much burdened with work as in Col. 1:24-29. 1:1 f. Tycheus is introduced in Eph. 6:21 f. as bearer of the letter, and as one who will be able to give further particulars as to the apostle's state, in almost the same words as in Col. 4:7 f.; and although there is no mention of Onesimus in Ephesians, we must hold that both epistles refer to the same mission.

The frequent verbal coincidences between Colossians and Ephesians even in points in which the phraseology is a matter of indifference (cp. for example, Eph. 1:15 f. and Col. 1:3 f.; Eph. 2:1 and Col. 1:21-23; Eph. 6:2 and Col. 4:3-4), unless we have here a case of deliberate imitation by a later writer, are intelligible only if we assume the one letter to have been written when Paul's mind was still full of the thoughts and expressions of the other. Of Colossians the only portions not finding a parallel in Ephesians are: the polemical section, 2:3-4 (although indeed 2:3-4 is again an exception), and the greetings in 4:10-12; of Ephesians, on the other hand, the only portions not finding a parallel in Colossians are: the introduction (1:1-14), the liturgically-phrased section (3:13-21), the exhortation to peaceful co-operation (4:1-6), and the figure of the spiritual armour, although in this case also some reminiscences are not wholly wanting in Colossians.

That the one letter is a polemic reproduction of the other cannot be said. If we possessed only one of them it could not be called a mere compilation or paraphrase. The parallel passages to Col. 1, for example, lie scattered up and down Eph. 1-4 (or 5) in a wholly different order, and there is no trace of any definite method according to which the one writing has been used for the other. There is no sort of agreement among critics on the question as to which of the two is the original form; but the present writer inclines to consider Ephesians the later, partly because in Colossians the various details and peculiarities are better accounted for by the needs of a church not yet far advanced ethically, and exposed to danger from false teaching, and it would have been rather contrary to what might have been expected if Paul had first sought to meet these very special needs by means of a letter of a more general character.

Of all Paul's epistles addressed to churches, Ephesians is certainly the least epistolary in character. One only examines the circumstances of those to whom it is addressed to find occasion for its composition. The epistle, which has a personal tinge in only a few places, could have been written equally well to almost any other church; it is more of a sermon than of a letter—a sermon on the greatness of that Gospel which is able to bridge over all the old contradictions in humanity, and on the grandeur of that one Church of Christ by which salvation is made sure, and on the precepts by which the members of this Church ought to regulate their lives. One commentator indeed goes so far as to say that in Ephesians 'we have the most mature and sustained of all the statements of Christian doctrine which have come down to us from the hand of the great apostle.' Other students may perhaps think Galatians and Corinthians more vivid and powerful, Romans rather, Philippians more sympathetic. But certainly so far as the thing can be done at all within the compass of one short letter, Paul has laid down in Ephesians something like an exhaustive outline of his Gospel. Viewed on its anti-Jewish or supra-Jewish side, however, it is much too slightly wrought out.

With regard to the question, to whom Ephesians was addressed, the only thing quite certain is, that if the epistle was written by Paul it cannot have been addressed to Ephesus. Even after all has been said by the apologists it remains incredible that he should have written to a church to which he had devoted three years of his life and to which, even after his final parting, his heart still yearned so tenderly, in so cold a tone as here, without a word of greeting to anybody, without reference to any of their common memories, in short without a single individualising note of any kind. Even apart from this and still no one could suspect that the apostle is here speaking to a church with which his acquaintance was so intimate as it was with the Ephesians. If his acquaintance with the Colossians was formed only by report, every reader of the present epistle must hold the same to be true of this. If the words 'in Ephesus' in 1:1 are to be held to be original, we have here no composition of Paul the prisoner writing in 63 A.D., but the work of a later hand who has artificially adapted himself to the part of the apostle but who wholly failed to realise how grossly improbable were the relations between Paul and the Ephesians as indicated by him.

But these decisive words—ἐν Ἐφεσῷ—are critically open to the gravest suspicion. It is true that from the date of the Muratorian Canon (about 180) onwards they are attested by witnesses innumerable; but an older authority—Marcion—about 140, cannot have read them where they now stand, since he took the epistle to be addressed to the Laodiceans; they are absent also from both of the oldest extant MSS. (A and B); and learned Church fathers, such as Origen in the third century and Basil in the fourth, agree in their omission. Not till the fifth century do we find the words regularly established in the recognised texts. But it is highly improbable that an original reading ἐν Ἐφεσῷ should ever have come to be deleted (let us suppose on critical grounds; for the exercise of criticism in this sense was unknown in the second century, and, if it had been, its exercise here would not have been content with a mere negative, but would have gone on to substitute the reading that was considered to be more appropriate). It is absolutely impossible that the oldest text should not have contained the name of some place; a name is rendered quite indispensable by the context 'to the saints which are . . .'

The only remaining alternative is that we should

suppose the original name to have accidentally disappeared and that ἐν Ἐφεσῷ was conjecturally inserted in its place, the determining consideration being that

COLOSSIANS AND EPHESIANS

Paul must surely, once at least in his life, have written a letter to his beloved Ephesians. If Marcion read ἐν Λαοδικαίᾳ instead of ἐν Ἐφεσῶν, it was only because he thought this a preferable conjecture; what he had in his mind was Col. 4.16, where an epistle to the Laodiceans is spoken of, which the Colossians also are bidden obtain a reading of. The letter alluded to must have been nearly contemporaneous with that to the Colossians; we may venture to conjecture that the then conditions in Laodicea were very similar to those in Colossae, so that on the present assumption the correspondences between the two letters become easily explicable. Tychicus then also will become the bearer of both letters. Only, on the other side again, it is not easy to understand in this case how it is that Paul treats the Colossians with so much greater intimacy and cordiality than he treats their neighbours the Laodiceans; how, further, he should invite comparisons by bidding the churches exchange letters with each other; and, lastly, how in spite of the labour expended in behalf of the Laodiceans by Epaphras (Col. 1.13), Paul should not think it necessary to enclose a greeting from him.

The attitude of Ephesians, with its absence of explicit and detailed reference to the circumstances and stage of growth of its readers, is, on the assumption of its being a Pauline letter, intelligible only if its destination excluded such individual reference; in other words, if it was really not addressed to any one church, but was a circular intended for a number of Gentile Christian churches in the present case in Asia Minor, or, more precisely, in Phrygia¹—which Tychicus on the occasion of his journey to Colossae was to visit, conveying to them at the same time also a direct message from the great apostle of the Gentiles.

It is not, after all, beyond possibility, however, that Ephesians may be the epistle referred to in Col. 4.16; for there it is called, not the epistle to Laodicea, but the epistle from Laodicea, by which expression may have been intended nothing more than a copy of Ephesians to be obtained at Laodicea. In the original superscription, if this be so, we may suppose Paul to have named the province or provinces to the churches of which he wished to address himself (cp. 1 Pet. 1.1); the epistle would then have an almost 'catholic' character, and, in point of fact, next to Colossians, 1 Peter, of all the other NT epistles, is the one that comes nearest Ephesians in substance.

The whole preceding discussion (§ 13.7) falls to the ground if, as was done by the Tübingen school and still is done by many recent writers, the

15. Genuine-ness. Pauline authorship is denied. The external testimony is the best possible: from Marcion's time onwards the epistle is included in all lists of Paul's writings, and from the second century onwards the citations from it are exceptionally frequent. On the other hand, in form and style it is removed still further than Colossians from the manner of the earlier epistles of Paul; the number of ἀρα λογιστέον is astonishingly great; whilst in Paul the devil is called Satan, here (Eph. 1.27-6.11) he is called δαιμόλιος or (2.2) 'prince of the kingdom of the air';² the structure of the sentences is strikingly lumbering; substantives closely allied in meaning are constantly linked together by prepositions—especially ἐν—or by the use of the genitive, an expedient that conduces neither to freedom nor to clearness of style. At the same time the epistle has a number of characteristically Pauline expressions, including some that do not occur in Colossians, and at every step genuinely Pauline turns of thought are recalled.

The absence of concrete details in Ephesians has already been noted; but, if it be true that we have here a circular letter, the standards which we might apply to Corinthians or Philippians cease to be applicable.

² In Paul he is called also, however, βελίαρ (2 Cor. 6.15) and 'the god of this world' (2.4). See BARNES.

Peculiarities in statement of many Pauline doctrines, or in theological outlook generally, indifference of attitude upon controverted points of the Pauline period, and a preference for the ideas of the old Catholicism that was beginning to take shape cannot be denied; but here, again, as with Colossians, the case is met if we postulate a growth in the apostle himself, under the influence of new conditions. We fail to find in the epistle any direct evidence that the writer is a member of the second Christian generation, addressing men who have been born Christians; on the contrary, the readers are addressed as persons who had formerly been heathens.

The main obstacle to the traditional view of the authorship of the epistle is found in 4.11-2.35. In 16. Uncertain. 4.11, in the enumeration of church officers, the peculiar spiritual gifts to which so great prominence is given in 1 Cor. 12.7-10 are almost entirely passed over; in 2.20 it is the glory of the Church that she is 'built on the foundation of apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner stone,' and in 3.5, as if there had never been any such thing as a dispute in Jerusalem or in Antioch, the present time is spoken of as that in which the Gentiles' equality in privilege has been 'spiritually revealed to his holy apostles and prophets.' In the mouth of the apostle who has devoted the unremitting efforts of his lifetime to the establishment of this equality of privilege, this last expression has a peculiar sound. In a disciple of the apostle, on the other hand,—one who has in view the accomplished fact, the one and indivisible Church, for which all the apostles and prophets are equally sacred authorities—the phrases quoted are natural enough; and on the whole the hypothesis that a Pauline Christian, intimately familiar with the Pauline epistles, especially with Colossians, writing about 60 A.D., has in Ephesians sought to put in a plea for the true catholicism in the meaning of Paul, and in his name, is free from any serious difficulty. It is very hard to decide, perhaps the question ought to be left open as not yet ripe for settlement, and Ephesians in the meantime used only with caution when the Pauline system is being construed.

Like the Pauline epistles in general, Colossians and Ephesians are among the best preserved parts of the NT.

They have hardly at all been subjected to 'smoothing' revision; the majority of the variants (which, it must be said, are very numerous) are clearly mere copyists' errors. At the same time the readings vacillate at several important points—e.g., (Eph. 3.2) between καὶ and οὐκ, (Col. 2.13) between ἀ καὶ and καὶ, (Col. 3.13) between χριστός and κύριος. Influence of the text of Ephesians upon Colossians can be sometimes traced—e.g., Col. 3.6, has been supplied from Eph. 5.6. The obscurity of many of the sentences may have helped to protect them from gratuitous change; in any case the exegete of either epistle has a much harder task than the text-critic.

H. J. Holtzmann, Kritik der Epheser u. Kolosserbriefe (72), a most careful comparison of the two letters with each other and with those Pauline epistles of which the genuineness may be regarded as certain.

18. Literature. Holtzmann's hypothesis is that in Colossians we have a genuine epistle of Paul to Colossae, which has been expanded by later interpolations; the interpolator, the author of the epistle to the Ephesians—a Gentile Christian of Pauline training, who belonged to the post-apostolic age. Alf. Köpfer, Der Brief an die Colosser (72), and Der Brief an die Epheser (91), a very thorough if somewhat stiff exposition; Colossians is held to be genuine, Ephesians not. H. Soden in NT, 1895, pp. 320 ff., 407 ff., 672 ff., and 1897, pp. 412 ff., substantially accepted Holtzmann's hypothesis, and in the HC (91) has given a luminous commentary. H. Orlamünde, Comm. sur les Epîtres de St. Paul aux Colossiens, aux Ephésiens, 3 vols., 1901-02, maintains the genuineness of both epistles. In the case of Colossians this had already been argued most brilliantly by J. B. Lightfoot (St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, 1875, 2nd ed. 1886). J. Macpherson in Commentary on St. Paul's Ep. to the Ephesians (92), has sought with a painstaking care, worthy of Lighthimself, to vindicate tradition and solve the difficulties of the epistle. Fr. Haug (die theologisch-haltigen Briefe, 1899, an entirely new recast of the Kritisch-gelehrte Ausgabe of H. A. W. Meyer) takes, as regards the genuineness, a position similar to that of the present article, but decides against the Roman origin and in favour of Caesarea. Some new points of view are offered in Zahn's Einl. i. d. N. T., 1887, 1908, 1918, both on the question of introduction and on details of exegesis. The one of the popular commentaries of Elliott (33) and Harless (2nd ed., 1870) on Ephesians are now somewhat out of date. COLOURS.

If in certain branches of art the ancient Hebrews fell far behind their contemporaries, they were not without artistic feeling; if they had no drama, they were not devoid of dramatic instinct (CANTICLES, § 7; POETICAL LITERATURE, § 5); and if, through no inherent fault of their own, they were unable to attain any degree of competency in the highest form of art, yet they had, as their poetry shows, a very real appreciation of the sublime and beautiful. The neglect to cultivate this taste was a necessary consequence of the effort to fulfil the ancient command in Ex 204:—a command which would of course apply as much to painting as to sculpture—and of the monotheism to which they subsequently attained. (See Raskin, Two Paths, 7 f.; Perrot and Chipiez, History of Art in Sardinia, India, etc., 1.11 f.; and cf. MENES, § 1.)

A simple style of decoration and the use of some of the dyes and dyed stuffs they may indeed have learned at an early date.² When, however, the post-exilic writers wish to describe the decorations of an ideal sanctuary, they are obliged to borrow their ideas of ornament from Egypt, Babylonia, Persia, or Greece. (See Wernum, Analysis of Ornament, § 1 f., and cf. ISRAEL, § 67.) Characteristic of this style of decoration was a love of costly display combined with brilliancy of colour (Analysis of Ornament, § 5, and BABYLONIA, § 18, ASSYRIA, § 10, EGYPT, § 36). From these countries, then, in which art was the ally, if not the offspring, of idolatry, came the practice of decorating sculpture in the round with bold colours and costly ornament,³ a practice condemned by Ezekiel (23:14) as being an insult to Yahweh. But such cases, however, were exceptional among the Hebrews; appears probable from the fact that their language contains no words for 'paint,' 'painting,' and 'painter' (see N. 1). Nor does this striking phenomenon stand alone. It is also noteworthy that in the original texts no term is found to express that property of light known to us as colour.

When a Hebrew writer wishes to compare one object with another in respect to its colour he finds it necessary to use the word ayin (עַיִן 'eye') in the sense of appearance. So in Lev 13:35 the plague is spoken of as changing 'its appearance' (E.V. here and in the following examples, 'colour'), and in Num 11:7 the appearance of manna is described as being like the appearance (so here RV) of bdellium. The same word is used of the appearance of wine (Prov 23:3), of amber (1 K 10:2, 10), of burnished brass (1 K 17:17, 19), of a lily (1 K 17:19), and of crystal (1 K 10:2). Certainly the term ayin occurs frequently in the L.V., but in such cases the translation is seldom warranted by the original text. In the Apocrypha, on the other hand, a word does once occur (χρῶμα, Wisd. 15:4) with reference to a painted

² Already the poet who sang of the glorious victories over Sisera knew of dyed stuffs (2:27, 28), and seems to assume that Israel could be expected to provide its enemies with booty of this kind (Judg. 7:10). Of what colour, however, this stuff was composed is not stated; nor is it said with what colours the needlework (2:27) or the Ch. 20:2, 1 K 17:19 mentioned in the same passage was embroidered. See LANGGUTH.

Just as the want of a word to express the idea of 'painting' tends to prove that the art was very little cultivated, so also the want of a word for colour (found in Syriac, Arabic, Arabic, Egyptian, etc.) naturally suggests that colours were not much talked about by the Hebrews. This inference could indeed be shown to be inexact if we found many names for different colours, and could prove archaeologically that many colours were in use. When, however, we come to examine the Hebrew colour terms, and this applies also to those in use among the Greeks and the Romans² at any rate in biblical times, we find that very few of them are real colour terms at all, such terms being used as denote rather a contrast between light and darkness, brightness and dimness, than what we commonly understand by colour. Still, if colours are not sharply distinguished in the language of the ancient world it does not follow that the Hebrews and other primitive races were unable to distinguish shades of colour for which their language possessed no distinct terms, or that they were at least with respect to certain colours, colour-blind.³

It is not so much a question of deficiency of colour sense as was contended some years ago as of an undeveloped colour-vocabulary. (See Bala, 20, and Bonnet, 10, under 'Farben'; also Grant Allen, Colour Sense, chaps. II-III.) If colour-blind people are so common it is able to use correctly the names of colour, that they can see, so conversely a people may be able to discriminate colours for which their language has not set apart names.⁴ Besides, it now seems clear that even the lower animals are sensitive to colour (see Grant Allen, 20; Chubb, The Theory of Vision, 82-83; and cf. Drennon, 17, Journal of the Royal Society of Medicine, 1914, 17).

From the use of the terms which the Hebrews did possess, we are led to conclude that one and the same word was used to denote several shades of one colour; the context or object to which the colour was applied affording the clue as to the particular shade intended. Sometimes, however, in order to distinguish the shade of colour quite unmistakably, the thing described is compared with another object of which the colour in question is peculiarly characteristic (e.g. Eng. salmon pink, emerald-green, etc.).

It is indeed remarkable how few real colour terms occur in the O.T. Only three of the natural colours are distinguished by names, while for blue and yellow distinct terms are entirely wanting. The deficiency, however, is made up for by the use of the terms expressing degrees of light or dark; and in addition to these are found artificial colours with the name of the object from which they were derived (like car, crimson, cochineal, indigo, etc.). Substances, too, of which a particular colour was characteristic, may have been used to represent the colour itself (like Eng. orange, etc.).

It will be convenient to group and examine the words employed under the following headings; terms expressing (1) light and degrees of light, (2) darkness and degrees of dark, (3) natural colours, (4) variegated surfaces, (5) pigments or objects. Finally, it will be necessary to point out instances in which the E.V. expresses or implies a reference to colour where no such reference

² Cf. De Quincey, London's Confessions, note to chap. vi, London: 'The truth is, colours were as loosely and latitudinarily distinguished by the Greeks and Romans as degrees of affinity and consanguinity are everywhere.' So further Smith's Phil. & Crit. Antiquities, 10, 11, and Robinson-Smith in Nature, 1914, 10, 11.

(1) Light and degrees of light.—The word $\pi\alpha$, pal, (from $\pi\alpha\tau\alpha$, Syr. gāh, 'to shine'), used in Cant. 5.16 to denote the glow of a healthy complexion and translated 'white' in the EV, means primarily glancing or glistening (cp its use in Jer. 1.11, if the text is correct, of a wind) [AV 'dry', RV 'hot'] in Is. 18.4 of heat [EV 'clear'], and in 32.4 as an adverb [EV 'plainly']. G represents it in Cant. by λευκος, a word which originally contained a similar idea, as is shown by its use in Mt. 17.4 Mk 9.4 and Lk. 9.9.

The term שִׁהֲבִיב, śihbîb (from שִׁהֲבָה, Ar. śahiba), 'glittering like gold', starts with the same idea. It is used of leprous hair in Lev. 13.30-32, where the EV represents it by 'yellow,' and in Ezr. 8.27 the Hophal participle of the same root is applied to 'brass' (AV 'fine copper,' RV 'bright brass'). In Lev. 13.30-32 G translates it by ξανθήων, and in 13.36 by ξανθῆς, whereas in Ezra 8.27 (= 1 Esd. 8.37) it would seem to render by στύλαιον [BAL].¹ To express 'brilliant,' as contrasted with 'white,' the NT employs λαμπρός in Lk. 23.11 (EV 'gorgeous'), Acts 10.33 (EV 'bright'), Ja. 2.2 (AV 'goodly,' RV 'fine'), Rev. 15.6 (AV 'white,' RV 'bright'), and Rev. 19.3 (AV 'white,' RV 'bright'). In Acts 10.33 Ja. 2.2 Rev. 15.6 the Vulgate translates the word by caudus.

8. Degrees of dark. Shūr, 'to be black') is employed. It is used of the dark hair in a leprous rising (chap. 12, v. 4) of a leprous

Another word חָמָה, hum (from חָמָה=חָמָה), applied to sheep whose wool has been scorched by the sun, though really meaning simply 'dark,' may be translated 'brown,' as is done by AV in Gen. 30₃₂f. 35 40. In G it is rendered by φαῖδος and once (v. 40) by οἰαλμός. To express the idea of gloom and sorrow

¹ The Heb. has דָּבַר אֶת הַמִּשְׁכָּה וְאֵת כָּל הַיָּדוּעִים בְּחֹזֶק יָד (Job 38:16). For this I.Esd. has καὶ σκευή λαλὰ ἀπὸ λαλοῦ χρηστοί στιλβόντα σκευή δεκά [H] and κ. σ. χ. ἀπὸ χ. χρηστοί στιλβόντος χρυσίουδεκα δέκα duo [L].

² There is also a form קַמְרִיר kamrîr (Job 35 plur. constr., קַמְרִי) which occurs in Job (AV black), and has often been connected with an Aram. root: קַמְר 'to be black.' BDJH, we meet with the root קָדַר, qadhar, which has the primary meaning 'to be dirty.' Thus it can be applied to the turbid water of a brook (Job 6:10), to a sorrowful countenance (Jer. 8:21), to mourning garments (Is. 64:6), and even to garbs of a mourning city (Jer. 14:2) and to the heavens (Jer. 14:19; K. 15:43). In Is. 50:14 a derivative קָדַרְתִּי from the same root is used of the mourning garb of the heavens (EV 'blackness'). To the same root also probably belong the names Kedar (Gen. 25:13) and Kudron (Is. 28:15²³; see SAMUEL, § 102). Further, קָדַר, qadark, 'to be dark,' a word generally used of the darkness of approaching night (cp. Job 18:6; Is. 5:10), is used in Lam. 5:17 of the eyes becoming dim, in Is. 60:24 of their becoming blind; and in Lam. 4:2 the same term is applied to a dark complexion. This root gives us the common word for 'darkness' (קָדַר). Both קָדַר and קָדַר are represented in Ⲭ by ⲕⲟⲩⲁⲧⲁⲓⲣ, ⲕⲟⲩⲟⲩⲣ, ⲕⲟⲩⲁⲩⲟⲩⲁⲧⲁⲓⲣ; and קָדַר also by ⲕⲟⲩⲁⲩⲟⲩⲁⲧⲁⲓⲣ.

Finally, to this class belong also apparently שֶׁחֵלֶלֶת hakkhīlēt (Gen. 49:12, שֶׁחֵלֶלֶת hakkhīlēt), שֶׁחֵלֶלֶת hakkhīlēt (Prov. 23:26, שֶׁחֵלֶלֶת hakkhīlēt), both of them seem to refer to the stult (EV 'red') appearance of the eyes after excessive drinking (cp the name Hachīlāl [שֶׁחֵלֶלֶת] I S. 23:19), and see NABI s. § 102).

(3) Natural colours. — Under this heading are included those Hebrew words which more closely resemble our natural colour-terms. There are three

9. Natural colours : white. classes : (α) white, (β) red, (γ) green. It is doubtless true that primarily white denoted simply purity, green paleness, and red depth of light ; but the use to which the words are applied shows that the Hebrews attached to them fairly definite ideas of colour.

(a) White is commonly represented by לָבָן , lāḇhān. Thus it is used of the colour of goats (Gen. 30.35-37), of teeth (49.12), of mammals (Ex. 16.31), of leprous hair (Lev. 13.10-20 f.), of the leprous spot (Lev. 13.24-38 f.), of garment (Ecd. 9.8), and of horses (Zech. 1.8-6.36). Here also, as with the shades of dark, different shades of colour seem to be clearly distinguished, as 'milk-white' (Gen. 49.12), 'coriander-seed white' (Ex. 16.31), 'snow-white' (Num. 12.10-2 K. 5.27 Ps. 68.14 Is. 1.18), and in the NT 'wool-white' (Rev. 1.14), 'bright-white' (Mt. 17.1 Lk. 9.29) and 'harvest-white' (Jn. 4.35). We even find in Lev. 13.39 a compound expression לָבָן וְדָרְכִי used to describe a shade of white (LV 'darkish white', RV 'dull white').

From the same Hebrew root seem to be derived the names Laban (גִּזְן Gen. 21:29), Libni (גִּזְן Ex. 6:17), Libnah (גִּזְן Josh. 10:27; but see LIBNATH), Lebannah (גִּזְן Ez. 2:45), and Lebanon (גִּזְן 1 K. 22:6[5]), so-called either on account of its snow-capped peak or from the colour of its stone, as well as its substantives גִּזְן, Libnathāh 'moon' (Ca. 6 to), גִּזְן, Libnathāh 'white-poplar' (Gen. 30:37), and, possibly, גִּזְן, Libnathāh 'brick' (Ex. 1:14; see, however, BRICK, § 1, n.). See NAME §§ 66, 102.

The corresponding root in Aramaic is ܚܪ , hur, which in Is. 29:22 is used (as a verb) of the face becoming pale with shame, and in Dan. 7:9 of a snow-white garment. Both these words are usually represented in G by $\text{A}\epsilon\text{K}\alpha\text{I}\alpha\text{I}$ (cp. however, Gen. 30:37 where $\text{X}\alpha\text{p}\alpha\text{S}$ = $\text{I}\alpha$), and, moreover, there occurs in the Apocrypha a word $\text{A}\epsilon\text{K}\alpha\text{I}\alpha\text{I}$ which is used of a disease of the eyes (Eob. 2:30 3:17 6:8 8:13, but in Ecclus. 4:18 $\text{A}\epsilon\text{K}\alpha\text{I}\alpha\text{I}$, Heb. עִוְרָה).

To the same class, perhaps, belongs also גֶּזֶר, Gen 40:10. In the RV it is translated 'white bread'; but from what follows in the context the word would seem to refer not to the contents of the baskets, but to the baskets themselves (AV 'white baskets'). Finally, to express the idea of the hair becoming grayish-white through age, there is the root שִׁיבָה, šibhā (1 S. 12:2 Job 15: whence the derivative שֵׁנִי, shēnī, 'gray hair' (Gen. 42:38 11:20; Deut. 32:23 Hos. 7:9 Prov. 20:29 or 'old age' (Is. 46:4). In שֵׁנִי it is usually represented correctly by σιν or σιν σιν.

(3) Perhaps the most clearly distinguished of the natural colours, as being the colour of blood, was red, to express which the Hebrews commonly used the root אֵדָם, 'adham. That it denoted a brilliant hue is evident from the fact that Isaiah uses the verb אֵדָם in the sense of becoming like scarlet (אֵדָם, see below, § 14) and the Priestly Code speaks of skins dyed red (אֵדָם). The adjective אֵדָם, 'adham, is applied to blood in 2 K. 3:22, to blood-stained apparel in Is. 63:2; and verbal forms, to a blood-besmeared shield (אֵדָם) in Nah. 2:4 [3], and to wine (אֵדָם) in Prov. 23:31. The root, however, was also employed to describe other colours of a reddish hue is apparent from its use as applied to a heifer (Nu. 19:2) or a horse (Zech. 1:8), to a reddish-brown (אֵדָם, Gen. 25:25 1 S. 16:12; cp Lam. 1:7, Cant. 5:10, and see GORIATIN, § 2, n.) skin, as well as to reddish or brownish-yellow lentils (Gen. 25:30).² The Priestly Code uses also a diminutive form (אֵדָמָה) to express merely 'reddish,' applying it to the colour of the leprous spot (Lev. 13:19-24) or sore (Lev. 13:42 f.).

From the same root are derived the names Edom (אֵדָם Gen. 25:30), Admah (אֵדָמָה Gen. 10:19), and Adumim (אֵדָמִים Josh. 15:7 18:17; see NAMES, § 10) as well as the precious stone called אֵדָם (see RUBY and PRECIOUS STONES). To אֵדָם 'adham, corresponds ruppōs (lit. 'having the colour of fire') in שֵׁנִי and NT; and in Mt. 16:23 we find the verb ruppōs used of the sky.

Other roots, however, besides this are occasionally employed to designate this colour. Thus the root אֵדָם, adham, which usually conveys the idea of 'acidity, fermentation,' seems to be used in Is. 63:1 to denote a colour; and the context requires a blood- or wine-like appearance (cp Eng. sorrel, (1) rum saur and (2) from saur—reddish-brown). אֵדָם in Zech. 1:8 is also from the context, possibly to be read אֵדָם (Cle.); cp Ges. Buhl, אֵדָם. The root אֵדָם 'adham 'to be red,' is traced by some in Ps. 75:9, and, with more justice, in Job 16:16 (P⁵⁷al form). To this class we may also probably assign אֵדָם, adham, 'reddish-brown' (cp Ar. al-ham, 'a sorrel-horse,' and Heb. שֵׁנִי)—a term used in Zech. 1:8 of a horse.

(7) The third natural colour term describes those uncertain hues—colours which it has, in all ages, been found difficult to distinguish—that

11. Green waver between blue, yellow, and green.

In Hebrew the adjective employed (אֵדָם, 'to be pale,' cp Assy. ariku, 'to grow pale' [of the face], arku, 'yellow,' and Aram. אֵדָם, 'to be pale') can be applied to the colour of vegetation (Job 39:8 2 K. 19:26 Is. 37:27); and a substantive אֵדָם, ariku, derived from the same root denotes vegetable produce in general. As, moreover, the root idea of the word was originally, like that of χλωρός its Greek equivalent, merely *pale*ness or faintness of colour, a derivative (אֵדָם) can be used to describe a panic-stricken countenance (Jer. 30:6) or the fading colour of decaying vegetation (Deut. 28:22 Amos 4:9 Hag. 2:17). Further, to express simply 'pale,' a diminutive form (אֵדָם) can be used of plague spots (Lev. 13:49 11:37) or of the appearance of gold (Ps. 68:13).⁴ On the word אֵדָם, ariku ('to be yellow?'; cp NAMES, § 66) which is applied to gold (Ps. 68:14, etc.) and seems to denote a shade of yellow, see GORIATIN.

(4) Variegated surfaces.—A few words occur which, though their precise meaning is uncertain, undoubtedly

² Unless we point אֵדָם (see Esau, § 1).

³ From this root some derive אֵדָם, hēmār, 'asphalt,' אֵדָם, hēmār, 'clay,' אֵדָם, yaḥmār, 'roebuck.'

⁴ Cp ME-JARKON (a doubtful place-name in Josh. 10:46).

denote a parti-coloured appearance of some kind; their employment being for the most part restricted to the description of animals. Of these the term rendered in AV by 'ringstraked' and applied to goats (אֵדָם, adham, Gen. 30:35 10 f. 11:8 1:12), probably has reference to white stripes on an otherwise dark skin; that translated 'speckled' (אֵדָם, adham, Gen. 30:35 1:12) to light spots on a dark skin; and that represented by 'grised' (אֵדָם, adham) and used of both goats (Gen. 31:10 1:12) and horses (Zech. 1:8) to light patches on a dark skin. The last word would, therefore, probably correspond to our piebald.

In Jer. 12:9 (RV) we meet with the phrase 'a speckled (אֵדָם) bird of prey.' The commentators have sought to justify and explain it; but it remains improbable.¹ A combination of different colours is expressed in Gen. 20:2 f. by אֵדָם, adham, probably 'besprinkled,' 'becked' (cp sparsus). The same term is used in Ezek. 16:16 of the dyed stuffs of many colours with which other peoples were wont to decorate their shawls.

(5) Pigments.—The Hebrews knew and made use of several pigments, three of which were derived from animals. These three dyes were all manufactured by the Phoenicians; the one 'scarlet' or 'crimson' (whence its Gr. name κόκκιος and Lat. phoeniceum), from an insect (coccus) which gave its name to a species of oak on which it was found (Ilex coccifera); the other two from a slimy secretion found in a special gland of a species of shell-fish called Murex trunculus and Murex brandaris.

By infusing the insect (coccus) in boiling water a beautiful red dye was produced, superior in effect and durability to cochineal; the other dyes when applied to articles became at first of a whitish colour, but under the influence of sunlight changed to yellowish greenish and finally to purple, the purple being red or blue according to the species of shell-fish employed. These three colours were held in high estimation by the ancients on account of both their brilliancy and their costliness. The purple-blue is translated 'blue' in the EV, but must have corresponded rather to our violet, by which it is once rendered in the AV (Esh. 1:6 and in the margin 8:13). The Hebrews knew no blue colour with which to compare it, and hence it is said in Isaiah 1:2 that 'purple-blue is like the sea, and the sea is like the plants, and the plants are like the firmament of heaven' (see also Isaiah 4:4 and cp Del. in PALESTINE, 19, 482, Isaiah 1:2 f., and the articles PURPLE, SCARLET, BLUE, CRIMSON).

(a) To designate the first of the dyes mentioned above, the Hebrews sometimes used simply אֵדָם, adham, 'worm,' just as we speak of crimson

14. Scarlet. (fr. Arab. krumiz=Sansk. krīmi) and cochineal (really a term denoting the insect coccus cacti found in Mexico). Thus it is used in Is. 1:13 as the most natural example of a glaring and indelible dye, and in Lam. 4:5 (where אֵדָם gives the simple term κόκκος, 'berry' [A. κόκκος], the insect being regarded in early times as a species of berry) of princely raiment. It even occurs as a verbal derivative (אֵדָם, Nah. 2:4 [4]; אֵדָם ἐμπαίζοντας) with the meaning 'to be clothed in scarlet' (see, however, DRESS, § 3, n.1). More often, however, the form אֵדָם, adham, is found with the addition, either before or after it, of the word אֵדָם, adham—a word which has been derived from the root אֵדָם, adham (cp Assy. admu, possibly fr. admu, supposed to mean 'to glitter,' and is thought to refer to the brilliant colour derived from the אֵדָם). In this form it is mentioned as a costly possession (Ex. 35:23), and as being, therefore, suitable for an offering (Ex. 25:4 27:6 Lev. 11:4 [11:4] 64:15 12:31 Nu. 19:6 [19:6] for the hangings (Ex. 26:36

27.16 36.17 38.18), for the ephod (Ex. 28.56 39.28), for the priests' girdle (Ex. 28.8 39.52), for the breastplate (Ex. 28.15 39.8), and for the embroidered pomegranates (Ex. 28.33 39.24), etc. In Ecclesi. 45.1, also, it is used of some kind of embroidered work (Gr. κεκασμένη κοκκω; vet. Lat. fortificatio). A thread of this colour—expressed by laui alone—was commonly used in the times of the Jubilee as a mark (Gen. 38.28; Josh. 2.1, 11), and the single term is employed in two poetical passages (2S. 1.4, where the maidens of Israel are called upon to lament Saul, who used to clothe them in scarlet; and Ca. 1.9 as equivalent to the longer expression). In the acrostic on the 'Capable Woman' the same word is used in the plural (laui, laui) to describe the warm clothing provided against the cold of winter (Prov. 31.21), and in Is. 1.18 to denote probably scarlet-stuff as distinguished from the dye itself (laui). As a substitute for these expressions we find the Chremeter using a word karml (2 Ch. 27.14 31.4, cp. Ex. 36.15), derived from the Persian (kirm, 'a worm'; see CRIMSON, and cp. above). In κόκκινος is chosen to represent all these expressions, and there can be no doubt that where the same word occurs in the NT it denotes this dye (Mt. 27.28 Heb. 9.10 Rev. 17.34 18.12).

Later OT writers knew of another pigment of a like shade of colour, called argaman (1 V. 'vermilion')—perhaps oxide of lead (cp. ῥομαίος and see Richm. Hilf 'Menning'). It was used for painting ceilings (Jer. 22.14, ῥομαίος) and images (Ezek. 23.14, ῥομαίος). (3) The Purple-blue (ῥομαίος, techeleth, Assy. ta-ki-ta) and Purple-red (ῥομαίος, argaman, Bib. Aram. argaman).

15. Purples. Assy. argamanna dyed stuffs also figure largely in the decoration of the Tabernacle and the priestly robes; but they can hardly have been known as early as the scarlet (cp. CANTICLES, § 15), their employment being characteristic of P and later writers. They also can be used for an offering (Ex. 25.4 35.6), as being a valuable possession (Ex. 35.23), as well as for the curtains (Ex. 26.1 36.8), for the veil (Ex. 26.31 36.15), for the hangings (Ex. 26.36 27.16 36.37 38.18), for the priest's ephod (Ex. 28.6 39.2), for the girdle (Ex. 28.8 39.52), and for the breastplate (Ex. 28.15 39.8), etc. A late prophet knows both colours as part of the splendour of heathen worship (Jer. 10.6). It seems natural also to another late writer to assume that the Midianitish chiefs would wear robes of purple-red (Judg. 8.26); and Ezekiel tells how the robes of purple-blue worn by the Assyrians had struck the imagination of the women of Israel (23.6), whilst he also knows (27.7) of purple-blue and purple-red from ELISHAH (q.v.). In Ecclesi., too, both dyes are mentioned (45.10) as occupying a prominent place in the raiment of Moses, and in 6.30 ribbons of purple-blue are said to form part of the adornment of Wisdom. On the defeat of Gorgias dyed stuffs of both colours were taken by Judas Maccabeus among the spoil (1 Macc. 4.23). Of the two purples red seems to have been preferred. Solomon's 'seat of purple' (Cant. 3.10) is perhaps due to error (see PURPLE); but purple robes of office were common. Judas was struck by the fact that the Romans, notwithstanding their power and riches, were not clothed in purple (1 Macc. 8.14). When, however, Alexander appoints Jonathan high priest, he sends him a purple-red robe (10.26 26.4 [RV]); so likewise Antiochus when he confirms him in the office (11.53). On the other hand, when the treachery of Andronicus is discovered, he is at once deprived of the purple robe (2 Macc. 4.32). Similarly in the NT in Mt. 27.28 (ῥομαίος κοκκινῶν) Mk. 15.17 (πορφύρεα) and Jn. 19.2 (ῥομαίος πορφύρεα), the red-purple robe is used as a mark of majesty; while in Lk. 16.19 (πορφύρεα) it is one of the characteristics of a rich man. In Rev. 17.4

1 ῥομαίος (v. 22) however suggests ῥομαίος 'double.' So Vg. Schleusser, Gril., Che.

COLOURS

(πορφύρεον καὶ κόκκινον) it is part of the attire of the great harlot, and in 18.12 (πορφύρεα) is referred to as valuable merchandise (cp. also 2.16 πορφύρεον). It is also worthy of note that one of Paul's converts made her living by selling this dye (πορφύροπώλις, Acts 16.14). In Cant. 7.6 the hair of the bride seems to be compared with purple (ῥομαίος), and Greek parallels for this are quoted. The comparison, however, can hardly be trusted, for ῥομαίος ῥομαίος is a dittogram of ῥομαίος ῥομαίος which precedes. Each form of the clause seems to be correct in one half than the other. Read, perhaps, with Cheyne 'The locks of thy head are like Carmel' (ῥομαίος); they are pleasant (ῥομαίος) as an orchard of pomegranates' (see GALLI RV, 2). ῥομαίος is plainly some word which should follow ῥομαίος probably ῥομαίος (written ῥομαίος and corrupted to ῥομαίος cp. HAIR, § 15). In the Gr. ῥομαίος is commonly represented by δακτύλος and δακτύλος, and ῥομαίος by πορφύρεος in both OT and NT (see Rev. 9.17 21.2).

(6) Object.—The words included under this heading denote objects of which a particular shade of colour was characteristic. Thus ῥομαίος (2 Ch. 2.12) was the fine cotton of the linen manufactured by the Egyptians and called elsewhere (Ex. 26.1 Gen. 41.42, etc.) ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος (see Erman, Life in Ancient Egypt, 448, and the articles EGYPT, § 35, COTTON, and LINEN). ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος, Easth. 16 probably means 'white-stuff' (whence ῥομαίος in Is. 19.9), and ῥομαίος (Pers. karpas) 'white cotton.' Three more rare words occur in the same verse which have been thought to denote different species of valuable stone or plaster: ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος (also in Ca. 5.13) which has been supposed to be identical with ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος (1 Ch. 29.2) and to mean 'white marble' or 'alabaster'; ῥομαίος (ῥομαίος ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος ῥομαίος) denoting perhaps 'porphyry' (so BDB; EV 'white marble'; RV¹⁸ 'porphyry'); ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος, meaning possibly 'pearl' or 'pearl-like stone'; ῥομαίος (ῥομαίος ῥομαίος); and ῥομαίος (ῥομαίος ῥομαίος) EV 'black marble,' RV¹⁸ 'stone of one colour', which has been derived from ῥομαίος = ῥομαίος, and taken to mean 'black marble' (see, however, MARAI).

Lastly it remains to notice a few passages in which the EV unnecessarily implies a reference to colour. Thus the colour 'green' is sometimes used in the EV to represent words denoting not colour but a healthy and flourishing condition. Of such words ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος which means rather 'luxuriant' is correctly translated in G by various words expressive of luxuriance (ῥομαίος Dt. 12.15 57.5; ῥομαίος 3 K. 14.3 Ca. 1.6 Ez. 6.13 ῥομαίος 4 K. 16.4 17.10 2 Ch. 28.4 Jer. 36.13 17.8 Ez. 27.6). Very similar is the use of ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος, 'fresh, moist' (ῥομαίος Gen. 30.17 Ez. 17.24 20.47 [21.3]; ῥομαίος Judg. 16.7 8) and ῥομαίος, 'juicy' (ῥομαίος Job 8.16). Again ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος denotes 'fresh, juicy ears of corn' (Lev. 2.14), and ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος can be used of 'fresh young plants' (Job 8.12 Cant. 6.11); whilst ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος seems to denote tender young fruits (Ca. 2.13, see Del. ad loc.), and ῥομαίος, ῥομαίος (Lev. 23.14) applies to 'garden fruit' in general.

To this category belong also such compound expressions as ῥομαίος ῥομαίος 'grassy pastures' (Ps. 23.2) and ῥομαίος ῥομαίος 'sprouts of the field' (Eccles. 40.22). In all these cases the term 'green' used in AV, might indeed serve as a paraphrase; but it is otherwise with the following examples:—In Job 6.6 the word translated 'white' (of an egg) is thought by many to mean 'the juice of purlan' (3 RV¹⁸ ῥομαίος ῥομαίος but see Fowl), but whichever interpretation be adopted it will be admitted that the Hebrew word contains no idea of colour. Similarly ῥομαίος, the reading adopted by EV in Is. 27.2 (AV 'red wine'; RV¹⁸ 'wine') instead of ῥομαίος (RV¹⁸ 'a pleasant vineyard'); see SBD L, means really 'foaming wine' (Driver on Is. 52.14); and 1 ῥομαίος also gives δακτύλος for ῥομαίος (Ex. 25.3 26.14 36.7 27.2, etc.) taking it as the equivalent of ῥομαίος.

COMFORTER

עֵצִי in the expression עֵצִי עֵצִי (Ex. 10:12, etc.; Wisd. 10:13 ἡ ἀσπασία ἐπιθρηνητική), meaning 'reed', contains no reference to colour. Moreover, in the expressions עֵצִי עֵצִי (AV 'black night', RV 'blackness of night') in Ps. 70 and עֵצִי עֵצִי (AV 'blackness') in Job 26:14, the English renderings are purely paraphrastic. In the same way the long robe (perhaps white with a blue border) worn by Joseph (Gen 37:3) and by Tamar (2 S. 13:18) is transformed in the RV into 'a coat of many colours'. In Ps. 20:10 (עֵצִי עֵצִי AV 'blossoms') and Eccles. 23:10 (מַעֲשֵׂה עֵצִי AV 'blue mark') the words mean literally 'bruisings'.

COMMON. The negatives of the qualities 'clean,' 'holy' (see CLEAN, § 1) are—

1. 'Common,' a synonym for 'unclean' (see CLEAN), constantly in RV for ἡ ἀκαθάρτης (properly, 'that which is open,' Bandissin, Stadion, 2:1). AV, however, only two renders het thus (1 S. 21:4; 2; elsewhere it has 'unholy' (Lev. 10:10) or 'profane' (Ezek. 22:26, 42:20, 44:23, 48:15)). In NT, the RV is less strict with κοινός, which is almost indifferently rendered 'common,' 'unclean,' 'unholy,' 'defiled,' 'polluted.' So in 1 Macc. 1:47, 6; RV (with AV) gives 'unclean' for κοινός. No injury is done to the sense; cp. V. 10:15, 'what God hath defiled' (i.e. pronounced clean), that call not thou common'; 7:11, 'common and unclean.' That which is 'common' is free, or at any rate is treated as if free, from ceremonial restrictions; it can be used in the common life—the life of the ἡ ἀκαθάρτης, the unintelligent 'people of the land' (ὁ ἄλλος οὗτος ὁ ἡ γυνάσκων τὸν νόμον, In. 7:49). And those who use what is only treated as if 'common' or 'open,' when it has no right to be so treated, become 'common'—i.e., unclean—themselves. 'Common,' therefore, becomes a wide term, dangerously wide from a truly religious point of view. What an irony in the evangelist's expression 'with common' (RV defiled), that is, unwashed hands!

2. 'Unclean,' the strict rendering of ἀκαθάρτος in NT, of ἡ ἀκαθάρτης, in OT (ἡ ἀκαθάρτης). Both 'common' and 'unclean' can be used (1) of forbidden foods or of animals which may not be eaten (Acts 10:11, 11:8, 15:20). (2) Of persons who are not Jews, or who do not belong to the Christian community (Acts 10:28, 1 Cor. 7:14, 2 Cor. 6:17; cp. κοινός, Mk. 7:15 and parallels, Heb. 9:13 Rev. 21:27 [RT and RV]).

3. 'Unholy,' given in AV of Lev. 10:10 (ἡ ἀκαθάρτης) becomes 'common' in RV. In Ezek. 22:26, 42:20, 44:23 (same formula), AV renders ἡ ἀκαθάρτης 'profane.' The influence of ἡ ἀκαθάρτης and Vg. may be suspected; these versions respectively give βέβηλος, profanum, so also in Ezek. 48:15, AV profane, Vg. profana. 'Profane' is best reserved, however, for other Heb. words (see PROFANE). RV of NT retains 'unholy' in 1 Tim. 1:2, 2 Tim. 2:20 (ἀνόσιος), Heb. 10:29 (κοινός).

4. On the peculiar technical term קָדָשׁ, 'to be polluted,' see HYPOCRISY.

COMMUNITY OF GOODS. In the widest sense of that expression, is usually considered (on the authority of Acts 2:44-47, 4:32-35, 6:1-6) to have been one of the established institutions of the earliest Christian society at Jerusalem. This opinion requires strict limitation; but that limitation is not to be based, as it has been, either on the intrinsic improbability of the institution itself, or on a vague conjecture that the writer of Acts has idealised the facts. It arises from an investigation of the sources of his narrative (cp. Acts, § 11)—a method which has to record one of its most assured results in connection with the subject of the present article.

We have in Acts not one account of the institution but three.

1. Three accounts in Acts.

(a) One account comprehensively records the sale of all lands and houses (ὑποθήκων ἢ οὐκίων; Acts 4:34, 5:1); according to 2:45 the sale was of all possessions and goods whatsoever (τὰ κτήματα καὶ τὰς ἐπιθήσεις), a common fund being thus formed, out of which all were supplied according as any man had need. (b) According to another account, the sale of property (κτῆμα, 5:1; ὑποθήκων, 5:2) cannot have been universally prescribed, or even generally customary; for Peter (5:4) expressly declares that Ananias was free to retain in his private possession either his property or the money for which it was sold. Moreover, although there is nothing of there being anything to mark out the act of Barnabas (4:36, 47) from the universal practice assumed in 2:45, such as that the estate was his only one, or was particularly valuable, it is thought worthy of special homologue mention. In 1:27, therefore, it is not assumed, as it is in 4:34, that the sale of property was expected of all. (c) In 4:34, however, where we find 'and' (καὶ) and not some word implying 'retained as private property,' there is no notion of any sale of property at all. The idea simply is that the owners placed their property in a general way at the disposal of the community at large. There is no assumption of a common fund.

(d) A fourth account may possibly be distinguished in Acts 2:44.

The statement in 2:44-47, 'they had all things common' by itself alone agrees well enough with the last-mentioned and simplest account. The statement in 4:34, however, which is a more detailed one, and 2:45, which is a more general one, and 2:47, which is a more specific one, all three together might be taken, like 1:27, 2:44, 4:34, 5:1, 2, to refer merely to the exigencies of social washing; but the connection of the clause with the statement that 'they had all things in common' appears to imply that the entire community lived in common, dwelling in the same house and having common meals.

2. Possibly a fourth account.

(1) Cor. 11:20-23, to refer merely to the exigencies of social washing; but the connection of the clause with the statement that 'they had all things in common' appears to imply that the entire community lived in common, dwelling in the same house and having common meals.

This inference, however, may safely be set aside, as it may well be doubted whether the collocation in Acts 2:44 has not arisen from the author's having inadvertently combined two heterogeneous ideas without perceiving the possible misleading effect.

A social institution of the nature indicated would scarcely have been practicable in a community of 120 persons (Acts 1:15) much less in one of 3000 (2:41) or more (2:47). The other statements in Acts do not preclude the supposition that the meals, even love-feasts and the observance of the Lord's Supper associated with them, were held in different houses at the same time. Κατ' οἶκον (AV 'from house to house,' AV⁹⁶ and RV 'at home') in 2:46 (p. 542) need not be rendered 'every day' that the whole community assembled on one occasion in one house and on another occasion in another; it may have a distributive meaning like κατὰ πόλιν ('in every city') in 15:21 (and κατ' οἶκον, that is 'in every house,' in 20:2). In Rom. 16:14, f., we find several household churches in the same city; cp. also 1 Cor. 16:19, Col. 4:15. The complaint about the neglect of certain widows in the daily ministrations (Acts 6:1), which the word καθημερινή proves to have referred to their sustenance, could not have arisen if there had been common meals (although indeed the expression 'tables' [τραπέζαι] might seem to point to these). It could have arisen only if the widows' share of provisions was brought to their homes.

A misrepresentation of the original idea, similar to that which, as has just been shown, may be present in

3. Acts 5:2, 24, is unquestionably to be found in 5:2 f.

The writer of this verse held Ananias to have sinned in keeping back part of the money obtained by selling his estate. The duplicity with which Peter charges him does not consist in his having, when questioned, passed off as the whole a part of the money thus obtained. It is only Sapphira (5:8) who does this. Ananias, according to 5:2 f., has already committed the crime of keeping back some of the money before he could be questioned by Peter. This cannot possibly be reconciled with Peter's declaration in 5:4, that Ananias had a perfect right to retain the whole. Notwithstanding that plain declaration, the author must have had before his mind, in writing 5:2 f., the stricter view that it was an absolute duty to sell all the property and to hand over the whole of the money.

The hypothesis that the narratives are based on various sources receives material support

4. Acts 1:32, from the impossibility of discovering any real coherence within the passages themselves.

Acts 4:33 treats of a subject quite different from the matters

1. This will also be the sense if we accept the reading of WH, which omits ἵνα and the following καὶ; they are retained in their marginal reading.

2. ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ in the NT always refers to place; AV 'into one place.'

dealt with in the preceding and the following verses. Nor can 4:34 be connected with 4:2. It could be connected with it only if the absence of poor persons were the reason (79a) why all property was common (79.12) instead of being the result of the community of goods. Further, according to 4:34, the absence of poor is due not to community of goods, but to the sale of all property in land and houses and the establishment of a common fund, whereas, in 4:35-36 again, the sale of any property appears as a voluntary act of certain individuals. In like manner 2:42 is so definitely repeated in 2:46 that the narrative can hardly be an independent composition. It must be a compilation. Even more marked is the repetition of the first clause in 2:41, ἐκαστος δὲ πᾶν ὃ ἔχει, in the third, ὅσους γὰρ ἔσχατος ἔτι πᾶσιν. But even if this last clause be omitted, with WH (though it is difficult to explain how it could have arisen as a variant to the first clause, 2:41, with the reading καὶ πᾶσιν), cannot be connected with what precedes. The opening, 'but also all that belonged (were) together, implies that others were together as well. The omission of the καὶ συνήθησαν by WH is clearly an attempt to remove the difficulty.

An attempt to prove that all these passages have been compiled by an editor from various sources, could be based only on an examination of the whole book. Such proof is not needful to our present purpose. It will be sufficient to have shown that the book presents three different views on the subject of community of goods.

If it be asked which of the three is the most likely to be the true view, it will be safe to answer that, if any one is to be preferred, it is that which is

5. Which the most trustworthy. simplest (§ 1.1). An account of any institution of the kind, clothed with the glamour of the ideal, is sure to have been exaggerated by writers with incomplete information.

It is certain, however, that the general idea of community of goods was not strange to the primitive Christian society.¹

It is indicated in such sayings of Jesus as those recorded in Mt. 6:19-20; 19:21-24, and in such information about his own life as we find in Lk. 8:3. Besides, we know there was a distinctly Ebionite tendency which applied a literal interpretation to the blessings pronounced on the poor and hungry (Lk. 6:20-26; 24:7), and saw the path of salvation in giving away all property in alms (Lk. 6:34-35; 11:41; 12:43; 16:6). It is not certain indeed that this Ebionite tendency was dominant in the period immediately following the death of Jesus. (The passages cited were taken up by the Third Evangelist from a document which itself rests upon an older written collection of sayings of Jesus. This is proved by the remodelled words in Lk. 6:20-26, which, not having any reference to the disposition of the persons addressed, certainly did not come in their present form from the lips of Jesus. Besides, what is here recommended is not so much community of goods as almsgiving.) The epistles of Paul, which are our most trustworthy authority, only show that in his time (20-30 years after the death of Jesus), the community at Jerusalem was poor, or, at least, contained a good many poor members, and stood in need of assistance from the Gentile-Christian churches (εἰς τοὺς ἀγαθούς, 1 Cor. 16:1; 2 Cor. 8:4; 11:3; but τὸν πτωχὸν alone, Gal. 2:10; εἰς τοὺς πτωχοὺς τῶν ἀγίων, Rom. 15:26).

The Gospels prove that many poor people had already attached themselves to Jesus in his lifetime. An active care for these, and consequently a more or less organised διακονία, must be assumed in the original church at Jerusalem. We may well suppose that, in as far as this ministration took the form of a community of goods, it led, according to the usual lesson taught by other attempts of the kind, to the increase of poverty. It may, moreover, be conjectured that in the earliest Christian times the institution of community of goods increased the tendency to forego the pursuit of wealth, which, even without that institution, was occasioned, according to 1 Thess. 1:1-3; 2 Thess. 2:13-17, by the belief that the end of the world was near at hand and by the unrest to which this belief gave rise. We may suppose that wealthy members of the community in Jerusalem allowed their property to become available for the use of poor brethren; and this does not preclude the belief that of their own free will certain persons, such as Barabbas and Ananias, went further and sold their belongings for the benefit of the community.

Still, it is certainly not true that communism was prescribed as obligatory.

The uncertainty of the subject is shown also by Acts 6:1-6. It would be very remarkable if there were no necessities persons whose support could be neglected but widows. The phrase seems to be due to a usage of the author's own contemporary (late) period, in which, according to 1 Tim. 5:3-16, the 'widow' had an official position in the community. It is strange that, although the mention of the names of the seven appointed to 'serve tables' (διακονεῖν τραπέζαις) points to genuine tradition, their function—they are nowhere styled διακονοί—is never referred to afterwards (they are not to be identified with the προεβήτορες of 11:30), and that only Hellenists had to complain of the neglect of their widows. Just as in Acts 15:36-40 a less serious dispute is narrated in place of one that had more important issues (see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 3), so here, at the bottom of the narrative before us, there really is, we may conjecture, some dissension occasioned by different conceptions of Christianity entertained by the natives of Palestine and by the Christian Jews who had come in from abroad.

CONDUITS AND RESERVOIRS

In any case, the community of goods did not long, though the view that it came to an end when a society was dispersed by the persecution (Acts 8:1-4) no more than a conjecture.

The subsequent influence of the idealised picture Acts is very noteworthy. In the exhortation to works of charity in the Epistle of Barnabas (198), and similarly in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (43), the statement of Acts 4:32 is repeated as a command.

6. Subsequent influence of the idea. 'Say not, "It is private property" (ὅτι ἐπὶ τοῖς ἐλπίαις), supported those in need from a common fund (ἀπὸ τῆς κοινῆς), and ridicules the credulity with which they allowed themselves to be cheated by impostors in doing. The influence of the same ideal on the monastic life is obvious.

CONDUITS AND RESERVOIRS. In a country where the rain-supply is small and irregular, where the possessors scarcely more than one perennial stream (פְּדִיָּה; cp Am. 5:24), and is not rich in springs, the preservation of water in cisterns and reservoirs, and the employment of trenches or conduits to convey it to the place where it was most needed, must have been of paramount importance. Hence the indispensability of rain as the trust placed in the continuance of its supply form the basis of some of the best known and most beautiful metaphors in OT.

Leaving to the article SPRINGS [p. 11] what needs be said upon the natural supply of water, we propose here to notice the artificial means by which it was stored and conveyed.

The ordinary method of preserving water was to dig (פְּדִיָּה) or hew (פְּדִיָּה) out of the living rock a reservoir varying in size from a small pit to a properly an artificial excavation, and thus distinct from כֶּסֶם kesem, a natural well (see SPRINGS). When dry the kesem is a pit (cp Gen. 37:25) which can be used as a prison (Jer. 38: Gen. 10:15, etc.; cp כֶּסֶם Ex. 12:20). In poetical language kesem is applied to the pit of the grave (Is. 28:17) or to Sheol (Ps. 93:1). In only two cases does kesem occur as part of a place-name: see BOGASHAN, SHAL.

To dig them was the work of benefactor and deserving of special mention (e.g., 2 Sam. 23:16), and the opening ceremony, on one occasion at least, becomes the subject of a song (see BEER).

Other terms are:

2. כֶּסֶם, gohel (cp Ar. ghahlan 'watering-trough'), Is. 30:14 (AV 'pit') in Ezek. 47:11 (AV 'marish' [moorass]), and

3. כֶּסֶם Jer. 14:2 K. 2:16 (AV 'ditch', RV 'trench'), perhaps used for purposes of irrigation (cp L. K. 2:12 Jer. 39:10 after K. 2); see ARABIC LITERATURE, § 5.

4. כֶּסֶם, berikhah (כְּרִיחַ, כֶּסֶם) is used of an artificial pool, Eccl. 2:6 (with כֶּסֶם), but elsewhere appears to refer to natural springs. Several pools were found in and around Jerusalem (cp below, and see HERODOTUS), also in Galilee (2 S. 21:3, Helon (2 S. 4:12), and Samaria (1 K. 22:39); for Cant. 7:4 [5], see BATH-RAMM).

5. כֶּסֶם, mikneh, Is. 22:11, AV 'ditch', RV 'reservoir.'

It was of the utmost importance that citadels should be well supplied with tanks for collecting the rain-water (so at Masada and Machanah, Jos. Ant. xiv. 146, Rf vii. 62, Exochordos). A cistern in the temple is mentioned in Eccl. 2:6 (ἀποδοχείων): cp below, and see ST. A. BRZEN. In the towns it seems to have been customary for every house to possess a cistern (cp 2 K. 18:17 Prov. 3:13). The best example of this is found in Alisha's stele (Il. 24 f.); 'there was no cistern (כֶּסֶם) in the midst of the city in כֶּסֶם, and I said to all the people, "Make ye every man a cistern in the midst of his house." The same king records that he made כֶּסֶם בְּכָל הָעָר, 'the locks or dams of the reservoirs for water'; but whether כֶּסֶם (the cutting[s] of water) which Alisha made with the help of his Israelite prisoners was a conduit which fed these reservoirs is uncertain. The view is not improbable, however, since the art of forming channels to convey water was common to all the Semitic races and was not due to foreign influence.

Remains of conduits (כֶּסֶם, ἰδιωτῶν [BAQI], aqueducts), connected as a rule with pools, are to be found in many places in Palestine;

2. Conduits. they are usually mere trenches running along the surface of the ground, subterranean channels being somewhat rarer. Certain of the rock-cut channels and cisterns in Jerusalem (as well as the Siloam conduit) may be pre-exilic; in many cases, however, they have been enlarged or repaired to such an extent as to make it extremely difficult to tell to what period they belong.

Jerusalem was well supplied with water. Perhaps the most important of its supplies was that which came from the so-called Pools of Solomon beyond Bethlehem (13½ m. distant). These pools (situated close by the Kal'at el-Barak) are near 'Atan and Artas, and must have been devised for a more important work than that of merely irrigating gardens (Eccl. 2:6 Eccl. 2:13 f., see BATH-RAMM). There are three of them, partly hewn and partly enclosed by masonry. The lowest seems to have been used at one time as an amphitheatre for naval displays.

The pools are fed by two large conduits. The one, after cutting through the valley of 'Atan (Etam) by a tunnel, runs through the Wady Der el-Hemat, along the Wady el-Biär (Valley of Springs), and ultimately enters

1 As Robinson remarks (RR 1:480 ff.), 'the main dependence of Jerusalem at the present day is on its cisterns, and this has probably always been the case.'

2 The meaning is not certain: perhaps it is 'two reservoirs.'

3 The Heb. כֶּסֶם, alal, is used of ditches for irrigating trees (Ezek. 31:4 συστήματα or συστήματα [BAQI]), of a trench round an altar (1 K. 18:25 25:12); in these passages alal [1] thalatara [BAQI], and of conduits or aqueducts in the ordinary sense of the word (Job 38:25, פְּרוֹת [BBA] Is. 7:3 [om. BAQI] 2 K. 18:17 Is. 36:2 2 K. 20:20).

4 The name 'Solomon's Pools' is based solely upon Eccl. 2:6, and, notwithstanding the statement of Josephus, we have no evidence that the gardens of Solomon were situated in the Il. Artas (=hortus, garden?); Baed. (9) 129 f.

the Bar el-Derej (Spring of Steps). The other is much longer and full of windings. Starting from a large reservoir, the Bar el-Arrah (now converted into a garden), it leaves the Wady of the same name, and after crossing the plateau of 'Atan flows into the middle pool. Conduits connect also the Scaled Spring (mod. Ein Sa'ida), identified by a modern tradition with the Sayyid in Cant. 1:12, and the 'Am 'Atan with this water system.

From the Pools of Solomon the water is led into the city by two conduits. The higher goes along the N. slope of the valley of Barak, descending near Rachel's tomb and rising again. (A syphon was used and remnants of the pipes may still be seen.) It then proceeds towards the hill of 'Atan and the Wady Rababi (see HINNON, VALLEY etc.). It is partly rock-hewn and partly made of masonry. The lower conduit (still complete) goes with many windings from the lowest pool, E. along the slope of the valley, and then W. above Artas. One arm of the conduit was connected (probably under Herod's government) with the spring of Artas and ran to the Frank mountain. The main arm passes Bethlehem and Rachel's tomb on the S., proceeding sometimes above ground in a channel about 1 ft. square, and sometimes underground in earthen pipes. It then crosses the Hinnon valley by a bridge of nine low arches and meets the other conduit hard by the Bar el-Salam. It finally runs SE. and E. along the valley over the causeway, under the Bar el-Silsieh (hang-gate), and supplies the 'Elkas' and the king's cistern in the Hinnon. These conduits were repaired by the Sultan Muhammad ibn Kalan of Egypt about 1300 A.D. Their date is unknown. The upper conduit is more artificial, and probably the older. Some refer them to the golden age of Judaism, and traditional and Rabbinical ascribes them to Solomon. It has also been pointed out that they exactly resemble the conduits which were made by the Arabs in Spain.

The well-known Siloam conduit runs from the Virgin's Spring (Ein Sitti Maryam) to the Pool of Siloam (see JERUSALEM).

4. The Siloam Conduit. It runs underground in a circuitous course and is 530 yds. in length (the direct distance between the two pools is 368 yds.). At its lower end it has a height of 16 ft.; but this gradually decreases to 3½ ft., and then to 2½ ft. This low part, however, is near the surface, and perhaps was originally an open channel. It is a dangerous conduit to explore, as the water is apt to enter unexpectedly and fill the passage. In various places false-cuttings and set-backs are found, indicating subsequent changes in the direction taken by the workmen. About 19 ft. from the Siloam end, on the right-hand side as one enters, is an artificial niche which contained a

5. Siloam Inscription. tablet bearing on its lower face an inscription. This was first observed in 1880, and was brought under the notice of Schick. The tablet was about 27 inches square, and its top only one yard above the bottom of the channel. The inscription, known as the Siloam inscription, is the oldest

1 In the Jer. Talmud it is stated, moreover, that a conduit led from 'Atan (Etam) to the temple (Jer. Yoma, iii. fol. 41; cp Lightfoot, Descriptio Templi, chap. 20).

2 Many subterranean passages and structures have been found under the Haram. Cp Jos. Rf vi. 7:84 94, and Lucius: 'Templum in modum acis . . . fons perennis aquae, cavae sub terra montes, et piceae cisternaeque servandis imbricibus' (Hist. 5:12). Many of these were for removing the water and blood of the sacrifices, or for flushing the blood-banquets (cp Yoma, 50, Pesa'kim, 22, Me'ila, 33, Middoth, 33).

3 Jos., indeed, speaks of a conduit which Pilate began to build, taking funds for the purpose from the temple treasury and thereby causing grave disturbances (Jos. Ant. xviii. 32, Rf ix. 94), and in one place gives the length as 400 stadia—a measure which would suit the conduit which leads from the Wady 'Arrah. It is more probable, however, that Pilate simply repaired the existing conduits; his reign was so often disturbed by Jewish seditions that he could hardly have had time to carry out such an immense undertaking. See Schür. GT 1410, and cp Jos. Ant. x. 17.

4 More precisely, 1757 ft. (Conder); but Warren gives 1703.

It runs as follows: '(1) (Behold) the piercing through (פִּקְעוֹת). Now this was the manner of the piercing through. Whilst yet [the miners were] lifting up (עָלָה) the pick (פִּקְעוֹת) each towards his fellow, and whilst there were yet three cubits to be struck through, there was heard the voice of each man (עָלָה) calling to his fellow, for there was a fissure in the rock on the right hand (עָלָה). And on the day of the (4) piercing through, the hewers (פִּקְעוֹת) smote each so as to meet his fellow, pick against pick; and there flowed (עָלָה) the water from the channel (פִּקְעוֹת) to the pool (פִּקְעוֹת) (200) cubits; and a hundred (200) cubits was the height of the rock over the head of the hewers.'

The difference of level in the bed of the channel is so slight that one is led to suppose that the excavators had some kind of test. Shirts were made here and there, probably in order that the men might find out their whereabouts. The first shirt is 47 cubits long to the stream end. After that the passages straighten.

The conduit is the work of a people whose knowledge of engineering was in its infancy. Its date is uncertain. It may be the one referred to in 2 K. 20:21 (2 Ch. 32:6), but the allusion in Is. 8:6 to the 'waters of Shiloah that flow gently' suggests that it may have been in existence in the days of Hezekiah.

More or less parallel with this, but straighter, is a channel, evidently connected with the Birket Haimit (Red-pool), which lay to the E. of the Silwan pool. It is older than the Silwan conduit (see Schick, PEI 17, Jan. 1891).

The conduit of the upper pool in the highway of the fuller's field (2 K. 18:17) is identified by Wilson with the aqueduct which seems to have run over the Cotton Grotto to the convent of the Sisters of Zion.⁶ Among other conduits may be noted the one which connects the Citadel or Castle of David (al-Khata) with the Birket Manilla. It is possibly referred to in Jos. BJ v. 7.3, where mention is made of the 'gate where water was brought in to the tower of Hippicus' (the latter is usually identified with the NW. tower of the citadel).

For others, less important, see the memoirs of the PEF. Many ruins of conduits, more or less well preserved, have been found in other parts of Palestine. It will be sufficient to mention the aqueduct at Jericho across the Wady el-Kelt (see Jos. Ant. xii. 141; Schur, GEI 1:270); another on the road from Damascus to Ptolemais, not far from Jericho; the canal Furam, which crosses the Wady Zeila near Dabab (L. de la); and the aqueduct conveying water from 'Am et-Jabigha (Perrot) to the Art in Ind. 1:107; Bauw. 221).

(See 'Die Wasserversorgung der Stadt Jerusalem,' ZDPV 1:172-175 (1878); Ben-Zvi, Heb. Arch. 51 ff. 210 f.; Warren and Conder, Jerusalem; Perrot and Chipiez, Art in Ind.; Rail. passim, and the many notes and articles in the PEF publications.) S. A. C.

CONEY (פִּקְעוֹת), see SHAPHAN; ΧΟΙΡΟΓΡΥΑΛΙΟC [BAPI] [Th. and many MSS of LXX have ΛΑΓΩΟC in Ps. 104:13]. Lev. 11:5 [in G¹], unless the order of the verses is accidentally reversed, פִּקְעוֹת is translated δασύπους [Dt. 14:7 Ps. 104:13 Pr. 30:26] should rather be 'rock badger' (RV¹⁹⁰⁸), the animal having been identified with certainty as Hyrax syriacus—called in Syriac hī, dū and in Arabic qabīr (Roh. LBR 3:387, Tristram, PEP 1 f.).

³ So most, reading פִּקְעוֹת [פִּקְעוֹת]; but the surface of the rock is here only about 10 ft. above the top of the tunnel whilst towards the N. it is 170 ft. This reading may represent the average thickness of the rock. Since, however, at the place of juncture (315-13 ft. from the back of the Virgin's fountain) there is a difference of height of 10-11 inches another reading פִּקְעוֹת [פִּקְעוֹת], 'a portion' [of a cubit], has been proposed (cp. Sayce, loc. cit.).

⁷ The name thufan, which is almost the same word as פִּקְעוֹת, is stated by Fresnel (JRAS, 1838, p. 514) to have been found by him in use among the southern Arabs for the jerboa, an animal somewhat resembling the hyrax.

The origin of the Hebrew word is quite uncertain: it has been derived by Rödiger and others from a root meaning 'hide,' akin to פִּקְעוֹת. The rendering 'coney' (the probable meaning of the Paganic פִּקְעוֹת) is due to Jewish tradition, but habits of the rabbit do not suit the term in Ps. 104:13. Jerboa. See also Is. 14:14 for פִּקְעוֹת rendering χοιρογρυαλλίον, hōlōgōgōl.

The sharkhan of OT is known to naturalists under the name of Procyon (Hyrax) syriacus (Schub.). It is a member of the Hyracoidea, one of the most remarkable orders of the Mammalia.

The Syrian hyrax is about the size of a small rabbit, and a superficial resemblance to that rodent. It is of a dull orange-brown or tawny colour, and has prominent incisor teeth, one in the upper jaw and two in the lower; the former, as in rodents, grow throughout life, but instead of being chisel-shaped at their tips are pointed, and the teeth are triangular in section. As in the rodents, there is a wide gap between the incisor and the molar teeth. The zoological position of the order is obscure. Cuvier pointed out certain anatomical features which they share with the primates; but this relation has not been universally accepted, and at present it is better to regard them as an isolated order. Paleontology has so far thrown no light on the subject. About fourteen species of hyrax are known, all of them in Africa, Asia, and Syria. The P. (Hyrax) syriacus, like its congeners, lives in holes in rocky ground; usually in animals are found together, and they are very shy and frightened. When alarmed they utter a shrill cry and have a habit of retreat to their holes. According to Nassonow, they are omnivorous. They eat green leaves, fruit, &c. They are said to make a nest of grass and fur, and to bring forth from two to three to six—three seems the usual number—young at a time. The Arabs esteem them as food, though Canon Tristram found them 'rather dry and insipid.'

CONFECTION, CONFECTIONARIES (עֲשֵׂי, AV, 1 S. 8:13, 14), old words meaning a composition (Confection), or mixture of drugs or dainties, and those who prepare such mixtures—i.e., 'apothecaries' respectively. RV correctly translates: 'a perfume' (עֲשֵׂי) after the art of the perfumer (עֲשֵׂי). In 1 S. 8:13 female perfumers are meant (עֲשֵׂי, μυροφῶι, unguentarie). It is the masc. pl. of the same word (עֲשֵׂי) that is rendered 'apothecaries' in EV (RV¹⁹⁰⁸ 'perfumers') in Neh. 3:8 (עֲשֵׂי [1 S.], μυροφῶι [A.V.], μυροφῶι [1 S.], μυροφῶι).

CONFESS, CONFESSION. The verb פָּקַד in Hiph. and Hithp. means either to acknowledge aloud in prayer and Hithp. worship God's great and glorious at 1. The term. Praises (=to praise him) or to make solemn confession of sin.

The former meaning is far the commoner in Hiph., the latter in Hithp. (a) For פָּקַד 'to confess,' see Ps. 32:5 Prov. 28:13 (b) for פָּקַד 'to praise,' 2 Ch. 20:22 (RV) 'making confession' For the more usual senses, see (a) Ps. 7:17 [15] 42:6 1 Ch. 16:10 and elsewhere, (b) Lev. 23:14 24:20 Nu. 15:27 Ezra 10:1 N. 16:2 f. Dan. 9:420. Note also that the noun פָּקַד, generally 'thanksgiving,' has in Job. 7:14 Ezra 10:11 the sense of 'confession' (of sin). עֲשֵׂי renders the verb usually by ἐξομολογέω (ἐξομολογέω), once by ἐμολογέω; it never renders the noun ἐμολογία.

No doubt there is primitive Semitic symbolism in the choice of פָּקַד to express the religious act of confession; but here, as elsewhere, we painfully feel the uncertainty of the subject (cp. Lag. Or. 2:22). The root-meaning of the verb is 'to throw,' or perhaps (cp. Ar. qadā and פָּקַד, Is. 11:8) 'to extend.' Some peculiar gesture used in confession seems to be indicated (cp. BDI, s.v. פָּקַד). In 1 K. 8:33 'spreading forth the hands' is specified, but this was simply the ordinary gesture in prayer.

Individual confession of sin must be assumed to have been common, though references to it are scanty. Josh. 7:19 is a passage by itself: Achishai is bound to confess, to 'give glory to God,' thereby to the all-seeing God; but he is not forgiven. Prov. 28:13 that not Ps. 32:5, where pious Israel speaks) extols the benefit of it. 1 K. 8:33 virtually refers to it. When God touches the heart of

¹ That this and not jerboa (as supposed by Rödiger) is the meaning of the Greek word is made certain by the testimony of Suidas and Hesychius; see also Ducange, s.v.

When an animal of the herd (כֶּלֶב) or of the flock (צֶמֶד; see further, Lev., § 11, and Sederim) was to be prepared for food it was first slaughtered according to the prescribed method, and the carcass thoroughly cleaned of its blood. For skinning, flint knives (פְּרִיזִי) (Judg. 13:19) were used in early times (p. Josh. 2:26, RV "knives of flint"; such as those recovered from Tell-Hesi (Bliss, op. cit. 1914, illustr. 190). Sacred knives were later known as כְּסָפִים (Lev. 1:10, cp. post-biblical כְּסֵפִי, a knife for ordinary domestic purposes was קַדְמִי (Lev. 24:21, in later Hebrew always קֶדֶם). The animal was then cut up, the technical term for which was שָׁחַ (Lev. 16:2 and often) a single piece שֶׁטֶף the priests removed the portions that were then due and the remainder was consigned to the pot. The latter, if of copper, had in later times to be scrupulously scoured (שָׁחַ) and rinsed (קָדַח, Zehab, 11:17, cp. Mk 7:4) when the cooking was over.

The primitive hearth was formed of a couple of stones by which the pot was supported, room being left beneath for the kindling.

4. Firing. Beneath for the fuel, wood or dung (see Qovv., § 2). Large pots might be placed on the top of the tannur or looking over, as at the present day, such an arrangement was found to have been in use in the ancient Lachish (see ibid., p. 107). The smaller pots were heated on a chafin dish or pan containing charcoal (עֲרֵב עֵצִים, Zeich 126 AV 'neath of fire,' RV 'pan of fire'), as in Rameses' kitchen. In Lev 11:13 there is mention, alongside of the tannur or oven, of the kizmor (כִּזְמוֹר, Asphorodes [Bl.], χυτροπόδες [Al.]; LV 'range' for pots, RVMS 'stew pan'). According to the Talmud, it was a portable cooking stove, capable of holding two pots (beneath the dish) as distinguished from the kuffah (כֻּפָּה, better עֲרֵב, a stove which had room for only one pot (Jastrow, ibid., c. v.). Like the tannur, it was of baked clay, and, therefore, easily broken (cp. De. 22:16, and Now. II 12:26, n.). The kerach (in the sing.) and the kuffah are frequently mentioned together in the Mishna (see esp. Kel'ah). For carrying the necessary charcoal a ladle or neqan (נֶקָאן) was used (Ex. 27:138; in Num. 16:6 # 'censer'; Abd 2:27); for stirring and adjusting it, a pair of tongs (מְחַבְּתִים Is. 66:15; שִׁפְפִּים shafpim, patrum), for removing the ashes, are mentioned, but only in connection with the great altar (see Av. ar., § 4).

The fellows (ἑταῖροι, ἑταίροι [B&M]) of Jeroboam was probably used only by the metal smelters - for a description and illustration, see Wilkinson, op. cit. 2:12. The ordinary housewife was content to tan the charcoal with a tin (ἑταῖροι, ἑταίροι 167) of leathers, as pictured in the representation of Rameses' kitchen referred to above.

5. Cooking utensils. Any attempt at consistency: pan, kettle, cauldron, pot (in this order is the list given in U.S. 244). The data at our command do not permit of these being accurately distinguished one from another. In the houses of the poor they were in. The spoons (2221) mentioned among the furniture of the table of Shewahad (1 x 25) and elsewhere were more probably shallow bowls. We find however, in the Mishna, real spoons (2778) made of bone (Shabb. 8.6, Kil. 17.2) and of glass (Kil. 30.3). There is also mention of a wooden cooking 'bowl' (לֶחֶם Zach. 1.7), which was probably used for removing the scum (עֲרֹסָה Lev. 21.6, so AV); but this word is more probably 'crust' (as KV) from the contents of the farin or pot (otherwise explained by Lev. 11.7, 21.6).

1. For boiling meat in the vessels were employed (Ex 18:24; 12:1). The method for cooking mentioned is the šg, i.e. pot or cauldron. It was used for cooking the ordinary food (e.g. 1 K 17:1; Mic 3:18; 16:1) [fish pots of 1 K 17:1] and for boiling the ceremonial dishes (Zech 11:16). It served to cook washpots (1 K 60:13). If it may have been one of the largest of the cooking vessels, to judge from the amount recorded in 2 K 18:27, it is the great pot for the whole company of the prophets. (a) The šg (עֲרֹסָה) may have been a wide, shallow pot of earthenware, since at the same time it is given to the liver of beef (1 K 60:1) at which the priests were to wash their hands and feet. It served as a chafing dish (Zech 12:1). When in the šg (עֲרֹסָה) differed from the šg (עֲרֹסָה) in which the manna was boiled (Nu 11:18; RV) and the šg (עֲרֹסָה) for fish (Lev 11:9), and to the šg (עֲרֹסָה) (Mic 3:18), we do not know.

6. Roasting. In the mode of cooking flesh meat, there need be no contradiction in saying that roasting also was practised from the earliest times. In its most primitive form, roasting, as we have seen, consists in laying the meat directly on the ashes or other source of heat, or better killed on the ground or in a pit specially dug (Birkbeard, A. G. G. Lys. Roli ZK [41], I, 1, 3). The fish of which the disciples partook by the lake of Galilee was cooked by being laid on the charcoal (βράζον ἐπὶ κάρβουνο, in 21a).

The spit, the ḡṣṣ of the Homeric poems, is not mentioned, as it happens, in the OI; but of its use there need be no doubt. In Egypt, Irfan tells us, 'the favourite national dish, the goose, was generally roasted over live embers; the spit is very primitive, a stick stuck through the back and neck of the bird. They roasted fish in the same way, sticking the spit through the tail' (Z. f. N. O., 181, illustr. 1, and Weik, 235). The wooden spit was favoured by the Romans (cp Verg. Georg. 2. 96, 'Pinguine in Arvulus torrens'), appears to be corrupt, the emendation '𐤀𐤍𐤔𐤌, 'a piece of fish,' has been suggested by Cheyne. This easy alteration suits the context.]

bimbs extra columnis).¹ Later Hebrew legislation, in fact, no doubt, perpetuating an ancient practice, required that the Passover lamb should be roasted on a spit of pomegranate (קֶשֶׁת עֵץ רִמּוֹן [Levy, קֶשֶׁת] Lev. 7:10). The ordinary spit, being of iron, so much we may infer from the demand that a spit purchased from an idolater must be cleansed in the fire (1k. 16:17, 18:22) was not allowed for the above-mentioned purpose; neither was the gridiron (קֶשֶׁת, Lev. 7:2). The spit, we may suppose, rested on andirons¹ (pāra, para), on which it could be turned by the hand.

The passage of the treatise Yabhim above referred to speaks further of roasting, or more exactly of broiling, on a gridiron placed apparently over the mouth of a furnace or baking oven. The gridiron was perhaps used to prepare the piece of broiled fish (אֶחָדֹם אוֹפֶּיִם) of 1k. 21:42. Not only flesh and fish but also eggs, onions, etc., were roasted by the Jews (Shabb. 11c).

The favourite mode of roasting meat for ordinary household purposes at the present day in Syria is by means of skewers. The meat is cut into small pieces, which are stuck upon the skewers and roasted over a brazier. Meat thus prepared is termed kabab.

With regard to the food-products of the vegetable kingdom (see 1:009), many vegetables were of course eaten raw (אֶחָדֹם, in Hebrew אֶחָדֹם, literally

'living,' a word applied not only to raw animal flesh [1 & 2:15 Lev. 13:10 ff.], but also to fish (Nedar. 64), to vegetables [1k. 1], and even to unmixed wine). They were also cooked by being boiled, alone or mixed with various ingredients, such as oil and spices. The Hebrew housewives, we may be sure, were not behind their modern kinsfolk of the desert, of whom Doughty testifies that 'the Arab housewives make savoury messes of any grain, seething it and putting therein only a little salt and sumn' (A. D. 2:193). Thus, of the cereals, the obscure Arishah (אֶרֶשֶׁת, Num. 15:20 f.) was probably a porridge of barley groats (see, further, 1:009, § 1), whilst Jacob sold for himself a dish (אֶרֶשֶׁת, EV 'pottage') of lentils (Gen. 25:29, 31); the same name is given to the vegetarian dish prepared for the sons of the prophets (2 K. 4:38 ff.; cp Hagg. 2:12). In NT times, at least, it was known that the pulses or pod-plants were improved by being soaked (אֶרֶשֶׁת before being boiled). Various kinds, such as beans and lentils, might be boiled together (Abith. 17), they might also, like our French beans, be boiled in the pods (אֶרֶשֶׁת). In the OT we find mention of the makhsath (מַחְשֶׁת, קֶשֶׁת אֶרֶשֶׁת, AV 'pan,' RV 'baking-pan,' mg 'flat plate,' Lev. 25:62 [14], etc.) and the marbesheth (מַרְבֶּשֶׁת, LV 'baking pan,' Lev. 27:70). The makhsath certainly (see Lock, 40), and the marbesheth probably, was of iron; and, although both are used with reference only to the sacrificial cakes (see BARNUM, VTS, BUL. VII), we may legitimately infer from the fact that the martyrs of 2 Marc. 7 were roasted alive on the קֶשֶׁת אֶרֶשֶׁת (17:35; cp late Heb. word קֶשֶׁת) that both may have been used also in the preparation of meat.

To judge from the prepositions employed (עַל, 'on,' and בְּ, 'in'), the makhsath was deeper than the marbesheth. This inference is confirmed by the tradition, which we find in the Mishna, that the difference between the marbesheth and the makhsath consisted in the former having a lid (מִשְׁכָּה) while the latter had none; (1) which another authority adds that the former is deep and its contents fluid, the latter flat and its contents firm (Nedar. 68). The makhsath, in short, was a stewpan, the marbesheth similar to a Scotch 'girdle,' a flat iron plate on which cakes are baked. A striking illustration of Lock, 13 is furnished by Doughty (D. Des. 150a), who describes an iron-plated dish in the castle of Haid: 'the plates (in the indigence of their arts) are the shield-like iron pans (tannur) upon which the Syrian housewives bake their girdle-bread.'

Other utensils named or implied are (a) the stove,

μαψιθ (קֶשֶׁת, Is 30:23; Shabb. 82, Aboth. 5:15), for sifting the flour, and (b) the strainer, makhsath (קֶשֶׁת) (Shabb. 201, Ab. 5:1), [especially for wine]; cp 1k. 21:6, Mt. 23:24. An ordinary bowl, however, might be perforated so as to serve as a strainer, as we see from the pottery of Tell el-Hesi (Bloss, op. cit. 85). The c may be added (a) one of the commonest of the post-biblical terms for a pot, קֶשֶׁת; hence קֶשֶׁת אֶרֶשֶׁת came to signify 'cooked food' (Nedar. 61). For the vessels used for serving food, see Mt. vi. 8, § 8.

The importance of oil in the Hebrew kitchen will be noticed under Oil (2:13). In early times the custom

8. Condiments. so popular among the modern Arabs of boiling flesh in milk seems to have prevailed among the Hebrews. The oldest legislation confirmed by the Deuteronomist limited this practice so far as to forbid (for reasons that are still obscure: 10:14, § 13, and see MAYOT, SACRIFICIUM) the seething of a kid in its mother's milk (Ex. 23:19, 34:26 Dt. 14:21). In NT times this prohibition had been extended to beef, as its original intention.

Thus we read in the Mishna: 'It is forbidden to seethe (Sg.) any sort of flesh in milk, except the flesh of fish and locusts'; it is also forbidden to set flesh upon the table along with cheese (with the same exceptions, Khull. n. 81). It was still debated whether the prohibition applied to fowls and game or only to cattle, sheep, and goats (ib. 4). In the course of time, however, it became part of the Jewish dietary law, that two distinct sorts of cooking utensils—one for meat alone, and another for dishes into the preparation of which milk or butter enters—are required in every orthodox Jewish kitchen (see on this law of 2:272, esp. Warner, The Jew. Synagogue. 41-120 [1951]). Extreme purists have gone the length of using three (ib. 115, 9) and even four such sets.

COOS. or rather, as in RV and 1 Marc. 15:21 EV, Cos (ΚΩΣ; now Samchia, i.e., ες την Κω), the least and most southerly of the four principal islands off the coast of Asia Minor. It lies at the entrance to a deep bay, on the two projecting promontories of which were Cnidus and Halicarnassus. It owed its fertility to its volcanic origin, and its commercial importance to its position. It lies on the high road of all maritime traffic between the Dardanelles and Cyprus; vessels coasting in either direction must pass within half a mile of the capital (also called Cos), which was on the E. extremity of the island, and had a good anchorage and a port sheltered from all winds except those from the S.W. Lucian (Phar. 824) thus sketches the usual route of ships:—

Rudit saxa Sami; spirat de litore Cos
Anch' hinc; Cnidion unde fugit, Caramque relinquit Sole Rhodon.*

In precise agreement with this is the account of Paul's voyage from Macedonia to Palestine (Acts 21:1). His ship ran before the wind (εὐεδρομεῖσας) from Miletus about 40 m. to the N., down to Cos (2:1), either the island or the capital; probably the latter is meant, next day it reached Rhodes.

In spite of its geographical advantages, Cos remained historically unimportant. Its inhabitants, apparently of deliberate choice, eschewed foreign relationships, and devoted themselves to the development of internal resources. No colonies were sent out, for long the capital was in the west of the island, the strategic and commercial importance of its present site was ignored until 306 B.C. When at last the Coans were compelled to emerge from their seclusion, it was only to echo the voice of Rhodes in all matters of foreign policy. The success of this concentration of energy is indicated by the fact that Cos ranked with Rhodes, Chios, Samos, and Lesbos as one of the μακροπολις (Diod. Sic. 30:182), and by the existence of the saying, 'He who cannot thrive in Cos will do no better in Egypt'. Allied with this material prosperity was the development of liberal arts. Under the Ptolemies Cos became an important literary centre. With it are connected the names of Theocritus the poet, Dioscorus the historian, Apelles the painter, and, of an earlier date (4th cent. B.C.), Hippocrates the physician. Cos was one of the great centres of the worship of Æsculapius, and of the case or medical school of Asclepiade. Claudius in A.D. gave the island the privilege of immunity, mainly for its medical fame (Tac. Ann. 12:61).

COPPER

Among the commercial products of the island were inguents, two kinds of wine, pottery (amphora Coss. Pliny, II, 3, 160), and silk for Roman ladies (sera purpurea, Hor., Od. iv, 1314; sera torques, Tibull., ii, 15). Cos is still an active port. Strabo (637) notes the fair aspect of the city to one entering the roads.

Interesting is the connection of Cos with the Jews. As Mithradates seized 800 talents deposited in the island by the Jews of Asia (Jos., Ant. xiv, 72), there must then have been a Jewish settlement there engaged in banking. In 1 Macc. 15:21 Cos is mentioned in the list of places to which the epistula letter of the Roman senate in favour of the Jews (c. 130-8 B.C.) is said to have been addressed. In 80 B.C. Gaius Fannius wrote to the Roman authorities enclosing a senatus consultum to secure safe convey for Jewish pilgrims to Jerusalem. The island was connected also with Herod the Great (Jos., Ant. 21:6), and with his son Antipas (Boeckh, 2502).

COPPER (נְחֹשֶׁת; χαλκός; cp BRASS). The compound of copper and zinc that we call brass appears to have been little known to the ancients.

1. In Egypt. But we have abundant evidence that copper was early known, and that it was hardened by means of alloys into bronze. Senclern, a conquering pharaoh of the fourth dynasty, worked the Sinitic copper mines, and M. de Morgan has found some articles of copper in the tomb of Menes (traditionally regarded as the first king of Egypt), explored by him in 1887. M. Amelinckx appears to have proved that copper was known at an even earlier date, and from his researches, and those of Mr. Quibell at Kom el-Ahmar, we may probably conclude that the Pharaonic Egyptians were from the first not ignorant of the use of gold and copper (hent). Thence in the Sinitic dynasty continued to be the chief source from which the Egyptians drew their copper (see Maspero, Diogenes of Cos, 355, and cp SINAI); but in the twentieth century they obtained it also from Asia (i.e., CYPRUS) (see Ant. Lib., 25 and 27), where Cosula has found both copper and bronze coins in Pharaonic remains.

The oldest Babylonian specimens of copper are those found by M. de Saurat at Tello (before 2500 B.C.), at Tell es-Su, in the same neighbourhood.

2. In Babylonia. Mr. Loftis has found even a large copper factory (1500-1600). In Babylonian graves, and also in what Dr. J. P. Peters calls a jeweller's shop (at Nippur), objects made of copper (belonging to cheta 1000 B.C.) have been found. Hommel thinks, on philological grounds, that the Sinitic Babylonians as metallurgists were pupils of the Sumerians, and dates their acquaintance with copper and non very early.² The inscriptions make frequent mention of copper (upara) and bronze³ (urru, also klu, and urudu; cp Lat. cuprum as intectum). The ancient hymn in Sumerian and Assyrian to Gaba, the fire-god, extols him for his services in the mixing of copper and tin (cp Tula-cum, and see UNTERS, § 100). The Assyrians used bronze axes as late as the ninth century. They derived their copper and bronze largely from the so-called N'ini countries; ultimately, their gold from Armenia; the copper in the tribute paid to Hammurabi III. by Dariusus is mentioned elsewhere (H. 10:4).

The Canaanites, naturally enough, were well acquainted with copper. According to Ritter (Früh, 17:103), cited by Knobel, there are still traces of ancient copper-mines in the Lebanon.⁴

3. In Canaan. Händers-Petrie also ascribes Winkler's identification of Ashtar in Am. Lat. with Cyprus (where copper was worked). See his account, Nova et Vetera, 44 (92).

COPPER

this is confirmed by what seems to be an assertion of the fact in De S. and Zee 6:1 (see below, § 31). On the E. of the Lebanon range copper must have been abundant in the 'land of Nuhassi' (De S., 1:1), which Halevy ingeniously identifies with ZORAH, and in later times there were copper mines in Edom at Phemon, or Phemon (p. 1108). The Phoenicians early employed bronze for works of art, and the great mound of Tell el-Hesi, believed to be a fish, proves that the Amorites who dwelt there had used their opportunities. In the remains of the Amurite city (perhaps 1500 B.C.) there are later rough weapons of war, made of copper, without admixture of tin; above this, dating perhaps from 1250 to 1000, appear bronze tools, but the bronze gradually becomes scarcer, its place being taken by iron (see below). Whatever, therefore,

4. In Israel. be the date of 1 S. 17, as a document, we may feel inclined to think that the Philistine warriors had armour of bronze, indeed, the Philistines in Asa Minor doubtless had bronze weapons long before David's time.⁵ Goliath, however, uses weapons of attack made of iron (the saḥar [?]) of bronze can hardly be a javelin (see God 1:111).

The statement in Josh. 24:11 (copper or bronze vessels found in Jericho) will be in the main correct, also that in 2 S. 8:1, in as far as it relates to the abundance of bronze in Syria. Whether the serpent of bronze called NEPHTHYS [?], was earlier than the temple of Solomon may, perhaps, be doubted. At any rate, the notice in Nu. 21:9 (H.) is as much of an anachronism as that in Ex. 38:2 (cp). The Israelites in the wilderness had no workers in bronze. Nor could David find a competent bronze-worker in all Israel, the statements respecting Hiram the artificer in 1 K. 7:13 ff. are no doubt historical.⁶ In the later regal period it was, of course, quite otherwise (cp Jer. 6:27; Ezek. 22:2-4). From 2 K. 25:17, Jer. 52:17 ff. we learn that the Babylonians broke the sacred vessels of bronze and carried away the metal to Babylon; no doubt Rehoboam's shields of 'brass' (1 K. 11:27; 2 Ch. 12:1) went there too; but the chief losses were probably repaired. The cymbals in the second temple were certainly of copper or bronze, as we may infer from 1 Ch. 15:19 Jos. 4:6; vii, 12 (cp 1 Cor. 13:1). Gates of 'brass' are mentioned in Ps. 147:18, 150 (cp Herod. 1:1, 2, 3; see Mr. Pinches' account of the bronze gates of Palmyra); among implements of 'brass' in Eccles. 4:8; 10:11; Jer. 1:17.

But 'brass' (bronze) should be used to symbolize hardness and strength is natural. In time of drought, it seemed as if the heavens were bronze,

5. OT usage. so that iron could pass through them (Job 28:1), or as if the earth were bronze, so that it could never be softened as in (Job 28:1). A sufferer asks if his 'flesh' (i.e., body) is of brass (Job 6:6), as the bones of Elisha are (Job 19:23) and the crowd of disobedient Israel (Is. 54:10). By other writers, said to be, 'To be compared with brass is not, however, the highest distinction. It was the third engine in Neuchadrezzar's vision that was of 'brass' (Dan 2:31 cp 1:32). On the other hand, 'brass' in the obscure phrase 'mountains of brass' (Zen. 1:1) has no symbolic meaning: 'brass' (i.e., copper) is merely mentioned to enable the reader to identify the mountains (cp Nuhassi, the 'copperland', see § 3).

Does not as the passage is, we need not despair of explaining it. The 'mountains of brass' are parallel to the 'mountains sapient, great mountain of copper'; also Sargon, Ann. 23, where Ena sapina, 'the great mountain', is spoken of as containing mines (cp 1:10).

COR (כֶּרֶךְ, perh. Ass. kāry [?], Mass-Arnolt, s.v.), or from כֶּרֶךְ; see No. 211/10 10:74 [26], a measure of capacity—can, homer (10 ephahs or baths); of wheat and barley (1 K. 4:22 [52]; EV 'measure,' mg. 'cor'; 2 Ch. 21:9 [27:5]; RV⁹⁸ 'cors'). As a liquid measure Ezek. 45:14. 2 K. 6:25 (emended text) speaks of $\frac{1}{4}$ cor of carobs (see HCSKs).

