Progressive Conservative Party who had that view of people who raised the question of the environment and that is the view that most of them still have. I believe that a few of them over there do not, but most of them still have that view, they have just learned how to talk differently while doing what they always wanted to do. And that is to have uncritical economic growth without regard to the environmental consequences.

You will recall, Madam Speaker, I hope, the story about how in the old days the miners used to take canaries down into the mine. The reason they had the canaries down in the mine was that when the canaries died they figured it was time to get out of the mine. It was a sign that the air was not fit to breath and they would get out of there as fast as they could.

With respect to both the Canadian environment and the international environment, the canaries are dying all over the place. The canaries come in different forms. The canaries come in the form of beluga whales in the St. Lawrence River. The canaries come in the form of cod fish off Newfoundland that are disappearing. The canaries come in the form of fish in the Great Lakes that have weird tumors and other genetic and mutational problems. The canaries are dying all over. In fact, actual species are dying all over all the time.

Mr. Fulton: Twenty thousand a year.

Mr. Blaikie: The hon. member for Skeena said 20,000 a year. The canaries are dying all over the place and what is this government doing? They are kind of having lunch down in the mine debating about how they can dig deeper instead of reviewing the whole project, instead of saying—

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): They are eating the canaries.

Mr. Blaikie: Somebody said they are eating the canaries. But this is a very serious analogy. What the government is doing is not paying attention to all the signs around us that we are on the verge of a global, ecological catastrophe which will precipitate an economic catastrophe that will make all this blather about deficits look trivial.

The real deficit, the deficit that cannot be paid off if it is not paid off soon, is the environmental deficit. When you are constantly borrowing and not putting back clean air, clean water, fertile soil, trees that take hundreds of years to grow, you are building up a deficit and a deficit that cannot be paid back, a deficit that makes the fiscal deficit, which is the preoccupation of this government, morally insignificant. Yet, the government carries on as if it thinks it can carry on like this forever. The fact of the matter is that we cannot carry on like that.

All that this motion asks the government to do is to put aside lands that are already there. You do not have to stop any development that is already happening. These are lands that are there but do not, as yet, have the appropriate legal and institutional protection. You do not have to tear anything down. What does the government do? It opposes this motion and gets up, like the Minister of the Environment did, on an entirely spurious point of order and argues that the government cannot support this motion because it is a non-confidence motion.

We would like to make things easy for the government. We would like to move, and I so move, an amendment, that the motion be amended by adding, after the words "marine zone", the following:

> "and, that for the purposes of clarification, this question not be considered a matter of confidence in the government."

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I will take the amendment under advisement and come back to the House. I am not sure whether this amendment is in order or not.

A point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, with respect, I do not think there is a lot to take under advisement. This is an amendment which is quite in order. Quite frankly, I do not see any reason why the Chair could not accept it at this point so we could proceed to debate the motion as amended.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I believe you would find, were you were to ask, that both the mover and seconder of the main motion are perfectly happy to have the motion as it is before the House, so amended.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair, along with the officers at the table, feel that there may be a problem with accepting this amendment as is. I would ask the House to please allow me to take it under advisement for a few minutes and then I will get back to the House.

I will now proceed to the period of question and comments.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I know the hon. member is very much aware of the remarks of the Minister of the Environment this morning. We know that there are 39 bioregions in Canada and 21 of the bioregions are presently represented by the 34 national parks that we have. There are 18 bioregions that are still not represented, the majority of which are south of 60.

In the minister's response this morning on this motion, he indicated that there are four national parks and four different bioregions north of 60 that are under consideration. One happens to be in the member's own province, which is the Churchill proposal for Canada's first national park dedicated principally to the preservation of the polar bear.

That still leaves 13 bioregions unrepresented. The minister suggested this would be the Conservative government's master plan, they would complete these five, perhaps others, but five between now and 1995. This would leave 13 bioregions unrepresented and 26 marine biophysical regions unrepresented. Since only 54 per cent of the land areas have managed to obtain national park status since 1885 when the first national park was created, that being Banff, I wonder if the hon. member would, first; touch on the proposal vis–à–vis the province of Manitoba, that being the only one suggested south of 60 and second; whether or not that target and timetable is likely to achieve what is being suggested by the minister's own task force, where it was stated definitively that if we do not complete the national park system between now and the year 2000, it simply cannot be because of developmental pressures that are making it impossible.

I wonder if the member could take a moment to talk about how realistic the government's proposal is and what kind of forces might there be out there that the Prime Minister and the cabinet might be listening to instead of the 96 per cent of Canadians who, when polled, say they want the national park system completed.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, it seems to me that the import of what the minister said with respect to his plan for only completing another four or five parks by 1995 is that he has basically written off the rest of the country that is eligible to have a national park and that has been designated as eligible in various plans produced by the government over the years.

There are various marine bioregions and the other eight or nine bioregions beyond the four or five already planned and these are to be written off. Why do we say that?

It is not as if the government has 150 years to do this. If it did, then it could say, "This is proceeding in an orderly fashion", as governments have said for the last 100 years. But we do not have that kind of time left, we have to do things in a hurry. We know that species disappear because of the effect of many environmental problems. The damage which is done to the ecosystems is not a gradual thing which happens, to use a mathematical analogy in a sort of 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 sort of way. It happens in a 2, 4, 8, 16, 32, and 64 kind of way, exponentially. Perhaps the hon. member would think it useful if I recited a story which I think illustrates what we are talking about.

Imagine, Madam Speaker, that there is a pond which used to be covered by lily pads, starting out with one lily pad, in a period of 28 days. So you start with one lily pad, two lily pads, four lily pads, 8, 16, 32, 64. I am trying to make it understandable to members on the other side of the House. It proceeds in this way and on the twenty–eighth day the pond will be completely and totally covered. Ask yourself, Madam Speaker, what will be the situation in the pond on the twenty–seventh day? On the twenty–seventh day half the pond will be uncovered. On the twenty–seventh day it would be possible for those who do not understand the situation to be sitting on a lily pad somewhere and saying to those who are saying "You'd better get out of here fella, the pond is going to be covered very, very soon". It is very possible for others to be sitting there saying "What are you worrying about, what's the rush? We have half the pond left". What happens on the twenty–eighth day, Madam Speaker?

Bingo! The pond is covered. That is the way environmental problems work.

I do not know whether we are on the twenty-seventh day or whether we are on the twenty-sixth day or whether we are on the twenty-fifth day. Some people think we are on the twenty-seventh day.

Recently I told this story to David Suzuki and he said to the hon. member for Skeena that he thought we might be on the twenty-seventh or twenty-eighth day, somewhere in there. I hope not. I know that we are in the twenties. If we do not act fast, one of these days we are going to wake up to a world that we should be held criminally responsible for by our grandchildren.

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, I would like to refer the hon. members of the NDP caucus who have introduced this debate and have been participating in this discussion to some testimony that we received in the sub-committee on forestry yesterday and the previous day from the deans of three of Canada's leading universities. I would like to refer them particularly to the testimony of Dr. Gordon Baskerville of UNB. Yesterday, although frustrated by the bells which rang throughout the afternoon, we did get some very substantive testimony in which Dr. Baskerville described the process of sustainable development as he sees it happening and the whole business of forest management. This included wilderness areas and ecological reserves and all the multiple uses and integrated management perspectives with regard to our forests.

One of the points that he made very clear was that the imposition of constraints is not management. The concept of management is the concept of establishing, first of all, what we want to do with our forests, where we want to go with them and then working at developing how we are going to achieve those directions and what the management methods are going to be.

The question has been asked, what would the Minister of the Environment be waiting for in completing the national parks system or in working towards his objective of completing it by the year 2000. It may well be that he is waiting for the development in Canada of more sophisticated, comprehensive and substantive forms of management towards sustainable development, rather than the isolated, let's do it now, one constraint kind of approach that the members of the New Democratic Party seem to favour.

The multiple use of our forests is fundamental to the interests of all Canadians. One of the things that we have to do, first of all, is to decide how we want to use those forests and what portions we want for ecological reserves and for wilderness areas.

I would like to ask all three of the members who spoke in the few minutes I have been here this afternoon, if they will undertake to read the testimony of the three deans of forestry presented to the subcommittee here in Ottawa this week.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the hon. member does not seem to grasp the time line that we are talking about, the fact that we have so very little time. He has not appreciated that. He wants to talk about management. His concept of management just cannot grasp the whole notion of leaving things alone, of letting them be what they are in creation, for all time. He just cannot get a handle on that.

According to this concept of management, all those full-growth forests out there, be they trees of 800 years or 400 years or whatever, have been poorly managed for 800 years, because nobody was in there doing management. God is a poor manager, it would seem.

What is at stake is the view of a consumer material society which I think is condemned rather well in Luke 12, Chapter 20:19, where it says:

> 19. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou has ampled goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry.
> 20. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee; and the things you have prepared, whose will they be?

That is the kind of time line we are dealing with when it comes to the global environment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period of questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate with the hon. member for Rosedale.

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I must say I am somewhat intrigued by the last comments of the member for Winnipeg Transcona. He and I share at least one profession in common, but I think he has fallen into a very large trap, and I may have to remind him of it during the course of the next few minutes.

First of all, I want to say how delighted I am that the member for Skeena has raised this matter by way of an opposition day motion. I think all members of all sides agree in the importance of the subject that has been raised here this afternoon. He has already read the statistics into the record about the kind of overwhelming public support there is. I do not think there can be any doubt about that whatsoever.

In addition, I would say there is very strong agreement on all sides of the House with respect to the importance of preserving for posterity the 39 ecological zones. One assumes that the total representative sampling of the land base of Canada, plus, I think, some 26 marine zones that would give a proper representation to that aspect of our resource heritage.

There are two things that are fundamental here this afternoon. One is the agreement that we must have a full representative sample preserved while it is still possible. I guess the second point is that we must do it within a reasonable time period. A lot has been made of the fact of how long it has taken us during the first more than one and a quarter centuries to get to the stage where we are at today, which is roughly about 50 per cent of our over-all national objective.

What I am troubled by, and I hope the member will listen carefully to what I am going to say—

Mr. Blaikie: I'm all ears.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Well, I was not going to say anything about your physical characteristics—

• (1550)

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): What I am troubled by are two things that seem to be running in train here. One is that somehow an opposition member can introduce a debatable motion which, on its merits or on some of its merits at least, should then allow us to totally forget the context in which we are having this discussion. I know the member has been here for some years and with some intermission I have been here a few years myself. And if there is anything I have learned in this Chamber, not just in this Parliament but in fact in any of the parliamentary traditions in operation, is that when one is discussing supply and when a motion is moved by any opposition member, that is a matter of confidence in the government. There can be no other interpretation.

An hon. member: Not true.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Well, I am sorry. My friend from Winnipeg says, "Not true". I think he has either a short-term memory or a somewhat inspired and selective view of the rule changes introduced by the—

Mr. Blaikie: We changed the rules while you were away.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Listen, my friend, listen carefully. There is no way that any committee recommending rule changes can change the essential character of the debate on supply.

Mr. Milliken: Look at the precedents.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): My other friend has come here a little more recently. He better look through all the precedents and realize that on the issue of supply, which I think covers at least seven centuries of parliamentary history, when an opposition member moves a motion, whatever that motion is, and that motion comes to a vote, it can be nothing more than a motion of confidence in the government of the day.

I am sorry the member for Davenport is unavoidably absent at the moment because I think he would have great difficulty in disagreeing with this. He sat for many years in a government that argued this case night and day. Several of my colleagues on this side of the House know that we use some of these same hoary arguments, but they do not hold water; they will not hold water. I think it is foolish in the extreme to waste the time of the House in debating what a former Prime Minister and distinguished parliamentarian said were rabbit tracks. We are not interested in rabbit tracks this afternoon. We are interested in the central objective which I think the member for Skeena properly introduced which is the achievement of a full representative sampling of these ecological zones in a reasonable time period. That is the issue. That is what we want to achieve and no amount of phoney struggling with the rules should get in the way of that objective. I am sorry, I think our friends to our left are being badly misled in trying to divert this to some kind of phoney debate about what is possible or not possible in a votable motion on supply. It is one of the fundamental traditions that makes the parliamentary system work.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is arguing this point. He seems to be getting into a point of order on the question of the admissibility of the amendment, and so on. I know he is not directing his remarks specifically to that. I would like to refer him to Beauchesne's sixth edition on page 257 and I quote citation 926 of that edition:

> Formerly, the votable motions presented on allotted days were defined by Standing Order to be automatically motions of no-confidence. Following the recommendations of the Special Committee on Standing Orders and Procedure, and the Special Committee on the Reform of the House of Commons, these references have been omitted from the Standing Orders.

And citation 927 reads:

> A motion on an allotted day, although not put forward as a votable motion, has been deemed, with unanimous consent, to have been carried unanimously.

Now, clearly these motions can be carried and they cannot, in those circumstances, be considered to be motions of confidence or else, when they had been carried, even unanimously, the government would have been out on its ear. The rules have changed and I ask the hon. member to recognize that fact.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, the member is a distinguished member of the bar, which I am not, has practised at the bar for some years. He is a relatively new parliamentarian. I invite him to review parliamentary practice. I was not a member when that report, whatever one it was, was agreed to unanimously, but I can tell you that if he thinks simply by the passage of that particular rule or report we have changed the nature of the fundamental way in which Parliament operates, he is very much mistaken.

Mr. Blaikie: Why change the rules then?.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Why do we bother having votes on days of supply if—

Mr. Blaikie: What's the point of changing the rules. Don't bother me with rules, I have my own idea of Parliament.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): I would think if you really want to give up, give up. I was here when we had most of supply on the floor of this House. If you really want to give up one of the important items left for an opposition, to represent and to register on a regular basis, both by way of debate and vote, its opposition to current government practice or stewardship then that is a very large decision. I do not hear the leader of your party or the leader of the official opposition arguing that they want to give up that important and fundamental parliamentary instrument. So I think you had better go back to the drawing board if you think—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Rosedale has, as he has said himself, been a member of this House for quite awhile and he should know that he should address the Chair.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): I apologize, Madam Speaker. I guess in my enthusiasm of how important I feel it is to retain these particular fundamental parliamentary aspects that I would not want to see for the sake of some short-term or superficial game—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Rosedale astounds me. He is entitled to have his own interpretation of how he thinks Parliament works and what the rules may have been before he left here in 1984, but the fact is that in 1985, and as is recorded right here in the annotated Standing Orders, says:

> In 1985 the Standing Orders were further amended by removing the no-confidence reference.

That happened in 1985. That did not not happen, it happened. The fact of the matter is that when opposition parties want to move motions that, in their judgment, are critical of the government, they are free to do so and the government is free to vote against them. In this case, we have moved something which is consistent with government policy and the government, instead of supporting the motion, has hidden behind the false and completely spurious claim that this is a motion of non-confidence. I have more confidence in the hon. member than that to think that he would get up and make an argument to the contrary. I have never seen such sophistry in my whole life.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Maybe before we do resume debate we will take a second of the House's time to rule on the amendment which was presented by the hon. member a few minutes ago. We did look for some kind of a precedent and did not. I will have to rule this amendment out of order and I will refer the hon. member to Article 437 which says:

> An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

The main motion deals strictly with the environment.

I would also refer the hon. member to Article 482 which says:

> On an allotted day during consideration of the business of supply, an amendment must not provide the basis for an entirely different debate than that proposed in the original motion.

That is exactly what we are getting into right now, so I will declare the amendment out of order and we will resume debate on this motion on the environment.

A point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, if I understand your ruling correctly, you are saying that it would be inappropriate for us to have an amendment which designates this as a matter of non-confidence because it is already not a matter of confidence. Is that how I am to understand your ruling, Madam Speaker, that—

An hon. member: The amendment is out of order because it is not needed as the Standing Orders already provide for it.

Some hon. members: Order, order!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The reason which I have given the hon. member is that the amendment is not related directly to the main motion. He may want to reread Article 437 and I think it will make it very clear.

Resuming debate, the hon. member—on a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

• (1600)

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, earlier Mr. Speaker refused to rule on a point of order that I made with respect to confidence and the nature of this motion. You have now made a ruling on an amendment which had to with the language of confidence, making it clear that this motion was not a motion of non-confidence. I therefore want to ask you, Madam Speaker, what your interpretation is of the statement in the annotated Standing Orders on page 279 where it says:

> In 1985 the Standing Orders were further amended by removing the "no-confidence" reference—.

What does that mean, Madam Speaker? Perhaps you could tell us for the erudition of myself and the hon. member for Rosedale. Perhaps that means something entirely different from what it appears to say. If it does, I would like to know about it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The article which the hon. member just read simply means that Standing Orders were amended and different words were removed. As far as whether or not this motion is a confidence motion, the government decides if a motion coming from the opposition is a confidence motion or not. At this time it seems to the Chair that the government has chosen to see it as a confidence motion.

With regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member, it is out of order.

Mr. Blaikie: Perhaps now someone from the government will get up and say why this is a matter of confidence according to them instead of according to some archaic view of parliament that has no relationship to the Standing Orders. If the government wants to make this a matter of confidence, perhaps the member for Rosedale could say why the passing of a motion in compliance with government policy is a matter of confidence as far as the government is concerned and stop hiding behind his interpretation of rules that no longer exist.

S. O. 81—NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I would be delighted to move to discuss the content of the motion because I think that is the essential issue here today. I would also be happy to indicate why we on this side of the House find difficulty in supporting the whole of this motion and that may be helpful to the member for Skeena, the member for Winnipeg Transcona and others on the opposite side.

We concur with the notion that we should take all necessary measures to complete the country's system of national parks. Clearly, as I said earlier, we have to gain a complete representation of the ecological zones and do that, I hope, by the end of the century. I would also say there are several reasons why we do not share the hon. member's proposition that we should set a figure as some kind of an absolute figure. I want to quote from one organization that the member for Skeena and I, and hopefully most other members, would take very seriously in this whole process and that is the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources.

They do not advocate the use of any percentage formula for determining how much of a country's land and water area should be set aside for national parks, wilderness, or any other type of protected area. The ICUN is an international network of governments from more than 100 countries, together with 450 non-governmental organizations, scientists and other conservation experts whose goal is to promote the protection of the world's heritage resources.

This expert committee which was founded in 1948 considers it more important to focus its attention on developing a strict definition of what constitutes a national park and encouraging countries throughout the world to adhere to these national park criteria than on establishing some arbitrary formula. Since the mid 1960s the ICUN has urged all countries to adopt what they refer to as the "natural regions concept" to guide the development of their respective systems of national parks or equivalent reserves in a systematic manner.

The beauty of this scientific approach is that it clearly sets out the number of natural parks required for a complete system, provides a straighforward means of measuring progress toward this goal and ensures that when the national parks system is completed it will protect a comprehensive and representative sampling of the country's landscape and natural phenomena. Canada, along with the United States which has been moving on this as well, was one of the first countries in the world to adopt the ICUN approach for planning its network of national parks.

I want to say that if we start there, we have a very strong measure of agreement. I would also like to point out that in achieving the over-all objective, there are several major hurdles that we have to overcome. I want to mention two this afternoon. There has been almost no reference to these two which are fundamental to achieving the very goals that the member for Skeena and others fully support.

One is the whole notion of establishing a complete mapping inventory of the country. I want to quote Monte Hummel who in a press release of September 6 released a very important document. Members will recall that several weeks ago I held up the Endangered Spaces document as an important move by 100 voluntary agencies to mobilize hundreds of thousands of Canadians around achieving the very goals that everybody in this House supports. There have been some disparaging remarks about the commitment of the Minister of the Environment. I want to tell you what was said just last December by 40 conservation groups from across Canada, and I quote from their own press release:

> —joined today in unanimously congratulating Environment Minister Lucien Bouchard for his pledge to complete the national parks system by the year 2000.

Now that does not sound like some kind of half-hearted, not quite sure, insufficient support. We have to be very careful about the extent to which we engage in some kind of partisan debate and weaken the kind of cross-party support that made the South Moresby motion possible. It was a very specific and a different context motion that was put, as members have been reminded here today. That is the kind of process we have to replicate.

Hummel made it very clear in September that if we are going to move specifically and practically in this area, certain things have to be done. I quote one paragraph of Hummel:

> Right now 8 of the 12 provinces or territories have mapped their natural regions. But only 6 have set targets, i.e. clearly identified candidate protected areas for their natural regions. Only four jurisdictions are 50 per cent or more down the road to completing their plans, which means we likely have 150 to 200 more parks to create.

—most of those obviously being provincial.

> Only two jurisdictions have obtained Cabinet approval for their park systems plans, and one of these is Quebec where there is currently a moratorium on the establishment of new parks. And no jurisdiction has committed itself to completing its parks system plan by the year 2000. In fact, no jurisdiction has attached any time limit to this task. I should emphasize, that this analysis is based on information provided to the WWF by the provinces and territories themselves.

Those are the facts of the situation. If we hope to really move ahead as a country, as a Parliament, all three parties together, we have to take the challenge of knowing exactly what we are about and urging the various jurisdictions to follow through in having a complete blueprint, as is being urged by the endangered species campaign. It is incredibly important.

I want to read into the record the words of His Royal Highness Prince Phillip, who wrote the forward to this campaign, who is the honorary international president of the World Wildlife Fund. He wrote this with respect to this campaign and this country:

> Canada has an almost unique opportunity to ensure that future generations will be able to see examples of the state their land was in before the rush for development and exploitation began. The task is to conserve a whole range of viable ecosystems and habitats, covering all the country's natural regions. It is also necessary to ensure that those human activities that impinge directly on the natural environment, such as forestry, farming and commercial fishing, adopt sound conservation practices.

That statement by His Royal Highness, again clearly states the challenge that faces us all. We are not operating in some kind of isolation. We are not in some kind of an ivory tower. We must work with others. We must, in the first instance, work with the provinces.

I am frankly amazed that we have not heard either from the NDP or the official opposition a clear acknowledgement that the provinces must be directly and helpfully involved.

The hon. member for Davenport made the remark in his statement that this government had completed projects initiated by his Liberal friends. Why was that? One reason was because we changed the approach. We were prepared to work with and not simply to move in unilaterally and get the kind of mix-up in delays and dilemmas that Kouchibouguac in New Brunswick resulted in and several others.

We want to see a realization of this plant and the minister, I think very realistically and methodically, laid out the five initial parks that he hopes can be a part of that package. I would say quite frankly that I hope that that is a minimum and not a maximum objective. If we are going to reach by the end of this decade those 39 zones and those 18 new parks, that strikes me more like two a year than one a year. To that extent, I would certainly support the hon. member for Skeena in seeing if we can reach that stage.

I want to say quite directly and simply that unless we acknowledge the realities of putting the park system together, knowing what we are doing, working with our closest partners, working with the major economic and social sectors across the country, we will achieve nothing. I hope that members on all sides of the House realize the importance of that.

I simply want to say in conclusion that the government is not in a position to move unilaterally to set aside 12 per cent of any province's lands and waters for wilderness protection or for national park purposes. The protection of wilderness is not solely a federal responsibility but one that must of necessity be shared with provincial governments and other jurisdictions.

It is hoped that by striving to complete the national park system within a reasonable time frame, such as by the year 2000, the federal government will encourage the provinces and territories to give similar priority to the completion of their respective systems of provincial and territorial parks, ecological reserves, wildlife areas and other categories of protected areas that they administer.

In my view, the completion of each jurisdiction's system of protected areas following the systematic approach that has long been advocated by the international union for the conservation of nature will contribute far more to the protection of this country's environment than simply the setting aside of some arbitrary figure, whether it is 12 per cent or any other and will achieve in the end the very results that the hon. member for Skeena and I believe all members of this House hope to achieve.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member for Rosedale has moved away from the rather spurious argument that has been going on for a good chunk of the day about some kind of threat to the government. Frankly, I have been a great supporter of the Minister of the Environment until today. The speech he gave in this House related to the completion of the national parks system and the reasons upon which he did not want to consider the 12 per cent target were absolutely without foundation. I think the minister will have to deal with me and many members of this House on different grounds from this point on.

I would like to ask the member to respond because he raised a number of arguments that I think need to be fleshed out somewhat. In the document provided by the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee and others, which I referred to earlier today, to the minister when he took office a year ago, one of the points that is made is point number three on parks, and states: "By the reckoning of experts world wide the opportunity to complete the national network in Canada will all but vanish by the year 2000 as development and land-use commitments overtake our last frontiers." This concern was emphasized by the task force on national park establishment in its 1987 report to the federal environment minister entitled "Parks 2000".

The concern that I have, and the minister alluded to when the member was here, the four potential national parks north of sixty and one south of sixty leave 13 bioregions south of sixty with no representation whatsoever. A number of our bioregions in fact have more than one representation.

There are 34 national parks now. There are two national marine parks out of the 27 marine biophysical regions. I want to give one other quote to the member before he answers. That was given in 1960 by Alvin Hamilton who was the minister responsible for national parks. In his plea to Canadians, now 30 years ago, he said and I quote: "It is my feeling as minister in charge of parks, that it is about time all those millions of people in Canada who use the parks and love them, should band together and form themselves into a national parks association. How can a minister stand up against the pressures of commercial interests who want to use the parks for mining, forestry, for every kind of honky-tonk recreational device known to man unless the people who love these parks are prepared to band together and support the minister by getting the facts out across the country."

I suggest to the member for Rosedale that is precisely what is happening now across the country, but the government is not listening.

On the final point, that he must respond to in relation to the provinces, I have a very short quote again on Canada in a global context:

> Between 1885 and 1929, Canada established 15 national parks. But with the transfer of natural resources in western Canada to the provinces in 1930, the national-parks program ground to a halt. Only four parks were established in the next twenty years: Cape Breton Highlands in 1936, Prince Edward Island in 1937, Fundy in 1948, and Terra Nova in 1957.

It is a situation that requires really serious national leadership and a response to those pressures that the minister must respond to from the provinces, the territories, the first nations and those who are here in Ottawa every day demanding of the government that there be no further movement on parks or ecological reserves, those who are the major developers in this country.

It is my view—and I think it is widely held in this country—that a very strong vote or a unanimous vote from this Parliament is the only way to give the tools necessary to the Minister of the Environment to deliver on this last opportunity to complete the national parks system.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I would have to say to the hon. member for Skeena that I am somewhat disappointed to hear his opening comments because he only has to think about the most recent example of South Moresby. If he wants to achieve the kind of unanimity and progress that I think he is looking for, there are ways of doing it, not by way of a motion that not only that has been put, but by the nature of the debate that I have listened to over the course of the last several hours. I simply say that as a piece of friendly advice.

I think that one has to balance off some of the more critical things that were said here today. Again, I repeat part of what came from the World Wildlife Fund on December 12 in reference to the Minister of the Environment:

> The minister's historic commitment demonstrates clear federal leadership in our campaign to protect Canadian wilderness areas.

I do not want to hold Mr. Hummel to that, but he said it not too long ago. I think it is an indication that he recognizes there is a serious attempt being made.

I would like to think that the member for Skeena, and others, recognize that and are prepared to work with it to make it happen. We are going to have to work together. If I can put it very bluntly the greatest problem in achieving this is not, in my view, back and forth across this floor. It is all over parts of the rest of the country, as the member knows only too well from his province of British Columbia, I think we have to develop a strategy.

What pleases me most about the Endangered Spaces campaign is that it puts most of its focus on Canadians. I have to say to the member that statistics are fine. Ninety-seven per cent may want to see the park system completed but I know that when the crunch comes—and it is going to mean some allocation of moneys and some reallocation of resources and it will likely affect some transition for people in traditional occupations—real issues are going to surface that are going to have to be dealt with, as the member knows only too well. I think we have to make sure that we make progress, that we get beyond the kind of bleak record that occurred between 1930 and the 1960s.

On that score I hope we can develop. Maybe today's debate can be a springboard into a real strategy. We only have this decade, in my view, to do it and we need to have a very clear cut strategy to make that happen.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, in his speech the hon. member indicated that the government was unable to accept this motion because to do so would constitute a question of confidence in the government. There is a precedent that runs contrary to that.

On Friday, November 24, last year, in this House, the then hon. member for Oshawa, Mr. Broadbent, moved a motion concerning child poverty in Canada. That motion was moved on a supply day as the opposition motion on that day and at the end of debate on that day the motion was carried unanimously by the House.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is here today, participated in that debate and supported the motion fully. I invite the hon. member for Rosedale to review the provisions of that day and come back to the House a little later and tell us that, in fact, the government agrees with this motion, the government does not regard it as a matter of confidence, and will adopt the motion so that the motion can be carried by the House.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, if I may reply just briefly. I remember that day very well. I remember there were several things about it that were significantly different, not the least of which is that I believe the motion was put in such a way as it did not create a similar situation. I think we have had a frank discussion here. The minister has said it and I have repeated it with respect to the 12 per cent. This is not something that we would feel comfortable in adopting, both in terms of its principle and in terms of its reality particularly with respect to the way in which we are going to deal with the other key players which are the 10 provinces and two territories.

One has to be realistic about this. It is all well and good to try and take a sort of precedent, and that is all I would refer to it in this instance, and try to incorporate it as a valid objection. In this instance, I think it is mixing apples and oranges, quite frankly.

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, I would like to add my comments in support of those expressed by the hon. member for Rosedale, that whether this is a confidence motion or whether it is not, I would vote against this motion on the basis of the commitment to a specific percentage of land and water resources of this country.

Mr. Blaikie: No specifics.

Mr. Bird: No. As a matter of fact I would like to read a paragraph from page 35 of the New Democratic Party document on the environment called "Towards a Sustainable Future", which I understand was authored by the hon. member for Skeena. It says, and I quote it in the context of my earlier words on sustainable development and the comprehensive approach we must take. He said in his document: A royal commission on our forests should be established by the federal government. A complete assessment of the effects of ozone depletion, the greenhouse effect, acid precipitation, soil degradation and forestry should be included in the mandate of such a royal commission.

Other issues that should be addressed include the designation of protection for ancient forests and watersheds, the most appropriate technologies for harvesting, the impacts of monocultural replanning, alternatives to chemical pesticides and the effects of harvesting methods and existing plant and animal species to name some of the major issues identified.

He went on to recommend that a royal commission be established and that the forestry company be required by law to practice sustainable forest management.

This motion is the second that I can recall in the past few months that the hon. member for Skeena has put in an effort to Put a band-aid solution to the whole environmental question. He came up with a green stamp policy to move us toward sustainable development when in fact he knows that we spent months in our environment committee talking about carbon taxes, energy taxes and all kinds of incentives and disincentives toward sustainable development.

I just believe that he is trying as usual for a silver bullet that is not going to fix the environment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments is now over. Resuming debate.

Mr. Blaikie: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the reason the member for Rosedale did not rise to say anything in response is because the member who rose allegedly on a question or comment having to do with what the member for Rosedale said spent the entire time talking about what the member for Skeena said, who is not the member who had the floor.

I remind Madam Speaker that the interpretation given to the question and comment procedure was that whenever there was a person or a member rising of a party other than the party of the speaker who was speaking prior to the question and comment period, that that person should be recognized, rather than a member of the speaker's own party, which was not observed in this case.

It is on this point of order that I want to say that I regret that I did not have the opportunity to point out to the member for Rosedale that the book he quoted, Endangered Spaces, has a whole chapter devoted to what Parliament did with respect to South Moresby, the kind of thing that he has prevented happening here today.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I would like to say one thing to the hon. member. There was one member of each party recognized in that round of questions and comments. He might remember as well that his colleague, the hon. member for Skeena, who was the first one to be recognized after the speech of the hon. member for Rosedale, had an intervention that lasted close to six minutes of the ten minutes, so there were three short interventions from one member for each party. I think that this was as fair as could be.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am happy to rise here today in support of this motion. I would like to remind the House and the people of Canada what the motion is all about because it seems to me that we have spent so much time on the process of this House today that the people of Canada must wonder what we are doing here.

The opposition motion proposed by the member for Skeena reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should move to complete the national park system (land and marine) by the year 2000 and should implement the recommendation of the World Commission on Environment and Development (Brundtland Report) that Canada protect at least 12 per cent of land and marine zones.

What has absolutely boggled my mind today is the fact that for the last year this House has been working almost unanimously on this issue called the environment. The Minister of the Environment I think has done a good job in working with all members of this House to try and make sure that the objectives which we all share are met. I naturally want to cite one very specific example that happened in my riding last September, Our World, the summit on the environment where we had over 40,000 people talk about all issues related to the environment. It was a week long event.

I also want to remind the House that not only did the minister speak but also the member for Fredericton–York–Sunbury came and spoke. Everyone was invited. All parties participated and it was a great success. I do not remember at that time one speaker not referring to the Brundtland Commission as kind of the international guideline. The Prime Minister has stated repeatedly that the Brundtland Commission is the international guideline.

What concerns me about today's debate is that this will be the first government in the world to vote against the Brundtland Commission Report. I think that is a dangerous precedent because if there is one system related to the environment that we are all proud of as Canadians, it is our national parks and wildlife system. No one here is stating that the system is perfect but it is the one are where we can keep the momentum going. It is the one area where we have got a leg up not only in terms of our national pride but our international pride. When people think of Canada they do not think of our smoggy cities, they think about our parks and our rivers and our lakes and our mountains.

To have a precedent set today where the government is voting against such a basic motion is very dangerous. I think it will send the wrong signal to Canadians, that all of a sudden the lead House in this country, the national Chamber, is breaking down on an issue where we all are united. I have not been in this House as long as the member for Rosedale who also is my member of Parliament and I have great respect for him. But there has got to be a way to send the united signal to the people of Canada. I think that had better be done by Monday.

We all know that the Brundtland Commission has been supported by nearly every government in the world. The recommendation that our national park system today be complete by the year 2000 by the Brundtland standard is not an unrealistic objective. It is not an unrealistic objective because this is the one issue where Canadians are ahead of us politicians.

There are children watching in schools today who are going to be confused because they are going to see us wrangling over procedure. They are going to see the government against the Brundtland Commission. We are seemingly for national park completion alone. We know that is not the case. We know that the Minister of the Environment is for completion. I think that they have to take the leap and get on with this.

If we cannot look after and maintain our parks and wildlife areas, the questions that come to my mind are: Are we going to break down on the Brundtland Commission guidelines when it comes to how we are going to maintain our cities? How are we going to make them more liveable? What are we going to do when we need new national standards for automobile emissions, when we need new standards for waste and water treatment? Are we going to take the same approach, where all of a sudden we are going to find ways of maybe not following the Brundtland Commission guidelines? What is going to happen to our attitude toward sustainable farming and so on?

We have already seen another example in Bill C–29 respecting the Forestry Act where we have endorsed the Brundtland Commission. We also see many examples across the country where provinces are not living up to it.

When the member for Rosedale talks about the fact that these relationships are municipal and they are provincial, I agree with him, but it is up to this Chamber to take the lead. This Chamber leads not only Canada but is our voice abroad. It is a bad thing for us to send out a signal that we are not trying to achieve the international standard.

The issue of the environment has always been an issue on which I have taken an absolutely non–partisan approach. I think most members in this House know that I have taken that approach from day one. This is the one area where we must all work together. Let us not disappoint the people of Canada today and let us figure out a way, between now and Monday, that we can get ourselves back on track and make sure we meet the recommendations of the Brundtland Commission.

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, I would like to acknowledge the significant contribution of the hon. member who has just spoken to environmental awareness through the organizational efforts he put into the conference Our World in Toronto last year. I was pleased to be invited to speak on that occasion and I spoke on the subject of forestry and on the concepts of integrated management and sustainable development as they pertain to forestry.

I believe that we are united in our concern for the environment and in our desire to ensure that environmental imperatives permeate all the things we do and decisions we make in this government and in the affairs of this nation. I certainly am committed firmly in that direction.

What I am concerned about and what I would not support at this stage, as I have indicated in respect of this motion, is the absolutism of one particular resolution that identifies 12 per cent, 15 per cent or 8 per cent of our land. As the hon. member for Rosedale said, we are close to agreement on the objectives of this resolution. The Minister of the Environment said, on January 22, 1990:

> —our goal must be to complete the network of our parks by the year 2000.
> I have instructed my officials to work on a plan to include in the global action plan of the government a strategy to complete this network by the year 2000, with a clear commitment for the establishment of a certain number of parks within the next five years.

There is no question that we are going in the same direction.

However, I am not sure the hon. member who has just addressed the House was in the House when I spoke earlier this afternoon and made reference to the testimony of the deans of forestry of three of Canada's universities given at our subcommittee on forestry this week. In this testimony we were cautioned against quick fixes to sustainable development, against management by constraint instead of management by planning, by direction and by comprehensive, integrated, multiple use approaches to our environment. That is the reason I would not support this motion, and I would ask the hon. member if he would undertake to read that testimony. Hon. members of the New Democratic Party did not make that undertaking. I hope they will read the testimony because they will find in it an approach to sustainable development and an approach to the implementation of the principles of the Brundtland Report whereby we adopt its principles in a progressive, constructive and achievable manner, not just blindly as wild statements of principle for which we are not responsible.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, if I can respond to that, I think we are forgetting that the report of the Brundtland Commission was not some document basically dreamt up in the middle of the night which was recommending quick fixes. This is something on which some of the best and the brightest in the world have been working for years.

I am not trying to argue with the professors of forestry from New Brunswick. I will read their testimony. I guess my point is a communications point. There is an international perception that the Brundtland Commission is a respected credo. What is happening here today is a perceptual problem. The world recognizes that document as one on which we all must work to set standards and guidelines. The problem that we have today is that the Government of Canada is going to be voting against a Brundtland Commission guideline that has substance.

I know the hon. member is not against sustainable development, but this is going to make a very tough sell to not only the people of Canada but to the rest of the world, and that was my point.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the member who has just spoken. Before asking the question, I would just like to read the motion again so that we all have it clear in our minds:

> That, in the opinion of this House,—

That is what we are seeking through a vote in this House. It is not binding on the government. It is in the opinion of the House. It continues:

> —the government should move to complete the national park system (land and marine) by the year 2000—

This is the key wording on the 12 per cent:

> —and should implement the recommendation of the World Commission on Environment and Development (Brundtland Report) that Canada protect at least 12 per cent of land and marine zones.

There is no direct time deadline. We are simply seeking the opinion of the House to tell Canadians. That is why I worded it so carefully. I did not want to get into what everyone now claims as some kind of silver bullet and all these other things.

Referring to the point the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood was just making, in the concluding two articles of Chapter 6 of the Brundtland report there are these two points:

> Since 1970 the networks have expanded in extent by more than 80 per cent, around two-thirds of which are in the Third World. That is where the growth on protected lands are. But a great deal more remains to be done; a consensus of professional opinions suggests that the total expanse of protected areas needs to be at least tripled if it is to constitute a representative sample of earth's ecosystems.

That is true of our country, as with most. This is really the key wording:

> There is still time to save species and their ecosystems. It is an indispensable prerequisite for sustainable development. Our failure to do so will not be forgiven by future generations.

The Brundtland committee heard representatives from much of the world, the Third World as well as the developed world. Scientific opinion or consensus came to this conclusion and the entire body says that setting aside these areas is an indispensable prerequisite for sustainable development.

I would just like to hear, further on your remarks, why it is so important when there is not a deadline on the 12 per cent, but that is the international scientific consensus, and why it would be so wrong, for whatever reasons, for this Chamber to send out the wrong signal on turning down the fundamental building block of the Brundtland commission?

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I want to say that I am a late comer to this issue on the environment and that I respect the substantive knowledge of the member on this issue.

• (1640)

I want to speak directly about the issue related to my own riding of Broadview—Greenwood. The hon. member for Rosedale is my neighbour. The dirtiest and most polluted river in Canada flows through the middle of my riding. The Don Valley is 1,500 acres of wasted land right now in a city where 2.5 million people cannot even go for a walk. It has been lack of political will. It has been a lack of co-ordination of municipal, provincial and national government to work together.

The very thing that makes me nervous about what is happening today is that that national will we seem to have been galvanizing here in the last few months on this issue is going to break down.

I say this in a very self-serving way because it is the most polluted river in Canada and I do not want to see a step backward. If I get a feeling that the government is fudging on something that is easy in comparison to some of the more difficult problems like a Don River or a Don Valley, then I think it may be the beginning. Part of this game, and the hon. member for Rosedale said it, is mobilization or momentum. We cannot lose that at all. We must keep it up.

Mr. Flis: Madam Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the intervention of the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. He said that he was a latecomer. I wish we had more latecomers like him, especially on this topic.

He referred to the World Summit on the Environment in his area last fall. I attended that summit. What I was impressed with was the number of young Canadians out of the 40,000 who were there. If we want to save this planet I think we have to start changing people's attitudes, and what better way than to change the attitudes of the young users of this planet. I was very pleased. I would like to congratulate the hon. member for his leadership on the environment.

My question to the hon. member is: Has he considered taking that model and promoting it to other countries and other continents? I think that is the best way. If we can influence 40,000 people within a one-week summit, perhaps we have an ambassador here who can maybe save this planet. Has he considered moving that idea across the world?

Mr. Mills: I would like to thank the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park for his generous comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): If I may, I was advised at the start of this afternoon's proceedings that there would be some members who would only use 10 minutes and 5 minutes for questions and comments; in other words that they would share the 20-minute period. The hon. member did not mention that when he started his speech.

I realize that I must really put an end to this period of questions and comments, to be fair to every one, and recognize the hon. member for Halifax for her 10 minutes, followed by a period of 5 minutes of questions and comments.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I rise this afternoon in very strong support of this motion, in support of the comments and statements made by my colleague for Broadview—Greenwood, in support of the Brundtland report generally, and in support of a future for our country, for our children and for the world.

Protecting and preserving our environment is clearly the idea whose time has come. My colleague, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, said that he has recently come to the "apostleship" of the environment, and, as my colleague for Parkdale—High Park said, I welcome him with delight to that circle. A number of us who for a long time struggled in vain on the question of the environment can only look upon the developments over the last several years with an incredible relief and an incredible happiness. For too long a time, for the last 20 years in this country, small groups had been crying out as voices in the wilderness and receiving little or no response as rivers, such as the hon. member mentioned, became polluted to the point where people could not walk along their banks.

My own harbour in the magnificent city of Halifax became a sink hole and an open sewer. The beautiful harbour of one of the most picturesque villages in eastern Canada, Mahone Bay, was a place where people went for years in the summer to look at the water, to swim in the not terribly warm waters of the Atlantic, and to enjoy the marvellous hospitality on the south shore of Nova Scotia. Now when we walk along the beaches and along the coast at Mahone Bay, we are likely to see broken syringes, medical waste and other detritus of our over-industrialized society.

With the exception of perhaps some industries which still seem to have difficulty balancing goals of profit with the objective of preserving the planet, almost everyone now pays at least lip service to environmental protection. Almost everyone realizes the acceptance and the action of environmental plans and environmentally friendly sustainable development as we come to the end of the 20th century and head into the 21st.

Unhappily for many, the response is just lip service. It is necessary to a degree, in wondering why it is that the government does not support this resolution, to examine critically what the government has done to meet our collective objective for this planet. Unfortunately it is easier to list what the government has failed to do rather than what it has done.

The environment, the health of Canadians and the future of our children have become catch phrases, but we still see a failure to regulate and to stop those industries that are totally hazardous and totally frightening to those of us who are fully committed to an environmentally safe Canada and an environmentally safe world.

We look at the megacorporations and we look sadly at our neighbour to the south, the United States. We see that our government still does nothing in a really meaningful way to say to the megacorporations that pollute and to say to our neighbours to the south: you must stop this because it is due to your industries that the salmon no longer swim in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick rivers in the great numbers that they used to. It is due to acid rain and other pollutants that the rivers in southern Nova Scotia contain much of the same material that your local dry-cleaner uses to clean your overcoat.

It is due to an inability to talk tough to polluters on a national and an international level that a country, as one of my colleagues mentioned earlier, which is recognized world wide as a place of mountains, valleys, rivers, prairies and an expanding northland is becoming nothing more than a memory, nothing more than a poster that we can hang on our walls, but we cannot see any more when we look out our windows.

When we come here to Ottawa, many of us from across the country, and we see the beauty of this city, we think as well of the beauty in our own cities. There has to be a fear that comes with it when we look at the changes in the environment, when we look at the changes in our weather patterns.

Just this past week eastern Canada was hit with a bizarre storm; winds higher than had been experienced in years; the waters of the harbour polluted as they are coming farther in and swamping restaurants on the harbourfront; winds so high that scaffolding was blown off buildings and sent down city streets; newsreels of people having to hold on to lamp posts and to car door handles to keep from being blown away; and a huge amount of snow, much more than normally falls in two or three snowstorms in the Halifax area.

Last summer we experienced weeks and weeks and weeks in the Atlantic area of 90 degree plus temperature and 98 degree plus humidity. This is something that we are not used to in our part of the world. We know that those of you who have to suffer in central Canada have to put up with that. It is not part of our climate. It is not part of our climatic history, and it worries us because we know that again this is part of the greenhouse effect, the warming of the planet, the failure of governments down through the years to do something significant to stem the tide of environmental disaster.

Some months ago at an international meeting of women politicians I was fortunate enough to meet former Prime Minister Brundtland. Listening to her incredible commitment to environmental protection and environmental regulation and listening to those who support her and follow her in the various European and African countries, I and a number of colleagues both Canadian and American were saddened that in spite of this increased awareness for the environment we still have not taken that awareness and turned it into concrete action.

I look again at the resolution and at what it says. It says that in 10 years, in the opinion of this House, the government should complete or move to complete the national park system, land and marine, and should implement the recommendation of the Brundtland report that Canada protect at least 12 per cent of land and marine zones.

In a country the size of ours with beauty and resources, land and marine, is it so much to ask that the government do this over the next 10 years? Is it so much to ask that we preserve the heritage for ourselves, for our children and for the generations to come? Is it so much to ask that we ensure through action of this kind that will show to the rest of the world that Canada is serious, that Canada is moving and that Canada will take nothing less than strong environmental controls to ensure our future?

Is it so much to ask that we ensure that this country is not a memory, that its beauty is not left to the books in our libraries and the posters on our walls, but that its beauty from Atlantic to Pacific, from north to south, in all of the provinces and territories, is one that we will enjoy ourselves and preserve for future generations?

I do not think it is so much to ask. My colleagues on this side of the House do not think it is so much to ask. I know that in their hearts my colleagues on the other side of the House do not think it is so much to ask. This is not a partisan issue. This is an issue that involves all of us, our futures, and the future of Canadians for hundreds of years to come. It is not a lot to ask and it is not a lot to give.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions and comments. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Terrebonne.

[Translation]

Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion presented by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

The motion concerns the environment which, as the hon. member is well aware, is one of the top priorities on the government's agenda.

As you know, Madam Speaker, in the Speech from the Throne, the government made a commitment to consolidate the environmental assessment review process. It is not a commitment to be taken lightly.

All levels of government, industry and Canadians across the country will have to learn to live according to new rules. Canada was built by people who counted on the abundance of its natural resources, and now, and this government fully intends to do so, we must find new ways to make sustainable development a reality.

The environmental assessment review process is a basic component of the new type of sustainable economy to which Canadian society must aspire. It is a complex and controversial issue, but we will get there, Madam Speaker.

At this point, I would like to comment on the second part of the motion presented by the hon. member for Skeena. Madam Speaker, the hon. member twice surprised me with his apparent failure to understand this question.

First, he gave us a simplistic interpretation of the Brundtland Commission's recommendation to protect 12 per cent of the total area of this planet.

Second, Madam Speaker, he failed to understand the role of our national parks in protecting the Canadian environment. As his party's environment critic, the hon. member for Skeena should be better informed. And in addition to being environment critic, he also represents a riding that includes the National Park Reserve of South Moresby—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, there is a rule in this House regarding the reading of speeches, and I am quite confident the member has neither read the Brundtland report nor wrote the speech. Perhaps he would like to comment on that.

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I shall, if I may, continue my speech. As for the Brundtland report, I think that if the hon. member gives me a chance to continue my speech, he will find out how much I do know about this report.

Madam Speaker, in addition to being environment critic, the hon. member represents a riding that includes the National Park Reserve of South Moresby. You are, of course, aware that the region is one of the most beautiful on this earth. The government made it a national park reserve because it is deeply committed to protecting those national regions that are typical of Canada.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fulton: I regret breaking into the member's speech, but after his earlier remarks I think I have a responsibility to do so. South Moresby is not a national park. It is a national park reserve. For someone who claims to be so up on all the facts in relation to parks, perhaps he should be aware of that.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I think the hon. member knows that that is not a point of order. He may wish to make some comments after the hon. member's speech. The hon. member for Terrebonne.

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I greatly appreciate the interest shown by the hon. member for Skeena in my speech.

The South Moresby area enjoys protected status because my government, the government I represent, acted to give it that status, and it did so with the unanimous support of the House of Commons.

The hon. member for Skeena knows that creating a national park is not an easy process. He knows that we cannot arbitrarily decide to create a national park. The federal government has to work together with provincial and territorial authorities, native people, municipalities and the general public. The federal government cannot simply announce it is going to create a national park, expropriate property and do as it likes. The Liberals did with Mirabel, but not this government.

The hon. member for Skeena knows that perfecly well, and South Moresby is a case in point, Madam Speaker.

Discussions with the Government of British Columbia were very arduous, and negotiations are continuing with the Haida to determine how Environment Canada will be able to work together with them and with the residents of the Queen Charlotte Islands to make this national park reserve a place where Canadians and other citizens of this planet will be able to acquire an appreciation and understanding of the magic of this extraordinary site. That is the point I wanted to make, Madam Speaker.

It is true that the Brundtland Commission recommended tripling the land area currently enjoying protected status, which is about 4 per cent. As part of a campaign for the preservation of endangered spaces, the World Wildlife Fund has asked that a network covering at least 12 per cent of Canadian territory be given protected status. To reach this goal, federal, provincial, territorial and local authorities must complete the networks of parks, wildlife reserves and protected areas. When approaching an issue of this magnitude, Madam Speaker, the federal government cannot, in the nineties, go it alone and act unilaterally.

Together with the provinces and the territories, the Canadian government now protects nearly 7 per cent of our magnificent territory. The 12 per cent objective is indeed a laudable one, but in fact, this figure is entirely arbitrary. Hon. members will agree, I am sure, that the Canadian government should never act arbitrarily, whatever the issue may be, and that includes protecting Canada's magnificent natural sites.

In any case, arbitrarily preserving 12 per cent of this vast country of ours will not achieve the objective targeted by the Brundtland Commission's recommendation, nor will it meet the objectives set by the World Wildlife Fund in its campaign to protect endangered spaces.

Madam Speaker, to protect appropriate areas in our environment, we must proceed systematically. The Canadian government has opted for a systematic plan to preserve representative samples of Canada's 39 bio–regions, and the Minister of the Environment hopes the national parks network will be ready by the year 2000. This means, Madam Speaker, that we must create 18 new national parks, since 18 of our country's bio–regions have yet to be represented within our national parks network.

The choice of areas to be protected also depends on the habitat requirements of endangered species. For instance, if we were to make 50 per cent of the Arctic a natural reserve, thus meeting the 12 per cent objective, we would not be doing much to save the belugas in the Gulf of the St. Lawrence.

The challenge is enormous, Madam Speaker, and the hon. member for Skeena is not unaware of the difficulties either; he knows the problems raised by protecting South Moresby. As I said, Madam Speaker, the federal government cannot just decide that this land is a park and then expropriate or remove the people who live there or earn their living on it. We had examples of that with previous governments. Our government does not operate that way.

We must proceed as partners. To properly safeguard our territory, we must establish partnerships and reach consensus with all levels of government and with the people. That is exactly what this government is doing, Madam Speaker, for South Moresby Park, for the Prairies Park, for the Bruce Peninsula Park. It is acting rationally and systematically to reach its objective of protecting a part of every natural region in Canada, not an arbitrary objective of 12 per cent of the national territory.

Once the various national, provincial and territorial parks and wilderness areas are completed, as much as 12 per cent of the Canadian territory may become protected areas. It may be more, it may be less, but it will not be simply an arbitrary protection of 12 per cent of the territory.

Under the World Wilderness Funds threatened natural site campaign, Canada is being asked to set aside at least 12 per cent of its land and water to create federal, provincial and territorial park systems and other protected areas. This campaign however does not insist on this arbitrary figure of 12 per cent, but on the representation of all natural regions within these protected area systems. The media have jumped on this 12 per cent figure because it is impressive. If, as I indicated earlier, we manage to protect 50 per cent of the arctic territory, we would have reached our 12 per cent objective. But would the essential area which must be protected throughout Canada would indeed be protected? Should the 12 per cent figure be set as an objective for the principle only of it or for what it really means?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions or comments? The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I am interested in asking the member a question because he describes my interpretation of the Brundtland Report as simplistic and that I am unaware of the role of national parks.

I would like to ask the member a very simple question. What percentage of the province of Quebec is national parks and how many are there in the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I could not tell you just how many national parks there are in the province of Quebec. I do not know and I have no way of finding out. On the other hand, I suppose I could tell you that there are probably not enough. I may have offended the Hon. Member when I said that his interpretation of the Brundtland Report was rather simplistic, but I repeat what I said in my remarks: If we are satisfied with seeking the 12 per cent objective as a matter of principle, I am afraid we are missing the boat.

There are protected areas and national parks and we should protect 12 per cent of the territory, but we must do so in an orderly fashion following a sound assessment and not simply as a reaction or in an haphazard. I understand the enthousiasm and vigor which with the Hon. Member for Skeena defended his motion, but it is necessary to understand that we cannot always do things in reaction to events as they occur. I suggest it is important to understand the deep significance of the 12 per cent objective which does not mean that 12 per cent of the Canadian territory will be protected for the principle of it. There are particular areas to be protected. There are natural habitats to be protected. To this extent, I feel it is quite justified to carry out a good assessment of the sites and territories to be protected in order to make the right decisions for our future generations.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member perhaps would be interested to learn that there are three national parks in the province of Quebec. They comprise 935 square kilometres which is only four-tenths of 1 per cent of the land mass of the province of Quebec. A poor Third World country such as Tanzania has 17 per cent of its land base set aside in national parks.

The member is quibbling over the 12 per cent, whether that is too high or too low. He seems to be arguing that it is significantly too high. I think anyone who was listening to his remarks would assume that. The fact of the matter is the 12 per cent was achieved through international consensus, from scientists from around the world who studied what kind of biophysical mass, either land, marine or atmospheric, is required for the protection of endemic, indigenous, migratory and pelagic species. These are scientific figures that are being used. The member did not know how many parks there are in his own province, what size they constitute, and he is arguing that a 12 per cent figure is too high.

• (1710)

Let me ask the member a very simple question that he should be able to answer for his constituents and for all Canadians. Does he or does he not support and endorse the fundamental recommendations of the Brundtland report, which his own leader, the Prime Minister did before the United Nations? He endorsed and adopted the recommendations of the Brundtland report before the United Nations. Will the member rise in the House and do the same thing today?

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I want to let the hon. member for Skeena know that I am not at all ashamed of not knowing everything. Madam Speaker, good for the member for Skeena if he has all the information, because personally, if I am asked a question for which I lack information, I feel completely at ease to come right out and say so.

When the hon. member for Skeena refers to the fact that I seem to be saying in my statement that 12 per cent is too much, or interpreting it that way, Madam Speaker, I did not say that 12 per cent is too much! I repeat what I said before. As part of a campaign to save endangered natural sites, the World Wildlife Fund requests that Canada safeguard at least 12 per cent of its land and water by completing the system of parks and other protected areas at the federal, provincial and territorial levels.

However, Madam Speaker, the campaign does not necessarily favour the goal of 12 per cent but wants every natural region to be represented among the areas protected. At the end of my speech, I stated clearly that when the system is complete, we may have more than 12 per cent, we may have less. But until then, obviously we will go ahead. An evaluation is now being done. I understand the eagerness of the hon. member for Skeena, I know that he cares about this subject, I know that the hon. member for Skeena is all caught up in it. I understand all that. But we cannot always react that way and say such things without first doing a good assessment to find out what areas should be protected.

If the Hon. Member for Skeena choses to interpret my remarks as though I stated that 12 per cent is too much, then I would simply refer him to my comments and tell him I am not saying it is too much. All I am saying is that before talking in terms of 12 per cent I think we should take the time to make the necessary evaluations and refrain from prescribing 12 per cent just for the sake of doing that. I said so. Protect half the Arctic lands and you will have your 12 per cent. But is that really in keeping with the findings of the Brundtland Report? I am not sure.

Madam Speaker, this is why I say again that the Hon. Member for Skeena's interpretation of the Brundtland Report is very simplistic.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a question, the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fulton: The member seems to have slipped back again without answering a very fundamental question. He has now indicated that he is a great student, a great scholar of the Brundtland report and that I do not know much about it. That being the case, it could well be.

I have a very simple question to ask, since he is such a erudite scholar on the matter, does he or does he not endorse the Brundtland report?

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member may think I tried to avoid answering his question, but the fact is that if I did not quite respond as he was expecting it does not mean that the answer I did give is meaningless. Again I would suggest he is free to interpret it as he sees fit.

I want to repeat what I said earlier, Madam Speaker. Stating that we must protect 12 per cent of the territory is a valid objective in itself. As I said before, if we were to protect half the Arctic lands that would account for 12 per cent of the territory, but is that really the objective?

Madam Speaker, I think the issue is too important to pin it down to a figure of 12 per cent. As I see it, this percentage stems from a basic principle which we uphold and which the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Bouchard) so staunchly defends.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There is still a minute and a half left. The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Keyes: Madam Speaker, I will make my question very short. The member who just spoke pointed out that this matter was close to the heart of the NDP hon. member and that he could understand his passion.

I think the hon. member should understand that an issue of this importance must be close to our collective hearts. Our environment and all the issues concerned are important to all of us here in the House of Commons and across this country. The member said that we should not act arbitrarily. Yet the definition of "arbitrary" is "based on random choice". It is not a random choice.

I point out to the fellow member that it is a choice being made to protect at least 12 per cent of land and marine zones. There is nothing arbitrary about that figure.

Therefore, I also ask the question: Does he, or does he not support the Brundtland report?

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, when the hon. member referred to my use of the word "arbitrary", that we must not act arbitrarily, I made it clear at the time that it was important, that you don't expropriate people this way. You don't say: We are going to create a park, get out, your property is expropriated!

The Liberals did that, Madam Speaker, in the case of Mirabel, and we saw what happens when a government acts arbitrarily.

In my speech, Madam Speaker, I made it clear that it was important to negotiate with various levels of government and with the general public. It is important to have a consensus. You don't act arbitrarily and say: 12 per cent, that is where we want it, so get out! You can't do that.

As for the Brundtland Commission, obviously my government and I support the Brundland report.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House some of the concerns that have been raised in western Canada. In many ways, the debate reminded me of when I was a university teacher listening to a number of disgruntled students giving a bad presentation. My job was to come in at the end of a seminar and try to bring some common sense to it.

Sometimes the west seems so far away that people wonder: Who are these guys from the west? They seem to be very moral and very upright. They really understand the environment and there is a lot of passion in their voices. Perhaps they stand for what is right?

The World Wildlife Federation described the prairies as the most altered environment in the world. If you are looking down at the prairies, what do you see? One of the biggest alterations in the environment is a huge dam in northern Manitoba.

One of the legacies left to us by the provincial NDP, which is somehow or other never mentioned in this federal House, is that Manitoba Hydro Dam. If you look at the devastation of Indian reserves, the devastation of the environment, mercury poisoning, the loss of fishing industry, the lack of economy, the ruination of trapping lines, you say: "Was that the federal government? Was that the big bad federal Liberals they talked about for years?" No, no, that is the NDP. But do they mention it? No, they have forgotten about that.

These guys in the NDP like to use the Brundtland Commission or some other report as a benchmark. Well, the benchmark is not what you read, it is what you do. These guys have done things wrong time and time again in the west and they come in here, like old gun slingers and say: "Let's go shoot the Tories". Well, Tories are such easy targets, anybody can hit the Tories. I will join in with the gang in a few minutes because they are such easy targets.

The real problem in dealing with the environment in the west is coming to grips with the fact that we are making one decision after another the same way as we did before. As politicians we all love to talk about the environment because it is such an easy topic. We all know that the public opinion polls tell us that our voters are concerned about it, but let us get down to some concrete points in which this government could have made a difference.

For example, let's talk about the Centre for Sustainable Development. The Centre for Sustainable Development was announced by the Prime Minister as an extension of the Brundtland Commission in the middle of the 1988 federal election. We are still waiting in Winnipeg. In fact, we have waited so long that even our mayor, who loves the Tories, has been forced to write to the Prime Minister asking, "Where is the centre?".

When you can get our mayor involved after all of these years, and taking on this government, then you know you have reached a crisis. So we have the city of Winnipeg being disappointed one more time in one more way. However, it is more than just Winnipeg, the whole country is disappointed because we need to get on with the research and development promised by this government. Even if the government does go ahead, before it has started, it has announced major cut-backs in this centre's budget.

The second issue in which the government could have made a difference is the Rafferty-Alameda dam project. Here people are opposing the dam, not just because the dam project is bad, but because there is a certain process at stake, namely, that we must take the environment seriously before we alter it. This government has decided that it will build the dam to help its Saskatchewan Tory friends. The government will set it up, and then maybe do an environmental assessment. Well, the government has had to be dragged through the courts not once but twice. Instead of making a statement at the outset that "We understand the environmental concerns in the west and throughout this country and this dam project, although a small project tucked away on the Manitoba-Saskatchewan border, we think it important enough to stop and say let's think about what we are doing". No, all the government wanted to do was make a deal and arrange a payoff.

Those are two past decisions. Hopefully, the Centre for Sustainable Development is not entirely past, but those are decisions where we say the government is wrong. Let us take a look at what is taking place in this country right now and set out a new agenda. For example, Manitoba Hydro again wants to build a dam. It has lots of international buyers. Throughout the United States, different states want more hydro-electricity from Manitoba and the Ontario government would like to be a big purchaser. There are many environmental issues. Let us not do the same thing as we did the last time. Let us not sell off the reserves of native peoples in the hope of making some money for the Manitoba economy. Let us make sure that as the power lines are constructed we understand the environmental fallout. And we must also make sure that we understand that there are interprovincial trade issues here and that the federal government does not nap its way through the planning stages but stands up and says: "These are the benchmarks that we will use to make sure this project is environmentally sound".

Another issue facing western Canada is the development of the pulp and paper industry. We have large development proposals in both Manitoba and Alberta. Although these projects are more environmentally sound than the ones put forward in other generations, they are still very, very susceptible to damaging the environment. Again, the federal government has been ducking the issue. It has been talking to people in the Government of Alberta about whether it is federal or provincial jurisdiction. It has been ignoring the issue in northern Manitoba. The fact is that when we talk about having a strong national government, we are not necessarily looking for money. What we are looking for is the establishment of ideals and principles that will make it easier for us to develop our country on sound environmental principles. In these cases, where is the federal government?

Next there is the issue of agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture pays great attention when we ask him in the House of Commons about his "Growing Together" paper or about subsidies to farmers. When has he ever taken the initiative on environmental issues? One of the great threats to our agricultural industry is the consumption of chemicals for decades on the prairies which is eroding the quality of the soil and the quality of the agricultural community.

It is not for us as politicians to tell the farmers what to do, because farmers are very sensitive about their farming habits. But, it is also for us to show leadership and say: "Please start talking about the environmental crisis on which we are on the verge, lest we have to come to you with new regulations". The Minister of Agriculture refused to discuss that in his "Growing Together" paper and has refused to raise it with farming groups. Some day in the future we are going to be in the middle of a crisis, as we have been in every other sector of the economy. We will find ourselves endangered and will have farmers bitter because we are talking about new regulations when right now is the time for the government to act and respond.

In these very few minutes, I would just like to reiterate the importance for the environment on the prairies, that the government not just take to reading the Brundtland Report, making statements at the United Nations, making grandiose statements that make headlines, but really sit down with people, such as the Manitoba TREE group which is concerned about northern Manitoba and the Concerned Citizens' of Manitoba which is worried about a number of environmental issues. The federal government will not fund them, it will not talk to them. This is no way to treat citizens who have in their hearts and souls the concern about the environment.

I implore the government to change its policy, to realize the mistake that it is making, to realize in the front-benches that they have to take these initiatives seriously and give the Minister of the Environment the support that he probably needs because these guys do not really understand it. Allow the Minister of the Environment the freedom to develop policies that will make this environment sustainable for the next generation.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I know that the member has listened with care to the debate as it has gone on today. It does not seem that there is the kind of potent support for the completion of the national park system by the year 2000 that one would have hoped for from the government side, knowing that the minister is on the public record and the government seems to be on the public record in endorsing that. The Prime Minister, himself, has endorsed Brundtland at the UN.

The question I want to ask the member is the following one. Does he not think that it would be helpful for a minister of the environment, such as the present Minister of the Environment, to be able to go to the territories, to be able to go to the provincial governments, to be able to go to municipal governments and state that 96 per cent of Canadians who have been polled recently want to complete the national parks system? There are very high statistics relevant to that kind of setting aside of land in all kinds of other areas of polling that has been done.

However, to be able to go, whether to Victoria, Quebec City, Toronto or anywhere else in the country and say: "Look, I want your support to set aside this particular land and this particular bioregion because it is important. We have no representation there, and I have the mandate of Parliament. This is not just a government push. Not only are Canadians on side but I have all the Liberals, the NDP, and all the Conservatives. You say that you have this particular problem in that area. Well, Parliament stands behind here. That mining company says this will be a problem, or you could have that forest company wanting to get in there or somebody wanting to do some kind of pongo-pongo development there."

Wouldn't you agree that if there is something significant this Parliament could do, it is this kind of a motion which, frankly, should be able to deliver the kind of consistent power into the hands of the minister that it seems to me Canadians have been demanding for the last couple of decades?

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, I cannot think of anything that would be more appropriate for this government to do than to take on an initiative in support of the national park system. In a symbolic way, Canadians want to see their particular environments from one region to the other protected.

For example, on the prairies it is almost impossible for a Canadian to now see grasslands. There are little bits here and there in private hands. There is one small piece in Winnipeg that has been preserved by a local park, but it has none of the authority of a national park. You say to yourself that there are so many unique corners to this country, yet the 21st Century is going to be a tremendous threat to these areas. For Canada to grow and survive it is going to need more people, it is going to need more resources. The questions that we are addressing here today in which the whole House is so involved are fundamental to the protection of all different types of areas.

The National Parks Program, although it is a very weak program under this government, could be symbolically so important to Canadians that we reach out and say: "We understand how important this property, these lands are for you. This is not to be used for mining. This is not to be a mixed use piece of property. This is going to be a national park set aside so that future generations can see exactly what it was that we had and, as we go along with development in other areas, we are secure in the knowledge that we have set it up to protect the lands for future generations."

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member in the sense that I did not hear all of his words when he was discussing the Manitoba Hydro proposal, and the proposed sale to the Government of Ontario. I am just asking for clarification, whether he and/or his provincial colleagues are criticizing that particular project. Are they opposed to it? I am simply not aware of the answer to that question.

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, I think any Party nowadays puts itself in danger to oppose or support a large scale development project before environmental questions are answered. So in the abstraction, we have built hydro projects in the past, we will probably build them in the future. The reality is that we have done severe environmental damage in northern Manitoba previously. I am sure my provincial colleagues await to see the strength of the environmental assessment process. We wait to see not only the role of the provincial government and the role of Manitoba Hydro, but we certainly await the role of the federal government both symbolically and in real terms of the regulations it can apply if necessary.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, as I have listened to this debate today I keep going back in my mind to an experience I had about 10 years ago when I first took my three children out west to see the full breadth and scope of the country they were going to inherit. It was a trip filled with strikingly beautiful, impressive and marvellous experiences, but it was also a trip that involved some pretty devastating experiences.

Certainly one of those was travelling through B.C. and seeing what had been done to some of the mountainsides of the Rockies. To look up and see to a certain line a fabulous, wonderful forest growing there as it has been for many, many years, and then right beside it to see something that looked so devastated, so scarred, so out of keeping with anything that looked like human accomplishment. We saw huge amounts of wood left on the mountainside, we saw that somebody had just wrenched that whole mountainside apart without any care for what was being left behind and what would be there 10, 20 and 100 years from now. We saw the waste of an extremely valuable resource. It was a very sobering experience for all of us. We had a very thoughtful and sad dinner that evening as we talked about what was being done in parts of our country, a country that we felt were extremely valuable and deserved better.

At that time I was in municipal government and it made the things that I was concerned about seem relatively small. Yet I guess I have realized that in context every bit we do is important. Retaining a 100-acre conservation area in the middle of an urban municipality is an important contribution and insisting that windsurfers and boats use one side of a pier and not the other because on the other side the destruction of a wetlands area would be the result. All these things are small but important contributions.

Earlier last week I talked to a group of children at one of the schools in my riding. None of the children were more than 11 years old. They have spent the last year recycling paper because they understand, as some people in this House seem not to understand, that the preservation of trees is important. They know that the full tonne of paper that they have managed to recycle in the last year represents exactly 19 trees that did not get cut down.

It is amazing to think what a difference those small kinds of contributions could make right across the country. The children also understand what they have done and the importance of it in a much broader context because with the $50 that they earned from recycling that paper, they bought two acres of rain forest in the Amazon. They know that the forests and the trees are important, not only to the people who live in the Amazon but to all human beings on this earth. They know instinctively, but also intellectually because they have taken the time, as it seems some members of this House have not done, to understand what the balance of life in this world is all about. They know that as we are spewing carbon dioxide into the world, it is the natural areas, the growing areas of the world, that buffer the damage that is done by our abuse of the atmosphere. So they want to do their small part to protect what they can.

As the environment committee heard this year, they have learned that the burning of those forests and the destruction of those forests is destroying the long-term ability of a whole people to feed itself. As we heard this morning, in 20 years, if the destruction of the rain forests proceeds as it is, there will be no soil and no ability for those people to feed themselves. That is pretty horrendous when you think about it; only 20 years from now. To me twenty years does not seem that long ago. In Brazil the ability of the people to feed themselves only 20 years from now is being destroyed on a daily basis and we are not doing anything about it.

The preservation of natural areas is an important issue world-wide, and it is an important issue in Canada. Again, we come to a question of balance. With governments it is always a question of balancing how much we use of resources with the need to ensure that they are there for the long term.

Any family understands this principle, understands that if you have so much money for groceries for the week you have to make it last for seven days. But we have never been able to translate that into an understanding of the world, an understanding that certain things do not simply replenish themselves when they are gone, and that if we want to continue enjoying the benefit of some of those resources we have to stage their use in a way that allows them to be replenished.

But there are some things on earth that are so precious, and certainly some things in our country that are so precious, that you cannot use them up or you will never be able to replace them. So it is a legacy that we owe to ourselves, to future generations, to preserve certain areas that are so unique that they are irreplaceable.

To find the balance is our job as politicians. What is the balance between the competing interests? Sometimes we have to be able to say, yes, jobs are important, but we cannot allow jobs to happen at the expense of destroying something that sustains life on this earth and that sustains the richness of our lives as human beings in this world.

In a way the argument is kind of ridiculous. I ask anybody just to picture a map of Canada. There is an ocean on either side and third one above us, and where do we live in this country? Nearly 80 per cent of us live in a little ribbon just so big. To say that we cannot look at that whole big area, more than half a continent, and set aside 12 per cent of its most precious areas so that it will be there in the future is simply not being realistic about what this nation is all about. If we cannot do that now, we will never be able to do it.

Now is the time. We are on the threshold of the future of this country. We have just begun. This is the time to make a commitment and say that we want the most precious parts of this country to be forever a part of its heart, its soul and its physical existence. We will grow, we will expand and we will draw on the world's resources around those things which are too precious to use up, too precious to destroy. That still leaves us a whole huge country in which to do what we want to develop as human beings.

There are assets that have been here for millions of years. Who are we, in our small span on this earth, to say in our greed, our lack of caring and our need for immediate gratification, that we are going to take something that has been here for a million years and use it for our own short-term pleasure, denying it forever to other generations? Who are we to do that? What gives us the right?

Humanity walked out of the Garden of Eden, according to my religious tradition at least, and we like to think of that as something that happened at the beginning of the world. Well, in fact, it happened in the last small fraction of a percentage of world time. Who are we now to say that we are going to destroy the Gardens of Eden of our country or of our world?

I think the politicians are way behind the public. I think it is time we caught up with a public that is telling us, "We don't need disposable diapers if it means destroying forests, thank you very much". Instead of trailing that crowd, let us get in front of them and show some leadership.

• (1740)

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to join in the debate on this resolution here this afternoon.

Let me read the resolution again because it helps to focus on the debate if we refresh our minds. The motion moved by the member for Skeena states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should move to complete the national parks system (land and marine) by the year 2000 and should implement the recommendation of the World Commission on Environment and Development (Brundtland Report) that Canada protect at least 12 per cent of the land and marine zones.

I concur with the minister in that the government should take whatever steps are necessary to complete the country's system of terrestrial and marine parks. It is only by setting goals and a timetable in a strategic time path that we will accomplish these goals and make the achievement worth while.

Our 34 national parks are certainly vibrant, living museums ranging from the northern most areas of our country in the ice-covered tip of Ellesmere Island to the southern most marshes of Point Pelee, from the shores of the Pacific Rim on the west coast of British Columbia to those in eastern Canada at Terra Nova National Park in Nova Scotia.

I also agree that there is considerable urgency in this matter because forestry, hydroelectric power developments, mining and other resource extraction activities are steadily encroaching on Canada's last remaining wilderness.

The Minister of the Environment has already stated in this House, I believe on January 22, that he is personally committed to completing the system of national parks by the year 2000, and that he has directed his officials to prepare an action plan outlining how this ambitious and certainly important goal can be attained.

This commitment is a clear indication of the importance that the present government places on this activity and certainly we believe it is important to the people of Canada and to our country that we protect our environment and, in particular, some of these very important regions.

Each government of Canada owes it to the next to put its imprint on what is already the world's finest family of national parks. I am pleased that real progress has already been made by this government. The Minister of the Environment is giving it very high priority, also to creating new national parks. His short list of parks that are currently being seriously investigated in one way or another includes Banks Island, the northern Baffin Island, Bluenose Lake, the east arm of Great Slave Lake in the Northwest Territories and the Cape Churchill area in Manitoba.

I also agree with the House leader of the New Democratic Party that the government should work with some diligence to complete this national parks system. Canada is a country that has been shaped by water. We are bounded by water in many areas of our perimeter: the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River along our southern boundary; the Pacific Ocean on the west; the Arctic Ocean on the north; and, of course, the Atlantic on the east.

These water bodies have had a pronounced influence on our history. They continue and will always continue to have a major importance to our economy, not only from a tourism point of view, but also for the marine based industries.

Clearly the system of protected areas under the administration and control of the federal government will not be fully representative of Canada's geography until outstanding examples of these marine environments are set aside by the Parliament of Canada as future national marine parks are created under the National Parks Act.

I am proud that the government is also striving to complete the network of national marine parks in a systematic and timely manner. This is a policy that is in place and it is a guide to the selection, establishment, planning and management of new marine parks. Similar to our national terrestrial parks, there are 29 various marine regions that have been adopted in setting the scope of this particular system. The long-term goal is to provide adequate representation of each of these 29 marine regions in the marine park system.

However, I cannot support the member's contention that the government should complete the network of national marine parks in this very short timeframe, which is really just this next decade. It would be an admirable goal, but I suspect it is something that is unattainable. I think we should most certainly have to move onward with the job. Of course there are several reasons to move on, but there are also reasons why I think we have to proceed with, at least, some caution.

First, the creation of national marine parks is still in its infancy and the national marine parks policy which sets aside the stage of selecting, establishing, managing our marine parks in Canada was first approved by the former Minister of Environment in September 1986 under the direction of this current government.

The following year, a provision to create a national marine park in the waters surrounding South Moresby National Park reserve by the year 1993 was included in the park agreement between Canada and British Columbia. Legislative authority for the government to create national marine parks in general, as a separate type of park and to proclaim the Fathom Five in Georgian Bay, Ontario, which is not too distant from my riding, as Canada's first such park was passed in 1988.

The point I wish to make in this brief chronology of events, is that things are moving fairly rapidly on this front. Research, planning, support for new marine parks must accompany the establishment of such parks. In my opinion, the government would be wise to proceed with the maximum swiftness that can be attained, but certainly with some caution as well in the creation of these national parks so we do it well and we learn the proper protection of these marine reserves, how to make opportunities for people to go into these areas, but to do it in a safe and conservation-minded way.

I suppose we might say that hiking boots and backpacks must give way to swimming fins and scuba tanks in some of these areas. It will be interesting and certainly very enjoyable for all Canadians to see the marine park group continue to expand.

Because marine ecosystems differ significantly from those on land, the experience gained from managing the country's century old national park systems are not readily transferable to the marine park counterparts. Furthermore, the experiences of other countries in dealing with marine parks are not always directly transferable because there are relatively few examples where marine parks have been established in cold or temperate and Arctic oceans which are the sorts of waters that surround our country.

There is another important reason for questioning the haste that is included. I do not question that we must move forward, and move forward as swiftly as possible, but I think establishing all these marine parks by the year 2000, within one decade, is a little bit bigger challenge than one can expect in order to proceed in an organized way.

As I mentioned earlier there is only one marine park in the country at this time. It was established in 1988. I mentioned one in South Moresby in British Columbia. That really means two of the 29 regions have so far been represented, leaving 27 regions yet unrepresented. If the government were to move forward and follow the timetable suggested by the hon. member, it would mean establishing an average of two to three marine parks per year over the next 10 years. Although it may be something that we would like to talk about, I suspect that goal is unrealistic.

In my view, the government should aim to establish at least two national marine parks in each of Canada's three environments and on the Great Lakes by the year 2000. This would mean that within 10 years there would be a total of no fewer than eight national marine parks. Work towards this goal has already begun. For example, the Minister of Environment is negotiating with the province of Quebec now for the establishment of a marine park at the Saguenay River. This is an area of considerable diversity and species. Of course, the ones of particular interest are the blue whale and the beluga whale.

Park officials are also examining the prospects of a new marine park in three northern regions. Those are the Lancaster Sound area at the eastern end of the Northwest Passage, the Hudson Bay and along the coast of Labrador. Similar studies will be undertaken this year in other marine areas if sufficient resources are available.

I think this goal is both realistic and wise in the view of the newness of the marine system. Also I think it provides those with the responsibilities of managing these new underwater parks an opportunity to develop their expertise, develop policies and correct any problems that may develop in the establishment of these parks.

The new national marine parks will also serve to increase public awareness of the benefits of marine parks and to help develop stronger public support for this new initiative. With the experience thus gained and the strong public support that already has been generated, Canada will have a solid basis by the year 2000 for a national marine park system that will match the grandeur that is internationally recognized for our current terrestrial parks.

Madam Speaker, I differ from some of those who have been critical of the government today. We have made significant headway on the terrestrial parks and more negotiations are going on and others will start in the not too distant future. There is significant progress in our marine park system which was just recently started by this government.

I look forward with eagerness, along with a great many Canadians, to see our fantastic family of national parks grow in the future. I am sure, as I stand here today, that there will be many new parks by the year 2000.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I appreciate many of the remarks that were just made by the member who just spoke. I am sure he is aware that there are 39 bioregions in the country and there are park representations in 21 of those bioregions at a rate of about one and a half parks per bioregion, because we have 34 national parks.

When the minister was speaking this morning, he indicated that the plan of the government right now is to simply have one representative area in each of the bioregions that are left, although if we were to proceed as we have to date, we could in fact suggest that there is a need for 27 terrestrial national parks as well as for 27 national marine parks.

But the point that the members seem to be driving at is that there simply is not time between now and the year 2000 to complete the system either due to time, money, political will or everything else. I suggest the members go back and look at the 1987 task force recommendations on national park establishment because they made it quite clear that we will have foregone the opportunity to have made a lot of decisions if we dilly-dally very many more years, even into this decade.

A very strong recommendation was made by a number of groups that I have referred to earlier in my speech about the need simply to establish the protected areas. As they said:

> Establishing protected areas need not be an expensive undertaking, especially if the goal is to reserve lands and waters primarily on crown land over the next 10 years, leaving the "development" of services for the future.

They are basically indicating two competing interests for those areas, that these are areas of national significance either for biological reasons or biodiversity reasons. Would not the members support and endorse the idea that we need to complete the designation and the reserving of those 27 marine areas during this decade as well as those 18 to 27 national terrestrial areas, because if we do not, we will have foregone the opportunity?

Mr. Stevenson: Madam Speaker, I certainly cannot disagree with the general objective that the member mentions. I think the problem with urgency, of course, as the member is well aware, is that there are other interested parties in all of these areas, governments and various other groups who claim their own interests for whatever reasons in the important terrestrial and marine areas of our country.

While each group has its own good intentions, it does require a great deal of time to negotiate these agreements. Even to put some sort of restriction on prior to significant negotiation, it is not all that easy to accomplish this in certain areas, as the member is well aware. We have situations going on in our country right now where there has been various development or control agreements on sensitive areas.

I think of the situation in areas like Temagami where there has been a longstanding agreement of many years that is under reconsideration. Of course, there is relatively little agreement on how that should be handled. It has developed into a very controversial issue in that area. So even to say that we can set aside a certain area that we would like to have for a national park somewhere in the future, and that we might start serious negotiations four or five years down the road, it will also be met with significant objection.

I think as resources and time is available, it is important that we look into these situations. I have confidence that the minister will do that because if we just look back we will see the progress that has been made in the last five years.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I must interrupt the hon. member. On a point of order, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, earlier today there was a discussion as to whether or not the question that Your Honour is about to put should be a matter of confidence in the government. I must say that I think perhaps the government has changed its tune since not a single one of its ministers is here to vote confidence in itself and I wonder if, in the circumstances, the government might agree that this is no longer a question of confidence.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, as the member, who is quite skilled in parliamentary procedure knows, calling attention to the presence or absence of members is really against our rules. I want to assure the member, because I think his intervention was partly in the nature of a question, that the government and members on the government side regret very much that the two opposition parties have joined forces to trivialize something which is so important in this country. Forcing a vote under confidence in the House of Commons rather than choosing a path on which we could have all agreed is really to trivialize the issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, we in this party and, I believe, the official opposition, consider this a vote of confidence in the minister and an indication of support from all parties in the House of Commons for the ministers' endeavours and efforts on completing the national parks system by the year 2000. So this is a motion of confidence, not non-confidence. And I urge the government to support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being six o'clock, pursuant to order adopted earlier today, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 81(14), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the supply proceedings now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—MULTICULTURALISM

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved:

That this House condemns the intolerance and prejudice in Canadian society that damages the fabric of the nation and urges the government and all members of Parliament to play a role in strengthening understanding and respect among Canadians.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt, but I would like to tell the House that the Liberal Party will be using 10-minutes speeches followed by 5 minutes of questions and comments for all our speakers starting with the hon. member for York Centre, the justice critic. In that way we will be allowed to have more members speak on this very important subject. It is very interesting to our members, and they would all like to speak on it.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, we have not yet had an opportunity to discuss this within our caucus today, but I will make a commitment that should we decide to follow suit we will indicate at the commencement of the appropriate speaker that in fact we would wish to split it between two. That certainly would not happen until after the first round of speakers.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I very much appreciate the clarity from both opposition parties. The clarity that I can give at this point is that our minister will take the full 20 minutes with a question period. Subsequently our speakers will divide as the Official Opposition is dividing: 10 and 10 with a 5-minute question period.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I wish to thank the representatives of all three parties. I realize that as far as the Liberal Party is concerned, everyone will be using only 10 minutes.

It will still be helpful to the Chair if, after the hon. member for York Centre speaks, members would remind the Chair. It would make things a lot easier.

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I have moved this resolution on behalf of the Liberals because in a word not enough is being done across this land to fight bigotry, intolerance, discrimination, and racism.

Canadians possess one of the world's most fortunate and favoured countries. We have national and personal security, peaceful lives, great prosperity by any standard, spiritual freedom, democracy, personal privacy, an abundance of individual choices about how we live. Our public policies express the decency and tolerance which is a large part of our heritage.

Unlike the nations which embody the values of a single culture and empower that culture with little need to give thought or care to minoritarian interests, Canada began with an accommodation of a minority. Otherwise we would not have had this country. The fundamental principles on which Canada is built reflect the need for justice and fairness for minorities and for the individual. Over 120 years history has made us a nation of minorities. Today, no one culture or historic national group can claim the allegiance of more than half the country.

Our successful life together has given us the background, the tested and improved tools of the experience of our national life and in the human experience of our citizens, on our statute books federal and provincial, in the rules of our public institutions, to be a truly just society.

The genius of Canada is that not only did we learn to cope with our diversity, but we made it an enriching feature of our national life and not a drain on it.

It would be a betrayal of the truth, however, to set out the record of Canada as a fair and justice democracy, as I have done, without acknowledging the history of shortcomings and living up to the ideals which we call Canada; to say what I have about the openness and tolerance, which is the greatness of Canada, without acknowledging the denial of rights, the suppression of fundamental freedoms to whole groups, and the official injustices based often sanctimoniously on sex, race, creed, region, religion, or historic origin.

The resolution before the House is not about history, because we cannot change our history and because through all of our history our eventual resolution and the national purpose was to recognize our faults, not to seek to justify them; to be more sensitive; to learn from our mistakes to the minorities in our country; and to design measures to promote fairness. Even if solutions were found too late to help the actual individuals who were victims of injustice, solutions have come and we have recognized our shortcomings and moved to improve the system.

While I do not want to dwell on the failings and shortcomings of the past, I do want to dwell on the failings and shortcomings of the present, because I am alarmed by them and because I think the whole country should be alarmed by them.

There are developments all over Canada which show the extent to which we continue to fail ourselves and our fellow Canadians. There are vast shortcomings which doom whole groups and communities to lesser status and which make a cruel joke out of the idea that everyone has an equal opportunity, or anything like an equal opportunity.

Madam Speaker, during the course of the day, my colleagues will speak of our country's shortcomings with respect to the status of women, to racial minorities and to our Native peoples.

Indeed, Madam Speaker, we intend to spend a whole day dealing with injustice towards Natives, and outlining our ideas for improving the situation to Canadians and to the government.

[English]

On the subject of native justice and the situation of the native people, I have to address and mention as a particular case the Donald Marshall inquiry, the results of which were made public over the last two weeks. That inquiry reveals the extent to which racism underlies the whole of the criminal justice system of the province of Nova Scotia. We all know that similar findings could be made in other parts of our country. An Indian man was sentenced to prison for 11 years, totally based, according to the report, on elements of racial prejudice.

There are vast systemic injustices in our country which doom too many to less opportunity, less education, less income, less health and to shorter lives. This denial is in itself unfair, but Canada cannot afford it either. We cannot afford the loss that is caused by denying opportunity to all Canadians. We need the contribution that every individual can make when his worth is recognized and when he is given an equal opportunity.

I want to talk about large injustices and the deprivation of rights that result from them, but I also want to talk about small matters and incidents. I want to give some examples which do not in themselves take away anyone's rights or reduce anyone's individual entitlement but which affect their dignity and which diminish their pride in Canada and, in diminishing their pride in Canada, weaken the country. I want to talk about two such incidents.

One is the decision of the municipality of Sault Ste. Marie to follow the example of a few other Ontario municipalities and to go "unilingual English". Every informed citizen in that community knew that no one was asking Sault Ste. Marie to go bilingual, whatever that would have meant. The achievement of Bill 8 by the Province of Ontario does not impose requirements on any municipalities. In fact for Sault Ste. Marie it would not alter the life or the opportunities of any of the people of Sault Ste. Marie so far as provincial services are concerned.

The resolution of that community is nothing but a mean-minded statement designed, I would assume, to send a message. What is the message? Maybe it was meant to punish all of Canada's francophones for the action of the Government of Quebec in limiting, to the extent that the Government of Quebec has, free expression by anglophones in the province of Quebec.

That sad development in Quebec was also deplorable, and I and many other Canadians condemned it. Unlike the gesture by the town of Sault Ste. Marie, it was a move in the province of Quebec which actually does limit the rights of people as defined by the Supreme Court of Canada. It was a move which confirmed a sense of despair in the anglophone community of Quebec and which no doubt will be a factor in contributing to the departure from the province of Quebec of some anglo-phones, a province which anglophones love as much as francophones who live there do.

I spent some time yesterday listening to the hot-line programs across the province of Quebec. I can tell the people of the municipality of Sault Ste. Marie that if their message was meant to encourage an improvement, it has not done so. It has only made things worse, as predictably it would. It makes it look as if this country has forgotten the openness or accommodation which is the essential ingredient of our creation as a country and the key to our good fortune as a country.

We never had the choice in Canada of being the monolithic culture which some countries are and which for some has given meaning to their national identity. We do not have that choice today. If we try to deny our diversity and suppress our differences, we will destroy ourselves.

The second example that I wanted to refer to is also a small incident in itself, small in a sense that it takes no one's rights away, but it directly affects the dignity of Canadians. I am referring to the rash of racist buttons which are being sold and eagerly bought by some in western Canada. As I say, these buttons do not take rights away, but they do attack the dignity of those they insult. They are most hurtful in their portrayal of non-whites as inferior races who are not a cultural match for whites.

This could be ignored as nonsense if it was not so hurtful. The false portrayal of the so-called sad plight of the whites in Canadian society makes a statement very far from true about the status of whites in Canada in every category of status comparison with non-whites. It is deplorable if not illegal and, while no one suffers the loss of rights, I ask the people who wear them to consider how it makes young Sikhs, young blacks, young Indians, and young orientals who were born in Canada feel when they see these insults.

In conclusion, the resolution is moved because it is not enough to identify problems. It is not enough to put in place national institutions, as we have done, or those which we will establish today to address these problems. We need to call on all Canadians who recognize what is at stake, who see that something precious is in danger, that our heritage is in danger and that our future together is in danger, to speak out. For the worst to triumph all that is required is for good people to remain silent.

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member on his very worth-while motion. It is a motion which asks this House to condemn intolerance and urges the government to play a role in strengthening understanding and respect among Canadians.

As the member knows, yesterday was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. It is a landmark statement with respect to tolerance and understanding. It is a report which recommended tolerance in language rights, and which said that both francophones and anglophones in this country should have the right to use their own language, to have their own schools, to have their own institutions such as radio, television and health institutions. Unfortunately, 25 years later progress has been uneven.

The hon. member mentioned in his speech the recent decision by the city council at Sault Ste. Marie, a very unfortunate and prejudicial decision directed against francophones. We deplore and condemn that action. On the other hand, we have the passage of Bill 178 in Quebec, passed against the judgment of the Supreme Court by the use of the notwithstanding clause. Therefore, we have instances of intolerance and prejudice both directed against francophones and directed against anglophones.

I would ask the member if he has some suggestions to make to the House with respect to not only the situation in Sault Ste. Marie, but also to the fact that the Government of Quebec would pass a law which I believe to be an intolerant law forbidding the use of languages other than French, even though the Supreme Court suggested that the Government of Quebec might mandate the use of French but should not ban the use of other languages. It even recognized the priority of the French language in Quebec.

What recommendations can the member make to this House, since he is the initiator of this motion, to bring about greater understanding and peace, not only in Quebec between anglophones and francophones but throughout the country, and to move ahead in the true spirit of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism?

Mr. Kaplan: I would like to thank my colleague for expressing so well the problems of intolerance behind some of the setbacks taking place in the country which inspired today's resolution. I hope it will lead to a greater recognition across Canada of a fact which I offer to the hon. member as at least a large part of the solution, that is recognizing what it is that has made this country great and what it is at the bottom that has made this country possible: the accommodation of difference and respect for it.

I do not want to abstract the problem from the context of the two situations that he referred to, the situation in Sault Ste. Marie and the situation with the anglophone language of signs right which was affected and diminished by Bill 178 in the province of Quebec. I deplore what happened in the province of Quebec at the time, as I deplore what happened in the city of Sault Ste. Marie.

Surely the solution is for us all to recognize as a nation what we have to gain by mutual respect and by respecting in particular those rights which are recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada.

We do not build a nation and then sit back and enjoy it. Building a nation is something that has to be done every day. We should be alert and vigilant every day to the suppression of rights, to insults to minority groups, and we should take steps when we see them to call them what they are.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I am sharing my time with the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan).

I welcome the opportunity to take part in today's debate. As a people, Canadians commit themselves to the creation of a society that ensures equality and justice for all, regardless of race or ethnic origin.

We find these words in the preamble to the Acknowledgment text signed by the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney).

Madam Speaker, I would like to know to whom these words apply. If we look at what is happening in this country, the principles of equality and justice for all seem at times, I would even say all too often, to be ignored by the very people whose mandate it is to uphold these principles.

Madam Speaker, I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lewis), where was justice in the trial of Donald Marshall in Halifax? Where was equality for all, when Donald Marshall, son of the Grand Chief of the Micmac Indians, was arrested? And this is only one of many cases.

[English]

Two research studies done in Nova Scotia have shown that prejudice against the natives and blacks is prevalent and leads to discrimination against them in the justice system.

A study by Dr. Wilson Head, president of the Federation on Race Relations in Toronto, and Donald Clairmont, a Dalhousie University sociologist, state clearly that "blacks have been viewed as undesirable, unable to adapt to a cold climate, shiftless, lazy, and fit only for slavery and as servants of the wealthy."

Madam Speaker, the intolerance and prejudice that exist in our society are unacceptable. It is high time the government got the situation under control, before it is too late. We must invest in citizenship programs. We must provide new immigrants, who often become the scapegoats of our frustrations, the resources they need to acquire a better understanding of the culture in which they have chosen to live. We must give them the means to adjust to their new country by helping them acquire a good knowledge of the language of daily life. Above all, however, and this may be where we have failed most, we must encourage Canadians to learn to know and accept Canada's new image.

Madam Speaker, it is important for various ethnic and racial groups to be visible in all areas that influence the image the government wishes to project of Canadian society. We need them in the government, at the decision-making level; in the media, to help prepare programs and series that are representative of the new Canadian reality; and in education, at all levels. If the government really wants to wipe out inequality and intolerance in this country, it must set an example. All Canadians must have their place in all sectors of our society.

Madam Speaker, it is unacceptable that in 1990, I should still receive letters from people who are being denied—one wonders on what authority—the right to be different.

I would like to read a short passage from a five-page letter I received from one of my constituents. I may point out that this person was employed in the Public Service. She has been in Canada for 25 years, and her only fault was that she was an immigrant. She explained in her letter that she tried to open the window of a room filled with cigarette smoke. I apologize for the unparliamentary language, but this is a daily part of some people's lives.

So I beg the indulgence of the Chair and my colleagues. I quote:

"I asked for permission to open the window (since I did not have the right to touch any window or door and I always had to ask for permission, just in my case, but if any other employees did, it was all right. —Then the cleaner jumped on me, shouting and calling me a 'damn immigrant woman. Why don't you go back to your land of camels? You have come to take our place, damn you. You won't stay here long.'" She continues: "I asked him, 'How do you know that I won't stay here?' He answered, 'I have been told and everyone knows, damn you.' I went to see the manager. He blushed and told me, 'This is a democracy. The majority wins.'"

[English]

The letter continues. This is not an isolated case. I am certain that everyone in this room knows of someone being abused in some way. We even do it in our ethnic and racial jokes. We never think of the effect it can have on the group we are joking about.

If we really want our nation to stay one, it is high time the government publicly condemned intolerance and prejudice and played a leading role in strengthening understanding and respect among Canadians and those who aspire to become Canadians.

The government must be pro-active. It must stop reacting to crisis and start weaving bonds between all, young and old, all professions and all cultures, all religions and all races. If we can do it to fight a war, why can we not do it to guarantee peace? What does this say for our society?

[Translation]

I am very concerned when a society has reached a point where a disenchanted employee can take the liberty to give the weather forecast, slipping in a message of intolerance like this, and I quote:

[English]

"Today, mainly sunny with racists. Then clouding over this afternoon with a chance of flurries and Nazis."

Those were the words used.

Madam Speaker, throughout Canada, intolerance is on the rise. Now we must stop saying so, playing the ostrich and hoping it will go away. We must take concrete action. We can no longer afford to wait for miracle solutions. The government must act, take a stand and provide support wherever this positive action is taken.

Madam Speaker, how can we tolerate racist buttons whose purpose is to denigrate another human being? Have we become so indifferent to what is going on around us? When will the government admit that however small the offense, even if it is just a button, it is still an offense and often it is an accumulation of small incidents that finally cause peace to break down, just as water eats away at a rock?

[English]

I do not think at this time that I need to pinpoint events where intolerance and prejudice are, sad to say, daily news. I condemn this and urge the government to play its role in strengthening understanding and respect among Canadians.

In conclusion, I would like to quote another great Canadian: "If we want to be independent and proud, we must keep this country united."

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville (Mrs. Maheu) for her excellent speech on Canadian citizenship and what it really means. I would also like to congratulate the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan). First, his motion:

That this House condemn the intolerance and prejudice in Canadian society that damages the fabric of the nation and urge the government and all members of Parliament to play a role in strengthening understanding and respect among Canadians.

As a Canadian citizen who is a fourth-generation Franco-Ontarian, I have often lived with prejudice and I am very sorry to see how much prejudice some people in Quebec have against their English-speaking fellow citizens. This week I was greatly distressed by the negative reaction exemplified in Sault Ste. Marie. As a former alderman, I know that small groups often lobby municipal councils for one cause or another; 99.9 per cent of the time, these causes are very worthwhile and municipal councils often present motions to accommodate groups and thus show their attitude to some event or other. In the case of Sault Ste. Marie, they had nothing to gain; it was negative, very negative. There was no reason for it to happen. I am afraid that the next resolution in a place like Sault Ste. Marie will be about people's colour. Then will it be religion? Canada was built by French, British, European, Asian and other immigrants. Because of intolerance, we came here to America to find a better world. And it is really deplorable that a generation or two or three later, the descendants of immigrants present such negative resolutions. So I congratulate the two hon. members who spoke before me for their presentation on tolerance in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Further questions or comments? Resuming debate. The Secretary of State of Canada (Mr. Wiener).

[English]

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member's motion I wish to reaffirm this Canadian government's commitment to the principles of tolerance, respect and understanding for all Canadians.

About three decades ago Martin Luther King, Jr., said: "Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere." This is why we have been working with groups across the country to eliminate intolerance, racism and racial discrimination in order to build a more just and caring society. It goes without saying that the first salvo in the battle against intolerance and racial discrimination is the acknowledgement of the presence of these evils in our society. We know there is prejudice in our society. We have all come into contact with it. But government alone cannot eliminate intolerance and racism.

We must have the co-operation of like-minded citizens. A recent incident shows that we have many Canadians willing to speak out against prejudice. Hon. members are aware of the racist pin being sold in Calgary. Its sale was another example of the intolerance we must overcome. The sale of this pin also brought home the fact that Canadians will not tolerate such an attitude. The swift reaction to this pin was most encouraging. The community came together and spoke out against its blatant prejudice. Editorial writers, columnists, the mayor of Calgary, the Alberta Human Rights Commission, the business community, all have spoken out against the blatant prejudice of these products. I myself issued a very strong condemnation of this very abominable behaviour.

The reaction to an incident such as this demonstrates the true heart of Canada. Canadians not only in Calgary, not only in Alberta, but throughout the country made their voices heard. They spelled it out. Racist symbols and the hatred they generate will not be tolerated.

• (1040)

We know the majority of Canadians celebrate the rich cultural diversity of Canada, but this government wants to ensure that cultural diversity, which we have declared in law to be a fundamental characteristic of Canada, is realized in fact.

Madam Speaker, Canada is lucky to be a young and free country, founded on the principles of openness and tolerance. We are a peace-loving people, a society that has always put the well-being and interests of its citizens above any other considerations, a country that has always cultivated the values of equality.

Entire generations of Canadians of all origins chose Canada because they knew they could live in peace and prosper in this country. They did far more than that, however. They helped make this country what it is today. It is largely thanks to them that today, Canada is a prosperous nation and one of the world's great industrial powers. It is also thanks to them that today, the Canadian character stands for something unique in this world, based on generosity, solidarity, and respect for others.

[English]

The multiculturalism policy of this government has created a vision of this country. It is a vision of nation-building and of national unity. We are building political and national unity out of our cultural diversity. Our diversity is what strengthens us. This is nation-building; this is equality; this is social justice. For this government multiculturalism is not simply the recognition of cultural diversity. For us it is an egalitarian and anti-racist philosophy and program.

Philosophically multiculturalism is a way of thinking about cultural diversity which emphasizes that all citizens have equal political, social and cultural rights. It views cultural differences as features of social life which must be incorporated into all aspects of the functioning of the state. To do otherwise would be to allow our cultural differences to destabilize society. With regard to racism, multiculturalism holds that it is at best pseudo-scientific nonsense and at worst a blatant fraud.

Programmatically multiculturalism seeks to preserve, enhance and share the elements of cultural diversity by, among other things, supporting the teaching of heritage languages, establishing chairs of ethnic studies and encouraging various artistic productions. In this endeavour it recognizes the need for active participation with the community, with institutions and with all levels of government as we pursue the important task of nation-building. Multiculturalism is also dedicated to the eradication of racism by relentlessly exposing its pseudo-scientific and fraudulent assumptions and by bringing about changes in social institutions that perpetuate inequality on the basis of cultural and physical differences.

This government introduced the first Employment Equity Act. It also established a committee to advise the Treasury Board on the representation of visible minorities in the Public Service. We opened up the Canadian Jobs Strategy to enable more immigrant women to benefit from language and skills training. We have addressed the grievances of Japanese Canadians, brought into law the Canadian Multiculturalism Act and introduced Bill C-18 to establish the new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. This new department will strengthen national integration and national identity and will enable all Canadians to participate fully and without discrimination in building the nation's future. It will work with community groups to break down the barriers and limitations that deny some Canadians full participation in day to day community life.

This nation has a rich cultural and ethnic diversity. It must be allowed to be given full expression in terms of our citizenship. Full citizenship demands full participation. It demands equal access for each one of us and we will not accept any less.

We have been working very vigorously to make Canadians much more aware of the benefits that this brings to the nation and to show how much more productive we have become, how much more challenging we are, how much more competitive we are when we use our full human resource.

We have been building partnerships so that multiculturalism is mainstream for every institution of the community. We have been examining how we can, through this program and with this cross-government commitment, examine every institution to see how they can be helped to become more familiar with it, allow more participation and derive more benefit from having this full and open participation. And, we have been making significant progress.

Our Canadian Multiculturalism Act provides a strong legislative base to promote social justice and equal opportunity for all Canadians. There is an increasing appreciation that the task of nation building is profoundly influenced by our social and cultural relations. Recognizing this, our Multiculturalism Act pledges that the Canadian government go beyond establishing equality rights. It promotes a multicultural and open society where all Canadians can participate and can contribute to their fullest extent.

The act strengthens our Canadian identity. It contributes to our understanding and acceptance of each other's uniqueness. It commits the Canadian government to ensuring that all Canadians can participate fully and without discrimination in defining and building Canada's future. Our multiculturalism policy will help Canada enter the 21st century with emphasis on the positive aspects of coexistence among culturally diverse communities.

The act is a direct result of our efforts to develop a model society. We have developed a society where diversity is acknowledged as a strength and where freedom and tolerance, fairness and courtesy, compassion and common sense are overriding characteristics. This is what we mean by cultural integration, not the form of assimilation which has been tried in other parts of the world. We believe in the preservation and the enrichment of our society for all Canadians. This has become a unique world model being examined and followed by nations around the globe.

The act that we brought forward states that multiculturalism is a fundamental characteristic of our society. That is a key statement of government policy, because it establishes for the first time in law that cultural diversity must be taken into consideration in the decision making of all government institutions.

Our new Governor General, His Excellency, the Right Hon. Ramon Hnatyshyn, expressed the identity of our country in his inaugural address this past Monday:

> The ability to change and move with history has been bred into the Canadian character. We are an Atlantic country, a Pacific Rim country, and we are linked almost mystically with the north. Rather than locking ourselves into rigid definitions and ways of acting, we have moulded ourselves into a complex and subtle nation.

The Department for which I am responsible has always worked very hard, especially in recent years, to fight discrimination and promote equal opportunities for all citizens.

For instance, in recent years the Women's Program at the Department of the Secretary of State has provided financial and many other types of support for many organizations involved in promoting women's rights. We have placed special emphasis on promoting economic equality, access to social justice and services, and the full and complete participation of women in society.

For a number of years the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and federal and provincial human rights legislation have helped to reduce various forms of discrimination and inequality affecting women. Of course, much remains to be done, but in this respect Canada compares well with most other countries.

[English]

Earlier I spoke of a racist incident that brought a strong response from many Canadians. Now I wish to say a few words about the government's formal efforts to combat racist attitudes.

We have a race relations and cross-cultural understanding program. It supports efforts by Canadian institutions, community groups and individuals to eliminate discrimination and foster understanding. The program encourages institutions in fields such as justice, education, labour, social services and the media to better serve our multicultural society. It helps community organizations promote equality and mutual understanding. It provides financial assistance for research and development of cross-culture training methods.

Under this program, in partnership with the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, we have carried out several initiatives designed to help police forces become more sensitive to our country's cultural diversity. We have assisted the Federation of Canadian Municipalities in implementing its own municipal race relations program. We have supported such activities as the establishment of the National Action Committee on Race Relations. The program has also assisted the Canadian Human Rights Foundation in helping promote awareness in the legal community of the legal basis of multiculturalism.

Under the program, we held a national symposium on the impact of media on race relations. Hon. members will recall that only two days ago I tabled a bill in the House to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation with its principal office in metropolitan Toronto.

Hon. members will also be familiar with the government's initiatives marking the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination on March 21. We will continue to use special days like March 21 to focus attention on the issues.

The Prime Minister of Canada, speaking at the installation of our new Governor General on Monday, said:

> Canada has constitutional promises to keep, multiple cultures to reconcile and regional disparities to redress. The task of nation-building is often difficult, and its fruits are rarely perfect. But they are the culmination of generous contributions to a noble cause—the building of a strengthened and progressive nation.

I share with the Prime Minister a vision of a new Canada, a Canada where our different customs and traditions, our origins and colour of our skin are a wonderful and varied expression of our common humanity. We are striving for a diversity to which we all contribute, a diversity from which we all benefit.

To achieve harmony among our various cultural groups remains one of the fundamental objectives of Canadian society.

Madam Speaker, I am very proud to have been given a chance to work towards this goal. Considerable progress has been made this year.

[English]

I have noticed a lot of good will, a lot of realism, a lot of understanding. We will soon be bringing forward a Canadian multiculturalism advisory committee. It will bring forward individuals representative of the varied institutions that we will be working with: labour, business, the voluntary sector, education, private and public sectors, health and social services. It will be an opportunity for us to examine institutions within the community to see how they can, once and for all, allow the full participation of all of our citizens.

It is an area of our endeavour of which we are particularly proud. There are still far too many incidents that are disquietening, with distressing undercurrents. We are developing initiatives to address concerns such as those raised by the Marshall inquiry in a very proactive manner. We have been consulting actively. For example, I have been to Halifax four times in the last year.

We have some very exciting ideas. I signed an agreement this past year with the city of Halifax on a very important initiative. We are looking to bring forward more important programs to help create equality in this society.

Wherever we turn, I have been forceful and vigilant on behalf of the government. I am pleased to say that Canadians from coast to coast have been very helpful in wanting to get more involved in the issue. I am thankful that we have an opportunity today, not only to reach all members of Parliament, but to be able sensitize the entire Canadian community to the benefits of what we are talking about. To keep a situation of second-class citizenship in the country is dangerous. It promotes racial tensions, and it is something we must avoid at all costs.

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, an initiative that was supposed to deal with intolerance and prejudice in the workplace was the government's Employment Equity Act passed in 1986. This law was supposed to implement affirmative action programs for women, visible minorities, aboriginal people and disabled people. Two years after the passage of the act very little progress has been made, and that was pointed out in the annual report pursuant to the act which was tabled in this House at the end of 1989.

Following the tabling of that report, Max Yalden, Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, stated that very little progress had been made. That criticism was seconded by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and the Canadian Ethnocultural Council.

In his speech the minister made some very strong statements against prejudice, and I congratulate him on that. There were some very good statements.

If he is sincere in what he says, will he not recommend to his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration who is responsible for the Employment Equity Act, to amend that act so it can be an effective act? The stated purposes in the act are very good, but the act is inadequate in that it does not have effective sanctions or an effective enforcement agency.

If the minister is sincere and if the government is sincere in trying to do the things that they say they stand for, surely they will want to amend that act so that we will not continue to get the kind of reports that we got this year. For example, even companies like the Canada Post Corporation and the CBC, all Crown companies, were getting failing grades against all target groups such as women, visible minorities, aboriginal people and disabled people. They had a horrible record, according to this report. It included private companies as well.

Would he not support an initiative to amend that law to make it do what he really wants to do?

Mr. Weiner: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce will know that I served as the parliamentary secretary at the time the employment equity bill was brought forward.

I have heard the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration respond that they are currently examining the whole process of what has been implemented and the effect of it on the program. In a very short period of time, she will be coming to her cabinet colleagues and discussing with them an opportunity of perhaps further strengthening the process.

I am certainly awaiting what she will bring forward from within her area of responsibility. I will indicate that those who have heard me across the country, wherever I have been, certainly have not found me to be lacking in the understanding I have of the inequality I have found.

I am not new to this issue. I have worked as a volunteer in the field all my life. If there is one thing that I carry with me from my youth it is a remembrance of the intolerance, the lack of understanding and the lack of opportunity that I faced as a member of a cultural community at that time. Many members of my community have now overcome it, but it is still blatant and present for many others.

What I have said as an individual and offering the leadership of the federal government is that we have been prepared to examine every institution beginning with ourselves and demand that once and for all it provide full equality, full access, and full understanding. That is what our citizenship demands and we will accept no less.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There will be five minutes left in the questions and comment period following the minister's speech after Question Period.

It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, for many months now my office has been offering a sympathetic ear to small business in my riding. Their concerns are not simply the monetary expenses which they will be confronted with in administering the GST. They are also concerned about the logistics and added pressures of dealing with the ever-deeper reach which this government is making into their lives and livelihood.

For example, tax preparers will be forced to submit pages 5 and 6 of every individual return for 1989 on green paper. Normally blue paper is accepted for income tax returns but pages 5 and 6 are the GST refund application forms. The government seems unable and unwilling to take its time to sort these pages out on its own. Instead they are placing the monumental task of submitting 2.5 million prepared forms on the backs of the tax preparers.

I suggest to the government that the Minister of Finance has set these tasks and expenses upon the backs of the small businessmen of Canada at his and his government's peril, and a further frustration for small business.

COMMONWEALTH GAMES

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, today I would like to draw the attention of the House to the outstanding performance of Quebec athletes at the Commonwealth Games in Auckland. I would like to pay tribute to Guillaume Leblanc of Rimouski, who yesterday won a gold medal in the 30-kilometre racewalk. He finished the race in two hours, eight minutes and 28 seconds. This was Guillaume Leblanc's third time at the Olympics, after Seoul and Los Angeles.

I would also like to mention the excellent work done by Joanne Falardeau of Quebec City and Denyse Julien of Rouyn-Noranda, who won a bronze medal in badminton doubles. These achievements are the result of incredible perseverance and hard work, something only exceptionally dynamic athletes can manage. I am sure that hon. members will wish to join me today in applauding these athletes from Quebec who honour our country with their success.

RELEASE OF NELSON MANDELA

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, radio and TV today announced that Prime Minister de Klerk of South Africa will he says soon release Nelson Mandela and legalize the African National Congress and other organizations which have been banned. This is something that people all over the world have worked for.

But we should be especially thankful to the courageous and mainly peaceful struggle of the South African people, blacks and whites, Christians and communists, who have struggled for half a century for justice against apartheid. We should thank also the United Nations which made apartheid illegal under international law and encouraged sanctions by many countries to put pressure on the apartheid government.

We should also look to the future because the African National Congress Charter, which was banned as a subversive document, calls among other things for universal literacy in a government drive against illiteracy, for health care, for housing and these are all matters in which we could copy the Charter of the African National Congress.

CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship, the hon. Gerry Weiner tabled a bill to establish a Canadian Race Relations Foundation. Tabling this legislation reinforces the government's commitment to equality for all Canadians as expressed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in the Multiculturalism Act.

The foundation will serve as a national resource for community groups, governments, institutions, the private sector, researchers and the general public to further. their understanding of racism and racial disrimination in Canadian society. The foundation, whose principal office will be located in the Toronto area, will be instrumental in the elimination of racism and all forms of racial discrimination in Canadian society.

I urge the hon. members to support the new foundation in its effort to combat racism wherever it exists.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, the role of the CBC in Canada is no less vital today than it has been at any time in our history. Canadians who value this great national institution should, may I say with great respect, wake up to the fact that the CBC as we have known it in this country is now about to be destroyed. May I suggest, Madam Speaker, by a deliberate design of the government opposite, primarily by the Minister of Finance who, in his headlong rush to meet his economic priorities, is destroying a part of Canada's heritage, destroying that institution that has provided the nation with a mirror of itself and mirrors this nation to the rest of the world, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

On Tuesday, the CBC announced cuts of $140 million over four years laying off 500 employees. On Wednesday, the Minister of Communications suggested CBC should get out of the advertising business, a loss of $360 million a year, and today we find out that childrens' programming is being cut by the CBC. There is pitifully little enough good children's programming available to our children in this nation. There is fewer still of good Canadian programming. Let's stop the destruction of Canada's culture and a great national Canadian institution.

REFORESTATION

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Madam Speaker, government and landowners should seek every opportunity to plant more trees. Presently there are a variety of federal and provincial government programs to assist reforestation. While these programs have proven quite successful, we still face a tremendous opportunity and challenge for replenishing and expanding our forests. Canada has vast areas of rural wasteland in regions where the climate is ideal for growing trees. This land should be planted with trees.

The National Soil Conservation Program and associated agreements with the provinces offer another opportunity to stimulate reforestation. Under these new programs highly erodable land will no longer be used for production of annual field crops. Trees could be a part of the permanent ground cover for such lands. The largest challenge and responsibility falls on individual landowners. I urge those with unproductive or erosion-prone rural lands to make a resolution for the 1990s. That resolution should be "Plant Trees".

FINANCE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak on a serious concern. We know that sometime this month the Minister of Finance is going to introduce his budget for the upcoming year. We also have been told by the same minister that he does not have the time to meet with ordinary Canadians. This year the hon. minister has chosen to prepare his budget behind closed doors surrounded only by his nearest and dearest.

The government can promise Boeing $150 million prior to the budget but it cannot meet with ordinary Canadians. Perhaps since the minister refuses to meet and consult with the rest of us, he will simply announce in this House what he will do and what workers should do with regard to negotiating higher raises to counteract the GST. You know the GST, Madam Speaker. That is the tax on which Jean Chrétien will not give his position.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Murphy: Should northern workers start bargaining for benefits to compensate for the impending loss of northern tax benefits? Should other workers be concerned about what is going to happen to UI premiums? What is going to happen to medicare and health programs across this country? When is the minister going to talk with ordinary Canadians and tell us what our future is all about?

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, the report of the Royal Commission on the Donald Marshall case is forcing Canadians to re-assess their attitudes and examine the extent of intolerance, discrimination and prejudice in Canadian society.

Aboriginal people are still in some parts of the country confronted daily with racial prejudice. It is hard to for aboriginal people to watch television movies in which our people are slow, dumb, vicious, blood-thirsty and speak in one- syllables. It is difficult to read old books which portray aboriginal people as "primitive" and "uncivilized". The recently re-released book of Pierre Berton, The Mysterious North is a modern example of old attitudes. Originally published in 1956 its descriptions of aboriginal people are offensive.

In a preface to the 1989 edition, Berton acknowledges that attitudes have changes toward the north and aboriginal people since the 1950s. While the book may be entertaining reading for most people—it won the Governor General's award—its repackaging is painful reading for aboriginal people.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, in the past couple of weeks we have had a couple of announcements coming out of Prince Edward Island. Both of these announcements were made for the best of reasons. They were made by two major corporations, McCain's and Irving's.

They were really announcements of how positive we are in Atlantic Canada. Both of these companies are expanding in Prince Edward Island for the very best of reasons, namely, that we can in Atlantic Canada do what we do best, do it better than any part of the world and compete on a very even and level playing field.

With these announcements nothing was done at the expense of the industry in any part of Canada nor will they endanger the industry in any other part of Canada. I am very proud of what the Irving and McCain corporations are doing in Prince Edward Island. I think as Canadians we can be very proud of the fact that we can compete on the international market.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, the temperature in the National Capital Region dropped overnight and as the final ingredient for another successful Winterlude the weather kicked into gear.

Thanks to all the volunteers and organizers, the people of the National Capital Region and the more than the million tourists who come to the nation's capital to participate in the ten-day party, Winterlude, 1990, can begin.

This year's theme is distinctly Denmark and promises to be the best ever. So put on your toque and mitts and have some fun. See the ice sculptures, watch the races and the fireworks, go for a skate on the canal while feasting on a beaver tail. Take a sleigh ride and cheer on the participants in the many competitions. Laugh with the clowns and watch the barrel jumpers. Enjoy the culinary dishes available at every turn. More than 300 events will take place over the next ten days so participate and enjoy.

In my constituency of Nepean we too will have programs. Hot air balloons and kites will fly the air tonight. The nation's capital is ready. The people are energetic. The weather is perfect.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Madam Speaker, this morning we have every reason to rejoice, since President de Klerk of South Africa has made a start with reforms, announcing he will release leader Nelson Mandela and showing his willingness to negotiate in order to unban the Africa National Congress and other factions that want recognition of human rights in South Africa. This step is partly the result of pressure by Commonwealth countries.

Since 1985, our Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) have worked very hard to fight apartheid and to support recognition of the rights of our black brothers in South Africa. I want to congratulate them, and I also wish to mention the courage shown by our Prime Minister at the Commonwealth Conference in Vancouver in October 1987, and on so many other occasions.

I would urge President de Klerk to perseveres, and I think all Canadians should be delighted with the first step made this morning.

ALLEGED COMMENTS OF MINISTER

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, in this morning's Journal de Montréal, the federal Minister of Labour (Mr. Corbeil), who is the minister responsible for Montreal, said: "If Montreal's economy is in decline, it is mainly due to an ignorant labour force."

Madam Speaker, "an ignorant labour force". Is the Labour Minister speaking on behalf of the federal government when he says that about the working people of Montreal? Do his colleagues here from Quebec agree with the Minister of Labour of Canada? This morning, Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is in Chambly for a by-election. Does the Prime Minister agree with his minister that the Montreal labour force is ignorant? If the Prime Minister agrees, will he repeat it to the voters of Chambly this morning? Or if he completely disagrees with his Labour Minister who said that this morning in Chambly, will he apologize on behalf of his minister? It is quite important, Madam Speaker!

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, with the announcements received today from South Africa's President de Klerk about proposed new directions toward the elimination of racial discrimination in that country, the world takes another giant step forward in the historic journal of global civilization.

This will be encouraging good news for all nations but particularly so for the Commonwealth countries whose efforts to promote reform in South Africa have been diligent and dedicated for a very long time. Canada has played a major role in these respects and credit is due both to our Prime Minister and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for their personal stands and influence on these issues leading up to today's dramatic events.

Surely this profound progress on the world's stage in which Canada has had a part will intensify the commitment and the creative energy of all Canadians to the continued building of our own country as a leading model among nations of racial and linguistic tolerance in a caring, compassionate and civilized society.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ENVIRONMENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question this Friday morning is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Environment Minister, who is not here this morning, is well known as the great expert on by-elections. He promised his own riding more than $160 million to ensure his own election on June 20, 1988. But as the Deputy Prime Minister well knows, only the Prime Minister's prestige friends are entitled to such special treatment.

After promising for months that he would find a solution to the problem of the PCB containers which are still in Saint-Basile-le-Grand, the Environment Minister told the people of that community very recently that the cost would be so huge that it could not be justified, even in an election campaign. That is what the Environment Minister said.

My question for the Deputy Prime Minister is: If the government can provide a safe seat for the Environment Minister, why is it unable to provide safe living conditions for the people of Saint-Basile-le-Grand?

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment I would remind the right hon. member that the federal government has already contributed some $2 million in services to the people in the area and, furthermore, it is agreed to provide compensation in partnership with the province of Quebec. Those negotiations are still occurring. I might add that we have not as yet received a package from the province of Quebec indicating what its request will be of us.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, again I address the Deputy Prime Minister, hoping for a reply. To show his alleged commitment to the environment and recycling programs, the government is recycling its old promises.

In 1988, the government promised to convert part of the firing range in Chambly into a green space. Now the Environment Minister is making the same promise again for this by-election. But only two years ago, eight soldiers were injured by a buried shell which exploded when they made a campfire. Will the Environment Minister stop manipulating the voters of Chambly? Why did he not ensure that the place was completely safe before recycling his own program?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the question of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. Of course, as he knows we have reached an arrangement whereby 85 hectares of the 512-hectare St. Bruno site will be transferred under the jurisdiction of the parks department. It is on the hillside to enable public access to that area which the public had been requesting for a number of years.

I would like to assure him that that range is only used for firing with blank ammunition. No live shells are used in the firing exercises at St. Bruno.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to remind the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that the incident to which he referred did not occur at the St. Bruno firing range. It occurred at Val Cartier which, of course, is quite a different place. So we can assure the public that there is no danger in the public utilization of the St. Bruno range. I am sure that it is going to be a very welcome addition for recreational activities for the people of Chambly.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to know that once more this government, when it comes to a by-election, shoots nothing but blanks in order to get votes.

Some hon. members: Oh, Oh!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1120)

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to put the following question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Only he can answer a question on general government policy.

The Minister of the Environment, using a metaphor that the minister has just used, has bombed in his portfolio as Minister of the Environment. He is too busy on by-elections to concentrate on the big picture and his big program. For months we have been told that the government has a new plan for the environment. For months we have been told that the government has real spending plans for the environment. For months we have been told to wait for the Minister of Finance because he and the Minister of the Environment, when the Budget is brought down, are going to have a great new environmental protection program for Canada. Now we read, and I want the Deputy Prime Minister to comment on these reports, that the Minister of the Environment has failed and has fired blanks with his colleagues, particularly the Minister of Finance, and there will be no such program.

Would he confirm or deny those press reports? Would he assure us, hopefully, that that great plan for the environment that we have been waiting for from this newly-minted minister will finally see the light of day for Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Well, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to shooting blanks, the best example of that is the performance of the Leader of the Opposition in Question Period.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Again, the Leader of the Opposition is relying upon The Globe and Mail for his research. I suppose his research staff has left him already because he is looking for a new job. The fact is that the—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Where is your answer?

Mr. Mazankowski: I will give you an answer. As a matter of fact, the Leader of the Opposition had two good answers to two very legitimate questions. I want to compliment both members for enlightening the minister.

Mr. Simmons: Order.

Mr. Mazankowski: If you will just give a little time, I will answer the question.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): How much time?

An hon. member: Stop rushing him.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): If you would like to sit down and get up later on—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I am momentarily speechless. Perhaps the minister could finish his answer.

Ms. Clancy: He hasn't started yet.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition should stop relying on The Globe and Mail for his questions in Question Period.

I can assure the hon. Leader of the Opposition, his colleagues, and the people of the country that the Minister of the Environment is working on a new environmental policy which will be all-encompassing. It is a very major priority. It was outlined in the Speech from the Throne and, as in so many other cases, when this government makes a commitment, it delivers.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour who is responsible for Montreal.

Three years after the publication of the Picard report suggesting a development plan for Montreal, noted the renowned economist Laurent Picard who wrote this report advises us now that it is being implemented in Toronto and not in Montreal.

Could the governement advise us whether it needs to take a geography course to find out where Montreal is really located? Could the Minister explain to me what stopped the government from implementing the recommendations of this report?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make it clear to the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville that contrary to the previous administration, this government has dealt effectively with the situation which has developed on the Island of Montreal over the past few years.

As a first step, the government passed a legislation dealing with pharmaceuticals which the opposition had fought tooth and nail and which now represents nearly $700 million in investments on the Island of Montreal.

Something the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville might be unaware of, this government has contributed to the prosperity of the riding she lives and works in by granting $43 million to Canadair to help this corporation get involve in the production of the stretched Jet liner and create 2,000 new jobs in that industry.

The government I represent has located in the Montreal area the Space Agency which should be worth $3 billion to the Montreal economy over the next few years and which, as recently as last Friday, awarded a contract to the Spar Aerospace corporation in Montreal, resulting in some $140 million investments in that area.

When one considers the situation now with what it was previously, Mr. Speaker, one realizes that the level of unemployment is much lower on the Montreal Island.

Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I wish I had as much time as the minister!

By the way, most drug manufacturers are based in Toronto.

I should like to know why Mr. Picard, the author of the report, has seen fit to focus on the inaction of the very government that commissioned his report. Just what does the government plan to do in the immediate future to implement the Picard report recommendations?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, our government will continue to do the excellent job it has been doing in recent years. Again I would remind the seemingly forgetful Member for Saint-Laurent that our government made a major contribution towards the establishment of an agency called CITEC in her riding.

With respect to Montreal East, Mr. Speaker, which happens to be the island's worse off sector as a result of years of neglect on the part of our colleagues opposite, last year we invested $13 million in the Industrial Recovery Program for East End Montreal which attracted private sector investments of $65 million.

Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat in the House that, contrary to Mr. Picard's statement, a man whose professional credentials I duly acknowledge, the federal government is not primarily responsible for the economic recovery of the Island of Montreal. The impetus should originate from local circles and we intervene only to grease the wheels, not to set them in motion.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Before the election in October, 1988, the Prime Minister made several very strong statements. He said on October 15, "We are prepared to subject every federal undertaking and every undertaking on federal lands to a full environmental impact study". On October 20, he said: "No area is higher on our environmental priority list than the Great Lakes themselves". On October 1, he said: "We stand for a cleaner, safer environment".

In the Throne Speech, this government's last Throne Speech, we were told, and I quote: "The world itself is facing an environmental challenge of unprecedented magnitude". These are serious words but there is no serious action. This government is doing nothing. It now appears that even the Minister of the Environment does not have the support of his colleagues. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, when will he give this House a firm deadline for the introduction of the government's environmental plan?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as I think all members of the House know, it is exceedingly important that this country have the kind of legislation in place which will ensure that decisions of government respecting the environment made in the future will have clarity and certainty with respect to the responsibilities of this government, the responsibilities of the provinces and all the interested parties.

As we know, the ERP guidelines which we inherited when we came to power in 1984 have clearly been found to be inadequate. As a result of that, the Minister of the Environment has committed himself to the formulation of new legislation which is part of an environmental agenda. That legislation and the environmental agenda require the co-operation and participation of all departments within this government. It is absolutely essential that this legislation and this agenda be drafted in such a way that we avoid the mistakes and messes created in the past by that party over there. Therefore, we are ensuring that the legislation be done in such a fashion. Although it may be later than we would wish, it will meet the test when it is there.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

All that we can hear and all that Canadians can hear from the answer to the previous question is that this government was inadequate in 1984 in dealing with the environment, inadequate in 1988 and inadequate again in 1990. They cannot get their act together.

An hon. member: Six years later, nothing.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, Canadians are fed up waiting for the government to act.

Let me ask the Deputy Prime Minister something more specific. Earlier this week the city of Toronto committed itself to a 20 per cent reduction in carbon emissions by the year 2005. This was something the minister of energy rejected despite the recommendations of many experts.

Will this government take some real action and commit itself to a reduction of carbon emissions by the year 2005?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member refers to the government's record on the environment as being inadequate, she is really misstating the facts. Quite frankly, since this government came into power we have brought in a Canadian Environmental Protection Act that stands as a model in the world, a made in Canada acid rain control program. We have the toughest controls on car emissions of any country in the world.

When it comes to water, we released a comprehensive federal water strategy, a $110 million clean-up of the St. Lawrence River, a $75 million clean-up of the Halifax Harbour, a clean-up of the Sydney tar ponds. We have negotiated and signed the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement with the United States, created six new national parks, $106 million to South Moresby, the Rouge River Wilderness Park and created the first national marine park at Bruce Peninsula.

In addition to that, the leadership internationally has been outstanding both by the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment.

[Translation]

Mrs. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary for the Deputy Prime Minister. Canadians are fed up with the empty promises of this government. Throughout the electoral campaign the government kept saying it would launch effective environmental assessment programs. Last fall the minister promised to introduce this kind of legislation. When will the minister table his bill?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, what I enunciated on behalf of the Minister of the Environment were not promises; they were undertakings and they were accomplishments.

As has been pointed out in the Speech from the Throne and has been enunciated by the Minister of the Environment, he is working on a comprehensive plan. Included in that will be legislation. I hope when the legislation is brought forth that that party will not diddle-daddle and subvert the democratic and parliamentary process by refusing to debate legislation with innocuous points of order and disruptive tactics that do that party no good and the House of Commons no good either.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

This is a black Friday, finishing off a black week for the CBC. On Tuesday Canadians were told about budget cuts totalling $140 million.

There were 400 or 500 jobs slashed. Today we get the news of a children's program chopped which is regionally produced in four centres and seen in most parts of the country. This is step by step dismantling of a great Canadian institution. The next thing we know the government will be telling Canadian kids that they cannot watch Mr. Dress-up.

Is it the government's objective to preside over the destruction of the CBC? Is that the goal?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am told by members who attend the respective standing committee that the hon. member made quite a strong case about the fat that occurs in the CBC on Bronson Avenue. He made strong representations. Obviously, his representations have been taken into consideration by the management and they have acted.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister has just attacked the management of the CBC. He evades his own responsibility. It is quite clear what is happening. This government has slashed the CBC budget. The CBC has had no choice but to cut its regional program budget and this is not going to be the end of it. Down the road we are going to see program cuts at the network level. Canadians are not going to stand for this. What we are seeing is the slow death of the CBC, death by strangulation.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this. When is the government going to take its responsibilities seriously and provide support and leadership and not just a knife to the CBC?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it abundantly clear to the hon. members of the House that I am not attacking the CBC management. As a matter of fact we are supportive of the CBC management. We think they are doing a great job.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he really meant what he said. Is he in favour of the cuts that have occurred on Bronson Avenue? Obviously the management has taken cognizance of his representations and they have acted on the basis of some recommendations that are coming from members of the committee. I think that is the way the parliamentary process should work and I congratulate him.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the effects of the 7 per cent goods and services tax are a slap in the face to those Canadians who built this country.

My question to the Minister of Finance is this. How does this government plan to significantly compensate those seniors, including the 27,000 in my riding, living on fixed incomes, when we know the cost of day-to-day living will increase under this oppressive and regressive goods and services tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I commented on this yesterday and I will comment again. There are a number of items that are not taxed under the goods and services tax which are of direct interest and concern to senior citizens: basic groceries, meals on wheels, meals served in nursing homes, charges for health and dental care, hospital and nursing-home care, prescription drugs, medical devices. No tax will be charged on residential rents, on municipal transit, passenger ferry service, legal aid services and other financial services.

Eighty-four per cent of seniors will receive the benefit of the goods and services tax credit which is a cheque that is paid in advance four times a year to people who are eligible to receive it. As I have said, 84 per cent will receive that credit. The result is that a large proportion of senior citizens will be better off after sales tax reform than before.

The hon. member is shaking her head. These are the conclusions that have been arrived at by people in the Department of Finance. They have certified these numbers and if my colleague, the hon. member, disagrees with those numbers she has the responsibility to state precisely where those numbers are wrong. Otherwise she should not be leading senior citizens astray with this faulty information.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, many studies, including the Canadian Seniors Network report, disagree. They say seniors living on a tight budget near or below the poverty level will pay still more under this 7 per cent goods and services tax.

An hon. member: Clothing, services, home repairs.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I might ask hon. members to allow the member to put her question.

Ms. Phinney: Mr. Speaker, the clawback makes pensioners pay more. The 7 per cent goods and services tax will make pensioners pay more. When will this government accept its responsibility to seniors by providing them with security and an adequate standard of living and promise them that once the rate is set at 7 per cent, it will remain at 7 per cent; not 7 per cent this year, 9 per cent next year and 11 per cent by 1992?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hear again that the Liberal Party is supportive of continuing to pay seniors who are earning more than $50,000 for a program which we cannot afford. Surely the hon. member realizes the significance of the deficit and the debt problem that we are facing. Many seniors understand the significance of that. Many seniors have stated directly to me that they support our efforts to get the deficit down. That requires as broad a sharing of the burden as is possible.

For senior citizens, we have only asked those who are earning more than $50,000 to participate in sharing that burden. That amounts to 4.3 per cent of seniors to share partially and only 1.8 per cent of seniors will have to pay back, through the tax system, their full old age security payment. That, I think, is a fair approach to dealing with what we believe on this side of the House is a most serious problem and that is the problem of the debt of this country.

FINANCE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously rendered a decision in the Hall case that allows chartered banks to repossess farm machinery, cars and other chattels that are in default without any notice and without any consideration to any other creditor. This means that there are two standards in this country, one for the chartered banks and one for the rest of Canadian lenders.

Will the minister ensure this House that it will introduce changes to the Bank Act by removing this unfair advantage so that the chartered banks are placed on the same level as any other financial institution such as credit unions and trust companies in terms of security and enforcement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hear the representation that the hon. member has made. This is a decision that has been rendered quite recently and, once we have had an opportunity to review that decision, we will be making known our views.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary will be on a subject that was decided some time ago.

There are thousands of Canadians who have signed promissory notes at a given rate only to find that later the bank had unilaterally increased their interest rate. A number of legal decisions have already been rendered ordering the banks to repay these overcharges, estimated to be between $2 and $3 billion to farmers alone.

Will the government today put a freeze on the destruction of bank records which they are doing to hide the facts and when will it take steps to force the banks to pay back these overcharges?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there has been extensive discussion in past years on this particular issue. I think the hon. member is quite aware of the position that the government has taken. As regards the destruction of records, there are specific rules in the Bank Act. They vary from four to ten years. The hon. member will be able to participate in the discussion of the review of the Bank Act when the Bank Act is opened. It must be opened every 10 years and that is something we can look at then.

HOUSING

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of State for Housing. Prior to coming to the House I was in the construction industry. I still have many friends working in the home renovation industry.

They keep voicing their concerns to me about the implications of GST in the home renovation industry. They have concerns about whether or not these people are going to go to the underground economy and do things themselves. Has your department considered the implications of bringing GST in and what the repercussions will be for the home renovation industry.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as you are well aware, in other jurisdictions such as New Zealand where a similar tax to the GST has been introduced, there has not been growth in the number of people who have gone to the underground economy, the cash economy. Rather, it has been the reverse because if one goes on a cash basis one does not receive the benefit of the credits that flow from the GST that has been paid in the past. In that way, it is likely we will see less of an underground economy, particularly in the home renovation industry.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women said that the President of the Treasury Board had announced the fairest pay equity plan ever seen in this country.

The Human Rights Commissioner does not agree. The Commissioner severely criticized the President of the Treasury Board for acting unilaterally in deciding to grant women half the compensation to which they were entitled, by depriving them of benefits and denying them two years back pay, while failing to provide for any real equality in rates of pay.

When will the government stop this charade and pay women in the Public Service what has so long been rightfully theirs?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware that the President of the Treasury Board has announced a $317 million retroactive payment which amounts to an average of some $4,900 per person.

There is an ongoing amount of some $76 million per year which will be paid as recognition of the responsibilities that the government has taken on the question of pay equity. We believe that this is a generous and fair approach. We think that it recognizes the responsibilities that were acknowledged back in 1985 when the union–management committee was established.

I believe what my colleague the President of the Treasury Board has done is a very fair response.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance is obviously unaware that the human rights commissioner does not agree with him. He thinks these people are getting half of what they deserve, that equalization payments are not pay equity, that only salary adjustments are pay equity. He also believes they are being deprived of benefits and that this is a plan that comes nowhere near meeting the complaints these people, 70,000 of them, have before the Human Rights Commission and have had since 1983–84. Will this government stop stalling, stop hiding behind technicalities, stop trying to bribe people to give up on their rights and give people the pay they deserve.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to understand the attitude that the hon. member is expressing.

When we came into office, we recognized there was a problem that had been outstanding and festering for a number of years under the government of the party that she represents.

In 1985 we established a union–management committee. We have made retroactive payments to 1985. Seventy thousand public servants will benefit from these payments. I understand that the chairman of the Human Rights Commission has been in contact with the President of the Treasury Board and that the President of the Treasury Board will be communicating with him in due course, after he has had a chance to study his points of view.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board, but in his absence I will direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister. The regulations that arise from legislation are the tools with which the legislation is implemented. As far as I am concerned, a government that passed a bill 20 months ago and is reluctant to table a copy of the regulations in this House is negligent and does not have its priorities straight, and its priorities may even differ from those of most Canadians.

I would like to ask the Minister whether the regulations arising from the Official Languages Act will be published by this government very shortly. We have received notice of the regulations. We do not have the regulations themselves. After waiting for 20 months, considering that it will take another year before we can adopt them in this House, will this tiger ever have any teeth? Will there be any regulations so that we can implement this legislation in a manner that is fair and equitable?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I know that my hon. friend has long had an interest in the Official Languages Act.

The House will know the new Official Languages Act was passed some 18 months ago. In the intervening time the government has been carefully preparing new regulations. We do not suggest that this is something that is easily done. We want the regulations to implement the act. We want them to be done fairly and in the best interest of the public and our employees.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): There are three important areas in the regulations that we are expecting from this government. These deal with the language of service, that is the people of Canada wanting to receive services in their language from this government; the language of work, which gives Canadians the right to work in their language in the Public Service of Canada, and equitable participation which means that Canadians can have access to the Public Service of Canada according to an equitable representation.

In the book called Federal Regulatory Plan 1990 no mention is made of language of work. It has been dropped from the publication this year. Why is the government dropping at this time regulations promised to Canadians on language of work.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I reject the suggestion that the government is dropping anything. As I said earlier, the Official Languages Act was brought in under our previous administration. We have been working at all levels to try to come up with regulations which will implement the act. There is no suggestion of delay. There has been no suggestion of delay by anyone up to now, until my hon. friend came up with his question. This is something that we are working on. We make no apologies for trying to give the best regulations possible. When we have them ready they will be published.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Canadians are losing jobs at an unprecedented rate these days, particularly in the Atlantic region. The government could do a lot to alleviate the problems these people are having by implementing and passing legislation on the variable entry requirements instead of playing politics on the backs of the unemployed.

The government would have us believe that the changes in Bill C-21, which is being held up elsewhere, are the same as the variable entry requirements. This is no so and the Canadian public ought to realize it. In 40 of the 62 regions the increase is going to be six weeks and in the Atlantic region alone 45,000 people will not qualify for unemployment insurance.

In a statement, one of the major ministers of the region, the Minister for International Trade, said that what the workers in the Atlantic region ought to do is get off their duffs and stop complaining. When is this government going to get off its duff and introduce variable entrance requirements in this House, preferably before C-21 comes back?

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. As he knows, Bill C-21 is in the Senate. It has been there for some time and they are doing very little with it as far as I understand it. The minister is going to appear in the Senate next week so we may see a little movement on their part.

As the member knows, the variable entrance rates are already in the legislation because he travelled on the committee across the country.

There are numerous other programs in Bill C-21 that will help employment in the Atlantic region and other parts of Canada, particularly for workers over 65 and those who are in industries that are having some difficulty.

We are looking forward to the passage of the bill by the Senate. Perhaps if the member has any friends in the Senate he might like to encourage them to pass the legislation.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose I have any friends in the Senate but I have a lot of friends in the working communities. And they are all employed too.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fisher: I travelled with that committee and I know what the entrance requirements are in C-21. What I said before is absolutely true, that it is a lot worse than the variable entrance requirements would otherwise be.

In the absence of the Prime Minister, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he is going to get this government to pass this legislation and stop holding those unemployed workers up for ransom?

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have passed the legislation. Were you asleep? Where were you? We passed the legislation and the variable entry requirements for people in the Atlantic provinces are not worse, they are better. They would still only have to work for 10 weeks in order to qualify. The member should go back and re-read the minutes and he would know what he is talking about.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. VIA Rail has a Canrailpass which is similar to the Eurail pass and allows Canadians to see Canada for as little as possible.

I have a copy of a notice which was sent to all VIA reservation desks that, effective March 31 Canrailpasses are only available for sale to permanent residents of countries other than Canada. Some Canadians can purchase passes if they are members of a club, such as the Ambassador Club, but they can only use it for off-peak travel, with limited quantities available. Why are Canadians second class citizens on their rail service?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that VIA Rail is not the only company in the world which operates in this way.

In any case, the internal operations of the corporation are not, on a daily basis, determined by the Minister of Transport. I think my friend should address his question to the board or the management of VIA Rail which would be able to give the answer that the hon. member requests.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. At this time in our country's history when Canadians see regions of Canada pitted one against the other, leading to distrust by some of Canadians of other Canadians and when we are concerned about a weakening confederation, why would this government permit one of the mechanisms which allows Canadians to see Canada, to meet other Canadians and to explore our great country to be cancelled? Why is this government allowing VIA rail to cancel the Canrailpass?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to repeat what I said, I think this type of system is also used in Europe and, I suppose, for the same reason that it is used here in Canada. I will say that the operation of the company and the way its policies are arrived at is determined by the management of VIA Rail. Therefore, the question should be addressed to the management of VIA Rail.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries I want to put a question to my bosom pal for St. John's East, the parliamentary secretary and future minister. He will know that the Harris report—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: It is all right. The parliamentary secretary will—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put the question to whoever is supposed to answer?

Mr. Simmons: The parliamentary secretary will realize that about two weeks ago the finishing touches were put on the Harris report in St. John's. Could he indicate when he expects his minister will receive the report and when it will be made public? Does he know whether it will deal with the economic and social price which is being paid as a result of the northern cod situation? Finally, does he anticipate that there will be further quota cuts recommended by that report?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I would say everyone in Canada not just in Atlantic Canada, are anxiously awaiting the report of Dr. Harris with the analysis that he and the people who have been working with him have done in addressing the problems which face particularly the science, the quotas and the allocation of fish. It is not known exactly when the report will be provided to the minister. It is my understanding that his committee is still meeting to discuss the report in order to finalize it. I can assure the hon. member and the House that when the report has been received and the minister has had a chance to look at it, obviously he will make it available in this House, in Atlantic Canada and across the country. I think at that time he will be anxious to see how Canadians view the report and ask for suggestions on how it can be implemented to improve the Atlantic fishery and address the problems, not only in Newfoundland but also in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I will direct my supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Now that the Prime Minister has grudgingly come to the conclusion that there is a crisis in the Atlantic fishery, can the Deputy Prime Minister indicate whether it is the Prime Minister's intention to visit the Atlantic region, particularly Newfoundland, in the near future in response to a number of invitations to do so in order to take a first-hand look at the crisis and get an idea first hand of how deep that crisis is.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did not come to the conclusion that there was a crisis in the Atlantic fishery grudgingly. He acknowledged that. He said there was not a crisis in Atlantic Canada. He said there was a crisis in Atlantic fisheries. Premiers have made the same statement.

I want to assure the hon. member that the Prime Minister has taken a personal interest in this issue, as have cabinet ministers. This is very, very important. We are working on several options that will be available which I am sure will be very satisfactory and acceptable to the hon. member. I expect that a fairly comprehensive program will be announced in due course.

The Prime Minister has visited the Atlantic region on a number of occasions and has been warmly received. I am sure he will do so again and that he will be warmly received when he returns.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice, Attorney general of Canada and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour of tabling, in both official languages, the government's response to serveral petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-283, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (control of firearms).

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to strengthen our gun control laws and to make them more effective in screening out applicants for the firearms acquisition certificate who are dangerous, unstable or irresponsible.

The bill would implement a two week waiting period for those who apply for the firearms acquisition certificate. It would require the signature of two other citizens who would attest to the responsibility of the applicant. It would also require the firearms acquisition certificate for the purchase of ammunition. It would require that the permit be valid for only two years rather than five years so that on renewal the police would have an opportunity to reinvestigate the applicant for the firearms acquisition certificate.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition that has been certified correct under the Standing Orders. This petition relates to the goods and services tax. It has been signed by over 400 Canadians and others who express their concern with the government's proposal for the goods and services tax. These petitioners call upon the House of Commons to withdraw this tax and to institute a program of fair taxation.

I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that this petition has been signed by people in my riding from Thompson, Easterville, Lynn Lake, The Pas, Flin Flon, Snow Lake, Churchill, Ilford, Bissett, Cranberry Portage, Poplar River and Manigotagan.

In addition, other Canadians from Surrey, B.C., St. Eleanor's, P.E.I., Southport, P.E.I., Bathurst, New Brunswick, Shediac, New Brunswick, Campbellton, New Brunswick, Moncton, New Brunswick, Saint John, New Brunswick, Halifax, Nova Scotia, Greenwood, Nova Scotia, Toronto, Ontario, Oshawa, Ontario, Edmonton, Alberta, Charlottetown, P.E.I.

In addition, people from Florida, California, Argentina and Australia have signed this petition against the goods and services tax, proving that it is unpopular throughout the whole world.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition certified under Article 36 of our Standing Orders from 1,160 Canadians who call on the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on the wealthy individuals in corporations and cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden onto ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax, instead of through real tax reform.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians who object to the federal government's proposed goods and services tax or GST, which should really stand for the grief and suffering tax.

They urge the government to immediately withdraw this ridiculous proposal and replace it with meaningful and fair tax reform.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I have the duty to submit a petition signed by a number of residents of Regina and several other communities in Saskatchewan in which they deplore the fact that the government accepted the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction.

Therefore, the petitioners pray and call upon Parliament and the government to bring in such an amendment to the Human Rights Act without any further delay.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, I have two other petitions in which, like hundreds of thousands of other Canadians, these Canadians from a number of locations in Ontario humbly pray that the government cease and desist from its proposal to implement a goods and services tax and they request Parliament to so instruct and call upon the government to no longer try to pass such legislation.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of the minister from Lisgar—Marquette, signed by 42 petitioners who call upon Parliament to consider construction in skating and educational services and, therefore, exempt skating educational expenses from the proposed goods and services tax.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to introduce a petition entitled "Help Save the Rouge". Petitioners are calling on the Government of Canada to work with the Government of Ontario to establish the Rouge Valley, 10,000 acres of beautiful geography of Canada. It is a wilderness state. There is endangered wildlife there to be saved.

I was very pleased to hear the Deputy Prime Minister in Question Period today mention the Rouge Valley as a park and the commitment by the federal government of putting up $10 million to save the Rouge Valley.

It is my pleasure to present to the House today the names of the petitioners who wish to support this very important endeavour.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and privilege under Standing Order 36 to introduce a petition from a number of residents of Toronto who urge the government to join with the Assembly of First Nations and the Innu of Labrador in halting all war training in that area, particularly the low level flight training, and to cease to ask for a NATO base there, but to use the money instead for a development both of Canada's First Nations and of all Canadians.

• (1210)

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of residents of London, Ontario, Denfield, Alberta, and Thorold, Ontario, urging the government to cease reducing and eliminating VIA Rail services, to modernize existing equipment and build a high-speed passenger train between Montreal and Windsor.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition which has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions on the subject of the grief and suffering tax being foisted on Canada by the present government.

The petitioners, some 140 of them from throughout the province of Ontario, with particular emphasis on the community of Hawkesbury, a number of lakehead communities and the Kitchener—Waterloo area, condemn the government for bringing in a proposal which will shift the tax burden onto ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax. They ask instead that the government, if it is seriously concerned with the deficit situation, conduct a vigorous and real system of progressive tax reform for all Canadians.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition duly authorized under Standing Order 36 from residents of Vancouver, Delta, Iroquois Falls, Maple Ridge, Abbotsford, to name a few, who point out that the goods and services tax which is being introduced is an extremely unfair one because it taxes people, not on their ability to pay, but rather on their consumption. They point out that the government has not addressed the unfairness in the present tax system in that it is not applying it the way it ought to be and the way it is intended. They decry the fact that reading, haircuts, coffins, diapers, home heating fuel will be taxed.

I could also point out a few things that will not be taxed, but I will not go into that.

They ask that Parliament reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and enforce the present tax system fairly.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions on the Order Paper be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Last Wednesday, January 31, the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt concluded his remarks in debate on second reading of Bill C-62, by moving that the House do now adjourn. That motion was subsequently defeated on a recorded division.

When debate was resumed on the bill, the hon. member for Edmonton East rose on a point of order to suggest that the House was still entitled to the opportunity to proceed to the 10 minute question and comment period on the hon. member's speech.

The hon. member for Churchill and the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca have argued that the right to proceed with the 10-minute questions and comments period is the prerogative of the House, not that of the member who has just ended his remarks.

After listening to arguments the Chair deferred ruling on the point of order to check precedents and past practices and then recognized the hon. member for Calgary West.

The Chair indicated as well that the House would be allowed the 10-minute period if the point of order raised by the hon. member for Edmonton East were deemed to be legitimate.

[English]

The Chair is now prepared to offer a ruling. According to Standing Order 74(2), following the speeches of members speaking 20 minutes on the second reading of a bill, a period of 10 minutes, if required, is provided for questions and comments. The rule does not mention any qualification which would prevent the House from claiming this 10 minutes.

By practice, however, it has been established that if proceedings are interrupted before the 10 minute period is reached or exhausted and the member is not present in the House when debate is resumed, the Chair will recognize the next member seeking the floor. It is also true that there have been occasions when members moved superseding motions that were negatived only to have the House carry on to another member who was recognized without a claim being made for the 10 minute question and comment period.

On the other hand the House has frequently claimed its right to the 10 minute period after members have moved amendments to the motion for second reading or motions to extend the sitting in order to prolong the debate and the claim has not been denied.

However our research uncovered the fact that during second reading debate on a bill on March 14 and 15, 1985, the hon. member for Vancouver—Kingsway, now Member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, moved the adjournment of the House. The motion was defeated in the ensuing vote. When debate resumed the following day the hon. member asked for a 10-minute questions and comments period. Speaker Bosley ruled that the fact that the hon. member had concluded his remarks by moving a dilatory motion did not prevent the House from proceeding with the 10-minute period.

In the case now under consideration, which is practically a repeat performance of the precedent I have just referred to, the Chair must keep previous practice in mind and allow a 10-minute period when second reading debate on Bill C-62 resumes, if the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt is in the House to respond.

[English]

The Chair would like to thank all members for their understanding and for giving the Chair the necessary time to do some research and some reflection on this very technical point before rendering its decision.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—MULTICULTURALISM

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan:

> That this House condemns the intolerance and prejudice in Canadian society that damages the fabric of the nation and urges the government and all members of Parliament to play a role in strengthening understanding and respect among Canadians.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to speak on this motion today. It is a good motion and I commend the member for York Centre for having introduced it. The motion is:

> That this House condemns the intolerance and prejudice in Canadian society that damages the fabric of the nation and urges the government and all members of Parliament to play a role in strengthening understanding and respect among Canadians.

I wish to deal only with certain aspects of this subject as it is a very large one. I want to concentrate particularly on the problem of certain long term and unresolved racisms in Canada. I would like to deal with, in particular, the bias against blacks and indigenous people.

My point will be that the basic problem is organizational rather than individual, although there may be complaints about an employer making improper advances toward a female employee, and those may be justified. There have been complaints about the shooting of certain people. In both cases we find that it is too often a person of one of the visible minority races.

The problem, in my opinion, does not arise from an individual quirk. It arises mainly from the low economic and social status of those racial minorities and in particular the low economic and social status of our indigenous peoples and of our black peoples. These things have historical roots and they cannot be got rid of solely by preachments and declarations of how kind and just and honest Canada and Canadians really are.

We have to take account of what we have done in the past and figure out what we need to do to change it. With regard to black people, I refer to a study from our parliamentary library called Canada's Treatment of Black Immigrants by Michael O'Neill. He points out among other things that early in this century as the prairies were opening up, there was quite an increase of black immigration from the United States. There was hostility to this among the white settlers.

In fact, in 1911, the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier prepared, but never proclaimed, an order in council which would have effectively prohibited black immigration. Instead, and I quote:

> Unless the overt course of action was adopted, agents were sent into the American south to discourage black immigrants. Medical, character and financial examinations were rigorously applied at border points with rewards for officials who disqualified blacks. American railways were influenced to deny blacks passage to Canada. Continued under the Conservative government after the 1911 election, these efforts eventually succeeded in stopping black immigration into Canada by 1912.

Those who are familiar with complaints in our immigration system know that these practices did not stop in 1912 merely because for a time they stopped some black immigration.

I refer to another study on the legality of slave marriages because an immigration question often involves a question of family relationship and identifying a family relationship. I personally heard, and I know of others who have heard of comments by immigration officials who seemed to believe that because people are of a certain race, they have a standard of morality that is lower than the general Canadian standard of morality in marital matters.

Therefore, I would point out that in the United States, and also, of course, in the British Empire up until 1834, whites were allowed to own black slaves of both sexes. In fact, marriage was legally prohibited to black slaves because they were slaves. In all the southern states before the Civil War, they were not allowed to have the right to stay together if the owner chose to sell the father one way, the mother another way, and the child another way. They had no civil rights, and therefore no rights as a family. Husband and wife had no rights as husband and wife.

This has coloured the perception that white people have of black people, for example from the West Indies. It has, unfortunately, sometimes biased decisions about immigration of a family member such as a spouse or a child.

These things are easily forgotten by most white Canadians. They are not so easily forgotten by black Canadians. The latter, of course, is not limited to blacks. We had reference already to the racist lapel pins. One minister of the government expressed strong disapproval of them. However, he did not say, and since he did not come back for questioning I could not ask him, whether he had discussed this with his colleague, the Minister of Revenue Canada. I quote from the January 22 Financial Post.

> Canada Customs has ruled a controversial lapel pin imported from Taiwan does not constitute hate propaganda and will be allowed to enter the country.

This government is condoning racism to that extent by allowing Taiwan, which we do not recognize as a government, to send racist lapel pins to Canada.

I quote from a letter from Mr. George Elliott Clarke of Ottawa to the minister:

> Dear Mr. Minister:
> Being a seventh generation Afro Nova Scotian, whose ancestors escaped the slavery and bigotry of the post-bellum American south, I am outraged that your officials have apparently decided to permit the importation from Taiwan of a racist lapel pin which depicts a Sikh, an oriental and an African, all of whom, dressed in stereotypical costume surround a man of European descent wearing a business suit, and above whom appears the slogan, "Who is the minority in Canada?". This pin, though cleared by your officials is derogatory, offensive and utterly destructive of the dream of multiracial, multicultural and cosmopolitan Canada.

I have a quote also from a letter addressed to the same minister. I quote:

> Dear Mr. Jelinek:
> As a Canadian of black heritage, I am appalled that you as a minister of the Crown would condone the importation of these racist lapel pins now being made in Taiwan and marketed in Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. It should come as no surprise to you or your colleagues if they are eventually marketed in all provinces across Canada.

She points out further:

> The salient observation of the Donald Marshall report was that racism in the justice system played a major role in convicting this young Micmac Indian.

This is from Mrs. Anne John-Baptiste of Ottawa.

When immigrants come from the non-white countries, which for the most part the white countries still oppress economically, we have these prejudices against the immigrants who arrive from those countries and the oppression continues, for example, in the decision of the government to cut the overseas grants. I quote from an article in La Presse of February 1 referring to Stephen Lewis:

> Lewis said Canada could be a bridge between developing countries and the developed world. He said only Canada and the U.S. among developed countries have reduced foreign aid.

The kind of prejudice in Canada that was reflected in the study by the Urban Alliance Against Racism showed that in Toronto statistically a white person had three times as many chances of getting a job as a black person did. That kind of prejudice is not to be found only in the minds of certain employers or other individuals, it is found in the structures and organization of our internal relationships in Canada and of our external relationships. In Canada we have the case as cited in The Globe and Mail of January 11 under the heading "Ojibway civil servant subjected to racial insults, federal investigator says". The article reads:

> —Mary Pitawanakwat, a social development officer—

Ms Pitawanakwat is a social development officer for the multiculturalism branch of the Department of Secretary of State.

> —Ms Pitawanakwat complained to the human rights commission that she had been racially and sexually harassed. After she was dismissed she obtained an order from the Federal Court of Appeal instructing the human rights commission to investigate her case.

The article goes on:

> One employee heard an official call the Ojibway woman a "goddamn Indian," the investigator said.
> Another bureaucrat joked about being "scalped" by natives, and others made derogatory remarks about the laziness of natives.
> There is evidence that Ms Pitawanakwat was sexually harassed and subjected to special monitoring by the Regina office, the investigator said. She was also asked as part of her job to investigate allegations of drug offences within a native group—a request that was "unheard of and improper."

It might seem only that we have some bad apples in the management of that branch of the Ministry of State, of which the minister is so proud, as he told us this morning. In fact, that sort of attitude arises very naturally or easily from the fact that Canada continues after 300 years of white settlement here to oppress and to be unjust in many organized ways to the indigenous people of Canada.

We have the example of Nitassinan where the Innu people who have lived there 9,000 years are being strafed by low level flight training on the excuse that we need to do this to protect Canada against the Soviet Union. In fact, nobody believes there is any such need any more. Of course, it is good for business. The government has explained that it is worth billions of dollars if we can get a NATO base in Labrador. Therefore, the training program will go ahead. The government despises the Innu people who are objecting to our taking of their ancestral lands.

On a smaller scale, the same thing is being done with the Lubicon in Alberta where the government has quite illegally undertaken to split the Lubicon band so as to weaken their insistence on having the land claim settled that was promised to them decades ago. In Ontario, the provincial government in the same way ignores the rights of the native people in Temagami.

The point is that we have a structure of economic oppression and social abuse of the indigenous people in Canada which has become institutionalized in our habits and sometimes in our legal practices that result in, for example, a very large minority far out of proportion to the population inhabiting our jails.

It is not sufficient simply to preach against racism and to investigate individual cases through the Human Rights Commission or individual employer's practices. Those are useful things to do but they are not enough.

I do commend as one example a report that was done for Dalhousie University entitled, "Breaking Barriers: Report of the Task Force on Access for Black and Native People", chaired by Mr. A. Wayne MacKay.

This report, after showing how black people and Micmac Indians are hindered in having fair and full access to the university, makes certain recommendations. In general, the report recommends that the university must adopt four components of policy; (a) encouraging and assisting indigenous black and Micmac people to enter and complete the university's undergraduate degree programs; (b) restructuring and revitalizing the transition year program; (c) promoting black and Micmac participation in professional programs and (d) developing a university policy on educational equity, race relations and affirmative action in education which compliments Dalhousie's employment equity through affirmative action policy.

