Mr. Martin (Essex East): —as my friend the hon. member for Laurier points out, somewhat gratuitously, "as so often happens".

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Essex East needs some help, though.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In May's sixteenth edition at page 530 that distinguished author deals with the question of reasoned amendment. He says:

> It is also competent for a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment". This amendment is to leave out all the words in the main question after the word "that" and to add other words; and the question proposed upon the amendment is, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question. A reasoned amendment is placed on the paper in the form of a motion and may fall into one of several categories.

(1) It may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill—

That is exactly what this amendment does. This amendment complains about the fact that in the bill before the house there are not included amendments not with regard to a minor matter but with regard to a matter that was regarded as important enough to be considered as a declaration of policy in the budget speech of last December, and which is still being discussed in this house as a result of the intransigence, if I may say so, of the Minister of Finance.

We are asking that this bill be strengthened by including in it provisions that are not now included. In response to that the Minister of Finance suggests that the existing law already gives the government the authority which we are seeking to have incorporated in this bill. That is one of the very points of the amendment. We are asking that there be incorporated in the form of a legislative amendment the authority which the governor in council now has in respect of a matter so vital as to warrant inclusion in the budget and which should form part of our statutory law and not be capable of giving authority to the government merely by the exercise of a secret order in council. That is one of the principles involved in this amendment.

The Minister of Finance says this is not a direct amendment, as though that were a very important observation in so far as the validity of this amendment is concerned. It is true that the government has acted in this particular matter under an order in council belatedly passed by the governor in council. Our contention is that the matter is of such importance that it ought to be included in an enactment of this house and that the particular authority authorizing the passing of an order in council is an authority that was never envisaged to cover a matter of this fundamental importance.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I would urge Your Honour, and I do so with confidence, to accept this amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there is one further point on which I should have touched and it will be, I think, quite obvious to the Chair. That is that the amendment introduces something that is quite outside the scope of the bill and therefore offends the rule as to relevancy.

The hon. member for Essex East, of course, wishes to revive the budget debate. This bill, C-73, is, of course, only one of the legislative measures which have been brought forward in pursuance of the resolutions introduced at the conclusion of the budget speech of December 20. I would point out that what has been attempted by the opposition in this amendment is to evade a ruling that was made with respect to this very matter at the resolution stage in committee of ways and means. This was in the resolution dealing with the proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act. Because this question of double depreciation, which was announced in that speech and which of course is a matter of regulation under the provisions of the Income Tax Act, was not referred to in the resolution, hon. members opposite including the hon. member for Essex East sought to debate that question in the committee of ways and means on the resolution. That discussion was ruled to be out of order by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the case.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You will find that at page 2606 of Hansard of March 2. The hon. member for Essex East was allowed a great deal of latitude. It seems to be that the only way any progress can be achieved in the house or committee is to extend to the hon. member for Essex East latitude to ride roughshod all over the rules of the house.

Mr. Pearson: A reflection on the Chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): After that had been done a point of order was raised. You will find reference to this at page 2606. Again the hon. member for Essex East made the same kind of voluble statement he has made today, and even the Leader of the Opposition took part in this discussion on the point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not a fact.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The deputy chairman disposed of the point of order. He disposed of it by ruling that kind of discussion to be out of order on the resolution. Here are his words to be found at page 2606—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Read them out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I certainly intend to read them out, but I do not need to take orders from the hon. member for Essex East. The deputy chairman said:

I think hon. members will realize first of all, of course, that the Chair does not make the rules of the house. The job of the Chair is to try to interpret the rules. When the hon. member for Essex East first rose and started talking about double depreciation I began to read the resolution very carefully and I have read it three times. Up to this point I have not been able to find in the resolution any reference to double depreciation.

I have no other alternative than to suggest to hon. members that they try to be more relevant to the particular resolution that is before us. We are not debating the budget. We are debating one resolution of the budget. I am sure hon.

members will appreciate the position that the Chair has to take and will do what they can to co-operate.

An hon. Member: That is no ruling.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): From that stage, the point was not raised again. No further effort was made by hon. members opposite to defeat or evade the ruling of the Chair in that respect.

We come now to the bill stage. There is nothing in this bill that relates to this matter of the double depreciation. That was not a matter requiring legislation. It is, therefore, outside the scope of the bill, and the purpose of the amendment is to enlarge the scope of the debate and revive the debate on the budget rather than have a debate on the bill itself. On the rule of relevancy I respectfully submit that this amendment is completely out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate speaks I wish to say that he should endeavour to meet the point that this amendment can be brought within the terms of the resolution.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): That is what I was seeking to do, Mr. Speaker. Evidently the Minister of Finance has had a lapse of memory, because later on March 2, as Your Honour will find from examining Hansard at page 2609, I got up to address the committee and said:

I should like to address myself to the first few words in this resolution which are:

"Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide among other things:"

The whole crux of my remarks was that among the other things that ought to be included in the bill as coming within the scope of the Income Tax Act which was being amended were precisely those things dealt with by this amendment, supported by my hon. friend, which I moved earlier today; that is to say, the inclusion in the bill of specific legislative authority for the kind of double depreciation which the government was seeking to give by order in council under existing legislation. Neither the chairman nor the Minister of Finance nor indeed anyone else took the slightest exception to that observation of mine.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, Mr. Speaker, that is not true. Will the hon. member look at page 2610 of Hansard, where he will see in the second paragraph that when the hon. member for Essex East attempted to revert to this subject I said "Order", and the deputy chairman made a ruling. He said:

Order. The hon. member was referring to what might be put into the Income Tax Act. That was quite in order. But I think the hon. member is going a little further than he is entitled to go—

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Pickersgill: Since I had the floor, after this usual intervention in the middle of speeches perhaps I might be permitted to proceed. I said no exception was taken to my observations, and no exception was taken to my observations, Your Honour. My observations were the only ones that dealt specifically with the point that the amendment I submitted to the house today deals with, namely whether this amendment can be brought within the scope of the bill. Nothing is more obvious than that. What we are seeking to suggest is that this amendment to the Income Tax Act should amend the act with specific respect to a matter which is now dealt with in the Income Tax Act. Surely the minister would not contend, and I am sure Your Honour would not support the contention, that because there is a provision for doing something one way in an existing act of parliament there cannot be an amendment to that act of parliament and provision made to do it in another way. All we are seeking to suggest here is that we find this bill unacceptable because it does not contain a specific provision to do in another way, which we think would be the better way, what the government is seeking to do though it is a new policy, by means of the use of old and existing legislation. If parliament cannot change existing legislation, and if the opposition cannot put forward alternative views as to what the legislation should be, it seems to me that we would have very little legislative function here whatever. However pleasant that would be to the Minister of Finance it is not a conception of parliament, I am sure, that Your Honour would accept.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was endeavouring to read the observations of the deputy chairman at page 2610 of Hansard of March 2. May I conclude the reading. He said, referring to the hon. member for Essex East:

But I think the hon. member is going a little further than he is entitled to go in asking what has or has not been done in an order in council.

This is the whole matter of double depreciation which hon. members opposite are seeking to drag into this debate now. If it is in order to amend a motion for second reading by bringing in something which lies outside the scope of the bill for which second reading is being moved, it will be perfectly in order to bring in any subject at all that has any relevance at all to the main statute, in this case the Income Tax Act. That is not the test of relevancy on a motion for second reading of a bill to amend an existing statute. The rule is that the relevancy applies to the terms of the amending bill, not to the main statute, because this present bill deals with only a few of the many sections of the Income Tax Act. Were this amendment to be in order, then, Mr. Speaker, I think literally hundreds of amendments could be introduced on such a motion just dealing with matters that relate to the main existing statute but have no relevancy whatsoever to the amending bill under consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Sir, since you have allowed the minister to speak twice, perhaps I can reply to his last observation. The effect of the last observation of the minister would be that no amendment could be offered to any bill. In other words we must accept or reject the bill en bloc, and that has certainly not been the practice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): How ridiculous.

Mr. Speaker: The amendment proposed is an amendment on the motion for second reading of a money bill, a bill preceded by a resolution, which distinguishes this bill and the type of amendment which may be moved from other bills which do not have to be preceded by a resolution, so there is that additional limiting factor to amendments which might not be applicable to other bills before the house for second reading.

It is not safe to apply generally decisions with respect to amendments on the second reading of non-money bills to bills which do require a preliminary resolution. In this instance the resolution does contain some general terms which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has pointed out. The resolution which was adopted by the house begins:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide among other things—

Then follow paragraphs numbered 1, 2, 3 and so on, setting out a number of specific items. The only argument that troubles me is the question whether "among other things" opens the door to specific propositions which are not enumerated in the resolution itself—I would be inclined to think not from rules of interpretation—which the reasoned amendment would have to contain; and it is agreed that reasoned amendments on second reading are acceptable.

If this were an acceptable reasoned amendment I would have no doubt about it. The question is whether it is that category of amendment, having regard to the necessity of bringing the reasons within the limitations of the resolution. I think my best judgment—and I agree that these are matters of judgment and might be decided in many instances one way or the other—is that the reason given here, in so far as it is specific or ascertainable, is not within the terms of the resolution, and therefore could not have been incorporated in the bill in the first instance.

As I try to interpret the reason, which is the latter part of the amendment, I read these words:

> That the house declines to give second reading to the bill because it does not include tax laws to assist areas where there is a substantial degree of continued unemployment over the years.

I think the hon. member who introduced the amendment would agree that this is pretty indefinite and vague, but it does assert the contrary principle to some other tax laws relating to assistance to areas where there is substantial unemployment and what he has in mind and what he asserts should be in the bill. The resolution in its terms certainly had no place for tax laws to assist areas where there is a substantial degree of continued unemployment—

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you give the full judgment would Your Honour hear a word on that specific point?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: My word is this. If the amendment contained a reason for not accepting second reading, which would be competent for a member to make as a motion to amend the bill itself in committee, then of course it would not be competent to entertain it on second reading. Your Honour ruled on that very point in one instance on another amendment of mine some years ago, perhaps two sessions ago, when I sought to do by a reasoned amendment something which was competent to do in committee on the bill itself because it was within the scope of the terms of the bill, and for that reason it could not be given as a reason for rejecting the bill as a whole. Therefore I would say that if our reason for seeking to get the house to reject the second reading of this bill was something that could be done to transform the bill in committee, then we would be out of order.

It follows, therefore, that if the reasoned amendment could be made at all it must have as its subject matter something that, though germane to the bill, could not be done in committee on the bill itself. I would not argue for one minute that this can be done in committee on the bill itself. Therefore it seems to me, sir, that that is a consideration that it did not seem to me had been brought out before; and before Your Honour gave a ruling, since this is an important matter, I thought I should draw it to your attention.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the force of the argument that an amendment which might be made at the committee stage to a particular section might also be expanded into a reason. If they were the same then presumably the ruling referred to would prevent it being used as a reason, because it could be dealt with in committee. But many reasons could be advanced against reading this bill the second time which would be within the scope of the resolution and yet would not be specific amendments to clauses, and I think I can give an example which will satisfy the hon. member. It would be a reason of principle that the effect of a particular tax measure would be to interfere with trade or investment between two countries, or something of that kind which would not be the subject matter of an amendment in committee. In the result I find that this latter part does not satisfy my mind that it is a reason which can be advanced on this bill because of the preliminary stage.

There is a further difficulty which I think is a real one, in that the amendment seeks to approve part of the bill and to disapprove the remainder. There is fairly clear authority on that point which has already been referred to. As found in Beauchesne, fourth edition, page 170, it is stated:

An amendment approving part of the motion and disapproving the remainder is out of order.

Then an instance is given. In effect this amendment attempts to approve that part of the bill which deals with allowances for tuition fees but to disapprove the bill otherwise, and on that ground I think it would fall. The hon. member has the floor and is free, of course, to continue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before Your Honour makes a final ruling may I ask Your Honour to consider the case in the United Kingdom parliament to which I referred, which was a specific amendment following a specific rule. A money bill was involved and the mover of the amendment expressed his approval of parts of the main content of the bill and rejected others for certain reasons. I will admit there is that statement in Beauchesne, but it so happens that in the case of that learned authority there is a mere assertion which, without the citation of instances, surely makes the statement of that learned author nothing more than an authority of persuasive value, whereas in the case I have cited we have a decision of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the hon. member for Essex East that I appreciated the force of his argument and the precedent he produced, and distinguished it in my mind, because the first part of the amendment he cited is simply a general declaration in favour of a national health policy. It does not really approve part of the bill, and it is quite different from the amendment before us which attempts to approve specifically some provisions of the bill. In the other case there is a general declaration in favour—I do not recall the exact words—of the institution of a national health program, but that is not specific approval of something in the bill itself, and on that ground I distinguish it.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I might resume my observations on second reading of the bill itself just long enough to express a regret that the government has not seen fit to take parliament into its confidence and give parliament an opportunity on the bill amending the Income Tax Act to make specific provision for double depreciation for what it pains hon. members so much to call distressed areas. When one thinks of the flights of eloquence that issued from this side of the house over the years from 1940 to 1957 from the present head of the administration, those immediately surrounding him and, not the least, from the Minister of Finance himself about the evils of government by order in council, about the restoration of the rights of parliament, about taking parliament into the government's confidence, about permitting parliament to have a share in the conduct of affairs, it does seem to me that in seeking to inaugurate a new policy of this kind it is a pretty sad thing for the government to follow the procedure of acting by order in council in a matter which they profess is going to be of such very great importance, as this was supposed to be when the advance pre-Christmas billing was given in the baby budget but which has turned out, of course, to be such a damp squib that it is perhaps understandable that the government did not want to make any reference to it in the bill. The government was so ashamed of what a poor, puny little mouse the mountain had laboured and brought forth that it preferred to have that labour in secret and to have the mouse concealed as much as possible, instead of allowing members of parliament the opportunity to discuss the matter and put forward amendments which would not perhaps affect the balance of ways and means but which might make the scheme more effective.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me very unfortunate that this government, which was going to restore the rights of parliament that had been so eroded, to use another of the minister's favourite words, by the previous government, should now be doing something which I cannot ever imagine the previous prime minister or any of the previous ministers of finance attempting to do in this hole in the corner fashion. It is all the more astonishing when one recalls that the very day before the order in council was passed, whose provisions or better provisions, we think, should be in the bill itself; the very day before when anyone who knows anything about the processes of government knows that the recommendation must have been before the government, must have been in the privy council office in the last stages of being processed, the minister by every possible device of evasion evaded the simple, straightforward questions which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was asking—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: —in a vain effort to find out what the government was doing about this matter. Since I cannot ask the house to join me in an expression of opinion as I had hoped to be able to do, I can only express for myself profound—

Mr. Jones: Just killing time.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Saskatoon suggests that upholding the rights of parliament is killing time.

Mr. Jones: All you are doing is killing time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unless his leader has changed even more than I would accuse him of changing, I think the hon. member will find difficulty in getting him to support that particular proposition. However, I think we ought to have it on Hansard that the hon. member for Saskatoon thinks that upholding the rights of parliament is killing time, because it shows what a transformation comes about—

Mr. Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: —when hon. gentlemen sit on the treasury benches.

Mr. Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have never suggested and would never state that upholding the rights of parliament would be killing time. Of course we are all concerned about upholding the rights of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has risen to make a personal explanation, which he has made.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose the hon. member does not consider that the time of parliament is being wasted when his friends are speaking, but like many hon. gentlemen on the back benches over there he probably thinks that the time of parliament is wasted whenever anyone in the opposition is speaking. However, sir, I recognize that I have digressed somewhat from the subject matter of the bill. I simply want to emphasize once more my profound sorrow and regret that the government, instead of taking action in a straightforward, open fashion, instead of acting in a generous way and assuming its own responsibility rather than trying to foist it on the municipalities, has chosen to act in this hole in the corner manner and not allow parliament to participate in what should be a very important piece of legislation.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This house, while not opposing all the features of the bill, declines to give second reading to a bill the provisions of which do not include any changes in the tax laws for the purpose of implementing the policy proposed in the supplementary budget in order to assist areas where there is a substantial degree of continued unemployment over the years.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance took objection—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask for a ruling on this amendment before it is discussed?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Welland has proposed an amendment, and I think it would be appropriate to consider it for a moment before he proceeds with his discussion of it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, copies of this further amendment have not been furnished us, so I really am not in a position to discuss it in detail or comment on the detailed terms included in it. I have only heard the hon. member for Welland reading it, but it seems to me that it is a repetition, in essence, of the amendment which you have just ruled out of order. It offends the same rules of the house as that previous amendment did, including the citation at page 170 of Beauchesne, that an amendment approving part of a motion and disapproving the remainder is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I am inclined to agree. I express my preliminary view that while there is some change in the form of this amendment from the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I do not see that there is sufficient change to alter the principle which would be applicable to it. If the hon. member for Essex East wishes to speak I will hear him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I had thought that the case of the amendment proposed in the United Kingdom parliament in 1946 was applicable in every particular to the amendment that was introduced by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. However, Your Honour did point out a flaw when he indicated that in the amendment proposed in 1946 the approval of the bill was in general terms. The amendment now before the house expresses no opposition to the general principles of the bill but finds an inadequacy in the bill, because it does not deal with the specific matter of providing legislatively for authority to deal with the matter of double depreciation. The amendment, therefore, which Your Honour now has before him moved by the hon. member for Welland does meet the objection which Your Honour pointed out, differentiating the amendment of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate from the amendment moved in the British house in 1946.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member allow me to have the text he refers to, and while I am considering it, the hon. member for Welland might continue with his remarks.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Finance took objection when anyone on this side of the house referred to the exchange rate or the value of the Canadian dollar. He said it had nothing to do with these income tax resolutions. One of the clauses of this bill has to do with the imposition of a 15 per cent tax on interest on bonds held by non-residents. The minister himself, as a reason for this tax, said:

> Under current conditions it is not helpful to the balance of payments—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member indicate what page he is reading from?

Mr. McMillan: I am reading from page 1009 of Hansard. The minister is reported as follows:

> Under current conditions it is not helpful to the balance of payments, to the exchange rate or, indirectly but more important, to the employment situation, to continue to encourage provincial, municipal or corporate borrowers to issue bonds in other countries.

The minister gave that as a reason for the imposition of this tax; so that our municipalities and provinces would not be going out of the country to such a great degree to borrow money. He admitted that this would increase the inflow of capital from outside and therefore increase the value of our dollar.

I think we should have some opportunity to refer to the exchange rate during the discussion of these income tax resolutions. I agree with the minister in his statement, but I do not agree that he alone and no one else in this house can discuss the exchange rate or the value of the Canadian dollar during the discussion of these income tax resolutions, and that in effect is what he said yesterday.

I suggest that if the minister did not take all the money available in Canada to meet his requirements, our provinces and municipalities would not need to go to New York to borrow money, or not to such a great degree.

The governor of the Bank of Canada said that among the problems that would have to be faced would be that of moderating the rate of capital inflow into Canada. This is what the minister is attempting to do by these income tax resolutions. At page 19 of the Bank of Canada annual report the following statement appears:

> The basic reason why interest rates are lower in the United States than in Canada is that the total level of borrowing, the aggregate demand for funds by governments, business and individuals combined, is less (proportionately) in the United States than in Canada.

I maintain that the minister is the worst offender in demanding more money from our economy. According to the minister pension funds are increasing by $300 million a year. Canadian workmen and Canadian people are putting aside $300 million a year into pension funds. All I can say in this regard is that even if the minister had impounded this $300 million each year for the last four years there would not be enough money in these funds to cover his overspending on current account alone. If the minister's money requirements during this next year are anything like the amount prophesied by the Canadian tax foundation, I suggest the provinces and municipalities will have to go to New York to get money to a greater extent than they have heretofore. If they do go to New York for money and there is a tax imposed on the income from the bonds, I maintain that the minister then will be taxing our provinces and the municipalities for their capital expenditures, because in the price of the bond and in the rate of interest the lenders will charge an amount to cover this 15 per cent tax on income from these particular bonds.

In a speech in New York the minister said that these measures were not antagonistic towards United States capital coming into Canada. However, in his budget speech he said that this measure would withdraw some of the special incentives which were designed to attract foreign capital.

I do not see how both these things can be so. In one case it is said the measure is designed to keep out foreign capital, and in the other case the minister says it is not designed to prevent United States capital coming into Canada.

In my view the real reason for the influx of foreign capital is the differential between interest rates in Canada and those in the United States. I say that the minister himself has contributed to this differential more than any other person in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, there were some other matters with which I intended to deal. There is the question of high interest rates. The minister proposes now to tax bonds that are issued at less than par value. In the past the minister has done this and has thus allowed wealthy people to escape their rightful taxation. Now, when the provinces are doing what he did, the minister says they cannot do it. In the past he has made it possible—

Mr. Benidickson: They had to compete with him somehow.

Mr. McMillan: —for corporations with high income tax of 50 per cent or more to net about 5.3 per cent after income tax, or the equivalent of nearly 10.6 per cent before income tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Mr. McMillan: I think this is absolutely wrong, and again I say the minister should start to clean house at home before he starts after the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should now deal with the proposed amendment. The amendment which has been submitted by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) is substantially the same as that which was dealt with earlier, the difference being that the first few lines read:

> This house, while not opposing all the features of the bill, declines to give second reading—

Whereas the previous amendment read:

> This house, while wishing to establish special measures in connection with tuition fees and non-resident investment in Canada, inter alia, declines to give second reading—

I think they are substantially the same. The statement that the house does not oppose all the features of the bill is equivalent to a statement that the house approves some of the features of the bill. As I said before, I do not think the house has accepted amendments which attempt to approve the bill in part at second reading and at the same time disapprove it in part. On that ground alone, I would not accept this proposed amendment.

With regard to my former ruling on the latter part of the amendment, to make clear what I had in mind, I would say that it may be asserted as a reason that the bill does some things that are not acceptable to the house, and that might constitute an acceptable amendment. But what is attempted to be said here is that because the bill does not make tax provisions to assist areas where there is extensive unemployment, the house declines to proceed.

Admittedly the bill does not make those provisions, and in my view the bill could not make those provisions without going back to the resolution stage and broadening the resolution to permit such provisions to be introduced into the bill.

That was the point made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), and it seems to me that is an insuperable obstacle to the amendment. Therefore with regret I have to advise the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) that I do not think his amendment comes within the rule.

I must inform the house that if the hon. minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I have no intention of following the practice of some hon. members opposite who have spoken of matters that lie quite outside the scope of the bill. This is not a continuation of the budget debate; it is a debate on second reading of Bill No. C-73.

Yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) raised a question concerning the lapse of time between the introduction of the bill and the motion for second reading. This bill was introduced on March 2 after the antecedent resolution had been reported out of the committee of ways and means and adopted. We moved for second reading on March 15.

This is not an unusual period of time to elapse between first and second readings of the annual bill to amend the Income Tax Act. Indeed last year when I sought to move second reading, I think one week after the bill had been introduced and given first reading, objection was taken that some of those who are interested, the professional organizations who make a study of the technical features of such bills, had not had enough time to complete their detailed examination.

Therefore there has been no unusual delay in this case. It was a matter of affording the usual period of time for such study as those interested might wish to make of the measure.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) raised a question yesterday concerning tuition fees. I think he may not have fully informed himself of the amendment that was made in the committee of ways and means on the resolution respecting the tax position of students paying university tuition fees and the parents of such dependent students. I think he will find the answer in the terms of the measure itself. However, if the hon. member wishes to raise the matter at the committee stage, I think that would be the appropriate place in which to discuss it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will not attempt to review the remarks of some hon. members. The remarks of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) this afternoon were thoroughly wild in many respects. He has made these remarks before and persists in making them time and again and I shall not take up further time of the house with denials of these very wild assertions.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the Chair.

On clause 1—Obligation issued at discount.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, would the minister give the committee an explanation of the purpose and intent of this clause beyond that given in the explanatory notes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think this matter was very fully explained in the budget speech. Its necessity arises from the way in which some provinces in particular, and municipalities have been issuing bonds with a very low coupon rate and issuing them at a substantial discount. I gave some instances in my budget speech on December 20 and the hon. member is, I am sure, aware of them.

The only point which I think could usefully be added to the remarks I made in the budget speech on December 20 and to the explanatory notes in the bill, would concern the position of treasury bills. In the case of treasury bills the lender is remunerated by receiving an amount on redemption which is in excess of the purchase price of the security. This remuneration has been taxed in the past and this practice will continue. However, this income is made subject to tax by a provision already in the Income Tax Act. It is not intended that a purchaser of treasury bills should also be made subject to a further tax under these new subsections added by clause 1.

Mr. McMillan: I think the minister stated that what I said was wild. I referred to the fact that a particular bond sold at a discount returned something over 5 per cent after income tax to corporations having a 50 per cent income tax assessment. I should like to ask the minister whether that is not so.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Whether what is not so?

Mr. McMillan: That it would return to corporations paying 50 per cent income tax over 5 per cent after income tax had been paid.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member is speaking about a particular case I shall have to have all the details of the case about which he is asking me.

Mr. McMillan: Yes. I am thinking of that particular 3 per cent bond which was sold at 94.65—I think that is the amount.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I indicated at an earlier stage, there is only one case since the present government came to office where an issue of bonds by the treasury would have been subject to the tax provided for in clause 1 if it had been in effect.

Mr. McMillan: The minister said my statement was wild. I said the net return would be over 5 per cent after income tax to certain corporations. Is that so or is it not so? Where is my statement wild?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has made assertions of that kind in the past and I have endeavoured to correct them. He goes on making them. If he wishes a detailed comment on what is the effective interest rate in any particular case perhaps the hon. member would give me particulars of any case he has in mind. I shall then be glad to give him an answer. I have already made my comment on the kind of statements he made in an earlier stage of this debate today. We are dealing now with the question of whether there should be a tax applied with a view to discouraging the practice of issuing these bonds at a discount price with a very low interest rate—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Below a hundred.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let me explain. This does not apply in the case of any bond where the coupon rate is 5 per cent or more but in the case of bonds issued with a coupon rate below 5 per cent. If the effect is to create a difference of 33⅓ per cent as between the effective yield and the coupon rate, then this clause will apply a tax in the case of the first holder. This, of course, applies only in the case of issues where the issuing authority is not subject to income tax. It will not apply to issues by corporations.

Mr. Benidickson: Yesterday I quoted a newspaper report on a debate which occurred in 1959 on this subject of discounts on government bonds and the advantages which accrue under certain circumstances to people in the high income tax bracket. The minister, as usual on technical grounds, challenged me and said I should bring forward the words used in that debate as they are found in Hansard rather than quote from a newspaper, as I did yesterday, the slurs which he had tossed to me then in debate, just as he tossed slurs to the very well informed member for Welland today when he called his statements in connection with these matters "wild as usual".

Normally these matters would not have to be dealt with over and over again. Some of us do not have the argumentative capacity of the Minister of Finance on questions of this kind which really, in effect, results in aspersions upon the integrity and intelligence of those who have the obligation, as part of their democratic duty, to question some of the hon. gentleman's parliamentary activities. If the hon. gentleman's assertions were correct and could be substantiated, a great deal of time and debate would be eliminated because we would have no justification for continuing the argument. But I must refer back to one of the early assertions in this discussion to illustrate what we are being asked to do under this new legislation in order to reduce the opportunities for tax exempt borrowers to issue bonds at a first issue price that is considerably discounted below the eventual price which will be paid when due for repayment.

Under these circumstances, and particularly if the term of the lending is relatively short, there is a provision in our tax laws which results in a capital gain. This is exceedingly important as a bond selling gimmick, and I am using a term which the hon. member for Welland has often, and very properly, used. This gimmick, while not understood too well except to sophisticated lenders, is of extreme importance when it comes to competition among governments seeking funds from the savings of the public. This includes borrowers at federal level, and the Minister of Finance has been the giant in that field in recent years. He competes with others for the savings of Canadians and, indeed, for the savings of investors even outside Canada if he offers a sufficiently big reward for the money he borrows. The hon. gentleman competes with the municipalities and with the provinces for such funds.

Now on March 18, 1959, I referred to this subject just as the hon. member for Welland referred to it and again today. There has just been an attempt made to cut him down with a broadside that his statements were "wild". As reported on page 2027 of Hansard of March 18, 1959, I pointed out that the Minister of Finance was so desperate for funds he was offering special attractions, attractions which were of unusual value to people for whom a capital gain was important in relation to their income tax. Indeed, this attraction had a net result for those whose prevailing income tax rate was at least 50 per cent which was far beyond what the figures inserted by the Minister of Finance in a public advertisement might have led unsophisticated readers to imagine was the cost to the government of this borrowing.

I referred also to an other bond advertisement in the name of the Minister of Finance which appeared on February 16, 1959. In great big letters reference is made to one year plus one month bonds at nominally 2¾ per cent interest. As I say, the unknowing investor, the average citizen, might think, "We have a very competent Minister of Finance and even in these times of relatively high interest rates seemingly he is able to borrow money on our behalf at the rate of 2¾ per cent". But if we look at the fine print, we see why we have now this clause of the bill. Reference is made to the discount to certain lenders. This is all-important as I pointed out in the debate on March 18, 1959 when, as reported at page 2027 of Hansard, I said:

> In the minister's advertisements to the public the issue is referred to as 2¾ per cent, due April 1, 1960, issued at 97.90, a discount from 100 to yield on that basis 4.76 per cent—

That is ostensibly the effective rate of interest for everybody, not 2¾ per cent. I went on to say:

> I want to point out to the minister that the corporation tax is approximately 50 per cent and that a great number of the personal taxpayers who buy bonds are paying on the last portion of their income an income tax of at least 50 per cent. The result is that people in that category who buy these bonds would have to get a rate of 6.6 per cent on another bond sold at par in order to net the same. That is how attractive the minister has been forced to make his interest rates for his purposes.

Corrective action is being taken in this bill at this time after these things were pointed out to the minister, because the hon. gentleman found that he was not the only one who could play this game. There are other tax exempt borrowers, such as the provinces and the municipalities, and they are beating him at this game of gimmicks. So the minister is now plugging this loophole.

Following the experience of yesterday, I want only to show that the minister's attitude toward ordinary debate here has not changed over the years. Two years ago this was the kind of language used against me when I advanced in this chamber what I thought was an accurate and appropriate argument in debate on this subject. The minister referred to me, as reported at page 2027 of Hansard of March 18, 1959, in the following terms:

> Surely my hon. friend is not going to leave on the record a shockingly misleading and inaccurate statement of that kind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister's well known adjectives.

Mr. Benidickson: As the hon. member for Essex East says, these are adjectives which come from the mouth of the minister so frequently that we cannot, after constant repetition, believe that they appropriately apply time after time.

I could deal with another similar short term issue of June 15, 1959 but it is not my wish to burden the committee members. However, as I said yesterday, in June 1959 there was also given an effective interest rate to a lender in a 50 per cent income tax bracket over a term of about 13 months only which would have required, if the bonds had been issued at par and at a fully stated rate of interest, a real interest rate in excess of 8 per cent. I see it was 8.27 per cent. That is what taxpayers of this country paid for money at that time.

When this was brought to the attention of the citizens of our country as we felt it our duty to do the minister tried to mow us down saying that we made misleading, malicious and inaccurate statements.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think I ever said malicious.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a word very commonly used by the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. It is a Liberal word, an Essex East word.

Mr. Benidickson: I would be the first to acknowledge that I have tremendous respect for the mental capacity of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Though not for his judgment.

Mr. Benidickson: Indeed, sometimes not for his judgment as for example when he bought money at rates much beyond the rates which private corporations were paying for money at that time, but I suppose the lenders thought it was dandy.

As I said, I should be the first to acknowledge the industry and fundamental intelligence of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And his stubbornness.

Mr. Benidickson: But one of the features of that debate that surprised me most was when the Minister of Finance told the hon. member for Welland that he was indulging in wild statements; that he did not know what he was talking about and suggested that, in so far as the length of the term of the loan was concerned, it was an insignificant matter. The debate in this connection occurred on March 18, 1959.

In the course of his remarks on that occasion the minister suggested that selling bonds at a discount was not an unusual practice and that it had been engaged in by the previous administration. The minister gave a number of examples. However, the amazing thing was that due to lack of experience in these matters or for some other reason, the minister neglected to place importance upon the length of the term of each borrowing. I think the discount figures recited were 98.5, 99.5, 97 and 99 and in each case he used as illustrations terms that were related to longer issues with the result that, to a lender in a high income tax group it was only insignificant with respect to capital gains.

We have before us in clause 1 an attempt on the part of the minister to stop this form of competition in so far as other non-taxable governmental borrowers are concerned—the provinces and municipalities. I do not in any way object to the purposes of this clause. In fact, I suggested in 1959 that a dangerous trend had been established and I felt that the minister was making opportunities available to lenders that were affecting the people who pay the shot, the taxpayers. As I say, generally most taxpayers in this area are not sophisticated and failed to realize the true cost of the minister's borrowings. I welcome this clause because I realize the trend referred to could reach ridiculous extremes.

The minister did not refer to some of his own borrowings at terrific cost to the treasury. I allude to the cost to the treasury because normally the treasury would receive more income tax from certain lenders. However, if they could avoid the payment of the tax on the capital gains portion of their lending to the government over short periods like 13 months, then the treasury, of course, would suffer a loss. Because of these comments I felt duty bound to reply to the minister's statement of yesterday when he was just as disparaging—I quoted from the newspaper rather than Hansard—of the possibility that I might in some way be accurate. I wish to draw this to the attention of the committee and reassert that events have proven that the warnings which were given by me in 1959 as to the dangers of competition in this field of discounting bonds, and they were also given by the hon. member for Welland, have proven to be well founded. Indeed, the minister himself has come forward now and made sure that there will be limitations on the power of his competitors in the borrowing field, the provinces and municipalities, to do what he did in a most extravagant way since he assumed office as Minister of Finance.

Mr. McMillan: The minister asked me to give him one definite bond. He said I was wild in my reference to the fact that over 5 per cent would accrue to those people paying 50 per cent income tax. He said my statement that this amount would accrue to them after they had paid their income tax was wild.

On October 1, 1959, the minister advertised bonds at 3 per cent. He sold them at $94.65, to mature in 19 months. Afterwards, on the orders of the day, he said that $125 million worth of those bonds were sold. I would challenge the minister to say that the return is not over 5 per cent net to those corporations that paid 50 per cent income tax. He asked me to name one specific bond, and I am naming it.

Mr. Benidickson: While the minister is contemplating a reply to that question—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Over 5 per cent? But the hon. member was talking earlier this afternoon about 10 per cent, not 5 per cent. He used this extravagant expression this afternoon.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, when speaking earlier this afternoon, referred to what I said in this house on March 18, 1959. He told only part of the story because it will be recalled that when I was enumerating a list of issues by the former government at discounts, the hon. member for Ottawa West rose and said "Those are not short term". Then, I was able to give him another list of issues by the former government that were precisely of that nature, issues at a discount and with precisely the same effect that he was contending the issues of the present government were having at that time. The fact is—I repeat it, Mr. Chairman—that there has been only one issue in the past three years and nine months by the federal government that would have come within the scope of this present amendment had it been in effect at the time.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the minister has again used very positive and assertive language. He said that I questioned the length of the term and on March 18, 1959, in reply to me, he said that length of bond terms were "precisely" the same under the former government. I will allow the minister considerable leeway over his usual extreme language. In this context he uses the word "precisely". I will send him over my copy of Hansard debates of March 18, 1959. I indicated that the previous government had issued bonds at times at a discount as is the common practice. But I say, the minister used the word "precisely". Will he indicate to me where any of those issues of the previous government were on a basis of anything near a 13 months term?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have sent for the volume of Hansard. I think the hon. member is aware that I have not the volume with me.

Mr. Benidickson: No; but I promised to send over mine.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps the date may not be the same, but I was referring to the time two years ago when we had a two-day debate on a supply motion and this subject was discussed at some considerable length. I gave two extended lists of issues at discounts by the former government.

Mr. Benidickson: I agree with the hon. member's recollection of his presentation during a supply motion in 1959 of certain details respecting a lengthy list of issues of government bonds at less than par. My recollection is that on that occasion the minister recited the rate of interest and the issue price. On that occasion I was astonished that after two years in office, in answer to a question raised by the hon. member for Welland, the minister suggested that the question of the length of term of each lending was unimportant.

Mr. McMillan: The minister seems to accept my contention that 5 per cent after income tax is correct. This is one of the statements which he said was wild. He said that I referred to 10 per cent. I did not say that the government was paying 10 per cent. I said these people would receive from the minister the same amount as they would from a bond that paid 10 per cent if sold at par.

Mr. Benidickson: Just for the record, Mr. Chairman, because the minister has referred to it again today, at the resolution stage of the Income Tax Act amendments this year, the minister said as reported at page 2614 of Hansard:

> —out of all the federal bond issues in the last three years and eight months there is only one to which this resolution would have applied.

I have referred to two issues in 1959; one, I think, in June and one in March or April. Does the minister refer to either of those issues?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My statement was one made after a detailed study prior to the supplementary budget of December 20 of all the issues of the present government.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister does not recall the particular issue to which he referred on Hansard page 2614?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The date, no; I have not the list here at the present time.

Mr. Benidickson: It is public information. I will not press the minister for it here.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Tuition fees of students.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister indicate in what particular I seem to have been misinformed? My point was, briefly, that the bill as it now reads provides for assistance for the year 1961 only. I had suggested that since the academic year began in the fall of 1960, the provision of benefits should run from that time. The minister seems to suggest that I had not properly understood what the amendment offers, and I should be very happy to be shown where I was wrong.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. Subclause (2) of clause 2 makes it quite clear that the proposed new subsection (1) of section 11 as amended is applicable to the 1961 and subsequent taxation years. When this matter was discussed on an earlier occasion the question was raised as to payments made by university students in the fall of 1960 of their fees for the 1960-61 academic year. As the resolution appeared in its original form such payments would not have qualified for the intended benefits, but the amendment does open the way now to a student who did pay his 1960-61 academic year fees in September, 1960, let us say, to deduct in his 1961 taxation year that portion of the fees which was paid in respect of the period commencing January 1, 1961.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Where does this clause say that? It is clearly stated that the clause is applicable to 1961 and subsequent taxation years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member must look further in the clause. In line 28 he will find the words, "in respect of a period not exceeding 12 months commencing in the year . . ."

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Certainly if the minister intends this to apply to 1960 that is very acceptable but I am simply pointing out that the clause does not say that. It is true that in line 28 it says, "in respect of a period not exceeding 12 months commencing in the year", but surely that is qualified by subclause 2 which says that this clause is applicable to the 1961 and subsequent taxation years.

When the bill is passed and some student will go and apply for relief, he will point out what the minister may have said in the house. The tax collector, as will the courts, will not interpret this clause on the basis of the language used by the minister in the house but on the basis of the literal meaning of the words as they appear in the clause. The clause as it is now drawn does not warrant the conclusion which the minister has reached. The only way that can be done is to say that the clause is applicable to 1960-61 and subsequent taxation years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has not been following me today with his usual clarity of thought. My remarks are consonant with the provisions of the bill. There will be no difference found between them and the plain language of the bill. The bill does not provide tax relief in respect of the calendar year 1960, but it does offer tax relief for periods commencing January 1, 1961.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): However, in relation to payments that were made in 1960 in respect of fees for a period commencing on or after January 1, 1961, the amendment introduced in committee of ways and means permits a student to have the benefit of deduction in respect of fees paid in relation to periods following January 1, 1961, notwithstanding that the fees may have been paid prior to that date.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the minister that I am speaking without any belligerence. However, I should like him to indicate to the extent he can, the consideration he may have given in preparing his budget proposals to alternatives so far as the actual mechanics are concerned. I think we all approve of the further step he has taken which goes beyond what was initiated by the previous administration to try to provide additional tax exemptions to assist parents and also to encourage students to remain at college.

The federal government cannot enter the field of education directly but this has seemed to be an area in which the federal government can make some contribution by way of encouragement along these lines. I have no doubt that the minister and his officials have given consideration to alternatives. However, I was greatly impressed in reading last month an editorial in an issue of a magazine or newspaper called "Labour" which is distributed to all railroad workers in the United States and also to the members of the international railway brotherhoods in Canada. The editorial comments upon proposals similar to those of the minister today which were advanced in the United States congress. It gives an example which I put before the minister because he will recognize its practical value and the fact that it can be applied to the Canadian situation. The editorial goes on to point out that there are flaws in connection with proposals for tax relief for students in college and has this to say in part:

> A $1,500 deduction would save $300 taxes for a family in the 20 per cent income tax bracket. The higher a family's income, the more taxes it would save by the deduction, up to $1,305 saving for a family in the 91 per cent tax bracket.

Here is the point that I think has significance for all of us if we are concerned about making sure that those who need help most are likely to be helped through the mechanism of income tax at the federal level where other opportunities to assist are limited. We do make grants to universities, and the desirability of doing this has been challenged somewhat in some quarters from the point of view of whether or not it was an encroachment on provincial rights. We all have knowledge of this argument. If the federal field is limited, are we looking after those whose need is greatest?

The editorial goes on to say that if, instead of a tax deduction, a credit of $500 a year were offered or any other fixed sum as a deduction from the tax of the parent or the student this would be much more consequential so far as actual value to the neediest is concerned. One realizes, of course, that while the provision before us would be of some value to the students it could be of no possible value to the parent in a family whose numbers were sufficiently large and where the over-all earnings were so modest that after deductions the parent either would have to pay no taxes at all or would not pay income tax at an important percentage rate. Therefore the relief to such a parent, who might need help most, would not be too important under the proposal before us compared with some form of fixed lump sum deduction.

I am sure the minister has given consideration to these matters and perhaps he could indicate to us what the difficulties are. It is quite obvious that the parent with a very large income really does not need to be encouraged financially to send his children to college. Under this legislation he gets the benefit of a much larger dollar value in respect of tuition fees and other deductible expenses than the man who is not paying any taxes at all or is paying taxes at such a low rate that 13 or 14 per cent of $1,500 is not nearly as important as 75 per cent or more on the same amount of tuition fee expenditure to a wealthy person.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wondered if the minister proposed to reply.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To be brief I would say that any amendment of this kind of course does not apply to all taxpayers but only to those who qualify within its provisions. This provision is intended to provide tax relief to the student who would otherwise be taxable, and will permit him to deduct the tuition fees which he pays from his income in determining whether he is taxable or not. In the case of a parent of a dependent student it means that the amount of the tuition fees paid will be taken into account in determining whether the student is still a dependent, that is to say, whether he has an income in excess of $950 or not. If, after deducting the tuition fees, the amount of income is below $950 then that student still qualifies as a dependent under the provisions of the act, and the parent in that case is entitled to the full $500 exemption provided. I think the situation is quite clear, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I regret that it is not clear to me and it may be my fault. The minister has been looking over at me with some amusement and on that account I feel very humble in raising the matter again because it may be in this particular instance that I am more obtuse than I normally am. In any event, because there is an important principle involved here, I venture to raise it again.

The minister may have provided for this in some other way but he has not convinced me that he has any authority for the conclusion that he has reached. I have looked around this chamber and asked at least two others whose mental I.Q. I am sure approximates that of the Minister of Finance, even if my own might fall far short, and their conclusion is the same as mine that this measure deals not with the taxpayer who may have dependents but deals rather with the taxpayer who himself is a student. The question I have raised is simply this; this measure provides, with respect to fees paid by students beginning in January, 1961 for a period of 12 months, a relief to that student. My complaint was with regard to those fees paid by the taxpayer student for the full academic term and this measure, as now drawn, does not warrant the conclusion which the minister has given.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I suggest you have misinterpreted the conclusion. I will say this again as simply as I can; there is no change created by this amendment with respect to the 1960 taxation year. The change that was made in the original resolution made it possible for the student who in 1960 paid his tuition fees in full for the academic year 1960-61, to have the benefit of a deduction in respect of those fees applicable to the portion of the academic year commencing January 1, 1961.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am glad the minister now agrees with me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is all I have said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The original proposal I made was, why did the minister not extend this provision for the full academic year beginning in the fall of 1960?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, the reason—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I finish. I am now glad to see that the difficulty of comprehension did not reside with the member for Essex East, but perhaps because of the confusion and all the concerns and preoccupations of the Minister of Finance, it was he who had not understood what apparently all of us now admit is a very simple point; and that is that tuition fees paid in the academic year 1960 should be embraced by this measure. I will tell the minister that I have had a considerable number of representations made to me by students, most of them attending the university in my own city and many of them married. The suggestion I make if adopted would provide them with some assistance, that is, if this measure applied to fees that they either have paid or that are owing for the full term. Some of the students will graduate in May and consequently the provision "not exceeding 12 months" will give them no relief whatsoever. It applies only to those students who will be at the university from January, 1961 until December, 1961. Many of the students will graduate this year and the plea that I am making to the minister is that, while this is a good provision—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Thank you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and will assist during this period of the emergency of unemployment, many students—I am glad to see that the Minister of Labour applauds this today. This, in an indirect way, provides small relief to many people who are very seriously affected by unemployment. Why does the minister not extend this benefit to the period of the full term so that those who are taxpayers, many of them married, and attending university, can get this relief?

The government has embarked upon a delayed program of vocational guidance, delayed by the Minister of Labour's procrastination, and finally he has accepted our recommendations over the years—

Mr. Starr: You never had any recommendations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says we never have had any. We have made these recommendations to the Minister of Labour repeatedly while he sat in his seat ignoring this question of unemployment.

Mr. Starr: Quit laughing when you say that.

The Chairman: Order. May I suggest that the exchange between the hon. member for Essex East and the Minister of Labour is not in order.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think you are right. I was simply going to say that if the Minister of Labour had the equanimity and the serenity of the Minister of Finance he would not provoke these outbursts.

I appeal to the Minister of Finance, now that he and I do understand this question, to extend the benefits of this provision for the full term so that the 12 months covered in line 28 would run from September or early October to the end of the academic year in the spring of 1961. If the minister would do that he would win, I am sure, the undying affection of thousands of students who find it difficult to follow him now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the hon. member now understands the effect of that clause. He attributed some element of misunderstanding to me and I hope I have not added to his confusion because that is the last thing I would wish to do. I thought the only thing I did not understand in this situation was the mental process that led him into such confusion in regard to the clear provisions of the clause. I have known the day when he was much clearer in following these explanations of the terms of these clauses than perhaps he has been today.

Let me now deal with the point in substance that he has raised. With respect to any tax change there must be a starting date. In this particular case the budget was introduced on December 20, 1960 and therefore the logical starting date was January 1, 1961. We are dealing with tax years and it is the calendar year that is the taxation year. It is not the academic year; it is the taxation year.

The hon. member has now taken note of the fact that fees paid in 1960 in respect of the academic period commencing January 1, 1961, can be deducted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I am clear on that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As to students who were in attendance in 1960 and paid their fees in the autumn of that year, if those students continue in attendance throughout the calendar year 1961 they will of course qualify for the academic fees they have paid for the full year 1961; that is to say, the two portions, the portion paid in respect to the term from January to May in the one academic year and the second portion from September to December in the following academic year.

With respect to those students who will be graduating in the spring of 1961, obviously they will qualify under this clause only for that portion of the fees paid for the 1960-61 academic year in respect of the period commencing January 1, 1961.

There must be a starting date and that is the reason why the particular date is chosen. Obviously the proper date to choose here was January 1, 1961, which was then within 12 days of the date of the budget and marked the beginning of the new taxation year.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, before the minister rose I intended to rise very briefly in support of what I thought was a very eloquent and earnest plea by the hon. member for Essex East. I listened carefully to the minister's explanation. We all understand that there is a calendar year and there must be a starting date. However, I think this is a somewhat different circumstance than applies to most taxation fields. I think the hon. member for Essex East was quite sound when he pointed out that those students who graduate in May this year will only enjoy partial benefit under this measure.

These young people will be going out into the world to seek employment, and so on—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And these students are themselves taxpayers.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is a very good point and I am glad the hon. member for Essex East has mentioned it. I do ask the minister to reconsider his decision in this respect. I think that under these circumstances, when we are considering giving some relief to these students, this amendment is very necessary and very worth while. The members of this group are very pleased to see this clause in the bill, but I would earnestly ask the minister to permit an amendment to the clause to provide for the inclusion of fees that are not included at the present time. I refer to fees incurred from last September to the end of the year.

I fully appreciate the minister's argument about the starting date, the calendar year and so on. If I recollect correctly, we have not previously had a situation of this kind in any discussion on the Income Tax Act. These are special circumstances that surround this request for an amendment to the clause.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, when you begin to go back on new legislation you have the same problem of drawing the line. What we are asked to do now is move the date back to September, 1960. What about those students who graduated in the spring of 1960 and paid fees in respect of the term in 1960 from January until May? If they were left out, they would have the same reason to complain.

You can go back further. Those students who graduated the previous year could make out the same case. It becomes necessary, under these circumstances, to draw the line. There will always be some people who will be included and some who will be excluded in new legislation of this kind. That will apply no matter what date we choose. There will always be those who made their payments in an earlier period. That is inescapable in legislation of this kind.

Mr. Herridge: I am sure the minister would have the support of the whole opposition if he accepted this amendment. We recognize the validity of his argument in this respect, but I think he would have the support of the whole opposition if he would accept the amendment on that basis, because it is a reasonable request.

You cannot go back year after year, but when you are considering the student year, I agree with the argument of the hon. member for Essex East that the measure should be amended in this way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am so encouraged by the support of the hon. member for Kootenay West that I think there may still be some hope of impressing the Minister of Finance.

I agree with the minister that there has to be a starting date, but surely the proper starting date is not the middle of the academic year but the beginning of the academic year. The beginning of the academic year is in the fall. The minister has made this measure start in the middle of the year. I am sure that if this amendment were accepted the loss of revenue to the crown would not be very great.

Clause 2 provides for this kind of relief extending for 12 months in the year. Subclause 2 provides that this clause is applicable to the 1961 and subsequent taxation years—it is going to extend for many taxation years—and time being what it is, surely it would not be a matter of inconvenience to the crown for the measure to begin at the proper time. As I have said, the proper time is not the middle of the academic year but the beginning of the academic year.

We are not asking for a privilege to be afforded to a select group in the country. University education in Canada today is not being pursued as it was in the days of the Minister of Finance and myself, on a somewhat restricted basis. In our universities today we have men who are attending university and working at the same time. Many students are married. The students who came to see me were men who were earning their way by working in one of the Windsor plants. Some of them were married.

It is a very difficult assignment for this type of student to obtain an education under these circumstances. I know the particular financial situation of people like that. The hon. member for Kootenay West, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and myself are making a plea for a very substantial number of people. We hope that the minister will be consistent and will apply this measure, as he said, at the proper period. The proper period is surely not the middle of the academic year but the beginning of the academic year. If the minister would do that I am sure he would be giving needed assistance to a large body of students in this country, particularly at a time when we are trying to encourage men to become trained in order to maintain our standard of living and to raise it still higher. This is all part and parcel of the process of trying to meet unemployment and the like. This does not seem to be an unreasonable request.

Once again I appeal to the minister, who knows the value of this kind of training, who received it himself in circumstances that indicated his own capacity for acquiring an education in the face of difficulties. I ask the minister to remember his student days, the days when he walked across the campus of the University of Toronto with holes in his pants and his stockings. I ask him to remember his own example, and I hope this will be the means by which he accepts the strong plea made by those on this side of the chamber.

This is the kind of occasion when the minister should swallow his pride. He should not be afraid to admit that he has made a mistake. This is the kind of admission that would endear the hon. gentleman to the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that nothing the Minister of Finance could possibly do could have the effect of endearing him to the hon. member for Essex East more than is the case at this present time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do like you.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not recall the holes that the hon. member speaks about. I think I was decently, if modestly, attired in those days.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You could not see from behind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have given the reasons in this matter. I can add to those reasons only that after the resolution was introduced on December 20 there were representations from various student bodies and from some hon. members of this house. I recall, for instance, what was said by the hon. member for Regina, and others. The burden of these representations in this respect was that we should permit the inclusion in the benefit of the clause of payments made by some students in 1960 in respect of that portion of the academic year 1960-61 commencing after January 1, 1961. That was the burden of the representations we received from the student bodies, and effect was given to those representations in the amendment which I introduced into the resolution in the committee of ways and means. It is now reflected in this clause.

I am glad that the merits of this new proposal are so widely recognized that hon. members who have not even raised the question in the past, now think so well of the idea that they would like to see it extended backwards.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to ask the minister a question. Supposing a student starts attending college this coming fall, in September, and has paid his fee, say, $400. Will he be able to charge that $400 against income tax in 1961 or must it be allocated over the number of months he goes to college?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In such a case the student could take the full benefit in the year 1961 or he could take part of it in 1962 if the payment was made in respect of the academic year 1961-62. But he could not have it twice.

Mr. Benidickson: I wish to suggest to the minister that he might be able to find an easy way around this difficulty. There is already precedent in the Income Tax Act. I refer to the language which relates to medical expense deductions. There is not a direct tie-up between expenses incurred in the tax-paying calendar year such as the minister suggests is generally necessary. It is stated there that the reduction for medical expenses shall be within the period of 12 months ended in the tax year and not included in the calculation of a deduction for medical expenses for a previous year.

We all know that normally the academic year in this country does not coincide with the calendar year. I am confident the minister will have to make a change to take cognizance of this fact in the future and I suggest that we should let this section stand until we have dealt with the remainder. I should like the minister to consider whether or not he ought to look further at the possibilities in the light of this precedent relating to deductions in respect of medical expenses which, though they confine the deduction to expenditures incurred in a 12-month period they do not necessarily relate to the actual 12 months of the calendar year for which a person has filed an income tax statement.

Mr. Herridge: I think the agile mind of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has helped the committee to arrive at a solution to this difficulty. I may say that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Kootenay West seem to be three hearts that beat as one on this issue. I think this is a very worth-while suggestion. I think the argument raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is a valid one and I should like to hear the minister's counter argument. I do not see why the minister should be unable to take action along the lines suggested.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for his compliment, though I do not think my mind is as agile as it should have been on this point. I recall now another precedent which I think might be helpful, where deductions are not related to the calendar year. I am thinking of the deduction which is made possible for self-employed persons in connection with savings plans for the period after their retirement, plans made on a basis resembling payments into a pension fund. My recollection is that such self-employed persons are able to make those contributions without strict restriction to the calendar year. I believe they had an additional leeway of two months—the months of January and February in the year following the calendar tax year—in which to make that contribution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The point raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River does not at all touch the problem which has been raised. The point he is raising is really in support of the answer I gave the hon. member for Welland, who asked about the applications of payments made once the clause comes into effect. I pointed out that this new clause extends to a student the benefit of being able to divide the payment between the calendar years embraced in part within the academic year.

This does not touch at all the question of the starting date. There still has to be a starting date and whatever date is chosen we shall find some qualifying after that date and others excluded, just before that date. That is inseparable from the legislation of this kind. We have to fix a date, and we have made the date conform with the first day of this present calendar year. That was a sound and proper date having regard to the date of the introduction of the budget, and the change we have made in this clause in favour of students in the academic year 1960-61 is made in full harmony with the representations addressed to us by the student bodies of this country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have heard a suggestion from the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River which I hope the Minister of Finance will accept, namely, to allow this clause to stand so that we may make some progress with the rest of the measure before us. Perhaps the minister would wish to think this over. If, after reflection, he is still of the same mind he could tell us so but I would suggest that this clause should stand at the moment in order that we could make some progress.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should very much like to see the committee make some progress, although I cannot accept the suggestion which has just been made. We have already spent three quarters of an hour discussing this question. Nothing new has arisen in the debate; these matters have all been considered previously. I should certainly like to see some progress made so that we might pass this bill and give effect to the benefits for students which it contains.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister himself may not be impressed by the arguments which have been made. He has said repeatedly that there must be a starting date and our suggestions as to the date differ. This is a question involving executive decision. The minister makes recommendations to his colleagues, and they have as much responsibility and as much right to pass on a suggestion of this kind as has the Minister of Finance himself. In the interest of a quick passage of this bill I recommend once more that the minister should allow this clause to stand. He would then have the opportunity to discuss it with his colleagues and see whether they do not agree with the representations which have been made from this side. The fact that the minister does not agree is no reason for believing that there may not be others in the cabinet who would take the position put forward from this side of the chamber, and if I judge correctly the temper of this committee there are very few members supporting the minister today who do not share strongly the views which we have put forward on this question this afternoon.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to support the proposal made by the hon. member for Essex East. When he referred to the silent sympathy with his arguments felt by members supporting the government I looked to my left and happened to see the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. If I read that hon. member's countenance aright he has been very sympathetic to the arguments used by the hon. member for Essex East. Perhaps if we defer consideration of this clause there may be enough young Conservatives down at the Progressive Conservative organization who will express their views and bring this matter further to the attention of the minister and his colleagues. I think the suggestion is a good one. By delay, we might make some further progress.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member brought up my name in this debate. Let me say that I heartily concur in what the Minister of Finance said. I only hope we can make speedy progress and pass this legislation which is for the benefit of all Canadian students. I see no reason for there being any delay.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Part payments.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, would the minister indicate again the number of taxpaying corporations that are in the area for which a change is provided here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the hon. member not referring to clause 5 rather than clause 4?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. The point I was going to make with respect to clause 4 is this. The minister has in front of him some tax experts and I should appreciate hearing their comment through the minister concerning the analysis of the baby budget published in the Journal of the Canadian tax foundation, issue of February, 1961, in which an interesting observation was made by a partner in the well-known accounting firm of Price, Waterhouse and Company, Mr. W. C. Shakespeare.

Mr. Shakespeare points out that the proposals under clause 4 will be reduced in some measure by the amendments that were made with respect to associated companies in the main budget in March of 1960. Would the minister care to comment in that connection?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. member has the right clause here. There is nothing in clause 4 that relates to associated companies.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Idem.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to revert to the question I had in my notes made some time ago where I had it under numerals that referred to the original resolutions rather than to the clauses of the bill recently presented.

In clause 5 reference is made to the so-called small business corporations. Would the minister please indicate how many corporations might be affected and benefit as a result of the reduction in the tax rate from 50 per cent to 21 per cent which of course includes the calculation for the old age security tax. I have before me notes I made some time ago which indicate that perhaps 55,000 out of 65,000 tax-reporting businesses have profits under $35,000. Would that be a reasonable report?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member will refer to my budget speech, as reported at page 1007 of Hansard of December 20, he will find I dealt with the matter thus:

> The present proposal to enlarge this bracket by a further $10,000 to $35,000—

That is, the income bracket to which the low rate applies. I continue:

> —will extend the benefit of the low rate of tax to an additional 4,000 companies. Out of approximately 62,000 corporate income tax payers 55,000 have incomes below $35,000, and will in future pay no more than 21 per cent.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Pension trust or corporation.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, could the minister indicate to what extent his investigation suggests that Canadian pension funds as they exist now without this legislation do not already comply with what is proposed? Would not practically all pension funds in Canada at the moment be set up on a basis providing that about 90 per cent of their income is derived from sources in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is no precise information available on that point.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that pension funds now pay no income tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct, if they are registered.

Mr. McMillan: My question is this. Suppose a pension fund did not meet these investment requirements. What income tax would they be called upon to pay?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the registered trust or registered pension fund does not qualify, it would then be a matter of the tax falling on the trustee as an individual.

Mr. Benidickson: A further question, Mr. Chairman. The minister I know is very familiar with what used to be called the blue pension book issued under the name of the Minister of National Revenue which had a connection with qualifications for certification or acceptance—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Registration.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, registration. What is the present equivalent of the book with the form of which I was more familiar three or four years ago? Is there still a publication of this kind made available by the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The blue book to which the hon. member refers ran out of print a while ago and has not been reprinted. There was an information bulletin put out for a limited period but it was withdrawn. As I pointed out in our discussion last year as the matter now stands the blue book is simply out of print.

Mr. Benidickson: What does a new organization setting up a pension fund do in the most direct and simple way to ascertain governmental views as to the qualifications of their proposals that might result in the least possible tax burden in so far as the pension fund is concerned?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The pension trustees in question simply make application to the department for registration of their plan as they have had to do ever since the legislation came into effect.

Mr. Benidickson: But there is no explanatory book available at the moment similar to the former blue book?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at present, no.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister said the income tax burden would fall to the responsibility of the trustee in connection with a pension fund if the investment requirements were not met.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the income of the fund will be income in the hands of the trustee unless it qualifies under the terms of the act. The method for qualification for exemption under the act is quite clear and simple, and this bill deals with one requirement in that respect.

Mr. McMillan: Would they then pay 21 per cent if those requirements were not met?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would depend, of course, on whether the trustee were a corporation or an individual.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7.

Mr. Benidickson: I rather imagine that the officials of the department have given some thought to what results might flow from this new legislation respecting mutual funds. Have these funds, to the knowledge of the department, been investing in sizeable percentages in foreign securities?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I do not think one can say that, Mr. Chairman. Some of these companies do publish their statements, but we have not information from them all in this respect, and I cannot be precise in an estimate in this regard.

Mr. Benidickson: Has the minister given consideration to the drafting of this clause? It seems to make reference to revenue. Gross revenue percentage figures are used, not a percentage of assets invested abroad. It seems to me it could be possible in a deliberate way for such organizations to invest perhaps rather heavily in no-dividend paying foreign growth stock. As I see it, that would not come within the compass of the word "revenue". The actual investments might be made in foreign securities that are non-dividend paying. Has that been given consideration?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, it was given consideration. We have to think of all these changes on the basis of income. There is a theoretical element in the view put forward by the hon. member, but I think it is a practical view that is contained in the clause.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Associated corporations.

Mr. Benidickson: We refer to taxes on associated corporations. I have forgotten the difference in the tax rate with respect to utility corporations engaged in electrical energy, gas and steam business, based on whether they are described as having class B income or class A income. What is the significance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Corporations deriving more than 50 per cent of their gross revenue from the sale of electrical energy, gas or steam, are subject to special rates of tax provided by section 85 of the act.

Mr. Benidickson: You are calling these clauses in the bill very rapidly, Mr. Chairman. I have a reference here to clause 4, in the discussion of which I was told that I was perhaps not relevant. I raise now a question with respect to associated corporations. The amendments made in the fall of 1960 reduced what, on the face of it, might, appear to be a fairly general and broad advantage to companies whose net incomes are in excess of $25,000 and under $35,000.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, all that this subclause does is to extend to the associated corporations herein described, the benefit of the increase from $25,000 to $35,000 of the corporate income that now attracts only the lower rate of tax. The amendment substituted the figure $35,000 for $25,000 and the figures $6,300 for $4,500. This, of course, is consequential on the amendment made by an earlier clause.

Mr. Benidickson: For the record, in reference to this particular clause, I am simply going to give the committee the benefit of expert comment in connection with it. I refer again to the Price Waterhouse statement in the Canadian Tax Journal. So far as I am concerned I am hoping we can conclude our discussion by six o'clock and if the minister will be patient I think we can do it. The statement reads:

> On the other hand, the changes in the rules relating to associated companies made earlier in 1960 will limit this benefit to a smaller number of taxpayers than previously enjoyed the lower rate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of course, the reasons for the 1960 amendment were clearly understood at that time. The legislation that had existed up to 1960 had evidently attracted a proliferation of those associated companies, each seeking to qualify for the low rate of tax. And, for reasons which commended themselves to parliament, the amendment of 1960 was introduced and adopted. What we are doing here is simply carrying through the consequential amendments in regard to the application of the reduced rate to the income.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister gave statistics as to the number of tax-paying corporations which might benefit and be in this profit area, between $25,000 and $35,000 and about which he directed my attention to his budget speech of December 20. Were his figures then based on statistics available prior to or after the budget of March, 1960, which perhaps reduced the number of associated companies which could actually benefit at the lower tax rate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of course there were no statistics available in respect of 1960, because we did not have the 1960 returns in at that time, but this is the statistical information available as of 1959.

On clause 9.

Mr. Benidickson: This clause contains one of those phrases which formerly and invariably aroused the curiosity and sometimes the excitement of the Minister of Finance when he was sitting on the opposition side. Having been well schooled in the careful supervision of these bills that he used to provide, I do feel obliged to ask a question about clause (1) (ii) (B), which gives notice that certain regulations are likely to be prescribed by order in council, which used to be a bad term to use in legislation. What are the intentions and requirements of the government, as the minister sees them now, in utilizing this opportunity which the statute would provide to give the cabinet in council the right to make an order or a regulation under this clause?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, these words "prescribed by regulation" apply only to the words "any international organization or agency". This was intended to have application to the purchase of securities by organizations such as the international bank for reconstruction and development. This is in keeping with the practice in, I think, most if not all of the countries that are members of the international bank. As I have said, in this respect we simply propose to follow the practice that has prevailed in other countries that are members of such organizations as the international bank.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, you realize we have several pages of this clause which could be passed too rapidly. We are now dealing with clause 9. This clause involves the underlying principles of increasing withholding taxes on bonds and stipulates that the new taxes will not be retroactive—and I agree with this policy—but will apply only after notice as given by the minister in his supplementary budget speech on December 20. I am led to believe, however, that this is going to result in two ranges of prices and quotations for similar securities in the investment market. There will be quotations with respect to pre-December 20 and post-December 20 issues which have the same nominal rate of interest and length of term. One will not bear a tax and the other will bear a tax.

This is a rather technical matter and I am not going to burden the committee with it because I do not understand some of the intricacies myself. There will ensue a great distinction between the advantages of the pre-December 20 issues and the post-December 20 issues so far as certain types of borrowers are concerned, particularly those abroad living in areas where income tax is not paid, and I am given to understand that difficulty and confusion will arise as a result of this situation.

In other words, we know that hitherto there has been a general level of quotations on issues of the federal government, which quotations are based on interest rate and the term or time for payment of the principal but now, irrespective of these basic factors there will be a different set of quotations relating to bonds issued before December 20 compared with those issued after December 20 even though they may mature at the same time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, every issue is quoted separately in the market as to its market value from time to time, so that I do not think the point can arise except in a theoretical or academic sense.

The only situation where I could see a problem arising would be if some issuing authority decided after December 20 to issue more bonds of the same maturity and with precisely the same terms as an issue prior to December 20, in other words, to enlarge the existing issue. The point might arise there but otherwise I think it can be no more than an academic question.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10.

Mr. Benidickson: This clause refers to the increase in the withholding tax with respect to dividends paid to a non-resident corporation. The minister has recently returned from Washington. I take it that difficulties were not substantial or perhaps were non-existent with respect to the tax treaty with the United States and these income tax changes. On the other hand, we have a number of tax treaties with other countries in respect of which the decision taken by the minister in his supplementary budget last December would not result in an automatic change in the tax arrangements on a reciprocal basis by the other party. What countries are in that category where the implementation of this clause will not be effective until further negotiations take place with respect to the existing tax treaties? In the case of the United States they took action automatically and their action cannot be regarded as retaliatory at all. It was simply foreseen in the setting up of the tax treaty that in this context if one country made any such move the other country would automatically do so and could do so without in any way abridging the basic purport of the treaty.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have tax treaties specifying the rate of withholding tax with the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Sweden, Ireland, Denmark and Finland. Agreements have been negotiated with Belgium and Norway but these have not yet been ratified by parliament.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—Income and capital combined.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment to clause 11 which I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Labour, to move, seconded by the Minister of Forestry.

Mr. Starr: I move, seconded by the Minister of Forestry:

That Bill C-73, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be amended by adding thereto, immediately after line 40 on page 9 thereof, the following:

"(3a) Where a person resident in Canada has, at any time after March 16, 1961, sold to a non-resident person a treasury bill issued by Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province, that proportion of the amount by which

(a) the amount payable on the maturity of the bill, exceeds

(b) the price for which the bill was sold by the issuer (or if more than one such bill was included in the same issue, the product obtained by multiplying the average price per $100 for which the bills so included were sold by the issuer by the number of multiples of $100 in the amount mentioned in paragraph (a)), that

(d) the number of days in the whole of that period, shall, for the purpose of this part, be deemed to be a payment of interest made by the person resident in Canada to the non-resident person at the time of the sale of the bill to the non-resident person, except that where it is established that, at any subsequent time before the maturity of the bill, the non-resident person has sold the bill to a person resident in Canada, the amount of the tax under this part that the non-resident person is liable to pay in respect thereof shall be deemed, for the purpose of subsection (7) of section 123, to be that proportion of the tax that he would otherwise have been liable to pay in respect thereof that the number of days in the period commencing with the day the bill was sold to him and ending with the day the bill was sold by him is of the number determined under paragraph (c).

(3) subsection (3) does not apply in respect of a payment to a non-resident person under any obligation in respect of which that person is liable to pay tax under this part by virtue of subsection (3a)."

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have furnished copies of this amendment today to hon. members of the opposition parties. It is an amendment relating to the sale of treasury bills. There is one change in the text of the proposed clause compared with the copy I gave the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. In the second line of the proposed subclause 3(a) he has the date "March 15, 1961" in his copy. It should be today, of course, and accordingly in the amendment which has been handed to the chairman it is March 16, 1961. Unless the chairman wishes to read the amendment first, I should like to say a word by way of explanation. The amendment is very long and perhaps it is not necessary to read it. The explanation is to this effect.

This amendment, which adds a new subsection to section 108 of the act, is necessary to facilitate the collection of the non-resident withholding tax on interest in the case of treasury bills sold to non-residents.

Treasury bills are generally sold without a provision to pay interest in the usual way. Instead, the lender is remunerated by receiving an amount on redemption which is in excess of the purchase price of the security.

This remuneration is in lieu of interest and should be taxed as interest. It has always been taxed when received by a resident of Canada but before December 20, 1960, it was not taxed when received by a non-resident because the non-resident withholding tax did not apply to interest paid on government of Canada securities.

This amendment provides that when a resident of Canada sells a treasury bill to a non-resident the non-resident shall be deemed to have received a payment of interest. The amount of interest he shall be deemed to have received shall be equal to the proportion of the difference between the original issue price and the face value of the bill, that is, the proportion of the original discount, which is attributable to the unexpired portion of the term of the bill remaining at the time it is purchased by the non-resident.

Since this amendment deems interest to have been paid to the non-resident at the time the non-resident purchased a treasury bill the Canadian resident who sells the treasury bill will be obliged to withhold the 15 per cent non-resident withholding tax on the amount that is deemed to be interest.

If at some subsequent time before maturity the non-resident sells the treasury bill back to a Canadian resident the non-resident will be eligible for a refund of that part of the tax he has paid which is attributable to the unexpired portion of the term of the bill.

In other words, in this case the interest deemed to have been earned is prorated in respect of the period that the bill is held by these several holders.

Mr. Benidickson: I cannot recall the definitions as contained in the act but when the minister refers to a Canadian resident does that mean, so far as treasury bills are concerned, a government, in other words, a non-taxpaying borrower via treasury bills? Is it only a government that issues treasury bills or would a commercial organization issue treasury bills as well?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not aware that any treasury bills are issued by corporations or by anyone other than the government in this country.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 11 as amended agreed to.

On clause 12.

Mr. Benidickson: Clause 12 as I recall involves some amendment since it was originally brought forward in December, with proper notice to the house in Votes and Proceedings under a policy I have given the minister credit for initiating in the past. Regarding new 110B (1)(b)(iii), is this a right that is already available to the executive under the section that is being repealed? While we are discussing this portion perhaps I could ask a question with respect to (2) of the new 110B (d) which reads:

> a corporation that was incorporated before the first day of July, 1867—

It is my understanding that there will exist perhaps some embarrassment regarding some foreign companies operating through an unincorporated subsidiary in Canada. I am thinking of the Hudson's Bay Company. It enjoys a very ancient and unusual charter. Would that company find any special difficulty in attempting to incorporate a Canadian company at this time? As I understand it, these foreign corporations who operate branch businesses without incorporation in Canada, pay full Canadian taxes, federal and provincial. I understand this new tax will be paid after the normal full federal and provincial taxes have been deducted, and if so, the tax would not be, for example, simply 15 per cent added to the present federal corporation tax of 50 per cent but would be based on the formula which I have outlined and perhaps would be nearer a rate of 57½ per cent instead of the present tax of 50 per cent. Is that perhaps the practical result for the majority of such branch businesses in Canada owned by companies abroad which do not have incorporated subsidiaries in Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The 15 per cent is calculated on that portion of taxable income remaining after the regular income tax has been deducted. This will not amount to 57½ per cent but will be something less than that by reason of the lower rate of tax to which the first $35,000 of taxable income is subject.

In one or two United States newspaper articles appearing after the budget there was a complete misapprehension on this score. Some articles referred to a tax of 65 per cent. These reports were quite wrong. So far as the regulations referred to by the hon. member are concerned—110B (1)(a)(b)(iii)—they are of course not available yet and cannot be settled or promulgated until this legislation has been passed and receives royal assent.

Mr. Benidickson: Regarding the question I raised with respect to (2) (d), am I right in thinking that this is an amendment that was advanced after the budget resolutions of December 20 and perhaps was advanced to meet some of the representations that were made by this rather unusual company, the Hudson's Bay Company?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Clause 12 agreed to.

Clause 13 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time, now?

Mr. Benidickson: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member allow this bill to be read now so that it can go to the other place?

Mr. Benidickson: Has the other place any particular need of this bill now? I know this is not debatable, Mr. Speaker, but I would prefer to have an opportunity to reflect on the rather long amendment which the minister will agree, was only introduced this afternoon, almost three months after presentation of his supplementary budget on December 20.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $911,098.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Chairman, in speaking on the estimates for the Department of Agriculture I should first of all like to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister on his new portfolio. I am sure he will continue the good work which he carried out in his former portfolio, with which I was closely connected as a result of my interest in national parks.

I am sure that agriculture all across Canada will receive the proper and deserved attention of the new minister. He has already made some notable strides in the department. We in Alberta particularly have witnessed the massive sales of grain which are going to be of direct benefit to the farmers in our province, for which we thank him. We thank the minister and the former minister of trade and commerce for their initiative and ability in getting out and selling our grain.

At this time I wish to touch briefly on some of the major points in our national agricultural policy. I want to mention our crop insurance scheme. We in western Canada have heard some opposition to this scheme, but we have not heard anything objective.

I should like to suggest through you, sir, that some of the M.L.A.'s in the Alberta legislature would be better off to start considering a crop insurance scheme, rather than making speeches condemning the government for this, that and the other thing. We have initiated a crop insurance scheme which will be of benefit particularly to the farmers in my area. I hope the Alberta legislature will give serious consideration to implementing such a scheme in our province.

Then, I want to talk about farm credit. Certainly no other government has done as much as this one for farm management and the improvement and establishment of economic units in western Canada. My friends in the Liberal party talk glibly about some of the agricultural problems in western Canada. Their glibness is notable for its absolute lack of policy with regard to western agriculture.

I should like to say to the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, that we must be always on the look out to make sure the farm credit corporation does not become stereotyped in its form of loan because, in western Canada and in my area particularly, we have a variety of soils and a variety of farming operations that are suited to the area. I should not like to think that because certain areas in my constituency cannot raise one thing but can raise another they will be hampered in securing from the Farm Credit Corporation proper loans to go ahead and develop a particular kind of agriculture.

Then I would move on to the stabilization act. I think that was a great stride forward, even though the hon. member for Assiniboia did not agree. However, the new program for hogs and eggs has worked out well. As with any new program, some wrinkles will need to be ironed out. The farmers in my constituency feel very strongly that we should give consideration to at least semi-annual deficiency payments on hogs and payment on a regional basis. We feel that the deficiency payment on eggs might be made on a quarterly basis.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the position of the Liberal party.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I will tell my hon. friend the position of the Liberal party in a moment or two. We know their position in western Canada. We know the Liberal party is dead. We know they have not any agricultural policy. I can also quote what the hon. member for Essex East said when this program was brought into the house. He threw it aside and said it was nothing. He did not know what he was talking about. He made a big speech for an hour and a half—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): If you will wait until I have finished my speech I will answer all the questions you wish to ask.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): As I was saying, the initiation of the new program for hogs and eggs required a great deal of courage on the part of the former minister of agriculture. We in Alberta are particularly proud that he had the courage to introduce this kind of program, in spite of strong protests from some organized groups. We think, as he did, that after a year's trial certain changes might be made.

Then I would go on to one other subject under the stabilization act. I ask that the minister give further consideration, as he has in the past, to the whole question of the sheep industry, particularly in western Canada, under the rehabilitation scheme. In our area we are interested in this industry. We feel we could go a long way in developing a proper sheep industry there with a higher support price for lamb, with the continuation of the present support price through deficiency payments on wool, and the establishment of information and experimental stations, sheep flocks for crossbreeding, and other technical details to help our sheep farmers develop a strong sheep industry in that particular area.

In the last three years we have developed a good national policy for agriculture. Its main points are good. As I have said, some of them require the wrinkles ironed out. I am sure this will come as time goes by.

I wish to say a word with regard to acreage payments. The hon. member for Essex East says that the Liberal party policy is such and such. I know that out of the Liberal rally came the big idea that we should pay something like $300 on a unit quota. How well would this go over in my area? I will tell the hon. member and the committee several things with regard to acreage payments and permit books. In 1958, when this government made the first acreage payment, there were 1,800 new permits issued in my constituency. Why were these new permits issued? They were issued primarily because we have an area which is just now being developed agriculturally, and we do not have the delivery stations or the railway stations that some of the other areas in the prairies have.

We found that in 1958 the Canadian wheat board did not know anything about 25 per cent of the agricultural land in my constituency. As a matter of fact, over 50 per cent of the farmers in my area would have received absolutely nothing under the Liberal party scheme or the C.C.F. scheme for deficiency payments. I am very proud to be able to say that most of them received payments under the acreage payments scheme.

However I do have a quarrel with some of the officers of the Canadian wheat board. I think this is another example of people who are working for the government thinking they have become so smart that they should take over the policies and legislation of the government. I wish to say with regard to the question of issuing permit books to the producers in my area the Canadian wheat board have at times, and are now, discriminating against the farmers of my region. This is not the result of a government decision; it is a decision made by some of the civil servants of the Canadian wheat board. I say this with adequate proof, and I wish to quote for the record the opinion of the solicitor to the Canadian wheat board at Winnipeg concerning who should be entitled to a permit book in any one year. I quote from a memorandum of Henry B. Monk, solicitor to the chief commissioner of the Canadian wheat board:

> In the writer's view to be entitled to a permit book under the Canadian Wheat Board Act the applicant must first qualify as a person engaged in the production of grain or as a producer within the foregoing. At the time of his application in this respect I would not regard the fact that the applicant had all his land in summer fallow or seeded to forage crops or had no grain on hand as necessarily conclusive against the application. The question at issue in deciding each application for a permit book must be what is the bona fide purpose and object of the applicant's farming operations.

I wish to say that in 1958 the Canadian wheat board did not follow out the instructions of its solicitor. In 1960 and 1961 they have not followed the instructions of their solicitor in issuing permit books to some of the farmers in my area.

I went further and obtained from a lawyer who is well known to members of this house another legal opinion as to who should be entitled to permit books under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. This is the opinion he has given me:

> I am of the opinion that the recent suggestion of the Board that farmers having only cultivated lands producing grain qualify for delivery permit books is not substantiated either by anything in the Wheat Board Act or in the wheat board regulations or in the western grain producers acreage payment regulations nor is it consistent with the interpretation placed on the act and on the regulations by the board itself in dealing with other farmers.

I would ask the minister to take this matter up with the Canadian wheat board because there has been discrimination in my area against farmers who had permit books in 1958-59 and who had permit books in 1960-61. They were refused a further permit book because it was said that they did not have acreage under grain in 1959-60. In taking this position, the board was not carrying out its obligations as determined by its own solicitor and I would ask the minister to investigate this problem and correct the situation as soon as possible.

There has been some suggestion on occasion, particularly from government officials, that the region which I have the honour to represent is not a grain producing area. I wish to correct that impression. Only last year the world barley king at the Toronto Royal Winter Fair, Mr. George Lamb, came from the town of Cherhill. We have had numerous world wheat kings from the area of Wolf Creek, which is in the vicinity of the Rockies in western Alberta. We can and do grow grain in our area. I hope recognition that we do will be forthcoming, and that the farmers may be treated accordingly.

Now I wish to turn to the feed grain regulations about which we have heard a great deal in this house. We have seen the hon. member for Assiniboia get up and wave his hands. We do not know what the Liberals think about this—I doubt whether they have any thoughts about it at all. We have seen the hon. member for Assiniboia claim we are wrecking the wheat board. We are doing nothing of the kind. In my opinion the new regulations will strengthen the board. First of all, they will give the board a comprehensive idea of all the land under cultivation in western Canada, something which it did not have before. Again, a secondary feed industry is needed in western Canada to provide us with the necessary equipment so as properly to finish our product and increase its market value. This will provide a secondary industry in western Canada and correspondingly create more jobs in that area, something which the hon. member for Assiniboia seems unwilling to do.

Reverting for a few moments to this question of permit books, in the light of the experience with the wheat board I wish to suggest to the minister that we scrap the entire permit department of the board and set up in its place local authorities in the municipalities who would have the duty of issuing permits to the farmers in the area. In this way we might bring an end to the business of father and son, brother and brother, or husband and wife partnerships operated so as to secure two permit books. Let us get back to good democratic principles. Let us say to the farmers: we are going to set up boards in your area and these cases will be judged by your peers. These are the people who will say whether or not you are going to have a permit book. It seems to me this could be done by using the field crop men who are already at work in western Canada, by using the district's agriculturists, by having representatives from the pools and the elevators and of the farmers themselves on these boards. It seems to me that a board composed of three such men could equitably distinguish between those who should receive permit books and those who should not. It would be far better done this way than by some civil servants in Winnipeg who have no knowledge of the land in question and who sometimes make arbitrary decisions one way or another. I hope the minister will at least give consideration to this view, because I think it would constitute a step forward in returning to the principles of democracy.

I wish to make some comments on one subject in connection with the experimental farm service. I want to ask the minister to set up an experimental farm on the muskeg we have in western Canada so that this land might, in time, produce the crops which it could produce after proper study and development. Right now we are importing into Canada, an agricultural country, crops worth in the neighbourhood of $650 million a year. This is a tremendous sum to spend on importing goods of this character into an agricultural country, though I realize that a portion of these imports is made up of fresh fruit and vegetables grown during the off season in some more southerly regions. On the other hand, there are a great many things which are imported into Canada which we could be growing ourselves and some of them, I believe, could be grown on the many millions of acres of muskeg we have in this country. I know the minister is interested in projects of this sort. I know he has paid a great deal of attention to conservation and that his work in connection with rural rehabilitation could mean a great deal for us in parts of northwest Alberta.

I wish to mention briefly the subject of butter and its support price. In addition, if I may be so bold, I should like to refer to reports with medical implications which have been rife in the lay press of late. I wish to say that as a country general practitioner I have in the past year conducted some very rough experimental work in my area on the cholesterol levels of the blood. I wish to take this opportunity of passing on to the committee and the public at large my findings in this respect. I agree with those renowned scientists who say that butter is a grade A food which we can eat and enjoy without regard for the bogey man of coronary thrombosis, for behind the threat of coronary thrombosis are a number of other factors besides the cholesterol level in the blood.

I think the greatest underlying factor is a lack of exercise. Canadians and the people of the United States in general are victims of what we might call transportationitis which leads to their taking little physical exercise. This, rather than the overeating of fats, is probably the greatest cause of heart disease. Of course, I hasten to say that moderation in all things is a sound principle the application of which is essential for good health and this applies to the consumption of animal fats as it applies to other foods.

We certainly will not improve the general standard of health of Canadians by subscribing to every new fad diet that comes along. As a matter of fact, it can be shown there is a correlation between the amount of heart disease in the country and the number of automobiles and television sets to be found there. But this of course does not represent the entire answer.

I wish to suggest to the minister and the government that we commission the national research council, through its medical division, to undertake a further comprehensive study of the question of cholesterol in the blood and that the findings of this study be correlated with the research done in various other countries so that we may find a proper and reasonable answer to this problem.

Certainly there is no reason at all at the present time for Canadians not to eat butter. It is a complete fallacy that anything would be gained by substituting margarine for butter because the process of the hydrogenation of vegetable oil into margarine renders it a fat chemically equivalent to butter. I wish to place these brief points on the record because I feel, although there is no way of measuring the degree, the drop in domestic butter consumption has been caused to some extent by lay press reports concerning arteriosclerosis and heart disease resulting from the overeating of animal fats. I suggest this is not true and that there is no evidence to support this contention. I suggest, rather, that these diseases arise from complex factors, that these are complicated conditions in which a number of factors play a part, such as stress, inherited resistance and others. Again I ask the minister to suggest to the national research council that they undertake a study to correlate information pertaining to this important subject.

In concluding let me pay a general tribute to the Department of Agriculture and, in particular, to the veterinary medical branch for the excellent work they have done in Canada which has made Canada's veterinary medical health service one of the best in the world. Having had some previous experience with the department in this regard, I can assure the committee and the country that we in Canada are fortunate in having such an effective group working under the able direction of the director general.

These are the comments I wished to place on the record. Again I invite the minister to investigate my complaints with regard to the issuing of permits through the Canadian wheat board. This is of particular importance to the farmers in the western portion of my constituency, who do not enjoy the privileges or the easy access to elevators and transportation that are enjoyed by the other farmers in western Canada.

If my friend the hon. member for Essex East has any questions I shall be very pleased to answer them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I simply want to ask the hon. member about the suggestion he has made with regard to the application of the principle of regionalization to the deficiency payments on hogs. Does the hon. member not recall that that proposal was made by me on behalf of the Liberal party at the last session of parliament? Is he not aware that our proposal is consistent with the recommendations made recently to the government by the federation of agriculture, and turned down by the government? We welcome the support of the hon. gentleman in this regard.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Finally I am able to welcome some reasonable support from the hon. member for Essex East who will recall that when speaking about this subject he said, "It is a good thing, but". Then, he proceeded to qualify his endorsement of the principle. I cannot quote the hon. member directly but it will be recalled that at that time the minister said he was eager to try the scheme for a year to see if it would average out properly, and if it did not the government would do something about it. All the farmers in my area accepted that. We now come to the government and say we do not think that national averaging was a good principle.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And we agree with you.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I am pleased that the hon. gentleman finally agrees with something that will be of benefit to the farmers. It is the first time the hon. member has ever done so.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Before dealing with the matter of agricultural research I would like to make a few general remarks.

In view of the importance of this branch, so vital to the welfare of all Canadians, I felt it would have been appropriate for the minister, in submitting his estimates, to make a comprehensive statement on the present position of agriculture in this country, on the problems our farmers have to face today, and to explain the relation between the estimates he is asking us to vote and the plan which the government proposes to carry out to raise farm income.

In his speech, the minister stated that 21 per cent of Canadian farms bring less than $1,200 yearly income to their operators. While this is obviously a disturbing figure, I am still more concerned over the present status of family farm operators, many of whom are found not only in the province of Quebec but also in central Ontario, in the maritimes, and elsewhere.

Mr. Chairman, I am asking myself to what extent those sums of money we are asked to vote will improve the situation of our farmers. I listened carefully to the statement which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) made on February 24 last, I have read and reread his report, because I wanted to take part in the discussion, as I did in 1958 and 1959.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that, after thoroughly considering the matter, the minister himself will admit that nothing in his speech holds out any very comforting prospects for our farmers. Yet the problems are there before us. They are serious by reason of their extent, and they are urgent. To talk of farming in Canada in 1961 is to talk of low and uncertain price levels, unstable and inadequate income, selling at a loss and surplus production. Those are, in general, the difficulties which our rural producers have to face.

No amount of speeches or statistical gimmicks can change any of the facts facing us in 1961. The answer to such conditions lies in over-all planning, in new and dynamic prospects. In other words, what is required is a national farm policy, in keeping with the needs of the moment.

If the government has any plan to offer, now is the time to do it. Until then, we are and shall be justified in saying that the government is not up to its task, is not assuming its responsibilities in the matter of agriculture, and that farmers in this country can rightfully say and repeat that they are not receiving their fair share of the national income.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with great care to the speeches of the hon. members for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) and for Beauce (Mr. Racine), who very clearly explained to us the problems peculiar to Quebec, as well as other matters of national scope with regard to the farming industry.

I hope the government will note the recommendations of those two hon. members and act upon them.

Mr. Chairman, I was quite amused when the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), at the beginning of his remarks, compared the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture and those made under the former government by the Hon. Mr. Gardiner. This provides me with an opportunity to recall the legendary figure of Mr. Gardiner and the debt of gratitude which Canadian farmers owe him. Let me say, therefore, to the hon. member who spoke before me and who referred to a national policy, that if he and his colleagues in the government are really interested in working out a policy, I heartily suggest that they consult the official record of debates under the former administration. They will see how vigorously and boldly Mr. Gardiner set out to apply an agricultural policy in this country, at a time when the major problem facing him was a problem of production. When Mr. Gardiner left the administration, he could take pride in the fact that in the matter of production, Canada's farmers were in the position he had dreamed for them, that is to say they were at that time the greatest wheat producers in the world.

Mr. Chairman, since the years 1956-57, great changes have occurred. It is unfortunate that this government has remained in a static position, because technology and scientific research have been transforming not only industry but also agricultural operations in Canada. Even more serious, such changes have also occurred in other countries of the world, so that today countries which at the time were our customers have now become our competitors. If as soon as it took over the country's administration this government had taken note of those structural changes, the yield of our farms would be much higher than it is now.

This view was expressed just recently not only by specialists and experts but also by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in the brief it submitted to the government on March 1 last. This brief not only reflects our present agricultural problems but offers to the government various practical solutions which could not be safely ignored.

The Montreal Gazette, in an editorial which appeared on March 2 last, reported on some comments with regard to this brief from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and mentioned the fourteen suggestions put forward in this brief to the government. I quote:

(Text):

In the annual brief which it submitted to Prime Minister Diefenbaker and other federal cabinet ministers for the calendar year 1961, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture laid it right on the line.

The federation was downright disturbed by a tendency which it saw developing. And it didn't hesitate to speak out.

The federation, as it turned out, came well armed with constructive proposals.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, this brief raises a very important question, one which I consider vital and which establishes something that we, in the official opposition, have been preaching for years, that is to say the interdependence of farm policy and business policy. May I therefore be allowed to read very slowly a few lines from page 5 of the brief submitted by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture:

(Text):

Trade in agricultural products is, of course, but one aspect of general trade, and is vitally affected by general trade policies. It was the opinion of the delegate body that there are at present heavy pressures from secondary industry for an increased degree of protection, and it would view with alarm any trend in this direction in Canada. There are of course fundamental issues and philosophies of economic policy involved here. As a surplus producer of agricultural products Canada has a great and fundamental stake in expanding trade. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture believes that the long-run interests of Canada lie in its development as a modern industrial trading nation, rather than a nation with the pattern of its industrial development shaped by a policy of increasing protection for Canadian manufacturing industry.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, there is obviously no point in producing, or in improving production methods if, on the other hand, the government, by its shortsighted commercial policy, does not at the same time take steps to promote the marketing of our products throughout the world.

I hope the government will reconsider its position in trade matters, because in a country like ours with its surplus problems, the only possible solution, the only plausible one, is a bold and dynamic policy of expanded trade. To that end, hon. members will recall that the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Pearson) missed no opportunity to express that view. In fact, at the Liberal rally, last January, one promptly adopted resolution advocated that policy of economic expansion, which would save our farm producers from their present predicament.

Mr. Chairman, the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture puts great emphasis on research. Allow me to read, in this connection, a few lines from page 17 of the brief:

(Text):

In a different field, we would bring to your attention that we believe, in view of the need for developing markets for farm products to an absolute maximum, that there should be stepped up programs by the national research council aimed at developing new and better utilization of farm products. Investigation into the use of wheat in food forms other than bread has been specifically mentioned as an area of research needing attention.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, in 1958 and 1959, I drew the attention of the minister of agriculture who today is Minister of National Defence to that matter. And, according to page 2401 of Hansard of 1959, I said this:

I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) a very important point. I feel that if we are to improve the efficiency of agriculture in this country, in the west as well as in the eastern and central parts of this country, we should at once adjust our research procedure. Let us set up a new co-ordination of existing services and give a new, bold and forward looking impulse to these research services—

Mr. Chairman, I understand that since January 1 last the minister has proceeded to a diversion of technical and research services with regard to marketing under the Canadian wheat board. I shall say right away that this is a step in the right direction. It is unfortunate that his predecessor, who is now Minister of National Defence, did not think it advisable to start setting up such a service two or three years ago.

We have of course in our service efficient experts and the most up-to-date material facilities with regard to research; but, if I am not mistaken, about 98 per cent of our research is still focused on production or the improvement of production methods.

I submit that it is absolutely necessary to underline the economic aspect. We should apply to agriculture the same methods which have been so successful in industry. How can production costs be reduced, how can the quality of our products be raised, and how can they be made marketable abroad? That is the whole Canadian farm problem which must be considered anew in the light of modern scientific information.

According to page 2407 of Hansard, the minister had a word to say on the matter on February 24, 1961. I quote:

Another point I should like to mention in this connection is that it is now very obvious that there are other things for which wheat can be utilized besides the traditional products, bread. It is no secret that thousands of years ago wheat and barley were used as a staple diet not in the form of bread. In many countries of the world where the tendency to turn to the use of the new product, bread, is slow, it might be possible for us to sell wheat ready for human consumption closer to the natural form.

Mr. Chairman, with regard to this question of bread, I would like to make two remarks. First of all, I shall repeat a question recently asked by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) who inquired from experts:

How can it be that we have, in this country, the best wheat and perhaps the worst bread in the world?

I leave it to the experts to comment upon it. My second remark is consequential to what I just said. I note in the report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, volume 10, page 138, that bread consumption in Canada per head is falling off in an alarming way.

The problem was submitted to experts and I am wondering whether the national research council would not have here a field to explore with a view to improving the quality of the bread we eat and, second, to finding the reasons why bread consumption has decreased in Canada, while our population is constantly on the increase.

In connection with those remarks, I would also like to mention my personal views with regard to the matter of research.

We know that in several other countries of the world, such as southern Asia—I refer particularly to India and China—the staple food is rice. Those countries, however, are chronically famished, while we have surpluses.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether our research division could not step up its work so that we might offer those countries some of our surplus products in a form that they could eat and assimilate.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the research council should also look into the most important matter of family farms.

In the minister's own statement as recorded on page 2405 of Hansard, we were informed that from year to year, the number of our farmers declined by about 10,000 a year. I quote the figures he gave. In 1958, there were 555,000 farmers; in 1959, 546,000 and in 1960, 536,000. I say, Mr. Chairman, that these statistics are alarming. All the more so because the bulk of these figures consists of family farms. This, I think, involves the most stable element of our population.

I think we have a duty to consider immediately the reasons why, from year to year, there is a decline in the number of farms, and particularly family farms, in Canada. I refer not only to the province of Quebec but also to other provinces.

I think this problem must be considered in our research effort. In the last analysis, it is a matter of determining what should be the exact structure or the mould of a family farm. Through such a study, a means might be found to make such farms economically sound and profitable.

And to show the economic benefits which can accrue from agricultural research, I was reading a few days ago in a Montreal newspaper that a manufacturer whose industry depends on imported vegetable oils—I think it refers to Mr. Pascale Gattuso—had decided to conduct experiments in Manitoba with this fodder plant called rapeseed, and from which vegetable oil is extracted. Well, through the initiative of a businessman, we now have in Manitoba a co-operative producing vegetable oil. I wonder why this initiative was taken by one of our businessmen rather than by our research experts.

On how many items is our trade dependent on imports? How many of those items could we produce ourselves? I have mentioned this example just to show the full importance of the research division.

Mr. Chairman, it is through scientific research that we have been able to increase production and sales, and raise the yield of our plants, our land and our stocks. We have doubled and even tripled the yield. It does seem that it is also through scientific research that we can substantially reduce our surpluses.

The time has come to throw into this struggle a larger portion of our financial resources.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that next fall a conference will be held in Montreal on "Resources and our future", all the provinces, as well as the Department of Agriculture and the federal government, will be represented.

I should like to quote from this booklet which has been submitted to us, a paragraph which shows the approach to be taken at this conference, and I quote:

Great stress will be laid on the vast problem of land use for agricultural purposes. It is known how difficult it is for domestic farms in the prairies to survive as such, and how quickly Ontario's farm lands become unproductive (at the rate of a million acres every four or five years); it is known at what rate the orchards in the Ontario peninsula and the farms along the south shore of the St. Lawrence, towards Montreal, are being taken over as industrial sites. In less than ten years, the agricultural situation has changed to such an extent that it can no longer be studied except on a national basis.

So, Mr. Chairman, I do hope that at that conference, a practical scheme will be worked out.

To that end, I should like to put forward a suggestion. I was saying a moment ago that as a result of the change in production techniques and of the fact that certain countries which were formerly our customers are now our competitors, what we need today in the agricultural field is to find out where we stand and work out a program.

I recognize at the outset that this is no easy task. Why? Canada will always have two major difficulties to overcome in the agricultural field. In the first place, we have an extremely vast territory; I think we have have the greatest area of tillable land in the world. The second problem is that the territory being heterogeneous, our land use is completely different from one point to another.

In view of those difficulties and of those important problems, and in view of the fact that we must necessarily take an inventory before drawing up a practical program on a national basis—a program which would be practical not only for the west or for central Canada but also for the east and for the maritime, in other words a truly national program, I wonder whether it would not be desirable to set up within the department a joint advisory council, as it was suggested at our last convention, a council in which every part of Canada would be represented. Those experts would have no other administrative duty than to study, comment, inform and suggest to the government what, to their mind, would be the most practical thing to do, in the various areas they represent.

The department would also have available some qualified and representative men from all parts of this country, who would be familiar with the special problems of those districts. Moreover, should a problem arise in any part of the country, then the minister could have those experts make inquiries on the spot.

I think the establishment of such a board would be to the benefit of the government and certainly in the best interest of the whole country.

Mr. Chairman, those are my suggestions. I hope that the minister will take them into consideration. Before closing my remarks, may I draw the attention of my hon. friends from the Conservative party, and more particularly of those who represent the rural and agricultural districts, to the fact that, in 1958 they received a token of trust, such as no government ever received before. In 1958, they obtained—

Mr. Parizeau: That will happen again in 1962.

Mr. Deschatelets: —this vote of confidence by making promises. Now I would point out that, at this time, those promises have not been kept.

Mr. Parizeau: Which ones?

Mr. Deschatelets: I shall tell my hon. friends that time is pressing them, because, very soon, their political future will be their past and they shall have to face those who have sent them here.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure to take the floor after the farmer-lawyer from Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets). My task will be that much easier, since his knowledge of agriculture seems to be limited. However, I would not like to be considered as an expert myself in agriculture. Be that as it may, it seems to me my hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont could have learned his lesson better, before lecturing Conservative members who none the less received, as he did say, a testimony of invaluable confidence on the part of the people, especially on the part of farmers.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the present Conservative government has received unlimited confidence from the agricultural class, because during the 21 years they were in power, the Liberal government failed dismally to live up to the task. Mr. Chairman, I should like to recall to the house some of the measures we have taken since we have been in power.

Mr. Chairman, may I first be allowed to remind the house that one of the first measures taken by the Conservative government after having been elected, after having obtained the confidence of the people, as the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) said a moment ago, was to put at the disposal of farmers $250 million as a revolving fund to stabilize the prices of farm products.

I should like also to remind all members that in 1959 the Conservative government granted, in subsidies to dairy products, the sum of $4,750,000. In 1960, that is from May to December, those subsides reached the amount of $3,750,000.

Furthermore, in 1960, the Conservative government paid $208,394.92 in support prices on eggs.

We all know that the Canadian Farm Loan Act has been improved substantially under the present Conservative administration.

Under our Liberal friends farmers could only borrow $15,000, while under the present Conservative administration they may borrow up to $20,000, since such loans are calculated now on the basis of 75 per cent of the value of the farm, while under the Liberal administration it was on the basis of only 65 per cent.

The Farm Improvement Loans Act was amended by the Conservative government and the amount of the loan was increased from $5,000 to $7,000.

Mr. Chairman, all those improvements have been made to the great resentment of our Liberal friends, whose whining we are hearing today and who were not able, during the 21 years they were in power, to understand the agricultural class.

Mr. Chairman, I should like all Canadian farmers to remember those things so that when the time comes for another general election they may not be fooled by our Liberal friends, who after a delay of 21 years now claim to be the friends of farmers.

Mr. Chairman, at the time of the Liberal administration the subsidy paid under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act was $100 per purebred animal slaughtered; the Conservative government increased that subsidy to $140 per animal. The sum of $40 which was paid for each half-bred animal slaughtered has been increased to $70.

Mr. Chairman, at this stage of my remarks, I should like to take a few minutes to inform the house of what the Conservative party policy has meant for the constituency I have the honour to represent.

Thanks to the measures introduced by the present Conservative government, thanks to the initiative of the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) and of his predecessor, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness), the citizens of my constituency received in 1959 the sum of $221,523.04 in subsidies on dairy products; those subsidies reached $295,364 in 1960.

As for sugar beets, farmers of my constituency received in subsidies the sum of $41,390.70, while in 1960 the 65,000 tons of sugar beets produced in our area brought to farmers of my constituency the sum of $74,015. I would suggest to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) to take good note of those figures.

Mr. Chairman, I might inform the house that through the beneficial legislation proposed by the Minister of Agriculture in the present government, a farmer of my riding has received an amount of $1,300, a thing that never happened under the previous Liberal government. In addition, he benefited from other grants under legislation passed by the Conservative government.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that our Liberal friends, especially the members for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and for Essex East, both of them lawyers, now wish to get closer to the farm people. But as in the story of the hare and the tortoise, it is too late to start when the opponent is already at the winning post.

Gentlemen of the Liberal party, you may well grieve. You have every reason to be sorry, because you have had your chance to show what you could do for the farm people. As for us, even though we came later, we knew how to take advantage of the situation and we gave to the farm people what they were entitled to expect from a truly Canadian government, devoted to all Canadians and not only to the Liberals.

Gentlemen of the Liberal party, you may give up that opportunity as lost, but we, of the Conservative party, are forging ahead, and we shall go from one achievement to the other, to the satisfaction of our constituents, people who are only waiting for the chance to return us to office with an even greater majority.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, may I put a question to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot?

Mr. Ricard: Certainly. In view of your ignorance, I can answer all your questions.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I wish the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot would tell me when the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) will keep his promise about a price support on pulpwood?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, let me first of all remind the house that the present premier of Quebec, who for some months travelled all over the province, promising to do and give all sorts of things certainly has a duty to fulfil in that respect. However, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska may rest assured that as long as the Minister of Agriculture and the Conservative party have a responsibility in the matter the party will certainly honour its obligations, contrary to what happened under the administration of those for whom he cares much.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Whenever the agriculture estimates are under discussion I see in my mind's eye the hon. member for Assiniboia up to his ears in grain. I almost hear the lowing of cattle waiting to be fed and I can smell bales of new mown hay.

While I was listening to the doxology to Conservatism and the hymn of thanksgiving for Conservative policies a moment or two ago, I could not help but remember reading some reports and statistics recently. Surely, while the hon. gentleman was performing this eulogy and protecting the flanks of the Minister of Agriculture he must have remembered that the province of Quebec has had a form of Conservative government for 16 years.

Mr. Ricard: It did very well for the province, too.

Mr. Herridge: And the net income per farmer for Quebec is one of the lowest in Canada.

Mr. Ricard: Because the earlier Liberal regime did not accept its responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Herridge: Now, I want to express my appreciation for the courtesy with which the Minister of Agriculture has attended to any of my complaints, that is, to individual complaints, not complaints relating to the whole farming industry. I have found the hon. gentleman courteous and co-operative in that respect and I appreciate it. I suppose it would be fair to say that the Minister of Agriculture is the roving ambassador for the government. From his remarks when the discussion of these estimates began, there appears no doubt that while he has not been able to present substantial solutions to many of the problems now facing agriculture he is finding out what the problems of the farmer are. I also wish to express my appreciation of the good work of the senior staff and the field men of the department. We must not forget, when we discuss these estimates in the relative comfort of this chamber—that is, the comfort of all of us except the minister—that the field staff do a lot of slogging day by day. It is not very glamorous work; it does not reach the newspapers, and to many people it is unknown. However, the department has some excellent field staff officers. I have known many of them for a goodly number of years, and I want to express the appreciation of this group for the work they are doing.

I do not intend to speak at length at this stage of the discussion because I shall have various things to say on the particular items as they arise, but I do want to speak briefly on one or two matters. I think one of the first things to be done is to get the public to recognize the importance of agriculture to the Canadian economy and to the country. There is a tendency to underestimate the importance of agriculture because, shall I say, of the dynamism of the growth of industry and things of that sort.

I notice that the hon. member for Essex East is listening intently, and I want to say this in connection with that hon. member. The member for Essex East is not a farmer but I know from lengthy discussions with him that he is a student of farmers' problems and needs, and that is what is required at this time. There has to be a greater recognition on the part of the people of Canada as a whole of the importance of agriculture, and this is lacking in many quarters. There is a tendency to underestimate it and in some cases almost to jeer at the maintenance of the economic family farm and agriculture of that type.

I think there a responsibility falls on the Department of Agriculture, as well as on the provincial departments and the farm organizations, to improve their public relations so as to inform the remainder of the population of the importance of the agricultural sector of the economy. In this connection, I wish briefly to read from a magazine called "Canadian Commentator" which often contains some very informative articles. The issue of June, 1960 to which I am referring contains an article by Mr. George R. McLaughlin on the Canadian farmer which I think puts the question very well indeed. I quote briefly from this article:

> I have been concerned these last few years about the misunderstanding which exists in the minds of non-farmers with regard to the economic position of farm people in this land of plenty. This misunderstanding has grown for quite obvious reasons, and there seems little indication that agriculture's public relations, if there is such a thing, has done much to correct the situation.

It goes on to say:

> Not many people realize that the farmers of Canada represent a consumer's market of some $2.8 billion a year, about $1.7 billion of which is spent for the goods and services required in the production of food, and another $1.1 billion for the requirements of family living, such as radios and cosmetics, children's toys and lawn mowers, coffee and canned goods, skates and cameras, furniture and overcoats, and all the hundreds of other goods and services required by any family, urban or rural. In the United States it has been said that the farmer as a consumer of goods and services is worth two and a half times as much as any other individual consumer in the country. I see no reason why the same comparison should not be used in Canada.

I think that is very well put indeed. There should be a public relations job done to inform the people of the importance of agriculture not only to the farmer but to the rest of the economy.

I could not help noticing, in the quotation I read, a reference to the purchase of cosmetics. What a change there has been in the world in which we live. I remember 50 years ago talking to a farmer who had to drive many miles along a mountain trail to get his groceries. He did not use cosmetics, nor did his wife. He got into the habit of putting a rooster into the crate to accompany him on his journey so that he would not be lonely. What a difference in the way things are done today. I have lived in the same circumstances, and I am proud of it.

It is only fitting when speaking on the estimates of this department to make some reference to the fact that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has celebrated its twenty fifth anniversary. I was very closely associated with the British Columbia federation of agriculture and on that account I realize what good work the organization has done throughout the years for the Canadian farmer. In saying this, I fully recognize the excellent work which has been done by other organizations, such as the farmers' union and those organizations connected with particular branches of the industry. In the early days our first president was the Hon. E. D. Barrow, former Liberal minister of agriculture of British Columbia and a great personal friend of mine.

An hon. Member: Where did he live?

Mr. Herridge: Chilliwack. He was a practical farmer who spent many years of his life working for his fellow farmers in British Columbia. I think we should remember these things. There was also Mr. Charles Hayden, the first secretary-treasurer, who lived in Vernon. Under his guidance the work of the organization was greatly developed. At the present time the British Columbia federation of agriculture has a membership of between 16,000 and 17,000 which shows how important the agriculture industry is in British Columbia when we relate it to other industries in the province.

I am pleased to see the hon. member for Cariboo has his hearing aid on and is listening to me, determined not to miss a single one of my words of wisdom.

Before taking my seat, I want to refer to some of the matters brought to the attention of the government by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I will avoid repetition and mention only those points that are important to the farmers I represent and farmers generally across the country.

In their brief, the federation indicate great interest in marketing farm products in commercial markets overseas and also in the development of the world food pool under the United Nations as well as other agencies for the proper use of our surpluses. In their representations they presented a resolution to the government in these words:

1. Receive from nations having the ability to do so, undertakings to contribute to an internationally conducted program of food distribution to areas of need. Such contributions could take the form of commitments to supply food, or could take the form of funds, or necessary services for transporting food contributions to needy countries.

2. Receive and appraise information on food needs, and, on the basis of such information and the requests of participating nations, carry out the equitable distribution of the food supplies made available.

3. Co-ordinate and advise on the orderly conduct of non-commercial food distribution in its broadest implications. The aim of such consultation and co-ordination should be to give direction and purpose, through the United Nations, to all programs and activities contributing to the goal of an international food program.

To indicate what farmers are thinking I wish to quote a statement made by the president of the British Columbia federation of agriculture:

H. D. Arnold of Duncan, president of the B.C. federation of agriculture, told the B.C. fruit growers association that Canada could do more for the world by helping backward nations in peaceful development than it could possibly achieve by its own armament.

He urged all sections of agriculture to press this viewpoint.

Mr. Arnold agreed that arms expenditure should be slashed—but instead of cutting taxes with the money so saved, he would spend it building up and developing backward countries.

He suggested Canada should select one or two countries and concentrate on them, or contribute to a master international fund for the same purpose.

"From a propaganda viewpoint alone," he said, "the other countries would not stand by and let us do it on our own."

"A tractor or a plow sent to Nigeria, for instance, would do more for world peace than providing another tank for our armed forces; better a fruit ladder to Nigeria than an aircraft.

That is a growing sentiment among farmers and I was pleased to see that this gentleman thinks along lines similar to those of hon. members of this group.

I shall mention one or two other matters of particular importance to the people in my district. In addition to supplying food overseas, all sections of the British Columbia Federation of Agriculture are concerned about the cost of taxation of the land for educational purposes. This reference is found at page 7 of the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and I will quote briefly from it because it concerns British Columbia farmers who believe that there must be some change in taxation, in view of the increased costs of hospitals and education, if the economic family farm is to continue to exist. The brief reads:

> One subject which we would mention only briefly—although it is a matter of very great importance—is that of education costs. It is becoming more and more widely recognized that as the importance and the cost of education increases that two things are necessary: first that a high standard of education and educational opportunity should be assured for every Canadian child; second, that the real property tax imposed by the local school district is becoming increasingly inadequate and inequitable as a basis for meeting education costs. This inadequacy and inequity does not concern the farmer alone, but as a heavy investor in land in relation to his income the farmer tends to feel the situation much more keenly.

They propose that this matter must receive the attention of the government.

The federation also deals with the question of transportation, with which I shall not deal at length. They deal, too, with the question of land and water use and rural development. This is the subject of a resolution recently brought forward by the Minister of Agriculture, which I hope will come forward again in the near future.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. member permit me to point out that at the bottom of page 10 of the brief, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture expresses the hope that the legislation on that subject introduced by the minister by way of resolution will be passed at this session of parliament and not postponed as the minister proposes.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad that the hon. member for Essex East, with his usual attention to detail in these matters, has reminded me of this important part of the representation.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member who has the floor would mind telling the committee from what he and the other professional farmer who spoke are quoting?

Mr. Herridge: I am surprised that the hon. member is ignorant of what has happened in Ottawa in recent weeks and months. I am reading from a presentation of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to the Prime Minister of Canada and members of the cabinet on February 28, 1961. Incidentally, that is my birthday and a very important event. I was born in London but only because my mother was visiting there that day. No doubt the hon. member has received a copy of this brief.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member. I certainly have a copy of the brief but I attend the meetings of these organizations and rarely read briefs. I must congratulate the hon. gentleman on celebrating his eightieth birthday.

Mr. Herridge: The federation in its brief deals with land and water use and rural development and expresses the hope that the legislation will be passed this session, as the hon. member for Essex East so kindly reminded me.

There is another subject in which I am interested because of its increasing importance. I shall deal with it and one or two other matters only briefly. I dealt with research at some length on the minister's estimates last year and if anyone wishes to be well-informed as to the needs of agriculture in respect of research I suggest he look up the speech I made last year on item No. 1 of the minister's estimates.

The federation is still interested in medical health insurance. The recommendation in the brief on this point reads:

> We do think no time should be lost in moving forward in the study of ways and means of aiding the provinces in the establishment of provincial medical health insurance plans.

This subject does not come directly under the Minister of Agriculture but the quotation shows that farmers are interested not only in their own problems but in problems of national scope and importance.

The federation also deals with unemployment insurance for farm workers. In this respect, I urge the government to act as soon as possible to institute a plan for unemployment insurance coverage for farm workers, either on voluntary or on a suitable selective basis.

It has frequently been said that farmers operate under severe circumstances. They may not want to work in industries or occupations covered by unemployment insurance. In conditions of full employment, nine times out of 10 an individual given a choice between working on a farm or accepting a position in industry will accept an industrial position. I urge the Minister of Agriculture to use his influence with the Minister of Labour to again stress the importance to the farmers of Canada of this subject.

I believe it was the British Columbia Federation of Agriculture which first brought forward a request with respect to land expropriation and easement, which subjects are also dealt with in the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. We in British Columbia suffer from iniquitous laws in respect to the expropriation of property for utilities, whether publicly or privately owned. There is absolutely no respect at all for the rights of the farmers or the land owners under the present legislation. Numerous instances have been brought to my attention of farmers whose timber had been cut down without any prior arrangements being made, of surveys being made, of fields being crossed, and things of that sort. This has created such concern that the British Columbia federation of agriculture has given the problem a great deal of study and has employed legal counsel. A good number of my constituents are concerned because, as the committee knows, the Minister of Justice has a plan under which 2,000 of them will be drowned in the near future if he has his way. They are all working together as a unit with the British Columbia federation of agriculture to try to protect their interests because, as I said before, the laws of British Columbia do not offer the proper protection. We are told that farmers are all for free, private ownership. Why, the government is destroying private enterprise, legitimate free enterprise and the small scale industry of farming right and left. Whenever the rights of the ordinary farmer come in conflict with the big corporations they go over the small farmer like a steamroller.

> Land expropriation and easement.
> The Railway Act provides that proceedings for drainage works arising out of the location of railways may be taken either under provincial law or under the provisions of the Railway Act, at the option of the land owner. It seems to us that this is a very reasonable principle in relation to problems of compensation and expropriation. We think this option principle should be extended to include all utilities operating under federal charter, and also to apply to proceedings not only for drainage works, but to proceedings for compensation and works connected with expropriation and easements generally.

I think it is the responsibility of the federal Minister of Agriculture, at the dominion-provincial agricultural conferences which are held annually, to work in co-operation with the ministers of agriculture of the provinces to provide some federal and provincial legislation which will protect the rights of Canadian citizens against vested interests and those who, up to date, have had the economic power to do what they like.

The federation commends the government's decision to hold an inquiry into farm machinery prices. We are glad that matter has been referred to a committee. I am also very pleased to see that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has passed a resolution with respect to nuclear weapons, as follows:

> Resolved that Canada should provide leadership in a plan to control the spread of nuclear weapons by promoting an agreement of all nations that they will not test, manufacture, or possess any nuclear devices for warfare, and
> Further resolved that Canada should encourage that this agreement be under the jurisdiction of the United Nations.

I hope the minister will draw this resolution to the particular attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs because I am sure that when he deals with the Minister of National Defence he will welcome the additional support he is receiving from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture reiterates its strong support of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I have mentioned briefly the majority of the questions which the Canadian federation brought to the attention of the cabinet. I do urge that the minister give these serious consideration as representing the views of a very responsible segment of our economy, upon which a great deal depends in Canada, and for the welfare of which we should recognize our responsibility on all occasions.

I shall have a few things to say when we discuss the various items.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on the agricultural estimates, since Waterloo county is a farming district equal to most counties in Ontario.

Although the growing of wheat, oats, corn and turnips is predominant, this county is well known for producing outstanding livestock and has on various occasions won prizes at the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto as well as at other well known places.

The Waterloo county federation of agriculture was formed in 1944 and, along with junior farmers, has assisted the whole agricultural economy. The Waterloo county farmers have contributed much to the welfare of farming and the Mennonites, long established here, have carried on this work in a successful way.

Perhaps one of the problems is the lack of help on these farms, as many of the young people are entering other fields of activity. Last year a farmer friend of mine was unable to secure help. This was finally supplied when a Negro working in our district, being an agriculturalist, carried on the duties to the utmost satisfaction of his employer.

On a previous occasion the hon. member for Halton and I mentioned in the house the limited facilities which were available for hog testing programs at Waterloo, Ontario. In 1938, a 48-pen piggery was opened in Waterloo. The building program for the advanced registry station was resumed after the second world war and in 1948 a 60-pen piggery was constructed at the Waterloo station. In 1959 the capacity of this station was 112 pens. Yet, the capacity of this station appears to be inadequate, as a number of entries have had to be turned away from time to time owing to the lack of sufficient facilities. While there has been some unused space in recent months, I should like to suggest to the government and the minister that they consider in detail the problem of more room. Mr. Ken Cappindale deserves a great deal of credit for his splendid work here. This station has played a prominent part in the breeding and selection of better hogs, and it must be increased in size if it is to continue to fulfil this objective.

The 4-H clubs have increased greatly, and I understand that today we have well over 77,000 boys and girls in this movement. They learn good practices at an age when they have no time to learn bad ones. They are a real credit to the agricultural set-up of our country, and their contributions are outstanding.

Elmira is the egg and chicken capital of Ontario. I understand that the largest broiler breeding farm in Ontario is located five miles from my home and operated by the Seiling hatchery. The output last year was 2,500,000 chicks. In addition, three other major chick hatcheries are located in our area. They are the Reliable, the Bonny Chick and the Produce. It may be interesting to know that Mr. Seiling of the Seiling hatchery developed his own incubator and holds a patent on it. He has been in the business over 40 years. A few years ago the hatchery discontinued hatching laying chicks and now concentrates on the broiler market. Broilers are hatched the year round.

In my travels across Canada, especially across Ontario, I have been deeply impressed with the value of fall fairs in our villages, towns and cities. After all, they are the show windows of agriculture in our country. Displays of baking, dairy and good food products, crafts and art exhibits, along with a showing of cattle, hogs, horses and so on have provided a great deal of interest in many communities. Horse racing, of course, is always popular, as the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, well knows.

In my own town of Elmira we held our 106th annual fall fair last year over the Labour day week end, at which time the attendance was 22,000 people drawn from a wide area.

In order to provide better facilities for our patrons the Elmira and Woolwich agricultural society are building a new grandstand to seat well over 1,000 people. It is interesting to know that all the directors of this society are farmers, or those having business dealings with them or a background of rural life. Their efforts have provided this fair with real possibilities for the future. Our memorial arena built on land owned by this society has seating accommodation for 1,500 people and many of the exhibits are shown in this building. As mentioned before, a new steel and cement block grandstand and exhibition building is being erected this year. Better facilities will be provided for the comfort of the people and also for the junior farmers and 4-H clubs which are all important in today's rural relationships. I hope that financial assistance will be available for this worthy project. In closing, may I commend the minister and his department for their efforts to bring about better conditions in agriculture.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Chairman, I listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot. I cannot reply to the remarks made by the member from western Canada because I am not a farmer. I am an agriculturalist. So that there may be no mistake about the distinction between the two, may I say that a farmer is a man who makes his money in the country and spends it in the city while an agriculturalist is a man who makes his money in the city and spends it in the country.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot spoke very glowingly of his constituency. I only wish I could speak as glowingly of mine because not since the hungry 30's have we had anything like the unemployment that we have in Renfrew North at the present time. The hon. member referred to the Farm Credit Corporation. May I say to him that he has very little cause to be worried for no organization of the government has done a better job, thanks to the personnel largely secured from the Veterans' Land Act administration, than the Farm Credit Corporation is doing at the present time. We have great hopes that the efficiency which was so evident in the administration of the Veterans' Land Act will be continued under the Farm Credit Corporation.

The hon. member for Jasper-Edson dealt with problems facing the farmers of western Canada. With that I have no quarrel, but not one word was spoken tonight, other than by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, with regard to eastern farmers. I am interested in having the question of the differences between the viewpoints of western farmers and eastern farmers aired in the standing committee on agriculture which is now sitting, and I would therefore ask the Minister of Agriculture to refer to that committee the problem of feedstuffs which is a sore spot in the economy of eastern Canadian farmers. I think this matter should be referred to the committee so that we will be allowed to call witnesses both from the west and the east in order to see if we can solve this problem which is a serious one, particularly to the feed manufacturers and farmers of Ontario and Quebec.

Sometimes I really worry about the situation as far as eastern and western Canada are concerned. I once heard the remark made that if the North American continent had been divided at the Mississippi river conditions east and west of that line would probably be better than they are today. I do not want to suggest that we should have a minister of agriculture for western Canada and one for eastern Canada but nevertheless, having regard to the situation that exists in this part of the country, in my opinion this might be a brilliant idea.

Mr. Jones: It is certainly not one to which the Liberals subscribed.

Mr. Forgie: I should like to deal with another matter which I should like to see referred to the standing committee on agriculture. I refer to the situation in the tobacco industry. I am interested in that industry because on my own diggings in Renfrew North I grew 4½ acres of tobacco, with the support and assistance of the tobacco division of the central experimental farm. In the constituency of Renfrew North there are over 50,000 acres of tobacco land, which is a substantial amount. Tobacco has been grown in that constituency for the last four or five years. As a matter of fact, I was able to secure a loan of $10,000 this year for a tobacco grower. He harvested 29½ acres of tobacco which was subsequently flue cured. He bought 200 acres of land for $4,000. The prevailing price of tobacco at which he sold his crop was 56.14 cents a pound. Because this farmer was successful in growing a first-class tobacco crop the land for which he paid $4,000 is today worth approximately $60,000. Land around Delhi in southwestern Ontario is selling at prices from $300 to $800 an acre, as those hon. members who live in that section of the country know. Therefore those farmers in my section of the country who are making $10 to $15 an acre from land planted in barley, oats or wheat would be well advised to grow tobacco because the soil is sandy. It must be remembered, however, that before beginning to grow tobacco you must be able to find a market.

I should like to refer to an article in the Montreal Gazette, I believe. It is pointed out that the introduction of cigarette tobacco growing in Joliette county in the province of Quebec has transformed formerly unproductive land into a $3 million business. In 1933 an acre of the sandy land in that area, which supported only poor grass, small willows and clumps of alders, cost $2 while today the price is $200. The article goes on to say that the change came when a group of provincial government agronomists jointly bought a farm in Joliette county 45 miles north of Montreal and began growing cigarette tobacco. Others quickly followed their example and by 1937 the price of land had climbed to $70 an acre. Last year 135 cigarette tobacco growers in that area earned nearly $3 million from the 5,300,000 pounds of tobacco they produced on 1,400 acres. Early frosts at the end of the summer present the chief hazard to growers. This damage is lessened by careful planning and fertilizer treatment to combine maximum yield with early maturity. As far as the frost situation is concerned in my riding, I might say that the day of September 28, 1948 will be remembered as the day the frost hit the tobacco crop at Delhi and hit my place up in North Renfrew as well. We have not had a day in the last 15 years when the farmers in my constituency could not grow tobacco but the whole problem is to find a market. When we come to a discussion of this problem I will have something further to say about it.

The tobacco industry has been subjected to terrific taxation. I think it will amaze many members of this committee when I recite the taxes that are imposed upon flue-cured tobacco in the Dominion of Canada. An industry of the importance of the tobacco industry would be a godsend to the North Renfrew area providing we could secure a market. We can secure markets if there is an incentive to produce a sufficient amount of tobacco for export, but this does not exist at this time. Experiments are still being carried out by one of the largest cigarette and tobbacco producers in the country. As I have said there is little hope for expanding the acreage under cultivation until this excise tax on cigarettes and tobacco is reduced.

During the last election campaign the Prime Minister spoke at Brantford to about 1,400 people made up mostly of tobacco growers. He told them that no industry in Canada suffered a greater degree of taxation than the tobacco industry. He said that tobacco growers represent the one segment of agriculture that is not receiving the attention that it deserves, and he dropped a clear hint that the tax on cigarettes and tobacco would soon be cut. He went on to say that the government wanted to give tobacco growers this assistance and was studying the industry to see what action could be taken to give tobacco growers a more reasonable return on their investment and more security for their efforts. He said a study of this tax would probably be made by the Department of Finance and the ensuing tax cut could be introduced at the time of the 1958-59 budget.

That was three years ago and nothing has been done yet. I presume that these statements by the Prime Minister were not made for the purpose of gaining votes but I am afraid that is exactly what the tobacco growers have accused him of doing.

In 1953 the present Minister of Finance stated that in his opinion the tax on cigarettes and tobacco was too high and that if there was smuggling at the United States border it was largely due to the actions of the Liberal government in imposing sky-high excise taxes. What action did the Minister of Finance take when his government took over? He increased the excise tax on a package of cigarettes by two cents. The increase in the sales in 1959 was only 3.8 per cent, compared with an increasee of 7.5 per cent in the previous year.

The general value of flue-cured tobacco far exceeds the value of any other agricultural commodity. There are approximately 4,500 qualified farms in Ontario growing tobacco in 16 counties. The estimated capital investment in these farms is $300 million or an average of between $65,000 to $70,000 per farm. The farm buildings and equipment required to cultivate flue-cured tobacco is upwards of $40,000, depending on the size of the unit. Salaries and wages of the tobacco industry amount to over $30 million and the number of employees is over 10,000. There are over 50 tobacco products establishments in Canada.

When we examine the production figures we find that the total yield of all types of tobacco products from 1949 to 1959 was 1,600 million pounds and the excise tax and duty on cigarettes alone totalled $1,960 million. In 1958 the Conservative member for Norfolk, who is himself a substantial tobacco grower, urged the government to reduce the excise tax on cigarettes. A reduction in the taxes on cigarettes has been proved to be advantageous to the government because the reduced tax results in higher sales and yields a higher tax level. The accuracy of this statement was proven in 1952-53 when the minister of finance at that time, Mr. Abbott, cut the tax by two cents a pound and the revenue then increased by $7,800,000. I must say that Mr. Abbott raised the tax by two cents a pound the previous year but realized his mistake in so doing.

It has been pointed out to the government that if Canadian cigarettes could be made longer, without this additional cost of two cents per package, there exists the probability of a greatly increased export trade in Canadian cigarettes. It is obvious that it is highly advantageous to increase our export trade.

The total excise tax, including sales tax, on manufactured tobacco products in the fiscal year 1958-59 amounted to $294 million. In comparison, the total excise tax levied on Canadian cars—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to have to inform the hon. member that it is now ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business is for tomorrow and Monday as well?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will commence with third reading of Bill No. C-73, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and follow then with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

The forecast for next week subject to change is as follows: Monday and Tuesday a supply motion; Wednesday, interim supply and if concluded, supplementary estimates. On Thursday we will commence with No. 8 on today's order paper which is a resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture dealing with agricultural development. Following, on Thursday and Friday, we will have the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

The remaining three days prior to the Easter recess will be available for the completion of supplementary estimates and such other business as the house sees fit to bring forward.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, should we finish agriculture on Thursday or on Friday—I doubt if it can be finished Thursday—what other business would we take up?

Mr. Churchill: We would very likely in that event consider the post office estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 17, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

SAINT PATRICK'S DAY

MR. MCGRATH—GREETINGS TO MR. SPEAKER AND MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting most of the hon. members of this house. Today is St. Patrick's day, Mr. Speaker, and it is appropriate that on this St. Patrick's day we welcome back to this house from the commonwealth prime ministers' conference and his history making visit to Ireland our distinguished Prime Minister, the first Canadian prime minister to visit the land that gave Canada Thomas D'Arcy McGee.

On behalf of all Irishmen in this house and those hon. members who wish they were, and on behalf of all Irishmen throughout the length and breadth of this country, I wish you, sir, the top o' the morning. May I voice the age-old cry of Irish exiles and Irish patriots everywhere and say "Erin go bragh".

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the official opposition may we be permitted to associate ourselves with the remarks of affectionate admiration for Ireland and St. Patrick, coupled with the name of that distinguished Irish visitor, Mr. John Patrick O'Diefenbaker.

While we are lauding St. Patrick from the old Emerald isle, let us not forget St. George, St. Andrew and St. David.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): On behalf of this group I shall now do something that I rarely do; I endorse wholeheartedly the remarks of the leader of the official opposition.

STANDING ORDERS

Seventh report of standing committee on standing orders—Miss Aitken.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

REPORT BY PRIME MINISTER ON RETURN

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I first thank the Leader of the Opposition for the way in which he welcomed me back and the designation he gave me. I am sure it was hardly realized that on this day I would be one of those who would owe so much to St. Patrick.

In that connection I might say that in the last few days I paid an official visit to Northern Ireland and also to the republic. In Northern Ireland my wife and I were the guests of the Prime Minister, Lord Brookeborough and Lady Brookeborough. I had the privilege there of addressing a luncheon meeting in the parliament building. From there I went to Dublin at the invitation of the Prime Minister of Ireland, Mr. Lemass. Everywhere I went there was a warmth of feeling for Canada. All were aware that one tenth of the population of Canada is of Irish origin. When I was there I paid a debt that Canada owes to one of the fathers of confederation, the prophet of confederation, Thomas D'Arcy McGee, and there gave to the Irish people a plaque from the people of Canada. On this day all of us, whether of Irish origin or not, join in the tribute paid by the hon. gentleman and those who have followed him to a race to which Canada owes so much.

Mr. Speaker, my primary purpose in rising today is to bring before the house something of the events of the last two weeks. The meeting of the commonwealth prime ministers began in London on March 8 and, as the house knows, I was accompanied there by the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, and was assisted during the conference by the high commissioner to the United Kingdom, Hon. George Drew.

The prime ministers' conference is a most unusual convocation. We sit around a small table with practically all the races of man and five of the leading religions, Christian, Jewish, Buddhist, Hindu and Mohammedan represented there. While during the discussions there are always disagreements in detail, there is that feeling that came to me as I visited the commonwealth countries in Asia and Australia and New Zealand some years ago, a feeling that defies explanation or understanding. It is just impossible to believe that any of the members of the commonwealth could ever be at war with one another.

We met in an international setting not as dark as in May, 1960, when the last meeting was held, but there are disturbing elements. While the Soviet campaign of vilification against Washington has subsided, and this is encouraging, there has been no sign of restraint in other ways by the Soviet leaders. They have relentlessly pursued Communist aims in countres as far apart as the Congo and Laos. I am not going to deal today with the Congo except to say that there the United Nations is on trial, and if it does not succeed in restoring law and order in that country the hopes and aspirations of mankind with respect to that institution may very well be diminished.

While all of us know the situation in Laos, those who live in Asia regard it as fraught with terrible danger.

The Soviet have maintained with increasing vigour their assault on the United Nations and also on the secretary general. Notwithstanding smiles toward Washington, there is much evidence that the Soviet union is not preparing genuinely for a period of calm and conciliation.

Everywhere over that conference came the shadow of communist China, the leaders of which country show an even greater thirst for domination and influence in the uncommitted world than does the Soviet union. The prime ministers were acutely conscious of these uncertainties and dangers. We dealt at some length with the current international situation, and I will deal with that on another occasion.

What I intend to do today is mainly to emphasize the momentous change that took place in the future relationship of the Union of South Africa with the commonwealth. Some may say this is being emotional, but my mind goes back to February, 1917, when for the first time I had an idea of what this commonwealth might be. The expression was not in general use at that time, although it had been originally used some 25 years prior to that date. I saw the King going to open parliament in the darkest days of the war escorted by three or four troops of Boer cavalry, all of whom had served against Britain only a matter of 14 or 15 years before. All of us saw, too, the contribution made by the Union of South Africa in two world wars.

Even before the meeting it was very clear that this would be the focus of general attention. I do not think it is an overstatement to say that in the long history of these commonwealth or empire meetings—we have had ten since the war—no issue so severely strained or tested the flexible bonds of the commonwealth association as did the one which faced this conference.

You will recall that South Africa first raised the question of its future relationship with the commonwealth at the meeting of the prime ministers in May, 1960. The foreign minister of that union gave notice of the intention of his country to hold a referendum on the question of whether South Africa should adopt a republican form of government. At the same time he asked for advance approval of its continuance of membership, or readmission to the commonwealth. At that time we gave to this problem a twofold reaction; the prime ministers affirmed that the choice between a monarchy and a republic was entirely a matter for South Africa to decide, but they also agreed unanimously, and I intend to read this because it represented a change in the commonwealth relationship which had previously existed—

> In the event of South Africa deciding to become a republic and if the desire was subsequently expressed to remain a member of the commonwealth, the meeting suggested that the South African government should then ask for the consent of the other commonwealth governments, either at a meeting of commonwealth prime ministers or, if this were not practicable, by correspondence.

On October 5, 1960 South Africa's choice was made by a referendum which resulted in a majority favouring the adoption of a republic. Subsequently the government of that country announced that a republican constitution would be proclaimed on May 31. I felt and still feel that we had made it clear last May that there was no automaticity about the application of a country which was a member of the commonwealth and which changed its form of government to that of a republic; and that until the legislative processes had been completed the decision had not finally been made.

That view did not command general support. I should point out here that the first reading of the bill to set up a republic was given in the South African house of representatives on January 23, that second reading was given on February 9 and that then the bill was referred to a select joint committee of both houses, the committee to report to parliament on March 24. Hence the matter is still before the parliament of South Africa.

What in effect was being asked was advance approval prior to the final legislative decision being made, something that was denied last May. The wording of the communiqué in May, 1960 reflected the general view of the prime ministers that a positive act of concurrence was required on the part of each of the other member governments if South Africa's request for consent to remain a member of the commonwealth was to be granted. It was agreed by the foreign minister of South Africa that all governments would have to consent; at least that was the statement he made in May last. It was argued that even in the face of the wording of the communique last May, it was still a virtual formality for countries applying for continuance of membership to remain as members. I think it was the consensus of a majority if not all of the prime ministers that more than a formality was involved. We met. The Leader of the Opposition, with the experience he has had, realizes that I cannot go into detail as to what actually took place but can give only a general outline.

Dr. Verwoerd, the Prime Minister, relied throughout on the argument that the consitutional issue should be dealt with separately, and that on the basis of the precedents there should be no question of South Africa's right to continuing membership. The discussion took a long time. All agreed that South Africa's constitutional change was not in itself an obstacle to continuing membership, but the view was strongly held that the question of membership could not be divorced from the international implications of the union government's racial policies. Apartheid has become the world's symbol of discrimination; and in the eyes of the prime ministers present, other than Dr. Verwoerd, to give unqualified consent to South Africa's application would be to condone the policies of apartheid.

That was the core of the issue which engaged our attention for three days. It was, I have been told, a discussion without parallel in the annals of the commonwealth association. It is a great organization where men—and a woman this time, the Prime Minister of Ceylon—with strong convictions, can sit down together and yet not speak to one another at any time with bitterness, virulence or in the manner described in some of the articles written by persons who must have secured their information from sources not present at the meeting.

I said, and I repeat, that it was a time for the exercise of the utmost compassion, and I have no apology to offer for that. That does not mean an acceptance of what is wrong; and I have found through life that if you follow that course you do not too often have to look back on events and say "If only I had acted otherwise". Compassion does not mean sacrifice of principle. It is based on a seriousness of purpose and a desire for accommodation. Though viewpoints were diametrically opposed, there was a determination to explore every possibility of a solution. If that attitude had not been followed the meetings might well have ended in an angry outburst of mutual recrimination.

Last night at the hour of 11.30 there were gathered in London the prime ministers of the commonwealth—and South Africa is still a member of the commonwealth—and you could not have detected there the tremendous effect of what had taken place a few hours earlier.

We tried to do whatever was humanly possible to avoid a break without making a sacrifice of basic principles. South Africa sought consent on the ground that continued membership was a virtual formality. I took the position that if we were to accept South Africa's request unconditionally our action would be taken as approval or at least condonation of racial policies which are repugnant to and unequivocally abhorred and condemned by Canadians as a whole. Speaking for Canada—and I do not have to say that this attitude represents no recent conversion—I pointed out that we were opposed to racial discrimination, and made it clear that I could not approve any formula or solution which did not maintain beyond any doubt that non-discrimination in respect of race and colour is an essential principle of the commonwealth association.

This was not a stand which was taken then and not before; I have followed that course over the years. All but the Prime Minister of South Africa were in agreement that no expression of consent to South Africa's continuing membership was possible without an expression of the strongest views on their part regarding apartheid.

I shall not go into detail in this connection. We spent a long time on this. The general attitude we took was to criticize strongly and deplore the racial policy of the Union government and the anxiety which we felt it was arousing in the hearts and minds of millions of people throughout the world. We expressed our deep concern about its impact on the relations among the member countries of the commonwealth and on the cohesion of the commonwealth itself as a multiracial association. I took the stand then, and I have taken it before, that the United Nations answers to these principles, and that the commonwealth cannot do less.

The Prime Minister of South Africa stressed strongly the positive aspect of the Union government's policy. He deplored the accusations of racial discrimination and contended that the other prime ministers did not understand the situation as they should. As I have already said, there was a patient and exhaustive search for a formula which would encompass frank criticism of apartheid. Somebody said "We do not want compromise". Well, the countries which feel discrimination most strongly, and which were the most outspoken critics, showed a desire and readiness at all times to come to agreement without sacrifice of principle, and I say in no bitter sense that there was no corresponding readiness on the part of Prime Minister Verwoerd. When I say that, I do not want hon. members to conclude that he was lacking in forbearance. He is a wonderful personality; he is a kindly burgher. In the face of strong and sometimes provocative criticism he maintained throughout an impressive courtesy and calm.

Was there ever a prospect of a constructive outcome? There might have been. There was a time when discussions seemed to give promise of a mutually acceptable solution. Dr. Verwoerd seemed ready then to acquiesce in a formula which would have been coupled with a declaration of principle by the cumulative conscience of the other prime ministers. That formula might have been accepted. But as discussion proceeded the basis of the compromise dissolved and it was impossible to find language capable of bridging the gulf. Again I say this; it is a lesson to those in this house who sometimes speak about what they would do if they were there. Those who belonged to non-white races showed an attitude of endeavouring to bring about some compromise.

When that hope ended, criticism continued. With some evident regret and without any advance notice—although he read from a document which I observed was somewhat dog-eared—Dr. Verwoerd formally withdrew South Africa's request to continue membership. In the tense drama of that moment little remained to be said. The true depth of the cleavage between him and the things he represented and the other members of the commonwealth was revealed, stretching to the breaking point the will to bridge it.

As I said a moment ago, South Africa remains a member of the commonwealth until May 31. Dr. Verwoerd made it clear that traditional ties with the commonwealth countries will continue. It is difficult to convey the picture of only a matter of 12 or 15 hours ago, when we were together as guests of the Queen and when such a change came about with so little apparent ill feeling.

Was the result unavoidable? I think it was. Over the years I have contended that in a multiracial association it had to become clear beyond doubt that if the commonwealth is to be a force for good, as it should be, there must be a measure of general agreement that discrimination in respect of race and colour shall not take place. I do not think we can compromise that principle if we believe that the commonwealth has a mission for all mankind. It would lose its power to meet challenges and opportunities in the future. I am more convinced than ever as to the power of this institution touching every part of the world.

I am not going to deal today with the conclusions on disarmament, but I think the discussions on that subject brought about a new relationship among the members of the commonwealth; but not an institutionalization, or anything that would interfere with the sovereignty of any of us. The influence of India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Ghana, Nigeria and Malaya joining with the other members of the commonwealth on a subject that has divided the United Nations and on which there has not been that progress that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would have hoped for, represents a major step, as indicated in the appendix on disarmament, toward a realization that only through action now can we save mankind from ultimate self-destruction.

The question naturally arises, has the commonwealth been weakened? Dr. Verwoerd says it is the beginning of disintegration. There are some who view with apprehension the shifting composition of the association. It is a strange thing, but out goes Verwoerd and in comes Archbishop Makarios to represent Cyprus. Sierra Leone was accepted, and other countries will be making application to join within the next year or so. The close intimacy of the days when the present Leader of the Opposition was secretary of state for external affairs, with a few members gathered about, is ended.

There are those who see South Africa's decision as the forerunner of further withdrawals as a result of campaigns of criticism related to national policy. In that connection I should point out this. All of us agreed that no national policy of any country should be examined or considered without the consent of that country. Dr. Verwoerd himself undertook the explanation of the policies of his country.

I do not minimize the risks inherent in the emerging trends. The task before the commonwealth is to reduce the risks by building firmly on new foundations. What has happened might be epitomized thus. We have declared that non-discrimination on the basis of race and colour is the foundation stone of a multiracial association composed of representatives from all parts of the world. No foundation could be broader or more solidly based than the fundamental principle which, though unwritten, has emerged from this meeting.

I have advocated in the past and I continue to advocate a declaration of principles. When I spoke in the house on May 16 last I referred to the possibility that the time might not be far distant when acceptance by custom rather than by the declaration of certain basic principles, including the equality of all mankind irrespective of race, colour and creed would be assured. No document was signed on this occasion, but that does not diminish the importance of what happened. I reiterate that we accepted the basic principle and established it as a commonwealth custom for the future. This is the bedrock of the modern commonwealth, the assurance as I see it of a stronger commonwealth in the future.

You will have noted, sir, that shortly before the meeting began the chief minister of Tanganyika, Mr. Julius Nyerere, published an arresting statement in which it was said that in so far as Tanganyika was concerned there would be no question of applying for membership in the commonwealth if discrimination were condoned. That statement and others by African leaders in territories shortly to achieve independence foreshadowed the course and the promise of the future.

There will be some who will say, and they will speak with great energy, that we should have pressed for the expulsion of South Africa. I remind those who speak in that vein that Ghana, Nigeria, India, Pakistan, Malaya and Ceylon did not follow that course. I think the fact that this break had to come and that South Africa should have withdrawn its application was the best course that could be followed. It provided a clearer opportunity of registering the principle of non-discrimination; for the prime ministers would not have been satisfied with less.

As the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom said yesterday in the British House of Commons, I regret that South Africa made this choice instead of adopting the attitude of a reasonable acceptance of a primary fact in the world in which we live.

I have seen the commonwealth in a different light than ever before. We took the course that anyone who recognizes the fact that communism marches on the application of discrimination, wherever it is practised, must take. I shall detour a moment to tell hon. members that, in the midst of the argument the day before yesterday, Dr. Verwoerd handed me a clipping regarding the denial of admission of two negroes to a hotel in the city of Edmonton. I do not think I have to make any further observation in that connection.

This is a fair summary of what took place. I thank the house for hearing me so patiently. I do not think there is any immediate necessity to discuss the other matters that were dealt with, but I will do so if the house grants me that privilege when the estimates of the Department of External Affairs are before the committee of supply.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be to reiterate what I have already said to the Prime Minister personally, namely that it is good to see him back in the house and looking so hale and hearty after what must have been a very exhausting and in some respects, I am sure, a trying experience at the prime ministers' conference. As a matter of fact, when I was passing the Chateau this morning I had thought of dropping into the hotel and taking advantage of one of those machines that are scattered around the lobby to give him the message on film and signing it in that way. Perhaps this is a better way of doing it.

The Prime Minister has spoken with moving eloquence about the nature, the character and the history of conferences of commonwealth prime ministers; how in the past it has been possible to maintain the informal, friendly character of those meetings, sitting around, as he put it, a small table, which will now have to get larger, and talking together as members of a family. It has been possible in the past to keep those meetings on that informal family level; prevent controversial subjects coming up in the kind of discussion which would bring about public statements and reports.

The communique on this particular conference which was issued this morning and to which the Prime Minister alluded briefly—and I can understand that the reference should be brief on this occasion, because we shall have an opportunity later to debate the international matters referred to in the communique as well as in greater detail the commonwealth questions involved—referred to the international situation which he mentioned as one in which the atmosphere happily is somewhat better. I do not think however, that any of us can take very much comfort out of that, however, because, as the Prime Minister has put it, cold war policies have not changed. Even the atmosphere after the inauguration of the new administration in Washington has unfortunately clouded again recently and, if I may put it this way, coexistence seems to be returning unhappily to normal.

The communique has an interesting reference to the importance of making progress in disarmament. It is to be regretted that understandably the commonwealth prime ministers on this occasion were not able to co-ordinate the resolutions which now are before the United Nations, including the Canadian resolution designed to, as the communique put it, promote disarmament negotiations, so that the commonwealth could have acted in this respect through a single disarmament resolution.

The Prime Minister referred to the discussions—and they are mentioned in the communique—about the United Nations structure and constitution. There is an interesting paragraph in the communique on that. I regret that it was not found possible—I can understand why it was not—to include in the communique some expression of unity and strong support for the secretary general in the work he is doing under the vicious attacks that are being made on him by those who are even more interested in destroying his office than they are in destroying the man. However, I am glad to see that there is in the communique a reference to the desirability of upholding the purposes and principles of the charter and the preservation of the international and independent character of the secretariat. In that connection I cannot help but feel some relief that a proposal which appeared in the press at least and which may have appeared in the conference, to change the structure of the higher level of the secretariat by surrounding the secretary general with three deputy secretaries general does not appear in this communique. I cannot myself feel that this would be a helpful change at this time.

There is no reference in the communique, although I am sure it is a matter under continuous consideration, to the desirability, and perhaps even in the future the necessity, of modifying in some way the structure of consultation and discussion among members of the commonwealth at commonwealth conferences in the light of the new constitution of the commonwealth. New members are coming in at each commonwealth prime ministers' conference, and that is all to the good; but of course it does alter the nature of commonwealth meetings, as the Prime Minister himself has pointed out. As he said, the old days of a small, intimate, informal association around a small table seem to have disappeared.

The most important and difficult matter, and one of the most dramatic that has ever come before a prime ministers' conference, was the situation that arose in regard to the application of South Africa to remain in the commonwealth consequent upon the adoption of a republican constitution to take effect at the end of May. It was decided some years ago, and the decision is not likely to be reversed, that there is room in this commonwealth of nations for nations of every constitutional form and character. Yet it has, I think, become a part of the conventions, because there are no laws of the commonwealth, that if a member of the commonwealth changes its constitutional structure or character, or if a member of the commonwealth seeks to enter via colonial status, the application should be agreed to by all the existing members of the commonwealth. That was required previously, and it has been required in the application made by South Africa. That application has now been withdrawn, and there is no reason to believe that South Africa will not now be leaving this association of nations at the end of May.

It is impossible not to regret deeply that the diplomacy of conciliation and mediation was not successful at the meeting in London in finding a formula which would have maintained inviolate a principle without bringing about a separation. No one, Mr. Speaker, can surely take any satisfaction out of the withdrawal from the commonwealth of the country of General Botha, the country that produced in the person of Field Marshal Smuts one of the greatest statesmen and leaders in the commonwealth, the country where the transition in a few years from military defeat to self government, to partnership, has always, and rightly, been heralded as one of the glories of the commonwealth association. Whatever may happen to South Africa, Delville Wood and Tobruk will always be in the commonwealth, and perhaps even now we may be able to look forward to a day when changing policies and changing conditions and the acceptance of those changes in South Africa may make it possible and desirable for South Africa to ask for readmission into the commonwealth in circumstances which would ensure a welcome for her by all the other members of the commonwealth.

One can take no satisfaction out of this withdrawal, but one can take even less satisfaction out of the fact that it was brought about by the uncompromising adherence of the South African government to a policy of race discrimination which was bound to be deeply repugnant to and opposed by other members of our multiracial association of free nations. The feelings of Canadians inside and outside the house about such discrimination have already been expressed. They have been expressed by the Prime Minister and other members of the government. They were expressed by me last April 27 prior to the conference of that year, and they were expressed formally in a resolution by the national convention of the party I have the honour to lead, a resolution passed unanimously last January, which reads as follows:

> The commonwealth has recently undergone rapid and important changes which have brought colonies to independence. Canada should continue to foster and support all such moves inside and outside the commonwealth toward responsible freedom. We should uncompromisingly oppose policies or trends based on racial or other forms of discrimination, including apartheid in particular, which not only are bad in themselves but are incompatible with the nature of the commonwealth as a multiracial association of equal, independent and freely co-operating nations.

Nothing has happened since then, Mr. Speaker, to change my views and those of my party on this matter. Before the last commonwealth prime ministers' conference, which was in May, 1960, I believe, the Prime Minister said that he feared "for the future of the commonwealth if the prime ministers' conference should become the judge and jury of the conduct of member nations". He repeated that view at a Canadian Club dinner in London a week or so ago, according to press reports.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the commonwealth conference has now decided that there must be such judgment including, according to press reports—and the Prime Minister confirmed those reports this morning—the requirement that every member of the commonwealth accept certain principles, among them being condemnation of racial discrimination. According to the London correspondent of the Toronto Globe and Mail, as found in the issue of March 15—until the Prime Minister spoke this morning this was the only quoted text I was able to get on this subject—Mr. Nehru put forward this requirement in a declaration which included the following:

> We the prime ministers of the commonwealth recognize that the principle of racial discrimination is inconsistent with membership in the commonwealth.

I take it that now applies to the commonwealth association. Last May I stated in the house that the conference of that time had merely "postponed a showdown". That showdown has now taken place, presumably on the basis of the declaration I have just quoted or the one from which the Prime Minister read this morning, because when such a declaration was pressed to a decision the result, it is now perfectly clear, was inevitable. I take it from what the Prime Minister has said this morning that the choice had to be made in London between South Africa and apartheid in the commonwealth and the Asian and African members remaining in the commonwealth. In the circumstances which made that choice necessary, the processes of conciliation and mediation having regrettably failed, there was, I believe, only one course for Canada to follow and she followed it.

But let us not deceive ourselves. The implications of the procedure that has been followed and of the results that have flowed from it at this conference are very important and very far reaching. On May 16 last the Prime Minister had this to say in the House of Commons as found on page 3899 of Hansard:

> ...if we ever arrive at the point where we will discuss—

He was referring to commonwealth prime ministers' conferences.

> —the internal affairs of other countries and determine the course by a majority, then there will be problems that will arise and it could only mean that several countries in the commonwealth could not accept the decisions of the majority. I need not go into particulars in that regard; I think a number would come to mind immediately, including the question of migration.

The commonwealth has now reached and passed this point of non-intervention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I may be permitted to say something, and I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, I pointed out that Dr. Verwoerd himself introduced the subject for discussion at London and said, "I am prepared to discuss this". Otherwise we would have found ourselves in the position that we always have, that internal affairs of any nation shall not be discussed.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made an interesting intervention to the effect that—I hope I am not misinterpreting what he said—if Dr. Verwoerd had not himself agreed at this meeting to the discussion of the matter, it could not with propriety have been discussed. That is very interesting and very significant in terms of the future of the new commonwealth association. Undoubtedly we have had indication that this will happen; that questions concerning racial discrimination in all its forms, if they should ever arise, will in fact be subjects of discussion. I would have thought from what happened in London that it has now been established that the policies of any of the members of the commonwealth which affect racial discrimination in any form, or constitute a violation of human rights or human dignity, are now subjects for examination at the commonwealth conferences. This change comes at a time when new members are being added to the commonwealth who are sensitive to a degree in regard to these matters especially and to any suspicion, even, of racial discrimination, but who do not—I say this in no spirit of criticism at all in view of the circumstances that they face in these countries—all apply in the conditions that face their countries those concepts of personal liberty and political democracy which, in the case of our own country and others, are the result of long and slow development over the years, which is no doubt why they work so well in our country.

We are indeed approaching a new and testing era in commonwealth relations. A great deal of understanding and good will is going to be needed by all the nations concerned if the test is to be met successfully. It is imperative that it should be met. If it is, then the commonwealth can perform now a role of great and increasing value as a bridge between Asia and Africa on the one hand and the west on the other, when there are very few if any such bridges in the world. I would think that the commonwealth is now, because of what has happened in London, put in a stronger rather than a weaker position to perform that particular role.

South Africa's announced withdrawal raises certain questions for its former associates in the commonwealth, questions of preferential trade and commonwealth status which it is not necessary to go into now; we will have an opportunity to discuss that before long, I assume. The withdrawal raises one other question which I am sure is in all our minds. What will it do for those African people who are the victims of that policy of apartheid which in the event, because the South African government clung so stubbornly to it, forced South Africa out? Will it hurt or help them? In any event, surely it is to be hoped that South Africa's new isolation will not give her a feeling of immunity from world opinion in this matter of apartheid and racial discrimination.

The commonwealth will soon lose one of its founding members in circumstances that can cause no satisfaction to anyone. One old member will go and two new ones will now come in, one from Africa and one from the Mediterranean. Let us hope that this association which has done so much in the world since it was formed will now be stronger and have a deeper meaning for those that remain in it and for the new ones to come into it.

Surely there can be no difference of opinion in this house on this score, that the strengthening of this association should be the objective of every member nation in the commonwealth whose full equality with every other member in rights and in race has now been confirmed, I think it is correct to say, as a condition of membership. There is no certainty, in the new circumstances of the old commonwealth, that this objective of strengthening can be achieved. It will not be done merely by speeches and declarations; it will be done only by the closest co-operation among all its members based on mutual respect and understanding.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I want to add my voice at this time to that of the Leader of the Opposition in extending to the Prime Minister a very warm welcome home. We welcome him today, along with the people all across our country, as the Prime Minister of our nation who has returned from a very important international conference.

I think we all regret exceedingly that South Africa found it impossible to start along the road of changing its policies of discrimination based on race. We regret that South Africa gave no indication that she was prepared to amend those policies. We believe, that being the situation, the members of the commonwealth had no other course but to express strong opposition to those policies, strong to the point that South Africa withdrew her application for readmission to the commonwealth. If the commonwealth is to survive and grow, as I am certain it shall, then it seems to us essential that this principle of nondiscrimination should be spelled out and strengthened.

The commonwealth, to make a contribution to peace and to the welfare of humanity, must be based on nondiscrimination. I suggest therefore that it must be based, for its main strength, on free institutions. The principle of the equality of human races is being accepted more and more throughout the world, and those who would continue a policy of the dark ages of the past will find themselves, in our opinion, in a smaller and smaller minority. Survival of humankind itself depends on the removal of discrimination in all its forms.

If the prime ministers at the commonwealth conference had decided, which was the alternative, to allow South Africa to remain in the commonwealth I should think there would have been great danger that other nations might leave the commonwealth. It would seem to me that this very act would carry the danger of turning the peoples of Africa and Asia against the commonwealth itself. There is no doubt that the course taken by South Africa is a very dangerous one and that this small minority, the white population, is in increasing danger because of the policy that South Africa has followed. If that minority is to have any hope of survival it must be in a community where racial equality is accepted, and it will have to be in a world where the white nations have determined that racial discrimination shall be removed.

We naturally regret these unhappy events, but we think the maintenance of the commonwealth has not in fact been jeopardized. On the contrary, we think history will show that although this was one of the most frustrating days for members of the commonwealth, it will eventually be found to be a turning point from which the commonwealth will gain greater and greater strength.

There is, of course, one question which I think is in the minds of most of us and which has not been dealt with today. I refer to the economic policies that will be followed as between South Africa and the other members of the commonwealth beyond May if this extremely difficult and apparently inevitable step is now to be taken. I am not one of those who think we should necessarily discriminate because one action has been taken which we do not support. However, it seems to us that it must not be possible for a member to remove herself from the commonwealth of nations while at the same time retaining the economic advantages that go with partnership in the club. We think it would be a bad precedent if a member could be removed from the club while still allowed to enjoy commonwealth trade preferences.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it seems to me that he is introducing a new subject which is beyond the scope of the statement and which might better be reserved for the time when debate can take place on these matters.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, this is certainly a question which must be dealt with, on which statements must be made and as to which policy must be determined. South Africa having taken this course, we are of the opinion that it may be possible for more liberal elements within that country to exert themselves and that from this unhappy situation will grow a modification of the apartheid laws. We believe that economic pressure may become an effective means of bringing to bear on the government of that country the kind of influence that may lead to a modification of those policies. The future we cannot see, but certainly as a result of the events that have taken place Canada is now in a position to exercise stronger and increased determination to lead middle powers in the world along the line destined to bring about peace, racial equality and the removal of discrimination in all its forms.

We express the hope that the voice of Canada will speak out more loudly in this regard. Although these are very difficult times, we think the United Nations will stand us in good stead. With conditions in Africa as they are and with the possibility of deterioration, we think now is the time for members and supporters of the United Nations to strengthen the instrument of the United Nations in every possible way.

As to the step that has now been taken, we believe history will show that it indicates a growing support of the basic dignity of human individuals and a growing respect for the equality of races; we believe that in the days ahead it will lead to a strengthening of free political institutions. Although it is a difficult time for all of us, we think eventually this step will go down in history as one of the great events to its credit in the evolution of the commonwealth, and as one of those great historic events to which mankind will refer and say "Here we made great progress".

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ITALY—CENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF CONSTITUTIONAL MONARCHY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the house to a significant anniversary observed this year in the history of a nation which has been closely associated with Canada in friendship and history, and whose traditions and culture have contributed much to this nation. On March 17, one hundred years ago, the parliament of Piedmont met at Turin, Italy and proclaimed Italy a kingdom under Victor Emmanuel II. This act created the first national government of united Italy and the present parliamentary republic which came into being in 1946 was the successor state to the constitutional monarchy established in 1861.

To commemorate the centenary of this historic event celebrations are being held this year throughout Italy, and major Italian cities will solemnize the occasion with appropriate ceremonies. This occasion provides us in Canada with an opportunity to pay tribute to the major contributions made in so many fields of Canadian endeavour by nearly a million and a half Canadians of Italian descent, among whom are two distinguished members of the house, namely the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Martini) and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai).

As a manifestation of the deep-rooted friendship and good will which Canada cherishes for Italy and for its people, I should like to suggest that it would be appropriate for the Canadian House of Commons, on this the one hundredth anniversary of Italy's independence, to pay tribute to what has been done and also to have placed before it an appropriate motion. I therefore move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson):

> That the Speaker of the House of Commons convey to the president of the chamber of deputies of the parliament of Italy, the good wishes of the Canadian House of Commons on the occasion of the centennial anniversary of the proclamation of Italy as a unified state at Turin on March 17, 1861.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured by being able to second this motion of tribute to one of the lands from which Canada has secured so much strength and colour in the person of Canadians from that land. I refer to the land of Italy to which the world owes so much as the source of the civilizing mission of Rome, of the mission of the Christian church, as well as the source of so much that has contributed to civilization in the arts and letters, especially from the Renaissance.

Inquiries of the Minister

As the Prime Minister stated, one hundred years ago the nation of Italy was established. It was due to the work of men like Cavour, Mazzini and Garibaldi. During that one hundred years Italy has had its ups and downs, and there have been times when we in Canada have not found ourselves on the same side as Italy in international events. Happily those days are over, and we now work together with the government and the people of Italy in the friendliest possible co-operation as allies in the Atlantic community.

As the Prime Minister has mentioned, we owe a great debt of gratitude to that country for those who have come to Canada from it and whose industry, initiative, intelligence and colour have added so much to our national heritage.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): This is another subject, Mr. Speaker, about which there is unanimity in all quarters of the house. I am pleased on behalf of the C.C.F.-New Party caucus to associate ourselves with the remarks of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. We are pleased to pay this tribute not only to Italy as a nation but also to our fellow Canadians who have come from that land. It is easy for us to pay this tribute at this time since our relations with Italy are so cordial, and we are fortunate as a country to count among our citizens so many thousands of people who have come here from Italy and who are becoming in such a short space of time Canadian citizens in the very best sense of the word.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO LOSS OF TRADE PREFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the Minister of National Revenue perhaps I might address this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I referred to it yesterday in addressing a question to the hon. gentleman. It is this. Is it not a fact that the government may withdraw by order in council the benefits of the British preferential tariff from any British country, and that authority for any such withdrawal is given to the governor in council under subsection 1 of section 4 of the Customs Tariff Act?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Leader of the Opposition has asked this question in a general way, but I presume what he is fishing for is an answer to a question he asked yesterday as reported at page 3033 of Hansard, which reads:

Is it or is it not a fact that preferential treatment automatically ends with withdrawal of any nation from the commonwealth?

Yesterday I replied by saying I was not in a position to give a definite answer to the question. I am in a position to give an answer today. The fact is that there is a bilateral trade agreement, as I had indicated earlier yesterday, between Canada and South Africa signed in 1932 following the imperial economic conference, and that agreement provides for guarantees on rates of duty and in some instances margins of preference for specific products. The agreement extended initially for five years, and after that date was terminable on six months' notice by either party. There is no clause in the agreement which states that preferential treatment ends with the withdrawal of either party from the commonwealth. The agreement is still in existence, and hon. members may be interested to learn that Canada sells far more goods to South Africa than we buy from that country.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): In view of the fact that so many important questions turn on the studies of the royal commission on transportation I wonder if the Prime Minister could inform the house when he expects to receive either the intermediate or the final report.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not had a report since my return about two hours ago, but I shall try to have the information for Monday.

UNITED NATIONS

SOUTH WEST AFRICA—IMPLEMENTATION OF RESOLUTION RESPECTING TRUST TERRITORY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what action the government proposes to take to carry out the United Nations resolution, which it supported, that influence be brought to bear on South Africa to change its policy in connection with the trust territory of South West Africa.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am not in a position today to make any statement about what action should be taken. I think that resolution was brought forward having in mind the commonwealth conference which, of course, has just ended.

Inquiries of the Minister

SPORTS

HOCKEY—REQUEST FOR OVERPRINT STAMP COMMEMORATING WORLD CHAMPIONSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Postmaster General. I am asking this question at the request of the David Thompson stamp club at Castlegar, British Columbia, whose members are ardent philatelists with an appreciation of major sports achievements in Canadian history.

In view of the fact that from time to time numerous countries smaller than Canada have commemorated many less important events than the winning of the world hockey championship by the Trail Smoke Eaters with special issues of stamps, would the minister give consideration to having some five million copies of the large size northern development stamp overprinted with the words "World Hockey Championship, 1961"?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I agree with the hon. member that this is an event of considerable interest to all Canadians but, like so many of our recent stamp issues, this one has proved so popular and in such demand that there is no substantial quantity left which could be overprinted in the way suggested. Since the name of the team is the Trail Smoke Eaters I looked to see whether we might have five million copies left of the fire prevention stamp, but we do not have this quantity available.

Mr. Herridge: In the event of there being another issue of this stamp during the present year, would the minister give consideration to the request I have made?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I would not be too hopeful that we would be able to work anything out, but I shall be glad to give consideration to the suggestion.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, following the question of the hon. member for Kootenay West, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General and ask him if he will not issue a stamp in honour of the record established last night in Montreal by Boom Boom Geoffrion?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, if we were to issue stamps in honour of the records established and to be established this year by the Montreal Canadiens we would have no room for other issues.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—INSTALMENT PAYMENT ON SALE OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate inquired whether Dimensional Investments Limited had made the payment which was due on March 15 in relation to the sale of Indian land at Sarnia. The answer is no. Notice was sent to the company yesterday giving them 30 days in which to remedy the default.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ABBOTSFORD, B.C.—REPORTED CANCELLATION OF RESERVE ARMY PARADES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence based on a recent editorial appearing in the Abbottsford-Sumas-Matsqui News. I wish to ask the minister whether it is correct, as stated in the editorial, that reserve army parades have been cancelled in the Abbotsford area due to the withdrawal of transport vehicles for repair.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): The militia units in Abbotsford consist of two transport platoons and one workshop platoon of 156 company, Royal Canadian Army Service Corps. In addition there is an army cadet corps sponsored by the militia. Five vehicles are maintained for the transportation of militia and cadet personnel to the training area. Earlier this month three of these vehicles were sent to the workshop for repairs, one of which will be returned before Easter and the remaining two shortly thereafter.

I am informed that to date training has not suffered through the temporary loss of these vehicles. Western command is attempting to arrange alternative transportation.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): A supplementary question. Is there no pool of vehicles in western command available to provide alternative transportation in these circumstances?

Mr. Harkness: There is a pool of vehicles available. Western command headquarters, as the hon. member probably knows, are in Edmonton and, as I said, an attempt is being made to provide some extra vehicles while the repairs to the unit's vehicles are being undertaken.

Inquiries of the Minister

TRADE

FLOUR—DISCUSSION OF U.S. SUBSIDY ON EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister tell us whether he raised the question of subsides on United States flour exports in his conversations with United States officials on his recent visit to Washington?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Finance has already made a statement on this subject. I believe he mentioned that food products were discussed. Of course that would include flour.

TURKEYS—INQUIRY AS TO QUOTA ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Agriculture is in a position today to answer a question I asked yesterday, which his parliamentary secretary took as notice.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I examined this question in Hansard this morning. The question is as follows:

Is it the intention of the government to abolish the four million pound maximum quota on the importation of turkeys from the United States?

I am not sure whether this question is in order, though I may be subject to correction in that respect. If it is, I should like to say that at the present time we have no thought in mind concerning any change.

OLD AGE SECURITY

CLARK REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare based on a statement he made in this house two and a half years ago to the effect that he was studying the recommendations and projections of the Clark report regarding the old age security system in the United States and its possible adoption in Canada. Now that the study has proceeded for two and a half years, is the minister in a position at this time to say that government policy is or will be?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, government policy will be announced in the house in the usual manner, of course.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister whether he has completed his study, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GRAND'MERE, QUE.—REPORTED CLOSING OF KNITTING MILLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether he has had an opportunity to look into the question I asked yesterday in connection with the laying off of some 300 employees of the Grand'Mere Knitting Mills and the Grand'Mere Handcraft Mills?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No report has yet been brought to my attention on this matter, Mr. Speaker.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-73, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $911,098.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Chairman, as I am the first speaker today I think I would be remiss if I did not welcome our Prime Minister back to Canada. I am very pleased to see that he is in good health after such a tiring trip. We have an outstanding Prime Minister who is guiding the destiny of our country in difficult days. If I may address the right hon. gentleman through you, sir, I am sure, Mr. Prime Minister, that the people of Canada appreciate the untiring leadership you are giving us at this time.

I wish to take this opportunity of congratulating our Minister of Agriculture on the fine job he is doing at this time. It is beyond my understanding how the hon. member for Assiniboia can go across the country talking about what a great mistake was the appointment of our present Minister of Agriculture. I have in my hand an article which appeared in the Edmonton Journal reporting a speech made by the hon. member for Assiniboia in Regina. The article reads in part:

National C.C.F. leader Hazen Argue said Tuesday the appointment of former northern affairs minister Alvin Hamilton as agriculture minister in a federal cabinet reshuffle is a mistake.

He also said he is disappointed that the federal government failed to appoint a farmer to the post.

"This is not only a mistake because Mr. Hamilton is not a farmer but because he is not acquainted with agriculture."

We all know that the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia places great reliance on the Saskatchewan farmers union. Let us examine what the president of that union said with respect to this appointment.

Mr. Argue: I often disagree with them.

Mr. Smallwood: Oh, not very often. This is terrific. The hon. gentleman is changing horses again.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't worry about the ability of the hon. member to change horses.

Mr. Smallwood: Maybe he will marry off the farmers to labour. The hon. gentleman is now starting to disagree with the farmers. This is what the president of the Saskatchewan farmers union said as reported in the Western Producer:

President Alf Gleave of the Saskatchewan farmers union said Saskatchewan farmers will be happy to have one of their own members of parliament as minister of agriculture.