In 1 K. 5:11 [25] 'measures of oil' is wrong; read כֶּרֶךְ 'baths of oil,' after ḥ and 2 Ch. 26: κορες [BA], a loan-word, which in ḥ represents both כֶּרֶךְ and כֶּרֶךְ, occurs once in NT (Lk. 16:7 RV⁹⁸ 'cors'; AV⁹⁸ says 'about 4 bushels and a pottle'). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CORAL is EV's rendering in Job 28:18 Ezek. 27:16 of קַרְלִיּוֹן, a word of unknown origin, which occurs also in Prov. 21:7, where EV treats it as a derivative of קָרַח, meaning 'too high.' Most commentators, however (Hitz., Siegf., Sta., etc.), suppose that there is a reference to a precious object called ramoth—as if the wise man meant, 'Wisdom is as much out of the food's reach as coral.' Neither explanation is satisfactory.²

The word occurs only twice, and, since the Vss. shed an uncertain light on the meaning, we must be content to make the most of internal evidence.

Ezek. has καμαθ [BQ], καμαθ [A], corium; Job has μετέωρα [BAC Theod.], δρόμα [Syn.], evēlāt; Prov. has σοφία καὶ ἐννοια ἀγαθή ἐν πύλαις [BAM] for קַרְלִיּוֹן כְּסֵף וְכֶסֶף כְּסֵף וְכֶסֶף [Vg., evēlāt].³

The context in Job (ramoth, gōbīl, penim) shows that some precious and ornamental substance is intended, and Dillmann infers from the language that ramoth was regarded as less valuable than penim (see below). According to MT of Ezek. 27:16, ramoth, with nōphēk, argamān, riknūth, bug, and kadikāth, was brought into the Tyrian market by merchants of Syria; but probably (see Cornill, ad loc.) we should read for Aram (אַרָם) Edom (עֲדָם);⁴ as Cornill remarks, Edom was an important stage in the transport of merchandise westward from S. Arabia and India. This last indication of the provenance of ramoth makes against the usual rabbinic rendering, 'coral'; for the red coral of commerce—the hard calcareous skeleton of the colonial Actinozoön, Coralium nobile, Pal. (rubrum, Da Costa), which is widely distributed in the Mediterranean and the Atlantic as far as the Cape Verde Islands, and is a considerable source of wealth in the Mediterranean basin—occurs in its natural state much less frequently S. and E. of Suez.

2. In RV⁹⁸ 'corals' (Lam. 4:7), 'red coral,' and 'pearls' (Job 28:18 Prov. 3:15 8:11 20:15 31:10) are suggested as renderings alternative to 'rubies' (see RUBY, 1) for עֲדָם penim.

2. Penim perhaps coral. Certainly 'rubies' is not a good rendering. The words, 'the catching' (עֲדָם; EV, improbably, 'price') of wisdom is above that of rubies, in Job 28:13, would seem to imply that a fishery was in the case, and if two of our best critics may be followed, the nobles of Jerusalem are described in Lam. 17 as 'purer than snow whiter than milk, more rudely than branches of penim' (i.e., obviously, of coral).² Another reference to penim, of considerable interest, occurs in Ps. 15:11 [15:11] where we should no doubt read עֲדָם for עֲדָם; the whole line should perhaps run, 'on her neck is a wreath of penim' (see (ib. Ps. 2) ad loc.).

² Bickell: 'If thou hold thy peace (שָׁמֵת) before a fool, thou art wise.'

In the somewhat obscure question as to identification of the substance or substances intended by ramoth and penim, it ought not to be overlooked that certain stones valued by the ancients seem to have been named from the resemblance to coral. Pliny, before passing from the onyx and alabaster group, speaks of a valuable 'coralline stone' found in Asia, of a white hue, somewhat approaching that of ivory, and in some degree resembling it (Hist. 36:13), also of corallis, a native of India and Syria resembling minium in appearance; and of coralline or coral-agate, commonly found in Crete, and the called the 'sacred' agate, similar to coral, and spotted all over, like the sapphire, with drops of gold (37:54 56). CORBAN (κορβάν [Ti.], κορβάν [WII], Mk. 7:11 translation of Heb. קָרְבָן, an offering;¹ explained by δωρον, 'gift' (cp Mt. 15:5; similarly Jos. Ant. 1:44: κορβάν), a kind of votive offering; an object devoted to the deity, and therefore tabooed.² Josephus (l.c.) uses the word in speaking of the Nazirites who were dedicated to God as a corban, and of the temple treasure which was inviolable (Ant. 11:94; l.c. τὸν ἱερὸν θησαυρὸν καλεῖται δὲ κορβανᾶς; cp Mt. 27:6 κορβανᾶς). These phrases, among foreign oaths, especially quotes the corban as one belonging to the Jews, which was forbidden to the Tyrians (cp Jos. c. Ap. 1:22, § 167). It is easy to see that by interdicting himself by a vow a man was able to refrain from using or giving away any particular object, and might thus evade any troublesome obligation. Several abuses crept in (cp Nat. 56), and, in the passage cited (Mk. 7:11 cp Mt. 15:5), Jesus denounces a system which allowed a son, by pronouncing the word 'corban' (and thus vowing a thing to God), to relieve himself of the duty of helping a parent. Cp comment on Mt. 15: Mk. 7:11, and especially L. Cappellus on Mt. 15:5; al. PRE⁹⁸ 5:12.

CORBE (χορβε [BA]), 1 Esd. 5:12. AV = Ezra 2:13 ZAC CAL.

CORD. There is no scarcity of Hebrew terms to denote cord of one kind or another.

Among the commonest words are חֶבֶל hēvel (s' to bind), and יֵתֶר yether (s' to stretch), both used of cords or ropes for drawing, hauling (cp 2 S. 17:13 EV 'rope'; 1 S. 33:20 J. 4:21⁹ and of ship's tackle; see SHIP, TERT, § 3. Yether (cp in Judg. ceppā), which seems to denote rather 'gut,' and its derivative חֶבֶל, are used also specially of hawsstrings (Ps. 11:21:12 [13]). Less frequent terms are: חֵט hāt (s' to sew)

² The common rendering is '... more rudely in body than penim' (cp EV). But 'in body' (עֲדָם) appears superfluous here; whereas if we transpose the preposition, and read '... instead of ḥ עֲדָם, we get a good sense (see above). ḥ thus represents either עֲדָם or עֲדָם. See En. and Bickell, ad loc.

³ In P of the Hexateuch it is the comprehensive term for offerings 'presented' to God, bloody or bloodless; see also Ezek. 20:28 10:43.

CORINTH

In conformity with his principle of seeking the centres of communal activity, Paul visited Corinth in his departure from Athens (Acts 18:1). For the importance of this step as regards the development of Paul's missionary designs, see PAUL. Converts were made chiefly among the gentiles, of the poorer class (Acts 18: 2 Cor. 12:13), although some Jews believed (see CRISTUS); and some persons of importance (see ERASTUS, GAIUS), thus also of Cor. 9. The accession of Crispus and Gaius was a landmark that Paul forsook his rule of baptizing them with his own hand (1 Cor. 14:29). He lays special stress upon his claim to be regarded as the founder of the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 3:16). His claim is not contradicted by 2 Cor. 11:13, who was reached only by me, and Silvanus and Timotheus, for

CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE

2 Cor. is addressed to the Christians of Achaia generally as well as to the Corinthians, while 1 Cor. is written more especially to the church of Corinth.

The apostle spent eighteen months in Corinth on this occasion (A.D. 1841). On his next record (A.D. 1842) he stayed three months (Acts 20:1). On a supposed intermediate visit to Corinth and on the correspondence that took place, see CORINTHIANS, §§ 9/1, 13. On the character of Paul's teaching see below, and esp. PART, APOLLOS.

As to the effect of Paul's letters and presence the NT gives no information; but the letter of Clement, written, perhaps, about 97 A.D., shows that the moral tone of the Corinthian church improved, though the friction between parties continued, as indeed we should expect from the social conditions obtaining in such a city. Hegesippus visited the church about 137 A.D., and was favourably impressed by the obedience and liberality of its members, and the activity of its bishop Dionysius (Euseb. Hist. iv. 22).

The two epistles written to the Corinthians are remarkable for the variety of their local colouring. The illustrations are drawn chiefly from gentile life: the wild beast fight (1 Cor. 15:32); the stadium and boxing match (1 Cor. 9:24-27); the theatre (1 Cor. 14:7-9); the garden of Lullman pine, the prize in the games (1 Cor. 9:25); the idol festivals (1 Cor. 8:1, 10:25-27); the essitia, so common a feature of Greek social life (1 Cor. 10:27).

W. J. W.

CORINTHIANS, Epistle to see 1. It will be unnecessary to repeat here the familiar story of the founding of the church at Corinth, which is elsewhere set in its place in the life of the apostle (see PART). According to the scheme of chronology adopted in this article it would fall in the years 50-52 A.D. (48-50 Harnack, 52-54 Lightfoot, otherwise von Soden; see CHRONOLOGY, § 71). In the spring of the latter year Paul left Corinth. Aquila and Priscilla accompanied him as far as Ephesus, where they stayed behind while he went on to Jerusalem. This journey and the visit to the Galatian churches (Acts 18:9) would take up the whole of the later spring or summer of A.D. 52, and it would not be until the autumn of that year that the apostle returned to Ephesus.

In the meantime events had moved at Corinth. The Alexandrian Jew Apollus, by this time an instructed Christian, had gone thither and his preaching had a great effect. Other teachers were at work there in a spirit less friendly to Paul. Factions were formed, and, when Paul wrote his first extant letter to the Corinthians some two years later, had begun to make serious mischief. The apostle was now settled at Ephesus, which, on an average voyage, would not be more than a sail of a week or ten days from Corinth.¹ News would thus pass easily to and fro; and Paul was evidently kept well informed of what passed at Corinth. At least one earlier letter of his has been lost to us (1 Cor. 5:9), unless, as some have thought, a fragment of it remains embedded in 2 Cor. 6:14-7:1 (on this view, which should probably on the whole be rejected, see below, § 13). The purport of the letter, which the Corinthian Christians somewhat misunderstood, was to warn them against intercourse with immoral heathen. When we remember the laxity of Corinthian morals we cannot be surprised that other and graver aberrations of this kind had taken place among them. The state of things disclosed by some of the apostle's visitors at Ephesus, notably by members of the familia of a lady called Chloë (1 Cor. 1:11), gave him so much anxiety that he took pen in hand to write our First Epistle. At the same time he replied to a series of questions put to him in a letter which he had received (perhaps through Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus: 1 Cor. 16:17) from the church at Corinth. These two things—the replies which he had heard of disorders in the church, and a certain definite inquiry put to him—account satisfactorily for the contents of the First Epistle (see below, §§ 14, 100). So far all is clear, except perhaps as to the exact date at which the epistle was sent, though it may be placed provisionally about Easter of A.D. 55. There is also no doubt as to the general nature of the circumstances under which our Second Epistle was sent. The interval which separated it from the First Epistle cannot have been very long. It may be assigned to the late autumn (about November) of the same year.¹ From some cause or other, it is clear, the anxiety of the apostle had increased, and had indeed reached a pitch of great and painful tension. The return of Titus, whom he had sent to Corinth, relieved him of this, and he warmly expresses his satisfaction. Then he turns to the practical question of the collection which he was organizing for the poor Christians at Jerusalem. Before the letter is concluded, however, he comes back (in the text as we have it) to his opponents and writes again with no little emotion about them. This letter was written on the way to Corinth, probably from Macedonia, and the apostle is about to pay to the church a visit which he repeatedly calls his third (2 Cor. 12:14, 13:1).

This brief outline, however, evokes a number of difficulties.

Considered quite broadly and generally, the course of events is clear enough; but, when we attempt to fix the incidents in detail, difficulties spring up at every step. The questions which arise are also exceedingly intricate, so that to state them satisfactorily is no easy matter. They have nearly all been brought out by the research of the last five-and-twenty years; and we shall perhaps scarcely best in threading our way through them by taking the several steps—leaving if not exactly chronological, at least by which they may be supposed to have arisen.

The data which we take over from the First Epistle are: (1) the existence of an active opposition to Paul on the part not only of unbelieving Jews but also of certain sections of Judaizing Christians at Corinth; and (2) the occurrence in the church there of a gross case of what we should describe as incest (1 Cor. 5:1). The main question which meets us is, how far does the Second Epistle deal with these same data, and how far have the circumstances altered? Before we can formulate an answer to this question, however, it is necessary first to decide whether or not we are to interpose a Third epistle between the two which have come down to us.

The Second Epistle is full of allusions to a previous letter, and the older commentators with one consent assumed that this was the First Epistle.

6. Intermediate letter. Such an assumption was obvious and natural; but, when the language of the Second Epistle came to be closely examined, doubts began to arise as to whether that language could really be satisfied by the First Epistle as it has come down to us.

In particular it was asked whether the strong emotion in the whole of the Second Epistle (which had been written, as I suppose, to the First Epistle) could be accounted for by the fact of about 1 year having passed since the writing of the First Epistle. The severe heart-sufferings described in 2 Cor. 11:27-28 do not seem to agree with the calm practical discussions of the First Epistle.

Since Kloppe (1874) an increasing number of scholars have replied to this difficulty in the negative. The case is somewhat too decidedly. Although it is prior to the fact that a great part of the First Epistle is taken up with calm practical discussions, the whole epistle is not in this strain.

¹ On this reckoning ἀπὸ πέρους (2 Cor. 9:2) will mean '1 year ago' but 'last year.' The Macedonian year, like the Jewish, began with October. See YEAR.

Many passages, especially in the earlier chapters, must have the writer not so lit emotional. Such would he (and) the seething joy of 1 Cor. 4:4-13 (the Corinthians already enjoying the rich abundance of the Meissner reign while the poor apostles are maltrated, but of 1 Cor. 13:1-13 (the apostle's the most section, 1 Cor. 13:1-13, which only with a threat that the apostle will come to them with a rod and then the section of the resurrection man, in which he proclaims himself in spirit, to the president's chair in their assembly and solemnly hands over the leadership to St. Paul).

It is by no means incredible that passages like these would stand out in Pader's memory after he had despatched his letter, and that he should work himself up into a state of great and even furious exasperation as to the way in which they would be received. The fact that a considerable fraction of the clergy should have made themselves, as it were, in some sort of sympathy with the often and possibly, but he will make the apostle feel that the moment was extremely critical and that the result might be nothing less than the breakup of the Church.

This leads us to the further question with which that just stated is bound up. Along with the allusions to a 6. Situation in 2 Cor.

Was this crisis the same as that which is contemplated in the first Epistle, or was it wholly distinct?

The scholars who first maintained the view that there was a list letter between the two casket letters were Robert L. Applegate in the older view that the casket letters of 2 Cor 2:14-17 had been interposed on the side of the outgoing directly out of the situation presented in 1 Cor 11:17-34, for there is a single offender, who appears to have a leading in the church, and the apostle is aware of the presence of ill-will in the church, and the mentions of Satan are not found in 1 Cor 2:11).

It must be confessed that the situation of $t \in \mathbb{N}$ fits on extremely well to that of $2t \in \mathbb{N}$, especially in urge, that the treatment described in 2 Cor. 26, which is accepted as adequate to the occasion by Paul, seems inadequate to the very gross offence of 1 Cor. 5. There is also considerable difficulty in assigning the part of the injured person in 2 Cor. 7:11: 'So although I wrote unto you, [I wrote] not for his cause that did the wrong, nor for his sake that suffered the wrong, but that your earnest care for us might be made manifest,' etc.

If the offending person of 1 Cor. 5 was really let off with a comparatively slight punishment there must have been extenuating circumstances of which we are not told. Such circumstances might be that the 'father's wife' was not in the strict sense a wife but a concubine (the father being probably a heathen); and we might have supposed that the father was dead. In such a case Paul with his strong sympathy for human infirmity, and his readiness to make allowance for a convert brought up in the laxity of heathenism, might conceivably have accepted an expiation short of that which the circumstances would seem at first sight to demand. The supposition that the father was dead would fall through, however, if, 'his cause that suffered the wrong' (τὸν ἀδικήσαντος) referred to him; and it does not seem satisfactory that a sin of this kind should be regarded only in the light of personal injury to another.

8. Other explanations of 2 Cor. 2:5-11.

8. Other explanations of 2 Cor. 2:5-11.

They, as a rule, take the offence on which the situation turns in this epistle to be some personal affront or insult put upon Paul (so Hilgenfeldt, Albrecht, Weissacker, Pfeleiderer, Schmiedel, Jülicher; Bousset gives the alternative that the insult may have been on Paul to Timothy), not in connection with the case of the incestuous man, but rather growing out of the revolt against his authority as an apostle. In keeping with this, most of them would explain τοῦ ἀδικήματος as an indirect reference to Paul himself. This is not so.

This, however, again seems strained and unnatural, and indeed inconsistent with the exegesis of the verse where Paul is meant, and (12) 'your earnest care for us': την σπουδαίαν ἡμεῶν ἐν ὑμῖν ᾠον in such a way as almost certainly to distinguish him from the injured person. Krenkel, it seems to us, rightly, suggests that and would take the passage as inferring to some private quarrel between two members of the Corinthian church (ibid., 394-5). We know from 1 Cor. 6 that such quarrels were not at Corinth, and the interpretation thus suggested suits the choice of words for μαρμαρι as a decorative rather than a structural material. The impression would be that the architect had a decorative type of the representation of a pavement with the tridactylus in mind, and have this in mind to be satisfied only once, because the name of tridactylus is a pun between the tips of the and a large section of the tridactylus.

We have then three hypotheses, each with some advantages and some counterbalancing drawbacks: (1) that the reference is to the mortuaries in n, which would greatly simplify the situation so far as the two epistles are concerned, but which will be held only on the assumption of peculiar validity of circumstantial evidence in this case which it is not easy for us to imagine; (2) that the reference is to some date, personal and not to Paul; a hypothesis which, by introducing an intermediate member, enables us to restrict the view which will suit the allusions somewhat better than in the extent of (1) is able, but in our opinion forces ô déuxième, and makes the situation in the Second Epistle a tantalising duplicate of that in the First, besides it might seem inconveniently crowding events between the two epistles; (3) that the reference is neither to Paul nor to the mortuaries in n, but to a quarrel between two unknown persons — which suits ô déuxième, but is open to some of the same objections as the first, and is not so probable.

We shall see below that, in spite of its apparent attractiveness, the first of these hypotheses must be given up. There is a break between the two epistles: there must have been at least one intervening communication, and if one, probably two communications—between Paul and the church at Corinth; and the aspect of things has changed not simply once, but probably twice. The fact of the new situation, and the fact of the intermediate letter, thus seem to be assured; but in regard to particulars we have hardly data enough to enable us to judge. We cannot readily bring ourselves to think that the person directly injured is Paul; at the same time he appears to be someone closely connected with him. Timothy would meet the conditions better than any one we can think of; but neither the injured person nor the aggressor can be identified more precisely.

Along with the question as to an intermediate letter goes the further question as to an uncorrected point by Paul to Corinth.

Unlike the letter, this visit is not purely hypothetical. In 2 Cor. 12:14 and 13:1 the apostle speaks expressly of his intention to

9. Unrecorded visit. This implies the fact that Paul visited another, not mentioned by the Acts, before, somewhere between Acts 18:18 and 20:1, rather, we may say, somewhere in the three years spent by Paul at Ephesus. We have seen that his communications with the church at Corinth were frequent; we have seen also that the exchange was easy. The silence of Acts (which dismisses two years in a verse) 19:1-4, therefore, is no real obstacle.

9. Unrecorded visit.

Is the visit to be placed before or after the First Epistle?

It is most tempting to go with the majority of recent critics and place it after 2. The conspicuous fact that this v. is not at all a parallel one (cf. Aug. 2 Cor. 2:14). It so, what could be more natural than to connect it with the letter which v. 5 is written 'with many tears'? Both alike, if this is so, it will be placed on the line of strained relations which led up to the Second Epistle. The time, enclitica would, in that case, precede the last letter. We might imagine, in view of 2 Cor. 1:10, that Paul had been summoned over to Corinth early, that he had not yet had time on that he had had to deal physically and been obliged to return, leaving his friends in all ignorance, worse than he found them; that he had written a letter to the Laodicean church of this kind, that in this letter v. 5 strongly warned, and, after it had been sent, caused a great anxiety; and that it was his relief from this anxiety, and the coming of Titus that was the immediate occasion of the Second Epistle.

Such temptations are tempting; but they lead us away from the direct road to the light which has a direct and perhaps a crucial bearing upon them.

In 1 Cor. 15: the apostle announces his intention of coming to Corinth by the longer land route through Asia.

10. Paul's plans.

interval, however, he must have changed his mind, not

once but twice; or, rather, he must have changed it and afterwards reverted to his original plan. From 2 Cor. 1:15 we learn expressly that he had at one moment decided to go straight from Ephesus to Corinth, thence to Macedonia, and then to return again to Corinth.

When he formed this decision he seems to have been well pleased with the Corinthians, and they with him; his motive is that, twice over, both on going and returning, they may have the benefit of his presence (2 Cor. 1:15). He did not carry out this plan because, after it had been formed, his relations to the Corinthians underwent a change. He tells us that he would not go to them because, if he had done, it must have been "in grief" (2 Cor. 2:1). None the less his change of plan was made one of the accusations against him, and was set down to fickleness of purpose (2 Cor. 1:17).

This being so, however, are we not precluded from interposing any visit between the conceiving of the intention described in 2 Cor. 1:15 (the short voyage and the double visit) and the writing of the Second Epistle?

It is not only, as Schmiedel argues (l.c. 3), that the feelings of the apostle when he made his plan and when he paid the supposed visit were different—in the one case satisfaction with the Corinthians, in the other case pain—but that a visit of any kind is inconsistent with the language used. If Paul had paid such a visit he would have kept to his intention (not broken it), and the charge of fickleness must at least have assumed another form.

We must therefore, with some reluctance, abandon the idea of bringing the painful visit and the painful letter into juxtaposition. The only other place for the former seems to be in the part of Paul's stay at Ephesus anterior to the First Epistle, and towards the middle or latter part of it (i.e., not far from, and probably before, the lost letter; 1 Cor. 2:9; cf. Schmiedel, op. cit. 54). The supposition that the second visit was only contemplated, not paid, appears to be excluded by 2 Cor. 13:4.

We observe also, in passing, that the history of these changes of plan goes far to dispose of the arguments in favour of the supposition that there is no lost letter between the two epistles.

The only way to make the First Epistle referred to directly in the Second is to regard certain passages in it as haunting the apostle and causing him trouble as to its reception. At the time when he conceived the plan set down in 2 Cor. 1:15, he was in a state of mind free from trouble; the Corinthians and he were on the best of terms. This alone would sever the links which have seemed to bind the two letters together. They must be connected closely or not at all.

When Paul wrote 1 Corinthians Timothy was not with him. We should infer from Acts 19:22 that before that date he had been already sent into Macedonia. This agrees perfectly with the turn of phrase in 1 Cor. 16:10: "If Timothy come, see that he be with you without fail." Before the despatch of the Second Epistle he had rejoined Paul, as he is associated with him in the opening salutation (2 Cor. 1:10). If the suggestion above holds, it was probably he who brought news of the events which led up to the second crisis. In any case the dealing with that crisis at its height was committed not to Timothy but to the stronger hands of Titus.

Assuming that there was an intermediate letter between 1 and 2 Cor. it is probable that Titus was the bearer of it (2 Cor. 12:18), as he was also the bearer of our Second Epistle (2 Cor. 13:14). A small group of scholars, including Hausrath and Schmiedel, would assign to Titus yet another earlier visit, on the business of the collection, soon after the writing of the First Epistle; but the hypothesis is invented to suit the theory that 2 Cor. 12 is not an integral part of our Second Epistle, and necessitates the invention of a number of other purely hypothetical occurrences (among them a fifth, or third lost letter), nearly all of them duplicates of others that are better attested. It may be rejected without hesitation.

The sequence of events, as far as we can ascertain it, seems to have been this:

13. Sequence of events.

(i.) While Paul is absent at Jerusalem Apollos arrives at Corinth, where he preaches with success (Acts 18:27).

(ii.) Paul takes up his abode at Ephesus in the summer of A.D. 52, remaining there until the summer of A.D. 53.

(iii.) Early in this period Apollos quits Corinth and certain Judaizing teachers arrive there. The beginnings are laid of differences which soon harden into parties.

(iv.) About, or somewhat after, the middle of the period Paul pays the church a brief disciplinary visit, cf. supra 1:10, 2:1.

see above, § 106. He also, after his return, writes the lost letter of 1 Cor. 5:9.

(v.) The household of Chloe bring news of an ominous development of the spirit of faction (1 Cor. 1:11), and a little later Stephanus, Proclus, and Achaius arrive at Ephesus (1 Cor. 16:15), perhaps as bearers of a letter to the apostle from the church at Corinth seeking his advice on various matters.

(vi.) Partly in consequence of what he had heard, and partly in answer to that letter, Paul writes 1st Corinthians in the spring of A.D. 53, taking occasion to correct a wrong impression drawn from the lost letter (1 Cor. 5:9, 10).

(vii.) The epistle thus written has the desired effect, and for the moment all goes well (2 Cor. 1:12-16). The apostle lets the Corinthians know his programme of 2 Cor. 1:13-16. Timothy arrives at Corinth and now, or at the time of chapter 8, returns to Ephesus.

(viii.) Another sharp controversy arises, beginning perhaps in some well-meant but feeble action on the part of Timothy, and soon involving the whole question of the apostle's position and authority.

(ix.) On hearing of this from Timothy Paul writes a second pastoral letter, the tone of which is severe and uncompromising. It is sent by Titus, who at the same time has instructions in regard to the collection.

(x.) After Titus has gone, Paul becomes more and more anxious as to the effect his last letter is likely to have on the Corinthians. He leaves Ephesus, having about this time been in imminent peril there. He stops at Troas. Still no news.

(xi.) Thus at last returns to him in Macedonia and dispels his fears. The Second Epistle is written and is sent by Titus and two others (2 Cor. 8:22). Its main tenor is thankfulness; but the collection is pressed, and the growth of one party (probably the Christ-party) leads to some emphatic strictures.

(xii.) Towards the end of December A.D. 53 Paul reaches Corinth. He stays there three months (Acts 20:3), during which he writes the Epistle to the Romans.

First Epistle.—We have seen that the occasion of the First Epistle was two-fold: (1) certain tidings which had reached Paul as to various disorders existing in the church at Corinth; (2) certain questions put to him in an official letter from the church. The disorders were: (i.) a number of factions which raised the flag of party spirit and used the names of prominent leaders to give colour to their own self-assertiveness. On these must be said below (§ 16). The subject covers 1:10-12:1.

(ii.) A bad case of immoral living which too much reflected a general laxity in the church (5:1-2:9).

(iii.) Litigiousness, which did not scruple to have recourse to heathen law-courts (6:1-11).

(iv.) An indecorous freedom in worship, exemplified by the abuse of the female headress (11:1-16).

(v.) Still worse disorders at the agapè or love-feast, which was followed by the eucharist (11:17-34).

And we may perhaps include under this head (vi.) the denial by some of the resurrection, dealt with in chap. 15.

The last three points may have been raised by the official letter. This certainly contained questions about marriage (answered in ch. 7:1); probably also about regulations to heathen practices, such as the eating of meats offered to idols (ch. 8 continued in 9:1-11:1); and possibly some inquiry as to the relative value of spiritual gifts. Chap. 1:3-6 is introductory, and ch. 16 an epilogue of personal matter containing instructions as to the collection, and details as to Paul himself and his companion.

The only points that need perhaps to be more particularly drawn out are the connection of chaps. 1:10-12:1 and 8:1-11:1.

The first tracks out the spirit of faction to its origin in the conceit of a worldly-minded wisdom, which is contrasted with the simplicity of the Gospel—a simplicity, however, which does not exclude the higher wisdom that comes from God (1:17-2:16). Then, in 3:1-4:7, the true position of human teachers is stated. They are but stewards, whose duty is not to put forward anything of their own, but only to administer what is committed to them by God. The Christian has but one foundation and one judge, namely Christ. 4:6-21 applies these general truths to the circumstances of the case with biting irony, which, however, soon changes to affectionate entreaty, and that again to sharp admonition.

The sequence of the argument in 8:1-11:1 should not be lost sight of. In ch. 8 is laid down the principle which should guide conduct in such matters as the eating of meat that might have come from heathen sacrifices. This principle is the subordination of personal impulse to the good of others. In ch. 9 Paul points out the working of the principle in his own case; it is in deference to it that he waives his right to claim support from the Church, in deference to it that he exercises severe self-

Bible of Zohrab in 1792 (incomplete translations earlier); also, with a manuscript by Reisk, in 1806. But as interest in the subject was being revived by Theodor Zahn (Zeitschr. f. bibl. Wiss., 1876, 24, 300-1) and Dr. P. Vetter, professor in the Roman Catholic faculty at Tübingen, a Latin version was discovered by M. Scaud Berger in a tenth-century MS. at Milan, and published by him in connection with Prof. A. F. Richter (Acta Soc. Scientiarum, 1881, 18). A second MS. of the text, containing a different but probably not altogether independent version, was found at Liège, and published by Prof. Brakke in LLZ, 1882, col. 565. There is also a MS. at Vercelli, a commentary on the epistle by Johann Schüssler. The texts are most conveniently collected by Dr. P. Vetter in a Tübingen programme (Die apokryphen Briefe von Paulus, 1882, 1-43).

The facts at present ascertained in regard to the apocryphal letters are these:

(1) They were known in the 14th C. (from the 5th cent.) admitted into the Armenian version as a part of the canon. (2) They also existed in Syria and were accepted as canonical in the fourth century by Aphraates, Ephrem Syrus, and the Syriac P. de Maria. (3) The Latin version of Aphraates is recognized by both Harnack and Zahn, though a question as to whether wrongly by Carrière and Vetter. (4) The letters were also known and had some small circulation in the West.

The problems which still await solution have reference to the question of origin.

(1) Zahn and now also Vetter, think that the greater part of the letters was in the first instance incorporated in the apocryphal Acts of Paul. (Since this was written Zahn's hypothesis has been upheld through the discovery, by Dr. C. Schumacher, of considerable portions of the Acts of Paul in Coptic; cp. Neue Heidelberger Jahrbücher, 1897, pp. 117-124, and Harnack in LLZ, 1897, col. 681.) In any case it seems probable that they gained their origin in the Syrian version in connection with the controversy against Paul's teaching in the third century. Their composition can hardly be much later than 200 A.D. (2) It is coming to be generally agreed that the 14 letters of the epistles existed in a Greek. Vetter and Zahn now think that the concluding portion was added in Syria, and Zahn goes so far as to make the Latin version translated not from the Greek but from the Syrian. This has certainly not been proved his case; but the age of these versions needs further investigation.

It is also of general commentaries (which still deserve mention) of Bengel, Wiessemann, and Meyer (first editions by Heinrich).

that the cohort mentioned consisted of Gauls but had distinguished itself in Macedonia. If this interpretation were applicable, an Italian cohort would mean one which had fought in Italy. In Arian, however (Act. 10 contra J. 1.1.1, § 3, p. 66), the cohort which in § 13, p. 102, is called ἡ σπειρα ἡ Ἰταλική, the Italian cohort, figures simply as of Ἰταλῶν, the Italians, and with this agree all the other mentions (entirely in inscriptions) of a cohort Italia.

These are (1) Cohors I Italiae civium Romanorum isauriana; (2) coh(ors) miliaria—i.e., having 1000 instead of as usual 500 men Italiae voluntarii quarta in Syria; (3) coh. II. It.; (4) the epitaph of a subordinate officer found at Carmentum in Pannonia and first published in the Archaeologia, Ab theilungen aus Oesterreich-Ungarn (1885, p. 217) epit. cohortis II Italiae (i.e., Italian) Romanorum centuria Tausiliani ex vexillariis sagittariis evectus (i.e., evectus).

Thus the σπειρα Ἰταλική of Acts 10¹ really consisted of Italians, probably of Italian volunteers.

Now, Schürer¹ has pointed out that according to Josephus (Ant. xv. 87, § 176) the garrison of Caesarea about 60 A.D. consisted mostly of Caesareans and Sebasteni (Sebasti having, from 27 B.C., been the name of Samaria). As early, however, as 41-44 A.D. (at latest), when Caesarea was not under a Roman procurator but under a grandson of Herod the Great, King Herod Agrippa I. (whose death is recorded in Acts 12:20-21, and during whose reign, or shortly before it, the story of Cornelius will have to be placed), the garrison at Caesarea must, according to Schürer, have been similarly composed. For in 44 A.D. the emperor Claudius desired to transfer the garrison—which, at that time, and according to Josephus (Ant. xii. 12, § 66) also twenty-three years later, in 67 A.D., consisted of an ala (ἄλῃ—i.e., cavalry detachment of 500 men) of the Caesareans and Sebasteni and five cohorts—to the province of Pontus, because, after the death of his friend King Agrippa I., they had publicly insulted the statues of his daughters; but there was no change of garrison until the time of Vespasian (Jos. Ant. xix. 91 f., §§ 359-366). This led Schürer to conjecture that a cohort of Italians may have come to Caesarea (there was in Syria, as shown above, one such at least) under Vespasian, and that the author of Acts, or of the source from which he drew, may have transferred the circumstances of his own time to the time of Peter.

Ramsay, on the other side, adduces the fourth of the inscriptions given above. This inscription, however, does not say more than that in 69 A.D. there was a cohors Italia in Syria; and, although there may have been such a cohort there as early as about 49-45 A.D., it is not said that there was one in Caesarea. It is especially improbable that that city was so garrisoned in the reign of Agrippa I. (41-44 A.D.), for he was a relatively independent sovereign, not likely to have had Italians in his service; but even for the period preceding 41 A.D. Schürer argues for a probability that the garrison of Caesarea was the same as it was afterwards, and that it was simply taken over by Agrippa at his accession. For the rest, Ramsay can only appeal to a possibility that Cornelius may have been temporarily at Caesarea on some 'detached service.'

Oscar Holtzmann (N. T. liche Zeitgesch. § 11, 2, p. 108) thinks that perhaps the enrolment at some time or other of a considerable number of Italian volunteers may have sufficed to secure for such a cohort in perpetuity the honorary epithet of 'Italia.' All this, however, is mere conjecture.

Mommsen (Sitzungsber. d. Akad. zu Berlin, 1895, pp. 501-3) seeks to deprive of its force the statement of Josephus on which Schürer relies. Starting from the view that the troops of Agrippa must certainly have been drawn from the whole of his kingdom,—that is, from all Palestine—he maintains that Caesarea and Sebastae are singled out for special mention by Josephus merely as being the two chief towns in Agrippa's dominions. He lays emphasis on the fact that in Ant. iii. 4, § 66

P.* 1896, 246-247, Schürer replies to Ramsay ib. 194-207; Ramsay replies, 1897, 169-72.

(see above) and Ant. xv. 61, § 122, it is said only of Caesarea and not of the cohors that it was composed of Caesareans and Sebasteni. At the same time he does not use this fact to establish the probability of a cohors Italia in Caesarea. On the contrary, his conclusion is that 'We are unable to identify with any certainty either the cohors Italia of Acts 27¹ or the σπειρα Ἰταλική of Acts 10¹.'

The special importance of Cornelius in Acts lies in the representation of a homo conversus by Peter brought to the original Christian community of Jerusalem.

2. Narrative irreconcilable with Council of Jerusalem.

Jerusalem, in spite of violent repression at first (11:17 f.), to the conviction that the God's also, without circumcision and without coming under any obligation to observe the Law of Moses, were to be received into the Christian Church if they had faith in Christ (11:17 f.). The historical truth of this representation has to be considered in connection with what we are told elsewhere concerning the Council of Jerusalem (see Constitution, ii. § 4; Acts, § 4). That council could never have been necessary, and the including Christians in it could never have stood out for the circumcision of the Gentile, or their obligation to observe the whole Mosaic Law (Acts 15:5), if they had already come to see and acknowledge in the case of Cornelius that such demands were contrary to the divine will. In his controversy with Peter at Antioch also (Gal. 2:12-14), Paul could have used no more effective weapon than a simple reference to this event; but he behaves no knowledge of it. No one, it is to be presumed, will attempt to save the credibility of the narrative by the expedient of transferring it to some date subsequent to the Council of Jerusalem. As at that council (see above) are told Peter himself expressly agreed that the Gentiles should be unimpeded entrance into the Christian Church, that circumcision and observance of the Law should not be demanded of them, he did not, at a later date, require to be instructed on the matter by a divine revelation. Had the Council in fact not been later than the Council the novelty would have lain simply in Peter's preaching the gospel and administering baptism to Cornelius and his household in praesentia. This, however, is precisely what would have been contrary to the principle adopted at the Council as laid down in Gal. 2:6, which settled that he should continue his missionary activity to born Jews. (On the importance of this principle, see Council, § 6.)

As the story of Cornelius must thus be retained, if anywhere, in its present place, before the Council of Jerusalem, its credibility can be allowed only on condition that it is acknowledged not to possess the important bearing on questions of principle which is claimed for it in Acts 11:1-17.

(c) To meet this requirement, it is usually thought sufficient to say that the occurrence was an 'exceptional case' (so, for example, Ramsay also, St. Paul, chap. 3, p. 44). This may be true in the sense that Peter converted and baptized no more Gentiles; but, unless at the same time it is denied that in the case of Cornelius Peter's action proceeded on a divine revelation and command, the reference to the exceptional character of the case has no force. The conditions of missionary activity which God had revealed to Peter in the case of Cornelius must surely, when Paul also began to apply them, have been acknowledged by the original Church; and thus the controversy resulting in the Council of Jerusalem could never have arisen. On this ground alone, then, to begin with, Peter's vision at Joppa is unhistorical; and aversion from miracles has nothing to do with its rejection. The whole account seems to be influenced by reminiscences of the story of the summoning of Hymen by Pothus (Nu. 22:5-23); see Krenkel, Josephus u. Lucas, 193-9 [94].

(d) It is further urged (so again Ramsay, St. Paul, ch. 3 § 1 and 10 § 1 pp. 42 f. and 375, and Exp. 1806, 2007/1 that Cornelius according to Acts 10:22 was a semi-proselyte, i.e., gave a general adhesion to Judaism, without being circumcised or yielding definite obedience to the details of the Mosaic Law;¹ but neither does this contention avail. The facts, as stated in Acts 10:28-11:4, that Cornelius and his house, according to Jewish and Jewish-Christian ideas, were unclean, and if, notwithstanding this, God had commanded his admission within the pale of the Christian Church, the command had essentially no less significance than it would have had if he had previously been quite unattached to Judaism. Ramsay (11) says, it is true, that Peter 'laid it down as a condition of reception into the Church that the non-Jew must approach by way of the synagogue (10:35) and become 'one that fears God.' But Peter does not say this until after he has been taught by God in a vision. Without this instruction it would have been incumbent on him to exact, as conditions precedent, acceptance of circumcision and submission to the entire law (10:14). As soon as the divine command is recognised as a historical fact the dispute at the Council of Jerusalem becomes, as already stated, an impossibility.

(6) On one assumption alone, then, will it be possible to recognise a kernel of historical truth in the story of Cornelius: the assumption, namely, that he was a full proselyte, - circumcised, that is to say, and pledged to observance of the entire Law. Such a supposition, however, is in direct contradiction of the text (10:28-11:4). It would be strange indeed if, in order to make the narrative credible, one had first to change it in so important a point.

It would be necessary to depart still further from the text if it were desired to put faith in what is said in the pseudo-Clementine Homilies (20:1), according to which Peter did not convert Cornelius at Caesarea to Christianity at all, but merely freed him from a demon's possession. It is not intrinsically impossible that here we have a fragment of good tradition preserved from some ancient source (see SIMON MARGR); but, on account of its combination with manifest fancies (see below, § 6), to trust it is all but unsafe.

All the more urgent becomes the question whether the narrative in Acts is derived from a written source.

4. Sources. Of the scholars enumerated under Acts (§ 11) the majority assume that it is, and point out verses in ch. 10, the proper connections of which (they say) have been obliterated by the final redactor of the book.² They further emphasise the point that in the narrative by Peter (11:5-17) certain details are not given precisely as in ch. 10. Still, even the most serious of these differences—namely, that in

² 10:36 f., however, ought not to be reckoned among these; no redactor would have introduced such violent abnormalities into his text. The words from ἀρχαίως ('beginning') down to Γαλιλαίας ('Galilee'), or, it may be, to Ἰουδαίᾳ (end of v. 37), are absolutely foreign to the construction, and certainly ought to come between οὗ ('who') and διήλθεν ('V. went abroad') in v. 38, whether it be that they originally belonged to this place, or that they originally stood on the margin as a reminiscence by a very early reader from Lk. 23:5 or Acts 1:22. In 10:29 the reading of WH ('He') sent the word unto . . . Lord of all. 'Ye know the word which'; ἐπ' ὧν is unquestionably a copyist's attempt to remove the difficulties of the construction; but their marginal reading (τὸν λόγον ὃν ἀπεστείλει, etc.; 'The word which' as in EV) it is as difficult to make dependent on the οἶδατε ('ye know') of v. 37 as it is to construe in apposition to the whole sentence in v. 35. If we refuse to suppose that before v. 36 some such words as 'you also hath he thought worthy to hear' have fallen out before τὸν λόγον ὃν ἀπεστείλει, etc. (the word which [he] sent), it will be necessary to take τὸν λόγον ὃν ('the word which') down to διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ('by Jesus Christ'), as a marginal explanation of τὸ γενόμενον ῥῆμα καθ' ὅλης τῆς Ἰουδαίας ('the word which was throughout all Judea'), where ῥῆμα (RV 'saying') is wrongly understood in the sense of 'word' instead of the Hebrew sense of 'event, occurrence' as in Lk. 21:5; and οὗτός ἐστι πάντων κύριος ('he is lord of all') will be a further addition.

ch. 11 the Holy Spirit fell upon Cornelius and his household at the very beginning of Peter's discourse (7: 13) admits of explanation; 10:44 may have been supposed to represent only a comparatively small part of what Peter meant to say. Were it necessary to make a choice between ch. 10 and ch. 11, it would be the worst possible course to try to see in the latter the source from which the fuller narrative of ch. 10 was originally derived by amplification (see Wendt, ZfA, 1891 pp. 230-251, esp. 250-4). That principle-determining character which, as we have seen, can in no case have attached to the assumed event is imparted precisely by the justification which in ch. 11 the event receives before the church of Jerusalem; and against this it is of no avail that Wendt chooses to attribute some of the strongest passages, such as 11:1 and 11:12, to the latest redactor of Acts.

More important than any of the indications hitherto dealt with is the clue supplied in 10:44-11:17. The 'speaking with tongues' of Cornelius and his household is here placed on a level with that of the apostles at the first Pentecost after the resurrection, but is not yet (as it is in the other passage) described as a speaking in the languages of foreign nations: it is undoubtedly meant, as in 1 Cor. 12:11, to be taken simply as a speaking in ecstatic tones (see GUTHRIE). Certainly this representation of the matter does not seem as if it had been due to the latest redactor of the book as a whole.

In favour of the credibility of the narrative, however, nothing is gained by all this search for a written source. It is a great error, widely diffused, to suppose that one may pro facto take as historical everything that can be shown to have stood in one of the written sources of the NT authors. As far as the source was in substance identical with what we now have in the canonical Acts, it is equally exposed to the criticisms already offered. There is one assumption which would escape the force of that criticism—the assumption, namely, that Cornelius was a full proselyte (§ 3 f.)—but it cannot possibly by any analysis of sources be made out to have been the original tradition.

All the more remarkable is the clearness with which the tendency of the narrative may be seen. The

5. Tendency. which historically belongs to Paul, is here set down to the credit of Peter (see Acts, § 3 f.). According to the representation given in Acts, it was preceded by the conversion of the Samaritans (8:5-25), who, however, were akin to the Jews, and consequently not Gentiles (Schürer, GH 2:57, ET 3:57). It had been preceded also by the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch (8:26-39); but he had not thereby been made a member of any Christian church. The really difficult problem was this: In what manner ought Jewish Christians to live together in one and the same church with Gentile Christians, who did not hold by the Mosaic Law? This question is brought by Peter, in the case of Cornelius, on the basis of a divine revelation, exactly to the solution which in reality it was left to Paul to achieve after hard battle at a much later date (see CORN. II, §§ 4, 7). With a certain reserve, which bears witness to right feeling for essential historical truth in spite of all unhistoricity in the narrative, the author attributes no more conversions of Gentiles to Peter; and even the conversion of Cornelius himself is in some measure toned down by the previous Jewish sympathies with which he is credited. There is thus a further step left. It is not till later, in Antioch, that the gospel is preached to Gentiles who had not previously stood in any close connection with Judaism, and the new step is taken (as in the case of the Samaritans) in the first instance by subordinate persons, and not sanctioned by the authorities at Jerusalem till after the event (11:19-24). None the less are mission to the Gentiles and the abolition of the distinction between Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians so essentially vindicated in the CORONATION. [Annotating.] § 11465. It is an ancient model of a tower with a central tower S. 10° 1' K. 14°. It is only in the case of Jewish coronation as mentioned is accompanying, indeed, it is mentioned as preceding the amount (2 K. 11:1). Perhaps 2 S. 11:1 refers to an older custom of mourning for the successor the person's dominions of the dead king; see G. G. W. Perhaps too the amount occurred near or on a particular place or place of the stone, as in the case of Munich, for we can hardly doubt that 1 S. 11:1 is the pillar that was Shedam (Chap. 10:1 is correct, though the final letter of Shedam has been lost or removed; see Moore, ibid. 1:1). Jewish texts tend to have stood by the pillar as the manner was (2 K. 11:1); but here the word for 'pillar' is different (2:12), and we should perhaps follow RV67 and Klostermann in rendering 'platform' (2 K. 23: RV67, RV68).

After the mounting the people greeted the new king with a flourish of trumpets (1 K. 1:31-2 K. 10:26-27, 2 K. 11:14-15:22). In the case of Jehu and Absalom (2 S. 15:6) the trumpet sounds were the signal of accession, though they may have been simply an element in the popular expressions of joy (2 S. 11:14-1 K. 1:31), which included hand-clapping (2 S. 20:1, 2 S. 11:12-13, 1 K. 1:23) and the exclamation 'Live the king' (2 S. 19:24, 2 S. 16:16, 1 K. 1:34-2 K. 11:10). Sometimes there was a procession with music; the new king rode on the royal mule (1 K. 1:33-34) and finally took his seat on the throne.

It is possible that 'today' in Ps. 27 refers not to the birth but to the coronation of the king. See Baethge, Chr. ad 175. The latter illustrates from the signatures representing the coronation of the Egyptian king Nub-shesut III, Na'ville, Temple of Dendera, Richard III, 1890, pp. 1-6. See Weinel's essay on 255 in UfU 187-9 [2] and Diehl, Feldzug Psylliden, Gießen, 1914.

case of Cornblith that Peter has not been able to consider their real motivations as far as Acts is concerned. The third view, accordingly, is in complete contradiction to the first two. In fact, thus, the historical Peter can be seen as Jewish Christian prejudice not voluntarily overcome, withdraws from table-fellowship which he had been in with Gentile Christians, and thereby expresses his refusal to the sharp censure of Paul (see Coloss. § 30). In Acts he has completely overcome those prejudices, being before Paul begins his Christian activity. It is not necessary on this account to suppose that the author of Acts freely invented the whole story, including even the name of Cornblith; but, considering his weakness, he brings it into the service of his theory, we have little prospect of ultimately being able to return more than a very small kernel as historical.

6. Later traditions. According to the pseudo-Clementine Homilies (20:1; see above, § 3.4) and Recognitions (10:1) Cornelius took the side of Peter as against Paul. When Simon the Sorcerer (i.e., Paul, see Simon Magus) had stirred up a violent mob against Peter, Cornelius comes upon a mission from the Emperor and arrives at an understanding with the friends of Peter; at their request, to set abroad the rumor that his imperial commission has reference to the arrest of Simon. Thereupon Simon makes his escape to Judea. Thus Cornelius here plays the part which in Acts 21 and 23:6-9 is assigned to Claudius Lysias.

According to the Chronicon on the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, attributed to Symeon Metaphrasi, the Carthusians created by Peter bishop of Bham, according to the Greek Menex (11th Sept.), he is sent by Peter to Skopos on the Hellespont (Thrace), Enceph. Apost. c. 11, in 147, and 151. According to the pseudo Isidore in 11 miles (10,000) and 12,000 miles (12,000). Zacharias was created first a bishop of Cesarea by Peter; in Ap. Const. vii. for Zacharias is created by Cornelius.

In (a) the phrase 'cornerstone', RV's 'cornerstone' is parallel to פִּנְיָה, 'its foundations' (or bases), just as in Jer 51:26 'a stone for a pinnaḥ' (פִּנְיָה) is parallel to 'a stone for foundations' (אֶבֶן יְסוּדוֹת). In (b) we find the same connection between פִּנְיָה, pinnaḥ, and the foundation-stone. Clearly, therefore, the traditional rendering 'cornerstone' for פִּנְיָה is unsuitable. Indeed, the word פִּנְיָה elsewhere only in some cases means 'corner' (see Ex. 27:24 Ezek. 40:20 45:14 Job 1:7 Prov. 7:1). Besides this, the architectural term פִּנְיָה in Ps. 118:22 (A. ἀποκύριος in 1 Pet. 2:6 cp Eph. 2:20; but not in Mt. 21:42 and parallel passages, A. τῆς ἑκκλησίας) evidently means, not 'cornerstone', but 'topstone of the battlement', and 'battlement' is RV's rendering of פִּנְיָה in 2 Ch. 26:15 Zeph. 1:15 3:5.

In spite of tradition, therefore, it would seem that פֶּנֶם זֶנֶח means, not a corner-stone, but a principal stone (cp פֶּנֶם, Ass. pinu, 'front'), one selected for its solidity and beauty to fill an important place in a building, whether in the foundation or in the battlement. Hence the metaphorical sense of פֶּנֶם, 'principal men.' Is. 19:13 (so point), t. S. 14:3 Judg. 20:2. (c) The third EV passage (Is. 11:12) with the word 'corner' is extremely obscure in MT. the most important occurrence of the opposed category, the one that bears the most obvious relation to the more contradictory accounts of it which we can process in table 2, and Acts 15, the more necessary is to adopt a critical method for its investigation. I believe that this method arises in which both accounts are to be taken into consideration. In order to do so, it is essential that we return to the times of Paul's journey to Corinth in order to have a conversation

1. Paul's Journeys to Jerusalem in Gal. and Acts.

But we are not alone. Unless we do, the continuance of the epidemic that is eating us will be a perpetual and a constant statement.

Paula, a black woman, who has been a part of the development of the black community in the United States, is a black woman who has been a part of the development of the black community in the United States. I will have been a part of the development of the black community in the United States.

Now, the journey mentioned in Acts 16 must be taken to be identical with that in Gal. 1, even though the narrative of Acts contains not the slightest hint that it was not made until three years after Paul's conversion, and had been preceded by a sojourn in Arabia and a second sojourn in Damascus.

It would seem, then, that the second journey recorded in Galatians 124 must coincide with the one in Acts 1126, which, according to Acts 1225, did extend to Jerusalem.

the famine during the reign of Claudius (by which the Jews were almost exterminated in Palestine before 48), in the manner of 1.10, repeats the narrative of Acts 11, to imply (1) that the famine of which Herod Agrippa I. died, the conversion of Paul, occurred shortly after the death of Jesus, and (2) that it was no more than a year after the appearance of the Lord, i.e., the fiftieth year of Jeremiah (Jer. 25:11-12; Am. 8:11) or, at the minimum, the interval of seventeen (Gen. 47:14), but it is implied by Gal. 1:23 before Paul's conversion and 1 Thim. 4:10 after it, Christus regnavit, § 74 ff. Thus the date of the journey in Acts is required to occur not only in one post-41, but also, and not not so, but after the beginning of the famine.

Still, since it mentions no object for the journey besides the sending of alms, the narrative of Acts 14 may be charged with having passed over in complete silence the conference mentioned in Gal 2:1-10.

This is no trifling matter. It is remarkable that a conference on the same subject should follow in Acts 16, for a repetition of the discussion within the next few years is not a normal prospect, but that no reference is made in Acts 16 to an earlier discussion. The journey mentioned in Acts 14, at all events, as Paul is concerned – may, on other grounds, be considered open to the possibility of having been determined by circumstances recorded in Acts 20: 21 ff (p. 115, 116).

² That it extended over the whole world (οικουμένη) is an error of Acts.

COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM

Rom 15: 27 and 1 Cor 16: 15-16, whether by mistake or purpose, for a far more fully pointed in the narrative for S. 15: 15-16.

In order to avoid recognizing the contradiction between Gal 2: 1-10 and Acts 15: 1-30, a whole class of writers have assigned the Council of Jerusalem to the journey described in Acts 18: 1-18. They ignore the objection that on this view Paul in Galatians suppresses important facts so far as to pass over two journeys to Jerusalem without mention.

On the other hand, it is a mistake to suppose that Acts 15: 22 does not imply a visit to Jerusalem at all.

Although ἀποδοξάω might signify the journey up to the shore to deliver it to the Jews, a man could not possibly be said to deliver it to the Jews if he were to deliver it to the Gentiles. Thus we are bound to supply the Council in Jerusalem by many interpreters even when denying the first day of the journey. On this last point, however, we cannot in fact be supported by the negative evidence of Galatians. For, if it is silent as to this journey, but not as to a day or two, it reaches the point at which mention of it would have come, instead of assuming such a journey, after describing the visit to Antioch. If the writer passes on to the Gentiles and thence to practical questions, entirely losing sight of his original purpose, which was to enumerate the persons and matters with the original apostles. Finally, indeed, he thought remarkable that Paul's doing, if intended, is not mentioned in Acts 15: 22, but this does not warrant the assumption now to be made.

Some of us have assumed that the Council of Jerusalem was really held on this occasion (Acts 15: 22), and not earlier. The author, having purposely transposed it to an earlier date, would express himself as briefly and obscurely as possible when he came to the point at which it really occurred.

This assumption has the advantage of bringing not only the first (Acts 13: 1-14) but also the second (Acts 15: 1-30) journey within the first seven or eight years after Paul's conversion, thus providing a natural time up to which the writer has reached. It is true, however, he would in this way put Barnabas who was personally known to the Galatians and the Corinthians, and that he could have been separated from Paul (Acts 15: 36-40) until after the second missionary journey, during which the communities in Galatia (22), Old Galatia (26), and in Corinth were established; to the passage, Gal. 2: 1-10, we are perfectly justified in the assumption that Barnabas was known to the readers by report alone.

The assumption of such a transposition is entirely wanting in probability.

The motive proposed, the writer to transpose the Council of Jerusalem to an earlier date is supposed to have been the desire to bring the whole of Paul's missionary work to its beginning within the scope of the decree of the apostles (Acts 15: 22-23), but had this really been the writer's intention, he would have indicated the Council not before Acts 15, but before Acts 13. What should have hindered him from so doing, if he was minded that he allowed himself to make free with his materials in this way at all, is not apparent.

Others actually transpose the journey described in Acts 13: 1-14 so as to make it come between the Council of Jerusalem and the separation of Barnabas from Paul, and therefore after Acts 15: 34.

Their strongest reason is the fact that Paul mentions only Syria and Cilicia as his places of residence up to the Council of Jerusalem (Gal. 1: 21). This is hardly conclusive, for, although Paul was pledged to enumerate all his meetings with the original apostles, he was not bound to mention all the provinces in which he had resided without meeting them. In any case, even if the transposition of Acts 13: 1-14 and Acts 15: 1-30 is accepted, it gives no support to the assumption mentioned under d, since for that assumption the writer of Acts has put the two sections exactly in the wrong order; his suppositional purpose, as well as the motive of historical accuracy, would have led him to put 15: 1-34 before 13: 1-14.

It is only by very bold treatment of the different sources of Acts, by which the accounts of Paul's journeys in Acts 11: 15-18 become merely the result of an erroneous combination of the writer's authorities, that Clement (Chronol. d. Paulin. Pr., 1893) contrives to identify Gal. 2 with Acts 21 and Joh. Weiss (St. u. Kr., 1893, pp. 480-510; 1895, pp. 252-264), on the contrary, with Acts 9 and (at the same time) with Acts 15: 1-12. It is, in fact, quite impossible to deny the identity of the events related in Gal. 2 and in Acts 15. See CITRONOTOGY, § 74.

In view, however, of the doubts cast upon Acts, it is more correct to refer to the book the last of the

2 Gal 2: 1-10 the primary passage

the Council of Jerusalem. It is not possible to suppose that the Council of Jerusalem was held at Antioch, for the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem.

But we must not permit our imagination to be misled by the dispute at Antioch, which is held in Gal. 2: 1-10. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem.

3. The dispute at Antioch.

The dispute at Antioch is held in Gal. 2: 1-10. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem.

The dispute at Antioch is held in Gal. 2: 1-10. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem.

The dispute at Antioch is held in Gal. 2: 1-10. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem. The Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem, and the Council of Jerusalem was held at Jerusalem.

As we are not informed of any answer from Peter to Paul's remand in Gal. 2: 1-10, it is commonly (though very rashly) assumed that Peter admitted his error. That Paul should record an explicit answer from Peter, however, was hardly to be expected, if only for the reason that he must have thought it inconclusive. Still, even if Peter was thought to have yielded, the others who shared his opinion did not yield. Otherwise, why is the dispute at Antioch followed so quickly by the entrance of the Judaising party into the churches founded by Paul in Galatia and Corinth, in complete contravention of the agreement in Gal. 2: 10, and by the nearly successful attempt to induce the Galatians to adopt circumcision (Gal. 5: 2-12; 6: 12-14) and to alienate the Corinthians from Paul altogether (2 Cor. 11: 12-13; 5: 12-13; 7: 5-6)? How could so important and persistent a movement— if it had already been encountered by Paul on two separate occasions, both in Galatia and in Corinth (Gal. 1: 5-13; 1 Cor. 9: 2 Cor. 11: 14)— have been carried on if it had been opposed by the first apostles? Whence came the letters of recommendation which, according to 2 Cor. 3: 1, these emissaries brought with them? As they formed the ground upon which the suspicion against Paul as one who had never known Jesus (1 Cor. 9: 1) proceeded, what weightier credentials could they have contained than the statement that their hearers represented immediate disciples of Jesus? Would the sceptical Cerebrians have been satisfied if the authentication had come (let us say) from Ephesus, or from some other town outside Palestine?

How comes it, again, that even at the end of the second century the pseudo-Chionetime homilies (17.1a) represent Peter as reproaching Simon—under whose name Paul is there attacked (see SIMON MAGI 8)—for having called him a κατασκευαστος (Gal. 2.11; RV 'stood condemned')? This shows how deep a wound was inflicted on including Christianity by Paul's bold attack on Peter. For this reason, not a word is said in Acts about the scene; though it is quite inconceivable that the author had no knowledge of it (see ACTS, § 6). Further, in the place in Acts where this scene ought to have been mentioned there is recorded a similar dispute (παροισμὸς, Acts 15.1) between Paul and Barnabas (see BYRNATHUS), who, according to Gal. 2.1, had gone over to the side of Peter. This dispute, however, does not turn on any question of principle. It was merely a personal matter (Acts 15.2-4). The comestime is a tempting one that this scene, if not an invention, is at least an interpolation, based on some written source, introduced for the purpose of effacing the memory of the more important quarrels.

We are now in a position to investigate the Council of Jerusalem itself. It was occasioned, on the part of

4. Occasion of the council.

Inclusive Christianity, by the appearance of the 'false brethren' who had made their way unauthorised into the Pauline and other churches, seeking to spy out and to suppress the freedom from the Mosiac Law that had been attained (Gal. 2.4). As this cannot have been in Jerusalem, we may accept the statement of Acts (15.1, cp 14.2) that it was to Antioch they came. Up to that time no such intrusion had occurred, although the circumstances at Antioch cannot have long remained unknown to the lead is at Jerusalem. It is, therefore, not improbable that the new and sudden aggressive movement proceeded from recently converted Pharisees, even though the statement to this effect in Acts 15.5 is made without reference to 15.1, and therefore appears to come from another source. Paul was prompted to go to the council of the apostles by a revelation (Gal. 2.2). Probably it came to him not as a bolt from the blue, but only after the question to be decided by the council had already stirred his soul to its depths. No less than his entire life-work—his of bringing the heathen to Christianity without loading them by the Mosiac Law—was at stake. According to Acts (15.2), he and Barnabas were deputed to go to Jerusalem by the church at Antioch in consequence of a fruitless discussion there. This motive for the journey is not, of course, absolutely incompatible with the revelation mentioned by Paul; but it is in any case significant that Paul speaks only of the revelation and Acts only of the delegation. Whatever the motive, what is it that Paul can have gone to Jerusalem in search of? A tribunal to whose verdict he would voluntarily submit, whatever its tenor? By no means. He had from a higher authority his gospel of freedom from the Law, and rated very little for the original apostles (Gal. 1.6-9; 2.5-7). Or did he expect to find among their assistance against the 'false brethren'? We think that he did not; if he did, his expectation was not justified by the event (see below, §§ 7, 8). The purpose with which he went to Jerusalem was to discover the source from which the 'false brethren' drew their support. He intended to take that support away from under them, and, in order to do so, it was necessary that he should appear in person. 'Last by any means I should be running or had run in vain' (Gal. 2.2); μήπως τίς κενόν τρέχω ἢ ἔδραμον is not an interrogative; Paul would never have made the justification of his work dependent on the judgment of the original apostles.

Were the conferences at Jerusalem public, or were they private? No clear picture of them is presented in Acts—perhaps because the account is compiled from various sources.

5. Public or private discussions?

A general assembly is set before us in Acts 14.4. We may suppose the private assembly mentioned in 14.2 to have been on another day (though the author says it being as to this). Suddenly, however, in 14.22, 'all the multitude (ὅλη το ἄνθρωποι) is present; and it reappears in 14.23 as responsible for the final decision, although in 14.23 this is attributed to the apostles and elders only. Paul, on the other hand, in the words κατ' ἴδιον, 'privately' (Gal. 2.9), passes from a public to a private conference, as also probably in 2.6 for the discussion about the circumcision of Titus (2.6-8) can most easily be supposed to have occurred in a public assembly, in which expression was also given to the position in which the original apostles did not themselves finally adopt.

So far there is no inconsistency between Galatians and Acts: both know of meetings of both kinds. The crucial question, however, is, Was any final decision arrived at in a public assembly?

If the decision was not in Paul's favour, the claims of truth and of prudence alike must have led him to mention it. Much, however, of what is recorded in Acts—e.g., the speech of Peter (15.7-11)—points very clearly to a decision in Paul's favour; and to pass this over in silence would have been folly.

The picture presented in Acts, therefore, of a decisive public assembly is entirely incorrect.

The case is similar with what is said, or implied, as to Paul's attitude toward the original apostles. According to Acts, he holds quite a subordinate position. He is allowed to state his case, but not to take part in the debate; he has simply to submit to the decision.

6. Paul's attitude to the original apostles.

According to Galatians, he debates as with his equals. Indeed, he even refers to the original apostles ironically as 'of reputation,' 'reputed to be pillars,' 'to be somewhat' (οἱ δοκούμενοι, στήλοι καὶ ἐκείνη; Gal. 2.9).

Even if it be granted that the title, 'pillars' (οἱ στήλοι) may have been originally applied to them by their adherents as a term of honour, the phrase 'reputed' (δοκούμενοι) cannot have been so used. It is explicitly derogatory. The most that can be done to soften the force of Paul's irony is to conjecture that he did not invent the expression until the incident at Antioch had diminished his respect for them.

Paul took Titus as his companion of set purpose. The uncircumcised assistant of his missionary labours would serve as an 'object-lesson' in support of his fundamental principle.

7. Question of circumcision of Titus.

An attempt was made to procure his circumcision; but, owing to the opposition of Paul and Barnabas, it had to be abandoned.

This is clearly the meaning of Gal. 2.1-5, and only the most violent feats of critical ingenuity can find any other explanation of the passage. One interpretation is that no attempt whatever was made (οὐκ ἐπαγχαθή) to procure the circumcision of Titus. If so, why the opposition of Paul and Barnabas? Again, the attempt was made, yet not on grounds of principle, but in the interest of Paul, to save him from daily defilement. How did he avoid defilement from other Gentile converts, with many of whom he associated daily? Perhaps, on account of the 'false brethren,' Paul did, after all, of his own accord, allow Titus to be circumcised. Did he hope thereby to maintain the truth of the gospel (Gal. 2.5) that no man need be circumcised? It has even been proposed to follow the Greek text and the Latin version of D with Irenaeus, Tertullian, and other Western fathers, in omitting the negative (οὐδε) in Gal. 2.5 (whether 'to whom, οὐκ, also be omitted is of less importance), as if Paul could have been so blind as to consider compliance at the most critical moment to be harmless, because only temporary (πρὸς ὥραν). It is, on the contrary, probable that after 2.5, to complete the sentence beginning with 2.4, we ought to supply not 'we did not give place' (οὐκ ἐχώρησεν), as if, had the 'false brethren' appeared, Paul would have been prepared to comply, but 'on account of the false brethren' it was all the more necessary to offer a strenuous opposition. For at the outset they had demanded the circumcision of all Gentile converts even. As this is expressly stated in Acts 15.1, it is the more certain that it is necessarily presupposed by the negative (οὐδε) of Gal. 2.5. Nothing worse occurred, and not even Titus was compelled to be circumcised. The worst thing that might have occurred was, according to 2.7, have been that Paul should have run in vain (εἰς κενὸν ἔδραμον); i.e., that a decree should have been passed prohibiting the admission of Gentiles into Christianity without circumcision.

Thus the demand for the circumcision of Titus appears as a compromise proposed for the first time when the original proposal for the circumcision of all Gentile converts met with insuperable opposition from Paul and Barnabas. The very circumstantiality of a conference that passed through so many aspects is enough to show that these proposals could not possibly have been made without at least the moral support of the original apostles. Had the latter been on Paul's side from the first it has been held that they are to be included in the subject of 'gave place,' ἔδωκεν, any attempt of the kind must have been instantly frustrated by their authority.

It is, therefore, useless to construe Gal. 2:14 as a reason subsequently introduced to explain 2:15, as though the circumcision of Titus was refused by all parties alike, for the reason that it was demanded by the 'false brethren' alone. Considerations of language also render inadmissible the other interpretation, which supplements so as to read 'and indeed on behalf of the "false brethren" . . . it was said that he ought to be compelled to be circumcised (ἐπικυρώσει without αὐτὸν). The importance attached to the memory of the case of Titus is best shown in Acts; his name is never mentioned at all, those who accompanied Paul to the conference being 'Barnabas and certain others' (τινες ἄλλοι; Acts 15:2) see Acts, § 6). It is not going too far, therefore, to say that the original apostles were at the outset included in their attitude; indeed, if we may judge by what occurred soon afterwards at Antioch, this understates the case.

In harmony with this attitude was that which they adopted towards the subsequent mission to the Gentiles.

8. The apostles and the mission to the Gentiles.

Paul's practice of admitting Gentiles as members of the Christian Church without circumcision cannot have obtained the sanction of the other apostles at the outset. Assent was wrung from them with difficulty. Indeed, they did not give way on any ground of principle; otherwise their behaviour in the dispute at Antioch would have been impossible. They gave way only because of the divine verdict as shown by the event (ἡ ἀνάγκη . . . ἡγορευθεὶς τῇ ἑκκλησίᾳ διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος; Gal. 2:9); cp. Acts 15:12, to which they submitted perforce, though without recognising its underlying justification. Peter and James, therefore, cannot have expressed themselves, even approximately, as in Acts 15:7, as they are said to have spoken. Had what Peter (15:7) emphasizes in regard to Cornelius really occurred, there would have been no Council of Jerusalem at all (Acts, § 4).

Peter is further said (15:7) to have declared that God had removed the difference between Jews and Gentiles by purifying the hearts of the Gentiles, 'as though in the eyes of a Jew the impurity of the Gentiles were impurity of the heart itself.' He is, moreover, represented as saying (15:11) that his hope of salvation was through the grace of God alone, whereas at Antioch he maintained that the observance of the Law was necessary to salvation. Finally (15:10) he calls the Law a yoke intolerable even to the Jews, yet at Antioch he again submitted himself to it. He calls it a 'tempting of God' to put the yoke on the Gentiles also; yet at Antioch he broke with the Gentiles because they did not take it on themselves, thus putting moral pressure upon them to 'release' themselves (Gal. 2:14). In short, the speech of Peter (15:7) and Pauline Paulism (Gal. 2:14) are mutually irreconcilable. There is violence on the latter side that the author did not seem to notice, contrary to estimate the positions of the speakers, in the fact that the speech of James is considerably more reserved. The reference to Cornelius in 15:11, however, is just as unobscured as that in 15:7. James, and possibly he employed the quotation from Amos unless it be maintained that the discussion was carried on in the ignorance of the hated foreigners; for in the original it is not so, and that the rescue of men and nations to whom God's name had been made known should seek the Lord, it is only said that the Jews themselves should 'revert' to the Law (ἐπιστρέψατε), and that the other nations that had at any time been under the dominion of God (ἡ ἑθνη; cf. 15:12) do. Yet James pays his tribute to Paulinism if he implies that the imposition of the whole Mosaic Law upon the Gentiles is a burden to them in action, as long since, they ought to be relieved (15:10). Paul, on the other hand, did not make the positive proposal of 15:1. See below, § 15.

The result of the conference, according to Galatians, was a 'law of the Jews' (νόμος τῶν Ἰουδαίων) 2:14. What the precise extent of this νόμος was can be learned only by inference from the incidental facts. A division of missionary districts was arranged. The reason why the original apostles desired to carry on their work only among the Jews can be gathered with absolute certainty from the situation of affairs which had been brought about. The separation of the missionary districts had been the result of the conference concerning the circumcision of the Gentile convert. Had the circumcision of these converts been decided on, the original apostles need have felt as little cause to shrink from missions to the Gentiles as a few had to shrink from the work of winning proselytes. As the sequel at Antioch shows, what they found intolerable was the idea of that intimate daily association with unconverted heathen which would have become unavoidable if missionary work had been engaged in by them without circumcision of the Gentiles. That was the reason why they abandoned this part of the work to Paul and Barnabas. To look for the reason of the separation of missionary districts in differences of aptitude for winning other Gentiles or natural Jews is to misapprehend the causes that were really at work. Such consideration, as those mentioned may have had some circumstantial influence, but how could the same at Antioch have been possible if the presence of aptitudes had been the sole or even the chief cause of the separation? Not a word is there said about Peter's missionary work; the only question is whether he is prepared to eat at the same table with Gentile converts.

It is equally certain that the separation of districts was intended in an ethnographical, not in a geographical, sense. Had the original apostles undertaken to labour for the conversion of the Gentiles as well as for that of the Jews in Palestine without making upon any ground of principle, they would immediately have found themselves face to face with all the difficulties which had caused them to avoid the Gentile countries and confine their efforts to the land of their fathers. The separation had no purpose unless missions to natural Jews were to be assigned to them as their province. Conversely, Paul and Barnabas were, of course, to go only to men of Gentile birth. Jews seeking only a man whom they met in Gentile countries they were bound to turn away, referring them for guidance to their natural Jewish Christian missionaries. This might have led to the further consequence that in one and the same town there would have been at once two Christian communities, one of Jews and one of Gentiles. Association at meals, as well as at the Lord's Supper, would have been impossible between them. This intolerable state of affairs, however, was exactly what the Pauline leaders had long ago contrived to avert; and this success was regarded by Paul as the highest triumph of the view of Christianity which he advocated. It is very reasonable to ask how he could have had any share in an arrangement by which, in the churches he had founded, the will of separation between Jewish and Gentile Christians, which it had cost so much labour to destroy, was again raised up. To fall back on the view that the separation was intended to be geographical would, however, be wrong. A separation on such a basis the apostles, as has already been shown, could not possibly have accepted. It would be necessary to draw the conclusion that the statement of Galatians must be pronounced unhistorical, and the apostles themselves, and Pauline, were there really no other way out of the difficulty. Before taking this step, however, we shall do well to remember that men have often enough acted upon a compromise without having formed any adequately clear conception of its consequences. The Christian church would specially have fallen a victim into two separate communities, the one of Jewish and the other of Gentile Christians, had no agreement been reached. Neither of the parties was able to abandon its view: each felt itself under a strict religious obligation to maintain its own principles. There must, therefore, have been the greatest eagerness to grasp at any formula that presented itself as a solution. 'We to the Jews, you to the Gentiles,' appeared to be a formula of the kind, and joy in the renewed sense of brotherhood may have blinded men's eyes to the impracticability of the proposal. This would happen all the more readily if the formula was so loose that each party could understand it in a different sense. In the absence of more precise definition, the geographical interpretation must have seemed to Paul as obviously the correct one as the ethnographical interpretation appeared to the other apostles — to Paul, who became not merely to the Gentiles a Gentile, but also to the Jews a Jew, that he might by all means win some, and, in order to save those belonging to his own race, would willingly have been accursed from Christ (1 Cor. 9.20 f.; Rom. 9.3; cp BARN. § 1). In the scene at Antioch the misunderstanding revealed itself only too clearly; but this does not prove that there was no misunderstanding at Jerusalem. Even in the aspect under which the matter had to be presented at the conference at Jerusalem, the unity sought for was limited. The 'right hand of fellowship' (δεξιὰ κοινωνίας) which they held out to each other was at the same time a parting handshake. According to their fundamental principles, the Jewish Christians neither would nor could have any very intimate communion, any really brotherly intercourse, with the Gentile Christians. It is worthy of notice that the support of the poor is represented in Gal. 2.10 less as being the only demand made upon the Pauline churches than as being the only bond by which the two halves of Christendom were to be kept together.

9. Result of Council according to Gal.

COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM

There is, however, no necessity for assuming that these aims from the Gentile Christians were like temple dues, or intended to express a position of inferiority as compared with that of Jewish Christians. In view of the notorious poverty of the church at Jerusalem (see COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 5), it would have been unreasonable to require reciprocity, and doubtless Paul was glad to evince his goodwill on such neutral ground. For the rest, it was quite impossible that the Gentiles should be treated by the Jews as having equal rights and full citizenship in the kingdom of God. The OT promises applied only to the chosen race and to those who had been received into it by circumcision. The Jewish Christians had made the concession—from their point of view a concession of real magnitude—of sanctioning the mission to the Gentiles without circumcision; but it was not to be supposed that this could be granted except on the basis that this class of converts was to hold somewhat the same position as that of the semi-proselytes (συνεισδυοὶ τῶν Ἰουδαίων) among the Jews; they figured only as a 'younger branch in the kingdom of God.' In no case could the original apostles have set the same value on the conversion of these Christians of the second class through the agency of Paul as on their own missionary activity. It is remarkable that Gal. 2.6 does not run, on the analogy of 2.8a, 'unto the apostleship of the Gentiles' (εἰς ἀποστολὴν τῶν ἐθνῶν). Freedom of constriction is, of course, a characteristic of Paul's style, and thus 'unto the Gentiles' (εἰς τὰ ἔθνη) also may be explained as a case of brachylogy. Still, it is noteworthy that—e.g., in 1 Cor. 9.1—he does not base any appeal on the fact that apostleship (ἀποστολή) had been conceded to him by the original apostles. How effective—if open to him—this appeal would have been against the Judaizers at Corinth who called his apostleship in question, and set up those very apostles as the supreme authority! The truth is that he does not appear to have received any such recognition. Thus he would seem to have been recognised only as a fellow-worker, in the Christian field, not as a fully accredited apostle.

According to Acts, the result of the Council was a decree in 15.23-29. Nevertheless, as long as the word

10. The decree in Acts. 'imparted nothing to me' (ἐμὸν οὐδὲν προσέθετο), in Gal. 2.6, allowed to stand, we shall be precluded from accepting this binding as a formal decree. Whether the words mean 'The δοκοῦντες imparted nothing further to me' (so according to 1.16), or 'They made no further rejoinder to my communication' (so according to 2.2), is immaterial. Their meaning made clear by 'contrariwise' (τοὐναντίον) in 2.7: 'Not only did they say nothing unfavourable to me, but also they pledged themselves to fellowship with me.' We cannot better convince ourselves of the certainty of this conclusion than by examining the attempts that have been made to avoid it.

Theologians have done their utmost to maintain that Paul was justified in using the words ἐμὸν οὐδὲν προσέθετο, instead of mentioning the decree of the apostles, because the decree was known to the Galatians already, or because he did not want to put a weapon into the hand of his opponents, or because the decree was only temporary, perhaps, not binding at all, but merely having reference to a custom, the object of which had been even discovered to be the protection of the Gentiles against trichinosis. In the last of these methods of evading the interpretation stated above, all idea of a formal decree having been promulgated is given up; but even if the agreement on the substance of the decision had been only verbal, Paul could not have said, ἐμὸν οὐδὲν προσέθετο.

Apart from this, the dispute at Antioch conclusively disproves the historicity of the decision, whether in the form of a regular decree or not. It is clear that any such arrangement, had it been come to, would have had the effect of rendering it possible for Jewish and Gentile Christians to associate with one another at meals. (as is stated in Acts 16.4) Paul and Silas continued to enforce the decree during their next journey, we are bound all the more to suppose that it came into force at Antioch immediately after its promulgation there. In that case, James and his followers had no reason for taking offence at Peter's eating with Gentile converts.

If, then, we are forced to admit that no arrangement of this nature was made at the Council at all, there are many who would like to retain the opinion that Paul was substantially in favour of such an arrangement. This, however, is a mistake. The four prohibitions are

11. Its prohibitions. taken, either from the seven 'Noachic precepts' (as they are called in the Talmud), by means of which a modus vivendi is said to have been arrived at between the Jews and the 'sons of Noah' (the Gentiles), or directly from the original ordinances on which these are based (Lev. 17.10-18.30), which likewise were promulgated, not for the Israelites alone, but also for the foreigners in their midst. The latter source is the more probable, for the Talmud prohibits actual unchastity; but it cannot be doubted that, had such a prohibition appeared to be at all necessary in Acts 15, the prohibition of murder and of theft would also have been adopted from the Talmud. In its association with ordinances so far from being common to all mankind, so peculiarly Jewish, as the prohibition of blood, of the flesh of animals that had died or been strangled, and of the flesh of animals sacrificed to idols, it is much more likely that the interdiction upon what is here called πορνεία refers to marriages within the degrees of affinity forbidden in Lev. 18.6 ff. (cp BASTARD). Moreover, as the passage in Leviticus lies at the foundation of Acts 15, in a general way only, it is possible that marriages with Gentiles also may have been included; these were prohibited by Ex. 34.16 Dt. 7.3 Ezra 9.2, and would have made it quite impossible for a Jewish Christian to enter the house of a Gentile who had contracted such a marriage.

Now, as to Paul's view in regard to eating things sacrificed to idols, we have full and exact information. As a general rule (1 Cor. 8.10.21-23; Rom. 14.14) he allows it; it is to be avoided only in cases where it might cause offence to a weak Christian who mistakenly thinks that the Levitical prohibition of it is of perpetual obligation.

COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM

Paul does recognise, it is true, one exception, which he mentions in 1 Cor. 10:14-22, though, curiously, not in the exactly similar case in 8:13 (cp. DeMoss, § 81); but even this passage contains no prohibition of the practice excepting at a religious ceremony of this kind. In the decree of Acts, on the contrary, the eating of things offered to idols is, it need hardly be said, forbidden in all circumstances, just as to partake of blood, or of the flesh of animals that have died or been strangled, is forbidden. Here the prohibition turns on the nature of the thing itself (cp. ἀσυνγνώστα, Acts 15:20); the soul was thought to reside in the blood (Lev. 17:14), and to eat the soul would have been an abomination. Now, as Paul does not concur in the decree of the apostles on the question of eating animals sacrificed to idols, it would not be wise to assume his agreement in regard to the prohibition of blood and of the flesh of animals that had died or been strangled, about which we have no expression of opinion by him. As to the question of marriage, he carried on an uncompromising warfare against unchastity of every kind (1 Cor. 5:6-13:23); but unchastity does not appear to have been what was intended in the decree of the apostles. Marriages with unbelievers, on the contrary, he did, it is true, advise against (1 Cor. 7:39), but in no case on grounds of principle. Otherwise he could not have enjoined that a Christian married to an unbelieving spouse should continue the relation if the other consented; nor could he have declared that the unbelieving spouse was sanctified by marriage with a Christian, and that even the children of a mixed marriage were holy (1 Cor. 7:12-14). The children were not baptised; if they had been, their sanctity would have been a consequence of their baptism, and not deducible from their connection with their parents simply. Accordingly, if Paul discourages marriages with unbelievers for the future (7:39), his reason cannot have been that they were in themselves wrong, but only that they were incompatible with the deeper spiritual sympathy of true spouses. On these grounds we are obviously still less entitled to assume that Paul would have pronounced to be wrong all marriages within the degrees of affinity, down to that with a sister-in-law, forbidden in Lev. 18:6-18, except in those cases which are manifestly contrary to nature, as, e.g., that given in 1 Cor. 7:1-2. On no single point, therefore, does Paul even express substantial agreement with the restrictions imposed by the decree of the apostles.¹

The last attempt to rescue some remnants of credibility for Acts connects itself with 21:25. Here Paul is acquainted with the decree of the apostles as if it were something new. It is absolutely impossible to reconcile this with the representation of Acts 15; but it is suggested that, if the latter has to be abandoned on account of Galatians, it may be possible to retain at least what is said in Acts 21. On this view the apostles issued the decree simply on their own responsibility, without consulting Paul; and this version of the matter was derived by the author from one of his sources. Unfortunately, the source of this passage (at least, according to all attempts hitherto made to distinguish the sources of Acts) is made out to be the same as that of Acts 15:20, or of 15:28 f., or of both those passages. To avoid this conspicuous failure in the argument, J. Weiss deletes from the account in

1 Some scholars have upheld the modified view that these restrictions were at all events customarily observed at the time among the Gentile Christians, many of whom had previously been semi-proselytes to Judaism and would therefore have naturally continued to obey these ordinances as Christians; and these would have been followed by the other Gentile converts. The only church, however, concerning which we have any information in this connection proves the contrary. In Corinth Paul had to contend with the very worst modes of unchastity, and with practices in regard to things offered to idols that went too far even for him; and mixed marriages were quite usual. It is hardly possible to believe that things could have been so completely different elsewhere, even if Corinth was exceptionally bad in these respects.

15:5-11:13 (for 15:1-412, see above, § 1 div. f.) all references to Paul and Barnabas (15:2-8) as editorial additions, and assumes that in the original source 15:5-11:13 related only to the conference of the original apostles among themselves, which is then called to mind in 21:25. Apart from the extreme helplessness of this assumption, it is to be remarked that this particular source is considered by Weiss himself, as well as by all other critics of the sources of Acts, to be untrustworthy. In particular, the verse in question (21:25) has been actually taken to be an interpolation, and in fact is so little necessary to the context that if it were wanting its absence would not be noticed. Read with the context, it causes no difficulty; but the context itself is not historical (see Acts, § 7). In any conceivable view, therefore, suspicion is thrown on the verse by a critical examination of the sources. In the absence of any confirmation, it certainly does not possess enough of internal probability to justify its acceptance.

In fine, it appears that the Tübingen school is not without justification in maintaining that the decree of the apostles is a fiction invented by the author for the purpose of promoting a union of Jewish and Gentile Christians. Only, in the second century it would have been little calculated to secure this object. The assumption is that these regulations were new at the time of writing. Now, they contain very stringent restrictions upon the freedom of the Gentile Christians in the interests of the Jewish; but the Gentiles were at that time so largely in the minority and so full of the consciousness of their title to membership in the Church, that they would hardly have acquiesced in such restrictions, then. Besides, the regulations contained in the decree of the apostles must, in their essence, have been actually in force at the time of the composition of Acts (see Acts, § 10), however little they may have been so in the first century.

The Epistle of Barnabas (3:6-16) betrays traces of this in the complaint that Christians believed themselves bound to observe the Mosaic Law, and from the middle of the second century there is evidence of this on all hands (Dob. 6:35; Jer. 1, 2, 35; Luc. 24:44; 1 Pet. 2:11; 1 Pet. 3:17; 1 Pet. 4:17; 1 Pet. 5:13; 1 Pet. 5:14; 1 Pet. 5:15; 1 Pet. 5:16; 1 Pet. 5:17; 1 Pet. 5:18; 1 Pet. 5:19; 1 Pet. 5:20; 1 Pet. 5:21; 1 Pet. 5:22; 1 Pet. 5:23; 1. The first part of the document is a letter from the President of the United States to the Congress, dated January 3, 1862. It is a very long letter, and it contains a great deal of information about the state of the country at that time. It is a very important document, and it is one of the most interesting documents in the collection.

metaphor, he designated "enchantment." This term was then extended to every alliance, even where the parties were in a position to do up a mutually binding document in the case. A Kindel and a Kindelheit are Kind (Knecht) and Kind (Knecht). As equals did not actually lay shackles upon each other, this is evidently a figurative name of the word; and as the thought of mutual obligation cannot have been immediately suggested by the imposition of fetters, it is as clearly secondary. The royal word of judgment or assent, Kindheit, when strengthened by an oath, was so firm, it could not be broken. A "fettered" horse was one firmly built, a 'fettered' place one surrounded by solid walls, 2 K 38, 12-17 (cp fortis fortress, fortified town, from the same root, Shalm, etc. 34, and see Del. loc. IIITZ, 135).

From the Amarna correspondence we know that some time before the Hebrew invasion a Babylonian dialect was written, and undoubtedly also to some extent spoken, in Palestine. The Israelites may therefore have become acquainted with this term through the Amorites. In the nomadic state, the priestly oracle by the casting of lots, the gûl, probably sufficed. Agricultural and city life called for increased civil authority. It is possible that gûl in the sense of 'binding ordinance', 'sentence', was adapted to supply the need of a corresponding word to designate the judicial decision of a ruler.

In the Hellenistic narratives the denominative gûl occurs with the significance 'to appoint' (1 S. 18). The noun was still used by the author of Ecclesiastes to denote the sentence pronounced by a judge (Ecc. 3). The fact that the dominant idea attached to the word at all times was that of a binding decree is better accounted for by this Babylonian derivation than by recourse to the gûl 'bind' 'to sever'. It also yields a satisfactory explanation of the early appearance of gûl in the sense of 'alliance', in accordance with the significance of 'community', 'nation'. On the other hand, the sometimes observed ceremony of placing between the severed pieces of an animal in making a solemn pledge may have been an inheritance from the nomadic period. In the phrase gûl gûl, possibly testifying to this rite, the verb throws no more light upon the noun than in the Greek ἀποκτείνω; whilst the secondary meaning of gûl, 'to decree' (cp the gloss to Hag. 25), bears witness to the primary and persistent significance of gûl.

The classical distinction between διαθήκη (diathēkē, will) and συνθήκη (synthēkē, agreement) was not entirely lost in Hellenistic Greek.

συνθήκη is exclusively used of a political alliance in 1 and 2 Macc. Apollonius' preference for συνθήκη cannot be explained by prejudice; its use by Symmachus was evidently dictated by considerations of style; even Theodotion's conservatism did not prevent him from abandoning at times the uniform rendering of διαθήκη by the Alexandrian translators can scarcely have been due to anything else than a consciousness of the fundamental meaning of gûl. This likewise applies to the independent rendering of the word by ἔργον in the Targums.

(i.) Civil.—In civil life the Hebrews seem to have employed the word to denote sentence, decree, ordinance, statute, law, pledge, testament, alliance, covenant, community, nation.

4. Specialised significations.

A successful leader against the enemy was in early Israel designated a judge (šāpāt), because the foe was regarded as a transgressor, the victory as a judgment, and the valorous chief as the natural arbitrator in internal feuds (cp GOVERNMENT, § 17). Even the king was a judge as well as a warrior, 1 K. 3, 16 ff. [1], 1 S. 8, 20 [E]. When this unity of the judicial and administrative functions ceased, the old term designating the decision of a ruler remained in legal phraseology. A collection of judicial decisions (gûl gûl) was called a berith-book, Ex. 21, 1 [E], the sentence was termed a berith (Eccles. 38, 3). But it also continued to denote the victor's decree affecting the condition of a city that capitulates (e.g., Jabez, 1 S. 11, 1 [1]), a territory that is ceded (e.g., Ishbaid's, represented by Amur, 2 S. 3, 12 ff. 21 [1]), a rival kingdom that is forced to come to terms (e.g., Benhadad's, 1 K. 20, 34 [E]), or a kingdom reduced to a state of dependence (e.g., Zedekiah's, Ez. 17, 13-16); and it was applied to the ordinance, statute, law, or constitution imposed by a king upon his own people, as David's (2 S. 5, 1 [1]), Josiah's (2 K. 23, 3), Zedekiah's (Jer. 34, 8 ff.), Antiochus's (Dan. 9, 27; 'the shall impose severe regulations on the many during one week'). Such a royal declaration was considered inviolable; a king would not go beyond his word in severity, nor fail to fulfil his promise. The Jabezites regarded their lives as safe, if Nahash would solemnly declare his willingness to rule over them as his servants. Antiochus Lysipator is severely censured (Is. 33, 8) for himself violating the constitutional rights he had granted (1 Mace. 6, 1 ff.; 2 Macc. 13, 2 ff.). Thus the word assumed the meaning of 'a pledge'. The captives placed themselves to cheer the king (2 K. 11), the nobles of Jerusalem to set their slaves free (Jer. 34, 1), Zedekiah and other citizens to drive away the ways of Zedekiah (Jer. 34, 10 ff.).

COVENANT

(ii.) Domestic.—Applied to domestic relations the berith was at first simply 'the law of the husband' (Gen. 7, 1). Since a wife was captured, bought, or given in marriage, her absolute subjection to her husband's authority was properly characterised as 'enfranchisement'. Social development, however, without introducing the idea of equality, tended to emphasise the obligations that grew with power. The husband's berith became a solemn pledge given before witnesses (1 K. 16; Mal. 2, 14). In this sense the word could be used also of the wife. In Prov. 2, 17, gûl gûl seems to mean 'the promise by her God'; the same pledge of faithfulness is alluded to in 1 K. 16, 1 (not for the sake of thy promise), and possibly also in 1 Esdr. 25.

A father's decision was binding upon his children. Especially the last paternal decree, the testament, was irrevocable. Whether it was a disposition of property or a dispensation of blessings and curses, deemed effectual in antiquity, it was termed a berith (Gal. 3, 15; Heb. 9, 17; test. auct. patr., passim), and had the nature of a promise.

(iii.) International.—Between nations equal in power a favour conferred or promised calls for a gift in return. To perpetuate mutually advantageous relations, pledges are exchanged. In this way political alliances may arise with mutual obligations. The best example of such a covenant is that between Solomon and Hiram (quoted in the Deuteronomistic note, 1 K. 7, 26, 12), can be relied upon. Of this nature were probably also the agreements between Hezion and Amah, Benhadad and Asa, and Benhadad and Baasha, referred to in 1 K. 15, 18 [1]. The berith with Assyria, Hos. 12, 1 [1], was originally intended as an alliance of this kind, though Hosea had reason to complain that out of such alliances there grew only new rights, i.e., demands (10, 1). Sennacherib's league with Rome was of the same character (1 Mace. 11, 1-3; Jos. Ant. xiii. 7, 1).

(iv.) Religious.—Since the relation of nations were thus frequently regulated by a berith, it is not strange that such a basis should sometimes have been assumed without sufficient foundation. When the once peaceful Arabic neighbours began to push the Edomites out of Mount Seir, Obadiah looked upon this as a breach of covenant on the part of allies (1, 7). The simultaneous attack of several peoples on the Jewish commonwealth described in 1 Mace. 5, 1 ff., seemed to the author of Ps. 83 to be the result of an alliance against Judaea (1, 2). Israel, if Amos 1, 6 is in its right place (see Amos, § 60), Tyre is charged with forgetting the 'covenant of brothers' with some other city or people, probably Phoenician; kinship is the basis of the assumption. Zech. 11, 1 ff. probably describes a change in the policy of the reigning pontiff as regards the Gentiles, rather than actual alliances with neighbouring states, as the consequent internal feud suggests. It is also natural that recourse should be had to the same fiction to justify or to condemn present conditions and demands. In the Negebi tribes of Israelite and Edomite extraction assumed themselves of their rights, against the Philistines, to certain wells and oases, by virtue of a solemn pledge given by Abimelech of Gerar to their berith goyim, Isaac (Gen. 26, 1 [1], 21 ff. [1]). Similarly, the border lines between Aramean and Israelite territory in Galilee were regarded as fixed by an agreement between Laban and Jacob, securing also the rights of certain Aramean enclaves on Israelite soil (Gen. 31, 44 [1]). Certain remarkable facts in the history of the Gileadites (see Gen. 48, 1) gave rise to the story told in Josh. 9, 6 ff. [1], 9, 1 [1]—a story which shows how unobjectionable such alliances with the natives were considered in other times. When 1 Mace. 8, 17; 2 Mace. 4, 1 are scarcely historical, phetic teaching had led to a recognition of the baneful influences upon the life of Israel of Canaanitish modes of thought and worship, the warning took the form of a prohibition of alliances projected into the period previous to the invasion (Dt. 7.2 Jud. 2.2 [Dt.] Ex. 23.12 [E] Ex. 34.12-15 [P]). Gen. 11.13, though found in a late Midrash, may reflect the memory of a long dominant Canaanitish majority in Hebron, since, with all the glorification of Abram, the three chiefs Mamre, Eschcol, and Aner are designated as בְּרִיתֵי 'holders of the pledge.' To legitimatise the Davidic dynasty, Jonathan was represented as having abdicated the throne in favour of David, while Saul was still alive, on condition of remaining next to the king in rank (1 S. 23.17 f. [E]). Such an action on his part was then accounted for by the story of a still earlier Yahwé-bérith of friendship (1 S. 18.3 [E₂]), referred to again in 1 S. 20.8-16 [E]. The friendship itself is sufficient to explain David's kindness to Jonathan's family; but the passage testifies to the custom of pledging friendship by an oath and a solemn ceremony.

(v.) Bérith = 'nation.'—In Dan. 11.22 בְּרִית is the title given to Onias III. This probably means prince or ruler of the nation. The בְּרִית קָדְשׁ Dan. 1.2² p. is the holy nation against which Antiochus I Epiphanes directed his attention and his fury; and בְּרִית קָדְשׁ are the apostates who abandoned the holy nation and lived like the Gentiles (cp. 1 Macc. 1.15, also Judith 9.13 1 Macc. 1.63). These renegades are called בְּרִיתֵי קָדְשׁ Dan. 11.32; 'those that bring condemnation upon the nation,' are responsible for its misfortunes. This significance should probably also be given to the word in Ps. 74.20 (Hitz., Che.). The בְּרִית Mal. 3.1, may be the angelic representative of the nation. At a somewhat earlier period in some inserted passages in 11. Is. (see ISRAEL, ii, § 16, Che. SBOT) בְּרִית seems already to occur in this sense. The context indicates that בְּרִית Is. 12.6 49.3, is meant to designate Israel as an independent organised community (lit. 'a commonwealth of a people').¹ Until Israel had regained its status of independence it could not rebuild the ruined cities, or restore the land to its former glory. This meaning may possibly be traced still further back; BAAL-BÉRITH (7.7), as the Elohist designates the god of Shechem, may mean 'god of the community.' The word used of the city-kingdom of Shechem in the seventh century (cp. Ass. Birtu, בִּרְתָּא, fortified town) may well have been applied to the ardently desired kingdom of Zion at the end of the sixth.

(vi.) Metaphorical.—Metaphorically בְּרִית is used in Job 31.1 of the law that Job has imposed upon his eyes that they shall not look upon a virgin; in 40.28 [11.4] of the pledge which Leviathan is not likely to give, that he will allow himself to be captured and become a slave; and in 5.23 of Job's agreement with the stones of the field that they shall not prevent the cultivation of his land.

No important transaction was done in antiquity without religious sanction. The oath and the curse were extensively used in judicial proceedings, legislative enactments, and political treaties. Before passing sentence, the judge pronounced a curse or adjuration to arouse the conscience and elicit a confession (1 K. 8.31 [D] Nu. 5.21 [P] Lev. 5.1 [P] Prov. 29.24 Mt. 26.62). A pledge or promise was made more binding by a curse (7.28, Ex. 17.16 Deut. 29.11 [12] 20.11). To set forth symbolically this curse, animals were cut into pieces, and the person giving the pledge passed between the severed parts, signifying his readiness to be thus destroyed himself, if he should fail to keep his promise. It is to be observed that in the only passages where this ceremony is referred to (Gen.