The report does not just state generalities. It states that the programs should be co-ordinated by the Registrar's office—they lay the responsibility there—as part of the university's larger recruitment effort and should comprise features such as, and I quote: "The involvement of black and Micmac students and alumni in recruitment efforts, parents nights in black and Micmac communities—"—that would be to explain this program—"—invitations to campus functions, such as open house and scholarships to attend many university and summer orientation programs".

The report goes further. It recommends that the university establish a number of renewable scholarships for blacks and Micmacs, that those who are not able to maintain grades should have the option of completing their programs with loans, that the awards office ensure that black and Micmac students in financial difficulty have access to bursary funds. It also recommends that the vice president of student services seeks to arrange summer and part-time employment for black and Micmac students, seeks to arrange the appointment of a black counsellor to provide advice and support to black students on campus, and seeks to establish a resource centre for black Canadian students on campus comprising adequate space to meet, study and house the students' counsellor. It recommends that the vice-president of finance and administration provide adequate university facilities and services at no cost to the office of the native education counsellor, thereby reflecting the value of that officer's contribution to the university.

If those recommendations are adopted, they will have some effect in reducing those historic organized institutional conditions in the province of Nova Scotia and in our country which encourage racism. This is the kind of action we have to study. It is far more than one government could do, even the federal government. But it must be done at whatever level of government we find ourselves, to search out the ways of providing the material means by which black people or Canadian natives, such as the Micmac people and, of course, the other visible minorities who have immigrated to our country as well, by which these people may be assured that they have full entry into education and other opportunities in Canada. The poverty that marks many of the black communities in Canada and most of the indigenous peoples communities in Canada can and must be eliminated through fair and honest treatment of the natural resources in the areas they inhabit.

Mrs. Browes: Madam Speaker, I want to compliment the member on his comments and his commitment. I know of his work in the Toronto area for and on behalf of his party to eliminate discrimination in Canada. He has brought up a number of items concerning research.

Yesterday, the Secretary of State and the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship tabled in the House of Commons the legislation for the establishment of a race relations foundation. I would like to ask the member if, with his commitment to the elimination of discrimination, we might be able to get the early commitment on behalf of his party to have the legislation to establish this foundation pass very quickly so we may get on with doing the work that he has suggested and the research that needs to be done.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. Since I have not had opportunity yet to read the legislation, I cannot substantially comment on its value. I was disappointed in the bill establishing the multiculturalism department because it lacked teeth. It made almost no reference to racism as distinct from ethnic conflict. It did not define the duties of the department or the minister and therefore it did not give a citizen the proper means of claiming upon his or her rights under that legislation. The legislation left the scope of the department and the minister so vague that if he chose to do something, or the department chose to do something, that might be fine, but the person in a minority position was not able to point to a statutory right or a statutory obligation to serve that would be given in a person who had that kind of need as a minority.

I would be very interested to see the detail of the legislation that was tabled yesterday. I can see the hon. member wishes to say more on the subject and I will listen attentively.

Mrs. Browes: Madam Speaker, I would be very pleased to send the member a copy and an outline of the bill. Without going into detail on this legislation today because we are debating another motion, it is primarily to carry out research activities, to facilitate consultation, and to publish and disseminate relevant information concerning it. I think this is going to be a very good foundation that will be able to get information, feed in information, and then allow volunteer organizations, police commissions and such to get the kind of information that we need from an up to date national collection of data. It will be involved with the developing and training approaches in materials and effective policies and approaches for the elimination of racism and racial discrimination.

I will be very pleased to send this to the member and I look forward to discussing this with him in the House in the very near future.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I think research can be very useful. I would be interested to learn the details and scope of the plan. There has been research from time to time. For example, in our library there is a book in typescript called *I*Racial Discrimination in Canada, The Black Experience* by James W. St. George Walker. I understand, and it is curious, that this book was never published in the usual sense. It exists in perhaps several hundred copies in typescript. It cannot be found in our public libraries and it has never been printed in the usual way in an ordinary print format. If it is limited to about 400 copies then it has not been much use to the black or white people of Canada.

I hope that the institution the minister is proposing will be an open institution and that research done, and especially research that should be done by black people, by Canadian aboriginal people and by other visible minorities, will be identified, advertised and made readily available throughout public libraries and other systems of information rather than neglected as this rather good study found itself.

Mr. Fisher: Madam Speaker, I would like to commend the Hon. Member for Spadina for an excellent speech. He pointed out a lot of things that are good in our nation and some things which are certainly in need of improvement. I know that he has done a lot of work in the field of immigration and I think in the context of the motion we are debating today immigration certainly has to be one of the aspects of it.

I was wondering if the hon. member, in light of his experience in the field, could expand on some of the things he feels this government and this nation should be doing in the realm of immigration to ameliorate some of the problems we have as far as racial tension and inequality is concerned.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. Since my time is short, I want to mention briefly a couple of things. At present, our immigration department has the responsibility for determining whether an applicant for landed status in Canada is acceptable under the rules. One of the rules is that if a Canadian is married to a non-Canadian the spouse has a right to be sponsored by the Canadian spouse. That is qualified by the question of whether the marriage is a bona fide marriage or a marriage of convenience for immigration purposes only.

I have been distressed to find that this rule has been misused in many cases, for whatever reason, by the immigration officials concerned in order to delay, delay and delay the entry of the non-Canadian spouse into Canada. I have heard of it happening to spouses from countries of Asia and the West Indies. I have never heard of it happening from Britain, France or from western Europe. I have heard of it happening from South America but not from white countries.

So I have to believe that while there are cultural differences in marriage customs and in expectations of permanency of marriage that in those cases racial prejudice overrode the obligation of our officials. This is something that has to be examined within our department.

The other matter is the single biggest injustice that Canada has committed toward non-white peoples by the denial of land claims of the aboriginal peoples of Canada. I do not see how we can honestly look in the eyes of peoples from other non-white races when we are refusing legitimate justice to our own Canadian aboriginal peoples. That lapel pin about which we spoke reflects a guilty fear that our sense of superiority is based on the fact that we had guns and those people did not, or we had more guns than those people did and, therefore, we are better than they are. We are afraid that some day they might turn the tables and, therefore, this fear of people of a different skin colour reflects our guilty recollection of our own military conquest of them. That has to be acknowledged before we can have a clear policy either toward our own aboriginal peoples or toward non-white immigrants.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today and I will be sharing my time with one of my colleagues.

Each of us knows there is a gulf between the aspirations and reality out there. That gulf is widened by prejudice and discrimination. In the form of racism they shatter the lives of individuals and destroy nations.

Racism is an uncomfortable word for us. It is an uncomfortable topic. But it is a reality that we have come grudgingly to acknowledge here in Canada and one that we must face up to.

What does racism do to us? UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, put it in a nutshell in its 1967 statement: "Racism stultifies the development of those who suffer from it, perverts those who apply it, divides nations within themselves, aggravates international conflict and threatens world peace". What does racism cost a society such as ours? It costs us young people who turn to the illusory opportunity of drugs and crime because they cannot see or find other opportunities or expectations for their future. We pay the cost of alcoholism, in lost productivity, in family violence, in the trivialization of relationships and the devaluation of human life, others and our own, born of the endless and ultimate overwhelming frustration of alienation, of never belonging.

The cost is in increased welfare and social services, in increased health care and mental health care, in the resources which must be spent on law enforcement and incarceration instead of universities, libraries and literacy programs. But, most of all, the cost of racism is in people who no longer know how to talk to one another or even begin to work with one another to solve problems that they share in common. It becomes the destruction of that trust and respect for one another which, in the final analysis, is what binds and holds us all together as a community.

We have to face up to what the researchers and the evidence tells us. It tells us that many Canadians actually believe in the theory of racial superiority, that one Canadian in seven carries out acts of open discrimination. Imbalance and discrimination does exist. Prejudice, discrimination and the virtual exclusion of visible minorities and native Canadians have been the standard operating procedure in much of the Canadian life for just about as long as anyone can remember.

How can we accept that blacks are turned down three times as often when looking for rental accommodation? Or that a black applicant is offered only one job for every three offered to a white? Or that a Micmac can spend years in prison for a crime that he did not commit? Or that products with demeaning stereotypical representations of minority Canadians can find ready markets? Is there any justification? Well, of course, there is not and we all know it. In order to eliminate racism in Canada, we have to comprehend how and why it works the way it does, how it perpetuates itself generation after generation. We must make our way beneath the paint on the surface, as British writer Paul Gilroy put it. We must understand this frightening ultimate perversion that makes the victim himself responsible for his fate.

The stereotyping that we see in broadcasting and advertising, the jokes told in locker rooms all contribute to making possible the act of discrimination itself and they help justify it afterwards.

But a great myth is the idea that racism is somehow part and parcel of the human condition, something we have to accept whether we like it or not because we cannot change it. Racism is not part of the human spirit. We can change racism. We do not have to live with it in our society or in any society. As Canadians we cannot allow racism to corrupt our own principles. We must uphold the values of equality and social justice. They are centre to who we are as Canadians. To cure this cancer there must be firm, clear and determined leadership.

In this proclamation of the United Nations Second Decade for Action to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, the Prime Minister expressed the will of this government when he called on us all, and I quote: "To work together toward the day when racism and racial discrimination become history and when every Canadian can participate fully and equally in the life of our country".

We have put into place structures and mechanisms to take up this challenge. This government introduced the Employment Equity Act. Then in July, 1988, the Canadian Multiculturalism Act was unanimously adopted by both Houses. This provided a legislative base for new directions for multiculturalism programs featuring a major new race relations and cross-cultural understanding program. Through these programs Multiculturalism and Citizenship Canada is forging strong partnerships in all sectors of society; business, labour, professional groups, municipalities and community-based volunteer organizations and to take action to eliminate racism and racial discrimination in Canada. These partnerships are active—and I want to give you several examples—building awareness through public education, changing the policies and practices of our own institutions, finding out more about racism and racial discrimination and how to fight it with the foundation that we are establishing, working to set the example in federal institutions and agencies and working together with other levels of government.

Yesterday, the Secretary of State and Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship tabled a bill in the House to establish the race relations foundation. We look forward to early passage of this bill in order to get this foundation going. The new department of multiculturalism and citizenship to be established by Bill C-18 will be another permanent expression of the government's commitment to fighting tolerance and prejudice and another important resource in this battle.

March 21 is International Day designated for the elimination of racial discrimination. It will be the focus for a major public education campaign again this year. Events are being organized in communities across the country, and Canadians in all parts of the country will have an opportunity to get involved personally. I encourage everyone to take part. This is an occasion for each of us to affirm our personal commitment to equality, to our fellow Canadians and to a stronger Canada in the days and years ahead. Only if we stand up, each in our own way, for the values that we share as Canadians can we stand with pride and look with confidence to the future.

Mr. Skelly (Comox–Alberni): Madam Speaker, just a short question for the speak who just spoke.

One of the problems that we have experienced in Canada is actually institutionalized racism, racism that seems to have the sponsorship of the government.

The concern that I have had over the past little while is the number of petitions and letters I have received, not just from my constituents, but from constituents across Canada with respect to opening the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to members of the Sikh religion and the fact that devout Sikhs cannot serve in the RCMP without wearing the turban and other symbols of their religion. It means that they are barred from serving in the national police force of Canada.

I am wondering what the ministry of the Secretary of State has done in order to make it possible to open the RCMP to devout Sikhs by allowing changes in the uniform allowing Sikhs to wear turbans. There is a necessity for this change to take place. It has been recommended by the senior officers of the RCMP and it is also a necessity to provide adequate policing within the Sikh community itself in Canada. I am wondering what has been done in that respect. I know there is a long delay with the Solicitor General in making a decision. Just what has been in that respect?

Mrs. Browes: Madam Speaker, I think the members of the House appreciated the opportunity provided by the Speaker yesterday to meet with members of the Sikh community. We spent about an hour with them. It was very enlightening to all of us and I know the member who just spoke was also at that session.

Members of the Sikh community met yesterday with the Solicitor General. They were very satisfied with the meeting and I understand the Solicitor General told the community at that time that he would be making an early decision on the recommendation from the Commissioner of the RCMP concerning the wearing of turbans. I believe the Solicitor General recognized that the decision has taken some time but he has been consulting with a number of groups across the country.

In relation to the pins and buttons referred to by previous speakers, I want to draw to the attention of members the pin that I saw recently. I hope to get one. Around the edge it shows people of visible minorities holding hands. Around the edge of the pin it says, "Canadians working together". I think that is the message that we, as members of Parliament, want to send out to the people of Canada, that we have people of all visible minorities, every person making up this great wonderful country of Canada holding hands and working together.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I listened with a great deal of understanding and pride in what I am hearing in the House today as hon. members get up and speak to this motion.

The hon. member who has just spoken spoke about some new initiatives that the government is undertaking to try to bring about a greater awareness of minority groups, of the differences that we have as Canadians and to try to bring about a better understanding from all Canadians.

There are certain pieces of legislation that are in effect such as the employment equity legislation. Rather than building new structures, does she not agree that perhaps we should go and look at the existing structures, such as the employment equity legislation? It is a very progressive piece of legislation. But it has no compliance mechanism; it has no teeth. It sets about almost a panacea of what we would all like to see. But it is very weak in the compliance section. I would like to get the hon. member's comments on that to see whether or not she believes there are things we can do as parliamentarians in a non–partisan fashion on both sides of this House to ensure that the legislation in effect is as effective as possible.

Mrs. Browes: I am really pleased the hon. member asked that question because it is a very progressive piece of legislation. I had an opportunity to sit on that legislative committee when the bill was being discussed.

When we were discussing the legislation, the importance that we put on it was that we wanted results. All parties wanted results. What we wanted was to give the companies which were contracting with the federal government an opportunity to put those affirmative actions of visible minorities, the disabled, within their own structure. We wanted to have that data base of one, two and three years.

We have the second report. The first report was the benchmark, and everything is going to flow from the benchmark report. So it is important that we look at the subsequent reports in order that we do have results out of the employment legislation.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Madam Speaker, the issue before us relates to the attitudes and acts of prejudice, discrimination and intolerance in our society.

As representatives of the various constituencies across this country, I expect all of us in this House have from time to time heard the claims of the disadvantaged members and groups in our communities. Over the years, several broad-ranging studies by committees of the House and the Senate have documented the phenomenon of intolerance.

"Obstacles", the report of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped evidences the difficulties of the disabled people. "Equality Now", the report of the Special Committee on Visible Minorities in Canadian society speaks to the problem of racism, and "Equality For All", the report of the parliamentary committee on equality dealt with the equality issues in federal laws.

We can also find many clear and objective studies in the provinces. McAlpine reported on the activities of the Ku Klux Klan in British Columbia, for example, and more recently, there was the report of the Marshall inquiry in Nova Scotia. We cannot close our eyes to the fact that prejudice and intolerance remain a fact of life for many Canadians.

Happily, I think that the overt conscious acts of discrimination based on ignorance and fear, hatred and intolerance are now socially disparaged. That direct form of discrimination and prejudice is widely regarded as the work of fringe elements in our communities. The general reaction to racists in the hate propaganda cases that were recently before the Supreme Court was one of some surprise and mild shock that such violent, anti-Semitic and other racist propaganda, would still be the stuff of the 1990s.

The fact that the Keegstra case had to go to court substantiates the point that the poison still flows, that it can contaminate the equal, multicultural society that our Charter enshrines, and that it has a propensity to promote attitudes that can lead to intercommunal strife and violence.

We have some tools to respond to the fringes when their intolerances become intolerable. We have some controls to deal with the extremes such as the Criminal Code or the provisions of the Human Rights Act across the country. The law exists to deter and repress the most extreme cases of prejudice and an issue for the future, once the court has ruled on the Keegstra case, may be the adequacy of our laws.

What is more insidious to me is the level of indirect discrimination that is implicit in the results of the reports of the Employment Equity Act, or the figures of complaint in the annual reports of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. We have too many employers who seem to share our shock at the purveyors of racial hatred, but who have, nonetheless, no visible minority representation in the work force. Women, natives and disabled people know the polite smile that too often accompanies literal compliance with our Human Rights Code, but that nonetheless deprives them of their fair share of the fruits of our economic and social progress.

The tools to moderate this kind of discrimination are more subtle but vitally important to the shape of our society in years to come. The roots of intolerance lie in the base of ignorance, the fear of the unknown. The only long-term weapon against the attitude of intolerance is familiarity, the sense of community that comes with the understanding of others.

Understanding depends on enlightenment. We need to break down the barriers of ignorance through education and I am optimistic at what I see. For example, community relations courses for our police forces across the land; continuing education efforts for judges and lawyers to familiarize them with cultural, racial and other differences; a uniform human rights education program for elementary schools developed by the Human Rights Foundation with federal help is now being implemented in different provinces; promotional and educational assistance to advance the evolution of employment equity and pay equity provided by the Departments of Labour, Employment and Immigration; modest funding programs at the Departments of Justice and Secretary of State to help kick start a bit of research and promotional efforts; and publicity and promotional activities by our Human Rights Commission to bring the message of equality and fairness down to the grass roots.

Admittedly, we have a long way to go to deal effectively with the apparent benign but socially insidious influence of discrimination and intolerance. Modest resources are tightly stretched with limited prospects for expansion. We are doing a lot with what we have, but we still need a lot more to do to make the impact that is needed. The legal rights to equality and the statutory protection against discrimination are needed for the hard cases that cannot be settled.

But it lies in our hands to lead by example, to support our community groups, to promote the educational efforts that will make tomorrow's society one that is tolerant, not merely tolerable.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, the issue before us today in this opposition day motion is one that I think every member of Parliament takes seriously, and one that I hope all Canadians take seriously.

Racism is a scourge upon our society. It is easy for me to say that as somebody who is white and Anglo-Saxon in a country that is primarily white and Anglo-Saxon. But if you sit back and listen to the cries and the stories of individuals in Canadian society who have been stung by the burr of racism, you will know that there is probably not one single other issue that we as parliamentarians face whereby with a combined effort we can have a more positive effect on the lives of tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of Canadians who find themselves members of minority groups.

In the last few years as our society has developed and we have become much more sophisticated—at least we think we have—a disturbing trend has emerged. That disturbing trend is the increasing intolerance to those amongst us who are different. We hear about it linguistically and we hear about it in reports such as the Marshall inquiry from my home province of Nova Scotia. We hear it from some segments of society when it comes to the wearing of turbans in the RCMP by Canadians of Sikh origin. We see it all around us. Sometimes, because it is there but it is never quite at the surface, we neglect to take it as a very serious issue, and by our inaction we become an accomplice to the sin in our society of racism and intolerance.

In my riding in Nova Scotia there is the largest native black community in Canada, in North Preston, East Preston and the Cherry Brook area. The forefathers of the individuals who live in those communities came to Canada over 300 years ago, well before my ancestors came to this country. Yet I am lucky, because my family, my children, myself and my parents had benefited from the wealth that is Canada. I wish I could say the same for those families that have been here a lot longer than my family that live in some of the minority communities in my home province, in my own riding.

The original peoples of Canada, the indigenous peoples have suffered for hundreds of years from racist attitudes and at times the complete ignorance and lack of concern for the contribution that they make and want to make to Canadian society. Many times we deny them the right to participate.

Last night while trying to put some notes together for today I thought about racism. Unfortunately, many of our views about racism come from watching television from south of the border. We look at what is happening in the United States. Most of what I knew before I became the member of Parliament for the riding of Dartmouth unfortunately was influenced by the American experience with minority groups.

Many Canadians do not understand that there was overt racism practised in Canada, in the 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s. Indeed, there was a case in Nova Scotia in the 1940s where a lady by the name of Viola Desmond was charged in court because she did not sit in the black only section of a theatre in New Glasgow, Nova Scotia. That was in the 1940s.

Then some of us wonder why members of minority communities talk about the discrimination that has been inflicted upon them by society. We must understand that the history of the treatment of minority groups is nothing we should be proud of.

In my community in Nova Scotia there have been a number of recent reports. The Marshall inquiry issued a scathing indictment of the justice system in the province of Nova Scotia. I am hoping that parliamentarians in this place and in other legislatures across Canada and Nova Scotia particularly will take that report seriously and look at the flaws that have been identified to ensure that our justice system is open and equal to every Canadian.

In September Dalhousie University issued a task force report on the responsiveness of the post-education system in Nova Scotia to the needs of native and black Canadians, and again issued a scathing indictment.

One of the problems is that the racism is no longer as overt. When we do see it as overt we try to change it. Unfortunately, over the last 15 to 20 years racism has gone underground. It has become systemic, and it is systemic racism that challenges each one of us as Canadians to root out and to kill.

In my community in Dartmouth we did a study called "Education Income in the Watershed Area". This black community is only six miles from the city of Dartmouth, a city that suffers only 6 per cent unemployment. In that black community of thousands of individuals that has been there for over 300 years, we found that on average a young black male could expect to earn 42 per cent less than the average non-black male in the Halifax-Dartmouth area.

We found that the levels of high school completion in academic programs was much lower for black students, not because they did not want to succeed, but because the school system was not responding to the different needs of various minority communities in Nova Scotia.

We also found some disturbing trends in types of employment. If you looked at the black community as opposed to the larger community in Nova Scotia, 39 per cent of the residents of the Watershed community, the black community, and 61 per cent of county residents work in white collar operations, while 61 per cent of Watershed residents and 31 per cent of county residents work in blue collar occupations.

We are dealing with something very deep and very systemic, but nevertheless something that is very dangerous. What we are doing by allowing systemic racism to exist in our society is creating a situation whereby we are robbing young people in minority communities of the right and the ability to dream, to dream about what they can be and what they want to do. When they look around and see people who have graduated from Grade 12 or have gone to university, they see that they are not getting the same jobs as their white counterparts. When they look around and see the types of jobs they are getting and the treatment that they get, it robs them of their ability to dream of where they can go and what they can be in this country.

This government and successive governments has tried over and over again to deal with this problem. I think that by and large we have failed and we failed for a number of reasons. One is that the provincial governments and the federal government has refused to put the necessary resources forward, especially in times of restraint, to do the job that has to be done. Canada Employment and the programs that come down from the CEC should target specifically the black, minority, and native communities in Canada. If a community suffers 40 per cent of the unemployment in an area then my view is that it should receive 40 per cent of the dollars that are available through government programs to alleviate the unemployment problems.

I would like to close my comments with a poem which I think is appropriate when we talk about Canadians trying to understand the role of minority communities in this great fabric that is our country. Many times we try to force minority communities to be more like the non-minority communities, to be more like me or to be more like us. This is a poem from Rita Joe, a native Micmac Indian, entitled Song of Eskasoni:

I lost my talk

The talk you took away.

When I was a little girl

At Shubenacadie school,

You snatched it away:

I speak like you

I think like you

I create like you

The scrambled ballad, about my word,

Two ways I talk

Both ways I say,

Your way is more powerful.

So gently I offer my hand and ask,

Let me find my talk

So I can teach you about me.

That is a lesson to which every Canadian should listen. If they practice it, I know that the scourge of racism in our society is something that can be eliminated.

Mr. Bjornson: I would like to compliment the member for Dartmouth on a fine presentation this afternoon. I think it was well received in all parts of the House.

One of the comments I made earlier and the hon. member referred to was legislation. For quite some time now we have had very significant legislation dealing with these issues and legislation seems to have failed us. He is making recommendations that perhaps we should bring in further legislation. I am of the opinion that maybe education is the way to go. I feel far more friendly, I do not know if that is the right word, to people with whom I have become associated because I have come to know them personally. No law of the land would make me like that person more, but the association with any person, whether it be a visible or invisible minority, is important.

Perhaps the member could comment on whether or not he feels this government is going in the correct direction in its educational programs.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The hon. member has raised some very valid points. Governments cannot do it by themselves, but at the same time government and members of legislatures, members who hold public office and are community leaders have an absolute responsibility to set the parameters of acceptable behaviour in our society and to reflect what Canadians believe to be acceptable behaviour.

This is the place to which we have been elected. I look to this place and to governments to ensure that the programs they put in place do not further contribute to the problem. Specifically, the member asked about education. I do not think the education system in our country, which is a provincial jurisdiction, has done its job. I simply think that if you look at the education system in any province where there are large or small numbers of visible minorities, for example, the history of the native community is not taught in the perspective as seen by natives. It is taught through a white perspective. The history of the black community in Nova Scotia, which is an important history and an important part of Canadian culture and heritage, is taught, when it is taught, through white eyes and in a period of time and by authors of 100 or 200 years ago who lived in a society where racial discrimination, bias and bigotry were acceptable.

I wonder why a black or native student in Nova Scotia is less likely to graduate from high school with an academic diploma. Why is it that they are streamlined into general programs? Why is it when you talk to some of the people who are in charge of the system, and I am not talking about the educators in the schools, they state that "We are educating more blacks and more native people for things that they can do, like clerk in stores."

So the attitudes are still there and they must be tackled with the resources necessary to change the curricula in schools, the resources necessary to ensure that programs are responsive and give equality of opportunity to quality education to every student in Canada no matter what their race, what their colour, what their religious belief. That is something that governments have to do. They will set the example.

In my community, we had a very difficult situation last year at Cole Harbour High in which there was what the media said was a race riot but which in fact was a fight in the school yard between two groups, one primarily white and one black. I want to put on the record what the community did because it is something that everybody in Canada should know about that situation. The community did not divide when that happened. The community came together.

Two weeks ago I attended a dinner. It was on the first anniversary of the situation at Cole Harbour High. It was not a dinner for blacks, it was not a dinner for whites. It was a dinner for people from both communities involved who were concerned about what had happened at that school and who were concerned about the root problem that caused that confrontation.

After that situation happened, instead of taking the anger and using it in a divisive way, leaders from the black community and leaders from the white community, from the Cole Harbour area and from the Eastern Passage area, came together as a parent organization to try to understand each other, so that they could understand the problems that caused this fight between their children. As a result of that type of positive community action, we have come a long way.

I thank God that there are people in my community and in communities across Canada who do not just sit back and wallow in negativism and who just do not accept racism as something that is going to be among us, but who go out and put the effort necessary into understanding at the community level, at a personal level, to tear down those barriers of ignorance that have for all too long a period of time caused racism to be perpetuated in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott–Russell): Madam Speaker, I must admit I do not find the subject we are discussing today very congenial, and I am referring to intolerance and prejudice.

A Quebecer by birth and a Franco–Ontarian by choice, I had the great privilege of learning both official languages of our country at a very young age: French of course, since both my parents were Francophones, and English because of the environment in which I grew up.

Madam Speaker, discrimination, prejudice and intolerance are like so many diseases that plague our society, and if no remedies are forthcoming, the consequences may be not only unpleasant and distressing but even devastating for our country. I am thinking, for instance, of Lebanon, Sri Lanka and Northern Ireland, where we see how intolerance can destroy every vestige of human dignity.

Earlier this week, Madam Speaker, municipal authorities in Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, passed a resolution declaring their municipality officially unilingual English, of course.

The city council took this step on the basis of a petition signed by several thousand residents of Sault Ste. Marie. Why? Are the vast majority of Sault Ste. Marie residents bigots? Probably not. Are their elected municipal representatives racists? I hope not. I would rather think they were misled, that they made a serious mistake. Inexcusable, if you wish, but still a mistake.

Last fall, Ontario's Bill 8 came into force. Under this legislation, the province guaranteed Franco–Ontarians living in certain designated areas access to services in French. I am of course referring to provincial services. A municipality may offer services in French and even declare itself bilingual, but it certainly has no legal obligation to do so. So why should it declare itself officially unilingual?

[English]

Madam Speaker, a small group of individuals, with their own agenda, are trying to have these resolutions adopted by certain municipal councils in Ontario, stating that bilingualism is something that municipalities cannot afford, and in alleged retaliation for Quebec's Bill 178, which forbids English outdoor signs.

As I said previously, no municipality is forced or in any way compelled to offer French language services in Ontario, even though, in my view, many of them should.

In regard to Bill 178, two wrongs, of course, do not make a right. But it should be noted that the services offered to English speaking residents of Quebec are by and large far superior to those offered to franco Ontarians.

What is most disturbing to me is the message that this kind of declaration sends. Let me try and draw a parallel or two for you, Madam Speaker, and for our colleagues in this House.

If a municipality did not participate in programs to promote racial equality, could it then, using the same logic, declare itself uni–racial? Hopefully not. If a corporation, or a municipality, or anyone else, failed to provide facilities for the disabled, or failed to hire disabled individuals, could it then advertise itself as a disabled–free zone, or any other such name? Again, the answer is no, of course.

Similarly, a municipality or corporation that does not offer French language services certainly need not call itself officially unilingual. The fact that it does not offer these services to its minority, particularly when the minority is composed of a large group of individuals, is unfortunate enough in itself.

To advertise it, in my opinion, constitutes an insult, not only to that minority, even though that is true as well, but to all members of minority groups right across this great country.

The linguistic duality of Canada has been recognized consistently from the Quebec Act of 1774. The fact that Canadians in significant numbers possess an ability to speak one or even both of our official languages represents an immense wealth to our citizens and to our country as a whole. It is a richness worth preserving and worth cherishing.

I call upon all my colleagues in the federal, provincial and municipal office to resist falling into any trap such as this one that divides Canada. Let our country be a land of tolerance where Canadians will feel free and will feel at home everywhere, be they French, English, native, or part of the multicultural community of Canada.

• (1330)

Madam Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to congratulate the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) on the motion he presented before the House today.

I believe that all Canadians, especially those who hold public office, have a duty to speak to this issue. I hope all parliamentarians will do so.

[English]

It has been said before, of course, that all that needs to happen for evil to triumph is for good people to do nothing. It is our duty to do something to ensure that evil does not triumph, particularly not on this issue.

I want to ask all my colleagues to join me to ensure that we all speak out for Canadian unity and for Canadian tolerance. Our country was built on that so let us make sure that it is not destroyed by these kinds of unfortunate actions.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I listened to the eloquent speech by my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and I cannot help but stand up and truly convey to him my sincerest appreciation.

As he spoke of human dignity, I was reminded of what has been written. Do we speak of the dignity and the beauty of a star? Do we speak of the beauty of a mountain? No, when we speak of human dignity we do not speak in terms of the glory of a mountain, in the glory of an object but in the glory of the individual. That individual must affirm oneself, and that is the essentiality of life itself.

I am also struck by his comment that those of us in government, the persons who are in power, must treat those other individuals with care. Those are the two concepts that are crucial when we speak of human dignity.

I congratulate my colleague, the member for York Centre, in introducing this motion in which he tells us that intolerance and prejudice exists in Canada and then challenges us to condemn that because intolerance and prejudice definitely will destroy the fabric of our nation. We ought to be reminded that the threads that constitute the fabric of our nation are the cultural, social, economic and political factors.

As we address these many issues as alluded to by my colleague, then one day truly we will say that bigotry, intolerance and injustice will be history in the history of our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I will take only a few moments to thank the hon. member for his kind remarks. I am happy to see, Madam Speaker, that there are many in this House who take this question very seriously. I hope we all do so and that in the days and weeks to come, we will be able to fight the latest unfortunate development we are seeing in this country, and that we will all work together to ensure that Canadians acquire a better knowledge and understanding of each other. I hope that unfortunate events such as those we have seen in the past few days will never happen again.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Charlesbourg (Mrs. Tardif).

Mrs. Monique Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Before I begin, Madam Speaker, I wish you to know that I will share the time allocated to us with one of my colleagues.

Madam Speaker, it is with deep emotion that I rise to deal with the motion which is before the House today and which, as the previous speaker reminded us, not only condemns intolerance and prejudice in our Canadian society, but urges—that's the part I wish to emphasize—the governement and all members of Parliament to play a role in strenghtening understanding and respect among Canadians.

Madam Speaker, it is indeed important to encourage mutual respect and understanding between Canadian men and women, especially in an area as basic as our linguistic duality, the recognition and promotion of both our official languages.

As next week will mark the 25th anniversary of the tabling of the Royal Commission on Bilinguism and Biculturalism Preliminary Report, I suggest it is important to see that this issue is still part of the current events, that there are new challenges and that we must strive to meet them.

[English]

Why? Because it is directly related to a fundamental component of our country's identity. Linguistic duality is part and parcel of our history and our evolution and I am proud of the renewal of our government's commitments in this regard.

After 20 years, Madam Speaker, this government decided to rejuvenate the Official Languages Act and included a new and extremely important promotion role for the Secretary of State.

By so doing, it gave a new impetus to a whole series of support and operation which we do not always take the time to identify and emphasize. Whether in the federal–provincial context, through exchanges with non governmental agencies or initiatives within linguistic minorities throughout this country, we should bear witness to these efforts and accomplishments, great or small.

[English]

Such efforts are visible, tangible signs of our country's openness and generosity. They show how together our linguistic duality and cultural diversity provides exciting opportunities for personal and social enrichment.

[Translation]

Many of these initiatives are major projects and collective realizations. They include the establishment for Francophones, together with the Ontario Government, of a College for Applied Sciences and Technology, agreements with the Saskatchewan Government providing for a variety of means to support the recognition of the French language, the promotion of teaching and the enlightenment of the French minority. Other agreements provide for the promotion of the official languages in Nova Scotia and various services to minority communities in Prince Edward Island and Quebec. Other agreements provide for the creation of new Francophone community school centers in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, like in New Brunswick.

We also signed a new memorandum of understanding on official–language instruction with the Council of Ministers of Education. These are landmark events.

Francophone parents outside Quebec are brought together and strengthened by the National Commission of Francophone Parents, and Canadian Parents for French is working in many communities for the teaching of French as a second language. Organizations to represent English–speaking Quebecers in the Abitibi and on the North Shore are coming into existence.

In June 1988, the programs of the Department of the Secretary of State were renewed and strengthened.

[English]

This type of activity reflects fundamental democratic values held by Canadians: promoting community spirit and dialogue; encouraging discussion and the exchange of views; relying on the consultative process; co–operation and good will; and seeking partnership on various levels. The language issue still produces and will continue to produce tensions. These we cannot and must not ignore but I am profoundly convinced we must address them not in a spirit of recrimination and confrontation but rather, in the spirit of openness and tolerance that has long constituted the best measure of progress in this country.

• (1340)

This will enhance Canadian identity, which is based on our diversity. Our country recognizes two official languages, used by two great language communities, and enjoys a rich cultural diversity, evidenced by the presence of many other languages and communities, namely our country's first inhabitants, our native people, and the communities formed by many people and groups who have come from all over the world to take part in the development of our country.

In speaking of these things, I do not refer to an abstract notion but to a set of closely related policies which seek to guarantee justice and fairness for all our fellow citizens, anglophone and francophone, with special attention to those who are in a minority.

I am also talking about policies based on the promotion of better understanding and greater harmony between our two language communities. The success of these policies depends in large part on each one of us, on our openmindedness, on our willingness to see the other's point of view, in short, on our attitude to our fellow citizens.

By being fearful, unimaginative or simply intolerant towards our neighbours, we contribute to tensions, problems and agitation. In short, we lay the foundations for a society that is a prey to dissatisfaction and anger. If on the other hand we display the necessary imagination and skill, if we have sufficient self-esteem and self-confidence to respect our neighbours, our country may still have problems—what country does not?—but it will not have to fear for its unity!

[English]

There is only one way to meet these fears and misconceptions. That is to explain, and explain again, just what we are doing and why. We have to explain why we believe our policies are reasonable, just, and above all, fair. We have to make sure they are all those things. If we do that we will continue to have the great majority of Canadians on our side.

[Translation]

Equality, justice, fairness—these are the basis of this government's policies, these are the fundamental commitments enshrined in the revised Official Languages Act passed by this House. These are also the principles that we must promote and have understood throughout our society.

[English]

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, I would like to compliment the hon. member for Charlesbourg on her excellent address, particularly on her call to Canadians for openness and understanding in our approach to the practice of our official languages legislation and the reality of our two official languages as the linguistic foundation of our country.

I believe I share with all hon. members the concern that was felt this week when one of our most prominent cities, the city of Sault Ste. Marie with its proud heritage and tradition in the history of our country, decided to make a formal assertion of its unilingual status. It was an assertion that did not seem to be required and that would obviously be cause for offence to some of its citizens and citizens everywhere in this country. I would hope that the mayor and councillors of Sault Ste. Marie would see fit to reconsider their positions, to review their references and assumptions and the act of leadership in the wrong direction which their decision, in my opinion, constitutes.

I would like to mention to the hon. member for Charlesbourg, to the mayor of Sault Ste. Marie and to this House that in the city of Fredericton, which I represent, we have also had linguistic tensions over the years. We are the capital city of New Brunswick, the only officially bilingual province, but the tensions of language still exist. We continue to work at them.

About a year ago we were able to establish a citizens committee on language and culture with individual citizens from both French and English backgrounds and from ethnic backgrounds. We have, for example, as a member of this committee, a church minister who is an Estonian. They meet every second week on Monday afternoon for three hours. While the discussions are not public yet, eventually they hope to be able to express their views in a manner that will lead the community to greater understanding. They sit and talk about what the anglophones of New Brunswick and of Fredericton want in a society and what the francophones of Fredericton and New Brunswick want in a society.

I have had the pleasure to witness real communication, understanding and tolerance developing. I urge the mayor and councillors of the city of Sault Ste. Marie, perhaps the MLAs from Sault Ste. Marie, and even perhaps the member of Parliament for Sault Ste. Marie to use their good offices to establish such citizens committees for the discussion of these difficult issues. As the member for Charlesbourg has said, that kind of an open, tolerant and understanding approach does lead to the creation of a civilized society, the kind for which Canada is held in great esteem throughout the world.

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Madam Speaker, I also want to thank my colleague, the member for Charlesbourg (Mrs. Tardif), for allowing me to add a few words to this afternoon's debate which I consider a commitment by each individual member to do everything in his or her power to make Canadian society a better place where all nationalities and races which make up our fabric can live in harmony.

Madam Speaker, intolerance and prejudice in any society, including ours, must be condemned. In addition, we must ensure that they are not allowed to feed on our society. Intolerance and prejudice are only the result of our ignorance. For us, as Canadian people, these are some of the reasons why this government has put so much emphasis on programs supporting our creative talents and promoting our cultural heritage, thus helping to enhance our Canadian identity.

[English]

Madam Speaker, the government's total cultural envelope is in the area of $2.4 billion this year, covering several departments and ministries, including the Department of Communications, and, among others, the Secretary of State and the several relevant programs, notably, multiculturalism and the Department of Employment and Immigration.

The Minister of Communications has stated many times in this House that a nation without artists is one without identity. The minister has long recognized the important role that writers, painters, mimes, actors and actresses, comedians, singers, journalists and broadcasters, among others, have played to help us to communicate with each other.

Through these talented mediums, we understand our common bonds, our history, our shared passions, secrets, likes and dislikes, our ambitions for ourselves and for our families, now and tomorrow.

Innovative and well funded programs coming under the aegis of the Department of Communications and the cultural agencies have provided encouragement and support to these artists and to the cultural industries they depend on to disseminate their messages, the publishing industry, the sound recording industry, the performing arts, cultural centres and museums, ballet and theatre companies, and probably the most potent educational force of this century, broadcasting.

Indeed, this House has before it now a wide-ranging bill respecting broadcasting. This bill, tabled in the House by the minister last October 12, has since progressed through second reading and is now before a legislative committee of this House.

Fundamental to the new bill is the notion that the Canadian broadcasting system is important to Canada and to all Canadians for the very reason that it has served and will continue to serve even more effectively to introduce Canadians of all backgrounds, creeds and customs to each other in what is now legally a bilingual and multicultural society.

There is no greater tool than the power of broadcasting to influence public opinion on any subject. The new broadcasting bill now before this House is an instrument which my hon. friend should support in our common goal of eradicating intolerance and ignorance. In its declaration of a broadcasting policy for Canada, the bill stipulates under part four of subclause (c) of clause 3:

> The Canadian Broadcasting System should, through its programming and the employment opportunities arising out of its operations, serve the needs and interests, and reflect the circumstances and aspirations of Canadian men, women and children, including equal rights, the linguistic duality and multicultural nature of Canadian society and the special place of aboriginal peoples within that society.

There are other parts of this declaration which are particularly relevant to our debate today. They include comments on the publicly-funded Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its new mandate. I would like to cite some notable exhortations: The programming provided by the Corporation should:

> Reflect Canada and its regions to national and regional audiences, while serving the special needs of those regions;
> Contribute to shared national consciousness and identity;
> Reflect the multicultural nature of Canada.

The broadcasting system is told it must provide programming that reflects the aboriginal cultures of Canada, as resources become available for this purpose.

Distribution undertakings are instructed among several subsections dealing with them, that they should:

> Provide access for underserved linguistic and cultural minority communities.

In summation, this land which already is strong will be reinforced yet further by our maintenance and improvement of those vehicles already at our disposal to educate the general public.

While the hon. member has called for a debate on intolerance and prejudice and while isolated incidents do remind us deplorably of bitterness, distrust and jealousy, Canada on the whole has been blessed with a positive and welcoming atmosphere for all people.

A reinforcement of our traditional pioneering values of hospitality, of compassion and tolerance for other other people is required. Through peer group discussion, through our educational systems and through the powerful popular media, it is in Canada's best interest that these values be allowed to prosper again.

Whether we date our history by the Julian or Gregorian calendar, or by the Chinese or Jewish calendars, today is shared by each and everyone of us and tomorrow will come just as routinely as ever.

Canada's painters, poets, dancers, actors, musicians and the many other talented individuals who make up our cultural wealth have played a useful role in the past and continue to be important to us as our interpreters, placing these differences into perspective and reminding us how much we have in common.

There are other languages than the spoken ones and all must be brought to bear to communicate the message that Canada is a multicultural society and all the richer for it.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member on his wonderful statement. It was very impressive.

He spoke about the issue of education through the CBC, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. One would suggest that is a very novel suggestion. I share his views and I am sure all members on this side of the House share his views on this issue. It is important to do that, but it is also important to provide the money to go along, to put our money where our mouth is.

I was a bit saddened when I saw the government cutting some of the funding to the CBC. I wondered, how can the CBC meet its objectives and its mandate in light of those cuts. That is one question.

I also agree that there is a need for education. We as a society have to keep our eyes open on issues, whether they affect a linguistic group or individuals in general. When it comes to individual rights, we have human rights commissions and agencies across the country that deal with abuses. The problem is that it takes forever for cases to be heard by those commissions or agencies. I also feel that there are no teeth in the decisions that these agencies make. A decision will be made and it seems forever before we see any action.

How does he propose CBC can meet its mandate in light of the recent cuts and the potential future cuts? How would he see commissions and agencies meeting their mandate under the same circumstances?

Mr. Jourdenais: Madam Speaker, I commend the hon. member for putting to me a few questions on how the government intends to deal with multiculturalism. As I said in my speech, if he listened closely, we have $2.5 billion invested in multiculturalism and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation legislation.

He referred to cuts. While he put his question I wrote a word down: "Quality" rather than "quantity". Do we need so many people to do the work? Three people are doing the work of one. You certainly realized this, since you live in the Ottawa area, where an unbelievable number of people are working but are not giving their best performance, either at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or even in other departments. So we made cuts and I am convinced that the CBC's new president certainly will get from those who are left the same results as when there were three times the number of people needed.

The last question I did not understand altogether. I am sorry I was taking notes. But following the discussions we had this afternoon, following the way the government has been working for multiculturalism under the new act, I must say Canada is the only country in the world with a new act to treat everyone on an equal footing, whatever his or her colour, race or country of origin. We also have excellent immigration policies that do not exist in other countries, and certainly the hon. member is following closely what is going on globally. What we see in other countries is that refugees especially and even immigrants are not accepted unless they can bring four times what people are bringing to Canada. We are open, we accept immigrants, and we continue accepting them. All I am asking is that all Canadians treat those people on an equal footing, that they treat them the same way as they themselves want to be treated.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a sobering debate today. There is no value more fundamental to our society and our existence as human beings on this earth than our value for life, the potential and the worth of every human being. We often come closer to that in our rhetoric than in our practice, unfortunately. A member on the other side of the House said earlier this afternoon that it lies in our hands to lead by example.

I want to examine one particular aspect of equality in Canada. There is no more fundamental right of equality than the right to work, to earn a living and to earn a salary that reflects fully the value of the work one does. Yet in this field alone people of different cultural, ethnic and religious backgrounds are not treated equally in this country. They are not given the full opportunity to develop and demonstrate their potential and to be adequately compensated for it.

By allowing this to continue, we not only demean, belittle and diminish the lives of those people but we diminish the life of our nation. The most valuable resource we have is the capacity and the ability of our people to contribute to the future development of Canada and to the richness of Canadian life.

There is no better way for the Government of Canada to lead than to exercise the tremendous influence it has as the largest employer in Canada and to demonstrate that full equality in hiring, that eliminating biases and prejudices of which we may not even be aware, is so fundamental to acting as a good employer and, above all, to acting as a good government that it deserves the highest priority that this government and this House can give.

I have raised this issue a number of times in the House and have been subjected to rhetorical answers about our employment equity practices and employment equity program and what a wonderful job we are doing. The facts are quite otherwise. I think it is important for the House to be aware of those facts.

Indeed, the Public Service Commission has done a good job of encouraging people to apply for employment within the federal government. I want to talk about the category identified as visible minorities. The federal government between 1987 and 1988 encouraged a 250 per cent increase in applications by people of visible minorities. Of a total 56,000 applicants to public service fully 9,500 were from visible minorities. But how did they fare when it came to being hired? While the number of applicants increased by 250 per cent, the number hired increased by less than 100 per cent.

If your skin was a different colour than that of the Canadian majority, your chance of being hired was only one-quarter as good. Let me just give the figures. Of all applicants, 17 per cent were hired. Of visible minority applicants, only 3 per cent were hired. That means that there is a six to one discrimination factor in our hiring practices in government.

I turn to the report of the Human Rights Commission for 1988 where it states:

> Although the official Treasury Board report published at the end of the year puts its best foot forward, analysis of the latest public service figures reveals that matters are not all that much better in federal departments and agencies, despite their having been subject to a policy on employment equity for several years.

It states further:

> Visible minorities fair reasonably well in the professional group but their numbers are negligible in blue-collar categories and well below national workforce figures in other areas.

In fact in hiring people into management the federal government has a worse record than the private sector; 6.4 per cent of our workforce are identified as being visible minorities. Yet, in our management category, only 1.6 per cent are. We find visible minorities in the public service clustered in the professional categories, virtually excluded from blue-collar positions, and clustered again in the low-paying clerical worker jobs. On the other hand, the management category in the private sector is well over 2 per cent, more than double that of the federal government. This is nowhere near the ratio of visible minorities in the Canadian population or the Canadian workforce, but is double the record of the federal government.

The same situation applies to promotions. People do get into the Public Service of Canada but they stay where they are. They do not move up. They do not move into that management category where policies are being made, where decisions are being made, where the very culturing ethos of the public service is being influenced and directed.

It is one of the reasons for my concern about Public Service 2000, the Canadian Centre for Management Development and various other initiatives of this government which would decentralize and delegate decision making. The Public Service Commission is responsible for hiring on the basis of the merit. But we have been unable to ensure that hiring is on this basis and not on extraneous factors such as the colour of the skin or the accent. I fear that by creating an elite management cadre we reinforce the little glass bubble lived in by our top 4,000 managers. We encourage and perpetuate the exclusion from that little glass bubble of those who do not quite fit.

There are pro-active ways to increase employment equity but they are not being carried out in the Public Service of Canada. There is no systematic sensitization of managers to the unconscious ways in which they may make choices of who to hire or who to promote. Essentially we all like to think of people who are most like ourselves as being competent. There is a desperate need for a pro-active program among managers in the public service to free up their thinking, to let them see and understand how they perhaps discriminate without intending to. There is also need for a pro-active program at the hiring level to work with people whose cultural differences, language barriers, and different backgrounds may be a negative factor in their being hired. We must get rid of those negative factors. There is a need to follow up when persons are not hired or interviewed to find out why and to what extent discrimination, however unconscious again, may have been a factor in that non-hiring.

There are a variety of areas in which Canadians look to the government for justice, fairness and equality. I was appalled earlier this year when this government refused to accept an amendment to the unemployment insurance bill that would have guaranteed equitable access for all discriminated groups to training and employment opportunities under the unemployment insurance scheme. I cannot understand or justify how our government, including the minister responsible for the Status of Women and the Secretary of State including people whose responsibility is equality in Canadian society could have voted against that amendment. But they did.

I cannot understand why I get a letter from the Assembly of First Nations of Canada saying the Secretary of State has refused them literacy funding unless the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs approves. Are they not able to apply for a national program on the same basis as any other group of citizens in this country? Are they being told they do not qualify because they are native Canadians? These are the kinds of things that happen routinely in government that we must obliterate.

It is fine to speak nice words but we have to look at reality. We have to look at enumerators who go around during election time and see if they react differently to somebody with a different skin and ask them where they were born. They do not ask that of people with white skin.

As the world opens up, people from different nations, different cultural and language backgrounds are invaluable assets to this country. They should be at the upper levels of policy-making, designing government programs, and they are not. I urge the members opposite to have an honest and open look at our own hiring and promotion practices and to fix them.

Mrs. Browes: Madam Speaker, the member who just spoke spent some time speaking about the public service and in reference to a very recent decision that was handed down concerning equal pay for work of equal value.

I would just like to read the decision on that particular issue brought forth by our government because we were concerned about the public service policy concerning the value of the jobs, and the pay. In January 1990, just last week, the President of the Treasury Board announced a $317 million retroactive equal pay adjustment covering four female dominated groups in the public service.

That retroactive adjustment will average about $4,800 per employee. Another $76 million will go to the annual adjustment taking effect in April of 1990. This is the result of work done since 1985 by the joint union management initiatives on implementation of the equal pay in the public service under which an employee study was undertaken and the value of 3,200 representative jobs were assessed. Some 68 public servants will be affected by this adjustment.

That has been a very positive aspect of our government's initiative in terms of evaluating those jobs in the Public Service.

The other point I would like to bring to the attention of the member is the number of Order in Council appointments by this government of women who have been appointed to boards and commissions. When we took over in 1984, only 13 per cent of those positions were held by women; now it is 30 per cent. It should be 50 per cent, but women are being recommended for positions as they become available, as are visible minorities.

We recognize that there is more work to be done, but we have made giant strides in terms of what was needed.

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, the member can believe all the propaganda the minister wants to put out if she wishes to, but the Canadian Human Rights Commissioner has other things to say about that. He slams government over pay equity. He has attacked the government for not co-operating with the commission. He warns that the issue of pay equity in the federal public service is far from resolved. There are still 60,000 outstanding complaints before the Human Rights Commission. They have not been resolved. Forty-eight hundred dollars over five years is not pay equity. In fact, the latest settlement by the Human Rights Commission was four or five times that.

The member is obviously not aware that people do not get their salaries or classification increased when they win a pay equity settlement. They just get this little token payment on top. They are denied their benefits. They are denied benefits lost over the last five years or more.

I would ask the member to read the message from the Human Rights Commissioner who had offered his co-operation but was not consulted. He said that what Mr. de Cotret announced was, in fact, one-half of what these people deserve. However, all of this has nothing to do with equality in hiring practices. I urge you to look at the number of women, visible minorities, and persons with disabilities who are being hired on short-term, temporary contracts, and a part-time basis. They are not getting into permanent jobs which would give them the financial security that people need and deserve.

I know people who have been in the public service for four or five years on repeating six months' terms, without any stability, security, promotion, or benefits.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I am wondering how comfortable the member feels representing a party that had close to 20 consecutive years governing this country and left us with those pay equity problems? Is it comfortable to support a party that had 20 years to fix them but did nothing? Or is it more comfortable to support a party that has at least done something?

Ms. Clancy: Five years and counting, Jim.

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, I think the member needs to be reminded that it is this party that introduced the Canadian Charter of Human Rights to ensure that not only in government, but throughout society, those problems would be addressed. It is his government which has had that charter for a number of years now and has been stalling and balking on implementing it.

I am not here to revisit history when attitudes were certainly different in government as they were throughout society. We know that the value of people and our commitment to respect the equality of people are something precious in our society. We incorporated equality in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in our Constitution.

Values are changing in society. Needs are changing in society. I think it is time the government took its responsibilities right now, stopped stalling and got on with the job.

Mr. Hawkes: I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The time for questions and comments is now over. On debate, the hon. member for Halifax.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak in strong support of this motion. I certainly advise the government Whip to listen; it might do him some good.

I rise to speak, as I said, in strong support of this motion and in a great deal of seriousness in relation to what has gone on today and what has gone on for far too long in this country: intolerance, bigotry and discrimination. These are synonyms for ignorance. They are synonyms for fear. There is no place in the Canada of 1990 for words such as these nor for the sentiments that they portray.

Bigotry, prejudice and intolerance are not natural to the human species. They are learned responses, learned through odious example and passed on as an insidious legacy, eating away the fabric of decency in Canadian society. Anti-French, anti-woman, anti-black, anti-native, and so on: what we have is a perfidious, sickening litany of hate.

Unfortunately my riding of Halifax in my province of Nova Scotia now has a reputation that has been much tarnished over the past several years and, more unfortunately, rightly so. I refer to the report of the Marshall inquiry that has shown beyond any doubt the despicable treatment of visible minorities by the justice system and the institutionalized racism that exists in Nova Scotia.

However, the tragedy is that it exists not just in Nova Scotia. It exists in Canada as a whole. It exists in every province. Nova Scotians today bear the guilt for what has gone on in our province in the past, but as Canadians we jointly bear the responsibility for our refusal to come to terms provincially and federally with the questions of bigotry and intolerance.

The metropolitan area of Halifax and Dartmouth, as was referred to by my colleague, the member for Dartmouth, in his speech earlier today, contains the largest indigenous black population in Canada. Some 90 per cent of indigenous blacks live in Halifax and Dartmouth and the surrounding area. The black population of Nova Scotia has a long and proud history in this country.

Indeed black immigration to the east coast of Canada was in two ways. The first was a significant number of blacks who came as United Empire Loyalists after the American Revolution, who came with the idea of starting a new life loyal to the British Crown and who came under the same theories of land grants as their white counterparts. Unfortunately those theories were not realized. Although there are many blacks in Nova Scotia who can trace their roots to that same proud heritage, that proud heritage was never recognized in land grants and reactions from the British Crown. Perhaps this was the beginning of institutionalized racism in the province of Nova Scotia.

The second major wave of black immigration into Nova Scotia was the famous underground railroad from the southern states, run by such famed abolitionists as Harriett Beecher Stowe, her brother and various and sundry other brave and courageous anti-racists in the 19th century in the United States and Canada. The last stop on the underground railroad was the province of Nova Scotia. From there the communities such as Preston and Cherrybrook, the black communities in Cape Breton and Digby County and Yarmouth County, eventually arose.

Blacks in Nova Scotia have been nation builders, the same as Canadians of any other colour from coast to coast. In Nova Scotia blacks have laboured side by side with whites as coal miners and steel workers in some of the most back breaking and dangerous jobs this country has ever seen. They have been fishermen and they have been farmers. In my city of Halifax they are an integral part of the small but cosmopolitan community that is metropolitan Halifax.

Yet, despite all this contribution, we still have in the black community in my province a disproportionate unemployment rate and a disproportionate school leaving rate. Worst of all, we have a belief among the black community that its worth and its value to our society is less in the eyes of its white fellow citizens than it is in its own eyes. This a shame and a scandal and something that none of us can stand for while it still exists.

I want to talk very briefly about a particular part of my city: a particular housing project in the city of Halifax which I think is a microcosm of the problems created by racism, combined with poverty and combined with a refusal to see what is in front of us, a refusal to see the facts as they are.

Over 30 years ago this public housing project was built in the city of Halifax. It overlooks some of the most beautiful landscape in a beautiful city in a beautiful province. From this housing project one can see Bedford Basin, Halifax Harbour and the hills beyond Dartmouth. This project has a series of joined terraced houses and at least two or possibly three high-rise apartment buildings. The first thing that strikes one inside this complex is the amount of concrete and the absence of grass.

When I went there for the first time in many years this past summer, the first thing that struck me was: Who decided that people who live in public housing do not want to have grass for their children to play on just as much as people who live in expensive neighbourhoods? Who decided that concrete and rusty springs, broken cement and broken wrought iron are acceptable for the children of public housing residents when they are not acceptable for children of people in perhaps a higher economic bracket?

When we look at this particular housing project we see that discrimination is alive and well, because the vast majority of residents in this project are either black or another group vastly discriminated against in our society: single mothers probably on social assistance.

This project was built 30 years ago. In its high-rise elevators children are stopped and dealt drugs. Muggings and rampant crime against persons and against property are daily events. We all hear about the projects in Chicago and tell ourselves that our cities thus far are better off. Well, I am here to say that in my city of Halifax they are not better off. The project in Halifax may be smaller, but the harm to the humans, black and white, adults and children, who live there is no less.

I doubt that anyone in this House would ever admit to be racist. I doubt that anyone in this House would ever admit to being a bigot. Certainly I believe that all of us, no matter from where we come, no matter what views we espouse, are here because we want to do as much good as possible. When I say that I do not believe anyone in this House is truly a racist or a bigot, I hope it is true at least in the essential meaning of the word.

The problem is that while we sit here in this House of Commons and do no more about projects like Mulgrave Park, about a refusal to allow Sikhs to wear their turbans in the RCMP and about a refusal to grant pay equity as it is supposed to be granted, we plead guilty to the charges of intolerance.

Mr. Gardiner: Madam Speaker, I have a very brief comment to make and a question to direct to the member.

I congratulate her on the comments she made reflecting circumstances in her riding in Halifax which I visited many years ago and hope to visit some time in the future. I would also like to speak briefly to the motion presented by the Liberals on intolerance in our society in Canada. It is a duty of all members of this House and community leaders to ensure that tolerance is recognized and continued in this country.

I gather this motion was presented by the Liberal Party. I am interested in having a comment from the member on how unified the Liberal Party is on the motion and if its members will be supporting it.

I refer to comments made on November 17 by the member for Gander—Grand Falls who in reference to the member's comments about turbans and Sikhs with the RCMP suggested that that was ridiculous. I wonder if Liberals have had their own talks on this issue so that they are in fact unified and that tolerance in society is represented by all members of all parties.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I am delighted with the question and comments of my colleague in the New Democratic Party. I can tell it has been a long time since he has been to Halifax, but I am sure he will remedy that. If he speaks to me, I will make sure they let him in.

With regard to a comment by my colleague for Gander—Grand Falls, if he said that the question of stopping the Sikhs from wearing their turbans in the RCMP was ridiculous, I can only say that I certainly agree. If he said something else, I suggest his remarks were misinterpreted. I am not familiar with the remarks. I only know that in the Liberal Party to which I belong I feel very strongly and I am fully aware that my views are supported by my caucus colleagues.

This is an issue that goes beyond partisan point making. If at times any one of us in any of the three parties falls from grace and makes a comment that is unacceptable to someone else, it is sad and unfortunate. We all try very hard to make sure that this does not happen, but unfortunately we too are human and we too make mistakes. When the day comes that we can stand here in this House and say that no one in any of the three parties is likely to put a foot wrong, perhaps that will be the day that this country will be in such perfect condition that we will have evolved ourselves out of the need for a job.

Mrs. Catterall: Madam Speaker, I was interested in what my colleague had to say about the obvious links between poverty and racism and lack of education and lack of opportunity. I just wonder if she might take a minute to reinforce her message to the House that racism has some very undesirable social and economic impacts in our communities.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I have a very brief comment in response. I mentioned that there was a disproportionate school leaving rate for blacks and a disproportionate unemployment rate for blacks in the province of Nova Scotia. I would just like to quote some statistics very briefly. We have 10,000 people in the Nova Scotia Civil Service. The Marshall inquiry report has told us this week that only 208 of those civil servants are visible minorities, which includes not only blacks but other visible minorities as well.

• (1430)

Today the Premier of Nova Scotia, John Buchanan, said there was no racism in the Nova Scotia Civil Service, and he said that he could not recall any incident of discrimination within the Civil Service or even a charge thereto in the last 10 years.

I want to say that in a city like mine where blacks are continually and daily the subject of discrimination in education and in hiring a statement such as this one shows nothing short of irresponsibility and insensitivity of a mammoth nature.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, intolerance and prejudice are attitudes that are crippling in any society, not only to individuals and families but also to society at large.

The House heard earlier today of government action on issues ranging from race relations and official languages to culture and justice, all of them fields in which this government's initiatives have made a meaningful difference in regard to improvements.

I join in the debate by discussing government initiatives in another field: the world of employment. I will focus on the issue of employment equity for there are few measures of such general significance in the fight against intolerance and prejudice.

This government recognized from the outset that Canada could no longer afford the enormous social and economic class implicit in inequitable and unjust employment barriers. We understood that for Canada to succeed in the 1990s and beyond the full participating of our human resources was essential.

Everyone in the House is aware that the competitive and skill demands on our labour market are increasing at an unprecedented rate. To meet these demands we must equitably involve all Canadians. In contrast to the government of hon. members across the floor, this government has not merely paid lip service to the issue of employment equity but we have acted decisively and responsibly.

In 1986 we took a number of major steps toward achieving equity in employment in Canada. As part of that initiative the government established two important programs: the legislative employment equity program and the federal contractors program. These major landmarks deal significantly and specifically with the four groups arbitrarily affected by stereotypes and prejudice, namely, women, aboriginal peoples, visible minorities and persons with disabilities.

The Employment Equity Act was passed in 1986. It is the first legislation of its kind. The legislative employment equity program applies to Crown corporations and to federally regulated employers with 100 or more employees. These employers are primarily in the banking, transportation and communications industries.

Under this program employers must implement employment equity and submit annual reports showing how the four designated groups are represented in their organization in terms of salary ranges, occupational groups, hiring, promotions and terminations. Their reports are analysed by us and are then made available to the public through public libraries. Employers who fail to report may be fined.

In addition, these reports are handed over to the Canadian Human Rights Commission which can take action against an employer who has discriminated.

It is important to note that this legislation does not set quotas or dictate exact steps employers must take. It is not a bureaucratic albatross for employers. Instead, it is a developmental mechanism which encourages investment in a more representative, productive workforce. The goal of these programs is to achieve equal access to employment opportunities for traditionally under-represented Canadians.

• (1435)

The government moved quickly to pass this legislation and we have been encouraged by the response from Canadian employers. The legislative employment equity program and the federal contractors program encompass 35 per cent of the top 500 companies in Canada with more than 1.5 million employees in total.

Under the the federal contractors program failure to implement an employment equity plan will result in sanctions, meaning that there will be no more opportunity to do business with the federal government until the program criteria have been met. This has already happened in many cases but, more important, over the short-term period we are seeing some positive results based on acceptance of this program and this government objective to put a more representative and dynamic face on our workforce.

We will continue to monitor these programs. We are determined to take the steps necessary to ensure even greater progress. Across Canada companies are recognizing that employment equity means good business. As important as this progress is the government sincerely believes that it is even more fundamental to give Canadians the chance to find their place in an expanding labour market. After all, the road to productive, meaningful employment must be built on economic opportunity.

Over the last five and a half years this government has clearly established a framework of opportunity and growth. During that time employment has fallen significantly, while job opportunities have grown. As significant as the number of jobs is the type of jobs this government is targeting. Through the Canadian Jobs Strategy approximately 1.5 million Canadians have received meaningful training and on the job experience since 1985. By emphasizing co-operative involvement with the private sector at the local level, the Canadian Jobs Strategy has given Canadians meaningful job skills that translate into long-term employment.

There has been no riding in the country that has benefited more from this particular program than the riding of Carleton—Charlotte. We have given programs to many disadvantaged people, especially women. We have allowed women to go into the workforce who have never had the opportunity because of lack of education, marital break-ups or whatever. We have really had some great successes in New Brunswick with that particular program. We have programs coming on stream constantly to address this very real need in the workforce.

Consistent with the Canadian Jobs Strategy mandate of helping those in need, participation in the CJS program is focused on women returning to the workforce, persons with disabilities, young people and other target groups.

This commitment to a more dynamic and representative workforce was reinforced last spring through the government's Labour Force Development Strategy. This strategy includes positive changes to the UI program designed to reflect the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as well as contemporary, social, family and work patterns. Again it is the co-operative, training oriented strategy involving all stakeholders in the common goal of making our labour force more responsive to emerging pressures.

Employment equity is not a thing of the past, but on a variety of legislative fronts this government has implemented measures that are already having an important impact. As the hon. member's motion states, every one of us in Parliament has a role to play in ensuring that all Canadians receive equitable hiring and salary treatment. This government has taken and is taking significant steps in that direction. The result of these initiatives and of a sustained period of economic growth has been unprecedented. The opportunity for Canadians will continue to grow.

In conclusion, the government is committed to ensuring that these opportunities continue to grow for all Canadians.

• (1440)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions or comments? Resuming debate with the hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I guess when one is almost the last one on the list in this debate one has an opportunity to do a bit of a recap.

On behalf of my party I thank the member for York Centre and the Liberal caucus for the presentation of this motion. Given some of the events in Canada today, it is important that we commit some time in this Parliament to the discussion of what appears to be a growing wave of racism and intolerance in this country.

It is of particular concern, when we look elsewhere in the world where barriers between peoples are breaking down, where freedom seems to be on the increase, where democratic thought seems to be on the increase and where tolerance to be on the increase, that in Canada the tide may be moving the other way. This is something that we in this Parliament and that the government have to be concerned about.

Some members even mentioned the speech in Parliament a couple of days ago by Prime Minister de Klerk of South Africa in which he announced that the barriers in South Africa are to begin to be broken down and that an approach is to be made toward more equality between the races and the establishment of more equal rights between the races in South Africa.

As those countries which have in the past been less tolerant become more tolerant, my concern is that Canada seems to be proceeding in the opposite direction and at some point along the way will end up substituting for those countries as the object of international concern and derision.

Previous speakers have mentioned the motion recently made in Sault Ste. Marie about its establishment as a unilingual city. This country is proud of its bilingual traditions and wishes to see those traditions expanded and the rights of Canadians, regardless of their mother tongue, respected all across the country. What happened in Sault Ste. Marie recently came as a shock to many Canadians who see this country as a country of freedom, a country of tolerance and a country of mutual respect.

One thing that has disturbed me over the last little while is the number of letters and petitions I have been receiving from people in my constituency and elsewhere, suggesting that devout Sikh Canadians who wear the turban should not have the right to be members of the RCMP because it will interfere with the tradition of the RCMP uniform.

I have noticed in the letters these people have written that they always feel compelled to include in these form letters that: "This is not a prejudiced statement".

Of course it is a prejudiced statement. It is designed to limit access of a specific religious group to the national police force of Canada based on specific characteristics of their religious; either that or it forces them to divest themselves of important aspects of their religion in order to conform with what the balance of the Canadian society would like to see.

In spite of a recommendation from senior officers of the RCMP and in spite of the concerns expressed in this Parliament, it is unfortunate that the Solicitor General has taken so long to make a decision on this issue.

An hon. member: Totally irresponsible.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): It is not just irresponsible. It gives people out there in society, people who are members of minority groups, the message that this delay means there is an element of racism in the Government of Canada which gives rise to the delay in making a decision with respect to the opportunity for Sikhs to serve in the RCMP.

There is concern about racism in the government itself. I think that is a legitimate concern and something about which all of us in the this Parliament and this government have to be concerned.

• (1445)

The Minister of State for Multiculturalism said in his presentation that government alone cannot solve the problem of racism, that it has to be done with the co-operation of others. To some extent, that is true. I do not think government alone can solve the problem.

To some extent, this is a cop-out for taking strong and effective action to deal with racism when we perceive it operating in our society. I would like to go back a few years. Mention has been made about racism in the United States, especially racism directed against blacks.

In the 1940s and 1950s blacks were protected under the United States Constitution. They had equality before the law under the U.S. Constitution. In terms of education, blacks were supposed to have the same rights as every other American, and yet blacks did not have the same right to education.

All Americans were entitled to vote at that time and vote for their leaders and presidents. Yet blacks seemed to be deprived of that right to vote and to exercise power because of the way the system enforced the rights of black people in the United States. It was only when the segregation decision was taken by the courts and the United States federal government used the power of its military forces to put black kids into white schools that the changes took place in the United States with respect to equal access to education.

It was only when the federal government of the United States passed laws with respect to voter registration that they enforced the operation of those laws in favour of black citizens. By using armed Federal Bureau of Investigation agents, black people in the United States got the rights that were guaranteed to them under the Constitution and under the fundamental law of the United States.

There is a principle that operates here and that principle is before you can change attitudes, you must change behaviour. Before you change attitudes, you must change behaviour. Education cannot do it alone. Fine sentiments made and expressed in this House cannot do it alone. Before you change attitudes, you have to change behaviour.

Members brought up the issue of the employment equity legislation. I think this employment equity legislation is not anything that we can be proud of in this country. There is absolutely nothing that we can be proud of in terms of this legislation. The annual report of the Employment Equity Act documents the failure of this legislation to serve the very people that it purportedly was designed to serve.

In fact, Madam Speaker, this legislation is designed to be public relations. It is designed to be smoke and mirrors. When you look at the success of this legislation from the point of view of aboriginal people—and I will just take one page—of all the corporations listed under federal jurisdiction on page 81, only a miniscule number conform with the requirements for hiring aboriginal people.

Even the Canadian government's own Crown corporations and instruments, such as Canada Post Corporation, is a failure with respect to the hiring of aboriginal people. Yet it is under the direct control and responsibility of this Parliament and this government.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has also been an absolute failure with respect to the hiring of women, aboriginal people, people with disabilities and members of visible minorities. Yet it is under the direct control and responsibility of this government and this Parliament.

There is no effective employment equity legislation in this country. The reason is that it was designed not to be effective because if people are designing legislation to accomplish employment equity, they must design that legislation to have within it the ability to impose sanctions against those who do not obey the law. Not to include such a section in this law is not an error or an omission; it is an invitation to the corporations that come under the federal jurisdiction to practice the biases that this law purports to be eliminating. That is precisely what is happening.

This is not a document designed to decrease prejudice or intolerance in this country. This document in fact increases it because it creates expectations without the ability of the people involved, the people oppressed, to have those expectations fulfilled. If this government does not within a very short period rectify this legislation so that it is designed to eliminate intolerance and prejudice, we are going to have something to say about this government and its commitment to eliminating racism and intolerance. These kinds of things do not happen in a country where the government has a commitment to eliminating intolerance. It is as simple as that.

Until we see some changes in this legislation, we are not going to see changes in the performance of those corporations. Then we are going to have some questions to ask about this government's commitment to eliminating racism and intolerance.

Some members in this debate mentioned the Marshall inquiry that recently reported in Nova Scotia. I think we should all read the report of that Marshall inquiry. It says a great deal about Canada. It says a great deal about Canadians and about the institutions of Canada and how they are racially biased against non-whites in Canada.

I would like to quote a few short sections of the Marshall inquiry. Basically, what the Marshall inquiry says in the very first part of its findings in fact its most important findings, is this: "The fact that Marshall was a native was a factor in his wrongful conviction and imprisonment."

It is the most unbelievable finding in this report. The most important finding in the Marshall inquiry report is the fact that Marshall was a native was a factor in his wrongful conviction and imprisonment.

There is a second section: "That MacIntyre without any evidence to support his conclusions and in the face of evidence to the contrary, had identified Marshall as a prime suspect. The fact that Marshall was a native was one of the reasons why MacIntyre identified him as the prime suspect."

The judicial system in Canada discriminates against people in Canada because they are of a different colour or a different culture than those of the dominant culture. That is the true finding of the Marshall inquiry.

We really did not need the Marshall inquiry to find this out. All you have to do is read the statistics of native people in prisons in Canada to find out exactly how this country's justice system discriminates against native people.

Let me quote from an article entitled "Locking up Natives in Canada" by Michael Jackson, a professor at the University of British Columbia. He talks about the federal prison system, the system this Parliament and this government has direct responsibility for. Here is what Michael Jackson says: "Ten per cent of the federal prison population is native men; 13 per cent in the women's prison are native women, and yet native people are only 2 per cent of the population."

You cannot argue from the point of view that natives are more criminally oriented, more likely to be involved in crime and more likely to be involved with brushes with the law. The system of justice in Canada is culturally and racially biased against native people and statistics document this over and over again. You do not need the Marshall report. You do not need the justice enquiry that is going on in Manitoba. You do not need the justice inquiry that is going on in Alberta. The statistics document over and over again that Canada is a de facto racist society when it comes to the practice of administering injustice against native people. This Parliament and this government have an obligation to do something about that.

In the prairie region natives make up 5 per cent of the total population but 32 per cent of the prison population. We send natives to jail at a rate six times greater than their representation in the population. It is de facto evidence that our system of justice and our country are discriminating on a racial basis against native people. This is not a finding that comes out of things like the Marshall inquiry alone. This is a finding that is now coming out of human rights agencies set up by the United Nations.

People are beginning to recognize throughout the world that this Canada of ours, this country that we expressed such great pride in at the opening of this debate, this country of ours has nothing to brag about when it comes to racial equality or equal treatment before the law. It is not only in the justice system where we discriminate against natives.

There is an editorial I would like to refer to called "Our Third World" in the Edmonton Journal of January 21, 1990:

> Alberta's treaty Indians suffer tuberculosis at a rate 12 times higher than the provincial average. Add in Métis and non-status Indians and the TB rate in the native community doubles. These 1988 stats follow a long trend of TB rates that run 10 to 20 times higher among natives than among non-natives.

Tuberculosis is essentially a disease of poor people who live in miserable conditions of housing and nutrition and natives suffer from this disease 10 to 20 times more than the general population.

> Natives suffer a higher incidence of skin disease, diabetes, high blood pressure. The death rate from respiratory diseases is two times the Canadian rate. From injury and poisoning four times the Canadian rate. From suicide three times the Canadian rate.
> In fact, Indians die at a rate two to four times higher than non-natives in this country at every age up to 54. Their life expectancy is nine years shorter than non-native Canadians, shorter even than the life expectancy in some Central American countries.

This country has an institutionalized system of discrimination on the basis of race against native Indians. We cannot make eloquent statements here about how good Canada is or how good we are going to be unless we come up with some concrete measures in this Parliament to deal with the issue and do something about it. To do something about it, Madam Speaker, you must change behaviour before you change attitudes. You have to change the law, you have to provide sanctions in the law and you have to be tough in the enforcement of that law.

We want to live together in this country with all people of all walks of life of all creeds and colours. But to do it we have to afford the same protection to all that we afford to ourselves. I think out of this debate Parliament should make a strong commitment that it intends to do that very thing.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being three o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17) the proceedings of the motion have expired.

On a point of order, the Hon. Member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Stupich: Madam Speaker, it has been an excellent debate with respect to content and timeliness. The interesting thing is that everyone in the House has spoken in favour of the motion, whether speaking, asking questions or commenting. May I suggest that the House unanimously agree to adopt this resolution?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The motion has expired. I have already announced that the time had expired.

Mr. Prud'homme: By unanimous consent we could adopt it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Saint–Denis says that by unanimous consent it could be, except that there was not unanimous consent.

Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

[English]

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

FUNDING

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reinstating funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of privilege that I rise in this House today on my motion which calls upon Parliament to urge the federal government to reinstate funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety located in Hamilton, Ontario.

At the outset of this debate I would like to thank the members of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedures and Private Members' Business for allowing this motion to become a votable item. I believe the decision shows not only the strength of this motion but the strength of parliamentary reform as well.

This motion speaks for all Canadians. While the Conservative government slashes through what it sees as the jungle of needless public expense, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, the CCOHS, is headed for disaster. For ten years the federal government has made a wise business decision by investing in the CCOHS.

Through its preventative role, the centre has saved the federal government, Canadians, millions of dollars a year in health care costs.

According to a poll carried out for The Toronto Star and CTV, Canadians strongly oppose reductions for, among other things, health and education. However, instead of investing in Canadians, in their health and in their future, the Conservative government is divesting itself of what is rightly its responsibility.

The CCOHS was established by Act of Parliament in 1979, as a national institute concerned with the study, encouragement and co-operative advancement of occupational health and safety. The centre has traditionally provided Canadians and the international community with cost-free, impartial and unbiased information on occupational health and safety matters in both official languages. Through the use of its telephone hotline services, technical publications and on-line computer data bases, people can obtain information from the centre virtually trouble free.

The important and valuable role of the centre is obvious. Occupational hazards rank as the number three cause of death to Canadians, right behind heart disease and cancer. Compared to the U.S., Japan, West Germany and Great Britain, Canada has the highest rate of fatalities due to occupational hazards. In 1987, 894 Canadians died as a result of occupational accidents; 25 million person days were lost as a result of work related accidents and injuries.

The Minister of Labour acknowledged in the House of Commons that work related accidents entail direct and indirect cost to Canadians in the amount of $17.5 billion a year. Considering the dividends to the Canadian economy in preventing such occupational related accidents, Canadians cannot afford to lose such a valuable institution. Clearly, public funding of the centre has illustrated that old axiom, "An ounce of prevention for a pound of cure".

The responsibility of the centre in providing accurate and non-biased information to Canadians is becoming increasingly important. In 1988-1989, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety received over 26,000 requests concerning hazardous chemicals. A significant number of these enquiries was received immediately after the PCB fire in St. Basile le Grand, Quebec, from Canadians concerned about the effects of PCBs and other dangerous chemicals.

To give you an idea of the centre's workload, last year alone the CCOHS provided Canadians and the world with over 350,000 copies of 1,000 different technical publications and over 1,200 Canadian companies connected with the centre's computer over 40,000 times.

However, the fuel which drives the centre, that vast pool of information which it provides may soon dry up. Much of the information which the centre disseminates to the public is provided free of charge by international business, foreign governments and the United Nation's World Health Organization and Environmental Program as well as the International Labour Organization.

Because the centre's core funding was slashed in last year's budget and will be completely withdrawn by April of next year, the centre has already resorted to user fees in order to keep itself afloat. The introduction of user fees across the board has wide ranging implications for both the public and for the benevolent organizations which provide information through the centre.

In order to survive in the long-term, the centre's council of governors has established a business plan which would see the introduction of user fees in virtually every case and would redirect the centre's efforts toward the search for new products and services. There is little doubt that user fees would soon turn a profit for the CCOHS. However, I urge this House to recognize today that those profits will just as soon destroy the credibility of this organization, making its role in the promotion of health and safety of workers virtually useless. In many ways this shift to the profit motive will sound the death-knell of this important national institution.

The problems associated with user fees are not only in relation to the worker but to the various bodies which supply information to the centre. User fees may discourage benevolent organizations from supplying information to the centre. Only a small portion of the centre's data bases are actually developed by the centre itself. Most of the centre's information is derived from a mixture of national and international organizations which have a direct interest in the free flow of information in occupational health and safety matters. Some of these organizations have not yet been informed of this plan by the CCOHS to charge for their information.

One of the centre's contributors, the International Labour Organization, has shown concern that it has not been involved or informed of the desire to introduce user fees for information which, in many cases, is supplied free of charge. In fact, most of the information from which data bases have been created is provided free of charge by the goodwill and commitment of these non-governmental agencies.

The question I would like to address today and which must be asked is what would the willingness of these non-governmental organizations be in providing cost-free information to the centre once they learn that the CCOHS is projected to make millions of dollars from their goodwill and commitment. In addition, the U.S. Congress has questioned the level of involvement which its equivalent, the National Institute for Occupational Health and Safety, should have in providing information to the CCOHS if the centre in turn charges its customers for it.

The implication of user fees is greatest for those whom the centre was first established, the Canadian worker. User fees essentially violate the right of Canadians to access to information on potentially life-threatening situations, free of financial barriers. As the Council of Governors state in their draft business plan:

> The centre must become a commercial organization while operating under its basic mandate of serving workers.

In my opinion the two are not compatible as any reduction in services will, in turn, affect Canadians through a reduction in accessible information. One can only imagine that under a profit-driven business plan it would not be safety that would be the first concern but the edict of the Conservative government itself; the bottom line. The proposed business plan which the Minister of Labour was to receive on January 31 of this year calls for the introduction of new services and projects. Heavy emphasis is placed on the marketing of existing products and services. A portion of the business plan blatantly exposes the intention of the Conservative government. I will quote from that plan:

> Based on the belief that the centre has the capability of increasing its existing revenues and—new revenue sources, the Minister of Labour announced—that funding to the centre will be—completely eliminated. The centre has been mandated by the minister to develop a business plan that will show how—the centre will achieve self-sufficiency through the sale of products and services.

I believe this statement illustrates the new philosophy being forced upon the centre. There is no mention of finding the proper balance between self-sufficiency and the rights of the worker to know.

I would like to bring to the attention of the House the following section of the business plan which is a case in point regarding the way in which the centre is evolving. Under the section entitled "Strategies" the draft plan states:

> The centre's strategy will be to favour the sale of products as opposed to the delivery of services, because of the revenue generation that can be achieved through products. Once the investment in product development is made, the profit potential is far greater than for services, which require far greater commitment of human resources and generally offer low profit margins.

There you have it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Flis: Profits before health.

Mr. Keyes: Exactly. Profits before health. The centre, originally established as an institution to help people and to promote occupational health and safety, will now focus on the bottom line and promote its products. The draft plan goes on to explain that a lucrative market for safety-related products exists and that the centre should focus greater energy and resources on developing products and services for sale.

Other aspects of the business plan include a subscription service on occupational health and safety matters targeted at small and medium sized businesses and to develop new and existing markets for the data base information.

The problem I foresee in relation to this business plan is the direction the CCOHS must take under such a market-driven philosophy. The plan will compromise the centre's mandate to promote occupational health and safety in the workplace in Canada and the physical and mental health of working Canadians.

It is the worker who, in the end result, will be compromised by the centre's drive for new products and new services. Surely the Conservative government must be aware that not everything could or should be privatized, especially with regard to the health and safety of workers.

The CCOHS will not be able to serve the very people it was mandated to reach, if, instead, it must apply its energies to potential buyers and potential suppliers of data bases. Worse, Mr. Speaker, those willing to pay the highest price could find their information and their ideas privileged at the expense of the health and safety of workers.

Workers deserve a more objective, arm's length, voice in the selection and distribution of the information, not on the basis of the highest bidder but on the basis of real concern for health and safety in the workplace.

On top of all this is the fact that for all of the new plans and the charges the centre expects to raise, the figure hidden behind it all is that ever present goods and services tax. Under the proposals in the technical paper the centre would have to charge the GST on all of their products making the cost of communicating with the centre just that much farther out of reach for small businesses and the individual labourer.

I would like to note that the total advertising budget for the GST, even before the tax comes into effect, would pay for the operation of the centre for an entire year. Is this what the government means by deficit reduction or wasteful expense? In essence, the CCOHS of tomorrow will be entirely different from the CCOHS of today. It will be profit-driven. Canadian workers will come second to the centre's obsession with marketing and pricing. It will seek the bottom line. It will become complacent as opposed to being on the leading edge of occupational health and safety measures.

The elimination of public funding will jeopardize the tripartite relationship of the centre. This relationship has been the backbone of the centre. The credibility of the CCOHS depends on the trusting relationship between business, government and labour.

Now that the CCOHS is faced with relying on private financing, labour has stated that it does not want to be part of a new commercial operation concerned with profit more than safety. As the vice-president of the Canadian Labour Congress stated:

> We are only talking about $10 million a year to provide occupational health and safety to all Canadians. That is the job of a federal government, to protect the citizens of the country. If this plan goes ahead, I do not think we are going to have any choice but to withdraw our support from the centre.

This will mean that user fees will hurt those people the centre was designed to protect. Because of the cost to small companies and workers without unions user fees will discourage inquiries leaving business to provide their employees with safety information.

Many critics have argued that placing the burden on small businesses and labour is scrimping on a false economy. One expert in the occupational health and safety field recently stated:

> The direct savings contributed by the centre could be estimated at more than three times its budget. This centre is already paying for itself hundreds of times over every year. The government now says that due to the national debt, the centre must find alternative financing. It will save $10 million a year by cutting off subsidies to the centre. Simple arithmetic shows that the real cost if the centre closes will probably run into hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

• (1320)

Simple arithmetic also shows that the government could and should pay for the centre's operations by cutting needless expenses elsewhere. For example, the federal Department of Public Works directed the purchase of a facility for a customs and excise training facility even though Customs and excise said that the facility in question did not suit their purposes. The facility, located in the federal riding of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, was purchased for $5 million.

As the Auditor General stated in his recent annual report to Parliament:

> In our opinion, the initial contracts did not provide for a realistic evaluation before the decision to proceed. When construction began in 1986, it was to meet needs established in 1976 and not re-examined since then. Although the consultant's report stated the property would be adequate—with some renovations—the cost of renovations has so far been $35 million.

The Auditor General also describes the fact that there are many loopholes existing in the income tax system which the government could close. These loopholes amount to some $350 million in lost revenue every year. For a government that preaches fiscal responsibility, it would be easier to support measures that would save on needless expenses, but not on cost-saving institutions such as the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

In short, the CCOHS needs public support in order to fulfil its mandate. Under the proposed plan Canadian workers would be compromised by the centre's desire for stability and profit.

Canadian workers need adequate information regarding workplace hazards. We know that. The fact remains that if the centre is unable to survive, if workers and small businesses cannot afford to contact the centre regarding workplace hazards, the real loss will be to the Canadian taxpayer and Canadian workers.

So I am asking my colleagues on all sides of this House to seriously consider my proposal urging that the federal government reinstate funding for the Canadian Centre of Occupational Health and Safety.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak to the motion of my colleague for Hamilton West. I know that he has long had an interest in his community and that he is very interested in the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, as he should be. The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety is a tremendous organization. It has proven itself over the last 10 or 12 years as it has developed an excellent record in the dissemination of important information in the field of health.

The information that the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety receives, as the member for Hamilton West mentioned, comes from other organizations. However, he forgot to say that the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety puts that information into a form that Canadian workers and employers can understand it and puts it to use in a very efficient way. The member speaks of this important information and then talks about profit. It will be a long time before there will be profit because even though this is a tripartite government organization the federal government or the taxpayers have been paying almost the full load for the operation of the centre; over $67 million over the last 10 or 12 years. That is a substantial investment.

There are other players, other people at the table in this tripartite organization that governs the centre. The centre does operate autonomously, it makes its own decisions and it develops without being told what to do by the government.

It has built up a tremendous reputation, as the member for Hamilton West indicated. But there comes a time under good fiscal management when the government and also the board of governors believes that there should be some cost recovery developed into a plan. And the centre has been doing that over the last number of years consistently, albeit slowly. The federal government believes that that should be accelerated to a certain extent and so we have said that the centre should move into more of a cost-recovery mode and it has now developed a plan to look at doing so.

As a result of receiving government funding only—although it had a good reputation and did a good job—I think that a lot of people did not know what the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety did. There are a lot of school boards and fire departments and so on which did not know. I see the member opposite from northern Ontario. I am sure he knows about it because he was involved in assisting workers.

Were we really spreading the word? As a result of not having to worry about where the funding comes from there may have been a less than an adequate job done on that. The business plan that is just now being developed will have to do an even better job with the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety by spreading the word and being helpful in a much better way.

The member opposite indicated that NIOSH and other organizations would not continue to give the centre information because it is moving into a cost-recovery mode. He used the word "profit". I use "cost-recovery" because the discussions that the centre has had with those contributory organizations have indicated that it was in a cost-recovery, or pay-for-the-cost, situation. They have no trouble with that at all.

I might be very surprised about what the International Labour Organization thinks about this very important plan. I think the plan is very exciting. It looks at the opportunities for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety to spread out, to move. It has been mainly concentrated on the health side, as I think members opposite who are interested know. It will now have the opportunity to move in a much more direct way into the safety side. Members will agree that it has been mainly operating on the health side and not as aggressively and helpfully on the safety side as it perhaps could be. I see that developing under this important business plan that has been brought forward.

We want the centre to carry on and expand. My colleague from Hamilton West mentioned that the centre is going to have to move into new product development. What is wrong with that? I think it is absolutely great that it is going to move into new product development. It will be putting on leadership seminars and conferences, as is proposed in the plan, as well as moving most certainly and directly toward becoming a self-sustaining organization, first, in connection with the CCINFO disc, that tremendous technology which it has that gives so much information to the worker and the employer. It will carry on from there developing new products and getting into conferences and seminars.

The cost projection is nothing tremendous. It looks like a 70 per cent or 80 per cent cost increase over the next few years on the CCINFO disc side. However, as is stated in the business plan, the centre will ensure that certain services will continue to be provided at no charge to clients so as not to impose barriers to access to information by individuals across the country. This will also act as a tool to assist the centre in marketing other products and services.

The person who phones for information will receive that information and get a publication and/or data sent immediately. That is what the minister and the government have committed themselves to.

So I look forward to great things. There is certainly great support for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety on the government side. I have visited it a number of times and as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour I have had close contact with this centre since last May. I know it is going to continue and I know the member opposite for Hamilton West wants that to happen too. We will all work together so that this centre can carry on with its good work.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today in support of the motion put forward by my friend for Hamilton West. The Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety was established in 1978. It was established to supply crucial research and information, which is duplicated nowhere else, to all workers in this great country.

It is very obvious to us on this side of the House that the government has a very blatant plan to privatize the CCOHS. In order to privatize an industry you must have a product to sell. In this case, Mr. Speaker, the product is information, information that relates to the health and safety of all workers across Canada. The information is contained on a computer disc which the government tells us can be sold at a high price. And that is what this is all about, profit line.

This is information which was donated and shared by institutes like NIOHS in the United States. Therefore this government is proposing, not only to sell something that we do not own to begin with but also to increase the price of the service.

I listened with interest to the member opposite when he said that it is not profits, it is cost recovery. That kind of says the something to me—the bottom line. I wonder at times why it is that whenever we talk about health and safety in the workplace we have to say "profits" or "cost recovery" in the same breath. Surely somewhere down the line we have to put the health and the safety of our workers before profits.

The member opposite and the government are saying that employers are paying millions of dollars in contributions to these services. I must point out that workers are paying with their health and their lives. When we can offer a service that will educate them so that they know more about what they are working with and what the ramifications are of working with these products, I think this is more in line with what we really want to offer our workers.

We hear it said that we have done well in the health related issues and now we have to look at the safety related issues. Every time I have talked to someone in the business industry about safety the first thing that is said is that it is the worker's fault, he was not paying attention, or the worker was hung over. It worries me when we talk about safety in that context.

The government has to make a commitment to workers to maintain the CCOHS to ensure that workers and their representatives have free access to this information. If we insist on privatizing this service, which is exactly what we are doing, we are taking that right away from them.

I urge all members of this House to disregard what was said by the other side and support this motion by our friend for Hamilton West.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the chance to speak on this important question today for two reasons. The first is that the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety is a very important institution in this country and an institution to which this government is fully committed.

The second reason is that the chairman, Maureen Shaw, is a constituent of mine from the beautiful southern Alberta foothills. She established credentials in this field over a period of several years and she now commutes to Hamilton at great personal sacrifice to provide able leadership for the centre in this challenging time.

In the past decade the number of occupational accidents and illnesses in Canada has continued to be a major concern to employers, to workers and to all levels of government. In this period of time we have witnessed an increasing willingness and capacity on the part of organizations of employers, workers and governments to co-operate in efforts to reduce these losses, both in terms of human suffering and economic losses. We must increase our efforts and continue to work together to ensure a safe and healthy working environment for all Canadians.

Today we face enormous challenges in the area of occupational health and safety. Fortunately we are equipped with an information centre that was envisaged some 12 years ago by the three social partners in order to meet the future challenges which are now upon us. I am referring, of course, to the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety which was created by an act of Parliament in 1978.

Since its formation the CCOHS has worked towards the objective of reducing the number of occupational accidents and illnesses in Canadian workplaces and has become an increasingly important component of this activity throughout Canada. Within its mandate it has assumed the role of being a national information resource on occupational health and safety matters. The CCOHS gathers, evaluates and distributes occupational health and safety information to all decision-makers; workers, unions, management, governments and professionals in the field.

The CCOHS information and advisory service answers inquiries from any source about workplace health and safety and related matters. It has developed automated databases on occupational health and safety topics which permit direct access by federal-provincial and territorial government agencies, employers and unions from any part of Canada.

The current economy in Canada dictates a critical need to reduce government deficits and to improve productivity and efficiency. The need to compete internationally also highlights and adds impetus to greater productivity and efficiency. All levels of governments in Canada are finding it necessary to restrain some of their services and some of their programs.

My friend opposite, the hon. member for Hamilton West, referred to a CTV-Toronto Star poll released just last evening. Unlike my hon. colleague, I have no desire to suggest that we should base all public policy on polling data. However, he will have noted also that a huge majority of Canadians also support cutting money going to Crown corporations. The bottom line is that all sectors in society must tighten the belt.

Concerns for rising costs of Worker's Compensation Board programs and of health care in Canada, and the concurrent concern for improving the health status of Canadians, are focusing attention on health promotion, disease prevention and accident prevention.

Occupational safety and health in Canada is a complex field. It embodies a combination of economic, scientific and ethical issues. The field is further complicated by the fact that it is regulated by 13 different occupational safety and health agencies across the country. The importance of this field in Canada and in other countries is becoming increasingly recognized because of the impact of economic, social, technological and demographic trends in this area of activity. It is also recognized because of the impact of trends related to the working environment and to the health field in general.

The impact that these trends are having on the field of occupational safety and health is also opening many opportunities for the CCOHS in performing its mandate. The rising awareness and understanding of health, occupational and general environmental issues is generating an increasing demand for information on these subject areas.

Perhaps the biggest problem facing people who need information in this field is the fact that there is so much information. There is so much that it is very difficult to find that piece of information which is useful to a particular user when they need it.

The CCINFO is the Canadian centre's computerized information service. It provides fast and user-friendly answers to a wide spectrum of occupational health and safety questions. It is also available on-line, the CCINFO line, through a telecommunications link to the central computer at CCOHS. A telephone link also provides user support as well.

The disc, read-only memory, is for microcomputers. It includes data bases, publications and videotex packages in a new application of current technology that requires only a microcomputer to access a very large volume of information. The set of information discs now comprise three discs; two contain chemical information and a third contains occupational health and safety information.

I would like to give hon. members a better appreciation of the capacity of this innovative product. The computer literate members of the House will know that one single three and a half inch compact disc could contain the entire copy of the departmental estimates tabled in this House last spring. A single compact disc can hold up to 300,000 pages of information. So, the application of this technology to the proceedings of this House could contain Hansard and the Canada Gazette would also be a very useful source of information for researchers.

Labour Canada, in conjunction with the centre, has developed a special application compact disc containing federal legislation and standards. This disc is currently undergoing operational trials in Labour Canada and after two to three months it will probably be put into full operation. Labour Canada currently is considering broadening the usefulness of this new tool to incorporate operational program directives on the disc and to explore an application in computer-assisted training.

Other federal departments are also exploiting the use of this innovative product which permits gains in efficiency within their own operations. For example, environmental protection, as we all know, is a major concern to Canadians. The effective implementation of environmental protection measures requires partnership among a number of sectors in the Canadian mosaic. This partnership will help preserve and protect the environment by the co-operative contribution of abilities and knowledge. A joint venture between Environment Canada and the centre includes a joint presentation at the Globe 90 exposition planned for Vancouver this upcoming March and will focus on this unique CCOHS information system and complex chemical information.

A direct indicator of the success of this innovative product of the centre is the peer acclaim for its quality and demand, both domestically and internationally, which demonstrates its utility. Several Ontario universities recently approached the centre to resolve a problem related to management of collections of material safety data sheets for the system in many different locations. The CCINFO database responded to this identified special need. These are just some examples of the kinds of products that can be developed in a new and reinvigorated centre.

Both the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Chemical Producers Association have assisted in the development of the CCINFO database for several years. They have also actively promoted the database among their member firms. This encouragement has included establishing the database as a voluntary central repository of material safety data sheets from manufacturers and suppliers of chemicals and by encouraging their member firms to use the database for such related information.

The CCINFO disc has also recently received accolades from Yale University. Yale's medical library in a detailed review of the disc, called it an information resource that is global in scope.

In addition, as a further demonstration of its wide acceptance and marketability, the centre recently signed an agreement with Geneva-based International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre, an arm of the ILO, the International Labour Organization. This agreement strongly boosts the centre's ability to market the CCINFO product internationally in Europe, Asia, Africa and Latin America. The centre has excelled in the performance of its mandate and in the information services provided to Canadians at a very low cost.

I wish to assure the House that the centre will continue in its role as a disseminator of occupational health and safety information in Canada. The government will continue to support the centre in its mandate and its role of performing this important service for the benefit of all Canadians. The government is simply asking that other sponsoring partners and the beneficiaries of the centre accept and shoulder their share of the responsibility for funding the centre.

It is a uniquely Canadian institution, created by Canadians to reflect the needs of the country, its industrial milieu and the people of this country. It has been given the task to provide specific occupational health and safety functions and services within a climate of increasing fiscal restraint. The present context of this restraint also requires the creation of a more business-like environment for the efficient management of scarce resources.

I would like to affirm the government's continued commitment to occupational health and safety, and specifically to the work of the CCOHS. This has not changed. The centre has become renowned both internationally and throughout Canada as a dependable source of unbiased and highly professional information. There is no question that the vital task of delivering this information service relating to the health and safety of Canadians in their workplace will continue. I believe it will provide a better service in the future. It will provide a service that targets very real needs.

Mr. Speaker, recognizing your signal—it will provide an effective and efficient service in the future.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to commend my colleague for Hamilton West for bringing forward this motion. It shows the insight and the initiative of this particular side of the House in understanding exactly what the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety was really put in place to do.

• (1350)

Before we get into the nuts and bolts of the issue, I would like to read to members opposite, who seem to have swallowed the canary in believing everything the hon. member for Sarnia has said as it relates to this centre, because there is one particular problem here. When this centre was created by all-party support, that is, this side and that side and it just so happens we were on the other side at the time. When that took place there were certain individuals who spoke and one of them happened to be the hon. member for Vancouver South, who we all know very well as a respected member of the House. This is what he had to say: "As I understand it the only funds going into the centre come from the federal government". That will only change if there is agreement with the provinces.

The objectives of the centre—and I will read them for you—do not state, as members opposite have referred, that it is simply to send information out to those who request it for a fee. There is a little more to it than this.

The first and most important part of the mandate is to promote health and safety in the workplace and the physical and mental health of working people in Canada and through that, to facilitate consultation and co-operation among federal, provincial and territorial jurisdictions. Further, participation is necessary by labour and management in the establishment and maintenance of high standards of occupational health and safety appropriate to the Canadian situation.

If you take away that particular ability by removing funding from this centre, what you do is completely remove the mandate. That is, it is not possible to carry out the mandate. No member on the other side in this House has had the nerve to say that. Basically, what the CLC has said in their own way is that they cannot continue in their tripartite arrangement if the mandate changes. Once the funding is removed, then basically what has been done is remove the mandate and that is the enhancement of health and safety. It is easy enough to send out a fee. We could start up a company that could very easily do that for Canadians, that is to buy different discs of different issues and different health hazards all across the world and then sell them to people who are interested. That is not the intent of this centre. The intent of this centre was to provide up-to-date unbiased information. It would go to whoever needed it. Access of information was based on the fact that you were Canadian, not that you had a dollar in your pocket to pay for it.

One of the reasons I thought it would be important for me to rise today is that I have taken the liberty of writing every premier and every minister of labour in the country to ask for their opinion of this, whether they thought it was a good idea to change the mandate of the Occupational Health and Safety Centre in Hamilton. I did this to find out if they agreed in essence with the government opposite and if it was nothing but opposition rhetoric that we have disagreed with the change in mandate.

I would just like to read a few into the record. From the letter from the Department of Labour of the great province of Prince Edward Island, I will read a few of the major paragraphs: "This decision will extremely prejudice the delivery of trustworthy and impartial information to individuals, unions, employers and governments which is so critically important in providing safe and healthy workplaces in the nation. The recent proclamation of the Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System, a system that has been heralded throughout many nations of the world as progressive and far-sighted, is now being placed in jeopardy with this financial decision."

We go to the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador which is always willing to give us its advice on different issues. They state to us: "I have previously indicated my support for maintaining the status quo with respect to funding for the Canadian centre. The centre is an important national clearing house of occupational health and safety information and represents a major tangible effort to co-ordinate and harmonize occupational health and safety issues in Canada".

The important part is "harmonize and co-ordinate", not just grabbing information and shipping it out for a fee. That is not what we are talking about here. We are talking about enhancing and improving our workplace hazardous information, our safety in the workplace and that is a continuing process. That is not something that we can just turn off like a tap and say: "It is done. Now we will sell it to you." It continues day after day as new materials are invented and new processes are put in place. Therefore we have to continue to allow the centre to do its work without the problems of trying to figure out where their next dollar comes from.

My colleague for Sarnia brought up an important aspect in his speech, that there are many different groups out there who know nothing about the Occupational Health and Safety Centre. For this reason, I thought it would be interesting to read comments of other groups that wrote to tell me what they thought of the government's particular move. One comes from a school board that the member said did not know anything about it. This is from the Dryden District Roman Catholic Separate School Board. "At a time when all levels of government are introducing new legislation regarding occupational health and safety, it would seem that this vital centre should receive adequate funding to continue its extremely valuable work. We have found CCOHS to be an excellent centre source of information on occupational health and safety matters and would urge you and your colleagues to reconsider the decision to withdraw its funding".

Again, I thought it was quite interesting when the member for Sarnia said that fire departments do not know what is going on and they have not got a clue about what this centre is all about. I have a letter here from the Kenora Professional Firefighters' Association, which states: "We feel health and safety is of great importance, not only to us, but to many people in the labour force. The occupational health and safety centre has been known during its tenure to expedite information quickly when requested by firefighting operations. This centre is vital for the health and safety of firefighters involved in what has been traditionally called the most dangerous profession, but continues to be needed for the safety of all Canadians who are reliant on the information available on short notice".

Short notice is the important thing here. Do we wait until we send a bill, get the cheque and then send the information? Or do we, in essence, send the information when they need it at that moment? It would be interesting for the members opposite to understand this, the little fire departments do not have the dollars available. Many of these fire departments are volunteer organizations that do not have the ability to pay for this type of information.

The mandate of this particular centre was simply that every single Canadian has the right to free access to health and safety information that relates to their workplace. We have now changed the mandate and I suggest very strongly that members opposite understand that before they vote against my friend's motion to change the approach and put funding back in place which was intended for this centre so we can continue our work as Canadians have done in the past and to be front and centre in the world and to try to make our workplaces safer and better places for us all.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I was listening carefully to the debate so far, and I realized that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Keyes) was accusing the Conservative Government of wanting to dismantle the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

I would like to remind the House that since the Centre was founded in 1978, the federal government has spent $68 million on its funding, and that two-thirds of that amount was invested by the Conservative Government.

When the hon. member says we are against Canada's occupational health and safety system, I think he is wrong, that he should take a good look at his notes and that his researchers should work a little harder on their statistics.

Mr. Speaker, as we know, the Centre was founded jointly by the provincial governments, the federal government, the territorial governments, employers and the unions, to improve the quality of life and the safety of Canadian workers.

Mr. Speaker, so far, only the federal government has invested in the Centre. When the Minister of Finance brought down the Budget last year, everyone was asked to tighten their belts, and I think we have a right to ask everybody, including organizations, to do their share and try and be self-financing, so that we will no longer have to waste public funds on projects that benefit only a small part of the population.

We must ask everyone to do their share, to participate. Those who receive these services should at least have the decency to shoulder a small part of the financial burden.

Mr. Speaker, I believe my time has expired.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, not long ago, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) announced that his government had decided to launch a major advertising campaign, estimated to cost about $9 million, no less, to try and make his GST palatable to public. We all know that this tax, which has been rejected by the vast majority of Canadians and by the Liberal Party of Canada, is pernicious and unfair.

At a time when Canadian unity should be this government's priority and millions of dollars are being spent on GST propaganda, what has this government done and what is it doing to inform Canadians about the crucial importance of Meech Lake?

I urge the government, as an example to the provinces and while there is still time, to act responsibly, to stop hiding its head in the sand, and take concrete action to show Canadians that it wants to see Meech Lake ratified as soon as possible.

CARIBOO CROSS-COUNTRY SKI MARATHON

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend it was my great pleasure to fire the starting shotgun for the Cariboo Cross-Country Ski Marathon at 100 Mile House, British Columbia. Close to 1,000 skiers ranging in age from five to 77 and from as far away as Switzerland and New Zealand took part in the event.

Fort McMurray should be very proud of Greg Inkster who came first in the male category. Prince George's Tracy Bell was the fastest female.

Many others must have taken time out to enjoy the scenery. One of the skiers, who probably had the most fun, proudly crossed the finish line eight and a half hours after the start.

The people of 100 Mile House are to be congratulated for hosting such a successful family-oriented event without the benefit of any government assistance.

On behalf of the organizers of the marathon, the largest of its kind in western Canada, I would like to wish similar success for all those who take part next weekend in the Gatineau 55, the largest ski marathon in Canada.

SPORTS

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the fourteenth Commonwealth Games concluded on Saturday in Auckland, New Zealand.

Referred to as the friendly games, they are conducted in the true spirit of international sport and friendship. Canadians can be proud of the performance of our athletes who earned a total of 113 medals, 35 of them gold, against the best in the Commonwealth.

While a winning performance is the goal of every athlete, we must continue to support the values of competing fairly and striving to achieve excellence through long hours of training and dedication to the ideals of amateur sport.

The Commonwealth Games in New Zealand were an excellent venue for Canada's athletes to begin a new sports era internationally.

On behalf of this House I would like to congratulate the Canadian team. I know we are all looking forward to the next Commonwealth Games scheduled for Victoria, British Columbia in 1994.

CANADA POST

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a message for the minister responsible for Canada Post. It comes as a motion passed last week at the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association. That motion reads:

> WHEREAS the Canada Post Corporation is currently establishing retail postal outlets which will unnecessarily duplicate the counter services offered by existing post offices; and
> WHEREAS the Canada Post Corporation anticipates that retail postal outlets will be the appropriate vehicle for provision of postal service in the future resulting in the loss of existing post offices;
> THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association demand that the minister responsible for Canada Post instruct the Canada Post Corporation to immediately halt the establishment of retail postal outlets in Saskatchewan.

I trust the minister is finally getting the message—Canadians want to keep their post offices.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, across the country Canadians of all walks of life are becoming increasingly aware of the need to take an active role in reducing the amount of environmentally harmful waste we generate.

It was therefore with great pleasure last Friday that I announced on behalf of the Minister of the Environment that an application forwarded by the Carleton County recycling project would receive funding under the Environmental Partners Fund. The partners fund will contribute $69,000 to a three year, $166,000 project which will see the establishment of a recycling project for glass, aluminum and other metal products, and will reduce the volume of material currently being placed in landfill sites.

I applaud the Clearing House Project, a group of 30 members of the local community who have played a leading role in putting together the application for this project.

I strongly believe that the future success of cleaning up our environment lies with projects such as this and I congratulate the applicants for their initiative in this regard.

BILINGUALISM

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, who would have ever thought the council of a city with a French name would outlaw French as one of the two official languages in the city of Sault Ste. Marie.

"From now on," declared Mayor Fratesi and most councillors, "English will be the official language of communication in the Sault." That is nothing new actually, but the decision of Mayor Fratesi has serious repercussions.

First, other municipalities such as Thunder Bay and Niagara Falls are following his questionable lead.

Furthermore, his decision has given defenders of Meech Lake new ammunition: "Sign or Canada will split".

We had a taste of this future when Premier Bourassa assured European investors that if pushed, Quebec would separate while maintaining economic association with Canada.

We believe the French language is as important as English in keeping Canada together. Across the land bilingualism and the respect for both languages in all cultures are the essential preconditions for a united and strong Canada.

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, over the past several months Atlantic Canada has been concerned as a result of the closure of CFB Summerside and the closing of the Canso fish processing plant.

All of Atlantic Canada is now relieved and pleased with the recent actions taken by the Minister of Public Works who is also responsible for regional development in Atlantic Canada. The minister, through co-operation with the government of P.E.I., the government of Nova Scotia, and with the co-operation of the private sector has helped keep both of these towns reasonably optimistic about the future.

Summerside has seen announcements by two potato processors which will result in major new facilities generating close to $80 million of investment and hundreds of jobs. Although not in place yet, an agreement in principle to keep the Canso fish processing plant open is under consideration and will save the way of life for residents of this area.

Atlantic Canadians appreciate the efforts by the minister. In fact, with these very positive developments in the potato and fish industries the hon. minister is respectfully and affectionately becoming known in Atlantic Canada as the minister of fish and chips.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 31 to ask members of this government to acknowledge the disaster unfolding in rural Canada. Thousands upon thousands of farmers are being forced off their farms, particularly in Saskatchewan. This results in the service industries also being forced out of business.

This government and its members are closing rural Canada. I ask them to implement a moratorium on all mortgages and interest payments on those mortgages for one year. I ask them to implement immediately a farm-gate price for grains that will reflect their cost of production and a return on investment, management and risk.

I ask them to make a commitment to the producers of Canada that this government will match the subsidies on export shipments by the United States rather than leaving the farmers of this nation to shoulder the load.

Finally, I ask this government to lift its shroud of secrecy, the conspiracy of silence, so that the people of Canada know the disaster that is unfolding across rural Canada.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of two of my colleagues on the other side, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and especially the Minister of the Environment, an article that appeared in The Gazette of Montreal today regarding an abandoned mine site in Joutel, Quebec.

According to the article, the waste at the Poirier Mine stands five storeys high. It has been accumulating since 1966 and left there when the mine closed in 1975.

What concerns me is the fact that there is a mention that the mine could be reopened in the future by another company and that the mess will not get cleaned up in the meantime.

• (1410)

Since the Quebec government has been trying unsuccessfully to get this site cleaned up since 1980 by the former owner, my hon. colleagues could look into the possibility of setting up through Environment Canada a committee such as the Equity Silver Public Surveillance Committee that exists in British Columbia.

The workers in the mining industry of the region must also live in that region. It is time for this government to show more leadership and not allow mining companies to come in, make their profits and leave the workers high and dry with no jobs and a spoiled environment to boot.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, 10 years ago a Liberal government turned its back on western Canada and launched the destructive National Energy Program which brought the oil industry to its knees.

This government killed that odious program. We are not sure that all the members of the National Energy Board were listening.

The National Energy Board has now turned its attention to gas producers. Last November the board refused to approve four export permits because, it concluded, the contract prices threatened the public interest. In effect, it has assumed the right to determine the price for exports based on a cost-benefit analysis divined from a crystal ball.

Furthermore, it is argued that these decisions fly in the face of both the free trade agreement and the GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. In response to a legitimate protest from gas producers the NEB is reviewing its procedures for approving gas exports.

I strongly encourage it to drop the use of the cost-benefit analysis and to rely on those other elements of the review process which complement the free market. This would allow for the development of a well functioning, competitive market which will let all customers, domestic and export, compete effectively and equitably for gas supplies.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, more evidence that equal status for women is still being thwarted came to the fore last week.

Female members of the Governor General's own footguards were unfairly excluded from participating in the installation of their new commander-in-chief. The commanding officer, who knowingly decided to leave the women out of the ceremonies, had ample opportunity and discretion to include them. He chose not to. One militia spokesperson considered this "traditional" and "logical" because, after all, they are not infantrymen. That is a self-evident statement if I ever heard one. That is exactly the issue.

Why have women been excluded from the infantry? Why are they confined to traditional clerical and administrative roles? The women who protested were told not to bother taking their complaint to the Human Rights Commission. We may all look forward to the day when fairness and justice are so embedded in the values and practices of Canadian society that the commission will not be necessary. Until such institutions as the military abandon outdated attitudes, the Human Rights Commission is all that protects many Canadians against prejudices of the dark ages.

The Governor General is a symbol of our national values, including the equality of all citizens. His installation should have been a joyful occasion for all Canadians, regardless of gender.

NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, a vote will be taken at 6 p.m. today on the NDP motion to complete the national parks system by the year 2000 and to implement the Brundtland report recommendations that Canada protect at least 12 per cent of land and marine ecosystems.

The real test of today's vote is whether this Parliament contains a sufficient number of MPs who understand what is at stake. We are the last generation which can make a choice on completing the national parks system. Our parks system is only one-half complete and a supportive vote will help, not hinder, momentum toward the goal of parks completion by the year 2000.

Protecting 12 per cent of land and marine ecosystems is described as the indispensable prerequisite to sustainable development by the Brundtland Commission. Only 2.6 per cent of Canada is fully protected. Another 3.7 per cent is partly protected. To reach the 12 per cent level requires federal leadership and co-operation at every level across Canada and around the globe.

The Prime Minister endorsed the Brundtland report two years ago. Let us hope that today's vote reflects reality. Ninety-six per cent of Canadians support strong action to protect and preserve our wilderness heritage.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I am a Francophone and a Quebecer, and I am helping to build this country, together with my colleagues in the House of Commons. However, while we Francophones say yes to English Canada, while we Quebecers want to enter the Canadian federation, provided it is recognized that Quebec is a distinct society, shots are being fired on all sides: by Jean Chrétien, who couldn't care less whether our country stays together or not, as long as his personal ambition prevails; by a number of provincial Premiers who probably have not realized what the impact will be in dollar and cents if Quebec separates, and now we have municipalities insulting Francophones by banning their language.

What will this lead to, Mr. Speaker? Although I am still confident that Meech Lake will be ratified, I am starting to wonder!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BILINGUALISM

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Bilingualism is an essential element in the fabric of Canada. It is what makes us unique. It is what keeps us united. It is a principle, I believe, worth fighting for.

The Prime Minister is aware, as we all are, that recently that principle is being challenged. I wonder whether he would join me in sponsoring a unanimous resolution of this House in support of the principle of bilingualism and the linguistic duality of Canada. Would he respond in a positive fashion to that suggestion?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I entirely agree with my right hon. friend that the concept of bilingualism is a hallmark of the nation. It is one to be strengthened at every opportunity, which is why this government was honoured to bring in the first amendments in 19 years to the Official Languages Act which strengthened both bilingualism and minority rights across the nation and which, I believe, was supported by all political parties in the House.

The linguistic duality concept is, as my right hon. friend knows, an integral part of the Meech Lake Accord. It was supported by all three party leaders because it, too, strongly enhances the concept of linguistic duality and strengthens bilingualism across the country.

While I have not seen anything that my right hon. friend is talking about, if he is discussing a resolution that talks about bilingualism and a reaffirmation of support for the Meech Lake Accord to be debated and voted upon in this House, I would be delighted to do that.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the spirit of bilingualism is wilting away—and I say this because of the Prime Minister's failure to give me a direct response—because of a lack of federal leadership. There is a lack of federal leadership not only in sponsoring the ratification of the Meech Lake Accord, but also in standing up to linguistic intolerance, whether that be in the English speaking parts of Canada or in the French speaking parts of our country, particularly the sign law in the province of Quebec.

In those circumstances I wonder whether the Prime Minister would outline what specific steps he intends to take as Prime Minister of this country to respond to the unacceptable resolutions at the municipal level in Ontario, resolutions which may well spread through that province and to other parts of the country.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that my right hon. friend would raise a question like this and suggest that it is because of a lack of federal leadership.

My recollection is that when Bill 101 was introduced into the Quebec National Assembly and passed, the federal Prime Minister of the day, while he regretted it, refused to invoke the disallowance clause, saying that the matter was something to be resolved by public opinion and by the courts. I had nothing to do with that, nor did my right hon. friend. I am surprised that my right hon. friend would suggest that there is something lacking in terms of federal leadership.

This government proceeded in Saskatchewan and Alberta and in the Province of Quebec because we believe that anything at variance with the promotion of language rights and the protection of minority rights across the country is at variance with the fundamental dimension of this country. That is why we have fought so hard to make sure that the Province of Quebec, which had been left out of the constitutional arrangements in 1981–82, was brought back into the family, so that these matters could be resolved by all Canadians within the constitution.

At all times, be it in Saskatchewan, Alberta or Quebec, I have carried the message. I have fought the fight from Manitoba to Rosemere in favour of the promotion of the protection of minority rights, English speaking in Quebec, French speaking across the country, and the building of a united Canada with tolerance, equality of opportunity, and through instruments such as Bill C–72, a greater protection for linguistic minorities and a greater role for the federal government in promoting that across the country.

These initiatives, Bill C-72, the Meech Lake Accord and so on, all of which have strengthened minority rights, all of which promote bilingualism, were supported by my right hon. friend. I am surprised that today he would reproach me for doing something with which he is in fundamental accord.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): We asked for the co-operation of the Prime Minister and we have asked for his leadership. We have been treated to a political charade here. The tone of the House is not the tone that I would have expected we could have brought together to deal with linguistic minority rights in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I believe Canadians are determined to enforce the protection of linguistic minority rights. As the Premier of Ontario said on the weekend, when those rights are threatened in one part of the country, they are threatened everywhere.

Will the Prime Minister call a meeting with the Ontario and Quebec Premiers and the other provincial Premiers, to ensure that concrete steps are taken to stem the surge of intolerance reflected in recent municipal resolutions against bilingualism?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, like the Leader of the Opposition, I deplore any surge of intolerance, in Ontario or anywhere else in Canada. I think that protecting the rights of linguistic minorities where they are located across Canada is a noble obligation, and an obligation that all Members of this House try to fulfil and support at all times.

To get back to the basic question, the hon. member is asking me for support for bilingualism. Of course my government would support a resolution to that effect. In fact, the present Governor General of Canada, when he was Minister of Justice, tabled the first substantial amendments in 19 years to strengthen bilingualism and the protection of minority rights. In this connection, the hon. member for Vanier is to be commended, since I believe he fully approved this approach which was one of the major components of the federal government's linguistic policy.

That being said, since the hon. member mentioned linguistic duality, that duality is specifically mentioned in the Meech Lake Accord. Considering the Liberal Party's support, through the Leader of the Opposition, for Meech Lake, I would be delighted to have a debate on these issues and to support a resolution in favour of bilingualism that, through this House, would support Meech Lake, which is also a very important document promoting Canada's linguistic duality.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Today, several national organizations, including the Conference of Catholic Bishops, the Assembly of First Nations, the anti-poverty coalition and the Social Planning Council of Toronto, expressed their unconditional support for a complete overhaul of Bill C-21, a bill which is extremely hard on thousands of unemployed Canadians.

Since the bill, if it ever had merit, Mr. Speaker, is no longer reasonable and we are all concerned about its economic impact—the disintegration of the regional economies, the real destruction of Canadian manufacturing, increased unemployment and poverty—and since everyone agrees, why does the minister not withdraw her bill immediately?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of withdrawing this bill because it is in the interests of Canadian workers from coast to coast, including Atlantic Canada.

The reason that it is in their interests is that it does two things: First, it provides them with an opportunity to upgrade their skills during periods of unemployment and to enable them to get more permanent jobs in a new future in a way that they have not been able to before. Second, it is much more sensitive to changes in unemployment rates than the existing system that we have today.

I should think that the hon. member would be speaking in support of a bill that is in the interests of Canadian workers.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, during committee hearings we attempted to speak on behalf of workers and what we got was exactly what people are saying today, that the 84,000 unemployed in the city of Toronto and the hundreds of thousands of unemployed elsewhere do not agree with the minister. For them, the government's withdrawal of its $2.9 billion participation in unemployment insurance and the reallocation of approximately 15 per cent or $2 billion of income maintenance funds to training is just a trifle less than highway robbery.

I ask the minister again to reconsider her position on Bill C-21 and either accept major changes to the bill, or to withdraw it completely and immediately.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already said in response to his first question that no, I will not withdraw the bill.

If you look at the people who have come to speak to this bill both in the legislative committee and in the other place, what you see is that people who do disagree with the bill, and there is some honest disagreement, all disagree for totally different different reasons.

We have a balanced approach. The benefits are on the other side. You cannot tell me that young parents in this country are not in favour of this bill. They are in favour of this bill because it will extend the maternity and the parental benefits. You cannot tell me that people over 65 are not in favour of this bill because it gives benefits to them.

Tell me where we are going to find these benefits if we do not revise this act. What we have done is create a situation that is going to be better for workers in terms of the kind of economic future that this country has that gives them a better way to participate.

BILINGUALISM

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister.

The Leader of the Opposition has raised what I feel is a very serious proposition and something that should be considered non-partisan. Canadians everywhere are concerned about the future of this country and the responsibility that we, as national leaders, have for nation building in this country.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister again: Would the Prime Minister support an all-party motion in this House that we accept and promote linguistic minority rights everywhere in Canada, whether that be English in Quebec or French in other provinces?

• (1430)

In my view it is not a matter for debate. I am not suggesting a debate. I would not have thought that it would require a debate.

Will the Prime Minister support a motion that this House support linguistic minority rights everywhere in Canada?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Why don't you support Meech Lake? That is what it does.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since I have been in public life, either elected or non-elected, I have been a strong and unwavering supporter of the concept of bilingualism and the promotion of minority rights, linguistic and otherwise, across this country.

I believe that this is a fundamental hallmark of the well-being of the nation. I have spoken on this issue. I have gone, in different circumstances, to Winnipeg in 1983-84 when it was not particularly popular, and I have done the same thing in Quebec when it was also not particularly popular. I believe that it is a fundamental to the well-being of the country.

My hon. friend says that she is concerned about the future of the country and asks if I would support a resolution in terms of bilingualism. I will be happy to look at any resolution that promotes some of these fundamentals. My hon. friend says she is concerned about the future of the country. I am very concerned about the future of a country where we have a Constitution without the province of Quebec. That is why we brought in Meech Lake, which is why I hope my hon. friend will support that too.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are surely looking to this Chamber for leadership on this issue. I do not dispute the Prime Minister's statements that he does support minority rights in Canada. Therefore I am assuming that we will have the support of the Prime Minister if our House leaders meet later this day to form such a motion. I do not dispute the Prime Minister's intentions.

In the same vein, I would also ask the Prime Minister if he has contacted provincial premiers and territorial leaders about this issue, which is becoming a continuing and very serious issue in Canada this week? We have to take some real leadership in this Chamber.

I would ask the Prime Minister: Has he contacted his colleagues in the provinces and the territories to discuss this issue? Has he called a meeting to discuss this issue, or will he agree to do so?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the question as to whether I have begun to speak to provincial premiers, the answer is yes.

Mr. Riis: On this issue?

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, on this issue.

My hon. friend expresses concern. This was a position, in terms of the hierarchy of concerns, that the previous Leader of the NDP expressed very eloquently and well on the floor of the House of Commons. He said time and time again and very persuasively that before some other important matters could be addressed we must repair the injustice of 1981–82 and bring Quebec back into the constitutional family.

The Meech Lake Accord, which deals with the fundamental issue of linguistic duality, English speaking minorities in the province of Quebec and French speaking minorities elsewhere, which spells it out very clearly, surely has to be part and parcel of any thought my hon. friend would give to any motion in promotion of bilingualism. So, clearly, if one came forward, I would count very much on her to express support for something which is so important to the province of Quebec and to Canada, namely, support for the Meech Lake Accord and all that it means to French speaking Canadians saying yes to Canada.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The Prime Minister must rise above all political partisanship. It is a question of national unity.

Why does he not support the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition for a unanimous motion of this House today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, neither I nor the Leader of the Opposition made any partisan remark. He asked me a completely legitimate question and I gave him an answer which I hope was suitable. We will have discussions to see whether some resolution could not be devised to promote the interests involved.

The Leader of the Opposition has always spoken and acted in favour of linguistic minorities, and so have I. The Leader of the Opposition has always acted and spoken in favour of the Meech Lake Accord because it will bring Quebec back into the Canadian Constitution. Talking about the problem of linguistic duality, which is mentioned in the Meech Lake Accord, and the problems of minorities, it seems to me that it is extremely difficult to present a resolution today that would ignore the problem of Quebec's exclusion, as in 1981. Nevertheless, it is a vital problem for Quebec, for Acadians, for francophones and for all of Canada.

So I agree with the Leader of the Opposition and perhaps with the Leader of the New Democratic Party that we should find a resolution honouring all our obligations for bilingualism nationally and for the Meech Lake Accord, which finally says yes to Quebec.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The government's earlier attempt to tie the variable entrance requirement to the new unemployment insurance bill is backfiring pretty badly, I think she will admit. The public's anger over that issue is focusing not on the Senate, as she had hoped, but on her and on the government.

Will she now undertake to do what she failed to do in December, what she and her predecessors have done every December for the last 11 years? Will she now bring in a variable entry requirement bill?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the minister is right in her earlier responses that everybody is against this new bill for a variety of reasons. There are many reasons that I could go into.

In view of the litany of opposition before the Senate committee and in the press and otherwise, will she now relent? Is she now prepared to cut her losses, to cut the government's losses, to heed the pleas of those who are going to be devastated and trampled by this bill and agree to send it back to the drawing board? Withdraw the bill altogether. That is the sensible thing to do, I say to her.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, let me just say with regard to the hon. member's own province that what has been happening in the other place on this bill is hurting his constituents.

What we are doing with this bill is taking away the penalty for seasonal workers who repeat in the system quite aside from the variable entrance requirement, people who repeat through the unemployment insurance system. That is hurting the people in his riding. It is not just simply the variable entrance requirement. There are benefits to people in his riding that we cannot alter with a variable entrance requirement bill.

He knows that. He knows that more Community Futures are going to help people in his riding and other parts of Newfoundland.

Mr. Simmons: Different issue.

Mrs. McDougall: No, it is not different issue. It is all part of this legislation and part of the Labour Force Development Strategy. It is a package. It is going to work for the people of Newfoundland, as it is going to work for the people of Atlantic Canada. I think it is time that he supported it.

CENTRAL AMERICA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In the speech he gave in the House on the Organization of American States, the Prime Minister committed himself to a new role for Canada in the western hemisphere.

I have recently returned from a trip to El Salvador and, amongst the tragedy of that country, sensed a new desire to move a peace process forward. But it needs the help of other countries.

Will the Prime Minister pledge today that the $100 million committed by his government over a year ago for Central America will not be cut in the next budget, but will be retained and in fact directed to the work of churches and other non-governmental organizations pursuing human rights conditions, pursuing the democratic process and adding to the peace process, so that this country can give a very positive signal to the people of that region that we do care what happens to them?

• (1440)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, given the interest of my hon. friend for the region, he will be pleased to know that yesterday I received a call from the President of Mexico, expressing gratitude to Canada for joining the OAS and, as well, for Canada's leadership on debt relief for Mexico, which he views as a very important instrument and which I think can be replicated in other countries of Latin America. I know my hon. friend would want to know that.

With regard to budgetary considerations, the Minister of Finance, at an appropriate time, will bring forth a budget which I hope will be able to satisfy the requirements and interests of my hon. friend.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister recognizes that conflict taking place in places like El Salvador. That is the key to peace in that entire region.

Is he prepared to use his good offices to make a representation to the Bush administration, which is presently looking at its own economic and military aid programs in Central America, and request that all U.S. aid, which is the major support of that country, be contingent upon recognition of human rights and upon the ability to bring the two sides to the table for a consecutive and ongoing negotiation toward a peace process? That kind of aid under that kind of condition would perhaps be the most important thing that could happen. Is the Prime Minister prepared to make that kind of representation to his colleague, the President of the United States?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we give a lot more aid on a per capita basis around the world than does the United States of America. Canada, on a per capita basis, is infinitely ahead of the United States of America, and we do not throw in military aid for the ends of the calculations either. I think the nation has an excellent record in terms of foreign aid, without strings attached. That is what we propose to continue to do.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself have already spoken to the United States many times in regard to this approach for its foreign aid. The parliamentary committee discussed $100 million in aid to the region. It is our intention to make sure that undertaking is respected.

As the President of Mexico indicated yesterday, through the leadership of the Minister of Finance as chairman of the interim committee of the IMF with his role in Mexico, with the role of the Canadian chartered banks, plus the high per capita contribution of foreign aid, second only to France of the major industrialized nations of the world, Canada has provided a leadership role and will continue to do so.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, there is growing evidence that Canadians will not accept cuts to social programs that would drag our programs down to the U.S. level. During the last election the Minister for International Trade promised Canadians that unemployment insurance would not be touched.

My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. When will she and her government realize that the unemployed cannot be privatized?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all there is no suggestion in any way, shape or form that this social program is about harmonization with the United States, which does not even have the kind of program we have.

We have done this in the interests of Canadian workers, in the interests of Canadian training for Canadian workers to face a Canadian future in a global economy. This is good for Canadian workers, good for Canadian industry, good for new parents and good for senior citizens who want to continue to work after the age of 65.

When is the hon. member going to look at what we are trying to do in a positive way? It is for the future of Canada, the future of Canadian workers, not for the past.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the minister has raised exactly my point, that it is not good for Canadian workers.

Will Canada join the United States as the only major western country which does not help fund unemployment insurance?

We are seeing the privatizing of training in this country. We are seeing Canadian workers forced to pay their own training expenses at a time when they can least afford it—when they are out of a job.

When will the minister stop making the unemployed pay for the mistakes of this government?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is not the unemployed who pay premiums. It is people who are employed and it is employers. It is for their own protection in hard times.

The government has committed to be there if the fund goes into deficit, as we have been in the past. That will continue into the future. The entire structure of the program is geared to help Canadian workers prepare for a better future for themselves in a world where people are going to have to train and retrain.

It is still there as a social safety net. We are talking about 10 per cent to 15 per cent of the program. Our own labour force surveys among unemployed people show that they feel that part of the reason they cannot get a job is because they do not have the right training. We are going to fix that.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works.

There is no project that would have such a real tangible, positive economic impact on the entire Atlantic region like the fixed link project to Prince Edward Island. It will require local engineering, design, construction, support boats, labour, materials, and when complete it will attract tourists from all over the world. It will encourage efficient interprovincial trade.

If the report on the environmental review panel due in a few months is positive, will the Department of Public Works move immediately to proceed with this important project? What is the time frame for construction?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I commend my colleague for his ongoing interest in this very important project. I know many members in this House share the feeling that it would be a very desirable thing for Atlantic Canada.

As soon as the environmental considerations have been fully met, it is our intention to proceed with the project at a time when arrangements have been made and it is feasible to do so.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

The farm debt crisis in Saskatchewan is continuing to deteriorate. Since 1985, 10,000 farmers have been served with foreclosure notices. The Farm Credit Corporation now owns some 475,000 acres in Saskatchewan.

Could the minister tell western farmers when he is going to bring in programs to keep farmers on the land rather than have their farms seized by the Farm Credit Corporation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, just for the record, the hon. member might be interested in being reminded of the fact that when we came into office, as a result of the Liberal policies farm bankruptcies reached an all-time high of 551 in one year. That was in the year 1984. They have been reduced substantially, by at least 50 per cent. That is still too high.

The hon. member has been an ardent watcher of the agricultural policy review process that is being undertaken. I think that this government has truly acknowledged the fact that many of our safety nets and stabilization programs have been put through the supreme test over the course of the last five years because of drought, because of other natural disasters, and because of the low commodity prices. We are presently reviewing all these programs in an attempt to bring about a safety net, stabilization programs and improved crop insurance programs that will assist our farmers.

In the meantime the farm debt review process is working very well. It has handled over 8,000 different applications and on 77 per cent of those occasions there have been satisfactory arrangements made.

All in all there is progress. We recognize the difficulty and the magnitude of the problem, but this government is working very closely with the farming community to try to bring about better policies to provide greater security and greater confidence for the future.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I would just point out to the Minister of Agriculture that in 1985 there were some 500 bankruptcies in Saskatchewan. Last year there were 1,106. I should point out that the impact of the farm crisis and farm debt spreads far beyond the farm to small communities. Some 23,000 left Saskatchewan last year.

On December 19, the Farm Credit Corporation in Saskatchewan sent out a notice to all real estate agents in north eastern Saskatchewan offering them a finder's fee of 5 per cent to buy up farmland and put farmers off the land.

Will the Minister of Agriculture explain to farmers why they are hiring people to put farmers off the land rather than bringing in programs to keep farmers on the land?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that under the farm debt review every attempt has been made to keep farmers on the land through short-term lease arrangements, through longer term lease arrangements, through consolidation, and through selling off some lands.

Every conceivable arrangement has been considered and the farm debt review board process has worked very well. This is where the creditors, the farmers, and the farm debt review board sit down together to try to work out the best available plan that can be arrived at. In some cases there is land that is put up for sale and there is land that is taken over by the Farm Credit Corporation.

We are attempting to sell off the land because it is not the intention of this government to hold on to large tracts of land. We are not in the business of owning land.

We are in the business of getting it back into the hands of the farmers, and that is what we intend to do.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the part-time Minister of Agriculture. The minister is aware that American subsidized wheat sales to traditional Canadian wheat markets are a devastating blow to the Canadian wheat farmer.

Will the minister make a commitment to this House today to stand up for the Canadian wheat farmer in the international trading community, to commit his government to matching the U.S. subsidies on wheat dollar for dollar so that the Canadian wheat farmers will be able to survive this year?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member was not a part-time critic over there, he would know that this government over the last five years provided $21.7 billion worth of assistance to the agricultural community and almost $12 billion tow grain and oil seeds farmers.

While he attempts to paint the Americans as the fall guy—and I make no apologies for him—he should also recognize the fact that in 1989 the European community budget for subsidies on cereal grains and oil seeds was almost $10 billion, amounting to $140 Canadian per tonne subsidy on bread wheat, and this year it is about $80 per tonne. There is a price war going on. It is important to note the leadership of the Prime Minister by bringing agriculture to the top of the agenda at the Uruguay Round. We must resolve the problem of trade distorting subsidies that is hurting this country and hurting other medium sized exporters. We are in that process.

I can assure the hon. member and the farmers of Canada that, as we have demonstrated in the past, in the course of pursuing this we will certainly not stand idly by and see our farmers go down the drain.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, what the minister is saying is that there should be one set of trade laws for the Americans and a lesser set for Canadian farmers.

The minister should be aware that there is a real crisis in western Canada. Over 10,000 Saskatchewan farmers are expected to lose their farms this year. Farm income in Saskatchewan is expected to drop 101 per cent, and 90 per cent in Manitoba.

Will the minister make a commitment in this House today to provide the operating capital necessary for Canadian grain farmers to plant their crops for this season so as to stop this agricultural devastation in our agricultural community?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I said precisely the exact opposite. Again, if the member was not a part-time critic, he would know, as I have indicated in the House on many occasions, that we have at the present time a technical committee of assistant deputy ministers of the federal and provincial governments assessing the situation. I should remind him as well, in case he was not aware, that grain prices are about 50 per cent higher this year in the announced initial prices than they were in 1986. It is still too low, but there is some sign that prices are in fact strengthening.

We are examining the situation in terms of the impact of the lower commodity prices, the drought situation, the excessive moisture in some areas and the critical cash flow problems in others. The technical committee of federal and provincial ADMs is assessing this situation. We will have the interim preliminary data sometime later this month.

We hope at that particular time to assess the situation, to look at the application of the existing programs and, if there needs to be further assistance, the federal government and the provinces will come up with a package.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Due to the public outcry and the inflationary pressures of the 9 per cent GST, it has been reduced by 2 per cent. It has been reduced on everything except housing where it remains an effective 4.5 per cent, as originally planned. In light of the crisis of affordability of housing, particularly for young families and seniors, and the fact that many families are being driven into poverty by the high cost of housing, why did the minister not reduce the GST on housing by the 2 per cent?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member would like to mislead the House. There is a reduction in the GST from 9 per cent to 7 per cent. There is a 2.5 per cent housing rebate. But there are also taxes today on a number of the things that are used to build a house, including building materials, plumbing supplies, rugs, windows and other material, all of which amount to about 4 per cent depending on the community.

When the hon. member says there is a 4.5 per cent tax, he is only telling half the story. The existing tax is around 4 per cent so that there is a small increase of the order of half of one per cent in his community. It may be somewhat lower or somewhat higher in others. I think we have treated the housing industry quite fairly, and we have certainly followed through on the commitment I gave in September 1988.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of Finance.

There is a crisis in confidence about the government's statements that the GST will not affect affordable housing. The statements in its information pamphlet are pure garbage. The Canadian Home Builders Association and independent tax consultants say that the average price across Canada will increase $3,000; in Toronto $9,000. Housing consultants say that rents will increase by $300 and $400.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Karpoff: In light of these facts, how can the minister say that it will not drive up the cost of housing?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is quite aware, rents are not taxed under the GST. Existing houses are not taxed under the GST. The impact of the 7 per cent tax, less the housing rebate, is about equivalent to the amount of tax that already applies to a house.

I suggest that indicates very clearly we have followed through on our commitment in September 1988 that what we would be doing with the GST would not adversely affect the affordability of housing.

MANUFACTURERS' SALES TAX

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Housing. All members know that the goods and services tax is intended to replace the existing manufacturers' sales tax. According to a recent Toronto Start article, it is doubtful that suppliers of building materials will deduct the manufacturers' tax from their prices and replace it with the goods and services tax.

Is the minister aware of this newspaper article? If so, what is he prepared to do to prevent this from happening?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly aware of the newspaper article. I am aware of the concerns of people that the existing manufacturers' sales tax will not be taken off many products, particularly with respect to building materials.

The hon. member and all members of the House should be aware that in the past there have actually been reductions in the federal sales tax on building materials and those have been reflected in the prices that have been charged to the public. In this case, with a very substantial reduction in the costs to the suppliers of building materials, that being the federal sales tax component, competition is obviously going to force that down just as it did in the past when there were reductions in the federal sales tax.

In addition to that, the Department of Finance will be putting in place a monitoring office to ensure that all consumers in Canada are quite aware of what prices should be once the manufacturers' sales tax, the federal sales tax, is removed. Also, that will operate as a complaint office once the new GST goes into effect and will be able to focus the spotlight of moral suasion on those people who persist in leaving the tax in place.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, over the last couple of years Canadians have been repeatedly shocked to learn that the justice system has failed aboriginal peoples. The Blood inquiry in Alberta, the Harper inquiry in Manitoba and the recent report of the Marshall inquiry in Nova Scotia confirm the abysmal failings of the provincial justice systems as they affect aboriginal peoples.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether the federal government, with its overriding constitutional responsibility for aboriginal peoples, will establish a royal commission to examine the Canadian justice system and its tragic impact upon this country's first citizens, the aboriginal peoples.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my colleague's concern about this issue. I can assure her that the government shares her concern. We are following, with interest, the commissions to which she referred. We have recently received the report of the Marshall commission and we are reviewing it actively at the present time.

I am not suggesting for a minute that a royal commission to examine the justice system is the answer. But I can assure my friend that we have every intention of acting on any suggestions that come up and reviewing them to see if we can improve the system.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, how many more J.J. Harpers and Donald Marshalls, how many more aboriginal victims do we need to have this government take direct action? We need the government to assume and exercise its constitutional responsibility for its first citizens and establish, at the request of the aboriginal community, a royal commission to investigate and resolve this matter.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think I can do no more than reiterate my first answer. This matter is being pursued very, very actively by the government in terms of reviewing the commissions to which my hon. friend refers, the most recent one being the Marshall Commission.

That report is with my officials now and, as I indicated to my hon. friend, we are studying it and we hope to be in a position to make recommendations upon which we can act. That is what I am interested in, acting, not further commissions. I am interested in acting on solutions which have been suggested rather than having another commission.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached hereto.

While I am on my feet, I move:

That the House do now proceed to the Orders of the Day.

POINT OF ORDER

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. During question period I had the impression there was agreement on all sides of the House on the matter of supporting and promoting official languages in this country. Considering the I believe unanimous interest in the House, may I perhaps suggest——

I have here a draft motion, a draft that could be used as the basis for consideration or consultation with members of the government and the New Democratic Party. Perhaps it would be possible to meet and discuss the matter, reach some kind of agreement and perhaps report back with the results so that both Chambers could vote in favour of a motion.

Mr. Speaker, the motion is very simple, and perhaps I could read it: "That the House renew its commitment to protect, support and promote"——

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think it would be more appropriate for the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) and perhaps other members to have a discussion or perhaps a meeting with the government, as suggested by the hon. member. However, it is not appropriate to have a debate now on the terms of this proposal.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lewis). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lewis), which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

[Translation]

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Anawak)—Proposed goods and services tax; the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan)—Treasury Board; the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Parker)—Cominco.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

RECOGNITION OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, earlier this day—before 10 o'clock as a matter of fact—I gave you notice that I would like to propose, pursuant to Standing Order 52, a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter, namely, the deterioration of the situation across the country with regard to the recognition of official languages.

We have had a change of heart—let me put it this way—and during Question Period there was an indication of some possible movement toward a unanimous resolution of the House. I have given copies of my resolution to the House leaders of all the parties. I take it that within an hour or so we will be finding a solution to this motion and that we would not have to ask you today, Mr. Speaker, to rule on an emergency debate.

I take it that I will give notice tomorrow. But I will see how the government and the NDP react to my proposal.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as much as I would like to allow my hon. friend to leave all that on the record unchallenged, I would like to say that we have now received in writing my hon. friend's suggested motion. Had we had that earlier in the day it could have been given the consideration that we want to give to it. It is not a question of a change of heart on the part of the government, because our determination on this issue has always been there.

We would like to flesh out the motion and have an opportunity to discuss it with my colleagues in Cabinet, and also with the New Democratic Party which will probably want to add something about Meech Lake into the motion. We will get back to the House later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to say that once the negotiations have been completed the Chair would love to know. Then we could carry on with this business.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is unfortunate that the Minister of Justice felt moved to make those unnecessary comments on a very critical issue.

I just want to say to my hon. colleague for Ottawa—Vanier that we have received the draft of the proposed motion. We are also in the process of circulating a draft motion similar in nature. We think that this is something that ought not to be debated and discussed in the partisan sense that we just heard from the Minister of Justice.

• (1550)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Once negotiations have been completed hon. members could advise the Chair.

I think we should now proceed to orders of the day. When Bill C-62 was last before the House, the hon. member for Calgary West had the floor.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, January 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 7569).

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth time that I have risen on this debate and been able to get perhaps a sentence out without points of order from the New Democratic Party. They seem determined that Canadians—

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Kootenay East on a very short point of order.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the record cleared up concerning the adjournment debate this evening. It should be the member for Kootenay East and not the member for Kootenay West.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Calgary West has the floor.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I guess there is nothing more precious about this place we call the Parliament of Canada than our capacity to speak in the Chamber, to listen to each other, to engage in vigorous debate on behalf of democracy and on behalf of good decision-making.

The last couple of weeks I have found particularly disturbing because of the extent to which tactics have been employed in the Chamber that bring the actions of the Chair into question but which, in the final analysis, are dedicated to reducing the possibility for us to engage in active debate.

I guess the best protection for us as a political party charged with the responsibility of governing this nation as we seek to do what is right but not necessarily popular, is that notion of free speech. Our protection lies in the facts and in the truth of the circumstances and the situation. It is what we predict will happen versus what the opposition predict will happen.

There are well over 100 members here today who were not here in 1984. That is when we announced our intention to examine the entire taxation system in this country and, in particular, the income tax system and the consumer taxation system.

We began a dialogue with Canadians back in 1984. We brought out a very extensive discussion paper close to three years ago. It was certainly available in my riding, and I would think in the ridings of all government members. We have made it available. Vigorously we went out into our communities and shared it with Chambers of Commerce, local business people and consumers groups. I am not sure that the members of the opposition did that. I am not sure that they want Canadians to know much about the current method of consumption taxation or about the possibility of proposed changes in relation to consumption taxation.

I am not sure they did because they knew that as we changed things for the better it would be hard for them to get the credit. They simply stood up and complained. A complaint is nice, it is abrupt, it can be colourful. Complaints are easy. Explanation of complex events is difficult.

We went through what I consider to have been the bitterest election campaign in my experience in September, October, and November, 1988. What made it bitter was the fact that members of the opposition and their partisans went out to senior citizen complexes to tell Canadians: "If you pass the free trade deal, your pensions will be gone, your health care will be gone. All of the good things that you value about this country will be gone." That is what they went out and said one and a half years ago. Where did it get them? It got them another term in opposition.

Now they have started the same tactic a little bit earlier. Instead of starting it the last six months before an election, they are trying to start it three years ahead of time. What are they doing?

They are going out to the senior citizens' homes and telling the seniors that they are going to lose their medicare because the government is going to change the taxation system and that they are going to lose their pensions because the taxation system is going to be changed. Canadians have a memory. Canadians do have a bit of common sense. All of these half-truths and misunderstandings that members of the opposition are spreading are going to come back and bite them and choke them by the time the next federal election comes around. They are not true. They are telling Canadians things that are simply not true.

I heard somebody on CBC Newsworld the other day. That person had been listening to the opposition say: "Everything in Canada on January 1, 1991 will be 7 per cent more expensive. Get ready for it". I said who is there, other than a very busy person who does not take the time to think, who could make a statement like that about this change? Is there anybody with a modicum of common sense?

It is a bit like this. Let us say that we have to collect 10 cents of tax. Under the current system, let us say we tax glasses and we do not tax pens. Then we have to get 10 cents off the glasses, if we have to have 10 cents, and we are getting nothing off the pen. That is what the manufacturers' sales tax is about.

It takes half the things we buy in this country and puts a tax on them, a tax of 13.5 per cent. It collects $18,000 million that way, on half the things we buy in this country. The opposition comes along and says: "The dirty old government is going to put it on the glasses and the pen". We still have to collect 10 cents. If we are going to collect it on the glasses and the pen, we collect five cents on the pen and five cents on the glasses.

Then what happens? The pen is five cents more expensive, but the glasses are five cents cheaper.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hawkes: Can the opposition understand that? Canadians can. If opposition members would pay a little bit of attention, they would know that we are going to put a tax on twice as many things and we are going to put it on at half as much. Thus half the things Canadians buy in the future will be cheaper and half the things they buy will be more expensive. That is the reality.

How can a 13.5 per cent tax be changed to a 7 per cent tax, a tax which is collected on twice as many things to garner that amount of money, unless half the things we buy in this country are going to be cheaper in the future?

Is it just half? That is where the mathematics get a little more complex. I do not know who is coaching whom, whether it is the member for Calgary East or the Leader of the Official Opposition. Last week we had a lesson in mathematics from the two of them that was identical. Either that is a lucky break or one person on that side—the Leader of the Official Opposition—is coaching the member for Calgary East, or the member for Calgary East is coaching the Leader of the Official Opposition.

When I look around at the Conservative benches I am reminded that once upon a time I wanted to start a business. I had no customers, no machines, no employees, no warehouse, no nothing. It was to be an office coffee business. I went out and made sales and bought machines, employed people, met a payroll and I kept the books. I look at this tax and I say: "Gee, if I still had that business it would help me." I sold a product. I sold a thing. I sold coffee. The GST would help me. It would make the machines I bought cheaper. It would make the coffee pots I bought cheaper. It would make the soap I bought cheaper. All of the things that went into my business, the truck and the gasoline would be cheaper. Therefore, I would have had to borrow less from the bank, pay less interest, and been in better shape.

I look around the Conservative benches and I see that there is somebody who owned a business, there is somebody, there is somebody, there is somebody, and there is somebody. I look over at the NDP and ask: "Is there anybody over there who ever owned a business?"

An hon. member: Yes.

Mr. Hawkes: There is one, and a couple of people who had a farm. Out of forty-some-odd people there they are. They actually employed one or two Canadians, while people on this side of the House employed hundreds and hundreds of Canadians. They had a salary and could go out and buy things.

I look at the Liberals and it is a little more mixed. A lot of them never ran a business. But let me come back to the Leader of the Official Opposition and the member for Calgary East. The one thing that they have in common is that neither one of them ever ran a business. Look back to the Leader of the Official Opposition and his example. We have a product bought from the factory at $100 and we sell it at $300, but we put a 13.5 per cent tax on when it is $100 so the government gets $13.50. The guy sells it for $313.50. Logical! It makes sense. Right? That bad old government is coming along with a 7 per cent tax, but it is on the $300 so that is $21. Right?

I look at people who have run a business. You have figured out your pricing. The little thing that people who have never run a business do not understand—the Leader of the Official Opposition and the member for Calgary East—is that they paid $113.50 and when the margin is 200 per cent that is $340.50. The price went up $40.50, but the government got only $13.50 because $27 went to the money lenders of this country. The price went up $40.50 and only about a third of it ended up in the taxman's hands. The difference, for those who have run a business and know, is that under the new system that only costs $100 and that 200 per cent mark-up means $300. Then you put the tax on. Because it is a rebatable system, you export it, you get every penny of the tax back. You are reducing the costs.

If you reduce the costs it shows up in lower prices. It shows up in more business. It shows up in more jobs. We have been fought in this Chamber over every thing that we have tried to do to help the Canadian economy since September 1984. We came in and we brought in our first budget. The Liberals and the NDP said it was an absolute catastrophe, it was going to cost this country hundreds of thousands of jobs and the unemployment roles would climb.

It is five years later. In every single province the unemployment rate is lower. There are 1.5 million more Canadians who have a job and pay tax than there were five years ago. These are the parties that stated: "You are going to lose your pensions. You are going to lose your health care if you continue free trade." There are almost 250,000 million more jobs in the first year of free trade. The jobs are better paid.

Did you see how much the average wages in this country climbed in the last 12 months, Mr. Speaker? It is an enormous increase. It runs to almost 9 per cent in some sectors. There are 750,000 people today who were on the poverty rolls when we came into office in 1984 who are not on the poverty rolls now. There are hundreds of thousands of children off the poverty rolls.

This is a government that has had a finance minister, instead of committees, instead of back-benchers, who has tried to consult with the Canadian people time after time to lay out the facts with the Canadian people time after time, and history says we are right.

Do all the senior citizens who are watching this program right now want me or my colleagues to explain in detail every little facet of the GST? Does that make sense? Do people need to know that? Do they need to understand it? I say, no, Mr. Speaker, but we are not afraid of that.

For the better part of a year we have had a hot line which has been advertised in newspapers. If anyone has a question about any little detail, he or she can phone that number free of charge. We are not afraid of the facts. We are not afraid of the details. How many members on the opposite side are telling their constituents to phone the number and get the facts? Or do they say: "Listen to me and my biased householders and my misinformation campaign?" Which is it? Phone the number and get the facts or listen to me and the nonsense I am sending out there?

I say to those senior citizens that they can listen to one party in this Chamber, just one, if they want to understand the future and the truth about the future. That is the party that has been right for six years in a row now.

Mr. Rocheleau: What a joke! What a deception.

Mr. Hawkes: There is a member who came into this House about a year and a half ago. I will bet you he campaigned in senior citizen's complexes, telling them they are going to lose their health care, they are going to lose their pensions.

Mr. Rocheleau: It's coming.

Mr. Hawkes: Now go back there and tell them that they lost their health care and their pensions. Their pensions are bigger today than they were then, and the health care system is in better shape today than it was then. These are scare tactics and Canadians will not be scared.

I do not know what it will take to convince members of the opposition that attempting to fool the Canadian people is a mug's game, a loser's game. Those of you in the Liberal party who were not here back in 1980 to 1984, for example, when your party was in power and finance minister after finance minister went public with an incorrect picture of the state of the economy. In 1984 it was the biggest defeat in the history of your party because consistently your finance minister and your back-benchers went forward with a picture based not on fact but on fiction. Canadians are a people with their feet on the ground, with an awful lot of common sense, and they can tell fact from fiction.

You have won a short-term victory, because you have had a lot of help. You have chambers of commerce that are out fighting on behalf of their members, you have had the Federation of Independent Business, you have had the "Axe the Tax", and many groups that have stated that they will fight this tax on your behalf, including your own parties, and "send me a donation". That is what all those groups have in common. "I will fight, but send me a donation that I can use to fight".

It is not a perfect tax. No one on this side believes that there is any such thing as a perfect tax. But we have an obligation as members of this House to determine whether it is a better tax, whether it is a better system of taxation.

Mr. Speaker, if you cut through all the nonsense, they want to say to Canadians that a 13.5 percent tax is better than a 7 per cent tax. That is a hard sell. Canadians, they want you to believe that a 13.5 per cent tax is better than 7 per cent. They want you to believe, Mr. Speaker, that taxing a domestic business heavier than an import business is good for jobs. Raising the price on things we make in Canada while at the same time not raising the price on things we import is somehow going to produce better jobs and more jobs for Canadians. That is what they want you to believe, Canadians. I think that is a hard sell. In 1924 we were the first country in the world to bring in the tax. A lot of countries copied us. Every single one of them has got rid of that tax. In 65 years people copied us coming in. They found out the problem with it and stopped.

Popularity is not what governing is about. It is doing what is right, what is sensible. Using common sense on behalf of Canadian people is what governing is all about. They will and they have convinced the Canadian people in the short term that there is something wrong. Over the long term Canadians will discover there is something right about what we are doing, that it is logical, that it makes sense, that it is good for the economy and good for the social welfare system. When they find that out, they will not forget who was lying to them and those who lied to them will get their just desserts the same way they did in November 1988.

Mr. Althouse: I have two questions for the hon. member who spent some time leaving the impression that he was speaking the undying truth and everyone on this side of the Chamber was lying. There are two items that I want to raise with the member. I note that in his party's outlook in 1984–85 when the Minister of Finance first began his taxation and expenditure program, he made the statement that if we continued to pursue the Liberal line of spending and taxation that within five years the deficit would have doubled. In fact, we have instead pursued a Conservative line of expenditures and taxation and the deficit has more than doubled.

Would he tell us what went wrong. Why did they point their fingers at the Liberals and then pursue an even more onerous proposition? Perhaps he could explain that, since he is in a truth-telling mood.

Also, while he is in a truth-telling mood, would he please try to explain to the people of Canada, since the people in the House know what the answer is, why he attempted to mislead the people of Canada with his statements over the weekend about the cost of maintaining the House of Commons. He left the impression that when the House was sitting it costs $1 million a day and leaves the obviously wrong conclusion that if the House was not sitting the cost would be zero. I have looked back at a few of the records. I remember noting a year ago that the House did not sit for the month of February. It sat for the whole of the month of February the year before. The costs for the year we did not sit were actually considerably higher than when we were sitting.

I submit that the hon. Whip of the government side knows that the cost of the House of Commons goes on and varies barely a tiddle or a jot whether we sit or we do not sit. It is a fixed cost and not much can be done about it. The restaurants may cost a little less when we are not sitting, but there is no business coming through to offset their costs either. In fact, the practice and the facts are that when we do not sit, it has been costing us more than when we do sit. Why did he try to leave the false impression that somehow by tying up time in the House we are costing $1 million a day when he knows better?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, when the member gets a chance to look at the "blues", I think he is going to be a bit embarrassed about where he started. The deficit was $38 billion plus—

Mr. Althouse: It was $150 billion.

Mr. Hawkes: Now he is talking about something different. He is certainly not talking about the deficit. He is talking about the accumulated debt over the last five years. That is a different figure. Maybe that is the way the NDP does it. They use one set of words when they are talking about something else and you are supposed to understand that when they talk about the deficit they do not mean the deficit, they mean health care; or when they talk about the deficit they do not mean deficit, they mean pensions. What are we supposed to do? Are we supposed to listen or are we not supposed to listen?

Mr. Althouse: The numbers are $150 billion and $350 billion.

Mr. Hawkes: Now he is into accumulated debt. Let me explain deficit first of all, Mr. Speaker. With inflation and a bigger country and all of these things in between, it is 25 per cent less than it was when we came into office. So, it has gone in the direction we promised.

Mr. Althouse: It went from $30 billion to $28 billion and back up.

Mr. Hawkes: The Leader of the Official Opposition with a minority government took Canada from a position of basically a balanced budget, where we were not using any money for payment on interest, and into big debts.

They used that minority government period to create the big debt that grew and grew. When we came into office the government of the day, supported in large part by the New Democratic Party, was borrowing $16,000 million for programs, plus another $22 million for interest payments.

Well, it is five years later and we have a surplus. We have changed. We have cut to the point where on programs we do not borrow a dime. On a net basis over five years, we have not. We, in fact have $9 billion that goes to pay the interest on the public debt. The interest payment this year is over $38 billion, the deficit is only $30 billion. Where does the money come from if it does not come from a surplus on programs? Members opposite may not quite comprehend all of that because there is a lot of technical vocabulary in that, a difference between the words debt and deficit and surplus, and so on.

We have created 1.5 million jobs with our economic program. If we had listened to the Leader of the NDP, he was predicting a job loss of 184,000, let us say a couple of hundred thousand each year. That would be a million more unemployed, instead of 1.5 million working. That is a 2.5 million turn around. That is 10 per cent of the Canadian population, the difference between their prediction and our prediction and what it would do. That is why so many people are off the poverty rolls. That is why so many more people have a job. That is why the average wage is up so much. That is why the standard of living is up so much. That is why the productivity of the Canadian economy is up so much. To the Canadian people, I say: "follow our advice".

With their behaviour in the last two weeks they have been trying to shut down Parliament. If they succeeded, they would believe that we should not have a democracy. Some of the people who provided some of the ideological thought for their party believed that a democracy really was antithetical to progress and good things. The member from Saskatchewan agrees that democracy is antithetical. If we closed this place up it would cost $210 million. We might have to spend $10 million to mothball some things to keep them in reasonable shape, but we could save $200 million. That is close to $2 million a sitting day, not $1 million. I thought it was a generous underestimate of what this place costs to simply say $1 million.

Mr. Althouse: Why did it cost more when we weren't sitting last February?

Mr. Hawkes: In any event, democracy, the chance for freedom of speech, the chance to debate is really priceless. To lose that is the real tragedy. Their behaviour in that regard of trying to stifle debate is really what I am angry about. I would hope most members of this Chamber and most Canadians would be angry about that attempt to stifle debate in this Chamber.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are two minutes left. I recognize the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I would give an A to the hon. member as his supervisor if he was a teacher making the presentation, but I would give him zero for the content of his presentation. In his preamble he talked about dialogue and how his party went across the country and listened to all Canadians, et cetera. I remind him that the definition of dialogue is two-way communication, not one way. His party listens but does not hear what is said. This is why over 70 per cent of the people are against this GST even though it was reduced from 9 per cent to 7 per cent. I would like to hear his comment on that.

In his example, he held up the glasses and the pen and mentioned how the manufacturers sales tax on the glasses was 13 per cent but nothing on the pen, again deceiving the public. What he did not tell the public was yes, 13 per cent on $50 glasses at the wholesale price. But when the glasses are sold for $100 the consumer is paying $7 tax. If they are sold for $150 the consumer is paying $10.50 in tax and not $6.50 in tax. He also forgot to tell Canadians that that pen had no tax on it and now it is going up to 7 per cent. Again, there is this kind of deception.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, sooner or later Gallup is going to get very clever and will ask a basic question. Do Canadians prefer a tax at 13.5 per cent or 7 per cent. Thirteen and a half or seven? I suspect they will come down on the side of 7 per cent. It depends on the question you ask.