"Mr. Hamilton has a thorough knowledge of the farm situation, particularly of the position the western grain growers are in, and we are hopeful that he will enact measures that will improve it."

I am pleased to read that statement by the president of the Saskatchewan farmers union. Our present minister who now has control of the wheat board has done a great job in expanding our markets.

I wish now to deal briefly with some of the comments made by the hon. member for Assiniboia, who recently advanced the proposal that the government should announce quotas for the ensuing year and made the suggestion that if the government announces it will take eight bushels and can take only six the wheat, should be left on the farm and the farmers should be paid for the remaining amount.

Let us examine this proposal. It is obviously a suggestion designed to help the big producers, the big wheat farmers. During the discussion of the Aurora Pipe Line Company bill we heard a great deal from hon. members in the far corner about Texas buccaneers.

Mr. Argue: A red herring.

Mr. Smallwood: I am not dragging in any red herrings, buster. During the discussion of Aurora we heard a great deal about Texas buccaneers. We are aware that it is a fact that 24 per cent of Saskatchewan farms on the Regina plains are controlled by United States interests. These are the big boys that the hon. member for Assiniboia seeks to help with his proposal. They probably own up to 3,000 acres. The hon. member wants the government to buy their grain which is left on the farm. He urges that we spend our money in this way giving it to the big American buccaneers on the Regina plains instead of helping the small family farms.

Mr. Argue: You are even more stupid than usual.

Mr. Smallwood: I did not hear that remark, but I thought the hon. member said I was stupid. If anyone is more stupid than the hon. member for Assiniboia I should like to know who it is.

Mr. Argue: He is talking right now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, in fairness to the hon. gentleman who is speaking I believe that the word "stupid" used by the leader of the C.C.F. is unparliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Mr. Argue: I did not say he was stupid; I said more stupid than usual. If that offends the sensibilities of the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose or on this particular occasion those of the hon. member for Essex East, I will be happy to withdraw or modify that comment.

Mr. Smallwood: I would not want to put the hon. member to all that trouble. In this case it is just like getting kicked by a mule. You have to consider where it comes from, and the hon. member's comment does not bother me at all.

The proposal advanced by the hon. gentleman is designed to help the big farmers. I am more interested in the family farm unit. Those on the family farms are the people we must keep on the farms. They produce some of our finest citizens. Children who are raised on family farms enjoy a full life and have a good background. If we can keep them on the farms we will prevent the unemployment situation from worsening.

There is a paragraph in this newspaper about the feed mills. I am not opposed to the new feed mill legislation, but if the hon. member will look around he will see that again he is wrong. I quote from a letter in the Western Producer, as follows:

I note in the press where the farm unions were left holding the bag, re the feed mills. After some other farm organization pulled the rug out from under them, by some of them reversing their stand.

Now I predicted this would happen after they came to realize how badly the vast majority of farmers wanted the new feed mill regulations and I admire them for it as a man's a man when he comes back and makes amends after he realizes he was wrong. I even wrote our M.P. quite early in the fray and explained if they held the line for a while proof would come out that the vast majority of farmers wanted and approved of the new ruling. Also it was not compulsory and the farmers are capable of their own bargaining.

That is what we want on the farm. We do not want complete government control. We are an independent class of people and we like to do our own bargaining. We do not like to be tied down by too many government controls.

I was up in the cafeteria yesterday, and I was interested to hear a couple of reporters talking about how well off the western farmers were. I would suggest to the members of the press gallery that if the farmers are so well off in the west they lay down their pens and go out and buy farms. I predict that they would starve to death. The trouble is they make those statements but they do not know what they are talking about. Like those reporters, too many people living in the cities think the farmers are well off. I wonder whether these people would be interested in going through the country, not only in the west but in the east, to see the women and children who are working on the farms helping the farmers to make a profit and a living. I realize that food costs in the stores have gone up far too high, but I can certainly say that the farmer is not getting his share of the price the consumer is paying.

We have more or less spoiled ourselves these days. I can remember a few years back when you were able to go in the butcher shop and have the butcher take down a whole quarter of beef and cut you off a roast or a steak. What happens today? Everybody expects it to be wrapped in cellophane. Years ago when you went in the store to buy a dozen eggs you would be glad to take them home in a paper bag. Today they must be in a special container. This is all costing money. The middleman is making the profit, and the farmer is not receiving a fair share by way of return for his work.

I have here some very interesting notes regarding the operation of farms, their importance and what big business farming is. I do not think there is any line of business where the investment is larger and the return is smaller than in farming. Here is a study which was undertaken in the United States, and I am sure the results will apply to Canada. It has been found that at the beginning of settlement of this continent if took nine men to feed one person. Today one farmer can feed 23½ persons.

This United States study went on to show that agriculture is big business. For example, agriculture is the biggest buyer, seller and borrower in the United States. The farmer buys more trucks than any other industry. The inventory of farm machinery is bigger than the assets of the United States steel industry and five times that of the automobile industry. Agriculture uses more finished steel than the output of passenger cars, consumes more crude petroleum than any other industry and uses more electrical power than Chicago, Detroit, Baltimore or Houston, Texas. I have just quoted this study to show what a big industry farming is.

The government has enacted a lot of good legislation. I do not want to be critical, but I might say that the deficiency payment on eggs and hogs is still a problem for us. I suggest to the department that the deficiency payments on eggs be based on a quarterly and regional basis. I would like to see hogs placed on a six month basis and also on a regional basis. To test the plan, I know that last spring a great many farmers sold their hogs at a very reduced price. The small farmers who had sold their hogs in the spring did not receive any deficiency payments on them. If they had been able to accumulate them on a six month basis, then those who sold a few hogs in the spring would have received deficiency payments on them later.

I should like to mention one matter concerning the last acreage payments. I feel that the regulations set up by the department were too rigid, and that in dealing with them the wheat board was also too rigid. There should be a little more flexibility. I had a few farmers in my area who were ineligible for payment because in a couple of instances they did not hold a 1959 permit book. This was the first permit book they held. These were young farmers. I think particularly of one young farmer in New Norway who had bought land from his father in 1959, and earlier in the year the father had made the mistake of including in his own grain permit book the land he had sold to his son. I did all I could to draw this matter to the attention of the Canadian wheat board. I had letters from the grain agent and some other agents in the town of New Norway. Because this small mistake was made I could not get this younger farmer paid. He needed the acreage payments much more than some of those who had already obtained them. I do hope that the department will take note of those remarks I have made, and I will not take up any more of the time of the committee.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. When I was speaking before lunch the hon. member for Assiniboia made an interjection and at the time I was not aware of the fact that he was referring to me. He said then that I was "more stupid than usual". I have taken the opportunity during the adjournment to check the typescript of the debate, and I can now say that the hon. member did make this statement about me. Before we proceed further I must ask the hon. member to withdraw his remarks and apologize.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I was given to understand that the hon. member had withdrawn the remarks he made or had modified them.

Mr. Smallwood: I understood him to say "stupid". I am no more stupid than any other member. However, I have checked the transcript and I find that he said "more stupid than usual", which is just a little different.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I do not apologize for taking part in this discussion. It has been suggested by implication at any rate by some hon. members, notably last night by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, that one has to be a farmer in order to justify participation in matters having to do with agriculture. That is not my conception of the role of a member of parliament, and I think that last night the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont clearly established what I believe to be the duty of all members of parliament. Our duty, as I see it, is to be concerned about all aspects of the problems that face the Canadian people, whether they live in the rural or urban parts of our country. In any event, as one hon. member of this house who represents a large number of farmers I feel it is my duty to make some comments today. I would remind hon. members, who sometimes find my participation in the discussion of agriculture unusual, that it is a matter of historical record that one of the first, if not the first, speeches I ever made in the house had to do with certain phases of agriculture as they affected the constituency I have the honour to represent in this chamber.

The Minister of Labour—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I can understand hon. members finding some amusement because my confrontations with the Minister of Labour are more frequent than with the Minister of Agriculture. The latter, in the opening statement he made on the presentation of his estimates, sought to create the impression that the revenue position of the farmers of Canada since he became Minister of Agriculture one or two months ago has considerably improved and that during the past year farmers have been better off than in the previous year and relatively better off than at any time during the past 12 years.

This misconception which was afforded by the speech of the Minister of Agriculture has been repeated in the province of Ontario and undoubtedly it will be hard to catch up with. I propose for a few moments this afternoon to deal at least in part with this particular aspect of the problem that concerns us at the present time. The fact is that the farmers of Canada are not as well off today as the Minister of Agriculture sought to portray. I note that when he spoke in Saskatoon the other day he presented a picture of moderate optimism as to the outlook for agriculture on the prairies. He did not give that impression in the house when he spoke in introducing his estimates. He argued that there had been a rise in the net agricultural income across the board. He did not differentiate between one section of Canada and another. I am sure, for instance, that when he made that speech he did not take into account the summary of statistics, dated February, 1961, presented to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization by an official of his department. On page 7 of the report, which was prepared by Mr. Gordon Haase, the following is to be noted:

> The behaviour of certain farm prices was examined . . . and the results of these price movements can be interpreted in terms of their final effects upon total farm income and expenses.

At the conclusion on page 8 the author observes:

> It should also be noted that this changing relationship of farm income and expense has had different effects in each province reflecting the particular types of farming that are practised.

In examining the minister's statement I think it is important that we bear in mind certain facts and among them is the fact that Canada's gross national product in current dollars increased from $16.3 billion in 1949 to $34.6 billion in 1959 and to an estimated $35.5 billion or thereabouts in 1960. With this as a background I should like to observe that while productivity in agriculture has risen rapidly, prices for farm products have not increased in step with increased costs. The report prepared by Mr. Haase for the standing committee on agriculture, and it is well worth examining, clearly establishes this fact. I think we have to examine the problem facing the farmers of our country with the background of present economic conditions in Canada. I cannot believe that any occupational group in any section of Canada can be well off for very long when the general level of economic activity is declining; when there is very serious unemployment and so long as our basic financial monetary exchange, trade and commercial policies are the subject of much criticism throughout the country.

Although changes in agricultural conditions are inevitable, we must be sure that the major changes are not brought about too quickly at a time when unemployment, as at present, is at an unprecedentedly high level. We must realize that there are some social problems facing the farmers which must be solved with sympathy and understanding.

The agricultural revolution of today places many farm people in a comparable position to that brought about by the industrial revolution of the last century. Rather than have these people leave the farms, as some suggest, and move to urban areas where they would add to the numbers of unemployed, it is preferable that they stay on the farms until employment opportunities in the cities increase. That puts a responsibility on the Canadian people as a whole, on this government and on this parliament.

As I see it, it is the responsibility of all Canadians to assure farmers a decent standard of living, and the measures taken toward this goal will be less expensive for the Canadian taxpayer in the long run than having to provide financial assistance to even greater numbers of unemployed people in Canada.

Dealing directly with the matter of the cash income of the Canadian farmer in 1960, I think it is important to bear in mind certain statistics that were not dealt with by the Minister of Agriculture. An examination of the statistics produced by his department through the economics research division of the Department of Agriculture reveals that the cash income from farm products declined in 1960 to $2,784 million, from $2,789 million in 1959, and $2,795 million in 1958. What the minister has done in the figures that he has given to the committee to show the alleged rise in net farm income has been to exclude from his calculations transfer payments that have been made under various measures passed in this house providing assistance in one form or another to the farmers of Canada.

Supplementary payments to farmers in 1960, it should not be forgotten, amounted to $77 million. These payments were made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, western grain producers acreage plan, the federal-provincial emergency unthreshed grain assistance policy and other measures. In 1959 the total supplementary payments amounted to $22 million only, most of which was received under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. So there has been an increase in 1960 of $55 million in transfer payments to the agricultural sector of the economy. These transfer payments, representing an increase of $55 million, were overlooked by the minister and must be calculated in determining the net farm income position of the Canadian farmer. In spite of this increase of $55 million in supplementary payments, the realized gross income of farmers rose by only $53 million, from $3,155 million in 1959 to $3,209 million in 1960.

This means that if one discounts the increase in government transfer payments the farmers' gross income declined in 1960 and did not increase as the Minister of Agriculture suggested to this committee and to the people of Canada. This statement is borne out by the dominion bureau of statistics compilation which was given out recently, and particularly the table entitled, "Net Income of Farm Operators from Farming Operations, Canada, by Provinces". This covers such things as cash income from farm products, income in kind, supplementary payments, realized gross income, operating and depreciation charges, realized net income, value of inventory changes, total gross income, and total net income. Hon. members will find this table, which was distributed by the minister or by the Department of Agriculture, of great significance in this regard. For instance, I find in the third paragraph of the commentary attached to this table the following statement, which bears out what I have said about the relationship between transfer payments and the calculation of the net farm income in 1960.

> Supplementary payments to farmers in western Canada in 1960 amounted to approximately 77 million dollars and included payments made under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act—

And the various other measures which I have already cited. It goes on to state:

> This is in contrast to 1959 when farmers received approximately 22 million dollars, most of which was received under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

So, this fact alone puts the enthusiastic statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, whose enthusiasm sometimes permits him to run ahead of his judgment, in proper perspective.

This is not the only fact. Since operating expenses of farmers rose by some $13 million according to the table to which I have already made reference, from $1,880 million in 1959 to $1,893 million in 1960, realized net income rose by only $41 million or about four fifths of the increase in transfer payments to farmers.

Moreover, the table also indicates that inventories on farms increased by $36 million in 1960 as opposed to a decrease of $70 million in 1959. It is indicated that this was due to an increase in grain production over the preceding year and a continuing build-up of Canada's cattle population. So between 1959 and 1960 inventories accounted for a change of some $106 million.

I draw from all these facts the following conclusion: The total net income in 1960 was approximately $1,352 million. In 1959 it stood at $1,206 million. This was an increase of only $146 million despite the fact that there was a $55 million increase in transfer payments and a change in inventories held on the farms which amounted to $106 million. These two factors would account for a change in the cash income of some $160 million. Despite these facts—and notwithstanding what the Minister of Agriculture said, and notwithstanding what the propaganda agencies of the Department of Agriculture indicated —the net income rose by less than $146 million so that the underlying economic position of the agricultural community, after allowing for an increase in transfer payments and a change in inventories, deteriorated in 1960.

That is in direct contradiction to what the Minister of Agriculture told this House of Commons. The government can take no credit for the increase in the yield of wheat or the continuing increase in the number of cattle which is the major factor in the change in the farmers' net income position. This was not the result of government policy. I am sure that even the Minister of Agriculture would say that these were factors that went far beyond the reach of government action. This government has nothing that warrants being called an agricultural policy. The increase in transfer payments which took place was the result of abnormal conditions that existed on the prairies during the last year; I refer, for instance, to such things as the early snowfall that caught the wheat unharvested in the fields.

Furthermore, a cursory look at the regional distribution of net income from farm operations reveals, I believe, a complete lack of a national agricultural policy. Yet I have in my hand here a document with a large blue streak across the top on a white background, addressed to certain people who are meeting in Ottawa at the present time for some undisclosed purpose. If one examines that document, one will find that this government has, according to its own impression, a clear-cut agricultural policy designed to meet not only the long term aspect of the problem but the short term aspect of it as well.

Mr. Churchill: That is a first-class document.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says it is a first-class document. He is right if one interprets that statement in the proper sense. It is a first-class Madison avenue product. That is what it is. All the propaganda of the government engineered by the arch-propagandist of the government, namely the Minister of Agriculture, is not going to convince the Canadian farmer that his position under this government is greatly improved over what it was when this government took office. The fact is that farm net income declined in British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec. The increase of over $100 million in Saskatchewan resulted from a good wheat crop and the increased transfer payments to western farmers. The increase in Ontario was largely accounted for by the increase in the inventory of cattle held on the farm. When the minister deals with the various submissions that have been made during the course of discussion on the first item, I hope he will address himself to the figures which I have produced and which come from his own publications. I challenge him now, in the face of these figures, to deny the picture which I have presented of the actual income position of the farmers of Canada at the present time.

The minister is a man of great enthusiasm and for that quality he is to be admired and congratulated. But when a man is administering a large department of government, he should not allow his enthusiasm in any way to discolour his judgment or to interfere with his capacity for good judgment. He must see things as they are and not as he would like them to be. A good case in point to illustrate what I have in mind is a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture two weeks ago when he said:

> The action taken by the government last year in placing hog support on a deficiency payment basis has had the anticipated effect of eliminating the previous surplus production and greatly improving hog prices.

That was a statement by the Minister of of Agriculture. I do not think that statement can stand any test of real validity. However, the minister is entitled to make an argument. Nevertheless, I suggest that no department of the government of Canada is warranted in using its agencies for the purpose of spreading political propaganda.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have before me the statement that came from the information division of the Canadian Department of Agriculture repeating precisely the words of the minister. I now quote what that information division says:

> —the action taken by the government in placing hog support on a deficiency payment basis has had the anticipated effect of eliminating the previous surplus production and greatly improving hog prices.

That is a complete reproduction of a political statement that was made by the Minister of Agriculture. The information division of that department or of any other department has no right to use its services, which are paid for by the taxpayers of Canada, in order to try to put forward the government's answer to suggestions made in the House of Commons concerning the application of aspects of its agricultural policy. Lest anyone think that I am giving an argument that is specious, I have before me the Farmer's Advocate of February 25, 1961. Here is what it says:

As you can see the two statements—

That is the one by the information division and the one by the Minister of Agriculture.

—are identical. Is the information division—

The editor asks this question.

—becoming an agency for repeating party propaganda? Surely the task of the information division is to inform not to repeat political overstatements.

And an overstatement it is.

So says the editor. He continues:

Anyone who believes hog prices are now high solely because of the new deficiency payment system of price support is living in his own little dream world. Deficiency payments for hogs were instituted mainly to get the government out of the hog business (their storages were full at the time).

The reason hog prices are good now is because a good many farmers have no hogs to sell. The reason they have no hogs to sell is because they lost their shirts when prices dipped so low a little more than a year ago.

No wonder the editor concludes his observations by saying this:

And let's keep politics out of the government information bureau.

I now make this suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture. He is beginning the administration of an important department. We all wish him well in the discharge of that function. However, he will not do the cause of agriculture much good by failing to make a distinction between his functions as a politician and his functions as Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Aiken: He will never come up to your record.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think that is true. The only difference between the Minister of Agriculture and me is that I am simply an ordinary private member of the House of Commons and the man to whom my remarks are addressed holds an extremely important post as a minister of the crown. He has been in that office only a short time and I believe he will be there for only a short time. Mr. Chairman, no one will deny that our country is faced with a recession. This we have been experiencing for a short time. Now this recession, which began in the second quarter of 1960, is commencing to show its impact on prices received for farm products. The ability of our economy to recover is impeded by the level of the income earned in the farm sector. Thus, both the farm and the non-farm segments of our economy have a vested interest in seeing to it that farmers are better compensated than they are at the present time.

This government was going to remove the cost-price squeeze in which farmers find themselves. In fairness to the present minister I will say that he has not yet made the extravagant claim made by his predecessor, namely that the present administration had removed the difficulties of the cost-price squeeze. However, I suspect that one must not allow the Minister of Agriculture to fall into the same error as that into which his predecessor fell.

Let us look into this business of the cost-price squeeze, something which greatly concerns the farmers as we know from the representations made in the briefs presented to this government by the national farmers union and the federation of agriculture, and about which not one word was said by the Minister of Agriculture when he introduced his estimates a week or two ago. Some insight into the deterioration of the farmers' financial position can be gained by referring to the following statistics which I obtained from the minister's own figures. I refer, first of all, to the index number of farm prices for the three years 1958, 1959 and 1960. The index number of farm prices in 1958 was 245.5. In 1959, it was 243.1 and in 1960, 236.6. Comparing the figures for those three years with the prices of commodities and services used by farmers in the same period, including farm living costs, we find the following: 242.7, 249.8, 253.6. The result is that the index of farm prices declined by 3.6 per cent between 1958 and 1960 while, on the other hand, the price of commodities used by farmers increased by 4.5 per cent. This is what is meant when the farmer says he is caught in the cost-price squeeze.

The Minister of Agriculture must address himself to this aspect of our presentation because one of the contentions made by the government when it introduced the Agricultural Stabilization Act through the instrumentality of the former minister of agriculture, and one of the assurances given by members sitting on the treasury benches, was that they were going to eliminate this situation which confronts the Canadian farmers. The figures which I have just quoted fairly establish the extent to which the government has been able to meet this problem. In the light of this deterioration in the position of the Canadian farmer, what should be the objectives of the federal government's agricultural policy? I ask the minister that question.

In his speech in Saskatoon the other day he told the Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities convention that the government had a long term program. He referred to the resolution which he had introduced in this house with regard to land use, and spoke of the potentially great benefits which could flow from such a reform measure. While that may be true in principle, that is not what the government said it was going to do. It was not going to deal with the long term situation; it was going to embark on policies designed to meet the present plight of the Canadian farmer. Moreover, when the minister talked of this land use program he neglected to mention the foundation of that program which does not reside with this government. The basis of the bill which will ultimately be presented to this house, lies in the work of a committee sitting in the other place, as well as the representations which were made on at least two occasions by the federation of agriculture, these representations went so far as to provide the minister with a model bill, suitable for introduction, in respect of the development of agricultural land in our country in a productive way so as to enhance the income position of Canadian farmers.

But this measure, which is not even to be passed this session according to the announcement made by the minister when he introduced the resolution, can hardly be referred to as representing an agricultural policy. Certainly, it is not designed to meet the present plight of the Canadian farmer. I use the word "plight" advisedly, because if there was a plight when hon. gentlemen came into office the income position of farmers in Canada in 1960, 1959 and 1958 clearly establishes that there has been no improvement whatever in their situation. The minister cannot hope to give the impression in the country that because the government has this land use program in mind, such a program can serve as a substitute or as a means of covering up the lack now of a real agricultural policy for Canada. There is no such thing at the moment, notwithstanding what the minister may claim. There has been no over-all agricultural policy yet presented by this government to parliament which warrants the use of the phrase "over-all policy". Some of the objectives which such a policy might have were admirably stated by the present government when the Agricultural Stabilization Act was introduced. It is well for us to remember the general intentions which the government had in mind when it introduced that measure. In the preamble to that act we find the following:

> Whereas it is expedient to enact a measure for the purpose of stabilizing the prices of agricultural commodities in order to assist the industry of agriculture to realize fair returns for its labour and investment, and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and the costs of the goods and services that they buy, thus to provide farmers with a fair share of the national income—

As a statement of intention, that is an admirable statement, but the Minister of Agriculture is not going to persuade us that anything he has told this committee so far is in keeping with that objective or those intentions.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have to advise the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): My estimates were introduced almost a month ago, and during that period I have been wondering just what the number two man in the Liberal opposition would have to say about them. All I can say at this time is that it is a good thing the bureau of statistics published this little pamphlet the other day to provide the hon. gentleman with a speech. There are a lot of things which can be done with figures, and I must congratulate the hon. member for Essex East on the efforts he has made this afternoon.

Before I go on to deal with some of the remarks he made, I should like to open my statement by expressing congratulations on behalf, I think, of all of us, to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont who spoke last evening. I have been in this house for only a short time but one of the things which has struck me about the speeches made by representatives of the official opposition has been not only their lack of constructive criticism but also, and more alarmingly, their complete lack of awareness of the seriousness and complexity of the present farm problem. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont is a city member and does not pretend to be an expert on agriculture. Nevertheless, in his speech last night I found at least some evidence that someone in the official opposition was doing some thinking and trying to grope his way forward in the situation we have in Canada today. I believe the thanks of all Canadians should go to the hon. member.

Having said that I should now like to deal with the remarks of the number two man in the Liberal opposition who just resumed his seat. The figures quoted by the hon. member for Essex East were an attempt, in his usual facetious manner, to challenge the figures I gave when I introduced my estimates. In referring to my introductory remarks the hon.

member used such clear dramatic terms as "misconception" and said that I did not consider regions or commodities. The hon. gentleman said his figures were a direct contradiction of what I had said in the committee. These are abrupt and dramatic terms.

Let us take a look at the record and get out of the ether in which the hon. gentleman circulates. Let us examine what I did say. The hon. member said I did not consider the matter on the basis of region by region or commodity by commodity. I wish to direct the hon. member's attention to page 2406 of Hansard of February 24, 1961 where I am reported as having used these words:

> I think it is necessary for me to point out that when one analyses the farm income of this country product by product and region by region, it soon becomes clear that the most variable area is the prairie province area.

I have said many times that the more one studies the statistics of farm income across Canada the more one realizes that there is inequality between regions and between commodities. This is one of the difficulties associated with being in a department where efforts are being made at long last to try to bring some stability to the industry.

Another remark made by the hon. member was that in my figures I had overlooked the transfer payments made by the government. I would direct the hon. member's attention and the attention of the committee to page 2405 of Hansard of February 24 where my introductory remarks appear. I quote now the eighth or ninth line from the top of the righthand column:

> These figures give total cash income, which does include supplementary payments by the federal government.

I then went on to point out that this increased income was due to two factors, first the efforts of the government and, second, the efforts of the farmer himself. I also did something which the hon. member chooses to overlook. I gave the figures for the decline in the number of farmers in Canada for the last ten years. I could easily obtain these figures for the last 25 years.

This situation reflects the effort of the farmer to attempt to adjust himself to a revolution in agriculture both in terms of machinery and technology. As the farmer fights to make this adjustment the result is less farmers and more money per farmer. If you divide the fewer farmers into the greater amount of money naturally you get a greater income per farm.

I do not intend ever to boast about the fact that in the last three years there has been some little increase in farm income because I, probably as well as any hon. member of the committee, know how far behind the farmer is in relation to comparable groups in the economy.

When I introduced my estimates I gave some indication of these small gains in the last three years. I do not think any hon. member of the opposition can escape the fact that in each of the last three years the farm industry of this country has received, on the average, $351 million more than was received in the previous four years. I do not think that any hon. gentleman in the opposition can get away from the fact that the average income per farm in the years 1953-57 was approximately $4,300 and in the last three years it has been running at better than $5,200. Using fairly accurate figures that represents an increase of $900.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the cost of production?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member interjects "What about the cost of production?" Let me come to that point in respect of net income. I was honest with the committee, Mr. Chairman. Not only did I compare gross income over the whole farm industry but I also compared the gross income farm by farm. I then went on to compare what really counts, what is left over after you deduct the expenses.

In my opening remarks on February 24, I said that the efforts of the government were to some extent being nullified by the increasing costs. The hon. member for Essex East quoted figures from indices of prices. Prices have gone up in the last few years. What the hon. member overlooked is that there are on this side of this committee a few of us who remember that these indices start from 100. When did they get to this figure of 242? I invite hon. members of the committee to ask themselves that question. Go back over the last 25 years and examine the rise in costs, then look at the rise in costs in the last three years.

I do not want to get into debate at this stage of the consideration of my estimates, but let us examine the cause of this situation. A part of this question has been sent to a standing committee for consideration. I simply say to the hon. member for Essex East that he must think, with his completely old-fashioned Liberal arrogance that all wisdom rests with the party that thought it had divine right to rule. The hon. member must not think that the rest of us have no brains nor should he continue to think that what is good for the Liberal party is good for Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This is an old-fashioned dogma concerning which the Canadian people made their opinion clear in 1957 and even more clear in 1958.

Mr. McDonald: Egotism unlimited.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wish to tell my hon. friends in the Liberal party that they must not be guilty of thinking that the people have forgotten why the Liberals were thrown out of office in 1957. If my hon. friends ever want to return to the right of the Speaker in this chamber they will have to realize that they must learn humility. When I look at the speeches made by hon. members of the official opposition, both inside and outside this chamber, I can readily see that those hon. members are a long way from having acquired the humility and broadmindedness that one would expect would be learned by an opposition. Judging from the progress they have made in acquiring humility I suspect it will take them a dozen or 15 years to learn this characteristic. There will have to spring up in the Liberal ranks a new group that will blow out the dust from the attic of the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us talk about agriculture.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will admit that there are hopeful signs of the type to which I referred. I thought I detected a hopeful sign in the speech made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. I assume that there may be some hope to be found among these younger men.

The hon. member for Essex East says, "Let us talk about agriculture." I should like to touch upon a few points dealt with in the remarks made by the number one man of the official opposition in terms of agriculture, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, who is the official agricultural critic of the Liberal party.

Mr. McDonald: A real expert.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wonder how long the hon. gentleman will have to reside in Canada before he comes to the realization that the people of western Canada fought a long time for the Canadian wheat board. They are very proud of it. It is their board and they feel they have the right to criticize it. But when the official spokesman of the Liberal party on agriculture stands up in this chamber, as the hon. member did, and unjustly criticizes the wheat board, there will be an answer some day.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Following the statement just made by the Minister of Agriculture, I must say that I have never spoken against the Canadian wheat board. Let the minister read again my statement. If he did not understand my remarks in French, he should read the English translation and he will see that I did not speak against the Canadian wheat board. If he prefers that I repeat what I said, I am willing to do so right now.

Mr. Fortin: We have some difficulty ourselves in understanding your French.

(Text):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): He is just political.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the hon. member's point is well taken. When I accused him of attacking the wheat board I should have produced evidence of his having done so. I am having the English translation of the hon. member's speech looked up and I will give the hon. member the gist of it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister had better wait until he gets the text.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member said that last fall the producers in eastern Canada were not able to get western oats.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, when one hon. gentleman denies a statement, the hon. member who makes the charge is in duty bound to accept the word of the hon. member. The Minister of Agriculture had an opportunity to refer to the text, but what he is doing now is paraphrasing—again misleading the committee—what the hon. member said, and he knows that is contrary to our rules.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have been able to get a copy of his speech and I shall read some extracts from the remarks of the hon. member. This is the type of thing that we have in the translation; I am not responsible for that:

> What do they want to say? After the results achieved in farming in the last four years, the remarks of the new Minister of Agriculture today should amount to more than so much hot air.

Then, he went on to say:

> I would now like to address myself to the situation of feed grain deliveries in the eastern areas during the summer, until the closing of navigation. We learned in the newspapers that from August to the end of the navigation season, in the harbours of Montreal, Quebec city, Baie Comeau and others, a number of ships were waiting in line for two, three and even four weeks in front of elevators full of grain, particularly wheat for export. Those ships could not unload their cargoes, and there was no feed grain on the eastern markets.
> In the meantime, our farmers were having all sorts of difficulties in getting supplies, and when they could get them they had to pay a high premium. Now, this shortage of feed grain on the eastern markets, was due to a decision of the Canadian wheat board to ship only export grades to eastern ports. Incredible losses of the order of $1,000 to $3,000 were daily suffered by ship owners, not to mention the loss suffered by farmers who saw their operating costs increase on account of the higher prices they had to pay for their feed grain.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This certainly does not support what the minister has been saying.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There you have it, the number two expert backs up the number one expert on this statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, the hon. gentleman is transgressing the rules of the house. He is now saying that I, too, have taken a position which supports his view as to what was said. In the statement that he has read he has clearly established that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska did not take issue with the institution of the wheat board, and the play upon words by the Minister of Agriculture is such that the Chair must call the minister to order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I may be allowed to continue, in the face of the tremendous strength behind the ministry, I would say that the minister has no warrant whatsoever for saying that the words he has quoted justify the conclusion that the hon. member drew. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska was seeking to explain a particular situation, and he was not attacking the wheat board. The Minister of Agriculture knows that full well.

The Deputy Chairman: I think it is a matter of interpretation of words. Both hon. members have made their points clear. Will the minister continue with his remarks.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I gather from your ruling, sir, that I am to be allowed to answer the point originally raised by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Provided that the minister keeps within the rules.

Mr. McDonald: He is doing it; he is one of the few who do.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): One thing I have learned in my short experience in the house is that you never know you have reached rock bottom until you see the suckers jump and squirm.

The statement I was objecting to was this:

Now, this shortage of feed grain on the eastern markets, was due to a decision of the Canadian wheat board to ship only export grades to eastern ports.

First of all, let me make it clear that the Canadian wheat board brings grain only to Fort William and Port Arthur. The grain east of Fort William and Port Arthur is handled by the private grain trade and the big co-operatives in Quebec. If the big co-operatives in the province of Quebec and the private grain trade want to buy oats, they put an order in at Fort William and Port Arthur and it is moved east by the buyers. What actually happened last year was that the private grain trade and the co-operatives did not order in time to meet their commitments. As we were moving grain through to take advantage of the market that occurred for durum wheat in Italy, they brought their orders forward and it was impossible to fill them. As a result there was a delay of one or two weeks. The minute those orders were brought forward, we cleaned out the elevators and put in the grain.

This is not the only statement the hon. member made. I am still using the translation at the back of Hansard of February 24, where the following appears:

Because of the lack of interest shown by the Canadian wheat board and the government, the eastern farmers will have to pay $300 more per carload for moving their grain than it would have cost them if that grain had been moved by ship at the proper time.

If this is not an attack on the wheat board, backed up by the number two man, the hon. member for Essex East, I do not know what it is.

The hon. member for Essex East asked me to speak about agriculture. I should like to say something that is reasonably positive in regard to this point because I know the situation in which the eastern farmers found themselves. I know how they were gouged by the dealers because of that temporary shortage. I have asked the wheat pools of the west to join with the Canadian wheat board in holding a meeting with the private grain trade and the big co-operatives of the east to see whether we cannot go out and show the eastern farmers that if they buy their oats in bulk in plenty of time in August or September for next year's supply—this is the time when they know what their own crops will be and what the supply picture will be in western Canada—they can save 10 cents a bushel. In other words, instead of paying 96 cents they will pay 85 cents if they buy in advance. This difference will pay for their storage. I should like to see a positive type of program which will benefit not only the eastern but the western farmer at the same time. The western farmer will get the same price and the eastern farmer will get his grain at least 10 cents a bushel cheaper. This is the type of positive proposal that I should like to put forward to meet this situation.

My time is about up, and I wish to conclude with this one observation. The hon. member for Essex East keeps pontificating with the remark, taken entirely from his own imagination, that the agricultural program will not be passed this session.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister said so.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This indicates how clearly and slowly I must speak so that the number two expert of the Liberal party will understand. I asked the house for permission, after I get first reading, to stand the bill over for a period to allow me to consult with the farm organizations and the 10 provincial governments to see whether the bill would meet what they think would be best for all concerned. The hon. member makes a big play over the fact that I have asked that the legislation be held over until I can consult those organizations. I know from past experience that the previous administration never thought of consulting anybody, and that includes the farm organizations. They thought that they were destined to rule by divine right and were unconscious of the needs of farmers. They did not even bother to ask for the opinions of these organizations at all. We like to discuss some of these problems with farm organizations and with other governments. But this is a difference in philosophy which comes only through the humility of long years in opposition, which I hope the opposition will achieve some day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want to do an injustice to my hon. friend. If I have misinterpreted my hon. friend's intention respecting this legislation—and his words were open to that interpretation—I want to correct it. The federation of agriculture apparently thought likewise. Has the bill been referred to every provincial government and to every farm organization? When may we expect the reintroduction of the measure, and can the minister definitely say it will be introduced this session?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The resolution has been introduced; it has been debated in the house. The bill has not had first reading and, therefore, obviously I could not show it to the governments or to the farm organizations. The resolution is before the house. When first reading has been given to the bill I will be in a position to take it up with the provincial governments and farm organizations.

I want to conclude with the answer to a question I have heard repeated over and over again by the official opposition and, unfortunately, by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont last night. I suppose if you hear something repeated often enough it almost becomes the truth, but the fact is that back in 1958 after several months of hard work we came forward in the house with a national agricultural policy which the Prime Minister announced on August 30 of that year. We have been following that policy step by step ever since. We have brought legislation forward, put it on the statute books, set up the machinery and have been trying to work out the troubles that arise in the case of any legislation which produced those results which I have already outlined.

I should like to outline to hon. members just what that agriculture policy is. First and foremost, with 30 per cent of our agricultural production going into the export market we have to sell and sell. The hon. member for Essex East has difficulty understanding why, even though there has been a slight decline in prices during the last few years, the farmers are getting more money. One reason is that we are selling more units of these particular articles. I point this out because my colleague, the former minister of trade and commerce and now Minister of Veterans Affairs, caused many very competent farm leaders to scoff when he predicted in 1957 that he would go out and sell 300 million bushels of wheat a year. In the three years since, I think the average has been about 297 million compared with an average of 272 million over the previous ten years or the previous four years.

When I took over the portfolio of agriculture, and also responsibility for the wheat board, I set myself the same objective. I can now tell hon. members that not only is the figure of 300 million, which was set as a target by my colleague, going to be achieved in this crop year but, it will be met for a four year average. A lot more is going to be achieved by way of sales.

I do not want to repeat at this time what I said in Saskatoon on Wednesday when dealing with the outlook for agricultural products in western Canada but every farmer in eastern Canada knows it is in his interests that western farmers, who have to sell mainly in export markets, should be able to sell their products in order to keep the pressure off the eastern farmer in his home markets. I think there is no question of a clash between the two. It is a question of realizing their points of "complementarity".

Let me go on to the next point. I am not going to say that cash advances are a fundamental point of our policy. They were very useful in that they gave the farmer a chance to obtain an advance on the wheat he had produced until it could be sold. It does not cost the farmer anything and it helps to stabilize the economy from the point of view of income.

The first big item of the national agricultural program was the Agricultural Stabilization Act. It has been in effect now for three years and so far as the nine mandatory products and eight named products are concerned I think in most cases it is working fairly well. In my opinion prices have been stabilized and we are using the legislation wherever we can to raise prices slightly. We have had great difficulties, of course, with hogs and eggs and the technique we had to use over a year ago of changing from a purchase system to one of deficiency payments can only be described as Draconian. It was a very difficult decision to have to make. I think my predecessor as minister of agriculture, now Minister of National Defence, deserves the thanks of the people of Canada for having the courage to make that decision. It has enabled us to get rid of the very burdensome surpluses and to stabilize prices. I think we can go on now to the next step of looking at the legislation so far as hogs and eggs are concerned very carefully and seeing if we cannot make improvements that will achieve the objectives of the government, namely, the stabilizing of prices and also the bringing about of increased returns for those products sold within Canada. This may mean possible amendments to the act. I have asked the advisory committee to the stabilization board to look at two or three of these proposals this year so that next winter we can make up our minds finally as to what we are going to do about these two products.

I would think that all farmers in Canada will support the principles of the act and will support any government that is willing to be open-minded, look at the facts as they are and see what it can do to make the act work. I do not have to tell the farm members of the house what a difference there is today. When you go to bed at night on the farm you know that if there is a sudden drop in world or domestic prices of the products you are producing you are not going to lose everything. There is a mandatory floor on the mandatory products and there are forward or support prices on all the products. It is a good act and I think we can make it work.

The next point in the national agricultural program is that enabling crop insurance legislation. At the present time only one province has a plan in operation but five other provinces are now working on plans. Active consideration is being given by us to at least two such plans. I predict that many of our specialty crops, and certainly our great cereal crops, will be under crop insurance in the very near future. There will be certain areas, of course, which can never come under crop insurance because of their poor production. In other words, if the land is very poor and failures are frequent the rates would be so high that it would be impossible to bring such areas under the plan.

The big gun in the arsenal, of course, is the farm credit plan. If you can stabilize prices, if you can stabilize income, it is easier to work out a plan with the farmer that not only enables him to pay back the amount of money he has borrowed but also increases his income. I should like to remind my hon. friends opposite, without any maliciousness whatever, that when farm credit was under the Department of Finance, which has a different philosophy from the Department of Agriculture, loans to farmers across Canada amounted to approximately $8 million in a typical year. In some years it was lower and in one year the figure rose to $12 million, but $8 million is the figure for a typical year. In the first nine months that the farm credit corporation was operated under the Department of Agriculture loans amounted to $56 million, and by the end of the fiscal year the figure will be close to $60 million. According to the estimate for next year, the amount will be $75 million. When you go from $8 million to $75 million there must be a considerable difference in the philosophy and the difference simply is that the Department of Agriculture is actively and aggressively trying to help the farmers to get a plan that will improve their farm income as well as enable them to pay back their loans.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And also because there is greater need.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The need has been there ever since the 30's. We had farm loan acts during the 30's that were good starts but since the war they could not meet the tremendous capital costs required to run a modern, efficient farm. The farm credit corporation is still not perfect. I think there are at least one or two loopholes. There is a weakness in that it does not meet the conditions under which the maritime farmer must operate. There is a weakness in that it does not meet the needs of young lads who have no father to help them and have not got 25 per cent of the assets required. Weaknesses of this type must be apparent. This is the type of constructive criticism that I would welcome from the opposition because I am looking for answers to these problems. The advisory committee to the farm credit corporation, which committee is composed of representatives of farm organizations, is also looking into these problems. I do have some ideas and I would welcome ideas from anybody because this matter is so important to the farmers that no question of politics should enter into it. It is a matter of a business arrangement. We turn down one out of every four farmers on the ground that they do not meet the requirements.

I see my time is up so I will conclude with one sentence. The other parts of the program involve conservation and of course, the rehabilitation plan. I do think that if you look at every other country of the world you will not find any country that has thought through its agricultural difficulties any better than we have or has come forward with such a coherent and logical plan.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, in opening my few remarks I should like to make reference to the suggestion of the Minister of Agriculture that there are certain ways by which parties become humble. If that is true I would suggest that we in this corner have simply gobs of humility which we are very willing to dispense to our friends at the left.

In presenting the views of this group I would be the first to admit that I myself am not a farmer. However, I would suggest that I have spent more time studying conceivable answers to the farmers' problems than on any other subject in the few weeks I have been in this house, and for that reason I do have a considerable amount of sympathy for the Minister of Agriculture. I think it is quite ironic when we turn to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture that we should be expected to look back into the past and expected to look at a sector of the economy which would be expressing something of an age that has gone. Yet, strangely enough, we are very much looking into the future. Although agriculture is becoming less and less the most important segment of our economy the effects of automation, and all the effects of the twentieth century, virtually are having more effect on agriculture than on any other sector of our economy.

In other words, the whole emphasis is that we have more and more production from a fewer number of people. Strangely enough man's output in the field of agriculture has gone up three times more than the output in manufacturing areas. I think this is one of the most serious problems which the Minister of Agriculture faces and suggests the tale of the sorcerer's apprentice who wanted to use the magical powers of his master to direct the broom to carry the water. Unfortunately of course, he could not stop the process and very soon would drown. We are being drowned in much the same way by the surpluses of our agricultural products to the extent that we have now 10 per cent less income going to farmers, according to the Manitoba farmers union, than 10 years ago. We have 10,000 people leaving farms and where do these people go? Today the farms and cities have become more integrated. More and more farmers are sending their sons into the city. Unfortunately, because they have less seniority and are less trained to deal with the new technological age, they find themselves standing outside of the unemployment insurance offices.

A great deal of the difficulty in terms of unemployment relates back to this problem regarding agriculture. Indeed, around every city there are a great many people who are actually subsidizing their farming operation by working in manufacturing areas. You have men who are in a sense doing part-time farming and going into the city, taking a job away from someone else who has no other form of support, and then returning to work the farm. These individuals actually spend the money they earn in the cities in an attempt to keep the farm operating. That is the position to which agriculture has come; a very sorry state indeed in the 1960's.

As one drives through various parts of the country one sees abandoned farms. Certainly, in parts of eastern Ontario more and more farms are being sold for tax arrears. This, in itself, indicates the very sorry state of our agricultural community. I think we have learned that we cannot have a healthy economy in any country without a healthy agricultural economy. We learned this lesson during the 1930's when we found that our manufacturing and secondary industries were in very bad shape simply because we had not kept up our agricultural economy during this period but had let it fall behind in its purchasing power. As a result, the economy began to slow down. Now, the farmer produces even more than he did before. Perhaps because he is less organized or perhaps because he is less concentrated in his displeasure, his problems tend to be ignored. We are still I think concentrating on the wrong aspect of our agricultural problem. We are still concentrating on productivity.

I would suggest to the minister that more emphasis, both in our agricultural economy and in terms of the whole emphasis in the Department of Agriculture, should be upon marketing rather than upon productivity. This very much corresponds to the overemphasis perhaps of the government in other sections of our economy, such as the setting up of the productivity council when we really need a distributing council to distribute the goods of our nation in some just and sensible manner. I would hope that over a period of time we could take a look at some process for bringing these marketing boards together so that we can see the entire pattern of our agricultural economy. I hope that the emphasis will constantly be placed, by the Department of Agriculture, on a process that will bolster and support all these pressures toward integrating these marketing boards.

I was surprised to find that in 1951, 58 cents of the Canadian dollar spent on agricultural products returned to the farmer and in 1956 only 44 cents of the dollar spent for food went back to the farmer. I think it is unfortunate if this trend continues. We must emphasize the need to have more of the dollar spent by the consumer returned to the hands of the farmer. I would suggest also that more emphasis must be placed on the securing of markets, both in terms of education and in terms of actual policy. I would certainly suggest that this is a great need in this country today. I think historians will find it strange, looking back on the twentieth century, to find that two thirds of the people of the world were going to bed hungry every night—as the hon. member for Greenwood mentions quite often and rightly so—yet surpluses existed in other countries which could not be used. I do not think historians, in looking back at the twentieth century, will say that we could not control our scientists but that we could not combine our surplus of food and the surplus of hunger in other parts of the world. I am sure that they will look with amazement at our agricultural policy in Canada and our attempt to cut down these surplus areas.

I am sure that this agricultural problem is one that must be solved especially in view of the fact that as scientists tell us, we will face difficulty in supporting the number of people that will be living on this earth in the next 50 or 60 years. We have not developed many solutions to these problems, but I am sure that is the aim of us all. I would certainly accept the fact that the Minister of Agriculture is attempting to find solutions. It certainly is the aim of the group in this corner to find a means of assuring that the farmers will receive their a fair share of the national income. Perhaps we might disagree as to what a fair share is, but they should receive a fair share of the national income. This share must be determined having regard to the family farm. I think the farmer has a right to expect that the economic unit which he respects will receive respect also from the government.

The only way we can really deal with this difficulty is to attack it directly with this in mind. I am convinced that the many direct plans, such as the resolution the minister has introduced to this house, are all to the good but at the present time price represents the main problem. It seems to me that transfer payments could be made to farmers with a greater degree of efficiency than by simply allowing the farmer to go to the city to collect unemployment insurance, while at the same time he is unable to pay his taxes. He is, in effect, taking his portion of this $2 million being payed to the unemployed in Canada. Surely, some system of deficiency payment based on the cost of production and the number of units of production on a farm, no matter what the farm is producing, could be devised. That is perhaps the fairest and most efficient way of transferring this money so that it will bolster the farm economy.

I view with considerable interest the fact that the Minister of Agriculture has been travelling about the country and that also he has enlarged his public relations division in the Department of Agriculture. I think this is extremely important too. But I hope he is just not going around talking to farmers. I think the main problem which the Department of Agriculture must overcome is the rather mistaken belief that support prices, subsidies and deficiency payments are some form of glorious charity on the part of the rest of the people of Canada to the people who are seemingly unfortunate enough to be farmers. It appears that no one seems to recognize that tariffs and the cost of transportation into mining or forest areas are also out of the public purse and indeed right out of the pockets of the people of Canada, and that this cost is also a subsidy, although I wish we could get rid of that word entirely when we come to talk about means of bolstering the various sectors in our economy. But I think we need a full scale public relations job done to convince the people of Canada that although the number of farmers is becoming smaller, none the less they should receive as much concern and as much monetary support as do the other parts of our economy.

I think that surely more than anything else we have to find methods of distributing this large farm surplus we have on our hands. We have heard that the Department of Agriculture is determined to help the unemployment situation by distributing some of these farm surpluses to those who are unemployed. I sincerely hope that this will be done immediately. I hope that some sort of food stamp plan can be initiated in order to help the unemployed not three years from now, not six months from now, but in the very near future.

I would also suggest that the Department of Agriculture make every effort to enlarge the amount of food that is being given to other nations of the world. In that way the Department of Agriculture could greatly support the Department of External Affairs and extend its influence in world affairs. This would be to our advantage, because as the other countries of the world become more and more able to buy, they will buy wheat instead of rice. They will be able to buy the high quality and high grade products which Canada produces in such large surplus. I can only hope that the Minister of Agriculture is using his influence to ensure that the tariff policies will not be to the detriment of the agriculture community. We listened with interest to the Minister of Finance when he told us that the legislation is not going to change the tariff policies of the Canadian nation. I hope not because if they are changed, and if we have a high tariff policy the people who will suffer, if they are not suffering sufficiently now, will be the farmers.

I hope the Minister of Agriculture will make every effort to make sure that the Canadian producer captures as much as possible of the domestic market. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said a great deal about buying Canadian. I think this matter is just as important in the area of agriculture as it is in the area of secondary manufacturing. Perhaps it would help a great deal if agricultural products could be stamped or by some means identified as Canadian. I would hope that the Minister of Agriculture would solve this problem of identification of Canadian products so that people walking into a store will know that these food products are Canadian and will be able to encourage their local supermarket or grocery store to buy food products which will support Canadian farmers.

While there are a number of special areas in which the minister certainly will be taking an interest, the dairy farmers of Ontario have a number of problems to face. The farmers that I meet are particularly concerned about the fact that they sell their milk to the producer on the basis of manufactured milk prices and then find that this milk is used in various other areas which, of course, results in far greater profits to those who are manufacturing the milk. If this is untrue, I should be very happy to take this information back to my constituents. Unfortunately, this is certainly the feeling of those who are engaged in dairy farming in my particular part of Ontario. I am informed this is one of the reasons for the huge butter surplus, namely that the milk producers are using surplus milk in order to produce butter. Indeed, there is some fear on the part of these farmers that this prospective drop of 10 cents in the price of butter will have a serious effect on dairy farming in this particular area.

I was particularly shocked at the suggestion by one of the hon. members to the left that there should be two ministers of agriculture, one for the west and one for the east. It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, if I may make the suggestion, that what is needed more and more is greater integration of the problems of the western farmer and the eastern farmer. Heaven help us, let us not have two department's going off on separate tangents, neither taking into their complete consideration the problems of the other sector of the economy.

The farmers in eastern Canada I think are as much concerned as are the farmers in western Canada with regard to the weakening of the wheat board. The fear is, of course, that the cheaper grades of wheat will be fed to poultry and hogs in western Canada and this procedure will undercut the production in eastern Canada. That is a serious fear on the part of the farmers I have met. I sincerely hope that the minister will do everything in his power to make sure that these fears are unfounded and that the wheat board will continue to market wheat in an orderly fashion as has been done in the past in this nation.

We shall view with great interest indications that the Department of Agriculture will take a new and dynamic approach to the agricultural problems of this nation. We were heartened by the fact that the minister is concerned that farm prices will go up in the next ten years. May we only suggest that the time is now; that he might take the suggestion of the Department of Labour and adopt a do-it-now-attitude toward this problem, and that a far more dynamic approach might be taken towards giving our agricultural economy a healthy and prosperous basis on which to operate over the next number of years.

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few minutes to discuss the grant of $26,000 to the Agricultural Institute of Canada. I am one of the original members of this institute and am also fortunate in having a lifetime membership. I believe my hon. friend from Kootenay West is also a member of this institution and I know there are others in the House of Commons. This institute was organized in 1920. It was first called the Canadian society of technical agriculturalists. However, some few years ago the name was changed to that of Agricultural Institute of Canada. The figures that I obtained the other day indicate that the membership totals 3,065. These members are mostly graduates in agriculture from recognized universities. Members hold top scientific agricultural positions throughout Canada. I want to say that I know of no other group in the Dominion of Canada who are more dedicated to their work and to the advancement of agriculture than are the scientific agriculturists of Canada.

Our own deputy minister is a member of this society. The head offices are on Gloucester street. There are 32 branches of the institute: five in British Columbia, four in Alberta, six in Saskatchewan, three in Manitoba, seven in Ontario, three in Quebec and one in each of the other provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. There is a national council, a president, a president-elect and a vice president; there is an honorary secretary and a director from each province helping to run the business, and there are nine affiliated societies. Thus members can see that there are very few areas of a scientific agricultural nature which are not covered by this institution.

In what we term the hungry thirties this institute was operating, but with very little cash, and at that time the federal government gave grants to pay for the printing of the results produced by this scientific research into agricultural questions. The association did the experimenting and compiled the results; the government paid for the printing. This was the arrangement used to supply the public with the results of agricultural research in Canada. The grant now amounts to $26,000 and, I repeat, it is for the purpose of printing a scientific and economic review and other necessary papers and journals. The money is not used to support the actual work of the association but is merely in respect to the printing. The agricultural institute gets its revenue from its membership and from advertisements in different journals and papers.

I have here the November-December issue of the institute, Review. Hon. members will recognize the photograph on the front page. It is a photograph of one of the hon. gentlemen who spoke. I should like to put on record some of the items which are discussed in this particular issue. They include the Canadian Farm Building Plan Service, Rural Aging, Basic and Applied Research in Weed Control, the Inter-American Conference on Agriculture, expressions of opinion by recognized experts, and so on. These are some of the results published, and this is how they are printed. Often in days gone by we heard criticism of experimental and scientific research along these lines: This work is all done in institutions, but you do not get it out to the people who are interested in it. Well, this is the very thing that this agricultural institute does and I strongly support this grant of $26,000.

I do not want to sit down, Mr. Chairman, without saying that even though my constituency is 3,000 miles away from Ottawa I have a couple of ladies in the gallery from the town of Chilliwack, one of the greatest places in British Columbia, and I am delighted to see them here.

Mr. Herridge: As another charter member of the Agricultural Institute of Canada, and as a life member, I endorse wholeheartedly the speech which has just been concluded.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of participating again in the discussion of the agriculture estimates, but as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) did not deal with the dairy industry, I feel I have to make a few remarks regarding such an important matter.

Yet, before getting right down to the subject, I want to commend the minister for his sincerity, when he recognized the agricultural capabilities of opposition members, and more particularly those of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets). I find that the Minister of Agriculture has not the same turn of mind as the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) and is able to admit that a lawyer can be conversant in something else besides law, that he can speak of farming, and deal with a particular sector of national economy even though it concerns all classes of society.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot could have used the same arguments against the Minister of Agriculture who is not a professional agriculturist, but indeed a former university professor. Mr. Chairman, I shall have the opportunity of coming back to the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture when speaking on his estimates.

At this time, I want to deal with the dairy industry, and the conditions now prevailing in this country as far as butter, cheese, etc., are concerned. Butter consumption is decreasing at an alarming rate at the moment, whereas margarine consumption is rising considerably.

It is noted, for instance, that butter consumption per capita, which was 20¼ pounds in 1957, has decreased to 16½ pounds in 1960. On the other hand, the increase in margarine consumption has gone up from 7¾ pounds in 1957 to 9¼ pounds in 1960. This means that the farmer has lost a market for 57 million pounds of butter in four years, that is the milk production of 11,000 farms averaging 20 cows each.

Despite the population increase, butter consumption has been decreasing by 3 million pounds a month, while margarine consumption reached 166 million pounds last year.

What is the situation of the milk industry today? How large are our stocks?

On March 1 our stocks amounted to about 80 million pounds of butter, 5 million pounds of dry skimmed milk and about 2 million pounds of cheese. We had no whole milk powder in stock.

The situation is not very serious at this time because a year of drought would eat up those surpluses in no time. However, it will become more serious if the government takes no action to prevent the accumulation of surpluses, if it does not take certain steps to check the decline in butter consumption or if it does not get rid of milk surpluses one way or another.

Since 1957 the government has followed a no-action policy in that field. And yet, recommendations are not lacking, for the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and farm associations, milk producers, economists and members of the opposition have made suggestions every year.

Mr. Chairman, I could deal in detail with those recommendations, but I will only list them. Recommendations included a butter consumption subsidy of 10, 15 or even 20 cents a pound; a two-cent subsidy on every quart of milk sold to the consumer; the purchase of milk powder surpluses, estimated at about 60,000 pounds a year; a 25-cent subsidy per hundredweight of milk produced by the farmers.

Another recommendation which I might stress a little more has to do with the free distribution of milk in schools. The suggestion was made by the Canadian milk producers association and according to the president of the organization, Mr. Emile Cote, it would cost no more to carry it out than to carry out the price support policy that we now have. If such a policy were carried out on the basis of the experience in war years, when it was in force, it would increase milk consumption by 1,300 million pounds or the equivalent of 50 million pounds of butter or 121 million pounds of cheese.

Mr. Cote points out that the implementation of this suggestion would not create a precedent, because substantial amounts are already being paid to essential average size industries other than food industries, namely gold mining, railroads, coal mining and others.

We realize that those recommendations, put forward by qualified people, are not well received because they are too simple and too logical. The government prefers to do as it pleases; it prefers confused and difficult situations which reveal the incompetence of the two ministers of agriculture we have had over the past four years.

Mr. Chairman, there is another grievance I should like to express with regard to the dairy industry. It concerns the present situation of the large companies producing powdered milk, whole milk or any other agricultural product, in the matter of patents. It is a long story, but I shall try to summarize it as best as I can.

A few years ago, a certain Mr. Peebles of the Western Condensing Company, of California, having improved the processing of instant powdered milk, for which permits granted in 1904 had expired, applied in 1953 for patent rights on the manufacture of instant powdered milk. In 1954, he therefore started to sell instant powdered milk. In the same year he founded the Instant Milk Company. Mr. Peebles owned 50 per cent of the stock, while the other 50 per cent was owned by Carnation. At the time, Mr. Peebles offered to sell his shares to Carnation, but the latter refused. He then sold them to Formost Dairy Incorporated. Carnation and Formost, which already had patent rights and had made application for other patents, decided to pool those rights and set up a new company, Dairy Food Incorporated, in the hope of controlling the instant powdered milk market within the country and in the rest of the world.

The patent application filed by Mr. Peebles with the American government in 1953 was turned down. It was put forward again by Carnation, and was again turned down by the American court of appeal. The company then decided to appeal to the district court of Columbia in the United States, where the judges yielded to the company's claim. The latter was therefore granted a patent on May 20, 1958. Immediately the company filed an application with the Canadian patent office, and having presented a solid case, it obtained, on December 2, 1958, a Canadian patent bearing number 566787, in the name of Instant Milk Company.

Shortly after the issuance of its American patent, Dairy Food Company started accusing every manufacturer of instant powdered milk in the world of violating its patent, and threatened legal action unless they signed an agreement and paid them rights of 1½ cents a pound on powdered whole milk and ⅞ cent a pound on powdered skim milk.

The first to sign the agreement were, of course, Carnation and Formost. As it was known that Borden had already been involved in several other legal proceedings, its members decided to sign the agreement immediately. Later, it was found that Borden and Carnation were combined organizations with plants in Cuba and other South American countries.

In April 1960, Pet Milk Company of St. Louis, Missouri, was prosecuted by Dairy Foods Incorporated and signed the agreement.

Mr. Fortin: Order.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet who is sitting across from me is trying to interject. If he would listen to what I have to say, he might be in a position to tell the farmers of his constituency what is going on in the house.

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. We are being subjected to the trial of American firms; the hon. member has been discussing their case for at least ten minutes, and I should like him to revert to the matter under discussion.

Mr. Boulanger: If the hon. member will bear with me, he will see what I am leading up to, because I am conversant enough with the rules to know where I am going.

Just bear with me for a moment and you will see what I am leading to.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska could tell us now what is the intent of his remarks so that we may decide whether they are relevant to the estimates now before us.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, the Canadian government granted patent rights to some firms which are now taking advantage of Canadian farmers with the levy of fees that we should not have to pay—and they achieve that through the use of a licence issued on December 2, 1958.

The Chairman: So, as I understand, the hon. member wants to discuss the question of issuing a patent?

Mr. Boulanger: It is in direct relation with dairy products.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

The Chairman: For my part, I doubt that government policy with regard to issuing patents and trade marks, would be connected with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, since the matter is under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Racine: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think the point which the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska wants to make is that the attitude of those companies affects farm income, for he is trying to convince the house—and I am sure he will succeed—that dairy products are controlled by monopoly and that the farmers consequently are receiving less for their produce. I therefore think it is very appropriate to deal with this particular matter when discussing the agriculture estimates.

The Chairman: I may tell the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine) that he has been perhaps more convincing than his colleague, and if that is the intention of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, I shall allow him to continue his remarks. But, what the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska criticized earlier had to do with patents, which is not quite the same thing as a monopoly by some companies.

Mr. Boulanger: I am pleased to see that the hon. member for Beauce has succeeded in convincing you, Mr. Chairman, which is one more proof that opposition members are quite conversant in procedure and agricultural matters.

As I was saying, it is interesting to note that the Carnation and Pet Milk companies own the General Milk Company, an export firm in which Carnation, which has branches in Canada, owns 60 per cent of the shares, and the Pet Milk Company 40 per cent. Those two firms have since formed an organization in France and are about to establish their monopoly in other countries.

Now, on the basis of the price of skim milk, which is sold for as little as 8¼ cents a pound, and at a cost of 2 cents to make it into instant milk, you have a total cost of 10.25 cents a pound and the royalty of ⅝ cent a pound would amount to 6.1 per cent.

Yet, the contract is for the duration of the patent, in 17 years. On the basis of the 1960 production, i.e. 33,300,000 pounds of milk powder the royalties for the year would be $208,000. As sales of instant skim milk for 1960 show an increase of 56 per cent in comparison with the preceding year, it is easy to guess what that royalty will produce by the time the patent expires. Based on the 1960 figure, the amount represents an additional $35 million which the consumer will have to pay because of a patent which should not have been granted to those monopolies.

Today, the Dairy Foods Company threatened to sue foreign firms, and initiated proceedings against a Canadian company, Milk Products Limited, of Hamilton, Ont. It is also prosecuting the Dried Milk Products Co-operative of Eau Claire, Wis.

Milko Products Limited has developed its own processing methods and its own device for changing milk into instant powder. Their device is covered by Canadian patent No. 533204. This manufacturing process has also branched out to various other countries and patent applications are pending elsewhere. Milko Products Limited pioneered in the field of canned skim milk powder sold to consumers throughout Canada since 1950. It also was the first to manufacture and sell instant skim milk powder throughout this country. It would be unfortunate if only one organization had absolute control over the production and sale of instant powdered milk, which is now becoming so widely used. Already, Cherry-Burrell Corporation has stopped producing its instantizer, fearing reprisals on the part of Dairy Foods Incorporated.

If the consumer has to pay extra on instant milk powder, large families will suffer, because they will have to keep from buying it and will thus be deprived of a sound food product.

The four largest manufacturers of milk powder in Canada get their product from American firms. Therefore, it is readily seen that it is becoming more and more difficult for a Canadian corporation to compete in this increasingly expanding field of the dairy industry with foreign corporations belonging to organizations established all over the world.

On page 23 of the 1960 edition of Modern Methods of Food Industry Management, published by Food Engineering, there is a list of companies bought out between 1948 and 1954 by companies wishing to control the industry. They are the following:

Formost Dairies Inc.	85
Borden Co.	62
Carnation Co.	24
Pet Milk Co.	7

Mr. Chairman, that is the situation of the dairy industry at present. Farmers are wondering today what the future has in store for them, with a shortsighted government doing everything to protect large companies or big businessmen. It is not without reason that it is being said that the Conservative government is the government of big business.

Mr. Pigeon: Just think of C. D. Howe. Big business indeed.

Mr. Boulanger: That is the present situation of the dairy industry. Therefore, I would ask the minister to inquire into the situation of those large companies trying to control the whole production and sale of milk powder in Canada.

We are demanding such an inquiry in order to know whether it is possible to remedy the situation before our farmers vanish from the scene at the rate at which they have been vanishing these last few years.

On behalf of the farmers of the province of Quebec and of Canada as a whole, we are asking that the support price of 64 cents a pound on butter, and of 32 cents a pound on cheese be maintained in Quebec, as well as in all the other provinces. At present, Quebec farmers are getting half a cent less a pound, so I would like the minister to tell us why they are not treated on an equal footing with farmers of the rest of the country.

We also urge the Minister of Agriculture to examine farming conditions in the east, and we invite him to come and visit the eastern part of the country. We read in the papers that the minister is always travelling in the west. So, we would ask him to come and visit the eastern farmers, those of the province of Quebec and of the maritimes, to realize what the actual situation is. Perhaps he will then be in a position to talk more often about it, when he takes the floor here to deal with agriculture.

(Text):

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, in rising to participate for the first time in the discussion of the agriculture estimates I should first of all like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture on his transfer to the department of which he is now minister. I say this because I personally feel he has brought to the department a knowledge that he has acquired through the years and an understanding of the problems of the farmers who are indebted to him for the many actions that have been taken.

I say this because only recently the Canadian Federation of Agriculture had a convention in this city and some of the delegates who attended that convention also took part in the mass march on Ottawa some time ago on which occasion we were given somewhat a rough time. However, these same people today want me to express to the Minister of Agriculture their feelings of confidence that he will do much for them and that he can display an understanding which was so lacking under the Liberal administration. If I may be permitted to make a comparison, they felt like delinquent children for many years and now they have found an understanding parent.

Perhaps the best thing that could be done so far as the Liberal party is concerned is to ignore the criticisms that have been levelled from that quarter. However, because there may be some people in the country who in a moment of weakness may feel that the Liberal party may have something to offer to them at some time in the future—certainly they did not in the past—I should like to refer to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. I am not sure whether he is the number one man or the number two man. When he first spoke on the estimates of the department on February 24 he said, as found on the first page of the English translation for that date:

I should just like to say that if anybody is losing confidence, whether it be a farmer or a businessman, and he feels that the profession he is following has no future, does he take out a loan? Does he go into debt? Certainly I would think that he would withdraw all his equity and run. This is definitely not the case with agriculture and I should like to compare the amount of loans in three years to show whether there is lack of confidence. From April 26, 1956, to March, 1957 loans amounted to $13,978,000. In 1957-58 the figure was $21,278,000 and in 1958-59 it was $30,145,000. Under the farm credit corporation, from April, 1959, to October 5, 1959, loans amounted to $23,215,000 and the figure for the period from October 5, 1959, to January 31, 1961, is $72,200,000. To me that certainly does not indicate a lack of confidence either in the way the government is administering the department or in the profession of farming itself. It is an indication that the farmers have renewed hope.

[Mr. Korchinski.]

The hon. member continued to be critical of the government and said that it had channelled a lot of the taxpayers' money into agriculture. As found on page 2 of the English translation for February 24 he had this to say:

> As a matter of fact, the cost to the Canadian taxpayers for meeting the commitments under the farm legislation was $77 million in 1960, $22.1 million in 1959 and $60.1 million in 1958.

He made a similar comment in participating in the debate last year. As found on page one of the English translation for March 25, 1960, he had this to say:

> Under the Liberal administration, from 1946 to March, 1957, the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act cost $25,052,806.98. Now if you look at the expenditures for the past three years, that is since the Conservative government took over, you find that in 1958 Canada spent close to $6 million and in 1959 $15,124,000. Now, for the year 1959-60 we are asked to vote $57,661,176.
> That means that since the election of the Conservative government it has cost the taxpayers the substantial amount of $78,773,819 to support agricultural prices. In short, therefore, it can be said that in the last 12 years of Liberal administration it cost us $25 million to support those prices, while in three years of Conservative administration the amount expended was $78 million.

I have no apology for what the Conservative government has done. In his statement the other day the hon. member went on to say:

> When will it put back in each farmer's pocket the $120 that the Liberal government took from him in taxes each year?

He is complaining that this government is putting back into the pockets of the farmers some of the money that the Liberal government had taken from them and, incidentally, the farmers too are taxpayers. It is no wonder that farmers today are looking forward to the present government carrying on in the manner it has. They well remember the $600 million that the British wheat agreement cost them. It will be a long time before they will look at anything that the Liberals have to offer.

The hon. member went off into the wilderness and ended up in a swamp when he tackled the question of the wheat board. I think the Minister of Agriculture dealt with that point and I will not deal with it further. The hon. member then went off on another tangent and decided to deal with the feed mill problem. I will be very brief on this point. The minister has put on record a table which indicates that prices are not depressed, as C.C.F. spokesmen would have us believe.

I should also like to point out that when the national farmers union presented their brief this year they were critical of the new feed mill regulations. At that time I asked Mr. Atkinson, the vice-president of the Saskatchewan farmers union, why they should be critical since in their brief they thought that co-operatives should be expanded. I asked him why he should be critical since it appeared to me that the feed mill policy would be of direct assistance in the expansion of co-operatives. It certainly seems to me that would be the case in an area where a feed mill exists and the farmers are being paid lower prices. It seems to me that under those circumstances farmers should group together to form a co-operative and pay the price that the Canadian wheat board pays. This would certainly eliminate the existing feed mills. These farmers could establish themselves as supporters of the Canadian wheat board and could pay, as I have said, the prices the wheat board offers but at the same time abide by its regulations. I do not think this would hamper the development of co-operatives.

I asked him what he thought of this suggestion but his only reply was "I will see you later". I have neither seen nor heard anything from him regarding the problem as I presented it at that time but, I should like to know what his opinion is. I have written several letters pointing out my solution to this problem but have yet to receive a reply.

One other point I should like to mention is that farmers have for years been able to arrange deals among themselves and with others who were interested in paying a price for grain. During all the years I have been buying grain I have always had to pay a price if not equivalent to that offered by the Canadian wheat board, certainly higher. I do not understand why a farmer should allow himself to be taken in, if that is what is happening, because he has no obligation to sell his product.

The wheat board regulations were criticized and it was said the wheat board would be ruined if there were sales over and above the quotas. Anyone familiar with the situation will realize that there are special quotas for barley for malting purposes as well as special quotas for specialty oats and they have not ruined the wheat board. This situation has been in existence for many years. I do not intend to review it again now.

The next point I should like to bring to your attention, Mr. Chairman, has no reference to feed mills. Incidentally, the hon. member for Assiniboia said that the feed mill issue was the hottest issue today and he was sure that the government would have to do something about it. This is the master mariner from the prairie who appears to have all the problems in hand, and claims that he can guide us over all sorts of troubled waters. I realize however that he has made mistakes before. He tried to take credit the other day for the big wheat sales to China and Czechoslovakia but I am afraid I cannot see that he had anything to do with them. However, if he wishes to take credit he must also accept the responsibility for the lack of sales under the Liberal government. He cannot have it both ways.

I should like in the little time left at my disposal to deal with a problem that vexes many farmers, and if I may be permitted I wish to follow my notes a little closer. I want to refer to the issue of permit books to producers. Each producer has one permit book in which are recorded all acreages leased. This creates a problem when a cash advance is required by the producer. In many cases the landlord resides miles away from the farm and in some cases out of the country. Before an advance can be obtained the landlord must sign a declaration. It is often impossible to get this declaration and the producer is then deprived of a cash advance. I have known of cases where the landlords simply refused to sign declarations, even though they might reside in the vicinity of the farms. I think this problem can be solved by having two permit books. One could be known as a producer's permit book and the other, perhaps, as the landlord's book. Each could be distinguishable by different coloured pages.

To illustrate what I have in mind, let us take the case of a producer who owns land of which 400 acres is cultivated and also rents land of which there are 300 acres cultivated. The basis of the rental agreement is, one third of the crop going to the landlord and two thirds to the renter. The producer, who is also a renter, would then be able to deliver on 400 of his own acres plus two thirds of the 300 acres making a total of 600 acres. The producer's permit book would then indicate that delivery could be made on 600 acres, while the landlord's book would register an acreage of one third of the total 300 acres or 100 acres on which delivery could be made. This would in no way mean that there would be any additional grain delivered as the total cultivated acreage is the same. The initial quota would, however, have to be divided on the basis of the agreement, even though the producer would have more of his own acreage. In other words, 200 bushels to the producer and 100 bushels to the landlord.

To take the same example, but in this case the rental agreement on a 50-50 basis, the renter would then have an acreage registered in his permit book on which he could make delivery of 400 acres of his own land plus one half of the rented land, or a total of 550 acres. The landlord's book would in this case register an acreage of 150 acres. The initial quota would then be 150 bushels to the producer and 150 bushels to the landloard.

The situation becomes somewhat more involved when a producer rents land from several landlords. The same procedure is followed in calculating the acreage for the producer and the landlord, however, depending on the rental arrangement. The landlord and the producer would have to sign a declaration in all cases where the agreement is verbal before a permit book could be issued. If a rental agreement could be produced, an affidavit signed by the producer would be acceptable.

The objection could be raised that the initial quota, where the producer normally sells his own grain to meet his own expenses, would be small when it is split up between the landlord and the renter. This objection could be overcome by the fact that the producer could obtain a cash advance, and also by inaugurating a system whereby the landlords would be prohibited from making delivery until the first quota became available. Under this system it would also be possible for the landlord to obtain a cash advance. All such advances would be recorded and registered against this land, the owner of the land being responsible for the repayment, even if a transfer of land is involved. The onus for repayment always must remain with the owner.

This system would have the added advantage of removing the complaint of the landlords, in many cases older, retired people, that they are often not given a chance to sell grain because the renter supplies his own needs first by selling his own grain and thus fills the quota. This is not, of course, the concern of the government, but it would have the effect of correcting the situation.

I should like to make another recommendation to the minister regarding the proposed changes in the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act regulations. At the present time the Department of Agriculture allows a payment for the construction of dugouts to the extent of $250. This has been a good program in the past and has met certain needs of the farmer, but I suggest that it is perhaps time to have another look at the situation. The water that was stored in these dugouts certainly was not of the best quality. Very often it became polluted in which case it was not fit for human consumption. My suggestion to the department is that when a farmer undertakes to drill a well the department assume a portion of the cost equivalent to the cost of a dugout, providing the farmer can show the department that there exists an adequate and good supply of water. In other words, if the department pays $250 toward the construction of a dugout for water it is only reasonable to suggest that the department should now pay the same $250 toward the drilling of a well. This would work in conjunction with the new program being undertaken by the department, and I am of course referring to the rural development program.

The other suggestion I wish to make is one which should meet with the approval of the hon. member from Assiniboia. As reported at page 2413 of Hansard of February 24, he said this:

> I was, of course, for many years a sharp critic of Mr. Gardiner because the average prices established under this legislation were not payable as some of us felt they should be directly to the producer, or they were not guaranteed to the producer. Instead, they were paid to the packing company and the farmer had to deal with the packing companies and do what he could to get from them the established floor.

I should like to make a suggestion here. It is with reference to making payments on elevator stored grain or the storage payment that the government makes to the elevator companies. I have here a table which indicates the amount of money paid by the government. I should like the permission of the committee to have this table printed in Hansard. This table is supplied by the Department of Agriculture. It indicates the amount of storage payments every year since the program was inaugurated in 1955. May I have permission to have this tabled in Hansard?

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The table referred to is as follows:]

Crop Year	Storage paid by Government
1955-56	$ 31,486,187
1956-57	28,816,766
1957-58	35,553,509
1959-60	43,604,073
Total	$179,285,839

The total amount of bushels on which these amounts were paid is as follows:

Crop year	Million Bushels

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, I should like to first make it known that I am not complaining that this payment is being made to the elevator companies. However, like the hon. member for Assiniboia, I feel that this payment should be made directly to the producers. For a number of years now, the department has been paying directly to the elevator company, and I feel that this system should be changed. In the agriculture committee last year it was only through the insistence of the hon. member for Yorkton that we were able to determine what amount was being paid to each elevator company. I think we should perhaps have a better system of indicating what the government does pay with respect to each producer. What I am going to outline may have that effect. If the elevator companies are going to charge seven cents, eight cents or 16 cents, whatever the amount is for the year in storage charges, I feel that that amount should be deducted from the initial cost when the farmer makes the delivery. In other words, there will be the initial price but then the cost for which the elevator companies will have to be compensated by the government will have to be deducted. In order that the initial payment will not be lower I would say that we should revise the system. I think the interim payment system should be eliminated and in place of the interim payment we should have the initial price.

Over the years, every year we have had a 10 cent interim payment. This is only money which is being withheld from the producer. I should explain also that at the end of the year, rather than make a payment to the elevator company the government would make a payment to the farmer depending on the amount of grain delivered. For example, if a farmer delivered 1,000 bushels and the storage charge was 16 cents per bushel for that year the statement would indicate that 1,000 times 16 cents, which is a storage charge of $160, was being paid to the producer to reimburse him for the storage charge originally deducted by the elevator company.

I have here also a list that I should like to have put on the record, if I may have the permission of the committee to do so. It is a table indicating the number of cents per bushel charged on the total bushels of grain delivered to elevators, and also a table indicating the costs per bushel of all that grain over 178 million bushels. If I may have permission, I should like to have this information also put on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give the unanimous consent to this information being printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The tables referred to are as follows:]

Crop Year	Cents per bushel per year
1959-60	10.5

NOTE: Relating this to wheat stored in excess of 178 million bushels the costs are as follows:

Crop Year	Cents per bushel per year

Mr. Korchinski: I note that my time is running short, Mr. Chairman. However, I should also like to bring to the attention of the committee one other complaint that I have had. It is a complaint that seems to be quite prevalent in many municipalities, and refers to the official date under which an application from a municipality can be received for P.F.A.A. assistance. At the present time under the regulations the date is September 15th. I think this date should be changed. This date should be November 1st. When the act was first drafted this date applied to that southern area of the prairies where their harvest is perhaps over by that time. But in my area our harvest drags on sometimes to November 1. I think there is no point in having a municipality first make application on September 15th when they have no idea what the average yield will be. In other words, a rather inaccurate prediction is made just so that the departmental officials will come into that municipality. Later, another revised estimate has to be made. I think this date should be stepped up to November 1st. I say this because we have run into several—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house as the case may be?

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence according to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the house for the consideration of order No. 1 under private bills, namely, a bill respecting Canadian Pacific Railway, before any order was called under public bills. As the basis for my request, I might say that on the early passage of this Bill No. S-13 depends the immediate employment of a fairly large number of men for a three-month to four-month period in the construction of a railway spur eight and a quarter miles in length.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the circumstances explained by the sponsor of the bill this group is only too willing to co-operate.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to the request made by the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. S-13, respecting Canadian Pacific Railway Company—Mr. Speakman.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

PROVISION FOR NATIONAL FLAG, ANTHEM AND INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-22 respecting the sovereignty of Canada.

(Translation):

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill deals with the expression of the sovereignty of our great country. Throughout its history, Canada has known a constant constitutional development and has become a sovereign state within the commonwealth of nations.

A state is sovereign when it enjoys supreme authority in its own territory and is subordinate to no other state in the international field. Sovereign does not mean absolute, since all states must submit to public international law.

It can be proudly stated that our country enjoys today the eight main attributes of a sovereign state. These are the right to legislate; the right to make our legislation extraterritorial; the right of diplomatic representation abroad; the right to have Canadian courts of last resort; the right to declare peace; war or neutrality; the right to amend our constitution as we see fit; the right to negotiate and to ratify ourselves our own treaties; and finally the acknowledgment of our sovereignty by the other countries of the world.

Many factors and events have brought about the realization of this maturity. But the most outstanding was the Statute of Westminster, passed on December 11, 1931, and granting our country its sovereignty and independence within the commonwealth.

It is not enough to enjoy Canadian sovereignty that is so often referred to in this house, at the United Nations, in NATO, and everywhere else throughout the world. That actual sovereignty must be reflected by external signs that would proclaim our distinctive Canadian personality.

This national need to express ourselves in a distinctive manner is not in any way detrimental to our relations with other commonwealth members to whom we are united by our common allegiance to the crown.

Mr. Speaker, it is mainly this spirit that motivates the introduction of my bill the reminder of an existent Canadian sovereignty and, as external signs to express it: a distinctive national flag, a distinctive national anthem, and a national sovereignty day.

I realize that this government faces a number of economic problems. However, the bill that I have the honour of introducing is not unrelated to the success of our efforts in all fields. In fact, the achievement of these three objects will promote understanding between Canadians from coast to coast, show that Canadian patriotism is really alive and stir up a national dynamism, likely to increase the efforts required for the development of our great country.

In the course of these remarks, we will deal separately with the first two objects of the bill, although the reasons which commend them to us are practically the same. But a common aspect which should be pointed out immediately has to do with the interpretation of the term "distinctive". Both instances involve the adoption of a flag and of an anthem that distinguish and characterize our national colours and our national aspirations, and that differ from designs or anthems of all other countries.

It is not the first time that this matter comes up in the political forum of Canada. In the past, governments, associations, members and many Canadians have raised this important issue, without getting any definite results.

The status quo of flags in Canada seems to be as follows: from 1760 to 1892, we hoist the union jack and the red ensign. In 1892, Sir John Macdonald, in an effort of national development, is granted the use of the red ensign, with the arms of Canada reproduced in its field, for merchant vessels registered in Canada. In 1911, the union jack is indicated as being our statutory flag to be flown officially over land in Canada. In 1924, use of the red ensign is authorized on all buildings which the Canadian government owns or occupies abroad. On September 5, 1945, the late Mackenzie King adopts an order in council which imposes the red ensign as the Canadian flag, with the arms of Canada in the fly and the union jack in the upper part, and that until parliament decides otherwise.

Considering the origin and the history of flags, we find that the union jack remains the national emblem of Great Britain, under a royal proclamation of January 1, 1801, and that the red ensign, authorized in England by Queen Anne in 1707 and by Queen Victoria in 1864, constitutes, under section 72 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, the national flag for all vessels and boats owned by British subjects.

Now, if Canadians really wish to demonstrate the new Canadian citizenship which has been theirs since January 1, 1947, and if those same Canadians want to display a distinctive patriotism, those two flags are no longer suitable as legitimate expressions of their feelings. Besides, the order in council of September 5, 1945 does state that the red ensign will be flown until parliament decides otherwise. That order in council recognizes a temporary situation which we must now correct by something definite, by the adoption of a distinctive national flag for our own Canada.

Since the last war, Canadian opinion in this field has steadily developed and it has now attained a degree of maturity which leaves no cause for doubt.

Why has the time come to act? Because our country needs external signs of its legal and progressive sovereignty. Sir Robert Borden signed, on behalf of this country, the peace treaty of Versailles. In 1923, Mr. Ernest Lapointe signed in Washington what was the first official treaty negotiated by our nation with a foreign country without recourse to the services of a representative of the London government. On December 11, 1931, under the Bennett government, the Statute of Westminster recognized the independence and the sovereignty of our country within the commonwealth. During the last war, Canada was the first country in America to declare war on Germany. Later on, the federal government appointed a Canadian to the position of governor general. Appeals to the privy council of England were abolished and, as I was saying, a Canadian citizenship established on January 1, 1947.

In the field of external affairs, Canada has shown itself to be a distinct power in the military as well as in the economic field. Must we recall its membership as a distinct nation in the United Nations, in the Colombo plan, in NATO and within the disarmament committee of ten nations. It has more and more ambassadors and plenipotentiary ministers throughout the world.

The world is learning to appreciate our initiative and our mediation. Such an important situation must not be jeopardized by the absence of a flag. We would otherwise expose ourselves to unfortunate incidents such as Nasser's protestations during the Suez crisis of 1956. Let us recall that the United Nations police force then responsible for the maintenance of peace in Egypt included men from Canada, Colombia, Denmark, Norway, Pakistan and Sweden. All those countries but Canada had a national flag, a distinctive flag.

If our country has grown up so much and if that evident maturity is acknowledged from every quarter, we should then exteriorize that emancipation through a really Canadian and truly distinctive national flag. The pride and future of our country is at stake. Most Canadians have a keen desire to live not for countries where their distant forefathers were born, but for the land which feeds them and will finally receive them.

Such a flag will strengthen the convictions which were at the origin of the confederation of 1867. It will materialize our common aspirations, our parliamentary and individual freedoms, our national understanding and our Canadian patriotism.

The various political parties represented in the federal parliament have already indicated a clear stand in favour of the adoption of a distinctive national flag. Resolutions along those lines were unanimously adopted by the Conservatives at their convention in December 1956, and by the Liberals at their rallies in January 1958 and January 1960. On November 8, 1945, as shown on page 1939 of Hansard, the C.C.F. leader, Mr. Coldwell, had this to say:

> I wish to see Canada with a distinctive flag, and in my opinion the red ensign with our coat of arms on it, which I would rather say nothing about, is not a distinctive flag.

Now, if all Canadians need such a flag, if they ask for it in such a way with the support of political parties, if the international community sees in us a child who has reached maturity and his distinctive personality, what are we waiting for? I have every reason to believe this proposal will be welcome and that the house will soon give it the stamp of its approval.

If we adopted a distinctive national flag, we should at the same time have to designate a distinctive national anthem. Because, how could we salute our own flag while singing the national anthem of another country? It would be absolute nonsense.

There is no longer any doubt that our country has reached maturity and that it intends to develop along that line. In 1958, Mr. Vincent Massey, our past governor general, acknowledged this national awareness. This is what he said then:

I feel that we have learned to be independent and proud of our country. We shall retain our identity as long as we remain true to our traditions while showing our independence.

For many years, two anthems have been sung in Canada—the one entitled "O Canada" was composed by a Canadian; the other, the royal anthem is "God Save the Queen".

For the reasons given above, it is essential that we now select a distinctive national anthem, i.e. an anthem likely to satisfy the aspirations of the greatest number of Canadians and one that would not be the national anthem of another country, by its origin, its composition and its expression.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the "God Save the Queen" that we admire and like to sing on various occasions, is recognized as the national anthem of a friendly country, Great Britain. By its origin, its composition and its expression, it does not reflect the Canadian spirit.

As a matter of fact, "God Save the Queen" has various origins and a European past. History reports that when the French King Louis XIV entered the chapel of Saint-Cyr, the boarders broke into that song, the words of which had been written by the superior, Madame de Brinon, and the music composed by Jean-Baptiste Lully.

Grand Dieu, sauvez le roi,
Grand Dieu, vengez le roi,
Vive le roi!
Que toujours glorieux,
Louis victorieux,
Voit à ses pieds ses ennemis
Toujours soumis!

According to tradition, Handel, the famous German composer, patronized by the king of England, visited Saint-Cyr in 1721, obtained permission to transcribe the song, translated it into English and offered it to King George I. Later, the song was slightly changed and became England's majestic "God Save the King".

Some authors have it that the melody of "God Save the King" was at some time or other, with appropriate words, of course, the national anthem of Prussia, Germany, Switzerland, and even Russia.

All this shows that "God Save the Queen" is deeply rooted in history. It has been the national anthem of England since practically the year 1745, during the Scottish revolution.

But there is nothing typically Canadian about it. That is why time has come to add to a distinctive Canadian flag a national anthem which will stir up the emotions and the feelings of Canadians.

As a third external sign of Canadian sovereignty, the bill proposes a national sovereignty day which would be celebrated each year on December 11, to commemorate the Statute of Westminster.

We must not be afraid to stimulate pride and patriotism in Canada. We must give to all Canadians an opportunity of becoming more aware of our constitutional development, and to express their joy of being Canadians, with all the advantages inherent in Canadian citizenship.

The annual observance of a national holiday would provide this opportunity and special celebrations in the various provinces and in the schools would further stimulate Canadian patriotism among our young people.

In ancient times, people worked hard at inculcating love of country in the minds of the young. Thus, in Athens, the young ephebus, that is the young Greek between 18 and 20 years old, went up on the Acropolis to swear allegiance on his honour to his country.

Such a ceremony could be revived on independence day if young Canadians were invited to take an oath and to pledge themselves to the service of our great country.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding may I be permitted to state the substance of the bill which it is my privilege to submit:

The healthy instinct of independence of a nation is anchored in the hearts of its people. Although certain historical traditions may, for a time, restrict that instinct it cannot be expected that it will be dormant eternally. Any nation with pride in its achievements in peace and war and conscious of its own sovereignty will insist that its status be recognized by other independent nations.

A distinctive national flag, a distinctive national anthem and a national independence day constitute external signs of sovereignty and it is the purpose of this bill to provide these three worthy attributes for our country.

Thus:

Whereas since the 11th of December, 1931 Canada is a sovereign nation, among the members of the commonwealth of nations, with them united by a common allegiance to the crown, equal in status and in no way subordinate to the United Kingdom;

Whereas the sovereignty of Canada should be made evident by the adoption of a distinctive national flag, the designation of a distinctive national anthem and the observance of a legal holiday on the 11th day of December in each and every year;

Therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. This act may be cited as the National Sovereignty Act.

2. Canada is hereby declared to be a sovereign nation.

3. It shall be the duty of the Canada council to prepare or have prepared, after competition or otherwise, a design for a suitable distinctive national flag free of the emblem or emblems of any other country and to submit the same to the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada within one year of the coming into force of this act.

4. Notwithstanding any royal prerogative and anything contained in any act, of the parliament of the United Kingdom such design for a national flag, after it has been approved by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons, shall be submitted for approval to Her Majesty the Queen and for the issuance of a royal proclamation under the great seal of Canada respecting such ensign, armorial flags and banners as Her Majesty shall be pleased to appoint.

5. It shall be the duty of the Canada council to select after competition a distinctive national anthem for Canada and to submit the same to the Senate and House of Commons of Canada within one year from the coming into force of this act.

6. The anthem mentioned in the previous section shall become the national anthem for Canada after it has been approved by a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada.

7. Throughout Canada, in each and every year, the eleventh day of December (not being a Sunday), being the anniversary of the day the Statute of Westminster, 1931 was assented to, shall be a legal holiday and shall be kept and observed as such, under the name of Canadian independence day.

8. When the eleventh day of December is a Sunday, the twelfth day of December shall be, in lieu thereof, throughout Canada, a legal holiday, and shall be kept and observed as such under the same name.

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, when anyone raises a question in the house and does it in an objective way, as did the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), I think it is the duty of all who rise after him to follow in his steps and to congratulate him for having once more brought before the house such controversial issues as a distinctive national flag, a national anthem and a Canadian independence day.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke mentioned many cases where the government by its decisions had helped our independence make a step forward. As a matter of fact, he said, and I am using his own words I think, our constitutional evolution had never ceased.

He mentioned the Canadian citizenship, the abolition of appeals to the privy council and the appointment of a Canadian as governor general.

He could have recalled also the mention in both languages, through an order in council, of Her Majesty as the Queen of Canada, as well as the appointment of our ambassadors under the great seal of Canada.

He also referred to the 1931 treaty and the signing of the first Canadian treaty by a minister of the crown, the Hon. Mr. Lapointe, without the representative of the United Kingdom.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke, I want to repeat it again, presented the question as objectively as it was humanly possible to do so, and I wish to congratulate him for that.

I need not explain again in this house the stand of our group, of our party concerning the adoption of a distinctive national flag. However, I do not wish to go on record without mentioning the 22 years of discussion on a distinctive Canadian flag, which did not produce a legislation providing for such a distinctive national flag. But I can say, as the hon. member for Sherbrooke mentioned in his remarks, that in the past several members have proposed legislation about a distinctive national flag.

Many are inclined to believe that when a member introduces a private bill and a discussion is started on that bill it is a waste of time for the House of Commons.

Such opinion is erroneous. On the contrary, I feel that every time matters as important as a national flag, a national anthem and a national independence day are raised in this house, we contribute through discussions as objective as the one just proposed by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, to mould public opinion in our country.

If we did not adopt a flag under the former regime—and I am not alone in deploring the fact, it is deplored by all members—the reason is, in my humble opinion, and the former prime minister indicated it repeatedly, that a flag must be a symbol of unity for all the citizens of a country.

He undoubtedly felt, because he was aware of it, that the public opinion was not ready to adopt a distinctive national flag.

In fact, every Canadian is free and everyone has a right to his own ideas about a distinctive national flag.

We should not criticize those who do not think as we do. On the contrary, we must try to make them understand our point of view that in an independent country, in a country which has therefore reached maturity in all fields, it is a duty and a right to think of a distinctive flag which will reflect our history, aspirations and independence.

So, I entirely concur in the proposals of the hon. member for Sherbrooke who has put in quite a different way remarks which we have been hearing here for any years.

About the flag, I recall that some 15 years ago, while I was in Ethiopia, in the heart of dark Africa, to teach geography, those young Ethiopians—I am glad to pay tribute to their emperor—were born with the love of their parents' country in their hearts.

And those pupils could not understand that a country like Canada, of which so much is said around the world and which has earned the sympathy and esteem of all other countries, did not have its own distinctive flag.

I used to explain to them what I just told the house, that public opinion was not ready for it yet. But they had a question which almost forced me to silence: "But do not all Canadians have for their country the same love as we have for ours?"

The question, we must admit, was too difficult for me to answer and too difficult for them to understand.

So, I want to say to the hon. member for Sherbrooke, who has introduced this bill, that we are all in favour of a distinctive national flag.

I would even say that the people of Canada are becoming more and more in favour of distinctive national flag.

About a year ago, I was reading in an important magazine that a poll has been conducted among students in the 15 to 21 age group in most high schools and other schools in this country. The results of this poll showed that 70 per cent of our young people are in favour of a distinctive national flag.

I think, Mr. Speaker, this poll showed a very interesting change in Canadian opinion.

With regard to the national anthem, I think there has been less progress than in the case of a distinctive national flag. However, I am pleased that it has been included in this bill and I hope the demand for a truly Canadian national anthem will increase.

Of course, that does not keep us from singing "God Save the Queen", whenever the occasion arises, singing it with all our heart and soul. But it would also be appropriate to sing a song of devotion to our country and to our forbearers.

Unfortunately, I think it will take a few years more before we get practical results, namely a truly distinctive national anthem.

Like the hon. member for Sherbrooke, hon. members will have to raise the matter often in their constituencies, with children and students and in discussions with their colleagues.

There will probably have to be many speeches made on the matter of a distinctive national anthem, but I am confident we will get it; I am even confident that we will get it before I draw my old age security pension.

With regard to the suggestion of a Canadian independence day, it becomes a corollary, as was so well shown by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, to the matter of a distinctive national flag and of a distinctive national anthem.

I do not want to take up any more of the time of the house. In closing, may I again commend the hon. member for Sherbrooke who has shown remarkable objectivity in launching the discussion of the bill.

Such speeches can only draw the various elements of our population closer together; they can only create mutual sympathy between the two groups composing it.

As the hon. member for Sherbrooke had set the tone of this discussion of his bill, I felt I had a duty to follow his example and express my views, in the hope that others would do the same.

(Text):

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to join the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard) in congratulating the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard). His address to the house was logical and sincere and I would say it had some merit in it. However, I wish to depict the other side of the coin. There are always two sides to every question. I think that when both hon. members who preceded me expressed the view that all Canadians want this and want that, they were taking a lot for granted because all Canadians do not want the flag they have in mind, do not want to change the national anthem, do not want to discard July 1 as our national holiday and replace to with December 11. Therefore when they say that all Canadians want these things they are stretching matters too far.

This is not the first time we have discussed this subject. It has come up before. Certainly, it comes before us in different forms. The wording of the bill or resolution is slightly different but the intention and object are the same, namely, a distinctive Canadian flag. This matter is a perennial one and, in fact, comes before the house almost monthly. I have no objection to that. In a democracy we are free to discuss both sides of a problem. I am not going to say that all Canadians agree with me but I know a lot of Canadians who do and I am going to quote a few of them today.

I have spoken on this subject before and to summarize my stand it is simply this. I am in complete accord with legislation being passed to bring about a distinctive Canadian flag but somewhere on the field of that flag I want the union jack. There are thousands and millions of people who support me in that view and that can easily be proved. I dread this controversy, but maybe it is all to the good. I am sorry that there are some people whose only mission in life appears to be to go down in history as having sponsored something altogether different.

I am glad that the hon. member for Sherbrooke did not say what some have said in the house, that they are ashamed of the flag we have, the red ensign; that they are embarrassed every time they look at it; that it hurts their national pride; that it is a symbol of servitude and colonialism; that it is a foreign emblem and so on. I am glad that the hon. member for Sherbrooke, as I understood his remarks, did not use any of those terms because I and thousands and millions like me are not ashamed. We are not embarrassed. We do not consider the union jack an emblem of a foreign country. There are many thousands and millions in this country who still consider that island as the old land and who feel they are going home when they visit that country.

Those of my race have certain attachments to that flag and that is why we would like to see it appear on any new Canadian flag. We would like to see some portion of any such flag allocated to the union jack because we are proud of it and are proud to live under it.

The bill before us probably goes further than any other measure we have had before the house. We have discussed a flag before but this bill seeks to bring about a new national anthem. Do hon. members suffer any indignation or shame when they sing "God Save the Queen", or is this a step in trying to break away from the mother of parliaments, from the Queen, from the monarchy to which we are so attached?

The bill also provides for a new national holiday. What is wrong with July 1 which we now observe as our national holiday? What is wrong with that? Should we break all ties with the past; forget sovereignty, forget our heritage and our ancestry? No one is asking us to do that in Canada today. We are attached to the crown, and we in Canada are proud to say "God Save the Queen".

This bill envisages that the government or parliament will legislate and declare this and this to be the national anthem. Are we going to prohibit everybody from singing "God Save the Queen"? These I suggest are probably the first steps to be taken in that direction, like the first steps taken by the people of South Africa. This bill proposes that we rid ourselves of this, and this, and finally do away with everything represented by British justice and everything for which British fair play stands. It is suggested that we have something completely new.

I feel I am echoing the feelings of many people in Canada. I am just as sincere in my thinking as I presume the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) was in his. I do not doubt his sincerity. I feel that he is honest and means well, but does he suggest that we break away completely from everything in the past? If that is what he means I would ask him why we should then adhere to any of our traditions. I cannot for the life of me understand why some people question the existence of our sovereignty, and suggest only that we have an invisible connection with it. What is sovereignty? I have checked the meaning of this word in several dictionaries and find the best definition contained in volume 25 of the "Encyclopaedia Americana". The definition given there is as follows:

> In political science the supreme power in a state by which the government is administered.

Further on in that definition we find the following statement:

> —the people were the ultimate source of political authority and the same principle was advanced by the French revolution.

I do not understand those people who say that since we have no flag of our own we have no full sovereignty. The hon. member for Sherbrooke discussed this subject in some detail, but I intend to go just a step further. There is not a single foreign soldier on Canadian soil except those who are here with the permission of the government of this country. I suggest that we are completely independent.

Mr. Pigeon: Let us prove it.

Mr. Mandziuk: The hon. member says, let us prove it.

Mr. Pigeon: Let us show it.

Mr. Mandziuk: The hon. member now says let us show it. I would suggest to him that we show it by our actions. I should like those individuals who feel we have no sovereignty to visit the iron curtain countries. Let them take a look at the situation in the satellites. Those hon. members who have been fortunate enough to visit the United Nations have seen what those countries regard as their representatives to the United Nations, and I speak of countries such as Poland, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Romania and the like. Do these representatives act independently at the United Nations? No, they most certainly do not. I will go even further than that and mention the land of my fathers, the Ukraine and its neighbour Byelorussia. They are members of the United Nations but the foreign ministers, as we know them, of the Ukraine and Byelorussia have never appointed one single representative. They have yet to appoint an ambassador or even open an office in other nations. This is what I call a state without sovereignty.

We certainly have control over our own external and domestic affairs and everyone knows it. A statement to the contrary would cause the horses out west to laugh, and we do not intend to do that. We have representatives at the United Nations and ambassadors in many other countries of the world. Surely, no one could say that our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), who played such a leading and brilliant role at the prime ministers' commonwealth conference in London just a few days ago, was not the representative of a country with sovereignty. There certainly does exist evidence by which all those peoples of the world know that we are a sovereign nation and I would suggest that those individuals who think otherwise are blind. Surely we do not want to be placed in the position the peoples of South Africa find themselves in today. I am sure they will regret that they entrusted their affairs of state to individuals like their prime minister.

Where is the servitude and imperialism that we have heard about in this house? We have heard that "God Save the Queen" is a foreign anthem. That national anthem is not the anthem of a foreign nation, it is an anthem which we sing because we consider the queen to be the head of our state, and we revere Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II as our queen. The hon. member for Sherbrooke asks us to insult her by proposing in this bill that she approve a different flag. Everyone realizes that we have had 2,400 different designs submitted, and I am sure we will receive 2,400 more. We would be asking Her Majesty to approve a new national anthem and I would suggest that we might receive 2,400 different versions of it.

As I have suggested before, it is impossible to legislate what exists in the hearts of the people; that which lives there must grow there.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, my time is running out but I must suggest that those individuals who propose that we discard our flag, our national anthem, and even our national holiday are proposing something which will not be received by the people of Canada. This proposal suggests we abandon our celebration of July 1, the date of the formation of our dominion. I am sure that the people of Canada will not accept such a suggestion. In this connection I should like to quote a portion of an article written by Peter Dempson, a gentleman of some reputation in our press gallery, in the Brandon Sun. Part of that article reads as follows:

> The choice isn't likely to be a surprise. It will probably be the Canadian ensign, the flag that was flown over most federal government buildings since 1924, and under which our armed forces fought in world war II and the Korean war.

I would be interested in knowing who could mistake those forces as the forces of some other country than Canada.

Mr. Dempson states further in his article:

> Canada really doesn't need a flag more distinctive than the Canadian ensign. It's known the world over as Canada's flag. It's raised aloft whenever a Canadian or a group of Canadians is being honoured.

Surely this type of statement does not suggest that Canadians want something that has no connection at all with our past and no connection at all with the union jack. I could quote further, Mr. Speaker. With your permission I wish to refer to Torch, the magazine of ex-service men and women. That organization is a large one. You are taking a great deal for granted when you say that all Canadians want something. These men fought under that flag. Here is what they did in 1960 at Windsor. It is interesting to note that the Canadian Legion is pressing for this change.

Mr. Antoine Frechette (Riviere du Loup-Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the member who has the floor—

(Text):

Mr. Mandziuk: Will the hon. member withhold his remarks until I get the translation?

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member repeat his question?

(Translation):

Mr. Frechette: I would like to ask the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk) if the union jack is represented on the flag of his native country.

(Text):

Mr. Mandziuk: Does the hon. member want the union jack? As far as the union jack is concerned, I can take the hon. member to schools in Manitoba and in 75 per cent of them you will find the union jack still flying. They have nothing against the union jack. I should like some indication that your Canadian ensign has met with the approval of the people of Canada. I spoke on this matter before and I am satisfied that you can even have a black flag, a green one, a yellow one or anything you like; but I would ask you to give a place on it to the union jack. That is what I stand for. I think I have answered your question.

Mr. Pigeon: I should like to ask a question of the hon. member. Do you not think in your speech you are more British than Canadian?

Mr. Mandziuk: I am entitled to my opinion just as the hon. member is entitled to his opinion. I did not question his sincerity and I hope he does not question mine. I am sorry that I differ with him, but I have the right to do that.

Torch "The Voice of the 'Corps' ", states as follows:

> At their 1960 dominion convention in Windsor in June they passed a resolution (this was the first time they had formally made reference to the matter) strongly urging the Canadian government to pass an act confirming an order in council of September 5, 1945, which declared the Canadian red ensign to be our national flag.

That comes from men and women who fought under this flag. Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask your permission to let me quote another part of Mr. Dempson's article which is under the heading "The Flag that Stands on Guard". He states as follows:

> Recognition in the form of federal legislation isn't really necessary to make the Canadian ensign our flag, for in every sense it is our flag, but to make the whole thing official, the government could introduce legislation spelling out the Canadian ensign as our national flag.

I hope the government does that. I hope so for the simple reason that it would end all controversy, and all these endless debates on a matter upon which we differ. That is true enough.

Mr. Speaker, I can quote individuals. I have received a large number of letters. One out of 25 did not agree with me when I spoke on this question in 1959. I admit that. However, Mr. Speaker, my opinion is that as long as the people of Canada who are sovereign, who are independent and who are building up a Canadian race—it is true it is on the basis of two basic races—allow anything to disrupt their unity they are not doing this country a favour. My feeling is this. Canadians are not unanimous on this subject. Those that say they are unanimous are just as far off the beam as I would be if I said that. As long as Canadians are so divided and as long as they are sincere, we as legislators cannot ram something down their throats. I agree with the hon. gentleman who preceded me when he said that these discussions are of benefit. They are helpful. But nevertheless they are creating public opinion. The time may come when Canadians will be unanimous, but today they are not unanimous.

I think I will just have time to quote one letter, Mr. Speaker. I have quoted the Legion. I am now quoting a letter from an individual. This book is full of these letters. Any hon. member who wants to see them is welcome to do so. Addresses and, in some cases, even telephone numbers are given. This letter is from St. Mary's of the River, Fredericton, New Brunswick, is dated June 6, 1959, and is addressed to me at the House of Commons, Ottawa. It reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. Mandziuk:
> Congratulations upon your speech in the house about the flag.
> I have a dear friend of Polish birth who feels the same as you do and for the same reasons.
> You can do a great deal of good making new Canadians realize that what they value in Canada was created by Britain.

That is under the union jack, and that letter is signed by Mrs. E. W. Sansom. I could read others.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Mandziuk: In closing Mr. Speaker, may I say that I appreciate the opportunity of expressing my opinions. I have expressed them as sincerely as have those arguing for the other side.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Batten: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader if there is any change in the business for next week.

Mr. Churchill: No, there will be no change. There will be a supply motion on Monday and Tuesday. The forecast was given last night. It appears in Hansard for Thursday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.B.C. SERIES "FESTIVAL 61"

Question No. 135—Mr. Badanai:

1. What is the cost to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of the current series of the 90-minute "Festival 61" T.V. play?
2. Who were the people responsible for buying this particular program?
3. For how long is this program contracted for?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. The budgeted costs of productions in the current series "Festival 61" have varied between $14,000 and $65,000. The series has presented a number of different types of program, including opera, Shakespearean drama, modern drama, and musical programs. For example, some of the programs have been "H.M.S. Pinafore" presented by the Stratford festival company; a production of "Julius Caesar"; the drama "The Old Ladies"; and a program featuring the Canadian pianist Glen Gould. The costs have varied according to the different requirements of each production.

2. The C.B.C. is responsible for the purchase of scripts and the production of all programs in the series.

3. The series is scheduled throughout the current fall-winter season on a weekly basis.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 20, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber) moved:

That the seventh report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Friday, March 17, 1961, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

TABLING OF FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ AND ANNEX

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the final communiqué of the commonwealth prime ministers' conference, as well as the annexes to that communiqué. If the house thinks it desirable, it might be printed as an appendix to Hansard of today.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree with the suggestion that the documents now tabled be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Mr. Winch: Is there anything in the communiqué having to do with a decision made on the proposed disarmament conference?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Annex I covers entirely the question of disarmament and the stands taken.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the house agrees to the suggestion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of documents above referred to, see appendix.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

OTTAWA—EVACUATION PRIORITIES IN EVENT OF NUCLEAR WAR

Motion No. 72—Mr. Regier:

For a listing of names and addresses on a priority basis of all those people who are supposed to be moved out of Ottawa to a supposedly safe place of refuge in case of a nuclear war.

Mr. Speaker: This notice of motion was stood in the absence of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, and I dare say he has read this comment on it by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the hon. member prepared to drop the motion?

Mr. Regier: I am not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Churchill: We are opposed to the motion.

DISCONTINUANCE OF STEEL STATISTICS

Motion No. 73—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the government and any person, organization, or industry since January 1, 1960, regarding the discontinuance of publication of statistical material, relating to steel operating rates and steel producing capacity, by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this request for the production of correspondence between the government and others relating to a change in reporting of the statistics of weekly steel production raises an important issue in so far as the dominion bureau of statistics is concerned, because in the final analysis the effective operation of the dominion bureau of statistics must be based on the assumption by business, unions, individuals and all organizations that all information supplied to the dominion bureau of statistics is secret and available only to the bureau.

In this case I have been assured that the correspondence is very limited and is confined to a few letters from Canadian steel companies and the united steel workers of America. These relate only to the technical difficulty of calculating a meaningful rate of operation, and discussion of a change in the period on which to base an index of production. This information was given to the house on February 2, 1961 in answer to a previous question by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

For the protection of the confidence which the public places in the dominion bureau of statistics, I feel that I must take the view that tabling of correspondence of this nature is not in the public interest.

[Mr. Churchill.]

However, if the hon. member so desires, I have no objection to tabling my own correspondence, which is limited to letters between the national director for Canada of the united steel workers of America and myself, subject of course to my obtaining the approval for such action from the national director. I have written him asking for permission to table these documents and upon receipt of an affirmative reply will be pleased to do so.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the mover's explanation I accept the limitation.

Mr. Speaker: The minister was referring, I take it, to motion No. 73 standing in the name of the hon. member for Assiniboia?

Mr. Hees: That is right.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house prepared to accept this motion at the instance of the hon. member for Kootenay West?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FEED MILL GRAIN PURCHASES OUTSIDE QUOTA

Motion No. 77—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, instructions, and other documents exchanged between the Canadian wheat board and the federal government since January 1, 1960, in regard to feed mills being allowed to purchase grain outside the quota system.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the absence of the mover, would the minister allow this to stand?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Motion stands.

FEED MILL GRAIN PURCHASE FORMS

Motion No. 83—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of each form which feed mills in western Canada are required to file with the Canadian wheat board relating to purchases of grain from permit holders.

Motion agreed to.

1960 SERVICE AGREEMENT, JASPER PARK LODGE

Motion No. 84—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of the agreement of service between the Canadian National hotels and the employees of Jasper Park lodge in 1960.

Mr. Winch: Would the government allow this to stand in the absence of the mover?

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of the hon. member for Port Arthur, is the government prepared to allow this motion to stand?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Motion stands.

EXELBY CASE CORRESPONDENCE

Motion No. 85—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of a letter addressed to the Minister of National Revenue on March 14th, 1961, by Mr. Harold B. Stevens of Shawinigan Falls, Quebec, re the C.B.C. and the Exelby case, together with a copy of the minister's reply to Mr. Stevens.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I would ask that this matter be considered privileged. I am not sure whether this came to me as a personal and confidential letter. I am advised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that he has already received a copy of the letter, so I suspect the confidential character thereof has been largely dispelled. Therefore I am perfectly happy to accept this motion.

Motion agreed to.

BILL NO. C-70—BRIEFS AND SUBMISSIONS

Motion No. 87—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all briefs and submissions presented to the government or any agency or branch thereof since February 17, 1961, dealing with Bill C-70.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, subject to the usual understanding under which documents of a confidential nature or documents which are ordinarily privileged will not be expected to be produced, we are prepared to accept this motion.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitations expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to accept the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—STATEMENT BY MINISTER AT CONSERVATIVE CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of a statement he is reported to have made at the Conservative convention last week to the effect that the Bank of Canada was responsible for monetary policy while the government was concerned with fiscal matters; that, however, since both fields offered an opportunity to deal with economic problems, their policies should be parallel and harmonious. My question is, will the minister assure the house the policies between the bank and the government on these matters are now parallel and harmonious?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government's policy I think is well known in this regard, and the policy of the Bank of Canada in relation to monetary policy has been recently stated by the governor of the bank in his annual report which I tabled last Wednesday.

UNITED NATIONS

DISARMAMENT—BRIEFING OF CANADIAN DELEGATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the discussions at the prime ministers' conference, which I understand went into some detail on matters involving all phases of disarmament, will the Prime Minister assure us that those who are delegates at the United Nations will be briefed on the various motions which have been moved by the Prime Minister's strong left arm, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in order to assist those who serve on the committee which I understand is soon going to meet on the motions moved by Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it the hon. gentleman's experience at the United Nations would give him the answer to that question. The Canadian representatives including the parliamentary representatives are always well and fully briefed.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON OTTAWA MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Can the minister advise the house whether a meeting took place in Ottawa this morning between Premier Stanfield and representatives of the federal government to discuss the coal problems of Cape Breton and, if so, is the minister in a position to advise the house on the decisions reached at the meeting?

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Gloucester, I must say that a meeting did take place in the office of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan). There were present at this meeting the Nova Scotia premier, Mr. Stanfield, and two of his ministers, Mr. Manson, minister of mines, and Mr. Ferguson, minister of municipal affairs. The miners' union was represented by Mr. Marsh, president, and by Messrs. Delaney, Higgins and Dolhanty. The president of the dominion coal board and I also attended the meeting.

During that meeting, ideas and views were exchanged about the Rand report and the impending shut-down of three Cape Breton mines.

The various views which were expressed will no doubt lead to further discussions and exchange of ideas, and I have no other statement to make for the time being.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister tell the house if the representatives of the companies were invited to that meeting?

Mr. Comtois: No, Mr. Speaker.

(Text):

CAPE BRETON—EMPLOYMENT FOR WORKERS NOW EMPLOYED IN MINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Will the minister advise the house whether he has received a telegram from the Cape Breton command of the Canadian Legion demanding that the federal and provincial governments see that no Nova Scotia coal mines are closed until suitable employment is available to all who are now employed in the mines? If so, what was the nature of the reply?

An hon. Member: Order paper.

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I received that telegram a few minutes before coming to the house. I immediately acknowledged receipt of the telegram without making any comment.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING FIRST VOLUME OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Assiniboia, as reported at page 3088 of Hansard, asked me this question:

> In view of the fact that so many important questions turn on the studies of the royal commission on transportation I wonder if the Prime Minister could inform the house when he expects to receive either the intermediate or the final report.

I am now advised by the assistant secretary to the royal commission that the chairman, Mr. MacPherson, has stated that the first volume of the findings of the royal commission on transportation will be available early in April.

FISHERIES

SEALS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO SLAUGHTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

In view of the concern expressed by the Canadian federation of humane societies regarding the brutal and wasteful annual slaughter of some 300,000 seals on our northeast coast, the majority of which are only a few weeks old, and the senseless wounding of thousands of others, many of which are pregnant and nursing females which are left to die; and in view of the possibility that this indiscriminate slaughter may bring about the extinction of the seals very shortly, if allowed to continue, will the minister investigate this reported situation and present a report and proposals for the conservation of these seals to the house when his estimates are under discussion?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to my attention. The harp seal is a very important source of edible oils, food and clothing for northern Canadians. I understand that hunting by foreign fishermen as well as native fishermen is allowed off the coast of Newfoundland. Because this matter has international implications, and because the direct management of fisheries comes under my colleague the Minister of Fisheries, I shall be happy to bring this problem to the attention of my colleague.

POWER

BEECHWOOD PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO EXPORTATION TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government passed an order in council authorizing the export of power from the Beechwood project to the United States?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will check into this and answer the hon. member tomorrow.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I now have an answer for the hon. member for Laurier, who asked whether an order in council had been passed respecting the Beechwood power project. I have just received an answer from the national energy board. No order in council has been passed in this regard. The Beechwood hydroelectric power project is an operation of the New Brunswick electric power commission. That commission holds a licence under the ultimate authority of the national energy board to export interruptible power from its systems, which include Beechwood.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

YUKON TERRITORY—REPORTED IMPORTATION OF UNINSPECTED MEATS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. On February 9 last I asked him a question concerning the unauthorized importation of meats into the Yukon from British Columbia, contrary to the Canada Meat Inspection Act, and in his absence his parliamentary secretary replied. Can the minister now say whether any action is being taken formally to enforce the provisions of the Canada Meat Inspection Act?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): At the time the question was asked my parliamentary secretary indicated that several forms of investigation and action were being considered, and I have not had a report on that matter since. However, I think I can say that one aspect of the investigation has been turned over to the Department of Justice, and when I have anything further to report on this I will let the hon. member know.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—INQUIRY AS TO ADVERTISEMENT IN "GLOBE AND MAIL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works, of which I gave him notice this morning. Does public offering C2 appearing as an advertisement on page 4 of today's Globe and Mail represent a new sales policy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. A full page advertisement in today's issue of the Globe and Mail does not reflect in any way a change in government lending policy. It was inserted and presumably paid for by a Toronto house building firm without prior discussion with representatives of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Apart from learning after the fact the identity of the advertiser—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Walker: —neither the government nor the corporation has any knowledge of the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Your Honour will recall that on two previous occasions the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin) raised precisely similar questions about the same kind of advertising, and Your Honour ruled that questions about advertisements by private persons with respect to housing were private matters and not matters for interrogation in the house. I trust that the same rule will apply in this case.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The question was whether the advertisement represented a change in government policy. As I understood the answer of the minister it was that the department had no responsibility for the advertisement, which would exclude it from further discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: And also from further answer.

AIR TRANSPORT

MATANE, QUE.—SUSPENSION OF SERVICE BY QUEBECAIR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alfred Belzile (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether the Minister of Transport is aware that Quebecair has discontinued its service at the municipal airport of Matane since the 11th of this month?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on February 21 Quebecair applied to the air transport board for permission to suspend its regular service at Matane. Such authorization was granted March 9, 1961.

Mr. Belzile: Another question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the answer given by the minister, may I ask whether he knows that the only reason put forward by the company to justify its decision is that the landing strips in Matane are not long enough to accommodate the modern aircraft it is now using?

Mr. Balcer: In fact, Mr. Speaker, Canadair—

Mr. Chevrier: Quebecair.

Mr. Balcer: We have been informed by Quebecair that it had to suspend its service because the landing strip at Matane airport was such that it could not accommodate aircraft like the F-27 and the 540 which the company is now using.

My hon. friend can rest assured that my officials and the Matane municipal council are seeking ways to improve the situation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—PROVISION OF STAND-BY AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I regret not having been able to give him notice. Can the minister indicate whether an aircraft, which I understand has the designation C-5, flew to London last week as a stand-by aircraft in order to ensure that the Prime Minister and other members of the delegation to the commonwealth prime ministers' conference could be back home at a particular time?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to answer that question without having received notice. I shall be glad to look into the matter and let the hon. member know.

LONGUE POINTE ORDNANCE DEPOT, MONTREAL—PARKING CHARGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. First of all may I point out that it is based on a French newspaper report and all I can say is "Pardon, je ne puis pas parler français". In view of the report in Le Devoir of March 16 to the effect that the car parking assessment at the Longue Pointe ordnance depot in Montreal has been increased from 20 to 50 cents so that a curling rink may be built for the use of certain personnel—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question whether the urgency or importance of the matter of parking cars at the ordnance depot is sufficient to take the time of the house with an oral question. I would request the hon. member to put his question on the order paper.

[Mr. Belzile.]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I should like to pursue the matter in view of what we know about what has taken place elsewhere. Now something has taken place at another depot.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I am still of the same view.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED RAIL STRIKE—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER TALKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. On Wednesday of next week the House of Commons will rise for the Easter recess. In view of this fact, and in view of the fact that the legislation passed by parliament last fall to maintain the continuity of railway operations will expire in May, can the Prime Minister inform the house whether the government has any policy directed toward bringing the two parties together so there will not be any cessation of railway operations in the country?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not think I can add anything to what was said at the time the bill which is now the law of the country was discussed. That legislation continues in existence until May 15. The hon. gentleman will recall it was anticipated that prior to that date there would be a report from the royal commission on transportation. Today I have advised the house that the chairman of that commission has informed us that the first volume of the report will be available early in April. After that report is received, naturally close consideration will be given to its nature and the government will then be in a position to bring before parliament such legislation or to take such course as may be deemed expedient or proper.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question in the light of the answer just given by the Prime Minister and the statement the Prime Minister made previously that he hoped there would be a resumption of negotiations between the brotherhoods on the one hand and the railways on the other. Can the Prime Minister inform the house what the position is at the present time with respect to these negotiations?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, they came together, they saw, they talked and they adjourned.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a further supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister give the house an assurance that the first volume of the report of the royal commission on transportation, which is now to be available early in April, will have recommendations having a bearing on the dispute which brought about the threatened strike last November?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, naturally I, in common with all hon. members, will have to wait until that portion of the report is received to be able to give an answer to the hon. gentleman.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—EFFECT OF DOUBLE DEPRECIATION IN DEPRESSED AREAS

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this traditional motion gives the opposition an opportunity to move a vote of no confidence, if it so desires, in connection with any matter concerning which the house in this session has not come to a decision.

With so much material available it is not easy to choose a particular vote of no confidence. In order to assist myself on this matter I thought it might be helpful if I looked at some of the resolutions and statements made at the recent Conservative convention, but I did not get very much help there. There was a resolution which might have been the subject for such a motion dealing with a distinctive Canadian national flag, on which the party decided that action should be taken as soon as possible, whereas our party has decided in convention that definite action on this matter is to be taken within two years of a general election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: When will that be?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I feel that, in view of the discussion of this matter in the house on Friday I thought that observation should draw some reaction from the other side. I had also hoped that perhaps at this interesting meeting we might have got some indication of the date of the forthcoming election. We did not get much enlightenment on that subject. However, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who made some strange statements indeed, according to the press said with regard to an election that "when the election does take place this is when you need workers out to sell a bill of goods on your behalf". This is an interesting approach to a general election.

If I may, with great respect, mention this Conservative meeting, it was undoubtedly the biggest and most expensive convention ever held by the Progressive Conservative party, but from all accounts it looks as though it was about the dullest as well and the one most completely dominated by those in control of the party.

An hon. Member: You are a dreamer.

Mr. Pearson: In that respect, and to show the contrast between the Conservative party on this side of the water and the Conservative party in Great Britain, may I quote from a reference in the London Observer of February 26 to a convention of the young Conservatives there at which a motion was moved in the following terms:

> The young Conservatives deplore the unctuous terms which preface so many of the resolutions submitted to the party annual conference.

In speaking to that resolution a member of the cabinet in the United Kingdom, the secretary of state for colonial affairs, Right Hon. Iain Macleod, had this to say, and I think this certainly applies to the resolutions of this particular meeting in Ottawa so far as we have been able to see them:

> The automatic and indiscriminate praise of performances which are often pedestrian is one of the dreariest features of annual conferences.

Mr. Hees: You are not doing badly now.

Mr. Pearson: I think that is a very apt reference with respect to the meeting that has just finished. The president of the national Progressive Conservative association of Canada was candid enough to say over the air last night in an interview, when he was questioned about the difficulties of the rank and file of the party making themselves heard, that "we cannot have every Tom, Dick and Harry taking over".

Mr. Pickersgill: Just John.

Mr. Pearson: We were informed by the press that 200 resolutions had been sent in before the convention opened. I thought I would get some help from that with regard to a non-confidence motion, but we were also informed that these 200 resolutions were all to be screened by the brass and only those that passed this scrutiny would get before the convention. According to the press this morning, 76 passed that scrutiny by the party managers and all 76 were passed Saturday morning in 75 minutes.

Mr. Anderson: They were like you. They ran out of time.

Mr. Pearson: That, Mr. Speaker, is Tory action but not democracy in action.

While the resolutions were not available, except those that had been screened and passed, we might have hoped that ministerial questions would give us on this side some idea of what was concerning the party and, perhaps, have provided some subjects for debate. There were questions, it is true, asked of the ministers, but again according to the press—and I am quoting now from the Ottawa Journal—the questions were written and screened by the seminar chairman. Oral questions from the floor were not allowed. This is in startling contrast to a convention held in this city in January.

Well, it is rather difficult to get any help from that kind of procedure. It is no wonder that the rank and file members of the party who came from all across Canada to attend this convention asked themselves "what did we come for?" Perhaps they came to talk into a box to the ministers.

Mr. Hees: Are you looking for a job?

Mr. Pearson: Having talked into this little box, then the recordings of the questions addressed to the ministers could have been sent to the national museum or to the archives. Perhaps they came for that purpose, or perhaps they came to have a good time, as was the answer given to this question by the Globe and Mail reporter, Mr. Walter Gray, this morning. He said they had won an election and now they were getting their reward. I quote:

—a trip to Ottawa, to rub shoulders with cabinet ministers and M.P.'s, to shake the hand of the Prime Minister, to be drawn into camaraderie with Tories from across the country. Who gives a darn about unemployment, nuclear weapons? Red China can go to the blazes. We're here to have a good time—

So, Mr. Speaker, the economic problems, unemployment, those things that are troubling the people of Canada today, were skipped except by those members of the government who abused the Liberals in intemperate and childish language because Liberals insisted upon bringing these nasty things before parliament.

Were any remedies to these problems suggested by the convention or by the ministers? No, not one. When they did dwell on these unhappy matters at all they spent their time caricaturing the position of the opposition. Having no remedies themselves, they jeered at the opposition because we dared to put forward some remedies in the House of Commons. They spent their time accusing us, in the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was a little more exuberant than usual at this meeting, of teen-age behaviour because we dared to talk about unemployment in the House of Commons.

Here is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce had to say, and of all the strange things he has said in the last few days this is the strangest. I shall quote from the Globe and Mail because his words are in quotation marks in that article. He refers to me and two of my colleagues by name, and these references were made to the applause of some 300 party supporters. He charged me with a particular kind of behaviour in the house when unemployment was mentioned, and these are the words attributed to him:

"It is something to disgust an honest Canadian," he declared. "They—

That includes me by name.

—are only interested in one thing, greater unemployment, because they think it enhances their chances of getting back into power—"

Mr. Hees: That is right.

Mr. Pearson: The minister now says "That is right". I can think of a three letter word to describe that kind of statement.

Some hon. Members: Use it.

Mr. Pearson: I shall content myself now by saying it is a slanderous, contemptible falsehood. If he does not like that reference he can get up and say so.

Mr. Speaker, these are the tactics we can now expect from a government that has no solution to offer; a government that is concealing its inefficiency and its own callous disregard of it. The government takes refuge in sensational, slanderous statements, and false statements as well, to conceal its own weaknesses, its own sins of omission in connection with this matter, by accusing its opponents of selling the country short, even of playing the communist game. There is a word for that kind of tactic which has entered into our language, and that word is "McCarthyism".

Mr. Hees: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition said I accused him of communist tactics. This is something I have never done. All I did was describe what we on this side of the house see on that side of the house, the obvious joy and satisfaction when the Minister of Labour announces increased unemployment figures. The opposition revel in them because they want more unemployment. They think it will get them back into power.

Mr. Pearson: I shall read again what the minister said.

It is something to disgust an honest Canadian—

Mr. Hees: That is right.

Mr. Pearson: I continue:

They—

And I was one of those he mentioned.

—are only interested in one thing, greater unemployment—

I say, Mr. Speaker, and I have said it in the house, that is a slanderous, malicious falsehood.

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, if I might rise once again—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition is accusing me of slandering him. My suggestion to him is that when these announcements are made in the future the opposition should hide their feelings a little better and not let them be seen so easily.

Mr. Pearson: I say again that when the minister, who should know better since he is a minister of the crown, accuses me of being interested in only one thing, greater unemployment so that I can get back into power, that is a slanderous falsehood. I have repeated it as often as I could. His is the old gimmick of the demagogue.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister also had something to say at this convention. He told us that the next election was going to be fought on the issue of free enterprise. The Prime Minister did not return until Friday, so perhaps he was not informed or had forgotten about the fact that a resolution was put forward on Thursday by young Conservatives advocating free enterprise. The resolution could only get 12 votes in this great convention. It was smashingly defeated, and only received 12 votes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Tell the whole story.

Mr. Pearson: This is the party that is now going to stand for free enterprise, free enterprise which extends so far that it is going to turn monetary policy over to the Bank of Canada and abdicate all responsibility in that particular field. The Prime Minister spoke for 40 minutes. He was more fortunate than I on a similar occasion. He spoke for over half an hour doing the people of Canada out of a very interesting television program.

Mr. Hees: The Prime Minister made a good speech.

Mr. Pearson: Yes. The Prime Minister made reference to Buckingham palace; he made reference to Sir John A. Macdonald, and he made reference to the new frontier which President Kennedy has now stolen from him. We have enough trouble now with the United States, and I hope this plagiarism will not be an additional grievance between our two countries.

The Prime Minister had a great deal to say about the rights of Africans and the rights of Asians, but he had nothing to say about the three quarters of a million men and women out of work in this country. The Prime Minister was able to speak for 40 minutes but the word "unemployment" was mentioned by him once as part of the title of the unemployment insurance fund. He said nothing about the economy, and nothing about unemployment. He mentioned nothing about the problems with which we are faced except to attack the Liberal position in regard to them and to unemployment. I ask the Prime Minister what kind of a report to the nation on domestic affairs is that kind of statement.

We have this situation in the House of Commons now every time we try to raise this question of unemployment. They say they are bad words; unemployment, recession and depressed areas, and they must not be raised. If we raise them we are liable to be accused of playing the communist game or selling the country short. They give the impression that it is far more important to discredit the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and an unemployed participant in a program, and thereby to discredit all efforts to underline the seriousness of this unemployment problem, than to deal with it. This is the type of dreary and cheap tactics they use.

The Prime Minister indulged in them on another front. The Prime Minister stated that when he was in the United Kingdom he was worried to find the people over there concerned about the economic situation in Canada; that is a situation when in January 11 per cent of our labour force were out of work compared to 1.8 per cent of the labour force of the United Kingdom. He said that he found the people of the United Kingdom worried about the situation in Canada, and that the blame for that worry was to be attached to the speeches made by the opposition in this House of Commons.

Whose fault is it that the magazine Economist is worried; that the London Times has expressed worry; that the Financial Times has expressed worry, and that the Manchester Guardian has expressed this worry? Whose fault is it that this worry has extended across the Atlantic? The government says it is the fault of the speeches made by the Liberals in this House of Commons. This is a great tribute to the influence we exercise through our speeches and I suppose we should be grateful to the Prime Minister for it. But it is nonsense to suggest that these citizens in the United Kingdom are worried about the state of affairs in Canada because of the fact that we on this side bring these matters to the attention of the house, as we shall continue to do on every possible occasion.

The Prime Minister went on to say—I cannot quote him exactly because I have been unable to get a text of what he said, but I think he will agree that I am not misrepresenting him—that when they were in opposition they never criticized in the way we are criticizing now; that they never exaggerated for political purposes, the difficulties that faced the country, and that they never sold the country short when they were in opposition.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: The Minister of Finance says "Hear, hear". This is just another example of the tendency of hon. gentlemen opposite to be, if not hostile to the facts, apathetic about them. They say they never criticized, as we on this side do now. Let me just refer you to a few statements made in 1955 and 1956 to indicate the incredible effrontery of those men then in oppositon, now in government, in talking like this.

On March 15, 1955, at page 2035 of Hansard, at a time when the unemployment ratio in this country was just about half of what it is now and at a time when, within a few months, employment went up to normal and unemployment went down to normal, the Prime Minister talked about the "hopeless picture"—those were the words he used—the situation which he viewed with great alarm. He also referred to "the serious situation" for which there was little hope. Those statements were made in 1955 by the gentlemen opposite who say they never talked like that when they were on this side in opposition. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that—> —if we continue to deliberately delude ourselves concerning the unemployment situation, we shall bring about a fear complex in this country which will have serious results in the future.

But who used these words? That statement was made by the present Prime Minister on March 15, 1955. So, I repeat, it is the job of the opposition to try to penetrate the ivory tower atmosphere which it seems keeps the government out of contact with reality and makes them unaware of what is really going on in the country. That is a very sensible observation and I suggest that it must be, because the words were used by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce on March 3, 1955.

Mr. Hees: You are talking about different people.

Mr. Pearson: I hear the remark "You are talking about different people". We certainly are talking about different people and about a different level of unemployment, as shown by the comparison of 11 per cent unemployed now to the 6.7 per cent unemployed at the time the statement was made. I wonder what the hon. gentlemen opposite will say tomorrow or the next day when the unemployment figures for February are brought forward. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will be busy looking for a trace of a smile—

Mr. Hees: You do not have to look very far for this smile; you need just look across to the faces of the opposition.

Mr. Pearson: The Minister of Trade and Commerce will then find out what is happening in this country, and will then travel around talking not about it but about the imaginary smiles on the faces of members on this side.

No better proof that this government is indeed blind to the realities of the employment and economic picture in this country can be found than in the proceedings of their recent convention and in the proceedings in this house in the last three years, when they have blamed everybody but themselves for everything that has gone wrong. The Minister of Finance in his contribution to these calculated questions and answers the other day—he had an opportunity to see them because they were all sent in writing, a democratic procedure—talked about the mess that they inherited in 1957, a mess which he referred to on January 6 in Toronto, as at a period of unprecedented economic expansion but which now seems something else in the opinion of hon. members opposite. From a less prejudiced source, the deputy minister of trade and commerce, we have heard it referred to most recently as "the fabulous fifties".

That is the mess that the Minister of Finance inherited from us. That is the mess from 1956, when from 1946 to 1956 the average unemployment in this country over that period was 3.1 per cent, when from 1957 to 1960 the average unemployment was 6.2 per cent, exactly double. That is the mess, when the gross national product per capita in constant dollars from 1949 to 1956 increased 22 per cent, and from 1956 to 1960 went down 5 per cent. That is the mess that the hon. gentleman inherited from us.

The unemployment figures, of course, speak for themselves. The unemployment insurance fund speaks for itself. The budgetary deficits speak for themselves. The maximum level of government expenditures speak for themselves. All these are things that constitute in the mind of the Minister of Finance a happy contrast between the situation of today and the mess of 1946 to 1956.

There are, of course, at the present time—and I know this is going to disappoint the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who does not like to have such references made on this side of the house because it takes away some of his thunder—some signs of improvement. The resumption of inventory accumulation will soon begin. It may well be that in the second and third quarter—I have said this outside the house and I am very glad indeed to say it inside the house—we will get out of the trough of this recession in the summer and will begin to move up in the autumn. It may be, and every hon. member on this side hopes that it will be, that by the end of this year we will be out of this particular recession which in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite never existed. How they are going to be able to take credit if that happens I do not know. "We got you out of the recession, but six months ago we said there was not any recession". They are pretty agile, however, at that kind of illogicality. Nevertheless, if and when this particular recession ends, the unemployment problem of this country—I mentioned this the other day and I make no apology for mentioning it again—will not end with it because the hard core of unemployment between recessions, between pauses or whatever you want to call them, is increasing, and each recession and each pause is worse than the one which preceded it.

Why, then, does the government flatly refuse to recognize it? We recognize it. We will continue to bring this danger and this difficulty to the attention of the house. The demagogic outbursts of ministers outside or inside the house are not going to stop us, any more than they are going to impress people outside the house—

Mr. Hees: So there.

Mr. Pearson: —except perhaps when the Minister of Trade and Commerce speaks to Conservative ladies. The governor of the Bank of Canada, who is a gentleman with whose views I do not always agree, recognizes the seriousness of the situation and the necessity for strong and co-ordinated action to deal with it. If hon. gentlemen will read—if they have not already read, and perhaps most of them have—pages 22 and 23 of his report—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My motion to resolve the house into committee of supply is, as the Leader of the Opposition has himself recognized, an occasion when hon. members may raise grievances. However, it is a fundamental rule in relation to this type of debate that only one grievance at a time may be raised. When one matter is introduced as a grievance, then before a second one may be introduced other hon. members who wish to speak on the first one are to be heard before the second one is raised.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where did you find that rule?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All we have heard so far has been a sort of blunderbuss attack on everything imaginable. I gather from the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition up to this point that his grievance is what was said by certain persons at the recent annual meeting of the Progressive Conservative party of Canada. If that is a proper subject for grievance then I presume the Leader of the Opposition will have an amendment to introduce on that subject and other hon. members who may wish to speak on it will have the opportunity of doing so. But in my respectful submission it is completely out of order and an abuse of the privilege that the Leader of the Opposition has of leading off in a debate of this kind for him to engage in an omnibus discussion of a dozen or more subjects. This is completely out of order.

We had an example of this attempted by the opposition on a previous occcasion. It was during either the 1960 or the 1959 session of parliament. If I remember correctly, at that time, Mr. Speaker, you pointed out that this kind of omnibus attack on everything is not in order on a motion to resolve the house into committee of supply. It must rest with the hon. gentleman to indicate his grievance and introduce whatever amendment he chooses in that regard. He must discuss his grievance and not engage in a debate as though this were a budget debate or a debate on the speech from the throne.

I think the rule is quite clear in this respect, and it is perfectly obvious that it is being broken in a most wholesale manner this afternoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: Cite the rule.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance for having intervened in this way and given me a chance to get my second wind. There is nothing to his point of order, but I should like to speak to it.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to hear the Leader of the Opposition on the point of order, because I think there is a point to be answered.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to submit a no confidence motion which will deal with one particular aspect of our economic and employment difficulties. I am building up a case to show the seriousness of this particular problem. I am pointing out that a convention of the Conservative party which met last week, which might have thrown some light on this problem, resulted in absolutely nothing being done. I am now pointing out that the governor of the Bank of Canada, in his report which was tabled last week, referred to this particular aspect of our employment problem—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Which aspect?

Mr. Pearson: —and in due course I will move a motion of no confidence dealing with that particular problem. Surely I am to be permitted some time—and the hon. gentleman ought to know this—before I move my motion. I have been talking about unemployment—

An hon. Member: And the flag.

Mr. Pearson: —and the seriousness of that unemployment. I propose to move a motion on one aspect of that as soon as I am given the opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: There are some limitations even to debate on a motion to go into committee of supply. As has been pointed out by the Minister of Finance, the customary practice in grievance procedure is to indicate a grievance and then to deal with it. That is one limitation. There is also the limitation against the repetition of previous amendments made on supply or on any other motion on which the house has come to a decision. The Leader of the Opposition recognized this when he opened his remarks.

I have been looking at the decisions taken by the house. The first decision was on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, where this amendment was moved and negatived:

> This house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to implement their election promises through refusal to undertake the economic and social planning necessary to provide full employment, a stable and prosperous agricultural community, and an adequate social security system.

I think that was a general debate on the subject of unemployment. Then I recall that one of the amendments on the two previous supply motions dealt with monetary policy, so those two subjects at least have been circumscribed. I have listened carefully to the Leader of the Opposition. While I expected a certain amount of general discussion as he was getting his argument focused on the subject he intended to deal with, it seemed that after he had dealt with the convention of last week he skipped through unemployment in general terms and is now on monetary policy.

I believe that if the Leader of the Opposition has a specific amendment he should come to the point, so as to put some proper limit on this debate for those who have to follow. If he does not do so there is no limit for any other speaker.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order may I say this. There is the further point that other hon. members of this house are entitled to make submissions to you if in their judgment the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) trespass on subjects on which the house has already declared itself at this session and some of the matters to which you have already referred. As long as the Leader of the Opposition goes on hiding whatever his grievance is under a mass of verbiage and these general accusations it is impossible to perform that duty.

It is quite clear that this kind of speech can go on and on and then the Leader of the Opposition can introduce an amendment which you might then rule out of order; but the hon. member already has his speech on the record and it has served his purpose. I therefore urge that you call upon the Leader of the Opposition to follow the proper course in this house, to state his grievance and then to address himself to that subject if it is in order under the rules of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have another ruling now.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot very well instruct the Leader of the Opposition how to make his speech but I can and I think I should say this. The hon. member's speech thus far has been, I think, too broadly discursive having regard to the previous discussions. If he is laying a foundation for a specific subject I feel he ought to come to it.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to make my observations on this subject a little more limited. I recognize, of course, the authority of the Minister of Finance to give advice on anything that deals with a mass of verbiage and general accusations. I shall try to follow your advice, Mr. Speaker; and I shall begin by telling you, sir, that what I propose to do is to show that in this whole unemployment situation the most difficult and dangerous aspect of it is the development in this country of chronic unemployment, of depressed areas and regional unemployment. I propose to spend the rest of my time dealing with that particular aspect of the problem on which the house has not this session taken any decision; and at the end of my reference to this particular aspect of unemployment I propose to introduce a motion that will cover that problem alone.

The governor of the Bank of Canada in his annual report had something to say on the subject of chronic unemployment of depressed areas and the regional nature of our unemployment. He showed in that report—as indeed other authorities have shown—an awareness of the seriousness of that particular problem. The governor had this to say as found at pages 22 and 23 of his report, and this has a bearing on this problem:

> Monetary expansion may play a part when it occurs in conjunction with a broad sweep of other programs of a more specific kind directed toward solving the problems in question. By itself, however, the creation of more and more money could do little toward achieving the objective.

Unemployment in Canada like economic expansion in Canada, as has so often been said in this house, has an uneven regional aspect. When there is general expansion in the country the regional incidence of unemployment is not too apparent but in years of recession or of pause, it then stands out. Since 1957 we on this side of the house have raised in this chamber this regional problem. We have pleaded for a more flexible and more selective formulation of national policies to deal with it.

The problem about which I am talking, that of chronic unemployment of depressed areas, was brilliantly analysed by Professor Judek for the Senate committee on manpower and employment in a report which he submitted to that committee on February 2 of this year. The report is entitled "Labour Surplus Market Areas". I should like to think that the Prime Minister and other hon. gentlemen opposite have studied it; but the attitude of the government toward this problem would indicate that if hon. gentlemen opposite have indeed studied it they have not accepted any of Professor Judek's recommendations to deal with it.

As a matter of fact, it is known now of course that for several sessions the attitude of the government toward this problem of depressed areas has been to deny its existence and to attack and pillory us on this side because we kept bringing it to their attention as I am attempting to do today. Then, three and half years after the election and three and half months after the announcement by the Minister of Finance last December that the government was going to take some action, they brought in some regulations. We were told that these regulations were designed to meet this particular problem. Presumably they are a part of that massive attack on unemployment to which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) referred to the other day, an attack so massive that there are still 700,000 or more Canadians in this country suffering from unemployment.

However, the government announcement which I believe was made last December and the government regulations brought in by the Minister of Labour a few days ago do indicate at least some recognition that the problem does at least exist. Hon. gentlemen opposite must have not discarded their blinkers but—and we can take some satisfaction out of this—they are beginning at last to look around them. They have stopped denying that there is any chronic unemployment to attack; and so we have these government proposals which could have been brought in by order in council any time since last December, notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance has said about this matter. We on this side of the house have already stated our opinion about these regulations. We consider them to be ludicrously inadequate, confused and restrictive.

In these regulations the responsibility for initiating action looking toward assistance has been abdicated by the government—we were told the other day in the name of democracy—and turned over to the municipalities themselves. From what we heard the other day, presumably it was humiliating for the government to designate an area as an area of surplus labour or a depressed area. It was not humiliating for similar action to be taken by the democractic governments of the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Scandinavia and Belgium. In this country presumably we are in this respect more democratic.

Under these regulations the government says to an area or a municipality, in effect: designate yourself, if you so desire, as depressed and then we will decide, by attempting to apply our inadequate criteria, whether you really are depressed and are to receive any special help under these regulations. If not, you are a self-designated depressed area and without help from us. If the municipalities go through this preliminary stage of designating themselves as depressed areas and submitting themselves to the examination of the government in respect of its criteria, what help will they receive under these regulations?

Here is where the labouring mountain really brought forth an abortive mouse. We on this side have already pointed out in this house that the criteria concerned are uncertain, confused and restrictive. They deal with areas having under 10,000 workers and with areas having over 10,000 workers. As far as the first category is concerned the regulations will be quite unworkable because the statistics required over the period in question, which I believe is eight years, are not readily available. If we are wrong in this matter will the Minister of Labour or some other minister—we do not even know which minister will be responsible for this matter—tell us how these regulations will be applied to this particular situation and where and how, if he is trying to apply the regulations, the minister will get the detailed information required for the eight years.

As far as communities of over 10,000 are concerned the regulations are obvious and excessively rigid and inflexible. They cover a period of eight years, four of which were ones of great expansion. To qualify under these circumstances a region must have had 6 per cent or 7 per cent of unemployment during 36 of the 48 summer months and employment must have actually declined during that period. These regulations are startling in their contrast with those adopted in other countries which earlier have recognized and tried to do something about the situation, particularly the United Kingdom and the United States of America, the senate of which passed a very important bill dealing with this matter on Friday of last week, I think. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, these regulations have very little relationship to these criteria suggested by Professor Judek at page 532 of his report, and which we would commend to the government as being much more helpful and effective for depressed areas.

If you do qualify under this criteria what help do you get? You get double depreciation for a new industry moving into a depressed area for one year only, one of the first three years.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that on March 3 a motion to adjourn the house was moved for the express purpose of debating the subject which is now being discussed by the Leader of the Opposition. We set aside the business of the house on that occasion, which was to be consideration of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, in order to permit a debate on this very question. Now we are having a repetition of the statements made by the Leader of the Opposition on March 3. I suggest that he is completely out of order in the remarks he is now making.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry that I cannot accept that argument because, as the leader of the house will recall, the debate was on a motion to adjourn and no decision of the house was taken. It is not in order to revert to a subject that has been debated provided the house has taken a decision. There is a worse obstacle to the course which the Leader of the Opposition is following in the amendments which have already been moved relating to unemployment; but of course I do not now prejudge the amendment he has in mind.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, had the house leader been listening at the beginning of my remarks he would have known that I then pointed out that I would be out of order if I dealt with a matter which had been decided at this session.

Mr. Churchill: It is repetition and there is a rule against that.

Mr. Pearson: This matter was not decided and it is not against the rules to talk about it. The house leader should have known that instead of interrupting me in this way.

What kind of help do the designated depressed areas in the country get under these regulations? As I pointed out, they get double depreciation for one year only of the first three, this help to apply only if a new industry makes substantial profits over one of the first three years, something which is not likely in that period of time in a depressed area. The tax reductions during that one year are to be offset later by higher taxes. That is the situation, Mr. Speaker, so far as help to the depressed areas of this country is concerned. These minor, uncertain, illusory tax benefits are supposed to be an incentive for manufacturers to move into a depressed area. It is no wonder that on March 18 the Financial Post wrote as follows:

> We find it difficult to believe that the government could seriously consider the new regulation as a genuine tax incentive.

Indeed, these new regulations are a farce in so far as they are a part of that massive attack on unemployment that the Minister of Labour talked about. Oh, they may have some use. We hope they may attract some industry into the depressed areas, if those depressed areas can meet these confused and restrictive criteria; but as to being a massive attack on unemployment, they do not make sense. Perhaps the Prime Minister or some member of his cabinet will tell us how much work is likely to be created in this period of high unemployment by this kind of regulation which has been described in these terms by the Financial Post.

I will put another paragraph from the Financial Post on record. It reads:

> We will not be surprised if the new regulation provides more employment in the civil service in Ottawa than it does in the depressed areas of the country.

Let the Minister of Trade and Commerce rub his hands, put on his cheerleader's hat and give us a pep talk on this governmental triumph, this massive attack on unemployment. What we need, Mr. Speaker, is something a little more impressive than this kind of sham attack.

Leaving out general policies created for expansion, which would affect the depressed areas—but I would be out of order if I talked about them, Mr. Speaker—may I mention what we think are the special measures which should be taken at this time for this special problem? Not all of these matters can be applied in the same way to all areas of surplus labour. At our convention in January, when we dealt with these matters, we said this and I quote from the resolution:

> A new Liberal government would co-operate with provinces and municipalities in providing tax incentives to encourage industries to locate in such areas.

This is not the kind of miniscule tax incentive which is in these regulations in their present form.

Mr. Fulton: Did the Leader of the Opposition ever define his?

Mr. Pearson: I will begin to do that if my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience. I go on to read from our resolution:

> It would see that more credit is available to business in these areas. It would help to finance power, transport and other basic economic developments. Through programs for urban and rural rehabilitation, it would see that both credit for private business and money for public improvement are readily available.

On July 29, 1960 I had this to say in the House of Commons, as reported at page 7320 of Hansard:

> If we want as a nation to deal effectively with the employment problem and at the same time to minimize the expenditure of public funds, we must arrive at a regional formulation of certain national policies, and in order to arrive at such a formulation we must know in greater detail and much more concretely than we do now the different structures and the peculiar behaviour of our economic regions.

We have made proposals in this house, Mr. Speaker. We made them on May 3, 1960, in 1959 and in 1958 to deal with this question of chronic unemployment in depressed areas. I am going to sum up the position we have taken over recent years in this matter by putting these proposals on Hansard at this time in the form of a six-point program for areas of chronic and serious unemployment:

1. An area rehabilitation agency should be set up within the federal government to implement, in co-operation with provincial and local authorities, an over-all program of economic assistance to the depressed areas of our country. That agency of the federal government should designate under the responsibility of the federal government such areas on the basis of suitable criteria and carry out detailed and concrete studies of their economies. The criteria for this purpose would not be these of the regulations put forward by the Minister of Labour which in our view do not go far enough, but would be much closer to the criteria laid down in the report of Professor Judek.

2. A flexible fiscal policy should be adapted to the specific needs of those areas which may require special encouragement to develop their primary resources, to establish new secondary manufacturing industries, to improve their transportation facilities or to increase their export trade.

To be more specific on this point, Mr. Speaker, such a flexible policy could include (a) capital grants for development, such as the Atlantic provinces development fund, which we have advocated for some time; (b) tax incentives such as temporary tax exemptions or concessions for distressed areas, to apply not only to new industries moving in, but to the expansion and modernization of industries already in the areas; (c) special consideration for distressed areas in public works programs; (d) special consideration for such areas in winter works programs, with the federal share of the cost extended to include cost of materials as well as labour costs.

3. Easier credit facilities should be made available to depressed areas. For that purpose the industrial development bank should be separated from the Bank of Canada and operated vigorously to provide capital assistance for depressed areas, a proposal which we have made time and time again inside and outside the house.

4. Special training and retraining programs should be implemented in order to prepare the workers displaced by declining industry for new or expanding industries. These programs should be closely related to the requirements of redevelopment projects and unemployed persons should be given allowances for these retraining programs.

5. Special urban renewal measures should be implemented to clear blighted areas for new industry or housing, with a municipal development fund set up to facilitate the financing of the municipal share of these measures. The federal government should increase from the present 50 per cent level its share in the cost of clearing blighted areas in depressed regions for any appropriate use, whether it be for housing, commerce, industry, transport or for open spaces. It should extend its contribution to cover the cost of renewing and improving basic services such as water, sewers and streets in the redeveloped areas.

6. The rural development program proposed by the Senate committee on land use in 1960 should be closely integrated with the over-all national policy for depressed areas.

I believe that this six-point program is desirable, comprehensive and responsible. It recognizes—as other countries such as the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Belgium and the Scandinavian countries have already recognized—that the problem of depressed areas is a special one and requires special treatment adapted, of course, to Canadian needs and conditions. It is in line with the recommendations made by experts in this field such as Professor Judek whom I have mentioned and Professor Cairncross of the United Kingdom. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, it is significant that Professor Cairncross, a well known British economist, who was appointed by the present Minister of Forestry, (Mr. Flemming) and the other premiers of the Atlantic provinces to make a study of the economic problems of that region, has come out in his report with two major proposals which we on this side of the house made over a year ago. The first one has to do with the encouragement of secondary manufacturing industries through tax incentives, which I mentioned again this afternoon, and the other envisages the reorientation of the industrial development bank for regional purposes, which I also mentioned this afternoon. So I hope that during this discussion the Minister of Forestry will tell us what he now thinks of those proposals.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the proposals I have made are supported by the presentation made by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities to the Senate committee on manpower and employment on February 15 of this year, I believe. It is supported also by the Atlantic provinces economic council. We on this side believe—and we reiterate our belief which we have expressed many times—that such a program as this one is needed in Canada at this present time of unemployment emergency. We also believe that the measures implemented by the government to assist in the solution of this problem, the regulations already brought down by the government as a solution to the problem are unworkable and too restrictive and that they will be ineffective. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai):

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that the provision for double depreciation announced last December will prove ineffective in dealing with the problems of depressed areas, and regrets that the government has imposed the responsibility for the designation of such areas on the municipalities, and that the definition of depressed areas is too restrictive."

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of any objection I propose to put the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson).

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the amendment I should like to refer to the interesting comments of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) on the meeting that was held in Ottawa last week. What does interest the group in this corner is the fact that the Leader of the Opposition was able to discern so easily a party which he felt was centred at the top.

If I may paraphrase the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), "You ain't seen nothin' yet". I suggest that next July there will be a real meeting here in Ottawa and that at that meeting you will see the rank and file in action. You will see something new in Canadian politics. Not only will the resolutions come from below but the money will come from below too.

An hon. Member: Below the border?

Mr. Pitman: The people who paid for the party will be making the resolutions and they will be accepted as policies. There will be no equivocation about whether any resolution represents exactly the policy of the new party. We will take these resolutions as representing our policies. I suggest too that these policies will be decided upon by people who have been sitting in living rooms over the last two years discussing, thinking and reacting to the problems of Canadian politics. The session of the house may not be over in July but I hope that it will be over and that hon. members will remain in Ottawa because we invite all of you to come and watch a real political rally in action here in the city of Ottawa. I can assure you that no matter what the gentlemen of the press have to say about the rally they will not say it is uninteresting.

I note, Mr. Speaker, that some hon. members including the Prime Minister are still talking about free enterprise and doctrinaire socialism. I hope that this will be one of the things we will try to bring into focus before the Canadian people next July. Surely, Mr. Speaker, we have need in Canada to talk about these things. I must admit, though, I find it rather difficult to understand what our friends to the left mean by planning with a capital "P". After the convention was over I noticed that somebody was asked if they expected the leaders of business to lose any initiative because of this planning. He said, no. Just how you plan from the bottom, I am not quite sure. Nevertheless, this is evidently to be the plan. May I say that next July you will have a real party of the left; and let me assure you that plenty will be heard from this political sector in the near future.

I was rather concerned, too, about the fact that our friends to the left found themselves in a dilemma in British Columbia. However, I am sure the rules would not allow me to go into that aspect of their policy, as a result of which they divided and supported a bill which negated the political rights of a large section of the people.

The last few months have been an incredible experience for all of us. Last November when we came here we expected this government would make an all-out attack on unemployment. After we arrived we discovered that really there had merely been a change in the timetable and we were only here six weeks earlier because this session was not concerned with unemployment at all. In fact, the word "unemployment" was not to be mentioned. We discovered in November that the government was quite willing to put through a number of long term measures. We have congratulated the government upon their measure connected with loans to small businesses and upon their housing policy. However, what we on this side of the house expected was an immediate attack upon unemployment, one which would drastically reduce the number of people who were unemployed. I am afraid we cannot congratulate the government upon this feature of their policy.

One snowy evening last December we came into this house expecting to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) give us some hope. We thought possibly some gigantic expansion of the public sector would be revealed. We expected some unusual tax cuts in order to give the people of this nation greater purchasing power. What did we find? We found very little, merely this double depreciation for one year to new industries moving into areas in which there are a number of people unemployed. By this time we were grasping at straws. We waited and hoped that this measure would do something for those areas in which the people today are living without much hope. We waited. I am reminded by this thought that about an hour ago spring came to Canada. Winter is over. It is too bad that winter unemployment cannot be over, too. Winter is over, and the government has survived. However, unemployment remains. There has been no storming of the ramparts by those who are on relief. So far as this government is concerned they have survived the winter.

However, as I have said, we waited and grasped at this straw hoping that it would do something for those areas in which unemployment was chronic. We waited with patience from December 3 until March 2 in the hope that some announcement would be made which would enable us to go back to our constituents and say, "See what the government of Canada is going to do in order to move industry into this area and in order to create a growing, healthy economy." On March 2 the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) did rise in his place and reveal that this delay was unnecessary. There was no reason for this delay because there was no real problem to be solved. However, by this time the government had conceded that unemployment was present. During the early part of the winter the government did not regard unemployment as very serious; indeed, in their view there was no crisis at all.

On March 2 we discovered that in areas of over 10,000 which had had considerable unemployment during the summer months from 1953 onward, some help would be given and in areas in which the labour force was under 10,000 certain other measures had been suggested. These areas will be called surplus manpower areas. Certainly, this description, "surplus manpower areas" is ironic. Distressed areas are out of the picture and the term "depressed areas" is unacceptable. We call them "surplus manpower areas". I am certainly glad to know that at least one government on this continent is willing to call a spade a spade. I believe that when we call these areas "surplus manpower areas", we are only adding to the confusion.

When the Minister of Labour rose to outline his method for reducing unemployment I noticed that he gave us a few examples. I believe mention was made of Elliot Lake, Springhill and some places in Cape Breton. However, not a single secondary manufacturing area was mentioned. I would suggest that this is perhaps one of the most serious lacks in this particular policy. What is so magical about 1953? Is everyone in Canada who is receiving unemployment insurance benefits dated back to 1953 suddenly going to disappear? I do not believe so. Why do we talk about 1953? Surely this government realizes that in a secondary manufacturing area you can have an immediate crisis resulting from a simple change in trading policy or from some technological change. The whole manpower situation can be quickly changed.

I could suggest that in the city of Peterborough, for example, there was considerable employment in 1957; that is nearly four years ago. We are now going back to 1953, a time when there was absolutely no unemployment whatever in many areas now suffering. I suggest that the measure advocated by the minister takes no account whatever of the particular problems of secondary manufacturing areas such as Windsor and Cornwall. It does not take into account the different kinds of unemployment. Why do we turn to the summer months? Does this government believe the only real problem is seasonal unemployment? Does the government believe you need not worry about what happens in the winter as long as you can get by? We realize that seasonal unemployment is here, but it is only a very small part of this problem.

In many areas, there is the matter of structural unemployment. There have been tremendous changes in the uses of certain products. There have been great trade differences. As a result of these things, you have a large number of unemployed emerging very quickly. The emergence of this large number probably goes no farther back than 1958 or 1959. The measure put forward by the minister takes no account of one of the main causes of unemployment, as a result of technological change; I refer to the problem of automation. This problem has been developing for a small number of years. Indeed, the developments that have taken place in Peterborough in two years have been tremendous and have had a tremendous effect upon the labouring force.

I would suggest that the selection of 1953 as some kind of magical date is unrealistic and unacceptable. The government waits until spring comes, and I suppose we shall soon be into the summer. I am wondering what will happen. I suppose the government is hoping that summer employment will bring a measure of relief. I would suggest, as did the Leader of the Opposition, that we are not out of the woods as yet, even though 1960 might be a better year economically. If the trends of the last 10 years continue, we shall have more unemployment within another two or three years. One does not have to be an expert economist to know that this government has done nothing to ensure that this cyclical unemployment will be alleviated.

I certainly feel the greatest sympathy for the unemployed individual. The cost of his food remains high. His rent has not gone down as it did during the depression in the thirties. Surely he is becoming more disillusioned. Surely he is coming to the point where he must really face the freedom of being unemployed, of seeing his home disappearing, of seeing his family hopes and the hopes of his young people slowly "going down the drain", to put it in the vernacular. I certainly hope these young people who are here today do not judge democracy, democratic action and the possibilities of democracy by what this government has done during the past six months.

This is what the government has left us with and we are very much disgusted with it. Any city or municipality must come to this government in order to reap the benefits of double depreciation and can do so only after that area has been established as a depressed area through the research and statistics of the area itself. This surely is a matter of some considerable concern. Surely this is something that the Department of Labour should do on the basis of unemployment in 1961 rather than on the basis of unemployment in 1953 in those areas having a surplus of manpower. We feel that this is one area in which the government should accept its responsibility, for what exists now, to an even greater extent than it does through this small and inadequate double depreciation program. We feel that this program will not be sufficient in terms of what must eventually be done. It is the view of this group in the corner that unemployment is a serious problem requiring a direct approach rather than an indirect one.

With regard to what private business can do in this regard,—and I think it has done very much during many years—it is the opinion of our group in this corner that private business does not have the power of an over-all approach to deal with this problem. We feel indeed that private business would prosper under the circumstances that we suggest. We feel it is time for a direct approach and for dealing directly through government agencies with the problem of unemployment.

I am not going to reiterate the things which have been suggested by members of the C.C.F. party. One has only to look in Hansard to see them. However, Mr. Speaker, I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West, that the following should be accepted as a subamendment to the amendment put forward by the Leader of the Opposition:

and, furthermore, this house is of the opinion that the government should promptly implement additional measures to immediately stimulate employment and the further growth of our economy.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot accept this amendment which the hon. member submits. I shall be glad to hear the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), if he has something to say in favour of this proposed amendment.

Mr. Aiken: I am opposed to the subamendment on the ground that it would be an enlargement of the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition, on the specific point "double depreciation". If accepted, it would deal with the subject contained in the amendment to the speech from the throne which was decided upon on November 21, 1960, and which referred to economic and social planning.

Mr. Speaker: It will not be necessary to hear the hon. member because I am of the same view. I would like to hear the hon. member who proposed the amendment if he wishes to argue its validity, but it seems to me he is faced with the decision of the house already taken in regard to an earlier amendment along the same lines. Furthermore, this amendment is quite irrelevant to the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pitman: I do not think there is contained in this amendment any specific suggestion that in any way would confine the issue of the amendment. I am afraid I have left myself without a copy of the amendment but I think it said "additional measures" and it does not in any way stress the words of the original amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry I am not able to agree with the hon. member. The difficulty with which he is confronted is that the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition deals with a rather specific and narrow subject, namely the provision for double depreciation dealing with problems of distressed areas, as well imposing the responsibility of the designation of such areas upon the municipalities. The hon. member proposes a motion which goes generally into measures to stimulate employment in general and to further the growth of our economy, which was the precise subject of the amendment moved on the address in reply to the speech from the throne as well as of a subsequent amendment.

Mr. Winch: I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that in the amendment, which is in fact an amendment to that proposed by the Leader of the Opposition which refers particularly to depressed areas, does not refer generally to employment or unemployment but asks that the government promptly implement additional measures to stimulate employment and further the growth of our economy. It is therefore, sir, a proper amendment to the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition in respect of depressed areas. I hope Your Honour will notice that the words in this amendment do not refer to that general problem of unemployment which has already been discussed in this house but refer to the implementation of further measures which deal with distressed areas and it is therefore in order.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate what the hon. member said but I am afraid I cannot agree with him. The proposed amendment is in quite general terms. An amendment may alter the motion; it is not supposed to enlarge upon it and it particularly should not go beyond the scope of the original motion.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, the various debates on unemployment which have taken place in this house during the present session have only served to reveal a sad state of affairs in its naked ugliness. This is a continuous problem without continuous measures to meet it. The measures which have been advanced so far by the government have failed to meet the situation.

The criteria to be used in order for a municipality to qualify for double depreciation only under certain circumstances is not only unworkable but absolutely restrictive, as pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition.

In my own constituency unemployment has been creeping up at an alarming rate from a registered unemployment figure of 2,600 in November of 1960 to 4,300 according to the latest figures available. The lakehead district is now classed by the federal Department of Labour as a substantial labour surplus area. It is one of 22 communities with a labour force of between 25,000 and 75,000, so designated across the country. It can be said, without much fear of successful contradiction, that although the problem of chronic unemployment is probably more severe in Canada than in any other western nation, no nation has done less to cope with it.

Several years ago when Britain was confronted with a similar situation, the government of that country did not hesitate to launch a mass attack on areas of unemployment with a high degree of success.

The double depreciation measure announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) last December in the baby budget can hardly be classed as a great inducement to establish a new industry in a depressed area; and according to the only interpretation possible for the formula only a few areas can qualify. In other words my own constituency, because it has only in the last two or three years fallen on hard times due to unemployment, is thus by-passed.

The winter works program, while it has been of some help, has not fulfilled expectations. For one thing it has ignored the difficulties of the municipalities to finance needed projects which would employ a considerable labour force. It is indeed regrettable that it did not include participation in the cost of materials to be used in these projects. Until the government establishes a municipal loan fund, which I have advocated in this house at every opportunity, the extended municipal winter works program will not make any appreciable dent in the ranks of the unemployed.

The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities has long been on record as favouring a federal-municipal loan fund and in its submission to the government on February 7, 1958, it urged that such a fund be established. I wish to emphasize the fact that such a fund has been specifically requested and has received unqualified support across the country from the municipal governments. Moreover, nearly all the provincial premiers are on record as endorsing a municipal loan fund.

In recent years local governments have been pratically forced to stand aside and allow all senior levels of government and private industry to gobble up nearly all the available supply of money. To finance the most necessary and urgent needs, such as schools, sewers, water mains, hospitals, paved streets, parks and recreational facilities, local governments have had to borrow at excessive rates of interest and it has often been difficult to obtain funds in Canada, thus forcing municipal governments to borrow in New York and helping to create the unnatural rise in the value of the Canadian dollar, with a detrimental effect on our exports.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who is now speaking has not yet mentioned any of the three subjects which are delineated in the amendment. He has said nothing about double depreciation; he has said nothing about what the opposition likes to call the depressed areas and their problems; and he has said nothing about their designation, and so on. He is dealing with a very wide-ranging list of subjects on the general subject of employment.

Mr. Badanai: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, in view of what has been said by the house leader, will he now indicate what the government says are depressed areas?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Fort William, who has the floor, has heard the objection that has been taken. I have been listening to his remarks which seemed to me to be verging on the second part of the amendment relating to the responsibility of the municipalities for the designation of such areas, and on the third part with regard to the definition of depressed areas.

As the house leader has said, there are three parts to the amendment, the first dealing with double depreciation, the second with placing on the municipalities the responsibility for designation of the areas in question, and the third dealing with the actual definition of the areas in question. If the hon. member will direct his remarks to those three areas he will be in order.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, in fairness to all hon. members of this House of Commons, and in view of what you have just said, will you now ask the house leader—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Winch: —who made a certain remark, to name the depressed areas?

[Mr. Badanai.]

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member will have to await the house leader's wish in that respect.

Mr. Winch: He cannot do it.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, I am merely trying to demonstrate as effectively as I can the reason why the lakehead cities are in a depressed area. That is the only object I have in view. I am endeavouring to offer suggestions which would cure the situation.

In order to attack the problem of unemployment the municipal governments require loans at a relatively low rate of interest on a long term basis. It is therefore a matter of concern to the nation, and it is reasonable to suggest that some responsibility for the provision of funds which are urgently needed by municipalities should rest with the federal government if we are to effect a cure in the depressed areas which are concerned in this amendment.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member now name the depressed areas as he knows them?

Mr. Hellyer: The whole country is a depressed area.

Mr. Badanai: I am again referring to the extended winter works program designed to alleviate unemployment. Though it is a desirable piece of legislation—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Badanai: —it has not stemmed the tide of unemployment to any appreciable extent. The criteria devised by the government will not do much, if anything, towards that end.

An hon. Member: Prophets of gloom.

Mr. Badanai: Out of 200,000 unemployed in the province of Ontario, the winter works program put to work only 15,000, or about 7½ per cent of the unemployed. In my own constituency of Fort William it has accomplished even less. Out of approximately 4,300 people out of work—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry but I must interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member was approaching the winter works program when the house leader rose to protest that he was not discussing something relevant to the motion before the house. I quite agree that the winter works program—a program to be provided for by estimates which will be discussed in the house in due course, if they have not already been discussed—is excluded from debate on a motion to go into supply. It is not relevant to the amendment nor is it appropriate to speak on or to discuss subjects which come directly under the estimates.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, would the house leader say what is the order and principle that we are now discussing?

Mr. Churchill: The same as was mentioned earlier.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) made the statement of government policy setting forth the conditions upon which the government would assist new industries in areas where there has been a substantial degree of continued unemployment over the years, we were amazed to find that this so-called criterion or formula would apply only to areas which were not named, but which would have to prove that conditions of employment had been on the decline over the period from 1950 to 1960 and taking into consideration the months from May to October.

I submit that whoever devised such an impossible formula to deal with unemployment must have had a diabolical sense of humour. This formula does not meet the situation. It does not satisfy the anticipation created by the statement of the Minister of Finance who on December 20 stated:

> I am pleased to announce measures to fulfil three major purposes; first, to assist new industries in areas where there is a substantial degree of continued unemployment over the years; second, to aid the development of new products from processing operations not hitherto carried on in Canada; and, third, to encourage the production of new types of goods. Double depreciation will, at the option of the taxpayer, be allowed in respect of capital expenditure incurred in the first year for these purposes but may be applied in any of the first three years.