¹ Cp. אֶסֶת אֶתְּא 'a wild ass of a man,' i.e., a wild man, Gen. 16.12. So in the main Duhm, though his conception of בְּרִית is different. Dr. Kratochewicz (The Foundation of the Law, vol. 1, and Kosters) explains 'a covenant with the people'—i.e., one in or through whom my covenant with the people is realised.

COVENANT

15 and Jer. 34.18 f.), there is no question of an alliance, and only one party passed between the pieces (cp. Dictys Cretensis, Epheueris belli Trojani, i. 15). Whether this custom was observed also in the conclusion of treaties, as was the case in Babylonia, if Ephrem was correctly informed (Comment. to Gen. 15), is uncertain, and there seems to be no justification for connecting this rite in particular with an agreement between two parties, or for supposing בְּרִית to have been the name of a ceremony of which it was an essential part. In most instances no doubt the oath sufficed. Sometimes the right hand was given in addition (Ex. 17.16, 2 Macc. 13.22), or a handshake took the place of the oath (Lev. 10.10 Prov. 6.1 17.1 22.26). It is possible that during the oath salt was sometimes thrown into the fire to intensify, by the crackling sound the terror-inspiring character of the act, originally to render more audible the voice of the deity in the fire, hence the salt-bérith (Lev. 2.13 [P] Nu. 18.10 [P] 2 Ch. 13.5). As vows were taken and agreements made at some shrine, the nomenclature dwelling in the sacred stone or structure was the chief witness (Gen. 31.43 [P] 5.2 [P] Josh. 24.27 [E] 2 K. 11.4 23.3), and a sacrificial meal preceded or followed the act (Gen. 26.30 [P] 31.46 [P] 1 K. 24.11 [P] 2 S. 3.20 [P]). The sprinkling of sacrificial blood upon the worshipper, a survival of the custom of sharing it with the deity, appears to have disappeared early from the cult. But it may have continued longest in the case of persons taking a solemn pledge, as is suggested by its use in the installation of priests (Ex. 29.20 [P] Lev. 8.23 [P]). This would account for the term berith-blood (Ex. 24.8 [E]). Where an alliance was desired presents were offered by the party taking the initiative (Gen. 21.27 [E]); probably the sacrificial animals; Hos. 12.2 [1] 6.

Since a decree, pledge, or compact was thus, as a rule, ratified by some sacred rite at a sanctuary, the word בְּרִית readily assumed 'bérith,' a religious significance, and was applied to a solemn declaration of the deity.

(i.) In J. E. and early Prophets.—In the earliest Judæan narrative Yahwé gives to Abram a promise that his descendants shall possess Palestine and symbolically invokes upon himself a curse, if he shall fail to keep it (Gen. 15.13 [P]; cp. Gen. 21.7 [P]). When Moses is reluctant to leave the mountain-home of his god and pleads for an assurance that Yahwé shall go with him, a solemn promise is given him (Ex. 31.1 a [P]; add, with SBOT, 28). The original context can scarcely have been anything else than a declaration that Yahwé will accompany his servant, probably in 'the messenger,' the בְּרִית. This promise was no doubt also referred to by the Elohist, though the importance of the ark in his narrative (cp. Nu. 10.33 f. [E]) renders it probable that Yahwé's presence was here connected with this palladium. After the subjugation of the Canaanites by the first kings of Israel the question arose as to the justice of this deed. Israel's right to the land was then established by the fiction of a promise given to the mythical ancestor. A religious problem of grave importance was how Yahwé, whose home was on Sinai, or Horeb, could manifest himself at the Palestinian sanctuaries. The solution was that he had pledged himself to go with Moses in 'the messenger.' The story of Elijah's visit to Horeb was probably written early in the eighth century; in it בְּרִית occurs in the sense of commandment (1 K. 19.15). This is also the meaning of the term in Dt. 33.9 (the Blessing of Moses), as the parallel אֶתְּא shows, and in Josh. 7.11 [E]. Hosea uses the word to denote an injunction of Yahwé upon the beasts of the field not to harm Israel (2.20 [12]), and a commandment of Yahwé to the general (8.1; possibly also 6.7). It is noticeable that this prophet, who through a sad domestic experience learned to apply the figure of a marriage to Yahwé's relation to Israel, never employs berith in the sense of a covenant. The בְּרִית was probably still operative in the Law of the husband, and the idea of a covenant with

Yahwé had not yet been formed. The covenant with death, the compact with Sheol (Is. 28:15-17), appears to be an alliance with the powers of the nether world, implying mutual stipulations. Men who preached the destruction of Israel and Yahwé's independence of the people, would not be likely to characterize the existing relation by a term current in necromancy.

(ii.) Deuteronomist.—Even the transformation of the Yahwistic and Elohist narratives of the Horeb-bérith, in the reign of Manasséh, by which the promise given to Moses became a solemnly imposed law (the Decalogue of J. Ex. 34:13-26, and that of E. Ex. 20:1-17), and the judicial decisions of the birth book, Ex. 20:22-23, became divine injunctions, does not contemplate an alliance. In the law promulgated by Josiah in 621 (not likely to be found outside of Dt. 12:26; but see DEUTERONOMY, § 5 f.) the word does not occur. But this law was designated at the outset as a birth-book (2 K. 23:21). It seems to have been intended to take the place of Ex. 20:22 ff. The promise to Abraham is strongly emphasised by the Deuteronomistic writers and enlarged to one given to Isaac and Jacob as well (Dt. 1:11-12; 28:1-2; 32:1-5 [Dt.]; cp also Dt. 18:15-16; 18:18-19; 28:1 etc.). At a time when Judah was in imminent danger of losing its heritage, faith took refuge in this divine assurance, manifesting Yahwé's love, and justified by the obedience of the patriarchs (Dt. 1:11-12; Gen. 26:4 ff. [Dt.]). One writer of this school declares that Yahwé announced on Horeb his birth consisting of the ten words (Dt. 1:3-5 ff.), and that this birth was written on tablets of stone (9a) and placed in the ark (see ARK, § 1 f., 3, 9). Another author made the Josianic code the basis of a covenant concluded in the fields of Moab (Dt. 29:12-14; 31 ff. etc.); 26:17-19; cp the later gloss 29:1 [28:69]. Here the idea of a compact between Yahwé and Israel involving mutual rights and obligations is fully developed. Yahwé pledges himself to make Israel his own people, distinct from, honoured above all others; Israel declares that it will make Yahwé its god and obey his commandments. This conception was subsequently transferred also to the Horeb-bérith; cp Judg. 2:1 ff. [Dt.].

(iii.) Jeremiah and Ezekiel.—Jeremiah does not seem to have participated in this development. He used bérith only to designate Josiah's law, which he regarded as having been given through Moses at the time when Yahwé brought Israel out of Egypt (11:2 f.; 68:10-31 ff.). It is evident from the context that בְּרִיתָהּ (11:10) indicates not the disannulment of a covenant, but the breaking of a law by disobedience, the law still remaining in force. Ezekiel, on the other hand, not only employs בְּרִיתָהּ in the sense of 'law' (20:37; 'the fetter of the law', 11:7), but also applies it for the first time to the conjugal relation of Yahwé and Israel (16:8-59-60). Marriage is here based on mutual pledges; it is a covenant. According to Ezekiel's view of history, Yahwé had entered into such an alliance with Israel in Egypt, but the people had by a long career of unfaithfulness forced its dissolution (16:59). Yet he hopes that in the future Yahwé will renew his intimate relations with Israel. There will be no covenant, however (for Israel's pledge cannot be trusted; 16:61), but a gracious dispensation of Yahwé (16:62), everlasting (37:26), and full of prosperity (31:25), ushered in by the restoration of the Davidic rule and the temple-service (37:25-26).

(iv.) Exilic times.—How ardently the next generation expected that the fallen tent of David would be raised up again, may be seen in the appendix to Amos (9:11 ff.) and in the more pregnant form given to the promise 2 S. 7:16 [Ez.] in 2 S. 23:5 (בְּרִיתָהּ). Such hopes may have been awakened by the honour shown to Jehoiachin by Amil Marduk in 561, and may have attached themselves to his son SINSIBAZZAR (57 ff.). They were naturally encouraged by the sympathetic tone of Deuteronomy's message (Is. 40-48), even though this writer himself knows no other Messiah than Cyrus. With the freer intercourse between the holy city and the Jews of the dispersion, possible after the Persian conquest (cp Zech. 6:6), and the appointment of Sheshbazzar, and after him of Zerubbabel, as governor, the Second Isaiah's evangel was brought to Palestine, and changed the comfortless lamentations of the native population (Lam. 3) into songs of redemptive suffering (Is. 42:1-49:6; 50:4-52:13; 53:1-2), or of future restoration (the Zion songs in Is. 40-55). It was felt that by the accession of a king of the old dynasty, a living witness would appear of Yahwé's faithfulness to David (Is. 55:1 ff.), a restorer of the territory once possessed (Is. 55:4 & Mic. 4:1-5 ff.), a fulfilment of the promised dispensation of everlasting peace (Is. 54:1-55:3), and that Zion would thus become again an organised community (צִיּוֹן מְבֻרָכָה), able to build up what had fallen into ruins, to attract the exiles to their spiritual home, and to teach the nations the manner in which Yahwé should be worshipped (Is. 42:6-49:1).

(v.) Haggai, Zechariah, etc. The prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah bear witness to the strength of the royalist sentiment at Jerusalem. The hopes of the Jews proved illusory; but in the midst of disappointment the belief in Yahwé's promises lived on. 'Malachi' felt assured that Yahwé would return, and accounted for his delay by the sins of the degenerate priestly descendants of the faithful and reverent Levi, to whom Yahwé's promise (7:2) of life and prosperity was given (2:1-6), and of those who, fascinated by foreign women, had forgotten the pledge (7:2) given to the wives of their youth (2:14). The author or authors of Is. 56-66 also deplored the marriages with aliens and the survival of forbidden forms of worship, but saw the remedy in the law: the keeping of Yahwé's commandments (7:2) would render the very unclean fit for membership in Israel (56:4); the distinction of Israel lay in that gracious arrangement (7:2) by which Yahwé's law, proclaimed by men of the spirit and repeated by a mindless people, would be its perpetual possession (59:21), a divine dispensation involving prosperity as a reward of obedience (61:8). The author of Jer. 30 ff., however, rises to a far greater height. He looks forward to a new regime based solely on Yahwé's love, which will take the place of the old and less permanent relation (Jer. 31:1 ff.). This work may perhaps be assigned to the time of the Greco-Persian war, when the writer confidently looked for extraordinary proofs of Yahwé's pardoning grace (see JEREMIAH, ii. §§ 7 [iii.] 8 [ii.]).

(vi.) P.—The conception of the bérith as a gracious act on the part of God, by which he binds himself to a certain course of action in reference to Israel and the world, implying the bestowal of blessings and the revelation of his will, becomes dominant in the Priestly Code. The bérith or engagement is here carried back to Abraham and Noah. Beside the Noah-bérith (Gen. 9:1-17) there is no room for an Adam-bérith; beside the Abrahamic (Gen. 17; cp Ex. 2:24-6:4), no need of a Sinaitic. The Noah-bérith secures the stability of earth's conditions and of man's life, and the accompanying law of blood is but a beneficent provision for the preservation of the race; the Abrahamic guarantees to Israel the land of Palestine and a large population, and the command of circumcision implies only a distinction conferred upon this people from which all further favours flow. The sign in the sky and the sign in the body are constant reminders to the duty of these merciful engagements. By the use of בְּרִיתָהּ and בְּרִיתָהּ ('establish,' occasionally 'maintain') instead of בְּרִיתָהּ the nature of the bérith as a gift, a divine institution, is emphasised. Though the word has thus become a religious terminus technicus in this code, it still occurs with the sense simply of commandment, Ex. 31:16 (the law of the sabbath), Lev. 24:1 (the injunction concerning sabbath, or of promise, Nu. 25:13 ff. (the assurance to Phinehas of an everlasting priesthood in his line).

(vii) Later writers. The author of Jer. 50 f. (see JEREMIAH, ii, §§ 7, 8 [iii]) refers to the Abrahamic dispensation in the spirit of the Priestly Writer (see that vividly expressed passage on the return of the men of Israel and Judah, Jer. 50:3);¹ and Jer. 11:21 reflects the same conception. Ps. 89:30 105:8 106:45 111:5 also show the influence of this idea.

On the other hand, in Ps. 25:14 132:12 בְּרִית is only a synonym of קָדֶשׁ, and in 118:50 107:78 of קָדֶשׁ. In Ps. 50:5, בְּרִית בְּרִיתָהּ יְהוָה, 'those who pledge their troth to me by sacrifice,' are graciously told that Yahwē will not demand excessive offerings,² and in 78:10 the men of the Mosiac period are charged with not being faithful to the pledge given to Yahwē.

Besides the Abrahamic dispensation (1 Ch. 16:15 2 Ch. 6:14 Neh. 1:5 9:31), the Chronicler particularly emphasises the engagement made with David (2 Ch. 13:5 21:7), but also uses בְּרִית of a pledge in general (2 Ch. 29:10 31:12 Neh. 13:29). The Prayer of Jeremiah (Jer. 32:44) is quite after the fashion of the Chronicler; in 32:41 the author has in mind 31:34, but interprets the בְּרִית vaguely as a promise that Yahwē will not cease to show mercy to Israel.

The author of Ecclesiastics (c. 180-200) introduces for the first time an Adam-bērit̄ as an everlasting dispensation (17:12), led by his biographical interest to mention severally the divine promises to Noah (11:12), Abraham (17:10 f.), Isaac (27:22), Jacob (27:28), Aaron (45:7-15), Phinehas (27:21 f.), and David (27:25 17:11), and employs the term in the sense of law (21:24 15:5), and of covenant (11:12, based on Is. 28:15, but אָמַן understood figuratively; cp Wisd. 1:6). The thought of Eccles. 15:15 (ἐν ἡμέραις οὐρανῶν, 25:25) is further developed in Jer. 33:14-26 (wanting in G¹, but translated by Theodot.; see JEREMIAH, § 11); the divine arrangements as respects the house of Levi and the house of David are as inviolable as the divine arrangements in nature, the laws of day and night, of heaven and earth. Deutero-Zechariah (Zech. 9:11 after 148 B.C.; see ZACHARIAH, ii, § 5) promises deliverance to the Jews of the dispersion on the ground of the faithful observance of the sacrificial cult at the sanctuary by which Israel continually pledges its troth to Yahwē (בְּרִית בְּרִיתָהּ, 'because of thy pledge-blood'; 9:11; cp Ps. 50:5). Dan. 9:4 (164 B.C.) refers to God's merciful promise to bless his people. The בְּרִית קָדֶשׁ, Is. 21:7-9, 128 B.C.³ is most naturally understood in the light of Eccles. 17:12, where the Adam-bērit̄ also involves the revelation of God's laws and judgments. In 1 Macc. 2:50 אֲבוֹתֵינוּ בְּרִית אֲבוֹתֵינוּ may be a designation of the holy nation, the theocracy, whilst 4:10 probably refers to the promise to the patriarchs, as 2:54 does to that to Phinehas. In Ps. Sol. 10:5, the law appears as a testimony of the eternal dispensation established with the Fathers (P¹60). The author of Jubilees quotes (6:6) from Gen. 9:12 f. and (15:10) from Gen. 17:7, but in his independent use of the term shows no trace of the conception prevailing in the Priestly Code. He introduces the Noah-bērit̄ as a pledge given by the patriarch (the original seems to have read בְּרִית בְּרִיתָהּ יְהוָה, 6:6), which is renewed by the people every year through observance of the feast of weeks (6:17), and the Sinai-bērit̄ as a pledge which Moses takes from the people (6:10); he employs the word as a synonym of 'law,' 'statute' (1:10 15:34 21:11 30:20), and possibly uses it also in the sense of 'theocracy' (6:15), where the feasts of the Jewish community are contrasted with those of the Gentiles. 'Arbiter testamenti illius' (τῆς διαθήκης αὐτοῦ μεσίτης), Assumption of Moses [Charles] 114, seems to be a translation of בְּרִית בְּרִיתָהּ (cp Job 9:11), and represents Moses, not as a third party effecting an agreement between God and his people, but as the preacher proclaiming his law (cp Amos 5:10 Prov. 25:12 etc.). This is to be inferred already from the sufficiency of it is God's bērit̄—and it is distinctly stated in 3:11 'the commandments in respect of which he was to us a mediator'—i.e., which he was the means of revealing to us (cp 27). The Abraham-bērit̄ is mentioned in 3:6 11:2 f. Enoch 69:6 is a fragment of a lost Apocalyphe of Noah; it presents the Noah-bērit̄ as the all-sufficient blessing of the elect.

(i) Other Is. 1 k. 17:2, which refers to God's promise to Abraham, would seem to have belonged originally to a Jewish Apocalypse of Zechariah, current among the Baptist's disciples. Jesus himself does not seem to have used the term in any sense.

7. NT. The thought of a new dispensation, so attractive to his disciples, may not have been foreign to his own mind. If it is not found even where it might most naturally be expected, as in Mt 21:41, the reason may be that his favourite expression, the kingdom of God, was intended to convey a similar idea. His words at the paschal table have evidently undergone successive modifications and expansions; and it is difficult not to trace Pauline influences. At any rate the declaration, 'This is the new διαθήκη in my blood' (1 Cor. 11:25 1 k. 22:16), seems to be an expansion of the earlier, 'This is my blood of the διαθήκη' (Mt. 26:28 Mk. 14:24). It is not inconceivable that Jesus actually said בְּרִית דָּם קָדֶשׁ, meaning thereby 'This is the blood in which I pledge my loyalty' (cp Ps. 50:5 Zech. 9:11). But the Greek translation suggests an Aram. בְּרִית דָּם קָדֶשׁ, in which the last word is likely to be an explanatory addition by a later hand, the original utterance being simply 'This is my blood.'

(ii) Paul. In Gal. 3:15 ff. Paul compares God's assurance to Abraham with a man's testament (διαθήκη), which cannot lose its validity by any arrangement subsequent to his death, and in addition seeks a proof of the inferiority of the law in the fact that it was given not directly by God himself, but through angels and a human agent (μεσίτης, used as in Assump. Mos. 114 31:24). In 4:24 he contrasts the present Jewish commonwealth (ἡ νῦν ἑτοιμασμένη), deriving its existence as a theocracy (διαθήκη) from the legislation on Sinai with the heavenly society (ἡ ἄνω ἑτοιμασμένη) from which the spirit-birth the new theocracy derives its life (cp Heb. 12:22). The new form of government (διαθήκη), according to Paul, was possible only through the death of Jesus abolishing the authority of the Law (hence the change to ἐν τῷ ἑαυτοῦ αἵματι, 'through my blood', 1 Cor. 11:25), and, as opposed to the maintenance of a social order by enforced obedience to external statutes, consisted in a free, love-prompted surrender of life to the divine spirit's guidance (2 Cor. 3:6). The idea of a special arrangement (διαθήκη), still in the future, by which all Israel is to be saved (Rom. 11:26 f.), does not introduce a foreign element into Paul's conception of the spiritual theocracy (for it implies only deliverance from sin), but is a concession to particularism, out of harmony with his general attitude, and due to his patriotic feelings (Rom. 9 ff.). Paul also uses the word as a designation of the O.T. (2 Cor. 3:14).

(iii) Other writers.—In the epistle to the Hebrews the Abrahamic dispensation yields to that of Melchizedek. Abraham is introduced only as an example of patient reliance upon God's promises (6:15), and as a representative of a priestly order inferior to that of Melchizedek (7:4 ff.); Jer. 31:31 ff. is recognised as a description of the often promised new constitution (διαθήκη, 8:8 ff. 10:10); but it is argued that, as a man's testament (διαθήκη) is not valid until after his death (9:16 f.), and as consequently the Mosiac constitution possessed no validity until a death had taken place (that of the sacrificial animal), so the better Christian dispensation could not be ushered in except by the death of Jesus (9:15 10 ff.), this departure of Jesus is, however, regarded as necessary in order that he might be priest—as he could not be on earth (7:13) in the celestial temple (6:20-21), and as such bear the responsibility for the new arrangement (7:1-3), and on God's behalf make it operative (7:13-15, 22-24) by sprinkling the blood on men's consciences, thus pledging and devoting them to the new priestly service (10:6, cp Ex. 29:20 [1] Lev. 8:11 [1]). The rank of the law' (diathēke) is mentioned in Heb. 9:4 (cp Rev. 11:19). In 1 Ph. 2:12 the one great promise is considered as renewed by a series of solemn assurances (ai diathēkai tēs epangelias). Peter's contemporaries are represented in Acts 13:25 as 'sons', i.e., heirs, who might enter into possession of the promise (diathēke) to Abraham, whilst in 7:8 the word diathēke is used to designate the ordinance of circumcision.¹

The most recent inquiry into the historical meaning of diathēke is Kautzsch's Die Bundesstellung im Alten Testament (1901). See also Vailant, *Z. f. CRANE (קָנָר), καταρῖς [B. M. A.], Is. 38:14 Jer. 8:7 RV, AV by an error (see below) 'swallow.' In Is. 38:14 there is no 'or' between the first two names in MT, and καταρῖς omits qanar altogether, rendering the other word (קָנָר) correctly καταρῖς (see SWALLOW, 2); in the second passage where in MT the same two words occur (Jer. 8:7) the connective particle is again omitted, this time by B. Hence it has been suggested that in neither place should both words occur (Klostermann, P. h. m., etc., omit קָנָר in Is. 1; this receives some countenance from the fact that the MT order of the words is reversed in Targ. and Pesh. in Jer. 8:7. The transposition misleads most Jewish authorities as to the real meaning of the two words respectively, and our translations followed them. That קָנָר (or rather קָנָר; see SWALLOW, 2) means 'swallow' or 'swift' there can be no doubt, and so the words 'crane' and 'swallow' should at least change places (as in RV).

What qanar means is somewhat uncertain; ² probably Grus communis or cinerea, which is the crane of Palestine. Once it bred in England. The passage in Isaiah refers to it 'chattering'; ³ and its powers of giving utterance to loud and trumpet-like sounds both when in flight and when at rest are well known.

Cranes are migratory birds, spending the summer in N. latitudes and the winter as a rule in Central Africa and S. Asia; but some pass the cold season in the plains of S. Judaea. While travelling they fly in great flocks, and at times come to rest on the borders of some stream or lake. They appear to have fixed roosting-places, to which they return at night in large numbers. CREATION. 1. Accounts of Creation. It may be regarded as an axiom of modern study that the descriptions of creation contained in the biblical records, and especially in Gen. 1:1-2:4, are primarily valuable only in so far as they express certain religious truths which are still recognised as such (see below, § 25). To seek for even a kernel of historical fact in such cosmogonies is inconsistent with a scientific point of view. We can no longer state the critical problem thus: 'How can the biblical cosmogony be reconciled with the results of natural science?' The question to be answered is rather this: 'From what source have the cosmogonic ideas expressed in the OT been derived? Are they ideas which belonged to the Hebrews from the first, or were they borrowed by the Hebrews from another people?' This question has passed into a new phase since the most complete form of the Creation-story of the Babylonians has become known to us in its cuneiform original. True, the story given in the tablets lies before us in a very fragmentary condition. The exact number of tablets is uncertain. Considerable lacunae, however, have been recently filled up by the discovery of missing passages, and there is good hope that further excavations will one day enable us to complete the entire record. At any rate we are now able to arrange all the extant fragments in their right order, which was not the case a few years ago—and so to recover at least the main features of the connection of the cuneiform narrative. Only a brief sketch of the contents can be given here.²

2. Babylonian epic. The 'Creation-epic' begins by telling us that in the beginning, before heaven and earth were made, there was only the primaval ocean-flood. This is personified as a male and a female being (Apsu and Tiamat).

Long since, when above the heaven had not been named,

when the earth beneath (still) bore no name,

when Apsu the primaval the generator of them,

the originator (Tiamat), who brought them both forth their waters in one together mingled,

when fields were (still) unformed, reeds (still) nowhere

1 On conceptions of creation, see below, §§ 25-29; on words, see § 39.

2 It may be observed here that Gen. 2:4 was, originally, the superscription, not the subscription. Schr. in his reproduction of the two narratives of the primitive story, rightly restores it as the heading (Ursprung der Kritik der Urgesch., 1863, p. 172). In that case the priestly narrator can hardly have continued with Gen. 1:1. Restore therefore with Dr. Gieseler, 17, 39, 'This is the birth-story of heaven and earth when Elohim created them' (עֲרֵךְ עֲרֵךְ). Then continue, 'Now the earth, etc. Gen. 2:4. Then God said, Let light be; and light was.' See Kautzsch's translation (Kautzsch, 1. c.).

3 Cp. Del. Das Bab. Weltgeschöpfungs-epos (1907); Jensen, Kosmog., 268-300; Zimmern, in Gunkel, Schöpfungsgesch., 3-14; and Ball, Light from the East, 1-21 (1906). The metrical divisions are well marked. The epic is mainly composed in four-line stanzas, and in each line there is a caesura.

4 [Ass. Mummu Tiamat. In line 17 of this first tablet we meet (most probably) with a god called Mummu. The name corresponds to the Mummu of Damascus (see below, § 15, end), and is rendered by Del. in 1. 4, 'the pairing.' This is by no means certainly right; for the grounds see Del. 110. Pinches notices only Tiamat (1907, Pinches, 1907). But Jensen warns us that there is another mummu. At any rate, the supposed connection with mu must be abandoned.]

long since, when of the gods: not one had arisen, when no name had been named, no lot (been determined), then were made: the gods, 1. . . 1.

Thus the world of gods came into being. Its harmony, however, was not long maintained. Tiamat, the mother of the gods, was discontented with things as they were, and from hatred (it would seem) to the newly produced Light, rebelled against the supreme gods, and drew some of the gods to her side. She also for her own behoof produced monstrous beings to help her in her fight. This falling away of Tiamat called for divine vengeance. To reply to the call, however, required a contrage which none of the upper gods possessed, till at last Marduk (Merodach) offered himself, on condition that, after he had conquered Tiamat, the regal sway over heaven and earth should be his. In a solemn divine assembly this was assented to him. He then equipped himself for the fight, and rode on the war-chariot to meet Tiamat and her crew. The victory fell to Marduk, who slew Tiamat, and threw her abettors into chains.

This is followed by the account of the creation of the world by Marduk. The process is imagined thus. Marduk cuts in two the carcass of Tiamat¹ (the personified ocean-flood), and out of the one part produces heaven, out of the other earth.²

He smote her as a . . . into two parts;
one half he took, & he made it heaven's arch, pushed bars before it, stationed watchmen, not to let out its waters: he gave them as a charge.

Thus the upper waters of Tiamat, held back by bars, form heaven, just as in Gen. 1 the first step to the creation of heaven and earth consists in the separation of the upper from the lower waters by the firmament. Then follows a detailed description of the making of the heavenly bodies ('stations for the great gods').

After this most unobtrusively comes a great Incantation. We can venture, however, to state so much as this—that the missing passage must have related the creation of the dry land, of plants, of animals, and of men. In support of this we can appeal (1) to separate small fragments, (2) to the account of Berossus, (3) to the recapitulation of the separate creative acts of Marduk in a hymn to that god at the close of the epic, and (4) to the description of the creative activity of Marduk in a second cuneiform recension of the Creation-story lately discovered (on the various Babylonian Creation-stories, see also below, § 13 ff.).

What then is the relation between this Babylonian and the chief biblical cosmogony? We have no right to assume without investigation that the Hebrew myth of Creation appears in its original form in Gen. 1-24a. The present writer is entirely at one with Hermann Gunkel, whose work entitled *Schöpfung u. Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit*³ (1905) contains the fullest collection of the relevant evidence, that this myth has passed through a long development within the domain of Judaism prior to the composition of Gen. 1-24a. Only with a clear perception of this does critical method allow us to compare the latter document directly with the Babylonian Creation-epic. Then, however, our surprise is all the greater that in spite of the preceding development there is still in the main points, a far-reaching coincidence between the myths. For instance, both stories place water and darkness alone at the beginning of things, and personify the primeval flood by the same name (Tiamat = Têhem). In both the appearance of light forms the beginning of the new order. Whether the production of light in

3. Relation to Gen. 1-24a.

² [Possibly the head of Tiamat is referred to at a later point of the story by Berossus. See below, § 13.]

³ The substance of this work, which will be referred to again, is: Die religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung über Gen. 1 und Ap. Joh. xii. Mit Beiträgen von Heinrich Zimmern.

CREATION

the Babylonian account was specified as a separate creative act or not (a point on which complete certainty cannot as yet be obtained), Marduk is at any rate the god of light an' elôgân, and, consequently, his battle with Tiamat is essentially a battle between light and darkness. In both accounts the creation of heaven is effected through the divine creator's division of the waters of the primeval flood, so that the upper waters form the heaven. In the Babylonian epic this division of the waters of the flood is in the closest relation to the battle with Tiamat; nor can we doubt that a parallel description once existed in the Hebrew myth of creation, though it is but faintly echoed in Gen. 1:6 ff. The list of the several creative acts runs thus in the two accounts:

BABYLONIAN.	GEN. 1, IN PRESENT ORDER.
1. Heaven.	1. Heaven.
2. Heavenly bodies.	2. Earth.
3. Earth.	3. Plants.
4. Plants.	4. Heavenly bodies.
5. Animals.	5. Animals.
6. Men.	6. Men.

There is much, however, to be said for the view that the present position of the heavenly bodies after the plants is secondary,² and that originally the creation of the heavenly bodies was related directly after that of heaven; the order will then be the same in both accounts. Further coincidences can be traced in points of detail: e.g., the stress laid, in both accounts of the creation of the heavenly bodies, on their being destined to serve for the division of time (see also below, § 6). Can we doubt that, between accounts which have so many coincidences, there is a real historical connection?

We must now inquire how this connection is to be represented. There are two ways which are historically conceivable. Either the

4. Distinctively Babylonian background.

Hebrew and the Babylonian accounts are independent developments of a primitive Semitic myth, or the Hebrew is borrowed directly or indirectly from the Babylonian. Dillmann proposes the former view in connection with a remark that the Hebrew story cannot have been simply borrowed from the Babylonians on account of the patent differences between the two narratives. 'There is no doubt a common basis; but this basis comes from very early times, and its data have been developed and turned to account in different ways by the Israelites and the Babylonians.'³ In reply we may concede to Dillmann that the cosmogony in Gen. 1 cannot have been simply taken over from the Babylonians, and that there are strong a priori reasons for admitting the existence of a common stock of primitive Semitic myths. Still, that the Hebrew myth, which is still visible in Gen. 1, was borrowed at a later time from the Babylonians, is the only theory which accounts for the phenomena before us. There are features of the utmost importance to the story which cannot be satisfactorily explained except from the Babylonian point of view.

At the very outset, for instance, why, from a specifically Hebrew point of view, should the waters of the têhem be placed at the beginning of all things? Or we may put our objection to Dill's theory thus, the question to be answered by a cosmogony is this, 'How did the visible heaven and earth first come into existence?' The answer given in Gen. 1 is unintelligible in the mouth of an early Israelite, for it implies a mental picture which is characteristically Babylonian. As the world still at the very end of every day, so, thought the Babylonian, must it originally have been produced. During the long winter the Babylonian plain looks like the sea (which in Babylonian is teintu, tiamat), owing to the heavy rains. Then comes the spring, when the god of the vernal sun (Marduk) brings forth the land anew, and by his potent rays divides the waters of

² See Gunkel, Schöpfung, 14; 'this unnatural arrangement may be explained by supposing that when the framework of the seven days was introduced, the plants, for which no special day remained, were combined with the earth, and so came to stand before the stars.'

A separate complete ceremony at any rate apparently, has taken place between light and dark, between heaven and earth, between the upper waters and the lower waters; thus division of labor and differentiation to the point of parallelism of function.

 Gen. 1. Some would also connect it with the B'ay, ḥay Mur = ḥay ḥay ḥay Prov. 8 = ḥay ḥay ḥay. Mur, we are told, was egg-shaped. Here one may detect Egypt in influence, for Egyptian mythology knows of a world egg, which emerged out of the water mass (the god Nam;

 this is confirmed by a reference in the cosmogony of Mochnus in Damascus, 388) to Nacnap "the operator" whom it is tempting to connect with Ḥay, the dyane lemmure of Memphis; the name of Ḥay may have been explained in Ptolemaic as the "upper egg", viz. of the cosmic egg. To the same cosmogony, Ptolemy gives a different account. We owe the statement that this Nacnap split the egg in two,¹⁰ upon which one of the pieces became

Holmgren (note on Gen. 1.3) objects to the combination of ayin and Behin, that Behin appears as the mother of the two sons in it, which will not suit Behin; but the Babylonian method is incorrect, as WRS (Barrett, Levi 1.5) has pointed out. Ayap not properly a 'mortal man', and ayapayotayot is a late invention based upon a wrong the way; here as elsewhere the dualism artificial. Ayap is identical with the Oyapayot of Mishna, the oyos of Iudaeus—ay, 𐤀, 'the world' (see Eccl. 3.11). The mixture with Beh, Beh is more doubtful. the eviler brother and his brother are said to have discovered the use of iron, like the Hebrew Tabit' ai, himself probably a denigrator (see CASSIUS, § 100). WRS (Barnett Lectures) suggests that he may have invented it in order to cut open the cosmic egg (cp the arming of Marduk in the Creation-epic, Tab. iv.), is clearly correct. Kosmos in Philo's text, the good makes good is ἡ ἀγαθὴ ποιεῖ ἀγαθόν against ὁ ἀγαθὸς. Originally, however, the weapon of the denigrator was the lightning; see Jensen, Kosm.

CREATION

heaven, and the other earth. Here we have a point of contact with the Babylonian and also with the Hebrew cosmogony: for the body of Eumert is, in fact, as Robertson Smith in his Literary Criticism remarks, 'the matrix or envelope of the dark, unforming waters of primordial chaos, and the separation of the lower from the upper waters in Gen. 1 is only a less picturesque form of the same mythic statement. These are 'poor and beggarly elements, no doubt, but then Eumert lacked what Babylonian possessed, a poet who could select, and to some extent idealize, such parts of the tradition as were best worth preserving. We shall see later (§ 28) that Judaism had a writer who in some important respects excelled even the author of the epic.

Egyptian mythology, which had perhaps an original kinship to the Babylonian² cannot be passed over, when we consider the close relations which long existed between Egypt and Canaan. The common Egyptian belief was that for many ages the latent germs of things had slept in the bosom of the dark flood (personified as Nut or Nutt and Nun). How these germs were drawn forth and developed was a story told differently in the different nomes of districts.

At Heliopolis, for instance, the demiurge was called Hnum; he was the potter who moulded his creatures out of the mud of the Nile (which was the earthly image of Nut); or, it was also said, who moulded the world-egg. His counterpart at Memphis, the artisan god Ptah, gave to the light-god, and to his body, the artistically perfect form. At Hermopolis it was Hoth who made the world, speaking it into existence.³ That which flows from his mouth, it is said, 'becomes, and what he speaks, comes into being.' In the east of the Delta, a more complex story was given. Earth and sky were originally two loaves lost in the primordial waters; the god Thoth, under the goddess, and seizing Nut with both hands, lifted her above his head with outstretched arms. Thus, among other less striking parallels, we have in Egypt, as well as in Babylonia and in Palestine, the primordial flood, the forcible separation of heaven and earth, and creation by a word, as elements in the conceptions of creation.⁴

The subject of Iranian parallels has been treated at great length by Lagarde,⁵ who argues for the dependence of the Priestly Writer as regards the order of the works and days, on a Persian system, against which, however, in the very act of borrowing from it, this writer protests. It is not probable, however, that the unbelief of the Jews to Persia began so early; it is not before the latter part of the Persian rule that the direct influence of Persian beliefs (themselves largely influenced by Babylonian) begins to be clearly traceable in Judaism. If we could venture to identify the ARAXIAXES (272) of Ezra with Artaxerxes II, it would be easier to adopt Lagarde's view. In the present stage of critical inquiry, however, this course does not appear to be advisable. Nor is it at all certain that the Iranian belief in the creation of the world in six periods goes back so far—to the time of Artaxerxes II. It is referred to only in the late book called Bundehesh, and in one or two passages of the Yasna (19.43) and the Vispend (17.4), which, on philological grounds, are regarded as comparatively late. Caland, indeed, has endeavoured to show⁶ that in the Yasht of the Fravashis (or protective spirits) a poetical reference is made to the creative works of Ahura Mazda, in the order in which these are given in the Bundehesh.⁷ But what object can we have in tracing the Hebrew account to the Iranian, when we have, close at hand, the Babylonian story, from which the Iranian is plainly derived? The reference, or at least allusion, to chaos in Gen. 1 is at any rate not Iranian, why should other features in the narrative be? It would not do to be possible to give the epithet 'Iranian' to the script of ideal perfection to the newly created world in Hebrew cosmogony. But it is by no means more tedious. Such a distinction would be naturally suggested by the thought that the evil now so prominent in the world cannot have lain within the purpose of the divine creator.⁸ Besides, Jewish thinkers would never have been repelled by Zoroastrian dogma. The existence of two primordial antagonistic spirits is not indeed alluded to in the rock-cut inscription of Darius and Xerxes, but the best scholars agree that it formed part of old Zoroastrian creed, it is indeed expressly recognized in the Gathas (Yasht xxx). Ahura Mazda, the 'true knowing God', assisted by the six Amshaspands, is creator of all the good things in the world. He is opposed, however, by Angra Mainyu, to whom the material and material possession of the world is ascribed. At that an venture to suppose is a possible indirect influence the high Zoroastrian conception of Ahura Mazda on the conception of Yahweh formed by the Babylonian Jew. The details of the Jewish creation story arose independently of Persia.

Points of contact with more primitive mythology are numerous. Abundant in form will be found

10. More primitive mythologies.

Sir George Grey's Polynesian Mythology, and vol. vi. of Waitz and Meier's Anthropologie der Naturvölker. That dry land and animate life, but matter, had a beginning, and that, before the primordial things, water held all things in solution, opinions common among primitive races, and one of the most widely spread mythic symbols is the egg-expression in Gen. 1, 'and the breath of Lohim brooding' (2722) over the surface of the waters; the best illustration (in the absence of the mythic egg which probably represented the deity as a bird) in common Polynesian representation of Languan, the god of heaven, and of the atmosphere, as a bird which flew over the ocean waters, till, as it is sometimes said, laid an egg⁹ (the world egg). This egg is the world egg, and we may suppose that 'in the earliest form of the [Hebrew] narrative it may have been said "the of Lohim"; "wind" appears to be an interpretation. The forcible separation of heaven and earth (Gen. 1) is illustrated, not only by the interesting Egyptian story mentioned above (§ 8), but also by the delightful story told by Sir George Grey, and illustrated by him in a not less delightful essay Creation and Myth, 45. The anecdotal character of myths like these adds to their charm. It is only in the last stage of a religion that cosmogonies are systematised.—

We have thus seen that the Creation story in Gen.

¹ I think less naturally thinks that in the Canaanite, 'Yahweh saw that it was good', there is an implied contrast to the state called Abah-Abah (Chaos).

² The word 2722 (Chel) occurs only twice, and both times Syriac of a bird's brooding. See 16. 3211, and Driver's Psalm, 357, foot; also We. Psalm, 393. (2727 Jer. 23. 6, be 2727 (2042)). Hence the Talmudists compared the spirit to a dove (cp. Mt. 3. 16 Mk. 1. 10 Lk. 3. 22). The notion myth, in the very late form known to us, has lost trace of the bird-symbol; it speaks only of a wind (2727).

⁴ ThP art. 'Cosmogony', 1. 27. It is of course not a bird that is meant; storm-birds are not uncommon; see the Babylonian myth of Adapa, in which the south wind is represented as having wings, and cp. Ps. 18. 10 (11). Waitz.

CREATION

24) is not as Wellhausen represents it, e.g. as the product of notation. It has considerably more substratum. That substratum is mainly Babylonian, but Egyptian and even Persian influences are not excluded. Indeed, for that singular passage Gen. 1:5 Egyptian influence, either direct or more probably through Phoenician or Canaanish mythology, indeed seems to be suggested. We are thus brought to face with a new problem. How is it that the Jewish Writer, with his purified theology, and his comparatively slight interest in popular tradition, should have adopted so much mythology as the basis of his statement that 'God created the heaven, the earth, and all that is in the earth, and hallowed the seventh day'?

If the Yahwist had given a creation story corresponding to his Flood-story, the phenomenon of Gen 1 would not be so surprising. The Priority of 12. Lost J original. What might thus be taken to have acted consistently by giving an improved version of both traditional stories? But we have no Yahwist creation-story, except indeed in a fragmentary form, and though the last portion of the cosmogonic preface to 1 S. Paradise story (based probably on a C. account) which must have differed greatly from the one we say in Gen 1, yet it is most improbable that P would spontaneously have thought of competing with J by producing a new semi-Babylonian cosmogony. In the next place it should be noticed that the Flood-story which J has borrowed, directly or indirectly, from Babylon, stands in Babylonian mythology in close connection with the creation-story; the two events are in fact only separated by the ten antediluvian Chaldean kings and an uncertain interval between creation and the foundation of a dynasty. The list of the ten kings is certainly represented, however imperfectly, by 1 S. cosmogony (see CASSELL § 471), it is probable therefore that J was represented by the storm-¹ of 1 S. originally had a creation-story with strong Babylonian attributes, and that P used this story as the basis of his own cosmogony.

Accepting this hypothesis, we are no longer surprised at the echoes of mythology in Gen. 1: 2-4. 'Underneath I' we recognise the debris of the cosmogony of J₂. The Priestly Writer did not go out of his way to collect Babylonian mythic data; he simply adopted and adapted the work of a much earlier writer.

The hypothesis is due to the sagacity of Hinkle,² and the more clearly we discern the mythic elements in P's cosmogony, the more probable, and indeed inevitable does the hypothesis become. That the old cosmogony has been lost, is much to be deplored; but we can easily believe that it would have been too trying to detain members of the "congregation" to have had before them in the same book the early and almost half-heathenish recension of a Canaanite-Babylonian cosmogony produced by J₂ and the much more sober but in all essentials thoroughly orthodox recast of this recension due to the Priestly Writer. Whether the latter found any reference to the Sabbath in the older story which might seem to justify his insertion of the divine appointment of the Sabbath, we do not know. Jensen finds a reference to the 7th, 12, and 14th days of the month in the fifth tablet of the epic (6: 1; 7: 3; and Zimmerer even inserts conjecturally "on the Sabbath" (line 17); but whether any part of this obscure passage lay in any form before J₂ must remain uncertain.

The explanation given by Zimmern (above, § 4) does justice, as no other explanation can do, to the circum-

sembles the explanation of the Babylonian flood-story, this is no objection. The post-diluvian earth may in a qualified sense be called a new earth, and some mythologies expressly recognise that the present creation is rather a re-creation.³ Still, it

But, considering his competence and his unique opportunities of consulting ancient documents, we cannot afford to neglect these extracts. One of the most important of them is a fragment of a cosmogony. Its resemblances to statements in both the creation-stories of Genesis, especially the first, are obvious. Among them we may mention (1) the description of the primaeval darkness and water, (2) the name Qazre (𐎧𐎠𐎼𐎫, translated Qaxar, which is given to the woman who ruled over the monsters of chaos² and (3) the origin ascribed to heaven and earth, which arose out of the two halves of the body of Qazre, cut asunder by Bel, who the creation of man by one of the gods (cf. Bel's command, who mixed with clay the blood which flowed from the severed head) not of Bel, but of the dragon Tiamat,⁴ may be compared, or contrasted, with Gen. 22.

According to Robertson-Smith's happy restoration, $\angle$ is a function. The text has $\Theta \angle \Theta$.

CREATION

The theogony of Damascius¹ (6th cent. A.D.) is at first sight of less importance. It shows, however, more clearly than the Berossian fragment that the essential features of the story of the epic were well known; for the two chief mythic names mentioned by Damascius – viz. Tamē and Apasur – are plainly derived from Tiamat and Apsin, whilst the only begotten son of this couple is Maeuar, which corresponds to the obscure name Mammū in the epic (Epic. 1, II. 4, 13; see above, § 2, second note).

We now turn to the cuneiform records, among which the so-called Chaldean cosmogony (RT² 1.10.7 p. 1) is not to be included. (a) The chief of these is the great Creation-epic, of which the reader has already heard. Its place of origin was, of course, Babylon, as appears from the fact that its hero is the god Marduk, who was the patron of Babylon. Obviously this is only one of several local versions of the primitive myth. In the original story B. I. of Nippur was, no doubt, the great god who overcame Tiamat, and prepared the way for creation. The legends of the other sacred cities, however, had to protect the interests of their patron deities, and local Creation-myths were the result.

(b) In another version of the myth, the fight between the divine champion and Tiamat occurs after the creation, and is waged for the deliverance of gods and mankind. 'Who will set forth to slay the dragon, to rescue the wide earth and seize the royal power? Set forth, O God Šu-IL, slay the dragon, rescue the wide earth, and seize the royal power.' (An extravagant account is given in the manner of the Jewish Talmud) of the dragon's size, and it is said that when the dragon was slain its blood flowed night and day for three years and three days and months. This may suggest the alternate mythic origin of a time, three and a half, in Dan. 12.7 Rev. 12.14.

(c) A much fuller and, if we assume its antiquity, more important narrative is the 'non-Semitic' one translated by Pinches in 1892 from a bilingual text discovered by G. Smith.² It is a mixture of creation- and culture-myth, and as a culture-myth we have already had occasion to refer to it (see CAINESS, § 3). The creation-story is given only in allusions. It is stated that once upon a time there was no vegetation, and 'all the lands' (of Babylonia) were sea. Then there arose a movement in the sea, and the most ancient cities and temples of Babylonia were created. Next the subordinate divine beings called Ammaki were created, after which Marduk set a reed on the water, formed dust, and panned it out beside the reed. Then, 'to cause the god to dwell in a delightful place, he made mankind (cp. Gen. 1.27) with the co-operation of and heaven out of the two parts of Qudmukkur (with whom the reporter of Berossus identifies Tiamat). It stands to reason that the severed head spoken of in connection with the creation of man must be Tiamat, not that of the Creator, though Pinches already had before him the reading qurru (see Biblical Archaeology, 4.79). The passage is therefore not a statement of the kinship of God and man (WKS. Rel. Sem. 43), though it is of course to be assumed that the god spoken of made man in his own physical likeness (cp. Maspero, History of Civil. 1 3). Strange to say, the name Qudmukkur seems to have come into the text of Berossus by mistake. The most likely it is a corruption of Marduk (Maspero, ibid., of Black and Assy. 53; cp. J. H. Wright, J. H. Wright, 1.197 p. 1). The story, however, is only intelligible on the theory adopted in this note.

the goddess Annu (whom we shall have to refer again, col. 6 p. 1, n. 4). We are allowed to infer that this waste of water had been converted into a fruitful plain by the industry of the newly created men (cp. under the direction of the gods); and to these gods ascribed the greatest of all human works, the creation of the sacred cities of Babylonia with their temples. Thus the most characteristic part of the Babylonian myth – viz. the fight of the sun-god with Tiamat – conspicuous by its absence. The reader should not miss this, as it illustrates one of the two chief Hebrew cosmogonies (see below, § 20 p. 1).

The statement that the myth which underlies Genesis of Babylonian origin may now be supplemented.

1. The epic of Assur-bani-pal's library stands at the height of a great mythic development. We cannot therefore presume that we have

17. Provisional result. covered the exact form of the Babylonian myth on which the narrative in Genesis is based, or the earlier narrative out of which that in Genesis has grown.

2. Since there were several creation-stories in Babylonia, it is a probatum probable that other stories besides that referred to may, either as wholes or in parts, have influenced the creation-stories in Palestine.

These reasonable inferences suggest two fresh inquiries. We have to ask, 1. What is the earliest date at which the adoption of Babylonian myths

19. Date of naturalisation. the Israelites is historically conceivable and 2. What evidence have we of the existence of any Hebrew creation-myth than that in Gen. 1.2-2.2, some of which may enable us to fill up incomplete parts of that narrative.

In reply to the first question it is enough to refer to recent studies on the Amarna tablets. The letters of Babylonian cuneiform sent by kings and governors of Western Asia to Amen-hotep III. and Amen-hotep IV. prove that, even before the Egyptian conquests and the rise of the Assyrian kingdom, Babylonian culture had spread to the shores of the Mediterranean. 'Religious myths must have formed part of this culture'. It is therefore in the highest degree probable that Babylonian creation- and deluge-myths penetrated into Canaan before the fifteenth century B.C., and as soon as the Israelites became settled in Palestine they would have opportunities enough of absorbing these myths.

At the same time it should be noticed that there are also several other periods in Israelish history where either an introduction of new or a revival of old myth is historically conceivable.² The first is the time of David and Solomon. The former appears to have had a Babylonian secretary (see SHAVSHAN); the latter admitted into his temple a brazen 'sea' (representing, as shown already, the primeval abim or tiamat) and a brazen serpent (representing the dragon; see NATHANIEL). The second is the eighth and seventh centuries B.C., when Aramean, Assyrian, and neo-Babylonian influences became exceedingly strong, and were felt even in the sphere of religion. The third and fourth are the exile and post-exile periods, when (see e.g. Job and Is. 40-55) there was a revival of mythology, which the religious organisation of Judaism could not neutralise but not put down.

In replying to the second question (as to the evidence for other cosmogonic stories in the O.T.), we must

20. OT. ref. to other cosmogonies: pre-exilic. be satisfied with very incomplete references. Such we can find both in pre-exilic and in post-exilic writings. Pre-exilic references occur in (a) Gen. 1.1-2.4, in (b) Judg. 5.2, and especially in (c) the introduction to the Eden story; post-exilic

(d) Job 15:7 f.; (e) 38:4-11; (f) Prov. 8:22-31 (besides the passages on the DRAGON).

(g) The phrase in the Blessing of Joseph, 'the flood (phol) coming¹ beneath' (cp. Gen. 7:10), is certainly the echo of a Tiamat-myth, and (h) 'the stars from their roads' (a Babylonian phrase²) in Judg. 5:20 of a myth like that in the fifth tablet of the epic.

(i) Gen. 2:4-7 needs more special, even if brief, treatment. It runs thus, the original introduction of the Eden-story having been abridged by the editor of J¹ J²:

1:1, when Yahweh [Elohim] made earth and heaven, 'Now there were no bushes on the earth, and no herbs, yet sprouted forth, for Yahweh [Elohim] had not caused rain upon the earth, and there were no man to till the soil'; but a flood³ used to come up from the earth and desolate the whole face of the ground; then Yahweh [Elohim] formed man of dust from the ground, and breathed into his nostrils breath of life, and man became a living being.⁴

Evidently this belongs to the second section of a mythological creation-story, and its details are all of Babylonian origin. Like Finches' non-Semitic creation-story (above, § 16 [2]), it describes, though with mythic exaggeration, the phenomena witnessed by the first colonists of Babylonia. The extremely small rainfall in Lower Mesopotamia was remarked upon by Herodotus (I.104); consequently, without the careful direction and control of the yearly inundation of the Euphrates and the Tigris the land would be rather marsh or desert. Water-plants there must have been for a season even in the most desolate tracts; but the myth-writers imagine a time when even reeds had not yet appeared, and when 'all the lands were sea' (myth, Z. 101), since 'a flood used to come up (it seemed) from the earth' (Gen. 2:6). Next, the Hebrew writer tells us that Yahwe formed man out of dust (2:7), just as, in the myth (II. 20 f.), Marduk, with the help of the potter-godless Aruru, makes man out of clay, and somewhat as, in the story of Prometheus (see above, § 15), one of the gods forms men out of earth moistened with Tiamat's (not Prometheus') blood. The sequel in the Hebrew story has obviously been abridged. There must have been some reference to the peaceful subjugation of the yearly flood, otherwise how could Yahwe have 'planted a garden (or park) in Eden' (2:8)? 'So in the old myth we hear next that Marduk made the Tigris and the Euphrates 'in their places', the reeds and the woods, and the green of the fields (II. 23-26). Besides this affinity of its contents to the non-Semitic Creation-myth the Yahwistic passage has a striking resemblance in form to the first tablet of the Creation-epic, which, as it now stands, is of course a Semitic work.

On (d) Job 15:7 f.; (e) 38:4-11; (f) Prov. 8:22-31 we must be brief.

In (g) we have apparently a reference to a more heroic παρωδῶνος than the Adam of the Yahwist (like the Yim of the Avesta and the Maui of New Zealand mythology), and somewhat like the Adapa of a Babylonian myth,⁵ who shared the privileges of the divine or semi-divine members of the council of Eloah. This first man was an embodiment of absolute Wisdom, and it is noteworthy that the same word אֲדָמָה 'to be brought forth' is used of this wondrous personage, and of the Wisdom which is described in Prov. 8:22-31, especially of the Wisdom of Proverbs, the first of which was created by Iphigaz came into existence before the world. The elēk has a very Babylonian appearance, and is clearly belonging to the same cycle of thought as the elēk. Next, the 'first man' of the Hebrew Bible, who was said to have descended from heaven to intercourse with angels.

¹ The name suggests a wild beast (Gen. 4:9). The same epithet (phol) is given to Nergal, the god of the nether world in the Gilgamesh-epic (Tablet IV, Jeremias, Vorstudien, 63).

1:1, when Yahweh [Elohim] made the earth and heaven (2:1) that the stars were 'brought forth' (cp. Gen. 1:5). In the creation-epic the creation of the stars is 'stations' for the great god, see Sargon, § 3.7. It follows on the subjugation of the dragon of chaos and the creation of heaven and earth of the chaos of Tiamat. The Hebrew poet, however, does not perhaps consider this story, or even its parallel one in Gen. 1, to be a worthy representation. Heaven and its stars must always have existed for Yahweh and the 'first man' to dwell on earth, the 'first man' of the Hebrew Bible, who was said to have descended from heaven to intercourse with angels. The Hebrew poet, however, does not perhaps consider this story, or even its parallel one in Gen. 1, to be a worthy representation. Heaven and its stars must always have existed for Yahweh and the 'first man' to dwell on earth, the 'first man' of the Hebrew Bible, who was said to have descended from heaven to intercourse with angels. Heaven and its stars must always have existed for Yahweh and the 'first man' to dwell on earth, the 'first man' of the Hebrew Bible, who was said to have descended from heaven to intercourse with angels.

In (f) Prov. 8:22-31 we find the same great restriction of the mythological element. The matter is expressed in the form of a poem, a poem of wisdom on its part against Yahweh, but this is described in the simplest manner. Of a time when chaos reigned supreme we hear nothing. Yahweh and Wisdom were together before the earth was². In fact the new quasi-mythic representation of Wisdom was incompatible with the antique Babylonian cosmogony.

These passages seem to show that there was a great variety of view in the post-exilic period respecting the best way of imagining creation. Some writers seem to have refused the dragon-myth (except in the palest form); others seem to have found it symbolically useful. To this we shall return presently (§ 23). There is a remarkable phenomenon respecting the pre-exilic time which has a prior claim on our attention. Though both J¹ and J² have a cosmogony (§ 12), there is an almost complete silence respecting such myths in the pre-exilic prophetic literature. There is, in fact, only one passage (Am. 9:1) that remotely suggests the existence of a creation-myth. This obscure passage has been considered elsewhere (see SIEFFERT, § 3.7), and it may suffice here to point out that mythology did not come naturally to the early Israelites, and that one great aim of the prophets was to recall their countrymen to old Israelitish ways; Solomon who adopted foreign fashions was no true Israelite. We need not be surprised, therefore, at the scanty references in the greater prophets to such figures of the Babylonian and Canaanitish myths as the Dragon, the Cherubim, the seraphim. It is to a historical writer that we are indebted for the information that there was a brazen serpent, symbolising probably the Dragon (see NIEBUHR, § 21, in Solomon's temple. At a later period (post-exilic) references to the Chaos-dragon, to the subjugation of the primordial sea by Yahweh, and to some other features of mythic tradition, abound. Nor was the spring of mythic imagery dried up even in still later times, as the apocalyptic writings show. See DRAGON, RAHAB, SERPENT, ANTIHIBIT, ANIMINATION OF DESOLATION, ABYSS, ARMAGEDDON, APOCALYPTIC.

If the above presentation of facts be correct, it is a

It is the 'heaven of An', in which the inferior gods take refuge at the Deluge (Deluge-story, Z. 102).

entrance into Canaan onwards, a fairly complete creation-myth, in which Yahwe took the place of Marduk, and lilith, lilithan, lilithim, lilith, etc., that of the dragon Tiamat. This theory has indeed been vigorously defended by Gunkel; but it is liable to grave critical objections. It is a significant fact that Amos (see last §) has little if any comprehension of the mythical serpent (25:2), and that the Israelites who worshipped in Solomon's temple completely misunderstood the true meaning of 'Nehushtan,' while from the time of the Babylonian 'exile' unmistakable references to the dragon-myth abound. This implies, not of course that there was not previously a Hebrew dragon-myth, but that a revival of mythology had brought the old myth into fresh prominence. It is probable that before the 'exile' the cosmogonic myths of the Israelites at large were in a very fragmentary state, and that if the myth on which the creation-story of Gen. 1 is based then existed (as it most probably did), it was uncomprehended by the people, and had no influence upon their thoughts. It appears, however, that, from the last pre-exilic century onwards, increased contact with Syria and (especially) Babylonia brought about a reawakening of the mythological interest, and that the myths which at a very early date had been derived by the Israelites from the Canaanites, were revived by religious writers (not prophets, at any rate in the proper sense of the word) and adapted to general use. This was done, sometimes with a rougher, sometimes with a gentler hand, but always without any dangerous concession to antiquated, naturalistic religion—a grand result, which the Babylonian priests, noble as their own higher religion was, never accomplished. To inquire into the cause of this success belongs to the history of Jewish religion.

The question has been raised whether Gen. 1:2-4 is, or is not, a poem. The theory was first propounded by d. Eichthal, Texte primitif de la Bible (1875), who found a true poem, composed of perfectly regular strophes, which had been distorted by the editor (32 ff.). Briggs (Old Test. Student, April '84) added to this the discovery of a metre (five tones in each line with caesura). The possibility of this is established by the undoubted existence of metre in the Babylonian creation-epic (see Del. Willschögl); but unless we had before us lilith's form of the creation-story, how could we expect to restore without arbitrariness the true Hebrew metre?

24. Gen. 1:2-4 a poem?

least two mythic stories of creation (cp § 22), both of which were directly or indirectly of Babylonian origin. It is still with the former that we are specially concerned for the present. That there is no clear reference to this myth in the fragmentary remains (cp below, § 20) of the pre-exilic prophets, is, no doubt, a fact which has to be accounted for; but when we consider the Canaanitish-Babylonian origin of the myth we cease to be surprised at it. Certainly Isaiah and the other great prophets believed in the creatorship of Yahwe; but they could not have given their sanction to even a simplified edition of any of the grotesque and heathenish myths of the Canaanites and the Babylonians. Why, then, it may be asked, did they not, like the Second Isaiah (Is. 40:18), preach the creatorship of Yahwe without any mythic ornamentation? The answer is, that their object was not to teach an improved theology, but to dispel those illusions which threatened, they believed, to involve good and bad Israelites alike in one common ruin. The pre-exilic prophets were preachers of judgment: the truth they had to announce was that Yahwe was not merely the god of Israel, but also the moral governor of the world, who would punish all guilty nations, and more especially the most favoured nation the Israelites. It was for the late exilic and the post-exilic prophets and other religious writers, whose function was, not so much threatening as edification and consolation, to draw out the manifold applications of that other great truth that Yahwe is the creator of the world.

On the pre-exilic conception of creation, therefore, not much can be said. There were, no doubt, hymns to 26. Pre-exilic traces.

Yahwe as the creator; but the divine creatorship was not a central truth in that early age, and could not have been expressed in a form congenial to the later worshippers. We have, however, a fragment of a song in the Book of Jasher (1 K. 8:12 ff.), which the narrator who quotes it ascribes to Solomon. With the help of the LXX we may restore it thus:—

The sun did Yahwe settle in heaven,
But he said he would (himself) dwell in dark clouds.
I have built a lofty house for thee,
A settled place for thy perpetual habitation.

Here Yahwe is described as the creator of the sun. He is therefore greater than the solar deity Marduk, the creator in the Babylonian cosmogony. None of the heavenly bodies serves Yahwe as a mansion; dark clouds are round about him (cp Ps. 97:2 18:11, 22:29 again). It is of his condescension that he dwells in Solomon's temple, which will therefore be as enduring as the sun in the firmament (cp Ps. 78:69). Considering that Solomon (it would seem) put up in the temple a trophy of Yahwe's victory over the Dragon of chaos (see NATHAN-TAN), it is conceivable, though scarcely probable, that a hymn to the creator which contained these four lines was actually written for use at the dedication of the first temple. At any rate, even if not of the Solomonic age, the fragment is presumably pre-exilic, and confirms the idea that the creation of the world (i.e., the world known to the Israelites) was early spoken of as a proof of Yahwe's greatness. Nor can we be surprised that some scanty reference to Yahwe as the Maker κατ' ἐξοχήν is traceable in pre-exilic proper names (see NATHAN, § 30, and cp the Bab. and Ass. names Sin-bani, Bel-bani, Bel-dani).

It was the Second Isaiah, however, so far as we know, who made the creatorship of Yahwe a fundamental 27. II Isaiah.

Jewish belief. Is. 40 gives the key to the later doctrine of creation. Living after the collapse of the ancient state, and amidst new scenery and other men, gifted moreover with a tenderly devout spirit and a rich poetic imagination, the Second Isaiah felt what was needed to regenerate Jewish religion—a wider view of the divine nature. To him Yahwe was far too high for the common sacrificial cultus, far too great to be merely a local deity; both nature and mankind owed their existence to Yahwe. He had indeed chosen Israel for a special possession; but it was for purely moral ends. Therefore Israel's fall could not be for ever; Israel's and the world's creator would certainly, for his own great ends, restore his people. Let Israel then look up to him as the creator of all things, and therefore also as the Redeemer (54:1) of Israel. However the Second Isaiah does not stop here. He rectifies some of the notions which were presumably current among the Israelites—old notions, now awaiting to a fresh life under Babylonian influence. Israel was, no doubt, one of the youngest of the nations; but Yahwe was not like Marduk, according to the old myth, one of the youngest of the gods; 'before me (Yahwe) no god was made' (Is. 43:1, 2, 3).

1 The passage is given in a fuller form in QERV after 7 (than in M1), with an introductory and a closing formula. The former runs, 'Then sp. activity of the Creator, who requires no self-enthralment, for he cannot be fettered.³ Nothing is said here, or in the Book of Job, of chaos or pre-existent matter. The first of the late dialectic writers who distinctly asserts the creation of the world out of matter is the author of the Book of Wisdom (11:17 κτίσας τὸν κόσμον ἐξ ἀσπερον ἄβυσσος). He may no doubt be said to Platonize;⁴ but Philo before him, not indeed without some hesitation, held the belief of the eternity of matter,⁵ and he appears to have been influenced by contemporary Jewish interpretations of Gen. 1:1. In 2 Macc., however (a Pharisaic record), we find the statement that the world and its contents were made ἐκ ἄβυσσος (7:1), a guarded phrase,⁶ which reminds one of Heb. 11:3 and is at any rate incompatible with a belief in ἀσπερον (7:1), and, in two late passages in 1 Peter, ἔκ (1 Cor. 2:9) is addressed thus, 'O Thou . . . that hast called from the beginning that which did not yet exist, and they obey thee' (2:14), and 'with a word thou quickenest that which was not' (4:1). Parallel passages in NT are Rom. 4:17 Heb. 11:3 (where, however, ἐκ φανερῶν is not to be confused with ἐκ μη φανερωμένων).⁷ We must not, however, overlook the fact that in one of the latest books a distinct reference to chaos occurs. In 2 Pet. 3:5 the earth is described as 'compacted out of water . . . by the word of God.' Here 'water' obviously means that portion of the chaotic waters which was under the firmament; out of this, according to Gen. 1:6, the dry land emerged at the bid of Yahweh. The importance given to the Logos in Ju. 1:1, and to the Son of God in Heb. 1:1, as the organ of the divine creative activity, is best treated in another connection (see Logos). On the doctrine of the re-creation of heaven and earth, see DILLMANN, § 149.

instead of Παλάρια in 2 Tim. 1:10. Gallia is a natural emendation, possibly a right interpretation, of Galatia—in accordance with the later usage as regards Gaul, both Galatia and Gaul having in St. Paul's time usually, if not always, alike been called Παλάρια by the Greeks' (WH). Cp GALATIA.

In the list of the seventy apostles compiled by the Pseudo-Barnabas (see Chrest. Pseudo-Barn., Bonn Ed., 21 ff) Cresconius is enumerated as 'bishop of Thapsodon in Gaul' (Ναυαφόντος ἐπίσκοπος τῆς Γαλατίας); in the list drawn up by Eusebio-Hippolytus he appears as 'Cresces, bishop of Carthage in Gaul'. According to the Pseudo-apostles, who enumerate 81 finally, Thues, Cresconius, and the Ephesian church immediately after the twelve apostles, he was founder of the church of Vienne in Gaul. The Latin church commemorates him on June 27; the Greek on July 13 (along with Silas, Andronicus, and Epimenus). See Lipsius, Epist. Pseudo-Barn.

CRETE (κρήνη; mod. Candia), the largest island in the Aegean sea, of which it is also the S. limit.

Crete extends 400 m. from W. to E., consisting of an irregular ridge of mountains which fall in three distinct groups, the central and loftiest (mod. P. nira) being the Mount Ida of the ancients. The S. coast is broken into a series of large bays and peninsulas; on the S. there are few harbours, and only one considerable bay, that of Messara, under Mt. Ida. The physical character of Crete is succinctly described by Strabo (475, ἡ δὲ χώρα καὶ ἐρηρὴ καὶ ὑψηλὴ καὶ ἀειβάτουρος ἐσκαρπύουσα).

Lying at almost equal distance from Europe, Asia, and Africa, Crete was one of the earliest stages in the passage of Oriental civilisation to the W. In historical times it was of little importance—chiefly as a recruiting ground for mercenary troops (Pol. 31:26, Jos. Ant. viii. 41, cp 1 Macc. 11:31).¹ Quintus Metellus reduced the island in 67 B.C., and it was combined with the Cyrenaica to form one province—senatorial under the emperors.

The Jews were early connected with Crete (cp the story told in Luc. Hist. 52 that the Jews were originally fugitives from Crete). In Ex. 25 of Luck, 2:19 and Zeph. 2:5 [B&V] Κρήτες is read for the 'Cherethites' or 'Cherethims' (קְרִיתִים) of RV, and Κρηται [B&V] in Zeph. 2:6 for קְרִיתִים, which, however, is certainly not Crete, but denotes 'land of the Cherethites'—i.e., Philistia. Κρήτες also occurs in Ex. 30 apparently for קְרִיתִים. See CHERETHITES; and, on the hypothesis connecting the Philistines with Crete, CAPHOR, PHILISTINES. Gortyn (near modern Il. Itea in the Messara, the only considerable plain in the island) is mentioned as containing many Jews (1 Macc. 15:21 cp 10:67, and Philo Leg. ad Car. 30) says that Crete, like all the Mediterranean islands, was full of them (cp Acts 21: Tit. 1:12, Jos. Ant. viii. 121, Vita, § 76).

The account of Paul's voyage to Rome furnishes several geographical details. From Catthys his ship ran under the lee of Crete (Acts 27: ὑπερνεύσαμεν τὴν Κρήτην κατὰ Σάλαγγρον), and some time appears to have been spent in the shelter of the Fair Havens. Whether the apostle was able to accomplish there any missionary work cannot even be guessed; and we are thus left without any information as to the process of the evangelisation of the island. When we next hear of it the gospel has apparently been widely established (see PASTORAL EPISTLES).

The character of the Cretans as gathered from the epistle to Titus is entirely in accord with what is known from other sources. The epistle (Tit. 1:12) quotes 'a prophet of their own' (i.e., Epimenides, called θεὸς ἀνθρώπων by Plato, Lysis, 1642; θεοφιλής Plat. Sol. 121), who stigmatised them as liars and beasts. It was a popular saying that it was impossible to out-Cretan a Cretan (Pol. 8:2, cp Pol. 6:46 f. 813-346). Polybius (6:40) writes that 'greed and avarice are so native to the soil in Crete, that they are the only people

Among whom no stigma attaches to any sort of gain whatever' (cp Tit. 1:16, 'teaching things which they ought not for an ignominious gain'). A similar phrase occurs in Tit. 1:11. The reputation of the thought of Tit. 1:7 αὐτὴν παρασκευαζομένην, 2: ἐκπαλαίοντες, 2: καὶ ὁρῶντες οὐκ ἐκ πολεμικοῦ δεδουλωμένους is equally common (Cretan wine was famous in antiquity; cp Juv. Sat. 14:20). Tit. 3:1 bears a curious reference to the turbulence of the Cretans, a characteristic which runs through their history.

CRIMSON (קִרְמִיזִים, qirmiz), a word common in the form תְּרִמָּה, tirmah, or תְּרִמָּת, tirmath, is used in Ex. 16:22 in the general sense of 'worm' [RV], in 1 S. 14:25 (EV 'crimson'), Lam. 4:5 (EV 'scarlet') for the crimson dye prepared from the body of the female Coccus ciliatus, a Homopterous insect belonging to the family Coccidae.

The female, which grows to the size of a grain of corn, is in the adult or imago stage attached by its inscribed proboscis to the leaves and twigs of the Syrian Holm-oak, whose juices it lives on. The male is winged and flies about. The bodies of the females are collected and dried, and from them are prepared the colouring matters known as Carmine, Lake, and Crimson. Since the discovery of America a Mexican species of Coccus, C. cacti, which lives on the India fig, has largely supplanted the first-named species as the source of the pigment, and at the present day both have lost their commercial value owing to the invention of aniline dyes. In old literature the name Kermes (see below) is frequently used for Coccus.

Other names for this colour are קִרְמִיזִים (qirmiz) (Jer. 4:30, RV 'scarlet'; elsewhere EV 'scarlet'; see COLORS, § 14) and the late equivalent קִרְמִיזִים, qirmiz (2 Ch. 2:26, [61] 3:14²). The origin of the termination -iz in קִרְמִיזִים is obscure; it can scarcely be explained (as in Ges.⁶) by the Pers. affix -an, for there is no word qirmiz in Pers., nor would it signify the colour if there were.

For 1 S. 6:31 (קִרְמִיזִים, RV⁹⁸ 'crimsoned,' EV 'dyed'), see COLORS, § 137.

In 1p. Const. 7:40 he is said to have been ordained bishop of Aegina. In West. Rom. Vet. he is commemorated on Oct. 1.

CROCODILE (קְרִיתִים) 'Beasts of the reeds' is an alternative rendering (in AV⁹⁴) of קְרִיתִים, 1 S. 6:8 (1 S. 6:8) קְרִיתִים τῶν καλάμων, AV 'company of spearman,' RV rightly 'wild beast of the reeds.' This means the crocodile (hardly Behemoth—i.e., the hippopotamus), used to symbolise the Egyptian power. Cp Hupfeld and Del. ad loc.

According to Ex. 23 of Lev. 11:30 (AV 'tortoise'), was a 'land-crocodile'; see LIZARD, 1. For 'land-crocodile,' RV's rendering of קְרִיתִים, a kind of lizard (Lev. 11:30), see CHAMELEON, 1. The animal described poetically in Job has generally been identified with the crocodile (see especially Bochart 3:717 ff.). Until recent times, when the propriety of making any zoological identification has been questioned, the chief dissentient has been Schultens. His great eighteenth-century scholar thinks that the arguments for the crocodile and the whale are about equal; the poet does not seem to him to have been consistent in his description. Tustin, however (VIII 258), is of opinion as a naturalist that the crocodile is described under the name Leviathan, and if Biddle's translation and explanation be adopted, the characteristics of the crocodile — the difficulty of capturing or taming it, its voracity, its formidable row of teeth, its impervious scales, its gleaming eyes, its violent snorting, and its immense strength, all come out with marvellous exactness. Richin (III B, 122) 'Leviathan' leaves it an open question whether the poet may not even have seen crocodiles in Palestine. Certainly the Nile or Zarka near Caesarea is believed to have had crocodiles quite lately, and, as the climate of this marshy region resembles that of the Delta, there is in this nothing surprising. Still, though Pliny (II 26) speaks of this river as the Crocodile river, and mentions a town called Crocodilon, we have no evidence that there were crocodiles there in biblical times. A thirteenth-century tract tells a strange story of fierce beasts called crocodiles having been brought there (see COCKERILL). Sir John Maundeville designates them crocodiles. See further Biddle's elaborate commentary on Job 41, and for another view connecting the description in Job with mythology see BETH MOH and LEVIATHAN, § 3.

¹ Probably from Pers. qirmiz, 'a worm,' and perhaps akin to our 'crimson' and 'carmine' (see Skeat, s.v. 'crimson'). Cf. Sans. qirmiz, which is probably identical with our word 'worm' (qirmiz, 'worm'). On the other hand, Del. (ZLLT 3:523) may be right in connecting Ar. and Pers. qirmiz, from which carmine and crimson are most naturally derived, with an independent Turkish root beginning with q instead of z.

Crocodilus niloticus, formerly common throughout the Nile, has been almost exterminated in the lower part of the river, though it still flourishes above the southern delta. It is found from the Nile and the Senegal to the Cape of Good Hope, and in Malagasy and Syria. Large specimens attain a length of 15 ft. It was worshipped by the ancient Egyptians at Ombi, and in the Fayum (by E. de Moiré) under the name of Sokki (transcribed in GK. as Sockki); for a possible explanation of this, see Maspero, Revue d'Égypte, 1897, p. 18. — N. CROSS. We shall not attempt to introduce the reader to the archaeological study of the symbolism of the cross. Interesting as the task would be, it is really superfluous. If there was a time when it could be supposed that between Christianity and the non-Christian religions there was, in respect of the symbol of the cross, an affinity that was divinely appointed, that time is passed. We are no longer tempted to imagine that between the sign of the cross in baptism, and the heathen custom of bearing a mark indicating the special religious communion of the individual, there is a kind of pre-ordained relation. On the other hand, the fact that heathen notions did affect popular Christian beliefs in very early times cannot be denied; the magic value ascribed to the cross has doubtless a non-Christian origin. For these matters it is enough to refer to Zöckler (Das Kreuz Christi), who fully recognises the original purity and simplicity of the earliest Christian view of the cross. His sobriety contrasts with the fantastic subjectivity of E. von Bunsen (Das Symbol des Kreuzes, 1870).

First as to the meaning of the Greek word σταυρός, which has a wider range than the word 'cross' by which it is rendered in English. We find it frequently used for the most primitive instrument of execution, the upright stake (crux simplex) to which the delinquent was bound when no tree was at hand (crux infirma arbor and infirma lignum; Liv. 20 Cic. Pro Rubeo, 4), or on which he was impaled (crux hanging), as well as for the fabricated cross (crux companda) of various shapes.

Schumacher says that he has seen a crocodile there, but that there are very few crocodiles left (PEAQ, Jan. 1887, p. 1). For a sifting of the evidence down to 1872, see Toller, Wandering nach Palästina (59), 375 ff. Cp Rob. Ph. Geogr. (2), 175 ff.; Raed. Fal. (2) 272.

CROSS

The origin of crucifixion is traced back to the Phoenicians. The cross was also used at quite an early date in some form or other by Egyptians (Thuc. I 10, Persians (Herod. 9: 1), Carthians (A. Valerius Maximus; Polyb. I 1, c. 4), Indians (Diod. 2: 1), Scythians (Justin, 2: 1), and others, besides the Greeks (Pl. Critias, 1) and the Romans. Among the latter named, however, this cruel form of punishment (cp Gal. 3: 10; 1 Cor. 1: 17) is called crucis supplicium (supplicium); J. S. B. V. 13: 1 was originally reserved for slaves (crucis supplicium), compare the application of the term crucis to slaves and criminals of the worst kind. It was at first considered too shameful a punishment to be inflicted upon Roman citizens (cp Tac. 1: 5, 20 c. 1).

On the cross proper there were three shapes: the crux immissa, or four-armed cross, the crux commissa, or three-armed cross, and the crux decussata, which is more commonly known as St. Andrew's cross. Following the tradition of the Church, Iren. Haer. 2: 1, Eccl. 1: 1, Tertullian, Adv. Marc. 1: 1, etc., and has some support in the assertion of the Gospels that before the face of Jesus was placed a title (Mk. 15: 26; ἐπιγράφοντες αὐτῷ; Lk. 23: 38; ἐπιγράφοντες; Mt. 27: 32; αὐτῷ; Jn. 19: 20; ἐπιγράφοντες), the cross of the NT has commonly been taken to be the crux immissa.

The counts of the passio of the crucifixion being so meagre, any degree of certainty on this point is impossible. But the evidence seems to preponderate in favour of the traditional view.

The four-armed cross in use at the time of the crucifixion of Jesus was most probably of the following description. It consisted of two poles.

3. N^o 1 cross. An upright stake (crux simplex), which was firmly fixed in the ground with pegs or it seemed to the stump of a tree, and across began transversum (crux commissa), which was carried by the condemned to the place of execution. The height of the upright stake in antiquity was probably made in which to fasten with cord and perhaps also to bend the cross-beam (cp Lucian's ἡ δὲ σταυρὸς; also Hor. Carm. 1: 35; C. Lev. 5: 1). At a suitable height from the ground was fixed a peg (ἡ δὲ σταυρὸς; cp Iren. Haer. 2: 1, 24) on which to set the body astride (cp Justin, Phil. 1: 1; Iren. Haer. 2: 1, c. 10; Adv. Marc. 1: 1, c. 10; so that the whole weight might not rest upon the hands and arms). Thus, together with the lashings, made a rest for the feet ἐπιποδίων, ὑποποδίων, ὑποποδίων (cp Greg. of Tours, De Glor. Mart., chap. 6 unnecessary).

It is probable that on such a cross as this Jesus was crucified, and that the execution was carried out in the regular manner.

4. Crucifixion. In the regular manner. Soon after the sentence (A. Val. Max. 1: 1; Dion Hal. 9: 1), or on the way to execution (1 M. 33: 6; cp Gal. 3: 10; 1 Cor. 1: 17) the condemned was scourged. He was led, bearing his own cross, or rather part of it (Pl. 1. De sera nummis vindicta, chap. 9; Artemid. 2: 5).

In some of these cases (e.g., Persians), no doubt, only the crux simplex is intended. The cross in the strict sense of the word was not used by the early Jews. In Est. 7: 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

This too is the shape of the cross in the old (3rd cent.) engraving of the crucifixion which was found on the Palatine hill at Rome.

Some scholars (Klein, etc.) have contended for the crux commissa (cp Seneca, Consol. ad Marc., vol. Jos. Ant. 1: 1).

Jeremy Taylor (Life of Christ) supposes the body to have rested upon nothing but four great wounds.

The offence alleged (Lk. 23: 2) was a political one. Stoning was the Jewish punishment for blasphemy. See LAW AND JUSTICE, § 12.

The scourging of Lk. 23: 22, Jn. 19: 1 was probably a preliminary and therefore an irregular one.

CROSS

and cp the symbolical phrase in Mt. 10:33 (16:24) to which he was bound, along the public roads to an eminence (see Göttingen) outside the city gates (Cic. Pro. 59; Plant. Hel. glor. n. 16). In front of him went a herald bearing a tablet (titulus, Suet. Cat. 32) of condemnation, or he himself carried the aria (cp trapis, Suet. Hel. 117; trapez, Euseb. HE v. 141; Arxadia, Sot. HE 117) suspended by a cord from his neck (Suet. Calig. 32; Domit. 10; Dio Cass. 51.4; Euseb. HE v. 141). On arrival at the place of execution the cruciatarius was stripped of his clothing and laid on the ground upon his back. The cross-beam was then thrust under his head, and his arms were stretched out across it to the right and left and perhaps bound to the wood (cp Lucan, Phars. 6.44 f. Plin. HN xxviii. 111, the hand being fastened by means of a long nail (cp cruci. figere, argere).¹ Hereby, before or after the arrival of the condemned (see Cic. Pro. v. 62, and cp Polyb. 1.869; Diod. xxv. 5.2; Jos. BJ vii. 43), the upright stake had been firmly fastened in the ground. The cross-beam was then, with the help of ropes (cp perhaps Plin. HN xxviii. 157) and perhaps of some other simple contrivance, raised to its place on the stake. Here it was hung provisionally, by a rope attached to its ends, on a firm nail or notch,² whilst the body was placed³ astride the lower peg in the stake, and the legs bound. The beams were then probably bound and nailed⁴ together at the point of intersection. Nails like those already used for the hands would be employed to fix the feet (Lk. 24.39; cp Plautus, Mochl. ii. 113; Just. Dial. chap. 97; Tert. Adv. Marc. 3.10, etc.), which were only slightly elevated above the ground. The nails were driven through each foot either in front, through the instep and sole, or at the side, through the hudo (clavus).⁵ The body remained on the cross until it decayed (Hos. Ep. 16.4; Lucan, Phars. 6.543), or (from the time of Augustus) until it was given up to the friends of the condemned for burial (cp Just. Dial. 6.2; cp Jos. BJ iv. 5.2). Soldiers were set to watch the crucified (Cic. Pro. Rabir. 4.11; Petron. Sat. 3; Quint. Dial. 6.2; Mt. 27.66; Jn. 19.23). Death resulted from hunger (Euseb. HE 8.5) or pain (Seneca, Ep. 101). To alleviate the latter the Jews offered the victim a stupefying draught (Mk. 15.23; Mt. 27.4; Rab. Saül. f. 131). Breaking of the legs (παλαιομα; see § 6) was a distinct form of punishment among the Romans (Seneca, De Ira 3.2; Suet. Aug. 67; cp, however, Ongen on Mt. 27.54). M. V. C.

5. Evangelists' point of view.

From an archaeological point of view this may be justified; but it is necessary to point out that the evangelists are entirely indifferent to the archaeology of the circumstances of the Passion. All indeed that they seem to care for is (1) the opportunity which the Cross gave for Christ to make fresh disclosures (i.e. speech) of his wonderful character, and (2) the proofs which the Passion gave, as it appeared to them, of a pre-established harmony between prophecy and the life of Jesus. When the ἐκταρακισμένος οἶνος (wine mingled with myrror) and δεσμός (vinegar) is mentioned, it is chiefly, we may presume, to suggest a connection with Ps. 69.21.⁶ So the 'casting lots' doubtless fixed

² See Brauch, Die Evangelische Geschichte, from which this part of the description is borrowed. For the two nails (cp Plautus, Mochl. ii. 113 and see Meyer). Others (Keim, Farrar, etc.) think that only one nail was used.

⁴ Mt. 27.4 (taken) is a fellow psalm to Ps. 69. See also Lk.

itself in tradition because of the parallelism of Ps. 22.14. The only NT passages in which a clear trace of sympathy with the physical pains of Jesus is discernible are 22.44 and Heb. 5.7, especially the former. There is great reserve in this. Though Weismann (1873) quotes several ancient writers who state that, in some circumstances, is really 'under' blood,² yet the early writer of Lk. 22.44³ comforted himself with saying that the sweat of Jesus in agony was 'as it were' drops of blood' (ὡς ἄνθος).

6. Death of Jesus.

There is no evidence that an NT writer had formed the idea that Jesus died of a broken heart, as W. St. M. D., supposed (Notice on the Physical Death of Christ, 1847). Certainly an idea for many modern readers of the Gospel would be a good and sufficient evidence. The hypothesis is based on Jn. 19.34, where we read that 'one of the soldiers with a spear pierced (εἰσέεισε) his side, and forthwith there came out blood and water.' From a critical point of view we can hardly say that the fact that Jesus died this would after he had breathed his last is established; theorising upon it therefore, with a view to determine the cause of Jesus' death, is excluded. We have reason to believe (see Orig. on Mt. 27.54) a lance wound was sometimes given to those who were crucified to accelerate death. The probability is (the kernel of Jn. 19.34-7) to be accepted as historical, that the two malefactors first had their legs broken (καταρτίσας) and then received their coup de grâce by being pierced with a lance. This is not opposed to the interpretation of 19.34 for all that the evangelist states that the legs of Jesus were broken. That the mention of the 'eye-witness' (ὁ ὁμολογῶν) has come to us in its original form, cannot, however, be asserted, because of the impossibility of explaining the issuing of 'blood and water' from an internal physiological point of view. Perhaps one may suppose that the writer of Jn. 19.34-7 in its present form has accommodated the facts of tradition (the tradition attested by the witness) to his theological needs. There is a theological commentary on the 'blood and water' in 1 Jn. 5.6, where the 'water' and the 'blood' have become, were technical expressions for permanent supernatural channels of divine grace, though the comment is to us (not to its first readers) as obscure as the text.

With regard to the hypothesis of Dr. Stourd (viz., that the sudden rupture of the heart, and that the blood water were the separated clot and serum of the escaped pericardial sac, which the spear had pierced), it is sufficient to mention the invariable fact, of which this physician is to have been ignorant, that the blood escaping into a cavity from rupture of a great organ, such as the coronary artery or pericardial sac, does not show the smallest tendency to separate into clot and serum ('blood water,' as he takes it), but remains thick, dark red blood. The notion that the wound was on the left side is comparatively late. It is embodied in some of the newer commentaries, but in most modern crucifixes, and probably the more ancient, the wound is placed somewhat lower, on the right side. That it was deep and wide, is inferred from language of Jn. 19.27, where Thomas is bidden to 'reach forth his hand and thrust it into my side'—namely the side of the spiritual body.

The ordinary view of the motive of the soldier (Jn. 19.34), that he wished to make sure of the death of Jesus, is a mere conjecture. If, therefore, the expression εἰσέεισε (19.34), 'he thrust through,' in Jn. 19.34 will permit some may prefer to accept a new hypothesis that the laceration by the lance was only a slight one. The author of this hypothesis thus explains it. 1. 6.1 'May it not have been, rather than a brutal act, the point of the lance directed at something on the surface of the body, perhaps the eye, and especially Jn. 19.34, which allude to the same? The εἰσέεισε of Jn. corresponds to the εἰσέεισε of Jn. 19.34. εἰσέεισε is most naturally rendered εἰσέεισε (19.34) in Weismann. This too suits Ps. 101.

2. This is not inconsistent with the fact that the second Mt. 27.35 is wanting in the best MSS, and omitted by others. See Jn. 19.34.

3. Numerous more or less inauthentic modern instances have been needlessly brought together.

4. An early addition to the original text (WH).

4. Post-exilic and NT usages. 'a diadem on his head' (διαδήμα, Ant. xii. 113). From Zech. 6:9-13, however, it would appear that Zechariah was directed to select from the exiles' gifts enough gold and silver to make crowns (כִּתְיָו) or a crown (כִּתְיָו, W. Now) for Zerubbabel.² Josephus was perhaps thinking solely of the Hasmonean kings; those priest-kings wore 'buckles of gold' on their shoulders, not crowns on their heads (1 Mace. 10:50 11:44, πορφυρῶν χρυσῶν; see Brückner, 3). The Ishmael thinks that Hyrcanus, the 'second David,' wore two separate crowns, one royal and one priestly (Ant. xii. 66 at); and Josephus reports a present to this king of a golden crown from Alcibiades (στρέφανος, Ant. xii. 83).

The Gr. στρέφανος, which properly denotes the badge of merit as distinct from διαδήμα the badge of royalty (see DIADEM), is frequently used by Σ to represent כִּתְיָו; but the distinction between διαδήμα and στρέφανος was not consistently observed in Hellenistic Greek.

In the NT στρέφανος is used of the garlands given to the victors in games (1 Cor. 9:25; cp 2 Tim. 2:5), of the ornaments worn by the 'elders,' etc., in the visions of the Apocalypse (Rev. 14:13 17:14 here, the Son of Man), and of Jesus' crown of thorns. The last perhaps affects the Roman rather than the Jewish idea as to the symbolism of the crown; but Jewish ideas on such matters must by that date have been assimilated to the Roman.

In RV 1 Mace. 1:29 11:35 13:37 2 Mace. 11 (στρέφανος) 'crown' (AV 'crown tax') refers to a 'fixed money payment like the Roman aurum coronarium' (Cic. in Proin. ch. 37), in room of the wreath or crown of gold which at one time it was customary, and even obligatory, for subject peoples to present as a gift of honour (cp 2 Mace. 14 and § 2 above) to the reigning king on certain occasions' (Comb. Bib. ad 1 Mace. 10:29); see TAXATION.

EV 'crown,' RV 'rim' or 'moulding'), see ALTAR, § 11; on that of the ark (ib. 25:11 37:2), see ARK, § 13; and on that of the table of shewbread (ib. 25:24 f. 37:11 f.), see ALTAR, § 10. Σ renders by κνυάριον στρεπνῶν and στρεφῶν.

CRUSE. 1. The cruse of water (תְּבַשְׁתִּין, qaydasheth) which stood by Saul's bed when he was surprised by David (1 S. 26:11 12:10; cp 1 K. 19:6) was probably a small water-jar of porous clay like the drick (water pronunciation, drick) of the modern Syrians and Egyptians. The porosity of the clay enables the water to be kept cool if the drick is placed in a draught.

² The MT assigns Zechariah's crown to Joshua the high priest; but this can hardly be maintained (see ZERUBBABEL, and cp Brückner ad loc.).

CUCKOW

The same vessel was used by the poor to hold oil (1 K. 17:11 12), where it is distinguished from תֵּבַח or water jar [EV 'pitcher'] in which a household supply was fetched from the well (Gen. 21:14 Σ τὴν ὕδα).

¹ 1 K. 17 ib., in 196 and in Judith 10:6, Σ uses the κεύρα, a written κεύρα, which, if from κεύρα, suggests the shape of the Roman ampulla.

⁴ On the cruse (τὴν ἀδὰς τστρον; AV Box, 2) of 2 S. 20:7, etc., strictly a jar or phial of alabaster, usually pear-shaped or pyramidal (Pliny, HN 9:60), ALABASTER.

CRYSTAL. There can be little doubt that κρυστάλλος is intended by the κρυστάλλος of Rev. 21:11; gl is represented by τῶνος (see GLASS). Theophrastus (14) reckons crystal among the pellucid stones used in engraved seals. In modern speech we apply the term crystal (as the ancients apparently did) to a glass-transparent stone (commonly of a hexagonal form, the flint family, the most refined kind of quartz).

In Σ κρυστάλλος represents —

a. תְּבַשְׁתִּין 'frost' or 'ice,' perhaps even in Ezek. 1:22.

b. תְּבַשְׁתִּין (1 S. 5:12, EV 'carbuncles'), — that 'stones of fire' (cp Ass. abun rāhi, 'stone of fire' (lipidū), on an assumed derivation from תְּבַשְׁתִּין 'to kindle,' by rubbing; hence the rendering of Ap. Ad. τρυφῶν, Sym. Theod. [Ad.] γαυρῶν, Vg. Trides scilicet [scilicet]). LXX and Pesh. have κρυστάλλος (תְּבַשְׁתִּין).

c. תְּבַשְׁתִּין, EV 'bellium' Nu. 11:7 (cp Field, Herod.).

d. תְּבַשְׁתִּין, EV 'vapour' (Ps. 148:8).

For Job 28:17, AV (תְּבַשְׁתִּין), RV 'glass'; see GLASS.

e. תְּבַשְׁתִּין, gabit (Job 28:18; RV 'crystal'; AV 'pearl' is of obscure origin; cp perhaps Ass. gabaia, 'be the massive').

The RV 'crystal' finds support in the Heb. תְּבַשְׁתִּין (1 S. 5:12) in the relation of meanings see BDB, תְּבַשְׁתִּין (תְּבַשְׁתִּין), and pass in the LXX, תְּבַשְׁתִּין (תְּבַשְׁתִּין), תְּבַשְׁתִּין (תְּבַשְׁתִּין) (1 S. 5:12 13 14), cp Ortomb, which, like Ass. Pers. billar, word is slightly transposed, but is 'crystal' or even 'glass' as well as 'beryl.' Blau understands 'glass pearls.'

Σ κρυστάλλος transliterates תְּבַשְׁתִּין and so Theod. γαυρῶν; the EV is too paraphrastic to be of any use; and ἐπεφωτισμένη (1 S. 5:12) [Syr. Hex., mg. [תְּבַשְׁתִּין]] are appellations derived from תְּבַשְׁתִּין 'to heap up,' תְּבַשְׁתִּין, 'heap,' (1 S. 5:12).

CUB (כֹּבֶא), Ezek. 30:3 RV; AV CUB (כֹּבֶא).

CUBIT. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The common term is תְּבַשְׁתִּין, ammah (prop. length of forearm; see BDB; Ass. ammah, תְּבַשְׁתִּין in the Siloam inscription; cp Gen. 6:15; cp תְּבַשְׁתִּין, 'an ordinary cubit' (1 S. 4:13); תְּבַשְׁתִּין one handbreadth longer than the usual cubit (1 S. 4:13), etc.).

¹ תְּבַשְׁתִּין, gomed, Judg. 3:10 seems to be a short cubit; so Jew. tradition; see More, תְּבַשְׁתִּין 1:1.

The NT term is תְּבַשְׁתִּין, Mat. 27:1 Lk. 12:25.

CUCKOW. RV 'seamew' (תְּבַשְׁתִּין; ἀλπος [1 S. 17:44]).

¹ Hitzig and On. delete 'terrible,' תְּבַשְׁתִּין (so Q¹), but not Vg. Pesh.. It is of course possible that we should read תְּבַשְׁתִּין.

On ⁷⁷צָרָה, zharah (Mal. 1: 3 [24], etc.), see especially HAN. On ⁷⁷צָרָה, zharah, Is. 65: 13 (RVmg prefers OVRN [27: D]; ⁷⁷צָרָה in Nu. 1: 21 (RVmg 'adoration'); ⁷⁷צָרָה [צָרָה] Lam. 3: 48, ⁷⁷צָרָה, Dh. 28: 20 (RV 'cursing'), ⁷⁷צָרָה, zharah, Rev. 22: 3 (RVmg 'anything is cursed'), and ⁷⁷צָרָה, Gal. 3: 10; see HAN 1505 A. 10 C. CURSING.

CURTAIN. For Ex. 26: 1 ff., etc. (⁷⁷צָרָה), and Nu. 3: 26 (1), etc. (⁷⁷צָרָה); more usually 'hanging' in AV, generally 'screen' in RV; see LAM 1505 A. 10 C. (⁷⁷צָרָה [צָרָה] Is. 40: 22), RVmg 'curtain' is properly from ⁷⁷צָרָה, 'to be fine or thin'. The Hebrews are likened to a fine gauze or screen. The rendering 'curtain' is loose, and is due, no doubt, to the use of ⁷⁷צָרָה in the parallel Ps. 104: 2.

CUSH. 1. A (non-Semitic) people called Kisse is mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions as dwelling in the border country between S. Euphrates and Media. Sennacherib (Eyl. Cyl. 16: 1 ff.; KR 1: 7) describes this region as difficult to traverse, and is not subjugated by any of his predecessors. In fact, it was a conquering race that dwelt there. To it belonged the dynasty which ruled over Babylonia for nearly six centuries—a lengthened rule, the consequence of which was the infusion of a large Kassite element into the population of Babylonia, especially S. Babylonia, which might fitly be called the land of Kās. It is this Kās or Kūs (whence MT's Kūš) that is intended in Gen. 10: 2, where NIMROD [7: 7] is called the son of Cush. That the Babylonian Kās is meant in Gen. 2: 13 as the passage now stands is much less easy to make out (see PARADISE), while to hold with Winckler (U. F. Unteruch. 1: 10 ff.) that Isuah refers to the S. Babylonian Kās in the difficult prophecy, Is. 18, can be rendered possible only by somewhat improbable textual criticism and exegesis.