Mr. Gauthier: That is not true. Don't start comparing apples and oranges.

Mr. Hawkes: I think the hon. member who just spoke—I was not sure if he ever owned a business. Now that he has opened his mouth, I am sure he never has. I am sure he never has sold a product and has never been responsible for the utilization of the concept of margin.

You start with what you pay and in the current system it would be 13.5 per cent on $50 and that is $56.75. That is what you start with and base your margin on. If you are doing a margin of 100 per cent, you are up to $113 instead of $107. He just handed me the example of why you would pay more under the current system than you would pay under the next system. I suggest to the member that he talk to the people in his riding who own the shoe store, the electronic store and the novelty store. Ask them how they price. Don't sit in your ivory tower.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: The Liberals, in the interest of getting more members on and having meaningful debate, would ask the House to concede to us the opportunity of exchanging our 20-minute slot for two 10-minute speeches followed by the usual five-minute question and comments, starting with the Hon. Member for Essex—Kent who will use his 10 minutes plus five. Then, I will go to the member for Restigouche—Chalour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there agreement?

Mr. Hawkes: The government side has no problem with that concept.

Mr. Nystrom: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this is the International Year of Literacy, I would ask the government Whip in his request that Canadians telephone the telephone line to get information on the GST, if he would provide that phone number for those Canadians who cannot read the ads in the paper, for those who are watching television as well for those who cannot afford newspapers, so they can indeed get information on the goods and services tax.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, in English, the number is 1-800-267-6620.

In French, that's 1-800-267-6440. For telecommunications—

[English]

For the hearing impaired, it would be 1-800-267-6650.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is not a point of order, but it is informative.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Gauthier: Propaganda.

Mr. Pickard: More propaganda from the government. That is true.

I would state right now that the Liberal party has been the party that has led the fight against the GST.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pickard: There has been absolutely no question that since the introduction of this measure until today, and certainly on in the future the Liberal party will be the party that opposes this tax.

We have listened to people all across Canada. According to some surveys, eighty per cent of the people in Canada have opposed this tax, and seventy per cent in other surveys. Eight out of ten people are opposed to this tax, yet the government says it is listening to the Canadian people.

I did some surveys in my riding. In September, 80 per cent of the people in my riding who responded to the survey said they opposed the tax. Just recently, in December, the result of another survey I sent out was quite astounding. Out of over 1,000 responses that I received, two were in favour, and the rest were opposed. As time goes on a much greater number of people are opposed, at least in southwestern Ontario.

Why has the Minister of Finance not listened to Canadians? Why has the Department of Finance not listened to Canadians? Why has the Conservative government not listened to Canadians?

The government's track record is one of not listening. It's track record really speaks for itself because it does not see this to be a problem. It has stated right along that the Liberals left a legacy of high debt, of high interest payments. We should look very carefully at the government's record and try to examine what, in fact, really did happen. When this government took power in 1984, the debt was approximately $170 billion. Today, the debt is $350 billion. It has doubled the debt in five short years.

What about taxes? What about the gross income of this country, federally, in taxes? When the government took power in 1984, taxes through the federal government sources were $70 billion. Today, the taxes bring in $120 billion. It has increased taxes by $50 billion in this country, over 70 per cent.

Canadians are upset because in five years our taxes have gone up over 70 per cent. The debt has been doubled. The government talks about the debt charges. When the government took office, the debt charges were $22 billion. Today, they are $40 billion. It doubled the cost of paying those charges as well.

The government's track record, financially, is a fiasco. It doubled what Canada owes. It doubled the cost of paying that debt and it increased taxes over 70 per cent. Those are the simple facts that it does not talk about.

The government talks about how it has dealt with the deficit. The average Canadian knows that it has not really changed the deficit significantly. Thirty billion dollars a year every year for five years is its record. That is not doing a good job.

Let us look at what the chamber of commerce said in the pre-budget report to the government, to the Minister of Finance and to the Department of Finance. The chamber of commerce stated very clearly that it expected the government in 1984 to follow a careful plan in order to deal with debt, but that the government had shown no leadership in its five years in office. This is a strong indictment of what the government has done.

We must remember that this government has been in power during times when interest rates have been low, the lowest in the decade. The benefit of a growing economy has been there and good times for Canada have been there, but the government showed no leadership in dealing with the finances of this country.

The government has introduced 31 tax increases in Canada in its five years. This leads us to tax increase number 32, the GST. That seems to me a pretty poor direction in which to be heading.

Canadians are upset with being told they are doing well when the reality is that our debt is growing and the only method used to deal with the problem is to increase taxes again. We have to look at where we are going.

According to the government's statements over the past year, one finds that the government has said that taxes should be simple, at least simpler than existing taxes if we are to have good reform. The Minister of Finance said that the tax must be fair to all Canadians, visible, integrated with the provincial taxes which exist and revenue neutral.

If we examine this point, we see very clearly that the five tenets that were put forth about tax reform are in no way lived up to by this government. How can that tax program be more visible? The Minister of Finance said the other day that it would be more visible than the provincial sales tax. The only place in this country that it will be more visible is Alberta. It will not be more visible in Ontario because the tax is displayed on our receipts. We also see it every day when we go to the store.

Will it be fair? I cannot see the fairness of that tax either, because when we examine it very carefully we see that we are going to have an army of 4,000 people trying to collect the tax. If the Minister of Finance were serious about bringing in tax reform that would have followed those tenets, he would have listened very carefully to some of the comments made by the Auditor General. He would have closed loopholes and lowered interest rates. He would have dealt with the debt and the deficit in other ways that would have been more reasonable.

We listen to Canadians across this country who are quite upset about what is going on in the country. The Progressive Conservatives were the authors of the free trade agreement. They authored 31 tax hikes. They authored the GST and they have authored pessimistic viewpoints across this country through each of those measures.

Canadians are upset with the types of legislation that have come through and that is being clearly reflected in the polls across Canada today. The Conservatives continue to author pain for Canadians through the legislation they bring forward, without giving a reasonable answer to the problems which exist, not even by following their own tenets in this case.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Essex—Kent would indicate whether he supports the manufacturers' sales tax.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party has suggested that there should be tax reform in this country. We are not questioning the fact that there needs to be tax reform. We are not questioning the fact that we must look at what is happening in the country, but we are questioning 31 tax increases.

We are questioning doubling the debt in this country. We are questioning the authors from the Conservative government who have created a real problem for all Canadians. We are questioning statements like those coming from the chamber of commerce that there is no leadership on the government side. We are questioning what will happen to small business when John Bulloch talks about the "super killer of jobs." We are questioning the government when Jean Woodsworth comes forward and says that no seniors support the GST.

We are listening to statements coming from across Canada and giving them back to the government so it can think about what it is doing.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the government Whip for having provided the phone number. I think that Canadians who phone that number will be sorely disappointed to discover that information coming from that line is less than useful. Those are my comments.

My question is to the hon. member who just spoke. We are currently debating a motion that the GST bill not be read now but be read in six months' time. It is a Liberal motion. In six months' time the Liberal Party will have a new leader. We have already seen its leadership candidates back off any opposition to the trade deal. We have seen its one opponent to the trade deal forced off the race by its corporate comptrollers. Will the Liberal Party still be opposed to the GST in six months' time?

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, we have clearly been following a line that has been consistent across this country as far as the GST goes. Unlike certain situations that I have seen happen with the party that is questioning where the Liberal Party is going, we do not change our minds at the drop of a hat or at the pinning of a microphone. We continue with solid, stable policies that give what Canadians expect: consistency in a party that is reasonably listening to all Canadians. It is important to realize that when a group is challenged we have to look at who is doing the challenging. I have some questions about that question coming from that party.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Essex—Kent: Does he support the manufacturers' sales tax?

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, the manufacturers' sales tax is a bad tax. But, you do not replace it with a worse tax, and that is what you are trying to do. The Canadian public is saying: "Don't do that." Not only do Canadians recognize the poor quality of the manufacturers' sales tax, they recognize that the legislation you are bringing in is worse.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to salute the hon. member opposite. It is refreshing and certainly a change to see a member of the Liberal Party actually professing concern about debt. This is certainly the first time in my lifetime that I have heard such a thing. I can scarcely believe my ears.

I have heard the hon. member offer 10 minutes of criticism of the GST proposal. He has agreed that there is something wrong with the existing manufacturers' sales tax. I believe I have heard the hon. member and his party oppose every single spending cut proposed by this administration. I have not seen him dancing with joy over VIA or the armed forces bases, over taxing back pension, family allowances and so on. At the same time he is criticizing all of the tax increases.

The question I want to ask is simple. Recognizing that we have a debt problem, at the same time criticizing every attempt to reduce spending and at the same time criticizing every tax increase, how would the hon. member propose to deal with the debt and the deficit problem?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have a short answer for that?

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I am going to give a short answer. This is the first time that my hon. colleague who brought the point forward has been concerned about the debt, and that seems to be inconsistent with what has been going on. The Liberal Party has been very concerned about the debt. It is concerned about the deficit.

The Conservative Party has run a deficit in good times, during years of low interest rates and years of economic growth and expansion, and now it has developed a problem. It should have followed its plans earlier, as stated by the chamber of commerce. The point is not to sit down and slice up this, that and the other thing. It is to look at the whole budget and see what is happening.

In addition you have to come out with some reasonable reform that follows the tenets you put forward a long time ago, and that the Conservative Party is not doing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur has the floor for 10 minutes, plus 5 minutes for questions and comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, the new goods and services tax unveiled by the federal government will be the most substantial tax levied on Canadians since the beginning of our history.

Actually, this tax has has nothing positive to offer. It is complex, regressive, inflationary and a prospective administrative nightmare for companies and businesses across the country.

The Conservative GST will hit many essential services purchased by average citizens. In fact, only basic groceries, prescription drugs and medical devices will be fully exempted. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) also told us that a number of essential services would also be exempted, which does not mean they will not be affected by the new tax.

For instance, a so-called exempt day care centre will not charge parents the GST directly. However, it will have to pay the GST on all purchases of books, equipment and so forth. It will therefore have to charge more for its services to compensate for the extra cost. As you see, in spite of the so-called exemption, the GST will affect the price of day care services, and the consumer ends up footing the bill.

The burden on Canadians will be endless. From now on, taxable items will include haircuts, funerals, vending machine sales, shoes, restaurant meals but not food products purchased in grocery stores, car repairs, plane tickets, clothes, stamps and items that average citizens purchase every day.

Mr. Speaker, there is one rather interesting item in all this mess. During the last election campaign, the Minister of Finance promised all Canadians across the country that he would not introduce a goods and services tax without the co-operation of the provinces. In fact, he solemnly swore across this country, during that same campaign, that if he did introduce a goods and services tax, it would not increase the government's revenue. He swore that if he introduced a GST, it would not be inflationary and that it would be visible.

Empty promises! He reneged on practically all his promises about the GST.

We can certainly not accuse the Minister of Finance of being consistent.

This was the minister who said that the manufacturers' sales tax was quietly killing jobs. Nevertheless, he increased that same tax four times, raising it from 9 per cent to 10, 11, 12 and finally 13.5 per cent.

In 1984, the Minister of Finance promised Canadians that he would not increase taxes a single cent. Since he and his government took power, they raised them 31 times. It is absolutely incredible.

Although this tax will go from 9 to 7 per cent, the principle remains the same. It is completely contrary to the basic equity of a progressive tax system that takes money from people based on their income.

This tax hits everyone on all purchases and all services. It is not a discretionary tax. No one can go without buying food. People have to buy clothes for their children. Many services are absolutely essential, whether for a pensioner or a family trying to make ends meet. They still have to buy things, so the principle remains.

It is the principle of taking the most from those who have the least, because they are the ones in society who are least able to be heard. They struggle every day to earn their living: workers on low and moderate incomes.

The fraudulent part of all this is that the minister hopes the headlines will say that he has reduced the tax from 9 to 7 per cent. In reality, all the revenue he gave up by doing so has been made up for by other taxes. In other words, the minister is pulling the wool over people's eyes. There is no tax reduction. I want to tell you that. He has simply transferred the burden to the middle class, the disadvantaged regions, pensioners and families receiving allowances.

When the minister announced that the GST would go from 9 to 7 per cent, he admitted that he had lost all control over the economy and the deficit, despite what he says. This is a minister who has doubled the public debt, that is, the total debt which this country has accumulated since Confederation, in only five years. It went from $170 billion to $350 billion in spite of all the tax increases in the last four or five years. In constant dollars, Canadian families are paying 30 per cent more in taxes than when the minister took office.

Obviously, the minister and his government are not to be trusted. They tell us that the GST will be 7 per cent, but what guarantee do we have that the Minister of Finance will not raise it? In fact, he recently refused to make a formal commitment not to raise the rate from 7 per cent in the future. Since the tax is invisible, the government can increase it more easily, which is what has happened abroad.

[English]

From the beginning the Minister of Finance has withheld the truth concerning the GST from Canadians. That minister has no more credibility. That minister has lost the confidence of Canadians from Vancouver to St. John's. Virtually every promise the minister has made concerning the GST has been broken.

For example, he promised that it would be revenue neutral. Is it revenue neutral? No, it is not. He promised that it would be visible. Is it visible? It may be. It may not be. We are not sure. He promised that it would be simple. It certainly is not. The Minister of Finance promised that small businesses would be adequately compensated for implementing the GST and that this tax would be fair to middle and low income Canadians. More broken promises, Mr. Speaker.

Finally, he promised to remove surtaxes on personal income as part of tax reform. Instead he has made them permanent. As an Atlantic Canadian I am particularly distressed that the GST will shift the tax burden from central Canada to other regions. The evidence presented to the finance committee clearly confirms that the GST will penalize regions for being located far away from the large consumer markets and manufacturing centres in central Canada.

Despite strong evidence that the GST will create greater regional disparities within Canada, there is no indication from either the government or the Conservative members of the finance committee that they either understand this shift or care about it.

In conclusion, I would like to say that the government's attempt at imposing this tax on the people of Canada proves one thing beyond all doubt. It proves that the government has lost control of the economy. Despite all the rhetoric concerning the deficit and the debt, this government has lost control of our country's finances. The finance minister has doubled the total public debt of this country, which is to say the cumulative debt since Confederation. He has doubled it in five years from $170 billion to $350 billion despite the greatest tax increases witnessed in Canadian history. He has imposed up to 31 tax increases. Canadians have had enough.

The Conservative goods and services tax proposal is seriously flawed and must be scrapped. Moreover, the federal government must immediately begin consultations with Canadians and provincial governments on the creation of a fair and integrated reform of the entire tax system. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, to all members in the House and to the Canadian public that it is time to go back to the drawing board. Let's scrap this tax.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear some of the member's comments about the effect of the proposed goods and services tax. Many of those are comments that I have heard from my own constituents. Around 30,000 people left the province of Saskatchewan last year because of the lack of business opportunities and the lack of cash income on farms, the international trade situation being what it is.

The business community there says that the high interest rates have become chronic and represent a financial grab by central Canada with the money draining out of the business community of that region into central Canada. In addition, they see this tax as being not only a pain in the neck that they do not need at a time when business is very tough, but as another decrease in the amount of money available in the small towns and remote regions of this community.

Is that the way the hon. member sees this tax as well?

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments. I think he summarized it quite well. The government's interest rate policy is in place to help alleviate the situation in central Canada, especially southern Ontario where they have a very hot, inflationist economy. I think the outer regions—western Canada, eastern Canada and the north—are suffering because of that.

It is about time the government has a look at those types of policies along with this tax, because I am told that if the interest rate is lowered by one point the government would save $1.6 billion. The government talks about saving. It cuts VIA Rail because it wanted to save $500 million. Why can the government not cut the interest rate? It says it is not that simple. I say that we should look at that a little more. If we do that along with a number of other new economic policies, I think we can do it.

As far as the tax itself, it is certainly going to cause some major problems. We talk about it being very regressive. It is certainly a regressive tax. Possibly it will also cause a state of recession. Certainly that is going to be a major problem for Canada.

NOTICE OF MOTION PURSUANT TO S. O. 57

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity and I shall not take too long.

I wish to give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the Order of the Day is called for resuming the debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee of Finance of Bill C-62 and on any amendments proposed thereto, I will move that the debate be not further adjourned.

Mr. Robinson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. First, I want to give notice to Your Honour and to the House that either myself or our House leader intend to argue a point of order tomorrow with respect to the procedural admissibility of the closure motion, given the provisions of Section 18 of the Constitution Act, 1867. I just wanted to give notice that we intend to argue that point tomorrow.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw to your attention the difficulty that this side of the House is experiencing with respect to the frequent use of closure and superseding motions.

I want to cite at this point, in making my point of order, the advice of the Chair some three years ago to this House. In fact, it was on April 14, 1987 that the Chair in fact did intervene in a manner that changed the way that procedure had historically been interpreted in this House. That was done at that time to deal with what was held by the Chair to be unreasonable delaying tactics on the part of the Opposition.

I want to suggest on this point of order that precisely the opposite situation is before the House now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the hon. member will be able to raise that tomorrow when he is debating his procedural motion. I think we should get right back into debate.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I cannot let this opportunity go by. The government's notice of closure on the goods and services tax just given by the minister shows a complete contempt for parliamentary debate.

I remind members that we are into the debate at second reading. There were, according to the Order Paper today, four hours and thirty-two minutes of debate left in the eight-hour initial debating time. We have not even had four hours of debate on the fundamental change to taxing Canadians, and I resent and reproach this government for using such tactics as imposing contempt on this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We still have three minutes remaining in questions and comments for the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur. Questions or comments? I will have to recognize the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville on another short point of order.

Mr. Nystrom: Very simply, Mr. Speaker, I want to support what the opposition Whip just said in terms of closure being moved this early. Perhaps you should check the precedents of the House. I know of no other example recently when closure has been moved so quickly in the House of Commons. The New Democratic Party has had only two speakers on second reading and all of a sudden there is closure. That is not a free and democratic debate in my opinion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think hon. ladies and gentlemen have expressed their views.

I would like to return to debate.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p.7569).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On questions and comments, the hon. member for Crowfoot.

There are two minutes left in the period for questions and comments on the speech of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur support the manufacturers' sales tax?

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for the question. I cannot support the manufacturers' sales tax as it now stands because there are some major problems with it. It needs reform.

The present tax that the government is proposing is worse than the manufacturers' sales tax. I honestly think that the government should have a look at tax reform in its entirety before proceeding with this type of tax, a tax on goods and services. There are some very negative things about this tax and unless we get them straightened out we are going to cause some great economic disruption in Canada's economy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to Bill C-62. I am in favour of the principle of sales tax reform in Canada. I emphasize the word "reform" because there are those who for selfish and partisan reasons persist in calling the GST a new tax. In so doing they imply that there is no present federal sales tax.

The fact is that Canada has had a sales tax, federally, since 1924. It is hidden deep in the price of all goods and services in Canada.

First, the federal sales taxes apply at rates of 9 per cent, 11 per cent, 13.5 per cent or as much as 19 per cent on sales of certain goods from the manufacturer. On top of that, there is a significant additional amount of federal sales tax paid on things that are used in the production of all other goods and services. These are input costs like vehicles, fuel, computers, telephone services, office furniture and equipment, stationery, construction materials and many more.

This additional amount results from cascading, tax on tax on tax, in each step between the raw material and the finished product. At present there is an additional tax burden of between 1 and 3 per cent on the selling price of an item as a result of cascading. There are those who may say, "So what?" Some of them are across the aisle. We have had the tax for 66 years. We survived. Why change it? Why reform sales tax at all?

First, the taxation of the inputs used to produce domestic goods harms Canada's international competitiveness. The goods we want to export bear the hidden burden of the current federal manufacturers' sales tax.

Second, the existing federal sales tax favours imported goods over domestically produced goods. Our domestically manufactured products are taxed on an average one third higher than competing imports. This is because the inputs are taxed on their value upon entry into Canada before a number of inputs such as further processing, advertising, distribution, marketing, packaging and other costs are added on to the value of that product. Whereas, the competing Canadian product is taxed further on in the chain after a number of these additional inputs have been factored in.

In an increasingly interdependent world, competition is such that we in Canada can no longer see our manufacturing sector trying to gain a share of the world market with one hand tied behind its back. Our enhanced ability to compete in the world will mean more jobs in Canadian manufacturing and industry. Adherence to the existing federal sales tax means more imports and fewer jobs at home.

Third, the existing federal sales tax is a jungle of regulation, special provisions, rulings, and administrative interpretations that generally evolve around the question: At which stage in the chain of value-added should the tax be imposed? Obviously, the earlier in the process the tax is applied, the lower the amount of tax—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise the question of quorum.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member wants to know if there is a quorum.

Yes, there is a quorum.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker is a slow counter.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Just as an aside, it is interesting that those who a few moments ago were professing interest in debating the merits of the GST are now trying by procedural measures to delay things even further.

Out of 75,000 manufacturers, there have been 23,000 separate legal rulings, and you can hardly blame manufacturers for trying to minimize the GST as they attempt to compete against foreign importers.

The Auditor General recently pointed out that the use of marketing companies costs an estimated $350 million a year in sales tax leakage. Other avoidance and evasion measures may add up to as much as $2 billion a year. Clearly, the federal government has to eliminate the incentive to resort to complex avoidance mechanisms. The answer is to reform sales tax entirely, to totally remove it from production as all other nations in the world have done. We remain the only country in the world which taxes its own production inputs thereby pricing our products out of the world market and enhancing the opportunity for foreign competition while at the same time encouraging elaborate tax avoidance and evasion techniques at home.

These are the reasons why most informed Canadians and, indeed, all political parties have recognized that the existing federal manufacturers' sales tax must go. It is fundamentally flawed. It is capricious in its application and damaging to our economy. This is why the finance committee of this House, composed of members from all sides, recommended that Canada implement a multi-stage sales tax on the broadest possible base.

The existing federal sales tax raises some $18 billion in federal revenue. A replacement tax clearly must raise an equivalent amount. A perfect GST system would tax all goods and services in the country. This would provide the broadest base to which the lowest percentage rate could be applied in order to produce that amount of revenue. But most Canadians feel that certain goods and services should be exempted. That is certainly the position of this government and the opposition parties. That is why basic groceries and prescription drugs, medical devices, residential rents, the purchase of existing homes and a number of other health and education related items are tax free.

The various exemptions narrow the base. That means that the percentage rate of tax has to be higher than would be the case if the base were broader.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I have counted for you now. There are 18 members in the House, one has just gone out of the door. That means 17 members in the House, and I would question quorum.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do now see a quorum.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I note that the lone NDP member present in the House is again trying to obstruct debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope hon. members would not begin raising these types of things in this Chamber. We know we do not comment on who is and who is not in the House. I am sure that the hon. member has now seen that there is a quorum. We can carry on with debate.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the GST, from the viewpoint of the consumer, is similar to retail taxes operated by nine of the provinces in Canada at the present time.

The major difference between the GST and retail sales tax is that the GST will be collected at each stage of the production and distribution chain with businesses claiming full credits for all tax paid on their business purchases. Only in this way, through the collection and rebate at each stage, can all of the GST be eliminated on business inputs thereby removing the hidden cost of the current federal manufacturers' sales tax for both businesses and consumers.

The replacement of the existing federal sales tax with the GST will enable our productive sector to better compete in the world marketplace. The GST is designed, as I understand it, to be revenue neutral. To the extent that it succeeds in plugging the kind of leakage that the Auditor General has pointed out—which some estimate as much as $2 billion a year—to the extent that at least a part of the underground economy will be forced above ground because the multi-state sales tax is much harder to avoid than a tax paid only at the point of sale, to the extent that more people will likely be employed in the manufacturing and business sector thereby contributing to the tax system rather than taking from it, there will hopefully be additional revenues generated. These revenues will contribute to deficit and debt reduction thereby ensuring that the essential programs and services, which constitute the Canadian social safety net and which Canadians value, can continue to be met.

By continuing to generate a portion of over-all government revenues from consumption, which is a tax on spending, as opposed to income taxation which is a tax on productivity the over-all fairness of the system will be maintained.

I personally believe that we cannot rely entirely on income taxation to generate revenues within Canada. There is a point, in my mind personally, at 50 per cent beyond which you are penalizing income which could be used for investment purposes. To the extent that people have moneys left over after the basics and after income tax they can spend it at their discretion as they choose or they can save it and invest. If they spend the money they will pay the GST—a consumption tax on what they spend. On the other hand, if they invest the moneys it will mean new capital, new plant, equipment, inventory, and jobs for Canadians.

There will be a refundable GST credit introduced to protect lower and modest income Canadians to the point where families with incomes of up to $30,000 a year will pay less tax than they do now.

The area that I represent is almost entirely dependent on agriculture and particularly the health of the export grain sector. That sector, at the moment, is terribly depressed as a result of the on-going trade subsidy war between the United States and the European community. I would therefore like to speak about the GST from the perspective of agriculture, and in doing so I would confess that I am sick, tired and weary of hearing special interest groups distorting the GST, and spreading untruths about it.

To hear the Canadian Federation of Independent Business quoted as saying to the farmer: "The implications for agriculture are staggering. You will soon be paying an extra 7 per cent retail tax on fertilizer, chemical fuels, equipment, et cetera." That statement is false. It is 100 per cent wrong. The fact is that the GST does not apply to production inputs of any kind whether they be agricultural, small business, manufacturing or industry. It does not apply to the purchase of goods and services that are used in a production chain, plain and simply. Under the current federal sales tax system many goods used in farming are tax exempt.

Mr. Nault: Like what?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): However, other things that a farmer uses in the course of his farming operations are taxed, generally at a rate of 13.5 per cent on the manufacturing cost. These items include half-ton trucks, tools, some repair parts, construction materials for farm-building fences, fuel for on highway use, and office equipment like computers. A half-ton truck for farm use, for example, which presently retails at approximately $14,000 should be some $1,400 less than would otherwise be the case as a result of the elimination of the existing federal manufacturers' sales tax and the rebate of GST to a farm purchaser.

Indeed a passenger vehicle of similar value purchased by a city dweller should be roughly $600 less owing to the difference between the current tax and the proposed GST. The naysayers and the doubting Thomases raise the question, "Will this saving be passed on?" I have no doubt that it will because we have in this country a competitive market-place, one that is based upon supply and demand. We have some 800,000 small businesses in this country, the backbone of the country, which compete with each other, which deal in large volume and small markup. I have no doubt that they will pass on the elimination of the FMST as well as the elimination of the cascading effect of that harmful tax to their customers. To believe otherwise would suggest that there are 800,000 small businesses in this country which collude and agree with each other every day to raise prices in concert. I think that is utter nonsense.

It is interesting to compare our system which is market driven, driven by supply and demand, with that kind of centrally planned economy which you have in eastern Europe and other nations in the world and which is being shown, day by day, to have failed utterly.

Even goods that are specifically exempt under the current sales tax regime contain a significant element of hidden tax, that is between 1 per cent and 3 per cent included in their price. This results from the cascading effect of the existing manufacturers' sales tax paid on many of the input costs that manufacturers and distributors have to buy in order to run their businesses.

Agricultural producers will note with satisfaction that the GST has been designed so that all producers, including farmers, get back all the sales tax they pay on their business inputs. The result will be real savings in operating costs. Under tax reform businesses pay a GST on the goods and services they buy and charge GST on their sales. The difference is remitted to the government. If the business in a particular period of time pays out more tax than it collects the government will refund the difference.

Most all sales by farmers are zero rated so they will not charge any tax in their sales but they will still, of course, be able to claim refunds for all GST paid on their business input purchases. Producers will receive a refund within 21 days or the government will pay interest on the money. In many cases it should be possible to get the rebate before the account is paid.

Some may say why can we not be exempted altogether with some kind of an exemption certificate. The problem is that the more exemptions you have the more complex the system becomes. It would be difficult for vendors to differentiate between exempt and non-exempt customers. It would make administration more difficult so, in most instances, the producer like anyone else will pay the GST in his purchases. He can then apply for a refund of the GST paid on all of the business input purchases. In order to avoid temporarily tying up large amounts of money there is now being prepared a list of selected major items which will be unconditionally tax free. This list of items used exclusively by farmers is being developed in consultation with representatives of the farm community. The list will include combines and other big-ticket items not bought by people other than producers.

Transfers of land within the family will be tax free. So too will dispositions of land as part of the sale of the farm as a going concern. Other sales will be subject to tax because of the difficulty in determining the ultimate use. If the purchase is for farming or other business usage the purchaser will be able to claim a refund of the GST paid. Crop share paid as part of a rental agreement will be exempt from the GST. Cash rental payments and custom work will be taxable, again to assist in the administration of the tax. In situations where it is difficult to ascertain the purpose, such as custom snow removal, the tax is paid by the purchaser who, if eligible, can then claim the refund.

In regard to fuel, gasoline and diesel, the farmer presently receives a rebate of the federal sales tax and purchases for off highway production purposes. Under the GST, farmers will recover all GST paid on fuel purchases for the farming operation and, unlike the current system, the rebate will apply to fuel used both on highway and off highway as long as it is used for business purposes. Invoices will show the GST as a separate item or as included in the price. In either case, farmers will have the same number of invoices as they have now and it will be a fairly straightforward matter to calculate the GST actually paid on business input which will be refundable. The bottom line is that farmers, like all other businesses, will be better treated under the GST than they now are under the federal manufacturers' sales tax.

The bottom line for the nation is a level playing field for Canadian producers, an economy in which imports will not be favoured but rather will be taxed in the same manner as Canadian-made goods. It will be an economy in which a hidden federal sales tax will be removed from the production of goods and services in Canada and from Canada's exports, thereby enabling Canadians to compete better, to expand sales, and to employ more Canadians.

Much of the criticism of the GST is tied into the perception that this is a new tax rather than a replacement tax. Coupled with the opposition to the GST is the common statement that the federal government, indeed governments at all levels, must demonstrate restraint, stop needless spending and eliminate waste and so on. We certainly subscribe to that. Indeed, we would invite an examination of a long list of program cuts and expenditure reductions, all of which have been criticized by those opposite.

This leads me to consideration of the current federal debt situation. We have moved in five short years from a $16 billion shortfall on federal current programs under the previous administration to a $9 billion surplus today. This clearly is still not good enough and much more has to be done.

The annual deficit must first be reduced, then eliminated, and ultimately we must begin making payments on the principal itself. The national debt imposes on the government of today the obligation to repay the over-spending of the past. This debt will not go away. We cannot wish it away and we cannot ignore it. Indeed, if serious measures are not taken to deal with this problem now we shall soon reach the point where interest payments will consume so much of government revenue that there will not be enough left to maintain the most basic program needs of Canadians. There is no easy answer. The choices are difficult. We can act responsibly through a combination of spending reductions and revenue increases designed to reduce and eventually eliminate the annual deficit, or we can go the other way. We can pretend the problem does not exist and go the South American way. We can simply print money and attempt to service the debt with cheap dollars. The result of this irresponsible action would be hyper-inflation, incredibly high interest rates, and massive unemployment.

There is still time to take control of the debt-deficit problem. To do so will test the resolve and determination of all Canadians. We have put in place over the past five years a number of policies designed to improve Canada's competitive position in the world because this means jobs for Canadians and a better future. Part and parcel of this initiative is sales tax reform.

In conclusion, I want to say that it is time to act. We have been talking about sales tax reform for 50 years. That is long enough. We have the GST proposal before this House. No one has been able to find any useful or viable alternative. No one has any other suggestions. We know that the federal manufacturers' sales tax has to go. Everyone knows it. All parties agree. The GST may not be perfect. Indeed, it is far from perfect. But it appears to be the only alternative and it is light years better than what we have now. I say let us get on with it for the sake of the country.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, to my honourable colleague, I have difficulty putting together two points that he raised in his speech. He raised the point that this tax is going to be revenue neutral and then in conclusion he states that this tax will, in fact, help pay off the programs initiated and a lot of other things.

In light of comments made by the Chamber of Commerce to this government suggesting that increases to spending by this government have been $50 billion over the last five years and 31 increases, how does he claim accountability with that question before him?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. member I will attempt to answer the question put to me. I think there were two questions folded into the comment and question. One, if I recall it correctly, related to the question of neutrality. The other one related to accountability.

In regard to neutrality, it is my understanding that the tax has been designed to replace the revenue which the existing federal manufacturers' sales tax currently generates. It is also my understanding that the Auditor General has pointed out that there is leakage as a result of marketing companies of some $350 million a year.

There are others in the country who point out other loopholes, other inequities, other unfairnesses, other avoidance and evasion mechanisms which may add up to as much as $2 billion a year. There is an underground economy out there which will be more difficult to operate in as a result of the multi-stage nature of the tax.

Clearly, there is the potential for revenue which ought to be collected at this point in time to be collected. To the extent that that happens, this tax will have been a success. I believe it could generate more revenue.

There is a second aspect to it. This involves the projections of increased employment in Canada's manufacturing and industrial sector. It is pretty clear that if our productive sector is relieved of production input taxes, both direct and through the cascading effect of the existing federal manufacturers' sales tax, then it should put that sector in a better competitive position. It should result in more sales, in more exports, and in more employment in this country. There will be a lot of people paying into this system rather than taking out of it.

That has characterized the policy of this administration. It is policies like this which have resulted in something in the order of 1,600,000 more Canadians working today than was the case just five short years ago under the previous administration, an administration which spent this country into catastrophic debt and which mortgaged the future of Canadians.

An hon. member: You doubled it.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): We doubled it, the hon. member says. The fact is that the debt which was inherited on March 31, 1985, at the end of the previous administration, was $199 billion. Members opposite do not want to hear the truth. The fact is that the effect of compound interest on that $199 billion accounts for every cent of the increase in the national debt from March 31, 1985 to March 31, 1990. Every cent of the increase in the national debt is simply unpaid compound interest on the profligate over-spending of the opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Fundy—Royal rose, as did the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, the hon. member member for Edmonton East and the hon. member for Gloucester. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Fundy—Royal.

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear my colleague so succinctly detail the benefits of the GST. Coming from a region of this nation which has for years been export oriented but which has suffered under the old system of the FST, we will now benefit from the imposition of the GST which will induce exporters in our region to be more competitive in the future. Hopefully, it will have the effect of bringing even more businesses into Atlantic Canada, as has been the trend over the past five years.

I also want to say that I am pleased to hear why consumers and all Canadians should not be skeptical that manufacturers will pass on the savings of the FST to them because of what has already been outlined.

I would just like to briefly comment that we often hear opposition members say that 70 per cent of the people are against the GST. In my experience, 70 per cent or more of the people would respond that they were negative to taxes anyway, regardless of what that tax might be and who imposes it.

My question to my hon. colleague is this. In his experience, what would be the response in his constituency to the question: "Are you in favour of government services"?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, there is clearly a problem. Canadians want continued services. They have been accustomed to a myriad of services from the federal government, and there is nothing wrong with that.

What is wrong is that previous administrations never had the courage to tax Canadians sufficiently to pay for those services and for those programs. There is a movement called Resolution One. I believe that Resolution One in the British North America Act ought to have been the clause stating that senior levels of government had to balance their books on an annual basis except in a time of dire emergency, such as war.

Had that been the case the spendthrift group under Prime Minister Trudeau would not have been in a position to mortgage this country to the hilt and put us in the position today where we are scrambling to pay off the debt of the past rather than being in a position to build and invest for the future. That is the problem.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I have a few short questions. First, the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia said that no one has made any suggestions other than the GST. I remember in the finance committee I heard a lot of alternatives, a lot of suggestions. Some were good and some were probably not so good.

Does he not admit that he might have been exaggerating a bit when he said: "No one has made any other suggestions"? I know that people in his own riding, for example, have made different suggestions.

Second, when in a democratic system is it incumbent upon him as a member of Parliament representing his own riding, his own constituents, to stand up and say: "No"? The Gallup poll last week showed that 74 per cent of the people are opposed to the GST. The poll today shows 79 per cent.

It is not good enough that the member for New Brunswick said that people are against taxes. We find today in The Globe and Mail, for example, that 56 per cent of the people who smoke cigarettes would favour an increase of 50 cents a pack in the tax on cigarettes. There are certain taxes in this country that are supported by the people. I do not think it is good enough just to say that people do not want tax increases.

How can he say that no one has made any other suggestions? At what point must a member of Parliament get up in this House and support his or her constituents, in this case 79 per cent of the people in this country who are against the GST? An overwhelming number of Conservative voters from 1988 are in opposition to the GST. Is it not incumbent upon that member to get up in this House and represent their point of view?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the question raised by the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

First, he asked if there were alternatives put in regard to the GST, or for sales tax reform. No doubt he is referring to those put forward by his own party in a minority report attached to the finance committee's deliberations on the sales tax reform question.

In my remarks earlier I talked in terms of viable, practical, sensible solutions and alternatives. Of course, in saying that I thought the hon. member would understand that it automatically excluded the addendum to the finance report put forward by the NDP.

Since he has raised the matter I will give members of the NDP a compliment. I will say that at least they have put forward some alternatives. They did that, unlike the Liberals whose only answer is to criticize, criticize, criticize endlessly and mindlessly. The NDP did put forward some suggestions, and indeed I looked at them.

They were in terms of hiking the marginal tax rate. I talked about that in my speech. We do not need a 67 per cent income tax rate in this country. You have got to give people a little bit of room to be productive and to have some incentive to grow. Personally, I reject that. I suggest to the hon. member that most Canadians would.

Another thing members of the NDP talked about was to bring back the estate tax. I thought they learned their lesson in Saskatchewan back in the 1970s. But they want to bring back the estate tax to "get the wealthy", the same "wealthy" that they are protecting every day in this House by objecting to taxing back old age pension and family allowance from higher income Canadians—a totally inconsistent policy and one which makes no sense.

The second point the hon. member suggests is that we should abolish Parliament, I guess, and just let the bureaucrats run the country based on a Gallup poll that comes out every Friday. Maybe that is the answer. I do not know.

The fact is that if we govern by polls in this country I do not know where we would be. I am not particularly interested in polls, whether they are Gallup polls or whether they are the polls which the NDP pays people in the United States to do.

The only poll which has the least bit of significance in a democratic society is the one which occurs on election day. All we can ask of Canadians at that time, probably some three years hence, is to mark the report card. They are going to judge based on which party had some sort of concrete approach to the debt problem. Was it a party which, yes, did raise some taxes; yes, did put forth some spending cuts and some restraint proposals in an attempt to do something about it? Or are they going to go with the opposition parties which have nothing to offer but mindless criticisms?

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I apologize to the hon. member for Gloucester and the hon. member for Edmonton West. The time has run out on questions and comments.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too, am pleased to stand in the House today to express my concern over the proposed goods and services tax, Bill C–62.

Lately the government has been playing the smoke and mirrors game by claiming that it is listening to Canadians and has thus brought down the rate of the proposed goods and services tax from 9 per cent to 7 per cent. The finance minister loves to tell us what a great guy he is for this reduction. However, he does not point out that he will make up the revenue he would have gained had it been 9 per cent by implementing other tax measures.

In other words, to help compensate for a revenue decrease of almost $6 billion, the minister plans to scrap income reduction for middle–income earners, reduce the refundable tax credits for low–income Canadians, reduce housing rebates, and reduce the indexation for family allowances and old age security. These are but four of the ways the minister will get back what he so arrogantly infers is money owed to him.

When each of the new highlights is added up, the total revenue for the government is $5.9 billion, or exactly what would have been made if the tax was introduced at 9 per cent instead of 7 per cent. Thus the finance minister will have taken the same amount of money out of the pockets of Canadians. It is simple math, and Canadians will not be fooled. Canadians are not that dumb.

Here we are with a government that expects credit for saving $450 million by not doing something that it never intended to do in the first place. Canadians understand this tax, and they are loudly proclaiming that they do not want it.

The latest Gallup poll shows that 74 per cent of Canadians are opposed to the GST. We all know how much the government watches polls. Perhaps it should start listening to Canadians.

Canadians realize that the 7 per cent proposal is just as offensive as the 9 per cent proposal. Canadians realize that this is a tax faucet for the government. Once installed, the drip can and will be turned to full flow. In other words, the tax will easily get to the government's desired rate of 9 per cent or more.

Let us not get bogged down with proposed rates because this government has proven time and time again that it believes rates are there to be increased. After all, since the member for Etobicoke Centre became the Minister of Finance he has increased various taxes to Canadians 31 times. This is the same minister who termed the manufacturers' sales tax a silent killer of jobs because it damages the competitiveness of Canadian exports.

However, he has not hesitated to increase the rate of the MST on four separate occasions over the past five years. If the MST is such a great evil that it desperately needs to be replaced by the GST, then how could he justify these increases?

This does not say that I like the MST. I do not. I just believe that you do not replace a bad tax with a horrendous tax.

This proposed tax is everything the Minister of Finance promised it would not be during the 1988 election campaign. During that time the minister swore that he would not bring in a GST unless he had provincial co–operation. Well, he does not have that co–operation.

He also promised that any GST would be revenue neutral, visible and non–inflationary. It is none of these things. In fact, the Conference Board of Canada estimates that the rate of inflation will be between 1 per cent and 1.5 per cent. The government admits that this number is reached by taking a very optimistic view of the effects of the GST. The Conference Board based these assumptions on those of the finance department.

The Department of Finance assumes that the savings of the cut will be passed on to the consumer. This is just a joke. There is no system in place to monitor such a move.

The minister promised Canadians that when he brought in a GST he would remove the 3 per cent temporary surtax on their incomes. He promised middle-income Canadians that he would lower their basic income tax rate. He promised business people that it would be simple to understand and administer. The Minister of Finance did not keep any of these promises.

Not only was the surtax not removed, it went up 2 percentage points. The income tax rate will not be lowered and the proposed GST will be a nightmare for the business community to understand and administer.

Most of all, the Minister of Finance promised that the tax would be fair. Canadians in every part of this country are continually pointing out just how unfair it is.

Is it fair that low-income families and persons living on fixed incomes, including seniors and welfare recipients, will be hurt by the GST? A senior with a given income will pay more, not less, taxes than his or her younger counterpart with the identical income. Sales taxes are by their nature regressive, simply because low-income Canadians spend a larger portion of their income on taxed goods and services than do higher-income people.

For example, according to Statistics Canada, families with incomes between $10,000 and $15,000 a year spend 92 per cent of their incomes on current consumption, with about 18 per cent of this being spent on food. In contrast, families with incomes of $50,000 or more spend only about 56 per cent of their income on current consumption, with only 7 per cent on food.

Although refundable tax credits are intended to compensate poorer families for the increased federal sales tax, many witnesses appearing before the finance committee were convinced that these increased credits would not fully compensate low-income Canadians for the added cost of the GST.

Is it fair that for the first time in Canadian history, books will be taxed? As was pointed out in discussions with the Nepean Library in my constituency, libraries will not be able to purchase on behalf of their clientele as much reading material because of this tax. As a result of the tax there will likely be less variety and selection of works for libraries to choose from because the booksellers will restrict their offerings to potential best sellers with less risk. At the very minimum, libraries will have the immediate impact of 7 per cent less money to buy books. This is at a time when the government is attempting to give the impression that it is fighting illiteracy.

Furthermore, by planning to tax reading but not gambling the government is saying that gambling is more worthy of support than the fight to end illiteracy.

Is it fair that the GST will wreak havoc on the tourism industry? One reason for this is that the GST discourages Canadians from spending their tourism dollars in Canada. This will have a devastating effect on the industry.

In addition, the GST will discourage foreign tourists from coming to Canada. Do we honestly think that these foreign tourists are going to save all those little sales slips and when they leave the country that they are going to turn them in for reimbursement? Of course they will not.

Is it fair that the real estate prices will increase and rents will rise because of the GST?

I realize that my time is getting short and my notes are not getting any shorter, they are still very long.

It is a real privilege for me to stand here because what I am hearing, not just in my riding but in letters from right across the country, is that people are very, very concerned about this. What it has shown me is that this government, as it has on so many other occasions, has failed the test. It is not listening to Canadians.

This government is tricky. It announces changes and calls them tax reform. Over all, the effect is to increase taxes for everyone except the well off. The GST represents a monumental shift in the way taxes are collected in Canada. Once that line is crossed there is no turning back.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member. I want to speak just briefly on what the hon. member said about tourism.

First, the hon. member said the tax is going to hurt foreign tourism. For any country that has a value-added tax, its tourism has not gone down. It has not affected tourism. The hon. member speaks of tourists going to cash in the tax credits. When I travel and have the opportunity I certainly cash in the tax credits. Most of the people I talk to who travel internationally, who go to countries that have refunds for foreign tourists, take advantage of it. I believe the foreign tourists here will.

We have gone one step further in Canada. We are also giving them a credit on short-term accommodation when they are here, which you do not get in other countries. You do not think they are going to claim that back? Of course they are going to claim it back.

The GST is not going to be a detriment to tourism. The only way it could be a detriment is with all of these opposition members standing up and saying: "Don't come to Canada, it is terrible up here". Well, that is absolute nonsense. You should be promoting this country. You should not be denigrating it with this nonsense about how this tax is going to hurt tourism, because you know it is not true.

Mrs. Gaffney: I think the comments of the member across the way were a statement. I do not know whether he knows how to ask a question, but anyway, I will respond to that.

When you have statistics from every one of the major tourism industries across the country, who can you rely on more than the tourism industry themselves, who say that the GST will hurt tourism in Canada.

I have to take the advice of the experts. Unlike the member across the way, I do not consider myself an expert on everything. I listen to the experts and it is high time he did too.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the member's comments about the grief and suffering tax. I just want to bring a little politics into the Chamber, if I might. I know we should not do that.

I would like to ask the member a question. When she is out, perhaps in the fall of 1992 or the spring of 1993, possibly knocking on doors trying to get the support of her constituents again, when they ask her how come the Liberal Party really did not help fight the GST and did not present any alternatives when that legislation was going through the House of Commons, what she will say to those voters?

Mrs. Gaffney: I will say the same thing to these constituents with regard to the GST, as I said to them about the NDP and why did they not fight the free trade agreement.

We have this government across the floor because of the New Democratic Party did not fight the free trade agreement. I will do the same thing for this. Canadians across this country have given alternatives to this government. They have not listened one iota. I have alternatives. Why should I give them to you? You will not listen anyway. The NDP have come up with alternatives. I have not even heard the government consider them. Why go through the sham of presenting something to a government that is going to sit there and ignore what is being said, because they are not listening to Canadians, so why should they listen to me.

Mr. Jordan: I would like to congratulate my colleague on a fine speech. She seems to have touched a few nerve ends and that is always an indication of a well supported speech and good statistics.

Canadians had a bad experience a few years ago when we converted to the metric system when rather ruthless entrepreneurs did a very limited kind of tinkering with the price of a unit when the size of the unit was markedly reduced or raised.

Mr. McDermid: Who brought that in?

Mr. Jordan: I am not speaking about the merits of the metric system. I am talking about ruthless entrepreneurs who existed then and I am sure exist today. I wonder if the member would care to comment on whether she sees any danger of a repeat here?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You have 30 seconds, please.

Mrs. Gaffney: Well, it was with a great deal of interest that I heard the government whip comment on who came from a business background here in this House. He indicated with great delight how most people on the government side of the House had a big business background, therefore, had a better opportunity to know how to run this country. I say that business is ashamed of this government. Business does not run business the way this government runs business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Thursday, February 1, 1990, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should move to complete the national park system (land and marine) by the year 2000 and should implement the recommendation of the World Commission on Environment and Development (Brundtland Report) that Canada protect at least 12 per cent of land and marine zones.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost. Orders of the Day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p.7569).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Gloucester on debate.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this motion, one of the things that strikes me the most is what we have heard from members opposite in the debate so far.

The comic strip may have passed into history wherein every now and then we would see General Bullmoose suggest that what is good for General Motors is good for the country.

In this particular matter, everybody else is wrong. Business, which is supposed to be helped by the goods and services tax is wrong when it is opposed to the GST—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. We are now in debate. If hon. members wish to discuss other projects, they could do it behind the curtain. The hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, when the Federation of Independent Business states its opposition to the goods and services tax, it is because it does not understand or it has a vested interest, whatever the excuse might be given by members of the government to support the GST.

When the Canadian Labour Congress opposes the goods and services tax, it is because they do not understand. When chambers of commerce across the country state their opposition to the way the GST is being implemented and some of the implications of the GST, it is because they do not understand.

Today in the House I heard the minister speak on the matter, saying that tourism would be greatly helped by the GST and that the rebate system that was involved in it would be very helpful to tourism. However, the tourist industry states unequivocally that it is opposed to the GST. The stock answer for members opposite is that people do not understand. What we are faced with now in the House is an opportunity for the government to provide Canadians with all the answers and all the explanations. I am suggesting to the Minister of Finance whom I know wants to make sure that Canadians do understand his proposal that he should be speaking to the government House Leader, suggesting that all members of the House should have an opportunity to speak out in this forum and tell exactly what they feel so strongly about in terms of whether or not they support the GST or whether they oppose it.

Today I listened to the story on how the deficit problem in the country has occurred. Although it has doubled the debt, and the deficit is going to be well in excess of $30 billion this year, the government says it is the fault of the government that was in power 5, 10 or 15 years ago.

If one wanted to look at it closely, one might want to ask what was the amount collected by the Government of Canada through the manufacturers' sales tax in 1984, what is the amount this year and what is the projected amount had the MST been left in force in the fiscal year 1991-92. I think Canadians would be astounded to learn that in 1984 when this government came to power it was collecting less than $8 billion in the manufacturers' sales tax. Under the goods and services tax it will collect in excess of $25 billion.

It would be interesting for Canadians and for all members of the House from Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario who support the GST to stand in this House and tell us why they support it. Do not tell us why the opposition is spreading gloom and doom and that the opposition wants to take political advantage of the goods and services tax. It seems to me that it is incumbent on members of Parliament to explain to the approximately 75 per cent of Canadians who are opposed to the GST why they are wrong.

The simple answer is for government members to muzzle the opposition. That is nothing new because of the experience of the finance committee over the past six months. As we travelled into Vancouver, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg, Halifax, St. John's, Fredericton and Charlottetown, Canadians were given very, very limited opportunity to speak out as to why they were opposed to the goods and services tax.

That syndrome continues. The Minister of Justice came in this afternoon, rose on a point of order and told Canadians that not only would they not be allowed to discuss to any great degree the goods and services tax and what it means to them and their families, neither would elected members of Parliament. We will be precluded from speaking out on the goods and services tax. It seems absolutely ludicrous to me that people who believe in the goods and services tax will not stand in their place and explain to Canadians what the government propaganda machine and a couple of ministers who spoke out on the matter have been unable to do.

I was very pleased to learn over the weekend that the Minister of Finance will be attending a meeting of the chamber of commerce in Edmonton on March 5. Since there has been a coherent long-term approach on the part of the government to restrict appearances by government members to very special contexts, I and I am sure Albertans would like to see an open forum.

We would like to see a forum where not just members of the chamber of commerce but Albertans generally could attend, not to listen to a debate between two politicians, but to be able to ask questions that concern them. The problem with the GST debate so far is that there have not been many answers from the government except to suggest that we have to replace the manufacturers' sales tax.

I say to Canadians what they must ask their members of parliament who support the GST what the tax is meant to replace. The manufacturers' sales tax had raised less than $9 billion when the Conservatives came to power in 1984. The GST in 1991-92 is predicted to bring in in excess of $25 billion. That is a threefold increase and the government says it is not a new tax. It may not be a new tax but it is going to bring in an awful lot more money than what was being raised by the so-called silent killer of jobs in 1984.

I would like to make a point to my western friends. Having travelled in the west, I know the deep-rooted feeling there against the goods and services tax. I would suggest that when members on the government side speak about the GST, and in particular about agriculture and farmers, they do not confuse the issue. The question of how farmers will operate their businesses in terms of inputs, credits, exemptions and so forth is one thing. It is debatable whether they will be better off or worse off.

Unfortunately, what members to your right do not understand is that farmers and their families are consumers. They do not just farm the land, they do other things. They buy other things than what they need to farm with. That is why Albertans, Manitobans and people from Saskatchewan understand why this tax is bad. It is not just what it is going to do to the primary industries in this country, it is not just what it is going to do to farmers or fishermen, it is what happens when people do not understand that farmers, like every other consumer in the country, are going to be attacked by the goods and services tax.

Mr. Sobeski: Who's paying the MST now?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): My friend asks who is paying the MST now. The people of Canada are paying the MST. There is no question about that. We paid $7.7 billion in 1984 but the Tories want to transfer a $7.7 billion tax that was being collected in 1984 into a $25 billion to $26 billion tax on consumers in 1991. That is the Tory way. That is the answer to the question.

Canadians know now that there is a manufacturers' sales tax and they know they are paying it. The fact is Canadians are saying to this government that they would rather stay with the status quo, the devil they know rather than the devil they don't know. That is what Canadians are saying.

The position of the Liberal party has been that we need to have tax reform with fiscal reform, something that nobody to the right understands. They know how to raise taxes. They knew how to raise them 31 times in five years, but they do not know how to practise fiscal reform because they do not understand that the two go hand in hand.

We have 80 members on this side of the House who want to be heard in this debate. I do not know what is wrong with members to your right, Mr. Speaker, that they do not want to take the opportunity afforded to them in this House to explain to their constituents what the GST is all about. However, to ensure that members of the Liberal party can be heard in this House, I move:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-62.

I believe it is important that parliamentarians be heard on the question of the goods and services tax in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by the hon. member. Would those members who object to the motion please rise in their places?

And more than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I rise to correct some very serious faults that have been made in the last two speeches by Liberal members. I am astonished to hear two falsehoods which Liberal party members should be very aware are serious misconceptions that they are propagating. They have been propagating them steadily for the last three months and have just tried to do it in the House again.

The hon. member for Nepean said that municipal libraries will have to pay the sales tax on books. That is not true and she knows that.

Second, the finance critic for the Liberal party just spoke about tourism and the GST and made an absolutely inaccurate statement. He said that the Tourism Association of Canada does not support the GST. Yes it does. It wants a lower rate but it supports the tax conceptually. That is what the hon. member does not want to hear because we have an alternative and the opposition does not have an alternative. The argument is about the rate, not about the tax. I would ask him to clarify what he means when he says the association does not support the tax conceptually.

Also, the hon. member who serves as the finance critic for the Liberal party talks about fiscal reform. Since 1984 this government has spent 3.5 per cent on average on program increases every year. I would like him to tell me what fiscal leadership the Liberal governments in the 1970s showed and how much their increases were year by year. I do know that from 1972 to 1975, when the member for Vancouver Quadra was the finance minister, increases were over 17 per cent a year. The member talks about fiscal reform. Fiscal reform has been pursued by this government. The previous Liberal government did not pursue fiscal reform or tax reform.

Finally, I want to ask the member what he means when he talks about the 1984 level of the federal sales tax and the manufacturers' sales tax. He fails to tell the House that in that year the Government of Canada was going to run a deficit of $38 billion or higher. That is the kind of fiscal reform he wants to return to.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, first of all, in terms of the tourism industry, if the hon. minister wants to discuss the question of the GST with the tourism industry I can arrange for that very easily. As a matter of fact, on Wednesday evening of last week the Canadian Restaurant and Food Association, a very integral component of the tourism industry in this country, was here. It said that it, like many other people, are very concerned with the government's approach on the goods and services tax. It is not like saying: "Are you in favour of fresh air? Are you in favour of it or are you against it?" It is not that black and white. The restaurant association does not support the proposal that the government is trying to ramrod through this House. It does not, and that is a fact. The Nova Scotia tourist association, also represented at that dinner, refused to support the government initiative as it is presently before this House.

Sir John A. Macdonald supported some things in this country too, if we want to go back. He supported the railway. What is the minister's position on the railroad in this country now?

The Liberal government of the 1970s and early 1980s had a mandate and it at that time had to answer to the people for what the people decided was not the proper way to proceed in this country. I am not going to defend what went on in 1970 or 1980, not at all. I have no need to.

The minister talks about reform. There was reform of the rules of this House. I want to tell the hon. minister, through you Mr. Speaker, that Sir John A. Macdonald had beliefs, which this member and his colleagues obviously no longer share, about a country and what the railroad contributes. John Diefenbaker, who I am sure you remember, had some thoughts on closure that he expressed during the pipeline debate. We are in this House today talking about tax reform, monetary reform, fiscal reform, and what do we have to do? Capsule it in five minutes or less because this government imposes closure on parliamentarians who want to discuss the GST thoroughly. We cannot as my time is ended because the government will not allow us to speak out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Defence.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, obviously, in any society it is a lot easier not to make decisions, not to govern, than to try and govern a country. And when one does govern, one has to make changes from time to time, and it is not necessarily easy to do so. The same applies to bringing up children, because if we promise our teenagers a lot of things when they are growing up, and we are unable to keep those promises, we are stuck and we then have some difficult decisions to make.

The financial situation in Canada is not an easy one, and when we want to change projects or introduce new policies, people are going to raise all kinds of scenarios, and we have had examples of this daily. In fact, we saw this just five minutes ago, when a vote was called on a motion to extend debate after the usual time of adjournment. I have no objection to the principle, but don't you think that if we had not wasted our time last week on endless votes on the tabling of private bills, and if we had each used our speaking time, our ten or twenty minutes, instead of putting on this show to try and obstruct the proceedings of the House, there would be no need today to call a vote on extending the hours of business of the House.

There was plenty of time, except they had to put on a show, and we saw some incredible ones— I wish the hon. member would let me get on with my speech. I let you talk, now let me talk. I support the tax!

Last year, we had a debate on free trade, remember? You know what the Liberals said? With free trade, old age pensions will go. They said the same thing about tourism. Old age pensions, all that was going to go. That was a year and half ago, and it hasn't happened, yet. Monique Bégin, former Minister of National Health and Welfare, said: With free trade, AIDS— You remember that one? And now they are trying to make Canadians believe any number of fairy stories. One thing is certain: this century saw a lot more Liberal than Conservative ministers of finance. In 1946, we had the Russell-Sirois Commission. In 1940, they took the Russell-Sirois Commission Report which had recommended to change the tax system and they shelved it. In 1956, they took the Carter Commission Report which had also recommended to change the tax system and they shelved it. Not to govern is much easier than to govern. That was in 1956. In 1966, they shelved also the Carter Commission of Inquiry report on taxation. In 1977, there was the Commodity Tax Review Group report. Again, instead of governing, they shelved this report. In 1983, they shelved the Goodman Report. There was one such report every decade, namely in 1940, 1956, 1966, 1977 and 1983. All these reports indicated that our tax system needed to be changed. Each time, the party in power decided not to govern and to continue as before. In 1984 or 1985, this Government tried another tack.

How did this develop? It was said earlier that taxes are not popular. It is clear they are not. We do not need surveys to find that out. Everybody knows that taxes are not popular and that governments try to get reelected. But how do governments go about it? When the needs are greater, they try to raise new taxes. If you were the prime minister of a country where religion forbade to eat pork, do you not think it would be easy for you, as a prime minister, to raise a special tax on pork? That is what you would do.

Mrs. Bourgault: So let say it is forbidden.

Mr. Hudon: It is forbidden. When something is forbidden either through religion or customs, people seem to jump on it. What did governments do 70 years ago when they wanted to tax people who were self-sufficient and rich? They taxed manufactured goods because as a rule, people were self-sufficient, made their own fabrics, sofas, clothing, etc. Therefore, they levied taxes on luxury items because rich people had enough money to buy a manufactured sofa or weaved worsted clothes. This is how we developed our tax system in Canada. Because of the religious or historical context, we have had sin taxes—liquor, cigarettes, playing cards. Only recently have we been able to buy playing cards without excise stamps. And we started taxing the rich because the rich bought manufactured goods. So we said that was a good way to raise money. And we kept on doing it. Manufactured goods were taxed more and more, but there has to be a limit. It is not because one is rich that one will use a hundred times more manufactured goods than one's poor neighbour. There is a limit to that. It is not because I am rich that I will take 42 meals a week instead of 14. If I am rich, or if I have money, instead of buying groceries for my meals I will buy services, eat in restaurants. So, the more affluent I am, the more services I can afford. If I had money, why would I buy a $20,000 car? I would lease an automobile with a chauffeur! I would be stupid to drive. If I am rich, why would I buy a house? Why buy a house and look after the flowers? Instead, I will hire a gardener, rent a house, and so forth. I will rent services, and they are not taxable.

If tomorrow morning you receive $250,000 in interest on your investments, Mr. Speaker, just for the last three months, it would be stupid of you to invest them yourself. You would use financial consultants. Come now! The more affluent one becomes, the more services one uses. Fifty years ago, the more affluent one was, the more manufactured goods one used. It was tempting for governments to jump on that. But as everyone suggests, this is old-fashioned. Our Opposition colleagues also suggest this I think. They certainly do not agree with the proposal. But that is the direction the tax system will take. We simply have to propose changes.

I can see some Members who did not even bother to attend the proceedings of the Committee on Finance chaired by our colleague from Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), so they certainly did not come up with meaningful suggestions. How do we go about it? Someone may not particularly favour 9 per cent, or 7 per cent, or even 5 per cent. We agreed to some exceptions. Some people said: I would support a 5-per-cent tax without any exception. That is one option. The government chose another one. So now the government is facing the problem of taxing wealthier Canadians on what they chose to do with their money, and these are the people who now use ever more services.

Back in my riding I gave a few conferences on the GST and a lady said to me: Mr. Hudon, this means that when I eventually sell my house I will pay a 9-per-cent tax on the contract drawn up by the notary. I replied: Yes, Madam, you sell your house, the notary charges $1,000 for the contract, so you pay $90. You cannot afford to pay that? On any given day, do you know how many people sell their house? You will sell one in your lifetime. How many houses did you sell in your life? Two, Mr. Hudon. Do you know how many people sell houses every day? They are not taxed. What the Minister of Finance did through the tax reform is something new, at the same time a change in the income tax level and in the tax rate. This is the way we will improve our system, broadening the tax base and being more equitable by taxing rich people on what they do with their money. We are not hiding anything, Mr. Speaker. It has been suggested that people will leave Canada and that tourists will stay away in droves. Well now, the situation is the same everywhere.

The second issue to keep in mind and to point out honestly to all Canadians is that everything made or produced in Canada is subject to a 13.5 per cent tax.

We do not tell people enough—you are afraid to and some days so am I—that normally, the price of all manufactured products will go down 13.5 per cent and up 7 per cent.

Will the big corporations pass on the savings? We have to find some way to check into that. A system will have to be set up to do that. But normally, that is what will happen and what will help our exports.

We talked about it in the free trade debate. Canada, the Canadian economy, depends entirely on our exports—and I mean that. I do not get richer by selling something to my neighbour in Valleyfield; I get richer when I sell abroad and new money enters the country.

When our Canadian products are put on the market in Europe or the United States with a 13.5 per cent tax included, I am automatically disqualified or it is harder for me to compete for sales internationally.

Mr. Speaker, I say that if we want to maintain our social programs, if we want to maintain Canadians' collective wealth, we must bring money into this country and we will do that by exporting our labour and what we produce.

So I want to tax rich people on what they do with their money. Secondly, I want to make my exports competitive. Thirdly, and this is not said often enough, we have no external marks to distinguish rich and poor. I want to help the less fortunate deal with that expense. That is why there will be rebates based on the previous year's tax return. Households with incomes of $30,000 or less will get tax credits four times a year, not to spend the first day they get it. It is to help them deal with the extra expenses they will incur.

It is true that if they go to St. Hubert Bar-B-Q or McDonald's to eat half a chicken for $10, it will cost $10.70. We are not lying to people; we are telling them that is true. But to help them pay the extra 70 cents, they will receive a credit on January 1, March 1, July 1 and October 1. With that, they can handle the extra expenses.

We are not lying. I for one did not need that. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I am earning $80 000, and I do not need the rebate, I can afford it. One thing is certain—the Canadian economy will be paid for by Canadians, not by foreigners. The debt will be paid by Canadians, not by foreigners. It is our business. We are asking more and more from the government. Every year we used to pay all sorts of things for Canadians. There was talk about VIA Rail, about a lot of other services. We have taken firm action on the economy. There is a new Budget coming, and I am sure there will be more.

I remember in 1984, when we came up with our first Budget and started cutting, I kept hearing on the other side who is running today for the leadership of the Liberal party. She used to say: "Cut, Cut, Cut!" and "Jobs, Jobs, Jobs." Never so were so many new jobs created than since that time!

There are political risks to be taken. There are fiscal risks to be taken. And the risks we took in 1984, 1985 and 1986 have borne fruit.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, I certainly want to tax the rich on what they do with their money. Second, I want to make our goods globally competitive by repealing the 13,5 per cent tax, and making our exporters competitive.

Third, I want to help the less privileged, because to them this will be an extra cost; those people I want to help face that new expenditure. And this, Mr. Speaker, leads me to the exemption. Not all goods will be taxed. Food will be exempt, drugs will be exempt, rents will be exempt, resale houses will be exempt.

So, Mr. Speaker, there are exceptions in—

Mr. Fontana: What is the definition of "Food"?

Mr. Hudon: —Someone asked for the definition of food. The Liberals, Mr. Speaker, are wondering how to define food. Well, since they were in power for 22 years, they could have come up with a definition!

Mr. Nystrom: It's caviar and Big Macs!

Mr. Hudon: Ah! Caviar! So that's it.. Here we go again, about those tons of caviar that are sold every year. The NDP and its crusade against caviar! Mr. Speaker, the Liberals are wondering how to define food. Shame, shame! So you really wonder?

Mr. Fontana: Is barbecued chicken food?

Mr. Hudon: You seem to have a problem. I suppose if I mention prescription drugs and tell them these are not taxed, they will say: What is the definition of a prescription drug? We will remind them that in Bill C-22, we came up with a definition of prescription drugs, and it was a worthwhile exercise, believe me, because during the 22 years they were in power, their definition of prescription drugs wasn't so hot. They didn't really know what it meant. Now they wonder what food is. They ask to have the hours of the House extended so they can talk some more. The people listening to us today, Mr. Speaker, can hardly be expected to take all this very seriously.

Mr. Speaker, the tax reform before the House today, which is part of the overall tax reform, will be beneficial to the economy of this country in general. All politicians are the same. They try to tax areas, not where it is politically expedient but where it makes the most sense to the public.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that tomorrow morning, the Minister of Finance will be able to sell Canadians a tax of x per cent on all incomes in Canada for environmental reasons, because of existing public awareness.

That is what governments will try to do. That is what governments have always tried to do. Remember what I said earlier about farmers. Every country has developed its tax system in terms of historical, religious, financial or other constraints.

Mr. Speaker, we don't need polls to tell us that a tax is not popular. When I walk around—-

Mr. Nystrom: In Chambly, too!

Mr. Hudon: In Chambly, you've are got to be kidding it is not the GST which will get us elected or not. Don't worry! You can talk about Meech Lake in Chambly and show how much of a hypocrite you are but the considerations. They are totally different.

Mr. Speaker, they tell us that a tax is unpopular— When I walk down Victoria Street in Valleyfield, I know that the tax is not popular. But popular or not, Mr. Speaker, it is not going to make me change my mind. I am not here just to get re-elected. I am here to try to make some useful changes, to build a nation for our children and to give them the tools they need to succeed. Because the way we are going— And we all agree on this; there is no need for a Gallup poll.

Mr. Speaker, the way we are going, it will be an a tragedy if we do not give ourselves the economic tools we need to face the new Canadian realities and responsibilities.

[English]

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with great interest to the hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry. I just did not quite understand his explanation as to why there is such a devastating percentage of Canadian people opposed to the GST.

I quote from the Star CTV poll just released last night which says that 79 per cent of Canadians are opposed to the GST and 16 per cent are in favour of it. That is not very many. Only 16 per cent are in favour of it. I think it is really the 16 Tories in the House tonight. These people are trying to muzzle Parliament by not allowing an extended debate so opposition members can explain to the government what is wrong with it and perhaps we can get some answers to these questions. Clearly, 79 per cent of Canadians are opposed to it. Only 16 per cent are in favour of it and 5 per cent cannot make up their minds. I think they just probably have not heard of it.

In the member's province of Quebec the situation is even more devastating: 81 per cent are opposed to it while 14 per cent are in favour of it. I would think that it is not just what the hon. member hears casually when he goes back on the weekend, but people are really concerned. He simply has to get better answers and better explanations of why he wants to impose this dastardly tax on the people of Quebec.

Clearly in the west it is the same problem. Only 1 per cent more are in favour; 15 per cent are in favour there and 80 per cent are opposed. Some 5 per cent have not heard of it. In Atlantic Canada 16 per cent are in favour and 78 per cent are opposed.

I think it is important to note when we look at these polls that many people are not only opposed to it but are prepared to sign petitions, write letters to their MPs, attend rallies, vote against it, and boycott the tax. They want to take whatever action is possible.

I wonder if the hon. member could explain to the House why 81 per cent of the people in Quebec are opposed to it and only 14 per cent are in favour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before the hon. member replies, the hon. member for Leeds—Grenville has a point of order.

Mr. Jordan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government House leader what business he intends to introduce in the House tomorrow.

Mr. Hawkes: The hon. government House leader is not here, Mr. Speaker, but as chief government Whip I think members can look at the Order Paper for tomorrow. I think the primary item on that would be a continuation of the goods and services tax debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Hudon: My colleague wants to know why so many people are against the GST. It is because of the damn lies you keep telling them!

Mr. Nystrom: The what?

Mr. Hudon: The lies! Throughout the free trade debate some Members kept asking why so many people were against free trade. You had elderly people believe they would lose their pension benefits. During the 1988 campaign we spent a whole month telling seniors that it was not true, that they did not have to fear losing their pension. Stop giving them misleading information.

A moment ago we were talking about Chambly and—What is his name— We are bound to forget his name within a couple of weeks. Why did the candidate in Chambly fail to tell the voters that right now— In any event, if he did not tell them I will because I am sure they are all listening to us, that on a $10,000 car they will pay $840 less.

An hon. member: With the GST.

Mr. Hudon: With the GST. Why do you not tell that to them? Why are people not aware of the fact that the price of all manufactured products will drop by 13.5 per cent and then go up 7 per cent? People do not know that food will not be taxed. You feed them misleading information to scare them. Tourism, nobody eats in restaurants anymore! The economic downturn will scare the daylights out of Canadians!

Last year, Mr. Speaker, we had the AIDS apocalypse in free trade and this is why some people were against it. So what happened to the untold woes we were supposed to witness, Mr. Speaker? Funny thing, here we are in 1990, two years later, yet we are still alive and old age pensions are still paid out regularly. My colleague on the other side has been making faces for nearly an hour, you will lose! If we lose the election next time around, Jos, that means you win. Well, when you do, you tackle the economic problems of the country. As you try to do that you will learn one thing: It is a lot harder to govern than to be governed. Then you can make faces!

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Gloucester, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

[Translation]

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask my hon. friend a question on a comment he made earlier. As we were dealing with food and its definition, I was somewhat surprised when I heard him refer to millionaires and state that he would tax all kinds of food. Am I to understand that he feels the people who are paying $10 plus the 7 per cent tax to eat in Quebec establishments such as St. Hubert B-B-Q—he mentioned it specifically—are millionaires? I suggest that people see food as something all human beings eat. Sometimes they have to buy something in a store or eat in a St. Hubert B-B-Q because most working men and women often do not have time to go back home every day for lunch or dinner. I was surprised that the Hon. Member could not understand our concern about the way the government is planning to levy a tax on nearly 40 per cent of all the food people will eat in Canadian restaurants, snackbars, cafeterias, and so on. Just the same, I find it surprising that the hon. member should not consider this important for low and middle income people who have to eat in these restaurants and who will have to pay this new tax from now on.

Here is my question, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member often refers to free trade. He knows how to associate the AIDS issue with free trade, and I congragulate him, for he has a most interesting turn of phrase. This being said, he suggested that all the support and the free trade discussions had made it possible for Premier Bourassa—

Mrs. Bourgault: Give him a break! Let him reply!

Mr. Young: Madam, you may have your turn if you do not insist on closure.

Now, the hon. member dealt with free trade. Are we to understand that you do not at all agree with Premier Bourassa and his Minister of Finance (Mr. Lévesque) who oppose the GST? Are you suggesting that they do not understand, like all the other Canadian Premiers?

Mr. Hudon: I will check the blues to see what I said about food. I did not mean to downplay the situation. I don't think I said that only rich people go to the restaurant, but I will check the blues. That is not at all what I meant.

Mr. Young: You asked what food was.

Mr. Hudon: No, no, you're the one who asked the definition of food. That is what you asked a few moments ago.

As for the other comment, it is not I who mixed AIDS with free trade, it is Monique Bégin.

An hon. member: Yes, it is Monique Bégin.

Mr. Hudon: Don't you remember, during the election campaign, when all the scare tactics were coming out and Monique Bégin was saying: You know, with free trade—It is well known. Anyway, in Quebec, everybody knows that it is Monique Bégin who made that kind of comments.

On the third point concerning Mr. Bourassa, it is true. We tried to harmonize our tax with the provincial tax. Provinces are not particularly interested in a harmonized tax because they would lose the tax on the tax. We would like to have a harmonized tax with each province and to have only one system. I am sure that the day provinces accept our offer, they will be able to sit down and negotiate.

I would like to say to my colleague that some statements are political. Of course, Mr. Speaker, when we brought forward the goods and services tax proposal, in the middle of the election campaign in Quebec, it was not very popular. Any premier will jump on that and say that it is not popular. The same thing happened when the premier, who is an economist, said that there should be different interest rates in Quebec and in Ontario. I said to him: Listen, apart from the fact that we are in the middle of an election campaign, have you ever seen different interest rates in Quebec and in Ontario?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being seven o'clock the House will now adjourn.

I regret the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville did not have an opportunity to raise a question. He will be the next speaker for the NDP when Bill C-62 comes up in the House again.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity tonight to return to the issue of the goods and services tax. On October 2 I pointed out to the Minister of Finance that the GST discriminates against the residents of the north.

Because the cost of living in the north is the highest in the country, each northerner will pay more of this unfair tax. The public documents released on the GST do not mention the north.

I asked the minister why the north was omitted from the government's technical paper on the goods and service tax proposal. I also asked whether the government had done any background studies on the impact of this tax on the north and, if so, would the minister release these studies to northerners.

The minister replied that the government had done a good deal of work on the impact of the tax on the north and that the impact on the north is about the same as the national average. The minister said that the GST would improve the economic fortunes of the north by about 1.5 per cent. I was not satisfied with that answer.

My office followed up with the minister's office and asked for the studies and information the minister said he had on the impact of the tax on the north. We were told that it would take a little while to put it all together and that it would be sent to us in a very short time. It is now almost four months from the time I asked the question and we do not have those studies yet. Frankly, I do not believe they exist.

At the time I asked my question the finance committee studying the GST proposal had not put the Northwest Territories on its travel itinerary. I urged the committee to include the Northwest Territories in its travel schedule and a lot of pressure from the north was placed on the committee chairman to the same end. Eventually, that committee did go to Yellowknife to hear submissions on the GST, and it got an earful.

In a letter to the finance committee chairman the NWT Minister of Finance outlined the areas where the tax will adversely affect the north and other isolated regions much more than it will in southern Canada. He said:

> The significantly higher costs in the Northwest Territories mean that northerners will pay much more under the goods and services tax than will other Canadians, while the proposed sales tax credit and other announced measures will be insufficient to offset the higher cost resulting from the tax.

It is the view of the government of the Northwest Territories that the GST will make the attainment of their goals of greater independence and self-reliance more difficult.

The brief of the government of the Northwest Territories pointed out that modern industries operating in the north face some disadvantages that are not shared throughout the rest of Canada. Operating costs are very high. Labour costs are very high because it is more difficult to attract skilled workers and because living costs are so much higher in the north. Transportation costs are very high, especially in the smaller communities spread out across the north where all the goods must be flown in or brought out by sea lift.

These high transportation costs affect both the cost of consumer goods and the cost to business of shipping in its inputs and shipping out its production. The benefits to the NWT economy are extremely dubious.

What of the NWT consumer? While the sales tax burden on all Canadians will increase because of the new tax, the burden on NWT residents will increase by substantially more.

In 1985, prices for goods and services, excluding shelter, were on the average 44 per cent higher in the Northwest Territories than in southern Canada. With the GST, residents of the Northwest Territories will pay much more than other Canadians because prices are much higher to begin with.

The government of the Northwest Territories has calculated that if the current price differential still exists in 1991—and I predict it will be even greater—northern residents will pay over 40 per cent more in tax than southern residents. If the cost of housing is included the average price difference and tax will probably exceed 50 per cent because of the exceedingly high cost of housing.

Prices in Yellowknife are about 33 per cent higher than in Edmonton. But prices in some isolated communities, such as Grise Fjord on Ellesmere Island or Pelly Bay can average as much as 100 per cent more than in southern Canada.

It is the lower-income residents of the north who will feel the burden most. The sales tax credit will be much lower in real terms in the north and will not be high enough to compensate northern residents for the increased tax. Also, northern residents will begin to lose the tax credit at much lower levels of real income. For example, an employee in the NWT has to earn 50 per cent more on average to maintain a similar purchasing power to an individual living in southern Canada. An individual in the NWT earning $30,000 per year might have a similar real purchasing power to an individual earning $20,000 in the south, but the southern residents will receive more of a benefit than the northern residents under the sales tax credit.

A further blow particularly affecting residents of the eastern Arctic and Baffin Island are Canada Post's new freight rates on food mail. These rate increases are averaging 20 to 25 per cent and will put some food out of reach for many families. A dozen eggs now costs $4.20. A litre of milk costs $4.50. These are the prices being paid now. These prices do not reflect what might happen to the cost of transportation under the GST.

The GST will apply to air fares and transportation. In my constituency there are no roads. Air transportation is a necessity. All our goods, food, clothing, hardware, and construction materials must be flown in, or they are brought in on sea lift in the summer months when the ocean waters are free of ice.

Under the GST fuel and electricity are going to be taxed. This will be a real additional hardship on northerners, where the necessities cost much more and where the consumption is much higher because of the climate.

Northern businesses will face administration costs. In the NWT businesses do not now have any sales tax to administer and accounting services are not available in many small northern communities.

The government has not considered how much harder this tax will hit northern residents; or, if it has, it has decided that it does not care.

When will the government recognize that the boundaries of Canada extend far beyond Quebec and Ontario?

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed by what my hon. colleague had to say. Right now, Canadian residents, whether they be northerners, southerners, easterners or westerners, all pay a 13.5 per cent federal sales tax.

And here was my hon. colleague talking about milk. We know that there is at present a 13.5 per cent hidden tax in the production of milk in Canada. Even on the carton itself and on the print on the carton, there is a 13.5 per cent hidden tax that Canadians don't know about but still pay. What we propose is a visible 7 per cent tax on all goods, except on what my hon. colleague was talking about, that is food, which includes milk. Since the GST does not apply to milk, milk will cost less than it does right now with the 13.5 per cent hidden tax. We should not forget that.

On the other side, when we talk about the northern part of the country, we talk about mining, and about production. The 7 per cent tax is a consumption tax, it is not a manufacturers' tax or a production tax. So, in the long term, northerners will come to see that change of target as an advantage. In the long run, they will profit from that tax, and I'm happy for them.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the current 13.5 per cent federal sales tax, instead of equally helping all areas across the country, is in fact putting some of the regions, including the North, at a disadvantage, because, as you know, the system is 65 years old. It is outdated and needs to be changed. The new tax system will allow us to help all of Canada, and specially the remote areas, more than we can now with the current federal sales tax.

Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. colleague would do well to examine the question in its entirety, although I know he has a special interest in the well-being of northerners. He would do well to put aside his partisanship, and to look at the real benefits the GST has in store for the people he represents and wishes to represent.

COMINCO

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, on January 24, I asked a question in the House concerning the shutdown of Cominco's Sullivan Mine in Kimberley, British Columbia.

The answer I received from the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion did not only reflect the minister's lack of knowledge of the case, but it was an insult to the people of Kimberley and to the workers who have dedicated their lives to this work in this community. I would like to review the answer given by the minister and bring some information to his attention so he will not embarrass himself in the House when confronted with a similar situation in the future.

The minister in his response on January 24 implied that the Sullivan Mine had run out of ore. For the minister's information the Sullivan Mine has at least 20 million tonnes of productive ore in the ground. This represents a minimum of 10 years of operation. This fact is acknowledged by all people familiar with the mine, including the company.

The company earned a a profit of over $9 million last year in the operation of that mine alone. Why did the minister's answer not acknowledge this fact? The people of Kimberley do not need misinformation such as this to cloud the fight for their community.

The minister also avoided the whole issue of the $79 million invested in Cominco by the federal government through the FBDB. When the government decided to invest the funds to upgrade Cominco's Trail smelter, it was with the clear understanding that the investment would secure employment at the Sullivan Mine well into the 1990s.

It also stated that it would help ensure the employment of 6,000 people in southeastern British Columbia. One and a half years later, Cominco announces that its operations at Sullivan Mine will be shutting down on two weeks' notice. That short a notice and that drastic a measure is not acceptable to the people of Kimberley.

At the same time we find out that the $79 million had no strings attached. I would like to tell the government that it cannot have it both ways. It cannot talk about total free enterprise and then bail out its corporate friends when the system breaks down while at the same time leaving the miners in the town of Kimberley with no assistance.

We recently learned that some disciplinary action may be forthcoming within the FBDB as a result of loans given to strip clubs. I would like to suggest to the minister that handing over $79 million to a hugely profitable company with no strings attached may constitute a more serious problem than the strip club loans.

We have a situation wherein a whole community is decimated overnight. A number of serious questions were raised concerning the crisis and we have a minister responding to them with inaccurate information, at least as far as those questions he decided to respond to were concerned.

I want to tell the minister on behalf of the people of Kimberley that we expect more from a minister of this government than a recital of the company line.

Will the minister undertake today to order a full investigation of the reasons for the shutdown at the Cominco mine, including allegations of union busting by the company, the transfer of over 800 jobs from Canada to the U.S. and the role of the American zinc, copper and lead lobby in the free trade negotiations?

Will the minister also tell the Canadian people that decent wages, environmental standards and health and safety regulations will not be seen as a liability in Canada by his government?

Finally, I would like to ask the minister what plans his government has to assist the community of Kimberley. If this government can spend $79 million helping one of the most profitable corporations in Canada, then surely there is some money available to assist the people of Kimberley.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, on January 31, 1990, Cominco shut down its lead and zinc mine for an indefinite period. As a result, over 700 workers in and around Kimberley have been laid-off.

Cominco had been operating this mine for decades to supply its smelters in Trail, B.C., with zinc and lead. But the company also sold a lot of concentrates in Asia, mainly in Japan.

Contrary to what my colleague said, the Minister never suggested there was no ore left. In fact, the deposit probably won't be exhausted for many more years. What the Minister meant was that it is becoming increasingly expensive to operate this mine at a greater depth and, in fact, the company has told us that operating and equipment costs are much higher for much lower quality ores.

In general, it must be pointed out that the price of zinc on the London stock exchange has dropped from 75 to 58 cents. In addition, the amount of silver found in the ore is getting increasingly smaller. The bottom line is that it is no longer economic to operate the mine.

In fact, the mining industry has lost $2 million a month in November and December 1989. You have indicated 9 millions for last year. In fact, if the activities were to be maintained after January 1990, losses would be of $3 million a month or some $35 million for this year.

Obviously, if prices go up again, the company could start its activities over again, and the workers' collective agreement states that the workers who have been laid off must be the first to be called back to work for 18 months.

As we have said, the federal government, through our department, is committed in the Trail Founderies with $79 million worth of stocks in a project totalling $275 million. In fact, that project is supposed to start this month. However, the proposed closure of the Sullivan mine will not harm Trail, although a much larger proportion of concentrates comes from the Sullivan Mine, because Cominco can obtain the concentrates from many other sources. More and more, the main source of the company will be the Red Dog mine in Alaska which opened in November 1989. It will soon become one of the least expensive mines to run in the world.

According to metal investment analysts, a greater number of companies mining base metals are tightening their belts by reducing production and prospection, now that metal prices are decreasing. The prices of aluminum, zinc, copper and nickel have been declining in the last few weeks.

Mining companies have not forgotten the depressed markets of the early '80s and the huge losses that resulted, so they move quickly to reduce the supply rather than wait until the situation worsens. However, most mining companies had trimmed the fat during the last economic cycle and they should, as a whole, keep lay-offs to a minimum.

As we already said, the government cares for the workers and it will take every possible action to help them.

In the present situation, operation of the mine cannot continue, because prices are too low, should they go up however, the mine might reopen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.20 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that I have an application for a question of privilege. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to your attention a situation which I suggest may be yet another contempt of the House on the part of the Department of Finance. On September 25, the right hon. Leader of the Official Opposition presented to you his view that a national advertising program explaining the goods and services tax in full-page newspaper ads was contemptuous of the House's authority and prejudiced the proceedings of House committees.

Some weeks later, Mr. Speaker, you returned to the House. While you did not find a prima facie case of contempt you did express serious reservations about the advertising campaign. You told the House of Commons and the people of Canada that the contents of the advertisement gave you difficulty. You said that the content was obviously drafted in a cavalier manner and that there was an element of confidence, if not of boldness.

However, you accepted the word of the Ministers of Justice and of Finance that the intent of the ad was to inform Canadians and not to diminish the dignity or authority of the House of Commons and the Parliament of Canada. We left the issue with some confidence that it would not be repeated. After all, you summed up your ruling with the following cautionary remark:

> I want the House to understand very clearly that if your Speaker ever has to consider a situation like this again, the Chair will not be as generous. This is a case which, in my opinion, should never recur. I expect the Department of Finance and other departments to study this ruling carefully and remind everyone within the Public Service that we are a parliamentary democracy, not a so-called executive democracy, not a so-called administrative democracy.

This morning, I read, as I am sure did all other members, that the Department of Finance is continuing to advertise the goods and services tax. While it is not using the print or broadcast media, it is exploiting a very effective advertising tool, namely, direct mail.

We learned from a report by Alan Freeman in The Globe and Mail today, that the finance department has mailed out 1,855,000 copies of a 20-page brochure; 1.4 million English copies; 375,000 French copies, and 80,000 bilingual copies.

The brochure claims that the goods and services tax will result in lowering operating costs to small business, an improved cash flow, a more competitive edge, and so on. These are debatable claims. We have heard from various organizations that represent the small business sector, as a matter of fact that speak for tens of thousands of people operating small businesses, that exactly the opposite will occur. So as I say, Mr. Speaker, what one person believes is a fact would be questioned by someone else.

Again finance department officials are claiming that this is not advertising but is simply factual material intended to inform the public. I find this, as I am sure others do, very reminiscent of the situation last fall. The Department of Finance is employing a communications strategy in advance of a House of Commons decision. After all, today we will likely only be completing second reading of the goods and services legislation.

Such a campaign can only be prejudicial to the work of the House and of the committee which will be charged with amending the GST bill, should it receive second reading later today.

Of greatest concern is that this time the Department of Finance employed this campaign after you, Mr. Speaker, had issued your warning to them. I ask you to consider what precedent will be set if a prima facie case of contempt is not found in this instance. What will it take to convince those who continue to act in defiance in Parliament that indeed the House of Commons does have an authority which must be protected?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, if you find that there is a prima facie case of contempt in this instance I would, of course, be prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice in reply.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have a few short points to make on my friend's point of order. I am amazed to find, once again, that the New Democratic Party objects to the Canadian people being informed. We on this side always thought that it was the job of governments and of Parliament to inform people. The NDP seems to operate on the theory that if you keep people in the dark and cover them up they will not create any problems.

I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker. The essence of your ruling, as I understand it, was that in the advertisement in question back in the fall there was an inference that the goods and services tax had become law. We took to heart the ruling which the Chair made. I can assure the Chair that all advertisements and all informational material has been prepared with that ruling in mind, and there is no intention of misinforming the Canadian people. Rather we intend to inform Canadians with as much information as possible.

I found when I was in my riding over Christmas that that was what people wanted. They want to know how we are going to implement this tax; how do barbers implement it, how do farmers implement it, how do business people implement this new tax. There is an understanding out there that the tax must happen in order to improve our competitive ability.

I hear my friends in the Liberal Party agree. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I am content that you will find that all information produced by the Ministry of Finance is in order and is in keeping with your previous ruling.

I wish, while I am on my feet, to respond to my hon. member's comments vis–a–vis debate. I am pleased to welcome the New Democratic Party to the House of Commons for debate rather than delay. We have a litany which is prepared and will go forward from my office advising the people of exactly the delaying tactics of the New Democratic Party. I am joined by my colleagues in the Liberal Party in welcoming the New Democratic Party to a forum for debate rather than delay.

Under the circumstances of this refreshing new attitude on behalf of the New Democratic Party I want to advise the House that, in view of this change of heart on behalf of the New Democrats, the government has no intention of delaying debate. The government will call Bill C–62 today. The government will not invoke closure today. There will be no need for any further points of order on whether the notice given yesterday was in order. We have a very routine Routine Proceedings as far as the government is concerned. We welcome and enjoin the New Democratic Party to participate in debate.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege that has been raised. I know hon. members opposite do not like to hear these words. They are embarrassed about the booklets they are distributing about the country on this goods and services tax, and with good reason.

I must say at the outset that I am delighted to receive support from the New Democratic Party for our leader's initiative taken last September on this important issue. We know that the privileges of Parliament are paramount because we in this party take the view that those privileges represent the privileges of the people who elected us to represent them here, and trampling on these privileges by this government has become quite notorious in the last few years. Frankly, the books that have been published recently, I am sure, are a continuation of the same kind of exercise.

I am delighted to hear the Minister of Justice say that the booklets have been prepared in accordance with Your Honour's ruling. However, I think the point raised by the hon. member for Kamloops is a valid one. While these booklets may, on their face, appear to comply with Your Honour's ruling in that they may state that the bill introducing the goods and services tax is currently before Parliament, I want to stress that the booklets are not just factual booklets, but contain information. And more than that, they contain opinion, the government's opinion that this tax is a great thing for people.

The government is using the booklets, not as an advertisement procedure for setting the facts before the people of Canada but for a self-serving justification for the introduction of Bill C-62 in this House. It is an improper use of public funds. It is an improper use of the government's advertising capacity and it constitutes a breach of the privileges of this House because hon. members on this side of the House are not given the opportunity to answer the nonsense published in these books.

I have not seen one of the books. They have not been distributed to us yet that I am aware of, but I understand—now the chief government whip is waving a copy.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could assist the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I have seen one of the books. I would not want him to feel that he could not continue his argument just because he has not seen one.

Mr. Milliken: Your Honour, I do not feel that way at all because I read the press release that dealt with the issue of the books and I could tell from the press release that there was more to those books than met the eye.

What is in those books is opinion. The government has put forward its opinions and its weak justification for this tax, and I suggest that that is an improper use of funds. It is an abuse of the privileges of this House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has put forward a point of privilege, not a point of order, and it refers to certain publications which are now in the public domain, as the hon. member for Kamloops said, by direct mailing referring to the legislation which is in front of the House and its consequences.

In view of the fact that the Chair was required to make a ruling on this matter some months ago, I will review very carefully the argument made by the hon. member for Kamloops, the response by the Minister of Justice and other members.

I want to assure members that I have the point and there is no particular necessity to engage in any further argument. The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan seeks the floor and given his stature and experience in the House I will, of course, hear him briefly.

• (1120)

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to be very brief and to add to the argument of my colleague.

It should be pointed out that at the time when you made your initial ruling last fall, the information that had been disseminated talked about a 9 per cent goods and services tax. As we know, the legislation before us is for a 7 per cent tax, clearly an indication that things can change and that factual information may vary from time to time. I would ask Your Honour to take that into consideration.

Just as an aside, you might note that the amount being spent for the small business mail-out, $1.3 million, is almost identical to the amount to be cut from members' householders through the cut-backs by the government of funding to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. The hon. member for Mackenzie is rising. He may have something to add. I will hear him briefly.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker.

I note in the government House leader's remarks that he says that the purpose of the 20-page document is to advise taxpayers, and small business people in particular, how to implement the tax. I think that this comes to the very root and nub of the argument that has been presented by my friend from Kamloops. It assumes that this House will make no amendments to the proposed tax, it assumes that Parliament has no role to play in tax legislation, something that is supposed to have been the role of Parliament since, at least, 1215.

I think this is very much a contempt of Parliament. I think what we have here is advocacy by the Conservative Party. It is not the law of the land and until it becomes the law of the land, the government cannot legitimately tell people how to carry out a tax that still is not even a tax.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member for Kamloops for raising the matter, and other members for their interventions. As I said, I shall consider the matter and report back to the House as soon as possible.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

SECURITY INTELLIGENCE REVIEW COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I would like to table, in both officials languages, the Security Intelligence Review Committee's report to the Solicitor General of Canada on the Innu interview and the native extremism investigation.

Often at this time, I also say that I have a motion. But at this time, because we understand the New Democratic Party wants to debate the goods and services tax, I have no further motions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

PRESENTATION OF THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 108(2), the Standing Committee on External Affairs has conducted an examination of the ramifications of Canada joining the Organization of American States, and I am pleased to present the third report of the committee, in both official languages, thereon.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Before we move through the daily routine of business, because of the high interest rate policy of the government and the fact that interest rates now appear to be increasing, our intention would be to move a motion of concurrence. I believe that ought to be done under motions. If that is the case we certainly would like to move that.

Mr. Speaker: I would just like to ask the hon. member to be patient while I consider this.

FINANCE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville) moved:

That the first report of the Standing Committee on Finance presented to the House on Thursday, June 22, 1989, be concurred in.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, to consider this motion at this time would disrupt the House in terms of its willingness to debate the GST.

What I am wondering is whether that requires some reversion. Had we passed the point at which this motion was in order and, if so, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you the NDP would not have the unanimous consent of the House for any kind of reversion.

Mr. Speaker: I take the position that we have not proceeded with petitions. I had not recognized any member. It was made clear to me that the hon. member wished to bring to the attention of the House that they wanted to move a motion of concurrence. I was not into petitions.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order just to clarify that point. I realize that we would not have gotten the unanimous consent to proceed.

To clarify what seems to be a misconception, it is not our intention to co-operate with the government. I think the Minister of Justice and the government House leader somehow conveyed that impression. I just want to make it perfectly clear that in no way do we plan to co-operate with this government as long as it is attempting to ram and jam the goods and services tax through the House of Commons.

Because of the high interest rate of the government and because of the concern we have of the impact this is going to have on consumers, and particularly small businesses in the country, we want to move concurrence in this report which asks, of course, the government to reconsider this silly high interest rate policy.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not think our House leader felt that the NDP were co-operating with the government on the GST. That is not a message that would sit very well with the Canadian people. I think it is quite clear that they are not.

What we did feel was that we were getting a lot of rhetoric from the New Democratic Party, through the press primarily, about their willingness to debate the GST any time, any place, anywhere. We thought maybe it was time to have a demonstration of whether the NDP keeps their word or not. It is clear from the tactics of the last five minutes that they have no intention of debating the GST. They simply intend to waste the money, millions of dollars, of non-debate on the GST. Their only strategy is not to debate it. They do not want the Canadian people to find out what it says because Canadians are going to like it when they find out what it is about.

The only protection they have is to stifle debate in this chamber, try to keep Canadians misinformed or uninformed on the GST. We would like debate and if we have to, at a later date, move closure to get that debate, we will be prepared to do that.

Mr. Gauthier: That last sentence of the government whip has got to be something else. "Canadians will like the GST." It is the most regressive, hidden tax, the biggest tax grab ever taken out of Canadian pockets in the history of this country and he is saying to us that Canadians will like it. I think the member should go back to his riding and console those people because I am sure they will not like it.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I thought you had proceeded to petitions. If we are still on motions, first, I would like to know, is it in order for a motion to be moved at this time? Because I have been restraining my members in the interest of getting debate, asking them not to move motions because I know the tricks and everyone in the House knows what is going to happen. The NDP, if you recognize them, will get a 20-minute speech on finance matters. Then the government will move to Orders of the Day and that is it.

I lose again my request for an emergency debate today. Our members are upset because I have asked them to hold back. I have members in my caucus who would like to move concurrence motions in many of these so-called reports of committees. I would like to see some co-operation in this House, not this kind of funny game.

• (1130)

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I had my headpiece on and I clearly heard the Speaker say, "Petitions". I stood up because I have two petitions to present. I have been denied the right to table any petitions for two weeks. Mr. Speaker, you did call the hon. member for Kamloops. I thought you were calling him because he had petitions and that is why I sat still. But the Speaker called petitions. I stood up to table petitions. I would like a ruling on what stage of the proceedings we are at.

Mr. Speaker: I thought I had made the ruling. I was informed by the hon. member for Kamloops that he wished to put forward a motion. When he stood I recognized him. As far as I am concerned we were not in petitions. I know the hon. member has petitions to present, so do other members. Perhaps we will get to that, but that is my ruling.

I know that the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park has important petitions to speak to. I hope that he will be able to do that soon. All hon. members know that if, for whatever reason, they cannot speak to them they can be presented to the Table, but I understand the reasons for wanting to speak to them and I hope that can be met shortly.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I want to explain, first to my hon. friend from Parkdale—High Park, that as we were moving through Routine Proceedings I had approached the Chair and, about the same time he was about to move on beyond motions, indicated that it was our intention to put a motion in advance of a move to petitions.

I understand his dilemma. It is a dilemma that we all face. Perhaps I should remind my hon. friend the government whip that if he looks at the history of this House that it was the government that moved dilatory motions on four of the five days of debate. So, in a sense, in terms of who is playing around with the rules of the House, he should keep that in mind.

I have two quick points. We are interested in debating the goods and services tax with the people of Canada in the regions and that is why we challenged the front benches of the Conservative Party to debate this in Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland and so on, but so far we have been unable to arrange, I think with one exception, any debates.

I am prepared, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, to permit the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier to put his request for an emergency debate today. I am not certain what it is, but just having faith that whatever issue my hon. colleague would want to put before the Chair in terms of a request for an emergency debate would be a serious one, I am prepared to offer, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, our unanimous consent to allow him to be able to put that at this point.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if the NDP are saying that they are seeking unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the motion and if they are further saying that they have no intention of any further dilatory tactics for the balance of today, then the government would be prepared to give the unanimous consent for the withdrawal of the motion.

But if we are simply trading one dilatory tactic for another and then we are going to follow with another, if they are still on the path of trying to stifle debate in this chamber about the GST then, of course, there is no way that the government will give unanimous consent for them to withdraw their motion. This is a chamber for free and open debate.

Freedom of speech is the most fundamental principle governing this place and they are attempting to cut off debate. They have been doing it since we came back in January on every conceivable occasion in every conceivable way. We take our responsibilities seriously. If they do not want debate tell us clearly, do not run to the media and say they want it when in fact their behaviour in this chamber says they do not. If they want debate we will have debate, if they do not want debate tell us and we will move closure. We will get to that stage of proceedings where debate will occur because it is under closure. If that is the only way to get debate in this chamber, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to act in that manner.

Mr. Speaker: This is going beyond a point of order into debate about other matters. I have moved the first report of the Standing Committee on Finance be concurred in. I will hear the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say that I think this House should agree and concur in the report of the finance committee which was issued on June 22 last year. The reason I say that is because it was one of those rare occasions when all three political parties, the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party were in accord. The interest rates at that time, mainly back last April, May and June, were too high, they were hurting this country and the Governor of the Bank of Canada, John Crow, should be doing whatever was possible to reduce interest rates.

That was last June, about eight months ago. The bank rate is even higher today than it was at the time we were considering its impact on monetary policy in this country. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you as a westerner who depends on exports of your commodities from Alberta like we do from Saskatchewan, was shocked last Thursday when the Bank of Canada once again raised the bank rate by 30 basis points to 12.59 per cent. That is at the highest level since about April last year. We are right back in the position now where we were eight or nine months ago, perhaps even a bit higher in terms of the bank rate.

I felt I had to do this today for a couple of reasons. First of all, I am shocked at what the government whip said when he talked about a waste of money. If there is any debate that is important in this country now it is the high interest rate policy of the Bank of Canada, which is wasting a lot of money in terms of interest and the national debt, and wasting a lot of money in terms of what ordinary Canadians pay on their bank loans, what small business people pay on their loans, farmers and fishermen, consumers right across the board.

Talk about wasting money. That is an issue Parliament should be dealing with and dealing with promptly, particularly when all three political parties on the finance committee are saying the same thing. A tight money policy by the Bank of Canada, a tight money policy by the Minister of Finance is hurting this country. It is sending this country into a recession. It is creating unemployment. Because of that, we should be moving concurrence in this particular motion.

I also want to make a comment about the GST and high interest rate policy and why I moved this motion today. The high interest rate policy is extremely relevant to the GST debate. One reason why the government is saying: "In this country we need to raise more money through the goods and service tax to help pay off the national debt". Well, one reason for the deficit being a problem and for the national debt being a problem in Canada, is that we have a high interest rate policy that is literally adding billions of dollars per year to the deficit in Canada.

I want to go back to April 26 of last year when the Minister of Finance made his very rushed budget appearance and divulged his budget to the country in the national press theatre after the leak. He said at that time that he fully anticipated that short-term interest rates in this country would drop to around 10 per cent by the time of his next budget in the spring of 1990. Well, that has not happened. Instead, interest rates have continued to stay high. They are about 2 per cent higher than the Minister of Finance forecast.

If you add two points to the bank rate in this country and you sustain that over a year, that will add approximately $3.2 billion or $3.5 billion to the deficit alone because of the national debt. Because of the high interest policy in this country this government is going to have to raise money in another way. They do that in part by a goods and service tax that puts a tax on everything from coffins to diapers for kids, to Big Macs, to haircuts, to taxis and all kinds of services that were never taxed in this country before.

The debate this morning is very relevant. I think this House should move in concert and concur in the finance committee report and say it is about time that John Crow come down out of his ivory tower and look at the reality, that high interest rates in this country are hurting the Government of Canada and the population of this country. They are slowing down the economy and creating unemployment. So the debate this morning is extremely relevant.

When this government came to power about five years ago in the fall of 1984 the national debt for the first time in 118 years in this country's history had reached around $160 billion.

Mr. Belsher: How much does it cost to carry it?

Mr. Nystrom: That debt is expensive to carry. In fact, that debt has more than doubled. By the end of this year estimates are that the national deficit in this country will be hitting around double that, that is to say around $380 billion. Here is a government which in five short years has doubled the national debt from $160 billion to some $380 billion. That is a lot of money.

Mr. Belsher: How much does it cost to carry that? You haven't answered the question.

Mr. Nystrom: The answer is around $45 billion this year. That is $45 billion this year because of the national debt.

The debate this morning is extremely relevant I suggest to my friend in the Conservative party. If it cost $45 billion to carry the national debt this year, then surely the House should spend a few hours today concurring in the finance committee report. That committee was chaired by the member for Mississauga, a committee that has eight members of the Conservative party on it. They have said to John Crow: "Look, enough is enough. Roll back the bank rate in this country so we can save money for the Government of Canada as well as save money for a lot of ordinary citizens from one part of this country to the other".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the national debt is now nearly $380 billion. In the five years since the Conservative Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) was elected in 1984, the national debt has doubled. Five years ago, the national debt was $160 billion.

By the end of 1990, when it reaches $380 billions, the national debt will have more than doubled.

Mr. Speaker, we now have a report by the Finance Committee in which all three political parties said: enough is enough. Mr. Crow, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, no longer has any excuse for a monetary policy that has maintained interest rates in this country at excessively high levels.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is certainly too high. If we look across the border to the United States we find that the Federal Reserve in that country has kept the American bank rate at about 400 bases points lower than we have in this country. That is an historic high in terms of the difference between the United States and Canada. The bank rate in that country is about 4 per cent lower than here in Canada.

Why do we have this historic high? It is almost without precedent that the bank rate in this country is about 4 per cent higher than the bank rate in the United States.

Enough is enough. The Minister of Finance should intervene and say to the Governor of the Bank of Canada that enough is enough, the bank rate is hurting the government and putting people out of jobs. It is hurting farmers across this country as well. The bank rate must come down not by one point but by at least two points in the next few weeks to put our finances in order.

Why don't we as Canadians say: "What we need is a made-in-Canada interest rate policy"? Why don't we have that independence to assert ourselves and have a made-in-Canada interest rate policy that will help this country in terms of our productivity, in terms of our ordinary citizens from coast to coast?

The chairman of the finance committee committee disagrees very strongly with the Minister of Finance. Some of the Conservative members of the finance committee disagree with the Minister of Finance. My friend from Calgary disagrees with the Minister of Finance. He stands very strongly behind the chairman of the finance committee. The member from Calgary is saying: "Enough is enough, let us bring down the bank rate".

Why does this House not speak independently, strongly and clearly for once and say to the Minister of Finance: "Go and talk to John Crow. Take John Crow out of his ivory tower. Show him the real world. Show him how he is hurting this country with a tight money policy that drives up the cost of living for ordinary Canadians and throws people out of work"?

The real interest rate in this country is the difference between the interest rates and the cost of living. Today, it is running at the same levels that we saw in the recession of 1981-1982. We remember that. We have had members across the way talking about those Liberal days when the bank rate was extremely high, at around 17 per cent or 18 per cent, and the cost of living was running at about 12 per cent or 13 per cent. They are talking about how interest rates really hurt the people at that time. Of course that is true. But the difference between the bank rate and the cost of living at that time was no greater than it is today. The real interest rate today is at the same level as it was in the recession of 1981-1982.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the time for action is now. The time to bring down the bank rate is now.

I want to go into some other reasons why that should be done. We have in this country now, if I can be blunt with the House in terms of where I come from, a farm debt crisis like we have not seen for a long time. I have talked to members in the Conservative party from the prairies over the last few days who are getting the same feedback and seeing the same reality in their ridings as we see in ours. It is that many farmers are being foreclosed upon by banks, credit unions and other financial institutions because farm income now is at a level that is much too low.

In fact, there are some municipalities in Saskatchewan where 48 per cent or more of the farmers in those municipalities have received foreclosure notices from banks or other financial institutions. One of the reasons why that is happening is that interest rates in this country are much too high and farmers simply cannot afford to pay the interest, let alone the principal, on the debts that they have incurred.

Surely to goodness, Mr. Speaker, this Parliament, if there is any relevancy at all to this place, should be saying; "We agree with the finance committee, the bank rate is too high. Mr. Crow, bring it down and bring it down now".

Interest rates are not the only reasons why farmers are in trouble. Price inputs are too high. The GST which is coming up will complicate matters for farmers in terms of the red tape and the bureaucracy they have to go through. Farm incomes are too low. What a farmer gets for a bushel of wheat today is not nearly as high in real dollars as what a farmer got back in the 1920s, the 1940s and the 1950s.

One reason for all this is that the bank rate is too high. One way of helping farmers in this country is by reducing the bank rate and forcing the chartered banks, the credit unions and the trust companies to reduce their rates as well. Of course the Farm Credit Corporation, which is run by the federal government, must also do the same.

There is also another sector, Mr. Speaker. There are many small businesses in this country that now have a problem with interest rates.

Three weeks ago, I was talking to a businessman in Yorkton, in my riding. He told me that sales were doing very well this year, but profits were down from last year. The only reason why profits were down compared to last year's was that now, interest rates were too high. Although he sells a lot in his business and, if I remember correctly, sales were better than they were last year, profits are down because interest rates are too high. This is a big problem for small businesses, for farmers and for practically everyone in this country.

[English]

I do not see why this House does not take the proper path and say yes to the chairman and the report of the finance committee of June 22, but say no to John Crow, tell him "interest rates are too high and the government will bring them down now". I suggest that members of the Conservative party get up and say the same thing. The hon. member from Calgary, the hon. member from Mississauga, the hon. member for Cambridge and others are on the finance committee. They and others supported that report last June. It is about time they got up here in the House and Commons and said: "Look, what we need now is action to bring down the interest rates in this country".

• (1150)

In two days, on Thursday, there will be another setting of the bank rate by the Governor of the Bank of Canada based on treasury bills and other things that are currently happening over there at the time we speak. It would not surprise me if the bank rate once again either remains about the same or creeps up a little bit. That again is going to be very difficult for the Canadian economy.

The bank rate is something that I said affects small business. It affects the farmers in this country. It affects people who want to build a house, expand their enterprise or their farm because mortgage rates and other rates remain very high. I suppose most of all it affects the poorer in this country because those people at the bottom of the economic scale are those who eventually will have to pay the greatest penalty when there is a tight money policy.

Why in a country that is so rich do the poor always have to pay? Why in a country that is so rich do the poor regions always have to pay?

We know the problems in Newfoundland right now. We know the problems in Atlantic Canada now. We know the problems in northern Canada and parts of western Canada. When I say northern Canada I include northern Ontario and northern Quebec. We know that the policy of the Minister of Finance and the policy of the Governor of the Bank of Canada is going to hit those regions of our country hardest. It will grind the economies of the impoverished parts of our country to an even slower and slower pace than they already are today.

Should we as a Parliament tolerate that? I think when Mr. Crow decides what the bank rate should be he climbs up on top of the CN Tower in Toronto and takes a look around. That is what he does. What he sees is a fair amount of affluence in Metropolitan Toronto.

One of the members across the way said maybe he should take a real jump into reality and get off that CN Tower. I agree.

I wonder if John Crow has visited Newfoundland in the last two or three years. I wonder if John Crow has ever paid a visit to rural Saskatchewan to see how the farmers in rural Saskatchewan are doing?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if John Crow went to Gaspé, in the province of Quebec, he would know, in fact he must know the unemployment rate there is around 14, 15, 16 or 17 per cent. I wonder whether he went there, Mr. Speaker. I hope Conservative Members will take the same stand I do and support this motion this morning, a motion that was moved because the Standing Committee on Finance agreed that our present monetary policy is a threat to Canada's future.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I know that you, as an Albertan, will be anxious to jump to your feet and say: "John Crow, you are hurting this country. Michael Wilson, talk to John Crow and let us have in Canada an interest rate policy made in this country that will help ordinary Canadians from one ocean to the other, from one part of this country to the other". We can do it if we have the will. We can do it if we listen to the finance committee. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, you get up on that chair and you throw off your robes and you make a speech with me. I am sure we can persuade the people in this House to agree. Why don't you give it a shot?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of very quick questions to ask the member. Could he explain to the House, if he is so concerned about interest rate policy, why that was not the subject of debate last Thursday on his party's opposition day? Could he explain to the House why the NDP is so afraid of debating the goods and services tax in this chamber?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, there is a very simple answer to that question. Last Thursday, we were hopeful that John Crow would see the light. We did not think that John Crow would really increase the interest rates by 30 bases points. We had to decide at 11 o'clock the day before, which was a Wednesday, what our opposition day should be. We were optimistic that John Crow would see the light. In fact, members across the way were predicting two weeks earlier when the bank rate dropped in this country that perhaps we had turned the corner, perhaps the bank rate would come down. Then, of course, there was the effect on the Canadian dollar which, I suggest, was a good thing. The dollar started to come down a bit. John Crow panicked, the bank rate went up by 15 points two weeks ago and by another 13 bases points last week.

Now we are in a situation where we have no choice but to move concurrence on the finance committee report, led by the Conservative party chairman from Mississauga, supported by all eight members of the Conservative party who sit on that committee, the four Liberals and the two New Democrats. This is a unique occasion where all three parties on the finance committee are in concurrence on something of importance to this country.

I am surprised that the whip of the Conservative party would even ask such a question. He, coming from western Canada, should know the impact of the high interest rate policy in his city in his province of Alberta. He, of all people, who has a little bit of political experience, must know of the unrest in the province of Alberta against this current government. He, of all people, knows that in Alberta his party, despite the fact they won all but one seat in the election a year or so ago, are now running not second, not third, but fourth in the polls in the province of Alberta. He, of all people, who has studied psychology a little bit, must realize that one of the reasons, aside from the GST and the general incompetency of the government, is the high interest rate policy of this government. He, of all people, should realize that, but perhaps I have over-estimated his abilities. If I have, I apologize to him.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the member failed to answer the question of why his party is afraid to debate the GST in this Chamber, and I would really like to know.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I have already said that one of the things that is relevant to the GST is the high interest rate policy. One reason why the Conservative Party wants a goods and services tax on Big Macs and on many foods eaten at restaurants by ordinary people is that they are trying to pay off the national debt. One reason for the national debt is that we have a high interest policy.

I want a full and free debate on the GST, not only in this Chamber, but a full and free debate of the GST across the country. I publicly challenge the government whip to a debate between himself and myself in Calgary. Let us do that in Calgary. Let us go to Calgary and have a public debate on the merits of the GST. If he has any courage, if he is really a representative of Albertans, he will get up and say yes. So I turn the question back to him: Will you accept a debate in Calgary? We will set a time, place and get ourselves a neutral mediator and away we go. Do you agree?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the House that I would be very happy to accept that challenge provided I do not have to wait until his speech writer returns from a strike. Can we do it soon rather than having to wait around for the speech writer to come off strike?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there is another question or comment. The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: I think you can tell from my speeches that I do not use speech writers, Mr. Speaker. We are not allowed to read speeches in the House, as you know. I respect the rules of the House. I could do like some government back-benchers, I guess, and get up and read a long monotonous speech, but I do not know who would write the speech. I do not know of any speech writers who are on strike now.

I am glad that the member for Calgary will accept a debate. Perhaps we can arrange that as soon as possible, the sooner the better. I am sure his constituents will be very glad to hear that. Let us head out to Calgary and find an independent organization to sponsor it and have a good debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Resuming debate with the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, like all Members of this House, I would love to spend the day having a debate on concurrence in the finance committee's report of last June. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I would like nothing more than to see you in full flight, robes off, standing on the chair, as suggested by my hon. friend across the way.

• (1200)

It is very clear that one of the most important things this House should be debating today is the goods and services tax. The debates across this country should start here in this House and we should not carry on as we have been doing.

Therefore, I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division.

POINT OF ORDER

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have given the Chair notice two days in a row that I would like to propose a motion for an emergency debate according to Standing Order 52.

Yesterday and today I have been unable to propose that motion to you for debate. I just wondered if there would be unanimous consent today for me to at least put the motion for you, Mr. Speaker, to decide whether that motion will be debated tonight.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's concern that we did not have a normal Routine Proceedings. Yesterday my hon. friend's leader made a suggestion during Question Period vis-a-vis a motion to debate a very important issue in the country to which I believe my hon. member is referring.

We had an opportunity to review the motion and do some thinking on our own. Last evening on television my hon. friend suggested that he could go along with our motion with the change of one word. We have agreed to change that word. I think we are making progress on entertaining a full debate but we are not there yet. We obviously want to have some time to discuss it with our caucuses.

In the alternative, if the Chair wishes to entertain a motion for an emergency debate, the government would not stand in the way of such a motion. We just want to indicate that we are making progress toward perhaps a full debate in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kamloops on the same point of order.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to indicate very clearly that the matter before us in terms of the motion that is being examined is an appropriate initiative suggested by the leader of the Official Opposition and being responded to now by both the government and the New Democratic Party. Those discussions and deliberations are under way.

I do think the issue that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier wants to bring before the Speaker in terms of making a case for an emergency debate is of sufficient importance that I am prepared to say, on behalf of my party, that we would be prepared to give unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to put his case now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I sort of divine the purport of the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I do not want to get into the substance but, quite frankly, I am not aware of the wording of the motion which I gather is on a very serious, fundamental, substantive subject. As far as I am concerned, not being involved in these House discussions, I am a little leery of giving consent.

I think the House leader for the government was proper in his initial reply to say that he wanted to discuss whatever the suggestion was with caucus members. All the parties are going to meet in caucus tomorrow. If we then know that it is one word changed or three words changed, or whatever the substance of the motion, then obviously, undoubtedly, we will have a debate.

But until this member knows what we are talking about, I refuse to give consent in a vacuum.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Therefore, there is not unanimous consent. Orders of the Day.

The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on a point of order.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I just wanted to very briefly make sure that the House understood what it is that you were asking unanimous consent for. It seems that some members were under the mistaken impression that unanimous consent was being sought for the purposes of introducing a motion.

Unanimous consent was being sought by the member for Ottawa—Vanier for the purpose of reverting to the procedure in Routine Proceedings to introduce to you, Mr. Speaker, a point under Standing Order 52. Perhaps the House was not quite clear on that, and it would assist if the House were reminded. I hope that unanimous consent can then be achieved.

• (1250)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believed that everyone was aware that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has risen twice now in the last couple of days in order to bring his motion under Standing Order 52 for an emergency debate. But I can ask for unanimous consent again. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent. Orders of the Day.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 7569).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville has the floor.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan on a point of order.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, if you will remember, on a previous occasion the Speaker ruled that following the speech of hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt the House did have an opportunity for a 10-minute question and answer period. That decision was rendered after the normal scheduled time for the House to have the opportunity to question the hon. member.

I am wondering, Sir, since the member is in the House, if this is the appropriate time to see whether the House has any questions for the member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, on the understanding that this in no way affects the rotation in which you will call the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Minister of Justice and Government House Leader.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate, on behalf of the government, that the government is always prepared to debate this particular bill. The hon. member who now sought to have questions put to a member because that member is in the House is the same hon. member who participated in the decision in his caucus to move a motion to concur in a motion and thereby delay debate in the House. I think, once and for all, the New Democratic Party should get its position together as to whether it wants to debate this bill or not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, I believe the Speaker at the time did rule that the hon. member for Okanagan–Similkameen–Merritt would have an opportunity for a question and comment period, provided he was in his seat the next time debate on the bill resumed. Debate on the bill did resume yesterday and the hon. member was not in his chair. Therefore, he loses his opportunity and I will now recognize the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville on debate.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on second reading of the bill on the GST. To begin with I want to make an appeal to the government back–benchers across the way to listen to their constituents. We do live in a democracy, and it seems to me that in a democracy you are morally bound to express the points of view of the people who elected you to the House of Commons.

I know that at times you have to go with conscience on what I would call moral issues, and I speak here in terms of capital punishment, abortion, and things of that nature. However, on a fundamental tax bill, I am sure that members across the way would agree that they should, to the best of their ability, reflect what their constituents are saying.

I see that my friend from Edmonton has already jumped to his feet and he wants to say a few words. His conscience is bothering him. Edmontonians, I know, are speaking en masse against the GST and, for reasons such as this, the hon. member is now running fourth in his riding according to polls that have been taken. I am sure that he wants to get up here and speak on behalf of his people.

It is a long time since I have seen such overwhelming opposition to a government measure as we have seen today. I noticed in the Gallup poll about a week ago that 56 per cent of those who voted for the Conservative Party in November of 1988 are now saying no to the GST, and they are saying no in a very loud, clear, efficient and effective way. I think the time has come when members of the Conservative Party, outside of the two or three who are very courageous, should start getting up and expressing what their constituents are saying.

Surely the chambers of commerce must know how this affects business in this country. Surely the Retail Council of Canada must know of what they speak when they say it will add millions of dollars per year of extra administrative costs. Surely the farmers of this country must know what they are saying when they say this will add millions of dollars per year in terms of administrative costs and extra book work. Surely the trade unions must know of what they speak when they say that this will drive up the cost of living and make things more difficult for their people. Surely the low–income groups in this country must know of what they speak when they say that this tax will hit hardest the poor people and the low–income people of this country.

Surely members of the Conservative Party in this House who have some intelligence and experience must know that their constituents are saying, "Speak up loudly and clearly against this tax which will hurt the people of this country". We have many intelligent members across the way.

I look, for example, at my friend from Lethbridge who is a long–time member of the House and the Conservative Party. He is a man who speaks his mind and a man who has great admiration for his Premier in Alberta. He has great admiration for Don Getty and tremendous admiration for Dick Johnston, the Treasurer of that province. I know that before this month is out he is going to join other Alberta MPs and will speak out against the goods and service tax because he wants to reflect Albertans in this House. He has tremendous admiration for that Premier and tremendous admiration for the tradition of his Party and, of course, for his constituents. He also has tremendous fear about what the voters in that riding will do if he does not do that. That is why I expect he will be speaking out loudly and clearly against what the chairman of the finance committee calls the gouge and the screw tax in this country.

I know some members of Parliament from Ontario may not feel as strongly. The member for Cambridge comes from a riding where there are a lot more wealthier Canadians. There are exporters and manufacturers and some of those people are in favour of this tax. But I appeal to my Albertan colleagues in particular to get up and defend their Premier and their constituents and what their own party is calling for.

Surely that is a democracy. They know that this is the single biggest tax grab in the history of this country.

Mr. Oberle: Be truthful.

Mr. Nystrom: The member from British Columbia says, "be truthful". That is what he says. I am talking about the people of this country and that they are saying that this is the single biggest tax grab in the history of this country. Here he is criticizing the people of this country. Every single Premier in this country, including his hero Vander Zalm, is saying no to this grief and suffering tax.

Here is the member from Prince George, whose hero is Premier Vander Zalm. Vander Zalm is saying no and yet he is not falling into line. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, why does the member from Prince George not reflect what his constituents are saying? They are saying no to this tax. They are saying it is the biggest tax grab in the history of this country. They are saying it is a very regressive tax. They say it is going to throw this country into recession. They are saying it is going to be inflationary. They are saying it is going to be tough on ordinary folk and the poor people in this country.

It is about time that the member from Prince George spoke his mind in this House of Commons, put his job as a cabinet minister on the line and defended the interests of his constituents and the interests of the people of British Columbia. Is it any wonder why the Conservative Party across the way, the 22 per cent—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 14 minutes left in his debate plus 10 minutes for questions and comments.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

VIA RAIL

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on January 15 nearly 3,000 VIA workers lost their jobs as a result of the federal government slashing 17 VIA routes across the country.

For the past three weeks, these laid-off workers have been waiting to receive their record of employment, which is a necessity when filing for unemployment insurance. Without this record, workers cannot receive unemployment insurance. Nor can they receive income security, as this is dependent upon the amount received from the UI fund. The legal limit for the provision of a record of employment by the former employer is five calendar days from the interruption of work.

How can these people be expected to look after themselves, much less their dependents, while they are forced to wait for their UI cheques? How can the government allow a Crown corporation to break the law with such blatant disrespect for workers and their families?

VIA has blamed the delay upon Canada Post. This is an unacceptable excuse for the workers and should be unacceptable for the government.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the city of Sault Ste. Marie is under siege. We are called bigots and racists. This debate is about Canadian unity and I ask the media and all politicians to bring the debate to a higher level.

Condemning Canadian citizens does nothing to improve the mood in my community or in the country. There was a demonstration last night in Sault Ste. Marie to protest council's decision. Francophones and others are justifiably offended and justifiably fearful. They are a threat to no one and deserve to be treated with dignity.

Yes, we have problems in our community. Yes, there is divisiveness and, yes, there is tension. Outside interference from whatever source or side at this point is not helpful and will only aggravate the tension. Give us some time and reconciliation will result. Give us some time and tolerance and understanding will prevail. This tolerance will come from dialogue among all parties. I ask you not to judge.

EGYPT

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the murder of at least eight Israeli tourists in Egypt is a reminder of the difficulties of moving beyond hatred and violence toward peace and negotiations.

It is profoundly distressing that terrorists persist in taking innocent lives in the pursuit of destructive political goals. At a time when negotiations between Israel, Egypt and the United States are gathering momentum in the search for a peaceful resolution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, this attack reminds us that there are forces in the region who view peace and negotiations as an obstacle to their goals.

There can be but one response to such an act, that is to intensify and strengthen our support for the peace process. I am sure that all members of this House join me in expressing our condolences to the families of the victims of this senseless attack.

THE LATE WHIPPER BILLY WATSON

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Whipper Billy Watson, a constituent and a friend who died this past Sunday at the age of 74.

Whipper was a professional wrestler who was a good guy, a five-time world champion, a man who took part in 7,000 bouts over 35 years, whose career ended in 1971 after a tragic car accident.

It is outside the ring where his efforts really took effect. For over 30 years he was associated with the Easter Seal society. I think most of us can picture Whipper hoisting Timmy and Tammy, and often both of them, on his broad shoulders every year.

He was also involved with the Canadian Rehabilitation Council, the Ontario Council for the Disabled, the Canadian Paraplegic Association, the Multiple Sclerosis Society and particularly with the York County Hospital where he was the prime mover in raising funds for the therapeutic pool that has been named after him.

Our thoughts are with his wife, his children, and his many friends. Whipper Billy Watson, a great Canadian, will be truly missed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, Regina is the Saskatchewan-Manitoba regional production facility for Switchback. The CBC has recently announced that the children's show, Switchback, has been eliminated as a cost-cutting measure. While I recognize and appreciate the CBC's significant effort in trimming its fat, I do not understand this decision.

We are a country that is as strong as its regions. While regional CBC people were asked for their proposals, I am afraid that the question begged the response given. It seems to me that we have cut the limbs off the tree to nurture the trunk. Switchback represents new limbs. It is inappropriate pruning.

Switchback was quality children's programming that was watched by a third of the viewing audience in Regina and more than half in Saskatoon. Has this year-round program been sacrificed so that CBC can continue to focus coverage on one-time spectaculars?

What other CBC programming is available to this new generation of TV viewers? I hope that this decision is not irreversible and that reconsideration can be given.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, this government has been trying to convince everyone that the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance have found the solution to their own sad record of mismanaging this country's finances.

The goods and services tax is a complex system that is going to confuse Canadians and cause horrendous difficulties for small business people. It is without a doubt a plan to perform the biggest tax grab in Canadian history. All the rhetoric in the world conjured up by this government and its back-benchers will not justify nor clarify this confusing system.

The government has not guaranteed that the 7 per cent rate will not be raised after the tax is implemented.

The Minister of Finance promised the GST would be visible; instead, it is hidden. He promised the GST would be fair to middle and low-income Canadians; it is not. He promised that small businesses would be adequately compensated; they are not.

The GST is the key element in the government's strategy to redesign the Canadian tax system in a way that favours corporations and the rich at the expense of almost everyone else.

REAL ESTATE

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, there has been a dramatic development in the real estate business. "Paul Legault buys the Permanent, the largest MLS real estate brokerage firm in Quebec" headlined an article in the Journal de Montréal on January 11.

Paul Legault, who has headed the Permanent since 1975, is a hard-driving man. He has a keen sense of marketing and innovation. He was the first broker to advertise individual properties on the radio, back in 1976. He also was the first to use video for selling homes and to set up exhibition booths in shopping centres.

Today, he is bringing the Permanent back to Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I knew Paul Legault when he worked on technical surveys for Hydro-Québec at Matagami in the James Bay area in 1967 and on behalf of Quebecers, I wish to congratulate him and all the real estate agents at the Permanent.

MCCARRAN-WALTER ACT

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, glasnost has at last arrived in the land of the free and the home of the brave. The United States of America has repealed the McCarran-Walter Act which had frozen their McCarthy-type immigration restrictions.

Forty years ago my then fiancee, Alice, working in the weiner room at Canada Packers in Montreal, taking skins off the skinless weiners, was elected to represent her local of the CIO packinghouse workers at their international union convention in Minneapolis. Because of that union's previous embarrassments at the U.S. border, her union directed her to get a visa to the U.S.

She went to the U.S. consulate and found that they suspected her of having undesirable political opinions. They asked her questions about her friends, their doings and their ideas. She refused to answer. They told her sweetly: "Any time you want a visa to the U.S. come back and we'll talk some more. Meanwhile, if you are found in the U.S. you can be imprisoned for a year and fined $1,000." I married her anyway.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Heap: Now when Alice goes to visit friends in the United States she no longer will run the danger of imprisonment. The land of the free has begun to open its borders. Congratulations, Alice!

NATIONAL BURNS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, this past Sunday marked the beginning of a very important week in Canada.

Through the efforts of the Canadian Association of Fire Chiefs and the Shrine of North America, in particular its program chairman, Mr. Don Bernard of Sarnia, Ontario, the week of February 4 through February 10 has been recognized as the first annual National Burns Awareness Week, a week which has been endorsed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Burn injuries continue to be one of the leading causes of accidental deaths in this country especially among our children, our elderly and our disabled. Yet it is estimated that 75 per cent of these injuries could be prevented through greater public awareness and better education. More widespread use of smoke detectors, home escape plans, as well as other procedures and techniques are essential to addressing the problem of burn injuries.

• (1410)

In light of these efforts, I strongly encourage all members of this House and indeed all Canadians to lend their support in the recognition of National Burns Awareness Week.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, there were two erroneous statements made by the Minister of Finance regarding the impact of the GST on the northern territories and on aboriginal peoples of Canada.

First, the minister claims a comprehensive study was conducted on the impact the GST will have on the Northwest Territories. Not true. If you look at Chart 4 on page 29 of the GST document it clearly shows that the northern territories were excluded from analysis. That is because there are no gains to be presented.

I challenge the minister to explain how he can state in the House that the Northwest Territories' economy will grow if the GST is implemented when he has not even looked north of 60. He does not know the cost of living in the north and he does not care.

Second, the minister states on the one hand that aboriginal people will benefit from the tax because they will be exempt under Section 87 of the Indian Act. On the other hand, the government states that this exemption raises several questions of interpretation. It has been the experience of aboriginal people that when their rights are left to the interpretation of this government they always lose.

We, as citizens of this great country, have the right to express our displeasure when government creates programs that will have negative impacts on the majority of Canadians.

EGYPT

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, the world was stunned by the news that a bloody massacre had been perpetrated against innocent Israeli citizens in the Suez region of Egypt. It is no less an outrage that Egyptian lives were also lost.

I join with others in the Parliament of Canada in condemning these brutal, terrorist activities against blameless citizens. Rather than impede the process of a peaceful settlement, which was no doubt the intention of the murderers, hopefully it will reinforce the urgent necessity of bringing all parties to the table so that the lives of future generations of Jews and Arabs alike may be spent in harmony and peace.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, in December 1986 then Trade Minister Pat Carney and the Conservative Government sold out the Canadian softwood lumber industry by agreeing to the softwood lumber tariff. Since then provincial Ministry of Forests officials, especially from B.C., have had to travel to Washington, D.C., to present our forest management plans for American review.

The Minister of Forests should confirm whether Canadian officials are attending these meetings and table in the House today the 64 directives the Americans have issued to the Canadian government on the tariff. The forest community must know what specific steps are being taken to end this punitive tariff.

RIDING OF CHAMBLY

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, if we go by the most recent opinion polls in the Chambly riding, it would seem that the NDP is a few days away from having a Quebec caucus. Although the New Democratic candidate is trying as best he can to distance himself from his party's policies, he is a member of that party and some day will have to accept its position against the Meech Lake Accord.

Before running under that banner, he would have done better to remember the unfortunate lesson of his Quebec predecessor in the NDP, the former member for Terrebonne, whom I know very well and who only lasted 10 months in that party. Ten months after joining the New Democrats, he had to resign, sincerely and bitterly regretting having joined a party controlled by extreme left-wing elements who in fact were opposed to recognizing Quebec's distinct character and culture.

The New Democratic candidate in Chambly, instead of hiding his allegiance to this party which despises Quebec's interests, should right away dissociate himself and stop lying hypocritically to the voters of Chambly whom he is misleading by promising to defend their interests and those of Quebecers within a party which develops its policies to suit the Ontario labour unions, anti-Meech sentiment and anti-Quebec and anti-French feeling.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, all Nova Scotians welcome the news that the town of Canso may be spared closure of its fish plant in the immediate future. However, the announcement of an agreement has raised some eyebrows in Western Queens and Shelburne Counties where plants in Port Mouton and Lockeport have already been closed for several months and where some workers have already exhausted their UI claims.

Similarly, plants have permanently closed in Shag Harbour, Woods Harbour and Bear Point. These people do not understand why governments in Halifax and Ottawa felt it was so urgent to allow Canso to jump the queue, as it were, and why responding to impending closures in Canso and St. John's was more urgent than actual closures in southern Nova Scotia.

I urge the government to now increase its efforts to complete and announce aid packages, including community development funding for Western Queens and Shelburne Counties as soon as possible.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on February 1, Canada Post implemented its commercial freight rates in a manner that increased the costs by 40 per cent to Canadians living in the north. In communities such as in northern Quebec and in the Northwest Territories, consumers will have their cost of living increased in some instances by as much as 20 per cent.

The Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations Committee adopted a resolution last week asking the federal government and Canada Post to extend the moratorium on any increase in Canada Post northern commercial freight rates for a further nine months.

The committee also asked Canada Post to undertake meaningful consultation with the people of the north to make sure that the people of those communities are not mistreated in the manner in which they have been by Canada Post in the past.

My colleagues in the Liberal party join me in asking the government to heed the advice of the parliamentary Committee of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The legislation bringing in the government's new sales tax is the most massive change in our tax system since the introduction of the personal income tax in 1917. This new tax will take billions of dollars more out of Canadian taxpayers' pockets.

This bill is 323 pages. It is full of complex mathematical formulae. It is full of complicated descriptions of what new services are taxable and which goods are zero rated, in other words exempt. It is full of legislative jargon which needs to be fully debated by this House and fully understood by Canadians. Yet the government is planning to rob Canadians of that opportunity by cutting off debate and invoking the heavy hand of closure to stifle debate in this House of Commons.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: Why will the government not allow a full discussion of this legislation? Why is his government even considering the use of what the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada once said when he was on this side of the House, and I use his words—I could not do better—when he called closure "one of the most repugnant and most destructive devices ever perpetrated on the democratic process".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Will the Prime Minister consult his seatmate and prevail upon the House Leader to open up debate so that Canadians can have the full picture on this sales tax?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's concern for debate.

On Wednesday, January 24, it took three votes by the NDP to introduce Private Members' Bills. That wasted Wednesday, January 24.

On Thursday, January 25, we moved to Orders of the Day.

On Friday, January 26, it took one vote to dispose of committee concurrence, another vote to dispose of "that another member be heard".

We have had dilatory tactic after dilatory tactic.

Today, I offer to the House the opportunity to debate this fully. I offer once again the opportunity to debate this fully. We are prepared to extend hours this evening if my hon. friends in the opposition parties want to debate this tonight. I suggest to them that they join with us in extending hours tonight so that we can end debate.

• (1420)

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons has had a change of heart. He is much more tolerant this afternoon.

Liberal members alone have collected over 400,000 signatures of people who object to the new sales tax. Add to this figure the signatures collected by NDP members and even by Conservative members, those people across the way who are afraid to present this petition here in the House.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians object to this tax for a number of reasons. It is a clear contradiction of the promises made by the Prime Minister during the last election. There is no collaboration with the provinces. It means double taxation, two sales taxes, no visibility, no simplicity, no neutrality!

Mr. Speaker—

An hon. member: Question!

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether you rose because of me or because of that ruckus opposite!

An hon. member: Because of the ruckus!

Mr. Speaker: I can assure the right hon. member that he was the reason I rose. Perhaps you would like to put your question.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): You maintain your customary composure, Mr. Speaker.

Why—and my question is directed to the Prime Minister—why is the government so anxious to have this bill rushed through the House? So it can rush it to the ad people and media manipulators, to try and fool Canadians?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, we are ready for the debate this afternoon. Are you?

[English]

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are ready, if the minister will withdraw his notice of closure. If the minister will withdraw that, then we can talk some business.

I want to say to the minister and through him to the Prime Minister that although he is the House Leader, the Prime Minister is still the senior member of the House.

We have had less than six hours of debate on this measure, a measure which will revolutionize the tax system in this country. Yet this government does not care to listen to the thousands of Canadians who have talked to their members of Parliament. Their members of Parliament deserve to be heard in this House.

The government does not care to listen to the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have taken the trouble to sign petitions, delivered again to Your Honour as Speaker of this House.

If the government proceeds to use this measure of closure—and it has given every indication that it will—then it will be the eleventh time since December 1988, since this session of Parliament began, that it has invoked the Draconian measure of closure, of stifling debate.

That is unprecedented in the history of Canadian Parliament.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Will the Prime Minister, now that he has had a briefing from his House leader, give us and all Canadians the assurance that we will have a full opportunity to debate in this House what is a revolutionary tax measure?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question of sales tax reform, my right hon. friend seems to suggest that it is a bit of a surprise for him. It has been recommended in five major studies for the government, going back to the Rowell–Sirois Commission in 1940.

A new sales tax was discussed in the White Paper on Taxation in June, 1987. From 1987 to 1989 the House finance committee carried out studies. A sales tax reform paper was issued with the budget of April, 1989. Draft legislation was tabled in October, 1989. There were revisions to the GST proposal in December, 1989. Legislation was tabled on January 24. Since that time the Opposition has been engaged in dilatory procedural tactics.

But if the Leader of the Opposition is ready to drop his vexatious and dilatory actions, then we will extend hours and begin debate immediately, tonight, tomorrow, tomorrow night.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance continues his losing propaganda war with these latest pamphlets—slick, biased and incomplete—dealing with the GST. He will not listen to the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have signed petitions against the GST.

Since the government is sending out nearly two million of these booklets—and there are four or five to each of the kits—I want to know from the Minister of Finance how many Canadians have requested the pamphlets with which the minister is inundating the country.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's leader has just made the point that there have been a number of petitions submitted to the Speaker expressing some concerns about the GST. Surely, my hon. colleague would like to see those people receive a copy of these brochures.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Surely the people in the small business community who have expressed some concerns, some interest and some desire to understand how the GST will affect them will be quite interested in receiving a copy of a brochure which sets out, in a good amount of detail, how the GST affects them, how they should register, how they should collect it, how they will recover the GST from their purchases and how the GST will improve their cash flow from what is the case.

Mr. Marchi: Come on, Mike, even Brian's laughing.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The minister will complete his answer.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the opposition parties have made my point for me. On pages 18 and 19 there is a very clear illustration of exactly how the GST will improve the cash flow of small businesses in this country. That is precisely why we want to get this information into the hands of the opposition, as well as into the hands of the small business community.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the 80,000 businesses represented by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business do not quite agree with the minister.

[Translation]

My question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, is that we now know that the propaganda campaign is still on. We know that it is going to cost millions of dollars. Does the Minister still intend to speak taxpayers' money before his bill has been passed by the Parliament of Canada? And now, as a result of this propaganda campaign, will we have an army of tax collectors, the 4,000 new employees of the Department of National Revenue who will go to get the tax from the pockets of Canadian taxpayers? Do you still intend to hire 4,000 tax collectors?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think what the hon. member ignores in his question is the fact that there is already a tax in place that collects $18 billion from the Canadian consumers today. The GST will replace that tax.

My hon. friend talks about the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. I have letters from members of the CFIB who have listened to the rhetoric of their president—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —but they have not heard about the information that is in this document. They are interested in knowing right away about this document, about the ways that the GST will affect them, how it can help in their businesses and how it can affect their record keeping—all of those matters which are important to its implementation.

These people want to get the information so they can plan and prepare so that they can be ready for it when January 1, 1991, comes around and the GST is implemented.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. On the front page of today's Montreal Gazette, there is a photo of 775 seniors lined up, at 7:30 a.m. yesterday, to receive food from a food bank. Seven hundred and seventy-five seniors! Mr. Speaker, this is national disgrace! And at the same time, the Minister is trying to convince seniors that the GST is good for them. Seniors deserve to live out their old age in dignity, not in food bank lineups. What is the Minister prepared to do for senior citizens?

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that I am quite safe in saying that those 775 senior citizens to whom the Leader of the New Democratic Party refers will be better off after the GST than they are today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I would like to ask my hon. friend whether she has taken the time to tell senior citizens that food in food banks is not subject to tax.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Basic groceries are not subject to tax. Meals on Wheels is not subject to tax. Meals in nursing homes are not subject to tax. No tax will be charged on health care, on dental care, on residential rents, on prescription drugs, nor on medical devices.

All of that, plus the fact the GST credit will help those very people is the reason that I say they will be better off. They will be receiving the GST credit four times a year, by cheque. Seventy-five per cent of senior citizens will be better off after the GST than they are today.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that Canadians will look forward to seeing the headlines tomorrow and will rejoice when they see that food banks will not be taxed by this government.

Let the minister tell the over 15,000 old age pensioners who go to food banks across this country every month that they will be better off under the goods and services tax. Let him prove that the increased inflation caused by the GST, under the minister's own admission, will not hurt pensioners and those on low incomes. Let the minister prove that the poor will be better off with the goods and services tax.

Will the minister now withdraw this tax and stop trying to convince Canadians who don't believe it that this tax will be good for them?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have demonstrated in income tax reform how we took 850,000 off the tax rolls so that they were paying no tax whereas previously they were. We are following this very same approach with sales tax reform.

I have listened to my hon. friend say on a number of occasions that senior citizens will not be better off. I have demonstrated in the brochures and in the technical paper that I have produced in connection with the GST that these people will be better off.

Those figures were not produced by me. They were produced by public servants who are working in the best interests of this country and who are doing this work to the best of their ability.

Those figures point out that 84 per cent of senior citizens will receive the credit. If the hon. member cannot prove that that is wrong, then she should not continue spouting this incorrect information which is leading senior citizens astray.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the minister attend the next food bank for senior citizens in Montreal and explain his views to them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: The minister refers to the brochure—a brochure which cost taxpayers $1.3 million—sent out to businesses and ensuring small businesses that they will have, and I quote, "lower operating costs, improved cash flow and a more competitive edge".

I suggest that the minister is not going to have any better luck explaining his position to small business than he is to senior citizens.

My question is simple. Has the government taken into account the expected lost revenue in its budget preparations? Has it told small business that the goods and services tax means lost business?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member makes reference to one particular item. She says that it will not improve their cash flow. She is referring to the part in this document which shows that it will do that; that it will improve their cash flow.

If she disagrees with that, if she can produce the figures to show me that that is the case, that shows me that this is wrong, then I would like to see those figures.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Is the Minister aware of the status of the trucking industry in Canada at the present time which is engaged in an absolute fight for its very existence, a fight brought about by high costs, regulatory structure and because of the total Canadian tax structure?

How can our trucking industry compete for contracts under these conditions? Will he now admit that present government policies have created conditions which are forcing the Canadian trucking industry to move to the United States in order to compete?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is wrong, first because since deregulation, the trucking industry has experienced considerable growth. He also ought to know that the provinces now have more responsibilities and broader jurisdiction in the trucking sector, that there is co-operation with the provinces, and that we are trying, both through the highway safety code, the legislation and the agreements we have in the trucking sector, to help the industry continue to develop. In any case, I can give the hon. member the assurance that especially since deregulation, the industry has experienced considerable growth in this country, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I beg to differ about who is understanding the trucking industry the best.

In the last two months Ford Motor Co. of Windsor has given $50 million out of $55 million worth of business to United States trucking firms.

The owner of the fifth largest Canadian trucking company is in my riding, Canada Transport of Belleville. He has moved 250 jobs in the last two months to the United States of America because he cannot compete under the present conditions in this country.

What has the government done and what is it going to do to keep the Canadian trucking industry in Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will maintain what I said before.

The trucking industry in Canada has known since 1985 about the developments. We have had rationalization in the industry, which we know very well. We are once again working with the provinces.

I should add also that the trucking industry under the GST will be a clear winner.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister promised that before April 19 this year, he would grant letters patent so that American Express could start Canadian banking operations. Does that promise still stand?

[English]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, given the enormous amount of work that has been undertaken over the past year, particularly in preparing financial institution reform, I am afraid it cannot be in place before American Express receives its licence.

That means, of course, that American Express will be in a position to offer certain services that other banks might momentarily be prevented from providing, but for a very short period only.

• (1440)

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, on February 3, the Minister of Finance promised Canadians that we would have this new financial legislation in place. His promise is right here in his press release. He said that we would have this new financial legislation in place before American Express would be allowed to operate as a bank in Canada.

My advice to the Minister of Finance is, take your American Express card and never leave home without it, because you have given up your credit with Canadians.

Why has this minister kept his promise to American Express? Why has he broken his promise to Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member get his lines from the member for Gander—Twillingate in the future.

The specific question that the hon. member has asked relates to what I said about a year ago. Our intention was to get the legislation before Canadians before the mid-year, I believe is what I said.

As my colleague has stated, a considerable amount of work needed to be done to get together financial institution legislation. The legislation needed a great deal of reform because, in some cases, the existing legislation is 65 or 70 years old. That has taken time. But we are working on it, and hope to have the legislation before the House at an early date.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, you will recall last summer that the government spent about $800,000 on an ad in daily newspapers about the GST, and the minister appropriately had his knuckles rapped for spending taxpayers' money in that way.

Now we have another fancy brochure advertising and promoting the GST to the small business community in this country.

Does the minister consider it appropriate that he should spend $1.3 million of the taxpayers' money? Is it proper to spend $1.3 million of the taxpayers' money on promotion, propaganda, on a fancy pamphlet before a law has been passed in the Parliament of Canada? Is that appropriate, or is it not?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite appropriate to inform Canadians, in this case small businesses, of the importance of a particular issue that they will have to deal with on January 1, 1991.

The legislation is before the House today. My friend is well aware that this is a very important initiative for Canada, for the Government of Canada and that we are proceeding with this legislation.

This is information which small business people have been asking us to provide for them. It is consistent with the direction which the finance committee recommended, following the return of the committee from New Zealand, where they learned from the New Zealand experience. The committee recommended that we provide full information to those who are affected by the proposed tax. That is the basic reason why we are providing this information.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the bill has not passed the House yet. It seems to me that it is rather arrogant to anticipate what this House may or may not do. Advertising is advertising, promotion is promotion.

I would like to ask the minister once again, how can he justify spending the taxpayers' money on partisan promotion of a tax that the people of this country do not want. How can he do that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me remind my friend of what the Finance Committee report of March 15, 1988, stated: "—to publicize the details of the new tax and the relevant social policy transfers". This brochure is publicizing the details of the new tax that we propose to bring in on January 1, 1991.

We also have a brochure which publicizes one of the key social policy elements, the GST credit, which improves the position of many senior citizens and low income people in this country.

This is information for which Canadians have asked. We are responding in a responsible way by providing that information.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, last night two Calgary journalists for CFAC television were held for several hours by the Israeli army after a raid on a village in the occupied West Bank.

Another Calgarian, a citizen of Palestinian descent, was also picked up by the Israelis. This man, Jamil Qasqas, was escorting the two journalists as they interviewed his family in the village.

I would to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he has any information regarding the whereabouts of Mr. Qasqas? Is he, a Canadian citizen, still being detained by the Israelis? What has External Affairs done to secure the release of Mr. Qasqas?

Finally, I would like to know if the minister has had any communications with the Israelis regarding the detainment of the journalists, Brenda Finley and Wayne Borowiec, and what their status is in Israel today?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question and am pleased to report to the House that, as a result of interventions by the Government of Canada in Israel, the three persons named are now free.

I understand that Mr. Qasqas is on his way, or will shortly be on his way back to Calgary. It may be that the two journalists in question will remain in the area. They had, from the beginning, access to the consular services of the Canadian Embassy. We are naturally seeking a fuller report from Israeli authorities as to the circumstances, but the three are free.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In his absence, I will refer it to the acting minister. It is in regard to his so-called environmental agenda for Canada. It is a mystery to Canadians and to the minister, it seems.

Canadians are getting tired of polluted promises. The minister has hailed his five-year plan as the most dramatic environmental reforms in Canadian history, and yet the energy minister two weeks ago in Calgary told oilmen: "Don't worry, don't be nervous, you have nothing to fear. There will be trade-offs". He said that the action plan is not the final word.

Will the minister meet the real needs of the environment and not the self-interest of his political colleagues?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as members of the House know, the Minister of the Environment is working on an action plan that has been supported very fully right through from the Prime Minister and other members of cabinet.

In Calgary approximately two weeks ago when the Minister of the Environment could not attend for personal reasons, I said that there would have to be trade-offs. I think anyone who has looked at environmental issues, who has looked at reduction or stabilization, for example, of CO2 levels, knows there are trade-offs. In fact, if he takes a look at some of the papers coming from the Ontario government, he will find that the trade-offs that are being examined not only have to be examined, but have to have a public debate, and that is why the action plan is coming forward.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Instead of consulting with environmental groups and the public, the minister is working in shadows. Canadians wonder why clean air, clean water, and safe land are such a secret, such a mystery, so confidential and classified.

Will big business dictate the environmental policy of this government, or do the people have a say?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, I am happy to confirm to my hon. friend that his comprehensive and, I believe, quite impressive work in bringing forward a major action plan is proceeding along course.

• (1450)

I met with the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association on Friday and indicated to them, as we have to other groups including environmental lobbies that, while we will be consulting with them, it is the government's intention to follow through on a commitment of sustainable development which moves the cause of the environment to the top of the national agenda, but which does not cripple development in Canada which means jobs for Canadians.

It is perhaps for this reason that Mr. Shevardnadze, the Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union, following the commentary of former Prime Minister Brundtland, stated:

> Canada was one of the first to place questions of environmental protection on the international agenda and has achieved remarkable successes in this area. Therefore, we attach great significance to and regard as an encouraging beginning the environmental accord signed with Canada in Moscow.

The international leaders recognize it. I urge the hon. gentleman to read and stop complaining.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Finance concerns the impact that the goods and services tax will have on disabled Canadians.

While the minister proposes not to tax wheelchairs themselves, he would like to tax all repairs on them to tires, seats, and brakes. Why should handicapped Canadians be asked to pay tax on what are clearly essential needs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has pointed out quite clearly how we have tried to identify certain things that are used by disabled people. That is why a number of medical devices have been made tax free, and I am pleased that she acknowledges that.

With regard to the specific question that she has asked, it is very difficult through the tax system to draw distinctions between repairs to certain types of equipment and repairs to other types of equipment. That is very difficult to do, but I appreciate her sensitivity to that issue.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister.

Now that he has confirmed that he would like to tax repairs to wheelchairs, will he also confirm that he would even like to tax grandmothers for their hearing aid batteries, or would he rather that they not hear about the evils of the GST?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member understands that hearing aid batteries are taxable today. She should acknowledge that when she asks a question like that, rather then trying to get some cheap political benefits from the type of question that she is asking.

We have made it clear that hearing aids are not going to be taxed, glasses will not be taxed. Other forms of medical devices, prescription drugs, and medical services will not be taxed. Therefore, in a number of areas we are responding to the sentiment that she is expressing, but we are trying to do so in a way that recognizes the problems that people have without getting cheap political gain for it.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications and it is about cable TV rates.

We in the New Democratic Party believe that Canadians are paying too much money for cable television. Cable profits are now about 32 per cent on fixed assets. That is about twice the amount that phone companies get because phone companies are regulated by law.

Will the government bring in a law which will regulate the rate of return for cable companies like we have done for phone companies?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, it so happens that the CRTC is holding public hearings on this issue because many Canadians feel that cable TV rates are too high.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I could go over to Hull, but I am not going. I want to ask the minister a question.

The fact is that cable rates are increasing enormously and phone rates are either frozen or they have dropped.

By refusing to have rate of return legislation, as we in the NDP advocate, is the government not sending the wrong signals to the CRTC, or is it simply a matter that the government is not listening to ordinary Canadians, the government is not heeding them, the government is not caring about them, and the government refuses to protect them with strong legislation on cable?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, unlike the NDP, this government respects the independence of the agencies that are responsible for examining these issues.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. Given that the Daly building has been recognized as one of the most important historical buildings in the nation's capital, given that the decision was made to preserve the sterling and rare Chicago style of architecture, and given that the National Capital Commission has already wasted millions of dollars waiting for the developer to come up with restoration plans, the question is why has the NCC now approved a plan that will virtually eliminate or destroy any authentic traces of what it was trying to preserve in the first place?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I cannot debate the aesthetics of architecture with my colleague opposite. I appreciate the question. However, I understand that some of the modifications that have been made, particularly with respect to windows, are in the name of energy conservation. I will attempt to find out more details for her.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The National Capital Commission has lost $2.5 million yearly on the Daly building in rental revenue. The developer has tied up the NCC for $1 a year for a good number of years. The central chambers in the 489 Sussex Drive buildings remain vacant. Lost revenue defies the spirit of fiscal restraint.

In tight fiscal times, how can the minister justify prime real estate remaining vacant?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, my information, and I stand to be corrected, is that in fact a satisfactory lease has been entered into with the developer for the Daly building and that revenues have been secured.

I will attempt to get more information, but I do not accept prima facie what my colleague has said. I understand that revenues have been secured and that a lease has been signed.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There is a debate proceeding currently in the U.S. Congress about a cold war provision of U.S. immigration law which has been used for decades by Americans to prohibit many law-abiding Canadians from entering the United States on the alleged grounds that they are subversive.

I want to ask the minister if he is prepared to make representations to the American administration to help promote the repeal of this section which really has no place in the laws of a great democracy?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the more difficult challenges I have had to face in this office was when the United States tried to keep Farley Mowat out. That was not an issue that receded quietly. I made representations then on behalf of Farley Mowat to try to get him into the United States, successfully. I think that the relevance of that law, if it ever existed, is now passed and I certainly would be pleased to act on the suggestion of the hon. member.

[Translation]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister agree that this cold war measure diminishes the image of the United States in the eyes of Canadians?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may be concerned about image but I am not. Nevertheless, I believe the Americans would do well to get rid of this regulation, and I intend to urge them to do so.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Since the minister met on the weekend with his provincial counterpart, could he inform the House whether the Quebec Minister of Transport gave him assurances, or whether the minister himself made concrete proposals to ensure that the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean region will not lose 11 of the 25 million dollars set aside for the Alma—La Baie highway, which must be spent before March 31, 1991?

Furthermore, if work on the Saint-Bruno—Jonquière section cannot start on time, what did the provincial minister say he would do to avoid losing this money, half of which is being paid by the federal government?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. Saturday, I had a meeting with the Quebec Minister of Transport who gave me the assurance that, in the case to which the hon. member referred, the monies invested by the Government of Canada would be spent within the required period, and that he would make the necessary representations to the Quebec Environment Minister, Mr. Pierre Paradis, to deal with the problems they are facing at this time.

I can assure the hon. member that the federal monies will be spent within the required period.

PRIVILEGE

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX BROCHURE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from the proceedings of the House this morning and from Question Period. This is the first opportunity I have had to draw it to your attention.

This morning and during Question Period the Minister of Finance drew our attention to the document:

TPS, Taxe sur les produits et services, renseignements à l'intention de la petite entreprise.

I asked, through the pages, for a copy of this document since it was referred to so many times this morning and by the Minister of Finance. The pages could not obtain a copy for me. After other attempts the pages finally did find a copy. They could only produce a copy for me in one of the official languages.

I thought that all proceedings in this House, all documents issued by the Government of Canada, have to be produced in the two official languages. How can this government on the one hand pretend to sign a resolution honouring the two official languages of the land and yet not produce a document in the two official languages for the members of this House.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have a document entitled, GST, Goods and Services Tax, Information for Small Business in the English language. The other side:

TPS, taxe sur les produits et services, renseignements à l'intention de la petite entreprise.

It is in both official languages. If my colleague would like to have copies in French and English, both official languages, all he has to do is ask and we will get him any number of copies that he can send out to his constituents.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I did ask for the document in the two official languages. This is all the pages could give me. It is in one official language only. The Minister of Finance says: "Turn it over". I did turn it over. It is still in the one official language. I can read, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance cannot.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I have listened carefully to the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park. While I do not think it is a question of privilege, I think it is a matter of good management and courtesy to ensure that copies of this particular document are available to all hon. members in this place.

I think some of the difficulty may be, if I heard correctly earlier today, that some were published in French only, some were published in English only, and some were published in the two languages.

However, the hon. member has raised a matter which concerns the Speaker. I shall look into it and I will try to satisfy the hon. member.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX BROCHURE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a related question. We found out this morning via the press that the Minister of Finance and the Department of Finance had sent out 1.8 million copies to small businesses across Canada. Members of Parliament have yet to receive copies in our offices.

Could the Minister of Finance explain when he had copies of this goods and services tax information booklet sent to the offices of members of Parliament? I wonder if he could explain when that was done.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops could put his question again.

Mr. Riis: I guess the Minister of Finance was preoccupied. The Minister of Finance sent the brochure out to over one million small businesses some time ago. I was wondering if he could explain when he had it sent to members of Parliament so we would be aware of what the Department of Finance had actually done.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, these pamphlets have just gone out to small businesses. It was done through the Department of National Revenue. I am not quite sure precisely when they went out. If my hon. friend would like more copies of the document—

Mr. Riis: I don't have any yet.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —we will make sure he gets as many as he wants.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has also indicated the desire of hon. members to have copies. The minister has responded, and I am sure the minister will co-operate with all hon. members.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): On the second or third printing.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Leader of the Opposition has an intervention, which of course is always welcome. Perhaps it needs no reply.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the point raised by the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and I think the matter can be rectified among members on both sides of the House. If it is not, I invite hon. members to raise the matter further with me.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 7569).

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Now that Orders of the Day have been called, I want to indicate the desire of the government to debate this very important bill, Bill C-62, on the goods and services tax.

In order to give all members of the House a full opportunity to debate this particular bill, I want to indicate the willingness on the part of the government to extend the debate this evening until twelve o'clock midnight in order to allow as many members as possible to participate in the debate.

I wonder if my hon. friends opposite are of the same mind.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, we on this side have been trying to get the government to do this. Yesterday we moved such a motion and the government refused to proceed with the motion. The government had 15 members of its party stand up to stop this from happening. We are very happy that indeed the government is going to give us a chance to debate the GST, this terrible tax.

I have been reading some comments by the government Whip yesterday when he said it was time to listen to each other, to engage in vigorous debate on behalf of democracy and on behalf of good decision making.

We could not agree more. We will be here and we will debate.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the government was not interested in returning to the House of Commons until well into the month of January. We would have had lots of time if it was genuinely interested—

Mr. Lewis: With your consent.

Mr. Riis: Yes, but the government had not indicated that it was interested in having a lengthy debate on certain kinds of legislation.

If the government were serious in its request, is this the way to deal with tax legislation that will have an effect on people's lives for generations to come, to try to run legislation by exhaustion late into the night?

Mr. Reid: You are driving us crazy with votes.

Mr. Riis: Good, that is the point. I want to make it very clear to my hon. friend, the government House leader, that we are in no way going to co-operate to try to facilitate the passage of this legislation. Unlike the Liberals who are presumably prepared to facilitate debate, to vote the legislation in the House of Commons, we want to stop the legislation and we are not going to make any deals whatsoever.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate, the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Manley: I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the member rising on the same point of order?

• (1510)

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, it is on the same point. I think the reference by the NDP to co-operation from the Liberal Party in the interests of advancing the GST is totally unfounded. What we hear from our constituents again and again is that the behaviour in this Chamber is not worthy of parliamentarians.

I suggest that the kind of antics that have been carried on down there are very unworthy of this Chamber. We need to debate the substance of this bill which is demonstrably wrong. It is a bad bill, it is bad tax law, but we do not need to do it by acting like buffoons.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Point of Order.

Mr. Rodriguez: Point of Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Consent has been sought and there is no consent. Therefore we just carry on with debate. The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville has the floor.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Point of order.