It certainly does not help my constituency because under the formula announced by the minister on March 2 the city of Fort William does not qualify under this scheme and therefore incentive to industry and business in that locality would not be provided.

The government, however, has at least recognized the need to do something in order to alleviate unemployment. One method now being introduced in the United States by the new administration is to encourage the mass construction of public works. In my own constituency there is a definite need for a building to house the staff of the unemployment insurance commission which now occupies the old post office building constructed at the turn of the century. Its conditions are deplorable. The lakehead employment advisory committee, which incidentally is doing a terrific job and trying through every medium at its disposal to promote employment, has passed resolutions for several years urging the government to give consideration to the construction of a new building. At this point I wish to quote two of these resolutions which point out the necessity for immediate action. The first resolution reads:

> Whereas the space in the present premises of the unemployment insurance commission office at 123 North May street, Fort William, is totally inadequate to handle the volume of traffic and maintain proper standards of efficiency, and
> Whereas this premises is too old (55 years) and structurally unsafe to handle the ever-growing volume of traffic, and
> Whereas the structure does not lend itself to any form of expansion, because of its age, and any expenditure on an old structure of this type is deemed wasteful, and
> Whereas the lack of space necessitates benefit claimants standing outside in the street in inclement weather, a condition which is certainly not conducive to good relations with the public, and
> Whereas a constantly expanding labour force wil reflect greater activity in the new office, and therefore require additional space, and
> Whereas certain amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and regulations will have the effect of further increasing traffic through the local office, thereby necessitating additional floor space,—

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is a point of order being raised by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is now speaking about the construction of public buildings in Fort William. I cannot see how this relates in any way to double depreciation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, since there seems to be a campaign of harassment of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) by hon. gentlemen opposite who have suddenly become very concerned about a rigid adherence to the rules, perhaps I might be permitted to make an observation.

Surely it has always been clearly understood that in a debate on a motion to go into supply on a matter of this kind it has always been relevant to consider the attendant circumstances. It may be that if the government did certain other things which many of us on this side think it ought to have been doing for the last three years, many places in this country would not be depressed areas.

What my hon. friend is seeking to show, it seems to me, is that the failures of the government in certain other respects had created in certain parts of the country a situation which was of such a nature that even this blind government decided it had to do something about it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member seems to be making a speech on the subject matter of the debate rather than on the point of order. I think one would have to be very strict to consider the point well taken. As the hon. member is discussing the problems of a municipality which are involved in the first part of the resolution, I do not want to be too restrictive in a debate on a supply motion.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question, in view of the suggestions of the hon. member about relevancy?

Mr. Badanai: My time is limited, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pallett: Is the hon. member suggesting that the lakehead is a depressed area?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Badanai: I shall be glad to answer the question later.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member cannot answer.

Mr. Badanai: I can answer it, all right. I continue reading the resolution:

> Now, therefore, be it resolved that we, the lakehead employment advisory committee, do most strongly recommend that our regional and national committees give immediate effective support to this resolution, and that they pursue every effort to indicate the need for adequate and suitable new office premises for the unemployment insurance commission at Fort William and,—

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Fort William has the floor.

Mr. Badanai: I continue:

> Be it further resolved that the local, regional and national committees urgently request that the federal government, through the departments concerned, take immediate action to construct new and adequate premises to house the unemployment insurance commission office and staff in Fort William.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Badanai: That resolution was passed in February of 1959. Another resolution passed in January of 1960 relates to the same subject. I shall quote only three paragraphs in the interests of brevity.

> And whereas the building now used is much too small to properly handle the volume of traffic processed there, it necessitating claimants standing outside in inclement weather often in below freezing temperatures,
> And whereas the existing building is in a generally deplorable condition and reflects discredit on the commission and whereas incidents have occurred which could have caused serious injury to claimants or personnel,
> Now therefore, be it resolved that in the opinion of this committee immediate steps must be taken to erect a new building at Fort William to provide adequate facilities for the efficient and orderly operation of the commission's business at that point.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member permit me to hear the hon. member for Vancouver East on a question of privilege?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, as I tried to say previously, the hon. member is discussing matters that are beyond the scope of the terms of the resolution before us. The discussion has strayed into the subject of unemployment insurance and various other matters. I take it that in our discussion from this point on we are free to discuss these matters.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member scarcely raised a question of privilege. If the hon. gentleman takes a point of order that the hon. member for Fort William was going beyond the terms of the resolution he may have a point but I consider that the resolution calling for the construction of a new public building in Fort William perhaps has something to do with aid to depressed areas and I did not intend to be unduly restrictive as I said earlier. When the hon. member makes his own intervention he will have to guide himself in terms of the subjects he discusses.

Mr. Winch: Unemployment insurance was also mentioned.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member takes exception to what is being said by the hon. member for Fort William, he is entitled to do so but the mention of unemployment insurance was surely incidental. The hon. member who has the floor should be allowed to complete his address.

Mr. Badanai: I must say that the Minister of Labour is aware of the conditions and I give him credit because I believe he has also recommended that a new building be provided.

During a recent visit to Fort William I had occasion to go into the customs building.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is really getting out of order now.

Mr. Badanai: I am attempting to point out the necessity for the government to do something. I am attempting to show how the depressed conditions that now exist in the lakehead can be cured. Just as I pointed out the deplorable conditions of the unemployment insurance building, I am now attempting to show that the customs building also requires some consideration.

What is the use of the government's spending a lot of money advertising "Do it Now" campaigns which, it is hoped will result in increased employment, when offices and facilities of its departments are allowed to deteriorate to the point that the situation is obvious and noticeable even to the casual observer? While admittedly the immediate repairing of buildings and government offices will not solve the unemployment problem, it could provide several weeks' work for quite a few unemployed. At least the Department of Labour would be setting an example to the citizens who are being urged to provide work for the unemployed.

I shall now proceed to show why the district of Fort William and Port Arthur is a depressed area. This house should know by now, and should be well informed of the fact, that in Fort William we have a spacious manufacturing plant known as Canada Car Company. It is one of the largest manufacturing establishments of its kind in Canada, and it has facilities for the employment of thousands of workers. During world war II it employed up to 7,000 people. It has a record for building aircraft of all kinds and descriptions. It has built buses, trailers and ships; it has built models of portable houses, ideal for families of army personnel serving in the Arctic and for families living in the far north.

A couple of years ago it had a flourishing bus manufacturing business. Unfortunately, the executive officers of the company which owns other plants, notably the Dominion plant in Montreal, decided to move the manufacturing facilities for buses and trailers to Montreal. It was at a time when the labour force employed in the area was nearly 2,000. It left the plant with only 400 to 500 people working on small subcontracts for aircraft component parts. It was at this time that a strong delegation composed of representatives from the city councils and nearly every other organization of the two cities came to Ottawa. They were well received by the then minister of public works, the acting prime minister, the minister of defence production and the minister of national defence and officials of their respective departments.

During the discussion of ways and means to secure work for the plant, mention was made of the amphibious army carrier known as the Bobcat, which was being developed by Canada Car engineers in co-operation with officials of the Department of National Defence. While there was no firm commitment to the delegation that if and when this vehicle would receive the approval of the Department of National Defence and the government for production it would be produced in Fort William, nevertheless a strong impression was left with the delegation that such would be the case. Therefore, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), made the statement in the house on February 15, considerable consternation was caused at the lakehead. I wish to quote a portion of the statement:

> Following the 20 preproduction pilot models being produced, when it is possible to proceed with the production of the balance of 480 vehicles this will be determined on the basis of competitive tender. This could mean that if Canadian Car Company Limited were the successful tenderer, production of the Bobcat could take place at Fort William, provided the company so elected. However—and I want to be frank in this connection—it is extremely doubtful whether the company would be in a competitive position if the manufacture took place at Fort William.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must ask the hon. member whether he does not think now that he is back again on a specific subject of the estimates of the Department of National Defence? He is dealing with the production of a specific vehicle, not with any measure that has been advocated in the amendment. I would ask him to stick to the amendment.

Mr. Badanai: I merely wish to point out some of the basic reasons why we have so many unemployed in the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur. Some of the people who live in Port Arthur work in Fort William in the Canadian Car plant, and some people living in Fort William work in the shipbuilding yards in Port Arthur. This is the reason why I have mentioned these two industries in these two cities.

The consternation which was caused in the city of Fort William by the Prime Minister's statement was that it was extremely doubtful whether the company would be in a competitive position if the manufacturing took place at Fort William. This is the point, Mr. Speaker. The suggestion contained in the Prime Minister's statement was that the local Canadian Car Company cannot compete with plants in other parts of the country. This is another way of saying that the cities of Port Arthur and Fort William cannot hope to share in any big way in future defence contracts.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, you have just warned the hon. member that this matter has really nothing to do with the motion which has been made and he has, I think, deliberately defied your ruling by going right ahead and talking about this matter of the possible contract at some time in the future for the production of the Bobcat.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; I was following what the hon. member said. It seemed to me that he was dealing with the competitive position of the company, which could be related to the question of depreciation and this resolution. Unless he returns to the specific subject to which I objected I think I should let him proceed.

Mr. Badanai: The point is this, Mr. Speaker. I have given the explanation and it is one of the reasons why the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur have so much unemployment. We take great exception to any statements which would create the impression that it costs more to produce at the lakehead than it does elsewhere. Such statements are illogical and are not borne out by the facts. That is all I wish to point out. I want everybody to know that manufacturing can be done in Fort William as cheaply as it can be done anywhere else. As a matter of fact, we have some advantages and I hold in my hand figures to demonstrate what I am talking about.

Out of 24 classifications for the production of the Bobcat which involves bench fitters, carpenters, assemblers, electricians, inspectors, jig borers, machinists, mechanics, painters, plate workers, sheet metal workers, storekeepers, tool makers, welders and truck drivers, the wages of 19 of the classifications were in Montreal from one cent to 19 cents per hour higher; in four of the 24 classifications the wages in Fort William were from eight cents to 10 cents an hour higher; and in one classification they were the same. This proves conclusively that wages are certainly not the reason for favouring Montreal over Fort William on any kind of production.

The lakehead cities can point with pride to records in the production of aircraft and shipbuilding during and after the last war. Can the Prime Minister or anyone else tell us what has happened to render these two cities unfit for participation in defence production?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member seemed to me to go back on the track, but as he has proceeded I find that he is still debating the subject of production and the choice of some other place for the production of Bobcats or some particular vehicle, a matter which, as I pointed out to him, was quite irrelevant to the motion and was out of order because it is a matter for discussion on the defence estimates.

Mr. Badanai: In deference to your suggestion, Mr. Speaker I shall not dwell any more on this particular point.

I fully realize that the lakehead is not the only region suffering from unemployment. The crucial difference is that we are practically isolated, and therefore are more or less forgotten in favour of larger centres of population. A few weeks ago I read in the Christian Science Monitor an article which told the story of an unemployed person who was asked what was the hardest thing about being laid off, and he replied: "Selling the dog". He went on to explain that they had the dog for five years, and the youngsters did not want to part with the dog. They cried for days. He sold it for $15.50 which he used to buy meat, something which they had not had since he was laid off. After all, unemployment statistics encompass unhappy men, frightened wives, hungry children, delinquency, demoralization and defeat.

When the government introduced the resolution to appoint a national productivity council, which had been announced in the speech from the throne last November, we all thought that perhaps here was a suggestion that might do something toward the stimulation of employment and that a council composed of men of vast experience could indeed offer valuable recommendations. However, since the council will act in an advisory capacity only—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has misconceived the opportunity that is given him by this amendment. The amendment was not selected by me. It was selected by the Leader of the Opposition. The hon. member who has the floor has a copy of it before him and I suggest that if he cannot confine his remarks to the amendment he might as well take his seat.

An hon. Member: He has his speech all written down.

Mr. Badanai: It is not all written down. Last January the Canadian chamber of commerce sponsored a national business conference on employment. The theme of the conference was an expanding economy, the key to employment. What are we trying to do? We are trying to advance suggestions in order to promote work in depressed areas such as my constituency and all others as well. The theme of the conference to which I have referred embraces in a single phrase one of the fundamentals necessary to put us back on the road to employment and prosperity. An expanding economy, which we need in order to get rid of the depressed areas, demands more capital investment and judicious handling of tariffs.

The recent budgetary resolution conferring upon the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) the power to determine the content of goods and to place an arbitrary tariff rate on the article involved does not augur well for some of our exports upon which much of our economy depends for expansion and employment. If the Minister of Labour in his statement of government policy to assist depressed areas had suggested a formula to stimulate business by allowing a company to deduct from current taxable income earnings if invested in the establishment of a new industry, or invested in certain specific areas in the promotion of low cost housing for rent or in shipbuilding, an industry which is definitely in the doldrums—incidentally, I may say there is a fine shipyard in Port Arthur—such a measure would be the greatest stimulant to private enterprise which would be eager to co-operate with the government in planning a mass assault on unemployment.

Nothing less than an all-out effort will do. The time for half measures is past. We are living in a day and age of technological change which has taken place in our factories and our industries, on our railroads and even on our farms. The result has been a steady increase in unemployment. This is one of the factors, among others, which has contributed to our dilemma. It has contributed to the condition of the depressed areas with which we are dealing at this moment.

This is the time for the government to step in and make a study of technological developments in every industry. This would not necessarily mean interfering with private industry, but I do think that sudden changes affecting employment should be handled intelligently and with a sense of humanity. Having this in mind, the government would be well advised to ask industry to inform it before industry employs methods that will displace a large number of employees because of automation, and competent advisers should be called in at once in an effort to find an immediate alternative in the form of work for these displaced persons.

Canadians have supported in the past—and they will do so in the future—programs for the alleviation of suffering in many parts of the world, especially in underdeveloped regions. We have always done so out of sympathy as well as in the national interest. I cannot believe that Canada will not support reasonable programs for the unemployed of the nation, be they victims of a disaster or victims of technological change. Technological changes are another reason why we have depressed areas in our country. The Minister of Labour has indicated that his department is undertaking a detailed study of the problem in the railway industry brought about by automation and technological changes and that the study is similar to that being made by the royal commission investigating the automobile industry. If it takes the experts as long to look into the railway problem as it has taken them in the case of the automobile industry, this will mean that the situation on the railways will get much worse before we can expect any action from the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the hon. member take his seat. His time has about expired and it appears he is unable to observe my injunction.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting debate, and very rarely does the small C.C.F. group have the opportunity to have two speakers in an afternoon. We appreciate the opportunity to speak on this very important question. When I look at the government side of the house I can sense a sort of you-next-my-dear-Alphonse attitude. They do not seem to want to discuss this question. However, when I discuss an amendment of this sort and this subject which is of great importance, I am always reminded of the nearly 700,000 unemployed Canadians, their families and dependents, their fears, their problems and their continuing hopes for action on the part of the government. I am also reminded of the apprehension with which many of our young people face the future because of the circumstances that exist in Canada at this time.

The amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and seconded by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) reads as follows:

> This house is of the opinion that the provision for double depreciation announced last December will prove ineffective in dealing with the problems of depressed areas, and regrets that the government had imposed the responsibility for the designation of such areas on the municipalities, and that the definition of depressed areas is too restrictive.

I read the amendment because it deals particularly with three problems, namely the provision of double depreciation, the problems of depressed areas and the definition of depressed areas. As we all know, depressed areas are areas where there is abnormal and large-scale unemployment. So I presume, Mr. Speaker, that in order to discuss the resolution intelligently we can refer to unemployment problems in depressed areas and make alternate proposals.

When the Leader of the Opposition was speaking he made reference for a moment or two to the recent Progressive Conservative conference or convention or party beano, shall I say, or whatever you like to call it, that was held in Ottawa. I cannot help referring to the fact that the Prime Minister said that the Conservative party will soon have a rendezvous with destiny. I do not know how he is going to determine that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. and amiable gentleman but in view of the treatment accorded to the hon. member for Fort William I feel that unless—

Mr. Churchill: Treatment by whom?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the attitude of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Churchill: I thought you were referring to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am speaking to a point of order. In view of the very strict interpretation of the resolution in respect of the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Fort William that the employment policies of the railways were contributing to depressed areas, I think the hon. member for Kootenay West would have to show that the Tory convention was a depressed area before he could make his remarks relevant to the motion. If he can do that, I would agree with him.

Mr. Herridge: I can do that immediately. I had a member of the Progressive Conservative party in my office before 2.30 today, and the statement he made was that it was a most depressing convention.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is true the Leader of the Opposition, when he opened this debate, dealt at some length with the events pertaining to a convention held in this city last week. It may be that he made some specific point which requires an answer from members of the other parties, or another member of the house.

However, following what I described as a rather discursive opening, the Leader of the Opposition did introduce a specific resolution which is the subject of the debate before the house. I have endeavoured to limit hon. members, including the hon. member for Peterborough and the hon. member for Fort William, who were inclined to debate anything which in their view affected unemployment. I feel that the hon. member for Kootenay West must also bring his remarks into order by referring to the amendment which is before the house.

The amendment which is before us, and which the hon. member has read, makes no reference and has no relevance to the convention which he was about to discuss. I trust the hon. member will do what other members have been asked to do, namely stick to the point before the house.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I bow to your ruling as usual. I mentioned the convention only because the Leader of the Opposition referred to it. I was a bit curious as to whether or not the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was going to consult an astrological chart or a medium with regard to this rendezvous with destiny.

However, coming directly into order, I must say that we are of the opinion that this blight on our society will not be cured by pious resolutions, declamations, the protests of any particular group or double depreciation. If that is not being in order, I do not know what is.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was no double depreciation at the Tory convention.

Mr. Herridge: It is only by the determination of the Canadian people who are willing to sacrifice some of their own comforts that this problem will be remedied. I believe that the remedying of this situation will require a great deal of thought and effective action, and particularly leadership by this government of a stronger nature than the introduction of double depreciation for depressed areas. I admit that there is no easy solution to this very complicated and involved problem which is a product of the free enterprise system. The Prime Minister stated that the free enterprise system was going to be supported during the next election by his party as against the socialist approach of this party. The Prime Minister is on the defensive in this respect because the blight is one of the effects of the free enterprise system.

We in this group offer democratic socialism not as an overnight cure but as a philosophical approach to life that will remedy this cyclical unemployment. I recognize that we live in a democracy. In a dictatorship problems can be cured by edict and by order. Dictators do not need to wait for the consent of the people. A dictator could put all the people in Canada to work tomorrow. However, in a democracy you have to recognize the parliamentary institutions; you have to recognize the democratic principles. What you do must have the consent of the people as a whole; otherwise it is not effective.

What we criticize is the failure of the government to give leadership at this time, beyond this question of double depreciation and other long term measures which are fully justified but which will not remedy the situation in the near future. In contrast to this suggestion of double depreciation and the designation of certain areas as depressed areas, we suggest the way to meet this problem is a program of long term and short term arrangements. We believe that long term arrangements, as opposed to this piecemeal double depreciation program, will require a conscious effort of planning by the people as a whole instead of leaving the planning of our economy to fewer and fewer corporations whose boards of directors decide whether or not men shall be employed. This planning will require co-operation between governments, between industry and labour, between labour and agriculture and other segments of our population.

This planning is only possible with the acceptance of a totally different approach to life, a different social and economic philosophy. In this way governments can influence the direction of investment rather than have, as I believe we have had in recent years, direction by boards of directors without any relationship to what was happening in the other provinces with respect to the development of our natural resources. We could then bring these resources into production as the result of a plan rather than have them brought into production as the result of a decision of a board of directors located in New York or somewhere like that, and without any thought given to whether or not we are exhausting our natural resources or developing them at too rapid a rate. An overall plan would provide for the education of our young people, the retraining of our older people and the rehabilitation of the disabled. Some of these things are mentioned in measures that have been introduced by the government. These are long term plans that would take some time to have effect. This planning with respect to the development of markets over the years is very necessary indeed, as is long term planning with respect to research into the economics and the development of natural resources, the use of fiscal policies and so on.

We are urging this suggestion, in general, as a long term plan in opposition to the program advanced by the government with respect to double depreciation. What about the short term program? We must do something that will have an effect in the near future. People cannot remain unemployed year after year without their morale being destroyed. I can tell you right now that I have no sympathy for the lazy man. There are malingerers in all groups in society. Since there is a small percentage of people in any group who will take advantage of any type of legislation, we find that fact is emphasized. We do not talk about the malingering of the corporations who have obtained concessions valued at millions of dollars as a result of incorrect statements, and so on.

We suggest a long term program as opposed to this short term double depreciation program. We suggest there is an opportunity for long term loans and aid to underdeveloped countries at low interest rates. We suggest this will provide outlets for our industrial and agricultural surpluses while at the same time providing increased employment and production. Is it not better to keep our workers working constantly and our farmers producing and paying income tax than to have the present-day rate of unemployment? Think of all the income tax that is lost on account of unemployment. This loss must amount to hundreds of millions of dollars each year, and it results directly from the lack of markets for our agricultural products. We suggest that these people should be kept employed, that the resulting increase in income tax could be used to provide the loans and aid to the needy countries, and that we then could use the immediately increased credit.

The government of this country represents all the people, and the wealth of Canada in the abstract belongs to the people of Canada. The government borrows not as companies do, but on the capacity of the total Canadian population to produce. We suggest the government of Canada could use the national credit to a much greater extent by permitting public investment programs for highways, hospitals, schools and public utilities instead of just providing this very minute remedy of double depreciation.

In the proposal for double depreciation it is suggested that it will have a benefit overnight and that companies would locate in certain places immediately. Companies do not establish industries in locations because of double depreciation or employment surpluses, but fundamentally because of the nearness of resources and the relationship between the factory, transportation and markets. These things are all taken into consideration when a company locates and it will take possibly a year or two before these companies get into operation. In the meantime this double depreciation program will have no effect so far as reducing the number of unemployed is concerned.

In addition to this double depreciation measure we suggest that the government undertake a national investment program for the utilization of the nationally unemployed, the utilization of idle natural resources, and the utilization of idle national credit at this time.

Mr. O. H. Phillips (Prince): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I have certain reservations, as I do not wish to place myself in the same position as that of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) who, despite the fact that he had ample notice and time to prepare his remarks, made only one statement that went unchallenged in the house, and that was the statement in which he declared Fort William to be a depressed area.

The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) was not satisfied with that effort but went further and classified the whole area of Toronto as a depressed area.

Mr. Hellyer: Not only Toronto; the whole country.

Mr. Phillips: That is typical of remarks made by hon. members of the opposition. One can imagine the harm to Canada's prestige throughout the world resulting from statements made by representatives in the House of Commons, of which the absurd suggestion just made by the hon. member for Trinity is a perfect example. They seem to have adopted the Templeton doctrine.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) began his speech by waving his arms and various notes in the air and I thought that he was going to create a great deal of fireworks, but they seemed to fizzle out considerably. The Leader of the Opposition left this chamber immediately after he made his remarks. I thought he would have been much better off had he left before he made them. The hon. member for Fort William, I see by his absence, has followed his leader's example. Indeed, it is not too many minutes ago, sir, that there were exactly two Liberal members in this house at a time when they are supposed to be taking advantage of a supply motion in order to criticize the actions of the government.

An hon. Member: There are only four in the house now.

Mr. Phillips: That is four too many.

The Leader of the Opposition in introducing his remarks used all the antics of a professional clown except paint and then he went on to minimize everything this government accomplished, and if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) had not called him to order he would still be criticizing this government.

The Leader of the Opposition seemed to be very conscious of the recent annual meeting of the Progressive Conservative association of Canada. Obviously, he found the number and the enthusiasm of the delegates most disturbing, as well he might. This was not a convention but an annual meeting and it far outshone any of the fiascos held down in what is commonly called the cowbarn at the coliseum.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I hate to interrupt the hon. member for Prince who does not often take up the time of this house but I assume that the rules will be enforced equally on both sides of this house.

Mr. Starr: The Leader of the Opposition spent about ten minutes talking about this subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Labour was not here in the house when the ruling was made regarding this subject.

Mr. Starr: I was in the house all the time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member does not make any specific objection, but the rules, I hope, will be enforced evenly.

Mr. Starr: Do not stretch the truth too far, Jack.

[Mr. Phillips.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I feel I must rise on a question of privilege. The Minister of Labour I think will not deny that he just made the remark to me; "Do not stretch the truth too far". If the hon. gentleman is suggesting anything which I said is in any way untrue, and if he can show me that it is, I will withdraw it at once, but unless he can do so I hope he will withdraw his imputations.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said I was out of the house when Your Honour brought to the attention of the Leader of the Opposition the fact that he was out of order. I said that he was stretching the truth because I was present at that time.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, sir, what I said was that Your Honour had made a ruling in regard to this matter, and I was referring of course to the ruling which was made when the hon. member for Kootenay West was speaking. If the Minister of Labour was in the house at that time I withdraw the statement.

Mr. Starr: I was in the house at that time and that is why I said the hon. member was stretching the truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope the minister will withdraw his imputation.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty seems to arise out of remarks made by hon. members who did not have the floor. While I did not hear the remark, I think perhaps the explanation made on both sides sufficiently disposes of the matter.

The hon. member for Prince has the floor.

Mr. Phillips: Mr. Speaker, before the member for Bonavista-Twillingate arose on the point of order I intended to refer to a few of the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in introducing his motion. I should particularly like to explain one matter to him and correct the impression he left on Hansard regarding the resolutions put forward at the recent annual meeting.

Before the meeting was called various associations were requested to submit resolutions, and approximately 200 to 250 resolutions were received by the resolutions committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I again rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Kootenay West was not allowed to proceed on this line of argument, on the ground that it was in no way germane to the motion of the Leader of the Opposition. I submit that neither should the hon. member for Prince be allowed to proceed.

Mr. Speaker: As I recall the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West, he was referring to the convention in his own terms. As I now understand the hon. member for Prince, he is replying to a statement made by the Leader of the Opposition. Even though it would be out of order to introduce a discussion on the Conservative convention in debating the resolution now before the house, I could not prevent the hon. member from replying to a statement made in the course of such debate. I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will appreciate that this is a necessary right of reply.

Mr. Pickersgill: I submit with the greatest possible respect, sir, that my hon. friend from Fort William was departing a great deal less from the subject matter of this amendment which, as Your Honour rightly pointed out, has nothing whatever to do with the recent Conservative meeting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then why was it introduced by the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the Prime Minister would like a reply to that question, I should be very happy to reply to it. The Leader of the Opposition spoke before he had introduced a motion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and it is a well known rule of the house, which I admit is frequently transgressed,—

Mr. Starr: By the Liberals only.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be allowed to proceed. It is a well known rule of the house, which I admit is frequently transgressed, that once a motion has been made the debate on that motion must be relevant to the motion, whatever scope there may have been before the motion was made. I say that rule is often transgressed.

I should never have thought of raising this point of order in the ordinary course of events, but in view of the harassment which the hon. member for Fort William endured from hon. members opposite, starting with the house leader, when he was seeking to talk on subjects quite germane to this motion, it does seem to me that the Chair, having embarked upon the very strict interpretation of the rules that was applied to the hon. member for Kootenay West, should apply that strict interpretation of the rules equally to both sides of the house. That is all I am submitting.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member makes one proposition for which I would require support; that is, that remarks made by the mover of the resolution before the resolution was actually moved, which would not have been in order afterwards, cannot be referred to. Unless I have some authority to the contrary I propose to follow the course which would permit an hon. member, in this debate initiated by the Leader of the Opposition, to make specific reference to what was said by the initiator of the debate in order to refute, contradict or comment on those things which he said, even though those things would not have been relevant after the amendment had been moved.

I know of no rule that would support the proposition made by the hon. member. I do agree with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that the debate on this resolution has been confined to the relatively narrow terms of the resolution and alternative methods of dealing with the problem of depressed areas. I hope that all hon. members who take part in the discussion will observe that limitation.

Mr. Phillips: Mr. Speaker, before the interruption of my remarks I was attempting to correct an erroneous impression that was left by the Leader of the Opposition. This has been the first opportunity I have had to do that, and I trust the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) will bear with me for a moment or two while I follow this line of discussion. We all know his dislike of arrogance and I am sure he would not wish to display it on this occasion.

As I was saying, the resolutions committee had received approximately 200 to 250 resolutions from Conservative organizations all across Canada. Some of them were received at least two or three months prior to the convention. They were passed on to the resolutions committee, in which every province was represented as well as members of our young Conservative groups and women's organizations.

Most of these resolutions were naturally of a complimentary nature. The people of Canada, realizing that this government has accomplished a great deal, naturally wanted to compliment the government on their achievements. Many of the resolutions were almost duplicates, and the resolutions committee met and condensed them into brief resolutions that could be readily understood by anyone in Canada. They were presented to the convention and delegates were allowed to discuss them. No effort on the part of anyone is going to be allowed to create the impression that the resolutions were handed to the annual meeting. The opposite is the truth, sir; they originated where resolutions should begin, namely at the grass roots.

In his motion the Leader of the Opposition produced a six-point program. I should like to refer briefly to several of these. The first one says that an area rehabilitation agency should be set up within the federal government to implement, in co-operation with the provinces and local authorities, an over-all program of economic assistance to the depressed areas of our country.

I was impressed with the wording of this resolution. I have in mind the objection which is embodied in the amendment, to having the federal government dealing with the municipalities, and yet the very first item presented by the Leader of the Opposition contains the words, "in co-operation with the provinces and local authorities". I fail to detect any great difference between the word "municipalities" and the words "local authorities". In my view the municipality is the local authority. In the very first point of the program the opposition have contradicted their whole argument throughout the resolution.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Phillips: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was beginning to deal with the six-point proposal advanced by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon before moving his amendment. I mentioned the reference in the first point to local authorities and stated that there was no difference between local authorities and municipalities and if it is improper to have the municipalities dealing with the legislation on double depreciation it would be equally improper to have such legislation dealt with by an area rehabilitation agency.

The first point then goes on to refer to economic assistance. Here the Leader of the Opposition picked a very vague cliche and made no effort to outline what economic assistance would be forthcoming under a Liberal government. The hon. gentleman in his first point went on to say "That agency of the federal government should designate such areas... on the basis of suitable criteria and carry out detailed and concrete studies of their economies." This is a most interesting sentence. The first thing I would ask hon. members to note in that sentence is that it states "That agency of the federal government should designate such areas".

I recall a special debate in this house in which hon. members of the official opposition were most emphatic that it must be the federal government that would automatically designate these areas. We now find that hon. members of the opposition have changed their minds. They are now passing over to an agency this responsibility and apparently if they formed the government they would have no desire to assume that responsibility.

That sentence goes on to state, "on the basis of suitable criteria." Here again there is no effort to outline or elaborate what suitable criteria would be under a Liberal government. The sentence continues, "and carry out detailed and concrete studies of their economies." That, sir, is the only thing that is offered to depressed areas in the first point, namely an economic survey. This is very interesting in view of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. There are a number of conclusions one can draw from this sentence. One is that the Leader of the Opposition has in his office a number of economists and that he is anxious to avail himself of an opportunity to unload them, and an economic survey would be an ideal means of getting rid of such people as Professor Lamontagne from the office of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Habel: He must worry you.

Mr. Phillips: No, Professor Lamontagne does not worry me. In fact, I rather appreciate some of his remarks.

Mr. Habel: Sure he worries you.

Mr. Phillips: I wish to paraphrase the remarks the Leader of the Opposition quoted from the Financial Post in which he said the present legislation would provide more work for civil servants than it would for the unemployed. I think the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition would provide work for only one class of people, namely certain favoured economists. I should like to see the Leader of the Opposition in the house at this time so that he might pick up his notes, wave them around to his followers and ask, for how many unemployed would an economic survey provide jobs?

The second point of the hon. member's proposal opens with a reference to a flexible fiscal policy. This is a wonderful old phrase which has been hashed and rehashed until it has no meaning today.

Mr. Pickersgill: Notably by the Minister of Forestry.

Mr. Phillips: I am sorry but I did not catch the interruption of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I will assume that it is like most of the hon. member's interruptions and is unimportant. The description of a flexible fiscal policy is merely designed to apply to all situations and hides the fact that you have solved none of them.

Earlier in my remarks the hon. member for Trinity stated that all Canada was depressed. In view of these remarks I should like to refer to the next words in the sentence that comprises the second point of the proposal: "A flexible fiscal policy should be adapted to the specific needs of those areas which may require special encouragement." That does not imply that all of Canada is depressed. In fact, it does not even admit that any specific area would require assistance. It merely refers to those areas which may require special encouragement and does not even mention the word "assistance".

The Leader of the Opposition went on to attempt to develop a description of a flexible fiscal policy. Paragraph (a) of the description is a real dilly. That is about the best characterization you can give it. Paragraph (a) refers to "capital grants for development, such as the Atlantic provinces development fund." The hon. member then had the unmitigated gall to say that the Liberal party had been advocating such grants for some time.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is true.

An hon. Member: What is true about it?

Mr. Phillips: I clearly recall the 1957 election campaign. There was not a squawk out of the Leader of the Opposition or the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate with respect to the Atlantic provinces development fund. That idea originated when the Leader of the Opposition went into hibernation with an advertising agency and came up with the idea of $100 million for the Atlantic provinces development fund.

The Liberals were going to work wonders with $100 million. They were going to build the Prince Edward Island causeway, costing $125 million. Then they were going to build the Chignecto canal which would also cost at least $125 million. We are already up to $250 million. Then my hon. friends were going to throw in for good measure electric power development, assistance to the coal mines and an extensive public works program in addition to the first two items. Apparently they did not have any economist in the den with them when they hibernated and dreamed up this idea.

Paragraph (b) refers to "tax incentives such as temporary tax exemptions." I think hon. members should note the word "temporary" and bear in mind that Walter Gordon on a recent television program, when questioned on Liberal proposals for tax reductions stated, "Oh, they would be temporary, very temporary". I point out that you are not going to get any great industrial expansion on the basis of temporary tax reductions. This proposal no doubt will be something like the six-weeks' honeymoon exemption that was offered during the last election campaign.

I wonder whether hon. members opposite would like to recall their criticism of public works programs that have been presented to this house. Their chief complaint was that public works programs did nothing except provide a deficit in the budget, and they were opposed to that.

Paragraph (d) is a most unusual one. It refers to special consideration for such areas in winter works programs. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition did not intend to compliment the Minister of Labour, (Mr. Starr), but I should like to join him in that compliment. The Minister of Labour was the first to initiate a winter works program, and the Leader of the Opposition now wants to join him in that regard. Probably this desire is activated by the knowledge that 1,800 municipalities are now spending $258 million on the winter works program, and are undertaking 6,000 projects this winter.

Point 3 states that easier credit facilities should have been made available to depressed areas. This is a most unusual confession and one that I appreciate very much. When hon. members opposite were in power several years ago the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Flemming), at that time the premier of New Brunswick, made a plea to Ottawa for easier credit restrictions in the maritime provinces, the government of that day said it was impossible; that the fiscal policy had to be the same all across Canada. We now find the Leader of the Opposition admitting that they were in error on that occasion. Not only that, but they are attempting to adopt the idea proposed by the former premier of New Brunswick.

The item goes on to state: "For that purpose the industrial development bank should be separated from the Bank of Canada and operated vigorously to provide capital assistance for depressed areas." Earlier the Leader of the Opposition made reference to resolutions passed at the recent annual meeting of the Progressive Conservative association. I am sure he read them very carefully and I am rather suspicious that he lifted this one from one of the resolutions passed at that meeting.

Item No. 4 states: "Special training and retraining programs should be implemented in order to prepare the workers displaced". I presume he means in order to prepare them with new skills, and so on. This is nothing new, sir. I wonder where the Leader of the Opposition has been in the last few months that he has not realized that this government has accomplished this in co-operation with the provinces? This program comes under the heading of education, and we respect the rights of the provinces in that regard and have attempted to co-operate with them. I am sure that the understudy of the Leader of the Opposition, who keeps pushing him to move out of the way and resign—I refer to the premier of Quebec—so that he may take over the leadership will not appreciate the wording of this paragraph.

Item No. 5 likewise contains nothing new. It calls for special urban renewal measures. The amendments to the National Housing Act passed this session permit municipalities to undertake urban redevelopment and to receive considerable assistance from the federal government.

In reading over these points I came to the conclusion that the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) at the recent annual meeting cut fairly deeply into the Leader of the Opposition. The Prime Minister quite justly stated that the Liberals had moved to the left and had adopted socialism, and we are now the only party on the right.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member's party has not moved at all.

Mr. Phillips: The Leader of the Opposition realizes his mistake and he is now attempting to correct it by adopting the Conservative program. I am sorry to have to inform him that there is no room on the bandwagon for those who have so actively criticized and opposed this program. Hon. members opposite adopted socialism voluntarily. Why not have the backbone to stay with it? Do not attempt to take our program.

Item No. 6 has to do with a rural development program. The only thing that is new here is that it is a rehash of the name of the legislation proposed by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Deschatelets: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has the floor just said that we adopted socialism. Personally, I have never been more insulted in my life. The hon. member should withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Winch: The hon. member has never been so honoured in his life.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no moral turpitude involved, I am sure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that a ruling?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is not a judicial opinion.

[Mr. Phillips.]

Mr. Phillips: In regard to the question of privilege, I would suggest that the hon. member discuss the matter with his leader and explain to him that he has been insulted by the actions of his leader.

I was saying, sir, that item No. 6 contains nothing new. It is merely a rehash of the name of the legislation produced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton), namely his program for agricultural rehabilitation and development.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just resumed his seat has referred to the six-point program which was introduced this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) who moved the amendment to the supply motion. He referred to the first paragraph of this program which suggests that an area rehabilitation agency should be set up within the federal government to implement, in co-operation with the provinces and the local authorities, an over-all program of economic assistance to the depressed areas of the country. I wish to state at this time that this proposal of the Leader of the Opposition is altogether different from the proposal of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) who put the whole onus on the municipalities.

The hon. member also referred to capital grants for development. He should keep in mind the fact that as far back as 1956, the then prime minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, asked the Atlantic premiers to bring forward suggestions for a capital program for the Atlantic provinces. Up to this date we have heard very little from the Atlantic premiers in this regard.

It has been said on many occasions, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government, which is called upon to spend $1 out of every $5 the country produces, can be considered as the biggest business in Canada. It is also recognized that in a country with such a diverse economy and such diverse interests it is the responsibility of the federal government to give consideration to all sectors of the economy, to all classes of people and to all regions of the country, and in doing so it must implement policies that are in the national interest. The function of the federal government is to create that kind of economic climate in which private enterprise and, more so, private initiative can spearhead the development of every region and where the national growth of the country can be shared on an equal basis by all areas and not be centralized to the benefit of preferred sections of the country.

It is most unfortunate that, on every occasion when we on the opposition side are attempting to bring forward constructive ideas, when we are urging the government to take bold and comprehensive measures to cope with the existing situation, we are accused, as we have heard in the last few days, of dredging up gloom; and of spreading talk of depression; and members on the other side even go so far as to say that we are holding the Canadian people by fear. It is most unfortunate that those to whom has been assigned the responsibility of government should be the first ones to dodge their responsibility and to try to lay the responsibility for events that happen on the shoulders of past administrations or the present opposition.

Is it the fault of the opposition, Mr. Speaker, if the unemployment figures which will be released tomorrow or the next day will show close to 800,000 unemployed in this country? Is it the fault of the opposition if those figures will be the highest in the history of Canada since the hungry 30's? I might also ask, is it the fault of the opposition if the unemployment insurance fund, a fund which was over $900 million when this government took office, is at the moment I am speaking under $200 million?

In supporting the amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon, it is my intention to deal with three main aspects affecting the Atlantic provinces and it is my hope that this time hon. members on the government side, particularly those from the Atlantic region, will refrain from personal abuse such as we have heard in the house on recent occasions. If our suggestions are sound and are of a constructive nature, those same hon. members would be well advised and would serve the interest of their constituents to better advantage if they would use their personal good will and their good influence to have the government of the day implement those measures which would benefit the Atlantic region and restore our economy in line with the rest of the country.

It is the duty of the government, we all know, to initiate immediate and bold action to take care of the chronic unemployment problems which we have to admit are growing worse and worse. The situation as we see it now may not adjust itself with the melting of the snow, and the coming of spring, which in fact started this afternoon, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) suggested to the house last year. The measures introduced so far have been inadequate, insufficient and incapable of meeting the serious problem of unemployment. Since taking office the government has been reluctant to face the facts and its approach to the problem of depressed areas is another example of its seceding attitude and its lack of responsibility.

The government's definition of a depressed area is most inadequate. It will create nothing else but confusion and delay. The remedies offered so far are too limited and inefficient and will not produce the effect expected because they do not offer the incentive needed to induce the establishment of new industries which the government expects to result from the application of such half-way measures as its double depreciation policy which was described to the house on March 2 last.

I said earlier that it was my intention to deal with the three main aspects affecting the Atlantic provinces. Notwithstanding the definition and the interpretation given to the house on March 2 by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) with respect to the selection of areas eligible for double depreciation, no one should question the position of the Atlantic region in so far as the application of this measure and much more effective measures is concerned. The president of the Atlantic provinces economic council, Arthur Johnson, in an address to the Canadian Club in Toronto on March 11, said that the Atlantic provinces' economy must be re-made and he added:

> Even more important, it means doing it without delay.

In his address Mr. Johnson deplored the fact that the unemployment problem is more critical in the Atlantic region than in any other region in Canada. He described the Atlantic region as largely a primary producer for the country and, he said, one which gets no benefit from the national tariff policy and one which bears far more than its share of the cost of the national transportation system.

The Atlantic region, Mr. Speaker, is an area with surplus manpower, an area where the percentage of the labour force without jobs and seeking work is at all times much higher than the Canadian average and in certain periods almost 100 per cent higher. The Atlantic region as a whole should be considered as an area where there has been a substantial increase of continued unemployment over the years and an area which would qualify under this program without having to be subjected to the strict definition given by the Minister of Labour. As I said earlier, this program is insufficient and inadequate and should be extended much further if it is to produce the results which are expected to follow from its application.

May I refer first to the situation which prevails today in the Cape Breton area. No other area affected by the general decline of the coal industry has felt the impact to the extent to which Cape Breton has felt it. The government must now admit its complete failure to meet this urgent problem and its refusal to recognize before it became too late the inevitable consequences which will result from the closing of a number of coal mines. While prospects for substantial new employment to replace coal mining are not bright, the government must admit that since taking office it has time after time, month after month, refused to recognize the situation and has kept away from adopting adequate measures to cope with this serious problem.

For the last three years we have urged this government to undertake, through the provision of special fiscal incentives, sufficient secondary industries in such areas where existing industry was declining. For the last three years we have urged this government that the coal industry was on the decline and that the time had come to take immediate steps to provide proper planning and investigation, before it was too late, to ascertain what could be done to meet the unemployment problem that would necessarily follow these mine closures.

As early as in 1958, over three years ago, I urged this government to introduce the necessary incentives to induce Dosco to establish their proposed steel rolling plant in Cape Breton and not at Contrecoeur near Montreal. Every time we put forward such proposals with sincerity and in the hope that the government would accept them or at least give some of these suggestions favourable consideration, we were subjected to the same type of personal abuse as that to which I was subjected in the house. I was accused of being ignorant and even of adopting a hypocritical attitude. Even if it is now almost too late, I still urge this government to explore the need for economic development in the mining areas of Cape Breton and to study the possibility of producing coal as a more competitive source of energy. Once again I urge this government to undertake at once, without further delay, the establishment of a committee of practical men to whom will be given the task of finding new industries that might replace that part of the mining industry which would be displaced by the mine closures. No coal mine in Cape Breton should be allowed to close, Mr. Speaker, without taking the necessary steps to provide alternative employment for the displaced miners; and the double depreciation offered by the government today will not take care of this most unfortunate situation.

The second suggestion which I intend to bring to the attention of the government has to do with the position taken by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. APEC's position was expressed very clearly on two recent occasions, first by the executive vice president at the Atlantic conference in Halifax on September 20, 1960, and again in a statement issued concerning the APEC program on February 20 of this year. I outlined earlier the statement of APEC's president in which he expressed his views toward the Atlantic's unemployment problems during an address to the Canadian club in Toronto on March 11, only a week ago. On the average, unemployment in the Atlantic regions is just about 50 per cent higher than it is in Canada as a whole. In certain periods of the year and in some particular sections, it reaches a figure as much as 100 per cent higher than the national average. Not only must the Atlantic region be recognized as an area for double depreciation under the program advocated by the government, but the remedy offered is not adequate and will not produce satisfactory results.

APEC is calling for bold new policies in an area where the economy is weak and where unemployment threatens to remain greater than in any other part of Canada unless bold new policies are developed without delay. APEC, in its determination to solve this problem, has been able to develop such unity in economic thinking as to determine that secondary manufacturing industries alone based on local and other resources could create the 107,000 job openings which will be required in the next 20 years to bring employment in the Atlantic area up to the national average. APEC has suggested a formula which, if implemented, could substantially close the present gap of approximately 22,000 jobs which are required in the Atlantic region in order to enable that region to share on an equal basis with the rest of Canada.

From APEC's program issued a month ago today, on February 20 of this year, may I be permitted to quote briefly as follows:

> The profit climate here, therefore, must be made sufficiently attractive to investors in secondary manufacturing industry to induce them to locate in the region. To this end, APEC recommends the adoption of fiscal policies having specific application to lagging regions as distinct from pinpointed distressed areas. They should also differ from policies applying to the nation as a whole in that they should have particular application to the needs of sub-average regions of which the Atlantic constitutes one.

APEC is prepared to work with responsible taxing authorities to arrive at a satisfactory formula and makes the adoption of such regional fiscal policies a major goal. It proposes a continuing study of such policies in all their aspects. Such fiscal policies should include, among other things, (a) regional tax and investment allowances and (b) accelerated depreciation, both to be available for a stated and suitable period to permit sound business planning.

This plan, Mr. Speaker, is quite different from the double depreciation for one year which is now offered in the government's program. Before discussing further the proposals offered in this well prepared program, may I be permitted to comment briefly on the two main points offered for consideration. The first suggestion calls for regional tax and investment allowances. No such offer is contained in the present double depreciation program announced in the baby budget of December 20, 1960. I recognize that the tax incentive to business enterprises included in the baby budget is at least of some significance to the Atlantic provinces where the number of small businesses is relatively high, but it is far from being enough.

May I be allowed to point out in passing that the benefits under this measure will apply largely to firms which have passed their initial development stage and are already in the profit making stage. What is requested and what is needed is a regional tax and investment allowance or, in other words, a regional tax incentive which would induce small secondary industries to establish in the area under opportunities equal to those offered in the more populated areas where the chances of success guarantee a larger measure of security. If the economy of the Atlantic provinces is to be subjected to unusual strains, if the Atlantic position is determined by recognized factors which cause such differences with the rest of Canada, then we must take it for granted that measures must be implemented which will restrain or narrow the gap which is causing such a situation to the detriment of certain segments of our population and, I would add, to the detriment of our general economy. Not only is the per capita investment relatively low in the region, but the average total investment is directed to a greater extent to those sectors where it provides limited employment. In other words it is directed in large proportion to non-business investment thus providing limited and temporary employment for a limited period only. What is required is inducement and incentive for investment in our primary and secondary industries. This is not provided for in the proposal which the government now has before us.

The three primary occupations which have played an important role in the economy of the Atlantic provinces are farming, fishing, and lumbering or logging. Statistics will show that the maritime employment in agriculture alone has dropped about 50 per cent since 1940, and in the lumber and wood industry by approximately 45 per cent. Only in the fishing and fish processing industry has employment remained fairly constant.

The problems of agriculture, as they affect the eastern provinces, are presently receiving attention in the consideration of the estimates of that particular department. I should like to point out at this time that the fishing and fish processing industry also occupies an important position in the economy of the Atlantic provinces and should be considered seriously under this program.

In the post-war period there has been increased activity in the building of modern fishing vessels and processing plants. Here again there is room for improvement and expansion, and here again we see an opportunity for the application of a policy of regional tax and investment allowances. In the construction of fishing vessels alone, the federal government has not varied one iota in its policy since 1946, which is 15 years ago. The construction of fishing vessels alone is an important factor as a source of employment in the Atlantic region. I am one of those individuals who believe in the expansion and modernization of our fishing fleet. Large quantities of fish are in our waters, but large quantities are caught by foreign ships and, in many cases, taken to Europe to be processed and reshipped to this continent. We in the Atlantic region can increase our production and our sales, and can produce additional employment for our unemployed. Sound expansion will require larger boats, modernization of equipment, and a larger market or outlet particularly on this continent.

A system of investment allowances should be introduced which would also apply to trawlers or draggers built in Canadian yards. I believe in Canadian built ships because I want to keep our Canadian shipyards in operation, and I am convinced that our Canadian shipyards and workers are qualified to do the job and do it right. I admit that the cost of construction will be higher than that for ships built in foreign yards, but this is where the government should intervene with a regional tax and investment allowance policy and, when necessary, with substantial grants in order to allow our producers to compete with foreign built trawlers. The opportunity is here for the Atlantic provinces to increase employment and to bring to our region each year additional millions of dollars of new wealth which could be distributed to fishermen and shore help alike.

The government of this country is missing the boat in not recognizing the possibilities of development of our fishing industry. The Atlantic provinces are doing their share to promote this vital industry but the financial resources at their disposal are too limited to reach the goal which they would like to attain. Is it logical that the fishing industry today, outside of technical assistance and advice provided by the Department of Fisheries, should be operating on the same basis as that which was established, as I said earlier as far back as 1946, and with the same measure of assistance? Again I could be called to order if I attempted to elaborate on this most important factor of our maritime economy, but may I be allowed to ask the government if it is logical to be granting today, under the present high cost of construction, the same subsidy of $165 a ton on the construction of fishing vessels of the dragger or long-liner type when in 1946 or 1947 a 60-foot dragger cost in the vicinity of $30,000 against a cost of $60,000 today for a similar boat?

As I said earlier in my remarks, APEC has set the requirement of a depressed area. If the government does not want to accept their definition may I be allowed to say that not only has APEC set the requirements of a double depreciation area but it has shown that the Atlantic region, with unemployment rates 5 per cent above the national average, needs now 22,000 new jobs, and that the main source for the provision of such jobs relies on the development of secondary industry.

Before reaching the third and last point of my remarks concerning Atlantic problems, I should like to stress the importance of concentrating on a type of investment which has greater ability for providing continuing employment. I am not against investment in housing, public buildings or others, but I urge the government to give particular consideration to the type of investment and the type of public projects which could help in providing continuing employment in such depressed areas as the Atlantic provinces. I have in mind particularly the improvement of harbour facilities for fishing and shipping purposes.

In my own constituency of Gloucester improvements are required for the port of Bathurst. Such improvements would be beneficial to existing industry and would lead to further expansion and increased production of our natural resources. In other areas such as Maisonnette, Lower Caraquet, and Pigeon Hill, improvements to landing and docking facilities would result automatically in increased fish production, additional employment and increased revenue for the communities concerned. Those are the types of investment which should be of concern to the government. Improved shipping or transportation facilities, to the benefit of existing natural resources, and such projects as the Chignecto canal, are the types of investment which should concern the federal government. They are the types of investment in capital projects which should receive priority in the government's program in its willingness to meet the problems and the needs of the Atlantic region.

I have now reached that part of my remarks which will deal with a study sponsored by the Atlantic provinces research board. This study was referred to very briefly this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition when he made reference to the proposals offered by Professor A. K. Cairncross in his report "Economic Development and the Atlantic Provinces".

In the introduction to his report, which I now have before me, Mr. Cairncross discloses the purpose of his study and describes the terms of reference of his proposed survey. I will not take up the time of the house by going into the detail of those terms of reference. In the first part of his report Mr. Cairncross deals first with the monetary policy and its effects on the economy of the Atlantic region, and in the second part he refers to the problems of regional economic development for an area where the economy lags behind that of the rest of Canada.

It may be noted here that Mr. Cairncross has fully recognized the position of the Atlantic provinces and the significant disparities which call for special measures from the federal government level. In other words, he did not have to use the restrictive and unworkable criteria suggested by the Minister of Labour to determine that the Atlantic region must be accepted as an area requiring appropriate policies.

He certainly did not shift the initial responsibility to municipalities and he did not hesitate to suggest on the part of the federal government more flexible and selective policies which in his judgment should be applied to the Atlantic region without any doubt or hesitation.

In reviewing the effect of monetary policy on the economy of the Atlantic provinces Mr. Cairncross admitted that a large part of the flow of credit into private investments comes, not from private but from public institutions. In his opinion there is nothing in the nature of things obliging these institutions to charge a uniform rate of interest on their loans or to make credit available on similar terms to all borrowers. He states in one section of his report:

> If money is tight elsewhere in Canada, the Atlantic provinces cannot be completely sheltered from the consequences merely by a decision on the part of the banks to go on lending in that area as before.

This is very significant to the economic development of the Atlantic provinces.

In summarizing his remarks on monetary policy he added these words, which are to be found on page 6 of his report:

I should like to make one further general comment. "Tight money" is an intermittent phenomenon and relief from tight money is unlikely to be of more than intermittent help to a region like the Atlantic provinces. If the grounds on which such relief is claimed are the unemployment and underemployment of manpower, and if these are not intermittent but chronic, then the action called for should be designed to remove the underemployment progressively and should not be limited to providing temporary relief, any more than one should treat toothache with an occasional aspirin.

Mr. Cairncross came to the conclusion that bank finance alone was not regarded as one of the major obstacles to economic growth in the Atlantic provinces and that it has not been a major factor in the fluctuations in activity in that particular region. In fact he went even further when he declared that whatever the conceivable effects, the real effects of credit restriction within the region appear to have been far less conspicuous than the damping effects of credit restrictions outside the region and of obstacles to expansion in other markets. This, again, is very significant to the situation we have to face today in the Atlantic provinces.

In other words, he said the existing monetary policy in its general application was detrimental to the economy of the Atlantic region and contributed in no uncertain terms in creating a contraction in markets which was reflected largely in areas which already operated under unfavourable conditions.

Mr. Cairncross made it very clear and significant that he could see no way of keeping interest rates on private loans in the Atlantic provinces below the rates obtainable on comparable loans elsewhere. But he did not hesitate to suggest that loans from public bodies were quite another matter and this did not prevent such agencies as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation relieving existing shortages by allowing the building industry more leeway and offering special help where it was most needed. He did not hesitate to suggest that such agencies as the industrial development bank could apply special or preferred policies to the Atlantic region.

I know that the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Flemming), who was one of the Atlantic premiers who asked for the services of Mr. Cairncross, would be interested in expressing his opinion and showing his influence with the present government so that some of the recommendations made in this report could now be implemented to the advantage of the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Churchill: What report is this?

Mr. Robichaud: This is the report of Mr. Cairncross, who was engaged by the Atlantic premiers to make a survey of the economic development of the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member answer a question? Would the hon. member inform the house how he relates that to the motion before us?

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I certainly relate this report to the motion which is now under consideration. The amendment introduced this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition is to the effect that the double depreciation program now offered by the present government is insufficient, ineffective and cannot cope with the situation. It cannot benefit the Atlantic provinces; it cannot benefit depressed areas. The recommendations made by Mr. Cairncross are certainly in line with the policy which should be adopted by the present government if they wish to be of any assistance to the areas concerned.

In his possible line of action Dr. Cairncross went even further. Here he was dealing directly with the economic development of the area. He says as found at page 32 of his report:

First of all, since the principal handicap to industry in the Atlantic provinces is distance, there is a presumption that lower transport costs would be of immediate help, particularly if the reduction were concentrated on outward freight.

Further on in his report he says:

I come finally to tax incentives.

Tax incentives certainly have some relationship to the double depreciation offer now being made by the present government. Dr. Cairncross continues:

I assume that such incentives, to be effective, would have to be offered exclusively in scheduled areas of Canada; and for administrative reasons these areas would almost certainly have to coincide with provinces.

Mr. Phillips: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is reading from the Cairncross report, which is not available to all hon. members of the house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Phillips: —and which has not been tabled.

Mr. Habel: Go to the library and get it.

Mr. Robichaud: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the hon. member's time has expired and it will be unnecessary to deal with the point of order.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) moved a motion for the house to go into committee of supply the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) rose to speak. After touching upon many subjects prior to coming to the particular item on which he intended to move his amendment, the Leader of the Opposition eventually moved the amendment that all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that the provision for double depreciation announced last December will prove ineffective in dealing with the problems of depressed areas, and regrets that the government has imposed the responsibility for the designation of such areas on the municipalities, and that the definition of depressed areas is too restrictive."

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition in moving this amendment had before him, as he admitted, the whole field of government action. The hon. gentleman pointed out in his preamble to this amendment that he had an opportunity to deal today with whatever problem he and his party considered was of the greatest importance and difficulty in our country at the present time. What he selected was the formula to deal with double depreciation for those areas where industrial employment has fallen off.

The Leader of the Opposition does not like the formula that has been set up by the government. The hon. gentleman said that if he had it to do he would do it differently. As I pointed out the other day, if the hon. gentleman and his party had it to do they probably would not do it at all.

It is interesting to note that the hon. member spent a good ten or 15 minutes of the time allotted to him in dealing with the sins of omission and commission which took place at the great Conservative rally which just terminated in this capital city of Canada. May I say this. What a demonstration that was of party unity and of party harmony compared with the disorganized efforts of the recent Liberal party catastrophe which took place last January. Who can ever forget the immortal television appearance of the Liberal leader or his immortal line "Better get them out of the way." Yes, the accent was on youth at that disorganized rally in January, so much so that the youth got shoved aside so the Leader of the Opposition could have his moment on television.

What a difference there was in that hurried almost panting exhibition of disorganized frenzy compared with the high-level statesmanlike discourse of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) last Friday night.

When we talk about disorganization it seems pertinent to point out that there appears to be a great deal of disorganization in the Liberal party these days. The Toronto Globe and Mail recently carried a report of a meeting held in Brantford on March 19. According to the newspaper account the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) urged the young Liberals to become the radicals of their party. She is reported to have said that the Liberal party had become conservative at the top and now was the time to build from the ground up.

Mr. Pearson: We believe in free enterprise.

Mr. Starr: Every man, woman and child in this country, as they watched and heard the Prime Minister on television when he spoke on Friday, must have felt that here was a great Prime Minister worthy of a great country. When we look at the overseas newspapers this week such as the great London Times and others, it can be seen that the Prime Minister of Canada was the dominating figure at the meeting of commonwealth prime ministers.

Mr. Speaker: I do not like to interrupt the minister but while it would be permissible, as I have indicated earlier, to reply to the reference of the Leader of the Opposition to the Conservative conference, I do not think the hon. gentleman brought in the prime ministers' conference in London and it would be quite out of order to deal with that.

Mr. Starr: I simply wanted to point out the difference between the actions of the Leader of the Opposition and those of our great Prime Minister and to illustrate in what great respect the Prime Minister is being held the world over.

What does this amendment to the motion amount to? It states that the provisions relating to double depreciation will prove ineffective. How are hon. gentlemen opposite in a position to decide this at this time?

Mr. Pearson: We can read.

Mr. Starr: This is the same old negative attitude that we have come to expect from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house, time and time again. Why do they not give this proposition a chance to work itself out?

Mr. Pickersgill: Work itself out?

Mr. Starr: How do they know it is not workable?

Mr. Pickersgill: Three and a half months.

Mr. Starr: It was announced only on March 2.

Mr. Pickersgill: December 5.

Mr. Starr: The criteria were announced on March 2. There is no use twisting and turning and attempting to say it was announced in December. In the baby budget it was announced that this proposal would be brought forward and the criteria were announced March 2.

Mr. Pickersgill: And nothing has been done since.

Mr. Starr: Why are hon. members opposite in such a rush about this if they do not believe it is of any value? The municipalities do not think in the same way as hon. members in the official opposition do.

Since I made the announcement in the House of Commons on March 2 last with respect to surplus manpower areas there have been relatively few municipalities which have made inquiries about their areas being included under the program. The first of these inquiries came from the city of Cornwall. The Department of Labour immediately contacted the mayor of Cornwall and arrangements have now been made to inquire fully into the employment and unemployment situation in that area. I expect a decision will be made within a few days in this case based on the findings in that area concerning the employment and unemployment situation in relation to the criteria that have been announced.

Requests for consideration and inquiries about the basis for including areas under the double depreciation program have also been received from Drumheller, Windsor and a few other areas. I have been rather surprised, especially in view of the concern expressed by hon. members of the official opposition, that we have not heard from more areas and localities. The fact that we have not done so, I feel, proves that there are not too many areas which regard themselves as depressed areas and that it was sound not to name these areas without first enabling the municipalities to request their inclusion subject to their meeting the test. I think that proves the fact.

Hon. members opposite say nothing has been done in respect to our economic situation. Since November 17 last this government has announced and brought down a total of 23 different measures and pieces of legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Twenty three?

Mr. Starr: Yes, 23. If the hon. member would like me to do so I should be glad to list each and every one of them and go into detail.

Mr. Hees: Go ahead.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member would be out of order but it is all right with us.

Mr. Starr: A great many of these 23 measures and pieces of legislation are "firsts" in this country. This government has not hesitated to tackle any "first" in terms of measures or legislation that would help this situation.

I might just run over the list. It includes measures relating to housing, small business, rural rehabilitation, municipal incentive, export credits, civilian rehabilitation, sewage loans and capital projects. The list is a lengthy and impressive one totalling some 23 various measures. Hon. members opposite say these things are not enough. In many cases hon. gentlemen opposite are not prepared to give these measures a chance to work out just as they are not prepared to give the measure under discussion a chance to work out. As I mentioned a moment ago, this particular measure was announced in this house on March 2. The opposition want results. This desire comes from a party which took over 20 years merely to examine health insurance in this country. What are they really saying? They are saying, "We do not like this measure; it will not work; we would have done it differently". The same speech has been used with regard to every measure that has come before this house since November 17. Whatever it is, they do not like it. It is not enough, or it is too late.

Mr. Pickersgill: Both.

Mr. Starr: Or they would have done it differently. But, Mr. Speaker, in each and every case they stood up and voted for the measures. The point is that they had the chance but they did not do any of these things. They certainly had plenty of chances.

Mr. Pickersgill: We had full employment then.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member certainly had plenty of chances in many instances to do something about the situation that existed during his term of office, or the 22 years in which his party was in power.

They say this formula is too restrictive. It is meant to be restrictive. It is an incentive formula. It is meant to be restricted to those areas in which it is needed. We want industry to go where it is needed. If you open it up wide industry will not go to those areas. Surely even the opposition can see the logic of this.

Mr. Harkness: It is logical; therefore they will never see it.

Mr. Starr: Let us look at their six-point program. Let me say that theirs is certainly not a policy of getting there first with the most. They get there last with the least.

After all those years in office, and after three years in opposition with not a peep from them about this matter or any matter like it, they wait until this government introduced a program and then they come in with a six-point program. Are they trying to tell us that in all those years of Liberal rule, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) said a moment ago, there was not a single area in Canada with problems of unemployment? Whom are they trying to kid, Mr. Speaker? What did they do about those problem areas? Not one single thing did they do. There is no record to show that they did anything about the problems that occurred in the 22 years in which they held office.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did the minister ever hear of Camp Gagetown?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member sat there for two minutes racking his brain and he came up with Camp Gagetown.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did the minister ever hear of the Canso causeway?

Mr. Pearson: And the St. Lawrence seaway?

Mr. Starr: There were many areas of unemployment during that time about which the Liberal government did nothing. Never at any time did they accept responsibility for unemployment in this country in the 22 years during which they were in office.

Mr. Pickersgill: We had full employment.

Mr. Starr: Now, in this session of parliament they want us to set up an agency which would designate depressed areas. Let me tell them that no area, and certainly no municipality in this country, is asking to be designated as a depressed area.

I want to refer to what was said by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) when he asked that his municipality should be made a depressed area. I also wish to refer to what the hon. member for Niagara Falls said as reported at page 2648 of Hansard on March 3:

> On a previous occasion I have styled as a depressed area the riding which I have the honour to represent. This has met with incredulity on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and with indifference on the part of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr).

That was on March 3, Mr. Speaker. On March 6 an editorial appeared in the Evening Review, which is published in Niagara Falls, headed, "Miss LaMarsh Off Base". It reads in part:

> In the light of recent industrial developments, this sector should not be classified as a distress area for special federal aid. Miss Judy LaMarsh, M.P., thinks otherwise, against the opinion of Labour Minister Starr.
> Let's look at the facts: $1 million addition to the Canadian Ohio Brass; another $1 million extension at the Nabisco plant and $6 million in the new Ford plant.
> With such industrial expansion it is inconceivable that our member feels we should qualify—

That is the answer with respect to the feelings of municipalities in this country when they are designated as a depressed area even by the member representing the area.

Mr. Pearson: They have to do the designating themselves.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Starr: What we are asking is very different. We are asking those municipalities and areas in which there has been a substantial decline in industrial employment to apply for designation as an area where double depreciation will be allowed to new industries. This is simple enough. In connection with the designation there is a formula. In speaking this afternoon the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) said he could not understand why 1953, as an example, was the date from which this was taken. I explained that matter on March 2. I said, as reported in Hansard at page 2569:

> The term "surplus labour market category" used in the criteria, I might explain, has reference to the classification of labour markets which has been published monthly in the Labour Gazette by the Department of Labour since 1953.

That was the first year when these figures were published and made available. That was the reason why we went back to that date. That is simple enough. I think this explains whatever the hon. member may have had in mind.

They tell us in their six-point program that they will follow suitable criteria. They do not tell us what those criteria will be. They very carefully avoid telling us what they will be except that they describe them as suitable criteria. They do not explain to us how the criteria they have in mind will differ from the criteria in existence at the present time, which we announced on March 2. For all we know their criteria may not differ at all, but they do not set that out. They bundle up a number of other things that this government is already doing and say that this is their six-point program.

They talk about a flexible fiscal policy. Surely no government has ever had a more flexible fiscal policy than has this government. That has been proven from the date when we took office. In this six-point program they talk about tax incentives. They never heard about tax incentives until we brought in this measure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Huh.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate says "huh".

Mr. Hees: He had a big dinner.

Mr. Starr: Let me ask him this. When his party formed the government, did they ever have a tax incentive plan?

Mr. Hees: Never.

Mr. Starr: Never. They say there should be special consideration in public works programs. We are doing this now. We have had the largest public works program any government ever undertook in this country.

Mr. Bourget: Public works have been going down for the last two years.

Mr. Starr: They say there should be special consideration in the winter works program, and this is what makes it special. They want us to include the cost of materials. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is really a good one. For three years now since we announced the municipal winter works program they have been tearing the program apart inside the house and outside the house. Now they want it extended.

Mr. Pickersgill: We always have.

Mr. Starr: Now they want it extended. They tore it apart. They said it was peanuts, that it was no good.

Mr. Deschatelets: That is right.

Mr. Starr: What do they do? They incorporate into the Liberal party's six-point master plan this program which was originated and inaugurated by the Progressive Conservative government three years ago. If this is what the Leader of the Opposition so frequently refers to as bold, imaginative, planning, I could not agree more. All they have to do is to pick up the measures we have brought in, demand that they go a little farther and this is the bold, imaginative action of the Liberal party. That is all they have to offer.

They want easier credit facilities and separation of the industrial development bank from the Bank of Canada. All I can say about that is that the industrial development bank started to fulfil its purpose only after this government took office. That is when it started to fulfil its purpose. Prior to that time it might as well not have existed.

They also talk about urban renewal and rural development. Mr. Speaker, these are just two more instances of measures brought in by the Progressive Conservative government and which they now seek to adopt as their own. This so-called six-point program is a phony, I submit. It is counterfeit goods, Mr. Speaker, and this is easy to prove. When you remove from their program the measures already brought in by this government, what have you left? You have a two-point program and a very feeble and shaky one at that.

I am glad that the Leader of the Opposition spent so much time in following on television the great Conservative convention and reading about it in the press. No doubt we shall soon be having more new ideas from him and his cohorts, all based on ideas already introduced by the government. But let me say this, Mr. Speaker. This method of operation makes being in the opposition a pretty simple business.

Labour Conditions

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, in his baby budget on December 20 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said, as found on page 1007 of Hansard, that he was anxious to do everything within the means of the government to encourage initiative and enterprise. In other words, he would do everything possible to stimulate our economy. Then he went on to say:

> As a powerful incentive to these ends I am pleased to announce measures to fulfil three major purposes: first, to assist new industries in areas where there is a substantial degree of continued unemployment over the years; second, to aid the development of new products from processing operations not hitherto carried on in Canada; and, third, to encourage the production of new types of goods.

The minister proposed to accomplish these things by allowing double depreciation on capital expenses incurred on new construction and new machinery purchased to accomplish these objectives. He proposed that the taxpayer would have the option of writing off these expenses on the basis of double depreciation in any one of the first three years. The need was great and, as the Minister of Finance said, the incentive was powerful but it took over two and a half months for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) to get around to announcing the regulations in the house on March 8.

Earlier on March 2 the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) announced certain very restrictive criteria which would apply and which municipalities and areas had to meet before double depreciation would be allowed. Under the regulations municipalities must apply and prove their cases. Some municipalities had been interested but when they saw in the press that not even Elliot Lake could qualify under these restrictive regulations they lost interest. I heard the Minister of Labour say earlier tonight that municipalities did not want to be classified as being distressed areas. I know of municipalities right now that do not think there is any use in applying because of what they have seen in the press concerning Elliot Lake. I will come to that matter a little later.

I heard the minister and others refer to what took place at the Conservative powwow last week and I would have thought they might refer to double depreciation but there was nothing in the press about it. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) said, "All we need is confidence and faith". He did not say whether we should have confidence and faith in the Almighty or in the Tory party. I imagine he meant the Tory party.

To my mind the Minister of Finance seemed to be in a haze and to be going about in a world of unreality.

Mr. Pickersgill: After all, it was a Tory convention.

Mr. McMillan: He did not refer to unemployment or double depreciation. To use his words, he said that there was a terrific financial mess at the time the government came into office although at that time Mr. Harris had a surplus. Rather than referring to double depreciation, the minister referred to the high interest rates under the former government; but he did not tell the convention that the average interest rate on our debt was under 3 per cent, being 2.97. He admitted that himself in his first budget speech. He did not tell the convention that he and the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) went on the air and begged, pleaded and paid the people to convert their bonds and bring the interest rate up to 4½ per cent.

I should like to refer to one other thing and then I will leave the Minister of Finance. He did not talk about the high interest rates that resulted from his excessive borrowing to meet overspending. The minister did not abandon this high interest rate policy until the press of this country called for more sanity in finance. He attempted to use more sanity in finance after that.

I would refer to that convention as a "flopnik". It certainly was a "flopnik" if you listened to the commentators. It messed around and sputtered around a bit but never got off the ground.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In the last part of his speech, the hon. member has been dealing with some things that are not mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. McMillan: I was replying to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is quite in order in replying to the minister, but latterly I think he broke new ground on his own initiative.

Mr. McMillan: Then, Mr. Speaker, I shall just say that this is a weak program put out by a weak government. I have seen several editorials concerning this double depreciation program, but I have yet to see one that is favourable. None of the editors has been able to swallow this plan, in spite of what the Minister of Labour said earlier tonight. I believe the minister mentioned Drumheller, Windsor and other places. He said that many of these areas did not want to consider themselves as depressed areas. I know of one municipality right now that would like to come under this double depreciation program for one year.

I should like to refer to some of these editorials which appeared in newspapers that are not unfavourable to this government.

Mr. Pallett: The municipality must think it is a good program.

Mr. McMillan: A number of these newspapers are always on the side of this government whenever that is possible, but apparently that is not possible in so far as this issue is concerned. The Toronto Globe and Mail of March 6, 1961, says, "No solution here". The article continues:

> The old saying about a mountain labouring and bringing forth a mouse applies to the dominion government's proposals for aiding depressed areas as outlined in the House of Commons this week by Labour Minister Michael Starr. They constitute a poorly thought out and thoroughly inadequate approach to a serious problem.
> It might have been thought that any such program would begin by naming the districts or communities which the cabinet considered to be in need of special help. But Mr. Starr indicates that the government would not designate particular areas. The local authorities would have to establish, to the cabinet's satisfaction, that their communities were economically sick.

I could continue quoting from these newspaper articles. Even the Ottawa Journal says that the government has sidestepped naming Canada's depressed areas. Similar articles have appeared in the Financial Post, the Financial Times and the Halifax Chronicle-Herald. The Halifax newspaper, which I believe supports this government, terms this a debilitated program, and I think that comment is aptly worded.

Earlier today my leader put on the record a six-point program designed to help these areas of chronic unemployment. I would predict that by tomorrow the cabinet ministers will be saying they have never heard anything about it.

In the few minutes I have left, I should like to refer to my own area. Some municipalities in my area want to know whether they can qualify under this plan for double depreciation. There are many unemployed in the city of Welland, in Port Colborne and in the Thorold area. I do not have the precise figures, but over the week end I was told there were approximately 3,000 unemployed in the city of Welland. This is quite a large number. Many young people who have just entered the labour market have been unable to get work. Industries have been cutting back their labour forces. This cut-back has been the result of automation as well as a lowering of the demand for production. These industries have been unable to sell their products. One result has been that the workers in the 40 to 45 age group have been thrown out of work.

The men in this age group cannot secure new employment because of their age. Even if a new industry were established in these areas, the men in this age group would still find it difficult to get work. I have referred before to the fact that the pension plans in many of these plants militate against older men securing employment. I believe these remarks would apply to any new plants that might be established under this double depreciation plan now proposed by the government. Even if a man in the 40 to 45 age group did take vocational training, he would still face the problem of age when he sought new employment. I think something should be done to cope with this problem. These remarks might not be quite in order, Mr. Speaker, but this is a factor in the unemployment in my area and in several other areas. Many of these people become unemployed after reaching 40, and that is the very worst time in their lives for this to happen. I feel that the government should give some consideration to this group of older workers.

I have often said in the house that something could be done through the provisions of the Income Tax Act. I think the government could provide earlier vesting in pension funds by withholding in whole or in part the right to exemptions which is allowed under the Income Tax Act. If this were done it would contribute a great deal toward helping people to find jobs. Certainly in our area a number of people have run out of unemployment insurance benefits. If a new factory were established in that area, it would help the young people. However, as I said before, you would still have the problem of the older workers. While I might be out of order, I should like to bring this problem of the older workers to the attention of the government at this time.

Some question has been raised as to whether or not the people in these areas are actually hungry. In passing, I might say that three Toronto newspapers have said there are hungry children in Toronto. During the consideration of the departmental estimates, I should like to say a word about nutrition. I think that if the government did nothing in addition to what they are now doing except to see to it that the children and others were properly nourished, they would have taken an important step at this time.

Over the week end I was talking with some officials in Welland who did not think the present regulations would allow double depreciation to the plants in Welland if they proceeded to make new products. I was informed in Welland—and I do not know whether it is so—that Welland stands second to Peterborough with the largest number of people per capita on the relief rolls in Ontario.

The government has advertised this scheme as a stimulant to our economy but I say that it is too restrictive and inflexible to be anything of the kind. This is further evidence in my opinion that the government is giving no serious consideration to the problem of unemployment. We heard the Minister of Finance say not long ago that there was no emergency in respect of unemployment. When I heard the Minister of Finance make that remark, and when I looked at these measures brought forward by the government, I came to the conclusion that the government is not taking the matter of unemployment very seriously at all.

We heard the Minister of Labour announce the criteria the municipalities would have to meet before they could be classified as surplus manpower areas. I suggest that announcement is the biggest farce that I have ever heard in this House of Commons. According to the explanatory memorandum of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as tabled here not long ago, these areas will be eligible, under certain regulations, to be declared as surplus manpower areas by the governor in council. Municipalities must apply on certain prescribed forms and the Department of Trade and Commerce will then decide whether they are eligible as areas for double depreciation. These regulations, as I said, must be complied with in order that the governor in council can name a municipality as a surplus manpower area entitled to the double depreciation. I would appeal to the government to give to the criteria a more generous interpretation than they have indicated will be given so far in this debate.

I think it is natural that the people in my riding of Welland would be very happy indeed to have a new industry established there. I feel that this would certainly allow many of the young people to go to work and would, I hope, as well provide jobs for the older unemployed workers. I would again appeal to the government on behalf of the older workers for the establishment of a portable pension. I might suggest that no matter what trade an older man took up he would still be faced with the problem regarding his age; and he would certainly benefit greatly by the establishment of a portable pension which, as the Minister of Finance has said, could be easily done through the provisions of the Income Tax Act. If this were done I feel that many of these people would be able to continue working rather than be forced to lead lives of uncertainty, as they are bound to do for the rest of their lives without it.

(Translation):

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is not without some curiosity that the hon. members of this house have been awaiting the amendment to this motion which we expected from the official opposition in the course of this debate. We were thinking, and not without reason, that in view of the variety of subjects of interest to this house, perhaps for once the Liberal opposition would get away from its pet subject and would mount another horse than its traditional subject of unemployment conditions in North America.

Our curiosity has been disappointed once again. As we now know, our Liberal friends have again decided to go on discussing unemployment.

It is quite obvious for hon. members of this house that our friends in the opposition have little to complain about, and it is probably because they are short of arguments that they go on repeating, practically on the same note, the same old song on the unemployment problem. There are those among them who discuss it in rather bitter terms, perhaps because they are of a bilious nature; others deal with it in a sarcastic way, perhaps on the theory that by being funny, they may gain forgiveness for their own ignorance in relation to other problems. The fact is, however, that they keep repeating the same thing over and over again, obviously in the hope of gaining some political prestige by capitalizing on the hardships of those who, unfortunately, in Canada as elsewhere in North America, and through economic circumstances beyond our control, now find themselves swelling the ranks of the unemployed.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), at the outset of his remarks this afternoon, strongly denied that he or his associates were using this unemployment situation to make political hay. Certainly, I would not want to raise doubts about the word of so distinguished a man as the Leader of the Opposition, yet I do regard as rather strange this constant repetition of the same arguments in this house, on the political hustings, on television and elsewhere, always on the same subject, without ever a change of tone. This leads me to believe that there is certainly an underlying political motive.

I recall, for instance, what happened in this house on February 2 last, when just to put on an act for the benefit of members of the labour congress who were here at the time, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) rose and despite interruptions from the chairman and from others who were seeking to restore order, proceeded to repeat the same arguments merely to put on a show meant to impress the members of that group who were in the gallery at the time. If hon. members go back over the official record of that discussion which took place on February 2 last, I think they will, like myself, come to the conclusion that the hon. member for Essex East in his remarks was thinking much less of the plight of our Canadian unemployed than of the political fate of the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the opposition should go on blaming the government for an economic situation which was largely the result of its own lack of foresight when the Liberal party was looking after this country's business, and of economic circumstances of considerable scope which are not only felt here in Canada, but throughout the North American continent.

One thing is certain, Mr. Speaker, there is too much unemployment, not only in some areas of this country, but everywhere in North America. However, I believe that it is important to look for the causes behind that situation elsewhere than in the present government's activities, because the situation is the result of events shaped by the second world war and the period which followed the victory in 1945.

It is important to remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1939, at a time when the nation was headed by a Liberal government, there was a tremendous amount of unemployment in Canada. In fact, if I remember correctly, I think the rate of unemployment was between 9 and 10 per cent; and without the world disruption caused by the second world war, it is certain that the government at the time would have been very hard put to find a solution to this unemployment problem which had been in existence for four years and was baffling the experts. However, war broke out and all the efforts of Canada's citizens as well as those of citizens of other countries, were concentrated on defence. The government was thus able to use all those energies, and war did away with the hideous spectre of unemployment which had been plaguing the nation under the Liberal government in 1939.

In 1945, the war fortunately, came to an end. The people of the world, at that time, were so anxious to get the things they had been deprived of during the war years that they turned to industry and trade in an attempt to acquire those things which make our standard of living perhaps the highest in the world. It seemed that the mass of buyers who wished to have a house, furniture, a refrigerator, a car, or any of those things which make modern life so enjoyable was inexhaustible. The whole world wanted to have the comfort of which it had been deprived, and that explains why our industry, like that of the United States, went through unprecedented development.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, these countries devastated by war were bound to reconstruct their economy and came here to get those products which, unfortunately their destroyed industries could not produce. But today, circumstances have changed, so that in some sectors of our economy, where previously production could not keep up with demand, we now have a surplus production.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, those countries who suffered from the second world war have now reconstructed their economy and instead of importing are now exporting, the result being that, today, German, French, British, Italian and Japanese products are competing with American and Canadian products on all world markets.

This means that the law of supply and demand is still playing the same part it always played during the second world war, and particularly during the post-war years, with this difference that in certain spheres of the Canadian and American economy, we are going through a period when supply is greater than demand. This is the reason for unemployment in certain areas where manufacturers have to produce less of the goods that is not easily marketable.

This also explains why some businessmen are experiencing some difficulty in selling Canadian products which come in competition with those now being manufactured in those war devastated countries that are once again prosperous and that are competing with us on domestic and world markets.

The facts I have just referred to, Mr. Speaker, are well known to the members of the Liberal opposition. However, always in the hope of achieving the political aims that obsess them, our good friends in the opposition keep on blaming the government for all the evils and the uneasiness which affect our economy in certain places. Moreover, they choose to disregard completely the fact that this government has already taken every sound and reasonable step possible to maintain the economy at its present level. Our friends also continue to speak of distress, of chaos, of disorder and of poverty, in spite of the fact that the reports of Canadian companies show that 1960 has been, once again, a record year; in spite of the fact that, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, more workers are presently employed in Canadian industry than ever before in our history; in spite of the fact that our export trade, thanks to the imaginative policy of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees), is expanding; and in spite of the fact that chartered bank reports indicate that, during 1960, more money was earned by more Canadians than ever before in the history of our country and that, notwithstanding the fact that more money was spent, the savings level exceeded all previous records.

But this does not satisfy our hon. friends and, in spite of the fact that our economy is really doing fine, they go on preaching their policy of gloom and doom, and this, I repeat, with the sole object of making political capital at the expense of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is ten o'clock. May I resume my seat?

(Text):

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house leader could give us any guidance on the program beyond tomorrow. Is the program the same?

Mr. Churchill: The program stands, Mr. Speaker, but I might repeat it so it is available to hon. members in Hansard. Tomorrow there will be a continuation of this debate. On Wednesday we will deal with interim supply, and if there is time that will be followed by supplementary estimates.

On Thursday we will deal with the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture with respect to agricultural development, followed by the estimates of the Department of Agriculture on Thursday and Friday. Should those estimates be completed on Friday, we will deal with the estimates of the Post Office Department.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS, LONDON, MARCH 8-17, 1961.

Final Communiqué

The meeting of commonwealth prime ministers was concluded today. Pakistan, Ghana and Cyprus were represented by their presidents. The other commonwealth countries were represented by their prime ministers.

It had been agreed that on this occasion the prime ministers would concentrate their main attention on a limited number of specific problems which are currently of common concern to them all—namely, disarmament, the structure of the United Nations and certain constitutional problems affecting the commonwealth itself. At the outset of the meeting, however, the prime ministers held a general review of the international situation as a whole, in order to set these particular problems in the perspective of current world events. They also considered, in the course of their meeting, recent developments in the Congo and in southeast Asia.

The prime ministers reaffirmed the support of their governments for the efforts of the United Nations to restore order in the Congo and to secure the independence and integrity of the republic. They deplored outside intervention in the Congo and recognized that many of the problems which had arisen were due to such intervention. They considered that United Nations forces in the Congo should be strengthened and that the security council resolution of February 21 should be fully implemented.

The prime ministers noted with concern the situation which had developed in Laos. They expressed the hope that the parties would be able to reconcile their differences, that intervention from outside would cease, and that Laos would be enabled to enjoy an independent, neutral and peaceful existence.

The prime ministers held a full discussion on the problem of disarmament. They recognized that this was the most important question facing the world today and considered that a favourable opportunity was now at hand for a fresh initiative toward a settlement of it. They agreed that the aim should be to achieve general and complete disarmament, subject to effective inspection and control, on the general lines indicated in the statement in Annex I of this communiqué. They recalled the resolution on general and complete disarmament which was adopted unanimously at the fourteenth session of the general assembly. They agreed that every effort should be made to implement this resolution by agreement between the major powers and that further negotiations for this purpose were necessary. Certain proposals designed to promote such negotiations have been put by various countries before the United Nations.

The prime ministers expressed their hope that the negotiations on the cessation of nuclear weapons tests, which were due to reopen at Geneva on March 21, would lead to the early conclusion of an agreement on this subject. Such an agreement, apart from its importance in itself, would provide a powerful impetus toward agreement on disarmament generally.

The prime ministers considered the various proposals which have recently been put forward for changes in the structure of the United Nations—including, in particular, the structure of its councils, the position of the secretary general and the organization of the secretariat. They recognized that such changes could only be made with general consent. They agreed that, whatever adjustments might be made, it remained vitally important to uphold the purposes and principles of the United Nations charter and to preserve the international and independent character of the secretariat. They further agreed that members of the commonwealth shared with all nations a fundamental common interest in maintaining the integrity of the United Nations as a force for orderly political, economic and social progress throughout the world.

The prime ministers also discussed certain constitutional questions relating to commonwealth membership. The conclusions reached were announced in communiques issued on March 13, 15 and 16 relating, respectively, to Cyprus, South Africa and Sierra Leone. The text of these communiqués is reproduced in Annex II.

Annex I to Final Communiqué

Aim

1. The aim must be to achieve total worldwide disarmament, subject to effective inspection and control.

2. In view of the slaughter and destruction experienced in so-called "conventional" wars and of the difficulty of preventing a conventional war, once started, from developing into a nuclear war, our aim must be nothing less than the complete abolition of the means of waging war of any kind.

Principles

3. An agreement for this purpose should be negotiated as soon as possible, on the basis of the following principles—

(a) All national armed forces and armaments must be reduced to the levels agreed to be necessary for internal security.

(b) Once started, the process of disarmament should be continued without interruption until it is completed, subject to verification at each stage that all parties are duly carrying out their undertakings.

(c) The elimination of nuclear and conventional armaments must be so phased that at no stage will any country or group of countries obtain a significant military advantage.

(d) In respect of each phase there should be established, by agreement, effective machinery of inspection, which should come into operation simultaneously with the phase of disarmament to which it relates.

(e) Disarmament should be carried out as rapidly as possible in progressive stages, within specified periods of time.

(f) At the appropriate stage, a substantial and adequately armed military force should be established, to prevent aggression and enforce observance of the disarmament agreement: and an international authority should be created, in association with the United Nations, to control this force and to ensure that it is not used for any purpose inconsistent with the charter.

4. On the basis of the above principles, it should be possible, given good will on both sides, to reconcile the present differences of approach between the different plans put forward.

Negotiations

5. The principle military powers should resume direct negotiations without delay in close contact with the United Nations, which is responsible for disarmament under the charter. Since peace is the concern of the whole world, other nations should also be associated with the disarmament negotiations, either directly or through some special machinery to be set up by the United Nations, or by both means.

6. Side by side with the political negotiations, experts should start working out the details of the inspection systems required for the measures of disarmament applicable to each stage in accordance with the practice adopted at the Geneva nuclear tests conference.

7. Every effort should be made to secure rapid agreement to the permanent banning of nuclear weapons tests by all nations and to arrangements for verifying the observance of the agreement. Such an agreement is urgent, since otherwise further countries may soon become nuclear powers, which would increase the danger of war and further complicate the problem of disarmament. Moreover, an agreement on nuclear tests, apart from its direct advantages, would provide a powerful psychological impetus to agreement over the wider field of disarmament.

8. Disarmament without inspection would be as unacceptable as inspection without disarmament. Disarmament and inspection are integral parts of the same question and must be negotiated together; and both must be made as complete and effective as is humanly possible. It must, however, be recognized that no safeguards can provide one hundred per cent protection against error or treachery. Nevertheless, the risks involved in the process of disarmament must be balanced against the risks involved in the continuance of the arms race.

9. It is arguable whether the arms race is the cause or the result of distrust between nations. But it is clear that the problems of disarmament and international confidence are closely linked. Therefore, while striving for the abolition of armaments, all nations must actively endeavour to reduce tension by helping to remove other causes of friction and suspicion.

Annex II to Final Communiqué

CYPRUS

(Communiqué issued March 13)

At their meeting this morning the commonwealth prime ministers accepted a request from the Republic of Cyprus for admission to commonwealth membership. They invited the president of the republic to join the meeting.

SOUTH AFRICA

At their meetings this week the commonwealth prime ministers have discussed questions affecting South Africa.

On March 13 the Prime Minister of South Africa informed the meeting that, following the plebiscite in October 1960, the appropriate constitutional steps were now being taken to introduce a republican form of constitution in the union, and that it was the desire of the union government that South Africa should remain within the commonwealth as a republic.

In connection with this application the meeting also discussed, with the consent of the Prime Minister of South Africa, the racial policy followed by the union government. The Prime Minister of South Africa informed the other prime ministers this evening that in the light of the views expressed on behalf of other member governments and the indications of their future intentions regarding the racial policy of the union government, he had decided to withdraw his application for South Africa's continuing membership in the commonwealth as a republic.

SIERRA LEONE

The prime ministers noted that Sierra Leone would attain independence on April 27.

They looked forward to welcoming Sierra Leone as a member of the commonwealth on the completion of the necessary constitutional processes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 21, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—APPEARANCE OF GOVERNOR BEFORE BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the great interest that has been aroused by statements of the governor of the Bank of Canada I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can see any reason why the governor should not be asked to appear before the banking and commerce committee which is now in session.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, questions like that are for the determination of the appropriate committee and decision by such committee.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. In the event that the banking and commerce committee should decide to summon the governor of the bank, would the Minister of Finance, because of his relationship with the governor, provide any obstacle to acceptance on the part of the governor?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The Minister of Finance does not create obstacles at any time in the way of doing anything that is proper—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This minister does.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and he commends that example to the obstructionist member for Essex East.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

REPORTED DEVELOPMENT OF NEW REGIONAL BOMB

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to give the House of Commons any information on the alarming statement in this morning's Globe and Mail attributed to Dr. Keenleyside that there is a regional bomb now on the drawing boards capable of scourging and sucking into a cloud the whole of Ontario from Ottawa to Windsor if detonated from a height of 200 to 300 miles?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister wants to undertake to answer a question of that kind he may do so, but I take it there is no suggestion that it is on the drawing boards in Canada or that it is the responsibility of any Canadian minister of the crown.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is no reference as to whose drawing board it is on. In my view this is a question of great national importance, and in the light of our international relations and the fact that this matter has to do with defence and external affairs I think it is appropriate to ask the government whether they have any knowledge of a regional bomb now on anybody's drawing board that could destroy most of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has not really brought out any fact which indicates responsibility on the part of any member of the ministry sitting in this house, but if he wishes to ask a specific minister whether he has such an instrument on his drawing board I think the question would be permitted.

Mr. Argue: I will ask the question in this way. Has the minister any comment to make on the statement that there is on the drawing boards, either in Canada or any other place—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I cannot accept the question in that form. If the hon. member is prepared to ask whether or not some such activity is the responsibility of the minister, then I suggest he ask the minister that question in order to establish his right to pursue the matter.

Mr. Argue: I suggest that this question is something about which this government must have some concern. I should think it would have an opinion, and if the question is not appropriate for the Minister of National Defence then perhaps it could be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would ask whether this government has any knowledge of a bomb of this kind being on the drawing boards any place in the world.

Mr. Speaker: I think I would accept that question.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of any bomb of this sort being on the drawing boards any place. I might say, in connection with this general report of the speech made by Mr. Keenleyside, that there are a lot of other statements in it which I think are subject to very grave doubts.

[Later:]

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this may be considered a question supplementary to that asked by my leader a few minutes ago. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he would confirm or comment on the claim made in Toronto last night by Dr. Hugh Keenleyside, who is the president of the Canadian national committee for the control of radiation hazards, that, to use his words, "Russia has about 70,000 bombs available". If the minister confirms this statement, does he continue—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is going outside our practice in asking for confirmation of a factual statement for which the minister has no responsibility, on a subject for which he has no responsibility.

Mr. Regier: Perhaps I might rephrase my question. Is the government aware of the claim that Russia has 70,000 bombs available, and if so is the present policy of the government on civil defence really a contribution to world peace and security?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, to begin with I may say that Mr. Keenleyside, I think, has no—

Mr. Regier: Dr. Keenleyside.

Mr. Harkness: —more knowledge of how many bombs are available in Russia than have most people in this chamber. Any estimate as to the number of bombs which may be held by Russia is of course only an estimate, and I have no intention in the world of saying what our estimate is.

However, I would suggest that the mention by Dr. Keenleyside of 70,000 as though this were a definite fact is pure guesswork on his part without any foundation in fact whatsoever. Furthermore, if the Russians have 70,000 bombs, that is not the material thing. The material thing is how many of those bombs they might be able to deliver in an attack on this continent and on the countries of western Europe, and that depends not on the number of bombs they have but on the carriers they have for the delivery of those bombs.

INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF TALKS CONCERNING TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask if he is in a position to give the house any information regarding the resumption of nuclear test talks. I ask this question because of the minister's well known interest in the restriction of nuclear weapons in this country.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the house is fully aware, this government remains firmly opposed to the testing of nuclear and thermonuclear weapons. Agreement among the nuclear powers on a definitive cessation of such tests under effective international control would give a welcome assurance that the world would be safeguarded against the hazards they entail. Therefore we are greatly encouraged by the many indications there are that the United States will put forward new and far reaching proposals in a sincere attempt to bridge the remaining differences that separate them from the U.S.S.R. in this field.

This development brings fresh hope to governments and peoples in all countries, large and small, whose interests are so intimately caught up in the success or failure of the Geneva talks. I understand that it will take some days for the new United States position to be outlined in its entirety to the Soviet side. Of course during that period we will be watching with interest and concern to see how the U.S.S.R. will respond to these advances.

As the hon. member for Essex East knows, these talks were commenced in October, 1958, I think it was, and during that time there has been a moratorium on further nuclear tests by the three nations engaged in the talks. This moratorium continues today. We are very hopeful that there will be beneficial results when the talks are resumed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the hon. gentleman's well known position, as well as that of the government, that there should be a cessation of nuclear tests, may I ask the hon. gentleman if it is the policy of the government to continue to oppose any extension of the countries that might become possessors of nuclear weapons?

Mr. Green: Well, now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, as he quite often does, laid a foundation and then asked a question that was not related to that foundation at all but to an entirely different subject. This government, as I say, has been against any further nuclear tests and that continues to be the policy.

INCOME TAX

CHARITABLE DONATIONS—REPORTED CHECKING OF BOOKS OF ROMAN CATHOLIC PRESBYTERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether, in view of the report in this morning's Globe and Mail, he is able to deny or confirm the allegation that the department is making special efforts at this time to look over the books of Roman Catholic presbyteries in order to compare their revenues with the receipts for charity donations presented by taxpayers for income tax purposes.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to telephone me a few moments ago, but he did not give me a copy of his question. I did read the article, and all I can say in answer to his question is that the same practice is being carried out in the city of Quebec as elsewhere in the province of Quebec and throughout Canada. It has always been the practice of this department to check on charitable donations from time to time, and when they are excessively large they are checked very carefully.

Mr. Regier: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the public charge made in this newspaper that $75 million has been lost to the federal government because of fraudulent receipts, will the government make a public announcement at an early date that will completely clear the reputation of the Quebec clergy of this serious accusation?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, the reputation of the clergy of Quebec is not involved in this matter. The clergy of the province of Quebec have naturally as high a standard of integrity and honesty as any clergy in Canada. There is no suspicion, no suggestion and no allegation of anything in this matter. What the Department of National Revenue is doing in this case is carrying on a practice which has been carried on for years, in checking, particularly at this time of the year, on charitable donations and other factors which arise in checking income tax returns.

Mr. Regier: May I ask another supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the press has been using quite blunt language, speaking of a tax Gestapo with regard to those who are now making inquiries in the province of Quebec about receipts for charitable donations, could the minister tell the house whether he has received, either officially or unofficially, complaints from anyone about that matter?

(Text):

Mr. Nowlan: To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, I have not received any official complaints. Several members of parliament spoke to me yesterday about this matter in view of letters which I believe they had received. I was informed that a letter was coming to me from some of the clergy asking for clarification of certain practices of the department but to the best of my knowledge there has been nothing of that kind received up to this time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROGRAM "HERE LIES MRS. MORIARTY"—INQUIRY AS TO PROTESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pratt (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Could the minister inform the house whether any protests have been received by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in regard to a television program entitled "Here lies Mrs. Moriarty", written by Richard Morris and Michael Leighton, produced by Mel Breen and presented by General Motors Corporation, in which a story set in Ireland portrays every single one of a dozen so-called Irish characters as either liars, idiots, thieves, drunkards, corrupt officials or corrupt clergymen, murderers, or as possessing various combinations of these rather undesirable characteristics? In view of the fact that not one single decent character was to be found anywhere among the Irish characters, and in order to protect the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation staff from possible mayhem, could the minister use whatever influence he may have to persuade the C.B.C. to avoid such studied insults to a friendly people, at least during the week of their national celebration?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I can assure this house that I have no influence for the protection of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation officials against anything, not even attacks by Conservative members of parliament or anyone else. I have been informed that there have been six telephone calls received in Ottawa and four in the city of Montreal, and that is the extent of the complaints. Mr. Blackburn, a columnist of some reputation in Canada, has said that this was the finest example of wit and humour he has ever seen the C.B.C. put on television. I have spoken to several people of Irish descent, who have not been so far removed from the "ould sod" that they have lost their sense of humour, who also appreciated it, as I did myself.

PUBLIC WORKS

SEWAGE DISPOSAL PLANTS—PROTESTS RESPECTING LOAN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister received any complaints from smaller municipalities to the effect that they find the regulations in respect to loans for the construction of sewage disposal plants somewhat too restrictive, as they only provide for front line sewers and things of that sort, and also that in their opinion they to some extent lack definition?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, no matter what the government does and no matter how noteworthy it is, we always get complaints. In this instance we have received a few complaints because municipalities both large and small would like us to further extend this sewage plant legislation. However, the hon. member, who is an authority on this subject, will appreciate that we have limited funds. We are anxious to have the municipalities instal sewage disposal plants and we would like to go just as far as possible, but in putting through all sorts of piping our money would run out and we would not get the desired result. I hope that answers the question.

(Translation):

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO PLANS AND LOCATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister tell us whether the plans for the Champlain bridge and its junctions have been drawn up and, if so, at what location will this bridge connect with Montreal island?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did not get any notice of this question. As far as I am concerned, the Champlain bridge plans are certainly completed. With regard to the exact location where that bridge will connect with Montreal island, discussions were held with the city of Montreal in this regard and the matter is being looked into at present.

(Text):

COMBINES

TRADING STAMPS—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Following a statement by the general manager of the retail merchants association that their brief for a clear-cut ban on trading stamps has had a sympathetic reception by the government, can we expect any legislation on trading stamps this session?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this is of course a matter which can only be answered in the usual way, that if and when a decision is reached to proceed on the matter, it will be announced in due course.

Mr. Pickersgill: "If".

SHIPPING

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUESTS FOR ASSISTANCE TO SEALING SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received requests for assistance from masters and crews of sealing ships off the east coast of Newfoundland and, if so, what action has been taken?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I was handed notice of this question as I was walking up to the house. However, I am able to inform the hon. member that we have in effect received requests from masters of sealing vessels, and the attention of my department has been brought to this matter many times in the last few days by the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

I have investigated the matter. Our icebreakers around Newfoundland at the present time are extremely busy on account of the very heavy ice season. They are all engaged at the present time in their priority work in that area, which is clearing cargo vessels. Nevertheless I can assure the house that every consideration is being given to this request from the masters of sealing vessels. We shall do our best to help them, but unfortunately many of those vessels are more than two or three days away from the icebreakers. I assure the hon. member that the matter is under constant study and every step that could be helpful will be taken.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—MEETING OF LABOUR, MANAGEMENT AND GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. On March 1 the minister informed the house, in reply to a question by the Leader of the Opposition, that there would be a conference held between the government of Nova Scotia, the united mine workers and the government of Canada to deal with the coal situation, and that some tentative arrangements had been made to hold such a conference during the week of March 20. My question is, has such a conference been arranged, and has the government any proposals to put before that conference which will provide alternative employment to Nova Scotia coal miners when the mines are shut down?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): That question, of course, was asked yesterday by another hon. member, the hon. member for Gloucester, of my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, and he answered it at that time.

Mr. Argue: I checked the record and I did not find a question in the terms in which I put it. Could the minister inform the house whether such a conference is going to be held this week?

Mr. Nowlan: The conference was held yesterday.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE—PROVISION OF STAND-BY AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked the following question:

> Can the minister indicate whether an aircraft, which I understand has the designation C-5, flew to London last week as a stand-by aircraft in order to ensure that the Prime Minister and other members of the delegation to the commonwealth prime ministers' conference could be back home at a particular time?

In reply I should like first of all to point out that the Royal Canadian Air Force sends regular flights of aircraft every week from Canada to Europe and back in order to transport reinforcements for the air division and the brigade which are over there, and to bring back people who are coming back home on reposting to Canada, to ferry supplies and so forth.

As one of these regular flights, which go on at all times, a C-5 trans-Atlantic flight was scheduled for March 14 from Ottawa to London and return. This flight was scheduled to coincide with the Prime Minister's return so it could be used as an alternative aircraft in the event that any difficulty was experienced with the Comet in which the Prime Minister was due to fly back to Canada. The flight was scheduled to carry a normal load of service passengers both eastbound and westbound. It is normal practice to reschedule a transport operation to provide a back-up for an aircraft carrying a head of state. In all such cases the aircraft is employed on a required transportation task.

UNITED NATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs may recall, I asked what action the Canadian government proposed to take to carry out the United Nations resolution, which Canada supported, to the effect that influence should be brought to bear on South Africa to change its policy in the trust territory of South West Africa. The hon. gentleman said that he was not in a position to reply on Friday. I wonder whether he is in a position to reply today.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): If the hon. member will look at the latter part of my answer he will notice that I said that this resolution was designed to influence the commonwealth conference which, by that time, had ended.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

MONTREAL—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN COST OF METROPOLITAN BOULEVARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): The premier of Quebec having stated recently that the metropolitan boulevard in Montreal will be considered as part of the trans-Canada highway, will the Minister of Public Works tell the house whether the federal government will be required to pay part of the cost of this boulevard?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member has not given me notice of this question, but I think it is public knowledge that under the Trans-Canada Highway Act, which was enacted in 1949, contributions by the federal government to any part of a highway used in any province and built before 1949 are allowed; but with respect to any part of a highway subsequently used by a province as part of the trans-Canada highway which was built after the act came into force but before that province came into the scheme as a member under contract to build the trans-Canada highway, that part of the highway, of course, cannot qualify for payments from the dominion government. This has been so in British Columbia and in Nova Scotia, which were late in coming into the trans-Canada highway scheme. The result was that any part of the highway built by them before the date they came in but after 1949 was not included as a part of the highway to which the dominion government could make a contribution.

Therefore, carrying the analogy to the province of Quebec—I have not studied the particular highway to which my hon. friend refers—the same principle would apply. If the highway was built between the time the legislation was first enacted and the time that Quebec came into the scheme, it would not qualify for participation under the terms of the act.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR LATEST STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Can the Minister of Labour indicate to the house when it is expected that the most recent set of unemployment figures will be made public?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Fairly soon.

Mr. Argue: Too soon for the government.

HARBOURS

MOOSONEE, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO JOINT SURVEY REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works a question based upon the eager anticipation expressed by Premier Frost in the Ontario legislative assembly about the joint survey report on the requirements needed to make Moosonee a seaport. Will this report be available soon? If so, will it be a public document?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, up to the present time I have not received any report. Therefore it would not be possible for me to give a positive answer to a question which at the present time is in the realm of possibility. As and when we get a report we will make a decision on that matter and also make an announcement in the house.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—EFFECT OF DOUBLE DEPRECIATION IN DEPRESSED AREAS

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, last night at ten o'clock I had given the reasons which, in my opinion, have caused a slow-down in our economy and provoked unemployment. I should like for a moment to comment on this very question of unemployment and to give my opinion on the seriousness of this problem.

There is no doubt that the present number of unemployed is far too great; in fact any unemployment at all is undesirable in a wealthy country such as Canada. It is obvious, however, that the present figures do not indicate the real nature of the problem, and are so made up as to exaggerate its importance. In a well documented speech made in this house on March 9 last the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Morissette) gave us a breakdown of the unemployment figure which is worthy of note. The statistical figures to which he referred indicate that about 20 per cent of the jobless are young people still in their teens. It is obvious that the labour market is unusually crowded by thousands of young people who normally should be in school in order to prepare themselves for the tasks of life. These statistics also show that the proportion of unemployed is much higher among non-specialized workers than among those who have trades. This is why many advantages will result from the technical and vocational training program which is now in force.

It is obvious also, in view of the fact that the number of farm workers has been reduced by 300,000 over the last 10 years, that automation on the farm has taken its toll of farm workers, who now must look to the cities in order to find work. It is therefore urgent to educate those young people and give them trades in order to give them the chance they deserve to find a place for themselves in the nation's industries.

It also seems that the labour market is employing a greater number of women and the rate of unemployment among women is less than the rate among men. While the female population has provided almost half the labour force in the last few years, it has suffered much less than the male population from economic fluctuations. The number of married women drawing unemployment insurance under present conditions is abnormally high, and the increase of female labour in the labour market presents a sociological problem which those who analyse the employment situation should study very closely.

In the light of the above facts it is not unreasonable to state that although we deplore bitterly the presence of unemployment in Canada, the situation is not as critical as the members of the opposition would like it to be, and the measures adopted by the Conservative party should serve to bring about a solution both from the short term point of view and the long term outlook.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon the Leader of the Opposition said in a most sarcastic tone that very few statements had been made about unemployment during the recent Conservative convention held last week.

That does not mean that the leaders of the Conservative government are not concerned about this unemployment problem which unfortunately affects certain areas of this country. On the contrary, I do not hesitate to say that the government's main care has been to apply itself to improve the lot of the unemployed, and I can state that all the ministers made every effort to seek solutions that would maintain the level of our economy and ease the sad plight of the jobless.

We, on this side of the house, do not believe that there is much to be gained by going around with dismal and sad faces where conventions are held and speaking constantly of doom and gloom, as the Liberals do. On the contrary, we believe it is more advisable to spread a little joy and hope around us. And, with all due deference to hon. members in the opposition, especially to my good friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), those who came here last week to take part in the convention of the Conservative party wanted, by their good humour and their support, to congratulate us for a job well done and to encourage us to continue in the course that we have chosen to follow.

Of course, our Liberal friends do not share this view and we can well expect them to continue to go around with long faces, spreading fear, gloom, despair and panic everywhere, always with the aim of making political capital. While following such a course, the Liberals now and then offer suggestions which, I must say, are not without merit. In those cases, we are eager to study them and occasionally to adopt them. Sometimes their suggestions concern things which have already been accomplished. For example, in the six-point program mentioned yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition in his speech, we find commonplaces, measures which are already in force and which are already a part of our own program. Let us take for example, the first point of his speech, where he suggests that a study be undertaken in co-operation with provincial and municipal authorities in order to determine the seriousness of the situation in areas where there is a manpower surplus. I must point out, Mr. Speaker, that this study has been going on for many years. In fact it is as a result of such a survey that the government decided to bring forward a winter works program which, though bitterly attacked in the beginning by the members of the opposition, is now recognized in all the different circles interested in labour problems as a dynamic program which has provided employment for thousands of our citizens, I would even say for hundreds of thousands of our citizens since its inception.

It is also because we must consider this matter of co-operation with provincial authorities that we have initiated this program of technical training for Canada's labourers, in order to provide unskilled workers with a trade that will enable them to fit in the nation's economy.

We also note that in other points of their program, the Liberals suggest that studies be made with a view to providing the country with a more flexible fiscal policy. The Liberals know full well that a degree of flexibility already exists in the financial policies of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and that improvements have already been made, such as the reduction in corporation income tax which was brought about by raising from $25,000 to $35,000 the taxable income of Canadian corporations.

Is it not also true that to make it easier for small manufacturers to borrow money, we have asked chartered banks to grant long term loans to such small manufacturers and businessmen who wish to improve their plant or industry? According to the latest statistics, that measure should increase the flow of money in Canada by an additional amount of $300 million, and perhaps more.

Is it not also true that as a result of the imaginative public works program applied by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker), over $54 million are being put into circulation?

In the housing field, one of the main sources of employment for our people, we find that thanks to the measures put forward by the Minister of Public Works, the number of housing starts in the current year has reached 7,000, as compared to less than 1,000 for a similar period last year.

Mr. Speaker, those are only a few of the solutions devised and put into force by the present government to correct the present economic problems in Canada and, once more, to provide employment for the unemployed.

The Conservative government has also put forward other measures, such as water purification, which should soon enable municipalities to carry out plants they have long been dreaming about.

Mr. Speaker, the list of the Conservative government's accomplishments is a long one, and I have mentioned only a few examples because of the limited time at my disposal. I should now like to go on to another subject.

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, I see that my friends on the other side make fun of my remarks. I hope they will listen closely to what comes next; it should be a lesson to them and should perhaps be of some influence on their program of action.

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has recognized that Canada's economic prospects for the future are already much brighter. That statement on his part is to his credit, and I commend him for it. However, his statement would have carried much more weight if the Leader of the Opposition had recognized that this improvement in the Canadian economy was due, in part, to the action by the Conservative government. However, that would be difficult in view of the policy of gloom and doom which the Liberal party has been using as the main plank of its program.

There is no doubt that we shall go on hearing members of the Liberal opposition preach gloom and doom in all their speeches and whenever they have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We shall do our duty.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that for three very specific reasons, such a policy on the part of what was once the great Liberal party poses a serious threat to Canada's economic life.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Nonsense.

Mr. Sevigny: Is it not true that when doubt is consistently spread in the hearts and minds of the Canadian people with regard to the value of this country's economy, while exaggerating the importance of unemployment in Canada, the Liberals succeed in producing panic and fear so that anyone wanting to enlarge his business and develop it to some extent, or perhaps create a new industry, will think twice about it and put off his projects?

Is it not a fact that by constantly hearing about imminent distress, people in Canada hesitate before buying certain goods they need, and that that decreases purchasing power and business turnover?

Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to tell Liberal members that by always speaking of unemployment and disaster, they are, themselves, creating unemployment and disaster. And the main promoters of the economic uneasiness now prevailing in this country are the Leader of the Opposition, and hon. members for Essex East, Laurier, Bonavista-Twillingate, and all the members of the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker, I am now coming to a second and very important part of my remarks. By endlessly dwelling on doom and gloom as the Liberals have been doing, and getting the press to fill its columns with tales about an apparently deplorable situation in this country—

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Ricard: That hurts.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. Associate Minister of National Defence is letting himself be carried away by his own enthusiasm, which is expressed mainly in this house, but not at public meetings. However, I want to say, in connection with the point of order, that we, in the Liberal party have never forced—

(Text):

Mr. Thrasher: Order.

Mr. Bourget: You do not even understand what I am saying.

Some hon. Members: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to state that members of the Liberal party, particularly the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member for Levis to state his point of order.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, if I were only given time to state my point. May I be given time to explain?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Levis knows that, when speaking on a point of order, the point raised must immediately be stated, so that the Chair may determine whether the point of order is rightly taken or not.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, in order to show the nature of the point of order, I wanted to comment on some remarks which the minister has just made. He said the members of the Liberal party were forcing the press to spread the news he mentioned a moment ago; he said that everything was going wrong. In no circumstances have we ever asked the press to publish such things—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ricard: That hurts you too much.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Levis is not a point of order; it is merely a difference of opinion which may normally be expressed when an hon. member has obtained the floor, or at the end of a speech, if an hon. member has misinterpreted the remarks of another member of this house.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, I must say to the hon. member that he is quite right; no doubt I did not express myself clearly. Certainly I would not like to say that the hon. members of the opposition have imposed their views on the press. What I wanted to say, rather, was that the newspapermen report the remarks they hear. That is certainly not the result of some undue influence on the part of hon. members of the opposition. I apologize if I have hurt the susceptibility of my hon. friend.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I apologize, but in view of the lengthy discussion on that point of order, I would ask to be allowed additional time in order that I may complete my remarks.

I now resume what I was saying about that second point to which I was referring before being interrupted. What I wanted to say is that by talking as they do, our Liberal friends are creating abroad a bad reputation for Canada. Nothing may be more detrimental to the good reputation of Canada and the welfare of its people than that policy of doom and gloom by which the opposition keeps on suggesting that the existing economic conditions here are deplorable, because that is liable to deter all those who wish to establish themselves here. That is so true that, by talking the way they do, the hon. members of the opposition are making a very bad name for Canada, so that in London, in several newspapers, there are articles, even at present, to the effect that the situation is terrible in Canada—

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Sevigny: —and that everything is going wrong. Those articles even bear sensational headlines which are certainly not likely to help our country. So, I would suggest that my friends of the opposition take a look at the Globe and Mail of this morning; they will see an article by Sandy Westhall entitled: "Image of Canada", "A bad press in Britain", "This is Canada today", "Even children join breadlines". That article states that those are the headlines appearing in the press—

(Text):

Mr. Hellyer: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I call your attention to the ruling of the Chair made yesterday afternoon in respect of this debate. As reported on page 3148 of Hansard for yesterday, Mr. Speaker ruled, after mentioning the discursive opening of the Leader of the Opposition:

> I have endeavoured to limit hon. members, including the hon. member for Peterborough, and the hon. member for Fort William, who were inclined to debate anything which in their view affected unemployment. I feel that the hon. member for Kootenay West must also bring his remarks into order by referring to the amendment which is before the house.

The minister is now beginning to discuss the effect that the opposition is having on Canada's prestige abroad and in the foreign press. With deference, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this line or argument is well beyond the terms of the amendment now before us.

Mr. Sevigny: In reply to the point of order may I respectfully mention the following. I was going to refer to the effects that these articles have on the unemployment and economic situation in Canada because they do not encourage people to invest in Canada, thereby creating employment opportunities for our people. I was going to say that this bad press is having distressing results. The article to which I refer reads in part as follows:

> This could not have happened at a worse time—when prosperous British enterprises are looking for other fields and are welcomed eagerly by European and other commonwealth nations. These are the companies Canada needs to pull itself out of the current recession.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are you still on the point of order?

Mr. Sevigny: I say respectfully, Mr. Speaker, that this point of order should not apply at the moment because I was going to relate what is said in these newspaper articles by the foreign press to our own unemployment situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Trinity has referred to the ruling made yesterday by Mr. Speaker. The amendment which is before the house deals with the inefficiency of double depreciation in dealing with problems of depressed areas and, as indicated by Mr. Speaker yesterday, the scope of debate on such an amendment is rather limited. Although I believe some reference may be made to the general situation of unemployment, I would be inclined to the view that the minister has been doing something else than laying the foundation for dealing with the amendment which is before the house. I think he should now relate his remarks to the subject matter of the amendment, otherwise he will be dealing with the general problem of employment which is not, strictly speaking, before the house on the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Chambers: May I point out to Your Honour that on page 3131 of Hansard of yesterday the Leader of the Opposition dealt with this point. He is reported as follows:

> Whose fault is it that the magazine Economist is worried; that the London Times has expressed worry . . .
> Whose fault is it that this worry has extended across the Atlantic?

This point was dealt with at some length by the Leader of the Opposition in preparing the ground for his amendment. Surely if this material is relevant in the moving of an amendment, it is relevant in opposing the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The ruling yesterday indicated that it was in order to reply to comments made by the Leader of the Opposition before he moved the amendment. If that is what the minister is now doing I am prepared to allow him to continue. I must say that he has not indicated as yet that he is specifically replying to this argument.

[Mr. Sevigny.]

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, I shall try to stick as much as possible to the matter under discussion. With respect, I submit we are now talking about unemployment in general, and in this connection, I am merely following the example so often given to me by my hon. friends opposite.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I shall not be very long and I simply wish to say in closing my remarks on that second point, that spectacular headlines such as those found in the Globe and Mail of this morning—"This is Canada" are not likely to create a very good reputation for a country like ours. It certainly deserves better. For, even if we admit that there is unemployment in Canada—which all of us regret—we still think that our country is the greatest in the world. We think that if ever a country has had a promising future, it is indeed this Canada of ours and not some other countries less profusely endowed by Providence.

Mr. Speaker, we have been referring to underdeveloped areas and I think it is probably wrong to refer to such areas in this country. There are areas where employment conditions are not quite satisfactory, at least for the moment. But, in a country like ours, abundantly provided with natural resources and particularly rich potentially, it is wrong to say that there actually are sections where misery and distress are prevalent. Mr. Speaker, I think that we should simply say that there is some uneasiness in certain places, but with a little goodwill and co-operation from all sides, the situation will improve.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this does not serve the purpose of the Liberal opposition. For reasons known only to themselves, members of the Liberal opposition have decided to take an extremely leftist stand, which makes them unofficially today the Canadian social party.

An hon. Member: What a dream.

Another hon. Member: Duplessist.

Mr. Sevigny: That attitude is perhaps based on the desire to copy the policy adopted by the British labour party which, under Mr. Attlee and his chief colleagues, was successful to a certain extent in 1945. In fact that attitude is probably due to blindness brought on by political ambition.

The Liberals tend to forget what was once the great Liberal party under Sir Wilfrid Laurier. They are prepared to resort to any tactics if it can put them into office.

I could not say why, but one thing is sure, the Liberal party today is farther left than the C.C.F. whose members sit to your far left, Mr. Speaker.

If the Liberal party wants to lean towards socialism, it is quite free to do so, but the unfortunate thing—and that is the third point I should like to discuss—is that in its constant complaints, it makes use of human distress, suffering and poverty. The Liberals give free rein to the spreading of subversive ideas among the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Bourget: Would the minister allow a question?

Mr. Sevigny: With pleasure.

Mr. Bourget: Several times the minister has referred to the Liberals as being socialists. Could he give us an example to prove his assertion that we are socialists?

Mr. Sevigny: Certainly. You need only look at the Liberal platform that was drawn up at the January convention, and you will find a whole series of socialist measures whose implementation would drive the country to bankruptcy, because they would involve a total expenditure of over a billion dollars.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Bourget: You have proved nothing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister, but his speaking time is over.

An hon. Member: He should be allowed to go on.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: I wonder if I could ask the minister a question. I did wish to wait until he completed his remarks, but in view of this interruption perhaps I could ask it now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, you may ask your question if the house is prepared to give unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

(Translation):

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, I did not quite get the point of the hon. member for Port Arthur. Was he rising on a point of order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Port Arthur was asking for permission to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny). The house did not give its consent, therefore I have given the floor to the hon. member for Lapointe.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, it is most interesting to follow the remarks of the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny). During his speech, I noticed that when he repeated the statement made recently at L'Assomption by the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion), namely that the people responsible for unemployment in Canada are those wolves, the Liberals, he expressed himself like the Secretary of State usually does.

Mr. Speaker, I have looked up yesterday's Hansard to refresh my memory on the great statements of the Associate Minister of National Defence. Here is what I found on page 3166:

> One thing is certain, Mr. Speaker—there is too much unemployment.

A little further down, he added:

> —the situation is the result of events shaped by the second world war and the period which followed the victory in 1945.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in my remarks, let me say to the leader of the government, his ministers and supporters in this house, that they started off by denying this matter of unemployment.

Last September, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) finally admitted in one of his great T.V. performances that he was beginning to worry about unemployment. Later, some said there were some big bad wolves who were responsible for the unemployment situation. Yesterday, the Associate Minister of National Defence indicated that the situation was the result of events during world war II.

When I examine those statements, I cannot help but say that all the members of the cabinet have a logic that kills.

If we analyse the period after world war II we find that there were only two years at the most where the percentage of unemployed was in excess of 3 per cent, and I mean 1954 and 1955.

Recalling the letter sent about a year or a year and a half ago to the Montreal Gazette by Mr. Forsyth of the Canadian Labour Congress and admitting that he is an expert in the matter, we can say that a country enjoys full employment when unemployment does not exceed 3 per cent.

The remarks I intend to make this afternoon do not particularly concern the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) whom I hold in great esteem. I think he is quite a sensible man.

My remarks are directed to his colleagues in the cabinet—the cabinet as a whole. I know that the Minister of Labour has a better grasp of the unemployment problem. If he did not put to use all the ideas he had for solving this problem, it was not his fault.

I can admit with my colleagues that the government did make certain attempts to cope with this situation which we consider regrettably contrary to what certain ministers and members have said.

I do not mind—as a certain well-spoken member would say—sitting on this side of the house. Our common duty is to serve our country well.

It is with that in mind that we rise to discuss problems which affect or should affect us all.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and the Minister of Labour have brought forward a resolution, a program that would extend accelerated depreciation to industries being set up in certain areas. I shall not call them distressed areas; this is something else and I shall say a few words about it, because the Associate Minister of National Defence accused us of referring to distressed areas, when those terms are the very ones used in the resolution submitted to us. I have been in Ottawa nearly eight years and I have never heard anyone here speak about distressed areas. This is the first time I have seen this expression in any legislation introduced by the government and it is the government that is suggesting it. The Financial Post, to which my leader referred yesterday, has expressed its views on the government measure now submitted. As a matter of fact, in an article published on March 18, Mr. J. G. MacDonald stated this:

(Text):

> We find it difficult to believe that the government could seriously consider the new regulation as a genuine tax incentive.
> Because the prospect to inducing the commencement of a new manufacturing enterprise in a depressed area would be bleak even to those companies already established, it is unlikely that any outsider will be induced by the new regulation to risk his capital when local businessmen are not prepared to do so.
> The regulation would probably make sense if it enabled established manufacturers in depressed areas to qualify for additional capital cost allowances in respect of new product development of their own.
> The department directive, however, makes it clear that capital equipment acquired to produce new products resulting from change, redesign or innovation will not be qualified under the new regulation.
> Change, redesign and innovation are, of course, the principal methods by which existing manufacturers in depressed areas improve their products and increase their production and sales.

[Mr. Brassard (Lapointe).]

(Translation):

As I was saying a moment ago, we admit that the government made some efforts but this is not enough in view of the seriousness of the problem that has been with us for some months.

This reminds me of an appalling thought expressed by John Stuart Mills:

> When the welfare of a whole country is at stake, half-measures do not produce partial results; they produce no results whatsoever.

Even though the government has made certain attempts to solve the unemployment problem, not only is the situation not improving, it is getting worse.

We are told from time to time that unemployment is only seasonal; let us wait for spring, let us wait for the crows. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the greatest abettors of socialism and communism in our country, and in other western countries, are those men who are in power but who only sit back on government benches waiting until the return of the crows or of spring to remedy a situation such as this.

We are asked to make proposals from time to time. Well, I have two suggestions to submit to the government. I am sure they will be welcome because they are not my own. The first was made by the Prime Minister himself. We all remember the year 1957 because that year we, from the Liberal party, were shifted to this side so we could think things over. However, we have made good use of the period elapsed since June 10. The Prime Minister then went all over the country telling us that not enough of our raw materials were being processed in Canada. I might quote for instance what he said in Parry Sound-Muskoka on May 10, 1957:

(Text):

> A Conservative government would do its best to assure that a larger share of irreplaceable raw materials was processed in Canada "for the benefit of Canadians and to ensure employment".

(Translation):

It was the same thing throughout Canada. And finally, in Saskatoon, he made the following statement, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of May 28:

(Text):

> Raw materials taken to the United States for processing—with large quantities of the ultimate products being returned for sale in Canada—supplied employment to thousands of Americans, jobs which through a policy to encourage more processing in Canada would be held by Canadians.

(Translation):

I agree with the Prime Minister. I am sure that if the government supports the establishment of industries so that more of our raw materials are processed at home, not only will it reduce our trade imbalance with our neighbours to the south, as he himself stated during the election campaign of 1957, but it will also provide jobs for thousands of Canadians.

I should like to make another suggestion concerning my own area. But first I wish to pay tribute to my colleague from Chicoutimi (Mr. Brassard), and also to the mayor of Chicoutimi who have both made similar statements on the deepening of the Saguenay river. The Saguenay, my own area, is now hard hit by unemployment. We are having a hard time trying to convince new industries to settle in our area because we are quite a ways from large centres. Then too, there is the matter of freight rates. Recently, we met with the president of a company who immediately brought up the matter.

If the government would accept the suggestion made by one of its own members, seconded by the humble member for the neighbouring riding, to deepen the Saguenay river, we would not be put in a more favourable situation than elsewhere, but we would simply be raised to the level of all the other areas in the country. We would then have a chance attract industries, which would help us to fight the distressing situation in which we find ourselves today. It will be said that the deepening of the Saguenay river will be very costly. We will be told: "You Liberals are against deficit budgeting; each time a deficit budget is brought down, you criticize us." Let me say that neither my leader, nor my colleagues, nor anybody else is opposed to a deficit when such a deficit helps give new impetus to the national economy. We are not against deficits when they are designed to alleviate unemployment or to strengthen our national economy.

In the speech he delivered yesterday, our leader put forward proposals which are sensible and practical. He mentioned the establishment of a bank which would provide the municipalities with better credit facilities. I think his program was quite to the point. Laugh if you will and say: "You could have done that when you were here." To my mind, the situation is not the same, far from it. I wonder why positive and practical suggestions such as these are never accepted. We have been criticized for offering only long term suggestions. But for the last four years now, we have been making long term suggestions to remedy unemployment. Had they been accepted at the time, we could have seen how they worked out. Long term suggestions are described as nonsense, it is said that they will not do any good until 15 years hence. But we ought to start looking beyond the year just ahead. It must begin to dawn on us that, in a free economy, in a free enterprise country, the government has a part to play in helping to create a favourable climate for enterprise.

Like everyone else, I also favour private enterprise. But I would also like the government to step into such areas where private industry cannot contribute to the prosperity of the country. In such a case, I think that the government should intervene and create a favourable climate and, if necessary, use the taxpayer's money to help revive our economy.

Yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) invited us to attend the new party convention. I was deeply touched by that invitation. I hope he has already read the comments of the member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) on the convention held in January. The hon. member for Peterborough said that, after the convention of the new party, we would have a real leftist party in Canada.

I am frankly fed up with all this talk about the right, the left, or the right or left of centre. Those purely academic discussions are futile and do not get us anywhere. Those phrases, imported from Europe, can mean a thousand different things to Canadians. I, for one, feel that men in responsible public office, whether at the federal, provincial or municipal level, should be abreast of the times and era. If that is what is meant by the word leftist, then I am one. If being a leftist means being able to understand the problems of our times and era, I will never be ashamed to say that I favour the left.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I do not mind saying that I am a leftist. To be able to understand my times and era, that has some meaning for me.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): If we are in an era requiring a measure of government control, in our western democracies, that is where private enterprise has failed, it is the responsibility of the government as soon as it becomes aware of such a need—and let us hope the government is not too blind for that—it is the responsibility of the government in the public interest to resort to government control in the field of economy. This control may not be the one my hon. friends on my right have in mind, but it must apply to those areas where private enterprise is either incapable or unwilling to do its full duty. In such a case I would have no objection, because such a control would give fresh impetus to the economy of the provinces and of Canada in general.

The worst reproach that can be addressed to the present government—and I am not referring to the Minister of Labour—is that it is neither right nor left of centre, nor even in the centre, but nowhere at all. Its head and even both its feet are up in the clouds. Not that we care much where the head is; at least the party could try to keep its feet, which characterize it, on the ground.

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, against socialism and communism. Long speeches are made about it. I heard one recently, at the Chateau Frontenac, about free enterprise. Let us fight shy of sluggishness, apathy and carelessness; they are leading straight and fast to dangers we are all trying to ward off, outright socialism and communism. It is useless and childish to make long speeches in praise of liberty, moral and spiritual values and private enterprise, in front of three quarters of a million people who are unable to earn their living. Our system will prove its superiority over other systems, thanks to its ability of getting effectively rid of the social evils which threaten it. I am not referring only to Canada but to many western nations. Unless the situation improves—and it will not unless the government resorts to measures quite more drastic and bold than the ones it has already introduced—there is the danger, as a writer has said, that the people who suffer will soon consider it is better to be a slave and not to work than to be free and have to work.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the government and those responsible for the administration of the country, to take a closer look at our problems. I know that they understand them, but if they understand them well, they must find bolder solutions than those already offered; I mean solutions that would actually improve the situation that has prevailed in recent months.

I do not wish to resume my seat without again urging the Minister of Labour to ask to his appropriate colleague to consider the deepening of the Saguenay river, which will greatly help bring industries into our area and thus provide some relief for the unemployed. In addition, I wish to remind him—this might cause him to smile—of one of the promises made time and again by his leader during the 1957 campaign, concerning the establishment of plants for the processing of our raw materials here in Canada.

Nobody can accuse me of merely criticizing. The only two intelligent suggestions I put forward were not my own, and I do not claim them as mine. I hope the government will at least consider them important enough to be acted upon.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me a question before he resumes his seat?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Certainly.

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member referred a moment ago to the necessity of setting up plants to process our raw materials; could he give one example of a company which might have been denied assistance, or of a company reported to have applied for assistance from this government to establish a plant for the processing of raw materials and which has been denied such assistance?

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I am pleased to see that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) is concerned about that matter.

I do not have to indicate whether the government turned down any request, but the Prime Minister himself promised to foster the establishment of plants to process our raw materials; it is therefore his responsibility to take action. He did not say that he would contribute to their establishment, but he said that he would introduce measures to help establish plants for the processing of our raw materials. But those are things of the past, like so many of the promises he has made.

Mr. Roland English (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the speech delivered yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. He spoke for over an hour but, strangely enough, he talked only few minutes on his own amendment concerning double depreciation.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, he referred to the resolutions adopted by the Conservative convention. He gave us his impressions of that convention and dealt at length with his favourite subject, unemployment.

I therefore intend, in my remarks, to reply to him, but only to refute the very points he raised in the course of his speech; I shall thus respect the rules of the house, as the Leader of the Opposition seems to have done, thanks to his long parliamentary experience.

Mr. Speaker, after hearing the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, I wondered if, during the week end, he has not been losing sleep over the success of the Conservative convention. Never had we seen so many delegates at a convention. Never had we seen so many people gathered for the dinner in honour of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) who addressed—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. English: Mr. Speaker, those delegates had come from everywhere and, above all, they did not fail, by their applause, to show how proud they were to welcome back the man who had just represented our government with so much dignity at the conference of prime ministers of the commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition was astonished at the text of the resolution on the Canadian flag. He pointed out that at the Liberal rally his party had committed itself to give our country a strictly Canadian flag within the two years following its coming into office.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Timmins): On a point of order, I do not want to detract from the importance of a distinctive flag, but I cannot see how it comes within the terms of the debate.

(Translation):

Mr. English: Mr. Speaker, if you look up yesterday's Hansard, you will see that the hon. Leader of the Opposition dealt in his speech with the question of a flag, and as I mentioned at the outset of my remarks, before dealing with the subject matter of my speech I am entitled to reply to the statements he has made.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think this point was raised yesterday and, if I remember correctly, Mr. Speaker ruled that he would not prevent any hon. member from replying to any comment made in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. However, I might go a little further and say that of course I would think it would be against the rules to make a whole speech only to reply to a certain point. I would suggest that in commenting on some of the specific remarks of the Leader of the Opposition hon. members should make their remarks brief and not deal at length with a point which was really out of order when it was raised. Replying to a point and making a speech are two different things, and I trust the hon. member can appreciate the difference.

(Translation):

Mr. English: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have discussed those different points at too great length, and if you read yesterday's Hansard, you will realize that the Leader of the Opposition dwelt on these different subjects at much greater length than I have.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was not telling the hon. member that he was out of order up to now; I was merely indicating the course I thought he should follow.

(Translation):

Mr. English: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

In any case, it was the Leader of the Opposition himself who said that his party had committed itself to give our country a national flag within two years after its coming to office.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, his government was in office for 22 years. Then too, Canada has had a prime minister from the province of Quebec, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, who, however, did not give the people of Canada a distinctive flag. In fact, Canada could be without a distinctive flag for 24 years, since the Liberal administration was in office 22 years, and they now ask for a further two years before they adopt a Canadian flag.

Mr. Speaker, I hear laughter from my hon. friends opposite when I say those things. I wonder then why the Leader of the Opposition brought this matter up yesterday. Our hon. friends do not seem to want us to reply to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition and they seem annoyed at the fact that we intend to do just that.

An hon. Member: We are pleased that it annoys you.

Mr. English: Keep it up and I shall go on with my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I was also saying that yesterday the Leader of the Opposition dealt at length with the unemployment situation. He referred to the years 1955 and 1956, and again to the years 1960 and 1961.

In 1955 and 1956, we had an unemployment problem, yet our friends opposite were then in office. In 1955, 1956 and 1957, the Liberal administration had a chance to do something to remedy the situation, but they did nothing.

Labour Conditions

Mr. Speaker, to confirm that there was an unemployment situation in 1955 and 1956, I only have to refer to statistics published in the Canada Labour Gazette. As a matter of fact, as reported in volume LVII of that publication, for 1957, there were 89,800 unemployed in the Atlantic area as at February 14. This was an increase of 14.8 per cent over the previous month, and 16.3 per cent over the previous year. During the same period, in the Quebec area, there were 176,900 unemployed, an increase of 10.4 per cent over the previous month and of 13.7 per cent over the previous year. The prairies with 78,100 unemployed, had an increase of 6.3 per cent over the previous month and a decrease of 0.6 per cent from the previous year; the Pacific region, with an unemployed population of 71,400, had an increase of 39.2 per cent over the previous month and 7.5 per cent over the previous year. On February 14, 1957, the total unemployed population numbered 574,700 an increase of 9.2 per cent over the previous month and 11.5 per cent over the previous year. Furthermore, on February 1, 1957, the number of claimants for unemployment benefits was 545,981, or an increase of 37.1 per cent over the previous month and 14.5 per cent over the previous year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, those figures indicate that an unemployment crisis prevailed in the years 1955, 1956 and 1957, and that the government of the day not only failed to act as it ought to have done to remedy the situation, but that it merely misled the people, by not pointing out prevailing conditions and more particularly by failing to reveal to the Canadian people the economic report prepared at the time.

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition admitted yesterday that things were picking up. Speaking of the economic recession, he said that it had a tendancy to ebb away, and I entirely agree with him. As a matter of fact, he mentioned it before when speaking in London, Ontario. This is what I read in the newspaper Dimanche Matin, March 12, 1961:

If Mr. Pearson says that things are picking up, the recession must be at an end.

Mr. Pearson, leader of the Liberal party stated during the week end, in London Ont., that the number one problem which Canada has to face at this time, is that of economic recovery. However, there are some indications that the recession is about to end.

Always in connection with this matter, this is what Le Soleil of Saturday, March 11, 1961, had to say:

Canadian business recovery is expected in mid-1961.

[Mr. English.]

"The slump which started about the middle of 1960, will probably keep on during the first months of 1961, but some improvement can be expected towards the middle of the year," stated Mr. E. S. Morse, president of the Investment Dealers' Association of Canada on a visit here.

It is expected that capital demand will be as strong in 1961 as in 1960. Federal government borrowing more particularly, will reach a much higher level. Mr. Morse expressed the view that there would be no new increase in interest rates for long term loans, but rather a trend to lower rates during the year.

Mentioning the trade situation, Mr. Morse stated that our export trade was rather encouraging, though some countries affected by the war have now completed their reconstruction and become major competitors on the world market. "In the future we will have a large measure of success in this field as long as we apply the latest methods and use the latest equipment, while controlling costs. Obviously, we will be helped by the reduction of the Canadian dollar premium," he added.

The Canadian dollar premium, which has been in existence for such a long time mainly resulted from provincial and municipal borrowing abroad, and of foreign capital investments in Canada made attractive by our high interest rates and development advantages. In the baby budget of last December, the federal government removed some tax exemptions formerly granted in order to attract foreign capital investment to this country. That decision had an immediate impact on the demand for Canadian dollars resulting in a sharp decrease of the premium. In time, our industry as well as our export trade will benefit from it.

Those are flattering words for the policy of this government.

Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that the recession had started under the administration of our hon. friends opposite. To prove it, I will quote from Le Devoir of Saturday, October 22, 1960:

The economic depression started in 1949.

"The resolution to unemployment is quite simple: save!"—Mr. Coyne.

Mr. James Coyne, governor of the Bank of Canada, has just published his annual report for 1960. It is an explosive document that will be discussed for a long time. In fact, Mr. Coyne has smashed the myth of the rosy years of the last decade. Mr. C. D. Howe must have turned in his grave on hearing the iconoclast raze to the ground the monument of infallibility erected to him by propaganda.

Mr. Speaker, we can see that the recession did not start with the coming into office of this government. And the Leader of the Opposition said that this government has done nothing, has adopted no measure to meet the situation.

As for the hon. member who spoke just before me, he pointed out that this government has done something but not enough.

Yet no government has ever done more to meet the situation than the present one. May I mention a few of those measures, so that this house and all the people in Canada may fully realize what this government has done to cope with the present situation.

Let us start with the housing situation. A down payment of $500 on a $10,000 house, as compared to $1,000 before. A down payment of $550 on an $11,000 house, as compared to $1,100 before. A down payment of $600 on a $12,000 house, compared to $1,200 before. The maximum loan has been raised from $12,800 to $14,200 and $14,900. One and a half million dollars have been provided for new housing. The federal government will pay 75 per cent of the costs of urban redevelopment and slum clearance. The government is providing $50 million for this purpose. House improvement loans are guaranteed up to $500 million, as compared to $200 million last year. Loans authorized for rental housing are increased from 80 to 85 per cent of value.

A second measure, against pollution: loans to municipalities for sewage plants; the government is making $100 million available for this.

In the automobile industry: a reduction of the preferential tariff on imported automobiles and parts.

For small businesses. Loans up to $25,000 to enterprises with a gross annual income of $250,000. An amount of $300 million is provided for a three-year period to help small businesses in Canada, and especially the tourist industry.

As regards winter works in municipalities, the federal government will pay an amount of $30 million in the course of this winter. Works totalling over $200 million were approved in early December. In early December, employment was assured for more than 75,000 workers.

With regard to the training of the unemployed, the federal government will pay 75 per cent, that is to say it has paid 75 per cent of the cost of such training.

On vocational and technical training, there is a 50 per cent increase in training facilities in Canada. The federal government is paying 75 per cent of the cost of new schools up to 1963, and 50 per cent thereafter. Twenty six million dollars have been voted for vocational training this year, an increase of $9 million. Fifteen million dollars will be spent on new school construction.

On public works, there is a $100 million construction program.

On export credits, there is an immediate credit of up to $110 million to help finance Canadian exports abroad; an ultimate credit of $750 million.

The national productivity council aims at increasing productivity in Canada through labour-management co-operation, so that the country may keep up with competition.

On small businesses: There is a reduction in the corporation tax, in the case of small businesses, by raising from $25,000 to $35,000 the minimum above which the excess profit rate applies. The tax will be 21 per cent up to $35,000, whereas the rate on excess profits used to be 50 per cent on $25,000 and over.

On new industries, double depreciation is applicable in the case of goods not previously made in Canada. Double depreciation is applicable in the case of businesses locating in areas of greatest unemployment.

On foreign investments, there is a 15 per cent tax on profits of Canadian subsidiaries of non-resident corporations. By 1963, investment firms will have to get 75 per cent of their income from dividends of Canadian firms.

On investments in Canada: There is the removal of the 4 per cent extra tax as a means of stimulating investment in Canada.

On education, university students are allowed to deduct tuition fees from their taxable income.

On veterans' pensions, there is a 20 per cent increase.

There is also a return to parity of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Bourget: You have forgotten something, there is also the rise in population.

Mr. English: The population has risen, but contrary to the assertions of the Leader of the Opposition, Canada's entire population is satisfied that the government has not turned a deaf ear to its demands, but has seriously tackled its job and has acted to improve conditions as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, and to reduce the recession in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I think Canada's whole population recognizes that the double depreciation measure put forward by the government will help attract new industries to our various areas and reduce unemployment.

The Leader of the Opposition, in his amendment, suggests the creation of a regional rehabilitation agency. In co-operation with the provinces and with local authorities, it would assist in the implementation of a program of aid in the less prosperous areas.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. members of the opposition have taken the government to task for being slow to act. And now that the measures put forward by the government have been adopted, the Liberals and all opposition members are suggesting a different administrative procedure.

We are asked not to bring in the municipalities.

However, I think the municipalities are the public bodies which are best qualified to make recommendations for fighting unemployment, in view of the fact that they are quite aware of their own economic situation.

I am confident that the municipalities will be able to supply correct information to the satisfaction of the government and of all hon. members.

If we were to start considering a different procedure, this would only delay the implementation of a most useful and desired measure.

For all those reasons, I am against the amendment which, if passed, would prevent a large number of manufacturers from setting up new plants in the near future.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly believe the original measure has the approval of every Canadian citizen. Manufacturers have expressed their satisfaction to me by telephone. They have indicated their intention to establish new industries in my area.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the general character of the contributions made by those who have spoken on behalf of the government today, in particular the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny), it would be well if we were to remind ourselves of the precise terms of the amendment introduced by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). The amendment reads as follows:

> This house is of the opinion that the provision for double depreciation announced last December will prove ineffective in dealing with the problems of depressed areas, and regrets that the government has imposed the responsibility for the designation of such areas on the municipalities, and that the definition of depressed areas is too restrictive.

When speaking in support of the amendment the Leader of the Opposition referred to the general condition of unemployment in our country. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in seeking to reply to what the Leader of the Opposition had to say, complained about the role assumed by the Leader of the Opposition and the members of the Liberal party who had, in the judgment of hon. members opposite, overstated the case with regard to unemployment.

I regret very much that the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) is not in his seat at the moment. I would say to him that once again, as I said on an earlier occasion, his stature has not been improved by the declarations he made today. Nor do we seek to justify the interest which we in the Liberal party have displayed with regard to this problem of unemployment almost from the days when this government first assumed office. Hon. gentlemen over the week end at their party conclave complained bitterly about the members of the Liberal party in general, and myself in particular, because of the fact that we displayed concern about unemployment. Let there be no doubt about this. We in the Liberal party propose to take every opportunity during the life of this parliament to bring home to the government the weaknesses in its policies in so far as those policies do not meet the problem of unemployment. We propose to remind the government of its promises; we propose to expose the government's weaknesses in unemployment or employment policy, as we see them, in accordance with our conscience and our concept of the role of an opposition.

Since when was the opposition to be denied the right to criticize a government because its policies, in the opinion of the opposition, did not seem to prove themselves effective in a given situation? Hon. gentlemen would destroy the value of the opposition. They say we weaken the reputation of our country because we expose this problem and because we complain about the lack of government policy to deal with unemployment. We would indeed be lacking in duty, from the Leader of the Opposition down—and this duty applies as well to every member sitting behind the minister—if we did not outline, as it is seen, the nature of the problem and to put forward proposals. Those who really are lacking in national duty at this time are those individuals in responsible positions who seek to prevent any proper discussion of this problem. Those are the individuals who are failing in their duty.

I would remind the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) that it is not only members of the opposition who believe the government has obligations. There are as well, important personalities in our country, in the church, in the schools and in Canadian life generally, important personalities, who have not been afraid to speak of the role of the state with regard to unemployment.

(Translation):

Here is what His Eminence Cardinal Leger had to say recently with regard to our Christian responsibilities in the face of unemployment. As reported in Le Devoir for Saturday, January 17, 1959, His Eminence declared:

Indeed, the state must, in this field, play a positive role and discharge its full responsibility.

It is first the duty of individuals and intermediate groups to assume their full responsibilities. However, as obviously they cannot be expected with all their ingenuity to solve the unemployment problem alone, public authorities must step in to stimulate their initiative and supplement their action. Indeed, we are reminded by His Holiness the Pope that when private initiative is inoperative or inadequate, "public authorities have an obligation to provide the greatest possible measure of employment by undertaking socially useful works and by promoting, through advice or other means, the employment of those seeking a job."

That is a statement made by a great Canadian. Would anyone say that His Eminence Cardinal Leger shares the communist viewpoint? In 1958, he had this to say:

A situation that creates hardship for too many families and causes such insecurity, should prompt each one of us to make a serious appraisal of the economic system under which we are living.

(Text):

I could go on and quote from statements of other personalities and declarations made by men who recognize that, as spiritual leaders, it is their duty to point out the obligation of not only the individual but the state in the face of what undoubtedly is, in its darkest apparel, a situation that cannot be described other than by saying that it represents a national emergency.

Because we talk about this problem we are criticized by those whose responsibility it is to lead and to bring forward measures capable of dealing with the situation.

Here we have the Toronto Star of today.

An hon. Member: Another spiritual source.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The mayor of Toronto is reported in this paper as saying:

There's Real Despair in city—Mr. Phillips.

I would say there is real despair in this country. There are 700,000 people out of work. We do not know what these figures are now but the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) has indicated he will have them soon. One need only ask the officials of the Salvation Army, or of any organization such as the St. Vincent de Paul society in order to see if there is real despair today in many sections of Canada. Because we point to the overshadowing problem of unemployment we are criticized in this free parliament because we criticize the government for the inadequate policies that it brings forward.

This particular program of double depreciation for depressed areas in principle, when it was first enunciated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), did give many people reason to believe that at long last the government had embarked on a substantially positive program to deal with unemployment, particularly in chronically unemployed areas, as the Minister of Finance calls them or distressed areas as I call them. In principle, this program of double depreciation is sound. It was recommended by the Leader of the Opposition, speaking on behalf of this party, many months ago and it was reaffirmed at our national rally. It has been practised in the United Kingdom and in the United States, and in that latter country it has now become much stronger and more substantive in form. The Leader of the Opposition did not overstate the situation yesterday, when he pointed out the inadequacy of the particular program of double depreciation brought in by this government.

I read the speech of the Minister of Labour last night and I must say that when I criticized those who criticized us for talking about this problem I was not including the Minister of Labour. I was referring particularly to the Associate Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker), that experienced parliamentarian who, within a very short time, has established himself in this house as one of its most beloved figures. I was, however, disappointed in the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) because he did not address himself to the real criticisms of this program offered by the Leader of the Opposition.

The background of this situation is simply this. On December 20 the Minister of Finance, in the only reference to unemployment in the budget speech, said that he was going to bring forward a program of accelerated depreciation to assist in the relocation of industries in depressed areas and to encourage industries to stay in those depressed areas. It was not until March 2, some two and a half months later, in spite of questions repeatedly put to the minister that we were in a position to gather what the details of this policy were going to be.

I say without fear of contradiction that any government that delays for two and a half months in outlining a program announced before Christmas in an emergency session designed to deal with unemployment is a government that deserves to be indicted for its failure to deal with unemployment courageously and effectively.

Compare that failure with the action taken in the United States. We have been asking this government for three years to study the problem of depressed areas. We have been asking the government to set up a committee in this house so we could examine into this problem. The only committee that was set up was one set up in the other place, where very important work is being carried out.

This work which is being initiated by Liberal senators, should have been undertaken by this government and it might well have been carried on in this House of Commons by a parliamentary committee.

I hold in my hand the area development act, report on hearings before a subcommittee of the committee on banking and currency in the United States senate. This committee went all over the United States during the past two and one half years studying the problem of the chronically distressed areas of the United States.

We pointed out to the government what was being done in that country. We asked the government of this country to embark upon a similar program. We were told that this was an impractical suggestion. Then in the month of December we found that the Minister of Finance was going to bring forward some kind of a proposal along these very lines, although the government apparently did not have in the Department of Labour or in other departments the necessary material upon which to found a properly conceived policy, as will be found if one examines the record carefully.

The inadequacy of the program is not the only thing about which we are complaining. It is clear that the government itself has been so lacking in any careful preparation—

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise at this moment, but I do not think the hon. member for Essex East would wish any wrong impression to stay in the house as a result of what he said a few moments ago when he quoted from today's Toronto Daily Star and said—

Mr. Pickersgill: This is another of those diversions to use up other people's time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this is not a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All I can say is that I was handed that newspaper and the headline is there for everyone to see. The minister is not going to divert me from my remarks because I have some very important things to tell him today.

Not only did the government not have a policy—

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Walker: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: What is your point of privilege?

An hon. Member: Wait and you will find out.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Starr: Don't get tough.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East has misled the house. He has said that the mayor of Toronto despaired. There is no such statement in the newspaper. A girl called Dinah Kerr wrote an article entitled—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is not a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there is any misunderstanding or misinterpretation arising out of the article in the newspaper to which the minister has referred, after the hon. member for Essex East has resumed his seat I will recognize the hon. member who wishes to make a correction.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Toronto Daily Star headline is as I read it—

Mr. Starr: No, it is not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and I challenge hon. members from Toronto to deny now that there are cases of unemployment—

Mr. Walker: That is not the point—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Starr: Closure by the Liberals again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The minister has risen on a question of privilege.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, that is another misrepresentation. The hon. member for Essex East succinctly stated in this house that the mayor of Toronto said—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Walker: —he despaired about this problem. He made no such statement. This is my question of privilege, and I claim the right to make it.

An hon. Member: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Walker: The mayor of Toronto made no such statement, whatever the reporter for the Toronto Daily Star, Dinah Kerr, said and—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Walker: I can wait as long as you can. Don't you want the truth?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I am stating my question of privilege—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ricard: A question of privilege is being dealt with. The hon. member has no right to stand up now.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I just—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I indicate to the Minister of Public Works that if he wishes to put the headline or the report in the Toronto Daily Star on the record he will have the occasion later to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, this is a question of privilege. The hon. member has—

Mr. Pickersgill: Sit down when the Speaker is standing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I point out that if the hon. member for Essex East, who has the floor now, has not read in its entirety the newspaper, to which the hon. Minister of Public Works has referred, this is not in itself a question of privilege because it does not affect any hon. member in particular or the hon. members of the house generally. This is a question of controversy or a question of correcting facts, which can be dealt with in the ordinary course of debate.

Therefore if it was the intention of the hon. minister to make this factual correction, I would point out to him that this is not a question of privilege, nor is it sufficient ground on which to raise a point of order. I would therefore ask hon. members to allow the hon. member for Essex East to continue his speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will allow the time which has been wasted to be added to the time I have left. This is a deliberate effort on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite who do not want to hear the truth—

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Do I understand that the parliamentary secretary rises on a point of order?

Mr. Hellyer: He is challenging your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, on the question that has been raised, may I say this. Since the hon. member for Essex East has referred to a document, perhaps it would simplify things, if he would table that document.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: He is not allowed to do so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I hope you have taken note of these interruptions so that I will be allowed the time that has been taken up obviously by hon. gentlemen—

Mr. Ricard: You are having a dose of your own medicine.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —being deliberately obstructive. I was saying that not only has the government an uncertain policy, but from the Prime Minister's answer to a question of mine a few days before the order in council was passed dealing with double depreciation, it is clear that the Prime Minister did not clearly understand which minister was to be in charge of this program, because he said that the Minister of Labour was to be in complete charge—

Mr. Pallett: No, he did not. Read the rules.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and then later we found out that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was to have some responsibility in this matter. We had been led to believe by the Minister of Finance that we could not have the details of the government's program of double depreciation until the budget resolutions had been disposed of, although the necessary authority resides with the governor in council. The necessary measures could have been effectively completed on December 18, and this program, inadequate as it is, could have become effective from that date on.

Now what do we get? We have a program which is a facade and which will no more resolve this problem of unemployment than would a mere declaration of intention to introduce such a program. Reference has been made to an analysis of this program by Mr. J. G. McDonald who has written:

> In our opinion, it is unlikely that any responsible manufacturer will consider expansion of his business into a new community under the regulation merely because of the minor tax benefits he may receive through accelerated depreciation.

He goes on:

> We find it difficult to believe that the government could seriously consider the new regulation as a genuine tax incentive.

Later, after discussing the requirements, he says:

> All this for one year's accelerated depreciation for additional depreciable property which probably will not amount to more than 1 per cent of the total undepreciated capital cost of most industries capable of having any effect upon the employment picture.

As the Leader of the Opposition reminded us yesterday Mr. McDonald goes on to observe:

We will not be surprised if the new regulation provides more employment in the civil service in Ottawa than it does in the depressed areas of the country.

Mr. Speakman: Would the hon. gentleman mind telling us what he is reading from?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Financial Post of March 18.

Let us face this problem seriously. We are legislators. We are dealing with an important national problem. Let us ask ourselves what industry would move, for instance, from the relatively prosperous area of Hamilton in order to settle in an acknowledged depressed or distressed area, or area of chronic unemployment, on the basis of this particular program which is to be in operation for not more than one year. Does anyone seriously think that this is a substantial program? Does the Minister of Labour not feel he has been considerably embarrassed by having to present this anaemic child born of this lethargic, inactive and tired administration?

This program of tax incentives, of accelerated depreciation, is a program which, if it were carefully conceived, could likely provide a substantial partial solution to the problem of unemployment in depressed areas. In my own area I can see where a program of real tax incentives, of real accelerated depreciation extended over a long period, could provide encouragement for the relocation of industry and for industry to stay in that area. Incidentally—and the minister did not refer to it last night—the community which I represent has made an application for the kind of limited assistance available under this program. As I say, if it were executed with sufficient boldness and scope, such a program could be of considerable use. But the program as now presented to us will not bring one industry to one community in this country. The government in offering such a program will be able to do only one thing, and that is to go out in public meetings, where there will not be full opportunity to examine the program, and say: look what we have done; we have brought in this program of tax incentives, of double depreciation, along with the scheme for productivity councils, the legislation to assist small business, and so on. Yet those men in the opposition have done nothing to help us solve this problem of unemployment. I say to the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) that it is a disgrace for the government to have brought forward a program of this kind when everyone knows it is completely insufficient and lacking in any real substance.

The first major weakness is that it attempts to foist on to the local authorities responsibility for the determination of what is a labour surplus area. Imagine imposing upon the local authorities of our country the responsibility for determining whether or not they are distressed areas. What is being done in England? What is being done in the United States by governments courageous enough to face this problem and acknowledge its seriousness? Of course, in England they have only about 1 per cent of their work force out of employment while in Canada we have almost 12 per cent of our work force out of work. President Kennedy did not hesitate to suggest the designation of distressed areas and to provide, within a few weeks of taking office, a program designed to assist the unemployed in those areas. I suggest that the real reason why this limited program is brought forward is that this government was embarrassed by not having brought forward a program in principle like this long ago, particularly when there was such discussion concerning lack of action in the United States at the time.

The second major weakness is, of course, the restrictive character of the criteria which are to be used to define a depressed area. Imagine places such as Elliot Lake, Springhill and Peterborough not being able to qualify for this kind of limited assistance. The requirement that one should go back to 1953 is a most ridiculous requirement. The only requirement which should have been put into this measure is: what is the level of unemployment and distress in these particular areas at the present time, not what the situation was in 1953. Is Elliot Lake a distressed area? Is there much unemployment in Peterborough? Why not apply the standards applied in Britain? Where 4 per cent of the work force is out of work for a certain definite period, then the area becomes a depressed area capable of qualifying for the benefit of accelerated depreciation. In the United States another standard has been put forward; 6 per cent of the work force out of work for a stated period qualifies the area as one which may take advantage of the proposals for tax relief or accelerated depreciation.

I suggest to the government that they are fooling no one with this program. They are not going to fool the municipalities. They are not going to fool corporations which would like to take advantage of such a scheme. Every paper in Canada which has commented on this program has criticized it because of its restricted character. It has been criticized in the Halifax Herald, the Windsor Star, the Toronto Globe and Mail, and in papers all over the country, added to which there is the criticism I have read from the Financial Post. This is a facade which is another attempt on the part of this government to give the impression that it is doing something substantial to relieve the most serious single domestic problem facing the people of Canada today.

Something must be done about this situation. We cannot allow this government to continue in its leisurely, laissez faire way because if we do so we shall run into very serious situations. The recession may lift, but unemployment will persist and with it will come those influences which will bring about a kind of society which the Associate Minister of National Defence deplores no less than does everyone in this house.

The governor of the Bank of Canada has some views on unemployment and we ask the government to address itself to the solutions which he advances and to say whether they are right or not. Mr. Coyne, according to his report, said:

> Economic developments have not been of such a character as to raise employment in step with the increase in the labour force.

Does the government agree with this statement? Does it confront the situation? Does it say the governor of the Bank of Canada is doing a disservice to this nation by pointing out what he believes to be the facts?

Then, the governor of the Bank of Canada says:

> Analysis of Canada's situation seems to me to indicate that the approach to higher employment and output should be through measures designed to reduce the large deficit in our current account balance of payments and through increases in spending of a selective character likely to increase production in Canada, rather than through measures designed to raise the level of total spending by Canadians.

Does the government agree with this statement? There is a proposal by the governor of the Bank of Canada for a solution of this problem, and yet ministers sit in their seats day after day refusing to say whether they agree with the governor of the bank or not.

Then, the governor of the Bank of Canada goes on to say:

> We should not allow exaggerated ideas about the influence of monetary policy to distract us from pursuing outside the monetary field the most practical and effective measures to ensure the restoration of a high level of employment and the reduction of unemployment to the minimum level.

Mr. Coyne says that the problem of unemployment belongs to the government; but, while that is the case, he nevertheless proposes his solutions for dealing with it. The governor of the Bank of Canada is a responsible, distinguished public servant in our country. I am not now commenting on whether I agree with his detailed analysis and his proposed solution. What I am pointing out is that the governor of the Bank of Canada may have exceeded his normal function, perhaps in the national interest, as he sees it, and has pointed out to the Canadian people and to the government the general lines of an attack on unemployment. He says that monetary policy is his responsibility. That is true. By that he does not mean to imply that the government has no responsibility in the final analysis, but he makes that remark so that it will be clear that with regard to debt management, fiscal and financial policy, in so far these have anything to do with the maintenance of our standard of living, they are a responsibility which belongs in the first instance to the government.

I say that if the government is serious about trying to resolve this problem of unemployment it cannot leave untouched and unnoticed these declarations of the governor of the Bank of Canada. It cannot simply hope that parliament will prorogue and that there will be no debate on the merits of the proposals put forward by the governor of the Bank of Canada.

An attempt to resolve this problem of unemployment should involve the careful consideration and study of the recommendations of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I raise this matter of the bank and unemployment at this time because I think it is basic and because, from all that one can hear, I believe the government is about to take this matter out of the hands of parliament. The government is about to resort to its well known technique of appointing a royal commission to examine into the whole question of monetary policy. If it takes that course, then to outsiders, to those members of the royal commission designated by the government alone, will be afforded the opportunity of interrogating the governor of the Bank of Canada on monetary policy and presumably on matters related to it, and arising out of the report presented to parliament a few days ago. If such technique is employed we shall be denied the right and opportunity to determine whether or not the governor of the Bank of Canada is diametrically opposed to the policy of the government—

Mr. Pearson: That is the purpose of it.

Labour Conditions

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Leader of the Opposition says that may be the purpose of appointing a royal commission. If this royal commission is appointed, then we shall be denied the opportunity of determining whether the proposals themselves deserve to be embodied in government programs to resolve this problem.

I say no government can discharge its function to the unemployed of our country, or in this particular context can deal with the very important problems facing Canadian industry, Canadian agriculture, our labour force, and the nation generally unless we are put in a position to ascertain what are the details of the solutions proposed by the governor of the Bank of Canada. In the face of the intransigent position taken by the Minister of Finance, the only way in which we can be given this opportunity is for this government, and particularly the chairman of the banking and commerce committee, without any interference by the Minister of Finance, to allow the governor of the Bank of Canada to appear before that committee and enunciate the reasons for his proposals.

Mr. Martineau: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martineau: For the last several minutes the hon. member has been discussing monetary policy and the opportunity for the governor of the Bank of Canada to appear before a certain committee. I respectfully submit to Your Honour that this is not pertinent to the debate before this house. The hon. member who is always rising on points of order should be the first one to observe the rules of this house, as Your Lordship so well pointed out just a few minutes ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are no lords here; this is a democratic house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): First, Your Honour knows very well that you are not Your Lordship. Second, the point of order taken was obviously another device on the part of the government to prevent one from continuing with one's point of view, namely the development of monetary policy. What I said about debt management and fiscal and financial policy are fundamental factors in the state of our economy and in any attempt to deal with the problem of unemployment.

In conclusion, I say that the government now faces—

Mr. Martineau: May I have a ruling on the point of order which I raised, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was about to say that it was useless to rule on the problem of relevancy, which is always rather difficult, after the hon. member for Essex East had indicated that he was about to conclude. If this is the case I will not rule, but if the hon. member wishes to pursue the subject of monetary policy I shall have to rule.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to deal with it. The point has been made as an obstruction and was intended for that purpose.

Mr. Martineau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has any cause to state that when a point of order has been upheld by the Speaker it was raised as an obstruction. Either this house has rules or it has not. If it has rules, I think the hon. member for Essex East should observe them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Whatever we may say, this problem is before us. Whether we sit in the opposition, in the ministry or behind the ministry, we cannot escape the fact that we have a serious problem before us. In our judgment the government has not brought forward a program which is capable of biting into this problem. The various measures which have been proposed such as the winter works programs and the like, only indicate the severity of the problem. The government says that it has put 100,000 men to work under that program. If that program had not been brought in, instead of 700,000 we would have 800,000 out of work. The fact is we have at least 700,000 unemployed. Under our parliamentary system this is a problem that rests primarily on the shoulders of the government of the day. It cannot shift that responsibility on to labour, management or oppositions. We in the opposition have sought to deal with it; we have put forward our proposals. The government has not accepted them. One of the proposals we have put forward is that about which I have been speaking today, namely an examination of the publicly declared program for resolving unemployment put forward by the governor of the Bank of Canada, that important institution established by parliament. If parliament is the master of the Bank of Canada as the Minister of Finance indicates, and quite correctly in a constitutional sense, then it is our responsibility as members of parliament to see that we ascertain from the governor of the bank what his proposals are so that we can examine and compare them with the program of the government, make the necessary judgment and give the people of Canada the opportunity of making the necessary jugment. The failure of the government to act on this proposal will only add to the growing record of the government's utter incapacity to deal with this problem.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I was very happy to hear the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) read the amendment presented to the house yesterday. No doubt his intention was to draw the attention of the house to the fact that he was going to speak on the subject of the amendment, limited as it is, but nevertheless he did find an opportunity to bring in a few other things which are not in the amendment. At the request of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) I should like to draw the attention of the house to a statement made by the hon. member for Essex East to the effect that there was real despair in Toronto. The statement referred to by the hon. member appeared to be a statement by Mayor Phillips of Toronto. The article in question in the Toronto Star of today is written by Dinah Kerr and in it she is addressing herself to Mayor Phillips and telling him that there is real despair. The article was misrepresented to the house by the hon. member for Essex East.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) endeavoured to bring the word McCarthyism into his speech. How far are they going to go in the making of such representations in the house with the intention, though I would not say it was deliberate, of misleading the house? While I am on the subject of McCarthyism, which was mentioned yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition, I wonder whether he is aware of the speech made in Brantford by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) in which she said that the young Liberals should be the radicals of the party. Accompanying her on that trip was the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) who apparently aspires to the leadership of the Liberal party and possibly is trying to create dissension in the Liberal ranks. Moreover, does the Leader of the Opposition not know of the statement made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) that in the C.B.C. there are subversive elements? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, where is the McCarthy in the House of Commons?

I should now like to deal with the amendment. There is an attempt on the part of the opposition to segregate each piece of legislation which has been presented to the house. It seems that they do not realize that the legislation whereby double depreciation will be granted to those establishing plants in depressed areas is part of an over-all plan. We cannot look upon the amendment strictly from the point of view of the effects that double depreciation will have on the economy but rather we should regard the provision of double depreciation as another well advised and well planned move. To use the words of the Leader of the Opposition when he spoke yesterday, it is another form of the massive attack upon the problems with which the government is confronted.

We are not going to be swayed by desperation as the opposition was during their last days in office nor are we going to approach the solution of these problems in other than a well moderated way in accordance with normal business procedure. The government is not going to be swayed by the woeful, sad and pitiful cries of the opposition, or by their exaggerated and often irresponsible statements. Rather, Mr. Speaker, the challenge to rectify the ills of the economy is accepted by the government and the problems will be dealt with with moderation and from the point of view of real expediency and not in a wasteful way through desperation.

The first measure introduced during the present session of parliament dealt with loans to small business. The effects are good. Then there was the creation of a productivity council. These two measures will enable the production of more and better goods and ultimately will mean more people on the payroll. Then there is the extension to $35,000 of the amount on which the minimum 21 per cent corporation tax applies, which is an additional tax concession to small industries and businesses. We also have the new incentives to industries to locate in depressed areas. Are not all these measures taken together an indication of sound planning and of the fact that the government is looking toward the solution of the problem not for a day, a month or a year but rather to the provision of steady employment and a stable economy in the future?

The government is to be congratulated for its well conceived plans and actions to bring an end to the ills that effect our economy not just for a few months but in the foreseeable future. If the former government in the days when it gloated over its large surpluses had only had the required vision it would have implemented the measures which are being introduced into the house during this session. It is not at times like the present when such measures should be taken but rather when the country has a surplus and we want to make sure that we will have a growing economy. The trouble today, and everyone knows it, lies in the fact that the gross national product has not been rising annually to a satisfactory level. The time for such actions to be taken is when governments have surpluses, because if such actions are taken then the gross national product of our country would not fall in the following years. This is one area of the economy, Mr. Speaker, in which the former government should have taken action. However, they were satisfied that nothing would happen in the next year. The former administration should have introduced those measures which have been lately introduced, and then today we would be happy to hail them for their generous actions.

There has been some talk about tax cuts. Is this double depreciation not a form of tax cut? Is the measure raising the level at which corporations would be liable for the minimum tax of 21 per cent from $25,000 to $35,000 not a tax cut? These, Mr. Speaker, are the incentives and the means by which industry will expand and enable us to attain our ultimate goal which is full employment. I can think of many areas in the country which would be very happy if this double depreciation applied to them. I can think of plants which have been closed; and if an extra 10 per cent or 15 per cent of their depreciation fund were made available to them in the form of working capital, I am sure they would welcome it. I can think of other industries that have settled in one area, and if this legislation were applicable to them they would give new thought to expansion. I can picture them looking for a place in which primary products would be available, where transportation would be cheaper and where they could find a labour force sufficient for their needs. How serious can a person be when he says that such measures are not good? It is true, Mr. Speaker, that there are many people who believe that the well designed plan this government has introduced will bring our economy up to the standard at which it should be. In the years to come we shall be able to look back at these measures as the greatest pieces of legislation that have been introduced into our Canadian parliament.

I should like to refer briefly to the speech made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) in which he stated that double depreciation was not adequate for the needs of the maritime provinces. Does he not recall that for some time APEC has requested that double depreciation be made applicable to the maritimes? Does he believe that this organization will hesitate to make the necessary applications under this legislation? I believe that the maritime area will derive a great deal of satisfaction from this measure.

I want to refer for a moment to the criticism levelled by the opposition at the fact that the municipalities themselves must make application. This type of criticism reminds me of the days when the Liberal party were centralizing everything in Ottawa. They do not want the municipalities, in conjunction with their boards of trade or other economic bodies, to decide whether or not they are depressed areas and in need of new industries.