W.'s result (232) is that the embassy mentioned by Isuah is that of Merodach-baladan to Hezekiah in 720 B.C., and his strongest argument is that 'the streams of Cush' in Is. 18 is not applicable to the kingdom of Ethiopia, which had but one stream, the Nile. The answer is that the geographical knowledge of the writer was naturally but small, and that the island of Merodach-baladan's residence of the Ethiopian kings was removed after Isuah's time, is formed by the union of the Nile, the Atbara, and the Blue Nile. On grounds independent of W.'s hypothesis, the words ⁷⁷צָרָה ⁷⁷צָרָה ⁷⁷צָרָה are certainly held to be a late interpolation. (See further Che. and Haug in Isuah, Heb. SBOT.)

2. The question of the existence of an Arabian Cush has passed into a new phase since the discovery by Arabian land of Kūš contiguous to the N. Arabian Musri or Musri, and together with it forming the region called Mchibha (see MIZRAIM, § 2b). The land being known as Kūš (7: 7) to the Assyrians, we cannot avoid a re-examination of the more difficult OT passages in which ⁷⁷צָרָה (Cushi) or ⁷⁷צָרָה (Cushi) occurs. Referring first to the Pentateuch and reserving the complicated question arising out of Gen. 2: 13 for subsequent consideration, we see at once (a) how probable it is that in the list of names in Gen. 10: 6 Cushi is an Arabian and not an African country; for none of the eleven names in Gen. 10: 6-7 can be supposed to be African except Cushi, Mizraim, Put, and Seba, and of these Mizraim (read rather Mizrim) has been claimed elsewhere for Arabia, while Put [7: 7] is at any rate not Libya, and Seba (822), which resists all attempts to localise it in Africa, may well be suspected to be only another form of Sheba (822) [7: 7], the well-known Arabian Sabaeans. It is true Sheba appears in 7: 7 as a son of Kaamah; but no objection can be based upon that. The same name probably fixed itself in slightly different forms in different localities, and in Ps. 72: 1 we even find 822 (which has intruded into the text) as a variant to 822. (Possibly Sheba, 822 sh everywhere rather than 822, 822.) This conflation greatly reduces the error committed by the redactor of Gen. in inserting 77, 822 (which belong to 1) between 77, 822 and 77, 822 (which belong to 1); for the location of the Babylonian land of Kās, to which N. belonged, was largely formed by the immigration of 'Chaldean' tribes (822) whose home was probably in E. Arabia. If Kās be taken, not ethnically, but geographically, as a designation of the Arabian land of the ancestors of a large part of the people of Babylonia, it was not incorrect to regard Nimrod related to the Cushi mentioned in 7: 6 f. (For J. see NIMROD, MIZRAIM.)

(b) In Nu. 11: 1 (E) we hear of 'the Cushite woman whom Moses had married'. In Ex. 2: 21 (1) his Zipporah is represented as a Midianite. A north locality for Midianites is probable even without the doubtful passage 1 K. 11: 13 (cp HAN 1505 A. 10 C.). It is not necessary to follow Wellhausen in his exegesis of the whole of Nu. 12: 1, at any rate 'the Cushite woman' comes from an early source. See Moses.

(c) On 2 S. 18: 21 see CUSH, 3.

(d) 1 S. 20: 13 (14-15) see MIZRAIM.

(e) Am. 9: 7. Who are the 822? Hardly 'children of the Ethiopians' (E.V.). What evidence have we that the Ethiopians were regarded as tempt in Amos's time? Probably the prophet had never been, and saw the misery inflicted on the Arabian Cush by some great mischance in war (cp W. 1: 2).

(f) Hab. 3: 7, 'the tents of Cushan' 822 sh perhaps become 822, 'Cush'; at any rate, N. Arabian peoples are meant in both parts of the verse. See CUSH.

(g) Job 1: 7. It is quite possible to read 822, 'Cushyom' (Che. JQR 4: 575) for 822, 'Chaldeans' [7: 7], which is not without difficulty, to explain this of the N. Arabian Cushites, who at any rate be referred to.

(h) In 2 Ch. 21: 6 we hear of 'Cushites' beside Arabians (cp ARABIA), a reminiscence of whose literary lands probably underlies the distorted tradition of 'Zerah the Cushite' (see ZERAH) in 2 Ch. 11: 9 ff.

(i) Ps. 83: 7 [7: 7] 'with the inhabitants of Tyre' should be 822, 822, 'Musri and Cush'. A similar emendation is required in Ps. 87: 4. The combination of Piddis and Tyrians, Tyrians and Libyans, presented in MT, is extremely improbable.

1. The story. I suppressed the Israélites and their king, and I asked of Canaan for eight years, and I asked Ben Kenaz to overthrow him (Judg. 4:1-14). This story of this oppressor and deliverance is introduced as a typical illustration of the edifying theory of Israel's history put forward in Judg. 2:1-6, and I was writing on the pre-Dionetomonic book of heroic stories which forms the basis of our [Judg. 3:1-7, §§ 3-5]. Hence we may

It is more probable, however, that the whole trouble is caused by an error in the text.

There is some reason to think that the true reading of Θ in Judg. 3:10 is . . . Novaparratha Buadras (that is) Son the origin of the name. עֲדֹמִי, Edomites in 2 K. 16:1, and עֲדֹמִי as a glass (with גִּזְרֵי, קֶלֶסֶת 1) that Ethelred the Kenizeite should be the deliverer of Judah from the Edomite tyranny is only natural. Observe that the next expression, עַל מִדְּבַר הַיָּם, 'Whether we may go on to correct קֶלֶסֶת עֲדֹמִי into קֶלֶסֶת-הַיָּם, 'the chief of the Temanite,' with קֶלֶסֶת, (Gen. 4:12), and to work into this paragraph the isolated phrase 1 Jo 5 by prefixing וְהָיָה 'and he smote' is problematical. It seems to the present writer enough to read, for עֲדֹמִי עֲדֹמִי עֲדֹמִי, 'from the land of the Temanites,' which is the description attached to the name of the Edomite king; Husham in Gen. 36:34. The letters become partly detached, and an editor wittily read עֲדֹמִי. It is very possible, too, that the name חִשְׁמִי (‘ushan) is a corruption of חִשְׁמִי (חִשְׁמִי) Hisham (cp. Klost. 119). The writer was at a loss for a name, and took one from the list of Ishodite knies. Hisham, son of Hisham, was a great warrior (cp. 35); it was natural to make the fact known to him in this respect. Whether we may suppose that the editors when we are indebted for ‘Cushan-rishathaim, king of Aram-naharaim,’ had in his mind Kossite (Cushite) incursions such, which might have been connected with Nimrod and Zerkim (cp. 77), which might have been referred to have proceeded from ‘Aram-naharaim,’ may be doubted. The different view of the origin of the story as given in MT see Moore’s Apocrypha, 58 f.), who thinks that we have here a distortion of the tradition of a raid of Midianitish ‘Cushites’ into Judah.

3. Other theories. stands, without applying critical methods, have two recent hypotheses respecting Cushman-rishathaim to choose from.

Prof. McCurdy (Hist. Proph. Mon. I 291; cp. 231) thinks that the 'wh'de land' (hōt Aramaean) may have been subdued by the Aramaeans, who, during the enfeeblement of Assyria, had re-conquered the land of Mitanni, the Egyptian Nubariah, which includes W Mesopotamia (see RFP 3 57), some time before the accession of Tiglath-pileser I. (1020 B.C.). In the ease with which the asserted conquest of the strong cities of Canaan was effected by the Aramaeans, in the name of ushan-rishathaim, led in the championship of a Keozizite or Judahite hero, he finds no difficulty. Prof. Sayce, too, in his ingenious defence of a § 2 S 1, RV, 'the Cushite', the messenger whom David dispatched, in preference to Ahimaaz, to inform David of the death of Absalom. Ahimaaz was told to convey 'later on by the way of the plain'² and reached David first (2 S 18:32). 'Two questions arise. Who was 'the Cushite'? and why did he defer his report to Ahimaaz as the messenger?' The account, which has been taken from a fuller narrative, does not say. Evidently 'the Cushite' was a foreigner, and that was the reason why, like the Amalekite in 2 S 1, he could without offence be the bearer of evil tidings. That David had foreign soldiers to guard the Hittite Goliath is well known. 'The Cushite' was not as H. P. Sm. supposes a negro. We can hardly doubt that he belonged to the N. As late as the time of Assur-lum-pal it was obligatory on the kings of Assyria to sacrifice to Šamaš and Nergāl [y.z.] at Sippar and Kutā respectively, a custom apparently due to the primitive importance of these cities in the Kingdom of the Four Quarters of the World; (Winckler, GfA 1.3.251).

mentions among his punishments that he restored the temple of the great gods at Kura (5, 10, 11). It was in the temple of the great gods at Kura that the Babylonians brought from Assyria the golden image of the god Marduk (2 Kings 17:18). The golden image of the god Marduk was brought from Assyria to Babylon in the year 606 B.C. (2 Kings 17:18). This penalty ('I' [א] diwa) was cut him off from among his people; 'he shall be cut off from his people, from Israel, from the assembly' and the like, 'אין ארץ ישראל' is first met with in II (see Lev. 17:10-12), where it is attached to a variety of offences, many of them of a ceremonial or technical character (Lev. 17:10, failure to bring slain ox, lamb, or goat to the tabernacle; 17:14, eating blood; 18:20, various 'abominations'; 20:15, Moloch-worship; 20:17, incest, etc.); 22:1, unlawful speech to holy things; It occurs frequently in P (Lev. 17:11, neglect of circumcision; Ex. 12:10, eating leaven in paschal season; Ex. 30:16, putting oil on putting to secular use the holy oil of anointment; Ex. 31:17, Sabbath profanation; Lev. 7:27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000).

The view of the older interpreters was that the expression meant the death penalty. It is worth noting, however, that in Ex. 31:17 separate emphasis is laid on 'he shall be put to death' (אין ארץ ישראל) as distinguished from 'that soul shall be cut off' (אין ארץ ישראל); cp. Lev. 20:27 (death penalty on witchcraft), the Deutero-nomic expression 'אין ארץ ישראל' 'put away the evil'; De. 13:5 [6] in connection with the death penalty on the false prophet or dreamer of dreams; and perhaps also Lev. 24:17, 24:22, followed by 'אין ארץ ישראל' 'graduation of penalties. It is not to be taken of the actual circumstances and which in II and P (see above), it seems more probable that the writers had in their mind either some such idea as that which was carried into practice under Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 10:3) separated from the congregation of the captivity (Isa. 52:11, 'cast out from the multitude of them that are of the captivity'), and ultimately developed into the minor and major excommunications of the synagogue (see SYNAGOGUE), or that they thought only of death through divine agency, not of punishment inflicted at the hands of the community (Driver on Lev. 24:17). See, further, BAN.

CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH (Ceremonial Mutilations). The former heading is derived from the EV of Lev. 19:28-30. It is, however, too narrow in its range. Circumcision cannot altogether be left out in dealing with the 'cuttings' referred to in these passages; nor can we forget how intimately the laceration of the flesh in mourning is associated with the practice of shaving the head or cutting off part of the hair. The origin and significance of CIRCUMCISION (q.v.) is treated elsewhere. The present article will deal with (1) incisions (§ 1 f.), (2) the cutting off of the hair (§§ 3-5), and (3) tattooing (§ 6 f.), regarded as ceremonial mutilations (see further SACRIFICE).

The technical Hebrew terms for ceremonial incisions are אין ארץ ישראל (verb אין ארץ ישראל); the verb אין ארץ ישראל also is used.

1. References. In Lev. 21:5 [11] we read (with reference to mourning for the dead), 'They shall not make . . . any cuttings in their flesh' (point אין ארץ ישראל, as plur. of אין ארץ ישראל). The practice

¹ It may be noted that the 'I' is peculiar to H, as also the phrase 'I will set my face' (Lev. 17 to 20:36 20:17) or 'put my face' (20:5) against the offender.

² Aram. אין ארץ ישראל, Ass. Yarafa, Ar. Yarafa, strictly 'to cut into,' 'nick,' or 'notch.'

was forbidden especially to the priests, who were thereby profaning themselves. The substantive occurs in Lev. 19:28. 'Ye shall not make any cutting in your flesh for a departed soul' (in the only passage [Zech. 12] in which אין ארץ ישראל occurs, not since the LXX). There is no exact parallel for this passage in Assyrian, but we do find אין ארץ ישראל rendering a garment in token of grief in passage Sirgou's Aras. 224 gives a striking parallel to Lev. 19:28 and probably enough this reading was an attestation of the Mesopotamian custom of rending the dress. Ass. Aras (Smith, 125) also speaks of his warriors those who 'at the behest of the gods let them be hatched to . . . in the fray' (Aras). On it may be remarked that the case of mourners who shed their blood to feed the fumes of departed fire is analogous to that of soldiers who do this on battlefield in obedience to the gods. A supposed secret term for ceremonial incisions (אין ארץ ישראל) is simply due to misunderstanding. In Jer. 18:5 we should read אין ארץ ישראל 'all hands are cut into'; the phrase אין ארץ ישראל is an error; אין ארץ ישראל is, in fact, participial. The reflexive form אין ארץ ישראל occurs in De. 14:1 (parallel the already cited passage of Lev.), and at least passes elsewhere. The primary meaning of the stem is obviously 'to cut off', cp. Ar. qadha, qadha.

The ceremonial cutting referred to was an ordinary custom of mourners in the time of Jeremiah, to dispense with which would have been something very strange and unusual (Jer. 16:15 17:1); evidently contemporaries of the prophet did not recognise the law in De. 14:1. The incisions referred to in Mic. [4:1], 'I will lack myself [so Nowack], O daughter of Ashdod' (it also be signs of mourning; and the law would be to cease, as in Jer. 57, where אין ארץ ישראל 'they would cut themselves', implies that the apostate Jer. who resorted to the Whore's House (i.e., the temple) wished to hang over the Deity to their self-mutilation. This description of the prophet is illustrated by 1 K. 18:28, where the 'cutting' practised by the priests of Baal is said to have been after the custom of ritual, and to have followed the ritual daily or round the altar (see DAVENPORT, § 5). Hosea, too (7:14), speaks of Israelites who 'because of corn and new wine cut themselves,' to propitiate their god (reading אין ארץ ישראל with G¹, We., Che., RV¹⁸⁸⁷).

The practice of shedding the blood in one way or another as an honour due to the dead is world-wide. 2. Significance. It is found not only among the Hebrews and the Arabs (We. Heid. 181), but also among the ancient Greeks and the modern African and Polynesian peoples. 'The blood is the life'; and it is probable that when in primitive times the mourning kin 'cut themselves for the dead,' they did it in the belief that the departed drank in new life with the blood thus poured out by the willing sacrifice of sorrowing friends, and at the same time renewed their bond of union with the living (cf. ESCHATOLOGY § 3, 4).

Such acts doubtless had a sacrificial or sacramental aspect and in view of the fact that the disembodied spirit was conceived as possessing a quasi-divine or demonic character, with undivided potencies for good and evil, it may be assumed that the blood-offering was, or became, as much a conciliatory present to the manes of the dead as that of slain victims was intended to be to the higher gods. It may even have been thought that, as the deceased man had passed into another world on leaving the circle of his kin, he had in some sense become a stranger to them and that therefore it was necessary to make a blood-covenant with him, and so secure his goodwill for the tribe or family. The radical change of death might suggest that as the corporate unity of the departed with his clan had been broken, it must be restored by giving the dead code of the blood of Christ.

² There was no longer any consciousness of this when the post-exilic prophet Joel wrote, 'Rend your heart, and not your garments' (Joel 2:13). Else he would have said, 'Rend your heart, and not your flesh' (cp. Jer. 4:4).

The living animal that ritual practice requires is symbolized in the lion given you, and that is the reason the dead lion has often symbolized itself even at the height of culture, by smother over the cross, and by coming to us as the Hindu Sati woman who is burned to save her husband from the dead, as practiced in the people of the great prophets. It symbolized respect for the womanhood of the mourner to die out and be with the lion and not one.

3. Cutting off hair.

Cutting off the hair was also the most characteristic expression of an Arab woman's mourning. When I did the 1-W did find all the women of his tribe pulled their hair at his grave (Agh 156; W. Heat 32). It was a sacrifice to the dead, and the underlying idea of the offering is suggested by the story of Simon: 'If I be shaven,' said that hero, 'my strength will go from me' (Judg 16:7). In other words, the hair, the growth of which was continually renewed, appeared to the ancients a centre of vitality, like the blood;¹ and thus to offer it, whether to duty (Nu. 6:1) or to the spirits of the dead, had essentially the same import and purpose as to offer one's blood, the offering to originate or to renew a bond of vital union between the worshipper and the unseen power. The acts of worship,' performed by the individual for his own good as distinct from that of the community; and both are common elements in ceremonies of initiation by which youths are admitted to the rights of manhood, especially to marriage and participation in the tribal worship. This CIRCUMCISION [Lev. xiv. § 4] was originally a rite preliminary to marriage (Ex. xiv. 20); and LAVAND (Lev. xiv. § 6) informs us that the long locks of young people were shorn and dedicated at the old Syrian sanctuaries on the same occasion. In the course of time the barbarous character of the blood-offering caused it to lapse from general use, except among certain priesthoods and volatiles; whilst the hair-offering, which in origin and principle was identical, survived to the close of Paganism, and may be recognised in the tonsure of early Christian Monachism.

What you do not know is predicted (rev. 1996). The experiment is presented on a computer screen.

By printing, for example, the word "Buxton", it is looked off as a word that does not ground.

The act of praying or leaving marks on the threshold would appear to be dedication of the person to his god. Herodotus' description of a group of Thracians at Erebos, by the entrance of the Nile, "where a funeral was being performed, if he was found to have left his belongings on sacred Struthion, he was to be killed" (1.141) would have a good measure of religious overtones attached to him taken out of society, "the world of the dead" (Nemes), and another world name used by the name of Iudith, and another world mark and shield (1.142), and receive the same name (1.143) (S&L, 1992, p. 116). As far as the burial and the ownership of property of the god, such names are analogous to the ba or cattle marks of the Bedawi tribes, and may have had their origin in that or a very practice of prayer or pastoral life (epithet 741, 742). In Book 246 we find of marking a lion or cross, the symbol of life (epithet Egyptian ♀, lyke, i.e., with †, the Phoenician form of the letter T(u) on the forehead of the faithful in Jerusalem, who are to be spared from slaughter; which recalls the sealing of the 144,000 servants of God on their foreheads (Rev. 7: 1 f.), and further, the mark of the Beast (σημαμα, something given, Acts 17: 29) on the right hand or the forehead of his worshippers (Rev. 13: 16 f., 20: 4). The strongly metaphorical words of Paul, too, I bear in my body the marks (or brands) of Jesus, τὰ σημάδια τοῦ Ἰησοῦ (Gal. 6: 17) clearly presuppose a custom of tattooing or branding the flesh with sacred names and symbols, which would be familiar as a heathen practice to Paul's Asiatic converts.²

7. Substitutes of tattooing and branding. The Israel-

—i.e., on his forehead (cp Dt. 6:8 Rev. 7:3). The sign on the hand recalls the sign which Yahweh set on Cain (Gen. 4:3; see CUSP, § 4), whilst these strips of inscribed yellow, the phylacteries (= frontlets, LV of OT) of Mt. 23, were looked upon as having magical qualities, not less than the old tattooings and brandings; they were a protection against harm¹ and probably also seemed health and good fortune (cp. Larg. Cant. 8.1).

² Cf. Deissmann, Abkürzungen (1951) 262-76 (a new and ingenious theory).

For the literature of the subjects here treated of, see the works referred to under CIRCUMCISION, MOURNING, CUSTOMS, FROTHIES, SACRIFICE, etc. See also WRS h *Son*² ch. 9, and the authorities there cited; f. R. Taylor, Prim. Cant. 20. 1. 16.

CYAMON (קְיָמוֹן [B&V], qammon [Vg.]; מִיָּמֹן [Syr.], 'which is over against Eshaddon' (Judith 7.1), looks like a corruption of JOKIAM or (Moses) JOKIAM. Rahmou, however, noting that קְיָמוֹן means 'beehive', identifies it with the modern El Endh, 'the beehive', on the plain itself but 'over against' the city 'of Jericho.' Cp. Bar. Ps. 210. The name Cyamon should probably be retained in Judith 4.4 for Kura [B]. See K&N VI.

CYLINDER (מִלְכָּה, milka, RV 10.6. See RING.

CYPRESS, RV Holm TREE (קִרְסָה, Is. 41.19), a tree which in the single passage where it occurs is coupled with the oak. The Hebrew qirsa does not appear in any cognate language, but may be connected with Ar. qirsa, 'to be hard'. LXX and Pesh. omit the word; Aq. and Th. render ἀγριοκάρπος ('wild-iron?'). Vg. has ilva, which is defended by Celsus (2.40.16), and has been widely adopted by our revisers. It is difficult, however, to be certain; for the evergreen oak (Quercus ilex), 1. 11. at the present day is in Palestine (LEP 412). The heavy, hard nature of its wood would harmonise well with the probable etymology of qirsa. 'Cypress' (perhaps a mere guess) comes from the Geneva Bible. David Kiuchi and others thought that what was meant was the fir tree; Luther preferred the beech. Cheyne (Is. 41.19, Heb.) thinks קִרְסָה corrupt, and with Gr., reads קִרְסָה (see PRIN).

For Cant. 1.11 Vg. see CYPRINE (so AV); and for Is. 41.19 RV 10.6, see Box Text [so LXX].

CYPRUS (ΚΥΠΡΟΣ, Is. 24.15), the third largest island of the Mediterranean, placed in the angle between the coast of Syria and that of Asia Minor (Strabo, 681), called ALASH in the Amarna letters, where its copper is specially referred to (so E. Meyer, Petrie, etc.), 'Ash' by the Egyptians, Yavnam by the Assyrians, and KITTIM (גִּי־צִי־וֹן) by the Hebrews. Its physical structure is simple.

1. Description. It consists of a central plain running across the island from E. to W., bounded by a long mountain ridge to the N., and by a broader mountain district to the S.

The central plain was likened in antiquity to the valley of the Nile, being flooded annually by the P. rivers, who held rich deposits of mud. Strabo sketches the productivity of Cyprus (Is. 4. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100. 101. 102. 103. 104. 105. 106. 107. 108. 109. 110. 111. 112. 113. 114. 115. 116. 117. 118. 119. 120. 121. 122. 123. 124. 125. 126. 127. 128. 129. 130. 131. 132. 133. 134. 135. 136. 137. 138. 139. 140. 141. 142. 143. 144. 145. 146. 147. 148. 149. 150. 151. 152. 153. 154. 155. 156. 157. 158. 159. 160. 161. 162. 163. 164. 165. 166. 167. 168. 169. 170. 171. 172. 173. 174. 175. 176. 177. 178. 179. 180. 181. 182. 183. 184. 185. 186. 187. 188. 189. 190. 191. 192. 193. 194. 195. 196. 197. 198. 199. 200. 201. 202. 203. 204. 205. 206. 207. 208. 209. 210. 211. 212. 213. 214. 215. 216. 217. 218. 219. 220. 221. 222. 223. 224. 225. 226. 227. 228. 229. 230. 231. 232. 233. 234. 235. 236. 237. 238. 239. 240. 241. 242. 243. 244. 245. 246. 247. 248. 249. 250. 251. 252. 253. 254. 255. 256. 257. 258. 259. 260. 261. 262. 263. 264. 265. 266. 267. 268. 269. 270. 271. 272. 273. 274. 275. 276. 277. 278. 279. 280. 281. 282. 283. 284. 285. 286. 287. 288. 289. 290. 291. 292. 293. 294. 295. 296. 297. 298. 299. 300. 301. 302. 303. 304. 305. 306. 307. 308. 309. 310. 311. 312. 313. 314. 315. 316. 317. 318. 319. 320. 321. 322. 323. 324. 325. 326. 327. 328. 329. 330. 331. 332. 333. 334. 335. 336. 337. 338. 339. 340. 341. 342. 343. 344. 345. 346. 347. 348. 349. 350. 351. 352. 353. 354. 355. 356. 357. 358. 359. 360. 361. 362. 363. 364. 365. 366. 367. 368. 369. 370. 371. 372. 373. 374. 375. 376. 377. 378. 379. 380. 381. 382. 383. 384. 385. 386. 387. 388. 389. 390. 391. 392. 393. 394. 395. 396. 397. 398. 399. 400. 401. 402. 403. 404. 405. 406. 407. 408. 409. 410. 411. 412. 413. 414. 415. 416. 417. 418. 419. 420. 421. 422. 423. 424. 425. 426. 427. 428. 429. 430. 431. 432. 433. 434. 435. 436. 437. 438. 439. 440. 441. 442. 443. 444. 445. 446. 447. 448. 449. 450. 451. 452. 453. 454. 455. 456. 457. 458. 459. 460. 461. 462. 463. 464. 465. 466. 467. 468. 469. 470. 471. 472. 473. 474. 475. 476. 477. 478. 479. 480. 481. 482. 483. 484. 485. 486. 487. 488. 489. 490. 491. 492. 493. 494. 495. 496. 497. 498. 499. 500. 501. 502. 503. 504. 505. 506. 507. 508. 509. 510. 511. 512. 513. 514. 515. 516. 517. 518. 519. 520. 521. 522. 523. 524. 525. 526. 527. 528. 529. 530. 531. 532. 533. 534. 535. 536. 537. 538. 539. 540. 541. 542. 543. 544. 545. 546. 547. 548. 549. 550. 551. 552. 553. 554. 555. 556. 557. 558. 559. 560. 561. 562. 563. 564. 565. 566. 567. 568. 569. 570. 571. 572. 573. 574. 575. 576. 577. 578. 579. 580. 581. 582. 583. 584. 585. 586. 587. 588. 589. 590. 591. 592. 593. 594. 595. 596. 597. 598. 599. 600. 601. 602. 603. 604. 605. 606. 607. 608. 609. 610. 611. 612. 613. 614. 615. 616. 617. 618. 619. 620. 621. 622. 623. 624. 625. 626. 627. 628. 629. 630. 631. 632. 633. 634. 635. 636. 637. 638. 639. 640. 641. 642. 643. 644. 645. 646. 647. 648. 649. 650. 651. 652. 653. 654. 655. 656. 657. 658. 659. 660. 661. 662. 663. 664. 665. 666. 667. 668. 669. 670. 671. 672. 673. 674. 675. 676. 677. 678. 679. 680. 681. 682. 683. 684. 685. 686. 687. 688. 689. 690. 691. 692. 693. 694. 695. 696. 697. 698. 699. 700. 701. 702. 703. 704. 705. 706. 707. 708. 709. 710. 711. 712. 713. 714. 715. 716. 717. 718. 719. 720. 721. 722. 723. 724. 725. 726. 727. 728. 729. 730. 731. 732. 733. 734. 735. 736. 737. 738. 739. 740. 741. 742. 743. 744. 745. 746. 747. 748. 749. 750. 751. 752. 753. 754. 755. 756. 757. 758. 759. 760. 761. 762. 763. 764. 765. 766. 767. 768. 769. 770. 771. 772. 773. 774. 775. 776. 777. 778. 779. 780. 781. 782. 783. 784. 785. 786. 787. 788. 789. 790. 791. 792. 793. 794. 795. 796. 797. 798. 799. 800. 801. 802. 803. 804. 805. 806. 807. 808. 809. 810. 811. 812. 813. 814. 815. 816. 817. 818. 819. 820. 821. 822. 823. 824. 825. 826. 827. 828. 829. 830. 831. 832. 833. 834. 835. 836. 837. 838. 839. 840. 841. 842. 843. 844. 845. 846. 847. 848. 849. 850. 851. 852. 853. 854. 855. 856. 857. 858. 859. 860. 861. 862. 863. 864. 865. 866. 867. 868. 869. 870. 871. 872. 873. 874. 875. 876. 877. 878. 879. 880. 881. 882. 883. 884. 885. 886. 887. 888. 889. 890. 891. 892. 893. 894. 895. 896. 897. 898. 899. 900. 901. 902. 903. 904. 905. 906. 907. 908. 909. 910. 911. 912. 913. 914. 915. 916. 917. 918. 919. 920. 921. 922. 923. 924. 925. 926. 927. 928. 929. 930. 931. 932. 933. 934. 935. 936. 937. 938. 939. 940. 941. 942. 943. 944. 945. 946. 947. 948. 949. 950. 951. 952. 953. 954. 955. 956. 957. 958. 959. 960. 961. 962. 963. 964. 965. 966. 967. 968. 969. 970. 971. 972. 973. 974. 975. 976. 977. 978. 979. 980. 981. 982. 983. 984. 985. 986. 987. 988. 989. 990. 991. 992. 993. 994. 995. 996. 997. 998. 999. 1000.

By situation, climate, and productions, Cyprus belongs to all the three surrounding continents, and historically it has constantly shared in their vicissitudes. It is most accessible from the E. and the S., and, lying right over against Syria, was early visited by the Phoenicians, who founded Amathus, Paphos, and Citium, the

The port was called Apollonia. The surrounding district was, and is, of remarkable fertility (Str. 4. 2; ἡ γὰρ ἡμετέρα γῆ, καλλικάρπια; Herod. 4. 187). The province of Cyrene was used upon its export of the drug silphium, derived from an umbelliferous plant, not yet certainly identified, have attended the Median court, and that either he himself or his father was son-in-law of Astyages.¹

Astyages (Uštairēgu on the inscriptions of Nabū-nā'id) is called at one time king of Media, at another king of the Ummān-manda,² by which it has been conjectured, are meant the Scythians. On

2. Career. this assumption, Astyages might with some reason be regarded as a Scythian usurper. In the third year of Nabū-nā'id (553 B.C.) there seems to have arisen within the Median kingdom a revolt against the foreign domination. At least, at that date the Ummān-manda who were in occupation of Harrān were recalled (5 Rawl. 64, 1. 28 ff.). Some time had still to elapse, however, before Cyrus contrived, by treachery in the Median camp, to become master of Astyages and at the same time of the throne of Media. This happened probably in the sixth, or at all events before the seventh, year of Nabū-nā'id (before 550 B.C.). (Ann. col. 2, 1. 1 ff.). The two texts cited can hardly otherwise be brought into agreement with each other. In the following years Cyrus extended his dominion over the whole Median empire, and after subjugating Lydia he directed his energies against Babylon. By the fall of Crœsus the alliance between that monarch, Nabū-nā'id, and Amasis of Egypt (Herod. 1.77 ff.) was broken up, and each one had to look out for himself. In 538 the end came. For several years the king of Babylon had withdrawn himself from Babylon, and alienated priests and people alike by neglect of the sacred feasts and of the worship of Marduk, as well as by other arbitrary proceedings. When, in his seventeenth year, he returned to his capital, it was already too late. Cyrus with his victorious bands had been steadily advancing upon the northern frontier of Accad, which the king's son, probably the Bi-Sar-usur who (in 1 R 69, col. 2, 20; 59 and 68, n. 1, col. 2, 24 ff.) is called his first-born, was guarding with the army. The brave prince did what he could; but after his army had been defeated—first near the city of Opis (Upa), and again as often as he rallied it—and after the Accadians or North Babylonians had revolted against the Chaldean king, Sippar opened its gates to the enemy, and Babylon also fell into his hands without further resistance. After Gobryas (Ugbaru or Gubaru), governor of Gutium, had taken possession with the vanguard, Cyrus himself made his entry into the city with the main body of his troops on the third day of the eighth month, 539-38, being received (so at least his inscriptions tell us) by all classes, and especially by the priesthood and nobles, as a liberator, with every manifestation of joy. Some days afterwards Gobryas seems to have pursued Bel-sur-usur and put him to death; but the place where decipherers think this ought to be read (Ann. col. 3, 22 ff.) is very much injured. Nabū-nā'id had already been captured. Cyrus reigned about nine years from this time. In his last year he handed over the sovereignty of Babylon to his son Cambyses (see Strassmaier, Inscriptionen von Cambyses, Leipzig, 1890, Pref.). Cp BABYLONIA, § 69.

Under the name of Kōrēš (see above, § 1), this Cyrus is repeatedly referred to in the OT, usually as 'king of the Persians' (2 Ch. 36.22 ff., Ezra 1.1 ff., 8.37 43 Dan. 10.1), once as 'the Persian' (Dan. 6.29), once as 'king of Babylon' (Ezra 5.13). Great expectations were cherished of him by the Jews. When, after his defeat of Crœsus, he advanced to the conquest of the whole of Asia Minor, there arose one of the exiles in Babylon, who pointed him out as the king raised up by Yahwē to be Israel's redeemer. From his pen comes Is. 40-48 (so much will be admitted by all critics, where Cyrus is represented as expressly called to accomplish the divine judgment upon Babylon, ² Del. Is. HTR, writes: 'Ummān-manda, horde of peoples, a general designation of the northern peoples, hostile to Assyria, subject at any one time to Media—e.g., the Gimirrai, the Mannai, the Scythians.' Cp Sayce, PSBA, Oct. 1896.

to set the captives free, and to restore Jerusalem at the temple (Is. 44.28 45.13). It was for this end we are told, that Yahwē had given Cyrus victory upon victory, and would still lead him on to fresh triumph (44.25 45.1-3). Whether he received recompense for his services or not is left uncertain (cp 43.1 ff. with 45.1-3), but at any rate he was no mere passive tool in Yahwē's hand. He did not, indeed, know Yahwē before he was called (45.1 ff.); but, once called, he fulfilled his mission, invoking Yahwē's name (44.25) and received the honorable titles of 'Yahwē's friend' and 'Yahwē's anointed' (44.28 45.1).

Bitter must have been the disappointment of the Jews; for, whatever else Cyrus may have done for them, he did not realise the high-pitched expectations of the Exile prophet. Nevertheless, a younger prophet, living in Palestine (Isaiah, ii. § 21), announces that, for the deliverance of Israel, Yahwē alone will judge the nations, without allies from among 'the peoples' (Is. 63.1-6, cp 59.16 ff.), thus reversing the old expectation respecting Cyrus. The later Jews, however, found it difficult to believe that the deliverance which Yahwē was to have wrought through the instrumentality of the great Persian king had never been accomplished. The prophecy must somehow or other have come to pass. Cyrus was regarded, it is true, as the man who had finally delivered Israel—the deliverance was still one of the hopes of the future—but the Jews desired to recognise in him, at least, the initiator of the restoration of Israel. Such a reflection inevitably suggested by a strictly critical reading of the work of the Chronicler (see EZRA, § 7).

The restoration of Israel might be considered to have begun with the rebuilding of the temple, and

5. Building of the Temple: three versions. a problem now arose, how to bring the event into connection with Cyrus, who, at this time, difficulty instantly presented itself.

(a) According to the evidence of Haggai, of Zech. 1-8 and of Ezra 5.1-16, the building was first begun under Darius, in whose reign it was completed. This made it necessary to give another account of the origin and course of the building, if any work was to be attributed to Cyrus. More than one way of effecting this was found. (b) According to the author of Ezra 5.13-17 6.3-5, Cyrus committed the task of rebuilding the temple to his governor Sheshbazzar, and the work thus begun by him was carried on without interruption till the reign of Darius. (c) The Chronicler, however, from whose hand we have Ezra 1.31-4.524, gives another version. He too has it that Cyrus ordered the restoration. The work was not taken in hand by the king himself; but permission was given by him to the exiles to return to Jerusalem for the purpose. Immediately on their arrival in the holy city they set up an altar and laid the foundations of the temple; but when Cyrus was still on the throne they were compelled to stop the work by order of the king himself, who had been stirred up by the adversaries of the Jews. Not till the second year of Darius could the building be resumed.

However widely these accounts may differ from one another in detail, they agree in stating that the restoration of the temple was originated by Cyrus, and in representing him as a worshipper of Yahwē, whom he recognised as the one true God. Yahwē is the God of heaven, who has bestowed universal empire upon Cyrus in order that he may restore the true worship in Jerusalem; the temple there is for Cyrus no more ordinary temple, of which there were so many, but the veritable House of God.

At the same time, the discrepancies which we find in the narratives b and c are by no means unimportant. According to the older (b), the building of the temple was entirely the work of Cyrus, which he caused to be carried on uninterruptedly, defraying the entire cost of

of the royal treasury. According to the other (c), it was carried out at the instance of Cyrus; not by himself, however, but only by returned exiles, who, along with their comrades left behind in Babylon, contributed the expenses of the undertaking (140 268 f. 37). So far, indeed, is the restoration of the temple from being, according to this account, the work of Cyrus, that it is actually represented as broken off during his reign at his command. Probably the Jews in the long run found the idea unbearable, that the sanctuary should have been built by a foreigner, even though the foreigner was Cyrus, and therefore his share in the work was reduced by the Chronicler to more modest dimensions.

The importance of Cyrus for Israel lies less in anything he actually did for them than in the great expectations that he excited, expectations which in their turn exercised a great influence on the ideas ultimately formed by the Jews as to the earlier stages of their restoration after the misfortunes of the 'exile.' Cp ISRAEL, § 50; DISPERSION, § 5.

In the OT Cyrus is mentioned also in Dan. 6:28 [29] 10; in the first-cited passage as the successor of Darius, that is, of 'Darius the Mede' (Dan. 5:31 [61]). See DARIUS, I.

The preceding sketch of the result of a critical examination of the passages of the OT relating to Cyrus is not contradicted by anything contained in the inscriptions of Cyrus himself discovered some years ago.

It is certainly worthy of note how closely, even down to details, the representation of the Persian conqueror in these inscriptions agrees with that which is found in Is. 44:28 and 45:1. Evidently the second Isaiah had a correct idea of what a Persian king, as opposed to a Babylonian, would be likely to do. In the cylinder inscription (S R 35; cp Hagen, 'Cyrus-texte' in Beitr. z. Assyriol. 2, 205 ff., and KB 3:6 120 ff.) Cyrus is the deliverer of oppressed peoples, chosen by Marduk himself, and hailed by all Sumer and Accad as a saviour, exactly as with the Israelite prophet he is the called, the anointed, of Yahwé. A difference there is between the joyous hope which the Jewish exiles cherished and the official statements which Babylonian scribes at royal command had to chronicle on their cylinders; but the coincidences referred to are too close to be entirely accidental. Moreover, priests and people alike had reason enough to be dissatisfied with the arbitrariness and misgovernment of their former sovereign, and Cyrus, with fine political tact, knew how to utilise this temper and win hearts by deference towards the national religion, restraint of robbery and violence, and redress of grievances. No wonder that the Jewish exiles also hoped for enlargement at his hands. That he fulfilled this expectation does not appear at least from his inscriptions.

The passage in which some scholars have thought that this may be read demands another interpretation. In Cyl. I 11 the words irtaki taaira kullat matata were taken together and translated, 'he (Marduk) decreed return from all lands'; but it is certain that, with Hagen and Del., we must connect the words irtaki taaira with those which precede, and kullat matata with those which follow, so that the meaning is: 'After that Marduk, in his wrath, had brought all sorts of miseries upon the land [he changed this disposition] and had compassion. Round all lands he looked; he sought [and so found] as the right prince, the fulfiller of his gracious decrees, Cyrus, etc.' In this passage nothing is said of any restoration of exiles to their native land.

More interest attaches to the passage L. 10 ff., where, however, the names on which the question chiefly turns are, unfortunately, obliterated. Here Cyrus says that he returned to their places the goals of a great many towns, brought together the inhabitants, and restored both temples and dwelling houses. The towns referred to were all named, and it was added that they lay on the banks of the Tigris,² and that their territory extended from [Acma in the text] to Assur and Susa (according to the correct interpretation of Delitzsch and Hagen), by which expressions are intended not the cities of the name but the countries of Assyria and West Flann (the city of Assur lay on the right bank of the river). The obliterated names (or names) can have denoted only the western and southern boundaries of the district referred to—probably Sumer and Accad, which are separately mentioned immediately afterwards. Accordingly, there can be no doubt that reference is here made to Cyrus's care for the restoration of neglected worship and for the return of the inhabitants of certain cities to their former habitations; this, however, only in the immediate neighbourhood of Babylon. At the same time, although in these inscriptions, which doubtless belong to the earlier period of Cyrus's rule over Babylon, no mention is made of any general measure extending also to exiles from the West, there remains the possibility that the Persian conqueror may have taken up this work of restoration at a later time.³ At all events the conciliatory policy of which he had already given positive evidence can very well have aroused among the Jews the hope and expectation that they also would one day benefit by it.

The tomb of Cyrus 'the king, the Achæmênid,' at Marzhab (Pasargadae?) is now assigned by Weissbach (DMG 4863 f.) to the younger Cyrus. At any rate the Egyptian head-dress of the king on the monument shows that it can have been erected only after the conquest of Egypt by Cambyzes.

C. P. T.—W. H. K.

¹ Probably the words naahhir ka . . . should be completed so as to read either ka/bittaku or ka/ba-ba-ussu. (So Fick.)

² The words ka/ba-ba-ussu are not clear. Schr. translates: 'whose place from of old lay in ruins'; Hagen, Del., 'founded in the most ancient time.' But does nata ever mean this? In our present inquiry the question is of subordinate importance.

³ (Cp the very interesting inscription in the last section of Briggs's Hist. of Egypt (the Persians in Egypt), which describes the religious patronism of an Egyptian Nephthys. The deceased is represented on his statue (now in the Vatican) as telling the events of the Persian period of his life. Being in high favour as a physician with Cambyzes, he was able to induce that monarch to give orders for the restoration of the temple of Neith at Saïs, and of the religious services. He was physician also to Darius, who, when he was in Elam, sent him to Egypt to restore the arrangements for the scribes of the temples. This last mission appears to synchronise with the erection of the (second) temple at Jerusalem. Cp. Meyer, Entst. 71; Che. Jew. Rel. Life.

Kphrayēns, is not certain. Marnas is the Aramaic marnā, our Lord, and it is not impossible that the god worshipped under this appellation was, by his proper name, the old Dagon.

In the fragments of Berossus, one of the mythical monsters, part fish, part man, who at long intervals came up from the Persian Gulf to repeat to the Chaldeans the original revelation of Ormuz, is named Odacon (Ωδάκων);¹ and as, since Kuthi, a like form was generally attributed to Dagon, it was natural to combine the two names (Selden and many others). Layard published a figure of a merman from Khorsabad, and in a note suggested that it might represent Odacon-Dagon (Newch., 18 p. 246 f.). Some later Assyriologists reproduce Layard's cut with the legend 'the fish-god Dagon.'²

There was a Babylonian god Dagan, whose name appears in conjunction with Anu and often with 'Namb'; he was, therefore, probably a god of heaven (Sayer, Jensen).³ As Sir Henry Rawlinson perceived, there is no connection whatever between the 1. Land Berossus' sea-monster, Odacon. Whether the 2. statue Dagon is originally the same as the Babylonian Dagan cannot, with our present knowledge, be determined. The long and profound influence of Babylonian-Palestine in early times, which is attested by the Assyrian tablets, makes it quite possible that Dagon, like Anath, came thence.⁴ Dagon, however, does not seem to have occupied a place of much importance in the Babylonian religion, and is much less often mentioned than the other great gods. The Assyrians did not recognise the name of the god Dagan in the town Beth-dagon, Bit-daganna (Sennacherib, Prism Inscr. 265), and possibly the similarity of the names may be accidental.

Of the worship of Dagon we know nothing. According to Is. 55 the priests and others entering his temple at Ashdod were careful not to set foot on the sill (Isaiah 17); cp Manc. Dial. 76. What we learn from the best-named author about the worship of Marnas at Gaza, for example, that the god was invoked to send rain; that he gave oracles; that there were certain marmas in the temple which were peculiarly sacred, and guarded from the approach (especially of women); that there were wells in the temple precincts, is not distinctive. Whether human sacrifices were offered there in the writer's day may be doubted; the indictment in 66 68 may refer to an earlier time.

he 'departed to the other side' (αὐτὸς τὸ πέραν), it has seemed natural to look for Dalmanutha on the W. coast of the lake. No such place, however, is known. The name does not appear in Ens. or Ier.; nor is there any trace of an analogy to it in any of the ancient itineraries or medieval travels.

Lightfoot's Ducas Chorag. in Chorag. 2 (p. 173, cp 178, Posth. 70) suggested that it might be an Aramaic form of Saladin, several times mentioned in Talmudic writings (Mishna, Talmud, 166, Keth'ub. 49; Orlah. 12; Talm. Baba Bathra. 82b) as it is in the neighbourhood of Tiberias; and similarly Iwadd (Chet. 11, 6, 4, n. 4) interprets it as the Galilean pronunciation of Saladin. Keim (Chet. 11, 12) takes it for Saladin, i.e., 'Shady Place.' Schwarz (Das Hebr. Land, 126) suggests that Dalmanutha, as another name for Magdala, may be derived from the cave of Talmud (Chet. 11, 12, Jerns. Pema. 2.), for which he proposes the caves on the cliff behind Magdala. Neubauer, however (Chet. 11, 12), says that this cave should be in the neighbourhood of Herod's Caesarea. Recently two other derivations from Aramaic have been proposed. Herz (Chet. 11, 12) (Sept. 1895) suggests that Dalmanutha is a translation of דלמנא, the emphatic form of דלמ, the Talmudic name for harbun (i.e., the bay or harb. in which Magdala stood), a designation 'one might expect of the evangelist whose gospel is founded on the preaching of Peter the fisherman.' Then Nestle (Chet. 11, 12), after pronouncing Herz's דלמנא an impossible form for the emphatic of דלמ, suggests דלמנא (i.e., דלמ + נא, 'into the parts' = harb. of Magdala). Herz replies (Chet. 11, 12) that דלמנא is possible in the locality of Talmud, translation and points out that in Nestle's suggestion the נ remains unaccounted for, as well as the intrusion of a needless Syriac equivalent of the Greek. Those who place Magdala on the S.W. shore of the lake have sought there for traces of the name, and Thomas (Chet. 11, 12) suggests a ruined site half a mile up the Armonik from the Jordan, called Dalmatia or Dalmania (Reh. 18, 324, Dalmeniyeh). For this is some distance from the lake. None of these derivations and identifications seems perfectly satisfactory. G. A. S.

DALMATIA (ΔΑΛΜΑΤΙΑ [Ti. WH]). Lac., Duc Cass., Dalmatia, Inscr. Dalmat. and Dalmatia. The name does not occur in early Greek writers. The Dalmatians are an Illyrian tribe, or perhaps rather a conglomeration of tribes, round the town Delmon or Delmum, from which their name was derived (Strabo, 315). They had fifty settlements (κατοικίας δαλιμαίων; but cp Cic. ad Fam. 5.12), of which some ranked as cities, e.g., Salona or Solona (mod. Salona near Syracusa). These titles had in earlier times been loosely accorded upon the rulers of Scodra (mod. Skutari), and therefore suffered from the Roman expeditions directed against Queen Teuta (229 B.C.) and Demetrius of Pharos (219 B.C.). On the accession of Octavius they revolted, and thus escaped the fate of southern Illyricum, which, on the subjugation of Macedonia, became permanently dependent upon Rome (see ILLYRICUM). Piracy and plunder were the only native trades (Str., 317). In 155 B.C. Publius Scipio Nasica took the capital, and the Dalmatians professed subjection. A series of almost endless wars had to be waged before this central part of Illyricum was finally reduced by Octavius (13 B.C.). In the partition of provinces in 27 B.C. so powerful was Illyricum τὸ δαλιμαίων, Duc Cass. 53.12) that it was made senatorial; but sixteen years later the Emperor was compelled to take charge of its two main sections, Dalmatia and Pannonia (ed. 54.34). A final struggle for freedom (69 A.D.); cp Suet. Tib. 16, who compares the crisis with that of the Punic Wars) was crushed by Tiberius. The coastland from Tassus to the Arsia was thereafter organised as an independent province (for its importance, see Lac. Ann. 43). The title of the province was 'Superior Provincia Illyricum' (ICIL 3, 1741), or 'maior pars Illyrici' (Aell. ii, 125c). After Augustus' Dalmatia is apparently the more usual title (cp Jos. R/ n. 164). Its northern boundary towards Pannonia is not clearly marked; in the S. it extended to the province of Macedonia. The mention of Dalmatia in the NT is confined to a single instance ('Titus is gone to Dalmatia,' perhaps from Nicopolis; 2 Tim. 4.10).

The connection may be illustrated from Tac. Ann. 2.11: honorum (consulatus) Germanicus init apud urbem Achaiae inevitable an emporium, Damascus was only less favourable a seat of empire. She has always been the natural capital of Lebanon and Eastern Palestine. As long as an Eastern power ruled, she remained the capital also of Syria; but during the Greek and Roman dominion (330 B.C. - 634 A.D.) she yielded her supremacy to Antioch.

The Arabs first made for Damascus, and then used her as the base of their Syrian conquests. Under the Umayyad Khalids she was the capital of the Moslem empire from Spain to India.

With so many communications Damascus has always been the home of a motley crowd: Syrians, Arabs, Greeks, and Kurds, with Turks and Jews.

5. Arts. Yet it has preserved, apparently through all ages, a very distinctive character for skill in handicrafts. Damascus, though it has never been a great school of letters, has always been a school of arts; even more a manufactory than a market or a garden. The English terms, Damask (originally any figured or patterned textile) and Damascene blade; the German Damast and Damascieren and Damascener; the French Damassquiere and Damassquiere (embossing on steel) are proofs of the inventiveness and technical skill of the people, which seem to reach back to a very remote time. In the middle ages Damascus was famous for its patterned and brocaded cloths, especially silks and wools (an inimitable perfection of work according to Idrisi); its glass, sword-blades, and embossed and enamelled metal-work. In the beginning of the Christian era, to 'carry wool to Damascus' was, according to the Talmud, a proverb, equivalent to our 'carrying coals to Newcastle.' Ezekiel (27:15) speaks of the city's exportation of wine and wool for the manufactures of Phoenicia (cp. Toy, SBOT, but see Cornill, ad loc.); 2 K. 8:9 mentions the 'goods of Damascus.' Abaz made a copy of its richly decorated altar (2 K. 16:10 ff.).

The extreme antiquity of Damascus (Jos. Ant. 1. 6:47-2) was a not unnatural inference from its perennial vigour throughout historical times.

6. Early History. Down to the eleventh century B.C., however, the references to it are few and uncertain.

A local tradition (found also in Nicolaus Dam. Fr. 30, ab. Jos. Ant. 1. 7:2) connects Damascus with Abraham; and there is some mention of it in the JE narrative of the patriarch's life (Gen. 14:15-21; see HORRIL, ELIEZER, 1). In the sixteenth century 'Damas' occurs as the thirteenth in the list of the Syrian conquests of Thothmes III. (KT 2:544); Timas-gi, Dimaš-ka-are read in the Amarna tablets (15th cent.) (13963, 11223). These tablets describe the invasion of N. Syria by the Hittites, before whom the Egyptian outposts had to give way, and for the next three centuries Damascus lay upon the vacillating frontier between the two powers. In the fourteenth century, Ramesses II. extended his conquests to Beirut and probably included Damascus. At the close of the thirteenth century, in lists of the conquests of Ramesses III., Sa-ra-ma-ski for 'Damas' (WMM At. u. Eur. 227) is mentioned. The addition of r to the name is taken (ib. 234) as proof that the regions of Damascus had meanwhile come under Aramean influence (but see ARAM), and so when at last they appear in the OT historical books, in the campaigns of David toward the end of the eleventh century, we find them possessed by a number of Aramean states, for the rise of which room had been made by the overthrow of the Hittites nearly a hundred years previously by Tiglath-pileser I. (circa 1106). The chief of these Aramean states was Sôlah (see DAVID, § 8 b) under King Hadadzer, to whose help against David came Aram of Dammešek (2 S. 8:5; cp. 1 Ch. 18:3). David,

It is not at all probable that Damascus had acquired a reputation for the manufacture of damask as early as the time of Amos, though RV of Am. 3:12 assumes this; 'Damask' and 'Damascus' may have no common time. In Ar. the forms are different—dinaks for the stuff, and Dimaš for the city. Probably (as Frankel, Vordr. 40, referred to by Driver, ad loc.) is of opinion) dinaks comes by metathesis from mīdaks. On Am. 3:12, see ARAM, § 5 n.; ib. § 5.

DAMASCUS

after his victory, is said to have pointed garrisons in the territory of Damascus, but that these had no permanence is plain from what we hear of Resai ben Elhadad the freebooter, who came to Damascus, and dwelt there, and reigned in Damascus, and was a foe to Israel all the days of Solomon' (1 K. 11:35).

We have now reached the point at which Damascus becomes chief of the Aramean confederacy, and enters upon her first great period of political supremacy (circa 1000-733 B.C.). Her history is articulate, and we have a pretty full, though not complete, list of her kings. Who Resai ben Elhadad (1 K. 11:35) was is disputed; probably (see, however, HIZION) he was the same as Hezion, father of Tabrimmon, father of the Ben-hadad (the adit, known as Ben-hadad I. who about 925 B.C. helped ASA 12:1) against Baasha (1 K. 15:16 ff.). It was perhaps the same Ben-hadad who, some twenty years later, defeated Omri and won the right of 'establishing quarters' (see TRAD. AND COMM. KT) in Samaria (1 K. 20:34; Nic. Dam. Fr. 31). The son of Ben-hadad I. (or Ben-hadad himself? See BEN-HADAD, § 2), whom also the OT calls Ben-hadad, but a contemporary inscription of Shalmaneser II. of Assyria (854 B.C.) calls Hadadzer (see, however, BEN-HADAD, § 2), besieged AMM (7:23) in Samaria, but was repulsed there and again at Aphek, on which Abab received the right to 'establish quarters for himself' in Damascus. In 854 the combined forces of N. Israel, Damascus, and other states were defeated at Karkar (see AMM) by Shalmaneser II., who again, in 850 and in 847, overthrew Ben-hadad. The Assyrian empire was thus steadily advancing on Damascus; but the latter was still the terror of Israel (2 K. 5:7, the story of Naaman), made regular raids over Jordan, and even besieged Samaria (2 K. 6:7; see JEROME, vii, 1) till Ben-hadad was drawn off by rumours of northern war. Disgraced by defeats

8. Hazael. so numerous, he was slain by HAZAEL (circa), at least if the text of 2 K. 8:13 is correct. Hazael then became king, and waged with Jehoram (ib. 28 ff.), also with Shalmaneser II., by whom he was defeated in 843 and in 840, the second time with the loss of four cities and much spoil out of Damascus. Still, he succeeded in depriving Jehu of all Israel's territory E. of Jordan, and in extending the dominion of Damascus southwards to the Arnon (2 K. 10:32; cp. Am. 1:3). He also took Gath, and was bought off from an invasion of Judah only by large tribute from Jehoshaphat (12:7 [1] ff.). Hazael and his son Ben-hadad III. (or II?) were able to oppress Israel through the reigns of Jehu's successors Jehuaz and Joash (2 K. 13:25), for under Sami-rimman the Assyrian armies did not cross the Euphrates (ASSYRIA, § 32), and Damascus was free for the time from the Northern terror. By 805 Assyria was again pressing towards Palestine, and in 803 King Mari

9. Mari. (Ben-hadad II.) of Damascus (see BEN-HADAD, § 3) was successfully besieged by Rimmanman III. This disaster to Damascus permitted JEROME II. (7:1) to recover the territory that Hazael had taken from Israel, and for a time Israel held part of the territory of Damascus (2 K. 11:25; not necessarily the city). In 773 Damascus again suffered from the Assyrians, who invaded the country also in 772, 767, 755, and 754 (ASSYRIA, § 32).

10. Rezin. It was the beginning of the end. In 743-740 Tiglath-pileser III. made his first Syrian campaign, and his annals (KT 2:1) contain the name Ra-sin-in (mat) Gar-imiri-su (i.e., of Damascus) as paying tribute. This Ra-sin-in is the Rezin of the Syro-Israelitish war (see AMAZ, TAB. 11), whose invasion of Judah brought about an Assyrian intervention (2 K. 16:7 ff.). Perhaps the danger which now threatened Damascus was the occasion of the allusions to the city in Is. 17:1. In 743 Tiglath-pileser—whether before or after his subjection of N. Israel and the Philistine cities is not quite clear—defeated Rezin, shut him up in Damascus, cut down the plantations (see above, § 2) round the city (the numbers the trees at 13,520), took the city, executed Rezin, and carried the people into captivity (Sch. OT 12v. 7; cp 2 K. 16v). It was after this, in 732, that Abaz visited Damascus, and obtained the pattern of the altar which he saw there (ib. 10).

Up to this time Damascus had possessed great political influence; her confidence in herself, her power

11. Decline. of recuperation, and her military skill are amply proved by her restless energy in Syrian politics, even while she was bleeding from the reiterated attacks of Assyria. The blow which Tiglath-pileser inflicted, however, absolutely destroyed her political power. She seems to have been reduced to the same position as Samaria.

Shalmaneser IV., Sargon, and Sennacherib mention no king of Damascus in all their Syrian lists; and the only notice of the town for a century is in the Khorsabad inscription of Sargon, where (about the year 719) Damascus is said to have joined Arpad, Simirra (S. Zimwera), and Samaria in a league formed by Hamath against Assyria. The allied forces were crushed by Assyria at Karkar (ib. 257). Next century Damascus is omitted from the list of twenty-two kingdoms given by Esarhaddon.

She is not mentioned by the prophets, except in a doubtful passage of the Book of Jeremiah (19:22-27) where she is given over to fear and flight, and by Ezekiel who names her, only in passing, as a customer of Tyre (27:15) and a point of measurement for the Holy Land (40:48 ff.). If then important, she would be certainly occupied by Pharaoh Necho in 610 and Nebuchadnezzar in 604 ff.

Under the Persians Damascus was a seat of authority, and very prosperous (Strabo vi. 23).

Cambyses died there (Jos. Ant. vi. 22), and there Darius deposited his family and treasures before the battle of Issus, after which they were surrendered to Alexander's general Parmenio (Quint. Curt. 3:13). After an unsuccessful revolt the Greek supremacy was established (ib. 41), and there are extant coins of Alexander issued from the city.

At the death of Alexander, Syria with Phoenicia fell to Laomedon, the capital being Damascus (ib. 101).

12. Supplanted by Antioch. The western people, however, to whom Syria was now subject, required a centre near the Levant, and Damascus became second in Syria to Antioch, the upstart capital of the Seleucids.

The diminished importance of Damascus is well illustrated by the small part it plays, as contrasted with Antioch, in those books of the Antiquities of Josephus (xii. 1) which deal with the third and second centuries B.C. Its more natural connection with N. Syria than with S. kept Damascus in the hands of the Seleucids, even when Palestine and Phoenicia were held by the Ptolemies; but several times it fell to the latter; e.g., in 320 under Ptolemy I. (regained by Antigonus in 314); in 280 when Ptolemy II. probably occupied it (regained by Antiochus I. 263-262); in 215 when, however, it was only besieged by Ptolemy III. and relieved by Seleucus II. in 242 (cp Schürer, Hist. 3:45).

In the Books of the Maccabees Damascus is mentioned only as being twice visited by Jonathan (viv. 141 B.C.; 1 Macc. 11:62 12:32; Jos. Ant. xii. 531).

The kingdom of the Seleucids was divided in 111 B.C., and Damascus must have fallen with the southern part to Antiochus IX. or Kyzikenus (cp Euseb. Chron. ed. Schoene, in Schür. op. cit. 67, and Jos. Ant. xiii. 134). It was retained by Antiochus' son, and then fell to Demetrius Eucerus, and after his overthrow (viv. 85 B.C.) to Antiochus XII. or Dionysius, from whom it was transferred (though only for a short time) by Milesius, the governor of the citadel, and the populace, to his brother Philip (Jos. ib. 131).

Antiochus XII. was defeated by ARETAS (7:7), the Nabatean, and with Coele-syria Damascus continued

13. Roman times. in Arabian hands (though pressed hard by Alex. Jannæus ib. 153), and Ptolemy Memnus, against whom Queen Alexandra of Judaea [78-69 B.C.] sent her son Aristobolus (ib. 163; BJ i. 53) till the occupation in 65 by the Roman legions under Lollius and Metellus (Ant. xiv. 23; BJ i. 62), who were followed in 64 by Pompey.

After this the exact political position of Damascus is difficult to define.

DAN

Though Josephus does not know Damascus as a member of the Decapolis (he calls Scythopolis the greatest town of Galilee), the name is in Ptolemy's list (Geog. Under Coele-syria). Under Coele-syria (11:12 B.C.) there was a Roman commandant, Fabius, Damascus (Jos. Ant. xiv. 117 12:1; BJ i. 121 13:1), and Nabateans appear to have been driven to the E. and to S. of Hamath. Somewhere about 18 B.C. Mark Antony Cleopatra 'Coele-syria' and parts of the Judean and Arab territories (Jos. Ant. xv. 344 13:1; BJ i. 85); she visited Damascus, and we have coins of 37, 36, and 35 that were struck in her honour, though other coins of about the same date do not bear any mark of her (De Saulcy, Numism. de la Terre Sainte 30 ff.).

In 31 B.C. occurred the battle of Actium, and Damascus coins bear till 33 A.D. the names of Augustus and Tiberius, under the latter of whom the Damascus had a dispute with the Sidonians about their boundaries (Jos. Ant. xviii. 61), a fact which shows how extensive their territory must have been (Schürer, 68). The name, however, no coins of Caligula nor of Claudius, nor any of Nero till his ninth year in 63. It was during this time that the apostle Paul tells us (see Ant. 13:1) that not the Romans but 'an ethnarch under Aretas' king held the city of the Damascenes' (a form of expression which betrays the fact that it was usual to think of Damascus as an independent city); see EUSEBIUS.

We do not know to what degree power in Damascus passed from the Romans to the Nabatean king. Nor, indeed, whether Rome actually held it then (cp Schürer, III 2 356 ff. 360). M'Guffert, 1890, 125, 126 n. 2). At any rate, the city was under Rome in Nero's reign (84-68 A.D.); but the Nabateans continued to hold the neighbourhood to the east till 106, when Trajan brought their whole kingdom into the Empire. Under Hadrian and his successors Damascus bore the title metropolis (De Saulcy, 37 ff.), under Alexander Severus colonia (ib. 43).

Under both Romans and Byzantines the city continued to flourish; yet so long as these Westerners ruled Syria she was only second to Antioch; and it was not

For a century, 650-750, Damascus had the Khilafate under the Omayyads; she was never taken by the Crusaders, whose pivot was Antioch; she was the capital of Saladin, and being found to Mecca by the Hajj, who starts from her gates, she has kept her place in the regard of Islam, while her fertility and her unique position have enabled her to survive the depopulations to which she has been subjected by conquerors like Timur, and the awful pestilences with which she has again and again been infected by her annual connection with Mecca.

1. Name. [BNAI ch. 12:35], eponymous head of the tribe of the same name. The name, like many other tribal names, is obscure. It appears, however, to bear the same relation to the personal name Daniel and Abdim as the clan name Ram does to Jehoram and Abdim, or on the other hand Jacob and Joseph to two ancient town names ending in -el (see JACOB, Joseph, § 1). It is therefore no doubt a divine title, 'judge' (i.e., 'deliverer'?). Cp. the Assyrian repeatedly recurring royal name Asur-dan, 'Asur is judge' (cp Nabudan) and the name of Shalmaneser II., a general Dayan-Asur, as also the epithet dānu (deliverer) applied to the sun-god (cp SAMSON, § 1) and the moon-god.

Dan is apparently etymologically related to the name of another Israelitish tribe of whose history still less is known (see DINAN); but it would be less safe to assume any etymological connection with Midian. The meaning of the name was not quite forgotten appears, e.g., from the popular derivation in Gen. 30:6 (E) and the paronomasia in Gen. 49:16 (J), although the latter passage applies the epithet to the tribe itself, not to its god.

DAN

The verb dan is used quite freely, not only in the earlier literature (1.1.1, 1.1.4, 1.3.1) but also (especially) in the 'style manuals' (cf. 1.1.3, 1.3.1); so also the derivatives; but, as in the case of other old Semitic names, the root does not seem to have been used in the formation of proper names in later times (see A. V. A. S. 1.3.26, etc.). Its place among apparently taken by the synonymous ḥaphat (see 1.2.10) is not clear, which on the whole prevailed in Hebrew and Phoenician, while less used in Assyrian and not certainly used at all in the southern Semitic dialects where dan continued to prevail.

Dan evidently belonged to the N-Joseph group of Israelitish claus. Not, however, in the same sense than Joseph, as the patriarch stories represent (see BILHAM). If so, the onward pressure of Joseph, though probably not hostile, may have co-operated with the other influences that prevented it from settling permanently in central Palestine, though the apparent southward movement of the Danites from Zorah-Eshlath to Kaphath-jearim (Judg. 1812) could not well be quoted in support of such a possibility (see MAHANEH DANA). Whilst Dan, if it was a prehistoric clan of the same or a kindred stock (it is called indeed clanger of Leah), but Dan took as its priest a Levite of Judah, suffered the fate of absorption (see DANAH, Dan, though it may have allied itself with Joseph for a time, was eventually compelled by its own energy and the force of circumstances to emigrate, just as perhaps the other Leah tribes emigrated in the opposite direction). If Dan was not older than Joseph, it must be regarded as an unsuccessful precursor of ISRAELIN (q.v., § 1 f.; so Stedeh).

The earliest mention of the tribe is in the 'Song of Deborah.' The poet upbraids Dan for seeking field' (see NATURAL). This reference to ships is obscure. It has been interpreted of the southern seat of the tribe,¹ but its proximity and resemblance to the phrase about Asher seems to suggest that the tribe is thought of as in its northern seat (so Moore and Bin, ad loc.)

The expression used of Dan is quite unique. One shrinks from drawing any definite conclusion from the passage. If the text is sound, it may mean that Dan was, like Asher, though not so much, a less extant (1879), under the sway of Thracian influence. It is much more likely, however, to have been involved with the Arameans than with the Phoenicians; for although Tell el-Kadi is fully 40 m. distant from Damascus, energetic in extending its influence in the Palestine hinterland (see DANAMASCUS, § 4). Although we do not reason to suppose that the Aramean element represented by such Song of Deborah. However that may be, in time at least the Arameans made their influence felt very decidedly. We relations with Israel; but it may well be doubted whether there ever was a stable or even a definite line between their respective domains. The population of the border region seems to have been largely Aramean. Benhadad I. had no difficulty in seizing Dan and other places in its neighbourhood, and it does not appear whether Israel was ever able politically to assert serious, or at least a lasting, claim to them. The fact that the operations of Tiglath-pileser III. (c. 735 years later), in suppression of the plot of Rezin and his accomplice Pekah, were confined to this same district, would be accounted for if it were more unequivocally connected with Damascus than the rest of Israel was (so Winkler).

¹ Noldeke suggests (in a private communication) that it is not inconceivable that members of the tribe may have taken to fishing.

2. ² מִן־הַבְּרִיָּה might easily arise by transposition from מִן־הַבְּרִיָּה (the suggestion was made also by Bu. Ki Sa. 16, n. 2, followed by Marq. Fund. 7; cf. Ki. Gesch. i. 24, n. 1. Bu. has since abandoned it; KHC, and loc.). מִן־הַבְּרִיָּה , however, occurs oftener in the phrase מִן־הַבְּרִיָּה and N. מִן־הַבְּרִיָּה argues that neither of the districts in which Dan was settled contained such pastures. ³ מִן־הַבְּרִיָּה need not be quite so definite in meaning; but if we accept מִן־הַבְּרִיָּה , this would presuppose the Son's having been committed to, or living some time before the blessing of Jacob was brought into its present form (cf. Gen. 49 13).

DAN

When I wrote Dan was still indeed honoured (2 S 20:1 &), but possibly somewhat as a survival of a time gone by, it was not had to be a living force in Israel. Balfanz was but a concubine (Gen. 35:22). It must not, however, be inferred, from the fact that the Blessing of Jacob, says Dan judges as people like an Israelite tribe (Gen. 49:17), that, when the Blessing took shape, Dan was felt to be hardly more truly a part of genuine Israel at all. It is clear, from the early authority referred to above (2 S. 20:1 &), that the city of Dan was proverbial as a well known home of genuine old Israelite ideas and practices, which is the more credible that we are told that its priest trained their origin to Moses himself (Judg. 18:30). We need not wonder, then, if the importance of this sanctuary was formally acknowledged in some way or otherwise (Gen. 49:18, & 1 K. 15: Jerusalem 1 [2]). The N settlement of Dan, however, perhaps did not amount to much more than the town of that name. Nor need the repeated mention of the town in the standing phrase "from Dan to Beersheba," which not unaturally suggests that it had some importance, have really had any political significance. Both places may have owed their celebrity to their ancient sanctuaries.

This may perhaps help us to understand the preservation of such an unexplained echo in the popular legend as we find in the latter part of Judges, unless connected with the stories of the Samson cycle are quite as much connected with the geographical distribution of Zaidi, etc. (p. the mention of a geographical distribution in that neighbourhood at least as early as Kautsky's Die Vögel Afrikas, 1891, p. 117 ff. in the same way, S. SAYMONS) as with any particular Israelitish tribe; they may indeed, Hebrew שִׁמְשֹׁן in Judges 16,3 is correct, and may be thought to have some relation to the stories of SHAMSHAN and SHAMGAR (27,7).

In Amos's time the northern Dan still ranked with Bethel (2 So IV, ad loc.) and Beersheba as a representative sanctuary (Am. 8.14; on the trading cp AMOS, § 201; but, whatever it was then, the treacherous time which ended with the fall of the N. kingdom (2 K. 15.29) and the changed conditions which resulted must have profoundly modified the position even of an ancient sanctuary town. This would perhaps account for the absence of all mention of it from P's geographical scheme. Still, even in the days of Jeremiah, although the phrase 'Dan to Beersheba' had given place to 'Geba to Beersheba' (2 K. 23.5), an invasion was felt to be begun when the enemy passed Dan (Jer. 41.8.16).

4. Traditions.

These are of two kinds. First there are the stories which, after circulating orally for many generations, were eventually committed to writing, and afterwards given so large a place in the latter portion of our present Book of Judges (q.v., § 16). These are among the best-known of the traditions of Israel. Then there are the most valuable fragmentary notices in Josh. 13-14,³ Judg. 1-34 f. – were scraps rescued from what the pre-exilic histories had to tell of the fortunes of this tribe from the 'Blessings' (see below, § 8). All these traditions, however, – both those that may fairly be treated as historical in their nature, and those that are mainly legendary – deal with two closely related points, the struggles which the tribe had with its two Israelite neighbours, and its migration northwards.

him, it would seem, made the attempt to push its way down from the highlands of Ephraim (see above, § 2) into the territory still completely dominated by the

2. This phrase rarely occurs (only seven times (all between July 20 and 1 K. 125 [53]), and in certain of these passages it may be suspected of being late). The Chronicler (perhaps naturally) prefers the reverse order (Beersheba to Dun 1 Ch. 212 [2 Ch. 242], Dun to Beersheba 2 Ch. 30 [5]). if we read α and β and a K. 6 q) and then was driven back (Judg. 1:14) by the Philistines (cp Bu. Rt. Sa. 18, n. 1) or—since it is difficult to see how 'Philistines' could be changed, editorially or by a gloss, to Amorites—by the Amorites (Judg. 1:34/1), or whether it never really established itself at all satisfactorily to the SW. of Ephraim, being forced back before it had really settled, we can hardly say. On some grounds it would perhaps seem probable rather that it separated quite late from Ephraim or that it settled for some considerable time. Otherwise we should perhaps hardly have such clear traditions of the incidents of the subsequent migration (contrast the legendary character of the Samson stories); although it is not at all clear what the history of these traditions is (see above, § 4). In any case, it seems pretty clear that the main strength of the clan (α) migrated northwards, but did not some remain? Probably.

Not so much because the MT represents the two fighting men as being some of the clan (Judg. 18:11; α 'clans, byways) of Dan (for the partitive preposition α , which here has the same letter not only after it but also before it, might very well be due to dittography), nor perhaps because the existence of a remnant is needed to explain the copious traditions of the early fortunes of the tribe already referred to (see also below), but because it is difficult otherwise to account for the priestly writer assigning it solely to the southern territory.

Those who remained, however, seem hardly to have been able to make good a separate tribal existence; for it was, according to J, not Dan, but the house of Joseph, that finally gained the upper hand over the Canaanites (Judg. 1:35)—whatever that may refer to (see Bu. Rt. Sa. 18, n. 2).

According to Josh. 19:47 (emended text), the border of the children of Dan was too narrow for them, and so they went up and fought against Leshem (Leshan?) and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein, and called it Dan. It is possibly the same writer who explains in Judg. 1:34 that the overcrowding of Dan was because 'the Amorite' forced them into the hill country. This Dan (see next article) became, as we have seen, if it was not already, a famous sanctuary, and it is not surprising that the story of its incorporation into Israel was a favourite with those who put into literary form the traditions of Israel's early days.

Many as are the obscurities of the narrative as we now have it in Judg. 17 ff., one thing is clear: several hands have worked at it (see J. 1961, § 13). A deputation of Danites, after consulting a priest in Mount Ephraim, and a roving district, easy of attack, in the far north, and return to Zorah to conduct their tribesmen thither. On the route they manage in one way or another to get the priest they had consulted to accompany them with the image he tended, which, having settled in their new home, they constitute their national palladium.

The main points in this story must be facts. How long the sanctuary maintained itself we do not know exactly (see the two independent representations in Judg. 18:30 ff., and cp SHILOH, JONATHAN, 1). Of a very different character are the stories that have gathered round the name of Samson; but they are more naturally treated elsewhere, the more so that we cannot be quite sure how far they are really to be regarded as Israelite in any ordinary sense, not to say Danite. See SAMSON.

are simply later echoes perpetuating the memory of the famous raid on Leshem, or whether they point to a repetition of such raids by this lion-city itself (Stade, GVV 163), we do not know; the latter is not perhaps unlikely.¹

¹ The metaphor of the serpent on the way, biting the horse's heels and throwing the rider backwards, has been supposed to refer to embarrassment of the Arameans in their wars with Israel.

At a later date, indeed, these references came to be interpreted of the southern Dan (Carg. Ch. 1, and of Samson in particular (Carg. Jon. and Jous.). The latter, however, that P has nothing whatever to tell us of the territory of the N. Danites, perhaps shows how this might come about. On the other hand, the etiological sense in which the words are explained is remarkable in view of the ill odour that attached to the name of Dan in later times (see below, § 9).

What the outlines of the district assigned by P to Dan were, P nowhere states; perhaps he was hazy, unable to formulate any top. the case of Simeon, Josh. 19:60. That he meant them to be inferred from the account of the adjacent tribes (Benjamin, Judah, Ephraim) is possible; but he is not usually afraid of repetition. Of the sixteen (in MT seventeen) places which P assigns to Dan, eight may be regarded as identified beyond reasonable doubt (see ZORAH, SHILOH, BETH-SHEMER, AJALON, TIMNATH, EKKO, JETHO, BETH-BURAK), while MI-JARKON (7:7), and see RABKON, MAKAZ) must probably be sought in the neighbourhood of Ras el-Lith. In Josh. 15 the same writer assigns not only Timnah (7:37) and Ekro (7:45), which are historically best known as Philistine cities, but also Zorah and Eshtai, where if anywhere the Danites were settled, to JUDAH.²

Still less to be trusted is the account of Josephus (Ant. v. 122, end), which, likewise ignoring altogether the N. Dan, actually makes S. Dan extend as far N. as Dor and as far S. as Ashdod. Though P 10 presents Dan as, next to Judah, the largest tribe at the end of the nomadic period (Nu. 26:43), both P and the Chronicler³ tend otherwise to give the tribe the scantiest possible consideration. In Joshua is the last to have its lot assigned it (19:40 ff.). The Dan fragment is the last of those collected in Judg. (2:34 ff.). The tribe stands last in the list in 1 Ch. 27:6-22. In Rev. (chap. 7) it is omitted altogether (see below, § 9), and the same fate seems to have befallen it in the genealogical lists in 1 Ch. 2 ff.⁴ In the form of the list now appearing in Gen. 46:23 = Nu. 26:42⁵ (both P), indeed, Dan is credited with an family; but one cannot be quite sure that the statement may not be a very late addition founded on the notion (propounded in modern times by Bertheau, ad loc.) that Alter (= 'another') in 'HUSHTIM, the sons of Alter' (1 Ch. 7:12b), was a circumlocution for Dan rather than a corruption of Ahijah or some other name (see BEN-JAMIN, § 9, ii. a). At all events, the omission of a Dan list from his lists by the Chronicler would be n

² On the other hand, the Chronicler probably did not really mean to make Gath-rimmon Ephraimite (1 Ch. 6:69 154b); see text note but one.

⁴ In the Chronicler's list of tribes in which Levitical cities were appointed (1 Ch. 6:54 151 ff.) Dan appears to be omitted, but 7:1 146 is obviously corrupt. A comparison with its source in Josh. 21:20-20 [P] shows that the name of Dan has dropped out, whilst the fact that Ephraim also, though preserved by α in 1 Ch. 6:61 146, is dropped in MT shows that the omission is not intentional. It has accordingly been restored by Klo. in HS and Ki. in SRD. In the enumeration of the towns by name farther down (22: 67 [52]-87 [66]) Dan is again omitted (this time without the company of Ephraim); but the probable explanation of this omission of Dan is that either the Chronicler or some copyist has accidentally omitted Josh. 21:21; for the consequence is that 7:24 is copied as if it belonged to 7:22, Aijalon and Gath-rimmon being assigned to Ephraim, and the Kohathite cities becoming eight, instead of ten, as stated above in 1 Ch. 6:1 141.

stranger than his omission of Zebulun, which has three families assigned to it by P in Gen. 49:14 = Nu. 26:26.

It is a fact, however, that in later times Dan was in dispute. In the Targums, indeed, as we have seen, the tribe is held to be extinct; but in Talmudic times this is changed. Thus Midr. Rab. on Num. declares that when Jeroboam's son from tribe Dan joined him so readily as Dan, it is the Talmud (Shabbath 100), accordingly, Dan represents idolatry.

Further, out of the very same passages so favourably interpreted in the Targums, there was evolved, in connection with Jer. 8:16, the remarkable notion (appearing in Jer. 2:26) that Beliar is in some peculiar way connected with the tribe, which, it is declared, will transgress against Levi and Judah; 'for in the Book of Enoch it is said that their ruler is Satan; and he will fight against Beliar.' With this is connected the tradition that the Antichrist is to come of the tribe of Dan. Already in Jer. (v. 30:2) we find the fancy. It may be in fact a fancy, that this is the explanation of the omission of Dan from the list of those that are sealed (Rev. 7:5-8).

DAN (דָּן, דָּנָן). 1. A city in the valley which belongs to Benjamin (Judg. 18:28); conquered by the Danites. It was the most northern city of Israel: note the phrase 'from Dan as far as Beersheba' (see above, 994, n. 21). Its original name was LAISH [לַיִשׁ], in Judg. 18:29, the change of name is accounted for. Historical references to it occur, not only in Judg. 18, but also in 2 S. 21a (where paan is appended to Dan by a singular error of the text; see DAN-PAAN); also in 1 K. 12:29 (golden calf), and 1 K. 15:26, and 2 Ch. 16:4 (Benhadad's invasion).

The reference to the name Dan in Gen. 14:14 need not, in the present writer's opinion, be counted; it is true, the city afterwards called Dan is meant, but the anachronism 'Dan' is simply a scribe's error for 'Laish'; the true text probably is, '... and pressed after them, he and his servants, as far as Laish, and smote them.'¹

One of the supposed arguments for the late date of Gen. 14 must therefore be abandoned; but this by no means involves regarding that strange narrative as historical. The anachronism in Dt. 31:6 remains.

The site of Dan has recently been fixed by G. A. Smith (IBG, 473, 480 f.) at Bānās, on the ground that the situation of Bānās is so much stronger than that of Tell el-Kādi (cp CYSARCA, § 7). The fact is undeniable, yet not decisive. From Judg. 18 we do not gather that Laish was a place of exceptional natural strength; its inhabitants were a peaceful folk, who trusted not in their fortress but in their remoteness from troublesome people like the Danites.

Theodore does not doubt favours our eminent geographer's view. 'The present Bānās,' he says, 'was called Dan,'² and even Jerome (on Ezek. 48:19 and on Am. 8:14) speaks of Dan as being where Bānās now is. The Jerns. Targ. too (on Gen. 14:14), calls Caesarea Philippi 'Dan of Caesarea'. These vague statements, however, do not carry much weight. On the other hand, Josephus (Jnt. i. 10:1 v. 31 viii. 54; BJ iv. 1) expressly says that Dan stood at the 'lesser fountain of the Jordan, in the plain of Sidon, a day's journey from that city, and that the plain around it was extremely fertile. Euseb. and Jer. (OG vi. 114-26 249-52) speak still more definitely. 'A village four miles distant from Paneas, on the road to Tyre; it was the boundary of Judea (opior tpe 'Ioudaia'), and at it the Jordan takes its rise.' Jerome adds: 'De quo et Jordanis flumen circumspicit a loco sortitus est nomen. For quippe peior (id est fluxum sine rivum) Hebraei vocant' (cp JORDAN). A glance at any handbook of geography will show what spot is here meant.

Four miles west of Bānās, in a well-watered district, is one of the two great fountains of the Jordan. It rises at the W. base of an extensive cup-shaped mound, called Tell el-Kādi. Now Kadi in Arabic and Dan in Hebrew both mean 'judge,' and the fountain bears a name (Laishdan) which also may perhaps be an echo of the name of the old city. The very fact that Tell el-Kādi is now said to be unhealthy suggests one reason more for identifying it with Dan. For Josephus (J 19, 10) expressly says that the marshes of Lake Semichonitis (Heli) extend northwards as far as Haphne (Dan), where are the sources of the Little Jordan (Ischelus). Probably, however, in antiquity, when irrigation was better cared for, the place now called Tell el-Kādi was perfectly healthy. On the whole, the grounds of the proposed identification seem to the present writer to be strong. Robinson, Guérin, Porter, Lush, and Moore have given their support to the one theory.

¹ There is a corrupt duplication. Read (עֲרִיבִים) עֲרִיבִים, עֲרִיבִים עֲרִיבִים. עֲרִיבִים for עֲרִיבִים is due to Ball; but it is also the original of עֲרִיבִים. Niebuhr has already suspected a place-name in עֲרִיבִים. In fact, the Pask after עֲרִיבִים warns us that the text is doubtful. Ewald (GI 173) supposed that עֲרִיבִים was substituted late for עֲרִיבִים—an arbitrary and inadequate theory.

Tell el-Kādi rises out of a dense jungle of thorn-bushes and rank weeds. Its circumference is about half a mile and its greatest elevation above the plain eighty feet. There are some traces of old foundations, and heaps of large stones on the top and on the S. part of the rim, where perhaps the citadel of a temple may have stood. There are also ruins in the plain a short distance N. of the hill. There are doubtless other remains, but they are now covered with grass and jungle (Porter).

DANCE. 'There is a time to raise the death-wail and a time to dance,' says the Proverb (lxxl 34).

1. Among the ancients in Egypt, etc. We have not now to discuss the origin of the practice of dancing, nor its connection with funeral, as well as with festival, observances. We may assume that from a very early period it has been an expression of joy, and has been accompanied by music and song.

The musical instrument employed may be no better than a wooden drum;¹ but without some music there can be none of that rhythmic movement which we call dancing. The principal occasions of dancing are, in an ancient community, religious. If these assumptions are, as far as our evidence goes, true for Polynesia, still more obviously are they true for early Egypt and Babylonia. The happy-tempered Egyptians loved their various dances, and cultivated the art both in public and in private festivities, both in war and in peace; but the primary impulse was religious.² In Babylonia and Assyria, too, the art of dancing flourished. 'To dance' (rakady) is a synonym for 'to rejoice'; and so great was the demand for singers, music and singing naturally go together with dancing; that Hezekiah king of Judah was made to send singers as well as other women of the palace to Niniveh (Isa. Inscr. 390).³

Neither Egypt nor early Babylonia, however, can be presumed to have influenced the primitive Israelitish customs, except, indeed, through the

2. Among the Bedouin. Canaanites. Of much greater importance are our scanty notices of Arabian dancing.

What the Bedouin dancing is to-day can be seen as near to civilisation as Jericho. Wild as it is, it is not without rhythm and measure.⁴ There are also still some relics of the primitive religious dance. Besides the dancing at the merry Circumcision Feast (muzaḥḥan), combined with sacrifice, there is the well-known custom of 'circumambulating' the Ka'ba or Holy House at Mecca seven times. This procession is a true substitute for a very old heathen rite.⁵ The prince poet Imr-al-Kais likens a herd of wild kine (ox antelopes) to a group of girls, gown-clad, going swiftly round the

the first day men of piety and repute singing hymns, danced with torches in their hands. No one who has not seen this pageant, a proverb has seen true joy (Seder Zeph). Thus the severity of the Law could not extinguish the impulse in the Jewish people to add rhythmic movement.

There was, however, one kind of dancing against which wise men protested. It is no doubt of tawdry dancing-girls that Ben Sin is thinking when he warns his readers not to "use the company of a woman that is a singer" (Luch. 9:6). Hellenism, indeed, was even more dangerous morally than religiously. It is just possible, too, that when on Herod's birthday the dancers of Herodias came forward to amuse the guests (id. rousaph. Mt. Hra. ep. Mk. 6:21), the more stylish dancing was derived from the portentious soledance of the hired female dancers of a tawdry sort.

The few occasions in the Bible in which dancing is referred to may be said to have an interesting history.

7. Biblical references

7. Biblical references. It was not always necessary to mention that a happy event was celebrated by dancing, because early readers would supply this detail mentally for themselves. We are thankful, however, that the writers did sometimes mention the dancing, and that so they interpreted for us many other passages. Dancing was continually in request in Israelitish and in Jewish society after Matt. 11:17. Lk. 7:32-35. This has in Assyrian 'dancing' and 'rejoicing' were synonymous terms (Am. 7:15 Jerem. 31:18, 30:12). It is an improbable idea of Eyerer (PKZ 22) that there is a reference to a kind of square dance in Cant. 7:1-8 (שִׁיר הַדָּוָד שִׁיר הַדָּוָד; see MATHIAS). Much more safely may we suppose a reference to a sword-dance, such as Wetstein found as a part of the wedding ceremonies in Syria (cp. ANTIQ. 18, § 91). Dancing has, of course, always been popular at weddings; and the virgins in the parable who go out to meet the landlroom no doubt looked forward to a merry round dance. Modern Arabs still sing and dance with lighted torches on the day of a wedding. (Amos. 6:4, 8:14.)

1. A man of extraordinary wisdom and righteousness (Ezek. ; see above). This Daniel appears to have become proverbial, as did Noah and Job; but when and where he was thought to have lived we are not told.

2. A Jewish captive, said to have been carried to Babylon 'in the third year of Jehoiakim' when Jerusalem was taken (Dan. 1.26), and to have become, through his supernatural wisdom, chief of the sages of Babylon and the minister of successive dynasties. The late date mentioned in his life is the third year at Cyrus (Dan. 10.1; cp. however, 1.2). Outside the book which bears his name, and the apocryphal additions to it, the only biblical passages which mention this Daniel are 1 Macc. 2.60 and Mt 21.45 (= Mk. 13.14). The former contains only a dialectic reference to the story of the lions' den. The latter apparently makes Jews speak of 'Daniel the prophet'; but, as the form of the citation shows, it is rather the evangelist who speaks (cp. B. Weiss, Das Matthäusevangelium, 508). DANIEL, BOOK OF

DANIEL, BOOK OF If we adopt the medieval division of the book into twelve chapters, the first six

divisiona

divisiona. This is a primitive split, which can be discerned in the first division from the second, in which Daniel records his visions. More important, however, than any such division into two six chapters is recognition of the fact that the aim of the book is not to record but to prophesy. It aimed at exhortation and encouragement. It talks, accordingly, not so much more or less detached and (so to speak) independent pieces of pictures, designed to lift the minds and hearts of its original readers, the contemporaries of the tyrant Antiochus IV. It prophesies about the oppressive present to the heights of a glowing party and a strong spiritual faith. These detached pieces, of which there are ten, I would group so as to divide the book into (a) an introductory part (chap. 1-2), (b) a second part (chap.
3-6), containing four narratives prefiguring events, and
6) a third part (chap. 7-12), containing four prophetic pieces. This threefold division is favoured by the consideration that the two four pieces contained in parts
(b) and (c) then serve as further amplifications of part
(a). For (a) also contains a narrative prefiguring events (chap. 1), and a Messianic prophecy (chap. 2), in which four kingdoms (corresponding to the four beasts of chap. 7) are followed by the everlasting Messianic kingdom which fulfils the history of the world to its close.

2. Contents. The book begins by describing how Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, after a siege and capture of Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim king of Judah (chapter 1), took Daniel and three other youths from the palace and brought them to Babylon where he had them brought up in the service of the royal court. Part II describes how Daniel was able to identify the vessels which were removed to Babylon – as the author states, “inasmuch as the king desired to know the secret of the vessels” (chapter 5). It also speaks of their desecration and how they were purified by the simplicity with which his Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah guarded themselves against certain pollution, and how marvelously God rewarded them for this; and finally, how they came to stand before the king, he found them ten times better than all the magicians and enchanters in his realm, and so they became his advisers.

The second piece (chaps. 2 and 4) relates an astonishing proof of the supernatural wisdom of Daniel, by means of which he was able to save his own life and the lives of the other magicians. The king insists on having the dream which has disturbed him not only interpreted but also, first of all, recovered for him, and by the king is interpreted as signifying his life. The image seen by the king is interpreted as signifying by its four parts the present kingdom of Nebuchadrezzar, whilst the remaining parts of the body, of silver, brass, and iron, are referred to three kingdoms which are destined to follow the Babylonian. The fourth kingdom, to which, as a divided kingdom, the legs (of iron) and the feet (partly of iron and partly of clay) correspond, is followed by the everlasting kingdom set up by the God of heaven. Just as the stone cut out without hands breaks in pieces the whole image, and itself becomes a great mountain that fills the whole

² The division into chapters has been most roughly made at three points: chap. II ought not to begin till II 26; and in XI chaps. 3 and 5 ought to end, as in EV, with 3 30 and 5 31 [61] respectively.

DANIEL, BOOK OF

earth, so every earthly dominion must give way before the imperishable kingdom of God.

In the third piece (11:30) we are told how, as a punishment for their refusal to worship the great golden image which Nebuchadnezzar had set up, the three friends of Daniel (himself silently passed over) were cast into the burning fiery furnace, and how, at last, when the fire had not been able to slay the men of faith who had been thus steadfast to their faith, the great king was compelled to do homage to their God.

The fourth piece (11:33-12:3) tells, in the form of a proclamation by Nebuchadnezzar to all the peoples of the whole world—a form which is not unvaried with uniform consistency—how an evil dream (which the king himself in this instance relates) had thrown him into dismay, and how Daniel alone was able rightly to interpret the vision, prophesying to the king that as a punishment for his pride he should for a long time be bereft of reason. Nebuchadnezzar is thus for a third time constrained to give the glory to the Ruler of heaven.

Next, in the fifth piece (12:1-4), we have Belshazzar's Feast and overthrow: we are told how in a wild orgy this king, unmannered by the fate of his father Nebuchadnezzar, desecrated the sacred vessels of the temple, and thereupon was horror-stricken by the miraculous handwriting on the wall. The explanation of this, which Daniel alone was able to give, was soon shown to have been correct, for that very night the king was slain, and his crown passed to Darius the Mede.

The sixth piece (12:5-20), that of Daniel in the lions' den, has reference exclusively to Daniel, just as a corresponding section, that of the burning fiery furnace, relates only to his three friends. We here read how King Darius suffered himself to be misled by his nobles, who were envious of Daniel, to promulgate the foolish decree that any one who for the space of a month should offer any petition to God or man should be thrown to the lions. Naturally Daniel transgressed this command; but the king, who had been compelled against his will to consign his faithful servant to punishment, soon became convinced of his error by the protection which Daniel's God vouchsafed to his worshipper, and, condemning the accusers to the fate which they had prepared for Daniel, commanded all his subjects to serve Daniel's God.

The seventh piece (7), the first in the prophetic section, is a picture in companionship to chap. 2, and dates from the first year of Belshazzar, not from the time of Nebuchadnezzar, to which the first group of four pieces belong. It, moreover, as we read in 10:1, the last great vision which Daniel saw immediately before his death is to be assigned to the third year of Cyrus, exactly seventy years after Daniel's deportation from Judah; it seems fitting that the eighth piece also should be assigned to the Babylonian period, and that only the last two prophetic sections should be given to that of the Medes and Persians. Most of the years they amounted to an ordinary lifetime—that Daniel spent in the East must have fallen under the reigns of the Babylonian kings; for, whilst Darius the Mede was already in his sixty-second year when he ascended the throne of Babylon (5:1 [6:1]), Daniel saw only the beginning of the reign of his successor Cyrus the Persian.

In chap. 7 we have Daniel's account of his vision of the four beasts, from each of which successively the supremacy is taken away to be at last and for ever bestowed upon the Messiah, one 'like a son of man' who comes from heaven, and so at the same time the kingdom is possessed by the saints of the Most High.

It, in 7:25, the angel's interpretation of one of the horns of the fourth beast has already unmistakably pointed to a king who persecuted the Jews on account of their religion; it is made still more apparent in the ninth piece (in the interpretation which Gabriel gives of Daniel's vision in the third year of Belshazzar) that by the fourth kingdom, which arises after the reigns of the Medes and Persians, we are to understand the Grecian empire of Alexander the Great and his successors. By the reader acquainted with Jewish history the description of the horn which at first was small, and of the bold overbearing king who deprives the Most High of his continual burnt-offering, and gives up his sanctuary to wanton desecration, and at the same time rages furiously against the holy people, cannot fail to be understood as referring to the Syrian king Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.) who, by his religious edict (1 Mac. 1:41, 54), designed to bring about the establishment of the Greek cultus throughout his whole dominions, and, by setting up an altar to the Olympian Zeus upon the altar of burnt-offering in Jerusalem (2 Mac. 6:1), provoked the revolt of the Maccabees (167). The eighth piece contains the comforting promise that after 2300 evenings and mornings the temple of God will be again restored to its rightful position, and the shameless king overthrown, but not by human hand.

The ninth piece (chap. 9), after a prayer of Daniel which, notwithstanding its borrowings from Ezra 9 and

Neh. 9, is still pathetic, gives Gabriel's interpretation of the seventy years, predicted by Jeremiah, as measuring seventy weeks of years, after the lapse of which the day of salvation is to dawn.

Whilst this vision comes to Daniel in the first year of the reign of Darius the Mede over the kingdom of Babylon, the last or tenth piece (chaps. 10-12) is dated from the third year of Cyrus his successor. In correspondence with the great importance of this last vision is the long introduction, after which, by a sketch (chap. 11) mainly devoted to the complicated relations between the Seleucids and the Ptolemies, and a picture of the downfall of the Syrian tyrant, the final destiny of the people of God is brought more precisely in connection with universal history. Chap. 12, however, does not give any one absolutely precise indication of the exact time when the troublous days, such as have never before been known, are to come to an end; it vacillates between 1290 and 1335 as the number of days that are to elapse between the setting up of idolatrous worship in the temple and the coming of the glorious time of the end.

The view taken over by the church from the syncretic, which makes Daniel not only the principal hero

3. Authorship. but also the author of the book, has not unreasonably passed current among theologians down to the present century. To the unprejudiced reader the book appears to claim to have been written by Daniel. The narratives in the first six chapters do not expressly make this claim; but in 7:2 we find Daniel himself presented as the narrator; the use of the first person singular. The use of the third person in chaps. 1-6 and in the beginnings of chaps. 7 and 10 is not against the authorship of Daniel (cp. Am. 7:12 ff.), who, at the beginning of chap. 8 and of chap. 9, speaks in the first person in giving the date. The close connection of chaps. 1-6 with the visions which follow may fairly be held to carry over the claim for Daniel's authorship to the beginning of the book also. No attentive reader will allow himself to be misled as to the oneness of the authorship.