Mr. Rodriguez: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Edmonton East and then the hon. member for Nickel Belt on a point of order.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, just for the information of the hon. member and all other hon. members, my constituents are not terribly concerned about how much we debate the tax bill in this House. My constituents want this tax stopped.

Mr. Rodriguez: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think it is passing strange to see the Liberal Party quite willing to jump in with a suggestion made on the floor of the House to cut off debate at midnight tonight, from ten o'clock till midnight.

Mr. Milliken: We are not cutting it off; we are continuing it.

Mr. Rodriguez: They want to go until midnight. That is the proposal that the Liberals are prepared to agree to. We have said: "Let's have the debate on regular time". This is the time of the House of Commons for debate, not to come in during the dark of the night—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, instead of shouting, perhaps we could listen to reason.

We have had many important topics debated in this House until midnight and until one or two in the morning. I am thinking of the debate on China. I am thinking of the abortion debate, et cetera. Here is an opportunity for us to debate this matter at length. The reason the Liberal Party wants to debate this matter is to convince the government to kill this bill completely, to kill the GST, but we have to do it with full debate.

We cannot understand the reasoning of members of the NDP who on the one hand want more time to debate and on the other hand when it is given to them they do not want it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There has been no consent. The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville has the floor on debate.

He has 14 minutes, plus 10 minutes of questions and comments.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is very simple. We want to kill the bill. We want to axe the tax.

I am surprised the Liberal Party wants to co-operate now with the government across the way by putting up more and more speakers, by wasting more and more of their speakers. Why don't they practise good tactics and hold some of your people in the background for a while and force the government to withdraw the bill?

I suspect what they are doing now is looking at the polls, seeing them at 48 per cent, and dreaming and assuming they are going to win the next election. They want this matter through as fast as possible so that once they are the government of this country they will have a GST.

There is not a single Liberal in the House who will get up and deny the fact that they would like to see this bill through. Once it is through and they form the government, they will keep the GST. Is there a single Liberal candidate running for leadership of that party who has said: "If I become Prime Minister of this country, I am going to get rid of the GST"? No, not a single Liberal candidate. That is not an issue in the campaign.

We all know they want the Conservative Party to get the tax through the House of Commons, take the flak and lose the election. All of a sudden they will be the government of this country, they will keep the tax and they will increase it from 7 per cent to 8 per cent to 9 per cent to 12 per cent. That is exactly what the Liberals will do.

The member from Newfoundland across the way is nodding his head. I can hear him from hear. He agrees. That is exactly what the plan of the Liberals is; that is why they want to co-operate with the government. I am making it very clear that we want to kill the tax. We want to stop the tax. We will do whatever we can to make sure it does not go through the House.

We already see all kinds of signs of Liberal governments co-operating with the federal government. Mr. Nixon, the Treasurer in Ontario, has now that said he will collect the federal sales tax in the province of Ontario. That is a Liberal Treasurer, a Liberal Minister of Finance. That is co-operation in the biggest province in this country. We see all of a sudden how the Liberal benches have fallen very quiet.

[Translation]

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the Premier of Quebec, Robert Bourassa, said practically the same thing two or three days ago about collecting taxes, including the GST, in the province of Quebec. We are seeing co-operation between the Liberal Party and the Progressive Conservative Party, and that is why we had this co-operation in the House of Commons this afternoon.

An hon. member: Liberal or Conservative, what's the difference?

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: In the House today we had a few questions about this fancy brochure, the propaganda brochure which has been circulated to over a million small business people by the government across the way. It spent $1.3 million circulating this advertising and propaganda.

That is not the only brochure that the government has circulated. I would like to know how much money the government has spent on propaganda and brochures on the GST in the last few months. I have here a little brochure entitled Questions and Answers about the GST. How many of these were circulated? Who did they go to? How much did this cost the Canadian taxpayer?

We are talking about brochures and leaflets about a bill that has not even passed the House of Commons. It has not been passed by Parliament, yet taxpayers' money is being spent to talk about something that is not even law, a hypothetical thing.

Another brochure on the goods and services tax is entitled Information for Small Business. That is the second small business brochure that has been circulated in the last few weeks. Another one is called The GST in Summary. Again, how many copies of this brochure have gone out in the last few weeks or months to the Canadian people? What did this brochure cost us?

Another one is entitled The Goods and Services Tax. This small brochure goes out to barbers and hair stylists. How many of these have gone out to barbers and hair stylists across the country? How much did that cost the Canadian people, particularly in an industry which will lose money because of the 7 per cent tax on barbering and hair styling in Canada.

Another one, which I suppose went out to some low income people in this country, is entitled Information on the GST Tax Credit. Once again, how many copies and to what people did that go? Here is another one entitled The Goods and Services Tax on Farmers and Fishermen. I look at this brochure and I wonder again how much this has cost the Canadian people and who received the brochures.

Another one is information on housing. Again, what did that cost us for information on a bill that has not even passed the House of Commons. Here is another one with information for convenience stores. Once again, who did this go out to? We already have this great big brochure on the tax for small business and there is another one here for convenience stores. Again, how much did that cost and who did that brochure go out to?

Another one is to self-employed trades people. Who did that go out to and how much did it cost? There is one more for the GST and pensioners.

Finally I have here a brochure entitled The GST Credit: The Government's Plan which were included in the income tax returns sent out to the people of Canada.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is only a bill. It is not the law of the land, yet the government is spending all kinds of money.

Since the purpose is to kill the bill, I move:

That this House do now adjourn.

• (1520)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

EXCISE TAX ACT

NOTICE OF MOTION PURSUANT TO S. O. 57

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Therefore, I wish to give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the Order of the Day is called for resuming the debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee of Finance of Bill C-62, and on any amendments proposed thereto, I will move that the debate be not further adjourned.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Dartmouth—Tourist Industry; and the hon. member for Delta—Charitable Organizations.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p.7569).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will now enter into questions and comments to the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

On a point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, now that the government has once again given notice that it plans to introduce a motion of closure for the next day, I want to simply indicate that at that time I will plan to argue the fact that moving closure at this point is not only irresponsible but unconstitutional.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments? The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to my friend for Yorkton—Melville when he was making his presentation to this House before he sought to adjourn the House.

He started off by saying that they were attempting to kill the bill and axe the tax and that they would do anything to see that the bill does not go through the House.

He then went on to lay out the brochures and called the brochures advertising and propaganda.

I would ask the hon. member this. If the information in the brochures is incorrect, would he please point out to this House and to all hon. members where the information is incorrect? He called it propaganda.

How can it be propaganda when people are seeking information right across this country about the goods and services tax? Does he not feel that we have a responsibility to get this information out to our constituents as quickly as possible so that they understand the implications of the goods and services tax and how it will affect them? Is it not the duty of every member in this House to inform his constituents and to inform the country?

I would ask the hon. member if he could show the members of this House, if that information is incorrect, where it is incorrect? I do not have a closed mind. I would really like to know how that hon. member can point out in the brochures what is wrong with the information that we are giving.

Obviously the New Democratic Party, the party of which the member for Yorkton—Melville is a member, has decided that it is not even going to discuss the goods and services tax. Members of that party have closed their minds to it. That is the ultimate autocratic position. It is the classic example of a party which knows that it will never, ever form a government in this country. It will never be in power and can never expect to be in power. Thus it can be totally irresponsible.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, we have discussed this bill since August. I was on the committee that travelled this country for several weeks, including when we went into the province of Alberta. We have discussed the bill.

The specific answer to the question about propaganda is that if he checks the most recent brochure he will see one of the headings is "Competitive Advantage". Under that heading it is argued that business in this country will have a competitive advantage.

I suggest that in many cases that is not true at all. We heard in our committee from representatives of many small business people who said they will have a competitive disadvantage. I refer specifically to the tourist industry, the fast food industry, the clothing industry and the footwear industry. All these industries have warned us that they will not have a competitive advantage but very much a disadvantage.

As a matter of fact, when it comes to tourism and restaurants those two industries are among the two most price-sensitive industries and businesses in this country. An increase in price, or a perceived increase in price—whatever it may be, we can argue that point—will be enough, in their opinion, to drive people away. We had representatives of the tourist industry before us in the Railway Committee Room before Christmas who made that very point in a very clear and effective way about how they think it would affect their industry.

I would suggest with great respect to my friend for Athabasca that it is propaganda when you have something that is misleading in a document. This does not give tourism, for example, a competitive advantage. That is a misleading statement that is just not true according to the industry.

He can challenge the industry and say: "Look, they were not telling us the truth. They weren't levelling with the House of Commons." But that is exactly what they were saying to us.

The same thing applies to fast food. We had the fast food people saying to us that they are also a very price-sensitive industry, that if kids have to pay 7 per cent on a Big Mac there might be fewer kids buying Big Macs and that their industry will be affected in a negative sense by the bill before the House.

I think that is a specific answer to his question. I am glad that he raised that question. I think that that part of the brochure at least is something that is propaganda and is not factual.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville represents an agricultural riding, as I do coming from Souris—Moose Mountain. Yet the member failed to point out the net benefits for agriculture in the GST.

I want to lay those out for him right now. If a farmer buys a new tractor the end user's certificate is in place as it always has been. However, if he buys a battery, a chain, a ladder, a jack, a hammer, lumber, posts, wires or staples—all of these things—he can claim the 7 per cent back, which he has not been able to do up until now. Most of those items are taxed at 13 per cent.

I make the point that an average farmer will have a net benefit in the GST of $1,500 to $2,000. If he buys a half-ton truck there is a $2,600 benefit on a $20,000 truck.

There is definitely a net benefit here to agriculture. Agriculture is exempt but the member has failed to point that out to the people of his constituency.

I thank you for the opportunity to do this, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I refer my good friend for Assiniboia to the hearings of the finance committee in October when representatives of the Federation of Agriculture appeared before us. They said that the GST would add several millions of dollars per year to the costs of farmers because of the additional administrative burden. That is what they are saying.

Mr. Siddon: They didn't understand it.

Mr. Nystrom: The member from British Columbia is saying that the farmers did not understand it. I do not want to challenge the farmers' lack of understanding or anything of that sort, but that is what the people from the Federation of Agriculture had to say. It seems to me that they would probably be experts in this because they are farmers.

Mr. Siddon: Spread the truth.

Mr. Nystrom: Somebody wants me to spread the truth. I am saying to you what they said to us, and I know that farmers know of what they speak. I just wish that the Mr. Know-it-all over here on the government benches would listen to the farmers.

The member for Assiniboia knows that for the ordinary farmer all the extra bookkeeping is going to be a burden. The red tape is going to be a burden. That is what the farmers have said to us.

I know the zero rating of many of the goods in terms of agriculture. I also know a recommendation in the bill that is there now that was not there before states that the farmer will have a certificate for big-ticket items. I know those things are in there.

I suggest in closing that there is no guarantee that the 13 per cent tax that already exists is going to be passed on to the farmer in its entirety. We do not know that. There have been many cases in the past where the raw material price has gone down, such as in crude oil in the Middle East, but the saving is not being passed on to the consumer at the gas pumps.

You cannot tell me that the entire $18 billion of FST and MST now is going to be passed on to the consumer, whether it is to a farmer, a small business person or a home builder.

I suggest that the farmer will not be better off. If you listen to your constituents most of them are convinced that they will be worse off.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I have two short questions for the member. I think they should be clarified for the people of Canada. First, the Minister of Finance has repeatedly stated that the GST is revenue neutral. He has also stated that the tax is to be implemented to replace the manufacturers' sales tax which is not serving the manufacturing sector well.

If we have a choice between two taxes that are supposedly raising the same sums of money, why should we opt for a tax which affects most Canadians directly and deleteriously?

The second question to the member is this. Most Canadians believe that the level of the goods and services tax will be raised soon after the tax is implemented, as it has been in virtually every other country where it has been implemented. Is there anything in the current tax proposal that will prevent the raising of the 7 per cent level of the goods and services tax once it is implemented? I think Canadians want to know this.

Mr. Nystrom: The answer to the second question about raising the tax is quite straightforward. There is nothing in the bill to prevent it from being raised.

In fact, the Minister of Finance has said many times that he cannot guarantee it. As sure as day follows night, as the years go on, the tax will go up. It takes only a very simple amendment to raise the tax. It will go up from 7 per cent to 8 per cent or 9 per cent. I doubt if it will go down.

One reason why the government wants this is that it is a relatively easy way to raise a few extra billion dollars whenever it needs money. It just takes a little old amendment, Mr. Speaker, and you can raise the tax by one point. That will create revenues of around $2.5 billion. That is an awful lot of dough and it is a very easy way to do it. That is why this tax must be stopped now, must be killed now. If it is not killed now, it will not be killed in the future.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, just to comment on the raising of the taxes. The manufacturers' sales tax was raised from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent during the life of this government. I did not get one letter concerning that increase because the people of Canada did not know that it was being raised. I say to the hon. member that if people know that the tax is going to be raised, it sure is going to put a stop on governments moving in that way.

I would like to go back to tourism operations. I would ask how the hon. member, with his comments in answer to my previous question, can square the idea that in the tourist industry all of the input taxes that go to make up the tourist industry are going to be rebated to the tourism industry. I think there is a legitimate debate on whether he is correct or whether I am correct. I would acknowledge that.

I would like to say that the biggest single thing against the tourism industry is that party's position on eliminating the entertainment deduction allowed now to people across Canada when they are entertaining business people and so on. I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, that that will have the most devastating effect on restaurants and places of entertainment more than anything else. I would like to see how he can square that.

Mr. Nystrom: I do not think it matters whether the hon. member for Athabasca is right or I am right on tourism. The fact of the matter is that the tourism people came to our committee and they said the tax would hurt them. It would hurt their businesses.

I understand that a great number of letters have been received from Americans who say that because of this tax they will not come here any more. I assume that people who run the tourist industry know their industry well. They know what impact the tax will have on their industry. I think we should take their advice and not argue about who is right, you or me.

As far as entertainment is concerned, right now under tax law the business community is able to write off 80 per cent of its entertainment expenses. That cost about $1 billion last year. I believe we could save a lot of money by making sure that Mr. Conrad Black cannot always write off his champagne and his caviare when he is entertaining the member for Athabasca.

I do not think that serves any purpose. That is one way that money can be saved. It is not only caviare and champagne that can be written off, there are other kinds of services as well. I sometimes question the value of those services. I am not saying that Jack is involved there but I question some of these write-offs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me today to be able to stand and finally participate in a debate in this House on this very important economic policy.

Like all members of the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, I know you are aware that the goods and services tax is a part of two other economic proposals this government has worked on and put forward in the last five years. Clearly reform of the sales tax is an essential part of tax reform that was undertaken initially in June 1987. That was part of a very clear and well defined economic policy laid down by the government in 1984 in its paper provided to this House in November of that year on limits to economic growth.

What we are seeing with the goods and services tax is an attempt, not only to rectify a tax system today that is hurting Canadians in all parts of this country and in all walks of life, but also to implement a system that is fair and productive and will help Canadians over a period of time to become stronger and more competitive, more able to create and maintain employment in this country. I do not think there is any member of Parliament in this House who would dispute that that is something all of us should be thinking about and should be focused on.

I would like to talk a little about some of the economic benefits of this tax. I would like to talk about some of the things that this tax does, particularly for my part of the country, particularly for the Atlantic provinces, that we all would agree needs whatever assistance we in the government and we in this House can provide.

If through the reform of the sales tax we can provide some economic growth, we can ensure that the economic growth and economic investment we so badly need is not denied us because of a tax system that is 65 years old, a tax system that nobody else uses, a tax system that penalizes production and restricts growth in the economy. That sort of a tax system must be replaced, if we are going to see real economic growth, real regional development, and the creation of jobs in this country when we need jobs more than at any other time.

We are well aware of the negative parts of the old federal sales tax. We know that the current federal sales tax distorts economic decision making, reduces productivity and, therefore, reduces the real incomes of Canadians.

What this tax does today is favours imported products. It favours goods of like nature imported from another country. Not only does it do that, but it quite clearly hinders the ability of our exports to compete against exports of other countries in the international market. We are a country of exporters. If we want to be able to compete fairly and compete properly, we must ensure that our tax system does not hold us back.

We all agree that any tax system is something we do not like, but surely to heaven we do not need a tax system that says to an exporting country that the things it ships out automatically have a 65 per cent to 70 per cent higher effective tax rate than the things it is competing against. The people to whom we sell what we produce are not going to buy something that has a tax rate much higher than what they are competing against. It makes absolutely no sense.

We are dealing in an economy that is integrated around the world. We cannot deny that we live in an economy that is interdependent. We cannot put walls around ourselves, as our friends opposite would have us do. We cannot live and work in a little cocoon. It will not work. If we are going to tell the people of this country and our constituents that we can do that, we are not being fair or honest with them.

What we are doing with this tax is trying to address some of those inequities so that we can deal properly with the future of this country and create jobs when we need them.

As we try to promote trade and competitiveness, as we try to produce more goods, products, and services that we can export, we cannot have a system that allows for goods imported into the country to be taxed at the border, which is what happens today. The federal sales tax is applied at the border. Therefore, a Canadian good, something that is produced in this country and is taxed at the manufacturer's level, the tax on production, is at an immediate disadvantage, because anything that happens to the import after it is imported is not susceptible to tax. Across this country we have seen plants closing because of this tax.

Mr. Funk: Why did you keep raising it, if it was so bad?

Mr. Reid: We cannot continue to have businesses subject to tax on tax. Any business that buys a good that has a federal sales tax on it, uses it in its production and sells it at the next level where again it is taxed is subject to a tax on tax, which affects the consumers of this country and holds back the ability of business to produce, to expand and to grow.

Where of all places do these policies have the most benefit and why? It is interesting when we look at the figures on growth in the economy that we see the greatest growth in the economy is in the prairie and the Atlantic provinces. Why does this happen?

Mr. Funk: Just like free trade.

Mr. Reid: It is because our economies in the prairies and the Atlantic are very capital intensive. They use machinery and big pieces of equipment. We need to bring those together to be able to extract and develop our raw materials. As well, those economies, because of the nature of this country, are based on export. What we see because of taxes on this sort of equipment is a constricting or a restraining of the economy to the tune of about $9 billion a year.

Whoever you are, whatever side of this House you sit on, if we can see an increase in growth in this economy of $9 billion a year, it is going to affect every one of our constituents. It will make their lives just that bit better. What we will see is investment in those areas that is being constrained today.

My friends opposite say: "What about free trade?" If you combine the effects of the changes in the goods and services tax with the benefits of free trade, we see growth in the economy of something approaching $30 billion a year, and that is the equivalent of 5 per cent.

Mr. Funk: You don't even know what you are talking about any more.

Mr. Reid: I know exactly what I am talking about, and I am talking truth to my constituents. I do not keep them in the dark. I do not tell them to listen to what the NDP says and not anything the government has to say. I do not deny them information so that they do not know what is going on and constituents of mine and yours cannot make an intelligent decision because you are denying them the information and denying them a debate in this House.

Mr. Funk: Make a motion to withdraw closure.

Mr. Epp: How come you guys keep promoting socialism and eastern Europe is changing?

Mr. Reid: Come on, give me a hand here, Mr. Speaker. I would certainly like to thank my colleague from Manitoba for all his help.

What so many businesses and industries in this country face today is a tax on inputs, a tax on the goods, the products and the equipment they use to carry out their business. One of the great benefits of the goods and services tax is that we will see the tax on inputs eliminated through the input tax credit. What we hear is that that is businesses. What about people?

We should remember that businesses are people, that businesses are people who work in our communities, that businesses provide jobs that create opportunities and provide services. Businesses provide growth. Today, small and medium sized businesses in this country are facing a total mishmash under the federal sales tax. What we see is 75,000 different companies paying this tax. Remember, Mr. Speaker, businesses do not pay tax. We see 75,000 companies collecting this tax. Virtually the same amount will collect under the goods and services tax. They do not pay it; they collect it. Consumers pay the tax. Consumers are paying that tax now. My constituents and your constituents are paying that tax.

An hon. member: Who is the consumer?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I really cannot hear the hon. member who is on debate. The hon. member for St. John's East has the floor.

Mr. Reid: With four different tax rates and 22,000 special deals, we have a tax system that nobody understands. We have a tax system that distorts decisions in the economy, that distorts the realities in the economy, and that hinders the ability of people to conduct business and therefore consumers to get the benefits of a competitive economy.

An hon. member: Maybe you can learn how to grow cucumbers.

Mr. Reid: The problem is not growing cucumbers; it is selling cucumbers.

As we face some particular challenges in the economy in Atlantic Canada, as we look at a fishery that is going to demand attention from all aspects of government, from the economy, and from all parts of our society, as we look at a forest products industry that has a great opportunity to expand its horizons to export across not only this country but around the world, as we look at a growing and developing minerals industry particularly in my province, as we look at some opportunities for oil and gas development and as we look at the opportunities to develop the hydro resources, we see some excellent examples of how the goods and services tax as opposed to the federal sales tax can assist the development of those businesses.

Today, any purchase that is made of a taxable item by a company is susceptible to the tax. For instance, it is important for people to realize that in the future a paper mill can receive the input tax credit on everything it buys to manufacture paper. That is not only the wood that goes into the chippers. It is the chemicals that go with it, the machines, the light bulbs to keep the place going, the typewriters. Anything used in that business will be a tax credit. What we are not seeing is tax on tax. We are not seeing tax produced so that someone else can pay tax on it. What we are seeing is an acknowledgement that the tax is paid once and only once through the system.

Mr. Funk: Let's hear more about the light bulbs.

Mr. Reid: The light bulbs are going out.

Ms. Hunter: I don't think they were ever on.

Mr. Reid: One thing that we hear a tremendous amount about is the question of spending. All of us hear that the tax would be more acceptable if the government were to cut spending, that instead of raising taxes we should attack spending. I would like to spend one or two minutes addressing that question. I think it is important to keep reminding Canadians of the effort that has been made to reduce spending in this country.

Since 1984 we have reduced the deficit by some $8 billion. In 1984–85 spending was $16 billion higher than revenue. Now it is $8 billion less than revenue.

Spending by the federal government in 1989–90 on government programs will have grown by 3.6 per cent, which is lower than any provincial government in this country and lower than any government in Ottawa in the last number of years. In 1984–85 some 19.5 per cent of the economy was comprised of government spending. In 1989–90 it is 16.1 per cent. If we carried on the way it was operating before we would be $22 billion higher or 21 per cent. By 1993–94 we will not have to borrow and we can start buying back things like treasury bills.

One of the most important parts of the goods and services tax for my province and my constituents is the tax credit, the system whereby we acknowledge that Canadians in certain circumstances may have been hurt by the goods and services tax if we did not take direct and specific action to redress that. The way of doing that is by enhancing and developing the sales tax credit.

In 1986 the credit was $50 for an adult and $25 for a child with incomes below $15,000. In 1990 it is now at $140 for an adult and $70 for a child with incomes less than $18,000. In 1991 it will be $190 for an adult and $100 for a child with an income of less than $24,000.

For single individuals there will be $100 extra and for single parents one of the children can be claimed as an adult. What effect does that have, remembering that it will be paid four times a year in advance of the expenditure being made? There will be 88.7 million families and individuals in this country who will benefit from the sales tax credit.

Families with incomes less than $30,000 will be better off under the goods and services tax than they are under the current system. That is where this system is fair. That is where this system addresses the needs of Canadians. That is where this system says to Canadians who need the help that we will give that protection and that help.

I am convinced that this tax, as controversial as it is and as controversial as it will be, is in the best interests of my constituents and I think the constituents of every member of this House. It addresses the realities of Canada in the world in 1990. It will help Canadians be competitive and productive in the next decade. It will protect Canadians who need our help and protection. It will make this country a fairer and a better place in which to live in 1990.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you very much for the opportunity to participate in this debate before closure comes down and this tax is rammed down our throats.

I want to ask the member a few questions. He stood in this House and explained to us how wonderful it is going to be for those people who get a rebate. Now think about it. I want to tell the member that there are a lot more people in this country who would rather not pay the tax at all than pay the tax and get some of their money back and expect to feel grateful for that.

That is the kind of convoluted logic of somebody who is trying to get a cabinet post rather than fight for the people in Newfoundland who are going to have this tax piled on to 12 per cent in Newfoundland.

I do not want to miss any other province in this country, but I want to spend a little time in Newfoundland.

• (1640)

The hon. member says that the government has the support of the citizens of Newfoundland to shove another 7 per cent down their throats. With high unemployment in that province, this disastrous government with its free trade policies and its fisheries disaster will give them the gift of a 7 per cent tax. They will get a free form so that they can ask for some of their money back.

An hon. member: Shame.

An hon. member: Isn't that wonderful.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, This is the kind of guy who insults the intelligence of every Newfoundlander with that kind of speech.

Mr. Siddon: Don't be silly.

Mr. Barrett: "Don't be silly", he says. I will come to you in British Columbia in a minute. Just give me a minute.

I want to move to the fact that I am shocked and dismayed. I want to ask that member: Do you speak for the back-benchers from Alberta? They have been deathly silent on this matter. I do not include the Chair. The Chair has other responsibilities. All other back-benchers from Alberta are yet to open their yaps over this tax because they are scared to death as to how they are going to explain this tax to Albertans. They have never had a sales tax. They voted Tory, and now they are getting a sales tax.

Do you know who is laughing about this, Mr. Speaker? The Liberals are laughing. They know very well that when they read the polls, they think are going to be re-elected, and that the Tories are doing their dirty work for them by passing this tax right now.

I warn the people of Alberta that the speech by that member is the kind of speech made by the Tory-Liberal alliance that we are witnessing. It is nothing but a Tory-Liberal alliance addressing itself to the same service of the same constituency, the rich, and the hell with the rest of the people in this country. That is what it is.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Barrett: Those Liberals are laughing at the Tories from Alberta. They are laughing at the Tories from Newfoundland, and that member speaks without recognizing that he is serving the cause of the Liberal party. He is a back-bencher and does not realize that there is a tacit coalition between those two old line parties to ram this tax through.

I have seen many bright young men and women come into politics who are called one-timers. They are described as those earnest young people who come here and support a government. They were brought in under the American expression of being swept into office with the flotsam and jetsam of a huge majority. That member is part of the flotsam and jetsam that came in with a new majority. He will be out in the next election, four years of his life sacrificed for that tacit coalition to serve special interests in this country, and he will not even get a pension.

I am a social worker. Do not come to me when you are down the tube, looking for help. It is your own fault. You are over 21. You should have known better than to get tangled up with that gang over other, even if the hon. member did work for the former minister. It is his own fault. I have enough of a case load without worrying over him.

It is the Alberta back-benchers who I am worried about. It is getting so bad that they do not even go home on the weekends. Those who do go home on the weekends in Alberta do not give anybody their phone number. If they are recognized on the streets, they say they are thinking of leaving the caucus.

Two members have actually served notice that they may speak against this bill. They have to do it quietly. They think they have a chance to get into cabinet. They are trying to balance their position on the GST and their ambition. Just think, one of them could succeed the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What an ambition!

I want to know whether or not every single back-bencher from Alberta supports this legislation.

Mr. Nystrom: Yes or no.

Mr. Barrett: I will not be the first to go to Alberta and report their answer, but I may be the second. There is not a single provincial government that endorses this, unless it is Social Credit in British Columbia, and they do not know from day to day what the heck they are doing anyway.

As for Alberta, Don Getty has got all of these guys on a separate list, under the list known as the H–I–T list, including my good friend from the tar sands, who will be in bigger glue and bigger tar if this goes through. I challenge him to get up along with that member—

Mr. Shields: Point of order.

Mr. Barrett: Wait. Wait, I will give you your chance. There is no point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I was challenged to state my position, whether I support the goods and services tax legislation that is now going through the House. I absolutely, positively do. I have absolutely no reservation whatsoever on that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will let the hon. member have another 30 seconds in order to put a question.

The hon. member for Calgary Northeast.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order because I do not support the GST. I am from Alberta. I am trying to represent the views of my constituents as well as the province of Alberta.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has 20 seconds to put his question.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, two words: Goodbye, Jack; hello, Alex. One of them is going to last and the other one is going down the tube. Mr. Speaker, I will leave it to you to guess what is happening. I speak for the west. We are opposed to this tax no matter what the government says.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I do not know where to start. I do not know whether to say: "social worker, counsel thyself". Talk about insulting Newfoundlanders. One thing the hon. member should know is how to pronounce 'Newfoundland'. It is about time he, as a former premier, recognized that.

If you are going to talk to me about insulting my constituents, if you stand up here and say to my constituents you are going to put on a new tax, my constituents know damn well there is a tax in place now. For you to stand in this House and pretend there is no tax and all of a sudden we have a new 7 per cent—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I think it is procedural precedent in the House to direct the comments through the Chair and not to other members of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe that is what the hon. member intended on doing.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I stand corrected. The hon. member, of course, is absolutely right.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is getting awfully close to five o'clock. The Chair does see all these things happening, but I just do not like to get involved in the debate. I am sure the hon. member realized what he had to do. I knew he was going to get to the point of saying "Mr. Speaker". I appreciate the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap bringing it to the attention of the House. If any member has any other complaint to bring to the Chair, I would appreciate hearing it rather than just sitting back and not saying anything.

The hon. member for St. John's East has the floor.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, a number of members clearly heard the member make a reference to the Chair and I ask that he withdraw it.

Mr. Samson: Mr. Speaker, if I made any comment that offended the Chair or any of the other members, I certainly do withdraw the comment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for St. John's East has the floor.

Mr. Reid: Now, where were we. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend opposite has suggested that I purport to stand in this House and suggest to this House that every one of my constituents support this tax. I said quite clearly that this tax is controversial. I would be an idiot to stand here and suggest that all of my constituents support this tax.

I am willing to say two or three things on that though, Mr. Speaker, quite briefly. First, I support this tax and I defend this tax. I have defended and promoted this tax for three years.

• (1650)

Second, come good or bad, I am willing to let my constituents make their decisions on this tax, based on discussions in this House of Commons and based on the reality and truth of this tax. If it takes my colleagues opposite to block that information they get from my constituents, I am prepared to wait until this tax is in place, until this tax has an opportunity to operate. I will let my constituents judge then as to whether this tax is good or bad. Then and only then will my constituents judge me, not the hon. member who comes along and pats us on the head, like the great former premier.

Mr. MacWilliam: Bye, bye.

Mr. Reid: Bye, bye, fair enough. When that hon. member is back giving counselling, I will be in this House referring colleagues to him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will allow one short question for the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Island.

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity to travel with the hon. member opposite, and I know he has a good sense of humour. That has been well demonstrated in his address this afternoon, especially as he relates to the talk of fairness in this GST and the "economic growth" that this is going to promote. I think this speaks a lot for his sense of humour.

We are talking about the relative merits of the manufacturers' sales tax. I think it has already been made clear in this House that no one is in favour of the manufacturers' sales tax. I think his tactic of putting the major focus of his debate on the manufacturers' sales tax is a means of avoiding the real issue. That real issue is tax reform.

When we are talking about tax fairness, I would just like to ask him how he can talk about tax fairness when over the last 40 years we have seen a real shift from taxing corporations to taxing individuals. In 1980, the tax was 69 per cent for individuals and 30 per cent for corporations. The projections for 1990 are 79 per cent for individuals and 21 per cent for corporations. We are talking about fairness in the tax system. How can he talk about fairness when this government is bringing in this kind of "tax reform"?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief because I know other members want to speak on this. My colleague from Calgary is next on our side. I know he would certainly like to address the comments of my friend from British Columbia. He and 26 of his colleagues support this tax.

The whole point of this, of course, is to replace the manufacturers' sales tax. That is a position held by all parties in this House, that the manufacturers' sales tax must be replaced. If we want to deal with the question of tax fairness and redressing the balance, in June 1987 this government came forward with a tax reform that recognized quite clearly there was a problem. Individuals were taking too much of the burden of income tax. The immediate effect of phase one of tax reform was to immediately shift $3 billion of that burden away from individuals and into the corporate sector.

More than that, it eliminated some of the huge loopholes for businesses. It took away some of the tax shelters that businesses had taken advantage of needlessly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments have now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Algoma.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I think there might be unanimous consent in the House to entertain a motion that the member from Calgary Northeast now be heard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Algoma has the floor on debate.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I thought it would be very interesting to hear the hon. member for Calgary Northeast. I am sure that every member of this House will want to be here tomorrow to hear him.

We would not want to break the stride of his speech, because we will hear from one honest Tory. He is listening to the people. This performance we have just seen from the hon. member for St. John's East shows that he obviously had a very weak case. That is why he thumped the desk so loud and spoke so loud.

We know the hon. member for Calgary Northeast will speak very clearly and concisely. He will not have to scream and yell because his case will be perfect. He will know exactly what he is talking about. Even though we did not grant permission for him to speak now, we will certainly hear from him tomorrow.

It will be very interesting to be here next January because no area of our country will be hit harder by this tax than Newfoundland. They already have a sales tax of 11 per cent, the highest in the country. It is the most regressive kind of tax. By this time next year there will be another 7 per cent added to that unless the Tories listen to the hon. member for Calgary Northeast and withdraw the tax. They may well do that because they know his arguments are right. They know that the people are with him not only in Calgary Northeast but throughout Alberta and throughout the country.

I do not think that the hon. member for St. John's East will be nearly as confident next year at this time because his people in that constituency and in that province will bearing the most onerous tax burden they have ever had to bear. Not only will they be paying 18 per cent sales tax on every meal they buy in a restaurant, it will apply to practically every good and service in that province. No province will be hurt more.

We are not talking about just one new regressive tax because during the last five years we have had a succession of regressive taxes; some 25 cents a gallon on gasoline, massive taxes on liquor and all kinds of non-prescription cosmetics; 31 different new taxes in the last five years. It would be very interesting if we could replay what we have seen this afternoon about the third or fourth week of next January and see how the hon. member for Athabasca, the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for Calgary Northeast react.

There may be a draft movement by then to make the hon. member for Calgary Northeast leader of the party. It could well happen. He may be the only member who could be elected. Obviously, if he is the only member who can be elected he will be the leader of the Tory party.

The poll that was just published reinforces exactly what the member for Calgary Northeast has been saying, that the vast majority of people are opposed to the sales tax. They are definitely opposed to the 7 per cent sales tax. In fact, 79 per cent are opposed to the sales tax; 16 per cent are in favour of it and 5 per cent have not heard of it.

It is amazing, because of all the issues I have ever seen come before Parliament in the last 20 years, I have never seen so many petitions as the ones on this issue. It is unbelievable. There were never so many petitions on any of the controversial issues which came before Parliament. This government is clearly moving against the wishes—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

NEEDS OF YOUTH

The House resumed from November 27, 1989, consideration of the motion of Mr. Anawak:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider developing special initiatives, in consultation with aboriginal peoples, to respond to the serious employment, education and health needs of aboriginal youth.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support the private member's motion of my colleague with regard to the situation which is facing our aboriginal people. In fact I wish, for clarification, to read the motion which I think would be deserving of the support of all members of this House, namely:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider developing special initiatives, in consultation with Aboriginal peoples, to respond to the serious employment, education and health needs of Aboriginal youth.

That particular motion and, indeed, its substance I think can be concurred in by all members of Parliament. If one has taken the time to examine the situation of the aboriginal young people in this country, one would quickly recognize that their particular needs cry out for special initiatives by the Government of Canada.

From a health perspective I wish to lay before you some disturbing facts which reaffirm my desire, as well as that of my colleague, for the Government of Canada to initiate leadership on these very important issues.

In 1977, the number of hospital admissions of native people for infections and parasitic diseases was about seven times higher than the national average. The mortality rate among native infants was two times higher for natives and four times higher for Inuit than the national rate. The mortality rate was almost three times higher for native children ages one to four years than for non-native children.

A glaring fact which ought to be shared with members of Parliament is that in 1981, 50 per cent of native people were in the labour force and the average income was two-thirds less for natives than for non-natives.

According to an article published in 1989 entitled "Nutritional problems of native Canadians, mothers and children", fluoride is not present in the water supply of most native communities and must be given to combat dental problems which are rampant in some areas throughout their communities.

I could go on and on with a litany of facts which would support my thesis, namely, that there are major and serious social and economic problems being faced by aboriginal people in Canada, so much so that those particular problems demand an immediate and effective comprehensive response by the Government of Canada. It is not sufficient at all for the Government of Canada to say that because of budgetary restrictions, because of the fact that it has linkages to provincial jurisdictions, the Canadian government is somewhat paralysed in providing a comprehensive response. If that is what the government of the day holds, it seems to me that it has fallen by the wayside in terms of living up to its responsibilities in meeting the needs of Canadian people and, in particular, our aboriginal people.

Special initiatives to combat the educational problems with regard to aboriginal youth ought to be a priority for any government. It ought to be a priority for every government; federally, provincially, and, yes, even our own municipalities in the respective areas of this country must bear some of the responsibility. What we hear are responses from the Government of Canada which would suggest that there may be a problem and, if there is a problem, we do not have the money nor, more important, do we have the will to ascertain the answers to provide a comprehensive response.

So there is, first, the lack of financial resources. Second and more important, there is the lack of political will to evolve a comprehensive response to the many facts I have laid before the House on this occasion and previous occasions, particularly during debate with regard to the child care situation in this country. It is irresponsible of the Government of Canada not to exercise its jurisdiction, its legislative authority and its political will to try to come up with a comprehensive response.

There has been a clear example of this broken promise and lack of leadership with regard to child care. There are many native communities throughout this country that desperately require new spaces in order that native children be given high quality child care. The government's response is that it was to provide upwards of $60 million to try to address that particular situation. However, in April of last year the Minister of Finance, aided and abetted by the Minister for National Health and Welfare, axed $60 million from their budget.

I have travelled to the native communities across this country, albeit not as often as I have wished to. In fact, I have been in my colleague's constituency. In those communities you see the need. This is not a need just written on paper. It is not a need that is theorized, if you will, by the academics at Mount St. Vincent University in Halifax, or the University of Toronto, or in Winnipeg, Calgary, or Vancouver. This is a real need, a people need. The response is: "We have no money. There is no political will. We don't have a response. I'm sorry."

These kinds of answers emanating from the front benches across the way leave Canadians with very few options. One immediate effect of not addressing the real social and economic problems of our aboriginal youth is for people to lose hope but, more important, to lose hope and faith in those institutions that they have supported over the years.

Are we paralyzed as a Parliament? Are we so ineffectual in terms of bringing the largesse of the treasury benches of the Government of Canada to the particular needs of aboriginal youth? Are we so concerned with our own personal pay cheques, our own personal well-being, that we cannot see beyond our own borders to other communities and other Canadians who are in need of financial help and special initiatives, some of which can be resources of the Government of Canada redirected from other government programs?

Are we so ineffectual as a Parliament? I would hope not. I would hope that government members would seize this particular opportunity and support the substance of the motion and thereafter have the ministers responsible, namely the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, be accountable for their dismal effort to date in responding to the social problems which are rampant in native communities across this country.

• (1710)

I speak of child care as one example. There are many other examples in terms of our aboriginal peoples to which I am sure every member will want to allude and, indeed, discuss in a fuller context. But let it be said that they were the first people and they, too, have rights. More important, we have an obligation as a Parliament to respond to those rights and those needs and thus far we as a Parliament, and I include members on this side, have been ineffectual in responding.

I realize that my time is somewhat limited and you are giving me the traditional wave to curtail my remarks. In conclusion, let me say that I support both the mover of the motion and the substance of the motion. I call upon my colleagues opposite, who are few in number today, but many of whom are aware of what is contained in this particular motion, to realize the intent with which it was moved, that being a sincere, honest, genuine belief that special initiatives are needed for our aboriginal youth, and to respond in kind. That is the kind of intention which is expected of members of Parliament who take the oath and take their seat in this great Chamber.

I call upon them to support this motion, as do I and all of my other colleagues, to make sure that it passes but, more important, to ensure that both legislative and administrative decisions be made to obtain the very laudable objectives contained in the motion of my hon. colleague.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to be able to speak on this very timely topic today. The motion before us calls upon the government to "consider developing special initiatives, in consultation with aboriginal peoples, to respond to the serious employment, education, and health needs of Aboriginal youth".

Like my hon. colleague, the member for Nunatsiaq, I believe these issues to be serious and pressing, and none more so than the health needs of our Canadian aboriginal peoples, the old as well as the young.

I will not begin my remarks by suggesting that the government is content with the health conditions of many aboriginal people. The fact is that it is not. There are simply too many indications that aboriginal people have not yet attained the same level of health and well-being shared by most Canadians.

The facts certainly suggest that there is cause for concern, but they also suggest that there are significant opportunities for bringing about positive and lasting change.

If we look at the registered Indian population in Canada we see that there has been a dramatic decline in infant mortality rates in recent years. This change has come about through better neo-natal and post-natal care and hospital deliveries. Yet this improvement has not been enough to alter the fact that the infant mortality rate of our native population is still twice that of the over all Canadian population. If we consider aboriginal youth, some 54 per cent of status Indians are under the age of 24. This compares with a figure of 38 per cent for non-native Canadians.

What then of the living and health conditions of our aboriginal youth? While aboriginal youth can now expect to live longer compared to 15 or 20 years ago, the life expectancy of an Indian male is still only 63 years compared with 72 years for the average Canadian male. For aboriginal women the figure is slightly better at 72 years compared to 81 years for the average Canadian woman.

The more telling statistics have to do with the incidence and causes of Indian and Inuit youth deaths and suicides. It is a deplorable fact that the highest rate of accidental and violent deaths occur in the 15 to 29 year old age bracket. Similarly, the highest number of Indian suicides are among the 20 to 24 year olds, which is five times the Canadian rate for this age group. In the case of Inuit youth, suicides in the 15 to 24 year age group are also radically higher than the Canadian average.

There are undoubtedly a number of issues and causes behind these grim statistics, but there can be little question that people who have a reasonable measure of confidence in the future are unlikely to choose to end their lives in violent fashion, particularly in the prime of their youth.

These desperate actions do suggest that education, employment and economic opportunities have been insufficient in too many cases to offer aboriginal youth reason to hope for a better life and a better future. This has to change and this government is committed to ensure that it will indeed change.

In a minute I will be speaking about some of the programs and initiatives which are helping to deal with aboriginal health problems. But the fact remains that the most significant aboriginal health problems are not linked to any disease. They are linked to fundamental economic, social and environmental factors. It will only be through structural change and adjustment in these areas that significant and lasting improvements to the health status of aboriginal peoples can be achieved. This means ensuring that Indian and Inuit communities assume a greater role in the design and delivery of their own health care services in the broader context of self-determination.

Toward this end, the Government of Canada is moving on a number of fronts. First, there is a wide array of federally-funded health services for treaty and for status Indians. As of 1989-90, these services totalled more than $478 million. They include community health services, dental health services, environmental health and surveillance, non-insured health benefits, the National Native Alcohol and Drug Abuse Program, hospital services and capital construction.

These services cover the spectrum of promotive, preventive, curative and rehabilitative health care. They are responsible, in no small measure, for the significant progress that has been made over the last few decades in improving the health status of Indian and Inuit people.

As I said earlier, the government is determined to work closely with Indian and Inuit communities to put into practice the concepts of community support and self-determination in health services. It is for this reason that Health and Welfare Canada established and funded program transfers which enable Indian communities to assume responsibility for planning, organizing and implementing their own health services. Five transfer agreements representing 28 bands have been signed to date and others are in the works.

Another example of the government's commitment to promoting aboriginal self-determination in the field of health services is the Indian and Inuit Health Careers Program. Again, through Health and Welfare Canada, this program is helping to correct the under-representation of native people in health care delivery. The program encourages and supports Indian and Inuit participation in the pursuit of post-secondary health careers.

As well, more than $5 million have been channelled to post-secondary institutions as developmental funding to address the special needs of native students in such career fields as nursing, health education and health administration. These and other health related initiatives have a direct and beneficial impact on the lives of some 274,000 on-reserve status Indians in Canada.

In all, the health services provided both directly and indirectly by the Government of Canada serve the needs of approximately 440,000 treaty and status Indians.

The very size and diversity of our original population, the isolation, and the very different cultural needs of many communities make the design and delivery of health care services a challenge of significant proportions. In large measure, that challenge is being met, but as I said before, no amount of health care, no matter how well designed, funded and delivered, can address problems that arise from social, economic and environmental conditions.

• (1720)

We must take steps to stop the high rates of violent death and suicide among aboriginal youth. These young people must be able to look to the future with a sense of hope and a legitimate expectation, not only of a healthier but a better life. To bring about this change, we must be prepared to move with all possible speed to help Canada's aboriginal people attain the self-reliance and self-sufficiency through which lasting economic and social progress can be achieved.

This is the government's objective. We are pursuing self-government at the community level and we have put in place the Canadian aboriginal economic development strategy which will put into the hands of aboriginal people the means to effectively manage their own business enterprises, economic institutions, job training and skills development. We also have an established program to help young Indians and Inuit acquire post-secondary education.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, the government is not content with the state of aboriginal health but neither is it content to continue to use methods and approaches which do not address the fundamental issues or support long-term solutions. We are committed to seeing that the cycle of aboriginal poverty, lost opportunities and unrealized human potential is broken once and for all. We are confident that we will succeed. That is the legacy which this government pledges to aboriginal youth and to all aboriginal people.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for giving me the opportunity to speak ahead of him in order that I may return to the legislative committee.

Indeed, I am pleased to speak to this motion which is of vital importance to Canadians and which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider developing special initiatives, in consultation with aboriginal peoples, to respond to the serious employment, education and health needs of aboriginal youth.

What is the situation for native Canadians? The situation for them, particularly the aboriginal youth, is that they are economically disadvantaged. There is discrimination, they are in poor health, social services are inadequate and hence, they suffer cultural isolation. As a consequence, they feel that they are second-class citizens.

It is particularly important that we focus on the youth because the native problems are magnified for them. They encounter tremendous obstacles, such as completing their education, finding a job, trying to handle or prevent pre-marital pregnancies, alcohol and drug abuse, suicide and problems with the justice system.

Only recently we have seen the report of the royal commission on the Marshall inquiry when Canadians have been told that, in fact, racial discrimination towards aboriginal people does exist. It is a sad state, Mr. Speaker.

The second reason why we should focus on the aboriginal youth is because the birth rate for native people is higher than for non-native Canadians. As a consequence, the aboriginal youth constitute a significant proportion of our native population. Therefore, their needs become greater and I should say quickly that their needs are truly urgent.

As a result of all of these things, we can anticipate increased family tensions and one does not have to quote any more statistics, because if there is higher unemployment for them, alcohol abuse, and drug problems, obviously the suicide problem will impact on the instability of the family. This must be addressed and must be addressed with initiatives, as indicated by the motion proposed.

The three specific areas that we are trying to address with this particular motion are health, education and employment. It is known that poverty, drug abuse, alcohol abuse, and geographic isolation would magnify any health problem any Canadian citizen would have. Because these problems are high among our native youth it should follow that they face these problems much more than the non-native Canadians.

The problem of their nutrition is also important. Just a few days ago my colleague from Nunatsiaq indicated to this House how, with the GST, the prices of food would increase in his part of the country. When the cost of food increases it should follow that access to them could be hindered and that would lead, or could lead, to malnutrition.

A University of Toronto study recently indicated that Indians on two northern Ontario reserves are twice as likely as an average Canadian to have a physical disability such as hearing, speaking and even seeing. This is as a consequence of poor living conditions and inadequacy of medical treatment and specialized medical services.

At one time the federal government agreed to transfer health care services to native control, but it was only a partial solution because the transfer of control was mainly administrative and the determination of the level of services that ought to be provided for native people was not given to them.

The second area is education. It is known that the schools are lacking in research. Not only are the schools lacking but the equipment for these schools is lacking. As well, the number of qualified teachers and teachers familiar with the cultural, language and sensitivity of native youth is absent.

On many reserves schools offer education only to a grade eight level. How can we expect them in the future to be as good as we are? That ought to be our challenge as we ought to provide for them as good an education as any other Canadian across the country. When the drop-out rate is very high, when only about 7 per cent of them—those between the ages of 20 and 24—are able to attend university levels, there is something wrong with our system in this country.

The availability of the services and the availability of opportunities ought to be open to all. Since education is a necessary tool to break the cycle of dependency, when that education is not attainable, then the dependency of our native population will continue to be present and that, of course, does not speak well for our country.

Hence, aboriginal people need a fully-integrated aboriginal education system that would care for and teach native children from a native perspective. Universities must be established throughout and should be made accessible to them. Do they have to travel far to obtain a university education? I think we can make universities reach them rather than their trying to reach universities to make the situation a more positive one.

The second point I would like to raise is that of employment. The opportunities for them, of course, are limited. Inherently, if one has a lesser level of education the opportunities will be less for them rather than having a greater level of training. So again, there is the vicious cycle. In fact, most recent equity reports have told us that the representation of natives in the employment force is not as much as we would like it to be. In other words, they are under-represented in employment and this is even true in the federal service where the federal government truly can have an immediate leadership role.

In conclusion, it is obvious that the native population and the native youth, in particular, are suffering in the areas of health, education and employment. It is vital for the government to develop special initiatives to respond to these needs. These needs must be developed and carried with full participation of native Canadians, otherwise the initiative may not see its full productive fruition.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I would like to thank my colleague from Nunatsiaq for introducing this motion for debate. I think it is a critical motion and one that the House should take seriously. I hope that it would take it more seriously given the number of speakers we have here in this House.

In winding up his motion, the member has indicated that special initiatives are required and that those initiatives should be taken in consultation with the native people. It is very important that we recognize that the solutions to these problems require special initiatives and that they cannot have any hope of success without consultation with the native people of Canada.

In introducing this motion back in November the member outlined a number of statistics that most of us as Canadians should find absolutely intolerable. These statistics related to infant mortality and the fact that infant mortality among native newborns is twice that of children in the whole population. He went on to tell us about a whole series of problems with respect to tuberculosis and respiratory diseases.

The member for Delta has just indicated that suicide is a serious problem among young people in native communities all across Canada, not simply in the north, but on Vancouver Island, the area of Canada I serve. The suicide rate among native children is extremely high, especially among native young men. Something must be done. Nothing can be done about this problem unless it is done in consultation with the native people themselves, keeping their particular experiences in mind.

I would like to point out that when native communities examine the problem of suicide they are able to come to conclusions which best reflect their culture. Having developed that view of the problem, they are also able to develop solutions that are more effective in their communities.

I would like to mention just one example. In communities in the Shuswap area of B.C. and also in the Cowichan area of Vancouver Island, native parents and communities were trying to find out what was causing suicides among their young people. They found out that suicide was related to a whole series of family problems, resulting from the system of residential schools that the Canadian government had imposed on Indian children. The government took the children away from their parents, put them in residential schools, and when those children came back they had lost all sense of how families operate, how to parent children, and of what the relationships are between children and parents in terms of things like incest taboos or the right to discipline children. They simply did not have that ability because the residential schools had been effective in destroying it.

Some communities in British Columbia, in order to deal with the family break-ups and the suicide problem, had to put families back together again and teach Indian children the whole concept of what an Indian family was all about. In effect, that concept had been destroyed in the Indian residential school system that Parliament had imposed on them for generation after generation.

What I am saying is that the solution to these problems are going to have to come from native communities themselves. They simply cannot do it without the resources being provided to them.

The member also mentioned low levels of education. Again, we are dealing with the same problems. I have had experience teaching native children in schools on the Queen Charlotte Islands and on the west coast of Vancouver Island. I know the problems we have in co-ordinating between the public school system and the kind of education that native children are looking for and require. The public school system across Canada has failed native children and native communities. There has to be changes in that system in order to make it possible for native children to succeed in the school system and to see that the school system works for them.

The same is true in the employment area that my colleague who introduced this motion mentioned as well. I live in a community where we have a fairly high level of unemployment in the native communities of my riding. That has not always been the case. I can recall visiting with families on the west coast of Vancouver Island who, when the fishery and processing facilities were all located on the west coast, native people had a high level of employment in those industries. Native people were considered the best workers in the industry. They did well financially and it was only when that employment was centralized in cities like Vancouver, Prince Rupert and Victoria, that their basic employment was taken away from them.

The issue is not that native people are incapable of working or incapable of the nine to five regime as organized by European society. They are extremely capable and effective workers. The problem is that our society does not hire them. I think it is important to reflect on the fact that there is no teeth in the employment equity legislation tabled in this House. There is nothing in that legislation to require companies that come within the federal jurisdiction to employ their required quota of native workers. They simply do not do it because they are not required to do so by the full sanctions of the law.

The same is true of federal government agencies whose employment equity programs operate under Treasury Board guidelines. This government does not even enforce its own guidelines on its own agencies. As a result, according to the Commissioner of Human Rights in this country, there is only one government agency that lives up to its employment equity requirements and that is the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. All the other departments of government, including Indian and Northern Health Services and entities of government that serve native people in this country, do not live up to their employment equity guidelines and their affirmative action requirements to employ native people in their departments.

We have to impose sanctions on those organizations to make them do the job we have instructed them to do in terms of affirmative action. It simply is not being done because the political will is not being expressed by this government or this Parliament in terms of native people. That is why I think it is important to deal with the motion put forward by my colleague.

Native people in Canada are marginalized people. We live in a country which was virtually taken over by immigrants. Now, native young people see themselves in a country which they once could look at as their own and see themselves as people who are isolated and marginalized. That kind of feeling is very destructive of the self-esteem and aspirations of native children.

It is possible for my children who are seventh-generation descendants of Irish and Scottish immigrants to look at Canada as a country that offers them more hope than their native neighbours who, to this day, claim legitimate ownership of this country. This is a problem still not resolved. Why does that happen? It happens because Parliament has not tried to resolved the unfinished business between Canadians and the native people of Canada so that we can live in this country as equals and that our children can look forward to a future of equal benefit to both of them.

What we need in this country is exactly what the member for Delta was talking about when he was talking about self-determination. The way we are going to succeed in having native children complete the education process and go on and become successful in the education system is to have native education systems. We will succeed when native children can go to school and learn from native teachers, learn aboriginal languages, and see their language, their school system and their teachers as being among the best in Canada and among the best that any other culture can offer. Then going to a native school is going to be perceived as something to do if one really wants to succeed.

When is native health care really going to serve the native citizens of our county? When the health care service is delivered by natives, administered by natives and oriented toward serving the community needs of native people of Canada. That is when it is going to be successful.

This Parliament has to realize that in order to be successful some of the power that we arrogate to ourselves or that the Department of Indian Affairs keeps to itself is going to have to be devolved and restored to those native communities that originally had those powers when they had their own right of self-government.

It is worth while that the member for Nunatsiaq has presented this motion for debate in Parliament. I have made a suggestion that was based on a proposal made to the aboriginal affairs committee by the Assembly of First Nations. I think that Parliament should take this suggestion seriously. It is that Parliament should be prepared to declare the 1990s the decade of aboriginal people in Canada. We have seen decades named similar to this before. We have seen the Decade of Women. We have seen the Year of Women in the Family declared by the United Nations.

Canada and this Parliament should take the step to declare the 1990s the decade of aboriginal people, setting as our objective the resolution of the unfinished business that exists between us and the aboriginal people of Canada. If we establish that objective for ourselves, then native people of this country will have something to look forward to.

It will be then that the statistics the member for Nunatsiaq talked about will be equalized to the benefit of all of us. It will be then that we will be able to reduce the number of health problems among native communities and be able to increase the educational opportunities of native Indians. It will be then that they will have the same opportunities as the rest of us in Canada.

Employment opportunities will be equal because this Parliament will have established it as an objective and declared the 1990s the decade in which we are going to resolve this problem. I hope Parliament will take this suggestion to heart.

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity today to take part in the debate on the motion presented by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Anawak), who is to be commended for his interest in the well-being of Canada's aboriginal people.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I would like to coment on the education system for aboriginal people. In Canada, aboriginal people and non-aboriginal people have access to education. This is part of being Canadian. For aboriginal people, education is probably the most precious thing anyone could give them. Why? The reason is simple. The aboriginal students of today are a vital resource, not only for their communities but also for Canada.

We all recognize that a solid education makes the ultimate goals of self-government and economic self-sufficiency attainable. There is no doubt that aboriginal people are also fully aware of this. In recent years, education has become a principal social concern. This interest has allowed aboriginal people to play a greater role in decision-making.

There was a time when the fate of aboriginal people was decided almost unilaterally by the federal government. That time is past.

Their increased participation in the area of education has resulted in improvements, not only in the quality of education but also in the number of graduates.

In order to lay to rest some of my colleagues' fears, Mr. Speaker, I would like to briefly describe the current system and outline the government's efforts to meet the needs and expectations of native people with regard to education.

When my colleague, the MP for Nunatsiaq, suggested that new initiatives be considered to meet the educational needs of natives, I sincerely wondered what he had in mind! The federal Government uses not one, but three, school systems to provide primary and secondary educational services for aboriginal people.

These services include federal schools, for which the Department of Indian Affaires and Nothern Development is responsible, band-operated schools on reserves, and schools run by provincial school boards.

In addition to providing a basic curriculum, many of these schools offer courses designed to meet the special needs of native people. These courses are offered from kindergarten right through to the last year of high school.

Furthermore, the federal policy of transferring control of native education to aboriginal people has led to new initiatives throughout the country. During the past ten years, a growing number of bands have taken charge of their school curriculum. Band-operated schools have been established across Canada.

In less than fifteen years, the number of schools located on reserves and run by band school boards has risen from 54 to 262.

In 1976-77, the number of students enrolled in these schools was 3,340. They now number nearly 30,000. These are indeed revealing figures.

It is particularly interesting to note that these schools have experienced an increase in enrolment at the secondary level. The number of students in secondary schools administered by bands has almost doubled in the past five years, increasing from 3,818 in 1984 to 6,839 last year.

Increased participation by parents and the community in the education process has certainly played an important role. However, we must not underestimate the impact of special training programs for native teachers, initiated by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

This initiative made it possible to increase the number of native people employed in band-operated schools.

Currently, about thirty per cent of the teachers in federal and band-operated schools are native.

In addition, thanks to the department's alternative funding arrangements program, bands have greater flexibility in developing academic programs which are better adapted to their local values and needs.

All these initiatives have improved school attendance and student perseverance. It is clear that the increase in the number of students at the secondary level was bound to have a significant impact on post-secondary programs sooner or later.

In the past few years, native enrolment in post-secondary studies has increased significantly.

From 1981 to 1988, the number of aboriginal students at the post-secondary level rose from 5,467 to 15,084.

In less than thirteen years, the budget increased from $4.2 million to $130 million.

In order to continue to meet the growing demands of Indian students, bands, and political organizations, the governement began talks with the First Nations to find acceptable and practical solutions to post-secondary education. Bilateral agreements were signed with six political organizations and one educational organization on a procedure for discussion and negotiation of all fundamental issues. I am pleased that a consensus has already been reached on a number of matters.

• (1750)

As you know, this policy was discussed at great length in the House last April, so I will not dwell on the details of this program.

However, I would like to remind my hon. colleagues that the federal government developed this new program not only to help native people gain access to post-secondary education, but above all to make it easier for them to acquire a degree or a diploma. Post-secondary education is essential in order to enable aboriginal people to achieve their objectives of political autonomy and economic self-sufficiency.

The approach adopted by the current government is already showing encouraging results. I agree, Mr. Speaker, that there is still room for improvement.

However, I am convinced that with the increased participation and decision-making of native bands and councils, the current educational system will have a signficant impact on the entire aboriginal community.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Nunatsiaq again for making us aware of the importance of native people in our country and I hope that our government will have the opportunity in the coming months and years to devote more financial and human resources all the time so that native people, who are full members of Canada, enjoy a better, more abundant life that will not only be a credit to each and every one of us here in the House but also to the whole country to which I am proud to belong. Mr. Speaker, I know that all my colleagues here, and in particular those on the government side, fully support me in this and in the measures that we are putting forward to improve this situation.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to thank my hon. colleague from Nunatsiaq for the opportunity to speak to the motion that he has brought forward dealing with aboriginal youth. The motion clearly states that what the government should consider is the development of special initiatives, in consultation with aboriginal peoples, to respond to the serious employment, education and health needs of aboriginal youth.

These are areas to which we can all truly relate and understand in light of many of the concerns that we face these days with our aboriginal youth across Canada. These concerns are not isolated to various regions. They are pervasive concerns. They go from coast to coast to coast and from community to community, from family to family and from individual to individual.

The right hon. Leader of the Opposition, the leader of our party, stated that one of the key elements of success for any society is to make an investment in education. In the aboriginal communities we have come a long way since the early 1950s and the early parts of this century. My leader said: "Education is the best investment we can give to start to combat unemployment."

Our Prime Minister has said from time to time that the best social policy is a job. These two go hand in hand. We need to pool our resources and our efforts.

I consider this to be a non-partisan issue in that it concerns the future of Canada. If we were able to deliver from the onset a series of programs and initiatives that would help the aboriginal communities, a large portion of the costs of social services and programs would not necessarily be needed.

I want to refer to a number of experiences I have had. In the last week I was in Washington, D.C., when the President of the United States gave a state of the union address. In this address President Bush made a commitment to the youth of the United States to go forward with resources and initiatives that would help them train for a technological age which would better equip them.

What we have to do with the aboriginal community and the aboriginal youth is not to marginalize them to various sectors of training. We have to throw open the doors and make available education of every sort and every type. Aboriginal people may want to train for a particular career or a particular job, and that should be available to them.

I had the opportunity in December to tour my constituency and to visit a number of residential schools where I met at least 50 teenagers who were in their high school years. These are the future leaders of my particular area. I am sure that across Canada there are many such youths. These people are not people who are ridden with social malaise. These are not youth who are ridden with social problems. These are youth who have an optimistic future and who, given the opportunity, given the resources, given every bit of effort that we can muster, will be able to make it, not just through high school but to post-secondary education. I had the opportunity to speak to these young people. It does well for these young people to see models who come in contact with them.

I want to say that we have to give encouragement in our own communities. I say that because I am an aboriginal person. I have three children. I come from a family of 15 surviving children. My family has benefited greatly from education.

I think one of the truly great experiences that we can offer to our aboriginal youth is to help them to broaden their horizons. I think how that can come about is through some very simple ways. One is that the government makes the resources available because education is a definite investment. It is a good investment which has positive results for the government and for the country as well. I think what happens is that when you put money into programs for students you are bound to come out with something that is going to help not just that student or that individual but that family, that community and that region.

It has been proven in many aboriginal communities that an aboriginal youth who has gained a high school education, who has a college or a university degree, is an individual who gives back to his community in spades.

I also want to say that there are a number of concerns which plague us. One of the areas that we have to think about is health. In the health area we have to think of essentials. Every student needs a place to sleep, a place called home. Every youth needs proper nutrition. Every young student needs proper child care. Every student needs to be protected and to have a home to go to, to be able to have quarters in which to study. These are things which we may not think about but they are very important.

We also have to be daring in our initiatives. We have to be risk takers. What we as the leaders in this country have to do is to put resources where we will produce results. These results will show in the area of the people having gained excellence in a number of areas such as the arts, music, if possible, and education—

Mr. Milliken: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

It is before six o'clock. I know that there is a disposition on the part of members on this side of the House to discuss the goods and services tax. I wonder if there would be unanimous consent to allow the sitting to resume following the late show for the purpose of discussing Bill C–62 until midnight.

We would be prepared to give unanimous consent so that we would have the opportunity to discuss the bill. I think there might be a disposition on the part of the House to allow that.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

TOURIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today as a result of a question that I asked in the House on October 2, 1989.

At that time I raised serious concerns about the devastating impact that the goods and services tax would have on the Canadian tourism industry, especially in Atlantic Canada.

On that particular day I asked the minister about the negative impact on Atlantic tourism, one of the few industries in Atlantic Canada that has not been devastated so far by this government's policies. The response I got that day from the minister responsible was absolutely incredible. The minister responsible indicated to me that there was nothing to worry about, because what was going to happen was that foreign tourists coming into Canada were going to have an exemption. They would not have to pay the tax, so everything was going to be fine and good and there was no problem in Atlantic Canada, especially in the tourism sector.

• (1800)

It is obvious that the minister simply does not understand his portfolio. If he understood his portfolio, he would not have given that answer. In my home province of Nova Scotia the economic value of tourism is at least $760 million a year. I believe those figures that we put together were from May 15 to October 31, 1988, so we are not even talking about a full year here. The value for three-quarters of the year in the tourism industry in Nova Scotia was $760 million, one of the largest industries in Atlantic Canada, one of the largest industries in Nova Scotia and one, thank goodness, that was doing fairly well. We have a lot to attract visitors there.

What the minister opposite failed to realize was that in Atlantic Canada, in Nova Scotia in particular, of 1,222,000 who visited that province between May 15 and October 31, 1988, fully 74 per cent or 903,000 of those visitors were Canadians.

The incredible response that I received in the House to my question on October 2 was the minister basically saying that for the first time in history this government was going to treat foreigners better than Canadians. He said that if you come from the United States of America, the government will not tax you, but if you are part of the 74 per cent or almost one million Canadians who are seeking a seaside holiday and choose to come to Nova Scotia to enjoy it and to spend money in my province, you will be taxed.

It was absolutely shameful for the minister to stand up and think that he was delivering good news. It certainly showed that he knew very little, if anything, about his portfolio. He certainly showed that day that he knew nothing about the tourism sector in Nova Scotia.

The tourism industry and its representatives in Nova Scotia have spoken against the goods and services tax. They spoke against it when it was proposed by this government. They spoke against it when the finance committee met in Halifax, when it was at that point a proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax. Since that period in time, the government has lowered it to 7 per cent and thinks that everybody is going to swallow that. Government members like to stand up and state that the tourism sector, or the restaurant sector, are really in support of the GST as long as it does not affect them, or as long as the rate is low.

Quite clearly, they do not even read the the press. They have not even read, or if they have, they have not understood, what has been said at the finance committee hearings. I refer to the Chronicle Herald of Saturday, January 20, 1990, where the headline states: "TIANS drops GST support". The Tourism Industry Association of Nova Scotia stated:

> "As far as prices are concerned, there is no question the GST will be devastating to the tourism industry", Gordon Harmer, the group's chief executive officer, said Friday in an interview.

He also stated:

> The national group predicts the GST will rip $1 billion out of Canada's tourism industry and force at least 25,000 people out of work.

Yet when I asked my question in the House of the minister who should have been responsible for tourism, he stood in his place and told me that things have never been so good. He said: "Don't worry about it because the people who are coming from the United States are not going to be taxed".

What I have said in this House before is that this government's goods and services tax is going to absolutely cripple and devastate the tourism industry in Nova Scotia and across Canada. What the government is going to do with its goods and services tax, this brilliant piece of Toryism, is drive Canadians who are seeking a seaside holiday state-side. The only people who will benefit from the 7 per cent goods and service will be some of President Bush's buddies in Kennebunkport. When Canadians are considering a holiday and want some Atlantic seaboard hospitality, they will go to Maine where they do not have to pay a 7 per cent tax. That is exactly what they are going to do.

With the figures that I have put forward in the House tonight as a further elaboration of my question, surely the minister or the parliamentary secretary will be able to give me a better answer. Surely to goodness since October 2 they have had an opportunity to check the facts. Surely to goodness since October 2 they have had a chance to check the record and to consult with some people in the tourism industry. I look forward to their response today. The only reasonable response is for the Conservative Government to drop the goods and services tax because it knows that nobody in this country supports it, and that the one growth industry that it has not been able to cripple so far is the Atlantic Canadian tourism industry.

I look forward to a very positive reply from my colleagues on the opposite side of the House. I am sure that the logic and the facts that I have just given them would show any reasonable individual that the goods and services tax will be devastating to the tourism industry in Atlantic Canada, in particular in Nova Scotia, and that no Canadian government would ever support a tax or a policy that would give foreigners in Canada preferential treatment over Canadians.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear that the hon. member opposite is so sensitive to the tourism industry. Certainly, as one who has been involved in that industry for the past decade, both as a publisher and as a volunteer in promoting the industry, I was interested in hearing his comments. I am even more delighted to set him straight on a couple of the errors that he made in his discussion.

First, I would like to emphasize that the federal government recognizes and remains committed to enhancing the important role of tourism in our economy. In this context, we believe that the GST will be a vast improvement over the present federal sales tax which restricts Canada's economic growth. The new tax will help Canada compete in the world economy, and people in the tourism industry will appreciate that.

In collaboration with representatives of the tourism industry, the minister has undertaken extensive consultations with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, regarding the effect of the GST on the international competitiveness of the industry. I am happy to report that, based upon the information provided in the recently released technical paper, these efforts have resulted in provisions that reflect consistent application of the underlying principle of the GST which is designed to improve the competitiveness of Canada's export industries. Among them, we include tourism, which is an export industry.

Thus, purchases of goods and accommodation by foreign visitors will be eligible for a rebate. The GST rebates to foreign visitors have provisions that are not available in other countries with similar taxes and that is a distinct advantage to our tourism operators here in Canada.

For example, Canada is the only country in the world with a value-added tax to offer a rebate on accommodation. International passenger transportation, both inbound and outbound, and inbound air travel purchased in the U.S. will be exempt from the goods and services tax. More people coming into the country and spending money help support our economy. Also, cruise ship operations to points outside Canada will be included. In addition, public and private sector attractions will be treated equally.

Measures have been put in place to ease the administrative burden on small business. Businesses with annual sales of less than $30,000, which includes very many small tourism operators along the border, will be able to opt out of the GST system entirely and an administration fee will be available to small businesses that will also be allowed to remit the tax less frequently than other businesses. These measures, I believe, demonstrate clearly the government's recognition of the importance of the tourism industry in the export sector.

It is also important to note that the Conference Board of Canada's projections indicate continuing growth in the tourism industry. The initial impact of the tax may be a slight decline in the rate of that growth, however, the industry will continue to grow to provide jobs for Canadians and revenues for the private sector and governments. Once the tax is in place and the over-all economic benefits from a more efficient tax system are felt, the tourism industry will grow more than it would have without the GST.

A number of studies undertaken by Tourism Canada, for example, have indicated that Canadian tourism prices are generally considered to be competitive to prices in the United States and other jurisdictions, especially when the total package of goods and services bought by tourists is considered.

A recent survey indicated that in the United States lodging, meal and domestic airfare costs are higher than those in Canada by 36 per cent, 20 per cent and 17 per cent, respectively. Tourism Canada is currently conducting a major new travel price value perception study to evaluate price as a factor in the influencing of travel to and from Canada. My colleagues would be pleased to make this information available to interested members when the study is completed in the fall of 1990.

With respect to travel in Canada by Canadians, I believe that it is important not to overstate the significance of the GST. Even relatively small fluctuations in exchange rates will more than offset any incentives under the new tax to travel abroad. It should not be forgotten that Canadians travel in their own country for a variety of reasons, to visit friends—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would love to hear the hon. member for another few minutes, but her time has more than expired.

CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon on the question I asked last week of the Minister of National Revenue. It is based on the fact that each year 5 million Canadians claim charitable gifts of $2.5 billion to Canada's 60,000 registered charities on their income tax return.

Canadians from all walks of life give millions of hours of their time as volunteers to these organizations. All Canadians benefit immeasurably from the work of the charities sector. Charities include welfare agencies, hospitals, universities, colleges, religious groups, and a myriad of community organizations established to assist those in need in every part of the country and to address such issues as the environment and the advancement of aboriginal peoples.

Throughout Canadian society, charities play a vital role in providing service in all facets of life, often delivering a more responsive, effective and economical service than could be provided through government action.

Historically, the federal government has recognized and supported this important contribution of charities by the granting of special tax status to charities. Charities are exempt from tax on their income, and donors may claim a tax credit or a deduction.

It is axiomatic that all charities rely on the goodwill of the public to accomplish their works. That this goodwill exists can be seen from the time and the money given freely by the people of this country. Canadians are justly proud of the vitality of the charities sector which reflects on the health of the country as a whole.

To my mind, the key to preserving a healthy charities sector is in maintaining that sector's credibility with Canadians. Only by sustaining this credibility will charities be able to continue to rely on the public to respond generously to their appeals for support.

It is regrettable, though perhaps not surprising, that on the relatively infrequent occasions when an individual associated with a charity steps outside the law, widespread media attention is paid to the issue. Too often the public reacts against the sector, rather than the individuals involved. On these occasions, it is unfortunate that the whole of the sector is harmed by the actions of the few. When these kinds of reports threaten to erode public confidence in the sector as a whole, this is a very serious matter for all Canadians.

I should stress that, to my knowledge, there is no widespread abuse by registered charities. But it does seem to me that the special tax treatment of charities must be justifiable to all taxpayers who must pay for the special tax concessions provided charities, because they in turn must shoulder a larger share of the tax burden.

I would therefore ask the Minister of National Revenue to let us know whether the government intends to ensure that public confidence in the sector is not eroded by the actions of a few charities such as we have seen in the last few months and which have been so widely published in the media.

• (1815)

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the hon. member for putting the question and congratulate him on the interest that he has demonstrated for this very important sector.

In answer to the question at the end of his statement, that is why we are conducting a review. As I pointed out in an answer to a question in the House just last week, and I will quote part of it: "There are some 60,000 charitable organizations across this country, the great majority of which are very legitimate organizations and benefit society as a whole.The hon. member is correct in saying that over the past months and the past couple of years there have been a few who have taken advantage of some loopholes and have abused the system at the expense of the majority of the others. Therefore, as recently as last November I advised my officials to begin a comprehensive review of the whole system. We are now in the process of consulting with interested individuals and organizations across the country with a view to eliminating any abuse that may in fact exist. Our objective is to make the system fairer, simpler and better for the majority of legitimate charitable organizations in this country."

This review then is intended to improve the system while maintaining and improving the credibility of the majority of charitable organizations across the country that contribute so much to our society.

Some of the things that we are looking at in the review, because we have been asked quite specifically as to what we are looking at, is to look at ways and means to open up the reporting from the charitable organizations so that there cannot be the abuse by a few individuals within certain organizations at the expense of the majority of the others.

The other area that we are looking at is to make the system clearer and simpler, as well as the definitions and regulations. All of this is being done in consultation with the representatives from the sector and those consultations are ongoing today.

It is my hope and my wish that by this autumn we will have a discussion paper for the public to look at, hopefully with some recommendations that I could bring back to my cabinet colleagues, particularly the Minister of Finance and the Department of Finance so that if there are any amendments to the Income Tax Act that have to be put, we would be able to do so in consultation, obviously, with the department and with cabinet as a whole. The timing in that area is to look at the early part of next year.

I am very sensitive at the same time to the special problems facing charities which rely on volunteers and limited resources. I will personally ensure that these are fully taken into account in the course of the review. The aim of the review is to ensure that the administration of the tax law contributes to the effectiveness of the sector without increasing the paper burden on individual charities.

Finally, I wish to reassure charities that the government continues to be committed to a strong, charitable sector and the objectives inherent in the present tax measures. The review that I have initiated is directed toward providing a simpler, fairer and more effective administration of the income tax measures in place to assist charities. Improvements will be made for the benefit of all legitimate charitable organizations and for Canadian society as a whole.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the city of Thunder Bay at committee of the whole last Monday passed a motion to make the city unilingual—English only. Unfortunately, this has been interpreted as anti-French, anti-minority and anti-Quebec.

Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to all members of this House and Canadians that this is simply not so. This vote expresses the frustration and the dissatisfaction with this government. It is a backlash.

Never before have residents of northern Ontario felt so alienated, so excluded and so ignored by this government. This government's policies show complete disregard for the needs of northern Ontario people.

It has eliminated our passenger rail service. There is a 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber. There is a closure of rural post offices. There is a lack of satisfactory roads. Gas prices are exorbitant. There is lack of enough grain to ship through our port, and now we have to face the goods and services tax and what it will do to an already troubled economy.

There is fear, although unfounded, about the rights of northern Ontario if we don't, like myself, speak French.

People in northern Ontario and Thunder Bay are patient and caring people. We are not saying "No" to our fellow Canadians from Quebec. We have the highest respect for them. We value the rights of all Canadians and all minorities.

All we ask is for this government to give us an equal chance—nothing special but an equal chance for all Canadians in the north to participate in the Canadian dream.

CEREBRAL PALSY TELETHON

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Over the past weekend, Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of participating actively in the 14th Cerebral Palsy Telethon in my Laurentides riding. I wish to emphasize the outstanding effort made by the organizing committee and the great many volunteers. They all spent a lot of time and energy to make this event an unqualified success and finally reached their target.

Mr. Speaker, I wish also to pay tribute to all the people who responded generously to this appeal. The commitment of all my constituents will certainly help the efforts of the scientists who are involved in cerebral palsy research with the hope that we may eventually refer to this condition as a thing of the past.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, across Canada the Canada Post Corporation has been telling Canadians it is committed to providing services for rural Canada.

We all remember the full page newspaper ads which appeared recently stating in large letters: "We are in rural Canada to stay". Once again, Canada Post is hiding behind its own propaganda.

On February 26, Canada Post will close the post office in Dubuc, Saskatchewan, forcing Dubuc residents to a neighbouring community for its retail postal services. Canada Post is obviously not in rural Canada to stay.

I call on the minister responsible for Canada Post to halt immediately this particular closing and commit the government to the delivery of quality postal service for all rural Canadians by maintaining full service post offices throughout Canada.

WHITE CANE WEEK

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec East): This being the White Cane Week, Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind my hon. colleagues in the House and the general public that all Canadians have the basic right to participate fully in our society, reach their goals and develop their potential. However, for the 500,000 blind and visually impaired people in Canada, leading a normal life has its problems. To fully participate in the life of their country, citizens of both sexes must have access to the information they need to make wise decisions. Unfortunately, blind and visually handicapped people cannot read printed material.

During this week which is focused on free access to information, we should altogether find out ways to make sure that visually impaired Canadians are fully informed. In this regard, I wish to emphasize the tremendous contribution of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and the Canadian Council of the Blind who are partners in this quest for universal equality.

CANADIAN EXPLORATION INCENTIVE PROGRAM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on May 3, 1988 the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program (CEIP) was annouced in response to the concerns voiced by the resource industry. Mining companies were worried about the negative impact of two factors on their ability to raise new capital through the issue of flow-through shares to support exploration activity, namely the stock market crash of October 1987 and the tax reform. That program will terminate on December 31, 1990.

For some months now, the Association des prospecteurs du Québec fears that the next federal budget may dump that program. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituency of Abitibi a prime mining area, I urge the government to consider seriously the concerns of the Quebec Mining Association and Quebec prospectors.

BILL C-21

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, our parliamentary system is becoming a farce at the hands of this government. The Unemployment Insurance Bill C-21, has not yet been enacted but the Minister of Employment and Immigration already has asked employers to deduct premiums under the amendments proposed in that bill.

[English]

Mr. Jim O'Harra, a constituent of mine, 76 years of age, is holding down a full-time job to help supplement his pension. He called my office because his employer has already been deducting UI premiums from his pay. The hon. member for St. Boniface has received similar complaints.

When a bill has not received the approval of Parliament, this government has no authority to take money from people who can ill afford to pay these premiums.

[Translation]

I am urging the government to stop that ridiculous action and show a little more respect for Parliament and the people we are representing.

RIDING OF CHAMBLY

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, in the Chambly election the NDP candidate has missed no opportunity to unfairly attack the GST bill, the legislation concerning the sales tax reform on goods and services.

However, the former president of the Automobile Association, that champion of automobile owners, deliberately omitted to inform constituents in Chambly of the savings they will be making when they buy their next cars, thanks to the GST. They will be paying roughly $800 less for a $12,000 to $15,000 car, roughly $1,200 less for an $18,000 to $20,000 car.

Why has he lacked the honesty to inform constituents in Chambly? Isn't it time to do it now, tell the truth to constituents in Chambly? Unless of course the NDP candidate caught that double-speak contagion, the double-speak on Meech Lake.

Mr. Speaker, does he support lower prices for cars, yes or no?

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in this House to raise an important environmental issue affecting not only the residents of Maple, but millions of people in Ontario.

Governments at all levels claim to care about our environment. However, government actions taken to date in relation to the Keele Valley landfill site issue indicate that the political rhetoric of governments far outweigh their true commitment to safeguarding our environment.

The Keele Valley landfill site is situated in the Oak Ridges Moraine and on top of two major aquifers which feed Lake Ontario, the source of drinking and utility water for millions of Ontarians.

The expansion of the Keele Valley landfill site has the potential to seriously contaminate the quality of our water.

This is not the time to by pass environmental assessments. This is not the time to make politically expedient decisions. This is the time to look at intelligent alternatives to the problem and replace the rhetoric with substantive solutions.

I ask and urge the Minister of the Environment, the Hon. Lucien Bouchard, to intervene in this issue so that we can find an environmentally sound resolution to this very pressing environmental problem.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, last night we saw another example of callous acceptance of violence against women. A woman was sexually assaulted on a busy intersection in Calgary. She was running down the street naked, begging for help. Brian Dorscht was the only person who responded to her screams for help. Other people simply shouted obscene remarks and encouragement to the attacker. A police officer brushed off the tragedy saying: "Of course people will catcall when they see a naked woman."

We must make educational programs for judges, police, and the public to fight violence against women a priority in this House.

We can remove the "honest belief" clause from the Criminal Code which allows men to get away with rape. We can remove the regulatory red tape that is—

[Editor's Note: And the hon. members for Vancouver Quadra and Windsor West having entered the Chamber]

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

RECYCLING

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Brampton—Malton): Mr. Speaker, last week I was pleased to learn of an environmental initiative taking place in Mississauga which I believe deserves our attention.

McDonald's Restaurants of Canada Limited has launched its first Canadian community-wide recycling program in all 10 of its Mississauga restaurants which includes the outlet in Malton.

McDonald's has been an environmentally conscious leader in the restaurant industry for some time and in 1987 was already phasing out the use of CFC-12, the fully halogenated chlorofluorocarbon which destroys our fragile ozone layer.

With its recycling program under way McDonald's restaurants in Mississauga are setting a pace for the restaurant industry to become environmentally conscious.

Perhaps more importantly it is a message that reaches our children. They will learn through recycling programs such as these that preservation of the environment is a responsibility we all share. What better way to ensure an environmentally sound future?

S. O. 31

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, there is mounting concern about the Great Lakes ecosystem and the threat pollution poses to public health, yet this government has left vacant since last summer the Canadian chair of the International Joint Commission.

Why is the government taking so long to find a suitable replacement? Canada needs a strong commissioner committed to public health, the rehabilitation of the ecosystem and one who is familiar with pressing and difficult issues.

The Great Lakes pose a significant challenge to the IJC, but they are only part of a mandate that includes bilateral issues from St. John's to Vancouver. The IJC needs a full slate of commissioners to represent Canadian interests.

We urge the government to fill this vacancy quickly with a competent person. The Minister of the Environment must ensure that Canada has the means to live up to its commitments.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, people on the prairies are getting sick and tired of the Minister of Communications unilaterally dictating what should happen to the prairie phone systems.

Yesterday, a report was released by Dr. Robert Olley of the University of Saskatchewan who is respected as an expert on telecommunications economics across North America. In it he clearly demonstrates that based on actual 1988 figures local phone rates for rural users would jump 167 per cent and those for urban users 140 per cent under the minister's proposals.

Clearly, what the minister is proposing would cut off rural, isolated and low-income Canadians from basic phone service, their lifeline to the communications system of the future. If the minister realizes this, he should withdraw his proposals immediately. If he does not, the Prime Minister should replace him, and replace him now.

TRIBUTES—THE RIGHT HON. JOHN N. TURNER

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise with the permission of the House to comment on the decision announced earlier today by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, at some early moment I understand, to leave public life. I want to begin by saying, on behalf of all members of this House and I think all Canadians, that his departure will be deeply regretted by Canadians and he will be genuinely missed across this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: The Leader of the Opposition has held the highest positions in government, including Minister of Justice, Minister of Finance and Prime Minister. All of these functions, without exception, he exercised with dignity and grace. Clearly, we have not always agreed on every issue—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: —but on most of them. There were some modest differences over the years.

I have always been aware of the largeness of view, the innate Canadianism and the genuine love of Canada that marked all of his actions.

Of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition it should be said that when he faced a choice between party advantage or what was good for Canada, he always chose the latter, as, for example, in his undeviating support for the Meech Lake Accord, not an easy choice for anyone. However, as he accurately observed in a very eloquent phrase, I believe, it placed him and his party on the right side of history.

I can now say today what I could not say as freely before. In the House he was tough and unrelenting, and I have all the scars you would ever want to see to prove it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Apart from that, he was also fair.

John Turner was and is an outstanding parliamentarian with a finely tuned understanding of what this House is all about. His reverence for this Chamber was both evident and impressive. He is a man of strong convictions and courage, a man who soldiered on when the going got tough, a man who smiled in the face of adversity and who never complained publicly, ever, in moments of what must have been for him, as comes to all leaders, private dismay.

I have always thought that there is a special place in heaven for those who have had to lead the Opposition in Canada. For the sake of the right hon. member for Yellowhead and myself, there had better be.

• (1420)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: One does not always receive in that job the adulation and universal acclaim that goes hand in hand with being Prime Minister.

It takes patience, a lot of patience and strong convictions. But above all, Mr. Speaker, it takes courage, something the Leader of the Liberal Party has never lacked.

I think that at this point it would be appropriate to recall that about 25 years ago, as Minister of Justice, the Leader of the Liberal Party tabled the first Official Languages Act in this House. Throughout his career, he has demonstrated his loyalty to the basic principle of equality between both major language groups in this country.

All Canadians who are anxious to preserve the unity of our country will never forget this outstanding contribution by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

The Leader of the Opposition took strong stands on major issues. There was never any doubt about where he stood on issues ranging from free trade to Meech Lake or national defence. He hurled himself into the fray with vigour and the joy of battle. In many ways some of the words of Teddy Roosevelt spoken decades ago at the Sorbonne clearly apply to the Leader of the Opposition:

> It is not the critic who counts; not the man who points out how the strong man stumbles, or where the doer of deeds could have done them better.
> The credit belongs to the man who is actually in the arena, whose face is marred by dust and sweat and blood; who strives valiantly; who errs, and comes up short again and again; because there is not effort without error and shortcoming; but who does actually strive to do the deeds; who knows the great enthusiasms, the great devotions; who spends himself in a worthy cause, who at the best knows in the end the triumphs of high achievement and who at the worst, if he fails, at least fails while daring greatly, so that his place shall never be with those cold and timid souls who know neither victory nor defeat.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a description of a man of courage and the Leader of the Opposition is, indeed, all of those things.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

To his wife Geills and family our very best wishes for a future of good health and accomplishment and serenity together. You, John, have served Canada well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly like to add the congratulations and best wishes of the New Democratic Party.

[Translation]

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, elected to the House of Commons for the first time in 1962, has represented various ridings in three provinces and has never lost an election. That is a good example to follow!

The hon. member's profound respect for parliamentary democracy is well-known. He sees the role of the House of Commons as central to our parliamentary system.

It is one of his great qualities we admire and respect.

[English]

I had the opportunity to speak to the former leader of the New Democratic Party with whom the right hon. Leader of the Opposition served for a number of years. He wants to add his best wishes for the future.

I have looked over the accomplishments of the hon. member. He deserves the fine tributes that he has received from the Prime Minister today. They come from our party as well.

Being a relatively new leader, I thought looking at some of his background could be an instructive experience. I noted that he was the Canadian junior champion in the 100 and 220-yard sprint—something obviously useful in politics, particularly if you happened to be Minister of Finance. I think the current Minister of Finance might agree.

Some hon. members: Oh, Oh!

Ms. McLaughlin: I noted also that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition used to write a column in the Ubyssey called "Chalk Talk With Chick Turner". Since we do sometimes go back to the successes of our youth as we move on to new things I will now be looking for a column entitled, perhaps, "Straight Talk from Bay Street on Free Trade", or something like that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Ms. McLaughlin: I do want to say sincerely that it has been a privilege to serve in this House with the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. I want to tell the Leader of the Opposition and his family what Ed Broadbent said to me when I spoke to him. He said: "If I were to sum up the Leader of the Opposition I would say he is a fine man, an honourable politician and a great Canadian".

We add our best wishes for your future and that of your family.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I know I speak for all members of the Liberal caucus today when I say to John Turner that notwithstanding the turbulence of days gone by and notwithstanding the preoccupation with the days ahead of us, each and every one of us has been proud, exceptionally proud, to stand with you, sir, through two general elections.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: In the history of every political party, in particular one that has been as successful as ours over the decades, there must from time to time—and the Prime Minister alluded to this—be a period of opposition. The forces of history, forces that are greater than any one individual, set of individuals, or organization deem that there must be a period of opposition.

The challenge of leadership in those times is one of renewal and rebirth. In that regard, John Turner, you have fulfilled your mandate as leader of our party with integrity, total commitment, courage and, I believe, with great success.

Many of us on this side of the House and in this caucus have on some days and on some issues failed to persuade you, sir, to our personal point of view. But none of us has ever doubted that no matter what the day or what the issue, you have always made your decision based on deep personal conviction and with courage for what you believe to be in the best interest of Canada and, indeed, the best interest of the party, the Liberal Party of Canada of which you have been leader.

You are a House of Commons man through and through. You have achieved that rare distinction in politics where not only your colleagues in this caucus, but indeed your contemporaries on all sides of the House, acknowledge your commitment to the institution of Parliament.

Many men and women from every part of Canada have the privilege to serve in this place, but few of us, very few, ever come to symbolize the institution at its best. You are one of the few. In that sense, you, John Turner, will always remain an important part of this place.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1430)

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, may I also report to you and my colleagues in all parties in the House, on behalf of the Liberal Party in Parliament, that we have unanimously endorsed the recommendation of our party leader that the member for Windsor West become, effective today, Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, and all colleagues that under the dynamic leadership of our colleague for Windsor West, we shall remain an effective and responsible opposition in the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think under the circumstances I could be permitted a minute or two to respond to the kind words of our caucus chairman and to join in the tribute to the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra.

As I said outside the House earlier today, I heard the announcement of the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra to our caucus this morning with mixed emotions. There was the feeling of sadness that we would no longer have his courageous and supportive leadership, we would no longer have his capacity for friendship, encouragement and support. At the same time, we know that we are left with his example of courage, his example of integrity.

We will have the example of his dedication to Parliament, to our country, to Canada.

[English]

We are also heartened by the fact that he is remaining as member for Vancouver Quadra and, therefore, we will be able to call upon him to assist us in our work in this House, to show us by example how to participate effectively in the interests of Canada in the great debates in this House on the future of our country.

I said that I heard the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra's announcement with mixed emotions. I mentioned my sadness and the sadness of my colleagues at his statement that he would no longer carry on as Leader of the Opposition. But I do have to say, particularly in response to the words of the chairman of our caucus, that I heard the words of the kind he has expressed today in our caucus this morning about me with extreme gratitude and honour.

For those of us who have feelings about Parliament, the concept of the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues holding the government to account, providing an alternative, providing a voice for those Canadians who are dissatisfied with the government and demand a change, is something very important.

I want to say to all members of the House, and the country that I, for one, together with my colleagues, intend to do my best to see that the traditional duties of the Leader of the Opposition are carried out to the utmost.

[Translation]

It is very important for us in the Opposition, and for me, as Leader of the Opposition, to hold the government accountable to the Canadian people and to provide a voice for Canadians who are dissatisfied with this government and desire change.

[English]

It is a great honour to have the position of Leader of the Opposition, even for a limited period. That is why, as I have said, I am so gratified by the support of my colleagues. In this connection, I also want to say that I am gratified by the continued support of the people of my own community who have made it possible for me to be here as member for Windsor West and thereby to carry on this additional responsibility.

We have, in the opposition, in the Liberal Party in Parliament at this particular time a special responsibility, not just the traditional responsibility I have outlined of holding the government to account, providing an alternative and providing a voice for Canadians dissatisfied with the government, but also to provide a base so that, if I may be permitted to say so, the new leader of the party will be able to build on that base to bring into Parliament a new Liberal government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): In conclusion, I want to remind members of this House about what the Prime Minister just said about being in the arena of political combat, a combat which is ultimately in the best interests of this country. I once again thank my colleagues for their kind words, and I say to them—

[Translation]

It is time to get back to work. We have an important task to fulfil for the people of this country. Thank you.

[English]

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief and non-partisan.

It is a poignant moment when you reach the stage in your political career when you are saying good-bye more often than you are saying hello. We have certainly reached that stage. However, I want to say a few words about the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, a former Prime Minister and a former Minister of Finance of this country, as a son of British Columbia.

We all are Canadians and we are proud of that, but we are also proud of our regions. John Turner represented all Canadians all the time, but he also had that special flavour that we in British Columbia know about. He did us proud. He enabled us, regardless of party lines, to become friends. One of the happiest moments for me in politics is to reflect on the friendships that I have made over these 30 years, and one of the best friendships, I say unashamedly, is with my colleague John Turner. Even though he is in the wrong party, he still is a good friend.

John Turner gave his word when we made deals or had conversations or arrangements, as are necessary in the various roles we have in politics. When he gave his word, that was it, and that was the hallmark of his service to this country. He was always loyal to his party, always loyal to his word, loyal to his country, but more important, always loyal to his family.

I am sorry to see him go. He has a few more months left. He represents a British Columbia seat, so he should come with us where he will have some company.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to trespass too much on the time of the House.

As the Deputy Prime Minister knows, on an earlier occasion, on May 3, we have been through this all before.

I do want to acknowledge the very generous, gracious words of the Prime Minister of Canada. I was particularly taken by his citation from Teddy Roosevelt. I do not attribute anything Freudian to that reference. I might say to the Prime Minister, the member for Yukon, and in his new responsibilities, the member for Windsor West, one of the remarks of Teddy Roosevelt which is useful to any party leader: "Speak with a soft voice, but carry a big stick".

• (1440)

May I say also to the member for Yukon and the member for Esquimalt how much I appreciated their generous words. The only reason the member for Esquimalt could not be more fulsome in his commentary about me is that he knows I have as much on him as he ever had on me.

I want to apologize to the member for Yukon, as does the new Leader of the Opposition, for our entry into the House at a time when her colleague, the member for New Westminster—Burnaby was speaking. We would certainly agree to her being able to redo her statement, because of the importance of the subject which she was addressing.

I thank the chairman of our caucus. It is the only time that I have ever seen him use a text. I will leave it to the House to decide whether that is an improvement or not.

I am proud to yield my place to the member for Windsor West. I don't know whether the story of my political life has succeeded, but to find oneself on the left of the member for Windsor West is a startling culmination of a career.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The member for Winnipeg South Centre suggested that I still was not to his left, and I say enough is enough.

I commend to you and to the House my colleague and old friend, the member for Windsor West. We were elected at the same time, but he has served consecutively now for 29 years in this House of Commons. He is the dean of this place. He has enjoyed the confidence of the people of Windsor for almost 30 years. It is no accident that he has been elected time after time after time, as has the vice dean of the House, the member for Saint-Denis. It is because they are constituency members. They never forget that we are here because people put us here and we have a duty to respond on a daily basis.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to mention the announcement by the new Leader of the Opposition that my colleague and old friend, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), has been appointed the new House Leader for the Official Opposition. He is competent, he is a House of Commons man, and he represents his constituency with great skill and energy, and I am very happy with this appointment. Congratulations, Jean-Robert.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it has been an honour to serve under your leadership of the House. You and I have been proud to have shared that unguarded frontier of 45th Avenue in Vancouver and our friendship goes back many years. I wish you well in your presidency of this Chamber. I can assure you that you enjoy the full confidence of our side of the House and that the new Leader of the Opposition shares my ultimate respect and confidence in you and in the Chair.

Since you and I have both shared a love of the outdoors, a love of the environment, and a love of the coastal waters of our province, I can only commend to the members of the House a saying of the Haida people that: "We do not inherit this land from our ancestors, we borrow it from our children". That should be a motto for every member of this House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I want to bring to the attention of the House the matter that was alluded to by our right hon. friend, that the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby was in the midst of making a statement. I think it may well have been impossible for hon. members to hear the statement. It is an important matter and I would ask the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby to present the statement again and completely.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the indulgence and the co-operation of the House in order to remake a statement that I feel is on a very important issue for all Canadians.

Last night we saw another callous acceptance of violence against women. A woman was sexually assaulted at a busy intersection in Calgary. She was running down the street, naked, begging for help.

Brian Dorscht was the only person who responded to her screams. Other people simply shouted obscene remarks and encouragement to the attacker. A police officer brushed off this tragedy by saying: "Of course people will catcall when they see a naked woman." We must make educational programs for judges, police and the public a priority in this House, to fight violence against women.

We can remove the "honest belief" clause from the Criminal Code, which allows some men to get away with rape. We can remove the regulatory red tape that is keeping millions of dollars targeted for battered women centres and shelters from being used at all.

In the face of women being gunned down on our university campuses, in the face of women being assaulted in the streets and in their homes, and in the face of a three year old child being called sexually aggressive and blamed for her own assault, we must act now.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I hope the Prime Minister would agree with me that there is an urgent need to express the sense of this House in support of language duality in Canada through a unanimous resolution.

The straightforward motion we have proposed was written to ensure the widest possible support, and reads as follows:

> That this House reaffirm its commitment to support, protect and promote linguistic duality in Canada.

Will the government agree now to allow this motion to be put to the House for unanimous consent?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that we look forward to debating this issue and supporting it before the House of Commons.

I had not been given prior knowledge of the resolution by the Leader of the Opposition a few days ago. When it was received, quite properly we looked at it, agreed with the general thrust of it, and submitted it for consideration with an amendment to the new house leader of the Liberal Party.

I was informed by our house leader that the house leader of the Liberal Party indicated that with one exception, one word changed, it could be accepted by the Liberal Party. We made that word change the following morning and sent it back for approval. I and my colleagues look forward to debating it fully here on the floor of the House of Commons.

I did not know this, but I have just been informed by the government house leader that there is a suggestion forthcoming from the leader of the NDP. If an agreement has been reached on the language, which is essentially the thrust of what my colleague is talking about, not only will we be here to discuss and debate, but also to support very strongly the concept of bilingualism in Canada which we view not only as a noble but a very enriching dimension of our national life.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Prime Minister misunderstood the intent and purpose of the words of the new house leader for the official opposition.

I am disappointed with the Prime Minister's answer and I must say that for us priority must be given to support for linguistic duality.

Why does the Prime Minister not want to give priority to supporting linguistic duality? Does he not agree that it is the top priority today and that his amendment is not necessary for his purposes?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are in full agreement with what my hon. friend is seeking to do. Normally, when all-party support is being sought for a resolution, I and the leader of the NDP are given prior knowledge of it so that we can consult with our caucuses and our people and report back. I was not given prior knowledge, information, or advice in respect to the resolution that was presented.

I did indicate, on hearing it for the first time, that I generally agreed with the thrust of the motion. I support what the Leader of the Opposition is seeking to do, but I did ask for a copy of the resolution so that I could consult with my colleagues and presumably the leader of the NDP.

When we submitted the text to the Leader of the Opposition's office, the then whip, now house leader, indicated on television, and I quote: "But I think generally speaking we can support the Conservative amendment if they will change the words 'as expressed' to read 'as reflected'". We then changed the word from "expressed" to "reflected", thereby meeting fully the request of the Liberal Party. With that we are prepared, and I am sure the NDP is prepared to debate the matter fully, and to vote upon it to reaffirm this very important dimension of our national life.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the remarks of the leader of the Government. The Prime Minister has suggested he had not received a copy of this resolution. I think it was read out in the House two days ago.

If the Prime Minister is now prepared to move a motion, will he confirm that it has been put down on the Order Paper and indicate exactly when he intends to call it for debate?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, not only will I confirm my intention to move a motion and set it down on the Order Paper this afternoon, I indicated that yesterday.

I would like to tell my hon. friend that my understanding of the customs in this House requires that when one is seeking all-party support for a resolution, prior notice is given to the Prime Minister and the leader of the NDP.

All I am saying is that in this case I had no notice of this whatsoever until the Leader of the Opposition stood up on Monday and indicated that this was his intention. I immediately said that I clearly agreed with the fundamental thrust of what he was saying. I asked for the document so that I could consult my colleagues. We submitted a small amendment which was then accepted by the member for Ottawa—Vanier, and I understand that the leader of the NDP quite properly asked for time to examine it herself and submit an amendment.

Here I have a motion I am going to table which will meet all the requirements of my hon. friend, and which will give members from all parties of the House an opportunity to deal directly with the worrying manifestations of intolerance that we see across the country, not just in Ontario, but elsewhere across the country.

I believe, as my hon. friend did, because he has defended this concept for 29 years since he entered this House of Commons. He has been fully consistent, that bilingualism and protection of minority language rights is a vital and noble concern of all members of the House of Commons. I would never do anything other than promote that and engage the responsibility for that debate. That is what we are going to do so that all members of the House have an opportunity to speak and to defend this concept and, if required, to vote on it. In that way Canadians will know that intolerance is unacceptable. Promotion of bilingualism and minority rights is exactly what this chamber and this country needs.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the best way to state a point sometimes is to put it very simply. On Monday, we had put to the House or to the government a two-line motion. That is a fact.

An hon. member: In Question Period.

Mr. Gauthier: No, after Question Period.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister has said many times that the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord should not be linked to other provincial legislation. He repeated that many times in Canada, whether in connection with Bill 178 in Quebec or Bill 8 in Ontario, or in other places. He knows very well that the Meech Lake Accord does not mention promoting linguistic duality. Furthermore, the Prime Minister himself in this House refused the amendment proposed by this party. I ask the Prime Minister why he changed his mind. How is it that he now links the Meech Lake Accord to a resolution which is merely intended to support the country's official languages?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the hon. member's attitude. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is a great defender of minority rights. I think the same is true of me as head of my party and Prime Minister of Canada. I simply say to the hon. member that last Monday, I received no prior notice as is normally the case when unanimous support of the leaders in the House is sought. I was given the text after hearing the Leader of the Opposition, after oral question period. I looked at it with my colleagues and we submitted it for consideration by the Liberal Party. The hon. member himself said on Newsworld the same evening and I quote:

[English]

"But I think, generally speaking, that we can support the Conservative amendment if they will change that one word as "expressed" to as "reflected".

[Translation]

The word was changed the next morning. We are submitting a document that allows for a completely normal debate and I have great difficulty understanding why the hon. member is hung up on procedural issues while we want to see it through in support of minority rights and linguistic duality in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to take any lessons in regard to official languages. I think I have stated my position in this House often enough for everyone to know where I stand on this issue.

The Prime Minister is quoted in the press on March 17, 1989, where it states: "Don't let Quebec language law destroy Meech Lake deal, Mulroney." The Prime Minister stated: "There is no connection between Meech Lake and the Quebec law."

I ask the Prime Minister, how can he this day mix up Canadians—the grass roots of Canada are asking for an expression of support on the linguistic duality of this country—by coming in with another constitutional amendment that has nothing to do with official languages in this country? How can he explain that to Canadians?

• (1500)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at my hon. friend. He indicated on television that he agreed with the document that he is now denouncing. Either he agreed with it or he did not. He clearly agreed on television with the document that he is now denouncing.

Mr. Gauthier: You amended my motion.

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, we amended your motion as we normally do and as we are entitled to do. We amended it not to diminish it at all, but to talk—

Mr. Gauthier: You neutralized it.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, we want to discuss official bilingualism, we want to discuss duality and we also want to discuss the Official Languages Act which has done more, according to the Commissioner of Official Languages, for the promotion of minorities than anything else. Surely this motion is very much in the national interest. If the member does not wish to proceed with his motion as amended, we will table our own motion and we will invite debate in this House which I believe will be fully consistent with every single one of the principles that my hon. friend has very appropriately defended over his long and distinguished career. He will be proud of the motion because he fought for every element in that motion.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance.

Tomorrow I will be meeting in Toronto with representatives of some 600,000 senior citizens across Canada. They do not like this new sales tax because they know that the goods and services tax is going to add to their cost of living.

The minister has said that 75 per cent of seniors will be better off after this tax, but I note that the groups to whom the finance minister is speaking are primarily business groups.

Will the minister join me tomorrow in Toronto to explain in person to senior citizens groups what this tax will mean for them?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member were not so interested in playing political games, she would have let me know about this meeting some time ago so I could have made plans to be there with her.

I say to her again, I have brochures here which I would like her to take to the representatives of the senior citizens organization and explain to those people what the GST applies to and what it does not apply to.

I would also like her to explain to them where she disagrees with the material that is in the technical paper which shows that under the GST, less the existing federal sales tax, a single senior citizen earning $25,000 will pay $220 more after the GST, before the application of the goods and services tax credit. There will be an improvement in their position with the ongoing indexing as a result of the GST of $81. Then there is the improvement of $278 as a result of the GST credit. That results in that person being $139 better off.

If my hon. friend disagrees with these numbers, let her come and tell me where she disagrees. This is the third time I have asked and I have yet to receive a reply. Until she comes clean and tells me where those numbers are wrong she should not go to Toronto and mislead those senior citizens.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Minister of Finance that those same senior citizens had asked for a meeting with him prior to the budget. I am having a meeting on Tuesday here in Ottawa with senior citizens representing Quebec and I should be happy to invite him formally.

The Minister of Finance ignores the point I made that there are growing lines of senior citizens, families and children at food banks across this country. Yet he proposes to spend $14.5 million to sell this tax, to tell Canadians that they need this tax. That is three times the amount of money spent on co-operative housing in Canada per year. If there were no GST, this government would not have to spend $14.3 million trying to sell it. It could get down to the business of providing essential food and housing for Canadians. Why does the Minister of Finance not just withdraw the tax now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, just to remind my hon. colleague, I have these booklets here if she wants to receive them, take them to Toronto and hand them out.

My hon. friend talks about people at food banks. She neglects to point out the tremendous progress that has been made over the last few years whereby there are three-quarters of a million fewer Canadians now living below the poverty line than in 1984. The poverty rate fell from almost 17 per cent to 13 per cent during that same period. The average family income has reached its highest level ever, after adjusting for inflation.

The low income rate for children under 16 fell from 20.1 per cent of the population to 15.4 per cent of the population in 1988. The number of adult women living below the poverty line fell by 30,000 last year, a total of 229,000 since 1984.

I do not deny there are problems. But the hon. member should look at the progress that has been made and talk positively about that progress and about how the GST credit will make 75 per cent of these senior citizens better off. That is how we are proceeding to help these people more than what we have done to date.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question. The minister boasted yesterday that food banks would not be taxed. Is the minister prepared today to promise that the next Budget will announce concrete new programs to help close down all food banks and not family farms?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think we have been progressing quite well, as those statistics have pointed out. We still have a way to go and one of the things that we are using is the GST credit. We have also through tax reform in 1988 taken 850,000 low income people off the tax rolls. These are two major initiatives on the tax side, income tax and sales tax, which are directly designed to help the people she is talking about. Surely she should acknowledge that. I would hope that tomorrow, when she is speaking to the people in Toronto, she will draw these very real pieces of evidence of progress to their attention.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The people of Canso feel humiliated and betrayed by this government after learning the details of the so-called plan to save the Canso fish plant, a plan that was dangled before them with so much fanfare on Friday. What galls them most is that the trawler port in Canso is to remain closed and the Canso fleet moved elsewhere. On December 13 the Prime Minister promised in this House to look into a suggestion that would require a company which closes a fish plant to keep the trawlers at the plant or not fish.

Has the Prime minister looked into this suggestion? Will he now order his Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to apply this requirement to Canso and keep the trawler boats fishing from that port?

• (1510)

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am a little disappointed at the reaction of my colleague opposite to the situation in Canso in his constituency. What we had a week ago was a town with no hope and a fish plant that was slated to close. What we have now is a town with a fish plant that is going to stay open, employ at least 300 people and which has some hope for the future, thanks to a corporate decision by National Sea which has brought in a revised operational plan. I do not understand the attitude of my colleague opposite.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the minister should tell that to the people of Canso.

[Translation]

My supplementary question is still for the Prime Minister. He knows that the fish assigned to the big companies under the program of grants to business still belongs to Canadians and not to the companies themselves. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has the legislative right to attach conditions to these allocations. Will the Prime Minister finally assume his responsibilities and order his Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to ensure that the trawlers from Canso continue to use that port?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, what my hon colleague is asking the Prime Minister and this government to do is bring in an entirely new concept to fisheries, port quotas. This is something that could be studied, but it is not the way things are done in the fishing industry in this country, as he knows.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of the Standing Orders Committee of Newfoundland and Labrador, led by their chairman, Mr. Jim Walsh, Member of the House of Assembly.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is also about National Sea Products. It is directed to the Prime Minister. National Sea is in St. John's today to offer what everybody, including the Premier, the Leader of the Opposition, and most important the plant workers, consider a shabby deal and a slick ploy. The anger of the plant workers in St. John's is symptomatic of a growing anger and a growing fear for the future among Atlantic Canadians.

As the Prime Minister of all Canadians, will he now intervene personally in a crisis that is growing? Will he intervene to make sure that Atlantic Canadians, in the worst crisis in our history, are treated with fairness and generosity?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's scorn for whatever is being proposed by National Sea in St. John's today is surely premature since at the present time National Sea officials are meeting with the Premier of Newfoundland and with representatives of the workers to discuss just what it is they are proposing.

It has been suggested in the press, and I think there is some validity to it, that they are prepared to start a new processing operation in their fish plant at St. John's which would not involve groundfish but another operation that would involve keeping some several hundred people employed on a permanent basis, not the full compliment of the plant at the moment.

The hon. gentleman knows that the problem is with the resource, that there is not sufficient fish for all these processing plants to process. National Sea is obviously making an attempt to do what it can for as many of the employees as it can. It would be premature to comment further until we know exactly what is proposed and until the workers know and take a balanced look at what has been suggested.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, it may be premature and there may not be enough fish, but there clearly is enough money.

On Monday the Deputy Prime Minister said that Canadian farmers had received $21 billion, I believe, from the government of Canada over five years. The fishermen of Atlantic Canada have received $130 million—no new money—after months of the worst crisis in our history. There may not be enough fish, but where is the aid package and where is the billion dollars that was promised to Atlantic fishermen and plant workers?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is quoting the Deputy Prime Minister accurately, but certainly there has been very considerable assistance for farmers from this government. There has been very considerable assistance for fishermen from this government, and there will be more.

When comparisons are being made as to what has been done for farmers as compared to fishermen, the hon. gentleman might remember that farmers are not eligible to receive unemployment insurance assistance, while fishermen are. Many hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent every year in assistance to fishermen through the unemployment insurance scheme and hundreds of millions more through the Department of Fisheries.

There will be whatever assistance is reasonably required to assist the Atlantic Canada fishing industry. The Prime Minister and this government will see it is received.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, what fishing communities throughout Atlantic Canada expected from National Sea Products and from this government was a life raft to help them while fish stocks were rebuilt. What they got instead was a slap in the face.

I want to ask this government what it intends to do to see to it that more than 150 out of 800 fishworkers in Canso are given some sort of future. Just 150 out of 800 is absolutely unacceptable.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this comes from a member who during his leadership campaign advocated that ACOA be disposed of.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacKay: Some of these advocates from the New Democratic Party purport to stand for working people. The only way you would ever see a callous on their hands is if it was a transplant.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: In terms of what this government has done for Canso and for fishermen, let me remind my hon. colleague that when the party opposite was in government, it spent an average of $185 million per year on regional development, period. Already this government has announced $130 million in fisheries aid alone and, as my colleague has said, it is only an initial response.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that New Democrats think there is no way that plants should simply be shut down unilaterally by a company without any worker or community negotiations.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Langdon: I want to ask this government why it left the union out of these negotiations. I want to ask this government when it is going to give the workers of Atlantic Canada protection against high-handed decisions on the part of governments and on the part of companies that do not care about the communities of Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, obviously National Sea Products did care. They provided a revised operational plan that they inform me will keep not 150 people, but 300 people working.

Mr. Langdon: One hundred and fifty.

Mr. MacKay: Well, my hon. colleague says 150. I hear 300. In any event, we have an operational plant now, which is more than we had last week.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker, John Bulloch, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, told the Finance Committee, and I quote:

> (The measures proposed to assist small business with implementing the tax)—such items as—documentation requirements, and incentives to purchase electronic equipment—do not begin to offset the actual costs that will be imposed on small firms by the two-tiered nightmare of the proposed GST.

My question is very simple, Mr. Speaker: Has the Minister of Finance considered the additional accounting costs for small business in his GST booklet, where he says that there are advantages for small business?

• (1520)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the brochure we put out is comprehensive. It answers many of the questions that have been put to us by the small business community in a reasonably detailed way, but not so detailed that it takes them a long time to get through. It is something that is very helpful to them in understanding the impact of the GST, how it can help them with their pricing, with their compliance, with their record keeping, and how it helps their cash flow. It gives them a quick overview of the goods and services tax to help them in discussing the matter further as far as their accountants and others are concerned.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, Ms. Catherine Swift, Vice-President of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, told the Finance Committee, and I quote:

> So anyone who thinks this is a boon for small businesses does not really know the operation of small businesses—

My question is simple: Why doesn't the Minister of Finance listen to the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and throw out this tax, instead of trying to sell Canadians the nightmare of the century?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me quote Mr. John Bulloch, the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business on September 19, again before the finance committee. He said: "Everybody out there would like to have an alternative to a multi-stage tax", a multi-stage tax being a GST. He goes on to say: "The damn trouble is that one is not out there."

It is very clear from the response of the Liberal Party of Canada that one is not out there because we have not heard of any alternative approach from the Liberal Party of Canada. That is why we feel we must proceed with this.

There are numerous people who time and time again have been telling us of the importance of changing from the federal sales tax that is in place today. It is a hidden burden on our exports. It taxes imports one-third less than Canadian products. It is a burden on new investment, investment that will create a more productive and competitive manufacturing industry, more competitive forest products industry and mining industry, and the agricultural side as well. All of our exporting industries are helped by this. This is why we must proceed on this and that is why this government is bound to do so.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the answer of the Minister of Finance quoting Mr. Bulloch, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. On Monday the minister stated, as reported at page 7892 of Hansard, February 6:

> My hon. friend talks about the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. I have letters from members of the CFIB who have listened to the rhetoric of their president—

My question to the Minister of Finance is fairly straightforward. If he does not believe that the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business disagrees with this goods and services tax, is he prepared to sit down at a round table with representatives like Mrs. Swift and Mr. Bulloch who represent small business in this country and try to explain to them why he thinks this tax is so good when they think it is a nightmare on Main Street.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have met with Mr. Bulloch on many occasions. We have a difference of opinion on certain aspects of the goods and services tax. The one thing we do agree on which Mr. Bulloch stated in the quote that I just read out is that there is not a better alternative. My hon. friend knows there is not a better alternative. My hon. friend knows that we must change from the manufacturers' sales tax. He said that himself on August 8 last year.

We are proceeding with change. We do not have the luxury as the opposition does of simply opposing and criticizing. We have to get on with making policy for the Government of Canada and we are going to do that. The goods and services tax is our best approach to changing the manufacturers' sales tax and replacing it with something that is much better, and we are going to go ahead and do that.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the minister is very interested in alternatives. I want to present an alternative to him. With respect to the $14 million he is going to be spending on informing Canadians about the goods and services tax—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): This is the alternative?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): This is an alternative to spending $14 million.

I wonder if the Minister of Finance would organize the members of Parliament who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative members of Parliament, all of whom are well paid and who enjoy the capacity to be able to travel—

Mr. Mulroney: What about you?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I am too, certainly. They have the capacity to travel across the country. Instead of spending $14 million on pamphlets, why does the Minister of Finance not ask his colleagues to fan out across the country and explain to Canadians what the goods and services tax is all about?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it passed your attention that the hon. member did not come up with an alternative to the goods and services tax. He does not have one.

He is encouraging hon. members on this side of the House to get out and talk to as many Canadians as possible about the GST. We are doing that. We have been and we will continue to do that, because on this side of the House we are committed to this. We understand that this is the best way to go, replacing a bad tax with a tax that is the right tax. I have any number of quotes from people who say that we must make a change from this tax. We are going to go ahead and do that because we know we must do that.

Members opposite have said from time time: "Why can we not have a more competitive country?" This is one of the ways that we can build a more competitive economy.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State.

In early December, the Standing Committee on Human Rights strongly and unanimously recommended extension of the Court Challenges Program. The committee said that access to the courts is integral to the effective implementation of constitutional rights.

Yesterday every employee of the Court Challenges Program received a lay-off notice telling them the program is shutting down on March 31 of this year. Will the minister immediately allocate a short term increase in funds, which was recommended by the committee, to take effect at the end of December of last year? More important, will the government now accept the unanimous recommendation of the standing committee and renew this program which is so vital, so important for the equality of all Canadians?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the standing committee brought forward some very good recommendations which the Minister of Justice and ourselves have been examining very carefully and giving very proper consideration.

I will say that the letter that was sent out by the Canadian Council on Social Development under the signature of Mr. Hunsley I find to be very unhelpful and very unacceptable. It is ill-timed and ill-advised. We are giving very active consideration to the program, and that is a positive signal. At the appropriate time when I have had a chance to receive the required approval of my colleagues in government, we will be making an announcement on the program.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Hunsley did not have much choice. The government is not funding the program. It is being shut down and the employees are all being laid off. That is a lack of leadership by this minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. Since 1978, the Court Challenges Program has been in place to help official language minorities clarify and defend their language rights before the courts. Considering the existing tensions around the issue of language minorities in Canada, I would ask the Prime Minister, who has defended the rights of language minorities in Canada in the past, why he has yet to announce an extension for a program that is so important to Canada?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly well aware of this dimension. I realize the program was very effective, but, as I said quite clearly, we examined the recommendations of the Standing Committee, a number of which did agree the program has been very effective. I have already had a chance to discuss the matter with my colleague, the Minister of Justice, and as I said before, this whole issue is now being examined very carefully by the government, and an announcement on the subject is expected very shortly.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It concerns the wearing of turbans by Sikhs in the RCMP.

My question is very simple. When will this decision be made, and is the Solicitor General willing to give us his decision today?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, like many Canadians, I am also concerned about this question. I already mentioned that I met groups from the Sikh community last week. I will also be meeting other groups, probably next week. In fact, we are in the process of deciding exactly when we are to meet during the next two weeks. Initially, I thought people should have some time to try and reach a compromise agreeable to both parties. However, no compromise was it seems that has been possible. I will nevertheless continue consultations for a few weeks more, and the government should be making a decision in a matter of weeks, as soon as we have finished our round of consultations.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State and again refers to the Court Challenges Program.

The Court Challenges Program currently heads a schedule of cases going before the court. The firing by the Canadian Council on Social Development of the staff has created a lot of ambiguity in that program and has fractured the administration.

Can the Secretary of State not tell us today that he will continue the funding of this important program to the year 2000 as recommended by the members of the Standing Committee on Human Rights?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the previous answer, what the executive director of the CCSD has done is totally inappropriate. He does not report to me. It is an arm's length organization that has been administering this program. In general we have been very pleased with the service, but we found this to be very unhelpful.

We are currently examining very carefully the entire proposition. I have indicated that I am very pleased by what I have seen in terms of what the program has been able to do. The Minister of Justice and myself and our two departments have been carefully examining some very good suggestions that have been made by the standing committee.

I made sure that my undersecretary called the Canadian Council and gave it whatever feeling we could. At an appropriate time, when I have received the consent of my colleagues, we will be making an announcement on the program.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): My supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is for the same minister, the Secretary of State.

The problem is that the staff of this program has been cut. The program is cut. The Canadian Council on Social Development does work at arm's length from the government, but since it has cut the staffing and virtually the program, could the Secretary of State not overrule yesterday's firing of the staff and show a commitment to this program by continuing it and announcing that today?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I was given no notice prior to this letter having been sent out. It was never communicated to us.

I indicated that I found it very unhelpful and very unacceptable. I asked that the Undersecretary of State make the immediate call and, as I have said, we have given what I felt was a very, very positive feeling about the program and the direction we feel the government may be prepared to take.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

Mr. Lewis: And while I am on my feet, I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

MOTION THAT DEBATE BE NOT FURTHER ADJOURNED

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved:

That debate on the motion for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance of Bill C-62 and on any amendments proposed thereto shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order as I indicated in the House yesterday that I would.

I wish to present for your consideration some serious difficulties which we on this side of the House are experiencing with this use of closure. I would like you to consider four issues surrounding the closure motion which the government has now put.

• (1620)

First, I will ask you to consider whether or not there is a responsibility of the Chair to ensure that, in your own words:

> —controversial issues be debated at reasonable length so that every reasonable opportunity shall be available to hear the arguments pro and con.

Second, I will ask that you examine whether or not the current use of closure, again in your words:

> —is being used for a purpose never originally intended.

Third, I will ask you to review whether or not Standing Order 57 is consistent with Section 18 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which requires that privileges, immunities and powers to be held by the House and members must be defined by an act of Parliament.

Fourth, Mr. Speaker, I will ask for your views on whether the current frequent use of closure is inconsistent with that same section of our Constitution insofar as it exceeds those held by the British House at this time.

On the first question, I submit that the time has come for the Chair to intervene to protect the House and our parliamentary democracy from abusive use of the rules by this government.

I would like to cite some of the advice you gave this House on April 14, 1987, regarding Bill C–22, amendments to the Patent Act. You intervened, Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, and reversed a previous decision in order to protect the House from what was held to be unreasonable obstruction. In doing so, you made several observations which I submit are more than pertinent today.

You spoke to us about the role of procedural rules and the spirit of their adoption. You said:

> Rules of procedure—are designed to allow the full expression of views on both sides of an issue. They provide the Opposition with a means to delay a decision. They also provide the majority with a means of limiting debate in order to arrive at a decision. This is the kind of balance essential to the procedure of a democratic assembly. Our rules were certainly never designed to permit the total frustration of one side or the other.

You warned us of the abuse of procedural rule, when you said:

> Notice of time allocation motions after only a few hours of debate at any stage of a Bill can also be an abuse. When such tactics are entered on by either Government or Opposition, the balance of democratic parliamentary government can be easily upset. The maintenance of that balance is a fundamental responsibility of the Speaker.

You spoke of the need to look beyond the text of the rules by saying:

> I believe that the resolution of these inevitable and legitimate disputes should be on the basis of our traditions, our rules, our precedents, and something else as well. By this, I mean what is essential to this House of Commons, that is, that well accepted but not always definable thing upon which our whole constitutional history is based. It is fair play and—common sense. It is, when all is said and done, the profound sense of what is appropriate under certain circumstances and which is acceptable to reasonable people.

I think if you review the debate which has taken place to date on Bill C–62, the changes to the Income Tax Act and so on that will implement the goods and services tax, Mr. Speaker, you will see that it is not the opposition which has used the rules to delay debate, as you put it, "to enable opponents of a measure to enlist public support for their point of view". Rather, it has been the government which has moved repeated dilatory motions during the passage of Bill C–62.

On four of the five days that Bill C–62 has been before the House, the government has moved dilatory motions. Only twice in that time have members of the New Democratic Party moved a dilatory motion, in this case, that the House do now adjourn. We have done so not to abuse procedural rules, but because the success of such a motion, that is for the House to adjourn, would result in the defeat of the bill to which we are wholeheartedly opposed. If once the rules existed to give the opposition the means to delay a decision, I think all members of the House will realize that this is no longer the case.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, in other parliaments, the Speaker has the right to refuse to allow a closure motion to be put to the floor. In Britain, such a motion has to receive the support of at least 100 members. If you permit it, I will return to that consideration in a moment.

In Canada, however, we have no protection from vindictive or totalitarian uses of closure. I ask you to consider whether the time has not come, as it did in April of 1987, for the Chair to intervene to ensure that the balance of democracy is not tipped over. In deciding the above, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to consider my second request, which is to review whether the current use of closure is in the scope and spirit with which Standing Order 57 was originally drafted.

Our business as parliamentarians, our trade if you like, is the drafting of legislation. No one knows more than the members of the House, like yourself, how important it is that the spirit of the law be given supremacy over its technical wording.

When the House adopted the closure procedure back in 1913 it did so in extreme and unusual circumstances. With rare exceptions, from 1913 to the present, closure was used only after prolonged debate and after the House had been given the opportunity to thoroughly review the issue before the House. The closure procedure was adopted as a safeguard for those rare occasions when negotiations had broken down between the parties. Today it appears to be used instead of negotiations.

In the past five sitting months the government has given notice of closure on 11 occasions. It has done so on highly controversial bills, like the bill before us. It has done so on routine bills, like C-20, the Excise Tax Act. And it has actually threatened closure on bills that had all-party support. I refer to Bill C-18, the multiculturalism bill.

I submit that no longer is closure being used to protect the government from complete legislative paralysis at all. Surely, the government's agenda is not paralysed in this House at this time or it would not have moved—I agree with our consent—to have the House take an additional nine weeks off. It might even have agreed to the suggestion of the New Democratic Party and, I believe, the Liberal Party that the House reconvene early last January. Obviously, the House is not experiencing a state of parliamentary or legislative paralysis.

I ask you to consider these comments and return to us with your comments on the appropriateness of the current use of closure in this House as it is being practised by this government.

I want to move on to my third request, which is slightly more complex. Indeed there may be another authority before which this argument should be presented. It concerns the constitutionality of Standing Order 57, especially its consistency with Section 18 of the Constitution Act, 1867. This section provides as follows:

> The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the Members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that any Act of the Parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities, and powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities, or powers exceeding those at the passing of such Act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the Members thereof.

In that particular section of the Constitution Act, 1867, I believe lies a fundamental difficulty which we must address now, before we continue.

When this section was drafted, almost 125 years ago, closure did not exist, in either Canada or the United Kingdom. Surely, unrestricted debate in the House must be viewed as one of the privileges enjoyed by members of the Canadian House until 1913. Parliamentary privilege embraces, among other things, the freedom of speech for parliamentarians in connection with our parliamentary duties. It is designed to prevent members from being obstructed, molested or intimidated by the discharge of our duties. The rights of members of Parliament to debate matters is fundamental to our system of government and any restrictions or limitations that are placed on these, such as the use of closure, would seem to be breach of privilege.

In that context, closure must be seen to be an extension of the powers of the House itself to adopt motions which impede the privileges of its members. The adoption of closure, I would argue, amended both the privileges of members and the powers of the House of Commons. Yet Section 18 of the Constitution requires that changes to privileges and powers be made only by statute. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, "only by statute". Closure in Canada was introduced by means of amendments to Standing Orders. No legislative changes have ever been made.

As a general rule, the House governs itself by modifications to Standing Orders rather than by enacting legislation. This may be acceptable in the absence of any requirement to the contrary, but Section 18 of our Constitution clearly directs the House to use legislation in such cases.

• (1630)

In fact, Section 4 of the Parliament of Canada Act repeats the wording of Section 18 of the Constitution Act. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to consider whether the House has the constitutional authority to adopt a closure motion at this point.

My fourth and final point picks up on the second condition which Section 18 places on the privileges, immunities and powers of the House. That condition is that any change must not go beyond the powers held by the British House. Some of us might have personal concerns about that limitation, but nevertheless it is there in our Constitution.

As I previously submitted, closure can be viewed as both an infringement of a member's privileges and an extension of the powers of the House. In Britain closure is much less an infringement on a member's privileges and much less an extension of the powers of the House. There are a variety of factors found in Westminster that are not found here in Canada, factors which make closure somewhat less abusive in England and less an infringement on a member's privileges than in Canada where such mitigating circumstances are simply not found.

For example, in the United Kingdom any member can rise and ask the Speaker to accept the motion that the question be now put. At this point the Speaker has the discretion to allow or disallow that motion. If the Speaker feels that the debate has continued for an appropriate length of time and that the rights of the minority are not being trampled on, the Speaker then allows the closure motion to be put without debate to a vote. A simple majority is not sufficient to pass the closure motion. At least 100 members have to vote in favour of it. With closure passed, the House then immediately votes on the main question.

In Canada we are aware that only a minister of the Crown may move closure. The Speaker is not in a position to disallow the motion, and a simple majority is sufficient to pass a closure motion.

In Britain, closure is used by all sides of the House. It is not the sole domain of the government. Closure is a heavy legislative stick. In Britain, all members are provided with this important artillery.

Nor does the use of closure in Britain impede a member's right and ability to debate a bill. I think this is a very critical point. At Westminster, imposing closure at second reading of a bill does not terminate debate, it simply moves the debate from the main chamber to the committee room where it can continue for some considerable period.

For example, in Britain, standing committees which study legislation operate essentially as a mini-Parliament. Members stand to speak and deliver speeches virtually identical to those given in the chamber at second reading. Thus, whereas in Canada, closure at second reading denies members the right to speak on the principle of the bill, in Britain this is not the case. We in this party oppose the principle of this bill.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: If more time was available I could go into other mitigating factors which make closure in Britain much less an infringement on member's rights and much less an abuse of majority power.

Mr. Speaker, I will close now by simply asking you to consider the points I have made in making your decision whether or not you want to permit the government to proceed with the motion to impose closure before these questions are in fact settled.

I would also like to take this opportunity to serve notice at this time that should the House not volunteer to examine the constitutionality of its own Standing Orders, I would be pleased to submit this entire issue to the appropriate court.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in rising to comment on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kamloops, I want to say that I am delighted that he has taken up this cause. I think the arguments he has advanced to Your Honour are most worthwhile.

It is refreshing to see a change of heart on the part of the House leader for the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Kamloops. I know the difficulty he and his party have been labouring under since January 24, when they began to prevent us in the opposition from speaking in the debate on this matter, which we of course have been quite concerned about.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): You support the GST.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says that we support the GST. I think the hon. member knows that we have been opposing the GST since last summer. It was this party, I do not want to stray from the topic, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who certainly has on many occasions been of great assistance to the Chair, suggested that he did not want to stray too far from the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kamloops. I would ask him to be admonished by his own advice.

Mr. Milliken: Certainly, Your Honour. I am distracted by the catcalls from my left.

I want to say that in our opposition to this bill we have sought to debate the measure in this House so that we can explain to the people of Canada the shortcomings of the government's proposal. We have sought to do that on repeated occasions and have been frustrated in our attempts to do so.

I think if Your Honour checks the record he will find that there have been a total of seven hours and 30 minutes of debate on this bill—

Some hon. members: Order!

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, hon. members beside me are—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was referring to the number of hours of debate which have taken place on the bill. The hon. member for Kamloops referred to the same matter. I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. Milliken: As I was saying, the debate on this bill has been severely curtailed during the last two weeks. I believe it was first called for debate a week ago Monday for three days, and then we had two supply days. It was then debated for two days this week.

I want to point out the efforts that we on the Liberal side have made to extend the debate on this bill in order to have an opportunity to present our views and criticisms to the Canadian public. This is a debating chamber. This place is established for the purpose of free discussion and debate. We believe in that principle. We have actively supported it on every occasion.

In dealing with the question of closure I think it is a restriction on that freedom of debate. It is a restriction on our rights as members to discuss issues of importance to Canadians in this chamber. Those are not the only restrictions.

I want to refer to Hansard of Monday, February 5, at page 7859, where the hon. member for Gloucester had the floor. He moved that the House continue to sit beyond the normal hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C–62 because there had been so little debate on the bill that day. Fifteen members objected. They were government members.

Yesterday, questions were raised in Question Period by the Leader of the Opposition to the government House leader about the possibility of extending debate last evening for the purpose of discussing this bill. At three o'clock, after indicating his willingness to do this during Question Period, the government House leader, I may say generously, rose in his place and offered the consent of the government to continue to sit. I thought it was an offer made in good faith and that he would allow debate to proceed to midnight last night. Guess who objected? The people who are now objecting to closure on my left, as well as the leader of the New Democratic Party.

Then, if that was not enough, just before six o'clock last evening I rose in the House and asked for unanimous consent to continue to sit until midnight. There wasn't a single New Democrat in the House to object, but some of the Conservatives objected—some of the supporters of the Minister of Justice, and he was the one who offered this earlier in the day.

The things that are going on in respect of the debates in this House and the use of closure strike me as absolutely amazing. At least in this party our approach and criticism of the government for its use of closure have been consistent and not marked with the inconsistency and unwillingness to debate that has marked the approach of the hon. member for Kamloops. I regret that, but I do support his arguments.

I want to point out some of the other salient facts relating to this particular debate which I think Your Honour should bear in mind in rendering your ruling.

With respect to the debate on this bill that has taken place so far, I have indicated there were approximately seven and a half hours of debate. During the course of that time, on my quick count, there were four adjournment motions moved. There were eight or nine questions of privilege or points of order raised, measures which I think were of questionable value. There were seven motions made by the government to proceed to Orders of the Day, each of which involved a 30-minute bell, followed by a vote in the House. There were four adjournment motions, as I indicated, and another motion that a member be now heard, all of which required votes and all of which took up time in the House.

There has not been a fair time for members in this House to express their views on this bill. We in this party in particular have indicated a willingness—indeed a great interest—in debating this bill so that we can point out to Canadians the faults of this legislation and that it is not right.

What is happening here is that for the eleventh time in this Parliament the Minister of Justice is proceeding to bring in closure on a bill at one of the stages. Not only is it the eleventh closure motion, there have been three uses of time allocation orders on two stages at once of various bills. This will be the fourteenth time, assuming the government votes this through as its supporters tend to do, that debate has been curtailed in this Parliament. No other Parliament in Canadian history has ever been subjected to this kind of arrogant abuse by the government.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, the closure rule, as my hon. friend from Kamloops has indicated, was not designed for government abuse of the House of Commons. The closure rule was designed to bring an orderly end to protracted debate.

I further state that this closure rule has been used on repeated occasions, on some of the occasions in the 11 that I have mentioned on the second day of debate. In fact on a great number of them it has been used on the second day of debate. Closure notice has been given on day one and applied on day two.

I say that the continuous abuse of this rule constitutes an abuse of the traditions of this House as outlined by the hon. member for Kamloops. I invite Your Honour to so find and rule this motion out of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The speaker before me in outlining his version of what took place yesterday indicated that when he asked for unanimous consent to have the debate continue there was not one New Democrat in this House when the government member refused to give unanimous consent.

I happen to have been in this House, along with a number of my New Democrat colleagues. I would like to make it clear to him that that was the case.

Mr. Speaker: I want to respond to the hon. member. It is probably not a point of order. There is a general tradition that under some circumstances the Chair will allow a member to make an intervention.

However, I want to make it very clear that her alleged point of order, and perhaps a complaint, is not a point of order and does not assist me very much with the very careful arguments put by the hon. member for Kamloops.

The Minister of Justice has the floor.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes I want to review the issue, as we see it, from the government's side and respond to my hon. friends' arguments.

We see this issue as a question of the rights of the government to govern and the opposition to oppose within the context of debate. I want to make some references to points that are in the records in order to support my argument.

First, I wish to refer to Beauchesne's fifth edition where it reviews the issue and responsibility of a parliamentary government. Citation 1, which is right at the start, puts it this way:

> 1. The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law, have always been kept steadily in view by the Canadian Parliament; these are: To protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority; to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner; to enable every Member to express his opinions within limits necessary to preserve decorum and prevent an unnecessary waste of time; to give abundant opportunity for the consideration of every measure, and to prevent any legislative action being taken upon sudden impulse.

Mr. Speaker, I would point out to you that we are not acting on the basis of sudden impulse when we move the goods and services tax bill. This initiative has come after five years of ample and full debate.

Bill C-62 has not been foisted upon Parliament suddenly. The issue has been the subject of technical papers, budgets, opposition days, discussion papers, draft legislation, committee hearings and Question Period.

I think the citation is clear. We are not moving on any legislative action taken upon sudden impulse. We are moving after a great deal of consideration.

Because it is at issue politically when one gets outside the walls of this House whether or not there is a basis for moving closure, I want to review for the record not only debate but delay over the past few days.

The issue was brought forward by a notice of Ways and Means tabled in the House on Monday, January 22. The Ways and Means motion was concurred in on January 23.

On January 24, prior to the introduction of the GST, the House leader of the New Democratic Party raised a point of order on the scope of the Ways and Means and Ways and Means reference to documents not tabled in the House asking that the introduction of the bill await the Speaker's ruling. The Speaker declined and agreed not to let the goods and services tax bill go to second reading until he had ruled.

The bill was introduced and read the first time with two votes. This was on a New Democratic Party allotted day. It required two votes to get it introduced.

Then, what did members of the New Democratic Party do to their own opposition day? They forced votes on the introduction of two private members' bills calling for three votes altogether.

On Thursday, January 25, the government on that day was forced to move to Orders of the Day to avoid a filibuster.

On Friday, January 26, we called other business awaiting the Speaker's ruling. The members of the NDP filibustered Government Orders. They did it this way. This is the time of the taxpayers and the time of the House.

There was one vote on concurrence in a committee report, and another vote on a motion that another member be heard. There was another recorded vote to move to Orders of the Day. Then there was a motion that the House do now adjourn. That is delay—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. minister could assist the Chair.

Speaker's Ruling

The Chair is extremely aware of the facts which the hon. Minister of Justice is relating. We have a careful argument put before the Chair. If it would suit the hon. minister, I want to deal with it now. I propose to let the House recess for five minutes while I consider the argument put to me by the hon. member for Kamloops.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The sitting of the House was suspended at 4.47 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 4.57 p.m.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has raised a point of order in which he says it would be improper to accept the government's motion for closure. He makes four points in this argument.

First, to paraphrase his own effective use of language and his own eloquence—and I do not mean to do a disservice to him by boiling it down into one point—his first point really is that under all the circumstances it is not fair that debate be curtailed.

He makes reference to comments that I made at another time, pointing out that in this Chamber there are many methods used by both sides in a dispute to make their point. With respect to that ruling, nothing that I say today should be considered to be any detraction from it.

Second, the hon. member for Kamloops argued that the government ought not to be moving closure at this time. He also argued that closure was being used for a purpose for which it was never really intended and that the effect of this is to limit freedom of speech in the chamber.

Third, he argued that closure contravenes the Constitution of the country.

Last, and I think I have it straight, he argued that the use of closure here is inconsistent with the practice in the United Kingdom House. He refers to constitutional sections which indicate that the rights of members here ought not be any the less than the rights of members under the Constitution of the United Kingdom. I am going to deal with each of these. Before I do, I want to say that the hon. member for Kamloops presented his arguments extremely clearly and with a certain compelling significance. I will deal with the first point.

• (1700)

The question of whether it is fair is a very subjective one. I have to point out that the rules of the House make it very clear that what the government is moving is within the rules of the House. I am bound by the rules of the House and I must make my decision on the question of whether or not the motion by the government is procedurally acceptable.

With respect to procedure, I have to say that it is acceptable. But the question was a purpose for which it was never intended and to counter members' freedom of speech. Even if that were so, I am not going to comment yea or nay on that because that is a philosophic and procedural debate that ought to take place perhaps in some other place. However, I do want to draw to the attention of hon. members the distinction between freedom of speech and continued debate. There is a distinction.

The rule which binds us with respect to allocation of time and closure does limit debate at certain stages of the process of a bill through this place, but it is probably too far to say that it contravenes freedom of speech in the House. I do want to point out that even if the hon. minister's motion is accepted by this House then there is an extensive debate later on today and tonight, there is then committee, there are other ways in which this matter can be raised in the House on a daily basis. Then the bill has to come back again to this House where there is further debate.

The hon. member makes a very interesting argument. I am not prepared again to rule on it because if I did I would be straying into an area in which I am not allowed to go. He states that our rule in the House contravenes our Constitution. That may or may not be, but the authorities for many, many years back make it quite clear that I cannot rule on a legal or a constitutional issue.

Lastly, I will deal with the argument that it is inconsistent with the United Kingdom, the use of closure here. It may be, but in the United Kingdom there is a specific rule which attaches to the Speaker a very clear discretion as to whether or not a motion of closure ought to be entertained under all the circumstances. There is no such rule in this House.

Therefore, having listened very carefully to the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, and because no Speaker is immune to what is going on in this Chamber, having listened to representations as to what has been taking place over a number of days and without making any judgment on that, I have taken it into account. I hope the hon. Minister of Justice will not be offended that I felt that it was not necessary to recite all of what had taken place. Looking at all of the circumstances and coming back again to the essential thing that I have to decide, and that is whether or not the motion is procedurally sound, I must rule that it is.

In ruling that it is, I am not in any way taking away from the cogency of arguments the hon. member for Kamloops put up with respect to constitutional and other matters. They may well be matters which the House may wish to pursue. It may well be that the House would wish to look again at the rules, but that is a matter for another day.

Therefore, my ruling is that the motion is in order.

MOTION THAT DEBATE BE NOT FURTHER ADJOURNED

Mr. Speaker: I will put the motion:

That debate on the motion for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance of Bill C–62 and on any amendments proposed thereto shall not be further adjourned.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to confirm, after discussions among House leaders, that tomorrow will be an allotted day.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I think you will find a disposition, notwithstanding Standing Order 57, to allow the speeches to proceed on the basis of 10 minutes each in the usual allocation, unless the speaker for one of the parties stands up and indicates that he or she will be speaking for 20 minutes. The normal rule will be 10 minutes.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I want to confirm for the assistance of the Speaker that if an individual party would like to take 20 minutes for one member, then he or she would so notify the Chair at the beginning of the speech.

Otherwise it will be two speakers per party in the normal rotation and 10 minutes each.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Yes, that is the understanding of the NDP, too, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is so agreed. The hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-62, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 7569).

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly nice to get back to debate after all the games that have been played by the NDP. I believe this is the fifth day that we are supposed to be debating the goods and services tax bill, and we have not even had eight hours of debate on the biggest tax grab in Canadian history. It is a very sad situation not to be able to have the opportunity for debate on this issue.

In order to end the debate even faster, the government has implemented closure for the thirteenth or fourteenth time.

• (1750)

I would like to discuss some of the concerns of small businessmen and others in my riding about the effects of this goods and services tax at a time when they cannot believe any government would maintain the high interest rate for as long as it has. Our Canadian dollar remains high and is absolutely devastating to their business. The sales of their products are decreasing.

For example, I will cite the case of Deacon Brothers, a clothing manufacturing business in Belleville. This firm has been a family business in Belleville for some 87 years. It announced a year ago that it was to build a new plant and to move to that new plant this May. About a month ago, the firm made the announcement that because of what was happening to sales there were no orders on the books for this spring. This firm has 40 employees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. If hon. members would like to carry on a conversation, would they go behind the curtain, please.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, because the firm knows what a goods and services tax is going to do, it could see the writing on the wall and what it was going to do for its industry. Rather than go through all of the hassle, the administration and the move, it decided to close its business and put 40 people out of work.

Small business people are tired, overworked and overwhelmed by what is happening. When I go home on the weekends they ask when the tax system in Canada will be revamped so that it is fairer for the lower income person, the middle wage earner and the small business man. I tell them that I do not think it will happen with this government. It has raised taxes 31 times in five years, and it does not seem to realize what that is doing to small business.

I also noticed in an article from Vermont in the United States that it was thought the goods and services tax in Canada was going to be a wonderful thing because it would increase the costs of goods and services to Canadians by 7 per cent. That is just going to drive more Canadians across the border to purchase their products.

This government has supposedly been trying to handle the affairs of the country for the last four or five years, through some fair and reasonable times and some business booms. I cannot believe that it has not done more than it has. The government brags about its fiscal management, but the total Canadian debt has doubled in that five-year period.

I want to read from The Wall Street Journal of January 10, 1990. I think this publication is pretty highly respected even by the Tories. The article reads:

> The Tories are raising taxes without reducing the debt—It is not easy to go bust when your income doubles over five years, but Canada's Progressive Conservative government isn't flinching from the challenge.

The article goes on:

> Wilson traded one tax increase for another when he lowered his proposed goods and services tax rate to 7 per cent from 9 per cent and raised some personal taxes.

It is not easy to do what the government has done with the debt but, by golly, it has worked hard at it and it has doubled it.

My constituents ask me several questions. They ask: "Is the tax going to be a joint tax with the provinces?" I say that it is not. "Is it going to be visible?" I say: "No, not necessarily". They ask: "Are we going to reap the so-called benefits that the Minister of Finance is telling us about as far as the reduction in the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax on goods and services is concerned?" I say: "Well, the minister says he cannot guarantee that".

I had interesting conversations with several car dealers in the last two or three days. The government has tried to convince taxpayers that they are going to save 13.5 per cent because the manufacturers' sales tax on automobiles is going to disappear.

Car dealers told me that the seniors in their companies were saying that if there were any savings at all on the retail price of a car after the GST came in, the saving on a $25,000 car might be $200 or $300. If the manufacturers' sales tax of 13.5 per cent disappears like it should disappear, it should be a saving of $2,500, not $200 or $300. Consumers will have to pay the 7 per cent on top of that.

I asked the government where the saving is for the small businessman who is already in business. We hear that they will get the GST back on new purchases they make. I do not deny that in the legislation, but I was approached by a restaurant operator who said that he already had all his capital investment. While there was a little upgrading each year, he wanted to know where he would save on the GST. I told him that the government said that he would not have to pay 7 per cent on his placemats. He said to me: "Well, big deal, 7 per cent of 1.5 cents on a placemat. That is really a big saving".

He asked if he would have to charge 7 per cent on the meals on his menu. I said that he would and agreed that it would not be very good for his business.

He wanted to know what he would get for collecting this tax. I told him that he would really not get very much. "Originally", I said, "you would get $600 a year but that is gone now". I said: "You are going to get one-time help of $1,000 and after that you will be collecting the 7 per cent GST for the government out of the goodness of your heart". As well, I said to this person: "Just do not take everything that you hear from this government as the gospel truth". He agreed and said: "We are getting a little sick and tired of that type of thing".

We see today how much we can trust the government. It has lost the trust of the Canadian people. I hope it realizes it soon and will revamp the Canadian tax system to make it more fair for everyone, not just for its rich friends.

I will take a couple of minutes to address the problems this will create in agriculture. One of the major problems facing a primary producer in agriculture in particular is having enough time. This tax will place a greater demand on the farmer's time. Most farmers do their book work at night or on the weekend because they have to do it themselves; there is not the money in the business. They are prepared to do that. That goes with the uniqueness of the industry they are in.

They are led to believe that this is going to help their cash flow. I beg to differ with that, and I can tell you from experience that one of the major problems farmers have today is the problem of being able to borrow sufficient money for cash flow.

This tax is going to have to be paid up front by producers. They are going to have to pay tax on their veterinary services, tax on their fertilizer, tax on their repairs, and other costs.

I note with interest one of the items that they are not going to have to pay tax on is natural fertilizer. There is another word that I could use for natural fertilizer that would not be very parliamentary. This government certainly has lots of that, so it is good that it can sell that and peddle that in the future without having someone to pay tax on it.

I made some phone calls to Revenue Canada. Many of those items in the technical papers that we were told would be clarified in the bill when it came forward have not been clarified. The word that I am sending to the agricultural community is that the only hope it has now, because the government is going to railroad this through whether farmers want it or not, is to lobby the government to get those lists, whether they be for zero rated or for tax exempt items.

• (1800)

We were told in the technical papers that we would have a list in the bill of those items that would be zero rated. They are not in the bill. We were told that definitions would be there. They are not there.

The message to all industries is to continue to lobby in the hope that the technical papers and the definitions will be changed to improve this terrible piece of legislation.

Unlike most businesses, agriculture, by its very nature, is not very attractive because of variable yields, unpredictable weather, the elements, the long hours, the miserable returns, the lack of security, the lack of adequate rural social services, the isolation in many cases, and its insatiable capital demand. Many young people are thinking a second time before they attempt to enter this industry.

The government predicts a slight increase in inflation at the outset of this tax. I wonder for how many farmers this slight increase will be the final straw that breaks their hearts and their will.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the goods and services tax. This is going to be a long evening, as we know, as we debate here into the wee hours of the morning. I will give notice to you now, Mr. Speaker, that I will be speaking for 20 minutes on this very important issue.

I cannot let the previous speaker get away with some of the statements he made. He certainly painted a very gloomy picture of what is going on in this country today, and how depressed it is in his particular area around the Belleville—Trenton area. I see his seatmate there with him who represents the neighbouring riding.

I was there recently. I went to school in Belleville, so I know the area very, very well. Belleville has never had it so good. Industry is growing there. There are industries coming in and expanding. There is job creation in Belleville. The mayor was telling us that the area is second to none. Now the member stands up and tells us all this doom and gloom about his riding, that it is going to hell in a hand basket.

The riding is one of the most beautiful tourist areas around, one of the finest parts of Ontario. Yet the member stands up and makes it sound like it is a depressed area. Well, what nonsense. What absolute nonsense. Belleville and Prince Edward—Hastings are doing extremely well and the area deserves a member who is prepared to stand up and promote it, not to put it into the ground and tell us how doomy and gloomy it is. I know better and the people who live there know better. What nonsense. They did not send that member up here to tell everybody how terrible things are there. What nonsense.

The member talked about the small business, the clothing company that is closing down because of the GST. That clothing company is going to save money on its operations. It is going to be a much more efficient operation. The GST is going to allow it to compete with competitors off-shore. That is what this all about. I am going to get into that in a little more detail in my comments.

I would like the hon. member to bring that individual who closed his operation down because of the GST, to see me, or I will go to see him and explain how it will work and be of advantage to his company. I can certainly explain to him why it will be an advantage to his company. Absolutely. No question.

The member says that the measure is not fair to lower income people. The Minister of Finance, under the goods and services tax, will be enriching a sales tax credit. I might remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the previous administration, before 1984, had a federal sales tax, a manufacturers' sales tax. The Liberals had one in this country, but do you know what? It was hidden, it was buried, and there was no sales tax credit for low-income people. It was not in existence. It was the present Minister of Finance who brought that in.

Mr. Milliken: What was the rate?

Mr. McDermid: It was 12 per cent back then.

Mr. Milliken: Oh, no, no.

Mr. McDermid: Oh, yes it was. I remember when it was 12 per cent. Absolutely, it was 12 per cent back then.

Do you remember that in one budget they brought down the federal sales tax from 12 per cent? The Liberals lowered the federal sales tax but they increased the debt rather significantly. They were fooling the Canadian people at the time. They looked like they were being great guys by lowering the sales tax but they jacked the debt up sky high.

We remember Mr. Chrétien bringing in three budgets in 16 months. He was juggling things around like crazy. He was having a terrible time.

My hon. friend from Prince Edward—Hastings said that this is going to increase prices by 7 per cent across the board. That was his statement. Yet every economist has made it very clear that there will be a one-time increase in inflation of about 1.3 per cent, not 7 per cent. He and his colleagues are the only ones going around the country spouting this nonsense. It is just not true.

The hon. member was talking about the debt of this country and how it has increased since the Conservatives came to power. They like to talk about this. I want to point out to the hon. member in that period of time, from 1984 to today, $154 billion was paid out in interest charges, just interest. The debt rose $152 billion in that period.

In other words, the only thing we had to do over the last five years was to borrow money to pay the interest on the debt that the Grits left us with. That is exactly the situation today.

Mr. Milliken: How much did taxes go up?

Mr. McDermid: The member is talking about the debt. He wants to talk about the debt and I am giving him the figures. There was $154 billion paid in interest payments and the debt increased $152 billion.

Mr. Milliken: You raised taxes.

Mr. McDermid: That is right. Because we want to pay for programs. You did not. You were borrowing $16 billion a year to pay for programs. You were not even collecting the money to pay for the programs.

Today there is a $9 billion surplus on programs and income. The member goes "Oh". This is a Liberal accounting, "Oh, oh". I love it. That is what the finance ministers did. I sat in here and watched Chrétien and Lalonde. I watched them all go, "Oh", including their leader, only he just shrugged. I watched all that. That is Liberal accounting. Now we have a finance minister who understands the problems of finance and is doing something about them. No question about it.

Canadians have one of the highest standards of living in the world but we cannot sustain it and we cannot improve upon it if we live in the past. We have to look to the future. That is what this government is doing. If Canadians want to have the future on their terms, there are investments to be made and there are bills to be paid now.

Mr. Whittaker: Just scrap it.

Mr. McDermid: I have been picking on the Grits, maybe it is time I went after the NDP. We understand the NDP philosophy perfectly, Mr. Speaker. Spend now and somebody, somewhere down the road, will pay, probably when we become a Third World country when the IMF rolls in here and we start begging around the world for help with our debt problem like other countries are doing today.

That is what the socialists would do if they ever got power. Thank God it is not going to happen, ever. Never in this country will the socialists see power because the Canadian people see right through them. They have seen the problems that socialist governments throughout the world have created. They are now turning to Conservatives. They are now turning to governments which have fiscal responsibility and that is what we have in Canada today. Thank goodness we do.

This country has to move ahead. We must be competitive producers of goods and services. We export 35 per cent of what we produce in this country. We are a trading nation. We cannot be like the New Democrats who want to stop the world and get Canada off. The NDP wants us to live on this little island all by ourselves with huge tariff barriers to protect this sector and protect that sector. The New Democrats want to tax our industries so high that we cannot compete with our competitors in the United States, in Asian countries and in Europe. That is what they want to do.

We cannot live in economic isolation. We just cannot do it, as much as the NDP would like to. The international marketplace is the ultimate judge of our products, but our financial policies are under scrutiny as well. Twenty-four hours a day there is a market open somewhere in the world and people watch Canada and what we are doing. There is no room for wishful thinking. There is no alternative to responsible management.

Canadian enterprises will make their way in the world economy by becoming smarter, faster to adapt—as you know, things are changing very rapidly in this world—more efficient and more productive. If Canadian firms are to provide the growth that we expect from the Canadian economy they must also have a tax system that places them on equal terms with those of other countries with which we compete, and that is what this is all about.

The goods and services tax is a sign that we are truly serious about maintaining and improving our international competitiveness. It is a sign that the government is serious about giving our business sector the tools it needs to do the job that we expect. We are taking action on sales tax reform now because we can no longer afford the destructive and wasteful impacts of the existing tax, which both the opposition parties say we have to get rid of and have for a very long time. They have always said we have to get rid of it.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has now spoken for 11 minutes. I wonder if he can inform us whether his speech is 10 minutes or 20 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): It is a 20-minute speech. I am watching very carefully.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member must have come in late. I gave notice immediately at the beginning of my speech. I am glad she is paying so much attention. That is great. I am flattered.

Five years ago, in November of 1984, the Minister of Finance laid out an economic plan for Canada. In that economic plan he had a number of items that he wanted to accomplish over a period of years. Of course, one was income tax reform which was completed in 1987. Another was privatization of certain Crown corporations that the government no longer needed for public policy purposes. Some 18 corporations have now been privatized, all of which are doing very well with the exception of one. That one was not doing very well as a Crown corporation either, it was eating a tremendous amount of money.

It is very important that we look at this over-all economic plan which included deregulation and freed up the private sector to create employment and grow. I can remember very clearly the night of that economic statement. I was sitting in this Chamber. First the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition got up and said that this was a disaster, that it was the end of Canada as we know it, that we were going to lose thousands of jobs, that it was just a terrible thing. Then the then Leader of the New Democratic Party got up and said that with this policy we were going to lose 100,000 jobs. That was his exact statement that night.

One and a half million new jobs have been created over the last five years, not in the Government of Canada, not by buying Crown corporations and not by enlarging the bureaucracy. The private sector has created 1,500,000 new jobs, meaningful jobs; 85 per cent of them full-time, 57 per cent of them filled by women.

Unemployment has dropped in every region and as well, and rather dramatically, among youth. The economy has expanded by 20 per cent. Business investment is up 61 per cent in this country. It is a good record. It is an astounding record. I believe the Minister of Finance deserves a tremendous amount of credit for that performance here in Canada.

Canadians know that good jobs, higher income and higher standards of public services all depend on our ability to compete in a tough world. The private sector and the public understand that.

I am not going to go into the details of the existing federal sales tax tonight. Suffice it to say that it is damaging to our economy. It gives our producers an unfair advantage over industries that import products. The damage that we have done to our industry is phenomenal. We are the only country in the world that has this type of tax.

Study after study has concluded that we should get rid of it. Various business associations have said that we should get rid of it, including the business association that Mr. Bulloch leads, whom everyone across the way likes to quote. He wants to get rid of it as well.

I mentioned earlier that we trade 35 per cent of everything we produce in this country. If we are going to compete, then we better put our producers on an equal tax footing with their competitors. And that is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Ferguson: Give them $20.50 a tonne and they'll sell their wheat.

Mr. McDermid: The hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex is sitting there bawling like a stuck calf. The hon. member should realize that this is going to help the farming community as well. There is no question about it.

Mr. Ferguson: Go to Saskatchewan and tell them that.

Mr. McDermid: A lot of input costs are taxed now that will not be taxed after this, so I can tell the hon. member that they will do much better.

The GST will eliminate all federal sales tax on inputs to the production process and that brings more incentive to invest in Canada. It means more jobs, greater productivity, greater domestic output, and that is what we need in this country.

This government has shown strong economic leadership since first coming to office. That leadership has produced results. The goods and services tax is just one more step in getting the economic performance of this country in shape, but it is a critical step. We must move ahead now.

Some members of the opposition stand up day after day and say that 79 per cent of the Canadian people do not want this tax so we should get rid of it. When 85 per cent of the people in Canada wanted capital punishment brought back that same bunch, in both parties, voted against it. But now they are saying that because the people say they do not like this tax, we should not bring it in.

In closing, we are bringing it in. And I can assure you today that by 1992 the Canadian people will understand that it is a better system and a fairer system and that it will do more good for the economy of the country than this tax that we have now which is unfair and hidden. It is a tax that must go. I think hon. members will find in the months and years ahead that Canadians will continue to create an economy that offers more open roads and fewer of the dead ends that the NDP are always promising.

We are making tough choices now so that Canadians in the future will share more prosperity and more opportunity than we have today. That is what this is all about. We are dedicated to getting on with the job.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the rather incoherent, self-congratulatory, superficial monologue of the Minister of State for Privatization does not really deserve a comment except to say that the Tory future that he has attempted to outline—and it took him 20 minutes to do that—leads us toward a regressive tax and into an era of anti-environmental taxes.

It is important to put on record today in this debate that what the so-called Progressive Conservative government is proposing to Parliament for a vote tonight is a goods and services tax which runs counter to sustainable development. The tax is not only regressive, and I am sure that the minister understands the meaning of the word, but it is without any reference to the environment. It can even be considered to be damaging to the environment in many respects.

That is so because it will increase the tax burden on environmentally harmless goods and services, which presently are not taxed. At the same time it will reduce the tax burden on goods and services that are energy intensive and polluting which at the present time are taxed more than they will be under the GST. In other words, this government is proposing a tax which is in contradiction with the polluter-pay principle.

Basically what this government will achieve once this tax comes into effect is the reduction of taxes on products that are the most damaging from an environmental and social viewpoint. That is the Tory tax ideology the minister was defending a moment ago. But the taxpayers will catch up with him on that at the next election.