The Liberal party is satisfied that these local governing bodies should stay at home and let the central government at Ottawa tell them what they should or should not have. The danger in this philosophy, Mr. Speaker, is that it tends to destroy personal initiative and the wills of local governments. We should beware of ever going back to the time when we would have a central government at Ottawa which would tell the local governments how they should operate.

The hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) did produce one statement by someone who was not favourable to the legislation that has been introduced. However, he omitted to read other statements which have been favourable. I should like to refer to one statement by John Meyer, the financial editor of the Montreal Gazette. He says:

> The measures taken by the federal government to relieve unemployment fall into two general categories—the obvious, like housing funds and railway construction, and the not so obvious, like doubled depreciation and long term export credit financing. Of the two, the latter will have the greatest effect over the long run. Their common purpose is to encourage the increase in production upon which the increase in employment depends.

When we encourage secondary industries to establish in depressed areas, Mr. Speaker, we are not only increasing the employment opportunities in that area but we are making available to the other parts of Canada the benefits to be derived from the purchase of heavy equipment, building material and other products. This measure, therefore, affects not only a sector, but Canada as a whole. I believe this has been a very commendable move on the part of the government.

Reference has been made also to the programs adopted in Great Britain, the United States, France and other countries for dealing with this problem. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) no doubt had a lapse of memory when he referred to these programs because, until these remarks were made, he led us to believe that Canada had a monopoly on this problem.

Before concluding my remarks I should like to stress the fact that the opposition should take a positive approach to these problems and endeavour to bring forward some solutions. Reference has been made to a press release issued yesterday by the Liberal party in which that party set out, not the 23-point program referred to by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) last nigh, but a six-point program. All I can say about this program is that it seems to emphasize the fact that the government should extend or increase contributions or renew certain measures. The Liberals seem to be sterile of ideas because they have not brought forward one new solution. I do not know the reason for this but it seems that the only policy the opposition has is to demand more of whatever the government brings forward. They have not brought forward one concrete proposal, but still they stand up and criticize this government, from one side to the other, and endeavour to make the people of Canada believe that without the Liberals there will be doom and gloom.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he believe that this program of double depreciation for a period of one year will materially or at all significantly assist in resolving the problem of unemployment in depressed areas?

Mr. Keays: I am sure that an industry moving into an area acquiring $1 million in equipment to set up would welcome the $100,000 to $150,000 it would be allowed to retain in the form of depreciation and could use it to great advantage during the difficult period of commencing operations, usually over five years. I am sure that no company would turn down the opportunity to retain that $100,000 to $150,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the hon. member another question because I know he would like to be fair. Does my hon. friend seriously think a company is going to move into a depressed area on the basis of the offer contained in this program? Does my hon. friend think there is any industry that would move into an area unless it was assured accelerated depreciation over a long period of at least 12 years?

Mr. Keays: Is the opposition trying to make us believe that this government or any government should pay for all the capital expenditures for any project? Has the opposition become so socialistically minded that it believes we should destroy private enterprise by asking the government to pay for every company's capital operation? I would suggest that we try to retain rather than destroy that initiative which is left in Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the hon. member does not wish to answer my question, that is fine.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I feel we have just seen a very good example of a Conservative definition of socialism.

The amendment under consideration is based, although we may not have been able to notice it during the last two days, on three points. The first is that double depreciation will prove ineffective as a solution to the problems of unemployment in depressed areas. The second point was the exception taken to the fact that the responsibility for declaring an area depressed has been placed upon the municipality. The third point, of course, is that the definition of the areas themselves is too restrictive. I should like to deal briefly with each one of these three points.

We witnessed today an example of the government's approach to this problem when the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) explained away, at least to his own satisfaction, the unemployment problem. He suggested it was just a matter of statistics which did not really show the true picture at all. He may have explained this problem to his satisfaction but he certainly did not explain it to the satisfaction of myself or the unemployed people across this country or the people whose jobs are hanging by threads in the face of this great new unemployment created by the relentless march of automation.

This one program the government has brought forward seems to fit into the program outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his speech on television last Friday to which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) referred yesterday. The Prime Minister suggested at that time that we must take a stand now on whether there will be free enterprise or socialism in this country. I should like to state on behalf of the C.C.F.-New Party that we are very pleased to accept that challenge. I suggest that this is excellent ground on which to fight an election campaign. I should like to have one hon. member in this house point out to me one social problem that has been solved through free enterprise. The Prime Minister has said that we must declare war on socialism. I would suggest that in order to do so we must first abolish our post office, the socialist water we get when we turn a tap on, the socialist light we get when we press a light switch, the socialist highways we drive our cars on, the socialist fire department we call when our house is on fire, the socialist police departments, which protect us, and we would have to abolish our public works departments. We would not be able to travel through our national parks because they are socialistic parks, and we would have to abolish our socialist hospital insurance plan.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Henderson: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. From where are you going to bring all these policies? Are you going to bring them from jail?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I am afraid I do not understand the significance of that question. I was speaking merely about the socialistic things we have today upon which the Prime Minister is declaring war, if we are to believe his speech of the other night.

What will we do about unemployment insurance, old age pensions, children's allowance, the civil service, the army, navy and air force? Are we going to abolish them as well as the twenty nine corporations which are outlined at page 54 of the Auditor General's report? I would suggest that this subject would provide an excellent platform for us to fight an election on.

I was very delighted with the Prime Minister's speech on television Friday night for two very good reasons. One reason was that I did not see the telecast. The second is that when I returned to my home on the week end I received a telephone call from two individuals who said they had worked very hard for the Conservative party in the past and suggested that his speech was the straw that broke the camel's back. They were so disgusted with his announced program that they came down and joined the C.C.F. party, and I have their membership cards before me now. I hope the Prime Minister makes a similar speech every night.

There was not very long ago a much more effective telecast which brought the problem of unemployment to the attention of the majority of Canadian people. Most of the time television viewers hear references made to statistical figures of unemployment but, after perhaps commenting that it is unfortunate, they return to their bridge games or whatever else they may have been doing. The majority of individuals seeing a film or television program depicting a depressed area are not particularly impressed because they themselves do not live in that kind of place. For this reason it is not of significance to them for very long. The program of which I speak brought home to those individuals what it is to live in a home such as their own after losing their income. They realized what it meant to lose their jobs suddenly and began to wonder how they would manage under similar circumstances.

Because of the way in which the majority of people live in our country today there exist monthly fixed expenses through mortgages and time purchases. We no longer exist at a time when an individual can cut wood for fuel because we are using coal, oil or gas and these things have to be paid for. We have heard complaints about individuals who refuse jobs that pay $40 per week, not realizing they have fixed weekly expenses of $50 or over. However if they stay on unemployment insurance they would at least have an excuse for not paying these bills.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member began very encouragingly by saying he was going to discuss the three parts of the resolution.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that when I get on to this subject I tend to be carried away at times. I should like to go back and deal with the first point that was mentioned, namely the ineffectiveness of this measure. What does this measure really mean? It means a one-year break for an industry if it will go into one of these depressed areas. It means a one-year break for an industry to set up in an area which has had this problem in the past, but it can only be regarded as a problem if it is eight years old.

Why we went back to 1953 is more than I will ever understand, because in 1953 we had the Korean war, did we not? A period of war is the only time that free enterprise has ever been able to solve the unemployment problem. It did it then because the government stepped in and took direct action that provided employment. It was not due to private enterprise at all.

The greatest failure of this particular program as an unemployment relief measure is in the fact that only if industry does step in will there be even one single, solitary job provided. I disagree with the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) on most things, but he said something with which I agree. He pointed out very clearly that not too many industries are going to be lured into any of these areas by this particular measure. As I mentioned before, this is in line with the announced policy of this government which says that we can solve these problems only through private enterprise. This again is to be a private enterprise measure to try to meet this social problem, and it will fail as utterly and completely as did similar measures which have been tried in the past.

I wish to speak now on the second point. The responsibility is being passed to the municipalities themselves. This is another shining example of this government's policy which we have seen unfolding before us for the past number of years. This is the government's idea of leadership by abdication. The winter works program was passed to the municipalities. The vocational training program is passed to the provinces.

The government is abdicating the policy of orderly taxation. I do not know why the federal government should collect taxes at all, if they are to pass off all the responsibility and all the costs to the municipalities and provinces.

Mr. Thrasher: What costs?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I believe some hon. member said, "What costs?" A good example is the 97 per cent of the costs of the winter works program which has been passed to the shoulders of the municipalities.

Mr. Thrasher: What has that to do with the costs of collecting taxes?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): We see these empty gestures which have been unfolded in particular during this session. These are examples of taking a good idea, blowing it up like a great big balloon and then applying rules so it cannot be effective at all. I wonder why this government does not just admit defeat and put a padlock on the door.

We have had a good example of what is happening to the support of this government. We had an excellent example last summer in the swing of 9,000 votes from the conservatives in the city of Peterborough. This government seems to forget that the only reason they got their chance in 1957 and 1958 was that the people were fed up with the Liberals; and unfortunately people have found they are out of the frying pan and into the fire. If measures like this are the best this government can put into effect, I predict that there are going to be many more Peterboroughs across the country.

Then lastly we have the fact that the definition is too restrictive. I certainly agree that it is too restricted. We have here a measure that does not take into consideration at all what the situation is in any given area at the present time. Under this measure we could have 100 per cent unemployment in an area, a complete shut-down of industry, and still it could not qualify under this measure. What kind of a solution is that? This is the so-called solution of leading into this problem and trying to do something about it.

I think it is time this government really headed into this problem. I do not think they are fooling anybody but themselves. I think the people across the country are becoming more and more aware of the fact that either there is no ability or there is no desire on the part of the present government to try to head into this problem and do something about it.

As I said, this is just another one of the empty gestures that are presented to this house to meet a problem that apparently, in spite of the gestures that have been made, is increasing month by month at a terrifying rate in this country.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Stewart: —yesterday when the Leader of the Opposition was speaking—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East has risen on a question of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter that affects the privileges of every hon. member of this house. Today the hon. member for Skeena asked the Minister of Labour when we would be given the latest available figures on unemployment which are released by the government every month. The minister's reply was somewhat vague, but certainly he did not convey the impression that those figures would be given to us today or that they would be available to us tomorrow.

I have had these figures sent to me. These are figures reeased by he dominion bureau of statistics, and on this document is marked "8 a.m. release March 22, 1961". This document was sent to me and was put on my desk. It contains the latest figures in connection with unemployment. At a time when we are discussing unemployment, it is a violation of our privileges to be denied this information.

I have just concluded a speech on this question. If I had been in possession of these figures I would have been able, as would other hon. members, to deal with the situation even more cogently than I did. But it is wrong—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member indicate what the document is which he has in his possession.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this is from the dominion bureau of statistics, Ottawa, Canada, the labour force for February, 1961; and then in red ink through a stamp, obviously, it says "8 a.m. release March 22, 1961".

Mr. Churchill: How did you get it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This was sent to me right here—

Mr. Churchill: By whom?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —as it is sent every month—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have already risen on a question of privilege. I say that the government, having distributed these figures, should not have withheld this document—which was obviously intended to reach us tomorrow morning, because it says it is to be released on March 22, 1961—when we are debating the very problem to which these figures have application. I say this is—

An hon. Member: You are just catching headlines.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says I am just catching headlines. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that when we are discussing the question of unemployment in this house we are entitled to have the latest available figures. These figures were denied in the house today in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Skeena, and they were sent to me and put on my desk. I say that this is a violation of privilege for the Minister of Labour or the government to have caused this distribution to take place and then to preclude us from using these figures in this particular debate at this time. That is my question of privilege.

Mr. Churchill: You had better tell us how you got it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have just told the hon. member how I got it. It was sent to me.

Mr. Churchill: By whom?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not know by whom.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps the dominion bureau of statistics, or perhaps some other hon. member, but it was handed to me at my desk by one of the page boys.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will hear the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Skeena as to when these figures would be released, I said, "Fairly soon". There had been no release, to my knowledge, of these dominion bureau of statistics' figures. The hon. member says he has received them and that they are stamped with a red stamp. That sort of release is never made on this basis. Then I think the hon. member got it in a way that is not proper. Officially, these figures have as yet not been released and they will be released, as marked on them, tomorrow morning at 8 a.m. I think the hon. member for Essex East should be asked to give a full explanation as to what method he used in obtaining this release.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Labour, obviously finding himself in a very embarrassing position, now seeks to extricate himself by making this charge.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless there is a motion before the house there cannot be a debate on this question. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has made his point that what has happened is some breach of the privileges of the house. The Minister of Labour indicates that as far as he knows there has been no release of the document in question. I cannot permit a debate on the question which has been raised by the hon. member for Essex East. He has made his point, and the minister has made what explanation he wishes to give. I therefore think that, unless there is some new element the discussion must be considered closed.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree with Your Honour that with regard to the question I have raised the matter is settled, but the Minister of Labour said I owed the house an explanation as to how I got this document.

Mr. Starr: What method you used.

Mr. Speaker: I heard the Minister of Labour say that, but there is no question of privilege arising there. There is no allegation of impropriety which would entitle the hon. member for Essex East to accept the invitation to explain how he got the document. That is not the matter before the house. The question before the house is the amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Very well; I will let it stop there.

Mr. R. D. C. Stewart (Charlotte): When I was interrupted by the hon. member for Essex East on his question of privilege I had just completed saying that when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was speaking we waited—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know how the reporter is going to report the hon. member for Charlotte from the far end of the room when there are three members talking from their seats in the centre of the chamber. I trust they will hold their peace.

Mr. Stewart: I, along with other members, waited for what we thought would be words of wisdom from the mouth of the Leader of the Opposition. I thought his opening remarks, which took approximately ten minutes, were just preliminary to getting the ship of state in motion and that we would eventually hear from the hon. gentleman something worthy of a man who at one time occupied a very prominent place in the Liberal party and in this country as a whole. We expected great things of the Leader of the Opposition. However, after he had finished bemoaning the fact that he had not been allowed as much time on television as had the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) he came out with an amendment which, if it was not still-born, was at least anaemic and had apparently no chance of surviving.

The Leader of the Opposition together with others on the opposition side persists in viewing the problems of this country piecemeal. The proposal for double depreciation advanced by this government is not the only proposal designed to cure or to assist in curing unemployment. Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, you laid down the boundaries of this debate and I hope I shall be able to keep within those boundaries, but I suggest that we cannot discuss this proposal for double depreciation intelligently or satisfactorily without considering unemployment, together with some of its causes and some of its remedies. Then, too, we must consider the proposals advanced by this government, the steps already taken and the steps to be taken in the future. We must view this problem in its true and proper perspective. We must consider this as part of a great national development.

The Leader of the Opposition advanced six basic proposals. I do not intend to refer to these at great length as I think they have been admirably and sufficiently dealt with by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Phillips). I should like to confine my remarks principally to the words of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). However, before I do so I should like to refer to the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) who referred to a possible split in the Conservative ranks. Apparently the hon. member overlooked what happened in the town of New Glasgow and I would refer him to a headline which appeared in the paper published in that area. It reads: "More C.C.F.'ers Quit in Executive Fight." If the hon. member would like to see that article I will send it to him.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock I had referred briefly to the hon. member for Gloucester who was not then in his seat, nor is he in it at the present time. In this debate the hon. member for Gloucester referred in very general terms to the development of the Atlantic area, to capital assistance, and read at considerable length from the speech made by Mr. Johnson, president of the Atlantic provinces economic council. He talked about coal mining and general development in the area, including secondary industry. In the few minutes available to me I should like to examine some of those projects and some of the statements made by the hon. member and point out how erroneous some of his observations were.

I am afraid that the people of New Brunswick will feel that the hon. member has done a great disservice to his native province. I would refer this house to some approaches made to the government by the government of New Brunswick that the hon. member supported at the time. When the province of New Brunswick came to Ottawa in 1953 for assistance in the development of Beechwood, which was one of the capital projects similar to those mentioned by the hon. member in his speech, what did it receive from the Liberal administration of that day? It received absolutely nothing. I said "nothing"; I should correct that. At the opening of the Beechwood project we received a speech from the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe. We were told at the time that we were able to finance Beechwood, and if we were not we had no industries that needed additional power.

The hon. member for Gloucester talked about secondary industries, and the observations made by Professor Cairncross in his recent survey of the maritime area. When we in New Brunswick approached the late C. D. Howe for industries during the second world war we were told that we had no surplus power for industries, and when we asked for power we were told that we had no industries needing power. It was a case of being damned if we did and being damned if we did not.

During the first world war, under a Conservative administration, New Brunswick had war industries. We had two munitions plants.

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of the way in which the rules have been enforced on a number of members of the opposition who spoke in this debate, I wonder how the history of New Brunswick and the first world war can be related to the motion before the house?

Mr. Stewart: In reply to the point of order raised by the hon. member may I say that we are talking about double depreciation in depressed areas and about depressed areas arising from the lack of industry. I was going to point out that had we established industries in the second world war we would not have the unemployment that exists at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: In the light of the earlier discussion about the Atlantic area as one of those which might be considered as an area under this amendment, the Cairncross report, and the definition of what is an area entitled to this tax consideration, the hon. member is really not far off the point.

Mr. Stewart: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can find nowhere in the record any indication that at any time the province of New Brunswick came to the Liberal administration prior to 1957 it received any support.

The Liberal administration appointed the Gordon commission. I point out to my hon. friend that one of the submissions to that commission by the province of New Brunswick was—and I am dealing now with agriculture because that was dealt with by my hon. friend from Gloucester—that "capital requirements of the industry will be substantial". We received no capital assistance at that time.

The hon. member also referred to harbour developments and inmprovements as contributing to the economy of the area. I suggest to him that his constituency has received more help since 1957 than at any time during the 22 years of Liberal administration; it has received many millions of dollars more.

During 1944 and 1945 it was my privilege to visit every wharf and every breakwater in the province of New Brunswick, including the breakwaters and wharves in the constituency of Gloucester. At that time the town of Bathurst was crying for harbour developments and received none. Under the present Conservative government millions of dollars have been spent in developments. I want to refer briefly to my own constituency. In 1958 approximately 3,200 people were unemployed. This area includes part of York-Sunbury, or the town of McAdam. That was in January, 1958. In January, 1961, we had fewer than 1,200 unemployed, and at the present time there are approximately 600. I suggest that this reduction has been brought about through the national development policy of this government, through the guidance and assistance of energetic people desirous of aiding their local areas and through some assistance rendered by myself. I say it is the duty of every hon. member to enlist the right thinking people of his or her area so that together we can bring this country back to a sound and boisterous economy.

The hon. member for Timmins referred to the recent Conservative convention. I am afraid that in this instance, as in that of the Leader of the Opposition, it was a case of sour grapes. They did not want to see the expression of national unity and the support that have been given to our present Prime Minister, in his efforts directed toward national development and prosperity. We are not a divided race nor a divided nation. I defy hon. members who talk about depression to come down to the maritime provinces. We are not depressed; we are not divided. We have given the brains so that the rest of the country could develop in years past and we can do it in the future.

[Mr. Stewart.]

The hon. member for Gloucester referred to capital development in the Atlantic area. I ask him in all sincerity to name one major capital development which was established in the Atlantic area by the Liberal administration in its 22 years of office. I suggest that the record does not disclose one single solitary item. To hear the hon. member for Gloucester you would think that the Chignecto canal has developed since 1957 or that the Campobello-Lubec bridge, which is now under construction, just developed overnight. These are major capital developments and I can refer to others. There is the trans-Canada highway bridge at Hartland built under the auspices of the present Minister of Forestry (Mr. Flemming) and this government. The same is true of the bridge at Fredericton. Surely these are capital projects which were designed to help and did help the economy of the Atlantic area. I could refer to others in the Atlantic provinces.

Then there are the special adjustment grants. We heard nothing of any such grants while the Liberal administration was in power. The phrase "adjustment grants" was unknown to them. These grants were made to help the Atlantic area overcome the inequalities arising as a result of population and as a result of distance. Never before has the Atlantic area received the support and help it is receiving at the present time. We are confident that under the leadership of our present Prime Minister we can go forward as part of a united nation and so fulfil our course and our national development program.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 8.15 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 4(d) of standing order 56 as provisionally amended, to interrupt these proceedings and to put forthwith the question on any amendment before the house.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I understand that at a quarter to six tonight the hon. member for Essex East rose to make what he seemed to consider the exceptional announcement that the dominion bureau of statistics labour force figures had fallen into his hands sometime this afternoon. He seemed to think, as hon. members of the opposition do these days, that people are trying to deceive them and are saying things about them which are not true. What has happened, I might explain—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not rising on a question of privilege but to make an explanation which, to my mind, is out of order.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I should like to explain.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: As the minister responsible for the dominion bureau of statistics I might explain how the release came about.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Essex East. There was a discussion in that regard in which the Minister of Labour took part, but I refused to allow further discussion on the matter and it was closed at that time. Except with the leave of the house, I think the minister would be out of order.

Mr. Hees: Then, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Has the minister leave to make an explanation?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if I have not leave to do so then I have a perfect right, as every member of this house has, to rise on a grievance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but the minister obtained the floor to raise a matter of privilege, and in order to state a grievance now, he will have to obtain the floor again.

An hon. Member: We will do it again.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Of course, if the hon. minister had a question of privilege of his own to raise, he would be entitled to rise and raise it; but from what he had said to this point I assumed that it was an explanation concerning the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe that I was on my feet before the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pearson: Don't believe the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka on a point of order.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I should make it clear that I am rising on a matter of grievance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Too late.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; I have recognized the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Canadian papers carried a report which should make this Monday, March 20, 1961 a very gloomy day indeed for all Canadians who want the fundamental rights and liberties of the individual to be respected in Canada, according to natural law, whatever the colour, race, sex and racial origin of the person concerned.

The grievance I want to raise is the unfair treatment meted out in the pathetic case of Mrs. Louis Yuet Sun, a 30-year old Chinese woman whose father is a businessman in Ottawa and who was expelled from this country and separated from her 29-month old son who is Canadian by birth.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that such a deportation order was contrary to all concepts of natural, moral and common law. I shall not go into details as they are already known to hon. members, but let me just quote a few lines of essential information published in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen dated March 20, 1961. I quote:

(Text):

Mrs. Louie who arrived in Canada December 12, 1957, to visit her father, entered Canada on a non-immigrant visa.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Her son was born in Ottawa August 18, 1958, making him a Canadian citizen. Mrs. Louie sought to have herself declared a landed immigrant in order to remain here with her child. Her application was turned down by the immigration department.

Justice J. M. King of the Ontario supreme court twice ruled that "under the natural, moral, common law," Mrs. Louie should not be deported. "Her Canadian citizen son", he said, "is entitled to the loving care of his mother, at least in his tender years."

Justice King's first favourable decision was ruled out on purely technical, procedural grounds by the Ontario appeal court and the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if Your Honour has considered whether the hon. member is in order in calling into question a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. I respectfully submit that such is not within the province of hon. members of this house.

Mr. Speaker: I should be glad to hear the hon. member's answer to the point of order which has been taken.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I am not questioning the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada or any court of the land. My grievance is based mainly on the order of deportation which I think should not have been issued in this case. This is the basis of my grievance. I read the report of the supreme court judgment only as a detail of my grievance. It has nothing whatsoever to do—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member would answer the question as to whether or not the order of deportation was confirmed on appeal by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Deschatelets: There is no doubt that under the Immigration Act no person can be deported without an order of deportation issued by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the answer to my question is in the affirmative, and that the Supreme Court of Canada did confirm the order of deportation.

Mr. Deschatelets: Even if the Supreme Court of Canada did confirm the order of deportation, my grievance is based on the discretion of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who, I submit, failed to exercise her right of discretion in this case. The minister failed to exercise the humanitarian right which she should have exercised.

Mr. Speaker: I am not satisfied—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, could I say a word on the point of order?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, but perhaps I might state the problem that is troubling me. The order of the Supreme Court of Canada superseded the action of the minister in making the order of deportation, by confirming it. What is now in question is a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

As I understand grievance procedure, it is to raise any matter that is within the jurisdiction and competence of the government of Canada. If it were sought to complain about an order of the minister for deportation with regard to some individual, simpliciter, I can see that would be within the proper scope of discussion at this stage. However, I am doubtful about the matter that has been raised. As the matter now stands, what is in effect involved is the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand Your Honour is willing to hear argument on this point. It is true that the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the validity of the deportation order, but a deportation order—and I speak from some experience in this matter, sir—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: A deportation order may be quashed by the minister at any time, quite as legally after the courts have ruled upon it as before. Notwithstanding the fact that there was a decision of the Supreme Court, that decision did not supersede the order; it merely confirmed the minister's right to exercise an order in this case. But under the law a deportation order may be quashed at any time.

As I understand it, my hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont is arguing that the hon. lady should have quashed the order and not allowed it to be carried out. It seems to me that is a perfectly proper grievance against the government, and there is no other opportunity for discussing it because the estimates of the hon. lady's department have been disposed of.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend seems to have overlooked the judgment of Mr. Justice Norris in the supreme court of British Columbia, in which that learned judge made some rather revealing comments on the point just raised by my hon. friend. The learned judge suggested that the jurisdiction of the minister was limited in a way quite contrary to that suggested by my hon. friend, namely that when the Immigration Act and its provisions make clear what should be the disposition of a certain case, the minister has but very limited authority to interfere with the operation of the act.

As I recall it, my hon. friend used to make fast and loose with the provisions of the Immigration Act, but we are endeavouring to comply with them and with the orders of the courts.

Mr. Deschatelets: The point having been disposed of, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member would mind giving me a minute to consider this matter?

Mr. Deschatelets: This is the last reference I shall be making to the courts. My grievance is based on the racial discrimination which has been used in connection with this matter. From now on I shall not even mention any judgment which might have been given in reference to this case.

Mr. Speaker: I am not satisfied that the hon. member can do what he says he proposes to do. If his grievance is the exercise of discretion by the minister in this particular case then he has to face the fact that what he is criticizing in effect, is a confirmatory judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada which confirms the action taken by the minister. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate makes the point that the minister, notwithstanding the judgment of the supreme court, could consider the matter again and withdraw or quash the deportation order. But that would reduce the grievance to a discussion of a hypothetical case, because that has not been done. It is rather like questioning the exercise of clemency after a decision of the court has been made. I may be wrong about this, but I do not see that the hon. member can raise a grievance against the government which really is based on a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I with the greatest possible respect submit to Your Honour that on many occasions when I was minister of citizenship and immigration criticism of the part played by the government was permitted after cases had been disposed of by the courts; and, indeed, in respect of this very case which my hon. friend is now seeking to discuss Your Honour permitted me only three days ago to ask the hon. lady whether she intended to persist in the deportation of this person. I asked that question because I knew she had a perfect right to quash the order at any time.

I suggest again with the greatest respect that the word "confirm" in this instance is not the correct term. What was argued before the supreme court was whether the minister had the power to make a deportation order which was valid, and the court decided that the minister did have the power to make such an order. But the court did not substitute itself for the minister who has under the law exclusive responsibility (a) for making the order and (b) for quashing it. Surely it can be just as much a grievance that the minister did not use a discretion which the opposition thinks ought to have been used as it could be argued that the minister did wrong in exercising a power of discretion.

I submit with the greatest deference that it would be an undue restriction of the rights of the opposition and of the historic right of raising grievances if, when a discretion is given by parliament to a particular minister, as it is by the Immigration Act, the way in which that discretion may be exercised, either positively or negatively, cannot in the mind of any hon. member constitute a grievance. That is the issue which I think the hon. member is arguing.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Minister of Justice any comment on the point just made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that what, in effect, is under review in the proposed grievance is the initial exercise by the minister of a discretion given by a statute, and that the subsequent proceedings did not replace or alter that initial exercise of discretion which was an administrative act?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Your Honour. May I say that this discussion comes very close to being a discussion of a point of law in that it involves the question of the authority of the minister under the act. I recall clearly that a recent judgment given by the court of appeal in British Columbia confirmed the judgment of Mr. Justice Norris in a case in the trial court where considerations arose similar to those which are now at issue.

Mr. Justice Norris upheld that when an inquiry is made and a conclusion is reached by a special inquiry officer that a person is not admissible, there is a limit placed upon the discretion of the minister. The Immigration Act lays down certain conditions under which people may be admitted or refused, and the learned judge went so far as to say, if my memory is correct, that where the act speaks clearly the minister has no discretion in such a case. For example, the minister has no power to say, of her own motion: I think there is something about this case which warrants my departing from the provisions of the Immigration Act and therefore I am going to allow this person into Canada notwithstanding the fact that the act says such a person is inadmissible. Mr. Justice Norris stated clearly that the minister has no such discretion, and therefore the first point made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is disposed of. The minister has no discretion to make orders of that kind but has to apply the terms of the Immigration Act.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Here, apparently, an action was brought in the trial court and taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, alleging that the minister had incorrectly applied the provisions of the act in confirming the order which was made. The result of this action, I submit, in relation to the second branch of the hon. member's second contention, clearly establishes that the minister correctly applied the provisions of the act, so what hon. members opposite are really doing is attacking a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. Either they are doing that or they are saying that the minister has authority to override the act itself, which is contrary to the view taken by Mr. Justice Norris. For this reason, if I may say so with propriety, Your Honour's point is perfectly properly taken. What the hon. member is seeking to do here is to bring into question a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada.

I was looking quickly through Beauchesne's fourth edition and I find that at page 127 it is stated:

> —a member, while speaking, must not: . . .
> (a) cast reflections upon the conduct of judges of superior courts, unless such conduct is based upon a substantive motion;

I think that is all I have to say.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I just say a word in response to the points raised by the Minister of Justice? The point which the Minister of Justice did not deal with, and which is the only relevant one, is whether the minister has or has she not the power to quash this deportation order? Has that power been removed by the supreme court? I say without fear of contradiction that it has not been removed, and I say that, as a former minister who has exercised that power after a decision had been made by the courts.

Mr. Harkness: An ex-minister.

An hon. Member: And broke the law.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I did not break the law because the law says that a minister may do it. It was not a statute at all that was involved in this case; it was an order in council setting out certain classes of admissible persons. But the real point is whether or not the minister has the power to quash an order. The Minister of Justice has not asserted that he has not that power. With respect to the judgment of the supreme court, this is not in issue. My hon. friend is not seeking to discuss that, and therefore there can be no question of any respect or disrespect for the courts.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Speaker, may I offer an opinion on the point of order. Let us assume that the supreme court did quash that deportation order. If it did so, I respectfully submit that the grievance itself is the fact that the minister did not properly exercise a discretion. Even if the supreme court did quash the order, we still would have had a proper grievance in that the minister did not properly exercise a discretion. I respectfully submit that that is the real basis of the grievance, court or no court.

Mr. Fulton: A court found that she did.

Mr. Crestohl: Did the minister exercise that discretion? If she did not, we have a grievance.

Mr. Speaker: There are two points involved in the discussion as it has developed. The first is that the minister has acted in accordance with an act of this parliament.

Mr. Pickersgill: An order in council.

Mr. Speaker: She has acted in accordance with the Immigration Act, and that has been determined by the Supreme Court of Canada. Now, rightly or wrongly, it does not seem to me that this is a matter which can be proceeded with in the way proposed. I do not want to be unduly restrictive about grievances because the whole realm of public administration is open to the house on grievance procedure. It is my best judgment at the moment, without attempting to limit discussion in the future. Until I have had more opportunity to satisfy myself, I do take that view and I therefore have to ask the hon. member who has the floor not to proceed along the lines which he proposes, namely to discuss the exercise of the discretion confirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Aiken: I have a grievance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont has not yet resumed his seat.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, the whole press of this country is now referring to that matter, and is giving it the importance it deserves. Of course, the object of newspapers is to alert public opinion in a country where political propaganda has been subjecting us, for more than a year, to brainwashing in the field of fundamental rights and freedoms.

When a government is taking attitudes like that taken in the case of Mrs. Louie, it is time, I believe, to stop for a while and examine our conscience.

What is the use of having in our statutes a law on fundamental freedoms and racial equality if, on the other hand, we tolerate treatments like the one imposed on—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member indicate to me what he intends to pursue? He, it seems to me, is going directly contrary to the ruling I made.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, the minister of immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) has her share of responsibility in this matter, but I submit that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker)—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Twice you have ruled that the hon. member could neither discuss this matter nor raise a grievance arising from a decision confirmed by the supreme court. Nevertheless, the hon. member goes on discussing the same grievance.

I respectfully submit that under the orders of this house and under your decision, he is out of order.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: That is so. I did not interfere with the right of the hon. member who had the floor to exercise his privilege of raising a grievance, but not on the one which I had excluded rightly or wrongly. It appeared to me he was proceeding with the old one. Unless he can move on to an acceptable grievance I will have to ask him to resume his seat.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: A 29-month old Canadian citizen has just been separated from his mother, despite his natural right.

I say that the minister of immigration—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Deschatelets: I say that the minister of immigration has her share of responsibility in what I regard as an injustice, and I think—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: There is no doubt that the hon. member has misunderstood me and is proceeding in direct contravention of my ruling. I must ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a grievance and my grievance, sir, is that the government did not see fit by order in council, which it would have the power to do under the Immigration Act—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I propose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought the hon. member was rising perhaps in connection with the decision I had made. If he wants to rise on a matter of grievance he will have to take his turn.

Bureau of Statistics Document

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, sir, surely if my hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont is not to be allowed to proceed, the right of a member of the opposition to rise on a grievance is being—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that no point of order can be taken with respect to the right to the floor. I recognize the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, is there not something in what has been suggested? Is it open to a member supporting the government—

Some hon. Members: Order. Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I take it the hon. member is rising on a point of order. I think he is entitled to be heard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Is it open to a member of the government party to rise in the house and raise a grievance against the administration? That is the question. Is it open to a private member supporting the government to rise and raise a grievance against the government?

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I presume that is what the hon. gentleman is now going to do.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I rose earlier—

Mr. Peters: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has not yet said anything. I do not see how a point of order could have arisen. If the hon. member feels he has a point of order, of course I must hear him.

Mr. Peters: I should like to inquire from you whether the previous grievance has been disposed of? If so, is it possible to speak on the same grievance?

Mr. Speaker: No proper previous grievance has been advanced tonight in accordance with my view expressed when the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont had the floor.

DOMINION BUREAU OF STATISTICS DOCUMENT

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, when I rose earlier I said it was my definite intention to raise a matter of grievance and I feel I am now merely taking my place in the order of debate. My grievance is that at 5.45 p.m. this afternoon the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) rose in his place and indicated to the house that he had an advance copy of a dominion bureau of statistics document not to be released until 8.00 a.m. tomorrow. As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, no other member of the house had this release in his possession at that time and as far as I know no other member of the house yet has a copy of this release. If this D.B.S. release had been given in advance to the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Walker: Sit down.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, is it in accordance with our rules for a member on the government side to raise a grievance against the opposition?

Mr. Speaker: All hon. members of parliament are entitled to raise grievances against the ministry and from that point of view there is no such a thing as a party, an opposition or a government. There is just a ministry and members of parliament. I am not sure that a minister could raise a grievance against the government but apart from that it is a basic privilege of parliament to withhold supply until its objections, comments or grievances having to do with the public administration have been satisfied.

Mr. Aiken: If there is a grievance, Mr. Speaker, I think it is against the government or someone within the government service. I want to know how a government publication prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce came into the hands of the hon. member for Essex East before it should have done so. That is my grievance. I was about to say when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) rose that if this advance copy had been given to the Leader of the Opposition I would think there would be no objection. I understand, however, that the release came into the hands of the hon. member for Essex East. If he is taking the place of the Leader of the Opposition for such a purpose, there again I have no objection. However, he is a private member of the house, the same as most of us are, despite the fact that he was a member of the former government. I feel that this is a matter of grievance and one that should be explained. How did one hon. member of the house come into possession of a document which is not to be released until tomorrow morning when no other member has it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He is wide awake. That is why.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on the same grievance.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I have a right to answer the grievance.

Bureau of Statistics Document

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is customary to recognize the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate wishes to speak on the same grievance.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right. I can explain to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) without much difficulty the problem with respect to which he wants an explanation.

Mr. Aiken: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not want the answer from the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. One thing is clear. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka can only speak once on his grievance.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I rose to answer the grievance.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister will resume his seat.

Mr. Speaker: The minister will have to take his turn. I have recognized the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might explain how this came about.

Mr. Churchill: State your grievance.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is just preliminary to stating my grievance. I will explain how this document came into the hands of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). It came into his hands from my hands—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and I will also explain precisely how it came into my hands. I went up to my room to make a telephone call about five o'clock and this document was lying on my desk.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Delivered by the minister's office.

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked my secretary how it had got there and she said it was brought in by a messenger from the Department of Trade and Commerce, from which I could only conclude that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) had "boobed" again, and that does seem to have been the fact.

But the real grievance, of course, is not that. There is no evidence as to when this document was printed but it was certainly printed by today and nobody can deny that. The real grievance is why it was rubber-stamped with words saying that it was not to be released until tomorrow morning, although there is nothing confidential in it whatsoever. It is information prepared for publication and yet it was stamped that it was not to be released until 8 a.m. tomorrow at which time the debate in which it would have been relevant would be over. That is the grievance. If this document had been delivered to the hon. member for Essex East in the house at the time it was delivered to my office he would have had it to use in any way he wished in the debate as he was entitled to do.

This is simply further evidence of the way in which the government is determined, in every possible manner, to keep information away from the opposition and prevent its use in debate in the house. The plain fact is that the moment this document was printed, the moment this information was available, it should have been made available to hon. members who had been asking for it for days and who had a suspicion, which appears more and more clearly to have been justified, that it was deliberately held up because of the Tory convention. It would have been a kind of fly in that ointment, though it was pretty poor ointment anyway.

I say, sir, that nobody had any warrant for rubber-stamping this document in this way. If the minister's officials did it without his consent, it just shows how little attention he pays to his department; but if, as we are entitled to assume since he is responsible for his department, it was done with his consent and approval it shows the minister's attitude to parliament. It betrays that teenage mentality with respect to which the minister is such an authority.

An hon. Member: Very weak.

Another hon. Member: Forget the personalities.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am very grateful to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka for having raised this grievance, which is of a type which it is not usual for Tory backbenchers to raise. We are grateful that there was one member on the government side sufficiently independent, sufficiently anxious to uphold the rights of parliament, sufficiently concerned about our liberties, and sufficiently concerned about the responsibility of the executive to parliament, to bring this matter before us.

Mr. Fulton: Why did you try so hard to stop him?

Mr. Pickersgill: We have noted this teenage, arbitrary attitude to parliament; the attitude that it does not matter about parliament; the groaning, jeering and giggling about these things. These are the things for which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is so famous in the house. As to his actions outside the house, I am really sorry I do not have the clipping at hand which contains a wonderful account of a speech by the hon. gentleman with the story being headed, "Kiss 'em Hees". That is, of course, a new kind of politics in this country—

Mr. Walker: How silly can you get?

Mr. Pickersgill: —the osculatory salesman of the "bill of goods." I suppose that is what they call those teenage years before maturity.

Mr. Hees: You should know. You never got out of them.

Mr. Pearson: Political puberty.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me, sir, that if it is impossible for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to avoid these constantly repeated "boobs", if it is impossible for him to show that respect for parliament to which parliament is entitled, then it is about time the minister took himself off to some more appropriate field for teenagers and left a man's job to a man.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, having seen this latest performance I think we will all agree that vaudeville lost a great performer when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) decided to go into politics.

Mr. Pearson: It still has one.

Mr. Hees: These days, Mr. Speaker, the opposition will do anything for sensationalism. I understand that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) rose at a quarter to six tonight and, in his usual flamboyant, dramatic style, accused the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) of somehow deceiving the house or doing some terrible thing that was aimed at the dignity of parliament. I should like to explain exactly what happened in this case. A certain procedure was initiated by the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe when he was minister of trade and commerce, and this procedure has been followed since. The dominion bureau of statistics, which comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, prints two documents. The first document is a joint release by the dominion bureau of statistics and the Department of Labour, and the second is a document produced by the dominion bureau of statistics entitled, "The Labour Force Survey".

On the day before these documents are released to the press, to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), I am advised by the dominion statistician they are delivered, as they have been in the years since the Right Hon. C. D. Howe was minister, on the regular delivery at 4.30 in the afternoon—

Mr. Pearson: Never.

Mr. Hees: —of the day before the release is made. Then, I understand these documents are delivered from the dominion bureau of statistics on the eight o'clock delivery to the press gallery, to the Canadian Press, to the Leader of the Opposition and to the Prime Minister. This is the normal procedure.

Today, by mistake, a messenger brought these documents, I am advised by the assistant dominion statistician, on the 4.30 delivery and delivered them to those to whom they would be delivered normally at eight o'clock tomorrow morning. This was a mistake made by an employee of the dominion bureau of statistics. All people sometimes make mistakes. Of course, it is difficult for the members of the opposition to understand how people can make mistakes. I understand from the members of the opposition that they never do make them. People are human. This messenger made a mistake today, and he would be the first to admit it. He brought these documents by mistake and delivered them to the regular list of people to whom he would normally bring them at eight o'clock tomorrow morning.

There was no attempt to deceive parliament. There was no attempt to fool anybody. There was no attempt on the part of anybody to commit some horrible crime—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They were still withheld from parliament.

Mr. Hees: —as the hon. member for Essex East tried to intimate. The Minister of Labour, as always, did exactly what was correct. He said that these documents would be produced soon. They were normally going to be produced tomorrow morning in the regular way, just as the Right Hon. C. D. Howe did and as all ministers of trade and commerce have done in the intervening years. Just what is so extraordinary about this is rather difficult to understand. Once again, Mr. Speaker, we have heard the hon. member for Essex East, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the Leader of the Opposition, trying to make something out of nothing. This time their effort did not go over any better than it has gone over on many occasions before.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the Leader of the Opposition speaking on the same grievance?

Mr. Pearson: Yes. I am speaking on the same grievance as that which the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) was good enough to bring to the attention—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I am afraid the Leader of the Opposition has already spoken in this debate and is precluded from speaking again. He was the first member to speak on the motion and he cannot have the floor twice.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that perhaps you will recall during last session or the session before I moved an amendment to the supply motion and then spoke on a grievance which concerned uranium production and Elliot Lake. I believe at that time is was quite in order for me to speak on a grievance after the amendment had been disposed of.

Mr. Speaker: I do not recall the incident to which the Leader of the Opposition refers. There is no doubt at all that under the practice a member cannot speak twice. The hon. Leader of the Opposition did make his first intervention in moving the amendment and for my authority on this point I refer to Beauchesne, citation 204.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I am sure that the house listened with—

Mr. Hees: The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not speak on the motion; I spoke on the amendment. I should be glad to give the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) a private lesson in house procedure sometime, but not at the moment. I am sure we are all very grateful to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for this very interesting explanation. Of course, it was regrettable that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) did not have this explanation this afternoon.

When I rose on a question of privilege, the Minister of Labour at once suggested that the document had been received by me improperly, and the record of Hansard is there to show how serene he was when he made these charges. It is rather interesting that, as a member of the government, he would not have been aware of the procedures which the Minister of Trade and Commerce so objectively pointed out a few moments ago.

Mr. Pearson: All a mistake.

Mr. Starr: You were not on the list.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is interesting to note that the document was delivered to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). I have no less an interest in unemployment than they have, but it was not delivered to me.

An hon. Member: A real grievance.

Mr. Walker: You are passe.

Bureau of Statistics Document

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker), who has become an authority on these matters, whose witticisms we greatly appreciate, gives evidence of his political maturity. His sophistication endears him to everyone in this house, as well as his great maturity and understanding of the problems of government, housing, parliamentary practice and, if I may say so, his ordinary civility.

Mr. Walker: What about sewage disposal?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then, turning to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, may I say that this document is something for which he has a joint responsibility with the Minister of Labour. This is a document that is issued by the dominion bureau of statistics under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce but in connection with which the Minister of Labour has a more knowledgeable and, I may say, authoritative sponsorship. The fact is that today the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) asked the Minister of Labour when these new figures on unemployment would be revealed. It would seem that on the second day of a debate which was initiated by the Leader of the Opposition and which encompassed the question of unemployment, the Minister of Labour could easily have replied, if this government was one that was willing to give information, that these statistics will be given out today.

The Minister of Labour knew that as did the Minister of Trade and Commerce and every other minister sitting before us as well as the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). It would have been proper, at a time when we were discussing a motion to go into supply on unemployment, for the government to advise the hon. members of the house that those figures were available and that they were going to be presented tomorrow. But no, this government would not do that. This government withheld this document from parliament at a time when we were discussing unemployment.

Mr. Hees: Do not take yourself too seriously.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "Do not take yourself too seriously". Let me tell my hon. friend that after his exhibition of Friday no one takes him very seriously.

The regrettable fact is that when this document finally is revealed to the Canadian public we realize that unemployment in Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. gentleman should not take advantage of the grievance that is before the house to go into some other matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank you, Mr. Speaker. It was only the presence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that, for the moment, excited me. The fact is we are grateful to the minister for telling us what happened, and we understand how a messenger in the minister's department could make this mistake. It is regrettable, however, that the government knew this information was in its possession but did not make it known today so that this matter of the present statistics could have been before us as we discussed the most challenging problem which this government faces and which it ignores.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a grievance which is different from those which have been raised so far. My grievance has to do with the application of the regulations of the Unemployment Insurance Act as it concerns individual workers. During the winter months for a number of years it has been the practice of the government through the Department of Labour to advertise the slogan "Do It Now". This practice has invited the general public to have certain jobs done during winter months when labour is available. In the majority of cases this work consists of repairs or interior alterations to homes. I realize that the government is concerned about the situation of the unemployment insurance fund and that it is taking every means possible to protect that fund. I also realize that there have been abuses in this regard and suggest that those abuses should be stopped but feel that they should not be stopped in a way detrimental to those individual workers who, when out of work, have a right to receive unemployment insurance benefits, because they have been working on jobs which qualify them for such benefits.

I have in mind certain carpenters who have been employed for week after week on jobs of this particular kind. I know of a case involving a carpenter who was employed for a period of 14 weeks practically re-building a house. He was carrying out this construction with the assistance of two other carpenters. That man was disqualified under the regulations of the Unemployment Insurance Act because there was no supervisor in attendance at the time he performed this work.

I would suggest that in my own area most winter work involves repair jobs of this type, done by individual carpenters working on their own. I suggest that the owner of the property purchases all the material—such as lumber, paint and nails—which is needed for the job, and then hires an individual carpenter to do it. If the man is not supervised by a contractor he is denied unemployment insurance benefits.

I suggest that this government, which claims to have introduced the bill of rights in order to protect the rights of individuals in this country, is not giving to those workers the protection which they are entitled to receive. As an example of this, I must say that I know of an individual employed driving a truck for an oil company. This man required certain repairs to his house and he hired a carpenter to make these repairs over a period of six weeks. That carpenter was denied the benefits of unemployment insurance and the privilege of having unemployment insurance stamps posted in his book covering the period of six weeks because the owner of the house, working for this oil company, did not leave his job to stay alongside the carpenter to supervise him. I would suggest that this is nothing else but gross injustice and discrimination.

I will cite another example, and I might say that I have at least one hundred of them which have been brought to my attention by my constituents in the county of Gloucester. A man whose family lived in New Brunswick was working in the province of Ontario. He decided to follow the suggestion of this government regarding winter work by building a new house. When the house was nearly completed he took one week's vacation and returned to New Brunswick to inspect the work which had been done. He realized that the house needed to be painted and that a porch should be added. He accompanied his father to the unemployment insurance office to make sure that if his father did this job at the fixed rate of pay he would qualify for unemployment insurance stamps. With the assurance that he would do so, he returned to his job in Ontario. A few months later when the work was completed his father who was out of work applied for unemployment insurance benefits but was denied those benefits and the six-week period of contribution was withdrawn from his unemployment insurance book because the owner of the house had not remained to supervise the work which was done.

Mr. Brunsden: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is presumably speaking on a grievance. He has been building houses but he has not finished them, and I respectfully submit that he is out of order.

Mr. Robichaud: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have been citing typical examples of workers in this country doing jobs which would normally qualify them for unemployment insurance benefits but who are being deprived of those benefits, and I have given the reason. I suggest that an injustice is being done by the unemployment insurance commission. I have presented this grievance and related several typical examples to support it, and for that reason I submit I am perfectly in order.

I would relate one more example of this type of injustice which involves a widow who decided last summer to build a new home. She hired three carpenters to do the work. They were employed for a period of 14 weeks but again the carpenter in charge was refused unemployment insurance benefits on the ground he had performed the work without supervision. I suggest this is a further example of injustice.

I suggest that the regulations of the Unemployment Insurance Act have been applied during the last eight or ten months, following the realization by the government that the unemployment insurance fund was being depleted, in an effort to protect this fund. Since that time hundreds and hundreds of cases similar to the one I have brought to the attention of the house have occurred in my own constituency of Gloucester.

I agree that abuses must be stopped. I admit that there have been abuses. However, the method employed to stop these abuses should not be to the detriment of those workers who are doing the type of work which would normally qualify them to receive unemployment insurance benefits. If this principle is to be maintained, it means that these workers will be affected. It means that any home owner who wishes some repairs or alternations carried out to his house must go to a contractor and pay the extra cost incurred in having the job supervised.

Is this consistent with the "Do It Now" program which the government is sponsoring at this time? Is it consistent with that program that people who have been doing this type of work for years, who have families to support and who have been depending upon unemployment insurance benefits during a certain period of the winter months, are now to be deprived of this privilege? This applies with even greater force to those who work in the summer months at a period of time when there is more employment. They may be employed for a period of 14 weeks or more, as in the case I mentioned, and in the winter, when there is no work to be found, they go to the unemployment insurance office and are denied these benefits. They then have to obtain social assistance in order to provide for their families.

I urge the minister to take the necessary steps to amend the act or the regulations where necessary in order to protect these workers who are doing exactly the type of work which the government is sponsoring in the "Do It Now" program.

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to endorse everything that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) has said and I would enlarge further on the same matter. These hardships are being forced upon the so-called casual labourers, but I think there are also other aspects of this matter which illustrate another discrepancy in the implementation of the law as it is being applied today. I refer to the farmers of this country and the law as it is applied to them.

I know of cases last summer where farmers hired casual workers to carry out some repair work on their buildings or to have new barns built. In years past these casual labourers enjoyed the benefits of unemployment insurance. Last season, however, these workers applied for unemployment insurance and were denied these benefits. My question is this. What will happen to the farmers of the country if they are not allowed to secure the services of these casual carpenters and labourers?

It is bad enough that farmers should now be penalized by not enjoying the benefits of unemployment insurance for the hired help which they need on their farms. However, they are going to be further penalized by being unable to hire carpenters to do the work that must be done on their farms. I say that this situation is very serious indeed.

There is another interpretation of this measure which works against the farming population of the country. I refer to those people who volunteer to stay within the community in order to perform this kind of work and who will not in the future be permitted to do so. I think this will mean a serious blow to the social structure of rural communities. These people will now be forced to leave this field of activity; they will have to abandon this type of casual work, which is essential to the social structure of the community. These workers will have to hire out their services to registered contractors, and such contractors do not exist in rural communities.

I wish again to emphasize that the situation will simply play havoc in the organization of rural communities. Therefore I endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Gloucester. I also wish to mention another aspect of this matter which concerns those people who are being disqualified. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I am in order. I ask for your guidance in this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is entitled to discuss only the one grievance which has been raised.

Unemployment Insurance Benefits

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the grievance raised by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) I should like to make a few comments. As my constituency is very close to the constituencies of the two hon. members from eastern New Brunswick who spoke previously, I think it is only proper for me to try to give some explanation in order that there will be no misunderstanding regarding what is actually taking place.

From time to time, of course, very grave injustices are committed in the administration of the unemployment insurance fund. I receive complaints in this connection, as does every hon. member of the house, but when these complaints are investigated, quite often it is found they are not entirely justified.

A great many of the workmen involved are related by blood or marriage to the property owners in question. Invariably there is no relationship of master and servant, no contract of employment, and no fixed hourly or weekly wage, or alternatively there are no fixed working hours even on a daily rate. Supervision is not necessarily all-important. There must be a contract, expressed or implied, of servant and master or employee and employer.

The same situation is found in eastern New Brunswick as is found in many other sections of the country concerning the operation of highway trucks. In some cases the driver is the owner of the vehicle but the vehicle has been reregistered in the name of an uncle, aunt, father or mother. The driver attempts to become an employee when in fact the contractor's cheque goes to him and then in many cases is turned over to a finance company.

Mr. Speaker, those are my comments in reference to the grievance which has been raised. I would emphasize that mistakes do occur. Fortunately these mistakes are not too numerous, but we members of parliament, particularly members of the opposition, take advantage of any irregularity and in some cases are not entirely justified.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to very briefly endorse the plea made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). In support of his plea for a change in the regulations concerning the unemployment insurance administration I think he gave some excellent illustrations. I could give similar illustrations from my experience in my own constituency, but I shall not take up the time of the house by doing so now because possibly some other members may have a word to say on this grievance. I do wish to join, however, with other members who have spoken in urging the minister to give favourable consideration to these representations. The grievance advanced by the hon. member for Gloucester was supported by what in my opinion was excellent evidence from his own constituency, and similar evidence could, I believe, be obtained from other constituencies all across Canada.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I want to support the representations made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) and the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Michaud). The way in which certain sections of the Unemployment Insurance Act are being interpreted seems to be much more rigid at the present time than it was formerly and as a result, as several hon. members have pointed out, hardship is being caused to tradesmen in small rural communities.

The hon. member for Gloucester illustrated his point by giving details of a number of cases and I want to tell the house that exactly the same position arises in my own province. A number of cases have been brought to my attention from the smaller communities in my own riding where circumstances have arisen identical to those described by the hon. member for Gloucester.

There also seems to be some difference in the interpretation of what constitutes a contract of service. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat pointed out that if a man who owns a truck employs his son to drive that truck, the son is not entitled to insurance stamps. If the owner of the truck wishes to hire it to another he has to put in a driver other than a member of his own family if the driver is to be able to qualify for unemployment benefit. In my area there are many small shopkeepers who have to operate trucks in connection with their businesses, to bring freight from the public wharves or to deliver purchases to homes some distance from their stores. These shopkeepers, too, are not able to employ their children for these services unless those children are to be deprived of the benefit of insurance. It seems very strange to these people that they should have to give jobs to strangers rather than to their own sons and daughters if the right to collect stamps is to be preserved.

Returning to the question of the contract of service I may perhaps speak from my own experience. As hon. members know, most of my riding is a coastal region and in order to get about it I have to use a boat. The most economical way of providing boat transportation is to own a boat. Last fall I had to make a decision to have done to my boat some fairly extensive repairs which would provide at least two months' work for two carpenters. However, I was not able to have this work done because I was not in a position to give stamps to the men while they were so employed. I took the trouble to discuss this problem with the officials of the unemployment insurance commission in the local office at St. John's. I thought I could get around the difficulty. It was clear that I could not be on the spot to supervise the work, but I thought it might be possible to employ an agent to do that on my behalf and to put the stamps in these men's books. After some deliberation and I believe, consultation with the head office in Ottawa I was told that an arrangement of this kind could not be allowed. On that account eight months' work for some carpenter has been lost and I, for my part, have been unable to get work done which is of importance to me.

It does not seem sensible to put on a big drive to encourage people to employ men during the winter months on odd jobs, and to pay such great attention to a winter works program, and then to say: these people cannot be employed and collect stamps unless you are prepared to give up your job and watch what they are doing. It seems to me that a situation of that sort is illogical and I hope the minister will do something about it at the earliest date.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit a question? The hon. member has just made mention of men working on his boat and the difficulty experienced if workers are unable to get stamps. Is the hon. member implying that people are turning down offers of work in Newfoundland because they are not qualified for unemployment insurance on the particular job offered to them?

Mr. Pickersgill: Say, no.

Mr. Carter: No.

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to section 3 (f) of standing order 26 as provisionally amended, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on the motion now before the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

131. Departmental administration, $473,500.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

272. General administration, $5,278,399.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

279. Departmental administration, including Canada's share of the expenses of the "Resources for Tomorrow" conference, $1,105,390.

Proceedings reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it there is no change in the program for the rest of the week.

Mr. Churchill: No change. I should just like to point out that while we shall be dealing with interim supply tomorrow, that will be followed immediately by the supplementary estimates. The house might consider it wise to pass interim supply with dispatch and then carry on to deal with supplementary estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I appreciate the advice.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

FISHERIES

PROVISIONS RESPECTING POWERS OF FISHERIES OFFICERS

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-76, respecting fisheries.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to revise the Fisheries Act to bring it into conformity with the Canadian bill of rights and in accordance with the report to be tabled by the Minister of Justice under standing order No. 40, as required by the Canadian bill of rights regulations.

More specifically, the purpose is to determine whether the clauses which empower a fisheries officer (1) to accuse a person of violating fisheries laws, (2) to adjudicate on that person's guilt or innocence, (3) to confiscate without a hearing the property of persons, boats, fishing gear and fish, and which deny an appeal to the courts or to the Minister of Fisheries for restitution of the confiscated property if the confiscation is not coupled with a criminal charge, are consistent with the Canadian bill of rights.

2. If so, how many loans have been made, and what is the total amount of such loans?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as lending under the new statute began only in the late days of January the figures for that month are not significant. May I suggest to the hon. member that he might consider changing "January 31" in his question to "February 28". I expect to have the figures to February 28 next week.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not in his seat, so perhaps the question might stand.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps it might be best to drop it and let the member rephrase it. I have made a suggestion which I think would be helpful to bring out useful information.

2. If so, to whom was the assignment given, on what date, and for what target date?
3. What use, if any, was made of this study?
4. Has the study become a part of any public record?
5. Are the findings of the study an embodiment at the present time of the C.N.R.'s concept of a wage rate standard?
6. What has been the cost, if any, to the C.N.R. for this study?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. No, but the six railways, Canadian National Railways, Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Toronto-Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company, Ontario Northland Railway, Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway, Midland Railway Company of Manitoba, making up the joint negotiating committee for collective bargaining with railway non-operating unions, did have a study undertaken.

6. As indicated in the answer to part 1, the study was undertaken at the request of the six railways making up the joint negotiating committee and the cost of it was borne by the six companies. In the light of this, the Canadian National does not feel free to disclose the cost or apportionment of cost.

FEED MILL PURCHASE REPORTS

Question No. 210—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Are feed mills required to make to the Canadian wheat board periodic reports of purchases and of prices paid for grain purchased from permit holders?

2. If so, do such reports indicate the grades of grain bought?

3. On what date or dates were the reports made to the Canadian wheat board which provided the prices shown in the table submitted by the Minister of Agriculture and printed in Hansard on pages 2426 and 2427?

4. Has the Canadian wheat board any record of prices paid by feed mills for higher grades of grain than those indicated in the table referred to above?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Under the 1960-61 agreement signed by feed mills they agree to report their total purchases of wheat, oats and barley for the period from August 1, 1960 to December 31, 1960, and their total purchases of the same grains from permit holders for the period from January 1, 1961 to July 31, 1961. Feed mills are not required to report prices paid to permit holders.

2. No.

3. Each week the Canadian wheat board secures buying prices from representative feed mills in different parts of the prairie provinces. The statements filed on pages 2426 and 2427 of Hansard were compiled as at February 13, 1961 and February 20, 1961.

4. Feed mills buy ungraded grain. The prices quoted in Hansard are prices paid for wheat, oats and barley, and the tables include board initial payments for No. 5 wheat, No. 1 feed oats and No. 1 feed barley purely as a basis of comparison. No. 5 wheat is not available to all feed mills and therefore it may be assumed that feed mills do receive grades higher than No. 5 for the buying prices which they quote. Their preference, however, would be for No. 5 wheat, if available.

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

3. Yes. Mr. Powers appealed the deportation order issued against him. As two civil suits were in progress in the Ontario courts, in one of which he was the plaintiff and in the other the defendant, it was decided not to deal with the appeal until the court proceedings had been completed. On receiving notice in November, 1960, that the litigation was concluded, the appeal against the deportation order was considered and dismissed. At the same time a minister's permit was issued under authority of section 8 of the Immigration Act authorizing Mr. Powers to remain in Canada for a period of one year.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West): Could the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration say for what reason the deportation of Mr. George Lee Powers was suspended?

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I shall not attempt to answer that question. I shall bring it to the attention of the minister.

B.C. PENITENTIARY—RESIGNATION FOLLOWING DEATH OF INMATE

Question No. 216—Mr. Howard:

1. Has the Minister of Justice received a copy of a radio script of an interview by a Mr. Jack Webster of a Mr. John Banford which was given over station CKLG, North Vancouver, B.C., on Wednesday, March 15, 1961, at 6:10 p.m. and which dealt with Mr. Banford's period of employment at the British Columbia penitentiary during the time that an inmate thereof, a Mr. Johnny Waslychen, died while alone and unattended in a dissociation cell the circumstances surrounding which Mr. Banford states he brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice which action Mr. Banford claims brought about his forced resignation?
2. If so, what action has been taken, or is contemplated, as a result thereof?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The answer to the first question is yes, in that a copy of the script of the broadcast in question was received in the Department of Justice on Monday last.

The answer to the second part is that no action has been taken as a result of this broadcast, nor is any action contemplated because the circumstances are not as implied in the question or in the broadcast.

The facts are that in the course of a visit to the British Columbia penitentiary early in 1960 I decided that certain matters in connection with the administration of the institution required investigation. At that time Mr. Banford placed certain information in the hands of one of my assistants. As a result of the investigation certain administrative changes were made in the institution including a reorganization of the medical department.

I must deny categorically any claim which Mr. Banford makes to the effect that his was a forced resignation. At no time has any action been taken by myself, by the commissioner of penitentiaries or by the warden of the British Columbia penitentiary which was designed to bring about Mr. Banford's resignation or which would have the effect of doing so. The contrary is, in fact, the case. On the occasion, last September, of a review of Mr. Banford's efficiency rating to determine whether his annual statutory increase in salary should be granted, it was the recommendation of the warden that the increase should be granted. The increase was approved at headquarters and it was granted accordingly.

However, on February 8 this year, many months after the actions referred to earlier were completed, Mr. Banford submitted his resignation in writing to the warden and this was accepted. On February 15 he addressed the following note to the warden:

I am unable to accept that you have been fully informed of the causes of, and circumstances leading to, my resignation. I respectfully ask a hearing on the matter.

On February 17 the warden sent to this officer a memorandum informing him that his resignation had been sent to the commissioner of penitentiaries, and added the following:

If you wish to record any causes or circumstances which led you to the decision to resign I would request that you detail them in full in writing so that they may be forwarded to the commissioner for attachment to your resignation. I shall make arrangements to try and see you next week after your submission is received.

By memorandum dated February 22 Mr. Banford informed the warden as follows:

After careful consideration I have decided that to submit reasons for, and circumstances leading up to, my resignation to the commissioner of penitentiaries would not be the proper course to take in the circumstances.

The facts make it clear that Mr. Banford's resignation was submitted of his own volition and that he himself declined to submit reasons therefor.

WAR CLAIMS COMMISSION

1. When was the war claims commission dissolved?
2. Have the recommendations of the chief commissioner to approved claimants for awards of payments out of the war claims commission been paid in full?
3. What is the balance of moneys remaining in the fund?
4. What rate of interest is it presently earning?
5. When will the final report of the war claims commission be available for tabling?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the five parts of this question are as follows:

1. The war claims commission has not been dissolved.

2. No. Payment of the balance of the awards recommended amounting to $2,278,514.67, within the limit of the funds available is held up pending clarification of possibility of satisfaction available from sources in other countries and the finding of certain claimants.

4. Interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum is allowed on the cash in the war claims fund.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—WELLAND CANAL LIFT BRIDGES

Question No. 218—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Did the St. Lawrence seaway authority recently call for tenders for the supply of gear speed reducers for the vertical lift bridges, Welland canal?
2. Has the contract been awarded?
3. If so, to what company?
4. Did the tender stipulate that the work shall be constructed by the contractor?
5. Is the work in fact going to be performed by the contractor?
6. If not, for what reason?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the St. Lawrence seaway authority advise as follows:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. The contract has been awarded to Lyman Tube and Supply Company Limited.

4 and 5. No.

6. The specifications did not require that the work be constructed by the contractor.

EXPLOSION, D.R.B. EXPERIMENTAL STATION, SUFFIELD, ALTA.

Question No. 219—Mr. Hellyer:

1. What were the conclusions of the official inquiry into the explosion at the defence research board, Suffield, Alberta, experimental station, last November?
2. Did the report include any recommendations, and, if so, what were they?

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the two parts of this question are as follows:

1. The inquest into the death of Mr. Norman Randolph Willis on November 22, 1960 at the Suffield experimental station concluded that Mr. Willis' death was caused by the premature explosion of a gunpowder charge in a field mortar.

2. In addition to the public inquest, a technical inquiry was also conducted by D.R.B. officials. Since it has not been possible to ascertain the precise cause of this accident further tests are being carried out by D.R.B.

Starred Questions

ORDERS PLACED WITH CANADIAN SHIPYARDS

Question No. 220—Mr. Badanai:

1. What was the total amount for orders placed with Canadian shipyards during the past five months?
2. Which were the shipyards that have received contracts?
3. Has the Port Arthur shipbuilding yard been considered for a share of these orders?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian maritime commission advises that the answers to the three parts of the question are as follows.

1. According to the information furnished by the 16 major shipyards reporting to the Canadian maritime commission the total amount of orders from all sources, public and private, for new ships during the past 5 months is $36,279,399 for 21 ships.

2. Yarrows Limited, Victoria Machinery Depot Company Limited, Burrard Dry Dock Company Limited, Collingwood Shipyards, Kingston Shipyards, Canadian Vickers Limited, Geo. T. Davie and Sons, Limited, Saint John Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company Limited, Halifax Shipyards Limited, Ferguson Industries Limited.

3. Most of the orders were for private commercial account and for such work the answer to this question is not known. Orders for two small naval craft were placed on a negotiated basis and other government orders were placed after public call for tenders from all shipyards, including the one at Port Arthur.

INTERSERVICE EQUIVALENTS BOARD—REPORT OF INVESTIGATION

Question No. 221—Mr. Winch:

1. Has the Royal Canadian Mounted Police completed its investigations requested by the Minister of National Defence and of which the House of Commons was informed on July 5, 1960, into certain alleged irregularities in the interservice equivalents board?
2. If so, what were the findings, and has any action been taken on them?
3. If the investigation is not completed, when is it anticipated a report will be received by the minister?
4. Will the results of the investigation, and any action taken thereon, be given to the house by the minister?

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the four parts of this question are as follows.

1. Yes.

2. The R.C.M.P. report stated that no evidence was uncovered which would warrant any criminal charges being laid.

3. Not applicable.

4. Answered by 2.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I think I am right in putting my question this way. I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence who answered my starred question No. 221. Is the department willing to file with this house a copy of the R.C.M.P. report on their 10-months' investigation into irregularities in the interservice equivalents board?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this question would more properly be directed to the Minister of Justice than to this department.

In regard to whether or not any report presented by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would be filed, my understanding is that reports of investigations by the mounted police are privileged documents and are not filed in the house or published elsewhere.

Mr. Winch: In that case, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice whether a 10-months' investigation has been completed into irregularities in the interservice equivalents board, and whether the same will be tabled in this house.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the investigation has been concluded. The Minister of National Defence has correctly stated, I believe, the position with regard to such reports. I would certainly have to give most careful consideration to making any exception to that rule.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a supplementary question. Did this investigation prove that any members of the interservice equivalents board have been guilty—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has received the answer that the report is regarded as a privileged and confidential document, and it seems to me it would be improper to ask a supplementary question as to what was in the report.

[Later:]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might say something that would go part way to answering the inquiry of the hon. member for Vancouver East and others who are interested.

While I still must take the position that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police report cannot be disclosed, I think it would be appropriate to say that not only did the report as made to me and to my colleague the Minister of National Defence establish that no evidence had been uncovered on which to base criminal prosecution, but also the person primarily investigated died suddenly at the beginning of March, which seems in any event to bring a pretty effective conclusion to the inquiry.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I accept that no criminal prosecution can be taken; he is before a higher court.

[Later:]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct another supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. As the result of this report, has the department seen fit to change the controls and procedures in connection with the administration of the interservices equivalents board?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have changed the controls and procedures. We have tightened up the procedures to some extent.

PARCEL POST RATES INCREASE

Question No. 222—Mr. Carter:

1. Has there been an increase in parcel post rates since January 1, 1961?
2. If so, what was the percentage rate increase by provinces?
3. What will the estimated gross revenue increase amount to per year on the basis of last year's receipts?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the 3 parts of this question are as follows.

1. Parcel post rates were increased on March 1, 1961.

2. Parcel post rates are based on an extensive schedule of charges which vary according to distance and weight. Thus it is not easily possible to give an exact answer to part 2 of this question, but the rate of increase is the same for all provinces in regard to zones involved in their mailings.

3. $9,300,000.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—DEPTH OF CONNECTING CHANNELS

Question No. 223—Mr. Chevrier:

1. What was the depth of the connecting channels (lake Erie to the head of the lakes) prior to the opening on the St. Lawrence seaway?
2. What was the depth in 1960?
3. How much of this work was done by Canada, and how much by the United States?
4. What has been the cost thereof from the beginning to date?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have here the answer to this question but it is quite long and involved. May I have the consent of the house to have it printed in Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answer above referred to follows:]

1. Minimum depths when the levels of the lakes were at normal low water: down channels, 25 feet; up channel, 21 feet.

2. In 1960 and until the end of 1961, the controlling depths will be: lake Erie to Detroit, 26 feet up and downbound channels; Detroit to lake Huron, 25 feet up and downbound channels; lake Huron to lake Superior, 21 feet upbound channel and 25 feet downbound channel.

3. None of the work is being done by Canada. It is all being done for the United States government under the supervision of the United States army corps of engineers.

4. The cost to date for Canada has been $200,000. This was the purchase price of land required for the southeast bend cut-off channel in the lower St. Clair river. This channel is in Canadian territory.

SAULT STE. MARIE CANAL TRAFFIC

Question No. 224—Mr. Chevrier:

1. What was the total traffic through the Sault Ste. Marie canal (4 locks on the American side and 1 lock on the Canadian side) during the last four seasons of navigation, namely 1957, 1958, 1959, and 1960?
2. How many vessels transited the canal?
3. How was the traffic broken down by classification and type of cargo?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the reply to this question involves five pages of closely statistical material, most of it published heretofore in government publications. If agreeable to the hon. gentleman in whose name the question stands and the house, at the conclusion of starred questions I would ask that this be made an order for return and would table the documentation immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

SARNIA INDIAN RESERVE—CLAIM OF CHIEF ADAMS

Question No. 225—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Has the minister, or the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, received representations on behalf of chief Telford Adams with regard to his claims as a locatee in connection with the sale of the Sarnia Indian reserve to Dimensional Investments Limited, since November 1, 1960?
2. If so, what is the nature of these representations, and what reply has been made by the department?

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answers are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The representations consisted substantially of a request for assistance in enforcing the terms of an alleged agreement between Telford Adams and Dimensional Investments Limited, the force and effect of which is now the subject of an action in the supreme court of Ontario. The reply made by the department was, in substance, that every consideration would be given Mr. Adams, subject to the crown's contractual obligations under the agreement with Dimensional Investments Limited. Subsequently an interlocutory injunction was obtained by Mr. Adams and nothing has of course been done to assist anyone affected by it to act otherwise than in accordance with its terms. The matter is now before the Ontario courts.

Question No. 224—Mr. Chevrier:

1. What was the total traffic through the Sault Ste. Marie canal (four locks on the American side and one lock on the Canadian side) during the last four seasons of navigation, namely 1957, 1958, 1959, and 1960?

1960 SERVICE AGREEMENT, JASPER PARK LODGE

Motion No. 84—Mr. Howard (for Mr. Fisher):

For a copy of the agreement of service between the Canadian National hotels and the employees of Jasper Park lodge in 1960.

Motion agreed to.

BILL NO. C-70—CORRESPONDENCE

Motion No. 86—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, or other documents exchanged between the federal government or any agency or branch thereof and any other person, government or organization since July 1, 1957, dealing with the subject matters contained in Bill C-70.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that this motion is extremely wide in its wording. I think it would be difficult, if not impossible to comply. It asks for all correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between the federal government or any agency or branch thereof, which includes every department as well as other government operations, and any other person, etc., since July 1, 1957, dealing with the subject matters contained in Bill C-70. There is a huge area, therefore, which would require to be looked at in all departments and every agency of government. It would be necessary to examine all files back to July 1, 1957.

I submit that it would be essential to examine virtually every single file to determine whether or not it contained some subject matter pertaining to Bill C-70 which, may I remind you, sir, contains references to such matters as the financial statements of companies, the place of residence of shareholders of companies, the number of shareholders of companies resident in Canada and a host of other matters connected with corporations, as well as all the various matters connected with labour unions. In my view the scope of the motion is so wide as to make compliance with it impossible. I suggest that the hon. member consider rewording it.

Mr. Howard: Yes, I will do that. Perhaps I might rephrase it so that it can be answered.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

RED RIVER FLOOD CONTROL

Motion No. 88—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the federal government or anyone on its behalf and the government of Manitoba or anyone in its behalf since July 1, 1958, regarding the Red river floodway.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Would the hon. gentleman allow this to stand?

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be pleased to allow it to stand.

Motion stands.

SARNIA INDIAN RESERVE—CLAIM OF CHIEF ADAMS

Motion No. 89—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of any communications received by the minister, or the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, or any official of that department, since November 1, 1960, regarding the claims of Chief Telford Adams, in connection with the sale of the Sarnia Indian reserve to Dimensional Investments Limited, together with copies of the replies to any such communications.

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Could this stand, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Pickersgill: Did I understand this motion was to stand?

Mr. Speaker: I understood the hon. gentleman concurred when it was asked that it stand.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to know whether the parliamentary secretary has good reason for asking that it stand. This has regard to information that I am very anxious to acquire, and since a similar question was answered today I see no reason why it should not be dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: The request is that it stand. Is the hon. member prepared to accept that?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be unreasonable, and if the parliamentary secretary has some good reason why it should stand I will agree. If he has no reason then I feel I should press my motion.

Mr. Speaker: This is not a debatable matter, and the parliamentary secretary has asked that it stand.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister I think it would be better to let it stand.

Mr. Pickersgill: Under the circumstances, sir, I am quite prepared to postpone it until next week.

Motion stands.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONSULTATIONS WITH HONG KONG AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he is in a position to make a report to the house at this time on the trade mission to Hong Kong.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I am not in a position to make a report in detail, Mr. Speaker. The group of officials who went to Hong Kong has just returned. I have received a report, but have not had the opportunity of perusing it as thoroughly as I would wish in order to answer that question.

FREIGHT RATES

GRAIN—REQUEST FOR DISALLOWANCE OF INCREASED RATES TO EASTERN PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the statement by the board of transport commissioners that the increase in freight rates on grain will result in a decreased grain price to the producer, and in view of the protest launched by the maritime and western provincial governments, can the minister now say whether the government will disallow the increase under section 53 of the Railway Act, to which he promised on February 27 consideration would be given?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter for cabinet decision, which will be announced in due course.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the minister could clarify his reply by saying whether the announcement will be made before the increase is allowed to go into effect?

Mr. Balcer: As I said, Mr. Speaker, the decision in regard to disallowing the increase is one to be made by the cabinet, and it will be announced in due course.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

APPEARANCE OF QUEBEC MINISTER ON FRENCH PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Last Sunday evening the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation presented the program "Gala de la chanson canadienne". Mr. Gérin-Lajoie, a minister in the provincial cabinet, was a guest of honour. In view of the fact that the C.B.C. is a federal corporation, shall we presume that the Minister of National Revenue, who reports to the house for this corporation, was also invited?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

INQUIRY AS TO TRIP TO EUROPE FOR INTERVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): I have another question to ask the Minister of National Revenue, and knowing his ability to translate from French into English I shall ask my question in French.

(Translation):

The C.B.C. has correspondents in Europe. About ten days ago, a certain Mr. Gerard Pelletier went to Geneva to interview Mr. Bourguiba.

Could the minister make the necessary inquiries with the authorities of the C.B.C. to know the reasons, if any, for not employing one of the regular correspondents of the C.B.C. instead of spending a large sum of money to have Mr. Pelletier make a free trip at public expense, or rather at the taxpayers' expense?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

OTTAWA RIVER—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROPOSED DEEPENING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Following the statement made by the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister on the deepening of the Ottawa river to Montreal, as reported in the news this morning, may I ask the minister whether a study has been made of the economics of this route, as well as the cost thereof? Can the minister tell the house what is the result of the study regarding both these points?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I must thank the hon. member for Laurier for giving me notice of this question. The answer is that a study is being made based on an earlier engineering survey and other public documents, but the study has not as yet been completed. Does that answer the question?

Mr. Chevrier: I would like to ask a supplementary question. Could the minister inform us whether in the course of this study consideration is being given to the depth of the channel as well as to the raising of the bridges?

Mr. Walker: In reply to the hon. member I might say that my department is simply making an engineering survey.

Mr. Chevrier: I would like to ask a further supplementary question. Does the minister not think that having regard to a matter of this importance there would be required, on the part of the government, an engineering commission to go into the whole problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is now endeavouring to present a case rather than to seek further information or the elucidation of an answer.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, sir, it seems to me I have the right within the rules to ask the minister whether instead of the study which he is making through his officers there should be an economic survey or an engineering survey made of the whole route of the Ottawa river. That was my purpose in asking the supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's supplementary question, it seemed to me, was framed rather as an argument—"does the minister not think this or that"—and not a question asking for information, but the presentation of a point of view of the hon. member for Laurier. The rules indicate that questions should be made in search of factual information and should be presented in that way.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me then ask this question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister indicate whether the government will consider an economic survey of a board of engineers to consider the route and the depth of the channel?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I am just the Minister of Public Works, and a matter of this kind would have to be decided upon by the government.

Mr. Chevrier: In that event, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if he will give consideration to the establishment of a board of engineers to consider the route, the depth and the economies of a deep waterway from Ottawa to the St. Lawrence river at Montreal?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Public Works has pretty well answered that question. I am not at all impressed with the suggestion, and I will go no further than that.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's announcement in the house, I think in mid-December, that a study was to be undertaken to study the studies that had already been studied, to see whether a further study was necessary—and I think this is a correct interpretation of what transpired at that time—has the minister anything to report on the study that he announced at that time in connection with the engineering or economic studies of the Ottawa-Georgian bay route?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, my department is carrying on an economic survey of the Ottawa river. I have not yet received the report from my officials.

QUEBEC—ACQUISITION OF LAND TO WIDEN FERRY APPROACH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport?

Could the minister tell me when he will be in a position to give an official and final answer to the authorities of Quebec city with respect to the transfer of lands required for a start to be made on construction of Champlain boulevard?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have had a phone call from the mayor of Quebec city in that connection. I immediately got in touch with my officials, and according to the report I have received this morning, I understand, subject to confirmation, that the plans have now reached Quebec city. On the basis of my latest information, the plans have reached Quebec city and the reply is to be forwarded to city hall at any moment.

INCOME TAX

CHARITABLE DONATIONS—REPORTED CHECKING OF BOOKS OF ROMAN CATHOLIC PRESBYTERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

Could the minister indicate whether instructions have been issued to his staff to conduct investigations in presbyteries of the province of Quebec with regard to tax receipts signed by the pastors of the various parishes?

Does the minister intend to put a stop to these searches which appear unwarranted, to say the least, in view of the fact that our priests are not and cannot act as tax collectors on behalf of the federal government?

(Text):

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of administration on which I will make inquiries and report in due course.

COAL

RAND REPORT—STUDY BY INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. The minister informed the house on February 14, five weeks ago, that the interdepartmental committee set up to advise the government on the Rand report expected to complete its study in a few weeks and report to the cabinet accordingly. Can the minister now state whether the recommendations have reached the cabinet, and if so, what is the nature of those recommendations?

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, the committee in question has not yet completed its study on the subject, and I cannot say when we will receive the report.

(Text):

THE CENSUS

INQUIRY AS TO RECRUITMENT OF WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I should like to direct a question to the minister's parliamentary secretary. Are workers being recruited at present for the taking of the 1961 census? If so, what method of recruitment is used, and are local offices of the unemployment insurance commission asked to provide personnel for census taking?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's inquiry covers a fairly wide range when one has regard to the extent of the census and the number of workers who may be involved. I suggest the hon. member put his question on the order paper in order to obtain a comprehensive answer.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED REPEAL OF SECTIONS OF ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I regret that I did not have an opportunity to send notice of my question.

Has the attention of the minister or her parliamentary secretary been drawn to a decision of a magistrate's court in Lillooet, British Columbia, to the effect that an Indian charged with being in possession of liquor off a reserve, in violation of section 94 of the Indian Act, was found not guilty as charged because section 94 was held to be in conflict with the bill of rights? If so, would the minister care to comment on this matter in order to have the relative discriminatory—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. member whether he is not asking for a legal opinion in his question. There was a good deal of noise coming through the amplifier and I was not sure that I followed his question correctly. However, it appeared to me to be a request for a legal opinion.

Mr. Howard: No, Mr. Speaker, it was not a request for a legal opinion. I asked whether the attention of the minister had been drawn to this case and whether the minister would care to comment on it from the point of view of having the relative discriminatory sections of the Indian Act repealed.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps in its last import the question is asking for a declaration of policy with respect to the revision of part of the Indian Act. If the minister wishes to declare policy in answer to an oral question without notice, I have no objection but it is not customary to do so.

CHIEF TELFORD ADAMS—PROTECTION OF INTERESTS IN LAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will the parliamentary secretary give an assurance that the department, as trustee for the Indians, will take adequate steps to protect the legitimate interests of Chief Telford Adams in the Sarnia land matter?

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I will take note of the question and advise the minister.

LIVESTOCK

QUEBEC—REPORTED OUTBREAK OF HOG CHOLERA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister aware of the hog cholera epidemic in the areas of Nicolet-Yamaska and Drummond-Arthabaska and, if so, what action has been taken to stop this epidemic?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the last few days there has been a resurgence of hog cholera in four counties in Quebec, Drummond, Kamouraska, Nicolet and Bagot. Yesterday the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot consulted with me on these matters. I am able to now inform the house that a senior official of the health of animals division is now in the province of Quebec and is making arrangements to use the powers that we have under the act to try to control the flow of hogs into and out of those four counties in an effort to stop the disease in the next four or five weeks.

SHIPPING

REPORTED PRESENCE OF RUSSIAN ICEBREAKER OFF ATLANTIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he has any knowledge of the presence of a Russian icebreaker engaged in the seal hunt in the waters off the Canadian Atlantic coast, as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): In the clipping which the hon. member sent me I do not find any mention of an icebreaker. In any event, the Royal Canadian Navy has no knowledge of the presence of a Russian icebreaker in coastal waters off Canada. Large Russian vessels which have been operating in the fishing areas off the Canadian coast are believed to be strengthened for operations in the ice.

COMBINES

KINGSTON—REPORTED IDENTICAL BIDS ON ELECTRICAL EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, notice of which I gave him some days ago. My question arises out of information given to me by the public utilities commission of the city of Kingston, to the effect that the commission has received identical bids from various companies for the supply of electric cables, transformers, meters and street lighting fittings.

In view of this evidence indicating a combine in the electrical industry, is the minister prepared to order a full investigation to be made under the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. In reply I am glad to inform him that the matter has been brought to the attention of the director and is presently being examined to determine whether an inquiry is warranted. The general practice is that no information is given out as to whether an inquiry is being pursued unless and until a report is published.

REPORTED COMPLAINT AS TO ADMINISTRATION OF ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder if I may direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask whether he has received a letter from a friendly colleague of the hon. member for Russell, Mayor Whitton, complaining about the ineffective administration of the Combines Investigation Act. If so, can the hon. gentleman indicate what action is contemplated as a result of that letter?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I have no knowledge of any letter from the hon. member for Russell—perhaps I misunderstood the question.

Mr. Howard: I asked the minister if he had received a letter from a friendly colleague of the member for Russell, namely Mayor Whitton.

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker, but I have received notice through the newspaper columns, and I am awaiting the letter with the greatest of interest.

AIRPORTS

MALTON—INSTALLATION OF HYDRANT REFUELING SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. May I ask the minister whether the Department of Transport has decided to let, or is about to let, the Malton airport hydrant refueling contract without calling for tenders?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): In view of the technical complications involved in providing a hydrant system to satisfy the requirements of all the various air lines and all the various fuel contracts, and because the system is required primarily to meet technical requirements including essential safety standards, the department has decided not to instal its hydrant system at the Toronto international airport. Instead it has asked the air lines if they would be willing to make the necessary arrangements on a joint basis, either directly or indirectly, to see that a hydrant system to satisfy their own requirements is developed at the Toronto international airport on a private enterprise basis. This matter is therefore being handled by the air lines themselves and not by the department.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL AND TERMS OF REFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position, or whether he will be in a position shortly to announce the appointment of the royal commission on medical care insurance?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I trust so.

Interim Supply

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Can the Prime Minister say whether he is now in a position to tell the house with greater precision when the report of the royal commission headed by Professor Vincent Bladen will be made available?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

UPLANDS AIRPORT, OTTAWA—REPLACEMENT OF SERVICE STATION STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the fact that the commanding officer of the R.C.A.F. station at Uplands, Ottawa, discharged the civilian staff employed at the Fina service station and replaced those employees with air force personnel? If so, will the minister investigate the use of service personnel in connection with the operation of a non public fund project.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): I know nothing about this. I can inquire into it.

SUPPLY

INTERIM SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

That a sum not exceeding $638,909,350.10 being the aggregate of

(a) one sixth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1962, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $614,823,482.50;

(b) one half of the amount of item 227 of the said estimates, $650,000.00;

(c) one third of the amount of item 38 of the said estimates, $233,333.34;

(d) one sixth of the total of the amounts of items 191, 198, 199, 271 and 307 of the said estimates, $2,038,429.67;

(e) one twelfth of the total of the amounts of items 63, 277, 370, 398, 456, 459, 464, and 469 of the said estimates, $21,164,104.59, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1962.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On April 1 we will be entering on a new fiscal year, Mr. Chairman. The main estimates for the new fiscal year have already been tabled. The present resolution and the legislation that it foreshadows seek a vote of supply required to meet the expenses of government for the months of April and May.

In general, one sixth of all items is requested and with respect to 15 items in particular additional fractions of the items in question are requested, these in all cases relating to programs which do not fit precisely into the month by month succession of the 12 months of the fiscal year. In general, these are programs that require to be expedited or advanced during the earlier part of the fiscal year.

I give the usual undertaking. The passing of the bill to be founded on the resolution will not prejudice the rights and privileges of hon. members to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration in the committee of supply. I give the usual undertaking that such rights and privileges will be protected and will not in any way be curtailed or restricted as the result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the request of the government for interim supply gives hon. members of the commons an opportunity to exercise their historic, constitutional right of introducing questions for consideration and if necessary for redress and raising grievances if they so desire before the supply is granted.

The minister has asked us for interim supply reserving all the rights of hon. members for discussion subsequently when the estimates are introduced and supply is requested again. The hon. gentleman has made the request for interim supply in order to meet part of a record level of governmental expenditure which has now reached for the year, I think, a figure approaching $6,300 million. With the supplementaries that have already been brought down and without considering any further ones that may be brought down, this figure, I believe, is over $400 million above that of last year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No supplementaries have been brought down for 1961-62.

Mr. Pearson: I referred to last year's supplementaries.

Mr. Benidickson: It indicates a trend.

Mr. Pearson: The estimates and supplementaries indicate a trend of increasing expenditures reaching record levels including something over $1.5 billion for welfare payments to be made by this free enterprise government.

As a result of this and other factors we have now to consider record deficits resulting not only from increased expenditures but from lower revenues which are themselves due very substantially, I think, to the recession in our economy from which we all hope it will soon emerge; and there are some encouraging signs of that emergence.

That strong hammer in the anvil chorus of constructive criticism against the government, the Toronto Globe and Mail, in an editorial entitled "Diminishing Returns" on January 30, 1961 had this to say, and these are interesting words from the editor of that paper:

> If the Diefenbaker government must operate at a deficit—as it has done ever since attaining power—it is better to have the deficit result from the lower revenue produced by reasonable tax rates than from the lower tax revenue produced (as in December) by excessive tax rates. That way, the economy will have a chance to grow; that way, the reasonable tax rates will eventually produce more than the excessive ones; that way, the Diefenbaker government—if it will curb its appetite for spending—can move toward a balanced budget.

Referring to the estimated expenditures the editorial concluded:

> This enormous spending does not boost the economy, but throttles it; does not increase the number of jobs, but reduces them; does not provide "security", but makes every Canadian—employed or unemployed—the less secure. Canada's economy cannot afford this sort of profligacy; the December tax returns show it; Mr. Fleming should see them for what they are—handwriting on the wall.

As I have just said the cessation of expansion in our economy is largely responsible for the situation. I quote from an article by Mr. Ronald Anderson in the Toronto Globe and Mail of January 26, 1961:

> Canada's economic growth has slowed almost to a standstill during the past four years. Since 1956 the dollar value of the gross national product has increased by 16 per cent, but in volume terms the gain was less than 6 per cent.

When we consider this situation of very high expenditures which is bound to cause anxiety to anyone who has at heart the welfare of the country and the employment of its citizens, we should remind ourselves that all these expenditures come out of our pockets as taxpayers. All of them are made by us directly through taxes or indirectly, if we try to escape this obligation, by runaway inflation. Nevertheless it is true that, in a time of economic stringency or unemployment, emergency tax adjustments may at times have to be made which would certainly not be justified in more normal and expansive conditions.

It is also true that in a time of emergency and stringency, expenditures may have to be made which would not be justified under normal conditions.

It was not very long ago that this government told the country that the solution for our problems was through huge expenditures for public works. That solution which was a phony one from the beginning in the terms in which it was put has, of course, recently been dropped, so to speak, by none other than the Minister of Public Works himself. However, as I have said, in these situations there are times when expenditures which normally would not be justified may have to be made. There are various kinds of expenditures and the government should be very selective when they are made. That selection should be based on the expanding of the economy that the expenditures will create and not on saddling the economy with extra expenditures which will be still there in their effect when the economy has gone through its period of stringency and emergency.

The governor of the Bank of Canada in his very important and interesting report, about which I will have something more to say shortly, has this to say on page 12 with regard to expenditure, and we are being asked this afternoon in this committee to meet at least some of that expenditure:

> In particular, investment in human capital can at times do more for growth of output than investment in physical capital. Improved education in general, higher education for a larger proportion of those leaving high school, technological development and training, scientific research, and the development of skills and aptitudes of the widest diversity as required in modern industry, can produce very marked increases in productivity and in total production.

That substantiates my own argument that if we have to make expenditures in this kind of situation they should be expenditures designed to increase productivity. The governor goes on to say:

> Such an improvement in human capital can help to develop new forms of industry and rapid expansion in the advanced technologies more effectively than can be achieved merely by straining for more and more physical investment whether provided by foreign investors or otherwise.

In the economic and fiscal measures which the government may have to take to provide for the expenditures which they feel are required, there cannot be satisfactory and constructive results without associating measures in the field of economic and fiscal policy with monetary policy itself, indeed, monetary policy is directly related to high expenditures and to deficits. It will be no surprise to the committee, Mr. Chairman, when I say that we feel that in this field of monetary policy there has been a shocking lack of co-ordination between the government and the Bank of Canada, the bank which is responsible for action in the monetary field, though in our view the government itself must remain responsible ultimately for the policies within which action is taken.

This matter has caused a great deal of discussion in the country and has a direct bearing on today's request for supply. It arose the other day at the Conservative convention. When the Minister of Finance was asked a question on the subject he is reported in the Toronto Star as having replied as follows:

> ... the Bank of Canada was responsible for monetary policy while the government was concerned with fiscal matters. However, since both fields offered an opportunity to deal with economic problems, their policies should be parallel and harmonious.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the minister is correct in saying that their policies should be parallel and harmonious; and surely it is the responsibility of any government to take steps to ensure, by accepting responsibility for policy, that these policies are parallel and harmonious. Yet the government has refused not only to take the steps that are required but to accept any responsibility for taking those steps. Again, I quote the following from the Globe and Mail of February 23, 1961.

Mr. Pallett: You should quote this morning's Globe and Mail.

Mr. Pearson: I read the Globe and Mail every morning. The editorial reads in part as follows:

> It is pitiful to see a minister of the crown so clearly contradicting himself for the sake of political expediency.

The editorial is dealing with the question of responsibility for monetary policy.

> Yet we can stand the humiliation of a minister. What is not tolerable is that a responsible minister, for the sake of political expediency, should perpetuate and spread, within the country and abroad, dangerous confusion concerning economic policy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Particularly the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pearson: Within the country and abroad, says the Globe and Mail, it is intolerable that a responsible minister, for the sake of political expediency, should perpetuate and spread this dangerous confusion. Surely it is time that parliament looked into this matter to see what can be done to remove these confusions and to ensure, in the words of the minister, that in the field of monetary policy the Bank of Canada and the government should be harmonious and proceeding on parallel courses. That is why we have been asking the government for weeks now to refer this very important report of the Bank of Canada to a committee of the house. Indeed, it is perhaps the most important report by the Bank of Canada that has yet appeared. We asked for this procedure before the report itself appeared and in answer to earlier questions we were told that when the time came shortly for the tabling of the report that would be the time to decide what should be done about it.

After the report was tabled we asked again that it should be submitted to a committee. In fact, I asked the Prime Minister only yesterday to have the report submitted to the banking and commerce committee of the house for purposes which I have already indicated are so important, and the Prime Minister stated in reply that this was a matter for determination by the committee itself. We are asking now that this report should go to this committee or some special committee. If the banking and commerce committee, because it is overburdened with work or for some other reason, does not wish to examine this most important report dealing with this very important matter, then we ask that it should go to a special committee. The report does not deal only with the most important question of monetary policy. There is much in it that goes beyond monetary policy. Therefore if the banking and commerce committee is not in a position to deal with it we ask that it be submitted to a special committee.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, this is a course which has already been recommended in an impressive way by the Ottawa Journal in an editorial on March 16 from which I can perhaps quote a few words.

> It might be said that the governor of the bank should not have thus to explain his mysteries to parliament—

By appearing before a committee.

> —else in the event he appeared to lose the detachment and dignity that should be his. The Journal rejects this.

We on this side reject it too.

> We reject it for we are not suggesting he appear before one of the conventional committees such as banking and commerce, where there would be the conventional push and pull, pouncing and defending, clamour and confusion.

Parenthetically may I say that would seem to be a little hard on the banking and commerce committee. If that committee decided to look into this matter we are confident that it would do a good job, but that is a confidence which is not shared by the editor of the Ottawa Journal. The editor goes on to say:

> A smaller and well-selected committee, probing rather political, could surely serve here a purpose as useful to Mr. Coyne as to parliament itself. Mr. Coyne has elected to take his case to the country in public speeches. The Journal has commended him for this and for the courage of his assertions. But if he is to step down from the eyrie of his bank to state his views to the people he should also be available to the cross-examination of the people, to the enlightenment of both.

We ask the government to take action which will make possible this examination of the governor's report and of the governor. The Minister of Finance has already indicated, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, that he is going to make a report to the house on this matter during the current week.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say a report.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps "report" is the wrong word.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): An announcement of great significance.

Mr. Pearson: The minister said he would deal with the matter next week, and that is this week. If we are to be informed in due course that a royal commission is to be set up on monetary policy, that will not meet the objectives which we have in mind and which I am attempting to state today. No royal commission, Mr. Chairman, can take away from the members of this committee their right or their duty to examine this matter which is one of immediate and great importance. A royal commission might be used as a device to shelve this whole question for years. We are asking this government for an examination of this matter now on the basis of the report which has been tabled and which, I think I am right in saying, has been considered by a committee of this house in the past.

I hope the minister will be able to reassure us on this point before he asks us to take action in regard to interim supply. I am thinking of an examination of this report not merely because it deals strictly with monetary policy, important though that is. I am thinking of the statements made in this report by the governor of the Bank of Canada which go far beyond monetary policy and which enter the field of fiscal and economic policy. These statements indicate that the governor has some ideas or some proposals which might help this country out of some of its economic difficulties. It is because of the importance of those statements by this important man that I venture, before I sit down, to read from this report, and to substantiate my statement that it goes far beyond the strict operation of monetary policy. I am not criticizing the governor for doing this because it has been done in past reports.

Mr. Coyne has this to say as recorded at the bottom of page 16 of this report:

> Large-scale unemployment is an indication of failure on the part of all of us collectively to make the most effective use of the resources of modern technology and social organization. When the economy as a whole operates at less than full capacity—

That is the situation now with 726,000 people out of work.

> —we are not producing the maximum possible supply of goods and services for use today, either for consumption or for increasing our capacity to provide a higher rate of production and a higher standard of living tomorrow. The nation as a whole suffers real economic loss, and it is avoidable economic loss, in addition to the personal loss and frustration of those particular persons who are seeking work and unable to find it. It seems to me only common sense, when considering the economic, social and personal problems of unemployment, that no price is too great for the community as a whole to pay in order to achieve full production and reduce unemployment to the lowest possible level.

That is a very important, straightforward statement from a man who is in a very responsible position and who has great authority and responsibility in the field of monetary policy. Surely it would be proper to examine the governor and the officials of the bank on statements of that kind. I should like Mr. Coyne to elaborate and perhaps be a little more definite about what can be done to realize the objectives which he has set out in this paragraph and which he says can be realized if the community is willing to do so.

Then the report goes on in this way:

> A central bank must be opposed to inflationary methods which involve excessive monetary expansion.

There can be no quarrel with that statement.

> But the adoption of any policy or any combination of policies directed towards establishing and maintaining full employment, and maintaining a high rate of steadily continuing economic growth without inflation, is not in any way prevented or limited by the central bank or by a sound money policy.

Presumably what the governor of the Bank of Canada means by that is that if there is a sound monetary policy—he asserts that the monetary policy followed by the bank has been sound—then within that policy and without inflation the government can take steps in the fiscal and economic fields to bring about and maintain a high level of employment. As Mr. Coyne puts it:

> There is no financial obstacle to the carrying out in a non-inflationary way of any program which is physically possible, if the community is willing to make the appropriate arrangements and put into effect whatever changes in the use of physical resources and changes in the distribution of real incomes may be involved in such programs.

Something else is required, Mr. Chairman, in addition to the will of the community and that is sound, bold and strong leadership on the part of the government of the day. This is what we are requesting. Every member of the House of Commons has his own responsibility to assist in this regard. Surely it would be desirable, if it is practicable, to have this report and the matters contained in it submitted to a committee of this House of Commons.

I should like to give one more quotation from Mr. Coyne, following what I have just read. He says:

These are the real factors involved, which cannot be avoided, whatever method be favoured to deal with them.

He is talking about the will of the community to take action. I have added the requirement of sound, bold and strong leadership on the part of the government. He says:

Inflation itself is one method of inducing changes and adjustments in the use of physical resources and in the distribution of real incomes—but there must be more equitable and efficient ways, better ways of sharing the real costs and ultimate benefits of full employment policy and other constructive economic and social policies.

These are impressive words in an impressive and, in some respects perhaps, controversial report. Because it is so impressive and because in some respects it is controversial this report should be examined by a committee of this house. This matter should not be referred to any royal commission as a device for avoiding a parliamentary examination. Therefore, before supply is granted, we ask the minister, whether or not he can give us some reassurance that this procedure will be followed.

Mr. Argue: The country faces at the moment a very grave unemployment situation which, as has been demonstrated in the figures made available today, is steadily worsening. Monetary policy has a very important effect on the economy, the whole problem of unemployment, surplus agricultural commodities and other important economic questions. When the Minister of Finance was in opposition he complained about high interest rates, and about the tight money policy the former government was following. He complained that they were not following a policy of lower interest rates and an expanded money supply. Now that the minister is in office, he seems to be determined to do exactly the opposite of what he recommended when he was in opposition and to adopt policies which are the opposite of those he put forward at that time.

The country faces a grave unemployment situation. The government has failed to deal with it. The statistics cannot be pooh-poohed or laughed off, even if hon. gentlemen opposite would like to do so. These figures not only show 719,000 unemployed in the week ended February 18 but show that in certain parts of Canada this matter of unemployment is extremely serious. They show that 18 per cent of the labour force is unemployed in the Atlantic region. This government has not put forward any program to deal with the problems in that region. When questions regarding coal policy are raised the government holds a conference but does not decide upon any policy. There is almost one person in five unemployed in the maritimes.

[Mr. Pearson.]

The figures show that 14.5 per cent of the labour force is unemployed in Quebec. This means that one person in seven suffers all the miseries of hardship, physical and mental, which flow from such a situation. Still the government does not act. Apparently the government is not concerned about this unemployment because it refuses to take steps to find a solution to the problem.

Let us consider these figures in regard to the prairie region where we find a better situation than that in the rest of Canada but still 7.1 per cent of the labour force is unemployed, or one person in 14.

The unemployment situation in the Pacific region is exceedingly bad, with 13.9 per cent of the labour force unemployed, or approximately one person in seven.

In the province of Ontario these figures show that 8.6 per cent of the labour force is unemployed. This a serious situation. It is not quite as bad as the national average, but still it is severe. This indicates that one person in 12 is unemployed. Although the province of Ontario is relatively better off in regard to unemployment than are most of the other provinces, nevertheless, in the great city of Toronto public welfare officers have made the statement that there is hunger in the city, that people are suffering from the lack of food. In spite of this situation the government fails to take any action with regard to monetary and other policies.

The governor of the Bank of Canada has been criticized very severely in recent days. The Minister of Finance takes a rather strange attitude towards this criticism. He states that the Bank of Canada is entirely separate from the government. The Minister of Finance states that he is not responsible for anything the Bank of Canada does, or for any statement made by the governor of the Bank of Canada. According to the Minister of Finance the Bank of Canada and the governor are laws unto themselves. Although this seems to be an alibi that the minister is putting forward, it would seem to me that the government must agree with the policies that are followed by the Bank of Canada or the government would change those policies. Surely in our democracy we have not yet arrived at the point where the government can say that all of these things are the responsibility of the Bank of Canada, that the government has abdicated its responsibility and that the Bank of Canada is running the country.

I believe the record will show that I made this suggestion first during this session, but in any event the opposition members of both parties have asked time after time that this whole question of monetary policy be referred to the banking and commerce committee. The minister has taken a non-committal attitude in this regard. He has not said that this will not be done or that he opposed it, but has just not taken any step to see that it is done. When I asked him a question in this regard on December 8 he replied that the annual report of the Bank of Canada had not been received but that when it was received the house could take action if it wished to do so. I suggest that now is the time for the government to send that annual report to the banking and commerce committee where a full inquiry can be made into central bank policies and into depressed economic conditions which exist throughout the country. I would suggest that it is perhaps of greater importance that an inquiry be made into the financial policies which are now being followed by the government, and in order to regularize such a procedure I would suggest that this parliament should refer not only the Bank of Canada report to that committee but also the estimates of the Department of Finance. The Minister of Finance should also be available to that committee in order to answer questions. Let us turn the spotlight of public opinion on this colossal failure of the government to deal with the economic crisis currently facing the Canadian nation.

Instead of dealing with this unemployment problem the government seems determined to adopt measures that will make a solution more difficult. High interest rates have made borrowings by provincial governments very difficult. High interest rates have rendered the whole question of municipal finances almost unbearable. Nevertheless the minister is apparently content with the very high interest rates being paid in this country today. They may be all right from the minister's point of view because the government has almost unlimited powers of taxation, but they are certainly not all right from the point of view of provincial governments, many of which have been forced into deficit budget positions, a situation which has placed unbearable burdens on the municipalities in this country. I suggest that now is the time for the government to end this high interest rate policy and to reduce the interest rate as a start on a program that will provide full employment.

It would be interesting to have the governor of the Bank of Canada before the banking and commerce committee because he has said that he knows how to solve the unemployment problem without any inflation taking place. This is the man with the greatest responsibility in regard to monetary policy in Canada and he says in his annual report that we in Canada can have full employment without inflation. Apparently this government is not prepared to have his programs spelled out by having Mr. Coyne appear before the banking and commerce committee.

If the Minister of Finance is not interested in the question of recession and widespread unemployment personally, he should be interested from a political standpoint. Not only is the country suffering generally from unemployment. I would suggest there is every indication that the Tory party is suffering through its failure to solve the problem.

The governor of the Bank of Canada has said in his report that there is no financial obstacle to the carrying out in a non-inflationary way of any program which is physically possible, if the community is willing to make the appropriate arrangements and to put into effect whatever changes in the use of physical resources and changes in the distribution of real incomes may be involved in such programs. The governor of the Bank of Canada says further that we can have full production and full employment, and can do all of these things in a non-inflationary way. The Minister of Finance on the other hand apparently does not want to hear about this, and does not want to listen to Mr. Coyne give details of this program. He refuses to have this annual report considered by the banking and commerce committee, but I would suggest that is the way in which to deal with this subject.

I would suggest that the way to deal with the problem of unemployment in Canada today is quite clear.

The government has to undertake policies of the same kind as those that were undertaken by a Liberal administration during the war. This problem has to be attacked by an expansion in the money supply, by an increase in the purchasing power in the pockets of the people of this country and by calling on the people of this nation to invest their own money in the productive resources of our own country and not to depend on United States money. This policy should be followed by one of price regulations when necessary in order to prevent an increase in the general price level.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? He is of course familiar with the debates we used to have years ago on this subject, and he understands that it was pointed out by those who were administering price controls that they could not enforce them without wage controls. Do I understand that the hon. member is advocating wage controls as well?

Mr. Argue: I know that the minister thinks this is a really tough question, but I do not think so. I think wage control flows from price control. You do not have to set a rigid control on wages in order to have the level of wages influenced and largely controlled by the price level. Show me any depressed industry in Canada today and I will show you an industry where wages are low.

There is no arbitrary control of the wage level in the coal industry, but wages are low. There is an arbitrary control at the moment although there have been attempts in the past—and we may get a dose of it soon—to freeze the wages of the railway workers, but they are very much controlled because in recent years this industry has not been one of much profit.

Therefore in answer to the question of the Minister of Finance I would reply that we in this party say there should be a control of prices in the key industries in this country. If you regulate prices, this control in itself has a very definite influence on wages. I may say to the minister that some of the people most strongly in support of price regulations are the workers and their organizations who would be affected, along with other Canadians, by any such policy being followed.

However, I think we have an issue at the moment, as the Prime Minister has so aptly put it, between free enterprise and socialism. The government is so married to the free enterprise system, and it so loves the profits of the big corporations and the high interest rates paid to the finance institutions of this country that it refuses to take the steps necessary to solve the unemployment crisis because this might mean some control of the economy.

We know that the Liberal party is not in favour of controls. They have said all along that they would not go for price regulations. They are also a free enterprise party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Argue: They are strong in condemnation but they are short on programs and alternative procedures.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Keep the debate on an objective plane.

Mr. Argue: Coming from the hon. member for Essex East, this is rather difficult to take, because I think the hon. member is probably the least objective member of the house.

An hon. Member: But he is not a socialist.

Mr. Argue: However, he will have an opportunity in a few moments, no doubt, to deal with this matter. The hon. member for Essex East has so much difficulty with his own statements that he should not worry about the content of statements of other hon. members.

We shall undoubtedly hear the policy of the Liberal party when the hon. member for Essex East makes his contribution, and I look forward to it very much. However, I very much doubt that the Liberal party will come out in favour of price regulations along with a massive attack on unemployment. They say they can make a few short cuts and a few tiny modifications that will allow big business to run the country in the future as it does today. But they say they are going to solve the problem of unemployment, where the Conservatives have failed.

The Liberal party has a long record in this country, and in past years there has been very high unemployment under a Liberal government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the fact.

Mr. Argue: I suggest that the minister should consider the plea that has been made to him this afternoon to have the annual report of the Bank of Canada referred to the banking and commerce committee. I would ask him to also consider referring the estimates of the Department of Finance to this committee. Let us have a full public inquiry. Let us find out how Mr. Coyne and other experts can deal with the very difficult recession in which this country now finds itself.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in introducing his remarks earlier this afternoon the Leader of the Opposition spoke of the historic and constitutional right which members of parliament have on an occasion such as this. That right is to raise grievances or deal with matters concerning which the Minister of Finance is now seeking interim supply.

There is one such matter with which I should like to deal, and I should like to do so in an objective and constructive manner. It concerns a subject matter which has been under discussion here on a number of occasions, and it concerns a very important industry which exists in several parts of Canada but more particularly in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I refer, of course, to the position of the textile industry.

During the course of the brief remarks which I intend to make I should like to put forward to the minister and the government certain suggestions which I believe are of a constructive nature. I would ask the minister and the government to give consideration to these suggestions.

It has been stated repeatedly in this house and outside that Quebec's big, important textile industry is struggling hard to "hang on".

This statement is contained in an article by Eric Richter in the Financial Post of February 4. The following is stated therein:

For most of the province's 370-odd mills and establishments, 1960 results were disappointing, even when measured against the "lean" years the textile industry has had in the past decade.

As the house knows, evidence was given before the manpower committee of the other place by the president of the primary textiles institute who stated that imported textiles cost 35,000 jobs in the Canadian textile industry last year and that the situation is going to get worse unless something is done.

In this morning's Globe and Mail there appears an article which I am sure the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Revenue have seen. The article is entitled:

Looking into business
The quiet Canadians were not exactly wasting their time.

I shall read but one paragraph. It is by-lined "Hong Kong, March 21" and reads:

Finance Minister Donald Fleming's special Hong Kong mission aimed at persuading local textile manufacturers to limit their exports to Canada was doomed to failure even before it started. Yet it shouldn't be thought that the mission was a waste of time. Mr. Fleming sent to Hong Kong the director-general of the international and economic affairs branch, S. S. Reisman, and two colleagues. Canada's trade commissioners in Hong Kong, C. M. Forsyth-Smith and C. J. Small also assisted the three Ottawa delegates in their talks with local exporters, textile producers and government officials.

Although the Canadians did not convince Hong Kong's textile men that they should impose voluntary restraints, both sides at least came to grips with a problem that is causing increasing concern in Canada's textile industry. Despite a huge mark-up at the Canadian end, Hong Kong shirts, for example, often sell at half or two thirds of the price of Canadian-made shirts.

There is no doubt that the situation is a very serious one. That fact has been emphasized by the recent closing of two mills at Grand'Mère—the Grand'Mère Knitting Company mill and the Grand'Mère Handcraft Company mill—as revealed in an article published in La Presse on March 15 entitled "Decision Brutale a Grand'Mère". The two mills closed down and put out of work no less than 300 employees who are now looking for other employment. Of course, the committee knows —and I need not repeat it—that mills in the vicinity of Hamilton, three mills in the community of Cornwall and mills elsewhere have closed down. My purpose in rising this afternoon is not to stress that aspect of the situation but rather to offer the minister some ideas of a constructive nature. I do not pose as an expert; indeed, I am far from being an expert on this very important question but there are others who are experts. I have been in consultation with someone who is an expert in this field. I have spent some time with him, and any credit that there may be for the suggestions I am about to put on record must go to this individual and not to me.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. gentleman say who he is?

Mr. Chevrier: I would rather not do so, but I should be happy to give the hon. parliamentary secretary the pamphlets which I have in mind and which have been written by him. This individual has written three pamphlets on this important subject. The first is entitled: "What the Canadian Textile Industry can Produce which it is not now Producing". The second is called: "How the Canadian Textile Industry can Compete with Imports". The third is entitled: "How the Canadian Textile Industry can Export". These are three pamphlets which I shall be glad at any time to show to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of National Revenue or their parliamentary secretaries for them to consider. As I said earlier, any credit for the suggestions contained in them should go to this individual and to nobody else, if they are found to be sound.

I have attempted to summarize as briefly as possible the main contents of these pamphlets. It is, of course, impossible in the 15 or 20 minutes at my disposal to give a complete summary of what is contained in these briefs, but I should like to put on record the main suggestions which are contained therein because I believe they are worthy of careful consideration.

The primary textile industry in Canada ranks second among the manufacturing industries of this country. No one in this committee, I am sure, will dispute the fact that this industry has fallen on very hard times in recent years. Even though some of the new textile companies may be efficient, there is an evident need for more co-ordination of effort on the part of all the component parts of the textile industry. For example, there is a need for better marketing techniques, more imaginative processing, better and greatly increased research methods, more investigation of new projects and a firmer will to export. All of these ideas need to permeate the Canadian textile industry.

Because the industry is so important to the Canadian economy, one might have thought that the Department of Trade and Commerce would already have taken steps to bring about some of this co-ordination. However, this appears not to be the case. I make this statement knowing full well that the Minister of Trade and Commerce called a conference of all the trade commissioners here in Canada. Whether or not there were present experts or representatives of the textile industry I am unable to say. However, I do not believe there was any decision on the part of those who were convened in the office of the minister on that occasion to seek to encourage the export of textile goods from this country. It may be that the new productivity council which was established recently by the government will provide an agency allowing the necessary co-ordination to be done. However, from the composition and the limited terms of reference of the productivity council it does not appear likely that this would be so.

I should like now to make a specific suggestion that the government should take the lead in bringing together various members of the textile industry and assisting them in the formation of a textile co-ordinating council. That is one of the many suggestions recommended in these three briefs. Some of the functions of this council would be as follows:

(a) The investigation of better or cheaper sources of raw materials and the study of their applications.

(b) Preparation of a detailed study of all existing textile processes from preparatory operations through blending, weaving, knitting, felting, dyeing, and finishing with a view to improving the quality and versatility of the end products.

(c) Improvement of merchandising, starting with accurate labelling and proceeding through consumer education.

(d) Continuous research in the field of development of new fibres; detailed studies of their properties and limitations.

(e) Encouraging industry to develop new techniques necessary to fully utilize newly developed synthetic fibres.

(f) Analysis of consumer demands in development of products which are custom-built to meet these demands.

(g) Collection and indexing of technical and statistical data on all phases of the textile industry in all parts of the world.

(h) Perhaps the council could consider the organization and maintenance of a Canadian textile museum containing representative samples of all available textile products.

(j) The council could act as technical adviser to the government and legislation pertaining to the textile industry. The council should develop very close relationship with the Department of Trade and Commerce.

The need, therefore, for this co-ordinating body seems to be painfully evident. The fact that the industry has difficulty in competing with imports indicates that development work on new products is far behind, and for that reason I strongly urge the government to give serious consideration to the formation of a textile co-ordinating council. It seems to me this might be done either separately or as a subcommittee of the productivity council, although because of the importance of the industry it would perhaps be far better if it were established separately and apart from the productivity council.

There are in addition two areas in which this co-ordinating council could be of great assistance to the textile industry and I should like to further elaborate on this matter. The first is the encouragement of the industry to do research into new products and to use the resources of Canada in manufacturing these new products. One illustration of the type of research I envisage is this. It stands to reason that we should use the great amount of wood pulp that we possess in this country. This could be done if we were to manufacture viscose. If we were to blend 20 per cent viscose with 80 per cent cotton this would mean better products and more use of Canadian resources. The production of the necessary amount of viscose would provide for thousands of Canadian workers and employment resulting from the use of our natural resources in imaginative processes. This ought to be, surely, our first aim.

I have before me a note indicating that we use in Canada about 300,000 bales of cotton a year. I am informed that if we were to mix 80 per cent of that baled cotton with 20 per cent viscose this would mean that an industry such as Courtauld's (Canada) Limited, for instance, would have to produce about 30 million pounds more viscose. It would mean thousands more jobs in substituting the viscose for the baled cotton.

I am also informed that there may be other areas in Canada where viscose might be produced. If after a careful study by the textile council as to whether or not this can be done—and I am informed from authoritative sources that it can be done—then here is a method by which not only can competition be better met but, more particularly, additional jobs can be obtained.

It has also been pointed out to me that in the opening of the vast regions of our north country we are faced with the problem of building roads on muskeg. We ought to investigate woven and non-woven fabrics which could be instrumental in overcoming the peculiar difficulties connected with this problem in the north country. In that area there are also a number of other needs to which the textile industry could contribute a solution. For example the present tents could be improved with the thermo insulation built into the fibre. Arctic clothing will have to have the insulation built into the fibre and into the woven, non-woven or knitted fabric. There are many other imaginative ways in which the textile industry could develop products for the north.

The number of new products which could be utilized staggers the imagination. Let me give the committee a few illustrations. As the committee knows, there is a great need for light-weight strong filaments, fibres, yarns, threads and rope. There is also no chenille to speak of produced in Canada. There is a need for various types of chenille which can be produced with blends of cotton, wool or silk. Such a product has innumerable applications never before produced in Canada such as knitted chenille outer wear, head squares, shawls, sport shawls, travelling plaids, chenille bathing and beach wear.

In the field of woollens and worsteds, by blending with high priced fibres like vicuna, camel hair, kemp and mohair products of an exceptionally high quality can be produced. New products like woollen chenille and woollen and silk-blended chenille which have innumerable uses for fine outer wear are possible.

As the committee knows, in the province of Quebec there is a special situation. There are in that province skilled workers who for many years have been directing their attention to a large number of articles that have a particular attraction in the province. There are, for example, wonderful local products the market for which could be greatly enlarged. I refer to such things as blankets, hooked rugs, shawls, felt slippers and felt skirts. None of these products is now being merchandised nearly enough.

Another product is the very popular Quebec blanket. This is a typical Quebec small industry. Some of these blankets have wonderful designs and there is a fantastic potential market for them with the proper merchandising. Long range policies for these articles in the province of Quebec should be given consideration and in order to give them the sales interest which they should have, we must be ahead of everyone else. We must have good research and consideration must be given to creating attractive designs and selling these goods in quantity in other countries. How is it, for instance, that articles made in Switzerland such as woollen sweaters and blankets are being sold here sometimes in greater numbers than are our own products simply because of the design?

If it were possible, as these pamphlets indicate, to create a newer design which would bring out, for instance, the Quebec folklore and which would lay emphasis on the art of the province of Quebec, it would then be quite possible to sell an attractive article which would compete here and in other countries.

In the field of plied fabrics there are again many products which should be investigated including items which have never been produced in Canada such as portable kayaks and other portable boats, diving suits and improved anti-gravity suits. These items immediately come to mind.

The second point I wish to elaborate slightly is the fact that there are great potential export markets for these typical Canadian products. Here I am willing to pay tribute to the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is encouraging to see that department is livening up in the area of increased Canadian exports. The textile industry badly needs similar stimulus for export. It urgently requires all types of information relating to exports such as foreign market conditions, shipping requirements, foreign prices and the like.

If the government would take the initiative in setting up this textile co-ordinating council which has been recommended, most of the information needed to stimulate export could be made readily available to the textile industry. By integrating the components of the textile industry in this country, the textile co-ordinating council could make a great contribution to the vitality of this major Canadian industry and could provide jobs for thousands of Canadian workers.

All I ask of the government and of the Minister of Finance and his colleagues who I am sure are interested in this industry, is that consideration be given to the suggestions I have made and to the contents of these three pamphlets to which I have referred. I urge them to consider the suggestions of an expert in this field who has had a great deal to do with matters such as this and who has already been in communication with a large number of textile industries in the central part of Canada. If that consideration is given I would hope the government will see fit, having regard to all the circumstances, to establish a textile council which would co-ordinate all activities of that industry.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) allow me a question? As an alternative, would the hon. member support an increase in the tariff covering the textile industry?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have already answered that question about a week ago during a discussion in the house, when I put on Hansard five or six suggestions which, in my view, would help the textile industry. A raise in the tariff was not included in those proposals.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the speech made this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition, it seems to me, touches the most important issue before parliament at this time, because the implications of the report presented by the governor of the Bank of Canada touch the heart of the major problem that confronts us in Canada. I join in the remarks he has made today and support them because of the apparent reluctance of the Minister of Finance to deal with them. Certainly this reluctance has been displayed not only during this debate but whenever the question has been raised.

The question takes on added importance in the light of the disclosure yesterday and the formal release this morning of the figures as to the present unemployment situation. These figures show that our labour force is down 33,000 compared with the previous reported period. It is the first decrease, by the way, since 1958. They show employment down 59,000 compared with the previous reported period. It also indicates that it is up only 25,000 over the figure of a year ago. In addition, of course, there is the dismal news that the present unemployment figure in our country on the basis of the lowest accepted standard, that of the dominion bureau of statistics, is 719,000.

This is a record figure, and it would seem to me that when the governor of the Bank of Canada deals with the capacity of this nation to provide full employment the government, and in particular the Minister of Finance, will be remiss if the statement made so ably today by the Leader of the Opposition is not answered. The unemployment statistics establish also that they are higher by 121,000 than they were a year ago, for the same period, and that they represent an increase of 26,000 over the previous month.

I am happy to note that the increase is not as great as one had been led to believe from the indices. The satisfaction one derives from the present figure is certainly less than one might have hoped. I would hope it is an indication that forces of growth are present that might lead to an end of the recession but from what we now know there is no reason to believe that this necessarily will be accompanied by a reduction on a proportionate basis of unemployment itself.

It seems to me that this is an issue to which the Minister of Finance cannot fail to address himself. He can take the position that he does not propose to answer the observations made by the Leader of the Opposition. He can take the position that the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada is a matter only for parliament. He can take the position that he refuses to say whether or not he is prepared to support the move to have the governor of the Bank of Canada appear before the banking and commerce or any other committee, designed for that purpose by this house. He can take all of these positions. He can sit mute and refuse to make any acknowledgement whatsoever; but if that is the position that he will ultimately take, all I would say, is that he will warrant the criticisms made a few weeks ago by the Toronto Globe and Mail with regard to what he had to say on a matter not unrelated to this question.

If the observations made by the governor of the Bank of Canada do not stand in the position of opposing the policies of the government, they at least stand in the position that there are no known declarations made by any of the ministers of the government, more particularly the Minister of Finance, that support the contentions made by the governor of the Bank of Canada. The government, when it is confronted with the problem of unemployment, now says that the responsibility lies on labour and on management. That is not what the governor of the Bank of Canada says. This is not the only inconsistency between the position taken by the government and that taken by the governor of the Bank of Canada, as the Leader of the Opposition indicated in a number of references he made to the recent report of the governor of the bank. I add these further observations of the governor of the Bank of Canada. As found on page 23 of his report to parliament he has this to say at the bottom of the page:

> If I may quote from a recent speech by the governor of the Bank of England, "... A theme which I have myself argued for many years past is that monetary policy cannot cure all ills, and that it is a great mistake to expect it to carry loads which should be carried in other fields of government policy."

That statement is approved by the governor of the Bank of Canada and he then goes on to say:

> Lord Cobbold was speaking in this context about the problems of restraining the excesses of a boom, but his theme applies with even greater force to the problems of overcoming recession and promoting a satisfactory rate of sustained economic growth.

Does the Minister of Finance agree with that statement? On page 14 of his report the governor says:

> At a time of relatively high unemployment in Canada, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the continuing very large deficit in the balance of payments is not only disadvantageous in itself but is indicative of an excessive capital inflow as well as structural weaknesses in the Canadian economy which result in excessive aggregate spending on goods and services provided from abroad to the detriment of the production of goods and services of a similar character in Canada.

Mr. Lambert: That was your argument too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I refer now to pages 15 and 16, and I invite the vigilant member for Edmonton West to pay attention to these words. The governor has this to say:

Analysis of our situation seems to me to indicate that the approach to higher employment and output—

I would hope that the Minister of Finance would find it desirable to listen to what is being said.

—should be through measures designed to reduce the large deficit in our current account balance of payments, and through increases in spending of a selective character likely to increase production in Canada, rather than through measures designed to raise the level of total spending by Canadians.

I call the minister's attention to these words.

I am sure that there are many more possible ways of setting up incentives directed towards these goals than is generally realized. One would hope for the most imaginative and thorough canvass of the possibilities and widespread discussion by those who are interested.

I would assume that among those who are interested would be the Minister of Finance and the government of Canada. The governor concludes that paragraph by saying:

Ultimate decisions must rest with the appropriate governmental authorities in accordance with their best assessment of what the national interest and welfare requires.

That statement, the other statements I have quoted and those put on the record by the Leader of the Opposition indicate that the governor of the Bank of Canada does not, and properly so, take responsibility for anything other than monetary policy. He says the monetary policy by itself cannot provide full employment. He then goes on to establish that he, as governor of the Bank of Canada, believes there are within this nation capacities and instruments by which we can achieve full employment. We are asking for the opportunity to ascertain from the governor of the Bank of Canada the details of his remedies. Once we have ascertained what those details are, we want to find out whether or not the government of Canada agrees with them. In that event, we want to find out why the government of Canada has not adopted the proposals made by the governor of the Bank of Canada. We should like to interrogate the governor in order to ascertain whether or not the government has, in fact, sought to make an appreciation of the value of the recommendations made by the governor.

The governor of the Bank of Canada is an important official under our system of government. However, he is not a sovereignty, in himself, as the Minister of Finance suggested some time ago when he divorced the government of any responsibility whatsoever for the conduct and formulation of monetary policy. But the governor of the Bank of Canada has been given by parliament important powers with regard to monetary policy that admittedly he primarily exercises. This does not mean, of course, that the government has no responsibility in the field of monetary policy. The governor has not been talking about monetary policy. In the main he has been talking from one end of Canada to the other about matters which agitate us in this house and which have to do with our capacity as a free enterprise nation to bring about full employment. If the Bank of Canada is responsible to parliament, it is the duty of this government to see to it that we as individual members of parliament are given an opportunity, through a parliamentary committee or otherwise, to obtain the answers to the questions I have outlined, which are among those that we would want to put to the governor of the Bank of Canada.

I join with the Leader of the Opposition in the stand he has taken today, as I did yesterday, for two reasons. First of all, when we are talking about unemployment in this house we are generally made to confront the Minister of Labour. I have always taken the position that the Minister of Labour—and I do not speak of him in a personal way—is not competent to deal exclusively with the question of unemployment, nor is his department capable of doing so by the nature of its organization. Unemployment is a matter that primarily rests on the doorstep of the Department of Finance, in association with certain other departments of government including the Department of Labour. The second reason is that we are entitled to know, before the committee disposes of the request for interim supply, whether or not the government proposes to by-pass parliament and appoint a royal commission, as was done two years ago in the United Kingdom.

There was justification for the appointment of a royal commission in Great Britain two years ago. The terms of reference given to Lord Radcliffe were altogether different from the terms of reference that arise out of any situation in this country at this time. If a royal commission were designated by the government of Canada to deal with monetary policy, we would be precluded in practice from taking any steps to examine the governor of the Bank of Canada with regard to monetary policy, assuming that the terms of reference of the commission were so confined. I do not believe we would be so precluded from a constitutional point of view. I want to say this now to the Minister of Finance and to the government. If that is the intention—

Mr. Benidickson: That would be a trick.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that would be not only a trick but it would be a violation of the privileges of parliament itself. If that is done I want to say to the government that we will not regard ourselves as being precluded from examining the governor on matters that are not exclusively referred to the royal commission.

There is no reason why, in the event of a royal commission being appointed, we would not be free to summon the governor of the Bank of Canada before a committee of this house and to ask him to divulge to this parliament and to this country the plans about which he has been speaking in a general way from one end of this country to the other for the past year and a quarter. The government cannot hope, therefore, to use this device to free it from a responsibility which now rests on its shoulders, and in particular on those of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Lambert: Are you setting up your own Aunt Sally?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would hope that my hon. friend would be more interested in this subject than in making these inane interruptions which give an indication of the quality of his mind. I had always understood the quality of his mind was higher than these interruptions would indicate.

This is an important matter. This is a matter that goes right to the fundamental issue facing us at the moment. The governor of the Bank of Canada says it is possible to have full employment with varying levels of capital investment and savings, as the history of many countries will show. He made that statement on January 17 when speaking to the annual conference of the business paper editors association in Ottawa. The following day, January 18, the Toronto Globe and Mail reported the governor of the bank in these terms:

> "I venture the proposition that it is not healthy and will not be fruitful or successful for a country such as Canada to pursue any other course than to stand on its own feet, finance its own development out of its own savings, and refrain from trying to achieve a rate of economic growth in excess of what its own best efforts can support," he said.

Is that the policy of the government of Canada? We are entitled to know that. We are entitled to know whether or not the Minister of Finance and the governor are in disagreement on this fundamental question. Does the Minister of Finance agree with the statement of the governor of the Bank of Canada as reported on February 4, 1961, when he said:

> It seems to me only common sense... that no price is too great for the community as a whole to pay in order to achieve full production and reduce unemployment to the lowest possible level—

Does the government agree with that statement? Does the government agree with that recommendation made by the governor of the Bank of Canada to reduce unemployment to its lowest possible level?

Does the government agree with the speech made by the governor of the Bank of Canada in St. John's, Newfoundland, on January 31, 1951, when he said the nation as a whole suffers real economic loss, and it is an avoidable economic loss, in addition to the personal loss and frustration of those particular persons who are seeking work and unable to find it? Does the government agree with that statement? When the governor of the Bank of Canada says this, he must have some reason for doing so. We want to know what his reason is.

In the other place today—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am entitled to make this reference, and I think that my hon. friend will acknowledge it. I am entitled to say what took place, not what was said in the other place today. One of the committees of that house has decided today to call the governor of the Bank of Canada before one of its committees. That is what the majority of that place had decided to do.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "No", but they have decided to call the governor of the Bank of Canada. I would have thought my hon. friend's intelligence—I do not mean his own intelligence but the intelligence of his department—would have informed him on this fact.

We in this house are the elected representatives of the people. We are the individuals who faced the Canadian nation in 1958 and asked the people to elect us as their representatives and spokesmen in this house. The hon. gentlemen sitting opposite said when they confronted the Canadian electorate that they had a solution to this problem. Because of the fact that we are the elected representatives, the governor of the Bank of Canada, notwithstanding whatever commitment he may have given in that other place, should on that account not be precluded from coming to a committee of the House of Commons and giving us the opportunity of determining the questions which I have put forward today in supporting the position of the Leader of the Opposition. Then, too, we could examine that most regrettable statement of the Minister of Finance when he accepted no responsibility whatsoever for monetary policy—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —which represented a position of abdication of government. My hon. friend says "Order". Why does he say "Order"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is referring to a previous debate in the house dealing with the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Certainly that does not preclude me from making reference to what the Minister of Finance said in respect of monetary policy.

This is the most important issue that has developed in our country in the last few months. The governor of the Bank of Canada is publicly on record as taking a position different from and opposed to the position taken by the government of Canada in the matter of unemployment. That fact having been established, under our system of responsible government, the government cannot sit by without making a reply. We are entitled to have, before this item is disposed of, a reply from the Minister of Finance. Surely we are entitled to expect, as are the Canadian people, that the minister will deal with the statements in the Bank of Canada report, that he will say whether it is possible at the present time to develop policies that will provide full employment as has been asserted by the governor of the Bank of Canada. If the government persists in being immobile and inarticulate in the matter, then it warrants the criticism that is being levelled against it.

The Minister of Finance is a man who I know takes his public duties seriously. Much as I may criticize him now and may continue to criticize him, I would not ever deny that fact; but he will greatly disappoint me and many other people in this country, who have great faith in his integrity and in the honourable way in which he pursues his assignment, if he does not reply to the statements which have been made. He knows the implications of Canadian constitutional history and of British constitutional history. Surely he cannot ignore the bank's report which is a condemnation of the government of Canada, expressed in able and dignified terms, but not lacking on that account in cogency or pointedness. We in turn cannot escape our responsibility any longer, in allowing the two sovereignties, as the Minister of Finance implied the other day, to co-exist in this country. There is only one sovereignty in Canada, and that is the people represented by constituted authority, the government of the day. There can be no other authority. The Minister of Finance or the government cannot allow a public official, no matter who that official may be, to parade from one end of this country to another enunciating publicly economic doctrines which he believes should form government policy. It is wrong to allow this to go on without intervention by the government, or any discipline being imposed. The government must affirm that the governor of the bank cannot go on in that manner, and stay within his present assignment if these views are persisted in and publicly declared. For the minister or the government to take any other course is, on the part of this government, an abdication of its responsibilities. This is making the government look silly and is putting it in a subservient position.

If the governor of the Bank of Canada is entitled to express views that are contrary to those expressed by the government of Canada why then are the military staff, the air chief, and the naval chief not allowed to express opinions in public or before Canadian clubs, boards of trade or universities? That of course would be a most unfortunate permission to extend to any military officer and would be a violation of our concept of government. That is exactly what is being done at the present time in an equally important field—the economic field—by the governor of the Bank of Canada. Not one word has been said by this government, to the knowledge of the Canadian people or this parliament, as to whether the government has expressed its view with respect to the propriety of this course. The governor of the Bank of Canada is a very able man and has been well trained for the high post he occupies. He must know the extent of his authority. He must know that his authority is limited to monetary policy. If he persists, as he does, in making these declarations on such a wide economic front, he must be doing it for a purpose. I suggest that purpose is clear. He is concerned about the results of government policy and particularly the policy of the Department of Finance and the consequences of those policies. He must feel that he is serving his country best by making these declarations which are tantamount to warnings to the Canadian people. What other conclusion can one come to?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If that is what the governor is seeking to do, does the hon. member approve of such a course of action?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I certainly do not approve. I am stating that I do not believe that under our system of government it is right or proper for a government official, in areas of authority not specifically extended to him by parliament, to take in public a position that puts him in disagreement with the government of the day. That is the position I take. What I have just been saying is that if the governor takes that position, he must be doing it because he feels that, with his knowledge as governor of the Bank of Canada, he owes it to the country to speak in this way and thereby to warn the people about the consequences of present government policy. That can be the only conclusion one can come to when these things are said by a man so reasonable and so well equipped for his job as is the governor of the Bank of Canada.

The Deputy Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, not being of the same political complexion as one might assume the governor of the Bank of Canada to be, I cannot be so laudatory of him as was the hon. member for Essex East. However, we do know that ever since this government took office there has been a growing conflict between the governor of the Bank of Canada, the Minister of Finance and government policy generally. There has been a growing desire on the part of the government to abdicate their responsibility in the fiscal and monetary field whenever they deem it expedient to do so.

We can recall those short days when we had a minority government before the election of 1958. During that period of time the Minister of Finance, who was not then the minister, and some of his colleagues campaigned on the basis of high interest rates, how they would fix the economy, how parliament would again have sole jurisdiction, and things of that nature. Hardly had the ink dried on these comments and the election been finished when the Minister of Justice, who was then minister of citizenship and immigration or the acting minister, came to British Columbia and attended a series of meetings.

One of these meetings was held on the campus of the University of British Columbia. The minister renounced all responsibility in the monetary field on the part of his government and himself. He said that everything that had been going wrong was really the fault of the Bank of Canada and that the government itself had no responsibility. Perhaps what he was saying indirectly was that the government really had no interest in tackling this major question of monetary policy and its effect upon and relationship to the economy. The Minister of Finance on various occasions has been engaged in making similar comments.

As I mentioned, Mr. Chairman, one of the key-note cries of the Tories before the 1957 election—I do not think we need dwell on them too long—concerned the question of tight money and how with a tight money policy the Liberals had dragged the economy into a recession or a rolling readjustment, or whatever phrase was used. It was said that all we had to do to solve all these problems was to elect the hon. member for Eglinton and his friends who would then become the government and would straighten it all out. But we have seen nothing straightened out. In reality the position has worsened, and it worsens as each day passes. To confirm this statement we have only to witness the figures which were released prematurely yesterday but which officially came to the attention of hon. members this morning.

At this time it appears that the government does not want to do anything about this situation. The Minister of Finance knows full well that the higher interest rates which he himself imposed foisted upon the Canadian taxpayers an extra burden to the tune of millions and millions of dollars and in reality constitute a drain on the purchasing power of the people of this nation.

I do not understand how on the one hand the minister can endorse this method of draining off the taxpayer's dollar while on the other hand his colleagues say, "Go out and spend yourself into prosperity". How this government can reconcile those two approaches is beyond my understanding. If ever schizophrenia existed in government, it exists here. We all know that this government spent so many years in opposition that it really has not much of a clue on how to conduct the affairs of state. It has so mismanaged the affairs that come under its jurisdiction, especially in the monetary field, that we have existing the condition that was announced today in so far as the number of unemployed is concerned.

Perhaps I may refer to that matter. The figures indicate that in my own province nearly 14 per cent of the work force is unemployed. This may not mean much to the Minister of Finance, who comes from Toronto and has relatively little concern or knowledge about what happens in other parts of the nation. Perhaps Ontario, with 8.6 per cent of its work force unemployed, seems rather insignificant to the minister. However, the figure is 13.9 per cent in British Columbia and it is higher in the maritimes. This is something that should concern the Minister of Finance more than it does.

We know there is conflict between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance about what should be done, one taking a course of action that is in reality critical of the government in office and the other, namely the Minister of Finance, sitting idly by, engrossed in some book or other and not too much concerned about these matters.

We have listened to a very severe and biting indictment of the Minister of Finance and his government delivered by the hon. member who just resumed his seat, the hon. member for Assiniboia and others. These criticisms have been made not only today; they have been made on other occasions, both inside and outside the house. There have been complaints about the silly and childish way in which this government and this minister approach the question of our economy.

These are justifiable complaints when we have 700,000 of our potential working force sitting idly around, not knowing where their next dollar is coming from, while the Minister of Finance also sits idly around and obviously does not worry too much about it. "After all, spring came just the other day; there is no need to do anything about it," is the approach of this government. Perhaps the Minister of Finance should advise his colleague the Minister of Labour, to change the "Do It Now" slogan to "Why Wait For Summer; Do It Now".

In the minds of the minister and his colleagues this sort of thing might help, and this is the fullest extent to which this government is prepared to go. Their attitude is, "Let somebody else do it." So far as concrete and definite action to deal with the unemployment situation is concerned, this government has not the faintest idea what to do.

The Minister of Finance sits quietly in his seat asking the infrequent question and commenting occasionally. He sits here while all this controversy is raging as it has raged particularly today. I think that is only another indication of how lightly he takes his responsibility toward the unemployed of this nation.

I think the Minister of Finance should have been one of the first in the house to rise and announce specifically what is government policy in this field, or what is going to occur and how they are going to deal with the questions raised by the governor of the Bank of Canada in his annual report.

Are the government going to arrange, as they should, to open up these documents and the policies to the public eye? Are the government going to approach the question by allowing the annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to be made available for study by the banking and commerce committee or some other special committee? Is this what is going to happen?

What is the approach of the government in so far as interest rates are concerned? What about the need, if it exists—and I think the need is very quickly approaching—for a new bond conversion program to get the minister out of the difficulty he got himself into a couple of years ago? These are serious and important matters. More than 700,000 people are tramping the streets in the middle of winter—even though spring is here according to the calendar it is not, in fact, here—not knowing whether government policies designed to assist them are going through. For the Minister of Finance to sit quietly in his place and decline to announce what is going to be done is an indication of the lightness with which he regards the economic difficulties of the nation. One of the things which I think must happen before we go much farther into the motion before us, is for the minister to rise and make some rather extensive announcements of policy and the like in connection with these matters which have been raised today and on other occasions.

We are not just using words and talking about statistics and pieces of paper and about whether or not they were supposed to be released this morning but were delivered inadvertently by a messenger to somebody else than the one intended. That is not what is at issue. The subject matter here is 719,000 people who are out of work because we have in office a bungling government without the vaguest idea of what to do and one which, even if it had such an idea, does not possess the courage to stand up and make announcements of its plans in the house.

It is a quarter to six by the clock. Perhaps what little the minister has to announce he might be able to announce in 15 minutes. It is possible his statement could be completed by that time. I think that is the only course open to the minister at the moment. Otherwise we are justified in arriving even more firmly at the conclusion that the hon. gentleman's interest in the unemployed is really not what he would have us believe.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Howard: Before it carries, I think the Minister of Finance has a duty and responsibility which he cannot evade. I think it is up to him to stand up and make a statement about what the government intends to do in this particular field. I think that opportunity should be afforded him.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have the duty and the responsibility to tell some hon. members that, in speaking as they have spoken this afternoon in a manner which, I think, is virtually an abuse of the proper procedure on a motion for interim supply, they are creating a situation where we may not be able to get out the cheques for the mid-April payments, as we wish to do, because parliament has decided that we shall be rising next Wednesday and not returning until April 10.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A point of order—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is another bogus one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has no right to make a remark of that kind. He has now the opportunity of having this matter disposed of forthwith. Instead, he is making an imputation directed against all those who have taken part in this debate.

Mr. Broome: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is a point of order, and I resent the imputation of the Minister of Finance that because we are discussing important public issues we are thereby open to the charge that we are preventing certain people in this country from receiving their remuneration.

Mr. Broome: That is exactly what you are doing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is not the case. This government could decide right now to relieve itself of its present parliamentary obligation. If there is any delay, it will be due to the intransigence of this government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should be obliged, Mr. Chairman, as I think would all members of this committee, if you would tell the hon. member for Essex East that he abuses the privileges of this house by raising bogus points of order. He offends against the rules at all times, and I think it is time he was rebuked by the Chair for so doing.

Having had my time taken by this bogus point of order, may I return to the point I was making. For years, with the exception only of these very recent years, these motions for interim supply passed very quickly. It was an extraordinary thing if there was any discussion on them at all. In recent times the opposition has chosen to debate, on this motion, any issue at all. This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition and one other hon. member talked about airing grievances. Mr. Chairman, they talked as though this were a motion to resolve the house into committee of supply. We are in committee of supply now, so that kind of procedure is clearly not the kind of procedure in which we are engaged at this time.

When the announcement was made that we would be asking for a vote of interim supply this afternoon, I think all hon. members were well aware that the house had decided to rise next Wednesday and not to return until April 10 and that there is some other important business which must be transacted before we rise. There is to be dealt with the whole of those final supplementary estimates consisting of more than 100 items, and if hon. members choose on occasions of this kind to talk about every item under the sun and to raise all kinds of political issues for which there will be ample occasion in the ordinary course of parliamentary business for full discussion, it is inevitable that we shall not be able to get this vote of interim supply through before the time appointed to rise next Wednesday. I have to tell the committee that if this should happen there will be delay in getting out the cheques for the mid-April payments. The responsibility in that regard will have to rest with those who have taken advantage of this motion today and the ruling made by the Chair last year to bring into this discussion today about every kind of political issue under the sun.

I am not asking for a ruling from the Chair in view of the ruling which was made last year. I protested against this kind of procedure last year, but the Chair did not uphold the point I raised. I therefore cannot do anything about it, and if hon. members wish to bring in political issues and talk about everything under the sun I presume nothing can be done to stop them. But I do point out to them that there will be proper opportunity for the discussion of all these various matters which have been raised today. We have the estimates of all the departments before us to be considered in committee of supply with the exception of one department, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration whose estimates have been fully reviewed and passed. If we do not get this vote through I point out the inevitable results with respect to these mid-April cheques.

I would remind hon. members that this is a vote of interim supply and that I have given the time-honoured undertaking that nothing done here today by way of approving interim supply for two months will affect or abridge the rights of hon. members to discuss these items when they are reached in the ordinary course in committee. So everybody has his full rights. It is not necessary that hon. members should seize this opportunity to drag up all kinds of political issues. If that sort of thing happens we shall simply have to accept the fact that we cannot get these motions through. If there is to be no limit at all on the right of hon. members to discuss everything under the sun, we are in a chaotic condition with regard to such motions as this. I appeal to the committee to have regard to the realities of the situation and to pass this simple motion knowing that the rights of members to discuss any question that is relevant to any item in committee are preserved.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if I could deal with one point which the minister has raised. I refer to the accusation that members in the opposition parties are responsible for delay. I would point out to the minister that it is the responsibility of the minister himself to decide if and when it is necessary to bring in an interim supply motion. It is his responsibility, and all he is doing now is admitting how delinquent this government is in its management of the bringing of motions before parliament. The minister knew a long time ago he would need interim supply. The fault is his entirely for deliberately forestalling this request until practically the eve of the Easter recess so he could make accusations of the kind in which he has indulged. The minister's own delinquency is responsible for this situation. The hon. gentleman is entirely incapable of operating properly.

The minister brought forward supplementary estimates that have to be dealt with. Do you realize, Mr. Chairman, that this is the fifth set of supplementary estimates we have had since the estimates a year ago? Five times he found out how wrong he was about his budget.

Mr. Broome: And five times the hon. member has made the same speech.

Mr. Howard: Listen to this, my hon. friend from Vancouver South. Perhaps the Minister of Finance should also listen and learn how he is participating in the breach of a contract between the government and parliament. I refer hon. members to the citation in Beauchesne's in which reference is made to breach of contract between the government and parliament and which reads—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We are not discussing supplementary estimates at the moment but interim supply.

Mr. Howard: The minister raised the question of supplementary estimates and said it was necessary to deal with them before the Easter recess. I point out that he is guilty of a breach of contract between the government and parliament. This is the fifth time this has happened.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We cannot have a debate on this subject.

Mr. Howard: The minister stood in his place and levelled accusations against us with respect to his inability to write cheques and so on. He has admitted his own delinquency and inability to be Minister of Finance but he cannot rid himself of the responsibilities that are associated with that office.

Mr. Spencer: The hon. member has just rid himself of an insulting speech.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): All the hon. member's speeches are insulting.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: I am dealing with the insulting remarks and accusations of the minister. He makes accusations of this insulting nature against the opposition. There are 700,000 people out of work. What is the minister's policy? I realize it is difficult for the government to face up to this question. The government levels insulting accusations. The minister's insults have to be answered in this fashion. I am not worried about the insulting accusations of the hon. member for Essex West or anyone else. I only know that 13.9 per cent of the working force in British Columbia from where I come are tramping the streets at the moment wondering when this minister will in the field of monetary policy take action to help them.

Instead of helping, the minister gave a five-minute lecture on how he wants the rules to operate so he can curtail business and conduct the affairs of parliament in his own way. I say that parliament should stand up to the minister and show Canadians how arrogant, delinquent, silly and childish is this hon. gentleman.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to confess that I also felt the Minister of Finance had evaded the chief issues raised here this afternoon. The hon. gentleman raised a bogey when he suggested that any discussion on parliamentary procedure at this time and of this type was unusual.

I wish to draw to the attention of the minister his assertions when in opposition. As recently as 1957 during his last term sitting on this side in opposition, the minister took up six pages of Hansard in speech-making at this stage of our proceedings.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On an occasion when no undertaking was given, on the eve of an election.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benidickson: I refer the hon. gentleman to page 2821 of Hansard of March 29, 1957. The minister suggested that democracy might perhaps take a backward step because this parliament would not do its duty with respect to widows, orphans and civil servants. He suggested this would follow if we did not have an adequate parliamentary authorization. I refer the minister to his activities during the time when he was in opposition. The hon. gentleman did not say that to you, Mr. Chairman, earlier.

I also refer to the previous year, 1956, when in the same month we had a requirement for interim supply. I give the Conservative opposition of that day full credit. Hon. gentlemen at that time were not inactive nor did they in any way forsake their duties to the public. They properly took up debate at this stage. The record of that debate indicates that pages of Hansard were filled with speeches made by such well known hon. members as the present high commissioner in London, the former leader of the opposition, Mr. Drew. Speeches were also made by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Postmaster General, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and other hon. gentlemen.

It is a well known and recognized privilege of hon. members of parliament, when a government asks for supply, to raise questions which they feel are proper in the interests of the Canadian public and no person has taken longer than has the Minister of Finance.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the committee again if it will pass this motion? Otherwise I am very greatly concerned about the results, as I indicated. Hon. members opposite have had their inning by now. They know that these items will be called in the committee of supply in due course. Surely we can have this resolution passed now, Mr. Chairman. The bill must follow. It must be passed in the Senate and must receive royal assent. If it does not do so along with all the other business that must be presented before parliament rises at six o'clock next Wednesday for the Easter recess, then the cheques for the payment of salaries, pensions and other obligations for mid-April are going to be delayed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Howard: There are many questions—

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member saying "No"?

Mr. Howard: I did not say no; I just rose to speak but I see that it is six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: I asked if the resolution carried.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The hon. member says no.

Mr. Matthews: Mr. Chairman, do not beg anything of the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Having regard to the importance of this matter, perhaps the hon. member for Skeena could complete his remarks in five minutes if the committee would be willing to sit on and pass the resolution in view of the urgency of it.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member calls it six o'clock.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is my hope that the people of Canada will understand who are responsible for this.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, was it not agreed that the hon. member for Skeena would speak for five minutes?

Mr. Matthews: Do not beg that hon. member for anything.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member called it six o'clock unless he wishes to follow a different course.

Mr. Howard: Six o'clock.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I hope that Hansard will show that the hon. member for Skeena said "six o'clock".

Mr. Howard: Six o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the house leader before inquiring about the business for tomorrow. Although last year we discussed interim supply about two days later than the date on which we are proceeding this year, would the leader of the house, in view of the remarks of the Minister of Finance concerning the importance of this matter, indicate whether or not it is proposed that an opportunity for debate on this question will be given early tomorrow? I ask because of course, some days will ensue before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Churchill: The suggestion will be considered but at this moment I think the business as announced will stand. For tomorrow we will commence with item No. 7 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture dealing with agricultural development, and that will be followed by the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

It being three minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ITALY—REPLY TO GREETINGS ON CENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Speaker: Order. By leave of the house may I table the cablegram which has been received from the president of the chamber of deputies of the parliament of Italy in acknowledgement of the cablegram which I sent in pursuance of a resolution unanimously passed by this house last Friday, and read to the house a translation of the cablegram dated Rome, March 22, 6 p.m.:

Hon. Roland Michener, Speaker of the House of Commons, Ottawa.

The telegram of greetings expressing the best wishes of the parliament of Canada on the occasion of the centenary of Italian unity was particularly welcome to me. On behalf of the chamber of deputies of Italy and in my own name may I request that you, sir, who are the honourable the Speaker, do accept the expression of sincere gratitude and most heartfelt good wishes for the prosperity of the Canadian people. I am, with highest consideration,

Giovanni Leone,
Speaker of the chamber of deputies.

STANDING ORDERS

Eighth and ninth reports of standing committee on standing orders—Miss Aitken.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—EMPLOYMENT PROVIDED AND EXTENSION OF PERIOD

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an announcement to the house with regard to the municipal winter works incentive program. As of March 21, the latest figure which I have obtained from my department based on estimates submitted by more than 1,924 municipalities across Canada indicates that this program has exceeded by a substantial margin the target of jobs announced last fall.

At that time we expected to provide direct, on-site employment for some 83,000 persons and indirect employment for approximately the same number. I am pleased to be able to inform the house that as of March 21 this program has provided direct, on-site employment for more than 105,000 men, according to the figures supplied by the municipalities, and off-site employment for an estimated equal number of men.

This program, through intensive co-operation at the federal, provincial and municipal levels, launched municipal work projects during the winter months of a total estimated value of $259,520,713. It has become one of the most effective public works programs of its kind ever undertaken in this country, through co-operation at all levels of government. It is a program well accepted by everyone and given enthusiastic support.

As the house may be aware, the government has received a number of representations from individual municipalities, as well as the Canadian confederation of mayors and municipalities, requesting the continuation of the program beyond the cut-off date of April 30. As the house also knows, the program this winter commenced on October 15, six weeks earlier than usual. I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that in recent weeks there have been severe storms accompanied by heavy snowfall in many parts of Canada, and this has affected the ability of municipalities to carry on their winter works projects.

In order that there will be no curtailment of employment as a result of untoward weather conditions, I am pleased to announce that the government has decided to extend the period for the municipal winter works incentive program to May 31.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement to make which is supplementary to that made by my colleague the Minister of Labour. I am pleased to inform the house that it has been decided to extend the winter works program in the national parks from March 31 to May 31, 1961. This will provide employment for 1,800 men at a cost of $1.6 million.

During the current season projects in the various national parks under the winter works program have involved an expenditure of $4 million. The program involves the construction of new picnic grounds, camp sites and other improvements to accommodate the increasing numbers of visitors to the parks.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I on behalf of this group say how pleased we are to learn that the expectations for the winter works program have been exceeded and that it is being extended. We hope that the Minister of Labour and the other ministers in the government will soon find it possible to bring in a program for the spring, summer and fall in addition to the winter so as to provide full employment for those who need it at the present time.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of the statement he just made in regard to the winter works program. Will the extension of the date for the winter works program exclude any of the projects now authorized under the program? I understand that on a previous occasion when the program was extended certain projects were eliminated. The reason given was that these projects would reasonably be carried out during the period covered by the program.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, offhand and without checking I would say that I see no reason why projects now under way that would carry over into the extended period of May should be eliminated. I should think they would be included.

[Later:]

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour based on the announcement he made earlier this afternoon about the winter works program and the suggestion that 105,000 jobs had been provided in on-site and 105,000 in off-site work. Can the minister tell the house the length of employment on these jobs? How much work are we talking about? Has the minister's department the complete figures?

Mr. Starr: This represents 4,636,972 man days of work.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister is in a position to give the house any information on the serious situation in Laos as reported in the press this morning.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, the situation developing in Laos is such that it commands the attention of people all over the world. I am aware of recent developments in the Laotian situation, and the government has been in continuing touch with the other governments concerned. While Canada is not a member of SEATO, the regional collective security organization whose interests are most directly affected by developments in Laos, Canada has a particular interest in the Laotian problem arising from her membership in the international supervisory commission established under the Geneva agreement of 1954 and adjourned in 1958. Mention has been made in the press of naval dispositions which are taking place in the Far East. I do not believe that they reflect anything more than normal measures of readiness in the situation as it exists.

Now I might say something regarding Canada's position on the particular problem itself. Canada is prepared to serve on a reconvened international supervisory commission should the governments concerned agree that conditions exist which would permit the commission to play a worth while and effective role. The reason there has been no decision so far to reconvene the international supervisory commission for Laos is that other possible alternative arrangements are being considered, such as a commission of neutral nations or an international conference as proposed by Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia.

These alternatives are still under consideration. Whatever type of international instrument may eventually be agreed upon, Canada continues to hope that circumstances will permit a negotiated settlement which will maintain the independence, the unity and the neutrality of Laos.

TRADE

O.E.C.D.—CANADIAN POSITION AT FORTHCOMING CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister would care to give the house any information on the position which Canada may take at the forthcoming conference of O.E.C.D., particularly in the light of the statement by President Kennedy that certain proposals for long term economic assistance will be put before that conference by the United States.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think during recent discussions in the house full information was given on this matter, information as full as the government could then give. There is nothing in particular that I can add at this time which would in any way amplify what was said then.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister tell the house whether Canada will be putting forth any specific proposals at the forthcoming conference with regard to economic assistance?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Canada's stand on economic assistance and her record have been admirable. I know the hon. gentleman will not agree with that, but I think Canadians as a whole feel that the contribution which Canada is making in connection with measures to raise standards in other parts of the world is the equal of that of any other nation in the world. When I say that, I think our contribution to the Colombo plan, with the increases in the last few years, and the contributions in other fields to which Canadians have given their support do not require on the part of Canadians any attitude of uncertainty or lack of pride concerning what is being done.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

FORD MOTOR COMPANY—LAY-OFFS OF MACHINE REPAIRMEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received a communication from local 200 of the united automobile workers drawing to his attention lay-offs by the Ford Motor Company of qualified machine repairmen, while at the same time large machines from the plant have been sent to the United States for repair? If so, is the minister in a position to use his good offices to have this work done by Canadian workers presently laid off?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Today I received a copy of a letter from the people to whom the hon. member refers which had been addressed to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister look into the situation and see if there is any way in which he could arrange to have some of this work done here in Canada by Canadian workers?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out, this letter was addressed to the attention of the Minister of Finance, and I received only a copy of it. But I will follow up the matter to see what reply is given by the Minister of Finance.

GLEN EXELBY—INQUIRY AS TO EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether as a result of the offer he made in the letter he tabled on Friday last the employment service has yet found a job for Mr. Exelby of Hamilton.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am relieved to say that I have not been keeping track of that case of late.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister be good enough to inquire and inform the house tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister inquire and inform the house tomorrow?

TRANSPORT

SPRINGHILL, N.S.—REQUEST FOR MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Transport whether he has yet received any report from the Canadian National Railways concerning the question of that railway taking over from the Cumberland Railway Company the 4-mile spur line from Springhill to Springhill Junction. The minister will recall that this question was asked on February 17, at which time the minister indicated that he would refer the matter to the management.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to report at the moment, but I will investigate.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED RECRUITMENT OF PERSONNEL IN U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Would the minister substantiate reports that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is recruiting personnel in the United Kingdom. If so, could the minister indicate the reasons for such recruitment at the present time?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to send me notice of this question a short time ago. I have been unable to obtain the information from the corporation. However, I have grave doubts about recruitment taking place in the United Kingdom other than in respect of highly specialized personnel. I will obtain the information and advise the hon. member on this matter as soon as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ONTARIO—ALLEGED CORRUPTION OF LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister received any request from the attorney general of Ontario for the assistance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in investigating alleged charges that Mafia gambling interests have succeeded in bribing and corrupting provincial and local law enforcement officers?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—ANNOUNCEMENT OF NUMBER OF HOUSING STARTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Nipissing, as reported at page 2542 of Hansard of March 1, as to the number of starts made in the month of February, may I say we now have received the figures for housing starts up to the end of February, in municipalities of 5,000 population and over. These amount to 3,967 for the month of February, which is an increase over a year ago of 86.2 per cent for that month. These are the latest figures for 1961; up to the end of February, 7,861.

The hon. member and other hon. members of the house will be glad to hear that the figures up to March 17 for N.H.A. requests for loans have now increased to 9,937. In the corresponding period a year ago the figure was 1,473.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): In view of the announcement made by the minister I wonder if I might put this question to him. The figure for last February was one of the lowest on record, at an annual adjusted rate of about 60,000, I believe, for that period. In view of this fact, and in view of the legislation recommended by some hon. members on this side and implemented a few months ago, does the minister not think he should go the full distance and reduce the N.H.A. interest rate, which is the main deterrent at this time?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, the record this year—and all we can control are the National Housing Act loans—has been almost unprecedented. We are having a magnificent year in housing compared with any other year except one.

Mr. Garland: Compared with last year.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member went a good deal further than he should have gone with his last supplementary, and a further supplementary would be out of order.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Does the Minister of Public Works mean by "on the contrary" that the interest rates should be increased?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would stick to yachts he would speak with greater authority.

Mr. Pickersgill: The usual politeness.

Mr. Garland: Since the Minister of Public Works has the figures now for February, can he tell us the number of bank loans made in that month?

Mr. Walker: A magnificent record has been made in housing in spite of the fact that we have had little or no participation by the banks. Therefore the banks can use their money for commercial loans in the regular course of their business.

Mr. Garland: A supplementary question. Does the government contemplate taking any action which will encourage the banks to get back into the housing field?

Mr. Walker: If by that the hon. member means are we seeking to increase the borrowing rate from 6 per cent to 6¾ per cent, the answer is in the negative.

Mr. Garland: I mean lowering the N.H.A. interest rate, as the minister well knows.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—INQUIRY AS TO CONTINUATION OF TRADE PREFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has his attention been drawn to the decision of the United Kingdom government, announced today, to continue trade preferences to South Africa after her withdrawal from the commonwealth, and does the government propose to follow the same course here?

Mr. Argue: We hope not.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did notice what had taken place in the British House of Commons and the statement made by the Prime Minister and I think as well by the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations. I do not know whether it was inherent in the question that Canada might follow the lead of the United Kingdom in that regard. I would say that when and if a decision is made in this respect the house will immediately be made aware of it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR LIST OF OUTSTANDING RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I can ask the Secretary of State whether he is yet in a position to provide the list of unfulfilled returns that was asked for some weeks ago?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): I believe it will be ready maybe tomorrow or next Monday.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I send to the Secretary of State a partial list that one of my friends prepared for me, to help him in the preparation of this material?

AGRICULTURE

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS RESPECTING MARGINAL LANDS, RURAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES, ETC.

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 1, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle)—Mr. Rea in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Agriculture to enter into agreements with provincial governments or agencies thereof for the undertaking jointly with those governments or agencies of projects for the alternative uses of lands that are marginal or of low productivity, projects for the development of income and employment opportunities in rural agricultural areas, and projects for the development and conservation of the soil and water resources of Canada; for the payment to the provinces of contributions in respect of the cost of such projects undertaken by a province or agency thereof; to authorize the Minister of Agriculture to undertake programs of research and investigation in respect of these matters; to provide for the establishment of advisory committees and the appointment of their members, and to provide for other related and incidental matters.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): When the resolution was last before the committee I had summarized in what directions productive acreage could be increased. In fact, after looking at our import and export position with regard to field crop production I find that without the export of wheat Canada would be a net importer of agricultural field and vegetable products.

If one takes a close look at the resolution before us, one finds that it readily breaks down into three categories. These categories are (1) projects for alternative use of land, particularly marginal land; (2) projects for the development of income and employment opportunities; (3) conservation of soil and water resources. I find the resolution very interesting because of the fact that about half of the land area in my constituency is included in what is called the "special areas". These areas consist of a number of municipalities in the centre of the Palliser triangle, and they went bankrupt in the early thirties. At this time the whole area was taken over by the provincial government and administered from Edmonton. About 70 per cent of the land is what is known today as tax recovery land. The heart of the policy followed in connection with this area is the refusal to sell either crown or tax recovery land. This, coupled with the stipulation that cultivation leases are to be issued only for special feed needs, has made the area a cattle raising area.

In most respects this policy corresponds to the policy that will be possible under this resolution, but recently the provincial government began to shift their view with regard to the whole area. The provincial government has done this, first, by increasing the forage value on lands, in some cases to the extent of doubling the value, and placing the whole area in a group with land to the west along the foothills. The interesting thing is that here we have the federal government bringing in a resolution which would set up an area similar to that which I have described, yet recently the provincial government has begun to shift its views with regard to this whole area.

The premier of the province told a few ranchers in the area that he thought the whole of the special areas should be turned into a county. Last fall the provincial government set up a commission to study the administration of the special areas. One of the purposes of the commission was to ascertain whether conditions had been altered sufficiently in the special areas as a result of agricultural practices, technological advances and increases in the size of farms, to warrant the establishment of local municipal government. I suppose the reference is to a county system. In addition, the commission was to see whether conditions in the special areas were of a sufficiently different character to warrant a different type of administration from that of any other area in the province.

I mention these two terms of reference of that provincial commission because they are closely linked with the thought in this resolution. Here is an area consisting largely of submarginal land which has been subjected to rules and governed by an administration of the type that has had much to do with shaping the development of the area. The heart of the policy was the refusal to sell either crown or tax recovery land for cultivative practices. These lands have been largely leased by the farmers from the provincial government for cattle raising. Today we find that the provincial government of Alberta has reached a stage in its thinking where it believes this policy should be reversed, while the federal government introduces a policy which, in a sense, endorses the legislation which has applied to this area in the past. As a result of my experience in living in this area, I commend the federal government for introducing this measure under which alternative use of the land will be encouraged, one way or another.

I should like to speak for a moment on the other two points in this resolution, namely projects for the development of income and employment opportunities and projects for the conservation of soil and water resources. The minister said that, in effect, this measure would enlarge P.F.R.A. to cover the whole of Canada. Most of my constituency lies within the old boundaries of the P.F.R.A. areas, but that part which is not included at the moment will certainly welcome the news that it will qualify for assistance under P.F.R.A. Another point that should be considered is the statement by the minister that cost sharing arrangements of the past will be carried forward into the future in connection with any projects undertaken under the new legislation or under the old P.F.R.A.

There is one question, however, I should like to ask about this measure. Who can apply for assistance in connection with these projects? Many towns in my constituency are finding themselves short of water which hinders their development, thus reducing employment opportunities. Can the town or municipality act as the agent of the province? I hope so. What I have in mind is not a dugout for water to be supplied to a small town, but a medium sized dam or canal to channel the water into these towns and thus help the towns develop industrially, thus creating greater opportunities for the citizens now living in the towns to earn increased incomes as well as creating greater employment opportunities for new citizens. I know a great many towns in my constituency that would welcome assistance along these lines.

The last item I wish to mention is soil and water conservation. As I have mentioned before, the whole area in my constituency would welcome assistance under this particular measure. We have received considerable assistance in connection with the conservation of soil, but our water resources have not been developed to the extent that they could have been developed. The Red Deer river flows through the central part of Alberta and through my constituency. This river has been talked about for a number of years, going back as far as 1918, when William Pearce envisaged the possibility of damming this river to create a greater water supply. I am sure the citizens of this areas would welcome assistance in the development of this particular project.

A number of people might think that I am advocating greater irrigation areas. This type of development may occur in some small areas in the east central part of Alberta, but by and large the development envisaged would create greater water supplies for the towns and for the cattle raising industry.

Last summer was a particularly dry summer, as well as the year before that, in some areas of east central Alberta. A number of farmers and ranchers had to sell their basic animals because of the lack of water in their pastures. The proposed project which has been talked about for many years, will bring about greater development and will industrialize the area. It will be accompanied perhaps by some small irrigation projects to assist in bringing about greater use of the submarginal land for stock raising purposes.

It is estimated that perhaps 40 acres out of each township, on the average, is adaptable for irrigation. A great deal of land, as hon. members will realize, is not suitable for irrigation because of the varied types of soil. I point this out only to indicate, to those individuals who think we have enough irrigated land at this time, that this is not another solid irrigation project that is envisaged in that area, but rather a project which will help to conserve water and bring about greater development of the area in general.

I welcome the introduction of this resolution. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will be willing to co-operate with the province of Alberta in this regard, and that he will realize that the development of this east central part of Alberta is necessary to maintain the livelihood of the agriculture element in that growing area of Canada.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the principle and purpose of this resolution which, from our point of view, is quite sound. We hope the future will disclose that the administration of the legislation founded on this resolution, and the co-operation extended by the provinces, will be equal to the hopes that are raised by the introduction of the resolution.

Before proceeding I might say that the C.C.F. party throughout the years has urged long term planning and action on the part of federal and provincial governments to protect, restore and conserve our renewable natural resources along the lines indicated in this legislation. On that account I have no hesitation whatsoever in congratulating the minister and the government for giving effect to at least another aspect of C.C.F. policy throughout the years.

This is a very interesting subject to me because I have lived very close to nature all my life. Anyone who reads the pages of history will realize that man has made a bit of a mess of the Lord's earth since he inherited it. I want to bring to the attention of this committee certain quotations which I have found while reading the scripture on Sunday mornings. I was looking up a few quotations which I remembered in the old testament, which had reference to the very problem that we are discussing this afternoon. We find that man awakened to life on this earth embowered in a garden of trees surrounded by fertile soil and unpolluted water. After thousands of years of life look how we have treated our heritage. I find in Genesis 2:8-9 the following:

> And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the men whom he had formed. And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

We have learned a lot about evil but very little about how to care for the garden. Ever since man was driven out of the garden of Eden he has done two things very successfully. First, he has tried to destroy his fellow man and continues to do so. Second, he has ravaged the earth; and no one can deny that.