4. Unity. of the book by the fragmentary or detached character of the ten pieces of which it is composed, it has attentively observes how the earlier portions allude to the later, and conversely how the later portions allude to themselves to the earlier, and how the same general manner of presentation, thought, and language pervade the whole.

The organic unity of the Book of Daniel, denied by Reuss and Lagarde, has been once more defended by E. H. von Gall in a monograph (see below, § 23). The grounds, however, which he offers (121 ff.) for regarding 9:20 as a late insertion are no more than plausible. The contents of this section are of a higher type than those of the hymns in the apocryphal additions to Daniel. A certain solemn fineness is characteristic of the liturgical style, and is not wanting in passages which may have served the author as his models—e.g., Ezra 9 and Neh. 9. Von Gall's changes in 9:2 are arbitrary; the change in the names of God, which is quite appropriate, proves nothing. It is a pure fancy that the author of Daniel, who was acquainted with the Book of Jeremiah, does not regard misfortune as penal; see 4:14, 5:22, etc. Besides, it is expunging 9:20, how much remains for chap. 9? Only ten verses. This is surely not enough for the ninth of the pieces which form the book.

What has been said as to the true unity of the book is only apparently contradicted by the use from 2:4 to the end of chap. 7 of the Aramaic language in a book otherwise written in Hebrew.

This interchange of language has given rise to many hypotheses. Spinoza thought the first seven chapters might be an extract made in the time of Judas the Maccabee from old writings of the Chaldeans (cp. Berthold, Einl. 1508 f.). Huetius, on the other hand, suggested that the whole Book of Daniel had been originally written in Aramaic, and shortly afterwards translated into Hebrew, and that the original work having been partly destroyed in the dark days of the Seleucid era, the text was restored by borrowing the Heb. sections that we now have from the Hebrew version (cp. Berth. Einl. 1544, 1549). It is hardly an improvement on this view when J. D. Prieur, adopting the theory of Leconte and Bérus, says: 'The book was probably written at first all in Hebrew; but for the convenience of the general

1 Clermont Gaméau's theory (J. J. 1839), accepted by N. d. l. (Z. 1. 14) and Bérus, that the mysterious inscription consists really of names of weights, is rejected by Behrmann. See Meyer.

DANIEL, BOOK OF

reader, whose language was Aramaic, a translation, possibly from the same point as the original, was made into the Aramaic vernacular. It must be supposed that certain parts of the Hebrew manuscript being lost, the missing places were supplied from the current Aramaic translation (Book of Daniel 1901, p. 13).

The hypothesis that 'the Hebrew edition was partly destroyed in the troubled Seleucid period, and the missing portions supplied from the Aramaic version,' leaves unexplained why the change of language should occur precisely at 2:1, where cannot be regarded as a gloss, although 'the author of Daniel evidently fell into the error of regarding "Chaldean" as the language of Babylonia.' If, to begin with, the loss of part of a MS. of no great length is in itself very immaterial, still less satisfactory is the assertion that in the second century before Christ such Palestinian Jews as were able to read books at all could hardly understand any Hebrew. Rashi is right when he says (Exh. in das A.T., 1879, p. 112): 'The change of language occurs in the middle of a section that cannot be divided (2:4), which shows that the author was so familiar with both languages that he could glide from one into the other without noticing it, and could assume for a great proportion of his contemporaries a knowledge of them both.' 'None asserts, as Prince expresses it, that both languages were used quite indifferently'; the author of Daniel and his readers were certainly more at home in the Aramaic vernacular. When Prince asks why chap. 7, 'which is indivisible from the succeeding prophetic Hebrew portions,' was written not in Hebrew but in Aramaic, we may answer that chap. 7 was written in the same Aramaic idiom as chap. 2 simply in order to make every observant reader feel that the book was one, and that the four visions were inseparable from the six narratives.

The change of dialect is made quite naturally thus: In chap. 2 the author has introduced the 'Chaldeans,' speaking the language which he believed to be customary with them; afterwards he continues to use the same language on account of its greater convenience both for himself and for his original readers, both in the narrative portions and in the following (seventh) chapter, the piece in companionship to chap. 2; for the last three visions (8-12) a return to Hebrew was suggested by the consideration that the chief front of old been the usual sacred language for prophetic subjects. Whether the Aramaic of Daniel, which is closely allied to that in Ezra, can really be taken as historically the language spoken in the Babylonian court in the sixth century B.C., or for the native language of the Chaldeans, cannot be discussed until we have faced the whole question of the historical validity or invalidity of the book (see § 16). It is enough in the meantime to say that the Aramaic or 'Chaldean' portion of Daniel cannot possibly have formed an independent work; on the contrary, the change of language serves to bind the different parts of the work into a firmer unit.

The position of the book of Daniel with reference to historical fact, a question most intimately bound up with that of its date, can be discussed to advantage only after we have, in a purely exegetical way (Bleek in DT, 1860, p. 512), firmly established the fact that makes for the unity of authorship in all five prophetic pieces (chaps. 2 and 7-12): the fact, namely, that the range of vision in each case reaches down to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, in whom afflicted Israel discerned the culmination of all that had been hostile to God in all history, and that, with Epiphanes' destruction, which is regarded as imminent, the dawn of the Messianic time is expected. This done, we shall have no difficulty in finding other weighty reasons for fixing the composition of the book of Daniel at a date shortly before the death of Antiochus IV.

The extraordinary precision with which the entire Daniel seems to prophesy about things that are to happen several centuries afterwards is particularly conspicuous in chap. 11, where, for example, reference is made in v. 13 to the victory which the Consul Lucius Scipio gained over Antiochus III. at Magnesia, in Lycia, in 190 B.C., or in v. 30 to Popilius Laenas, who in the name of the Roman Senate forced Antiochus Epiphanes in 168 B.C. to quit Egypt with great precipitancy, upon which the king, as we learn from 1 Macc. 1:50 ff., wreaked his wrath upon his Jewish subjects. Although predictions of this sort are nowhere found in the writings of the prophets of the Old Testament, orthodoxy was long accustomed to take special delight in contemplating predictions which had been so wonderfully fulfilled (cp. the case of the name of Cyrus in Is. 41:26). In the present century, however, as the historical sense became quickened, difficulties began to present themselves against assumptions which were contrary to the analogy of the prophetic writings, and found their support merely in the dogma of a magical inspiration.

7. Always. In spite of Prieß's energetic warning against 'hall-measures,' modern apologists, pressed by the constantly increasing historical difficulties caused by uniform decipherments, have been driven more and more to seek refuge in the 'hall-measures,' thus deprecated, so that, as Beyer (l.c. 8) immovably says, the defenders of Daniel live, during the last few years, being employed chiefly in cutting Daniel to pieces.

It may, indeed, if inference is made here to but one of the equally arbitrary and dogmatic attempts which have been made to save the authenticity of the book as a whole by 'arranging' its contents so as to authorise Zöckler in his exposition of the book of Daniel (7) declared 11-12 to be a later interpolation; he had come to see quite clearly that such a piece of history could never have been penned by an eighth-century prophet. The attempt, however, was in this case as in the attempt made elsewhere to change the name of Cyrus (Is. 45:1) into an appellative, for it left altogether out of account Dan. 2:41 and the relation of that verse to 11:17. The two verses read of two unlikely marriages between Seleucus and the Ptolemies; namely, v. 17, of the marriage of Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, with Antiochus III. Theos, and v. 17, of that of Cleopatra (daughter of the Seleucid Antiochus III., the Great, and thus sister of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes), from whom all the Egyptian Cleopatras have taken their name, with Ptolemy V. Epiphanes. But these marriages are quite plainly alluded to in 2:41, where we read as follows: 'Regarding the kingdom represented in the vision by the legs of iron and the feet partly of iron and partly of clay: "And whereas thou sawest the iron mixed with clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men, but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron does not mingle with clay." From this it follows at once that by the fourth kingdom in chap. 2 is meant that of Alexander the Great, which became divided into that of the Seleucids and that of the Ptolemies (the other kingdoms of the successors of Alexander have here no interest for the author, and are therefore passed over). But if in chap. 2 the first of the four kingdoms has been made out to be the Babylonian, and the Greek to be the fourth, it follows, from what we are told of the dynasties under which Daniel himself lived, that the second and the third kingdoms, reached upon so lightly in Daniel's interpretation in 2:6, must be the Median and the Persian. Still more clearly than in chap. 2 does the author's special interest in the period of the fourth kingdom disclose itself in the visions of Daniel; the relations of the people of God to Antiochus Epiphanes possess such great importance, because, immediately upon the fall of this tyrant—which is to be brought about without human intervention (cp. 2:44 with 8:25)—the Messianic kingdom is forthwith to be set up. It is universally admitted that the reference to Antiochus Epiphanes is as plainly manifest in the second vision (8:14-26), as it is in the last vision (11:1-4), which occupies itself wholly with the reign of this king. Chap. 12:7-12, also relates to his persecution of the saints and his long-continued cessation. To the unprejudiced interpreter there can be no possibility of doubt that in the three other pieces also the range of vision is limited to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. What is true of 2:41 is true also of 7:8 ff. 10 ff., where the little horn (cp. 8:3, 11) whose power the saints are delivered up for three times and a half (cp. 7:25 with 12:7), must again be the same persecutor who had made himself so hateful to the Jews. The same holds good, finally, of chap. 9. Here the sixty-two years which follow the first seven present, it is true, a historical difficulty which will have to be discussed (see § 27); but this much at least is certain, that the 'nameless' one in 9:26 is the high priest of the III. who was put to death in 171 B.C., so that the last seven weeks comes down in 174 B.C., and the suspension of sacrifice and offering which is predicted in 9:26 for the second half of this week enables us to place it so, that it is the action of Antiochus Epiphanes that is referred to.

Now, on the assumption of the authenticity of the book, it is very hard indeed to understand how, out of the ten pieces of which it is composed, 8. Authenticity, so many as five, in which the coming of the Messianic kingdom is predicted, should stop short at the reign of a Seleucid sovereign whose kingdom—not to speak of the Greek kingdom out of which it and the other Seleucid kingdoms had arisen—had no existence in the days of the exile Daniel.

Even the early father Hippolytus did not fail to notice the allusions to the history of the Seleucids and the Ptolemies which occur in the book of Daniel; but it was the Neo-platonist Porphyry (ob. 304 A.D.) who first drew the right inference from the acknowledged facts, and took Daniel's professed authorship to be a mere literary form, ascribing the book to a Jew who wrote during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. As, however, this denial of the authenticity of the book came from an opponent of Christianity, it produced no effect. It was necessary that, within the Church itself, a truly scientific and historical method of dealing with the OT should arise.¹ This has at last come to pass. As the result of the labours of several generations, we can safely hold it to have been established, as one of the ascertained results of science, that in chap. 7 we are to understand by the fourth beast the Grecian Empire, by the eleventh horn Antiochus Epiphanes, and by what is related regarding this horn the religious persecution under that king; as also that the author of the book wrote in his reign. A fundamental rule of all sound exegesis was violated when the utterances of chap. 7 were not interpreted in the light of the other four parallel texts, but were torn from their connection in the book in order to give them a meaning divergent from the sense of the rest of the book, as if the fourth beast signified not the Grecian but the Roman Empire. To interpret the four kingdoms as denoting those of Babylonia, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome, seems, indeed, by grouping the Medes and Persians under one empire, to offer a series which, from a historical point of view, can be more easily accepted than that of Babylonia, Media, Persia, and Greece; but this last series alone gives the true sense of the book, which represents the Median kingdom of Darius as being the second of the four world-monarchies, and places this as an independent intermediate link between the Chaldean and the Persian monarchies (cp 6:1 [5:1] 8:20-9:1), distinguishing it quite plainly from the Persian, which it makes out to be the third. With our perfectly certain knowledge, derived from the cuneiform inscriptions, that there never was any such Median empire between those of Babylonia and Persia (cp PERSIA), the authenticity of the Book of Daniel falls to the ground. Quite apart, however, from the numerous contradictions of history to be afterwards spoken of (§ 10, etc.),—contradictions which absolutely exclude the supposition that the author was an eye-witness living during the period of the 'exile,'—the fact that the horizon of the book is throughout bounded by the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the fierce persecutor of the Jews and their religion, with whose fall the Messianic salvation is represented as being ushered in, makes it abundantly plain that the figure of the exile Daniel is employed only as a literary form. The Messianic hope could not possibly have taken this special form so early as during the 'exile,' but only under the oppression of the Syrian tyrant who sought to extirpate the religion of Israel, and to compel the Jews to adopt the idolatrous worship of Greece.

The book of Daniel being, as Wellhausen well describes it (1/6², 240 f.), 'a hortatory and consolatory writing for the persecuted, designed to strengthen and cheer them by the knowledge that within a very short time the overbent bow will break,' its author was able to allow himself great freedom in the use of his materials. His aim was not the communication of historical information. Using as a vehicle the materials, historical or unhistorical, that tradition had placed at his disposal, he availed himself of the literary artifice of employing the name of the exile Daniel to gain weight for the ethical and religious truths which he desired to set forth.¹ As in the cases of Job and Jonah, so also in that of the book of Daniel, a great injustice is done if the standard of strict historicity is applied,—a standard by which the book is not in the least intended to be tried. We find in it (cp Kämpf, Daniel, 16 f., 28 ff., 45) not only

10. Unconcern about history. many historical errors but also, frequently, a magnificent unconcern about historical possibilities, of which the author, in spite of his great literary art, certainly was not always conscious. If it is permissible to find in 6:8, no less than in the demand mentioned in 2:11, a scornful reference to that religious edict of Antiochus Epiphanes which the pious Jew could regard only as a piece of insanity, these passages without doubt contain other conscious allusions to historical fact. In many cases, we can quite confidently conjecture their presence, though we do not always quite understand them. If it is only with difficulty that we are able to form any visual image of the fiery furnace (3), or of the lion's den (6), still less are we able to comprehend how Daniel, who had constantly remained steadfast to the God of Israel, could have come to be the chief of the heathen Magi (2:2); and in like manner we fail to make clear to ourselves how Daniel (cp 8:26 12:4) could have managed to secure that what he had seen should remain a secret for centuries. The matter becomes at once natural and intelligible if we suppose that the exile Daniel was simply employed as a literary device by a writer of much later date, who regarded the fury of Antiochus Epiphanes as the last visitation of the people of God before the blessed time of the end should come. Anachronisms and historical difficulties of every sort occur throughout the whole of the book, not only in its preliminary narratives.

Orthodoxy shows a natural reluctance to recognise the unhistorical character of the book. As even its latest expounder,² although dating it in the Maccabean period, greatly exaggerates its historical value, and justifies himself in his refusal to recognise its true character by urging that in substance the book is not pure invention, but rests upon tradition, it seems fitting to call attention to one outstanding instance in which tradition is no guarantee of historical truth, before we proceed to enumerate some samples of the unhistoricity of the book.—Among the apocryphal additions to Daniel contained in B, that of the 'Dragon at Babel' (cp Schr. in Riehm's HTB) is certainly not pure invention. This legend, which in its present literary form is very late, had already been brought into relation with the old Babylonian mythology by Schrader and Ball (Wace, Apoc. ii. 348 ff.); but quite recently Gunkel (ut sup. 320 ff.) has conclusively shown that what lies at the root of it is the primeval Babylonian myth of the conquest of the Chaos-monster or the great dragon Tiamat by the god Marduk.¹ Instead of merely pronouncing this apocryphal narrative, as Zöckler (Apoc. [91], 215-221) somewhat imprudently does, foolish and silly, we ought rather to learn from it that dependence on ancient tradition is not incompatible with complete unhistoricity.

¹ Gunkel, Schöpfung, 125. Doubts as to the authenticity of the Book of Daniel were uttered again in the seventeenth century by Hobbes (Leviathan, 33) and Spinoza (Tract. theol. polit., 10); but Anthony Collins, the 'free-thinker,' was the first who treated the subject with something like modern thoroughness. As Leibler has shown, the eleven grounds which Collins adduces (Scheme of Literal Prophecy, 17:6, p. 149 ff.) are mostly those on which recent criticism relies for proving the Maccabean date of Daniel. It would, however, be a mistake to suppose that critical doubts were confined to sceptical theologians. Richard Bentley, scholar and apologist, had reached by 1721 a conviction of the late origin of Daniel. 'Jehd in his monograph (67 f.) makes too light of Bentley's doubts. In spite of Whiston's somewhat disparaging language, it is clear that Bentley found serious difficulties both in the narratives and in the predictions of Daniel, in consequence of which he supposed the book to have been written after the time of Onias the high priest, and that this Onias was Daniel's Messiah' (see Whiston's Memoirs by himself, Lond. 1749, p. 108 f.). Whiston was a Boyle Lecturer.]

² It is possible, no doubt, that he derived some part of these narratives from Jewish or Babylonian popular stories. But even if we accept this conjecture, the historical setting, the moral purpose, and the skill in presentation are all his own' (Che, F.H.B., art. 'Daniel').

As a contemporary, the author of Daniel 11:2-19 was in circumstances which enabled him to depict with the utmost accuracy the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes and his two Egyptian campaigns; but for the concluding portion of ch. 11 he can no longer be taken as a historical source, inasmuch as 11: 40-45 go beyond the author's present; the actual course of events in which Antiochus Epiphanes perished on an eastern raid in the Persian city of Takke in 164 B.C. is glaringly inconsistent with the author's anticipation that the king, after a successful expedition against Egypt, was to meet his end suddenly in Palestine.

We are thus led to the conclusion that the book was written during the life-time of Antiochus Epiphanes. The conclusion that it belongs to a very late date in the post-exilic period is forced upon us also by its language.

11. Language.

The many Persian words in the book are, in the mouth of Daniel, anachronisms which clearly testify against the authenticity of the book; as also testifies the use of the word Kasdim (EV 'Chaldeans', q.r.) for the Babylonian priests, soothsayers, or magicians. True, our book sometimes, in agreement with those prophets who lived under the new Babylonian kingdom, understands by the Kasdim the people who had the predominance in Babylon (cp Dan 3:5-10; 11: 43-44); but it stands alone, opposed not only to the Assyrio-Babylonian uassu loquendi but also to that of all the rest of the OT, in the manner in which it everywhere else (cp 2:24, etc.) makes Kasdim synonymous with 'Magi,' a practice which is found, long after the downfall of the Babylonian empire, in Greek and Roman authors. As the number of words borrowed from Persian certainly exceeds a dozen, the few Greek expressions do not come so much into account; but attention is worth calling to psalterium in Dan. 3:5, because this form, alongside of the Greek psalterion, proves the influence of the Macedonian dialect (which substituted n for h), and because it is in the case of this word that the Semitic derivation of the foreign words in Daniel, so much insisted on in the apologetic interest, is strikingly seen to be untenable.

The non-Hebrew language of Dan. 2:4 ff. is introduced as being the speech of the 'Chaldeans,' and is kept up by the author down to the end of chap. 7, because in his time (though not so in 2 K. 18:26) both languages were readily understood; it is thus possible for us to form definite conclusions as to its character. Although it is called Aramaic correctly, it is at the same time intended to be taken as the language of the 'Chaldeans,' and this on any assumption involves a historical error. The biblical Aramaic (see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, § 3 f.) is now known to belong to the West Aramaic group and to be closely related to the language of the Targums and of the Pahlavene and other inscriptions. We know also that this language, of which the remains preserved to us come for the most part from Palestine, did not, as the language of current improvisatio, supersede the old Hebrew (which had now begun to assert its claim to be regarded as a sacred language) until the end of the third century B.C. The actual language of the 'Chaldeans' also we know from the cuneiform inscriptions to have been Semitic, but very different from the West Aramaic, so that Luther's free translation of 2:4—'Then spake the Chaldees to the king in Chaldean'—is indeed exegetically correct but historically false. If, on the other hand, in order to avoid supposing that Aramaic was confounded with

'Chaldean,' it is maintained that the court language at Babylon was Aramaic, we may point to the linguistic peculiarities of the old Aramaic inscriptions,² which abundantly show that the Aramaic of the Book of Daniel could not have been spoken in Babylon in the sixth century.

How little the Book of Daniel can be depended on in matters of history appears from its very first verse. Not only do the real contemporaries (cp Jer. 16:1, 2; 26:7) of the famous Chaldean king

call him Nebuchadnezzar; but also Strabo, in transliterating the name, comes near the cuneiform form. In Dan. 1:1, on the other hand, the name is given in a later corrupt form (with n instead of r) in connection with the unhistorical statement (cp Jer. 25:1, 36:1, 9, 20) that Nebuchadnezzar conquered Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim. Whatever be the case with the rest of the OT, Daniel betrays no trace of acquaintance with cuneiform; the error made in 13 [5] is an urgent warning against any attempt to interpret the writing on the wall in 5:25 by reference to the real speech of the 'Chaldeans.' In 4:8 [5] Daniel's name Belshazzar, which is already taken in the LXX to be the same as Belshazzar (5:1), the name of the alleged last Babylonian king, is wrongly supposed to be a compound of the divine name Bel (Is. 46:1), although Bel-sar-usur (that is, 'Bel preserve the king') and Bel-sar-usur (that is, 'may his life be preserved') are philologically distinct.² It would take us too far afield were we to show how even Nebuchadnezzar's insanity and the equally unhistorical conception of Belshazzar or even of the legendary Darius the Mede (whom Xenophon's romance, the Cyropædia, cannot make a historical person carry us back to traditions which, widely different as they seem, in part at least, to have been, were in any case greatly distorted. How strained are the author's relations with history can be seen by a glance at chap. 11:27. As only two Babylonian kings are known to him, so he knows of only three Persian sovereigns besides Cyrus (10:1); their names being those of the four that occur elsewhere in the OT (cp 1:21, 15:2); as Xerxes is clearly intended by the fourth, this sovereign is made to be the successor of Artaxerxes (whom he really preceded), and the contemporary of Alexander the Great.

In these circumstances Driver's correct statement (Introd. 60 510), that 'the book rests upon a traditional basis,' or, at not to have been followed by the statement that 'Daniel, it cannot be doubted, was a historical person, one of the Jewish exiles in Babylon.' A book which does not admit of being used as a historical source, save for the author's own time, cannot possibly be a guarantee for the existence of an exile Daniel. When we cast about us for information concerning Daniel independent of our present book, we find that the name Daniel is of rare occurrence in the OT, being met with (see DANIEL, 1:1) only once on perfectly historical ground; and, moreover, what is very remarkable, we find also in Ezra's time (see DANIEL, 4:3) a Mishael, an Azariah, and a Hananiah (cp Dan. 1:6)—a coincidence of rare names which led Bleek to conjecture that our author had thrown back the contemporaries of Ezra by more than a century in order that he might represent them as living in the time of the 'exile' at a heathen court, and showing an example to his countrymen under the oppression of the heathen. This hypothesis and that of Cheyne (OPs. 107) are, at any rate, preferable to the view of Ewald, who places the original Daniel among the North Israelitish exiles at the court of Nineveh (Prophets, 511).

In confirmation of the date (during the lifetime of Antiochus Epiphanes) already made out, we have many additional facts which point to the early enable us to fix the time with absolute precision. Among these are the argumenta e silentio supplied by the fact that Daniel is not named by the son of Sirach who wrote about 190 B.C. (Eccles. 18 f.), and—a still weightier argument—by the complete absence of any influence of Daniel upon post-exilic prophetic literature. Conversely this book, to which the angelic names Gabriel and Michael, the resurrection (12:1; cp Eschatology), and a collection of sacred books that included the prophecies of Jeremiah (92) are known, plainly reveals its dependence not only on Jeremiah and Ezekiel but also on the post-exilic Book of Zechariah. If the absence of Daniel from Eccles. 496-11 is itself a proof of late origin, a still stronger proof lies in the fact that it has found its place in the Hebrew canon, not in the second division, the collection of prophetic books, but in the third or last division, between Esther and Ezra (cp CANON, § 49). Not until the time of the LXX (which, moreover, has treated the text of Daniel in a very arbitrary fashion) does it find a place, after Ezekiel, as the fourth of the 'great' prophets, and thus it comes to pass that once in the NT¹ Daniel is designated as a prophet.

The very arbitrary treatment of the MT of Daniel in the LXX, particularly in chaps. 3-6, and the false interpretation of 9:25 ff. (Sabbu'im, 'weeks') confronted with Sabbu'im, 'seventy' brought it about that long before Jerome's time, Theodotion's translation of Daniel (already employed by Irenaeus)² superseded the LXX in ecclesiastical use. Though Theodotion did not remove the apocryphal additions not found in MT, yet, by making use of Aquila's version, he brought the text of the LXX into closer relation with MT. From a MS (Cord. Chisianus) of the LXX in the library of Cardinal Chigi, not very old, but supplied with Origen's obeli and asterisks, an edition of the LXX Daniel was published at Rome in 1772, and another and better one by Cozza in 1877. The Syriac Hexaplar version of Paul of Tella, edited by Bugati in 1788 and photographically reproduced by Ceriani in 1874, is justly held to be purer than the text of the Cod. Chisianus (Swete's 87), which is, indeed, full of errors. The text-critical importance of Θ is, for the Book of Daniel, fortunately very small; so far as the integrity of the consonants of the original text is concerned, the book is one of the best preserved in the whole OT.

As distinguished from the older prophets the Book of Daniel is often spoken of as the first apocalypse (cp Dan. 2:19). It makes a revelation of the coming end of the world, although in a veiled manner, so as to avoid the dangers of open speech. Upon the basis of his study of earlier writers (92),³ and conscious of his own divine enlightenment, the author wrote his work of admonition and comfort in the name of the ancient Daniel; it is on ignorance (cp the excellent remarks of B. in Wace's Apoc. 2307) or misapprehension that can lay to his charge as a false employment of a literary form which was common throughout antiquity. We must not, of course, unduly exaggerate the feeling, no doubt prevalent in the Maccabean period, that prophecy had become extract—feeling which may have contributed, along with other causes, to the choice of this literary form. Our author pursues the same lofty moral and religious aims which were sought by the older prophets, and it is by no means his intention to gratify a merely idle curiosity. In presenting, as still future, just occurrences in which as one world empire perished after another, he saw the hand of his God only as preparing the way for that which was still really in the future, the downfall of the last and most direful enemy of the good, and the coming of Messiah's salvation, there was a double advantage. The people who were in the secret were able to recognize in what he wrote the circumstances of their own time, although only darkly alluded to; and what had happened already supplied a guarantee for the certainty of that which was still to happen. The author lives in the firm faith that everything has been fully foreordained in the counsels of God (cp 7:14); the Almighty is steering the whole course of history towards the salvation of his people (cp Smend's lecture on 'Jewish Apocalyptic' in Z. f. F. W., 1885, p. 127 ff.). Cp Eschatology.

If we turn now to the question how our author set about fixing by computation the date of the accomplishment of the Messianic hopes of the Jews,

we are able to arrive at a more precise determination of the date of his writing. It must have been either soon before, or soon after, the purification of the temple. Thus we learn from the number given in 8:14. As already said, the years of weeks (cp 2 Ch. 36:1) present some historical difficulty, inasmuch as, after the first seven weeks of years (which suit the Babylonian 'exile'), instead of the $62 \times 7 = 434$ years of the interval which we should expect to find between Cyrus and the death of Onias III. (538-171 B.C.), we are, according to the actual chronology (which gives 307 years), 67 years short. As the Jewish Hellenist Demetrius, however, who wrote about 210 B.C., has fallen into a mistake precisely similar to our author's—a mistake which could easily be made in the absence of a fixed era—we need not be surprised at such an error in a book historically so inaccurate as that of Daniel. The last week of years, which begins in 171 B.C., extends (precisely reckoned) to 164 B.C., and it has certainly contributed greatly to the esteem in which the book has been held, that Antiochus Epiphanes actually did die in the year 164. For our author the division of the seventieth week of years into two equal parts was suggested by the history of his time, inasmuch as towards the end of 168 B.C. the Abomination of Desolation was set up, and idolatrous worship in the temple began. The three-years-and-a-half which remain after deduction of the historical three-years-and-a-half stand for the still incomplete period of the last and greatest tribulation in the course of which our book was written. For the correctness of this second number ($3\frac{1}{2}$) faith had to be the guarantee; and that it was known to be a round number or a number of faith is shown not only by the vague periphrasis in 7:25 and 12:7, where the plural 'times' takes the place of the linguistically impossible dual, but also by the three numbers, 1150 (cp the 2300 evenings and mornings in 8:14), 1260, and 1335 days, used in an approximate way to express three years and a half—apparently with precision but in reality only in round obtained through the error in 25:24-27. Besides, it is unnatural to explain the phrase 'the books' as referring to the Pentateuch when the context speaks only of Jeremiah. Behrmann's rendering of 9:25 ('I took notice of') is preferable to that of Bevan and of EV ('I understood').

² Porphyry, too, made use of Theodotion's translation, and even according to Jerome's express testimony regarded it as the original (cp Bevan, op. cit. 3).

³ Following out a suggestion of Nöldeke (Alttest. Litt. 224), Prof. Bevan has offered this interpretation of 9:2, 'I understood the number of years by the Pentateuch,' the special reference being to Lev. 26:18-21 24-28, where it is declared that the Israelites are to be punished seven times for their sins. 'The 70 weeks become intelligible if we suppose that the author of Daniel combined Jer. 25:11 29:12 with Lev. 26:18 ff.' 'The 70 years of J. remitt were to be repeated 7 times, and at the end of the 49th year the long-promised deliverance might be confidently expected.' But the expression 'seven times' has here, as in Prov. 24:16, simply the sense of 'often.' The text in 9:2 cannot ascribe to Daniel a comprehension of 'the number of the years by the (holy) books,' because such a comprehension is, as a fact, only numbers. Behrmann, with Cornill, continues to fix the date of the book as in the beginning of the year 164, because the number in §14, which does not seem to be symbolical, is held to point to the purification of the temple as having already been accomplished; but Cornill,¹ reckoning backwards 1150 days from 23rd December 195 B.C., sought to make out 27th October 168 as the probable date of the religious edict of Antiochus Epiphanes. The difference of 45 days between the number in 1211 and that in 1212, which it is merely arbitrary to attempt to explain as a gloss, points to months of 30 days. In that case the 1290 days (iv. 11), or 43 months, would fit in if we were to add an intercalary month to the 42 months of the three years and a half. However we may reckon (cp H. Gort in Th. T. 28, 450 [94]), the end of chap. 9 forbids the disconnection of the restoration of the temple service from the final close so decidedly that the present writer now nutes with Kuenen and Wellhausen in preferring the usual view, according to which 814 still lies in the author's future, and holds the date of the book to be 195 B.C.

When the book, which rapidly became popular, first began, perhaps as early as 150 B.C. (cp i Macc. 154

19. Apocryphal additions.

259 f.), to be translated by Egyptian Jews into Greek, the legends of Susanna, and of Bel and the Dragon (cp Bevan, 45), which may very well have had an independent circulation,² had certainly not as yet been taken up into it. In fact, as late as the fifth century A.D. we have it on the authority of Polychronius that the Song of the Three Children was still absent alike from the Syriac version and from the original text. We cannot tell at what date it was that these apocryphal additions (which are contained in all the MSS that have reached us) were taken up into the Greek and the Syriac Daniel. In view of the great popularity of their contents, shown by the variety of the forms in which they are presented, we can only conjecture that they must have been adopted comparatively early (the book from the first was freely rendered rather than faithfully translated in the LXX), although the growth of the four different Syriac texts of Susanna (cp Wace, 230 f.) may have been later. The so-called genuine LXX text, which we possess in the Cod. Chisianus (Sw. 87) and (in Syriac) in a valuable Milan MS (cp Swete, Septuagint, vol. 3, p. ii f.) contains, of course, the additions just as fully as do the many MSS which give us Daniel in the text of Theodotion, already described above (§ 16) as a revision of the LXX. Swete (as above) has conveniently printed together the text of Theodotion, which obtained ecclesiastical sanction, and that of the LXX, which had lain in oblivion for almost fifteen centuries. Even if we suppose, with Schurer (*JRE*³ 1890), that the LXX text must have been in existence before the Daniel legend received new developments in Greek, we may safely assume that the additions to the Greek Daniel had been made before the beginning of the Christian era. The balance of probability is that they were not translated from any Semitic source, but were originally written in Greek (cp Pusey, Daniel, 378 f.). They are distinguished—as indeed is the LXX version of Daniel—from the Jewish Greek that prevails in the rest of the LXX by their purer and more elegant diction; another indication in the same direction is the well-known play upon Greek words in Susanna (iv. 54 f. 58 f., cp HOLMSTREE), which even Julius Africanus urged as proof of the spuriousness of the piece in his letter to Origen, who wished the narrative to be retained in the canon. As Protestants are in no way bound by the decree of the Council of Trent (cp Wace, Apoc. 1368 f.), which declares the apocryphal additions to be true history, and as we hardly require a full enumeration of reasons such as is given, e.g., by Reuss (Urs. II. II. ubi citat., 1894, 741 f.) in proof of the unhistorical character of the Susanna legend, we are able to approach without any prejudice the question as to the language in which it was originally written. It may be frankly conceded that in view of the small extent of the additions—plainly the work of a Hellenistic Jew (or Jews)—and in view of the fact that even in the case of a comparatively poor language it is always possible by free translation to imitate any play upon words whatever, we have not the means that would enable us to prove conclusively that the original language was Greek.

To estimate the additions correctly, we must consider their substance rather than their present Greek form. Without prejudice to the literary freedom which is manifestly presupposed by their present form and by the fact that the Susanna legend appears in several shapes (cp Salmon in Wace, p. xlvii), it is clear that they contain more or less of traditional matter, and, like the canonical book itself, cannot be regarded as pure invention. So long ago as 1832 Zunz (Gottesdienstl. Forts. 122 f.) called attention to the fact that traces are preserved in the Haggada of wonderful doings of a Daniel famous for his wisdom—e.g., the fight with the dragon, already mentioned, in Midrash Ber. Rab. par. 68 (in Wünsche's transl., Leipzig, 1881, p. 334). As for the position of the legend of the beautiful Susanna, whom Daniel (represented in v. 45 as a very youthful boy) saves from the false accusation of the two elders by his wise judgment, Theodotion, for the sake of the presumed chronological order, has placed it before Dan. I (though after chap. I would be more appropriate), while the LXX and Vg. on the other hand, place it as a thirteenth chapter after the twelve canonical chapters; Bel and the Dragon being a fourteenth. Daniel's wise judgment recalls i K. 315 ff.; but the lascivious old men recall still more Ahab and Zedekiah, the two adulterous false prophets living in Babylon and threatened by Jeremiah (cp Jer. 29:2-3 with Sus. iv. 57), about whom the Talmud and Midrash have so much to say. Brüll even thought that he had discovered the explanation of the flower-name Susanna in the Midrash Havvra Rabba, par. 19 (p. 129 in Wünsche's transl.), and Ball (Wace, 230) would tam have it that the piece is an anti-Sadducean 'tendency' writing. More likely is the connection suggested by Ewald (*GE*³ 463b) of the Susanna story with a Babylonian legend, an allusion to which occurs in the Koran (Sur. 2:20), of the seduction of two old men by the goddess of love.

While in Susanna Daniel, as his name implies, appears as a judge, he comes before us in the other two related pieces—Bel and the Dragon of Babylon (see 77: 2428)—which immediately follow in all MSS and editions, as the successful opponent of heathenism, distinguished for wisdom and piety. In the first of the two, Daniel convinces the king (called Cyrus only in Theod.) of the fraud practised by the priests of Bel, who pretended that their god was an actual living deity, while it was they themselves with their wives and families who consumed the food and drink offered to Bel. After the execution of the priests and the destruction of the helpless Bel and his temple (v. 22) we read (77: 2441) of further exploits of Daniel in Babylon. He subdued the invulnerable dragon (Job 41:18 [26] ff.) which they worshipped with divine honours, by throwing indigestible substances into its jaws, whereupon the king at the instigation of his enraged people caused the destroyer of their gods to be cast into the lions' den (cp Dan. 6); here he was divinely protected, and supported by food miraculously brought to him from the land of Judaea by the prophet Habakkuk (cp Ezek. 83). In § 87 (see Sw.) the superscription of the twofold narrative of Bel and the Dragon runs: 'From the prophecy of Habakkuk, the son of Jesai, of the tribe of Levi.' Here, doubtless, there is a reference to some Jewish prophetic legend, although only Theodotion calls this Habakkuk a prophet (see HABAKKUK). The only addition which, strictly speaking, supplements the canonical book of Daniel is the double hymn introduced after 3.23, consisting of 67 verses numbered in Greek and Vg. as 77: 24-93. The EV treats this entire section as one, headed 'The Song of the Three Children'; Luther, following the Vatican superscription, divides it into two, under the titles 'The Prayer of Azariah' and 'The Song of the Three Men in the Fiery Furnace'. The prayer named after Azariah (cp Dan. 17) is spoken in the name of the three friends; but its language is as general as if the entire Jewish people, oppressed and penitent, were speaking. After a brief connecting narrative relating their miraculous preservation from the devouring fire—a preservation regarded as an answer to Azariah's prayer—we have in 77: 52-93 the song of praise sung at the same time by all three together. This speaks of the deliverance from the fire only in the verse where they call upon themselves by name (77: 83), whilst the rest takes the form of a prolonged litany, reminiscent of Ps. 103: 20 ff. and still more of Pss. 136 118 and Eccles. 43, where in quite general terms all created things are summoned to praise the Lord.

DAN-JAAN (דָּן יָאָן): ΕΙΣ ΔΑΝ ΕΙΔΑΝ ΚΑΙ ΟΥΔΑΝ [B]. ΕΙΣ ΔΑΝ ΙΑΡΑΝ ΚΑΙ ΙΟΥΔΑΝ [A]. ΕΩΣ ΔΑΝ [L]; IN D V MILITAKI [Vg.], a place mentioned (2 S. 246) in a description of the limits of David's kingdom, after the 'Land of TAHTIM-HODSHI' (q.v.). Conder (Idibk. 408), following Schultz, identifies it with Dinān, a ruined place between Tyre and Akka, 4 m. N. of Achzib. That, however, is too far west. 'Dan' must be the historic Dan, and -jaan (for which Ges.'s pa'ar 'forest' is a poor conjecture; but see 6 Vg.) is plainly corrupt. To emend the text so as to read 'they went' to Dan, and from Dan they went round (יָבִיחוּ דָּן) to Zidon' (We., Dr., Ki., Bu.) is possible. It is better, however, especially if Klostermann is right in his emendation of Tahtim-hodshi, to change -jaan into we'ijyan, 'and (to) Ijon'; Ijon, like Kadesh, belonged to the territory of Naphtali. We should then continue, 'and they went round (יָבִיחוּ) to Zidon' (καὶ ἐκὶκλωσαν). Observe that Klostermann's emendation (יָבִיחוּ) is easier, and probably gives a better sense than that of Wellhausen and Driver. It is also proposed by Gratz.

DANNAH (דָּנָה; ΠΕΝΝΑ [B.V.]), a city of the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:49), mentioned between Socoh (Shuweikoh) and Delair. Suitable to this position is the modern Idhna, the Idōna of the OS, 6 m. SE. of Beit-Jibrin; the variation in the form of the name is a not unusual one (cp Ibiq and Bezek).

DAPHNE (ΔΑΦΝΗ [AV]), 2 Macc. 4:33. See ANTIOCH, 2, § 1.

DARIUS

DARDA (דָּרְדָּר), one of three wise men, sons of MATHAI, (the Chronicler differs; see ZERAI), compare with Solomon (1 K. 1:31 [5:11]). 6:27: ΔΑΡΔΑ [B]. ΤΟΝ ΔΑΡΔΑ [V]. ΔΑΡΔΑΕ [L]. In 1 Ch. 26 the name appears as Dara (δαρα [BA], darade [L]); but as it seems intended to be analogous in form to Chalec (χάλεικ), a second d is indispensable. The largest group of MSS of the OS read in 1 K. and 1 Ch. τον δαρδα (three cursives in 1 K. have τον δαρδαν (so Arm.). Pesh-Targ. and some MSS (Kemm.) support MT in both passages.

DARIC (דָּרִיכִים, דָּרִיכִים). RV 1 Ch. 29:7 etc. AV DRAM [q.v.].

DARIUS (דָּרְיֹוֹשׁ). Old Pers. Dārayavānš, Darayavānš Bab. Dariyamaš (vau); Sus. m Fariyamaš (vauš) Δαρ[ε]hoc [BNAQI. 87].

1. Darius the Mede, son of Ahasuerus, Dan. 6:1 [2:28 [29] 9:1 and 11:1 (καρπορ [BAQ—i.e., Theod.; 87—i.e., the LXX]. Δαρειος [Aq. Sym.]). The name is here applied in error to the conqueror of the new Babylonian empire. In Dan. 9:1 Ahasuerus is the father of Darius the Mede, who, we are informed (cp 11:1), 'was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans' after the death of Belshazzar. We are told of Darius that he was then (538 B.C.) sixty-two years old, from which it follows that Ahasuerus his father must have been a contemporary of Nebuchadnezzar. With this agrees Tob. 1:15, where it is said (but not by N*) that the population of Nineveh was deported by Nebuchadnezzar and Ahasuerus. All this proceeds upon a mistake. Nineveh was conquered by Cyaxares (Old Pers. Uvakhšātarā), the predecessor of Astyages, with the assistance of Nabopolassar (Nabū-pal-usar) the father of Nebuchadnezzar. In the list of Median kings one searches in vain for a name that can by any possibility be taken for that of Ahasuerus or Darius. Even if it be argued that Darius was indeed a Mede though nowhere called king of Media, we have to reckon not only with the notices given by the Greek historians but also with the Nabū-nā'id-Cyrus cylinder, from which it appears that Cyrus himself, immediately after the fall of the capital, ascended the throne of Babylon, and appointed to the governorship of the province of Babylon Gobryas (Old Pers. Gubaruva, Bab. Ugbaru or Gubaru), governor of Gutium, who, it would appear, was superseded, as king, by Cambyses the Persian. This Gobryas may very well have been the person who, seventeen years afterwards, joined forces with Darius Hystaspis against the pseudo-Smerdis. As governor of Gutium, which lay on the Median frontier, he may well have been called a Mede, and, as the ally of Darius, have been confounded with him. The name, however, of the father of Gobryas was Mardonius (Marduniya), not Nerses, and it is not to be supposed that Cyrus made such a political blunder as to entrust the control of so important a province as Gutium to a Mede. See DANIEL, BOOK OF, § 13.

2. Darius I. Hystaspis, king of Persia (521-485 B.C.), who allowed the Jews to rebuild their temple, is referred to in Ezra 4:5-24 5:5 6:1 Hag. 1:21 Zeck. 1:17, and probably in Neh. 12:22. His liberality towards the Jews is in complete accord with what we know otherwise of his general policy in religious matters towards the subject nations. He took the great Cyrus for his model, and contrasts strongly with Cambyses.

If Cambyses dealt the sacred Apis-bull of Memphis a mortal wound, Darius presented the city with a new Apis, and restored the temple of Annu-Ra at the oasis of El-Khargeh with great splendour. In Asia Minor and the islands of the Aegean, temples were indeed sometimes destroyed by his generals, especially where, as at Naxos and at Eretria (Herod. 6:97-101),

1. It is stated in Neh. 12:22 that the priests were registered under 'Darius the Persian'; the Levites (if we emend the text) till the period from Elishah to Jaddan. The text of 7:22 f. has passed through changes, probably through the reduction of the Chronicler. So Koster, Herod. 1-9. [For other views see Meyer, Introd. 105, and NEUBAUER, § 1.]

revenge was to be gratified; but he himself gave special orders to spare Delos, and also caused three hundred talents of incense to be burnt on the altars of Apollo and Artemis. If he discerned some affinity between Apollo and his own god Mithra, he may well have seen resemblance enough between Yahwe and Ahura-mazda to lead him to do homage to the god of Israel.

3. Darius III, Codomanus, the last king of Persia (1 Mac. 1:1). Cp. DANIEL, Book of, § 14; Ptolemy.

DATES (דָּתִים, 2 Ch. 31:5 AV; 1 V HONFV [p. 75]).

DATHAN AND ABIRAM (דָּתָן וְאַבִּירָם, meaning obscure; and אֲבִירָם, see ABIRAM), Kenites who led a revolt against Moses in the interval between the return of the spies and the final march towards Canaan.

In Nu. 16-17 the revolt of Dathan and Abiram is mingled and confused with another revolt, that of Korah.

1. The story. Consequently, it is difficult, indeed impossible, to interpret the narrative as it stands. There are sections of the narrative from which Korah disappears altogether. We have three causes for the revolt: impatience with the civil authority of Moses, discontent with the exclusive right of the Levitical tribe (as against Israel in general) to exercise priestly functions, and a desire on the part of the Levites who were not descended from Aaron to vindicate their equal right to the priesthood. These various motives are not combined, but appear in various parts of the narrative independently. The confusion reaches its highest point when we are told that the company of rebels who had already been swallowed up by the open earth were devoured by fire from Yahwe (cp. 16:33 with 35).

If, however, we turn to Dt. 11:6, we find the means of escaping from this confusion ready to our hand. 'There

2. In Deuteronomy. Moses begs the Israelites to remember what Yahwe their God 'did to Dathan and Abiram the sons of Eliab, the sons of Reuben; how the earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up and their households and their tents and every living thing that followed them, in the midst of all Israel.' From this passage, with which cp. Ps. 106:17, we might naturally conclude that the Deuteronomist had a text of early Israelite history before him, in which the revolt of Dathan and Abiram was mentioned without any reference to Korah, and the rebels, instead of being devoured by fire, were swallowed up alive by the earth.

We ask, therefore, if any such independent narrative of the revolt led by Dathan and Abiram can be extracted from the composite text of Nu. 16. The

3. Original narrative. answer must be given, and is in fact given by all recent scholars, in the affirmative. We have but to read 16:1b-24:12-15, 25, 29, 27b-32a, 33, 34 by themselves, in order to obtain an account which is nearly complete and is also consistent and intelligible. This is the history from which the Deuteronomist has borrowed his summary—from which he has taken not only his facts but also his words and phrases. That, however, is not all. The verses just mentioned form a literary unity. Their style is partly that of the Yahvist, partly that of the Elohist, whose allied works here, as elsewhere, have been combined by an editor into a whole. The rest of the narrative in ch. 16, is in the style of the priestly writer (P), a style so clearly marked and uniform that it cannot be mistaken. The Deuteronomist makes no allusion to the priestly narrative—for the simple reason that in his time it did not exist. One difficulty remains. In v. 1 On is mentioned as one of the rebels, but not a word is said of him in the sequel. Here in all probability the text is corrupt, and most scholars accept the emendation proposed by Grel [Grelch. Buch. 1, 80]. 'Dathan and Abiram, sons of Eliab, son of Pallu, son of Reuben.' The emendation is abundantly justified by a comparison of Gen. 16:1, 6-14 Nu. 26:5-12 Ch. 5:1.

When disentangled from the later priestly story of the rebellion of Korah, with which it was mingled

4. The old tradition. by the compiler of the Hexateuch, the old tradition is in substance as follows.

Dathan and Abiram belonged to Reuben, the oldest tribe, which had, however, forfeited its claim to the hegemony or primacy among the sons of Jacob (see the so-called Blessing of Jacob; Gen. 49:1-5). As Kenites, Dathan and Abiram resent the supremacy of Moses. When Moses bids them come up to judgment, they insolently refuse. They reproach him with his untitleness for rule. Instead of leading them into a land flowing with milk and honey, he has led them away from Egypt, which deserved to be so described, and has exposed them to the deadly perils of the wilderness. It is only by blinding the people that he can maintain his position. Moses, in answer, protests that he has neither done them any hurt nor robbed them of so much as an ass, and he begs Yahwe to pay no respect to their offering. These last words refer, apparently, to the sacrifice which every Israelite might offer for his household, and may be compared with Gen. 14:18, where the Yahvist tells us that Yahwe looked favourably on the offering of Abel but not on that of Cain. The writer is not thinking of any special priesthood, but simply takes for granted that Yahwe, whose favour was always sought by sacrifice, will not accept the offering of rebels against just authority. Thereupon Moses, accompanied by the elders of Israel, goes down to the tents of his opponents. He predicts the divine chastisement which will fall upon them, and his threat is fulfilled. The earth opens her mouth and Dathan and Abiram go down into Sheol, the receptacle of the shades; only, they, unlike other men, go down into it alive. Their wives and little ones perish with them.

We have made no attempt to distinguish between the work of the Yahvist and that of the Elohist. There

5. Redaction. are marks of style and expressions proper to the one and to the other, and again and again the same thing is mentioned twice. Kennen (Unt. § 8, n. 14) and Kittel (Hist. 1:24 n. 1) attribute the narrative of course after exclusion of P) as a whole to the Elohist, Cornill (Ent. 20), with better right, to the Yahvist. The frequent doublets show that two hands have been at work. We believe that Yahvist and Elohist told much the same story, and that the editor who combined their histories into one here made the Yahvist his basis, adopting at the same time some expressions from the Elohist. We cannot see any solid ground for Dillmann's belief that the Yahvist represented Dathan and Abiram as claiming the priesthood. He urges the words in v. 15, 'respect not thou their offering'; but such a curse, while all Israelites were allowed to sacrifice, might be naturally invoked against any enemy. The Yahvist makes little or no mention of a special priesthood, and though, no doubt, he was familiar with the institution, assuredly did not impugn the right of lay Israelites to offer sacrifice. The whole narrative now before us depicts a rebellion directed against Moses as a civil ruler. Had Dathan and Abiram claimed to exercise priestly functions we should have heard more about it. See KORAH.

DATHEMA (ΔΑΘΗΜΑ [A], -ΘΑΙΜΑ [S], -ΜΕΘΑ [V], Syr. ܕܐܬܝܡܐ in 1 Mac. 5:4; ΔΙΑΘΗΜΑ ΤΟ ΦΡΟΥΡΙΟΝ, Jos. Ant. xii 8-11), one of the strong places in Galilee to which the Jews had betaken themselves when threatened by Euthymus and his host. It was relieved, with great slaughter of the enemy, by Judas the Maccabee (1 Mac. 5:4 ff. 24 ff. 25 ff.).

DAUGHTER

Dathema has not been identified; from the description it must have lain between Bosra and Maspha (Möpel). The Syr. reading may be only a mistake for Danthea (Lew. Ital. 534); but within the distance from Bosra of a night's march (cp. Jos. Ant. 20.8.3) lies the modern Kemtheh, a considerable village and station on the (day) road (Daughity, Ar. Dec. 17).

DAUGHTER. The word 'daughter' (בַּת, bat) in EV often has Hebraistic senses, the chief of which are here mentioned:

1. Native Canaanite or Philistine women are 'daughters' of Canaan (Gen. 36.2) or of Philistia (2 S. 1.20).

2. 'Daughter' is a synonym for 'girl' or 'woman' (Gen. 30.13 Judg. 12.11) 'daughters' (Cant. 2.2-6); in addressing a person (Ruth 2.8 Ps. 130.1).

3. The population of a place, or the place and its population, may be called collectively a 'daughter'. A typical phrase is בְּנוֹת יְרוּשָׁלַם (Is. 38.10 etc.); lit. 'daughter of Zion', but, since the genitive is appositional, more correctly rendered 'people of Zion' (so sometimes in Sept.). So, too, 'daughter of Babylon' (Ps. 137.5) 'daughter of Egypt' (Jer. 46.10-14); also 'daughter of my people' i.e., my country-people (Is. 22.1 Jer. 4.6). A phrase which is generally synonymous is 'sons' (ben, inhabitants) of Zion, Babylon, etc. See 2DMG, 40.69; König, Synon., § 255.7.

4. Dependent towns may be called 'daughters'. Thus the 'daughters of Judah' in Ps. 48.11 (12) are the cities of Judah (cp. Genealogies, i. § 1). Cp. the use of 'mother' for a provincial capital in 2 S. 20.19. See Howe, Villages.

5. 'Daughter', like 'son', in combination with a noun, may also express some speciality of character or capacity. Examples of this are few in number. A 'daughter of Belial' is certainly a 'grossly wicked person' (1 S. 1.17). 'Daughter of troops' (בְּנוֹת חַיִּל; Mic. 5.6 [4.4]) is explained 'those who submit to attack'; but the text is doubtful. 'Daughters of music' (בְּנוֹת נָחַל; Eccl. 12.4) might be singing women; but others think that the sounds of music are thus figuratively described.

DAVID (דָּוִד, David; Δαυιδ [BAL.]). The name may be explained (1) as meaning 'beloved, a friend', NAB. 5. 56; or (2) as meaning 'paternal uncle,' if we pronounce דָּוִד (i.e., Dod), for which Gray (HP, 83) offers Semitic analogies, though the explanation is certainly 'at first sight unlikely'; or (3), best of all, as an abbreviation of Dodiel, which was perhaps the name of one of David's sons (see DANIEL, 1.4), or of Dodijah = Dobai (q.v.). See also Dodo.

The chronology of the life of David is most uncertain. We have elsewhere (see CHRONOLOGY, § 20.37) assumed 630 B.C. as the first year of the reign of Rehoboam. To accept the round number of forty years assigned to the reign of Solomon in 1 K. 11.42 and to that of David in 2 S. 5.4 and in 1 K. 2.11 as strictly historical, would be uncritical. The chronological statements referred to are, at most, editorial guesses which may, as good critics think, be not very far from the mark.² The early history also of David is in many respects uncertain. It intertwines to a great extent with the still obscurer record of his predecessor (see SAUL); and keen criticism is necessary to arrive at the kernel of fact which there undoubtedly is in the legends that have come down to us. Winckler indeed denies that there is such a kernel of facts in the romantic story of David's early vicissitudes. Such exaggerated distrust, however, appears to arise from a preconceived theory respecting David, and most critics hold strongly to the view that the imaginative element in the story of David is but the vesture which half conceals, half discloses, certain facts treasured in popular tradition. If it should appear that this imaginative element contains some details which we have allowed a warm place in our regard and it would pain us to miss from the history of Israel, we must comfort ourselves with the thought (1) that what remains unshaken becomes more precious than ever, and (2) that even pure legends are of great historical value for the characterisation of the age which produced them.

(a) First appearance.—The only ancestor of David known to early traditions was his father Jesse,¹ who was believed to have been a citizen of Bethlehem.² David was the youngest of his four³ sons (so 1 S. 17.14 [omits], cp. 16.5-9), and was sent to keep his father's sheep in the steppes of Judah. Such at least is the statement of one of our traditions, which, at any rate, has the merit of accounting for the agility, endurance, and courage, so constantly ascribed to David (cp. 1 S. 17.34 24.2 2 S. 17.9).

² See Kamphausen, Die Chronol. der hebr. Könige, 16 f.; cp. (c.v. David) St. GLT 1264.297. Wi. (GL 1174) questions this.

There, too, David is supposed to have acquired that skill in music (cp. Gen. 4.20 f.) which led to his first introduction to Saul, after which he became the king's armour-bearer and slew Goliath. This, however, is not in accordance with the older and more trustworthy account, which simply tells us that David was a valiant Israelitish warrior who happened to be also clever with his tongue and with his lyre, and who was sent for from Bethlehem (a feature borrowed, perhaps, from the other tradition, to charm away Saul's melancholy). Nor is the statement that the shepherd-lad slew Goliath the Philistine consistent with the plain and thoroughly credible, because unlegendary, tradition given elsewhere, that the slayer of Goliath was Elhanan, and the period of his exploit not in Saul's but in David's reign⁴ (see ELHANAN, GOLIATH). We must, therefore, if the superior antiquity and probability of a narrative are to count as recommendations, give up the more romantic of the two sets of statements respecting David's introduction to Saul and his early prowess. That he became Saul's armour-bearer and musician need not be disputed.

(b) Break with Saul.—Another point in which the ordinary view of the life of David needs rectification is the occasion which gave birth to Saul's jealousy of David. The MT of 1 S. 18.6 states that 'when David returned from the slaughter of the Philistines,' the women came out of the cities of Israel, singing, 'Saul hath slain

² The connection with Bethlehem has been rendered doubtful by Marg. (Psalm, 23 f.), who thinks that the belief in it arose from a false reading in 1 S. 20.25, where, for 'asked leave of me unto Bethlehem' (cp. DAVID) he reads (with Klo.) 'asked leave of me until the meal-time' (with lechem for both lechem)—a sound emendation. From the fact that David's sister AMIGAL (cp. q.v.) married a man of Jezreel (near Carmel in Judah, the native place of David's favourite wife Abigail), and that David himself took his first wife from that place (see AMIGAL), Marg. suspects that the hero's real home was further south than Bethlehem, perhaps at Arad. This view he supports by a plausible but unprovable conjecture, viz., that Shammah the Aradite (so he reads in 2 S. 23.25; see HARRITT)—i.e., the man of Arad—is Shammah, David's brother, and Ami Amiah b. Shobab the Aradite (2 S. 23.31; see HARRITT), was also a relation of David. Both these persons were enrolled among David's 'thirty.' The name of the home of David may conceivably have been forgotten, and (quite apart from 1 S. 20.28) a tradition such as that in 2 S. 23.14-17 may have suggested to narrators the choice of Bethlehem for his birthplace. This is probable. Cp. Winckler, Gen. 12.4.

³ A later tradition increased the number to seven (cp. Ch. 2.11 15) or rather eight (1 S. 16.10 f. 17.12 [B om.]). ⁴ The duplicate narratives of Saul's first meeting with David and of the slaying of Goliath respectively are:—
(a) 1 S. 16.14-23 17.1-18.4 (part), and
(b) 1 S. 17.1-18.4 (part), 2 S. 21.9.

On these passages what is most necessary has been stated by Dr. Introd. 160; cp. also the writers referred to in GOLIATH. WRS (OT, 433) finds some of the arguments for the existence of two opposite traditions as to David's introduction to Saul inconclusive. But there seems no strong objection to regarding the words וְהָיָה דָּוִד עִשְׂרֵי שָׁנִים 'who is with the sheep' in 1 S. 16.19 as a harmonising interpolation (see St. GLT 1224 n. 2; Bu. Ri. Sa. 213), and it seems unnatural to take the words of Saul's servant in 1 S. 16.18 proleptically. The true continuation of 1 S. 16.23 is not 17.1, but a lost description of David's early exploits (see above), which was followed by 18.6 (in a shorter form)—8a.

DAVID

his thousands and David his ten thousands,' from which (see v. 88) Saul inferred that the ambition of his spoiled favourite would not rest satisfied without the crown itself. It is certain, however, that MT does not give the original form of this passage. Whether the Hebrew text underlying the LXX contained the words 'when David returned, etc.', and the clause at the end of v. 8, is a point on which critics differ. Even if, as Budde supposes, the LXX translator, to produce a simpler narrative, omitted these clauses, it is not denied by that critic that the former clause is an editorial insertion;¹ it was not, therefore, the slaughter of Goliath by the shepherd lad that (according to the tradition) made Saul suspect that David nourished hopes of becoming king.

This, however, is merely a negative statement. What was it, we may ask, that, according to the best analysis of chap. 17, aroused the jealousy of Saul? To the present writer, as well as to Stade and Wellhausen, r S. 186 (with the omission of the reference to Goliath) seems to presuppose some account of David's early exploits as a warrior which stood in no connection with the story of Goliath, and indeed was removed by the editor to make room for it. It was these early exploits of a trained warrior that excited the jealousy of Saul, but (since v. 86-11, which $\mathfrak{G}^b$ omits, are derived, like v. 17-19, which also $\mathfrak{G}^b$ omits, from another source) did not suggest the thought of David's wish for the crown. This is no doubt psychologically intelligible. Saul could not bear the sight of his too popular armour-bearer, and so he transferred him to a post which would remove him from his own immediate presence. The tradition adds that this served to promote David's interests. Even Michal, Saul's daughter (see MICHAL, EGLAH, HUKRAM), fell under his fascination, and her jealous father resolved to put the young captain on a perilous enterprise, promising him his daughter's hand in return for the customary proofs of victory, but secretly hoping that he would never return. David went forth, slew a hundred Philistines, and won his wife;² but the anxiety of Saul went on increasing after such a manifest proof of the divine protection of David.

This is certainly an improvement upon the ordinary view which treats chap. 18 as a homogeneous narrative; but who can assert that this view of the facts produces the impression of being perfectly historical? It will be noticed that we have laid no stress on the song of the women (187). The fragment is indeed clearly ancient; but it seems best understood as coming from a time when David was already king. This, however, is not the most important point. We need a narrative of still greater simplicity and verisimilitude. It is, as Stade remarks,³ more credible that Saul gave his daughter in marriage to David of his own accord, in order to bind the young hero to the family of his benefactor, and that Saul's jealousy broke out after, not before the marriage. Besides, it would be inconsistent in Saul, first, to send David away as a captain of a thousand (1813), and then to bring him back to the court as the king's son-in-law. For this position had attached to it the captaincy of the body-guard (see r S. 2214, $\mathfrak{G}^{bav}$), which gave its holder a rank next to Alner the general (r S. 2025), so that Saul would be continually liable to fresh irritation from the sight of David. We cannot, however, positively assert that Stade's correction of the tradition brings us face to face with facts, and must be content to believe that the early story of David's life is not altogether a popular fiction, without insisting too much on the most romantic and interesting, and therefore least certain, parts of it. One of these least certain parts is the account of David's early relations with MICHAL (17-19).

¹ See Budde's interesting analysis, as embodied in SBOT, Heb. edition. This critic seems to hold that the Goliath-story was originally closed by a description of the festal rejoicing which greeted the returning warriors and especially David, and that the same document then went on to relate the terror with which David's success inspired Saul, the king's removal of David to a high military post, and the episode of Merab. For Stade's view, see SAUL § 10.

DAVID

(i) Early late narratives.—On the episode of Saul's broken promise of Merab as a wife for David (r S. 1817-19) it is unnecessary to dwell. The story, as all agree, interrupts the original context of chap. 18, to which the insertion has been clumsily fitted by an interpolation in v. 16. We have here, therefore, a notice drawn from a distinct source. The language of vv. 17 and 19 seems to presuppose the story of David and Ishbath (17-25) speaks of the king's promise of his daughter, and the whole narrative implies that David is as yet a mere lad, too young in fact to marry. It might of course be historical in spite of its close connection with the highly imaginative story. Since, however, Michal, not Merab ($\mathfrak{G}^b$, however, has Merab), appears in 2 S. 21 as the mother of Adriel's children, it is more than probable that the whole episode of Merab rests on a confusion of names. In short, we have two variants of the same tradition, and the form given in 1 S. 20 ff. is the more likely to be historical.

Nor need we pause long on some other late narratives. (ii) The account of Samuel's solemn consecration of David as king in r S. 16-17 has evidently not a historical but a religious motive. To devout readers the 'from according to God's mind' would have seemed to be disparaged if he had not, equally with his predecessor, been anointed by Samuel. (iii) The episode of David's visit to the prophetic community at Ramoth (19-24) is an attempt, in the style of the midrash, to explain the proverb, 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' On this, as well as on (i), see SAUL 11, n. 84. (iv) The pretended madness of David at Gath (21-19) see ACUSATION. To these we should, not inconsiderably, add (v), a part of the story of David and Bathsheba (see BATHSHEBA).

Let us now resume the thread of the narrative. David was at first known to the servants of Saul as a brave warrior and a skilled musician, and also as clever of speech and comely in person. Whatever he did seemed to prosper, for he had not only unusual abilities, but also a power of fascination which seemed a special sign of the divine favour (cp 1 S. 452). His prowess in the war against the Philistines marked him out as one worthy to be the king's friend. He was, in fact, rewarded, first of all with the position of a royal armour-bearer, and then with the hand of Saul's daughter, Michal. For a time all went well. In the intervals of military service he played on his harp, and by his skill in music chased away the 'evil spirit' of melancholy, which already threatened to mar the king's career. Saul's gratitude, however, was not proof against the severe trial to which it was exposed by David's growing popularity, and, it would seem, by his close intimacy with Jonathan. The heir to the throne had, like Michal, passed under the spell of David, and become his devoted friend, probably his sworn brother,² and the disturbed mind of the king conceived the idea that Jonathan had stirred up David to be his father's enemy, in the expectation (we must suppose) of succeeding him as king (228). Saul brooded over this idea, and even reasoned with his son on the folly of supposing that his crown, if he came by these unholy means to wear it before the time, would be secure from such a powerful and ambitious subject as David (2031). Hence, tradition reports, Saul 'spoke to Jonathan his son, and to all his servants, that they should slay David' (191), and even sought, in a fit of frenzy, to pierce David with his javelin (1815). ($\mathfrak{G}^b$ omits) 196). Whether it was due to Jonathan's influence that the final breach between Saul and David was averted, we cannot tell; the story in 19-17 seems really another version of that in chap. 20. It is equally uncertain whether the story in 19-17 has any claim to represent the closing scene in David's life at Gibeah. There are difficulties in regarding it as the true sequel to 18-16. It may possibly come from another source,³ and refer

¹ This is the view expressed in EB 99, art. 'David.' WRS there emphasises the fact that the episode of Merab (including v. 21), like the section of chap. 17 to which it specially refers, is wanting in $\mathfrak{G}^b$, the text represented by which he regards as superior to that of MT in chaps. 17-19 (cp OT/OT 4317).

³ Verse 10 should end at 'escaped,' and v. 11 should begin, 'And it came to pass that night that Saul sent' (so $\mathfrak{G}^b$, but not L).

DAVID

to a slightly later period in David's life. The daring spirit of that hero might prompt him to visit his wife, even after his first flight,¹ or at least the first reciters of the tale may have meant it to be so understood. There remains the story in chap. 20, which (putting aside the opening words as a misleading editorial insertion, and 10:4-7 as an expansion, due to an early editor² who loved the theme of Jonathan's friendship, for David) evidently gives a traditional account of the rupture between Saul and David. Whether it is historical, however, is quite uncertain. There were, of course, gaps in the tradition, especially as regards the earlier period of David's life. Two great facts were certain, viz., the transformation of Saul's original kindness towards David into its opposite, and the firm friendship between David and Jonathan. Out of these facts the reciters of legends, aided by a traditional acquaintance with the general circumstances of the time, had to produce the best detailed account of David's flight from Saul that they could.

As was natural, David turned his steps southward. In the hill-country of Judah he would find hiding-places enough, and if the army of Saul threatened to reach him even there, he could easily seek the hospitality of some one of the neighbouring peoples. This, it is true, would be most displeasing to a worshipper of Yahwe (see 20:16); but it must have already occurred to David as a possibility, for he soon afterwards placed his father and mother under the protection of the king of Moab (22:1 f.; see MOAB). At present,³ his first impulse was to fly with his men to the sanctuary at Nob, or perhaps rather Gibeon (see Nob, where he had already, it would seem, had occasion to consult the priestly oracle (22:13). On his arrival, so the tradition declares, he obtained bread, by a plausible but fictitious story, from the consecrated table, and, as a pledge of victory in the king's 'business,' the mighty sword of Goliath (see GOLIATH, § 3). We can hardly venture to accept this account as correct;⁴ it is most probably a later writer's attempt to fill up a gap in the old tradition. Whatever took place, it is certain that David very soon hastened on to the fortified hill-town of Achish. Here he was still in his native land, though probably not among Israelites (see ACHISH); he could worship his own god, and might hope to be safe from his pursuers. In the fort (not the cave) of Achish he was joined by his family, and by a small band of fellow-outlaws (about 400 in number). Meantime Doeg, the Edomite, who had seen David conversing with the priest Ahimelech at Nob (or Gibeon), had reported the circumstance with details, which may or may not have been his own invention,⁵ to Saul, and the king inferred from the report that Ahimelech had used the sacred oracle in support of treasonable designs of David. It is only his rooted belief in David's treason that excuses the fierceness with which Saul destroyed, not only the eighty-five priests,⁶ but also the entire population of the city of Nob or rather Gibeon (22:18 f.); see GIBEON, DOEG, ABIAHAR, BAN. He also indicated the expulsion of David from the royal family by giving Michal, David's wife, to a new husband (see MICHAL).

David now became a captain of freebooters, levying

³ It is incredible that David should have passed by the sanctuary without 'inquiring of Yahwe,' nor does the reference to the 'sword of Goliath' in line 15 much to accept the rest of the story. That the words assigned to Saul in 22:8 rightly express the king's belief is, however, more than probable.

⁴ It is certainly not impossible that David did take the opportunity of consulting the sacred oracle. The reference to the sword of Goliath in 22:8 is interpolated (see Budde).

4. An outlaw. or other enemies. We have an attractive and sympathetic sketch of his conduct, and of his generous spirit which softened the harsher details, in chap. 25. Besides the means of subsistence, David looked, of course, for timely warning of the approach of his bitter enemies. In this way he held his ground manfully (with the support of the priest Abiathar) against almost overwhelming odds, trusting that he was being preserved for high ends. He must have felt that not only he could provide Israel with the leader that needed, though to work directly towards the attainment of the crown would have been contrary to his loyal nature. One point in his favour there was, the value of which can hardly be overrated, viz., the peculiar conformation of the hill-country of Judah. It is necessary for the untravelled student to form by books and photographs some idea of those 'tossed and broken hills' where the valleys are all alike, and large bodies of men may camp near each other without knowing it. Magnus Conder goes even further, and claims that through recent identifications the narrative assumes a consistency which traditional sites have destroyed. From Gibeon (Gib'at near Mukhris) David flies southward to Nob, thence down the great valley to Gath (Tell es-Sa'idi) from Gath he returns into the land of Judah, the bounded by the Shephelah, most of which seems to have been in the hands of the Philistines; and on the edge of the country between Achish and Saul, Philistines and Judah, he collects his band into the strongest spot to be found in the neighbourhood of the rich cornland of Judah. At the advice of the seer he retires to the hills, and if my identification of Hareth be correct, it is but a march of 4 m. distance. Here, as at Achish, he was also within easy reach of his family at Bethlehém. At Haras he hears that the Philistines, whose advance he probably barred when holding Achish, had invaded Keilah immediately beneath him, and it is this proximity alone which accounts for his attack upon the marauders.¹ There can be no doubt that exact identifications of the sites referred to would give the narrative of David's outlaw-period a greater approximation to consistency. But this able explorer's identifications are too often (like that of Gath above) unproven, and he has, on principle, omitted to take account of the composite character of the biblical narrative.²

We left David at Achish; we next find him before another fortified town (1 S. 23:1-3), called Keilah (קַיִלָּה), of which Abiathar was perhaps a native (see GIBEON). His hope was to secure the gratitude of the inhabitants by chastising the Philistines who were besieging it. Supported by an oracle, he attacked and defeated those most dangerous of foes. He was disturbed, however, by another oracle, warning him that the men of Keilah would surrender their benefactor to Saul. The king was, in fact, on his way with his whole fighting force, and David would sooner trust himself to the intricacies of the wilderness than to the 'bolts and bars' of Keilah. Whether David really went from the 'forest of Hareth' to Keilah, is highly uncertain. The anecdote in 23:1-3 is not necessarily the sequel of the connected narrative in 21:1-22. Nor can we assume (with Conder) that the generous action related in chap. 24 took place immediately before the events described in chap. 25; for, as critics agree, the narrative is but a duplicate of the traditional story given in a better form in chap. 26.³ If we ask how much of the details of these hairbreadth escapes is historical, the reply must be equally disappointing to literarists. The central facts of the stories are all that we can safely rely upon. Such a detail, for instance, as the meeting of David and Jonathan in the wilderness of Ziph (23:16-17) is obviously an innocent piece of romance; in fact it is but another version of the favourite story of the 'covenant' between the friends. Nor can we venture to assume that, if David once, in accordance with a chivalrous rule still common in Arabia, spared the life of his sleeping foe, either he or Saul displayed that delicacy of sentiment which a later age attributed to them.

³ That the story in chap. 26 is more original than that in chap. 24 is obvious. The conversation which it gives is full of antique and characteristic ideas, wanting in chap. 24. That David is recognised by his voice is meaningless in 24:16 (p. 75 B), but appropriate in 26:17. See Bib. Res. 227 f.; and cp. Che. Ant., 12-12.

Strangely enough, the two accounts of David's generosity towards Saul are the setting of a perhaps more completely historical story—that of David and Nabal (chap. 25). The portrait of David here given is less idealistic, but seems much more truthful than that in chaps. 24 and 26. Not less interesting is the sketch of Abigail. To her it was that David owed his avoidance of blood-guiltiness. To her, too, he was indebted for the improvement which took place in his social status. As the husband of Abigail, he was no longer a mere freebooter, but the wealthy head of a powerful Calebite family, and so took one step forward towards his ultimate enthronement at Hebron as king of Judah.¹

How long David remained in the Calebite district of Carmel, we do not know. He is next introduced as despairing of being able to hold out any longer against his foe; 'there is nothing better for me,' he said, 'than speedily to escape into the land of the Philistines' (27:1). So he placed himself and his 600 at the disposal of Achish, king of Gath. All at ease, however, among the Philistine chieftains, he induced his new suzerain to give him as a residence the outlying town of Ziklag. Here he still maintained amicable relations with his friends in Judah, and though he craftily professed to be engaged in raids against the Negeb of Judah, he was in reality more honourably employed (see ACHISH, AMALEK, § 3).

At length, in the second year, a change in his relation to Achish became imminent. The Philistine lords, who had probably long been suspicious of his intentions, refused to let David join them in their campaign against Saul. David on his side professed eagerness to fight for Achish; but we are not bound to take his words too literally. Historians, it is true, differ in their view of David's conduct. It seems psychologically probable, however, that David was only too glad to be sent back by Achish to Ziklag, with a charge not to cherish revengeful thoughts against his friendly suzerain (1 S. 29:10, 31). A picture, Homeric in its vividness, is given of the effect produced on David and his men by the sight that met them at Ziklag, which the cruel Amalekites had plundered (30:3-4). An oracle encouraged David to pursue his foes. He came up with them, and chastised them severely. The account closes with a list of the towns in Judah, to which David sent politic gifts. His ambitious plans were no doubt maturing.

Meantime Saul had fallen on Gilboa and Israel was in a state of chaos. The Philistines were masters of the fertile lowlands of Jezreel and the Jordan, but disinclined to interfere with the poorer country of Judah. There were some even in northern Israel who thought that David and David alone could help them, and among these were probably the men of Jabesh-gilead, to whom he sent graciously expressed thanks for their chivalrous rescue of the bodies of Saul and his sons (2 S. 25:7 cp 31:7). David,

¹ Wi. (GI, 1:25) sees underlying the Nabal-story a tradition that David was 'prince of Caleb' (a tribe or district), and, following C. Niebuhr, he even finds this title in 2 S. 38, where, according to EV, Abner says, 'Am I a dog's head?' but where Wi. renders, 'Am I the prince of Caleb?' (257). Marquart's theory (see above, § 1, note 2), that David was really a man of S. Judah, might be used to corroborate Wi.'s opinion. In any case, the facts on which Marquart's theory is based illustrate this period. See DOUG, § 3 (5).

DAVID

however, was content to let Abner have his way, and attempt to consolidate the weakened royal authority in the North, nominally for Saul's incapacitated son, Ishbaal. For the present, David transferred his residence, in obedience to an oracle, to Hebron, placing his men in the neighbouring towns or villages. The elders of Judah took the hint, and solemnly acknowledged him as their king.

It was not a grand position. As king of Judah, David was no less a vassal of the Philistines than when he was only lord of Ziklag; indeed, he still retained Ziklag. This only shows his caution, however, not his want of independence. Even Abner could not venture to let the puppet king Ishbaal revolt from the Philistines;² rest was the last need both of Israel and of Judah. We cannot, however, suppose that David and his kin were idle. It is, on the whole, probable that the conquest of the Jebusite fortress of Zion belongs to the period of David's tribal kingship,³ and not (as is generally supposed) to the commencement of his enlarged sovereignty. When the Philistines made that bold attempt to seize David which is related in 2 S. 5:17, David, we learn, took refuge in 'the stronghold.' It is difficult to suppose that a different 'stronghold' is meant from that mentioned in 27:79 (which there is reason to assign to the same document). The Philistines themselves are uncertain where they will find David; clearly then David had more than one place of residence. We are also told that they 'came up' to seek David, and spread themselves out in the valley of Rephaim near Jerusalem. It is true that where the narrative 2 S. 5:6-9 is placed, it seems to have reference to the beginning of David's kingship over Israel. Probably, however, something has fallen out before v. 6. The lost passage presumably referred to David's removal of his residence to Jerusalem; the narrative which has been preserved explains how the king and 'his men' possessed themselves of the all but impregnable fortress.

By this important conquest David secured his position from all possible enemies, whether Philistine or Israeli. He also doubtless hoped to make Zion what it ultimately became—the capital of united Israel. We may assume that this caused uneasiness to Abner, who doubtless had dreams of a reunited Israel under the sceptre of a descendant or kinsman of Saul. These dreams must have been rudely interrupted by the news of David's success. Abner well understood what the conquest of Zion portended, and it was natural that he should seek to counteract David's ambition. He had no occasion to form an elaborate plan of operations; he had but to allow the unsleeping jealousy of Israel and Judah to display itself. There would be constant border hostilities, and Judah, as the weaker of the two, would (he must have hoped) be reduced to vassalage to Israel, and in time perhaps incorporated into the kingdom. A 'very sore battle' is reported between the men of Ishbaal and those of David by the pool of Gibeon. It began with a mere sham fight; but such a contest could not be expected to end without bloodshed, and Abner must have foreseen this when he and the men of Ishbaal set out from Mahanaim (2 S. 2:12-17). The result was disastrous for the cause of Ishbaal, and year after year the war was renewed with constant loss of prestige to the house of Saul. Fierce private passions, too, added to the horrors of the time (see ABNER; ISHTHBAAL, 1; JOAB, 1). At length, Ishbaal being removed, David stood alone, sad but confident, for who else could be thought of in this hour of need? Had he not in the olden time been Israel's leader against the Philistines, and was he not by marriage a member of

² See Kamph. Z. ITH 643-97 1884; Ki. Hist. ii. The older view (see St.) was that Abner upheld the banner of Israel against the Philistines; but Kamph. shows at great length that the evidence will not justify this.

DAVID

Saul's house (2 S. 5:23-31-36)? So the elders of Israel accepted the inevitable, and anointed the son of Jesse king over Israel.

David was now, according to it not very early tradition,¹ in his thirty-eighth year, seven and a half years had elapsed since he first became king at Hebron. His training had been long and varied, and he might now fairly hope to finish the work which

Saul had begun, and remove for ever the danger of Philistine invasions. The Philistines knew what they had to expect from the new king of 'all Israel and Judah,' and lost not a moment in 'seeking him.' They felt towards him as the Syrian king felt towards Alab; if he were only slain or captured, the title of Israel was settled. They knew, too, the rapidity of his movements, and sought to capture him before he could retire into his newly-won stronghold of Zion. They were too late for this, and challenged him to battle in the valley of Rephaim westward from Jerusalem (2 S. 5:17-25; cp BAAL-PERAZIM). Two great victories are said to have been won on this occasion by David. We have also a record of individual exploits and of personal dangers run by David in 2 S. 21:15-22 23:1-7 (see ISITH-RENON, etc.), which must, it would seem, have stood originally close to 56-12 17-25. It is singular that this should be almost all that is told us respecting what, if entirely David's work, would be the greatest of all his achievements. One more notice indeed has come down to us (2 S. 8:1); but it is tantalisingly short. It states that David smote the Philistines and subdued them, and took 'something of importance' out of the hand of the Philistines.² The Chronicler thinks that what David 'took' was 'Gath and its towns' (1 Ch. 18:1), and this is certainly plausible, for deeds of high renown were performed near Gath (see ELHANAN, 1), and afterwards we find 600 men of Gath in David's service (2 S. 15:18; see below, § 11). It is more probable, however, that Ashdod was the city spoken of in the true text (see MÉRHEG-AMMAN). Still it is doubtful whether such a total defeat of the Philistines as the passage just quoted ascribes to David, is historical. That the Israelites were delivered from the dread of these foes is indisputable; but that David broke the power of the Philistines is not probable. It is a reasonable conjecture that the deliverance of the Israelites was helped either by an Egyptian, or by a Musrite (N. Arabian) intervention.³ Moreover, the friendly terms on which David appears to have stood with the Philistines at a later time suggest that he had made a treaty of peace with this people on conditions equally honourable to both sides, one of which, as we have elsewhere seen reason to think, was the restoration of the ark (see ARK, § 5).

However this may be, David was certainly not deficient in the qualities of a general. This is plain from his wise measures on the rebellion of Absalom, of which we have very full particulars. His other wars, with neighbours only less dangerous than the Philistines, may be conveniently referred to here. We have a summary of them in the same section that refers to the subduing of the Philistines (2 S. 8:1-14, cp 1 S. 11:47, and see SAUL, 1 § 3), and further information respecting the Ammonite war in 2 S. 10:11-12 24:31. It is important, however, to study these notices critically, both from a purely literary, and from a historical, point of view. The two points of view, it is true, cannot be kept very long apart. A preliminary literary analysis, however, will quickly show us that in 2 S. 8:1-14 we are dealing, not with an original historical, but with a panegyric made up from various sources, containing strong traces of editorial work.

to 2 S. 10 the case is not at first sight so clear. A further investigation reveals here, too, the hand of the editor. The contents also must be criticised, and will greatly clear up the problems of literary and historical criticism. The historical results of the whole process are not unimportant.⁴

(a) Moab.—Little enough is told us of David's war with the Moabites (cp MOAB); but that little is suggestive. With cold-blooded precision the conqueror destroyed two-thirds (such is the meaning of 2 S. 8:2) of the fighting force of Moab. The description seems to imply that it was an act of national retaliation, and the offence which caused this may be plausibly conjectured. The kingdom of Israel, as Kamphausen has shown, by no means so powerful as the early writers supposed. The defeat on Gilboa had brought the Israelites to the verge of ruin, and Saul's feeble successor had to maintain, not only with the Philistines, but also with Moabites and the Ammonites, to whom his capital Mahanaim, was only too accessible. It is probable that both Moab and Ammon granted him peace only on insulting conditions, and we can form some idea of the insults that were possible in such circumstances from 1 S. 11:2 2 S. 10:4. David of course had to give to insolent neighbours a lesson.

(b) Ammon.—Passing on to the Ammonites, notice that, if there is a doubt as to the degree of severity of their punishment (2 S. 12:1), there is none to the gravity of their offence (2 S. 10:1-5). The account of the details of the war requires very careful criticism. The conduct of the host of Israel was entrusted to Joab, and it was owing to the politic self-restraint of general that David in person stormed the Ammonite capital, and carried away the crown of the idol Milcom (see AMMON, § 8). The difficulty of the narrative is caused by the statements which it contains respecting the Aramean allies of the Ammonites and successes which David gained over them.⁵ Was Zolab mentioned in 2 S. 10:6 (undoubtedly an anachronism) as joining with Beth-rehob to send help to Ammonites, a powerful kingdom N. of Damascus, which all Aram W. of the Euphrates was subject to (2 S. 10:6), or was it a small state near the land of Ammon, which on various grounds agrees with our expectations? If the latter view be adopted, we must regard 2 S. 10:15-19 as a late editorial insertion, akin to the much edited passage 8:1-8, and that we know respecting David's relations to Arameans is that Joab routed the forces sent by them to help the Ammonites, so that they 'feared to help Ammonites any more' (2 S. 10:13 19b). The statement of 8:6, in itself so improbable, that David annihilated Damascus, is due to a misreading of a passage which appears over again in 7:14. The editor, by mistake, read 'Aram' instead of 'Edom,' and then interpreted 'Aram' as 'Aram-Damascus.'⁶

(c) Edom.—Lastly we come to the war with Edom, which, as we are told in 2 S. 8:11, was incorporated into David's kingdom. We are left entirely ignorant as to the cause of the war,⁷ and know next to nothing of the details, though the conquest of such a small region would have been well worth describing. A general

(ii) The list of heroes in 2 S. 23 enumerates 'the Three' zār šēpār; 4 MACH (3) ELIŠAR (1) and SHAMMAH (1); then follow Abishai and Benahai, who occupy an intermediary position; and finally, the hero who occupies the thirty-seventh in a list of 40. There is some difficulty in assigning this number (see ELIKA, 19170111, 2), and the numerous textual corruptions preclude complete certainty as to their names and origin (besides the special articles of Ying. Fund. 75 p. 1).

The heroes seem to have been originally arranged in pairs according to their homes; thus, M. harai and Heleb from N. gadiah (22, 24), two from Iattir (15), one each from the neighbouring places of Prathon and Geshi (30, 31). It is noticeable that they are almost wholly of Benjamite and Judean origin, and this supports the conclusion that the list in the main refers to the early days of David's life (p. 69, cf. 1 S. 23, 17), before his supremacy was spread over the rest of Israel. Note the head of David's guard, and how he apparently reached the position he holds in 2 S. 8, 14 (see below). The omission of Joab as the holder of any official position is remarkable, and suggests that he had not yet become 'captain of the host', though the references in 77, 18 (Abi-hai, the father of the host), 1 p. 7, 24, 37 seem to show that he was not unknown. It is highly probable that the whole chapter was its present form to a comparatively late editor (cf. Kne. U. m. i. 2, § 2, p. 11).

(u.) In 1 Ch. II the same list is substantially repeated—in a few cases with better readings—and a few names occur in 1 Ch. II 27:1-4 (see below, § 1.1 i.). Verses 1-4 of 1 Ch. II 27:1-4 add sixteen other heroes, who, to judge from the gentilia (often doubtful, see MAHAYITE, MIKAYATHI, MITNATHI) are partly of east-Jordanic origin. The authenticity of these names is a difficult question. They may have proceeded from a source common to both compilations (see Kue. Zeit. 12, § 10, n. 1); but the mention of Reubenites, and the preponderating proportion of theophorous names as well as the relative lateness of such names as Jasiel, Jeiel, Josphaviah in this chapter, render their genuineness open to question.

(iii.) Further lists of warriors are found in 1 Ch. 12, which enumerates those who came to David (a) at Ziklag (1-22), and (b) at Hebron (2: ff.). (3) The latter is purely fabulous. It represents the warriors as assembling from all the tribes (not ex-honest and vigorous ruler both in peace and in war, the evidence given above sufficiently shows. In after-times his name became the symbol of a righteous ruler (Jer. 23, 34, and further criticism of the records has only confirmed the eulogy given to David by Robertson Smith in 1877: that his administration of justice 'was never stained by selfish considerations or motives of personal animosity.'¹ Nor does he deserve to be blamed for his cruelty to Israel's foreign enemies, when we consider the imperfect development of the idea of morality in his time, and the fate that would have been in store for himself and his people, had the conquerors and the conquered changed places. The doubtless thought it absolutely necessary to compel Israel's cruel and malicious neighbours; to the Edomites at his own door he was gentle;² compare him with Sargon or Ashur-bani-pal, in whom cruelty was joined to the lust of conquest, and how great is his moral superiority! Nor can we easily admit a doubt as to the genuineness of his religion. He lived in the fear of God, according to the standard of his times.

¹ The modifications introduced into this narrative both by the author of the gloss in 7, 13 and by the Chronist (1 Ch. 17) are interesting evidence of the constant recasting of old material carried on by the editors. See SAUVET, II, § 5; and cf. We. l. rel., I, 1, 177.

² ḥarṣūt and ḥarṣūt were sometimes confounded (see 1 Ch. 11:15, 12:18, Var. Bib.). Klo. prefers ḥarṣūt (cp 11. on Ex. 14:7). At any rate such a term as 'the thirty' would soon become conventional (see 2 S. 23:39). Cp CHAMBERLAIN, § 10.

Klo., Kl., Bu. It seems doubtful whether David had really had any prolonged or bitter strife with the Philistines.

The generous elevation of David's character is seen most clearly in those parts of his life where an inferior nature would have been most at fault—in his conduct towards Saul (with which the story of REPHAIH is in no way inconsistent), in the blameless reputation of himself and his band of outlaws in the wilderness of Judah, in his repentance (which we so greatly desire to believe) under the rebuke of Nathan, and in his noble and truly religious bearing on the revolt of Absalom, the accuracy of the account of which is guaranteed by the antique elements which it contains. His unflinching insight into character, and his power of winning men's hearts and touching their better impulses, appear in innumerable traits of the history (e.g., 2 S. 14:1-20; 3:1-5; 23:15-17). His knowledge of men was the divination of a poet rather than the acquired genius of a statesman, and his capacity for rule stood in harmonious unity with his people by song? The old tradition knows him as a musician (1 S. 16:4-5); late editors of the psalms, but not Amos, may must have supposed ²¹), as a poet. Several poems, too, are ascribed to his authorship in the Books of Samuel, and those who inserted them had a very definite belief on the subject (see SAMUEL, n. § 7). One

4) It would be a strange exception to this rule if out of pure inadvertence David urged his son Solomon to put certain persons who had injured him to death (1 K 2: 29). Three answers may be given to this charge. (1) If David spoke in his state these words, it was because he feared to leave Judah, should heeding unrepentant and Shimei's solemn curse unheeded, by the death of the offenders: continued enmity would, words as ribbed. (2) David supply a vigour of mind and a regard permit us to assume in a dying king. After neglecting to communicate with the elders of Israel and Judah respecting his successor to the throne, it is not likely that David's mental powers suddenly rallied, so as to enable him to make this foolish and even eloquent speech. (3) The text is precisely one of the occasions on which a narrator was likely to invent. Solomon needed to be excused to unfriendly readers for having put Ishb and Shimei to death. The excuse (which in the narrator's view was perfectly valid) could best be given by introducing it into a last speech of David.

² The allusion is to Aramath, or rather Adonijah, as the name should probably be read. See ARAMATH.

[illegible]

David to be more nearly a saint than he appears to us in almost any part of the Chronicler's biography.

The effects of David's sin lasted to the close of his life, for the undue influence of Bathsheba is conspicuous in the sad story of the competition for David's crown. Even apart from this, however, the royal princes could not but display the faults due to their birth and education. The narrative is imputably exact. We shudder at the brutal passion of Amnon, and the shameless counsel of the wily Jonadab. If a brilliant suggestion of Ewald may be accepted, we see the 'intransigent expression,' or in plain English the black scowl that for two long years rested on the face of Absalom,¹ and the name of the court when the blow was struck, and Amnon was assassinated in the midst of his brethren. Not less valuable psychologically is the graphic description of Absalom's untimely revolt (see AUSAROM, 1).

On the tragic death of the popular favorite, better thoughts were turned to David's people, who brought themselves of the many occasions on which he had saved them from their enemies. The men of Judah, however, took the opportunity of putting forward that claim to precedence (2 S. 19:41-44) which the king's policy had steadily ignored, and a rupture ensued between north and south, which, but for Joab's energy, might have led to a second and more dangerous rebellion (see, however, SHULY, 11). After this nothing seems to have occurred to trouble the peace of the kingdom. David did not many more years to live, for Absalom's rebellion must have occurred near the last decade of his father's life (Kittel, ibid. 2:173). The closing scene in the biography (1 K. 1:1-21a) represents David as derelict and bedridden, and an easy prey to the intrigues of Solomon. The unifying account of the palace-intrigue (see ABRAMSON, 1), which placed Bathsheba's son upon the throne, and was followed by the execution of Adonijah and Joab, shocked the Chronicler's sense of reverence. He therefore (as also perhaps the author of a lost Midrash on which he bases his work) substitutes for it a great religious function, in which David plays the leading part, and Solomon appears as the meek recipient of much highly spiritual advice and of minute instructions as to the building of the temple (1 Ch. 28:29).

We have now to estimate the character of David.² We may safely assert that, if the narrative is to his physical but also to his moral qualities. In him the better elements of the Israelitish character start at once into a new life. There are some points in him that repel us; in these he is the child of the past. There is more in him that attracts us; in this he is a herald of the future. One of the later writers who have contributed to the story of Saul and David describes the latter as 'a man according to God's mind' (1 S. 13:14), which means, as the context interprets it, one in whom Yahweh God of Israel has found the qualities of a leader of his people (cp Jer 31:5). That David was an

1 On 2 S. 13.12 see Ew. Hist. 3.172. The suggestion is given in fuller form by Dr. WRS 274, whose "only doubt is whether a word (hinnu) meaning in itself simply 'unhappiness' could be used absolutely to signify a "token of unhappiness" for others." WRS (DAY in Exodus) accepted the view; W. and Ba. are also attracted by it. The present writer prefers Ew.'s alternative suggestion, viz., to read הַנִּיחָה instead of הַנִּיחָה (Ki) or הַנִּיחָה (Ki); but הַנִּיחָה remains unexplained. Almost certainly הַנִּיחָה is right. Read, with him, הַנִּיחָה . . . הַנִּיחָה 12, 'for hostility was in Absalom's heart'; cp הַנִּיחָה 3.17.

The most helpful characterization of David from a moderate traditional point of view is that of Koh. Lehrb. der Bibl., 2 vols., 1874-1887 (84). Owing to the progress of criticism, however, all the earlier sketches of David's character need a thorough revision. A bridge between the old and the new is offered in Weyne's Life, 1872, where the results of recent criticism of the Books of Samuel and of the Psalter are presupposed, and all that is still tenable in the earlier estimates of David is retained. See also Lehrb., §§ 170-2.

of them—the deeply-felt elegy on Saul and Jonathan—was taken from the so-called Book of JASAR (q.v., § 2), and another—the short elegy on Abner—may have been copied from the same book. These occur in 2 S. 19-27 and 333f. respectively. They have an antique air and are worthy of David. Whether any religious elements formerly present have been removed, we cannot say; but there is no special reason to think so. That the song of triumph in 2 S. 22 (= Ps. 18) and the 'last words of David' in 23:1-7 (both highly religious compositions) are Davidic, is not, on grounds of criticism, tenable. Nor can any of the psalms in the Psalter be ascribed with any probability to David. The eager search for possible Davidic psalms seems to be a proof that the seekers have taken up the study of the Psalter at the wrong end. That David composed religious songs is of course probable enough. When he and his companions 'played before Yahwe with all their might, and with songs and with (divers musical instruments)',¹ it is reasonable to conjecture that 'some of these songs had been made for the purpose by the poet-king.'² But how much resemblance would these psalms have had to the psalms of the second temple? and how could the David known to us from history have entered into the ideas of Psalms 32 and 51, which are assigned by Deitzsch and Orelli to the sad period of David's great sin? Would not that have been one of the greatest of miracles? See PSALMS.

[In the above sketch sentences have been here and there borrowed from the late Robertson Smith's art. 'David' in the EB, especially where David's character and his originality as a ruler are referred to. The advance of criticism since 1877 required a fresh survey of the subject. On Renan's view of David in his Hist. d'Israël, see WRS Eng. Hist. Rev., 1888, p. 134 f. Dümcker (Hist. of Ant. vol. ii.) is hardly less unsympathetic than Renan, and his narrative needs adjustment to the results of critical analysis. St.'s GT 1223-29, and We.'s Prod., ET, 261-272, and IT 59-64, are of the highest importance. Wi.'s GT 1 is fresh and original, but often rash. Cheyne's Aids (92), part I, relates to the David-narratives; Ki.'s analysis in Kau. HS, the results of which are tabulated in chap. I, is provisionally adopted. See also Dr. TBS Cont.; Kamph., Philister und Hebräer zur Zeit Davids, ZATW [86] 43-97; Marquart's Fundamente (97); and the articles in this Dictionary on Samuel and Chronicles (with the books there referred to). Prof. W. R. Smith's article in *EB*⁹⁹ should be taken with the corresponding portion of Ewald's Hist. op. Chandler's Life of David (1st ed. 1766) gives answers to the very real difficulties suggested by Pierre Bayle which are now superseded. Stahelin's Leben Davids (60) is recommended by Robertson Smith for the numerous parallels adduced from Oriental history. The late H. A. White's art. in Hastings' DB has great merit. DAVID, CITY OF (דָּוִד, דָּוִד), 2 Sam. 57 1 K. 21. See JERUSALEM.