On January 23, 1990, the environment committee was informed by Dr. Metz, the Netherlands' Counsellor on Health and Environment, that as of January 1, 1990, the Netherlands had introduced energy taxes for environmental purposes. They have implemented an additional carbon tax on energy. They say it is a fairly modest tax but it is just the first step. We applaud that and wish only that this government would have enough imagination and sense to implement its rhetoric when it comes to taxation and the environment.

There are several alternatives. For instance, if you take the proposals of the Quebec Union for the Conservation of Nature and le Groupe de recherches appliquées en macro-écologie, you find exactly what I quoted a moment ago, mainly an idea which they have fleshed out whereby they propose the importance and desirability of, instead of an outdated and regressive sales tax, a tax on environmental nuisances which they call TEN. It is a form of carbon tax. It is a taxation of fuels that is dependent on the amount of carbon dioxide that is released when these fuels are consumed.

The environmental nuisance tax would be calculated on the basis of $130 per tonne of oil equivalent. Such tax would generate some $17.3 billion of revenue, reduce the bureaucracy which is needed to collect the federal tax from the present one in place, and would, of course, encourage fuel efficiency in industrial, trade, commercial and domestic activities.

In other words, what the Quebec Union for the Conservation of Nature and le Groupe de recherches appliquées en macro-écologie are proposing is a tax that will lead to higher productivity and a more competitive position in world markets while, at the same time, taking into account the ecological situation that we are, at the present time, facing and which we intend to improve, particularly in relation to climate warming.

If you look west instead of east you will find Professor Rees at the University of British Columbia suggesting another form of tax. It is called entropy taxation. He argues that instead of subsidies to hydrocarbons, Canada should place a tax on fossil fuels on the economically sound grounds that atmospheric capacity to absorb carbon dioxide is a scarce resource for which we, as consumers, should pay. The tax rate should vary for different fossil fuels, of course, depending on carbon content per unit of energy. It would, therefore, be approximately twice as high for coal as it is for natural gas. Such a tax would lower the consumption of hydrocarbons, encourage conservation and reduce carbon dioxide pollutions.

If the Minister of Finance is not satisfied with home-grown suggestions and wants to look at what is being proposed on the other side of the ocean, he will find a proposal by Professor Ewringmann at the University of Cologne in the Federal Republic of Germany who speaks in terms of a green tax reform which includes a carbon tax proposal, taxes on throw-away packaging, taxes on junk mail and taxes on water consumption.

What an opportunity the Minister of Finance had which he has completely wasted by not remembering the commitment made by his own Prime Minister at the United Nations and in Toronto in 1988 when this government committed itself to sustainable development and to the reduction of climate warming.

Here we have a tax reform which will be outdated the moment it comes into effect. It has no consideration, it has no sensitivity, and it actually disregards the potential and the requirements that the environmental situation of today demands.

The time allocated requires that I conclude now. The government has not understood that the environment and the economy are one and the same thing, that there is no conflict between the two and that the taxation instrument is a very important instrument in order to achieve ecological objectives. This opportunity, unfortunately, has been missed entirely.

The GST is penalizing environmentally friendly activities, goods and services and it is going to favour, by way of a lower tax, activities and services which are environmentally damaging. That is the summary, from an environmental and sustainable development point of view, of the proposal of the Minister of Finance which we have here for discussion tonight.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, we have heard during debate on the GST in the finance committee and in the House itself that the principal justification, in the government's view, for the goods and services tax is the need to replace the manufacturers' sales tax. It has been pointed out frequently that the need for replacement of that outmoded and in many ways injurious tax has received the support of all three parties in the previous Parliament. Indeed, no one would dispute the need to replace, modify or change the manufacturers' sales tax in order to remove the well known detrimental aspects of this tax.

However, the question is really whether the goods and services tax is, in any way, a satisfactory replacement for the manufacturers' sales tax. What began as an understandable effort to seek support for a visible and equitable sales tax to replace the manufacturers' sales tax has ended with something very different. The fact, of course, that the government has changed its original proposal of a 9 per cent tax to a 7 per cent tax in no way changes the basic problems with the proposed tax.

We all know that all sales taxes are regressive. They have a more adverse impact on the lower-income people in our society than on the more prosperous. The government committed itself to alleviate the adverse impact of the goods and services tax on the lower-income people by offering an offset in terms of a significant credit. Of course, while this is socially desirable in any discussion of a regressive sales tax, it means that the cost of the tax itself increases. Also, the government has sought to reduce the regressive nature of the sales tax, an almost impossible task, but nevertheless it undertook to do so, by excluding certain goods and services from the effect of the tax. This, of course, resulted in a narrower tax base than what otherwise would have been the case, and therefore the rate had to be increased to offset the fact of a narrower base.

The government attempted to obtain agreement from the provinces for a jointly administered sales tax. It failed to achieve that agreement, it failed to achieve agreement from any province, presumably because no province wishes to be associated, directly or indirectly, with the imposition of yet another regressive sales tax. The result is a much more expensive tax to administer, because federal and provincial sales taxes will not be levied at the same time. There will be an additional cost for consumers since provincial sales taxes will be levied on top of federal sales taxes. That is very nice for the provinces. It results in a windfall of several hundred million dollars for the provinces in taxes that they did not think they were going to get. But, it also means the consumers of Canada will be paying several hundred million dollars more in a consumption tax than they would have paid if the government had succeeded in convincing the provinces to combine with them on a jointly administered tax.

The cost of a separately administered federal sales tax will be greater than if it were administered jointly with the provinces. The credits to small business to offset the increased collection costs of the federal tax again will be higher than needed, thus making the GST more expensive.

There are many other flaws in the GST. In short, it is neither visible, simple, fair nor effective. But, along with the basic problems about the tax, as noted by my colleagues in detail, is the severe problem that a sales tax of these proportions is inflationary.

With all goods and services in Canada being taxed, except for something called basic groceries and a few other items, there will be an immediate, pervasive and prolonged inflationary impact. To some extent, this might be mitigated by the price reductions that, presumably or theoretically, will be passed on to consumers by manufacturers who will see their sales tax reduced from 13.5 per cent to 7 per cent. But, I know of no mechanism which can assure us that this will be done and that those savings will be passed on to the consumer. In any event, of course, the GST covers a much larger range of goods and services than the manufacturers' sales tax which it is replacing.

It is idle to believe that in such inflationary circumstances organized labour will not seek to offset the adverse impact of the tax when they get to the bargaining table. We can be quite certain that in the year ahead of us we shall see rising wage demands across Canada, again fueling inflation on top of the fuel already provided by the goods and services tax itself.

Mr. Caccia: That is why we need the environmental tax.

Mr. MacLaren: My colleague draws attention to the environmental tax. I agree with him. I would only note that if higher wage demands result from the GST, we shall find Canadians attempting to cope with renewed inflationary pressures in a variety of ways.

We will also see the Governor of the Bank of Canada attempting to cope with inflationary pressures with the one tool that he has at hand, a crude tool it is, but it is the only one he has at hand, monetary policy. I think we can be certain that as the inflationary impact of the GST works its way through the economy, the Governor of the Bank of Canada will feel compelled, once again, to increase interest rates in Canada.

The tragedy of this situation is that the government had the opportunity during six or more years of economic buoyancy to combine fiscal and monetary policies to fight inflation, but they did not do so.

A few moments ago, my colleague across the way spoke of the November 1984 statement by the Minister of Finance. A Conservative government had come into office and the Minister of Finance of the day soon issued a statement to the effect that if drastic measures were not taken by the new government, federal spending could rise as high as 21.8 per cent of the Gross National Product. "Horrors", he said. "We must do something". Well, where is it today? It is 22.2 per cent, not the terrible 21.8 per cent he forecasted, but 22.2 per cent.

How can our colleague across the way talk about progress being made? He said that program spending has been reduced. Program spending was forecast to rise to 16 per cent of GNP if the government did not act. Today, it is 16 per cent. The government, crying "horror", said interest charges on the debt would reach 5.3 per cent of the GNP. Where is it today? It is 6.1 per cent of the GNP. The government said the interest rate on the debt would average 6.5 per cent over the five years between 1985 and 1990. What has it averaged? It has averaged 9.6 per cent, not 6.5 per cent which caused them such concern. But, under their own government, their own policies or absence of policies, it has now reached an average of 9.6 per cent. Finally, they said if they did not act immediately on inflation, it would reach 3.8 per cent. Where is it today? It is 4.3 per cent.

The problem is one of government mismanagement of the economy. From 1982 to 1990, Canada has experienced an economic boom, a consumption boom, fuelled in part by cuts in taxes and a continued high level of government spending. The government failed to take the opportunity of a buoyant economy to raise taxes and cut government spending. Now with an economic slow-down in the offing, the government is increasing taxes, stimulating inflation and finally facing up to the prospect of having to cut government spending, but all at the wrong time. The government delayed over and over and now it has left any action so late in the economic cycle that all Canadians will pay the price of this government's economic mismanagement.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, one of the conventions of our Constitution is that ministers are responsible to the House of Commons. This is a government bill under discussion and there is not a single minister of the Crown in this House.

Mr. Thompson: No members either.

Mr. Milliken: I would suggest that if the Speaker wishes to allow the debate to continue, he get ministers in and if none want to come, I suggest we simply adjourn immediately.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, to begin I want to use the words of a 17th century French statesman and former finance minister, Jean Baptiste Colbert. Colbert, I think, sized up taxation by stating that the act of taxation consists of plucking the goose so as to obtain the most feathers with the least hissing. I think we would all agree that there is a fair amount of hissing in relation to the goods and services tax. I believe that the sum of that hissing, a great deal of that hissing, is simply caused because of a lack of information and knowledge on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada.

I do not believe that we have done a good job in explaining this tax and I do not believe that the opposition has helped us in the explanation of this tax and what it really is. To begin, Mr. Speaker, I might have to go back to the classroom of my old teaching days. It has been about 10 years since I have been in the classroom but I think the basis of any intelligent debate is information and facts. Let us go through this process and see if we can explain some of the difficulties with the perception of this tax.

The tax itself is a replacement tax. I think we should emphasize the word "replacement" because it is a replacement tax. We are taking an outdated federal sales tax of 13.5 per cent, a sales tax that has been around since 1924, and replacing it with a 7 per cent tax. That is the one point I believe all of us fail to mention enough, that it is replacing an existing outdated tax.

Where does the difficulty lie? I think it lies, in a sense, in an article that a lady by the name of Diane Francis wrote for The Financial Post. Listen to what she had to say about the goods and services tax in the November 15, 1989 edition of The Financial Post:

> One cannot blame the public for being upset.

This is in relation to the goods and services tax. The article continues:

> After all, a bush-league press and second-rate politicians tell them the GST is a brand-new tax over and above the onerous burden most are shouldering. This is erroneous. This is not a new tax but one that replaces a destructive, burdensome one that eats jobs.

I agree with her totally. I believe there has been a lot of nonsense spoken by the opposition in relation to this tax. I will tell you where the opposition has not changed their tactics at all. Ten years ago in this country, almost to the date, we were in the midst of a federal election. Why did that federal election come about? If you sum up the 1980 election, it was a 16 cent a gallon election. It was an election when a finance minister of this country attempted to come to grips with some of the financial problems we were facing. And to do it we were going to be paying 16 cents more per gallon for gasoline, a fuel tax.

What happened? The government was defeated in 1980 and we resorted back to the old ways of spending. We did not come to grips with our problems in the way that we should have and could have. By losing that election, we lost the best opportunity that this country has ever had since Confederation to come to grips with certain realities.

What happened to the tax on gasoline? I think the Canadian public was totally deceived. The tax certainly exceeded fivefold the 16 cents per gallon. The point is that taxation is not a popular concept. It is one that is very difficult to articulate and one that the Canadian people would rather not talk about. But we are talking about it and we are going to do something about it.

Let us look at some of the areas of taxation and exemption into which we are getting. To begin with, of course, we know that this tax is going to replace the existing onerous 13.5 per cent federal sales tax. It will not apply to such things as residential rates or rents, health and dental services, hospital and nursing home care, day care services, legal aid services, financial services, and certain educational services will be exempt in this particular tax.

What we are attempting to do with this tax, as I said initially, is to come to grips with certain realities in this country. We have an onerous debt, a debt that has to be reduced. That is exactly what this new tax is going to do. It will contribute to the government's debt reduction effort and it will ensure that we can pay for programs that we, as Canadians enjoy, programs such as medicare and old age pensions.

It is going to ensure that Canadians can compete effectively in the world economy because the present federal sales tax discriminates against products made right here in Canada. As crazy as it may seem, our present taxation system leaves our domestic products at about a 30 per cent disadvantage in relation to products brought in from other countries. It leaves our exporters at about a 1 per cent disadvantage in the international market at a time when we have to compete in international markets. That is what it is attempting to do.

To offset some of the problems envisaged because of the difficulties that low-income families might experience this very day with the federal sales tax, we will have it set up so that lower-income families and those in the $30,000 range and under net income, will enjoy some definite advantages with this particular program. The credits which will be going out to all the individuals in Canada with incomes under $30,000 per year will start in December of 1990 in advance of the start-up of the GST. So there will be money in the hands of low-income Canadians to help offset this new taxation.

Small businesses will certainly have an advantage because of the tax credits they will receive under the GST which they do not receive under the federal sales tax. The paperwork involved in processing their taxation is not as onerous as the opposition would like to have us believe. Businesses with $500,000 of annual sales can file one annual report. Companies with sales of $6 million or more can do these reports quarterly. There are good reasons why we need this tax. It simply comes right down to the fact that to be competitive we must have it, the old tax has to be replaced, it is a burden on industry and the development of this country.

• (1850)

In conclusion, I am going to quote the Premier of the Province of New Brunswick. Obviously, he is on the other side of the political fence, but I think he hit the nail right on the head when he said that the opposition has failed utterly in coming up with an alternative to this tax. The premier is saying that it is irresponsible for us to criticize the tax that is attempting to do something unless we have an alternative. Members on the opposition side are devoid of all alternatives.

I summarize by saying that this tax is good for Canada. It is something we should have had 50 years ago and I am proud to be part of the government that is bringing it in.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in this important debate on the tax reform measures we are proposing to Canadians.

This evening I will not repeat what has been said many times before. We all know, about the reasons for this tax reform which has been awaited for years in this country, which follows a series of studies and which will put Canada on the same footing as 50 other countries that already have a VAT or goods and services tax.

Recently I noticed that as people became better informed, the percentage of the population that supports our tax reform has steadily increased.

The country's major commentators, and I refer for instance to the August 9 Le Devoir, in which Mr. Albert Juneau wrote: "The Wilson reform is inevitable. Despite its limitations, the Wilson plan is a tremendous improvement". That was last August. A little later, in December, in Le Soleil, a Quebec City newspaper, George Anger wrote an editorial: "The Wilson solution is the right one". And finally, the big Toronto newspaper, the Globe and Mail, printed the following headline last Tuesday: "The unpopular but essential GST".

I think this is very significant. The opposition parties tell us that more than two-thirds, more than 70 per cent of Canadians are against the GST. The former Minister of Finance of New Zealand, Mr. Douglas, testified before the Finance Committee. He said that one month before the GST was introduced, two-thirds of New Zealanders were against the tax. One month after the tax was introduced, the situation was reversed, with two-thirds in favour of it.

Mr. Speaker, I understand the strategy of the opposition parties and especially the NDP, which for a week has been trying to prevent any debate on the issue. I think the people watching us this evening on television ought to know that we have been treated to votes on 30 minutes' notice. Last night we offered to sit until one o'clock in the morning. However, the Opposition wants to prevent public debate and ensure we talk about the tax as little as possible, because otherwise more people will realize there are good reasons for this tax.

Taxes are never popular, but on the weekend I was reading La Presse, which had conducted a poll on increases in tuition fees in Quebec. It seems 60 per cent of adults are against increases in tuition fees. Mr. Dubuc wrote that adult respondents were too hasty in their reaction to an issue on which they were ill informed. Three-quarters did not have the slightest idea what the present level of tuition fees actually was or that it was two or three times lower than in other provinces, which did not prevent them from being against the increase or from suggesting other ways to deal with a university financing problem.

Mr. Speaker, just because a poll at this time doesn't indicate popular support—a real leader has to propose the measures he feels are in the interests of his country, and hope that, as so often happens, people will appreciate those measures once they experience the benefits.

To show you the opposition's bad faith or ignorance, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take two concrete examples. The first is from the Liberal opposition. Last week, I asked the hon. member for Ottawa South, a Liberal, whether he was opposed to—because we must understand that the GST is not a new tax—a reorganized tax. Therefore, some items will go up in price and some others will go down. That is easy to understand. We are replacing a 13.5 per cent tax with a 7 per cent tax and applying the tax to new products. It is like two interconnected vessels: when the level in one goes down, the level in the other goes up.

So I asked the hon. member for Ottawa South the other day whether he was opposed to new cars costing at least $500 to $1,000 less starting January 1, 1991. I am not afraid to tell people that I am waiting for the GST to take effect before changing my car. I have a five-year-old car and I want to wait for 1991 because I know that a $15,000 car will then cost at least $500 or $600 less. For the car which the hon. member for Ottawa South drives, a Buick Century—I checked this afternoon, it would be about $1,200 less.

The hon. member told me that he could not afford to buy a new car. I quote the hon. member for Ottawa South who said: "Now, speaking of cars, it is clear that the Conservative member and his friends always buy new cars. I am just an Ottawa lawyer and I usually buy used cars."

Look at that, Madam Speaker. A member of Parliament who makes $80,000, who lives in Ottawa, who does not have to pay for a second home, can tell car dealers that he cannot afford a new car! Madam Speaker, excuse me, but that is bad faith. And I think it is right to tell people that new cars will cost a lot less. He tells me that he will buy a used car because it will give him—He says that unfortunately a 7 per cent tax will apply. That again is misinformation. There will be no tax on used car transactions between individuals and secondly, if you buy a used car from a dealer, you will pay 7 per cent on the mark-up. In other words, if the dealer bought the car for $10,000 and sells it for $12,000, the 7 per cent tax will be paid on the $2,000 mark-up.

Let us stop frightening people. Let us stop telling them stories. Let us be frank and tell the truth.

My next example is taken from the NDP. The star candidate in Chambly, Mr. Edmonston, the former consumer advocate, has now become the advocate of our big financial institutions. He keeps telling his audience in Chambly that Desjardins will be paying $20 million more per year because of the GST. That is just not true! The Minister of State for Finance went to his riding to explain that any reservations Desjardins might have had last summer had faded because it was now clear that transactions between credit unions, and there are thousands in Quebec, will not be taxed. It is misleading to keep repeating, like Mr. Edmonston, that Desjardins will pay 20 million more annually because of the GST.

Madam Speaker, you will excuse my emphasis here but I just wanted to point out the opposition's bad faith or ignorance in this respect.

Finally, I would like to mention two ways in which people are reacting to the GST. We have the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, some of whose leaders have declared war against the GST. They are using what is referred to as telemarketing. They have a taped message which runs practically 24 hours a day, and we are now being flooded with calls by an anonymous voice that tells us to call our MP because the GST is no good.

I prefer what was said by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities in its latest bulletin: "We started talks with the Department of Finance and the results were excellent. We feel very positive". My point is, Madam Speaker, that this tax proposal is a very good one. This tax reform has been long awaited, and the Prime Minister said quite frankly some time ago: "We know that the proposed changes aren't popular but they are in the best interests of Canada. We want to make constructive changes in our economy, to make it more competitive, and we are prepared to introduce measures that are not popular because the national interest demands that we show that kind of leadership."

Madam Speaker, that was the point I was trying to make. In a very apt simile used by a columnist in L'Actualité, instead of the calm before the storm, we have the storm before the calm, like 50 other countries. If we give this tax reform a chance to be implemented, I think all Canadians will realize that the sky is not falling. They will realize they will be more competitive with a tax that will be far more productive and help improve the quality of life of all Canadians, including our hon. friends in the opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Duplessis): The hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands.

• (1900)

[English]

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to conclude our fight in the House against the GST. Opposition to the GST started from the very word that this measure was going to be brought forward. I can remember sitting in the finance committee hearings last August in Ottawa listening to submissions by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and its opposition to the GST. At that time I said that the opposition was forming strange new alliances. I want to tell this House about some of those strange new alliances.

Since last August I have been meeting with many constituents in my riding. I have been meeting with individuals, operators of small businesses, restaurant operators, and resort owners in the Saanich Peninsula, the Gordon Head area and the Gulf Islands. I have also met with representative of the Chambers of Commerce both in Sidney and on Saltspring Island. The unanimity of voice of those people indicates that they are absolutely opposed to the GST. People who usually have differing opinions on a range of subjects are unified in their opposition to the GST. This makes my job as a politician very easy because I am giving voice to their opposition.

People are feeling powerless. This government should take note of what has happened in eastern Europe where people have risen up in their feeling of powerlessness. If we believe in our political system we must rely on public confidence to do this kind of work. Imposing this kind of widely abhorred legislation is done at our jeopardy.

Since last August I have circulated many petitions throughout my constituency. Small business owners have been most gracious in contributing to that task. I want to read into the record a letter dated September 24 from Marlene Thompson, a constituent of mine and the proprietor of Roy Imports:

> Dear Lynn:
> I was pleased to receive your letter, and to learn that there was one person in Ottawa who realizes the problems that face the operator of a small business, of whom there are so many of us in Sidney; that our 24-hour day is pretty full, and for us money does not grow on trees. We just do not have the time for further tax administration or collection problems, nor the money to buy fancy cash registers or accountants to help us.

I must tell you before going any further, that I am not a member of your party; having voted Conservative all my adult days and thus feel somewhat responsible for the mess we have down there. I am thoroughly disenchanted with those we trusted to guide this wonderful land.

Considering all the scandals since Mulroney and Wilson took power—I wonder now if the cash register companies are greasing someone's hand.

I took the enclosed petition up one side of Beacon Avenue, until I ran out of signature spaces: every merchant signed it. They are very upset over the possible hassles and additional bookwork that is going to be required. I now plan on closing down my little shop at the end of the year. I do not have the time to devote to additional bookwork or tax administration. I had the feeling today in talking with 30 odd people that more will follow suit. The big corporations and oil companies will soon have swallowed up all of the small entrepreneurs.

This is an example of the kind of correspondence that many of us on this side of the House have received from people asking us to represent their opposition. That is what I am pleased to be able to do in this House tonight.

I want to point out that the income tax and the tax system in Canada generally is based upon a system of voluntary compliance. That system of voluntary compliance depends upon confidence in what we are doing. The GST and the widespread opposition to it erodes that sense of confidence. When we get this kind of legislation rammed down the throats of so many people, the voluntary compliance mechanism is eroded. What we are promoting by doing this is going into more of an underground economy. There may even be a downturn in revenues.

When government members speak about this bill, they point out what they call fairness. I have to put a somewhat wry little smile on my face every time they speak about this. We have to realize their definition of fairness is quite distinct from the definitions of fairness on this side of the House.

Perhaps, the most striking illustration of what the Tories have done to the income tax system can be found in some calculations done by the National Council on Welfare.

Since this government gained power in 1984, the income taxes of an average working poor family have risen by 44 per cent. Those of a typical middle-class family have increased by only 10 per cent. The typical top income family has seen its tax bills drop by 6 per cent. Is this fair?

Since 1984 the Tories have raised corporate taxes by 21 per cent, personal income taxes by 46 per cent and sales taxes by a dramatic 67 per cent. The far more significant issue is the reliance on sales taxes. What we are talking about here is a strange definition of fairness.

Whenever the question of fairness comes up the finance minister immediately points to the enhanced sales tax credit. We have heard a lot about it in this House. The credit is a direct payment made four times a year to those with incomes below $24,000, and partially available to those with incomes up to $30,000 depending on family size. The Minister of Finance argues that once the credit is counted in, low-income families will be better off under the GST than they would be otherwise in 1991.

This may be true, but is it a meaningful point of comparison? The working poor are clearly much worse off now than they were when Mr. Wilson became Minister of Finance.

Furthermore, even the small relief low-income families will receive due to the enhanced credit will be short-lived. The credit is indexed only to 3 per cent. If the Minister of Finance were serious about protecting this low-income group, he would have at the very least made the credit fully indexed to inflation.

I want to sum up by pointing out some of our alternatives. We in our party have developed some alternatives, unlike the Liberals. We have pointed out that there has not been a royal commission on the tax system in 25 years. I point out to those who are watching that we are willing to send them the minority report on our alternatives if they wish to write to me at the House of Commons.

• (1910)

The government's GST proposal is expected to raise $18.5 billion. We have proposals to reform the personal income tax system, to broaden the base of the corporate income tax, to impose a green tax, an excise tax to discourage production and use of environmentally hazardous goods and to introduce a tax on transfers of wealth, a millionaire's tax.

In conclusion there are alternatives, although listening to the finance minister one would never believe there were. There are viable alternatives. We in our party have gone to the trouble of proposing them because we believe that as an opposition party we have a duty, not just to oppose this legislation but to propose alternatives.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to be able to speak on behalf of the residents of North Surrey tonight.

Many people will know that I made a survey of the residents in my riding concerning their support or opposition to the GST. Ninety-eight per cent opposed the GST. In addition, I have had thousands and thousands of petitions, including another 4,500 petitions that I received this week from seniors in my riding who are opposed to the GST.

One of the things they keep saying to me is that the biggest problem is that there is no credibility in the Tory arguments about the GST. Let me go through some of the reasons for their having no confidence that the government is telling them the truth.

First, members of the government say that the manufacturers' sales tax is evil and that it costs us jobs. I agree. But then they cannot understand why, if that was such a terrible evil tax, the Minister of Finance increased it from 8 per cent to 9 per cent to 10 per cent to 11 per cent to 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent. The minister started off saying that the GST would be revenue neutral. That is what he said. Now he is saying we must impose this tax to deal with the debt.

Which way is it? People say to me that he is not really serious about dealing with the debt. If he was serious about dealing with the debt, why did he bring into this House last week a bill that gives another $350 million in tax concessions to the rich, to people earning $86,000, by increasing their ability to avoid taxes on RRSPs. For people who are earning less than $37,000 he reduced their ability to contribute to their RRSPs. That is the way it has gone.

Last year there was $10.1 billion in revenue lost with the rich avoiding paying taxes by making contributions to their RRSPs.

People do not believe the government when it says that the tax will stay at 7 per cent. In New Zealand it went from 7 per cent to 12 per cent. In Britain it went up to 15 per cent.

My riding is the fastest growing riding in the country. It has more housing starts than anywhere else. New housing is vital to that municipality. People in my riding receive a pamphlet that states: "Over all, GST housing rebates will ensure that homebuyers will pay roughly the same amount of tax on their new house after January 1".

What do competent people say? The Homebuilders Association has put out a detailed report. It contains something like 28 pages of calculations. What does it say? It is going to drive up the price of a new house by nearly $5,000.

I had a tax consulting firm do another detailed calculation for me. It looked at the actual cost of land compared to the cost of building materials and labour. It calculated what in fact makes up the manufacturers' sales tax that now goes into that housing. It is saying that it will drive up the price by a little over $5,000.

In the metropolitan areas and in the fast growth areas like Vancouver and Toronto, the calculations show that it could be as high as $9,000; and if there is an increase in interest rates because of the GST it will add up to $14,000 on a new home.

The government's response was: "They are wrong". The Homebuilders Association has been asking since last fall for the government to produce its detailed figures. I have in my hand a statement issued by the Canadian Homebuilders Association within the last week which states that the government has refused to give it its detailed calculations. That is because this government knows that it is deliberately misleading the people of Canada.

The Canadian people do not have any confidence in the slick advertising that is at best misleading and at the worst deceitful and dishonest.

The government says that it will not affect rents. Yet housing economists clearly show that because of the input costs into rental units, the cost is going to go up anywhere from $300 to $400 a year, which means a rent increase for people of $30 or more a year.

The other people in my riding who say that they do not believe this government and what it is saying are particularly the small business persons. The small business person is concerned that there is going to be increased problems in the administration of this tax, that there is going to be less money for the customers to spend because they are going to have to pay 7 per cent on all of their goods and services. That is going to take away from consumer buying power.

Because of the very quick escalation of housing costs in some areas, some of the major shopping centres are feeling a downturn in consumer buying power. If rental costs or housing costs go up $150 or $200 a month, that money is taken from people's disposable income. People cannot afford to buy a new coat. They cannot afford to buy bikes for their children. They are paying their basic rent. If you add another 7 per cent to all of the goods that they are buying, they have less money to go around.

One thing that has happened in this whole debate is that people have lost confidence in this government. They are convinced that the arguments that the government is putting forward are not based on sound, rational behaviour and sound, rational calculations.

They are saying that the Liberals are in collusion with the government because, first, they started some of the trends away from corporate taxes. They are also the ones who are willing to push this measure through the House in order to allow their friends in the Senate to deal with it. That is simply because they do not have the confidence to deal with it here. They want to get it through this House so that they can have the Senate deal with it. They have been mainly responsible for the tax shifts that have taken place in Canada over the last 10 years.

One of the major things that my colleague was talking about is alternatives. She mentioned a number of the alternatives. The one that she overlooked was the question of the interest rates.

High interest rates are one of the direct problems that are creating this debt. A drop in interest rates of 3 per cent next year would save over $10 billion in servicing charges—$10 billion. That is one-third of the current debt.

If the Conservative government had brought in a reasonable interest rate policy three years ago, our current debt would not be $360 billion. It would probably be $250 billion.

• (1920)

I would like to summarize by saying that the residents of Surrey North are going to continue to oppose this tax, when it goes through this House and to the Senate and when it comes back to the House.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Duplessis): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, once again I want to draw the attention of the Chair to the fact that there are no ministers of the Crown in the House. We are about to be treated to a speech by one of the supporters of the government. I would have thought that the ministers would have the politeness to come in, since they put closure on, and listen to the speeches of the hon. member who is about to speak.

[Translation]

Some hon. members: You are the only Liberal in the House.

An hon. member: That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Duplessis): That is not a point of order. Order. The hon. member for Calgary Southeast (Mr. Richardson).

[English]

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, I should say at the outset to the lone Liberal in the House that an agreement was reached over the dinner hour whereby some of our members would be allowed to slip out and get a bite to eat before the 1 a.m. vote. Thus a few of our ministers have in fact left the House momentarily to get a bite to eat.

We have had a great discussion tonight concerning the goods and services tax. Discussion on the goods and services tax has been vigorous and spirited since it was first proposed.

In June of 1987 Finance Minister Michael Wilson told Canadians how he planned to replace the out-dated, capricious manufacturers' sales tax.

For almost three years the government has consulted widely with groups and with individuals in cross-country hearings by the Commons finance committee. As a member of the finance committee I can tell you that this was a serious undertaking, prompted by respect for the opinions of Canadians and conducted in a thorough and painstaking way.

The proof of our commitment to the consultation process is the legislation tabled in Parliament. The concerns of ordinary Canadians are reflected in this legislation as well as the ideas and experience of our business and community leaders.

In every region of the country we heard the views of Canadians. Some understood the need to replace the old tax. Some were confused by conflicting stories they were being told. Many were prepared to accept the replacement tax if the government continued to cut expenditures and brought the tax in at a rate lower than 9 per cent.

Mike Wilson presented Canadians with the difficult choices to be made if the rate were to be reduced. The 7 per cent rate itself is proof that the government listens and listens carefully.

In the course of the public hearings and in the ensuing debate, Canadians have been plagued with a lot of myths about the GST. The government has gone to great pains to express the concepts and the impact of what we propose to do, why we are doing it and what the impacts will be. However, there are still some unfounded and unrealistic ideas about the GST.

I want to take this opportunity to address the concerns which still trouble some Canadians and dispel a few of the myths. For example, many people have been led to believe that the GST is a new tax added on to existing taxes. It should be made clear to Canadians that the GST is not a new tax but rather a replacement for a wasteful and destructive tax, the manufacturers' sales tax. This tax is a hidden one which the ordinary consumer never sees.

Canadians have been paying the old tax, and they have been paying for the old tax in the sense that it impedes our export efforts and makes imported products less expensive in relation to those of our domestic manufacturers. The goods and services tax is indeed new in the sense that it is a modern, up-to-date and efficient tax. But it is not designed to add to the existing tax burden; it distributes the burden more fairly through various sectors of the economy.

Myth number two is that some Canadians believe the GST is necessary because the government cannot control its own spending. This government has consistently pursued two key objectives since coming to office. They are to reduce government spending and to keep the debt on a downward course and ultimately eliminate it.

On December 15, 1989, the President of the Treasury Board announced further spending restraint measures and initiatives to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of government. These measures are additional evidence of our ongoing commitment to good management and expenditure restraint.

Mr. Milliken: Listen to that nonsense!

Mr. Richardson: Let me just tell the hon. member about our record in this regard.

Since coming to office in 1984 we have reduced the debt by almost $8 billion, from $38.1 billion to $30.5 billion this year. In 1984–85 our spending on all government programs and services was $16 billion more than revenues. This year as a result of tight management of spending and increased revenues program, spending is $9 billion less than revenues.

The fiscal plan we tabled in April shows that the debt will be cut in half within four years.

Since we took office, spending on all government programs through 1989–90 has grown by 3.6 per cent a year less than the rate of inflation. Relative to the size of our economy, expenditures on programs and services have declined from 19.5 per cent in 1984–85 to 16.1 per cent in 1989–90. If we had not restrained spending to this extent, program expenditures would have been $22 billion, or 21 per cent higher today.

The size of the Public Service has been reduced by more than 12,000 persons bringing it back to the level it was in the early 1970s.

We remain committed to ongoing debt reduction, but to do so will require continuing action to control expenditures and a stable and reliable tax system that supports economic growth.

GST myth number three is a widespread concern that the rate of the GST will be pushed up in a few years as an unlimited source of money for the government. It is difficult to see why we would introduce a measure as visible and as controversial as the goods and services tax if our intention was to increase the rate within several years. If our objective were merely to raise money without incurring the wrath of the public, the existing tax with all its faults is a much better way to do it.

In fact, members of this House should know as well as anyone that an increase in the GST rate would require approval of this House. This is hardly the place to expect such a move to pass without comment.

Changing the GST rate, given the visible nature of the tax itself, is not something that will be done lightly by any government. Through parliamentary reform and other measures we have increased the number of steps any measure must go through. In the end the best protection for Canadians from increased taxes is a government with our commitment to careful spending and responsible fiscal management.

Myth number four has led some people to believe that housing prices will increase sharply because of the GST. In fact, more than 90 per cent of new home purchasers will qualify for the full rebate under the GST, and some 95 per cent will receive some assistance. In most cities, like Calgary, impact on house prices will be less than 1 per cent. This government has a commitment to affordable housing and the goods and services tax is fully consistent with that commitment.

Myth number five is that small businesses across the country have been told the GST will be a nightmare of complexity and very expensive to administer. That is simply not the case.

The goods and services tax will have an impact on small business but the GST has been designed to minimize, as much as possible, the trouble and expense of compliance. The straightforward nature of the tax, its wide application and uniform rate all contribute to its simplicity.

In addition, there will be an exemption from the existing 13.5 per cent FST for cash registers and similar equipment, and a start-up grant of $1,000 in the first year. The exemption for point of sales systems and cash registers will reduce the after-tax cost of such equipment by 20 per cent.

Streamlined accounting methods are being developed for retailers selling taxable and zero-rated products.

Finally, it has been a cruel campaign of misinformation to convince senior citizens that the GST will make their lives more difficult. Quite simply, most senior citizens will be better off under the GST. Like other Canadians with low and modest incomes, the majority of seniors will benefit from the GST credit and from the other provisions of the GST as well.

We have excluded basic groceries from the GST to protect Canadians with low and modest incomes. Meals on Wheels and similar programs offered by charities will not be taxed. There will be no tax on drugs prescribed by physicians. Eyeglasses, contact lenses and hearing aids will all be tax free.

Virtually all health care and dental services will be exempt, as well as most services provided by health care plans.

The GST credit will protect seniors with cheques mailed every three months beginning in December of this year before the tax is implemented.

• (1930)

In summary, the goods and services tax was designed with the needs of seniors very much in mind. Some 84 per cent of seniors will receive the benefit of the goods and services tax credit.

The GST is an essential element to securing the economic future of this country. It is the most fair and effective way to replace a tax that has been blocking economic progress literally for generations. The GST is an expression of our commitment to responsible economic leadership.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to enter into the debate on the goods and services tax. As all of us know, our country has changed and evolved greatly over the years.

At the time of Confederation in 1867 we were hewers of wood and drawers of water and relied very heavily on tapping resources. By the mid-1920s the country had changed. Canada was evolving into a manufacturing power and our tax system evolved with it. To show that Canada could tailor a tax system to the times, we brought in a manufacturers' sales tax because we had a manufacturing based economy.

Now we are in the 1990s and things have changed dramatically: we have an economy which is knowledge based, information based, and service based. Although 60 per cent of our economic activity is based on services we do not tax them. We continue to cling to an archaic, outmoded 1924 manufacturers' sales tax. That is why we are having this debate and that is why tax reform proposals have been put forward by this government.

There are many people in this country who are watching what goes on in this House. They watch one side stand up and say black, and they see the other side stand up and say white. Most people know that it is grey, that the truth lies in between.

I am not going to stand here tonight and cry black. I am not going to blame the debt, the debt and our economic woes on the opposition parties.

In truth, during the 1970s when this country was running astonishing debts we had turbulent economic times. Hindsight is great. I think it is time to stop putting the blame there. By the same token, I am not going to say that the government has done everything perfectly or that the course of debt reduction could not have been faster. I do not think that is relevant. I want to refrain from placing blame, but that does not mean that the Liberals should go unchallenged. It does not mean that Canadians should put up with parliamentarians who scream about their rights, without also telling us about their responsibilities.

For example, the New Democrats have a right to try and disrupt proceedings in this House the way they have done it, but they have a responsibility as well to come up with meaningful alternatives.

The Liberal Party of Canada has a responsibility in this issue. As the Official Opposition in this Chamber it is asking us to scrap the GST. It is asking us just to throw it away.

Any Canadian who is watching this debate should ask themselves: Does the Liberal Party not have the responsibility to tell us what it would do? I have a few questions which Canadians should ask their neighbourhood Liberals.

First, exactly how would the Liberals deal with the country's growing debt and debt problem? What spending would they cut? What taxes would they raise? The Liberals should also tell us how they would deal with over $2 billion in existing federal sales tax which is collected now and is at risk.

The Liberal Party knows that it is at risk, the government knows it is at risk, and we have yet to hear any solutions.

As well, they should ask their neighbourhood Liberals about the debt and the interest on the debt. This year alone $39 billion will be paid in interest on the existing debt. Where is that money going? Most of it is going into the bank accounts of the rich. It is being collected from all taxpayers, lower and middle income people, and being deposited back in the bank accounts of people who own treasury bills and Canada Savings Bonds. This is terrible social policy. Ask the Liberals how they can support that?

Why would the Liberals support a tax system which favours imports over exports? How can they do that? How can they stand there and tell us that they support a system which penalizes Canadian businesses?

Also they should ask their neighbourhood Liberals how they can support an existing tax system which costs businesses billions of dollars? Businesses pay the federal sales tax. The GST will correct that. Businesses will not pay the GST. Ask the Liberals how they can support a tax regime which penalizes businesses?

Ask the Liberals how they can support an existing tax system which has the effect of penalizing not only business and importers but seniors, people on fixed incomes and those the Liberal Party are trying to frighten right now with a campaign of misinformation. The GST credit will make lower income Canadians better off than they are today. Ask your local Liberal how he or she supports that?

Don't Liberals want Canadians to have more protection than exists now against future tax increases? Don't Liberals want Canadians to have a tax in place which is not easily raised, which is unlike the federal sales tax or income taxes that can just go up in a budget? Ask the Liberals why they oppose a visible, up front GST which cannot move unless it is totally debated in this House?

Also ask the Liberals how they can support simply tinkering with the income tax system, when they know that to make any meaningful change in our economic situation would mean income taxes which are massively higher than they are today?

Finally, we have to ask the big question: What is the Liberal alternative? Are the Liberals going to cut spending? If so, what spending? Tell us. Where are they going to cut spending and find the money?

Are they going to print money? Are they going to call the Governor of the Bank of Canada and tell him to fire up the printing presses, that inflation is no problem, that higher interest rates which result are no problem and that higher unemployment is no problem? Let's have a re-run of the Liberals in the late 1970s, let's have a re-run of 22 per cent mortgage rates, and let's have a re-run of double digit unemployment; that is exactly the Liberal alternative, and it is no alternative.

Or, are the Liberals going to raise taxes and, if they raise taxes, which ones? Do we not have a right to know? Do we not have a right to know from the Official Opposition what exactly it would put in place?

The Liberals are the ones saying: "Scrap the GST. Scrap this tax". They are going from one end of the country to another instilling fear in people, fear of the unknown. What we have to fear most is the status quo and gutless inability to move forward with real reform.

Frederick Gardiner once said: "Smile and all the world smiles with you. Tax and you tax alone". If taxing at this point means paying down the mortgage on our children's future, securing our economic strength, making us more competitive, ensuring that we can fund our social programs, our health care and our medicare in the future, and ensuring that Canada goes into the 1990s in better economic health than it has in past decades, then I am willing to stand alone, my colleagues will stand alone, and we will do it for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to point out something extremely important: I have the honour to be in the House with two pages from the city of Hearst, in my riding. They are Dominique Boucher and Manon Girard.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bélair: Thank you. Obviously, they are doing a wonderful job for hon. members and I thank them.

On the subject of Bill C-62, Madam Speaker—

• (1940)

[English]

We are indeed assisting the Conservative government's Waterloo. Just like Napoleon's famous pose with his hand inserted mid-chest, the autocratic Conservatives have their hands inserted in each and every Canadian's pockets. It is not enough that personal income tax increased by 22 per cent in the last five years. Now we will be choked with an extra 7 per cent on everything we buy.

Bill C-62 is so flawed that I do not know where to start. It is full of injustices. Last week the hon. Leader of the Opposition indicated in this House, in his question to the Minister of Finance, that a kid selling lemonade on the corner would have to pay the proposed goods and services tax on what he buys, while a millionaire could get his caviare tax-free. Is that justice? Talk about justice and fairness. Talk about a double standard in Canada: one for the rich and one for the poor.

The government is not listening to its electors at all, because the majority of Canadians is opposed to this 7 per cent GST. The Angus Reid group conducted a poll on behalf of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business which showed quite clearly that more than two-thirds of Canadians oppose this tax. The Canadian people clearly see through the Tory veils. This is not tax reform. This is not revenue neutral. This is a Tory tax grab which will reap an extra $4 billion every year. Canadians are going to be taxed from the cradle to the grave.

Talking about a grave, lately there are some funeral directors who are going around trying to sell some packages before the year ends. These sales are directed at senior citizens in particular to enable them to avoid this new tax. This government has instituted a policy of pay now and die later. The Tory tax grab is nation-wide. It will hurt everyone regardless of who, how, what and where.

I would like to focus attention on how it will affect my constituents of Cochrane—Superior. I think the Tories want the northerners to become southerners. They are making life intolerable for the residents of the north to continue their present existence. Practically all incentives have been taken away.

Let me summarize what northern residents can expect in the 1990s as a result of the Tory regime. What a future. Listen to this: unemployment insurance cuts where there are many seasonal employers in single industry towns; with the imposition of the 15 per cent export surtax on softwood lumber, seven mills closed and 2,000 jobs lost; the task force recommendation to eliminate the northern and isolated areas tax benefits; the VIA Rail cuts with no proposed alternatives; the reduction in air service with the loss of the DC-9 service to Timmins; the high interest rates which are squeezing small businesses; and then they lower the boom with the goods and services tax.

This unfair tax will have dramatic effects on the transportation of fuel and gasoline. May I point out that our gasoline is imported from southern Ontario. May I further point out that residents of my riding pay an extra 20 cents a litre in comparison to those who live in the south.

What is going to be the cost after GST, and who says that there will be no hike in food costs? The price of edible products may not increase, but taxing the transportation of that product will indeed increase the cost. One may argue that this is not a food tax, but in the end the consumer still has to dig a little deeper in his or her pocket.

The facts that I have enumerated are absolutely incredible. This Tory regime is without a doubt out of touch with reality in trying to reduce its debt by this method.

I would like to illustrate one aspect of the plight of northern residents. A task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas was mandated by the finance minister on April 29, 1988, to examine the existing criteria for determining eligibility of residents in northern communities.

For northern ridings, including my riding of Cochrane—Superior, the task force recommended that only communities north of the fifty-first latitude be eligible for the tax benefit. As a result, if the report is implemented as recommended, 37 communities in my riding will no longer be made eligible. Consequently $2.5 million will be drained from our economy. What an injustice, if this recommendation ever materializes.

This government should not penalize northerners. We should instead be compensated for living in isolated areas in the north. We must endure a higher cost of living, the harsh climate, and additional transportation costs.

It is estimated that each year the government refunds $200 million for this northern tax benefit. If recommendations are implemented, the government will only have to refund $50 million. This government will be making money on the backs of northerners. As I have stated, to compound this loss of benefits with the proposed goods and services tax will be devastating for northern Ontario.

Please allow me, Madam Speaker, to quote from a letter written in 1983 by the right hon. Prime Minister when he was Leader of the Opposition. The letter is addressed to a school official in northern Quebec, and it states: "For almost 30 years the Progressive Conservative Party has always been in favour of these tax incentives because they encourage people to settle in the north and exploit the richness which profits the rest of our nation".

Why is the Prime Minister reneging on his word today? We are just as much a part of this nation building and growth as any urban region of Canada. Northern Ontario holds four-fifths of the province's natural resources. It contributes much of its wealth to other Canadians and foreign countries by supplying them with extremely valuable forestry and mining products.

Another essential service that will be adversely affected by the new goods and services tax is housing. Last Monday the Canadian Homebuilders Association released some statistics. Its calculations indicated that nationally the price of a typical new house will rise by $3,000 or by 2 per cent. This contrasts with finance's estimates of less than $500 per house. This also contrasts with the Liberals' view that housing is a basic need. Does the government realize how difficult it will be for young Canadians to make their dream of owing their own home come true?

For the last few years the country has been witness to a peaceful co-existence between labour and large industry. The Canadian Labour Congress has recently stated that it will request that salary increases and benefits be greater than the rate of inflation in order to compensate for the loss of revenue caused by the GST. This government should not attempt to reduce its debt at the expense of labour unrest and turmoil in this country. The workers of Canada will not be the scapegoats of government mismanagement of funds. Honest workers will remember for a long time if their take-home pay is reduced by the GST.

Small business persons will not forget the shrinking of their profits because consumers have less buying power. If this government wishes to let Canada slide into a recession, it is doing the right thing in using its majority to force a GST upon Canadians who adamantly opposed this oppressive tax.

Thank you, Madam Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to voice my feelings and those of my constituents of Cochrane—Superior.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I waited a while to rise in the House when the government finally had the courage to bring forward the goods and services tax proposal.

• (1950)

We found out earlier today how much courage the government has. Government members stand over there on a daily basis during Question Period and pretend that white is black, yellow is green, and purple is blue. They refuse to listen to the Canadian public. They refuse to listen to their own former Conservative supporters in their ridings who have been telling this government over and over again that they do not want this goods and services tax and that this GST is a regressive tax which they simply are not going to accept.

Today the government says that it wants to debate. We heard it when our friends over in the NDP were using crazy tactical and procedural manoeuvres because they did not want to debate the tax and the government kept saying that it wanted the tax debated.

We get to the floor of the House of Commons and as soon as we say "yes, we are ready for debate", the government comes in and says: "Hold it now, we want limited debate. We do not want real debate on this bill. We want to gag Parliament because we know what the public is saying. Perhaps it is going to be just a little too much for our poor back-benchers who are getting ripped apart every time they go home by their constituents knocking on their doors and telling them 'You had better start looking for another job because you have deceived us again'".

Perhaps a few more hours of debate in the House of Commons and the government would find that it is not just one or two members of its back-bench who finally found their backbone and stood up and said what their constituents are saying, that they oppose this goods and services tax. No, the government does not want to hear that. It is called minimizing your losses, decreasing your losses.

What the government wants to do is limit debate on a tax measure to which nearly 80 per cent of the Canadian public, even after the millions of dollars in deceitful propaganda that has been pushed out by this government, still say: "No, we see through the wool that you are trying to pull over our eyes when it comes to the goods and services tax".

We have to go back a little to understand fully the depth of outrage of the average Canadian over what this government has tried to do. Anybody who has any memory left—and that is about the only thing the government has not tried to tax—will remember that last year during the election campaign the chairman of the government's finance committee let something slip. He let it slip that they were to come in with a goods and services tax that was to be a windfall, up to $10 billion in extra revenue. Every Tory minister and senior Tory running in the country was very quick to dissociate themselves from the comments of the hon. member for Mississauga South at that time.

However, during the campaign we heard it again. Every time the New Democratic Party or the Liberal Party put forth a fiscal plan or a spending plan for this country, the government would say: "That's lies. They don't have the money". It said that everything we put up, every promise like day care, the enhanced regional development, everything that the government talked about, was a spending commitment.

I remember the Minister of Finance, poker-face, standing there, looking at the television camera and saying: "We do not make promises. What we have are spending commitments". Of course child care has since been cancelled, but the government stated that everything on which it was to spend the billions of dollars was well within our fiscal framework, that the debt was under control and Canadians need not worry. The Conservative government has the answer: "Elect us and we will set you free. It will be a bright new tomorrow".

The Liberals went across the country and said: "We do not believe you. We think we know what the real Tory agenda is". The real Tory agenda was to get back in office so that they could do a hatchet job on taxpayers' wallets and at the same point in time withdraw all those necessary pieces of national infrastructure and completely gut the universality of certain social programs. That is exactly what they did.

An hon. member: What is your alternative?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Our alternative will be an elected Liberal government in 1992. Your alternative is going to be the unemployment line.

These people opposite still think that they are going to be able to get the support of the Canadian electorate. I heard members opposite in their speeches tonight say that everything is going to be rosy, if only the Opposition would stop scaring Canadians. "Trust us", they said. I want to read some selected quotes from the minister opposite who wants us to trust him and his government.

It is a tax grab. According to the Minister of Finance in The Toronto Star of October 8, 1988: "The bottom line is that the sales tax will not be used to raise the revenues of the Government of Canada". That is absolutely false.

Again according to the minister on CTV News, Friday, June 19, 1987: "So again what we are trying to do is be, using your word, revenue neutral in the second stage as well." That is absolutely false. He should choke on those words today.

The Minister of Finance in the House of Commons, June 18, 1987: "Sales tax reform will eliminate the hidden tax in the prices consumers pay." That is absolutely false. This government has proposed removing the manufacturers' sales tax and putting a tax on that it is not even prepared to make visible.

Here is another gem from my hon. colleagues opposite which concerns the removal of the personal income surtax. The Minister of Finance in the House of Commons, June 18, 1987: "In addition to the credit when the new sales tax is introduced the personal and corporate income surtaxes will be removed." What they probably meant now that we know is: remove the 3 per cent, make it 5 per cent, lower the base, the threshold, and make it permanent. That is exactly what they did.

Here is another one. The Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on December 16, 1987 indicated: "and the income surtaxes will be removed." Has the man lost his memory, or has the man lost his mind?

The Minister of Finance, responding to a question from the House of Commons finance committee about his promise to remove the surtaxes, said on May 4, 1989: "At this point I would not want to hold that one out."

Finally, they got back in office after they had deceived the Canadian public, and the minister wanted to backtrack on all his earlier protestations that the Liberals and anybody who opposed the deceitful Tory tactics and try to convince the Canadian public that black was white. Now that they are in government, now that they have another term, they turn to the true Tory agenda and that agenda is full of deceit.

Everybody else who has spoken in the House tonight and has been truthful and honest, has been speaking on behalf of 80 per cent of Canadians who have had it right up to here with this government, who have had it right up to here with the nonsense coming from the government benches opposite when it comes to fiscal responsibility.

The minister opposite claims he still has the credibility to be able to convince the Canadian public to buy this pig in a poke. First of all he said that it would be single tiered. Can you imagine? Does he think nobody in Canada can count? I would think that single tiered would mean that the prerequisite would be that there would be one level of government collecting the consumption tax. We find out that that is not the case. We find out that what was really meant was one divided by one, divided in half, which would mean two levels of government because it is not a single tiered tax.

They said that it would be fair and equitable. Yesterday, my hon. colleague from Hamilton asked the Minister of Finance a question on this fairness and equitable issue. She wanted to know if he thought it was fair not to tax caviare but to tax hearing aid batteries for our senior citizens. Boy, that certainly set them into a tizzy on the other side of the House.

He said that it would be revenue neutral. We have heard over and over again from anyone who can use a calculator or can add that this tax is going to be a windfall for the Canadian government. It is going to be an absolute rape of the wallets of consumers right across this country.

The government has often said that the tax must be a simplified tax. It is so simple that last week in the House, when the former Leader of the Opposition read from one of the manuals, one would have an easier time understanding Greek mythology than the simplified tax system.

This government's attempt to push through a goods and services tax even at 7 per cent is so flawed that the Canadian public is not going to accept it. I ask hon. members opposite to look across at us on this side of the House who have done our jobs and have allowed Canadians to have their say and petition this place with over 600,000 names.

Goodness sakes, hon. members on the government side of the House, go back and talk to your constituents. Perhaps you will find out that your true job is to represent your constituents, not the Tory bosses at the top of your caucus. Go back to your ridings and listen to what the people are saying. Withdraw this tax and maybe a few of you will end up after the next election getting your deposits back.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part as well in this debate tonight. I have just heard my colleague who was all worked up, who was almost shouting, express her opposition. I would remind her of what one of her colleagues, the hon. member for York Centre said last September about the role of the Opposition in the House of Commons: "The orientation of the Opposition, the tools at its disposal, the expectations of its various support groups, the hallowed rhetoric of tradition is that the Opposition opposes. It was always very rare, exceptional, and even remarkable to obtain help from the Opposition when we were in power and it is true that the system has to run well and succeed without it."

Madam Speaker, from that we can see that the Opposition does not consider whether what we present is sensible or not, whether it is in the interest of Canadians; it just opposes and tries to raise any fear to attract the public's attention and frighten them into objecting.

Remember the free trade debate during the last election campaign and what people tried to have seniors believe. They were told that if free trade passed, their old age pensions were in danger! That is a fine example of demagoguery used in the last election campaign to get votes and make people oppose free trade.

Mr. Milliken: No, no, that's not true!

Mr. Blackburn: Again I see the opposition member telling me, "No, no, it's not true."

But I know, I was in the election campaign and I know what seniors were asking and saying to us, the fears they had because of this demagogy from you, ladies and gentlemen of the Opposition.

An hon. member: That's false.

Mr. Blackburn: Let us get back to tonight's debate, Madam Speaker. Why are we imposing a goods and services tax? What is behind all that? Sixty years ago, we were among the first industrialized countries to impose a tax on manufacturing. Today, Madam Speaker, this tax brings us $18 billion a year in revenue.

So why do we want to change the system? Why would we do that?

Here are some reasons, Madam Speaker. Today, unlike 60 years ago, nearly 52 countries in the world have the same tax that we want to implement ourselves. While we were the first 60 years ago, today we are among the last industrialized countries to do so.

And I will name some of those countries for you, since my colleague opposite does not quite seem to believe it: South Africa, West Germany, Chile, Korea, Costa Rica, Japan, Italy, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, Taiwan, Sweden—they are all countries, and I could list 52 different countries, that have such a goods and services tax.

So why are we doing it, Madam Speaker? First, when we get a product now from, say, the United States, when we import some product and it arrives on our shelves here, compared to one of our own products— We will for example. Take a bicycle, Madam Speaker. I do not know if my colleague has young children, but we still have some young children at home and they buy bicycles, or at least I have to help them because I try to get them to contribute to what they buy. So a bike made here in Canada costs about $50 to produce. Once you add all the promotion and advertising costs and the various services along the way, the same bicycle costs $75 at the wholesale level. Then we impose our famous 13.5 per cent tax. If the same bike comes from the United States, it costs $50 at the border and we also tax it. This means that compared to the bicycle from the United States, ours costs more, more than what we import from other countries. This makes Canadian products less competitive on the market. As consumers, people are all alike. If you want an item that sells for $75 or $80 and the one next to it sells for $70, which one are you going to buy? All other things being equal, the cheapest one, of course. And that is what is happening with our manufacturers' sales tax. We want to bring the tax down to the retail level, so that when goods arrive on the shelves, they are priced on the same basis, since the tax levied at the manufacturing stage will cease to exist.

That being said, Madam Speaker, why will this tax be applied to both goods and services? Obviously, the net result will be to provide additional revenues for the government. Canadians are being asked to help manage the debt, and you know what the debt situation is today! Our cumulative debt is now $350 billion. The daily interest charges alone cost us $100 million. With three days, worth of interest payments you can build a highway from the Saguenay to Quebec City. That is an indication of our present situation and why it is necessary to make these changes.

However, letting people help manage the debt is not the only reason. There is also the regulatory aspect. Did you know, Madam Speaker, that the present tax involves 22,000 different regulations? Imagine what is involved with 22,000 different regulations and interpretations to administer the existing tax! Some housecleaning is in order, and that is what we are doing with the proposed goods and services tax.

I repeat, there are two aspects to consider: first, we are adjusting to the competition, so that our goods will be on the same footing as imported goods. Second, we are helping to manage the debt. And third, it should make our economy more competitive and also help our businesses.

What happens when our products are more competitive on the market? Automatically, sales go up. If you increase sales, what does it do for production? When a manufacturer increases sales, he automatically increases production, which creates jobs. Your economy becomes more competitive and you are able to increase economic activity.

Now, what is being done to protect the neediest in this country? There will be a tax credit of $190 per adult and $100 per child, the net result being that people will pay less than they are paying now. They will get this tax credit before the GST is implemented, so they will receive the cheque next December, although the tax will not be introduced until January.

Madam Speaker, how will all this affect our daily lives? Suppose we take a look at specific items, like cars, for instance. It is estimated that people who buy a car worth $15,000 will pay about 5 per cent less under the new GST, because they will be paying 7 per cent instead of 13.5 per cent. There are people who wonder how you can tell whether dealers have subtracted the 13.5 per cent instead of just adding the 7 per cent to 13.5. These people don't know much about business! I was trained in the business world. For ten years I was CEO of the Racine Business Centre Corporation in downtown Chicoutimi and, believe me, merchants always try to get the best possible price so they can sell more than the guy next door. And that's the truth. It is a rule of business that will not change because competition is the very basis of our economic system.

If you have a chance to sell more, cheaply than your competitor, of course you are going make more money. Anyone can understand that. Unfortunately, you people don't seem to realize how a market economy works, what economies of scale mean, and how business people operate.

That being said, Madam Speaker, I know the goods and services tax is not popular. We don't particularly enjoy asking for, or considering, a new goods and services tax, especially when we see the negative attitude of the opposition to the proposed tax. However, thanks to our economic renewal strategy, introduced in 1984, our tax reform, and the economic activity this has attracted to the country, we have now reached the stage where we must ensure that our goods become more competitive.

• (2010)

Madam Speaker, as a government we are also doing our share. We have cut spending by $700 million, keeping in step with Canadians who are helping to control our national debt to ensure that our country's economy improves.

I see, Madam Speaker, that I will have to pick up speed since I only have a few moments left.

No, the tax is not popular. However, we have to do it. We have a responsibility to introduce this tax. It is in the best interests of Canadians to ensure that our economy becomes more competitive and that our domestic goods are not more expensive then the ones we import, which is the case now because of our 13.5 per cent tax. I repeat: we are going from a 13.5 per cent tax to a 7 per cent tax.

[English]

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, thank you for the privilege of being able to put my comments on the public record tonight for the benefit of our colleagues in the House, for my constituents and for other Canadians who might be watching this evening.

I want to say that Canadians do make choices when they elect political parties and those choices have consequences in the governance of the nation. Because we are a democracy like so many other countries of the world are trying to become, Canadians will always have the right, as they will in 1992 to 1993, to assess the consequences of our decisions as a government.

I want it firmly on the record that I am proud of this goods and services tax and I am proud of the economic record that we have put in place as a government. I have no hesitation and will be proud to go to the doors in the next campaign to argue for re-election.

There are many other issues that I would like to talk about as to why I am proud of the PC record over this last five years. There is competition policy, transportation policy, international trade rules, privatization and the rights to intellectual property. Our professors and our authors and our artists did not have protection before, Madam Speaker, as they do today. That has been a major advance in our country.

The opposition parties have opposed all of these major policy thrusts. I understand that. Sometimes they oppose for ideological reasons, for others they oppose simply because they are in opposition. We used to do that too. We used to have lots of fun, playing with the rules and trying to stall things, delay the House and delay the government. I understand that. Parties do have different views.

Tonight I want to talk about the GST and how it fits into the broader context. We really have to understand our history to know whether we are on the right track or whether the nation needs the action that we are taking right now.

You remember 1968, Madam Speaker, when Canadians made a major choice. They chose Prime Minister Trudeau and his Liberal government and they shifted dramatically the way this country was governed. We moved to larger governments. There was a major move to nationalization of our industries, a major move to subsidizing industries that were no longer competitive, even within the country, let alone within North American and around the world. The Liberals subsidized those and we got into huge debts, thereby resorting to turning on the printing press.

By 1972 we recognized there was a problem and Mr. Stanfield said that we needed to have price and wage controls for a period of four months to get the economy under control. The Liberal Party said no, and Canadians chose the Liberals. By 1974 we were in very deep trouble.

Again, in 1979, Canadians knew there was something wrong with the economy. They chose the right hon. member for Yellowhead. In the first budget under Mr. Crosbie, Canadians again were faced with a choice. At that time the yearly debt was $12 billion and the national debt was $72 billion. We had a solution for that. It involved an 18 cent tax, but the Liberals said, no, and there was an election which they won.

We all know that it was 30 cents within a few months but nonetheless Canadians made those choices. As a result, four years after that, in 1984, the yearly debt that was $12 billion had increased to $38 billion, that is a yearly debt.

The national debt had gone from $72 billion to over $200 billion, so Canadians knew they were really into the soup and they changed from the model of the Liberal party of then, which was more government, more nationalizations, higher debts, and more use of the printing press.

We came to power under the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance and over the last five years we have had a major change in economic policy. It involved a mix of cuts in government that is now back to the size it was in 1973; privatization of over 18 Crown corporations, 17 of which are doing a whole lot better and are now employing people, paying more income taxes, rather than getting taxpayers, money.

I remember sitting in this House every year having to allocate $300 million or $400 million for deHavilland, Canadair and the other 17 Crown corporations.

We did change but there was one thing we decided we would not do and that was to turn to the printing press. When you are solving problems you increase taxes, you cut programs or you turn on the printing press. When a government turns to the printing press, as the Liberals did, it always leads to inflation which, in turn, leads to the high interest rates and collapse. It is the printing press that people have to be worried about.

Again, we made choices and we made predictions. The government prediction was that there would be jobs, jobs, jobs. I can remember the NDP members standing up and saying that our economic policy would cost 100,000 jobs in the first year. The Liberals said the economic policy would cost 150,000 jobs in the first year. They were simply wrong. Had Canadians chosen the Liberals to continue the past policy, there would have been 150,000 jobs lost. They chose us instead, and over 1.5 million jobs have been created. For the first four years 1,000 Canadians every day went off to work for the first time. It is absolutely amazing. The opposition was wrong and we were right.

Let us now go to the goods and services tax. Again, we must consider it in the context of its history. Today we have a manufacturers' sales tax through which some 75,000 firms, with 22,000 special arrangements, nonetheless pay $18 billion. Canadians are paying that tax. It is hidden. They do not know it. It totally distorts our local manufacturing industry so that our exports cost more. It is cheaper for people to buy imports than to buy our own manufacturing. Everyone has agreed, including the two opposition parties, that that tax has to go.

Prior to 1984, there was no manufacturers' sales tax credit for low-income Canadians. We brought that in. I am very proud of that. Under the GST it is enriched even further. Canadians need to understand that the real reason our friends on the opposite side of this House are opposed to the GST is that 8.9 million Canadians, if they make under $30,000, will get, four times a year, their entire tax back in spades. They never got that when the Liberals and NDP were running this country. They will be better off.

We are the only country in the world that has the manufacturers' sales tax. Forty-eight major western competitors have moved from the manufacturers' sales tax that you cannot deduct under the GATT agreement to a goods and services or value-added tax that can be deducted from exports. For very good reasons, 48 of our competitors have moved to that tax. We have not. As in so many other things, we should have done this 5 or 10 years ago, but those parties were not prepared to face up to it and take a leadership position. We have. Just as Mr. Stanfield provided leadership in 1972, the member for Yellowhead in 1979 and the Prime Minister in 1984, I am proud to be associated with a party that will stand up and tell Canadians what the situation really is. They will judge us in 1992. I am confident that we can carry their judgment at that time.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, after listening to the hon. gentleman across the way, I would like to observe that Lethbridge is famous for its wind, but I do not think it has any place in this Chamber. Take it back where it was.

In the past few weeks I have travelled this country. I have gone to GST rallies, I have talked to people on the street, I have met with them in the coffee shops. I am concerned about what I hear and what I see because never before have I witnessed the level of frustration that Canadians are showing with respect to the GST. Never before have I witnessed that level of resentment, level of anger and level of hostility.

It is not just because they hate this tax, it is not just because they see it as a tax gouge, and it is not just because they see it as a regressive tax, it is the way they are being treated by this government in the process, by the way we are debating the GST. What have we and Canadians been getting from this government in this debate that has been going on for the last few weeks? Insult, upon insult, upon insult.

The Tories will not listen, they will not explain, and they will not come to meetings except in the case last night of Brandon, Manitoba, when Lee Clark came. He showed some courage and Canadians told him exactly—

Mrs. Dobbie: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that it is against the rules and the conventions of this House to mention the member by name.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Duplessis): I would ask the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James to observe the Standing Orders of the House. The hon. member may proceed.

[English]

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, I hope that is not taken out of my time.

I find it passing strange that the member for Winnipeg South would notice some little subtle regulation inside the Chamber but she will not listen to the Canadian people. She will not listen to her own constituents. She will not listen to her voters. She is more concerned about some little rule in this Chamber which I, by the way, respect, than she is for her own constituents. I say shame on her. She does not have her priorities right.

All we are getting are insults from this government. Its members will not come to meetings. The government will not compromise, it will not listen, and it will not reconsider. The worst insult of all is that we are told it will invoke closure to cut off debate because it has heard it all.

Well I can tell you, the truth of the matter is that those people across there do not like the truth because they do hear the people out there and they do not like what they hear. They know that what they have done here is wrong but they do not have the guts or the humility to stand up and say that they were wrong and will change their course.

The government has insulted all Canadians with this implementation of closure. It is contempt for Parliament and contempt for the Canadian people. In an issue as critical as this, this is the way those members treat Parliament. What a way to treat ordinary Canadians and what a way to treat taxpayers who, after all, pay your wages and pay your salaries. This is what they get in return. Canadians are frustrated and angry and they are not going to take it any more.

You know, I fear for my country and it is not just because the way things have unfolded with respect to the GST.

Wherever we look around this country the Tories are mismanaging. They are managing to somehow just tear the country apart, not only tear it apart but dismantle some of the old institutions and some of the old programs that have served this country so well. They have decimated VIA Rail, they have taken away a part of old age pensions from pensioners who worked hard for years. They have done it through this thing they call the "clawback", which is just a way of destroying universality.

They have privatized unemployment insurance. They have sabotaged the supply-management system in the agricultural community. They are closing down rural Canada. They have wrecked the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada. Where is their mandate? Where is their mandate to do all these things that they have done? They do not have the mandate.

If they had any intestinal fortitude they would go to the people. They would call an election and find out what people would say. I know exactly what Canadians would say. They would say: "Down with you. Out with you. Off with you rogues and scoundrels!"

The behaviour of this government and its members since they were re-elected in the fall of 1988 has been nothing short of contemptible. They have had contempt for the institutions of this country, contempt for Parliament and contempt for Canadians.

Let me talk about one aspect of the GST. We all know that it is a tax grab and that it is going to be an extraordinary cash cow. In addition, there is an enormous tax concession to manufacturers in this country.

Today manufacturers are paying roughly $18.5 billion in the manufacturers' sales tax. That is a lot of money. When the GST comes in they will not have to pay the MST any more. What will they do with that windfall of $18.5 billion? Are they going to lower their prices accordingly? Are they going to pass the savings along to the consumers?

If there are people in this Chamber who believe that, I have swamp land in Florida for them. I have a deal that will knock their socks off.

Of course, they are not going to pass along those savings. Let me raise, in evidence, just a couple of points. About nine or ten years ago Jean Chrétien, when he was the Minister of Finance, lowered the manufacturers' sales tax three points. Did we see a lowering of prices? Not on your life. Somebody took the money and put it in their pockets.

Ever since free trade came in a little over a year ago some tariffs have come down. I defy anybody, particularly those people across the way, to identify lower consumer prices as a result of the trade agreement and as a result of lower tariffs. It has not happened because people have just taken the difference and put it in their pockets. It is just human nature.

We will wind up paying the goods and services tax on top of a price as if the manufacturers' sales tax is still there. In effect, in some provinces except the province of Alberta, it will be like paying three sales taxes. We will pay the old MST; we will pay the new GST; and, of course, we will pay the provincial sales tax.

Let me just finish by saying this. We can count on this side. All it takes is about 20 of those members opposite to show that they have some humility and can admit that they were wrong. Vote against the GST. Listen to Canadians because that is what Canadians are saying. They do not want this tax. They want just 20 Conservatives to show that they have the gumption, to show that they have the fortitude and to show that they have the honesty to change their minds and defeat this tax.

• (2030)

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, in the brief time available to me tonight I want to touch on three issues in this goods and services tax which impact directly, sharply, harshly and unfairly on the people of my riding of Willowdale.

The first of these issues relates to purchasers of new homes. I read to you the promise of the Minister of Finance to the President of the Canadian Homebuilders Association, in writing, by letter dated November, 1989. He said: "We will attempt to ensure that there is no negative impact on affordable housing from sales tax reform".

In the 1989 budget speech the minister made a further promise to Canadians. He said: "The new system will not pose a barrier to the affordability of housing". Let us examine the facts.

Mr. Kempling: What about the lot levy that your brother put in. Tell us about that.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, the jackals are yapping and, with your permission, I would like to continue. I will come to the member's point later.

According to the Minister of Finance the cost of the average house across Canada will go up only $500 because of this goods and services tax. However, the Canadian Homebuilders Association has shown in its calculations that the price of the average home in Canada is going to go up by $3,000.

Land is being taxed and so what is going to happen in Toronto where land prices are higher? The minister told us that the price of a house in Toronto would go up by $4,450 under his tax.

Mr. Kempling: Ten thousand dollar lot levy.

Mr. Peterson: The facts, according to the Canadian Homebuilders Association, are that the price of a home in Toronto is going to go up by over $9,000. That does not take into consideration the 7 per cent tax being imposed on the lawyers' fees, the registry fees, the survey fees and the mortgage fees, all of which are costs to the home owner when buying a home.

That is looking at the price of an average home in Toronto. Some homes are selling today in North York for over $500,000 and $600,000. On such homes that increase is going to be far more than $10,000. This is not fair because home owners are not getting the same break right across Canada. This is why this tax, on fairness alone, must be defeated.

Now I want to look at small businesses. In Willowdale there are approximately 1,600 small businesses. With this tax there is going to be an increased administrative burden. Even the member for Burlington, who knows business, knows this.

The retailer is going to have to make some very difficult decisions when someone comes in and buys a particular item. Is it taxable provincially, is it taxable federally, is it not taxable federally, or is it not taxable under both of them? You are going to have to set up a computer system or else do it manually, and in either case you can make mistakes, mistakes for which you will have to pay penalties.

If you think it is going to be easy, listen to this: yogurt is taxed but a carton of yogurt is not taxed; doughnuts are taxed, bagels are not taxed; muffins are taxed, crackers and raisin bread are not taxed. Maybe that is a simple calculation for people as brilliant as those sitting over there to make, but the 1,600 small shopkeepers in Willowdale realize they are going to have an administrative burden.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business has estimated that the administrative costs that are going to be borne by small businesses in Canada as a result of this new tax are going to be $1.9 billion. What is worse, small businesses are going to have trouble coping with the paperwork and the calculations every month. They are going to have to hire accountants and lawyers to help them cope with this burden and they pay the 7 per cent tax on the fees of these professionals. The big corporations have in-house counsel and in-house accountants and they do not have to pay the goods and services tax on those salaries. It is unfair again to the small business person.

There is another aspect of this tax which is very unfair to our small businesses that are close to the United States border. The United States does not have a goods and services tax. In the first 11 months of 1989 there were 39.6 million day trips taken by Canadians to the United States and back. They made purchases.

We know the problem in enforcing this GST at the border on people returning from the United States. How do you impose the GST on a tank of gas in a person's car? The border states south of Canada are building new shopping centres in anticipation of this tax driving up even further the disadvantages that we have in competing with some American merchandisers. If our small businesses think they are going to get off scot-free and benefit from this tax, they are wrong.

In the short time remaining to me I would like to talk about low and middle-income Canadians. The minister has stood in his place day after day and given us figures on how the GST is going to benefit low-income Canadians. We know that this is just not the case. We have the figures. Look at the record of this government. As a result of the taxes imposed since 1984 when the Liberals were last in office, projecting ahead and showing the GST coming into effect in 1991, the taxes of a working poor family with an income of $20,000 will have increased by 370 per cent.

The taxes of a middle-income family with an income of $49,000, under this Tory government, will have gone up fully 17 per cent.

The taxes of an upper income family, earning $123,000 a year, under this Tory regime from 1984 to 1991, will have gone down 6.4 per cent. This is their concept of fairness; raising taxes on the backs of the poor and middle-income Canadians and lowering them for the high-income Canadians.

On top of that, let us look at what the government is doing to our senior citizens in terms of the clawback of old age security. How unfair this tax is. Even the way they are administering it is unfair. If you are a one-income family of seniors earning more than $50,000 you get the clawback. If you are a two-income family you can make up to $100,000 and not have any clawback whatsoever. It discriminates incredibly against single seniors. This clawback takes away from seniors who have been frugal during their lives and saved their money. If they saved a bit of their money and put it away in anticipation of contributing to their secure and dignified retirement, this government claws it back. It is saying, "Forget about saving in the future, just spend it. We will give you your old age security and we will not claw it back because you will not have any money over $50,000. Don't save, don't be frugal."

The people of Willowdale are not amused by this tax. They are not deceived by the promises that are made because they know they have been broken. They are fed up with this goods and services tax. They will indicate their displeasure at the ballot box.

• (2040)

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am very perplexed and I am concerned by the debate on the goods and services tax that we have been hearing here in this House.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed. I am disappointed in the hon. members on the other side of the House. Every time one of those hon. members rises I have an expectation built up within me. I look forward to receiving some intelligent criticism, some criticism that will help us address the flaws in the tax if, indeed, there are any flaws.

I am afraid that I have to assume that there are no flaws because all I get from the members opposite who stand up is empty rhetoric, groundless attacks on the government and general disapproval of the GST, but absolutely no substantiated reasons for this disapproval. I guess there is a good reason for that because, in fact, there is no substantive reason to reject the goods and services tax, and the hon. members know that.

The fact is that the goods and services tax favours the poor and the lower income earner and protects the lower middle income earner through the rebate system, as my hon. friends know.

Those at the bottom of the income scale will actually gain from the goods and services tax because the basic necessities of life; food, shelter, health care goods and education will not be taxed. The poor, who spend proportionately more of their incomes on the necessities, particularly groceries and rent, will pay very little GST because of that. Because of this I find that the GST is an extremely progressive tax.

Surely the goods and services tax is a realistic measure that offers a realistic alternative to the current unfair, unrealistic and punitive manufacturers' sales tax which undermines the ability of Canadians to compete in the international marketplace.

I am not the only one who believes that this is so. In fact, The Financial Post calls the GST, the goods and services tax, a "generally sensible tax". Informed Canadians, Canadians who understand the tax system and those who have examined the goods and services tax, agree with that assessment. This is a generally sensible tax.

There is no doubt that a change in the system requires adjustment. All change does, that is the nature of change. But if Canada is to position itself to enter this decade and proceed into the next century as a major player on the world stage, that change is absolutely vital.

Fifty-two countries, as a matter of fact three in the past year, have instituted a tax system similar to the GST. In fact, in 1989-90 countries like Iceland, Japan and Norway, which have adopted the value added tax system, have joined other countries like France, Korea, Sweden, the United Kingdom, West Germany, and a whole host of others in this kind of tax system.

Why, given those facts, would Canada want to remain outside a major trend affecting our international trading position? Why would we not want to be in the forefront of successful trading nations, and why would Canada not want to adopt a financial policy that would free up personal choice and allow its citizens to choose their time and place of tax contribution, because that is what the GST does.

We have heard a great deal about the goods and services tax in business over the past while. I have to say that as a business person I understand the fears and concerns that we frequently hear expressed. Business hates change, it only likes change that it can personally manage and direct and I think that that is absolutely appropriate and correct. Business, naturally, is always very suspicious of government.

This is one time when business will be the winner, when those fears will have absolutely no foundation. Small business especially will be the winner in this tax.

Last week we saw the Leader of the Opposition, who left the House today, stand up, and perhaps in a swan song, make a very eloquent intervention about a 7-year-old lemonade stand operator who, he said, with great oratorical effect, the GST would absolutely ruin. He said the GST would weigh heavily upon his budding entrepreneurial spirit.

Well, he got himself a headline, but I have to say that he was absolutely dead wrong in his facts. Unless that 7-year-old was a business genius who made over $30,000 a year, he would not even be included in the GST system; nor will music teachers, skating coaches, seamstresses, handymen, baby-sitters, student printers, or anybody else running a business with sales under $30,000 a year. They simply will not be included in this system.

Most small businesses will actually benefit in terms of cash flow, and that is important. For example, let us take printers, an industry I know well. Currently they collect and remit federal sales tax at 13.5 per cent, plus whatever applicable provincial sales tax is in place in their province. I should say that they remit and collect because what actually happens is they remit the tax and then they have to wait to collect it with their bills whenever the money comes in. All the while they are carrying the additional burden of the federal sales tax they have paid in the inputs used to print the job in the first place.

Once the GST is in place they can choose to report monthly, quarterly or annually, depending on their sales volume, and all they have to do is remit the difference between what they paid out in tax on their purchases and what they invoiced in that reporting period. That can free up thousands of dollars in cash to support vital day to day operations. That is important to small business.

By the way, the tax they paid on absolutely everything they use in running their business is considered as an input and will be rebated. That includes telephone, stationery and even their cleaning supplies.

The bookkeeping will be minimal. It will be only one sheet, which is what manufacturers use now.

For years I have attended meetings with business leaders where they absolutely begged to be relieved of the unfair manufacturers' sales tax. I am very proud to be a part of a government which has the vision and the good sense to respond to those requests.

The GST is a generally sensible tax. I support it all the way. It is the right move for Canadians and it is the right step for Canada in the 1990s.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg South was making a lovely speech. She has made a speech that I am sure would have charmed the ears of the cabinet, had any of them been here to hear it.

This is a government bill for which cabinet is responsible to this House. They should be here listening to this speech. At least one minister should be in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. The hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my words of support for the goods and services tax program. I hope that my hon. colleagues across the way will listen. I do not think they really want to hear the story about the goods and services tax.

Mr. Peterson: Yes, we were afraid that the minister didn't want to hear it.

Mr. Bird: I think the hon. member across the way is bereft and bankrupt of ideas with regard to the goods and services tax. It is interesting to hear that stale old phrase that came from their leader and has been coming from their financial critic for several months, that the only solution to the goods and services tax that they have is to go back to the drawing boards. I would like to know what that really means. It is just amazing to me—

Mr. Peterson: It means it's the worst tax we've ever seen and Canadians know it.

Mr. Bird: I would like to hear the member offer an alternative. If it is such a bad tax, then the hon. member should be able to provide an alternative. He was certainly put in his place the other day when it was demonstrated so clearly that he had changed his view about taxation being a quick fix. His view of economics has changed dramatically in the past several years. Hansard is quite a record of the truth.

• (2050)

Nobody likes taxes, that is clear. I share the view of the Minister of Finance and most of the members of this House that it would be great if we could avoid tax measures. It certainly would be more comfortable. Yet we cannot take our responsibilities seriously unless we deal with the need to raise revenues to pay our way. We cannot ignore the realities of Canada's financial position. The Liberals created it over the years. The hon. member across the way had a great deal to do with that and I do not blame him for being ashamed of that and being unwilling to address it. But now, without alternatives, there is no responsible measure that a government can take except to address it.

I must say, to the credit of the New Democratic Party, although their socialist ideas will not work, that at least they had a few ideas and that should be embarrassing enough to the so-called Official Opposition.

I am convinced beyond any doubt that the goods and services tax measure is a responsible, necessary, fair and reasonable program to meet the needs of the Canadian taxpayers and the needs of the Canadian economy in the years ahead. While I understand public concern and opposition to the goods and services tax, it is complex, it is new, it is transitional—

Mr. Milliken: The public does understand.

Mr. Bird: Why don't you just listen?

Mr. Milliken: We are.

Mr. Bird: You are all noise and no substance and in months of debate you have not come up with one single idea. Mind you, there is no chance of you ever having to deal with this subject because you are not going to be in a position of responsibility for years to come. I think most Canadians, when they dwell on that, will say, thank goodness.

The GST program is complex and it is new and it is going to be a difficult transition for many companies and for many people. There has been a great deal of misrepresentation. I would venture to say that the Official Opposition is really not exercising integrity when it addresses some of the details of this program to Canadians, but I am convinced that it is a program that will be very worthwhile for Canadians.

I speak as one who has come from a business background. I have dealt with the federal sales tax extensively. Fortunately, the company that I owned and operated had a federal sales tax wholesale licence. We were one of those 17,000 variations in the existing federal sales tax plan and were favoured because we did not have to invest in the tax when we purchased our inventory. The licence exempted us from the tax.

Most of the wholesalers, and certainly all of the retailers, in Canada who buy taxable goods have to carry that tax in their inventories. As the Minister of Finance said the other day, on January 1, 1991, there will be a $2 billion cash flow relief to Canadian business spread broadly. That is a very significant item that the Liberals and the NDP have omitted entirely from their presentations. Just imagine a $2 billion relief in the financing of the federal sales tax by Canadian business.

I think the Canadian Federation of Independent Business could well make that point to their members because there is going to be considerable relief, more than enough to pay their fees in the Canadian Independent Business Organization and others.

This is a program that 48 countries of the world have adopted. A value—added tax was recommended by the OECD and the International Monetary Fund as the right direction for the tax strategy, the tax program in this country. The two members opposite are constantly out of order because they cannot get their minds in order as to what really is going on here.

Here we have a government that finally is addressing, with courage, with intelligence and with conviction, the needs of the Canadian economy and these two sit over here and cat call and mimic and make jokes. But what are their alternatives, I ask the hon. member for Willowdale and the hon. member for Kingston. Back to the drawing boards. I think they are all frustrated architects to tell you the truth. Back to the drawing boards. What does that mean? What a stale old way. I say, thank goodness for the Minister of Finance and the government of this country for the courage that it has to move forward with a program such as this, a program that is fair.

I would like to speak for a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, and I hope you are not going to deduct from my time, the catcalls over there. Otherwise, I would have to sit down while you brought them to order. That would not be difficult for you.

In any event this tax is not an extraordinary or an arbitrary measure that is imposed upon Canadians, as the hon. members would have us believe. This is a program to replace an existing tax that will eliminate $18.5 billion in the existing federal sales tax program. As I said, it will relieve inventories of Canadian companies of $2 billion in investment. It will provide new tax credits for low–income Canadians. Every Canadian family making less than $30,000 will be better off as a result of this tax program than they are now. That will affect almost nine million Canadian families.

In eliminating the manufacturers' sales tax a lot of smoke and mirrors have been raised by the opposition trying to persuade Canadians that they will not see the elimination of the federal sales tax. I want to tell you that Canadian consumers are diligent, competitive shoppers. They know how to make the private enterprise system work in this country, and they will see that tax relief because they will make sure to ask their merchants, their car dealers, their furniture dealers, and their hardware store dealers what the price was in December and what the price is now. They will see that difference, because the consumers of this country are not out to lunch like some of the poor unfortunates on the opposition benches who have such dreary lives. No wonder they can think of nothing more than, "back to the drawing board".

The inventory rebates to Canadian business that I mentioned are very significant. I would say sufficiently so that most small businesses who contemplate the relief that they will receive will quickly change their opposition to this program to support. As my colleague, the hon. member from Winnipeg, said just recently—she has some familiarity with the printing business—the printing business is one place one will see the application of the existing federal sales tax very clearly now. If one goes to purchase wedding invitations from a local printer, for example, one will see an 11.5 per cent tax added on, or 13.5. It used to be 11 per cent for most of my years in business. That 13.5 per cent will be eliminated.

The goods and services tax credit will have real meaning for almost nine million Canadians. Let us look at the practical impact. The Leader of the New Democratic Party said the other day that because low-income Canadians will be spending so much of their disposable income on taxable items, it will be an undue hardship. That was a misrepresentation, because the facts are that low-income Canadians spend most of their incomes on groceries, on rent, on the kinds of necessities of life that will be exempt.

Low-income Canadians will benefit greatly from this program. All families making less than $30,000 a year will receive tax credits quarterly, commencing late in December of this year or January 1 at the latest. These tax credits will be in the form of cheques, month after month after month. For example, a family of four, making less than $20,000 net income, will receive tax credits of $580 per year or $145 per quarter.

The goods and services tax program is one important pillar in rebuilding Canada's financial structure. It goes with the restraints which have been placed on government spending of 3.5 per cent rate of growth per year in the last five years, less than the national inflation average. It goes with income tax reforms, where 85 per cent of Canadians have seen their individual income tax bills go down. It will go with the job creation programs of this government. It will go with the free trade agreement which has set us off in basic new directions for economic growth in the future. It will go with the reductions in the size of government. The Public Service in this country is now at 1973 levels. What other institution in Canada could make the claim that it is down to levels of 16 years ago in terms of person years and employee overhead. Canada is on a mission toward financial integrity, indeed toward financial sovereignty. I would like to take a moment and make reference to what the alternatives would be if we were not taking these kinds of measures. I have a little book that I suggest the opposition read. It is called The Hyperinflation Survival Guide for Business. It talks about what happened when hyperinflation struck South American countries such as Bolivia, Argentina and Brazil.

This did not happen many, many years ago. It happened in the 1980s. In 1985 Bolivia reached inflation levels of 50,000 per cent annualized, if you can believe it. Its tax revenues covered just 15 per cent of government expenditures. Argentina's debt reached 11 per cent of its Gross Domestic Product, resulting in an annual inflation rate of 1,000 per cent. Imagine, that was in 1985, only five years ago. In 1988, less than three years ago, after three consecutive years of increasing its money supply by over 300 per cent, while amassing a debt equal to one-third of its Gross Domestic Product, Brazil had nearly 1,000 per cent inflation.

I would like to read the conclusion drawn from those studies in this book. The conclusion is this. First, it will not take triple-digit inflation to wreak havoc on the Canadian economy. A sudden acceleration into the teens or the twenties would be sufficient to alter our personal or corporate lifestyles in very dramatic ways. An inflationary scope of this nature is possible given the circumstances that we are in.

I would like to conclude with this final remark. If there is one overriding lesson from the South American experience, it is that governments cannot indefinitely continue to spend beyond their means without suffering terrible economic consequences. I believe that the goods and services tax is part of a program towards the financial integrity of this country and deserves support. It deserves the support of every member. It is an example of the financial integrity of this government and this country. It is an example of a nation prepared to start living within its means.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to make a brief speech against this iniquitous, destructive goods and services tax.

I am not going to cover the great range of solid criticism that has been made and will be made during the rest of this evening by my colleagues. I want to concentrate on one point that I believe needs more attention. That is that the goods and services tax is, among other things, a plan to shift power from one group in society to another. It is a plan to shift economic power from working people to owners. In other words, it is class legislation. It benefits the class of capitalists, those who live by what they own and it takes away from the class of workers, those who live by the work they do.

Some people are shocked at the talk of "class". What is shocking is not the word. When we use the word in economics some people get all upset. If we use the word in school, of course it is perfectly normal. What is wrong is not the word, but the actuality that it refers to. What is wrong is the act of taking power away from the great majority, the working people of this country, and giving it to those who already have more than they need or know how to use well.

This is not just the opinion voiced in certain left-wing circles. Six years ago these words were said in Canada by a visitor: "The needs of the poor have priority over the wants of the rich. The rights of workers are more important than the maximization of profits. The participation of marginalized groups has precedence over the system that excludes them." This was said in Canada in 1984 by Pope John Paul II. I think he was quite right on that, no matter who else may have said things like that.

The goods and services tax is a tax on value added. That is, of course, the emphatic doctrine of the Minister of Finance and it is quite a clear description of it. It taxes the only sources of wages and current profit. That is value added. But it does not tax the accumulated wealth that determines which of that value added goes to the capitalist and which of that value added goes to the workers.

It is being done because the governing philosophy of the eighties, which started well before this government, has been that to get more production, more or better goods and more value in goods produced, it is necessary to pay workers less than to pay owners more. That is what this tax does.

It is not a successful program. We can see it particularly with our neighbour to the south, where the great increase of profits is not producing more goods or services or a higher quality of goods and services. It is producing corporate cannibalism. What is happening there is a frenzy of buy-outs.

We have just seen a Canadian entrepreneur who made fortunes out of overpricing housing in Ottawa and Toronto. He went to the United States, tried to buy out two big chains and fell flat on his face. The fact is that these sales of junk bonds and tax credits and all these leverage buy-out tricks do not create more jobs, they usually create less jobs. They do not create more goods or more quality. In fact, they create chaos.

What is really serious about this crazy buy-out business is that it establishes the philosophy that it is good to have money, it is bad not to have money, not because you can do things with the money, but because anybody with money is considered to be a hero. The people with little or no money are considered drones, according to the former Imperial Oil president, and they are the only ones that should be forced to pay taxes.

In the first place, by the standard of Pope John Paul's words, "This is unjust." The injustice of it can be shown very simply in the fact that by 1991, to raise $18.5 billion, the arbitrary sum that the minister is concerned about, would require in income tax $70 from a person earning $20,000 a year, but $695 from a person earning $20,000 a year by the GST.

For someone earning $30,000, it requires $747 by income tax, but twice that, $1,405 by the GST. For someone earning $45,000, it would require $2,303 by income tax and a little more by GST, that being $2,475. If I get up to $60,000, and in fact it is beginning to shift the other way. It would take $3,953 in income tax from someone earning $60,000, but with the GST, it lets them off with only $3,115 tax. People earning $100,000 would have to pay $8,155 income tax and a little over half of that, $4,875 by goods and services tax. So it was intended to take the tax off those who already have the highest incomes and add it on to those who have the lowest incomes.

What is even more serious is that it redistributes decision-making power away from those who work into the hands of those who get their living not by work but by what they own. Low-income people, for example, those earning $10,000 or $15,000 a year according to Statistics Canada spend 92 per cent of their income on their current consumption. They do not have the choice that a previous speaker was talking about, to spend or not to spend. If they do not spend, they starve.

A person earning over $50,000 only has to spend 56 per cent of his income on current consumption. In other words he has 44 per cent to save. What this does is hand at a greater rate the ownership of wealth more and more to the rich. It is a misappropriation of the idea that to him that has shall be given and from him that has not shall be taken away even the little that he has. That was said in a very different context but what it means here is that the factories, the office buildings, communication systems, the transportation systems, all the wealth of our country is to become concentrated in even fewer hands than hold it now.

It also means that through the GST there will be a windfall of $2.5 billion to the class of capitalist exporters. In the past they paid the manufacturers' sales tax even on goods that were exported. Now they will not have to pay that. In other words, that $2.5 billion stays with that class.

We are told that that will make more jobs in Canada but that is not at all convincing because in industries like automobiles and the export of raw materials, the prices are set by world markets and not so much by day-to-day competition. This will mean that if the sale price is lower by the difference of the tax, that is extra profit to the people who already have too much. It means also that Canadians will pay that tax on goods and Americans will not. Because of the free trade agreement, we cannot charge the Americans a higher price. Therefore the Canadians will be discriminated against by the goods produced in their own country.

There will be a wage revolt. We have been promised it by the unions in this country, and they mean it. It has been pointed out by Marjorie Cohen that they have lost 10 per cent of the real value of their wages since 1984 through inflation. They are told by the finance minister "don't go for a big raise or we will put a wage freeze on". Well, we will see how that works. It is not only Marjorie Cohen, it is Wood Gundy which says: "Inflation will rise by much more than the 2.25 per cent promised by the minister." Therefore the Bank of Canada, according to Wood Gundy, will have to raise its interest rates so as to raise the unemployment rate to double-digit levels before workers will swallow a real wage cut of a 9 per cent GST. What he says applies almost as well to a 7 per cent GST.

A country in which 5 per cent of the people own 50 per cent of the wealth begins to sound like a banana republic. It is interesting that it was John Diefenbaker who said we are becoming a banana republic. A country where 32 families own $132 billion worth of our wealth is a country of extreme injustice in the distribution of power. This goods and services tax will increase that injustice and drive this country into desperate social conflict that we have not known for half a century. It is a very mistaken move by this government.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to again strongly oppose the goods and services tax. This tax is known throughout the land, I suppose, as the GST. To some it is known as the grief and suffering tax.

I am speaking as a New Democrat who is committed to fair taxation and I am speaking as a representative of nearly 100,000 constituents in New Westminster and Burnaby, British Columbia. Constituents who, no matter what their political affiliation or political bent, have written to me by the thousands. I have received thousands of cards, letters and petitions, all from people who are opposed to this bill. Many of these people have been Tories.

I speak as a Status of Women critic for my party, a capacity which has enabled me to see the severe repercussions that this GST will have on women, the oppressed and on the disadvantaged in our society. I speak as Canadian who is fed up with higher and higher taxes and seeing Canadian social programs decimated by this government. Canadians are becoming increasingly fed up with the decimation of our social programs and the destructive elements of this Conservative government.

The GST is a tax on almost everything. It is a tax on heat, hydro, children's clothing, condoms, diaphragms, diapers, haircuts, telephones, stamps, postal services, books, school supplies, coffins and muffins. A kid's McHappy meal at McDonalds and all take-out food and sweetened baked goods are taxed, no matter where they are bought. As well, movie tickets, furniture, household repairs, funeral services, boots, shoes, coats, winter hats, gloves, a visit to a grandmother or to a grandchild who lives out of town, and much, much more. It is a ridiculous tax.

This government thinks it has fooled Canadians by lowering their percentage rate from 9 to 7 per cent. But we all know and all Canadians know that once a federal tax is in place, it is only going to go one way, and that is up. It is not going to go down. It will go way up. It will go up again after the next election if this government wins. It may even go up again if my colleagues in the Liberal party are elected. With the 7 per cent federal sales tax on top of the existing 12 per cent provincial tax, in Newfoundland people will be paying 19 per cent in sales tax.

An hon. member: Shame.

Ms. Black: The GST is choking the disadvantaged regions of Canada and the disadvantaged people of Canada, no matter where they live. Ordinary Canadians will be stifled with an extra 7 per cent tax on everything they buy, in addition to our provincial rates, and we still see the large corporation capital tax at .2 per cent. This is a special tax on women. Sanitary napkins will be taxed, tampons and menstrual sponges. There is no escape for women between the ages of 12 and 45. This government is obviously top-heavy with men if it does not realize that feminine hygiene products are not a luxury, they are a necessity for women.

The majority of the poor in this country are female. Part of the government's new announcement about the GST was a 50 per cent cut in the enhanced tax credits for poor Canadians. This credit was cut from $2.4 billion to $1.2 billion. By how many billions of dollars will the government be profiting from this tax? Many low-income earners do not file income tax returns, so they will never see a penny of this tax credit, or what is left of it. The credit is not indexed. Every year this credit will be worth less and less to lower-income Canadians. People will pay much more in sales tax than can be made up by this credit. Of women who file tax returns, 50 per cent have incomes of $10,000 a year or less, compared to only 23 per cent of men.

Many of these women live below the poverty line, yet they pay income tax. Our tax system rewards high-income earners with tax cuts and with shelters. Women are left to pay the taxes and to raise our future generations on whatever they can scrape together.

The GST is an inflationary measure. Even the government admits that this tax will cause inflation. Since this government deindexed family allowances in 1985, this income support to mothers no longer keeps up with inflation. This is another attack on mothers and families by the Conservative government.

The GST will drive child care costs sky-high. Even though there is no direct tax on child care, the GST will apply to everything that child care centres buy. It will apply to heat, lights, cleaning service, repairs, toys, supplies, diapers. The same applies to rent. Although there is no direct GST on rent, the GST will drive the price up on everything that the landlord buys; heating costs, plumbing services and maintenance. Operational costs will increase and so will the rents.

Ms. Hunter: And they call it fair.

Ms. Black: The Prime Minister and his merry band of ministers came up with a tax that they would pay on the same basis as the homeless in this country. The Prime Minister will pay exactly the same amount of federal tax at the cash register as a single mother with three kids who is surviving on social assistance. This is the convoluted Tory concept of fairness and equity.

From my constituency I receive thousands and thousands of cards, letters and petitions from people who are opposed to this tax. I would like to share with the House of Commons, for the record, some of the comments that people have been saying to me.

A small businesswoman who lives in Burnaby, British Columbia writes: "A 9 per cent hike in my rates would put me in the position where it would be no longer feasible for my clients to use my services, professional transcribing. My choice would have to be reducing my own rates which, in turn, would not make it feasible for me to continue. In other words, I would be out of business. My husband earns in the $25,000 a year range and my supplement to our income is necessary. With a 9 per cent rise in the cost of everything it will be even more necessary. This tax is a threat to our very way of life and, although I have never taken a political stand before, I join with you to heartily oppose this tax."

From seniors I received a large number of letters. They like to write and they are good at writing letters. Mrs. Rejane Lawrence in the city of New Westminster, B.C. says: "The Tories, and in particular Mr. Wilson, seem to be bent on hurting the elderly and the poor. First the attempt to deindex our pensions in which he failed and now this terrible tax." That is from a senior in my riding.

There are letters from working people as well. Dian Dougan in New Westminster writes: "Please tell Mr. Wilson and Mr. Mulroney loudly and clearly that the restructuring of Canada in their corporate interest is going to prove to be their undoing. Working people may not be vocal but they will eventually fight back to keep their universal programs to keep Canada intact and to ensure a fair and decent standard of living."

People in the small business community have also responded. I have received hundreds and hundreds of petitions that unfortunately are not in the right form for presentation in the House of Commons. They are put out by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and people in my community of New Westminster—Burnaby have signed them by the hundreds.

Jimmy McGivern from New Westminster writes: "I also feel that it will be a tremendous boost for inflation. It will put many small businesses out of competition with the larger ones that can afford the extra costs."

People are worried about tourism in our country. There is a letter from Doris Jorgenson on tourism. She says: "This tax will ruin Canada. No more tourist dollars will come our way and Canadians will take their holidays away from Canada and spend their money away from Canada."

Mr. Speaker, I recognize that my time is running out. There is one more letter I would like to put into the record. It is from the mayor of the municipality of the city of Burnaby. He writes to our finance minister with the following resolution by his council: "That the Burnaby council communicate to the Hon. Michael H. Wilson, the Minister of Finance, that Burnaby is adamantly opposed to both the principle and implementation of the proposed goods and services tax."

Canadians are angry about this tax. They do not want this tax. We do not want this tax. We are opposed to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, this evening and throughout the debate on the GST, we have heard statements I would be tempted to qualify as irresponsible, especially from our colleagues in the Official Opposition. They insisted on using election campaign rhetoric, at a time when we are discussing a very important issue that will have an impact on the future of this country, not only because it is a new tax but because the Government of Canada and Canadian citizens, including opposition members, must consider the future of our social programs between now and the year 2000 and a major realignment of Canada's public finances.

What I noticed, especially on the opposition side, is that both opposition parties continued to make the kind of irresponsible statements we heard during the last election campaign. I will give you a very concrete example, Mr. Speaker. In Saint-Maurice, every day during the last election campaign, the NDP candidate used the radio and the media, and even went from door to door, to tell senior citizens in my riding, and there are quite a few: If you elect the Mulroney government, you will lose your old age security pension next week; and that's a promise! The Liberal candidate in my riding did exactly the same thing, Mr. Speaker. He went around my riding, and people were so upset they burst into tears. At the senior citizens' clubs in Charette and Saint-Paulin, the Liberal candidate brought senior citizens to tears when he told them that if they voted for the Progressive Conservative Party, they would lose their old age security pension. I saw it with my own eyes, and these are people in one of the poorest ridings in Quebec, because for 97 years it was represented by Liberal members.

I will say one thing. At least, our NDP friends, our socialist friends had one suggestion in connection with the GST. I don't agree, but at least they did make a suggestion. They realized that in countries like Sweden, their socialist friends found that a GST was necessary. They adopted the GST and implemented it, and its success has been widely acknowledged by all political parties in Sweden today. You should take the advice of your Swedish socialist friends who had the guts to introduce a tax on goods and services!

The Liberals, however, have offered no alternative solution, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Liberal party has no alternative. They are waiting now for their unleadership convention to decide who is going to be their next unleader. They are waiting for that.

Their only alternative is to have an unleader. They will try, maybe, to have the guy that was before me in my riding, Jean Chrétien.

We have one thing to do in politics. We have to check the record of a member of Parliament to know if that guy is able later to become the leader of a party or leader of the government. I will give you that record.

Jean Chrétien was elected in my riding as member of Parliament in 1963. At that time he was member of Parliament and the unemployment rate was at 8 per cent in my riding. The year after he was named Minister of Indian Affairs and the unemployment rate rose to 10 per cent in my riding.

Some hon. members: Oh!

Mr. Pronovost: After that, Jean Chrétien, the guy that will save this party, as the unleader of this party, was named Minister of Revenue Canada. Do you know what happened to the unemployment rate in the riding of Saint-Maurice? It rose to 16 per cent.

An hon. member: That is performance.

Mr. Pronovost: After that, Jean Chrétien fortunately for a very short period of time, was named Minister of Finance, one of the most influential jobs in this country. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what I think—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski) The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a short point of order.

• (2130)

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, it will be a very short point of order. We were discussing the GST. The motion is for second reading of this wretched bill before us tonight.

I am enjoying this recitation of the triumphs of one of the candidates for the leadership of our party, but I question its relevance to the GST.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): He is getting to it now.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, it is not a point of order to question the relevance of the gentleman so named as a potential leader for that party.

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to explain something that will shake them up very much. I was saying that for a man to receive our credibility in politics we have one thing to check. It is his own record.

Before saying that the Liberals are right in contesting the federal sales tax, we have to check their record to see whether or not we can give them credibility. I was trying to explain that when one of their potential leaders was an elected member of Parliament the unemployment rate was 8 per cent in my riding. After that he was named Minister of Indian Affairs and the unemployment rate in my riding rose to 10 per cent. After that, when he was named Minister of Finance, the unemployment rate rose to 16 per cent.

The last time he was named Minister of Finance, which is the most influential job in the country after the Prime Minister. Do you know what happened to my riding, Mr. Speaker? The same year that Jean Chrétien was Minister of Finance of this country the unemployment rate rose to 24 per cent. If that is the way they want to choose a man who will lead this country, then people in my riding understand that.

I have the pleasure to announce to you that the unemployment rate now in my riding of Saint-Maurice is at 13 per cent. That is one of the realities in my riding.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pronovost: I want to give the people on the Liberal side a very important message. I want them to choose Jean Chrétien today. Choose Jean Chrétien at once and you will stay in the opposition for the rest of your life.

Mr. Speaker, these same Liberals in the debate brandished a small folder on the GST, telling us that it was full of lies and that there was no truth in it. Look at page 2, questions and answers on the GST, where it says that Canadian consumers will not pay the GST on basic food. Can you say that is not true? They will not pay the GST on rent for long-term housing and sales of existing houses. Can you say that is not true? Nowhere did I hear a Liberal member—and the socialists have already gone to bed—tell us that this folder contained errors. Mr.

Speaker, at no time have they been able to prove that a single line of the ton of documents available, which Canadians are asking us for—The Liberals and New Democrats want to keep us from informing Canadians, which is also shameful. Besides telling us all sorts of things here in the House, they are refusing Canadians information. However, when the Liberals were in power, they paid for beautiful advertisements on television with big birds flying by, and then they said, "Hooray for Canada!' ' That is how you did your propaganda!

Now we are more reasonable. We have documents and information and we want Canadian citizens to be informed.

Mr. Speaker, they frightened seniors in my riding during the last election campaign. Seniors want to have information now. The fact is that 84 per cent of the seniors in my riding of Saint-Maurice will be better off once the GST is accepted in Parliament and I think that will happen very quickly. Eighty-four per cent of the people in my riding deserve a better economic situation. Let us pass the GST and the poorest in our society—Not like my New Democratic colleague just did, talking about the rich who have $500,000 in cash and $50,000 in interest income. The New Democrats care about those people.

One-third of my constituents are seniors in difficulty who need that money. You know, one-third of the families in the riding of Saint-Maurice are headed by single mothers, Mr. Speaker. That is something quite significant. With the GST, these women who head young families of one or two children will be better off economically, once the GST is passed.

With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, and some others that could keep us going for a long time, I am absolutely unable to understand why the Official Opposition and the NDP cannot at least think for just a moment that they are making a serious historic mistake. When Canadians realize once the GST is implemented that it is good for the whole Canadian economy, they will say: "What you Liberals and New Democrats told us in 1990 was wrong." Keep on telling them that. Canadians will remember as they remember the scare campaign you waged against free trade and on the backs of seniors in Quebec and throughout Canada. Continue that way and you will stay on that side of the House for a very long time.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, we heard quite a story about a former finance minister in the Liberal government who left things in a bit of a mess. I can remind members of this House that in 1984 when the Conservatives came to power things could not have been much worse.

The programs that we inherited and are trying to deal with now were programs of overspending. The annual debt was at an all-time high, and the forecast was not much better. I can remember in 1985 when the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre, who was the finance minister at the time, introduced his budget and how members of the Opposition cried out loud and clear about the 50,000 or so jobs that would be lost because of the economic budget brought in by the Conservative finance minister.

We are on a program of cutting back on escalating debts. I am not a bit surprised that this upsets some members of the Opposition. I think that what we have to bear in mind is that a good economic policy results in a program, or many programs, that will do a couple of things.

First, it will make it possible for us to afford the kind of standard of living, the kind of social programs that we have rather grown accustomed to. Without economic viability in a family, in a business or in a government there are not the necessary dollars to finance the kind of standard of living, the kind of society with the kinds of services that the Canadian people expect.

We have implemented policies and initiatives which have not always been politically popular but which were seen as necessary if the country was to grow and become truly competitive.

I remember a forced election not many years ago. It was forced by the unelected Senate, in part because it felt that our policies of freer trade would lead to the loss of jobs and the loss of sovereignty in this country. I think that what we found out was just the opposite.

Not only did we create more jobs, more economic growth, a better standard of living, a lower debt, a higher Gross National Product, a stronger dollar and lower interest rates, but we accomplished the kinds of policies that for decades members in the Opposition who are now heckling away as best they can to cover up the mess they made of this country over a period of 20 years in power never dreamt of. They are astounded that any policy will work when they tried everything.

But they forgot to try two things. They forgot to try to bring the debt under control. They were interested in being popular. They wanted to be loved. They wanted the people to return them to office. They handed out money for programs they could not afford. They spent money they did not have. They did all of the kinds of things that one cannot do if one is to be financially accountable.

The plan that we have now put in place is creating the same kind of a dilemma that was created for the members who are now in opposition when they were in government. They cannot believe that people have to pay for what they want and what they want in politics, they usually get. The more they ask for, the more government gives them. That is the story of the Liberal past. They gave them what they wanted. They produced the programs that demanded high taxation, huge debts.

• (2140)

Per capita we have one of the largest debts in the free world. There was never a program put in place by the former Liberal government, from the days when it started the debt program, that reduced the debt year over year over year as the Conservatives have reduced the annual debt every year for the past five years.

At $30.5 billion in the current fiscal year that will mean that it is $8 billion less than it was when we took over and—

Mr. Milliken: And more than last year.

Mr. Domm: You can't tell me of one year in the preceding years to us coming to power in 1985 when the Liberals did it. They never, ever did it. Let's be honest about this thing. Let's not put up a camouflage to let the people in Canada think that they knew how to get an annual debt under control.

Now we come to another phase of reducing annual debts, the phase which calls for the people to do one of two things. Either the Canadian people have to accept fewer programs or in combination with fewer programs more taxes, or we will be back into that spiral of inflation, high interest rates and increased debts that were created by the Liberal government in coalition in large part with the NDP. Those two together have created the disaster that we are faced with today.

How are we going to do it? The Liberals campaigned for four elections in which I campaigned with the story that the manufacturers' sales tax was regressive and should be abolished. Members of the NDP in committee prior to the last election campaigned with the same story. They wanted us to get rid of the manufacturers' sales tax. They said that putting a tax on manufactured goods with which we had to compete on a world market—something which the 48 countries that are our major competitors do not have—would be disastrous. The part of the program that the Liberals campaigned to get rid of they did not know what to do with. We cannot give away $17 billion if we do not have a source from which to collect it.

We introduced a goods and services tax. We were that late in doing it, thanks to the delay of the Liberals and the NDP, that all of the other 48 countries in the world with which we compete had long done away with a manufacturers' sales tax.

I don't know how many of you have ever been in business, but if you were competing against the United States in selling—

Mr. Young (Gloucester): They don't have one in the United States.

Mr. Domm: You are the expert at finances. If you were competing against the United States for markets in the Pacific Rim would you expect your corporation, if you were lucky enough to have one, to compete against the United States, if you had to pay 13.5 per cent and it didn't in selling to that Pacific Rim country? Now we have removed the manufacturers' sales tax and have produced a program that neither the NDP—and I don't see any of its members in the House. Is it right that there are no NDP members in this House, no NDP members in the House at all?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. The hon. member has been here a long time and he knows that he should not say who is or who is not in the Chamber.

Mr. Domm: I agree, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): However, that is not the reason that I called the member to order. I just cannot seem to hear the hon. member. There seems to be a little chatter in the House. I would like to hear the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that, but I have to point out that I would not be guilty intentionally of mentioning another member of Parliament by name. I was referring to the New Democratic Party and I think that is in order. Correct me if I am wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No, that is not right.

Mr. Domm: All right. Members of the other opposition party have never produced a program to offset what they wanted to do, that is, remove the manufacturers' sales tax. Yet here are members of the Official Opposition sitting opposite squabbling away about a program that we introduced when they have no program to introduce to replace the manufacturers' sales tax.

There is no rationale for that kind of management of this country. Yet they seem to think that the Canadian people are not intelligent enough to figure out they had no way to finance the programs that they put in place, none whatsoever except through spiralling inflation. There is the government now sitting in opposition which had double digit interest rates right up in the twenties. When in government they not only had double digit interest rates; they had double digit inflation. If they do not think that drives up the costs for those who can least afford it, if they think for one minute that they can run this country and not pay for the programs, then they are mistaken. Our debt has reduced on an annual basis every year since we came to office.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): It's going up.

Mr. Domm: Hold on a minute. If you take the debt that you had which we took over, along with the debt that we have now annually, you will see that it is reduced, and that is with some inflation, not nearly the inflation you had. It has reduced from $38 billion to $30.5 billion. When did you ever in all the years that you have been in office save $8 billion in five years? You have never done it. You had debts year after year from the time that the leader and the finance minister who was mentioned just a few moments ago by my colleague were in office. The past leader you had just up until today was the one who created the debt. You had debts every year.

If they think they are ready to govern this country, then they have a long way to go before they will convince the Canadian people that they have any answers for any of the problems they created.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my comments will be brief and to the point. They will be brief because the Government opted to limit the debate on this important matter, and they will be to the point because of the very evident and serious problems associated with this goods and services tax proposal.

Together with millions of Canadians, we in this Party believe that this Government cannot simply keep on ignoring the serious flaws in the proposed tax.

It is a well-known fact that tax reform should be aimed at simplifying matters. It should not create confusion, complicate matters, slow the economy down or seek to pick more money out of working Canadians pockets.

However, Mr. Speaker, such are some of the implications of the proposed goods and services tax.

A great number of reports by various economic experts stated that if the GST was implemented, our economy would be hard hit by higher rates of inflation, unemployment and interest.

The Consumers' Association of Canada testified before the finance committee that it would be most unlikely the elimination of the current manufacturers' sales tax at 13.5 per cent would benefit consumers.

The major unions also told the Government that labour would not tolerate the inflationary impact of the tax. This means that when their collective agreements come up for renewal, those workers will ask for higher wages to catch up with the inflation caused by the GST.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the Economic Council of Canada has showed that the implementation of the tax would lead to a 2.4 per cent decrease in real salaries in 1991.

• (2150)

This means a significant decrease in the standard of living of Canadian workers.

Further, the Conference Board of Canada predicted that 71,000 jobs could disappear in 1981 only. Finally, studies done by the Economic Council indicate that interest rates will have to climb if we are to limit the inflationary impact of the GST, and that would happen as early as 1991.

Virtually all economic studies other than those prepared at the government's request forecast the GST will lead to higher inflation and unemployment rates and slower economic growth in 1991.

[English]

Small business is a well-known contributor to the economic vitality of our country. Small business provides more of the new jobs and new opportunities for Canadians than any other sector. Yet the government's proposed goods and services tax will hit small business harder than any other sector of our business community.

There is a general problem of confusion. It concerns what will be taxable and what will not be taxable. Will the tax be included in the shelf price of the item or added at the cash register? How will the retailer decide and how will the consumer know which system is being used?

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business estimates it will cost $1 billion just to convert retail trade to cash register systems which will show the customer the GST on their sales slips.

The costs for additional staff, training and time to collect the tax for the government are also astronomical. But it does not stop there.

Small business will be the first to feel the effect of the decreased spending power of consumers, when consumers start tightening their belts as the result of the increased portion of their wages going to pay the goods and services tax.

Local business owners in my riding of Ottawa Centre tell me that consumers are already starting to hold back on spending in anticipation of this tax. Businesses are going to fail.

Small specialty shops like antique dealers, stamp collectors, retailers, consultants, and a list longer than I have time for tonight will be hard hit. This is just another example of how unfair this tax is and what a crippling effect it will have on the local and national economy.

The goods and services tax will also have a serious impact on tourism. The Tourism Industry Association of Canada shows that by 1992 Canada will lose over $1 billion per year as a direct result of this tax.

The Canadian Restaurant and Food Services Association says that the $230 million now raised by the federal tax—mostly, I should add, through the sale of restaurant equipment—will jump to $1.16 billion when the goods and services tax is applied to a much wider range of goods and services in this sector.

A Woods Gordon study predicts that food service sales will fall 5 per cent to 7 per cent as a result of the goods and services tax. The Hotel Association of Canada is actively opposing the goods and services tax.

The tourism industry problem will be felt heavily in western Canada and especially in Atlantic Canada where tourism is a badly needed growth industry and tourist dollars are an important source of income.

I do not think I have to spell out for my colleagues opposite what a faltering tourism sector will mean to the millions of Canadians employed in the service sector. To put it simply, it could mean a disaster.

I would like to move from my examination of the goods and services tax and its effect on the economy and look for a moment at the impact of the goods and services tax on the educational system.

We have heard members from all sides of this House rise to speak on the important issue of education, not only to the personal development of individual Canadians but to the full development of our culture and an internationally competitive economy. Yet the government has seen fit to put forward a tax which will discourage education, training and research. For the first time learning is going to be taxed. How shameful, when we are on the brink of a new era in which education and technology will be more important than ever before.

Education is also being attacked on another front. Colleges and universities will be faced with a complicated rebate system, which, even if they manage to make their way through the paperwork jungle, will ultimately result in these institutions paying more. We all know they cannot afford it. There are no incentives included in the tax system to encourage research and development—another opportunity missed by the attempt to introduce this tax reform system.

I recently received more than 300 petitions signed by thousands of Canadians who were appalled to discover that the tax will apply to books. It is quite an irony that in 1990, the year that the United Nations has designated as International Literacy Year, the government is taxing books. It is more than ironic. It is shocking and sends a dangerous message about the government's views about the importance of learning.

One of my constituents is a psychologist who wrote to me when he learned that the government was planning to tax the patients of psychologists. I share his views about this astounding lack of compassion and understanding about mental health.

People do not choose to go for psychological help any more than they choose to become physically ill. Emotional problems if left untreated can result in huge personal costs to the individual and real economic costs to our society.

This is not a question of economics. It is a question of health care and people's lives. Obviously any tax that limits the accessibility of psychological services for Canadians is a tax that is unfair and incredibly short-sighted.

The National Council of Welfare predicted that within five years 700,000 poor families will be cut off from the tax credit because of the lack of full indexation. Within 10 years over one million Canadian families who need this protection will lose their tax credit.

In summary, there is one word only which sums this up. It is unfair. Canadians across the country have been shouting out their opposition to this tax. The government must not ignore them. They deserve better. I call on the government to scrap it.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to participate in this debate on the much talked about goods and services tax that is going to be imposed on Canadians.

I am very disappointed that we were promised tax reform over the years. According to all groups, individuals and organizations across the country, this is not really a reform. It is an added burden to the already overburdened taxpayer.

I have listened to people from both sides of the House talk about the comments and questions they have been asked by their constituents and about the concerns of many organizations. I have had many people, as have other members, come into the constituency office and give their comments on this proposed goods and services tax.

One of the main industries in Prince Edward Island where I come from is the tourism industry. The tourism industry is very concerned about what this will do to it. In Canada, for one reason or another, we have more expensive meals and hotel accommodation, gasoline, alcohol, tobacco prices than south of the border. People have a very great fear in the Atlantic region that this will have a devastating affect on the tourist industry there.

The hotel and food and beverage industry is also concerned because it knows and we know that one of the areas that would be affected first by a rise in prices, or a rise in taxes, is that industry because people tend to stop eating out. They do not go to these places on their vacations when they find it is more expensive. So these are two organizations in my area that have shown great concern.

Another interesting group in my area is the manufacturers. The manufacturers are concerned because the imposition of this tax will probably cut back on the sale of their products. As well, they are going to have to—and this is prevalent throughout the business community—hire somebody almost full time to collect the tax.

The people who have come to see me in my area are opposed to the implementation of this tax. In the regions of Canada the two-way street in transportation is that of the expense to ship goods to the central market and the expense to get goods shipped to the regions from this central market. Again, this will add an unnecessary mark up to the price of the products that we will have to buy in my area, in the western regions and in the outlying areas of Canada.

For instance, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission states that the GST will create the perception that goods from the Atlantic region are more costly, due to the application of this GST and higher transportation costs, than those of competitors located closer to the market-place.

We have known this for years and years. For instance, the price of a car in that region is more expensive because it costs more money to transport it there. Now, with the added cost of the sales tax on the product itself and on the transportation, this is going to again increase the cost of that motor vehicle, or whatever other product, out of reach of many people.

The real estate associations have made presentations, I am sure, to most members of this Chamber. As with many people across the country, the concern they have is that buying a new home is a very expensive proposition. To most people it is the most expensive item they will ever purchase in their lifetime. Now, with the imposition of this tax it will put housing out of the reach of many people.

The real estate association in my area has stated that in certain areas of Atlantic Canada, at 11.5 per cent interest rates, 65 per cent of the people who have mortgages are over-mortgaged; at 12.25 per cent, 75 per cent of the people who have mortgages are over-mortgaged. So when you add what the tax will be on the brokerage fees, on the cost of the house, this will play a devastating role in the housing market.

The Canadian Homebuilders Association states that monthly rents on average could rise by $40 to $60. This again is going to place people in a desperate role. The people who are going to pay the price for this are the middle and the low-income people. They, as always, pay the major share of taxes and never ever get a tax break. Again, they are going to be put into a position where they have to pay this 7 per cent on top of all the goods and services they purchase.

Organizations and labour unions, organized workers, especially those who have some clout at the bargaining table, are going to look for more wages, rightfully so, because they are the people who pay through their pay cheques the most tax. The middle-class people pay the shot right across the board for everybody and they do not get a break in their taxes.

The people who have come to my offices and who have written letters to me are people who are very concerned about this tax. They feel that there must be a better way, that the government should scrap this tax, go back to the drawing board and come forward, after consultation with the provincial governments and with Canadians in general, with a more fair and equitable tax system.

Therefore, I beg of this government to really take seriously that the polls are saying that 79 per cent of Canadians are opposed to this goods and services tax, go back to the drawing board and come forward, after consultation, with a more fair and equitable tax.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, you can tell that the Conservative side of the House are indeed enthusiastic about having an opportunity, at long last, to be able to speak about the subject which has been made much more controversial than in fact it should. There is no question at all in my mind, or in the minds of the average thinking Canadian that, if asked the question: "Do you agree that you should pay more taxes or tax in a different form?" of course, their answer is going to be no. As a result, we simply cannot, for the betterment of Canada, respond to anyone's poll on this particular issue, for I believe that we are on the brink of the greatest shake down of truth in taxation in Canada's political history. It is just unfortunate that the other parties are not ready for it.

There are many components of this bill which can be spoken about because it is indeed very complex, very complex in nature and very complex to understand. As a result of that, I will not try to speak about every aspect of it, but instead I have chosen the component of competitiveness, and it is on this issue that I would like to speak to the House of Commons tonight, particularly how this government has been working to improve our economic competitiveness.

As we all know in the House of Commons, Canada depends on world trade. Exports account for about one-third of our national income and our costs must remain competitive with those of our major trading partners and competitors, both at home and abroad. If we fail to remain competitive, we will pay the price in lost jobs and, of course, a lower standard of living as well. The goods and services tax will make Canada more competitive in domestic as well as foreign markets. This can be seen if we look at how the present hidden manufacturers' sales tax works.

First, when someone brings goods into Canada, because of GATT, the tax has to be calculated at the manufactured price, f.o.b., free on board, the plant in the foreign country. All of the costs of bringing the goods to Canada, loading them at the dock, distributing them across Canada, guaranteeing the goods, financing the goods, packaging the goods, and marketing the goods, bear absolutely no federal sales tax whatsoever. Yet, those goods are in competition with goods manufactured in my hometown of Regina. In Regina the manufacturer pays the federal sales tax on the invoice price of the goods leaving his plant. That invoice price includes the guarantees, the financing costs, the marketing costs, salesman's wages, and, yes, even the salesman's car. Indeed, that price includes municipal taxes. No wonder the foreigner has an advantage. Our system gives him an advantage. Does the opposition care about this inequity? Of course not.

That is not all. When a Canadian manufacturer in Regina sells something, he has to add in all of the sales taxes he paid on his computer, his telephone service, his washroom supplies, his paper clips, his pens, and on his motor fuel, because none of that tax is currently rebatable. When he does not pay sales tax on what he sells, if he sells it as an export the taxes on his operation are in his cost structure and have to be borne in his price in a foreign market, where he competes with an exporter who has no such tax burden.

The opposition looks at the present tax and agrees that it has to be changed. The opposition knows that the present tax costs us around $9 billion a year in lost output, but does the opposition put forward any credible alternatives? Of course not, Mr. Speaker.

In recent years, many countries, including Canada, have adopted structural reforms to provide clear and powerful market incentives and reduced barriers to trade, glasnost and perestroika are certainly not among the least of them.

The Government of Canada has implemented a number of structural policies and reforms to raise potential output and living standards. All of these initiatives represent a serious commitment to an improved economy. They stand as testimony to our faith in the private sector. These initiatives include free trade with our largest trading partner. They include the personal and corporate income tax reforms of 1988 which made the tax system more equitable and increased the incentive to save and invest. We have acted on deregulation in the energy and transportation sectors as well.

This has freed these critical sectors of the economy from a regulatory nightmare. Can the opposition see the need to reduce regulation? Of course not. This government has privatized 18 Crown corporations and replaced the Foreign Investment Review Agency. I think it was an appropriate acronym when they called it FIRA, something that all of Canada feared. The government has replaced this body with Investment Canada. We are implementing a new approach to encourage research and development and putting in place a new labour force development strategy. All these policies and programs contribute toward making Canada more competitive at home and abroad.

Now is the time to take the next major step, to consolidate the progress we have made and to introduce even more efficiency into our economy.

The existing federal sales tax hurts our competitive position and absolutely must be replaced. I know other speakers have also mentioned this, but Canada is alone among industrial countries in its continued reliance on a manufacturers' sales tax. Today, 19 out of 24 of the world's most highly industrialized economies, members of the Organization for Economic Co-Operation and Development, rely on sales tax systems of the type that we are proposing. It is as simple as that.

The existing tax is buried in the price of all goods and services made in Canada. Even products that are nominally exempt from tax, such as food and clothing, are affected by this existing tax. Does the opposition care about this unfairness? Of course not. Because the tax is levied on a broad range of business inputs, including fuels, vehicles, computers and office furniture, a part of the tax is embedded in the price of all the goods and services produced using these inputs. Tax applied to inputs in the production process ends up embedded in the selling price of the goods produced, a form of double taxation or tax cascading results. Has the opposition proposed anything to solve this problem? Of course not.

At least, nothing that makes any sense. There have been proposals, but nothing viable.

For many sectors of the Canadian economy, the current sales tax system penalizes investment in capital goods by taxing capital purchases. Under the goods and services tax, purchasers of capital goods will be able to claim an input tax credit. I know that is terminology not easily understood, but take the time because it is worth while to understand what an income tax credit is all about. This income tax credit will be paid for taxes paid on such of these purchases. It will vary from industry to industry depending on the degree to which purchases are now taxed.

Lower capital costs will increase incentives to invest and lead to a significant increase in the capital stock over time. Has the opposition informed Canadians about this benefit of the goods and services tax? Of course not. Surely a duty of theirs would be to advise their constituents of the truth.

Removing the tax on inputs for construction materials and manufactured equipment will lower production costs and make natural resource industries in Atlantic and western Canada more competitive on world markets. Directly and indirectly, significant amounts of federal sales tax on such items have hampered the ability of these industries to compete in critical world markets. Canadian goods bear a higher tax burden than competing imported goods.

For example, currently domestic furniture manufacturers face an effective tax rate of 70 per cent higher than that for foreign producers. For office machines and equipment, the margin is over 65 per cent. For domestic goods, the tax applies to a manufacturers' selling price which normally includes marketing and distribution costs. Generally speaking, such costs are not reflected in the price used to calculate FST on imported goods.

Some domestic manufacturers can avoid the tax by restructuring their business activities. This is clearly an unproductive diversion of time and money. While there was no direct sales tax on goods exported from Canada, the federal sales tax on business inputs represents an indirect charge estimated at 1 per cent, 0.9 to be precise, of the sales value of exports. That may seem small, but it accounts for well over 10 per cent of the profit margin of many Canadian exporters.

These business people are working in an extremely competitive international market. The federal sales tax acts in a very real way to impede Canada's export performance and competitiveness. The GST will eliminate the bias in favour of imports by applying a uniform tax rate to both imports and domestic goods and services.

We will see domestic products substituted for imports. On average, we will reduce exporters costs by almost 1 per cent. Will the members opposite acknowledge this important benefit of the GST? Of course not. On a level playing field Canadian producers will become more competitive in domestic and international markets. We will create new jobs in export markets. Expanded Canadian operations will stimulate new demand for plant equipment and labour. Is the opposition concerned with creating new economic growth? You know the answer, Mr. Speaker, of course not.

All regions of Canada will benefit from sales tax reform. It will remove tax from the production process, eliminate import biases and lift tax from exports including exports of resource based products. The single 7 per cent rate and broad base already makes the GST simpler in operation than either the present tax or, indeed, most of the consumption tax systems in other countries.

Canada trades around the globe today. A dramatic increase has occurred in trade with countries, particularly of the Pacific Rim. Steady growth has taken place in trade with developing countries in Europe. Trade with the United States has expanded strongly. By the end of 1992, 12 countries in the European community are destined to form a genuine common market of some 330 million consumers comparable to the industrial might of Japan and the United States. Completion of the European single market should result in a more prosperous European community becoming a stronger market for Canadian exports. In the next few years, we will need to seize new opportunities and face new challenges presented by free trade with the United States, with Europe in 1992, and a further reduction in tariffs currently made being negotiated in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

We need a modern, fair and effective tax system to meet these challenges. The GST fits this description, Do I expect the opposition to recognize this? Of course not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): May I just explain to the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden that there are two 10–minute speeches to take up the 20–minute time. Then we will get to the hon. member.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a little different approach to the sales tax debate that is going on right now because I have been involved in business for a number of years. I have worked on the floor and I have been in every level of management. I have been president of a company, chief executive officer and chairman of the board, so I know it from the bottom to the top. I have callouses on my hands, right up to my elbows so I have a fairly good idea of what goes on inside business.

I would like to talk for a few minutes on how prices are structured, something that has not been talked about at all in this debate. How is a price structured and where does the federal sales tax or the manufacturers' sales tax fit into that calculation? What effect does it have on the consumer? Everyone is talking about the tourism industry and the automobile manufacturers. Nobody is talking about the consumer, and the consumer is the one who eventually pays.

Let me tell you how a price is structured. Either you manufacture a product, or if you import it there is a different calculation. If you manufacture it, you come down to all your calculations of overhead, packaging and so forth, and then you add on the manufacturers' sales tax. That is part of your cost. Then you sell it to a wholesaler and he is going to develop that into a retail price. Part of his cost structure is the manufacturers' sales tax. When he takes that cost of his, he wants to reflect it into a retail price so that he can make a profit on which he pays his overhead, his staff, taxes and everything else, so there is a specific mark up formula that is used.

• (2220)

If you want to make a margin of 50 per cent on your product, you mark your cost up 100 per cent. That means you mark up the manufacturer's sales tax 100 per cent. Who pays? The consumer pays. Is that inflationary? You bet it is inflationary.

So what we want to do is take that sales tax out of that part of the calculation, put it down on the bottom as a consumption tax. Therefore, the prices will be lower all the way down the line.

A lot of people talk about manufacturers or wholesalers not taking that manufacturers' sales tax out of there. I want to tell you that you just have to go to any of the border cities and see what is happening. People are all going across to the United States to buy. Why are they going? Because they can get a better deal at a better price that does not have the tax in it. If you do not think our wholesalers and retailers are going to respond to that, you do not know anything about business. They will respond to the competition, and it will come out.

Furthermore, if businesses had inventory on hand, the amount of sales tax that they have in their inventory will be rebated. It will be worked out between themselves and the Department of National Revenue. Of course with that tax out of the inventory, they then have more cash to play with. They do not have to go to the bank to borrow money to pay the tax to the government. That is what they are doing right now. So that is going to be quite a help to the businessman.

I have said all the way along that with the combination of the GST, the GATT tariff reductions, and the free trade agreement, the consumers of Canada are going to get the best break they have ever had in 40 years, and that's that. They will have lower prices. They will have more products. They will have a greater variety and the market–place will be more competitive. It is going to be better for the consumer in the final analysis. When the tariffs are out of there and when the GST is in place, the prices will be better all the way around.

I also want to talk about the existing manufacturers' sales tax system, because it is probably the most inequitable system I have ever seen. It is disgusting. The Minister of Finance has told us that there are 75,000 different people who pay the manufacturers' sales tax. He has also said there are 22,000 different deals made on that, and there are six different rates. Do you call that fair and equitable across the board?

What are these 22,000 different deals? When I looked into it as a businessman, I found there was no definition for manufacturing in the Sales Tax Act. There was no definition for assembly, there was no definition for producing, and so it was left to sales tax auditors who came into a business and made a judgment call as to whether you were manufacturing, producing or assembling.

You will never know the number of businesses that have just turned in their chips and said that they were not interested in getting into this any longer. Hoover Manufacturing in my constituency made a little washer and dryer. They came to me and showed me their figures of input costs, manufacturing costs, overhead, and so forth. They showed me their selling price wholesale to a company like Eaton's, The Bay, or someone like that. Then they showed me the calculations on a Sanyo product that comes from Japan. There was $90 difference in the retail price.

Now you and your good wife are going along to buy a little washer and dryer for your daughter who has just got married and living in an apartment somewhere. What do you buy? You buy the one that is $90 cheaper. Where was the difference? The difference was in the manufacturers' sales tax all the way through the calculation.

I spoke to the former leader of the official opposition, John Turner. I went all over this with him. Not a word. I went over it with Chrétien. I went over it with everyone, right up to MacEachen, who really did not understand anything. I have talked to every minister of finance we have had here about this problem. It did not mean a thing. They did not understand it.

I started a national trade association because of the manufacturers' sales tax. It is still going. I found that I had certain rulings on manufacturers' sales tax and my competitor in Toronto, who was selling the very same product, had a different set of rulings on the manufacturers' sales tax, and somebody in Montreal had another different set of rulings on manufacturers' sales tax.

We met one day at a convention. My friend told me he was going out of business. I asked him why, and he said that he was being put out of business by National Revenue, the sales tax people, because they were charging him with certain operations. We sat down and talked about them and I said that I had rulings on those, that they are not taxable. They were taxing him and not taxing me. I gave him all my rulings and he stayed in business.

We called our friends across the country. We had a meeting in Toronto and we formed a national trade association. We took all our rulings, put them together in a book and published them. When we came to meet with the people at National Revenue, they gave us hell. They said we should not be doing what we did. They said: "Those are private rulings you have. We gave them to you and they are private to you". Is that balanced taxation across the country? Not one little bit.

I am pleased that we are doing this. We have had 20 Ministers of Finance since the manufacturers' sales tax was brought in. Every one of them wanted to change it. The first levy of manufacturers' sales tax was 1 per cent. It has gone up year after year after year. Everyone said it was an inequitable tax and it should be done away with. The only guy who had the political courage to do it was this Minister of Finance. We are going to do it and we are going to straighten that situation out so that our manufacturers can compete, not only in the export business, but domestically and give the consumers domestically a decent price.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, over the last several weeks, the nation and the House of Commons have been overwhelmed with submissions, briefs, editorials, speeches and reports on the proposed goods and service tax. It is no secret, nor is it any revelation that the people of Canada reject this proposal for tax reform. However, the government is continuing to push ahead, despite what Canadians believe.

Less than a year ago, Canadians found themselves in a similar dilemma. The government was proposing something which, in theory had merits, but the method proposed was flawed. Of course, I am speaking of the free trade debate during the federal election of 1988.

In that instance, the government was not trying to sell free trade, but rather the free trade agreement. Ideologically, few people have problems with freer trade, but many have problems with the Mulroney—Reagan free trade agreement. The government recognized this and launched a multi-million dollar advertising campaign to fool Canadians into believing that free trade and the free trade agreement were one and the same and that if you opposed the free trade agreement, you opposed free trade.

Common sense tells us that such an argument is defective. However, during the election of 1988, ads were run so often and the facts so dramatically manipulated, that many began to believe them. In 1988 the Conservative sell tactic worked. Today Canadians are wise to the tricks of the past.

The people of Canada do not want to buy another lemon. No matter how it is packaged and how it is marketed. Canadians are tired of buying lemons disguised as Cadillacs. This time the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are selling by themselves. Big business has deserted them. Interest groups have deserted them. Even some members of their own caucus have deserted them. This time no one, no corporations, no interest groups, no George Bush, no Margaret Thatcher is going to get involved with such an unpalatable proposition. Only the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance want to see the goods and service tax come into effect. They continue to flog an idea which has already been rejected by Canadians. Let us make no mistake, Canadians from sea to sea, regardless of economic status, age, background and party stripe, have rejected this GST proposal. In fact, 79 per cent of Canadians are opposed to the GST.

• (2230)

In just a few short months since the technical paper on the GST was released, thousands of petitions have been signed protesting the GST. Hundreds of thousands of letters have been written protesting the GST. Town hall meetings have been held across the country. Editorials nation-wide have condemned the tax as unfair and unjust and protests are being planned, even as I stand before you. In Canada's history there have been very few proposals which have received such massive opposition as this GST proposal.

Despite the powerful opposition to the GST, the government forges on. Like trying to cut a hole through a wall of water, the government proceeds, seemingly oblivious to the torrential downpour of opposition.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are very confident that Canadians will change their minds, that Canadians will suddenly wake up one morning and say, "My goodness, I have been wrong all along. I really want to have my purchasing powers slashed by 7 per cent."

The reality is that Canadians are not as naive as the Prime Minister thinks. The sad reality is that the Prime Minister underestimates the Canadian voter. A slick, deceptive advertising campaign may have fooled Canadians once, but it will not work again. This time the organizations that helped fund the glitzy ad campaigns have jumped ship. This time the Prime Minister's friends are not around to fund and support his personal delusions of nation-building. But who needs friends when you have lots of money.

The government has allocated millions of dollars to sell this unsaleable tax, to convince Canadians that they are wrong and that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are right. It has allocated all kinds of money. Why not? After all, it is not as if they are spending it on anything else. They do not want to spend on VIA Rail. They do not want to spend on unemployment insurance. They do not want to spend on day care. They do not want to spend on foreign aid. I suppose that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance believe it is all right to spend our money on advertising campaigns to persuade us to love paying taxes.

Unfortunately, no matter what happens, the Canadian taxpayer loses. If the proposition goes through the taxpayer is stuck with an intangible reality. If the proposition fails millions of dollars will have been needlessly spent.

The goods and service tax is a case in point. I cannot say it in any simpler language. Canadians just do not want a goods and services tax.

For the people of Nipissing and northern Ontario in general, the GST will have devastating effects. Tourism, one of the biggest industries in the country, particularly in the north, will be decimated. It is an industry which contributes $24 billion to Canada's Gross National Product, which provides employment to 10 per cent of the country's workforce. It is Canada's second largest earner of foreign exchange at $7 billion per year. It provides employment in all regions of Canada including summer employment for students, part-time employment and jobs for unskilled labourers.

In the near north alone, tourism generates $200 million annually and $1 billion across northern Ontario. Yet the government through its policies continues to neglect this vital industry and place its existence in jeopardy.

In 1989 we experienced an unprecedented $3 billion balance of payments debt in the travel account. To compound the problems, Canada's share of world tourism has been cut in half over the last decade. However, our government is making it even more difficult for our industry to effectively compete by adding an additional cost of at least 7 per cent.

Where is the incentive for our citizens to travel in their own country when they can get more value for their money south of the border? Every province, with the exception of British Columbia, has experienced a net decline in tourism this past year.

With the dismantling of the defence industries around the world and the opening up of the east bloc, tourism in the 1990s will rapidly become the world's largest industry. Canada with its natural endowments and breathtaking scenery is in an excellent position to expand its market share.

This can only happen if we offer good value at competitive prices, and if we undertake more effective promotion. However, tourism is highly price sensitive. There is no question that if the GST is introduced it will cripple this industry.

What about more effective promotion? When the government slashes the budget for tourism from $35 million to $20 million and yet provides $30 million in aid to McDonnell Douglas of Toronto, we have to question the priorities of the government.

Another example are the cut-backs to VIA Rail. The government's idea of serving the people of northern Ontario is to increase the cost of their train tickets, and then cancel the train. What about the cuts to the unemployment insurance program? Many industries in the north are of a seasonal nature, particularly tourism. Yet, this government has made it more difficult to qualify for benefits, and when you do, you get less.

One might think that the unemployed could go back for retraining and additional education. However, this government wants to impose a tax on books that these people will have to use to be retrained. It is a tax on people trying to better themselves. Where is the logic in this? Where is the logic when the biggest reduction of corporate taxes in history will be passed on to ordinary Canadians who can least afford it? Is this the kind of development that the government has in mind for the north?

We have heard all the rhetoric about the need for a north-south dialogue and a north-south flow of trade. Why do we not look at the north-south flow in our own country and see the regional disparities? When will the north become the priority it should be? For the people in northern Ontario and in the north generally, the GST is not only the goods and services tax but rather, it more clearly stands for the Go South Tax.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate in this debate this evening and to bring the concerns of Prince Edward Island, and especially the concerns of Cardigan, to the floor of the House of Commons. My constituents have grave concerns about this regressive tax.

I represent an area which is mainly rural, where the family farm dominates, where life is lived on a somewhat smaller scale than in the bustling urban centres found in ridings across this country.

It seems this government believes Prince Edward Islanders and Atlantic Canadians are better at stretching a dollar than Canadians in other parts of the country, for we have certainly been called upon to work magic with our dollars to obtain the same standard of living as other Canadians.

The GST will cause inflation. It will drive up interest rates and unemployment. Yet it is a measure quite in character for this government's agenda to serve corporate Canada. My constituents are not surprised. Along with other areas of Atlantic Canada, we in Prince Edward Island have become accustomed to the government's gunfire against our region which has come in the form of spending cuts and tax increases. We lost our bus service to the mainland with the cuts to VIA Rail. Our military base, which provided 1,300 jobs and injected $62 million into our economy, is slated to be closed. Funding was cut for post-secondary education, medicare and hospital services. The Advanced Payments for Crops Program lost its interest free status. Prince Edward Island will lose over $15 million in UI benefits and this is at a time when our fishing industry is on shaky ground. Now Islanders will have to pay a new tax on almost everything they buy, from homes to french fries and everything in between. It simply is the straw that broke the camel's back.

Let me point out what this tax will do to farmers, tourism operators, small businesses and consumers, which includes virtually everybody who lives in Cardigan. Given the geographic location of my province, transportation costs increase the price that consumers in Prince Edward Island must pay. All taxable products to be transported will cost more since transportation will be taxed. The portion of the transportation costs included in the price of goods will be increased by the GST. This will put consumers in my riding at a disadvantage as we are far from major markets and transportation costs are generally higher.

• (2240)

On the other hand, our exports such as potatoes, will be perceived in the marketplace as being more expensive because of the increased costs of transportation and costs for the GST.

Potatoes are to Prince Edward Island what oil is to Alberta. If our number one export is not competitive, our whole provincial economy suffers. Members of the Prince Edward Island potato industry are very concerned about the effect this tax will have on them. Twenty-five per cent of potatoes produced in Canada must be transported to national and international markets.

The GST will be applied to the transportation of our potatoes. This tax on transportation will be rebated. However, the following example clearly shows that our potatoes are at a disadvantage. A buyer in Toronto has a choice to make between a P.E.I. potato and an Idaho potato. It costs the same to produce and transport both potatoes. The difference is that the GST is added to the transport of the P.E.I. potato. Which is easier, to buy the Idaho potato without the added cost of the GST or to buy the P.E.I. potato, then file for the rebate? The answer is obvious.

This tax will be an administrative nightmare to P.E.I. farmers and small business people. Rebates on purchases made by farmers are supposed to make this tax fair to farmers, our primary producers. Instead, it is causing them one big headache.

I am sure the people who designed this tax have not had a lot of experience working on a farm. It is true that many large farms these days use computers to run their businesses. Most small or medium-sized farms have very basic accounting systems. Keeping a record and filing for rebates on a day-to-day basis will be costly and time consuming for farmers. As a dairy farmer myself I know the last thing I would feel like doing after a long day on the farm would be to add up the receipts of small purchases. These small purchases of $10 or $15 would probably never be recorded and thus the rebate for them will not be claimed. The farmer will end up absorbing the cost of the GST.

For larger purchases such as equipment, the delay between the time of purchase and the reimbursement will cause the farmers cash flow problems. These are only a few examples of the serious negative impact that the GST will have on farming in Prince Edward Island and in Cardigan. This negative impact to our number one industry will have ramifications in all sectors of our economy.

Another important industry in my province is tourism, which will be equally damaged by the GST. The tourism industry provides 16.7 per cent of the Island job opportunities and accounts for 10.5 per cent of our gross provincial product. The GST is going to hamper this industry.

The southeastern tourist association in my riding is strictly opposed to this tax and the Tourism Industry Association of Prince Edward Island is deeply concerned as well. Over the last few years there has been a 3 per cent increase in visitors to P.E.I. The Conference Board of Canada predicts there will be a 4.8 per cent decline in visitations once the GST is in place. We are talking about a net decline of approximately 8 per cent. That 8 per cent decline will surely result in job losses.

This tax is regressive. The cost for small businesses, which includes farmers and tourist operators, to comply and administrate this tax will be staggering. The key word here is small.

Many of the small businesses in my riding do not have fancy accounting systems at their disposal. The small business person will have to deal with a provincial sales tax collection system and a new federal sales tax which he or she never had to deal with before.

The provincial retail tax will apply to some items, the federal GST will apply to others, while both will apply to some and to others, none will apply. God help us.

In order to receive an input tax credit under the GST system, small business people would have to submit detailed calculations on the tax they pay to produce their goods and services. Small business, and I repeat, small, do not have the sophisticated accounting systems to deal with this complex system.

The government is putting the onus on small business to collect its tax. This is unfair. Small businesses cannot absorb the cost of maintaining the paperwork necessary to collect the government's taxes. The result will be an increase in price and a decrease in competitiveness.

The GST is not a good and simple tax as this government would like to have us believe, but rather a grief and suffering tax seems to be more appropriate.

The people of Cardigan join the majority of Canadians in telling this government that it should not seek to help their big business friends on the back of the little people who are the backbone of the Cardigan and the Prince Edward Island economies.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, virtually all those who know something about taxation will agree that the GST is the most important and clever reform ever carried out. How is it, as the Prime Minister was saying, that it has made us so unpopular? Several interested groups have suggested that the opposition parties are responsible for this. We all recognize the important role opposition parties play in our parliamentary system. As far as the GST is concerned, however, the Opposition Parties are not assuming their responsibilities. In short, they had no mandate to conduct a campaign the way they did to misinform the business people and the general public. They had a twofold objective: completely distort the economic policies of our government and present a simplistic and threatening picture of the GST. They still insist on telling us horror stories about it. That is why we must set the record straight. For this reason, I must remind the House of the economic vision for the future which is guiding our government as well as try to focus the central role of the GST within our program.

The replacement of the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax by the GST represents a major element of the program implemented by our government to build a stronger economy to face an increasingly competitive world. We have faithfully followed the program which we presented in November 1984 and we will continue to do so.

From the very beginning, we set as an objective a sustainable economic growth, because we felt that this was the best way to meet the aspirations of Canadians throughout this country both now and for the future.

This is a major challenge, Mr. Speaker. The Canada we are building now for the 1990s and the next century must garantee families and individuals a higher standard of living, together with a better protection for the environment, an updated medicare, a satisfactory welfare system and quality education.

We need a strong and competitive economy to create jobs, provide services and create opportunities for our children.

• (2250)

As the Minister of Finance was saying, we are meeting our objectives in two ways. Firstly, we are continuing our efforts with a view to eliminating the debt and curbing the growth of the public debt. Secondly, we are basically and consistently renewing the economy to spur private initiative and improve the efficiency of public management.

Our initiatives will generate sustainable growth and productive jobs in the future. Among the most important are the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement, the privatization of Crown corporations, the deregulation of the energy and transportation sectors, pension reform, direct taxation reform and the new Labour Force Development Strategy. The GST will eliminate the tax which is detrimental to our exports. Canadian exporters will be on an equal footing with foreign competitors in domestic and international markets. Finally, it will increase our competitiveness and economic efficiency and create jobs.

The GST will replace the current 13.5 per cent federal sales tax. It bears frequent repetition because most Canadian citizens are not aware of this fact. In addition, we know that this tax has a negative impact on the economy. It harms Canada's domestic production and exports and favours imports. Overall—and everybody agrees on this—it is complex and not very reliable. It is important to note here that Canada is the only industrialized country that still collects this kind of obsolete sales tax.

Under the circumstances the GST is a rational and sensible choice from an economic standpoint because it favours business competitiveness and Canadian economic growth. Thanks to the GST, Canadian manufacturers for the first time will be in a position, to operate on a level playing field. With the new GST system, the invisible sales tax will be eliminated from the goods and services production process in Canada. It will also be eliminated from our exports. Similarly, imports will be taxed the same way as domestically produced goods. Moreover, the implementation of the GST will make possible an estimated $10 billion increase in the Real Domestic Products each year. Every region and every industry will derive economic benefits from the federal sales tax reform.

The GST is a fairer system. The GST credit is a simple and fair way of protecting low and modest income Canadians. Through that credit, families earning less than $30,000 a year will pay less tax under the new GST system. Small businesses will benefit from special measures. Businesses will have no difficulty complying with the GST because of its large tax base and single rate. Generally, businesses will be eligible for a series of measures especially designed to help them implement the tax.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, this Government has dealt with the problem of an economy that was left adrift in 1984. It has spared no effort and accomplished very significant progress.

It is no coincidence, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has the second largest economic growth among industrial nations after being eigth in 1984. It will be remembered that in 1984 there was a Liberal Government. Today, we are continuing our efforts by tackling an outdated and harmful tax system. We are now proposing a system that is a sound choice. That is why again I am urging the public and especially business people to make a sound choice and co-operate with us in implementing the GST. In this way, together we can go on building a strong and competitive economy, thanks to the courage shown by this Progressive Conservative Government I am proud to be a part of. And thanks to the leadership shown by the Prime Minister.

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak on the goods and services tax, just some 24 hours since I had the experience of attempting to do so last evening in my own constituency.

My constituents gave me a message which they asked me to transmit to my colleagues in Parliament and to members of the government. I have already, in fact, done that in part in private conversation, and I will faithfully fulfil my responsibility by doing so during the course of my remarks, at least at this preliminary point this evening.

As you may know, there have been a number of meetings organized throughout western Canada where there has been considerable opposition expressed to the goods and services tax, not the least of which was one in the community of Brandon last evening.

There are two messages which those meetings very clearly convey. One is a very strong message in which the Minister of Finance will probably take some heart. That is the fact that there is an indication that they wish government spending to be curtailed in a very substantial way.

I repeatedly attempted to point out that this government has done a great deal to get its financial house in order, the fact that we have increased spending on programs by only 3.6 per cent on average since 1984, whereas the previous administration increased spending on programs by some 13.6 per cent between 1980 and 1984. Although there is very substantial progress as evidenced in those statistics, it was also clear that my constituents, and I believe many other constituents in Canada, are asking government to reduce spending even further.

In the upcoming budget there will be a very major effort by this government to reduce the annual debt even again. We will have made progress from the $38 billion of 1984-85 to the $30 billion in the current fiscal year.

I only hope that Canadians, including my constituents, will understand that it is impossible to reduce government spending in any way which will not impact on some Canadians throughout the country, and that it is impossible to reduce government spending without reducing some of the services which government provide. There is a price which we as Canadians must pay if we are going to reduce spending as citizens seem to be demanding.

I think it is also important to understand that we as a government have not done a particularly good job of ensuring that people throughout the country understand the goods and services tax proposal. Far too many people believe that there will be some sort of multiplication of the goods and services tax that will be applied at each and every stage. They do not seem to understand, despite our efforts, that what the businessman will pay is the difference between what he himself has paid on the goods and services which he buys and on the supplies which he sells.

• (2300)

It is important to point out again that the reason for the goods and services tax is to replace the hidden 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax which has been in place in this country for some 60 years.

It is important to remind Canadians that governments, beginning with the 1950s, understood the inadequacy and the inefficiency of the manufacturers' sales tax.

It is important to point out that there are some 75,000 instances in which the manufacturers' sales tax has been applied in Canada and there are some 22,000 separate arrangements. The inefficiency and inequity of that is apparent to those who are directly part of the manufacturing scene, but I am afraid it is not necessarily apparent to all Canadians.

It is important to understand and to reiterate over and over again how the manufacturers' sales tax discriminates against those who work in manufacturing in Canada. It discriminates against those who would find jobs in the manufacturing sector because it makes domestic production in Canada more expensive than imports coming into the country. There probably is not another country in the world which has such a policy in place.

In addition, of course, the fact that the manufacturers' sales tax is applied at the wholesale level also means that the exports that we would sell to our competitors abroad are more expensive. It makes it more difficult for our businesses to compete and again that means fewer jobs for Canadians. We are the only industrial nation in the world that has continued to rely on a manufacturers' sales tax.

It is interesting that this government has often been accused of governing as a result of public opinion polls. We have been accused of following public opinion rather than providing leadership. You do not have to be a political genius to understand that the goods and services tax, to this point, has not been an overly popular proposal. Therefore, you have to come to the conclusion that we believe as a government that it is absolutely essential for the future of this nation that we take this leadership stand.

It is important for our children and for our grandchildren that we provide the kind of economic leadership which will ensure that there will be more jobs in Canada, that there will be a fairer and more equitable tax policy in the future than there is at the present.

It is also important to point out to Canadians that there is, in the goods and services tax, policies which will help us address the debt because there is a very widespread demand among the public that the annual debt and eventually the national debt be reduced.

One of the things which a goods and services tax will do is ensure that the $2 billion which was deliberately set aside in the last budget will be there as part of the annual debt reduction process.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, but which unfortunately not all people understand as yet, with the abolition of the manufacturers' sales tax and the provision of the goods and services tax rebate to lower and middle-income Canadians, some 8.7 million families will in fact be better off. Those earning $30,000 a year or less will actually be better off in the future under the goods and services tax than they are at present.

The fact that the manufacturers' sales tax is a hidden tax, that it is on virtually everything we buy but that we do not see it, makes it difficult for many Canadians to understand. It is a point which we as a government must continue to address over and over again.

The manufacturers' sales tax will disappear. It will be abolished as of January 1, 1991. That means that there will be a very substantial saving to consumers at that stage. It also means that it will permit Canadian businesses to be more competitive in the future than they have been in the past.

I also want to stress the fact that there is a greater degree of equity in the goods and services tax in that it will be far more difficult for those Canadians who have succeeded in the past in escaping their taxation responsibilities to do so in the future.

Much of the mail I, as a member of Parliament, get from my constituency of Brandon—Souris and elsewhere in the country is addressed to the fact that many Canadians believe that too many people escape their taxation responsibilities. One of the advantages of the goods and services tax is that there are fewer opportunities to evade those taxation responsibilities.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Estimates now indicate that some $2 billion is owed to the government on an annual basis from the manufacturers' sales tax that is not collected. One of the advantages of the goods and services tax is that that will be more equitably collected in the future than it is at the present time.

In addition, as you know, as part of the change in policy from a proposed 9 per cent to a 7 per cent goods and services tax, there is an increase in the taxes which the large corporations will pay and there is also an increase in the personal income tax which higher income Canadians will pay. I think that is something which will be generally applauded by Canadians when it is understood.

In closing, I would like to speak about reduction in government expenditure because that is very much a part of the concerns which my constituents and others have been expressing. It is important to remind ourselves that this government has in fact reduced the civil service by some 12,000 positions since we came to power in 1984. It is important to remind Canadians that 16 Crown corporations have been privatized. It is important to remind Canadians that employment in those Crown corporations has been reduced by some 60,000.

While this is not necessarily popular with all, and certainly was not popular with some of the labour members in the community last night, particularly those who are employed by the federal government, as you might expect, the reduction in the size of the federal government is something which has been very much demanded by the public at large.

The cost of providing government has been substantially reduced. In fact, the civil service today is the same size as it was in 1973. There has been a very, very substantial reduction in the operating costs of this government.

In closing I want to repeat what I said earlier on in my remarks because it may be one of the most significant statements that has been made in recent months with respect to the cost of government. From 1980 to 1984 the cost of providing programs, the very basic programs on which this government and all governments have depended, rose by some 13.6 per cent. Since 1984 the cost of providing those same programs has risen by only 3.5 per cent per year, less than the annual cost of inflation and, I think, evidence of the commitment of this administration to good fiscal management.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what I could do in 10 minutes to really highlight this GST. I clear my throat in 10 minutes. Well, I am going to give it a try.

The GST has been called by the member for Mississauga South the gouge and screw tax. Others have called it the grief and suffering tax, but I want to tell you, I call it, God save the Tories, because I cannot. Only the Almighty can do that.

I have been around this House for some 13 years as an MP. I thought we had reached the apex of arrogance when we had the Liberal government in office. I thought we had the ultimate in arrogance but these Tories have gone far beyond that. They could teach Liberals a few things about arrogance, and that bothers me. That is hard to do, but I want to tell you that their arrogance is beyond anything Canadians and I have seen for a long, long time around this place.

I say that because in fact the Tory government has consistently lied to Canadians. We remember the debate in 1984 with Ed Broadbent, the member for Vancouver Quadra and the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister responded to our leader at that time by saying that the rich would pay, and that not only should the rich pay but it should be a handsome tax.

Then we have our friend, the finance minister, who made a speech in Montreal and said: "There is only one problem with Canada, we have too few rich people". Then he proceeded to create all these rich people in the succeeding budgets.

He said in the House in June, 1987: "We all know that the tax system allows many profitable corporations to avoid paying a fair share of tax year after year. We all know it allows some people with very high incomes to pay less tax than the average Canadian wage earner year after year." Now why, I ask you logically, does the government, which wants money, not go to people who have got money? Why is he going to the poor people with the GST and all the other taxes? The Canadian people do not have it.

• (2310)

I want to tell you that I hear the rumblings out there in the grassroots. They are sick and tired. If it is not the provincial government it is the municipal government, school boards, all kinds of commissions and the federal government going into their pockets constantly. The member from Souris did not have to tell us what his constituents told him last night. We saw it on television. We saw it in Technicolor on television.

It seems that this whole point is being missed. Why are 80 per cent of Canadians opposed to this tax? Never mind all of the fancy rhetoric about how we are going to be competitive. Never mind all the fancy stuff about how we are shifting from 13 per cent to 7 per cent; more is less, less is more; war is peace, peace is war; weakness is strength. Never mind all the double talk.

You can make all the logical speeches you want about this GST. You can make all of those speeches that you think are putting something across. Ordinary Canadians watching look at you and say: "We know who the defenders of the rich are in this country". They say, very logically: "Why should I pay one more new tax, one penny of new taxes, when in fact this government has not moved to make sure that those who get the most out of this economy, the most out of this country, pay their fair share of taxes?" They ask themselves that question.

When they see, for example, that Robert Campeau can go out and borrow money to go on a shopping spree and write off the interest he pays on the money he borrows against his income tax, they say: "Why should I pay more taxes?" When they see that last year it cost the government $1 billion for the three martini lunches of wealthy Canadians, why should they pay one penny of new taxes? When they see that previous governments in this country audited corporations and found hundreds of millions of dollars and, lo and behold, this government has cut back on the auditing of corporation tax returns, why should they pay one penny of tax more?

They are not fooled by all the flam-flimmery, the bamboozling and all of the other stuff that goes on over there. You can do all you want, you will never persuade them because they know you for who you are.