I was looking up this question and now realize that rehabilitation and conservation is not something new. This subject goes back thousands of years. In fact the first instruction to conserve and care for the things on earth is to be found in the Bible. I quote from Revelation 9:4, as follows:

> So protect the bounty of the earth, for nature is the work of God.
> And it was commanded them that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree—

We have certainly broken what I would call the eleventh commandment throughout the ages. Man continues his devastation today. We find signs of this in the history of the valley of the Euphrates and in the valley of the Nile; we find this in Europe and in Asia.

I then turned my attention to the history of rehabilitation programs, and found that after wasting resources for centuries man found that he had destroyed many of the things he had inherited, and was instructed in Leviticus 19:23 as follows:

> And man realizing his loss, must set out to clothe the land with trees.
> And when ye shall come into the land, and shall have planted all manner of trees for food, then ye shall count the fruit thereof—

I mention these quotations from scripture to indicate how ancient and long standing this program of rehabilitation is. Even the present minister is not the first one to develop a rehabilitation program, but we give him full marks for being the first one in this house to do so on this scale. I have no hesitation in giving him credit for seeking to have this problem studied as the result of a national conference, and as a result of this resolution being brought to the attention of the house.

Man has gone on since early ages ruining the land, destroying the forests, polluting our waters and diminishing our wildlife in all sectors of the world. It is only in comparatively recent years that rehabilitation programs on any scale were attempted. I find from my reading that the first program of any scope was introduced in Europe about 1865, and then in Great Britain in about 1880. A program has only been introduced in Asia in very recent years; in fact one is under the Colombo plan, to which the people of Canada are contributing in an attempt to restore the areas which have been ravaged and denuded as the result of man's pollution of rivers and destruction of forests.

In this virtually new country of Canada we find that the destruction of natural resources has taken place at a tremendous pace from almost the days of early settlement. I have been reading in regard to this problem, and I notice that one of the first studies was made by the commission on conservation which was appointed by the government of Canada in 1909. I know that the father of the Minister of Justice was a member of that commission in its initial stages. I obtained a copy of the Trent watershed survey which deals with this problem. I mention these things to indicate our lack in foresight in the establishment of programs in connection with the preservation of our natural resources. I wish to quote from this book entitled "Trent Watershed Survey," because it is very interesting to me and I think will be of interest to some hon. members, and will show how grave this problem was as far back as the middle of the nineteenth century. This report was written by Messrs. C. D. Howe and J. H. White. At page 97 is found the following paragraph:

> The impression received daily throughout the season's investigation was the dreary hopelessness of attempting to secure returns by agricultural activities, from a soil inherently adapted only for forest use. The amount of human energy unavailingly expended in this attempt, represents an incalculable asset lost to the province. It is but another example of past misguided or rather unguided occupancy of townships which should never have been thrown open for settlement, and of the lack of appreciation by government of its obvious duties.

This, mind you, was in 1865. The report continues:

Early advice—That this was not done through ignorance of conditions is shown by various reports of the early commissioners of crown lands and of parliamentary inquiries. Extracts from two of these will suffice to show that, even in those days, there were men who were aware of the necessity of segregating agricultural from absolute forest lands, and the setting aside of the latter as forest reserves. As early as 1855 a committee of the House of Commons, Hon. A. T. Galt, chairman, reported, among other things: "It appears from the evidence that settlement has been unreasonably pushed in some localities quite unfit to become the permanent residence of an agricultural population. Especially has this been the case in some of the free grant roads and adjacent country, lying between the waters of the Ottawa and lake Ontario. Your committee would refer to the evidence and recommend that the government should, in all cases, ascertain positively the character of the country before throwing open any tract of land for settlement, so that such lands that are really not fit for profitable cultivation may not be thrown upon the market. There being considerable diversity of opinion among the witnesses in regard to some of the localities adverted to, it seems to the committee that the government should have an examination made by some thoroughly competent and reliable officer, whose report would be available in any further consideration of this subject."

Again, in 1865, the Hon. A. Campbell, commissioner of crown lands, in his report for that year, stated: ..."It needs a careful discrimination between pine lands exclusively and lands fit for settlement, to place it in the power of the government to conserve this valuable source of national wealth".

The report goes on to point out the completely uncontrolled destruction of forests in eastern Ontario and the need for some action on the part of governments to change these circumstances, to control the settlement of land and so on. Yet it is obvious that although consideration was given to these matters over a century ago, very little was done to correct the situation until recent years, and nothing has been done in the nature of a co-ordinated program as suggested by this resolution.

I wish to quote briefly from the recommendations of this commission, which are found on page 15 of this report. There are two recommendations which I think are most interesting in light of the present circumstances:

Nobody who has studied the conditions presented in this report will hesitate a moment in agreeing that the bulk of the country involved should be placed in, and managed as, a permanent forest reserve for the growing of timber. The only question can be: How this is to be brought about? There are at least five interests to be considered or reckoned with and to be brought into co-operation in building up such a territory—the dominion government, the provincial government, the municipalities in which the territory is situated, the private owners of properties and of timber licences, and the public at large.

Later on in the recommendations it is said:

The co-operation of the three administrative agencies, the dominion, provincial and municipal governments, is especially needed to develop anything like a permanent forest policy, for forest growth is slow, and financial results from timber growing, the only incentive for private enterprise, are slow in coming, so that only persistent entities like governments can be expected to carry on the business of timber growing.

And I might add, to carry out the recommendations mentioned in this report. Those were very sound observations which apply just as much today as they did at the time of that commission's investigation and report. I am very pleased to again say that according to the terms of the resolution the minister is actually proceeding along the lines recommended in a government report of many years ago.

While this is a subject of immense importance to our country as a whole and to the welfare of human beings, throughout the years only a very small percentage of the population has been far sighted enough in this regard. Socialists have been in the vanguard in this respect in every country in the world. If you read socialist literature you will find that they had the foresight to realize man's dependence upon the conservation of natural resources, their proper development and so on, and others have followed suit.

However, it has taken a long time to build up a social consciousness on this question, and I admit quite freely that complete consciousness does not exist even today. I have been talking to men who have been concerned with the proposed building of dams, and so on, in my constituency. I must explain that these men are not resident in my constituency. I have on occasion talked to these men, who seem to have no appreciation of the necessity to do what is in the best interests of the country as a whole and the public at large. They would be just as shortsighted as some capitalists are in providing nothing but an immediate job without any idea of the project's influence on the welfare of future generations.

Throughout the years socialists have influenced governments and public opinion, and our province has had a fairly high percentage of these people. It is interesting to note that although this matter was investigated in Ontario over a century ago and a report was made to the government of Canada, no action was taken until recent years. Do you know that in British Columbia, after the election of a number of C.C.F. members who became the official opposition of that government, because of their insistence in the legislature on the necessity to protect our forest industry, our forest resources and other natural resources, within eight years the first royal commission on forestry in British Columbia was appointed.

There is no question in my mind that socialist minded people had a great influence on public opinion and, as a result, on the government of the day. We had a similar situation with respect to conservation in Ontario. I refer to the report of the select committee on conservation set up by the Ontario government. There has been literature published on this subject, and in recent years professional organizations have taken a leading part in this matter.

I refer to such organizations as the Agricultural Institute of Canada, the Canadian forestry institute, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the Canadian forestry association. I cannot mention these organizations without referring to the good work carried out by a number of professors in the universities across this country. I would mention particularly Dr. O. M. McCoukey of the Ontario Agricultural College who retired a few years ago. This gentleman has spoken often on this question, he has written on the subject and has published literature on conservation for many years. He has been a guide and stimulus to many people in Canada in this respect.

With a hurried summary of the situation, since the garden of Eden until today, I say that we cannot but recognize this is a long term program. This is not going to give work to large numbers of people immediately. We know that. However, it is a program that should have been commenced a century ago. Because it is a sound program we are supporting it, and we are glad to know that even at this late date a start is being made in this connection.

If there is to be success in this program it will require the co-operation of federal, provincial and municipal governments in some cases. It will require the co-operation of organizations across this country which are interested in this problem. It will require the co-operation of the public at large. This means that the public relations educational program will have to be extensive. In my opinion there is an opportunity here for our younger people in the high schools and senior grades of public schools to build up their esprit de corps, an interest in the fact that this is Canada, this is their country, and they should be well acquainted with the efforts of government and organizations to give effect to a program such as this, in order to preserve it.

I suggest that not only will funds be required to make this program effective, but funds will be required for extensive research, because conditions are so varied in different parts of Canada.

I have had some experience in the conservation of forest resources, though I find that my experience has been very different from that of people in the Ottawa valley and other places. A great deal of educational and public relations work is required. I suggest to the minister that this does offer an opportunity to arouse the interest of our younger people in the universities, high schools and public schools through an educational program which would promote a desire on their part to participate in something which will bring increasing dividends to Canada as a whole and to them as individuals throughout the years.

Before concluding I do want to say there are some wonderful opportunities in Kootenay West for the application of this program. I cannot conclude without making some reference to my constituency. We have thousands of acres of undeveloped land in my constituency which could be brought under cultivation through the application of this program. We have thousands of acres of other land, now improperly cleared for other purposes, which could be replanted and turned back to forest growth.

There are wonderful opportunities, for example, in the Slocan valley, a valley 30 miles long with a paved highway 20 feet wide running through it. A beautiful river three times the width of this chamber flows the full length of the valley; power and light have been provided and all that is needed is co-operation between the federal and provincial governments to instal irrigation and drainage to make this an area of the most fertile possibilities where thousands of acres could be brought under cultivation. I could take hon. members to one spot where they could look down over 12,000 acres of land as level as a billiard table. All that is required to make that area habitable and suitable for cultivation is the lowering of the water level by three feet as a result of the deepening of the Duncan river, and the building of 20 miles of road. The same opportunities are available along Kootenay lake and in the valley of the Columbia river between Castlegar and Revelstoke.

This is a program in which we should get people interested, and young people particularly. I am confident that if we could get them to see—I was about to say "the vision" but I do not want to be misunderstood; however, I mean it—if we could get them to see the vision in a national way and then apply it to the circumstances in which they live there would be no difficulty about enlisting the time and energy of people who wanted to take part in this great development.

That is all I intend to say. My remarks have been somewhat general. However, I hope the measure which will follow this resolution will satisfy our anticipations in every way and that when it is passed the minister will enjoy the co-operation of the provinces in the development of this forward looking long term plan so long advocated by the party to which I belong.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In speaking on the resolution for the second time I feel I should tell the committee that of all people in this chamber I, perhaps, appreciate more than most the honour which has fallen upon me in bringing in this legislation. Like the hon. member for Kootenay West, I know full well how long people have talked of conservation; how long people in the universities have proposed ideas, and how long organizations across this country have made representations to governments at local, provincial and federal level with respect to it. I agree with the hon. member that the significant thing is that at long last something has been started.

I should like to discuss some of the observations which have been made during the debate on the resolution. I think I should be doing only justice to posterity if I omitted some of the comments made, because I think they are better forgotten. I think the only remark which has achieved national publicity across this country, and which is negative with regard to this legislation, is that it is long ranged. At the very outset I want to make it perfectly clear that I agree that this is a long range program. No one wants to pretend it is anything else.

The criticism which went across the country after the introduction of the resolution was to the effect that it was not going to do any good now; it did not affect prices or the shortage of income in agriculture, but was just a long term measure. Fortunately this first public information which went out from the house with regard to this measure has not been able to take hold. The common sense of the farmers and of the people who live in our towns and cities, as well as the tremendous, almost fantastic support that this resolution has received from newspapers and editors, from farm organizations, from the great weeklies across Canada and from newspapers in general in their news columns and special articles, have brought to the attention of all segments of the population the achievements of which this measure is capable. I think the thanks of all Canadians are due to these agencies of public education.

I am very glad to have the support of the knowledgeable members of the C.C.F. party in connection with this measure. I think it takes the bad taste out of one's mouth when one considers some of the things which have been said by various members about it. If any person tries to divorce this from the over-all agricultural policy of the government, that person does a great injustice to what we are attempting to do here.

This is part and parcel of a national program for agriculture which is a logical, co-ordinated attack on the fundamental weaknesses we see in agriculture. It is just as important as the stabilization act; it is just as important as crop insurance will be some day; it is just as important as this new power which is being put into the battle on behalf of farmers, the farm credit corporation. It is part of a program for agriculture which is the basic cornerstone of a national development program.

Perhaps I may say something now which is not altogether new. When I was in the United States last week I discussed with the secretary of state for agriculture and the secretary of state for the interior of that country something of what we are doing here. Because of the great interest they took in the outline of our thinking we realized we should have more time to discuss this question, so I invited them, along with the head of the food for peace program, to visit us in Canada for two or three days to sit down and discuss the philosophy and principles of our respective agricultural programs and see whether we could not only bring agriculture and other resources together in our respective countries but also understand better the relationship of resources between the two main countries on the North American continent. I think it is hopeful for the future of all of us in Canada that the interest of these three men is as great as it is.

I should like to say a few words now on the general necessity for the agricultural rehabilitation and development bill, to be founded on this resolution. It is, first of all, to fill a most important gap which has grown up over the decades in our agricultural industry. It is a gap which has defied all attempts to get at the agricultural problem on the economic side. The people primarily the concern of this measure live on marginal and submarginal land. The policies of price stabilization, of crop insurance and of farm credit do not get at the real difficulties of these people who live on marginal and submarginal lands.

We do not know how many of these people there are. I have tried to get at the number by estimating those whose annual production is less than $1,200 a year. In essence they represent about 30 per cent of our people who, through the decades, have been occupying land which has slowly been becoming an agricultural slum. To get at their problem is one purpose of A.R.D.A. and, in my opinion, its main purpose. I cannot get away from the fact that we are not using to the full the human resources of these 120,000 family farms. I put this forward as the No. 1 purpose of this program.

The second purpose is more general, and is somewhat along the lines of the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay West, the hon. member for Kent (N.B.) and other hon. members on this side of the committee. This measure represents an attempt for the first time on the part of any government to look at agriculture as a unit and not to regard the various commodities separately. This is an attempt to look at the opportunities for the intelligent use of land and water not only in the field of agriculture but also in the field of the related resource industries.

I recently heard one person express this in a highly dramatic way. He said that if we ever departed from the thought that the forest industries of Canada and the agricultural industries were not related, we were doomed. He said not only were the forests and farms of Canada twins but they were Siamese twins, and to separate them would be fatal to both.

This is the approach I have in mind as the second great purpose of this program, namely to attempt to look at the interests and needs of our forest and other resource industries and the various aspects of our agricultural industries and relate them, to plan policies that would permit taking advantage of the opportunities in both fields.

I spoke earlier of the tremendous response to this program on the part of many people throughout the country, I spoke of the warm response of many people who have worked in this field for many years, of experts in various departments of agriculture across Canada, of experts in resource departments and branches, and I included in that reference the editorial writers and newspaper people whose attention had been drawn to this program. The clippings I have on this subject could be numbered only in the several hundreds.

I wish to place on the record some of these editorial observations to indicate to the committee and those who in years to come read this record that there is now general support across this country for this program. The following is an editorial from the Calgary Albertan of February 2, 1961 under the title "Rural Development":

> Agriculture minister Hamilton's rural development program got a cooler reception than it deserved when it was introduced in the House of Commons last week. Opposition spokesmen, particularly the C.C.F. leader, Mr. Hazen Argue, condemned it because it promised to bestow no immediate benefits on Canadian farmers. We doubt—and certainly hope—that Mr. Argue's attitude is not shared by the majority of the farmers for whom he presumes to speak.

I think it is not shared by farmers generally. I continue:

> Mr. Hamilton's program has three main facets. One objective would be to take marginal land out of cultivation by using it to grow trees or grazing grass (depending on the location and economic possibilities). The second would be to promote economic diversification in rural areas through the encouragement of local industry, the development of recreational facilities and the provision of technical training opportunities. The third, involving an expansion of the activities of the existing prairie farm rehabilitation administration, would be the development and conservation of water and soil resources.
> Obviously, these are not the sort of measures from which either farmers or the nation can expect immediate returns. Their purpose is to strengthen Canada's agricultural economy and thus gradually overcome or reduce some of the difficulties farmers now face: crop losses due to inadequate moisture, soil wastage caused by the planting of land that should never have been put to the plow, excessive dependence on too few crops, lack of employment opportunities for the sons and daughters of farmers, and so on.
> A great many questions remain to be answered. Since agriculture is a constitutionally joint federal-provincial responsibility, Mr. Hamilton proposes to operate his rural development program as a co-operative venture. That means that it will not get off the ground unless the provincial governments take a more positive view of it than does Mr. Argue. Administration will be complicated both by the complex nature of the program itself and by the fact that Ottawa and the provinces must work in harmony; yet success will depend on enlightened, flexible management capable of taking varying local circumstances into account. Finally, the active support and willingness to take the initiative of rural people will be absolutely essential, and a deplorable number of Canadian farmers seem to be all too ready to "let George do it."
> Nevertheless, Mr. Hamilton's program is pointed in the right direction. Let his political and other opponents pick on the flaws of detail if they wish; but let them do so constructively, with the object of improving upon the minister's design, not of ripping it to pieces and consigning it to the wastebasket.

I do not think what I have to say could be expressed in better words than those of this editorial. I need not tell hon. members from western Canada that the Calgary Albertan is not known as a Conservative newspaper. I also have in my hand an editorial from the Toronto Globe and Mail of January 28 entitled "Rural Rehabilitation", only the last two paragraphs of which I shall read:

> As to the first charge, a scheme of this sort must be very general at the present stage; partly because the full extent of the task is not yet known and partly because agreements have to be reached with the provinces on the specific measures to be taken. As to the second, it is surely the merit of the project that it is a long term approach to long term problems. It is designed to pay economic dividends for the future, not political dividends for the next election.
> This last criticism, indeed, comes rather oddly from the Liberals. During their long tenure of office they did almost nothing about this problem of submarginal lands and submarginal living; that is one reason why it has grown to its present proportions. They are hardly entitled to demand immediate solutions now.

Having read those two editorials, one from a business paper in the east and the other from a city and farm paper in the west, let me say I think they are indicative of the type of support that has been given to this program. We all accept the fact that it is a long term program but, because it is, I hope that people across Canada will not fail to realize its immediate advantages.

If we throw enough effort into this program in the next five or ten years and, getting at the alternative use part of the program, shift the people on the farms to alternative types of production where they may receive greater returns, not only will we increase their returns almost immediately but there will be as a result of the shift an immediate impact on the farmers who are now on the better land. The farmers on the better land will be those who will receive the immediate benefits of this program in so far as the alternative land use aspect of it is concerned.

I hope this point will be carried by every hon. member into all ridings in Canada. As the program develops and as the money is spent in the poorer land areas of our provinces, it should be driven home to all those concerned that the immediate benefits go to the farmers on the good land. I hope this point will in some measure meet the criticism that the program is long range.

I wish now to express sincere thanks and appreciation to the many hundreds of people who have written to me as the minister in connection with the suggestions I made relating to tree farming, forest farming, wood lot development, and related subjects.

I have been quoting figures as part of my educational program. I have said it is possible on many farms in eastern Canada to raise one cord of pulpwood per acre per year. I gave that figure with some timidity because I was not an authority on this subject. I examined what had been done in silviculture programs by various organizations across the country and selected the figure of one cord per acre per year. Many farmers are writing me saying they are doing a lot better than that. One I think of in particular wrote to say he started out with three quarters of a cord per acre per year and has now raised production to one and three quarters cords per acre per year. Therefore the figure I had been quoting as evidence of the extra income which could be derived from using land for this purpose is apparently a very conservative estimate.

One farmer, not in the east, not only wrote to me but wrote to the Winnipeg Free Press under date of November 26, 1960. That was before the legislation was introduced in the commons. Let me read one paragraph from that letter:

Today the need to rehabilitate the marginal farm, and the need for off-season employment, again direct attention to the need for tree farming. Let us not overlook the fact that, wisely developed, farm forestry can make employment on the farm during the off-season for field crops the most remunerative portion of the year. If given a fair chance, too, it can re-establish the attractiveness of rural life.

I do not know this farmer, but I have read a good deal about him since. A Free Press editorial dated November 12, 1960, dealing with the same subject, had this to say:

The important aspect of all this for the individual farmer is that lumber, and its by-products, are readily marketable. Converted to forestry, the uneconomic marginal farms could return a profit to the owner. To the province at large, there would be additional gains in conservation of wildlife, transformation of scrubby, desolate areas into scenic beauty, with all the attendant implication for the tourist industry, and the provision of additional employment opportunities.

As Mr. Dawson rightly suggested, the responsibility for encouraging farmers to grow trees lies with the province. The provincial government is currently engaged in taking stock of its assets and liabilities in these very areas that would be best suited to tree farming. It should not, in its studies, overlook the possibilities in forest farming.

Here we have examples from all across the country, the east, the west and the centre, speaking of the type of program that I have been talking about under this resolution. Not only are newspaper editors doing it, but others are talking in the same vein. Here is a clipping from the Toronto Globe and Mail dated February 8, 1961, with the heading:

Jaycees urge northern study, regional plan.

The article goes on:

Creation of a commission to study the problems and assess the potential of the northeastern part of the province was recommended yesterday by the Ontario junior chamber of commerce in a brief to the cabinet.

I am leaving out a couple of paragraphs. The article continues:

Besides calling for a commission to survey the area, the brief urged that a regional plan be drawn up to direct development and that a regional planning office be established to implement the plan and provide leadership.

This is the same thing we envisage under our rural development program. In the Edmonton Journal of January 17, 1961, I find the following headline:

To spend $500,000 for seven pastures.

This is a program of the Alberta government to spend this amount of money in the next 10 years to build pastures on a total of 185,000 acres that will give the farmers in the dry land areas and in the irrigated areas a diversified use of their land that will increase their income. This is one of the types of proposals that we are thinking about in the west.

Here is a story from the Rural Co-Operator of February 28, 1961. The headline reads:

East asks land use plan.

The article reads in part as follows:

The eastern Ontario development association has asked the provincial government for a conference in the east to set up an area program of land use. The request is contained in a 54-point brief to the government.

Specifically addressed to the Department of Agriculture is a request for more encouragement of tree planting on submarginal land, of which the east has much. The brief asks for expansion of export markets and research to find alternate uses for farm products.

If I may, I should like to head down to the maritimes for a moment and take an example from the Charlottetown Guardian of January 27, 1961:

No estimate can be made now on what share of cost the federal government will assume in each type, but spokesmen for the Shaw government have already indicated their desire to co-operate, and their belief that the program can be put to good advantage in this province. By helping low income farmers, our whole economy will be benefited and our basic industry placed on a less precarious footing. Not least significant is Mr. Hamilton's assurance that it is not the purpose of this legislation to reduce the number of farms.

I think this is sufficient to indicate that the support for this program across the country by individuals, by organizations, by university people and by the newspapers particularly, has been gratifying.

I should like to conclude my remarks by putting the proposal that I have made into its simplest terms. I am asking the support of the committee for this resolution, which will permit us to spend money to achieve certain purposes. These purposes are first of all to give some sort of opportunity for additional income to the 30 per cent of our people who live on the marginal and submarginal lands; and second, to use this program as a vehicle to start on the over-all conservation approach to the use of our resources. These two purposes, although they are long run in their application, will bring about immediate benefits to all agriculture and to the country.

May I give in conclusion a set of figures to indicate the size of this program. I should like to give the committee the actual figures of income of farms which returned less than $1,200 a year. The reason I do this is that on January 25, when I introduced the resolution, I gave the percentage of farms in each province that had a gross production of less than $1,200 a year. On reading some of the editorials and accounts across the country I saw where one province gloated over another province because their figure was lower, which they said indicated that they must be better off.

In order to prevent any misunderstanding I am going to give the figures for gross income in 1950; this means the amount of cash income the farmers received. I am going to give it to the committee province by province. The first set of figures quoted on January 25, 1961 were figures of the total production of the farms in each province with incomes less than $1,200. The production includes the amount of food that goes to family living on the farm. The figures that I am going to give now are for the total cash income of farms, province by province. Therefore any province which was particularly proud of the fact that its percentage was less than that of another province may find these figures interesting. They are taken from the 1951 census and apply to the farms in 1950.

This is a table giving the percentage of farms with gross incomes below $1,200 in 1950; this is the way the farmers measure, by income, not by production:

Newfoundland	88.8	per cent
Prince Edward Island	48.1	" "
Nova Scotia	72	" "
New Brunswick	69.7	" "
Quebec	47.3	" "
Ontario	29.3	" "
Manitoba	28.7	" "
Saskatchewan	26	" "
Alberta	29.6	" "
British Columbia	54.5	" "

That is an average for all Canada of 37.9 per cent in that wonderfully prosperous period of 1950. Thirty seven per cent of our farmers in that period had a gross income of less than $1,200 a year. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that with respect to the type of program we have outlined in general, this table alone is sufficient evidence to warrant the support of this resolution by all hon. members.

Mr. Racine: May I ask a question? Is the minister in a position to tell the committee whether he expects those new regulations to take effect before the end of 1961?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The timetable I had in mind was to have the resolution introduced before Christmas. It failed to get that introduction. Following the introduction of the resolution in January I thought there would be a debate for two days. Then I intended to go to each of the provinces, see the provincial governments, sit down with them and work out the general framework for a series of agreements that I thought we should work toward, especially the areas where research has to be done before agreements can be completed. Following that meeting with the provinces there will be a time lag, as they work on this, in some instances of three or four months. I want to discuss with them the terms of the bill to see if it is broad enough to cover the various types of agreements we have in mind. Second, I want to go to the farm organizations, who have been most co-operative and helpful over the years in suggesting this idea, show them the legislation and ask if they have any ideas for broadening it. I do not believe anyone would want to narrow it.

With these facts in mind, I could come back to the house—this is now March and I am three months behind schedule—by May 1 with a series of more definite ideas which will enable me to indicate to hon. members the type of agreement into which we will be entering. When hon. members see the bill they will notice a section that protects the right of parliament to express its will before agreements can be put into force. In answer to the question may I say that keeping in mind the amount of work that has to be done, I would hope there would be at least a pilot agreement in operation in almost every province before the end of the year.

Mr. Boulanger: I should like to ask the minister a question. This resolution indicates a long range policy. Will he have a short range program to aid the farmer?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): During the last three years we have been putting forward these various aspects of a national agriculture program. First of all, there were the tremendous efforts that were made in connection with sales. Then, there was the stabilization of prices, which is in effect now and the results of which are showing in the income figures. The third item was crop insurance, and the fourth item was the farm credit corporation which commenced operations only last April. These items are designed to help the farmer immediately, and to help the 70 per cent who are on reasonably good land.

Our desire is to bridge the gap that exists between those farmers who are on reasonably good land and those farmers who are on poor land and cannot be helped by these measures or who are producing something that is in surplus. This measure would enable such farmers to take the land out of that type of production and put it into a new type of production. There is, therefore, an immediate effect there. The whole agricultural program is co-ordinated and long range. There is, however, no program for additional subsidies to take up the slack immediately, excepting those that are already in effect.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the minister one question. However, before doing so I might say I am rather disappointed, as I am sure all members will be, to hear that what we have before us represents the complete program of the government for meeting the problems that face agriculture.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone says "Nonsense". This term, then, would apply to the words of the minister because what I have said arises from his statement that this program, together with the others that have been proposed earlier, represent the complete program of the government with regard to agriculture.

Mr. Cardiff: An absolutely false interpretation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend, who is a keen interpreter of words, says that is a false interpretation. I have just listened to the minister say that, and the minister does not quarrel with what I am saying.

I had been under the impression that the minister proposed, once this resolution was passed and the bill had been introduced, to send the bill based on this resolution to the provincial governments as well as to certain national farm organizations. I believed that after these organizations had had an opportunity of examining the contents of the bill, the bill would then be given second reading. This procedure had suggested to my mind that the bill, in final form, would not be disposed of this session.

A few days ago the minister corrected that impression and said that was not his intention. I welcomed that statement. But can the minister now give the committee an assurance that the government will bring this legislation forward at the earliest possible moment so that there will be no delay and so that this measure can be enacted before the end of this session? Next Wednesday we shall be adjourning. Is it the intention of the government to bring this measure forward immediately, say tomorrow, so that there will be no delay in passing the resolution and obtaining first reading of the bill before the Easter recess?

If we wait until after the Easter recess, then of course the minister runs the risk of not being in a position to bring the legislation back into the house and dispose of it this session. Will the minister give us an assurance now that there is no doubt he proposes to take steps that will ensure the passage of this bill before this session of parliament terminates?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am sorry the hon. member was not in the committee when I gave the explanation. I made it quite clear that the timetable upon which I was working envisaged the passage of this resolution today.

As a matter of fact. I think there is good reason for believing it could go through today. Then I could take the bill to the farm organizations and the provincial governments and return with the bill to the house about May 1. The reason I set May 1 as the date was that I did not believe it would be humanly possible to have conferences with 10 provincial governments and several of the main farm organizations in any shorter time. I certainly should not like to bring this bill forward for second reading unless I had consulted with the provinces and the farm organizations.

I will give this assurance to the hon. member: unless there is a filibuster on the part of the opposition, the bill will be passed before the end of the session.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There will be no filibuster, but I am afraid you are delaying too long.

Mr. Michaud: I should like to ask the minister a question. In his remarks he used the term "30 per cent" a couple of times. I was not clear what he meant by that term and I wonder if he would repeat the reference to 30 per cent of the population. Does that refer to the farm population affected by this measure?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): When I introduced the resolution, I presented a series of figures taken from the 1956 census. There was a tabulation of the farmers who had a production value per farm of $1,200 a year or less. The number of farmers who had this production value ran from 78 per cent in Newfoundland right down to 4 per cent in Saskatchewan and the total for the whole of Canada was 21 per cent, if I remember the final figure correctly.

Because of the fact that these figures were quoted widely across the country, and some provinces took delight in the fact that their percentage was, say, 9 per cent as opposed to that of another province which was 20 per cent, I thought I should pick a better year, namely 1950, and use cash income as the term of reference since most farmers use this term. It seems that 1950 was a better year financially than 1956, yet 37.9 per cent received $1,200 or less in that year. The figure I quoted on January 25 was 21 per cent, and this 30 per cent figure that I have been using is about halfway between the 38 per cent and 21 per cent. In numbers of farmers across Canada, this would represent about 120,000.

Mr. Best: I want to speak about this measure that is before us today. First of all, I should like to congratulate the minister. He has received congratulations, of course, from all across Canada and I think it has been stimulating to hear the commendation this resolution has received. The minister has read into the record the favourable comments on this resolution made by various newspapers and farm organizations across this country. This resolution, which is now being called by the name A.R.D.A. has been welcomed with optimism and confidence. I think that many of us will remember that the hon. member for Essex East criticized the Minister of Agriculture for his optimism during the agricultural debate about a week ago. I believe that the farmers across our country need optimism, understand it and welcome it. I suggest that forecasts of doom and gloom such as those made by the hon. member for Essex East will not be satisfactory to farmers and certainly are not what they want. I am certain that those farmers need a measure of optimism and confidence such as that expressed by the Minister of Agriculture.

This resolution is in several sections. One is to allow the Minister of Agriculture to enter into agreements with the provinces for alternative land uses, employment, and conservation practices. The second involves the payment to provinces of contributions toward these projects, if initiated. The third measure authorizes the minister to undertake research programs which might give assistance to the over-all plan. The fourth measure will establish advisory committees to co-ordinate research and the program itself, at various levels of government.

What briefly is this problem with which we are faced? It has been repeatedly stated by others and by the Minister of Agriculture when he brought it to our attention on January 25, 1961, that the problem is varied. The Minister of Agriculture mentioned certain figures in his statement of January 25, 1961. Those figures show that, according to the 1956 census, 21 per cent of the farmers in this country have farms which produce less than $1,200 worth of produce annually. Many sets of figures and statistics exist in this regard, but we are not happy about any of them. In the last three and a half to four years we have dealt with various specific measures in agriculture to aid this industry in Canada. Some of those measures are deficiency payments, aid to western farmers, and the outstandingly successful farm credit corporation which distributed a greatly increased amount of money under its authority. There have been other specific measures giving aid to different sectors of our agricultural economy, such as those for the fruit and vegetable growers. I am very happy indeed, as I am sure are many people across Canada about the Resources for Tomorrow conference to be held this autumn in Montreal. I feel that this conference will be very stimulating and will have a favourable result.

It was stated by the Prime Minister some years ago that the specific measures for agriculture were to be followed by one which would be very basic and fundamental. It was stated that this would go to the roots of our agricultural economy and the roots of our problems which we inherited from the previous government. The measure now before us is optimistic and goes to the heart of the problem. Criticism has been raised by the agricultural critic of the opposition—I am confused as to whether he is No. 1 or No. 2 critic—some weeks ago regarding the long range aspect of this measure. At that time I felt that the hon. member for Essex East was just raising straw men and blowing them down in order to present some sort of objection to a measure with which he fundamentally agreed. I think he agreed with this measure because, if one glances through his speech, one finds that very little constructive criticism is brought forth.

The Prime Minister some time ago dealt with the intention of the government in bringing out the sort of measure we have before us today. As recorded at page 4345 of Hansard for August 30, 1958, he stated that various specific measures were needed and also a more general and basic measure to attack the agricultural problems with which we were faced.

Of course during the last few decades previous measures have been taken by this house directed to various sectors of this problem. I speak of measures such as the National Parks Act, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, all of which to some extent have had a favourable effect on the various parts of the country. Although these measures were brought out, some of them by the previous government, at different times with the intent of solving this general problem, they are in many cases contradictory. They certainly are not co-ordinated as an over-all plan in an attempt to solve the basic and fundamental problems of agriculture in this country.

This problem as we see it is a varied one, as has been stated by many people and organizations, some of which I will mention in passing. They include the Agricultural Institute of Canada, an association of professional agriculturists and others. In the November-December, 1960 publication of the A.I.C. we find comments regarding the technological revolution in agriculture and the need for basic solutions to the problems of the agricultural industry. In view of the many different problems we of course must have many different solutions.

Land use in Canada is a matter which has come forcibly to public attention only recently. I think many of us have been surprised, in travelling overseas to various countries of Europe and Great Britain, by the tidiness of the farm lands. Those areas of course have been faced with different problems than we find here in Canada. We possess a large amount of agricultural land and we have been wasteful. Perhaps the tidiness of land overseas is accounted for by centuries of good husbandry. Our Canadian farmers are famous for livestock and in the production of various breeds and strains which have been exported to other countries of the world, but we are less famous indeed for our land use, and I think with justification. Farmers in Britain and northern Europe have solved their many difficulties over centuries by research in husbandry and, by the evolution of perfected techniques and meticulous care have preserved their lands for generations to come.

I feel that the resolution before us today is fundamentally addressed to another facet of the problem as well. I believe it is addressed to land, water and air—although air is not specifically mentioned as a national resource—that is our material resources. In addition this measure is directed to our human resources, to technological change, education and relocation, if desired by the people of various areas, something which is perhaps even more fundamental than is the problem of land use.

The difficulties which face our agricultural industry are common of course to the country south of us. These difficulties have been courageously stated by various leaders in this country. I should particularly like to commend the former minister of agriculture and other individuals, such as the minister of agriculture for the province of Ontario, who have recognized and courageously announced the difficulties facing this industry. To deny that these difficulties exist in the agricultural industry in various parts of this country is the same as denying that great industrial cities are faced with slum and rehabilitation problems, and it would be obviously incorrect to do so. These problems do exist and solutions must be found for them. Nevertheless in backward agricultural areas where the average annual income is low through a combination of reasons, such as climate, soil, lack of capital and markets, there is still a great attachment to the land. Perhaps through one or several generations of settlers and their dependents, these people have worked this land. They have grown to know each other and have developed a community spirit. To say, as did the hon. member for Assiniboia, that this resolution means that these people are to be moved or taken off the land is to fail to recognize the human values, the human problems and the community problems which this government recognizes and which do exist.

I believe we intend through this measure to give voluntary inducements to farmers in various areas to take advantage of its provisions, through the various matters and results worked out with the provinces and perhaps the municipalities, whereby these people may help themselves. We have no such socialistic tendency, doctrine or intent to move vast numbers of people off various sections of the land. I am sure that is not the intent of the government.

The problem has been studied by various people and of course by many organizations throughout this country and indeed throughout the world. I have looked, as I am sure have many hon. members, at the interesting study of the scientific conference on conservation and utilization of resources of the United Nations at Lake Success, New York, in 1950. This conference received various papers on the world resources situation and made many comments on this aspect of the situation. For instance, they said that use of material resources increase in a geometrical fashion, that the problems we face with regard to oil, water, minerals and so forth, really jump by leaps and bounds and would come on us very fast in the future.

World population is a problem and an area which is not unrelated to the resolution with which we are concerned today, because the measures that this government or any government in Canada must take are of course related to our export markets and the need and demand for Canadian agricultural produce around the world. It appears that in many countries mechanization, for instance, is not necessarily an answer to a food shortage. Real utilization of the present large labour force in countries in Asia and perhaps Africa is the greater need.

We have a critical shortage of foods in various parts of the world. It may be that Canadian agriculture can fill the gap here, or it may be that certain means of transportation, or indeed of preservation of foods, improving their keeping qualities, and so forth, will have to be brought about before any tremendously increased demand for certain Canadian agricultural products can be achieved even in these areas which need them today.

This conference pointed out the great likelihood that the demand for forest resources and forest products would increase tremendously in the decades immediately ahead. This is a good thing, because it is the intention of the minister and of the government to increase our output of forest products as a method of alternative land use. As well, the increase in community pastures, different crops, and so forth, is commendable.

The problems in agriculture have been set out in many publications. I have here the publication "Outlook on Agriculture" published by the Imperial Chemical Institute of Great Britain. Included in this publication are certain comments on a meeting at Cardiff of the British association for the advancement of science on September 5, 1960. The world food problem was studied by this body. As I say, this bears a relationship to Canada's agricultural program and the demand for our various commodities. We know, of course, that the number of farmers is decreasing each year in this country. On an average the figure has been approximately 10,000 less each year.

The committee of the other place on land use has studied problems and solutions put forward by a variety of witnesses. These very interesting documents provide perhaps as useful and as large a source of information in this field as any publication or series of publications in this country. Among the areas studied were the effects of the rural rehabilitation program in the United States. The problem in the United States is still present, but it has been attacked and a solution was begun a number of years ago. In its last volume, I believe, this committee studied the United States program to rehabilitate some of their people under the rural development program.

It was found that after about three years of operation the program was going ahead in some 200 counties and 30 states, and in Puerto Rico. For instance, in the United States some two million farms produce 90 per cent of the farm products, and about 2.7 million farms produce the remaining 10 per cent. This situation is perhaps not entirely analogous with what we have in Canada, but it shows that this problem is international in its nature and is not confined to our country.

The three main aims of the United States program were evidently to help those who wished to stay in farming to get the necessary tools, credit, information, and so forth, to widen farm opportunities of employment and to assist farming people to obtain better training and better health schemes. This program came into effect in June, 1956, when the needed legislative authority was granted by congress and the funds required by the federal government for the carrying out of the program were appropriate. It is interesting to note that the amount of money spent in this program by the federal government in the United States was very low indeed. Appropriations specifically earmarked for the rural development program were $2 million in 1957 and $2.5 million in 1958. These are incredibly low amounts for the size of the country and the magnitude of the program.

The basic principle of this measure in the United States was the co-ordination and co-operation of self-help at many different levels, with municipalities, state governments, the federal government, the church, industries and every facet of the local economy playing some part.

This United States program has come under some criticism because of the speed with which action has been taken. For instance, the Eisenhower administration believed that this measure should be carried out at a certain pace, but the National Planning Association of the United States—and I am now quoting from the Christian Science Monitor of December 16, 1959—felt that much more massive federal aid would be necessary.

However, it would seem that however this program works out both in the United States and in Canada it is essential, no matter what proportion of funds comes from what level of government, to have intense co-ordination and co-operation from all levels of government, and indeed of the community. It will be seen, therefore, that the solution of this problem is complicated indeed. May I refer members to the report on land use by the Conservation Council of Ontario, the economic survey of eastern Ontario by the provincial department of economics, the Saskatchewan Royal Commission on Agriculture and rural life, and the Gordon report.

In concluding I should like to point out two or three specific examples of what has been happening in my own province of Ontario and across Canada. In our county of Halton we have parts of four river valley conservation authorities. There are some 20 odd of these authorities in the province of Ontario, and they are doing very successful work. They are at various stages and ages, but they are accomplishing work and focusing the attention of the public on the conservation of soil, land and water, and providing park areas, flood controls and many other benefits.

In our own county we have parts of the Credit Valley conservation authority, the Grand River conservation authority, the Sixteen Mile Creek authority and the Twelve Mile Creek authority. In such organizations as the Sixteen Mile Creek authority, the present chairman, Mr. Robert Marshall and the vice-chairman, Dr. Carl Martin are examples of pioneers and dedicated citizens playing their part in many river valley conservation authorities throughout Ontario.

I might say that in my own riding we have certain historic land masses. The escarpment runs north and south throughout my county. It is an unusual area, one which provides timber, the rising of streams, and a natural conservation area, and it is falling to our local conservation authorities to play some part not only in water conservation and reforestation, but in the preservation of historic and important sections such as the escarpment ridge for generations yet to come.

An interesting example comes from the Globe and Mail of Saturday, January 28, 1961. Here is an example of co-operation and self-help on the local level in Manitoba. I am reading a headline here: "Farmers, Business, Work Together". This was the Brandon area development association, formed to help farmers increase their income, find new markets in the Brandon area, raise the standard of their products and finally develop new industries allied to the district's agricultural enterprises. This is just the sort of local example set in recent months in Manitoba which is envisaged on a larger scale by the resolution before us today. This resolution, for its effectiveness and success, will be very dependent on local planning and the sort of action taken in Brandon, Manitoba.

I should like to mention certain specific recommendations before I sit down. It would seem—and of course, it is part of the resolution itself—that a co-ordinating group or committee between various federal departments involved in this over-all plan should be set up. I imagine this would be implicit in this measure when it is spelled out in more detail. I think the departments would include those of agriculture, forestry, health and welfare and trade and commerce. In order to have a co-ordinated over-all attack on the problem, such departments, and indeed others, would have to play their part. A joint federal-provincial committee for each province wishing to participate in the scheme would seem necessary at some stage. This matter of liaison within the federal government and between federal and provincial governments together, probably, with representation from municipalities and so forth, would seem most important.

I think—and I must stress this—that a thorough examination of financing and credit methods in connection with tree farms and reforestation would seem in order. Increased reforestation, to be more attractive and to be given incentive, might come from the expansion of existing facilities under the farm credit corporation or some new body might have to be set up to perform this function.

But in any case, if we are to make it attractive for people to go into this reforestation and tree farming business, further measures will be necessary.

I have spoken of the need for co-operation with the provinces, and perhaps this co-operation should first of all begin with specific areas. Perhaps pilot schemes or pilot areas will be necessary. It is difficult to know where to start in our country and it would be wise to select certain areas in a province which have expressed an interest in this scheme and to see how it goes there first of all.

I was interested in the speech made by the hon. member for Essex East the other day. I thought it was a little empty and windy but the hon. member did stumble on one specific matter in connection with land use surveys, and soil surveys but he failed to develop it fully.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I only had half an hour.

Mr. Best: I thought this was a matter which should have been gone into in a greater degree. We should complete our soil surveys right across this country and, following that, there should be a land use survey such as that which was done in Britain by Professor Dudley Stamp and which, of course, took many years. This seems to me a basic prelude to the implementation of any scheme envisaged by the resolution before us.

On another specific question, I think when we go into reforestation and tree planning we must remedy any deficiencies which now exist in our tree breeding and seedling production. We all know that within white pine or red pine seedlings, for example, there can be as great a variation as there is between a good and bad example of any one breed of livestock. It is evident that although a good deal of breeding and research has been done in the past, something in the nature of a crash program may be needed in order to produce more vigorous and fast growing tree seedlings for the benefit of farmers entering upon these schemes.

I have mentioned the hon. member for Essex East. I should like to comment briefly on the hon. member for Assiniboia who on January 25 made some arguments about this measure. He thought that getting farm products to market was the imperative matter and that support prices, priority prices and so forth were much more important, and that this resolution was only a sideshow. I submit that this is the sort of basic measure for which Canadian agriculture has been looking. It is interesting to examine what might be the result of the policy of the hon. member for Assiniboia in advocating high support prices, more money and greater security for farmers in respect of specific commodities.

There are only two results which one can expect from his policy, in my opinion, and the hon. member does not seem to have spelled them out to farmers as he should. One is that we shall have disastrous overproduction with the consequence that the government will step in to market the goods or to play some part which farmers do really not want. The second thing which may be implicit in high support prices is severe production controls. Why does the leader of the C.C.F. group in this house not mention this when he talks to Canadian farmers? Severe production control limiting each farmer to a certain specific unit of production would be necessary. This does not go with Canadian agriculture in general and I am sure Canadian farmers would not be happy with this sort of procedure.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the minister's remarks this afternoon and his criticism of the opposition for not having passed the resolution some time ago. Is this not a problem in respect of all legislation? The house leader appears to have had to juggle this resolution from time to time. If the minister were to stay within the call of the House of Commons we could have proceeded with this in a more orderly fashion. If we did not jump around from month to month with respect to this resolution it would eventually pass. If we are accused of prolonging the discussion, let it be remembered that much confusion could be eliminated if the Minister of Agriculture would pursue one piece of legislation to the end before starting half a dozen other things.

We must view this measure through the eye of the farmer. The farmer will remember the Conservative vision of a few years ago on which the Conservative party campaigned. The farmer will remember that this same hon. gentleman, the present Minister of Agriculture, put before the Canadian people the vision of northern development. He spoke of glorified solutions to the problems of developing the north. He spoke of a city encased in a bubble of glass on the very rim of the Arctic circle. There was no truth or sincerity in that vision. It has not come to pass nor will it do so for a long time.

Some of the minister's suggestions concerning solutions for the problems of agriculture are just as much a pipe dream and a vision as were his suggestions regarding northern development on which the Conservative party campaigned not long ago.

Hon. members of the C.C.F. have always been interested in the advantageous use of agricultural lands. We and all farmers know that much of the land in Canada should never have been put into agricultural production because of unsuitability. It was cleared and developed for agricultural purposes because there was no control or regulation of land development and no advice was given concerning the suitability of land for agricultural use.

Changed conditions have come about. We all know that the accessibility provided by our waterways and transportation systems was a feature in the development and exploitation of some land. It is a tragedy that, because of lack of government supervision and control, much land which should have been left in forest production has been wastefully exploited. This is true of many parts of the Ottawa valley, my own area and parts of northern Manitoba and of other provinces. The government should have given leadership in this regard; and because of our failure to provide leadership in the past we perhaps deserve what has taken place. In my area it is now possible to receive provincial government assistance in putting land into production but the cost of putting such land into production is more than the land would ever be worth.

It is no solution to agricultural problems for the government to say it has a vision of trees growing throughout Canada on land not suitable for agricultural production. The results envisaged by the government will not come about overnight for the simple reason that many people who now depend on revenue from woodlots are not receiving any more income from land put to this use than they would receive if the land were devoted to any other type of agricultural production. In many cases such farmers fall into the category of the 29 per cent who receive less than $1,200, to which group the minister referred this afternoon.

The government has referred to this wonderful solution to agricultural problems but it has taken a strange position. The government has said in effect: "We have a wonderful solution but let us not do anything about it; we will let the provinces do something about it. Let them decide what they will do and we will assist them put it into effect". This government does not have half the guts, vision and authority of the former government which did not have those qualities in too large proportion either. The Liberal administration enacted the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act relating to various phases of agricultural development including community pastures. That government did not ask the farmers, municipalities or provincial governments to contribute to the program. That government gave something to agriculture from the federal purse through this program.

In the annual report of the Canadian Department of Agriculture for the year ended March 31, 1960, we read that there are now 64 operating pastures including a total of 1,814,544 acres. By agreement with Saskatchewan and Manitoba, large areas of land unsuitable for cereal crop production are leased to the federal government for the establishment of pasture facilities. Reference is made to individual pastures but little would be gained by such detailed reference here. It is indicated that the number of pasture patrons increased by 496 with 6,331 farmers and ranchers making use of the pastures in the 1959-60 season. Each patron pays a certain amount to the federal government to pasture a certain number of cattle or other animals on the community pasture. The former government inaugurated this program to assist western farmers and develop pasture.

The report also indicates that eight construction and three water development crews carried out an extensive construction and maintenance program on the pastures. In addition to 80 maintenance jobs, the water development crews erected 32 new windmills, dug 38 wells and established 21 dams, 31 dugouts and 16 springs. It is also indicated that regrassing, the construction of stock-watering facilities and irrigation development were the main types of work undertaken in the open plains pastures during 1959; 11,030 acres were regrassed, 14 dugouts and 19 dams were constructed, and further irrigation development was carried out on eight pasture irrigation projects in southwestern Saskatchewan.

The former federal government inaugurated this program and did not expect the municipalities or farmers to take the initiative. In view of the fact that the present government has not altered the program one may conclude that, on the basis of this government's philosophy, it is not opposed to programs of this nature. It is therefore difficult to understand why the government expects the municipalities, provinces and farmers to take the initiative in respect of the program dealt with in the present resolution.

Let us take an example of what the present government has done. It introduced crop insurance legislation. Under this legislation what did the federal government give to the farmer? It donated 20 per cent of the cost of the program and the balance must be provided by the provinces, municipalities and the farmers. We need badly what is envisaged in the present resolution but we should tell the farmer he is not going to get much out of this measure. He is going to have to pay for it. He is not going to get any particular assistance from Ottawa. Therefore, I suggest right now we can guarantee that the federal government will probably pay the administration costs of this program but the provinces, the municipalities and the farmers themselves will have to pay a great share of the cost. This is not what should be done. The government should not say, "We want to talk to the provinces and see what they are going to do." The federal government should go out and say, "This is what we will do, and we will do it for any province, any farmer, or any municipality that wishes to meet the terms of the program that we will present to them."

This reutilization of submarginal land through agricultural reforestation is not something that will solve the unemployment problem. If under the program farm land is purchased and the farmer is removed from the land we shall eliminate that farm land from agricultural production and put it into forest production. That will take the farmer off the land, but it will put him into the ever-growing and increasing ranks of the unemployed. It will bring about two things. It will take the farm out of agricultural production and it will take the farmer out of farming and put him into the ranks of the unemployed. From the short range point of view, this program will not do anything to solve the problem of agriculture or to help the Canadian farmers, particularly the 37 per cent whose average income is less than $1,200. This is particularly true of the next three, four or five years.

May I say I think the minister has not been completely honest in his presentation of this program. I do hasten to congratulate him on having the foresight to assist in two things. One is the setting up of the Department of Forestry. Certainly he is a very influential member of the cabinet, and I think this is going to have a great influence on agriculture. The second is the bringing forward of this particular program, even though I do not think he has shown very much courage because he has not introduced it on a national scale. Instead, he is asking the provinces and the municipalities to do all the initial implementing of the program, with government assistance. He has shown some leadership in this field.

In the winter works program the Department of Labour has asked the municipalities and the provincial governments to do the major share of the work. This is also true of the tax agreements. The federal government has been willing to assist, but it has never been willing to give the initial leadership in these things. As to what can be accomplished—and this is not new—I hold in my hand an extract from the Country Guide, which was published last month, I think. There is an article headed:

> Managed woodlots earn $15 per acre.
> New Brunswick's tree farm program has turned wood into the province's most popular farm cash crop.

The article goes on to talk about a man who has assisted in the operation in New Brunswick. As I say, this program is not new; it has been going on in the province of New Brunswick for some time. I quote from the article written by Don Baron. He is speaking about John Torunski of the University of New Brunswick forestry extension service, and he says:

> When he joined the program, he was visited by John Torunski of the University of New Brunswick forest extension service. Torunski is a young man who knows forests and trees thoroughly. He was raised in Quebec and graduated in forestry from the University of New Brunswick. He has studied woodlot management practices in Europe (where certain species of wood are worth up to $300 per cord) and in several provinces across Canada. He is a pioneer in his own way, preaching the gospel of woodlot management with all the zeal any agricultural representative ever brought to farm extension work.
> Torunski sees woodlots as an ideal farm cash crop. "Once a well managed woodlot in New Brunswick is in production, it can produce over a cord of wood per acre, worth $10 to $15 annually," he says. "One man can look after 100 acres and do the work himself."

He visited a particular farm and discussed the program with the farmer. The article goes on to say:

> On this visit, he also inquired about Dunphy's farm program, because the woodlot and the farm must complement each other if they are to be successful. He talked over long term goals with Dunphy.

The article goes on:

> "No two woodlots are the same," Torunski explains, "so no two management plans can be the same either."

I shall leave out a paragraph or so:

> Commenting on his province's tree farm program, New Brunswick's deputy minister of agriculture, Reg. Gilbert, who played a big part in its success, says that woodlots offer the best hope for many farmers to boost their income. "Woodlots are the most overlooked cash crop I know of," he says. "The average woodlot produces only one quarter of a cord of wood per year—yet it can be made to produce several times that much."

Mr. Chairman, I will not quote any further from this article. I recommend that every hon. member read it and the recommendations which are included in it. They are brief and I should like to read them:

> Recommended Woodlot Practices
> Walk through every area in the woodlot at least once every 10 years to see what is there. Harvest trees that are ready, especially overmature and dying ones.

Marginal Lands

When working through an area, cut down dead trees as well as those severely infected by disease, even if they can't be sold.

Build a good road system through the woodlot, to save time hauling out wood. Roads should be 12 or 13 feet wide to carry trucks.

Get out and find a market for your trees. Take a few days every year to find out what kind of wood is selling and who wants to buy.

Consider leaving healthy trees standing for a few years, if the market for such species is not good. Markets change quickly, and such trees could be in demand in a few years.

I believe this is the program that has been put into effect. I am sure the minister is familiar with it and has given some consideration to it.

Previous speakers have mentioned that this measure is not going to do anything for the farmers. This article indicates that for a farm to be successful it must be 500 or 600 acres in extent. This program is going to mean that farmers will have to be moved from one area to another, and this can be done successfully. The farmers who remain will be integrated into a woodlot operation and other types of agricultural production. If this program is to be successful it will have to be supplemented with other types of agricultural operations. This type of development is seasonal and a part-time operation in many instances, and it is meant to supplement other types of farm income.

The hon. member for Halton who just took his seat pointed out that this should not be done. He might be interested to know that under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, in 1959, the federal government carried out a rehabilitation program. I shall read from the annual report to the minister, which I recommend to the hon. member:

Where resettlement was necessary to rehabilitate farm families, farmers were given assistance in moving to irrigated land in Alberta. During 1959, three Saskatchewan farm families were moved to the Hays district of the Bow river project, completing the present phase of the resettlement program. There are now 162 farm families resettled on this project.

I would presume the reason they are being settled there is that the federal government purchased the land and developed it. They are now in a position to say that the land is resettled and production has begun.

This will also have to take place in Ontario, Mr. Chairman. Many of our farmers own farms of 160 acres, with 20 or 30 acres cleared, and they are trying to earn a living from the bush operations as well as from general farm production. These farmers are being penalized as a result of their inability to move from these farms and go into areas where other forms of agriculture are possible. Some incentive to move from such areas will be provided by this legislation. I would suggest that the incentive take the form of expropriation of the farm so the farmer could be paid for that land and the land could be brought under government control. At least we would then be able to plant trees and eventually bring the land into some type of production.

The situation to which I have referred does not apply to those areas in which woodlot operations are now in effect. The province of Quebec has been doing this type of work for years. The agriculture representatives in that province have gone to the farmers and advised them about these operations. However, in Ontario it will be necessary for the federal Department of Agriculture to set up experts in woodlot operations who will be able to give the farmers advice in silviculture and pest control and other forms of assistance in connection with these operations. This will have to be done on a federal basis. No longer will it be necessary to request the government of a province to undertake such a program, even with federal assistance.

There is another form of assistance that can be given, and that is in connection with the growing of Christmas trees. In 1957 Canada produced 12 million trees which were exported to the United States. These trees had a total value of $6,240,000 or an average of 52 cents per tree. Consumption in the United States had a total value of something over $45 million. It seems to me that many areas of Canada are in a good natural position to take advantage of this market for trees. However, this form of assistance will not be given by merely telling the farmers they can plant as many trees as they like because the trees will be supplied free. The December issue of the "C-I-L Oval" contains an article outlining the methods to be followed in planting these trees and in running such a plantation. The article states:

Under the plantation method, trees are planted in rows six feet apart, that is approximately 1200 trees to the acre, and they are ready for harvesting when they reach a height of six or seven feet. However, special types of trees must be chosen for growing in this manner.

The article then goes on to outline the different types of trees that should be used.

Many of the farmers in northern Ontario, Mr. Chairman, are now engaged in the business of pulpwood production. The hon. member for Halton said that we did not need government controlled marketing boards. He said we did not need government interest in this particular aspect of the problem. Let me tell him that if the government is not interested in this aspect of the matter I would strongly advise the farmer to stay out of pulpwood production because he is not getting anywhere near the value of his production. The manager of one of the larger paper companies in Canada said that it was costing his company $40 per cord for pulpwood delivered to the door of the mill from the company's limits. At the same time the farmers in the surrounding area were being paid only $12 to $18 per cord for delivering their pulpwood to the door of that same mill. It seems to me that before we ask the farmer to take part in this large reforestation program we should be able to assure the farmer that he is going to receive a fair price for his products. Perhaps the farmer should be given some type of co-operative organization through which the producers would be able to get together and assure themselves of a much better price for their products than they are receiving now.

I have always been told how backward Ontario was in the development of agriculture. Perhaps the politicians have been saying this. I was surprised, therefore, to find that, according to the figures the minister quoted a while ago, 47 per cent of the farmers in Quebec received less than $1,200 a year as compared with 29 per cent of Ontario. These figures would indicate to us that the farmers in Quebec were not getting a very fair deal either. I am told that the province of Quebec has established government boards which market the pulpwood for the farmers. As a result of this procedure the farmers have been receiving as high as $28 per cord for their pulpwood in the area of Quebec which is just across from my riding. This price should be compared with the $12 to $18 per cord received by the farmers in northern Ontario.

It is all very well, Mr. Chairman, to say that this really does not matter and that this is not a field into which the federal government should enter. This resolution, however, does something for which we have been asking for a long time. This program can be advantageous to the farmer. I feel it is the responsibility of the federal government to do something to ensure the farmer of a market which will give him a reasonable reward for his effort in producing his crops. The minister will have to give consideration, first of all, to the need for the extension of services to woodlot operators. At the moment we have no federal agricultural representatives engaged in this type of educational program. We need agriculture representatives who will go around to the farms to discuss problems that will arise in connection with these operations, much as the provincial agriculture representatives do. The provincial representatives have set an example which the federal government will have to consider.

I believe the minister will have to reorganize his department. I understand the deputy minister will be moved very shortly and there will be a shake-up in the department that will permit the reorganization of that department. This reorganization should be done bearing in mind some of the better things that have happened in the provincial departments.

In addition, I believe that we need to supplement this reforestation program with a program for agricultural production. This is not a short term program; it is not something that will solve the problems of agriculture in Canada tomorrow or even 10 years or 15 years from now. The reforestation program has to be supplementary to good farm practices in other fields of endeavour. It could be supplementary to dairy production, for instance. It can supplement all the other forms of agriculture that farmers are now depending on. This can be an additional form of cash support. If we hold out the idea to farmers that they are going to be able to combine their farms with their neighbour's farm under one woodlot and make a living next year, I think we are misleading them.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Chairman, in introducing this resolution in the house on January 26 last the Minister of Agriculture detailed three types of operations which would be the basis on which the federal government, in co-operation with provincial governments, hopes to make agricultural rehabilitation and development a reality. Briefly they are projects for the alternative uses of land which are presently classified as marginal or of low productivity; projects for the development of income and employment opportunities for rural agricultural areas; and projects for the development and conservation of the water and soil resources of Canada.

This is just another step forward in the government's agricultural program as enunciated by the Prime Minister in 1958. Personally I believe this is a very important part of that program and I believe this view is shared by most hon. members in this house, because we are beginning to realize that rural development and conservation is one phase of our national life that we Canadians have been prone to disregard, even though it involves our most important national resources of soil and water.

Though we consider ourselves as a highly developed nation, with the knowledge and the techniques available to a modern society we continue to neglect to a great extent the lessons learned from past civilizations which refused to recognize the impact that neglect and exploitation of these two resources had on their survival. There was some excuse, perhaps, in the early settlement of the nation for cutting down some of our magnificent forests in order to populate our vast country, or for putting to the plow thousands of acres of natural pastureland in the scramble to settle our western plains. There is no excuse for continuing this practice in this enlightened age, or for neglecting any opportunity to restore nature's cover to our natural forest and grass areas. The incidence of flooding has been rising notably in the past decade, and many of our fertile valleys, and even some of our industrial areas, are subject to recurrent floods because the natural cover, which in the past had slowed up the melting of the snow in the spring break-ups, has over the years been destroyed.

As important as the soil is to our society, water is probably the most abundant and and widely distributed natural resource throughout the world. Used intelligently, these two great resources complement one another to the greatest benefit of mankind. But in spite of the great abundance of water and our absolute dependence on it for survival, it is today our most wasted, most polluted, and most generally abused natural resource. Fortunately it cannot be destroyed. We cannot destroy it, but that does not mean that we do not have the responsibility to protect, control and conserve it.

One of our western farm papers, the Manitoba Co-operator, described the need for conservation in a recent editorial entitled "Conservation Need Grows". This article reads in part as follows:

> The need for soil, water and forest conservation is becoming more and more apparent each year, and is one of the major responsibilities facing the people today. A very impressive amount of work on conservation projects has been done and is being done, but far too many do not realize the ever growing importance of such undertakings. The work is not only for the practical and technical men who are engaged in the various conservation projects, but must receive wholehearted support from people in all walks of life. All must fully grasp the importance of such undertakings to arrest deterioration of soil, water and forest resources. They must realize a nation lives off the land, and play their part by helping to publicize and urge greater efforts in conservation work.

The article continues briefly as follows:

> History has long revealed that the wealth of any nation deteriorates with its soil. Once fertile lands along the Mediterranean coast of northern Africa are now desert wastes. Lebanon's cedars went with the soil. Eroding soil is reducing productive areas in many sections of Africa. Australia's black blizzards in the war years were comparable with those that swept out the dust bowls of the south west United States and western Canada in the drought years of the disastrous 30's. It is difficult for people in Canada, particularly those who did not experience the 30's, to visualize such scenes in this country for future generations, as those that existed in once productive areas now laid waste in other parts of the world. It cannot be too strongly emphasized that soil deterioration in particular in many parts of Canada, is now occurring at a rapid pace. The area of productivity can diminish speedily.

Hon. members will know, of course, that with the exception of our navigable streams, water is a provincial resource, the prime responsibility of the provinces. But, if we are to meet this problem of conservation of our land and water resources as it applies to rural development and diversification of industry, it must be a co-ordinated effort of all levels of government, municipal, provincial and federal and with the federal government, with agencies set up under this act, and perhaps in the western provinces through prairie farm rehabilitation, supplying advice, technical and financial assistance to provincial and local administrations.

In the province of Manitoba, though we have abundant supplies of water, the larger portion of it is in the northern half of the province, remote from the major concentration of our population. Even in the case of the relatively smaller bodies of water in the southern more populous areas, we quite often find the most likely source of water many miles from the desired point of use. Owing to our geographical location and climatic cycles, we have been accustomed to receiving our natural water in varying rates and volumes, both annually and over cycles of years. As an example, the Assiniboine river, one of our major but typical southern streams, can have as much as 35 per cent to 40 per cent of the total annual flow pass a given point on the river in a single month in the break-up period. It also has had as little as 1 per cent pass the same point in the single month of February. Also during the five-year period 1952 to 1957 over seven times the volume of water flowed through this river as flowed in the same length of time between 1936 and 1941. The same situation can be said to prevail on the Souris, the Pembina and other lesser streams. Thus under natural conditions we have floods in the spring and low water, or perhaps no flow of water, during the fall and winter.

As our population increases it is becoming increasingly more difficult, under those conditions, to provide modern sewerage facilities in our rural towns even though recent developments in disposal systems such as lagoons have made it financially possible to dispose of our sewage and industrial wastes without polluting our natural streams. This situation also makes it difficult, or almost impossible, for our rural communities to take advantage of any industrial development, in spite of the fact that there is no lack of other facilities such as power, roads, transportation, communications, excellent schools and hospitals, and a potential labour force. With only one sixth of our urban population enjoying proper sewerage facilities, a long step forward in correcting this situation was made in the recent budget when funds were made available toward helping finance sewerage installations and proper disposal systems.

I submit that it is of equal or even greater importance that the federal government, in co-operation with our provincial and municipal governments, impound our flood waters, control our streams and provide reservoirs for sewage, industrial development and recreation. Owing to Manitoba's topography in relation to other parts of the continent, water flows into that province from Ontario on the east; from Montana, South Dakota, North Dakota and Minnesota on the south; and from Saskatchewan and Alberta on the west. All this water is on its way to Hudson's bay and the Atlantic ocean.

Since almost all Manitoba's flood control and water conservation projects involve either interprovincial or international waters, participation in these projects involves all levels of government. The federal government has participated with the provinces in a hydrometric service measuring and recording stream flows and lake levels. This is done in order accurately to determine actual water resources and so that watershed development programs and works can be properly planned and designed.

The federal government has also assisted rural development and rehabilitation through the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, in constructing small agricultural dams and dugouts and in the development of community pastures. I would hope that under this new rural development scheme this phase of development will be continued and expanded to include dams for industrial and recreational purposes for our smaller rural centres.

The rural areas are now requiring water in increasing volume for town supply, for diversification and production through irrigation of crops that would decrease the acreage sown to cereal grains, for food processing, industrial plants and many other purposes. Without it, diversification of industry will remain only a dream to be realized some day in the distant future. Without adequate water supplies and proper control of this important resource, rural development and conservation will be a slow process indeed.

A recent economic analysis made for the Manitoba government, covering south central Manitoba, sets out in detail the agricultural and industrial potential of that region, as well as recommendations for its development. The 104 page report is entitled "Economic Survey, South Central Manitoba" and is, I believe the first comprehensive survey of its kind made in Canada.

Since it is relevant to the subject under discussion, I should like to quote briefly from the document as it relates to the industrial development, agricultural potential and water conservation for the area. The report states:

> Analysis of the productive capacity of south central Manitoba indicates considerable increase in industrial development is possible. Compiled data indicates that the products of increased economic activity are marketable. There is every indication that the people of the region desire such development. It is therefore recommended that the several communities within the region, working individually and in co-operation with one another and with the provincial and federal governments, embark upon a co-ordinated development program.
> Such a program will have as its goals the increase of primary agricultural production, the increase of manufacturing and processing, and the orderly economic and physical assimilation of increased population and physical facilities. This, in turn, will require improved patterns of land use, improved and developed conservation and use of the water resources of the area, improved social and administrative organization, and improved urban land use planning.

Feasibility studies of irrigation in Manitoba are now under way. In some areas, especially along the banks of the Red and Assiniboine rivers, some irrigation has been practised successfully. Experiments at the Morden experimental farm have similarly demonstrated satisfactory results from irrigation. Producers of canning crops in the south central region have suffered some drought losses and canners have been somewhat disturbed by quality fluctuations caused by temporary rainfall shortages. As a result considerable interest has been stimulated in the possibility of supplemental irrigation for certain areas of Manitoba, most of which lie within the south central region.

The Pembina triangle-Red river district presently suffers from a shortage of water for domestic, municipal, industrial and agricultural use. Even as late as last week a disastrous fire in the town of Winkler, one of the growing industrial towns of the area, swept through a good part of the main business section. Though three or four fire engines from neighbouring areas came to help the Winkler fire service, they ran out of water—they were pumping from the artesian wells—and the result was that instead of the fire being confined to one or two buildings the whole of one side of Main street was practically burned down.

Marginal Lands

The report to which I have referred goes on to state:

> It is anticipated that between 6,000 and 10,000 acre feet per year of water in excess of present use will be required by 1981 for domestic, municipal and industrial water supplies. During the same period, a demand for water for irrigation may be created. The engineering feasibility of conservation of the waters of the Pembina river has been established, and water from this source would be adequate to meet the anticipated demands. If these demands are not met, the economic development of the Pembina triangle area will be impeded. Control and conservation of the waters of the Boyne river are essential to the development of the town of Carman in the surrounding community.

Should large demands develop at Carman for water to be used either for industrial or agricultural purposes, a proposal has been made to divert water from the Assiniboine river into the headwaters of the Boyne. Further on, the survey states:

> The possibility exists of the development of a major tourist resort in the Sprucewoods forest area north of Holland, Manitoba, if the proposed dam on the Assiniboine river is constructed.

In summary, the survey indicates that if the proposed development of water resources is carried out the area can expect a population increase of 50 per cent in 20 years and the establishment of at least 40 new industries.

I would respectfully submit to the minister and the government that the P.F.R.A. administration or an agency established under the present measure be given an active role in assisting provincial and local governments in making available to our rural areas adequate supplies of water together with a proper system of flood control. Many of these projects would be financially self-liquidating and though beyond the immediate resources of the communities directly concerned would become a tangible national asset. The intangibles would be in human betterment.

The success of any rural development program depends more than anything else on what we do with our two greatest resources, soil and water. Our hopes for the success of such a program is the recognition by the leaders in our rural areas of its importance. They are looking to all levels of government for co-operation, assistance and guidance in its fullest development. This measure recognizes the importance of conservation to our national well-being and gives us an opportunity to face up to the very urgent problem of rural rehabilitation. It should provide us with the incentive to nurture our natural resources not only for our own advantage but for the benefit of future generations.

In the interests of our national well-being, I hope that with the passage of the bill based on this resolution these objectives can be realized.

[Mr. Muir (Lisgar).]

Mr. Argue: We listened to the minister when the resolution was first debated on January 25. We listened to him today, and as far as I can tell he has yet to divulge the main features of the bill which will follow the passage of this resolution.

There is a need—and no one has disputed it—for a redevelopment program for agriculture in Canada. The minister has emphasized—correctly, I think—that there are large parts of the agriculture industry which live at a subsistence level. I submit that this particular legislation will do very little as far as they are concerned. It is a long term measure. It may result in the long run in an improvement of the incomes of people in the lower brackets but I suggest the main reason why this may be accomplished is that the government will succeed in what is the unstated purpose of this resolution, namely moving a large proportion of these people off the farms. They are being squeezed off in the ordinary course of events. Probably this measure will accelerate the movement of farmers from the farms because it is designed to bring about more economic units and that in turn will mean a smaller farm population.

Before the resolution passes I should like to ask the minister whether he will give us some idea as to what proportion of the moneys involved will be paid by the federal government. I think that is a fair question. I think it should be answered. I think the committee has a right to know before this motion passes at least the general range of contributions which the federal government is prepared to make.

Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which was passed some 25 years ago for precisely this purpose, as far as the tremendous development of community pastures is concerned, almost the total cost has been paid by the federal government. We wonder whether the present measure will mean the removal by the government of this kind of proportionate payment. I express the hope and I make the request that the government will do much better under this scheme than it did under crop insurance, because unless the federal government is prepared to pay more than 20 per cent this will be in a large degree a window-dressing measure designed from the beginning to have very rough going. I hope this is not another instance of the federal government trying to slough off a substantial part of its responsibility on to the provincial and municipal governments.

I think it is an affront to parliament for the minister not to give us this kind of information. He wants us to pass this motion, so he tells us, and then he wants to go carpet-bagging across the country talking to the ministers of agriculture and working out some kind of formula or scheme. Then, presumably, he is going to put this into a bill and ask parliament to approve it. I think the minister owes it to the committee to tell us at least in general terms what he hopes to put before the provincial governments.

I think this matter has not been handled in the best possible way. I think the government's method of handling the crop insurance scheme was the worst possible way, because, before they had discussed it with the provinces at all, they brought in a measure and said to the provinces, "If you want to cooperate you can do so". It is not a measure which has done very much to aid in the field of general crop failure protection. The fact of the matter is that a very small proportion of farmers qualify to come under that scheme. One of the main reasons for that is that the federal government is bearing such a tiny proportion of the cost of the scheme, namely 50 per cent of the administrative cost and 20 per cent of the premium, but not even 20 per cent of the losses or 20 per cent of the liabilities. So I ask the minister if he will tell us whether the government is going to do better under this program than they have done in connection with crop insurance.

Another thing I should like to hear from the minister is this, and I am sure he will be able to answer this question. I want to know whether this measure will in any way supplant the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I wish to know whether the community pastures will be maintained in future as they are now. I also wish to know whether the stock watering schemes and the building of dugouts and stock watering dams will be continued under that act. I ask those questions for what I think is a good reason. Under the legislation to which I have referred the federal government has assumed the major responsibility. The provincial governments initially provided the land by one means or another. In some cases the municipalities provided the land or the farmers provided it by exchanging land for certain other land.

The federal government set up the pasture scheme, put in the fences and seeded some of the land to grass. The whole scheme is now operating under the federal government. It is operated very much like a crown corporation. The scheme may not be entirely self-liquidating and may not recover all its costs but certainly the major part of the expenses are covered by revenue.

I have in my hand the report of the prairie farm rehabilitation branch of the Department of Agriculture for 1958-59. On page 80 it sets out that in 1958-59 there was an area of 1.8 million acres in pasture. The total construction cost had been $5.5 million. There were carried some 117,332 units of livestock. One unit of livestock is defined as one head of cattle, one horse or five sheep. It is stated that the average charge to farmers per unit of livestock was $4.64. This is a good scheme and the farmers have supported it. I hope it will be maintained intact and will not be interfered with by the program under discussion.

I do not wish to be unfair but we must keep in mind that the government has attacked some other crown operations. The Canadian wheat board has been attacked by the feed mill policy of the government. Trans-Canada Air Lines has been attacked by the government allowing Canadian Pacific Air Lines to move in on some of their flights. There is a report that the government is considering ways and means of making it more difficult for Eldorado to operate. Rumours persist—and they are not denied in this chamber—that the government has not yet defined its policy so far as the successful operation of Polymer Corporation is concerned.

I am expressing the hope that nothing will be done by the minister to interfere with the good work of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I ask him again to give the committee some information on the points I have raised.

I also wish to have the following information before the resolution is passed. I want to know the minister's estimate of the cost of this measure within the coming fiscal year and I should like him to give a forecast of the cost for the years ahead if he can make that projection.

It has been reported in the press and elsewhere that the minister is much disappointed about the amount of money he expects to get for this measure, that he is not going to get large sums of money, that not much money will be put into the scheme. The minister at this time should be able to give us some idea of the amount of money that will be forthcoming by projection in the next year or so under this measure.

When we pass a resolution preceding a money bill we do so under a practice that has grown up because it has been felt necessary for the government, before asking for such a vote, to give the committee some indication of the amount of money involved. This is a money resolution. The minister has said little or nothing about the question of cost. Before the resolution is carried I hope he will give the committee some information on the points I have raised.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, as a quick answer to the points raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia let me say this. In answer to the first question about the amount of money that will be put into these proposals by the federal government, let me first point out that there is a great variety of agreements envisaged between the federal government and each of the provincial governments.

As I have made clear in the past, both governments I know will be happy under some of these agreements to co-operate in putting into effect many of these schemes which are entirely self-liquidating. An example of that would be community pastures where the operating expenses are met by the farmers themselves. The farmers like to carry their own load if they are able to do so.

Under another type of scheme for rural development we can refer to the experience in the United States. Neither level of government put in any money or made any contribution beyond that of professional advice and research efforts that went into helping a local development group implement ideas for their self-help programs.

With respect to the alternative land use part of the program where heavy costs are envisaged, this will depend almost entirely on the rapidity with which the provinces wish to push this program. Other factors to be considered are the necessary research that will have to be undertaken and the question of assessing the market possibilities for various alternative uses for the land. All these questions will decide the cost-sharing arrangement between the two governments.

As for the physical projects referred to in the third part of the resolution, I think the usual expectation here is that it will be on a 50-50 basis. Let me read to the committee the recommendation of the minister of agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan, Hon. I. C. Nollet, who gave evidence before the special committee of the Senate on land use in Canada on May 6 and 7, 1959. This may be found at page 218 of the report of that committee. In giving evidence, Mr. Nollet said:

> It is suggested that as a basic principle of soil and water conservation programs, the general approach should be on a shared cost or earned assistance basis for the whole cost of a completed project including maintenance in succeeding years.
> In our opinion, the federal-provincial agreements now in effect for the construction of the trans-Canada highway provide a form of inter-governmental agreement which could be the general basis for agreements contemplated under the legislation and policy we recommend.
> It is also respectfully suggested that a proper role for the senior government would involve mainly:
> 1. Provision of financial assistance in connection with agreed upon projects, on an approved basis.
> 2. Making top level technical and professional advisors and consultants available, as requested by the province.

This, in essence, is the type of financial agreement I think we may expect, as put forward by the minister of agriculture of the province of Saskatchewan.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

The second point raised concerned community pastures, dugouts, et cetera. I do not think there is any question about this. In the alternative land use portion, this program has as its purpose not only the carrying out of the present program under P.F.R.A. but also the carrying out of a program which will accomplish as much in the next two or three years as was accomplished in the last 25 years under P.F.R.A.

In other words, in the last 25 years, under P.F.R.A. 1.8 million acres have been put to community pasture in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. We are thinking of proposing to the western provinces at least an additional 1 million acres in the next two or three years. If we can get more and there is use for it I would certainly go after it because, as the hon. member for Assiniboia and other hon. members know, there is tremendous overcrowding on the pastures that now exist.

The farmers want this type of diversified use of their land. It enables them to diversify their wheat economy, by being enabled to pasture their cattle on community pastures. As the hon. member said, the cost to the two governments is divided in this way. The provincial government buys the land. We pay the capital cost of preparing it for pastures, providing the bulls and so on. The costs of the operations of the pastures are borne by the farmers. The farmers find this a very acceptable arrangement. They hope that it will not only be continued but will be tremendously stepped up in pace.

I might point out that so far as dugouts are concerned, last year some 4,000 dugouts were built. This year we expect the construction will be about the same, probably 4,000. This is a tremendous program.

The final question was, what was the projected cost of the whole program? I do not think a living person, either in Ottawa or in any other place in Canada, can give an accurate estimate. I have used figures of $300 million to $600 million for the next 10 years to 20 years. I have no way of knowing whether these figures are accurate because I have no way of knowing on the physical side, and on the alternative land use side, the number of projects that will be brought under this plan.

This brings me to the final statement, and this has to do with philosophy. It was suggested by the hon. member for Timiskaming that we should just go ahead as a government and ram these things down the throats of the various provinces and municipalities as we were supposed to have done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. This goes against the grain entirely of myself personally and I think of most people in Canada. The idea here is that property and civil rights belong to the provinces. The provinces have the responsibility for their farmers in those areas. All we are doing is going to the provinces and suggesting that we enter into a co-operative program. They know the needs of their people as well as anyone. If we can share this program in any form and work out an arrangement that will be satisfactory to both of us, we will do it. I think the idea that is spreading across Canada of a centralized force under the Minister of Agriculture to impose things on people that are good for them, whether they want them or not is a philosophy that is foreign to myself and to most people in Canada.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the last statement of the minister I would suggest that what I said was not to ram these things down the throats of the people. Now may be the time to talk about what happens to agriculture in Ontario, for instance. The farmers in Ontario have needs similar to those of the prairie farmers in so far as community pastures are concerned. We get no benefit whatsoever from that type of legislation. Frankly, we would not suggest that this type of thing be curtailed in the west, but that it be extended into Ontario.

What I contemplated, Mr. Chairman, and what I would ask the minister to consider, is the government buying up certain lands in Ontario which are now very cheap. There are farms in my part of the country consisting of 10,000 acres which could be bought in a block. The cost of that land would be probably less than one tenth of the initial cost of clearing it. The government would own the land and have control of it and would supervise the putting of it back into production for the benefit not only of itself but of the country in general.

Community pastures made up of this type of land seem to have worked very well; they worked so well that the minister now indicates that he is willing to double them. What I am suggesting is that this land was put into community pasture because it was of no value to anybody else and nobody was able to make a living on it. There is a great deal of land in Ontario at the present time that is not being lived on; no one wishes to do anything with it. Crops have not been grown on it. Even those areas that have not been deserted very long are in this position. Even the hay is not being cut and no pasturing is being done on it. This is the type of program that the federal government could go into.

If we are going to ask the farmers of Canada in general to support something that the minister as a federal member will recommend but will depend on the provincial governments to decide whether it is going to be put into effect or not, it may well be that the government of Ontario would not be interested in the scheme. It may well be that the province of New Brunswick, which already has this type of development, would be willing to put a concrete area under control and into this type of agricultural reforestation and that the people of New Brunswick may get a very large benefit from it, and yet the people of Ontario, who would like to see something done about the reclamation of land which is not being used for agricultural purposes, would get no benefit at all simply because the provincial government will not go ahead with it.

Certainly we want to protect the property rights of the people. I am not sugesting that the land be expropriated. The land of which I am speaking has a very low sale value at the present time and expropriation, as conducted by the government now, would take this fact into consideration. Large tracts of land could be bought up for national utilization, and this would entail no hardship to anybody. This land would be put into production on a national basis, and full consideration would be given to all provinces. Other provinces would get benefits that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act gives to the western farmers. Those benefits would be much more evenly distributed if the federal government were willing to participate in the scheme.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the minister for the information he gave the committee just before six o'clock. While it was not particularly specific, he did give us some idea of his own thinking. We learned from him that it is his intention—at least, I took this from his statement—that the cost of alternative land use will be divided between the federal and provincial governments on roughly the same basis as the cost of the trans-Canada highway. This would mean, I take it, that it would be on a roughly 50-50 basis.

I am not completely clear as to what is going to happen to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the organization under that act and the work that has been carried on under that act. The minister seemed to infer, at least in one place in his statement, that this new legislation would supersede the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and that future projects which would have come under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act would come under this new legislation. I feel the committee would like some clarification of this point.

The minister also said—I took down his words and I may not be completely accurate, but he will correct me if I am wrong—that the provincial and federal governments would be happy to put up the money for such self-liquidating projects as community pastures. I wonder whether the minister would be more specific. My understanding of the way in which community pastures were operated under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was that the provincial governments put up the land rather than money. I do not know whether or not the minister's words mean that there will be some alteration in his approach to community pastures. I would hope that they do not. I should like to make a plea that the work carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act be maintained on the same basis as that on which it has been in the past. I do not believe this government need "junk" the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; I do not think they need to terminate the act.

The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was a good one. We have suggested improvements. We have suggested that the coverage of the act be extended to all parts of Canada but it was, nonetheless, a good act. The attitude of this government seems to be this. If the former administration had a good act, this government comes along with another act that supersedes the old one and the government representatives go across the country saying that this is a brand new act and a brand new policy. This government then does not have to give any credit to the former administration. This is what happened in so far as the agricultural prices stabilization act was concerned. In that case the producers got a pig in a poke. The act was represented as meaning a great deal to agriculture producers, but in my judgment the way it has worked out has been to give the producers lower support prices than they had under the former act. However, Mr. Chairman, we will not get into that argument.

Many people believe the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act should be maintained. If it is going to be amalgamated with this new legislation—and I protest that being done—I suggest that the government should maintain all of the beneficial provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and should not use the new, broader act as a means of taking away some of the advantages the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act contained. I think the minister owes it to the committee to clarify, if he will, the position of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act after the legislation forecast by this resolution becomes operative.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to answer these questions right away. First of all, in connection with the finances I may say that the recommendations I read from Mr. Nollet's testimony dealt with the conservation aspects and not the alternative land use aspect. Financial arrangements will have to be worked out with the provinces in connection with the alternative land use. I have no idea what the percentage will be because I suspect a tremendous variety of proposals will be considered.

In so far as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is concerned, the intention is to keep the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in force for use in the western provinces but to extend the operational borders of that act to include all agriculture land in the west and the Peace river area. The idea behind keeping the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is, first of all, that the machinery is there and it is working. In the meantime, as the other provinces come in with various agreements that deal with the physical part of the program, machinery will be created in those provinces that will correspond, in essence, to the P.F.R.A. machinery. When this machinery is set up in all the provinces, I hope then to meld it with the P.F.R.A. machinery. In the interregnum, before all this machinery is set up, the P.F.R.A. will continue to operate in the western provinces.

In so far as the suggestion that this government does not think well of the P.F.R.A. is concerned, I would say that we do think well of it because we brought that act into force.

The last question concerned community pastures.

Mr. Argue: How long did you operate that act?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): We started in 1934, and it was operational in 1935.

Mr. Argue: But the government ceased to be operational.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Unfortunately that was the case and for 22 years this country suffered without us.

The third point concerned community pastures. There will be no change in that respect except for an increase in the pace of our activities. The provincial ministers indicate they are quite willing to go along with a rapid extension of community pastures.

Mr. Argue: I have just one question in connection with the extension of community pastures. Will the extension of community pastures on the prairies be undertaken in the immediate future under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act or under this legislation? Again, I thank the minister for having made the intention of the government clearer than it has been at any time since this discussion commenced.

Before we conclude the discussion on the resolution I want to warn the minister and the government against taking away any of the benefits that now exist under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, we listened very closely to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) this afternoon. In reply to a question of mine, he said he hoped the bill ensuing from this resolution would be brought before the house around May 1, if there was no filibuster on the part of the opposition. He actually used the term "filibuster".

This afternoon, we, members of the opposition, refrained from speaking because we endorse the object of the resolution under discussion. However, I cannot say so much for government members and I must point out particularly that the delay in passing this resolution is entirely due to the government members themselves.

As I was saying, we endorse the object of this resolution which deals, for instance, with the alternative uses of lands of low productivity. Among other aims mentioned are the development of income and employment opportunities in rural agricultural areas and the development and conservation of the soil and water resources in Canada.

I was particularly interested in hearing the minister state this afternoon that in my own province, 47 per cent of the farms will be able to take advantage of this legislation.

We have been hearing about this legislation before, and if we refer, for instance, to page 3869 of Hansard for May 13, 1960, we note that the predecessor of the present Minister of Agriculture said this:

(Text):

> I do not think we can over-emphasize the importance of the introduction of a rural redevelopment scheme in Canada. We have been working on this now for the last year and a half to two years and we hope to be in a position some time before the end of this year to be able to make some definite proposals as far as instituting a rural development scheme in Canada which would be adapted to Canadian conditions.

(Translation):

Those words were spoken by the predecessor of the Minister of Agriculture on May 13, 1960.

I should not want to blame the minister too much for having delayed the introduction of his resolution until today. He told us himself this afternoon that he had hoped to introduce the resolution before the Christmas recess.

I assume that unforeseen circumstances forced him to delay the introduction of the measure. Nevertheless, I think we cannot help but be somewhat surprised, especially when we read the editorials in some newspapers. And here I am going to imitate him, for he read editorials this afternoon to back up his resolution. Being the second member from Quebec to speak on this resolution—it will be remembered that the publication Terre de Chez Nous blamed Quebec members because too few had taken part in this discussion—I will read to the Minister of Agriculture some of the points raised in an article published in Terre de Chez Nous on March 8, 1961. The article is entitled:

> The new rural rehabilitation policy.

And the headlines read:

> To be enacted during this session or just before the election?

And there was a question mark. There are more question marks right through the article.

Well, Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the house had the same reaction this afternoon when several government members noticing our co-operation began to filibuster, to use the very word of the minister.

But I am not going to follow the example set by the minister. I will only quote a few excerpts of this article which says among other things:

> Since he became federal Minister of Agriculture a few months ago, the Hon. Alvin Hamilton has taken every opportunity to set out the new policy on the utilization of renewable resources and improvement of the rural areas, which is intended to be the main undertaking of his department and even of the government of which he is a member. Everybody welcomed that stand.

And, incidentally, so do we—

> And the legislation that was to materialize this was eagerly awaited.

And further on, I find this:

> We realize that it takes time to get such a far-reaching program going, but since the situation calls for emergency measures, we had anticipated some initial move in the very near future.

We appreciated the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture. While we congratulate him for wanting to consult provincial authorities and the different agricultural organizations, we regret however, like the minister himself, that this legislation was not introduced before the Christmas recess.

And again following the example set by the minister, I will quote another part of the same article:

> It is in fact our impression that the introduction and the passing of this legislation enacting Mr. Hamilton's good intentions will be postponed until the next session.

The minister told us that he intends to introduce the bill based on this resolution about May 1. But we doubt—and I am convinced that we are right—that, in spite of his goodwill and his known co-operation, he will be able to introduce this bill by May 1. Therefore it is most unlikely that the farmers will be able to take advantage of this bill in 1961.

The article goes on:

> Otherwise, the bill will be introduced only on the eve of an election . . . and that may dangerously delay the beginning of application.

I do not know who wrote that article, but apparently the results of that legislation would be forthcoming only on the eve of an election. Since I am not the Prime Minister's spokesman, it is rather difficult for me to foresee when this legislation will be of any help to the farmers, as I do not know when a general election may be called. And let me add this statement also found in the article in question:

> It must be noted however that only one representative from the province of Quebec has taken part in the discussion so far, and he was a member of the opposition.

Mr. Chairman, at this stage I should like to congratulate my colleague the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) who has displayed remarkable intelligence in this debate. If he ever needs a salesman, I suggest that he hire the Minister of Agriculture who, when the occasion arises, proves to be the best salesman of government policies.

I now wish to quote the last part of the article:

> Why are some of our representatives in Ottawa, who are so anxious to run down their compatriots and to scorn them as intellectuals, or to attack those of our people who work for agencies such as the C.B.C., so remiss when the future of tens of thousands of our farmers and their families is concerned?

Mr. Chairman, it seems that this debate will be on for some time yet, because, as I understand, members of the government want it that way. I hope several members from Quebec will contribute and lend a helping hand to a just cause, that is, the cause of farmers. As far as I am concerned, I hope that the discussion will be concluded as soon as possible, in order that the minister may, as he suggested, meet with provincial authorities and farmers' organizations. I wish to say to the credit of the Minister of Agriculture, that this time he has introduced a resolution that will be welcomed by a great many farmers, even though it is a long-term measure. It is not a matter of criticizing the length of the term, but to see whether the legislation will bring the results expected by the farmers.

Mr. Jorgenson: The hon. member read quite extensively from an article. I wonder whether he would give us the name of it.

Mr. Racine: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I was referring to Terre de Chez Nous, of March 8, 1961.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine) permit a question? When reading the newspaper report, the hon. member mentioned that hon. members did not take an active enough part in the discussion, and he also asked that the resolution be passed as soon as possible. Would he not think that his remarks have delayed the passing of the resolution?

Mr. Racine: The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) has, to my mind, a quality which I shall recognize, that of opening doors.

I do not believe that by speaking five minutes this evening, I have in any way delayed the resolution. However, having been in the house all afternoon, I realize that the official opposition was ready to pass the resolution, whereas I noticed, as did several of my colleagues, that hon. members on the government benches were drifting away from the matter at hand, and I think I was right in taking five minutes this evening to put things in their proper perspective.

Mr. Ricard: It should be kept in mind that we have four times as many members as you have.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: A great deal has been said about the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and its relationship to the present resolution. I am pleased to note from the remarks of the minister that there is to be a continuation of prairie farm rehabilitation, and also that there is a similarity and even the idea of assimilating the two measures to keep them in relationship one with the other.

I am pleased to hear that. It will mean that this assistance which has been given to western farmers in relationship to community pastures will, with the joining of the two programs, be given to farmers in northern Ontario and they will receive some advantage from this legislation.

I should like to ask the minister what is his hope in relationship to the program as it affects the provinces? What is the contemplated contract or agreement with the provinces? Who is going to own the land that is put into reforestation? Is it going to be owned by the municipalities or the provincial governments, as it is owned under the community pasture scheme? Is it going to be leased to the federal government under a similar program?

Is the farmer going to have his own wood lot on the basis of this land being added to his present farm in the form of additional acreage? The minister has said outside the house that it is quite possible there will be an assembly scheme. This was my understanding prior to today. I understood there would be an assembly scheme under which the federal government would assemble a large block of non-productive, agricultural land. This land would be put in charge of the farmer either as an employee of the government or as a person hired for the purpose.

I understood this land would be operated as a unit, the farmer receiving wages or some other compensation until the time the wood lot was self-sustaining. Is that the intention of the minister, or is it the intention to work toward negotiating agreements with the provinces which will mean giving the provinces a sum of money, as has been done in connection with other forms of assistance to the provinces such as the winter works program?

I point out to the minister that I do not think this procedure will be at all satisfactory. Under the winter works program we have asked for winter works to be developed to the amount of $197 million up to December 20. At the same time the contribution by the federal government will amount to only $24 million. I should like to know what the minister contemplates in this regard, because I am not at all in agreement with the idea that the federal government should go to the provinces and ask them what they want to do about it.

I am of the opinion that the federal government should take something upon themselves, under their own initiative, and should make recommendations regarding what they want done. I think the federal government should act as they did in the case of hospital insurance. In that case the government told the provinces they were willing to go so far if the provinces were willing to meet certain conditions.

I would be very reluctant to accept the type of plan which would allow only those provinces which took the initiative to benefit from this rehabilitation of agricultural land and undertook to do it themselves with federal money and federal support. I am quite sure that provinces such as Ontario, which have been very reluctant to enlarge their conservation programs in other respects, would look at the large timber limits they have already allotted to pulp and paper companies, and at the large timber limits which some of the other companies hold, and would come to the conclusion that if this plan is to be used as a supplement to the forestry industry itself it is not needed in that province. This would defeat the purpose which I think we are trying to accomplish.

It is my opinion that this purpose has been partially accomplished by measures such as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I am sure that if the eastern farm representatives talked about the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act there would be a hue and cry from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, to say nothing of the maritimes, for a similar type of legislation. If we develop this measure in this manner it may produce a favourable result in the prairies, where the provincial governments are used to co-operating in this type of scheme. However, we have not that history in Ontario and I am afraid that unless the minister outlines exactly what he hopes to accomplish by this measure and gives some information of the stereotype agreement the government is willing to negotiate, this will leave it pretty well to the provinces to decide. In my opinion this would be shirking the duty of the federal government, and I think that more leadership and direction must be given.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer the hon. member briefly. I think some of the hon. member's questions would more properly be asked in committee.

The hon. member asked who is going to own this land. This is one thing you cannot tell until the final agreement is reached. I think there will be four or five different types of ownership. In some cases they will want to revert some of these lands back to crown lands; that is provincial ownership. In other cases there will be county ownership. My own philosophy in this matter is that there should be the maximum private ownership by the individual farmer to increase his income opportunities, rather than ownership by the county or province.

Mr. Peters: Am I not correct in presuming that the previous intention of the minister was, to some extent, that certain areas would be assembled? If I remember correctly, on one occasion the minister referred to farms in the Ottawa valley which are not too far from Ottawa and which are not producing anything at all at the moment, where 500 acres, 600 acres or 1,000 acres could be assembled into one unit and a government supervisor could probably operate the land on a salary basis. The federal government would have some control over this area, in somewhat the same respect as the experimental farm itself.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Chairman; on that example of the Ottawa valley, or I should say the whole ten eastern counties where there are these vacant farms and there are privately owned units of 200 acres, 400 acres, 600 acres or 1,000 acres, my hope is that as far as possible these will be given to a farmer who needs an income opportunity. He will be able to augment his income by looking after these forest areas.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-77, to provide for the rehabilitation of agricultural lands and the development of rural areas in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration branch—

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $911,098.

(Translation):

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, I represent a substantially rural constituency, and agricultural production makes up a large portion of our economy. I therefore wish to take the opportunity provided by consideration of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture to comment briefly on the problems facing the farmers in the constituency of Labelle, and in view of the fact that agricultural production is quite diversified in my area, I would say that the same problems exist throughout the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I find the following statement in the 1959-1960 report of the "Union catholique des cultivateurs du Québec":

The 1960 crop year will be remembered rather bitterly by many farmers. The downward trend of agricultural prices took a turn for the worse. Developments in the support price policies with regard to pork and eggs discouraged many producers. The prices of milk products also showed a decline over last year's figure. The constant rise in costs, coupled with a gradual decline in sales prices put the squeeze on the average farmer, through a constant reduction in his net profits per product unit and in his hourly income.

Mr. Chairman, in view of this, I am surprised at the government's lack of concern for agricultural problems. In that connection, I should like to quote the only part of the speech from the throne where reference is made to this serious and important problem.

As an additional step in the national agricultural program, you will also be asked to approve enabling legislation to authorize the federal government to join with provincial authorities and local groups throughout Canada in comprehensive programs of rural rehabilitation and development. My ministers believe that as farming is a basic Canadian industry it must be made more stable and remunerative. Widening the uses of Canada's farm lands and water resources will be necessary for this purpose.

May I now quote from a speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) at Massey hall, Toronto, on April 27, 1957:

We shall see that the farmer gets a fair share of the national income by maintaining a flexible program—

And I stress the word "flexible".

—of price supports, in order to provide him with adequate parity of agricultural prices, based on a fair ratio as between sales prices and costs.

I should now like to quote the preamble of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, passed by parliament in January 1958:

Whereas it is expedient to enact a measure for the purpose of stabilizing the prices of agricultural commodities in order to assist the industry of agriculture to realize fair returns for its labour and investment, and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and the costs of the goods and services that they buy, thus to provide farmers with a fair share of the national income.

There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the farmers have not forgotten the words of the Prime Minister or the preamble of the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

However, referring to the latest figures published recently by the dominion bureau of statistics and particularly to the table entitled "Net farmer income from farming operations for each province", I find that in 1960, the net cash income of Canadian farmers was $2,783,753,000 as compared to $2,789,348,000 in 1959. In 1958, the figure was $2,794,615,000. Operating and depreciation costs in 1960 showed an increase of $13 million over 1959. Those costs showed an increase of $110 million in 1960 over the 1958 figures.

The total net revenue of Quebec farmers in 1960, according to the preliminary report, was $188,756,000 compared to $189,728,000 in 1959 and $203,699,000 in 1958, a decrease of $1 million between 1959 and 1960 and a decline of $14,900,000 as compared to 1958.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, we have a diversified farm production in Labelle—namely dairying, hog and poultry raising, and the growing of potatoes and other crops.

We have seven farm co-operatives with a very substantial turnover, research centres, farmers' associations and other groups devoted to the farmer's well-being. There is an agricultural college at Mont Laurier.

Much of our farmers' income is derived from dairy products and the farmers are concerned—and rightly so—with the decline in butter consumption from the levels of a few years ago.

Here is a table, Mr. Chairman, showing a stronger decline in butter consumption since 1958:

	Per capita consumption
1954	19.19
1955	19.21
1956	19.50
1957	19.38
1958	18.32
1959	17.37

It will probably be less than 17 pounds in 1960.

In a speech he made in Toronto on December 1, 1960, Mr. Pierre Cote, chairman of the national council of milk producers, said that butter supplies on that date, including butter oil, reached 150 million pounds, most of them owned by the government and that at the present rate of consumption, that figure exceeds by some 80 million pounds this country's needs.

He added:

> In 1960, our consumption will be 36 million pounds less than in 1957. In other words, even if our population has increased by one and a half million since 1957, monthly consumption is down by 3 million pounds compared to that year, while our consumption of butter substitutes in 1960 will exceed that of 1957 by more than 38 million pounds which is a presumed increase of 9½ pounds per capita, in so far as butter substitutes in 1960 are concerned.

Considering that butter consumption in Canada had at one time reached 32 pounds per capita and that, in 1948, it was still 26.55 pounds, while it has now gone down to about 16 pounds per capita, while consumption of butter substitutes has increased to the point of reaching 9½ pounds per capita, we readily realize the difficult situation in which the dairy industry was in 1960.

It would seem, Mr. Chairman, that the price of butter is too high for the consumer as compared to that of its substitutes. I am not suggesting any reduction in the price that the producer is now getting for butter fat. On the contrary, I support the request made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in which it asked the government, in section 24 of its brief, to maintain the support price at 64 cents at production level. I do hope, Mr. Chairman, that it will be possible for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) to seriously consider the recommendation of the Quebec C.C.U. and of the C.F.A., that is (a) the granting of a subsidy to the consumer so as to bring butter consumption to a proper level; (b) the assurance that such a subsidy would fully benefit the consumer.

I should like to join the farm associations in asking the government to set the support price on Quebec cheese at the same level as in Ontario. Quebec cheese producers are now getting half a cent less per pound than in Ontario.

Mr. Chairman, when the support price on eggs was introduced in 1959, it had a twofold purpose: (a) to stop integration; (b) to allow small producers to remain in business. Under the support price program little more than half of the egg producers have received deficiency payments and they were of so little help to those who got them that the payments did not cause production to increase or decrease.

Various associations have recommended to the government that the support price on eggs be calculated on a regional rather than on a national basis, in order to be fair to producers all over the country. Those associations have also recommended that deficiency payments be paid on grades "A medium" and "A small" eggs; that the quota of each producer be increased accordingly, in order to avoid the substantial losses that farmers are liable to incur as a result of the great price spread between grades getting the payments and those that do not.

The C.F.A. has also asked the government that compensation prices on hogs be calculated on a quarterly rather than a yearly basis, and on a regional or provincial basis, and that the premium for grade A be increased to $4. In closing, Mr. Chairman, let me add that a great many farmers in my constituency have to resort to forest operations to supplement their inadequate income from the sale of farm products.

(Text):

Mr. Forbes: Mr. Chairman, my first words in speaking on the agricultural estimates are to express my appreciation to the former minister of agriculture for the important legislation that he was responsible for implementing during his term as minister of agriculture. I also wish to compliment the present Minister of Agriculture on his appointment to this important post. It was my pleasure a few years ago to attend a conference with the hon. gentleman and at that time I was intrigued by his knowledge and understanding of the problems facing farmers. I am particularly pleased that he now occupies a position which will enable him to implement some of the ideas he gained from that conference.

My remarks at this time will pertain to the agricultural conditions in western Canada with which I am quite familiar and I hope hon. members will not think that I am being sectional in my outlook because we have hon. members from other areas in Canada who are well qualified to speak of the conditions in the regions they represent. While reference has previously been made to measures taken by this government to reduce the disparity between costs of production and prices received by farmers for their products, I think I could enumerate a few of them again without being accused of boastfulness. For instance, there are the increase in compensation to livestock producers for cattle slaughtered in the control of contagious diseases; cash advances on farm-stored grain free of interest; the amendments to the Veterans' Land Act to enable veterans to obtain increased loans; the greatly improved Farm Credit Act; the long-awaited amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which have removed many of the inequities in the making of payments and broadened the coverage; the acreage payments to western farmers amounting to over $82 million; and the provision of funds through the Colombo plan on long terms to assist India and Ceylon to purchase wheat and flour.

I feel I should also make reference to the recent sale of wheat to China and the opening of an office in Tokyo, Japan, whose main function it will be to promote the sale of grain; and the announcement by the Prime Minister that jurisdiction over the Canadian wheat board and the board of grain commissioners be transferred from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Department of Agriculture. I feel certain that this action on the part of the government will prove to be of inestimable value to grain producers in the coming years owing to the fact that the marketing of grain is so closely associated with the Department of Agriculture.

I have referred to only a few of the items of legislation that have been enacted by this government to assist agriculture. I am certain that western farmers are encouraged by the action of the government to implement a comprehensive agricultural policy that will enable farmers to help themselves. However, farmers are still confronted with the cost-price squeeze. This particular kind of squeeze has come about because the farm industry's costs are rising steadily and the prices which farmers receive for their products are still falling; hence the squeeze. As hon. members know, I have not made many speeches in this chamber and I am only prompted to do so now owing to the inequitable position in which agriculture finds itself. It is reasonable to expect that the financial position of farmers in the federal constituency of Dauphin is similar to that of farmers throughout the prairie provinces.

The present position of agriculture is not one that has developed since this government took office; rather it is the result of steadily increasing costs of production and the low prices for agriculture produce received by farmers since world war II. The problem had its beginning during world war II partly as a result of the British wheat agreement entered into by the Liberal government. A paragraph from the Searle Grain News of May 7, 1958, explains the situation as follows:

> The unwinding of the wheat marketing problem in the future is going to require not only the patience, courage and understanding of all concerned, whatever their personal views, but also a willingness on the part of the Canadian taxpayer to accept, if necessary, any temporary financial burden that may arise. Such a burden, since the early days of world war II, has been shouldered by the western wheat grower, for the benefit of the Canadian people at large. Before long, perhaps, it may be necessary for the population as a whole to assume some part of it.

Another problem closely associated with agriculture is that of unemployment which is so frequently mentioned in this chamber. It seems to me that when we are looking for markets for the products of our factories to help the employment situation, we are overlooking our most important market here at home. By increasing the purchasing power of our farmers, we would create employment all along the line from the mines to the railroads to the factories back to the transportation systems and offices, et cetera.

While farmers are usually regarded as producers, they are also the largest purchasers of goods of all kinds of any segment of our society. As further evidence of the recognition of farmers as an important market, I will quote from a submission made to the government on June 25, 1958 by a delegation of unemployed from Ontario and Quebec. They suggested an imaginative trade policy for moving wheat that would include long term credits to enable such countries as India, Asia and Africa to buy Canadian grain. In their brief they went on to say:

> Call it subsidization if you will, but at least it is priming the most necessary pump—our farm economy. Restore purchasing power to the farmers, and you have gone a long way toward restoring it across the nation.

Let me refer to a statement made by the Prime Minister as quoted on page 42 of Hansard:

> Those of us from western Canada know something of what the result was when the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were devastated when drought hit us to such an extent that there was no purchasing power among the farmers, that there were no jobs in eastern Canada.

The farmer is sometimes underestimated in his value as a market for industrial products which find their way into his operation. According to the economics division of the Canada Department of Agriculture there are more than one million cars, trucks and tractors on Canadian farms and their annual expenses, excluding depreciation and financing, are more than $400 million. About 11,000 tons of pig iron go annually into the making of agricultural implements, and the implement manufacturing industry gives work to more than 10,000 employees, with a payroll of over $42 million. Farmers use $20 million worth of electric power annually and pay nearly $200 million for hired labour. They buy 900,000 tons of fertilizers valued at nearly $70 million, and they use over 600,000 tons of limestone. The cost of pest control each year amounts to $20 million. Farm operating expenditures and depreciation total $1.9 billion annually.

Moreover, an estimated one eighth of the total revenue from motor transport of commodities and about one fifth of the revenue from all carload freight involve agricultural products. The combined revenues total more than $225 million. Hundreds of millions of dollars are spent annually on the construction, maintenance and furnishing of half a million homes owned by farmers. With 17 per cent of the population living on farms, additional hundreds of millions are spent for clothing, recreation, health and education.

In 1958 there were over 9,000 establishments with more than a quarter of a million employees processing products of Canadian farm origin. The value of products from these establishments amounted to more than $4.5 billion, and the payroll of the employees was $763 million. While the number of farms declined from more than 700,000 to fewer than 600,000 between 1924 and 1958, this reduction was about equal to the increase in the number of employees processing or manufacturing products of farm origin. In addition to these, there are about 70,000 engaged in the food wholesaling and retailing.

I mention these statistics in order to indicate to hon. members the potential market we have in Canada if farmers have the purchasing power. I have had a large number of requests from farm organizations during the last few years for the government to take some positive action to reduce the disparity between costs of operation and prices received for agricultural produce. My own experience as a practical farmer indicates to me that these requests are fully justified. We frequently hear complaints about the costs of support for farm produce, and I would suggest to those who complain that the cost of supporting secondary industry in this country is high by protecting industry through tariffs. In a study of tariff costs made by a Yale economist for the Gordon commission on Canada's economic prospects, the cost of tariffs to Canadians was estimated at from $610 million to $735 million annually. When Canadians are willing to spend such a large amount to support industry, they should not complain about the small amount the government spends in assistance to agriculture.

As further evidence of the importance of government assistance to agriculture, I wish to quote at this time a statement by Prime Minister Macmillan of the United Kingdom, on June 21, 1960:

> A system of price guarantees is not a subsidy to agriculture. It takes the place of tariffs by which manufacturing industry is helped by the government. British farming prosperity has been built up and will be sustained in the future by price guarantees. No country can be truly prosperous without a strong and healthy agricultural industry.

Let me repeat that there are many signs that the decline in western farm income has been a significant factor in causing the unemployment situation in the rest of Canada. I hope that this government will make whatever provisions are necessary to ensure that adequate returns are received by the farmers in the future in order to enable them to share in the general prosperity of Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a very brief reference to the new system instituted last year in connection with the deficiency payments on hogs and eggs.

While we realize the difficulties confronting the government under the offer to purchase method which created surpluses, the deficiency payment method has not provided the stability in western Canada that was expected. At intervals during the year the price would fall below the prescribed price, but owing to the higher price prevailing in eastern Canada the western producer would not qualify for deficiency payments. Now that the deficiency payment method has been in operation for over a year, I would recommend that the minister take a close look at the disparity in prices prevailing in western Canada with a view to working out a more equitable system in establishing floor prices for these products.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, during the past year or so some hon. members, particularly those from western Canada, have disparagingly referred to the fact that I personally and others did not represent a farm area; the reference was particularly to me. I was not sure how extensive was the farming area I represented until the other day I decided to send an inquiry to all the farmers in my riding. I found that, rather than representing a very small farming area, I represented one of the very large farming areas of the country and close to 1,400 farmers. Therefore, in the future I shall make no apology whatsoever for the agricultural speeches that I shall be called upon to make.

Sometimes we forget the extent of the agricultural industry in some of the ridings in Ontario which are not normally considered to be agricultural areas. The other day I spoke to a gentleman who was surprised to learn of the topography of northern Ontario. Probably it would be wise to inform the committee at this time of some of the topographical features of northern Ontario. For years some parts of northern Ontario, particularly the Timmins and Timiskaming areas, were represented by representatives of the mining industry, and a great deal was heard of that industry. Particularly from the managers' point of view and from the company operations side of the picture, and very little was said about the farming areas themselves. One of the reasons why I want to mention the topographical features is a desire to interest not only hon. members and the government in a conservation program for my area and for northern Ontario but also to mention the need for certain conservation measures before a condition develops in that area similar to that which has developed in southern Ontario.

The riding of Timiskaming covers almost entirely the little clay belt. This little clay belt contains about a million and a half acres of probably the best clay agricultural land in Canada. It is a very level area. The little clay belt resulted from the receding waters of a glacial lake which covered the area from James bay almost to the lower end of the Ottawa river valley. The deep part of the lake, which is now called the little clay belt, is an area extending approximately 100 miles from north to south as far as Cobalt where the triangle narrows very greatly to an area from 100 to 125 miles in width. This land is similar to the prairie lands. It is table land which stretches out for many miles with a very slight elevation. You can see from 70 miles to 80 miles from a given point of land. Because the land was created by a lake and later by a river bed it rises in steps which are probably 200 feet high. In this area, as I have said, there are from 1,200 to 1,400 farmers.

There have been many more. Many of the farms in my area are not being operated at all. Many of these farms could be given over to programs such as the one we were discussing a few minutes ago under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the community pasture program. Hundreds and hundreds of acres of agricultural land which have been cleared at great expense by the original owners are lying idle. This land could be put to use as community pastures because there is an exceptional opportunity in northern Ontario for beef production.

During the last 10 or 12 years the beef industry in Timiskaming has increased greatly. We are now favoured by having several large community sale barns which are providing a great impetus to the increasing beef production. In this respect, I should like to ask the minister if it would not be possible for the department to send a government grader to these sale barns during the time the feeder sales are taking place. In this way a farmer who has bought an expensive bull to improve the standard of his herd could be given an opportunity of obtaining the premium price that should flow from the purchase of the very best animals. The farmers are to be congratulated on the amount of money and effort they have expended in attempting to make this transition from the poor grade of beef that was produced a few years ago, mainly as a result of the disposal of dairy cattle, to the situation we have now where we have some exceptional beef herds. Many of these herds are registered under the pedigree act, and each year they are increasing in stature. I feel that it would be advantageous if the department were to send at least a grader or two to these feeder sales so that the farmer could get the benefit of the premium price for his cattle and the buyers from southern Ontario would be able to assess the grade of cattle that was being produced in this area.

The numerous dairy farms in this area, Mr. Chairman, supply a market of between 100,000 people and 200,000 people. The market is a limited one, but there is some hope that with new equipment for handling dairy products the market will be extended to include the Sudbury and North Bay areas. In this area we have a creamery that has been operating for 25 years and in every one of those years has received not less than the first grade for all the butter that has been produced. I believe this is an enviable record and one that is difficult to equal or to better. All the other facets of agriculture that go with mixed farming are found in this area. A considerable number of mixed crops are grown in this area. Timiskaming has produced some of the best timothy seed that has been produced in Canada and ribbons and awards can be produced from the various fairs across the country to prove it.

The other seed producers of the area are plagued by the lack of markets and a lack of facilities which should be afforded to seed grain growers for disposing of small seeds. We have a great need for some new thinking in connection with agriculture in my area. The farmers are pleased to note that the government is giving consideration to the extension of woodlot operations and the reclaiming of land to be put into pulpwood production. This is one of the areas in which this type of development can be used to great advantage. The present practices in connection with the disposal of the bulk of the products from these woodlots cause us to be worried about the future. We have found that there has never been any equalizing of the costs of production in so far as the pulp and paper companies and the saw mills themselves are concerned and the prices those companies will pay farmers for their products from the woodlots.

No assistance has been given to farm woodlot operators through research into the utilization of wood products that would come from the farm. As a result, very little secondary industry in the woodworking field has been established in the area. We have seen the disappearance of the large operators in the bush industry, and this leaves only the farmers' woodlots from which to draw these wood products. The lack of a market for these products has led some of our entrepreneurs into the plywood and chipboard industries. These people hope they will be able to utilize the resources of the farming communities, and this would provide the farmer with a cash crop that would be advantageous to him.

I should like to thank the previous minister of agriculture for answering the call of the people of Timiskaming by treating the outbreak of rabies that plagued the farmers of the district. There was never very much for which I could thank the former minister, but I should like to give him credit for this much. The minister did make the facilities of the department available for the inoculation of pet dogs, cats and other domesticated animals. He made the serum and the facilities available and inoculations were carried out in that area. I am very happy to report that the results have been satisfactory. I would recommend to the new Minister of Agriculture that when there is an outbreak of rabies immediate attention be given to it. A program of inoculation should be carried out by the department in connection with all domesticated animals. I am quite sure the minister will find, as we found in northern Ontario, that the response of the farmers will be very good. Most of the citizens were willing to take their pets for inoculation when it did not cost them anything. This procedure did result in the elimination of the outbreak which could have reached serious epidemic proportions.

It is interesting to note that the outbreak was so serious that more than 40 people in that area had to be treated as a result of contact with animals suspected of having rabies. I understand also that there is some considerable difficulty with rabies in some of the counties of southern Ontario. The federal government is now being asked for some support in paying the claims for some of the animals that were ordered slaughtered as a result of being suspected of having rabies. I would strongly urge the minister to continue this fight to control rabies because it is my opinion that rabies can be controlled if the government shows leadership. During the parliamentary recess I made several trips to Ottawa and discussed the matter with the officials in charge of this department. They were willing to act in this regard and indicated that fewer animals had to be destroyed and that the epidemic was of shorter duration than it would normally have been because of this program.

Timiskaming is famous for many other reasons. The potato king of the world has very often been a man from our area. We have embarked on a program sponsored by local businessmen of inviting farmers from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to come to our area to take advantage of the amount of unused land that we have and the favourable climatic conditions for the growing of potatoes. These men from the maritimes are offered plots of 500 acres or 600 acres for their use and are financed by businessmen on a crop share basis. Profits from such a venture would be split equally between the farmer and the supporter. This program was commenced on a small scale last fall and I understand it was highly successful. It was so successful in fact that I am sure it will continue on a much larger scale this year. As a result of this program I suggest that the Timiskaming area will develop into one of the largest potato growing areas in the country within a very short period of time. I would suggest that this is a very good area for this type of crop because of the existence of facilities, the availability of land, and its closeness to market. For the reasons I have mentioned I feel that Timiskaming will become even better known as a potato producing area.

It has been difficult for individual growers in our area to retain the potato growing championship because of the fact that these individuals have in past years won this championship two or three times in a row. The officials of the exhibit in Chicago will no longer allow those individuals to enter the exhibit. They have suggested that we should allow someone else to win. Perhaps in the near future we can enter this exhibit and win the championship not only on the basis of quality but perhaps on the basis of quantity as well.

I feel that the Timiskaming area is one of the best farming areas in this country. During the past years we have had very favourable climatic conditions and the farmers have always shown an ability to work hard. The growers in this area were blessed at the beginning because of the relatively low cost of land. They were able, as individuals now are, to carve farms out of the bush. As a result, it has been possible for a strong and forceful farming population to grow. However, I should like to invite some of the western farmers to northern Ontario in order to see for themselves the conditions that exist on some of the farms here. I would suggest to the farmers of western Canada that they should not holler so loud because perhaps the farmers in eastern Canada will decide to ask for some of the advantages presently received by those western individuals. I would suggest they show some sympathy for the eastern farmers and their problems. Surely I do not have to remind them that because of this government they enjoy benefits that eastern farmers do not receive.

We have heard fine-sounding arguments regarding woodlots, and other election propaganda of late; but surely we should not put these arguments on that basis because this situation which exists in eastern Canada is a very important one to the farmers of these areas. One need not travel to northern Ontario to see that there are individuals living on farms and working for very small wages in the villages and towns in order to buy and maintain the equipment needed to carry on with the farming operation.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: Certainly.

Mr. Brunsden: What is the hon. member's specific complaint regarding the difficulties existing among the western and eastern farmers?

Mr. Peters: I would refer the hon. member to the dispute that is taking place in regard to feed grain. We have been informed today that in western Canada the price of feed is 50 cents a bushel less than it is in eastern Canada. This will have the result of western farmers feeding cattle with grain that cost 50 cents a bushel less than the cattle feeders pay for feed grain in eastern Canada. There is a further problem involved in regard to this feeding problem in eastern Canada. It is my understanding that in many cases the farmer in western Canada grows the feed and takes it to the feed mill where it is processed for two cents per bushel and then returns the feed to his own property for his own cattle raising purposes, whereas in eastern Canada the farmers support the wheat board and must pay the higher price. The farmers in this area have been sceptical regarding the allowance of this leeway to the feed mills, and have felt that it was detrimental to themselves. When this detriment is reflected in eastern Canada to the extent of 50 cents a bushel for feed grain the farmers certainly feel that they are not getting a fair shake.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. Peters: Yes.

Mr. Brunsden: How does this situation reflect on the economy of the eastern Canadian agriculture situation? The hon. member knows, as a result of his attendance and the attendance of his leader at the meetings of the agriculture committee, that the percentage of grain in western Canada going into feed mills is very limited.

Mr. Peters: Surely the hon. member will admit that there is a difference in cost in the neighbourhood of 50 cents a bushel. This represents a great difference in the cost of raising cattle as between the two areas. If the difference in cost were only a few cents, then I would admit that there would not be much effect on the cost of production in eastern Canada.

I am familiar with the practices of the feed grain companies in western Canada because they are in fact the same companies which exist in eastern Canada. I know that these companies are not going to sell the grain for 50 cents less in eastern Canada because they are able to purchase it for 50 cents less in western Canada. There is certainly a relationship between the purchase price and the selling price. If the grain company were to charge the farmers raising cattle in western Canada the same price that the farmers in eastern Canada pay for feed grain, the man in western Canada would not buy from the grain company but would purchase his feed grain from his neighbour.

How does the difference in cost affect the farmer in eastern Canada? I must tell the hon. member that hundreds of head of cattle are sold at community sales each week in my area. The farmers in my area are certainly in competition with the beef producers in western Canada; and if there is to be this great difference in the cost of grain feed then there will certainly be a difference between the price of eastern and the price of western beef. I do not think that situation is difficult to understand.

Mr. Forbes: May I ask the hon. member a question? Has the hon. member any evidence to support his suggestion that the farmer in western Canada sells his feed grain at 50 cents per bushel below the market price?

Mr. Peters: I have it right here.

Mr. Brunsden: Put it on the record.

Mr. Peters: I was informed that this is so, and I have no reason to believe it is not so. I am very much surprised at the western members. They are very happy to say that this does not happen, but they must know it has been happening for years and years. There has been a continual bootlegging of grains in western Canada outside the sphere of the wheat board. This has been going on for a long, long time.

Mr. Chairman, I was going to continue my speech on other subjects, but this matter has now been raised and perhaps I should deal with it. The national farmers union presented a brief to the government this year, and in it they had a great deal to say about this matter. I will read some of the brief:

> We believe that the family farm is the most efficient unit in terms not only of production, but also in terms of soil conservation and human and social values. We, therefore, believe that the preservation of the family farm is of importance to farm families as well as to the nation as a whole.
> 6. Reports from local farm forum groups, as publicized by the Saskatchewan farm forum office, indicate that country people were disgruntled by the farm forum guide. One forum "wished to express their disapproval of the ideas contained therein, and would be glad if the person or persons responsible for its contents were not given an opportunity to write for it again". Another forum bluntly stated: "It looks to us like someone is trying to sell us down the river".
> 7. We share the dismay of the forums and have brought this information to your attention because it has a direct bearing on our main question which we have put to you in 1959 and 1960, and to which we have not received an answer. The question is: "Are federal agricultural policies to be enacted that will aim at the preservation of widely distributed private ownership of productive assets, enabling men to maintain themselves and their families on their farms, or does the federal government intend to let those economic forces have free play, that encourage the trend to anonymous, corporate ownership with all its inherent dangers".

Further on in the brief this is said:

> 9. Still dealing with the question of the family farm v. the factory farm, we draw to your attention the grave effects any weakening of the quota system of the Canadian wheat board will have on the economic position of farmers in the prairies.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, will my hon. friend permit another question?

Mr. Peters: Certainly.

Mr. Brunsden: Is my hon. friend under the impression that this situation arose this year, last year or the year before? Does he recognize it has been in existence for 20 years—

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Brunsden: —and that we are now legalizing a practice that has grown up over a long period of time?

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Chairman; I am well aware of that. I said that bootlegging had gone on for a long time, but bootlegging is not recognized as a favourable practice in my area. We certainly never elected to the House of Commons people who participated in this practice. That happened with the former western member who bootlegged in wheat and demonstrated this fact publicly in advertisements. He is no longer a member of this house. Unfortunately he was a member of this party. He put advertisements in the newspapers which showed he was condoning the bootlegging of wheat.

To answer the hon. member's question, I am well aware that this practice has gone on, and I am not in agreement with legalizing bootlegging.

We had a great deal of talk last year about the unfortunate position of the feed mills. If that was only to legalize bootlegging, I am not in favour of it. Mr. McNamara is not in favour of it either—

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I did not use the word "bootlegging". I merely said that a practice had grown up in western Canada by virtue of the dire necessity for a market for wheat. Because of that situation, this practice developed.

I did not use the word "bootlegging" and I had no intention of using it. I resent my hon. friend accusing me of using that word.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I did not accuse the hon. member of using it. I used it. I am only using a colloquial expression to describe something that everybody else may call by a much more polite name. Even the government had a name for it, because they put it under legislation and called it something else altogether, assistance to feed mills or something of that nature.

An hon. Member: That is nonsense.

Mr. Peters: If these hon. gentlemen who talk from their seats will rise and ask questions, I will answer them.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member would have to obtain the unanimous consent of the house to answer any questions, because his time has expired.

Mr. Best: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the belligerence of the hon. member for Timiskaming this evening and the seeming split which has developed in the C.C.F.-New Party—

Mr. Peters: Not at all.

Mr. Best: —between the east and the west, pitting the eastern farmer against the western farmer. I must say that this is not the first instance we have seen of this split today. The hon. member for Assiniboia was talking about people going off the farms during our discussion on the previous agricultural resolution and disagreeing strongly with it. Then the hon. member for Timiskaming rose later and said that people should be taken off the farms, large tracts of land should be assembled by the government and these people should manage them as government employees. We have here a complete contradiction in policy and philosophy and I can see a large chasm and great split developing in this small group down at the end of the chamber.

I expect the hon. gentleman wants large, corporate state farms run by state officials. That is the only conclusion I can draw from what he has said. I must point out to the hon. member that if he examines the record tomorrow he will see that earlier today the leader of his group spoke rather differently.

There is one matter to which I would refer specifically this evening. I wish to refer to page 2404 of Hansard of Friday, February 24, 1961, when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were being dealt with. The Minister of Agriculture was dividing up the estimates for this coming season into four main categories. One of these categories was grants and subsidies, and another was rehabilitation, including P.F.R.A. and the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act. The third area covered a wide range of legislation under the Canada Grain Act, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act. The fourth area covered agricultural research within the Department of Agriculture. It is this area specifically with which I should like to deal briefly this evening.

The minister told us that the agricultural research section takes up 24 per cent of the revenue of his department, and as a figure that is $28.8 million for this coming year. This is a large figure, and coupled with the amount expended in provincial agricultural research this must add up to a very considerable figure indeed for research right across Canada.

I have mentioned previously in this house the idea of an agricultural research council in Canada. I should like to develop this idea briefly this evening. I am convinced that such a council could facilitate co-ordination and liaison between the different types of agricultural research in the federal government and its research system, the experimental farm system, and the various provincial agricultural research bodies across Canada. At present there is of course liaison in this field, but I have in mind a body which would report directly to the Minister of Agriculture and which might perhaps be able better to co-ordinate the work and to bring about a focus of attention on areas of agricultural research which might be either too big, too small or too difficult to be covered by any single body set up at the present time.

I also have in mind that while we could get more for the money spent presently in the total field of agricultural research in Canada, we might be able to save money and avoid duplication through overlapping in this field. I should also like to comment briefly on the liaison that exists in this area at the present time. There are at the present time a number of methods of liaison between the federal department of agriculture and the provincial departments and the other agricultural bodies. There are, for instance, associate committees of the national research council sponsored by the national research council and having varied membership. Such committees have dealt in the past with problems of plant breeding, plant diseases and animal nutrition. They are essentially work planning committees or committees planning the co-ordination of research in these various fields. In addition, the provincial governments sponsor committees in various fields. Federal research men sit on these various committees which are largely concerned with the pooling of information and the dispensing of research information together with its practical results.

Many provinces have these committees. I am told the Atlantic provinces share one. I am not certain whether Quebec has one or not. There is also a national advisory committee on agriculture made up of the federal deputy minister and all the provincial deputy ministers of agriculture across Canada. There are certain specific subject subcommittees under the national advisory committee and research personnel sit on these subcommittees. I can point to such examples as the national committee on weeds co-ordinating weed research programs. Other subcommittees deal with animal breeding, farm buildings, engineering, soils, and similar subjects. These subcommittees are largely concerned with research planning, but include some extension matters. Also under the national advisory committee is a series of provincial committees, one per province, under the chairmanship, I believe of Mr. A. E. Barrett, assistant to the director general of the research branch of the federal Department of Agriculture. Provincial experts form the remainder of the membership and they study all sorts of fields, mainly extension projects but including new facilities, specific projects and requests from farm bodies and individuals, I am told. There is another form of liaison which goes on at the present time. It takes place at federal agricultural stations such as Harrow, Ontario, and Kentville, Nova Scotia. Here provincial extension men work in co-operation with federal personnel. Liaison of this sort is both right and proper.

I said earlier that I believe the setting up of an agricultural research council would mean better use being made of the money and personnel now being devoted to this field by both federal and provincial governments. I should now like to comment briefly on the organization of such a council in Great Britain at the present time. I am examining a document entitled "The Promotion of the Sciences in the Commonwealth" put out by the United Kingdom information office in January, 1958. The publication notes that agricultural research in its early days in Britain was not centrally organized. We know of such important stations as the Rothamsted experimental station which, I believe, was originally set up privately around 1889. Some 20 years later, in 1909 it was recommended that financial aid should be made available from the development fund to aid and develop agriculture and rural industries by promoting scientific research. In 1911 the development fund was used to promote a scheme which led to the establishment of many of the present day agricultural institutions. In 1931, in Britain, the agricultural research council was established by royal charter to be responsible for the general organization and development of agricultural research in Britain.

The council was given funds to spend at its own direction and gradually took over the various responsibilities in this field. I will go on to say that it is responsible in Great Britain to a committee of the privy council for agricultural research, and under the agricultural research act of 1956 it was charged with the organization and development of agricultural research at which time an agricultural research fund was established. This council consists of not more than 18 and no fewer than 15 members. It is of varied composition and it is responsible for the financing of independent research institutes and—this is very interesting—for making grants for special investigations to universities and research bodies. It also awards research fellowships and post-graduate studentships in agricultural and veterinary science. There is obviously great co-ordination there but of course we must not draw the immediate conclusion that we need exactly the same system here in Canada. I would only say that in a country such as Canada with its provincial jurisdictions and a much wider area to be covered, the establishment of such a council might prove even more advantageous.

I should now like to point out briefly what happens in the United States. The situation there is different but there is considerable liaison between the federal government in Washington and the various state governments. I am quoting from a document put out by the national science foundation and entitled "Organization of the Federal Government for scientific Activities". This publication states on page 23:

> While most scientific activities are carried out by the department with its own personnel and its own facilities a significant proportion is conducted through co-operative, contractual and grant programs with state and private institutions and agencies, and with industrial firms. The unique and central feature of the research programs of the department is its traditional system of elaborate co-operation and co-ordination with the research and educational activities of the land-grant colleges of the states and territories of the union.

We can see that there is a very fair measure of co-operation and liaison there.

In conclusion I should like to define a little more clearly what I think an agricultural research council could do in Canada. I believe it could define research problems. It could define them jointly, given good liaison, with all those working in this particular field in Canada. Second, in solving the problem, for instance, it could work through universities, through provincial or federal research establishments depending perhaps on the background the availability and personnel and so forth to work on any given problem. It could perhaps also work jointly with private companies in the agricultural research field. The membership of such a council would include, I suppose, provincial and federal representation, farm groups and companies involved in the agricultural business and research field. I would say that such a council might not at first undertake its own research projects. It could perhaps recommend initially at least to various bodies that various projects should be conducted and could go slow at first with the actual allocation or spending of moneys on its own. After it got going it might adopt some more basic functions and be able to allocate money with regard to specific areas and difficulties in the agricultural research field. This council could examine areas where Canada at present has blank spots. It might direct its attention to problems too big or too difficult, or too small or too specific to be undertaken at other levels. It could indicate how joint action, joint co-ordination and co-operation might solve such problems and then could allocate funds to a specific research group attached to an agricultural college, university or other such institutions.

I have emphasized that such a council might save us money. I am convinced it could do away with overlapping and duplication and could focus attention on the real problems facing agriculture today. It would aid in the education and training of our scientists and personnel engaged in this field. I believe that the retired secretary of the agricultural research council in Britain, Sir William Slater, has made a study relating to re-organization within our own Department of Agriculture. Perhaps such a man might be called upon to make recommendations concerning whether or not an agricultural research council should be set up in Canada, and indeed he may have done so.

There is another matter that is related to this field that probably could come under such a council or perhaps could be set up separately. I refer to the national council on farm policy research which is to be held in Winnipeg in April, 1961. This council has to do with marketing problems and economic policies. It therefore is somewhat outside the ambit of the research field of which I am speaking and perhaps it might be wiser not to combine with research the political aspect, and the controversial field of economics and marketing problems. Perhaps consideration would be given to the establishment of what would be strictly a research council.

[Mr. Best.]

Mr. Chairman, I hope these ideas will be given favourable consideration by the government in the future.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the previous speaker for his intervention. I wish to remind him of one thing of which he should be reminded and to which he should give consideration. The hon. gentleman made a reference to my leader and myself and our views in respect of this present measure. I wish to inform the hon. gentleman, through you, Mr. Chairman, that I was elected by the people in the constituency of Timiskaming to come to parliament to represent them to the best of my ability, always having their interests at heart. It does not apply in this case but let me say I would stand up for the interests of the people of my riding against any hon. member in any part of the chamber. My prime responsibility is to those who elected me. I am not like some of the hon. gentleman's colleagues who say, in effect, "We would love to do this but our party is against it at this time". If the hon. gentleman wants quotations, I have them here and with the permission of the Chair I will read them. What the hon. member's party stands for is the exact opposite of what we stand for.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Peters: I have not read the quotation and if there is objection I will not do so.

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member had his time a little while ago. Is the hon. gentleman now making another speech?

The Chairman: The hon. member is entitled to speak for 30 minutes at a time.

Mr. Pickersgill: And as often as he likes.

Mr. Argue: The Tories have not yet applied closure.

Mr. Peters: I was saying that I support my riding, my people and their interests and if it is necessary I will do so against any segment of the committee. In this instance there is no difference of opinion. Now that this issue has been raised there will be a further statement. Previously it had not been raised. I thank the hon. member for Moose Jaw, Dauphin, Medicine Hat or wherever he comes from, for raising it in the first place.

Hon. members of the Conservative party do not represent their ridings but vote as the government decides they should vote or as the cabinet suggests. Here is a statement made by one hon. member of the government party:

We are torn, as it were, between two choices, like a father with two sons. If a recommendation has been made by the cabinet, or by the minister, and apparently it has been, I submit that the government members have no alternative other than to support our government.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member state from what he is reading?

Mr. Brunsden: The hon. member does not know.

Mr. Peters: I am reading from the evidence of the standing committee on veterans affairs of February 23, 1961. If hon. members wish me to do so, I will name the people.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I believe it is customary under the rules of the committee for an hon. member to state what he is reading from and to indicate who made the statement.

Mr. Peters: The first statement was made by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, is it proper for an hon. member to read from a document of that kind when the committee is sitting and has not reported?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): In any event, what does this have to do with agriculture?

Mr. Brunsden: Nothing.

An hon. Member: The hon. member is incapable of relating two ideas.

The Chairman: Do I understand that the hon. member is reading from the proceedings of the committee on agriculture and colonization?

Mr. Peters: The veterans affairs committee of this year.

The Chairman: I understand that one may quote from a report of a committee but that one may not criticize a decision taken by a committee.

Mr. Peters: At page 126 of this report the hon. member for Megantic is reported to have said:

Our responsibility is to study the bill and to make the best decision we can on it. The only power that we have is to recommend to the government. And now, it is up to the members, whether they are supporting the government or the opposition, to make their positions clear. After our position is made known to the house, it is up to the government to decide as to whether it implements the recommendations or not. Then, at that time, the members can vote for the government or against it. It is as simple as that.

On the same page, the hon. member for Middlesex West is reported as saying:

I will be glad to make my statement without political bias. However, it is a fact that the members of the government are placed in an awkward position.

The awkward position is that government members were not representing the veterans in their constituency because the government was not taking action in the particular matter under consideration. The hon. members of the government had to vote against the wishes of the people who elected them because the Conservative party said that was what they had to do. The government did not accept the recommendations presented.

I refer to this matter in order to make it clear that I will vote against my party when it is necessary to do so in the interests of my constituents.

Mr. Brunsden: When have you ever done it?

Mr. Peters: I have done so on a number of occasions; and to be completely fair I should say that this has been done on a number of occasions by hon. members of the party to which the hon. member who raised the matter belongs. Of course they got into trouble for doing so, but they exercised their integrity and sincerity on those occasions.

I return now to the question of the wheat board with which subject I was dealing when I was so rudely interrupted by the expiry of my time.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would the hon. member ask his leader what he finds so funny? The hon. member for Assiniboia has been sitting there giggling for the last half hour.

Mr. Argue: I have been looking at you.

Mr. Peters: I do not need to ask him. What is funny is that a government member should ask questions that are so easily refuted. Let me read the refutation advanced by the wheat board:

Chief Commissioner W. C. McNamara pinpointed the operation of the Canadian wheat board before the standing committee on agriculture and colonization when he said:

"Orderly marketing is achieved by the quota regulations under the Canadian Wheat Board Act."

He went on to say:

"In the view of our board the essential feature of the marketing scheme established by the statute is the equitable rationing of delivery opportunities and the ensuring that, as far as possible, all producers will get the same basic price at the same time for like kind, grade and quantity of grain. Equal delivery opportunity is the basic feature of the scheme.

Obviously, Mr. Chairman, this is not happening. When the price drops 50 cents at the feed mills in so far as one farmer is concerned, another one may be getting a much higher or even a lower price for selling to another feed mill, say, under the wheat board.

The brief goes on to say:

It is our considered opinion that the recent exemption of western feed mills from the quota and pricing regulations of the Canadian wheat board destroys this "basic feature" of the marketing scheme by depriving many grain producers of equal delivery opportunities.

I am concerned not only with the matter of equal delivery opportunities but also with Mr. McNamara's contention that all producers will get the same basic price at the same time for like kind, grade and quantity of grain. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, this feature has been eliminated. I suggest further that its elimination is detrimental to the farmers of eastern Canada. Therefore, I would advise western members to walk very softly when they attack the position that some of us in eastern Canada take, because we have been willing to give them every possible opportunity to get what they desired. We should also like to have that opportunity extended to our farmers. You have noted my support on many occasions, Mr. Chairman, of the maintenance of stable prices in the legislation which has been introduced, and in measures which have not been introduced. I have supported them because I thought they were better than the measures which were supported by the government members, and I refer particularly to deficiency payments on grain.

Mr. McNamara went on to say:

If a producer may sell a portion of his crop to a mill for flour, feed or seed, outside of his quota, he would then be able to deliver to the other channels of the marketing system grain up to the amount of his quota and thus achieve an advantage over less fortunate producers who were not able to get their grain into the local flour, feed and seed outlets.

In our meeting with the Canadian wheat board at Winnipeg on February 1, Mr. McNamara was questioned and admitted that quotas would be affected by the present exemption of western feed mills.

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, the hon. gentleman is reading from another document but he has not identified it.

Mr. Peters: I am sorry; this was a complete oversight. I identified it previously as the national farm union submission to the Canadian government on February 15, 1961.

Mr. Brunsden: The hon. gentleman used the word "we".

Mr. Pickersgill: Presumably they did.

Mr. Peters: It could be the identity of myself. I continue with the brief:

Finally we want to point out that, when he was asked by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort at the hearing before the standing committee on agriculture and colonization whether he wanted any of the board's powers relaxed, Mr. McNamara said "no".

[Mr. Peters.]

In view of the chief commissioner's clearly expressed opposition to the exemption of western feed mills from the quota and pricing regulations of the wheat board, the gross injustice it does to many farmers, and the strong sentiments expressed in many country meetings, we respectfully request that the Canadian wheat board be instructed to rescind instructions to the trade Nos. 41 and 43 which allow feed mills open market rights in purchasing feed grain supplies outside of wheat board price and quota regulations. We are happy to report that Mr. McNamara has agreed to meet with our executive and review the situation.

My argument in relation to this matter is that a differential of 50 cents would be detrimental to the beef producers, the poultry producers, the hog producers, the dairy producers, and all those who are buying feed. It would be detrimental to the production of agricultural products in my area because none of this 50 cents will ever flow from the feed mill to my area. None of this 50 cents will ever accrue to the farmers in my riding. If there is a differential in the production of beef and agricultural products which is brought about by the difference of 50 cents in so far as the eastern and western farmers are concerned, it will be the result of legislation passed by this government last year.

I hope this matter will go before the agriculture committee. I hope this will be referred to that committee by the minister who no doubt is aware of this situation because he represents all the farmers of Canada and not only one small segment, namely the grain producers.

Mr. Argue: Small?

Mr. Peters: This matter has to be incorporated in the regulations of the wheat board. We in eastern Canada want the equality that existed under the wheat board to be extended to us.

There will be no difference of opinion between my leader and myself in this regard. He is now the leader of a very influential party in Canada. He will speak on behalf of the farmers of western Canada with the same strong voice as that with which he has spoken before. He will also ask them to give respect and consideration to the needs and desires of the farmers in my area as well as those of all other farmers throughout Canada. In the C.C.F. we have always had a leader who has been willing to speak for all the people of Canada, as, incidentally, it is the responsibility of every member in this house to do.

Mr. Brunsden: May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Argue: No; you cannot chisel like that.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I believe the house leader intends to indicate some slight change in the business for tomorrow.

Mr. Churchill: Yes. Following consultation with the parties on the other side of the house, it now appears that it would be appropriate to start off with interim supply tomorrow. My understanding is that we hope that by one o'clock interim supply would be completed. Then we would follow with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

The forecast for next week, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, runs in this way, subject, of course, to change and to the progress that the house makes. We will start off on Monday with supplementary estimates. It is impossible to tell how long we shall be on those, but during the course of the three days we should like also to consider Bill No. S-5, which is No. 1 on today's order paper, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, and Bill No. S-6, which follows it, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act. These bills were before the house earlier and were referred to the banking and commerce committee. They have now come back to the house. If time permits next week, we might also continue with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FEDERAL GRANTS FOR AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION, QUEBEC

Question No. 130—Mr. Boivin:

1. Has the Department of Transport made any grant for the construction or extension of the following airports: Baie Comeau, Gaspe, Godbout, Havre St. Pierre, Matane, Rimouski, Rouyn, St. Jean, and Senneterre?

2. Are the said airports placed under municipal management?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1 and 2. The department has made grants in aid toward construction at the airports at Gaspe, Matane, Rouyn, Senneterre and Havre St. Pierre. In addition, the department has actually carried out construction work at airports at Rimouski, St. Jean and Baie Comeau.

SUMAS PRAIRIE, B.C.—PURCHASE OF LAND FOR AIRPORT

Question No. 148—Mr. Winch:

1. Did the federal government in or about the year 1940 purchase land on the Sumas prairie in British Columbia for the construction of an airport?

2. If so, what was the amount of land purchased, and total price paid for same?

3. Has the federal government sold all or any part of this land, and, if so, to whom, and for what price?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1 and 2. Yes, in 1942, the Department of Transport, acting as agent for the Department of National Defence, acquired by expropriation approximately 422 acres of land, at a total cost of $32,624.30.

3. Yes, all the land was sold in 1958, through Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, to Buckersfield's Ltd., of Vancouver, B.C., for the price of $67,601.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

AGRICULTURE

SUNFLOWER SEED—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the agricultural stabilization board has been authorized to support the price of sunflower seed to the producers of this crop in the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta at 4.15 cents per pound for Canada No. 1 grade, 10 per cent moisture, delivered at the crusher for the manufacture of sunflower seed oil. The support price is approximately 100 per cent of the base price.

The production of sunflower seed in Manitoba has been an important secondary cash crop in that province for a number of years and the board has supported the Manitoba producer price for the past two years. Production of sunflower seed in Alberta has been increasing in recent years, and it is now becoming an important secondary cash crop in that province. Alberta producers have therefore been included in this year's support program.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of his announcement in regard to sunflowers. Is the 4.15 cents a fixed price for each province or an average price on the production of both provinces?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is a national average taken from the figures that we have for Manitoba and the estimated figures that we had for Alberta; a national average.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question. Is it not a fact that the farmers of western Canada asked for a regional price and not for an average national price?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I always bow to the great wisdom of the hon. member for Essex East on agricultural matters. In this instance we consider the prairies to be a region or national area.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question was, is it not a fact that the farmers of western Canada asked for the application of a regional price on the basis of individual provinces and not an average price, as suggested wrongly now by the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The representations from the sunflower producers were based on the one price for the two provinces.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to add anything to what he was good enough to tell the house yesterday on the serious situation in Laos.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the 24 hours that have elapsed since I commented yesterday on the Laotian situation there have been certain positive developments. The military situation is that the Pathet Lao are continuing to make serious inroads into territory previously held by the royal Laotian government. The situation changes from hour to hour, and I think what appears in the press will give a general idea as to the situation in that regard.

A determined effort has been made by the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States to find a basis for peaceful negotiation with the objective of bringing an immediate end to the hostilities in Laos, of ensuring its neutrality and detaching it from the pressures of the cold war. There can be no doubt that this course is the one best calculated to serve the true interests of the Laotian people and prevent the present hostilities from spreading beyond the borders of that country, the result of which would be to create an even more serious threat to world peace.

As hon. members know, yesterday the United Kingdom laid specific proposals before the Soviet union. These call for an appeal from the United Kingdom and Soviet co-chairmen for an immediate cease-fire in Laos, the first and the most necessary step; following that cease-fire, the reconvening in New Delhi of the international control commission for Laos, of which Canada is a member along with India and Poland.

Inquiries of the Ministry

When the commission so reconvened found that an effective cease-fire was in effect, an international conference would then be called. This conference could consist either of the countries represented at the Geneva meeting of 1954—that is, the United States, the United Kingdom, France, communist China, the U.S.S.R., Laos, Cambodia, South Viet Nam and North Viet Nam—or on the other hand, the larger conference along the lines proposed by Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia. This would extend membership of the conference to the members of the international supervisory commission for Laos and to Burma and Thailand.

The proposals which I have just outlined represent a sincere attempt to find common ground and would, if successful, accomplish the main objective of a neutral and independent Laos. There are, of course, grave difficulties still to be overcome, including the timing of a cease-fire in relation to the proposed conference and the identity of the government which would represent Laos at such a conference. The Canadian government fully shares the objectives of the United Kingdom proposal and, as I said yesterday, would be prepared to play its part in the international supervisory commission which would have an important function to perform in relation to the implementation of the proposals.

FORT PEPPERRELL, NFLD.—TERMS OF REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada announced by the Prime Minister on January 23 with respect to Fort Pepperrell, just outside St. John's, has yet been made.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker. My understanding of the situation is that counsel for the government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland are working on an agreed statement of facts which would form the basis of the reference.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the urgency of getting a decision from the court in the present year so that use can be made of this very valuable property, I wonder whether the minister would see if this matter can be expedited.

Mr. Fulton: I was inquiring into the matter just yesterday, and am glad to be able to tell the hon. gentleman that I have anticipated his suggestion.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

"CANADIAN OVERSEAS VOLUNTEERS"—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that a Canadian peace corps called "Canadian Overseas Volunteers" has been set up under the sponsorship of groups at the University of Toronto and Laval University, with its first objective being the provision of volunteers for Ceylon, is the Canadian government prepared to lend any financial assistance to this worthy project?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to send me the reference to this organization and a summary of what it has done as set out in Varsity of March 10.

The action of the young men and women both at Toronto university and Laval University, as well as the members of the faculties associated with them, shows a foresight and a spirit of co-operation in international affairs that deserves the widest commendation. This plan in essence has been in formulation for about a year. I think it is only fair to say that the fact that these young men and women got this under way so long ago indicates that they are taking a proper interest in world affairs.

In so far as the question of finance is concerned, the article points out that the Canadian overseas volunteers are now engaged actively in raising the funds they will need and are appealing to industry, business and the various student governments at the universities. As far as the government are concerned, we give the highest approbation to the conduct of these young men and women, and the external aid office and Canadian missions abroad will extend to them, in their initiative, every administrative support and assistance.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister tell us whether the contributions of industry, business or individual persons to this group will be allowable as income tax deductions on the basis of similar types of charitable donations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think I ought to pass that question over to the Minister of National Revenue and, even in so far as he is concerned that might be placing him in the position of interpreting the law which I am sure the hon. gentleman being a lawyer would not want him to do.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt that the hon. member for Ottawa West would expect to receive the answer to such a difficult problem across the floor of the house.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I can rephrase my question. Is this organization listed by the Department of National Revenue as one of those that qualify in that category?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge the answer is no. As the hon. member appreciates, those organizations must make application to qualify as such, and it is not just a matter of the department doing these things on its own. Organizations must apply in this regard. I received three such applications yesterday, as a matter of information. When an application is received in the form which is prescribed, the matter is taken into consideration by the officers of the department, the legal branch and by the minister, and a decision is rendered. This course will be followed in this case if and when an application is made.

Mr. Argue: I would like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the Prime Minister's very complimentary and generous remarks with regard to this organization do I take it that if it includes the government in the list of bodies to be approached for financial assistance, the government will give sympathetic consideration?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I note in the article that it states that some 35 students are presently devoting their Saturday mornings to briefing sessions about Ceylon, that the scheme will cost $2,000 annually for each volunteer sent. There has been no request made so far, and I have never found it convenient to anticipate what the results will be when requests are made. These young people are doing worth-while work and have not asked for any government assistance.

[Later:]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have been reminded by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Stinson) who is president of Canadian Overseas Volunteers, that some time ago that organization made application to the department to have donations thereto ruled as charitable, and such ruling was granted.

TRADE

URANIUM—ALLOCATION OF CONTRACT WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask if he would comment on the revelation that Eldorado has had a contract with the United Kingdom for some years for the purchase of some $200 million worth of uranium over a period of years. Would the Prime Minister inform the house on what basis this large contract will be allocated among the producers?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that would be a proper question at the moment. I suggest I simply take it as notice and that on Monday an answer be given as far as it is possible to do so.

PROPOSED U.S. RESTRICTIONS ON TOURIST IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government been notified whether any decision has been reached by the United States government in respect of the bill to reduce the value of tariff free tourist goods permitted entry from $500 to $100?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LILLOOET, B.C.—REPORTED DISMISSAL OF LIQUOR CHARGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Justice if he can comment on the report that a magistrate in the town of Lillooet, British Columbia, has dismissed a charge laid against a native Indian for having bottled beer in his possession—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Winch: —contrary to the federal Indian Act because the section involved contravenes the bill of rights?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is asking the Minister of Justice to comment on a routine matter of the administration of justice, which is a provincial rather than a federal responsibility.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On the point of order Your Honour has raised, surely what the hon. member is inquiring about is a decision which the court has made with respect to legislation of this parliament. In view of the fact that the bill of rights is involved it seems to me it is a proper question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but I cannot agree with the hon. member in that respect. It does not seem to alter the case at all, the fact that the magistrate referred to the bill of rights.

On the contrary, it would involve an improper request for a legal opinion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—INQUIRY AS TO REVISION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour and ask if he could advise the house whether it is the intention of the government to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act this session in order to bring under coverage tradesmen and particularly those carpenters who are employed in repairing or altering privately owned homes, and who are being denied coverage on the ground that they are employed in casual labour in a type of work which has nothing to do with the employer's normal line of business.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member given notice?

Mr. Robichaud: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The question involves, I would think, an inquiry into particular circumstances.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am in no position at this time to say what form the amendments will take.

Mr. Speaker: It is a matter of policy.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister tell the house whether there will be amendments to the act?

Mr. Starr: There will be amendments to the act.

BANK OF CANADA—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Acting Minister of Finance. Is he aware that on Wednesday, March 15, I raised a question with respect to the submission of the report of the Bank of Canada to the banking and commerce committee. The minister made a commitment that not later than the end of this week he would make a statement in connection with this subject. Is the acting minister going to make the statement today?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I would have to take that under consideration, Mr. Speaker. I have no instructions on the matter, and obviously I cannot make a statement.

COMBINES

OTTAWA—REPORTED IDENTICAL QUOTATIONS FOR ALUMINUM SULPHATE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Jean Casselman (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask whether it is a fact, as stated in a report in the Ottawa Journal of March 21, that the government failed to answer a complaint from the city of Ottawa made last January regarding identical tenders received by the city for aluminum sulphate.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not a fact. The facts in this respect are quite contrary to what appeared in the press which, in turn, appears to reflect what was said at a recent meeting of the Ottawa board of control.

The facts are that a letter complaining about these bids, dated January 12, 1961, was received from the city of Ottawa. It was addressed to Mr. T. D. MacDonald, who has not been director of investigation for some months. Mr. Henry, who is the director, replied on January 17, advising that an officer from the branch would get in touch with the city purchasing agent shortly. This was done, and the officer made a report to the director on the information obtained. This report is being considered.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—SAVINGS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister any estimate of the saving to the unemployment insurance fund that resulted from the winter works program that, according to the minister's statement yesterday, will provide an average of approximately 11 days of work per man on site?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The latter part of the question is incorrect, Mr. Speaker. I did not say that it supplied 11 days of work per man on site. The hon. member's division is incorrect. As to the other aspect of the question, I suggest that he place his question on the order paper so that we can look into the matter to see whether any computation can be arrived at.

Mr. Garland: May I ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member's original question is properly one for the order paper, particularly since he did not give any notice that he required statistical information. If he has another question I shall recognize him later.

Mr. Garland: On a point of order, the minister has implied that the figures I have used are wrong. I suggest to him that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member would have to give me more information before I could find a point of order in what he says. There is really no point of order arising that would permit the contradiction of a statement made by another member. There might be a personal explanation if it involved the reliability of the hon. member's statement, and if the hon. member wishes to make such an explanation I will give him the floor for that purpose.

[Later:]

Mr. Garland: May I address another question to the Minister of Labour. Apart from the 22 days of work per man in respect of the on-site and off-site figures used by the minister yesterday, is it reasonable to assume that the real unemployment figure in this country is 929,000?

Mr. Starr: No, it is not.

[Later:]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, could I ask—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) is having some difficulty obtaining the floor.

Mr. Grafftey: I would like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he can inform the house as to the number of days of work which will be provided by the winter works program.

Mr. Starr: I gave the answer to that question yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would like to ask a supplementary question. How was the minister in a position to give that answer when the table which I have asked for has not been compiled?

Mr. Starr: The table the hon. member asked for had relation to the various projects, where they are located and other information about them. There are over 6,000 projects, and the hon. member will realize the amount of work entailed in the compilation of such a table.

Inquiries of the Ministry

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour based on a question put by me on March 9 and again on March 15. On the former date I asked the minister if he would table the statistics indicating the extent of the provision for work and the number of projects in consequence of the winter works program. The minister replied that he would be able to do that very soon. Then on March 15 he assured me that he would table this information in the next day or so. I do not find it in the records. Can the minister give me an explanation?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): On checking the question asked by the hon. member for Essex East we found he wanted information to be given by localities. I was informed by the responsible section of the Department of Labour that it would take two weeks at least to compile the information on that basis. We have mobilized all our resources in that department in order to do this, but the figures will take about a week and a half to prepare. As soon as they are available I will inform the house.

GLEN EXELBY—INQUIRY AS TO EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Minister of Labour whether he is now in a position to answer the question of which he took notice yesterday, as to whether Mr. Exelby of Hamilton has yet been found a job by the national employment service.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the national employment service inform me that they are continuing their efforts on his behalf.

INCOME TAX

CHARITABLE DONATIONS—REPORTED CHECKING OF BOOKS OF ROMAN CATHOLIC PRESBYTERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance or, in his absence, to his parliamentary secretary. Did the minister receive a few days ago a joint letter from several Catholic priests of the province of Quebec in connection with receipts for charitable donations and, if so, would he table this letter as well as a copy of his reply?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): I shall make inquiries, but I believe this is a matter which lies under the administrative jurisdiction of the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the parliamentary secretary verify whether the letter was sent to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, I shall make inquiries.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—CONSIDERATION BY PARLIAMENT REGARDLESS OF B.C. AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that the Senate of the United States has now ratified the Columbia river development plan almost by unanimous vote, we can expect that this treaty will be submitted to parliament shortly for consideration?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am sure Canadians as a whole will be very happy at the outcome of the proceedings in the United States. In so far as the latter part of the question is concerned, determination as to if and when the matter will be brought before this house should be made shortly after Easter.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, a moment ago in answer to a question regarding the Columbia river treaty I inadvertently said "if and when it will be submitted to parliament". I want to make it very clear that it will be submitted, but the date when it will be submitted still remains to be considered. I do not want any misunderstanding regarding my words in that connection.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rather assumed that was a slip of the tongue by the Prime Minister. May I ask him whether the treaty will be submitted to this parliament for consideration irrespective of the negotiations with the province of British Columbia?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, we dealt with this on a previous occasion, and I have nothing further to add to what was said in that regard.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

MONCTON, N.B.—DISMISSAL OF CIVILIAN FIREFIGHTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): I wish to address a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Yesterday I received letters suggesting that certain civilian firefighters at No. 5 R.C.A.F. supply depot at Moncton would no longer be required. Today I received letters saying that 30 men had received notice that as of April 1 they would no longer be employed. Would the minister investigate the accuracy of these reports and, if they are correct, take steps to reverse the decision of his officials?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): As a result of changing commitments the number of civilians required at a particular defence establishment may increase or decrease. The department's total requirements for civilian employees have been reduced during the past several years as a result of programs designed to increase efficiency.

The department attempts to carry out reductions of civilian staff resulting from changing requirements with a minimum of adverse effects on individuals. With this objective in mind, arrangements have been made to retain in employment during the winter months a number of employees whose positions will become redundant, and who would encounter difficulty in securing alternate employment if released during the winter months. The number of individuals in this category at the present time is approximately 250 of the more than 45,000 civilians employed by the Department of National Defence. The army and the R.C.A.F. employ approximately 900 civilians in the Calgary area. Of these, 16 are in positions that will shortly become redundant.

In answer to the second part of the hon. member's question, may I tell him that the complete question is at present under consideration by the officials of the Department of National Defence and the members of treasury board.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO DATES OF BY-ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder if I can address a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he is yet in a position to make an announcement about that matter which so greatly concerns the Leader of the Opposition and others, namely the announcement of by-election dates.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING TO AMEND CONSTITUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he is in a position to tell the house whether the provinces and the federal government will be meeting shortly to seek a formula for amending the Canadian constitution in Canada, particularly as a result of the initiative taken by the government of the province of Quebec.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we were very glad indeed to find that the thinking of the government of the province of Quebec appeared to be in line, generally speaking, with the thinking of the majority of those who met in the course of this conference, which arose out of the initiative taken by the Prime Minister of Canada last year.

In reply to the specific question, I may say that as attorneys general it was our hope that it would not be necessary to have another meeting and that we had arrived at a proposal on which it was hoped general agreement might be reached to the effect that that proposal should be submitted to the governments of the provinces and the government of Canada for consideration, and in due course should be presented to the respective legislatures and parliament.

I have not yet heard from the attorneys general of the provinces whether in fact the proposal has been agreed to by their governments so that it will be recommended by them to their legislatures. It may be that another meeting will be necessary, but I still hope it will not.

[Later:]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say something in clarification of a remark I made in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Essex East. As I recall it, I said I had not yet heard from the attorneys general of the provinces. That is not quite correct and would perhaps convey a wrong impression. I have heard from several, but with respect to at least two they said they were engaged in affairs of their legislative sessions and would not be able to let me have a definitive reply until a little later.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister know whether it is a fact that the attorney general of the province of Saskatchewan finds it difficult to accede to the proposal made by Mr. Gerin-Lajoie of Quebec?

Mr. Fulton: I do not think I understand the implication of that question, but even if I did I do not think it is the kind of question I should answer at this stage, because the discussions and negotiations are not yet completed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since the minister has not fully understood my question may I ask—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member asking a further supplementary question or presenting an argument?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that the minister apparently did not understand my question I am trying to clarify it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fulton: As I pointed out to the hon. member, even if I did understand his question it is not one that should be answered at this point, when negotiations are not yet complete.

Mr. Pickersgill: How can you say that when you do not understand the question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I simply wanted to know whether the government of the province of Saskatchewan appears to take the position that in the absence of any conference it would be unable to agree to the proposal for a specific formula to amend the constitution of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know upon what the hon. member is basing his assumption, Mr. Speaker, but I am afraid I must remind him that the discussions have been held in camera. We are hopeful of a satisfactory outcome, but I am not yet at liberty to disclose the position taken by the government of any province. If he wants an answer to that question he will have to ask it of the attorney general of Saskatchewan.

IMMIGRATION

GEORGE POWERS—STATEMENT ON PERMISSION TO REMAIN IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the following question was asked by the hon. member for Algoma West:

> Could the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration say for what reason the deportation of Mr. George Lee Powers was suspended?

I have been informed by immigration officials that Mr. Powers was permitted to remain in Canada under permit, in view of the relatively minor nature of the offence for which he had been convicted and as he had had no previous difficulty, had fairly lengthy residence in Canada—more than three years—and was reasonably well established.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder whether the same sort of courtesy will be extended to Mr. Chan?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Does the parliamentary secretary think that a conviction for bootlegging is a relatively minor offence, whereas being of Chinese origin is not?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member in asking for information of that kind is debating the issue and not seeking further information.

FLOODS

BEAUCE COUNTY, QUE.—STATEMENT ON ASSISTANCE BY ARMY

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wish for a brief moment to revert to motions in order to make a statement concerning flood conditions in Beauce county.

Mr. Speaker: The Associate Minister of National Defence asks for leave to revert to motions in order to make a statement concerning flood conditions in Beauce county. Has the associate minister leave of the house to make this statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, there are serious flood conditions in Beauce county, and as a result the Quebec provincial authorities have asked for the help of the army. This request has been granted, and 31 all ranks departed from Quebec on March 21 and arrived at Beauceville at approximately 11.40 hours. Blasting operations commenced in the area, and this work is continuing. The Department of National Defence will do everything in its power to help in this particularly distressed area because of these flood conditions.

(Translation):

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the Associate Minister of National Defence, I should like to ask him a question to which he may reply some time next week. Will the cost of the blasting be paid by the federal government or by the provincial government?

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member to speak in a louder voice, because I was unable to hear his question.

Mr. Racine: I shall repeat it with pleasure, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Associate Minister of National Defence whether the cost of the dynamite and of blasting operations is to be paid by the federal government or by the provincial government?

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, that is a rather technical question. It is my impression that the Royal Canadian Engineers personnel who were sent into the Beauce constituency to help in the emergency operations will pay their own expenses, but as I am not sure I shall inquire and let the hon. member for Beauce have the answer later.

SUPPLY

INTERIM SUPPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 22, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Rea in the chair:

That a sum not exceeding $638,909,350.10 being the aggregate of

(a) one sixth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1962, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $614,823,482.50;

be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1962.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to hold up this resolution for any length of time. However, there is one matter which I think should be given some consideration before we go any further. I refer to the situation in which our old age pensioners find themselves in this country today. On July 19, last session, I had occasion to raise this matter, but unfortunately no decision was reached at that time. The matter was discussed until eleven o'clock that night but no decision was reached. The outcome was that the business of the house was arranged in such a way that we had no further opportunity to discuss this question during the following month of that session.

I am not going into all the detail that was discussed last year on this matter. However, I think in all fairness we should review the situation, particularly in view of the considerable support that government members gave it that day. I made a check and found that the matter was supported to a lesser or greater degree by the hon. members for Chapleau, Parry Sound-Muskoka, Restigouche-Madawaska, York-Humber, Simcoe East, the present minister of northern affairs, the hon. members for Regina City, Prince, Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, Inverness-Richmond, Athabasca, St. James, Wetaskiwin, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet.

Some 15 hon. members on the government side, including two cabinet ministers, supported this proposal to a lesser or greater degree. However, I am sorry to say that all hon. members were not in support of the matter which was raised at that time, and the debate ranged from the full support that was given by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, who is unfortunately no longer with us, to lesser support by other hon. members. I do not know whether the fact that the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska is no longer with us has anything to do with the position he took on that occasion. I was talking to him some two weeks ago and he informed me that this was definitely one of the reasons that he moved from the house. He said it was because he felt the government had failed totally, completely and absolutely to carry out any of the promises they had made during the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958.

I should like to quote very briefly from the words of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska as they are reported on page 6507 of Hansard for July 19, 1960. In the first column of that page, near the middle of the column, the hon. member is reported as having said:

> I listened, as I said, very attentively to the representative of the C.C.F. group who introduced this amendment, as well as to the hon. member for Essex East. I could see nothing in what they said, with one possible exception, that was not in strict conformity with the solemn promises we officially made during the 1957 and 1958 elections.

Unfortunately some other hon. members did not agree completely with that and the debate ranged from a back-patting contest of saying how much the present government had done since they took over to an out and out condemnation of myself for raising this very embarrassing subject at that time.

I think it would be appropriate at this time to remind the committee once again, as I did last year, of just what is involved in this problem. I should like to quote from page 6521 of Hansard of July 19, 1960. I reminded the house of this matter last year, and I think this quotation is very appropriate. I am reported as having said:

> I hope we have not lost sight of the problem with which we are faced by reason of all the diversions I have listed. It is not the Liberal party of 1923 or the Conservative party of 1931 that is going to have to deal with the problems facing old age pensioners today. It is the members of the government and other members sitting in this house a few days before the end of the session who are going to have to decide if they are going to do anything for the old age pensioners other than utter kind words about them. We are going to have to make a decision before the end of the session so that the old age pensioners will know whether they are going to have to face another bleak winter before the government has another opportunity to do something for them.

That winter has come and gone and we do not seem any closer to solving this problem than we were when we debated it last on July 19 of last year. In spite of the kind words of many hon. members that day, and in spite of all the grand assurances of the 1957 and 1958 election campaigns, which were referred to by the former hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, the cold facts of the matter are that this government have been in office for almost four years and they have failed to take this problem into consideration.

Something else has developed over that four-year period. It is something we hear very much about in this house from time to time. I refer to the problem of unemployment. I should like to refer to that problem only to relate it to the present problem of our old age pensioners. In this respect, as our communities across the country face increasing unemployment and as more and more of the unemployed come on to their relief rolls, we find that the municipalities are less and less able to give consideration to the relief of old age pensioners.

There is another factor which I think should be brought to the attention of the committee, and that is the increase in the number of old age pensioners over the last four years. If we look in the Canada Year Book we find on page 315 that old age pensioners between the ages of 65 and 70 have been increasing at the rate of 1.1 per cent every two years. This means that over a four-year period there has been an increase of between 300,000 and 400,000 in the number of old age pensioners who are in so many cases trying to live solely on the miserable pittance of $55 a month.

We also find that the cost of living has steadily crept up since the last increase in pension rates was given. The cost of living rose from an index of 121.9 in 1957 to 129.6 at the time the latest figures were given, a substantial increase for people who are trying to live on that sort of money.

There are two or three other things which I think should be listed to drive home the nature of this problem. The subindex shelter figure has risen from 134.9 to 144.6, and shelter is something which, obviously, no old age pensioner can do without. The cost of household operation has climbed—not as much as some of the other things, but it has climbed from 119.6 to 123.5. One of the most tragic things of all is the rapid increase in the cost of certain basic foodstuffs, and I should like to list two of the worst instances. Living on $55 a month, old age pensioners do not buy sirloin steaks; they have to look for the cheap cuts of meat. Yet we find that the index figure for the cost of stewing beef has risen from 52.6 to 140.5, an increase of 437 per cent, and the cost of hamburg from 37.9 to 123.7, an increase of 310 per cent.

Certainly this is something which the government must take into consideration and remedy. We find today that the prisoners in our federal penitentiaries, according to an answer given last year by the Minister of Justice to a question asked by the hon. member for Skeena, to be found on page 1386 of Hansard of February 23, 1960, cost $167.71 to maintain for a 31-day month. That is the difference, $167.71 for prisoners as against $55 for old age pensioners. If that is the free enterprise system the Prime Minister was talking about on television last week, it is a sorry picture. If it takes three times as much to maintain a prisoner in a penitentiary as the amount upon which we expect an old age pensioner to live, no wonder we have so many people in prisons under free enterprise systems. It is because they are treated better there than when they are outside.

Last year we heard so much about the amount of money involved in the resolution I moved. It was going to cost $200 million, and where was all that money to come from? Well, if the government have not got the answers to the problems which have to be met in our society, why do they offer themselves for the job? Where is the money coming from for the $1,250 million we spend every year on obsolete weapons? Where does the money come from for the $900 million interest a year it costs us to maintain our federal debt?