DAY. Among the ancients the day was reckoned in a great variety of ways. The Babylonians reckoned from sunrise to sunrise, the Athenians from sunset to sunset, the Umbrians from noon to noon, the common people everywhere from dawn to dark, the Roman priests and those by whom the civil day has been defined, as also the Egyptians and Hipparchus, from midnight to midnight (Plin. HN 270, § 138). 'From dawn to dark' (ante lucem ad tenebras) was the ancient and ordinary meaning of a day (20) among the Israelites; night, as being the time 'when no man can work' (In. 94), might, it was considered, be left out of account altogether, or, at all events, as being the evident complement of the 'day' and involved in it, did not require explicit mention. Thus the word 'day' came to have a twofold meaning at one time signifying the period from sunrise to sunset at another including day's inseparable accompaniment the night, and embracing the whole period from sunrise to the next. Only in cases where the count had to be brought out, or there was risk of ambiguity was it necessary to name the night (לַיְלָה) expressly, as, for example, in Gen. 7:12 31:19. Apart from this and the combination of יוֹם and לַיְלָה, the Hebrews possessed no expression for the civil day as including day and night; for the designation בֹּקֶר, 'evening' and morning, which makes its first appearance in the second century B.C. (Dan. 8:14), equivalent to the Greek εὐχθέρων (2 Cor. 11:25), is but a combination precisely similar to the older יוֹם and לַיְלָה.

The Israelites regarded the morning as the beginning of the day; in the evening the day 'declined' or 'went down,' and until the new day (בֹּקֶר, 'morning') broke it was necessary to 'tarry all night' (עַד בֹּקֶר, 196-9 and the series in Nu. 11:32, 'all that day and all the night and all the next day'). Not till post-exilic times do we find traces of a new mode of reckoning which makes day begin at sunset and continue till the sunset following. In P, it is true, the expression 'day and night' (e.g., Lev. 8:35 Nu. 9:21) is unhesitatingly used, not 'night and day,' and the evening following the fourteenth day of the first month is regarded as the evening of the day (Ex. 12:18); but Lev. 23:32 certainly reckons the day as extending from evening to evening, and the same mode of reckoning seems to have been in the mind of the writer (P) when, after describing the work of each day, he invariably adds, 'So there was evening and there was morning, a first [second, third, etc.] day' (Gen. 1:5 8:13 etc., יוֹם וָלַיְלָה, לַיְלָה וָבֹקֶר, יוֹם וָלַיְלָה, etc.). The later mode of reckoning is shown also in the above-mentioned expression in Dan. 8:14 (בֹּקֶר וָלַיְלָה), in the order of the words 'evening, morning, noon' in Ps. 55:17 (עֶרֶב וָבֹקֶר וָצֹהַר), and in the 'night and day,' 'night or day,' of the late passages Is. 27:3 31:10 Esth. 4:16. In connection with this later Jewish custom one has to remember the importance which the new moon (visible only in the evening) had for the Israelites in the determination of their feasts, and it must not be forgotten that other ancient peoples, who observed lunar divisions of time (Athenians, Gauls, Germans) also began their day with evening. All the same, it is undeniably a somewhat unnatural mode of reckoning, and as far as Israel is concerned can have come into use only when it was desirable to fix times with legal and uniform precision for the nation at large.

The ancient Israelites had no precise subdivision of the day for accurate measurement of time. They designated the various periods of the day by the natural changes which marked its successive stages, or by the successive occupations in ordinary daily routine. Thus it was in the nature of things that morning (בֹּקֶר), midday (צֹהַר), and evening (עֶרֶב) should be distinguished, and equally so that morning should be spoken of as the rising of the morning, the breaking of the day (Gen. 19:15 32:24 [25]), or the rising of the sun (Gen. 19:23 32:1 [4]); midday, the heat of the day (Gen. 18:1 8:11) or the height of the day [i.e. the perfect day] (Prov. 4:12); afternoon, the time of the day's decline (Judg. 19:2); and evening, the time of the going down of the sun (Gen. 15:12 17:1) or of 'the wind of the day' or evening breeze (Gen. 38 Cant. 2:17 [when the day is cool] 46). Specially noticeable is the expression בֵּין עֶרֶב וּבֵין עֶרֶב, 'between the two evenings,' met with only in

DAY

P (Ex. 126 16 12 29 30 41 302 Lev. 23 5 Nu. 9 3 5 11 28 48), which can mean only 'towards evening,' 'about the evening time,' since it is used to indicate the same period that is called in Dt. 16 the time of the going down of the sun (cp. Ex. 126 Nu. 9 3 11). Whether the form ought to be taken as a dual, and 'the two evenings' understood as meaning 'the evening of the sun and the evening of its still visible light,' may be left an open question; but it is important to note that the evening sacrifice prescribed by the law to be made עֶשְׂרֵים וְשֵׁנִי—i.e., towards evening (Ex. 29 39 41 Nu. 28 4 8)—was offered in the first century of our era in the afternoon between half-past two and half-past three (cp. Jos. Ant. xiv. 43 and Mishna, Pesahim 51; also Avot 31 10 3 30, where the prayer associated with the evening sacrifice also is made at the ninth hour), and that only the Samaritans and Karaites maintain the old correct interpretation. The change possibly may not have taken place till after the Maccabean period; for in Daniel (9 21) the daily offering is still spoken of as עֶשְׂרֵים וְשֵׁנִי, 'the evening oblation,' and no place in the OT gives any hint of a change (cp. on the other hand, the reminiscences of psalmody by night in the temple: 1 Ch. 9 33 23 30 Ps. 92 2 3 [34] 134 1; cp. 119 62). By reference to functions of daily recurrence, morning is called 'the time of incense' (1 K. 18 36); the middle of the afternoon, the time of the offering of the Mishka (1 K. 18 39 36); and the evening, 'the time that women go out to draw water' (Gen. 24 11), or 'the time of the evening oblation' (Dan. 9 21; cp. Ezra 9 4 f.). Cp. also 'cock-crowing' as denoting early morning (Mk. 14 30 72).

The OT affords no evidence that the Israelites divided their day into twelve hours as the Babylonians did.

The sundial (2) of Ahaz (2 K. 20 9 11 Is. 38 8), whatever it was (see DIAL.), did not lead to a more accurate measurement of time on the part of the people, and even at so late a date as that of Daniel (4 16 5 5) the Aramaic word שָׂעָה ('hour') does not mean any exact portion of time. reckoning by hours is met with first in the NT, where the day consists of twelve hours (Jn. 11 9) or twelfths simply designated as first [second, etc.] of the day, reckoned as beginning at sunrise (cp. Acts 2 15 Mt. 20 3 5 6 27 35 40 etc.). The hour was thus with the Jews a variable quantity, as it was also with the Babylonians, the twelfth part of the day ranging from forty-nine to seventy-one minutes according to the season of the year. The division of the day into twelve parts and the further development of the sexagesimal system as a whole had commended itself to the Babylonians from their observation that, at the vernal equinox, the time between the appearance of the first direct ray of the sun and that of visibility of the entire disk above the horizon amounted to a 300th of the whole time during which the sun was visible in the heavens, or the 720th part of a full day reckoned from one sunrise to another.

Equal divisions of the night were of older date than equal divisions of the day. Three night-watches were recognised: the first (שָׁמַר אֶשְׁמֶר; Lam. 2 19), the middle (שָׁמַר תְּשִׁמֶר; Judg. 7 19), within which, of course, midnight fell, Ex. 11 4) and the last (שָׁמַר אֶשְׁמֶר; Ex. 11 4 1 S. 11 11).

From the NT we learn that, in the first century of our era at least, the Roman division into four watches had in common use superseded the old division into three (Mk. 13 35 δὲ μεσονύκτιον, ἀλεκτοπορεύων; and πρῶτη, Mt. 14 25 Mk. 6 43 Lk. 12 3, cp. Acts 12 4). From the division of the day into twelve hours the step to a similar division of the night was easy (so, certainly, in Acts 23 23; cp. also Acts 16 1 Lk. 12 3) and, for the last cited passage, see the parallel in Mt. 21 43 which speaks of 'watch' not 'hour'.

'Day' is sometimes used in a half-apophorical sense. Thus in Hos. 2 15 7 it means 'high day' (cf. Job 31 'birthday'; Jer. 50 27 Job 18 5 15 23 Ps. 37 11, 13, 37 'day of doom'; Is. 9 3 14 'day of battle'). On the expression 'day of Yahweh' (Isa.

DEACON and DEACONESS (ΔΙΑΚΟΝΟΣ).

1. The Word. We may consider first the use of the word and of its cognates.

In the Gospels the word διακονος is used (1) literally, of a servant who prepares or serves a meal, Mt. 23 1, Jn. 2 5 9; (2) metaphorically (Mk. 9 35 10 43 Mt. 23 11 20 26, Jn. 12 26). It is never used by Lk. who, in what seems a parallel to sayings in Mk., prefers the participle ο διακονων (22 26 f.); in one place (10 40), however, he uses διακονος of the preparation of a meal. The verb (διακονω) is likewise used (1) literally, of preparing or supplying food (Mk. 14 13 Mt. 4 11 14 the angel); 14 14 (Mt. Lk.), Lk. 10 40 12 37 17 Jn. 12 Mt. 2 44 (rather more widely); and again somewhat more widely (Mk. 16 44 Mt. 27 55 Lk. 8 3) of the women who ministered to Jesus in his journeyings in Galilee; (2) metaphorically (Lk. 22 26 f.; Jn. 12 26).

The ordinary word for a servant in the Gospels is δοῦλος, a bond-servant or slave; but a δοῦλος may be called upon to διακονειν (Lk. 17 7), and in the case of a functionary may be termed διακονος (Mt. 22 13 26). Δοῦλος emphasises relation to a master; διακονος, performance of service. The latter word is free from the associations of slavery which belong to the former. It was thus fitted for adoption as the designation of any form of Christian service rendered to Christ or to his Church.

Accordingly in Acts we find διακονος frequently in this sense: A 13 17 25, the διακονος of apostles; p 11, the daily διακονος by which the needs of the poorer brethren were met.

2. In Acts, suppl. 11 and, in contrast to this, the διακονος of the word (9 4). In 11, 12 and 12 25 διακονος is used of the help in the famine rendered by Antioch to the brethren in Judaea (a sense which recurs in Paul's epistles). In 20 24 Paul speaks more generally of fulfilling the διακονος which he has received of the Lord Jesus; and in 21 9 he declares what God has wrought among the Gentiles through his διακονος. The word διακονος does not occur at all in Acts (as it does not in Lk.); but διακονω is used in a literal sense, notice of serving the tables; and metaphorically of Timothy and Onesimus, who 'ministered' to Paul (19 22).

In the first of the four chronological groups of the Pauline epistles, the only instance of the word for its cognates is 1 Thess. 5 12, where Timothy is called 'the διακονος'.

3. In Epistles, ποις διακονος, diakonia (cf. the gospel of Ch. 1). In the series of 20 34 the words are freely used. Paul and Apollos are διακονος through whom we believed (1 Cor. 3 5). 'The διακονος of διακονος' are spoken of in 12 5; and of the household of Stephanas the remarkable phrase is used, 'they appointed (or 'set') themselves unto διακονος to the saints' (19 1). This passage alone would show that the words were not yet limited to ecclesiastical use. In 2 Cor. the most noteworthy passages are 7 15 12 19 23, where the words are applied to the collection for the Greek churches for the poor saints in Jerusalem, a service on which Paul and the greatest stress as being a means of cementing the unity between the Jewish and the Gentile portions of the Church. The Epistle to the Romans (12 3 7) shows us his anxiety for this matter, and his fixed resolve to carry out his part of the person at any risk to liberty or life. Here again, in 12 19, διακονω and διακονος are used of the ministration to temporal needs. In the same epistle (14 1) occur the notable words 'I testify my διακονος to the Gentiles'; and the well-known words with which he uses the term 'seen when he speaks of the temporal as well as the διακονος of God' (13 4). The application of the word to Phoebe of Cenchreae (16 1) will be considered presently (6 4).

In the third group Paul himself is twice styled a διακονος of the gospel (1 Phil. 2 25 1 Th. 2 9), and once a διακονος of the church (Col. 1 24 7). Timothy is twice described as 'the below brother and faithful διακονος in the Lord' (1 Tim. 4 12 Gal. 4 1) in the latter place the description 'below brother' is also is inserted); similarly, 'Epaphras, who is a faithful diakonos, on our behalf, of Christ' (Col. 1.7). 'The work of diakonia is referred to in the widest sense in Eph. 4.12; and in Col. 4.17 Archippus receives the message: 'Look to the diakonia which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou mayest fulfil it.' In Philémon Paul says of Onesimus the runaway slave, 'that on thy behalf he may minister to me' (diakoni), p. 13). In Philippians the only instance is of special importance; for the epistle is addressed 'to all the saints . . . in Philippi, together with diakonoi and diakonai' (1.1).

DEACON AND DEACONESS

The fourth group consists of the Pastoral Epistles; and here the general sense of the words is still the most frequent. The apostle thanks God (1 Tim. 1.12) for having appointed him unto diakonia. Timothy is to be a good diakonos of Christ Jesus (4.6), and is charged to fulfil his diakonia (2 Tim. 4.5). Of Onesiphorus the apostle recalls how he 'ministered' in Ephesus (1.10); and of Mark he says, 'he is useful to me for diakonia' (1.11). On the other hand, the passage of most importance for our purpose is the code of regulations laid down in 1 Tim. 3.8-13 for a class of persons who are definitely designated diakonoi.

Before considering these regulations we may return to Rom. 16.1, 'I commend to you Phoebe our sister, who is [also] diakonos of the church which is in Cenchreae.' It is possible to interpret the word here either in the general sense in which Paul uses it so often, or in the official sense which we find in the later epistles to the Philippians and to Timothy. It is no objection to the official sense that the person so designated is a woman; for we shall presently see that at Ephesus the Order included deacons of either sex.

On the other hand, since there is not in the two earlier groups of Paul's epistles any other indication that diakonia is a special office in the Church, this, which occurs in the second group, would be a solitary and somewhat puzzling exception. More over, as Cenchreae was the E. port of Corinth, this case practically belongs to the Corinthian church. In that church special mention is made of the diakonia of Stephanas and his household, the word diakonia being used in its broadest sense. There also Chloe and her household were of note. It may be, therefore, that Phoebe was another woman of influence who held a corresponding pre-eminence of service in the neighbouring port, a pre-eminence that earned for her at the apostle's hands the honourable title of diakonos of the church; for she had been a helper (perhaps we should render it 'a patroness,' πομπή) of many and of the apostle himself. If we could assume that the diaconate was formally established in the Corinthian church at this time, we should certainly conclude that Phoebe was one of the women who served it; but this assumption is in sharp contrast with the silence of Paul's epistles as to any kind of definite ecclesiastical organisation at Corinth.

Of Phoebe, then, we may say with security that she is a witness to the important services rendered by women in the primitive Church; but in tracing the history of the diaconate it will not be wise to assume that the word diakonos is used of her in the strictly official sense. As a matter of historical evidence this passage must be left out of the count as being, at any rate, uncertain testimony. For a technical diaconate in Paul's writings we are thus reduced to two passages, Phil. 1.1 and 1 Tim. 3.8-13.

II. Origin and functions of the Diaconate.—The first recognition of any need of organisation in the Christian community occurs in connection with the daily meal in Jerusalem (see CHURCH, § 11).

5. Origin of Diaconate. The word diakonos is not applied in Acts to the seven men who were on this occasion appointed to the service of the poor; but we have already noted that diakonos does not occur in Lk. or Acts. Nevertheless, by the later Church tradition, they were constantly regarded as the earliest deacons; and so strong was this feeling that the number of deacons in some churches was limited to seven. Names apart, they truly represented the essential feature of the diaconate, as the Church's organ for service to her poorer members. In other communities, especially in the Greek world, this service was destined to take a different form; but the deacons of the Pauline epistles at Philippi and Ephesus had a similar function, though the circumstances in which they discharged it were very dissimilar. The definite title is met with first in the Greek churches, and here the order from its commencement is found to include the services of men and women alike. The admission of women to the diaconate could scarcely have arisen in the Jewish communities; but it was probably felt to be natural in places where women were in general accorded a larger liberty. What then we recognise the germ of the institution in the appointment of the Seven in Jerusalem, we must look to the Greek churches for the development of definite and permanent order.

As the personal ministry of Paul drew to a close, and as it became evident that the 'return' of Christ was indefinitely postponed, it was natural that ecclesiastical organisation should assume a new and increasing importance. It is in harmony with this that we find the apostle in a later epistle recognising expressly 'bishops and deacons' at Philippi, very much as I had recognised the 'episcopate' of the presbyters at Ephesus, when he thought that he should see them again no more (Acts 20.28). 'Those who ruled,' and 'those who served' under them, were coming to form definite classes, to which the natural designations of overseers (ἐπισκοποι) and servants (διδάσκαλοι) were beginning to be formally appropriated. Accordingly, the first epistle to Timothy

6. Functions. lays down regulations for the two classes under these titles. The differences in the regulations help to show us the nature of the function to be discharged in the two cases (1 Tim. 3.1-13). The rules which should govern the choice of deacons must be cited in full.

'Deacons in like manner must be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not eager for petty gains, holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. And they too are first to be tested, and then to minister, if they be irreproachable. Women in like manner must be grave, not slanderers, sober, faithful in all things. Deacons are to be husbands of one wife, ruling well their children and their own houses; for they that have ministered well acquire a good standing for themselves and much boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.'

The essence of these regulations is that deacons, whether men or women, must be persons of character, who can rule their tongues and are temperate in the use of wine. Frustworthiness is demanded of the woman, as strict honesty is of the man; this doubtless points to the fact that Church moneys would pass through their hands. Deacons are to know what they believe, and to live in accordance with it; but no aptitude for teaching is demanded of them, nor any qualifications for exercising discipline. The service of the deacons is the house to house service, which deals primarily with temporal wants.

In the AV the women spoken of here are represented as the wives of the deacons. This interpretation puts a serious strain on the original Greek, and it is now generally abandoned. It finds no parallel in any demand for special qualifications in the wives of bishops. It belongs to a period when the diaconate of women had been wholly lost sight of; and it cannot be maintained in face of the fact that women were undoubtedly admitted to this office in the early ages of the Church's history.

For the later confusion between deaconesses and widows see WIDOW; and for a full historical account of the female diaconate see The Ministry of Deaconesses by Deaconess Cecilia Robinson (198).

DEAD, THE, and DEATH. The preliminaries may first be briefly considered. To kiss the dead (Gen. 50.1) and to close their eyes (Gen. 46.4) and month (Mishna, Shab. 23.5) immediately after death was looked upon as a deed of natural piety. In NT times the body was washed (Acts 9.37), anointed with sweet-smelling ointments (Mk. 16.1; Lk. 21.1; Jn. 12.7), and wrapped in linen cloth (Mt. 27.59; Mk. 15.46; Lk. 23.53), or the hands and feet were bound with grave-clothes and the head covered with a napkin (Jn. 11.44). The age of these customs must remain uncertain, as they are not alluded to in OT; but the old belief that in Scythia the dead would be known by their dress, the king by his cladon, the soldier by his sword, the prophet by his mantle (1 S. 28.1; Ezek. 32.27), leads to the inference that the dead were buried dressed as in life. In later times, delicate foods, ornaments, gold and silver, and all kinds of valuables were placed with the body in the graves of princes and nobles¹ (Jos. Ant. xv. 34). If what we read (Jos. Ant. xiii. 84 xvi. 71) as to the plundering of David's grave by Hyrcanus and Herod is to be accepted, this custom also is very old. LAMENTING, q.v. was not in use. On sacrifices to the dead, cp ESCATOLOGY, § 3.

The usual method of disposing of the dead was by burial (Gen. 23. 19, 25. 35; Judg. 2. 8, 2 etc.). In L.S. 41. 11, where we read of the burning of the body of Saul, the text is corrupt (see Klost. ad loc.); as is also the case with Am. 6. 1, 2. Burning was looked upon as something abominable, as an injury to the dead (Am. 2. 1); it was used by priestly law and old custom, only in a few cases, to render the death sentence more severe (Josh. 7. 25 Lev. 20. 14, 21. 1; cp LAW AND JUSTICE, § 12). The aversion to the burning of the body was connected with the belief that the soul even after death was bound to the body. Not to be buried was a terrible disgrace which one could hardly wish even to one's greatest enemy (Am. 2. 1; 1 K. 1. 2, 14; 16. 4, 2, 8, 9, 10; 18. 33; Jer. 7. 32, 8. 2, 9, 2 [21]; 14. 6, 16; Ezek. 29. 3). The spirits of the unburied dead wander restlessly about, and in Sheol are condemned to lie in the corners (Ezek. 32. 1, 18, 19 etc.). Burial alone so bound the spirit to the body that it had rest and could harm no one. It was therefore the sacred duty of every one who found a corpse in the open field to give it burial (1 K. 14. 11, 16, 21; Jer. 7. 33, 8. 2, 10, and especially Job 11. 24). In cases of death by stoning the pile of stones took the place of a regular grave (Josh. 7. 26). Cp the Greek idea as given, for example, in the Antigone of Sophocles.

Rapid internment was necessary on account of the hot climate, and even without express biblical authority we may assume that then, as now, in the East, it usually took place on the day of death (cp Dt. 21. 23). The body was carried to the grave on a bier (2 S. 3. 31; Jer. 7. 14 [sopós]). Coffins were not used by the Israelites (2 K. 13. 21); Joseph's bones were placed in a coffin (Gen. 50. 26). Egyptians (cp ESCATOLOGY). The stone coffin (sarcophagus) was adopted by the Jews (as also by the Phœnicians) from the Egyptians long after the exile, but only by the wealthy. The procession of friends, who would of course often be mourners,² was accompanied by hired mourners singing lamentations (2 S. 3. 31; cp MOURNING CUSTOMS).³ The place of burial was determined by the belief that the unity of the family and tribe continued after death. The bodies of those who wished to be reunited with their parents and family in Sheol had to be buried in the family sepulchre (see TOMBS, ESCATOLOGY).

'Death' (מָוֶת, ΘΑΝΑΤΟΣ) can mean, not only the process or state of death, but also the realm of the dead, 2. Biblical references. See L.S. 28. 15 Hos. 13. 14 Ps. 63 [6] 9. 13 [14] 22. 15 [16] 68. 20 [21] 89 48 [49] 107. 18 Prov. 2. 18, 7. 27 Job 2. 22, 38, 17 Rev. 1. 18, 6. 8, 20. 13. f. In Rev. 6. 8 RV prints Death, to correspond to Hades. Both are personifications; cp the later Jewish representations of ABADDON, q.v. and MARECOTH ('Death') as two of God's chief angels (cp DESTROYER). 'The dead' in AV corresponds not only to מֵתִים (often) but also to עֲרֵפֶת (Ps. 88. 10).

² See, however, the ingenious suggestions of WPS Rel. Sem. 2. 172. Wellh. is fully conscious of the difficulty of Am. 6. 10 (Die Kl. Prop., 37); also Schwally, Das Leben nach dem Tode, 48.

⁴ Cp L.S. 7. 12. Whether we may compare Job 21. 31b is uncertain. Di. denies, Dahm affirms this. The whole passage is obscure and not very coherent.

⁵ On the mourning women in primitive Babylonia see Maspero, Diction. of Civ. 384. They also washed, prepared, and arranged the dead body.

DEAD SEA, THE

[11] Prov. 2. 18, 21. 16 L.S. 11. 6, 26. 14; inconstantly Job 26. 5, 'dead things'. RV sometimes has 'they that are deceased' (e.g., Job 26. 5), in mg. always 'the shades', Heb. Rephaim.

We will examine the above passages, beginning with: (a) Job 26. 5, of which Schultens remarks, 'Sulata nox diem solumque admittit.' RV, and virtually Davidson, render thus—

They that are deceased—
Beneath the waters and the inhabitants thereof.

Davidson comments, 'This abode of deceased persons lies deep down under the waters of the sea and all the inhabitants of these waters, for the sea belongs to the upper world. Yet the power of God is felt even at this immeasurable distance from his abode on high.' Thus this may appear natural, but to those who believed that the 'shades' were 'deceased' by God (Ps. 88. 5 [6]) it would scarcely appear so. The Hebrew word is also not worthy of the context. Probably we should read (Expt. Times, 10. 32 May 1904)—

He makes the sea and its billows to start (in alarm),
He terrifies the waters and the floods thereof.

(b) L.S. 88. 1 [11] the shades are represented as incapable of arising and praising God. In 'arise' Kuyper sees a reference to the resurrection, an idea which the psalmist finds inconvertible. (c) Prov. 2. 18, no return from the shades. (d) Prov. 9. 1. Those who frequent the house of Madam Folly (7. 13) are, as it were, shades already haunting Dante. (e) Prov. 21. 16, Folly leads surely to the shades. (f) L.S. 14. 6. When the over-throwing king of Babylon appears in Sheol, the shades themselves, especially the royal shades, are in excitement. Some tidings of his greatness have reached them, and they marvel to see one who had claimed to sit with the gods reduced to their own miserable state. The poet takes some liberty with the popular belief, or else revivifies an earlier form of it. In the legend of Ishtar, 7. 10, we read, 'I will raise up the dead to eat the living.' (g) L.S. 26. 14. 'The shades will not rise, for to life shall the earth bring it'—shades (Rephaim). The resurrection hope. See ESCATOLOGY, § 3.

Butcher (Th. intert. § 112 ff) derives the word Rephaim (רֵפְאִים) from רָפָה, propitius. The giants are 'hurled' to Sheol, and then, as the chief inhabitants of Sheol, give their name to the whole population. Dahm (on L.S. 14. 6 and Job 26. 5) holds the same view as to the transference of the title Rephaim from the giants to all other inhabitants of deathland. This theory must take the meaning of the Rephaim of Genesis, Numbers, Deuteronomy, and gives a doubtful meaning to רָפָה. It also assumes an incorrect passage (Job 26. 5) which is certainly corrupt. It is an old view revived (see Schultens on Job. 17. 37, p. 795). Most critics, however, hold that Rephaim = 'the flood, weak, a natural development of רָפָה (cp Jer. 6. 24 etc.). At that time also become weak (רָפָה) as we ask the shades (L.S. 14. 6). But this is far too easy, and the Hebrews would hardly have spoken of the spirits of the dead as 'the weak ones.' 'I see a god coming up out of the earth,' says the wise woman to Saul (1 S. 28. 13; RV). The word ought to mean 'the terrible' or 'the wise,' or the like. In the later OT books the condition of those in Sheol is portrayed in very gloomy colours; but these books do not express the primitive popular belief. No doubt Rephaim is a mutilated or modified form of some primitive religious term. A sister-form is most probably TERAPHIM (q.v.). Cp Sayce, Hibbert Lect. 430, n. 5.

§ 1. L.S. 2. 2 f. T. K. 1.

DEAD SEA, THE, the usual designation of the lake in which the course of the Jordan terminates, occurs

1. Names. nowhere in OT or NT though it was not uncommon in antiquity (θάλασσα νεκρά; Plin. v. 7. 1; Galen 1. 20; Justin xxxv. 36, En. 8. 261), and is found in Vg. of Josh. 3. 16 (mare solitum; sed nunc constiter mortuum).

In the OT this lake is occasionally called simply 'the sea' (סָהַר, four times, and in the expression 'from sea to sea'), also 'the salt sea' (סָהַר מֶלַח, nine times; ἡ θάλασσα τῆς αἰῶνος, ἡ ἀλμυρῆ, never salt, in Septuagint); 'the sea of the plain,' RV 'sea of the Arabah' (סָהַר הָעָרָב, 10 times; ἡ θάλασσα τῆς Ἀραβίας; mare solitudinis, m. deserti), in the three places where both designations are employed 'Salt sea' is used to explain the expression 'sea of the Arabah'; and, in three places, 'the eastern (east, former) sea' (2277, 217; ἡ θαλάσση ἡ ἀνατολική θουκάνωσις, ἡ θ. ἡ παλαιά; mare orientale).¹ In Doct. Sci. (24, 190) and in Josephus (often; see especially Bliv. 84) it is 'Ἀσφαλίτις λίανη'; so also in Pliny (lacus Asphaliticus; HN, 1515). Josephus also has ἡ Σοδομική λίανη (Inf. v, 122); cp. the 'Sodomish sea' (mare Sodomiticum) of 4 Esd. 57. This name occurs also in Edrisi (35, transl. Janbri, 1117), who calls it the sea of Sodom and Gomorrah and the sea of Zarrah (Zair). Its name in Arabic (at least since the eleventh century) is Bahr (or Bahriyat) Lut; but this does not prove the name of Lot to have remained attached to the sea in local tradition for four thousand years. It arises simply from the fact that Lot and the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah are mentioned in the Koran.

From the biblical point of view the Dead Sea is not very important. The references to it in the OT occur generally in topographical connections, especially in delineations of the eastern frontier of the land of Israel. There are two notable exceptions: (a) where it comes into the story of the Cities of the Plain, and (b) where it is referred to in the prophetic descriptions of Ezek. 47 and Zech. 148. The NT does not refer to it at all.

From the geographical point of view it is otherwise: the interest of this lake is quite extraordinary.

2. Geographical interest. The Jordan valley, running from N. to S., begins to sink below sea-level as far N. as a little below Lake Huleh; the Lake of Galilee is some 680 feet lower, and thence the 'Arabah' or Ghôr continues to fall till the surface of the Dead Sea is reached at a distance below the sea of some 1300 feet. At the opposite extremity of this lake ends another valley, coming from the S., formerly called the Arabah [?]. Thus the lake constitutes the deepest portion of what is the most strongly marked depression (unconnected with the sea) on the surface of the globe. It has no effluent. Should the question be asked, whether in former times the Jordan, after passing through the Dead Sea, may not have flowed on southward falling at last into the Red Sea, the Gulf or Gulf of Aden, it may suffice to point out how much below sea-level the Dead Sea is, and further, that the valley to the S. of the Dead Sea is really two valleys. One runs N., the other S., and the intersection watershed is at a height of 650 feet above the level of the Red Sea and of the Mediterranean (according to the PEF survey).² Thus the two basins are hydrographically distinct, which is confirmed by a stratigraphical study of the sedimentary deposits on the valley floor (Lartet).

The geological investigation of Palestine and of the Dead Sea, carried on mainly by Fries, Lartet, Hübl, and Blanckenhorn, has proved, contrary to previous ideas, that the Dead Sea cannot possibly date from the historical epoch, and that it must have presented, at any rate from the beginning of the quaternary epoch, practically the same aspect and configuration as at present. Traces can still be seen, however, of a past time when the water stood as much as 1180 feet above its present level, as well as of another phase in which the difference was only 348 feet; in short, the waters have gradually subsided to their present position.

The actual level is that at which the evaporation exactly counterbalances the daily influx of water from the Jordan and the other affluents. Of these, the chief, including certain winter torrents, are: (a) on the eastern side, reckoning from N. to S., the Wady Ghuweir, the Wadys Zerka-Ma'in (Callirhoe Mōijh (Arnon), Beni-Hanād, ed-Dera'a (Kerak), Numéréh, e-Ahsa (or e-Sāliyah); (b) on the S., the Wadys Tufileh, el-Jel el-Fikreh (these three traverse a marshy plain, the Sebkhah which stretches immediately southwards from the Dead Sea and is bordered by gigantic thickets of reeds); (c) on the western side, going from S. to N., the Wady el-Muhawwaj, the Wady So (to the S. of which lies Sebbih, the ancient fortress of Masada) and the spring of 'Am-Jedy (Engedi), the Wady en-Nār (Kedron) and the spring of 'Am el-Feshkhah (cp. B. TH. ARABAH), to the S. of which is the head and known as Rās el-Feshkhah.

The amount of daily evaporation³ has been estimated at 13½ millimetres, and the daily contribution of the Jordan alone at 6,000,000 tons (the volume of the Rhone at its influx into the Lake of Geneva is 22,000,000 tons). Another feature of it is its great density, which arises from its salinity (the mean is 1.166). At a depth of 1000 feet the solid matters contained in the water represent 27 per cent of the total weight. These substances are mainly chlorides of sodium, magnesium, and calcium, also certain derivatives of bromium. The chloride of magnesium gives the water a very disagreeable taste; the chloride of calcium gives it a slightly oily consistency. The eyes, and some assume also the skin, are powerfully affected by contact with it. Garments receive from the evaporating water a saline deposit, with indelible spots of an oily appearance. The salt encrusts also the many trees and pieces of wood which lie stranded on the shore; so much so that the form a characteristic feature of the landscape, and recall the striking antithesis in Jer. 175-8.

A bath in the Dead Sea at once proves its difference in density from other seas or from fresh-water lakes.

Eggs float on it. The human body, being lighter than the water, swimming becomes difficult, the head alone of the swimmer tending to sink. The boiling point of the water is 221° F. It is remarkably limpid, and has a beautiful colour, now blue, now green. To think of this lake as somber and sad is quite an illusion; its intense colouring its varied effects of light, its scarped overhanging slopes broken by deep gorges, produce a picture of wild and sublime beauty. 'The scenery round the sea is very fine,' says Gaudier; 'it is compared, by those who have seen both, to that of the Lake of Geneva.' The present writer, whose home is in Geneva, agrees with this comparison, it being understood that it is between the northern portion of the Dead Sea and the eastern end of the Lake of Geneva towards the embouchure of the Rhone. Another common error about the Dead Sea is that its waters have no motion; on the contrary, it is constantly agitated by the winds, and storms sometimes drive huge billows to the shore. It does not owe its name to this imagined immobility, but rather to the fact that no sort of living creature—fish, crustacean, mollusc, etc.—can subsist in its waters, the only exceptions being certain inferior organisms and microbes, as shown by the investigations of Ehrenberg and of the zoologist Lartet (not to be confused with the geologist Lartet). This fact—which is conclusively proved by the death not only of the fish carried down into it by the Jordan (their bodies serve as food for numerous birds which frequent the neighbourhood), but also of salt-water fishes—has given rise to various incorrect ideas. Thus it has been said that birds attempting to fly over it drop down dead; this is a mere imagination—a fable which like a host of earlier water-series, the present writer is able to contradict from ocular testimony. Or perhaps it may be the result of a confusion with some other lake (see Köln, 214 #1). It is equally false to say that the shores of the Dead Sea derive their barrenness from the pernicious action of its waters. What hinders the growth of plants in its vicinity is not the presence of the lake itself, but the absence of fresh water whether from affluents or by precipitation. Wherever there is fresh

² The (not very wide) variations from this figure are for the most part explained by a rise of the sea level in one season and another, which can be the least of the rise or fall some 10 or 15 feet. It is at its highest in April and May.

⁴ The distance from the watershed to the Red Sea is about 46 m., and to the Dead Sea over 73 m.

running water, as at Engedi, where there is a thermal spring (79° F.), vegetation flourishes (cp. Cant. 1:14) and, as elsewhere throughout the Ghaz, exhibits a combination of tropical plants with others belonging to the Mediterranean region. Finally, the scant population of its shores is to be accounted for more by the found temperature (above 100° F. in the shade) than by any infertility or positive miasma.

In fact, the lake has not always been so deserted; witness, for example, the town of LAMAR at the SW. extremity. Even the shores of the Sea of Galilee have gradually come to be wholly abandoned except in three or four localities. The shores of the Dead Sea too had once a very different aspect. Both in antiquity (we learn this from Tac. Hist. 5) and also from the Madaba mosaic and so recently as the time of the Crusades when Kerak and other fortresses had such an important position, the waters of the Dead Sea were covered with passing vessels. Nor were the curative qualities of the water of the Dead Sea unknown in the Roman period. Julius Africanus speaks of these baths as wholesome (Rekud, 153 f.), as also does Galen (ib. 241 f.), who (wrongly) adds that an artificial substitute could be obtained by the simple expedient of saturating ordinary sea water with added salt. Mention is often made of the mephitic odour exhaled by the Dead Sea (see NINNIAS); but it has not been shown that the lake itself is the cause of this. It may be occasioned either by the marshy lagoons by which the lake is bordered, or by the mineral springs of the neighbourhood. The sulphurous odour, which reminds one of that of rotten eggs, is particularly noticeable near 'Ain el-Eshlah.

The lake, as we have seen, lies N. and S., with a maximum length of 47½ m., a maximum breadth of 10 m. (Josephus gives 66 and 17 m. respectively) and a superficial area of 360 sq. m. (the Lake of Geneva being 224 sq. m.). It is divided into two unequal portions by a peninsula, 11-12 m. in length and about 40-80 ft. above the level of the lake, flat for the most part, but with a range of hills rising 300 ft. This peninsula, formed of white calcareous marl, with deposits of salt and gypsum, projects from the E. shore; it is separated from the W. shore by a channel about 3 m. in breadth. The name of the peninsula is el-Mozrah or el-Lasim, the last designation, meaning 'the tongue', has been brought into connection with the mention of the pass (LV. 'the high way'; Heb. tongue [that looketh southward]) in Josh 15:25, but whilst the modern Arabic term is applied to the land in the middle of the lake, the two biblical passages refer to the water at the two ends of the lake (cp. Is. 11:15; 'the tongue of the Egyptian Sea').

The N. promontory of the Irtan has been named Cape Cosganau, the S. Cape Molyneux in honour of two bold explorers who navigated the Dead Sea in 1845 and 1847 respectively. We ought also to mention the expedition of Moscati and Beck in 1847 and of Symonds in 1847, and especially that of Lt. M. Lynch of the U.S. navy in 1843 and that of the Duke de Luyne in 1844, both of which were of great importance.

The portion of the Dead Sea to the N. of the Irtan is much the larger, and reaches a great depth (1278 ft.).

The S. smaller portion is quite shallow (10-18 ft.), and in parts even fordable. Possibly this portion is of less ancient date than the rest of the lake, and may have arisen within historic times in consequence of some subsidence of the land. The shores immediately bordering on this section are the most saline of the whole country. There are salt marshes in the neighbourhood, and it is there that, running parallel with the W. shore, the curious ridge of rock salt, a veritable arsifera as Lartet (p. 87) picturesquely calls it, occurs. It is called Jebel Usdim or Hagar-Usdim or Khasim-Usdim, thus echoing the name of Sodom, and rises to a height of 600 ft., with a length of 3½ m. and a breadth of over half a mile. In its immediate vicinity can be seen, occasionally at least, detached pillars of salt, suggesting some resemblance to a rudimentary colossal statue.

Another peculiarity is the presence of asphalt in the Dead Sea basin (see BITUMEN), whence the Greek name

6. Its asphalt. of Asphaltitis (cp. Tac. Hist. 5:6; Str. 16:42; Dioseor. 199; Diol. Sic. 19:25).

Since 1803 roving boats, sailing boats, and, more recently, even steam launches have occasionally been at the service of travellers.

Near the lake are found beds of a whitish chalky marl, and also of bituminous marl. It is not, however, from these deposits on its shores that the water of the Dead Sea derives its bituminous constituents, but rather, no doubt, from deep subaqueous beds; there has been observed a marked coincidence between the appearance of considerable bituminous masses floating on the surface and the occurrence of the earthquakes which at intervals desolate the whole of that region. When these take place quantities of bitumen are broken loose and come to the surface; the natives are diligent in collecting them, but hitherto no methodical exploitation of these mineral resources on a commercial basis has been attempted. The existence of bituminous constituents in small quantity in the water can always be shown.

Notwithstanding the presence of this bitumen, of sulphur springs, and of masses of sulphur which are met with here and there, as also of certain igneous formations, the region of the Dead Sea must not be included in the category of volcanic territories properly so called. On the contrary, in opposition to the assertions of certain travellers too richly endowed with imagination (e.g., Kusssegger and Van de Veldey), the very competent geologists already named agree in doubting whether any large part in the formation of this region ought to be attributed to igneous forces.¹

The calcareous beds rise in regular stages in the W. bank from the margin of the lake. On the other shore the arrangement is less regular, but under the surface as beds there are carboniferous strata and beneath these are other formations still more ancient. At the most it may be assumed that certain volcanic agitations have made themselves felt in the depths of the lake. Blankensford (op. cit. 1:25, p. 53) records and attaches importance to an observation made by Molyneux and quoted by Kuter (756 f.) relating to a whitish belt of foam stretching from the NW. of the lake towards the Irtan and following on the whole the modern line of the lake, above which a whitish vapour lingered in the air. From this phenomenon, supported by certain other indications, he concludes the existence of a fault in the floor of the lake which is produced in the channel skirting the Irtan and terminates in the S. portion of the lake near the calcareous shore of the W. Molyneux. On 10th March (this year) 1892 the author of this article witnessed the same phenomenon as that seen by Molyneux in 1847.

In a general way we might describe the geological formation of the Jordan valley and the Dead Sea basin by the technical expression synclinal.

7. The story in Gen. 19. The phenomenon occurred at the time of the transition from the tertiary to the quaternary epoch. It is not possible, therefore, to establish any relation between the formation of the Dead Sea as a whole and the catastrophe described in Gen. 19.

At most that narrative might possibly admit of being connected with certain events of a more local character and of secondary importance, which might have occurred within historic times (see LOT, SODOM, SODOM).

As we have not to deal with the historical side of the question, but with the geological only, it will suffice to say (a) that the text of Genesis speaks of a rain of fire and brimstone and a pillar of smoke rising to heaven, but neither of an earthquake, nor of an igneous eruption, nor of a local condition; (b) that there is nothing to show that the cities of the Pentapolis were in the plain of Sodom; (c) that the remark in Gen. 14:1 'the plain of Sodom which is the Salt Sea' may be a conjecture of the narrator or even the gloss of a copyist or late reader; (d) that account must be taken of the mention of the kikkar of Jordan (Gen. 13:10-12; 19:17:25:2-26); (e) that possibly a distinction must be made between the actual position of the Pentapolis and the position assigned to it by later writers, inasmuch as these entertained perhaps divergent opinions as to this point; (f) that the position of Zoar is as problematical as that of the other four cities; (g) that scholars are divided as to whether the cities were placed on the Pentapolis in the N. of the Dead Sea, or those which lay in the S.

In complete contrast with the sombre narratives regarding these doomed cities, the D.L. at two prophetic passages of Lament and Zechariah (cp. 1:11, 13), describes the transformation of the waste and barren regions of the Dead Sea basin into a fertile stream issuing from the temple, fertilising all that it touches so that fish and fruit-bearing trees abound.

the triumphal ode, Judg. 5. The Israelites, particularly the tribes which had settled about the plain of Jezreel, had been reduced to great straits by the Canaanites, who, holding the fortified cities along the plain (Judg. 17), blockaded the main roads and cut off communication, while from their strongholds they harried the country so that the unwall'd villages were deserted (56 f.). Incited by Deborah, the Israelites at last took up arms against their oppressors. Under Barak as their leader, Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasse united with Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali, and gave battle to Sisera and the confederate Canaanite kings in the plain not far from Taanach and Megiddo. The Canaanites, notwithstanding their formidable iron chariots, were put to rout; the waters of the Kishon completed their ruin. Sisera, seeking refuge in flight at a nomad's tent, was killed by a woman, Jael.

The history of the struggle is related somewhat differently in chap. 4,² according to which Barak, at the summons of Deborah, raised ten thousand men of the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali, occupied Mt. Tabor, and from that position attacked Sisera as the latter was advancing against him. A more serious difference is that in chap. I the oppressor of Israel, from whom it is by Deborah, is Jabin king of Hazor, a city in Upper Galilee, whilst Sisera is only Jabin's general. In the act of the story, however, Jabin plays no part; and we can only surmise that the story of Sisera has, by mistake, been connected with a tradition of a conflict between some northern tribes and the king of Hazor (see also

From chap. 4 we learn that Deborah was a priestess, an inspired woman; that her husband's name was Lappidoth; and that her home was between Beth Ramah, whither the Israelites resorted to her for judgment. Chap. 5 is, however, seems to prove that she was of the tribe of Issachar; and other considerations would incline us to think that she lived in or near the plain of Jezreel. (For a conjecture on this subject see DABERATH.) That her home was in Mt. Ephraim has been inferred by the author of 45 (in addition to the narrative) from the existence of a tomb of Deborah under a tree below Bethel, where, according to the patriarchal legend (see below, no. 2), the Rebekah was buried (Gen. 35:8).

Barak, who shares with Deborah the glory victory, was from Kedesh in Naphtali (46).

2. Barak. is somewhat remote, and in the account Sisera's flight seems impossible. It has been conjectured by Wellhausen (CH 221) that that of the more famous Kedesh in Galilee has been planted an obscure KEDESH (q v., 2) in Issachar 674 [57]—mentioned with Daberath not far from Tabur; a suggestion which is the more plausible, if, as the text be sound, connects Barak also 515, if the text be sound, connects Barak also Issachar (cp BEZAVANIM KISHON). It is likely that Kedesh in Naphtali, in the immediate vicinity of Hazor, comes in some way from the north.

The Song of Deborah bears in itself the evidence it is the work of one who had lived through the struggle which it celebrates, and that reason of inestimable value.

Few odes in the world's literature, indeed, compared with this triumphal Te Deum. Unfortunately the text, especially in vv. 8-15, has suffered grievously from the injuries of time.

Until very recent times, Deborah has been universally believed to be the author. It is ascribed to her in the title; and this testimony was thought to be conclusively confirmed by 2: 7, 'Until I, Deborah, arose.' The use of the Hebrew verbs in this verse, however, is ambiguous, and the clause might equally well be interpreted, 'thou didst arise, Deborah' (cp 2: 12), whilst 3: 23 can be rendered in the third person (cp 2: 15). On the other hand, the natural inference from 2: 15, and especially from 2: 12, is that the heroine is not the poet.

DECALOGUE

(207) Ezek. 18:7. ἀρεοφίλις. Lk. 7:40. See LAW AND JUSTICE, § 16, and TRADE AND COMMERCE.

DECALOGUE (ἡ δεκάλογος, see BIBLICAL, de z. logos, se. liber), a term adopted from Patristic Greek and Latin, and meaning what we commonly call the ten commandments. Ultimately, the name comes from the LXX which in this case adheres closely to the original Hebrew and speaks, not of ten commandments,

1. Meaning of the term. but of ten words (δέκα λόγος or piguara, Ex. 34:28 Dt. 4:13 104). The decalogue, according to the biblical narrative, was uttered by God from Horeb and written by him on two tables of stone which he had prepared. Afterwards, when Moses had broken the tables in indignation at the idolatry of the people, he was laden to hew other tables on which God again wrote the ten words. They were the foundation of a covenant (berith) between Yahwe and his people (Dt. 10) and were placed in the ark as the 'testimony' (eduth) or revelation of Yahwe's will (Ex. 25:16); see COVENANT, § 6 (n.).

The two parallel texts of the decalogue, one in Ex. 20 the other in Dt. 5, present striking points of difference.

2. The two texts. In Exodus the Sabbath is to be kept, because Yahwe made all things in six days and rested the seventh; in Deuteronomy, because the slave as well as his master needs rest. Here, too, as in the command to honour parents, there are amplifications of language peculiar to the version in Deuteronomy. In Exodus the Israelite is forbidden to covet his neighbour's house, and then wife, slave, and cattle are specified as possessions included within the Hebrew idea of house or household. In Deuteronomy the commandment is adapted to a later and more humane view. First, the Israelite is not to 'covet' his neighbour's wife. Next, he is not to 'desire' his neighbour's house, land, slaves, etc. The separation of the wife from mere property is very significant (see FAMILY, § 6).

How comes it that the parallel texts vary so seriously? The answer now generally given is that originally the decalogue was composed of concise precepts, which were expanded in different ways by later editors. The decalogue was incorporated in his work by the Elohist; it was repeated by the Deuteronomist and lastly by the Priestly Writer. No wonder then that, in the final redaction of the Pentateuch, each text of the decalogue offers clear marks of the Deuteronomistic style, whilst in Ex. 20:11 the Deuteronomite motive of humanity has been supplanted by the example of God's rest after the week of creation—evidence of a super-redaction in the spirit of P (cp. Ex. 31:17 Gen. 2:2). Commandments 6-9 preserve their primitive form. We may therefore on that analogy restore the decalogue to its original form thus:—

DECALOGUE OF EXODUS 20

1. Thou shalt have no other gods beside me.
2. Thou shalt not make unto thee any (graven) image.
3. Thou shalt not take the name of Yahwe thy God for a vain oath.
4. Remember the sabbath day to hallow it.
5. Honour thy father and thy mother.
6. Thou shalt do no murder.
7. Thou shalt not commit adultery.
8. Thou shalt not steal.
9. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.
10. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house.

(a) In their arrangement the commandments fall into two pentads, or sets of five each, corresponding to the two tables. The first table sets forth the law of piety in the pure worship of Yahwe and in reverence to parents, the

3. Arrangement. second table exhibits the law of probity or duty to fellow Israelites. (b) The scheme known to Philo (De Decalogo, 12) and Josephus (Ant. iii. 55), adopted by the Greek and Anglican churches, as also by the Scottish and other churches of the Calvinistic type, and approved, among recent scholars, by Dillmann.

Another arrangement adopted by Knobel and, in 1869, by Kuhn, is to count the opening statement, 'I am Yahwe thy God,' etc., as the first 'word,' and bind the commandments against foreign god- and image-worship into one. This is the Talmudic division, which is still in force among the Jews, and is also of greater antiquity in the Greek church than some have supposed.

Augustine too (and he is followed by Roman Catholics and Lutherans), treats the prohibition of serving other gods and worshipping images as one commandment. He makes this the first, however, not, like the modern Jews the second 'word.' Hence he has to divide the prohibition of coveting into two commandments, viz.: one against coveting a neighbour's wife, the other against coveting his goods. The objection to the Talmudic scheme is the awkwardness of a law which makes up the number ten from one statement of fact and nine precepts. The Augustinian scheme cannot be bettered to the text in Exodus and causally have been intended even by the Deuteronomist.

The order given by the Vatican text of the LXX in Exodus is: 'Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not murder,' and in Deuteronomy 'Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not murder, Thou shalt not steal.' Probably the variation arose from the belief that the prohibition of adultery, as the destruction of family life, should be immediately connected with the injunction to honour parents.

We come next to the question of date. The Elohist document (perhaps a later edition of it) is our earliest

4. Date. external witness, and that does not carry us back beyond the middle of the eighth century B.C. Nor does internal evidence point to a much earlier time. The character of the decalogue, which is not ritual but almost purely moral; the prohibition of images, apparently unknown to Elijah and Elisha; the refinement which forbids thoughts of covetousness (the Hebrew cannot fairly be taken otherwise); all lend support to the view that the decalogue is grounded on the teaching of the great prophets of whose discourses we have written records. It has been compared with the loftier teaching in Micah 6:8, and may belong to the same age, i.e., at earliest that of Manasseh (see, further, MOSTS).

The reasons against a date very much earlier are clinched by the modern discovery that there was another decalogue older in character. True, we cannot say for certain how each particular precept of this older decalogue ran. We do know, however, that reference is made to it by the Yahwist in Ex. 34:28, and further, that the decalogue itself is imbedded in 1:29, and there is, therefore, no doubt about its general character. Wellhausen's reconstruction is as follows:—

DECALOGUE OF EXODUS 34

1. Thou shalt worship no other god.
2. Thou shalt make thee no molten gods.
3. The feast of unleavened bread shalt thou keep.
4. Every firstling is mine.
5. Thou shalt observe the feast of weeks.
6. And the feast of ingathering at the year's end.
7. Thou shalt not offer the blood of thy sacrifice with leaven.
8. The fat of my feast shall not be left over till the morning.
9. The best of the firstfruits of thy land shalt thou bring to the house of Yahwe thy God.
10. Thou shalt not seethe a kid in its mother's milk.

The Yahwistic legend which encloses this decalogue is simpler and more natural, for here it is Moses not

1 Geffken (Einteilung des Dekaloges, 1738) found it first in Synellus (circa 790 A.D.) and Cedrinus (1119); but Nestle has shown that it is to be met with in the Codex Vaticanus and the Amosianus. See Nestle, F. P. Times, 426 f. (July 1890) and cp. Redpath, Codex Zithavensis, F. P. Times, 832 (May 1891).

2 CH 31 C; cp. Stade, GLT 510; Stark, Deuteronomium, 7.

3 According to the more original text in Ex. 23:18.

4 The number ten is gained by omitting the command of the seventh-day rest (which is out of place in the cycle of annual feasts) and the command that all males should appear before Yahwe twice in the year (which is merely a recapitulation of the three preceding laws).

Yahwé, who hews the tables and writes the words. The decalogue represents that ritual of outward worship which was essential to the early stages of national religion, but was subordinated to ethical monotheism by Amos and his successors. Yet even this decalogue must be put long after the time of Moses. The texts mentioned imply an agricultural life, and must have been adopted by the Israelites after their settlement.

DECAPOLIS (ΔΕΚΑΠΟΛΙΣ [Pl. VII]) is the name given in the gospels (Mt. 4: 13; Mk. 5: 23) to a territory in Bashan and Gilead covered, or affected, by the power of a league of ten or more Greek cities (called in Mk. 7: 31 τὰ δέκα πόλεις, ΔΕΚΑΠΟΛΙΣ, by Pliny HN v. 15, Decapolitana regio). Josephus calls the league itself both ΔΕΚΑΠΟΛΙΣ (B.J. iii. 97) and αἱ ἐν τῇ Συρίᾳ δέκα πόλεις (Vita, 65-74). Other early instances of the name are Ptolemy v. 1522, and C.G. no. 450, of the time of Hadrian. Eusebius describes the Decapolis of the Gospels as a region (see below, § 2).

The first Greek cities in Syria were founded by the veterans of Alexander, and from his time their numbers were rapidly increased by the immigration of Greeks under the patronage of the Seleucids and Ptolemies. On the west the Greeks settled in ultimately Hellenised Phoenician and Philistine towns; but beyond Jordan many of their settlements were upon fresh sites. Among the oldest were Pella, Dion, Philadelphia (on the site of Rabath-Ammon), Gadara, and Abila—all strong fortresses by 218 B.C. (Polyb. 5: 71; 16: 10; Jos. Ant. vii. 34; Stark, Gaza, 381). Bosra had become largely Greek in the time of the Maccabees (1 Macc. 5: 24 ff.). Gerasa and Hippus are not mentioned till the first century B.C. (Jos. Ant. viii. 153-4; B.J. i. 18).

As the Hellenic world came under Roman sway, various confederacies of Greek cities were formed, both for purposes of trade, like the Haemastatic League, and for defence against alien races (Mommson, Prov. of the Rom. Emp., Eng. ed. 1: 264 f.). Such confederation was nowhere more necessary than in Syria, where, after the success of the Maccabees, and especially under the Jewish king Alexander Jannaeus (104-78 B.C.), the Greek cities must needs have combined against the common danger of overthrow and absorption by their Semitic neighbours. Such combinations, however, if they were formed, proved a failure till the Roman legions led by Pompey reached Syria in 65. Then the Greek cities took a new lease of life. Several called themselves after Pompey and several dated their eras from the year of his Syrian campaign, 64-63 B.C. Among these were Gadara, Hippus, Pella, Dion, Abila, Kanatha, and Philadelphia. Pompey gave them, or after this time they gradually received, municipal freedom, the rights of coinage, asylum, property in the surrounding districts, and association with one another. They were, however, put under the Roman Province of Syria (Ant. xiv. 44; B.J. i. 77), and taxed for imperial purposes; their coins bore 'the image of Caesar'; and they were liable to military service (B.J. ii. 1819). Some of them, certainly with the reservation of their rights, were afterwards transferred from the Governor of Syria to the direct authority of Herod.

From Pompey's time to Hadrian's (106 A.D.), Rome's grasp of Eastern Palestine was neither constant nor effective. It was during this time, and in this region of unsettlement, that the League of the Decapolis. The precise year we are unable to fix, it may have been till after Herod's death in 4 B.C., but it was soon after Pompey's campaign.

2. The Decapolis. At first, as the name implies, the league comprised ten cities. Only one of Jordan—Scythopolis, the ancient Bethshan—remained the approach to the others, by Ladsraclon, the Greek cities of the coast and the Levant, Scythopolis remained the capital of the league. All the other cities either upon the three great roads which, traversed E. Palestine, or on the trunk road, ultimately joined: Pella, Gadara, and Hippus, on the edge of the Jordan valley, and the Lake of Gerasa (modern Jerash), and Philadelphia (near the S. road); Raphana, somewhere near the road; Kanatha (now Kanawat, see KENATH), the central road joins the great trunk road from S. at the foot of the Jebel Hamrân; and Damascus, the junction of this road with the northernmost three roads. All the sites are certain except Dion, Raphana and of Dion. These form the earliest list we have—Pliny in HN 5: 15. Other cities added. Ptolemy gives eighteen, omitting Raphana, adding other nine, mostly towards Damascus.—At a branch of the Varunk 12 m. E. of Gadara; K. either the modern Kerak or el Kumeiyeh in en-N. Kapitolas, probably the modern Beit er-Ras, Irbid; and some of the Semitic towns incorporated in the extension of the Empire in 106, such as Ladsraclon, Bosra. Each of these cities held sway over the territory in its neighbourhood. Round Hippus was Hippus (B.J. iii. 31); round Gadara the country of the Gadarenes (Mk. 5: 23 according to one reading), which, if we judge from the traces on some Gadarene coins, extended to the Lake of Galilee. In the fourth century Jerome calls all Gilead the region of Gerasa. These sub-properties or spheres of influence must have touched one another, and the remains of the long aqueduct the centre of Hamrân by Edrei to Gadara is one of how far they extended. The 'Decapolitan region' (of Decapolis) was, therefore, a wide and ill-defined, territory lying on the E. of the Lake of Galilee and stretching across a large part of Gilead. Eusebius (OS) defines the Decapolis of the Gospels as lying in Peraea round Hippus, Pella, and Gadara. Pliny, however, describes it as interpenetrated by Jewish Tetrarchies (HN 5: 16); and in particular territories of Herod Antipas in Galilee and Peraea probably so joined across Jordan as to cut off, from E. Decapolis, the suburban territory of Scythopolis.

Within this region of Decapolis Hellenism was dominant. On the time of the ministry of Jesus, and the time of the Decapolis, it flowed out upon Galilee. This proved by a trace or two in Galilee themselves (e.g., the presence of a large temple of some in Gadara), by the ample ruins, still extant Greek architecture (the most glorious period of which, however, was not till the time of the Antonines), especially by the constant communication between Decapolis and the Mediterranean ports and Greece, and by the flourishing state of Greek literature in Ten Cities. The Decapolis had, in each city, temples to purely Hellenic deities, theatres, amphitheatres, and various athletic institutions. Yearly were the παγκάδοι celebrated—games in which every form of physical strength was exhibited. There was a vigorous municipal life of democratic constitution. Gadara was the birthplace or home of Philodēmus the Epicurean contemporary of Cicero, Meleager the epigrammatist, Ménippas the satirist, Theodōrus the rhetorician (tutor of Tiberius), and others. The Greek writers of Damascus are still better known. Gerasa had a school famous for its teachers. Besides, the League, being largely a commercial union, pushed the Greek method of trade across W. Palestine; the result is seen in the DEDICATION, FEAST OF THE. On the 15th of Chislew of the year 145 of the Seleucid era (Dec. 165 B.C.), during the religious persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes, a pagan altar was set up on the site of burnt offering at Jerusalem, and on the 25th of the same month sacrifice was for the first time offered upon it (1 Macc. 1:40-64; 2 Macc. 6:1-11; Jos. xii. 54). Three years afterwards (195 B.C.), as the Maccabees had recovered Jerusalem and the temple, The temple was then cleansed, the altar of burnt offering displaced by one entirely new, new vessels made, and the temple reconsecrated with festivities. These lasted for eight days, beginning on 25th Chislew 148 of the Seleucid era (Dec. 165 B.C.), it is, on the very day on which, three years before, the altar had been desecrated (1 Macc. 4:10-30).

196 it was observed after the murder of the feast of Tabernacles, and in another passage it is even called the feast of tabernacles of the month Tishrey (hupai ris syngoungias toe xaseoi, a Marc. Ev.). The special and distinguishing peculiarity in its celebration was the illumination of synagogues and houses.

At the close of a performance one light, at least, to the honor of those who had paid the expense, as in the case of a light to the crew members in the house, had to be displayed on the second balcony.

Jewish tradition explains the eight-days' situation of the lights, and the custom of displaying lights, by the assertion that Jews found only one small trace of consecrated oil, but that it lasted for eight days instead of only for one.

The probability is that the illumination, like the chubrit and other features of the feast, was taken over from the feast of tabernacles and referred to the re-lighting of the golden candlestick (cf. Matt. 13: 10; 23: 35; Luke 11: 14).

GREEK occurs in a passage of some interest with reference to early church offices. What is the 'good' (AV) or rather, 'good standing' (RV) which is ascribed to those who have 'served well as deacons'? εὖ καλὸς is the phrase. According to Hort (Chr. Ecol.) it means the vantage-ground of influence and moral integrity won by the excellent discharge of official duties. Joret, de Wette, etc., however, find a reference to divine reward at the great judgment; whilst Jerome, Fathers, Baur, Holtzmann, and von Soden it is pronounced in the episcopate that is intended, and that the qualities required of an ἐπίσκοπος in the one are analogous to those required in the other.

DEHAVITES. RV Dehaites (דְּהַיִּטִּים, Kt., but דְּהַיִּטִּים, Kr.; דְּהַיִּטִּים [A], -הַיִּטִּים [L], but A omits 'Elanites'), generally regarded as one of the peoples represented in Samaria among the colonists of ASSUPPER (Ezra 4.9). They stand apparently between the Susanchites (Susani) and the Elanites. No plausible identification has yet been offered (see Schr. A 17²⁰ 376, 610).

The reason is plain, as soon as it is mentioned. If we point, with G. Hoffmann (Z 1254), דְּהַיִּטִּים, and take this with the following word דְּהַיִּטִּים, we shall get the phrase 'that is, Elanites' (דְּהַיִּטִּים already has or עֵשֶׂה דְּהַיִּטִּים), which is an explanatory gloss on the preceding word 'Susanchites.' Delilah dwelt in the vale of SOREK (p. 7), and we may presume that the tradition regarded her as a Philistine. Her temporary relation to the Philistine princes hardly warrants us in calling her a 'political agent' (Smith's *DB*² s.v.). See SAMSON.

DELUGE. Postponing the various interesting questions, as well of comparative folk-lore (§§ 18-20) as of biblical theology (§§ 10 ff. 17), which are connected with the title of this article, let us confine ourselves at present to the relation between the Hebrew Flood-story and that of Babylonia.

1. Babylonian Flood-story. Of all the parallel traditions of a deluge the Babylonian is undeniably the most important, because the points of contact between it and the Hebrew story are so striking that the view of the dependence of one of the two on the other is directly suggested even to the most cautious of students. The account in the Berossian excerpts will be referred to below (see § 16); but we may state here that the genuine Babylonian character of the Berossian story has, since 1872, been raised above all doubt by George Smith's discovery, in the remains of the library of Ashur-bani-pal, of a copy of a very ancient cuneiform Deluge-story derived, it would seem, from the city of Šurippak in Babylonia, and by a more recent discovery by Scheil (see § 6). The former story fills the first four columns of the eleventh tablet of the epic of Gilgamesh,¹ a cycle of legends to which, in studying the early narratives of Genesis, we have so frequently to refer (see, e.g., CAINITES, § 6).

A paraphrase of its contents is all that we can give here: translations of recent date and critical in character will be found in K. 17²⁰ 55 ff. (by Paul Haupt); Jensen's Kosm. 367 ff.; A. Jeremias's Isidubar-Nimrod, 32 ff.; Muss-Arnolt's essay in Bibl. World, 3. 109 ff. ('94); and Gunkel's Schiff, 423 ff. (by H. Zimmern).¹ gods, more especially Bel, wrath at the sins of men determine to bring upon them a judgment consisting in a great all-destroying flood. One of the gods, however, namely Ea, selects a favoured man, named Pār-nāpīstī,² of the city of Šurippak, for deliverance. This is the Xisuthrus of Berossus, and he it observed that the name Xisuthrus is found, in all probability, by transcribing the two component parts of Atra-hasis—i.e., 'very wise,' or, still better perhaps (so Haupt), 'the v. pious'—one designation of the hero of the cuneiform account. Pār(?)-nāpīstī is in a dream acquainted by the purpose of the gods, and commanded to build a ship (šippa, cp Aram. שִׁפָּה), the form of which prescribed, as a means of saving his life, and to take with him into it 'seeds of life of all kinds' (L. 2). Accordingly, the ship is built; its dimensions³ are given with great precision by the poet, who mentions that it was coated within and without with bitumen (kuṣra), and that cells were made in it. Into this vessel Pār(?)-nāpīstī brings gold and silver and 'seeds of life of all kinds,' besides his family and servants, beasts of the field, and wild beasts of the field (L. 84 ff.). Shortly before the Flood, the beginning of which is made known to him by a special sign, Pār(?)-nāpīstī himself enters the ship and bars the door, while his steersman, named Puzur-Bel, takes over the direction of the vessel (L. 94). Upon this the deluge begins: it is thought of as a loosening of all the elemental powers, torrents of rain, storm and tempest, together with thick darkness. The waters rise higher and higher, till the whole land becomes a sea; all men and animals, except those in the ship, perish. Six days and nights the flood rages; on the seventh day a calm sets in. Then Pār(?)-nāpīstī opens the air-hole (L. 136; nāpāšu = nāpāšu, cp עֲשֵׂה), and sees the widespread ruin. At the same time land emerges, and the ship grounds on the mountain of Nisir (L. 141).⁴ After seven days more Pār(?)-nāpīstī sends out successively a dove, a swallow, and a raven. The dove and the swallow, finding no place of rest, return to the ship; but the raven is seen no more. Upon this Pār(?)-nāpīstī clears the ship and offers a sacrifice on the summit of the mountain. 'The gods smelt the savour, the gods smelt the sweet savour. The gods gathered like flies about the sacrificer' (L. 160-162). As for Bel, however, he is at first displeased at the deliverance of Pār(?)-nāpīstī and his household; but on the representations of Ea,⁵ who points out the rashness of his act in causing a universal deluge, and recommends the sending of wild animals, famine, and pestilence, as a more fitting mode of punishing humankind, Bel becomes reconciled to the escape of Pār(?)-nāpīstī, and even gives him and his wife a share of the divine nature, and causes them to dwell 'afar off, at the mouth of the rivers' (L. 199-205).

Before attempting to explain this Deluge-story, and comparing it with the corresponding Hebrew account, we must consider the position which it occupies in Babylonian literature. It stands at present, as we have seen, in close connection with other traditional stories, and particularly with the cycle of Gilgamesh-legends. The hero, Gilgamesh, who, after his various adventures, is visited with a sore disease, sets out on the way to his ancestors Par(?)-napišti, whose dwelling is remote from that of all other men, beyond the river of death (cp. CANTILLAS, § 6; ENOCH, § 2). From this fortunate possessor of eternal life, Gilgamesh hopes to learn how to obtain, not only the cure of his disease, but also the same supreme felicity. Par(?)-napišti answers by a detailed description of the Deluge, in which he was himself so prominent a figure, and at the end of which he was admitted to the life of the gods. Obviously, the present connection of the Deluge-story with the Gilgamesh-tradition is secondary in character, and it becomes all the more reasonable to maintain that the Hebrew Deluge-story too has only an artificial connection with the framework in which it now stands. Noah may originally have had no more connection with Nimrod than Par(?)-napišti with Gilgamesh (see NIMROD, NOAH).

The secondary character of the present connection of the Babylonian Deluge-story being granted, can we venture to indicate a more original connection? According to Berosus,¹ Xisuthrus (the hero of the Deluge) was the last of the ten primitive Babylonian kings, whose immensely long lives so forcibly remind us of those ascribed to the antediluvian patriarchs in Genesis, and, as has been repeatedly pointed out,² are closely related to the theory of an artificially-calculated cosmic year. The Berosian cosmic year had the enormous duration of 518,400 ordinary years, and each of its twelve months consisted of 12 sari—i.e., (12 × 3600), 43,200 ordinary years. According to this system, ten cosmic months are equivalent to 432,000 years, and this is exactly the number of the years assigned by Berosus to the ten antediluvian Babylonian kings (cp. CHRONOLOGY, § 4, end). The theory of the Babylonians appears to have been that these ten primitive kings reigned during the first ten cosmic months of the great cosmic year (each king for a cosmic month), and that the Deluge fell at the end of the tenth month. Now, the eleventh month was for the Babylonians (who began the year with the vernal equinox) the time from the middle of January to the middle of February—in other words, the middle of the rainy or winter season.

It is also to the winter season that the position of the Deluge-narrative in the Gilgamesh-epic points—more particularly to the eleventh month Šebāt (Jan.-Feb.). For, as Sir Henry Rawlinson saw, the twelve tablets of the adventures of Gilgamesh stand in relation to the passage of the sun-god through the twelve months of the year, and the principal event on every tablet has its analogue in the corresponding one of the twelve signs of the zodiac, which, as is now certainly known, had their origin in Babylonia. Now, it is the eleventh tablet that contains the Deluge-story, and the eleventh zodiacal sign is Aquarius. The conclusion is obvious. Lastly, it is also probable that the Assyrian name of the eleventh month, Šabātū (probably 'destruction'), and its ideographic designation as '(month of the) curse of rain,' both have reference to the Deluge. Clearly the connection of the Deluge-story with the story of the ten primitive kings is much more close and original than its present connection with the Gilgamesh-legends. The fixing of the great catastrophe in the eleventh month is a fact of importance with reference to the question, which will shortly (§ 8) claim to be answered: Has the Deluge-story a historical kernel, or is it simply and entirely a nature-myth?

The elaborate account in the Gilgamesh-epic is not the only cuneiform record of the Babylonian Deluge-story. Peiser has published (Z. 14 190 f.) [80] a mythological text, with a map, giving a primitive picture of Babylonia at the time of the Deluge under Par(?)-napišti. The text is very fragmentary; but as far as it can, with the help of the map, be understood, this is the notion of the Flood which it suggests.

—The Persian Gulf was conceived of as encompassing Babylonia, and round about this ocean lay seven islands. The mountain of the Deluge was due north of Babylon, but still within the tract enclosed by the ocean. It is noteworthy that the time of the Deluge is apparently designated in this text—'the year of the great serpent.'

[Further, among the tablets in the Constantinople museum Scheil has recently discovered a mutilated fragment of a new Deluge-story, containing

6. Scheil's fragment. part of column 1 f. 7 f. In the twelfth line occurs the word šubūt ('refined'), which, according to Scheil, suggests that our tablet is but a copy of a much older original which had been injured. The date of the tablet itself, however, is sufficiently ancient: 'month of Šebāt, day 28, the year in which Ammu-zaduga built the fortress of Ammu-zaduga at the mouth of the Euphrates'—not much later than 2150 B.C. By whom the story is told, is not evident. The complaints of mankind are spoken of first; the god Kammur appears to be angry with them. Thereupon a god pronounces sentence upon mankind; reference is made to a destroying rain-storm. In the seventh column the god En speaks. He expostulates with the other god for wishing to destroy men. 'Some men at least, En will save; let them come into [the vessel] . . . the ear (?) . . . let him come . . . let him bring . . . let him . . .'. That the great Deluge is referred to is now clear: the occurrence of the word abubu must dispel all doubt. In the eighth column only two lines are complete; but these contain a reference to Atra-hasis (Xisuthrus), who is introduced speaking 'to his lord'—i.e., to the god who has proved himself a friend to the human race. The name of the scribe suggests to Scheil that this version of the Deluge-story is that which was current in the city of Sippar¹ (see § 10).]

We have also a list of royal names which bears the inscription, 'These are the post-diluvian kings of Babylonia,' thus implicitly confirming the Berosian distinction between kings before and kings after the Deluge (cp. COT 160).

7. Other references. The word here used for Deluge is abubu (cp. below, § 13), which elsewhere is of frequent occurrence,² the Deluge being referred to as an event of hoary antiquity—i.e., when it is said of old inscriptions that they go back to the time before the Deluge (abubu). See TRILAH.

We have now to take up the question, What was probably the true origin of this Babylonian Deluge-story, looking at it by itself, without comparing the Hebrew records? The first thing that strikes us is the harmony between the narrative and the local conditions of Babylonia, which justifies us in regarding that country as the native place of the story. It is more difficult to determine whether any real historical event lies at the foundation of the narrative, or whether we have to do with a mere myth. In itself it would, of course, not be inconceivable that in days of yore an unusually extensive flood from the Persian Gulf, combined with continuous rain, burst upon the Babylonian lowlands, and destroyed countless human lives; that a dim tradition of this event was preserved; and that the Babylonian Deluge-story was a last deposit produced by this genuine occurrence. Judging, however, from what is known of the growth of myths and legends, especially among the Babylonians,

² [abubu, 'storm,' is also used as a title for the god Marduk's weapon in the Creation-story, Tab. iv. 49, and King Hammur-rabi calls himself abū tukumatim, 'tempest of battles,' KB 3a 115.]

we think that this is far from probable. The entire character of the narrative, and the connection with other myths indicated above, are much more favourable to the view that we have to do, not with a legend based upon facts, but with a myth which has assumed the form of a history (cp below, col. 1063, note 3). The colouring may have been partly supplied by the cyclones which, in an alluvial country like Babylonia, frequently make their appearance from the sea; but the origin of this myth will have to be sought in quite another direction. We noticed above that the great catastrophe is placed by the Babylonians in the middle of the winter season, in the eleventh month¹ (Sabit=Jan.-Feb.), which was regarded as specially the time of storms, and had for its patron the rain-god and storm god Ramman. To the present writer it seems most probable that the Deluge-story was originally a nature-myth, representing the phenomena of winter, which in Babylonia especially is a time of rain. The hero rescued in the ship must originally have been the sun-god.² Thus, the Deluge and the deliverance of Par(?)-napišti are ultimately but a variant to the Babylonian Creation-myth (see CREATION, § 2 f.). Now we can understand the very peculiar designation of the Deluge-period mentioned already. The 'great serpent' is no other than the personified ocean, which on the old Babylonian map (see above, § 5) encircles Babylonia, just as 'Leviathan the wreathed serpent' (Is. 27:1) is the world-encircling ocean personified as a serpent;³ it is the same monster that is a central figure in the Creation-story.

The question as to the relation of the Babylonian to the Hebrew Deluge-story can now be satisfactorily answered. If, as we believe, the former had its origin in Babylonia, and is fundamentally a myth of winter and the sun-god, the Hebrew story must have been borrowed from the Babylonian. In this case, Dillmann's theory of a common Semitic tradition, which developed among the Hebrews in one way, and among the Babylonians in another, is once more put out of count (see CREATION, § 4).

The Israelitish story of the submergence of the earth (i.e., of the part known to the narrators) by a Deluge is found in the Book of Genesis (6:5-9:10) in two forms, belonging respectively to J₂ and to P, which have been welded together (see GENESIS, § 8). There are also allusions to the story (all late) in Ezek. 14:14-20, Is. 54:9, Ps. 29:10, Is. 21:15, Job 22:15 f. (2). It remains to be seen, however, whether the two forms of the tradition in Genesis are really independent; it may be that, as in the case of the Creation-story (see CREATION, § 12), P has only given a somewhat different setting to data which he has derived from J₂. It is no objection to this view that P's account is longer and in some respects less fragmentary than that of J₂. The editor (or editors) naturally preferred the former, because P's work was systematically adopted as the framework of the combined historical narrative. The three principal points in which P is fuller than J₂ are (1) the announcement of the coming deluge to Noah, and the command to build an ark (or chest), the measurements of which are prescribed; (2) the notice of the place where the ark grounded; and (3) the appointment of the rainbow as the sign of the covenant between God and man. On all these points, we may safely presume, information was given in J₂. To suppose that the latter began with 'And Yahwe said to Noah, Go thou with a into the ark,' would be absurd, and Budde is right in supposing that the measurements in Gen. 7:15 come from J₂, who on his side derived them from some form of the Babylonian (cp GÖRNER-WOOD). Budde has also made that J₂ gave a statement as to the resting-place of the ark, which he placed among the mountains Kasdim. P knew that there were higher than these in the N., and transferred the ARARAT (Z. IV, § 3); though it is probable the support of the later Babylonian tradition (Berosus).

¹ The fragments of Berosus mention Daisius (May-June) as the month of the Deluge. This notice is suspicious on several grounds. The writer who excerpted Berosus probably identified the eighth Babylonian month Arad-samma (Marheswan (Oct.-Nov.) with the eighth Syro-Macedonian month Daisius. The biblical revision also makes the Deluge begin in Marheswan. On this view, both Berosus and the OT placed the beginning of the Deluge early in the winter, instead of in the middle of that season—an easily intelligible variant.

Nor need we doubt that the episode of J₂ also was told by J₂ to whose delicate imagination it would be in a high degree congenial.

11. Rainbow episode. It is true, there is nothing like the Deluge-story given in the Gilgamesh, but we do not know all the variants of the myth. Most probably, however, J₂ may honour of having invented this exquisite covenant. The covenant is distinctly Israelitish; the sign should be Israelitish too. A probable contact for the rainbow episode is suggested by words of the Babylonian poet (II, 92-102): 'A dark cloud came up from the foundation of Ramman (the storm-god) thundered therein, noise of Ramman penetrated to heaven; its brightness into obscurity.' The flashes of lightning, the storm-god's arrows (Is. 66:15) [41 7843] and when the storm ceases, the god lays aside (this is said, e.g., of the god Ishtar, after his the demons). If the Hebrew story in its origin referred to the thundering of Yahwe, we believe that when J₂ appended the account, he said to himself that the bow which had laid aside could be no other than the rainbow. There is, at any rate, no exact mythic parallel to the use made of the rainbow in Gen. 9:12-13.

There are also other points of difference between J₂ and P. (2) The latter is without the vivid

12. P's deviations. the sending out of the birds (Gen. 8:1-12); such a prosaic writer would think these superfluous. (3) The important point is P's non-recognition of the difference between clean and unclean animals (Gen. 7:2-3). His not mentioning the sacrifice which, according to Gen. 8:20, Noah offered after leaving the ark, is a cause of these deviations of P is obvious. His theory of the origin of the cultus imposed on him the necessity of harmonising the tradition with it.

(4) Not less remarkable is the difference between J₂ and P as to the duration of the Deluge. According to J₂, seven days elapsed after the command to enter the ark; then the rain-storm¹ came, and it rained forty days and forty nights; then in three days the waters disappeared. The computation gives more occasion to debate.

It is stated in MT (7:11) that the deluge began on the seventh of the second month, and that on the twenty-second of the second month the following year the earth was dried. If this is correct, the flood lasted 1 year 11 days 17 hours. This is a lunar year form the basis of the computation, 354 days, which make a solar year. This looks very much like a correction; the flood really lasted a lunar year. As it reads in 7:11 'twenty-seventh' (EADL) instead of 'seventh' (MT), the solar year would be meant,² and the deluge (365 days) would be the same as that of Noah (365 years). We also learn that 'the water on the earth 150 days' (7:24 cp 8:3). This ought to be five months (711 84). But 150 days are more than five lunar months; it is clear that solar months must be meant (see, however, Di. Gen. 129 f., and his dissertation on the Calendar, Monatsher der Hebr. Akad., 1881, pp. 90 f.; Bacon, 'Chronology of the Account of the Flood in P¹ Hebrewa, 8 (92) 79-88; Nowak, II.1 2230).

We are thus enabled to some extent to reconstruct the Deluge-story of J₂. No doubt some archaic incidents have been lost, but P has preserved three of the most important details which were found in the earlier narrative, though he has moved the Mountain of the Ark northwards. He has also retained שָׁפָן (κατακλυσμός), J₂'s term for the Deluge; ¹ outside of J₂ and P in the Deluge-story, the term occurs only in Ps. 29.10 (post-exilic), and in Gen. 6.17 7.6 an editor has glossed it by the word מַיִם 'waters'; also שָׁפָן, 'chest' ² (κιβωτός, Vg. arca), used elsewhere only of Moses' ark of Nile-reeds (Ex. 23.5, θηλοῖς [BAF] θηλοῖν [1.]), and we may presume that the words נָח (see GOMER-WOOD) and בִּתְּוִן ³ 'bitumen,' both occurring in 6.14 and nowhere else, were retained from the lost narrative of J₂.

But what of J₁? Did his narrative of the origin of man contain any Deluge-story? No—at any rate, if the theory ably propounded by Budde be accepted. J₁'s narrative contained Gen. 2.4-5 3.1-24 6.1-4 9.1-27 (but on 27 see JAPHET III) 11.1-8; it included no Deluge-story. In this record Noah appears as the first agriculturist, and the inventor of wine. A corruption of the text, and perhaps editorial convenience, led to his identification with the hero of the Deluge, who (it is held) had originally the name of Enoch, but had now to take that of Noah in exchange (see NOAH). We need not, however, suppose that the Deluge-myth was unknown to the Israelites before J₂ wrote. It is in reality a pendant to the Creation-story: we should naturally have expected both stories to reach the Israelites at the same time. We have, indeed, no direct evidence of this; but the expression שָׁפָן has a very archaic appearance. At one time שָׁפָן must have had a meaning in Hebrew, and that time must have been long anterior to J₂. But the Deluge-myth, like the companion-story which underlies Gen. 1, did not, it seems, take a firm hold on the Israelitish people: when J₂, or (more probably) the earlier writer from whom he draws, shaped his story, the Deluge-myth had passed out of mind, and needed to be revived by the help of some one acquainted with cuneiform documents (cp CREATION, § 11 f.).

14. J₁ had no Deluge-story. Of the earliest Israelitish Deluge-myth and of its Canaanitish original we know nothing. (a) Lucian (100 A.D.), laughing in his sleeve, gives the Syrian Flood-story of his day; ⁴ but it has been partly Hellenised, and probably Judaised (a 'great box or chest,' ξάπρανξ, is spoken of), and we can lay no stress upon it. Its origin was no doubt Babylonian. 'Most people,' says Lucian, 'relate that the founder of the temple (of Hierapolis) was Deucalion-Sisythos.' (c) The Phœnician version of the myth, if there ever was one, has perished. ⁵ (d) The ¹ שָׁפָן, 'destruction': hence 'deluge' from Bab.-ass. nabāhu, 'to destroy'; cp שָׁפָן, שָׁפָן, a softened form of שָׁפָן, Gen. 6.4 Nu. 13.33. The word was chosen probably as a synonym for Bab.-ass. abāhu (deluge), on account of the assonance, when the Bab. Deluge-myth first became naturalised in Canaan. On the etym. cp Frd. Del. Par. 156; Haupt, in KAT 60; Cheyne, Psalmist, 320, Hebrewa, 3.175; Jensen, Eph. Times, 9. (e) ² שָׁפָן (derives from שָׁפָן, 'to rain' (against which see Del. Gen. 11 [87] 172, and cp König, Lehrb. 2.153). On the form of the Syriac loan-word minimū, cp König, 1.495. Such a notable mythological word as abāhu was certain to be naturalised in Canaan in some form (cp DELIAL).

³ שָׁפָן may be of Egyptian, but can scarcely be of Bab. origin, as Jensen (II.1 427 f.) represents. The word tebtim in the phrase ina elippi tebtim is most naturally connected with שָׁפָן.

⁴ Cp Apri in the parallel passage in the Gilgames-epic.

⁶ Gruppe's opposite view (ZAFH 9.135 ff. [89]) is unsatisfactory.

Arabs, like the Egyptians, ¹ certainly never had any, though the legendary el-Hidr (see col. 1062, n. 1), who in the Alexander legend conducts the hero to the waters of life, and in the Koran, according to the commentators (Sar. 1830), is found by Moses 'at the confluence of two seas (rivers?)' may be a reflection of Par-nipasti, or rather Hasis-sara from a shortened form of which el-Hidr may be derived.

Outside of Babylonia, therefore, the only extant Semitic tradition is that of J₂ and P. This is obviously based on the Babylonian myth, for the substitution of a 'chest' for a 'ship' is due either to reflection, or to a confusion between two Babylonian words, and in any case not to independent tradition. J₂'s account is the typical one; P's statements as to the length of Enoch's life and the duration of the Deluge seem to rest on Jewish Aggada.

The typical Babylonian myth is that in the Gilgames-epic (see above), which appears to be the local tradition of the city of Surippak (see Frd. Del. Par. 224; Jensen, Komol. 387); but the variant discovered by Poser ² (§ 5), and the much fuller one transmitted by Berossus, ³ also are valuable. The Babylonian king, Xisuthrus, is the hero of the Berossian Deluge-story; in this way Berossus disguised the name of Atrahasis, transposing the two parts of the name or title. ⁴ Xisuthrus, he says, was accompanied on board the ship (σάφρος, πλοῖον, παῖς) by wife, children, friends, and steersman, and took with him quadrupeds and fowls. He was ordered to turn the course of his vessel 'towards the gods.' How long the flood lasted we are not told. When it went down, he sent out birds three times; the third time the birds did not return. Then he discovered that the ship had grounded 'on a certain mountain.' With wife, daughter, and steersman, he disembarked, erected an altar, sacrificed, and then passed out of sight with his companions. Those who remained heard a voice which announced that Xisuthrus had been taken to be with the gods as a reward for his piety; also that the land in which they were was Armenia (cp Gen. 8.4 f.). They were, further, commanded to dig up the sacred books which Xisuthrus, before embarking, had buried at Surippak to transmit them to mankind. This form of the story was, therefore, the local tradition of the ancient city of Surippak, on the left bank of the Euphrates (the Abu Hira of to-day). We may plausibly assume that the fragment discovered by Scheil (see § 6) also belonged to the story current at Surippak. Here, however, we find, only Atrahasis as the name of the hero of the Deluge. This name, however, is perhaps to be regarded rather as a title than as a personal name.

The epic narrative fills up the lacuna in the Berossian story. It presupposes a division of the period of the Deluge into an (at present) uncertain number of weeks. The same predilection for the number seven is visible in J₂'s account (see Gen. 7.24 8 [6] 10.12). Similarly the epic agrees more definitely than Berossus with J₂ in its notice respecting the birds. Seven days after the calming of the waters, Par-nipasti sends out first a dove, then a swallow, then a raven. J₂ less naturally puts the raven before the dove; probably he did not draw directly from a Babylonian source (see above, § 11, end; § 14, end). The other details of the Deluge have been simplified by J₂ (or his predecessor).

17. The Epic, J₂, and Gen. 5.23.

is still prevalent throughout the American Indian tribes. The Zoroastrians believed in six ages of the world, with a final catastrophe issuing in a renovation. The six ages are of Life origin (see CREATION, § 91), but the renovation, as Darmesteter admits, goes back to the Achaemenian period. Not without stimulus from Zoroastrianism, the Jews in later times advanced to the same belief.¹ They were assured that the present world would be destroyed and that a new heaven and earth would take its place (Is. 24:1-25; 51:9-52:1; Mt. 19:28-2 Pet. 3:12; 1. John 15:1; Apoc. Bar. 32:9); in harmony with Gen. 1:5 fire was to be the destroying agency (2 Pet. 3:10). These beliefs were naturally fostered by the moral idealism of the best men, as we see, not only from the biblical writings (e.g., Gen. 1:5-11 2 Pet. 25; καὶ ὅρα ἀπὸ τοῦ οὐ, 37), and from the Babylonian story, but also from an American (Quiché) story, which says, 'They did not think or speak of the Creator who had created them, and who had caused their birth.'² The intense moral fervour of the ancient Zoroastrian hope of world-renovation is well known (see PERSIA).

If it were possible to believe in a primitive tradition respecting early human history, and to accept all mythic narratives as independent traditions, we should have a weary waste of Deluge-myths.

20. Other Deluge-myths.

There are, however, only three more such accounts which have any special interest from our present point of view. (a) The Indian Deluge-story is the first.⁴ This can hardly be a genuine Aryan myth, for there is no clear reference to it in the Rig Veda.

The Satapatha Brahmana, where it first occurs, was written (Weber) in the late 6th or the 5th century B.C. Another version, in which the names of the deities are filled up, is given in the Mahabharata; but this poem, which existed in part before the Christian era, did not assume its present form till long afterwards. A third version, still more recent, is of Indian character, but with some significant resemblances to the Shukra accounts, is given in the Bhagavata Purana; but the earliest possible date of this work is the twelfth century A.D., which deprives its account of the deluge of all claim to originality.

The principal characteristic of the older Flood-story is the part assigned to the fish which warns Mann of the Deluge, and ultimately saves him by drawing his ship to a northern mountain. This is surely out of character with Aryan mythology. The horned fish, in which Brahma appears, reminds us strongly of the Babylonian fish-god Ea. It was Ea who gave notice of the coming Deluge to Pär-napisti, Zimmer (Altindisches Leben, 101), Jensen, (Kosmol. 497) and Oldenberg (Rel. des Veds. 276) consider the Babylonian origin of the Indian Flood-story to be certain; but on the other hand cp Usener, Untersuch. 329-244.

(6) The second account is a Zoroastrian myth in the Avesta (Vendidad, 2.46 ff.). In its present form (even after the prosaic additions have been removed; see Goldner, in Usener, 3.209 ff.) it seems to have been influenced by the Hebrew Deluge-story.

The Var, a square enclosure constructed by Yima (Yama, the Vedic god of the dead), had a door and perhaps a window,⁵ like Noah's Ark, and it was designed to preserve men, women, and animals. Apart from this, it reminds us of the biblical Eden, and the calamity which was to be averted was, not a flood, but a terrible winter's frost, connected, however, with the end of the world.⁶ The myth seems to be a recast of elements from more than one source.

(c) The third is a Phrygian myth. Possibly there was a primitive native Deluge-story; but, if so, it was vitalised from a Jewish source, some time during the third or the second century, B.C., when (as Ramsay has pounded out) many thousands of Jews from Babylonia were settled as colonists in the areas which the Seleucid kings had ruled. This was the period of the intermingling of religions, when Judaism too made conquests, especially in Asia Minor. Even those who were not otherwise judged were influenced by Jewish legends of SCHOLIM AND GOIM—ANGELS. Important cities exhibited their own consubstantial symbols, and harmonised their old traditions with biblical narratives.¹

This Apama (formerly Kolumba) adopted the Noolde legend; Lomung, that of Luch, whose name was connected with the Phrygian name of Naraxos or Narong. This king (of such tradition made him) was said to have lived more than 300 years, to have announced the coming of Lucretia, and to have prayed for his people. The mountain here of Apama was said to be that on which Noolde's ark grounded; the city therefore assumed the title Kolumba (Ark).

arrived at is that of Franz Delitzsch and Dillmann, that the Deluge is no 'myth,' but a historical fact. Lenormant, at any rate, holds that the three great civilised races of the ancient world preserved a dim recollection of it. This implies a self-propagating power in tradition, which the researches of experts in popular traditions do not justify. Lenormant died, a martyr of patriotism, in 1884. Would he have changed his mind had he lived? At any rate, he would have respected the honesty of those who regard the Deluge-story as a precious record of the myth-forming imagination which has been made subservient to a high moral idealism. — See ADAM AND EVE.

Lastly, the writer would call attention to Jastrow's two articles on Schell's Deluge-story (86) in the Acta

22. And on
theory.

22. And on Jastrow's theory. The Deluge-story is of the Assyrian type, 10th and 17th Feb. 1898 (cp his Rel. of Bab. and Ass. 502-509). It is here maintained that a local tradition of a rain-storm which submerged a single city has been combined in the Gilgamesh-epic with a myth of the destruction of mankind based upon the annual phenomenon of the overflow of the Euphrates. Pir-napisti or Pir-napisti (as Haupt in *KLZ*³⁴) and Jastrow prefer to read the name) is the hero of the local tradition, while Hasis-adra (= חַסִּידָא אֲדָרָא, Gen. ix), according to Jastrow) is the hero of the larger nature-myth. The present writer admits that the version in the epic is of composite origin, and that the names Pir-napisti and Hasis-adra may perhaps come from different sources; but he holds that all the Babylonian deluge-stories, whether simple or composite, have a mythic basis. Moreover, he does not recognise that the simplicity of the oldest Hebrew version of the Deluge-story heightens the probability that the Hebrews carried that story with them when they left their Euphratean settlements. The account given above of the origin and development of the Hebrew story has surely not lost any of its probability in consequence of Scheil's discovery.

smallest of the Cyclades, regarded by the ancients as the centre of the group—a confusion of the geographical and religious points of view (cp Str. 485). Delos was both a shrine and a commercial centre, and 'her whole destiny is explained by her religious traditions and her geographical situation.' Though nominally free, the island was really subject to the dominant power for the time being in the Aegean. It was a free port as early as 168 B.C., and attracted a great part of the Rhodian trade (Polyb. 317). After 146 B.C. it entered upon the heritage of Corinth (Str. 486). The acquisition of the province of Asia by the Romans in 133 B.C. added greatly to the wealth and importance of Delos. Now began the most brilliant epoch of its history: the inscriptions show that its commercial relations were with the Levant, chiefly Syria and Egypt. So Pausanias calls the island τὸ κοινὸν Ἑλληνικὸν ἐμπόριον (viii. 332). For long it was the chief emporium of merchandise from the E. to the W., so that the fine bronze or copper wares of Greece were called indifferently Corinthian, or Delian, from the place of export (Pl. IV xxiv. 29; Cic. Terr. ii. 27). The island became especially a great slave mart, where the Asiatic slave dealers disposed of their human cargoes to Italian speculators; as many as ten thousand were landed and sold in a day (Str. 668). Naturally such a spot attracted large numbers of Jews (Jos. Ant. xiv. 102; Philo, Leg. ad Cai. 39; cp 1 Macc. 152). According to a Greek inscription, a company of Tyrian merchants was settled there as early as the second century B.C. (IG 2271). At the altar of Delos Antiochus Epiphanes set up statues (Polyb. 261), and an inscription to Herod Antipater has been discovered in the island (cp Schür. GIL 135). In 88 B.C. 20,000 men, mostly Italians, were massacred in the island by Archelaus, admiral of the Pontic fleet of Mithridates, a blow from which it partially recovered, only to be finally ruined about a twenty years later by the systematic and wholesale destruction wrought by the pirate Athenodorus. The resurrection of the island was rendered impossible by the rapid growth of Puteoli and the revival of Corinth (for its decay, cp Paus. viii. 332 ix. 346).

See the articles by M. Homolle in the Bull. de Corr. Hell., especially Les Romains à Delos, op. cit. 875 ff. A good account in Diehl's Excursions in Greece, E.T. 128 ff. W. J. W.

DEMAS (ΔΗΜΑΣ [Ti. WH]) is enumerated by the apostle Paul as among his 'fellow-workers' at the time of his (first) Roman captivity (Phil. 24; see also Col. 414). In 2 Tim. 410 he is thus alluded to: 'Demas forsook me, having loved this present world, and went to Thessalonien.' Nothing is known of him beyond what may be inferred or conjectured from these allusions.

He is enumerated in the 'list of the seventy disciples of our Lord' compiled by the Pseudo-Dorotheus of Tyre (Chr. Pasch., Bonn ed., 212) and is stated to have become a priest of idols in Thessalonica. Along with Hermogenes, he figures prominently in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla as a hypocritical companion of the former, and to Hermogenes and Demas is assigned the particular heresy about the resurrection which in 2 Tim. 217 is attributed to Hymeneus and Philetus.

DEMETRIUS (ΔΗΜΗΤΡΙΟΣ [ANV]—i.e., of, or belonging to, Demeter, a proper name of very common occurrence among the Greeks).

1. Demetrius I., surnamed Soter,¹ king of Syria, son of Seleucus IV. Philopator, was sent in his early youth to Rome as a hostage, the throne meanwhile being occupied by his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes (see ANTIOCHUS, 2). After some time he effected his escape to Tripolis (chiefly through the aid of the historian Polybius), and thence proceeded to Antioch where he proclaimed himself king, securing his position by putting to death his cousin Antiochus Eupator (ANTIOCHUS, 3), and LYSIAS (1 Macc. 7: 162 B.C.). He lost no time in pleasing the Hellenizing party by sending Bacchides to instal Alcimus as high-priest (see BACCHIDES, ALCIMUS). The dis- caused by the latter need not here be described. SYRIAN general Nicator [J.V.] was de- Capharsalama (726 ff.), and at Adisa (726 ff.) warning was sent from Rome to Demetrius interfere with the Jews; but it was too late than two months after the fall of Nicator invasion under Bacchides took place; the power was seriously crippled (chap. 9, 160 ff.) further BACCHIDES. Seven years later D. disputing the sovereignty with Alexander endeavoured, though in vain, to secure the support of the Maccabean party (chap. 10), and after hostilities died fighting his rival (175, 497; 175 ff. See MACCABEES, § 5).