We have it on record. It is in Hansard. John A. Macdonald, the antecedent of these members across the way, in one of his first speeches in the House of Commons, said: "In this fine young country of ours the rich are a minority and it has always been my practice to defend the rights of the minority". I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that is a time honoured tradition among Tories. That tradition of defending the rich is still in place. After all of their tax reforms, after Mike Vader and the Evil Empire over there finish all their tax reforms, lo and behold, the dust clears and we find, in fact, the middle class and the poor are paying more in tax, percentage wise, than the rich. The rich get the breaks. They believe in a trickle down theory. Well, it does not work.

I see the member for Mississauga South. Look at the arrogance in which they view Canadians. He said in the finance committee: "What is the point of going across the country for tax hearings on this GST? Why should we go across the country and listen to a bunch of nobodies repeat the same thing over and over?"

He goes to Alberta and what does he say to them? He said he never found so much ignorance as in Alberta, that they would have to hire a whole bunch of grade five schoolteachers to teach them about the tax. The hon. member said there is a lot of ignorance in Alberta. I want that to be on the record. That is the arrogance of Tories. He is not prepared to go to Newfoundland unless he can get one first-rate brief. He judges what first rate is. He judges. They are not interested in that.

I want to tell you that when this bill goes to the committee there will be a great push by Mike Vader to push it right through in two weeks.

It hurts me when I think of how they defend their rich friends. Guess who is exempt from this GST? You will not believe this.

An hon. member: Bankers?

Mr. Rodriguez: No, not bankers. Stockbrokers, brother. And what is Mike Vader's profession? He's a stockbroker. He is exempt. I mean the race-tracks are going to be taxed but not the stockbrokers. Now, you tell me the difference between a stockbroker and a race-track tout. I do not know the difference between a stockbroker and a race-track tout.

I did not think it was possible for any government to tax sex. I thought that was the ultimate, that no government could tax sex. Well, they have done it. The Tories have done it. They are now going to tax condoms. Can you believe that? The only good thing I could see from that is that it could limit the number of Tories that we might eventually get in the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to follow the hon. member for Nickel Belt, although no one can really follow the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

I must say that it was a great, thoughtful speech, especially about housing and the tax on condos. Oh, I'm sorry, it wasn't condos.

I have only one thing to criticize in his speech and that is when he called the GST the God save the Tories tax. That is blasphemous. Not even God, not even She, could save the Tories on this one. They are going to go down to defeat.

I want to stand back a moment and have a look at some of the things that are happening in the country. Let us just look at what is happening. One-sixth of Canadians are in poverty in this country. Over one million children are poor. These are the recent statistics. Over one-half of single women are poor. There is high regional unemployment in the country, despite an economic recovery. The part-time jobs that are being created are low paying. There are plant closures in the country laying off workers. Older workers cannot get retrained and cannot get new jobs.

We are way behind the European countries in retraining. We have high and growing levels of dependency on social assistance. We have more and more food banks and line-ups. We have discrimination in wages and jobs against women, visible minorities and disabled in this country, and we have a growing homelessness in our cities. And what does this government do? It brings in a tax which is basically, as everyone knows who knows what a sales tax is as opposed to a general tax, a tax on the poor.

We have increasing poverty and the government's remedy is to bring in a tax on the poor. I saw the Minister of Finance there a moment ago. Let me say to the Minister of Finance and the House that he has a problem. We have a problem as a country because the last budget projections were for a debt of $30.5 billion. But that was based on interest rates of 10 per cent. We have had interest rates almost at 13 per cent for a year and so the government is going to have a shortfall of $5 billion.

That is another reason the government is bringing in the goods and services tax. The government of this country is broke and it has to collect more money because of its own high interest rate policies. It has had a high interest rate policy to protect the small area around Toronto, the Golden Horseshoe, from inflation, and it has penalized the rest of the country. Now it is flopping over, if you like, to the whole country.

I predict that we are going to see cut-backs in the upcoming budget. The cut-backs will be in transfers to the provinces in two ways; on education and on health care. If you are going to have a modern industrial country that really works and is up there with the leaders in a modern industrial world, you have to put money into education, good health care and retraining of workers.

The economic policies of this government, based on the GST, are really going nowhere. I ask the government to listen. This is not idle rhetoric. In my constituency of Port Moody—Coquitlam, since the Conservatives got into power, the people who have really suffered, and will suffer from this tax as well, are the family people who are making $25,000 to $40,000 a year. An average family making $25,000 a year has seen a 60 per cent increase in real terms in taxation under the Tory government.

The rich lawyers, brokers and so on, spoken of by my friend previously, who are making $125,000 a year, have seen their income taxes drop. That is scandalous in this country. People are beginning to understand that.

People say: "Well what would you in the NDP do? What is your solution?" It is all very well to criticize, because no one in this country likes this tax. Well, let me suggest what we would do. Here are some possibilities. We could cut the capital gains exemption. Why should there be a capital gains exemption for brokers and investors up to $100,000. We could do that because the average working person has to pay taxes right off the top of their cheque. They do not get capital gains exemptions. We are not talking about houses or farms, we are talking about the general exemption for making money in the market and so on. That would bring in $1.5 to $2 billion right there.

Then we could look at the interest rates. I have already said that the interest rates are going to put the projections in the budget of the finance minister $5 million out of whack. We are going to see it in two weeks in the budget that comes up. The government should be cutting interest rates by 2 per cent. If the government did that we could save $3 billion in interest payments.

Third, we should look at a corporate minimum tax. Why is it that a bank teller in this country still has to pay tax when some banks are not paying any tax and 60,000 corporations are not paying taxes? There is a tax revolt in this country. Whether you go to rural Alberta, where the Tories would not win a seat today, or to suburban British Columbia or suburban Toronto, the Tories are in trouble and there is a tax revolt.

There should be a corporate minimum tax. Reagan did it. We can do it here and the government could make another $1 billion.

Finally, there should be a wealth tax in this country. It is done in 13 of, I believe, 21 of the OECD countries, the industrialized countries. We could collect more money there.

This is an alternative to the goods and services tax and I challenge the government members to get on their feet and rebut me on these figures because here is an NDP alternative to the GST.

Let me conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I am proud of the fight that we in the NDP have put up in this House against closure, using all the legitimate legal tactics, to show the country that it is the NDP that is against this tax. Further, I have advanced a four-part alternative to the tax. So we have been very positive when we say there is an alternative.

To take that route, as the hon. member for Nickel Belt said in more colourful language than I used, you have to make a choice, you have to favour the ordinary people, the working people of this country, the families, the average and lower-income people and not the rich, which is the route the Tories have taken.

Finally, I want to add—and I wish I had more time to outline this better—there is an economic alternative to the Tories' policy of low wages which they say we need to have because we have to compete in the world. In Canada we should be looking at a high wage, high productivity, and an educated labour force. Yes, that is the real way to the future. We have to bring capital and labour together.

This will be the NDP's future economic alternate policy. We have advanced an alternative to the GST. We have advanced a new economic policy. I say to the Conservatives that the country is listening to this because it is fed up with the Conservative government, it is fed up with this unfair tax, it is not going to be gouged and screwed any more.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I believe that Canadians want a government that can provide sound economic management, a government that understands economics, a government that is going to bring this country in the direction of growth, economic development and competitiveness and is going to increase the number of job opportunities that are meaningful and substantial for Canadians.

Canadians want facts, not flights of fancy such as we have heard from my friends on the other side. They want reality, not mythology. They want the truth. They do not want to be misled and misconceived as has been done, not only with this much maligned bill but indeed on previous occasions.

I am proud to stand in my place today and support Bill C-62 which is a very important piece in a sound economic program that this government has brought in over the course of the last five years which is going to lead and prepare Canada for a competitive place in the international economy of the 1990s and indeed in the next century.

Let us talk about what the GST is, not what it is not. The GST is a consumption tax. It is one of a balanced program of taxation. Consumption taxes are not new in Canada. We have had a manufacturers' sales tax, a hidden federal sales tax, since 1924. Consumption taxes are an important element. They have an element of fairness, or they should have an element of fairness. One of the things that this bill and this new proposal is going to do is put together a fair form of consumption tax.

In 1924 people bought a lot of manufacturers' goods and the tax was applied. Since then we have had a plethora of exemptions here, there and everywhere else. A lot of Canadians choose to spend their dollars, not so much on buying goods but on services. Why should the people who prefer to spend their money on goods be penalized to the benefit of people who prefer to spend their money on services? The idea is to have fair taxation and surely all members of this House support the concept of fair taxation.

What we have here is not a new tax. We have a replacement tax, an updated tax, a tax which exists in 48 other industrialized countries of the world and in most of them at a considerably higher rate than the 7 per cent rate that is being opposed here. Take a look at 27 per cent in Sweden, 18 per cent in the United Kingdom, 19 per cent in Belgium. These people over here would try to mislead Canadians into thinking that they will be destroyed by a 7 per cent sales tax applied fairly across the board.

When I hear suggestions that poor people and low-income Canadians are going to be disadvantaged, I cannot help but remember the free trade debate and the terrorization of senior citizens that went on by some people on the other side. It was an attempt to mislead Canadians into misunderstanding the sound management that this government has brought this country.

Some friends opposite talk about polls. The only poll that counts, I remind them, is the one on election day and Canadians elected this government for the second straight time with a historic back-to-back majority because of sound management of the Canadian economy, and they will continue to do so.

Why the GST? Why is the GST important to Canada? It is important to Canada because competitiveness is important to Canada. As Canadians we want our economy to grow. A growing economy means more wealth for Canadians.

My friends in the NDP seem to be against people being wealthy. They seem to think they are the only ones who speak for low-income Canadians. It is this government that is protecting low-income Canadians. Most of my constituents could be described as low-income Canadians. They are Atlantic Canadians. Atlantic Canadians will benefit from the GST and they will benefit from the credit that comes from the GST.

Why do my friends opposite not remind the people that nobody below the income rate of $30,000 is going to pay more with the GST? They are going to pay less. They are going to be the winners under this GST. It is a fair form of taxation that is going to do that. Why do they not mention that? Why are they against the growth of the Canadian economy? Why do they oppose the idea that Canadian goods should be more competitive both in our own markets here and abroad by the establishment of a tax system that removes the disadvantage that exists against Canadian goods, by having an across the board system, by not putting a manufacturers' sales tax on goods that are being exported thereby making our own goods more competitive? Why are they against debt reduction?

The Minister of Finance pointed out that this would be a revenue neutral tax as it will be on the present basis, but it will in fact accrue additional revenues because the Canadian economy is going to grow. When we have growth we have more development, more wealth, and consequently more people pay more taxes and the revenue side of government benefits. That is the way it should be.

Why do my friends opposite oppose another advantage of this tax, that we should have a visible as opposed to an invisible tax? They are trying to hide from Canadians the fact that the 13 per cent manufacturers' sales tax is going to come off. Why are they not talking about that? It is going to be replaced by a 7 per cent tax across the board. We believe that taxes should be up front so the people can see them. We do not hide from what we are doing, because we know what we are doing is in fact a good thing.

There are special groups within the economy of our province in Nova Scotia that are going to benefit from this tax. Farmers and fishermen in particular are going to be winners because they are going to have an opportunity to participate in decisions. Their products are going to be exempted from this tax. As a general rule most businesses will pay GST on goods and services they buy and charge GST on their sales. The difference between the two, tax charge minus tax paid, will be remitted to the government. If the business has paid out more tax than it collects, the government will refund the difference.

However, most sales by farmers and fishermen will be zero rated under the GST. This means they do not charge any tax on their sales, but they can still claim the refunds for all GST paid on the goods and services bought for their business. They will receive their refund within 21 days of filing. That is going to be a very good deal for fishermen. I have 7,500 people in the South Shore dependent upon the fishing industry. They are going to be winners under the GST. I have a significant number of farmers. They are going to be winners under the GST.

Yet, my friends opposite are against it. Small business people are going to be winners under the GST because of the increased tax flow benefits. They are going to get the benefit of input credits as well. The suggestion across the land is that this is going to be complicated is criminal and shameful. We already collect sales taxes in this country.

People are saying that certain kinds of industries will be destroyed. There is a lot of concern in the hospitality industry. I remember when the province of Nova Scotia levied a sales tax on restaurants and other hospitality industries not so long ago. There was doom and gloom, and there was going to be the destruction of the industry. It has not happened. The industries are booming as never before in Nova Scotia, and so it should be. The increased competitiveness of the Canadian economy will assist us with this tax and will assist our hospitality industries as well.

There will be some adjustment, there is no question. Whenever we have change there is adjustment. The question is: Do Canadians want a government that has the courage to meet the change, or do they want a government that hides in the sand, dreams up fairy tales and ignores the reality of economics and growth in an international and evolving world? The GST is part of a package that will assist Canada to move out into the world and to take its rightful place among the leading nations of the world. That is the way it should be.

The GST quite clearly is going to be good for Canada. It is going to be good for Nova Scotians. It is going to take a little time because there are so many misconceptions out there. However Canadians are finding out the truth and, when they find out the truth, they will talk to my friend from Nickel Belt who was speaking earlier and talking about who lies to whom.

When Canadians find out the truth, the results of that will be not that we need a God save the Tory tax but that we need a God save the NDP and the Liberal tax. Once again, after the truth has sunk in and people understand what it is, the result is going to be that Canadians will do in the next election exactly what they have done in the last two elections: They will recognize good government when they have got it. We will see Canadians glad that they have a government that has sound management. Indeed, we will see the return of this government, this Prime Minister and hopefully this Minister of Finance for a long time in this country.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak this evening in the Bill C-62 debate.

What are we talking about tonight but a vision of Canada, whether we go back to Sir John A. Macdonald, to Confederation, to John Diefenbaker and Roads to Resources or to our Prime Minister today and free trade, Meech Lake or goods and services.

That is why in 1982 I decided to run for this party. The leadership of the Conservative Party of Canada has always had a vision and a direction: to help Canada grow and prosper. The goods and services tax is just another example of the vision and the boldness that make great leaders and a strong Canada.

I would like to vary my comments a bit before getting into the goods and services and talk a bit about northern Ontario, about the facts, the concerns and the good things that this government has done for northern Ontario in the last number of years.

Let us look at the FEDNOR Program by which we have contributed over 1,300 jobs to northern Ontario or at Community Futures, a couple of projects which I feel indicate that northern Ontario is finally being recognized by this government in Ottawa. Previous governments never did that.

Let us look at a manufacturing plant which is going into North Bay. It will distribute toilet facilities across Canada and the United States. It was to go to Kentucky but instead is going to northern Ontario.

Let us look at a new science research centre that is going into Sudbury. It will be the only one in the world. Where will it be placed? It will be in northern Ontario.

The list goes on, but with only 10 minutes I would like to deal with the subjects that we are talking about tonight.

Yes, there are problems in northern Ontario. They have nothing to do with the free trade agreement or the goods and services tax. Whether we are dealing with world prices, low grade ore or depleted resources, no government can control them.

The approach that we are taking makes common sense. There is a common misconception out there about the goods and services tax. I wish the opposition would sit down one time and do what should be done for Canadians: give them the opportunity to understand what this is all about. The security and the future of Canada are based on this.

The goods and services tax can continue to pay for the programs and services that Canadians value. We heard prior to the last election that if we signed the free trade agreement the Canada pension, old age pension, baby bonus, health care, and education would all be gone as of January 1, 1989. The same tactics are being used again with the goods and services tax.

We know what happened when we signed the agreement. We still have the Canada pension. We still have the baby bonus and we still have health care. We can still have those programs after the goods and services tax.

The essential part is that the old hidden 13.5 per cent tax was difficult to collect and unreliable. As someone who has worked in an industry that had to compete on the basis of imported goods coming into Canada, let me tell you, sir, that the old system has to go. For the manufacturers in Canada to compete both in the country and internationally we have to go to this new tax system.

Mr. Speaker, you would almost think with the speeches you have heard here in the last number of days that this was the only country doing this. There are 48 other countries are doing it. In fact earlier tonight I had the opportunity to meet a couple from New Zealand who said to me that what this government was doing was certainly correct.

We have to change from an old, outdated tax system to a new, aggressive system that is going to enable Canadians to have a bright future. In all regions and sectors of this country the economy will benefit from this over the next decade. The output will expand by an additional 1.4 per cent or $9 billion into the economy.

The refundable goods and service tax credits will be paid four times a year to 8.7 million families. The first payment will be done in December of this year. Families who earn $30,000 a year will be paying less taxes after this is put into place.

The basic groceries, prescription drugs, residential rents, existing housing or child care will not be taxed. The price of manufactured products is going to be reduced. The very small business with sales under $30,000 a year can opt out of the GST and will not have to charge tax.

Restricted government spending will enable us to reduce it from 9 per cent to 7 per cent, by $700 million, to get this lower rate. To maintain our commitment to protect the lower and modest income families, we have done that. The days of less taxes after GST are now here.

In closing, we are not walking into the future with a blindfold on. We have policies and directions. We are making tough decisions. We are not seeing our initiatives through today. We are not looking for votes and headlines for today. What we are looking at is building a future for Canadians, a future for tomorrow, a future for our children, our grandchildren and our great-grandchildren.

I am so proud to stand here tonight with my colleagues, the finance minister and the Prime Minister, to take our country forward out of the red ink that has destroyed this country, that has not enabled us the opportunity to build on our strengths because of the huge debt, and to be able to look at another leg to ensure that in the future Canadians have the opportunities that a great number of us have had over the last 40 years.

We can no longer stay with what was good today and yesterday. Those are policies from across the way. This Conservative government and this Prime Minister have a vision of Canadians. The goods and services tax is a step forward, a step to enable Canadians to have the opportunity for new jobs and new direction.

I am committed, as is everyone on this side, to ensure that there is a bright future for each and every one of us. That future is there for northern Ontario, whether it is with the goods and services tax, free trade or any of the other programs this government is going to bring forward. We are going to ensure that there is a bright future for Canadians.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow on the heels of a couple of members on the government side in order to bring them back down to earth to face the reality of what some parts of the country will be going through and is going through now.

It seems that the government has not to date paid any notice to the fact that one-third of Canada is going to be heavily affected, and in this case I mean the north. The government has chosen to ignore it because the population does not warrant any notice of being given a chance to air their grievance on the issue of the goods and services tax.

We have been hit quite hard over the last number of years. First, in the case of aboriginal people in Canada there was the case of capping of the post-secondary funding on education. Recently the northern air mail service was raised on the average by about 27 per cent. The NWT financing formula has been cut back by $110 million over the next five years, but in the previous year for all the Inuit organizations funding was cut by 15 per cent across the board. We are not doing very well in the north as aboriginal people.

Right now, because of the northern air mail service increases, as I mentioned some time ago, one dozen eggs are going to cost $4.20 and one litre of milk is going to cost $4.50 on the average. That is probably on the low side, because that is taken from one community. Now the government wants to add 7 per cent to either the transportation, the packaging or the service of that already high cost of the dozen eggs, the litre of milk or any other essential goods.

From reading the papers I understand that the government is prepared to spend $14.5 million to advertise the benefits of the goods and services tax. If the goods and services tax is such a great benefit to Canadians as a whole, why does it need to spend $14.5 million to advertise it? Why do we have to take $14.5 million of taxpayers' money and spend it on advertising? Frankly, if I may be so bold, I think the Conservatives should spend that and $14.5 million per year extra on the north and on aboriginal people. I think we could put it to much better use than advertising in the newspapers, on radio and on television.

The government seems to have this attitude: "Yes, we are all concerned about what is happening around the world. We are concerned about what is happening in central Canada. We are concerned about other things". But, the population in my area or my backyard does not warrant notice. My backyard can remain there for some time to come because, after all, there are only 55,000 people in the north.

The residents of the north cannot afford a 7 per cent goods and services tax because our cost of living is already the highest in the country. According to the calculation of the Government of the Northwest Territories prices for goods and services, excluding shelter, average 44 per cent higher in the north than in southern Canada.

Prices in Yellowknife are on average 33 per cent higher than in Edmonton. In October last year, when I asked the Minister of Finance whether they had done a study to determine the effect of the goods and services tax on the north, he said yes, they had to get it all together. I think they were doing the pull the rabbit out of the hat trick. I do not think there was anything there because this was some time in early October, and I still have not received the study I was promised by the minister.

• (2350)

I would like to invite any member who does not believe that our cost of living is as high as I and members of our caucus have been saying to come to Pelly Bay, Yellowknife, Ikhaluit, Coppermine, Cambridge Bay, or Rankin Inlet. They could see for themselves what the cost of living is in the north. The power supply will be taxed and the heating fuel which we really need because of the extreme cold will be taxed. All services will be taxed. Transporting of goods will be taxed. It will be much harder for people on fixed incomes to afford nutritional food, warm clothing, the necessary fuel to heat their homes, or the power by which to light them.

The tax credit that is supposed to help will not help as much in the north as it might in the south because the cost of food and other goods is already much higher. Also, there is a cap on the tax credit. Basically it will not do that much good.

In the government's technical paper on the GST released last August the north is not even mentioned. It is excluded, omitted or ignored. That has been the characteristic attitude of this government ever since it came to power in 1984. Even when it had two members representing the north, the north never received any notice.

What we are asking is that the north now be given some consideration because it has not had any to date. All the Conservatives have been doing for the last five years is taking away from the north rather than giving. They are worried about sovereignty. We are the people who live in the north. We are the people who create the environmental sovereignty in the circumpolar part of Canada.

I ask the government to give us a chance to prove why we need consideration on the issue of the goods and services tax.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I would ask unanimous consent of the House that as a courtesy to the pages who I know study hard and work hard and are kept here inordinate hours we agree that they should go home and hit the books or hit the bunks.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Schneider): Thank you pages. Good night. You have done good service. See you again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise here tonight to speak in the closing hour of the debate on the goods and services tax. It is almost midnight. This debate will end at one o'clock in the morning.

I am speaking on behalf of the constituents of my riding of Lambton—Middlesex. We are going to be deprived of input into the debate on this major piece of legislation because we are now down to 10-minute speeches. For what I have to say tonight, we should have three times that available to us.

We have had 31 tax increases since this government took office in 1984. I have talked to scores of people across my riding who have attempted to understand this tax and how it will affect them.

People who have read the government's information on the tax and who have logged in calls to the GST hotline reached the same conclusion, that this tax is going to be impossible to work with. Some people who came here from Europe, for example, tell me that this is going to eventually lead to a black market economy which is going to be very difficult to police.

Many of our people are very confused about what is going to happen and how they can possibly administer this tax. I will have to refer to the testimony from the Federation of Canadian Municipalities on the taxation of chlorine, for example, for municipal swimming pools. Just how complex this tax is was reflected in the testimony of Mr. Michael Facey of Calgary who pointed out that there are four different situations: tax-exempt, fully taxed, certain tax-free ones, and others where the tax is going to depend on the ages of the recipients or the service.

If you look at a swimming pool as an example, we have to determine what portion of the repair and chlorine put in that swimming pool is tax-free because the swimming pool is used by children, and what portion is tax exempt because it is used by adults. It will be a bizarre and complex situation.

This is the level of complexity the minister is bringing into the tax system in Canada with the GST. Realistically, how many small municipal pools, community arenas and sports complexes are going to be able to file for tax rebates when faced with such complexity?

All service clubs which are not dependent on government for 40 per cent of their funding and which provide so many services in their communities will be discriminated against by this GST. Groups which provide funding for the blind, the mentally handicapped, for seniors, youth, amateur sports, women's shelters, an endless list of services contribute to Canadian society and they are being ignored by this government.

These organizations will have to charge and collect tax on many of the goods they sell and on the service they offer. Service clubs which pride themselves on their ability to wear many hats now have one hat they should not have to wear. That is the hat of a tax collector.

Although the minister lowered the threshold for the 50 per cent GST rebate to 40 per cent, he certainly missed the point, which is that the government is penalizing volunteer organizations that are not looking for government handouts to operate. The situation is ridiculous.

Volunteer organizations such as our minor community ball, hockey and soccer should be praised and encouraged, and not penalized for not requiring high levels of government spending.

If the minister really wants to cut the debt with the GST, encouraging groups to seek more government funding, it certainly is a strange way to do so.

Murray Costello, the president of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association, informed the finance committee that they had never received more than 22 per cent of its annual revenues from government subsidies. Sadly, the only real option for many service clubs may be to limit their success in an attempt to meet the small traders clause of $30,000. Of course, they are then not eligible to claim input rebates. As well, the negative impacts on the communities they serve will be enormous.

As KIN points out, their average club earns in excess of $100,000 a year. Limiting that to $30,000 is no recipe for success.

Just recently the Royal Canadian Legion, Branch 216 in Petrolia, donated a substantial sum to the Petrolia Community Track and Field, raised from its casino night. Under the GST, that would have been heavily taxed. For example, casino games will be taxed per bet at 7 per cent. Bingo cards will be taxed at 7 per cent per card, unless the bingo is operated in a volunteer way and held in a place not used to hold bingos for profit. This is unconscionable.

• (0000)

Finally, a decline in services performed by these organizations will lead to increased expenses for future governments, as they attempt to deal with the neglect this will create. We have already seen the federal government cut back on services it provides for those less fortunate members of Canadian society. There has been a reduction in unemployment insurance, a decline in pension levels through deindexing and the claw back of seniors' pensions and baby bonuses, as well as a failure to provide sufficient day care services for thousands of Canadian children. This is a national disgrace.

In some of these cases service clubs and charities are now picking up the tab, a tab that the government wants to tax with this GST, a tab, which if the government had to pay, as it rightfully should, would then be tax exempt. By foisting this responsibility off onto others, the government can now, it claims, balance its budget.

This is not the only area where similar groups are treated differently under the GST. Listen, for example, to a letter from a constituent of mine, a realty agent who asks: "Why is the federal government's GST proposing to tax my real estate commission and those earnings, although not those of my commissioned counterparts for example, insurance agents and stock brokers." This is favouring one group over another, treating similar groups differently.

Look at the treatment of veterinarians, who are indeed animal health care practitioners. Consider the treatment of the inputs for agriculture under the GST in this light. Feed for cattle will be a rebated tax input. Medicine for the same cattle, on the same farm, will not be tax rebatable. It just makes no sense.

The Ontario Society of Veterinarians argues, correctly, that the lack of exemptions for veterinarians may lead to increased economic hardship and may force farmers and pet owners to decide not to treat their animals. This decision will be based solely on economics and will have inhumane consequences for those animals. Animals that could be healed will be killed because treatment is unaffordable.

It should also be noted that veterinarians make significant contributions to human health by assisting in the control of diseases, making contributions to ensure safe food for Canadians, and many other related things. They should receive the exemptions granted to other health care professionals.

Agriculture, in general, will suffer under the GST. John Bulloch of the Federation of Independent Business told the annual meeting of western Canadian wheat growers on January 6 that the implications to agriculture are staggering. Bulloch also contends that the GST will be an administrative nightmare for farmers. He told the meeting that farmers will be forced to chase down every seed invoice to prove to Ottawa the amount of GST paid on purchases.

As a western Canadian wheat grower stated in a letter: "Our initial analysis indicates the tax will significantly reduce farming operation margins". The western Canadian wheat growers indicate, among other difficulties, the cash flow problems that will be created for their members by the taxation of elevator tariffs and other taxes.

With a forecast decline of 101 per cent in farm income in Saskatchewan this year, this is one more nail in the coffin.

The Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board wrote to the Minister of Finance on January 23 to protest the pressure the GST will place on its pricing mechanism by including cookies and biscuits as taxable food. It warned that Canadian wheat producers must not be forced to fire-sale their wheat to domestic producers and manufacturers of wheat-based food products in order for the manufacturing industry to overcome unjustified taxes, in addition to subsidized imports of wheat products based from the United States.

This is but one effect that agriculture will have to deal with due to the effects of the GST on the economy.

Prairie Pools have recommended that from the start—and continue into the 1990 position paper—to reduce cash flow costs, administrative costs for farmers, that all farm production inputs be zero rated at the time of purchase. To date, the government only states that there will be a list issued of some inputs which will be zero rated. Of course, like all other half-way measures the government introduces to save what is a fatally flawed idea, this one only serves to add further complexity to the GST.

I have to ask this. Why cannot all Canadian farmers be given a tax-exempt number and simply sign the invoice and include that number? This would be much simpler and would save a mountain of paperwork for everyone.

The race track industry is certainly hard hit and may be wiped out, according to testimony provided at the committee hearings. The removal of the current federal levy still leaves $5 million to be absorbed by the industry or to be passed on to the public. As some members may know, an increase in the tax betting severely decreases the number of times a dollar is bet which severely threatens the profitability of the race track industry.

I would like to conclude very quickly. The Minister of Finance has insisted that the GST will be revenue neutral, but he also insists that it is an important tool in debt reduction. Clearly, it cannot be both.

He insists that this tax will be good for Canada, but fails to mention the mountain of paperwork that will be created for all businesses and the increases in the cost to the Canadian people.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak this evening to Bill C-62, and I do so now because in the course of the debate I heard many comments which I feel are misleading and give the Canadian public a distorted picture of the bill before the House this evening.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-62 is to replace a tax that has become obsolete, a tax that is hidden, regressive, and has not kept pace with the needs of Canada's economy. The present federal sales tax puts Canadian businesses in a position that makes it difficult for them to compete with goods manufactured in other countries and imported to this country.

[English]

I have also heard comments from members across the way talking about the negative effect that the GST is supposed to have on the fishermen. I would like to address specifically that issue because a great majority of the people in my riding of Manicouagan are making a living from fishing. They are fishermen. I would like, tonight, to explain to the House and to them what the GST will mean to them and to their business.

Under the current federal sales tax system many goods used by fishermen are already tax exempt. However, other things used by them to conduct their daily activity and to make a living are taxed, generally at the rate of 13.5 per cent. These include small vehicles such as pick-up trucks, tools and many repair parts, construction material and other types of equipment and fuel for highway use.

Even the goods that are specifically exempt under the current system contain a significant element of hidden tax included in their price. This happened because the manufacturers and the distributors of such products pay sales tax on many things they buy to run their businesses. These costs are passed on to the fishermen.

The GST has been designed so that the fishermen will get back all the sales tax they pay. The result for them will be real savings in their operating costs.

As a general rule most businesses will pay GST on the goods and services they buy and charge GST on their sales. The difference between the two will be remitted to the government. If the business has paid out more tax than it collects, the government will refund the difference.

However, most sales by the fishermen will be zero rated under the GST system. This means they will not charge any tax on their sales but will still claim refunds for all GST paid on the goods and services bought for their business. They will be sent a refund within 21 days of filing their return or the government will pay interest to them.

Since the fishermen will usually receive refunds, many will prefer to file their GST return on a monthly basis for a quick recovery of the sales tax they have paid. However, if their annual revenue does not exceed $500,000 they can choose to file one annual return and pay in quarterly instalments if this is more convenient to them.

• (0010)

If they have a large fishery operation, they can file on a monthly or quarterly basis. The government is also developing a list of selected major items that will be unconditionally tax free. These items will be tax free and the list will include commercial fishing boats as a matter of fact. The list is being developed with representatives of the affected sector.

Fishermen will also receive the rebate on the federal sales tax which they pay on their fuel. Under the GST they will recover all the GST paid on fuel purchased for their business. Unlike the current system, the rebate will apply for fuel used both on and off highway use, as long as it is used for their business purposes.

The government has three good reasons to implement the GST and get rid of the actual sales tax.

[Translation]

First, the GST will help reduce the debt; second, the GST tax credit will make the tax system fairer to low-and middle-income taxpayers; and third, the GST will make the Canadian economy more competitive.

This evening, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes to talk about the impact of the GST on jobs and the economy. The tax we have now is making us lose jobs by increasing the cost of our exports and giving preferential tax treatment to imports.

Under the present system, goods produced in Canada, Mr. Speaker, are taxed when they are sold by the manufacturer, whereas imports are taxed when they cross the border. This means that imports are taxed before the costs of advertising, distribution, transportation and the importer's overhead and profit are added. However, goods made in Canada are taxed after all these costs have been included in the price.

Let us take the example of two bicycles, Mr. Speaker, one made in the United States and the other made in Canada. If it costs the Canadian manufacturer $500 to make a bicycle, he must pay advertising, transportation, handling and overhead and think of his profit. Therefore he sells the bike for $750. The 13.5 per cent tax on it amounts to $101.30.

If the same bike is made in the United States, the selling price probably does not include all these costs that are added after the bike is taxed. Thus the importer only pays 13.5 per cent on $500, the cost of making the bike, or $67.50. This means that the tax makes the Canadian bike cost $33.75 more than the American one. That is a good example of how Canadian products are penalized compared to imports.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is most important that the debate end as soon as possible and that the House pass Bill C-62 so that we can implement it and Canadians can benefit from it as quickly as possible, so that our economy can benefit and so that we can create jobs, Mr. Speaker, and reduce unemployment in Canada.

[English]

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, tonight I want to highlight Canada's prosperity and security. Economic strength and political stability give Canada the tools to go into the 21st century and compete with anyone.

National priorities are essential to our progress, our well-being and our future. We are a remarkable country and we must approach the challenges with confidence, understanding and have goals. We must have a vision for the future, a vision for our children. We must make decisions, difficult decisions that move us forward.

Our industrial productivity and economic future depend upon our competitiveness. This country is a trading nation. We take in $30 billion a year in revenue from trade. We have to remove the obstacles, get in there and compete. We must compete better because trade is what makes Canada tick.

This government has a vision. Look at what has been accomplished over the last five years. When we came to office in September, 1984, unemployment was 12 per cent and inflation was 8.5 per cent. We had just come through a devastating period of high interest rates which were at 20 per cent to 24 per cent. We inherited a debt of $38.3 billion and a $200 billion national debt.

In terms of competitiveness we were No. 11 in the world. Capital was flowing out of this country and business confidence was at an all-time low.

This government had a vision, an economic plan to revitalize our nation's economy, and we have succeeded. In five years we have the best job-creation record in the world—1.5 million new jobs, and 85 per cent of them are full-time employment.

We have cut inflation. Our competitive position has moved from eleventh to fourth. Japan is first. Switzerland is second. The U.S. is third, and we are fourth. We are second only to Japan for increased economic growth in the world; and our economy has grown 20 per cent in real terms. We have the best investment climate in the OECD.

Our farm bankruptcies are down 41 per cent. The debt is down by $9 billion. The public service has been downsized by 12,000. The cost of operating the government is down by 10 per cent, but 20 per cent if you take inflation into consideration. We have privatized 18 Crown corporations, implemented the biggest trade deal ever, the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. We have scrapped FIRA, scrapped the National Energy Program, got rid of the PGRT, deregulated energy, deregulated transportation, and brought in a new National Transportation Act that removed freight rate discrimination once and for all for western Canada.

We have set up regional development agencies, western diversification in Alberta where westerners make the decisions for westerners. We set up the eastern one in Moncton. We set up a western procurement fund of $600 million.

Those are just to name a few things that we have done in five short years.

During that time we faced problems. We assisted the farmers. We poured about $12 billion into Canadian agriculture when our farmers were caught in the crossfire of a price war on subsidies and a disastrous drought situation.

Energy prices fell in 1986 and we implemented a $1.2 billion petroleum program.

We faced two bankruptcies that cost us $1 billion, not because we set out to bail out the banks. We set out to save the investors, pension funds, credit unions, teachers' funds and municipalities.

We inherited a $200 billion debt. We did not create it, and we have not added one nickel to it. What has been added are interest costs, the cost of servicing the debt. We cut program expenditures from 15 per cent per year from 1980 to 1984 to 3.6 per cent per year.

We have made a $25 billion turnaround in five years, and that is through 70 per cent cuts and curtailments and a 30 per cent increase in revenues. If we had not acted at all the national debt would be $25 billion higher today than it was in September, 1984.

We have come a long way and now we face the biggest challenge. That challenge is competition, Europe 1992, the Pacific Rim, the U.S. and the world. We are only as healthy as the goods and services we produce and we sell. We have to become more competitive, both domestically and globally. We must maintain and improve our position in trade.

The present federal sales tax is archaic, obsolete and out of step with the world. Since 1942 there have been 10 known governmental and committee reports, commissions and special studies, all recommending that the manufacturers' sales tax is detrimental to Canada and it has to go.

We did not dream this up. No, sir, we did not dream it up on the spur of the moment. For three years we have had indepth studies under way. We have had talks with the provincial governments. I will tell you that we have waited long enough.

• (0020)

It is right for Canada. If we want to maintain our standard of living, there is only one way to go, and that is to change this obsolete tax. We are the only country in the world to have a manufacturing sales tax while 48 of our trading partners have implemented a type of consumption tax. That is the way we will go.

The old tax is hopeless to administer. It is complicated. There are six different rates and 22,000 different rulings. It is a drag on the community. It is applied to business inputs, the materials, parts and supplies that are used in the manufacturing process. It makes it tougher for Canadian exporters to sell in foreign markets, and it allows imported goods to be taxed one-third less than domestic goods.

We lose $9 billion a year because we cannot compete with this tax, and we lose $2 billion a year due to avoidance and even evasion. That is an $11 billion loss a year.

The GST is a replacement tax and it is going to contribute to debt reduction. It is going to ensure Canada's competitiveness. It is going to improve the over-all fairness of the tax system. There will be one rate which is 7 per cent on all goods and services with the exception of approximately 15 areas where we will have exemptions or zero-rated items such as basic food and health care.

There are going to be refundable tax credits so that lower-income Canadians earning under $30,000 a year will pay less after tax than they do now. These credits will be paid four times a year and will be based on last year's income tax return.

All the tax on business purchases, the input costs for business, are going to be refunded and credited back within 21 days. There will not be a hold up on inventory. Therefore the cost of doing business is going to drop.

There is another special arrangement. Small businesses with gross annual sales of $30,000 or under can opt out of this system.

I would like to emphasize that we are not implementing this tax because we want to. We are doing it because it is right for the country. It is part of our vision. We have to become more competitive.

This is a reliable tax system to pay for the social, environmental and educational programs that Canadians want. It is our challenge and after 30 or 40 years of being told to change it we are now acting and changing it.

In combination with this move major expenditure cuts are mandatory. Deficit reduction goes hand in hand with an effective tax policy. This GST is a predictable source of revenue. It will play a crucial role in our long-term battle to bring down that debt. It is necessary.

In over five years we have moved the country forward and brought the debt down. In 1993 and 1994 the government will no longer have to borrow outside the government and will start to bring down the national debt.

I know Canadians have expressed some dislike for this measure, but I can assure you that we have to have a vision. It will protect our senior citizens. They are the ones who built the country. It will educate our youth. They will be our next leaders. It will train our workers. We will be more competitive.

It is a major and tough change. We were not sent here to do the easy things. We were sent here to do the tough things. You bet.

Not everyone understands the tax. How could they when members opposite are proceeding to fill the constituents of Canada full of inaccuracies? I will tell you that nothing in this world is stagnant. We always have to be willing to look ahead, make the changes that are necessary for this country so we can move on and be in a much better financial position.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, with all those great advantages that this new tax is going to pour on the Canadian people, why would the government try to stifle the debate? It should carry it on for a few more weeks and get all those good relationships built up with the Canadian public and see if it can convert that 75 per cent or 80 per cent of the people who do not agree.

I am pleased to have this opportunity, even at the late hour, to relate for a few minutes some of the adverse affects that this proposed GST will have on ordinary Canadians—not highly paid executives necessarily, not highly paid professionals, but ordinary Canadians who do their day's work, work their shifts and go home to their families. Maybe they trade in their car every once in a while. If they do, they probably cannot afford a new car. They can afford a used car but there is still going to be a tax on used cars. The statistics will tell you that most Canadians cannot afford new cars so it is going to hit the car trade very, very seriously.

Seniors who have left the labour force cannot easily compensate for these required increases in everyday expenses. They have no way of making up the shortfall. The argument that they will receive rebates to make up for the added costs sounds good and very simple, but are those rebates going to be tied to the cost of living? I do not see any mention that they are. If it is $190 this year, how much is it going to be next year and the year after that and the year after that?

To take the manufacturers' sales tax of 13.5 per cent off big ticket items such as cars, refrigerators, boats and things that seniors rarely, if ever, buy because of their state in life and to impose a 7 per cent tax on practically every necessity in their life is hardly a fair switch. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, seniors across Canada know that it is not a fair switch and they have great memories. They will have great memories of this at election time.

Remember too that the 7 per cent tax will not stay at 7 per cent. My friends are awfully good at saying all the other countries have had this tax and it is working fine. You know what happened in New Zealand. You know what happened in Britain. Did you see what happened to it in Holland where it went from 12 per cent to 20 percent? No questions asked, it will not stay at 7 per cent. Everybody who is honest and sits across on the other side in the peanut gallery tonight should certainly admit that. Remember too that the peanut gallery will find there will be a tax on peanuts at the same time.

Some businesses were less than honest during the transition to the metric measures a few years ago. Prices were hiked by considerably more than the proportionate change in the weights and the measures and the units. What is there to assure Canadians that that will not happen again? Anyone in their right mind would know that the entrepreneur who is anxious and eager to make a buck will have no hesitation whatsoever in leaving the 13.5 per cent where it was and putting the 7 per cent on top of it. I can tell you that ordinary Canadians are smart enough to know that that is going to happen. They are smart enough to know who imposed that on them. They also have long memories.

All the promised tax rebates for the very minimum wage earners will mean fewer dollars to put into their pockets. Most ordinary Canadians realize that. That adds up to less disposable income, amounting to greater wage demands from the unions, and who could blame them for that? That is an up and coming thing and every sensible thinking Canadian knows that.

The tax, members opposite say, will not apply to existing housing. That is a bit deceptive. All the services involved in acquiring a new house, such as the realtor's fees, the lawyer's fees, the surveyor's fees, all taxes and costs associated with buying a new house will be taxed. For the person who has that kind of equity in the home, do you not think when the house is sold that the price of the house will have to go up? He has to get his equity back out of it. To say that there is no tax on existing houses is not being quite honest. It is a bit deceptive, and Canadians are too smart for that.

• (0030)

The tax will also be reflected on the cost of rental units, even with the controlled rent mechanism we have in Ontario. One can work outside rent controls in Ontario, if there is proof that costs have been expended. For example, if a new foundation or a new roof has been put on the building, tax is going to be added to the cost of those measures, and it will be reflected in the rents charged. Many people renting in this country who have the idea that they are going to escape this GST at 7 per cent will get a rude awakening when they get the next adjustment in their rent control.

I want to come back to the effect this tax will have on economic growth and employment opportunities for ordinary Canadians. Because it is a tax on services, job losses are predicted to hit the service sector hardest because the service sector is more labour intensive.

The Rideau Lake–Thousand Islands region of my riding has towns and villages in which tourism is the biggest single industry, towns such as Gananoque, Prescott and Westport. Now the government will say the GST will not affect the tourist trade. The American tourist, on whom a great deal of the industry depends, will be looking to spending tourist dollars elsewhere. He is going to avoid Canada. There is no question about that.

A recent article in the Ottawa Citizen was entitled "GST Big Trouble for Tourism Industry". It went on to say: "More and more Canadians are travelling south of the border, rather than shopping in their own back yard. Last year, 1989, there were 18 million visits to New York state by Canadians, up from 16.5 million the previous year."

A spokesman for the state of New York department of tourism states that those figures of 16.5 up to 18 million will only increase by the time the value added tax is introduced in Canada. He went on to say: "Anything that makes us look more affordable simply enhances an already strong attraction for Canadians to come and shop in the United States".

If you live in a border town these days, as I do, you would realize the attraction is already there to go to the States to shop. This is going to really make the attraction that much more beneficial for shopkeepers in the U.S., and the trend will continue.

The Conference Board of Canada estimates that the tourism industry in this country will suffer $1 billion a year loss when this tax grab starts to its full extent. It will affect the tours operators, the tourist industry, the airlines, and car rental firms as well. That is a direct quote from the Tourist Industry of Canada. It is not from the Tories. This one is accurate.

By passing the cost of this tax on to the tourist, we are saying to the Americans, the Europeans and the Japanese: "Why don't you stay home. We don't need your business in Canada". This is making it almost impossible to attract tourists, and I can tell you that the nuisance factor in applying for those rebates when they get back home is not going to be enough to compensate and make up for the difference.

The president of the Tourism Industry Association of Canada, John Lawson, recently stated: "It's the Canadian who will be looking to vacation elsewhere that concerns us". The Conference Board of Canada's predictions about slower economic growth in jobs was based on the most optimistic conditions. They assumed, for example, that wages will not increase in 1991. That is a big assumption. They assumed that the Bank of Canada will not raise its interest rates. There is no guarantee of that at all. Perhaps the biggest assumption is that businesses will remove the 13.5 manufacturers' sales tax before they add the 7 per cent. I can tell you that that is a big assumption. If any of these assumptions are wrong, the effects on the economy are going to be even worse than the already gloomy Conference Board of Canada's predictions. It is terrible. The Canadian people have spoken out against this tax grab wherever the committee had its hearings, young people, old people, people with young families, and people with families that are not so young.

Our party is asking the government to wipe the slate clean. Use what the committee heard at the meetings across the country in a positive way, and before any comparable new tax is announced, ask first of all some basic questions. Where is the simplicity that was promised? Where is the fairness that was promised? When one thinks of the existing disparities in this country and add the effects of the tax on people who live in the far reaches of the country the results are very bleak. Admittedly, basic food is not affected, but tax on the transportation costs to get the food on the shelves in those northern outposts will be added to the cost of the product. Complex problems will develop for those least able to pay because of existing disparities, and it will be almost insurmountable for those people to manage.

Where is the assurance that this tax will not be added to the existing tax which it was originally intended to replace? Canadians have spoken out loudly and clearly. If the government chooses to move on and to ignore the concerns of ordinary Canadians, they will do it at their peril, and I can tell you that Canadians will not forget.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, last night I had a dream that at 12.35 a.m. I was in the House of Commons debating a bill. Tonight, I find myself immersed in a nightmare with my colleagues on this side of the House debating a goods and services tax legislation, a tax that should be withdrawn and thrown out of this House completely.

However, I believe that the people who represent the government in this House have not gone to their ridings and spoken to the people there so they can understand how seriously they feel the negative impact of this proposed legislation will be. Perhaps to bring it down to earth, I can describe what the people in my riding of Northumberland are telling me about the goods and services tax.

Northumberland is a riding which lies between Toronto and Kingston on the shores of Lake Ontario. My riding is from Lake Ontario in the south to Rice Lake in the north and includes 14 small communities of significant employment and significant population, but with scattered areas of smaller population. The people in my communities represent a very broad spectrum of demographic population. They represent youth, young adults with families, seniors, those on fixed incomes. They strive in my communities to provide a diversity of services to their citizens and they are very proud of the social, educational, recreational, and cultural services which enhance the attractiveness of Northumberland.

The economic base of Northumberland riding is diverse. It includes an agricultural component, a tourist component, light industries, small businesses, and service industries predominate. People from all of these economic sectors in Northumberland have approached me and have spoken very strongly about their concerns of the goods and services tax and the impact it will have on their lifestyles, their economies, their family life, their security.

We live in a very beautiful area of the country. It is a growing area because the secret of our beauty is getting out. Nonetheless, on an individual basis people in my area are very concerned. The people who have spoken to me are music teachers, dance teachers, lawyers, accountants, small business people, the variety and corner store operators, real estate agencies, the homebuilders association, horse breeders and race track operators, bowlers, users of McDonald's, seniors, those on fixed incomes, farmers, and consumers in general.

People have spoken to me about the impact of the goods and services tax on housing in Northumberland. It is a growing area and prices are rising, but they are very concerned about the inflationary impact of the goods and services tax. As we all know, the goods and services tax favours high-income Canadians while doing nothing for low-income Canadians and adds to the affordability problem of housing for low-income Canadians.

You can still find a few houses in my riding that are valued around $100,000. With 4.5 per cent added to the value of such a house the price of the house will rise to $104,500. This is a starter house. It means that a young family trying to get a roof over their heads is going to have to come up with a larger down-payment, making highly priced housing even more difficult for them to own. A house priced at $200,000 has $9,000 added to its price, bringing that house up to $209,000. Although the GST does not apply to existing housing, the increased demand for existing housing not subject to the goods and services tax, will push up the prices.

There are rental implications as well. The goods and services tax, because it is added to the cost of repairs and servicing, will have to be reflected in rents and rents are expected to rise by $40 to $50 per month in my community. Small businesses are to expect a $1,000 one-time credit in 1991 to cover the costs of instituting the GST. But it is estimated that small businesses will incur an ongoing cost annually of $1,900, and small business operators have talked to me about the equipment which it will be necessary to install, which is over $1,000.

There is confusion in society about the items that are taxed and those that are not taxed. In my riding there are many small communities with corner stores and small grocery stores. There is going to be untold confusion because some items are taxed and some items are not. Clothes are taxed, drugs are not taxed. Furniture is taxed, medical devices are not taxed. Restaurant meals are taxed, basic groceries are not taxed. Doughnuts are taxed, bagels are not taxed. Muffins are taxed, raisin bread is not taxed. The list is endless.

At present there are non-goods and services tax provisions in the goods and services tax legislation package about which people in my riding have expressed concern. At present, we have a 3 per cent income surtax on medium and low-income Canadians and a 5 per cent surtax on higher income Canadians. Through this legislation that surtax will rise to 5 per cent and 10 per cent respectively.

The government has decided not to implement the tax rate reduction to middle-income earners, as promised in 1987. This will cost a middle-income family, with a $40,000 income, another $200 in income tax. No provision exists to limit the impact of the goods and services tax regionally. Hence, in northern communities that experience transportation costs, there will be increased costs on goods.

The government regularly accuses the Official Opposition of criticizing the goods and services tax legislation and not proposing alternatives. This is simply not so. What the government has set as its own objectives for tax reform are fairness, competitiveness, simplicity, consistency, reliability. We believe that the goods and services tax proposed violates all of these objectives.

This government has increased taxes numerous times since coming to power, taxes that in total have had a regressive impact, reflecting a mean and heartless administration, a tax system which in general provides benefits to those with high incomes, and penalties with inadequate compensation for those on fixed, middle and low incomes.

We have recommended an alternative. We asked the government months ago to bring down the high interest rates in this country. High interest rates contribute more to our ever increasing national debt than any other single factor. Increasing taxes in the piecemeal, regressive fashion this good and services tax legislation proposes, brings Canadians much pain with no gain.

We depend upon tax revenues to support programs which are important to our country and make it unique. We recommend a review and reform of Canada's entire tax system, the withdrawal of this regressive goods and services tax, and a concerted effort to bring in a new tax system which does fulfil the objectives of fairness, competitiveness, simplicity, consistency and reliability.

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, this is a real opportunity for the government side of the House to talk about all of the positive things concerning the GST, and I welcome the opportunity.

We all know that the FST is archaic. We all know that the members of the opposition, when they sat on the finance committee, agreed that the FST was archaic and that it had to be replaced. They have a bit of a problem with those who are from their ranks in agreeing to that.

We all know that the manufacturers' tax is bad. I would note that The Financial Post has indicated that the MST is mainly a stupid tax. I thought that was interesting. Certainly, it is narrow based. There are a lot of problems with it. It distorts the consumer choices, because it is a varying tax. It taxes investments. It taxes exports, and that is a real problem for us because the FST remains in the price of exports. It favours imports against domestic and that is a problem. It distorts the way people do business. I think that is another serious problem with the FST.

We all know the manufacturers' sales tax also costs a lot to administer, with its over 22,000 exemptions. That is a real problem.

I do not think the members opposite want to hear all these things about what is wrong with the FST. They do not seem to want to listen to what is wrong. They probably do not want the people of Canada to hear why we should replace the FST.

There was an interesting article in The Globe and Mail today which states:

> An investment boom, triggered by free trade with the United States, tax reform and energy projects, will make the 1990s a good decade for Canadian economy, a team of university research economists forecast.
> After it gets by this year's slowdown, the economy will rack up a string of years in which real economic growth will surpass 3 per cent, according to a long-term projection by the institute for Policy Analysis at the University of Toronto.

They go on to state that real reasons for all that are free trade and the GST introduction. Members opposite probably did not get a chance to read that this morning. As a matter of fact, maybe they should take some reading lessons. Better still, why not have some of your staff read it to you. I have to give members opposite all this good news about the GST that they do not know. They just want to talk about doom and gloom.

• (0050)

I go out and speak to many groups in my riding. It is amazing that I seem to be getting a little different story than my colleague for Lambton—Middlesex. It is probably in how you answer questions or give them information. It is probably slightly different.

I have a lot of respect for my colleague for Lambton—Middlesex. He is a fine man. Perhaps politics are entering into this from what he is getting from the people on the street in Strathroy and Elphinstone. I have a notion that that is the case, that he is bringing out of them what he thinks they want to hear.

I had a chat not too long ago with people from Japan. They think we are absolutely daft to have only a manufacturing sales tax. Many other countries do, too. When we get the opportunity to speak to groups and explain to them what the GST is all about, the majority of groups I am speaking to feel positive about it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. James: Members opposite will never have that opportunity, because they would not be trying to explain—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Edmonton East on a point of order.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it is with intense fascination that I listened to the hon. member speak of the apparent majority of his constituents who support the GST. Would the hon. member please tell us when he tabled in this House a petition from a single constituent supporting the GST?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. On a point of order, the Minister of Privatization.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might be interested to know that some of the opposition members delivered petitions to the Minister of Finance's office the other day and some of them supported the GST.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Those are not points of order, that is debate. The hon. member for Sarnia—Lambton has another couple of minutes.

Some hon. members: Axe the tax!

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, I would think that you would want to explain to your constituents about the GST and the positiveness of the GST. That is what you should do and that is what we want you to do.

Some hon. members: Axe the tax!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member still has a minute in his debate. Then we can hear the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. James: This party and this government has the political will to do what needs to be done in connection with introducing the GST. The Liberal government was told on a number of occasions and even had input from the Leader of the Opposition about a tax that was a value-added type of tax. We have the political will. They do not have the political will. In the long run, better things will happen in Canada because of this tax.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I know you are all anxious to stay here a little longer than one o'clock, therefore, I would like to advise the hon. member that he has 20 minutes for debate, if he would like to take it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, this has been a long debate tonight.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: And we have a lot of spirit in the House tonight, but we have a very serious issue before us—

An hon. member: How to beat the tax.

Mr. Blenkarn: —in dealing with a proposal to tax both goods and services in a multistage sales tax. This tax has been described in many fashions. It has been described as a good service tax—

An hon. member: No, no, no.

Mr. Blenkarn: It has been described as many other things.

An hon. member: Bad tax.

An hon. member: A horrible tax.

Mr. Blenkarn: But I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the multistage sales tax is another way, and a more intelligent way for us to tax the consumption in the country. Consumption taxes are part of our tax system.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: We have tax consumption since the day this country was founded with a tariff policy under John Macdonald.

We have taxed consumption with a manufacturer's sales tax, now known as the federal sales tax, since 1924. Since the 1930s, Canadians have been trying to get rid of the federal sales tax.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: As a matter of fact, this tax must go!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fulton: Dump the GST.

Mr. Blenkarn: The royal commission wanted this tax to go.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: The Carter Commission wanted this tax to go.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: The Macdonald Commission told us to get rid of this tax.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: John Turner told us to get rid of this tax.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: Marc Lalonde told us to get rid of this tax.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: And we are going to get rid of the federal sales tax.

Some hon. members: Right on!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: Stop the GST, Don.

Mr. Blenkarn: And we are going to replace the tax with a tax that makes some sense.

Mr. Riis: Listen to the people, Don.

Some hon. members: Axe the tax.

Mr. Blenkarn: Indeed, we are going to axe the tax.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member is finished.

Some hon. members: More, more.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 57, at this time it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill now before the House.

• (0100)

The question is on the amendment.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to bring to the attention of the Chair some concerns that the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House is being done in a manner which in fact is anticipating a decision of the House on the report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business.

The committee is recommending in paragraph 3 of its ninth report that: "The programming director should be responsible for the production and direction of the broadcasting of the House of Commons, subject to the overall direction of the monitoring committee of the House of Commons."

Clearly, the committee did not like the way that the House is now televised. In its report, it described the current rules as unnecessarily strict and then gave us a synopsis of those rules: "Camera shots are restricted to the torso and head of the person speaking, and the microphone picks up only his or her voice— Strict rules for the cameras have prevented certain events from being shown and the full flavour of the House of Commons from being conveyed. For instance, the cameras are unable to show a member crossing the floor, either to join another party or to congratulate another member."

I do not wish to express either agreement or disagreement with the committee's views. That is a matter for the House to consider at another point in time.

I do wish to raise a concern that the guidelines under which the House has been broadcast for the past 11 years seem to have been changed. Yesterday, during the very warm tributes to the outgoing Leader of the Official Opposition, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, the cameras did, in fact, show the Prime Minister crossing the floor to congratulate the member.

The cameras also showed you, your Honour, leaving your chair, walking toward and shaking the hand of the member for Vancouver Quadra. The cameras also showed wide-angled views of the House which enabled viewers to see the response of the House, in this case a standing ovation for these tributes to the hon. member. There is no question, Mr. Speaker, that these shots were good television and accurately reflected, in a positive way, what occurred in the House yesterday.

• (1110)

However, over the past year, a number of memorable, if not historic events have occurred in this Chamber. When the newly elected Leader of the New Democratic Party, the member for Yukon entered this House, in itself an historic event, the cameras did not show the reception that she received by all members of this House, but particularly from the women members of this House, on her important milestone.

As a member of the Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business, which authored the ninth report which makes those proposals—

An hon. member: You were not there.

Mr. Angus: No, I was not an active member and the member for Sault Ste. Marie was replacing me. However, as a member of that committee, I know that this House has not been seized with the matter, it has not deliberated on the recommendations, therefore, the rules have not been changed.

Beauchesne's, Sixth Edition, sets out in citation 1122:

The electronic record is provided for informational purposes, similar in intent to that of Hansard—

Point of Order

Citation 1123 states:

> The coverage by the House television cameras is based on certain understandings arrived at by the committee which supervised the installation of the system, and the resolution of the House passed on January 25, 1977. In principle, it is to be an electronic Hansard. When a Member is recognized by the Speaker, the participation of that Member is recorded. Just as Hansard does not record the reaction of the House in an editorial manner, neither does the camera coverage.

I raise two specific points. I would ask Your Honour that you review the tapes of yesterday to determine if, in fact, what I have just stated to the House is accurate, and if it is accurate, to determine how it came about. Was there a policy decision made by an appropriate official, or was it an independent decision made by a technician?

Second, and I think more important, given that if there is an error in Hansard, the printed record of this House, which is the official and only record, corrections can be made. However, if there has been an error in the electronic version, and recognizing that it is not the official version, where the camera showed that which it was not supposed to show, is it appropriate for the Speaker to have that record edited?

This is a very substantive question, Mr. Speaker. In the past, giving permission to edit has not been not allowed. One is not allowed to edit in any way the electronic recording of this House, whether visual or audio. However, in this instance, should you order that the record of yesterday be edited to exclude those camera shots which violated the rules of this House? I am not necessarily arguing that you should, Your Honour, but I think it is a question that you and this House have to deal with, particularly inasmuch as we have not approved or even considered the ninth report of the committee, and it may be something to which you may wish to refer back to the Elections and Privileges Committee for further consideration.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, not being a member of the committee I would like to defer perhaps to the member for Kingston and the Islands for his comments but I would like to say a few things. First of all, I understand that the televising of the proceedings of the House is in the hands of a very competent staff of technicians and producers. I recognize the present rules state that the camera is allowed to show only the person recognized by the Speaker, or the Speaker.

Yesterday's events showed you leaving the chair and coming to shake the hand of the Leader of the Official Opposition, now the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. In my view, that was a very touching move on your part. In my view, that was a very human move, something that I thought was appropriate in the spirit of the House at that time.

The cameras were indeed following you, Mr. Speaker, which is exactly and technically correct, as far as I am concerned, because the cameras must stay on the Speaker. In my view, you should be commended for this very human, personal touch that you put to this event yesterday.

I realize that some people may say that you did divert, change or modify your normal behaviour of staying in the chair. In the view of the Liberal opposition, even though we do recognize and we were actively involved in presenting the ninth report to the House, which proposes certain changes to the broadcasting of the proceedings, I want to tell you that we are entirely supportive of what happened yesterday and we thank you for it.

Mr. Speaker: I want to say to all members of the House that I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. I have to say it is my opinion that his complaint is justified. I do not take anything that the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan said as a personal criticism of me. I know the hon. member very well and I know his colleagues. He and his colleagues, my former colleagues from the party from which I come, and my colleagues in the Liberal party will know that my association with the right hon. gentleman we honoured yesterday goes back for many years. I think that all hon. members will understand that when I think back to my boyhood, the same people who raised me are the very close friends of the same people who raised the right hon. gentleman. There is an association that crosses the years and crosses party lines. I know that the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan and my very good and dear friend, the hon. member for Kamloops, understand.

The complaint made by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan is legitimate. It is legitimate in the sense that not all of what happened yesterday was covered. Our colleague, the hon. member for Yukon, the new and distinguished Leader of the New Democratic Party, in an act of generosity and goodwill, of which this House is capable but which is not often recorded or seen, came up this aisle. She did not need to, but she did, and shook the hand of our right hon. friend.

That was a dramatic moment in this House, as was also the fact that the Prime Minister of our country crossed the floor on this occasion and shook hands with our right hon. friend.

These are moments in the history of our country that probably ought to be recorded. That is as far as I will go because I am your servant and I must be guided by the strictures that you have decided to place on television coverage of this place.

I want to say to my hon. friend from Thunder Bay—Atikokan and my hon. friend, the House Leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Kamloops, and other members of the New Democratic Party that I am very sorry if the coverage was not complete. I think the complaint that has been brought to me is legitimate and I will do what I can to make sure it does not happen again.

• (1120)

What I do have to say to all hon. members is that there are times in a long lifetime that we all do things because of memory, circumstance, friendships and long associations.

I have to tell all hon. members—and I know that it will be accepted by the New Democratic Party—for associations that go back many years, I did what I did yesterday, and I am sorry that it was covered and another equally touching tribute from the New Democratic Party was not covered.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 115 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Routine Proceedings

BROADCASTING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-284, an act to amend the Broadcasting Act (distribution undertaking).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I present this bill. Cable television rates increased on average by 6 per cent annually between 1984 and 1988 but by 29 per cent between 1988 and 1989. We could ask anyone watching us today and they would indicate that those rates have increased.

Second, the big cable operators such as Ted Rogers and Company have really been given a licence to print money.

What this bill does is applies the same principles to cable companies as are applied to phone companies. In other words, this outrageous rate of return is going to be regulated, just like phone companies are regulated under the Railway Act.

In the past year, telephone rates have actually gone down, whereas cable rates have gone sky high. The bill states that it is not enough just to give the CRTC broad discretion. The government has to direct that the cable companies will be regulated. This is what this bill does.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-285, an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act (pollution).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, this bill was inspired by a newspaper article in Vancouver some time ago which indicated that some of the tankers owned by Esso carry on board temporary booming equipment should there be a spill.

That would at least provide temporary containment of a spill until the larger equipment could be brought along.

Those of us who have coastal communities as our constituencies realize how vulnerable we are for any oil spill. Again the news last night carried the report of a spill in California.

This bill requires that all tankers in Canadian waters would be required to have temporary booming equipment on board in order to give temporary protection until the permanent equipment would come along.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for the explanation. I think it will be a matter of considerable interest to all members.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of petitioners from various communities, including Blue River, Avola, Vavenby, Birch Island, Clearwater, Black Pool, Wells Gray Park, Adams Lake, East Barriere Lake, Little Fort, Chu Chua, Darfield, Chinook Cove, Barriere, Louis Creek, McLure, Vinsulla and others.

The petitioners are pointing out their concern that the government's proposed goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because it lacks regard for taxpayers' ability to pay the tax. It imposes a tax on everything from piano lessons and diapers to coffins and even consumer loans which some Canadians must take out to pay their taxes.

The petitioners go on at some length and ask Parliament to do whatever it can to cause the government to back off from proceeding with this goods and services tax.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty on the same day that this House has adopted second reading of Bill C-62, the GST bill, to table a petition sent to me by people from Milk River, Alberta.

The petitioners state that the present federal manufacturers' tax has already been increased by the federal Tory government from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent, that is four times over a period of five years, and that the federal government wants to impose upon Canadians a new 7 per cent tax on goods and services which will be hidden from Canadians and applied to virtually everything they buy.

These people feel that the imposition of this new general goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians. They join with Liberals and strongly oppose the new goods and services tax which is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

The undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

BILL 178

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour to table petitions on behalf of the constituents of Parkdale—High Park who claim that the Constitution of Canada under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees to all Canadians the right of freedom of expression.

The government of the Province of Quebec has abridged that right by enacting Bill 178, which restricts the right to freedom of expression in the English language. Under Section 90 the Constitution Act of 1867, the Governor General in Council has authority to disallow legislation enacted by a province within one year of its enactment.

Petitioners argue that over 53,000 Canadians from every province and territory of Canada have petitioned the Governor General to disallow Bill 178 of the province of Quebec as being contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and to the preservation of peace, order and good government in Canada. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass a resolution of the House of Commons using the Governor General in Council to give force and effect to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by the exercise of its constitutional power of disallowance with respect to Bill 178 of the province of Quebec.

This petition is time sensitive. I could not table it any earlier because of the government's procedure of moving to the Orders of the Day. Mr. Speaker, I hope you will take this into consideration when you are looking at this petition. It is not the fault of the petitioners that it arrived late in this House. It is the procedures by which we are guided.

Mr. Speaker: On behalf of the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park I want to say to him and to the petitioners that he represents that I fully understood the difficulty a few days ago. I understand his comment and while I would not normally intervene I want to say to the petitioners through my colleague that we understand the difficulty.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition, also from the constituents of Parkdale—High Park. They argue that the Government of Canada has seen fit since Confederation and without hiatus to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers and now propose to include them in the GST. They argue that uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and literature, and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST application.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 and present 127 petitions that are grouped together to facilitate their movement through the House. These petitions have been signed by 3,325 residents, the vast majority of whom are in the Okanagan—Shuswap area.

This brings the total number of petitions against the government's goods and services tax from the Okanagan—Shuswap to 311, signed by over 14,700 residents of the area. This represents 28 per cent of the registered voters in the Okanagan—Shuswap.

These petitions come from the North Shuswap, Salmon Arm, Enderby, Armstrong, Vernon, Lumby, Sicamous, Sorrento and Falkland. I think the fact that these signatures represent over 28 per cent of the voting population in that constituency is a very clear message to the government that people in Okanagan—Shuswap are certainly very disturbed about the goods and services tax.

Through the petition they have asked that this government reject the proposed goods and services tax and that this government consult with business, labour and consumer groups to reach a broad consensus on reform of the tax system before implementing further changes. Finally, they ask that there is a process of fair tax reform that will provide a healthy climate for future economic growth in Canada. The people of Okanagan—Shuswap have spoken loudly and clearly. Stop this tax.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present three groups of petitions from constituents in Manitoulin Island, Gore Bay, Evansville, Spring Bay, Little Current, Tehkummah, Manitowaning and Mindemoya, calling on the government not to implement the goods and services tax.

They point out the adverse impact this will have for senior citizens. The higher taxes are not appropriate at this time. It will cause higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

I hope that the government will take into account these representations, made by these people who are very concerned with the possible implementation of the goods and services tax.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I am the surrogate today for our former leader, the Hon. Ed Broadbent. On his behalf, I am submitting these petitions from people of Ontario and the region from which he formerly represented.

Gone but not forgotten in the hearts of his constituents, he is still their member of Parliament. As a consequence, they have submitted these particular petitions to me to be his vehicle and his presence here today.

Not to my surprise, but perhaps the government's surprise, this petition is focused on the goods and services tax. I can see there is a groundswell of public opinion in the Oshawa area that represents a significant part of Ontario that says clearly through this petition, that they are frustrated, angry and deeply hurt over the goods and services tax.

Their petition says that they would pray that this government would do its utmost to delay the bill and permit those taxpayers a greater opportunity to present their feelings, perhaps through an election, simply on this issue, which would be a fair and democratic step.

They are suggesting that the government go to the people and have the people approve, in a democratic process, whether or not they agree with this tax. Even though the polls show that 80 per cent of the people are opposed to this tax, it may not be reflected in an election and the government should take the bidding of these petitioners and poke its feet in the water of an electoral process.

I submit these petitions on behalf of the good burghers of the Oshawa, Ontario area.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and the duty to present a number of petitions signed by 920 residents of my area. These petitions have been circulated by a number of business people in the community, Galaxie Lanes, the staff of St. Jude schools, Ziebart, Family Diner, Northern Women's Centre, Breenie's Auto Body, Lochloman Ski Area, Superior Bowl-o-Drome and one petition that was circulated on VIA Rail when it was still running.

The petitioners are all against the GST. They want the current proposal rejected and they want a proper reformation of the taxation system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise again in the House under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present petitions on behalf of small business people in my community.

Small business people in my community continue to send petitions and letters in opposition to the GST. In this petition hundreds of small business people from New Westminster, Burnaby and other areas of the lower mainland in British Columbia say that this form of taxation is unfair because it forces small businesses to carry a disproportionate share of the tax burden.

These small business people say that this will be an implementation nightmare for them, and that this tax does not address the concerns of small business in regard to the current federal manufacturer's sales tax and that, instead, it increases the tax burden on the small business community.

They call upon this Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax, to consult with business, labour, and consumer groups, and to reach a broad consensus on reform of the tax system before implementing this regressive alternative to the manufacturers' sales tax.

They ask for real reform of the tax system to provide a healthy climate for small business in Canada.

I have presented other petitions from small business people in my community and these are more in opposition to this tax.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present a group of petitions which have all been certified correct as to form and content pursuant to Standing Order 36.

These petitions have been signed by over 300 people, all members of four different churches in the city of Red Deer. They represent members of the Church of God, the Roman Catholic Church, the Baptist Church and the United Church, all of whom call upon Parliament to formulate and legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child.

[Translation]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions signed by people who object to the new goods and services tax. They say it will be the worst tax levied on Canadians since the beginning of our history.

[English]

These petitioners tell us that as it now stands the GST would create economic disruption, increase taxes on average families, introduce an unprecedented level of complexity into the tax system, impose further hardship on low-income Canadians, and remain hidden from taxpayers.

They call upon the House of Commons to withdraw this tax.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present to the House of Commons today a petition concerning the preservation of the Rouge Valley which is 10,000 acres of beautiful natural wilderness geography in Canada. The petitioners are from communities of Oakville, Scarborough, Etobicoke, Thornhill, Whitby, Bolton, Kitchener and Norwood.

This issue of the preservation of the Rouge Valley as a precious natural area is spreading right across Ontario, right across Canada. It is in the national interest to preserve the wildlife and wilderness aspects of the area. There are thousands of people who are working in the Save the Rouge Valley System organization.

These petitioners call upon this government to work with the province of Ontario which owns about 80 per cent of this beautiful land, to have the Rouge Valley system preserved as a park.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bonavista—Twilling—

Mr. Mifflin: Trinity—Conception.

Mr. Speaker: Trinity—Conception. I apologize to the hon. member but the former name of the riding is almost part of the history of the country and I have to keep in mind that for administrative reasons it has been changed. Of course it takes nothing away from the representation that the riding has in this Chamber.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If I may, those comments are very appropriate in view of the fact that some of my colleagues and I had the delightful experience to dine with the former member for Bonavista—Twillingate to whom I am sure you are making reference. A delightful dinner it was!

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member goes too far I just want the hon. member to know, and I think his constituents should know, that I have had the great privilege at least once a year of dining with the former hon. member and I want the hon. member to know, and I want his constituents to know that I hold their former member in the highest esteem.

Mr. Mifflin: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I will convey that message to my constituents. And, Mr. Speaker, the present member is doing his best to hold himself in that kind of respect as well.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): You are doing a marvellous job!

Mr. Mifflin: Thank you, to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a number of petitions. The House might be interested to know that I have received 15,000 petitions on this subject, representing 35 per cent of my voting population. There are 1,130 signatures on this particular petition from one end of my riding to the other: Lumsden, Traytown, Bonavista, Queen's Cove, North West Brook, Clarenville, Bellevue, North River, Harbour Grace, Carbonear, Northern Bay, Bay de Verde and I could go on.

People in my riding basically do not have high incomes. They are concerned, for example, that Canadian families with incomes of between $10,000 and $15,000, spend 92 per cent of their income on current consumption, while families earning in the vicinity of $50,000, spend only 56 per cent on current consumption. They are concerned that they are paying almost all of their income for essential purposes and now they are being asked to pay, on top of the 92 per cent on consumption, another 7 per cent.

They feel that this is blatantly unfair and unjust. As one of my cogent and well-expressed constituents said to me, it was inexpressibly distressing.

These petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to show some heart, some compassion for the situation in which they find themselves. They wish to have the proposed goods and services tax firmly, soundly and decisively rejected.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege of presenting, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition from people in the province of Quebec, Montreal, Châteauguay, Pierrefonds, Roxboro, Ile Perrot, St. Hubert and Lacolle.

[Translation]

And also my own riding, Saint-Laurent.

[English]

The petitioners are asking the government to reject the proposed goods and services tax because the imposition of this tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians who point out that the government has not addressed the unfair tax system which is currently in place, which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax, while forcing low and middle-income taxpayers to bear more of the tax burden.

They call upon the government not to proceed with the current goods and service tax, but to bring in fair taxation for all Canadians.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, let the House not forget the New Democrats are putting up the best fight possible to stop the goods and services tax. The petition I have to table in the House today under the provisions of Standing Order 36, is to remind the House of the call to the Minister of Finance to reject the task force report on northern tax benefits which was unfair and should be addressed by the Minister of Finance when he brings down his budget later this month.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, question No. 205 will be answered today.

[Text]

ROYALTY CHARTERS AND JOINT VENTURES

Question No. 205—Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso):

Are Native Groups given Royalty Charters (special quotas) for Canadian fish stocks and is it possible, under a Joint Venture Business Arrangement, for businessmen out of Ottawa, Montreal and other centres to secure a licence for foreign fleets to catch these species and then process their catches in European countries such as England and Denmark and, if so, what are (a) the names of all Joint Ventures and Royalty Charters issued (by year) over the last five years (b) the species allocation and location allocation for each (c) the names of the brokers and foreign vessels associated with each of these ventures?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): In 1985 and 1986, the Torngat Co-op and the Labrador Fishermen's Union Shrimp Company (LFUSC) were the only northern shrimp licence holders authorized to use foreign vessels under so-called royalty charters. The vessels used were the Ocean Prawns, a Faroe Island vessel, by Torngat, and the Helen Basse, a Danish vessel, by the LFUSC. Since 1987, such charters have not been permitted. Northern shrimp licence holders have been given permission to enter into Joint Venture Business Arrangements with foreign partners. Canadian equity in such joint ventures must be at least 30 percent and must be Canadianized (i.e. over 50 percent ownership) by May, 1990.

All northern shrimp vessels can process shrimp on board and are not required to land in Canada. However their product must be labelled "Product of Canada" and is subject to Canadian inspection.

Following is the list of joint ventures with foreign partners in the northern shrimp fishery for 1987 to 1989; the foreign vessels used in 1985 and 1986 are identified above.

These vessels fish for shrimp in NAFO Areas 0, 2 and 3KL.

Licence Holder	Vessel	Country of Origin
Pikalujak Fisheries	Faroe Prawns	Faroe Island
Torngat Co-op	Ocean Prawns	Denmark
Caramer Ltd.	Arctic Viking	Faroe Island
M.V. Osprey Ltd.	Hvitanes	Faroe Island
Fishery Product International	Hvilvtenni	Faroe Island

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester) moved:

That this House call upon the government to abandon its ill-conceived goods and services tax scheme and to bring forward in its place a comprehensive reform of the tax system that is fairer, simpler, integrated, taking into consideration all forms of taxation and the needs and practices of other levels of government and that this be clearly visible to the taxpayers and designed in a manner that does not merely, under the guise of reform, constitute another increase in the overall burden of taxation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I know that there will be a great deal more said in the weeks and months to come about the goods and services tax. I know that many of my colleagues wish to speak to this motion. I deeply regret that many members of this House have not had a full opportunity to debate the goods and services tax because closure was imposed by the government.

There has been a great deal of discussion about alternatives or the lack thereof, and the need for real tax reform. In my opening remarks I want to set out what is not tax reform. After five years of Conservative government I want to review some of the results of the tax reform that allegedly was undertaken by the Minister of Finance and the Conservative government.

In 1983–84, government revenues were $64 billion and the public debt was $160 billion. After five years of tax reform, in the year 1991 this government as a result of 31 tax increases now is generating revenues to the Government of Canada of $120 billion. These are obviously not final figures but the government's own numbers which I expect will change and unfortunately for Canadians for the worse. Revenues have gone from $64 billion to $120 billion in five years. That is the tax reform tax grab that this government has put in place.

While government members during the election campaign in 1988 were bragging about their ability to manage the economy and to manage the affairs of this nation, we went from a public debt in 1983–84 of $160 billion to a total projected debt at the end of this fiscal year of $380 billion. In five years of Tory tax reform and alleged good management, from $160 billion of public debt to $380 billion.

The point I want to make is that that is not tax reform. That is not good management. It is a sad commentary on the inability of the Minister of Finance to be able to manage the economy of this country and the spending of this government. It has been able to demonstrate clearly that it is the all-time taxing champion of Canada. It has found more ways and has been more aggressive in dipping into the taxpayers' pockets than any government in the history of this country, and at the same time spending to a point where it has more than doubled the national debt.

One of the fundamental commitments of the Minister of Finance and this government was to address the question of the deficit. The fact of the matter is that the deficit has been increasing in the last few years, not decreasing. The deficit has risen from $28.1 billion in 1987–88, to $28.7 billion in 1988–89, to $30.5 billion in 1989–90. Regardless of projections made so far by the Department of Finance, at least those which have been released, I believe that the deficit for this year will again increase above the $30.5 billion that it was last year. The government has increased revenues by nearly $60 billion while being unable to address in a meaningful way the deficit and while doubling the national debt. I reiterate, this is not the way to deal with tax reform nor fiscal responsibility.

Among the problems that this government has faced is the question of high interest rates. After five years of Conservative management of the economy our interest rates are 4 per cent higher than those in the United States. Traditionally, we were always able to keep them within a half point to a point, a point and a quarter.

Many people attribute this to the free trade syndrome and other reasons.

To be fair to the Minister of Finance, I do not lay the blame for the deficit, the debt and the high interest rates at his doorstep. I blame it on the lack of will of his government, because I think the Minister of Finance has been left to hang, to spin on his own. The government has read the polls, and although the Minister of Finance may have been well intentioned and may have had a plan initially, he believed that he could carry through and he has not been able to do so. I suspect it is because the government has refused to do what needed to be done.

When we debated the goods and services tax, I heard over and over again from members opposite that there is no alternative to the goods and services tax being proposed by the Liberal Party. That is the canard. That is the problem that Canadians have to address. One of the things, of course, that we have to recognize is that in 1984, when this government came to power, the manufacturers' sales tax was generating somewhere in the neighbourhood of $8 billion in revenue. The new goods and services tax will generate $26 billion, over three times more. Yet, they say: "What's your alternative?"

I believe that the people who have signed the petitions that have been presented to this House, the over 300,000 signatures that we have been responsible for, have said that the alternative for the short term is the status quo. Yes, there are problems with the manufacturers' sales tax and yes, there have been a myriad number of reports saying that we have to get rid of it, but this is not the way to go.

Our motion talks of tax reform and I believe that that is what we have to do. We have to take the responsibility in this place to talk to Canadians about tax reform that will address the problems of generating revenues, to maintain for Canadians the infrastructures that we require and the social programs we need. When we look at the municipal tax systems, the provincial tax systems and the federal tax system, we see it has to be an integrated approach, because there is only one taxpayer in Canada. That taxpayer pays municipal tax, provincial tax and federal tax.

It is not as though the Minister of Finance, when he brings down his budget in two weeks, can say that this is only going to affect the federal taxpayer. It is going to affect every Canadian taxpayer. We have to look seriously at the suggestions made before the Standing Committee on Finance by the mayor of Vancouver who made it clear that there are only so many dollars available from Canadian taxpayers, and we cannot play games by shifting burdens from one level of government to the other because, in the final analysis, Canadian men and women have to foot the bill.

I believe that in tax reform we have to address the question of real property taxes. Are real property taxes still a legitimate way of generating revenues? Are they a true measure of people's ability to pay, or have they become location taxes? If you have a $100,000 home in my constituency in northern New Brunswick and you have $100,000 home on the outskirts of Toronto you very likely have the same home. The only difference is that the property in Toronto will cost a lot more because you are paying for the land underneath the home. The home and its facilities are probably very similar. Is this approach still feasible or should we be looking at new approaches? Should we be deciding on progressive ways to raise the revenues required to function in this country?

The alternatives that we believe must be considered in tax reform, and that we recommended in the minority report that we presented subsequent to our study of the goods and services tax proposal, is to look at all forms of taxation. We have to look at what economists, bank presidents, business people, anti-poverty groups, the National Action Council, Canadian Labour Congress, talk about when they talk about equitable, progressive taxation.

Many of these people have excellent suggestions on how we can deal with tax reform in this country. We can eliminate tax breaks and we can make sure that everyone is treated fairly. We have to look at the business sector. I want to be very clear on this. In the Liberal Party we believe that tax reform must provide for a strong economy and must provide for initiatives for men and women to become involved in the private sector. I want to say clearly that I do believe in profits, I do believe in rewarding hard work and I do believe in making sure that people who take a risk can expect a return on their investment.

• (1200)

Business in this country is prepared to respond to tax reform as long as it is fair and allows them to compete internationally. The time has come to deal in a straightforward way with tax reform for individuals and corporations. We have to make sure that the system in place is not only fair, or as fair as we can make it, but that Canadian taxpayers believe it is fair.

That is why they do not accept the goods and services tax. Nobody likes taxation but Canadians do not believe the goods and services tax is fair. They do not believe either that the revenues generated by the goods and services tax are going to be spent properly.

We recommend that as we go through the exercise of tax reform in this country there also be an effort made with regard to what is happening to government spending, with regard to where we are on fiscal reform. How are we going to address the question of dealing with municipal, provincial and federal spending requirements in a restrained and responsible way?

There are no easy answers to this. People suggest it will take years. I have heard people suggest royal commissions. I do not think we need a royal commission. I believe we need to have leaders in the three levels of government who are well supported and who understand the problems come together and talk about an integrated tax reform.

People will be very quick to suggest, when we talk about tax, that they want the lowest taxes possible, but when we talk about spending they want as much spending as possible as it applies to them, but very little for anyone else.

I do not think we should be afraid of looking at reform of taxation from the point of view, as I suggested, of real property taxes. I do not think we should be concerned about looking at taxing wealth in this country. I do not think we should be concerned about clamping down on people who do not pay their taxes.

I think Canadians would be absolutely appalled if they could sit with the Auditor General of this country, as I did this morning, and hear him suggest that tax avoidance is an extremely serious problem in this country. There is tax avoidance in this country through under the table transactions because there is not sufficient audit, because there are loopholes and because many people make their living in this country searching on a daily basis for ways to avoid taxation.

For example, I wonder how many Canadians know, disregarding the tax situation where people are able to hive off or, through holding corporations, avoid some tax, that we have between $7 billion and $8 billion in receivables in our tax system. That seems to me to be an enormous amount of money.

People are always concerned about corporate taxes. It is often said that if we address the corporate side with taxation in the end it is the consumer, the ordinary Canadian, who pays for it because it is always passed along. Corporations as legal entities do not of themselves pay taxes. It is the people who own shares in the corporations and the people who buy the products that they produce or the services that they produce who in the end pay the price.

There are innovative and creative ways of looking at corporate activity in this country, whether it is domestic corporate activity or through multinationals. We can look at how to deal, for example, with profits as deemed dividends in the hands of shareholders.

What I am suggesting to my colleagues in the House today is that tax reform is possible because so many people are thinking about tax reform. As many people are talking about fiscal reform. Finally, many Canadians are talking about monetary policy. If we speak of tax reform on the basis of an integrated review dealing with federal, provincial and municipal taxation, we must also look at what we are doing in terms of our tax policy, what we are doing in terms of our fiscal policy, what we are doing in terms of our monetary policy and how they fit together. Are we doing one thing with the left hand, another with the right, and trying to tap dance as we go through the exercise of administering the affairs of this country?

I believe that Canadians are at a point where they will not pay any more taxes. I do not ascribe to the view, as some people do, that a tax revolt is imminent because Canadians are too generous to get into the kind of tax revolt that we have seen in the United States. Canadians will not say that we are going to cut social spending, cut spending on education and cut spending on medicare without looking at the over-all picture.

There is a deep malaise among Canadians with respect to spending. I do not think we want to have any knee-jerk reflexes and simply say sure, go out and cut $20 billion, $30 billion or $50 billion. As parliamentarians and politicians we have to ask Canadians how we reduce spending, not how the Conservative Government of Canada reduces spending or the Liberal Government of New Brunswick reduces spending, but how we together evolve a program that Canadians understand and perhaps accept because they have had a role to play in determining that program.

How do we create a climate of trust that in fact politicians can manage billions and billions of dollars? How many people involved in these major corporations, both domestically and nationally, are being asked to make the tough decisions when suggestions are made that government spending is out of control? How many of them are prepared to say: "This is where we believe you should cut. This is specifically the program we think you should diminish or eliminate".

I think the challenge is not just for politicians. The challenge is for Canadians. Can we together discuss real tax reform? Can we agree on what must be done to serve the needs of Canadians from all walks of life, corporate as well as private?

How do we control our spending and how do we relate in our relationships with our trading partners, especially the United States, because right now the United States is a dominant force with regard to interest rates and the value of the Canadian dollar.

I am trying as best I can to articulate the plea that I have heard all over this country as a member of the Standing Committee on Finance. Canadians are hit with taxes from every direction. They have no control over the taxes that are imposed on them and they believe they have no control on what is happening to those tax dollars when they are being spent. In my view that is a recipe for a great deal of unease among Canadians on a lot of other issues that are not directly tax or fiscally related.

In closing, I hope that the Minister of Finance, when he comes before this House with his budget in a few days, will recognize that there is a need to respond to the legitimate cry from Canadians for responsible tax reform, responsible fiscal reform and a monetary policy that reflects the best interests of Canadians both as individuals and as corporations and exporters.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that both the tone and the content of his intervention are very refreshing. He has come forward with a lot of very positive suggestions. In this debate on a difficult issue which is vital for the future of our country it is very pleasant to have this kind of exchange across the floor even though we might not agree on everything.

The member has touched upon a wide range of problems in the fiscal area. He has referred to tax breaks. I think he knows that we as a government over the last few years have eliminated dozens and dozens of tax breaks that the government formed by his party put into our system over the years.

• (1210)

He referred to corporations. I think he will agree, looking at the last budget and yet again at the measures we have taken recently to move from 9 per cent to the 7 per cent rate, that we have increased considerably their share. We will continue to look carefully at all the areas he has touched upon.

I will tell him that the magnitude of the problem we are facing is of replacing one of the central pillars of our income as a government. We have the income tax, the excise tax and the present federal sales tax which I appreciate he knows is a bad tax for this country.

I would like him to tell me why this approach is so bad when 48 other countries, most of them being large industrial countries like ours, have used this type of tax.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, dealing with the last element of the hon. minister's comment and question first, the difficulty with the implementation of the goods and services tax is that we would be the only country with two levels of retail sales tax. The tax does not meet the very criteria set out by the Minister of Finance and the department in their initial presentation.

The difficulty with the goods and services tax, as it is presently put forward, is that in 1984 that tax was raising approximately $8 billion. The technical documents and the supporting material to the current proposal for the GST indicate that the government will be seeking to raise some $25 billion to $26 billion with this tax in the fiscal year ending in the spring of 1992.

It seems to me that with all the flaws of the existing federal sales tax, to replace it with another tax that is not capable of being implemented even according to the government's own criteria, is the problem. We could get into a debate on whether goods and services taxes are regressive, whether sales taxes on goods and services to consumers are regressive, but from a strictly technical point of view, even the Auditor General this morning was very circumspect in his comments, but I think one could interpret them to mean that it is going to be an administrative nightmare, not only for small business but for the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Finance to implement this on January 1, 1991.

To my friend, the minister, I would simply say that it is best to stay with the devil you know than to jump into some kind of an arrangement with the devil you do not know. The status quo, it seems to me, until we get it right, is far preferable than moving to this tax.

I do not want to take too much time but I want to comment on the minister's statement with respect to corporate taxes. I would simply point out very briefly that since the Conservative government has come to power it has increased corporate taxes a little more than 20 per cent, from 20 to 22.5 per cent, while personal income taxes have been raised by 45 per cent. That is part of the problem in dealing with this. Surtaxes remaining in place that were part of tax reform have, I think, exacerbated the problem of where the tax burden in the country lies and how it is being applied to both corporate taxpayers and individuals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have three other questioners for the hon. gentleman; the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, the hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville and the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte. I will recognize the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca first.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I share the feelings of the minister about the tone of this debate but I cannot quite go along with the substance. The tone is very good but the substance is what concerns me. For many years I have heard the appeal that we have to rise above politics and meet the challenges. I have heard these appeals on the basis that the business community has to do this and others do it. But are we not in politics? Is this not the forum where ideas are exchanged but decisions are made by competing parties wishing to be government; one is in waiting, and the third is hopeful that both will fail. That is the nature of politics. To suggest to this House that we have to meet this challenge by some vague method of pulling people together is avoiding reality.

We are in the blood and guts of politics. We stand for office because we have different ideas. I do not like the goods and services tax. My party has proposed an alternative. The member's party claims to be opposed to the goods and services tax, but I hear this flim-flam stuff about having to rise to meet the challenge.

In order to make a decision as to who should govern them, Canadian people need to know. I give credit to this government for courage to press on with its ideas. I do not agree with its ideas, but it has had the guts to press on. Even if the government commits suicide, it is doing a good job.

But as we seek to replace the government, as the Queen mandates us to do this through Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, it is the responsibility of the Official Opposition, and certainly of the third party, to state clearly, when asking for the confidence of the people to return them to office, that should they be returned to office and the goods and services tax is in place, they will immediately cancel it.

I have not heard that from the leadership candidates of the Liberal party. I have not heard that from the Liberal party. What we have is a touch of cynicism which I avoid even raising in an arena like this, but I must. The cynicism is that they are clucking and chucking behind the curtain knowing that the Tories are doing the dirty work for them. They do not have to give a commitment against this tax and they will keep it in place once they are elected in government.

My question requires a yes or no answer; no fudging, no hedging, no beating around the tax bush. Will the Liberal party say absolutely to the Canadian people, yes or no? If you are returned to office, do you pledge to immediately remove the goods and services tax? Yes or no?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, as the premier of British Columbia, was very well known for his yes or no answers.

I want to point out to my hon. friend that should the government majority be able to railroad the GST into place, thereby eliminating the federal sales tax and some $18 billion in revenue, when the Liberal government comes to power, it would be folly to state that that day—

Mr. Barrett: Oh, oh! There it is my friend.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): To walk in and say that day that we are going to increase the deficit by $20 billion—

Mr. Barrett: Oh, oh! Why don't you just vote for it and get it over with.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The point is that when you deal with reality you are faced with a fiscal and a revenue generation system, as the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca knows from when he had, in another incarnation, to manage the affairs of British Columbia. We are very well aware of his fiscal policies.

I do want to say very clearly that our commitment to tax reform is based on a progressive tax system. The goods and services tax is a regressive tax. When tax reform can be implemented those kinds of regressive taxes will be eliminated in a responsible way.

[Translation]

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, we are aware that the government will bring down its budget very shortly.

[English]

Could the hon. member share with us what bad news he feels is in store for us at that time?

• (1220)

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, on the question of the budget, I think Canadians understand that on February 20 the Minister of Finance will come in and announce his budget. We are assuming it will be announced in the House and not somewhere else. When that does happen, I do not have any doubt that the minister will have to address the fact that his deficit will be substantially higher than what was projected last year. That has been a continuing problem for the Minister of Finance.

I think that the Prime Minister and the minister are already preparing the way for a very harsh budget. For me to speculate on what would be included in that budget would be to upset Canadians 10 days prior to the minister actually delivering the bad news himself. I will leave that to the Minister of Finance to inflict on Canadians on February 20.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today asks us to call upon the government to abandon its goods and services tax. I believe our answer is clear and straightforward. The answer is no. Let me explain. To abandon this essential reform of our tax system means abandoning senior citizens; it means abandoning individuals and families who are less well-off; it means abandoning our industries and businesses, both large and small; and it also means abandoning our exporters who are faced with increasingly intense competition on international markets. Mr. Speaker, to abandon this reform is to abdicate our responsibility as a national government.

We do not intend to follow the far from illustrious example of previous governments that lacked the political will and the courage to overcome obstacles to a comprehensive reform of our tax system. This reform—our reform—is indeed a challenge. However, as we demonstrated in our policies on investment, competition, rules, copyright, international trade and many other vital economic issues, this government is prepared to face the major challenges of our time.

It is never easy to initiate a major reform, especially tax reform. Our friends in the Official Opposition who drafted the motion before the House today proved this point, year after year, decade after decade, when they were in power. Despite recommendations made by several royal commissions and parliamentary committees during the past 50 years, they always tried to avoid the complex issues and problems involved in a comprehensive reform of the tax system.

For half a century, our businesses and exporters have been severely handicapped when facing foreign competition. For half a century, Canadians have been paying billions of dollars in federal taxes they were not aware of. Doesn't it strike you as something of a paradox, Mr. Speaker, now that they are sitting comfortably on the opposition benches, that same party is asking the government to abandon its plans for a so-called ill-conceived tax reform, a tax reform that the Liberals, of course, carefully avoided introducing when they were on this side of the House?

[English]

Where was the Liberal party over the last 50 years? More important, where is the Liberal party today on the issue of tax reform? Trying to put together the bits and pieces of Liberal thought on this issue is a little like trying to shovel smoke on a windy day. On this vital issue for the future of Canada the Official Opposition has shown itself to be rather bankrupt. But, when you think about it, bankruptcy is a condition not unknown to that party in its management of our affairs.

One of the few clues to Liberal thinking on this issue can be found in their minority report of November, 1989. They outlined a list of principles of tax reform which included fairness, simplicity, integrated reform, visibility and, yes, revenue neutrality. It sounds pretty good. In fact, these principles have a vaguely familiar ring, not only because of today's motion but because they are exactly what guided the development of our proposed goods and services tax.

One sentence in that report particularly struck me, and I quote: "The Liberal Party has always stood for and defended a fair and progressive tax system." I do not question the sincerity of my Liberal colleagues. I do, however, question their accuracy. Is this not the same party which refused to undertake comprehensive reform of our destructive sales tax system for the past 50 years? Is this not the same party that ignored the Rowell–Sirois report, the Carter commission and the Goodman committee report? Progressive, Mr. Speaker? I suppose this is what is meant by the Liberal interpretation of history.

[Translation]

As for our friends, the New Democrats, we have already given a detailed response to their proposals. Suffice it to say, Mr. Speaker, that the NDP has shown a disturbing lack of intellectual honesty and has inexcusably failed to grasp the realities of our international economy.

For several days now, this party has treated us to a regular roller coaster of obstruction tactics. Day after day, it delayed the business of the House and prevented members of the other two parties from proceeding with the debate on the GST bill. Day after day, NDP spokespersons indicated they were not in the least interested in a real debate on the GST.

When I see this kind of anti–democratic behaviour, I am reminded of something that Rabelais said: Bring down the curtain, the play is over.

I must say that their new leader's performance was rather pitiful. She seemed incapable of dealing with the substance and was constantly spouting generalities, I would even say platitudes, that had no connection with the proposed legislation.

When the Minister of Finance asked her to back up her gratuitous statements on senior citizens and the needy, she was unable to quote any figures, any valid statistics.

Mr. Speaker, you can rebuild a bottomless boat a thousand times, but as long as it doesn't have a bottom, it won't float.

The motion of the Official Opposition requests a comprehensive reform of our tax system. That is exactly what we are proposing in the GST bill. The motion asks for a visible tax. The GST will be visible. It will be applied at the retail level, to a very broad range of items and at a uniform rate. Consumers will know when and how much tax they will be paying. This is a vast improvement over the present system. Today, we have no way of knowing how much federal sales tax we pay. Why? There are four different rates and numerous exemptions, and every tax we pay is hidden somewhere in the production and distribution process.

The motion asks for a reform that will take into consideration all forms of taxation. The GST is part of a comprehensive reform of our tax system which includes changes in personal and corporate income tax, the introduction of refundable credits, the introduction of a tax on large corporations, and so forth.

The motion also asks for a tax reform that will not increase the overall tax burden.

• (1230)

We are proposing precisely a reform which, thanks to refundable credits, will give three quarters of one–parent families and households headed by seniors more after–tax income than they have under the present system. With the credit on inputs, our businesses and exporters will also find their tax burden lighter.

The Official Opposition's motion also asks for an integrated tax system. I presume that means a national system involving both levels of government. Mr. Speaker, from the summer of 1987 to last spring, we had detailed discussions with the provinces on the feasibility of an integrated national sales tax. Although we did not reach agreement, the discussions helped the government develop and design the GST. Furthermore, we are continuing our consultations with the provinces and the door is always open to creating a system with their participation.

Mr. Speaker, today we are at a crossroads in our political and economic history. What road will we choose? The one which leads to the future or the one which leads to the past? The road of reform, freedom and initiative or the road of the status quo, constraints and the faint–hearted?

As for us, Mr. Speaker, we have chosen the future. We are proposing reform and progress. We accept the challenges of political and economic integration with the world. That is the way to a stronger, more dynamic and prosperous modern Canada.

Unfortunately, in spite of what their motion says, our friends in the Opposition are proposing the opposite. With their gaze fixed on the rear-view mirror, they seem to want to take the beaten paths. Faced with a rapidly changing world, the Opposition is seeking the security of known ground. Faced with the challenges of a more open and integrated world, they want Canada to turn its back on the changes, reforms and initiatives of our trading partners.

Mr. Speaker, no one in this House will pretend that reforming our tax system will be simple or easy. That is never the case with big projects. However, few claim that this reform is not necessary for the country's financial and economic health. Because this reform is so important and complex, we listened very carefully to our fellow citizens from all regions and all sectors of activity. Their numerous suggestions did make it a lot easier to improve the original draft. They told us the rate was too high, so we reduced it while at the same time maintaining the essential balance between the various measures which guarantee the equity and protection offered to low-income Canadians.

We have also allayed some of the concerns voiced by businessmen who will have to meet the GST requirements. For example, we will give small businesses a one-time transition credit of up to $1,000, and we have exempted from the current sales tax points of sale electronic equipment and related stock management systems. This is on top of the 100 per cent deduction for the depreciation of this kind of equipment which we made public as early as last August. Then we made a number of technical changes to simplify the implementation of the tax, made the situation of competitive companies more equitable, and improved the tax application in certain sectors.

Mr. Speaker, the system we are proposing under the GST is in keeping with all the reform criteria advocated by the Official Opposition. It will be visible, fair, readily understandable and much simpler than the current system.

Give up our project, Mr. Speaker? Quite the contrary, it is time to act more than ever before. More than ever before, now is the time to build a strong and dynamic country. More than ever before, now is the time to control our own destiny.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague. I should like to know whether you have had any opportunity to consider other approaches or other possibilities with respect to collecting the necessary taxes, and if so which ones? For example—

[English]

Did you look at what the blocking of the various loopholes that now exist would have yielded? Did you look at the possibility of more auditing and how much more funds that would have provided for government? Did you look at the possibility of examining the underground economy to see whether or not there would be some additional financing for government? Did you look at the possibility of increasing corporate taxes? Did you look at a possible new mix of fiscal and monetary policies?

[Translation]

What I really want to know, and I know that from the outset you as a government have emphasized the GST and a number of variations. But quite apart from these other possibilities I am interested to know what you have done to examine the suggestions I just mentioned. Was that really done? If so I should like to have concrete proof, not just comments to that effect.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me an opportunity to clarify a number of points. We did just that and I believe the results are proof positive. I would not say that all the options he suggested have been thoroughly explored. I would suggest these options relate rather to day-to-day management. He said something about loopholes.

[English]

You spoke about the loopholes. My colleague, the Minister of Finance, has provided the House with massive lists of loopholes which we have closed, loopholes which were introduced in our fiscal legislation by your party when you were in power.

Mr. Duhamel: How many still exist? That is what I am asking.

Mr. Loiselle: We are closing them all the time. There are fewer and fewer.

You talk about more auditing. Of course this is a question of better management. We have to keep trying to make sure that the taxes which are owed to the government do come in.

We have looked at all these measures to the extent that when we came into power, for example, our budget was far from being balanced as you know very well. We needed to borrow $16 billion just to make up for the expenditures, apart from the interest on the debt and so on.

Last year we were able to take $9 billion and use that to pay the interest. We have improved the situation by $25 billion. That is very good management. We have lowered the deficit.

Of course we must do more. We increased corporation taxes in the last budget by $2 billion. The package that was introduced by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, is linked with the GST. There is a limit to the pressure you can put on that.

When I listen to these stories about thousands and thousands of corporations making a profit and not paying any taxes, it always throws me off because it is not true. It was true many years ago, but we have worked in a very careful way to close these things and to make sure they pay their contribution.

Some companies have a profit which is paid as a dividend that is taxed. It cannot be taxed twice. Others are very small companies, many of them farms, which have had an average profit of $25,000 over the last few years. These are areas with respect to which we have been asked to be very generous in order to make sure that employment is maintained. You cannot have it both ways.

We are looking at all these avenues. I do not think that they can make up a major pillar of our taxation system.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: A brief comment, Mr. Speaker. I think the Minister of State for Finance may have gone further than his text and perhaps even his thoughts. He said that Bill C-62 is "compréhensif dans son concept". I looked up the definition of the word because I had the impression the minister's definition is not the same as mine. "Compréhensif" means that which is easily understood and defined.

Mr. Speaker, the bill is one of the most complex ever tabled in the House.

It is not easy to understand, and when I hear him talk about a "readily understandable" reform, I wonder where on earth he got that idea from. Either he did not read the bill, and I am pretty sure the Minister of State for Finance has read it, unlike the Minister for International Trade who does not read his documentation. But where did he get the idea that this document is simple when we know that it is one of the most complicated, that, as the Canadian people keep telling them, it will be hard to interpret and, in many cases, very complex for small business, and that the manufacturing and others industries will have a hard time understanding and implementing it. I have a very straightforward question for the Minister, since it involves a remark I made on the meaning of the French word "compréhensif".

Will the Minister admit that this goods and services tax bill is the biggest tax break ever given to Canadian corporations? I am using these simple terms so that he will be able to answer my question. Will he admit that it is the largest tax break ever, what we would call a Christmas present, to corporations? The 13.5 per cent tax is being removed but there is no guarantee that they will be passing on these savings to the Canadian people under the GST.

Mr. Loiselle: The hon. member is quoting from the Petit Robert, I believe.

Some hon. members: The Grand Robert.

Mr. Loiselle: I must say that being in Ottawa, where we switch back and forth from one language to another, as he very well knows, we sometimes make mistakes. When I said "compréhensif" in French, I was probably using it with the English meaning of "comprehensive" or "wide-ranging". Besides that, the hon. member is right in a way. Canadians pay tax, but if you put the tax laws in front of them, not one of them could truly say they would be able to get through it, and that certainly applies to me. But if you like, while we are here—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Loiselle: I can read it, but in fact I must say that I have good accountants to explain it to me. Those documents are indeed very complicated but we can summarize the main idea. When we talk about exemptions, for example, on basic food or medicine, not everyone necessarily has to deal with all that. They are usually concerned with only one area and everyone will get detailed explanations.

So I think our bill is "comprehensive" in that it is all-inclusive. It is also "understandable" because 48 countries have such a tax. I do not think Canadians are dumber, as some would have us believe, than the people in those 48 countries that have a tax which works very well and is based on exactly the same principles as ours, often with several rates.

[English]

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about the proof being in the pudding. I suggest that the proof is that this government is incapable of managing the economy.

He talks about the future. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the future is a nightmare for lower and middle income groups, as well as small business, as reflected in the GST.

I suggest that this government wishes to punish the Canadian people for its mistakes and mismanagement of the economy. I want to ask the minister this: How is it that this government has raised taxes 31 times in the last five years, thus increasing taxes on middle income people by over 60 per cent and at the same time doubling the debt from $160 billion to over $360 billion in 1990?

Perhaps, while he is up, he may want to tell us what pre-budget consultation his government has undertaken in preparation of the budget to be tabled on February 20.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has covered a lot of ground. I do not know in the time remaining if I can cover everything.

He said that we are punishing the people. The economy has increased and of course people are paying more taxes, but their incomes have also increased to the extent that they have more money now than they had before.

Mr. Fontana: In their pockets? Are you kidding?

Mr. Loiselle: The hon. gentleman does not realize that the number of unemployed people who were there when we came into power was as a result of the awful state of the economy. We had to raise taxes to make up for the deficit we found when we came in.

In the last year there was a 17 per cent increase in spending. We have lowered that over a period of five years to 3.6 per cent, 5 per cent, and so on each year. We are very good managers and we are very proud of our performance. It is difficult to manage, but we have improved the situation considerably.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a couple of comments on what the hon. minister had to say. What I want to emphasize the most is the fact that there has not been any real debate on this particular issue. The things we are hearing from the Liberal Party and the NDP are the same things we have heard all along. They say that there is no real debate. They are using the same kinds of tactics that they have used on any initiative that this government has attempted to take. What we do here is maintain the status quo, and we know the status quo has been broken. It has been broken since 1924 and we know it.

Every Canadian who has a head on his shoulders knows that this present tax system is broken. What do they want to do, hold on to it?

I suggest that Canadians put that question to each and every Liberal candidate who is seeking the leadership of that party. In fact some are on record as saying that they would maintain the status quo. That is exactly the same thing they have done since Confederation—maintain the status quo. But they do not attempt to do anything different, anything that might take a little imagination or anything that is the least bit controversial. They will always take the easy road. They have done it for years. They will take the easy road and the low road. They have not changed.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I would certainly agree that it is not an easy road, but it is the only good road for the economy and the people of this country. We are taking it.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for allowing me to enter into this debate under the rules of this House. I have been very interested in sitting here listening closely to what people are saying and hoping to become informed.

I thought the member from the Liberal Party who asked the questions about the 30 increases in tax and the increase in the deficit had some very valid questions. I was disappointed that the minister did not respond to those valid questions. In effect, what the minister said to my friend in the Liberal Party is that the reason we have more debt is that we have more money. That is right.

It was Orwellian. He said that we have more money in the economy, people have more money in their pockets, ergo, we have more debt. My parents raised me during the depression years. When we had more money we paid down the debt.

The Conservatives have invented a whole new strategy in the economy. When you have more money, go deeper into debt.

Mr. Larrivée: He didn't say that.

Mr. Barrett: He did. You read what he said.

The logical conclusion of his statement is that if we have more money then we have more debt. My God, let's go poor so we can pay off the debt: that is the stupidity of the attitude of this government in terms of its responsibility.

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that is absolutely not what I said. I did not have time to get into the subject of the debt. I could answer him that the debt rose because we carried forward the Liberals' deficit, although we reduced it. That is obviously not what I said. I explained that Canadians paid more tax because their incomes were higher and they had more money in their pockets.

[English]

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I don't mind the interruption as long as it does not come off my time. Not only do they squeeze up the debt, they take up other people's time. I want that time recorded back to myself.

What I got out of it is inescapable Orwellian thinking. We have more money, therefore, we have more debt and that is all there is to it.

I like to hear all this discussion from an academic sense from the minister. It is a lecture that says to the Canadian people: "We have to be responsible. We have to pay these bills down. The rich cannot afford to do this, otherwise they would not be rich any more. It has to be the poor and the middle income earners who will have to do it".

• (1250)

After all, I understand the Conservative philosophy. If we tax the rich they will not be rich any more. Would that not be unfair? They would have to pay taxes and maybe not enjoy the luxuries as much. Therefore the poor and those in the middle must pay the tax.

I know now the purpose of this coin established by this government. It is known as the loonie, which is absolutely appropriate. Before somebody in the middle income tax bracket gets to spend this loonie it is already reduced to 70 cents because of the 30 per cent, on average, tax that has been paid. Some poor bank clerk, some security attendant or some other people who service this place get a loonie, and it is only worth 70 cents.

Then they live in a province where they have on average a sales tax of 10 per cent, but not Alberta. I will come to Alberta in a minute. We are not going to hear from the Alberta MPs. I have to speak not only for British Columbia but for Alberta because the Alberta members have been struck dumb on this issue. It is incredible the new handicap they have. They are speechless politicians, a genre unique to the Tories of Alberta. When you raise the question of GST, they are gone, dead, disappeared, with the exception of Kindy who they want to trade off anyway. He is the only one from Alberta who says he is against the tax.

Returning to the loonie, Mr. Speaker, it is down now to 70 cents. With 10 per cent on a provincial tax it is down to 60 cents. There is 4.5 per cent off for inflation and another nickel on stupid high interest rates and we have a 50-cent loonie.

That is what average people have in their pockets after they have already paid taxes. The surtaxes on the taxes reduce this loonie to 50 cents. We have a government of 50-cent loonies. They are four-bit loonies. It is a whole new expression. The Tories are four-bit loonies, and they are trying to tell us that they are being fair with the taxes. Goodbye loonie, spend it now before it goes down to 40 cents. The way these guys are going they will have to use these in nickel slot machines and hope for the best.

Let us talk about debate. The Conservatives say: "We have been fair. We have listened to people. We are the Conservatives. We believe in democracy". Yesterday was the twelfth time we have had closure in the life of this Parliament. The door is closing more frequently in this debate than it is in the washrooms of this Chamber. They close the door with everything they do. On debate, it is closure, closure, closure.

Now we are going to go to committee, and do you know what is going to happen, Mr. Speaker? I know what is going to happen. I hate to share this with the House. Thank goodness there are only a few people here.

They are going to have the committee meetings here in Ottawa. They are not going to travel across Canada. They are not going to open the doors to ordinary people. They are going to use my good friend, that fellow from Mississauga, as the chairperson of the committee. He is going to say: "No, we are not travelling. No, we are going to close it down". It is a whole new concept. Not only are they going to have closure in this House, they are going to use closure on the Canadian people by keeping the committee here in Ottawa.

Some 80 per cent of the population is against this tax. Why would a government pursue a policy when 80 per cent of the voters are against it? We have to ask who their masters are. If the masters are the vex populi, the ordinary Canadians, men and women who say they want a government that is reasonable, responsible and fair, 80 per cent of whom say they are against the tax, then reasonable people will expect that a responsible government would say: "80 per cent of the people do not want to pay the tax. We had better take a second look".

Who do they represent? It is not the 80 per cent. They represent the corporate elite in this country who have been dictating the fiscal agenda in this Chamber since the Tories got elected.

It is a big problem for the Liberals. Some of them are actually Liberal. They are going to have a fight about who dictates their agenda, but we know that that is a separate problem. As a social worker I am available, for a fee, to assist them.

Mr. Duhamel: You are doing well so far, so just back off.

Mr. Karygiannis: No hidden microphones here.

Mr. Barrett: I do not mean to rile up the Liberals. The reality is—and we heard it today—that the Liberals have declared publicly: "We are against this tax. We are mad at government. Please don't pass it, but if it does pass I guess we are going to have to keep it if we are in government".

You know, Mr. Speaker, I heard it with my own ears. There it is, Mr. Speaker, right out in the open: no bugs.

There was closure in the House. There will be closure in the committee. That is exactly what the Liberals want.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Barrett: The Liberals are chuckling, giggling, and laughing behind the curtains. They look at the polls which show that they are away up and may win the election. These guys across the way are committing suicide, and the Liberals are going to embrace the hemlock and live off it because it is their fault.

Do you know who is getting hosed in this, Mr. Speaker? The same people who have the 50-cent loonie from this outfit. Ordinary Canadians are being taken for a ride by the same two old line parties which represent the corporate interest, the bottom line of this country, no matter what is going on.

The member said that I was a Minister of Finance. He is correct. We squeezed $800 million out of the oil companies that the federal Liberals were allowing to go into U.S. pockets. That was a change in taxation. You should have heard the former ministers, except for their leader, who had the courage to take it.

Mr. Milliken: And the people threw you out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to hear the hon. member. The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has the floor.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I am glad you intervened. I was getting so interested I wanted to hear myself.

Perhaps we could agree, Mr. Speaker, that it is one o'clock and I will complete my remarks later this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have eight minutes left in his speech, plus ten minutes for questions and comments when we return after lunch.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 12.57 p.m., the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, as Canadians we are fortunate to live in such a wonderful country. Created out of a wilderness with the blood, sweat and tears of people from every part of the globe, we are the envy of the world. But there is a lesson to be learned from historic events occurring in eastern Europe where every day walls are being torn down.

The world is full of examples of what can happen to a nation when its people lose faith. In Ontario, municipalities have been expressing their concern for the economic impact of the province's Bill 8, an act to provide for French language services.

Some of these municipalities are in my federal constituency in eastern Ontario, and they have expressed disappointment and surprise at the recent irresponsible statements made by the premier of Ontario on this sensitive and deeply rooted issue.

Let us remember that, only through goodwill and tolerance, can we hope to have a stronger and unified Canada.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on February 2, an agreement in principle was reached between the Ontario government and five Indian First Nations on Manitoulin Island, concerning their historic land claim involving some 36,400 hectares of land and $8.9 million in land and money.

Once the agreement is ratified by the parties involved, it will settle at the provincial level a land claim that has been going on for many years which has caused uncertainty not only for the bands but, as well, the municipalities of the Manitoulin district.

So far the federal government has refused to negotiate with the Manitoulin First Nations their part of the land claim; that is, to pay compensation for the loss of the use of these lands for the past 128 years since the treaty was signed in 1862.

Now that Ontario has reached an agreement on this claim, I call on the federal government to sit down with the Manitoulin First Nations and negotiate a fair and equitable settlement for this land claim. It is essential not only for the First Nations of Manitoulin, but for the entire district.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, on December 13, the Prime Minister made a commitment to Atlantic Canadians that this government would be as generous to them as it had been to Prairie farmers last year.

The Prime Minister reaffirmed this commitment on January 22. Where is this help? Tens of thousands of Atlantic Canadians are facing no future if they choose to stay in the region. They see their jobs disappearing, their communities and way of life threatened.

Ken Stein, who heads the government's task force charged to provide cabinet with options for the Atlantic fishery, told the fisheries committee that the best approach is more research and development of underutilized species and advised the committee that the government was not interested in subsidizing the industry.

Canso, the first community to benefit from this thinking will lose its trawler fleet and see the replacement of 800 jobs with 150 jobs shared between 300 people. Some solution!

This is the federal government's idea of help when at least two-thirds of those involved in the fishery can look forward to losing their jobs, having to leave their communities and those remaining can look forward to temporary work at best?

What are these skilled Atlantic Canadians to do between now and when the stocks are replenished? When is the Prime Minister's commitment to provide Atlantic Canada with $1 billion worth of aid—the amount he said he provided the prairie farmers—going to be fulfilled? When are Atlantic Canadians going to see a full-blown strategy to deal with the crisis they face?

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, since my arrival here some months ago I have been puzzled by the absence of discussion about language. My view is that after many years of official bilingualism there is still a great misunderstanding between the French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians.

To English Canada the language issue is one more of economics, language and convenience. To French Canada the issue is one of culture and the very way of life.

As a unilingual Canadian I have experienced the isolation of being in a group of French-speaking Canadians and not understanding what is being said. Perhaps this is the same isolation that French-Canadians feel in a continent which is mostly English.

French members on the other hand express surprise that language is even an issue at all in my English riding. But in an area of high unemployment and limited opportunities many people otherwise qualified for government jobs are disqualified because they do not speak a second language.

Now municipal, provincial and federal governments are passing language laws but laws will never resolve these questions. Only understanding will. Understanding should start right here. I urge English and French members to begin a dialogue to begin to understand our differences and then maybe we can develop some successful solutions.

CATALOGUE MAILINGS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, Canadian Forces Bases Borden, Kingston, and Petawawa were recently the target of a catalogue mailing from a lingerie company. The recipients of this mailing are upset and deeply offended.

The catalogue in question arrived unwrapped and contained pictures that are borderline pornography. In many cases children in the families were the first to see the catalogue. This has upset many parents who feel that their fundamental right to choose what is acceptable or not has been challenged.

More important, the fact that they were the only people in the ridings to receive this material is unsettling. It casts aspersions upon the character of these people. It is as if the company that manufactures these goods feel that Canadian Forces personnel are more likely to purchase them than anyone else.

Canada Post adheres to the Criminal Code when deciding what should be wrapped before it is mailed. To that end, I am looking into proposing an amendment to the Criminal Code that deals with the problem of offensive and targeted mailings.

These peoples' rights have been infringed upon and such incidences should be rendered preventable.

INTERNATIONAL HOCKEY PEEWEE TOURNAMENT

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, today is the official opening in Quebec City of the 31st International Peewee Hockey Tournament, Mr. Alex Légaré presiding.

I wish to take this opportunity to praise the dedication and understanding of a man who, for more than 10 year, has done everything to help these young hockey players.

I also wish to mention all those who worked so hard to organize this tournament and the many sponsors who have made this event a resounding success.

A word of praise also to the parents who accompanied their children on frequent trips, which in many cases, Mr. Speaker, had to be organized with very limited resources.

And now I wish to congratulate our young hockey players, on behalf of the people in Québec-Est, for their energy and courage in preparing for this competition, and I wish them the very best of luck.

MINORITY RIGHTS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my deep concern with the spread of serious symptoms of intolerance in our country.

Recently we have seen many examples of this ugliness. A pin showing a white person surrounded by stereotyped and menacing images of minority groups, a vulgar and racist handbill declaring open season on native people, a racist anti-Sikh calendar, many failures to respect minority language rights here in Canada.

Canada is built on tolerance. When this fundamental characteristic is eroded we lose the essence of what it is to be Canadian. The national government must really play a leadership role, a substantive role. It must stand up for minority rights everywhere and it must stop the continuing polarization of the have and the have-nots in this country.

DONALD MARSHALL INQUIRY

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, Nova Scotia's Attorney General may have apologized to Donald Marshall but Nova Scotia's response to the Marshall Commission recommendations are deceitful and defensive.

They exonerate the justice system again by blaming Marshall's socioeconomic status rather than the justice system for his poor treatment. In fact, Nova Scotia boasts that its system treats Indians better than western provinces, which put more Indians in jail. Nova Scotia has rejected virtually every substantive recommendation of the Marshall Report but has couched its rejection in the language of acceptance.

The refusal of Nova Scotia to accept the Marshall Inquiry's recommendations, and to be honest about the shortcomings of its justice system, amount to another whitewash. It means we will be seeing more cases like Donald Marshall's.

S. O. 31

I call on the Minister of Justice to take immediate and effective action at every level of the justice system throughout Canada so that our aboriginal people can receive fair treatment under the law.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, last week the Secretary of State and the Minister of Education for Quebec announced a series of innovative measures to be undertaken by the provincial government. These will constitute part of the federal-provincial agreement on official languages in education.

Given the extent of the English language school system in Quebec, the province receives a sizeable portion of the financial assistance allocated by the federal government to the provinces.

Under the agreement, the Government of Canada will contribute $328 million over the next four years toward minority language education and second-language teaching in Quebec.

This financial assistance will permit the Government of Quebec to direct $27 million toward new capital projects in various English-language educational institutions. Significant sums will also be directed toward the teaching of French and English as second languages.

The two ministers have also announced innovative initiatives to encourage exchange and dialogue between young people from our two linguistic communities. As well, a number of joint projects will be established to give support to francophones outside Quebec in the area of education.

It goes without saying that these measures are both timely and desirable for the harmonious development of our Canadian linguistic duality.

JUSTICE

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to inform the House of a grave miscarriage of justice.

S. O. 31

During the evening of April 29, 1989 five young women were seriously wounded when the car in which they were driving was hit by a van driven at high speed in the wrong direction on a one-way street.

The van had been stolen, the driver, Gérard Arbic, had just been released on parole. He had no driver's licence. With two accomplices he was trying to escape a police chase after the burglary of a supermarket. Gérard Arbic was later sentenced to seven and a half years in jail.

Milva Di Francesco is one of my constituents. She is one of the young women injured in the collision. She is 19 years old. Right now she would have been starting commerce or business administration at McGill or at Concordia University. She had been accepted by both institutions. However, she has been unconscious since the night of the accident.

With good behaviour Gérard Arbic will probably be eligible for parole in two and a half years. Milva Di Francesco will probably be still in a coma.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a petition that I will give personally to the Minister of Justice.

This petition contains more than 9,000 signatures of Canadian citizens who call upon the federal government to amend the legislation so as to impose more severe sentences for criminal offences causing serious bodily harm or leading to death.

Mr. Speaker, the government should also do more to help the victims of crime and their families.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have received an overwhelming response to a survey on the goods and services tax.

Several hundred people did more than reply. They wrote letters, many of them three and four pages of ideas and constructive criticism. Of the total replies received, 29 per cent were categorically opposed, 8 per cent offered their unqualified support and 63 per cent offered a qualified support, mainly a call on the government to practise restraint and reduce spending. The detailed results of my survey have been forwarded to the Minister of Finance. I have assured him that the people of Red Deer understand the need to eliminate the deficit and control the debt. They will support—indeed, they demand a tough budget and further restraint in government spending.

CHANGING WORLD EVENTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's decision to eliminate the monopoly power of the Communist Party in the USSR must surely now convince even the most stubborn that a security system based on the notion of "better dead than Red", is now truly archaic.

A nuclear strategy designed to incinerate the people of eastern Europe and the Soviet Union and ourselves in the process, was always heinous and unacceptable. Its continued existence now is nothing less than radical evil.

Let us finally bury the big scare, and while building a new common security system in Europe, turn our political and moral energies to many other countries which are equally in need of glasnost, like Burma, which has been called Asia's Romania; or South Korea where we hear too much about economic miracles and too little about continuing repression; or Taiwan where a Canadian like Yih-Sheh Leo was recently arrested and detained for political reasons; or China proper, which continues to oppress its own citizens, and Tibet.

The list goes on, but it is not endless. It is finite and susceptible to human purpose. May all the anti-Communist energies that have been used for good or ill over the years be turned against oppression of all kinds, economic and political, in whatever guise.

INVESTMENT CANADA

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Well, here we go again. Another plant will close in Canada. This time a battery plant will close in my riding after another sale to an American company and 175 jobs will be lost. Investment Canada has approved the sale, but why? This is the government agency that has a mandate to protect Canadian workers and Canadian investment.

If there is a net benefit to Canada in this sale, where is it? It would be difficult to convince the workers that there is a net benefit to them. It would be difficult to convince Winnipegers that there is a net benefit to them.

If there is a net benefit to Canada, it has not been spelled out by Investment Canada or by this government.

Winnipegers and Canadians have a right to know. I challenge the government to make the facts public right now. In this sale, western Canada loses all of its battery production. Under this deal, Americans have gobbled up another Canadian competitor. Where will it all end? Canadians want answers and they want them now.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue's office recently held meetings with local customs officials to discuss the matter of extending services at Centreville, in my riding of Carleton—Charlotte. At that meeting there was unanimous resolve on the part of local departmental officials and union representatives to find a solution that would extend commercial service beyond the current deadline of 5 p.m. To date, officials in Ottawa have resisted such a change, citing that such a move would be contrary to the department's need to reduce expenditures.

The facts do not support this position. The number of people on duty after 5 p.m., at Centreville does not change. Consequently, there will be no need to increase staffing budgets. Furthermore, the volume of traffic is such that the additional time needed to process commercial entries would not seriously affect the department's ability to serve non-commercial traffic.

In short, the only real difference resulting from this change in status is the ability of the department to better serve the needs of the local community.

I call upon the Minister of Revenue to direct his department to—

Mr. Speaker: Unfortunately, the hon. member's time has expired.

USSR

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, the events of recent days in the Soviet Union have been extraordinary. Mikhail Gorbachev has shown courageous leadership in moving his country toward democracy and economic renewal. We should commend his vision and applaud his skills.

By taking these steps, Mr. Gorbachev has also given a challenge to all other countries. The challenge is to dare to undertake those procedures which will build a mutual environment of confidence. All countries should work to respond to this opportune moment in history.

Next week, in Ottawa, Canada will have the opportunity to play a leading role in advancing the confidence-building measures. The Open Skies Conference is a unique occasion for Canada to make a substantive contribution to verification procedures, tension reduction and confidence-building. This statement is shared by all members of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

• (1420)

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. He knows that the legislation imposing a 7 per cent tax on all goods and services has not yet passed this House, has not passed the Senate, and has not received Royal Assent and yet he will recall that last fall he authorized the spending of over $1 million of taxpayers' funds to put ads in all the newspapers to say that the tax was a fact and asking Canadians to save those ads.

Well, apparently, Mr. Speaker, in spite of even your condemnation of these ads, some firms apparently did save this notice and are already charging the new tax to Canadians. Will the Minister of Finance confirm that Metropole Emergency Response Centre of Winnipeg is already billing its clients for this new tax, and will the Minister of Finance tax immediate steps to find out how widespread this practice is and take immediate steps to have it stopped immediately?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague is quite well aware that it would be quite inappropriate for any company to charge GST today. There is a federal sales tax in place. That is the only federal sales tax that should be levied on any good today, and until that is eliminated, which will be the case with the GST, then it is inappropriate. If my colleague would like to provide me with the details that he has just mentioned to me right now, I would be happy to look into it.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to send the Minister of Finance the facts on this situation, but what we have here is evidence of a blatant lack of respect for democracy and the House of Commons of this country. As I said before, ads appeared in the papers, telling Canadians that the House had spoken and that in any case, we would have a new tax as of January 1, 1991. A $14 million advertising campaign was launched to persuade Canadians to accept the new tax. Debate in this House on one of the most important tax proposals in our history was blocked with a motion of closure. The fact that today, people are being charged a tax that does not yet exist, is, I would suggest to the Minister, a logical consequence of this systematic erosion of the democratic process. Why did the Minister let this kind of situation develop?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the focus of that last question of the hon. member was. The point I should make to my friend is that the advertisement of which he is critical was an advertisement in late August which advertised a 9 per cent tax. Clearly the person who is charging 7 per cent, according to the allegations that he has just made, is dealing with another piece of information besides that particular ad, so the two things are not linked.

Now, he has made the point that we have ended debate on the second reading of the GST legislation. I think he understands the reasons we had to do that. We had offered the House the other day four hours of debating time and the opposition parties, particularly the New Democratic Party, wasted three of those hours. This place is for debate. I think it is important that we understand—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister is attempting to defend the indefensible when he talks about the government imposing closure on debate on second reading of the GST legislation in this House. If he is so concerned about that and so interested in debate, will he give an undertaking on behalf of the government that in spite of what the chairman of the finance committee says about getting the legislation through his committee in only four weeks, he will insist that the Conservative majority in that committee give Canadians all the time they need to make their point about how bad this tax really is?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the House Leader and the Whip of the Opposition, has said—I am using his lines on this—that what the New Democratic Party was doing was silly; it was wasting Parliament's time. This is the reason that we moved the way we did yesterday.

As far as debate is concerned, we have been dealing with this particular legislation going back to a White Paper in June of 1987. We have had extensive consultations, discussions with organizations, social groups and labour groups that were interested in it. We have discussed the matter with the provinces. We had another paper in the April budget, the technical paper in August, the draft legislation in October and the response to the finance committee. The finance committee worked all through the fall. We have had tremendous openness and consultation discussion on this.

Ms. Clancy: Nonsense.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It is now time that we get on with the job.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The bank rate today went up to 12.79 per cent, the highest in the five and a half year record of this government. Historically, the real interest rate in Canada, that is, the interest rate minus inflation, has been about 2.5 percentage points. With today's rate increase this real interest rate has gone up to about 7.5 per cent. When is the government going to recognize that its high interest rate policy, which is driving us into recession, is wrong?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I may quote my hon. friend when he was on this side of the House in 1981, "there is no quick and easy solution to dealing with the problems of inflation and getting interest rates down."

We acknowledge, we recognize the importance of low interest rates to the health of an economy. But, we also know that it is important to get those interest rates down on a permanent basis. That can only be done if we can get the problem of inflation under control. We are facing the problem of inflation. We are facing up to it in a way that the previous government, through the 1970s and early 1980s, did not face up to it. That is why we got into the problem with which the hon. member was presented when he made those comments in 1981. These matters take time. We are dealing with them and we are going to follow through on the plan that I presented in November of 1984 as well as in the April budget last year.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the difference between myself and the minister since 1981 is that I think I have become wiser.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Wisdom is rare and should never be denigrated.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peterson: Certainly on the government benches, Mr. Speaker.

The historical difference between U.S. and Canadian interest rates has been about two percentage points. With our rate increase today, this spread is well up over 4.8 percentage points. This high interest rate policy, which artificially inflates the value of the Canadian dollar, is having very serious consequences for Canadian exporters and Canadian workers. Will the minister table in this House and make public all communications that he or his officials have had with their American counterparts since prior to the free trade agreement being signed up until now with regard to keeping our dollar high in order to help the Americans with their trade deficit at the expense of Canadian exporters and Canadian workers?

• (1430)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the wisdom that my hon. friend displayed in the opening part of that question deteriorated badly as he got through to the final posing of the question.

The point that my hon. friend is making is that interest rates are causing some difficulties within the country. I understand that, but I also understand what the alternative is. If we do not deal with the inflation problem, we are going to have some very serious, longer lasting problems with high interest rates.

My hon. friend said he is wiser today than he was back in 1981. I would hope so, because in 1981 he was defending a policy which led into the most serious recession that we have had in many years. That is what we are trying to avoid.

He also said he wants to see all of the correspondence that is exchanged between this government and the United States government. Surely he understands that that is a ridiculous request to make.

[Translation]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): I also have a question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. This afternoon, the Bank of Canada sharply raised interest rates in this country and the discount rate is now at its highest level since the summer of 1984. My question is therefore addressed to the Finance Minister. When will he stop being John Crow's puppet? When will he tell John Crow, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, that enough is enough, that interest rates in this country are now too high for ordinary people?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at any time when one is dealing with very difficult and complex matters of government and public policy, one always has to look at alternatives. My friend says, "get interest rates down". Tell me, how is he going to get interest rates down? Is it just picking up the phone and speaking to the Governor of the Bank of Canada and saying, "Governor, get the interest rates down?". That does not work, because you have to get interest rates down through operations in the marketplace. That leads to an increase in bank loans, and that leads to higher inflation which automatically leads to high interest rates on a permanent basis and an ongoing deterioration of the competitive position of the Canadian economy. That costs jobs, and when we lose jobs, we lose those jobs on a permanent basis.

We understand the importance of getting interest rates down. We would like to do so, but we want to get them down on a permanent basis. The NDP approach to getting them down simply will not work.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, back in June the finance committee, supported by all three parties in this House, told the minister how to bring down interest rates in this country. It seems to me that Mr. Crow is only flying on his right wing. There are alternatives. This morning the Conference Board said that business confidence in this country is at a level almost as low as 1981, and that was before the increases in the bank rate this week and again last week.

Because of the economic and monetary crisis in this country, when is the minister going to present a budget to this House to deal with that crisis facing the Canadian people? When are we going to have a budget, and when are we going to have some concrete action?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are going to have a budget on Tuesday, February 20. In that budget we are going to set out in a very clear way how we are dealing with the problems that we have today and how we are going to continue to deal with them into the future.

What we are doing now and what we are proposing to do is a continuation of the plan that we have had in place since November, 1984. The results of that plan have been that job creation in this country has been the best of any of the major industrialized countries, and economic growth in Canada has been second only to Japan and only by a small margin short of Japan. What we have been doing is working, and what we are going to do in the future will also work and will lead to a continuation of the excellent record that we have had so far.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): I do not think any serious Canadian believes what the Minister of Finance is saying. He is sounding more and more like Allan MacEachen every day.

Is the Minister of Finance not aware what a high interest rate policy is doing to farmers in this country, to small business people, to Atlantic Canada, to the regions, and to the north? If he is not aware of that, why does he not he take up his responsibility and resign as Minister of Finance, or call upon John Crow to resign as the Governor of the Bank of Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the preamble to the hon. member's question, he just delivered the ultimate insult. I cannot accept the recommendation that he has made.

What I will say to my hon. friend is that I am very much interested in the well-being of the small businessman, the farmer, the fisherman, the people in various parts of this country, and the people who live in all regions of this country.

I am convinced that the approach which we have been following over the last five years is absolutely the right approach, and it has been proven in the economic record that we have seen as a country over these past five years. We want to continue that record, but we know that if we ignore the inflation problem that we have seen developing over the last couple of years, we are going to get right back into the problem that Mr. MacEachen got us into back in 1981–82.

An hon. member: That is where you are going.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend says that is where we are going. That is precisely where we are not going to go, and that is precisely why we are doing what we are doing so we can avoid that.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Today's papers carried the shocking news that the government's long-promised environmental action plan has been scuttled and all Canadians will get is a discussion paper.

Canadians were promised an action plan, concrete measures, timetables and money for the environment. Once again they have been betrayed.

Why has the Deputy Prime Minister and, for that matter, the Prime Minister allowed in-fighting in cabinet to destroy the most important action this government needs to take?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that question has been answered in the House before. It was referred to by the Prime Minister a couple of days ago. Clearly, the action plan that the Minister of the Environment has referred to is in the process of being developed. There are broad-based consultations currently under way.

I can assure the hon. member that there will be a comprehensive environmental package that will be introduced pursuant to the commitment made in the Speech from the Throne.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister. Canadians want concrete measures, right away. The government once again has not kept its word, its promises. Why is the government treating the environment as a second-class matter? Why does it not have an action plan for the Budget?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with respect, that statement is absolute nonsense. The fact of the matter is that this government has a tremendous environmental record. The Prime Minister has made a commitment.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

• (1440)

Mr. Mazankowski: Obviously, the hon. members were not paying attention when I reeled off the long list of environmental initiatives that this government had undertaken.

Mr. Crawford: Rhetoric.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. members cannot have it both ways. On the one hand, they argue that there is inadequate consultation with the people of Canada, and on the other hand, they want firm action right now. Well, they will get firm action as soon as the consultative process is completed. I know very well that the hon. member will be very pleased with the action plan that the Minister of the Environment will unveil.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

On page 8 of the GST brochure published recently for small business there is an accounting table which implies, wrongly, that small businessmen can collect their accounts receivable at the same rate as their outstanding bills.

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister to give us one example of a small business likely to use such an unrealistic accounting procedure, and to explain why he used such a misleading example in a brochure aimed at helping small business understand this unfair tax.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is asking a question which would be more appropriate outside of Question Period. However, if he would like to provide me with the specifics of a detailed question like that, I would be happy to respond to it.

What is proposed in this booklet is an illustration of how the accounts of a small business can be conducted for purposes of calculating the goods and services tax. My friend would be quite interested in knowing that about 25 or 30 per cent of the calls to the 1-800 number for the GST are asking for the precise information that we are giving in this type of a book and in other brochures that we have prepared for the Canadian people.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe it. This is the minister who said this tax was so simple, so easy to understand.

Will the minister admit that even the so-called simplest aspects of his tax are based on a lack of understanding of small business, and how small business works? If the minister cannot understand small business, how does he expect small business to understand him and accept his tax. Will he, right now in this House, withdraw the brochure which was sent out to over 1.8 million people and withdraw this tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have made it absolutely clear to this House that we are not going to withdraw the tax. What we have looked at on many occasions in discussing this matter with members of the House, are alternatives. What are the alternatives for a goods and services tax? The Liberal opposition has no alternatives. I have requested alternatives from the Leader of the Opposition, the finance critic of the Liberal party, and I will ask the member for Willowdale, if there are alternatives that the hon. members would like to put forward, we will be happy to review them.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. As he knows, the Minister of the Environment, on behalf of the government, promised environmental assessment legislation in the spring of 1989 for the fall of that year, and we still do not have it. He promised last fall that there was going to be a five-year action plan announced around budget time and that, apparently, is one or two weeks from now.

Since this government has had five years to come up with an environmental action plan and still does not have one, can the Deputy Prime Minister give us a date when there is going to be an environmental action plan which has what the minister promised, a plan of action, a list of concrete measures, the amounts that will be spent and a clear timetable? When do we get it, 1990 or 2000?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked whether or not the government's comprehensive action plan would be available in 1990 or 2000.

I can say to the hon. member that after the appropriate period of consultation with environmental groups, with industry, with provincial government representatives, there will be both legislation introduced into this House and an action plan deposited in this House in the year 1990.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, again on behalf of the government. On Monday this government voted against completing the national parks system by the year 2000, even though the Minister of the Environment is on the public record, on behalf of the government, promising the completion of the national park system by that year.

Would the Deputy Prime Minister advise this House whether or not sufficient planning, staff and funds are in place to complete Canada's national park system by the year 2000? Yes or no.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this government reformed the National Parks Act in its last mandate. It has allocated major new funding to Canada's historic buildings and sites.

As a matter of fact, we established the first national marine park at Bruce Peninsula, the Rouge River Wilderness area, $106 million to South Moresby for the creation of a national park in an area of sustainable development, which I am sure the hon. member supported. We created six new national parks which protect over 40,000 square kilometres.

Mr. Speaker, that is a record. That is a solid record of progress and achievement.

HOUSING

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing. Violence against women is intolerable, unacceptable, and it must be stopped.

In June 1988, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in conjunction with National Health and Welfare, allocated $22 million to support the development of emergency shelters for victims of family violence.

To date, I have not heard any further news with regard to this $22 million. In light of what happened Monday in Calgary when a woman was sexually assaulted at a busy intersection, can the minister please tell this House what has happened to this program and just where the $22 million has been allocated?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a program known as Project Haven under which the federal government committed to pay for some 500 new hostel rooms across the country for women and children who are the victims of family violence.

As of the end of last year, some 100 of those allocations had been committed. We expect that some 275 more of those units will be committed by the end of June.

Unfortunately, at the moment we have not been able to reach any agreement with the province of Ontario or the province of Prince Edward Island with respect to these allocations. In Alberta, we have put out two proposal calls for bids. We have received only seven expressions of interest, unfortunately none of those were in the city of Calgary. I hope that the hon. member will encourage the social housing groups in the city of Calgary to put in submissions so that units can be built there.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. It is 24 hours later and the situation at National Sea Products in St. John's still has not been resolved. The union has rejected the National Sea plan. My question is very simple. With all the authority that the Government of Canada has under the Fisheries Act, why has it not acted to help the hundreds of workers who are out of work?

Let me throw the minister's own words back at him, when is he going to get off his duff and do something about National Sea?

• (1450)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to tell whether or not the hon. member understands the situation with respect to the east coast fishery.

Mr. Robichaud: You don't understand it.

Ms. Clancy: We understand it all too well.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has been asked a question. I am sure that hon. members would want him to answer it. The hon. minister.

Mr. Crosbie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is a problem with the availability of the resource to National Sea. They have lost in the last several years something like 159 million pounds of quota to process, so they no longer have this fish to put through all of their plants and had to make a decision to close several plants.

After considerable urging from myself, and others, they have now come up with a plan that would provide, on a permanent basis, 100 full time jobs in a shrimp shucking operation at the St. John's plant; 170, if the workers agree to time share, and another 130 workers would be employed in trawlers and in landing fish at the plant. So that would be about 300 people who would retain employment out of the 450 affected by the present lay-off notice.

In addition, the government of Newfoundland entered into an agreement with the company so that the company would operate on the present basis until August 5, thereby extending the period of notice by some four or five months.

Now I think that the workers should consider carefully the proposal that the company has made and consider what the alternatives are, because there does not appear to be other alternatives.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. Yesterday, he told us that unemployment insurance was the salvation of Atlantic fishermen.

I want to tell him that 50 per cent of the fishermen and plant workers in my riding did not qualify for unemployment insurance this year. The plan which this government has gutted is useless.

Some hon. members: The Senate.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Surely on an issue such as this, hon. members should let questions be asked and answers given. The hon. member will repeat the last part of his question.

Mr. Rompkey: It is very simple, Mr. Speaker. When is the Government of Canada going to keep its commitment to the fishermen and plant workers of Atlantic Canada and offer something substantial and not simply the paltry $130 million that they have been offered so far?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, $130 million is $130 million more than was ever offered by the government when the hon. member was in the government.

In addition to the efforts being made by National Sea, the government of Newfoundland and ourselves to keep plants operating, as well as the offer made by National Sea in connection with the St. John's and Canso plants, the government is providing a five-pronged program, including community development funding, and including the POWA program which applies to people over 55 who are laid off and cannot be retained or find other jobs. There is a special supplement for those who are over 50. There are other programs such as Community Futures and industrial adjustment.

That is what has been offered to help the 250 who might be left out of work as a result of the unfortunate experience at National Sea at St. John's. That is what has been provided. That is a serious effort to help these people. The company is ready to operate to take care of at least 300 more through this proposal, and I do not think that it is a proposal that should be hurriedly thrown away. What is the alternative? If the company does not have fish to process, what can it do?

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The people of Atlantic Canada in the fishery industry are looking to this government for help. The Minister for International Trade says there are existing programs out there which were out there before the fishery crisis came.

Even the conventional programs are being reduced because the subagreements under ACOA have been drastically cut back. In Nova Scotia alone, the subagreement that was $7 million a year has been reduced to $1.2 million a year, a reduction of 83 per cent.

When is the government going to at least bring those subagreements back to historical levels, and when are the people of Atlantic Canada going to get some answers?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must be trying to become the prime joker in the opposition. There has never been such a level of funding for regional development in Atlantic Canada as the present fiscal year, over $500 million. When the hon. gentleman's government was in office the maximum they got to was $185 million, which is one heck of a lot less than $500 million. If the hon. gentleman knows how to subtract one from the other, it is $315 million less when the hon. gentleman's government was in office, so stop pitying us.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that the Minister for International Trade would actually come forward with such absolute balderdash and absolute nonsense.

This government knew last February that the fishery stocks in Atlantic Canada were in serious decline and only a fraction of what they previously estimated them to be. Yet the Minister of Finance in his last budget cut drastically the ACOA financing. How can the people of Atlantic Canada rely on this government? Will the Minister of Finance today stand up and say that he is going to replace that financing and help Atlantic Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, facts are facts. From 1979–80 to 1983–84, regional development assistance in Atlantic Canada averaged $185 million a year. Then in the years from 1984–85 to 1988–89, the average was $282 million a year. Now we are in a five-year period where the average will be $425 million a year.

As a matter of fact, tomorrow in St. John's, Newfoundland there will be another announcement showing continuing spending under development agreements in Atlantic Canada. What is wrong with the hon. gentleman, can he not appreciate a good program and spending when he sees it?

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, there is outrage today throughout the scientific community. The scientists at NRC are demoralized as a result of the hatchet job being done at NRC. Scientists, such as David Wiles at chemistry are being muzzled.

I would like to direct a question to whomever is speaking on behalf of the Minister of Science and Technology. Will she confirm that it is the intention of the government to announce the break-up of the chemistry division, of the physics division, and will she tell us what else they intend to do to cut back on expenditures at NRC as they are going to cut back on science generally?

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): In response to the question of my colleague from Windsor—St. Clair, Mr. Speaker, I want to assure him that there was no new cut-back at the National Research Council. The article in today's Citizen is obviously an expression of concerns on the part of various NRC researchers.

Mr. Speaker, the National Research Council is busy drafting its long-term plan. This document has yet to be submitted to the government and no decision has been made.

I believe the plan will be sent to the minister in late spring, so that is what we are waiting for, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I ask him to confirm that he recently met with the Prime Minister, with the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, swore the members of that committee to secrecy under the Official Secrets Act, and informed them of the future cut-backs in science expenditures by government. I ask the minister to tell us to what extent such expenditures will be cut and in what percentages?

• (1500)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is really groping with that question. There was no swearing to secrecy of the members of the NABST to tell them what might or might not be in the budget. There was no discussion of what might or might not be in the budget at that meeting with the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology.

Those were the meetings that the Prime Minister chaired a week or so ago. They were very productive meetings, talking about where we were going to proceed as a country on the development of a greater level of science and technology; how we were going to improve the educational levels of our scientists in this country; how we were going to improve the co-ordination of science—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Beaver River.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct the Houses's attention to the question of official bilingualism.

The Prime Minister has condemned recent declarations of official unilingualism in certain Ontario municipalities. I do not question the Prime Minister and the government support for official bilingualism.

Therefore, my question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Will the Prime Minister and the government also be urging the government of the Prime Minister's own province to declare Quebec an officially bilingual society with full equality of official status to both French and English?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the House will know the interest of the Official Opposition and the government in debating this important issue in this House. In fact, we have put on the Order Paper a motion that this House reaffirm its commitment to support, protect and promote linguistic duality in Canada as reflected by this House in the Constitutional Amendment, 1987 and the Official Languages Act, 1988. That is the official policy of this government.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, we are seeing it inside Quebec and outside Quebec, in fact in all of Canada. Anyone who claims to support the policy of official bilingualism must face the fact that many Canadians, whether we in this House like it or not, see official bilingualism as heavy-handed and exerting a double standard, and of course there are many examples of this, including the actions of a committee in this House last June.

I would be interested to know, and many Canadians would as well, why the selective outrage over official uniligualism?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): There is no selective outrage on behalf of this government or on the part of this government.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious issue which all members of this House treat seriously and about which all members of this House in one way or another are on the record. I think it is about time my hon. friend got on the record.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the government the usual Thursday business question. What does the government intend to bring forth this Friday, and Monday and Tuesday next?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to officially welcome my hon. friend to his duties as opposition House leader. We have all worked with him before. We recognize the challenge and his ability.

I would like to advise the House that tomorrow we will deal with Bills C-5, C-25, C-44 and, if there is time, Bill C-45. I realize this may sound like a full program, but I believe there have been discussions among the parties as to exactly what can be completed.

On Monday morning we will deal with Bill C-26, the grains and flour subsidies. Possibly in the afternoon we would take another look at Bill C-52, the income tax bill regarding pensions.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a point of order with my hon. friend the government House leader. He has given us an idea of the business for tomorrow and Monday, at least the government's intention. We all recognize the importance of interest rates. My hon. friend would know that the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville moved a motion of concurrence in the finance committee report that was studying high interest rates and had some very useful recommendations.

I wonder if we could have at least a couple of hours of serious debate on interest rate policy. That could be reflected by moving concurrence in the finance committee report next week.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, we have been trying to allocate as many opposition days as possible. It is quite possible that there will be one allocated next week, at which time my hon. friend will have the opportunity to debate that issue.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Young (Gloucester):

> That this House call upon the government to abandon its ill-conceived goods and services tax scheme and to bring forward in its place a comprehensive reform of the tax system that is fairer, simpler, integrated, taking into consideration all forms of taxation and the needs and practices of other levels of government and that this be clearly visible to the taxpayers and designed in a manner that does not merely, under the guise of reform, constitute another increase in the overall burden of taxation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the House rose at one o'clock, the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca had the floor.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I just want to carry on with the thrust of my discussion about the official opposition's motion on the goods and services tax.

An hon. member: A loonie tax.

Mr. Barrett: Exactly, on the loonie government, relative to the coin.

Before we were interrupted by a break the House took to reflect on my comments—

Mr. Gauthier: I went to have lunch.

Mr. Barrett: What I had to say this morning is best summed up by the member for Burlington's tie. The member for Burlington wears a tie today that expresses for all of us in the New Democratic Party exactly what we think of the goods and services tax. I challenge the member for Burlington to let his colleagues know what is on his tie. Never mind what is on his mind, just his tie. It expresses completely how we feel about the goods and services tax.

In spite of all of their protests on the goods and services tax, when the Official Opposition was asked this morning if the Liberal party was given the confidence of the people of Canada to form a government after the next election would they remove the goods and services tax, the answer was, no.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Barrett: Not every Canadian heard this. I know there is great interest in this land because I am speaking this afternoon. I know that 90 per cent of the nation is glued to their television tubes this afternoon to hear what I have to say. For the other 10 per cent, I want to repeat that the Liberal party's policy on the GST is straight hypocrisy. In this Chamber, of all places to have a political party be hypocritical. It is unprecedented.

An hon. member: You are new.

Mr. Barrett: I am new. But that is what I thought. Then I discovered how the game is played in this House. When there is a serious question to the government by the Official Opposition on this tax which protects the rich, the government's immediate response is: "You created the mess when you were in government". Then the official opposition has its chance to respond: "No, we did not. You made it worse". This game goes on. Those two parties have learned a great formula that my former leader in this House, T. C. Douglas, used to talk about. They learn how to take money from the rich and votes from the poor, with a promise to protect them from each other.

As far as the Conservative party is concerned, they have their own philosophy. They believe in the truth, until they find out what it is.

I find it interesting that this government denies it is issuing propaganda. I want to make you aware of a little incident that happened in what is considered as the territories, as far as most of this government is concerned. It is known as the province of British Columbia.

An hon. member: I remember it well.

Mr. Barrett: You remember it well, my friend. It is not often thought of by this government. Alberta has been abandoned. But, that is another story.

• (1510)

Alberta's Conservative members of Parliament, except for the Speaker of the day, are going down the tube. We have a requiem political high mass for the end of the Alberta MPs from the Conservative party. Those no-names, those no-records, those people we never got a chance to meet are going to go so fast after the next federal election that we will not even have a chance to socialize with them.

An hon. member: Where are they now?

Mr. Barrett: "Where are they now?" is a good question. I will tell you—

Mr. Duhamel: Time!

Mr. Barrett: Not yet, not yet. They have another two and a half years, then their time is up. Let me read about what has happened in my province. An article in the Victoria Times Colonist relative to this debate was headlined: "Ottawa sent GST propaganda, but she has to pick up the tax form". I am going to send a copy of this article to the Minister of Finance from downtown Bay Street.

The minister stands up and folds his hand and his thumb—it is a very expensive gesture by a lawyer. If he holds his hand up this way, it is $500 bucks an hour; if he extends it, it is $750. He is a thousand-bucks-an-hour lawyer.

The minister tells us how the government sends out this information to assist the taxpayers in understanding what is going on. The bill has not passed the House yet. The government invoked closure. But, this is what happened:

> A four-page pamphlet of Goods and Services Tax information and questions is no substitute for a tax return form—especially when the federal government tells you it is trying to save you money, says an irate Sooke resident.
> Pauline Atterbury is hopping mad that Revenue Canada sent her the GST information but, in the same package, told her she will have to pick up her tax-return form from the nearest post office.

Fourteen million bucks worth. I quote further from the article:

> "I have to make a six-mile round trip to get my form but they say this is part of their ongoing effort to reduce costs," Atterbury said.
> "They are spending our money to send propaganda for a tax no one wants and then I have to spend gas money to go to get my tax return—thanks a lot fellas," she said.

No wonder she is hopping mad. No wonder there is cynicism out there. No wonder there is anger.

The Minister of Finance said he would go anywhere in Canada and debate with anyone this question of the GST. I am going to make a courageous challenge that I want you to listen to very carefully. I am prepared to go into Calgary, Alberta, where we have a history of famous elected socialists, since the last provincial election, and challenge the Minister of Finance to stand up with me in any hall that I want to rent or that he will attend. Let's have a public debate in Calgary between the Minister of Finance and myself. He can speak on behalf of the GST and I will attack it. We will invite the Alberta MPs to sit in the front row and witness it.

I do not want to shock young children or senior citizens of this country, but he is not going to take up the challenge that he himself suggested. He was not really serious when he said he was prepared to discuss the GST anywhere in Canada with anybody. He even voted for closure.

As we go to committee, I want the Canadian public to know that the committee is going to stay in downtown Ottawa. The members of the committee are going to eat breakfast here, lunch here and supper here, pay their tips for these meals before the GST comes in and they are going to have closure in the committee because they will not allow Canadians, right across this country, to see them. Not only is the minister frightened to take up the suggestion of being heard across the country, but the committee will refuse to move out of this town.

I predict that not only will the Liberals continue their flim-flam and support this bill behind the curtains and wait to be in government when they will keep it, at the same time the committee will refuse to hear witnesses from across Canada. We can see closure here in this House against the members of Parliament. But the worst step will be closure to the people of Canada who will not see the committee leave this town. I say shame, Mr. Speaker. Shame on the Minister of Finance. Shame on the committee. Shame on those Tories who will not be back. And shame on all of us that we allow this kind of closure to be rammed down our throat and think that the taxpayers do not know what is going on. There will be a taxpayers' revolt. I hope you survive. I know a lot of those guys there will not. Say goodbye now because we will not be seeing them after the next election.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here in the House. I listened to my friend on the left and to all of the wonderful words that he spreads; the verbiage, the grandstanding and all of the fear about the Liberal party. He should remember though that there is another two and a half years to go. I remind him of that.

This is an opposition day and we have a motion put forward by a member of the Liberal party. I am going to read it for him and ask him a question.

The motion reads:

> That this House call upon the government to abandon its ill-conceived goods and services tax scheme and to bring forward in its place a comprehensive reform of the tax system that is fairer, simpler, integrated, taking into consideration all forms of taxation and the needs and practices of other levels of government and that this be clearly visible to the taxpayers and designed in a manner that does not merely, under the guise of reform, constitute another increase in the overall burden of taxation.

Does the hon. member support this motion or not?

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I support the motion. Unknown to a large number of that group over there, I am over 21. I have seen the Liberal party in action before. This kind of motion, this kind of promise, this kind of commitment goes under the category of b.s. The Liberals have about as much support for this as they have for the person who wrote it. They probably wrote it from a 'help wanted' or some petition.

You have no more commitment to this than the Liberal member who answered my question. I asked: as a political party, as the leadership candidates, as members of this House, will you give a solemn pledge that should you be returned to form a government that the first act you will do is immediately withdraw the goods and services tax? They will not.

My friends in the Conservative party have decided on a matter of principle to commit suicide. It is their right. They will not back off this. They intend to ram this through because once giving their word to the corporate elite of this country that they are going to protect them by further taxing the middle-class and the working poor of this country, they are going to deliver.

The greatest fraud in this debate is the Liberal party. They are clucking, chuckling and laughing behind the curtains every day. They know very well. I ask them in the House to confess their sins. I will listen but none have stood. Not one of the leadership candidates and no one here in this House has said: "On my soul, should I be returned to office, we in the Liberal party will do away with the tax." They will not. Furthermore, the Liberals will keep the tax.

I can hear the speeches now as they switch roles in the House. They will say: "Oh, we've just been elected. We've discovered the mess we have inherited from the Tories. Oh, it is worse than we thought, Mr. Speaker, and as a consequence we have to keep the tax and we are forced to put it up to 10 per cent". I can see the speech now from their minister of finance. Pick any one you want. It does not matter. It is a plastic speech from the Liberal party. They will stand up and they will say: "Oh, my goodness. The Tories have ruined this country and we have to increase the tax".

There it is. I conclude my remarks by saying there is no difference in those parties. One is in, the other is out, and they both have the same purpose: serve the rich.

• (1520)

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to ask the hon. member why he chooses to be so unfair and insensitive and make so many erroneous statements about my party. Some of the comments bordered on the malicious and perhaps even the vindictive. I am delighted, however, that he will be supporting this motion. I will ask him another serious question.

He knows that most Canadians believe that the NDP does not have a credible economic policy. Does this lack of credibility in the economic area limit the effectiveness of his own and his party's attack on economic matters in Canada, including the goods and services tax?

Mr. Barrett: I thank the Liberal member for finding the question that I wrote out for one of my colleagues. I want to thank him for doing the job for me.

Not only do we have a plan but we have been responsible in laying it out word for word, item by item, idea by idea. Whether you agree with my ideas or not, the point is that we put them in writing, we put them down as serious proposals. The Liberal party has not done that. These guys are write-offs, they are gone. Goodbye, nice knowing you.

Those members are prepared to ride down the middle with no commitment to say where they stand. The first response to the proposals made by my colleagues who have done a great deal of serious work on this was to do a great deal of handwringing. The first response was that it is socialism. I remind them, was it not true that it was this group who created socialized medicine? If this government and that opposition is against socialism I want everyone of them to stand up in this House today and rip up their medicare card and stop sucking off the taxes of the poor and the middle class while benefiting from a socialist program. I hope this does not go out on television to the Canadian people and they get exposed to the fact that these members live off socialist programs while they are attacking our ideas all the time.

I do not wish to be partisan but the question has forced to me to respond in a partisan manner. Every single idea that this party has expressed in social policy and economic policy that now benefits this country, from UIC to socialized medicine, has come from this party over in this corner.

Mr. Crosbie: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Barrett: Permit a question? My friend, I am always willing to take a question from you, but not on my time. I conclude by saying to members that I love you as individuals. I do not like your party and do not like its history. I love you as individuals. It is unrequited love. You do not like me in return. I am broken-hearted about that temporarily.

It is the same old game with the same old two parties. They represent a special interest in this country and there will be no change one way or the other. The only party that is committed in terms of serving the average person in this country is the New Democratic Party. I say that in a non-partisan manner.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, my question to the hon. gentleman is this: Is he feeling lonely because there are only, as far as I know, two socialist parties left in the world today. Two and one-half: One-half of the official opposition is socialist in its tendencies; the NDP here in Canada and Mr. Mugabe in Zimbabwe. These are the only two and a half socialist parties left today.

They have disappeared in eastern Europe. We had a representative from Hungary in the gallery earlier today. They are all now going to be market driven. They are embracing the market. When is the hon. gentleman and those who contested him in the NDP leadership going to get up to date with the eastern European governments which led us in socialism for 40 or 50 years? They are now running away from it as though they had the trots. They no longer have Trotsky, they've got the trots in their haste to get away from socialism. Why is he clinging to this outmoded, decrepit philosophy?

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to respond to my good friend who is a graduate of the London School of Economics. He knows very well that that school of economics has had an influence on the governments that are now in place in New Zealand, Australia, Denmark, France, and in half of the industrialized countries of this world where social democrats are in power.

An hon. member: And the Yukon.

Mr. Barrett: And the Yukon. It was the democratic socialists who were first shot by the communists. Let us get that straight. It is the social democrats, since the turn of the century in the industrialized nations of this world, who have stood up for human rights, for economic pluralism and for social justice on the basis of an individual having a right and an equal chance in a society that plays no favourites. We have suffered from the extreme left because of that and the extreme right, but the world is turning toward the kind of goals my party has stood for since the very inception of the Christian socialists who are part of the foundation of this party.

I am proud of the heritage of this party. I do not mind those questions and attacks. The results speak for it. This world is a better place because of democratic socialism. Eastern Europe is now rediscovering that fact since the death of Shcharansky. The west, particularly the United States, will rue the day that they too have not had an influence of social democrats to humanize their corporate society.