My point is that this government can do something when they want to do something, but it is very obvious, at least in connection with the difficulties of the old age pensioners, that they do not want to do anything. They shrug their shoulders and say "What can we do?" If they can do nothing it is time they got out and let somebody else try. Yet in the face of this problem we see the Prime Minister having the effrontery to go on television and pronounce pious platitudes about free enterprise versus socialism. It would be a joke if it were not such a tragedy.

Mr. McMillan: It is not our intention to hold up interim supply, but there is one aspect of the vote which should give cause for alarm to all members of this committee and, for that matter, to all Canadians. I refer to the extra public debt charges which are piling up at a very fast rate indeed.

At the end of the fiscal year about to start these extra charges since the present government came to power will amount to the staggering sum of $878.6 million, and most of this is for extra interest. This huge amount is arrived at by including the minister's estimate for these two years, that is for this fiscal year and the next fiscal year; and since the Minister of Finance has practically always been on the conservative side in his estimates as far as interest charges are concerned I have no reason to think that this staggering sum will be any less; in fact it is likely to be more.

So far we have not paid one cent of this extra interest nor are we likely to do so in the foreseeable future. The point is that we have borrowed this money, and this debt on account of these extra interest charges is snowballing at an alarming rate, particularly since it is being compounded every six months at a high rate. The hon. member from Carleton, the parliamentary secretary to the minister, tries to salve his conscience by talking about the per capita debt. All I can say is that Canadian babies are not being born fast enough to help spread the debt among them so as to give any weight to his argument.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Timmins has raised an extremely important subject matter and one which has, of course, been extremely important for many years, even in the years preceding the time the Liberal government was forced into establishing a system of pensions in 1925 and 1926; forced, I may say, because of the high principles of the socialists in the house at that time, under the late Mr. Woodsworth, a man for whom everyone in a position to judge had the highest regard, respect and admiration.

Even though the legislation in those days was totally inadequate from the point of view of the needs of our elderly citizens it was, nevertheless, a step along the road toward security for these people in their later years. It was primarily in 1925-26, in that period of time when there was a minority government, a matter of political consideration which the late Mr. King had in mind. This was one of the conditions on which he and his government could stay in office. The C.C.F. group in this chamber was then under the leadership of Mr. Woodsworth. We cherish the letter Mr. King wrote; in fact it is framed and hangs in Mr. Woodsworth's house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The fact that nothing is said should not be taken as acquiescence, because these are not the facts.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member should pay more attention to what are facts. We all know his ability to twist facts so they no longer appear factual. The hon. member's many years of experience in the Liberal party enable him to do this effectively. The fact is that Mr. King introduced amendments to the old age pension legislation because of political considerations in order to have support to remain in office and—I am sure my hon. friend will not disagree with this—it was the old guard Tories in the Senate who turned it down. Surely the hon. member will not deny that that is a fact.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the only part of the hon. member's statement with which I agree.

Mr. Howard: I am sure of that; none the less both statements are true and factual. It is an historic fact that political considerations have always been instrumental in the adjusting of old age pensions, fixing the amount and governing the regulations relating thereto. Political considerations relating to the 1949 federal election resulted in the establishment in 1950 of the joint committee on old age security. When the universal plan, as it is called, was instituted in 1951 and became effective in January 1952, it was primarily as a result of political considerations relating to the 1949 federal election.

The niggardly $6 increase introduced by the Liberal party coincided with the election of 1957. Again the old age pensioners were used as political footballs, but this time the technique backfired. The Conservatives with a different conscience from that which they displayed in 1925 and 1926 made promises in this regard, which incidentally have not been kept. When the Conservatives came into office old age pensions again became a political matter. A $9 increase was introduced in November of 1957 by the minority government, again coinciding with an election. The promises about pension increases have not been kept. Let me refer to a statement made at page 411 of Hansard of October 25, 1957. I quote from one on whom the hon. member for Essex East will look as an outstanding authority whose word could never be doubted. I propose to quote the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A very high authority.

Mr. Howard: I am sure my hon. friend agrees with that statement. On that occasion the hon. gentleman quoted statements made by the present Prime Minister prior to the election. These are the words of the Prime Minister which the hon. member quoted:

> We believe the old age pension is inadequate. We intend, this September, to call together a parliament and there and then fix a fair and reasonable amount for the old age pensioners, indeed for the other pensioners, and also make provision for a formula whereby due alowance will be made in the future for the rising cost of living, providing that it continues.

The reference is to September of 1957. Of course the cost of living has continued to rise. Commenting on that statement the hon. member for Essex East said:

> That last provision was an essential part of the program.

The present Minister of National Health and Welfare then interjected, "That will be looked after", and following another statement by the hon. member for Essex East an unidentified hon. member interjected "Give us time". The Minister of National Health and Welfare said this matter would be looked after, but we have waited three and one half years and nothing has happened. Perhaps he has not had time to look after it. Old age citizens deserve dignified treatment and should not be treated as political footballs, as they have always been treated by the old line party governments over the years.

In the short session of 1957 the Conservatives took a different approach and employed another election gimmick, as a result of which we got the Clark report. That report has been in the hands of the minister for some years and is probably languishing in a dusty drawer in his desk. In response to our persistent inquiries the minister says he still has it under consideration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Study.

Mr. Howard: I venture to suggest the opinion that the minister, considering his great concern for political matters, will suddenly complete his study and come up with recommendations at a time that will coincide with the next general election, and again the old age pensioners will be used for political purposes. Our senior citizens have contributed greatly to the development and wealth of Canada over the years, and should not be treated in this shoddy manner.

A year ago I received some correspondence, as I am sure other hon. members did, from some senior citizens.

Mr. Chambers: Languishing in one of your dusty desk drawers?

Mr. Howard: I have a copy of a letter written to me under date of January 4, 1960 by the secretary of the federated legislative committee of the elder citizens' associations of Vancouver, enclosing a copy of a brief dated December 18, 1959 submitted to the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet. I shall not read all of the brief but it reads in part:

> We feel that the present pension of $55 should be increased to $80, at age 65 without a means test.

Since the last pension increase of $9 in 1957, many of our elder citizens were at once compelled to pay increased rents.

This is a fact. In the city of Vancouver rents went up immediately because of the increase in the pensions received by senior citizens. I continue:

The transport board at Ottawa—

I presume this is the board of transport commissioners, but the document refers to the transport board:

The transport board at Ottawa also permitted the B.C. Telephone Company to make two applications for increases in revenue within a period of six months in the same year, with the result that telephone rates in British Columbia were increased very substantially, and definitely meant a further hardship for the welfare of elderly people.

They make reference also to the so-called Clark report. This letter is dated December 18, 1959, and I use it only to substantiate the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has lost the Clark report somewhere in the bottom of a dusty drawer. He might finish the study of it to coincide with the next election.

I continue with the next paragraph:

We looked forward with hope and anticipation—

The elderly citizens are talking to the government and the Prime Minister. I continue:

We looked forward with hope and anticipation for your government to establish their policy with respect to the Clark report. While this very important document was tabled in the House of Commons on March 5, 1959, we have not learned, or observed, any action being taken by your government with respect to this very important and expensive document.

These words are just as true today as they were on December 18, 1959. Since that time I am sure all hon. members and the government have received similar briefs, lettters and references from elderly citizens who are humbly requesting that the government take into account their needs and their requirements and forget about the political aspect of the matter.

In the first place, it took the socialist point of view, against the tremendous opposition of the Conservative party and the Liberal party —except when they found it was politically expedient—to bring about old age pensions. It took the socialist philosophy in the first place to get this federal parliament and government into the field of old age pensions in the 1920's.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ridiculous.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend from Essex East says "ridiculous".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Howard: I would say to him with just as much force that he looks ridiculous in saying that factually true statements are ridiculous, even though he may want to prevent the country from knowing the truth about his party and how, like Moses, it also wandered for 40 years in the wilderness before it came up with a national health scheme. It was socialist philosophy that took into account the dignity that should be afforded to old people. It is regrettable to us that those—

Mr. Deschatelets: Your philosophy is gone with the wind.

Mr. Howard: My friend says that our philosophy is gone with the wind. There are no more windy opponents of our philosophy in this house than the hon. member for Essex East and his colleagues. All they do is talk, talk, talk, and no action is taken unless it happens to be politically expedient to do so. This is one of the things that Mackenzie King was noted for over the years. He was noted for being able to move just enough at election time to get re-elected. The late Mackenzie King has a great follower in the present Prime Minister, who wants to emulate him at every turn. Political expediency is the order of the day rather than social justice. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont agrees that the present Prime Minister is so like the late Mr. King that—

Mr. Deschatelets: No.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, it is difficult enough to deal with the interjections and comments from the other side of the house without at the same time having to keep an eye on those behind me.

Mr. Deschatelets: Try to be accurate.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend says "Try to be accurate". In so far as my references to the Liberal party are concerned I have never been more accurate. We regret very much, Mr. Chairman, that people in their later years, who have contributed their talents, skills and ability to build up this nation and make it what it is today, should have to endure in some third floor cold-water flat a sort of meagre starvation existence from a small pension granted to them with great gusto only at election time and only when it will have some bearing on how the individuals may vote in that particular election. This has been the history of the Liberals and Tories; it makes no difference. I said, so far as the old age pensioners were concerned, the order of the day was political expediency and not social justice. With this the socialist element disagrees entirely.

We would welcome at any time, Mr. Chairman, the opportunity to deal with the Conservative party on the basis of socialist principles versus the so-called free enterpriser. The so-called free enterprisers, the merchant trading classes, were not in favour of old age pensions and are still not in favour of them. They have come to accept them in the same way the Liberal party and the Conservative party finally came to accept them, as a matter of social right and social justice.

The Minister of Finance is not with us today, but I am sure that his parliamentary secretary is equally capable in the field of administration in the Department of Finance as the minister, perhaps even more so. I am sure that if the hon. member for Carleton had the portfolio in his hands he would not make the bungling errors that the Minister of Finance has made. With the ability of the hon. member for Carleton, the parliamentary secretary, his knowledge of and intimacy with the intricacies of the Department of Finance, and the cabinet, he should be able to explain to the house what is government policy on old age pensions, whether the government are going to come along with an increase, and whether they do not think it is long overdue. Three and a half years is a long time for people to exist on a $9 increase, which was eaten up the next day by rent increases, increases in telephone rates and in the cost of living, and the like.

Does the hon member not think it is time this message was carried to the members of the cabinet, two of whom are with us today? Does the hon. member not think it is time they sort of probed the depths of their conscience and looked back upon the promises they made in 1957 with regard to the cost of living and brought them into account? Do not wait until the next election, and then be accused of playing political football with our elderly citizens. Does the hon. member not think our elderly citizens deserve a bit more justice and a bit fairer treatment than have been accorded to them since 1926?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Peters: Certainly this is too good an opportunity to miss. Unfortunately last year the C.C.F. were not able to get a vote on the motion of the hon. member for Skeena which would have forced the government to take a stand on this important matter of old age pensions.

I should like to refer to what I consider a disgusting situation. We are being asked to vote interim supply today. A great deal was said about our holding it up, and other things along that line, yet today we find the minister does not even do parliament the courtesy of being here. He said there was a great rush to have interim supply voted, yet the minister is not in the house.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am sure the hon. member wants to be fair. He knows and the committee knows that the Minister of Finance is on a very important mission in Victoria today.

Mr. Peters: I did not know that. If the minister was going to be away he should have had the courtesy to say so last night when the request was made to bring this legislation forward today. I think the Minister of Finance is vitally involved in this matter of old age security. I think the time has come for us to give further consideration to the method of making old age security payments and the method of raising the money for such payments. In my opinion this is a responsibility of the Minister of Finance, in conjunction with those other ministers having responsibility for health and welfare in this country.

It has been generally agreed that there is a limit to the amount of payments to old age pensioners under the method we are following, and it is also generally agreed that there will have to be some change in the pension plan we now have with respect to the basis of making payments to our old age pensioners. This was recognized by the Prime Minister when he appointed Dr. Clark to investigate the whole matter of pensions not only in Canada, but also in the United States and other countries throughout the world where there are much better social security schemes that provide greater benefits to old age pensioners.

The former minister of national health and welfare had something to say about this matter, and it was not surprising to us that he took exception to the statement that it was not his party that was interested in old age pensions in the first place. Old age pensions were provided because pressure was brought to bear. I hope the same kind of pressure will be brought to bear after the next election and will force a complete change in social security programs for the Canadian people. As the hon. member for Timmins said, in 1958-59 we paid $5.41 per person per day to maintain prisoners in federal penitentiaries, while at the same time we were only paying our old age pensioners $1.80 a day. It seems to me something is wrong when we are paying more to keep people in penal institutions than we are paying our old age pensioners for the service they have rendered to our country during their years of employment. In addition, if an old age pensioner wants hospital or medical care he must either pay the premiums for such care out of his old age pension or be declared an indigent after signing a form setting forth that he is not able to make the necessary payments. By a means test he is then able to get medical and hospital care.

As I have said, this is a very opportune time to speak about this matter. There will shortly be an election. Old age pensioners have always been under the impression that the only time they can get an increase in their pensions is when there is an election, particularly so when the situation does not appear to be too favourable so far as the government in power is concerned. As we are going to have an election shortly, I think it is time the present government stated what they intend to do for the old age pensioners.

An hon. member says that it is time for a change, which is quite true. I suggest to the Canadian people that if they are going to make a change they should make a real one and elect a party that will do something about such matters as old age pensions; not on the basis of a hand-out but on the basis of the changing environment of our country, our changing needs and the changing attitude of our nation.

The Prime Minister received a petition from the national old age pensioners federation which reads as follows:

The national old age pensioners federation presents for your attention the following resolutions and respectfully requests that prompt and decisive action be taken by the federal government.

Whereas the high cost of necessities makes a decent, healthy living on the present pension impossible—in which the government appears to be in agreement—as shown by the raising of the civil servants' pensions, grants, wages, etc., thereby acknowledging the necessity but omitting the above group of senior citizens who have helped to make these raises possible.

The argument has been put forward that the country cannot afford to increase the pension, that in doing so the incentive for economy and thrift would be destroyed—this is not necessarily so, for every dollar paid out to these pensioners would be spent on goods and services, thereby creating a decent standard of living for the consumer. This is sound democracy and business economics which the federal government acknowledged in principle when the family allowance was established without any contributory scheme or means test.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: After I have finished reading this presentation of the old age pensioners. I continue:

It would not be absolutely necessary to place added burden on the taxpayer. It could be just a matter of allotting more finances to help the great need of the senior citizens, who are entitled to a just and rightful reward for a lifetime of toil and hardship in building this country up to the high economic standard it now enjoys. With the wealth and rich resources of Canada these aged citizens should not have to be employed, as it would greatly enhance the opportunities for advancement and employment for the younger generation.

Therefore we respectfully request that immediate attention be given by the government to alleviate this chronic situation and that the following brief be given prompt consideration.

1. That federal action be taken to raise the pension to $75 per month payable without a means test to all citizens reaching the age of 65 years.

2. That we urge the federal government to set up a national health and medical scheme, to include mental institutions and tuberculosis sanitoriums.

3. That the government be requested to amend the regulations under the disabled persons allowance act to provide for payment of allowances to persons judged by a medical referee board to be physically incapable of gainful employment.

4. That we request the federal and provincial governments to amend the Old Age Security Act and the Old Age Assistance Act to provide that those receiving the pensions be allowed to reside wherever they choose with no limit of time and still be eligible to receive such pension.

5. That decent and appropriate housing facilities be made available to senior citizens by providing an adequate number of specially designed housing units and that special N.H.A. financing opportunities be made available to older citizens for the improvement of homes which they own and live in.

6. That municipal, provincial and federal authorities be called upon to initiate programs for the social needs and personal security of senior citizens, including counselling, guidance and rehabilitation services and the development of adequate recreation and education facilities and services.

7. To amend the Old Age Assistance Act to increase the allowable income to $2,000 for married pensioners and $1,600 for single pensioners.

Respectfully submitted,

National Old Age Pensioners Federation,
Nathan W. Medd, president.

Mr. Pickersgill: The question I was going to ask the hon. member is not as relevant now as it would have been at the time I rose to ask it. However, perhaps he would remind the committee what government was in office and what party was in power when family allowances were put on the statute books, and what government was in office and what party in power on the last occasion on which an increase was made in these benefits.

Mr. Peters: Unfortunately no changes have been made in the legislation since, so it remains to the credit of the Liberal party that they put it on the statute books. I would also point out that I believe the measures they introduced were strongly supported by the party to which I belong, because they had been advocating them for many years.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member would permit another question. Has he ever looked at Hansard at the time family allowances were first proposed to see how enthusiastic the support of the party to which he belongs was. Because it was not very enthusiastic.

Mr. Peters: I am not familiar with that, but I am of the opinion that the C.C.F. has at no time opposed anything that was of social advantage to the Canadian people. I think the family allowance was only introduced as an additional argument. The clergy have also been interested in this matter. In the Montreal Gazette of February 24, 1960 appeared an article headed "Father Ambrose Pleads for Elderly". This article reads in part as follows:

A need for increase of the old age pension was stressed last night by Rev. Patrick J. Ambrose, director of the Catholic welfare bureau, at the annual meeting of the organization.

More financial aid for private agencies, strengthening of family life by enforcement of juvenile and adult disciplines, elimination of substandard housing and controls of the abuse of alcohol were also called for by Father Ambrose.

Further along the article reads:

On pensions, Father Ambrose called for an increase to $75 a month from the present $55 (with a means test at 65 years of age and as a matter of social security at 70). "Present costs of living indicate that our recommendations are modest if elderly people are to live in frugal comfort. Even a pension such as recommended would not enable the dependent elderly person to have extra money for clothing, medical care and other essential needs," the director declared.

Dr. Clark was appointed to conduct a study into this matter, and according to an article appearing in the Gazette of March 6, 1959 reported that Canada cannot afford pensions on the scale of pensions in the United States. This is probably the reason the Conservatives have been so quiet about this matter. There has been very little said by them regarding what they intend to do about a long range solution to this problem.

I would like to read a letter which appeared in the Northern News of December 3, 1957, writen by a Conservative named Foster Rice. Mr. Rice wrote as follows:

Dear Sir,

In your issue of November 25, I was requested to state the policy of the Progressive Conservative party on the matter of pensions for miners.

I have not heard of pensions to miners or any other workers being included in the policies of any political party.

I would like to inform this committee that three political parties were asked to submit letters in this regard, and at least one did propose a national program for pensions. The letter continues as follows:

However, speaking recently in Toronto, Mr. Diefenbaker said "The concern of this government is for the welfare of the average Canadian."

The Progressive Conservative government realizes that manpower is becoming less and less essential as more and better machines are designed to do the job. In view of this they realize that not only must the work week become shorter in order to supply employment for all but the years one works must become less. Therefore, in order for all the people to enjoy the standard of living this country should warrant, more and more social measures must be put into effect. Certainly, pensions, not only for miners, but for everyone will in time become a must, so the sooner they can be arranged the better.

Sincerely,

Foster Rice,
Haileybury.

I presume that Mr. Rice had spoken to the Prime Minister. Mr. Rice is an honest man and was probably promised, as we all have been promised, many things by the Prime Minister including increased pensions, shorter hours of work and a shorter number of years of work during each individual's lifetime, but nothing has come of these promises as yet.

Members of the Liberal party today have made several interjections pointing out what they would have done, and perhaps some of those members will speak on this subject and bring out their suggestions. However, I am doubtful that they will. They have not said very much in this regard for a long time. I will read you what one Liberal senator had to say regarding pensions, as quoted in a news letter issued by the department of economic development, Canadian Chamber of Commerce, dated December, 1957. This article adds the following:

There is a vast reservoir of human experience and wisdom in the Senate of Canada.

I would quote other Liberal members as well if they had made any pronouncements in regard to this matter, but I have been unable to find any to date.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the hon. member referring to now when he speaks of other Liberals not making pronouncements?

Mr. Peters: I am referring to old age pension increases.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the hon. member will take the trouble to look up the record he will find that many members of this party taking part in that debate did so because it is only natural in view of the fact that it has been the Liberal party that initiated whatever advances we have had in the field of old age pensions in this country.

Mr. Howard: Only after you were forced into it.

Mr. Peters: The last time this subject was brought to our attention was toward the end of the last session of parliament, and to the best of my personal knowledge there was no Liberal support given at that time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member need only look at the record to see.

Mr. Howard: It was only political expediency.

Mr. Peters: I am only stating now that our position is clear, and suggest that the attitude of a number of other people regarding increases to old age pensions is not clear. The article to which I referred, appearing in the news letter, reads as follows:

On November 20th, the Honourable T. A. Crerar, participating in the debate on the speech from the throne had a good deal to say about the Old Age Security Act which has been amended to increase the amount of pension to $55 per month from the $46 at which it was left by the previous administration. Mr. Crerar points out that by 1957, a new theory respecting old age pensions has developed. The theory is not that a pension is to aid elderly people to sustain themselves in comfort, but that they are entitled as of right to an amount sufficient to maintain them in comfort even though they have no resources of their own. Mr. Crerar points out that if we accept the principle that old age security payments should be based not on the need of older folk nor as an aid "but on the assumption that they are entitled to it as a right" then the incentive of people to work and save for themselves during their working years will be in large measure destroyed.

"The problem as I see it," said Senator Crerar, "is that we are steadily eroding away the desire on the part of individual citizens to make provision for their old age." He pointed out that in his view at least 75 per cent of the Canadian people are good, decent, hard working citizens who desire, above everything else, good, honest, economical government. It is the other 25 per cent to whom Canada's public men have been paying the most attention in the last ten or 15 years.

Mr. Crerar pointed to the fact that in 1939 he had an insurance policy which matured and which he left where it was. At present, he pointed out, the proceeds of that insurance policy would buy less than half of what it would have bought in 1939. His point was that there has been a steady erosion of the saving that hundreds of thousands of our people made over the years. "If we go on with these heavy expenditures and run into deficits, as we are almost certain to do, the Minister of Finance will have to show these when he brings down another budget. At all costs we should avoid feeding the fires of inflation. Nothing is more important than maintaining the integrity of our money. It may be a nice thing to give a pension on the theory that, well, we are helping the old people, but it is not going to be of any great value within two or three years if the pension is worn and eroded away by the inflationary process."

Some hon. members may not agree that old age pensions are of prime importance, but it is our national pension scheme at the present time, and is the sum total of our national social security. It seems to me that it is the right of those individuals who have supported this country over the years to have a decent standard of living now.

I would like to place on the record a C.C.F. plan regarding pensions that was adopted at the national convention. This plan is as follows:

The C.C.F. believes that the present $55 flat rate old age pension is totally inadequate to accommodate the needs of Canada's senior citizens under the economic and social conditions in which we live today. Higher prices for food, clothing and shelter, the increase in living essentials brought about by the changed living conditions of today, underline all too clearly the inability of the present old age pension system to meet the requirements of our retired elderly citizens.

[Mr. Peters.]

The C.C.F. proposes:

A basic pension of $75 a month payable to all at age 65 without a means test;

A contributory old age insurance plan to provide pensions over and above the basic pension and thus prevent the drastic drop in living standards which many people now suffer on retirement. The main features of this plan are as follows:

1. It would provide the vast majority of Canadians with a pension of approximately one half of their income on retirement;

2. Contributions would be made by employees and employers, and the plan would be available to farmers and other self-employed people desiring coverage;

3. Contributions would be based on, and the pension would be related to, individual incomes up to a reasonable maximum;

4. Those now enlisted in existing superannuation schemes which meet the standards set by the national scheme would have the choice of remaining under those schemes or of transferring their equity to the national plan, and individuals could still insure for additional benefits under other pension plans;

5. Pensions would be available at age 65, but an individual would have the right to defer taking his pension if he continued to work and benefits would be adjusted upward accordingly;

6. In the case of death of the insured, benefits would be transferred to the surviving spouse, or children up to the age of 21;

7. The plan would enable persons to move from job to job without loss of pension rights and would help to avoid discrimination in the hiring of older workers;

8. Contributions into the national pension fund would provide one source of investment funds for carrying out public developments in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, two aspects of this matter are very important to the Canadian people. First, in this way we would establish a pension plan which would give the old age pensioner the right, not by gift or anything else, to receive a pension of $75 a month when he retires. Second, this plan would follow the social security schemes which are in use in most of the countries of Europe at the present time. It would allow an industrial employee to retire with a pension of at least half of the highest five-year average of his earnings during his working lifetime. This worker would be able to retire on a pension of half that income for the rest of his life. This plan would also provide a large fund, thus eliminating the problem that Canadian governments, both Liberal and Conservative, have faced in dealing with this matter.

I wish to refer to the action taken in connection with a booklet concerning vested pension rights. I think the action taken in this matter is a disgrace to the Canadian public. I refer to a publication that was presented to the Canadian people in 1954. This publication was issued by the income tax department of this country under the then minister of national revenue, and it concerned a pension plan under the Income Tax Act. This document is not in the library and it is not in the Department of National Revenue. Why? The answer is that it was withdrawn. It was found it was going to cost International Nickel upwards of approximately $300 million to establish vested rights, and this was embarrassing to the previous government.

Mr. Nowlan: That statement is absolutely false and untrue.

Mr. Peters: Could I ask the minister in what respect it is false?

Mr. Nowlan: In every respect.

Mr. Peters: This document is not available in the Department of National Revenue or the public library. I received the document from an hon. member who was a member of this house a number of years ago. It was widely distributed, and I should be happy to give a copy to any hon. member who may wish one. The Conservative party say this is not true. In 1959 they issued information bulletin No. 14. This has also been withdrawn because it contains the same fault. It means that the companies will have to establish vesting rights, which they do not want to establish. The minister's department has informed me that the only way this will ever be accomplished is for a national fund to be established where the government will take the responsibility of maintaining the fund, holding the money and acting as the vesting agency for the pension plans.

These other plans have not been successful because we have not been willing to bring them under national control and devise a national pension plan. Until we are interested in doing this we will have to exist with individual plans worked out by individual companies where the vested rights run from full rights to no rights at all, no matter what is the length of the pension plan.

It seems to me that the Canadian people have now reached a sufficient state of maturity in the operation of pension plans that the plan I have outlined should be put into effect. There are thousands and thousands of cases where people are willing, capable and able to implement a completely national, portable pension plan which will take into account complete vested rights and give these rights to the Canadian people. These provisions would apply to all people, including wives who are not in a position to earn an income, those employed in industry or those who are self-employed. If a national pension plan were put into effect, payments would be made by these people on a contributory basis and we would finally establish a completely national pension plan that would have all the benefits of portability and all the benefits of a minimum basic pension.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to delay the passing of this interim supply motion. I have listened with great interest to the display of the C.C.F. group and their intentions. They say they are going to approach the whole problem of pensions. I come from the province of Saskatchewan. We have a socialist government in that province, and I should like to say that the provincial government are paying approximately 16,000 people supplementary payments in addition to their old age pension cheques.

The Deputy Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. I must advise the hon. member that we are discussing federal payments and not provincial payments.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, what I am saying is in relation to pensions. I should like to point out that the C.C.F. group is suggesting higher payments, and so on, to old age pensioners. I should like to put on record that our socialist government in Saskatchewan are paying to approximately 16,000 people amounts that range from $2.50 to $20 a month; 7,000 people receive only $2.50 per month.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Lower supplementary payments than other provinces.

Mr. Rapp: Much lower. There are only 49 people who receive the full amount, namely $20 a month.

Mr. Pearson: This is socialism in action.

Mr. Rapp: I should also like to point out that only 1,261 people receive $5 a month in supplementary assistance.

The Deputy Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. I must once again remind the hon. member that we are discussing interim supply here and not provincial payments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, surely the hon. gentleman is justified in making these remarks. We are having a discussion on old age pensions and the C.C.F. party has taken a particular position. The hon. member is now trying to show that in the case of the only socialist government, the only C.C.F. government, in this country the pension payments are of such and such an order. I should think that if it were justifiable for hon. gentlemen to take up most of the time this morning—and I do not complain about that—in discussing pensions, an hon. member from Saskatchewan who knows the situation and who can tell us what the C.C.F. government is doing there should not be denied that opportunity.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to suggest that the point of order you have raised is well taken. With regard to the point mentioned by the hon. member for Essex East, if we were discussing labour relations, for example, I am sure he would object most strongly if his party's position were taken as being that outlined by the provincial premier of Newfoundland. I think if you are consistent in one place you have to be consistent in another, and that your ruling should therefore be supported.

Mr. Pickersgill: A word on the point of order. This repudiation of the premier of Saskatchewan is most interesting.

Mr. Argue: No repudiation.

Mr. Pickersgill: But my hon. friend from Humboldt-Melfort, who does not take the time of the house very often and usually has something to say when he does, is seeking to reply to a line of argument which Your Honour did not interrupt when another hon. member followed it. Just the other day, because the Leader of the Opposition made some passing reference to a sad event which took place in this city last week, hon. members were permitted to reply to that, and I suggest that my hon. friend from Humboldt-Melfort should be treated in exactly the same way.

Mr. Argue: On that point of order—

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair has made up its mind. The Chair did not object to members talking about what certain parties did on a federal level, but the Chair does not wish to permit, and will not permit, the bringing in of provincial situations in this discussion. Hon. members can talk on the federal level as much as they wish, but not on the provincial level.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I speak on the point of order again? With great respect I suggest that Your Honour would wish to consider your ruling carefully. It is not possible to discuss old age pensions in this country without bringing in the provinces, because the old age assistance scheme depends on contributions made by the provincial governments as well as the federal government. We pay a large percentage of the cost of old age assistance. The provinces, including Saskatchewan, pay a minor part, and in respect to that scheme the provinces provide supplemental payments. All the hon. gentleman from Humboldt-Melfort is now doing is indicating that an analysis of supplemental payments paid by the provinces in western Canada shows that the supplemental allowances paid by the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan are lower than those of any other western province.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mr. Argue: On the point of order, the hon. member for Essex East has not only made a contribution on the point of order before you, Mr. Chairman, but he has endeavoured to challenge your ruling by speaking about the point of order after, I understood, that ruling had been made. I want to say that as far as I am concerned I would be quite happy if you would reverse your ruling and allow the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort to continue giving the house very important information as to the supplemental payments made in Saskatchewan on a very wide basis. Then some of us could point out that the record of Liberal provincial governments is the worst in Canada and has always been that way. If a Liberal provincial government pays a supplement—and I am not aware that one does—it is certainly something which has been done in very recent days, because the Liberals have held the record for many years of being the only governments at the provincial level which never make supplementary payments. I think it would then be only fair to point out the important health benefits now being paid in Saskatchewan—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: Senior citizens' housing, and so on.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair is now more convinced than ever that the ruling made was correct. Shall the resolution carry?

An hon. Member: No.

The Deputy Chairman: The Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Argue: If I could have the floor until one o'clock I should be obliged. I have another engagement at 2.30.

Mr. Pearson: Unfortunately I am not at all sure whether I can be here either. I shall try to arrange to be here for this important debate. However, because of the fact that hon. gentlemen to my right have taken up practically all the morning on this important issue—

Mr. Argue: We do not apologize for that. We are the people fighting for the pensioners. Just because the Liberal party has been asleep—

Mr. Pearson: That is another example of the normal approach of hon. members in that socialist group. They have, of course, arrogated to themselves exclusive interest in, and concern and credit for, everything that has been done in this country in this field.

Mr. Argue: Just the major things.

Mr. Pearson: That is their normal approach to matters of this kind. It is easy for them to take that approach because they have no expectation of ever being called to office and to a position where they would have to discharge in responsible action some of the words they utter in this house. That makes their statements not only exaggerated and unrealistic but very easy to make. They have been doing this for a long time over the years. We are accustomed to it, and we do not pay much attention to it.

Mr. Argue: That is why you landed where you are.

Mr. Pearson: The fact that hon. members of that group have again been expressing this attitude in words is perhaps the most important evidence that they are really not expecting to have to put into effect the words they utter.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition would permit me to ask a question.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I think so, in view of the fact that the hon. member is unable to attend at 2.30.

Mr. Argue: Does the Leader of the Opposition not realize that one of the main reasons he sits on this side of the house was the failure of the former minister of finance, Mr. Walter Harris, to do more than provide an increase of $6 a month; consequently he became known as "Six-buck Walter"?

Mr. Pearson: One of the reasons only eight gentlemen sit in that corner is that the people of Canada saw through their wild and irresponsible statements. May I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Nowlan: In view of the fact that this is only interim supply and it was understood that some progress would be made, might I ask if there would be any objection to our continuing for five or ten minutes and completing our consideration of this matter? The discussion would indicate that this, perhaps, would be a natural procedure.

Mr. Pearson: We are quite agreeable to doing that.

Mr. Howard: Before we agree to some open ended thing, let us set five or ten minutes, otherwise we shall be here until 2.30.

Mr. Nowlan: If we could agree to spend another five or ten minutes on this—

Mr. Pearson: I am quite agreeable to concluding my remarks in ten minutes—

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, at one o'clock I was dealing with some points made in connection with the pension matters raised by our hon. friends of the C.C.F. party, and I should like to say just a few more words on this subject. I do not intend to hold up this interim supply very long, but because this matter has been raised, and because of the terms in which it was raised, it is necessary for us to put ourselves on record in regard to such a vitally important matter as pensions.

The record of our party on this matter is not to be found so much in the words used in the House of Commons—though it may be found there, too—as in the legislation of this country over the last 25 years. That is more important than words.

I recognize that my hon. friend who preceded me attempted to point out—and this has been attempted many times—that the social security program which the Liberal party is proud to have carried out over the years had been forced on us. The answer to that rather ridiculous charge is to be found in the fact that this program was initiated long before there was a C.C.F. party in existence in this chamber. The hon. member for Timiskaming, of course, has attempted to disprove the record, and to throw some suspicion on our desire to continue this record and expand and enlarge it, by quoting from an hon. member of the Liberal party, namely Senator Crerar, who over the years has done a great deal for the party and for the country.

I have what I am sure the hon. member will consider to be an even more impressive authority to use against him in contradicting some of the things he said this morning because I could, if I so desired, use his own references to this matter last year when we were debating the principle of pensions and social security and when he said at that time, in contradiction to what he and his hon. friends have said this morning, that he was not wedded to any particular amount in regard to old age pensions and that he thought perhaps $75 a month at this time and in the present circumstances might be too high.

Those were the words used by the hon. member for Timiskaming when discussing this matter last year in this chamber, and if he reads Hansard of July 19, 1960 he will find a reference to that effect. I thought the hon. member at that time was adopting a very reasonable and responsible attitude reflecting a combination of economic reality and strong humanitarian considerations. It is that combination which characterizes the approach of the Liberal party to this question. We believe and have always believed—and we have shown our belief in action—that humanitarian considerations are to be given first priority in the field of social security but that these must always be reconciled to fiscal and economic considerations as well.

Perhaps I may be permitted to quote from a distinguished authority in this field, namely myself when I spoke in a debate on this subject on July 19, 1960 as reported at page 6510 of Hansard of that year—

Mr. Nowlan: A natural modesty.

Mr. Pearson: —and when I said, referring to the Liberal party:

> We also recognize, while keeping in mind economic and fiscal considerations, that there are social considerations which are equally important, indeed more important, than fiscal considerations. We know that pension schemes and pension levels and social security programs generally can never be fixed but that they have to be adjusted and changes made as conditions in the country change.

That quotation indicates our position on this important matter. My hon. friends opposite in the Conservative party before and during elections have been lavish in promises in the field of social security and more specifically on the question of old age pensions. The Prime Minister is on record—and he has not as far as I know denied the record—as saying, and I quote from the statement he made on April 19, 1957, that "old age pensions should be high enough to meet needs".

That is an important and categorical statement. It would be very interesting if we had time—and I do not propose to take up the time of the committee to do it—to relate that categorical statement that pensions should be high enough to meet needs to what actually has been done by the government since it has had responsibility in the field of old age security.

In dealing with this point we think particularly of the Clark report. We think of the promises of the government to introduce with a minimum of delay a scheme of contributors pensions for old age security. We think particularly of the appointment after the election of a commission to look into this matter and we think of the Prime Minister's instructions to the first chairman of that commission to have his report ready in four months. The chairman of that commission, unable to do this kind of job within four months, resigned and so great was the haste in this matter he was succeeded at once by another chairman, Professor Clark, who did make a report on this very important question in March, 1959.

Since that time we have been unable to secure any information in this committee about the implementation of that report or the government's intentions in that regard except to get periodically, after questioning by my friend the hon. member for Essex East, a reply from the minister concerned to the effect that he is still studying the matter. The hon. gentleman has been studying the recommendations of this report since March, 1959.

Mr. Pickersgill: He is a very studious fellow.

Mr. Pearson: So much, then, for the progress made by the government in implementing its own promises in this field.

The position of the Liberal party on this matter has been made clear in this chamber on many occasions. It was made clear in the debate which took place on July 19, 1960. I do not think I can do better than put on the record the motion we moved at that time because it established our position then and it is our position today. This particular amendment to the motion to go into supply was repudiated, rejected and turned down by the majority in this house. Our amendment, which is found at page 6511 of Hansard, of 1960 reads as follows:

> That in the opinion of this house the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation to provide, in co-operation with the provinces, for increases in the old age pensions to meet special hardships endured by the recipients of old age security and old age assistance; to extend old age assistance to unmarried women and widows at 60 years of age; for the vesting of benefits in industrial pensions plans; and for a national contributory pension scheme, co-ordinated with existing provisions for retirement and old age security based on federal government contributions, as well as on contributions of employees, employers, and self-employed.

This is definite and concrete, Mr. Chairman. I think it is a very progressive program in this field. We have laid the program down in the House of Commons. It has been rejected in the House of Commons by the government, but it remains our position. I do not think I need detain the committee any longer, except to repeat that this program remains our position in this field.

Mr. Argue: We in the C.C.F.-New Party group have initiated this debate because we take the position that old age pensions are too low today and are a disgrace to the country; they should be increased. We have not had any reply from the government. We should like to have a reply as to their policy and what they intend to do about old age pensions because certainly it has beeen made crystal clear to the country that the Conservative party understands that old age pensions are too low but it has not yet decided to do anything about them. We would certainly be interested in learning of their stand.

We think that the problem of old age pensions falls into two categories. First of all, there is need for an immediate increase in the pension that is now paid, one that will overcome some of the hardships that undoubtedly exist among old age pensioners in our country. Second, we believe a comprehensive social security system should be introduced to provide for retirement pensions based on the general average income and standard of living of Canadian people. We think that if such an old age security system were put into effect immediately it would have the advantage not only of providing much needed assistance to people on retirement but would do a great deal to stimulate the purchasing power of the Canadian nation. We suggest that such a plan is sound in every respect and that those people who are working today, those who are self-employed in small businesses and farmers should be permitted to pay into such a plan during the period of their income, and that at the retirement age they should receive a pension in keeping with the standard of living of other Canadians.

We believe that such a scheme should receive contributions from the ordinary citizen, the employee and the self-employed person. Contributions should be made by the employer—that is, by industry—and there should be contributions by the federal government. From contributions made to such a plan on a three-way basis would come the funds from which an adequate pension should be paid. I see no reason why such a plan could not pay to the beneficiaries concerned pensions of $100 to $200 a month. This would certainly not be high in relation to the average national income of the country. It should be sufficiently high so that the people who retire could look forward to a standard of living that was at least from 50 per cent to 75 per cent of the general income standards of working Canadians.

We think the time has come when further action should be taken in the social security field by providing increases in family allowances. After all, the family allowance legislation has been on the statute books since 1944. There has been a tremendous increase in the cost of living since that time. The index has risen from 75 to 126. To restore the purchasing power of the family allowance cheque, to say nothing about adding to its real value, would require an increase in the first category of payment of $6 a month to $10 a month, and in the category of $8 a month to $13 a month. Once the Canadian nation has decided that a given social security system shall be provided—in this instance, of family allowances it was decided back in 1944—parliament should not allow inflation to eat away and tear down the value of such payments. I repeat, to restore the value of family allowances increases of this size would be required. I think that initially family allowance legislation was on a sound basis. Its purpose was to enable the parents of families to be better able to care for their needs, and this is the kind of program that is of benefit to the Canadian nation as a whole. This change, together with the old age security system that I have been speaking about, would provide a vast improvement in our present social security legislation.

There is a crying need for a system of portable pensions in Canada. After all, the present system or lack of system whereby certain pensions are provided by certain industries—and the pensions vary from industry to industry and are tied to an industry—means that a person in middle life is very reluctant to transfer his employment even if he is certain that at that time he would get a definite increase in income. He is reluctant because very often he loses his pension rights. To a certain degree we have tied or bound employees to industries which provide pensions. By allowing this system to grow up without an over-all social security plan we have contributed to the immobility of labour because, if persons should decide to make a transfer, they have to suffer a very severe loss in their pension rights. To overcome these difficulties we are suggesting now that there should be such an old age security system.

We have listened with a great deal of interest to the Leader of the Opposition. He says his policy this year is the same as it was last year. You can read the policy of last year but you cannot tell what it means. They would have an increase for special hardship cases. They would put a means test on the existing means test where it exists.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He did not say anything about that.

Mr. Argue: They say special hardship cases can have another blood test. They would put them through the wringer. It took the members of the C.C.F. party in this house, fighting day in and day out over a long period of time, finally to convince the government of the day that they should, at least in a partial way, do away with the iniquitous means test. Apparently once again the Leader of the Opposition would impose the means test in what he calls special hardship cases. I have in my hand the evidence taken before the joint committee on old age security in 1950. At that time a very important witness had this to say about the scheme as it was then projected and the methods of financing it. I quote from page 1038 of the proceedings:

In conclusion, then, it seems evident that the tripartite scheme of financial social security—

The one we have.

—apart from its unethical nature, is in conflict with our post-war objectives of full employment.

That was a head-on assault against the Liberal scheme of the day. It was called a tripartite scheme of financial social security that was inadequate in nature and in conflict with our post-war objectives of full employment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who was that? Was it the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Argue: The man who made that statement was none other than Mr. Maurice Lamontagne, professor of social economics, faculty of social science, Laval University, who since has gone to his reward and has been given the very eminent position of chief adviser to the official opposition.

An hon. Member: A great man.

Mr. Argue: Somebody among the Liberals says "a great man". That was certainly some advice. We would like to know from the Leader of the Opposition today if it is the stand of the Liberal party that the scheme introduced by that party was of an unethical nature, did not fit into the general scheme of our future fiscal policy and was in conflict with our postwar objectives of full employment. I do not know whether the money being raised in this unfair, unethical and discriminatory manner is a reason that has contributed finally to widespread unemployment. It would be very interesting to know Mr. Lamontagne's views on that question.

We have heard from the Leader of the Opposition and they have no policy. Our position today is clear that there should be an increase of $20 a month in old age pensions. Just a few days ago representatives from the city of Toronto came to Ottawa to ask that such an increase be provided. They pointed out to the federal government that people who have to exist on $55 a month and pay rent out of that sum are suffering from malnutrition and starvation in a very real sense.

We suggest that now is the time for action. Now is the time for the government to provide an increase in old age pensions. We are putting this suggestion forward before the mother budget is brought down at this session in the hope that there will be some reference in it to this very important issue. There is no question that the government realizes that there is a need. Here is the Clark report. The government knows that something should be done about the old age security system. They established a royal commission and they have been studying the report of the commission for two years. One can only wonder whether the government are going to act or whether they are going to set up another royal commission to study the Clark report. I hear that is what is going to happen with respect to the railway issue. I hear that there is going to be a royal commission to look into the report of the conciliation board. I hope the government is not going to set up another royal commission to examine Robert M. Clark's report.

We are taking the opportunity at this time to raise by way of grievance a subject that we think is of great national importance and of great urgency. We are very much disappointed that we have not received assistance and support from the Liberal party in the simple, basic proposition that now is the time for an increase of $20 a month in old age pensions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the speech by the hon. member for Assiniboia to which we have just listened cannot be regarded as the most lucid statement he has made in this chamber. It was indeed very difficult to follow the hon. member as he moved with such uncertainty from subject to subject. He did not give evidence of an appreciation of his subject, as one would have thought would be the case of a man and a party with such pretensions to protagonism for legislation in the field of social welfare. Indeed, the background to what he has said was provided this morning by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort who pointed out what the record is in the field of old age assistance in the only province with a C.C.F. government.

Mr. Argue: Excellent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): So far as supplementary old age assistance payments by the provinces are concerned the fact is that the contribution of the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan is less than that of any other western province.

Mr. Argue: And more than any Liberal province.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The way for any political party to show the good faith it attaches to its proposals is to indicate what it has done whenever that particular philosophy has been given an opportunity to produce. The hon. member in attacking the Leader of the Opposition today neglected to recall that whatever social security program we have in this country was placed on the statute books by a Liberal government. We owe the old age pensions of 1925 and the eight different amendments since that date, with the exception of the amendment brought in by the present government three years ago—

Mr. Pickersgill: Between two elections.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to Liberal governments. We owe the establishment of old age assistance, blindness allowances, disability pensions, unemployment insurance, the veterans charter, hospital insurance and family allowances to governments that were Liberal in character, notably the governments of Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. St. Laurent. Notwithstanding what the hon. member who has just spoken has said, the fact is that every single act of social welfare in this country on federal account has been placed there by Liberal governments. When we went out of office in 1957—

Mr. Howard: The best thing that ever happened.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): It will never happen to you because you will never have the opportunity to govern.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —we had produced a social welfare program which in its total dollar value represented a greater total percentage of the national budget than that of any other country in the western world save one. When hon. gentlemen talk about their protagonism for social welfare, let them not forget, as the Leader of the Opposition reminded us this morning, their hesitancy in the matter of family allowances. No one denies that Mr. J. S. Woodsworth was a great humanitarian. I sat with him in this house and knew him as well as any hon. member in the house. But that does not mean that because he had generous social views he is to be regarded, having sat in the opposition, as the author of any of these plans.

The fact is that when family allowances were first proposed in the industrial relations committee around 1926 Mr. Woodsworth was opposed to the concept. That is a matter of record. It is not to be forgotten too, of course, that the members of the Conservative party were opposed to the proposal of a system of family allowances.

Mr. Pickersgill: A political bribe, they called it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): By a former leader of the party and one-time premier of Ontario it was referred to as a political bribe. So when hon. gentlemen talk about their views on social welfare, and when members of the government consider the contributions they have made in that field, and notably when one takes into account the kind of speech made by the Prime Minister last Friday at the Tory conclave, one can say that only by one's accomplishments can one appropriately be judged. In Canada it is the Liberal party which will lead the way in the field of responsible social reform in this country. The record is there to show this.

One can enter into competition as to what amount the pension should be. I think it is regrettable in our public life for any political party—men who have never held office but who look for the opportunity to do so—to promote a competitive race in the promotion of social benefits. I say that any political party that wants to be entrusted with the confidence of the Canadian people must demonstrate in its advocacy of particular social measures that it has a responsible appreciation of all that is involved. That is something that I regret I cannot say, has been done, having listened to the speech just made by the member for Assiniboia who aspires to be prime minister of this country.

As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out today, the fact is, that the Liberal party, having this record in the field of social welfare, recognizes that, with the existence and emergence of new problems in our industrial society, modifications have to be made, and increases have to be provided for in social benefits and in the field of old age pensions, family allowances and disability pensions; that new schemes have to be embarked on to meet new situations as they arise, and that these can be met possibly in the light of the nation's capacity to meet those obligations. One should not forget that all of these measures have to be provided for out of one source only; and that source, of course, is the hard work of the Canadian people. With that consideration in mind the Liberal party has put forward, as the Leader of the Opposition has reminded us, the program of the 1958 convention which continues to represent our position. The leader of the C.C.F. party failed to note what the Leader of the Opposition has said in that regard.

First of all, as to a further step in the implementation of health insurance against the hazards which can be provided for by medical care insurance, we do not believe that we should deal with this matter by way of a royal commission. Indeed, if we were going to do this by way of a royal commission we would not have taken three months to announce the personnel of it. The government announced the royal commission in the middle of November. All we have had from the Prime Minister or the government is the designation of a chairman, and no further progress has been made. One is left in doubt as to when this royal commission is going to be finally selected and when it is going to begin its operations.

We also believe in extending unemployment insurance because of illness. We believe in the expansion of pensions for disabled persons to include the partially disabled. As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, we believe in the extension of old age assistance to unmarried women and widows 60 years of age. We believe in the improvement of family allowances with special reference to family allowances to students until they have attained the age of 18 years. We believe in the introduction of new pension plans with provisions for early vesting of benefits so that if an employee changes his employment he will retain the advantage of pension contributions previously made by him and his employer, so that in effect the pension follows the man. The leader of the C.C.F. party is by no means the spokesman for the only group that believes in portable pensions. Because the provinces have jurisdiction in this matter, I would call my hon. friend's attention to the lead of the Ontario Liberal party with regard to portable pensions.

Finally, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, we believe in the immediate consideration of a national contributory pension scheme co-ordinated with the existing provisions for retirement of old age security, the pensions to begin at age 65 and based upon the federal government contributions as well as contributions of employees, employers and the self-employed.

I doubt very much if the hon. member for Assiniboia appreciated fully what he was talking about when he referred to a contributory plan. He first of all confused it with a means test. He gave one the impression that he had that uncertainty of touch in this field that he sometimes alleges I have in another one. I can only say this with regard to this scheme. Having in mind the fact that we now have a universal system, and having in mind the fact that the federal government of the day in 1951 embarked upon the only universal old age security system to be found anywhere, we believe the time now has arrived when, in the light of experience and practice in the United States, we might well give consideration to supplementing our existing universal system with a scheme of contributory pensions that will provide for amounts relating to the contribution that will far exceed anything like the present basic amount of the old age pension. I think it is important that we should understand what this scheme is. It is because the hon. member for Assiniboia obviously does not understand that I feel I should like to say something about this today.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

First of all, as the Leader of the Opposition reminded us, the government did promise the Canadian people in 1958 that we were going to have a scheme of old age pensions based upon a full contributory principle, along the lines generally known to apply in the United States. The fact is that since the election the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who does not take part in this debate, has had in his control the recommendations and the assessment of this problem by Professor Clark, but the government refuses to give the house any indication of what its intentions are. The minister said only ten days ago, in answer to a question of mine, that he was continuing to study the Clark report. I called his attention to the fact that last June he told me that he had completed his study, but that the government had not yet decided upon a course of action based on that study and the recommendations which he would, at some stage, make to his colleagues. In the absence of action there can be no justification for the government of the day having authorized the expenditure of money that went into producing this report, and there can be no justification for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or for the Prime Minister not telling this house what the government policy is with regard to the adoption in Canada of a system similar to the old age survivors security system in the United States. Last Friday the Prime Minister promised that at the appropriate moment something would be done about pensions. What is the appropriate moment? Is the Prime Minister waiting until the eve of an election before announcing this? Is he hoping once again, notwithstanding the admitted need that now exists, to take advantage, during the course of an election, of a proposal in this field in order to enhance his own political position and that of his party? If that is the course being taken by the Prime Minister, I say that it is not a proper course, because if there was need in 1958 that need certainly exists today.

I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is not here today, what decision the government has arrived at and what decision the Minister of National Health and Welfare has arrived at. Is the minister now satisfied that the suggestion in the Clark report, that this would be too costly a scheme for Canada, really represents the government's policy? That is not the position this party takes.

It is to be noted that the proposal put forward and referred to today by the Leader of the Opposition is one that goes further than the old age security contributory system in the United States. That system in the United States is based exclusively on contributions from employee and employer. No government contribution whatsoever is made under that system in the United States. However, because of our regard for the existing need we have included in our proposal contributions from the federal government also.

This problem of providing assistance for our senior citizens is one of the great problems facing us. Almost one million people in Canada, out of our 18 million people, are 70 years of age and over. Almost one million people are now in receipt of old age security universal pensions. Some 300,000 people between the ages of 65 and 70 are receiving old age assistance. Our population is ageing, and what is now a great problem in terms of numbers will continue to be a challenging problem. There is great need in the case of many of our people. This is one of the problems of this industrial age in which we live. We can meet it out of the present universal system by adding to the present cost of something like $600 million almost twice that amount in less than a decade.

Because of this consideration I think we must recognize the inevitability of superimposing on the existing old age universal system something that is in principle not unlike the system in the United States. I suggest that the government has been remiss in waiting all this time to take the house into its confidence with regard to its view on what should be done about the facts elicited in the Clark report. The government is certainly treating parliament with great disrespect and it is treating the people of Canada with very little respect when it causes a report to be prepared during the course of an election and keeps it under cover for two and a half years, giving no indication whatsoever as to what it proposes to do with it except to hint at political rallies what it might do as the time approaches for holding an election.

I think that for the Prime Minister and this government to play with the old people of our country in this way indicates the real concern the government has for their plight, particularly when we bear in mind what the Prime Minister said on February 12, 1958. This is what the present Prime Minister said, as reported in the Globe and Mail of February 13, 1958:

> —Mr. Diefenbaker took his social security program one significant step further. Until now he has promised only a study of the U.S. social security system.
> Tonight, he pledged: "We will bring about in Canada a rounded and effective contributory social security plan over and above—and I emphasize this—that which already exists".
>
> Such a plan would provide Canadians with social security payments in addition to the $55 now paid under the old age pension plan.
> Referring to the report his government has ordered, he said he had asked that it be made within the next few months so the government would be in a position to have parliament consider the expanded plan.

That was during the course of an election campaign. The Prime Minister led the people of Canada to believe that if they elected this government we would have in this country a system of old age security based upon and similar to the contributory system existing in the United States. That is what those words imply.

The article in the Globe and Mail continues:

> He reviewed the social security accomplishments of the past few months—

The Prime Minister gave the impression that all the existing social welfare laws had been placed upon the statute books of this country by a Conservative government. Except in debate, we have no way of trying to persuade the government to fulfil its assurances. We have no way of trying to bring home to the government the importance of implementing its assurances other than by debate in this house. We cannot force the government to reply, but the Minister of National Health and Welfare should be replying to these questions today. The Prime Minister, who made these assurances, ought to reply to this matter today.

Mr. Nowlan: Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone says "Nonsense". I say that under our parliamentary system, when a prime minister goes to the people and makes a promise, he ought to indicate to the Canadian people and to parliament, certainly three years afterwards, why he has not implemented that promise.

Mr. Pearson: A second-class promise.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend has said it is nonsense. Where is the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Why is he not here now to tell us exactly the results of the study that has been made with regard to this problem and this program that was projected before the Canadian people in the last federal election campaign?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was just an election promise.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have not been able to persuade the government to make any definite decision one way or the other in this field. I think we ought to clearly affirm, when the opportunity is given, our criticism of the government for not coming to any decision and that we ought to restate what we have done. We should again state our objectives in the field of social welfare.

We have stated our objectives today in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. We may not be able to realize all those objectives at once. These programs are very far-reaching in their consequences as related to situations which exist at the moment. If the Prime Minister had taken that kind of attitude during the election campaign and had said, "This is our objective; this is something we hope to do", that would have been understandable; but he should not have said, "This is something we are going to do very shortly", which I suggest is indicated in his statement. If the Prime Minister had said that, one would not have the same criticism to make.

The other day the mayor of Toronto came to this city to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister was quoted as saying that the kind of consideration being given to this question would involve the application of a system based upon eligibility, which in turn would be based upon need. That is nothing more than a means test. It should not be forgotten that in 1951 parliament decided to bring in a universal old age security system without a means test. It is interesting to note that the recommendation for that policy was made by a parliamentary committee whose chairman at that time was the present premier of the province of Quebec, Mr. Jean Lesage.

Parliament and the government accepted this report. I think it would be very difficult for the government to embark upon a new system that ran contrary to the attempt to eliminate a means test in the application of old age pensions in this country. If the government feels it cannot provide an extension to the existing universal system, then the provinces and the federal government ought to give consideration to the fact that something must be done immediately to meet the kind of case which was presented to the government by the mayor of Toronto. That could be done by the federal government in the interim along with the provinces. But over the long term, and as a basic program, I think we must recognize that it is desirable to adopt in this country the features of the old age survivor system in the United States, based, as it is, on a system of contributions from pensioners and employers with added contributions from the state.

If contributions from the state are not provided we shall encounter the same experience as that which was encountered in the United States when the scheme was first established there. It took 18 years before any real benefits were paid at all under the old age security system as conceived in the United States some 22 years ago. If we are to provide a system which gives immediate benefit to the people who will have made contributions, the only way in which that could be done would be by adopting the course we pursue in the case of unemployment insurance where one third of the contribution is paid by the state.

In this industrial age there is no other course open to us than to provide these social welfare measures. Some call this welfare capitalism; some call this the welfare state; some call it a negation of the system of free enterprise. I prefer to recognize what has happened in the last half century. I prefer to recognize that our society has changed. It has changed gradually, and I hope it will continue to change gradually and under responsible direction. But our system cannot be maintained unless we recognize that in our effort to provide the maximum amount of private initiative, we must take provision at the same time for those classes in our community who do not have the necessary means in order to qualify for the assistance now made available in one form or another.

When we look at our heavy roll of unemployed today we might well ask ourselves: where would we be but for some of the social measures we brought in? Where would we be but for unemployment insurance? Well do I remember the criticism made of the Liberal government when it introduced unemployment insurance in 1941 and the suggestion that we were embarking on a form of state paternalism which would cause this country to become bankrupt. The same kind of criticism was levelled against Mr. Mackenzie King in 1925 when he introduced a system of old age pensions, only to have it turned down by a majority in the Senate which happened in that year to be made up for the most part of supporters of the Conservative party. The situation was the same when family allowances were introduced. It was said in criticism that we had become socialists, and that we had destroyed the private enterprise system. Let me say this to the Prime Minister and his colleagues on the benches opposite. The issue in the next election will not be the kind of issue he envisages. It will be the incompetence of this government and its failure to carry out its promises compared with the record which the Liberal government, when it was entrusted with office, was able to build up for the Canadian people and which included the provision of family allowances as well as these other social measures. Family allowances now provide almost three million families representing nearly 6,500,000 children every month with assistance in filling the gap between what a parent earns and what is needed to maintain these dependent children properly.

I have been aroused into making this speech by the suggestions of the hon. member for Assiniboia who holds himself up as the only one who is interested in these matters, though the fact is that the Liberal party has led the way. The man who sits on my left is the leader of the party which has been first in the field of social welfare in Canada and the only party in this house which can legitimately criticize this government for having failed to carry out promises which greatly assisted it in being placed where it now sits, Mr. Chairman, to your right, but it will be for only a short time.

Mr. Howard: I have one or two comments to make and I wish to attach some of them to the glowing tribute which the hon. member for Essex East paid himself a moment ago.

An hon. Member: It is only what he deserves.

Mr. Howard: It is twice as much as he will get. After listening to the hon. gentleman I came to the conclusion that anyone who was present in this house during the time he was minister would be reminded of his speeches then, because he has just made precisely the kind of speech he used to make when he sat on the treasury benches. It is an excellent indication of why he failed to be successful in his attempt at the national Liberal conclave in the winter of 1958—

An hon. Member: Superman.

Mr. Howard: Did you call him a superman?

An hon. Member: I was talking about you.

Mr. Howard: You should not talk about me in that way. I think it is regrettable indeed that the Liberal party, which sets itself up as the only one in a position legitimately to criticize the government in office, should be at the same time opposed to an increase in the old age pension to the amount we have suggested.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, the hon. member has no right to misrepresent the opposition. What the Leader of the Opposition and I have indicated is that we are in favour of increases for the old age pensioners of this country.

Mr. Howard: But without the courage to mention a figure.

Mr. Pearson: With enough responsibility not to do so.

Mr. Howard: Fence sitters. He and his colleagues want to keep out of any controversy. A six-dollar party is what they were in 1957 and they are still a six-dollar party. They are afraid to come out and mention any figure at all because they will then be in the happy position of being able to agree with anybody about any suggested increase. They should know full well, having sat in office for so long, that it is necessary to establish a particular figure, even though that figure may be an arbitrary one, and to campaign for that figure or nothing will be done.

I did not participate in this movement because of age, but much of the progress which has been made in the provision of social welfare measures has been due to the stand taken in this house by members and former members of the C.C.F. party. One of the reasons we have a degree of social security today is that members of the C.C.F. had the courage to go out into the country against the objections of Liberals and Conservatives and other reactionary groups in the nation and campaign for a particular figure. They had the courage to demand increases in pensions, and adjustments in administration and to ask for a national health plan. They rallied support in the nation for these things. It is because of the courage of people like J. S. Woodsworth, Stanley Knowles, and Alistair Stewart that the Liberal party in office was forced into the position of having to put these increases and improvements into effect.

When the hon. member for Essex East spoke in glowing terms about what he and his party had accomplished in the past he was doing nothing more than apologizing for the lack of action on the part of the Liberal administration over the years. It is an indication of the right wing of the Liberal party coming up. Those people who have their roots in Newfoundland and support that element in the Liberal party are the ones we are hearing from today. The Liberals lack the courage to make known any figure in order to avoid any difficulty that may arise out of arguing for a particular amount. They want to be in the position of agreeing with anyone and everyone for the sake of political expediency.

The hon. member for Essex East spoke about the government hiding the Clark report and later on asserted that his party is the only one with any legitimate right to criticize the government. The Clark report is indeed a hidden document tucked away in a dusty file as I mentioned earlier, but the hon. member expressed a false point. He attempted to suggest that his party is the only one not only in this chamber but in Canada with a legitimate point of view. The hon. member was a top-ranking member of the cabinet in the Liberal government and he and his colleagues sitting alongside him participated in hiding many reports. They kept information from the public. I will not use such words as "corruption" or "dishonesty" in describing their actions but they did keep reports secret from the nation. What about the Currie report? What about the four-legged people on the payroll at Petawawa? How did that matter come to the attention of the public? It was not because the Liberals had the courage to face their responsibility. They tried to hide the report.

What about the report relating to flour milling combines, the report on price fixing and involving criminal actions? This was before there was a combines investigation branch. What happened? The report was kept secret and hidden from the public eye until sufficient time had elapsed that prosecutions could not be launched. Let my hon. friends in the Liberal party not take the position they do, attempting to sugar-coat it with a claim to legitimacy.

What about the report concerning the economic outlook which the Prime Minister unethically chose to wave around in this chamber in 1957? This was a hidden, secret document and something to which the Liberals paid no attention. They knew they should do so but they did not feel like it.

What about the advice of Mr. Lamontagne given 11 years ago to the effect that the old age pension scheme could easily lead the nation into unemployment? The Liberals paid no attention to it and then hired this same gentleman as a top adviser. Regardless of how much the hon. member for Essex East coats his phrases in emotional terms and regardless of how mellifluous he is—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That word is pronounced "mellifluous".

Mr. Howard: —or no matter what he says, everyone in Canada knows how bleak and black is the record of the Liberal party over the years. It was a great day for the country, at least from one point of view—

Mr. Chambers: Be careful now.

Mr. Howard: —when they were summarily fired from office.

Mr. Pearson: All but eight of the hon. gentleman's group were fired.

Mr. Howard: It will be a sad day if the Liberals ever get back in again.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. gentleman will not be around to welcome us.

Mr. Howard: That may be so, but I will tell the Leader of the Opposition this through you, Mr. Chairman. My approach and that of the C.C.F. with respect to elections is this. I do not care if I am ever again elected to parliament or if the C.C.F. ever forms the government of this country or of any province thereof so long as the things for which we campaign become the law of this nation and the people are treated justly, fairly and squarely. That is what I am concerned about and I do not care whether the hon. member in any capacity is around to welcome the members of future parliaments. I am interested only in square shooting and in a fair deal for all Canadians including the old age pensioners about whom we are now speaking. They should have decent treatment and a proper income. I am not interested in political expediency which is the hallmark of the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, do not be so self-virtuous.

Mr. Howard: There is no self-virtue here. I started at the lower levels of the political ladder and have no desire or intention of going farther. The Leader of the Opposition started at the top and since then has come down a long way. He will slip farther down if he persists in pursuing the course he followed a moment ago of lifting statements out of the context of the record and distorting them to create a false picture. I will leave it to the hon. member for Timiskaming to deal with that matter.

It is our desire to promote discussion of old age pensions. We know that pensions should be increased and only we have the intestinal fortitude to suggest a specific amount. We are not like the Liberals who the other evening wanted to close off debate and go home. It is our intention to develop an argument about old age pensions. We have succeeded in bringing about such debate even though hon. members of the government have remained silent and even though latterly hon. members of the Liberal party have sought to tag along after sleeping all morning. The C.C.F. party has always had the courage and the intestinal fortitude to speak out on behalf of increases in old age pensions. My hon. friends look askance. They know how angry everyone in this chamber was at me the other evening because I wanted to call it six o'clock—

Mr. Pickersgill: Everyone?

Mr. Howard: —and when the Liberals wanted to give away the right to debate this question. If the government should increase old age pensions before the next election I will welcome that action even if it is taken because of political expediency. I am sure the Liberals will also welcome the increases and that the Conservatives will trumpet it around the nation that they introduced increases. I take some small personal satisfaction out of knowing that it was the C.C.F. again that wanted to bring these things to the forefront, to raise the issue, as the C.C.F. has done year after year on all sorts of issues affecting the rights and the dignity of the people of this nation and justice for them.

An hon. Member: Hollywood.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend says "Hollywood". I could tell him a story about Hollywood which would more nearly fit his party but this is not the proper place to do it.

(Translation):

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, while listening to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), I was reminded of a scene I have read about in the holy scriptures concerning the publican and the Pharisee. While would be most appropriate to report it here, I will merely suggest that he read it. If he does not recognize himself in the person of the Pharisee, he can come and see me and I shall be pleased to show him the analogy.

I also know a fable by La Fontaine entitled "The Wolf and the Lamb." The wolf used to spend his time bragging about his strength in the woods and in the fields. One day, he met a lamb grazing peacefully in a green meadow. The wolf, looking for an excuse to treat himself to a good meal by eating the lamb accuses the latter of grazing in his fields.

Mr. Chairman, this fable came to my mind when I heard the hon. member for Skeena state: "We are not like the Liberal party". We are not like them, we are the new messiahs, the new prophets in America. We are going to change everything in this world; it is going to be paradise on earth.

Mr. Chairman, as I have already said in this house, I believe in public men who try to eradicate all that is unsound in public administration; I have no faith in those who try to have the people believe that with them it will be the embodiment of purity. I am afraid of those who give themselves as being pure, because the pure do not need to broadcast it, it shows in their deeds.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know now whether the hon. member for Skeena is speaking on behalf of the C.C.F. or the new party. Of course it is quite hard these days, and it will be for months to come, to know to what group he belongs, but I am very anxious to see the designation that will be given to this new party which will be made up of old human natures such as our House of Commons is composed of. And, Mr. Chairman, we are not going to change human nature.

I much prefer to see a man, like my leader or like the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), state publicly in this house that he is in favour of improving social security measures, without starting a childish quarrel as to what should be the increase in the rate, 15 cents, $20 or $50. That point is unimportant. Personally I think that what is important is to make sure that all social security measures are adequate to meet the present needs. It depends how one sees it.

The hon. member for Skeena tells us that his colleagues and himself have the courage to announce that they will increase old age security by $20. I think the only courage he can boast of is the one needed to beg for votes. I am fed up with his lessons in humility.

Mr. Chairman, I was going to suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) that he appoint a minister of humility, and that he select for the office the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton), since he possesses that quality to such a high degree. However, if they want to do a good deed and appoint one day someone who will really teach humility, by his words as well as by his deeds, I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he keep in mind the member for Skeena.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Essex East, the Liberal party need not be ashamed of its accomplishments. If it is ashamed of its record, the people are a party to such a record, because they kept the Liberals in office for 22 years.

The Liberal party is not ashamed of its record. That is not to say that the Liberals never made a mistake. In fact the best evidence that they did is that they were removed to this side of the house in 1957. Like my leader, the hon. member for Essex East and may colleagues in the Liberal party, I feel that it is a good thing to sit in the opposition once in a while. It induces one to make reflections and it is better to be in the opposition after being in office because we then have a better understanding of public responsibilities.

It is for this reason, Mr. Chairman, that you will never hear us voicing such bitter and irresponsible statements as those which we heard prior to 1957, or as those which are made, on occasion, by those hon. members who, though they sit to our right, are, in their own view, far to the left.

I am, I repeat, extremely happy to belong to the Liberal party. It changes its name most infrequently. As you know we make no attempt to change our spots, to trade one suit of clothes for another, to put on a new mask. The Liberal party is a very old one indeed but—and this is what is so remarkable about it—it has always kept pace with the times and adapted itself to changing conditions. The matter of a name is a very secondary consideration indeed, Mr. Chairman.

Mind you, I have no difficulty in understanding that in the case of the C.C.F., or New Party, or what have you, there is some advantage in finding a new name, because, in spite of that, all we have here are the same old and unsuccessful faces. Understandably, to go before the people that group must, in every possible respect, change its external appearance while at the same time remaining faithful to its old, tired clichés and subject to the eternal frailties of human nature.

I look forward with great anticipation to the next election, Mr. Chairman, I have promised the fullest possible support to this new party so that it may remain in the position in which it finds itself today, in sole possession of Mr. Stanley Knowles' chair at the Canadian Congress of Labour.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I started off the debate on this subject this morning but, as happened last year, unfortunately hon. members seem to have taken off in all directions. There is one thing to be said about it, at least; the battle lines are being drawn for the next election. Of course, the Tories are coming out plump and plain for free enterprise, and down with everything socialistic. The C.C.F. is perfectly willing to accept the challenge. We believe that democratic socialism offers the only solution to these problems. The Liberal policy is the position where they profess both but will admit to neither.

Unfortunately, I missed the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. Nevertheless, I heard the speeches of two members of the Liberal party, one devoting 20 minutes to patting the Liberals on the back for past performances and 20 minutes to attacking the C.C.F. and the other devoting one half of the time available to attacking the New Party and the other half to patting the Liberals on the back.

As I mentioned before, last year we had 15 members from the government side, including two cabinet ministers, speak on this subject. This year we can find only one. Why the sudden loss of interest in this subject? Furthermore, although I did not hear it, I am given to understand that the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort, who is a government supporter, spoke on this subject. Unfortunately, if what I hear is true, he did not devote any of his time to the problem but rather directed his efforts toward attacking the provincial government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Argue: He is against an increase in old age pensions.

Mr. Rapp: No.

Mr. Argue: This is true; the hon. member is against it.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Rapp: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I never mentioned anything of that sort in my speech. It is just the hon. member's imagination. He does not like to hear anything unfavourable said about Saskatchewan. He is now saying that I am opposed to an increase in pensions or something along that line.

Mr. Argue: You would not support our proposition. You talked about something else.

Mr. Rapp: I am definitely not opposed. All I am saying is that the provincial government—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Argue: But you are against a federal increase.

Mr. Rapp: That is just your imagination.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Be fair.

Mr. Ricard: They have no sense of fairness.

Mr. Argue: All the Tories are against an increase. They will not talk.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We reserve our speeches for the proper time.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry, but the rules say that there may be only one speaker at a time. The hon. member for Timmins has the floor.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I must confess that I fail to see how an attack on a provincial government in the federal parliament is going to be of any assistance with respect to the plight in which old age pensioners find themselves today. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, in view of the comparison of the number of government speakers this year with the number last year, which was in the ratio of 15 to one, we can only be led to believe that the purpose last year was not to improve the lot of the old age pensioners but rather to avoid a vote. I do not know what other conclusion we can come to. Why have hon. members opposite lost interest in the period from July 19 last to now?

It may be that the idea of increasing old age pensions is too repugnant to the Prime Minister with his views on free enterprise. If the old age pension is too socialistic, then I suggest that the Prime Minister, or some other member of the cabinet or at least some member of his party should stand up in the house and tell us what the free enterprise solution is to the problem of our old age pensioners.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution carries I should like to refer to something that was said by the Leader of the Opposition about what I had said. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition can afford to be fair and I am not quite sure that he was fair last year when dealing with this subject. At that time he was depending entirely on his memory of something that had been said earlier in the debate. However, having had an opportunity to look at the record, he said today almost the same thing as he said then.

I pointed out at that time that old age pensions do not appear to me to lend themselves to great expansion as long as we neglect to bring in the large number of compulsory and voluntary pension plans found in the industrial sector of our economy. Therefore, it seems to me there is very little difference of opinion between the hon. member for Essex East and myself in this respect. He has indicated now that the Liberal party is pledged to put into effect an old age survivor assistance plan similar to that in the United States. He also implied that if we adopted a social security scheme such as that in the United States we would be able to implement the same benefits and thus place our elderly citizens in a much better position. I referred to bringing together industrial pension plans and the national old age security plan in order to provide a much better old age retirement fund than we now have. As found on page 6495 of Hansard for July 19 last I said:

> We should pay our old age pensioners a reasonable amount based on the cost of living and the standard of living to which we are accustomed. It is not sufficient to provide old age pensioners with a roof over their heads and a subsistence diet consisting of bread, milk, butter and a small amount of meat. In arriving at a figure we should take into consideration the gross national product and the ability of Canadians to contribute to a plan that will enable our senior citizens to retire on decent standards. The time has come to consider this.
> In my dealings with employees in various industries throughout the years I have never encountered any reluctance on their part to contribute to retirement funds, whether it be the old age pension scheme or a pension plan between the employee and employer. In every case, however, I found a great resentment on the part of the employee concerning those conditions that made it necessary for him to remain in the same job in the same plant under the same employer for a period of 25 years or more before receiving any benefit from the pension plan. These plans should be national in scope. People who retire should be granted a basic pension of $75 a month, and it would be advantageous for the Canadian economy and in the best interests of the security of our people if they could have a supplementary retirement pension equal to half the maximum salary they earned during their lifetime. Where the government contributed to the pension plan the $75 would be part of the retirement fund.

I went on to say this, and this is the part to which the Leader of the Opposition has referred:

> I do not ask the government to adopt $75 as a fixed figure. It could be increased to this amount today, but within a month or six months if the Canadian dollar continued to decline it might be that $75 would be too much and the economy could not bear it. On the other hand, the rising cost of food, rent, clothing and medical care has made it imperative that the old age pensioner now receive $75.

Then I went on to recommend a study being made of the Clark report. What I was referring to there was the fact that at that time the Canadian dollar was dropping very rapidly and, having regard to the state of the economy generally, that it appeared to me that old age pensions should have some relationship to some standard or formula and not remain at a set figure. In the depths of a depression when the prices of goods fall markedly I can see that $75 a month might be regarded as a very large amount. However, I certainly stated that in terms of present conditions $75 a month was the minimum requirement and that it was likely that this figure would rise rather than fall. I suggested that the payments should be tied in with some formula, such as the gross national product or the cost of living as established by the bureau of statistics or some other formula which would provide flexibility and keep payments to old age pensioners in line with their needs.

There is nothing very difficult about understanding this matter. If our standard of living dropped very rapidly it might be that the Canadian economy could not afford to pay to old age pensioners any amount that would be out of line with the standard of living at such a time. On the other hand, under present circumstances I think we can now afford to pay old age pensioners more than $55 a month when the standard of living in the city of Toronto, for example, is such that the municipality must pay almost as much as the federal government to maintain a bare minimum standard for these people.

I do not understand why governments are reluctant to put into effect a national pension plan that would be based upon contributions by employees, employers and the government. I do not see any difficulty in establishing a pension plan such as that in Germany which will provide the worker with a pension half as large as his income in his highest five-year earning period. My hon. friend points out that the insurance companies will not allow it. I believe this is the reason why government annuity and superannuation provisions have not been developed to the extent of providing a national portable pension plan.

I would draw to the attention of the committee to the Department of National Revenue information bulletin No. 14 on pension plans for the purpose of the Income Tax Act. The Minister of Finance in his argument said that the reason that proposal had not been accepted or was no longer in effect was the same as that for which the so-called blue book had not been left in effect. He said that it was his opinion that vesting rights of pension plans must remain within the jurisdiction of provincial governments. I read his remarks at that time but I can see no reason why the Canadian government could not deal with vesting rights as it did with unemployment insurance. It will be remembered that it was considered that the responsibility for unemployment insurance was not within the jurisdiction of the federal government, but a change was made in the British North America Act allowing unemployment insurance to be implemented. With that fact in mind I would suggest that it would not be difficult to overcome the present problem. I suggest that the blue book sets out the principles and regulations regarding the method by which the pension plan should be introduced and operated.

I have had many inquiries from union members regarding this problem of vesting rights, and would bring to your attention that Mr. McCann suggested, in 1950 when he introduced this statement, how this matter should be treated. I should like to read the sections which those union members are interested in. Appearing at page 14 of the blue book under the heading "Part 10. Vesting" appears the following section:

(a) The rights of the employees to the benefits provided under the plan must be stated. An employee must have an immediate vested right in contributions made by him.

(b) The rights provided by employer contributions must vest in the employee within a determinable period, and particularly on the attainment by the employee of an age which would prejudice him in the event of severance from employment. Therefore vesting should be absolute upon attaining age 50, subject to a minimum period not exceeding 20 years of service or participation. There must be an absolute vesting upon attaining optional retirement age, subject to a reasonable period of service or participation.

(c) Vesting of the employer benefits may be conditional upon the employee leaving in the plan his own contributions, or may be graduated by a stated percentage over a period of years. Vesting of the employer's contributions in the event of death prior to retirement is optional.

(d) The terms of the plan may not subject the rights of employees under the plan to any claims by the employer or any other person. In particular, the funds available for employee benefits may not be held or used as security against any debt or defalcation.

(e) If the number of employees covered under a plan is five or less, there must be an immediate vesting of all payments.

Many pension plans are being implemented across the country in many different categories, some not advantageous to the majority of employees in the plan. One plan was brought to my attention where the employer made all the contributions and therefore felt that until the employee, after long continuous service with the company had reached retirement he had no vesting rights whatsoever. Other plans exist of course where the employee and the employer make contributions, but in those cases the employee, after a period of time, is given vesting rights in his contribution, but in most cases the employee is never given vesting rights until he has reached a specific age in regard to the contributions made by the employer. In many cases, the employee continues to feel, that the contributions made by himself and his employer is his own money because if these contributions were not made toward a pension plan he would be receiving the amount of money in the form of wages.

What does the term "vesting right" mean? It is my understanding that this term is interpreted to mean that after a three-year period of contribution to an insurance policy the subscriber has limited rights and at that time may in conjunction with his insurance company have a paid-up policy or may transfer the amount of his contribution to another type of insurance policy. It means he has certain rights in the funding of his pension plan and the right to take part in the decision as to whether it should be fully funded.

At page six of this Co-operative Commonwealth Federation letter to its council members, the following appears:

In discussing the subject of a national pension fund, the question immediately arises as to whether or not it should be fully funded. While this aspect of the subject will be discussed thoroughly at a later date, there are one or two observations that should be made here.

It is not at all necessary to place national superannuation on a fully funded basis. (The term "fully funded" means that if contributions ceased to be paid into a fund, there would still be enough money in the fund to pay up all benefit claims against it. Such a fund would have no deficit on capital account, or actuarial deficiency.)

In the case of private insurance schemes, there may be a good argument for maintaining the scheme on a fully funded basis, or avoiding a deficit on capital account. By nature a private company cannot be assumed to be a perpetual concern. A private company must also depend on its own, and therefore, limited resources. On the other hand, a compulsory national pension scheme is based upon a permanent body of contributors with unlimited life. There is no need to make provision against possible liquidation.

What would be required, however, is the assurance that the position of the national fund on current account be at all times sound.

This would mean ensuring that for a number of years ahead income was at least equivalent to expenditures by adjusting contributions whenever necessary. However, for a considerable number of years after the commencement of superannuation this problem would not exist. During this period income from contributions would greatly exceed benefits paid out.

While the primary importance of a national superannuation scheme is to provide adequate financial security in old age, it has also a national economic advantage. The accumulation of contributions under such a scheme would provide a substantial source of investment funds for carrying out large-scale capital developments in Canada. This would be especially true for the first 20 to 25 years when contributions exceeded benefits paid out.

This matter of vesting rights is very important. It has been stated many times that only the Canadian government can carry out the full vesting of these pension plans. Many of the mines in the area from which I come cannot establish this type of pension plan because it would be impossible for them to put away the amount of money which would guarantee this pension to their employees. They could not do it on the basis of a portable plan; they could only do it on a limited scale pension plan where they have vesting for their employees only after ten years of employment.

This means that if a fund were established and the mine were closed down before the ten years had elapsed, those employees would not of course have been employed in the mine for the requisite number of years and would not have reached retirement age. There would be no way in which they could obtain this money after they had reached retirement age, because the company would be liquidated and would no longer exist. The Department of National Revenue could not guarantee that the contributions which had been made on behalf of these people would be available. The department would not be in a position to guarantee that the private company would have the money put away for this purpose. The money could easily be disposed of in the liquidation of the company.

For this reason it is very important that this matter of vesting be given very careful and immediate consideration. I suggest that when the former minister of national revenue, Mr. McCann, introduced this measure he was of the opinion that it would solve the problem that was self-evident in many of the plans his department was asked to approve.

Mr. Pickersgill: A good, progressive move.

Mr. Peters: Yes; I am sure it was a good, progressive move. I can inform the hon. member who has interrupted that the unions are still interested in this matter of vesting.

Mr. Pickersgill: They will get it when we again have a Liberal government.

Mr. Peters: They cannot get it from a Liberal government; it was a Liberal government that withdrew this plan. This book is not to be found in the public library; it is not available to unions or anyone because that minister, Mr. McCann, had to withdraw it because it was impossible to put it into effect. The Minister of National Revenue knows this. He tried it again in 1959. He did not make it quite as clear then, because he did not specify vesting rights in as simple a form. However, he also had to withdraw it for exactly the same reason. This has been withdrawn and disposed of because neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives have yet found a way of dealing with this matter. The only way to do so is by putting into effect a national pension plan. A national pension plan is twofold in this respect. We will have to give the old age pensioner $75 a month, but we will have to look for methods of increasing this pension beyond $75 a month other than those which are being used at the present time.

We have mentioned several amendments that would allow us to meet a pension of $75 a month, but we have not solved the problem of establishing this plan. The Minister of Finance has said he cannot allow this vesting section in the Department of National Revenue's direction for the simple reason it contravenes what he considers to be provincial rights. The Minister of Finance says this matter comes within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments in connection with civil rights and liberties. There is no greater civil right or liberty than the matter of the old age pensioner being able to live out his last days enjoying those liberties and rights which should have been established for him during his many years of employment.

I think all that is involved here is a small amendment to the British North America Act. It may be that a former minister of the crown, now the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, may be in a position later to do something about this matter. I do not know.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: Never.

Mr. Peters: I am not sure whether he will be in a position to do it. I hope this party will be in a position to do this.

Mr. Argue: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peters: I hope that what the hon. member has said is an indication that his party agrees to put into effect a national pension plan which will provide—

Mr. Pickersgill: It is in the Liberal program now.

Mr. Peters: That does not mean anything. I have not heard the hon. member endorsing the resolutions which came from his party's convention. I have never seen a group of people so reluctant to talk about those proposals as are the hon. members of that political party. I understand that the only person who really sympathized with them was the leader of the party. I do not know why he did this, because I have not yet assessed his reason for supporting most of these things.

If what the Leader of the Opposition has said is true, it means he is pledged to support these resolutions. However, I am pleased to know that even from his seat the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate says he will change this section of the British North America Act in order to make it possible for this program to be effected.

Mr. Argue: He will change it by a private member's bill.

Mr. Peters: I hope they will do what was done with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which was a very forward step. I hope we shall no longer do what the Conservative government has done, namely hide behind the skirts of the provincial governments of this country. I hope the federal government will give leadership in this matter of social security, even if it means amending the British North America Act.

When this measure was introduced in 1950 it became self-evident very soon afterwards that this step should be taken in order to make the program possible. The minister did not see fit to do this. He did not even see fit to come to parliament and explain why he did not do it. There has been a great deal of reluctance on the part of our governments to say why they are afraid to give consideration to a national pension plan on a contributory basis in order to supplement old age pensions.

The only minister who has given us any clue as to the reasons for this reluctance is the Minister of Finance. He gave an explanation, but only after one of the government members said, "We cannot increase old age pensions now. If we increase old age pensions to $75 a month it will give us a $200 million deficit. We cannot increase them because we already have a deficit".

This is what provoked the Minister of Finance to get into the argument. There may be another reason. I do not know everything; I have difficulty in learning what little I do know. However, if the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue or their assistants say that what I have said is wrong, and they have found a way of doing this other than the way I have outlined, I hope the necessary steps will be taken, and I will support them to the limit.

I have worked in the industry of gold mining for 15 years. The gold mining industry has never had a lifetime of more than about 20 years. It is an industry in which very few people would ever be able to obtain a pension because they either do not live in the industry long enough or the industry itself does not live long enough. We shall have to adopt a national pension scheme which will allow them to take the benefit of their contributions from one industry to another, and we shall need to supplement the payments made in order that they may be able to retire with reasonable comfort in their old age.

I am sympathetic toward part of the argument used by one of the Liberal spokesmen when he said we should give consideration to allowing the people themselves to help build a national pension scheme. However, employees in those sections of industry where there are no pension plans today have no alternative but to end their days under the old age security program. The only people who benefit are those in industries where unions are strong enough to force implementation of pension plans to which both employers and employees contribute. I do not think we should leave the situation as it is. I think we want to offer the opportunity to all Canadians to make contributions to pension plans and to help them to establish schemes which will return them at least half of their average wage in their best five years in order that they may be able to retire with respect, maintain the homes which they have taken a lifetime to buy, continue to run their cars and retain their position in society which they have been accustomed to hold.

Mr. Nowlan: I have no desire to prolong this debate beyond the length of time it has already taken. However, in view of the fact that I suspect there may be an inordinate demand for Hansard of today's issue for distribution throughout the country, I think I should say one word about all this discussion, reminding the committee at the same time that this is only a motion to grant interim supply.

We have today discussed the Bank of Canada, the textile industry, unemployment, fiscal matters and monetary matters. We have discussed a national pension scheme, the old age pension scheme and, now, the vesting of pensions as well as half a dozen other subjects which no doubt have not occurred to me. In fact, the committee has skimmed very lightly over every subject in this category, running as fast as Eliza did in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" when she ran across the ice of the river, and probably just as frightened.

It has been a beautiful display of theatre, and the friendly arguments between the two groups on the other side of the house, as to which should eliminate the other before it is itself eliminated, were no doubt greatly appreciated by government supporters and others.

Once again I stress that this is a motion for the granting of interim supply. There will be other debates. There will be a budget debate. The estimates of practically all the departments with the exception of the department of immigration have yet to come before the committee, so there will be many opportunities for these matters to be discussed at length. I would suggest also, with respect, that these motions are not usually regarded as providing an occasion for a policy discussion. Certainly it has not been the practice of any government, as I recall it, to make announcements of policy during a debate such as this one.

If we became involved in a discussion of all the matters raised today the debate would probably need to be carried on for another two or three days. As I say, we shall have further opportunities to discuss these matters later. The committee has spent a reasonable length of time at least—and I think that is a conservative statement—in discussing these questions up to now; and if hon. members feel that they have had ample opportunity for raising these problems I hope they will agree to get on with this resolution and dispose of this matter before five o'clock when we shall be considering private members' bills. As hon. members know, it is necessary to dispose of this matter and others in the immediate future. Without desiring to limit debate in any way, I hope this objective can be achieved. I promise hon. members opposite who have raised the questions and sought answers from the government that at the right time those answers will be forthcoming. We are not proposing at this stage of debate to satisfy the wishes of the opposition in all those respects because, as I mentioned, this is a stage of debate which heretofore has gone through within a few minutes and has been regarded as merely a technical matter.

Since the debate has gone on for this length of time, I suggest that with the consent and approval of all members we might get on with the practical steps necessary to implement this measure before five o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the item carries, I wonder whether the minister is prepared to give an unqualified assurance that there will be another budget. That is a serious question.

Mr. Argue: We are disappointed that the Minister of National Revenue, the Acting Minister of Finance, should not have taken this opportunity to put forward the position of the government with regard to this very important question of an immediate increase in old age pensions.

It is true that before 1956 it was not customary in dealing with interim supply to have a debate on questions of government policy. However, I think the practice has grown up since 1956 of making use of this stage of debate to put forward some of the proposals that may be in the minds of members. We regret very much that not a single member on the government side of the house has risen during this debate to speak in support of an increase in old age pensions though it is certainly clear to anyone who reads today's Hansard—and the minister referred to this matter—that it is very much in order during this discussion to talk about increases in old age pensions.

I should just like to make one further comment. It seems indicated that interim supply will be passed today. I was not certain at all that this would be the case. However, I think the government has arranged—I do not say deliberately; perhaps it is just one of those things which happen by coincidence—that the most controversial and, very often, the most vitriolic member of the house and of the cabinet, should not be in his place today to pilot this resolution through the house. There is no doubt in my mind that though this matter has taken a considerable time to deal with, the hon. gentleman's absence has expedited the discussion.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. George C. Nowlan (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Nowlan (for the Minister of Finance) moved:

> Resolved, that toward making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1962 the sum of $638,909,350.10 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before this resolution carries, I wonder whether the Minister of National Revenue can assure us that there is enough money in the treasury to meet these disbursements.

Mr. Nowlan: We do not expect to have difficulty on that score.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, let me say one thing before the resolution carries. I am sorry that the hon. member for Assiniboia is not in his seat. I wish to express the greatest regret at the reference he made to the Minister of Finance. I thought it was a most unfair reference. I am sorry the hon. member is not in the chamber because I thought he himself might see it was unfair and withdraw it.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Nowlan (for the Minister of Finance) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-78, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1962.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): When shall the bill be read a second time? By leave, now?

Mr. Pickersgill: By leave.

Mr. Nowlan (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, may I just indicate to the committee that the bill is in the standard form of the first interim appropriation bill and deals in its schedules only with those items which have been considered in the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, clause 4 of this bill allows the governor in council under the Financial Administration Act to borrow sums of money not exceeding in total the sum of $1 billion. I was just wondering why that is so. Why does the government need $1 billion for the purposes stated here, for public works and general purposes?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This has been the standard practice in the first appropriation bill, for a number of years. Authority is given to borrow $1 billion in the first interim appropriation bill. This is for public works as is indicated and for general purposes and covers, of course, the issue of treasury bills and the necessary financing that must be done as the government proceeds from month to month. This, as I say, is standard practice.

Mr. McMillan: It does not occur in subsequent appropriation bills?

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No, Mr. Chairman, except the final one. Perhaps the committee would be interested in what has been the position, previously. The authority granted by parliament in recent years has been as follows, in tabulated form:

1955-56	$ 1	billion
1956-57	$ 1.5	"
1957-58	$ 1	"
1958-59	$ 2	"
1959-60	$ 1.5	"
1960-61	$ 1.5	"

Clause agreed to.

Clauses Nos. 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules A to C inclusive agreed to.

On schedule D.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to ask one question. Item No. 469 relating to the Canadian pension commission is a vote in the amount of $147,484,000. How does the parliamentary secretary relate that amount for the period mentioned to the total amount shown opposite that figure?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The last figure to which the hon. member referred is the total for all the amounts in schedule D, I believe. The particular item of $147,484,000 is due to additional appropriations for the two items required to cover payments resulting from the increase in rates authorized by the recent revision of the Pension Act.

Schedule D agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Nowlan (for the Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Before the bill is passed, I am sure the Acting Minister of Finance and the parliamentary secretary to the minister will be appreciative of the high degree of co-operation extended today.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration branch—

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $911,098.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, a great deal of discussion has taken place on these estimates and I shall attempt to avoid repeating anything that has been said. The minister at an earlier date dealt with the various changes in his department. I do not intend to deal with those changes except to say I think they are good ones. I refer to the bringing of the wheat board and the board of grain commissioners under the Department of Agriculture. I think this action will result in better co-ordinated farm policy and will bring about a greater co-ordination in aid to farmers.

The endeavour to stress farm sales and find new markets is a commendable one. Perhaps to some extent it is directly as a result of the changes to which I referred, particularly the placing of the wheat board under the Department of Agriculture. Perhaps the board more fully realizes that the income of farmers depends on the board.

We all realize that the famine in China had something to do with sales of wheat in that country but similar circumstances were not evident in relation to sales to Czechoslovakia or Russia. I hope the Department of Agriculture will make every effort to regain and hold sales in our regular markets and that every effort will be made to make customers aware that our products are available to underdeveloped countries under the Colombo plan and through United Nations organizations.

Much has been said in this debate about farm income and cash income. In a way that would be clear to anyone who would take the time to study his figures the minister pointed out that cash income to farmers is moving in the right direction. I noticed recently that in the year 1960 the cash income was up 12 per cent. We are all glad to see this result.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska quoted some figures that he said were from D.B.S. sources. Where he got them I am sure I do not know. I have some figures on my desk but they certainly do not correspond with those of the hon. member. He quoted prices at which products were sold, and said that they had decreased, but he did not refer to his own province at all. The index for that province is considerably higher than the index of prices in western Canada. He condemned to some extent the acreage payments to the western farmers. If he had referred to the index from which he quoted he would have seen that products sold on the prairies at prices considerably lower than those in eastern Canada, and particularly in his own province.

The hon. member for Beauce quoted from an article in Maclean's magazine, written by Peter C. Newman. He more or less pounced on the idea that the Minister of Agriculture would never take the place of Johnny Appleseed. He did not quote from the same article a paragraph that caught my eye. This paragraph is from the same article in Maclean's:

> The Tories have ladled out nearly half a billion dollars to Canadian farmers since they took office. Their various programs and subsidies will this year amount to nearly four times as much as the farmers received during the last year of the Liberal administration.

He did not feel that this was worth putting on the record, but I do. The article goes on to refer to the great hope of the new Minister of Agriculture and suggests that he may take the place of Johnny Appleseed. Certainly, he is doing a tremendous job in selling agricultural products and in selling agriculture to Canada as a whole.

I do not intend to say too much about the C.C.F. party. Last night we heard a great deal about their aspirations, and perhaps today as well. For a long time the hon. member for Assiniboia has talked about what he would do for the farmers of western Canada. In considering how serious he and members of his party are, and how serious the official opposition are one must come back to the record in order to see whether it bears out their remarks. We have often reviewed what the Liberal government did during the 1940's, up until 1948. They would not lift the embargo on Canadian cattle going into the United States, much to the chagrin of the farmers in western Canada. They entered into an agreement with Great Britain which cost the Canadian farmer a great deal of money.

In looking back over the past record I notice that the socialists and the C.C.F. party supported this agreement and said that it was a good thing and that we should enter into it. Several members in the house at that time raised doubts and inquired whether some precautions should be taken in the consideration of this agreement. One of those members was the present Prime Minister and another was the then leader of the opposition, Mr. John Bracken. They both raised doubts with regard to this agreement, as to whether it was a good one and whether every consideration was taken in connection with the years ahead. One must realize that over the years the C.C.F. party has tried to climb onto anything that would bring them votes. This was evident in the farmers' march on Ottawa not so long ago. Another instance was the demand for deficiency payments. They raised this issue and blew it up as high as they could. They are now going to do the same thing with the feed mill question, blowing up out of all proportion the situation that actually exists.

I hold in my hand a clipping from the Kinistino Post dated Wednesday, May 27, 1959. The headline reads:

Minty Loptson declares:

C.C.F. sabotage of wheat board has cost farmers millions.

The article goes on to say that Mr. Loptson charged that the minister of municipal affairs for Saskatchewan made a speech in which he said that in 1951 the British people had already paid the Canadian producer $182 million more than they needed to pay on the contract for wheat delivered. The article goes on to say that Mr. Attlee was made aware of this view and, of course, when more money was asked for by the then government it was refused. Certainly no money was given. I do not like to quote this article. I am sorry that the hon. member for Assiniboia is not in the house, but I went to the trouble to look up the debates in the Saskatchewan legislature in order to see whether the Saskatchewan member had actually said that we had already received $182 million more than we should have received for our wheat. At the bottom of page 3 of the proceedings of the legislative assembly of Saskatchewan for February 14, 1951, I find that Mr. McIntosh said:

In other words, the British government paid to the Dominion of Canada $182 million in excess of the price quoted in the contract.

To me this was rather shocking. I came to the conclusion that one cannot take too seriously everything that is said in the House of Commons.

Last night the hon. member for Timiskaming made a great speech on the feed mills. He went on at great length to say that wheat was selling now at 50 cents less than the price at which it should be selling. He said that the farmers producing beef in western Canada got the advantage of this 50 cents. He mentioned this 50 cents time and time again, and I pretty nearly reached out and caught it. Where he got it from I am still in doubt. His whole speech reminded me of the speech he made in the House of Commons a year ago on wheat board permits. The committee will remember that last year we discussed wheat board permits and the whole quota system for quite some time. I listened to the hon. member for Timiskaming for quite a while at that time. I spoke to him afterwards and I said, "Surely you did not grasp how the quota system works". I went on at great length to explain it to him. He said, "Oh, I see how it works now but still, it does not matter; I had to fill in the time, anyway". I gathered from the remarks he made in his speech last evening—

Mr. Peters: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is referring to a speech I made last year. I was not completely aware of how the quota system worked. The hon. member who represented one of the ridings affected was good enough to explain to me at the time how it did work. I thanked him for it but I did not say that it did not make any difference and that I was filling in the time.

The Deputy Chairman: That is not a point of order. The hon. member can make his correction after the hon. member who has the floor has finished his speech.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Maybe the member does not recall, but after the hon. member had made his speech I thought that perhaps he was willing to learn something about our quota system. I listened to him very carefully. I was quite amazed to realize that a person could stand up and speak for as long as he spoke in this particular debate and know so little about his subject. I said to myself, "Perhaps I should go around to see him and inform him on how the quota system actually works". Perhaps the evening is clearer in my mind than it is in his, and also what happened at that time. I am just saying that his speech last night reminded me very much of that evening last year. He talked about feed mills and he quoted a statement made by Mr. McNamara to the committee on agriculture when it was conducting its feed mill inquiry. What did Mr. McNamara say when 400 Saskatchewan farmers visited him early this year? He said, as found in the Manitoba Co-operator:

Your interests are being directed into local problems and your support of the wheat board should be centred on us as a marketing agency.

The article from which I have quoted is headed, "McNamara Says Farmers Directed Away From Most Vital Issues". This is true of the whole feed mill question and, as I suggested earlier, the C.C.F. party seems to have seized upon it in the hope that it will attract some votes to them. Actually the hon. member for Timiskaming suggested in his speech—and this struck me as rather odd—that the whole feed mill problem should be sent to the standing committee on agriculture for study. I thought that this was a surprising suggestion because we have already studied the question. The committee had 12 or 13 meetings on this matter and heard nine briefs. I said to myself, "Surely he does not want this matter to go before that committee again", although I realize that the members in that corner are particularly anxious to have everything under the sun referred to the committee. However, when the time comes for the committee to meet some members of that group do very little work in the committee. This was evident in the private bills committee when it was considering the bill to incorporate the Aurora Pipe Line Company.

Mr. Peters: May I ask a question?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): My time is limited and if the hon. member simply has a question I am going to continue. When the hon. member made these remarks last night I took the trouble to find out how many meetings of the committee on agriculture he attended when the committee was studying the feed mill question. He attended three meetings out of 12 or 13 and heard part of three of the nine briefs that were presented to the committee.

The hon. member for Assiniboia has talked at length about the feed mill question. How many committee meetings did he attend at that time? He attended three and heard part of three of the nine briefs presented to the committee. I only point this out in order to indicate that hon. members should not take too seriously suggestions from that corner about referring matters to a committee because some of their members do very little work in the committees.

It aggravated me to some extent to hear the hon. member for Timiskaming say that the feed mill regulations would put western farmers in a better position than eastern farmers with regard to feeding livestock. I could not understand this. As I mentioned earlier, he went on to talk about a figure of 50 cents and he referred to 50 cents so many times that one could almost visualize that 50-cent piece. Actually, however, under the feed mill regulations western farmers will be able to buy western grain no more cheaply than they have been able to buy it in the past. In fact, allowing the feed mills to come into the picture and handle feed grain will have a tendency to increase the price farmers are paying for feed grain because it will create a greater market for such grain. If anything, it will have a tendency to increase the price of feed grains sold to farmers.

Farmers who are feeding cattle in western Canada now will be in the same position as that in which they were in the past or perhaps will not be quite as well off from a financial point of view. They may be able to get a better concentration of feeds or a better mixing of feeds. I hope that will be so, but certainly there is no 50-cent piece in evidence as the hon. member for Timiskaming tried to indicate last night. This is borne out by the figures the Minister of Agriculture put on Hansard indicating what feed mills are paying for coarse grains. It appears to me that the hon. member is once again trying to create an issue that does not exist. Rather than pay more attention to members from that corner, I think we should pay less.

Mr. Michaud: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that it is one minute to five o'clock, may I call it five o'clock.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15 as provisionally amended.

INDUSTRY

DISTRIBUTION TO AID PROVINCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. R. C. Coates (Cumberland) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-23, to provide for the development of certain provinces by the distribution of industry and for the reduction of unemployment therein.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is twofold, first, to encourage the development of industry in the four Atlantic provinces and, second, to reduce the high level of unemployment in those areas where it persists. It has been my view that the Industrial Development Bank Act, which legislation has been made available to assist in the establishment of industries in Canada, has not had in the Atlantic area that beneficial effect that one would have expected from this legislation when it was placed on the statute books. It may be that statistics will emphasize the situation more forcibly to all members of the house.

In the six years from 1955 to 1960 inclusive the following numbers of loans through the industrial development bank were made available to industries in the Atlantic provinces: Newfoundland, 21; Prince Edward Island, 19; Nova Scotia, 114; and New Brunswick, 116 loans, or a total of 270 loans during this period. For the sake of comparison I point out that in the same period in the province of Ontario 937 loans were made available to industry and in the year 1960, 264 loans were made, only six less than were made available to the four Atlantic provinces in six years.

From a monetary standpoint the imbalance of this situation is still more significant, with the four Atlantic provinces receiving less than one tenth of the over-all amount lent to the 10 provinces, a matter of slightly more than $18 million compared with $192 million, or a percentage figure of less than 10 per cent.

When one compares the situation in existence here with the repeated comments of experts, that the prime need of the Atlantic provinces is cheap investment capital which must of necessity come from outside our area because of the low level of the earning power in the maritimes—37 per cent on a per capita basis below the average for residents of the central or western provinces—one quickly realizes the need for bold and imaginative steps to rectify the situation. In recent times the Atlantic provinces have shown a very real interest in their own problems and have taken many steps on their own to remedy the situation wherever this is financially possible.

An example of this action in my province of Nova Scotia was the establishment by the Stanfield government of a crown corporation known as "Industrial Estates Limited". Another example was the appointment of A. K. Cairncross, an eminent British economist, to study and report on the economic situation in the Atlantic area. This report was made available to the provincial government in February of this year, and the conclusions reached by this economist will no doubt be of lasting benefit in correcting the situation wherever the provinces find this possible within their limited resources.

In this report Professor Cairncross indicates a number of methods whereby the federal government could assist our area in attracting new and expanding established industries.

As all members are aware, in the supplementary budget, this government took the first step that has ever been taken by any federal government in its efforts to assist areas with persistent unemployment in attracting new industries, through the principle of double depreciation. Some have said since this step was taken that the government has not gone far enough. Very recently Conservatives from across this country, in convention, passed a resolution requesting that tax incentives for new and expanding industry in our coal mining areas be provided on a scale more generous than presently proposed.

In recent days Mr. Frank Sobey, president of the Nova Scotia crown company, Industrial Estates Limited, when appearing before that legislature's industry committee, stated that this crown corporation could attract industries into depressed areas of Nova Scotia if it had additional help from the federal government enabling the crown corporation to offer tax concessions or start-up concessions, or other types of concessions of this nature that would make Nova Scotia locations attractive. The bill that I have before the house at the present time would do exactly what the president of Industrial Estates requests.

Its basic premise is the co-operation of the directors of the industrial development bank with the industrial estate corporations in the Atlantic provinces. It would allow the industrial development bank to lend moneys to industrial estate companies to assist in providing premises for industrial enterprises. Further, it would allow the bank to make to such companies annual grants which could be used to make payments of interest on the moneys borrowed until such time as the said company or companies were in a financial position to do so from their earnings.

Further, in areas of persistent high level unemployment it would allow the bank, working in co-operation with the industrial estate companies, to go even further and consider ways and means of providing still further incentives to convince these investors they should locate in these areas. In this regard may I bring to the attention of members of this house an editorial recently published in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald which comments on Professor A. K. Cairncross' report which emphasizes a situation that is not usually given the consideration it merits. The article appeared on March 1, 1961, under the heading "An Epidemic Force" and reads as follows:

> One particular piece of basic philosophy to be found in the report on the ills of the Atlantic provinces which has just been submitted by Professor A. K. Cairncross of Glasgow university should be necessary reading and re-reading for all those in governmental positions of responsibility for tackling this growing problem. It is this:—

The article then quotes from the report as follows:

> "The mere existence of a chronic labour surplus is usually sufficient to generate obstacles to development in the habits and outlook of the population. The pace of work becomes slowed down where unemployment is a frequent recurrence. Why hurry towards idleness or work under pressure where others could lend a hand? Ambition is curbed, the response to economic incentives is blunted, mobility is reduced and hopes of a higher standard of living are stifled. Thus even the opportunities that plainly exist may be neglected and the failure of the community may be attributed to apathy, laziness or lack of enterprise."

This is the third year that I have placed this bill before the house, but I feel certain there never has been a time when its debate has been more appropriate than now. Very recently in my constituency of Cumberland the very fine citizens of Joggins were informed that the coal mine upon which the area depends for a livelihood is to be closed forthwith. This situation coupled with the one that has been in existence in the disaster scarred town of Springhill, indicates that new, realistic, bold, imaginative and immediate steps must be taken if they are to have the opportunity to secure new types of industry to employ the responsible, willing and able working force available to them.

The submission that I make which is included in this bill is not an unrealistic one but one that has been tried and proven successful in Italy, Belgium and France, and in those areas of England, Scotland and Wales, where unemployment was persistent. It has been proven in Puerto Rico and now has been adopted in the United States. I see no reason why we cannot, and should not, go forward immediately and give to the Atlantic area that hope, which they must have and certainly deserve and which is inherent in this bill.

I know my constituency is not the only one in the Atlantic provinces that suffers from this dilemma at the present time. I am quite certain that it is not necessary for me to point out the problems of these other areas, for they have seated in this house able and energetic representatives who I am certain will be only too anxious to express their own opinion, if the time is available to them, under this particular bill.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to give my wholehearted support to the bill which has just been introduced by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates), an act to provide for the development of certain provinces by distribution of industries and by reduction of unemployment therein.

There is no need for me to repeat my view regarding this particular matter so far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned. I have spoken in this house on many occasions, and have brought forward the needs of the Atlantic provinces. Speaking on the last supply motion on Monday of this week I expressed the policy of the official opposition with regard to the development of the Atlantic provinces. I mentioned at the time that the double depreciation measure for depressed areas introduced by the government was insufficient and would not provide the remedy which is required to take care of the situation.

The situation in the Atlantic provinces at this time is certainly not the best. The latest unemployment figures which were released on Tuesday of this week show that in the middle of February we had 101,000 unemployed people in the Atlantic provinces. This figure represents an increase of 17,000 over and above the figures which were released for the month of January this year. This means that out of a total increase in unemployment of 26,000 persons for the whole of the country, 17,000 or 65 per cent of that increase came from the Atlantic provinces. It is no wonder that we on this side of the house are concerned about this problem, and we are pleased that for a change one of the government members agrees with us and admits that we need special measures and special incentives, to take care of this situation.

The bill introduced by the hon. member is in line with the policy which has been expressed by the official opposition. It is in line with the resolutions which were discussed at the Liberal rally held early in January. I know that effective measures must be taken at once to take care of the situation, particularly in the Cape Breton area where coal mines will be closing almost regularly starting from the month of May and continuing for the balance of this year.

It is most unfortunate that the present government has not realized the seriousness of the situation before this time, when it is too late. The government should have realized the seriousness of the situation in 1958 when we of the official opposition disclosed the situation as we then saw it and as we felt it would become in the years to follow. As I have said, the action taken by the government has been insufficient and has not taken care of this situation. If the government are prepared to accept the provisions which are included in this bill, we are sure they would at least alleviate the situation.

It is most unfortunate that an area like the Atlantic provinces, with natural resources at their disposal, is being deprived of secondary industry and does not receive the share of industry which it deserves in order to maintain its economy in the same manner as the rest of Canada.

Under the present administration individual workers in rural areas—tradesmen such as carpenters and so on—who have been receiving unemployment insurance benefits in years past have this year been deprived of those benefits. A few moments ago I received a letter from an individual in my constituency who employed a carpenter last summer for a period of four and a half months. That man was disqualified from receiving unemployment insurance benefits—

Mr. MacLellan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill which members from the maritimes would like to discuss. I think the hon. member for Gloucester should be confined to the point before the house and should not waste the short time which we have to discuss this very important matter.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us reads:

An act to provide for the development of certain provinces by the distribution of industry and for the reduction of unemployment therein.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the point of order is well taken. The application of the Unemployment Insurance Act has really nothing to do with this bill, the purpose of which is related to the Atlantic provinces, whereas the Unemployment Insurance Act applies to the whole of the country.

Mr. Robichaud: I will abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker. Nevertheless I wish to repeat that the measures introduced so far, such as the double depreciation measure which was included in the baby budget, do not meet the needs of the Atlantic provinces. In the Atlantic provinces we need additional capital and tax incentives. This situation will not be remedied by allowing new industry double depreciation for one year. That measure will not improve the situation.

I wish to repeat what I said earlier. I completely support this bill. I agree with the hon. member for Cumberland, and I hope that this time all hon. members from the Atlantic provinces, whatever their political affiliations, will be in agreement and will support the measure.

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all like to extend my heartiest congratulations to the dynamic hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) who has brought this very important bill before the house this afternoon. I think my greatest pleasure while serving in the House of Commons to date has been in my association with other hon. members from my province and indeed from the whole Atlantic area. These hon. members have always endeavoured to keep the problems of the Atlantic region before the government. One of the foremost leaders at all times in this effort has been the hon. member for Cumberland.

It is important to note that Bill No. C-23 introduced by the hon. member for Cumberland pinpoints one of the chief problems of the Atlantic area. Our chief problem is to develop further manufacturing industry in the area which will provide more employment. Indeed, I could not help but remark to myself, while the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) was speaking, how little had been done in all the years when the party of which he is a member was the government of this country. I also remarked how much the unemployment problem which we have in the Atlantic provinces today is due to the carelessness of that administration and the fact that in those days there were so few people to speak out for the Atlantic area.

It is particularly apt that this bill should come before the house at this time, when we are experiencing such great difficulty in the coal industry in Cape Breton. This is a difficulty which has been advancing over the years. It is paramount at this time because of the surplus fuel oil, residual oil, hydro power and natural gas upon the Montreal market in particular. It is too bad that in the days when the hon. member for Gloucester was on the government side of the house he did not bring to the attention of the government of that day the effect upon the coal industry of the maritimes, of the completion of the natural gas pipe line to Montreal.

Indeed, one of the reasons for the problem we have today in the coal industry is the surplus gas being pumped to our traditional markets in Montreal and east. It is a shame that this fact was not brought to the attention of the former government which sponsored that pipe line prior to 1957.

Many of our industries in the Atlantic provinces are doing very well at the moment. Our tourist industry has grown very appreciably in the last few years. Much of the credit for that growth is due to the considerable expansion in our national parks and in the development of other tourist activities in our region. Much of it is due also to the new roads which have been constructed through the greatly increased grants made available to the Atlantic area since 1957.

As I am sure the hon. member for Gloucester will agree, the fishing industry is growing steadily in all Atlantic areas, and we look forward to an expanding market and to an increased sale of fish products in the years ahead. Our dragger fleets are growing, our fish plants are generally busier than in previous years and we can expect this resource industry of the Atlantic area to continue to expand. In Nova Scotia in particular there has also been a great increase in the market for pulpwood over recent years. At the moment I am proud to say that in my own riding at Point Tupper there is being built at a cost of about $40 million, a pulp mill which will almost double the demand for pulpwood in the province. In addition, there is an increased demand for pulp for export. Generally speaking, while we must grapple with the problems of our declining coal industry, we rejoice in the fact that a new door is opening and that the forest industries will provide increased employment.

Agriculture, too, stimulated by the new market for pulp, which means extra cash in the hands of the farmers, is increasing in importance. Certainly our problem is not one of surpluses but rather one of production. The effort being made in all the Atlantic provinces, but particularly in my province, to increase agricultural production is one of which we can all be proud and one which augurs well for the general economic future of the region.

However, I should like to point out that resource industries, such as fishing, agriculture and forestry are activities of a type which do not effectively remove seasonal unemployment. This has been the case for many years and the situation can be cured only by an industrialization program of some kind which would mean more employment of that type in the Atlantic area. Some big strides have been made toward increasing manufacturing production in the Atlantic provinces. As the hon. member for Cumberland has mentioned, Industrial Estates, with the encouragement of the Stanfield government in Nova Scotia, has fostered the establishment of a substantial number of new industries and, the new mill at Point Tupper, about which I spoke a moment ago, is the first major manufacturing plant to be established in Nova Scotia since the Mersey pulp mill was established in 1925. In all these years between 1925 and 1960 no substantial new large industry was established in the province. It has been owing to the forward-looking confidence and faith of the premier of Nova Scotia and the dynamism of his government that there has been a stimulation of industrial manufacturing and industrial settlement in the province and we all hope very much that this process will continue.

I spoke a moment ago of a number of our resource industries which are now doing very well, though we lack sufficient manufacturing plants. I might say also that the primary steel plant in Sydney which supplies much of the steel sold in Canada had a good year in 1960. It enlarged its markets. It is very efficient and it is able to compete with most other primary producers on this continent. The men who are employed in this industry are grateful in particular to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) for his help to the company when it was seeking out new orders in 1960.

However, the general problem of establishing industries in the Atlantic area has not been solved. What strides we are making, and I do not minimize them, have been against the tide that runs against the Atlantic provinces owing to our geographical position. We are a long distance from the markets which our manufactured goods must find in Ontario and Quebec. Manufacturing industries in the Atlantic provinces which sell goods in the central provinces are at a disadvantage. They have to bear the extra cost of maintaining a sales force far from home, and the lack of a large local market to help set up the primary source of sales which is so important particularly to infant industries.

An example of the difficulties under which industry labours in the Atlantic area is to be found in the experience we have encountered in trying to coax into Nova Scotia the new rolling mill, which Dosco proposes to build on the St. Lawrence river east of Montreal. One of the most important markets for primary steel is that provided by the demand for cold rolled products. If Dosco's primary steel mill at Sydney is to enjoy stable markets in the future it is very important that the corporation build a cold rolling mill to process Sydney ingots. We from Nova Scotia have been pressing for the construction of the mill in Cape Breton Island. A new industry such as this would give a tremendous uplift to our economy.

However, Dosco insists that, to be economically successful, the mill must be located close to its potential market which would be in the Montreal area. It says that it is only one of several firms considering locating in Quebec and that if it does not move into the area, some other steel company will do so. Their position is that it would be of no advantage to Nova Scotia to have a cold rolling mill built in the province if in a few years Stelco or some other processor moved into Quebec, where it would be in a position to capture a large portion of the Quebec market. They also say that transportation difficulties are not the only problem since, while transportation subsidies might equalize prices for a company manufacturing in Nova Scotia, the company in Quebec, as a local industry with its headquarters in the area, would have a distinct selling advantage and be able to offer better delivery service and more convenient contact for custom and special work.

If there is any way in which these difficulties can be overcome, the construction of the proposed rolling mill in Cape Breton would go a long way towards solving our present coal industry crisis. But if the mill must, for economic factors beyond control be built at Contrecoeur or some site along the St. Lawrence, then it is vital that special transportation assistance be provided to carry primary steel from Sydney to the rolling plant, wherever it may be built.

The Atlantic provinces in general have been very pleased with the special help which has been provided since 1957. The Atlantic adjustment grants are in themselves an example of this. Over-all grants to the Atlantic provinces, conditional and unconditional, have doubled since 1957. Moreover, other provisions of this government, although not specifically designed for the Atlantic area, will be of great benefit to my province. I refer to such projects as the vocational training program. Only the other day the premier of Nova Scotia announced the building of a vocational training school on Cape Breton Island. It is a school in connection with which there will be no need for assistance from the municipalities. This will be of great help in training men in the eastern part of Nova Scotia. However, in order to strike at the root of the problem of seasonal unemployment in Nova Scotia we need more than anything else to develop more manufacturing industry. Only manufacturing can provide us with the steady year-round employment which we need in order to give stability to our economy.

We can have manufacturing industry if in some way we are able to equalize the profits that an entrepreneur can earn in Nova Scotia, or any other province in the Atlantic area, and those available to him in the other provinces. Regardless of transportation subsidies which we must have and regardless of other aid which may be made available to the Atlantic area, unless we can provide as great a profit to a manufacturer in the Atlantic area as he can find in the more populous areas of Canada then we will have a difficult time in establishing industry there.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Cumberland we need special assistance to help us in the financing of industries in the Atlantic area. It is not as easy to provide financing for manufacturing there as it is in other areas. We should like to have that special help in a manner suggested in the bill presented by the hon. member for Cumberland. We also need tax concessions to help us equalize profit opportunities in the area. Because of transportation and other difficulties it is not possible to earn the same ratio of profit. Therefore it does not seem fair to me that a company in the Atlantic area faced with all the obstacles involved in manufacturing there should have to pay as high a corporation tax as do manufacturing companies elsewhere in Canada. If we could say to the owner of a company that might locate in the Atlantic area that even though his profits might be lower, he would have a lower rate of corporation income tax to pay over the period he would be in the area, I am sure this inducement would mean the difference between his company locating in our area as against a more populous or more geographically-favoured region of the country.

I feel it is only through the establishment of industry in that area with the help of transportation subsidies and the availability of industrial credit and above all of tax concessions to equalize profit opportunities that we can overcome the far-reaching problems of the Atlantic area in relation to the attraction and development of manufacturing industry.

As I have said, we from the province of Nova Scotia and from other parts of the Atlantic area are grateful for the consideration that has been given to our problems by the government to date. It is certainly quite a change from the attitude that existed in the period of which I spoke from 1925 to 1955 when so little progress was made in terms of providing new employment sources or potential in the Atlantic area. However, I suggest to the government that in taking further steps to help us become self-sufficient, and to help us earn our way in this great and expanding nation, nothing is more important than to encourage the development of manufacturing industry to provide employment in Nova Scotia and the Atlantic area. At this particular time when we in Nova Scotia are faced with the dire threat of mine closures it is more important now than at any other time that the government give all possible consideration to such concessions as will induce manufacturing industry to settle in the Atlantic area.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, while this bill is addressed to a particular section of the country from which I, like so many other hon. members of this house, do not come, all our interests are so interdependent that there could be nothing but encouragement for participation in this debate by hon. members who come from sections of Canada other than the maritime provinces.

I rise to speak in support of the principle and indeed much of the content of this bill because if there is any section of our country that needs the kind of assistance envisaged in this bill, it is the Atlantic provinces area. I refer to the four Atlantic provinces and particularly, perhaps, those on the mainland. I well recall the speech made in this house on Monday last by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) who outlined the economic conditions prevailing in the maritime provinces and indeed the remedies which he proposed encompassed many of the provisions of this bill. The discussion we had on that occasion had to do with a matter which in principle involved the recommendations contained in the operative parts of this bill.

We have heard from the hon. member who has just taken his seat and from various other hon. members who participated in the discussion on the previous occasion and from the hon. member for Gloucester today about the background of economic and social conditions in the maritimes at the present time which warrant our support of this measure. These matters should serve as notice to the government of not only the desirability but the vital urgency for the government to take measures more formidable than those now before us, not only to correct the situation in that section of the country but to deal with similar conditions that prevail to a greater or lesser degree in every part of our nation.

The facts of the situation in the Atlantic provinces are these. Eighteen per cent of the labour force in the Atlantic provinces is out of work, according to the latest figures given to this house officially on Wednesday last.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does that figure not incude a high percentage of fishermen?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In reply to my hon. friend let me say first of all that fishermen are not included in the figures. That was as a result of a decision taken by this government two years ago. In addition to that whether or not they are included, I do not know why my hon. friend in particular should regard fishermen as being less deserving of remedial legislation in the matter of unemployment than any other segment of the working force.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The point is that on the basis of the last available figures 18 per cent of the working force in the maritime area is out of work. That percentage is so much greater than the national average of 11.3 per cent as to give any hon. member of this house cause to be greatly concerned about conditions in the Atlantic provinces. There was an increase in the last reported figure of some 23,000 more Canadians out of work than in the previous reported period and of that 23,000 no less than 17,000 come from the Atlantic area. Those are alarming facts.

It seems to me this bill, which I should like to see receive immediate passage, is one which if implemented by the government would not immediately but would in the foreseeable future provide the kind of encouragement for the relocation of industry that might materially assist the maritime provinces. The immediate problem in the Atlantic area, however, is not covered by this bill. The immediate problem is that 2,800 miners will be out of work as a result of the shutdown of mines at the end of May. That is a matter of grave concern to everybody in the maritime provinces and particularly to people in places like Glace Bay, Sydney Mines and Waterford. It is a matter of serious concern to all people of Canada that at the end of May the mines will be shut down and at least 2,800 miners will be out of work in adition to those miners who are already unemployed.

When we realize the problem in regard to the relationship between the lack of certain skills and the availability of employment, we can well appreciate what this is going to mean in human terms to so many people in the Atlantic provinces and indirectly, on that account, to Canada as a whole. While this bill is commendable and touches upon the type of thing we have been advocating in our criticism of the government's program of double depreciation designed to assist areas of chronic unemployment, I should hasten to say this. The measure now before us will not solve the immediate problem that confronts the coal miners in the Atlantic provinces and in particular in the areas I have mentioned.

Of course, this bill is worthy of support because it highlights the weakness of the program announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his baby budget speech on December 20. In his only reference to unemployment the minister said that the government was going to try to meet the national emergency by a system of accelerated depreciation, particularly described as double depreciation, in order to assist industries in relocating and to encourage industries already established in areas of chronic unemployment to stay there. We have criticized the government's program of double depreciation because of its limited extent. A program of double depreciation that is to be in force for only one year is, of course, of no great consequence. I have made the statement—and it has not been challenged by the Minister of Finance—that the program will not bring one industry to one community in Canada. That being so—and it is supported by the evidence of those who have no political interest in making comments on the government's depreciation program—it reveals that the government is lacking in its approach to the whole problem of unemployment.

If the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) would come forward with a bill or an announcement based upon section 11 of the Income Tax Act, which would incorporate some of the provision, in this bill, we would not have the same substantial grounds for criticism of that measure as we have had, because in this bill the hon. member proposes a form of accelerated depreciation, but he also proposes loans to assist enterprises in reducing high unemployment. He proposes that there should be bank grants to acceptable persons or companies to be used in the establishment of or assistance to industrial enterprises. Bank loans and development loans are the things that are now being tackled and are part of the crash program being undertaken in the United States in its program of accelerated depreciation.

This bill is valuable not only for what it proposes but for what it exposes, namely the weaknesses in the government's declared policy to meet the situation not only in the maritime provinces but throughout Canada generally. I could go on commending this bill, pointing out its good features and comparing them with the weaknesses and the wants of the government's own program; but so anxious am I, as are other hon. members in this party, to see this bill pass so that it can be used as a sanction on the government to take a more vigorous step to do something about this serious problem of unemployment that now obtains in the maritime provinces that I will not do so. These figures cannot be scoffed at; they cannot be ignored. When 18 per cent of the working force of the maritime provinces is out of work it is a matter of the gravest concern not only to that area but to everyone in this house. The government of the day, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) and other ministers in the house today, along with the minister without portfolio from Newfoundland should rise in their places—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I draw to the hon. gentleman's attention that I have been promoted to the office of Solicitor General?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did the minister a great injustice.

Mr. Lambert: What about the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith)?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wish the Minister of National Health and Welfare had been here when we were discussing old age pensions earlier this afternoon.

An hon. Member: He was here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, he was not here. I invited him to take part in the debate. I want to say to the hon. member I regret I referred to him as the minister without portfolio. Of course, I knew he was Solicitor General. It was only because one is tired at the end of a long week that one makes these errors. I wish to say that the hon. gentleman deserves a much more effective and important post than that of Solicitor General. I would have hoped that the government would recognize the maritime provinces by using not only the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) from that area but also the productive capacities of the Solicitor General who could add to his general legal knowledge, his knowledge of the maritimes and of Newfoundland and push this slow-moving government into action. I hope the Solicitor General will take part in this debate for one minute, because we want this bill to pass today. I hope he will give it his support and urge on his colleagues the adoption of policies that have been proposed by private members of the Conservative party based upon recommendations made by Liberal members of parliament from the maritime provinces.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover of this bill, but we should like to draw to the attention of the hon. member the fact that this bill should apply not only to the four maritime provinces but to all of Canada. The need is as great in a number of other mining areas as it is in the maritimes. I presume the maritimes are generous enough to give us the opportunity of receiving the benefits that they and other parts of Canada also need very badly.

I hope we shall have the opportunity of amending this bill when the appropriate time comes.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to talk out this bill because it is a very important one. I see the time is getting short, but I do want to indicate my support of this measure and to make one or two observations with regard to my own province. There is nothing in this bill that has not been proposed on many occasions in the past. If we are to put this bill into effect we must realize that, however desirable it is to attract industry to the maritime provinces, the economic laws cannot be completely ignored. In my opinion, a rational program will first of all utilize the resources that are available in any particular area. In my own province, of course, the main industry is fishing and I think a great deal could be done to modernize this industry, to improve marketing and to reduce the cost of operations.

As far as manufacturing industries are concerned, of necessity they must be on a small scale. There again, they should utilize the skills and materials that are available there. I should like to recall to the house that in the early days the great industry in the maritimes was shipbuilding. We have a great tradition in the building of ships, and great skills not only in building them but in managing them and sailing them. A great deal of our prosperity in days gone by was based on that fact alone. We need a shipbuilding industry in Canada, and I think that is one thing that should be given much more encouragement than is the case at present. It is all right to concentrate the shipbuilding industry in one or two places but this is something that the maritime provinces can do as well as or even better than other parts of Canada. I should like to see a special shipbuilding program introduced particularly for the benefit of the maritime provinces.

I am going to take only another minute to say that whatever are the industries we establish in the maritime provinces and in my own province in particular, they will not survive unless something is done about transportation because over the years every industry that we have managed to get started has foundered on transportation costs. I am speaking from memory but I do not believe that the bill makes provision for any special concessions for industries in the maritimes with regard to freight rates. That is an absolute "must" if we are going to do anything of a concrete nature.

I think it is shortsightedness on the part of big business in other parts of Canada not to realize that a nation cannot exist, as our deputy minister of economic development said a short while ago, half rich and half poor. It is in the interests of the richer provinces to spend some of their money in developing industries in those provinces which are not so well off, thus raising the standards in those provinces. In my own little province of Newfoundland we already constitute a market with a value of some $250 million for the central provinces. This could be expanded to a billion dollar market if industries were developed in our province even to a small extent. I do not want to take any more time. I hope that the government will take the bill seriously and that it will be given swift passage through the house.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) was good enough to suggest that I make a few observations with regard to the bill.

Mr. Robichaud: Don't talk it out.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): He asked me to avail myself of a minute at least in order to say something but I could not in a minute or even in an hour do justice to the valuable contributions which the government has already made to the Atlantic provinces in the three and one half years we have been in office.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us pass this bill first.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Essex East was a member of a government that ruled this country for 22 years. It has been said that in the short time we have been in office we have done far more beneficial things for the Atlantic provinces than the Liberal government did in all the time they were in office. Let me mention three or four of the salient things that have been done by parliament on the recommendation of the government since 1957. The hon. member will recall distinctly the dominion-provincial conference which was called in November of that year.

Mr. Robichaud: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the bill before us has to do with the distribution of industry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It seems to me that one might put forward an argument for or against the bill on the basis of whatever measures the government has or has not adopted. The hon. member will also appreciate that he discussed the problem of double depreciation as having a relation to the bill. It seems to me that the minister may also draw an argument from other measures.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I would point out that I believe these things are very important so far as the discussion of the bill is concerned. I was going on to say that we gave the Atlantic provinces $25 million a year for four years; and at the recent dominion-provincial conference it was arranged that this amount would be increased by $10 million which will enable the Atlantic provinces to do things they could not possibly do otherwise. This grant to the Atlantic provinces provided a tremendous lift when it was given. We also gave them loans to assist in the construction of transmission lines for electricity and for the development of electricity through the use of coal and the construction of interconnecting lines. I have in mind a statement I have quoted before by the president of the Atlantic provinces economic council to the effect that this action saved millions of dollars. He referred to a figure of $60 million. This action was of tremendous value to the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Robichaud: Will the minister permit a question? What is the government going to do about the 2,800 miners who are going to be laid off?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I cannot deal with everything in a minute. I promised to speak for only a minute or two. With regard to my own province of Newfoundland, the federal government offered to assist the government of Newfoundland in the construction of a transmission line from Bay d'Espoir on the south coast of Newfoundland to Grand Falls and Corner Brook which would cost $13 million and was prepared to give the government of Newfoundland 40 years in which to pay for it at a low rate of interest of a little over 5 per cent. If that is not offering assistance to the Atlantic provinces and enabling them to establish industries which they could not otherwise establish without access to such a valuable source of electrical power, I do not know what is.

The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) comes from New Brunswick and he knows that the former government which he supported would not assist the government of New Brunswick by way of loans to help them in the construction of the Beechwood project.

Mr. Robichaud: Give us a chance to pass the bill.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): This government has assisted the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. Robichaud: Don't let the minister talk out the bill.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should also like to point out—

Mr. Robichaud: Don't talk it out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I see it is six o'clock.

Mr. Robichaud: A cabinet minister has talked out the bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would there be any disposition to carry on for a while in order to pass the bill?

Mr. Nowlan: The same disposition that you showed at noon today.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not think I should carry on because it would take me a long time to speak about all the things I might mention.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have heard hon. members call it six o'clock.

Mr. Robichaud: Pass the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Robichaud: Will the minister give us the business for Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, last night the house leader gave the order of business for Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, possibly subject to some slight change. That has been the usual procedure, and there is no change from the order of business which he announced last night.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CONTRIBUTION TO ROAD PAVING, PARENT, QUE.

Question No. 123—Mr. Argue:

1. In 1959, did the Department of National Defence contribute in any way to the cost of paving approximately one mile of the main road through the village of Parent, Laviolette county, Quebec, including the raising of several manholes of existing sewers?

2. If so: (a) for what reason? (b) what was the cost involved to the Department of National Defence? (c) who was responsible for the work carried out in regard to (i) planning (ii) supervision (iii) actually doing the work? (d) in the event that the Department of National Defence was responsible for any item under (c), why was the department thus responsible?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

2. (a) To improve the road access to R.C.A.F. station Parent.

(b) $42,792.92 with the village of Parent committed by an agreement, dated June 17, 1958, to contribute 25 per cent of this amount.

(c) (i) Department of National Defence.
(ii) Defence Construction Limited.
(iii) Paquin Construction Company, Val D'Or, P.Q.

(d) The requirements for suitable road service to station Parent could not be met by the resources of the local municipal authority. Recognizing a measure of responsibility for the condition of the street and in the interests of economy and efficiency, the Department of National Defence by agreement with the village of Parent undertook the rebuilding and surfacing of that portion of the village street which forms part of the access road to station Parent.

AUTOMATIC CROSSING PROTECTION, EDINBURGH DRIVE, MONCTON

Question No. 146—Mr. Creaghan:

1. Did the board of transport commissioners for Canada receive an application from the Department of Public Works of the province of New Brunswick for the installation of automatic protection of the railway level crossing at Edinburgh drive in the greater Moncton area?

2. If so, when was the request received, and what is the present status of the same?

3. If a grade separation was requested instead of automatic protection, to what extent would the board authorize a grant from the railway grade crossing fund, and how would the balance of the cost be apportioned, including future maintenance?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The board of transport commissioners for Canada advise as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The New Brunswick department of public works submitted a letter to the board dated February 3, 1961 requesting that automatic protection be installed at the level crossing across the Canadian National Railways at Edinburgh drive in greater Moncton area and by letter dated February 23, 1961 withdrew its request for protection at this crossing, advising that the department proposes to make an application for a grade separation at this location.

3. The board may authorize a grant from the railway grade crossing fund to the extent of 80 per cent of the cost of constructing a grade separation which will eliminate an existing level crossing which has been in existence for at least three years not to exceed, however, the sum of $500,000. If the total cost of constructing a grade separation does not exceed $625,000 and if a grant is authorized from the railway grade crossing fund to the extent of 80 per cent of the cost of construction, the railway company is required to pay 5 per cent and the highway authority having jurisdiction over the highway is required to pay 15 per cent, all in accordance with section 9 of the board's general order 848. If the total cost of a grade separation is in excess of $625,000, the board may authorize a grant from the railway grade crossing fund, not to exceed $500,000, with the balance of the cost to be borne and paid by the railway company and the highway authority in accordance with agreement reached between the railway company and the highway authority, or as the board may direct. The cost of future maintenance of such grade separation would be borne by the highway authority in the case of an overhead bridge and by the railway company in the case of a subway.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MALONEY—REFERENCE TO EVIDENCE GIVEN IN MAGISTRATE'S COURT ON MARCH 22

Mr. Arthur Maloney (Parkdale): I rise on a question of privilege personally affecting me in my capacity as a member of this house. The question of privilege arises out of newspaper and radio publicity concerning evidence which was given on Wednesday, March 22 last in magistrate's court in Toronto during the course of a preliminary inquiry conducted by His Worship Magistrate Joseph Addison into charges against three men, Mr. Robert J. Wright, a former constable of the Ontario provincial police, Mr. Joseph McDermott and Mr. Vincent Feeley.

Among the charges facing these three gentlemen are charges of conspiracy to bribe a police officer and conspiracy to pervert the administration of justice. The witness whose testimony was given the publicity to which I now refer is an officer of the Ontario provincial police named Scott, who is represented as being an undercover agent of the Ontario provincial police and who purports to have kept notes of conversations he had with each of the three accused. Part of the conspiracy which the crown seeks to establish in this case is that the accused tried to bribe officer Scott in order to obtain information as to raids proposed to be made by members of the police force against a number of alleged gaming houses.

During the course of the preliminary inquiry into these charges one of the documents filed as an exhibit was a brief which I am informed contains instructions designed to facilitate a successful prosecution of an alleged gaming house known as the Ramsey club in Niagara Falls, Ontario.

The crown alleges that the brief was prepared at the instance of the accused who were interested in securing a conviction against the then proprietors of the Ramsey club in the hope that a competitor in the gambling business would thereby be eliminated. During the preliminary hearing on Wednesday last, March 22, police constable Scott, while giving evidence as a witness for the crown and while being questioned by counsel for the crown, testified with reference to conversations that he alleges he had with the accused ex-police officer Wright. The evidence he gave on that occasion with reference to the alleged conversations with respect to the brief I have mentioned is as follows. I quote briefly from the transcript when he was being questioned by counsel for the crown on that occasion, and it reads as follows:

Q. What, if anything, did Wright say on this occasion to you, as to any activities of his when he had been on the force?

A. Well, for one thing, he referred to a brief. This brief was common knowledge to both Wright and myself, and dealt with a set of instructions, how to go about prosecuting what we call the old Ramsey Club at Niagara Falls.

Q. And when you say the brief had been common knowledge to you and Wright when Wright was on the force, why had it been common knowledge to you?

A. Well, Wright saw this brief, and I saw this brief, and we both acted upon it, along with other officers of the branch, in an attempt to prosecute that club.

Q. This was, I take it, a typed brief, with details as to how to obtain a conviction against the old Ramsey club?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that had been seen by each of you, when Wright had been on the force?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When you say the old Ramsey club, are you referring to, from your knowledge, the Ramsey club in its location and alleged management referred to here, or some other club?

A. Different management, sir.

Q. Yes, and prior to the present Ramsey club?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Yes, well I have interrupted you.

A. He went into—he told me that this brief was drawn up by lawyers, and also, or included in which was Dave Humphrey, and also he—Wright himself, in composing this brief, and the way he described to me—the way this brief got into the anti-gambling branch—in that he said the brief was given to Fred Maloney, the federal member of parliament, who gave it to Jim Maloney, the minister of mines in Ontario, who in turn gave it to Inspector Stringer of the Ontario provincial police, and Inspector Stringer gave it to Sergeant Anderson of the anti-gambling branch.

Q. And, speaking from your knowledge, apart from what Wright told you, you have indicated that the anti-gambling branch did, in fact, receive a brief, as you have described?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Speaker, the first point to be observed is that my name is not used at all. While officer Scott was giving this evidence he was referring, I suppose in order to refresh his memory, to the notes he alleges he kept of the conversations he professes to have had with ex-officer Wright. An examination of the notes to which he was referring as he gave his evidence reveals likewise that my name does not appear in them at all but refer to someone else altogether; and the minister of mines for Ontario is designated as "Jim Malone". I will not mention the name of the other person referred to in these notes in the hope that I will help put an end to the character assassination that was commenced when this evidence was given in court. Some of the newspapers, however, for reasons best known to themselves, saw fit to take the liberty of inserting the name "Arthur Maloney" when in fact it had not appeared at all, and this was the news report that went across the country.

As someone who has tried to build up an honourable reputation in this place it seems to me that those responsible took an inexcusable licence with my name.

To their credit, there were certain newspapers and radio stations who, doubtless shocked that such gossip should be admitted in evidence at all in a court of law, refrained from mentioning any names in their press reports. The Ottawa Journal and the Globe and Mail of Toronto so far as I am aware are cases in point. This is true also of radio station CFRB in Toronto. And the Globe and Mail, so far as I am aware, is the only newspaper that took the precaution to refer to the fact that the name "Arthur Maloney" was not used in court at all.

Because, however, of the wide publicity given to the matter and to the suggestion contained in this publicity that my brother and I had seen the brief, I asked and received permission from Magistrate Addison to appear before him on Friday morning last, March 24, to make a statement both on my own behalf and on behalf of my brother, who is indisposed. I stated to His Worship then and I repeat now that neither he nor I at any time heard of such a brief or saw such a brief. It was never at any time delivered to me, nor did I at any time deliver it to him. It has in fact never been in the possession of either of us. To this day I do not even know what the document looks like.

I think I am bound to say that crown counsel in cases such as this has to assume the responsibility of not leading evidence in a public courtroom that is not only inadmissible and irrelevant but contrary to what he knows to be the facts, especially when it involves the use of names that are bound to receive wide publicity.

Why this piece of false and unfounded gossip was admitted at all as evidence is something that I will never be able to understand. Crown counsel last Friday attempted to undo the wrong that had been done by saying this in court:

> Although the stories that had been passed to me as to how this brief came to Inspector Stringer were conflicting; that that did not support an allegation by Wright to Scott that it had gone through the hands of Arthur Maloney or his brother, but were inconsistent with them.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, crown counsel has admitted that the facts in his possession contradict the suggestion that the brief was ever in my possession or in that of my brother. Among other things Mr. Ford said on this occasion were these:

> Your Worship, first, I am very happy to say Mr. Maloney's reputation is, as we all know, completely untarnished, and I think this is an unusual opportunity extended to him. I feel it should be and I for one am happy to accept, as I would always be happy to accept, his personal say.

During the course of my presentation to His Worship the magistrate I complained about the failure of crown counsel to have informed the court that there was no evidence whatever to establish the unfounded statement that the brief had ever come to me or to my brother. Thus, on Friday, Mr. Ford stated as follows:

> Now, my learned friend, Mr. Maloney, suggests that in addition to the statement made by the crown yesterday, that a statement ought to be made that there was no evidence to support any innuendo—first of all, there is no innuendo, and it's not part of the crown's case that my learned friend, Mr. Maloney or his brother are in any way implicated in this case.

In the concluding part of his statement to the magistrate Mr. Ford said:

> On behalf of the crown, and with respect to the court, I was happy to accept Mr. Maloney's statement that he, personally, and through him, his brother, had no part in this. I say again that I accept his statement, that there was never, at at any time, any intended innuendo that they had any part in any way in the matter involved.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in view of what I think was a grave injustice done both to me as a member of this house and to my brother, I had no alternative but to rise today on this question of privilege to set the record straight, in the hope that those who caused the injustice will see to it that what wrong they have done is now set right.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO PRIME MINISTER ON 21 YEARS AS MEMBER

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that our Prime Minister is now fully grown, in that he has now served 21 years in the House of Commons.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when I entered the house this afternoon and noticed all these artificially coloured carnations—perhaps the hon. member for Halton will tell us why blue carnations cannot be grown—I knew that something important had happened. I have since learned that this is an important anniversary for the Prime Minister, and we wish him well. There have been times in the past when I have thought his entry into the house was not an occasion for celebration, but we do wish him well on the occasion of achieving, in a parliamentary sense, his majority.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate this group with the remarks that have already been made in acknowledgement of the fact that today is the 21st anniversary of the election of the Prime Minister to the House of Commons. The Prime Minister has had a very important and distinguished political career in the house, and while we do not always agree with the statements he makes from time to time I think we can associate ourselves with others in wishing him well in the years to come.

As I recall the order of precedence, I believe I am right in saying there are only three members in the house who have been here longer than the Prime Minister. Although, as I have said, we do not agree with him very often on many controversial questions, I should like to say that the people of Saskatchewan take great pride in the fact that a person from that province has had such a very distinguished career in the House of Commons.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. member for Huron, the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia how very deeply I appreciate what they have said.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORT ON MEETINGS WITH B.C. PREMIER

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the house might be interested in a brief report on the meetings I had in Victoria, B.C., on Friday and Saturday last with Premier Bennett concerning the financing of the Columbia river project.

I met with the premier on Friday morning, that meeting being attended only by the premier and myself. In the afternoon we had a further meeting in which one official on each side also participated, and I had a further opportunity for discussion with the premier more briefly on Saturday evening. The discussions were conducted in a very cordial atmosphere which enabled the exchanges to be carried on in a very candid manner.

I think the meetings did prove to be thoroughly useful. They covered very wide ground. It may be said that the discussion was comprehensive.

On my arrival on Thursday evening Premier Bennett presented me with a letter in which he set forth two alternative proposals. These two proposals, along with the federal government's proposal which I had submitted to the prime minister by a letter dated December 6, 1960, were very thoroughly discussed. The representatives of both governments, Mr. Speaker, declared their common purpose of bringing about the implementation of the project as quickly as possible. Further studies will be required in the light of the discussions. These may be expected to be followed in due course by further communications between the two governments. The desirability of the earliest possible commencement of work on the Columbia river project has been acknowledged by both governments.

For the convenience of the house, I should like to table the letter dated March 23 written to me by Prime Minister Bennett and to which are attached the alternative proposals which he submitted on behalf of the government of British Columbia, and also a copy of my letter to Prime Minister Bennett of December 6, 1960. This latter letter has already been brought to the attention of the house, I believe, but if there were any thought of having these communications printed as appendices to today's proceedings it might be convenient for hon. members to have both communications printed together.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the documents submitted by the Minister of Finance shall be printed as appendices to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: for text of letters referred to above, see appendix.]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): We on this side have listened with some interest to the minister's report on his recent visit to British Columbia and the steps he has taken on behalf of the federal government to clear up certain difficulties between the provincial and federal governments which stand in the way of consideration by this House of Commons of the Columbia river development treaty with the United States. Apparently these difficulties are to some extent financial, and to some extent arise out of certain doubts the British Columbia government has about some of the aspects of the treaty. It is unfortunate that these difficulties could not have been cleared up before the treaty was signed and which, since, has been ratified by the United States. In so far as progress has been made as a result of the minister's visit, I suppose he can consider the time well spent in British Columbia.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): We appreciate the report of the Minister of Finance on his visit to British Columbia and his conversations with the prime minister, as he called him, of British Columbia. The minister has given us some details concerning his efforts to navigate the swirling kilowatts of the Columbia.

However, this matter is of increasing concern in British Columbia, as is evidenced by the recent announcement of the British Columbia chambers of commerce and the university provincial research council that they are not in favour of ratification of the treaty in its present form. They urge further study and delay before ratification is considered.

TRADE

REPORT ON CONSULTATIONS WITH HONG KONG AUTHORITIES

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the house might wish to have a report concerning the team of officials who went to Hong Kong to discuss trade relations between Hong Kong and Canada. A question was asked by the Leader of the Opposition last Wednesday in this regard. I reported to the house that a group of government officials would visit Hong Kong for the purpose of discussions with the Hong Kong authorities in regard to trade relations between the two countries.

The purpose of these consultations was to exchange views on the difficulties which had arisen in Canada owing to a rapid increase in imports from Hong Kong concentrated in particular in certain textile products, and to ascertain whether the Hong Kong authorities would be willing to impose voluntary export controls on these products similar to the controls maintained by the Japanese government in order to ensure that their participation in this market proceeds on an orderly basis.

Canadian officials described the difficulties which had arisen in the past few years as the result of a rapid and concentrated increase in imports from Japan and Hong Kong, and explained that on the items in which Hong Kong exports to Canada were concentrated Japan was applying export restraints, and had been for several years.

The recent rapid increases in exports from Hong Kong of certain products tended to undermine the effectiveness of the Japanese restraints. The Japanese authorities had intimated that it would be difficult for them to restrain the growth in their own exports of these products if exports of the same products from Hong Kong were not subject to any restraint. The Canadian officials made it clear that Canada had no desire to curtail the total level of Hong Kong's exports to Canada, but that some method would have to be found for avoiding the concentration of these exports in items where the Canadian market was being disrupted. In the Canadian view the solution which would be most satisfactory for both sides would be a system of voluntary export restraints applied by the Hong Kong government.

While the Hong Kong authorities recognized the nature of the Canadian problem, they could not consider it in isolation from their relationships with other important trading countries. They made it clear that they were not willing at this time to introduce a system of voluntary restraints in respect of their exports to Canada.

The discussions with the Hong Kong authorities were friendly and cordial throughout. The Canadian government appreciates the many problems, political as well as economic, which Hong Kong has to face. I believe the Hong Kong authorities understand the difficulties created for certain Canadian industries by the rapid increases in imports which have occurred.

In the light of these discussions it will now be for the Canadian government to consider what steps need to be taken, bearing in mind the need for avoiding disruption in the Canadian market and the system of voluntary restraints on exports to Canada maintained by Japan.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the minister for his statement to the house on this somewhat difficult subject of trade in certain items from Hong Kong. There is one regrettable feature in this that I think it is desirable we should not lose sight of, however great the problem may be at the time. That is, that the proposal, perhaps of necessity, of the Canadian government in this particular context had to be a negative one and does not really go to the ultimate solution of the problem created for certain industries by this excessive and rapid increase of exports in certain products from Hong Kong.

Perhaps I should not enlarge on this subject at the moment because I would be getting into the realm of debate. However, I do want to point out that factor in the minister's statement and suggest to him that when this problem is receiving the attention of the Canadian government it should bear in mind the necessity for longer term, positive approaches in this field as well as any negative steps that may be necessary at this moment.

WATER RESOURCES

OTTAWA RIVER—BOARD TO STUDY STORAGE AND FLOW REGULATION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, in the latter part of 1957 the dominion government approached the governments of Ontario and Quebec to inquire whether they would join in a study of the existing storages on the Ottawa river and the possibilities which these afford for regulating the flows of these waters in conjunction with those of the upper St. Lawrence for the benefit of all interests affected.

In making this proposal the federal government indicated that such an engineering study would assure that full attention would be given to all navigation, power and riparian interests on the Ottawa river in Quebec and Ontario in a manner consistent with the regulation of the outflows of the international section of the St. Lawrence river. The latter are, as hon. members know, under the jurisdiction of the international joint commission.

I am pleased to inform the house that the governments of Canada, Ontario and Quebec have agreed to establish a three-man technical board to be known as the Ottawa river engineering board to study the storage and regulation possibilities in the Ottawa river basin from the viewpoint of all the interests affected. The federal member of the board will be Mr. T. M. Patterson, director of the water resources branch of my department. Ontario and Quebec members will be designated by those provinces.

The first assignment of the board will be to submit to ministers for approval terms of reference covering the study. It is of course understood that arrangements will be made by my department to ensure adequate and full discussion with representatives of interested federal departments and agencies.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. N. L. Spencer (for Miss Aitken) moved that the eighth report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Thursday, March 23, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Railway Act

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TRANSPORTATION OF MEMBERS' FAMILIES

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-79, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the proposed amendment is as follows. Section 351 of the Railway Act now provides that members of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada are entitled to free transportation, with their baggage, on all railway lines in Canada. The amendment will add to section 351, following the word "Canada", the words:

—and dependent members of their families.

The new section 351 will then read:

Members of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, together with dependent members of their families, with their baggage ...

—are entitled to free transportation on all railway lines in Canada. Such an amendment will do away with the present necessity of members asking each time for rail transportation for dependent members of their families, and will allow for provision of a card to these dependent members of families similar to that now furnished to members of the other place and members of the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES

STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER RESPECTING BILL NO. C-76

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the house would permit me to call attention to an omission or error of the Chair and ask for the indulgence of the house. It arose in a similar circumstance, where an hon. member had risen to ask leave to introduce a bill, namely on Wednesday, March 22, when Bill No. C-76 was given first reading, just as we have given first reading at this moment to another bill.

If I had performed my duty at that time I should have called the attention of the house to the fact—which I did not actually know, but I should have known, in my responsibility for the form in which matters come before this house—that the bill is designed to do only one thing; that is, to repeal and re-enact the Fisheries Act. In other words, it does not propose any legislation but it is simply a repeal and re-enactment of a statute now on the books, and accomplishes nothing whatever in a legislative way.

That, I think, should have been brought to the attention of the house by me, if it was not done otherwise, so that a point of order might be considered as to whether the bill presented and read the first time is, in fact, legislation within the practices of the house. Certainly a bill of that kind has never been introduced before in my experience, either in this or in any other house as far as I am aware.

I do not think further action on my part is necessary now, but I point out the omission on my part so as to bring the problem to the attention of the house in order that hon. members may consider what course should be taken.

The house has read the bill and ordered it for second reading, but I do think I should call attention to the course which the house adopted at a time when it did not have the bill in its hands and could not have known what it was undertaking.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RED RIVER FLOOD CONTROL

Motion No. 88—Mr. Chevrier (for Mr. Pickersgill):

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the federal government or anyone on its behalf and the government of Manitoba or anyone in its behalf since July 1, 1958, regarding the Red river floodway.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): There is no objection to accepting this motion subject to the permission of the province being obtained, the usual provision regarding privileged documents, and an understanding that documents relating to matters under negotiation cannot be tabled at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitations expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this motion?

Motion agreed to.

SARNIA INDIAN RESERVE—CLAIM OF CHIEF ADAMS

Motion No. 89—Mr. Chevrier (for Mr. Pickersgill):

For a copy of any communications received by the minister, or the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, or any official of that department, since November 1, 1960, regarding the claims of Chief Telford Adams, in connection with the sale of the Sarnia Indian reserve to Dimensional Investments Limited, together with copies of the replies to any such communications.

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): This motion can be accepted subject to the usual reservation that the consent of the government of Ontario be obtained.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitation expressed by the parliamentary secretary, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

INQUEST INTO DEATH OF JOHN WASLYCHEN

Motion No. 90—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the government or any agency or branch thereof and any official or staff member of the penitentiary branch since January 1, 1958, regarding the death of an inmate in the British Columbia penitentiary, Mr. John Waslychen, and for a copy of the results of the inquest into Mr. Waslychen's death.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I have to advise the house that I am not able to accept this motion because it calls for the production of documents which have always clearly been regarded as privileged, inasmuch as it asks for the production of documents exchanged between the government or any agency or branch thereof and any official or staff member of the penitentiary branch since January 1, 1958. I am not, therefore, able to agree to the motion. I would point out, however, that a copy of the inquest referred to was tabled in this house on April 28, 1960.

Mr. Speaker: Having regard to the explanation given by the minister, does the mover wish to withdraw the motion?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): This matter has been hushed up in secret for too long. I think the motion should be pressed.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Howard) which was negatived on the following division:

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker may I address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that in two days we shall adjourn for the Easter recess, and in view of the widespread interest in and importance of the subject, can the minister give some guidance to the house as to how soon after our return on April 10 we are likely to have a new budget and a statement of fiscal prospects?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): All I can say is that the slow pace at which the business arising out of the supplementary budget has been moving through the house has greatly retarded the date of the main budget. At this present moment I am in no position whatever to give an indication as to the probable date or the probable period in which it may be possible to introduce the main budget.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the blue colour which is evident here today, and which has been typical of all the minister's budgets, including the baby budget, will he take some guidance from the colour offered by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh)?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I might be more disposed to take an example from her colour than from some of the ideas that have been expressed from that quarter.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PICTOU, N.S.—REQUEST FOR ORDER FOR RAILWAY CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a telegram from Robert MacNaughton, president of the united steel workers of America, following a public meeting of residents of Pictou county dealing with unemployment, and in particular asking whether the government could seek to obtain an order for the Eastern Car Company to produce railway cars?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did receive such a telegram, and in a day or so I will give a reply thereto.

TRADE

URANIUM—STATEMENT ON ALLOCATION OF CONTRACT WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Might I now give a reply to the question which was asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) on Friday last in regard to uranium arrangements between the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company and the atomic energy authority of the United Kingdom. I have to ask leave of the house, because after the question was asked I promised to reply today, and I am now in a position to do so. The reply is naturally lengthy.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house concur in the request of the Prime Minister to make a rather extensive reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia?

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps it would be better to revert to motions so that the right of reply, if required, can be preserved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If that is the attitude of the opposition I do not choose to revert to motions, and the matter can stand over until tomorrow. I thought they wanted an answer today, but if they do not, that is all right. I decided to give the answer in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who will not be back until tomorrow. If there is objection I will just postpone it until tomorrow.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, as the one who asked the question in the first place, I think it would be preferable if members of the opposition parties had a chance to make some comment. Nevertheless, I think the statement is of such importance that as far as I am concerned I am prefectly agreeable to the Prime Minister making the reply even though it is somewhat lengthy.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I deferred the answer on Friday for a number of reasons, one of which was that the United Kingdom authority had advised that it planned to make a statement later that day. Another reason was the unavoidable absence from the house of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I shall start by reading this statement by the atomic energy authority of the United Kingdom, which sets forth in particular form the situation in this connection. I do so because of the fact that much has been said outside the house with respect to this matter, and much of the recital of what took place will answer the statements that were made to the effect that it was incredible, incomprehensible and shocking that this question had not been fully brought to the attention of the house. Those statements made by the Leader of the Opposition outside the house must have been made without a knowledge of the facts, particularly the fact that he himself was a member of the government which conducted the initial negotiations in April of 1957.

Mr. Pearson: "Initial".

Mr. Diefenbaker: Pardon?

Mr. McIlraith: He is just noting your language.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Leader of the Opposition says "initial". May I add that they were the completed arrangements up to the time that the letters of intent had been given by the British government and accepted by the government of which the hon. gentleman was a member.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is presumably answering the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia. He has brought me into the matter, however, and I hope I will be given the opportunity to reply to those statements made by the Prime Minister which concern me and not the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the statement by the United Kingdom agency reads as follows:

The A.E.A.'s attention has been drawn to statements which have recently appeared about an exchange of letters which took place in 1957 between the authority and Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited about the purchase of 12,000 tons of uranium between 1963 and 1966. In 1958 the authority indicated that as a result of the changes in the United Kingdom nuclear power program they would like to renegotiate the terms of this arrangement. Since that time, and most recently in November, 1960, discussions have been held between the A.E.A. and Eldorado regarding the possibility of major adjustments in the program. The discussions between A.E.A. and Eldorado are continuing and it is expected that they will be resumed in London within the next few weeks. These discussions do not affect the authority's contract for 10,500 tons of Canadian uranium deliveries under earlier agreements which are proceeding.

I mention at this moment that shortly after these letters of intent were exchanged the United Kingdom government began to press for modification of their undertakings before a formal contract would be entered into, and these discussions have continued from time to time since. The exchange of letters referred to in the statement of the United Kingdom on the questions was between Sir Edwin Plowden, chairman of the atomic energy authority and W. J. Bennett, then president of Eldorado. They took place in March, April and May of 1957.

Sir Edwin asked Mr. Bennett if Eldorado would be prepared to supply 12,000 tons of uranium oxide between March 31, 1963 and December 31, 1966 at a price of $8 United States a pound, at which it would be available to Eldorado under the options for continued purchases from those holding production contracts with Eldorado under the United States procurement program. Mr. Bennett undertook that Eldorado would provide this amount on these terms, having secured United States agreement to release that amount of the options, and asked Sir Edwin to confirm that the United Kingdom authority would purchase it, and the latter did so. These undertakings were not reduced to the form of a contract; the correspondence commenced on March 29, 1957 and continued for some weeks thereafter between the president of Eldorado Mining and Refining and the British authority.

All these things took place just three days after a conference between the British and Canadian prime ministers in Bermuda, at which conference there were also other ministers present. These meetings took place on March 25 and 26, 1957. When anyone says he had no knowledge of this matter, I would point out that the ministers who accompanied Mr. St. Laurent were the then minister of trade and commerce, Mr. C. D. Howe, and the then secretary of state for external affairs, now Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). If there is still no knowledge of the matter I would refer to the annex to the press release, which reads as follows:

During the meeting approval was given to a large-scale contract for the purchase of uranium which will greatly assist in carrying out the expanded nuclear program in the United Kingdom. Under this contract the United Kingdom atomic energy authority will purchase, during the next five years, uranium to the value of about $115 million from the Canadian government agency, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, which in turn has entered into purchase contracts with Canadian mining companies. This contract has been worked out with the co-operation of the United States atomic energy commission and is similar in terms to the contracts by which that commission purchased uranium from the same agency.

Then there is this addendum:

The ministers also discussed arrangements to supply United Kingdom requirements for uranium fuel after this five-year period and agreed that further discussions on this matter should proceed between the agencies concerned.

That last paragraph was the basis upon which negotiations continued thereafter. These undertakings were not reduced to contract form as had been the case in the past. The reason for this was the fact that the United Kingdom found that its letter of intent covered a quantity of uranium far beyond that which it had expected to use and that the cost was much higher than it had expected. As a result the United Kingdom, for a year or so following the letter of intent, continued to negotiate with representatives of Eldorado.

This was the third transaction for the supply of uranium to the United Kingdom authority, as was made clear by Mr. Gilchrist in his evidence before the special committee on research early in March. The first was a contract for the supply of 11 million pounds or 5½ thousand tons prior to March 31, 1962, and was to be met by diversion from the contracts originally made to meet United States requirements. This was arranged among the representatives of the three governments. The second transaction was for the supply of ten million pounds during the year from April 1, 1962 to March 31, 1963, as part of the general program worked out with United States authorities. The first and second agreements required production contracts with Canadian producers and were part and parcel of the program for which Canadian production facilities were created and for which an allowance to amortize capital costs was included in the contracts.

The third transaction, that is the one in question before us, was an undertaking which did not require any immediate production contract as it could be met, if necessary, by diversion from supplies under option as a result of the original United States contracts. Consequently there was no need to take action to implement it years before it was to commence; and this was the reason, I take it, the St. Laurent government of the day made no specific announcement of it at the time, other than a general reference to the subject in the communique issued at the Bermuda conference and which I have already placed before the house.

It has been said by Hon. Robert Winters, president and director of Rio Tinto Mines Limited, as reported in the Globe and Mail of March 25, 1961, that he was not aware that the hidden uranium contract had been signed with the United Kingdom on March 27, 1957, at which time he was a member of the Liberal cabinet. Then he goes on to explain that, in the first place, he could not remember the contract and, in the second place, even if he could he would not be able to talk about it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I simply point out that after he ceased to be a minister of the crown he became, within a matter of a few days or a week, the head of this particular uranium firm. Within a few months thereafter the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe became a director of this company. Naturally these facts arouse a question amongst minds as to whether or not there might have been some communication on a question such as this, where letters of intent had actually passed.

However, within less than three months of this existing undertaking, in March, April and May of 1957, and before the undertakings made in an exchange of letters were embodied in detailed contracts, the United Kingdom government decided to stretch out and modify this nuclear power program for which it had been ordering Canadian uranium. The United Kingdom found, as I understand, that it had ordered much more than it was going to be able to use. As a result a representative of the United Kingdom authority informed Mr. W. J. Bennett of Eldorado early in 1958 that they would like to renegotiate the commitments made for the period 1963 to 1966. Sir Edwin confirmed this by letter. Discussions followed between a representative of the United Kingdom authority and Eldorado as well as between government officials, but as yet no agreement has been entered into.

Now, there has been some loose talk about concealment. I point out in this connection that on February 1, 1958 the then minister of trade and commerce and now Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) said, as reported on page 4147 of Hansard for that date:

> As announced on March 26 last at the conclusion of the Bermuda conference, a contract with an approximate value of $115 million has been entered into with the United Kingdom atomic energy authority. Deliveries will be made over a period ending March 31, 1962, by diversion from existing contracts.

This contract is not the one in question, but it is the beginning.

> It was also stated in the joint communique issued following the Bermuda conference that consideration was being given to the supply from Canada of a substantial part of the uranium requirements of the United Kingdom atomic energy authority in the period after March 31, 1962. Arrangements have now been made whereby the United Kingdom atomic energy authority will obtain an additional quantity of uranium with an approximate value of $105 million. The delivery of this quantity will be made over the period April 1, 1962 to March 31, 1963, by a diversion from quantities now under contract which are scheduled for delivery in that period.

Then I underline these words:

> Negotiations are now under way with regard to the supply from Canada of a substantial part of the uranium requirements of the United Kingdom atomic energy authority over the period April 1, 1963 to December 31, 1966. These negotiations are proceeding satisfactorily, and Canada has undertaken to supply the quantity which the United Kingdom atomic energy authority has requested in this period. This will be supplied from quantities under option in the present purchase contracts.

In other words, he referred particularly to negotiations in that connection which, I again point out, have not yet been completed. The Leader of the Opposition had this to say as reported on page 4149 of Hansard of the same date:

> Mr. Speaker, I think the house will have listened with great interest to this important statement of the minister which deals with the development and marketing of one of our most important products and will, I think, have learned with satisfaction that the policy of the previous government in working out bilateral contracts with other governments for the sale of this commodity is making progress.

There is another point in connection with this subject of concealment of these negotiations that I should like to mention. I would point out that there is a survey of the uranium industry in Canada issued regularly. I have before me the survey by J. W. Griffith dated November, 1959. It has been drawn to my attention that this is a government publication, published by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and widely distributed. Indeed, the distribution list includes mining societies, mining, metallurgy and research organizations, the publishers of technical magazines, the mines department and other government departments. The distribution totals several hundred copies. Then, of course, the publication is on sale to the public as well. On page 87 of this document I find this:

> Arrangements are being made to supply the United Kingdom with uranium over the period from April 1, 1963, to December 31, 1966. Supplies for this purpose will come from quantities under option in the present purchase contracts.

In addition to that, why did the previous government give the details of what had been arranged? I point out this fact, that as soon as we took office on June 26, 1957, Mr. Bennett delivered a communication to the then minister of trade and commerce which deals with uranium procurement. He sets out the facts in general, and he says this at page 15:

There has always been, and still is, close co-operation with the government of the United Kingdom and the government of the United States in the matter of the classification of information with respect to all phases of the atomic energy program. A tripartite committee is responsible for recommending the declassification of information.

Up until December 13, 1956, all information with respect to uranium, ore reserves and production was classified. This information was declassified as of that date. However,—

I emphasize this. This is what Mr. Bennett, head of Eldorado and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, said:

However, both the United Kingdom atomic energy authority and the United States atomic energy commission have asked that no information be made available as to the specific quantities of uranium which will be delivered to these agencies in any given period.

That was the course directed and determined by the president of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and Eldorado as representing the policy that had always been followed. The only change in that regard was when an actual contract was entered into.

Discussions with the United Kingdom government have gone on since 1958. By 1959 the United Kingdom had further reduced its planned requirements for uranium and was faced with a larger prospective surplus than it had expected in the preceding year. These discussions have continued intermittently since that time, without agreement being reached.

I underline those words. We are still in the position of having the letters of intent and the acceptance, but the course at all times followed in the past has been that the transaction is concluded by an agreement in writing giving full particulars. As yet we have not been able to secure the signing of such an agreement.

In the meantime, the demand from the other quarters for Canadian uranium has also declined and the United States atomic energy authority decided not to exercise its options to purchase additional amounts under its Canadian contracts. As a result the government decided upon a stretch-out of uranium production by the rearrangement of the existing Eldorado contracts. This has been put into effect and has resulted in enabling some mines with lower costs to continue production for a longer period.

The United Kingdom authority, as well as the United States atomic energy commission, as purchasers, have co-operated in this rearrangement of the production program.

I have already pointed out that on February 1, 1958, the minister of trade and commerce, in a comprehensive review of the Canadian uranium and nuclear power programs, announced that Canada had undertaken to supply the quantity of uranium which the United Kingdom atomic energy authority had requested for the period 1963 to 1966, and that negotiations concerning it were under way. Since then, while the negotiations have continued, we have never reached a conclusion.

Some details about the original undertakings were given early this month to the special committee on research, as was appropriate, and indeed necessary, if that committee was to do its duty properly in considering the Eldorado program as a whole. For some reason no notice was taken of that for some ten days or two weeks.

It has not yet been necessary for Eldorado to enter into purchase contracts in order to meet its commitment to the United Kingdom authority for this 24 million pounds covered by the letter of intent. Until the revision of the production contracts was made in the stretch-out program, Eldorado could get what it required under purchase options in the contracts with producers. After that revision it knew that it could obtain what it would require in the future more simply and cheaply by purchasing it from producers at competitive prices because there is a surplus of production capacity available.

I simply pause to say this. There has been no secrecy and there has been no concealment of any contract. We are still in the position of negotiation regarding the letters of intent. At no time in the past—those were the instructions given as to the procedure in the past—has there been any revelation as to the terms until the completion of a contract. Even then the price was not set forth in all cases, nor were other particulars given.

It was asked by the hon. gentleman whether or not there had been any allocation. It would be unwise, without the completion of a contract, to allocate or even to forecast the basis for allocating this quantity among Canadian producers, until the conclusion of the discussions with the United Kingdom on the terms of the contract and the possibility of major changes in the program proposed by the United Kingdom.

As I said a moment ago, in the early stages of uranium purchase programs the details of amount covered by contracts, the rate of production and delivery were not revealed. Later the main purchasers in the United States and the United Kingdom asked us to keep the details confidential for commercial reasons. In the result, only general information was given out even, as I said a moment ago, when in certain cases contracts had been signed.

There is much more information in this connection that might be brought together. What I have given represents in sufficient detail a recital of the course of events which I suggest gives the answer to the use of incredible language and incomprehensible denials of the existence of something in which the Leader of the Opposition had participated. It also belies the use of the word "shocking" on the part of hon. members opposite in describing what they charged was concealed. There was no concealment.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I expect that you, sir, will give me the same latitude in dealing with this matter that you gave the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), in view of the nature of his reply and the fact that he brought me into his reply by name and referred to statements I have made in regard to this matter. I expect, therefore, to be given the opportunity of answering those statements made about me and about this matter by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the position ought to be clear before the Leader of the Opposition proceeds. The Prime Minister asked for leave to answer a question at considerable length. The Prime Minister was given that leave and answered the question, bringing in references to the Leader of the Opposition, of course.