2. Demetrius II., Nicator, son of the above, had been living in exile in Crete, came to Cilicia to avenge his father's ill success in Syria, and secured a powerful follower in the person of APOLLONIUS (J.V., 2). An engagement took place at Ashdod, and Apollonius was decisively beaten (107 ff.). Shortly afterwards, however, his hands were unexpectedly strengthened by the secession of VI. Philometor (see PROLEMY, 1), who transferred to him his daughter Cleopatra, the wife of Antiochus Balas (see ALEXANDER, 2). Alexander was slain and Demetrius became king in 145 B.C. A treaty by which Jonathan obtained favourable concessions was concluded (MACCABEES, § 8). Demetrius, believing his position secure, took the wise step of discharging his regular troops, and once went over to Tryphon, the guardian of the person of Alexander Balas (113 ff.; see TRYPHON). Profiting by the approach of a disturbance, he obtained fresh concessions from Demetrius, understanding that Tryphon's rebellion in Judaea should be put down. This was successfully accomplished; but when Jonathan saw that Demetrius no signs of carrying out his promises he was persuaded to transfer his allegiance to Tryphon. Demetrius' princes entered Judaea and after a temporary success were routed in the neighbourhood of Bethsai (116 ff.). Another invasion was mediated in 144, but was successfully ward off by Jonathan's skilful generalship (122 ff.). The scene was changed when Tryphon usurped the throne of Syria and endeavoured, with some success, to reduce Judaea. Jonathan was dead and Simon busied himself strengthening the defences. An embassy was sent to Demetrius II., who, to obtain Simon's support, granted all the Jewish demands including complete immunity from taxation (131 ff.). Demetrius continued the struggle against Tryphon. Demetrius marched to Persia, partly for coin, partly to acquire auxiliaries; but he was captured by Nithridates I. (see PERSIA) and imprisoned in place in Syria being taken by his younger brother Antiochus Sidetes (1 Macc. 141 ff.; see ANTIOCHUS). From non-biblical sources we know that, at the expiration of ten years, he resumed the throne (128 ff.) quarrelled with Ptolemy Physkon and his son Alexander Zabinas, and was finally conquered by Damascus, after fleeing from which place he was murdered at Tyre in 125 B.C. (cp Jos. Ant. xiii. 9).

3. A silversmith of Ephesus, who was the chief instigator of the tumult in the interests of his craft which brought about the mission in that city to a close (Acts 1924 ff.). See DIAKONOS.

The conjecture that he figures again in the Acts as a convert to Christianity, precarious at best, is singularly so when the commonness of the name is considered.

4. A Christian mentioned with commendation in 1 John. That he was the bearer of the epistle is sometimes inferred.

¹ If we follow RV (after A8, etc.) and read 'the 2 Alexander fled,' it would seem that 25, 45 and 750 must be two different accounts. See more fully Jos. Ant. xiii. cp Camb. Bible, ad loc.

While the worship of dead ancestors was at its height, however, the wicked dead were disregarded, and the spirits of the good were honoured as εὐδήμι (1 S. 28 13; cp. Is. 83 6). On the philosophic basis of the Platonic Ideai or Forms, and the Stoic Logos or Reasons, combined with the Hebrew conception of angels, Philo had bridged over his dualistic gulf between God and the world with intermediate beings, some 'blessed' and others 'profane'; the incorporeal souls being pure their failure (Mt. 17: 1), or the phylactery may possibly have been alone. The belief of the writers (as also in Mk. 1: 4, where the knowledge of the demon is described as supernatural). Acceptance of the demon belief is only at the basis of Lk.'s argument in the Pharisees in Lk. 11:19, however, and this is open to Koran as much as the evidence. On the other hand, the indefinite multiplication of spirits, and the grotesque functions ascribed to them in contemporary and later Jewish literature, and the whole belief in possession in the second century A.D., and not only with Jesus or his biographers or in NT literature generally. While the existence of Satan's ministers is recognised, the tendency is rather to concentrate the influence for evil in Satan himself. Finally, that Lk. is believed in the power of others besides himself and his disciples to expel demons in some sense, at any rate, seems clear in the presence of such passages as Mt. 12:28 Lk. 10:17, where he attributes the power to the disciples of the Pharisees, he recognises also the fact that similar success was attained by some who used his name without actually following him (Mk. 9:38), or without being more than professed disciples (Mt. 7:22).

The chief foreign influence on Jewish demonology was no doubt Babylonian. It was partly direct, partly indirect. For though human superstition had an internal principle of development, it was only fertilised from Babylonian. For instance, the seven devils or arch-demons of Zoroastrianism are a reflection of the seven evil or destructive spirits who play such a part in Babylonian mythology (see Maspero, Dawn of Civil. 634-779), and who in a famous incantation are called 'the Seven' (see Zimmern's translation of the text, Father, Sohn u. Enkel, 7, 71, 1906), and the supposed capacity of the formula of the Alma-varya to drive away the devils is but a sublimated form of the Babylonian belief in the recitation of the hymns to the gods. Hence, even when a Jewish belief, such as the grouping of seven demons, characteristic of Jewish popular superstition (Mt. 12:28 Lk.
11:25 Mk. 16:17 Lk. 8:2), appears to be shaped by Persian influences (for names of demons of Persian origin
besides Asmodeus, q.v.; see Handarger, RZ 16, 1 291), it is very possible that Babylonian gave the first impulse to Persia. The doctrine of 'disease-possession' among the Jews may very well have been taught in pre-exilic times,¹ but it is probable that it was when the Jews were conscious of the displeasure of the God, and when they became more and more exposed to foreign influences, that this doctrine attained its full dimensions, as we see it in the NT. It is not so much from Persia as from Egypt and Babylon that the stimulus for its development was derived. The Egyptian view described in Orig. c. Cels. 8:53 (Schürer), that the human body was divided into thirty-six members, and that with each of these was connected a separate demon, by rebuking whom a member could be cured of disease, is but a more specialised form of the doctrine of the Book of the Dead.² The doctrine of disease among the Babylonians was that the swarming demons could enter a man's body and cause sickness. On a fragment of a tablet Budge has found six evil spirits mentioned by name. The first attacked the head; the second, the lips; the third, the forehead; the fourth, the breast;
the fifth, the viscera; the sixth, the hand.³ It was the duty of the exorcist to expel these demons by incantations, and the Zoroastrians believed that Zarathustra, by retaining the formula called the Alma-varya (cp. Lk.

Lk.'s argument in the Pharisees in Lk. 11:19, however, and this is open to Koran as much as the evidence. On the

The great site of the district is the mound of Gobilissin in the plain about 3 m. NW. of Zerk, and 48 m. S. of Komu. (Commenced at the foot of the M. S'ukh Dagh. The mound is of the class called by Strabo (537) 'mounds of Scythians,' which are largely artificial, and of Oriental origin. It contains numerous traces of Komu occupation. The earliest city of Derbe must be sought in the mountains to the south. This situation

This similarity agrees with the names in Strabo. After discussing the ten Strategia of Cappadocia, he adds that in the first century ad, there was an eleventh Strategia, consisting of parts of Lycaonia, Cilicia, and Cappadocia (Στ. εβ, 22). Kappadokien und Kappadokiene (the Artemiou tou Antiochi (Στ. εβ, 23)) refers to the same district (εβ) as the additional (Στ. εβ, 24) Strategia. Derbe is further described as lying on the river of Isauria (Στ. εβ, 25) Ἰσaurίας ὀρίων ὁρμητικῆς κατὰ τοὺς ὀρίους τῆς (the immediate) ἑλλάδας (the fact that it was also on the frontier of the eleventh Strategia, the extended allusion to Cappadocia as above described). It is clear that Strabo's eleventh Strategia is identical with Ptolemy's 'Strategia Antiochiense,' in which he enumerates Derbe better to suppose that the 'monot which is on the east of Jerusalem' (1 K. 11) was anciently called, not only 'the mount of olives' (1 S. 16), and in a late psalm 'the mount of olives' (Zech. 14), but מוֹנֵת הַיְּשׁוּעָה ('monot of those who worship'), of which מוֹנֵת הַיְּשׁוּעָה would be a purely accidental corruption. (cp 1 S. 16.) And when David had come to the summit, where men are wont to worship the deity' (עַל הַיְּשׁוּעָה) whence comes near proving that this view is correct. Observe, too, that the Mt. of Olives appears to be so referred to as the 'hill of God' (1 S. 16) amended text. See Noy.

Brocardus (1283 A.D.) gives the name Mont Olympe (cp Vg.) to the most southern eminence of the Mt. of Olives, because Solomon set up there the image of Moloch; on the northern summit, afterwards called Mont Scandale, he placed the idol of Jehoshaphat. Guinness, however, in the Pentateuch, calls the southern ridge Mount of Scandale. Gratz, after a full discussion, pronounces in favour of the northern summit, i.e., the 'Am Gahar' (1871 f. 73, p. 97 ff.); so also Stanley (1871 f. 183, n. 2). No doubt, this view is correct; Solomon would certainly prefer in elevation already consecrated by tradition.

The phrase 'mount of destruction' is found also in 1 K. 15 as a symbolic term for Baalbek (RV 'destroying mountain').

DEUTERONOMY. The name comes ultimately from the Greek translation of Dt. 17:1, in which the words דְּעוּל הַחֹק, 'the duplicate (i.e., a copy) of this law,' are rendered ἡ δευτερονόμος νόμος.¹ As a title of the book, Deuteronomion (without the article) occurs first in Philo.² Philo takes the word to mean 'second or supplementary legislation,' and more than once cites the book as Ἐπιδείξις.³ Others, with Theodoret, explain the name, 'repetition, recapitulation of the law.' Criticism has shown that Deuteronomy is neither a supplement to the legislation in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, nor a renewal of it; but to modern critics also it is the Second Legislation, an expansion and revision of older collections of laws such as are preserved in Ex. 21-23:31.

Deuteronomy contains the last injunctions and admonitions of Moses, delivered to Israel in the land of Moab, as they were about to cross the Jordan to the conquest of Canaan; and, with the exception of chaps. 27-31 and a few verses elsewhere, is all in the form of address. It is not, however, one continuous discourse, but consists of at least three distinct speeches (14:5-28, 29 f.; together with two poems recited by Moses in the hearing of the people (32 f.). The narrative chapters record doings and sayings of Moses in the last days of his life, and are more or less closely connected with the speeches. Besides this unity of situation and subject there is a certain unity of texture; the sources from which the other books of the Hexateuch are chiefly compiled (Ex. 1) are in Deuteronomy recognisable only in the narrative chapters; and in a few scattered fragments in the speeches; a strong and distinctive individuality of thought, diction, and style pervades the entire book.

It was observed by more than one of the fathers that Deuteronomy is the book the finding of which in the temple gave the impulse to the reforms

Yahwe, but also destroyed the high places of Yahweh, and every altar in the land except that in the temple in Jerusalem (2 K. 22 f.). In Deuteronomy, there alone, all the laws thus enforced are found; inference is inevitable that Deuteronomy furnished the reforms with their new model. This is confirmed by the references to the book found in the temple as 'the law book' (2 K. 22:8 f.); cp 23:2 f. and 'the cover book' (23:2 f.).

The former of these names is found in the Pentateuch in the secondary parts of Dt. (28:6 f.; 30:10 f.; 34:1 f.), and the phrase 'this law' (18:27 f.; 29:20 f.), signifies Dt. or deuteronomion legislation exclusively; 'covenant book' is appropriate designation for a book in which the covenant of Yahweh with Israel (see Gen. xviii, § 9) is an often recurring theme (2:2 f.; 17:2 f.; 29:2 f.; 34:1 f.; 35:1 f.).

That the book read by Shaphan before Josiah's destruction (2 K. 22:8 f.), which seems to show that law was accompanied by such denunciations of the consequences of disobedience as are found especially in Dt.

The opinion, once very generally entertained, that the book found by Hilkiah was the whole Pentateuch, is longer tenable. In addition to arguments of more or less weight drawn from the narrative in Kings, that the whole Pentateuch would hardly be described as a 'book'; that a book as long as the Pentateuch could be read through twice in a single day (2 K. 22:8 f.) that with the entire legislation before him, the king would not have based his reforms on deuteronomion laws exclusively, recent investigation has proved that the priestly legislation in the Pentateuch was not in force with Deuteronomy till long after the time of Josiah. Modern critics are, therefore, almost unanimous in opinion that the law-book, the discovery and the introduction of which are related in 2 K. 22 f. (see next) is to be sought in Deuteronomy; and they are very generally agreed, further, that the book was written either in the earlier years of Josiah, or at least under one of his predecessors, Manasseh or Hezekiah (see § 10).

The soundness of these conclusions has recently been pugned by several French and German scholars (Genébrat, Hat, Talbot, Vernes, Horst), on the ground that the book is partly of sweeping doubts concerning the trustworthiness of 2 K. 22 f., partly of peculiar theories of the composition of Dt. The theories cannot be discussed here; but the great importance of 2 K. 22 f. in the modern construction of the history of Hebrew literature and religion, makes it necessary to examine briefly the historical character of those chapters. It is generally agreed that the account of Josiah's reforms, as it lies before us, is the work of an author of the deuteronomion school, who wrote after the destruction of Jerusalem. If this author had depended upon oral tradition, he might well have derived his information from eye-witnesses of the events of 621; but it seems to denote a contemporary account of Josiah's reign, which was probably included in the post-exilic history of the kings. The narrative was brought over and enlarged by the exilic writer; partly also, the original response of Huldah, which was not referred by the event, was superseded, after the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., by a wholly different one, in which the judgment is represented as inevitable (22:15-20; cp 23:20 f.; 23:15-20, also, is generally recognised as a legendary addition, but, notwithstanding these changes, the outlines of the original account can be reconstructed with reasonable confidence, and appears to be in all respects deserving of credence. See Kline.

3. Account in 2 K. 22 f.

The historical evidence proves only that the law-book which was put into force by Josiah contained certain deuteronomion laws concerning religion, not that it comprised the whole of the present Book of Deuteronomy. A superficial examination of the book shows that the latter cannot have been the case.

Chaps. 30-31 are composite. Besides the two poems, 32:1-43, they contain the links which connect not only Dt. 1-18, 21-23, often called by modern scholars 'The Covenant Book' (see 2:7), cannot be meant, for, so far from putting in high places under the law, these laws assume the existence and legitimacy of many local sanctuaries (see 2:6-23:14 f.; c. 20-24).

In the Hebrew legislation three strata are to be recognised: the collections of laws incorporated in JE (Ex. 21-23, often called the Book of the Covenant; Ex. 34); the Law of Holiness, contained in a priestly recension in Lev. 17-26 and cognate passages (14); and the rest of the laws in Leviticus, Deuteronomy, and Numbers, predominantly liturgical, ceremonial, and sacerdotal, which, though not all of the same age or origin, may now be treated as forming a single body of priestly law (P). DEUTERONOMY agreed by all that the little collections of laws in JE are older than Deuteronomy. The most convincing proof of this is given, of course, by the Deuteronomic laws restricting the worship of Yahweh to the one temple at Jerusalem. It may confidently be inferred also from the prominence given throughout Deuteronomy to motives of humanity, and the way in which old religious customs, like the triennial tithes, are transformed into sacred charities, as well as from the constant appeal to the memory of God's goodness as a motive for goodness to fellow-men. Where the provisions of Deuteronomy differ from those of the Book of the Covenant, they sometimes appear to be adapted to a more advanced stage of society; as when the old agricultural fallow-year is replaced by an experiment in the septennial remission of debts. The many laws dealing with contracts of one kind or another also are to be noted.

Most recent critics are of the opinion, further, that the author of the Deuteronomic law-book was not only acquainted with Ex. 21-23, but also made this code the basis of his own work; Deuteronomy, it is said, is a revised and enlarged Covenant Book, adapted to some extent to new conditions, but with only one change of far-reaching effect, the centralisation of worship in Jerusalem. It may be questioned, however, whether the evidence will sustain so strong a statement of the dependence of Deuteronomy on the Book of the Covenant.

Verbally identical clauses are very few, and in some instances, at least, have probably arisen from subsequent conformation. There is no trace of the influence of the Covenant Book either in the general arrangement of Dt. 12-26 or in the sequence of particular laws. To fully one-half of the Covenant Book (after the subtraction of the religious precepts), viz. the title Assurances and Injuries, Ex. 21:13-22:17, there is no parallel in Dt.; while the subject of Authorities in Dt. 16:18-18 has no counterpart in Ex. 21:23; of thirty-five laws in Dt. 21:10-23:16 only seven have parallels in the older code. Finally, in the corresponding laws the coincidences are hardly more frequent or more nearly exact than we should expect in two collections originating at no great distance in place or time, and based upon the same religious customs and consuetudinary law; the evidence of literary dependence is much less abundant and convincing than it must be if Dt. were merely a revised and enlarged Book of the Covenant.²

Certain laws in Deuteronomy have parallels also in JE; but, whilst the provisions of these laws are often closely similar, the formulation and phraseology are throughout entirely different.³ In some points JE seems to be a stage beyond Dt.; but the differences are not of a kind to imply a considerable interval of time so much as a diversity of dominant interest, such as distinguishes Ezekiel from Jeremiah.

Dt. 14:21, compared with Lev. 11, has been thought to prove that Dt. is dependent upon JE; but the truth seems rather to be that both are based on a common original, a piece of priestly Torah, which each reproduces and modifies in its own way.⁴

References to the history of Israel are much fewer in Dt. 12-26 than in 1-3:1; they are of a more incidental and allusive character, and the author exercises some freedom in the use of his material; but, as far as they can be certainly traced, they appear to be all derived from JE, or from the cycle of tradition represented by that work. That the author did not have before him JE united with P is proved by his reference to the fate of Dathan and Abiram (11:6); if he had read Nu. 16 in its present form, in which the story of Dathan and Abiram (JE) is almost inextricably entangled with that of Korah (P), he could hardly have failed to name the latter, who is the central figure of the composite narrative (cp Nu. 26:10 f. 27:1 Jude 11, and see KORAH and DATHAN AND ABIRAM). But even if he had possessed P separate it would be almost inexplicable that he so uniformly follows the representation of JE where it differs from P or conflicts with it. The instances which have been adduced to prove that he was acquainted with P are few and uncertain to sustain the conclusion; moreover they are all found in the long digression, 9:1-10:11, which probably was no part of the primitive Deuteronomy.

The traditional opinion among Jews and Christians that Deuteronomy was written by Moses shortly before his death, though resting on the testimony of the book itself (31:9 ff. 24:2), is contradicted by both the internal and the external evidence; the contents of the book and the entire religious history of Israel prove that Deuteronomy is the product of a much later time. The legislation of JE in the main, doubtless, merely the booking of an ancient consuetudinary law is without exception the law of a settled people, engaged in husbandry. Deuteronomy reflects a still more advanced stage of culture and must be ascribed to a time when Israel had long been established in Palestine. The fundamental law for the Hebrew monarchy, Dt. 17:14-20, presumes not only the existence of the kingdom, but also considerable experience of its evils. Solomon appears to have for the portrait of the king as he ought not to be.⁵

The prohibition of the multiplication of horses and treasure we may recognise the influence of the prophets to whom the political and military ambition of the king seemed apostasy (see, e.g., Is. 27). The constitution of the high court in Jerusalem (Dt. 17:8-13, cp 19:17) is thought to be modelled after the tribunal which Jehoshaphat (middle of 9th century B.C.) established (2 Ch. 19:8-11).

More convincing than the arguments derived from these special laws are the ruling ideas and motives of the whole book. The thing upon which Deuteronomy insists with urgent and unwearied iteration is that Yahweh should be worshipped only at one place, which he himself should choose, where alone sacrifices may be offered and the annual festivals celebrated. Although no place is named there can be no doubt, as there was none in the mind of Josiah and his counselors, that Jerusalem is meant.

Jerusalem was not one of the ancient holy places of Israel. It owed its religious importance to the fact that in it was the royal temple of the Judæan kings; but this was far from putting upon an equality with the venerable sanctuaries of Bethel and Shechem, Gilgal and Beersheba. The actual pre-eminence of Jerusalem, without which the attempt to assert for it an exclusive sanctity is inconceivable, was the result of the historical events of the eighth century.

The fall of the kingdom of Israel (721 B.C.) left Judah the only 'people of Yahweh'. The holy places of Israel were profaned by the conquerors—proof that Yahweh repudiated the worship offered to him there, as the prophets had declared. A quarter of a century later Sennacherib invaded Judah, ravaged the land, destroyed its cities, and carried off their inhabitants; the capital itself was at the last extremity (see HEZEKIAH, ISRAEL, § 33 f.). The deliverance of the city from this peril seemed to be a direct interposition of Yahweh, and Jerusalem and its temple must have gained greatly in prestige through this token of God's signal favour.

This of itself, however, would not give rise to the idea that Yahweh was to be worshipped in Jerusalem alone. The genesis of this idea must be sought in the monotheism of the prophets. At a time when monotheism had not yet become conscious of its own universalism, men could hardly fail to reason that if there was but one true God, he was to be worshipped in but one place. And this place, in the light of history and prophecy, could only be Jerusalem. The way in which Dt. attempts to carry

Solomon appears to have for the portrait of the king as he ought not to be.²

The prohibition of the multiplication of horses and treasure we may recognise the influence of the prophets to whom the political and military ambition of the king seemed apostasy (see, e.g., Is. 27). The constitution of the high court in Jerusalem (Dt. 17:8-13, cp 19:17) is thought to be modelled after the tribunal which Jehoshaphat (middle of 9th century B.C.) established (2 Ch. 19:8-11).

More convincing than the arguments derived from these special laws are the ruling ideas and motives of the whole book. The thing upon which Deuteronomy insists with urgent and unwearied iteration is that Yahweh should be worshipped only at one place, which he himself should choose, where alone sacrifices may be offered and the annual festivals celebrated. Although no place is named there can be no doubt, as there was none in the mind of Josiah and his counselors, that Jerusalem is meant.

Jerusalem was not one of the ancient holy places of Israel. It owed its religious importance to the fact that in it was the royal temple of the Judæan kings; but this was far from putting upon an equality with the venerable sanctuaries of Bethel and Shechem, Gilgal and Beersheba. The actual pre-eminence of Jerusalem, without which the attempt to assert for it an exclusive sanctity is inconceivable, was the result of the historical events of the eighth century.

The fall of the kingdom of Israel (721 B.C.) left Judah the only 'people of Yahweh'. The holy places of Israel were profaned by the conquerors—proof that Yahweh repudiated the worship offered to him there, as the prophets had declared. A quarter of a century later Sennacherib invaded Judah, ravaged the land, destroyed its cities, and carried off their inhabitants; the capital itself was at the last extremity (see HEZEKIAH, ISRAEL, § 33 f.). The deliverance of the city from this peril seemed to be a direct interposition of Yahweh, and Jerusalem and its temple must have gained greatly in prestige through this token of God's signal favour.

This of itself, however, would not give rise to the idea that Yahweh was to be worshipped in Jerusalem alone. The genesis of this idea must be sought in the monotheism of the prophets. At a time when monotheism had not yet become conscious of its own universalism, men could hardly fail to reason that if there was but one true God, he was to be worshipped in but one place. And this place, in the light of history and prophecy, could only be Jerusalem. The way in which Dt. attempts to carry out this principle, by simply transferring to Jerusalem the cultus of the local sanctuaries with their priesthoods, was only practicable within narrow territorial limits, such as those of the kingdom of Judah in the seventh century.

We have the explicit testimony of the Books of Kings that there was no attempt to suppress the old local sanctuaries in Judah until the reign of Hezekiah; the most godly kings left the high-places unmolested (1 K. 15:14-22; 2 K. 12:14; 13:15-17). The deuteronomic author of Kings, to whom the temple in Jerusalem was, from the moment when Yahwe took up his abode in it (1 K. 8:10 f.), the only legitimate place of sacrifice, condemns this remissness as a great sin; but there is no evidence that the religious leaders of Israel down to the end of the eighth century so regarded it. Ehad is in despair over the sacrilege which threw down the altars of Yahwe; when he goes to meet God face to face, it is not to Jerusalem, but to Horeb, the old holy mountain in the distant S., that he turns his steps. Amos and Hosea inveigh against the worship at the holy places of the Northern Kingdom because it is morally corrupt and religiously false, not because its seats are illegitimate; nor is their repudiation of the worship on the high-places more unqualified than Isaiah's rejection of the cultus in Jerusalem (Is. 1:15 ff.). The older law-books, far from forbidding sacrifice at altars other than that in Jerusalem, formally sanction the erection of such altars, and promise that at every recognised place of worship Yahwe will visit his worshippers and bless them (Ex. 20:24).

According to 2 K. 18:22-23, Hezekiah removed the high-places, demolished the standing stones, heaved down the sacred posts.¹ The false tenses prove, however, that 184 has been interpolated by a very late hand; the original text said only that Hezekiah removed the bronze serpent which was worshipped in the temple (see N. in SH. 183); nor can much greater reliance be put upon the reference in the speech of the Rabshakeh (Is. 37:36). It may well be that Hezekiah, after the retreat of Sennacherib, took vigorous measures to suppress the idolatry against which Isaiah thundered in both his earlier and his later prophecies (28:18-20; 30:22-31:7), perhaps including the sacred trees and other survivals of rude natural religion (Is. 1:40).² In any case, the reaction of the following reign swept away all traces of his work. (Cp. H. Z. KRAH, Die Propheten, 3, § 15.)

Another very distinct indication of the age in which Dt. was written is found in the foreign religions which it combats. 'The worship of "the whole host of heaven"' (Dt. 17:1 cp. 18), an Assyrian cult frequently condemned by the prophets of the seventh century (Jer. 8:2; 19:13; 22:2; Zeph. 1:5),³ but not mentioned by any earlier writer, was probably introduced by Manassah, during whose reign Assyrian influence was at its height in Judah. The sacrifice of children, 'sending them through the fire' to the King God (Dt. 18:10-12), also belongs to the seventh century (see MOORE); neither Isaiah nor any of the other prophets of the eighth century alludes to these rites.

A relatively late date has been inferred also from the laws against the erection of steles and sacred poles (mizbe'oth and dshirim) by the altars of Yahwe (Dt. 16:17 f.).

The older laws only enjoin the destruction of the Canaanite holy-places with all their appurtenances (Ex. 34:13-23; cp. Dt. 12:3). The prophets of the eighth century, especially Hosea and Isaiah, assailed the idols of Yahwe, but not the more primitive standing stones and posts; the polemic against the latter begins with Jeremiah.

The age of Dt. may be determined also by its relation to other works of known date. From the time of Jeremiah, the influence of Dt. is unmistakably to be recognised in the whole prophetic and historical literature, whilst we look in vain for any trace of this influence in 15. D and other writers.

² If it were established that Hezekiah put down the high-places, it would not follow that Dt. is older than Hezekiah; the more probable hypothesis, in view of all the testimony of the prophets and the historical books, would be that the Deuteronomic law was in the line of the measures adopted by the king.

DEUTERONOMY

the prophets of the eighth century; neither the impressive ideas nor the haunting phrases of Dt. have left their mark there.⁴ The inference that Dt. was unknown to the religious leaders of Israel before the seventh century is hardly to be avoided.

On the other hand, in all its ruling ideas, Dt. is dependent upon the prophecy of the eighth century. We have already seen that the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib prepared the way for the belief that the temple on Mt. Zion was the only sanctuary at which Yahwe should be worshipped, and that the monotheism of the prophets was the theological basis of the same belief. The Unity of God of Dt., which exalts Yahwe, not only in negation and contrast, but also in righteousness, goodness, and truth, is the moral transformation of the old conception of 'holiness' (see CHAV. § 1). It is of the same origin, whilst the central idea of the book, that the essence and end of true religion is the mutual love of God and his people, is derived from Hosea. In general, the theology of Dt. is an advance upon that of the prophets of the eighth century, whose teaching it first assimilated, and approximates to that of Jeremiah and Isaiah (10:5).

To the same result we are led by the literary character of Dt. Its style is more copious and flowing than that of earlier writers; but it lacks the terse vigour, and is not free from the faults of looseness, prolixity, and repetition, into which a facile pen so easily glides. In these respects it exhibits the tendencies which mark the literature of the seventh century and the Bible. The diction, also, is distinctly that of the same period, closely resembling that of Jeremiah.⁵

Evidence of every kind thus conspires to prove that the primitive Dt. was a product of the seventh century.

16. Result as to date of D.

The fact that it combats foreign cults which were introduced by Manassah must be against the opinion entertained by some scholars, that it had its origin in the last years of Hezekiah, perhaps in connection with the reforms of that king. A hypothesis which commends itself to many critics is that Dt. was composed in the reign of Manassah as a protest against the calls of the time and as a programme of reform. Its authors dealt without being able to accomplish their object, and the book was lost, until, many years after, it was accidentally discovered in the temple by Hilkiah. To others it seems more probable that Dt. was written under Josiah, shortly before it was brought to light, by men who thought the time ripe for an attempt to introduce the reforms by which alone, they believed, Judah could be saved, and had intelligently planned the way in which this should be effected.⁶

Everything points to Jerusalem as the place where Dt. was written; a work whose aim was to exalt the

17. Place. temple to the position of the sole sanctuary of Yahwe can hardly have originated anywhere else. The Torah of the priests is throughout so intimately mingled with the religious teachings of the prophets that we are constrained to believe that both priests and prophets were associated in its production, or at least that its priestly authors were thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the prophets. Who these authors were cannot be more definitely determined.⁷

That the authors of the primitive Dt. freely used older collections of laws has been generally recognised.

17a. Sources of D.

Beside Ex. 21-23 (on which see above, § 6), remains of another collection are found in Dt. 22-25. Stark and Steuernagel have recently undertaken to show by minute analysis that both the hortatory and the legislative parts of Dt. are in a stricter sense composite.

According to Steuernagel, the book discovered in the temple in the eighteenth year of Josiah (Dt. 34:22) was the work of a redactor, who combined with considerable skill—although basically, and without substantial aid from two older works of like character, each consisting of a hortatory introduction and a body of laws. One of them (S₂) is marked by the direct address to Israel in the second person singular; the other (P₁) uses the plural. The older of these works (S₂) is assigned to the early years of Manasse's reign (shortly after 700 B.C.), the other (P₁) was composed about 675. The union of the two by the redactor (D₁) falls in the middle of the century, twenty-five years or more before the discovery of the book in the temple. Both S₂ and P₁ made use of older collections of laws, and these sources can still in part be recognised. One of the chief sources of S₂ (the 'Grundannahme') was put out in support of Hezekiah's reforms, probably not long after 722 B.C.

Chaps. 1-3, in the form of an address of Moses to Israel, contain a review of the principal events of the migration, from the departure of the tribes, 1-3, which he is speaking to them.¹ This retrospect throughout follows the history of JE, from which its material is drawn and many phrases and whole clauses are borrowed.² Upon closer examination it appears that the chief source of the chapters is E, which the author had before him separately; whether he made use of J is doubtful; of dependence on P there is no trace.

The retrospect begins abruptly with the command to remove the altar at Horeb (1:10), and it has been conjectured that 9:10-11 (cp. 10:1-11), which recites the transgression at Horeb, belongs to the narrative to the precise point where it is taken up in 1, once stood before 17. More probably, however, 9:10-11 is not a misplaced fragment of the retrospect, but the product of successive editorial amplifications.³ The review ends as abruptly as it begins; the words, 'And we abode in the valley in front of Beth-peor' (3:20), must originally have been followed by an account of the sin at Beth-peor (Nu. 25:1-5; cp. Dt. 4:16).

The chapters (1-3) are not by the author of 5-26. The resemblance in language and style is unquestionably very close, though there are some noticeable differences; but the diversity of historical representation is decisive; cp. 2:29 with 23:3-6 7 f., 1:35 ff. 2:14-16 with 11:2 ff. 5:2 f. The opinion of some critics, that 1-1 was prefixed to the primitive Dt. to connect it with the history in Ex. and Nu., is improbable; for such a purpose a recapitulation of the history was more than superfluous. Others, with better reason, suppose that the historical résumé was intended as the introduction to a separate edition of Dt. The way in which it begins and ends (see above, small type) suggests that it was not composed for the purpose, but was extracted and adapted by the editor from some older source. Conclusive marks of the age of the chapters, further than their dependence upon E and the general affinity to the deuteronomistic school, are hardly to be discovered.

Chap. 4:1-40 has generally been taken with 1-3, as a hortatory close to the historical introduction.

19. Chap. 4 There is, however, neither a formal nor a material connection between them.

The historical allusions in the exhortation are to events related, not in 1-3, but in 5 ff.; 4:10 f. 32-33 differ from the retrospect (1:39 f. etc.) and agree with 5:2 f. 11:2 ff. 29:2 ff., in making the speaker's audience witnesses of the scenes at Horeb; the greater part of 4 is only a homiletical enlargement on 5:25 ff.

In other points 4 goes beyond 5-11; its monotheism takes a loftier tone, like that of Is. 40:5-55 (see 4:35-39 15:10-16). In 4:25-31 deportation and dispersion are inevitable; the prediction that in the far country Israel will return to Yahvé and find forgiveness takes the central place which it has in the exile prophets.

The language resembles 5-11 more closely than 1-3, but has peculiarities of its own: 4:17 f. are full of words and phrases which remind us of Ezekiel, 11, and P (cp.

1. Chap. 1:1-5, which now forms the introduction to the speech, is not homogeneous, and glosses have been pointed out in the discourse itself.

DEUTERONOMY

introduction is not deuteronomie, as the language proves; it is equally clear that it is not by the author of 14:7-20. The question of the source of the verses will recur in connection with the age of the poem itself (next §, second par.). 17:6-13, relating how the law was committed to writing and preserved, form an appropriate conclusion to the account of the giving of the law, and are by many critics connected with 5:26-28. The preservation of the law is the subject of 24:27, which the repetition and the different motive prove to be by another hand;
25:1 seems to be a preparation for the recitation of the 'Song'
(31), and is as much out of place after 19:22 as 24:27 after 19:13;
the whole passage, 24-26 (30), is, therefore, ascribed to a later hand.
Dillmann conjectures that 22 ff. (in substance) originally constituted the introduction, not to the Song of Moses, but to a speech the close of which is to be found in 32:43-47. This speech, containing the last exhortations and admonitions of Moses, was removed from its place after 31:13 to make room for the Song, and is preserved, though worked over and extensively interpolated, in 42:9. For reasons which have already been indicated, we should not, however, with Dillmann, attribute this speech to the author of 5:26-28, but to a later deuteronomistic writer.

Chap. 32:1-43; The Song of Moses.¹—The theme of the Ode is the goodness of Yahwe, the sin of Israel in rejecting him, and the ruin which this apostasy entails. The poem contains no definite allusions to historical events by which its age may be exactly determined. The conquest of Canaan evidently lies for the writer in a remote past (7 ff.); and he has had ample experience of the prosperity of Israel to adopt foreign religions, and of the national calamities in which the prophets saw the judgments of Yahwe upon this defection. The language has been thought to indicate that the author was a native of the North; and many scholars believe that the situation reflected in the poem is that of the kingdom of Israel in the reign of Jehoash (767-783 B.C.) or the early years of Jehoahaz II. (782-743 B.C.), when, after the long and disastrous Syrian wars, Israel was beginning to recover its former power and prosperity.² Others, understanding by the 'no people' (32:18), the 'foolish nation' (32:21-23), the Assyrians, to whom such terms would be applied more naturally than they could be to the Syrians (cp Is. 33:10, 5:26 ff.), ascribe the poem to the latter half of the eighth century. The words may, however, with even greater probability, be interpreted of the Babylonians (cp Jer. 5:15 ff., 5:22 ff., especially Hab. 1:6 ff., Dt. 28:19 ff.). In the vocabulary of the Song there are several words which are not found in writers of the eighth century, but are common in the literature of the seventh and sixth; the Aramaisms in word and form which have been looked upon as evidence of Ephraimite origin may equally well be marks of a later age. The poem contains many reminiscences of the older prophets, especially of Hosea and Isaiah; but in its whole spirit and tone, as well as in particular expressions, it is much more closely akin to Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Is. 40:35.
It has a strong resemblance, also, to the exilic additions to Dt. (12:9 ff.); its theology is that of these chapters and of Is. 40 ff.; its affinities to the Psalms and the products of Jewish Wisdom are to be noted.³ It is, in fact, a didactic poem, embodying in lofty verse the prophetic interpretation of Israel's history from beginning to end. Kuenen and others ascribe the Song to the end of the seventh century (say 630-600 B.C.); but the considerations last adduced, and others which might be mentioned, point rather to an exilic or post-exilic date.

It has commonly been assumed that the introduction to the Song (31:16-22) is pre-deuteronomie (J or E);⁴ not so much, however, upon internal evidence as in consequence of general theories about the age of the poem and the composition of the last chapters of Dt.
It is intrinsically at least equally probable that the introduction is post-deuteronomie; and this hypothesis is strongly commended by the fact that the Song itself has apparently been put in the place of the last discourse of Moses (29:7), who is itself a product of the 'exile.'

Chap. 32:1 is the closing note to the poem, corresponding to 31 at its beginning. Verses 43-47 are the close of the speech, answering to 31:27 *ff.*¹ they contain no allusion to the Song; their literary affinities are to 31:1 ff., not to 31:16-22 or 32:1-43. Chap.
32:1-52 belongs to the priestly stratum; the same command is given somewhat more fully in Num.
27:12-14 (P).

Chap. 33: 'The Blessing wherewith Moses the man of God blessed the Israelites before he died.' Beyond

25. Blessing. this superscription, no attempt is made to connect the poem with the history of Moses' last days; in which it may be inferred that it was not introduced by a deuteronomie editor. The opening verses (1-8), which are very obscure, in part through corruption of the text, describe the coming of Yahwe from Sinai, the giving of the Law, the acquisition of the territory of Jacob (9), and the rise of the kingdom in Israel.² Thereupon come, without any transition, Blessings on eleven tribes, following a geographical order from south to north, and differing greatly in length and in character.

The Blessing of Moses is a composition of the same kind as the so-called Blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49:1-27), though not a mere imitation of it. The

26. Its date. historical situation reflected in the Blessings of the several tribes in Dt. is that of a time considerably later than that in Gen.; cp particularly Levi (Gen.
49:5-7 Dt. 33:8-11) and Judah (Gen. 49:8-12 Dt. 33:7). On the other hand, the situation is entirely different from that represented in the Song of Moses, Dt. 32. While in the latter, apostasy has drawn upon Israel the consuming anger of Yahwe, and the very existence of the people is threatened, the Blessing breathes from end to end a national spirit exalted by power and prosperity and unbroken by disaster. The author was a member of one of the northern tribes, or a Levite at one of the northern sanctuaries. The blessing of Joseph (11-17) was written at a time when the kingdom of Israel, in the pride of its power, and perhaps flushed with victory, was thinking of foreign conquests (17). Recent critics have generally followed Graf in ascribing the poem to the time of Jehoahaz II. (782-743 B.C.), when for a brief space Israel seemed to have regained all its ancient power and glory; so is then referred to the recovery of the territories of which Gad had been stripped by the Syrians of Damascus in the disastrous period which preceded.

The prayer in 7, 'Hear, O Yahwe, the voice of Judah, and bring him to his people,' has been understood as the wish of the Ephraimite poet that Judah might be reunited to Israel, and is thought by many to point to a time soon after the division of the kingdom, when the desire for the restoration of the national unity was still strong. This obscure verse, however, cannot be allowed to outweigh the clearer testimony of other parts of the chapter.
The Blessing of Levi (8-11) describes the privileges and offices of the priesthood, and the fidelity of Levi to its sacred trust.
There is nothing to indicate that the author was a priest of the temple in Jerusalem; the priests of other temples also were Levites; nor any cogent reason for thinking that 9-11 are Jewish interpolations. Verse 11, however, is hardly a blessing for the priesthood, and would unquestionably be more appropriate to one of the other tribes; but that it was the original sequel of 7, as has been conjectured, is not evident.

DEUTERONOMY

26-29, have no connection with the Blessings, and it is not improbable that they are fragments of another poem. Whether the Blessing of Moses was contained in J or E is a question which we have no means of answering; neither the short introduction, nor the titles of the several Blessings (which alone can be attributed to an editorial hand), offer anything distinctive; nor do the reminiscences of the earlier history.

Chap. 31. The story of the death of Moses is highly composite, elements from JE and P, as well as the hand of more than one editor, being recognisable in it.

Deuteronomy is the prophetic law-book, an attempt to embody the ideal of the prophets in institutions and laws by which the whole religious, social, and civil life of the people should be governed. We recognise this aim in the treatment of the older right and custom of Israel, and more clearly in those provisions which are peculiar to Deuteronomy, above all in the fundamental law, chap. 5 ff. It seeks, not to regulate conduct by outward rule, but to form morality from within by the power of a supreme principle.

The dominant idea of Deuteronomy is monotheism.

27. Religious character of Dt.

The first sentence of the older Decalogue,¹ repeated in 5:6 ff., expresses, indeed, only a relative deuteronomy law, 'Yahwe our God is one Yahwe' (6:4 ff.), declares, not only that there are not many Yahwes, as there are many Baals, but also that there is no other who shares with him the attributes of supreme godhead which are connoted by his name. He is 'the God of gods and the Lord of lords, the great, mighty, and awful God' (10:17), to whom belong 'the heavens above and the earth beneath, the earth and all that therein is' (10:14). 'The [only] God in the heavens above or in the earth beneath; there is no other' (4:39, cp 35).² The unapproachable majesty of Yahwe (5:1 ff., 22 ff., 19 ff.), his constancy to his purpose, and his faithfulness to his word are often recurring themes (7:8-10, 12 ff., 35, etc.). He is a God who requites his enemies to the full (7:10); yet a compassionate and forgiving God to those who under his judgments turn to him again (4:29-31, 39 ff.).

Idolatry is strictly forbidden. The images and emblems of the Canaanite gods are to be totally destroyed (12:1 ff., 7:5-25). The Decalogue prohibits the making of images of Yahwe in the likeness of any object in heaven, or on the earth, or in the sea; and in 4:15 ff., where this prohibition is emphatically repeated, Israel is reminded that at Horeb, when Yahwe spoke to them out of the midst of the fire, they saw no form—lesson to them not to image him in any form. The more primitive standing stones and sacred poles are included in the prohibition (16:21 ff., 12:3 ff.). All kinds of divination, sorcery, and necromancy are condemned as heathenish (18:9-14); Yahwe's will and purpose are made known, not by such signs as are interpreted by the magic art, but by the mouth of his prophet (18:15 ff.).

Yahwe is to be worshipped, not at many sanctuaries, but at one only, in the place which he chooses to fix his name there (12:5-16, 14:23, 15:20, 16:2, etc.). The unity of the sanctuary is a consequence of the unity of God. The suppression of the high-places, which is so strenuously insisted on in Dt., was primarily dictated, not by practical considerations, but by the instinctive feeling that their existence was incompatible with monotheism; as long as there were many altars there were as many local Yahwes. It is doubtless true that, for the religious consciousness of the great mass of worshippers, the Yahwe of Dan was no just the same as the Yahwe of Bethel or of Beersheba. But the great doctrine of Dt. is, 'Yahwe thy God is one Yahwe.' The principle, 'Thou shalt have no other gods' is strongly reaffirmed (6:12-15, 10:20-22, 11:16 ff., 28:14-15, 32:17-18, 34:16-17, 35:1-3, 39:1-3, 40:1-3, 41:1-3, 42:1-3, 43:1-3, 44:1-3, 45:1-3, 46:1-3, 47:1-3, 48:1-3, 49:1-3, 50:1-3, 51:1-3, 52:1-3, 53:1-3, 54:1-3, 55:1-3, 56:1-3, 57:1-3, 58:1-3, 59:1-3, 60:1-3, 61:1-3, 62:1-3, 63:1-3, 64:1-3, 65:1-3, 66:1-3, 67:1-3, 68:1-3, 69:1-3, 70:1-3, 71:1-3, 72:1-3, 73:1-3, 74:1-3, 75:1-3, 76:1-3, 77:1-3, 78:1-3, 79:1-3, 80:1-3, 81:1-3, 82:1-3, 83:1-3, 84:1-3, 85:1-3, 86:1-3, 87:1-3, 88:1-3, 89:1-3, 90:1-3, 91:1-3, 92:1-3, 93:1-3, 94:1-3, 95:1-3, 96:1-3, 97:1-3, 98:1-3, 99:1-3, 100:1-3). The apostasy of the nation by nature (6:14 ff., 7:4-8, 10 ff., 12:30-31, 32-33, 34-35, 36-37, 38-39, 40-41, 42-43, 44-45, 46-47, 48-49, 50-51, 52-53, 54-55, 56-57, 58-59, 60-61, 62-63, 64-65, 66-67, 68-69, 70-71, 72-73, 74-75, 76-77, 78-79, 80-81, 82-83, 84-85, 86-87, 88-89, 90-91, 92-93, 94-95, 96-97, 98-99, 100-101). Not only in Israel, but also in Canaan, which is to be obliterated. Every trace of religions of Palestine is to be obliterated. The cities themselves must be exterminated, lest, in intimate with them, Israel be infected with their religion (16:9 ff., cp 12:30 ff., 20:16 ff.).¹ Alliance and intermarriage with the heathen are stringently prohibited (7:1 ff., and many special laws are directed against heathen customs and rites; see, e.g., 22:5, 23:17 ff.). No less warnings are given against the religions of other peoples (13:6 ff.).

The essence of the religious relation to Yahwe and his people is love. He has loved from the beginning (10:15, 7:7 ff.), and if they keep his commandments he will love and bless them in the future (7:13, cp 4:7 ff.). They are the children of their God (14:1); his discipline and his care are paternal (5:13). All good things are from him; his signal proofs of his love to Israel are the deliverance from Egypt (Exodus, e.g., 8:14 ff.), and the law which has given them (4:5-8, 32 ff.). The love of Yahwe people demands, as it should inspire, their love: 'Thou shalt love Yahwe thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might' (6:5) is the commandment of the law, the first principle of religion (10:12 ff., 11:13-22, 13:4, 19:9, 30:6-16, 20). Love to God strains to do his will; to love God and to keep his commandments are inseparable. His commandments are not remote or incomprehensible; they are in the hearts and on their lips (30:11-14, cp Jer. 31:33-34). They are they difficult and burdensome (10:12 ff., cp Mic. 6:8). To keep them is for man's own good (6:24, 10:11). The religion of the heart, not of outward observance of formal legality. Observances are not rejected, religion without worship and distinctive ceremonial is not contemplated; but festivals and sacrifices are the expression of religious feeling—above all, of love and joyful gratitude for God's love and goodness.

The relation of Yahwe to Israel is not a natural, indissoluble relation, such as subsists between a tree and its fruit; it is a moral relation, which has its origin in his choice of Israel to be his people. He chose it, for any good in it (7:7, 9:4 ff.), but because he loved his forefathers (10:15); and love and faithfulness bind him to their descendants (7:8, 9:5). The election by which Israel alone of all the nations of the earth is made the people of Yahwe is Israel's glorious distinction; but it imposes the greatest obligation. Sin, in this light, is more heinous, judgment more necessary and more severe; but in God's constancy to his purpose and promise faith finds the assurance that the severest judgment will not be utter destruction.

The bond between Yahwe and Israel is the covenant which he made with them at Horeb (5:2 ff.) and renewed on the plains of Moab (29:1 [28:6]). The deuteronomy law sets forth the obligations imposed by Yahwe accepted by Israel (17:2); strict observance of the law is the condition of the fulfilment of the promises of Yahwe the obligations which he voluntarily took upon himself in the pact (7:9-13, 11:22 ff., etc.).

Israel is to be a holy people (7:6, 14:21, 26:19)—that is, one set apart to Yahwe in all its life. The stringency of the laws which are to preserve the purity of the people and the land from false religion and immorality is thus explained and justified: 'Thou shalt exterminate the evil from the community' (1135 and pass.; see 22 13-19 21-21 1919-21 etc.).

31. Principle of love.

The relation of Yahwe to Israel is not a natural, indissoluble relation, such as subsists between a tree and its fruit; it is a moral relation, which has its origin in his choice of Israel to be his people. He chose it, for any good in it (7:7, 9:4 ff.), but because he loved his forefathers (10:15); and love and faithfulness bind him to their descendants (7:8, 9:5). The election by which Israel alone of all the nations of the earth is made the people of Yahwe is Israel's glorious distinction; but it imposes the greatest obligation. Sin, in this light, is more heinous, judgment more necessary and more severe; but in God's constancy to his purpose and promise faith finds the assurance that the severest judgment will not be utter destruction.

32. Moral basis.

Notwithstanding the sanguinary thoroughness with which it demands the extirpation of heathenism and the severity of many of the special laws, the distinctive note of the deuteronomie legislation is humanity, philanthropy, charity. Regard not only for the rights, but also for the needs of the widow, the orphan, the landless Levite, the foreign denizen, is urged at every turn.¹ The interests of debtors (231-241-11 151-11), slaves (514 1512-13), and hired labourers (214 f.) are carefully guarded. Various provisions protect the rights of the wife or the female slave (214 221-11 211-11 15-17). Nor are the animals forgotten (251 226 f.). The spirit of the legislation is seen not least clearly in the laws which appear to us altogether utopian, such as 20 (cp 215 1714-20 151-16).

In conformity with its prophetic character, Dt. presents itself not merely as a law-book, but also as a book of religious instruction. Its lessons are to be diligently remembered, and not forgotten in times of prosperity (66-12 811-13 etc.). Its fundamental precepts are to be repeated daily, to be worn as amulets, to be inscribed in public places (67-9 111-21). They are to be taught to children, that each succeeding generation may be brought up in the knowledge of Yahwé's will (67-20-25 111-49); and every seven years the whole law is to be publicly read in the hearing of the assembled people (310-11).

Taken all in all, Dt. will ever stand as one of the noblest monuments of the religion of Israel, and as one of the most noteworthy attempts in history to regulate the whole life of a people by its highest religious principles.

and, but for the shock to our associations, 'night mist' would be a preferable rendering to 'dew'.

This explanation clears up certain otherwise obscure passages. It also enables us to identify with considerable probability the season to which any important passage mentioning ḥal refers. The miracle of Gideon's fleece, e.g., was presumably placed by the writer in the summer. At the same time, when perfectly general language is used respecting ḥal ('dew'), it may be open to us to suppose that a confusion exists in the writer's mind between the genuine 'dew' of winter (spring and autumn) and the 'night mist' of summer, which is not, in our sense of the word, dew at all, since the vapour becomes condensed in the air before it reaches the ground.

In illustration, see Lane's Arabic L. Lexicon, s.v. ḥalā. One example given is: 'The sky rain-dew (ḥalāl) upon the earth.' ḥalāl is defined as 'night or weak (i.e., drizzling) rain, or the light and weather' or dew that descends from the sky in cloudless weather.' (Cf. also Koran, Sur. 2:27, 'And if no heavy shower (ḥalāl) falls on it, the mist (ḥalāl) does'.)

(1) Where the 'dew' comes from.—Job 38:28 is, probably enough, a scribe's insertion (Hb., Dahm); but, if so, the scribe gives an invaluable early summary of what precedes. He states that what is said of the rain in 37:25-27 refers not only to the winter rains or to the occasional thunderstorms but also to the 'night mist'.

Has the rain a father?
Or who has begotten the streams? (not 'drops') of 'dew'?
To this question a wise man replies (Prov. 3:20),
By his (God's) knowledge the depths were opened (i.e., at creation),
And the sky drops down 'dew'.

So Gen. 27:23 Dt. 33:28 Hag. 1:10 Zech. 8:12; cp. also Judg. 5:4 (S) and Theod. 1:2. A more complete answer is given in Enchiridion, where the 'treasuries' of snow and hail (Job 38:22) and also of dew and rain are described. If Job did not 'come to these treasures' Enchiridion did, according to the current legend. The statements are important: 'The spirit of the dew has its dwelling at the ends of the heaven, and is connected with the chambers of the rain, and its course is in winter and summer; and its clouds, and the clouds of the mist are connected, and the one passes over into the other' (60:20, Charles).

In chap. 54 the twelve portals of the winds are described. From eight of them dew and rain are said to proceed; the winds are not, however, always beneficial. The author is by no means a good observer, and his statement is of value only as confirming the statement of 10:20 that 'dew' and 'rain' are connected.

(2) Price-values of 'dew'.—The land of Israel is called 'a land of corn and wine; yea, his heavens drop down dew' (Dt. 33:28). The blessing of Jacob says: 'God give thee of the dew of heaven, and of the fatness of the land' (Gen. 27:28; contrast 7:39, RVmg.). Yahuwe himself resembles 'dew'; 'I will be as the dew for Israel' (parched up, desolate Israel, Hos. 11:5 [n]). The preciousness of the 'dew' is shown by its effects, which are next described.

Perhaps, however, ḥal here includes rain. Dew is an emblem of resurrection: 'A dew of light is thy dew, and to life shall the earth bring the shades' (Is. 26:19, SVOT). 'I rom the world of perfect light where Yahuwe dwells a supernatural 'dew' will descend on the dead Israelites. 'The dew of resurrection' (צֶמֶח חַיִּים) is a Talmudic phrase based on this prophecy. In the Koran, also (e.g., Sur. 41:39), rain is referred to as a sign of the resurrection, too. Micah 5:7 [n] also should be mentioned here. The traditional, as it stands, is unintelligible. The 'coming of Jacob' among the nations cannot be at the same time like showers of night mist on the earth and like a lion. The upright lion (Pasek) placed after 'And shall be' (יִהְיֶה) warns us (as so often) that there is something doubtful in the text. Possibly ḥal, 'upon' has dropped out. The passage

² MT reads ḥal, generally rendered 'drops' (S ḥalōn). 'Reservoirs' would be more defensible; but this does not suit 'begotten.' The obvious emendation is ḥal. Rain is called ḥal in Ps. 65:10. The scribe is thinking of the 'channel' (נַחַל) in 7:23.

³ Heb. text has only 'dropped'.

DIAL AND SUN-DIAL

then reads thus, 'And there shall be on the remnant of the world as it were "dew" from Yahuwe . . . which carries rain, etc. . . ḥal, which is independent of human effort. Rain may be due to deviate from an unquestioned truth, but it is necessary to do so, when even the same Word admits that the point of the comparison in the present is unattainable to him.

(3) Other illustrative passages.—The dew (night) like the rain, comes by the word of a prophet (1 K. 18:41). It falls suddenly (2 S. 17:12), and gently, like perfect eloquence (Dt. 32:2); it has all night (Job 29:4), early disappears like superficial goodness (Hb. 12:17). Such a night mist is to be expected in the early stages of the settled hot weather of harvest (Is. 18:4; text, see VINT., § 1). It has a healing effect on vegetation (2 Chr. 18:16, 13:22); but for a man to be cured it is a trying experience (1 ant. 5:2). It is all-pervasive. Hence Gideon asks, as a sign of his divine mission, that the fleece which he has put on the threshing-floor may be wet with a night mist (ḥal) when the floor is dry, and next, that the fleece may be dry when the floor is wet. So abundant is the moisture of the mist that in the morning after the first exposure Gideon is able to wring out of the fleece a whole tub of water (Judg. 6:36-40).

(4) Two doubtful passages.—In Ps. 110:1, if the scribe correctly transmitted the text, there is a condensed account of a king's youthful army to the countless drops of a highly poetic figure, adopted by Milton in speaking of the hosts. The words, however, 'thou hast the dew of thy crown' is not attested by the LXX, though the other translators all have ἀπὸ τοῦ, are probably corrupt (see Psalm 2).

The other passage (Ps. 133:3) appears to be that it is the dew of Hermon that comes down on the fountains of Zion. Some (so Del.) have thought that a plowman on Hermon might be the result of the abundance of rain on Hermon; others (so Barth.), that 'dew of Hermon' is a proverbial expression for a plentiful dew. Robertson (OT 1:25:2) suggests that the expressions may be hyperbolic, the gathering of pious pilgrims from all parts at the great Jerusalem was 'as if the fertilising dews of great Hermon were all concentrated on the little hill of Zion'; but the passage as it stands, is incapable of a natural interpretation. It came into the editor's hand in an imperfect condition. If an ḥal can be by no possibility be brought into connection here or in the equally corrupt passage, Ps. 42:6 [7]. 1. K.

DIADEM. Strictly δίαδημα (diadēma), to bind round is no more than a rich fillet or head-band. It is worn around the Persian royal hat (see MITRE) and, as distinguished from στέφανος (see CROWN), badge of royalty; cp. 1 Mac. 19:615 8:14 etc., 12:13 13:1 19:12 (RV, 'crown', and so 1 V in 1:4 4:9). It is probable that fillets of a more or less of character are referred to in the Heb. ḥal, ḥal (CROWN) and ḥal (see MITRE).

1. Δίαδημα is used by S to render 772, kether, Esth. 8:15, mitre, 2 S. 1:10 [11, Syn. Theod.] (see CROWN, § 2), ḥal, Esth. 8:15 (see MANTLE), and 772, ḥal, 1 S. 6:2 (see 1:7); see 1 below.

2. ḥal, Bar. 5:2 (1 V, in Judith 10:3 10:8, 1 V, 'mitre', 'mitre').

3. ḥal, miqnepheth, Ezek. 21:26 [31] AV; see MITRE.

4. ḥal, ḥal, 1 S. 6:23 RV, Zech. 3:5 RVmg. (EV 'mitre' Job 20:14 RV (RVmg. 'mitre'); see TURNAN, 2.

5. ḥal, ḥal (properly 'a plain'; 'to weave'), 1 S. 6:23 RVmg. (EV 'mitre').

(6) ḥal, ḥal or ḥal, etc. (RVmg.), ḥal. The ḥal, ḥal (Syn. B. In Ezek. 7:7 10 (RV 'dew'), cp. Co., ḥal means 'crown' (cp. RVmg. 'crowning' in text perhaps faulty, see Co., Bertholet).

DIAL AND SUN-DIAL (ḥal), literally 'stone' ἀναβαθμοί; ḥal, 'hour-stone'; Syn. 1 S. 388 ὠρολογιον; horologium, 2 K. 20:11, 1 S. 388. The term occurs in the account of Hezekiah's illness.

In point of fact, however, the narrator says nothing of a 'dial' and of 'degrees' but only of 'steps'; where AV says, 'The returned ten degrees', RV more correctly says, 'The sun returned ten steps', though immediately afterwards it uses the incorrect 'dial' (with a marginal note, 'Heb. steps'). Hence in AV and in RV the count is more obscure than it need be. It is true, the ḥal accounts in 2 K. 20 and 1 S. 388 which produces some difficulty.

¹ For the meaning of this word in connection with the Annulian system, see Ramsay, Hist. Surg., 196.

DIANA

'swarm' (so Curtius, Epheac, 361); but it is perhaps wrong to follow Lightfoot (Coloss., Intro. p. 141) in denying all connection with the name of the Jewish sect of the Essenes. These priests were the connecting link between the hierarchy and civic life—e.g., they cast the lot which determined the Thousand and Fifth of a newly created citizen (Hicks, Lev., loc. 447, etc.). Neither their number nor the mode of their appointment is known, but they held office only for a year and superintended the feasts at the Artemesium following the sacrifices at the Artemesia, or annual Festival (Paus. Ant. 134). For minor sacred duties see Hicks, Lev. 85 f.

The analogous establishments of the goddess Ma in the temple E. of Asi Minor, at the two Komatas (Cappadocia, Str. 535; Paus. Ant. 137), shows the system in a more thorough-going form. Strabo's words (ἐν δὲ ταῖς ἀρχαῖς ἀρτεμίδεσσιν ἐπὶ δὲ ἡρώεσσιν) imply that the grosser features of the cult had been got rid of at Ephesus. In the eastern shrines we have a presiding priest, aided in blood to the reigning family, and second only to him in honour, ruling the temple and the attendant τεμενοκόμοι (ἐκ τῶν κληρῶν), and enjoying the vast revenues of the sacred estates.

The cultus-statue was thoroughly oriental in form, being a nude, surmounted by a bust covered with breasts (Her. Prod. Eph.).

2. The image. Like the most ancient image of Athena at Athens (Paus. Ant. 266) and the statue of Artemis at Tauris (Her. Prod. 1, 977), and that of the allied Cybele of Pessinus, it 'fell down from Jupiter' (so AV and RV in Acts 19:15: τοῦ διωπετοῦς, 'that fell from heaven'). Such was her form wherever she was worshipped as Ephesian Artemis; but on the coins we find mostly the purely Hellenic type. The 'silver shrines' (Acts 19:24 αὐαὶ) were offered by the rich in the temple; poorer worshippers would dedicate shrines of marble or terra-cotta.

Numerous examples in marble, and some in terra-cotta, are extant (Athen. Mitth. 24, Arch. Zeit. 1850); the series shows continuous development from the earliest known representation of the Mother-goddess (the so-called 'Niobe' at Magnesia near Mt. Sipylus) to such as that figured in Harrison, Mith. and Min. of Athens, 43 (cp Rams. in HB, 1832, p. 45). Such shrines were perhaps also kept in private houses (Paus. Ant. 31 ἀνδρῶν τὰς οἰκίας); in fact, they constituted an important part of ancient ritual (cp Her. Prod. 1, 9 συνάδοι παρτεῖς, θεοῦργοι καὶ ἐσθλοὶ; Mith. Mitth. 179; εἰδωλὰ διὰ χειρὸς ἐκτελεῖται in the festival called καταγυμνασία; Dion. Hal. Ant. 3 n. 171, referring to the thirty gold and silver ἀντικεινόμενα presented by C. Vibius Salutaris in 104 A.D.).

In the manufacture of these shrines many hands and much capital were employed (Acts 19:24 παρεῖχτο τοῖς τεχνίταις οὐκ ὀλίγην ἐργασίαν).

The characteristic formula of invocation was μεγάλη Ἀρτεμῖς (whence we must accept the reading of D as against the μεγάλη ἡ Ἀρτεμῖς of the other MSS). The epithet is applied in inscriptions (IG 2963 C, τῆς μεγάλης θεᾶς Ἀρτέμιδος; ib. 6797, Ἐφέσου Ἀνασσα). Its use in invocation has been detected at other centres of the allied cults.

This was the case, for example, at the shrine of Artemis-Leto and Apollo-Lairhenos at Dionysopolis (Rams. HB, Phryg. 1151, n. 4); μεγάλη Ἀπόλλω Λαίρηνος, see J. Hell. Stud. 1889, p. 216 f.; cp HB, Phryg. 135, n. 53, εὐχαριστῶ Μητρὶ Ἀρτῶν καὶ Ἀδωνάτων δυνάτῃ ποτεῖ. In an inscription from the Limnai (mod. Agios Geras and Hoban G.), where Artemis of the lakes was revered, we have the formula Μεγάλη Ἀρτεμῖς (Rams. HB, Grec. of Asia, 410). The Artemis of Therma in Lesbos is invoked by the phrase 'Great Artemis of Therma' which appears on a stone still standing by the road between Therma and Mytilene (Revue de Corr. Hell. 1880, p. 430). The Artemis of Perga also affords a parallel (Rams. Church in R. Emp. 133; cp also HB, Grec. of Asia, 292).

All these examples show that the power of the goddess was a prominent idea in the cult, and give point to the reiteration of the formula by the mob (Acts 19:11). Cp Ken. Eph. 1.11, δυνάμει τῇ σου τὴν πᾶν τὴν ἡμῶν θεῶν, τὴν μεγάλην Ἐφέσιον Ἀρτεμῖν.

One of the secrets of the popularity of the temple was its right of asylum. Whatever the fate of the town, the temple and all within the precinct were safe (Paus. Ant. 28 τοῖς δὲ περὶ τὸ ἱερὸν οἰκοδομὴ δῖμα ἦν οὐδὲν. Cp also Herod. 126; Cic. Verr. ii. 13; Strabo, 641).

3. The temple. The peribolos-area was several times enlarged—by Alexander the Great who extended it to a radius of a stade from the temple, and Mithridates. Antony doubled it, taking in μνηστῆρας—i.e., part of the salubres. This extension in favour of the criminal classes (Strabo, Lev. 360), so that Augustus in 6 B.C. narrowed the area, and surrounded it with a wall (Hicks, 522 f.). There was a further revision by P. 22 A.D. (Tac. Ann. 361). Connected with this was the use of the place as a national and provincial deposit (Dion Chrys. Rhod. Or. 595; see Her. Prod. 341 f.; Strabo, 640). From the loans were issued to individuals or communities (Manual Gr. Hist. Ins. no. 205).

It is noteworthy that the opposition to Paul originate among the priests (see Epist. 18). The energies of the priests of the great shrines have been largely directed to the absorption of elements in the new cults with which they came in contact, or at any rate to the harmonising of the rival worship. In this they were assisted by the tendency of the Greeks to see in foreign deities figures of their own pantheon. That very deity were taken in Ephesus to avoid conflict with the Apollo is proved by the localisation there of the place of Apollo and Artemis (Str. 639, Tac. Ann. 11 Pauli's Religion, 137). The teaching of Paul seems but another imputation from the E. effect a revival redounding to the advantage of the temple. This blindness of the priesthood to tendencies of the new teaching is well illustrated by the priest of Zeus Propoileos in 1 A.D. in doing honour to Paul and Barnabas (Acts 14:13). Not until a later period was this attitude exorcised of hostility; the earliest pagan opposition was on lower grounds than those of religion (Rams. in R. Emp. 131, 200). [See especially Zimmern, Ephesus im ersten christl. Jahrhundert, 1874.]

Nr. 2514. There the name of Zimri is more or less identical with a Mande sister-tribe used southward here the other side of the Sahara. Zimri belongs to the tribe of Senni which according to Gmelin had Cameroonian origin prior to their flight into the tube of Darfur. See DAN 2011. In both stories the prevailing principle is the necessity of cutting off Israel from all sources of help. See also Nchira 1376 and see Bartholet, Sahelien, I, p. 147.

DIMNAH (דִּמְנָה; ΔΑΜΝΑ [VL]; ΔΑΜΝΑ [B]), one of the cities of Zebulun theoretically assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21 and Ps. . It is mentioned together with NAMAL (נַמַּל). The form, however, seems incorrect; we would rather read KIMMONAH, with D^h, Barth, Dematt. Cp. Kimmona (c Ch. 602 [77]), and see KIMMON, ii, 3.

DIMON (דִּמְיוֹן ; $\Delta\epsilon\iota\omega\nu$ [B twice]; $\rho\epsilon\mu\omega\nu$ Neuch.^{ch} twice; $A\Gamma$ once, Q^o once); $\Delta\epsilon\omega\omega\nu$ [once M^t , sp. ras N^o]; $\delta\epsilon\rho\omega\nu$ [N^o fort]; $\Delta\epsilon\omega\nu$ [once C^{mg}]; $\delta\epsilon\upsilon\omega\alpha\tilde{o}$ [once S^o].) a town of Moab mentioned only in Is. 15^g (twice). According to the p_{ms} it is a corruption of דִּימוֹר NINRIM [y :]; it is no objection to this view that Ninrim has already been mentioned in v. 6; $\Delta\epsilon\omega\omega\nu$ in Jer. 48² is still more plainly a corruption of Ninrim. Those who adhere to the traditional text suppose that Dimon=Dibon, the former without being chosen on account of the association with $d\acute{\imath}\nu\alpha$, 'blood,' or else that some unknown place is referred to according to Dibon, on the border of Edom; cp 14ⁱ and see K. 322). The former view is the more prevalent one. If Abana=Armana, may not Dimon be equivalent to Dibon? Jerome in his commentary says, "Usque ad indiciferentem et Dimon et Dibon hoc oppidum dicitur," and in the OT itself we find DIMONAH (דִּמְוָנָה) and Dibon (2) used for the same place. If Dibon be meant in Is. 15, 'the waters of Dimon' may, according to Hitzig and Dillmann, be a reservoir such as many cities probably possessed (cp Cant. 7^{4[5]}, but see LESHMON). The Arnon flowed too far off from the town to be meant. Still the text may be admitted to be doubtful.

DIMONAH (דִּמְוֹנָה) [פֶּדְמוֹנָה] [B], אִדְמוֹנָה [A.], Judahite city on the border of Edom (Josh. 15:2). Perhaps the DIMON (2) of Nch. 11:25 (cp Edom and Edom in Moab). Knobel and others suggest the modern edh-Teirib or et-Teiribeh, 2½ m. NW of Tell'Arad; it this is quite uncertain. Posh. אִדְמוֹנָה presupposes form דִּמְוֹנָה; cp the variation given under DANNAH.

DINAH (דִּינָה) [דִּינָה] [A.], 'daughter' of Leah (1) 'sister' of Simeon and Levi.

Whilst Ben-oni left behind it some memorials (see N-ONI), the disappearance of Dinah, to judge from the absence of all later traces, seems to Gen. 34. have been absolute. In Is story, how-

Unfortunately, the story is incomplete. We are not told what the country chairman of S. S. C. saw in why the city was so bad. After the 1960 election, China not only the Tibetans were concerned and Communist, § 4, and then later the Communist to work, adopted to settle in Shoshone areas that have adopted the communist rule. I do not have to mention this.

2. Motive. For the 'motive' is the 'the good of health' (that it was better, and better for her) it was cured, but according to the chief reason of this difference was that the safety of Elizabeth had been imperilled. The judgment that overtook the perpetration of the deed is clearly indicated in the Bible; they should be divided and scattered. One collectively (vs. 11) does this 'judgment' stand related to the name dejah? Does one explain the other? and, if so, which?

The Dinah story may be regarded as an explanation of the 'judgment' either on the part of an Sumerian deity. It is also, however, fitted to serve as a popular explanation of the name Jacob, which it assigns to the immigrant people: Jacob was a wily people; and he had tricked an ignominious him. Stories are easily made to fit so as to explain several distinct points.

It was a common belief in the days of the monarchy that the Leath tribes had been in the highlands of

3. Meaning. I phrased before they settled in the south (see ISRM, § 7; LEVI, SIMON, DAN, 20). The point that concerns us here is whether some of them settled in Shechem. Unfortunately the oldest traditions that have come down to us belong to an age when there was no distinct memory of the real course of events. Every one knew that there was a time when peoples had planted themselves in the hill country that had not yet incorporated Shechem: the belief of later age, that it was the resting-place of the remains of Joseph, had not arisen, but as to how it became a tradition there were already various theories. One story told of deeds of sword and bow (Gen 35; Judg 9a); another made more of a treaty or contract of some kind (cannibals? circumcision? a sale of property? an alliance [盟約]? 31a, b). It might perhaps be suggested that the rabbi alliance with the Shechemites (Judg. 8a) points to a third story, a story of an Abiez-

Prof. Cheyne thinks that the disappearance of the tribe is really recorded in 25:1; that what I. wrote was not 'and he died Beth-el', but 'and there died Dinah'. Here are, finally, in his eyes, difficulties in the text as it stands: the meeting of a famous tree with — (nurse); the preservation of a name (Contrast Gen. 24:6, where moreover I read וְהָיָה שֵׁם הָעֵץ וְהָיָה עֵץ הַיָּדָה וְהָיָה עֵץ הַיָּדָה); the presence of the use in the train of Jacob; the whole Jacobian making a man (marrying over her); the geographical discrepancy (Gen. 35:8 and Judg. 43). He therefore proposes to read וְהָיָה שֵׁם הָעֵץ into וְהָיָה שֵׁם הָעֵץ and to read 'and Dinah, Jacob's eldest daughter, died, and was buried at the foot of the hill of Beth-el, and was buried under the tree; its name is called Amon-dikuth' (See APPENDIX 70). The destruction of a tribe would certainly fulfil וְהָיָה שֵׁם הָעֵץ (Gen. 35:8). Both J (Gen. 35:19) and P (Gen. 46:7) represent Jacob as having more than one daughter.

the settlement in Shechem. The idea of the covenant, however, may be simply a popular attempt to explain the name RAYAH-SHECHEM (cf. like the story connected with the name Jabbadib (see GUTHRIE)). The wife's story, though fairly, may have to be classed with others of the same type. It is possible settlement theory is historically the most probable; but it is hardly necessary to question the occurrence of a Duth raid less successful than the Rumble. See, further, RAYAH-SHECHEM.

DINAITES (𐎠𐎡𐎢) mentioned by the Aramaeans, Syrians, Parthians [?], and others, in the Aramaic letter from Rehob to Antiochus (117 B.C.). It is improbable that the word is an ethnic name (so 𐎠𐎡𐎢 dinait [Yg]), and we should rather point 𐎠𐎡𐎢 judges (so 𐎠𐎡𐎢 al-pairan). It is the Aramaic translation of the Persian title dānabāhar. Cf. Hoffmann, Z. f. 1887, p. 55; Schröder, II/172a; Andrews in Mon. f. Iran. (rom. 5).

DINHABAH דִּנְהָבָה ΔΕΝΑΒΑ [AUF], the city of the Idumean king Bura (771, Gen 36¹²). Almost beyond a doubt דִּנְהָבָה is a corruption of דִּנְהָבָה (cp 771, 77). See Bura and cp Che. 127. My op. cit. It is a mere accident that several names can be quoted somewhat resembling Dinhabah. Thus in the Amurru tablets Dimp or Dimp is mentioned as in the land of Martu. Dimpur also occurs in the list of the N. Syrian places conquered by Thodmes III. (Lomkins KPZ 500). There was a Dandah in Palmyrene Syria (Ibid. v. 1504; Assmann, RPZ Op. 32, p. 505f. ibid., quoted by Knib, and a Dandah in Babylonia (Zosim. ibid. 309). There was also a Dandah in N. Arabia (OS 114 ch. A. Tondah RPZ Empur Thombi Frstn) is to be found N.E. of Hoshan; the RPZ map calls it Hoshan of Tondah but the Honi Sakhir knew not Hoshan (Gray H. I. RPZ 180, p. 104). With this place Dinhabah is identified by a Russ. Bibel-Atlas, and Tomkin, RPZ Op. p. 227. T. K. C.

1. Lucian (WZ 34 42) tells us in the authority of Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, who flourished about 171 A.D., that Dionysius' tradition is sometimes confounded with St. Denis, the first apostle of France, a confusion which was greatly fostered by Aldobaldinus of St. Denis (14 A.D.) in his Apocrypha, which made large use of spurious documents. The important writings of the Pseudo-Dionysius-Areopagita, first mentioned in the sixth century, do not fall within the scope of a Dictionary of the Bible.

2. NT usage. occurrence. Here it sometimes with the usage in Atta (cp. Plato) and designates merely the pupil or taught by another (Mt 10: 1; Lk 6: 1). It is applied to the followers of a particular teacher as, for example, of Moses as regarded in 9: 1, of the Baptist (Mt 9: 14; Mk 2: 18), of Jesus teaching (Lk 10: 2) and others. As referring to followers of Jesus we find that μαθηται is applied widely, to all his adherents and followers (e.g. esp. in Acts 6: 7; etc.), only once following (arguing 9: 1), including even, those who had baptized only 'into John's baptism' (Acts 19: 4), in a more restricted manner, to denote the out of which the Twelve were chosen, who, therefore also called μαθηται in relation to the meaning of ἀποστόλοι (Lk 6: 13) compared with 1 Pet 1: 12; 2: 25; 4: 14; 5: 1, see Acts 11: 2).

3. Later Christian usage. Finally, in ecclesiastical language, the term apostolus is applied (in the plur.) more particularly to the twelve apostles, who were sent out by Jesus to preach the Gospel in the Kingdom of Heaven (Lk. 10:1-17). The number varies between seventy (s. Rev. 1:1, 8; Act. 13) and seventy-two (Mt. 28:19; s. also fully Evangelium secundum Mattheum). Lists of the names are extant in various forms and are ascribed to Dorotheos, Epiphanius,¹ and Sophronius. They compare well with the Acts and Pauline Epistles; but vary to be found in each list. (See Epist. de apostol. nom. et apostol. ord. I, pp. 226, 227.)

It was at Apameum (a place half-probably to indicate that Amos' wilderness was 'taken with a great fever', i.e. 1.81—an expression which is thought to indicate medical knowledge). Certainly Galen and Hippocrates use the phrase, as Weistman has pointed out. There are parallel cases in Acts 12.25-28 (see 9.6). According to Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, cp I, 409-11, 1890), pp. 20-23) the 'thorn (stake) in the flesh' (taken of m. 2 Cor. 12) means the severe headache (like a hot bar) which follows an attack of the animal fever of Asia Minor.

The list of these terms, 'dysentery,' occurs in Acts 28 where the combination of

According to Josephus (Ant. vi. 11) the disease of the Galilaeans in A.D. 5 was dysentery.

Since in 1883 it was dysentery, a view which, if the literal Hebrew reading of the text may be accepted, is somewhat plausible. The more usual biblical expression for dysentery is the falling out of the bowels, implying either painful straining as if the bowels would cut out, or some shedding of the mucous membrane, or degree of prolapse, such as occurs normally in the case, jungle, etc.

There is a singular combination of the idea of bursting out with that of falling out in Acts 1:2; but the second of this passage will not bear the stress of critical treatment; the conventional fate of traitors in apocryphal legends that is signed to Judas. The statement must, if this view is not, be classed with the less historic portions of Acts. Cf. 1:16A.

σκοληκηδωματος ('eaten of worms') gives us the detail as to the disease by which Herod Agrippa I. was carried off (Acts 12:28). It reminds us, however, of the disease of which, acc. to Josephus (Ant. 18:113),

DISPERSION

And Harold the car had one feature of which I was a strong admirer, and of that which a Munich friend of mine had called the death of Trotsky's father. As we proceeded to look at it in the department store, it was indeed as if a fate had fallen on its wheels. So R. Bennett sometimes put on the subject of his statement to me, saying, "I am a descendant of Harold Trotsky's death," and the fellow, by the way, was a Jew.

DISPL. ἡ ἀποποδοσία so rendered by RV of Mt. 127. ἀποποδοσία is a verb, and partly to include the process itself, the gradual distribution of riches among foreign lands, and partly as a collective term for the persons so displaced or for their surroundings. In the present article it is proposed to treat only the case of the Jewish Dispersion §§ 117-125, its standing § 150, and its inner and outer life §§ 126-129.

Asiophila occurs in G of Dn, Ss, Lr and U17 for Hb, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855,

1. Permanent settlements of Israelites in regions east of Canaan had their origin in one or other of two main factors: the search for pasture and the search for security.

the Assyrian and the Babylonian kings were of a quite different character. The first was brought about in 734 by Tiglath-pileser III. (2 K. 15:29); at a later date Sargon deported 27,280 inhabitants of Samaria to Mesopotamia and Media (2 K. 17:6). These large colonies seem to have become completely absorbed; history furnishes no clear trace of their continued separate existence. Still, there is no improbability in the supposition that many of the banished Israelites subsequently became united with the later exiles from Judah. These later exiles were transported by Nebuchadnezzar II. to Babylon in 597, 586, and 582,—according to Jer. 52:3-35 to the number of 4600 souls. They did not readily accommodate themselves to the arrangements made by the king in their behalf, having been led by their prophets to expect a speedy return to Jerusalem (Jer. 29: Ezek. 13). This view, as we know, was not shared by Jeremiah and Ezekiel; and hence it is that the first-named prophet has left us a clear utterance with regard to that (for Israel) perplexing event—the 'exile.' For him the Babylonian Exile is a prolonged punishment from God. It must be submitted to with resignation and patience, and relief will come only to those in whom the chastisement has fulfilled its purpose. Hence he admonishes the exiles to settle quietly down in Babylonia, to think of the welfare of their families, and to seek their own good in that of the foreigners among whom their lot is cast (Jer. 29:4-7). On the other hand, in his view the intention of those men of Judah who were proposing of their own proper motion to forsake the land of Yahwé and remove to Egypt was against the will of God; it was the road to ruin (Jer. 42:1). This view of the prophet did not, however, turn them from their purpose (see JEREMIAH). Nor did the distinction made by the prophet between involuntary and voluntary exile, however obvious in itself, affect the theorists of a later age, whom we find expecting the return of the Israelites indiscriminately from all the lands of the dispersion (Is. 11:12-13:5).

Let us now seek to trace the subsequent history of the diaspora in the various lands of its abode. The Judahites deported to Babylonia constituted, alike in numbers and in worth, the very kernel of their people (2 K. 24:12-16 25:11 Jer. 52:15). They carried with them, accordingly, as we learn from the Book of Ezekiel, into their new home all the political and religious tendencies of the later period. In particular, there was in Babylonia no want of persons who cherished and developed the ideas of the prophets of the eighth and the seventh centuries. For proof we have only to look at the great zeal which was shown in preserving and adapting the older historical and legal literature, or to call to mind the many prophetic utterances belonging to this period. Those who cherished these ideals did not constitute any 'close' community; they mingled freely with those who were opposed to them, and the prophetic conception always had much to contend with. Still, there were certain centres for Israelitic piety at which fidelity to the Law and hope in the return of the exiles were sedulously and specially cherished. TEL-ABIB (Ezek. 3:15), the river CHEBAR (Ezek. 1:3), AHAVA (Ezra 8:15), and CASIPHIA (Ezra 8:17) are the only names of such places that have come down to us; but doubtless there were others. When we find Ezra fetching Levites from Casiphia we have evidence enough to mark the place as a centre of deuteronomistic legalism. The Babylonian Diaspora was by no means entirely deprived of these devoted religious workers in the sixth and fifth centuries. The return under Cyrus must not be construed exactly as we find it represented in Ezra 1-3 (see ISRAEL, § 50 ff.; EZRA, ii; CYRUS). The command to rebuild the temple of Yahwé in Jerusalem mission of Sheshbazzar in 538 led to the return of a few families to the ancestral home; the restoration of the temple had been accomplished (519-515) led only to the sending of deputations of gifts to Jerusalem (Zech. 6:9 ff.); it was not until some 5000 or 6000 persons that Ezra came to Judaea about 430 B.C. All this abundant that the inclination to return was not very felt by the exiles.

For this there were various causes. Many exiles were indifferent in religious matters; in the interval adapted themselves too closely to new conditions in which they found themselves held the return to be premature, deeming that the times of fulfilment had not yet come. In a with prophecy, the last-mentioned were expected special divine interposition to put an end to the and to give the signal for the beginning of the nation of Israel (Jer. 32:46 ff. Ezek. 31:11 ff. 9 ff. Mic. 5:2). Just as, in Jerusalem, men hesitated as to whether they ought to return to the temple and not rather wait for Yahwé's manifestation of himself in glory (Hag. 1:2 ff.), so in Babylonia they hesitated as to whether they ought to return with and not rather await some special divine disposition. It is possible that a few additional may have migrated to Jerusalem after the community there had been reconstituted under Zerubbabel and Ezra (430 B.C.); but in any case it is clear that a very considerable body of Jews who still adhered to the law remained behind in Babylonia, and the same tendencies which had led to the great exodus in Jerusalem brought about through the help of Persian kings continued to be influential in Babylonia also. The Babylonian Diaspora received an impulse under the reign of Artaxerxes III. Ochus (358-338 B.C.) he transported Jews to Hyrcania and Babylonia (Syncell. ed. Dindorf, 1:486).

The Persian overlordship may be assumed to have helped to open the way for the Jews of Babylonia towards the E. and the N. (Tobias 1:17 Nehemiah [Neh. 1:3] is a clear evidence of the kind of thing that must have happened; compare also Tob. 1:17). Wherever a Jew had established himself in an advantageous position there were never wanting persons to press forward and follow this up for them. From Babylonia (and Hyrcania) the Jews advanced to Elam (Is. 48:14), Persia, Media, Armenia, Cappadocia and the Black Sea. The relations which Herodotus had established with the princes of the Upper Euphrates were utilised, we may be sure, by the Jewish Diaspora. Their centre of radiation for the whole of these countries, however, continued always to be in Babylonia where the Euphrates and the Tigris begin to flow. Here was situated Nehardea (ܢܗܪܕܝܐ, Νααρδῶνα) the temple tax levied in these parts was collected (see below, § 16). In the same neighbourhood two Jews named Asinens and Anilans, in the time of Caligula, founded a sort of robber state, held its own for sixteen years (Jos. Ant. xv. 104). Another important focus of Judaism was the Nisibis (2:22), in the upper basin of the Tigris. The Jewish community in Babylonia could boast of the conversion of King Izates of Adiabene (2:77-78), the upper Tigris, along with his mother and the rest of his kindred, in the reign of Claudius (Jos. Ant. xx. 104). The development of the Diaspora in Egypt followed a quite different course from that which has just been sketched. Whilst the Judaism of Babylonia maintained its Oriental character with considerable strictness, in Egypt (to speak more precisely) in Alexandria, it entered into that remarkable alliance with Hellenism which destined to have such important effects on the history of religion. Whether Psametik I. (663-609 B.C.) actually had Jewish mercenaries in his service (Letter of Aristaeas) may be left an open question. We know, however, that in 609 Necho II. condemned King Jehoiachaz to exile in Egypt, and that in 586 a body of Jews, including Jeremiah the prophet, under the leadership of Johanan b. Kareah, migrated to TAPUANITES (Tell Deffenne; cp Jer. 42 f.). According to Jer. 44b (an insertion dating from about the fifth century) Jews settled also in Migdol, Noph (Memphis), and Paturos (Upper Egypt). Their settlement in Alexandria is assigned by the Pseudo-Hecatæus, by Aristæus, and by Josephus to the period of Alexander the Great or Ptolemy I. It has been shown by H. Willrich,¹ however, that the statements of these writers must be taken with great caution. In his own view there was no considerable Jewish element in Alexandria until the second century B.C. Against this theory two objections can be urged. First, the statement of Apion that the Jews settled to the E. of the harbour of Alexandria (Jos. c. Ap. 24) can be understood only with reference to the time of the rise of the city. Secondly, the statement of Josephus (ib.; cp RJ ii. 187) that the Jews in Alexandria received the honorific name of Macedonian can hardly be doubted. Josephus indeed exaggerates; the Jews in Alexandria were in the first instance under the protection of the 'phyle' of the Macedonians, and the Jewish quarter formed a part of this 'phyle'; in the limited sense only came they to be called Macedonians. As the later Ptolemies, especially from the time of Ptolemy VI. Philometor onwards, favoured the Egyptian more than the Grecian element in Alexandria, it is not to be supposed that the Jews reached this privileged position so late as the second century.² This being so, they can have obtained it only under the first Ptolemies, and in that case it is very far indeed from improbable that Jews were included among the earliest inhabitants of Alexandria and thus acquired special privileges there. They had a separate quarter of their own, known as the Δ (Delta) quarter (Jos. RJ ii. 183). The repeated struggles between Ptolemies and Seleucids, and the preference of the Jews for the former dynasty, may be presumed to have led in succeeding generations to further Jewish migrations into Egypt, especially to Alexandria, partly even as prisoners of war (cp Jer. in Dan. 114).

We are told of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus (Jos. Ant. xii. 21) that, as a fitting prelude to the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, he released some 120,000 Jewish prisoners of war. The story is doubtless a fiction; but it throws light on some of the circumstances which had to do with the increase of the Jewish population in Egypt. Ptolemy VI. Philometor (181-145) also is mentioned in history as a friend to the Jews; Ptolemy VII. (see Euergetes), as a relentless enemy. For the former see Jos. Ant. xiii. 31 f.; for the latter Jos. c. Ap. 2 c. We may take it that Euergetes for some years regarded the Jews as his political opponents, siding as they did with his rival Ptolemy Philometor; but we have evidence of papyri and inscriptions that he also showed them various marks of favour (Willrich, op. cit. 142 ff.).

In Philo's time (40 A.D.) the Jews in Alexandria were so many as to occupy two entire quarters, besides furnishing a sprinkling over the rest of the city (in Flaccum, 8, ed. Mangey, 2525).

An exceptional position was taken by the Onias colony in the nome of Heliopolis. The high priest ONIAS (7.7.), son of Simon the Just, had taken refuge from his adversaries, the children of Tobias, and from Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, in 173 or 170, by flight into Egypt. He was accompanied by a body of his adherents—among them DOSITHES (4), who is named in the subscription to the Greek version of the Book of Esther. From Ptolemy VI. Philometor he and his people received permission to settle on the eastern border of the Nile delta in the nome of Heliopolis. Here Onias built a fortress, and within this a sanctuary (on the pattern of the temple of Jerusalem), in which he established a legal worship of Yahwe. Philometor endowed the temple with land (cp Jos. RJ i. 11; vi. 10; ff.; Ant. vi. 51; 97; xii. 31 ff.; also the recent discussions of the date of this exodus and the persons engaged in it in Willrich, op. cit. 14 ff. 125 ff.; Wellh. GGI, 1895, p. 947 ff.; also ISRAEL, § 7).

The temple of Onias, however, did not receive universal recognition even in Egypt (not to speak of Palestine). It had, indeed, the legitimate high priest, of the family of Aaron; but it did not occupy the legitimate site. Thus the Diaspora in Egypt was brought to a state of schism, which is alluded to in a veiled manner in Ant. xiii. 34 and elsewhere, as Willrich (op. cit. 120 ff.) has conjectured, no doubt correctly. At the same time, the antagonism between Leontopolis (as the city of the Onias-temple was called) and Jerusalem does not seem to have been very intense; otherwise the allusion to the temple of Onias in Is. 19:13 (but cp HIRSH, CIY OT) would hardly have been allowed to pass. Moreover, national feeling appears on repeated occasions to have overridden religious or ecclesiastical differences (Jos. Ant. xii. 132; xiv. 81; RJ i. 94). Particularly noteworthy is the readiness for war and the ability for self-defence to which Josephus frequently calls attention in the followers of Onias (c. Ap. 25; Ant. xiii. 104; 131 f.; RJ i. 94; Ant. xiv. 81). The temple at Leontopolis was destroyed in 73 A.D. by Lupus and Paulinus by order of Vespasian (Jos. RJ vii. 102 ff.).

Jews penetrated also into Upper Egypt and Cush (Is. 11:11), as we learn from lately published papyri.

They were strongly represented in Cyrenaica also (c. Ap. 24; Jer. on Dan. 11:14). Strabo (cp Jos. Ant. xiv. 72), writing of 85 B.C., divides the inhabitants of the city of Cyrene into four classes—citizens, peasants, settlers (metæci), and Jews. In the city of Berenice the inscriptions show a special πολιτεία of the Jews dating from 13 B.C. (cp CI G iii. no. 5361).

The Diaspora in Egypt did not owe its origin entirely—as, in the first instance, did that of Babylonia—to external compulsion. It owed its growth and its reputable standing mainly to the great changes produced throughout the East generally by the conquests of Alexander. The greatly enlarged channels of commerce, especially by sea-routes, attracted many from the interior to the coasts. The newly-founded Grecian cities, rendered attractive by all the achievements of Greek art and civilisation, became favourite resorts. Henceforth trade relations, the desire to see the world, soon also political considerations and (we may well suppose) a certain conscious or unconscious craving for culture, became operative in promoting the dispersion of the Jews over the civilised world.

Such things seem to have been specially influential in bringing about the settlement of Jews in Syria. It is quite possible, indeed, that the old

10. Attractions of civilisation.

Israelite colony in Damascus (see above, § 1) may have maintained an uninterrupted existence and gradually developed into the Jewish community to the largeness of which Josephus bears witness (RJ ii. 202; vii. 87). In some of the Phœnician cities also, as, for example, in Tyre (cp Ezek 27) and Sidon, Israelites may have settled from a very early period; as at the main points on the great trade route between Jerusalem and Mesopotamia, such as Hamath (Is. 11:11). The Syria of the Seleucids, however, seems first to have become thoroughly accessible to Jews only after the reign of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes. It was his successors, for example, who first conceded to them the right of free settlement in Antioch (Jos. Ant. vii. 33). The later Seleucids had abundant occasion for showing consideration to the resident Jews: in the frequent struggles for the crown, the support of the Maccabees became important (Jos. Ant. xiii. 53). The opposite statement of Josephus that it was Seleucus I. (306-280 B.C.) who granted to the Jews the rights of citizenship in Antioch (c. Ap. 24), or even equal rights with Greeks in all the cities founded by him in Asia and Lower Syria (Ant. xii. 31), is probably to be understood only as meaning that the Jews ultimately received the rights of citizenship in all the places named. It is easy to understand how the astonishing increase in numbers, power, and influence, which the Jewish commonwealth gained under the rule of the Maccabees, should first have made itself felt in the neighbouring kingdom of the Seleucidae. The Maccabees had subjugated and converted the Idumaeans in the south as well as the Iturians in the north; Galilee and Peraea also became Judaised during their supremacy. What was the little community founded by Ezra and Nehemiah, either in extent or in numbers, in comparison with this? Jerusalem had become so strong that—reversing the prophetic prediction—it could lend to the Dispersion from the abundance of its own forces. From thence forward it was, we may plausibly conjecture, that the Diaspora in Syria became so strong as to exhibit the largest admixture of the Jewish element known anywhere (Jos. BJ vii. 33). Precise details regarding the individual localities are, however, lacking.

The immigration of Jews to Asia Minor and its islands was partly overland by way of Syria and Mesopotamia, and partly by sea from Egypt and Phoenicia, but for the most part not before the Grecian period. It is possible, however, that Jews may have been sold as slaves into these regions at an earlier date (cp. Ezek. 27.13 Joel 3[4]7). It is interesting that Clearchus of Soli (c. 320 B.C.) speaks of a meeting between his master Aristotle and an already Hellenised Jew (Jos. c. Ap. i. 22). In the passage in question the Jews are represented as descendants of the Indian philosophers; which shows that at that time and place the Jew was looked upon with wonder as a new phenomenon—the educated Jew, at least. Josephus (Ant. xii. 34) will have it that a colony of 2000 Jewish families was transported by Antiochus III. the Great (224-187) from Mesopotamia and Babylonia into Lydia and Phrygia. The form and the substance of the statement alike arouse suspicion (Willrich, 39 ff.). Here again we are in ignorance as to the details of the migration. In any case, it was to the advantage of the Jewish Diaspora when Greece and Asia Minor in 146 and 130 B.C. became Roman provinces and the kings of Eastern Asia Minor accepted the supremacy of Rome. From the days of Simon, the Maccabees had been in friendly alliance with Rome, and the Jews very soon began to realise that under the Roman rule they enjoyed greater freedom in the exercise of their religious customs than they had found in the Grecian kingdoms (cp. Jos. Ant. xvi. 24, and below). Accordingly, as early as the first century B.C., we find them making use of their good relations with the Romans to secure any doubtful or disputed rights in the cities of Asia Minor and Syria by decisions of the supreme authority (cp. decrees and the names therein mentioned as given in Jos. Ant. xiv. 10, xiv. 123 ff., xvi. 23 ff., 62 ff.; for Cyprus, Ant. xiii. 104, Acts 134 ff.; for Crete, BJ ii. 71; also Acts 13-21 passim).

12. In Asia Minor and the West.

Jews arrived in Greece and Italy in the second century B.C. if not earlier. Between 170 and 156 we find an emancipated Jewish slave named in a Delphi inscription (Willrich, 123 f.), and Valerius Maximus (I. 32) mentions that in 139 B.C. certain proselytising Jews were expelled from Rome. The fabulous assertion of kinship between the Jews and the Spartans (1 Macc. 12.21) presupposes for the time of its origin (see SPARTAN) a mutual acquaintance. Jewish inscriptions, moreover, in Greece, and the apostle Paul found firmly established communities there (Acts 17 f.). In 63 B.C. captives were brought to Rome by Pompey and slaves. Soon emancipated, they acquired the citizenship and founded the Jewish colony on the right bank of the Tiber (Philo, ed. Mangey). Caesar conferred upon the Jews many favours; the decree of the senate in Jos. Ant. xiv. 85 immediately preceding narrative. Herod, who always interested himself in the welfare of the Diaspora (Ant. xvi. 22-5, 61-8), cultivated with Rome assiduously, and greatly promoted the settlements there. Thus in the course of the first century the Jews had already begun to establish themselves on the left bank of the Tiber, the Porta Capena (Juv. Sat. 3.12-16), and at what later date on the Campus Martius and even Subura. In connection with events in the year 70, Josephus (BJ ii. 61) speaks of a Jewish embassy to Rome as having been supported by more than 100,000 Jews there. Under the same year he mentions (BJ ii. 71) the existence of Jews in Dacia (Puteoli). The friendship of the two Agrippas with the imperial house, the relations of Josephus with the emperor Vespasian, and the loyalty of the Jews to the emperor Titus for Berenice, all testify to the fact which Judaism had made in the highest Roman circles, and no one will imagine the Jews of that day to have been so self-forgotten as not to utilise such favourable circumstances, as far as they possibly could, for their own advantage.