Just reflect on the violence in the urban centres of the United States and its consequences and causes. Just reflect on the isolation and the destruction of the human family in a corporate empire that does not even have an iota of socialized medicine. Thank you for my chance to give a brief lecture to my friend who has long forgotten what he learned in the London School of Economics.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The hon. member for Outremont.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to interrupt my hon. colleague in his debate, but having now completed the first round of speakers, it has been a tradition on opposition days that if the parties wish, they take their 20-minute periods for debate and 10 minutes for questions and comments and split it up into a 10-minute debate with a five-minute question and comment period, if they so wish.

I would like to have the unanimous consent of the House to allow us to proceed that way today as well.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, perhaps in giving our consent to what has been offered by the hon. member for Kamloops, I could make the following suggestion on behalf of our caucus. We wish to notify the Chair now that for the remainder of the afternoon all the speakers from the Liberal party will be utilizing the 10-minute format plus an immediate five-minute question and answer period, if the other parties are willing to provide unanimous consent for that so that we do not have to ask it every time one of our speakers rises.

In other words, we will have one 10-minute speaker followed by a five-minute question and answer period, followed immediately by another 10-minute speaker and another five-minute question and answer period for the rest of the afternoon as it pertains to the Liberal party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it so agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered. The hon. member for Outremont.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on the Official Opposition's motion. I am doubly pleased because this motion gives us another opportunity to praise and present the advantages of the goods and services tax. The GST is a considerable improvement over the present federal sales tax, for three reasons. It will encourage economic growth and job creation, while putting our businesses on an equal footing with their foreign competitors, both on the domestic and on the export market.

Thanks to the GST tax credit, the new system will distribute the tax burden more fairly than ever before in Canada. Moreover, by providing a more reliable source of revenue and by stimulating economic activity, the GST will contribute to the national deficit reduction effort.

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker, the GST is therefore a fundamental, and also an essential, change. Many studies have shown that the present manufacturers' sales tax seriously affects our firms' ability to compete. It thus hurts economic growth and job creation in Canada. The present tax, as you know, is also a brake on investment.

The GST will therefore stimulate investment by eliminating the federal sales tax on goods and services which for many years have been used to produce other goods and services. We will eliminate the tax on production and as a result, investment, capital stock and the economy's productive capacity will grow.

Mr. Speaker, economic activity and production in all regions of Canada will benefit from the GST. The Atlantic provinces and Western Canada stand to gain the most because a good part of their economy is made up of capital-intensive or exporting industries. These industries will be the main beneficiaries of the GST refund for business inputs. Nevertheless, Ontario and Quebec will of course also obtain economic benefits—and rightly so—amounting to billions of dollars in new activity and thousands of new jobs.

The motion before us, Mr. Speaker, asks that we abandon our proposed GST. Why, Mr. Speaker, abandon a reform that will give the Canadian economy and all Canadians so much? Why abandon the reform of an obsolete, destructive and outdated tax system? After a certain number of years, models and techniques may become obsolete, and this tax is definitely obsolete. We must develop a new approach that, as I said earlier, will thoroughly change the situation and provide for more equitable treatment for all Canadians.

One of the reasons why Canadians gave us a majority in two consecutive elections is because the Progressive Conservative Party does not abandon ship. Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to abandon senior citizens, as they say we would, or low-income families that will benefit from refundable tax credits. We will not abandon our entrepreneurs, our manufacturers and workers who every day have to deal with the obstacles created by the present sales tax, which as I said before, is definitely obsolete. A responsible government does not abandon ship at a critical moment in its country's history. A responsible government like ours keeps going ahead and perseveres despite the obstacles.

Mr. Speaker, the motion refers to fairer tax reform. That is exactly what we are suggesting with the GST. You must not forget that the GST is part of a comprehensive reform of the tax system. Our government took the initiative for that tax reform.

During the first stage, the Progressive Conservative Party converted personal exemptions and a large number of deductions into tax credits, to make the system more equitable. It also reduced and eliminated altogether a large number of special tax concessions.

The government also abolished or reduced many corporate tax concessions, and we have expanded their tax space so that profitable companies now pay more income tax.

With the GST, the overall tax burden will be more progressive, and low-income Canadians will be protected. The tax credit will help to direct assistance to those who need it most. As a result, we have a goods and services tax that improves the overall fairness of the tax system.

The GST credit will be paid to about 8.7 million families and individuals. The first cheque will be mailed in December 1990, before the GST comes into force on January 1, 1991. The tax credit will be paid in advance, four times a year.

The basic credit will be $190 for an adult and $100 per child. Single parents will be entitled to an adult credit of $190 for one dependant child. Furthermore, adults living alone, including single parents, will be entitled to a supplementary credit of up to $100.

For instance, a single parent with two children and a net income of $20,000 will be entitled to an adult credit of $190, a supplementary adult credit of $190, a child credit of $100 and a supplementary credit of $100. In other words, this single parent will be entitled to a total of $580 in GST credits.

The credit will start decreasing at about $24,800 in 1991. Beyond that point, it will level off gradually, and a family of two adults and two children will be entitled to a credit if their net income is less than $36,400.

Therefore the credits will go to those who need them the most.

More affluent Canadians will pay their fair share of taxes.

Mr. Milliken: Nonsense!

Mr. Hogue: They cannot avoid the GST. Since they consume more, they will pay more. To help reduce the GST rate, the present 3 per cent surtax applicable to high-income Canadians will be raised to 5 per cent effective January 1, 1991 and its threshold will be lowered from $15,000 to $12,500 in basic federal tax.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up and I am wrapping up. The GST is fair and meets the other criteria outlined in the motion now before the House. It is fair and consistent with the nature of our society.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud and I thank you for the time you gave me.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech made by my friend, the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mr. Hogue), and I want to ask a question and make a short comment. However, the book I am referring to is in English, so I hope he will excuse me if I read something in that language.

[English]

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business recently submitted a pre-budget brief to the Minister of Finance. The hon. member who spoke in such laudatory terms of this wonderful goods and services tax that his minister is putting before the House will want to hear the words of the federation. Their brief states: "At a time of supposed government restraint the addition of such an enormous bureaucracy"—and they are referring to the 4,000 tax police—"to duplicate effectively existing provincial retail sales tax bureaucracies defies belief."

Another quotation that I found most interesting and that I know will be of great interest to the hon. member for Outremont is found on page 4 of the brief. It says:

> To date, the GST process has been driven with undue haste to the detriment of all Canadians. In the province of Quebec, for example, where the provincial government is openly discussing the revamping the sales tax system, the federal government has not held hearings. Why has Quebec been ignored in this debate? Leaving Quebec out of the consultation process is especially reprehensible when considering that the small business community in that province has a structural make-up which is unique in this country. There are a greater number of small retail businesses in Quebec than in any other part of Canada. The GST will therefore have an even greater negative impact on small firms and consumers in Quebec.

Mr. Blenkarn: Nonsense.

Mr. Milliken: The hon member for Mississauga South is getting a little exercised. He is the chairman of the committee that should be holding these hearings. I suggest to him that when his committee meets to discuss where the hearings will be held on the bill which has now been referred to committee, he get moving and have some hearings across—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. I would hope that the hon. member would direct his question to the hon. member for Outremont.

Mr. Milliken: I was about to do that. I would like to ask the hon. member for Outremont how it is, with statements like this from a respectable organization such as the Canadian Federation of Small Business, an organization I may say that is not a particular friend of the Liberal Party, or at least has not been until recently, that he would ignore these statements and make a speech that supports this dreadful tax the government has imposed instead of condemning the tax and voting against it at every opportunity.

[Translation]

Mr. Hogue: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Mr. Milliken) will, I am sure, be agreeable to my answering in French.

We sit on certain committees, and we manage to move the ship of state in the right direction. The hon. member had two questions: One about the bureaucracy, and the second one, I believe, about the apparent lack of consultation in Quebec.

It is not my place to answer on behalf of the government. The question was put to me, and I will have to respond accordingly and give my view on the matter.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this tax comes at the right time, and it does because the situation demands it. As the hon.

member is aware and with him other members of this House who certainly share my point of view—

Mr. Boudria: No, we do not share your point of view.

Mr. Hogue: —things happen when they are supposed to happen.

If we put on too much pressure, there is a negative impact on the socio-economic situation, things do not run as smoothly as they should and society does not benefit at all.

In the past few days, we have spent hours discussing the merits, and also the weaknesses which I do not feel are apparent, of this new way of letting Canadian society develop, in other words, of collecting taxes. In 1990, our society cannot hope to function with instruments and techniques that have long become obsolete.

A tax is not necessarily perfect when it is implemented, and I am sure everyone accepts that. The same applies to just about everything in life. You can draw a car model on your draft board but people will want changes.

Clearly, this tax will undergo minor adjustments, and thanks to the wisdom and common sense of this party and the Minister of Finance.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The time for questions and comments has expired. The hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin has the floor for 10 minutes, plus 5 minutes of questions and comments.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in addressing the motion before us. It is a very long motion, but it tries to address a very interesting question.

The Opposition is seeking comprehensive reform of the tax system. Of course that in itself is good. They want a fairer, simpler and an integrated system. They are saying they want a fair and effective tax system.

I do not know where the people who drafted this motion have been for the last few days, but that is in fact what we have been debating. The GST is a fair, reformed tax system that has been introduced because this country needs a reformed and fairer system.

No matter how critical Canadians are of many respects of this country, maybe of the politicians or some of the things that are going on, I have yet to find a true Canadian who is not totally pleased with living in this country. There is not another country in the world where they would rather be.

I would like to build on that theme because the reward and the privilege of living in this country has a price. It is we the citizens of this country who must pay that price. There is no simple solution and there is no easy way out.

This reform of our tax system has been portrayed as a tax grab and a tax increase. It is neither of those. It is a very serious response to a very serious situation. Canada must measure up against some very tough international competition in the months, years and decades ahead, if we want to maintain our quality of life, if we want to meet the payments on our deficit, if we are going to leave our children a country as good as the country in which they were born.

A truly fair tax system will meet these challenges. A truly fair system will contribute to a strong economic policy. A truly fair tax system allows Canadian businesses to make the best possible use of their resources. Under these terms the goods and services tax measures up. It is a fair tax system.

It is this government that initiated tax reform. Stage one was eliminating many of the loopholes, the problems that we experienced in the old tax system so that we could have a better tax system which was more equitable to all. It is through that that the businesses are now paying more and high income wage earners are now paying more than they ever were before.

• (1550)

The second stage of that tax reform is the goods and services tax. Interestingly enough, instead of this system being a tax grab on low income earners, low income people will in fact benefit the most. They will pay less under this new system. On the other hand, the wealthier people, those who have been more fortunate in what they have, who tend to enjoy our services more, buy more goods and more expensive goods will of course be paying more and more because of the goods and services tax. It is a positive form of taxation.

Many seniors have been concerned for their welfare under the goods and services tax. I am happy to inform them that in over 75 per cent of the cases they are going to be doing better under the goods and services tax than they did prior to the goods and services tax. They will not be paying tax on their groceries or their medical services. They will not be paying tax through any of their charities or non-profit organizations. They will not be paying tax on drugs, health care or most essential services. For them, of course it is a fairer system.

The social programs for the rest of us Canadians are dependent on an economic system that can support and pay for them. It is for those programs that we need a system such as the goods and services tax. It is a system that will create an economic push for our economy. Many economists have indicated that as much as $9 billion a year will be contributed to jobs and increased wealth for all Canadians. It is this tax that will support the social programs when you and I will need them the most, Mr. Speaker.

It is the engine of the economy, private business, to which we must look to see the end of our deficit and debt problems and the continuation of the way of life we all enjoy in Canada.

I do support the concepts that are in this motion, but I see them endowed in the goods and services tax.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recognize that there have been 31 tax increases over the last five years and that the goods and services tax will be number 32. He recognizes as well that the debt has been doubled over the last five years. There have been massive lay-offs in this country, and I cite as an example 2,700-plus at VIA Rail. Just this morning my colleague announced that in his constituency of Winnipeg St. James a battery establishment was closing and another 275 people would lose their jobs.

The member will recall as well that it was his government that attempted to deindex pensions for seniors. Then it brought in the clawback which affects both seniors and families. He will recognize as well the massive reduction to health and education transfer payments to provinces, actually $24 billion over eight or nine fiscal years.

Are the effects of the GST not much worse because of all of these negative measures that have been undertaken by his government? Will the hon. member confirm this reality?

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot confirm that as a reality. We listened to the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca in the last hour. I know that you, as well as I, Mr. Speaker, found his talk very interesting. I think it bears directly on the hon. member's question.

Although the social democrats, as he refers to them, have done a lot—and I think it is acknowledged by all in our society—to make us more aware of the social aspects of society to which we should pay more attention, never have they been renowned for their economic foresight or economic knowledge, especially the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

I happen to be over 21 as well, and well remember that hon. member's efforts at helping the economy of British Columbia. Very few people in British Columbia my age will ever forget the efforts.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate the member's comments. I wonder if he has any documentation or information that he can provide to us to compare with his friends in the Social Credit Party in British Columbia who are driving that province into the ground.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin has the floor.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I acknowledged in my speech that most Canadians will recognize that we in Canada have never been better off than we are now, in spite of the fact that we are still burdened with a debt and a deficit legacy that we inherited. This government will address that.

The member mentioned that we have doubled the debt. I think he had better recall who created the debt. It is now the interest on that previous debt with which we are burdened.

We took over government with a $16 billion a year deficit. The government will now have a $9 billion surplus. That is a $25 billion a year turnaround. It is this government that has done that. It is this government that will continue to make that surplus increase and, God help us, I hope we will in fact be able finally to overcome the scourge that was left to us in 1984.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Saint Léonard, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier—Official Languages Act, the hon. member for Comox—Alberni—Justice, and the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River—Telecommunications.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I want to take part in this debate on the motion introduced by my colleague because, as it happens, he is giving us an opportunity to continue our attack against the GST, particularly since the government lowered the boom on us last night. Quite naturally, I want to speak on behalf of the residents of Saint-Léonard, more especially in the name of the 15,000 citizens who signed a petition against this tax. This is the first time in the history of Saint-Léonard that 15,000 people went to the trouble of signing a petition to express their opposition to such a regressive tax system that our ill-at-ease government chose to cut off debate on last night.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to shed more light on the facts and make it easier for people to understand just what the government is up to. We have had just a few days' debate on this issue in the House, five or six I believe, and since the Minister of Finance unveiled his plan in June 1987 the government has steadfastly maintained that the tax is necessary to make Canadian companies really competitive with the rest of the world.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Finance—I deplore the absence of the Minister of Finance, but I am sure his officials are all ears right now—heard a spokesman for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. And sure enough, he referred to the percentage, for we know very well that manufactured products or finished goods are not taxable.

• (1600)

So in the case of the tax, the famous, the bad, the terrible federal sales tax which is—to use the very words of the Minister of Finance—a killer of jobs and which went up from 8 to 13.5 per cent in four years, Mr. Speaker, barely 1 to 2 per cent showed up in the price of exported goods. We have to take a much closer look at this small percentage because the tax does not apply when you buy some equipment or raw materials. Nor does it apply to the work done by the employees, so all this led us to the conclusion that it was only a matter of a small percentage. But of course when the company bought a limousine for the president it had to pay the tax. As you might expect, Mr. Speaker, limousines will no longer be taxable under the new system, but the small ordinary Canadian worker who needs a compact car to go to work will pay that tax.

[English]

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you would understand what I am saying. I know that the Minister of Labour says no. One day I will have to ask him some questions about the pre-retirement pensions with which we have some problems in Montreal. I will try him then.

I know you have been in this House for many years, Mr. Speaker, and you understand very well what I am saying. Imagine this. The executive of a large corporation will be able to buy his own executive desk tax free. It will cost nothing. But the poor Canadian who needs a bed to sleep on or a table in the kitchen from which to eat has to pay the 7 per cent tax. Is that fair? I am sure you agree it is not fair.

I could continue on. When the worker buys a sandwich, a lunch or a coffee at the canteen he has to pay the 7 per cent tax. But the executive who has a luxury kitchen in his luxury executive office pays nothing and he has his food prepared there, caviare and so on. That is why this tax is so unfair.

[Translation]

Do you know what GST means, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. member: What does it mean?

Mr. Gagliano: Good simple taxation. Tax people solely, Mr. Speaker, because all corporations have just been exempted. Not one Canadian corporation will pay the goods and services tax. Our tax system has just been changed, Mr. Speaker, in an underhanded way. So far, we have considered corporations as a legal entity, as a physical person. So why do you and I and your constituents and mine have to pay 7 per cent and corporations not pay a cent of this goods and services tax?

The other reason the government is proposing this goods and services tax system is simple, Mr. Speaker. Again, they are changing the nature of our tax system. So far, we paid taxes on goods; now, for the first time, we will have a tax on all services throughout the country. That is very important, Mr. Speaker. How can we have only five or six days of debate when our tax system is being radically changed, Mr. Speaker? I see the Minister of Labour laughing, but I do not know if his constituents will laugh too. He and I could have a debate in east-end

Montreal on the goods and services tax and we would see who laughs last.

Mr. Speaker, it is very important. We are changing our tax system in Canada and the government does it like this: tax people solely and let the corporations off scot free. That is the reality, Mr. Speaker. Today, big corporations, on the pretext of being more competitive, can pay not a cent of tax and the Minister of Finance, who for the past five years has helped the rich get richer and the poor get poorer, is right in saying that there are not enough millionaires to tax in Canada. That is what he finds. He taxes everyone and comes up with a tax credit that he forgot to index. That is the reality.

Mr. Speaker, you were in this House as I was a few years ago when the Minister of Finance said that the tax system had to be reformed to make it simple, so that everyone could understand it. Yesterday and this afternoon, in question period, my colleague tried to make the minister understand that it will cost $14 million to explain this madness to Canadians.

It says here on page 8 of this GST brochure:

Sample cash journal pages

How a small business will account for this tax. Mr. Speaker, I am reading from this sample journal: "Date: March 2; Description: Antique bath & shower; $10,700.00 cash in. " Mr. Speaker, it is total confusion. Is this cash in an account receivable? The way the example is written there, it means that tax is collected, money is received and it is paid when the time comes. But if we look at what the legislation says about billing, even the Finance Minister does not know how a small business has to keep its books to understand it.

And later in this House, he had the courage to get up and tell us that there is an impact of the cash-flow change. On page 19, he gives us a ridiculous calculation showing a total benefit of $1,140. He did not at all consider the complexity of the accounting system needed for this crazy new system, which I call the nightmare of the century, because it will really be very difficult to find one's way through it.

Mr. Speaker, you are indicating that I do not have much time left. Of course, this debate is not over even if the government imposed closure last night. Of course, this morning we read the comments from the Chairman of the Finance Committee who wants to pass this quickly, in three or four weeks—that is enough. But, Mr. Speaker, given the complexity of this legislation, how can we pass it so quickly?

So we shall come back to it. We shall debate it. We shall continue to explain to Canadians that this tax, the GST, applies only to people. It is not the Canadian way of doing things. I am sure that in the end, Canadians will understand and not be fooled by this government. Elections are coming up fast, Mr. Speaker, and be assured that if the government continues to maintain this tax, it will be defeated.

[English]

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague. I am not going to run a long preamble because I see one of his own colleagues would like to ask a question.

This particular motion states in essence that the government should abandon the GST and bring forward in its place a comprehensive reform of the tax system that is fairer, simpler, integrated and taking into consideration all forms of taxation, and so on.

As I understand it, members of his party, including the hon. member for Gloucester, sat on the finance committee to review the GST and came back with a minority report which was a few pages long. It was not comprehensive. It seems to me there has been every opportunity for this member's party, the hon. member who proposed the motion and the member who just spoke, to develop a comprehensive reply or presentation as to what we should have. As I recall it his own party members who were on the finance committee last year were in agreement with the unanimous decision of the Standing Committee on Finance. They agreed that the FST was outdated and that a new tax regime should be instituted. When there is an opportunity to do so they don't do it. All they talk about now is doing it.

I think the member opposite may like to answer why they are saying one thing and doing another.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to say to my hon. colleague that if he wants us to form the government we are ready to go to the other side. We will write our report and show him how to reform this tax law. If you are ready, come to this side and we will show you. If you are ready, let us do it right away starting this afternoon.

The hon. member referred to the Parliament before this one. I had the privilege of serving on the finance committee as a substitute member. We looked at the first stage of the Conservative tax reform. That is basically where the problem lies.

The members of this government were committed to full tax reform. Because there was a pending election they gave out some candies in order to get re-elected. That was the first phase.

Then they introduced the second phase, which is the GST. It is terrible. The people will not forget that for years and years to come. They will reject it in the next election.

What did we say then, Mr. Speaker? We said that, yes, we are for tax reform, but not the way they are doing it.

If you want to quote the words of my ex-colleagues in this House from the last Parliament, read the records and you will see exactly what was said. We said: "Yes, we are for tax reform".

This motion before us today makes a commitment to real tax reform. If you want to change places, we will go over there right away, this afternoon, and show you how to do it.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to inform the hon. member for Saint-Léonard (Mr. Gagliano) that when he was speaking, I was not laughing at what he was saying, because this is a very important subject, but I was laughing at his assumptions.

My question is this: How can he seriously explain to the people watching him on television, and I wish we could turn the cameras around so that we could see Canadians roaring at the inconsistencies in the explanations given by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard—how can he seriously say the GST will apply to purchases made by certain people but will not apply to purchases made by other people?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I will need some time to answer that one.

Mr. Boudria: Don't worry, take your time.

Mr. Gagliano: A company that has to pay taxes is licensed under this new tax system. Companies pay the tax on their purchases, and before, what was paid was deducted. So the result is zero. That is why they don't pay taxes.

The individual, however, cannot deduct the tax. He doesn't have a credit. That's what I meant. So I hope the minister will take the time to read the bill and will be able to provide all the necessary information.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of my colleague. I know that he was a member of the finance committee in the last Parliament and that he is also an accountant by profession.

My question is with regard to the discriminatory policy that the government has adopted in the GST whereby services offered by independent adjusters will be taxable under the GST while similar services provided by the insurance industry will not.

Insurance adjusters in my own constituency—and I have a letter in my hand signed by the the branch manager, Mr. Les Sazant, of the Underwriters Adjustment Bureau of Hawkesbury, Ontario—have informed me that if the minister proceeds with the bill as proposed now that it could very well mean that this business will be in serious trouble. Incidentally, the finance committee recommended that it be given an exemption so that it would be treated in a way that is similar—

Mr. Soetens: Are you endorsing the finance committee's report?

Mr. Boudria: That is an excellent question that our colleague asks. The finance committee recommended that a few injustices be corrected. Notwithstanding the fact that I reject the bill, if it does go ahead it seems to me the very least that could be done is to correct some of those injustices that make my constituents lose their jobs.

It is for that reason I bring this to the attention of the House. I think it is a very serious matter. I want to ask my colleague what he thinks of that discriminatory policy which I have just described.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. The GST is very complicated. That is why some people feel discriminated against and and others feel confused. You might find yourself in a situation where you are tax exempt but, because of the system, the product you sell might not be taxable so you do not have to charge the tax, but you will have to pay the tax on all other services or you do not get your credit. So people feel discriminated against.

There might be other cases where you do not charge the tax but you can get the credit. In other cases, you might not charge the tax nor pay the tax. It is so complicated. Yet this minister and this government was supposed to bring in a system which everybody would understand.

Remember, a muffin can be taxable or not taxable. A muffin is a muffin. But if you go to a store and say: "I want a muffin". Then you say: "Would you put it in the microwave to warm it up?" It then becomes taxable. That is why I do not see how small businesses, most of which are in the food and retail business, can cope with the nonsense that this system is proposing.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to my hon. friend. He gave the impression very clearly that he opposed this tax. Just to make the record perfectly clear, we in the New Democratic Party, no matter what the outcome of the next election, we oppose this tax. If we were to form the Government of Canada, we would oppose this tax. We would not proceed with this tax. We would reject the tax. We would undo the tax and go back to some decent tax reform.

As my hon. friend from Esquimalt—Juan-de-Fuca said, I respect the Conservatives because they like this idea of a tax that will assist the privileged. They make no bones about it. They bring it in and say: "This is what we are going to do". They are very up front about it. I have to respect that level of frankness.

As well the New Democrats are saying: "We oppose this tax completely in principle, totally, in every way, shape or form". I do not know how much clearer one could say that.

I am going to provide an opportunity for my hon. friend from the Liberal party to speak on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada to try to give a simple yes or no or not much more elaboration beyond that to this question. Is the Liberal Party of Canada completely and totally opposed to this tax in principle?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague because I see that already he sees us in government. I hope we will be very soon. If the hon. member convinces the Conservative government to call an election right away, we are ready. We have a plan. If an election is called right away, we will tell Canadians what we are going to do.

This government told Canadians that it would implement such a tax, and it did. We are going to oppose it, and we are opposed to it. When we get to the other side—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Resuming debate with the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government is unable to properly manage the economy, witness the growing deficit. Thus it is trying to place its responsibility for fiscal ineptitude on to Canadians. One method of doing this is through the levying of the goods and services tax.

• (1620)

Before I proceed further, over the last few days we have seen procedural tactics by members on my left that, in the eyes of many Canadians, were totally meaningless because time was wasted. Early this morning we witnessed the government's unreasonable closure on second reading of this bill, which cut off the opportunity for we members of Parliament to debate. The Liberal party, the Official Opposition, is neither to the left nor to the right. We stand for debate and for the well-being of all Canadians.

The opposition motion reads:

> That this House call upon the Government to abandon its ill-conceived goods and services tax scheme and to bring forward in its place a comprehensive reform of the tax system that is fairer, simpler, integrated, taking into consideration all forms of taxation and the needs and practices of other levels of government and that this be clearly visible to the taxpayers and designed in a manner that does not merely, under the guise of reform, constitute another increase in the overall burden of taxation.

This motion reflects the Liberal commitment to kill the GST, while at the same time recognizing the need for tax reform. We have identified the principles that should guide this tax reform. There ought to be federal-provincial co-operation and, when this is done, we will have, as always, the well-being of all Canadians at the core of this reform. The need for tax reform is in fact very timely, particularly in light of the proposed GST which has been given an 80 per cent disapproval rating by the public. This is an indication of Canadians' distrust of this government and, in a real sense, of the alienation of the governed from the government.

Do we need a reform? Almost half of our national income is transferred to the government by way of taxes. Taxation has increased over the last five years at a distressingly high rate.

I submit that Canadians, indeed, have a good deal of common sense. Thus we understand the purpose of taxes. We appreciate that we will pay taxes. In fact we accept that it is a necessity. But there are limits to acceptance.

When taxes are too much, when there is unequal sharing of the tax burden, when the tax system is complex and cannot be understood, and if there is misuse of the taxes collected, then Canadians rebel.

There are many forms of taxation: property or wealth, customs or excise, payroll, personal, corporate and sales taxes. But this afternoon I would focus on the need for tax reform in the context of the proposed GST. We would like to replace something that is awfully bad, that is, the manufacturers' sales tax. This tax is hidden, has increased rapidly and does not allow our domestic producers to compete effectively with foreigners.

First, let us examine the foundations, the principles that should govern tax reform. As I have indicated, we on this side of the House have identified two sound economic principles. One, there must be efficiency. We must not unduly interfere with the allocation of resources, both capital and labour.

Two, it ought to be simple. It must be understood by all. We should not need tax advisers who must be paid. In fact, the law itself should be enforceable with a minimum of litigation.

The second set of guiding principles would be that any tax system, or any taxation that we introduce as we reform the system, has to meet the accepted Canadian social values of fairness. That tax system would have taxpayers in similar circumstances pay similar amounts. Also, the ability to pay is taken into account so that it would allow a more equitable distribution of wealth and income.

The government seems to ignore the fact that there are other alternatives to the GST. The government has created a fiction by saying that it had no choice but to introduce the GST. The government has not even told us how many alternatives it has examined. Yet it has the resources of the Department of Finance to study many alternatives.

I do not have the opportunity to discuss a lot of them in depth. One that has been proposed is a single tax alternative which would be simple: lower taxes for most, share the tax load more fairly, eliminate loopholes and reduce administrative costs.

Let us continue to debate, but let us not insist on this GST.

There have been many other suggestions for reform, including the harmonization of the federal and provincial tax systems. This government has failed to do that.

Let me examine the GST itself. It will deal a devastating and crippling karate blow to our economy. It will be a fuel for recession and a fuel for inflation, both of which will result in a ruined economy.

When the goods and services tax is introduced, it will hit the pocketbooks of all Canadians. In fact, it has been estimated that it will be some fourfold. That will lead to a higher cost of living. Draining the power of consumers to buy will alter their spending pattern which will, of course, lead to a drop in the sales of manufacturers. As a consequence, there will be a steadily increasing cost of business. Operating costs will increase, workers will be laid off, the economy will slow down and a recession will happen.

When workers are hurt they have less buying power. They will demand higher wages, naturally and rightly so, to compensate for the ill effects, something which will trigger inflation. When the two are combined you will have a ruined economy.

The government's brochure states that this GST has been designed to reduce the deficit. Yet the government has claimed it will be revenue neutral. I cannot follow the logic. If it were revenue neutral, cancelling the GST should have no negative impact on the deficit. That, incidentally, is also the opinion of The Financial Post.

There will be many ill effects on the health programs of our country when some of the services of health care workers like psychologists are taxed. You can see the danger of these services not being accessible to Canadians. When the administrative costs of our health care institutions are increased, you can see the burden added to our health care system. When we realize that transfer payments have not kept up with inflation then you have double jeopardy.

The effect on education will be similarly adverse to administrative costs. We cannot attract good teachers to our faculties. When the equipment becomes obsolete, we cannot replace it quickly. We will then suffer in our ability to compete internationally, since our ability to do research and development will be hampered. Science in Canada may be relegated to kindergarten level.

Can we believe the government when it says that the tax it intends to impose will remain at 7 per cent?

• (1630)

Let me tell you the history of the GST. New Zealand introduced the tax at 10 per cent, and now it is 12.5 per cent. The government could argue that is not a large increase. In Austria, it came in at 8 per cent, and now it is 20 per cent. In Britain, it was introduced at 10 per cent, now it is 15 per cent. In Denmark, it was 10 per cent, now it is 22 per cent. In Ireland, it was 16 per cent, now it is 25 per cent. In the Netherlands, it was 12 per cent, now it is 20 per cent.

Can the government fool Canadians that it will be 7 per cent forever? I dare the government to tell the truth. If we do not defeat this tax, there is a possibility of a tax revolt, but I hope it does not happen.

I would like to quote from a financial columnist who wrote on February 6, 1990: "If we have a choice between two taxes, which raise identical sums of money, both of which are perceived to be bad, why should we hope for the tax which affects most people directly?" Is GST better for the government? The answer is yes. Is GST good for Canadians? Eighty per cent of Canadians say no.

In last night's debate, one member of the government side said: "We were sent here to Ottawa to be tough", as though it was a source of pride. My submission this afternoon is that we have been sent here by our constituents to be sensitive, caring, fair and honest. Let us achieve genuine tax reform, acceptable to the constituents of Winnipeg North and acceptable to all Canadians. When that happens, we will be truly Canadians.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to a quotation that I have used in this House before. It is one by a John Baptiste Colbert, a 17th century statesman and finance minister during the time of Louis XIV. What he said at that time was: "The art of taxation consists of plucking the goose so as to obtain the most feathers with the least hissing."

I still go back to my perception of the goods and services tax. In response to the member for Winnipeg North, a great deal of this hissing is because they have never attempted to help the Canadian people understand this tax. They are using the same kind of rhetoric that they have used for years in relation to taxation.

Let me go back to the election of 1980, 10 years ago exactly to the day. We were in the midst of an election campaign because the Liberal party could not come to grips with reality. We were forced to go out and sell a 16–cent a gallon tax increase on gasoline. They fought against it, yet they knew at that particular time that it was good for the country. They chose to ignore it and they are doing the same thing with the GST.

What I want to ask the hon. member is this. The Liberal party is in the midst of a leadership campaign. Some of their candidates have taken positions on the GST and explained what they will do after they do win the leadership of the party. Regrettably, if they did ever form a government, some of them have told us exactly what they would do in relation to that tax; keep it, reject it, change it, whatever.

I am going to ask them this. I think the NDP is exactly right; the Liberals would not change it. They want to stand up and they want to holler but they will not change it. Is the hon. member going to take this into consideration in his support for some of these candidates who are seeking the leadership, and ultimately, the prime ministership of this country?

Mr. Pagtakhan: The answer is simple, Mr. Speaker. I will recommend to our leadership that the GST be scrapped.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments by the member for Winnipeg North and I think the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca summed it up very clearly when he said that we get mixed signals from the Liberal party as to exactly where they stand on the goods and services tax. I think the Liberal Party is shilly-shallying in trying to tell Canadians that they are against the tax. In reality, we all know—as all Canadians know who are watching this debate today—that the Liberals have no intention whatsoever of asking their leadership candidates to oppose the GST. I agree with the hon. member who spoke just a few moments ago, heaven forbid if the Liberal Party ever formed a government again in this country.

The only hope is the NDP, as the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca says. I would like to ask the member if he will join with us in rejecting completely Bill C-62, the goods and services tax. Will the Liberals make a commitment to the New Democrats in committee that they will stand and reject completely that bill, no tinkering, no fooling around, no technical amendment, just reject the bill completely?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, today he will be happy. You can join us and reject this GST. But Liberals are reasonable people. Three years down the road we do not know what the GST will have done to the Canadian public and we might devise a much better alternative than you predict, because you know that you cannot form the government.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in this motion the opposition calls upon the government to produce a tax that is clearly visible to taxpayers. That is precisely our intention in the goods and service tax. It is clear, it is straightforward and it is up front.

In fact, this is also how the government has conducted itself on this issue. We have gone to great lengths to inform the country about this measure and we will continue to do so in the period ahead. In the last few days, we heard a great hue and cry about our honest and open efforts to inform every business person in every region of this country about their rights and obligations under this proposed legislation.

Anybody who walked through the Confederation Building before we left for the Christmas recess could have seen the huge crates of Householders. On the front of them was printed in large black letters "Stop the GST". These were by the opposition members. In fact, I am amazed that they would have the nerve to stand in this House and try to stop us from putting out information on the GST, because what they are saying is "Let us, the opposition, put out bad information, in most cases, on the GST. But you, the government, can't put any information out. If you do, we are going to rise on questions of privilege in the House of Commons". That is the most two-faced, double-dealing effort I have ever seen and that is exactly how they have operated in the last little while.

If we cannot inform the public and businessmen, what are we supposed to do? Suddenly we appear in January, on New Year's Day, 1991 and say, "Surprise, what do you think? You have a new tax. Now you are going to take a year to figure it out". We are not doing it that way.

My colleague, the chairman of the finance committee has not hidden himself away. It would be a hard job to do anyway. There were public hearings across the country.

The Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and others on this side of the House have spoken at many public meetings about this measure and will continue to do so. In fact, I have heard challenges from the other side about getting on a platform and debating the GST. I will go anywhere, any time, with anybody, to debate the GST. Because I know how it operates. I know how the present system operates. I know how bad it is. I know people who have been hurt by it and I will go anywhere and debate it.

• (1640)

In fact, few measures have attracted the attention that this legislation has. Unlike some opposition members, Canadians in every part of the country have contributed to make sure that the goods and service tax is straightforward, fair and as effective as possible. By their wilful obstruction and stalling tactics in this House, the opposition has thrown away an opportunity to make a meaningful contribution during this debate. They have turned their backs on the process, and in doing so they have turned their backs on the people they were elected to represent. They want to send out a bulletin that says, stop the GST but I am not going to tell you what it is all about. That is the sort of phoney approach they take to it.

We came into this parliamentary session fully prepared to debate the opposition on the worth and substance of this legislation. They have proven unwilling or perhaps unable to do so. We know that the Liberal Party is distracted because of its struggle to find a new leader. The new leader of the NDP is distracted because she is struggling to find herself. She cannot find herself in that dark socialist closet. Unfortunately, Canadians may never know what a difference an effective, responsible opposition could have made to this legislation.

An hon. member: Keep your tie in.

Mr. Kempling: However, I always keep my tie inside my jacket especially when I am speaking and I keep my jacket buttoned up. I want to find a tie just like this for him. If I can get a red or orange one I will do that.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I believe the rules of the House state that a member is not allowed to use an object for display. I am interested in what your ruling is on the member's time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think that is a point of order. I haven't seen his tie and I don't care to see it.

Mr. Kempling: However, Mr. Speaker, Canadians will indeed know that they are paying a goods and service tax.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex–Windsor on a point of order.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I think I have quite a legitimate point of order. I believe that when a member refers to a printed document he or she is required to table that printed document in the House. I heard a reference to a tie, which I understand is a printed document, and it seems to be quite clear that the rules of the House require—

Mr. Speaker: It has to do with cabinet ministers but it does not have anything to do with private members.

Mr. Kempling: As I was saying, Canadians will know that they are paying a goods and service tax. We don't expect them to enjoy doing so but the GST will be visible and paid by consumers at the retail level. The part I cannot understand is that the opposition want this tax to remain invisible. They do not really understand what happens when the tax is invisible. I do not think any of them have been involved. I am not saying this in any derogatory sense. They have not been involved in the business side of structuring a price. What do you think happens when the federal sales tax is increased under the present regime? What do you think happens? There is a windfall to any merchant or any wholesaler who has tax-paid inventory in his warehouse. There is a windfall to him. He feels justified because he says, I have to go to the bank and borrow the money to pay the government the tax. He says I have to go to the bank to borrow the money to pay the federal sales tax to the government. Canadians in every region of the country who pay this hidden tax every day are going to be able to see the new tax up front. They pay about $18 billion in federal sales tax and many of them do not even know they have paid it. If members of the Liberal Party who are barracking over there had been here this morning they would have heard my friend, the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, challenge the Liberals as to whether or not they would cancel the GST if, unfortunately, they ever came to power. He nailed them right to the wall. They fumbled, mumbled, gasped, and choked and they did not have an answer. All they could say was that they would go back to the drawing board, as they have said for 40 years, 40 years of the same hidden tax with all the warts and problems it has.

I spoke on this yesterday. This morning I had a call at my office from someone who works in National Revenue in the federal sales tax division. He was very unhappy about some of the things I had said. He would not leave his name nor his phone number. I hope he is watching now, because a lot of those guys who were sales tax auditors when they left the government service became sales tax consultants. They went around to little businessmen in this country, the guys they were dunning for sales tax who should not have been dunned, and said that they could show them how to save all kinds of money because they are now sales tax consultants. I hope that guy is watching. Maybe he will call me and I will have a good long conversation with him.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I could not help but respond to remarks of the member for Burlington on the GST. I have been reviewing some correspondence that I have received recently from constituents and I would have to acknowledge that the tax reform manifested by the GST proposal is destined to bring about what the economists call allocative efficiency, but it is really so marginal that most of us in the real world are not going to be able to understand it or pay much attention to it.

One constituent has written to ask me to consider the leasing of automobiles. He says we will be paying 7 per cent on the 13.5 per cent federal tax which has already been charged on the automobile unit, 7 per cent on the $100 air conditioning excise tax, which has already been paid, 7 per cent on the $25 provincial tire tax, 7 per cent on the $600 minimum gas guzzler tax, and 7 per cent on the 8 per cent provincial sales tax in Ontario. That is very, very confusing for a consumer. My comment is that the government is replacing a bad tax, an efficient tax, the MST, with an equally bad or worse tax that will impact not just on manufacturers but on every single consumer in Canadian society. That bad tax is now made 100 times worse because it impacts on 100 times more Canadians. That is what the taxpayers out there do not understand.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, there is a pamphlet on leasing which I would encourage the member to send to his constituent. It all depends on when the vehicle was leased. If it was leased at a certain date there are different provisions from those which would apply if he has had it for a long while. At any rate, we have worked with the leasing companies very closely and I think we have a system now that they believe is fair to the people who are leasing vehicles. If a business is leasing the vehicle, any of the charges the business pays may be rebated. I do not think it is all that bad. I know there is a grey area with respect to the date the vehicle is leased; I would not deny that. But I would urge the member to see that pamphlet. We have some of them in our lounge. If he wants one, I will send it over. I suggest that he go through it carefully because it is not our intention to put any extra burden on anybody who is leasing a motor vehicle. I have leased hundreds of them myself over a period of time and I know the ins and outs of it. I would not be that concerned. But if you get that pamphlet, I think you will understand it.

• (1650)

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on the dialogue between the two members opposite. I think that is constructive. We just pointed out that some meaningful discussion and understanding can take place when the dialogue is on the level it has been on in the last two situations.

I want to point out to the Parliamentary Secretary that we collect the manufacturers' sales tax, I believe, from only 75,000 sources. In those 75,000 sources, there are something like 22,000 special exemptions and categories. I was wondering if the Parliamentary Secretary could answer that.

I am also interested to know whether he could point out why we are at a disadvantage in this country in relation to imported goods versus domestic goods, all things being equal. I was wondering if the Parliamentary Secretary could point out to us how discriminatory our present manufacturers' sales tax is.

Mr. Kempling: I will be as brief as I can. There are 75,000 people involved in paying the manufacturers' sales tax today. There are 22,000 different arrangements with them and there are six different rates, not four, as we have been told.

I will be specific on how it affects manufacturers. In my riding we have the Hoover Manufacturing Company. They made a little washer and dryer that my friend from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca would buy for his family or a friend. They imported some component parts and they manufactured it here. When they put their price together, they had to include their overhead, sales cost, telephone costs, packaging costs, shipping costs and everything else. When they compared this with a Sanyo that was imported from Japan, there was a $95 difference at the retail level. This is because the Sanyo comes in and a price is set on it, FOB a certain point in Canada. When the consumer buys this washer and dryer he would see this $95 difference and say: "No way am I going to buy the Hoover product". So, what did Hoover do? They moved the production out of Canada into the United States so they could be on a level field with the Japanese. That is what has actually happened. It has happened with all kinds of products across this country. In the United States, there is a group of people called custom manufacturers who just manufacture for Canadian mass merchandisers. That is all they do. They do not sell in the United States, so they do not even have to abide by the dumping legislation. This is something this goods and services tax will overcome.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think I will have to carry on. There will be another opportunity. The hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury has the floor.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that really amazes me this afternoon is that the official opposition that sponsored this motion and scheduled this whole day of debate on a very significant program like the goods and services tax has hardly shown up for the game. There are no members present on their front benches.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member knows, because he was also a long time provincial member, that you do not mention who is and who is not in this Chamber.

Mr. Bird: I stand corrected on that point. I must say I am sorry that some of my hon. colleagues across the House are not here to more vigorously debate this motion this afternoon.

I would also like to say that this is the second occasion in two days that I have had the opportunity to speak on this goods and services tax program. It is one I have deliberately sought, because I sincerely believe in the importance and quality of the legislation which constitutes the goods and services program.

I believe it is the right kind of legislation, the right kind of tax reform for Canada. Because I come from a business background, I have some sense of feeling for what financial pressures are about. My experience tells me that over the past 25 years our country has been proceeding in directions that had it been a business it would have been virtually insolvent.

I have an appreciation for the type of financial responsibility which we have to demonstrate in the years ahead, the type which would enable us to pay our way, to live within our means, and not to spend years in search of the myth of prosperity which really results in hyperinflation and the economic chaos that goes with it.

I would like to commend the hon. members of the opposition, particularly my hon. friend from Tracadie who introduced this motion this morning, and say that as wordy as it is, and as stale as it is, at least it is different from the traditional comment that he, his leader and his party have been delivering over the past many weeks and I quote: "Let us take this tax back to the drawing-board."

I gather that the paragraph presented today in this motion is the Liberal Party's redesign and it is hardly a work of architectural excellence. In fact, it is a work that almost departs entirely from accuracy and the truth and substance of the goods and services program.

The pivotal call in this motion is that we abandon the goods and services tax program. The word "abandon" is the type of word that suggests loss, fear, and flight, and it has been the hallmark of a great deal of this debate with members standing and speaking about assumptions of doom and gloom and all of the things that this tax program may bring.

I think Canadians are tired of politicians who cannot bring themselves to support good government legislation simply because of partisan pressures. When they ask us to abandon this tax program they are asking us to forsake our responsibility to Canadians and to their economic future. They are asking us to ignore the deadly deficit which we have seen year after year for almost 25 years and the deepening debt which is now standing at $320 billion and growing.

This motion also contains another sort of moral insolvency in the sense that it blatantly betrays how little the opposition really cares for the millions of Canadians, those on low and modest incomes including many senior citizens and single parents who will be better off under the goods and services tax program.

It is a fact that has been consistently ignored. Families making less than $30,000 income will have a net improvement in their financial and economic circumstances as a result of this goods and services program. These are the people that the opposition would have us abandon. When they say abandon the tax they mean abandon a fairer tax system, one that shifts the burden from those who cannot pay to those of us who can, to abandon a tax system that will let Canadian made products compete on equal terms with imports. Keeping a 13.5 per cent extinct federal sales tax will penalize domestic production as it has for years gone by.

They ask us to abandon a tax system that will strengthen imports and diminish our export capability. The GST will ultimately provide an economic boost to this nation, estimated to be close to $9 billion. They ask us to abandon a tax system that will help business to invest in new technology and productive capability and to create new jobs. As I said yesterday, the credit alone to businesses at the end of this year on existing inventories will constitute a $2 billion cash flow improvement to business accounts in this country.

These calls for abandonment of this tax are callous and contemptuous messages. They are calls to abandon our responsibilities. They are calls that we will not heed. That is not the policy of this government.

This motion talks about the tax scheme being ill-conceived. What could be more ill-conceived than the stale expression: "back to the drawing-board". There are no alternatives or suggestions, but back to the drawing-board, and then a resolution that is as negative and as preposterous as this which has been presented to us today.

They ask us to abandon the goods and services tax program. They are asking us to ignore the challenges which Canada faces in a world market-place that is increasingly more competitive on a global basis. The message that royal commission after royal commission, study after study, expert after expert, has driven home to Canadians is that the current manufacturer's tax is extinct, it is a bad tax, and it must be replaced.

This is a progressive tax. The goods and services tax is not a regressive program at all, it is a progressive program. It is one that to any fair and reasonable mind would be seen as a very positive and constructive direction for Canada.

Canada exports one-third of our Gross National Product, representing millions of workers. For example, our pulp and paper exports are $20 billion out of a total production of $25 billion. This tax program will enhance that industry.

This government will not be abandoning its responsibilities. It is the opposition members who should be abandoning their concepts which date back to 1924, and they should be abandoning the fearmongering which has characterized their debate.

The most interesting aspect of this entire debate today is that the Liberal opposition, as devoid as it has been of alternatives and creative suggestions in this debate, has actually been ridiculed and laughed at by the socialists to its left. That, to me, is the real interesting highlight of this entire debate. Not only is the opposition across the way divided, but the NDP are ridiculing the Liberals.

Canadians are seeing the government supporting this goods and services tax program with confidence and conviction, based on the knowledge that we are doing the right thing for Canada and that the Canadians will be well served.

The goods and services tax is one that will meet Canada's needs into the 1990s and into the 21st century. These are goals we cannot abandon, and they are goals we will not betray.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, we have heard time and time again in this assembly members on the government side saying that there have been no alternatives offered, that they have no alternative except to impose this massive, Draconian tax measure.

I want to point out very clearly to everyone in this House, as well as people right across Canada that time and time again my colleagues in the New Democratic Party have posed many alternatives. It is just that members across the floor have simply not listened to them.

What about the concept of a 20 per cent minimum corporate tax? What about the concept of lowering the interest rate and reducing the government debt as a result of increased productivity and lowering costs of borrowing? What about reclaiming the billions and billions of dollars in deferred taxes that have sifted through the government's hands because it has not claimed the money due and owing to it from those large profitable corporations, over 89,000 of which in 1986 paid no taxes whatsoever on $22 billion in combined profits? Why not go after some of that money? What about an assessment on corporate polluters with an environmental tax assessment? There are four alternatives right there, four good alternatives that this government, I submit, has simply refused to accept.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, the socialist representatives of the New Democratic Party have proposed tax measures that, thank goodness, they know they will never have the opportunity to implement. They know that they are unworkable. They know that the 20 per cent basic tax on all corporations will inhibit growth and initiative.

Mr. MacWilliam: They did it in the United States.

Mr. Bird: I give the New Democratic Party credit for their socialistic suggestions, Mr. Speaker, but they know that they will never have to implement them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think that everybody has caught their second wind since early this morning. Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address a bill that deals with fundamental fairness and equity. The Conservative government's goods and services tax will hurt all Canadians, especially those on the lower end of the economic spectrum. It is clear that the GST must be withdrawn.

Mr. Bird: That is not true.

Mrs. Maheu: It certainly is true.

Mr. Blenkarn: That's not true.

Mrs. Maheu: The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance must begin a process of actively consulting Canadians and provincial governments. They must create an integrated and fair taxation system. The government cannot fool Canadians by simply lowering the rate of the tax from 9 to 7 per cent.

An hon. member: One of your suggestions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Hon. members, please. There is still an hour or so to go. I would appreciate listening to the hon. member. The hon. member for St. Laurent—Cartierville has the floor on debate.

Mrs. Maheu: When the opposition starts screaming, it means we have really got them worried.

We will not accept a tax that is still fundamentally flawed.

[Translation]

Even if it reduces the rate from 9 to 7 per cent, the government cannot expect Canadians to accept the tax without protest.

It is imperative that the federal government further consult with the provincial governments, in order to create an integrated and fair tax system.

At a time of economic restraint, when the Governor of the Bank of Canada is keeping interest rates at artificially high levels in order to fight inflation, our minister introduces legislation that may raise interest rates even more.

[English]

If we look back to when the government first proposed the goods and services tax, they said that it would be visible. We have been talking a lot about visibility today. They said that every Canadian would be able to see the tax when paying for an item or a service. Unfortunately for Canadians, this government has reneged on another promise. The problem is that this government has a remarkable tendency to raise taxes.

If we look at the old manufacturers' sales tax, we see that when the Conservatives first came to power, the tax was approximately 9 per cent. Now this tax has climbed to a level of 13.5 per cent after four increases.

Can Canadians really trust this Government to keep this tax at a relatively low level? I doubt it. They were not able to keep their hands off the old tax.

It will simply be a matter of time before the Minister of Finance increases this tax back to 9 per cent and heaven knows how high he will raise it after that.

[Translation]

Apparently, the present government would like to reduce the debt by raising taxes and eliminating social programs. The federal government must find ways to manage our country's resources far more effectively. We cannot let remote regions and the poor in this country pay the price of the Conservative Government's poor fiscal management.

As a government that professes to favour tax reform, the Conservatives have failed miserably.

[English]

Another promise that the government made with respect to the proposed goods and service tax was the fact that it would be revenue neutral. Well, it is obvious that the Conservatives are using the GST as one of their main instruments in the battle against the deficit. Instead of being effective economic managers, they are using the bluntest instrument possible, increased taxation.

• (1710)

The Minister of Finance will say that he has been brave in his cutting of government expenditure. His definition of bravery includes attacking the unemployed, withdrawing the Citizenship Instruction and Language Training agreements which helped new immigrants adjust to Canadian society, and closing down the cafeteria in one of the Parliamentary Buildings. Some hero! What kind of minister would engage in this type of action? It is very clear that fairness is not a word in the minister's vocabulary.

As the "Axe the Tax" movement has been saying, the administration of this tax will be a nightmare for small businesses throughout Canada. Canada will have the dubious distinction of being the only country in the world with a two-tier tax system. So much for this government's promise to keep the tax system simple.

[Translation]

It is estimated that the GST, the tax on people, will cost small retailers who will have to hire additional staff, including accountants, to deal with their new administrative chores, $2 billion annually. What is particularly disturbing about these additional costs is that most of this burden will be borne by very small businesses. It will be a nightmare for small businesses because the federal government is determined to impose the GST without the co-operation of the provinces. We will have a two-tier sales tax, since small businesses will have to apply both the provincial retail sales tax and the federal government's GST. Although the Conservatives claim they are trying to simplify the tax system, it is quite obvious that the GST, in its present form, will make it even more complex.

[English]

Another fundamental flaw is the fact that the GST will have a disproportionately negative effect on low-income Canadians, including senior citizens and people on welfare. People over 65 in my riding who live on pensions already have a hard time making ends meet. They do not have the means to pay for an automatic 7 per cent increase on the necessities of life. Is it fair for them to pay tax on clothing and on certain food items? We do not tax caviare, we just tax our seniors.

[Translation]

On a more personal note, I know a woman in my riding who can only afford one evening out a month. She will soon be housebound because she cannot afford to pay the 7 per cent tax the government intends to impose on practically all her purchases. This tax penalizes business people, but this woman is also very clearly penalized. These are people on small budgets who can afford very few extras, such as going to the movies or to a restaurant.

[English]

Many individuals who testified before the finance committee stated that proposed tax credits to low income earners would not be enough to compensate for the negative effects of the tax. The tax will be particularly difficult on seniors. The president of the One Voice Seniors' Network stated before the committee that the proposed tax credits are not reassuring. Seniors, many of whom are on fixed incomes, will still have to pay proportionately more of their income than richer Canadians.

A further flaw in the tax is the fact that the credits are not fully indexed to inflation. Therefore, as the years progress, what little protection individuals on fixed incomes had would be severely weakened. According to the National Council on Welfare, within five years 700,000 poor families would be cut off from the tax credit because of the absence of full indexation. Within 10 years, this number would rise to one million families.

[Translation]

As a former city counsellor and a former mayor, you will understand that. I would like to refer to the impact of this bill on the other levels of government. At a time when municipal budgets are drained by deteriorating infrastructure while collapsing under the increased burden of having to supply a variety of services and improve environment management, this Tory Government is giving them and the provinces the additional responsibility of managing our national debt.

Municipalities have to use a multiplicity of services in order to offer their citizens a range of programs. With the GST, it is clear their operating costs will rise, with the result that services will have to be reduced or even eliminated or taxes increased in order to maintain some quality of life.

In fact, Canadian taxpayers will pay this tax three times. They will pay it when they buy a good or service. They will pay it again when municipal taxes and provincial taxes are increased. Each time the municipal government buys a pencil, the tax will automatically be transfered to the taxpayers.

Is the Government in effect creating two societies, one made up of people who have the means to look for every possible tax loophole, and the other made up of people who have always to think twice before buying their daily necessities because of their tight budget? Culture for the former, TV for the latter.

If we refer to the report on the tax impact of the GST, provinces suggest the tax would seriously jeopardize their financial situation.

[English]

While medical services are exempt from this tax, psychological services will be subject to taxation. This is simply an unfair assessment of the need of psychological services and the inherent benefits they have for patients. To exclude these professional health-related services from the umbrella of related medical services shows this government's insensitivity toward mental health issues.

[Translation]

In conclusion, I believe the time has come to balance things. The Government should tax fairly and stop favouring large corporations and very high income people. It is not reasonable that the same ones have to pay all the time, the poor, low income people, senior citizens on fixed incomes. It is unacceptable that this tax be implemented as proposed as early as 1991.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, we have reviewed with interest the Hon. Member's speech, and I have three questions.

[English]

First, I would like to ask the hon. member if she believes the representation which is contained in a study by Peat Marwick Thorne published on December 19 which states that a family of four with a single wage earner, making $24,000 or less, will receive a $580 tax credit per year in four quarterly cheques of $145 each. Does she believe that?

Second, I would like to ask the hon. member if she believes the representation made by the Department of Finance that families earning less than $30,000 per year will receive a net economic benefit as a result of the goods and services tax program, the total program, the elimination of the tax, the GST credit and so on.

Last, she has addressed low-income families. I would like to ask her if she agrees that the primary expenditures for low-income families are in the areas of basic groceries and rent for accommodation, both of which are tax exempt. Therefore, would those families not benefit from the goods and services tax exemption component as opposed to her claim that they will suffer increased expense?

I would like to have her answer to those three questions.

Mrs. Maheu: I thank the member for the question. Have you ever been poor? Twenty-four thousand dollars a year for a family of four? It is quite obvious that you do not have to answer the question for me because you do not even know what poor is.

• (1720)

When we talk about poor families only buying the primary necessities like groceries, and then they have to pay the rent, we forget about the fact that they have to heat their houses and buy clothes for their children, plus the 7 per cent additional expenses. Toward the end of the week, we are not even letting them get away without a tax on a package of cookies for the kids. When they get home from school, cookies and milk are a thing of the past for the poor family because they will not be able to afford them.

It is very obvious that they do not understand what being poor in this country means.

[Translation]

Mrs. Tardif: Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the question just put by the Hon. Member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury and the answer to it. My hon. friend from Saint-Laurent—Cartierville probably reads Montreal newspapers. I have here a clipping from the Montreal Le Devoir titled "An unavoidable reform". I would like to quote Albert Juneau, who had this to say in the last two paragraphs of that column: "There will be some gnashing of teeth here and there, but we will have to get used to it. The new sales tax on goods and services, the rules of which have been made public, will not please middle-and high-income families who will experience a significant increase in their tax burden. On the other hand, low-income families will be happy because they will be making real gains. As a result, in the face of increasing opposition to that new consumption tax, the Conservative Government, in order to obtain acceptance, chose to improve the situation of the neediest. This could not be done without increasing the tax burden on the most privileged and increasing revenues from the GST."

Mr. Speaker, when I look at the analyses that were made, not by people who simply reported the news but people who took the time to look at the whole issue, the general conclusion is first, that low-income Canadians will fare better and second, that, in all that was said since the technical document was tabled, there is no better alternative to the proposed GST, one that would reflect the disparities among our population, that would help to solve all the problems, one that would be a comprehensive proposal. I find it difficult to accept that people daily tell us the proposed GST will hurt the less privileged or senior citizens, when the exact opposite is true.

I also find it hard to understand that the tactic most often used in this House since the beginning of debate was that of petitions. I was listening last night to the news, after hearing the day before how important it was to the Liberal Party, the Opposition Party to put forward full cases of petitions. Last night, one of the leadership candidates said: "Listen now, it's so easy to make people sign petitions—all you have to say is: Look here, the tax will cost you money, a lot of money." One evening I see how important they view a petition, and the next evening they don't think much of it by the way they trick people into signing petitions. When I look at that I tell myself: How can that be taken seriously after all? Is there a will to help people, is there a way to consider legislation seriously, or do they talk simply for the fun of it?

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, we do not wish to be constructive, we just want to get rid of it. Could the hon. member explain to us why 78 per cent of Canadians are against the GST. Your own constituents— I probably got signatures from some of your own constituents, because I received them from all over Quebec.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am very honoured to add my few words to the motion put forward by my party that this House call upon the government to abandon its ill-conceived goods and services tax scheme and to bring forward in its place a comprehensive reform of the tax system that is fair, simpler and integrated.

Over the last few months, my colleagues and I have tabled over 600,000 petitions bearing hundreds of thousands of signatures from Canadians right across the country who oppose this proposed goods and services tax. We have tabled petitions that oppose taxing everything from books and ballet classes to straight outright opposition to the GST.

I have been monitoring the petitions that I personally tabled. While looking through the government's response to the petitions, I was struck by the arrogance with which this government addresses very valid concerns of the Canadian public. The hon. members opposite know what I am referring to. We find in our desks about one month after tabling a petition a big brown envelope and inside is the response to petitions.

I want to do something that probably no other member has done in this House. I want to respond to this response to the petitions. The response to each petition, be it against the ballet lessons or the books, was identical. It it because of this that I think the response merits some serious attention and shows why we need serious reforms to our tax system.

First, we start off with the criticism of the current manufacturers' sales tax which, as we all know, was brought in at 9 per cent, and raised by this government to 13.5 per cent. The Minister of Finance describes this tax as discriminatory and complex. If the MST is discriminatory, that is one positive aspect of this tax that the GST does not have in that the GST indiscriminately taxes right across the board, placing a higher and bigger burden of taxes on the poor working population of this country.

With respect to the current tax being complex, let me quote from one of this government's traditional allies, Mr. John Bulloch. In response to the streamlined accounting system proposed by the government to simplify the collection of taxes, he states that these procedures "are the most complex part of the whole nightmare".

He has also forwarded his estimate that it will cost approximately $1,500 to $2,000 for this collection versus the government's estimate of $600. The Minister of Finance states that the GST will improve our competitive position and provide a major stimulus to economic growth. Although the Minister of Finance may have in the past consulted with a broad spectrum of sectoral and public interest representatives, as claimed in this response, there are dire consequences expected for our economy resulting directly from the implementation of this new tax.

Wood–Gundy, the renowned Toronto investment firm that has also traditionally been an ally of this government, among others, has predicted that the GST would set off inflation at a rate much higher than estimated by the Minister of Finance. This would in turn set off spiralling wage demands which would lead to higher interest rates which would lead to higher unemployment.

We then come to paragraph three of this response in which the Minister of Finance describes the generous credit to low–income earners and claims that families earning under $30,000 a year will be fully protected once the GST is in place. That is a bunch of hogwash. The working poor are worse off than when this government took power five years ago, through the minister's insistence in the raising of sales tax. Furthermore, the small relief that may be felt in the first year will be eroded very quickly as the credit is indexed only to inflation of over 3 per cent and therefore the value of the credit is virtually guaranteed to erode by 3 per cent in a year.

A tax that did not even exist one year ago has suddenly become the only solution to all our social and economic woes. If the truth be known, the only reason that this government is sticking to its guns on the GST is because it falls right into line with the government strategy of favouring corporations and the rich at the expense of the average Canadian.

According to the National Council of Welfare, since 1984 when this government came into power, income taxes for an average working poor family have risen by 44 per cent, while those of a typical top income family have dropped by 6 per cent. Yes, the average working poor family is paying 44 per cent more in income taxes, not including the direct effect of the increased sales tax, while the rich are paying 6 per cent less.

There is something wrong in our tax system when the collection of our revenues and the sharing of our resources leads to 378,000 people per month using food banks in Canada. This is based on Canadian Association of Food Bank figures. There is something wrong with our tax system when 151,000, or 40 per cent of the food recipients, are children under the age of 18. Children are twice as likely to need food assistance than adults. There is something wrong with our tax system when nationally on an annual basis it is estimated that 1.4 million different people, including 560,000 children, use food banks.

There are at least 1,100 emergency grocery programs and 400 meal programs either operated or supplied by food banks in Canada. Meal programs are estimated to serve 1.1 million meals per month. I have 11 food banks in my riding of Parkdale—High Park alone.

Sales taxes have become the answer to all of this government's revenue problems. Now we know why. At the expense of the majority of this country, this government is going to protect its rich friends. This is getting increasingly and frighteningly obvious. It does not take a genius to realize that $1 tax on an item is going to hurt the working poor much more than someone with an income of $100,000 or more.

In my riding of Parkdale—High Park, the average price of a house is $290,000. We already have a housing crisis. The GST will add another $9,200 to that price. That does not include the taxes on lawyer's fees, real estate, commission fees, lot levies, and so on. For the majority of my constituents who cannot even now afford a house, it will be virtually impossible in 1991. For those who do not have the money to buy, they will have to have the money to pay higher rents. The GST will affect new dwellings and old, as it applies on all landlord operating costs.

For those of us who are making the decision to make any major purchases before 1991 to avoid the GST, do not worry. It will still get you every day, every month, every year.

In the fourth paragraph of the response to the petition comes the question of visibility. The response from the minister claims that because the GST will apply at the retail level and because it covers a broad base, consumers will know that they are paying the tax and how much they will be paying. This is the essence of visibility.

The Minister of Finance has already admitted that he does not have the legal authority to force businesses either to show the tax as a separate item on sales receipts or to display the tax on the shelf price. Why did the minister even bother to make this argument if visibility is already built into the tax for the consumer's protection.

That was the Minister of Finance's response to Canadians who have and are still voicing their opposition to the GST. I am amazed when I sit in this House and listen to the minister defend his tax. I am amazed because, first, he must have a very dim view of the intelligence of the population of Canadians when he argues that everybody who opposes this tax is wrong. They include economists, lawyers, financial experts, small businesses, provincial governments, non-profit organizations, public service organizations, the private sector and his own officials. They are all wrong. Only he and his buddies are right.

I am also amazed that he can continue serving as Minister of Finance, can keep a straight face and can look Canadians in the eye and say: "Trust me". I am not referring to the blow to his credibility with respect to the budget speech. I am referring to the promises he made only within the last year. The Minister of Finance promised that the tax would be revenue neutral. Instead it is a tax grab. He promised that it would be visible. Instead it is hidden. He promised that it would be simple. Instead it is extremely complicated.

If the current manufacturers' tax is referred to as the silent killer of jobs, I would put to you, Mr. Speaker, that the proposed GST will be the silent killer of everything, including jobs. I want to say to the Minister of Finance, scrap the GST, and go back to the drawing board.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, we have heard that type of debate in the last number of days in this House. It does not change.

The member for Parkdale—High Park points out that we need serious tax reform, but again he offers no alternatives. He and members of his party do not come up with another plan at all. I guess he supports what the Liberal finance critic stated this morning. They favour maintaining the status quo. We realize that the status quo is broken. It has been broken since 1924. We are the first government to come to grips with that problem.

He lambastes our tax and what we are attempting to do with the GST, but again he puts forward no alternatives.

The amazing story in all this is that the opposition, especially the Liberals, criticize while not looking down the road to the future of this country. They are not serious in this debate at all.

If they were serious, they would stand up on their hind legs and give us their alternatives. They say that they want a fairer tax, a simpler tax, an integrated tax. That is exactly what the GST is going to be.

They continue to mislead the Canadian people in assuming that the new GST is going to be an added tax without using the word "replacement". I wish for once one of them would stand up and tell the Canadian people that this is a replacement tax. We are replacing an outdated, outmoded 1924 federal sales tax.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that this Tory member who just spoke cannot read or does not listen. This is what this whole debate is about. The motion does have the alternative. The motion reads:

> That this House call upon the government to abandon its ill-conceived Goods and Services Tax scheme and to bring forward in its place a comprehensive reform of the tax system that is fairer, simpler, integrated, taking into consideration all forms of taxation and the needs and practices of other levels of government—

This government could not even get the provinces to agree. It is going to be a nightmare for small businesses to collect two levels of tax here. It continues:

> —and that this be clearly visible to the taxpayers and designed in a manner that does not merely, under the guise of reform, constitute another increase in the over-all burden of taxation.

The hon. member asks where we are headed. The Tory government is headed to run this country with food banks. Some 1.4 million Canadians have to rely on food banks to satisfy their food needs. Thousands and thousands of Canadians have to make a choice. Are they going to use their money for shelter or are they going to use it for food?

The two basic necessities of life are shelter and food, and so many Canadians cannot afford both. If they want to spend more money on food, they have not got the proper apartment. I have seen eight or nine people in one room, sleeping on mats on the floor. This is the future that the Tories are bringing to Canada. When we form the government, after 1992, we certainly know what kind of a future Canadians want.

• (1740)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Thompson: Finally, Mr. Speaker, someone with some common sense.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the cheering I am getting from the member, but I would like to get involved in this very serious debate because as a member of the finance committee I think I have a full understanding of the Liberal Party's intention in this resolution today.

I would like to go back to the actual recommendation that the Liberal Party put in the report of the finance committee to the House of Commons. Rather than participate in the process throughout Canada, they actively participated in the press conferences out in the hall and actively went to meet with all the associations outside the meetings so that they could make sure that their opinion was heard. They did not bother to stick around to hear the opinions of those who were witnesses.

Their recommendation was: "That the Conservative goods and services tax proposal be withdrawn and that the federal government immediately begin consultation with Canadians and provincial governments on the creation of a fair and integrated reform of the entire tax system".

They do not really describe just what they mean, but it involves the entire tax system. I thought I would be able to look at today's resolution to see what they are talking about. Did they follow through on their recommendations that they had in their report? They came through with the motion today that says:

> That this House call upon the government to abandon its ill-conceived goods and services tax scheme and to bring forward in its place a comprehensive reform of the tax system that is fairer, simpler, integrated, taking into consideration all forms of taxation and the needs and practices of other levels of government and that this be clearly visible to the taxpayers and designed in a manner that does not merely, under the guise of reform, constitute another increase in the over-all burden of taxation.

It is rather like the resolution. Does the Liberal Party really stand for tax reform? Does it really, seriously mean what it says in that resolution? Let us do a study and come to some conclusions. Let us just look at the record of the Liberal Party, because I think it is most important that we compare just what it says versus what it does.

I happened to go back and check the records. Yesterday, the member for Mississauga South mentioned some of the studies that were done, many of them under the Liberal Party. They include the Rowell-Sirois Commission back in the 1940s, the Carter Commission of 1966 that recommended tax reform, and the Macdonald Royal Commission that recommended tax reform. Even the member for Vancouver Quadra, when he was the finance minister back in the early 1970s, recommended tax reform. Marc Lalonde, when he was the finance minister, recommended tax reform, as did Mr. MacEachen.

All of them recommended tax reform. Here we are, finally getting around to doing something that should have been done as shown by many of the studies they did.

Suffice it to say that I was not here at that point, the previous finance committee did a very extensive study on tax reform, in relation to a goods and services tax or a value added type tax. All members of all parties in that committee endorsed the recommendation to proceed with a value added type of tax, the goods and services tax.

Liberals going back to the 1940s have been saying that the government should do something about the manufacturers' tax and the tax reform, and that we should endorse such action. Lo and behold, the Liberals did not have the guts to do it.

But what happens when a government is elected that has the guts to do it? They do nothing but criticize. They do not even have the courage of their conviction to say: "We recommended we do this a long time back, but we did not have the guts to do it. We commend you for doing what we just could not bring ourselves to do".

In the past they talked about tax reform to make it fair and simple. I cannot talk about the NDP because it has not been the government, and heaven forbid it ever gets there. Certainly we have some examples in provinces where it was the government. In fact, one of the members from British Columbia was premier and it only took them three years to discover that maybe another type of government would be more appropriate in British Columbia.

The Liberals believed in giving tremendously large grants. They believed in large Crown corporations. If de Havilland needed money, no problem. The same with Canadair, Air Canada, Canada Post and VIA Rail. Take it from the taxpayers and give it to those who really are happy to spend it.

Another example is the Foreign Investment Review Agency. All they were in favour of was big government interfering with everything. The National Energy Program not only shut down Alberta. It almost shut down all of Canada. Ontario was devastated with the PGRT taxes. They brought in taxes and tax schemes that are still with us to this day. In 1984 they gave us about a $40 billion deficit. They spent $40 billion more than they collected; $20 billion on programs. They were not even paying the cost of the programs let alone the cost of the interest, which at that point was another $20 billion.

The Liberals are calling for another study, according to their resolution today. They want another study. I listened to the member for Gloucester who proposed this resolution this morning. He recommended that we review taxes. He suggested, for example, that we look at property tax. He gave an example of a house in his riding in New Brunswick selling, I believe for $100,000, versus what it would sell for in the suburban Toronto area. Since when has the federal government been involved in municipal property taxes?

The Liberals talk about provincial taxes. They want to talk about excise taxes and transportation taxes. What they want to talk about is their past. What they want to talk about is big government and interference in everything in Canada.

Imagine what would happen to the municipal tax base if the federal government became suddenly involved in the municipal tax structure. It would be an absolute disaster to the municipalities. One need only listen to the cries now in the province of Ontario where the government is giving all kinds of programs to municipalities without the revenue sources to handle them. That is liberalism. It is rampant in Ontario. It is big government throwing costs on groups that just cannot afford it. Liberals stand for big government, big brothers and big Liberals.

The final report I really have to comment on was the visit today of the Auditor General to the finance committee this morning. The Auditor General made the comment that in 1984, during the federal election, he went to the Minister of Finance at the time, Mr. Lalonde, and complained that the SRTCs were going to cost us a fortune in tax leakage. What did they do about it? The Liberals said that they were involved in an election and did not want to be bothered. It cost us $4 billion to deal with their tax reform and their tax proposals. Heaven forbid we ever deal with their tax proposals again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap would like to rise on a point of order.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order to seek unanimous consent for extension of the sitting of the House to allow for a second member of the New Democratic Party to present his views on the motion at hand.

The reason I do so is that when I checked last, almost a half hour ago, five government members had spoken on this motion, five Liberal members had spoken on the motion and only one New Democratic member had spoken on the motion. I do beseech the consent of the House so at least we can hear one more member present the views of his constituents.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Mississauga South on the same point of order.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I think in the normal course of splitting 20-minute speeches I had agreed to take on a speaking responsibility following the member for Ontario.

In view of the fact that the member for Okanagan—Shuswap is a relatively new member in the House and I get lots of opportunity to speak, perhaps we can hear the views of members of the New Democratic Party. They say they have great views and wonderful ideas. I priced some of those ideas out. Perhaps we would have some fun asking him some questions if he restricted his remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Instead of having an extension of hours, is it agreed that we allow the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap to have the last 10 minutes?

• (1750)

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, that would mean giving up the time for questioning of the previous member. I would certainly be prepared to do that.

In so far as the extension of the hours beyond six o'clock is concerned, given the fact that I, along with my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, had remarks to make earlier this week and we asked for extension of the hours and that was denied, I am not prepared to give it. However I am prepared to forgive the five-minute question and answer period in order to allow my other colleague to speak, as a compromise, to show good faith on our part and perhaps to forget a little of what happened earlier this week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ontario does not give unanimous consent. Are there questions or comments for the hon. member for Ontario? The hon. member for Sudbury on a question or comment.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to make a comment, at any rate, before my question. I take very serious offence to the sleight of the member for Ontario on the Liberal members of the finance committee.

I happen to be one of those members. I attended hearings and I spent a lot of very valuable time listening to the people who came before the committee. I very much object to some of the comments that were made by the hon. member for Ontario. I do not believe that this House should be used for that kind of comment. It shows the kind of arrogance that some of these members have had toward these people who have taken time out of their busy schedules to come forward and make presentations to the finance committee.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if I have upset the hon. member. Certainly there were participants from the Liberal Party during the finance committee hearings as there were participants from the NDP.

The only comment I would make is that the record of attendance is there. I grant that the member was there, but other members of her party consistently were not there and were more actively involved outside the committee process. I believe we were there to take part in the committee process. I heard most of the witnesses, by far.

I can comfortably stand here in this House and say that the majority of the witnesses were in favour of the goods and services tax. They had amendments that they would like to see, many of which were recommended by the finance committee, but they supported the goods and services tax. If those members were there listening to all the witnesses that I heard, why are they not here saying the same thing? Why are they not here saying that many of those witnesses who appeared thought that this was an excellent idea and we ought to proceed with it?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the member for Ontario. It has to do with senior citizens and those members of society in lower income brackets and the impact of the GST and the tax credits in relation to those two groups.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a very appropriate question. We have had some debate today in the House about the credits that low income Canadians would be getting from this tax. Some said the credits were certainly not adequate. I would point out that that is exactly opposite to what was said by witnesses from the National Council on Poverty and the National Council of Welfare. They felt the credits that were being granted were in fact adequate.

I should add for the member's information that, for example, in his province of New Brunswick there are some 267,000 families or 75 per cent of the families in

New Brunswick who will be getting a credit in the amount of $215 on average per year. That is a very substantial percentage of the people of New Brunswick who will be getting assistance. The same is true for Newfoundland, a place where assistance is definitely needed, where low-income families unfortunately do need the help. Some 85 per cent of the families of Newfoundland will be getting sales tax credits.

Across Canada 64 per cent of families will be receiving sales tax credits. I believe we have very adequately protected those low income Canadians from added costs that might occur.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the House for the incredible latitude it has shown in terms of equity of presentation today.

Last fall when it became clear the government was set to proceed with its kamikaze mission of imposing this goods and services tax, I took the opportunity to canvas the business community in the riding of Okanagan—Shuswap. From the North Shuswap down through Salmon Arm, Sorrento, Sicamous, Enderby, Salmon Arm, Armstrong, Falkland, Lumby and down into Vernon I talked to business owners throughout the riding and with their customers.

I have never before seen such anger, frustration and complete contempt for any government initiative. Business people, housewives, professional people, elderly people, people right throughout the riding were telling me to come back here and to kick the slats out of this government for what it is trying to do to the people not only of Okanagan—Shuswap but all of Canada. They are extremely angry and upset and they want the government to know it.

There has never been a more abusive tax measure, a more unfair tax proposal, a more damaging initiative, unless we do not exclude the free trade deal. I left almost 500 stop the tax petitions in those businesses and only 4 out of about 500 businesses that I visited did not take the anti-tax petition. People signed them in droves. Today I deposited my last instalment of 127 anti-GST petitions. Some 3,325 residents signed those petitions. That totals 311 petitions with 14,700 signatures from the riding of Okanagan—Shuswap.

That represents over 25 per cent of the registered voters in my riding who were angry enough about this tax measure to put their signatures on the line. An equivalent of over one in four voters felt mad enough about this gouge and squeeze tax to sign these petitions.

As well as that I have received over 1,000 stop the tax protest cards. In fact this is a package of over 1,000 mail-backs asking the government to stop this tax. As well, I have over 5,000 questionnaire surveys. Here is one box with 1,000 in it, and there are four more in my office upstairs.

The people responding in those surveys have made it very clear that they want this tax stopped. They do not want it reduced, modified, or phased in. They want it stopped, killed, DOA.

They want that because they know that this tax is going to hurt them. It is going to hurt them as consumers. It is going to hurt them as small business people who are trying to get by and maintain their standard of living.

Consumers know that it means a higher cost of living. Seniors know that it means doing with less again, and those less fortunate also know that it means tough times ahead.

Tory times are tough times. Tory times are taxing times, and these Tory tax tricks are terrifying people right across Canada.

I know my time is very limited and I appreciate your indulgence, Mr. Speaker. I want to read into the record a few comments from people in the Okanagan—Shuswap. A constituent in Salmon Arm writes: "The GST is an insidious assault on working people, retirees and average Canadians. We are fed up with the continued assault on Canadians by this government."

Here is one from a former president of the Conservative riding association in my constituency: "This tax will play hell with the tourism industry and the people of Canada."

And a third one: "Why is it that the average Canadian continually has to bear the brunt of financial incompetence of our government?" That is from a Mr. Johnson.

There are many more comments like them. I could go on at length. However I think they give a very clear message that people not only in my riding but throughout Canada are extremely upset with this proposed tax measure. There are better ways to reduce the debt. We have talked about them repeatedly. My colleagues in the New Democratic Party have proposed a number of alternatives.

I submit to you, Sir, that one way is to get tough with the corporate welfare bums. I know that term was used years ago, but it still relates today, those corporations that continue to stick their snouts into the federal trough. The government is giving away $30 billion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

It being six o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

The motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Last Friday, Mr. Speaker, I tried to find out whether the government was planning to issue the regulations related to Bill C-72, which the House adopted in the spring of 1988.

Mr. Speaker, these regulations are necessary for Canadians to know exactly with what tools the legislation will be implemented. The Official Languages Act needs its own regulation, because, otherwise, it would be like a boat without a rudder. The target would be easy to see but difficult to reach.

Following the adoption of the legislation in July, 1988, the Official Languages Commissioner wrote last year in its annual report, and I quote:

> We hope the first regulations will be tabled in the House by the end of 1989.

He made that statement in his annual report.

On April 11, I asked the president of Treasury Board when he expected to table his draft regulations. This is what he said, and I quote:

> In today's report, the Commissioner said that he hoped regulations would be tabled by the end of 1989. I can assure the hon. member that the regulations will be tabled in the House well before that date, so that we can have final consultations with all members of this House.

Mr. Speaker, it has been 20 months since the act was passed, and 10 months since the President of the Treasury Board promised in the House that regulations would be tabled. It will have taken nearly three years, if you know what the procedures are, to give this legislation some teeth, to have a set of regulations adopted and implemented.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very long time for what I consider an urgent matter. I think that considering the symptoms we are seeing in this country, symptoms that are widely known and in deed regrettable, we cannot let this kind of intolerance exist with respect to certain groups across the country.

If the government does not table the regulations, if the government is reluctant or perhaps afraid to table its regulations today, it compounds the problems for Canadians who need to know the objectives and methods by which the act is implemented. It is a very difficult situation, especially for Francophones outside Quebec, because we need these regulations to have a clear understanding of the policy and how it is applied. Mr. Speaker, there are three main chapters that require clarification.

Language of service: in other words, the language used by Canadians to ask the government for the services to which they are entitled.

The language of the institution: being bilingual, Canadians may chose the language in which they wish to communicate with the government. The language of services to the public is essential. What are the regulations in this respect? Well, we don't know, Mr. Speaker. But I can tell you that the language of service, Section 26 of the act, safety and security of the public, is important and we must know where we are going.

• (1805)

Section 32: definition of significant demand. In what regions of our country will we provide services to Canadians in the language of their choice?

Section 33: authority of the Governor in Council to oblige institutions to provide those services. So, there are three sections in this act that are very important and require a regulatory definition.

The other component, Mr. Speaker, is language of work.

Section 38: The obligations of the employer—the federal government or, if you prefer, the President of the Treasury Board as our representative—to promote the language of work (documents and all other work instruments). Prescribe parts and regions conducive to the use of the language of work. Here again, Mr. Speaker, firm decisions must be made to determine where, when and how these rights will be exercised.

Finally, fair participation.

Section 40: Ensure equal access to employment by both linguistic groups—the English-speaking minority in Quebec and the French-speaking minority outside Quebec—while maintaining the merit principle.

Mr. Speaker, these three issues—language of service, language of work, and fair participation—call for clear and specific regulations. I know that the government did consult with minority associations, I know it did consult with the various departments. I also know that the government is sitting on its regulations. I am asking the government why hesitate now to let Canadians know the major points of the regulations which would put some teeth in the Official Languages Act and give us an idea of where we are going. The government simply has to change course, Mr. Speaker, and that does take a bit of courage.

However I will not say what I think, that the government lacks courage. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I think there are enough Members on the other side of the House who believe in the objective of the official languages, who like me will very soon want to know just what the government plans to do about the official languages. This once, for heaven's sake, give us an answer!

[English]

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, before I respond to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier let me very quickly cover three points.

First, in the House this week the Prime Minister and the government confirmed in a motion their commitment to official bilingualism and language policy in Canada. That motion reaffirms the commitment to support, protect and promote linguistic duality in Canada as reflected by this House in the Constitutional amendment, 1987 and the Official Languages Act. The commitment is there and clearly confirmed.

Second, let me say to the member for Ottawa—Vanier that everybody in this House respects his devotion to the promotion of official languages. I personally encourage him, as a person from a predominantly unilingual English area, to continue that commitment and not to hesitate to express his views at any time.

The third point, which I think is the most important of all, is that our language rights are embossed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. No legislative act or regulation can improve on the enshrinement of language rights in that constitutional document. I would like to think that the language minorities of this country are protected by our Constitution, but that does not mean that we should not move to improve and implement those rights in any way we can.

That brings me to the Official Languages Act, which members of this House enacted in July, 1988. That Official Languages Act was a very special kind of document. Great care was taken to ensure the proper implementation of the provisions of the document relating to language rights.

The member specifically mentioned language of services. That is one of three important areas covered by the Official Languages Act.

The member also knows that the House of Commons when it enacted that important piece of legislation provided a very special procedure. Unfortunately, that special procedure is quite complicated. It involves various processes that delay passage of regulations, but it is designed to ensure that when a regulation is made and acted upon it will have the real support not only of this House of Commons but of all the major linguistic groups in the country.

• (1810)

It is to that end that we would like to direct our attention, not simply regulations for the sake of getting them through quickly but regulations that have meaning, that are accepted and will be enforced and have the support of everybody involved.

I do not need to remind the member of the complications of the process but he knows that it involves time frames, presentation to the House and publication of regulations in the Royal Gazette. It is a five-step procedure which I will not detail because it is contained in the provisions of the Official Languages Act.

One of the important parts of the process is consultation. That consultation has taken place but it is not a process that starts and ends, it is a continuing process. If anybody sees any difficulties that would be an impediment to the implementation of language policy I think they have to consult at whatever time and regardless of what past consultations have taken place.

Let me conclude by saying that it is a difficult process but it is a process that is worth following carefully because in the end, if we have regulations that implement the language policy as adopted in the Official Languages Act with everyone's consent and concurrence, then the regulations will be effective and they will accomplish the end that we all desire. I know that that is the aim and goal of the member for Ottawa—Vanier in particular as well as of all members of the House.

JUSTICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express concern about the response to my question on January 29 with respect to the Donald Marshall inquiry and the recommendations made under that inquiry.

At that time I asked the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada what that minister was going to do with respect to the number of specific recommendations made by the Marshall report which fell entirely within the federal jurisdiction. I referred to issues such as establishing a court worker program or a native court system in the native areas of Nova Scotia or dealing with the establishment of a justice institute.

I also addressed a question to the Solicitor General with respect to the recruiting and hiring of RCMP officers of minority origin, in this case specifically native Indian origin.

This is an extremely important issue. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, there are inquiries into the equality of justice being administered to natives all across Canada. There is an inquiry going on in Alberta now. There is an inquiry being pressed for in Saskatchewan, although the Attorney General for Saskatchewan is refusing to get involved in an inquiry even though the number of natives in jail in Saskatchewan is grossly out of proportion to the number of natives in the general population and there is clearly evidence that the justice system treats natives differently than it treats Canadians of other racial origins.

My specific concern was about the recommendations of the Marshall inquiry. In response to one of my questions the minister indicated that within seven to ten days he would be coming down with responses to the specific recommendations of the Marshall inquiry. In the meantime, he indicated he would be consulting with the authorities in Nova Scotia. As the Speaker is aware, the authorities in Nova Scotia have come out with a relatively detailed response to the recommendations of the Marshall inquiry.

As I pointed out in my statement made earlier this morning, I believe, as do many Canadians, that the response made by the Government of Nova Scotia was completely inadequate. In fact, it tended again to put the blame on Donald Marshall as being the author of his own misfortunes. I would like to quote briefly from the executive summary to the response of the Government of Nova Scotia. It states: "Difficulties Micmacs encounter with the justice system are rooted in social, political and economic structures outside the justice system and are not the result of any evil intention to discriminate by justice personnel."

We saw in the Marshall inquiry report that that statement is absolutely false. The justice system, according to the Marshall inquiry, failed Marshall, and according to the findings of the inquiry, it failed Marshall because he was a native Indian.

• (1815)

I think it is good and worth while that the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, Mr. McInnis, has apologized to Donald Marshall. I think it is a good and worth while action on the part of the government of Nova Scotia that it has now referred the issue of compensation back to Mr. Justice Evans to investigate a possible increase in the compensation given the fact that both federal and provincial authorities were at fault for the racial prosecution that took place against Mr. Marshall.

I think more has to be done by this federal government. Native Indians in Canada are the jurisdiction of the federal government and justice to native Indians is a problem all across this country, not simply within a particular province of Canada. The problem is not that Indians run into more mistakes with the federal justice system or that there are collections of circumstances which cause more problems with Indians. The problem is that aboriginal people are discriminated against by this justice system.

In part, Mr. Speaker, it is a cultural thing. I think we saw evidence of that in the Innu case that is taking place in Labrador right now. The Innu are being expected to testify before a court which they believe is on a land that has been stolen from them, before a judge who represents the people who stole the land from them, to try to establish why they should not have the right to occupy land which was taken from them without compensation and without any documentation.

As I say, the system of justice in this country discriminates culturally against native Indians and we need to have quick, distinct, positive and proactive answers from the Minister of Justice in this House so that natives in this country will be able to have some expectation that in the near future we will not have any more Donald Marshall situations and we will not have any more of the kind of situations that are taking place with the Innu people in Labrador.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the report of the royal commission on the Donald Marshall, Jr. prosecution was anxiously awaited by a great many Canadians. The prosecution, wrongful conviction and imprisonment of Donald Marshall, Jr. has come to symbolize for the public a growing awareness of problems in the criminal justice system, particularly as those problems affect aboriginal persons.

The federal government is deeply concerned about this issue. The Minister of Justice chairs a committee of federal and provincial ministers responsible for justice matters and this committee has identified aboriginal criminal justice as a matter of highest priority. The minister and the federal government actively and regularly consult with native groups about necessary reforms in the system of aboriginal criminal justice.

I can tell the House that this is a subject to which the hon. minister has devoted and will continue to devote considerable attention.

The release of the royal commission report represents an important turning point in the history of aboriginal criminal justice and is now receiving a most detailed review. The commissioners found that the criminal justice system failed Donald Marshall, Jr. from the time of his arrest, conviction and imprisonment in 1971, up to and even beyond his acquittal by the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal in 1983.

The report does not, however, just indicate where the system has gone wrong, it also makes a number of thoughtful and far-reaching recommendations for reform. Since the report was released the minister and the Department of Justice have been carefully studying its findings and recommendations. The Minister of Justice has conferred with his provincial counterpart in Nova Scotia and the department has as well discussed the matter with interested parties including a number of native individuals and organizations.

The interest of the hon. member for Comox—Alberni in the matter is well recognized by this House. The Minister of Justice shares the interest and is giving consideration of the royal commission report priority attention. I expect the Minister of Justice will respond to the parts of the report which pertain to the federal role in the administration of criminal justice in the very near future.

• (1820)

In closing, I would like to indicate to my hon. friend that all Canadians share his concern about the wrongful conviction and imprisonment of Donald Marshall, Jr. and the findings of the commission. Nothing can properly compensate Mr. Marshall for the years he has been in prison. We can, however, use this opportunity to take what steps we can in order to ensure that this tragic case does not recur.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, on November 3 I rose to ask the Minister of Communications why he had rejected out of hand and refused to negotiate a compromise proposal on the regulation of telecommunications that had come from the prairie phone lines, the three prairie governments, when they proposed that the prairie governments should maintain control of local service, that the federal government should control interprovincial and international service and that the cost of maintaining affordable local service be split.

Prairie people are getting very frustrated with this situation, as am I, because the minister says he is negotiating but in fact there are no negotiations taking place at all. The minister is repeatedly holding a gun to their heads and saying: "You either do it my way or I will take unilateral action", and that is not negotiation.

Obviously the minister is ignoring two very important elements of this situation. One is that the prairie phone system was built over 80 years by the people of the prairies and is a very appropriate system to that part of the country and is recognized as one of the most modern and efficient in the world.

Second, he ignores the very real consequences. His own department produced the Sherman report which said that nine out of ten users would pay more than they are now for local service, including 90 per cent of businesses, with the justification for this whole move being that businesses would be more competitive. In fact, 90 per cent of businesses would pay more.

Then, just this week, a report done by Dr. Robert Olley, an internationally respected telecommunications expert, came out which said that the basic phone rates on the prairies would rise 167 per cent for rural users and 140 per cent for urban users.

What is happening here is that people who have low incomes, people who are in isolated areas, people who live in rural areas, are going to find themselves more and more cut off from the basic phone service that everybody needs to become part of modern society and be part of a modern economy.

Furthermore, it totally ignores the fact that there are different ways of doing things in the different regions of the country. It seems ironic that the Minister of Communications, who is very much a champion of his particular region, should so totally ignore institutions that have been built up and work very well in our particular region of the country. That kind of attitude certainly does not help to lessen the stresses and strains which our country is feeling.

Therefore, I would like to ask again, why is this minister proceeding in unilateral fashion, without any kind of meaningful negotiation with the prairie phone systems, to introduce a phone system that would be a Cadillac system for the wealthy, the big businesses and the people in big cities while the low-income people, the people in isolated communities, the people in rural Canada, the people in the hinterlands, would become more and more second-class citizens? That just does not seem right to me and I would like to know what the real answer to that is.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to respond to my hon. friend. Over the last five years the Government of Canada has conducted extensive negotiations with the provincial governments to find a way to accommodate their role in and responsibilities for telecommunications. I have had the honour, Sir, of being part of the most recent negotiations and I can assure my hon. friend that they were very serious negotiations with no gun held to anyone's head.

The concept of two-tier regulation was rejected by the industry, including the provincial telephone companies. So, with no satisfactory settlement, a new approach and a new consultation mechanism was called for. The federal government decided it would be in the best interests of all Canadians to resume those negotiations. The emphasis now was to develop mechanisms for effective consultation and thereby ensure that all levels of government be involved in future policy and regulatory formulation.

• (1825)

The new comprehensive legislation that the minister intends to table shortly is based on the over-all objective of not only creating one national telecommunications policy and a simplified regulatory framework with one regulator, but also the promotion of equality for all regions, regional sensitivity in policy and regulatory formulation, a thriving market-place in the supply of telecommunication services and equipment, and an open market.

There has been drafted a new memorandum of understanding with the provinces. We have consulted with them on this matter and have received a favourable response. The memorandum of understanding and the proposed telecommunications legislation does include the proposals of the Prairie Telecommunications Alliance.

Notably, some of its proposals are the following: regulation must be sensitive to the priorities of rural development; it must recognize provincial participation in developing ongoing maintenance of national telecommunications policy; the national policy must promote industrial development in the provinces; and national telecommunications policies must include measures that enhance our international competitiveness and reduce regulatory burdens.

We are now in the wake of the Supreme Court decision of August 14, 1989, which found that regulation of provincial telephone companies was within the ambit of the federal government and, notably, the CRTC. Now Canadians are concerned about rates. Most Canadians are concerned about possible increases in their local telephone rates. The proposed legislation which is to come has no impact on specific rates. The most significant change that will result from the legislation is the simplification of the regulatory structure.

No existing regulatory decisions, orders or associated items of service will be affected. Significant changes in any rates require a thorough public hearing process, I should add, much more open than the process that exists in the hon. member's own province of Saskatchewan where rate decisions are made behind closed doors by cabinet and not even by a public utilities commission.

The CRTC's vigorous public hearing process will now be applied to all regions of the country, creating uniformity of the decision-making process. This does not imply, however, that the rates between or within companies' areas of service will be changed. Again, such changes, if and when they occur, must occur only through public hearings in which all interested parties can participate.

I wish to emphasize that the introduction of the new telecommunications legislation has nothing to do with the issue of whether long distance competition should be introduced.

Finally, I wish to conclude by saying that the large increases in local rates suggested by several opponents of long distance competition, including my hon. friend, are based on extreme assumptions.

The federal government commissioned a federal—provincial task force to examine the impact of long distance competition. That is the Sherman report. We agree that some rate changes may occur. Even under the most extreme assumptions in the Sherman report, local telephone rates did not increase appreciably. But, as stated in the report, the size of this impact depends on basic assumptions. It will not be until we have a formal submission that more conclusive evidence could be made available concerning the actual impact of the introduction of long distance competition on local rates. There has been no submission for long distance competition involving the prairie region of the country.

I should emphasize, just in concluding, that the telecommunications policy, the telecommunications legislation which is about to be tabled in this House, has no relationship with long distance rates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at ten o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

POINT OF ORDER

COMMUNICATIONS AND CULTURE COMMITTEE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order as my party's communications critic and a member of the communications and culture committee of the House of Commons.

John Kim Bell is a distinguished Canadian. He is the first North American native to become a symphony conductor and he is founder and president of the Canadian Native Arts Foundation, which provides educational grants and scholarships for promising young natives.

I can testify to the fact that he has been applying to appear before the House of Commons committee on communications and culture to be heard with respect to funding for native cultural projects. There has been some resistance to allowing him to appear before the committee.

He is quoted in the Ottawa Citizen today as saying with respect to the hon. member who is the Chair of that committee, that the Chair said, "The problem is, Indians are lazy." These were his exact words. These are the words of the Chair of the committee to Mr. John Kim Bell. There is a very serious allegation of racism and it comes at a time when there are some unfortunate similarities of racist attitudes in other issues in other parts of the country.

I put the government on notice that we expect a statement from the Minister of Communications or from the Prime Minister with respect to this matter.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that is a point of order.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make two comments. The first one is that the hon. member from Manitoba is not here at the moment. Traditionally, before any charges, or any accusations against a member or any points of order of this nature are heard, we ask that the member affected be in the Chamber.

Second, I understand from talking with the member who is being referred to here that he plans to rise on a personal point of privilege later in the day. So I think that issue can be addressed at that time.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps the best way to deal with this is to leave it where it is at the moment. Let us see what events unfold during the day. I know very well the very sincere and serious concern that brings this matter to the floor of the House, but I think that the hon. parliamentary secretary is right. It has been said. Let us await events.

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) that Bill C–5, an act to amend the Railway Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

• (1010)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I will just take a couple of minutes to make one point on this legislation. The transportation policy over the years has been based on the need for transportation, particularly in remote areas. What is happening today is that transportation policy is becoming less of a national policy and one more based on economics, the amount of money that can be made. This why I want to make one point on this particular shortline railway, the Central Western Railway bill.

This railway is an experiment. The basis on which the movement of grain can be paid for has not changed because this railway is in place. It is an experiment. Any grain that would be delivered from any point to Vancouver or to Thunder Bay, would get the same amount of freight as if it were transported from the end of the railway. In other words, there is no basic method, except for government subsidies, to pay for the continuing operation of this railway.

The $7 million used to operate this railway is entirely a government subsidy. Those funds which I gather amount to some $17 million after upgrading are of no real value in changing the arrangements for the movement of grain. They are a slight saving to the CNR, and of course they are a saving to the farmers on that line because they would have to haul many more miles if the line were abandoned.

We should recognize that the funds to keep this railway or any other shortline railway within the structure we presently have will require the subsidy of the government for its entire operation. That is the way it will operate unless a change is made in the movement of grain by this government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

GENEVA CONVENTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, January 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) that Bill C-25, An Act to amend the Geneva Conventions Act, the National Defence Act and the Trademarks Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): I was speaking to this bill when it was before the House a week or so ago. The point I was trying to make at that time was that although it is very important to have the Geneva Convention and the protocols ratified, there are other things we should be doing to make sure that the world is a better place and that there is less chance of war.

Making rules for making war less barbaric, although recognized as necessary, really gives us the idea that war is okay. Therefore even as we ratify the protocols that are part of the Geneva Convention, we should do things that will help to make the world more likely to keep the peace.

I want to mention a few of the things I think Canada can do to increase the likelihood of peace around the world. Something we could do immediately here right at home is ban the testing of weapons in Canada. We could eliminate testing of the cruise missile tomorrow if we wished. That in itself would send a message that we are really concerned about making peace possible in the world.

We could establish a comprehensive test ban and Canada could press for such a ban. The 1963 treaty banning the atmospheric testing of nuclear warheads was a move in that direction. We can thank Howard Green, who was the minister at that time, for his significant contribution to the ban on testing nuclear weapons in the atmosphere.

We now have U.S. resistance to a comprehensive ban on the testing of nuclear weapons. But Canada could do something about that by refusing to be part of it. Instead, we are going along with the strategic defence initiative, the star wars initiative, that the U.S. has in place. By being part of that star wars initiative we are contributing to the development of armaments in the world. We are therefore part of the resistance, if you wish, that the U.S. has shown to the testing of nuclear weapons.

We should consider all of the money we are spending on armaments in conjunction with the money being spent on other things happening around the world.

Over 20 million people have died in wars since 1945. The world spends $130 million every hour on armaments. During that same hour 2,000 children die of starvation and disease.

The transfer of arms to Third World countries has risen from $5 billion per year in the early 1970s to as high as $35 billion per year in the 1980s. Many of those arms transfers are done on credit, something which adds to the debt of Third World countries. Consequently, this decreases the possibility of worthwhile development and the elimination of hunger and disease in those countries.

• (1020)

There have been some positive developments, and Canada has a good record of development aid. However, our record is not as good as it could be and we could do more. We could do more in terms of peacekeeping work and development. As I mentioned the other day, we could also make a very basic and direct move by reducing our military exports.

When this government first came to power five years ago, one of its first privatization operations concerned the armaments industry in Canada. While the armaments industry was under public control we had very specific control over the export of those armaments. Since that time—and I cannot blame the company that took over the manufacture of armaments too greatly—arms made in Canada have been appearing all over the world.

According to Project Ploughshares, approximately 300 million armaments from Canada go to the Third World either directly or as parts of units assembled elsewhere. A large number of the recipient countries that are serious violators of human rights.

In the Iran–Iraq war, Canadian–made components for weapons appeared on both sides. There should be stronger restrictions so that, minimally, military and military–related products do not go to human rights violators. The end use of any components should be part of the exporting requirements and should be firmly controlled. Better still, we should stop making and selling armaments completely.

Canadians could also make an effort, both nationally and internationally, to reduce the flow of weapons on the international market. As a place to start we could make requirements which would force suppliers to recognize when they are contributing to world armament.

We could appeal to places such as Indo–China, the Horn of Africa, South Africa, Central America, the Middle East and other places where there is widespread killing, devastation and injustice. We could deal with them and start a movement toward the elimination of armaments.

Even as we make rules for war we should be doing much more to ensure that war becomes less likely in the world.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On questions or comments, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for my hon. colleague who has spoken so thoughtfully regarding Bill C–25. We are aware that the legislation deals with international conventions. From time to time one asks why we bother to sign these conventions if we are going to ignore them.

The Canadian government supported the American invasion of Panama which was in direct contravention of the international principles of national sovereignty as articulated in the United Nations Charter to which, of course, we are a signatory. Does that not put into question the whole matter of living up to these international conventions that we sign?

I suppose we could also draw attention to the situation in East Timor. Again, despite the United Nations Charter's recognition of the rights of the people to self determination, the Canadian government continues to refuse to recognize this right in practice when it comes to the case of East Timor.

I had the opportunity some time back to actually be one of the visitors to East Timor. As a result of that visit there were some unfortunate comments that all is well. Despite all of the evidence that was presented regarding Indonesia's invasion of East Timor in the late 1970s and the fact that Indonesia has continued to occupy East Timor ever since we have really never had any comment from the federal government. It is simply ignoring the plight of the people of East Timor.

We could talk about the issue of the CANDU reactors and nuclear proliferation when we see our sale of CANDU reactors to regimes like those in Cambodia, South Korea, and India. Obviously this has implications in terms of nuclear proliferation in contravention of the principles of the non–proliferation treaty.

There are so many conventions that we have signed, yet one could provide a whole list of where the Canadian government ignores the fact that we are a signator to these conventions. I think particularly economically about asbestos when the International Labour Organization has laid very clear restrictions on the sale and use of it yet we send tons and tons to countries like Thailand.

I wonder if my hon. friend would comment on some of these questions and the fact that, while we give lip service to international conventions, when the crunch comes we seem to often turn a blind eye. Does he agree with that, and what would he suggest we could do as a result of that?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, Canada is not lily-white in any way when it comes to making itself considered around the world as a peace-loving nation. We do have a considerable reputation as a peace-keeping nation, but we continue to support a variety of actions which belie the seriousness of our seeming desire to be seen as a peace-loving nation.

I spoke earlier about the hypocrisy of Canada in these areas. It is not something that we should dwell on because it is something that every nation in the world can be accused of. Even as we say that we want to eliminate war, we establish rules under which wars can be carried out and, therefore, seem to legitimize the war. At the same time we build, sell and trade armaments. We force countries into debt by giving them armaments on a credit basis. Our reason for this is, if we do not do it somebody else will. It is a pretty thin excuse.

• (1030)

The areas of export and indirect violation of human rights to which Canada contributes are all part of that hypocrisy. I want to stress the point that we are one of the nations that can be accused of that. We are not the only nation but we can lead the way in eliminating many of those things which do contribute to war, devastation and hunger, and in doing so perhaps make the world a better and more peaceful place to live.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, December 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp that Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise as my party's former energy critic. I started out going right up the National Energy Program and then right down the National Energy Program. I was there as it was brought in and as it was dismantled, and we are back to square one. We are not really back to square one. There have been some major changes in energy and I would like to speak briefly about that in addressing this bill.

This bill concerns the financing of the Hibernia energy megaproject; drilling for oil in iceberg alley, as they call it, hundreds of kilometres off Newfoundland in the Atlantic ocean. This bill, C-44, runs parallel to another bill, C-45, which is to finance what is called the OSLO project, which is a project in the Alberta tar sands, another vast energy megaproject.

As Canadians we must ask ourselves whether Canada's energy future lies with big hydrocarbon megaprojects. Consider that last year Canada spewed 473 million tonnes of carbon dioxide into our atmosphere. The carbon era, the era that powered our society and powered our motor vehicles especially through gasoline from oil, I believe is coming to a close. Part of our problem, to be fair, is that we are in an interstitial period, a kind of interim period. We still drive cars. We have not adjusted to the new reality of the world environment.

Scientists are telling us the carbon dioxide that is produced from the burning of fossil fuels is producing, together with other greenhouse gases, a global warming by trapping the infrared radiation in the atmosphere. There have been all sorts of dire predictions: melting ice caps, rising sea levels and changing weather. We all seem to notice changing weather, but is it real, are the predictions real? We do not know, but we would be foolish not to take seriously the prediction of scientists.

I am told by some of my friends and some professionals in the area that all bets are off, that, as David Suzuki said, we have ten years to save this planet. So we have to look at these vast projects in a new way. We have to look at them as environmentalists as well as energy producers. I think that members on all sides of the House realize that, including people from Alberta and people from Newfoundland who want to benefit from the projects.

There is a second reality we have to face. One of the news headlines this morning reads: "Get ready for harsh budget, Tories warn". We are going to have a budget on February 20 and I suspect that we are going to be told how we have to cut the deficit and how difficult it is to run a modern government, how there will have to be cutbacks in certain programs. That is one of the reasons we are getting the goods and services tax, to pay for government expenditures.

I want the House to look at the expenditures here in Hibernia because they are very illustrative of how expensive these projects are. This bill talks about a grant. Do not forget that there are some of the biggest oil companies in the world involved here, but we have to give them a grant. We have to cut back on giving grants to welfare families, single mothers and so on with kids. That is welfare, but this is not welfare, this is a grant to Exxon, Imperial Oil, Shell and Mobil, the biggest companies in the world. We are giving a grant for the defraying of capital costs in the amount of $1.04 billion. As well we are taking up loan guarantees on the capital project of up to $1.66 billion.

Mrs. Sparrow: That's a loan.

Mr. Waddell: Well, Mr. Speaker, do you get a loan guarantee on your mortgage from the government? Do you get a loan guarantee when you go to the bank? Not likely. The government is giving a direct loan in the amount of $300 million, loan guarantees for what is called a temporary financing facility in the amount of $175 million and interest payable guarantees on the $1.66 billion loan guarantee. In other words, if the loan is defaulted, the government has guaranteed that not only will we pay the principle, we will pick up the interest charges as well. Not a bad deal for the international oil companies.

So we are talking about a direct expenditure, a grant of up to $1.04 billion, a $300 million loan, and various and sundry loan guarantees and interest guarantees in the amount of $1.835 billion. That is a total possible government investment of $3.139 billion. That is a tidy sum in anybody's book.

Mrs. Sparrow: Talk about the jobs.

Mr. Waddell: I will come to the jobs. The fact is this is the price that we are paying for hydrocarbon fuels. You can make the argument that we have to have the insurance of having fuels. There is also a suspicion that governments tend to win elections with promises. Projects and megaprojects are among the famous ones: Bourassa, James Bay; the Conservatives and the Liberals before them, Hibernia; the Tories promising the upgrader in Lethbridge and the tar sands project.

I am hearing from the hon. members from Alberta across the way. I am just saying that it costs a lot of money. We are saying to Canadians that we are going to have a tough budget, we are going to have to cut back, we are going to have to pull the purse strings in, yet look at the money that is going to feed this beast, and it is a beast. It is the hydrocarbon beast.

• (1040)

There are alternatives, but before I come to them I would like to talk about the OSLO project. I have just said there is $3.1 billion in the Hibernia project.

Mrs. Sparrow: It will not go ahead unless it is economically sound.

Mr. Waddell: The member says it will not go ahead unless it is economically sound. It is only going ahead because the Government of Canada is putting up the guarantees. It is not the market. The private companies will not do this of their own accord. They want and have received government guarantees. This is not free enterprise.

Let me deal with OSLO. I am trying to be fair. I have already said that we need gasoline. We are still riding in a carbon society, still feeding the beast. OSLO is the megaproject in Alberta. We are talking about a grant for capital costs of up to $425 million and a price of oil production subsidy of $48 million.

I will be consistent. When I was energy critic I advocated a price floor in difficult times and a price ceiling in times that were too easy for the industry and it was creaming it off. But this is what is happening in this project. It is a regulation and it is providing a no–lose situation to the private entrepreneurs who are making this project go basically. That is a pretty good deal and it is pretty costly to the Canadian public.

We are looking at a $48 million floor guarantee, $425 million in capital cost start-up and loan guarantees of up to $642 million. If you add that up we are looking at another $1.4 billion. So now we are up to $5 billion in two projects. That is billion, not million. This is at a time when the headlines are saying: "Get ready for harsh budget, Tories warn", and the GST is coming in to put a 7 per cent sales tax all across the country. This is what Canadians are paying for and Canadians should know that.

Let us talk about the environment for a moment. It seems to me that there is another energy future we should be looking at.

Mrs. Sparrow: Nuclear.

Mr. Waddell: At the Montreal conference and other conferences there has been a target set for a 20 per cent reduction in carbon dioxide emissions by the year 2005. We are going to need special measures to do that. Now where is the money coming from for that? Here is $5 billion for two megaprojects. The government has cut back on its research into alternate energy measures and we are spending something like $49 million on research and development in energy conservation.

There have been studies which go back ten years. Amory Lovins, in Hard Energy Paths, says that nuclear, coal and hydro big energy projects are no longer appropriate. The nuclear industry is pushing hard to come in because it says it does not produce acid rain or greenhouse gasses and so on. The problem is that we do not have any reliable way of disposing of nuclear waste. It is immoral for this generation to hand nuclear waste to a future generation, with vast clean-up costs. People are starting to understand the cost of the environment.

I will give an example. My hon. colleague from Esquimalt knows that recently the government of British Columbia sold land in downtown Vancouver, the old Expo land, to Li Ki-shing of Hong Kong for $100 million. Then it received a bill, which may exceed what they got for the land, to clean up the old industrial wastes in the land. There are a lot of costs out there. People are now environmentally conscious. We are trying to save this planet. We should not be putting $5 billion into megaprojects.

Lovins says that we have to look at alternate ways of getting away from the beast. I think we all agree with that. He says that we should be encouraging hydrogen fuels, which are currently being wasted.

As an example, one pipeline in Alberta is venting off $360 million a year in unused hydrogen. We have to start getting into the 21st century a little ahead of time. We have to use the hydrogen.

Hydrogen can be made with surplus electricity and at sites of natural gas extraction so we can use the Alberta natural gas. Hydrogen creates water vapour when it is burned. It is a good transportation fuel. Now is also the time when we have to retrofit all isolated communities with solar, wind or small-scale hydro projects. We have known this for years but now the reality is coming in. We cannot feed this beast any more. We have to come up with alternate energy paths, not $5 billion into a vast megaproject.

I want to address the project itself. This bill provides inadequate job guarantees for Newfoundlanders for the public money that it is spending. Many members of the House who are not from Newfoundland, that wonderful province, travel there. It seems to me that for so many years people in Atlantic Canada have been led down the garden path or, if I can mix the metaphor, have been led to believe that there is a pot of gold at the rainbow. There is always a pot of gold at the end of that rainbow and Hibernia is the latest. It is suddenly going to turn a have-not province into a have province.

We all sympathize with that, especially people from western Canada. The former premier, my friend from Esquimalt, made the gas industry in British Columbia into a public marketing agency and used our resource to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into the provincial budget and then redistributed that money to the people of the province. That was good government. So we westerners know how to use heritage funds and we sympathize.

Let us not lead Atlantic Canadians down the garden path. Let us not put out Hibernia, with all the money going into it, as a project that will suddenly turn a have-not province into a have province. The real future of a province like Newfoundland is still in the harvesting of the fisheries.

In my view, for the public money that goes into Hibernia, the bill still does not guarantee jobs for native Newfoundlanders. I submit that when the committee is considering this bill it should look at what was done by the Scots in Aberdeen and how they managed to get jobs for local people there.

Look at what the Norwegians do. Look at the requirements. Somehow the Canadian government has a mind fix that we cannot require jobs for Canadians because that is against the international marketing system. Look at the way the Brits did it with the North Sea oil and the way the Norwegians did it. They were much more sophisticated than we are. They guaranteed jobs for their people.

I say this bill provides inadequate job opportunities for Newfoundlanders in terms of the public money that is going into the project.

Second, putting so much money into one project will inevitably take away other moneys that could go to Atlantic Canada for economic diversification. That is what Atlantic Canada needs, not one big energy megaproject but a number of projects that can work with the resources in Atlantic Canada.

The government says it will leave that up to the market. If you read the speech made on December 18, 1989, in this House by the energy critic of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Edmonton East, sets out in detail the cost of this project, the fact that jobs have to be guaranteed and the fact that there has to be other economic diversification for Atlantic Canada. If we do not say that to the people of Atlantic Canada we are not telling them the truth. We are saying that Hibernia is the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow and it just does not fit in.

I want to return to the environment briefly before I conclude. As I said, Canadians have added a new criterion to deciding on energy projects and that is the environment. We are requiring, and the courts are requiring now, that every project be looked at in terms of its environmental impact and so on. This project in Hibernia will have to be looked at in that regard. There are some vast dangers out there.

We think of the icebergs out there and remember the Ocean Ranger oil rig. I remember being in the House when the minister stood up on that very sad day and announced the loss of those workers on that oil rig. It is a very dangerous area. When you have an accident it is pretty hard to cap things 400 miles out in the Atlantic Ocean off Newfoundland.

One has to go back to the Brundtland report, the United Nations report which is now in the forefront of our criterion for considering environmental projects. Brundtland said, in Our Common Energy Futures, choosing an energy strategy inevitably means choosing an environmental strategy. That is the key.

Dare I quote the Prime Minister? He said at the Changing Atmosphere Conference in Toronto: "The world is coming to recognize what we believe to be self-evident, that development and environmental protection are mutually enforcing, not mutually exclusive. Our economic activity must be increasingly compatible with today's environmental facts of life."

Here is an energy megaproject, with is over $3 billion in loans, guarantees and so on, at a time when we do not have much money in this country. Is that where we should be putting our money? Is this the way to deal with carbon in the atmosphere? Are there no other alternatives?

We in the New Democratic Party believe in the greening of Canada and the greening of the world. We are going to deal with these projects and these bills with questions and comments in the House of Commons from the point of view of being a newer, greener party.

I would like to move an amendment to the motion, seconded by the hon. member from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. I move:

> That the motion for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources of Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following:
> Be it resolved that Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto be not now read a second time because:
> (1) this House is of the opinion that simply giving huge amounts of money away to any private sector development without securing equivalent equity in such project for the people of Canada is wrong in principle;
>
> (2) this House is of the opinion that pursuing further fossil fuel megaprojects in the absence of concerted government action to reduce CO2 emissions in Canada generally is wrong in principle; and,
> (3) this House is of the opinion that proceeding with the Hibernia project in the absence of sufficient guarantees of consequent job opportunities and economic development prospects for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador and of the Atlantic region generally, is wrong in principle.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will reserve the decision as to the admissibility of the motion and report to the House right after Question Period. In the meantime, on a point of order, the hon. member for Portage—Interlake.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMUNICATIONS AND CULTURE COMMITTEE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a point of order regarding media stories in this morning's newspaper reporting on a recent meeting between myself and the President of the Canadian Native Arts Foundation. The meeting was arranged to discuss an appearance before the Commons Committee on Communications and Culture, which I chair.

It has been reported that during the meeting I made comments which, if true, would have offended our native people. I did not make the statements attributed to me and I clearly did not intend to give offence to any individual or group.

My support for native programs and native people's aspirations are well known to my colleagues and within my constituency and I, in no way, want to leave the impression that it is otherwise. I strongly deplore any misunderstandings my comments may have generated, and if any person took offence then I sincerely apologize.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I raised this matter this morning on a point of order. I am pleased that the hon. member has come to the House and made a statement, but I must say that I feel this is not adequate. All too frequently the member, as chair, has embroiled himself in controversies and I think we have to hear from Mr. John Kim Bell. He does not have—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must rule this out of order. I realize the member raised the question this morning. I will give the floor to the member on that matter later on during the day, not now. Questions and comments.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp that Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As you consider the admissibility of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, might I direct your attention to the fifth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, at page 226, citation 744(1) and 744(2) governing the content of reasoned amendments, and citation 745 governing aspects of the admissibility of reasoned amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have about two and a half minutes for questions and comments. I recognize the member for Saskatoon—Humboldt and I ask him to be brief.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member a sequence of questions. I will ask them all together. They are three very short questions.

First, would private enterprise have gone ahead with this had the guarantees and the government assistance not been in place? Second, could the member give us any indication of what the price per barrel of oil would have to be for private enterprise to have gone it on their own? And third, does it mean that indirectly, or directly if you wish, we are guaranteeing that price per barrel to the corporations that do go into this project?

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, the member's question is exactly on point. It depends. Private enterprise would not go into this alone because the price of oil is too low. I never could get out of the Minister of Energy, even with repeated questions when I was energy critic, what market price for a barrel of oil was required for Hibernia to be economically viable without government subsidization. They said it was between $30 and $50 a barrel.

Mrs. Sparrow: That's too high. You know that.

Mr. Waddell: Well, we do not know whether it's high or low. Certainly the price of oil right now is too low and so we have a government subsidized project, which still may not go ahead. The hon. member is right. In fact, the government is guaranteeing the project and guaranteeing an economic price for the project.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 11 o'clock we will proceed to Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, Supreme Court Justice Bertha Wilson has made a statement of profound importance to relationships between men and women and to the very foundation of our values as a society. She is right when she says our laws and judicial system discriminate against women and that they fail to respond to women's values of mutual obligations, caring for one another and preserving relationships.

• (1100)

She has put her finger on the root cause of pervasive injustice against women and children, the reason courts treat theft more seriously than wife beating or child abuse, why court ordered support payments leave mothers and children in poverty and then are ignored in 85 per cent of the cases, and why governments can play games with pay equity and pension justice even for its own employees.

To paraphrase Justice Wilson, it is impossible for men to respond even conceptually to the vulnerability women feel because it is outside the realm of their personal experience. Canadian society cannot wait while women make their way in equal numbers into the Parliaments and courts to change this system. We will only be the richer if our government acts—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but her time has expired.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, a recent survey of my constituents revealed that 63 per cent of respondents felt that the Meech Lake Accord was important for Quebec and Canada, while only 16 per cent disagreed. Twenty-one per cent of respondents indicated they had no opinion.

Mr. Speaker, the results of this survey show that the people of Témiscamingue care about Meech Lake and want the Accord to be ratified so that Quebec will grow within our Canadian federation.

Mr. Speaker, I also see a very clear message to opponents of Meech Lake that they should weigh carefully the consequences of their actions in the months to come, if they do not want to jeopardise the unity of this country.

History might judge them very harshly. Yes to Meech Lake means yes to Quebec and yes to Canada, and it means saying yes to a country that is stronger because it is more united.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw to the attention of the House the latest in the government's campaign to sell the universally unpopular goods and services tax.

Canadians are already being bombarded with a $14 million GST propaganda campaign. Now the ultimate in insults arrives in the 1989 tax guide, a GST insert that is purely a propaganda tool.

The insert states that the GST will reduce the deficit, but the Minister of Finance has repeatedly claimed that the GST will be revenue neutral. It states that the GST will make a fairer tax system, yet the GST is regressive and hurts lower and middle income earners.

The insert states that the GST will pay for social programs, but this government continues to reduce social spending. It states the GST will help lower and modest income earners, but seniors and the poor simply do not believe this.

Surely a person filling out an income tax return should be protected from the Mulroney government's political hypocrisy. Can this government not at least let people do their income tax in peace?

S. O. 31

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, these are challenging and stimulating days to be a Canadian. We are living the historic reality of building our nation Canada and we must build it together in our two official founding languages and in our many ethnic cultures. For me, that is the essence of being a Canadian.

To achieve true understanding about our diverse identity and to generate the kind of tolerance and mutual respect which Canadian unity will demand, we must constantly strive to know one another.

In my riding of Fredericton today, a small citizens' committee on language and culture is meeting regularly to encourage continuing dialogue between English and French neighbours. It is succeeding, slowly but surely, to enhance a spirit of common cause among its members which will spread throughout our city.

From such small candles, larger lights will glow. I recommend similar initiatives for true communication among Canadians in every community across this country.

BILINGUALISM

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in the past week or two there has been a lot of talk about the cost of bilingualism. What are the facts?

The whole federal bilingualism program costs less than one-half of 1 per cent of total federal spending.

Again, one-half of 1 per cent is the total amount for the whole federal bilingualism program, including contributions to help the provinces deliver minority language education and services.

The new Ontario French Language Services program entails no costs whatsoever for municipalities. Moreover, the Ontario government estimates that it will spend about $11 million a year to deliver this new program. This is about three one-hundredths of 1 per cent of Ontario's total spending.

To put it another way, federal bilingualism program costs every Canadian man, woman and child 6 cents per day.

The new Ontario program will cost each resident of Ontario three tenths of a penny per day. Add the federal and Ontario programs and you get six and one-third cents per day for each Ontario resident. Is an investment of six and one-third cents per day too much to keep our country together?

CANADIAN FILM INDUSTRY

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, our Canada is a great country and Canadians are a capable and creative people.

On Wednesday night of this week I was privileged to join with some distinguished Canadians, including members from both sides of this House, at the Museum of Civilization for the premier showing of an all-Canadian film Divided Loyalties, the story of Joseph Brant. This 100 per cent Canadian film is a tribute to a great Canadian loyalist. Produced by Baton Productions and Mr. Tom Gould, it is an example of the quality that can be created by Canadians. The film is a tribute to the actors, technicians and financiers, all of whom are Canadian. They deserve congratulations for an excellent production.

TRADE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, this week Moose Jaw Packers was forced to stop shipping pork to the United States due to the U.S. countervail and U.S. inspection harassment at the border. This has meant that half of the plant's employees have lost their jobs. This affects much more than Moose Jaw. Intercontinental Packers of Saskatoon have cut their shipments of hogs to the U.S. from 5,000 a week to 1,500 and are contemplating ceasing shipments altogether.

In fact, in 1988, 53 per cent of hog exports were to the U.S. and represented some $410 million in trade. These trade dollars are now in jeopardy. Not only are Canadian producers and processors upset, but Clover Dale Meats of Minet, North Dakota have stated that they prefer Canadian hogs to American hogs.

This government said that the free trade agreement would be good for Canada, yet Moose Jaw Packers is forced to search for markets 1,200 miles away in Vancouver and 2,000 miles away in Ontario, instead of 400 miles south in Minet, North Dakota in a market that wants Canadian pork.

There is nothing free in this free trade agreement for Canadians. It is time to tear up this agreement right now.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the small business community continues to be a vital component of our national economy. Statistics show that between 1978 and 1987 over 1.5 million net new jobs were created across Canada through small, independent business ventures.

These Canadian small businessmen and women continue to demonstrate that initiative. Coupled with sound planning and a lot of hard work, they can be successful and prosperous all across our country.

I cite Dollard Landry's company, Atlantic Mini Bar Inc., which is a new and thriving business in Moncton, New Brunswick as a prime example.

Small business, without hesitation, continues to be the backbone of our economy. It is one of the greatest sources of new ideas, opportunities, wealth and employment. Like all members, I wish to pay tribute to the men and women across Canada who have and will embrace the bold Canadian spirit of small business entrepreneurialism.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, Dr. Leslie Harris, in his recent report on the Atlantic fisheries crisis, stated that commercial extinction occurs when it is no longer profitable to go after fish. We think we are fast approaching this point.

No one has accurate figures, but the federal Department of Fisheries estimates that the harp seal population has grown from 2 million to about 3 million in the past six years. Estimates of how much these seals eat, whether it is herring, capelin, cod, crab or other commercial fish, is placed between 3 million and 10 million tonnes a year. It is estimated that 90 per cent of the fish they consume are commercially important.

No matter how you do the mathematics, it is apparent that seals catch between two and seven times as many fish each year as the entire Canadian fishing fleet and it costs the fishery close to $90 million a year.

I join many others in publicly calling on the Government of Canada to implement now, immediately, a cull of the seal herd population using appropriately sized vessels and using idle plant capacity to process the seal meat. This in itself is not enough. To complement this, the government should initiate an aggressive public relations campaign aimed at countering any future boycotts of Canadian products at home and abroad resulting from the seal management issue.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw to the attention of the House the support of the English community of the Quebec metropolitan area for the Meech Lake Accord.

By a resolution passed on Monday, January 29, the association Voice of English Quebec stated that it was in favour of supporting the Meech Lake Accord.

Voice of English Quebec stated also that the accord brings the province of Quebec fully into the constitutional family and urges the First Ministers, the Government of Canada and the provinces to take all necessary steps to ensure the passage of the Meech Lake Accord and to commit themselves formally to a process for further constitutional renewal.

• (1110)

The support of this important group from Quebec for the Meech Lake Accord proves once more that the accord must be ratified as is, without delay, in the best interests of all Canadians.

RADIO CANADA INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs has told Radio Canada International to disband its German broadcasting system in favour of switching to Arabic.

Events have changed radically in Europe. It means that that has become a poorly timed decision, to say the least. It is important to note that the German service is not only broadcast on shortwave, the service is also picked up between 6.30 and 7 p.m. daily on a local Berlin FM station. This enables us to present a Canadian perspective to the people of Berlin. It comes out of an old post-war arrangement the allies made. We do this through the British Broadcasting corporation. This is really something that we have. At a time when there is talk of German reunification, this access to people in East and West Germany should not be abandoned.

We have a large German-Canadian community that is interested in this as well. I have written to the Secretary of State for External Affairs about this decision, asking him to reinstate the German service of Radio Canada International.

At this time in Europe, with the momentous events that are happening and with our access, we should not give that up.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago a member opposite stated that a car dealer in his riding was concerned about how the GST would affect his business. He clearly does not understand that the principle of GST is to completely relieve Canadian business of the federal sales tax burden.

As a new car dealer for 15 years, I see very tangible positives for dealers in several ways. First, inventories. Dealers carry large volumes of inventory. The GST will reduce the dollar amount and the cost of carrying that inventory.

Second, operating costs. Any business that consumes materials, tools, supplies and facilities, will see their costs of operation go down.

Third, and probably most important, the benefits to purchasers. All customers will see the after-tax price of vehicles go down.

In particular, farmers, fishermen and commercial customers in the system will benefit even more because they are relieved completely of both the FST and the GST, about a $2,000 reduction on a $20,000 pick-up.

As well as the positives, of course, there are always some negatives, mostly relating to transitional issues. These are now being addressed by the Department of Finance. By any standards, the positives of GST far outweigh the negatives in this business as in other small businesses.

POSTAL SERVICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): In June 1988, the Conservative Government announced it would establish a Postal Services Review Board that would be responsible for examining changes in postal rates and postal services and submitting recommendations to the government.

Last Tuesday, however, when the chairman of the relevant committee appeared before the House committee, he told us that so far, his committee's experience and the consultation process had been disappointing. He added that after a full year of operating as an advisory body, the Postal Services Review Committee felt that if the review process did not improve substantially during the current year, the government should consider amending the proposed status of the Postal Services Review Board and making it a regulatory body.

On behalf of the Official Opposition, I invite the responsible minister to table forthwith a bill that confers real powers on the Postal Services Review Board, so that it can discharge its responsibilities and prevent the Canada Post Corporation from raising rates and reducing service.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, we know that when democratic rights and privileges are widely abused, anarchy will result.

We also know that when lawmakers circumvent their own rules, they promote the very disorder the rules were intended to prevent. The planned and deliberate actions of the New Democratic Party to thwart the rules and orders of the House in pursuit of their own ends is exactly the kind of conduct that creates disorder and breeds anarchy.

Do hon. members want examples? The member for Nickel Belt went to a flea market in Nova Scotia to gather anti-GST petitions in defiance of the ancient rule of parliamentary petition.

The NDP House leader announced on TV his intention to stall and delay House business. This is conduct contemptuous of the parliamentary process. No wonder The Ottawa Citizen warns the NDP not to stall Parliament and states: "Play by the rules, not with the rules. All Canada is watching".

SCHIZOPHRENIA

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, there is an illness that is affecting one in a hundred Canadians but that no one seems to want to talk about. That illness is schizophrenia, a disease which costs Canadians over $3 billion in direct health care and support costs each year. This brain disease often leads to hallucinations, thought disorders, loss of emotions and an inability to function in a work environment.

Federal funding for schizophrenia research is only $2 million per year. The quality of research is excellent and research results have greatly improved the outlook for discovering the causes and methods for preventing and curing this terrible brain disease. More needs to be done. Including private funding, cancer research in Canada receives $300 per patient, schizophrenia receives $17. The progress in combating schizophrenia is now just as possible as for cancer.

I urge the government on behalf of the thousands of Canadians afflicted by this disease and the families and friends who share their suffering to do more to help these physically able individuals to become fully productive members of our society.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister for employment. Today's statistics show that the unemployment rate has now increased for four consecutive months to 7.8 per cent, with over one million Canadians unemployed and major plants closing all over this country.

In these circumstances, I ask the minister when the government will change its hands-off policy to counteract this disturbing trend in the economy, to change its policy to stimulate economic growth and save these jobs, or are the government and the minister willing to accept the 8.5 per cent unemployment rate predicted in the Minister of Finance's budget last April? Is the government going to put its head in the sand and let thousands of jobs go down the drain in this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the hon. member that for the month of January, he should read the statistics for what they are. The number of new jobs increased by 42,000. The reason why there was a marginal increase in unemployment was that the number of people working increased. I think the performance is good. I would put our record of job creation against that of the former Liberal government any time.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about a marginal increase in unemployment. We are talking about a four month trend in which unemployment has increased substantially. I remind the minister that in 1981-1982, which he and the Prime Minister often refer to, the western world was in a recession. The Liberal government did something about it and changed that situation around, which was evident in 1984.

This government is willing to tolerate high interest rates, a declining trade situation, high employment and at the same time is bringing in new taxes which economists say will accelerate the recession. How can the minister justify this blend of policies at this time as we face a recession? How can he justify that trend? How can he be so callous toward the unemployed in this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, this government recognizes that lower rates of interest would be good for the economy. That is why it supports the Bank of Canada in its policy to bring interest rates down in a way that will allow them to stay down. We cannot work on this artificially. We support the Bank of Canada's approach to fight inflation. Inflation is the threat. If we did not act in this way, we would not be acting responsibly. Again, without any hesitation, I would put our record on this side of the House against that of the former Liberal government.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, since 1984 the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have claimed credit for every job created in this country as if the private sector and the international market-place had nothing to do with it. They had all the answers. That was easy in an expanding economy, but the real test of a government's policies is in a declining economy. If they have the answers to these problems, I ask the minister to show them to us today, and reverse this four-month trend of unemployment. What is the minister going to do about it? What new policies is he going to give the Canadian people?

• (1120)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think we are doing exactly what needs to be done. We are taking very tough decisions. GST is one of them. The terrible tax on the Canadian economy, the 64-year old manufacturers' sales tax which destroys jobs, is being removed. For 50 years groups have said that Canada must change this system. We are doing it. We are making sure that inflation does not run away like it did in the early 1980s when interest rates were above 20 per cent and inflation rates above 10 per cent.

YOUTH PROGRAMS

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. This morning the minister confirmed fears anticipated by the youth of our nation. At a time when they are faced with higher tuition fees, escalating education costs, an unbearable debt load and devastating double digit unemployment, the minister in her wisdom decided to respond to this already grave situation by cutting the seed program by 35 per cent and wrongfully denying summer job opportunities for young Canadians. How can the minister justify this action?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud of the initiative that we announced today. It is a stay-in-school initiative. As the hon. member knows, people who are on our social welfare system and back on UI are very often people with a grade 10 education. If we can convince them to stay in school until they are in grade 12, their chances of better employment are doubled. We think it is very important that our young people, looking at the future for them and the kind of lives they can lead, stay in school. That is the first point.

The second point is that last summer in many areas there were more jobs than there were students to fill them. What we have tried to do is look at an area of greater need. There will be a regional balance to the summer employment program so that we continue to be sensitive to the needs of students where employment conditions are not so good.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister, whose rhetoric is quite unacceptable. Not only is the minister's policy direction misguided, but it steals money and opportunities away from post-secondary education students to pay for high school drop-outs. How can the minister pit two needy groups of our society, the post-secondary education student and the high school drop-out against each other? How can she morally justify that? Does she not know that both need our help?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly like to remind the hon. member of how we feel with regard to our young people that the youth unemployment rate in 1984, when his party was in power, was 18.2 per cent. The youth unemployment rate now is 12 per cent. That means that young people and students are considerably better off today than they were then.

I would also point out that there are a greater number of high school students in need across this country than there are at the post-secondary level. The hon. member should be congratulating us. If we cannot keep people in school, they are not going to achieve the post-secondary level. It is very important that those young people be encouraged to stay in school.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to he or she who will answer today for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday the interest rates hit a five-year high. The Conference Board has observed that the economy is in the same state as it was in 1981. In Windsor the focus of the automobile industry in Ontario, accountable for 140,000 direct jobs and responsible as the engine of growth for the economy over the period of the last seven years, the unemployment rate has hit 13 per cent, chiefly because of lay-offs in the automobile industry. That was the first fiscal sign in 1981 of the downturn that followed. My question to whoever is speaking for the Minister of Finance is this: Is this really the time to be talking about a tough budget that is going to cause yet more unemployment and economic troubles in this country?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that there are no miracle policies. There are difficult decisions to steer the economy on a good course. This is the course we are following.

We want to be sure that inflation does not run away from us. This would be devastating for members of the hon. member's riding and for all Canadians. We know that we need to bring interest rates down. We must do that by fighting inflation, by making sure that we can bring them down.

In mid January we saw the first sign that things were easing up a bit. The pressures in the economy which cause these rates were diminishing. We brought the rate down to some extent, but it is a very volatile situation. We need to manage it in the best interest of Canadians. In the meantime, I think our policies are the only good policies that can be followed. Over the years they have resulted in a a very good performance compared to any other industrial country.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly clear that everybody knows that the interest rate policy is not in the best interests of anybody. It is not in the best interests for the Minister of Finance to be communicating that there is going to be a tough budget that is going to affect the middle class and the poor and the regions yet more. In the province of Quebec the unemployment rate has gone from 9.5 to 10.5 per cent. This is one of the regions that will be most affected by Bill C-21.

I ask the minister whether it is not time to withdraw Bill C-21 as a part of a whole series of actions that ought to be taken to address the fact that we face not inflation, but high unemployment rates because of an economic downturn that will affect a great many people in this country.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I have said in this House before, Bill C-21 is designed precisely to help those who are the first hit in an economic downturn. Those who need training are thrown into unemployment quickly. The workers we have spoken to and the surveys we have conducted among unemployed workers indicate that the reason they cannot get jobs is they do not have the skills.

Our job as a government is to make sure that they do have the skills. That is why we need Bill C-21 and need it quickly. That is why we have the stay-in-school initiative that I announced this morning, so that young people in Canada will have the right high school education in order to have job training for the future. We are focusing on regional development because job training and regional development go together. That is what this government has done. It has taken tough decisions on those things and they are the right ones.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the government is adopting policies that are going to increase the unemployment rate. It has a bill that will lengthen the qualifying period and shorten the payment period. Then the minister has the nerve to talk about the stay-in-school initiative. The Challenge program is being cannibalized to introduce a half-baked program that the minister could not even describe in detail this morning. Is that the answer to the unemployment situation we face in the future? That is outrageous.

I ask the government again to reconsider this cockamamie, bucket of programs that have no relationship to the realities of this country. In the portions of this country on which this economy depends, the unemployment rates are going up. I ask the government to lower the interest rate policy, to do something about changing the budget direction. It is going to be hurtful. Increase the government's role in helping those who will be affected.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there was some kind of question in there. I want to correct the impression about the stay-in-school initiative that was announced today. I am sure if the hon. member has done his homework, he knows that federal labour market programs and services now directed at in-school youth are going to be increased. Those are programs that are working. They include co-op education, work orientation workshops, Canada Career Week and counselling services.

• (1130)

In addition, within my own department the job entry programs under Canadian Jobs Strategy are directed at our young people as well. We spend within our own framework alone $700 million on the young people of this country.

That is money well spent. We know that they will be better educated. They will be better trained, and they will have much better and more stable futures with the kinds of programs we are providing than with the kind of crap the NDP talks about.

COMMUNICATIONS AND CULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, given the paucity of senior ministers over there, I will direct my question to whom it may concern. I want to raise the serious issue involving the chairman of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

John Kim Bell, the first native Canadian to become a symphony orchestra conductor, has said that the chairman of the Communications and Culture Committee has called native Canadians lazy. This is a very serious matter and something which cannot be ignored.

I am aware of the fact that the hon. member has already denied making the statement. He has said that the statement is inaccurate.

However, the government cannot escape its responsibility. I want to know where the government stands on this issue and whether the government accepts the member's statement.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, sooner of later perhaps the hon. member will recognize that his responsibilities as a member of Parliament require a little more discipline and attention to detail than simply being a talking head on television.

He will know that the member in question took the first opportunity today to rise in the House of Commons to make an apology and, among other things, to say on the record of the House of Commons that he did not make the statements attributed to him.

The hon. member will know, if he knows anything about Parliament, that there is an elemental rule here which says that the word of a member is accepted. That finishes the matter.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, if the minister was listening closely, he would have heard me quote the hon. member saying that he denied making the statement and that the statement was inaccurate. I quoted the hon. member, and I am not going to take any lessons from the senior minister.

Mr. Cooper: You should.

Mr. Harvard: My supplementary questions is this—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harvard: Perhaps the jackals would just shut their mouths for a moment.

I think there is a lesson for all of us. I think there is much too much loose talk in this country—

Mr. de Cotret: We are hearing some of it right now.

Mr. Harvard: —and I think it is incumbent upon all of us to get a grip on ourselves.

The chairman was elected on the strength of the majority of the Conservatives on the committee, obviously on the recommendation of the government. Despite the hon. member's denial, does the government still support the chairman in that role as chairman of the committee?

When will the government stop the hon. member from always putting his foot in his mouth?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The first part of the question is out of order. There were two parts to it, and the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs may answer the second part.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member believes that there is too much loose talk in the country, I can suggest a direct contribution he might make to solving the problem.

There is a rule in the House with respect to accepting the word of the member. The member has given his word and it therefore must be accepted.

Therefore, the government does not intend to act on an allegation which has been denied following the proper procedures in the House. This government, as a product of the House of Commons, intends to respect the rules and traditions of the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

TAXATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to the Minister of State (Finance) and ask him this: If the current sales tax is so bad for employment, why did the government increase this tax four times in the last four years? And since in the past, the government took the credit when unemployment rates went down, why does the same government refuse to take the responsibility for the present increases in the unemployment rate? Why is it so indifferent to the people of this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, this government is certainly not indifferent to the circumstances of Canadians and Canadian workers. In fact, we have had policies that were central to the economic development of this country. I am not going to claim that all the good things that happened in Canada were a direct result of the government's actions, but they would certainly not have occurred if the environment had not been favourable.

We increased the existing tax because it is one of the pillars of our system for raising revenue, a pillar that has its faults and has been around for 64 years. However, when we saw the impact it had on a country that must become increasingly competitive, we decided, considering our general development strategy which included the Free Trade Agreement and other measures, to introduce this tax reform which is not very popular but necessary, difficult, but good for the country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there are some serious contradictions in its policy when the government admits that the present sales tax is one of the pillars of its economic policy and at the same time is saying that it is a silent killer of jobs in this country. My supplementary for the Minister of Employment and Immigration is as follows: If the government is not indifferent to Canadians, why will it cut the student summer employment program this summer and what is the government going to do for those students who used the program last summer? What is the government going to do for this important group?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out in my earlier answer, the program will remain regionally sensitive in areas where there is higher unemployment among students.

In the meantime, in parts of southwestern Ontario, not all of it—and we have gone through this very carefully—there are certainly places where there were more jobs than there were students to fill them.

We believe it is a higher priority for the country, and I think the public would agree with us, to ensure that high school students remain in school in order that they can then qualify to be in the post-secondary stream about which the hon. member is so worried.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the status of women in Canada.

All through Canadian society we see negative attitudes and sexism rampant toward women. Last night, Supreme Court of Canada Justice Bertha Wilson said that "some aspects of criminal law in particular cry out for change since they are based on presuppositions about the nature of women and women's sexuality which in this day and age are a little short of ludicrous".

She cited studies that show sexism is the underlying premise in many judgments and that gender based myths, biases and stereotypes are deeply embedded in the attitudes of many male judges.

Will the minister consult with the Minister of Justice? Will she make input into the inner cabinet of this government and insist on training programs for judges? Will she insist that the Minister of Justice work with the provinces to ensure that judges receive education and training in women's equality issues, in sexual assault issues against women and wife battering? Will the minister do that?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that this is something I regard as an ongoing part of my job. I have been doing it from the beginning.

I point out to the hon. member that probably she and I are in some agreement on the subject. We understand the references Justice Bertha Wilson made. We all have to work toward making some of those changes.

Since we have been in office this government has not only agreed that women, for example, should be better represented in the judiciary, but we are working very hard to achieve that.

We have made a total of 222 new appointments to the bench and elevated 66 judges to higher judicial office throughout the land. Of the new appointments, 37 have been women or 16.7 per cent of the total. Clearly we would like to improve on that, but it is a fairly good record so far. More significant, 16 of the 66 judges elevated to higher office or 24 per cent have been women.

In addition, we are following with interest the judicial education centre which, in its early formulative stages, the government was helping to promote and encourage with the judiciary in Canada.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the slight progress in appointing women judges and women into positions of authority, but it is very slight. The record speaks for itself.

• (1140)

A judge in Quebec has said: "Rules are like women. They are meant to be violated". A judge in the North-west Territories said sexual assault was not as serious there because "women get drunk and men see a pair of hips and help themselves". A judge in B.C. blamed a three-year old girl, a child, and called her sexually aggressive. She in fact was seen as responsible for her own assault. A judge in Nova Scotia was removed from the bench for telling women that they should obey their husbands and go back to them.

It is just not good enough. The time for action is now. It is past time for real action.

Will the minister consult with the Minister of Justice? Will we see real action for mandatory training programs for judges on the issues of women: women's sexuality and equality for women in the judicial system?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already said that I regard this issue as an important part of my job.

I think it also goes back much further than that. The audience whom Justice Bertha Wilson was addressing on this topic was a very important audience because these things start in law school. They probably start in high school. They do not all of a sudden spring into place when people are on the bench. I am sure the hon. member would agree with that, as would the Minister of Justice.

In the meantime, we are making better progress than has been made in the past; not as good a progress as I would like to see us make in the future or that this government, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice would like to see us make.

NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

The people of Red Deer, and I am sure all thinking Canadians, are becoming increasingly concerned about the need for deficit reduction and spending restraint. They are rightfully concerned about a report suggesting that the government will need an army of bureaucrats to administer the proposed goods and services tax.

In a time of restraint and given the Canadian taxpayers' desire to see a stronger effort in reduced spending and tax fairness, why do 3,000 or 4,000 tax police and collectors have to be hired to administer the proposed goods and services tax?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this government has continued to reduce government spending five years in a row, to the point of reducing the deficit by $10 billion.

Mr. Manley: $10 billion, that is not out of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Jelinek: In so far as people required to administer the GST is concerned, late last year I predicted a maximum number required of 3,900 people, and that was before discussions progressed with the provinces—and I am pleased to announce that those discussions are progressing very well—in order to eliminate any overlaps or duplications.

Let me make one thing clear, Mr. Speaker: there are no tax police. Of the total amount of people required to administer and prepare for a smooth launch of the GST, only 11 per cent of those people will be tax collectors. The rest are there to plan, to reach out to the business community, to provide technical and information assistance, and to prepare and plan GST credits for low and modest income Canadians and senior citizens. Those are not tax policemen. They are people to process payments, claims and refunds to businesses and to assist the small business community to plan in an orderly, smooth, efficient and simple fashion.

That is what this is. It is a service. Once and for all let us put it to rest: there are no tax police.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

EAST COAST FISHERY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs who is chairing the special cabinet committee on the east coast fishery.

The 1989 Prince Edward Island lobster season saw prices drop drastically and inventories of frozen lobster products reach peak levels. Just recently the U.S. passed legislation to keep lobster out of its market. Fishermen in my riding want to know what this government is doing to develop new foreign markets for their lobsters.

Can the minister tell this House today if this problem has been identified to his committee and, if so, what steps have been taken?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question was addressed to me in my chair of a committee dealing with a specific problem. It has nothing to do with the implications of reductions in the resource of the northern cod. We are focusing on that problem and its implications for the fishing communities affected.

The government takes very seriously the implications for the lobster fishery.

My colleague, the Minister for International Trade, through his responsibilities in that department, is seeking to determine whether there are other viable outlets and markets for the Canadian lobster fishery.

I can assure the hon. member that it is a matter of as high priority to us as it is to him.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, if this government does not take action now many of my communities will end up like Canso. Surely this government must have learned from the costly mistakes it made in the northern cod.

Can this minister make a firm commitment today to the P.E.I. fishermen that this government will develop new markets for lobsters before it is too late?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly make a commitment that we will try to develop markets for P.E.I. lobsters.

The hon. member realizes that there are some limitations upon what even this government can do. That is one of the difficulties we are encountering with the question of the northern cod.

The fundamental problem is not a problem relating to policy. It is a problem that has to do with overfishing, that has to do with the disappearance of a resource, that has very little to do with mismanagement, unless we go back to an earlier time before this government was elected when decisions were taken by a former Liberal government to give away large amounts of Canadian fish that should never have been given away.

TRADE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question with the acting minister of trade.

There is a report out of Washington this morning that a representative of the U.S. Commerce Department has said that any effort by the Canadian government to cover losses of the fishing industry, or any attempt to provide a subsidy which does not meet the test of specificity, would be contrary to U.S. trade law.

Is the Canadian government prepared to declare today that we have the sovereign right to support and provide any subsidy to any industry, the fishing industry included, and to say today that we will cover any costs encountered by the fishing industry in a countervail case taken by the Americans?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was properly precise in identifying the source of that comment. It was a comment by an official in the Department of Commerce in the United States.

There has been no investigation. There is no countervail action. It is a matter of opinion. Usually those opinions are expressed by that official or others in the U.S. Congress Department whenever Canada takes any kind of action.

If there is a countervail action raised, we will defend our interest and we would expect to prevail.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the problem is not the statements made by officials in the U.S. government. The problem is the lack of statements made by officials in the Canadian government.

We really need a clear statement of what is a statement and what is not. The government has made no effort to describe what would be a subsidy during the forthcoming negotiations. We gave no reaction to the U.S. court case which said that our regional programs, our industry programs, were unfair according to U.S. trade law.

Will the minister now say clearly on behalf of the Canadian government that any subsidy directed to the fishing industry is proper under Canadian law and we do not give a damn what the U.S. trade law has to say?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I assume that last declaration which would have Canada take itself out of the world was not intended seriously as a statement of Liberal policy by the hon. member.

The hon. member well knows that the question of the definition of subsidy is one of the most difficult questions in international trade. It had been approached extensively in bilateral discussions between Canada and the United States before the negotiations of the free trade agreement. There was an attempt made in the context of those discussions to get an agreement on subsidies. We were not successful then. A process was set in place trying to set a timetable by which there would be an agreement on the definition of subsidies.

It is not only a difficult issue between Canada and the United States, but with all nations involved in trade. We are pursuing it vigorously as we have in the past.

We have defended Canadian programs. We have taken the case to court. We have won court decisions with respect to the right of Canada to follow programs that we believe are in the national interest, and we will continue to seek a common definition of subsidy.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who spoke so glowingly earlier in Question period about regional development grants.

• (1150)

Atlantic Canada is in serious need of real economic development help. Yet, instead, I have evidence here of wasteful government grants to a highly questionable project. The federal government has granted over $2 million to a company called Technitread, a tire retreading operation in Cape Breton, despite the fact that the owner's previous company in Brantford had a 30 per cent failure rate on the tires it produced and went bankrupt after having received half a million dollars in previous government grants.

Is this the kind of magnificent record of regional development grants that the Minister of Employment and Immigration was talking about earlier in Question Period?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency which this government created and put in Moncton to administer regional development grants, to the benefit of industries in Atlantic Canada, has been working very well. There have been hundreds of grants given out to small and medium sized businesses which have produced hundreds and hundreds, indeed thousands of jobs.

The hon. member has asked about a specific grant. He provided some details which there is no possibility of verifying and asked for a comment on them. If he had given us the courtesy of alerting us in advance of his intention to do so, we could have had a detailed answer, but as it is we will have to take that as notice and get back to him.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, letters with specific reference to this company have been constantly sent from New Democratic members to the minister responsible for this area.

The minister was told last summer of the failures I talked about and said at that stage that he would investigate. Despite these problems which are backed up in a letter from the Ministry of Transport, from this very government, why was it decided and in fact carried through that this grant would go to this highly questionable project? How can this government justify that in view of the very serious problems put before ministers long before this point?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I wonder why the hon. member has waited until the one day this week the minister responsible for ACOA is not here to pose that very specific question.

As of January of this year ACOA has dealt with 14,141 applications. The hon. member stands up in some indignation and asks why we do not have the details on one of those 14,141 applications at our fingertips. The answer should be obvious to him.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade, my question is for his boss.

It was announced this week that Moose Jaw Packers Limited has laid off one-half of its staff and is blaming the move on U.S. border harassment since the introduction of the free trade agreement.

In fact company officials are quoted as saying: "With the free trade agreement we were supposed to have less hassles but it has become more and more difficult". What is the minister prepared to do to stop this U.S. border harassment? What is he prepared to do to help these displaced workers at Moose Jaw Packers?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a question of considerable concern to the government. The Americans should know that they run a sizeable trade surplus with us in agricultural products, to the tune of $1 billion a year; in that neighbourhood.

We are investigating this matter very thoroughly. If in fact the Americans cannot show good cause for the kind of hold up and what some people would describe as harassment at the border, we are going to have to consider very seriously taking some retaliatory action.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, how long is the minister going to consider? When will he take action? The Canadian meat industry wants the minister to take action today.

Since the free trade agreement came into effect, the U.S. has increased fees charged to Canadian exporters from $100 U.S., to as high as $700 U.S. per inspection. It has increased the frequency of these inspections from one in 20 shipments to one in 7 shipments.

Given that this is clearly a non-tariff barrier to trade and is in complete violation of the free trade agreement, when will the minister stand up for the Canadian meat industry, demand that the Americans stop this harassment of our agricultural industries, and take immediate action today to deal with this problem?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may want us to go ahead today. It is important that we take a responsible action. If the Americans cannot justify what they are doing and there is no other conclusion that we can draw except that it is harassment, we are going to be in a much better position to proceed if we do get to that day.

Let me say again that the Americans should understand they run a sizeable trade surplus with us in agricultural products. We are a major customer of theirs and we expect that to be recognized when we trade with them.

We are investigating. That process is under way now in a very thorough way. We want to do our homework and be responsible. If the Americans cannot justify their actions and we are left with no other conclusion to draw except that they are harassing us at the border, as the hon. member says, we are going to have to consider very seriously, I say again, taking retaliatory action.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

The goods and services tax is going to cause hardship for charities. We are informed that in the case of the Arthritis Society it will have to raise an additional $100,000 a year to offset the effects of the GST.

Given that last August the Minister of Finance promised that he would treat charities in a way which reflected the important role these organizations play, why is this government now placing this extra burden on charities?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we are not placing any additional weight on charities. On the contrary, we have been very careful in devising the new tax so that it would be equitable.

I have heard comments about elderly people. We were extra careful to ensure that those who especially need our attention would be better off the changes. Charitable organizations will receive the same treatment. They will not have to pay higher taxes than they were paying before.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I think the Arthritis Society is very capable of calculating how much more this tax will cost it. That is the figure the society has estimated.

My supplementary question is to the same minister. Certainly charities provide a very valuable service. They deserve all the help they can get.

Will the minister guarantee that charities will pay no more tax under the proposed goods and services tax than under the present manufacturers' sales tax? Can he promise that? If so, how?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I will tell the hon. member that if the association gets its information from the opposition members who have been stating all kinds of things about the GST, I am not surprised. However, when its members read the facts they will find out that they are treated very fairly. We have made a special case of these organizations.

• (1200)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will close Question Period with two questions, one from the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre and one from the hon. member for Calgary Southeast.

TRADE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I direct my question to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

He indicated that he would look into the matter respecting Moose Jaw Packers. All he has to do is call Moose Jaw Packers. He will be told that it is now going 1,200 miles to Vancouver to find markets and 2,000 miles to Ontario to find markets when Cloverdale Meats of Minot, North Dakota, 400 miles to the south, has said that it wants Canadian hogs. Cloverdale Meats prefers Canadian hogs to American hogs.

When is the minister going to do something about this outrageous situation?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, we understand the situation. It does not only involve Moose Jaw. There are other areas across the country that are experiencing the same kind of difficulties.

I know that the hon. member wants us to do our homework and be thorough when we proceed, if in fact we do get to a position where we have to proceed. If we were to take some action now that could not be justified farther down the road, he would be the first one to get up in the House and say: "Why didn't you do your homework before you proceeded?"

We are putting the Americans on notice that we think it is a very serious situation. We are letting them know that if they cannot justify their actions we are prepared to take some retaliatory action.

If the hon. member wants to be fair about it, I am sure he thinks that that is by far the responsible way to proceed.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have made some telephone calls and done some investigating. Intercontinental Packers in Saskatoon, which was shipping 5,000 hogs a week, is now down to 1,500 a week and in fact is thinking about cutting out sales to the U.S. altogether.

This is a $410 million industry that is being lost. This is a national matter and is affecting not only producers but hog producers across the country.

When will the minister have some answers for the people of Canada with respect to this most important issue?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I will elaborate just a little bit. We want to make sure that we investigate this matter very thoroughly.

We can all make phone calls. All of us have had these concerns expressed to us. I have had these concerns raised through my constituency office for the past three or four months. We want to make sure that this matter is dealt with properly.

The hon. member asks what we have done in the meantime. The Americans are well aware of our concerns. When the time comes, as I said, we are certainly prepared to take some retaliatory action. It will not be very long before we do that, but in the meantime we want to make sure that we do our homework so that if we get to that situation we will be on very firm ground when we decide we should proceed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has confirmed that Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze will be participating in the Open Skies conference here next week. My question is for the chairman of the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs.

Can he confirm that Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze will be appearing before the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs? Will that meeting be open to all members of the House?

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, yes, I can indeed confirm that Mr. Shevardnadze will be here. He indicated a desire to attend. Our Secretary of State was instrumental in making it possible.

The precedent was Mr. Gorbachev's visit to the committee in 1983.

It is certainly our intention to invite the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee to participate as well as the defence committees of both Houses.

It is our intention to find a room to which we may invite all members to attend what I suspect will be an historical meeting.

STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS

UNITED NATIONS OBSERVER GROUP

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to table an Order in Council confirming the intention of the Government of Canada to participate fully in the United Nations observer group in Central America.

As I announced on November 30, 1989, in concert with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Canada has dispatched nine officers to Honduras as part of the UN's advance party. I am pleased to announce that a further 12 observers are being deployed.

As well, the first elements of an approximately 100-person helicopter squadron was deployed beginning this week. It will continue to be deployed during the month of February to Central America where it will join the UN observer group known by its Spanish acronym of ONUCA.

I would like to emphasize that Canada's involvement in the Central American peace process should not be seen as something new, but something that has been evident for a number of years, especially over the last decade. My colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and others in this House have visited the region a number of times and those visitations were to promote the peace process.

Following the August, 1987, signing of the Esquipulas II Agreement in Guatemala City, an agreement that outlined, "a procedure for the establishment of a firm and lasting peace in Central America", this House created a Special Committee on the Peace Process in Central America to consider Canada's participation in the peace process.

An important recommendation of that committee stated: "If and when a verification force of some kind is created and Canada is requested by the five to participate in the force, then Canada should favourably consider such a request". Today, I am able to say that we have been able to comply with the recommendations of that special committee.

You will also recall, Mr. Speaker, that when it became obvious that the peace process would require a verification mechanism, the five Central American nations turned to Canada, Spain and the Federal Republic of Germany to undertake this mission. It was Canada which, while giving full support to the peace plan, pushed to have the United Nations intimately involved in the process. We can now take some degree of credit for seeing this phase of the peace plan being conducted under the auspices of the United Nations.

We have supported UN involvement, as did the special committee on Central America, because we believe that it is the most credible and competent authority to undertake peacekeeping operations. This belief is firmly tied to our support for the obvious capacity of the United Nations for peacemaking.

You may well ask this question, Mr. Speaker. Why deploy a UN observer mission now? If one looks carefully at the situation in the region, one quickly arrives at the conclusion that there will never be a perfect time to deploy a UN observer group.

In November, we applauded the Secretary General's initiative to deploy an advance party to Honduras as a potential catalyst to re-establish the political consensus in the region and as a means of stabilizing the situation there.

At that time we also indicated that we expected to continue to participate in the UN decision-making process throughout the subsequent phase-by-phase deployment into the Central American countries. Obviously, we have closely monitored the situation and we are prepared to commit both military observers and a helicopter unit of the Canadian Forces in this next phase.

For those who are concerned about the risks involved to our peacekeepers, let me remind you of what was said in the Bosley report: "The risks of involvement in Central America are considerable, but the risks of non-involvement or turning a blind eye to a genuine appeal from the five, would be a failure of responsibility and of self-interest on Canada's part."

As I stated earlier, there is no perfect moment in which to deploy our peacekeepers and there are inherent risks in peacekeeping at any time. But in the case of Central America the level of risk is manageable and is justified by the importance we attach to the process of advancing peace in that region. If at any time we conclude that these risks are becoming unacceptable we will, obviously, reconsider the total situation and our role in it.

• (1210)

As our peacekeepers are certainly aware, they are continuing a long and proud tradition of members of the Canadian Forces in the name of peace throughout the world.

The steps toward peace in Central America have been slow and at times painful. But progress is being made, and progress will continue to be made.

The dispatch of our peackeeping forces to another region is a sign of Canada's willingness to help those who seek peace and security anywhere in the world.

I know that you, Mr. Speaker, will join with all members of the House in offering their best wishes and support to these Canadians who are serving the cause of peace and security around the world.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, we on this side obviously support this initiative. I do not have to tell the House or Canadians that it was the Hon. Lester Pearson who began the Canadian contribution, historic contribution, to peacekeeping with the Canadian peacekeeping force in Suez in 1956 which helped to resolve that crisis.

Indeed, Canada has a long and proud tradition in the world in peacekeeping, which this gesture now simply carries on.