I should think that apart from leave of the house, those hon. members who are interested would be entitled to ask questions to elucidate the answer or to explain their positions, and that the Leader of the Opposition, to whom personal reference was made, would be entitled to make a personal explanation with respect to his part in the matter. But I would not without leave of the house give the floor to the Leader of the Opposition so that he might make an extended statement, or comment in general terms. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition wishes to ask for more than that, but that is my view of what his rights are.

Mr. Pearson: I ask for the right to reply to the statement which the Prime Minister made about me and about my position on this matter which went far beyond the facts which were necessary to answer the question which was put to him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Leader of the Opposition said I went beyond what it was necessary to include in my answer. I did so because of an ex parte statement which he himself issued on Friday outside this house. I have no objection whatsoever to the hon. gentleman answering any suggestions I made regarding his conduct in this connection.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order, I think it is only fair and proper that the Leader of the Opposition should be given full latitude to make a reply with regard to those parts of the statement in which the Prime Minister referred to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: I take it the house is prepared to recognize the right of the Leader of the Opposition to deal with references to his part in this matter by the Prime Minister in his answer.

Mr. Pearson: I will proceed to do that, Mr. Speaker, and I will say at the beginning that what the Prime Minister has said, not so much in answer to a question but on this general matter, makes the conduct of the government and of the right hon. gentleman with regard to this question even more incomprehensible and incredible than I had previously thought it to be. What we have learned this afternoon from the Prime Minister is that in respect of 24 million pounds of uranium to be delivered from Canada through Eldorado to the United Kingdom atomic energy authority in the period 1963-66 there is no contract at all. That is what the Prime Minister says now, no contract at all. The Prime Minister went to a great deal of trouble to talk about the Bermuda conference—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No formal contract, I said.

Mr. Pearson: No formal contract is no contract. This is an easy way to slip out of this, to slip out of it by using sophistry of that kind. We shall find out whether there is a contract in the minds of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and others by quoting what they have to say. I think I have a right to do that, Mr. Speaker.

The Prime Minister quoted at some length from the proceedings of the Bermuda conference. That conference was one which I remember very well. It took place on March 26 and 27, a few days before the dissolution of parliament which was, I think, on April 10 or 13. That conference issued a statement from which the Prime Minister has quoted. Included in that statement—and the Prime Minister quoted from this paragraph—there is the following reference:

> The ministers also discussed arrangements to supply United Kingdom requirements for uranium fuel after this five-year period and agreed that further discussions on this matter should proceed between the agencies concerned.

Well, of course, as one who was there I knew there would be further discussions between the agencies concerned. Those discussions did not result in a contract at the end of March as has been stated. They went on through May. I believe that they came to a conclusion, as far as negotiations were concerned, some time toward the end of May, a few days before the general election. The Prime Minister says now, no contract came out of those discussions. Then the hon. gentleman wonders—and some of his friends have been wondering—why we did not know all about those negotiations in the early part of June, after the general election? The election was on June 10.

After June 27, the Prime Minister was responsible for these negotiations. He criticizes us and the government of that day for not knowing all about this. We have been criticized also for not knowing that there was a contract at that time, though the Prime Minister now admits, for the first time, there was no such contract.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No formal contract.

Mr. Pearson: I ask the Prime Minister—and this is one of the questions I hope he will answer—if he will tell the house whether there was a commitment entered into with the United Kingdom authorities with regard to the supplying of 25 million pounds of uranium from Canada from 1963 to 1966. Does the United Kingdom admit there was a commitment entered into in 1957 for the supplying of this uranium and if there was a commitment why was that commitment not carried out during the time when we were closing uranium mines in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister has said there were negotiations, but no contract. Let me read from Hansard on that point—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member consider this suggestion? He has asked a supplementary question. Would he consider having it answered at this time?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. I have a lot of other questions to ask arising out of what the Prime Minister has said.

Mr. Speaker: I am not happy about the prospects of a general debate on this matter by question and answer across the house. I believe the house is about to go into committee of supply and it seems to me it would be much better if hon. members would debate this matter at a time when debate is permissible because there is no rule, other than my discretion, which would permit such a discussion as this to continue. It is not too comfortable a position for the Chair to be in to be regulating a debate at a time when no debate should be taking place.

The Leader of the Opposition has the floor to make a statement which explains the Prime Minister's answer in so far as it involves him and reflected on his part in this matter. If the hon. gentleman would conclude that statement I think we might reserve any further debate on this subject until it would be proper for such a debate to take place.

Mr. Pearson: I shall try to deal with those points with which I was directly concerned. Perhaps the most important of them is the Prime Minister's criticism that we did not know all about the subject when we were in office, and he mentioned me by name. The Prime Minister now says there was no contract. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce, only a few days ago, as reported at page 2672 of Hansard had this to say in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond:

> The Canadian government through its crown corporation, the Eldorado company, has a firm contract with the British atomic energy authority. I have received from the British authorities no indication that they do not intend to honour this contract.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce left us in no doubt about what he thought of the position when he made a statement in Calgary as late as Friday last on being confronted with this report that a 24 million pound uranium deal with the British had come to light. Here is what the minister is reported as telling the Toronto Star from Calgary:

> Hon. George Hees, Minister of Trade and Commerce, told the Star the contract would be of great assistance to the industry.

> He said there had been no reason to reveal the contract earlier.

Now I quote from the report:

> "The government doesn't go around shouting what it is going to do in the future".

That, Mr. Speaker, is a laughable observation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce went on to say that there was nothing hidden about it. "Nobody ever asked me about it," he declared.

So the Minister of Trade and Commerce said there was a firm contract. The Prime Minister thinks there was not. The president of Eldorado thought there was a firm contract—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What I said was that a letter of intent was given and accepted but that a formal contract was not entered into and negotiations thereon are still continuing.

Mr. Pearson: Here is what the president of Eldorado said on that score. The Prime Minister was good enough to quote selected passages from this document. Let me quote this. The president, talking about these three contracts, said that these are firm contracts. He repeated that in emphatic terms. Later, on March 3, he said that these are firm contracts and the British can be trusted to live up to their contracts. He went on to say that there are, however, always ways open for re-negotiation.

Now the Prime Minister says it is not a question of re-negotiating a firm contract, a commitment on which the United Kingdom government had entered—oh, no, it is not that —we are now in the process of negotiating a new contract. That is not what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Pearson: That is not what the president of Eldorado said, and if anyone wishes to read the evidence given by the president they will find out he was talking about the 24-million pound firm contract into which the United Kingdom government entered and which was obscured and kept hidden by the government at the time when the uranium industry in this country could have used a contract of that kind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is perfectly untrue.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe that the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) is now referring to evidence given before a committee of the house which has not yet reported. It seems to me that any debate that arises out of that should be deferred until that committee reports. The hon. Leader of the Opposition has had an opportunity to deal with his own knowledge and statements on this matter. If he is not through, I will allow him to finish, but I would ask him to limit himself to that aspect of it rather than refer to aspects that are obviously out of order.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned the president and the committee report because the Prime Minister himself had done so initially to show that his statement was correct. The Prime Minister referred to the president of Eldorado and I now refer to the president of Eldorado, as the president of an agency—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pearson: It was stated in no uncertain terms that there was a firm commitment, and that the firm contract for 24 million pounds was in the process of being re-negotiated with the United Kingdom government. That is a very different story from the one the Prime Minister has told us this afternoon. It will be very interesting to find out exactly what the facts are in this matter. Perhaps there will be an opportunity in debating the estimates to discuss this at greater length and in greater detail. Perhaps on this occasion I will be able to restrain myself to asking the Prime Minister some questions supplementary to that which has been addressed him by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), to which I am not sure he received a reply.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to get into any general debate. I am not in the happy or unhappy position, whichever it may be, of having a record in the government, as has the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), which can be brought forward in this debate. I think that the Canadian people are interested in—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is in the happy position of having the right to ask a supplementary question. If he will do so, he will be in order, otherwise he will not.

Mr. Argue: In view of the latitude that has been allowed this afternoon I think I might be allowed to conclude one sentence.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry but I am not prepared to accept that position. As the hon. member knows, his question regarding this subject was answered originally, and he is now entitled to ask a supplementary question. I suggest he should proceed in that manner.

Mr. Argue: I can proceed in that manner, but I am put in a very awkward position when two hon. members have made speeches based on my question and I am allowed only to ask a supplementary question. However, I would be interested if the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) could tell the house whether or not there is any firm commitment by the United Kingdom in this regard and, if so, for what quantity of uranium. I would also like to know the basis upon which the contracts will be allocated because of the very great interest of many communities in this question. I wonder whether the Prime Minister is prepared to answer the question I have just asked: whether or not the United Kingdom has given a firm commitment, and if so, for what quantity of uranium?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I endeavoured to make that very clear. There was a firm commitment, but before we are in a position to carry it into effect, following the course that has been followed in the past, a contract embodying the terms must be signed and completed, and that has not been done, for discussions have continued intermittently over the last two years with respect thereto. Under the circumstances I spoke at length in this regard in my opening statement.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the Prime Minister would say whether it is the intention of the government to hold the United Kingdom government to their commitment to purchase the 24 million pounds of uranium, or is Canada going to let it off the hook?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not think the United Kingdom government, in its experience, has ever asked to be let off the hook.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights and privileges of every hon. member of this house. My question of privilege has regard to what we have seen today, a shocking abuse of the rules of this house. The Prime Minister has—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question of privilege he should be specific. If he will specifically indicate what the breach of privilege is it will be considered.

Mr. Hellyer: If you will hear me out, Mr. Speaker, I will state it clearly. The Prime Minister, in flagrant disregard of the rules of this house, chose not to make a statement on motions as is the custom with statements of this importance, but chose rather to introduce it at another time on questions before the orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member, if he reconsiders what has transpired, will find that he has not risen to a point of order at the time it was relevant to do so, when he could have been heard, but at a point after the course has been set by the house itself. I see no question of privilege.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister asked the house for unanimous consent and—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I think there is a point of order, Mr. Speaker, arising out of the assertion made by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) who saw fit to criticize the conduct of the Prime Minister in this regard. May I remind Your Honour that the house, including the hon. member for Trinity, gave unanimous leave regarding the course followed by the Prime Minister and now, like a lot of spoiled children, hon. members opposite are seeking to withdraw their leave after the event. This amounts to—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I rather think the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) is attempting to speak to a question of privilege which I have found not to exist.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask leave of the house to—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry, I have heard the hon. member and I have given—

Mr. Hellyer: You have not heard the point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I have been present in the house and have come to the conclusion that if there was a question of privilege the hon. member is too late in raising it now.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister tell us the date on which this firm commitment, or firm contract—whichever terminology he used—was made?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned the period of time during which there were letters passing back and forth. The hon. member will be able to ask that tomorrow, when I think the committee is meeting, and will be able to secure a full answer in that regard.

Mr. McIlraith: Is the Prime Minister able to tell me the precise date on which the commitment itself was made?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that when the president of Eldorado appears before the committee that will be a proper question to ask him.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. When did the Prime Minister personally first learn of this contract?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I learned of the negotiations that were taking place at the time they commenced to take place.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has any comment to make on the statement made by the president of the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company to the effect that there had been no indication that this 24-million pound contract with the United Kingdom government would be—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; the Minister of Justice was interrupting on a point of order?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. I believe, Mr. Speaker—and if I am wrong I shall be glad to be corrected—that the Leader of the Opposition is again doing that which you told him was out of order; he is referring to a statement made in a committee which has not yet reported to the house.

Mr. Pearson: May I just ask the Prime Minister, does he not know of a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the effect that there is no indication that the British government will default on its 24 million pounds uranium contract?

Mr. Benidickson: That statement was made in the house.

Mr. Pearson: That statement was made in the House of Commons.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The word used is "default". The answer is, there has been no indication of default on the part of the United Kingdom government. What the United Kingdom government is endeavouring to do is to bring about a continuing negotiation of the statements and terms made in the exchange of letters, and then to have the agreement embodied in a written contract.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is a fact that the United Kingdom government have accepted the commitment to purchase 24 million pounds of uranium from Canada between 1963 and 1966?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman will know that that was answered by the statement made by the United Kingdom authority the other day.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question supplementary to that which I asked earlier. Did the Prime Minister know about this contract with the United Kingdom atomic energy commission when the United States cancelled its uranium contracts with Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I did not use the expression "contracts"; I used the expression "an exchange of notes, a declaration of intent and acceptance".

Mr. Chevrier: Did the Prime Minister know about the position when the exchange of notes took place?

Mr. Fulton: You were in office then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have already said I know of the general discussion and negotiations that have taken place from the time they commenced.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. McIlraith: Could I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: I will allow one more supplementary. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare has been deferred the floor for some three quarters of an hour.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. Perhaps I was not heard at the far end of the chamber, but I have indicated that I shall allow one further supplementary to close this discussion.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the Prime Minister advise the house as to the date of commencement of the negotiations of this commitment, or renegotiations, as they have been called?

Mr. Diefenbaker: They commenced in 1958.

[Later:]

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. I apologize for not sending notice. It is based on a telegram just handed to me. In view of the purchase by Mr. Roy Thomson of the defunct Elliot Lake Standard on March 15, to recommence publication on March 16, is it possible that the purchase was the result of the release of information on uranium not previously disclosed to the public?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I shall take the question as notice and refer it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MISSING FISHING VESSELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. F. Legere (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister give a report concerning the three Lockeport fishing vessels missing off the coast of Nova Scotia since the storms of March 21?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question on a subject which I know has been of vital concern to him over the past few days.

The Royal Canadian Air Force Rescue Co-Ordination centre at Halifax promptly co-ordinated the search for the missing fishing vessels, and in spite of a secondary storm and later fog conditions a very intensive search of the disaster area was made by surface vessels of the Royal Canadian Navy, aircraft of the R.C.A.F. and the Royal Canadian Navy, with assistance from surface vessels and aircraft of the United States navy, all of which were on exercises in the region involved.

The long-liner Muriel Eileen was found with decks awash on Wednesday without any sign of life. Debris from the Jimmie and Sisters and the Marjorie Beryl was picked up in the search area by the surface vessels. Positive identification of this material was made by the owners of the respective vessels and relatives of the crew members, virtually ending any hope for the safety of the vessels and crews. I am at the same time pleased to report that another vessel, the Felix and Florence Hickey, which was disabled in the same storm, was taken into tow by the tug Foundation Vigilant on Friday, March 24, with all hands safe.

In view of the very thorough search coverage that has been given and the evidence found which indicates that the missing vessels are no longer afloat, search authorities now consider that nothing would be gained by prolonging the operations further. Accordingly, it is expected that the search will be suspended at the conclusion of the operations today.

I know that all hon. members join me in expressing our sympathy to the wives and relatives of the 17 fishermen who must now be feared lost, and to the 50 children whose fathers are the victims of this disaster.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED REMARKS BY DEPUTY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In her absence perhaps the parliamentary secretary will answer.

My question arises out of a speech made by Dr. Davidson, deputy minister of citizenship and immigration, to the effect that reports of Canada's economic conditions, appearing in the British and European press, were malicious libels on the reputation of Canada. Can the minister or the parliamentary secretary indicate to the house more specifically what reports Dr. Davidson was referring to and exactly who was responsible for them?

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF WILDLIFE BREEDING GROUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, notice of which has been given.

In view of the current very active program of exploration in northern Canada and on the Arctic islands for oil and other natural resources, will the minister assure hon. members and all sportsmen in Canada that the natural breeding ground of the Canada goose —that symbol of Canada—and other wild geese, will be protected, so that such exploration activity will not destroy another of our great natural resources, good, wild fowl hunting?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of this question, and I want to assure him that we are fully aware of the potential conflict between the development of mineral and petroleum resources in the territorial and island Arctic areas and the protection of the important wildlife resources, particularly the migratory birds of those areas.

Fortunately we have had no difficulty up to the present moment, but the whole question is under urgent study by some of the divisions of my department. These divisions are those concerned with wildlife interests, the welfare of the native population and mineral development. Full consideration is being given to the implications of resource use in the areas in question.

Mr. Speakman: A supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister could be more specific, and could he tell us of anything positive which his department is doing in those areas toward conservation of the migratory birds?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Up to the present moment we have established six migratory bird sanctuaries in the eastern Arctic regions: one of these is on Akimiski island, another in the McConnell river area, and another north of Churchill; two on Southampton island and also two on Baffin island. There are no sanctuaries established in the western Arctic at the moment. Arctic biologists, however, have surveyed the problem. They are aware of the location of the nesting grounds and we hope to have a similar number of migratory bird sanctuaries established in the western Artic area.

The supplementary question gives me the opportunity to refer to the problem of the potential hazard from aircraft operations. My department has arranged with the Department of Transport to advise all pilots operating in the areas of existing sanctuaries in the eastern part of the Northwest Territories of the location of those sanctuaries. As new sanctuaries are created, similar information will be forwarded to the Department of Transport.

CROP INSURANCE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY PROVINCIAL MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister comment on a reported statement made by the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan, as found in the Leader-Post of March 25, that the federal government has agreed to amendments to the Crop Insurance Act which would make it possible for farmers to participate in an area where less than 25 per cent of the farmers are involved?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of his question before the house opened. The federal Crop Insurance Act does not specify that an area must have at least 25 per cent of the farmers participating in the scheme. I have seen the press report to which the hon. member makes reference and it would appear that the Saskatchewan minister of agriculture was speaking of amendments to the province's crop insurance act.

I have been in touch with the minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan and have written him to the effect that we had in mind something along the line of the 25 per cent coverage which the provincial act in Saskatchewan originally provided. However, in view of the fact that the Saskatchewan government is undertaking a pilot operation this year, I indicated that I would recommend to my colleagues that a percentage less than 25 per cent for a pilot operation should be agreed upon for one year.

Mr. Korchinski: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the minister indicate what percentage he has in mind?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Speaker; I have no particular percentage in mind.

TRANSPORT

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—REPORTED REQUEST FOR SUBWAY LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Now that the cabinet has had a chance to meet following the Prime Minister's return to Canada, is the minister in a position to say whether or not a federal loan will be made to the corporation of metropolitan Toronto to assist the corporation in the speeding up of the construction of the east-west subway?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Trinity, may I say that the asking of that same question is becoming a little monotonous. This is a matter of government policy which involves more than Toronto and the question will be answered by the Prime Minister in due course. I feel presumptuous even trying to answer a question of this sort addressed to me.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, even though it may seem monotonous to the minister, may I ask the same question but directed toward the proposed subway for the city of Montreal?

Mr. Fulton: It should get the same answer.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister if he will give an answer?

Mr. Walker: I thought I had answered that question in my previous answer.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say when he will be in a position to deal with these matters, other than in due course?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to adopt the answer that the hon. gentleman used time after time during his tenure of office. I simply say, as the Minister of Public Works has said, that when the government is in a position to announce a policy in this regard it will be announced.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister give the house any information on the situation in Laos?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, after a week end of intense activity, including a meeting between Prime Minister Macmillan and President Kennedy in Florida, there are indications that the prospects for a negotiated settlement of the Laotian problem have improved. My understanding is that no formal reply to the note from the United Kingdom co-chairman to the Soviet co-chairman has been received but a dispatch, as hon. gentlemen know, in the Soviet newspaper Pravda suggests that the Soviet government will agree to the main elements in the proposals put to them by the United Kingdom government.

An outline of these proposals was given by me in the house on Friday last. The first task following a cease-fire will be the immediate reconvening in New Delhi of the international commission for supervision and control for Laos. The first task of the reconvened commission would be the verification of the cease-fire. When the commission is able to report to the co-chairmen that hostilities have in fact ceased, the next stage will be the summoning of an international conference. It seems probable that the membership of that conference will be wider than that of the Geneva conference of 1954 so that it is likely that Canada will be represented thereon.

The government early made preparations to discharge the obligations that would fall on it should the commission be reconvened. Personnel for full-scale activity by the commission have been ready for some time on a stand-by basis. The exact personnel requirements for the initial meetings of the commission will be determined in consultation with the Indian chairman of the commission whenever a formal request has been received from the United Kingdom and Soviet co-chairmen of the Geneva conference to reactivate the commission.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether the Canadian government made any representations to the United Kingdom or the United States before they made these very important representations and, if so, what was Canada's attitude?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will realize that that question would require a considerably detailed answer and I will simply take it as notice.

FREIGHT RATES

GRAIN—REQUEST FOR DISALLOWANCE OF INCREASED RATES TO EASTERN PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Prime Minister which I do not think will require as much detail to answer. Can the Prime Minister tell the house now, as a result of the statement made in the house by the Minister of Transport with regard to an impending cabinet decision under section 53 of the Railway Act, whether or not the government is prepared to disallow the 25 per cent increase in grain freight rates recently allowed by the board of transport commissioners which is to go into effect on April 1?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in effect this question is sub judice. An appeal is being made to us and I think the hon. member will agree that during the period when the matter is under consideration questions are not proper or within our rules.

Mr. Argue: My question is this. Will the government come to a decision, as has been indicated by the Minister of Transport, before April 1, and when will an announcement of this decision be made?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the necessary papers are not before the government.

Mr. Argue: The increase will be in effect in 48 hours.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BANK OF CANADA—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. I propose to remind him of a commitment that I feel he made to me and, through me, to the house on March 15 when he said that during the following week he would make a statement to the house with respect to the suggestion that the important report of the governor of the Bank of Canada, a report of great democratic interest, should be referred to the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not quoted me very accurately. He asked his question on March 15 and it is to be found in the second column on page 3013 of Hansard. My answer was:

> Mr. Speaker, I expect to make a statement in the house on this subject next week, after hon. members have had an opportunity to peruse the report.

Last Tuesday, March 21, when I was prepared to make a statement, the Leader of the Opposition did not wait for my statement. He triggered the matter by directing a question to the Prime Minister on the very same point, taking the question right away from the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who had first asked it. The Prime Minister answered the question. There was no need then for me to rise and merely repeat the answer given by the Prime Minister. I would suggest a little more teamwork on the part of the opposition.

Mr. Pearson: A little more information from the minister.

[Later:]

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance, as always, had his references ready, but when he quoted himself he did not quote what I said. My question was not similar to the one asked by the Leader of the Opposition on March 21. I asked if the minister would use his good offices to give the nod to the chairman of the banking and commerce committee, the hon. member for York North, to assure the likelihood that there would be approval of a motion to have the governor of the Bank of Canada examined by the banking and commerce committee.

The Prime Minister, as reported on page 3171 of Hansard for March 21, 1961, simply used evasive language to say that this was something within the determination of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member would agree with me that this is a matter which should be pursued in committee.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR LINES—REQUEST THAT OVERHAUL WORK BE DONE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Transport, whoever he might be, whether the attention of the department has been drawn to a report in last Friday's Winnipeg Free Press to the effect that Canadian Pacific Air Lines has carried out 85 per cent of its major overhaul work in foreign countries? If that is so, what steps could be taken to give Canadian Pacific Air Lines an incentive to do its overhaul work in Canada to provide employment for Canadians?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I will accept the question as notice and refer it to the Minister of Transport.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: We are considering further supplementary estimates, item No. 658.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Research branch—

658. Branch administration—to extend the purposes of vote 5 of the main estimates, 1960-61 to include a grant of $10,000 to assist in defraying the costs of the ninth international botanical congress, $1.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few comments on item 658 of the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture. I intend to refer especially to the stabilization of farm prices.

Mr. Chairman, we are being asked to vote $69,504,548 for the rest of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1961. During the discusion of the measure on agreements respecting the development of marginal lands, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) stated, as reported on page 3264 of Hansard:

> Then, there was the stabilization of prices, which is in effect now and the results of which are showing in the income figures.

Mr. Chairman, if we consider the situation which has prevailed these last years, we note that the stabilization of farm prices—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I wonder whether or not the hon. member looked at vote No. 658, which is for the research branch. As a result of listening to the few remarks the hon. member has made, I have come to the conclusion he was not talking about research.

Shall vote No. 658 carry?

Mr. Herridge: Will the minister give us some explanation of this vote to the international botanical congress?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this item concerns a grant of $10,000 toward the ninth international botanical congress. The congress was held and this further sum is required. The reason for the $1 item is that there was sufficient money in the item to take care of the obligation but there was no authority to use the sum for the purpose of helping defray the cost of the botanical conference. The reason for the $1 item before us is to give legislative effect to this vote.

Mr. Benidickson: This is the first item of the supplementary estimates to come before us. The Minister of Finance has been in this house for the same length of time as I have been, and he will recall that the previous government was criticized, particularly by the former hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to the effect that these dollar items should not be used without exceptional justification. He felt that they were designed to give parliamentary sanction to something about which parliament had no knowledge and perhaps no jurisdiction over the amount that would actually be spent in the long run. There are a number of items of this character in these further supplementary estimates, No. 5, 1960-61 now before us. I get the impression that this is perhaps an extension of the practice which has been criticized by private members in the past.

I note that there are four of these one dollar items in the estimates of the Department of Finance. Perhaps when the minister is dealing with those estimates he would give careful consideration to making a statement as to whether or not this is an enlargement of the practice which has been criticized in the past. Perhaps after the dinner recess the minister would be prepared to give some explanation of this matter such as I have requested, and tell us whether or not this indicates a maintenance of the practice or an extension of it. This seems to be a fairly loose method of getting parliamentary approval without members of parliament actually knowing the details of the ultimate expenditure.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Each case stands on its own feet. This is a situation in which there is sufficient money in the item to meet this particular expenditure proposed, but the terms used in the item as they appear in the Appropriation Act are not broad enough to include authority to make this payment. We are coming back to parliament, therefore, not to ask for more money but to ask, in effect, for an extension of the scope of the item. A one dollar item is the appropriate and accepted legislative vehicle for this purpose.

In so far as information is concerned, if the hon. member will look at the details on page 14 of this pamphlet copy of the further supplementary estimates we are now studying, he will see that the item appears as follows:

> Grant towards ninth international botanical congress, $10,000.
> Less—amount available from savings in the main estimates, 1960-61, $9,999.

This leaves the balance of $1 to be voted.

Mr. Benidickson: With all the respect in the world for the efficiency of those who look after government accounts, I just cannot believe they can be so accurate as to estimate within one dollar—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has missed the point—

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister please hear me out. I just cannot believe they can be so accurate in estimating that within one dollar there will be a saving of $9,999 or, shall we say, a lapsing or shortfall in the main estimates of $9,999 and that this can be put alongside a necessary new item of expenditure of $10,000 for the ninth international botanical congress.

The point I raise is that we always have lapses. I have paid my respects to the estimators in our departments, but they cannot always be accurate. If they put a suggestion in the estimates a year ahead that a certain appropriation is required for certain reasons, expenditures under one heading may prove to be either not required or plans may have not advanced sufficiently to entail spending that amount of money within the fiscal year of budgeting. In consequence, such an item would normally lapse.

I raise the question of whether we should enlarge the procedure of introducing a dollar item in the summary of our supplementary estimate requirements, where there is no requirement for the non-observant person to go to the details and perhaps find something that may be quite contrary to that which is related to the lapsing.

We have here a lapsing of $9,999. This amount is apparently not likely to be spent under the main estimates. I am not criticizing the Minister of Finance particularly in this matter, but why does not the Minister of Agriculture direct that the reason is recited in bold, clear detail under the item "Branch Administration"? Why should it not be set out in this item that we require $10,000 for the ninth international botanical congress? Would that not be possible?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that is precisely what the item does. If the hon. gentleman will look at item 658 he will see that its purpose is described in these terms:

> To extend the purposes of vote 5 of the main estimates, 1960-61 to include a grant of $10,000 to assist in defraying the costs of the ninth international botanical congress.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, what could be clearer than that? Parliament is told that this is the whole purpose of the item. We cannot bring in provisions in supplementary estimates unless there is some amount set forth. Hon. members will know we have never yet had an item in the estimates that did not show some amount. The accepted practice is, and has been for a long time, that where the purpose of the item is not to seek a grant of money, but to bring about legislative enlargement of the purpose for which parliament previously voted the money, the one dollar item is the method used.

What is the alternative? The alternative would be that we bring forward an entirely new item of $10,000. If we detached it altogether from existing items in the Appropriation Act and brought forward another item such as the item of $10,000 for expenditures in connection with the ninth international botanical congress, we would be asking the committee now, within four days of the end of the fiscal year, to vote additional money.

The additional money is not required in this item. The item is simply asking for legislative authority to use money that is available there now for a purpose which parliament, in the Appropriation Act, did not contemplate.

I think the situation is perfectly clear. We have to put a one dollar item here. It is not to say that we have $9,999 remaining in the item ready for lapsing. It means we have $10,000 there. This is the accepted means of showing that we already have the amount required in the item, and consequently we put in the one dollar amount. That has been the practice for years and years. The effect is legislative. It is not to seek the vote of additional money, because additional money is not required here. I would not consider myself justified, in a situation like this, in asking parliament to vote additional money in these late days of the fiscal year, unless additional money is actually required.

Mr. Benidickson: It occurs to me that we have an enlargement. I hope the minister will obtain from his officials a review of whether there is in the supplementary estimates an enlargement of the use of this one dollar estimate, such as we have in the four items for his own department.

It occurs to me that there is such an enlargement. I may be wrong. However, I can see the minister's point. The public accounts committee has for several years considered revising our method of preparing the estimates in a way which would take account of lapsing items and record them in subsequent years. That committee has also considered taking into account additional revenue, so that we have net figures with respect to items that are simply gross expenditures, such as we have here.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a different matter. That is in the main estimates. That suggestion which was made in the public accounts committee has no application to this situation.

Item agreed to.

Production and marketing branch—

659. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act—further amount required, $98,432.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, would the minister tell us the terms and conditions which regulate the granting of these subsidies?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are to be found in the Cold Storage Act, which is in the revised statutes of Canada, chapter 52 as amended by chapter 313. The cold storage regulations are published; they were first promulgated in 1954, and they were amended in 1958. Provision is made for the payment of subsidies not exceeding the lesser of 33⅓ per cent of the approved expenditure, or $50,000. This limitation of $50,000 applies to a good many of these subsidies for the construction of cold storage warehouses.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister tell us the conditions for recovery of part or all of the subsidy in the event that the cold storage plant is subsequently sold for purposes other than those for which it was originally intended, or if it were just sold.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not quite follow the hon. member when he speaks about the subsequent price. This is a matter of the construction of cold storage warehouses. It has been public policy to encourage the construction of cold storage warehouses. Therefore there is a provision made for the payment of a subsidy toward the cost of construction.

This subsidy is $50,000 of the cost, or 33⅓ per cent, whichever is the lesser amount. That is determined as a matter of proof in relation to the cost of construction.

Mr. Hellyer: I understand the purpose and the policy. The minister has not answered my question regarding what provision or regulation there is for recovery of the subsidy if the cold storage plant ceases to be a public cold storage plant. What guarantee is there to the crown that the subsidy is recovered? Under what conditions is it recovered?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In a situation of that kind the statute confers a discretion on the minister.

Mr. Hellyer: In other words, there is no laid down rule by which the recovery takes place? It can be administered in an arbitrary fashion by the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is a matter which has been under study in the public accounts committee. It is under discussion there at the present time and it may be the subject of a report to the house later this present session. I do not think I should go beyond that at this time.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not wish to labour the point. I wondered whether the minister had under advisement the possibility of putting into effect a regulation which would govern the system of recovery, rather than leaving it a discretionary matter as it is at the present time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sure that only good will come of the study the public accounts committee is making of this matter at the present time. If a recommendation is made by the committee it will of course be very seriously considered.

Mr. Batten: I should like to know how many warehouses are involved in this item and the location of each.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This present item involves two new contracts entered into after the previous estimates were presented. The first is in connection with the Chaîne Coopérative du Saguenay of Chambord, Quebec, and the amount of the subsidy is $47,500. The second is the Barker Storage Company Limited at Meaford, Ontario where the approved subsidy is $14,615. There is a third, the cost of the completion of a warehouse being built under a subsidy contract which was not foreseen at the time the previous estimates were completed. That is the Dairy and Poultry Co-operative Marketing Association Limited of Saskatoon. The subsidy in that case is $50,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Has the minister, after looking up the details on page 14, given any thought to the fact that we are not very consistent when we set out details of these expenditures for the convenience of members of parliament? I have observed that this has been the case in the past, also. With respect to items where the expenditure is not particularly great we are given details of individuals and how much they receive—sums of the order of $5 or $20, or $70—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think that is another item.

Mr. Benidickson: I know. The total there is about $12,000. But when my hon. friend asks a question with regard to companies across this land which might have been overlooked in last year's estimates as being entitled to subsidies under the legislation dealing with cold storage he is faced by the situation that a lump sum appears in the estimates —$98,432—with no details given. This obliged the hon. member for Humber-St. George's to ask the questions he did. It seems to me inconsistent to say so little when in the course of the next few pages, with respect to agriculture, we let it be known that Mr. So and So of rural route so and so gets $5 compensation for the loss of animals. What we see before us in connection with this item is complete repetition. There is no point in putting it there, because it is a mere repetition of the gross amount, though it is called a detailed item. I am not saying this has not been the practice for a long time but I just draw attention to what appears to be a lack of consistency when it comes to giving details.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As the hon. gentleman has acknowledged, this is the form in which the supplementary estimates and, indeed, the main estimates have long been presented. There is a very good reason for the use of the form to which the hon. member drew attention when he referred to compensation for the slaughter of animals. If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, to comment in advance on that item in view of the fact that the hon. member has done so, may I say we are dealing there with payments which are to be authorized to individuals; there is no such thing as a shift within an item. The ordinary right to allot within the total does not apply. In the case of item 659, however, there is, of course, the normal right to allot within the item. It is because there is a deficiency to meet in connection with the three particular projects to which I have referred that the additional sum is asked for, and in keeping with the form of the corresponding item in the main estimates it is a lump sum total.

Item agreed to.

661. Compensation for animals slaughtered—further amount required, $1,113,869.

Mr. McMillan: This item shows an increase of about 50 per cent over the estimates of last year. It is a large item—larger than usual—and no details are given with respect to it. Could the minister give us some more information?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I shall be pleased to do so. There has, indeed, been an increase in the operations of this particular branch in relation to the slaughtering of animals and this item arises out of a need to pay compensation. The item consists of several portions. The first is the increase in the number of cattle slaughtered for which compensation is payable under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act brucellosis eradication program involving a sum which amounts to $545,662. The second portion is compensation for hogs slaughtered in swine herds infected with hog cholera. That total is $534,667. The third portion is the increase in the number of sheep slaughtered for which compensation is payable under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act scrapie eradication program, and the amount there is $138,376. The total of these three items can be taken as being $1,218,705. There is a reduction in that sum of $104,836 because of a smaller amount paid in respect of tuberculosis reactors slaughtered. Thus we arrive at a figure of $1,113,869.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) his views on the epidemic hog cholera.

Yesterday, I read in the papers that the disease had now reached the epizootic stage in the riding of Nicolet, where 3,500 animals had to be slaughtered to date.

In the neighbouring areas there were many centres of infection, nine in Arthabaska, 10 in Drummond, 23 in Nicolet and 18 in Yamaska. That was on February 14.

I do not have the latest figures here, but, according to the press, the situation is very serious.

I therefore would ask the Minister of Finance whether he has any comments to make in order to reassure the farmers of that area, who hope to see that epizooty stopped as soon as possible.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have no information with regard to widely scattered constituencies, but if the hon. member would submit a definite question, I would make the necessary inquiries and let him have any information I would receive.

Mr. Boulanger: I would like to know whether the minister is aware of the causes of that infection in that district.

This is what a news item published in the Sherbrooke paper La Tribune, said on March 25 last:

> According to Dr. Armand Methot, of Acton Vale, the epizooty is now regressing.
> The causes of the disease are attributed to hog imports from the United States, because of the contacts through a lack of sanitation in handling the animals.

According to comments which circulate in my riding, the disease is due to hog imports from the United States.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I must repeat to the hon. member that I have no information to give him with regard to that epizooty. If he would submit a specific question, I would get the information for him.

(Text):

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take advantage during the discussion on this supplementary estimate to put forward the suggestion to the Minister of Finance, in cooperation perhaps with the Minister of Agriculture, that animals destroyed because of rabies be brought within the regulations of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, so that the owners could be compensated in this regard. I understand some months ago there was a rabies epidemic and that compensation was made by the federal government through order in council on the basis of 40 per cent by the federal government, 40 per cent by the provincial authorities and—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that this discussion on supplementary estimates is not the same as the discussion on the first item of the department and therefore we must confine our consideration to the individual items.

Mr. Pitman: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I simply wanted to ask the minister whether it was possible to compensate farmers in this regard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That matter does not arise under this item. I am informed that question has been discussed in previous sessions but I think the hon. member will have an opportunity to raise it during the consideration of the main estimates of the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1961-62.

Item agreed to.

Livestock division—

663. Supervision of race track betting—further amount required, $35,000.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I notice that this involves $35,000 as compared with the amount last year for supervision of race track betting, and I wonder why the government has to spend that amount?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As the hon. member is aware, this is a service that does produce a revenue. In this particular case the additional sum of $35,000 is required to meet the increase in the cost of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police supervision as a result of the higher salaries granted to R.C.M.P. personnel, effective September 1, 1960.

Mr. Benidickson: Frankly I was not aware, and perhaps I should have been, that there are costs related to the R.C.M.P. under various departmental estimates other than the estimates of the department of the Minister of Justice. Are there many of this type of charge in votes that would not show under the R.C.M.P. vote which apparently covers the total cost of maintaining this federal police force? In other words, if members of the R.C.M.P. were to perform a service on an Indian reservation would a vote of this kind be found under the Department of Citizenship and Immigration? Apparently in this case they are operating under a federal statute in providing a service to the rack tracks in the form of supervision, but the cost is charged to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not aware of any other votes of this type, Mr. Chairman. This is an item respecting a service and of course a charge is made for the service, but revenue is yielded. As a matter of fact the revenue yielded is expected to be in the amount of $712,000. This is not a service through which the crown is out of pocket. This is the only service that the R.C.M.P.

renders to the Department of Agriculture and the only item of this type of which I am aware.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I always thought that the federal government's share of the pari-mutuel take could be construed as a tax, such as a money transfer tax, and I am a little bit surprised to hear that we have to provide such an expensive service in the process of collecting this tax which the minister now describes as revenue. Is there some way that the federal government could charge the race track association for this service which is being provided so that it could be recovered?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is what is being done.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister now saying that this cost is recovered from pari-mutuel takes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a service that is rendered to the race tracks, and a charge is made to cover it. This is not a tax in the ordinary sense at all, but a charge for that service rendered. The service rendered here involves a statutory levy of one half of one per cent on all moneys wagered at tracks and involves R.C.M.P. supervision regarding photo finish camera finishes, and the taking of saliva and urine tests at the major race meetings.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister is now saying that the percentage taken on betting is fixed and is by way of remuneration to the federal government for services provided rather than a tax, is that the case?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right.

Mr. Hellyer: I would commend the minister to consider an increase in the rate when he is considering these matters in the next few weeks.

Mr. Fisher: I would like to ask the minister if the purpose of this service is connected with the approving of the breed of race horses, or is it a form of protection to the bettor insuring that he has a fair deal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is to assure that we have an effective operation at race tracks within the law.

Mr. Fisher: What is the reason for this charge appearing under the agriculture estimates when it involves primarily the service of Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers supervising urinalysis and that type of test?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is because the Department of Agriculture is responsible for the operation of all manner of racing at fairs and other meets of that kind which are definitely agricultural in their nature. This item covering this service has been in the Department of Agriculture for as long as I can remember.

Mr. Fisher: I suggest that now is the time to raise this issue. This is obviously a very large commercial operation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that this falls directly under the provisions of the Criminal Code, and the Criminal Code makes the Minister of Agriculture responsible for the supervision of pari-mutuel race track betting.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder whether the minister's attention was directed to the debate in the Ontario legislative assembly in relation to race track betting and gambling, and in particular in regard to the percentage going to the provincial and federal governments as compared with the amount which goes to the Ontario jockey club, for example. I wondered what part the federal government would play, or whether this item would have anything to do with the part it would play in the determination of how the cake or pie is sliced?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am not acquainted with the debate to which the hon. member refers. I must say that I am kept busy trying to keep up with the debates of this house without having to look into debates that occur in the different provincial legislatures. So far as taking into account the respective levies by the provincial and federal governments is concerned, all I can say is that this is provided to pay for the cost of these services, which an enactment of parliament has laid upon the Minister of Agriculture, in relation to pari-mutuel betting.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, under the procedure which we follow we do not receive information regarding the balancing of revenues unless we ask questions. The minister has indicated that related to this item of expenditure is an intake based on 1½ per cent, is it, on the mutuel betting?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): One half of one per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: We know from the main estimates that in 1960-61 it was indicated that we would have an expenditure of $593,000. This is an additional $35,000. If the minister has the information conveniently handy, would he indicate to us what revenue under this item is estimated for 1960-61? Has he a prospective figure for 1961-62, and has he the figure for 1959-60?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; the actual figure in the current fiscal year up to February 20, was $712,000, as I intimated earlier. The figure of revenue for the fiscal year 1959-60 was $673,917.

Item agreed to.

664. Agricultural lime assistance, further amount required, $200,000.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister give us what information he has in respect of this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is an item of agricultural lime assistance. This is simply an addition of $200,000 as a further amount required in addition to the sum of $1,200,000 voted in the main estimates.

This assistance is based on a subsidy not to exceed 60 per cent of the total amount expended by the provinces for any direct activity in increasing lime utilization for soil amendment purposes, such as transportation costs and, in some cases, lime production.

The use of lime in the present fiscal year has extended beyond the sum that was contemplated when the item was written into the main estimates. I am told that the increased use of lime in eastern Canada is attributable to a long, open autumn season.

Item agreed to.

665. Contributions to the governments of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchwan, and Manitoba, in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council, of one half the amounts paid by the governments of those provinces to farmers in respect of their 1959 unharvested crops to a maximum of $300 in respect of any one farm—further amount required, $390,000.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister give us the details of this vote as well, if he has them before him?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is an item covering contributions to the three prairie provinces in respect of the program of assistance to the farmers in those three provinces in respect of the 1959 unharvested crops. The house previously authorized the payment of 50 per cent of the cost of the emergency unharvested crop costs in those three provinces, and this item is based upon claims filed by the provinces and as yet unpaid and on claims still to be filed by the provinces. The amount in the previous supplementary estimates was $1,060,000, and this is an addition of $390,000 thereto.

Item agreed to.

Special—

666. Estimated amount required to recoup the agricultural commodities stabilization account to cover the net operating loss of the agricultural stabilization board as at March 31, 1961, $69,504,548.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I apologize for having spoken a little too soon during consideration of the supplementary estimates of the Department of Agriculture, when I raised the matter of the stabilization of agricultural prices. The fact is that I wanted to put certain questions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

The other day, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) claimed that farmers' increase in income over the past three years resulted from the operation of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. I do not think that claim is quite true.

In order to determine the average net income of farmers for the years 1947 to 1956 inclusive, and compare it with the figures for the years 1957 to 1960 inclusive, I made the calculation and I find that it is $234 million less per year. In fact, for the ten-year period from 1947 to 1956, the average for all of Canada was $1,459,000,000, as against $1,220,-200,000 for the years 1957 to 1960, a difference of $238,800,000.

Could the Minister of Finance indicate whether, in view of the tremendous amounts spent over the past five or six years to stabilize agricultural prices, a bill will be introduced to carry out the pledges that were made to give the farmers parity, not charity.

Could the minister also give us the breakdown of the amount of $69,504,548 that we are asked to vote under item 666?

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is a very large item. It is one of two really extraordinarily large items in these final supplementary estimates. This is the estimated amount required to recoup the agricultural commodities stabilization account to cover the net operating loss of the agricultural stabilization board as at March 31, 1961, in the sum of $69,504,548.

This is an item that arises annually in the final supplementary estimates. That was the practice last year and it was the practice in previous years. It is only when we reach the end of the year, actually, that we know what is going to be the total amount required to recoup the agricultural commodities stabilization account. The practice has been to provide for this recoupment in the final supplementary estimates as close as possible to the end of the fiscal year. Even then it may not be possible to estimate it with absolute precision. We do the best we can in this respect; but from the time the item is made up and the final supplementaries are tabled in the house to the March 31 following, there may be some variations in the amount.

This is the largest sum that has been expended in any one fiscal year thus far in agricultural stabilization. The sum voted a year ago in respect of the fiscal year 1959-60 was $57,661,176. In the previous year, the fiscal year 1958-59, the sum voted was $15,017,182. This illustrates the very large growth in the amounts provided by parliament under the terms of the Agricultural Stabilization Act to meet the problems of fluctuations in agricultural income and to make provision for stabilization of returns to agriculturalists from the various types of production of agricultural products. This year's outlays, Mr. Chairman, for this purpose, cover the purchase programs for butter, eggs, dried skim milk, cheddar cheese, fowl, raspberries, lamb and pork. Of course, pork was by far the largest item. It covers as well the deficiency payments on the deficiency programs and it covers the subsidy programs as well.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Does the minister know the amount spent so far on butter, eggs and pork?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On butter, the amount spent is $2,208,774.

Mr. Boulanger: And what about pork? The last figure was for butter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Butter, yes.

Mr. Boulanger: What about pork and eggs?

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as pork is concerned, under the purchase program the sum in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1961, is $45,846,270.80.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Perhaps I should ask the minister to give us the list. I do not ask him to give it immediately, but perhaps he might have it printed in Hansard, where we could look it up.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For all products, or only eggs?

Mr. Boulanger: For all products.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, certainly. Would the hon. member allow me to give him these figures in English?

Mr. Boulanger: I have not asked the minister to give the figures today, but he could have them printed in Hansard. That would be satisfactory, as I do not wish to delay the proceedings of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Thank you very much.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: I understand that the consent of the committee to put these figures on Hansard is desired. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SECRETARY OF STATE

Civil service commission—

667. Salaries and contingencies of the commission —further amount required, $30,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with a subject coming under item 167 which deals not only with the civil service commission but with the Department of Transport as well. I am going to try and be as brief as possible in order not to delay this item.

I have here a letter from Riviere-Madeleine. A man named Josephat Ste-Croix, assistant lightkeeper on Anticosti island, has been laid off, just like that, though he had worked seven years for the department and in spite of the fact that he has seven children. He was given only a week's notice that his services were no longer required. He asked me to take the matter up with the civil service commission and with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer). I first wrote to the Minister of Transport who is primarily answerable for lightkeepers. Here is a paragraph of the letter I received from the minister under date of November 8:

> It so happens that this case falls under the juridiction of the civil service commission and I hasten to draw your letter to the attention of the president, the Hon. S. H. S. Hughes, asking him to get in touch with you on this matter.

Meanwhile, I had also written to the president of the civil service commission asking for explanations about that case.

The president of the civil service commission told me that the matter was outside his province. Here are the contents of the letter he sent on November 25:

I am fully conscious of the obligation of the civil service commission to protect classified employees of the civil service and I know where my own duty lies as chairman of the commission, but we must not forget that Mr. Ste. Croix, as assistant lightkeeper is not and has never been under our jurisdiction.

Now, here is what happened. After that man had worked for seven years as assistant keeper, the civil service commission was asked to open a competition. Mr. Ste. Croix was invited to compete, which he did, and he succeeded, as was indicated by both the Minister of Transport and the chairman of the civil service commission, since his result was 75 per cent; but another person, who had obtained 72 per cent, but who was entitled to veteran's preference, supplanted him.

I do not complain of the fact that a veteran should come ahead of one who is not. What I do complain about, however, is the fact that as a result of a competition in which he succeeded, Mr. Ste. Croix was dismissed from his employment, after spending seven years in a position with which, by then, he was thoroughly familiar, while his successor knew nothing about it. He was laid off, he is now seeking a job and depending on unemployment insurance, notwithstanding the fact he is the father of seven children.

Above all, I complain of the fact that the Minister of Transport and the civil service commission are both passing the buck to one another. It is clear that lightkeepers come under the Minister of Transport, but assistant keepers come under the keeper himself, in accordance with a contract. That is the situation which has been existing for years. But it has been established in the Department of Transport for many years that every effort would be made to provide work to assistant lightkeepers who might find themselves in similar circumstances.

Perhaps his political affiliation may have been taken into account—but I would not like to raise that matter, although he wrote to tell me he had been dismissed only on account of that. I do insist on the fact that the policy which has been in force in the Department of Transport for years has not been adhered to. In this particular instance, I complain, above all, of the fact that the Minister of Transport wrote me to tell me that the matter comes under the civil service commission, while the civil service commission states they have nothing to do with the matter, as indicated in the letter I received from Mr. Hughes. When the civil service commission, according to Mr. Hughes' letter, says that Mr. Ste. Croix obtained 75 per cent, while the other obtained only 72 per cent, I say, Mr. Chairman, that this is an injustice. If the Minister of Transport to whom I sent a note to advise him of our intention to raise the matter were in the house, he would partly agree to my assertions since one of his letters implied that the department would try to find a job for that assistant lightkeeper.

Mr. Ste. Croix has unfortunately been out of work since last November and despite the efforts of the Minister of Transport—if he made any, and I am willing to believe that he did—he is still unemployed.

Therefore, I wish to bring that case to the attention of the Minister of Finance because it involves a serious injustice to the above-mentioned person.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I will be pleased to communicate the representations of the hon. member for Laurier to my colleague the Minister of Transport.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

A—Department—

668. Canadian representation at international conferences—further amount required, $31,500.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, there is a further amount required of $31,500 under this item for representation at international conferences. I know it is quite difficult to estimate the actual amount of money that will be spent on conferences such as these, but I wonder whether or not this particular amount has been earmarked for a particular conference or whether it represents a general increase in expenditures?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It will be voted as a general increase, but there were several conferences in particular, the holding of which has led to this additional requirement. There is the multilateral tariff conference of the contracting parties to GATT which has been proceeding at Geneva. This is one of the meetings that has led to this additional requirement. There is also the cost of representation at the resumed session of the general assembly of the United Nations this month. In addition there was the NATO ministerial meeting in December, 1960 and the United Nations scientific committee on the effects of radiation which met this month.

Mr. Cardin: Could the minister give the total amount of the expenses?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I could give the items in total, Mr. Chairman. The main estimate provided $295,000 and this vote of $31,500 will bring the total for the item to $326,500. If the hon. member wishes a breakdown, I can give him a breakdown. The item is made up chiefly of travelling expenses, telephone, telegraph expenses and so on.

Mr. Benidickson: I notice that the form in which the details are provided on page 16 indicates that is the case. I do not know whether or not it is convenient for the minister to break down the total sum as between conferences rather than for items of expenditure. Has the minister that information?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Naturally these are estimates. I may say that approximately half of this additional sum is considered to be required by reason of the resumption of the United Nations general assembly meeting this month.

Mr. Benidickson: This is quite unusual.

Mr. McGee: I wonder whether or not the minister could make any comment on the adequacy of the expense money paid to our representatives at the United Nations. I have heard from various sources that New York is becoming an increasingly expensive place to live. Has any serious consideration been given to any change?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have heard it said that the expense allowance provided is inadequate to pay the expenses of delegates attending these conferences. In fairness to those who represent Canada at these meetings, I should like to say that there may be some people who think that being appointed a delegate or a parliamentary observer to the Canadian delegation to the United Nations assembly is something of a joyride. As hon. members who have been there well know, these delegates put in long hours of intensive work. Having regard to the cost of living in cities like New York, I do not pretend for one moment that the present allowance is generous.

This matter has been brought to my attention by some hon. members who have been through the experience of representing Canada at these sessions, and they have told me that they have been substantially out of pocket in consequence. I will say for myself, Mr. Chairman, that I do not believe any Canadian delegate should be denied a reasonable sum to meet the costs of sojourning in cities like New York, well knowing that the cost of living in such cities is very high indeed. What has been said by hon. members is being examined.

Mr. Cardin: I am very sympathetic toward any member of parliament who is sent abroad to attend these conferences. I also feel that they should be given greater expense allowances.

I wonder if the minister could give the committee the amount of the living allowance for a delegate attending the United Nations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps the hon. member would permit me to send him that information.

Item agreed to.

669. Gift on the occasion of the wedding of the King of the Belgians, $1,500.

Mr. Herridge: This item covers a gift on the occasion of the wedding of the King of the Belgians. I would be interested to know what the gift was and who was responsible for purchasing it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The purchasing, in a case like this, is carried out by the Department of External Affairs. The gift, in this particular case, was essentially a Canadian product, namely a Canadian wild mink stole.

Item agreed to.

670. Gifts to commemorate the independence of African states, $1,200.

Mr. Chevrier: The committee will recall that in connection with this matter the Secretary of State for External Affairs rose in the house some time ago and referred to an agreement which had been made between the government—perhaps I am mistaken as to the details—and the University of British Columbia concerning scholarships.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item has nothing to do with those.

Mr. Chevrier: I think it has, Mr. Chairman, and I should like to discuss the subject very briefly. If the minister will bear with me. I think I can conclude my remarks rather quickly. I believe the committee was very happy with the arrangement which the minister announced, namely that there should be an understanding between the University of British Columbia and a university in Malaya or some other federated state—I think it was Ceylon—in connection with an exchange of students.

I wonder whether the government had or is giving consideration to a similar arrangement, (1) with reference to universities in other parts of Canada, and I have in mind particularly those in the province of Quebec and, (2) with reference to the French communities of the African states? After all, this gift is to commemorate the independence of the African states, and there are quite a number of them that have now joined the United Nations. I am anxious to know what the government is doing with reference to that matter which has been mentioned in the house from time to time. The government has said repeatedly that consideration was being given to it.

I think the universities in the province of Quebec, particularly because of the language aspect, and in other parts of Canada could be of tremendous assistance in so far as the French communities of the African bloc are concerned. My purpose in bringing the matter to the government's attention was to inquire where the government stood on the matter with reference to both the commonwealth nations and the African states.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 670 relates merely to gifts to the African countries to commemorate their independence. These gifts, apart from special cases like Nigeria or Ghana which are commonwealth countries, have taken the form of Canadian books. In the case of countries in which English is the spoken tongue, the books of course have been English. In countries where French is the spoken tongue, the Canadian books have been in the French language. There were 13 of these African countries, and the first six are included in these supplementary estimates, Mr. Chairman. There will be gifts of $200 each made to them in the form of Canadian books. They are the Republic of the Congo, Mauritania, Republic of Cameroon, Malagasy Republic and the Central African Republic and Somalia Republic.

Mr. Chevrier: May I call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, before the committee rose at six o'clock I was making inquiries of the government concerning vote 670 relating to gifts to commemorate the independence of African states. I was referring to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs had stated with reference to an arrangement made between the University of British Columbia and one of the universities of the federated state of Malaya in connection with an exchange of professors.

I realize that perhaps my question is not entirely germane, but none the less I believe it can be brought under this item. I do not wish to delay the passage of this item, but I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to bring the committee up to date on what has been done with reference to assisting universities in other provinces, particularly the province of Quebec, in so far as commonwealth scholarships are concerned, and also scholarships to the French community of states in the African bloc.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the lending of a professor to Malaya related to the provision made for sending a professor to that country recently. That, of course, had nothing to do with the question of bringing students to the French language universities of Canada.

Some students are already studying at the French language universities of Canada under Colombo plan aid. This plan for students from the French speaking states of Africa to come to Canadian French language universities is a matter which has been under study.

My colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has mentioned this plan in the house on several occasions and has indicated the efforts he is making to facilitate aid in such cases.

Mr. Chevrier: I am grateful to the minister for what he has said. I hope the government will give consideration to this latter matter, namely the establishment of bursaries in Quebec universities for the French community of states in the African bloc.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Communications have been passing between the Department of External Affairs and the French language universities of Canada on this subject.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a word in connection with this item. The minister has indicated the nature of Canada's gifts in this respect. The hon. member for Laurier has indicated that we should perhaps give more consideration to Canada providing bursaries to students from those areas of Africa which have French speaking populations.

During the short time that I spent at the United Nations last year, when there were in attendance so many new delegations from Africa and Asia, I was greatly impressed by the delegates whose native tongue was French. I wish to pay tribute to a member of the Canadian delegation who was in constant attendance at the United Nations last fall, and who I think is there at the moment. I refer to the hon. member for Charlevoix. The hon. member was relied upon very much by the Canadian delegation. He performed a great deal of good work in his approaches, through his knowledge of their tongue and because of his own personal qualities, to these people from the African states who spoke French and who were attending the United Nations.

I think it is very important to make sure that we make provision, not only in this item but in other items in other estimates, for students to come to Canada. There should be proper provision for students to arrive from Asia, Africa and those countries where French is the native language.

Item agreed to.

671. To provide for memorial plaques presented to Ireland to commemorate the life and work of Thomas D'Arcy McGee, $800.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, vote 671 is to provide for memorial plaques presented to Ireland to commemorate the life and work of Thomas D'Arcy McGee. I am rather curious as to what was the inscription on these plaques. Has the minister any information on what was the inscription and who composed the inscription, and can he assure us that it did not contain any Progressive Conservative propaganda?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I cannot tell the hon. gentleman exactly what the inscription was, but I would not be surprised if it had something to do with Dublin's fair city, where girls are so pretty.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this is not a large item. We heard previously about transferable items. I think I have read that these plaques have already been erected. Under what circumstances are we now being asked to authorize this expenditure?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The government has power, of course, to make provisions of this kind under the minor and unforeseen vote provision.

Mr. Benidickson: This is a replacement from that fund?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

[April 10, 1961]

I have since been informed that the sum in question is not a replacement to that particular fund. I had previously referred to the minor and unforeseen vote provision. The Department of Public Works had paid for the two plaques in question and provision was made in item 671 for a replacement of that expenditure on behalf of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Chevrier: Why is it "plaques" and not "plaque"?

Mr. Pearson: How many were there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There were two plaques. One was written in Irish, and one in English.

Item agreed to.

Contributions to international economic and special aid programs—

Special aid programs—

672. Contribution to the United Nations fund for the Congo in an amount of $1,000,000 U.S. notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of February 1961, which is, $991,000.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if the minister would give us some information about this item which is a contribution to the United Nations fund for the Congo. What proportion of the total contributions to this fund would this vote of approximately $1 million represent? What is the work covered by this vote? I am certainly not quarreling with Canada's contribution. Do we get any consideration for the money which we are already spending on the maintenance of our force in the Congo and that kind of thing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item of $991,000 is the equivalent in United States funds of $1 million. It has nothing whatever to do with the support of military operations carried out by the United Nations or the support of Canadian forces in the Congo. It relates only to civil operations of the United Nations.

Last September the Secretary General of the United Nations urgently recommended to the security council that a fund of $100 million be established for the Congo. That recommendation was approved at the fourth session of the general assembly and the secretary general then requested all member governments to give urgent consideration to making a contribution to this fund. Canada's contribution, as recommended in this item, is $1 million. The fund is intended to bring immediate financial assistance on a large scale to re-establish stable administration and internal security in the Congo and to restore normal economic life. It is not designed to set up a permanent subsidy as the Congo is expected to pay its own way both currently and for development purposes in what, it is hoped, will be the near future.

The Prime Minister in his speech at the United Nations general assembly on September 26 pledged Canada to contribute a portion of this proposed fund. The United States has made two contributions of $5 million each. The Netherlands has contributed $1 million. New Zealand, for example, contributed $280,000.

Mr. Pearson: Are those the only members who have made contributions to this fund?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The pledges which, of course, are not all paid, are as follows according to the latest information I have: Australia, $750,000; Cambodia, $2,040; Denmark, $600,000; Haiti, $2,000; India, $105,000; Iran, $25,000; Ireland, $25,000; Liberia, $250,000; Morocco, $39,526; The Netherlands, $1 million; Norway, $490,616; New Zealand, $280,000; The Philippines, $10,000; Sweden, $1,391,304; Tunisia, $10,000; United Kingdom, $3 million.

Mr. Pearson: I think ours is a very worth while contribution and we certainly do not oppose it in any shape or form. I note that no communist member of the United Nations has made any contribution to this effort. Perhaps that is not surprising in view of the general attitude they take towards these United Nations activities.

I wonder if the minister has any information about the actual administration of this fund, which is a substantial one designed to assist the authorities in the Congo to establish themselves. I should like to know something about the administration of the fund if the minister has that information available. I should like to know whether the United Nations authorities are getting co-operation from the local authorities in the Congo? We read a good deal in the press about the—perhaps I can call it negative—attitude taken towards the United Nations activities and I was wondering what had been the experience of the United Nations in administering this fund in the Congo.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I speak with some diffidence because I am not at all sure that my information is complete but I understand that the fund has not yet reached its objective by any means. As a matter of fact it amounts thus far to less than $20 million of the $100 million which the United Nations assembly envisaged as an objective. So the experience thus far may be too limited to be an indication of what may be expected on the whole. My information is that the work of the United Nations in making use of this fund has been on a very limited scale thus far.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister and I were together in November when something of a financial crisis developed at the United Nations because it was not clear whether or not all members of that body were prepared to bear their proper financial share in support of the United Nations peace effort in the Congo and the forces which had been sent there. Has that picture cleared, and to what extent has it any relation with the item before us?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That, Mr. Chairman, is a different item—item 678—and we shall come to it in due course.

Item agreed to.

673. To reimburse the agricultural products board account for whole milk powder donated for international relief purposes, $2,420,000.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Herridge: We are very pleased to support this item. However, could the minister give us some idea of the distribution of this amount of powdered milk by countries?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. This item has provided for the distribution of 22 million pounds of milk powder as shown in the following table. I will give round figures if that meets with the hon. member's approval. The table follows:

UNICEF	15,600,000	pounds
Gold Cross	2,105,000	"
Canadian Save the Children Fund	216,000	"
Canadian Lutheran World Relief	552,000	"
Care of Canada	2,005,000	"
Canadian Red Cross	80,000	"
Council of Churches	65,000	"
Mennonite Central Committee	500,000	"
TOTAL	21,123,000	"

Mr. Benidickson: If we did not have this item in its present form as a contribution to international relief and special aid programs, would it otherwise have some bearing on an item we passed earlier when we were dealing with agriculture, item 666 concerning the agricultural commodities stabilization account?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: It would otherwise, perhaps, have had a relationship to that other vote?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Item agreed to.

674. To reimburse the agricultural commodities stabilization account for canned pork and the agricultural products board account for whole milk powder supplied as emergency food relief for the Congo, $6,200.

Mr. Pearson: This is another small vote for the same purpose as item 673. We have heard and read reports to the effect that some of these relief supplies, more particularly canned pork, have been sent to certain areas—and, again, I am thinking of the Congo—with the best of intentions to assist in relief and rehabilitation in those areas, but that they have not proved too effective for that purpose. Can the minister indicate whether the allocation of canned pork for relief has proved a happy experience on the whole or has there been trouble about this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the problem of the pork surplus has now been largely resolved, but I must say it was found, when inquiry was being made around the world as to countries in need which might be glad to have this food assistance, that the number of countries which had the problem of hunger and under-nutrition did not coincide with the number of countries willing to take pork. We found that pork was unacceptable in some countries even on an aid basis. However, this small item is to recover the gift of canned pork on an emergency basis to assist famine victims in the Congo.

Mr. Cardin: I wonder whether the minister can inform the committee whether this total amount in the special aid program of $3,417,000 is in addition to the amount of $2,481,000 in the main estimates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the $3,417,000 item is simply the total of the three new votes, 672, 673 and 674.

Item agreed to.

675. Assessments for membership in the international (including commonwealth) organizations that are detailed in the estimates including authority to pay such assessments in the amounts and in the currencies in which they are levied—further amount required in Canadian dollars, estimated as of February, 1961, $401,500.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman,, if one looks at the details of this item it will be noted that the amount of $401,500 is that amount required to pay the assessment for the fiscal year ending 1960 for all of these international conventions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are payments which fall due in the fiscal year 1960-61.

Mr. Chevrier: How are these amounts arrived at? Are they arrived at on the basis of population or on some other basis?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The shares of these various committees all follow an established division upon the basis of the assessment to different countries. This particular total of $401,500 is actually composed of about one dozen items including the United Nations organization, the food and agriculture organization, the international atomic energy agency, and so on. In every case the assessments are arrived at by decisions of the budgetary committees of these organizations.

Mr. Chevrier: What are the countries that do not pay their assessments?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To which organization?

Mr. Chevrier: I refer to the organizations mentioned in detail, and there are about ten of them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That does not, as I understand it, enter into this question at all. This involves simply the matter of paying Canada's contribution in full to these organizations. That is not to say that this is an additional assessment that arises out of the failure of some other country or countries to pay its or their assessments. This is a matter of making an estimate at the beginning of the year when the main estimates are being made up for presentation to the committee in an attempt to arrive at the best estimate of what may be Canada's assessment in these various organizations. In these cases the Canadian assessment is larger than was estimated. For instance, this supplementary estimate for the United Nations organization provides an additional $248,354, and in regard to the food and agriculture organization provides an additional $11,230, and so on down the list.

Mr. Chevrier: In the case of ICAO this provides for $1,817 out of a revised total assessment of $192,496. The question I have is, do all member nations or states of ICAO pay a similar or proportionate amount?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, each member country has an assessment to meet. I am told that much of this particular item, and indeed others, is the result of the reduction in the premium of the Canadian dollar during the past year. The ICAO item is all attributed to the reduction in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Pearson: Is the amount of $248,000 in respect of the United Nations due to an alteration in our percentage, or the application of the same percentage to additional expenditures?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no addition, I am told, to Canada's percentage but the increase is caused by the application of Canada's percentage to a larger total, plus again the exchange difference.

Mr. Chevrier: I take it the item in regard to the commonwealth shipping committee is $17?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, and that is the difference of the exchange value in sterling.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the purpose of the commonwealth shipping committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I speak only from recollection because the information is not on the table before me at the moment. The commonwealth shipping committee, as I remember, is one of two organizations—the other of them being the commonwealth economic committee—which have their headquarters in London and are some years old. These two organizations are not among the recently formed commonwealth organizations. They have existed for some considerable time and I am sure that the hon. gentleman to the right of the hon. member for Laurier may be able to give a very complete account of these two commonwealth organizations and their beneficent work. As a matter of fact, I think this involves largely the pooling of information and methods of shipping.

Mr. Benidickson: I take it from the minister's reply to other hon. members that we have nothing unusual in this particular item but that it represents changes in the exchange rate on our dollar, and perhaps the over-all cost to us of our normal percentage of contribution to these various organizations to which we belong. The hon. member for Laurier raised a question regarding ICAO, and I believe we will find another item in the estimates with respect to the special Canadian obligation to ICAO. Regarding the United Nations will we not also find a special item where the percentage payments may not be supported on the usual pattern and that in consequence Canada will be asked—for instance with respect to the Congo as I suggested before—for special contributions?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: In this item we are dealing with the normal percentage and there is nothing unusual which changes the pattern from that of the main estimates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct. The distribution among the different countries and the assessments for the ordinary budget of the United Nations are, of course, different from those which apply to some of the special funds created by the United Nations.

Item agreed to.

676. To provide the international civil aviation organization with office accommodation at less than commercial rates, further amount required, $40,778.

Mr. Chevrier: This has to do with the rental arrangement in the international civil aviation building in Montreal. I presume this building is the property, or under the ownership, of the Canadian National Railways and is leased in large part to the international organization. What are the terms of the lease? If I read this item correctly, the lease provides for a fixed amount, but then by virtue of certain arrangements made between Canada and the nations which have agreed to come here and have this country as their headquarters in international civil aviation matters, Canada has agreed to make a certain deduction in the amount of the rent. Can the minister give an answer to these two questions?

Mr. Benidickson: While this is being calculated, may I add this. Does this involve extra space for the international organization, or the re-assessment of what would be a proper commercial rate? I presume it involves the payment of the difference between the rate agreed upon by these international organizations and the present-day commercial rents in the area of Montreal where this accommodation is provided?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The building in question is owned by the Canadian National Railways, and the Department of Public Works leases space from the Canadian National Railways and sublets it to ICAO at a reduced rate. The reason for the reduction in the rate is, of course, well known to hon. members and is approved.

The space in question is 30,000 square feet and the rate paid by ICAO is $1 per square foot. This proposed appropriation of $40,778 is to take care of additional floor space provided for ICAO in this way. On May 1, 1960, the Department of Public Works leased two additional lots of space in the building, one of 11,800 feet and the other of 3,450 feet. These two lots were leased in 1960. Then, just last month, the public works department leased an additional 3,500 square feet, and this proposed appropriation will take care of the portion of the rent chargeable to the Department of External Affairs and is what is in effect a subsidy payable to ICAO.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has said that the rate is $1 per square foot. What I was trying to ascertain, although I did not put it in that way—I put it in the general rather than in the particular—is what is the per square foot rate paid by other tenants in the building? I am thinking now of the international aviation offices such as K.L.M., T.C.A. and others. Air France is not there, but there are other corporations that do not benefit from the advantage obtained by the international organization.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that the commercial rate varies somewhat, depending upon the space and the floor. The commercial rate is not the same in all three instances of those areas that have been leased. It runs between something over $2 and up to about $3 in those three lots. Therefore, the extent of the subsidy is the difference between those figures and the $1 per square foot which is paid by ICAO.

Mr. Chevrier: Has the matter of deciding on Canada as the headquarters for this international organization been finally concluded? As the minister knows, there was, because of some of these difficulties in the past, an attempt and a desire by not a majority but many of the member states to move their headquarters elsewhere. I think it is because of the manner in which the various governments of Canada have attempted to treat this international organization that it has decided to stay here; but I do remember there was a vote taken not many years ago, and I wondered whether it has now been finally decided that Canada will remain the headquarters of ICAO?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am aware that at one time there was a strong suggestion that ICAO might move its headquarters away from Canada, but I believe talk of that kind has subsided. I have not been hearing anything of it for the past year or more. There can be no finality about matters of this kind, but my understanding is that there is a reasonable degree of satisfaction now, certainly a greater degree than previously, with the retention of the headquarters at Montreal.

Mr. Benidickson: For the past year, then, our apparent subsidy or assistance to encourage the maintenance of this international organization in Montreal would include the item of $40,000-odd which we are now discussing. To this item should we add the item of $215,000 in the estimates of 1960-61? In other words, would it be about $255,000?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The total it $256,-494, with the inclusion of the requested additional sum.

Mr. Benidickson: For the current year, the subsidy is $256,494 to encourage the maintenance of ICAO in Montreal in the building that otherwise would charge rents beyond what is being charged to them?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

677. Assessment for the United Nations Congo ad hoc account for 1960 in an amount of $1,506,232 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of February, 1961, which is, $1,493,000.

Mr. Pearson: This is a vote of almost $1,500,000 for Canada's assessment for the United Nations Congo ad hoc account. Can the minister give the committee some information as to the purpose of this vote?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is Canada's share of an assessment for the United Nations Congo ad hoc account for the year 1960. The United Nations operation in the Congo was established by the security council in July last. I do not think I need to go over all of the details. Hon. members are aware of the necessity of providing funds for this purpose, and of the steps taken at the fifteenth session of the assembly for this purpose.

The resolution passed at the assembly last year permitted the secretary general to expend first of all $15 million, and then later $40 million. When he presented his estimates for the Congo operation for the last six months of 1960 only they were in an amount totalling over $66 million. The secretary general put these costs in the supplementary estimates for 1960. No budget has yet been drawn up for the 1961 operation and that subject is being discussed in New York at the present time at the resumed fifteenth session.

So far as the distribution of the burden of these expenses is concerned, the obligation rests on members in accordance with article 17 of the United Nations charter. Several countries, including the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada, agreed to absorb certain claims so as to reduce the large over-all total of the cost of the operation. Canadian bills for the cost of the initial airlift of the Canadian contingent to the Congo amounting to some $600,000 were absorbed by Canada and have not been carried into the cost chargeable to the United Nations.

The Canadian government has indicated Canada's strong support of the United Nations operation in the Congo from its inception. All political considerations point to the necessity of continued Canadian support for United Nations action in the Congo. Canada's share of the cost of the operation in 1960, on the basis of the regular scale of assessments, is $1,506,232, and this present estimate is designed to provide that sum in United States dollars.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to this appropriation in any way. I am anxious, however, to have it made clear that this appropriation, from what the minister has said, is in addition to the expenses we bear for our own forces in the Congo. We pay the expenses of our own forces and in addition we are subscribing approximately $1½ million to the general fund to cover the expenses of the Congo intervention. So, unlike the situation in Palestine, I believe, we are not being credited in this fund for the expenses of our own contingent. I am not complaining about that. Canada is one of the countries trying to play their role in the Congo, at times without much co-operation from the Congo authorities themselves, and I think it should be made clear that Canada is one of the countries trying to play its part by providing for all the expenses of its own intervention and also making a contribution to those United Nations forces from countries that charge their expenses to the United Nations. Is that the situation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps it is not quite that. We have not received any reimbursement whatever so far from the United Nations on account of the expenditures we have incurred in supplying Canadian forces in the Congo. That is not to say that we do not hope some day to recover some portion of that expense, but there is no fixed arrangement yet and this item has nothing whatever to do with the fund in item 672 which we have considered and to which Canada is contributing $1 million for civilian assistance.

This item represents Canada's assessment with respect to the military costs for the last six months of 1960 alone. No one can yet see the end of the road in the matter of cost in this United Nations intervention in the Congo nor the extent to which nor how long assistance may be required. One can only hope that good reason will prevail and that order will soon triumph over the chaos that has persisted in areas of that country. In the meantime we are bearing the outlays required in providing Canada's contribution to the United Nations forces there.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in the wording of the item the phrase "ad hoc" is used. While I belong to the legal profession as does the Minister of Finance, I find that many people today use this phrase in a rather broad way. Am I right in thinking that when the words "assessment for the United Nations Congo ad hoc account" are used, what is meant is that this is an account which is special to the extent that it does not include participation by all normal participants in the United Nations activities and that this account is one to which Canada is contributing on a basis different from that normally applied in respect of other contributions? I understand that a number of nations which normally participate in United Nations affairs are remaining apart from this ad hoc account. Is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The significance of the expression "ad hoc account" is to indicate that it is special. It has a special purpose and thus far the money has been raised, to the extent it has been raised, by special means. The ordinary budgetary arrangements have not applied in this area. Indeed, as I mentioned earlier, special contributions by some countries, the United States, United Kingdom and Canada, have had the effect of reducing the sum to be raised by ordinary assessment by some $17½ million. In other words, the total amount to be raised by assessment has been reduced by these special contributions from $66 million to $48½ million.

Mr. Pearson: I have heard it stated, and perhaps the minister will confirm the statement or otherwise, that notwithstanding the contributions of countries like our own and the United States, the United Kingdom and others who customarily discharge their responsibilities to the United Nations in this manner, so completely negative has been the response of other members of the United Nations that the expenses of the United Nations intervention in the Congo at the present time are being borne by overdrafts, that the secretary general has had to borrow money. I saw in the newspapers this morning that he had had to borrow money from Mr. Hoffman of the international development fund. Is it a fact that the United Nations has been unable to raise enough money to cover the expenses which have been entailed in the Congo as a result of security council resolutions supported by those communist countries in the United Nations which have not only refused to contribute but have done their best to frustrate the efforts of the United Nations in the Congo?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is quite true and the secretary general, as the Leader of the Opposition has indicated, has been obliged to draw on credit balances standing in some special accounts under United Nations auspices. It is a deplorable situation.

Mr. Benidickson: That is what ad hoc means here, that just some participants in the United Nations are prepared at the present time to do as we are doing in advancing funds for this particular purpose?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as the ad hoc account is concerned, it is a special account set up to meet the expenses of this particular intervention in the Congo. When it was set up it was not assumed there would be defaulters and the special contributions made by the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada have really been made to relieve the United Nations in the face of the very serious difficulties confronting the secretary general in trying to make ends meet when his budget assessments have not been paid by some of the countries on whom they were levied.

Mr. Benidickson: Despite a resolution to that effect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Quite.

Item agreed to.

678. Assessment towards financing the United Nations emergency force in an amount of $892,680 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of February, 1961, which is, $885,000.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if the minister could give us some indication of the operations of the United Nations emergency force for which this appropriation is to pay? How many troops have we now in Palestine still working for peace in that area? How many other countries are continuing to participate in the United Nations emergency force? Perhaps the minister could indicate whether we are still being credited with that money which we have already spent as against our ultimate expenditures. When this United Nations emergency force was set up, it was understood we would pay our own expenses as we went along, and eventually there would be payments received from other members of the United Nations and our expenses would be credited against those receipts. Would the minister make a report to the committee on this matter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. I have not the precise figures on the strength of the Canadian contribution to the United Nations emergency force in toto, but the strength has been running in the neighbourhood of 1,000 to 1,100 men. As to the strength at a particular moment, I speak subject to correction.

In so far as financing is concerned here again it is a case of the general assembly starting out bravely in 1956 with a decision that the expenses of the force should be collectively shared by all members of the United Nations in accordance with the scale of assessment approved for the regular budget of the United Nations for 1957. It has not been possible to adhere to that because the communist countries have flatly refused to make any contribution toward meeting the expenses of the United Nations emergency force.

There has been a continuing and serious contention in the United Nations as to the financing of these forces. In 1959 the general assembly adopted a resolution, of which Canada was a co-sponsor, which incorporated a formula designed to preserve the principle of collective responsibility while reducing the burden on the underdeveloped countries which had found it impossible to meet their obligations. Under this formula it would be open to the participating governments to accept or decline a 50 per cent rebate of their assessment which the United Nations was able to offer as a result of voluntary contributions pledged by the United States and the United Kingdom. In October, 1960, the Canadian government considered this offer and decided to forego the rebate. This means that Canada has become liable to pay a full share of the $20 million total costs of the force in 1960. This full share is 3.11 per cent of the total, which is the same percentage Canada pays to the regular budget of the United Nations. Pending a decision on the rebate, Canada has already paid half of the 1960 assessment. This payment—adjusted to take account of certain credits in the United Nations budget of which Canada is entitled to a share—amounted to $307,182 U.S. The remaining portion of Canada's assessment for 1960 amounts to $310,764 U.S. What is submitted in these estimates represents the Canadian equivalent of the balance of the 1960 assessment and the full 1961 assessment, totalling $892,680 U.S., converted at the current rate of exchange.

I expect the Leader of the Opposition is going to ask me a question, as he did last year, about the defaulters so perhaps I might as well go on to that. The following members of the United Nations are respectively in arrears in their contributions to the support of the United Nations emergency force at March 7, 1961. The countries that are in arrears for four years are, Afghanistan, Albania, The Argentine, Bolivia, Bulgaria, Bylorussia S.S.R., Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Greece, Hungary and Iraq.

Those in arrears for three years are Costa Rica, El Salvador, India. Those in arrears for two years are Colombia, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras. Those in arrears for one year are Austria and Denmark.

There is another page containing these names, so may I qualify that answer by adding to those who were four years in arrears the following: Jordan, Libya, Mexico, Nepal, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Poland, Romania, Saudi Arabia, Spain, Sudan, Ukrainian S.S.R., U.S.S.R., and the U.A.R. and Yemen. We add to the three-year list the Philippines and Venezuela. We add to the two-year list Lebanon and Liberia, and to the one-year list Morocco, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Uruguay and Yugoslavia.

Mr. Benidickson: We thank the minister for that information which he anticipated would be requested. I do not have in front of me the estimates for 1960-61, and I should like to know if there was a special item to which this is an addition or is this something that comes completely on its own at the end of the year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item, Mr. Chairman, is quite apart from the ordinary budgetary contributions of Canada to the United Nations. It is also quite apart from Canada's contributions of all kinds to the special United Nations undertakings. As I mentioned, the amount of this item represents the Canadian equivalent of the balance of the 1960 assessment and the full 1961 assessment, converted at the current rate of exchange.

While I am on my feet, I think I should, in fairness to certain countries that appear on this list, say that while Afghanistan, Chile, China, Cuba, Iraq, Mexico, Nepal, Panama and Peru are in arrears for four years in connection with United Nations emergency force operations, each of those countries has made at least one direct contribution to the fund which, however, was not sufficient to offset completely their respective assessments for the year during which it was made.

Mr. Benidickson: While we are dealing with supplementary estimates, I believe the minister has indicated this is not a supplementary item but a distinctive item in so far as 1960-61 expenditures are concerned. It is not supplementary to anything else, apart from the general United Nations appropriation. Is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, this is not one of those items described as, "further amount required".

Mr. Benidickson: We already have in front of us the estimates for the forthcoming year which commences April 1, 1961 and ends March 31, 1962. There is nothing in the estimates for the next year that is comparable to this item of $885,000 that we have here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that this item is always in the final supplementaries.

Mr. Benidickson: We might, therefore, expect that next year we would have a further obligation similar to this, but it is something not contained in the main estimates for 1961-62?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, in respect of the 1961 assessment.

Mr. Pearson: I take it, Mr. Chairman, from what the minister has said that Canada gets credit for some of the expenses in connection with its force for this year against its assessment, perhaps not all of it but some of its assessment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pearson: I was very interested to hear the minister give the list of those members of the United Nations who for one reason or another, good or bad—and I do not want to be captious or critical in this matter—have not been able to make any contribution to an effort which in the first instance they supported, and which some of them very actively supported. It does underline a difficulty which I think is facing the United Nations in an increasing proportion of members of the United Nations voting resolutions which impose on the United Nations certain obligations, activities and responsibilities, and then leaving it to certain members of the United Nations to discharge those responsibilities.

In so far as the communist members are concerned, we can expect that; but it is unfortunate that members of the United Nations—I am sure the minister will agree with me, and I know the difficulties involved here—who vote for resolutions imposing certain responsibilities and duties on the organization do not see fit at the same time to discharge their own share of the obligations involved in the resolutions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I agree entirely with what the Leader of the Opposition has said. Apart from the fact that the burdens have fallen with unfair weight on certain countries, our own included, some of the countries which have undertaken these special burdens have had at the same time to submit to a great deal of abuse from the countries which have completely left the United Nations to find the means as best it can.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, for bookkeeping purposes does the minister carry the cost of our forces in the Congo or Palestine as a debit to the United Nations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Department of National Defence is keeping a record, and the record will be employed if the day ever comes when we can have a final reckoning in this matter.

Mr. Benidickson: These items are constantly conveyed to our delegation, and when negotiations take place in one of the committees of the United Nations—and I think one of the committees is on finances—they are up to date on Canada's expenditures beyond the common account, are they?

Our delegates are fully aware of these special expenditures, are they?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is quite correct. The hon. member is of course speaking from personal experience.

Mr. Benidickson: No; I never attended that committee. However, I think Senator Bois did good work in this regard. I think all members of the committee would want to know that our delegation in New York would know that these extra expenditures had been made by Canada and were not charged to the common account, and of course they would be taken into consideration when Canada speaks in that committee.

Mr. Pearson: I wish to say a few words before this vote is passed, Mr. Chairman. The Canadian members of the United Nations emergency force have been in this area now for a good many years serving the United Nations and the cause of peace. They have willingly gone to this area and they have done their work there with efficiency and credit to themselves and their country.

They have been there perhaps long enough that we are now inclined to take them a little bit for granted, and we are perhaps not as aware as we were a few years ago of the importance of the work which they are still doing.

I should like, therefore, to pay tribute to this work and to associate with these remarks the Canadian members of the United Nations Congo force. These men have not had such a long experience in international service, but in their relatively short experience they have been exposed to difficulties and tribulations which have been very great indeed. In facing these difficulties and tribulations they have conducted themselves with characteristic courage and that kind of discipline, in the face of great provocation, with which Canadian soldiers in my day were not always credited.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sure that all hon. members of the committee share in the sentiments which the Leader of the Opposition has expressed. The task of the United Nations expeditionary force has now slipped out of the headlines. Africa leaped on to the centre of the world stage in 1960 and there has been relatively small place left in the headlines for the United Nations expeditionary force.

However, that force has been carrying on, and its Canadian component, with patience, perseverance and in a manner that continues to make Canadians proud of their armed forces wherever they serve.

With regard to our forces in the Congo, I am sure all Canadians are aware of the dangers under which Canada's armed forces are serving. In the face of attacks, and indeed some very severe dangers, they have come through. Their role has been one of hardship and peril, and in the face of these challenges these men have acquitted themselves with gallantry and courage, again in a manner that makes Canadians proud of them.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to cast a disparaging note on the very amiable discussion that has just taken place. However, I have had the privilege of attending the United Nations for three years now and the discussion we have just heard between the government and the official opposition is rather fantastic. It indicates a lack of realization of the problem with which other nations of the world are faced.

We have to realize that the personal income of Canadians is second in the world only to the personal income of the residents of the United States of America, and for us to be blowing our horn—and this has now been going on during a number of speeches of the government and the official opposition—is, I feel, most unseemly and most unchristian.

I would be the last one to disparage the efforts of Canadians who are serving overseas. However, I am reminded of the little quotation, "I thank thee, Lord, that I am not a sinner like the others are". I think it is most unseemly to adopt this attitude on behalf of Canadians and to be listing other nations not in the communist bloc which have not met the obligations expected of them.

These other nations have problems that are beyond our comprehension. I feel that for us to be scratching each other's backs and praising the Lord for what good people we are is most unseemly indeed, and I am a little bit ashamed to be a Canadian tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is of course entitled to his own feelings. If that is the way he feels, as a Canadian, I can only say I am quite certain there is no other hon. member of the committee who shares the feelings which the hon. member has just expressed.

I will say this, that nothing that has been said here tonight deserves to be regarded as—

Mr. Benidickson: He has been here only for ten minutes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —clapping ourselves on the back. The references to the list of delinquents concerns those countries which have failed to meet obligations in respect of assessments made by the United Nations. In arriving at these assessments the United Nations takes into account all the circumstances of these countries. It is not a question of arbitrary assessments being applied. All the considerations pertaining to the respective economic strength and means of these countries are weighed and taken into account before the assessments are ever arrived at. This is a matter of countries not measuring up, not paying assessments which were arrived at after a vote of the organization in question. Therefore, in drawing attention to the fact that there is a substantial number of countries who are in a delinquent position with respect to these assessments it is right we should bear in mind that the delinquency arises in respect of assessments levied by the organization itself after taking due account of the circumstances in which those countries find themselves. We must bear in mind that the countries which measure up to their obligations and which, as in the case of Canada, have gone beyond the extent of their obligations in order to help out, do so in the face of the fact that other countries have not lived up to their obligations.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is seems to me that the criticism we have just heard is wide of the mark not only because of what the minister has just said but for another reason. Surely, what the Minister of Finance was doing was to discuss our position frankly, recognizing the fact that there are certain outstanding obligations which someone has to take care of. I did not in the least feel he was taking a "holier than thou" attitude. He, and others, who spoke, were being realistic in order to give us a picture of the circumstances as they exist. Not to have let us know about the shortcomings and the reason for them would have been to keep back part of the story from us.

Mr. Regier: I should like to remind the minister that the United Nations a number of years ago asked Canada to make no less than 1 per cent of her gross national product available to help these nations, including the nations listed a few minutes ago. Yet Canada at this time gives only 20 per cent of the amount which the United Nations deemed it necessary to ask our country to give in order to aid the establishment of international peace and security.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to hear the hon. member spell out the particular resolution passed by the United Nations in the normal way, which imposes on us an obligation to contribute 1 per cent of our gross national product for international purposes. That is a new resolution to me. I know it has often been brought up but I did not know it had been passed.

I want to say to the hon. member who not long ago resumed his seat that he has misrepresented and distorted the position I have taken in connection with this matter. All I have ventured to point out is that all members of the United Nations, however impoverished they may be, should have the privilege as well as the responsibility of discharging their obligations. They experience the privileges; they should discharge their responsibilities. When those responsibilities are taken into account by the United Nations and when the allocation is made all the factors mentioned by the hon. member are taken into account. That is why the contributions of some of these countries to these international activities are almost nominal, only a few dollars, $50 or $100 a year. It should be a matter of pride for each member of the United Nations, however impoverished, to spend even such small amounts on these international activities and I think they should be very glad to do it. I do not think we are unaware of their difficulties when I suggest they should all discharge their obligations.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Administration of various acts and costs of special functions—

Royal Canadian Mint—

679. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $65,000.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister would indicate the necessity for this additional expenditure and tell the committee if it is in any way related to the fact that the banks for a time during the year no longer accepted United States coinage at par value.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The demand for Canadian coins from the mint in 1960 reached record proportions. No doubt the withdrawal of United States coins had something to do with that fact. The sum in this item takes account of additional express on coin shipments as a result of this extraordinary activity in the mint in 1960.

Mr. Benidickson: Are there still shortages in particular denominations of coins?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are working heroically at the mint to keep up with the demand. The demand has not been uniform with respect to all coins but it is continuing to be heavy. Indeed, for a time it was not possible to get certain shipments of ingredients from the United Kingdom in the amount required and it was necessary for a short time to seek supplies from elsewhere.

Contingencies and miscellaneous—

680. Telephone service at Ottawa for all departments—further amount required, $40,000.

Mr. Cardin: I see there is an additional $40,000 required for the telephone service at Ottawa. I can recall not very long ago that the Minister of Finance was very touchy and, indeed, very indignant at the size of the telephone bills which the former government presented to the committee for consideration. At that time, of course, the hon. gentleman claimed that the telephone bills represented waste and extravagance and that they could be cut down.

From the main estimates it appears that in 1959-60 the cost of telephones, telegrams and other communications were set down as $1,424,530. In 1960-61 in the main estimates the figure was $1,624,874 which shows an increase of roughly $200,000. Now the minister is asking for an additional $40,000 which is a fairly considerable increase. If the hon. gentleman were to look at the figures back to 1957-58 he would find that the increase in the telephone bill amounted roughly to half a million dollars. Under this particular item of telephone bills there has been in all departments, an increase of almost $3 million. In 1960 the total amount of telephone bills was $19,625,756 whereas in 1960-61 the amount is $22,050,350. This, as I say, represents an increase of almost $3 million.

I wonder if the minister could explain why he has not been able to stem this increase in telephone bills which he claimed in 1957-58 represented waste and extravagance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Before the hon. member goes any further, perhaps he would be interested to know why this further supplementary estimate of $40,000 is required.

Numerous unforeseen developments involving the provision of additional telephone service account for this additional requirement. One item not anticipated when the original estimate was made was the expansion of service for members of parliament in the House of Commons and in the west block where they now occupy rooms. There has been a substantial increase in the telephone service on parliament hill. Similarly, it was not anticipated when the original estimate was prepared that the house would adjourn for only three months during this current fiscal year as against the usual five or six months. This has also added considerably to the requirement.

The Congo crisis has increased our telephone expenditure in the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence. The inauguration of a parole board and the setting up of royal commissions and committees on publications and government organization are also among the contributory obligations that were not foreseen when the item was first prepared. Moreover, effective November 1 the Bell Telephone tariff covering the cost of installation and movement of equipment was increased by 150 per cent. The charge for the movement and/or installation of a telephone was increased from $2 to $5. This increase in the movement of telephone equipment from November 1 has been a very substantial factor in the increase in cost. The average number of moves and installations per month throughout the government service is 300 telephones. I think hon. members can see why it is necessary to have this additional amount of $40,000.

Mr. Cardin: The minister has been giving us reasons why the increase of $40,000 was necessary and, of course, I was questioning that figure, but I also referred to the fact that since 1957-58 this particular item has increased almost $500,000. I wondered whether the minister thought that the problems he now faces were problems that the previous government did not have to face?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think we are facing some problems that the previous government did not have to face.

Mr. Benidickson: I am disappointed with the Minister of Finance, regarding the increase in telephones, telegrams in the estimates which have risen to the extent they have, when he starts off by saying that these are largely attributed to expenses—and he puts this at the top of his statement—which would lead one to judge that they perhaps belong to parliament hill. First of all, I would point out that the members on parliament hill, to an extent never before, belong to the government party. Whether or not they are getting telephone consideration that is different than in the past I do not know, but I want to bring to the minister's attention the fact that I have made an offer to the Sergeant-at-Arms, and other authorities in this house, in asking for a second telephone such as I would have if I were carrying on normal business, to pay the additional expense. I feel it is ridiculous for me to have to continually change places with my secretary because we have only one telephone.

I have been denied the opportunity of personally paying the extra $1.50 per month for that extra service which I would certainly have in my office in the normal course of business. I have not asked that the crown pay the additional cost but have offered to pay it myself and that privilege has not been afforded me. I have offered to contact the Bell Telephone Company in this regard but because of the red tape that is involved in the government service I am denied that privilege.

I think it is very unfair for the Minister of Finance to suggest on the basis of economy that a good portion of this increase in the expenditures is attributable to parliament hill. Certainly this increase of $40,000 cannot be attributed to that small portion of the service on parliament hill, and certainly not to the very small opposition that is assembled here in this parliament.

Mr. Aiken: Before the minister answers, if he intends to, one thing ought to be straightened out. I should like to comment, in case the impression is left otherwise, that long distance telephone calls made by all members of parliament are paid for by those members.

Mr. Benidickson: The members of parliament pay for their own long distance calls.

Mr. Aiken: I thank the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River for his assistance. He has said exactly what I intended to say. I should not like the impression to get abroad that the government is paying for private members' telephone calls.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has brought to our attention a point with which I think the minister should deal. We have before us now this substantial increase in the cost of telephone service. The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres has referred to the attitude taken by the minister when he sat on this side of the house in assailing the government for the increase in telephone costs. I am not going to challenge the items which the minister has put on the record, namely, the increase incurred by the board of transport commissioners, the increase in calls because of national defence and the Congo situation, and the increase brought about by the members of parliament in the west block. But, I would have felt a great deal better if he had not mentioned that last item because I think it is a drop in the bucket compared to the tremendous amount that we will have to vote in the main estimate.

I think the minister should tell the committee why it is that a member of parliament who, because of the population in his constituency, or because of the extra work he may have—this is not a reflection on anyone else—feels that he should have a second telephone, is denied that convenience. The minister should also tell us why a member is not entitled to that convenience if he is willing to pay for it himself, and why that policy should not be amended if it is in existence.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think in the observations of the hon. gentleman it has been overlooked that this is not a matter of government responsibility but a matter concerning the commissioners of internal economy who are the officers, appointed by this house, who deal with matters of this kind.

Mr. Benidickson: You are the senior member of that committee.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister why this does not apply as well to telephone service provided for the members of parliament, to which he has referred?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is what I thought we were talking about. I felt this was the point raised by the hon. member for Laurier and the concern of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River when he asked me about second telephones for members. Am I not right in assuming that was the question he was putting to me?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a matter for the commissioners of internal economy in the last analysis, and our guide has been—

Mr. Chevrier: The minister is quite right in giving the answer which he has, but he gave as an excuse for the increase in this cost the fact that a number of members of parliament required additional telephones, and now, because of the suggestion which was made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, he states that it is a matter to be dealt with by the commissioners of internal economy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Laurier is getting this mixed up. Let me start again. I pointed out the various additional outlays, imposed for various reasons, which account for the fact that we are here now with a supplementary item of $40,000. The member for Kenora-Rainy River asked why he could not have a second telephone and made some comment about the Sergeant-at-Arms in this respect. I must say that the Sergeant-at-Arms operates under the direction of Mr. Speaker and, in relation to matters of this kind, Mr. Speaker operates in association with the commissioners of internal economy who are members of this house, appointed by this house to consider matters pertaining to the operation of the services of the House of Commons. In this respect, thus far, this view has prevailed. This is not the first time the question has been raised but is a view that has been consistently taken over the years, and I am sure the hon. member for Laurier will recall this. It would not be wise to introduce the practice of allowing members to have their own special lines introduced in the house, or additional lines, because this would eventually lead to some increase in expenditure. It was felt that this is a matter in which all members should be treated alike. This is the view that has prevailed.

Apparently the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has taken this up with the Sergeant-at-Arms and has taken the Sergeant-at-Arms to task. I must remind him again that the chain of command here would lead the hon. member, if he thinks he has reason to do so, to go to some other level in this respect. The Sergeant-at-Arms is simply operating under instructions that have been given to him.

Mr. Anderson: I should like to make an observation on this point and tell the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that possibly he is very fortunate to have one telephone and one secretary in this house, because many of the members on the government side have one telephone and one secretary to answer the telephone for two members.

Mr. Benidickson: Just the same as in the opposition.

Mr. Anderson: I think that is not the situation on his side.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: There are two things which the minister said which I found quite surprising. First of all, he attributes part of this increase to the Congo crisis. Surely, Mr. Chairman, the government does not budget so closely that it has no leeway for potential crises. There have been crises almost every year for many years. Surely, in his estimating, the minister makes some allowance for the inevitability of international situations.

Second, the minister said that there had been a considerable increase in the functions which are being carried out by government; that is, we know there have been extensions, and new services are being provided, but what the minister did not explain is where the cutting has been done, where he has trimmed off the fat, where he has found the waste, extravagance, and so on, that he used to speak of so eloquently. Perhaps the minister would now tell us what increased functions and requirements there are that make for additional telephone services. He might also tell us in what directions he has been able to make savings, what sections of what departments he has eliminated in the thrift under which this government operates the affairs of the country?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I started out to answer that question we would be here for a good many hours. In this item we are asking for $40,000 to cover additional telephone service at Ottawa and might I suggest, now that the explanation has been given, we reserve that other larger and interesting question for a suitable occasion.

Mr. Regier: I noticed that one of the last members in this house has his office in the west block, namely the hon. member for Peterborough. Exactly how much did it cost the government of Canada to persuade the Bell Telephone Company to supply the hon. member for Peterborough with a telephone? I mean the installation cost?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have just said the installation cost of putting in a telephone has been raised from $2 to $5, an increase in the Bell Telephone tariff that became effective on November 1. In addition to this cost of installation, of course, there is the monthly charge and beyond that, the service charge.

Mr. Regier: If I might pursue this a little bit further; take a matter of four months, five months or six months, plus the installation cost, and it would run to roughly $30. I understand there are about 40 members in the west block. Does the minister consider it exactly fair to blame members of parliament in the west block for the $40,000 expenditure, or even for any significant portion of it, and to list that as the initial reason for the expenditure of $40,000?

Mr. Benidickson: I want to re-emphasize to all my colleagues in the committee that I would not have raised this point had not the minister in defending the increase of $40,000 in the telephone account attributed it in the main to expenses on parliament hill for members of parliament. First of all, I think he had better tell us how many members of parliament have actually been located in the west block. There are not very many. If we had that number we could then easily do the mathematical part of the equation ourselves. The sum of $3 or $4 apiece would be involved in installations over there.

I have raised my personal grievance only because of the aspersions that were cast on members of parliament and everybody else on parliament hill with respect to their telephone bills.

The minister has referred to some special, extra line in a member's office. I was not asking for a special line in my office; I was asking simply for an extra telephone which would cost me personally $1.50 a month, or something of that kind, which I indicated I was prepared to pay. I have given full credit to everybody. I am not casting aspersions on the Sergeant-at-Arms who is enforcing the economy of the house. The Minister of Finance suggests there is extravagance here. I wish to point out there was no extravagance here. I offered to pay for my own extra telephone, as I would have to do anywhere where I was in business. There is such economy being practised here that I could not pay for my telephone myself, despite the fact that the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka points out that we are billed personally and individually for our long distance calls and we pay for them. Because of that I saw no reason whatsoever why I could not be provided by the Bell Telephone Company with an extra telephone, be billed for it personally and pay the $1.50 a month, or whatever it might be, for this telephone which I would have if I were carrying on business in a similar office elsewhere, rather than have to jump up and down and take the telephone from my secretary, or vice versa.

It was only because the minister suggested that this extra amount was largely attributable to extra expenses for telephones on the hill that I raised this as an example. I want to assert that there is the utmost economic control of telephones on parliament hill, to the extent that I cannot even pay for that kind of service out of my own pocket.

Mr. McGee: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has not considered that perhaps the exercise of jumping up and down for the telephone might be just what the doctor ordered, so to speak. I would also like to offer him the suggestion that if he moves his secretary's desk over close to his own he could simply hand the telephone back.

Mr. Benidickson: I can see that the hon. member is an efficiency expert.

Mr. Fisher: I hate to be the dreadful Willie in this but I should like to inform the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that I know of one member of parliament in the opposition who has two telephones in his office. I do not want to be sneaky and reveal the name, but there is a member in this committee who has two telephones in his office. It is not too big an office, and his secretary and he sit facing each other and each has a little telephone. I think it improves their efficiency tremendously. I hope no one is going to run around trying to find the office with the two telephones in it. I think it works out very well.

An hon. Member: The hon. member is over in the west block; he is one of those who caused the expense.

Mr. Fisher: Someone suggests this office is in the west block. This man is not in the west block; he is in the centre block. In the west block there are special considerations. I know one Conservative member over there who has an office so big it is a route march from the door over to his desk. His poor secretary is really in trouble. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has a little office. This member's office is a great big office, and the hon. member sits away over in the big bay window looking out on the Ottawa river and his secretary is over by the door. When the telephone rings there is all this jumping back and forth.

It seems to me that we have a problem here of great importance. I refer to the juxtaposition of the member and the secretary. It could raise all kinds of questions. I am very much bothered that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River should bring up the question. I know it has been brought up about my office. I have my secretary sit right next to me so she can answer the telephone.

Mr. Benidickson: Is that the reason?

Mr. Fisher: Therefore, in fairness to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and the Minister of Finance, I think that maybe someone with the authority should approach the members of the internal economy commission to see if we can all have telephones just where we want them. In particular, if it will improve the efficiency of some members of the House of Commons I think it would be an excellent idea. I can just tell from the look on the faces of most hon. members that they would like to see the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River have two telephones in his office.

Item agreed to.

681. To authorize the treasury board to delete from the accounts certain debts due to, and claims of Her Majesty, each of which is in excess of $1,000, amounting in the aggregate to $4,071,008.80, $1.

Mr. McMillan: This vote authorizes the treasury board to delete from the accounts certain debts, which I presume were legitimate debts, each of which is in excess of $1,000, the total amounting to $4 million. That seems like a lot of money to be writing off. I notice that in the Department of National Revenue there are 913 claims each of which is for $1,000 or more and amounting in total to $3.7 million. I should like to know whether the department is forgiving people their income taxes or just what this means.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The details on page 18 indicate the amounts in relation to each of the eight departments concerned. It will be seen that by far the largest amount is in the Department of National Revenue where there are 913 claims within the scope of the proposed write-off. In general the cases presented in these estimates fall within one or the other of two categories: first, uncollectable debts due the crown in excess of $1,000 where treasury board has approved deletion subject to inclusion in a special estimate item and, second, debts due the crown in excess of $1,000 in respect of which the governor in council has granted authority not to take recovery action and where sufficient time has elapsed to ensure that their status is unlikely to be altered as a result of changing circumstances.

I can give more information about these various categories if that is the wish of hon. members. They will see from the details the number of claims involved in each case. I have before me a very long list of the items concerned. To take the Department of National Revenue, for instance, most of the claims are very old, some of them having been incurred as long ago as 1935. There are no live claims written off here where there is any hope at all of collection. I see others here going back to 1931, 1929, and 1928. Therefore I think the hon. member can be assured that there is nothing written off that has any material value.

Mr. Chevrier: What are they for?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The ones affecting national revenue are all debts incurred between 1926 and 1957 representing arrears in sales and excise taxes where it is considered impractical or impossible to collect due to various reasons. I can detail those reasons if that is the wish of hon. members or give some examples. Bankruptcy was the reason in 273 cases.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps we could save time if the minister would agree to table tomorrow, if not tonight, a list of amounts that have been written-off and the details. This would satisfy any hon. member who wished to look into the matter more thoroughly.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That would be entirely agreeable. That was done last year and I will be glad to do so again. I have the list before me and it is very long.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister what is the procedure here. I heard him mention a claim that had been uncollectible since 1926. Is this a periodic cleaning up of accounts or why would an account be uncollectible from 1926 and written off in 1961? Can the minister give the committee some idea what the practice is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, apart from the normal work of review that goes on within any individual department there is a committee of review of debts that may be thought to be uncollectible. That committee makes reviews and then the matter goes before treasury board. I think the hon. member can be assured that by the time anything goes through these three bodies it has been pretty carefully winnowed down. We do not propose the writing-off of anything where there is any likelihood at all even of partial recovery.

Mr. Herridge: It seems to me that maybe the process is rather slow if it takes from 1926 to 1961 to decide that a debt is uncollectible. Can the minister give the reason for some of these accounts going back so far in the past?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are some of the old ones that have obviously been kept open in the hope the debtor would acquire some means some time that would enable recovery to be made in whole or in part. Time goes on, sometimes a long time, until in the end the conclusion is drawn and the decision taken that the claim is utterly uncollectible and might as well be written off. Sometimes a claim is incurred when a man is in full vigour of middle life and hope exists that he may acquire means, but by the time he reaches a more mature age, let us say, it appears that his earning power is gone and there is going to be no possibility of recovery.

Mr. McMillan: Are some accounts written off every year? Were there some written off last year, for example?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, yes, we went through the same procedure last year and we followed the same procedure as has now been suggested by the hon. member for Trinity. Last year the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River suggested it and I tabled a large number of sheets listing all these claims.

Mr. Benidickson: Is there any requirement in the Financial Administration Act to report this kind of write-off in the public accounts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Under the Financial Administration Act there is authority in the treasury board to write off claims under $1,000.

Mr. Benidickson: I mean to report in the public accounts—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: —anything over $1,000 on a similar basis as in the case of rebates of duties and excise taxes where there is an obligation to report anything over $1,000. Is there a similar obligation under the Financial Administration Act to print these write-offs in the public accounts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will not say that every item written off is shown in full in the public accounts but the details are given there of the write-off in terms of the reduction of the crown's claims.

Item agreed to.

683. To provide that paragraph (c) of subsection 4 of section 8 of the Public Service Superannuation Act, as amended by section 6 of chapter 38 of the statutes of Canada, 1960, shall be deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of January, 1954, $1.

Mr. Benidickson: In items 683, 684, 685 and 686, we are dealing with the dollar items to which I have referred, though perhaps with not as much justification as when I raised the matter on vote No. 658, the first item in the supplementary estimates. My concern with these items is that I suspect they have the effect of legislating and perhaps amending a statute in a way that, if the items pass, they will not have to be brought back annually for parliamentary attention. They would not have to come back annually for parliamentary attention and, of course, no amendment to the statute itself comes forward in the form of a bill. However, some of these items have an effect that goes beyond one year. Am I right in thinking that that might be so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think we should consider these items one at a time. Item 683 is intended to give retroactive effect to 1954 to one of the amendments passed to the Public Service Superannuation Act at the 1960 session of parliament. I think the hon. member will recall the amendments to section 8 of the act which were introduced last year.

A question has arisen as to whether those should not be made retroactive. This could be called an act of grace on the part of parliament.

Mr. Benidickson: I am thinking more of whether or not there is a future effect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They have a future effect only in the sense of having permitted a retroactive effect to the 1960 amendment; so that they may have effect from January 1, 1954, these benefits will be available to those whose claims under section 8 of the act would have come into existence between 1954 and 1960. I would be the first to say it would have been better if this matter had been taken care of at that time. However, under these circumstances, it was felt this was the most direct way of accomplishing the purpose now because the numbers affected by this item are quite small.

Mr. Benidickson: The numbers affected are quite small, and that excuses the failure to introduce an amending bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The effect of this—

Mr. Benidickson: It appears that something was overlooked when we had the amending bill before us in 1960. This may be the easy method of accomplishing the purpose, Mr. Chairman, but I just raise the point that this is a back door method of legislating which has been criticized in the past. This item will have the same force as if an amending bill to the Public Service Superannuation Act had been introduced because next year it will not be necessary to have anything along these lines in the estimates. The administrative officers of the crown will be able to take this language as being equal to an amending bill approved by parliament.

As I have pointed out to the committee, the danger of this type of item is that it will have exactly the same force and effect as if we had had a formal amending bill to a public statute approved by parliament. This item will not appear in the index to our public statutes, so it will be difficult for members of parliament to find this amendment. Those who are expert in these matters, of course, will have in their offices a reference to an obscure item in supplementary estimates No. 5 of the session of 1961. Other people looking for this authority, however, will not find it so easily. I say this is a rather obscure method of legislating.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have just two brief observations. The first is that a reference is made to these amendments in the index to the public statutes. The second is that what is proposed here is of a financial nature. It means, in effect, that permission is given to grant a waiver. That is the reason the procedure of an amendment in the estimates is suitable.

This particular item, No. 683, is intended to authorize and validate the returns of contributions on the part of the superannuation account. This takes care of cases where contributions will be permitted to be returned to employees who ceased to be employed for a second time following two periods of employment which were separated by an interval of less than a year. There were several cases where payment of return contributions was, in fact, made by mistake so this retroactive effect is required to validate those, while future returns of contributions in similar cases simply permit equal justice to be done in all these cases.

Item agreed to.

685. To provide that any reference to the "Civil Service Superannuation Act" in subsection (5) of section 20 of chapter 38 of the Statutes of Canada, 1960, shall be construed as including a reference to the "Public Service Superannuation Act", $1.

Mr. Benidickson: All of these items are of a similar character. I know the minister will take notice of the objections and perhaps give consideration to dealing with such matters next year, if they are of sufficient importance, by way of an amending bill to the particular statute. The minister will realize that if amendments are made in this way next year with any degree of frequency, he will meet with similar objections to those which have consumed the time of the committee. I suggest to the government and to the minister that they give consideration, in future years, to the introduction of amendments to the statutes themselves, if the matters are of sufficient importance to warrant this course.

Mr. Chevrier: Ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I take it that we will be dealing with supplementary estimates tomorrow and Wednesday.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why Wednesday?

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder what the business of the house is for tomorrow and whether consideration has been given to the business with which the house will be dealing when we reconvene on April 10.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will carry on with the supplementary estimates, followed by items Nos. 1 and 2 on today's order paper, if there is time for them. These items are concerned with Bills Nos. S-5 and S-6 dealing with insurance matters.

I hope to make a forecast, perhaps tomorrow night, concerning the business with which the house will be concerned immediately following the Easter recess.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

WORK PERMITS TO FOREIGN NATIONALS

Question No. 72—Mr. Argue:

1. How many work permits have been issued to (a) American citizens; (b) other foreign nationals, for each year since 1955, and for what provinces were they effective?

2. How many (a) American citizens; (b) other foreign nationals are presently in Canada on a work permit, in what provinces and in what industries or services are they working?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. No "work permits" as such are issued to foreign nationals seeking temporary entry to Canada for employment. They are either admitted for employment or other designated purpose or are refused entry. There may be a great number of categories of persons admitted to Canada "for employment" including diplomatic and consular representatives, foreign armed forces, members of religious orders, professional entertainers and athletes, seasonal workers, professional practitioners (doctors, lawyers, etc.), businessmen, trade representatives, executive and technical personnel of foreign concerns with Canadian interests, persons entering to service foreign built machines and systems, representatives of international trade unions and persons entering to perform labour or service for which Canadian labour is not available.

Statistics showing the number of persons who entered Canada for employment of one kind or another are available for 1959 and 1960 but cover only persons admitted from countries other than the United States. Under section 7(1)(h) of the Immigration Act, which provides for the temporary admission of "persons engaged in a legitimate profession, trade or occupation entering Canada for the temporary exercise of their respective callings" 6,733 persons entered from countries other than the United States in 1959. In 1960 these totalled 7,277. Documentation for all temporary entrants from the United States has been reduced to a minimum and does not facilitate statistical analysis.

2. Toward the end of 1960 the immigration branch instituted new procedures to document the admission of non-immigrants. An analysis of the resulting information shows that, as of March 1, 1961, a total of 1,067 persons, who entered under 7(1)(h) of the Immigration Act were in Canada. Statistics regarding the occupations of the persons are not available; however, the table below provides a breakdown by province of residence and shows the numbers who entered from the United States and those who entered from other countries:

COLUMBIA RIVER—LETTERS FROM AND TO FINANCE MINISTER, AND B.C. PROPOSALS

OFFICE OF THE PREMIER Province of British Columbia

VICTORIA
1961
March 23rd

Honourable Donald M. Fleming, Q.C.,
Minister of Finance,
c/o Government House,
VICTORIA, B.C.

Dear Mr. Fleming:

Because your own time here is limited and since it appears, at this writing, that I shall have to contend this week with several extra sittings of our legislature, I am taking the opportunity to extend to you through the medium of this letter a warm personal welcome to Victoria.

I am certain that our discussions relative to development of the Columbia river will be extremely useful and I should like to assure you further that the government of British Columbia is genuine in its desire to co-operate with the government of Canada in order that Canada's obligations under terms of its treaty with the government of the United States may be carried out fully and without delay.

It is with these thoughts in mind that I am attaching two alternative proposals for Columbia development which British Columbia feels may serve as a firm basis for discussion tomorrow. In doing so, I should state further that these proposals are not designed to limit in any way the range of our talks; I shall, of course, be pleased to study and discuss any proposals of the government of Canada which are brought forward either during or following our discussions.

With your agreement, I would suggest that we meet in my office at 10 a.m. tomorrow. A number of arrangements which will, we hope, make your visit an enjoyable one have been worked out in detail, and these will, I believe, be outlined in a separate letter to you from my executive assistant, Mr. G. D. Ekman.

With kindest personal regards, I remain,

Yours sincerely,

W. A. C. BENNETT

FINANCIAL PROPOSALS BY THE GOVERNMENT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA FOR DEVELOPMENT OF THE COLUMBIA RIVER

Number One

A. The government of Canada to construct on its own account the storage dams and transmission lines necessary to carry out requirements of its treaty with the government of the United States.

B. Generous compensation to be paid by the government of Canada to those citizens of British Columbia whose homes and property will be affected by flooding.

C. Payment of flood control indemnities in the approximate amount of $64,000,000 as provided by terms of the treaty, to the government of British Columbia, which government will keep these moneys intact in perpetuity with earnings only to be used as compensation for economic loss to the province resulting from flooding.

D. Assumption by the government of Canada, or its appropriate agency, of pre-engineering costs in the approximate amount of $4,000,000, this sum representing necessary expenditure already authorized by the government of British Columbia for investigations into Columbia development now being carried out on its behalf by the British Columbia energy board.

E. Ownership of all works and transmission lines constructed pursuant to the United States-Canada treaty to be transferred without charge to the government of British Columbia 50 years after the commencement of the treaty development, or at such time as the works are paid for, whichever occurs the sooner.

Number Two

A. The government of British Columbia to undertake full financial and fiscal responsibility for construction on its own account of the storage dams and transmission lines necessary to carry out requirements of the United States-Canada treaty.

B. The government of Canada and its officials to be afforded full access to engineering data, together with scrutiny and approval of all contracts in the manner now employed in the trans-Canada highway program.

C. The government of Canada to guarantee, by appropriate financial measures, that the net cost of Columbia river power delivered to the Vancouver area will not exceed 4.25 mills per kilowatt hour.

D. The government of Canada to arrange with United States authorities, should any Columbia river power become surplus to the needs of British Columbia, for purchase of such surplus power in the United States at a price not lower than 4.25 mills per kilowatt hour.

MINISTER OF FINANCE

Ottawa December 6, 1960.

The Honourable W. A. C. Bennett,
Premier of British Columbia,
Parliament Buildings,
Victoria, British Columbia.

My dear Premier:—

I duly received your letter dated October 27th concerning the financing of the Columbia river power development. Your writing of the letter followed our personal discussion of the same subject on October 26th.

You will undoubtedly have been advised by now that at the meeting of the Canada-British Columbia policy liaison committee on November 23rd and 24th the federal ministers amplified the nature and effect of the federal government's offer as first put forward on February 9, 1960, and confirmed in my letter of April 21st. Since the questions in your letter under reply were based on the situation previous to the elaboration made at that meeting, I believe it would be appropriate if I were to repeat the outline of the federal offer here, in order that my answers to your questions may appear in their proper context. Subject to satisfactory agreement on the character and functions of a joint federal-provincial co-ordinating agency, along the lines indicated by federal representatives at the recent Canada-British Columbia policy liaison committee, the federal government would give financial assistance in the following manner:

1. The government of Canada is prepared, subject to the approval of parliament, to advance one half of the capital cost of creating the storages necessary to implement the proposed treaty between Canada and the United States for the co-operative development of the Columbia river.

2. The government of Canada will advance these moneys as an investment in a joint project of Canada and British Columbia which will be self liquidating.

3. The government of Canada proposes the creation of a joint entity for the purpose (amongst others) of receiving and advancing the federal government's financial contribution. It is understood that you propose to designate the British Columbia power commission as the agency to have physical responsibility on behalf of British Columbia for construction and operation of these projects. Subject to satisfactory agreement between our two governments as to the role and position of the joint entity in safeguarding the obligations of the federal government under the treaty and the interests of the federal government (including such matters as the giving of necessary clearances called for by the treaty, adherence to completion dates as may be agreed in the treaty, Canadian content and employment in construction, etc., and such other matters as are appropriate to be entrusted to the entity), and subject to the approval and authorization of parliament, the joint entity could be authorized to advance the federal moneys for capital costs, to British Columbia power commission in accordance with the schedule of construction as contracts are approved.

4. The financing thus provided by the federal government (or guaranteed, if a guaranty arrangement is agreed to be more suitable) would be looked upon as a joint investment with British Columbia, and be repayable by the operating entity to the joint entity on behalf of the federal government, out of revenues earned from the project after operating costs are met. Since it would be a joint investment, capital repayment out of revenues to the federal government would be in the same proportion to total earnings as the capital contribution by the federal government bears to the total capital contributed to bring the project into operation and would be subject to the same maturity dates and other repayments conditions as were applicable to the capital contributed by the provincial government, or by private investors.

5. Under this arrangement, it would also be possible for the joint entity to receive and disburse the proportion of the capital to be contributed by British Columbia, if the province wishes to handle it that way. Alternatively, it would be possible for the entity to raise the finances directly from the public, with each government agreeing to guarantee the issue proportionately and to purchase proportionately any part thereof from time to time not taken up by public subscription.

Subject to the foregoing, I would answer your request for information on five precise points as follows:

1. and 5. You now inquire as to "the maximum amount which the federal government would be prepared to lend to the B.C. power commission". In our oral discussion on October 26th, your question was put in rather different form. You then asked if there would be any strings attached to any loan that the federal government might make and, if the loan were to the B.C. power commission, whether the federal government would wish to have a guarantee by the government of the province and, if so, whether on principal, interest or both. As indicated above and as stated in my letter of April 21st, I wish to confirm that the government of Canada is prepared, subject to the approval of parliament, to provide one half of the capital cost of the approved storage required to implement the proposed treaty between Canada and the United States for the co-operative development of the Columbia river, as an investment in a joint project of Canada and British Columbia that would be self liquidating.

2. The financing provided or guaranteed by the government of Canada would be recoverable with interest from the revenues earned from the project.

3. The precise interest rate to be fixed would depend on the form of financing agreed to, but it would obviously have to bear a direct relation to the rate at which the entity could borrow in the market. With guarantees as suggested above, and in view of the advantageous nature of the project which has been arranged, it should be possible to secure a favourable interest rate. The point to be emphasized is that, on the basis of this concept of a joint invesment, there would be no question of an interest charge to the British Columbia government for any investment by the government of Canada. Interest will be paid at the same dates as interest is paid on the capital provided by the provincial government, or to private investors on the bonds guranteed by the provincial government.

4. Until its investment has been recovered by it, the federal government would be entitled to receive a share of the net revenue earned from the project in proportion to its contribution to the total capital contributed by the two governments.

You will appreciate that, apart from answering your specific questions in the context of the elaboration of the federal offer referred to, I have confined myself to a very general outline of the nature of the offer and of the ways in which it could be implemented. We are ready and shall be pleased to discuss the details of these and all other questions pertaining to the financing of the Columbia river project, in which the government of Canada has such an important interest, and express the hope that you may see fit to authorize your government's representatives to discuss these questions at the meeting on December 8th and 9th.

Yours, sincerely,

DONALD M. FLEMING.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 28, 1961

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO YUGOSLAV FOREIGN MINISTER AND WIFE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon it is my privilege to say a few words of welcome to Hon. Koca Popovic, the foreign minister of Yugoslavia, and Mrs. Popovic, who are visiting in Ottawa for a day or two.

As hon. members know, Mr. Popovic represents a country which has shown great courage and great steadfastness, and which has been our ally in two world wars. Both the foreign minister and his wife were officers in the partisan army. The minister eventually became the commander in chief of that force, and both had very distinguished careers in those trying days.

Since the war the minister has taken a very active part in the work of the United Nations, where his country has stood for peace and has always taken a stand which would lead in that direction. Yugoslavia, like Canada, is one of the middle powers of the world today, and one of the powers which depends so much on an effective world organization.

It is very significant that in far-away Palestine there are several hundred young Yugoslav soldiers serving beside approximately the same number of young Canadians in the United Nations emergency force. They have been participating together there now for some years, making a great contribution, which I think sometimes Canadians are inclined to forget.

Therefore, under all these conditions it is a very happy occasion for me to be able to welcome the minister and his wife to Canada and in particular to the House of Commons.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the opposition I should like to associate ourselves with the welcome which has been expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the foreign minister of Yugoslavia and his wife. We welcome them, Mr. Speaker, not only on their own behalf but because the foreign minister represents a country which in the past has fought fearlessly for its freedom against all aggressors, and we know it will continue to do so in the future.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group wish to associate themselves with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the leader of the official opposition in extending a most hearty welcome to the foreign minister of Yugoslavia, about whose great achievements we have all heard and read. He proved his mettle and successfully fought against nazi terror, nazi brutality and nazi viciousness. Anyone who has done that has a very deep affection in our hearts. We wish him a most happy, fruitful and enjoyable stay in Canada.

TRADE

URANIUM POLICY—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the need for the Canadian government to remove the present state of confusion in the uranium industry by making an immediate statement of policy that will assure the Canadian uranium industry, and employees engaged therein, of (a) minimum quantities of uranium that it will insist shall be purchased by Britain as a result of the commitment made for purchase of uranium during the period April, 1963 to December 31, 1966; (b) the general basis of allocation of the market within the industry; (c) the maintenance of uranium communities such as Uranium City, Elliot Lake, Bancroft.

Mr. Speaker: If I understand the hon. member's request, it is to interrupt our proceedings under rule 26 to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, and that the matter of urgent public importance is the need for a statement of policy by the government with respect to the uranium industry?

Mr. Argue: Yes, Mr. Speaker. With respect to the question of urgency, we believe there is a great state of confusion in the uranium industry in our country at this time that has not been cleared up by the statements made in the house yesterday, and this confusion is brought about because of the uncertainty in the public mind with regard to the quantities of uranium that will be sold under the contract, or under the commitment made between Canada and the United Kingdom. By this motion we are asking as a matter of urgency that the government should state to the country now the immediate quantities of uranium that the Canadian government will insist that Britain purchase from Canada on the basis of the commitment to which the Prime Minister has referred. After that has been stated there should be some indication of the general basis of allocation of this market within the industry in Canada so the various components of the industry will know their economic position and, further, so the uranium communities in Canada such as Uranium City, Elliot Lake, Bancroft and others will be assured that they will be maintained over this period.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is unnecessary to consider the matter further. It seems to me that the hon. member's interest in this matter should be expressed at a time provided by the general rules of the house rather than in a special debate under rule 26 which would interrupt all other proceedings. My view that this matter does not come strictly within the rule is based partly on the sittings of a committee of the house which has this matter before it and where there is ample opportunity to inquire into and deal with the problem of uranium supplies and marketing. In fact I think the issue has come to the fore through that committee which has not yet reported.

Furthermore, from listening to the discussion of this matter in the house it appears that the main controversy is over the sale of uranium to the United Kingdom between the years 1963 and 1966. Therefore it seems to me that parliament will have ample opportunity to deal comprehensively with this important matter in the course of its ordinary proceedings and at the usual time.

TEXTILES—INQUIRY AS TO TARIFF PROTECTION AGAINST HONG KONG EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister in a position to state whether it is the intention of the government to provide additional tariff protection to Canadian manufacturers against the import of textiles from Hong Kong?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, tariff questions are normally reserved for the budget, as I think the hon. member is very well aware.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask a supplementary question. If that is the minister's answer, is it the intention of the Canadian government to rely on the escape clause in GATT to bring this about?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I indicated yesterday this situation, on which I gave the house a report yesterday, is now under examination in the light of the fact that the Hong Kong authorities have indicated that they do not propose to apply any restraints on exports from Hong Kong to Canada in the interests of orderly marketing in Canada. It rests then with the Canadian government to decide, subject to the approval of parliament, as to the proper course to be taken in the light of this now ascertained fact.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a further supplementary question. Does the Minister of Finance intend to follow the advice of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who in Toronto yesterday called for competitive effort, not higher tariffs, to increase industrial production?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I warmly associate myself with all calls for effort on the part of Canadian producers that they be competitive not only in holding their markets in Canada and abroad but in expanding those markets.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope you will keep the Minister of Trade and Commerce in tow.

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO REVISION OF U.K. CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether since his last reference to this matter on March 6 he has received from the British authorities any indication that they do not intend to honour the firm contract for 24 million pounds of uranium, delivery to be made commencing March 31, 1963?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have had two discussions with the British high commissioner, and we both expressed ourselves very clearly on this matter. I think we understand each other's point of view very clearly now.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister's reply indicate that this firm contract—those are the words of the minister—will be honoured by the United Kingdom government?

Mr. Hees: I have every hope it will, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if the Minister of Trade and Commerce can inform the house what quantity of uranium is provided for in the firm part of the contract.

Mr. Hees: I think the hon. member for Assiniboia knows as well as I do the figure that has been mentioned.

I might clarify the term "firm contract", which has been laboured slightly by both the hon. member and the Leader of the Opposition. As both these hon. gentlemen know, the exchange of letters between the British atomic energy authority and the Eldorado company are in fact a firm undertaking by the Eldorado company to supply 12,000 tons of uranium to the British atomic energy authority between March 31, 1963 and December 31, 1966, and an equally firm undertaking by the British atomic energy authority to receive the 12,000 tons of uranium and pay for them.

The Prime Minister said yesterday that no formal contract has been signed between the two entities. In referring to the exchange of letters as a firm contract when I spoke in the house on March 6, I was expressing my own feeling about such an exchange of letters, which to me is a firm undertaking on the part of both entities.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister confirm the statement that there is a firm undertaking on the part of the United Kingdom government to purchase from Canada 12,000 tons of uranium between 1963 and 1966?

Mr. Hees: My understanding of the letters of intent is to the effect that the British atomic energy authority have by their letter indicated that they are willing to accept that quantity of uranium.

Mr. Argue: I wish to ask a supplementary question. Will the minister say whether it can be taken by the house that Canada is insisting that this quantity be purchased, or whether the Canadian government is prepared to allow Britain to purchase a smaller quantity?

Mr. Hees: When I talked last with the British high commissioner, I made it clear to him that Canada expected the United Kingdom government to take the 12,000 tons originally described in the letter of intent. He explained at quite some length the difficulties faced by the British atomic energy authority, in that their need for uranium is not anywhere nearly as great now as it was when the letter of intent was orignally entered into. At that meeting I told him that we should be glad to discuss this whole matter and that, on the understanding that it is vital to the uranium industry of Canada that the 12,000 tons of uranium be received and paid for by the British atomic energy authority, discussions could take place regarding perhaps an alteration in price which would be fair to the Canadian uranium industry, and which would also to some extent relieve the burden upon the British atomic energy authority and thereby the British government.

I told him that we are willing at all times to discuss matters in which we are mutually concerned and that Mr. Gilchrist, the president of Eldorado Mining and Refining Company, would be glad to have talks with the head of the British atomic energy authority with regard to this matter. I also told him that, at the end of these talks, Mr. Gilchrist would report to me as to how the discussions worked out, and that I would report to the cabinet for their consideration of any changes that were suggested.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister if he will inform the house why this firm contract for 12,000 tons of uranium was not included in the stretch-out arrangements of 1959?

Mr. Hees: The Leader of the Opposition seems a little bit difficult to explain things to this afternoon. The Prime Minister explained this matter to him yesterday and I explained it again this afternoon. Yesterday the Prime Minister pointed out very clearly that no formal contract has yet been signed, that what exists at the present time are letters of intent between the two entities, and that until a formal contract is signed no formal contract exists. However, these letters of intent are, as I say, an undertaking by both entities to carry out certain undertakings.

Mr. Argue: I wish to ask a supplementary question. From the minister's statement are we to take it that the price is flexible and the quantity certain, or are both elements firm?

Mr. Hees: It seems equally difficult to explain things to the hon. member for Assiniboia this afternoon. I stated a short time ago that I had pointed out very clearly to the British high commissioner that Canada considered the quantity of 12,000 tons of uranium vitally important to the continuation of our uranium industry here, and that I did not feel any change in that quantity could be contemplated by the Canadian government. This being well understood, I also pointed out that there might be a possibility of some alteration in the price providing it would be a fair price to the Canadian uranium industry, and would be of assistance in lessening the burden which, the high commissioner explained, is falling heavily on the British atomic energy authority and, consequently, on the United Kingdom government. This burden has been brought about because their need for uranium has been greatly reduced compared to what it was when the letters of intent were originally entered upon.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but before I do I should like to remind him of an answer he gave in this house on March 6, as reported on page 2672 of Hansard. He said then, in effect, that he had received no inquiries either from the United Kingdom government or from the United Kingdom atomic energy authority concerning possible cancellation or renegotiation of a firm contract involving 24 million pounds of uranium. The hon. gentleman answered in a dogmatic manner on that occasion that he had received no such inquiries. Can the minister tell us now whether since that date he has received any inquiries or requests for the renegotiation of this contract?

Mr. Hees: Again may I comment that it seems hard to explain things to certain hon. members this afternoon. If the hon. member for Ottawa West would think back he would recall that only a short time ago I explained I had held two lengthy talks since March 6, with the British high commissioner, who has spoken to me about this important matter. I think that answers the hon. member.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps we might have some further clarification of this situation. How did it happen that on March 6 the minister did not know that this contract was under renegotiation?

Mr. Hees: I said on March 6 that I had received no representations from the British government or from the United Kingdom atomic energy authority.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Speaker, may I ask—

Mr. Speaker: I think this matter has been pursued at more than the usual length both yesterday and today. If it is to be clarified further, a debate will be necessary.

[Later:]

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): I wonder if Your Honour would permit me to put another question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce along these lines. Can the minister state who it was initiated the conversations with the British high commissioner which he described in his reply? Was it he who initiated them or the high commissioner?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's question directed to a detail of that kind amounts rather to a cross-examination such as he might employ in an extended cross-examination in court, and that it is not a proper supplementary question at this stage.

FLOODS

BEAUCE COUNTY, QUE.—REQUEST FOR FURTHER STATEMENT ON ASSISTANCE BY ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. It is a rather slippery one. In view of the fact that the Associate Minister of National Defence reported to the house on March 9, 1960 that an army report recommended the use of explosives to weaken the ice on the Chaudiere river two or three weeks before the anticipated break-up, would the minister explain why, as he stated in the house on March 24 of this year, the army has been sent to Beauceville once again at the last minute when flood conditions are already serious there?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): In reply to this question I may say that the army was sent to Beauceville immediately upon receipt of a request from the provincial authorities in view of the serious condition which was threatening the security of the citizens of that area.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to ask the the minister a supplementary question. In view of the fact that this condition occurs repeatedly and there is some danger to the troops when the ice gets into a certain condition, would it not be sensible for the Department of National Defence to conduct negotiations with the provincial authorities to arrange to meet this difficulty at less expense and with more safety to the persons concerned?

Mr. Sevigny: These flood conditions have prevailed on the Chaudiere river for a good many years. Each year the circumstances are quite different, and it is rather difficult for the army to negotiate with the provincial authorities concerning events which cannot be forecast.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Crestohl (Cartier): May I address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister inform the house whether there were consultations between the United States government and the Canadian government prior to the recent conversations between President Kennedy and Mr. Gromyko concerning Laos, and whether the proposed continuation of participation by Canada in the truce forces was the result of such conversations?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. There have been continuous consultations between Canada and the various other countries concerning Laos. This particular conversation between President Kennedy and Mr. Gromyko had nothing to do with the position Canada has taken.

AID PROGRAMS TO UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the hon. gentleman comment on the report that Canada is rumoured to be pushing for longer term programs of aid to undeveloped countries at the development assistance group conference in London and, if possible, give any information he might have to the house?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Canadian delegation, which is composed of senior officials, is not taking any particular initiative such as the hon. member suggests in his question. It is expected that certain proposals will be put before the meeting, mainly by the United States delegation, for examination and subsequent study by the various members concerned. The Canadian delegation will, of course, be reporting fully to the Canadian government upon its return.

The present meeting is the fourth meeting of the development assistance group which is made up of Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom, France, West Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, Portugal and Japan. When the organization for economic co-operation and development comes into being, the development assistance group will be absorbed into the larger organization and will become a subcommittee on aid questions. I am afraid that the statement the hon. gentleman referred to is speculative and not based on facts.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister who is the head of the Canadian delegation to this important meeting?

Mr. Green: The head of the delegation is Mr. A. F. W. Plumptre of the Department of Finance, and the senior official from the Department of External Affairs is Mr. A. E. Ritchie.

LAOS—STATEMENT ON CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia asked whether Canada has made any representations to the United Kingdom or the United States about the latest proposals made by the United Kingdom to the Soviet co-chairman. In reply to his question I wish to inform the house that during recent months the government has been in constant touch with the United Kingdom and the United States and with other governments about developments in Laos, and the possible role the truce supervisory commission might play in a solution of the crisis in that country. In these continuing discussions Canada has recognized that the situation is serious and that action is required by the countries principally concerned as well as the Laotians themselves to contribute to a peaceful solution.

As to the possible use of the international commission, we have taken the position that there should be general agreement among the parties concerned about the part the commission might play in contributing to a negotiated settlement. The proposals put to the Russians were a result of a long series of consultations and were made in the light of the existing circumstances. The views that Canada has from time to time expressed about the role of the Laos commission were taken into account in the proposals that were placed before the Soviet co-chairman by the United Kingdom government last week.

CUBA—ARREST AND DETENTION OF PATRICK WILLIAM GARRARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister indicate whether any move has been made by the Canadian government on behalf of Patrick William Garrard of Vancouver, who was arrested in Cuba and detained in jail? I have heard no further report regarding that situation, and would like to know whether the Canadian embassy has taken any action on his behalf.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian embassy in Havana has been in close touch with the case of Patrick William Garrard since this Canadian citizen was detained by Cuban police when leaving Havana on March 23.

At this time the Canadian vice consul visited Garrard in detention and found him well and in good spirits. Garrard had not been interrogated and was not able to ascertain the charges against him. The vice consul visited him again on March 24, and the embassy has since made a direct approach to the Cuban foreign ministry for an explanation of the reasons for arrest. The outcome of these representations is not yet known, but we are doing everything possible to protect Garrard's interests.

THE MINISTRY

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF NEW DEFENCE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In the light of the increasing crusade being waged by the Minister of National Defence on behalf of the extension of the nuclear club, can we expect that the commendable effort by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in connection with this matter will be crowned with success at an early date by the appointment of a new minister of national defence?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The gentleman's question is a rather argumentative one and asks for the announcement of an appointment by the government. Such announcements, in my experience, have always been made on the government's own initiative and not in answer to questions from the floor.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

RESOLUTIONS REQUESTING BRINGING INTO FORCE OF SECTION 96A OF ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder whether in the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration I may direct a question to the parliamentary secretary, of which I hope sufficient notice has been given.

Can the parliamentary secretary inform the house whether any reply has been received from the attorney general of British Columbia with respect to the resolutions from the Tsitsk, Bella Coola, Kincolith, Metlakatla, Canyon City and Gitlakdamix Indian bands requesting that section 96A(2) of the Indian Act be brought into force, which resolutions were forwarded to the attorney general? If so, could he also give an indication as to the contents of the reply?

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I wish to thank the hon. member for Skeena for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The reply to the first part of the question is yes; a reply has been received from the attorney general of the province of British Columbia. As far as the second part of the question is concerned the contents of the letter are being studied. I am not in a position to make any comment at the present time.

[Mr. Green.]

DORVAL AIRPORT—SITUATION OF PORTERS AND EFFECT OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he could give us any information concerning the matter of the Sky-Caps porters at Dorval airport about which he was supposed to make inquiries some time ago.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the situation remains unchanged for the time being and is still being looked into.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister was also supposed to tell the house whether the order in council passed by his department constitutes an infringement upon provincial rights, that is to say, civil rights.

The minister made that statement in reply to a question of mine on February 3. Over a month has elapsed since then. Is the minister in a position to tell us whether he has made inquiries?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, there is no infringement upon the civil rights of the provinces, and I advise my hon. friend that the order in council in question has not actually been carried into effect in the present case. We are still looking into the situation before reaching a final decision.

GRAND'MERE—STATEMENT CONCERNING SHUTDOWN OF TWO INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question put by the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche on March 16 regarding Grand'Mere Knitting Mills and Grand'Mere Handicraft, I might say that those companies have not applied to the Minister of National Revenue for assistance. Neither did the minister himself ask that special measures be taken in favour of those companies. Any steps taken are intended for the textile industry in general.

(Text):

FORD MOTOR COMPANY—LAY-OFFS OF MACHINE REPAIRMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the hon. member for Trinity directed a question to the Minister of Labour based on a communication received by the Minister of Finance, a copy of which was sent to the Minister of Labour. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, having received the communication from the president of local 200 of the united automobile workers drawing his attention to the lay-offs by the Ford Motor Company of qualified machine repairmen while at the same time large machines from the plant have been sent to the United States for repairs, could the minister use his good offices to ask that this situation be rectified?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I received a letter containing such allegations and asking if I would communicate with the company. In my reply I pointed out that matters pertaining to the export of machinery for the purpose of repair, reconstruction or other such purposes with the intention of reimporting them into Canada are not matters falling under the jurisdiction of the Department of Finance but under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Revenue. I accordingly referred the letter to my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Argue: In the absence of the Minister of National Revenue could the Minister of Finance inform us what follow-up has been made, or representations, to the company?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is a little premature in this regard, as I received the letter only yesterday.

Mr. Argue: No; this letter was received last Thursday.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was in Victoria last Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

DRUGS

PROPOSED LIMITATION OF PRODUCTION OF NARCOTICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question in connection with the international convention to control the distribution of addiction-producing narcotics. Would the minister comment on the chance of limiting the production of these narcotics to the quantities necessary to meet medical and scientific needs?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I would hope there is every chance of limiting the production of narcotics to the fields specified by the convention adopted at the United Nations on Friday, since this, of course, was the purpose of calling together the many countries involved. The force of the convention will depend on the sincerity of the signing countries in imposing controls within their own national boundaries.

I am glad the hon. member has given me an opportunity to recognize the valuable contribution made toward the production of the convention by Mr. R. E. Curran of my department, who headed the Canadian delegation and acted as chairman of the drafting committee.

PUBLICATIONS

STATEMENT ON SALE OF ELLIOT LAKE "STANDARD"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West asked a question yesterday regarding the sale of the Elliot Lake Standard. I am advised that the first negotiations by the Thomson interests to purchase this paper were entered into three years ago, and obviously therefore bear no relationship to the present situation.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR LINES—REQUEST THAT OVERHAUL WORK BE DONE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur inquired regarding a press report in respect of major overhaul work carried out by Canadian Pacific Air Lines in foreign countries. I understand that Canadian Pacific Air Lines has had some of its overhaul work carried out in Great Britain. Canadian Pacific Air Lines is a privately owned company which must operate in direct competition on its international routes with the international carriers of other countries. I know that, as a Canadian based company, it maintains extensive maintenance facilities in Vancouver. However, since this is a private matter of this company I am not in a position to comment any further.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTIVITIES OF RETURNING OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. Would the minister explain why returning officers have been asked to designate district boundaries and to enlist enumerators when it is known that a redistribution of ridings will be required by law for the 1962 session of this house?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): I will take the question as notice.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED REMARKS BY DEPUTY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Charlton (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peterborough asked a question yesterday with reference to a speech made by the deputy minister of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in Toronto last Saturday.

Dr. Davidson has advised me that in what he said about malicious libel on the reputation of Canada he was referring not to reports of economic conditions in Canada, but rather to reports of the alleged hardships suffered by certain immigrants who have returned to Europe from Canada. The hon. member might refer, in this connection, to a recent series of articles appearing in the British newspaper The People, beginning February 19 and running through to March 19. He might also refer to Stanley Westall's article in the Globe and Mail last Thursday, entitled "The Image of Canada—a Bad Press in Britain". I shall be glad to make the clippings available to him if he so desires.

IRENE REBRIN—PERMISSION TO REMAIN IN CANADA PENDING CIVIL ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would the parliamentary secretary assure the house that the usual practice will be followed, as in similar circumstances, and that Miss Irene Rebrin will be permitted to remain in Canada until the conclusion of a civil action in which she is interested?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Perhaps I might deal with that question, Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister. I can assure the hon. gentleman that every consideration will be given to the proposition he has put forward.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

The Chairman: We are considering supplementary estimates, item No. 687.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

688. Payment, subject to such terms and conditions as the governor in council prescribes, of assistance to producers of salted fish on products designated by the governor in council, in the amount of 50 per cent of the laid down cost of salt purchased for their production—further amount required, $155,105.

[Mr. Dorion.]

Mr. Carter: May I ask the minister if he has a breakdown of this amount by provinces?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member will appreciate that this is an estimate of what will be required for this purpose. The provision of information as to any possible breakdown of payments among provinces will not become possible until the payments have actually been made. Of course the estimate itself does not attempt a precise breakdown on this basis.

Item agreed to.

690. Contribution towards the costs of a special meeting of the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations regarding distribution and use of fish meal, $2,500.

Mr. Regier: On this item I should like to lodge a complaint with the minister, with the Department of Fisheries and with the government as a whole. In recent years we have received notice of a developing practice, especially on the part of fishing companies located in British Columbia, under which, in the production of herring fish meal, they are moving into other countries and using their capital resources, taking advantage of lower labour costs, especially in such countries as Peru, to develop large herring fishing industries. This has the result of undercutting and eliminating the Canadian production of fish meal, and consequently our herring fishermen have had to suffer long months of unemployment. They have now been re-employed at reduced rates. Their income has been reduced because of the activities of Canadian corporations which are establishing herring fishing enterprises in other countries.

These corporations are using Canadian resources to do this. They are using the profits they made in Canada in the Latin American and South American countries, with the result —I will not say with the purpose—that many Canadians interested in herring fishing, and who have invested their whole life savings in gear and equipment, are either unemployed or have their income reduced. If we are to engage in international aid in regard to the distribution of fish meal, I feel that Canadian fish meal should be distributed to those nations in the world that have need of it. Consequently every consideration ought to be given to the Canadian production of fish meal, and we should not be voting money here that will help to distribute to the needy nations of the world the fish meal that has been produced by Canadian corporations in countries other than Canada. If we are to give aid in this respect we ought to ensure that Canadian fishermen get the benefit, and that we are not actually aiding Canadian corporations in their profit-making schemes in other countries of the world.

Item agreed to.

Governor general and lieutenant governors—

691. Office of the secretary to the governor general—further amount required, $8,500.

Mr. Herridge: I want to ask one question of the minister, who I know has a great regard for constitutional rectitude. Would the minister consider it proper for a lieutenant governor of a province, who it the representative of Her Majesty, to be appointed a director of a crown corporation and be subject to the criticism of members of parliament?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am not in the habit of expressing opinions on speculative or hypothetical questions. If the hon. member will direct my attention to something specific under the proper circumstances I will do my best to give him an opinion, but I warn him that I am still in good standing as a barrister and solicitor in the province of Ontario, and if this question involves rendering a legal opinion I will expect him to see that the labourer is regarded as worthy of his hire.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

692. Departmental administration, to extend the purposes of vote 151 of the main estimates, 1960-61, to include a grant of $5,000 to the Canadian corrections association to assist in defraying the costs of a congress of corrections to be held in Toronto in 1961, $5,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) concerning this item. The provision relates to a grant to the Canadian corrections association to assist in defraying the costs of a congress of corrections to be held in Toronto in 1961. Can the minister give us further details about this congress? Will it be sponsored by the Department of Justice or by a professional association?

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Canadian corrections association is sponsoring a congress of corrections to be held in Toronto from May 14 to May 19 next. It is expected there will be close to 1,000 persons in attendance from all parts of Canada. Those are persons engaged in correctional work, such as judges, magistrates, crown attorneys, defence counsel, wardens and other officers of penal institutions, probation and parole officers and social workers in the field of after care. It is also expected there will be in attendance certain well known authorities in the correctional field coming from the United Kingdom, the United States and Belgium, as well as representatives from the Department of Justice.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say whether there is any special reason why this convention is being held in Toronto other than the beauty of the city, the friendliness of the people and the unsurpassed convention facilities which exist there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member will agree with me that no further reason is required.

Mr. Hellyer: I thank the minister.

Item agreed to.

Northwest Territories—

694. Administration of justice in the Northwest Territories including the Northwest Territories territorial court—further amount required, $48,500.

Mr. Roberge: I have noted that the item in the main estimates provides for $45,000. The government is now asking for an additional $44,000 in these supplementary estimates. Can the minister indicate why such a tremendous increase is required?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This vote of $48,500 is composed of two elements; the first, $44,000; the second, $4,500. The item of $44,000 covers fees paid to crown counsel and defence counsel appointed by the court in the Northwest Territories as well as fees, living expenses and transportation of jurors, witnesses, interpreters and others in connection with the proceedings in criminal matters and the conduct of coroners' inquests. From this allotment are also paid the expenditures made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the maintenance of prisoners, including the hiring of matrons for female prisoners while jailed in Royal Canadian Mounted Police guard rooms and during transportation to provincial jails.

I may say that in addition to the current expenses I have mentioned there has been received by the Department of Justice a bill in the amount of $21,687 from the government of the Northwest Territories, covering payments made by that government to the province of Manitoba with respect to the housing of juvenile delinquents from the Northwest Territories. This is a cumulative amount covering such service between April 1, 1953 and June 30, 1960. That explains why the item is concentrated at this particular time but this portion covers, as the hon. member will see, some seven and a quarter years.

Item agreed to.

Combines Investigation Act—

696. Restrictive trade practices commission—further amount required, $17,500.

Mr. Creston: Can the minister give the committee some details as to what industries are being investigated, necessitating this additional expenditure? In the details on page 20 there is simply a general statement referring to fees and expenses of reporters, witnesses and so on, and also travelling expenses, with no indication in what field of investigation this money was expended. I think the statement of details would have been more informative and more complete if it had included information as to the particular trades or practices being investigated.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member is aware that it is not the practice to announce the particular areas of Canadian business or industry in which investigations are being carried on until a report has actually been made and published.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to repeat a question I asked the Minister of Justice on March 7 and I quote now from page 1798 of Hansard:

I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Justice. In view of the fines levied on eight electrical companies in the United States for bid rigging and price fixing, will the minister tell the house whether any investigation is being made or is contemplated by the combines investigation branch into similar practices by the Canadian counterparts of these electrical companies?

The Solicitor General, who was the acting minister of justice at that time, said:

I will take this question as notice and give the member an answer at an early date.

If the answer has been given I have missed it. I wonder whether the minister can throw any light on this question.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do not imagine that the Minister of Finance could be expected to reply to that question, but I rise with a similar purpose in mind. On March 13 I asked a question in similar vein with respect to combines administration. My question referred to two articles that had appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail under the by-line of Mr. Bruce Macdonald in which it was alleged that since the passing of legislation last session electrical goods were no longer available except at prices 25 per cent to 40 per cent higher than had been normal prior to last year's legislation coming into effect. At that time the parliamentary secretary replied to my question in these words, as found on page 2914 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, I am sure the officials are on the job in this respect, but I shall be glad to refer the matter to the appropriate officials for comment.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

I have been very intrigued this afternoon to note the lack of co-operation that the Minister of Finance is experiencing so far as his colleagues are concerned when he is called upon to deal with problems of this nature in this important committee of supply. We have only been in committee for about 20 minutes. I saw the Minister of Justice conveniently retire, but I thought fortunately we still had his parliamentary secretary here. However, as we approached closer to the items under the heading "Justice", by coincidence or otherwise the parliamentary secretary retired. Then I thought that we were still all right because the Solicitor General, who has acted as minister of justice, was with us and perhaps we would be able to get some information from him on these matters about which we could not expect the Minister of Finance to have complete details. However, as we were getting closer and closer to the items under the heading "Justice", off went the Solicitor General.

Mr. Chevrier: He cleared out, too.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, any connection between the particular items now engaging the attention of the committee and the movement of my colleagues and the hon. members to whom reference has been made is, I am quite certain, purely coincidental. The long-time practice of the house has been that the final supplementaries coming at the close of the fiscal year are handled by the Minister of Finance as best he can. I may say that I do not find the lack of co-operation on the part of my colleagues that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River professes to find.

So far as the question of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo is concerned, I shall be glad to draw his inquiry to the attention of my colleague.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us the number of prosecutions under this legislation in the fiscal year just ending compared with the number in the previous fiscal year and also whether the change, if any, is responsible for the increased expenditure?

Mr. Benidickson: I am delighted to see that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice was only behind the curtain and is now back in his seat. I refer to him the question I posed as long ago as March 13 last. It related to allegations that under the new combines legislation passed last session electrical consumer goods are no longer available generally throughout the country except at prices 25 per cent to 40 per cent higher than those prevailing prior to the new legislation. In my view this confirmed the warning of the opposition last year when the legislation was introduced. We asserted then that such legislation was likely to have a very adverse effect upon consumers. We pointed in the strongest possible terms the danger of price fixing, particularly if jurisdiction over price fixing was to be removed from the Department of Justice and, as is usually the case under Conservative administrations, transferred to the hands of powerful manufacturers such as Canadian General Electric and others who are referred to in the articles by Mr. Bruce Macdonald in the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say for the record that there is no evidence whatsoever that the consumer has been harmed in any way by the legislation enacted last year. In fact I think the contrary is the case. I am not sure whether the hon. member wants a specific answer at this time to the question he posed.

Mr. Benidickson: The parliamentary secretary will recall that he assured me that after consulting the officials he would furnish some information to the house. These articles received considerable prominence, and my recollection is that they asserted facts in a most positive way. They referred to companies, they referred to products, and they referred to very distinct changes in consumer prices in the range I have already mentioned and which I referred to in my question of March 13 to which no reply has yet been made.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The question asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River on March 13 was as follows:

> Would the parliamentary secretary inquire and inform the house whether officials have examined the first retail pricing guide issued by the Canadian General Electric Company Limited after the government's amendments to the Combines Investigation Act last session to ascertain whether consumer electrical goods, in consequence, are no longer available except at prices 25 per cent to 40 per cent higher than formerly?
> If an examination has taken place, is the minister satisfied that because of the amendments of last session there is no offence against the remaining provisions of the act respecting resale price maintenance?

In reply to this question I may say the matter has been brought to the attention of the director and is presently being examined to determine whether an inquiry is warranted. Of course, as the hon. member knows, the general practice is not to give out information on whether or not an inquiry is proceeding unless and until a report is published.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I agree that the government needs this additional amount. I believe a useful purpose is served in exposing the activities of Canadian or other corporations in so far as price fixing is concerned. However, in a certain way we are simply pouring money down the drain. Almost every major industry in Canada has been found guilty of violating the Combines Investigation Act, yet no beneficial results have flowed to the Canadian consumer except the publicity given to these matters. I feel the time is rapidly approaching when the Canadian government should reconsider its position in connection with this subject.

I remember very well indeed, Mr. Chairman, when our present Prime Minister was a member of the opposition. At that time he demanded of the government of the day that the Combines Investigation Act be amended in order to put some teeth into it. It was his contention then that anyone who was found guilty of violating the Combines Investigation Act, no matter how high ranking an officer he might be, should have imposed on him a mandatory term behind bars. He ought to have to go to jail, because the mere levying of a fine is ineffective and even ludicrous. If the Prime Minister meant what he said a few weeks ago, that the issue in the next election is going to be free enterprise versus socialism, I believe his election appeal is going to meet with very little response unless he is able to show that his government really believes in free enterprise.

We have had all these investigations in the past, and almost without exception Canadian enterprise has been found guilty of plotting and scheming in an unethical way, in an illegal way, to rob the consumers. Even the Minister of Finance, I believe it was in his budget address in 1959, admitted to this house the concern of the government over the growing power of corporations to determine prices regardless of the normal laws of supply and demand. If the election issue is going to be free enterprise versus socialism, the government will have to convince the Canadian people that there is some free enterprise.

I happened to be in the United States at the time the officials of the electrical industry were convicted of combining. I can assure the minister that after these officials were sentenced to jail the people of the United States found a renewed faith in the fundamentals of free enterprise. We have seen nothing of the kind happen in Canada. I think we ought to take the Prime Minister's advice when, as an opposition member, he advocated that if our Canadian people are to be expected to believe in the existence of free enterprise, if they are not to become cynical, then we will have to prove by the implementation of the Combines Investigation Act that we mean what we say. After all, Mr. Chairman, I do not see why a man who steals a bit of wire from the B.C. Electric should be sentenced to two years in the penitentiary, while a man who is a member of the baking industry combine and who needlessly adds one cent per loaf to the cost of every loaf of bread the Canadian housewife buys, should only be fined. In my opinion the baker is a bigger criminal than the man who steals a bit of wire from his employer.

I would urge upon the government that they look at the attitude and the thinking of the government across the border in connection with this issue, and recall how quickly the confidence of the people of the United States was restored in the institution of government. In contrast, our government merely carries on year after year by levying fines upon those who have been found guilty. This means nothing to these people. As a matter of fact they very often increase their rate of violation immediately after the results of an inquiry have been released.

If the minister is really concerned about the growing power of Canadian corporations to determine price levels regardless of the normal law of supply and demand, I recommend that before we vote much more money to the combines investigation branch we consider amending this act so that it will have some effect on the Canadian economy and on the faith the Canadian people are supposed to have in our method of doing business, as well as upon the respect our people are supposed to have for law and order in this country.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, we should hear something from the minister on this subject. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice told us a few minutes ago there was no evidence that prices had been increased since the change was made in the legislation last year. Obviously the parliamentary secretary has not been shopping recently or he would know from his own experience that prices for many lines of hard goods have increased. The Minister of Finance should be interested in this matter, because the Minister of Finance is interested in the total amount of business done in this country and in the total number of jobs available to Canadian workers.

The Minister of Finance is well aware of the fact that there is an elastic demand for many of these hard goods. The lower the price is, the greater the market, and the greater the market the more jobs there are for the people who manufacture these goods. Part of the trouble with our economy at the present time is this matter of the rigidities which are being built into it. One of these rigidities is fixed prices. I think the minister should look into the effects of the changes in the legislation which were enacted by parliament last year to determine the extent to which they have caused prices to be increased, as well as the effect this has had on markets and consequently upon employment in Canada. I think he should do this not only for his own sake but because he has a responsibility to this House of Commons and to the Canadian people because of his high office.

Mr. Benidickson: The productivity council should look at it also.

The Chairman: Shall item 696 carry?

Mr. Regier: No. I should not like this opportunity to go by without making this comment. When I referred to the budget contribution of the Minister of Finance in 1959 I noted that he, by shaking his head, attempted to deny that he had indicated as I mentioned. I should like to read to the minister what he had to say as reported at page 2408 of Hansard of April 9, 1959 when, among other things, he said this:

> Advancing technology might have been expected to reduce the cost and selling price of many products to consumers. It is evident, however, that developments in corporation pricing policies, in labour organization and even in our political democracy are producing increased rigidities which inhibit the free play of competitive forces and thereby promote inflation and price increases.

All I am asking at this time is what are the intentions of the government with regard to this concern so aptly and ably expressed by the minister on April 9, 1959, other than a mere pouring of more money into more investigations that will find even more Canadian corporations guilty, but will have no effect in reality except to build up an attitude of despair and cynicism on the part of Canadian consumers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to the hon. member for reading exactly what I did say in the budget speech of 1959 and in that way exposing his earlier misinterpretation of what I said in this regard. Hon. members are now in a position to contrast what I actually did say with the interpretation put upon it by the hon. member in his earlier remarks.

May I remind you, Mr. Chairman, that item 696 is for a further amount required in addition to a sum already voted by parliament and to be found in the Appropriation Act passed earlier in the session of 1960. In this situation, as I understand it, the rule that applies is that we are not debating the principle of the main item but are simply endeavouring to decide whether the additional amount now proposed is in fact required.

I may say that this additional amount is in fact required. It is required owing to an unforeseen increase in reporting costs and other fees and expenses in unusually prolonged inquiries, and to cover the cost of travelling to hearings at points outside of Ottawa. These are additional expenses necessarily incurred in the effective enforcement of our combines legislation. I would have thought that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam would warmly applaud these demonstrated efforts at effective enforcement of the legislation enacted by parliament in this regard.

Mr. Hellyer: I want to say just one word. Surely we are in order in discussing here the government's schizophrenic approach to the matter of combines. On the one hand it spends more money on prolonged investigations, and on the other hand it introduces legislation which is responsible for more prolonged investigations owing to the fact that it enables companies to have broader scope in the fixing of prices within the law. For this reason we are perfectly justified in questioning further expenditures which might not have been necessary if the government had not taken an altogether different position in the legislation it placed before this House of Commons last year.

The Chairman: Shall vote 696 carry?

Mr. Regier: No, Mr. Chairman. The minister made an attempt to indicate that we might even be out of order. No one here attempted to debate the principle of the Combines Investigation Act. We only ask the government, before we vote the additional amount for the implementation of this act, what its intentions are in this regard.

I listened carefully to the hon. member for Trinity when he spoke previously, and he also complained about the rigidity in our price structure. I indicated the minister's complaint on April 9, 1959 about the rigidity in our price structure. All I am asking of the minister is that he indicate what intentions the government has in this regard. Is this money now being asked for going to help to eliminate or to elasticize the rigidity that now exists by restoring a bit of old fashioned, honest, free enterprise into our economy?

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Special services—

697. Special services branch including the promotion of a program for combating seasonal unemployment, the organization and use of workers for farming and related industries and assistance to the provinces under agreements entered into with the provinces by the Minister of Labour with the approval of the governor in council—further amount required, $65,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this vote reads as follows:

Special services branch including the promotion of a program for combating seasonal unemployment—

And so on. I should like to say a word in connection with this matter. I believe it was on March 21 last that the Minister of Labour indicated in the house, by way of an announcement, that some 105,000 jobs were created this year because of the winter works program.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, may I say that the minister was referring to the municipal incentive winter works program. This item does not refer to that matter. This item refers to expenditures in relation to publicity to encourage people all over the country to undertake the provision of employment in the winter. This item is not related to the government's own municipal incentive winter works program.

Mr. Chevrier: As I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, this item refers to the promotion of a program for combating seasonal unemployment. The implementation of winter work is for the benefit of seasonal unemployment. It is my intention to deal with seasonal unemployment under this heading. I hope the minister will allow me to continue, because I believe that the remarks which I intend to make, and which are going to be brief, are in conformity with the title of this item.

I was going on to say that, following the statement which the Minister of Labour made and which can be found at page 6823 of Hansard of July 23, 1960, reference was made to seasonal unemployment and the assistance that was being given to combat seasonal unemployment by the winter works program. The government has attempted to deal with the matter on every opportunity which has been given in the house. The government has taken full credit for the creation of new jobs during the season of unemployment. To the extent that any new jobs have resulted from works provided by the government to relieve seasonal unemployment, in my opinion and that of those of us who sit on this side of the house credit should go to the local authorities on whom the major financial burden of these projects has fallen.

On July 23 of last year the Minister of Labour stated that the average labour content of all municipal winter works is 34.5 per cent. As the committee knows, the federal government pays 50 per cent of the direct labour cost or approximately 17 per cent of the total cost. An additional 25 per cent to 40 per cent of the direct labour cost is borne by the province. In the case of the province of Quebec 40 per cent of those costs are being paid by that government, and were it not for what is being done by way of assistance with regard to seasonal unemployment in the province of Quebec, unemployment there would be much higher than it is. The point I am trying to make is that under this scheme for combating seasonal unemployment the main burden falls upon the municipalities.

I have compiled here two tables which indicate that the winter works program is not as effective in its impact as the government would have us believe. Special table 3(c) breaks down the labour force estimates of employment by industry and by occupation, and I should like to table a compilation of figures derived from special table (c) entitled "Employed by Industry and Occupation" issued by the special surveys division of the dominion bureau of statistics. I should like to ask permission to table these two documents.

Mr. Chambers: Did the hon. member for Essex East do any arithmetic in connection with those?

Mr. Chevrier: No, these are not from the hon. member for Essex East, though were he here I am sure he would approve of those two documents.

The Chairman: Did the hon. gentleman say he wanted only to table these documents?

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to have them printed in Hansard in connection with the matter now under discussion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I take it they are from government sources.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, as I have indicated they are from special table 3(c), employed by industry and occupation, special surveys division, dominion bureau of statistics.

The Chairman: These are two tables. Does the committee agree to have them printed at this point in the hon. member's remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Source: Special table 3(c), Employed by industry and occupation, special surveys division, DBS.

Mr. Chevrier: If hon. members would look at the first table entitled "Employment in Construction Industry" they would see there were 10,000 fewer jobs in construction in February of this year than there were in January, and 24,000 fewer than in February, 1960. Thus, the winter works program has not mitigated the seasonal decline in employment in the construction industry between January and February.

In so far as the other table is concerned —the table entitled "Employment by Occupation"—as can be seen from the table which has just been filed there was a decline of 4,000 workers in 1958, but during the last three years there has not been a decline in the number of what are termed construction workers between January and February. During 1959 there was an increase of some 5,000 workers and this year there was an increase between January and February of some 7,000 workers.

However, the point I am trying to make, and which is borne out by this latter table, is that the winter works program has had no discernable impact on the employment of labourers and unskilled workers. There were approximately 21,000 fewer jobs in this occupational category in February of this year than in January. We have, of course, asked the government on a number of occasions—the hon. member for Essex East and others, too—for a local breakdown of the projects undertaken during this year's winter works program. We have not as yet obtained the answer, so we have been unable to analyse the local impact of the projects.

There are a few explanations why the government can claim that there were 105,000 additional jobs created by the program and why there has still been no amelioration of the seasonal unemployment problem among construction and unskilled workers. These reasons are, first, that municipalities have undertaken during winter construction work which would normally be done in summer in the belief that the extra cost involved would be more than compensated for by the participation payments of the federal government. To the extent that this is true, no new jobs have been created but, rather, unemployment in wintertime has been replaced by unemployment in the summertime. This has been brought to the attention of the government not only during discussions this year but also last year when an indication was given to the Minister of Labour that in so far as seasonal unemployment is concerned many of the municipalities which undertook works simply postponed the works from summer to winter, the effect of which was simply to postpone unemployment in wintertime to unemployment in summertime.

The other point I should like to make is that communities suffering from a high incidence of seasonal unemployment have found themselves incapable of participating in the winter works program to any great extent because of the high level of cyclical unemployment they have experienced this year and the encumbent financial burden of increased welfare payments. Communities such as the city of Ottawa, for instance, where there is not a high level of unemployment, have been able to take advantage of winter works projects to a greater extent than communities which really need them. This, I think, is a factor which should be taken into consideration with regard to this whole matter of seasonal unemployment.

There are two suggestions I should like to make and then I shall resume my seat. They are a repetition—and I think they need to be repeated—of suggestions which have already been advanced by those of us who sit on this side of the chamber. They are, first, the establishment of a municipal loan fund, and, second, the incorporation in the winter works program of a formula on a sliding scale of federal participation depending on the amount of unemployment in a particular area. That would have the effect of insuring that the winter works program had its greatest impact in distressed areas. As a deterrent to seasonal unemployment and as a project to assist employment we do not think that what has been advanced by the government meets the situation at all, and now I have reference particularly to the formula which was brought down by the Minister of Labour having to do with accelerated depreciation. It is our opinion that the two suggestions I have just made would meet the situation far better.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item is one calling for the provision of a further amount of $65,000 to supplement the amount previously voted in the main estimates. It has nothing whatever to do with the municipal incentive winter works program. As I pointed out after the hon. member for Laurier had launched into his remarks, this has to do with the effort made to encourage others than municipalities to undertake what measures may be open to them with a view to extending employment in the winter months. This is an offer that has been made by the Department of Labour, and with very encouraging results, to encourage people to do work in the winter and to undertake the job of creating work that can be done in winter months but is not always done then, for some reason or other.

This item is designed to provide the sums that have been expended for publicity in this regard, directed to bringing home to people their responsibilities in this respect, and the opportunities that do exist for the undertaking of work during the winter months. This lies completely outside the field of the municipal winter works incentive program. That is a matter that was undertaken, in so far as the estimates are concerned, under an item that was brought in with an earlier group of supplementary estimates. If we are going to have a debate on that I will be happy to participate in it but with respect, that lies completely outside the ambit of this present item.

Mr. Benidickson: In view of the remarks just made by the Minister of Finance, I take it that this involves some uncontemplated items of advertising and promotion that would have an ancillary effect with respect to the enlargement of the winter work. Perhaps it includes advertising such as I have here "Department of Labour—Do it Now with a Small Business Loan". Perhaps that is one of the items that was not contemplated when the main estimates were provided more than a year ago, and perhaps advertising of this kind would be provided for in the vote we have before us, is that so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That particular advertisement may have been included in the scope of the main original estimate. I cannot say precisely whether it was included in the sums provided for in the supplementary estimates now under consideration, but the increase that is provided for here, in the appropriation for this total purpose, arises in part out of the fact that after the main estimates were introduced in the house for the fiscal year 1960-61, the chartered banks indicated their willingness, when this matter was discussed with them, to service home improvement loans. This type of loan was extended by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to include the owners of rental properties. The winter employment committee within the Department of Labour recommended that, in view of the need to give support to the promotion directed to home and farm improvement loans the increased cost for the printed material over the last year and the needed expansion to keep pace with demand, the expenditure for winter employment publicity should be increased. That has been approved and this additional sum of $65,000 resulted.

Mr. Benidickson: I was not referring to advertising with respect to home improvement loans because, after all, that has been a form of providing employment which has been in existence over a long number of years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, I think the hon. member is not right about that. The home improvement loans program was undertaken last autumn. What has been done in that respect since is quite additional to what has been done before. The co-operation of banks was enlisted and a new program was undertaken in this respect, and because this source is regarded as such a hopeful one for the provision of employment, a campaign was undertaken to promote the awareness on the part of Canadians of the fact that home improvement loans were available as well as farm improvement loans.

Mr. Benidickson: Farm improvement loans and home improvement loans arranged through the chartered banking system in this country have been available for years. There is nothing new in this regard except that the terms of the loans change from time to time as a result of the amendments regarding the amounts, and so on. I was referring to something that is new—small business loans—where again the enlistment of the chartered banks' support is made with the banks' numerous branches across the country. Since this legislation was passed it has been possible for businessmen to get small business loans. When this new legislation was introduced it was suggested that there was an accumulation of perhaps $65 million worth of work.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was $75 million.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, $75 million—I stand corrected—of work that was standing ready and which would be accommodated under this new legislation. The minister will recall that I complained about this later, and said we thought, in order to assist the winter works emergency, this should have been advanced more rapidly. The opposition co-operated in this regard at the beginning and its debate and criticism were reduced to a minimum prior to Christmas. We were very surprised to find that the cabinet had not arranged these regulations sufficiently in advance so that it would be possible, prior to January 19, for the banks in this country to be ready to receive applications for loans. Since that time a number of inquiries have been made regarding the approach to the target of this $75 million worth of work, to which the minister has referred, by the extension of loans. These were presumably requirements which were ready, on shelf.