To complete the present survey, Arabia also must be mentioned as one of the fields of the Jewish Diaspora. From Acts 21 and Gal. 1.17 the inference that in the first century there were Jewish communities there is certain, but as to their origin we are left entirely to conjecture.

Philo (in Flacc. 6, ed. Mangey, 2523) estimates the number of Jews living in Egypt alone in the first century at a million. If to this we add the number of Jews in Caligula's time, we shall not be far wrong in putting the figure at three or four millions. The violent breaking-up of the Jewish population in Palestine in consequence of the war of 66-70 A.D. (Jos. BJ vi. 82, 93) raised this number still further, thus the expression of Dio Cassius (69.3) in speaking of the Jewish insurrection under Hadrian—that all the Jews were stirred up—is intelligible.

11. The legal standing of the communities of the Diaspora at first varied in the various lands. The chief factor in the Assyrio-Babylonian empire was the crown possessions, under royal protection (Ezra 4.14). The lands they till were granted from the king, on which they were free to settle in accordance with their own laws and customs (cp. Gen. 1.24 ff.). If the colonies flourished they gradually established their independence; if otherwise, they ultimately lapsed into a state of vassalage (cp. Gen. 47.13 ff.). In this respect it is not supposed that any considerable change came under Persian or Greek supremacy as long as the colonies continued to be members of the colony. In Egypt the same course was followed by the rulers or pharaohs (Gen. 47.13 ff. shows: to shepherds a pastoral region was assigned, and the pharaoh was their master (cp. Gen. 47.11). It must be borne in mind, however, that in the case of Israelites came into Egypt not only as prisoners but also as refugees.

15. Legal standing. Brighter prospects opened up before Israelites in foreign parts as Alexander and his successors founded new cities in the east. In Alexandria they received important privileges; they came into a fellowship of protection with the Macedonians—the 'phyle'—and were probably considered the foremost of all and therefore named after Dionysus (see above, § 7).

The Jews made of this privilege is shown by Josephus (Ant. xvi. 22-5, 61-8), who cultivated with Rome assiduously, and greatly promoted the settlements there. Thus in the course of the first century the Jews had already begun to establish themselves on the left bank of the Tiber, the Porta Capena (Juv. Sat. 3.12-16), and at what later date on the Campus Martius and even Subura. who asserts that they had equal rights (ισοπολιτεία, ισοπολιτεία) with the Macedonians and even the right to bear this honorable name (c. Ap. 24; BJ ii. 187). As Alexandria never attained the characteristic constitution of a Greek city with a βουλή, but continued to be governed directly by royal officials, it is probable that the special administration and special jurisdiction in civil matters which the Jews enjoyed within the bounds of their own quarter of the city were of ancient standing. At a later period, as the Ptolemies came to take more account of the Egyptian population, it is possible that many of the Jewish privileges may have been curtailed (cp Mahaffy, The Empire of the Ptolemies, 70, 359 ff., 381 ff.; Lumbroso, L'Egitto dei Greci e dei Romani, 1895, 140 ff.). In Strabo's time, however, they still had an administration of their own under the special jurisdiction of an ethnarch (Jos. Ant. xiv. 7.2). In any case, they again received full rights of citizenship in Alexandria from Caesar (Jos. Ant. xiv. 10.1; c. Ap. 24). In Cyrenaica also they enjoyed special privileges (Jos. Ant. xiv. 7.2). The Onias colony doubtless enjoyed the special protection of the sovereign (see above, § 8).

In the Greek cities properly so called the Jews were not so favourably situated. In these a group of foreigners could keep up the observance of its ancestral customs, especially its religious customs, only as a private society or club (θλαστός, ἐπάρος; cp E. Ziebarth, Das griechische Vereinswesen, 1896). The Jews in this respect followed the lead of the Phoenicians in Athens and Beios. We do not possess definite evidence of the fact, though it is interesting to note that in the Roman decree preserved in Jos. Ant. xiv. 10.8 the Jewish communities without prejudice to their privileges are placed upon a level with θασοί. In particular cities, such as Ephesus and Sardis, they no doubt sooner or later acquired the rights of citizenship (Jos. c. Ap. 24; Ant. xiv. 10.24); but whether they already had it under the Seleucides, as Josephus asserts, or whether they first received it from the Romans, is not quite clear (see above, § 11). It frequently happened that their citizenship became in turn a source of embarrassment. In the Greek cities, by ancient custom, community of place was held to imply community of worship; in many places the fact of citizenship found its expression in some special cult, such as that of Dionysus. Hence a demand that the Jews should worship the local god—a demand which they were compelled by their creed to resist (Jos. c. Ap. 26). Even in Caesarea Palestina their ισοπολιτεία did not secure them full protection (Jos. Ant. xv. 879 BJ ii. 137 14.4-5 18.1).

It was not till the time of Julius Caesar and Augustus that the Jews of the Diaspora received a general recognition of their legal standing throughout the Roman Empire. Josephus (Ant. xiv. 85 10 12.3-6 xvi. 62-7) quotes a series of enactments from 47 B.C. to 10 B.C. by which the Jews had secured to them the enjoyment of religious freedom, exemption from military service, special rights in the administration of property, and special jurisdiction (in civil matters). Nicolaus Damascenus, in his apology for the Jews before M. Vipsanius Agrippa in Lesbos, in 14 B.C., says: 'The happiness which all mankind do now enjoy by your means we estimate by this very thing, that on all hands we are allowed each one of us to live according to his conviction and to practise his religion' (Jos. Ant. xvi. 2.4). In Roman law the Jewish communities came under the category of collegia licita (Tertullian, religio licita). After 70 A.D. this held only for the Jewish religion, not for the Jewish nation. From cases covered by these general regulations we must distinguish those in which individual Jews had obtained for themselves the Roman citizenship (Acts 22.25-29; Jos. Ant. xiv. 10.16 17 f.). See GOVERNMENT, § 30 f.

III. The great difficulty of Jewish social life in the Diaspora lay in the fact that community of place and community of worship no longer coincided. The case had been quite otherwise in Palestine, and the Jewish laws in their original framing had contemplated Palestinian conditions alone. Communities of some sort, however, had to be formed abroad if Judaism was to maintain itself there at all. Thus the attempt to secure local separateness was abandoned. Attention was concentrated on the effort to maintain the bond of union by means of a separate, if restricted, jurisdiction, and administration of property; the sacrificial worship was given up; and the means for a new spiritual worship were sought in regularly recurring meetings for prayer, reading of the scriptures, and preaching (see SYNAGOGUE).

For the central sacrificial worship there remained the high honour of being the expression of the connection still subsisting between Jerusalem and the outside communities; every Jew of twenty years old or more had yearly to pay a half-shekel or didrachma to the temple for the maintenance of the sacrificial system still carried on there. This tax was collected yearly in the various districts, and transmitted to Jerusalem by the hands of persons of repute (Philo, de Mon. 23) under carefully framed regulations (Jos. Ant. xviii. 91). Further, the pilgrimages to the three principal feasts, particularly that of Tabernacles, annually brought vast crowds of Jews of the Diaspora to the religious capital. Josephus (BJ vi. 9.3) gives the number of persons—natives and strangers together—present at the Passover, according to a census taken in the time of Cestius Gallus (63-66 A.D.), as having been 2,700,000. After the sacrificial system had been brought to an end in 70 A.D., it was by the bonds of religious fellowship which had been developed in the Diaspora that the continued existence of Judaism was rendered possible.

The individual community was called ἐκκλησία (lit. 'congregation'; συναγωγή). In towns with a large Jewish population (Alexandria, Antioch, Rome)

17. Synagogues. there were many synagogues. The heads of the communities are usually spoken of as ἄρχοντες.

In Alexandria an ἐθνάρχης was at the head of the entire Jewish community (Jos. Ant. xiv. 7.2); it may be added that he had nothing to do with the office of the ἡγούμενος or Archibarch (cp ALEXANDRIA, § 2). Under Augustus the direction of affairs was handed over to a γερουσία with ἄρχοντες at its head. In Rome each of the many synagogues had its own γερουσία with ἄρχοντες and a γερουσιάρχης over all. The building in which the meetings were held—on sabbaths and feast days especially—was called ἡ ἐκκλησία, in Gr. συναγωγή or προσέτιχῃ, less frequently συναγωγίον, προσέτιχτιριον, σαββαταίον. See, further, SYNAGOGUE.

The contact brought about by the Diaspora communities between Judaism and the Greco-Roman culture

18. Contact with Hellenic world. was of great consequence to the history of civilisation. Here again it is the Western Diaspora that principally claims our attention; the Eastern, in Mesopotamia and Babylonia, had little share in this movement, and indeed hardly comes under observation at all.

It was not until comparatively late in the day, it would seem, that the Greeks began to take any but the most superficial interest in Judaism and the Jews. Willrich (43-63) has collected all that Greek writers had to say about them down to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and remarks (170): 'In the period before Antiochus Epiphanes the Greek regarded the Jew with feelings of mingled curiosity and wonder, astonishment and instinctive antipathy.' In these circumstances it is not surprising that, down to the date in question, the intellectual importance of the Diaspora was slight. Traders, freedmen, and prisoners of war constituted the majority of the Diaspora of these days; that such people should excite the interest and attention of educated Greeks was not to be expected. An educated Jew acquainted with Greek is spoken of as a rarity by Clearchus of Soli (c. Ap. 122).

The question of the rapidity or tardiness of the change in this respect that ultimately came depends on whether we date the production of the Greek translation of the Pentateuch from the reign of Philadelphus (285-246 B.C.), or, as has recently been done by Willrich (ut sup. 154 ff.), from that of Philometor (181-145 B.C.). Whatever its date, this attempt to make the Law speak in Greek conclusively shows that when it was made the Jews of Alexandria had already assimilated so much of what was Greek that they could no longer get on with Hebrew alone, either in their synagogues or in their courts. Their sojourn abroad made it imperative on Jews everywhere to complete their rapprochement with Hellenism. In the process many may well have become lost to Judaism altogether. The Greek version of the Pentateuch, however, evinces the fixed determination of the majority not to allow themselves to be robbed of the old faith by the new culture. As the influence of the Jews, on trade and public life generally, advanced—in Egypt and Syria in the first instance—it became increasingly necessary for the Greeks to decide definitely what their own attitude towards them was to be. This led to struggle, but also to friendly dealings.

Antipathy to Judaism manifested itself both in coarse and in refined ways. The uneducated masses scoffed at the Jews for their outlandish customs, plundered them at all hands, and occasionally gave expression to their hatred in massacres. Civic authorities tried to infringe Jewish privileges or to hinder the transmission of the temple money to Jerusalem (see the decree in Jos. Ant. xiv. 10). Roman emperors even more than once sanctioned measures that pressed hardly on the Jews. Tiberius in 19 A.D. expelled them from Rome, and forced 4000 of them upon military service to Sardinia (Jos. Ant. xviii. 35; similarly Tac. Ann. 285 Suet. Tib. 36). They seem soon afterwards to have been restored to the enjoyment of their rights. Caligula gave free course to a bloody persecution of the Jews in Alexandria in 38 A.D. Petitions and embassies (Philo, Apion) to the emperor proved of no avail. It was not until Claudius had come to the throne that the old privileges were again restored to the victims of persecution (Philo, in Flacc. and Leg. ad Caium; Jos. Ant. xviii. 81 xix. 52). Later, Claudius intervened in Rome in a hostile sense (Acts 18 2 Suet. Claud. 25 Dio Cassius lx. 6). The Jews defended themselves as best they could, not so much by force as by money or writings, and by cultivating friendly relations with those in high places.

The controversy carried on with the pen is worthy of remark. Gentile writers made it a reproach that the Jews as a people had done nothing for civilisation and had produced no men

21. Literary controversy. of distinction (so Posidonius, Polybius, Strabo, Apion). These and similar charges the Jews answered in innumerable apologies—some of them (such as those of Nicolaus Damascenus and Philo) with a dignity and earnestness worthy of the cause, though others (such as that of Josephus in many cases) showed a disposition to confound the convenient with the true, and others did not hesitate to resort to misrepresentation and positive falsehood (Pseudo-Hecataeus, Eupolemus, Artapanus, Aristobolus, Aristaeus, etc.). The most incredible fables were gravely set forth.

Abraham was the founder of astronomy; Joseph the founder of geometry and the inventor of agriculture; Moses the author of the division of Egypt into nomes, and even of the Egyptian animal worship. Jews and Spartans exchanged salutations as descendants of Abraham (1 Macc. 12 20 ff.; cp. Ant. xiv. 10 22).

Such things could be written only by Jews who had become familiar with the activities and intellectual life of Hellenistic circles, by men for whom the Greco-Roman culture had become an indispensable element of everyday life. They were only unconsciously the respect which they themselves cherished for culture when they tried to trace the origin of their own forefathers. Such literary phenomena not be produced in Jerusalem, the home of Judaism, they prove that Judaism abroad, although still the garment of the Law, carried a very different under that old-fashioned vestment. It had no large range of activities which it shared with temporary humanity at large.

This struggle—its evidence of the process which the Judaism of the Diaspora had attained more educated circles of the Gentile world the Jews of the Diaspora had, in fact, a great attraction. Men felt themselves face to face with a power which developed new forces—unflinching self-sacrificing in the maintenance of religious customs which to the outsider meaningless—sabbath observance, circumcision, laws of purity. Through Judaism became acquainted with a conception of God strange in its severity, enlightened by its simplicity and attracted religious natures by its purity and sincerity. The popular polytheism of Greece and had been shattered by philosophy; in the Greco-religions, which at that time were advancing in the westward, the idea of a supreme God found supporters; Judaism in its monotheism presented an explicit conception for which so many were long inseparably connected with it was the thought of divine creation of the world, of the original one of the world and the human race, as well as that providential ordering of the world—thoughts promised to provide fixed formulae for the cosmological tendencies of the time, and were welcome on account. No one has set forth the contents of Judaism from this point of view more nobly than Philo, contemporary of Jesus in Alexandria. The content with which he handles these conceptions makes probable not only that he had literary predecessors in this style but also that an appeal to practical experience gave a powerful support to his teaching (cp. Strabo Jos. Ant. xiv. 7 2; also Jos. c. Ap. 122 236 39 41 52 κοσμική θρησκεία; also PROSELYTE, § 3). The Diaspora of the Mediterranean, and especially in Alexandria, thus not only led the way to the breaking narrow bonds of the Jewish Law, but also was the to make the heathen world acquainted with a spiritual conception of God and a spiritual worship presenting a positive religion, and thus paved the way for the coming of Christianity.

22. Friendly contact. not exhaust the history. There are many points of friendly contact between Judaism and the outer world.

DISTAFF. See FLAX.

DISTRICT 1. (דִּשְׁטְרִיק; περίχωρος; vici [once pagus 315]; Neh. 3:9 12:14-18† RV), the name given to certain administrative divisions of Judea in Nehemiah's time, each of which was under a 'ruler' or 'chief' (רִשָׁה). These 'districts' comprise Jerusalem and Keilah (each with two rulers), Beth-hacerem, Beth-zur, and Mizpah (EKA om. [L. pépos; for Vg. see above]). It is not impossible that the list was originally much fuller. From the character of the names of the 'rulers' Meyer (Entst. 106 ff.) has concluded that they were Calebites (see CALLEB, § 4).
The organization of the Calebites in the genealogies
1 Ch. 2:4 suggests further that the pelek was a tribal subdivision,² the head of which would correspond to the ἐθνάρχης (in Gr. inser. from the Hasm.) of the later Nabataean kingdom (cp 2 Cor. 11:32, and see EPISTARCH).

2. 'District' in Acts 16:12 RV also translates μετῆ, which here represents, apparently, the Latin regio.

DIVINATION. Men instinctively wish to know the future, and among all peoples there have been those who have, from certain omens, claimed to be able to predict it. Such knowledge could only come from supernatural beings.
When beasts or birds, by their movements, or otherwise, gave men intelligible signs, it was because they were 'indwelt' by beings that were supernatural, or because they were supernatural themselves. 'Omens are not blind tokens; the animals know what they tell to men' (WRS Rel. Sem. 443).

Neuromancy is a kind of divination, not a thing distinct in itself (see below, § 3). It is difficult, if not impossible, to indicate the boundary line between divination and prophecy. In both the same general principle obtains—intercourse of man with the spiritual world in order to obtain special knowledge. In divination, this knowledge is usually got by observing certain omens or signs; but this is by no means always the case, since sometimes the beings consulted possessed the soothsayer. Divination, as practised in this last method, does not differ from prophecy of the lowest kind—that of the ecstatic state—as distinguished from that higher species of prophecy which in Riehm's happy phrase is 'psychologically mediated.'³ See PROPHETCY.

The ancient Greeks, Romans, Arabs, etc., had modes of divining that apparently were unknown to the Hebrews of the OT—e.g., by observation of the flights and cries of birds, inspection of the entrails of animals, etc. (see Freytag, Einl. 159 ff.); but there are mentioned in the OT
many signs or omens that resemble or are identical with those in use among other nations.

1. Rhabdromancy (divination by rods) appears to be referred to in Hos. 4:12, 'My people ask counsel at their "wood," and their "staff" declares unto them' (cp Herod. 467). The higher prophets of course forbade this; but we may perhaps assume that it was uncon-demned in earlier times.

ii. Belomancy (divination by arrows), a development of rhabdromancy, is mentioned in Ezek. 21:21 ff. [19 ff.], where the Babylonian king is said to have stood 'at the parting of the way,' and to have 'shaken the arrows to and fro.' The doubtful point was whether he was to march from Babylon to Egypt by Jerusalem or by Rabbath-Ammon. As Pocock (quoted by Rosenmüller) long ago pointed out, belomancy was much in use among the Arabs (see also We. Hist. 2:132). For the Babylonian practice, see LEBRON, La Divination, chap. 2; as this able though sometimes uncritical writer truly points out, belomancy had but a secondary importance. Nebuchadnezzar had certainly consulted the stars and the regular omens in order to ascertain whether the right time had come for the campaign against Egypt. Arab tradition tells how Hurai al-Kais practised belomancy before setting out against Asad.

He did so 'by shuffling before the image of the god a set of arrows. These were here three in number, called respectively, "the Commanding," "the Forbidding," and "the Warning." He drew the second, and thereupon broke the arrows, and flung them in the face of the idol.' Mohammed forbade the use of arrows, as 'an abomination of Satan's work' (Koran, Sur. 592). The arrows were special, pointless arrows (originally rods).

iii. The Babylonian king, however, did more than shake the sacred arrows; the passage continues, 'he looked in the liver' (hepatomancy). (We omit the reference to the teraphim because no new point is indicated by it; the king consulted the teraphim [teraphim], by shaking the arrows before it, as was always done also by the heathen Arabs.) The liver, which was regarded as the chief seat of life (Prov. 7:24), was supposed to give warning of the future by its convulsive motions, when taken from the sacrificed victim (see LIVER). That an application for oracles was accompanied by sacrifices we know from the story of Laban. Lenormant (op.
cit. 58 f.) refers to two Babylonian fragments relative to the inspection of the entrails, giving some of the features which had to be watched for. The Greeks, too, practised hepatomancy.

iv. The objects used for lots in Arabia were, as we have seen, pointless arrows. Among the Israelites, however, the principal objects employed were probably stones of different colours, one of which gave the affirmative, the other the negative answer to the question put (so Wellh., Bibl. H. P. Smith, in connection with the classical passage, 1 S. 14:41). Other passages in the historical books in which the phrase לִּשְׁאֹל ('to inquire of') occurs show, I probably be explained on the analogy of this passage. Cp EPHOD, URM AND THUMMIM, TERAPHIM.

v. Passing over such omens as Gideon's in Judg. 6:36 and Jonathan's in 1 S. 11:3 ff., and reserving astrology for subsequent consideration (see STARS), we pause next at the most important of all the modes of divination that linked the Hebrews with other peoples—

(vi.) The method of dreams (oneiromancy). Jacob may have sufficient reason for making good his escape from Laban; but he will not take the decisive step without a direct revelation (Gen. 31:10-13). In other cases the divine communication is such as exceeds the power of human reason to discover; instances are the dreams of Abime-lech (Gen. 20:3 ff.), and especially those of Joseph (Gen.
37:5 cp 40:8 41:1 ff.). Other noteworthy instances of divinely sent dreams are Gen. 28:12 ff. 31:24 Judg. 7:13 1 K. 3:5 Mt. 1:25 2:12 ff. 27:19. Notice 1's fondness for relating dreams. The author of the speeches of Lilith also attaches great importance to dreams as a channel of divine communications (Job 33:14-16). It would almost seem as if the belief in the symbolic character of dreams should be reckoned among other revivals of primitive beliefs in the period of early Judaism (cp the dream-vision in Enoch chap. 8:53, 50, and the dreams in the Book of Daniel; also Jos. BJ ii. 74
iii. 8-11). Men were oppressed by constant anxiety as to the future, and there was no prophet in the great old style to assuage this. They looked about, therefore, for artificial means of satisfying their curiosity. Prophets like alah, however, never refer to their dreams, and it is a question how far the visions of which they speak are to be taken literally (see PROPHECY).

vii. On a possible divination by means of sacred garments, see DRESS, § 8.

We must now consider briefly the various terms applied to divination and diviners, and endeavour to define their application.

1. כֹּהֵן (kohen), a general term for divination of all kinds (cp the Ar. kahin, and see PRIESTS), on the derivation of which see MAGIC, § 3 (1). Thus RV renders

3. Terms. כֹּהֵן, 'divination' (once 'witchcraft', 1 S. 13.2; RV), כֹּהֵן, 'diviner' (1 S. 6.2 Zech. 10.3), also 'soothsayer' (Josh. 13.2; RV) and 'prophet' (Is. 32. AV); and כֹּהֵן gives the more general terms מַחְשֵׁב, מַחְשֵׁבִים, מַחְשֵׁבִים, מַחְשֵׁבִים. Ezek. 21.6, 11, however, shows plainly enough that the word had the distinct sense of obtaining an oracle by casting lots by means of arrows (see above, § 2 (2)). The one selected by chance was supposed to represent the divine decision; on the other hand, in 1 S. 28.8, Saul is made to ask the witch to divine for him by means of the 'ob' (28.8); see below, § 4 (ii.); and cp MAGIC.

2. כֹּהֵן (on'um). The etymology of this word is much disputed (cp Del., on 1 S. 28). Two interpretations deserve mention: (a) on'um is one who divines by observing the clouds (denom. from כֹּהֵן), a mode of divination well known among the ancients; or perhaps, one who brings clouds, or causes storms (apomancy). In the passages in which the word occurs, however, there is nothing to suggest that the on'um has anything to do with the 'v'. (b) One who smites with the 'evil eye' (denom. from כֹּהֵן), at apart from other considerations, the Term rendering כֹּהֵן appears to be decidedly against this view. In the absence of further evidence it is best to follow Ewald (Bibl. Theol. 1.234) and WRS (ibid. 1.234; cp also Dr.), who compare the Arabic ganna, 'to emit a hoarse, nasal sound.' The fact that so many of the words connected with magic and divination denote low-subdued mournful speaking, favours this last surmise, though there must ever remain much doubt about the exact origin and meaning. כֹּהֵן renders by a word which means primarily to take an omen from the flight of birds, examples of which practice may be found in Arabic (cp We. Hebr. 2.22 f.). The word is usually rendered by 'observers' (once Judg. 9.17 AVing 'regard-ers' of times' (AV), or 'singers' (RV) (Dt. 18.10-14 Lev. 19.26 2 K. 21.6), in 1 S. 26 Mt. 3.12 (11) RV 'soothsayers' (so also Jer. 27.9 RV, where AV 'enchanter'); once (Gen.) 'sorceress' (Is. 57.3). An oak near Shechem, famous in divination, bears the name 'Oak of MEROZIM' (Judg. 9.37). For other examples of sacred trees cp Isot. Arab. § 2, and see NAT. MAG. § 1.

3. כֹּהֵן (uif), 'to use enchantment' (2 K. 21.6=2 Ch. 33.6 Lev. 19.26; cp כֹּהֵן, 'enchantment' Nu. 23.23 24.1), or 'to divine' (Gen. 41.5 15 RV; and Gen. 30.27 RV, where AV 'to learn by experience'; cp 1 K. 20.3, 'diligently observe', RVing 'take as an omen'), is probably used to include any kind of divination (WRS). In Gen. 41.5 15 the same word is used for divination by a conj. i.e., probably by hydromancy, where a vessel is filled with water and the rings formed by the liquid are observed. Was כֹּהֵן originally used in a special sense, and connected with כֹּהֵן, 'a serpent'? So at least Bochart, Lenormant, and Baudouin (Etude sur sem. Rel. gesch. 1.267); see SERPENT, § 1, 3. MAGIC, § 3, 3.

4. כֹּהֵן (gizvun), is found only in Daniel (2.27 4.17 5.7 11, EV 'soothsayers'), and may be rendered 'prognosticators,' properly 'those who determine [what is doubtful]'; cp Rev. 1.6. The root means 'to cut'; but whether the 'cutting of the heavens' by Babylonian astrologers is meant, is uncertain (see STARS, § 5). Perhaps (cp Ar. jazara, 'to slaughter') the gizvun originally offered a sacrifice in connection with the art (cp Vg. haruspices). See § 2, iii.

5. כֹּהֵן (ashaph) and כֹּהֵן (shafan) occur in the Heb. (1.20 2.2) and the Aram. (2.10 4.7 [4], etc.) parts of Daniel respectively, and are rendered 'astrologer', RV 'enchanter.' The word is of Assyrian origin (STARS, § 5). It is difficult to say whether כֹּהֵן and the other terms found were meant to represent a separate class, or whether the writer employed these terms indiscriminately (lex. Dan. 63).

6. כֹּהֵן (chashdim) in Dan. 1.20 (5.7 11) means the caste of wise men. This usage (well known from classical writers) arose after the fall of the Babylonian empire, when the only Chaldeans known were astrologers and soothsayers.

1 Possibly the Teraphim were similarly employed; see TERAPHIM.

2 The so-called καλικομαγεία. Cp Joseph's divining-cup with the Euboean goblet of Jemshid, and see Lenormant, La Divination, 73-80. For a parallel French superstition, see B. Thiers, Traité des superstitions 2, Paris, 1697, 1.187 ff.

DIVINATION

7. For כֹּהֵן (Gad) and כֹּהֵן (Meni) in 1 S. 6.11, see AND DESTINY. See also other terms under MAGIC.

Necromancy, to which we turn next, is, as the etymology of the word implies, divination by resort to the spirits of the deceased.

Three terms or expressions fall to be noticed which are met with in Dt. 18.11.

i. We shall begin with that which occurs in the verse, viz. כֹּהֵן (one who consults with a dead), rendered by EV 'necromancer' clear from 1 S. 8.10 that this is a general term embracing the kinds of necromancy indicated by the two words next to be considered and other kinds (Dt. on Dt. 18.11); the conjunction with which it is introduced is simply the explanatory 'etiam,' to the Gk. epexegetic καὶ.

ii. כֹּהֵן (ob'el), one who consults an 'ob' word 'ob' is generally found with ob'el'oni (see below), like which, from meaning the spirit of a departed person, it came to stand for the person who possessed the spirit and divined by its aid. The full phrase כֹּהֵן (the possessor of an 'ob') is found in 1 S. 28.11 it is applied to the 'witch of Endor.'

כֹּהֵן explains the expression by ἐγγαστριμύθοι, 'quint' (i.e., in the OF passages, one who 'by his voice into the ground, where the spirit was supposed to be, made psychopompe that a ghost spoke him'), and Lenormant (Div. 101 ff.), Renan (ET, 1.47), and others so explain the phenomenon the writer of Samuel, and other biblical writers speak of this species of divination, evidently not as being really what it claimed to be. Lev. 20.27 only possible exception.

The etymology of the word is very uncertain. Suggestions may be passed by, for the field seems to be very large, H. P. Smith's view (Sam. 239), not very probable. (a) ob'el has been connected with ob'el, and explained 'a soul which returns (from the dead)'. So Hitz and Kö. (on 1 S. 8.10), 1.504, and Schwally (Das Leben nach dem Tode, 69). It also suggests a connection with כֹּהֵן 'father' (note phn. in ob'el). Van Hoonacker (ET, 7.157 ff.) objects that in 1 S. 11 the ob'el is distinguished from the dead (necromancy), the latter clause of the verse is simply a generalisation of the two foregoing clauses, this objection fails.

(b) The other view (Gies., Del., Di.) connects the word with ob'el, literally 'something hollow.' A similar Arabic (wa'at) means 'a hole in a rock,' a large and deep hollow.

On the assumption that the fundamental idea of ob'el is hollowness, many explanations have been suggested. Van Hoonacker, as above. Of these, two may be probably approximating most nearly to the truth. 1. Böcher (De inferis, 101), Kan. (Richm., HT 182), 'beschwärer'), and Di. (on Lev. 19.31) hold that the spirit ob'el, on account of the hollow tone of the voice—such a voice might be expected to issue from any empty phn. Other for practising magic and divination lend some support to this view.

2. The idea of hollowness has been held to apply in place to the cave or opening in the ground out of which the spirit speaks. Among the Greeks and the Romans, oracles on necromancy were situated among large deep caves which were supposed to communicate with the spirit. If the Hebrew ob'el is parallel to the Greek chthonic deity to the Arabian ahd al-ard or 'earth-folk,' with whom have intercourse, it is conceivable that, by a metonymy, the hollow cave, and vice versa—the hollow cave have come to be used for the spirit that spoke out of it (WRS Rel. Sem. 2.193).

iii. כֹּהֵן (videl'uni). The English word 'witness' by which this Hebrew term is rendered, means 'to rise one,' and agrees with כֹּהֵן (videl'uni) in Dt. 18.11 (τῆς ἀνάστασης), Arabic videl'uni, and Ewald's rendering 'videl-wisserisch.'

Like ob'el, videl'uni is used, in the first instance, for the spirit of a deceased person; then it came to mean

1 Namely, that the ob'el was originally a skull prepared for superstitious rites for magical purposes; H. A. Redpath the other hand, suggests that the ob'el was one who spoke a hollow mark or domino.

2 In Job 32.19 כֹּהֵן seems to mean 'bellows' (כֹּהֵן φουσητήρ [τῆς κῆ] χαλκῆος).

Is. 63:11, see FORTUNE under MAGIC.

or her that divines by such a spirit. Robertson Smith (J. Phil. 14:17), followed by Driver (on Dt. 18:11), distinguishes the two terms thus:—

'Yidd'oni is a familiar spirit, one known to him that consults it. The 'ob is any ghost that is called up from the grave to answer questions put to it (cp 1 S. 28). The yidd'oni speaks through a personal medium; that is, through the person whom it possesses. The 'ob speaks directly, as for example out of the grave (cp 1 S. 28). Rashi (on Dt. 18:11) says that yidd'oni differs from אֵשׁ בְּרִי' (אֵשׁ בְּרִי' 'ob) in that he held in his mouth a bone which uttered the oracle. It is hard to establish these distinctions, the data for forming a judgment being so slight.

Is it quite certain, however, that the words are to be held as standing for distinct things? Why may we not have in them different aspects of the same spirit? So regarded, 'ob would convey the notion that the spirit has returned from the other world, while yidd'oni would suggest that the spirit so returned is knowing, and therefore able to answer the questions of the inquirer. The fact that in all the eleven instances of its occurrence yidd'oni is invariably preceded by 'ob is in favour of its being a mere interpretation of it. 'Ob, on the other hand, is often found by itself (1 S. 28:7 1 Ch. 10:13 etc.). It is probable, therefore, that these two characters are at bottom one, the 'and' in Dt. 18:11 joining 'ob and yidd'oni in the way of a kenosis: 'he who seeks a departed spirit that is knowing, just as the remaining part of the verse is, as we have seen already (§ 3, i.), simply a repetition in different words of the same thought. This is in complete harmony with the usages of Hebrew parallelism. The whole compound expression might be rendered as follows:—He who inquires of the departed spirit that is knowing, even he who seeks unto the dead.'

iv. To the expressions considered already may be added אֵשׁ בְּרִי', ifim, Is. 19:3, EV 'charmers.' RV 'whisperers'; cp Ar. afāf, 'to emit a moaning or creaking sound'; or perhaps rather Ass. afā, 'darkness.' Apparently renders by ῥά ἀγάνυατα ἀνῶν.

Though condemned in the OT (1 S. 28:7; Is. 8:19; cp Lev. 19:31 20:27 Dt. 18:11), necromancy among the Israelites held its own till a late period. The leaders of religions thought were opposed to both witchcraft and necromancy; but the influence of habit and of intercourse with people around was too strong to be wholly overcome. See Schultz, OT Theology, 2:322 (ET). Wiener (KHB 5:7; 'Totenbeschwörer'; see references) shows that in the ancient world divination by calling back the spirits of the dead was very widespread among the Greeks, the Romans, and the other ancient nations. Cp BABYLONIA, § 37 f. See MARRIAGE, § 6.

DIZAHAB (דִּזְחָב; καταρχυρεα BAFI), ubi auri est plurimum—i.e., 'Dizahab' (Vg.), in the topographical description Dt. 1:1. 'If it be the name of a place in the "steppes of Moab" the situation is unknown' (Dr. in Hastings' DB, s.v.); on the identifications, cp Dillmann. The explanation 'place of gold' is difficult to justify (see Dr. Deut., ad loc.). The name corresponds to 'Me-zahab' in Gen. 36:39 (as Sayce, Arab. Oct. 22, 1892, and Marq. Fund. 10, have observed), and like Me-zahab [γ. v.] is no doubt a corruption of מִצְרַיִם (came from מִצְרַיִם—i.e., the N. Arabian land of Musri or Musri, which adjoined Edom (see MIZRAIM, § 26, and cp Che. Or. L., May 15, 1899). It was perhaps premature to identify 'Dizahab,' before the correctness of the reading had been investigated. T. K. C.

The name, doubtless, still survives in the mod. Tin ed-Duk, 2½ m. N. of Jericho, where there are traces of ancient substructions and remains of a fine aqueduct (Rob. BR 2:4; PEF Mem. 3:171; Baed. 1:152; v. Kasteren, Kort. Bibl. 1897, p. 93 ff.).

DOD, NAMES WITH. This group of compound names comprises with certainty only Dodayah and Dodiel (see DANIEL, 11, and virtually David, Doda, Doda. To these Gray (Heb. 60-63) would add דָּדָה (Eldad), דָּדָה (Beldad). In all these names he interprets דָּד as meaning 'uncle on the father's side,' which is no doubt a perfectly legitimate sense of דָּד or דָּדָה (see 2 K. 21:17). (a) First, as to Eldad and Beldad. The objection to admitting that these names are compounded with the divine name Dad is obviously provisional. The god Rammān was so well known in Canaan that we may expect to find at any rate isolated names compounded with Dad, which was one of the names of this deity (W. AT Untersuch. 19, n. 1). In the Amarna letters, it is true, the form we find in compound proper names is Addu; but the equivalence of Addu and Dad is admitted. (b) Next, as to the other names. That Dad is not the name of some one special deity, is admitted; but whether it is, or is not, a term designating some degree of kinship, is disputed. It is undeniable that דָּד (=Ass. dada) means 'beloved,' and also, by a natural transition, 'divine patron' (cp דָּדָה, used of God, Job 16:21). The present writer contends that it is more natural to give this second sense to Dad in the few Hebrew names compounded with it than to adopt the theory (Gray, Heb. 60) that דָּד as well as דָּדָה in proper names has the sense of 'uncle' or 'kinsman.'

This is not affected by the discovery that there are some S. Arabian names compounded with Admā, and some others with Kāhā, both meaning 'uncle.' Nor need we enter into the question whether the S. Arabian name Dāhī-karāh (so Hommel gives the name) really means 'My cousin hath blessed' (Hommel, ATF 85). See DOD, DODAYAH. T. K. C.

DODAI (דָּדַי, דָּדָי, § 52; but Ginsb. in 2 S. 23:9 points Kt. דָּדַי), another form of Dodo [γ. v.], presumably shortened from a form דָּדוּיָה; see under DODAYAH: 'Yahwē is patron' (Marquart, Fund. 16), 2 S. 23:9 (RV following Kt.; but AV Dodo; εὐχετο [B*], εὐχο. A son of JAVAN [γ. v.], son of Japheth, Gen. 10:4 = 1 Ch. 1:7. The same name—i.e., either Dōdan (דָּדָנִים) or Rōdān (רֹדָנִים)—should possibly be restored for 'Deilan' (דָּלָן) in Ezek. 27:15 (ποδίων [BQ]; adnot. ποδίων ορασις κρισεως [Qm.], απαδίων [A]; so Pesh., but Aq. Sym. Theod. δωδαν). The merchants there referred to brought to Tyre the ivory and ebony which they had themselves procured from Africa or India. Two views are held.

(a) Stade, Cornill, Bertholet are strongly for 'Rōdān,' and naturally hold a similar opinion as to the reading in Gen. 10:4. It is, however, by no means certain that MT is not right in reading דָּדָנִים, 'sons of Dedan,' in Ezek. i.e.; Edom (so all [except Aq.] read for 'Aram') follows in 1:16. As to Gen. 10:4, the most prevalent opinion certainly is that Rōdānim is the better reading, and that this term designates not only the Rhodians properly so-called (on whom cp. Hom. Il. 2:634 ff.), but also ('many islands' being also mentioned) the people of other Aegean islands. (So Di., Hal., Kau., Holzinger, Ball, G. Sm. IG 135.) This view is geographically plausible, but the short o in Pōdōs must not be overlooked.

(b) Another view, so far as the name goes, is more satisfactory. The Rodanim of the text of Chronicles (if we follow most MSS and 6) may be as inaccurate as the 'Diphath' which it gives for 'Riphat' (1 Ch. 16), and Rodanim itself may be incorrectly given for Dardanim (Tg. Jon., Luzzatto, Ges., Knob., Friesz Del.). The name Dardani, as inscriptions of Rameses II. show, comes down from early times; it designates properly a people of Asia Minor, not far from the Lycians (see WMM, Is. n. Eur. 354 f.). It is not impossible that for דודנים (Ch. reads 5) the original source of P's information read דודנים (cp. Targumim), and it would be natural for writers and scholars of the Greek period (6 and perhaps Ch.) to convert Dardanim into Rodanim, and to understand the Rhodians. It has been proposed elsewhere to identify another son of Javan (Tarshish, or rather Thrus) with another people mentioned in the Egyptian inscriptions (see TIRAS). The author of the list used by P may have known Dardani as well as Thrus. If דוד is the correct reading in Ezek. we should perhaps pronounce it Rodani, not Rodim. Recent critics may, however, have been too hasty in rejecting MT's reading Dedan. The 'islands' are not necessarily those in which the merchants spoken of resided; they may very well be the coast-lands with which Dedan had commercial dealings. Cp. DEDAN, and, on Ezek. 27:15, see EROSY.

DODAVAH, as AV, or rather DODAVAH as RV (דודָוָה), perhaps for דודָוָה, 'Yahwē is friend or patron,' § 47—whence come the abbreviated forms Dodo, DODAI [דודאי]—דודאי [BA], ΔΟΥΔΑΙΟΥ [L]; Dodoi; Pesh. implies the reading 'Dodo', the father of a prophet called Eliezer (2 Ch. 20:37).

The Dodoth (דודות) of Ahiroth is mentioned in the Mesha inscription l. 12. May we also compare Duda, the name of a high Egyptian official in the Amarna tablets (Am. Tab. 44:45 52:15, cp. W. AF 104)?

An Edomite (for the reading דֹּעַ, 'Syrian,' presupposed [except in Ps. 52:2] by 6BA [but not L.] and Jos., is certainly wrong) who filled some minor post among the servants of Saul; most probably he was 'keeper of the saddle asses' (cp. He had been detained (so one tradition tells us) 'before Yahwē'—i.e., in the sacred precincts at Nob (or Gibeon; see Nob)—by some obscure religious prescription (see RS² 456), and had cunningly watched David in his intercourse with the priest Ahimelech (see DAVID, § 3). The two passages in which Doeg's office is longer in their original form in MT. In 21:8 [A] 'the mightiest of the shepherds' (דֹּעַ, Adv. [L]), a title of a shepherd, and still stranger when 22:9 occurs nowhere else in Hebrew narratives. 'the mightiest of the runners' (דֹּעַ, Adv. [L]), an easier but still not a natural phrase, and rendering of 6BAL in 21:7 [3], Adv. [L] can be little doubt that Lagarde (Method. 3) reading דֹּעַ, which he renders 'driver' a less natural rendering than that given above, but words like דֹּעַ and דֹּעַ are flexible. For Lagarde (Adv. [L]); for the latter, see Adv. [L]. We should also read דֹּעַ for דֹּעַ in 22:9 (see section to following 6 here (Adv. [L]) falls as soon as it is recognised that 21:7 [3] is a correction).

dogs of any noble type are in the Bible. The Israelitish kings were the Assyrian, great hunters, and even the legend of Nimrod the hunter (but is 'hunter' literally? see NIMROD) in Gen. 10:9 says no dogs. According to RV the greyhound is in Prov. 30:11 as one of the four things 'stately in going'; but this is doubtful (see C. TOWN). The shepherd's dog is mentioned and dogs which guard the house may be in Is. 56:10; but neither passage vouchsafes friendly words. The OT references are entirely to the pariah dog, such as may be seen of the 'Bible lands' to-day. They seem to be careering in packs round the city at night (14 f.); it was dangerous to stop one of them (26:17). Doubtless, however, they were scavengers. They were ready to devour even bodies (1 K. 14:11 16:4 21:23 f. 2 K. 9:10 30 and Jer. 15:3 cp. 1 K. 21:19 22:38 Ps. 68:24 [24], and flesh that men might not eat was thrown (contrast Mt. 7:6). From Mk. 7:28 (Mt. 15:15) have inferred a sympathy between men and dog of Christ; but this is hazardous. Pariah such sympathy (Phil. 3:2), and a certain Rabbi from keeping fierce dogs in the house, a because they would frighten away the poor (63:7). Most dogs, then, were fierce. Those that frequent the towns act as scavengers on offal; but in the country they are trained shepherds and farmers to act as sheep-dogs (cp. f.). 3. Exegetical details. The mention of 'dogs' in company with 'hounds' in Ps. 22 as typical of the fierce enemies of pious Israel, is surprising. There is no OT parallel for the use of the pariah dogs of Eastern cities as symbolic of the enemies of Israel. In later times the Gentiles were called 'dogs' (Yerush.
77 a; Raba Kama, 49 a, etc.), but the Talmudic use has no biblical authority; Mk. 7:27 surely does not express what may be called hounds doctrine. Moreover in Ps. 22:1 only lions and wild oxen are referred to. Apt., Theod., and Jer. evidently read קָנִים
'hunters'; this is a clever attempt to get over a real difficulty. In v. 17 (L.V. 16) we should certainly read קָנִים וְרִמָּה, and רִמָּה. The sense then becomes,
Greedy lions in their strength surround me,
A troop of wild oxen encircles me.

Similarly in v. 21 (L.V. 20) we should read קָנִים וְרִמָּה, and render (reading קָנִים for קָנִים),
Smash my soul from the young lion,
My life from the clutch of the greedy lion.

We now pass on to a group of five passages which have been much misunderstood.

1. 2 K. 8:13 'What is thy servant, the dog (שָׁלֵה) has the dead dog (שָׁלֵה) do this great thing?' RV, paraphrasing, 'which is but a dog.' AV incorrectly, 'Is thy servant a dog?'

2. 2 S. 10:9 'Why should this dead dog (שָׁלֵה) curse me?'

3. 2 S. 9:4 'What is thy servant? that thou shouldst look upon a dead dog like me?'

4. 1 S. 24:15 'After whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog?'

5. 2 S. 38: 'Am I a dog's head that belongeth to Judah?'

As to (1) AV is quite wrong. Hazael does not revolt in horror from the description of Elisha, but only affects to think too great an achievement for him. 'Dog' is here an expression of servile humility towards Elisha, as in Assyrian ('we are the king's dogs, i.e. his humble servants'). In (2) 'dead dog' (שָׁלֵה) is cannot be right, as שָׁלֵה indicates by the substituted epithet (see above). The text must be incorrect. We want some word which will be equally suitable in (3) (4) and (5); and if possible some word which will make better sense than 'dead' (שָׁלֵה) even in (2) and (4), where it has hitherto been plausibly taken as an Oriental exaggeration. The word which we seek is קָנִים
'unclean'; 'dead dog' should be 'unclean, despised, pariah dog.' To explain this see Donahy's striking description of the treatment of their hounds by the Bedouin, who 'with blows cast out these profane creatures from the best.'² As to (5) the text is evidently not quite correct (see Klv.); there seems to be a play on the name of Caleb the dog-tribe (see 205, n. 1; NABAL). To read 'Am I a dog's head' (omitting the next words), with Prof. H. P. Smith, can hardly be called satisfactory.

This idiom may cast light upon Dt. 23:18 where 'dog' appears to be applied to the class of persons elsewhere called kēdīm. It was natural to explain the word as a term of contempt (see IDOLATRY, § 6). If, however, 'unclean dog' or some similar phrase was a common circumlocution indicative of humble deference used in addressing superiors, as kalbu is in Assyrian (especially in the Amarna letters), keleb need not, as applied to these temple servants, have been a term of contempt;
it may have been their ordinary name (so RS² 202). The word appears in fact in Phoenician, applied to a class of servants (כְּלָבִים) attached to a temple of Ashtoreth in Cyprus (CIS 1 no. 86
B, l. 10).

There are not wanting indications that the dog was held in religious veneration. A river running into the

4. The dog in religion. sea a few miles N. of Beirut is called the Dog river (Nahr-el-Kalb, Lycus flumen), and al-Nadim informs us that the dog was sacred among the Harranians. 'They offered sacrificial gifts to it, and in certain mysteries dogs were solemnly declared to be the brothers of the mystic.'³
This seems to be connected with primitive Babylonian mythology; 'my lord with the dogs' (a divine title at Hittite poets to Marduk and his four dogs. It is possible that the dog may have been among the animals worshipped by the earliest Semites as a deity (see, e.g., among some N. American Indians and in Java).

Robertson Smith refers to Ishtar (1870), who states that Urinus forbade the Carthaginians to sacrifice human victims and to eat the flesh of dogs in a religious meal, it is implied. There seems also to be an allusion to something of this kind in post-exilic Palestine to a custom, chiefly prevalent perhaps among the mixed Samarian population, of sacrificing the dog on certain occasions (Is. 66:3).

way between the promontory of Carmel and Caesarea, at a distance of about eight miles from the latter.

The fuller form of the name is explained by Sym. as the παρὰ τὴν of Dor, or as Δωρ ἢ παρὰ τὴν (cp 115² 250 v, dor nath, δωρ τοῦ παρὰ, 112¹ 283 i, netedhor, rap nath) it probably includes the undulating plain of Sharon (king's land). The exact meaning of Δωρ (RV height, AV 'region, coast, border, country') as well as that of 'Dor' is very uncertain. Outside the OT the shorter form of the name is usual. It is frequently mentioned by Greek writers and appears as Δωρ, Δωρα (Δωρα in 1 Macc 15:11 13:23 AV, Dora), also Δωρα (Polyb.), Dorion (Pliny), and Dora (Tab. Pent.). In Ass. Dura (by the side of Megiddo) occurs only once, in a geographical list (2 R. 5:3, no. 4, l. 57). The meaning of the name is obscure (see EN-DOR, and for HAMMATH-DOR see HAMMATH).

Dor is first mentioned in the Psp. Golenischeff (temp. 11th cent., circa 1050 B.C.), where Dura belongs to the Takara, a race which entered Palestine along with the Philistini, and occupied the sea-coast (cp WMM, Is. u. Eur. 388, and see CAPITOL, §§ 2, 4; PUTHESSES).² Then prince bears the name Ki-dara, which appears to represent a theophorous name (Ki-d, 'servant of El' or Ki-d).

That Dor continued to remain in the hands of a non-Israelite people seems highly probable. Later writers, with Deuteronomian sympathies, supposed that Dor joined the northern coalition against Joshua (Josh. 11:2), and they include its king among those who fell (ib. 12:23). In the same spirit Dor is assigned to Manasseh (Josh. 17:11; cp 1 Ch. 7:29).³ A more historical view is presented in Judg. 1:27, where Beth-shean, Bechem, Megiddo, and Dor (in MT the order is disturbed) form a belt of Canaanite towns stretching from E. to W., which must have separated Ephraim from the more northerly tribes. In the time of Solomon, it is true, the 'heights of Dor' was under one of his commissaries; but it is hardly probable that the town of Dor was itself included (1 K. 4:11; see EN-ABIN ADAM).

For the next few centuries Dor drops out of Jewish history. It was well known, however, to the Greeks, the earliest authority in which the name occurs being Hecataeus of Miletus (circa 500 B.C.). It is not improbable that it ought to be identified with the Δωρ which, in the fifth century, was tributary to the Athenians (Steph. Byz. s.v. Δωρ), and this agrees with the view that the Takara (the earliest known occupants of Dor) were from Asia Minor, and, therefore, might have been in close touch with Greece. At the beginning of the fourth century Esmunazar relates that Dor (Δωρ) and Joppa (Γόππα), rich corn-lands (ἀμπελῶν) in the held of Sharon (ἐν τῇ Σαρὼν), were handed over to Sidon by the king of Persia (Artaxerxes Mnemon?), probably (as Schlottmann conjectured) in return for their help in the battles of Cnidus (394) and Cymus (386).⁴ Hence perhaps arose the belief of later Greek geographers that Dor was originally a Phoenician colony. It successfully resisted two sieges, one by Antiochus the Great (ANTI-CHUS, 1) during his war with Ptolemy Philopator in 219 B.C. (Polyb. 5:66), and the second by Antiochus Sidetes (ANTI-CHUS, 5) in 130-8 B.C., when the siege was raised in consequence of the flight of Trypho (1 Macc. 15:11 ff.). It was afterwards held along with Strato's tower (CAESAREA, § 1) by a tyrant named Zoilus, on whose subjugation by Ptolemy Lathyrus it became part of the Hasmonaean dominions (Jos. Ant.

the great caravan road from Damascus and Gilead to Egypt, which is still in use, as it was when the story of Joseph and the company of Ishmaelite traders passing Dothan with spices from Gilead for Egypt was written (GAStm. II 151 f. 358). Van de Velde found the remains of a Jewish road crossing from Hadraclon to Sharon. At the S. foot of the Tell is a fountain called El-Hafreh; there is a second fountain and two large cisterns (cp the cistern into which Joseph's brethren are said to have lowered him). There is very fine pasturage on the surrounding plain, which the present writer found covered with flocks, some of them belonging to a camp of nomad Arabs. From its site on so ancient a road through the country, and near the mouth of the main pass from the N. into the hills of Samaria, the Tell must always have been a military position of importance; note the description in 2 K. 183 ff., and the frequent mention of it in the Book of Judith (advance of Holofernes). Cp P.F.F.Mem. 246, 245; Thomson, L.B., ed. 1877, p. 466 f.; Buhl, Pal. 24 f., 102, 107.

DOVE. The word dove is somewhat loosely applied to certain members of the suborder Columba or pigeons; and, as no sharp distinction can be drawn, it is proposed to treat the doves and pigeons together in this article.

Three Heb. words come under consideration: (1) דֹּבָה, dobah, probably derived from its mournful note (שִׁירָה shirah [18]), (2) תִּירָה, tirah, for (probably) monotonous, cp Lat. turtur; טַרְטוּר tarthur [18], i.e. 'turtle-dove'; and (3) צִיפור, tsifur, EV 'young pigeon' (Gen. 159, טַרְטוּר tarthur [AD.], properly any young bird; cp Dt. 32 11 (with reference to the צִיפור)).

Apart from its occurrence in P and Gen. 159 (see below), דֹּבָה is found only in Cant. 2 12 (where allusion is made to its 'voice'), in Jer. 87 (a migratory bird; cp § 4 [v.] below; EV in both 'turtle'), and in Ps. 74 19 (not 18). In the latter-quoted passage דֹּבָה, as the harmless, timid dove (cp Hos. 7 11 or Mt. 10 16), is usually thought to be symbolical of Israel. The text reading, however, is doubtful.¹ Elsewhere it is to the צִיפור ('dove') that Israel is compared (see Jos. vii. ii. § 3). This is the most common term, which appears notably in the Deluge-story, Gen. 8 1-12 (Deluge, § 17). Allusion is made in Ps. 55 6 [7] to its plumage, in Ps. 38 14 59 11 to its mournful note.² Its gentle nature makes the dove a favourite simile or term of endearment in love poems (Cant. 1 15 4 5 5 12 13 9). That doves were domesticated among the Hebrews may be inferred from Ps. 60 3 (see Fowls, § 5), and it is of interest to recall that carrier-pigeons were well known in Egypt, and that at the coronation ceremony four virelets fly to carry the tidings of the newly-made king to the four corners of the earth (Wilk. Anc. Eg. 332-3).

Are there reasons for supposing that among the Hebrews the dove ever enjoyed a reputation for sanctity? Conclusive evidence in support of this view is absent; but it is remarkable that the dove, although a 'clean' bird, is never mentioned in the O.T. as an article of diet. It was a favourite food of the Egyptians, and is commonly eaten in Palestine at the present day. Moreover, we have to note that the דֹּבָה and צִיפור are mentioned in an old covenant ceremony by E. (Gen. 159), and that in P's legislation 'turtle-doves' (תִּירָה) and 'young pigeons' (צִיפור) are frequent sacrificial victims in ceremonies which,

3. Sacred character.

'Deliver not the soul of thy turtle-dove' is a strange expression. Sym. Ig. Jer. find an allusion to the Law (Ex. 13 10) the souls of the teachers of thy Law'; but S. Pesh. read דֹּבָה; so Gunkel, Ch. 1: 'Deliver not the soul which praises thee, because the dove.'

DOVE'S DUNG

however do not involve a sacrificial meal (Lev. 37 12 etc., in N.T. 1 K. 224). This exceptional treatment of the dove suggests that originally the Hebrews were wont to ascribe to the bird a sacrosanct character, similar to that which it has obtained among other families of the Semites. In Palestine the dove was sacred with the Phoenicians and Philistines, and on this superstition is based the common Jewish accusations against the Samaritans that they were worshippers of the dove. There were holy doves at Mecca (the custom is hardly indigenous), and according to Laman (Des. Syria, § 1, cp 14) doves were taboo to the Syrians, he who touched them remaining unclean a whole day. On the symbolism of the dove in N.T. (Mt. 3 16 etc.) and in early Christian times, see Smith's Int. Christ. Ant., i. 1.

The following species occur in Palestine:

(1) Columba palumbus, the rock-dove or wood-pigeon, common in England and throughout most of Europe. Large flocks of these assemble in the winter months and do much damage by feeding on the young leaves of cultivated plants; some migrate in the autumn, but many pass the winter in Palestine. (2) C. oenas, the stock-dove, smaller and darker than the above and rarer in Palestine; unlike C. palumbus it does not build on branches of trees, but lays its eggs in holes or in hollows, in the ground. (3) C. rock-dove, is abundant on the coast and uplands; it is the parent stock from which the domesticated varieties have been derived. (4) C. a. himpan, closely allied to the preceding, which it takes the place of in the interior and along the Jordan valley. It is elsewhere found in Egypt and in Abyssinia. It nests in rocks and fissures of the rock (p. Jer. 48 20). (5) Turtur communis, the turtle-dove, which probably represents דֹּבָה (see § 2, Cant. 2 12) about the beginning of April, when they become very plentiful and are to be found in every tree and shrub. This species is the most abundant of all the Columba in Palestine. (6) T. montana, the Barlary or collared dove, which extends from Constantinople to India. Around the Dead Sea this species is a permanent resident, being found as a rule in small flocks of eight or ten. (7) T. sinensis, the palm turtle-dove, has been regarded by Tristram as the turtle-dove of the Bible. It lives amongst the courtyards of houses in Jerusalem and seems to be half tame; it especially frequents palm groves.

DOVE'S DUNG דְּבִינִים or חֲרִיטִים Kt [חֲרִיטִים]. In a graphic account of the siege of Samaria, side by side with 'an ass's head' appears 'the fourth part of a kab of dove's dung' (ḥaritim) as a food only to be bought at a very high price (2 K. 6 25). Much has been written to account for this strange-sounding detail; Josephus (Ant. ix. 44) even suggested that the dung was a substitute for salt! The reference to it, however, is doubtless due to an error of an ancient scribe, which is precisely analogous to one in Ps. 123 4 (MT).

In that passage a questionable word (rendered in LXX 'the proud') is represented in the mg. as being really two words, one of which is דְּבִינִים. It is more than probable that 'an ass's head' (רֹאשׁ אֶשְׂתִּי) should be דְּבִינִים, 'a homer of lentils,' and 'doves' dung' (חֲרִיטִים) should be קִיטִים, 'pods of the carob tree' (see Hubsch.). That the ancients agreed with MT and that the correctness of the reading can be defended (see Post in Hastings' BD, 2. 22) by observation of the habits of pigeons is no reason why we should acquiesce in it; similarly we might defend the painful figure of the 'snail' in Ps. 124 4 (see S. 124, 2). For the attempts of modern writers to mitigate the unpleasantness of the expression 'dove's dung' by finding some plant which might have been so called, see articles in Smith's and Hastings' dictionaries. Two illustrative passages (2 K. 18 27 Is. 1 20) have, we may believe, been recovered by similar corrections of the text, one certain, the other highly probable. See Hubsch.

F. V. C.

¹ In NT times doves for such purposes were sold in the temple itself (Mt. 21 12 Mk. 11 15 Jn. 2 14 17).

² On the whole subject see Huchart, Hibos, ii. 11 and WRS Kin. 100 f.; RS 219 n. 2, 204, etc. Cp also for 'dove' oracles, Frazer, Paus. 4 140 f. The white dove was especially venerated; Tibullus, 17: 'alba Palestinae sancta columba syrae'.

³ This is a euphemistic substitute. Some authorities recognise דְּבִינִים, 'doves,' as an element in the phrase (so Kün. Leheng. 2 102); others take it to be simply a termination (Ginsb. Introd. 346, 'decayed leaves').

⁴ Such 'unclean' food was not likely to be exposed for sale even during a siege. And why specially the head?

DRAGON (נָחָשׁ, ΔΡΑΚΩΝ)

For De. 32:11 EV Ps. 91:13 (RV 'serpent') see SERPENT, § 1 (1), and for Ps. 147 (RV 'serpents' or 'waterspouts'), SERPENT, § 3 (C) n. For the 'dragons' (נָחָשׁ, נָחָשׁ, נָחָשׁ) [sing. 17] in Lam. 4:1 W 'sea-monsters', W 'sea-monsters' (of Mal. 1:1), see TALKERS (to RV).

In addition to the passages in which the term dragon is used of a natural species of animals (such as Gen. 1:21

RV 'sea-monsters', AV WHART. 1:21; Ex. 7:2 f. EV SERPENT [2:7]) there are various longer or shorter passages in which a mythological or semi-mythological explanation of the term may be reasonably supposed. Some of these have been, with more or less fulness, treated elsewhere, and may therefore be here considered more briefly.

The passages are as follows (not discussion, see § 1/2)-(6): 14:27 (see B. Midrash and Leviticus, § 1/2); (6) Is. 51:9 (see RAHAB); (6) Jer. 51:34 (see JEREMIAH, ii. § 4); (6) Ezek. 29:2, 'I will attack thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, thou great dragon, which hast in the midst of thy streams, which hast said, Mine are the streams, I have made them. I will put hooks in thy jaws, and cause the fish of thy streams to stick to thy scales. I will bring thee up out of thy streams, and I will hurl thee into the desert, thou and all the fish of thy streams; upon the open country shalt thou fall; thou shalt not be taken up nor gathered. . . . (6) Ezek. 32:2, 'as for thee, thou wast like the dragon in the sea, thou didst break forth with thy streams, didst trouble the water with thy feet, and didst foil its streams. Thus saith Yahweh, I will spread my net over thee, and bring thee up into my snare. I will spread my net upon the mountains, and fill the valley with thy corruption. . . . I will cover the heavens at thy setting, and clothe its stars in mourning. . . . (7) Job 7:12, 'Am I the sea or the dragon, that thou settest watch against me?' (8) Neh. 2:13, 'believe the dragon-well.' These are probably all the passages in the Hebrew OT; for Ps. 41:19 [20], referred to by Gunkel in this connection, is certainly corrupt; but (2) Esth. 10:7 (1 H6 [5], (2) Bel and the Dragon, and (8) Ps. Sol. 2:24 have to be grouped with them (see § 3).

The NT references are all in Revelation, viz. in (m) 12:3-17, (n) 13:2-11, (o) 16:13, (p) 20:2; cp 12:9. These last require to be treated separately, but with due cognisance of that old Babylonian dragon-myth, uncomprehended fragments of which circulated in the eschatological tradition of ANTICHRIST (7 f.). The dragon which sought to devour the child of the woman is the very same development of Babylonian mythology which lies at the base of Jer. 51:34. From a Jewish point of view the woman (cp Mic. 4:10) is either the earthly or the heavenly Zion, and the dragon (originally Tiamat) with its seven heads¹ is Armilos, or רָשָׁע ('the wicked one'; cp 2 Thess. 2:18), i.e., Rome, the new Babylon, which is identified with 'the ancient serpent,' נָחָשׁ אָדָמָה (cp Rev. 12:9, and see Weber, Jud. Theol. 218). The storming of heaven by the dragon is also Babylonian; it is the primeval rebellion of Tiamat (see CREATION, § 2) transferred to the latter days² (cp Eph. 6:12, the spiritual hosts of wickedness ἐν τοῖς ἀποκρυφοῖς). The additions of the apocalyptic writer do not concern us here.³ On the affinities of Rev. 12:1 to a Greek myth see HELLENISM, § 8.

DRAGON

We pass on to (4) Esth. 10:7 (1 H6). Two dragons fight against a 'righteous people,' i.e., the Jews.

3. In OT Apocryph. These are interpreted as Maccabees and Amas, and of this is that they fight together.

a late modification of an uncomprehended. The connection of the dragons with water is of the Tiamat myth. The writer, however, does it, and explained the 'much water' of Esther. Dragon strikes us at once by its Babylonian origin. It is Daniel, not a god, who kills the Dragon, natural to Haggadic stories, to which, as full story belongs. No trace remains of the old myth is found in Jer. 51:34. (4) Ps. Sol. 2:24 (1) is a Pompey, the profane of the people, hyperbolical if it were not obviously coloured by tradition.

Resuming the consideration of (a) = 1 notice that the two Leviathans and the 1 set are distinctly mythical.

4. OT allusions considered. Two former, differentiation the latter, King, Tiamat they are identified by the apocalyptic (see with the three great powers hostile to Babylonia, Persia, and Egypt. The reference continues the mythological origin of the for Tiamat is the personification of the primeval chaos.

On Yahweh's sword see Gen. 3:24, and a weapon, called in Creation tablet iv. 2, 'storm' (cp 1/2 30:39). As to (b), note a conquered monsters (Rahab) and the Dragon connection with the sea in 1/2. The old myth to the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea; but the application would have been in the destruction of Rahab and the 1 equivalent to the subjugation of the sea. does not say, but obviously supposes, that Pharaoh are in some sense identical, just 12 the mythical power of Rome is identified Dragon. The 'shattering' of Rahab is referred to the Babylonian myth.

Of (c) nothing more need now be said, but (d) and (e) require to be clearly interpreted not to an ordinary crocodile that Pharaoh is 'the hyperbolical' language would, in the intolerable. It is the despot and blasphemy Tiamat. The blasphemy is at once explained by the reminder that Tiamat was originally a divinity older in fact than the gods. The denial of Pharaoh is of course explicable out of mere necessity; but it is a worthy supposition that we have a somewhat pale reflection of the outrages of the body of Tiamat by the young sun-god Marduk 'hook' reminds us of Job 41:1 [10:25] (Leviathan's hook) a striking detail in Creation tablet iv. 112. The 'setting' of the dragon implies that a constellation identified with the dragon (cp Parson of Astronomy, 137, 146). In (f) the notion of 'sea' and 'dragon,' and the occurrence references elsewhere in Job to Rahab and 1 sufficiently prove the mythological affinity passage. The Dragon was, according to our version of the old myth, not destroyed, but confinement (cp Job 38:41). Cp the stress 1 38:11 Ps. 104:29 336 [7] 657 f. on the long-passage of the sea by Yahweh.

One passage only remains (g). The term 'well' suggests a different class of myths, in which the supernatural serpent is a friend. Primitive sanctuaries were often at wells (Ex. and serpents love moist places.³ Serpents, too question, How came these only half and misused myths represented by Behemoth, Leviathan, Rahab, and the inclusive appellation Dragon, to be so prominent? We have already seen that they are not of native Palestinian growth but (apart from the myth of the Dragon's Well) of Babylonian origin. Not that every important Dragon myth in Asiatic countries must necessarily be derived ultimately from Babylon (this would be a unscientific theory—but that for the myths now under consideration the evidence points unmistakably to a Babylonian origin. If we ask how these myths came to be so prominent, the answer is that a great revival of mythology took place among the Jews, under Babylonian influences, in exile and post-exile times. Jewish folk-lore became more assimilated to that of the other nations, and the leaders of religion permitted what they could not prevent, with the object of impressing a catholic stamp on popular beliefs. This has long since been noticed, especially by the present writer in a series of works (see also Crit. ATION § 23), where it is pointed out that the Dragon-myth comes from pre-Semitic (Babylonian) times, and where several explanations are indicated.

1 Rashi, on Is. 27:1, remarks that the 'coiled' encompasses the earth (נָחָשׁ אֶרֶץ כְּסִי). Cp (2) 2P46 31:27. The 'coils' of the Egyptian Leviathan were in heaven (Book of Hades, RP 12:13). Apocryphal myth identical with Tiamat, but the details of the Egyptian.

methodology will account for all the details of the biblical descriptions which an accurate exegesis will admit. We need not suppose a reference to the myth of the daily struggle between the Light god and the serpent. The Tiamat story, as known to the Jews, was fairly thin. At the commencement of creation, Tiamat was, according to some, destroyed—according to others, completely subdued and confined in the ocean which encompasses the earth. At that time God's permission began her forth-doing. Truly the angelic powers, commissioned by God to keep watch over Elysium, our 'mouse' Tiamat, even they 'shudder as they do so' (see BILIMON AND LITVINSKY). This form of the story became popular in later biblical times, because it met the requirements of apocalyptic writing. It was a necessity of biblical wisdom to anticipate a return of the 'lost things' of Paradise, and its glory. Evil seemed to have been intended; the reign of Tiamat was renewed, as it were, upon the earth. A deliverance as great as that wrought by Yahweh to greater Marduk of old must therefore be anticipated, and the struggle which would precede it would be as severe as that which took place at the creation. Then would the old things pass away, and all things become new. It is not improbable, as Budge long ago pointed out (ANU, 86, n), that Tiamat in course of time acquired a symbolic meaning, certainly the serpent of Egyptian, and not less of Jewish, belief acquired one. The identification of the old dragon myth is needed in the mysterious but fascinating story of ANTIKHREST [?]. In the twofold representation of Tiamat (dragon and serpent), see STRONG, § 37.

And the degeneration of non-Semitic peoples frequently added to illustrate the fact, it is not necessary to enter. The Semitic material has been glowing from a considerable mass, but it is well to restrict ourselves at present to this. Otherwise we might discuss a striking passage in De Homine, Jan. 24, 1908, in the very fact that in China quarters for the recovery of the rays of the sun in the law of the sun, Jan. 24, 1908, was the day of the sun's eclipse. The fullest English investigation of the different forms taken by the mythical dragon is to be found in W. H. Watt's article 'Bel and the Dragon' (Am. Journal of

In early Babylonian art the dragon does not represent the chaotic dragon, but a destructive demon of pestilence or famine. The sign of the dragon is not as a rule indicated in the primitive representations, even when the dragon is given together with a god (e.g. Ishtar); an exception however is figured by Ward, in which the dragon appears to be made. In the Assyrian period, to which the representations of the conflict between Marduk and the Dragon belong, the dragon is of the male sex, which reminds us that the evil serpent Abrimam in Persian mythology is male. It is very possible that in the oldest Babylonian representations the dragon was female (cp. Dr. H. J. G.). With regard to the view (indicated in parts of the Light), that the chaos-dragon was not slain, but only subdued by the Light-god, we may compare some Babylonian cylinders, older than Hammurabi, which represent the dragon as harnessed in a chariot and driven by Bel while a goddess stands on his back and wields the thunderbolt; or else the god stands on the back of the dragon. The Assyrian representations do not, it is true, show that the dragon was slain; but the natural supposition is that the conflict ended in his destruction.

According to the commonly accepted view a and b are identical and mean 'dates'.² Against this two objections may be urged: (1) the ḥ in b is left unexplained, and (2) the form a, which alone supports this meaning, is untrustworthy. In 1 Ch. it is doubtful (עֵץ הַנָּחַל may be a gloss; the amount of gold has been already mentioned), and in Ezra 827 the better reading is עֵץ הַנָּחַל (see above). The form מִנֶּחֱסֵי (δραχμα) is preferable, not for this reason alone, but also on account of its identity with the Phoen. מִנֶּחֱסֵי (pl.),³ which, as the analogy from Gk. inscriptions shows, must represent δραχμα. The occurrence of this Gk. (or Asiatic) word in Ezra-Neh. is due perhaps to repeated glosses. cp Ezra 827 with 1 Esd. 857 and likewise that in some of the passages (above) BA om. DRESS A complete discussion of the subject of ancient Israelish dress (including toilet and ornaments) is impossible with our present limited knowledge. It is true, the Assyrian and Egyptian artists had keen eyes for costume; but trustworthy representations of Israelites are unfortunately few. It might be tempting to fill up this lacuna by noting the usages of dress in the modern East. This, however, would be an uncritical procedure. We might presume on obtaining more than analogies from the customs of the present; but common sense shows that to look for a Hebrew equivalent to every modern garment would be unnatural. Consequently, in spite of the scantiness of detail in the OT, we must base our conceptions upon OT evidence (viewed in the light of criticism) treated by the comparative method.

There are several general terms in Hebrew for 'dress,' 'garments,' 'attire.' It is needful to give details, as there are distinctions of some importance which could not be brought out otherwise.

1. General terms.

1. כִּתְיָה, keṭiyyā (cp perh. Ar. keṭā; we cannot assume a root meaning 'to cover', the verb כָּסַף known to us means 'to deal treacherously'; it is perhaps a verb denom.)¹ may be used for a garment of any kind 'from the filthy clothing of the leper to the holy robes of the priest,' for 'the simplest covering of the poor as well as the costly raiment of the rich and noble' [RDB]; for women's dress (Dt. 2167; cp Gen. 3814), for royal robes (1 K. 2240), and apparently once for the outer robe or MANTLE (2 K. 911); also for the coverlet of a bed (1 S. 1911 1 K. 11), and for the covering of the tabernacle furniture (Neh. 1011 P.).

2. לְבוּשׁ, leḇuṣ, Ezek. 2724, AV 'clothes,' RV 'wrappings,' mg. 'hales.' Prof. Cheyne writes: 'The existence of an old Hebrew root לָבַשׁ "to roll together" is not proved by 2 K. 23 Ps. 13916; both passages are very doubtful, and can be emended with much advantage.

² A Phoenician inscription of the first century B.C. from the Pireus; see Lidbarski, Handb. d. Nordsem. Epogr. 160.

DRESS

ḥab plainly = ḥab in Is. 321, which Peiser identifies with gubnu, a kind of garment' (Z. L. H. 107) Cp CHESE.

3. כִּתְיָה, keṭiyyā, a word of the widest signification (the German Zug) used of garments in Dt. 22 Lev. 1349 (קִיץ).

4. כִּתְיָה, keṭiyyā, 'covering,' Ex. 2110 22 restored by Gratz, Bill, and Cheyne in Gen. 49 כִּתְיָה keṭiyyā, peṭiyyā, fallium, and by Cheyne in Prov. 710 (MT כִּתְיָה, EV 'garment,' 'attire' Prov. 18. 2313 (EV 'clothing'); see AWING.

5. לְבוּשׁ, leḇuṣ (the root לָבַשׁ 'to wear, put found in all the Semitic languages), a general term so frequent as 11; used of the dress of (2 S. 124 Prov. 3122), etc. Cognates are לְבוּשׁ 1022 (1A 'vestment') etc., and לְבוּשׁ Is. 'clothing.'

We turn now to the Hebrew terms denoting particular articles of dress. It is one of the defects of the

that the same English word is often used to represent several distinct Hebrew words, and that, vice versa, the same Hebrew is rendered by different English words (promiscuously). This is due partly to the difficulty of finding an equivalent for many of the Hebrew terms, partly to ignorance of their precise meaning, and the uncertainty of tradition as represented by the versions, Rabbis, exegesis, etc.

Of the numerous Hebrew terms denoting articles of dress, those referring to the feet are discussed under SHOES. For the various head-dresses (כִּתְיָה, etc.) TURBAN. One of the special terms for garments about the body is כִּתְיָה, 'kilt' or 'loin-cloth' (GIRLE).¹ Out of this an evolutionary process brought breeches (cp Ar. miṣṣar), which, however, among the Hebrews appear first as a loin garment (כִּתְיָה, see BRECKEN. For the ordinary under-garment worn next the skin (כִּתְיָה, see TR. The over-garment (corresponding roughly to the quadron and Roman lega) varied in size, in shape, in richness, and had several distinct names (שָׂרָב, etc.), for which see MANTLE.

Certain classes and certain occasions required special dresses. The clothing of ambassadors is called

² Others vocalise מַד (ZDMG 37 535; properly 'that which is set upon one').

³ So for the obscure Aram. כִּתְיָה (Dan. 321 Kri) see find some remarkable variant renderings as 'hosen' (AV), 'unicus' (RV) and 'trunks' (RVmg).

⁴ We may compare the ḥab of camels or goat's hair which like other primitive garments, long continued to be worn in the morning. The ḥab was perhaps identical with the kilt of ancient Egyptians, for which see Wilk., Enc. Egyp. 2322.

⁵ Che. (Ps. 2) reads עָלָה עַל הָרֶגֶל, 'on the surface of the desert.'

who is cursed (but the whole passage is in disorder; see Che. 176). In the Lahn כִּתְיָוָה is a robe distinctive of the Avot or prince. In the priestly head dress, see MITRE; the priests in later times indulged in sumptuous apparel.¹ In Talmudic times Rabbis wore a special dress, and were crowned until the death of Eliezer b. Azaiya (Levita, Sotah, 15). In Babylonia a golden ordination robe was used at the crowning of the Rabbinical dignity. A festive garb was worn at the creation of an Elder (zaken); cp. No. 1 has a special mantle, the Exarch a girdle.² For the king's regalia see CROWNATION, CROWN. For the warrior's dress we can add very little. In 88 heeds the military boot (כִּנְיָוָה) in Is. 94 (1) and is related to the distinctive outer garment (maddim) of the warrior, and to his shoes, has been compared in Nah. 212 [17].³ See also HEMET. For bridal attire (cp. Is.
4918 6110, ἔνδυμα γάμου Mt. 2214) see MARRIAGE, § 3, and for the garb of mourning (כִּתְיָוָה Is. 6131, אֲדָמָה
2 S. 141), see MORNING CUSTOMS.

With the exception of the swaddling clothes of the newborn babe (hithallah, Job 386; cp. verb in Ezek. 1611, σπαργανον, Wisd. 711; cp. Lk. 2712), children seem to have had no distinctive dress. The boy Samuel wore a small me'il (see MANTLE), and if the lad Joseph possessed a special kuttaneth (see TINTO), it was regarded by the narrator in Genesis as exceptional. In Talmudic times boys wore a peculiar shirt (כִּתְיָוָה Shabb. 1341).⁴

In ancient times, dress depended to a large extent on climatic considerations. The simplest and most primitive covering was the loin-cloth (see GIRTHE), a valuable safeguard in tropical climates, adopted perhaps for this reason rather than from the feeling of shame to which its origin was afterwards traced (Gen. 37). The use of sandals in early times was not looked upon as an absolute necessity (see STOPI), and although the PERSIAN in some form or other may be old, the custom of wearing the hair long was for very many a sufficient protection for the head.

It is impossible to say how early the ordinary Israelite assumed the two garments (tunic and mantle) which became the common attire of both sexes. The garments of the women probably differed in length and in colour from those of the men. Dt. 225 leaves no doubt as to the fact that there was some distinction.
Several terms are common to the dress of both sexes (beged, kuttaneth, simlah, etc.); for some distinctive terms see VAIL, and cp. TINTO, MANTLE. The Jewish prisoners pictured on the marble-reliefs of Sennacherib are bareheaded and wear short sleeved tunics reaching to the ankles. This costume differs so markedly from the Assyrian, that the artist seems to have been drawing from life. Jehoi's tribute-bearers on Shalmaneser's obelisk wear Assyrian dress and headgear, due probably to the conventionality of the artist. The Syrian envoy in a wall painting in the tomb of Hui at el Kab wears a dress so unlike the Egyptian that we seem once more in presence of an authentic record. The over-garment of this envoy, which is long and narrow, and is folded close to the body, is of blue and dark red material richly ornamented; he has yellow underclothes with narrow sleeves and wears tight breeches. In the OT, however, there is no indication that such a costume very uncertain; see Che. 176, Ges. 136. It is possible that the words are a gloss to כִּתְיָוָה (RV), for which cp. Ex.

DRESS

was ever prevalent among the Israelites. For simplicity of attire it would not be easy to surpass the dress of the Semitic Bedawin (see WMM, J. A. S. 1900, and this simplicity once doubtless marked the garb of the Hebrew). Later, life in cities and contact with foreign influences paved the way to luxury. The more elaborate dress of the Canaanite would soon be imitated.
Several signs of increasing sumptuousness in dress are met with in the later writings. The dress at the court of Solomon (cp. 1 K. 1018) is represented as an object of admiration to an Arabian queen (1 K. 1018). One notes that it is in the later writings that several of the names for articles of dress appear for the first time.

Early garments and ornaments were added and then materials used. The traditional materials of garments were wool and flax woven by the women; but now trade brought purple from Phoenicia, byssus from Egypt, and figured embroideries from Babylon (see TINTO). That silk was known in the time of Ezekiel (Ezek. 1613) is doubtful (see COTTON, LINEN, SILK, WOOL). New luxurious costumes (cp.
כִּתְיָוָה, Ezek. 2312 3841; כִּתְיָוָה, 2717) are a frequent subject of denunciation in the later prophets, partly because of the oppression of the poor involved in the effort to extort the means of providing them, and partly because of the introduction of alien rites and customs encouraged by contact with foreign merchants.

In later times intercourse with other peoples led to the introduction of fresh articles of apparel and new terms.
Such for example is the essentially Grecian perizoma (if correct) of 2 Mac. 112 (see CAP). These obscure words denoting articles of dress, most probably of foreign origin, are mentioned in the description of the three who were cast into the fiery furnace (Dan. 312). For Talmudic times Schürer (1/1 207) notes the mention of כִּתְיָוָה worn by laborers and soldiers, אֲדָמָה (shab), כִּתְיָוָה (garbapant); see NAKIN, כִּתְיָוָה (παιδα), אֲדָמָה (himation). Among under garments are the כִּתְיָוָה (dalmatica), according to Pappianus (Heb. 111) worn by slaves, and the כִּתְיָוָה (perizoma), of which the equivalent perizoma is used in the Aramaic Vers. for χίτων. To these may be added כִּתְיָוָה (mantica) an outer garment, כִּתְיָוָה (akachora), כִּתְיָוָה a fringed garment of fine linen (see FRIING), Gloves are mentioned כִּתְיָוָה (chitin, 1610, etc.); but they were worn by workmen to protect their hands (cp. also כִּתְיָוָה Targ. on Ruth 47).⁵

Increased luxury of dress among the Israelites was accompanied by an excess of ornaments. Ornaments of many kinds were worn by both sexes primarily for protective purposes (as

AMULETS), at a later time (when their original purpose was forgotten) to beautify and adorn the person. The elaborate enumeration of the fine lady's attire in Is. 3, though not from the hand of Isaiah (see ISAAH, n. § 5), is archaeologically important. Here the Hebrew women (of the post-exilic period?), following foreign customs, wear arm-chains, nose-rings, step-chains, etc., in great profusion. For these cp. SAMENTS, and see the separate articles.

On the manner of treating the hair, see BEARD,
CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH, § 3; HAIR, MORNING
CUSTOMS. Women curled their hair, bound it with veils (see VAIL) and GARMENTS 1911, etc. Later, the Roman habit of curling was introduced (Jos. Ant. 1910).

Washing the body with water was usual on festival occasions, at weddings (Ezek. 1610), at meals (Gen. 251 1910 Lk. 711), before formal visits (Rn. 31), before

¹ In the Roman period simplicity of attire (almost amounting to nakedness; Lahn, Sabb. 414) was observed in the case of criminals, whilst persons on trial were expected to dress very specially (Jos. Ant. xiv 92).

² For a discussion of the terms see Che. 176, 106 (17).

the various terms. For later Jewish dress see Verulamius, officiating in the temple, in ritual purifications, and so forth. Rubbing the body with sand or sherds was also practised. Unguents prepared by female slaves (1 S. 813) or by male professionals (מְשִׁימָה) were used after washing (Ru. 3; Amos 66 etc.)¹; see ANOINTING, § 2, CONFECTIONARIES. After the Hellenistic period such festal customs became more and more elaborate.

The eye-lids of women were painted to make the eyes larger, kohl being used for the purpose (see PAINT). It is doubtful whether henna dye was placed on nails and toes.

The references in the EV to dress are so frequent and the syncretical usages so familiar that a passing glance at them may suffice. Food and clothing

6. OT are naturally regarded as the two great necessities of life (e.g., Gen. 2820 1 Tim. 68).

An outfit is called בְּרִיחַ (Judg. 1710). In Talmudic times it consisted of eighteen pieces (Jer. Shabb. 13). Clothes were made by the women (Prov. 3122 Acts 939), but references to sewing are few (מְשִׁימָה, Gen. 37 Job 1615 Eccles. 37 Ezek. 1318, ἐπιπλάττω Mk. 221).

Clothes were presented in token of friendship (1 S. 184; see WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 335), as a proof of affection (Gen. 4521), and as a gift of honour (1 K. 1023; cp Am. Tab. 270). Garments were rent (קָרַע, קָרַע) as a sign of grief, of despair, of indignation, etc. (see MOURNING CUSTOMS). Shaking the clothes was a sign of renunciation and abhorrence (Acts 186; cp Neh. 513). Promotion was often accompanied by the assumption of robes of dignity (cp Is. 2221). So Eleazar takes the robes of Aaron (Nu. 2028), and Elisha the mantle of Elijah (2 K. 2); see also CORONATION. Conversely, disrobing might be equivalent to dismissal (2 Macc. 433). Rich people doubtless had large wardrobes; the royal wardrobe (or was it the wardrobe of the temple?) had a special 'keeper' (1 K. 2214). The danger to such collections from moths (see MOTH) and from the so-called 'plague of leprosy' (see LEPROSY) was no doubt an urgent one. The simile of a worn-out garment (בְּרִיחַ, cp Dt. 84) is often employed (cp Is. 509 516 Ps. 10226 [27]). Rags are called קָרַע (Prov. 2321 EV); cp also בְּרִיחַ קָרַע (Jer. 3811 f. RV), 'old cast clouts and old rotten rags'. The EV, alt apparently containing the idea of something rent (cp πάρος Mt. 916 Mk. 221).

To cast a garment over a woman was in Arabia equivalent to claiming her.² Robertson Smith (K'in. 87) cites a case from Talari where the heir by throwing his dress over the widow claimed the right to marry her under the dowry paid by her husband, or to give her in marriage and take the dowry. This explains Ruth's words (Ruth 39) and the use of 'garment' to designate a woman or wife in Mal. 216 (K'in. 87, 269). A benevolent law, found already in the Book of the Covenant, enacts that every garment retained by a creditor in pledge shall be returned before sunset (Ex. 2226); the necessity of this law appears from Am. 28 Ezek. 18716; see PLEDGE.

D's injunction 'a man shall not put on the simlah of a woman,' 'a woman shall not wear the appurtenances (בְּרִיחַ) of a man' (Dt. 225) may have been designed as a safeguard against impropriety; but more probably it was directed against the simulated changes of sex which were so prevalent and demoralising in Syrian heathenism.³ Quite obscure, on the other hand, is the law prohibiting the layman from wearing garments made of a mixture of linen and wool (שַׁמְשֵׁן, Dt. 2211).

² Hence some explain בְּרִיחַ in Ex. 218 to mean that the master could not sell his female slave 'seeing that (he had placed) his garment (qagat) over her.' See SLAVERY.

³ See Dr. ad loc., Frazer, Paus. 3197, ANTIQUITY, § 2. It may be doubted whether in ancient times dressing boys as girls was due, as among later Orientals, to a desire to avert the evil eye.

DRESS

Lev. 1919; see LINEN, 7, n. 1). Such garments worn by the priests;¹ and the law, which is the term itself, be of foreign origin, is at a later than Ezek. 4418. Another law, which laymen to wear tassels or twisted threads skirt of their simlah, seems to go back to a sacred custom (see FRINGES). See, further, ST.

Garments had to be changed or purified on occasion of a religious observance (cp Gen. 1910) or before a feast (cp

'changes,' תַּחֲבִישָׁה, 'festal robes' (see MANTLE). Primarily, however, all festive occasions are sacred occasions, and there is therefore no real difference between best cloth and holy clothes. When a garment comes in contact with anything partaking of a sacred nature it becomes 'holy,' it must never be worn save on occasions.² This is why in early Arabia certain were performed naked or in garments borrowed from the sanctuary (We. Heid. (2) 56, 110). The same principle illustrates the command of Jehu to 'bring vestments for all the worshippers of Baal'; the vestments were in the custody of the keeper of the melkashim (1022; text perhaps corrupt; see VESTRY). That rites among the Hebrews were performed in a naked condition seems not improbable. The itself was once perhaps nothing more than a loi (cp 2 S. 614 1620, and see EPIROT, § 13).

Elijah's kilt (ḥizor) of skin and the prophet's 'cushy' 'hair mantle' (see MANTLE)—in later times falsely assumed (Zech. 134)—remind us of the of the Palmætum who were dressed in skins (Strabo 418; for other analogies see RS (2) 437 f.);⁴ but there is always a tendency in cults to return to ancient customs in the performance of sacred rites, and, as Robertson Smith has shown, later priestly ritual is only a development of what was originally observed by all worshippers when every man was his own priest. The dress of worshippers in skins of the sacred kind (cp 1 S. 1910) implies that they have come to worship as kinsmen of the victim and of the god, and in this connection suggestive to remember that the eponyms of the Levites and Joseph tribes are the 'wild-cow' (Leah) and 'ewe' (Rachel) respectively. See LEAH, RACHEL.

Again, we note that clothing may be looked upon as forming so far part of a man as to serve as a vehicle of personal connection. The clothes thus tend to be identified with the owner, as in the custom alluded to in Ruth 39 above. The Arab seizes hold of the garment of the man whose protection he seeks, and 'pluck a my garments from thine' in the older literature means 'put an end to our attachment.' So a man deposits with a god a garment or merely a shred of cloth and even to the present day rag-offerings are to be seen upon the sacred trees of Syria and on the tombs of Mohammedan saints. They are not gifts in the ordinary sense, but pledges of the connection between worshipper and object or person worshipped (RS (2) 335 f.).⁵ Garments are offered to sacred objects, to wells (cp 1 S. 177), but more particularly to trees and idols (cp NATURE WORSHIP).⁶ So 2 K. 237 speaks of the woman who wove tunics (so Kto.) for the asherah. The custom is not confined to the Semitic world, and instances

³ Verse 146, however, may be an addition. For Ex. 2026 BIRCHES, 3.

⁴ In Zeph. 18 the wearing of 'strange garments' (בְּרִיחַ) is associated with foreign worship (cp 7. 9).

⁵ Cp Bertholet, Israel. Vorstellungen v. Zustand nach Tode (99).

DRINK OFFERING

draped images in Greece are collected by Frazer (Paus. 257 f.). 'The Greek images,' he observes, 'which are historically known to have worn real clothes seem generally to have been remarkable for their great antiquity.' The custom does not seem to be indigenous; it was probably borrowed from the East.¹ The counterpart of the custom of offering a garment to the sanctified object is the wearing of something which has been in contact with it. At the present day in Palestine the man who hangs a rag upon a sacred tree takes away, as a preservative against evil, one of the rags that have been sanctified by hanging there for some time (see PEEF, 1893, p. 204). The custom of wearing sacred relics as charms is clearly parallel. Now, just as the priests had their special garments, so particular vestments were used for purposes of divination. Thus a magician wears the clothes of Er-ti—i.e., Eridu, a town mentioned often in Babylonian incantations (Del. Ass. III B 371b). Another instance of the wearing of special dress is cited by Friedrich Delitzsch in Baer's Ezek. p. xiii. An important parallel to this custom appears in Ezekiel's denunciation of the false prophetesses² and the divination to which they resorted (Ezek. 13:17-23). Two special articles are mentioned: (a) ḥathōth, 'hands' or 'fingers'³ worn upon the arms (cp the use of FRONTLETS [p. 11]), and (b) ḥathōth, 'long mantles' (ἐπιβάτια [BAQ], πεπλ. [A. 21], Pesh. takithi, ma'na, EV incorrectly KIRKIROTHS), which were placed over the head of the diviner.⁴ It becomes very tempting to conjecture that these garments were not merely special garments, but the garments actually worn by the deity or sacred object itself, since it is plausible to infer that they would be held to be permeated with the sanctity of the deified object and that supernatural power might be thus imparted to the wearer.⁵ It is true, the link is still missing to connect the diviner's garb with that of the clothed image; but such a conjecture as this would seem to explain how the use of 'Ephod,' as an article of divination, in its twofold sense of image and garment (in which it has been clothed), might have arisen (cp Bertholet on Ezek. 13:18); see EPHOD.

See Weiss, Kostümkunde, i. ch. 5; Nowak, H. A., § 20; Benzinger, H. A., § 10; and the special articles referred to in the course of this summary.

DROMEDARY. The word קִרְכִּירוֹת, kirkīroth, is rendered 'dromedaries' in Is. 66:2, RVmg. (so Bochart, Ges., Che., Di., Dulmi., cp כִּרְכִּיר 'to whirl about' and EV 'swift beasts'). The rendering 'pauers' (cp μετὰ σκευῶν [BAQ]; Sym. ἐν φορείοις) has little in its favour. For Jer. 23 (כִּרְכִּירָה) and Is. 60 (id. plur.)—EV 'dromedary,' RVmg. correctly 'young camel'—see CAMEL, § 1, n. For 1 K. 4:29 (כִּרְכִּירָה) and Esch. 5:10 (כִּרְכִּירָה) see HORSE, § 1 (4).

DUKE had not yet become a title when the AV was made, but was still employed in its literal sense of any dux or chief: cp Hen. I. iii. 2:23; 'Be merciful, great duke (viz., Fluellen), to men of mould.' With but two

² The importance of women in divination will not be overlooked. One notes how frequently the Grecian images, above referred to, represent goddesses.

³ See CUTTING, § 7, n.; but כִּי might also mean garments, cp Ass. Kusti.

⁴ It is surely wrong to suppose that the mantles were worn by the enquirers. We have to read the fem. suffix in כִּרְכִּירָה (p. 214; cp the fem. suffix in כִּרְכִּירָה p. 202); there is a similar error in עֹבֵדָה p. 196. כִּרְכִּירָה (p. 18) should probably be emended to כִּרְכִּירָה, 'every diviner.'

⁵ Cp RS 2438 and see SACRIFICE. This may have given rise to the figure 'robe of righteousness' and other well-known usages, cp also Joh 29:14; 'I put on truth and it clothed me (יִתְבָּשֵׁת)'—i.e., became, as it were, incarnate in me.

exceptions (see 1, below) this now misleading term has given place in RV to a more modern equivalent.

1. דִּירָא (dyra [B.M.]), a title applied to the Edomite 'chiefs' (so RVmg. only) in Gen. 36:15 ff., 1 Ch. 15:1 ff. (cp Ex. 15:15 EV, and see KNOW, § 4); but also (rarely) to the 'chieftains' (so RV) of Judah (Zech. 9:12 ff., צִיָּאִים, AV 'governors'). The tribal subdivision of which the dyra is the head is called ḥeleph.

2. דִּירָא, in pl., of the 'dukes' (RV 'princes') of Sihon (Josh. 13:21). Elsewhere the word is always translated 'princes' or 'principal men' (Ps. 88:11 [12] Ezek. 32:30 Mic. 6:4 [5]).

DULCIMER (כִּנֹּרִים), Dan. 3:5 10 15; see MUSIC, § 4 (c).

DUMAH (דִּמְיָה). 1. In Gen. 25:14 (דִּמְיָה [ADE], δωμια [L.]) and 1 Ch. 1:30 (δωμια [B.M.]) Dumah appears as a son of Ishmael. The form δωμια suggests comparison with Adumu, the 'fortress of the land of Arbi' (AB 2:11), which, as Esar-haddon tells us, Sennacherib had conquered.

2. If the Dumah of Gen. is the same as Adumu, it may be tempting to suppose with Winkler (AT Unt. 37) that the heading 'Oracle of Dumah' (Is. 21:11) also refers to this 'fortress.' The prophecy itself, however, seems to forbid this; it begins 'One calleth to me out of Seir.' More probably not Adumu but Udumu, i.e., Edom, is meant (Cf. Proph. I. 1:10); in other words, 'Dumah' is a corruption of 'Edom' (τῆς Ἰδουμαίας [BAQ]; see Sw. [p. 11], facilitated perhaps by the neighbourhood of Massa (ματτα, p. 11), being misunderstood and Temar (p. 14); see Gen. 25:14 f. This is a less probable view than 'Dumah' ('silence'—i.e., desolation) is a mystical name for Edom (τῆς Ἰδουμαίας). See also ISHMAEL, § 4 (4). EDOM (footnote on name of Edom).

3. There is another (apparently) enigmatical heading in Is. 21:1 ('Oracle of the wilderness of the sea'), which should probably be emended into 'Oracle of Chald.' (כַּלְדָּיָה) (see SROT). Both headings are undoubtedly late.

4. In Josh. 15:24 the reading followed by EV is found in some MSS and edd. (see Ginsb.), and being supported by the OS (δωμια; see below) is very probably more correct than the RVmg. of MT (דִּמְיָה [Ba. p. 80, Gi.]; so Pesh. and Σ, δωμια [B] δωμια [A.]). In favour of this is the fact that the name is assigned to a town in the hill country of Judah, mentioned in the same group with Hebron and Beth-tappuah. For there is still a place called ed-Dōmeh, 2190 ft. above the sea-level, 10 m. SW. from Hebron and 12 SE. from Beit-Jibrin, a position which coincides nearly with the definition of Jer. and Eus. (OS 1164 25058), 'a very large village now in the Daroma,' 17 m. southward from Eleutheropolis.

If the word is Aram., it should mean 'dwelling-place' or 'village'; but Σ's rendering, even if a guess, may suggest that the name had come down from old Babylonian times and means 'wall.' In fact, three localities are mentioned in the tablets as bearing the name Dūru, ¹ In all the passages quoted there may have been a confusion between דִּירָא and דִּירָא.

² In Zech. written defectively דִּירָא. The St. Petersburg MS, however, points דִּירָא.

³ Uduma, as Wi. now reads (but cp U 1:189), was the name of a city in the land of Gar, which may be identical with the Adumu of Esar-haddon, and from this city the land of Uduma may have derived its name. Still the remark in the text appears to be sound.

DUST

'wall' or 'walled town' (Del. Par. 216), and several Babylonian cities had names compounded with Dur.¹ That the writer of the narrative knew any of these places, appears improbable. Possibly the old name Dûru had attached itself in his time to the plain adjacent to the remains of the walls of Babylon. At any rate, the scene of the dedication of the image must in the writer's mind have been close to Babylon.