A number of inquiries have been made in parliament of the Minister of Finance, because this was legislation initiated by him. It would seem that some of this money is required for advertising, through the Department of Labour, because we have seen advertisements across the country such as the one to which I referred—"Do it Now With a Small Business Loan". I am not referring to home or farm improvement loans, but new small business loans. Presumably because this is a new thing it could not have been provided in the main estimates which were prepared over a year ago. I do feel, however, that since January 19, 1961 when the cabinet's regulations were made public, the Minister of Finance has not been adequately communicative to this house and to the country with respect to progress under this new legislation.

I think on March 9 the hon. member for Port Arthur raised a question in respect of this subject and the reply of the minister was that there was no report available as yet. Later on March 22 the hon. member for Beauce asked what report of progress the minister could give.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Was that not for January?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, from January 19 to January 31 was the purport of his question. He asked how many loans had been made and what was the total amount involved. At that time the Minister of Finance said he had no information in that regard. I would suggest that while we are dealing with an item relating to the Minister of Labour, we are fortunate this time to have a direct tie-up with an item that appears to have been originally fathered by the Minister of Finance, and I think it is now time for the Minister of Finance to give us some information in a definite way as to the number and dollar volume of loans that had been made since January 19 under the small business loans legislation of this session.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The banks have 30 days to make returns in this respect. If the hon. member had read my answers to these questions instead of paraphrasing them he would have seen that what I had indicated was that if the starred question which was asked was rephrased to include the period to February 28 I would be pleased to supply that information just as soon as it was available.

As I pointed out, there is no value in asking for a return for the last few days of the month of January because the loans only became available on January 19 and, after all, the processing had to be done after that.

In relation to the figure that has been quoted by the hon. member as to the work waiting to be done, in the discussion of this matter earlier in the session I used the figure of $75 million which, as I pointed out, had been furnished to me by the retail merchants' association of Canada as their estimate of the volume and value of work waiting to be done on retail premises in Canada in the modernization and reconstruction of them.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say a few words in connection with item 697 concerning the Department of Labour.

I quite understand that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) would wish to limit as much as possible a discussion of this item, more particularly if one turns to the third line reading: "for combating seasonal unemployment".

That gives me an opportunity of mentioning again what everybody knows, that until last fall, this government considered unemployment a seasonal occurrence. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Finance will recall that in his budget speech, last March, he only devoted a few lines to the unemployment situation. As a matter of fact, if I remember well—and I am now relying on my memory, so the minister may correct me if I am wrong—he said this: "I hope that the coming spring will create new employment opportunities".

The minister will also recall that we criticized, and rightly so, his observations.

Mr. Chairman, when dealing with this question of unemployment, and more particularly seasonal unemployment, we are always struck by the failure on the part of this government to solve this serious problem for which it seems unable to find a practical remedy.

I have no intention of speaking much longer on that issue. We will have that opportunity, if the leader of the house does not delay too much submitting to the house the estimates of the labour department. I very much hope he will not wait for the last day of the session to do so—as was the case during the last session—so that we may have the opportunity of discussing this lack of policy on the part of the government and a chance of expressing all suggestions which we are able to make, which we never failed to do whenever there was an opportunity.

(Text):

Mr. Hellyer: Did I correctly understand the minister to say that this money had been spent to advertise home improvement loans and small business loans?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I pointed out that the additional amount required is attributable in part to the fact that the banks were persuaded last autumn to undertake the home improvement loan program, a substantial program, and it was considered most desirable in the interest of stimulating winter work that this fact should be brought to the attention of the Canadian public. This resulted in the enlargement of the expenditure for the publicity promotional program over that which was previously contemplated.

I may say that more and more companies, businesses, organizations, associations and all segments of society have been lending support to this campaign of persuading people to undertake as much of the job creating work as possible during wintertime, and have carried the winter work message in promotional media. This is a sample of the kind of co-operation that has been received by the Department of Labour from the public and is warmly appreciated. This has been made possible by the preparation of material by the Department of Labour, information branch, for non-government sources. This in itself has meant that more Canadians are being exposed to the idea of having more work done in the winter when men and materials are available, at a time when, quite apart from unemployment attributable to other causes, we have always had the problem of seasonal unemployment. It is estimated that for every dollar spent on paid advertisement by the government in this regard $10 has been contributed from outside sources. This includes, of course, not only national publicity but also local support which has greatly increased this year as a result of greater concentration across Canada by the local offices of the national employment service.

Mr. Hellyer: That is what I thought I understood the minister to say and I must admit I am surprised to have it confirmed to me. This government has endorsed some very strange principles. In many instances it has introduced what might be referred to as the Houdini system of accounting. The Minister of Public Works was asked in this house to consider the advisability of the chartered banks making loans at the current National Housing Act rate. In reply, he said, with a certain amount of obvious righteousness, that the government would not consider tinkering with the bank rate; that it must continue the bank rate; that it must not allow a change to take place which would increase the charge to the Canadian taxpayers for loans made to them by the chartered banks; and he imputed political motives to us for making this suggestion.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, here we have the Minister of Finance doing the same thing by the back door method. Instead of allowing the chartered banks to increase their rates he says, "If you do what we ask you, we will do your advertising for you so that it will reduce your costs of doing business". This is a very strange principle, indeed.

The government refuses to face the fact that the banks will not make a certain type of loan at the rates which they are allowed to charge by law; but in order to encourage them to make the loans which the government wishes to have made the government says, "We will take some money out of our back pocket and we will do the advertising for you so that people will come to your doors and ask you for loans, and in this way we shall be mitigating the effect of the statutory limitation on the interest rates which you are allowed to charge." This is a most surprising thing, Mr. Chairman. The Minister of Finance has done similar things with his obvious polish and sleight-of-hand in some of his bond savings campaigns. Therefore, he seeks to do by one indirect method what he refuses to do directly because of the political consequences of taking direct action.

Here we have the government of Canada spending the taxpayer's money to advertise private businesses, to advertise that private businesses are open to receive applications for business from the public at large. What principle could be more questionable than this one? I should like the Minister of Finance to explain to the committee why we should vote money to the government of Canada to enable it in effect to subsidize the rate of return which private institutions are able to obtain from the loans made to taxpayers who have to foot the bill for these expenditures on advertising.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most ridiculous assertions, I think, that this committee has heard. I can only conclude that the hon. member has some animus toward the idea of having the banks launch with some vigour into a program of home improvement loans. I may say it was a matter of no little satisfaction to the government last autumn when, in discussion with the banks, we found the banks willing to undertake an invigorated program of home improvement loans. This obviously was going to be a source of employment particularly during the winter months because this is the type of work that can be carried on indoors.

If it is a justifiable policy on the part of the government to seek to increase employment during the winter months, then I should think it is not only equally justifiable but equally a duty of the government to see that as much use as possible is made of the facilities thus created. That is why, within the scope of the promotional program to which I have referred and which was provided by parliament in the main estimates for this purpose, the fact that the banks were providing home improvement loans was made known as one of many matters that indicated to people throughout the country that facilities existed making it desirable for them to undertake these job creating programs during the winter months.

This program has been successful because the expenditure of money on this promotional campaign has unquestionably had the effect of creating jobs, and it strikes me that this is hardly an occasion for a rebuke to be administered to the government by the hon. member. If it is the wish of hon. members that there should be no more unemployment than can be avoided and if it is the policy on the part of hon. members that work should be provided in the winter to meet the problem of seasonal unemployment, then I should think it would be the desire of hon. members to make this effective without dredging up accusations out of whole cloth, out of imagination, sheer fictional suggestion, that the government is trying to help the banks. In this situation the government is trying to help to provide employment.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I did not expect much business acumen from the minister but surely he knows that any private business will spend its own money on advertising if it can engage in a venture which is profitable for it, and the mere fact that the government has to subsidize the banks is an indication that what they have been asked to do by the government would not otherwise be attractive to them.

If the minister is correct in his contention that it is legitimate for the government to advertise the particular services that are available, he can extend this principle to any field whatsoever. Surely if the government merely wishes to provide employment and is interested in doing so, it can subsidize any business. It can provide back door benefits to any business. That is precisely the objection, that this is a back door subsidy, a back door arrangement, back door assistance rather than a forward approach so that the people of Canada will know the actual cost of the service they are receiving.

Here we have an instance where the banks will make loans at 6 per cent for home improvements while at the same time, according to the annual report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation distributed yesterday, they are not the least interested in making loans at the same interest rate for new housing. Why not? There must be some reason that the one is attractive to them while the other is not.

Surely one of the reasons is the fact that the minister has lifted from them the burden of servicing part of this particular business venture by reason of his assistance through the provision of free advertising. Perhaps the minister would be good enough to indicate the amount of free advertising he has provided on the basis of the different mass media listed in the details and also tell the committee whether any of this money was spent on advertising in the foreign language press of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The break down of the total amount of $332,000 is as follows:

(a) Advertising in daily, weekly and farm newspapers	$102,200
(b) Advertising in trade, ethnic and national magazines	48,000
(c) Spot announcements, etc., through radio and television	80,200
(d) Public relations, production charges and reserve for rate increases	21,600
(e) Posters, pamphlets, payroll stuffers and billboard paper	68,700
(f) Advertising mats, postal cancellation dies and post office householder mail	4,500
(g) Films and slides for television and theatres, article reprints and exhibits	6,200
(h) Public service radio discs	600
	$332,000

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the minister has been rather unfair to the hon. member for Trinity. After all, the minister seems to be hiding behind the unemployed in denying the principle that has been put forward by the hon. member for Trinity. We welcome so much these statements of principle from the Liberal party, this declaration of faith in free enterprise and the need to keep it pure from any government support and subsidization. After this clear statement the minister gets up and suggests that these factors really do not count, that we are involved in the matter of assisting the unemployed.

I know the hon. member for Trinity is not going to let his principle of the purity of free enterprise be clouded by that kind of issue. After all, if the hon. member for Trinity has a principle I am sure he wants to stick to it. Maybe this advertising will help the unemployed and may create jobs, but if you have a principle you are going to stick to it. At least, I feel that seems to be the line of the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Hellyer: Your principle is pure nonsense.

Mr. Fisher: It seems to me that one could almost turn it the other way round and say that perhaps the situation is that private enterprise in the form of the banks is subsidizing the government, which would give you a real question of principle. It seems to me that perhaps we should ask the hon. member for Trinity for a further explanation of this principle he has enunciated for the Liberal party today, this principle of no mixture at all of private and public enterprise.

It seems to me the minister has been quite cruel in suggesting that the unemployed really deserve consideration ahead of this great principle of the Liberal party. Mind you, we welcome very much knowing where the Liberal party stands on questions of principle such as this one involving no truck or trade by the government with private enterprise so far as any subsidies are concerned. It seems to me that this will lead to quite a number of denials on the part of the Liberal party, including a denial of the mixed economy about which we have heard the Leader of the Opposition talk.

It is also going to raise a question about the role of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and even about such firms as Eldorado, a government corporation that seems to be in the news these days, with respect to its dealings with private enterprise. As a matter of fact, there are some well known private enterprises that once had something to do with the hon. member's party. I do not wish to say more except that it has been delightful to have had this little talk about principle. Now we know where the Minister of Finance stands. Now we know where the Liberal party stands as outlined by the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the twisted and tortuous words we have just heard from the hon. member for Port Arthur are such unadulterated political garbage they do not deserve to be even mentioned let alone recorded. The hon. member has such a facility for getting in the ditch at the first intersection that he may not have recognized there is another principle involved here. I refer to the fact that the government may be using this advertising campaign to line the pockets of its friends, and using the opportunity so presented for political patronage.

I have examined one or two of the advertisements and they can be construed equally as political propaganda as they can be in giving encouragement to the particular service they are trying to sell. I hope the government will be extremely careful in the spending of public funds not to incur commitments, the main purpose or the only purpose of which, is merely to try to win friends and influence people, especially since the government is preparing to ask for another judgment of the Canadian people.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I did not propose to take part in this discussion because I know that we will have an opportunity of coming back to it when the estimates of the labour department are voted.

However, I do want to refute the entirely uncalled for remarks of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) to the effect that the methods used by the Conservative government in order to stimulate employment in this country have completely failed. I think he is entirely wrong. He should rather have mentioned that the policy of the provincial Liberal party was a complete failure because it did not avail itself of the facilities put at its disposal by the Conservative government in order to create employment. Contrary to the failure which my friend alluded to a few moments ago, 15,000 more jobs were created in the city of Montreal this year, thanks to the policy of the Conservative government—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair has been quite lenient in this debate. After all, we are discussing the question of advertising in connection with seasonal unemployment. We are not discussing the whole question of unemployment in the various parts of Canada.

Mr. Valade: I was just saying, Mr. Chairman, that as a result of the advertising that was undertaken in Montreal 15,000 more employment opportunities have been created.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I just want to set the record straight with relation to what was said by the hon. member for Port Arthur a few minutes ago. The hon. member for Port Arthur seems to have gotten his principles mixed, if he has any principles at all. The whole principle at stake, and the whole point the hon. member for Trinity was trying to make, was that we should be straightforward and honest in what we do. We should not use subterfuge to obtain an objective indirectly which, for political reasons, we prefer not to attack directly. This is the principle at stake, and I commend it to the hon. member for Port Arthur and to his party.

Mr. Benidickson: This item is couched in rather general language, and we find a number of subjects apparently are involved. The purpose of the item is said to be to combat "seasonal unemployment", the organization and use of "workers for farming" and related industries and "assistance to the provinces". It seems to me that this is the appropriate time to ask the Minister of Finance who, after all, has to be consulted with respect to all new programs, before they develop, with regard to including under unemployment insurance those seasonal workers who have been employed on farms. I do not need to remind him that for the last couple of years farm organizations have made representations along this line.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I think perhaps the hon. member is straying away from the subject matter of this vote. I believe this vote is for the promotion of these particular things and we should not discuss whether or not they should be done.

Mr. Benidickson: I draw to the attention of the committee the fact that there is a reference in the wording in this vote to a promotional program to "assist the provinces" and for the "organization and use of workers for farming". I point out to the committee that at least the Manitoba minister of agriculture, Mr. Hutton, has indicated as late as this month that his government favours the extension of unemployment insurance to farm workers. I was wondering what the development was along this line.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that has nothing whatever to do with this item. This item is related to a publicity and promotional campaign. It has nothing whatever to do with the question of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act. At a later point in the session the government's bill dealing with this matter, as announced in the speech from the throne, will be submitted to the house.

Mr. Benidickson: Now we have the truth. This item has no relationship to anything except a "publicity and promotion campaign". Despite this other very fine language in the vote about the special services branch dealing with promotion programs for "combating seasonal unemployment", for "assisting workers on farms", who we know are on a seasonal basis, and for the "assistance of provinces" in connection with agreements, the Minister of Finance said this item, in essence, is simply a publicity item.

Item agreed to.

698. To carry out the purposes of the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act (superseding the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act) —payments to the provinces—further amount required, $450,000.

Mr. Pitman: This particular item seems to relate closely to an important piece of legislation which was put through this house at the last session. The amount of the appropriation outlined here seems to be small. I wonder if the Minister of Finance could indicate what provinces have been assisted by this program. Perhaps he could even tell us how many areas within a province have been assisted, and possibly how many men are being trained.

I ask these questions because $450,000 is such a minute sum in terms of technical education, which is a very expensive type of education when one considers the facilities and machinery required. I should like to have a detailed account of exactly how this money is being spent in this very important area of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. gentleman will look at the main estimates and the previous supplementary estimates, he will see that parliament has already provided about $9 million for this purpose. This additional supplementary estimate is required to provide for the expenses arising out of the agreement which was recently completed with the province of Quebec for sharing the costs of training unemployed workers under schedule M of the special vocational training projects agreements.

Mr. Carter: Could the minister tell the committee on what basis these agreements are being worked out? Is it the same basis for each province or is each province treated separately?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The basis is uniform. It used to be a 50-50 basis, but the federal share has now been increased to 75 per cent.

Mr. Hellyer: It is interesting to see the liberally minded C.C.F.'er from Peterborough getting on the bandwagon in respect of this program which was espoused by the Liberal party and which is, at long last, being acted upon with halting steps by the present administration. I wonder if the minister could tell us what part of this total allocation for the year has gone to the province of Ontario?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as the estimate under schedule M is concerned, the estimated federal cost in respect of the province of Ontario is $100,000.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment insurance commission—

699. Administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act—further amount required, $1,850,000.

Mr. Deschatelets: I wonder whether the Minister of Finance can supply me with the following information. I should like to know how many prosecutions have been launched against individuals in the past 12 months for having illegally collected unemployment insurance benefits? Has the minister these figures?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have not the figures on the prosecutions but I shall be glad to furnish that information to the hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: If one looks at the details, one notes that the amounts seem to be rather substantial. I wonder whether the minister could give a breakdown of them. For instance, there is an amount of $1,500,000 for salaries and wages. Can the minister give the reason for that amount? Then there is an amount of $240,000 for postage. Will the minister explain that amount?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The amount of $1,500,000 is required to pay 44 new enforcement officers and 963 man-years of additional casual employees. The estimated cost for this fiscal year is $2,175,000 but only $1,500,000 is required as the balance has been made available out of the former appropriation, because of unfilled positions in the regular staff which were higher in number than expected.

Mr. Chevrier: Are these casual employees in the various offices across Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the explanation for the amount of the postage item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It relates to the claims load which was higher than expected.

Mr. Hellyer: On March 9 the hon. member for York-Sunbury, in a question of which he had given notice, asked the Minister of Labour what would be done to tighten up the regulations which were presently allowing thousands of men and women in Canada to draw unemployment insurance benefits when there were job opportunities available for them in their own industries. In his reply the Minister of Labour did not deny that there were thousands of jobs available in the industries to which these people ordinarily would be attached, and he went on to say that the regulations were being tightened up and for that reason certain additional expenditures had been undertaken. I assume they are covered by the moneys that we are presently being asked to vote. I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to indicate precisely where the thousands of jobs are and how many there are in each industry and in each province, so that we shall know exactly what it was that the hon. member for York-Sunbury and the Minister of Labour were talking about.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not before me the details of that question and answer to which the hon. member refers. If information is required in detail, I am sure the unemployment insurance commission can supply the list it has of the vacancies for persons who are qualified. I presume it becomes a question of qualification for the particular vacancies that exist.

Mr. Hellyer: In view of this rather serious allegation that reflects on the principles of thousands of unemployed persons in this country, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance would be good enough to undertake to get this information from the unemployment insurance commission and to make it available to the committee later on during this debate. These were serious charges that were made in saying that there are thousands of people drawing unemployment insurance benefits who could be working if they wanted to work. I think that we should have some further words from the minister on this matter before we start to vote money in order to prosecute people holus-bolus, when the minister has not more information to give us in this regard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has overlooked the fact that this item does not relate to the sums paid by way of insurance benefits. This item relates to the further amount required to provide for the costs of the administration of the commission.

In so far as the information he seeks is concerned, may I say that any information of that kind can be made available, I presume, by the unemployment insurance commission. But with respect, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I do not think it relates to the subject now before us. This matter of enforcement has now been reported to the committee. I have given the committee the figures to indicate how the amount is broken down, and to indicate the amount required to complete the enforcement to March 31, of this present fiscal year three days hence. We are not here dealing with the 1961-62 estimates nor are we dealing here with the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. That bill will come to the house at a later stage of this session.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Am I to understand from the minister that this increased cost is owing to increased administration costs brought about through this tightening up process that was referred to?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. I pointed out how the largest element in the item, namely $1,500,000 for salaries, is made up. It is to provide for the services of 44 new enforcement officers and then the casual assistance required by the commission in its various offices for all purposes.

Mr. Benidickson: We have here an item for an additional amount required for administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I have not in front of me at the moment the Unemployment Insurance Act. The minister, with the details in front of him, is probably better informed at the moment than am I. But am I not right in thinking that having regard to the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act, the administration will include not only services with respect to persons unemployed and drawing unemployment insurance benefits but under this act will have responsibility under other sections which provide for employment services?

Having regard to recent discussions concerning Mr. Exelby, am I to understand that henceforth if members of parliament want to place on the order paper questions that do not relate especially to anonymous questions relating to statistics, they could, with respect to services rendered by the employment services under this act, ask the ministry as to what specific opportunities had been offered, for example, to Mr. A., Mr. B. or Mr. C? Has the government given consideration to this matter? Is that likely to develop from the exposé by the Minister of Labour with respect to services rendered by the employment services section under the Unemployment Insurance Act administration in relation to one person?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not given consideration to that question, Mr. Chairman. I presume that is a question on which it would not be proper for me to comment in advance.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, can we carry this item and complete this department?

Mr. Hellyer: I think the item had better stand, Mr. Chairman. The minister may have a change of heart and wish to provide us with some of the details for which we have asked.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: As there are two private bills standing on the order paper for consideration in committee of the whole does the house wish, in accordance with section 1 of standing order 54, that they be referred to the committee of the whole in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. S-10, to incorporate Canadian Pioneer Insurance Company.—Mr. Cardin.

Bill No. S-14, respecting Canadian General Insurance Company.—Mr. Ricard.

DIVORCE BILLS

On the order:

Second reading of Bills Nos. SD-1 to SD-179 inclusive—Mr. McCleave.

Mr. Mandziuk: May these stand?

Mr. Speaker: It is requested by the hon. member for Marquette, on behalf of the hon. member in whose name these bills appear on the order paper, that they should stand. Is it the pleasure of the house that they stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AURORA PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-2, to incorporate Aurora Pipe Line Company—Mr. Woolliams—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Argue: Where is the mover?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): In the absence of the mover, and, indeed, of the supporters of this bill I should like to move that we rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member give me a motion in writing to that effect? It has been moved by the hon. member for Timmins:

That the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

Motion (Mr. Martin, Timmins), negatived: Yeas, 5; nays, 41.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I could not help wondering, in the absence of the mover of this bill, whether, possibly, he might not have listened to the hon. member for Vancouver South and reached the conclusion that the bill was not as good as he might have thought it was in the first place.

Mr. Chown: If I may intervene on a point of order, I think the hon. member for Timmins spoke on making his motion, and now he is speaking again. Under the rules there should be an intervening speaker before the hon. member rises again.

Mr. Howard: On that point of order—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Timmins.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): It is true I did have a few minutes to discuss this particular bill which appears to be sponsored in this house by the Social Credit wing of the Conservative party, the hon. members for Bow River, Acadia, and Jasper-Edson and others. As I pointed out the other day, I do not know just why they should be doing this. They seem to be contravening the policy of their party and the policy of their leader. Certainly, they are flying in the face of the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Vancouver South.

However, during the period when this bill has been debated, they have sought to create the impression in this house that everyone in Alberta is behind this bill, that support for it is unanimous, and that the measure is being held up by a bunch of irresponsible people. That is very far from being the truth, and I should like to point out something which will completely refute this effort to try to fool the house in this regard. I have here a copy of the Calgary Herald dated Thursday, January 19, which contains some very pertinent comments relating to this debate. I should like to quote briefly from these remarks. The newspaper states:

Mr. Harold Winch, C.C.F., M.P., quite rightly raised the question of national interest in the matter of a company seeking incorporation of a pipe-line operation when the subject came before the House of Commons Tuesday.

The points which he raised are certainly points significant in the over-all question of Canadian participation in development of its own resources. Surely there is no better place than the house to air the matter.

This is exactly what the members of this party have been trying to do in this regard assisted to a great extent, I hasten to add, by the hon. member for Vancouver South, who seems to be under no illusion whatsoever with regard to this bill. The article goes on to say:

Mr. Winch performed a service by pointing out that the bill would incorporate Aurora Pipeline Company, owned by Hudson Bay Gas and Oil Company of Calgary, which is in turn owned 68 per cent by the Continental Oil Company Limited, a United States corporation.

Mr. Winch pointed out that a Canadian company, Foothills Pipeline Company Limited, a subsidiary of Canadian-owned Pembina Pipeline Limited, is also seeking permission to export the by-products, although not by the same route or with the same objectives as Aurora.

The article continues:

"Serious consideration" should be given to whether the Aurora incorporation would benefit Alberta, he declared. And, certainly, that should be a consideration of the House of Commons.

This is something that we in this group have pointed out on more than one occasion. We have always been held up to scorn in doing so by the social credit wing of the Conservative party. They have attempted to lead us to believe that the bill is very definitely in the interest of, and has the support of the whole of the province of Alberta.

This article continues as follows:

The opportunity for Canadian participation and a considerable measure of control by a Canadian company is provided for in the Foothills proposal. It is a consideration to which these bodies must give the greatest weight.

The hon. member for Vancouver South pointed out very clearly that this bill in its present form is a complete negation of the policy that has been expounded by the Prime Minister and the Conservative party, and that it is something to which parliament should certainly give more consideration. We have been told not to bother in this regard. It has been suggested that after all there are fuel boards, both national and provincial, which will look after these details. The article appearing in the Calgary Herald has reference in this regard. It reads as follows:

The boards have the facilities and the personnel able to assess the technical aspects of all proposals. But a strictly technical view is not enough in itself. The Canadian view must also be taken and, for putting it forth in the house, Mr. Winch should be thanked. His fellow members would do well to have that view in mind.

One of the important objections to this bill is the fact that this Canadian view regarding the development of Canadian resources is completely forgotten.

Oil and gas represent a most valuable and important resource which this country possesses. The rank and file of Canadians across this country, who are the consumers of these resources, have been gouged very severely as a result of the sell-out of these resources to particular interests in this field of production. We saw an example of this in the pipe line debate of 1956. Fortunes were made by a few individuals at that time, of course, the consumers, of this and future generations, must bear the cost of providing these fortunes. An unnecessary amount of money has been written into the cost of selling these products for the benefit of a few privileged individuals, and this is the type of thing we in this country can well do without, in respect of our natural resources. In order to avoid further sell-outs of this type, which result in the loss of thousands of dollars, we should be more careful in the future than we have been in the past.

Those hon. members on the government side of this chamber, who apparently are in favour of this bill, should heed the words of one of the ministers of the crown, and I refer to the present Minister of Agriculture, who was the former minister of northern affairs and national resources. What he has said in the past in regard to our natural resources I think is very appropriate at this time during the discussion of this bill.

I would like to refer to some of his remarks which can be found at page 3323 of Hansard of August 9, 1958, in a speech which I made at that time. He is quoted there as follows:

To be very blunt about it, if you go back to the experience of the second world war you will find that the American government was very much concerned about the rapid depletion of their strategic resources and there was set up a presidential committee in that country to examine into this matter. This committee reported in 1952 and their report is known as the Paley report. The Paley report says in plain English that the resources of the United States of America are not unlimited and that, at the present time, they are in a deficit position so far as total resources are concerned to maintain their industrial economy. Naturally they have to seek out reserves both of energy and mineral resources in every land.

We have seen examples of their seeking out of these resources, unfortunately to our sorrow, on more than one occasion.

The minister had more to say in this regard which is becoming more pertinent as time goes on. He is reported on the same page as follows:

—we are the nation on the northern half of this continent and we want to make certain that the interests, not only of the present generation, are protected, but that the interests of generations unborn will also be preserved.

I think those remarks are exactly in line with what hon. members of this group have said in regard to this measure and other similar measures.

At the same page the minister is quoted further as follows:

We in Canada, whether because an act of grace, or because of our geographical location, or simply as a result of inertia, have not had our resources depleted so widely as the American resources have been depleted, without plan.

That again is something completely in line with the stand we are taking. Here we have a minister of the crown agreeing completely with this group in this regard but still we have this bill being promoted at this time by certain member of the government side of this chamber.

From the same source I repeat the following quotation:

We may have, either by the grace of God, or by our own inertia, been saved from having misused our resources.

I cannot help but wonder at the thinking and inconsistency of hon. members on the government side when some of them, as the minister, recognize this problem, while others insist on blindly promoting and executing the things condemned in the words of the minister.

Beginning on the same page and carrying over to the next, the minister is further quoted as follows:

It is simply that we have a determination to avoid these mistakes, if possible, in our country in relation to the future development and efficient use of those resources.

Does this bill represent an example of that determination to avoid these mistakes in the future? Is this the way the government intends to avoid making these mistakes, which the hon. minister recognized as having been made before, the depletion, waste and squandering of the resources in the country to the south? I suggest by the passage of this bill we will be encouraging those individuals to come in and do the same in this country, regarding our natural resources, as they have done in regard to their own.

The Minister of Agriculture, the then minister of northern affairs and national resources, had more to say regarding this subject. He is quoted at page 3324 of Hansard of August 9, 1958 as follows:

Because we have great reserves of minerals of all kinds, Canada is a great centre of interest in an economico-political way. For that reason, some consideration and logic had to come in respect of exploitation of these resources.

I would like to heartily endorse the words of the minister in this respect and suggest that it is about time we had some logic regarding these resources. I fail to see the existence of logic in the bill that is presently before us.

Later on the same day, the minister is quoted as saying:

—there is no use in doing all this work if there is not some thought given to a long range conservation concept of the most efficient use of those resources.

The hon. member for Timiskaming has pointed out the need for developing secondary industries and using those resources to build our own country into something other than a country producing primary products. If we are to avoid becoming hewers of wood and drawers of water, something to which the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet have referred from coast to coast in this country, then certainly we cannot endorse bills of this kind.

Finally, the minister went on to say:

I want to make it clear that unless we formulate a plan for the use of our resources we may lose the long range strategic necessity of having control of those resources in our hands,—

How true, Mr. Chairman. I continue:

—either for world use, or for people over the world, or most effective use in the North American economic picture.

Well, maybe this particular bill would fit in the North American economic picture but certainly it will not fit into the Canadian picture. If hon. members on the government side cannot agree with the C.C.F. that in a matter of this kind we should consider the benefit to Canadians as a whole, then surely they should listen to their own minister and his plea to try to avoid the mistakes of the past. If they cannot agree with the so-called policy of the Prime Minister and of the members of the Tory party, how do they expect the people are going to believe the Prime Minister at all if he rises in his place and expounds one view and then members of his party advocate a bill that is exactly the opposite to what he expounds?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The hon. member does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I wish the hon. member who made that interjection would rise in his place and tell us what he is talking about.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): On that very point, I am talking about the fact that this company wishes to export a product which is gasoline. The company said that 90 per cent of the product they wished to export is gasoline. This is a product that we have a surplus of in western Canada. How we can develop further industry out of gasoline is beyond my comprehension. If the hon. member looked at it in that light he would probably agree with me. If the hon. member says it is not gasoline, why did not the hon. member of his party in the committee question the statement of the representative of the Hudson's Bay Gas and Oil Company who said in the committee that it was gasoline?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): We seem to be learning more about this bill all the time. During the discussion of this bill we have had a difficult time eliciting any information at all. First of all, no record was kept of the committee meetings in the other place—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): This information is on the records of the committee. Read the record.

Mr. Howard: On a point of order, may I draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, the fact that there is one vocal member on the other side who has not the courtesy to rise before he speaks. I wonder whether you would draw the rule to his attention.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The hon. member who had the floor asked me to give him the information and I did so.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): That is not exactly in accordance with the fact. I heard an interjection from somewhere across the floor and I did not realize at the time it came from the hon. member. However, we do not mind these interruptions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fane: It uses up more time, and that suits you.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): However, Mr. Chairman, if, as I said, the Social Credit members—they are not really Social Credit members, but the hon. members who are taking the Social Credit stand on this particular bill—will not listen to the Minister of Agriculture, and if they will not agree with the stand of their Prime Minister and their allegedly official party policy, then, surely, as a last resort they will listen to the hon. member for Vancouver South and will apply to this bill the principle that was recommended by him.

If they are to insist that the resources of this country must be developed by the quick buck artist method which is, of course, another name for the racket that is called free enterprise development of our resources, then, in heaven's name, if this is the way we have to go along in the development of our resources, as the hon. member for Vancouver South suggested, let it be a Canadian racket and not a United States racket. Even that, Mr. Chairman, is preferable to the bill in its present form.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the passage of this bill very much, but I should like to ask a couple of questions which rather puzzle me. We have listened to the group in the corner to your immediate left for several long sittings talking about this bill. These are the champions of the unemployed; these are the champions of labour. The purpose of this bill is to build 41 miles of pipe line, to provide employment for unemployed Canadians, to sell a by-product, not a product, already developed, and these champions of the workers in Canada are denying to Canadians employment which would become effective almost immediately on the passage of this bill and final approval.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Since the hon. member saw fit to intervene at this time, would he give the committee any assurance that if this bill passes and if the pipe line is undertaken it will give employment to Canadians and not to people of the United States, as was the case in nearly all the previous pipe lines built across the country?

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Chown: All of the information the hon. member has asked for is on the record. A letter was read into the record by the hon. member for Bow River, the sponsor of this bill. The letter was from the financial vice president of the company, assuring this house that if this pipe line should be authorized by the national energy board, and by the conservation board of Alberta, Canadian labour, and nothing but Canadian labour would be employed in the construction of the pipe line.

Very briefly, and without taking too much of the time of the committee, I want to put on the record the composition of the employees of this company. There are 371 Canadians employed, or a total of 90 per cent of the over-all—

Mr. Peters: Employed by which company?

Mr. Chown: This is the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited. As I said, 371 Canadians are employed, or 90 per cent of the total number of employees. There are 21 from the United States, or 5.1 per cent; 14 British, or 3.4 per cent; 3 Australians, or .7 per cent; 2 Hungarians, or .5 per cent; and one Indian, from India, representing .2 per cent.

Now, as to Canadian participation, or the opportunity for Canadians to participate on a broader scale in this company, I have a letter dated March 17, 1961, from K. H. Burgis, financial vice president of the Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, which is addressed to Mr. Eldon C. Woolliams, M.P., House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario, and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Woolliams:

With respect to the question raised by Mr. Broome in the debate on March 14 last regarding possible plans to increase the percentage of Canadian participation in the ownership of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, I would advise that the management of the company anticipate a continuing growth in Canadian participation. At the present moment the company does not have any need for additional equity capital to finance its operations and accordingly, cannot make any definite prediction as to the timing or possibility of a further issue of treasury shares which could be offered to the Canadian public. However, we believe the past actions of the company in making a distribution of a portion of its capital stock back in 1957 before there was any strong public clamour for such action is the best possible kind of indication of the company's attitude and thinking on this subject.

The shares of the company were listed on the Toronto stock exchange in 1957 and since that time have been actively traded and have been readily available for purchase by any Canadian who wished to invest in the company. In fact, since 1957 there has been a steady growth in the number of Canadian shareholders and a proportionately greater growth in the number of shares owned by Canadians.

I might also add that the company has issued and sold to Canadian investors three debt issues which in total amounted to $28,600,000.

If any final evidence of the good faith of this company is needed I do not know what we can offer. Everything that has been controversial about the bill or has been questioned has been dealt with by the hon. member for Bow River and others. Hence I can see no reason for delaying the passage of the bill any more than I could see any reason for delay in the passage of the Northern Pipe Line Company bill or the Matador Pipe Line Company bill, which I happened to sponsor, which was wholly American owned and went through the house with no resistance whatever.

My suggestion and challenge to those who oppose the bill now before us is to put it to a vote and let their position be well and truly known from one end of the country to the other. I will be one of those who will go out and defend the government; defend my sponsorship of the bill, together with the hon. member for Bow River, in any part of the country.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two with respect to what the hon. member for Winnipeg South has just said. He said that he would be one who would be prepared to go out and defend the government on this measure.

An hon. Member: He corrected that.

Mr. Howard: Let me finish. Don't be impatient. Those are the words he used and then he corrected himself by saying that he would be prepared to defend his position on the bill. I submit it is this type of slip of the tongue that really tells the true story, and while the hon. member did correct himself I submit there was more truth in his initial statement about defending the government with regard to this measure than in his corrected statement about his own position and the position of the sponsor of the bill.

Be that as it may, there were also some interesting comments by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin which I think should be explored further. I understood him to say, and if I misunderstood I am sure he will correct me immediately, that under the bill the company proposes to build a 41-mile pipe line. There is no contrary indication by the hon. member so I assume that I understood him correctly. Yet we know full well that this is not the purpose of the bill. Its purpose is to establish a company to build half a mile of pipe line, not 41 miles. There are some other miles of pipe line involved in the same way that there are other miles of pipe line connected with the Hudson's Bay Company in other parts of Alberta and in the same way as there are other miles of pipe line in the case of Continental Oil in the United States.

But the purpose of the bill is not to build 41 miles of pipe line. It is to build half a mile of pipe line and this was made very clear by the sponsor of the bill himself on the occasion when there was some doubt as to exactly what the hon. member for Vancouver South was getting at when he said that the contract had already been let.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin also dragged out the question of providing employment. We know that the Minister of Justice did the same thing last session when he tried to connect employment with the Combines Investigation Act but the Speaker hauled up short at that time and pointed out that the legislation had nothing to do with employment.

While some employment may develop from the passage of the bill now before us, to attempt to make out that this is part of the policy of the government to provide employment is to stretch things quite a bit, especially when the hon. member for Wetaskiwin said so emphatically that employment would start immediately. That is just not so.

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I said "immediately approval had been given".

Mr. Regier: Employment in the stock exchange.

Mr. Howard: Employment may start in the stock exchange. Perhaps it is taking place there at the moment. The statement that employment will start immediately upon approval leads to the question, approval by whom? Approval by the house? This sort of implication means that the Senate need not have anything to do with this matter nor does the governor general need to give royal assent to the bill. It also assumes that this company which is seeking incorporation already has the approval of the Alberta oil and gas conservation board as well as the approval of the national energy board because apparently they have to go to these agencies in order to place themselves in a position finally to start construction.

If the hon. member for Wetaskiwin meant that work on the pipe line could start immediately after approval by these other public bodies had been obtained, that is a different question, but I did not understand him to say that even in his later clarifying statement. It may also be true that some measure of employment will be provided in the construction of half a mile of pipe line—

Mr. Speakman: Forty-one miles.

Mr. Howard: —under the bill which seeks to establish a company to build half a mile of pipe line.

Mr. Speakman: Forty one miles.

Mr. Howard: Half a mile of pipe line is all it is going to build. I do not care how many interjections are made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin or how much he wants to dress up this project as a major summer works program of the government in office. We have been told many times that the company is going to build half a mile of pipe line. There is no question of 41 miles being built under this bill at all. I have just been handed Hansard for March 6, 1961, and I should like to refer to some comments of the hon. member for Bow River, the absent sponsor of the bill. As found on page 2705 the hon. member used these words:

> ... to build the half mile of line joining the Canadian line across the boundary with the United States line.

It is half a mile of line, and that is what we were told would be built. Half a dozen men with picks and shovels would almost be able to build half a mile of pipe line overnight, so any attempt to promote this project as a major contributing factor in providing employment merely for the purpose of bailing out the government because it has not been able to provide employment is just a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Not right at the moment. I have extensive notes here. Perhaps the hon. member might ask it at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): Are you going to read Hansard?

Mr. Howard: No, I have some other books to read which have been suggested by one of your legal friends, the hon. member for Bow River. I am glad you asked that question because perhaps I might make some other references to Hansard before I proceed.

Mr. Smith (Simcoe North): It will fill up space.

Mr. Howard: At least I will not be sitting in my seat all the time and I will not be drawing on the lord lion of Scotland to help me. I am quoting now from the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South in which he was quoting the hon. member for Bow River. The hon. member for Bow River was dealing with subsection (d) of section 44 of the National Energy Board Act and this is what he had to say:

> —the board must have regard to the question of financial responsibility. That will be considered.

It would almost seem as if the hon. member for Bow River was in fact the national energy board.

> It must have regard to the financial structure of the applicant. That will be considered.

Again it would seem that the member for Bow River was in fact the national energy board. I continue:

> It must have regard to the methods of financing the line. That will be considered.

Those are rather definite statements.

> It must have regard to the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity of participating in the financing, engineering and construction of the line. That will be considered.

Then on March 13, 1961, the hon. member for Vancouver South went on to talk about the use of the words "may" and "shall". The hon. member for Bow River interrupted at that point and said, as reported on page 2924 of Hansard:

> Will the hon. member permit a question?
> Mr. Broome: Yes.
> Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether the hon. member has read Maxwell on the interpretation of statutes wherein it is stated that "may" may be interpreted as "shall", and vice versa. If he has done so, I should like to hear from him.

The hon. member for Vancouver South gave what I thought was a delightful answer in layman's language. I undertook to consult a member of the legal profession concerning the use of the words "may" and "shall", to ascertain if they could be used alternatively under certain circumstances. I undertook to inquire into just what Maxwell himself may have thought about the use of these particular words because they do seem to have some bearing on what action the national energy board will take with respect to this company.

I have a book entitled "Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes", the ninth edition by Sir Gilbert Jackson. I do not know whether or not this is the latest edition, but there is a preface in the book by Mr. Jackson which is dated January, 1946. In any event, this is the edition I received from the parliamentary library which I assume is up to date on these matters. At page 246 of this book, with respect to the words "may" and "must", I find this:

> Statutes which authorize persons to do acts for the benefit of others, or, as it is sometimes said, for the public good or the advancement of justice, have often given rise to controversy when conferring the authority in terms simply enabling and not mandatory. In enacting that they "may" or "shall, if they think fit" or, "shall have power" or that "it shall be lawful" for them to do such acts, a statute appears to use the language of mere permission, but it has been so often decided as to have become an axiom that in such cases such expressions may have—to say the least—a compulsory force—

I would take it from this that in some cases "may" is a word which could be used, as Maxwell puts it, with compulsory force. In fact, this word may be mandatory in its relationship to a body upon which certain power or authority is conferred.

Section 44 of the National Energy Board Act, to which reference has been made on a number of occasions, uses the word "may". The national energy board may do this or that. The hon. member for Bow River interpreted the word "may" to mean "shall", that it was mandatory on the national energy board and Maxwell pretty well substantiates the hon. member's interpretation. It is mandatory, therefore, for the national energy board to have regard to the financial structure of the applicant, to have regard to the method of financing, to have regard to the extent to which Canadians will have an opportunity of participating in the financing, engineering and construction of the particular line.

These facts raised another point in my mind, just as they did in the mind of the hon. member for Vancouver South. Why in heaven's name do they not use language in these statutes which is easily understood? I am sure that all laymen take the word "may" to be permissive and the word "shall" to be mandatory or contain some compulsion to do something. However, according to the quotation from page 246 of Maxwell on the interpretation of statutes, to which I have just referred, one can use either of the words in the same circumstances and they both contain a certain amount of compulsory force. I believe the hon. member for Bow River, therefore, was quite correct in saying that, although the word "may" is used it means that the national energy board must do these things.

However, I find that both Maxwell and the hon. member for Bow River are quite incorrect. This parliament of Canada has decided otherwise. The parliament of Canada has decided that when you use the word "may" that is precisely what you mean and when you use the word "shall" that is what you mean. Regardless of what the hon. member for Bow River or Maxwell might think about it, this is the decision of this parliament of Canada and I believe that supersedes the interpretation of either Maxwell or the hon. member for Bow River. In the Interpretation Act, chapter 158 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, section 35, we find the following:

(28) "shall" is to be construed as imperative, and "may" as permissive;

I would take it, therefore, that the argument of the hon. member for Bow River about substituting one word for another was either made to lead us off the track into considering that the national energy board would have certain functions which it did not have or he actually believed, as Maxwell has pointed out, that you can substitute one word for the other. However, the Interpretation Act of this parliament tells us otherwise, and we know full well what the national energy board may do.

I merely wanted to clear up this one point, Mr. Chairman, because I feel it does have a strong bearing upon our decision as to what to do with the particular bill before us. The argument has been advanced that the national energy board has been given certain authority and that it will protect the public welfare, that it will ensure that Canadian interests are given primary consideration. An argument was developed from these facts to the effect that because this parliament enacted legislation to set up the national energy board it was designed to protect the interests of Canada and we should, therefore, give only a cursory examination to the bill before us. We should leave it to the national energy board to protect the interests of Canadians.

The section quoted at some length and on more than one occasion by the hon. member for Bow River as supporting this stand was section 44 of the National Energy Board Act. As I said before, I do not have it with me, but it has been placed on Hansard a number of times. The hon. member for Bow River said that it was mandatory upon the national energy board to do certain things and he enumerated them. I think we can see that the argument of the hon. member for Bow River in that regard, even though he drags Maxwell into it, was an incorrect and erroneous one. I think we can see that the national energy board does not in fact have this authority or that it is not forced by the statute itself to inquire into these certain things. It only may do them. It is only permissible that the national energy board do things of this sort.

There is another saving feature, and that is the national energy board may do these things with the consent of the governor in council. To sum up, it is not mandatory that the national energy board inquire into anything and it inquires into matters only with the approval of the governor in council or, in short, the cabinet. These are the provisions of the National Energy Board Act on which the hon. member for Bow River and his other Social Credit friends launched so much of their argument. We find that it has fallen flat because the parliament of Canada, in the Interpretation Act, decided differently a long time ago.

Mr. Peters: We were mislead.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Regier: No, Mr. Chairman. I have attended most of the debates on this issue and I have noticed the plea that the committee be permitted to have a vote on the bill. We were appealed to on the basis almost of ethics. We were elected to this House of Commons under certain terms of reference. These terms of reference are contained in the rule book. The rule book that governs the procedure of this parliament is the framework within which we operate. I believe that it is up to the members of the opposition, any time they feel sincerely about any issue before the house, not to heed the plea that every idea or bill introduced in the house be allowed to come to the vote but rather that they should continue to operate within the terms of reference that happen to govern at the time of our election to parliament.

I was very much interested in the remark that we have in the government a branch of the Social Credit party. I had heard previously that there is a branch of the Union Nationale party represented in the government of the day. We now have another branch.

However, to get down to the basic issue, may I say that we are dealing here in this bill with the exploitation of Canadian resources. I have always contended that Canadian resources existed for the benefit not only of Canadians primarily but also for that of all mankind. We as Canadians happen to be in the fortunate position or otherwise of being trustees of this heritage of ours. I do not subscribe to the philosophy of "finders, keepers". I am a great believer in the evolution of economic democracy as I am in the evolution of political democracy. I do not believe that we are fulfilling our responsibility if we subscribe to the idea either of "finders, keepers" or that whoever gets there first ought to be given any particular advantage. I do not believe that it is in the best interests of Canada to hand over to selfish interests the exploitation of any major resource of our country.

I welcome and indeed acknowledge the role of the private entrepeneur on the Canadian economic scene. However, I contend that the day is long past when we can have any major private entrepeneur who refuses to accept responsibility for the welfare of the nation as a whole. At this point I must take occasion to disagree with the otherwise very commendable efforts of the hon. member for Vancouver South, when he mentions that the royalties in Saudi Arabia are as much as that we are fulfilling our responsibility if 50 per cent and that they are negotiating to increase these royalties to 75 per cent. I could mention that there are other places in the world with oil resources where the royalties are even in excess of 75 per cent.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for the consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the business that was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Unemployment insurance commission—
699. Administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act—further amount required, $1,850,000.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McMillan: I wonder if the minister could tell us something about the present condition of the unemployment insurance fund. How much is in it, and how many securities have been sold?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That, with respect, does not arise on this item. We have given that information as to the status of the fund a number of times this session in reply to questions on the order paper. I think I have given answers of that kind about every two weeks during the session. Here we are dealing not with the unemployment insurance fund but simply with an item for administration costs. As I said this afternoon, there will be an item before us this session with relation to the fund itself.

Mr. McMillan: I think we should have some information as to whether or not there have been sales of bonds this month and, since there has been some weakness in the bond market, whether or not putting a lot of these bonds on the market has been among the causes of this weakness. In addition we should like to know whether or not the recommendation of the advisory committee that the government should put $133 million into this fund—

The Chairman: Order. I must indicate to the hon. member that in my view these questions are not relevant to the item before the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to bring to your attention, Mr. Chairman, that we are now discussing the unemployment insurance commission, and in my humble opinion that commission has to do with the advisory committee, and the advisory committee is responsible for the fund. On numerous occasions in these circumstances it has been our privilege to discuss this question, and simply because the Minister of Finance says this is purely an administrative item should not close the matter. I think we are entitled to argue that this does entitle the hon. member for Welland to ask a few questions. All he had was two or three questions in connection with the fund, and I think that perhaps that would have ended the matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The place for the hon. member for Welland to discuss this question would be either on the main estimates for 1961-62 when they are before the committee of supply, or, depending on precisely what his points are, on the bill which will be introduced later to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Chevrier: What objection could there be to answering the questions—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because they are not relevent to this item, that is the reason.

Mr. Chevrier: I disagree with the minister. Moreover the minister did not allow me to complete what I was saying. He interrupted me, as he very often does, before my question was asked. I was about to ask the minister what objection there could be on an item such as this dealing with the unemployment insurance commission to answering a few questions on the position of the fund. After all, the fund is related to the commission. If there is a tremendous amount of unemployment the fund will decrease; if not, it will increase. Surely, on an occasion like this the committee is entitled to know the position of the fund, and that is all the hon. member is asking.

Mr. Crestohl: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, this item asks for a further sum to be made available. The government is asking for an additional $1,850,000. We in this committee are surely entitled to ask: what do you want this money for? Whether the minister can answer or not is another matter, but I respectfully submit we are entitled to ask these questions. We are entitled to know what this amount is intended to cover.

The Chairman: May I indicate to the hon. member that he will find the answer given in the details on page 20.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is precisely the information I gave to the committee this afternoon when I answered questions regarding the purpose of this additional amount. That information was completely given.

Mr. Chevrier: I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that that is not an answer to the question. To say we will find the answers in the details is humbug, because the details with respect to every one of these two items are simply a repetition of the details to be found in the supplementary estimates we are dealing with now. Just why it is not possible for the minister to answer two or three questions concerning this subject, which is one of vital importance to the people of Canada, I cannot imagine.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): He has answered every question.

Mr. Chevrier: He has not.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): On other matters, no.

Mr. Chevrier: Then why does he not answer these questions?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Because they are on other items.

Mr. Chevrier: I ask the minister now what is the present position of the fund. I think the committee is entitled to know that on this item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That information is not relevent to this item but it has been given on a number of occasions this session. The last occasion on which it was given was within the last fortnight or so.

Mr. Crestohl: I was surprised, Mr. Chairman, at your referring me to the details on page 20. Of course, the item of $1,500,000 is shown there as representing salaries and wages. That is a general statement. Surely we are entitled to know to whom these salaries and wages are being paid.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That information was all given this afternoon.

Mr. Crestohl: I do not know whether it was given or not—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then you should have been here.

Mr. Crestohl: The minister will not sidetrack me in this way. We were told some time during the present session that about 40 additional inspectors were hired to track down those who might have drawn unemployment insurance without being entitled to do so. We want to know whether this item, this additional amount, includes provision for inspectors, investigators or detectives to track down these people. We are entitled to these details.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They were all given this afternoon in their amplitude and if the hon. member was not here at the time that is no reason why that information should all be repeated now. I went over all these points this afternoon and they are all on record in Hansard.

Mr. Chevrier: You did not answer the questions about the fund.

Mr. Hellyer: Has the extra expenditure been due perhaps to a greater level of unemployment than was anticipated, and is that the reason why administrative charges amount to more than was forecast?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not hear the first part of the question.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I will repeat the question for the minister. Is the extra expenditure due to a greater level of unemployment than he had anticipated at the time he set his original estimates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I pointed out, very plainly this afternoon, the bulk of this additional item is for salary, and amounts to $1.5 million. I pointed out why that was required both with respect to casual employees and enforcement officers. The figures are all on this afternoon's record.

In regard to the unemployment insurance fund, if the hon. member will take the trouble of looking at page 3006 of Hansard he will see the answer that was given as to the state of the fund as of February 28 and the holding of securities.

Mr. McMillan: The reason I asked these questions was because there was considerable variation between the report of the advisory committee and what the minister has said in the house. The advisory committee said that the market value of these bonds was between 8 and 9 per cent below par but the minister on March 15 said that the securities at par were worth $253 million and at market value, $210 million. This represents approximately 16 per cent. I would like to find out why the advisory committee says it is 8 to 9 per cent while the minister reports something like 16 per cent.

The Chairman: Shall vote 699 carry?

Mr. McMillan: No, Mr. Chairman, I would like to find out what the reason is for this difference.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That has nothing whatever to do with the item under consideration. What we are concerned about in this item is the provision for salaries, travelling expenses, postage, telephones and telegrams, as we went over them this afternoon. That information is all on the record.

As to the state of the fund, there will be occasions in the course of this session when discussions of that kind will be quite in order. They will be in order at the time we are considering the appropriate item in the main estimates for 1961-62. Some aspects of this question may relate to the bill which I indicated this government intends to introduce in due course later this session, as indicated in the speech from the throne. This kind of inquiry initiated by the hon. member for Welland is not relevant to the item now before this committee.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say whether the additional casual employees were required to improve the service or because of the increase in work load?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The addition results largely from an increased work load.

Mr. Chevrier: There are one or two matters I should like to bring to the minister's attention. If the minister will look at the main estimates he will see item 188.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Which year's estimates are you referring to?

Mr. Chevrier: I am looking at the estimates tabled for this year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You refer to the estimates for 1960-61?

Mr. Chevrier: No, for 1961-62.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Those are for next year.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister will note item 188—unemployment insurance commission—$45,542,000 which appears to be the same item as this present one and would in my opinion authorize the committee to discuss under this item the same matters that would be allowed for discussion in the main estimates. That would therefore authorize the kind of question that the hon. member for Welland has in mind.

However, to come back to what the minister said concerning the details which are to be found at page 20, I see two items that indicate to me that this is a matter which can be discussed at greater length than the minister suggests. I refer to salaries and wages. This would authorize the committee to discuss the administration of the unemployment insurance committee and the unemployment insurance contributions, and would therefore allow this committee to inquire of the minister the nature of these contributions.

However, there is an item here which concerns me at the moment covering postage in the amount of $240,000. I would ask the minister whether that is exclusively for the posting of letters.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I pointed out this afternoon, the item of $240,000 for postage is entirely due to the higher than expected claims rate.

As to the unemployment insurance contribution item in the amount of $33,000, this increase is due to the large number of casual workers who have ben engaged by the commission to look after the increased number of claimants and represents wages paid to these casual workers.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that the item for postage, being $240,000, would represnt the dispatch of some 6 million letters. If that is the case then what would be the total amount of letters posted in a 12-month period? This is, after all, a supplementary estimate for a short period of time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The amount for postage provided in the main estimates is $900,000. This addition of $240,000 will bring the total outlay for postage for the fiscal year to $1,140,000.

Mr. Chevrier: It would follow from that statement that the information I have relayed to the minister, which I believe to be accurate, would indicate the dispatch of some 6 million letters, which is a tremendous volume. I should like to know whether or not that information is accurate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member is speculating about the number of letters that have gone out, I will question his figure. However, I am trying to do something a little better than that by giving him a more precise figure as to the volume of mail.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the minister. I was not speculating, but asking for information as—and the minister knows this—I have a perfect right to. If I am mistaken as to the 6 million figure I should like to be corrected.

Mr. Crestohl: Could the minister inform the committee in regard to this new group of inspectors or investigators, which the minister has been talking about and for whom he is now requesting this additional money, what is anticipated in the way of recovery for the unemployment insurance fund from those who are accused of having pilfered the fund by making claims to which they were not entitled? Is there any anticipation of prosecutions, and recovery by way of penalties, of those people who have received unemployment insurance when not entitled to it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is very difficult to give even an approximate estimate as to anticipated recoveries because this raises the question, in every case, as to whether the amount is recoverable, having regard to the means and position of the person who has improperly collected the insurance. However, as to the prosecutions, I might say that during this present fiscal year there has been a substantial increase in the number. In the fiscal year 1959-60 the number of claimants prosecuted was 1,341. I am informed that in the present fiscal year, which has not yet ended, the number of prosecutions will probably reach 1,800.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to draw the minister's attention to an actual case with which I am familiar. A person in Montreal was summoned and charged with overdrawing his unemployment insurance to the extent of $103. Of course, we certainly do not condone that. He went to the office of the unemployment insurance commission and admitted that he had overdrawn this amount and offered to pay it back. He said, "I have a job now and I will repay this amount on the instalment plan". He was told that they could not take it from him in that way. They said, "We will have to lay a complaint before the courts", which is quite proper.

A complaint was laid and he pleaded guilty. He was informed that his penalty was a sum calculated on the number of offences he was supposed to have committed with respect to the withdrawals he made. The penalty was fixed by the court at about the same amount, $103, and costs, which together came to $110. The sum of $110 was paid into court. This man was under the impression that that was the end of his offence and the penalty. He is now faced with a civil claim for the recovery of the amount.

I do not say there is anything improper in this. It is perfectly proper and perfectly within the law; but I point out to the minister the hardships which are sometimes inflicted on those unfortunate people who have to struggle in their new jobs to pay their penalties. This is a double penalty. Again I emphasize that I do not condone what was done and I do not suggest that it should be forgiven, but when the man appeared and offered to repay the amount he was faced with a second penalty.

If the money which is now being requested in this item is being used for the hiring of inspectors to track down these things, then perhaps there is a certain amount of recovery. Perhaps the minister will inform the committee that that is the approach and there is expected by way of recovery at least enough to pay these expenses which otherwise become a very costly operation on the government.

Mr. Deschatelets: I have only one question. We are dealing with the unemployment insurance commission. Will the minister give us the latest figures of the number of people drawing benefits from the unemployment insurance fund?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, in reply to the question asked earlier by the hon. member for Laurier, I am told that there is no precise figure available as to the number of pieces of mail that go out from the commission, but the figure which I gave earlier, which indicates an increase in the postage outlay of the commission, is attributable to the higher volume of claims and to some extent to a centralization of the adjudication of claims at regional points, necessitating the mailing of claimants' documents to central points.

The figure of unplaced applicants at March 16 was 873,092, which was a slight reduction from the previous week.

Mr. Deschatelets: Do I understand that this figure represents the number of people drawing benefits from the unemployment insurance fund?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, this is the figure of unplaced applicants.

Mr. Deschatelets: What I am asking for now is the latest figure of the number of people drawing benefits.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that the latest figure is one which appears in Hansard, one which was given recently by my colleague the Minister of Labour. That is the most recent figure.

Mr. Deschatelets: Will the minister repeat the figure?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not the Hansard reference, but I am told by my advisers that that figure was given recently in the house by the minister and it is the latest figure available. The January figure was 846,940 active claimants; that is, at the last day of January.

LEGISLATION

The Senate—

700. General administration—further amount required and to authorize, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, an honorarium in the amount of $1,000 to Dr. R. Warren James, for services rendered by him to the Senate special committee on manpower and unemployment, $27,200.

Mr. Herridge: This vote has to do with general administration of the Senate. One rather intriguing item in the details on page 20 reads:

Carriage of mails between postal terminal and Senate: session, $5 per diem; recess, $50 per month, $200.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

Will the minister inform the committee where this postal terminal is, and will he give us an idea of this arrangement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This amount of $200 relates to a trucking service operated at a cost of $50 per month during the recess and $5 per day during the session. The need for the provision of this sum is due to the extended period of employment at the higher rate during the present fiscal year.

Mr. Herridge: What I am interested in is why this is necessary on the Senate side of the post office when there is no item like it for the House of Commons.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; it is the carriage of mail between the postal terminal and the Senate. In other words, this is for bringing the mail from the postal terminal to the Senate post office downstairs.

Mr. Herridge: I have never seen a comparable item for bringing the mail from the postal terminal to the House of Commons side of the post office. Why is that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The House of Commons is the owner of two trucks, one in good shape and one in very poor shape.

Mr. Herridge: The House of Commons does its own work through its own employees who carry the mail. In the other case other arrangements are made. This seems rather a peculiar thing to me.

Mr. Pallett: The House of Commons always carries the mail, anyway.

Mr. Herridge: Why is it necessary to have two methods of transporting mail from the postal terminal to the house, one for the Senate and one for the House of Commons? Why can one vehicle not do both?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is aware that both houses of this parliament are very jealous of their independence of one another. They have largely separate services in this building. The post offices of the two houses are separate, at least in the sense that they are set apart one from the other and, as the hon. member is aware, there are other services that the two houses choose to operate independently of one another. There is a measure of co-operation, of course, but I do not think the hon. member would wish this house to sacrifice to another place any of its independence with respect to its own services and I dare say the feeling in another place is somewhat similar as to its services.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to say that I cannot see why the senators would lose any dignity by having their mail bags put in the House of Commons truck instead of having two vehicles doing work that one vehicle can do and causing unnecessary expense.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

General—

704. Polar continental shelf project—further amount required, $89,940.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister explain the purpose of this item, polar continental shelf project, $89,940? Is this another form of winter works program?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman, although part of the operation that is here provided for is carried on under Arctic conditions. This is an additional provision to enable the field program of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to be carried forward in relation to the polar continental shelf project. This project has been described in the house on earlier occasions and is, I am sure, well known to hon. members. The principal element in the figure of $89,940 is an item of $78,381 for materials and supplies. This additional amount is required for aviation gas and oil, totalling $72,000, and for camp and field supplies including fresh provisions which will be transported to the Arctic in this present month. There is an additional item of $10,959 for the charter of aircraft and the rental of equipment and there is a small item of $600 for the purchase of field notebooks and a typewriter for field use.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss this matter and raise some questions about the manner in which the contract for the helicopter part of the polar continental shelf project was given. I state that it was given without the calling of tenders and it was given to the same person who received it last year although it was brought to the minister's attention that that too had been done without tender.

It has been the practice in most departments, I believe, to call for tenders on work of this nature, particularly when it is done by means of the filing of tariffs with the air transport board. In this case the minister, for some unknown reason, decided not to call for tenders, as I will indicate in a moment, and simply awarded the contract on the basis of information obtained through the filing of tariff rates. On March 8, 1961, I asked the following questions of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, as found on page 2774 of Hansard:

1. Did Autair Helicopter Services Limited obtain a contract or contracts from the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for the continental polar shelf project and for topographical work in 1960?

The minister replied as follows:

The answer to part No. 1 is that Autair were awarded one contract for helicopter services required on the polar continental shelf project in 1960.

Then I asked what was the amount of such contract and the minister's answer was "$183,500". I also asked the following question:

How much was paid to Autair Helicopter Services Limited in 1960?

The answer was "$137,551.36". Then I asked the following question:

Has Autair Helicopter Services Limited a contract or contracts from the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for the continental polar shelf project for 1961?

The answer was:

The answer to part No. 1 is no. A letter of intent was, however, sent to Autair on February 23, 1961, pending, and subject to, final consideration by the treasury board who, on March 2, 1961, approved our proposal.

Therefore the answer to that question was in the affirmative, namely, that there was a contract awarded to this company. The second question was the following:

If so, were tenders called, and who were the other tenderers?

This was the answer:

—we do not call tenders in those cases where rates are filed with the air transport board. We do, however, review the rates of all companies considered capable of performing the service before making our selection.

Here is my criticism of the manner in which this is being done, and I say this without any fear of contradiction. The minister may contradict it but I have it on reliable information. It is well known in the trade that, notwithstanding the fact that tariffs had been filed, Autair was not the lowest of those who filed tariffs in accordance with this policy of the minister which merits only condemnation. Autair filed a tariff afterwards which was lower than those that had been filed by the other applicants and in that fashion the contract was awarded to them.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Should the hon. gentleman not read the answer to part 3?

Mr. Chevrier: I will come to that in a moment and to a further question. I am complaining at the moment about the manner in which these contracts are awarded for the work on the continental polar shelf. Contracts for helicopter services elsewhere are not awarded in this manner. The third question, with respect to which the parliamentary secretary wishes me to deal, was the following:

Did Autair submit the lowest tender?

The minister answered as follows:

The answer to part 3 is that an economic assessment of the applicable air transport board rates and associated costs made by my department indicates that the services of Autair would result in the lowest over-all cost to the government of Canada.

That is not a statement that they were the lowest. It simply says that an examination indicates that the services of Autair in the result would be the lowest. It seems to me that is not the manner in which to award contracts. Rather it should be done on the basis of open, public tenders with the contract being awarded to the lowest tenderer. In this case the contract did not go to the lowest tenderer because Autair was given the opportunity to submit a lower tariff rate after all the applicants had submitted their tariff rates.

I submitted a third question on March 15, 1961, as found on page 3006 of Hansard. It reads as follows:

What equipment is required of a contractor to perform the helicopter services on both the continental polar shelf and the topographical survey?

This was the answer:

For 1961 operations we require the contractor to supply: 4 Sikorsky S-55 helicopters equipped with float landing gear; 1 Sikorsky S-55 helicopter equipped with wheel landing gear; 1 Bell 47 G2A helicopter equipped with skid and float landing gear.

In addition, the following are required on all aircraft: (a) H.F. radio transceiver (b) V.H.F. radio transceiver (c) radio compass (d) gyro compass (e) cabin heater (f) engine heater and (g) engine and nose bubble covers and tie down equipment. Major and minor spare parts must also be readily available.

2. Autair Helicopter Services Ltd., report that on March 8, 1961, it had in its possession one Bell 47 G2A and four Sikorsky S-55 helicopters, and arrangements have been made for the fifth Sikorsky S-55. The necessary items of equipment required by the department are also reported to be available.

That information is false. That information was not true. That information is inaccurate and the minister got around it by saying that Autair Helicopter Service reported they had the following equipment. They did not have the following equipment, and that is well known to the trade. Whether or not they have it now, I doubt very much. I do know one thing, that one of the main things required of the person obtaining the contract for the polar shelf job was that the Bell 47 G2A helicopter should be equipped with a skid and float landing gear. Autair did not have it. I am mistaken, Autair had it but it did not belong to them. Autair borrowed it from one of the members of the trade and refused to give it back. One of the members of the trade has had to sue Autair in the courts of the province of Ontario for the return of this equipment; that is a matter of public record.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

This company is not a reputable company and should not be in receipt of this contract.

I indicated last year, and I repeat now, that this company operated without a licence for several months in 1958. Furthermore, this company had its insurance cancelled twice by a reputable insurance company and is not a reliable helicopter operator. More than that, this company said it did not give a damn for the air transport board.

Last year when I brought up the question, the company refused to file a financial statement with the air transport board in accordance with the Aeronautics Act. The information I have now is that they still have not done so. In the far north, where it is extremely important that persons should be transported with safety, why is it not necessary and of prime importance that the requirements of the Aeronautics Act should be complied with? The information I have is that the requirements of the Aeronautics Act have not been complied with. Certainly, the requirements laid down by the minister in answer to the questions which I have put to him have not been complied with in so far as equipment is concerned.

I have a perfect right, therefore, to ask the government why this contract should not be reviewed and why it should not have gone to the person or corporation that submitted the lowest rate in the first instance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The fact is that the contract did go to the corporation that submitted the lowest tender. The hon. member has chosen to make a vitriolic attack, and he has chosen to make assertions here. Well, I suppose a member enjoying the privileges of this house can make assertions of that kind and reflect upon the integrity of a firm outside the house. However, Mr. Chairman, it is not a good way for parliamentary business to be transacted if hon. members get up and make assertions such as those which have been made tonight.

In the first place, there were three bidders for this work in 1960. The contract was awarded to the Autair company which was the lowest of the bidders. All of the bidders filed tariffs, so that the rates are known. So far as this year is concerned, there were five bidders and again, Mr. Chairman, their tariffs were filed. Again it was found that Autair was the lowest and the contract was awarded to Autair. In so far as any bidder being permitted to refile a tariff is concerned, all of the bidders were permitted to refile tariffs, so the treatment was equal in all cases.

So far as this company is concerned, it has fully discharged its obligations under the contract and has a satisfactory record of performance under the contract. The law will be observed and nothing less than the law will be accepted in the discharge of the company's obligations. I think, Mr. Chairman, in the face of these facts the public interest is fully protected, except against vitriolic attacks of the kind the committee has listened to tonight.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has said I have made a vitriolic attack against this company. Will the minister disprove any of the statements I have made? I have made charges in this house in the same way that I made them last year. Nobody rose to dispute them. My statement last year that this company had operated without a licence was admitted by the Minister of Transport. He said he had overlooked it and he passed an order in council by virtue of certain decontrol powers which put this company in a position to operate. I also made a statement that the company's insurance had been cancelled twice and I named the company that had cancelled the insurance. It was the British Aviation Insurance of Montreal. This statement has not been disputed. I also made the statement that this company had not filed a financial statement as it is required to do under the Aeronautics Act.

If these statements are not correct, let the minister or anybody else on the other side disprove them. I am not in the habit of making statements on my responsibility as a member of parliament that I cannot substantiate. If I make statements that are incorrect or inaccurate I will rise in my place afterwards, as I have done on one occasion, and say that I was in error. I have made these statements based upon information which I have received from extremely reliable sources. One of these statements which I have made this evening indicates that, notwithstanding what the minister has said was required in so far as equipment to operate in the far north is concerned, Autair did not possess. Furthermore, Autair is being sued in a court of law for the return of certain equipment that is required, according to the minister himself, for operation in the far north. Surely, that ought to be enough to put the minister and the government on the defensive and to urge them to inquire fully into this matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has chosen to repeat something he said last year about this company in relation to its licence. The air transport board is quite capable of dealing with this situation. The air transport board is the body with which this company has filed its tariff, and this company must be licensed. The hon. member keeps on speaking of what happened last year as though it were a continuing situation. He talks about an action in the courts against the company. It is not customary, Mr. Chairman, to assume that a company that is being sued and, as I gather, defending an action, is at fault until that has been determined by a judgment of a court of law.

I suggest to the hon. member that talk of this kind is the sort of thing that should be put forward in quite different circumstances if he feels that, on his responsibility as a member, he should undertake to do so.

The hon. member has mixed up, along with statements made in a government return, a large number of statements that he himself has made. I respectfully suggest to him, Mr. Chairman, that he has not correctly interpreted the answers that were made by my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I repeat—and in this respect I find myself in contradiction of the hon. gentleman's earlier assertions—that in each year this company was the lowest bidder and that the government in awarding the contract to Autair was serving the public interest and getting the most economical job done in relation to this polar continental shelf project; and in that respect I suggest that my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys was carrying out his duties.

So far as an action in the courts is concerned, I take it that we may await the outcome of that matter instead of trying to prejudge it. So far as licensing last year is concerned, that gave the hon. gentleman no right to make continuing accusations as to a later period. I have said that this company must obey the law. Nothing less than obedience to the law will be accepted in satisfaction of the company's obligations.

Mr. Chevrier: On that point, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the company has said positively that it would not obey the law last year and there is indication—and I think it is my duty to bring it to the attention of the government—that the company has no intention of respecting the law again in 1961. I refer to the law as laid down under the Aeronautics Act in so far as the filing of a financial statement is concerned.

Then the minister said, "Here I rely on the answers which were given by my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys". The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys says that he gives this tender out on proposals and not on bids. I condemn that practice. I say that is not the proper way in which to do it. If there were bids, I would not be here condemning the situation. There were no bids. There was a filing of tariffs and the man who was not the low man was allowed to retender. That was why I enter a caveat. That is why I say that the policy is bad and should not be condoned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, let us not have any misunderstanding about this matter of bids. The filing of a tariff is an offer; it is a bid. In this particular case the tariffs of all these companies were known; and it was found on examination, as I indicated last year, that on the basis of the tariffs filed, Autair was the lowest. Again this year, of five companies whose tariffs were known or were published, Autair was the lowest. I repeat that when the hon. member talks about Autair being permitted to refile a tariff—

Mr. Chevrier: Re-enter a bid or re-enter a tariff.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that was done by all of the five companies.

Mr. Chevrier: No; it was not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not peculiar to Autair.

Mr. Chevrier: It was.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman makes that statement. I am going by information which I have received from my advisers and I believe it to be correct information. The hon. gentleman speaks with great confidence in making his assertions. How can he pretend to say that the department did not have regard to five tariffs filed by as many respective companies? I think the hon. member is taking a great deal on himself.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I am not taking a great deal upon myself; and I do not like the minister instructing me as to what is the meaning of the filing of tariffs. I know full well what is the meaning of tariffs. It seems to me that the proper way in which to have proceeded was not by way of a filing of tariffs but by way of open tenders. That is what I am complaining about. This position I am now complaining about would not have arisen if the system of open bids had been followed, of which system I am sure the minister approves in all other cases.

Why are tariffs filed? Tariffs are filed in order to give the department a too wide opportunity to select one rather than the other. If you look at the answer which the minister gave and which the parliamentary assistant insisted that I repeat, it would indicate quite clearly that there was a reason for this. It reads as follows:

> The answer to part 3 that an economic assessment of the applicable air transport board rates and associated costs made by my department indicates that the services of Autair would result in the lowest over-all cost to the government of Canada.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

It does not state that it is the lowest. Hence the statement the minister has just made is not accurate. It was not the result of the rates that indicated who was the lowest. It is rather the study or the "economic assessment" of the board rates and associated costs "made by the department". The minister asks me to say that the officers were in error. Of course I am not going to say that the officers were in error. How can I say that? However, I can say this from information I have in my possession. Those who did tender were not given the same advantages in the consideration of the economic assessment of the applicable air transport board rates and associated costs as was Autair. This seems to me to be a very roundabout way in which to grant a contract of this importance and of this nature. I am repeating now that the method is not the right one. Certainly it is not the method that the Minister of Finance advises his colleagues in other departments to use when large and substantial sums of money are spent by the treasury. I am sure he suggests to them in all cases, except in very extraordinary circumstances, that the contract should go not by the filing of tariffs but by bids to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the tender system is well established in government practice and there will be no weakening of that principle, I can assure the committee. But in the case of transportation services, as the hon. member well knows from his experience, the established custom is to file tariffs. We have it done on the part of railways. In some jurisdictions we have it done on the part of trucking services. In the case of aeronautic services we have it done with the air transport board. I must say to the hon. member that he is drawing a long bow in trying to set my statement at odds with that of my colleague as reported at page 2774 of Hansard. They are the same statements. His answer was:

> The answer to part 3 is that an economic assessment of the applicable air transport board rates and associated costs—

And so on. As to the applicable air transport rates, that expression signifies the tariffs filed by these companies with the air transport board. It was following a review of these published tariffs that the department decided that the most economical service to be obtained in relation to this project was that of Autair. That statement is not controverted here tonight.

Mr. Chevrier: I say it is.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Benidickson: Can the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys who is principally concerned, indicate to the committee the grade of tariff filing that would be applicable to this particular contract?

The minister, is, I think, aware that there are tariffs which are based on scheduled services and tariffs based on non-scheduled services. They fall into classes (a), (b), (c) and (d). In connection with this particular contract, under what tariff rating in accordance with the air transport board regulations would these tariffs have been filed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot give the particular designation but it is not one applied to a regular route.

Mr. Benidickson: No. That illustrates the necessity of having the minister principally concerned present before the committee, because I am confident that within the last ten days I have read an amendment to the air transport board rules under which henceforth a grade such as, for example, grade 4, will not be permitted to file a tariff and operate under that tariff in advance of permission being given by the air transport board. I presume that perhaps under this contract a tariff has been filed which has never received public adjudication in the face of competitive representation before the air transport board. There are certain grades of air operation which can simply file a tariff, and that tariff prevails until the board adjudicates to the contrary. That is the reason I raise this question—in what grade of aviation operation is this contract to be considered?

Item agreed to.

B—Dominion coal board—

705. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council—further amount required, $2,106,502.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister would say whether this vote includes any funds for the storage of coal.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not the storage, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hellyer: It is for transportation only, not including storage?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Royal Canadian Navy—

706. Operation and maintenance—further amount required, $1,000,000.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could say whether this additional amount required is entirely due to the increase in rates of pay?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. This item arises entirely from a general salary revision granted to classified civilian employees of the Royal Canadian Navy.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Air Force—

707. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment—further amount required, $10,000,000.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister will say for which engines and which aircraft additional funds are required?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): First, it will be understood that in this large item—the item in the main estimates was $228,192,000—it was found at the end of the year that some parts of it were inadequate and in other cases that the full amount appropriated will not be required. This is a case of putting together the pluses and the minuses and arriving at a net result. However, the deficiencies were in relation to the CF-104, the C-130B, the CC-109, and the Caribou.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister mentioned three aircraft on which expenditures were being made, but he did not mention the engines. Can he tell us whether provision for engines is included in this amount?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, but I found it difficult to hear all the hon. member's question. Is he asking me what engines are incorporated in these respective aricraft?

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Chairman. The details of this item refer to aircraft and engines. I wonder if the minister would indicate which engines are referred to?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The engines referred to in that expression are those of the aircraft I have just mentioned.

Mr. Hellyer: Just before this item carries I should like to reiterate the feeling of this side of the committee with respect to the CF-104 and its engine and to say we believe this is a rough engine being installed in a poor aircraft to carry out a questionable role to which we should not have committed ourselves in the first place.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Every one of those assertions was completely controverted last year by the Minister of National Defence.

Item agreed to.

Mutual aid—

708. Contributions to infrastructure and military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization—further amount required, $740,000.

Mr. Fisher: Several years ago I discovered that all the bids that are put up for contracts within the infrastructure are on a partnership basis, that is, the fact that some of the contracts may go to supply Canadian troops is no advantage to Canadian suppliers who are bidding. As I understood at the time, no Canadian bidders have ever been successful in obtaining any large contracts within the infrastructure organization.

I wonder if the minister could tell us whether in the past year Canadian contractors have had any more success in bidding for NATO infrastructure contracts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that no Canadian contractor has participated yet in any of the infrastructure contracts. Of course, a Canadian firm has been successful in the provision of simulators, but the information I have been given with respect to the infrastructure indicates that no Canadian contractor has yet succeeded in that field.

Mr. Fisher: Can the minister give the committee a rough indication of how much has been involved in the last year in these particular contracts in respect of which Canadians have not made any bids or have not been successful bidders?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not have the total of the entire NATO infrastructure outlay here, but it would be a substantial sum.

Mr. Herridge: Could the minister give us some idea of what is included in this term "infrastructure"? I have a general idea, but can the hon. gentleman say just what is meant by the word?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): "Infrastructure" is an expression which has come into well-established use within the last decade. As a matter of fact, I think it was NATO itself which introduced this expression. It applies to permanent installations, the fixed installations. It would apply to airports and to buildings; to anything of a permanent or semi-permanent nature which is a fixed installation.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister would indicate why the Canadian percentage of infrastructure expenditure is being reduced compared with that previously in effect?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because the humble representative of the Canadian government on the committee insisted that Canada was being assessed more than her share. There was a general revision of assessments having regard to the fact that some of the European allies had their percentages struck at a time when they were not as strong economically as they have become. In the revision of the assessments the two North American allies were granted a reduction in their percentages, and some of the European countries accepted an increase in their percentages. Germany accepted the largest increase.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister is saying that Canada's economic position has declined relatively in the last two or three years, and that is the reason for it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all. The fact is that the two North American allies were called upon in earlier years to contribute a share to the NATO budget for its infrastructure which took into account the fact that at that time the economies of the principal European partners were not nearly as strong as they are today. With the increase in economic strength of those countries there is no reason why they should not accept a larger share of the burden, and they have done so, notably Germany. Its increase has been substantial. Who should benefit by Germany's increase as among the other countries? The two countries on this continent that had accepted a disproportionately heavy assessment at the outset naturally felt that they could expect a more proportionate share than they had borne up to this time.

Mr. Hellyer: I am not a lawyer but it seems to me that when the European countries' economies have strengthened the converse would be that Canada has not been able to keep up.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is an absurd conclusion. We are speaking in relative terms here. The fact is, and I make no apology for the part I played in relation to this in bringing about the reduction in Canada's contribution, that if a million dollars a year can be saved the Canadian taxpayer, we shall make no apology for the saving.

Mr. Hellyer: You are indeed responsible for saving the taxpayers' money in this country.

Mr. Pearson: Is the minister telling us that he has saved a million dollars out of the infrastructure as reflected in the supplementary estimate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What I indicated was that the reduction in Canada's share of the budget will amount to approximately that figure. There was some extended discussion as to the extent of reduction in the United States percentage and the extent of the Canadian reduction. The situation is that Canada's—I do not recall the precise fractions now—percentage came down approximately 1 per cent of the total NATO infrastructure budget.

Mr. Pearson: As a result of the minister's efforts he is now saying that our contribution to the infrastructure has been reduced about $1 million. Does he refer to the infrastructure alone in this regard?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, in this coming fiscal year.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister tell the committee what is involved in the other part of this item, the NATO military budgets? What are the other military budgets involved in this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The additional payment to the military budget is $580,000.

Mr. Pearson: I may be wrong, but the figures I have here at page 22 of the supplementary estimates show that our contribution to infrastructure and NATO military budgets totals $540,000. The minister has now stated that the total contribution to the NATO military budgets is over $500,000. There must be some mistake there.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, here are the figures in detail: the expenditures to February 21, 1961 on account of military budgets amount to $13,656,000, leaving an unspent balance of $844,000. With current requests of $1,384,000, there is a further requirement of $540,000. The $740,000 is made up by two additions required. The first is direct procurement, $200,000; the second is the NATO budget, $540,000, totalling $740,000.

The figure that I gave earlier of $1,384,000 is made up of three items. The first, contribution to SHAPE for forward scatter system—$380,000; the second, additional payment to the military budget—$580,000; the third is the first quarterly instalment of the adjustment in the contribution to infrastructure—$424,000, making the total of $1,384,000.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether the minister could tell us what form this procurement for mutual aid takes which amounts to $200,000? I understand this is a supplementary figure. Could he give us the total figure for procurement for mutual aid for NATO this year and indicate what is involved in that procurement. How much of it, if any, is the transfer of military equipment, and how much is for the purchase of new equipment for the NATO forces?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as Canada's share is concerned, the main budget contained a figure of $300,000 for direct procurement, and to that it is now proposed to add $200,000 making a total requirement in respect of direct procurement of $500,000.

Mr. Pearson: Does that mean that our mutual aid contribution to NATO this year will be half a million dollars for direct procurement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Could the minister give any indication of what is covered by this item for direct procurement? What are the items of equipment involved?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps I can provide that answer later.

Mr. Pearson: I can understand the difficulties involved in getting the details, and perhaps the minister will procure this information for us later. Could the minister now compare this amount of half a million dollars for mutual aid direct procurement with what it was five years ago?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will be glad to secure that information and communicate it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Benidickson: Could we leave this item open?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words regarding this item on behalf of the C.C.F. new party group in the committee, and as the national leader of the C.C.F. movement.

NATO has had a long and memorable history and we believe, has in the past been an important force in the stabilization of world conditions. We do think that world conditions are changing and that in these changing world conditions we should re-assess our position in NATO. Europe is stabilized, and the nations of Europe have made a very excellent economic recovery. It has been the policy of the C.C.F. party, and the policy of the Canadian government to this date—but government policy now seems to be shifting as far as Canada is concerned—to prohibit atomic weapons on Canadian soil.

The Co-operative Commonwealth Federation has gone further in this regard. We have a definite policy not only of opposing the spread of atomic weapons to Canadian soil, and to other nations but being placed in the hands of Canadian troops anywhere in the world. Therefore we oppose, and will continue to oppose in the future, any move to provide atomic weapons in general to NATO forces. We are fully aware that certain NATO powers have atomic weapons and that atomic weapons are under the control of the United States commander in Europe. This is a further reason why we think our role in NATO should come under review at this time.

If one makes the assumption, which I do not think is an accurate one, that NATO has only conventional weapons, that NATO is merely a force which has the use of conventional weapons, then it also can be questioned on this ground as to what military contribution our small conventional force attached to NATO in fact makes, and whether, if we should withdraw this small force, it would have any material effect on the military position of the NATO countries.

One of the main reasons why the former national leader of the C.C.F., Mr. M. J. Coldwell, and the members around him in the house at that time, including myself, supported NATO and supported it in subsequent years, was that we felt that article 2, under which there was to be economic assistance and economic aid to other countries, would be implemented. As a matter of fact, we have now come to the conclusion that article 2 of the NATO treaty was little more than a sop to those people who believed that economic aid within NATO should be promoted. It has been demonstrated beyond any shadow of doubt that article 2 within NATO is dead.

One needs only to refer to the necessity of setting up the O.E.C.D. which we in the C.C.F-New Party group in the house were very pleased to support. We feel that so far as economic assistance and economic stability are concerned the O.E.C.D. is in a better position to bring this about successfully than was NATO because there are a larger number of nations involved and because other nations such as Finland and Yugoslavia, we understand, are prepared to associate themselves at least to some extent with O.E.C.D. We are encouraged that President Kennedy of the United States made it clear the other day that there will be very definite changes in the United States long term foreign aid program, and that part of this foreign aid program would be channelled through the O.E.C.D. We think that all of these things suggest that NATO is becoming more and more clearly a military force and nothing else.

We are not neutralists; we are not pacifists. We take our position with the democratic and the free nations of the world, but we do question whether the expenditures that we make through NATO are the most effective means of playing our responsible part in providing a measure of stability in the world, in supporting free institutions and the United Nations.

We think that in this day and age and at this time Canada would be better advised to dissociate herself from regional military alliances, improve her conventional force at home, make that conventional force at home strong and mobile and, as a matter of national policy, make our forces available to the United Nations for police work at any time. Let us not be in the position in which we found ourselves not so many months ago when Canada was asked for some 200 technical personnel for assistance in the Congo. It took us a very long time to gather this technical force together. We think that greater emphasis on such a force at home in readiness for use by the United Nations would be the best role for Canada to play at this time.

[Mr. Argue.]

To make the position of the C.C.F. party clear to hon. members I should like to quote a resolution passed at our last national convention held at Regina in August 1960. It reads as follows:

> We believe that Canada must at all times give vigorous support to the United Nations, and constantly promote the strengthening of the authority of the United Nations. Our objective should be to make the United Nations eventually into an effective world government with sovereignty over all international affairs. The actions of the United Nations in the Suez crisis and now in the Congo point up the role which it can play to preserve the peace. That role must be strengthened, particularly in the fields of international economic aid and world disarmament. Since NATO has become a purely military organization, Canada should immediately withdraw from NATO in favour of promoting peaceful economic and cultural activities through the agencies of the United Nations.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in keeping with the policy statement that I have just outlined and believing that Canada can play its most constructive role in promoting the peace of the world, in bringing about stability and in encouraging the growth and strength of free institutions by strong conventional forces at home, we feel that the large sum of money now spent on NATO could better be spent on conventional forces at home and in providing economic assistance to underdeveloped countries.

The other day figures were brought down in the house in answer to a question of mine which showed, as recorded at page 2994 of Hansard, that the estimated direct costs of Canadian forces committed to NATO in 1961-62 would be $455,545,000, or an increase of some $47 million over the present fiscal year. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I should like to move that item No. 708 be reduced to $1.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think it is well that the attitude of the C.C.F. or New Party in relation to NATO should be thus exposed to public view.

First of all, let us think for a moment what the amendment means in proposing that the item be reduced to $1. It means that Canada would now be called upon to make a default under its NATO obligations, obligations solemnly and faithfully undertaken, and Canada, a country with a proud record in the fulfilment of its obligations honourably entered into, would now be invited to become a defaulter. I do not think that will commend itself to the Canadian sense of honour, in the first place.

Now, let us look a little further. The position that has been taken by the hon. member for Assiniboia, presumably the official position of the C.C.F. and New Party, is that—

Mr. Argue: Quite correct.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —Canada should now withdraw from NATO. Let me ask the committee to consider one or two facts in this regard. First, think of what Europe was like, and think of the position of the free world before NATO. I saw a good deal of western Europe and most of the countries there just before the North Atlantic Treaty was entered into. For Canada's part in the writing of that treaty I think all must take satisfaction, and for the part that Mr. St. Laurent played in that we give him full credit. It was an honourable page in Canada's history.

Mr. Hellyer: And the Leader of the Opposition. Do not overlook his part.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I continue? It will not be necessary to offer these coaching suggestions. I know something as well of the part which the present Leader of the Opposition played in bringing about the North Atlantic alliance, and all of us on this side of the house give him full credit for the part he played in the Canadian role in that alliance.

What was the situation then, Mr. Chairman? The fact is that until the alliance welded together the countries of western Europe to face the power of an aggressive communist bloc there had been no front presented to the westward march of the iron curtain and one country after another had fallen behind the iron curtain and had been reduced to the role of a satellite of the U.S.S.R. It was to erect an effective barrier against the westward march of the iron curtain that the North Atlantic alliance was brought into being.

Has NATO fulfilled its hopes? Yes, Mr. Chairman. It may not have fulfilled them all. NATO is not a perfect instrument. It is a man-made instrument and it has human imperfections and plenty of them. But the fact is that NATO has rendered to the free western world an inestimable benefit. Had it not been for the NATO alliance the history of the world in the past 12 years might have been very different.

You do not bring about great results such as have been achieved under NATO without sacrifice and without cost, and Canada's participation in NATO has not been without sacrifice or without cost on her part. But whatever part Canada has played, and it has been an honourable one, in bearing the cost and the sacrifice has been our contribution to the preservation of freedom in the western world. It was not simply a case of preserving our own hides as a nation. It was a case of making our contribution as an important nation in the free world to the preservation of the freedom of the west because we had seen that countries, if they chose to remain divided, could expect to fall one by one like ripe plums into the U.S.S.R. basket. So let us be under no illusions about the effective role that NATO has played in the preservation of the freedom of the west.

It is all very well, Mr. Chairman, to talk about the failure to implement article 2 of the NATO treaty. It is quite true that this article has not been employed in the way that its terms would have suggested or in the way in which the nations probably expected it would work at the time they entered into the alliance. There have been difficulties in the economic field but the fact is that the O.E.E.C. played a very important part in filling the gap that the implementation of article 2 of the NATO treaty was intended to fill. That organization is now in the process of being transformed into the O.E.C.D., with more effective participation intended now by Canada and the United States as full members instead of merely associate members as they were before. The O.E.C.D. is wider in its membership than NATO. It embraces not only the members of NATO but the neutral countries of western Europe as well.

So it cannot be said that there is any great gap left in the economic growth of the North Atlantic area by reason of the failure to give literal implementation to the terms of article 2 of the NATO treaty. The fact is that O.E.E.C. and then O.E.C.D. have played a very effective role in this respect.

The immediate question, Mr. Chairman, is: Shall Canada default on her obligations to NATO, to the other allies in this alliance? The C.C.F. party may think that Canada does not need allies in this world. Perhaps there have been other countries in the past that entertained that idea. Some of them woke up to a dreadful day of reckoning. I think most Canadians will feel that in the kind of world in which we find ourselves today it is not a bad thing for Canada to have allies. How long would Canada have allies if she now chose the role which she is invited by the C.C.F. to take and became a defaulter and renounced the obligations she entered into in favour of her allies? This is the issue presented by this amendment tonight.

Shall we say to those who have entered into this defence partnership with us: "We are leaving you, we want no more of you. We realize that you have got to carry a burden but we are not going to share that burden with you any more. We are withdrawing. We are going back across the Atlantic."

Is that the language of realism in this year of grace and international disturbance, 1961? Is this the lesson that we have learned in recent years in the international field, that Canada can withdraw, live unto herself and take the attitude of a pious nation that has no great concern with the problems of other nations a little closer to the areas of aggression in the world today?

So, Mr. Chairman, let it be clearly understood that, so far as the government is concerned, we believe in the honourable implementation of Canada's obligations. We believe as well that it is a good thing for Canada to have allies. We believe in saying to these allies that we are not going to turn tail and leave them in the lurch, that we are not going to be parties to signalling any retreat from NATO. We stand squarely for NATO. We recognize it is not perfect. We recognize that it is a human instrument and there will be difficulties as long as it operates through human beings and as long as we have strife and the threat of aggression in the world today. But with all its shortcomings this is the instrument that has preserved not only Canada's freedom but the freedom of the western world, and we want that freedom to be preserved. We are not prepared to accept the invitation of the C.C.F. to dishonour Canada's obligations.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the amendment that we are invited to support has brought out into the open in the House of Commons, in respect of this vital matter of collective security, the position of the C.C.F.-socialist party. It is now perfectly clear and perhaps it is just as well that it should be so.

I do not always agree with the Minister of Finance but on the argument he made tonight I agree with him 100 per cent. As the minister has said, we are being invited by this amendment to run out on our commitments to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and to the principle of Atlantic collective security. That course would not only be humiliating for Canadians, it would be disastrous and would have effects which would be felt far beyond the borders of our own country at this particular moment when the threat to our security persists and the danger is still present as it was ten or 11 years ago when we founded NATO.

The danger has changed, the threats have been modified and I have no doubt in my own mind that the organization which we founded in those earlier years should also be altered and modified to meet these changing threats and changing dangers. But the threats and the dangers are still there and in the circumstances they require an organization for collective security.

Mr. Regier: What about the United Nations?

Mr. Pearson: I will come to the United Nations in a moment. My hon. friends to the right cannot arrogate unto themselves exclusive virtue on this matter of support for the United Nations. We will consider that in a few moments.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, is really a withdrawal from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. This is a vote of no confidence in Atlantic collective security, and we are opposed to it. With all its faults—and it has had its setbacks; as the minister pointed out, it is a human organization—NATO has done great things for freedom and security in the last dozen years. Perhaps if it had not been for NATO and for what it stood during these dangerous years in the late forties and early fifties when the eastern steamroller was moving across Europe, perhaps if it had not been for this demonstration of western solidarity and collective security, the hon. member for Assiniboia would not be able to move this amendment in this free parliament tonight.

My hon. friends in the corner say, what about the United Nations? Well, there is nothing contradictory about supporting NATO and supporting the United Nations, and there never has been. If the United Nations could only give us on a universal scale the kind of collective security we want, and we hope one day we will get, there would be no need for NATO. I hope it may come to that, and we will be able to scrap NATO in favour of a bigger, better, universal organization. This is the purpose of the charter of the United Nations, but we have not realized that purpose. Until we do realize that purpose we are entitled, as free members of the international community, to band ourselves together in regional organizations for collective security. What we have done under NATO is what I hope we will continue to do as long as NATO performs this collective function and as long as the necessity for collective security persists.

When I support NATO I never feel that this is any reflection on my wholehearted support of the United Nations. I never have felt that way and I do not feel that way tonight. I agree with what the hon. member for Assiniboia has said that we should do all those things under the United Nations that we can do. We should build up security. But until we can do these things in the United Nations, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization still has value for us.

My hon. friends have made reference to article 2, sometimes known as the Canadian article. When the NATO treaty was drafted, the Canadian delegation did play some part in getting this article put into the treaty. It is quite true that we have not been able to implement article 2 over the years as we had hoped would be possible. There is no doubt about that. The Minister of Finance has already stated that we have been disappointed in that respect. In recent weeks we have been discussing in this house an organization for European Atlantic economic co-operation and development. This will be a wide organization covering all the European states, except one or two and we may—I put it no higher than that—be able to do in it what we have not yet been able to do under article 2 in NATO. If we can do that I will be quite satisfied because this organization would be performing every economic co-operative function of article 2.

However, there is more in article 2 than economic co-operation. There is the desirability of political co-operation amongst the Atlantic countries. Until more progress has been made on that score, action in the direction of the political co-operation, all that we had hoped for under NATO will not be possible. However, is that any reason why we should scrap the whole organization at this time as my hon. friends to the right would do? I agree, as I have just said, that changes are required. I have no doubt that changes in the structure of NATO to make it a more effective organization in the face of the new dangers, the new threats and the new opportunities are being considered. I hope that is true. Anything I say tonight about NATO will not preclude me, when the time comes, from putting forward the ideas which I think will improve and strengthen NATO. But this is not scrapping it.

If NATO does not move in the direction of a stronger politically co-operative organization, in the direction of greater unity rather than less unity, it may well be that NATO will disappear. It may be, too, that if NATO becomes only an organization for military co-operation—

Mr. Martin (Timmins): As it has.

Mr. Pearson: —that just is not true and no statement can make it true. If NATO does become only an organization for military co-operation to meet a military danger, then of course NATO will disappear when the danger disappears. We should, therefore, try to find a broader, deeper foundation for NATO than merely military co-operation. But believe me, Mr. Chairman—this is where we disagree with my hon. friends to the right—the need for defence co-operation still exists. They would scrap NATO, but I would not scrap it. I would not scrap it. I would make NATO stronger rather than weaker, even as a defence organization. I do not want to withdraw from collective security on an Atlantic basis. I do not want to withdraw from any organization which makes it possible for free countries to stand together and, within even a limited area, do what they can to discharge the collective security function which is recognized in the charter of the United Nations. I do not want to withdraw into isolation or neutralism. I do not want to weaken our support for the United Nations. But none of these things would prompt me to withdraw from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization at this particular time.

The hon. member for Assiniboia, perhaps in the hope of strengthening his argument, talked about NATO nuclear weapons. This brings up one of the changes that I should like to see brought about. Perhaps it is being considered in NATO at the present time. I think it is important to make the North Atlantic organization, as a defence organization, much stronger in conventional forces than it is at the present time. Then, the organization would not have to rely on nuclear weapons for defence against every aggression, no matter how regional, no matter how limited, or how small it might be.

As I understand the purpose of this particular amendment it is to strengthen, perhaps in a small way, the conventional forces of NATO. I think this is important. As long as the NATO countries in Europe feel that they have no alternative but to use nuclear weapons against aggression, no matter what kind or character of aggression, I think that NATO is weaker rather than stronger. There may be occasions arise when it would be very difficult indeed for anyone to press the nuclear button and if that were the only button that could be pressed, we would be subjected to grave peril indeed. I want to see the conventional forces of NATO not weakened but strengthened. I want to see NATO rely less and less on nuclear deterrents and more and more on the strength of the NATO countries to withstand aggression without using nuclear weapons.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that is very sound defence policy. I think it is a good policy in other respects. It will make NATO and the European countries less dependent, for instance, on the United States and nuclear weapons than they may be at the present time. There are three members of the NATO alliance that have nuclear weapons now, the United States, the United Kingdom and France. So far as NATO forces are concerned, and I speak subject to correction, all those nuclear weapons which are in Europe at the present time in the hands of NATO forces—except perhaps United Kingdom weapons and I am not sure they have any—are under the single control of the United States authorities. I think that is wrong. If NATO through a decision of its council decides that tactical nuclear weapons are required for defence purposes, and I am talking about tactical nuclear weapons only for defence purposes, then I say this. If the NATO council thinks that weapons of that kind are required, then we have taken the position in our party that those weapons should be brought under NATO control and that those NATO members which now possess them should turn those weapons over to the control of the NATO organization. That is not extending the use of nuclear weapons. That is limiting their use to the NATO organization rather than to individual nations.

An hon. Member: To people like Speidel, the former nazi general.

Mr. Pearson: If my hon. friend wants to be consistent, he would probably take the position that no German should have anything to do with the north Atlantic organization. If we take the position that Germany cannot associate at all with Atlantic security, Atlantic development or the Atlantic community what do we do with Germany? We drive her into the arms of the people of whom we have cause to fear. If that is the policy of my hon. friends to the right, I should like them to try to defend that policy in this country. That is the kind of policy that in 1919, 1920 and 1921 helped to bring about the nazi regime in Germany. If my hon. friends want a recurrence of that policy, they are welcome to it.

Mr. Argue: We just said we did not want a nazi general heading it up.

Mr. Pearson: You just said you did not want Germans.

Mr. Argue: German generals.

Mr. Pearson: That is a far-reaching extension of policy when the party on my right said that they did not want the German republic to take any part in the development of the Atlantic community.

Mr. Argue: Nobody said anything like that or nearly like it.

Mr. Pearson: It will be on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pearson: I think I have made the position of my own party on this matter quite clear and I am very glad of having had the opportunity of doing so. We think the NATO organization should be changed in order to bring it more into accord with the changing situation. We think that political and other kinds of non-military co-operation in NATO should be stronger and not weaker. We think that the defence policy of NATO should be stronger, not weaker, but that defence strategy tactics and co-operation in NATO should be based not on nuclear weapons but on the building up of conventional forces which will give the European countries protection without the necessity of using nuclear weapons.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, we have had a couple of very good demonstrations here. We have had a demonstration of Tory policy which is one purely and simply, of thinking back. We have had a demonstration of Liberal policy which goes back even further than that of the Tories. In fact, the Leader of the Opposition had us back almost to the days of bows and arrows for a little while. The Minister of Finance, when making his presentation here tonight, of course, very conveniently forgot or omitted the fact that when he was back 10 years, 12 years or 13 years ago, the C.C.F. supported that position at that time; that the C.C.F. never denied the benefits that NATO may have contributed at that time. But the C.C.F. unlike the minister and the party which he represents, can recognize things as they are now, not as they were 10 years ago, 50 years ago or 100 years ago. We are prepared and willing to accept the facts as they are today, not as they were in the past. This is something that they conveniently forget. They forget that today we are in 1961, not 1951.

An hon. Member: What about tomorrow?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Exactly; what about tomorrow? If we are going into tomorrow while looking into yesterday, where is it going to get us?

An hon. Member: Right where you are.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): The minister admitted very frankly that article 2 of NATO had never been implemented to date. I should like to congratulate the minister on that admission. It is true that it has never been implemented. It is also true that it will never be implemented as long as we keep looking back and do not look ahead. Surely the minister can realize that. We have had examples in this chamber. We had a Liberal government that looked back 40 years to the time when they promised health insurance. For 40 years they looked back but they never implemented it. It was only when the Conservative government came into office that it finally implemented this promise to which the Liberals were looking back 40 years.

This position is what we face today with regard to this NATO situation.

An hon. Member: You were in the wilderness for 25 years.

Mr. Pearson: He is talking about the Regina manifesto.

Mr. Chevrier: Tell us about the Regina manifesto.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): The fact still remains that, as their national leader put before the committee tonight,—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): —we are not prepared to share this burden so long as it is purely and solely a military burden and so long as it does not implement the things that it is supposed to implement. As long as we can see no progress—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it is ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I presume that tomorrow we will continue with these estimates; and I take it that it is the hope, not so much of the house leader as of the Minister of Finance, that we will terminate them. However, I should like to ask the house leader what the house will be doing when we reconvene on April 10?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow I think the house would indicate its wisdom by completing the supplementary estimates. There are some items of the supplementary estimates that are of great importance to a large number of people in this country. I mention only one group, namely the disabled veterans of Canada. The item in the supplementary estimates which refers to them is one which should be passed speedily so that their next cheque will carry to them the information that parliament has dealt with that particular problem. I think tomorrow we should consider passing the supplementary estimates even if we have to carry on beyond the hour of six o'clock.

After the supplementary estimates are through there will be the normal appropriation bill and then, as the other house has dealt with interim supply, we will be prepared for royal assent for that item as well as for the supplementary estimates. When we resume on the 10th—

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Finance looks concerned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I say this? I am gravely concerned. Far be it from me to suggest that any hon. member should curtail his remarks. The fact is, however, that included in these supplementary estimates are a good many provisions for salaries. My colleague has referred to the appropriation for the veterans, item 755, but I must draw attention to the fact also that there are numerous salary items here as well and those salary cheques cannot go out unless the bill is first passed and this supply released.

Mr. Churchill: When we resume on April 10—

Mr. Chevrier: I remember the same exhortations when I was on the other side.

Mr. Churchill: When we resume we shall deal with supply motions on April 10 and 11. Then the forecast—and this is subject to change—is that on Wednesday, April 12, we would consider the second reading of Bill No. C-72, to amend the Customs Tariff, and then on Thursday and Friday of that week we would resume discussion of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture followed by those of the Post Office Department.

I might point out for the interest of the house that this is the 77th day of this session. We have completed 17 pieces of legislation. The estimates of one department have also been dealt with and we are further ahead than we were last year at this time because it was not until the 90th day that we succeeded in passing the estimates of the first department.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the leader of the house if he would consider bringing all the other estimates before the committee tomorrow and leaving until the last the estimate we have just been discussing?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Churchill: We would still have to pass every other item in the supplementary estimates to deal with the appropriation bill and get royal assent. The actual arrangement in which the estimates are taken during the course of the day might be something we could discuss through the usual channels tomorrow morning.

Mr. Chevrier: I submit we should proceed in the usual manner.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MAIL CONTRACT, PETERBOROUGH

Question No. 151—Mr. Pitman:

1. Did the post office award a contract for driving mail from Peterborough to Apsley, Lakefield, Belleville, Tweed, and Madoc in the years 1959 and 1960?
2. To whom was this contract awarded?
3. Was there any stipulation in the contract in regard to wages paid to employees in the carrying out of the contract?
4. Is there any protection for workers under the post office regulations for such contracts?

Answer by: Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General):

1. There is no one contract covering service between Peterborough and the localities mentioned, but rather three service routes. These are:

(a) Apsley and Peterborough/Lakefield and Peterborough stage service—contract renewed 1st October 1960.

(b) Belleville and Peterborough highway service—established 25th April 1960 under temporary arrangement.

(c) Tweed and Peterborough highway service (via Madoc)—established 25th April 1960 under temporary arrangement.

2. Mr. Lawrence Wesley Olver, Peterborough, Ontario.

3. No.

4. (a) Stage services are minor operations and contracts for these services do not specify the payment of wages to couriers.

(b) Tender notices and contracts for highway services contain specific clauses covering the payment of wage rates to couriers. Notices inviting bids for temporary arrangements stipulate that the remuneration paid by a contractor to his couriers shall be reasonable and comparable to that paid drivers of trucks of equal size, in the district.

PASSENGER TRANSPORTATION, MALTON-TORONTO

Question No. 154—Mr. Pitman:

1. Does the Department of Transport give a franchise to any person or company for driving of passengers from Malton airport to downtown Toronto?
2. If so, to what person or company?
3. Is there any stipulation in the contract as to charges for transportation from Malton airport, and from the Royal York hotel to the King Edward?
4. If so, what are these charges?
5. If not, what is the charge to any person transported by this service from the Royal York hotel to the King Edward hotel or vice versa?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1 and 2. No. Transportation franchises are controlled by the Ontario transportation board.

The department has an agreemnt with Air Terminal Transport Limited, granting them the privilege to maintain and operate a limousine and taxi station at the Toronto international airport (Malton). The company has a franchise from the Ontario transportation board to operate between the airport and Toronto.

3 and 4. The tariff charged by the company is subject to approval by the Ontario transportation board and the company files a schedule approved by the transportation board with the department.

5. The approved tariff between the Toronto international airport (Malton) and downtown Toronto, (Royal York hotel) is $1.50 per passenger (75 cents children's fare). The company operates a jitney service between the Royal York hotel and the King Edward hotel to accommodate passengers who wish to go on to the King Edward hotel.

The same jitney service from the King Edward hotel to the Royal York hotel is available to passengers travelling from the King Edward to the airport. There is no charge for this jitney service.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to parts 1, 2 and 3 is that the report of the interdepartmental committee has been received and is under study. RECRUITMENT OF CENSUS WORKERS

Question No. 236—Mr. Godin:

1. Are workers being recruited at present for the taking of the census?

2. If so, what method of recruitment is used, and are local offices of the unemployment insurance commission asked to provide personnel for census taking?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, many thousands of Canadians will be employed in the important national undertaking of the 1961 census of Canada this year. Several hundred are being recruited by the civil service commission of Canada to augment regional office staffs of the dominion bureau of statistics across Canada and the head office at Ottawa, and in this phase of the work the commission is following its customary relationship with the national employment service. In addition, some 1,300 commissioners and 27,000 enumerators will be required. The time allowed for replies to starred questions is not such as to permit a detailed description of this procedure, but the house will be interested to hear that this is one of those not too common occurrences in which the present administration is following the same procedure as that followed in the 1951 census of Canada.

Mr. McIlraith: That is not right.

Mr. Morris: The hon. gentleman in whose name this question stands may be strengthened, therefore, in the knowledge that he can secure all the details from his colleague, the present member for Ottawa West, who was then parliamentary assistant.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise to make a personal explanation which perhaps involves a question of privilege. In answer to starred question No. 236 of today's proceedings the parliamentary secretary, in giving the answer, made a certain statement of fact and then went on to make gratuitous references alleging that the facts he had given would indicate that the same procedure was followed in taking the 1951 census. He then proceeded to indicate that I—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: —was familiar with that procedure and perhaps responsible for it. The explanation I wish to make is that the procedure to be used in the 1961 census taking is basically and fundamentally different from that used in 1951.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not making an explanation regarding something that relates to himself personally. In so far as reference was made to obtaining information from the hon. member for Ottawa West regarding the procedure used by him, the answer went beyond what might have been expected as a factual answer, but there does not seem to me to have been any reflection on the conduct of any member which would require an explanation or a member to rise on a matter of privilege. The course the hon. member is now following is to contradict the answer.

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to stop the hon. member from making an explanation if he feels he has been implicated, but he must confine himself to that aspect of it.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the point, Mr. Speaker, I am not saying that the factual part of the answer that was given is wrong at all, but seeking to point out that the information which related to me was wrong. I was referring to the answer only in so far as it had reference to me. I propose, Mr. Speaker, with your concurrence, to limit myself to that narrow point.

It was indicated by that answer that when I had some activity or responsibility in this field the system was the same as now when something over a thousand census commissioners are being appointed. I wish to make very clear now that no such system was used by me. One census commissioner was appointed for each electoral district during the 1951 census. The present system of appointing a number of commissioners for each electoral district was one with which I had no association whatever.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CLAIMANTS

Question No. 237—Mr. Robichaud:

What was the total number of claimants for unemployment insurance benefits as of March 1, 1961, as compared with similar date for 1959 and 1960?

Mr. R. D. Thrasher (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the latest data released on claimants for unemployment insurance are those for January 31, 1961. The numbers at this date and at comparable dates in 1959 and 1960 are:

January 31, 1959	785,071
January 31, 1960	782,542
January 31, 1961	846,940

Question No. 238—Mr. Richard (Ottawa East):

2. If so, what classification of employment does this regulation cover?
3. Has any consideration been given to waiving this regulation in the case of residents of areas of chronic unemployment who wish to secure an appointment elsewhere in the country?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. Is there an order-in-council approving the export firm power to the United States by a New Brunswick company?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. P.C. 1959-334 gave authority to the following companies to export firm power until March 31, 1960:

(a) Maine and New Brunswick Electrical Power Company (a New Brunswick company).

2. If so, what were they, and how many copies of each were printed?
3. Have any of them been burned since the time of publication?
4. If so, how many?

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): The records are being searched in regard to this matter. May I ask that the question stand.

Question stands.

4. Is it true that Miss Judith Jasmin is to represent the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at a convention to be held Saturday, April 8, at the University of Montreal, for the opening of a campaign in favour of the establishment of a non-denominational public school system?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. Miss Judith Jasmin is a program interviewer on contract.

2. Since 1956 Miss Jasmin has acted as a reporter and commentator on a fee basis.

3. Miss Jasmin is presently engaged on contract as an interviewer for the program "Premier Plan". She receives the remuneration stipulated in the contract which the C.B.C. has negotiated with her.

Question No. 243—Mr. Cardin:

1. What is the date of the letter which covers the firm commitment made by the British Atomic Energy Authority to purchase 12,000 tons of uranium from Canada, between 1963 and 1966?
2. Has the British government accepted this commitment as a contractual obligation which it must live up to, unless released by mutually agreed arrangement with the Canadian government?

4. As I stated in answer to No. 2, it is not in the public interest to discuss the details of these proposals during the period that negotiations are still proceeding.

FREIGHT RATES

INCREASED GRAIN RATES TO EASTERN PORTS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the decision of the board of transport commissioners allowing an increase in freight rates on grain moving from Georgian bay to eastern ports, scheduled to go into effect April 1, and the urgent need of the government to announce without delay the setting aside of this order under section 53 of the Railway Act in order to prevent a serious reduction in grain prices to western producers.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would indicate a little more specifically of what the specific, urgent matter he wishes to discuss consists of.

Mr. Argue: The urgent matter consists of order No. 103860 of the board of transport commissioners, which would allow an increase in freight rates on grain moving from Georgian bay to the eastern ports of Saint John and Halifax. It has been announced in the press that the railways intend to take advantage of this order on April 1. Since this is the last day of this session prior to the recess, and in view of the fact that April 1 occurs on Saturday and that this is the only time and the very last time that parliament would have a chance to express an opinion on this subject before the order goes into effect, I suggest that this is an appropriate time to ask for a public debate and to urge upon the government the setting aside of this increase.

I might point out that there is a general ceiling or a general freeze on freight rates, but in the opinion of the board of transport commissioners this general freeze has not applied to the rate in question since they have defined this as an export rate. For these reasons I feel that there is urgency for debate.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the question can be answered simply in this way. The order was made by the board of transport commissioners. An appeal was launched to the governor in council. The reasons for judgment on the part of the board of transport commissioners have not yet been delivered to the governor in council, or they had not been delivered at the time of the last inquiry I made. Therefore what is being asked for is a discussion in the house of a matter that falls peculiarly within the authority of the governor in council on appeal. The matter is still sub judice, that being so, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the motion that has been made is premature and out of order.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question—

Mr. Argue: On the technicality raised by the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. I have not the statute in front of me, but I am certain I am right and the Miniter of Justice will correct me if I am wrong. Under section 53 of the Railway Act the governor in council, of course, has the power to set aside a freight rate increase following an appeal. But the governor in council of its own initiative also has the authority to set aside any order of the board of transport commissioners. It is because of this authority, apart altogether from whether or not there is an appeal before the cabinet, that I have brought this motion before the house. In my own experience in parliament, we have on many occasions debated the general question of impending freight rate increases following such an announcement.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question was to the Prime Minister. Is it possible for the Attorney General for Canada to appeal a judgment by the board of transport commissioners, in this instance to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say offhand. That would be a legal opinion, and I am unable to answer that question offhand.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask whether this matter is one which could be discussed under the supplementary estimates, which are the next order of proceedings? There are transport items in the supplementary estimates. I am not sure whether the items are such as would permit reference to this matter, but it would be helpful if I knew.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether you expect me to make a comment on your last observation. The items awaiting consideration by the committee of supply this afternoon in the final supplementary estimates do not appear to me to touch on this question.

In the main estimates there is always an item to provide for the payment of salaries and other expenses of the board of transport commissioners. Matters pertaining to the jurisdiction of the board or orders issued by them are sometimes discussed on the main estimates under that item, if I recall correctly. However, in the present case I do not believe that any reference to this subject would relate to any of the items in the final supplementary estimates.

Perhaps I might add this comment. When the hon. member for Assiniboia talks about such matters having been discussed in the house in times past, it is true that there have been discussions about freight rates in the light of orders issued by the board of transport commissioners, but not, in my submission, in cases where an appeal is pending from such an order.

The Railway Act makes provision for two kinds of appeals from an order or decision of the board of transport commissioners. There is an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada on a question of law or jurisdiction. There is also a right of appeal to the governor in council, which is not restricted to such questions. In the present case the parties have entered an appeal to the governor in council. Therefore this question is now most plainly sub judice.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister for their assistance in dealing with the question which has been raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The hon. member asks that we interrupt our proceedings today which, as all hon. members know, is the last day of sitting before the Easter adjournment pursuant to an order already made by the house.

There is on the agenda some very important if not essential work for the house to undertake. I should think, therefore, that the hon. member would have to make a very strong case in order to interrupt the proceedings as they have been planned and ordered.

The immediate event which he has suggested raises a matter of urgent and immediate importance is a decision of the board of transport commissioners which will change freight rates on grain moving in an area of Canada between Georgian bay and eastern ports. If I am correct, an appeal has been taken from this order to the governor in council.

It has been suggested that the governor in council is a court and that the matter is sub judice. I am not prepared to accept that argument, but it is perhaps not necessary for me to deal with that question for the purpose of making my present decision. Has the house the right to discuss and consider the transport board's decision before the cabinet exercises its discretion on the appeal? Perhaps I do not have to make a pronouncement on that point and had better leave it as a doubtful submission.

I think on the broader issue the railway freight structure of this country is subject to constant review and change. Orders are made from time to time by the board and it does not seem to me that when any particular order is made it should be the occasion for interrupting the orderly consideration of freight rates in the way that has been prescribed by parliament, namely by the transport board, by appeals, and by debate in parliament as well as by legislation on a considered basis. Therefore I do not think, in the circumstances, the rule has been satisfied.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

URANIUM ORE TO U.K.

Motion No. 96—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of any contract, letter of agreement, correspondence, or other documents, exchanged between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom since January 1, 1956, in relation to the supplying of uranium ore to the United Kingdom.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I presume that the documents referred to by the hon. member for Assiniboia as being exchanged between the governments of Canada and the United Kingdom are those which deal with the purchase of uranium concentrates and not, as the question states, uranium ores. Moreover, they were exchanged between Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited and the United Kingdom atomic energy authority and not, as is stated in the question, between the governments of the two countries. If the hon. member will amend the form of his motion to cover that particular correspondence of March, April and May of 1957, I shall be glad to give it further consideration. It would be understood, of course, that the production of these documents would require the prior consent of the other parties to this correspondence.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the more convenient course to follow would be for the hon. member to withdraw his motion and resubmit it.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN SMALL HOLDING REQUIREMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I might say that I think these will be my last words prior to the Easter recess.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I am very glad to make everyone happy at Easter time. In view of the fact that many veterans are anxiously awaiting the government's decision with respect to the reduction of acreage required for small holdings—as an example, one subdivision in Kootenay West of 30 half-acre lots will not be available for veterans if an early decision is not reached—would the minister inform the house when an announcement concerning this urgent and important question to veterans can be expected?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): This question has been raised on several occasions previously. The matter is under review. I hope during the Easter recess to have the opportunity to study a very comprehensive survey that has been made regarding this problem, and will have an early reply for the hon. member.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO DATES OF BY-ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether, before we adjourn for Easter, he will be able to inform the house as to the date of the four pending by-elections?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

STATEMENT ON ACTIVITIES OF RETURNING OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question put to me yesterday by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is that the chief electoral officer proposes to carry out an annual revision of polling division boundaries each year until the next general election is held.

TRADE

WHEAT—REPORTED ADDITIONAL SALE TO CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister comment regarding reports that there have been additional sales of wheat to Czechoslovakia other than the sale which was announced in this house?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been an additional sale to Czechoslovakia of 100,000 metric tons of wheat on the same terms as those I announced in the house on an earlier occasion. This sale is valued at $8.6 million. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, combined with my earlier announcement, this will mean that approximately 300,000 metric tons or approximately 11 million bushels valued at approximately $25.8 million are involved.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PICTOU, N.S.—REQUEST FOR ORDER FOR RAILWAY CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I addressed a question to the Prime Minister in regard to the receipt of the telegram from Robert MacNaughton, president of the united steel workers of America, following a public meeting of residents of Pictou county dealing with unemployment and in particular asking whether the government could seek to obtain an order for the Eastern Car Company to produce railway cars. I wonder if the Prime Minister is in a position to give a reply.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I recall it copies of the telegram referred to were addressed to a number of members and ministers. The Minister of Transport replied by telegram, which I might read to give the answer in detail. The telegram reads as follows:

> Your telegram March 27 received and representations concerning employment situation arising from public meeting held in Trenton on March 26 have been carefully noted. With regard to the question of railway car orders I might say that following the interview in Ottawa to which you refer I communicated with the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway company drawing attention particularly to conditions in Pictou county and asked both companies to review their requirements for equipment from the standpoint of assisting the employment situation. Am pleased to say that I have been informed that the Canadian Pacific have tenders out for 1,000 assorted units, and can also advise that Canadian National will be shortly calling for tenders for assorted units totalling approximately 225 cars. Canadian National advise as well that their requirements will be reviewed from time to time in the light of traffic needs.

REGINA—INQUIRY AS TO ARMY INTERVENTION IN LAUNDRY STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that Rainbow Laundry and Dry Cleaners in Regina have been dismissing union members over contract negotiations and a strike has ensued, will the minister inform the house whether the army will respect the picket line and cease delivering laundry to the plant involved?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, although the hon. member gave notice earlier today of his intention to ask this questions, for which I thank him, it has not been possible in the time available to obtain the full particulars in this case without which I am unable to give the assurance the hon. member requests.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

However, I would say that we do respect at all times the legitimate rights of union members, and it is not one of the functions of the armed services to act to strikebreakers or in any way impede duly authorized and legal actions of any properly qualified labour union.

Mr. Argue: Do I take it from the minister that he will now inquire into the situation and report at a later date?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

WAS SECRET FILE MADE AVAILABLE TO TORONTO NEWSPAPER?

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Will the minister confirm the statement appearing in last night's edition of the Toronto Daily Star to the effect that a secret R.C.M.P. file on communist subversive activities within Canadian unions was made available to a Toronto newspaper?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, I certainly will not confirm that statement. I am advised by the R.C.M.P. that there is no record, and no knowledge on their part, of any files having been shown to any unauthorized person. It is not the policy of the R.C.M.P. or of the government that any official document of any kind be made available to unauthorized persons.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister say whether it is true that the R.C.M.P. did confirm the accuracy of the details which were published by a Toronto newspaper in respect of alleged undercover activities?

Mr. Fulton: If I understood the question correctly I think the answer would be no, there was no confirmation. I do not know to what article the hon. member refers. I think I had better have a look at the question in Hansard and give a reply later, if it can stand over until after Easter.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps I could rephrase the question. It is alleged that the newspaper article was given to the R.C.M.P. to check for accuracy before it was published.

Mr. Fulton: By the newspaper?

Mr. Hellyer: The question is, would the R.C.M.P. have checked a newspaper article before publication to verify its accuracy in respect of details contained in private and secret documents?

Mr. Fulton: This seems to me to be a hypothetical question containing a number of allegations, as to the accuracy of which I have to express some doubts.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR LINES—REQUEST THAT OVERHAUL WORK BE DONE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in answer to a question asked of me the day before by the hon. member for Port Arthur I gave a reply respecting the overhaul work that was alleged to be done outside of the country for Canadian Pacific Air Lines. I am afraid that in my answer yesterday I did not give accurate information. Therefore, in fairness to all concerned, I should say that I have been assured by the president of Canadian Pacific Air Lines that it is the company's practice to do its engine and airframe overhauls in its own plant at Vancouver.

In 1957 a total of three airframe overhauls were accomplished in Hong Kong and Amsterdam. This is a very small proportion of Canadian Pacific Air Lines overhaul requirements. These overhauls were made only because the facilities and personnel to perform this work were not available in Canada at the time.

In fact, according to what the president of Canadian Pacific Air Lines tells me, in order to keep its maintenance and overhaul facilities fully occupied the company ensures wherever possible that in cases where it leases aircraft to a foreign carrier, the aircraft shall be returned to Canada for necessary overhaul work. Such instances involve carriers in Lebanon, France and the United States. The president of C.P.A. points out that the company does not carry out 85 per cent of its overhauls outside of Canada, nor does it require any incentive to do its overhaul work in Canada.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO DEADLINE FOR HEARING REPRESENTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister indicate to the house whether he has yet established a deadline date by which time he hopes to complete hearing delegations making representations in respect of the main budget?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope to complete the hearing of the delegations by the end of next week, April 8.

THE CENSUS

INQUIRY AS TO RECRUITMENT OF WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the answer to question 236 regarding the census procedures was so cryptic that I should like to direct another question to the parliamentary secretary. Will the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce advise members who have requests from constituents regarding census enumerator jobs whether these job requests should be directed to them, to the national employment service or to the local constituency officials of the Progressive Conservative party?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer to that is not cryptic at all. The commissioners of each census district are entrusted with the recruitment of enumerators, and members of parliament may send these names to the commissioners.

Mr. Fisher: Are any steps being taken by the department to encourage the employment of university students on this survey this year because of the shortage of jobs for university students in the general economy?

Mr. Morris: Without agreeing with the qualification that there is a shortage of jobs for university students, university students and all others who are qualified would be encouraged to apply for work as census enumerators. There are very many required, as I said in answer to the question. This time there is no disqualification procedure such as there was before.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): May I address a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. How many census commissioners have been appointed?

Mr. Morris: Of the 1,336 required, 1,307 have been appointed.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ENGLISH—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON MARCH 27

Mr. Roland English (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The question of privilege arises out of statements made in this house on March 27, 1961 by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). I would like to refer to some of his remarks which can be found on page 3375 of Hansard, and I quote:

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the parliamentary secretary proceeds perhaps he would indicate why he has not raised this matter earlier. I take it that his question of privilege arises out of something said in the house on Monday, March 27. Was the hon. member not here then, and had it not come to his attention before now?

(Translation):

Mr. English: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because, according to the statement of the hon. member for Laurier, there was a dismissal for political reasons, which affects me—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. English: —because it happened in my constituency of Gaspe. I would like to quote part of what was said, Mr. Speaker, and you will see that I am really affected in this matter.

I quote:

> Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with a subject coming under item 167 which deals not only with the civil service commission but with the Department of Transport as well. I am going to try and be as brief as possible in order not to delay this item.
> I have here a letter from Riviere-Madeleine. A man named Josephat Ste. Croix, assistant lightkeeper on Anticosti island, has been laid off.

That man was not on Anticosti island, but in Gaspe. I must put the facts right.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will have to come to the point if he wants to continue. If there is a serious reflection on his activities giving rise to a question of privilege, and which stems from the statement made by the hon. member for Laurier on Monday, perhaps he would indicate what reflection on his conduct there is which warrants the time of the house being taken now, at this late date.

(Translation):

Mr. English: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laurier has suggested to the house that it was purely a political dismissal, and even in today's issue of La Presse, we find this:

> Lightkeeper fired for political reasons.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the house that there were no politics involved, and I feel I have the right to inform the house in this respect.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is perhaps stretching things to find that it refers to him, because it seems to me what was said was a general statement that there had been political considerations. However, the hon. member has given the assurance he intended to give to the house, and I expect the matter can be considered to be disposed of.

HISTORICAL SITES AND MONUMENTS

OLD FORT CHAMBLY—CORRESPONDENCE AS TO RESTORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Johnson (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Could the minister inform the house whether he recently received from the "Societe Historique de la Vallee du Richelieu" or from its chairman, Mr. Leo Leblanc, letters, requests or other representations relating to the restoration of the old fort of Chambly?

(Text):

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I have had an opportunity to check into the matter. There have been no representations concerning the restoration of old Fort Chambly from "La société historique de la vallée du Richelieu", nor from the chairman of that organization.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE REALIGNMENT OF POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Following President Kennedy's announcement yesterday of a realignment of the defence policy of the United States, will the minister say whether we can expect a realignment of the defence policy of this country to bring it into conformity with the real situation existing in the world today?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Trinity is quite familiar with the course that has been followed by the Department of National Defence. May I also remind the hon. member that Canada is a sovereign nation and makes its own decisions without being influenced by other nations.

Mr. Hellyer: Since when?

SUPPLY

The house is committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mutual aid—

708. Contributions to infrastructure and military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization—further amount required, $740,000.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, before I conclude my few brief remarks on the amendment I should like to turn for a moment to certain statements made by the Minister of Finance last night. As found on page 3445 of Hansard the minister said:

> Let me ask the committee to consider one or two facts in this regard. First, think of what Europe was like—

That is clear proof out of the mouth of the minister himself that although we should be looking ahead with regard to this matter, he is actually looking back ten years. The minister also made another statement with which I should like to take issue at this time. As found at the top of page 3446 he said:

> —that Canada can withdraw, live unto herself and take the attitude of a pious nation that has no great concern with the problems of other nations a little closer to the areas of aggression in the world today?

I think this is very unfair on the minister's part. There was nothing in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia or in the remarks he made that indicated in any way that the intent of this party is that Canada should withdraw unto itself, as the minister said. The hon. member for Assiniboia stated very clearly and distinctly, and I reiterate, that there is nothing either neutralist or pacifist about the stand of this party on this matter.

There is another point with which I should like to take issue. It is found in the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, who tried to give the house his interpretation of our intentions. As found on page 3448 of Hansard he said:

> That is a far-reaching extension of policy when the party on my right said that they did not want the German republic to take any part in the development of the Atlantic community.

There was nothing in the remarks of the national leader of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Assiniboia, that could give rise to such a comment. There was an interjection by one member of this group who objected to the fact that people like Speidel, a former nazi general, were playing such a prominent role in the NATO forces at the present time, but that has nothing to do with the German republic. Apparently this party, unlike the Leader of the Opposition, has just as much suspicion of the nazis as we had 20 years ago when we were fighting. To rectify this distorted version of what the amendment means I should like to deal with it specifically.

What it means is that our concern is not sectional. Ten years ago the situation in the world was such that the world was dominated by two giant powers, and at that time this party fully supported NATO. We took our place where we felt we should be. Today, however, we see a third force growing in the world which is becoming stronger and stronger every day. It is a force of uncommitted nations who do not have too much patience with either of the two giants who dominated the situation ten years ago.

We have noticed, Mr. Chairman, that this new group of emerging nations has strongly resisted any attempt to line upon either side. These uncommitted nations are not in NATO or, in fact, in any other military regional alliance of this sort. These new nations are desperately in need of leadership and assistance, such as a country like Canada can give. This is the reason we moved this amendment. We feel we cannot go on any longer shutting our eyes to the facts of life.

We believe in collective security, but we believe in it on a universal scale such as the United Nations and not on a regional basis such as we have it under NATO. Times change, and we feel that if we are going to keep up with the times we must reappraise our position from time to time. Before I close, I should like to give a brief illustration of just how much times can change. I should like to refer to some excerpts from an address given by Professor Watson Kirkconnell at the 1960 maritime universities student parliament in Halifax. I see the hon. member for Halifax is here, as well as the hon. member for Trinity, and I believe they were both present at the time the professor gave this address.

Professor Kirkconnell was speaking of how times do change and he said:

> The vagaries of the press in these matters are aptly satirized by a recent strip in the Chicago Tribune:
> 1898: Those bad Spaniards who have bull fights.
> 1904: Those dirty Russian bullies, jumping on those fine little industrious Japanese.
> 1914: Those horrible Germans, those fine, friendly, simple-hearted Italians, those helpful Japanese allies.
> 1941: Those dirty and cruel Germans and Italians, those fine simple, kindly Russians, those nasty Spaniards who are cruel to animals, those fine, dependable, honest Chinese, those heartless and brutal Japanese.
> 1951: Those dirty grasping Russians, those fine Italians, those brave and hard-working Japanese, those industrious and brave Germans, those fine Spaniards, those treacherous Chinese.

This excerpt shows how quickly things can change, even within a short period of ten years. We would like to restate that this amendment does not represent a negative move so far as we are concerned. We feel that this is the only right, positive move that we can make today if Canada is going to take its proper place in world affairs.

Amendment (Mr. Argue) negatived: Yeas, 5; nays, 91.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the minister could tell us what type of fish there are in the river, and whether they are commercial fish or game fish for which these facilities are being provided?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that the fish is salmon and it is commercial fishing so far as the Indians are concerned.

PRIVY COUNCIL

Special—

720. Expenses of the royal commission on railway problems—further amount required, $10,800.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us when the report of the commission is likely to be available?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have no information to add to that imparted to the house within recent days by the Prime Minister in reply to a similar question.

Mr. Fisher: We have the promise of both an interim report and a final report by this royal commission. I should like very much to know when the final report of the royal commission is likely to be available rather than the interim report.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot add anything to the answer I just gave to the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we were informed in the house some months ago that during the period which had been established by legislation for the postponement of the railway strike, the royal commission dealing with this matter, and the one we are discussing now, would make a report. I believe the report was expected by the end of March, and that report was to contain a recommendation which would make possible, it was hoped, the solution of the dispute which nearly brought about a strike last December.

What the committee would like to know is this: Will the interim report which the Prime Minister stated would be available in the early part of April contain a recommendation bearing on this dispute which would make possible a solution of this problem before the end of the period established by law within which a strike is not possible? Can the minister throw any light on that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the committee is aware of the questions that have been asked on this subject, and the answers that have been given to those questions by the Prime Minister. The Leader of the Opposition is referring to a statement made in the house by the Prime Minister several months ago and in which he indicated that the information conveyed to him by the chairman of the royal commission was to the effect that the report of the commission would be tendered by the end of March. Further follow-up questions have been asked on this subject more recently and the Prime Minister has answered those questions. The last answer was given, as I recall it, within the last ten days. In it he indicated that a report was expected from the commission I think within a few days from this time. I think I can give the Leader of the Opposition the reference to the Prime Minister's answer.

Mr. Pearson: I remember the answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): At page 3126 of Hansard of March 20 the Prime Minister is reported as having said this:

> I am now advised by the assistant secretary to the royal commission that the chairman, Mr. MacPherson, has stated that the first volume of the findings of the royal commission on transportation will be available early in April.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like at this time to make some comments on this royal commission and its work. I have been bitterly disappointed, as one very much interested in transportation problems, in the way in which this commission has been conducted. I say this not as any criticism of the members of the commission or of the secretariat. However, we have a most paradoxical situation. The government is waiting for a report because this report is to give us a solution for a management-labour crisis. Yet at the very first hearing when the commission was starting here in Ottawa I was a spectator and I noted that at this hearing it was made clear that the royal commission was going to keep completely away from the problem of railway labour.

We get all kinds of ironies and paradoxes. We have had one very recently in connection with the uranium industry. Here we have an almost classic one, namely that of a royal commission that on its very first day deliberately eschewed any responsibility or any interest regarding the labour side of railway problems. Yet we are waiting for their report as the solution or the advice to the government by means of which to get us out of one of the worst labour-management snafu's we have had in Canadian railways.

It seems to me that this was most unfair to the commission because, from my observation of the commission during its earlier hearings and through following the evidence, I believe that the decision to keep labour matters out of the commission sittings was taken at the advice of the executive. Here we have a commission that started with one complete part of railway operations outside of its jurisdiction; and the other even more contentious issue, namely that of the Crowsnest pass rates, was deliberately ruled out as an issue more specifically by the Prime Minister in his statement in which he set up the commission. Yet while facing one of the worst crises that the railways have had in Canada not only with regard to freight rates but with a strike deadline on May 15, we are waiting with bated breath for a report by a commission that has deliberately stayed away from labour problems.

I feel that very rarely have royal commissioners been put or placed themselves in such a peculiar position. I was critical right at the start of the number of people who were on this commission. The royal commission a decade ago was concentrated really in three men. This commission has been larger and it seems to me that an almost impossible burden has been placed upon these commissioners over the period since they got started. It seems to me that such an unwieldy group of commissioners makes it very difficult to hope for coherent and consistent reports. I do not know whether we shall have minority reports from the commission. However, it seems to me that this is an example of the wrongful use of a royal commission. The report and the use that government indicates it is going to make of it—that is as some kind of solution to the problem—can only be an interim one since obviously this commission did not deal with the whole range of railway or transportation problems that was dealt with by the royal commission a decade ago. Anyone of us looking back at that old royal commission will agree that in the majority or minority reports or special memoranda prepared by Dr. Angus and Dr. Innis, we have an insight into and a conception of our railway problems a decade ago that were most useful to everyone. I do not see how we can possibly get them from this particular royal commission.

I should just like to underline the fact that we have perhaps the worst railway crisis of our history facing us within a month or a month and a half and everything about it seems to hinge upon this royal commission report. When we had the maintenance of operation bill here before us early in December the Prime Minister indicated that negotiations were going to continue in the interim and that strenuous efforts were going to be made to solve the deadlock. Instead, at least according to word from the people in the unions, no progress at all has been made. Negotiations in effect are a dead issue at the present time. The railways are hard and fast in the position in which they were last December and so are the unions. So far as we know the government has been waiting all this time for this royal commission interim report that has not yet been received. It seems to me that on a domestic issue this is brinkmanship of a kind that we should not expect from a government that has had three years in which to survey transportation problems.

There is nothing we can do at this time to express our displeasure at or our low opinion of this kind of approach to transportation problems. However, I feel that we in our party should express right now what is almost our dismay at what we are faced with in the transportation field within the next six weeks and the complete lack of any indication as to how we are going to get out of it on any kind of reasonable basis.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 720 carry?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Port Arthur has made a strong case for a statement from the minister which will, as he hopes, throw some light on this extremely important and indeed extremely dangerous situation; and one which is, so far as we know, completely frozen having regard to relations between the railways and the workers. No doubt one reason why it is frozen is that we were told that it could not be unfrozen until this royal commission had made a report in which would be included recommendations which might be effective in dealing with this matter.

As my hon. friend has just pointed out this is a royal commission which told us earlier that it was not going to deal with this specific matter. I think we should ask the minister whether the royal commission since that time has been requested to deal with this matter in such a way that it might be able to produce recommendations or proposals which will have a bearing on the solution of this situation which will confront us again, I believe, on May 15th.

That is one question. The other is that in this interim report, the first report which has been promised for early in April—and the Prime Minister referred to this in his statement the other day—might be nothing more than a progress report. We do not know. It would be very useful indeed to get some assurance that this first report is not merely to be a formal progress report but is to include in it provisions, recommendations or proposals which will have a bearing on this group and which can be used in a way which will avoid the possibility of a crippling strike on May 15 when the legislation passed last December for preventing such a strike comes to an end.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the committee is well acquainted with the terms of reference of this royal commission. It was a royal commission appointed to investigate the inequities in the freight rate structure. There were also other matters referred to the commission, such as the possibilities of achieving more economical and efficient railway transportation, whether and to what extent the Railway Act should specify that the assets and earnings of railway companies in businesses and investments other than railways should be taken into account in establishing freight rates, and related questions.

Without going back over the ground that was thoroughly traversed in a debate on a government bill in this house several months ago during the present session, I remind hon. members that it was because of the fact that the royal commission is dealing with something that is of the utmost importance to the whole question of railway revenues that it has such a direct relationship to the ability of the railways to meet the demands of employees for increased earnings. That was the relationship.

It is not necessary, if I may say so, to belabour the commission for not entering into this labour dispute. That was not a subject referred to the royal commission and they could not properly have considered it. The subject referred to them is related to railway freight revenues; it was the companies that took the position that they required additional revenues, that they simply could not meet the demands.

[Mr. Pearson.]

In the face of this situation it pleased parliament to pass certain legislation in expectation that the report, when received, would have a direct bearing on this question of the revenue position of the railways.

I think the whole matter is fully understood. I believe we are in very grave danger at the moment of going back and trespassing on the debate which took place at an earlier stage of the present session, after which debate the house passed certain legislation.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, would the minister then agree that the title "royal commission on railway problems" is a bit of a misnomer and that this might have been called a royal commission on railway revenues or a royal commission on freight rates, but hardly a royal commission on railway problems in the general sense?

I say this because surely the toughest problem facing the railways and their employees today is the question of some kind of a standard for the employees' wages.

I remember the reason, excuse or apology given for the royal commission not going into labour problems. It was that negotiations were taking place between the managements and the union. One of the reasons given was that the royal commission would be entering into something that was being negotiated.

I should like to point out to the minister that the last royal commission on transportation did try to come up with some idea of a yardstick that could be used for railway employees. In so far as the Milvain hearings and report are concerned, I imagine the C.N.R. and C.P.R. spent pretty close to $200,000 trying to introduce, through a study made by Woods Gordon, a comparability of wage rates and job classifications between railway workers and comparable workers in other industries.

As it happened, their whole approach was dynamited. The Woods Gordon report was in effect practically laughed out of the hearings. In his report, Mr. Justice Milvain dismisses it very curtly in a few sentences. It is intriguing to me that so much money was paid to this great consulting firm in order to produce this report.

I insist that this is the key to railway problems at the present time. It is not the question of freight rates, and it is really not the over-all question of revenue. It is, what kind of yardstick are we going to apply for railway labour? It is apparent that unless we change our whole conception of railways in Canada, very many jobs performed by the railways are not going to be remunerative, in the normal revenue sense, in comparison with any kind of private enterprise on a competitive basis. I wish to underline that we are not going to come to any practical solution from this royal commission on the real problem that we face at the present time.

I do not wish to take up any more time on this matter, but I should just like to point out to all hon. members of the committee that we are going to be faced with a crisis period when we get back here after Easter, and it will concern transportation problems. What always happens, and what I am afraid of, is that when the threat of a strike hangs over the country the people who are going to get it in the neck are the railway workers, because the antipathy to strikes as a whole hides the fact that the railway workers have a real case for an adjusment in their wage rates.

I think this fact needs to be pointed out. I hope the railway workers themselves will tighten up their discipline, and improve their solidarity and will be prepared to face a strike on May 15, despite the fact that in the crisis period after we return we will go into these problems and there is no doubt that public opinion will be worked up so as to place railway workers in an invidious position.

I am sorry to have spoken so long, Mr. Chairman, but it seems to me we are going to land back here with a really big problem in our laps, and I think the people who are going to take the real kicking on it—and we should have sympathy and consideration for them—are the railway workers, largely as a result of an inactive and ineffective government policy on railways.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to hold up this matter, but I have one final observation to make. The hon. member who has just spoken has said that unless this problem of transportation which faces us is solved shortly we will indeed be facing a major crisis, because the deadline date is May 15 and we will soon be in April.

We on this side of the chamber are not belabouring the royal commission, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance suggests, it is the government which has burdened the royal commission with certain responsibilities related to this labour dispute. These are responsibilities which the royal commission certainly did not anticipate when it was set up. This has been done by the government itself in connection with the dispute of last autumn, which was temporarily settled, but only temporarily, by legislation.

During the discussion of that legislation the Prime Minister himself said that all that was being done was to postpone the strike, and no rights were being denied anybody.

In the discussion on November 30 the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

There is a postponement—

It is only a postponement—

—because of the action of the government to preserve the equality of all parts of Canada—

That is, with respect to freight rates:

—until equalization has been provided for as a result of the recommendations of the royal commission.

There it is. The royal commission has been given that responsibility. We are entitled to ask, and we do ask whether in this first report—it may be the only report before May 15, in all likelihood it will be the only report made before that date—recommendations will be made, as stated by the Prime Minister, to provide for equality of all parts of Canada. If that is not the case, then how is this matter going to be provided for, as the Prime Minister said it would be provided for, before the date of May 15 after which, if no solution is found meanwhile, a strike can take place?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot say what will be the precise contents of the report. It will be received in due course, as the Prime Minister has indicated. I think that would be the proper time, when all hon. members have the report and have perused it, to discuss the contents of the report and whatever recommendations it may contain.

Item agreed to.

722. Expenses of the royal commission on the Great Slave Lake Railway—further amount required, $2,150.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether the minister would give us some information about the work of this royal commission on the Great Slave Lake Railway for which we are asked to make a further appropriation? Is this work completed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the work is completed and this small sum is required to pay the final accounts.

Mr. Pearson: The work then has been completed and the recommendations have been made by the royal commission, and the minister says that this item is needed to tidy up the expenses of that commission. May I ask whether any decision has been taken by the government regarding the recommendations made by that royal commission as to the route of this railroad?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That information will be fully given to the house in due course.

Mr. Baldwin: I would like to take just one moment to say, in respect of the recommendations, that I was up in this country just recently and am pleased to advise the committee that there is at the present time a full location survey taking place, and that promptly following the commission's recommendation they were implemented. After the estimates in this regard had been passed last December, survey parties commenced working in the area and I understand that the information gathered at that time confirmed the reports of the commission and the action of the government in implementing the commission's recommendation.

Item agreed to.

SECRETARY OF STATE

Public printing and stationery—

723. Printing of Canada Gazette—further amount required, $17,000.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether the minister could tell us if this increased cost is due to a greater number of orders in council that had to be printed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, there was more printing cost.

Item agreed to.

724. Printing and binding the annual statutes —further amount required, $3,000.

Mr. Hellyer: In respect to this item I wonder whether the minister could say whether the additional amount required is due to an increase in cost or to an increase in laws passed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is due to an increase in cost because of the increased volume of printing of statutes passed.

Item agreed to.

725. Reimbursement of the Queen's printer's advance account for the value of stores which have become obsolete, unserviceable, lost or destroyed, $41,467.

Mr. Fisher: I think we should have a little more information than is contained in the details of this particular item. I think I understand how this is done but could we have some details as to the type of material that has become obsolete, lost or destroyed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is an annual write-off item. The sum involved here is $41,467 and is made up of the following items to be written off inventory as obsolete or unserviceable, and there are five of them. The first is the Winnipeg printing unit, substore No. 653, $41.01. The second is purchasing, procurement and stores—Hull, inventory No. 112, $28,356.69. The third is the Edmonton printing unit, $352.98. The next item is the outside printing production branch, St. Patrick street, Ottawa, inventory No. 663, $10,268.43, and the last item is procurement purchasing and stores, Hull maintenance store No. 620, $4,488.11, totalling $43,507.22.

Mr. Fisher: Two or three of these items seem to be fairly substantial. I do not have the figures here to check, but could the minister indicate whether this write-off is about average for a year or is higher than normal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This figure fluctuates materially from year to year. In the fiscal year 1956-57 the amount of this item was $123,326. That was unusually high but there was a fire at the Edmonton operations that year, and two other items as well were involved. In 1958-59 the figure was $14,573, so it is quite clear that this fluctuates from year to year.

Mr. Fisher: I can understand that forms which go out of date from year to year are destroyed, such as the census forms which were printed and then superseded because of protests by hon. members from the province of Quebec, but could the minister tell us if most of this loss or destruction is related to forms, or printed material such as actual publications?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that this item embraces stores and equipment, and included in the write-off are forms that have become out of date and are no longer in use.

Mr. Fisher: Would the added expense of printing new census forms and the destruction of the old be included in this item or would it come under a departmental item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that the cost of the new census forms does not enter into this present item.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Public buildings construction and services—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects,—further amounts required—

726. Nova Scotia, $1.

Mr. Fisher: I would like to know in each of these cases in which constituency the particular structure is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In regard to item No. 726, the location of the post office is at Bras d'Or. I do not have the information regarding the relationship of the locations of these various works to federal or other constituencies, but perhaps if I give the hon. member the geographic locations he will be able to relate them to the constituencies.

Mr. Fisher: I just wanted to make sure that they were all located in constituencies represented by members supporting the government. I looked hopefully to find if some of them were located in constituencies represented by opposition members.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The building in item 726 is located in Nova Scotia. The building in item 727 is located in Manitoba, and I am happy to say that there are none but government members from those two provinces. The building in 728 is located in Saskatchewan and unless it happens to be located in the riding of Assiniboia I think it would be a safe inference that it is located in a riding worthily represented by a supporter of the government.

Mr. Fisher: I would like to point out to the minister that the ratio of opposition members to government members is roughly one in four, and I hoped surely one in four of these locations would fall in a constituency represented by an opposition member, by the rules of the game, but I can perhaps assume that the minister of this particular department did not receive representations from opposition members regarding these extra estimates.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the hon. member that the government proceeds according to need of the buildings and not with regard to those extraneous considerations to which he has adverted.

Item agreed to.

National capital commission—

731. Interest charges on outstanding loans that were made for the purpose of acquiring property in the national capital region—further amount required, $140,000.

Mr. McIlraith: I would like to ask one or two questions about this item. The particulars carried on page 25 of the supplementary estimates read as follows:

Deficiency resulting from a short-fall in estimated revenues from the rental of properties and interest income—

I wonder whether the minister would give us the rate of interest paid on these loans? I presume they are loans from the government. Then, will the minister give us any information he may have available as to how it happens that there is what appears to be a large deficiency in the rentals?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The rate of interest on these loans varies from 4 per cent up to 5¾ per cent.

As to the second question, may I point out that the deficiency which this item is intended to cover does not arise out of any increase in the interest charge to be made but out of a disappointment in the revenues from rentals which are applied as against the interest. These rentals are from properties in the hands of the national capital commission. This year they were estimated at $311,000. It is now estimated that they will yield only $163,000.

Item agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Land, air and training divisions—

732. Operation and maintenance—further amount required, $224,500.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I have just one question on this item. Can the minister give us a breakdown on the increase, or at least some reasons for the increase shown in this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, with pleasure. There are four items which compose the total of $224,500. First, there are the increases in medical rates effective August 1, 1960, and an increase in the number of members receiving medical and dental services from the Department of Veterans Affairs. That amounts to $70,000.

Second, there is the increased requirement for removal expenses owing to a change in the marriage regulations. The removal expenses amount to $100,000; third, freight, express and cartage, $30,400; fourth, sundry investigation expenses, $24,200, making a total of $224,500.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Marine services—

Aids to navigation—

738. Administration, operation and maintenance —further amount required, $46,130.

Mr. Fisher: Can the minister tell the committee whether any of these extra expenditures are going into the great lakes system?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this sum of $46,130 is the balance required for the removal of three derelicts. I do not think the hon. member wants to claim one of those for his area. One of them was removed from Montreal harbour, another from Midland harbour and a third from a government wharf at New Campbellton, Nova Scotia.

Item agreed to.

Railway and steamship services—

741. Canadian National Railways deficit, 1960—amount required to provide for payment to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made by the national company to the Minister of Finance, and to be applied by the national company in payment of the system deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) arising in the calendar year 1960, subject to recovery therefrom of accountable advances made to the national company from the consolidated revenue fund, $67,496,777.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, this is a staggering sum. Surely we should not pass it without at least some comment or explanation. Can the minister indicate to us what was the projected deficit last year as compared with the actual deficit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The 1959 deficit was $43.6 million. Last year the C.N.R. deficit was $67.5 million, which represents an increase of $23.9 million.

Mr. Fisher: As I recall the railway practice, some indication is given by the president of the railway as to what the picture is going to be in the next year. I want to know whether this $67 million deficit is high or low?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is very high.

Mr. Fisher: Has the minister any explanation of this other than that we can turn to the annual report of the president?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The annual report has recently been tabled, Mr. Chairman. In it the president draws attention to the contraction in the volume of railway freight business.

Mr. Fisher: Can the minister give us assurance that the government brings this forward without any hesitation and generally approves of the management of the railway which has resulted in a deficit of this size?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All I can say is that the deficit has been incurred; there can be no question about that, and it must be paid. Therefore, we are asking parliament to make provision for the payment. The deficit in question has been incurred.

Mr. Fisher: The minister would not care to comment on whether the government is satisfied with the actual level of the deficit; that nothing could have been done in the past year to make the deficit lower?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Naturally, Mr. Chairman, the extraordinarily large size of this deficit is a matter of very keen disappointment alike to the management of the railway and to the government. It is substantially more than the management had anticipated when they furnished an estimate to me a year ago. It was one of the elements entering into my forecast of the budgetary position of the government for the present fiscal year, and when I brought in the supplementary budget on December 20 I drew attention to the fact that one of the factors which had disappointed my hopes of a balanced budget, with a modest surplus, and turned those hopes into the certainty of a budgetary deficit this year, was this matter of the C.N.R. deficit.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fisher: Does this not raise in the minister's mind the question of the efficiency of the management of this particular concern?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No one can view this large deficit without being concerned about the whole operation. This is not to say, however, that the responsibility for the deficit should be attributed to some mismanagement. The fact is that the Canadian National Railways are expected to carry on operations on a very large scale and, in the face of a contraction of railway freight, it is not possible for railways quickly to adjust their budgetary position. There is a good deal of inflexibility in our railway structure in Canada. The companies operating railways are not in a position to make quick adjustments to meet the financial situations that they face in consequence of fluctuations in the volume of railway traffic.

In this particular case the management has suffered a disappointment in its hopes and indeed in its forecast of its operating position for 1960. They did expect a very much better result when they surveyed the situation in 1960 and made their first estimate of the probable results of operations.

Mr. Fisher: Perhaps I could just close my remarks by saying I am sure the minister would not mind me at least expressing my doubts about the efficiency of the management of the Canadian National Railways in the light of this deficit.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister say whether the government has in mind any plans to merge the two railway systems?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, I did not catch the first part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say whether the government has any plans ultimately to merge the two railway systems in Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. I may say with regard to this subject in general that, as usual, this matter will be before a sessional committee and the officials of the Canadian National Railways will be appearing before that committee to answer questions on the 1960 operations.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, may I take only a few moments of the time of the house, under item 741 of the supplementary estimates, to say a few words on a matter that was raised by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) on March 13 last. It dealt with the 160 C.N.R. employees who will be laid off shortly unless the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) makes less timid representations than he has made so far, in order that these employees, which include some older people, will not be thrown out of a job following the vacating by the C.N.R. of two buildings that have been sold to the government of the province of Quebec.

If unemployment is everyone's responsibility, the Minister of Transport in this case has a moral responsibility to make every effort to prevent the lay-off of these 160 employees.

I leave it at that for the time being, but we shall be watching closely what the minister will do for these workers, and I hope the Minister of Transport will see that they are protected and are not thrown out on the street.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that is a matter that the committee of the house will have an opportunity to consider.

(Text):

Item agreed to.

General—

743. Trans-Canada Air Lines deficit, 1960—amount required to provide for payment to Trans-Canada Air Lines (hereinafter called the company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made by the company to the Minister of Finance, and to be applied by the company in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the company) arising in the calendar year 1960, subject to recovery therefrom of accountable advances made to the company from the consolidated revenue fund, $2,607,350.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say to what extent the deficit shown here was due to the competition from the once-a-day flights of Canadian Pacific Air Lines?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think one can isolate any one factor in this regard to connect it with the results of the year's operations. The fact is that Trans-Canada Air Lines anticipated a deficit this year of $2½ million. It proved to be slightly larger relatively. The figure is $2,607,350.

Mr. Fisher: Can the minister make a distinction between the forecast on the railroad side and the forecast in the case of Trans-Canada Air Lines? He has pointed out that Mr. McGregor's forecast was much closer to accuracy than that put forward by Mr. Gordon. The minister indicated earlier that the impact of economic circumstances explained the disappointing results in the case of the C.N.R. Can we take it that economic circumstances were less hard upon Trans-Canada Air Lines? If there is a recession one would assume it would affect both modes of transportation. I just wondered what reason the minister would give for the difference in the accuracy of the forecasts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is very hard to be precise in these matters. I am sure management, alike of Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines, did their best to make an accurate forecast both of operating revenues and operating expenses when the budgets for the two companies were prepared and submitted early in 1960. The operating revenues of Trans-Canada Air Lines were about $4 million less than the budget anticipated. The operating expenses, including depreciation, were about $2 million less and the interest payable was about $2.2 million less than anticipated in the budget.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I am getting a little tired of the aspersions that the hon. member for Port Arthur is making against Mr. Gordon. I have no brief for Mr. Gordon, but I believe in fair play and certainly the answer to the question that he asked the minister should be within his understanding.

I should like to elaborate on what the minister has said. It is well known to everyone that Trans-Canada Air Lines gets most of its revenue from carrying passengers while the revenue of Canadian National Railways comes mostly from the carriage of freight traffic. With the slowdown in our economy there has been a falling off in traffic, and I should think that accounts mainly for the difference in the forecasts between Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian National Railways.

Item agreed to.

744. Reimbursement of Department of Transport stores account for the value of stores which have become obsolete, unserviceable, lost or destroyed, $62,514.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister indicate the nature of the stores referred to in this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The list includes stores that were written off as obsolete or unserviceable totalling $52,569. This includes telecommunication spare parts, automotive spare parts, paints, metal and castings, food, printing and stationery forms, general hardware, plumbing supplies, electrical equipment and miscellaneous. Then there were some smaller amounts of losses. There was a write-off on stocktaking of $3,360.45, a further loss of $2,607.03 on account of thefts or other causes and, finally, stores destroyed to the value of $3,976.72.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to ask the minister whether he thinks it would be practical to include some of this basic information in the details of these votes. If he will consult what purport to be the details he will find that exactly the same information is given as is listed under the item. It seems rather wasteful and redundant to print details when the information given is no different from that contained under the item itself. I would ask the minister if it would be possible to alter the practice and, if not, what the purpose is in printing details.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The question of the form of the estimates is receiving study on the part of the committee on public accounts. The present form of the estimates, and this applies particularly to the main estimates, dates back about ten years. With respect to the point raised by the hon. member for Trinity, the estimates simply follow the form which has been in effect now for ten years. This matter is being studied in the public accounts committee and, as I have some responsibility in relation to the form in which estimates are presented to the house, I can assure the committee of my wish to co-operate fully with the public accounts committee.

Mr. Cardin: Can the minister inform the committee whether it is the practice of the government to make these obsolete stores available for sale through Crown Assets Corporation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. Any that have any value, of course, are disposed of through Crown Assets Corporation. We are only too glad to realize something on them when they have any value.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation branch—

746. Control of civil aviation including the administration of the Aeronautics Act and Regulations issued thereunder—further amount required, $58,000.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal lately, although I do not believe the matter has been the subject of discussion in the house, about the inability of the Department of Transport through this branch, I believe, to collect revenue from a number of international carriers to whom services are provided through various facilities under the control of the civil aviation branch. So far there has been no indication that this money is going to be collectible. I just wonder if the minister is in a position to give us any kind of report on this situation, and whether it is costing the department a considerable amount of money and effort, in terms of the service of its employees, to track down these people.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This subject, Mr. Chairman, at the present time is undergoing study by the international air transportation association. Beyond that I really cannot go at the present time. This item, of course, relates to the provision of funds for increased travelling expenses, hangar rentals at Malton airport and training for inspectors of civil aviation.

Item agreed to.

747. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—to extend the purposes of vote 446 of the main estimates, 1960-61, to provide authority to charge to that vote the cost of lands purchased by means of loans provided for the acquisition of land required to control properties in the vicinity of main terminal airports in order to prevent the erection of hazards to flying and for future development of new and existing main terminal airports including facilities for relieving congestion thereat, $1.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to shout "author", here if I were permitted to do so. I should like to know who is the author of the item which reads:

To extend the purposes of vote 446 of the main estimates, 1960-61, to provide authority to charge to that vote the cost of lands purchased by means of loans provided for the acquisition of land required to control properties in the vicinity of main terminal airports in order to prevent the erection of hazards to flying and for future development of new and existing main terminal airports including facilities for relieving congestion thereat.

Perhaps the minister would give us an interpretation of that item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told, Mr. Chairman, that the author of this composition is the solicitor to the treasury.

Mr. Fisher: What does it mean?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item is one in which I am not asking for any additional money. It is one of these one dollar items. What is sought is the extension of the terms of the vote contained in the Appropriation Act so as to include new services that were not previously covered. The vote in the main estimates was No. 491, which authorized loans up to $3 million to be used for the acquisition of lands to prevent the erection of hazards to flying in connection with future airport development. This is an annual item and has been in the estimates each year since the fiscal year 1954-55, when the major airport construction program was started. At the moment, land to a total value of more than $1 million is on the asset side of the balance sheet. It is proposed to transfer to current account the cost of these lands which were initially purchased through the loans account and which it is not intended to resell. It is for this purpose that this legislative authority is required.

As I say, there is no money involved beyond the nominal one dollar. It is a matter of providing legislative authority for the transfer of these lands to the current account.

Item agreed to.

Canadian maritime commission—

750. Steamship subventions for coastal services, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $692,779.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether this amount is to subsidize the ferry from Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, to Rockland, Maine, and does it refer to the ship, City of Havana?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman, it relates to the motor vessel Bluenose.

Mr. Fisher: I understand the Nova Scotia government is considering requesting subsidies for the three summer months for a service to supplement the service provided by the Bluenose on this particular run. I understand, further, that the ship in question is a foreign owned ship, the City of Havana. I just wondered whether or not the fact that this amount is in the estimates would indicate that no request came to the federal government for support for this ferry, the City of Havana?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not know about the City of Havana by name, but this item of $6,000 is payable to the contractor, Himmelman Supply Company Limited, for supplying transportation between Yarmouth and Rockland, Maine, for the carriage of fish, mainly lobsters, while the ferry service from Yarmouth to Bar Harbor was suspended during the annual refit of the Bluenose.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

754. Treatment and other allowances—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. Hellyer: I wish to draw to the attenition of the committee the necessity, in considering this item, to consider the revision of the War Veterans Allowance Act. The changes which were recently made in the Pensions Act have resulted in pensioners being cut off from the supplements provided by the war veterans allowance and, worse than that, these pensioners no longer receive certain medical benefits which were previously available to them.

I should like to suggest that the committee urge upon the government an early reconsideration of the War Veterans Allowance Act so that these people, who in many cases are very much in need, will receive proper consideration.

Mr. Winkler: I should like to say to the committee that this suggestion was made on numerous occasions during the consideration of the amendments to the Pensions Act. If one refers to Hansard, one will find that this request was made by most hon. members who spoke.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1961, the sum of $182,230,741 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-80, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1961.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, will you allow me to thank the house and the committee of supply for the co-operation that has been extended to this measure today by all hon. members. The proceedings could not have been carried to a conclusion without the co-operation of all hon. members in all parts of the house. I should just like to say that the adoption of the bill today, assuming that it is adopted in another place and receives royal assent this afternoon, means that it will now be possible to proceed with the issuance of approximately 150,000 cheques to veterans as well as others for payment of salaries and accounts. This can now be done.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INVESTMENT AND OTHER POWERS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. S-5, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—"British Company".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I just remind hon. members that this bill, following second reading on March 7, was referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. It has received at the hands of that committee a thorough review and has been reported back now without amendment. Not only was the committee assisted by Mr. MacGregor, the superintendent of insurance, but also there appeared before the committee representatives of the Canadian Life Officers Association. If I may paraphrase their statements to the committee, they indicated their satisfaction with the bill and hoped it might be passed.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 12—Municipal, etc., securities.

Mr. Hellyer: Before this clause carries, I should like to repeat my conviction with regard to the change in paragraph 5(b) as to the allowable mortgage which one of these companies may make on a dwelling unit. The amount has now been increased from 60 per cent to 66⅔ per cent. I am convinced that this increase is too small and that the government should have recommended to this House of Commons a more liberal evaluation. I have made the point in this chamber previously that the experience in other countries has shown that loans up to 75 per cent of the appraised value of the unit have been repaid without any serious losses. The experience there has proven beyond peradventure of a doubt that a much higher percentage of loan would be in order in the type of economic system that we presently enjoy.

I think it is a step in the right direction to increase the percentage from 60 per cent to 66 and ⅔ per cent. I think the mere fact that it was unanimously recommended by the insurance companies is an indication of what a conservative move it is. I know that many of these companies individually would have preferred to see the limit set much higher. Whereas last year in the house I suggested that an 80 per cent loan would be realistic under existing circumstances, I think that perhaps a compromise on 75 per cent at this time would be fairly generally agreeable.

May I state that I personally regret that the government has not seen fit to recommend a higher percentage than that included in this bill. I hope that the government, with the advice of the inspector, will see fit to recommend to the House of Commons in the near future a further revision which will increase the allowable loan at that time at least to 75 per cent of the appraised value.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I merely point out that to the knowledge of the insurance department no company has asked us for more than that 66⅔ per cent.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 to 36 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the sitting of the house could be suspended until you yourself resummon it at about a quarter to six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the house be suspended at the call of the Chair?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: To be signified by the ringing of the bell?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MR. DACOUGNA, FRENCH GUIANA—IMMIGRANT STATUS

Question No. 124—Mr. Argue:

1. Was Mr. Dacougna of French Guiana, who sought entry to Canada on September 22, 1960, considered to be a non-bona fide immigrant or non-immigrant?
2. If so, on what grounds?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1 and 2. Mr. Dacougna was ordered deported on the grounds that he was not, in the opinion of the special inquiry officer, a bona fide non-immigrant. (See section 5(p) of the Immigration Act.) At the time of his arrival in Canada he had insufficient funds to maintain himself for more than a few days. He gave several different reasons for coming to Canada, including one that he was seeking medical treatment (for which he did not have the funds to pay), and another that he was intending to marry a resident of Canada. His intended fiancée was known to him only through correspondence. Two previous applications for his permanent admission to Canada had been refused, on the grounds that he did not come within the admissible classes of immigrants whose admission is authorized by the Immigration Act and regulations. From the evidence given at the inquiry, the special inquiry officer came to the conclusion that, if Mr. Dacougna were allowed temporary entry to Canada, he might then seek to remain here. On these grounds, since Mr. Dacougna was not in the opinion of the special inquiry officer a bona fide non-immigrant, deportation was ordered.

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SERVICE—UNPLACED APPLICANTS

Question No. 143—Mr. McIlraith:

How many unplaced applicants were registered with the national employment service on the last date for which the information is available in each of the following cities:—Sydney, N.S.; Halifax, N.S.; Saint John, N.B.; Montreal, Que.; Vancouver, B.C.; Edmonton, Alta.; Calgary, Alta.; Winnipeg, Man.; Port Arthur-Fort William, Ont.; Toronto, Ont.; Hamilton, Ont.; Windsor, Ont.?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

Halifax, N.S.	6,976
Saint John, N.B.	3,586
Montreal, P.Q.	90,646
Vancouver, B.C.	37,763
Edmonton, Alta.	21,187
Calgary, Alta.	13,467
Winnipeg, Man.	28,613

C.N.R. AUTOMATIC YARD CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 145—Mr. Badanai:

1. How many automatic yards are being built by the Canadian National Railways?
2. What are the locations of these yards?
3. What is the cost of each?
4. How many men will these yards displace?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Four.

2 and 3.

Location	Estimated cost (millions)
Moncton	$15.0 (includes diesel shop)
Montreal	32.2 (includes diesel shop)
Toronto	43.0 (includes diesel shop and proposed freight shed
Winnipeg	24.2 (includes diesel shop)

4. The yards are being constructed to provide faster and better service to customers through greater efficiency in operations with the objective of producing increased railway traffic volume, which would, of course, maintain or enlarge employment opportunities. As each yard nears completion, yard masters, yard foremen, switch tenders and clerical forces are being retrained in the new skills required. When the yards are fully operational, adjustments will occur some of which will be taken care of by normal attrition. At the same time, retraining measures are being undertaken to provide, wherever possible, alternate employment. Therefore, the displacements which may actually occur are not immediately ascertainable.

D.B.S.-LABOUR STATISTICS—JOINT MONTHLY RELEASE

Question No. 152—Mr. Pitman:

1. Has there been any change in the distribution of the joint monthly release of the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics over the last six months?

2. If so, what are the reasons?
3. Are the official monthly national employment service figures available from the regional offices of the national employment services?
4. Are national employment service figures broken down into categories, such as unskilled, clerical, etc?
5. If so, are these statistics available through local national employment service offices?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. Figures representing the total number of persons registered for employment with local offices of the national employment service are released from time to time.

4. For internal operational purposes these figures are broken down into a number of occupational categories.

5. See 3 and 4.

Note: When compiled, national figures on registrations for employment are published in the Labour Gazette, broken down into several occupational categories.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—LOCAL OFFICE REPORTS TO OTTAWA

Question No. 153—Mr. Pitman:

1. How often do the local offices of the unemployment insurance commission report to Ottawa on such administrative matters as registrations, refunds, claimants, etc?

Questions

2. Is this information compiled monthly?
3. If so, when in each month is it made available to the government?
4. Are these statistics normally made available to persons outside those employed in government service?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. Reports containing information as to the number of claims registered, the disposition of these claims, the number of active claimants, etc., are made monthly by local offices to Ottawa. No reports of refunds are made to Ottawa as these are dealt with at regional offices.

2. Yes.

3 and 4. The information regarding claims is contained in the "Statistical Report on the Operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act", published by the dominion bureau of statistics usually within seven weeks of the end of the month to which the material pertains. This report is available to the public on a subscription basis.