However, I would say to the minister that I think Canada has to be careful in not sending mixed signals to the world. We find it ironic, for example, on this side that today we are sending a peacekeeping force to Central America and just recently we gave unconditional and unequivocal support to an armed invasion of Panama. Canada should not be for peace at one moment and war at the next. I think that that kind of signal strains Canada's credibility and does not do anything to enhance our reputation. We believe that Canada has to be careful in the kind of signal it sends to Central America. We believe that Canadians were disappointed with the government's support of the American invasion of Panama.

I would further say to the Minister that we also believe that while the monitoring of the situation in Central America is important, that perhaps considering the conflicts in places like El Salvador, for example, the mandate of the mission might be expanded and that that might be helpful.

There is another thing that I want to suggest to the minister, that we simply go further than the sending of missions. Perhaps there is a role for Canada in an expanded peacekeeping operation.

I want to remind him that we on this side, particularly the member for Eglinton—Lawrence and our members from Prince Edward Island, suggested to the government that perhaps Summerside become a base for the training of peacekeepers and for peacekeeping operations. We were disappointed the government did not support that suggestion. I put it forward again and ask the minister if he would reconsider on behalf of the people of Summerside, and the people who serve there, Canada's expanded role in peacekeeping.

I would further point out to the minister that in the last budget new communications equipment for our soldiers was discontinued. If our forces are going to Central America and other places in the world, they need to be as well equipped as we can make them. I further ask the minister to reconsider the cancellation of the new communications equipment for our soldiers.

Basically, we in this party, as I am sure all Canadians, support this initiative by the government. We believe that is is an important contribution, a contribution that Canada should make.

I want to join with the minister in wishing our Canadian forces who go to Central America all good wishes for themselves and for a speedy recovery of the situation there.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond on behalf of the New Democratic Party to the minister's statement. Let me begin by saying that we join with the rest of the House in support of the Canadian forces personnel going to Central America who are making their contribution on behalf of Canada to the peace process there.

I might also say as an aside that coming from Winnipeg I am aware with respect to another peacekeeping operation that the PPCLI, the Princess Patricia Canadian Light Infantry, are about to embark on their third tour, I believe, of Cyprus. There will be a ceremony to mark that in Winnipeg next Tuesday, a ceremony which I am unable to make. That is why I want to mention it today. It points out one of the dangers of peacekeeping, namely, there are some situations in which we have been peacekeeping now for 25 years. We hope that will not be the case in Central America. We hope this will be part of a process that will reach some kind of happy conclusion in a much shorter time period than has been the case in Cyprus.

As the minister stated today, this most recent United Nations peace monitoring effort is not the beginning of Canadian efforts to bring peace to Central America. Members of Parliament, church workers, NGOs, and a great variety of Canadians have been involved over the years from all walks of life in Central America.

The government has chosen the course of promoting multilateralism with respect to solving the problem in Central America, in this case through the United Nations. We are all hopeful that approach will succeed.

As the hon. member for Labrador pointed out, there is an inconsistency in the extent to which the government promotes multilateralism on the one hand and yet when confronted with unilateral action, as it was in the case of the American invasion of Panama, it remained silent—in fact, it does not remain silent but approves of a unilateral action.

If you want to be wholly, shall we say, in favour of multilateralism, then one has to be consistent and be critical of unilateral actions when they appear as they did in the case of the American invasion of Panama. Yet the government took the wrong position on that.

It is a position which I think was implicitly, if not explicitly, criticized in the recent report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade where it stated with regard to Canada's membership in the OAS that we had to get beyond this sort of unilateral action—the United States acting as a policeman according to its own ethics in Central America.

We should not take all that much comfort in this particular announcement. It is an important step along the road to peace, but there are many steps yet to be taken.

Indeed, appearing before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade in December, the director of the Peacekeeping Operations Directorate, Colonel Don Ethell, pointed out that the ONUCA operation in Central America was a unique exercise in many ways.

I might say that I have had the opportunity to know Colonel Ethell and to travel with him in Central America when I was part of the Special Committee on the Peace Process in Central America. I would like to take this opportunity to compliment him on the work that he has done. He is certainly a very professional man and someone in whom we can all take a great deal of pride in his peacekeeping work.

ONUCA will be proceeding within the context of an agreement concluded between the five countries in the region which are not in direct conflict with each other. Colonel Ethell pointed out what he and the rest of the committee were all too aware of. The root of instability in Central America is not country-to-country fighting, it is civil unrest. It is what is happening within the countries.

The ONUCA team is not there to act as a negotiator. It is not there to act as a police force. Indeed, Colonel Ethell stated that the UN peacekeeping forces or observer missions are there to provide a UN presence, an international presence. They are there to provide stability so that the politicians and the diplomats can carry on with the peace process. They are not there to solve the political problems.

• (1220)

With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say just a word or two on the political problem. This whole announcement begs the question: What is the government doing about the political problem?

Has this government approached the Bush administration and voiced the concerns of many Canadians about U.S. support for the Contras in Nicaragua? Has the government questioned the $1.4 million a day in military assistance to the ARENA government in El Salvador? Perhaps now that Canada will have a military presence in Central America through ONUCA the government will follow on this initiative and press the United States to stop interfering in the sovereignty of Nicaragua and El Salvador.

The United States has done everything in its power short of invasion to disrupt and discredit the election process in Nicaragua, for instance. I wonder what the reaction would be in Washington if this government, or any government, openly provided $9 million to the Democrats in an election year, as the U.S. has done for the anti-Sandinista coalition in Nicaragua.

In El Salvador, the recent FMLN offensive has proven that despite massive U.S. support of Salvadoran armed forces there will be no military solution to the decade old civil war. There has to be a political solution. Crucial to that political solution are the actions and the intent of the United States of America, and that is where Canada comes in. That is where we have a role as a friend of America to say: "You need to be playing your part in this peace process, and that means stop funding those who have no intention of having a political solution".

We welcome the announcement. We all wish our peacekeeping forces well. It is going to be a dangerous job. Helicoptering around Central America is not exactly something that I would wish on anybody. But that is what people in the Armed Forces are for. They know that when they go in. We commend them for their responsibilities in that area. We hope that they all return safely in a context that sees progress toward peace in Central America.

LITERACY

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, a lot of people in Canada today have found a new lease on life. They are finally shedding a cloak of secrecy they have worn for years at school, work and home. These people face the future with a mixture of fear and optimism as they summon the courage to stand up and say, "No, I cannot read or write".

Our fellow Canadians who lack literacy skills will be helped this year with more commitment and compassion than ever before. All around the world 1990 is being observed as International Literacy Year.

[Translation]

It is a year declared by the United Nations as a time for self-awareness, study, hard work, understanding, patience, and above all—hope.

For its part, the government of Canada has made a long-term commitment to the cause of literacy. Through the national literacy program, we have already given support to develop more than 400 literacy projets and activities in partnership with community organizations, volunteer associations, business and labour.

We also have agreements with every provincial and territorial government covering joint initiatives to promote literacy. Ours is clearly a cooperative approach to a major social challenge.

[English]

These innovative projects include the development of literacy materials, setting up learners' conferences, studying ways in which training may be made more accessible and promoting literacy in the workplace.

As well, other government departments have become closely involved in the literacy movement. For example, the Solicitor General supports a program which gives inmates the opportunity to complete an adult basic education program before their release.

The Canadian International Development Agency includes literacy as a key component in the success of its development programs.

The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission sponsors literacy efforts directed at enhancing the employability of workers and youth. Of course, these are only a few examples among others.

Canada's future economic competitiveness and social development will depend on the existence of a highly skilled and adaptable workplace and workforce. Greater reading and writing skills are going to be called for in every area of national life from technology to the social sector.

The government has taken a leadership role in addressing the challenge of literacy, but we cannot do it alone.

[Translation]

We need the willing partnership of all Canadians from every sector of society—during 1990, international literacy year, and for all the years to come.

Business and labour, parents and teachers, as well as volunteers—all have an invaluable contribution to making our country a nation of enthusiastic readers, young and old.

[English]

Literacy is key to the Canada of tomorrow. It is our guarantee of future success. I am confident that by working together Canadians will be able to make the dream of a more literate Canada come to life for our children and their children.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations has proclaimed 1990 International Literacy Year.

This will be a time of increased awareness, study, hard work, understanding, patience and especially of hope.

The purpose of this proclamation, Mr. Speaker, is to make governments throughout the world aware of the need to address a matter that is important to us all.

The Secretary of State is to be commended for his speech, perhaps a bit brief but excellent nevertheless. I know the Secretary of State as a man of conscience and compassion, and I can only applaud those qualities.

During his speech, he mentioned that the Government of Canada had made a long-term commitment to literacy training. I may point out, Mr. Speaker,—

[English]

In September of 1988, the Mulroney government announced a $110 million grant for new literacy initiatives for the five years after 1988. I made a calculation and found that this works out to about $4 per year per student. I ask the government this. What kind of commitment is that?

Roughly, five million Canadians are functionally illiterate, unable to read, write, or compute at a level sufficient to let them participate fully in the Canadian society. That is over 20 per cent of our population—one out of five Canadians.

The government's initiative is important, but is it enough? Will it continue past this year, the 1990 International Literacy Year, or are these just good words we have heard as a sort of short declaration?

The Canadian Business Task Force on Illiteracy has estimated that illiteracy costs Canadian business $4 billion a year and that the annual social cost of illiteracy could be as high as $10 billion.

I would like to refer to an article that appeared in this morning's The Globe and Mail. It states that Southam News in 1987 conducted a survey which discovered that Newfoundland alone, with its high rate of unemployment, faces further strain from layoffs in fish packaging plants. The survey revealed that 44 per cent of Newfoundland's adults were considered illiterate. That is quite a mouthful on the part of the Southam research. What will this government do to address this particular question?

I would like to finish by quoting—

[Translation]

—from a speech by the hon. member for Saint-Boniface (Mr. Duhamel) at the 42nd Convention of the Association canadienne d'éducation de langue française, in Quebec City this summer. He said:

> —that the general definition of illiteracy includes not only the illiterate as such but also the functionally illiterate.

He added:

> —that illiteracy is not an isolated problem. It often occurs where there is poverty, hunger, excessive use of drugs and alcohol, violence and cultural alienation. To wipe out illiteracy, we also have to look at the following issues: nutrition, child case and access to transportation.

• (1230)

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today on behalf of the New Democratic Party to respond to the minister on the issue of International Literacy Year. I would like to speak as directly as possible to the minister because I know he listens to these comments.

In 1987 the Southam literacy survey found that 4.5 million Canadians over the age of 18 were functionally illiterate. More disturbing was the news that the number of illiterate Canadians is expected to continue to rise by 100,000 per year.

The Canadian government must make commitments to all those who are overcoming their fear, stepping forward and asking for help. This commitment must be a guarantee of access to literacy programs within our communities across the country. We must provide long-term funding to groups and organizations delivering those programs.

Learners must be able to find a program which fits their needs. Literacy organizations across Canada are attempting to provide such programs from the John Howard Society's literacy program, which the minister mentioned, to the Ontario Federation of Labour's workplace literacy scheme called BEST. These programs are off and running. We should celebrate that.

However, the programs face constant underfunding. There is no doubt that if this government made long-term financial commitments, these literacy groups and organizations could devote all their energies to battling this serious problem rather than raising funds. It is a good investment too. Business and community groups realize that the cost of illiteracy in the workplace is extremely high. It affects workers, productivity and morale. Furthermore, it is estimated that the cost to the Canadian economy is $10 billion a year.

We have to do other things and I remind members opposite that it is inconsistent to put a tax, the GST, on books at the same time as tackling illiteracy. There are some positive things the government could do. It could provide child care for single parents so they can participate in literacy programs. There is initiative. It could work with the actors who now have an illiteracy program whereby they go to suburban malls and hold celebrity readings. I hope they come to Coquitlam in my riding; it is a perfect place for it. I hope the minister will support that program.

In this International Year of Literacy, Canada still remains a long way from addressing the causes which lead to a great number of Canadians growing up unable to read. There still exists the vicious cycle of poverty which can lead to inadequate education, meagre job opportunities, and continued poverty in the next generation.

On a personal note, I would like to tell the minister that I had a fellow in my office recently in Coquitlam, British Columbia, who used to be in the key business but is now unemployed. He confessed to me that he could not read and was going back to school. He has a family and he needs help to support the family when he goes back to school. But it was wonderful to talk to that person. That is part of what we are trying to convey. I say to the minister that we are all in this together. Let us be positive and work together as Canadians to tackle illiteracy this year so that we become the best educated workforce and population in the world because that is the key to industrial success.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I am obligated pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present four petitions to the House today. They have been certified correct as to form and content by the clerk of petitions. The signatories from my riding of Sarnia—Lambton call upon Parliament to enact legislation which will effectively protect the life of the preborn child without distinction as to stage of development.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition on behalf of several hundred of petitioners, mostly from my riding and the riding of the Minister of National Defence, who call upon the Government of Canada to stop its actions relative to the goods and services tax and to put in place a tax which is fair to all Canadians.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present two petitions to the House. They are from the riding of Oshawa, which used to be represented by Ed Broadbent, the former leader of my party. It is now a vacant riding, but nevertheless, these people want to tell the House of Commons that they are against the government's goods and services tax.

The petitioners think there should be tax reform, that there should be a minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, that there should not be a goods and services tax on haircuts, fast foods, piano lessons and other non-luxury items and that the government should quit taxing Canadians, as they say, from the cradle to the grave.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition which I would like to table under the provisions of Standing Order 36.

This petition is signed by a number of Canadians who are upset with the GST, which stands for the goods and services tax, but which should stand for the grief and suffering tax. Those Canadians want tax reform and they also want the goods and services tax to be abolished, no matter what the rate.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of my constituents from Deadman's Creek, Savona, Logan Lake, Lac Le Jeune, Cherry Creek and Red Lake.

These constituents are distressed that this government, in spite of the fact that 80 per cent of Canadians oppose this goods and services tax, continue to ram it through the House of Commons. They point out that it is going to touch almost every aspect not only of their lives but of the lives of generations of Canadians to come. They feel that the government should listen to the people of Canada who are saying: "Do not proceed with this tax. Go back to the drawing board and essentially start all over."

They point out that this tax is unfair because it taxes all individuals, wealthy or poor, while our present tax system is biased in favour of the wealthy and the privileged. They also say: "Good grief, when you tax haircuts, diapers, coffins and all sorts of fast foods, piano lessons—all kinds of non-luxury items—it is an unfair tax." It is a regressive tax. It is unfair. It is biased against western Canadians as well, and for that reason they are saying: "Please, Government of Canada, go back to the drawing board and start all over."

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions signed by people from my former leader's constituency of Oshawa, as well as from surrounding communities of Ajax and Whitby.

These people, like millions of other Canadians, have recognized the government's goods and services tax for what it is, a tax grab on ordinary citizens which will drive up their cost of living and make an already unfair tax system even more unfair. Therefore, these people are calling on us, as members of Parliament, to take seriously the democratic wish of the people of Canada, to send this tax back to the drawing board and come back with a tax system that will be fair to everybody and will not tax people who cannot afford to pay.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to stand, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a number of petitions in the House today.

The first petitions are, as a previous member has indicated, in opposition to the goods and services tax. These petitioners are from all over my riding, from the Marigold district, Saanich, the Ganges, Victoria. They are all opposed to this tax. They point out in their petition that, while there is broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, this should not be interpreted as agreement for a massive tax grab and a regressive tax system. What these petitioners want is real reform of the tax system.

EL SALVADOR

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the second major petition that I have before the House today relates to another part of the world, the situation in El Salvador. There are nearly 500 signatures on this petition, once again from my riding.

It addresses many of the comments that were made by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona earlier today when he spoke about the situation there. We in Canada have a role to play in resolving that situation. We have to be much more forthright and purposeful in our statements to the United States and their role in giving military assistance to the repressive regime in El Salvador.

This petition refers directly to the incidents of the bombing of the civilian population and the murder of the Jesuits. It asks the Canadian government to utilize our offices to enhance Canada's role in the United Nations and in the OAS for the full protection of human rights and a peaceful resolution to the conflict in El Salvador.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Finally, Mr. Speaker, one more brief petition on another very important subject and that is the clawback of the old age pensions. These people state their opposition to it and ask that the government look again at that particular initiative.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians who are strongly opposed to the goods and services tax. This petition has been certified correct as to form and content.

I think that this particular petition is very timely. I say that because I was in Brandon, Manitoba this week and I listened to about 1,000 people who were strongly opposed to the GST. They find it repugnant; they find it regressive, and they find it will be a terrible burden on them if it is introduced on January 1, 1991.

What those people were saying in Brandon this week and what these people who signed this petition are saying is that the government should wake up, listen to Canadians and stop this tax. Do not go ahead with it. They feel that if the government would just listen to Canadians, who have sound arguments and strong views and make a lot of sense about this tax, the government would come to its senses, and say, "No more. We are not going ahead with this tax. We are going to scrap it and we are going to go back to the drawing board".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I just listened to the hon. member who has presented a petition. What appears to be happening is that they are not simply presenting the petitions as they should be, but they are engaging in debate. I would just like to call that to the attention of the Chair and ask that the Chair relay to members the proper procedure, which is a very brief statement, not a debate.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, once again I am honoured to rise in the House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of the constituents of the ridings of Kent and Kent—Essex who wish to protect the lives of unborn children and who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to enact legislation which will protect the preborn child, without distinction as to the stage of development.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present to this House a series of petitions signed by citizens from Windsor, Maidstone, Tecumseh, Essex, and a number of other communities, expressing their outrage against the goods and services tax which was debated here this week in Parliament and which the government forced through second reading by closure.

I rise today to present these petitions to show the government that people are still upset with this tax, this grab and steal tax, and we hope that the government will come to its senses and withdraw the legislation.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise in this House to present a petition signed by almost 3,000 Canadians, about half of whom reside in the constituency of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in Edson and Hinton. These petitioners have one objective in addressing their remarks to this House and that is:

> To cause the government to cease with the proposal which will ship the tax burden onto ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by many concerned Canadians.

These petitioners strongly oppose the government's proposed goods and services tax because they feel it will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians. They call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty today to present a number of petitions, signed by concerned Canadians who are absolutely opposed to this government's goods and services tax, this attack on the wallets of the taxpayers of Canada.

They join over 600,000 other petitioners who have presented petitions through the Liberal members of Parliament to this Parliament, to tell this government that they do not support the goods and services tax. They urge the government to come to its senses as quickly as it can and to cancel this regressive tax.

Speaker's Ruling

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from the constituency of Kenora—Rainy River. Their hon. member wanted me to present this petition today because of the seriousness of the issue. He wanted me to explain to you, Mr. Speaker, how heart-struck the petitioners of Kenora—Rainy river are that the government has still continued to propose this GST. They want to inform the government that they will not stand by and allow this government to propose this regressive tax.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from constituents on the goods and services tax.

Their main concern is that the imposition of the new GST will cause serious hardship to low and middle-income Canadians. This is on the basis that they spend about 90 per cent of their income on consumption items as opposed to those in the $50,000 income bracket who spend roughly 55 per cent on consumption goods. On that basis they feel it is going to hit them the hardest.

Also, the small businesses in the riding are concerned that the goods and services tax will probably put them out of business. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to firmly and immediately reject the goods and services tax.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I neglected when introducing the previous petitions to introduce this one because the wording is different. I would now present under Standing Order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I understand the member has already risen before on a petition. When that happens and a member has more than one petition, even though they may be on different subjects, the member should do all of them at the same time. Is there unanimous consent to allow the member to file a second petition?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you across the way. I will conduct myself accordingly in future.

These 27 petitioners from the city of Calgary are very direct in their presentation. The prayer in its entirety reads as follows:

> Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable Parliament may be pleased to reject this tax.

It is most unlikely that the good citizens of Calgary, or indeed the good citizens anywhere in this country, will be duped by the apparent opposition of the Liberal Party to the tax, knowing full well that it is the intention of the Liberals to allow the Tories to introduce the tax, to defeat them at the next election, and then to exploit the consequences of the introduction of that tax thereafter.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all Questions on the Order Paper be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall all the questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp that Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Prior to resuming the question and comment period, the Chair is ready to make a ruling on the proposed amendment by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has reviewed carefully the amendment and has come to the conclusion that it is out of order for a number of reasons which relate to Sections 744 and 745 of Beauchesne, particularly that the amendment must relate strictly to the bill before the House.

In the Chair's opinion, paragraph 2 of the proposed amendment could relate to other bills and particularly to Bill C–45.

Also the proposed amendment does anticipate possible amendments in committee. For those reasons, the Chair must declare the amendment out of order.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I believe I am also the next speaker. But I wanted to comment on some of the statements made by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

I was concerned when I heard some of the comments. I stand here now, not as the energy critic, which I am not, but as a member of Parliament from Newfoundland. His comments cause me great concern. I was surprised and very disappointed when I heard the position he was taking. I presume he was speaking for his party when he said that he was opposed to this bill going ahead for second reading.

Mr. Waddell: Shame on you!

Mr. Mifflin: If that is not what the hon. member said, then that was the intent of the motion, although the motion has now been ruled out of order. I certainly got the opinion that there was less than enthusiastic support for this bill to go ahead.

I am very concerned about that for a number of reasons. I shall speak about the Hibernia project now. I recall very distinctly being in St. John's, Newfoundland. It was by accident that I was there on July 18, 1988, when the Prime Minister of this country came to Newfoundland. We had a very large and well–advertised meeting with the then Premier of Newfoundland, Brian Peckford, and there was great jubilation in Newfoundland.

The issue was, as much as these issues can be, non–political. Most and perhaps all Newfoundlanders rejoiced at the thought that there would be something around the corner other than the one industry that we have been working on for years and years—400 years plus.

I believe this is question and comment. I am going to ask you a question, but I had to lead up to the question. I have some time. I am also the next speaker, so you are going to have to hear a lot about this.

My concern is that on the principles espoused there was no concern for the number of jobs and opportunities that this will give Newfoundlanders, particularly at this time when the outlook is dismal. No matter how you look at the economy of Newfoundland, whether it is ACOA, regional funding, ERDAs, Bill C–21, funding for various projects, tourism, fishing, extension of the jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the bank, seal cull, whatever it is these days, the news is less than joyful. In fact, it is dismal. Hibernia has always been there as a hope, a ray of light at the end of the tunnel, at a time when, not only is the ray of light a bit dim but, in fact, you sometimes wonder whether there is a tunnel at all. I hear less than enthusiastic support from the hon. member. Yes, I am concerned and disappointed.

This project is not perfect; nothing in this world is perfect. I certainly strongly disagree and I am going to have to ask him precisely what he meant by the statement that fishing will always remain the one item that will keep Newfoundlanders alive. Surely we have to look at other things. We have to hold out some hope for the future, whether it is Hibernia or something else. Maybe tourism is a bit of a hope; we need to concern ourselves with this.

There was talk about feeding the beast. I am not sure which beast was being discussed but I was concerned that last June we ran into a problem with Hibernia simply because there was a problem with funding. We were looking at the plan by the consortia to build their so–called super modules and reduce the numbers from the 17 smaller ones for living quarters and production facilities atop the huge concrete base to five larger ones that would be differently structured.

I am concerned not just about the jobs of construction, which will be the initial jobs, the nuts and bolts of preparing the superstructure, but also about the follow–on jobs and whether there are 3,500 and 1,600. There is some debate over that right now. The fact of the matter is that these jobs are not nuts and bolts jobs, they are not mundane jobs, they are engineering skills, engineering skills in maintenance, in ballasting and reballasting, and these are the kind of skills that the Minister of Employment has been talking about and the things we are looking for.

I do not want to detract from some of the things I want to say later on, but I would like to ask the hon. member what precisely his concerns are with respect to why we should not go ahead. Is he considering not only the immediate jobs that this is going to offer Newfoundlanders and, indeed, all Canadians since this is a Canadian project but also the advantages that are offered, not just by the jobs, but by the ray at the end of the tunnel, the morale boosting aspect of this? Does he not think that that outweighs all of the other concerns that he may have? I think it is also a question of risk analysis here and which of the two alternatives are the best or the least risky.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, we in the NDP are not against Hibernia. We are against this bill and we have made detailed comments against the bill, as I did in my speech.

As an outsider of Newfoundland—I come from the west coast of Canada—I am aware of and very sympathetic, as we all are, about the economic plight and the difficulties in Newfoundland. We want to hold out hope for Newfoundland but it should be real hope, should it not, and not false hope. We have seen in the past chocolate factories and cucumber factories. Successive Liberal and Conservative governments and politicians, in my view, have let the people of Newfoundland down with false hopes of pots of gold at the end of the rainbow. That is all I am saying, let us make sure it is real hope.

With respect, let me conclude with this. The ex-admiral said, "What about your criticisms of jobs"? Maybe we should go to the captain of the ship. We will go to Premier Clyde Wells. Here is what he said in interview with The Financial Post on October 2, 1989. He is a Liberal and the Premier of Newfoundland. The member said he is a good Liberal. That is right, he is a good Liberal. He said that the number of permanent jobs generated by this Hibernia project would be about the size of the workforce of two fish plants, and I quote:

> The former government painted it as a saviour, it is not.

That was my position. What was the hon. member's position? He has taken a different position than Clyde Wells, the Liberal premier.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, I wish to inform the House that because of ministerial statements, Government Orders will be extended by 34 minutes. Therefore, Private Members' hour will begin at 2.34 this afternoon.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to comment on this bill. I was not going to go over any preliminaries, but in light of what I have heard this morning, I think it might be worth while to review for the members some of the things that have gone on with Hibernia, and perhaps to review some of the difficulties we have had in moving this project ahead.

I will start by commenting on the fact that we Newfoundlanders and most of us here in this House believed that the statement of principles that was signed on July 18, 1988, would go forward and indeed be approved on March 31 last year.

There was great disappointment that we ran into snags. This signature to the statement of principles was based on production going ahead in 1996. I understand that there has been a delay of at least one year. While that in itself is bad enough, we are concerned that at every turn, like on first reading, we had difficulties. In June 1989 we had concerns about the reduction in the number of modules that would be put on the gravity base structure and the consequent reduction of jobs.

Indeed, this is not a perfect set-up. It is not a perfect agreement. Certainly in the short time that I have been in the House I have not seen any perfect bill. This is why we go to committees and have the number of readings that we do.

I cannot impress upon this House the importance at this time in Newfoundland economic history for the Government of Canada, no matter which government is in power, to show that there is some concern and a will on the part of the Canadian government to do something that will assist eastern Canada, particularly Newfoundland.

The Hibernia oil field is located off the Grand Banks. For the information of the hon. member who talked about a couple of hundred miles, it is precisely 315 kilometres southeast of St. John's, Newfoundland. It is an elongated reservoir covering 20,000 acres. It has an estimated capacity of 525 billion barrels. The recovery of the oil will be through an offshore drilling rig that will have supports on the floor of the ocean with a platform above the water line.

This project is highly technical. I think it is safe to say it is on the cutting edge of technology. Some of the ideas are new. Some of them, if they cannot be considered revolutionary, are evolutionary in an uncertain sense. The plans have been refined at each turn of the clock. After a few turns of the clock, we ran into snags. That is to be expected.

I will accept the remarks attributed to the premier of Newfoundland, the Hon. Clyde Wells, that the jobs that would be engendered by this project would amount to the size of a couple of fish plants. As I said to the hon. member, a couple of fish plants would look pretty good right now. The fact of the matter is we have to start somewhere, even if there is a snag that comes up at every turn.

Yes, we are concerned about the environment, and yes we are concerned about toxic wastes. We are concerned about all these things, but in any project, any decision that I have had to make in recent life, nothing is clear-cut and dry. Everything is grey these days. You have to weigh the pros and the cons. Once I left school, one and one no longer equalled two. After leaving school, it is not quite one plus one equals two. It is sometimes three, and maybe 1.5.

This project has a tremendous future. It is a future that we have to concern ourselves with. This party supports this project for Canada, and especially Newfoundland.

There are some other principles that I received from our energy critic which I believe have direct application here.

The primary objective of our energy policy is to first and foremost gain the maximum economic benefit from the development of Canada's energy resources.

The second one is to ensure the security of Canada's energy supply. We are also concerned that we use energy in the most environmentally responsible way possible. Consistent with these three principles, we want to promote regional development consistent with economic reality.

It is estimated that oil from this project will be produced at 110 million barrels a day. It is not expected to flow until 1996-1997, depending on when the impediments to this bill are finally resolved and we get on with acting in a positive sense by approving the bill and giving it Royal Assent as soon as possible.

We are already a year behind the previous start-up schedule that was set in July 1988. It is imperative that we go ahead with this project as quickly as possible. It is expected to produce oil and there is no question that the oil is going to be higher priced. This is one of the great uncertainties. We can never say with any degree of confidence from month to month, even from week to week, what the price of oil is going to be. We all know that one wakes up in the morning without knowing what it is going to be. It is almost on a daily risk basis that we go forward with these projects.

There are some other down sides to this as well. There are some problems. I know that Premier Wells was speaking about his concern, one that I share, that perhaps we could have struck a better deal, that our royalties could have been increased and that maybe some of the tax concessions should not have been allowed. I do not want to get into that detail right now. I think those are the details we can get into after we examine it in committee and we look at some of the finer prints when we dot the i's and cross the t's.

The main concern we have now is with the statements of principles. We have to go forward with this now so that we can get into the detail. We can examine it in detail and make decisions and judgments amongst ourselves to come up with something that is reasonable. It probably will still be imperfect, but we are prepared to accept the imperfection of this kind of a deal.

We are dealing with the future. When you do not know for sure what the future is going to give you and what it is going to bring, you go on the best information you have at the time. The best information we have right now is that this is a worth-while project. It is a project that should go ahead and as soon as possible.

The statement of principles that has engendered a great deal of debate in this House engendered a great deal of debate in juxtaposition with some of the other principles that perhaps may be equally important in the future, but cannot be foreseen at this point in time. The statement of principles is something we have in front of us. We know what they are and we are dealing with them.

There are a number of statements of principle, but the one that I am going to concern myself about right now, in direct comparison to what the hon. member from Port Moody—Coquitlam had to say in his response, is the statement of principles calling for 3 million hours of employment to be created in Newfoundland during the four years of construction. Whether that is plus or minus

10 per cent, plus or minus 20 per cent, I am prepared to accept that as in the ballpark of what we are looking at.

The fact is that the oil companies changed the fundamental design and that complicates the situation. Anything that is changed invokes a complication and prevents them from carrying out this plan as had been previously agreed. The principles are not altered. Mr. Wells, the premier of Newfoundland, was quoted recently by The Globe and Mail in an article which I have as saying that the principles are not altered.

According to the article, he said: "We expect that they will ensure that there will take place in Newfoundland and in Canada as a whole work to the level that was agreed upon".

There are comments one might make here in the heat of of the battle or when anger sometimes flows, as is meant to happen in debate. Perhaps some statements one makes one regrets or would like to have said in a more positive sense. For all these statements, we have to look at this project in as positive a light as possible and I suggest, in as unpartisan a way as possible.

• (1310)

I on the one hand could not look at the negative aspects of this project attributed to the government and then, at the same time, stand on my feet and criticize the government for something that it is not doing.

This is an opportunity for the government to go forward with something that is potentially very helpful to Newfoundland and indeed to Canada. I would want my party to be seen as being very supportive of that initiative. Perhaps this is one of the rare times that we have gone forward in support of what the government plans to do. While we may have some difficulties with the technical details and with some of the wording of the statement of principles, I would be less than honest and forthright if I did not stand here and suggest that we move forward with it as soon as we can.

The economic benefit related to Newfoundland has to be considered beyond the millions of manhours that we talked about. Those benefits must also be considered in direct relationship with what the government claims to be doing in the business of retraining people. I do not know what the bracket of the financing is going to be, and I do not think that has been actually worked out yet, but we know the gross figures. The project is going to cost $5.2 billion and there will be more money related to it later on. We know what the loan guarantees are and some of the most recent agreements.

Before I talk about the economic benefits in general, let me update the House about some of the most recent developments. Last June the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was somewhat concerned—and we shared his concern—about precisely how the new agreement would come out and how it would affect the Statement of Principles with respect to the restructuring and reducing the number of modules from 17.

While it is safe to say that the machinery hit a snag I am delighted that, according to my information, we are back on track again. It is my understanding that the federal and the Newfoundland governments have agreed on a new joint proposal to the private sector consortium in an effort to get this energy development project back on track.

Apparently the federal energy minister was quoted as having said that no new money would come from Ottawa, but that some extra cash, as he called it, might become available from the Canada–Newfoundland Offshore Development Fund which, of course, has already been used. This is a $300 million account that was established in 1986, two years before the signing of the statement of principles, to help defray the cost of energy off the Newfoundland coast. About $235 million of that has already been earmarked of which $95 million was approved in 1988 as a part of this signing of this statement of principles for the Hibernia megaproject.

Apparently the $65 million left in the fund will be a factor in the upcoming negotiations with the oil consortia. Obviously this has to be part of the discussion. It is my understanding that Premier Wells has been meeting with the consortium members; that is Mobil Oil of Canada, Petro-Canada, Gulf Canada Resources and Chevron Canada Resources, all of Calgary. Perhaps we will hear more in the next two or three weeks on the specifics of the proposals.

Everybody has heard about the dismal situation that we now have in Atlantic Canada. I have two members with me now, the hon. member for Dartmouth and the hon. member for Malpeque. Everybody here has been aware of the crisis that we have had in Atlantic Canada.

We in Newfoundland—and I have to speak as a Newfoundlander now—do not like to have our hands out begging. Nobody likes to do that. We have had to resort to some pretty severe tactics in the last few years.

I remember growing up in Bonavista where my grandfather was a fisherman. I remember the meagre earnings of fishermen in those days. They lived simple lives, they lived happy lives, they ate healthy food and they had healthy habits. The situation, I regret to say some 45 or so years later, seems to have deteriorated from that of my memory.

I read a comment made by the commissioner of fisheries in Newfoundland about 100 years ago. The statements that he made 100 years ago are not too far removed from some of the statements that Dr. Harris made in his task force report on the fisheries. This is not meant as a criticism. These are facts and they cannot be disputed.

ACOA was reprofiled. Every week I get calls from disappointed people who perhaps are not aware of the rule changes. They believe that ACOA was meant to help them. They find stumbling blocks everywhere until they realize that there is not enough money there to launch their projects. I could cite 30 projects from one end of my riding to the other. I try to explain to these people that reprofiling means that there is less money. They understand but they are very disappointed.

There is less money for education and health. I am not going to harangue about the goods and services tax but it is not causing cheer in the hearts of men, women and children. Mr. Speaker, I know that you and I have had many discussions on Bill C-21, have sat in committee and listened to people. Whether you agree or disagree with the impact of the bill, the fact is there is a perception of what it will do to the unemployed in Newfoundland. Last year 79,000 people who drew unemployment insurance are going to be affected.

One study says that Newfoundlanders will lose the most. They will lose $2,540 on average. When you take out all the bipartisanship and all the things that perhaps are judgmental, the indisputable and relevant consideration is the morale of Atlantic Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I know about morale and I know that you know about morale. Morale is very subjective. It is difficult to measure it, but you know what it is when you are among those whose morale is affected. You can walk on to a ship and within five minutes know whether the morale is high or low. How do you know? I cannot explain it. I went through my riding from one end to the other in mid-January for the specific purpose of talking to people and sensing their morale. It was not good.

Apart from the economic benefits, the statement of principles, the details, the complicated fundings, the royalties, the income tax and everything else, there is one ray of hope.

People talk to me and ask: "What is the hope? What is ahead?". I do not turn and criticize the government and say: "Well, this government does not know what it is doing". That is not good for morale and I do not say that. Not all of the time, Mr. Speaker.

I do say that tourism in perhaps 50 years will be good for Newfoundland. I say that it will get off the ground some day, perhaps not in my time. And we always look at Hibernia. If anybody in this House does anything to cripple the principles involved and the idea of Hibernia, this is going to be not just another little nail in the coffin of morale, but there will be no more hope. All hope will be diminished. It is in that context that I speak here as a member of the Opposition and as a Newfoundlander to ask members, when they are considering this very important bill, to bear that in mind in their consideration of the bill.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the comments of my hon. colleague and, as always, he has been very eloquent in his presentation and he has been very true to his constituency and exceptionally true to his province, the great province of Newfoundland.

I got a flavour of the importance of the Hibernia project to Newfoundlanders and to Atlantic Canada. I would hope that those on all sides of this House and those who are watching this debate did the same. In Atlantic Canada, all too often there are too few opportunities to diversify. In Newfoundland in particular, where we have primarily resource-based industries in the fishery, we have seen the fishery go into a tailspin and a state of collapse.

• (1320)

Everybody likes to talk about diversification and prospects for a bright future. Hibernia has been a flicker of light at the end of a very dark tunnel for Newfoundlanders and Atlantic Canadians. There have been some worrisome delays in the past.

I am not here here today to blame or point a finger, but it worries me considerably that we have waited as long as we have to get the Hibernia project under way. It worries me considerably that at some point there was discussion about altering the type of platform and that perhaps the Canada benefits may not be as significant as what they absolutely must be in Newfoundland.

I ask my hon. colleague to expand a little further about the real necessity for maximization of Canada benefits not just as it affects material procurement, but actual jobs and the spin-off industries that could be created. I know many people say that it is pretty parochial to want to keep as much of the pie from development as one can in one's region when so many people, like those in Atlantic Canada, depend on the good graces of people in central Canada to shift their money and resources to help us out.

I ask my hon. colleague to expand on that so that people from all sides of the House and people watching this debate will have a better understanding as to why it is absolutely essential that the Hibernia project go forward, not just for energy self-sufficiency for Canada, but also for the benefits that could accrue to places like Newfoundland, which have waited for a long time to be fed a full plate in this Confederation.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Dartmouth for that question. I think it is a very pertinent and relevant question, one that is not difficult to address but hard to answer in the limited time that I am sure you will impose, as you are required to do, Mr. Speaker.

I want to review the initial feeling about jobs. As a backdrop to that, I am very proud of representing my constituency of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, which is named after the three great bays on the east coast of Newfoundland. There is a lot of distinction in that riding.

Every member represents a distinct area of Canada. There is one distinction that I would rather not have. There is one distinction that my constituents would rather not have. In the 62 unemployment insurance regions in this country, my riding is in the region that has the second highest unemployment rate in Canada. Northern Manitoba is the highest, with an unemployment rate of 25.4 per cent. Bonavista—Trinity—Conception encompasses an area where the unemployment rate is over 20 per cent. That gives the backdrop against which I discussed the jobs.

I want to give an indication of what jobs mean in Newfoundland. When we were discussing free trade I remember being involved in a debate with one of my constituents and explaining to him that there is a chance that we would gain a certain number jobs and there was a risk that we might lose some. We did not know. He turned to me and said: "Mr. Mifflin, we can't afford to lose one job in Newfoundland. Not one job".

The last time I checked the figures, there were 79,000 in Newfoundland on unemployment insurance. That is a lot of people. That is almost the total number of people in my riding. I have 92,000 people in my riding. That is shocking.

In the statement of principles there was some anticipation of jobs. I will attribute these statistics to the companies because I think one might want to read something into that. Mobil Oil— they were the leader of the project consortium—said 14,500 person-years of direct Canadian employment would be created during the construction phase out of the total of 21,500 person-years required overall.

They went on to say that indirect and induced employment—that is second and third order jobs—were anticipated to increase the total employment impact for Canada to over 40,000 person-years of which almost 35,000 person-years of the project construction would result in Newfoundland. Thirty-five thousand person-years when one job means so much to so many people is indescribable. The impact is fantastic.

The production phase was anticipated to create 1,100 direct permanent jobs and 2,450 indirect permanent jobs for a total of 3,500 permanent jobs for the province of Newfoundland. That was the original initial estimate and they will change, and they have changed.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): They have gone down.

Mr. Mifflin: They have gone down, indeed. I regret to say that. I agree with my hon. friend that they have gone down. That causes me and all Newfoundlanders concern. I hope it causes all Canadians some concern. We are paying good money for this and we want to get as much as we can out of it.

Mr. Barrett: Do you believe the oil companies when they talk this way? What does that say about the oil companies?

Mr. Mifflin: The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca will recall that I referred to the oil company that actually mentioned these figures. I want to specifically attribute it to the oil companies. I could not do the arithmetic. I did not have the facts with me.

These are all kinds of jobs; they are highly technical jobs, good jobs, and they are jobs that would allow Newfoundlanders and Canadians to compete in other jobs once they are trained for this. The second, third and fourth derivatives of this job creation machine have a tremendous impact and a great potential that we should not minimize in this kind of discussion.

I would say to my hon. colleague from Dartmouth, we are kindred spirits. In fact, we all are when it comes to this. We know the problem in Atlantic Canada. One need only go to any organization, any group of people whether they are church people, fishermen, Liberals, Conservative, NDP and talk about this number of jobs, and you will come away a hero. You are a downright hero. When you talk about a 10 per cent reduction in the number of those jobs it is not as cheerful, but it is still there.

I think I have made my point. I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity. I have not spoken to Premier Wells recently on this subject, but I know he is generally in favour of the project. Of course he has some concerns, because it is estimated that we have had a 50 per cent reduction in these jobs. Who knows. It is a long way away. We are looking at production in 1996—1997.

The fact of the matter is we will have the jobs, we will have oil production. There are uncertainties and we have to be patient. But let us move ahead now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): There are only a few minutes left in the question and comment period. Guide yourselves accordingly.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, in responding to comments by the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, I simply want to say that like him, I was very surprised at the remarks made earlier by the hon. member for the NDP on Bill C-44 and the Hibernia project. I can inform the NDP member and the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception that the government is committed to Bill C-44 and to Hibernia. The Prime Minister will honour the undertaking he made to Newfoundland in 1988 regarding the Hibernia project. The Cabinet is also committed. Members on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, will, of course, unanimously support Bill C-44, because we realize this project is vitally important to Newfoundland and Eastern Canada.

The project will not only help us to maintain and preserve technology but also to develop new technologies and new types of jobs, and to offer young people in Eastern Canada some interesting opportunities. The hon. member may rest assured that on this side of the House we will be working very hard and very effectively to get Bill C-44 passed as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I have a piece of paper here that I have to make reference to. I thank the hon. member for that reassurance. I am sure that the morale of my constituents and indeed people from Atlantic Canada, having heard the assurance from the government side, will be raised just a little bit more today. That is not a bad thing for a Friday, after the kind of a dismal week that we have had.

• (1330)

We have just heard some comment on the job creation aspect of this matter. I have talked about the morale aspect of it. After all, we are going to produce oil. It might be expensive oil, but we are indeed going to produce oil. I never like to play off one group against the other, but yesterday in Question Period I heard mention—and I think it was attributed to the hon. minister involved—that over the last five years or a similar period $21.7 billion was given in grants to farmers. I think that is tremendous.

I understand farmers are not eligible for unemployment insurance, but I use that only as a bench-mark to look at the $5.2 billion cost of the project. The oil companies are putting in $1.92 billion. Quite frankly I think they are getting a very good deal. Including federal grants for construction, the guaranteed loan by the federal government, the federal loan to help meet interest payments, the federal loan for contingency, the $95 million from the offshore development fund and perhaps even more, and the $11 million for the provincial offshore technical transfer fund, we are looking at $3.281 billion. That is an awful lot of money. After a couple of hundred dollars I stop visualizing what money is like.

That figure, if compared with $27 billion, is not a bad investment for the kinds of jobs we are looking at in eastern Canada where we are hungry, thirsty and crying out for jobs. I would only hope this will be considered sacred and outside budget cuts and that kind of thing. This is long-term thinking, a long-term project. We cannot afford to have hopes dashed at this time.

I would like to conclude my comments by once again thanking the hon. member from across the floor for his reassurance. I hope the government will continue to reassure us as we go through the procedure of finally getting this bill approved and under way.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see a new Speaker in the chair today. I will not make any reference to the member for Burlington, but if he were here today he would be proud of the speaker.

I want to start by saying that we should not place this project into an either/or situation. I want to make very clear to members from Newfoundland that it is the history of this country, if we have developed into an economic landscape, to see the wreckage of megaproject after megaproject that has been held out as the single hope for the people of a region to restore their economy.

It happens in British Columbia. It has happened in Alberta. It has happened on the prairies. It happens elsewhere in the regions but not so much in central Canada. I urge my good friend from Newfoundland not to get into the trap that this is the only ray of hope for his province and region. Let us understand that if he falls into that trap, it will become the case of consistent subsidies to large corporations that have walked out of this country time after time after time with huge profits and left economic wreckage in the region from which it comes.

Need I cite examples? The heavy water plan was the ray of hope, the morale booster. The people were let down and fibbed to. I do not say they were lied to, Mr. Speaker; they were fibbed to. When we signed British Columbia into Confederation, CPR said that it would keep up passenger service. It was given a 10-mile strip of land across this country. The CPR exploited it, made billions of dollars of profit, abandoned the rail traffic, and taxpayers had to pick it up. They were stuck again.

When I was a younger boy I used to believe it when companies, prestigious people in public life such as politicians, company executives or others, said: "Why, if you just give us a little help here we will create a fortune for this region. We will create jobs. We will do this wonderful thing. Just give us the money, the seed money." Then I heard about free enterprise and I was puzzled about it. Free enterprise, I thought, was the God-given right to lose money or make it. Every time there is a megaproject it is held out as if it is some kind of last hope or beacon. The people's hopes are built up and the large corporations have walked out of this country with the money time and time again.

Money is hard to come by. There is not a taxpayer in this country who does not have a sense of the importance of the Atlantic region. At this point my province is in a bit of an economic uplift. We would like to see some of our taxes go to help the poorer regions. That was our whole consensus in building this country as a confederation of nations. In good times we share with our neighbours; in bad times we expect our neighbours to share with us. No special deals, no favours, just a moral obligation as a nation. There is absolutely no resistance. There is a concern and a willingness to help the Atlantic region. I want to get that on the record clearly.

In that concern there is absolutely no desire to see the oil companies walk off with the vast amount of money that we are talking about. I have been there. I have seen how the oil companies work. I challenge the Minister of Finance to declare how much the oil companies pay in corporate income tax. In my province of British Columbia, when they were creaming off hundreds of millions of dollars selling natural gas, they did not pay one penny in corporate income tax.

When I was Minister of Finance in that province I exposed them and they took out big newspaper ads attacking me for being nasty and telling people about their private business. Do you know what I said to them? I told the oil companies to stuff it. I was sick and tired, as the leader of a government, seeing those oil companies consistently spread false information that they were good corporate citizens. They were not paying any damn money whatsoever in terms of corporate income tax, but they made a lot of money. They had depletion allowances, write–offs and everything else.

Let us go back to the problem in Newfoundland. I do not want anyone to be a tout or a leading light asking for money for oil companies, but the federal government is prepared to put up $3.8 billion. A little over $1 billion is a direct gift and the rest is in loan guarantees. Good, let's take the money; let's cut the oil companies out and sit down with the good people of Newfoundland and decide what we can do with $3 billion.

Money does not grow on trees. It seems to grow on trees for megaprojects. It seems to grow on trees for big corporations that do not pay their fair share. If the government says there is $3 billion available for Newfoundland, let Newfoundlanders sit down and decide how they can best use that money, not tie it into one huge megaproject that may be a Lorelei. My good friend, the member from Newfoundland, knows what a Lorelei is. The sailors of the past saw that little mermaid out there. They have been away from port, their morale is low, they have other needs and the Lorelei attracts them, and the crash comes.

We have had Loreleis on land in this country time and time again. This is another Lorelei. I want to tell you why it is another Lorelei. First, the premier of the province of Newfoundland, who is a good person, has emerged on the national scene in a dimension which I think has been absolutely positive. Regardless of comments made by people for political purposes, the contribution made by the premier of Newfoundland, even though he is not of my party, has been an outstanding to nation building and a national debate. I want to go on record as saying that.

The premier of Newfoundland is a guy who tells it as it is. I like that. The premier of Newfoundland is like the former Tory premier with whom I worked, Frank Moores. He is another guy who told it as it was. We were the bookends of the country. Frank Moores fought for his province as a Tory in an outstanding manner and I was proud to know Frank Moores. I do not know Wells, but I am impressed.

I want to tell you what Wells said about this project. He is not going to fib to anybody. He is not going to hold out a Lorelei image. He is telling it the way it is.

• (1340)

Premier Clyde Wells recognized that there is a tremendous amount of public money invested for limited employment. In an interview on October 2, 1989, my birthday, in The Financial Post he said that the number of permanent jobs generated by Hibernia would be about the size of the workforce of two fish plants. He said: "The former government is painted as a saviour. It isn't".

My new good friend, the member from Newfoundland, has pointed out that two fish plants would be welcome in Newfoundland. I agree with him. Let us investigate and find out how much fish is being picked up by National Sea Food, which received federal government grants, in its two trawlers and sent to France to be processed while National Sea Food says: "Oh, my goodness, we don't have enough fish for our own work so we have to close in Canada".

Do you know what I say to that? I am a good living person. I try to be temperate in my language, but when I hear that claptrap from a company that received grants and hand–outs from the federal government to run its ships, moved that fish over to France and closed its plants in Canada, the first thing I would say is: "Look you guys, you got Canadian taxpayers' money. You are irresponsible in moving that fish to France. You give us back every single penny you got plus interest".

I know that it is a difficult problem in Newfoundland. We had the same problem in British Columbia. The buccaneers there have run that government through various forms of Tory administrations, alliances, coalitions and all kinds of deals. It is the same thing.

We have heard not a peep out of this government. We have not heard it say: "Bring that fish back". All we hear is the ministers saying: "Oh, we don't not have enough fish". You are damned right you do not have enough fish. It is being sold in France in ships subsidized by the Canadian taxpayers. You do not hear a word about that, do you? Not a word. All the people in Newfoundland should know it. All the people in Canada should know it.

The same thing is going to happen with this project. I believe the suggestion that it is morale lifting and spreading the good light. However, the best way to be a morale lifter and spread the good light is to tell the people of the region that we have $3 billion and decide what we can best do for ourselves in an indigenous development of our economy and tell the oil companies they can wait on the outside until we decide.

Who did it best? The canny Scots. The canny Scots in Aberdeen were faced with the same deal, but they did not chase the first carrot that arrived. They knew the oil was not going rotten under the sea. It had been there for a long time and it could last a bit longer. The canny Scots have a great word. They say "nay" and then they start talking. I suggest the same approach on this deal: "Nay. Now we will do some talking."

What is in it for us? I want to remind my good friend that the government seems to be able to find money conveniently before elections. It talked about $12 billion for submarines. Do you remember that? Of course we knew it would have been a heck of a lot more. We know what the conventional needs for our armed forces are and our armed forces should get those conventional needs met, but that is a separate story. I represent a great naval base in my area and I am proud to do that.

They find this money for the oil companies and my first response is to give this money to the government and the people of Newfoundland and tell them: "Here is $3 billion, start going right now." Not make work projects so they get their 20 weeks in for unemployment insurance. That is the most insulting kind of development possible. Is that a morale lifter? Is that light at the end of the tunnel? Does that provide dignity and self-respect on a long-term basis? Not at all. The people of Newfoundland deserve more and they deserve it in a way that makes sense, not as some kind of afterthought as a hand-out to the oil companies.

Mrs. Sparrow: There are no hand-outs.

Mr. Barrett: Let's talk about hand-outs to the oil companies. You represent the oil industry over there. You cannot even accept the fact that some people who wear turbans are Canadians. I find that disgraceful. I will not even deal with that.

Mrs. Sparrow: I never said that in my life.

Mr. Barrett: They have as much right to be in the mounted police as anyone else in this country, anyone else.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): On a point of order, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who is speaking has accused me of being discriminatory and a racist in a particular area. I have never, ever stated in this House, or on the street, or in the public, anything that way. The hon. member is misleading this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): I would ask that if the hon. member made those remarks he withdraw them.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I accept the hon. member's word, as we must do in this House, but I read the petitions that she presented in the House.

Mrs. Sparrow: I did not sign those petitions. I presented them on behalf of my constituents.

Mr. Barrett: Ah, being hoisted on your petard. One can refuse to present petitions in this Chamber. Yes, Mr. Speaker, one can make their position clear. Do you or do you not demand the rights of people, regardless of their religious persuasion? Will you fight for those who wear a turban to be in the RCMP as well as every other Canadian? Will you do it or not?

Mrs. Sparrow: That is totally irrelevant. I will not discuss it.

Mr. Barrett: Will you do it or not?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): Order, please. The comments of the hon. gentleman are not relevant to the debate. I would ask him to withdraw his racist comment, if that is, indeed, what he said.

Mr. Barrett: Sir, I withdraw my comments, but I am able to reflect on what the member said herself. If I cannot do it here, then I can do it outside.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate the sensitivity of this issue. The hon. member for Calgary Southwest accused my friend from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca of using the term "racist" in reference to her. I was in the Chamber and I believe that that was not a term used.

Mrs. Sparrow: He indicated I was racist.

Mr. Barrett: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: The point I want to make is that there is nothing to withdraw because unless you state the term—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): Order, please. The hon. gentleman from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has withdrawn the comment. I would ask him to continue the debate. There is exactly six minutes left in his debating time.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I was distracted and I responded to the distraction. That is now history in Hansard, but I do hope that people of any religious persuasion will be permitted to join any civil service capacity that is available in this great country of Canada. I just want to put my position on the record. I think it would be welcome for all minorities to have the same rights in this country.

Mrs. Sparrow: Who is arguing with that?

Mr. Barrett: I was not speaking to that member. Is she feeling guilty about something? I cannot understand her immediate response to this.

Mrs. Sparrow: Oh, come off it.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, why is she constantly interrupting when I am not even addressing her?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member please address the bill before the House?

Mr. Barrett: We will let it rest there, Mr. Speaker. I believe in religious freedom, and we will let it rest there.

I want to comment further on this whole question of a commitment to oil companies.

Mrs. Sparrow: It's a commitment to the people of Newfoundland.

Mr. Barrett: Well, Mr. Speaker, it is a commitment to oil companies. If we want a commitment to the people of Newfoundland, put this money up for restructuring the economy in Newfoundland. Let me talk about—

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): There are far better ways to do it.

Mr. Barrett: Yes, far better ways. Let me quote from an article published July 25 in The Financial Times. It is not exactly a newspaper that supports the New Democratic Party. I have never seen an editorial in it supporting us. Should they wish to support us, I would consider welcoming it.

However having said that, let me go on to this. This is an article written by the dean of the faculty of management of the University of Manitoba. He said: "As a regional development scheme the project may have some merit, but not in terms of capital cost per job. Energy is one of the world's most capital intensive industries and, accordingly, is a strikingly expansive vehicle with which to deliver regional employment. Temporary construction jobs in Newfoundland will carry a capital cost in excess of $500,000 per job".

It is hard to figure after a couple hundred bucks, as the member said, but $500,000 will employ a heck of a lot of people.

• (1350)

"Permanent production jobs will carry a capital cost of several million dollars per job. Granted, oil is there, but it would be difficult to find a more expensive way to deliver either oil or jobs in Newfoundland."

Who am I to question the author of this article? All I am suggesting is that if the government has $300 million to put up, put it up and let the oil companies put up their own money. I have seen too many giveaways in the history of this country already. This government is always talking about being frugal and being careful with taxpayers' money, cutting and slashing.

They are the guys who just one week ago gave Boeing another $160 million. They are paying them to take the company off their hands. What kind of business is that? What kind of business enterprise is that in front of farmers or fishermen, to tell them you have to take $160 million of taxpayers' money to pay off Boeing to buy the plant? Dumb-bell economics. It is not so dumb if you are paying the piper who calls the tune. The Tories have represented big business in this county since the inception of their party, and when it comes to welfare for big business, they find new ways to do it every day.

That is the record, Mr. Speaker. As a consequence of that record it is my intention to move an amendment, should I find the appropriate document in front of me. The amendment is seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East who is an outstanding colleague in this House, probably one of the most articulate spokespersons from western Canada and without a doubt the best representative from Alberta that this House presently has.

I have prepared this amendment with his advice and the help of the Clerk. I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:
> "Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be not now read a second time, because:
> (1) granting the Project more than $1 billion without securing equivalent equity in the Project for the people of Canada is wrong in principle;
>
> (2) it fails to contain specific provisions which provide environmental protection measures in connection with the Project; and,
> (3) it fails to contain specific provisions which provide for the creation of job opportunities in relation to the Project".

I commend this amendment to you as soon as I affix my signature.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will take this proposed amendment under advisement and rule shortly on its admissibility.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I listened with rapt attention to the remarks of my hon. colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca whom I am sure the entire House will agree is one of its most eloquent spokespersons. He is indeed a fine gentleman in his own right, if I may say so.

However, in listening to those remarks I could not help but overhear as well certain uncharitable comments directed his way by other members of the House to the effect that because the NDP was opposed to this bill it was therefore opposed to Hibernia in principle and was therefore opposed to the creation of meaningful well paying jobs for the citizens of Atlantic Canada in general and of Newfoundland and Labrador in particular. I was wondering if the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca might undertake to comment on the veracity and worthiness of those charges.

Mr. Barrett: I am surprised and pleased that my colleague would give me this opportunity to share my opinion with him since I do not think the rest of the House is really interested in what I have to say. Should there be someone who is suffering from the lack of the ability to go to sleep, they too might be interested in my answer.

I am suggesting that if the government can find $3 billion for oil companies to subsidize this project it should get an equity position.

Mrs. Sparrow: We got an equity position.

Mr. Barrett: There is the voice again. There is the voice again coming out—

Mrs. Sparrow: On the OSLO deal we got an equity position.

Mr. Barrett: Far be it from me to interrupt the debate of the member who does not have the floor. Nonetheless, I must continue.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): When there's a profit pigs will fly.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to interrupt this debate, but I happen to have the floor.

I want to point out that if we have equity we should get a share of the profit. All we are guaranteed is a loss. That group of free enterprisers out there astounds me. My poor father, who started off as a humble merchant selling fruits and vegetables, never got a subsidy from the government. Had he got a subsidy from the government, since he sold tomatoes that at some times were not exactly of the best quality, he would have allowed anybody giving him a subsidy to have an equity position. If the tomatoes went soft, they lost money and he lost money. However, if the tomatoes lasted long enough to sell to the customers, he made money and the person with the equity position made money. If it is good enough for my dear old dad, surely it is good enough for this government.

Mrs. Sparrow: Tell us about ICBC in British Columbia.

Mr. Barrett: Now I hear this voice saying something about the ICBC in British Columbia. Yes, the Socialists brought in ICBC in British Columbia and every succeeding government has kept it and taken credit for it.

Mrs. Sparrow: The money they have lost. Come on.

Mr. Barrett: Chirp, chirp, chirp. There is something wrong with the sound system. It has a strange feedback in this Chamber. I know it can be corrected or cranked down.

Furthermore, I want to pause and reflect on the challenge my good friend has presented to me by this question. Is this project a paternalistic approach to the indigenous people of that region?

[Translation]

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Louis-Hébert, on a point of order.

[English]

The member has lost the floor for a minute.

[Translation]

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, I think the discriminatory attitude taken by the hon. member for the opposition when he made fun of the voice of the hon. member for Calgary Southwest was absolutely uncalled for. This reeks of discrimination, and I would like him to apologize.

[English]

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I am the only one who has the floor. I cannot identify where interruptions are coming from. I mocked no one except the generic interruptions from that side. If a particular person feels offended by my generic comments, then I honour the rules of this House and withdraw.

However I would ask them, if they are going to interrupt, to please identify themselves by name so I am assured that I am not insulting them by person.

If I may continue on the point made by my colleague, it is indeed a desire of every member of this House to ensure that every region has the possibility of developing to its greatest potential. As a consequence of that I believe that if Hibernia should go it should go on the basis of its own merit, but we should not tie the economy of one province to that project. What we should do is immediately spend the $3 billion inside that province on developing other projects that the people themselves are a part of planning.

That is the way to go. Trust people. Believe in people. Let them have the sense and the ability to develop their own destiny without having some outside massive hand-outs. That is my point.

• (1400)

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, if the amendment to the motion for second reading, moved by my colleague moments ago, is deemed to be in order, I would be very much desirous, as would other of my colleagues, of participating in the debate on that amendment.

I do not know what these calls for the question are at the moment. If there is no other person interested in taking part in the debate on the question for second reading, I would be delighted to move to the debate on the question of the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: After studying the matter, the Chair finds the amendment to be in order.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I stand in support of this reasoned and reasonable amendment which is asking that Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia development project, be not read a second time at this point, because of three very fundamental principles that are not adequately addressed in it.

The first principle is that there is not a securement of sufficient equity for the government in the project. We have set out in the amendment that granting the project more than $1 billion without securing equivalent equity is wrong in principle.

The amendment also suggests that the current legislation fails to contain specific provisions which provide for environmental protection measures in connection with the project. At a later point in my presentation, I want to outline in more detail why that factor is in itself so critically important to whether this project should or should not go ahead.

The last provision is also a very salient point. The current legislation fails to contain specific provisions which provide for the creation of job opportunities in relation to the project.

I would like to start by going to the last point first. I come from an area in British Columbia where, like my colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, I have seen the cumulative economic impact, or lack thereof, of many of the megaproject developments which have gone on in our province. I speak of projects such as the Columbia River Power Treaty. In that measure a massive investment of taxpayers' money went into creating cheap power and cheap water for agricultural communities in Washington and Oregon, communities which are now competing with and keeping our agricultural communities out of the market.

Some of these projects are incredibly expensive. Let us look, for example, at the Northeast Coal project that was developed years ago. That project was developed under the British Columbia government of Bill Bennett. It involved millions and millions of taxpayers' dollars to develop the coal fields in the northeastern part of British Columbia.

To begin with, after investing all that money, they even put the hole in the wrong place. Millions and millions of taxpayers' dollars went into the creation of an energy project which saw very little return in terms of actual job creation. Certainly, there were jobs created. But when you look at the cost of capital investment necessary there was a million dollars of capital investment that was necessary to create one long-term job in the Northeast Coal fields.

Now, when we are competing with our Australian counterparts for the Japanese coal market, we find that the Northeast Coal project is not able to recover the costs that we were hoping it would be able to recover when the project was initially started. Millions of taxpayers' dollars have gone to create temporary jobs.

If you took $1 million of capital investment—and that is what it was to create one job in Northeast Coal—and you put that money into the community into, for example, the small business sector you could create 10 times the number of jobs that you could for one long-term job in the capital intensive industry such as in the energy sector. Some $50,000 to $100,000 of capital investment will create jobs in the small business sector. It will also create ten times the economic spinoff in terms of job creation.

Yes, we believe in job creation and, like my colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, I think all Canadians are vitally concerned about what is happening in our Atlantic provinces, in Newfoundland, with respect to the economic difficulties that they are involved in at this time. We want to help out. But I think all Canadians, as well as those residents in the Atlantic provinces, also want to make sure that we get the biggest bang for our buck. That certainly cannot be achieved in capital intensive projects such as we have seen with Northeast Coal in British Columbia or in Atlantic Canada with the Hibernia project.

We want to create the most jobs with the money that we do have available. That is why we oppose this bill. We believe it to be an inefficient means of job creation.

We oppose the bill because here we are utilizing federal money without really consulting the people in the communities about whether or not they have some better ideas about how that money should be put to use in creating jobs that will be around for a few years throughout their communities.

When this bill was first introduced on November 7, my New Democratic colleagues and I issued a series of conditions that we felt should be satisfied in order to win support for the project. My colleague from Edmonton East, who I think has so eloquently spoken on this issue a number of times, dealt extensively with these four conditions in his remarks of December 18.

What are those conditions? I would like to review them very briefly.

• (1410)

First, there should be no investment of public money without equivalent equity being held by the Crown. It is a fundamental tenet of economic development that there should be no give-aways of taxpayers' money, be it federal, provincial or otherwise. There should not be any give-aways of public money, unless there is an equity position for the government to be attained.

The Alberta government made sure it had equity in its Syncrude project. There is no essential equity of investment for Canadian taxpayers' dollars going into this Hibernia project.

The second principle which I think very important is that there should be guarantees in the agreements among the parties that the production costs will not be subsidized by the public purse now or in the future.

Third, the expenditures by the federal government on research, development and the commercialization of energy alternatives and conservation must be restored to a minimum of the $400 million budgeted for it in 1984. I think all members of this House would agree that there are great opportunities for job creation in this field, small-scale, community-based projects for energy alternatives which will benefit ordinary people, not only in Newfoundland but throughout this country. This is a very important principle and, when we dive into these mega-projects of exploration opportunities for coal fields and oil fields, we sometimes neglect some of the alternative projects we could be developing.

A fourth important point is that concrete steps and guarantees must be put in place to minimize the environmental impacts of the Hibernia project, as well as any other energy project. This should include the assurance that, within the framework of reducing Canada's carbon dioxide emissions, which are the by-product of burning our fossil fuels, we should be reducing those emissions by at least 20 per cent by the year 2005 to combat the problem that we are experiencing even now. That problem is global warming due to the greenhouse effect caused by the increased concentration of carbon dioxide gases in our atmosphere.

This project is not going to help in that respect. Once again, we are tapping our resource of fossil fuels and utilizing fossil fuel products for our energy sources. It is high time that this government put its money where its mouth is in terms of taking on its supposed commitment to the exploration of energy alternatives, something which will utilize other fuel sources. For example, there is hydrogen which, when combined with oxygen in the process of combustion, produces a very simple by-product which is environmentally harmless—water. Those are the kinds of energy alternatives that we should be exploring rather than simply blundering again into the utilization of our coal fields and oil reserves.

I think I speak for everybody in my caucus when I say that we take very seriously the recommendations made by the Brundtland Commission. The main thrust of the report of that commission was that any kind of economic development taking place has to go hand-in-hand with the need for sensitive environmental planning, a stewardship to ensure the kinds of economic development that we fund and pursue are in harmony with our environmental objectives.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that economics aside, the Hibernia project does not take that into consideration.

The environmental problems that we are running up against today in Canada and throughout the world are becoming increasingly critical. As I mentioned before, the greenhouse effect brought on in large measure by the use of our fossil fuels is having very significant impacts, on a global scale, on our climatic conditions. One of those conditions is the reduction in available sunlight in photosynthesis for aquatic plants. It is changing in a myriad of ways the whole balance in our biosphere and in the ecosystems throughout the world. The longer we continue to ignore those important problems the greater the ultimate crisis will become.

The points that my colleague from Edmonton brought before this House earlier are reasonable conditions for any energy project that is to be considered. The government could have pursued a bill on Hibernia that did satisfy these sensible and reasonable requests. But it chose not to do so. As a result the projects that have resulted will provide comparatively few jobs. I mentioned before a case where it took a million dollars of capital investment to create one job. When I say that that is not getting the biggest bang for the buck I think we would all agree with that.

Newfoundland needs real economic development. Hibernia could help with that. We do not have any argument in that regard. But that is not likely to happen with this current bill because many of the potential benefits to Newfoundland and Labrador have been squandered and ignored by this current piece of legislation.

I would like to deal with the other principles in the reasoned amendment before the House. However, before I do that I would like to outline or review a bit of the history of the Hibernia project.

It is a project that has been a dizzying roller-coaster of raised expectations and dashed hopes for our Atlantic friends. When the first major oil discovery was made in the Grand Banks back in 1979 the expectation was that Newfoundland would blossom to become what they called at that time the Norway of North America. Unfortunately, the first estimates of the amount of oil contained in the oil fields were soon proved to be much too optimistic, too high.

In 1979, it was estimated that the Hibernia fields contained about 1.8 billion barrels of oil. By 1985, the estimate was in fact much lower. The field is estimated to contain between 800 million and 900 million barrels—nothing to sneeze at but certainly not the great expectations that we had in 1979.

The most recent estimate with respect to the Hibernia reserves has lowered it to between just 500 million and 650 million barrels. We can see that it does not have the great potential we thought it had when the oil fields were discovered initially.

The estimates of the benefits from the project that would have been enjoyed by Newfoundlanders have similarly declined steadily. Initially, Newfoundlanders believed that the province owned this off-shore resource and that it would be used mainly to provide much-needed jobs to boost the Newfoundland economy.

This hope of exclusive provincial ownership and control was dashed by the rulings of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and the Supreme Court of Canada in 1983 and 1984. Basically, it was ruled that the federal government would have jurisdiction over this off-shore mineral resource.

The Atlantic Accord, a long-term agreement on the joint management of off-shore oil and gas development, was signed in 1985. But, as Newfoundlanders know only too well, the agreement does not change the simple fact that Hibernia will not in itself transform their provincial economy.

On top of the disappointing realization that Hibernia would not be the bonanza that was initially thought, politicians have repeatedly used the promise of the project, quite frankly, for crass political purposes. They have repeatedly raised the hopes of the people of Newfoundland by making the big glitzy announcements, the deals, strangely enough either just before or during election campaigns. We all know how quickly promises evaporate once an election is over and done with. We all know how quickly those promises have evaporated in the past. You cannot blame people for being a bit reluctant to accept the promises this government has continued to make in terms of its commitment to some of its election goodies.

• (1420)

The project was announced once in 1979. It was announced again in 1982 and yet again in the 1988 federal election when the federal Conservatives made Hibernia an important plank in their Atlantic Canada platform. Each time the impression was given that a final deal was completed, that it was wrapped up, that it was in the bag, that it was just a matter of putting the bells and whistles on it, and this would mean great things for Newfoundland.

This is what the Prime Minister said at the time during a pre-election stop in St. John's, on July 18, 1988:

> Hibernia has been the dream of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador for decades. Today, the dream has been realized.

In the midst of the last election campaign on October 6, 1988, the Prime Minister, once again, waxed lyrical about the project, as he is often wont to do. He said: "For me, Brian Mulroney, Hibernia meant a lot more than barrels of oil. Hibernia, to me, was about dignity. Hibernia is about the future, about jobs for our kids. It is about a new tomorrow".

For his part Trade Minister John Crosbie told more than 1,000 invited guests in St. John's that the announcement has nothing to do with politics, it has to do with simple justice. That was in 1988.

I am certain the government will try again somehow to blame the opposition for holding up Hibernia.

I will summarize by making it very, very clear that we in the New Democratic Party are not opposed to the Hibernia project. What we are opposed to is the fact that the federal dollars involved in creating Hibernia could better be spent on a community-by-community basis developing the kinds of projects that Newfoundlanders themselves feel are the best means for economic development and job creation in their province.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, in the same context, but perhaps expanding it a bit, I was just wondering if the hon. member could comment on what the effect of this headlong rush into megaproject development, not only Hibernia, but across the country might be in light of the free trade agreement.

My understanding of the free trade agreement is that once we achieve a certain level of export to the United States that level of export then becomes the bottom line of what we have to make available to the Americans in perpetuity through the free trade agreement. For example, if 60 per cent of our production of oil or 50 per cent of our production of gas is committed to the Americans at a certain point in time, then from then on forward that will be the production level.

I found it very interesting when the member commented that we should make incremental kinds of investments in our energy future, including investments in conservation and so on which would benefit Newfoundland communities and all others. Might that not also be a more intelligent way to go about it, rather than at this time rush into a whole series of megaprojects, the bulk of which products go to export? That will place us in a position whereby our non-renewable hydrocarbons will be locked into an export pattern we will not be able to get out of.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I believe the member has posed a very salient question. It is also a very important question in terms of the impact of the free trade agreement on our energy resources.

There is no question that the free trade agreement as is signed and implemented today has far more to do with access to Canada's resources than it has to do with the reduction of tariff barriers. That is why we initially opposed the free trade agreement before it was implemented. That is why we continue to oppose it today.

The fact is that the FTA is really an attempt by our neighbour to the south to access our vital resources, our energy supplies, our electricity and hydro supplies, our water—in fact, the lifeblood of Canada.

The section of the agreement dealing with energy basically says that once contracts have been established for the provision of Canadian energy supplies to U.S. markets and once that trade has taken place, the federal government of Canada or a provincial government loses control of that resource. That is so because in times of energy crisis they can no longer cut back on exported supplies of that energy without cutting back an equivalent amount on our own domestic supplies. That is what is so wrong with that aspect of the trade agreement.

These megaprojects are exploring our resource base and opening up these resources, a major portion of which we know darn well will then be exported to our southern neighbours. Once we have established those export markets, if we have to cut back 10 per cent on our export supply, the free trade agreement says: "You can't cut back on 10 per cent of the export supply to the U.S. unless you cut back an equivalent amount in your own domestic consumption". That means we are losing control and the husbandry of our own natural resources.

In light of that, the development of these megaprojects has to be very seriously questioned indeed.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member.

I have to say that I have enjoyed the debate today on government participation in megaprojects. It is debated in our small post offices in the Cariboo—Chilcotin. It is debated over office coffee urns, in our beer parlours and at our church socials. It is a subject that is very important to a lot of people in Canada. I do not know that there is anybody wise enough to give the ultimate answer.

The hon. member supports the motion to squash what is considered by the people of Newfoundland to be their opportunity. They want the Government of Canada to help them help themselves. It is easy for people to squash a project that is considered important by people on the other side of the country.

My question for the member is this. There are projects in British Columbia in which the federal government's presence and assistance is necessary. Would the hon. member be prepared to have the federal government also squash the gas line to Vancouver Island and the icebreaker that will be there to assist our shipbuilding industry in British Columbia?

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has missed a very vital point in my argument. The argument is not to squash the project. The argument is that if we go ahead with it we want some assurances that the federal government has equity in the project. We want some assurances that there are environmental impact assessments done with respect to the project. We want some assurances that the long-term interests of our energy supplies are secured before this project goes ahead.

We want to make sure that the $3.1 billion in investments is used by the people of Newfoundland rather than being squandered away by giving it to the multinational oil companies. We want to assess the rationale for using $1 million in capital investment to create one job, or whether perhaps it makes more sense to take that $3.1 billion and use it in other sectors of the economy where you are going to produce 10 to 50 times the number of jobs for every dollar you spend.

It is a matter of putting the bucks where you are going to get the biggest bang for them. I think that that makes ultimate economic sense.

• (1430)

Ms. Callbeck: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment on this amendment. When I look at a copy of it, it seems to me it is there simply to stall this bill. We would like to see the Hibernia bill go to committee. I think there are a lot of technical details in it. We want it to go to committee so we have the opportunity to hear witnesses and to make improvements in this legislation.

The NDP say that they want assurances. We also want assurances. This amendment shows that the NDP members are more concerned with technical details. I think the place to deal with these details is in committee and that is what we would like to recommend because we want to get on with this process which is advantageous to Atlantic Canada.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that the member may wish to peruse the exact wording of the reasoned amendment. Nothing in this amendment can, in fact, be dealt with in committee. These amendments are far more than simply housekeeping measures and changes in wording. It changes, in fact, the principle of the legislation. What she calls technical details and housekeeping measures are about whether or not the Canadian taxpayer deserves the right of equity financing in projects of this sort, or whether we are going to give $3.1 billion holus-bolus to multinational investments.

The amendment is concerned with whether or not there are adequate provisions for environmental safeguards in this project. Every Canadian citizen knows that the major concerns in this country—the major concern globally—are environmental issues. This government has itself given the commitment, at least it has paid lip service to the commitment, that all projects would receive an environmental assessment as to whether or not they should proceed. This is far more than simple housekeeping. The creation of jobs for people in Newfoundland is far more than a simple housekeeping measure.

Megaprojects are capital intensive. They do not create enough jobs for the amount of money spent. Our position is that perhaps there could be other mechanisms by which we get the biggest bang for the buck.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I had actually hoped to catch Your Honour's eye before now, because I wanted to say that I found the recitation of the history of the project that the hon. member was relating to the House a most interesting one. I was hoping that I could invite him to continue with that recitation in the time remaining so that all members might be further enlightened.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, you caught me unaware on that one. Because I had summarized somewhat it will take me half a second to go back to where I was before.

We talked about the historical aspect of Hibernia and the number of promises that have been made time and time again by this government in regard to the development of the project.

Let us have a look at what is actually in Bill C-44. In a nutshell, the bill is meant to give the federal government the statutory authority to enter into one or more legally binding agreements based on the statement of principles signed in July, 1988. It sets out how the federal government will spend money on the project.

Mr. Speaker, in the very brief time I have remaining I want to point out that we are talking about a great deal of money. We are talking about $1.04 billion toward capital costs, $1.66 billion in loan guarantees for capital projects, $.175 billion in loan guarantees for temporary financing; $.3 billion is a loan. No cap on the amount contributed as interest. $3.139 billion in taxpayers' money is a lot of money. Is it a wise use of that money?

That is all we are asking. Does the legislation that is before us set out a mechanism for the judicious use of federal taxpayers' money?

Let me emphasize once again that we do not oppose Hibernia in principle. We do oppose the fiscal arrangements that are set out in this piece of legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 2.34 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

JOB-CREATION STRATEGIES

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of ensuring that federal job-creation strategies emphasize job opportunities that extend beyond the industrial and commercial sectors and include the arts, culture, social and voluntary services, and community-based enterprises.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite appropriate that this private members' motion, which I am introducing comes before us on this particular day. It is a day on which we see the contrast of philosophies, with the government promoting, on the one hand, massive investments of billions of dollars in megaprojects. This money will, in large part, end up in the hands of large multinational corporations, for each dollar invested will yield very little in terms of job creation in a region of the country where such job creation is so badly needed. On the other hand, earlier today, we had the Minister of Employment make an announcement with regard to one of the government's major employment creation projects, the Challenge '90 project, which, through a series of smoke and mirrors, ends up being even less of a program than it was before. This program was very useful in communities from coast to coast, communities that every one of us represent. I think it is very appropriate that we address this particular question, on the one hand, a community-based development philosophy and on the other a megaproject-big business type of philosophy.

One of the things that concerns me very much, as a member of this House and as a witness to what is happening to our communities, to our economy and to our country, is that this government seems to be lost in a dark ideological tunnel that seems to have no turns. I find it hard to comprehend why that should be true because, as I get to know members opposite better on a personal basis and work with them in committees and so on and discuss issues with them, I realize that in many ways the partisan differences between us tend to blur when it comes to concern about our communities and interest in local projects and the kind of things that we support from day to day as members of Parliament.

Therefore, it seems incongruous to me that these same members then end up voting and supporting a point of view in a series of legislative initiatives that fly in the face of the kind of work they do and take a great interest in as individual members.

I have come to the conclusion that the government opposite is much less than the sum of its parts. I think there are three basic issues inherent in the question we are addressing today. One is a very fundamental problem with the values this government lives by and which it promotes as being those that Canadians should emulate. It is very much a bottom line orientation towards life, an orientation that says that if you are not part of big business, if you are not the rat race, if your goals are not to get ahead as fast as you can economically, if you are not prepared to get there and elbow your way through different kinds of economic competitive environments, then you do not have a place in society. If you are not turned on by the vision of capital flowing back and forth through capital markets around the world day and night, if you do not follow the stock market very closely, if these things are not of interest to you and if that is not where your life revolves then somehow or other you are a second-class citizen and this government does not really have a role to play in your life.

It seems especially ironic that the historic Conservative party should end up in that kind of a values vacuum. I had always seen the Conservative party partly that way because my constituency was represented by the late John Diefenbaker, and perhaps because the old British Tory tradition of conservatism respected community life, family life, and applauded local grassroots initiative.

Instead, what we see is a headlong rush into the materialistic type of big business–oriented philosophy that leaves our society not only socially much poorer, but in many ways, spiritually much poorer. Ultimately, it gets us on a environmental treadmill that we will not be able to get off. In fact, it holds within it its own seeds of destruction.

I might comment in that regard on what is happening in eastern Europe. My own family roots are in eastern European. My family was forced to leave the Soviet Union in 1927. If the bankers take our farm away in Saskatchewan, perhaps Mikhail Gorbachev might give our farm back in the Soviet Union, in view of the changes that are happening there.

Nevertheless, I have heard a lot of comments from people espousing neo–conservative, right wing ideas. But what is happening in eastern Europe is, in fact, a sudden conversion to a completely capitalist, free enterprise kind of thinking.

I think that is certainly part of the answer. I know that there people have been very frustrated, as our family was, with the inability of individuals and communities to make their own economic decisions. But there was also a structure evolving in that country that was oriented from the top down, where individuals and communities had no control.

I think that can happen in a private enterprise economy as it did in a communist economy. We are seeing in our country that people are feeling less and less in control of their lives. The values that are driving this culture, the same as they did there—it was called economic materialism—are giving rise to a right wing version of economic materialism that is just as destructive to individuals and communities as the communistic type of economic materialism was in eastern Europe.

Another problem with this government is that it recognizes only two–thirds of the economy and of that two–thirds, it only supports one–third. If you analyze the economy, it has three sectors, not two. There is a corporate business sector, a public sector basically evolving around different levels of government, and then there is a community sector which includes voluntary organizations. They, in turn, include organizations, such as small family–owned businesses, community development corporations and co–operatives; all the kinds of little grassroot local activities that people carry on in the economic sphere. I think that it is just as important, perhaps more important, to help people live in our communities as it is the big government and private sectors. This government has really lost sight of that in spite of the fact that it represents those same communities as I do.

I might also comment that if you look at the economic history of the country those sectors are the ones that are durable in tough times and are the ones that have endured.

The other problem is that this government is proceeding without a full employment policy. The interest rate policies of the Bank of Canada under its Governor, John Crow, make it very clear that fighting inflation by creating exorbitantly high interest rates is much more of a priority to this government than full employment. In fact, the government does not even talk about full employment. It becomes quite clear that the corporate agenda is to force wages down, which it thinks it has to do in order to compete economically in the world, requires high unemployment. In that way people will not make higher wage demands and develop expectations that this government does not want ordinary Canadians to be able to realize. If you look at the successful economies of the world that are competing successfully and are making progress, the economies of western Europe, the economies of Japan and so on, you will see that those economies have very focused emphasis on full employment and on ensuring that everybody has a role to play in the economy.

In fact I have heard it argued that one of the reasons we are having so much trouble financing our social programs and one of the reasons the country is continually clawing back and cutting and making it more and more difficult for a lot of these social programs to survive is because social programs have not been tied to a full employment program. Surely a full employment program is the most successful social program you can have for a great number of people.

I started by mentioning the Challenge program that was introduced today and I would like to return to that as an example of what I am talking about. This program, at least in a limited way, gives young people some opportunity to get experience in the job market. It also gives local communities a source of funding to get some local projects completed and to do interesting things that benefit the communities. But what did we see happen today? There was an announcement, which on the face of it has some merit, about the stay-in-school program. There was a big announcement that it was funded to the tune of $296 million. In much smaller print was the fact that that $296 million was spread over five years and in fact amounted to $60 million a year.

But where did that money come from? The money came out of what is called the SEED program. We have $60 million going toward staying in school this year. We have a loss in the SEED program which was the program available to post-secondary education students. $41.8 million was taken out of that program in the same year—a 35 per cent cut. All that has happened is that high school students are getting some support to stay in school at the expense of university students who will now have to take even bigger student loans, or find jobs in a very tough job market and pay back student loans at exorbitant rates of interest. That is hardly progress.

In the La Ronge region of my constituency, when last year ended, the Challenge Program had applications for $1.2 million of funding, while only $247,000 of funding was available. This left many very frustrated community groups that were not able to complete their projects and a lot of frustrated students. I have talked to many other members who said it was also true in their constituencies. It turned out to be a program that in many ways perhaps turned out doing more harm than good. This is in a constituency where only 23.15 per cent of the people between 15 and 65 are listed as working. In other words, it is a constituency with 77 per cent unemployment, according to Statistics Canada.

I would also like to make some proposals, as I did in my motion, as to how the government might come to terms with its very short-sighted and incomplete approach to job creation.

I think what has happened in Quebec has given us a fine example of how encouragement for the arts and culture not only benefits arts and culture and the people who are interested in pursuing those but has also given a real boost to that province as a whole. I am thinking of the self-confidence, not only in the cultural and nationalistic sense that we see arising in the province of Quebec but also of the success in entrepreneurial business areas. It comes from the fact that Quebecers have been able to develop a sense of themselves of which they are proud. I think that comes very much from the support for arts and culture that has happened in that province.

On the other hand what do we see in English Canada? Lately we have seen the CBC cuts which were only the latest in a whole series of cuts to the CBC. I know that a lot of those were designed to trim fat in head office and one thing or another but it also has become very clear at least in my province that a very valuable children's program, Switchback, was cut. That program was produced in Regina and provided employment for local artists and producers and it was the only alternative for children in Saskatchewan to the type of video shows and game shows the commercial networks provide. Part of the CBC cut was the Switchback program. There is also a real threat to the small remote stations that tie the remote communities in this country together.

In my riding we have Emma Lake Art Camp, which is an internationally renowned centre. It is a gathering spot and training ground for artists. For many years it has been struggling to survive as a teaching institution and as a place on the map.

We have local native singers and dancers who cannot get funding to answer an invitation to make a European tour, even though they were judged good enough to perform at the opening of the Museum of Civilization last spring.

A French cultural centre is being proposed which is being bucked by the provincial government and given only lukewarm attention by the federal government. When I looked at the CIC figures, only two out of 294 jobs listed at the local manpower office are in the recreational and cultural areas.

What we have seen is a shift, in accordance with the same value structure, of support for the arts from public institutions to the corporate sector. What that means is, first of all, the kind of arts that are supported are those that the corporate sector chooses as being sympathetic to its way of thinking. Second, it perpetrates the centralization of artistic activity of which both public and private institutions are guilty. The big corporations that can afford to fund arts and culture are centred in the big cities and that is where they invest their money. Therefore, the hinterlands of Canada, the small communities, do not benefit. The cultural life of the hinterlands of Canada is stagnating as a result.

A second aspect is the voluntary and social service sectors in this country. Through those sectors, 175,000 people are employed full-time 200,000 man years of voluntary time are donated through the voluntary and social service agency networks. There are all kinds of social needs that need to be met. There are all kinds of people out there who would like to meet them. There are all kinds of studies that say this is a cost-effective way to spend money in terms of return to the economy and multiplier effects in communities and so on. But yet, what do we see? We see large cuts in transfer payments that funded those kinds of programs at that level. We saw a 15 per cent cut in Secretary of State programs last year federally. We are warned of even bigger cuts this year. We saw cuts to the ODA programs.

Again, local initiatives are being left begging, while megaprojects and big business get their way with this government.

The last point I would like to raise is that of community based enterprises. This country has a proud history of development of co-operatives and community development organizations. We are renowned world-wide for this ability. People come here to do research on how to start local grassroots enterprises. But when we see the programs coming out of this government like the CAED program and the aboriginal economic program, when you look at our regional development programs, WDO, look at community futures, when you look at all of these programs, community development organizations and co-operatives take a seat so far back that you cannot even see them from the front. I know that many people who work with these programs are very frustrated by the fact that guidelines are written in such a way that these kind of locally based initiatives find it very difficult, first of all, to make it through all the hoops and the feasibility studies that it takes to get money.

Second, so often the criteria involved make it impossible for them to access this money. Again, we have a situation where those who really do not need the money can get it, and those who do need the money cannot.

The last point I would like to raise is the whole question of the environment. There is a new employment for local communities opening up in the environmental area; monitoring the environment, cleaning up the mess we made before; participating in local energy development programs. The kind of things that all of us recognize are the wave of the future and would operate best on a local community basis.

In closing, I would like to call on this government to do three things. One is recognize that a third community based sector does exist in this country and does deserve support.

Second, the third sector is the most cost effective, the most positive way to develop local communities and, in fact, to develop the economy. Third, I would like the government to recognize that life is more than being part of the international, big business rat race. I would like members of this government to support this motion and to make the point that we do recognize the value of community life. We do recognize that locally based initiatives are worth supporting.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to what my hon. friend said. I think that the late great John Diefenbaker would not be ashamed of him at all. I think he has done his homework. Mr. Diefenbaker would not agree entirely with his ideological point of view, but I think he would respect the work that the hon. member put into his thoughts and into his speech.

As the hon. member appreciates what I am about to say, he will find himself returning to his natural roots of conservativism. Perhaps even his riding will some day under his leadership do the same. I would invite the hon. member some day to come with me into the bosom of the Department of Communications where, just the other day, I spent several hours discussing cultural initiatives in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta. I recognize the centralist tendency that he alludes to. It is one that I have been concerned about as well. I can assure him that there are those of us in government who are working to combat that natural tendency of a system such as ours seems to have built into it.

The Canadian Jobs Strategy introduced in September, 1985 focuses on training and development in the Canadian labour market through the six programs created by the strategy. Many organizations and individuals in the cultural sector have benefited from the opportunity to develop their skills and enjoy newly created employment possibilities. There is no question that the cultural sector is of great importance socially and economically in the life of our country. It is the fourth leading creator of employment. Our cultural industries, including broadcasting, directly employ more than 185,000 Canadian and are one of the fastest growing sectors of our economy.

In terms of social significance, our nation's creators have won international recognition and secured our reputation as a vibrant, creative and vital people. Artists form the cornerstone of our distinct identity as Canadians. As the Minister of Communications so aptly noted in outlining the status of the artist's initiative recently before the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture a society without artists is a society without identity.

[Translation]

The Canadian Jobs Strategy acknowledges the cultural sector's contribution to our society. Interested members of the cultural community can apply for assistance offered under any of the following programs included in the Strategy: Skill Investment, Job Entry, Job Development, Skill Shortages, Innovations, Community Futures and summer employment programs for young people.

Employment and Immigration Canada gives a broad definition of the cultural sector which includes visual arts, literature, interpretative arts, heritage activities including museums, art galleries, archives and libraries, and our cultural industries including radio and television, film, video, sound recording and editing.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will agree that the broad range of activities that can be supported by the Canadian Jobs Strategy reflects a sincere and substantial commitment by the government to Canada's cultural development.

I would like to mention some specific initiatives that are now a possibility in the cultural sector, through the financial support of the Jobs Strategy.

Skill Investment provides assistance in training workers affected by technological or market change. They are helped to re-train or acquire new skills.

[English]

In Alberta, a sound production company is developing the music engineering and studio technical skills of employees under the small business training option.

In Prince Edward Island, an art gallery intern at the Confederation Centre for the Arts was able to attend a three-week Banff School of Management program with assistance toward tuition and transportation.

• (1500)

In Ontario, an association representing workers in the Canadian film industry, including self-employed workers, is developing a training trust fund with Employment and Immigration Canada which will enable its members to upgrade various technical skills.

The objective of the Job Entry Program is to assist youth and women having difficulty making the transition from school or home to the labour market. A project in Thunder Bay for youth from small communities who have an interest in the arts is providing training in arts management and entrepreneurial skills, along with practical experience in arts organizations.

In Fredericton, New Brunswick, 20 women have been trained to become archivists. Some projects have provided training and work experience for people wanting to be library assistants and apprentice theatre managers. Other projects are developing skills in broadcast sales, marketing and journalism.

Through another Canadian Jobs Strategy initiative, the Job Development Program, people have been hired to work on projects to develop the management, production, technical or curatorial skills which will qualify them for long-term positions. For example, the Aerospace Museum of Calgary is training eight individuals to repair and rebuild three World War II aircraft and set up an aviation library.

In Sioux Lookout, three native people are being trained for work in the media. Dance companies, theatre companies, orchestras, art galleries, cultural centres and libraries are among the many other organizations benefiting from this imaginative enterprise.

The Skill Shortages Program provides assistance when employers are unable to find workers with occupational skills which have been designated, nationally or regionally, as being in short supply.

With funding from the Skill Shortages Program, the Canadian Opera Company is managing a three year training program for opera singers, fund raising consultants and technical personnel. People are being trained in several other artistic and administrative occupations in regions where shortages exist.

Prince Edward Island, arts administration and video production skills are being developed by an art gallery, arts centre and video production company.

In Alberta and Nova Scotia, arts administrators and stage managers have been trained.

Another component of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, the Labour Markets Innovations Program, is designed to assist individuals and groups to develop and implement innovative responses to particular market situations. Participation is open to groups or individuals anywhere in Canada.

Examples of innovations projects are the Dancer Transition Center, which assists professional dancers to move from active performance into a second career; the Academy of Canadian Cinema and Television's national apprenticeship program for young Canadian film makers; the Festival of New Canadian Plays, being developed by Alberta theatre projects, which aims to demonstrate to potential corporate investors the viability and importance of Canadian plays; and a Musical Performance and Communication Project designed to improve employment prospects for musicians.

These programs represent a substantial investment in our future by the Government of Canada. They are providing the training which the talented men and women in our cultural sector need to improve their skills.

They also enable young people to enter demanding professions which today call for a high level of training and expertise.

Earlier this year, the government announced that it intended to build on the success achieved by the Canadian Jobs Strategy. A commitment was made to maintain annual funding for the strategy at the present level of $1.8 billion. In addition, with the announcement of a new labour force development strategy, and the reallocation of $1.3 billion in unemployment insurance expenditures, the sum of $800 million was committed to assist in upgrading the skills of the labour force. These additional funds offer new opportunities for the cultural sector.

The art of promoting our culture and unique identity should not fall on the shoulders of the Minister of Communications alone. It is the responsibility of all of us who take pride in calling ourselves Canadians.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the member opposite just read out an impressive list. I find that a little sad because it is easy to take select examples and say we are doing good things. The government does have some good programs.

What is missing, obviously, is an overall view of where our economy and society is going with a comprehensive meshing of policies. We on this side of this House have expressed our concerns about the Labour Force Development Strategy and various other elements of economic policies of the government because they do not seem to be leading anywhere.

• (1505)

I want to discuss the problems as I see them in the context of this motion before the House today. This morning's announcement by the Minister of Employment and Immigration typified the lack of fundamental understanding on the part of the government of some of the problems the country faces, businesses face and some of the problems our young people face. It is reflective also of the unwillingness of the government to commit the resources in order to invest in the future of the economy and the people of Canada in the most productive way for our economic future.

First, the minister takes money from the summer jobs program for young people, money which helps with their education and is vital to our economy. She then puts it into programs to keep young people in high school.

While it is extremely crucial that our young people stay in school and get the kind of education they need, there is no recognition by the government of why young people drop out of school. There is one fundamental factor. If you grow up in a poor household in Canada you are four times as likely to drop out of high school before you have the education you need.

That indicates to me is in fact that poverty is a fundamental cause of school dropouts. It does not make sense to take money from one group of people who are pursuing their education to give it to others so that they will stay in school without recognizing the reason they are dropping out of school is poverty. At the same time, it is cutting back the kinds of transfer payments to the provinces that ultimately deal with the fundamental problem of poverty which keeps people dropping out of school. It just does not make any sense. It is patchwork at its worst.

One-fifth of money allocated to keeping young people in school is going to go to the information programs, which is propaganda about what a wonderful job the government is doing and which provides healthy contracts for friends of the government. That is not what our young people need.

I want to talk about the Community Development Initiatives. I think it is a great benefit when one comes into this House to have been in touch with what happens in communities, with the dynamics of communities and the strengths of communities. I had this experience through nine years in municipal government, as have many of my colleagues in the House. This experience allows one to know the strength of communities and to bring into play all the resources of a community to resolve problems such as high unemployment, untrained people, poverty in our communities, and to put all those strengths to work to create solutions which will work because they are developed by the people of a community who know their needs best.

We see elements in the government's current programs that not only do not support it, but militate against that happening. We see a requirement that somebody be out of work for six months and on unemployment insurance before they can get into training programs. That only allows people six months to sink further and further into the concept that they cannot do anything for themselves, that they are incompetent and incapable. When they finally enter a training program with those attitudes, reinforced by six months of unemployment, it is no wonder they do not do as well as they might.

This year several programs in my own community were held up for up to a year because the government, instead of trying to put back in money that it has taken out of training programs and job creation programs, was waiting for the provinces to come up with the money. Programs that were under way and staffed had to close for a year while the government made up its mind whether it was or it was not going to fund them.

Resources continue to be depleted to those programs. Now we are turning to the unemployed and asking them to give up money required for food and shelter for their families, to give up that money which is essential in order to pay for training and make up for the cuts the government has made over the last number of years.

The Challenge '90 program was cut back last year and it is getting cut back again. What was the effect of that?

• (1510)

The effect of that in my own riding and, I am sure across the country, was that extremely worth-while projects were cut. Many of these programs were operated by volunteer organizations which created jobs for young people and gave them a sense of commitment to their community and a stake in their community. These were programs that helped young children in poverty to have a worth-while summer experience, to feel that they were were worth while so maybe they will grow up and stay in school instead of dropping out.

Voluntary organizations produce up to 10 times the value of the dollars we put into them. That is not true of money we put into businesses. Often we are just paying for an employee the business would have hired in any case. Voluntary organizations can give a young person or anybody a work experience that involves them in their community, that gives them a commitment to their community and makes them see that education is relevant, that it has concrete results for society and for their own neighbours and friends.

These are the sorts of programs that we should be funding and which are especially important now when cut-backs to voluntary organizations are rampant and when volunteers are not able to function. There are still volunteers, but they still need paper to mail things out and still need the ability of staff people to support the their efforts. When those are missing we are losing a lot of the value of our voluntary organizations.

I want to expand the discussion because it really is a bigger question than job development, job-creation projects or training projects. It is a question of those much larger multibillion dollar programs that the government has, theoretically, to support employment and job creation in this country. But again today we see unemployment on the rise.

Let us consider the billions of dollars that go out through the Economic Development Corporation to support trade and employment in this country. Are these really the most valuable ways in which to use those dollars? We have seen in recent months serious reasons to question the way in which the Federal Business Development Bank theoretically helps with business development and job creation. It seems to have forgotten that its role is business development, not building development. These are examples of wrong policy directions.

On the other hand, we can look at other more positive directions, other things that are perhaps more worthwhile initiatives for us to invest in. We know that housing and housing renovation has a nine-to-one spinoff in terms of job creation for every dollar invested in it. We know that municipal infrastructure, roads, sewers and water, not only serve the health and safety of Canadians and reduces environmental damage through transportation, but also have a very healthy spinoff rate in terms of jobs per dollar invested.

We know that arts and culture, dollar for dollar, is the most labour intensive employment in the country. That is obviously a good way to invest our money if all we are interested in is in job creation, and yet we have the additional benefits of an enrichment of our social and cultural life. Again, instead of support of those industries which naturally produce jobs without any artificial infusion, we see the reduction of funds.

I want to reiterate that the official opposition has a very strong belief in the role of the individual in society and the importance of government supporting and creating an environment where each individual can develop his or her own talents, contribute to society and benefit from that contribution. We simply believe that there must be a comprehensive review of the whole scope of job creation, investment in employment, investment in corporations, and investment in education.

While the motion is a worth-while one, it is only one part of what we need to be looking at as a society. What is good for us as a society is also what is good for job creation and for our economy.

• (1515)

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I understand and respect the hon. member's interest in the Canadian job creation strategies and training opportunities. I appreciate the member's concern about finding ways to increase participation in our economy, especially by those Canadians who live in small communities and who work in our arts and culture sectors or social and voluntary services. My hon. colleagues will address these particular issues.

I share the hon. member's desire to build a strong and competitive Canada, through the creation of jobs. I would like to remind him that this government is not a stand pat government. We have always recognized the folly of complacency. We have repeatedly pointed out that if Canada ever adopted a passive approach to job training in this highly competitive world, that strategy would serve as an invitation for disaster.

We have repeatedly warned that the demands of a constantly changing and interdependent global economy must never be underestimated. We have always maintained that the failure to preserve a competitive workforce would have dire consequences for Canada's economic prospects. That is why we have dedicated more dollars to job training and skill enhancement than any government in the history of Canada. That is why we have replaced the hodgepodge of job-creation schemes with a comprehensive plan designed to prepare the Canadian workforce for the challenges of the 21st century.

This government is not in the business of cobbling together short-term make-work projects. That was the traditional approach to job creation.

While the quick-fix has at times provided monetary comfort, the relief experienced has too often proven ephemeral and fleeting. Instead, we have adopted a different long-term strategy, a strategy that addresses unemployment and labour market dislocations with an eye to establishing prolonged stability.

I would like to point out to the hon. member that if he carefully examines our programs and policies, he will quickly see that the training we provide is relevant to local conditions and he will find that our training efforts are designed to produce permanent jobs that are in demand now and will be in the future.

I am proud to state unequivocally that the federal government has provided consistent leadership in helping Canadians prepare for the labour market of the 1990s. In September 1985 we launched the Canadian Jobs Strategy after intensive consultation with the provinces, business and labour. Since then this strategy has helped more than 400,000 people each year receive the training they need for tomorrow's jobs.

Unlike previous programs, the Canadian Jobs Strategy is decentralized, relying on people who understand local conditions to come up with solutions that best suit their needs. It places an emphasis on co-operation with the private sector at the local level and offers a mix of tools and programs that has provided a unique and integrated approach to the labour market.

Within the Canadian Jobs Strategy, there is the necessary flexibility and range of activities to allow the government to address the specific needs of the sector identified in this motion: community based enterprises, the arts and culture sector, social and voluntary services.

To point to the arts sector by way of example, there is room within the CJS to support the Dance Transition Centre and a musical performance program. Best of all, CJS has an excellent record in helping those who are on the margins of the labour force and who are most in need. Because of this, I can assure my colleague that our work through the Canadian Jobs Strategy will continue.

Although we recognize the importance of maintaining the income support benefits of the unemployment insurance program, we are still moving toward more active programs of skill development and relevant career training. For example, with Bill C-21 we propose to make the unemployment insurance system more flexible and to use UI moneys to help claimants get back to work faster. That is what Canadians want most.

• (1520)

Last spring we announced a Labour Force Development Strategy that builds on CJS and places a major emphasis on skill development and employment training. The Labour Force Development Strategy is a comprehensive, wide-ranging formula for improving the function of Canada's labour force, and it contains measures geared specifically to help communities found in areas such as the one the hon. member represents.

These measures include strengthening the Community Futures Program and the Industrial Adjustment Service, or IAS. Both programs will receive additional financing under the Labour Force Development Strategy. Community Futures, for example, will see its 1990-1991 budget increase by $50 million to $198 million, while the Industrial Adjustment Service allocation is being doubled from $15 million to $30 million.

I would like to point out that IAS, the Industrial Adjustment Service, has inspired countries from all over the globe. Recently a delegation from Hungary visited Employment and Immigration Canada's headquarters to learn more directly how IAS operates. The Americans have also turned to us for guidance. They searched the world for an effective, industrial adjustment program, and the one they finally settled on was ours.

Once again, in human resource development, we are leading the way, but the task of building a labour force of tomorrow is not ours alone. It also involves the efforts and the co-operation of business, industry and labour. All these major sectors must be willing to make a major investment in Canadian workers if we are to remain relevant in the international economic arena.

Canadian workers are well aware of the importance of training in today's economy. In 1988, Decima did a survey and found that half the respondents said that they would reduce their wage demands in return for additional training.

In conclusion, our challenge is to address this desire to learn and upgrade skills. I believe that the Labour Force Development Strategy will meet this challenge. It is instituting an unprecedented level of co-operation among business, labour and the government in the interests of building a competitive and relevant labour force. We want everyone to take advantage of the many new opportunities that the Labour Force Development Strategy offers. I am confident Canada will grow and prosper in the next century because of the commitment that we and our partners are ready to make today.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to talk on this topic today.

I was interested in the motion that the hon. member from Prince Albert—Churchill River proposed. I have to say that I was disappointed that he did not spend as much time talking about culture and the arts as I expected. He diverted quite a bit into the whole political spectrum of megaprojects and other forms of economic assistance to the various communities and regions of our country.

I can divert, for a couple of seconds, by indicating that it is not a matter of making choices between megaprojects for Newfoundland or any other region, but in place of municipal programs it is a matter of a wise and judicious balance between the two. The regions of Canada have legitimate aspirations whether it is us in British Columbia, the people from the good province of Saskatchewan with their aspirations, or the people from the maritimes with their real needs now and their aspirations.

What the member was alluding to was the current bill and the plans the government has to try to provide assistance to that region's aspirations, and I think quite legitimately. Any government that does not consider the needs and the wants of the regions of Canada is one that is going to be in trouble. Equally, of course, the aspirations of the communities of this country must be considered. The area I represent, Cariboo—Chilcotin, is comprised of many of these small communities. It is essential that we as a government and as members of parliament keep in mind what those aspirations are and make sure that we balance the dollars, our time and our attention with those needs.

Obviously government cannot provide everything for everybody. Somebody in my riding said the other day that it is only children and socialists who feel that we can have all of the goodies and not pay the price. Obviously, if we want the goodies we have to pay the price. Government, especially government in these times, is a body that has to make very difficult choices. All we can do is hope we are making wise choices and decisions, all of which must be fiscally responsible.

But heaven protect any government or any member of parliament who, in his eagerness to establish the economic base that is necessary, forgets that we have to be fed and clothed before we can really enjoy an art show, watch a presentation in a theatre or enjoy a hockey game. The government must spend the predominance of its time ensuring that the basic economic strength of our communities and our regions is solid and strong, that the people are working and that their basic needs are met.

Once they are met and we ignore for any length of time whatsoever the needs of the cultural and artistic communities or the interest in their communities, we do so at our peril. I made a mistake in one meeting with a constituent who I hope will become a very good friend. She felt that I was not paying due attention to her interest area which was the arts. She is a very artistic lady and spends untold hours daily and weekly in supporting the artistic endeavours of her community.

She took me on and did so quite properly, to make sure I understood that the needs of that community were real and, more important, that job opportunities, vacancies and potential in those areas were real. I have to admit that I had not given attention to it prior to that meeting. Since then I have been astounded by the many opportunities that exist, the economic incentives and push that the arts and culture communities perform in the Canadian economy. Listening to the debate today I have gained a perspective of several other members in this area.

What we are talking about in the arts and culture community are more than 185,000 people currently working there. They make their living in the performing arts, theatre, music, opera, dance and the visual arts. One that is very important to my area of the country is the heritage sector. Quite often we do not think of this as being one of the cultural artistic areas but it is. It is composed of our museums, galleries, archives and libraries.

Then there is the high-tech sector. Of course high tech is very in at the present time and, despite the added emphasis now on television, we cannot forget the radio to which a person my age has spent so many hours listening. It is still an effective medium, not only for broadcasters but in particular for the performances of music and artistic expression.

• (1530)

There are many people in my Chilcotin wilderness who use their battery radios to tune in to the only station where they can get their dose of arts and culture, or after their basic needs have been satisfied through the CBC air waves and the many fine programs that are put on over the radio and on television.

Another area that is fairly important to the Cariboo—Chilcotin is that of crafts. It is one that I have not heard mentioned here today, but to our aboriginal peoples it is one that is going to become more and more important. It will be important for the government to make sure that we give full consideration to and understand the potential of this area. It is not just in their carving and their art. There is a huge market developing now for the art work.

On a recent trip to Asia, I noticed that business people who have an appreciation for art were commenting on how in at least the larger cities of Asia they were starting to show a greater appreciation for the aboriginal art from Canada, as well as from the United States. They now have carvings and jewellery that are not only beautiful but are creating a meaningful livelihood for so many of the artists who can communicate through that medium. We are seeing more and more of their native dancing and their native theatres. I am sure that form of participation and development in our native aboriginal communities will continue to be a major factor in the arts and culture of Canada.

Arts and culture are not just in the big cities, even though we tend to think of seeing ballet in the major cities and symphony orchestras perform principally in the major cities. The small communities of Canada are also recipients of the efforts of the people who work in arts and culture.

On one of my recent trips home—actually it was in Quesnel—there was a visiting group from Montreal, a fine francophone group of musicians, world-renowned percussionists who were performing for the people of the Quesnel area. This was in the Cariboo, the hinterland of Canada. One of the artists was commenting on it. He said: "All of the world-renowned artists play in Paris, in New York, in Montreal, in Hong Kong, all of the major centres". He singled us out in Quesnel and said: "We feel unique because very few of those world-renowned artists have played in Quesnel." We did appreciate it in Quesnel, and one of the benefits that the Government of Canada is able to provide to the small communities is to assist in such endeavours.

On a closing note, I will add that in small towns and big towns in Canada 13.5 million people have been participating in the arts and cultural community. There are more funds brought in from people watching the arts than the total for professional hockey, professional football, as well as baseball.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

The House resumed from Monday, December 11, 1989, consideration of the motion of Mr. Althouse:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing measures to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act to include coverage for producers who feed their own grain to their livestock; and the amendment of Mr. Funk:

That the motion be amended by adding immediately after the words "Western Grain Stabilization Act" the following:

"and Agricultural Stabilization Act'.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Mackenzie and the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River on the matter of making it possible for farmers to be covered under the Western Grain Stabilization Act or the Agricultural Stabilization Act for grain that they grew and fed to their own livestock, particularly cattle and hogs.

I have read in Hansard what members from all parties had to say during the debate. I must say that I found those who spoke, in the main from the government side, did all kinds of talking around the subject matter, but did not examine what it is that the agricultural industry wants and for what has been asking for a long time.

• (1310)

One must remind the House that the following support this kind of move: the Canadian Pork Council, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, the Ontario Cattlemen's Association, the chicken producers, the egg producers marketing board, milk marketing board, pork producers marketing board, sheep marketing agency, turkey producers, the three prairie wheat pools, and the UPA of the province of Quebec which is probably the largest farm organization in all of Canada, as well as many groups and individuals.

In March 1988, Mr. Kraft, a University of Manitoba economist, in his study on income stabilization and eligibility of farm-fed grain recommended that either the WGS or the red meat stabilization formula could accommodate farm-fed grain. The policy choices would be to change the grains programs to a production based qualification from the current marketing qualifications, or to modify the red meat stabilization formula to account for the costs of producing grain rather than just buying grain.

It makes no sense to allow the farmer full credit for the cost of the grain he purchased from a neighbour, feed grain dealer, or the Canadian Wheat Board. He is covered for the full cost of that, but he is not covered for the cost of grain he raises on his own farm and feeds to his hogs or cattle. That is something worse even than an anomaly. It would seem to me that that is totally unfair.

Let me quote from a letter from the Canadian Pork Council dated September 22, 1988, which states:

It is our view that grain should be treated no differently if it happens to be marketed through a livestock operation on the same farm rather than sold through commercial channels, which can include sales to other domestic livestock operations. All grain, whether immediately sold or fed to livestock, incurs the same basic costs. Growing grain and feeding hogs, for example, should be regarded as distinctly separate activities just as feeding hogs and feeding cattle within the same enterprise structure are treated as being unconnected for purposes of stabilization coverage for either of these two commodities.

The letter further states:

The Canadian Pork Council is advocating that immediate steps be taken to correct this inequity, and to include farm-fed grain in all current (which includes programs for the 1986-87 and the 1987-88 crops) and future grain stabilization programs.

In eastern Canada, grain produced and consumed on farms equals total sales off the farm and in western Canada it represents 20 per cent of all production. That is a lot of grain.

Excluding the farm-fed grain from qualifying under the Agricultural Stabilization Act or the Western Grain Stabilization Act, and not accounting for grain production costs in the red meat stabilization programs, has removed a portion of farm income derived from farm-fed grain from the farm income stabilization programs.

The policy choices to include the farm-fed component in stabilization are either to change the grain programs to a production based qualification from the marketing qualifications, or modify the red meat stabilization formula to account for the costs of producing grain rather than just buying feed grain. The policy change requires either the grains or the red meat stabilization programs be modified, but not both.

I know it was alleged that some cattle or hog producers would be collecting twice. We submit that it is done under one program or the other, but not both.

A production based grain stabilization program would require farmers to register the land producing each crop. The land must be assigned at productivity rating and stabilization payments would be triggered whenever the moving average support level of income was not attained.

Stabilization income levels would change from year to year because of crop prices and operation costs, but they would not be related to current crop yields or sales. Participants in a crop production based stabilization program would pay a premium when it was due. They would pay the premium when they were registering their land and their crop base.

Pay-out support levels would be dependent upon the premiums and contributions from government. All grain and oilseeds for which sufficient information on yields, prices and costs exist, should qualify for the production based programs.

Much of the information required for a crop production based stabilization program is currently used and processed by the provincial crop insurance corporations. Administration of crop production based stabilization programs would merely extend the responsibilities of the crop insurance administration rather than change the nature of their work.

In fact, I have long felt that the provincial crop insurance programs, and there are a few federal programs, should be integrated so that there would only be one administration cost. It would probably be a quicker and more efficient treatment of the producers who are supposed to benefit.

Incorporating grain production costs into the red meat stabilization formula could be accomplished by either having two formulae or one with a weighted average which recognizes the share of grain produced and fed on farms. The two-formula approach recognizes that some livestock operations purchase most of their feed requirements while others produce their own feed. The two-formula approach allows the participants to elect which procedure best represents their cost structure.

• (1320)

The motion of my hon. friend for Mackenzie corrects what I consider to be more than an anomaly. It is unfair. I would hope that all members, in the desire that we all have to do more about stabilizing and enlarging the income of our agricultural producers, would be anxious to pass this motion which only asks the government to "consider", and does not require the government to do anything. It gives them a sense of what the House of Commons feels, that they should consider what the motion of my hon. friend says, then the government could reply and report back to the House of Commons.

I hope that all members will support both the amendment and the motion submitted by the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to enter this debate. The issue which we are discussing is certainly an important one. Farm-fed grain plays a significant role in our agriculture economy. About half of Canada's cereal crops, with the exception of wheat, are fed to livestock. The promotion of farm-fed grains is even higher in the maritimes. There, even when wheat is included, about 30 per cent of the crops are fed on farms.

Farmers across the country are concerned because the role which farm-fed grain plays in the agricultural economy is not acknowledged in stabilization programs. In some livestock support programs, the price of grain is included in the formula for triggering payments. Therefore, when grain prices go up, support prices for livestock go up.

Livestock support programs do not take the cost of producing farm-fed grain into account. If the price of grain stays the same but grain production costs increase, the high cost of growing grain is not reflected in payments through livestock support programs.

This is an important issue, but it cannot be considered in isolation. Right now, the federal government is undertaking an extensive review of all agricultural policies and programs in consultation with farm organizations and the provinces. The way that farm-fed grain is included in the farm safety net must be discussed in the broad context of that policy review.

At first glance, including farm-fed grain in the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act seems like a simple way to provide income protection for farmers who feed grain to their livestock. Let us take a closer look at the issue. Changing the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act to include farm-fed grain has a number of implications for both grain and livestock farmers.

First of all, some programs already include part of the costs of producing farm-fed grain. The dairy program is one example. If farm-fed grain were included in the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act, some farmers would be compensated twice for the same grain.

This was a point which the Standing Committee on Agriculture emphasized in its January, 1986 report on the Western Grain Stabilization Act. The committee concluded:

> It should be only for the final products marketed that the producer receives market protection under the Western Grain Stabilization Act or the Agricultural Stabilization Act. In the case of livestock producers, they face the livestock market but not the grain market risk. Treating livestock producers as grain producers means the grain may be covered in the raw form and again as it goes into the final product.

That is what the committee stated. Beyond that, including farm-fed grain in the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act would mean changing the fundamental structure of these programs. Rather than being based on commercial sales, the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act would be based on production. If that were the case, the administration would have to collect yield data on every single farmer enrolled in the program. That would be a costly and impractical exercise.

In many cases, the information simply does not exist, so payments would have to be based on a regional yield average. Most farmers find this unacceptable. Farmers with yields below the regional average would be overpaid and those with higher yields would be underpaid.

Changing the basis on which payments are made could result in trading off the interests of one commodity group against the other.

Although including farm-fed grain in the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act would mean more protection for livestock farmers, it would remove the protection for grain farmers which these programs were designed to provide. Both the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act are designed to protect producers from a dramatic loss of income when they are unable to make sales.

For example, right now the Western Grain Stabilization Act is based on sales. If producers cannot make delivery, that is reflected in reduced sales and a Western Grain Stabilization Act payment can be triggered. If the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act were based on production, payments under both programs might not be triggered because of a drop in deliveries.

As a last point, including farm-fed grain in the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act would make both programs more expensive and farmers would end up footing the bill along with the federal government.

The way in which farm-fed grain is included in stabilization programs must be addressed through a comprehensive safety net program. At the national agri-food conference in December, the Minister of Agriculture announced that the National Grains Bureau would lead the consultations with industry and the provinces on developing a grain safety net program.

The committee on grain safety nets had its first meeting in January and is expected to present a proposal for consideration by agricultural ministers in the spring. Legislation should be in place by the end of the year.

We need to develop a stabilization program which will do three things: first, it must respond to the needs of the producers; second, it must have a sound financial base; and finally, it must be based on a fair cost-sharing arrangement among farmers and provincial and federal governments.

Responding to the needs of farmers means putting a program in place in which farmers make long-term plans for their operations. In recent years, the federal government has responded to declines in farm income and production with ad hoc assistance. Farmers needed that assistance. However, relying on ad hoc programs makes it difficult for farmers to manage their operations effectively.

During the national agri-food policy conference, the Minister of Agriculture announced that a government-industry task force would be set up to look at several aspects of farm management. These include the special needs of beginning farmers, the management tools farmers need, the role of lending institutions, and the effectiveness of subsidized interest rates.

Over the next six months, options will be developed in consultation with industry. Federal and provincial ministers of agriculture will look at these options at their final meeting in August, 1990. Public consultations will start in the fall.

The issue of how farm-fed grain should be included in agricultural stabilization programs is an important one. It is an issue which must be considered in the context of over-all policy review. As part of the policy review, both levels of government and the industry are now in the process of developing options for grain safety net programs. The committee on grain safety nets held its first meeting in January and will be discussing several options with the industry over the winter. By late spring the committee is expected to have recommendations to be considered by ministers and legislation will be in place by the fall.

The way in which farm-fed grain is included in grain safety nets will be discussed in the context of the over-all safety net review. I have spoken briefly about the implications of adding farm-fed grain to existing grain stabilization programs. Simply adding farm-fed grain to the Western Grain Stabilization Act or the Agricultural Stabilization Act would likely create more inequities than it would solve. That is why the issue must be discussed in the context of the overall grain safety net review. I am confident that working with farmers and with the province we can arrive at a safety net program which will satisfy the needs of farmers and their livestock industry.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to participate in this debate.

I listened with interest to the remarks of my colleague from across the way. He enumerated several problems that will occur the motion if the motion is adopted. Let me repeat that the motion asks the government to consider the advisability of introducing measures to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act to include coverage for producers who feed their grain to their livestock. The key word here is that the government should consider the advisability.

We are asking the government to study and recognize that a problem exists now. Producers of red meat products who grow their own feed and grain are in a disadvantaged position compared to those producers who purchase their feed. The system discriminates, perhaps unconsciously, against one type of producer compared to his neighbour.

Theoretically, there are ways around this. Neighbours could start selling the grains they grow to each other but I do not think we want to encourage any more games to be played. Often when I go into the rural area of my constituency farmers tell me that it is not enough to know the ins and outs of growing a crop. Now they have to become experts at the various government programs. These anomalies in the existing program and legislation are forcing farmers to become like high-priced tax accountants in order to learn how to play the system.

Our motion asks the government to first recognize the problem and then give some commitments to working with members of the House and members of the agricultural community to find ways and means by which we can solve the problems that we are facing. In a nutshell, that is the purpose of the motion.

I appeal to members of the government to support our motion. It is not a motion that condemns the government in any way. I believe it is a motion that government members should have no difficulty supporting because it is presented in the spirit of trying to improve agriculture in this country and help our farmers. I hope that government members will see it as such and will support the motion.

Let me also say just a few words about the state of agriculture back home. During the Christmas break I visited many of the rural communities in my riding of Regina—Qu'Appelle.

I had the time to go into the local cafes, to sit in the booths, to drink gallons of coffee, and to talk with members of the farming community, people from the small towns I was visiting. I must say that I have never experienced such a psychological depression as what exists in rural Saskatchewan today. There is a sense of hopelessness, a sense of helplessness, a sense that nobody out there is listening to their concerns, let alone being able to do anything about it.

I find the type of fatalism that exists out there today extremely saddening. I talked with young farmers who were working land that had belonged to their family for generations. They have a sense of hopelessness and just shrugged their shoulders and said: "Well, Mr. de Jong, what can I do any more? We are totally in debt. We are totally uncertain as to what types of government programs and types of assistance there will be to keep us on the land".

I was shown old newspaper articles with the cost of wheat 10 or 20 years ago. In fact it is not much higher today and in many cases even lower. The cost of production in the last decade or two has soared. There is a sense that it is just not going to work any more. They wonder why they are out there struggling, trying to make ends meet, when they see no light at the end of the tunnel. This Parliament has must address those problems.

In conclusion, the farming community needs some help. It needs help from this Parliament. It needs some understanding and co-operation in developing policies of mutual interest so that the farming community in this country will not go down the drain.

Accepting this resolution is a small but significant indication to our farmers that this Parliament is interested in their concerns and will rise above our partisan interests. The effort by my colleagues who have moved this motion is an effort of co-operation with the government to find a solution to this problem. I hope the government will accept it and, in doing so, will send out a signal to the farmers that this Parliament is willing to work together to find solutions to their problems.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I pleased to speak to the motion this afternoon. We are all aware of the problems Canadian grain farmers face. The financial squeeze which began gripping farmers in the middle of the decade has not yet loosened. Export subsidy battles fought by others on the world grain markets have depressed the prices Canadian farmers get for their grain. Until there is some further progress made in the trade talks through the GATT, or unless there are production problems in major grain growing regions, the situation will remain uncertain.

In recent years dealing with problems brought on by low commodity prices has meant relying to a large extent on ad hoc government programs for support. In 1986 and 1987 the federal government provided farmers with a total of $2.1 billion through the Special Canadian Grains Program. In 1988 the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program paid out $850 million to farmers who suffered crop losses because of the severe drought.

We cannot continue to rely on ad hoc government assistance. There must be a better way in place to provide protection to grain and oilseed producers. This government has set out to find that better way. It began last year with changes to crop insurance plans. Coverage was increased in 1989. As a result of that increased coverage the revamped crop insurance programs in 1989 provided farmers with more coverage than in the previous year.

• (1340)

For example, the 1988 crop insurance payments for wheat on stubble in Saskatchewan ranged from about $32 to $53 an acre, depending on the risk area. In 1989, coverage for the same risk areas ranged from about $50 to $85 per acre.

In 1988, a southeastern Saskatchewan farmer, who grew a crop of wheat on summer fallow would have been eligible for about $60 an acre in crop insurance. On top of this, the same farmer would also have received about $14 an acre from the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program. The maximum coverage for that farmer would have been approximately $75 an acre.

After changes to crop insurance in 1989, that same farmer would have been eligible for about $94 an acre from crop insurance alone. Producers in Alberta and Manitoba were also eligible for more coverage through crop insurance alone in 1989 than they were able to collect from drought assistance and crop insurance in 1988.

The changes to crop insurance protection was a first step. Now this government is moving on the development of a national safety net program for all grain and oilseed producers. It seems inappropriate at this time to be tinkering with individual programs like the WGSA and the ASA. We have to look at this issue in a broader context.

At the National Agri-Food Policy Conference in Ottawa in December, it was agreed there is an urgent need to help develop a national safety net program that is fair to all grain and oilseed producers. Work on this issue is being undertaken as part of the federal government's national agricultural policy review. It was announced at the conference that the national grains bureau in Winnipeg would take the lead in working to develop a national grain safety net program.

This task will include the involvement of provincial governments and those industry representatives in developing a proposal. Meetings are under way this month. It is expected that a proposal should be ready by late spring with enabling legislation developed by December 1990.

The federal government is moving quickly on this issue. The farm income problems projected for the next year must be taken into account. There is also a need to ensure that action taken now is in line with the longer term goals as safety nets are developed for all farmers.

Part of the review, of course, is the examination of existing safety net programs. The advisory committee of the western grain stabilization program has been asked to examine issues surrounding the potential transition of the WGSA to a more comprehensive safety net program.

This government is moving on the issue. In fact, progress has been made. The existing federal-provincial working group on safety nets is continuing the work it began in 1988. Its key objective is to develop a long term comprehensive safety net policy for all commodities and all farmers.

A series of regional meetings were held during 1988 among all farm leaders across Canada and government to help identify the problems which exist with existing safety net programs and determine the direction that would be taken for agriculture in the future.

Subsequently, the National Grains Bureau in Winnipeg developed a number of grain safety options which were presented to farm leaders. The work of the National Grains Bureau on safety nets is continuing. Continued discussion with farm leaders across Canada with other government members is continuing to work out a program for agriculture. As a government we are working out a comprehensive program which is fair to all producers across Canada. It will have a sound financial base for Canadian farmers which they require at this time.

This government has taken action and will continue to take action to ensure that agriculture is protected across this great land. We feel that it is appropriate for this government to continue to discuss with the farm leaders the future of agriculture, combining crop insurance and some safety net programs. We are continuing working with that to develop protection for producers.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak briefly on the motion that is before us from the NDP. I would just like to make a few comments and explain to the House an experience that I had last Friday which I think is indicative of the situation that we have in the agriculture community at the present time.

Last Friday I took the opportunity to attend one of the largest, if not the largest, farm machinery equipment shows in Canada that takes place each year in February in Toronto. From my previous experience as an active farmer-producer I met many acquaintances there who were manning the booths for the dealerships that were there. They said that the attendance at the show was excellent. That was quite evident on Friday when I was there. However, they said that they found this year probably without question the worst year as far as interest from producers is concerned. They were there to look.

On the lighter side, I can never forget my father saying that that was an excellent place to go once a year because you could see a lot of things that you could get along without. It is like going to a sportsman's show or whatever, and you could go home and appreciate what you did have at home.

They said it was very depressing that those farmer producers were simply not interested. They simply do not feel confident with the industry that they are involved in. They have seen many things happening. The interest free provision of the advance payment for crops removed. It was a management tool that they have used.

The basic improvements to the crop insurance bill are all well and good, but they are saying that because there has not been a tripartite type of program put in place with a three-way split on the premiums that the risks are going up and the premiums are going to be so high for that extra extent on the risk that they are probably not going to be able to afford it. They will be no better off than they were in the past.

There is a problem out there and I feel that this motion is a good one. It is simply asking the government to consider those improvements. I ask the members opposite to vote in the true spirit of this motion and not oppose it just because it came from a party on this side of the House. The motion seeks nothing specific. I can tell you from past experience that the way the stabilization act works now is not fair.

A farmer who produces his own grain for consumption by his own herd of cattle or hogs is not able to take part in the stabilization program because he has to subtract what he purchased from what he sold. There is no net benefit.

However, if a farmer is the sole producer of grain, he can take part in the stabilization program. If he is a purchaser of feeds, he cannot benefit from that. What I am saying is that whether I sell as a primary producer, whether I sell to the local grain elevator, my own grain enterprise in my farming operation, my hog enterprise or my beef producing enterprise, a sale should be a sale no matter which way it goes.

At the present time the program is not fair. This motion requests that the government consider this and rather than take something away from producers, make an improvement to it. The producers are eager and willing to sit down with the government and make those suggestions.

The tripartite program is the type of program that can be protected and explained in other countries so that it is not challenged under the free trade agreement, as it has been, and we are going to have to work hard in order to do that.

In summary, I am requesting the government to vote in the spirit of this House and support this bill. The motion is asking the government to sit down and discuss this situation for the betterment of the industry which so many Canadians are involved in.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join this debate today on this important agricultural topic.

The issue of including farm-fed grain in stabilization programs is a very important one. It is an issue that cannot be considered in isolation. Including farm-fed grain in stabilization programs must be looked at in the broad context of all agricultural stabilization programs.

As you know, the federal government is undertaking a major review of all agricultural policies and programs. Any changes to the Western Grain Stabilization Program and the Agricultural Stabilization Program will be considered in the context of that review.

No farmer would want to make a decision about what he or she was going to plant on a quarter section without an understanding of the broader context of the future of that farm. I suggest that members of the House should keep that in mind. This government is looking at the over-all strategy and the whole Canadian farm sector before making a specific decision about one aspect of it.

The first step in the review process was the release of the discussion paper "Growing Together" last November 7. In that paper the federal government identified four pillars on which our vision for agriculture rests. They are market responsiveness, greater self-reliance in the agri-food sector, a national policy which recognizes regional diversity and increased environmental sustainability.

The next step was the national agri-food policy conference in Ottawa in December. Over 1,800 people representing farmers, processors, consumers and other groups with a stake in the agricultural industry attended that conference.

During the policy conference a series of panel discussions on seven key issues were held. Now we are in the process of following up on those discussions. Task forces have been established in a number of areas, including market development and value-added, farm finance and management, safety nets, supply management, transportation, food safety and sustainable agriculture.

This is how farm safety nets fit into that over-all global picture. A federal-provincial working group on farm safety nets was in place before the policy review started last fall. That group will continue its work. Their objective is to develop a long-term comprehensive safety net program for all commodities and for all farmers. The group will prepare an interim report to be given to federal and provincial agricultural ministers at their annual meeting. In the fall of this year the group will consult with farm groups and other interested parties.

In addition to the working group on farm safety nets a special, committee has been established to look specifically at the question of grain safety nets. The committee was established after the policy conference in December. It has been set up because this government recognizes that grain and oilseeds farmers are likely to face some very serious income problems in the coming year.

We need to develop proposals to assist these farmers immediately. These proposals must fit within a national program framework. The Minister of Agriculture has asked the National Grains Bureau to lead the consultation with industry and with the provinces. That process is already under way. The committee had its first meeting in Winnipeg during the second week of January. That committee is expected to present a proposal to ministers for a grain safety net program by late spring. Proposed legislation should be submitted by the end of the year.

This is where the issue we are discussing today fits in. If we are going to make changes in the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agriculture Stabilization Act then we must consider these changes in the context of the review of grain safety nets and of all farm safety nets which is taking place now.

Including farm-fed grain and stabilization programs is a longstanding and significant issue for farmers all across the country. The cost of producing grain to feed livestock is not fully taken into account in livestock stabilization programs or in grain income stabilization programs.

The member for Regina—Qu'Appelle asked the government to consider specific changes to the WGSA and the ASA. Looking at the whole picture of agriculture, this government is considering adaptations necessary to face the future in all aspects of agriculture. Growing Together is not just a question of making speeches, it is a commitment to agriculture, a commitment to producers and a commitment to people in the agri-food sector to take action over the course of the next year or two.

We invite the opposition to participate in that process in a constructive manner. Simply including farm-fed grain in the WGSA and the ASA may not be the best answer. In fact, taking this step could create a whole new set of inequities and perhaps a return to the business of ad hoc government programs. We need to have a sense of the over-all context.

First of all, some stabilization programs such as the dairy program already include the cost of farm-fed grain. If these costs were included in WGSA and ASA some producers would be overcompensated. Second, including farm-fed grain in WGSA and ASA would make a fundamental change in the basis of these programs. Right now both of these programs are based on commercial sales. If farm-fed grain were included in both programs then these programs would have to be based on production rather than on sales. This would add a whole new dimension to the administration of these programs.

Members opposite might want to increase the administrative burden for farmers and the administrative cost to taxpayers. I can assure you that members on this side do not. If both programs were based on production, the administration would have to collect yield data for individual farmers. In many cases this information simply would not be available. Both WGSA and ASA would have to be administered on the basis of regional yields. I do not have to remind members of the difficulties we ran into when we established the recent drought assistance program on that sort of basis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(3) the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to S.O. 31.

NELSON MANDELA

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's release of Nelson Mandela was an occasion for world-wide rejoicing. Having spent 28 years in prison for leading South Africa's black national movement, Mr. Mandela personally became a symbol of the terrible injustices inherent in his country's white supremacy laws.

In South Africa, as in nations of eastern Europe, we have witnessed events in recent weeks that many felt could not occur in our lifetime. Much credit must go to President de Klerk who has demonstrated an enlightened outlook and the courage to accelerate change. Yesterday did not by any means mean the end of apartheid, but it was, we must hope and pray, the beginning toward the end of this abhorrent system.

Today we must encourage South Africa to continue this new and difficult course and do all we can to help that nation achieve a future in which every one of its people can participate.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased and heartened to inform the House that this morning Parliament lit the way to a cleaner environment with Operation Super Bulb. Some 1,200 energy efficient light bulbs were presented to the Speaker by three Canadian companies: Philips Electronics Ltd., General Electric Canada and Sylvania.

One bulb will be distributed to each member of Parliament and senator for use in his or her office and to 800 House of Commons employees for a home efficiency survey. These bulbs produce the same amount of light as an ordinary bulb but use only 20 per cent of the energy.

Reducing energy demand means less burning of fossil fuels and lower emissions of carbon dioxide, the main contributor to greenhouse gases and global warning. Each of these bulbs, so members will understand when they get one, over its lifetime can reduce carbon dioxide emissions by up to one tonne.

I hope this will be only a first step to Parliament and all government operations becoming leading lights in the preservation of the world's environment.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the recent advisory council report to the Minister of the Environment says that the country is out of balance. The regions of Canada are being devastated by a wide range of government policies and programs, including cuts to regional development programs, cuts to provinces for health care, social welfare and education, cuts to the unemployment insurance program, cuts to VIA Rail, and the postponement of the Polar 8 contract.

Provinces like British Columbia get shortchanged on virtually every federal program that exists and it is quickly becoming a forgotten part of Canada. As a result of being abused and ignored by the government, a petition campaign is beginning to circulate in British Columbia to find out whether British Columbians wish to separate from the rest of Canada. The organizers say the high taxes of this government, coupled with its recent initiative on the 7 per cent goods and services tax, was the final straw.

Where is the federal government's leadership for nation building? When will the west and British Columbia in particular get their fair share? When will their views and concerns be recognized by this federal government? The government's cavalier attitude toward raising taxes and cutting services to the regions only exacerbates the growing tensions and frustrations.

The budget provides an opportunity for this government to demonstrate compassion and understanding for all of Canada, for if next week's budget reflects past attitudes and behaviours, including ignoring British Columbia, I am afraid that the embers of western alienation and separation could be fanned into ignition.

MUSEUMS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the proposed fossil museum in Parrsboro, Nova Scotia will provide a showcase for displaying some of the world's oldest and most unique fossils found nearby on the shores of Parrsboro and Joggins.

Recent palaeontology finds have been described by the National Geographic Society as the biggest fossil find in North America and include over 100,000 pieces of bones of sharks, dinosaurs, lizards, crocodiles and insects, including one of the oldest fossilized insects ever found in the world. They are so plentiful that even I can find them.

Many of these rare fossils are now being trucked to the United States for examination, but when completed the museum will allow the research to be done on site in Nova Scotia. Not only will this museum serve the scientific community. It will be the foundation of a tourist industry in an area of high unemployment and few options.

The project requires participation from the municipality, the province, the private sector and the federal government. All are now firmly committed except for the federal government.

Although the Minister of Communications has given his complete support and assurance that funding will be made available, he will need the support of other ministers. I urge again that they all support this very genuine and much needed project.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, student aid in this country is in one terrible mess and the problem is that the government has not been updating the criteria which determine the amount of living allowance students can claim and the amount that parents are expected to contribute.

Until 1984 the criteria were updated annually but have been frozen since then. As a result students are expected to live on the same amount in 1990 as they were in 1984–85. Parents are expected to make contributions based on today's income, but allowances and exemptions for income have not changed for six years.

This means that parents are expected to make substantially higher contributions to their children's education than they would if the policy prior to 1984–85 were still being followed. If the freeze continues this is going to get worse.

I am concerned that the time is fast coming when we will back to the old business of having to have a rich parent in order to get a university education, and we cannot allow that to happen.

FUR INDUSTRY

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, the fur industry plays a significant part in our Canadian economy. It is about a $1 billion industry that supports well over 100,000 Canadians, the majority of whom are in northern communities.

It was good to see this past weekend in nine cities across Canada hundreds of people, including over 300 in the city of Toronto, marching in support of this important industry. These Canadians were marching for the rights of trappers, ranchers, retailers and the public to enjoy our quality fur products and the economic activities generated from them.

I must agree with Mr. Del Haylock of the Fur Council of Canada when he stated that the industry had been a victim of misinformation by a small group of radicals. Judging by the numbers who made Canada Fur Appreciation Day a success, there are many Canadians who are fed up with the half-truths of the anti-fur campaign.

We can be proud of the Canadian fur industry and its humane trapping and ranching methods, methods that are the best in the world. Our Canadian fur product is indeed something to be boasted about.

NELSON MANDELA

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): He is free, Mr. Speaker. Nelson Mandela has walked out of a South African prison but remains a captive of a wicked regime. A gracious man to his jailers, Mandela called President de Klerk a man of courage, but was quick to add that "negotiations cannot take place above the heads or behind the backs of our people".

Nelson Mandela challenged President de Klerk to prepare the proper climate for negotiations between the white minority and the black majority. He called on de Klerk to lift the state of emergency in South Africa and for the release of all political prisoners.

Nelson Mandela also called on the international community to continue sanctions on South Africa. Nelson Mandela says he is prepared to die for the ideal of a democratic and a free society in which all persons live together in harmony and with equal opportunity.

Apartheid has no future in South Africa. Amandla awatu.

NELSON MANDELA

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, over the weekend my daughter called me from 1,000 miles away, both sobbing and laughing with the soulful joy that Mandela was free.

Yes, the whole world rejoiced, and none more deeply than the black people of South Africa for whom the struggle has been both long and brutal and for whom we must remind ourselves it is far from ended.

But my daughter's deeply emotional response reminds us of the wider meaning of the struggle in South Africa, that it is fundamentally a part of the continuum of the black struggle against the legacies of slavery, colonialism and racism of which all of us of African origin are a part. Nelson Mandela is therefore the bearer of the flame of black aspirations once borne by Martin Luther King that one day the necessity of mutual love and equality for all humankind must order human affairs.

Canada's role in the struggle has been both noble and principled as have been the contributions of many. None, however, have sacrificed more than the South African people.

But let us not forget the critical role of black Americans. They brought focus to the issue of South Africa. It was they who forced sanctions upon an unwilling American administration that ultimately was so critical in bringing about the change that we have seen.

All of this, in turn, was made possible by the black struggle of which Mandela is now the leader.

RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, following a decision handed down on January 31, 1990, by the Canadian Transport Commission, CN will not be allowed to abandon operations on the Franquet–Chapais line in the Chapais subdivision. On March 12, 1986, at the request of Mr. Denis Lamarche, then president of the Senneterre Chamber of Commerce, we reacted strongly against CN's attitude to the Abitibi–Chapais area.

Special thanks go to Michel Champoux, Jacques Pelletier, Jacques Ruel and Daniel Morin from the Quebec Department of Transport, Florien Grenier of Sullivan, for the video, and all parties who testified at the hearings of the Canadian Transport Commission.

Today, I want to ask the people in Abitibi–Chapais and CN management in Montreal, Quebec City and Senneterre to get ready for the reopening of this section of the railway network.

Mr. Speaker, I dedicate this victory to CN employees in Abitibi–Chapais, to the wives and children of those employees and to one of our friends who died during the dispute with CN, our friend, Bob Langlois.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, the government has long been citing job creation statistics and boasting of its record. For a while Canadians accepted this rhetoric.

Well, they do not accept this government's rhetoric any more. A press release issued last week by the Ontario government clearly shows the reality of our economy today.

According to the provincial labour ministry, a total of 17,526 people were laid off in 1989. This is the highest number of workers laid off in one year since the recession of 1982.

It is also important to note that this total would be even higher if lay-offs involving fewer than 50 employees were included.

During the recession of 1982 there were partial closings and production slowdowns. In 1989 that was not the case. These jobs are gone and no doubt we will see more of the same in 1990. Canadians across this land can see, hear and feel the results of the government's gross mismanagement of our economy.

AUTO PACT

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, this year marks the silver anniversary of the auto pact. This agreement between Canada and the United States has become crucial to the livelihood of many Canadians.

It is interesting to note that the auto pact was not immediately seen as a saviour of jobs in Canada. As was the case during the free trade debate, many well intentioned but pessimistic people denounced the auto pact as the beginning of the end of the Canadian automobile industry. Time has since proven, however, that the signing of this agreement was critical to the stability and growth that Ontario's economy has enjoyed over the last 25 years.

There are glaring similarities between the protests of 1965 and those during the election of 1988. Those who are afraid of progress, seemingly intimidated by the United States, claimed the auto pact would mean the end of the industry in Canada. Obviously Ontario's economy has reaped huge benefits from the auto pact and will do likewise under the free trade agreement.

EL SALVADOR

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sadness and horror that I rise today to speak of a bombing raid by the Salvadoran air force on a refugee resettlement area. The bombing in Corral de Piedra resettlement site in the north of El Salvador left at least 20 injured and 6 people dead; 5 of those 6 were children. To add insult to injury, Salvadoran military infantry platoons walked into the village afterward and refused to help the injured.

These refugees lived for years in the Mesa Grande camp in southern Honduras where I assisted them to overcome the horrors of a terrifying flight from El Salvador. They were very recently guaranteed safety in returning to their homeland. Two weeks ago a Canadian fact finding mission went to El Salvador and the delegation was given assurances by the United Nations Human Rights Commission officials and Salvadoran government officials that these refugees would be safe.

The Canadian government must speak out. There is no excuse for the bombing of the civilians in this resettlement project, only callous disregard for the lives and the safety of innocent victims.

I implore this government to use every method, including our OAS and UN Security Council membership to guarantee the safety of refugees and resettlement projects and to bring about an immediate ceasefire and negotiated settlement in El Salvador.

OPEN SKIES CONFERENCE

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, throughout 1989 the world watched as the walls of communism and oppression broke down across eastern Europe. Now, in 1990, the world is watching the East and the West begin building a new foundation of freedom and prosperity.

Today in Ottawa an historic chapter in that process is unfolding. Representatives from 23 NATO and Warsaw Pact nations have gathered in Canada to negotiate a treaty which will permit unarmed surveillance flights over each other's territory. An open skies treaty will help foster peaceful understanding and co-operation and lead to more stable relations between all nations.

Canadians can be proud of the role that our country is playing in helping to put an end to the cold war once and for all.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on behalf of all Canadians in regions outside of Ottawa who will not be treated equally when it comes to the availability of budget documents on February 20.

The Minister of Finance has indicated that budget documents will be available only in Ottawa on budget day and will be made available the following day across Canada. This is not fair or equitable treatment to all Canadians who require this information. Private individuals and small businesses will not be able to react with the same speed as large corporations that have a presence in Ottawa.

I would like to point out to the Minister of Finance that last year's budget leak did not take place in Vancouver. It did not take place in Winnipeg. It did not take place in Montreal. It did not take place in Halifax. It took place in Ottawa.

Why is the Minister of Finance punishing people in other areas of Canada for his own lapse of security that took place in Ottawa?

SOUTH AFRICA

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a few questions for the Acting Prime Minister about certain recent international events. Like all Canadians, the members of our party are delighted with the release of Nelson Mandela and hope that this event marks the beginning of the end of the sad story of apartheid in South Africa. However, we realize that the apartheid laws are still in place, as is the state of emergency, and that these measures continue to oppress the black majority in South Africa. Nelson Mandela said yesterday, and I quote: "To lift sanctions now would be to run the risk of aborting the process towards the complete eradication of apartheid".

Will the Acting Prime Minister and his government make a commitment today that they will not lift sanctions against South Africa until the apartheid laws have been lifted and the black majority will be able to vote at all levels and take part in the political life of their country?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased the hon. gentleman asked this question and indicated his interest in this subject matter, because I think it is appropriate to say that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been very much in the forefront on this issue and have given leadership.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: They have been among the leaders in the Commonwealth and elsewhere in the campaign of the last several years to exert pressure on South Africa for internal change and for change in the system of apartheid.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs said on Sunday that before we could start to remove any sanctions we have imposed there are some things that will be clearly necessary, and they would be the removal from the statute books of laws that give effect to the apartheid system.

The Prime Minister stated last night on the CBC program, The Journal, that the South Africans would have to lift the state of emergency, to release unconditionally political prisoners, and to put entrain a negotiating process. He said with respect to sanctions that a very important opinion which would have to be ascertained before any such actions could be taken would that of Mr. Mandela.

I think that that sets out the Canadian position to which we will be adhering, and I hope that gets the support of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the move to lift sanctions will not begin until there is in place in South Africa the right to vote and the right to participate in the political process for the black majority. That was something my hon. friend did not mention.

OPEN SKIES CONFERENCE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Deputy Prime Minister or his colleague relating to new international developments.

This morning in his address to the Open Skies Conference the Prime Minister became perhaps the second last Canadian to admit, and I quote: "The cold war is over." He also said, and I quote again: "We are no longer hostage to the frozen political meteorology of suspicion and animosity".

Clearly the Prime Minister's own credibility at the Open Skies Conference is impaired while his government clings to a defence White Paper filled with cold war rhetoric.

• (1420)

Will the Prime Minister instruct the last cold warrior, the Minister of National Defence, formally to put aside the 1987 White Paper on defence and produce a new defence policy based on wide public consultation which is relevant to what is really going on in the world?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, not having the warmth of my hon. friend across the way, I guess I could accept that criticism.

As I have said earlier in the House, the White Paper was enunciated during the years 1984 to 1987. What was put into that White Paper at the time was realistic. Unfortunately we did not have the foresight to see the changes that have taken place and which we very much welcome. I cannot say to the hon. member that further changes will not take place in the world, and we hope that changes will be positive.

We are assessing our defence force structure at this time and we will continue to do so. As I said to his colleague the critic for defence and his party, I think prudence and patience at this time, as well as co-operation with our NATO allies through discussions such as Open Skies that are taking place today, will bring forward peace and security to the world.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians will be disappointed that the Minister of National Defence is not able to say forthrightly at this time that the outmoded defence White Paper of 1987 has been put aside and the government is preparing one that relates to what is going on today.

Why can the Prime Minister or his Minister of National Defence not give a straightforward answer on this point today? After all, for some time now we have been hearing about the foreign policy review being undertaken at the Department of External Affairs.

Canadians find it ironic that at a time when the countries of eastern Europe are turning to democracy and when there is a reduction of superpower tensions their own government is undertaking a major review of foreign policy behind closed doors. The Prime Minister seems to believe in open skies, but he does not believe in open government.

Will the Prime Minister instruct his Secretary of State for External Affairs to begin a new policy of review of what is going on in the world and Canada's policy in that regard, with wide public participation so that we will have a relevant approach to eastern Europe rather than outmoded rhetoric?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman must be having difficulty in finding something to oppose today, as can be seen from the questions that he is asking.

Just last week the Secretary of State for External Affairs, for whom I am deputizing today, made a major address in Montreal on revised policies he is considering as a result of the changes that have occurred in eastern Europe in the last several months.

Policy is constantly being reviewed, refurbished, renewed and produced in co-operation with other departments of the government and with the public.

I recommend to the hon. gentleman that he obtain and read closely and carefully all future speeches by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, there is total confusion among Canadian and foreign investors, following a series of conflicting statements by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Could the Minister of Finance explain to the House today exactly what his government's policy is on interest rates this week and what the government's policy will be next week, after he has brought down his Budget?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government will be the same this week as it will be next week.

We have made it very clear that we have some real concerns about the level of inflationary pressures in the economy today. They are still there, and we want to make sure that we get this inflation wrung out of the system before we see any meaningful drop in interest rates. That has been the policy we have been following for some time now.

There have been some signs in recent months of some easing in inflationary pressures. As I have said on many occasions in the past, we are not out of the woods yet. We still have a ways to go to deal with this problem so that we can avoid the mess we got into as a country when the previous government ignored the inflationary pressures in the late 1970s and early 1980s. That is the policy for this government to avoid.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the government's lack of a coherent policy is in fact causing a lot of chaos both here in Canada and on foreign market exchanges.

My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the Prime Minister. Does the government support high interest rates? Does the government support a high Canadian dollar? Does the government support the policies of the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada?

The question has to be: What was the purpose of the Prime Minister's statement last week that blew the Canadian dollar all to pieces on the international markets?

If he agrees with the policy of the government, what was the Prime Minister talking about last Friday?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think there is another indication here of the hon. member going off half cocked. If he had read the full statement of the Prime Minister he would understand that there was a clear misinterpretation by the market of a very limited, edited version of what the Prime Minister said.

The member can check the words, but the policy of the Prime Minister, the policy of the Minister of Finance and the policy of the Governor of the Bank of Canada are all the same, a very coherent policy, a very simple policy: we must get inflation down in this country and we are going to do that.

OPEN SKIES CONFERENCE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Canada is hosting the international Open Skies Conference this week, a move that could provide a landmark in co-operation and confidence building measures.

This morning the Prime Minister said that the cold war is over. However, at the same time the government persists with plans to welcome a NATO tactical fighter centre to Goose Bay, Labrador, a move that would involve the largest military expansion in Canada since the cold war days of the 1950s.

I ask the minister to explain why he is even considering this now. Why will the minister not take leadership for peace in the country and the world?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will explain to the hon. member if I could. The reason the Government of Canada is considering that as a NATO ally is that Canadian forces pilots fly more low-level sorties over Germany with a population of 58 million people than will be flown by the allies over 100,000 square miles of Canada where no one has permanent residence.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, Germany and the people of Germany have said quite clearly that they do not want the low-level flights there. Canadians are saying the same thing. The Innu are saying they know that if this centre is approved the number of low-level flights will go from 7,000 a year to 40,000 a year.

The world is changing faster than this government. We have all seen dramatic changes in eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. Has the minister done a thorough internal review of the relevance of a tactical fighter centre in Goose Bay and low-level flights? Are they still relevant and applicable in the 1990s?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as long as the men and women who serve in the Canadian forces are required to do low-level flights, they will need a place to train. As long as the NATO allies rely on low-level flights as a defensive mechanism, there will have to be training.

The offer by NATO to establish a NATO training centre has been put forward. Two countries in the alliance have said that they will attempt to accept this offer. If NATO continues to put forward the NATO tactical training base as an offer to both Turkey and Canada, we will have to assess, as we have already through the environmental impact study and through the other activities that are taking place, the options that Canada has in that case.

• (1430)

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Low-altitude flights will increase from 7,000 to 40,000 annually if Canada approves the NATO Centre.

Considering the reservations expressed by a number of experts about the impact of low-altitude flights on the environment, would the Deputy Prime Minister recommend that the Minister of National Defence stop all low altitude flights until a new, independent study is made?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can only say that the question that was asked in French will receive the same answer in English. No.

TRADE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture.

I begin by quoting his predecessor, the Hon. John Wise, who had the good sense to resign his seat before these words caught up to him. He said: "The benefits for Canadian farmers will be tremendous if we are able to negotiate a new trade deal with the United States". He went on to say: "It must be a deal which once and for all regulates technical barriers in order to prevent their use to block trade, and a deal which gives Canada more secure access to our largest agricultural market."

In the minister's own speech to the Canada Meat Council on Friday he admitted that the trade deal is a fraud and a failure. He says it has given rise to further harassment by the Americans who are in fact now supplanting Canadian markets by their export subsidy programs and thus we will need a new arsenal of weapons to tackle Americans.

Now that the minister has admitted that the free trade deal is a failure, what are he and his government going to do about it? Rather than using the rhetoric, where is the beef when it comes to getting rid of this free trade deal?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, at no time did I admit that the free trade agreement was not working. The free trade agreement is working. There is a dispute-resolving mechanism.

The fact of the matter is that we are two of the world's largest trading nations and there are bound to be problems that arise from time to time. We have a mechanism now that can resolve these particular issues.

We are simply saying that we are going to use the instruments that are available through the free trade agreement and other mechanisms that we have at our disposal to ensure that the interests of Canadian agriculture and the interests of Canadian farmers are always upheld.

What we have, and the hon. member is very much aware of this, is a trade war that is going on between the European Community and the United States of America. The European Community has been engaged in huge subsidization of grain and oilseeds. It has changed from becoming a major importer of grains to becoming the world's second largest exporter of grains. It has done it largely through the use of subsidies that have distorted world markets.

This brings into question the issue that the MTN negotiations currently under way are very important. We have to be a part of that process to ensure that the trade-distorting subsidies that are in place will be ratcheted down so that we can again achieve a more level playing field which will allow us to compete more favourably in international markets.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is a trade war being waged on the borders of this country by U.S. inspectors who are stopping meat exports from going into that country.

I think Canadian farmers will want to know specifically what the plan of action of this government is. Can the minister tell us when this government will undertake action to retaliate against the use by the United States of an increase of its Export Enhancement Program which is supplanting grain markets for Canadian farmers?

Can the minister tell us when we will take action to stop the border harassment by U.S. customs inspectors?

Will the minister tell us explicitly when he will take action to repair the bleeding away of our farm marketing boards under the yogurt and ice cream measures that were initiated by the United States?

When is this government going to stop using camouflage and smoke screens and start taking action to stop the bleeding away of the Canadian farm industry?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I find it rather strange that the hon. member gets on to this subject after I made a speech in Toronto raising the issue and indicating that we were not going to sit idly by and allow this to happen.

We are taking the initiative and there are corresponding actions that can be taken. We have advised the Americans that we will do that.

What we have seen is a willingness on the part of the administration to recognize the problem that exists. There are some difficulties they have in terms of resolving the issue.

I am confident that it will be resolved. I indicated directly to Secretary of Agriculture Yeutter and, indeed, to the Ambassador that we can always provide reciprocal action. We can do the same kind of inspections as they are doing, which would not serve the long-term interests of trade between our two countries.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, last week the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States said that we have just seen the beginning of the use of the Export Enhancement Program by increasing it by almost 300 per cent to $900 million.

Does the minister know that this is destroying our markets abroad and that it is destroying the world price for grain? Can the minister say when the government is going to invoke Article 701.4 of the free trade deal and demand that the U.S. stop harassing our markets abroad?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, not to condone the use of the Export Enhancement Program, may I just point out to the hon. member that the figure to which he is referring is really $900 million and that it is for 1991, and not 1990. The original figure asked for, for 1990, was $1 billion and Congress approved $566 million.

What we have here is clearly a signal to the European Community that unless there is some progress made at the MTN in bringing down the level of trade distorting subsidies, the price war, the trade war will continue.

It is in our interest to ensure that success and progress is made at the MTN. Clearly, Article 701 of the free trade agreement to which the hon. member refers is a possible course of action. We are examining it, plus the fact that we have made direct representations to the Americans indicating that in the process of this trade war that continues, Canada gets sideswiped in the action, as do other countries such as Australia.

Is is an urgent matter, but there are mechanisms under the free trade agreement which we believe can be useful in resolving this matter. We will use those mechanisms.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that last fall when the government accepted the GATT panel decision with regard to ice cream and yogurt that this had the potential to destroy the whole marketing board system in Canada.

What assurance can the minister give the dairy farmers of this country that when the government does propose changes to Article XI of the GATT that we will not be making proposals that will allow massive new access to our processed dairy products to the Canadian market by United States producers? What assurance can he give the industry?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the opposition is against the free trade agreement. They are against GATT. They are against trade of all kinds. It is quite obvious.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: He should be the first one to recognize that without trade we would not have much of an agricultural industry because 50 per cent of our agriculture income comes from trade.

The GATT panel that he has referred to has been accepted. We have said from day one that Article XI had to be clarified and strengthened. That has been the position of the Canadian government at the negotiating table.

We will present a formalized position, strengthening and clarifying Article XI so that it will ensure the maintenance of farm marketing boards in Canada.

Clearly, the members of the agricultural community who are involved in the marketing boards and supply management systems are satisfied with our position. Only the hon. member is not.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same subject as raised by my colleague, the member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, with the minister last week.

I want to refer to the minister's speech as reported in an article which appeared in The Toronto Star. It states:

> Mazankowski, who is also agriculture minister, said the intimidation caused by increased inspections of Canadian meat at the border crossings has to stop or Canada will begin to do the same to U.S. imports.

That is what he said. The minister is nodding.

The article states further:

> He also lashed out at American "harassment" of our pork producers. These producers face an 8-cent-per-kilogram countervailing duty on shipments exported to the U.S.
>
> And he said Canada will no longer tolerate being caught in the crossfire of the agricultural subsidy war between the United States and the European Community.

Those are tough words.

• (1440)

I will come to my question after this.

> But he told reporters that his remarks shouldn't be characterized as retaliation against the Americans.

I want to ask the minister this. Are you playing hardball or pat-a-cake? The Americans are kicking the slats out of the Canadian pork producers. The minister makes a tough speech and then you is not prepared to follow up.

Tell this House, through the Chair, Mr. Minister, whether or not you are prepared to do anything, or are you just making speeches?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is yes, we are prepared to do something.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister tell this House that he is prepared today to tell the Americans that he wants to invoke an interpretation of 701.4 right now? Is he prepared to do that right now, today?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first he was dealing with meat inspection. Then he was dealing with pork. Now he is dealing with wheat. What question does he want answered?

The fact of the matter is the article is there and maybe it is time to test it. We are considering that action.

Mr. Barrett: Pat-a-cake!

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the task force report on northern and isolated areas.

Two weeks ago the minister told me that he refuses to meet with the mayors of my riding and other ridings of northern Canada. Is he willing to reconsider his decision and, at the very least, let the program remain as is with the distance factor being the only criterion to qualify?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did indicate to my hon. friend that with the budget coming up it is very difficult to meet with a broad range of people on this particular subject. I appreciate the hon. member's interest in this. If he wishes to convey any specific suggestions to me, I will be happy to look at those.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I certainly will.

[Translation]

In December 1986, you issued a press release that contained the following statement:

The program's new provisions are fair and reasonable. They renew the commitment made by the Conservative Government to residents in the North and isolated posts.

Does the Minister intend to keep his word and honour the commitments he made to residents in Canada's North?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is well aware of the inequities that this program has had, inequities that we are trying to resolve.

We have asked the task force to come up with some proposals. Those proposals were provided by the task force last October. They are under review now. Once we have had an opportunity to have a full study of those, we will be making our decision.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, last Friday we heard the Minister of Employment and Immigration give the government's response to double digit unemployment faced by Canada's students. The response was a 35 per cent cut to the SEED program.

The Canadian Federation of Students estimates that 24,000 jobs will be affected.

Will the minister reconsider these cuts and return to the students their much needed summer jobs as they continue to struggle with higher tuition fees, an increasing debt load, escalating education costs and the future threat of the GST on their education?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I the hon. member and the Canadian Federation of Students know that the average unemployment rate among students aged 20 to 24 last year was 4.7 per cent. That is well below what it is for other people of that age group in other sectors of the population.

I have said that we will make our program sensitive to those regions where there is some higher unemployment than there is in other areas.

I remind the hon. member that in the area that is inhabited by himself and myself there were more jobs than there were young people to fill them last summer.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, when I get up in this House I speak for students throughout Canada, not merely for students in my own area.

Both post-secondary education students and high school students need much assistance. What made the minister's announcement shocking was the fact that the stay-in-school initiative channels funds away from students and gives it to useless, expensive propaganda machines and a bureaucratic maze of consultants.

I will give you some free advice—

Some hon. members: Order!

Mr. Bevilacqua: Why does the minister not give the money directly to the students, not to the bureaucrats and the various businesses which will be making money on this particular program?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do very much value the hon. member's advice. I certainly value the fact that he speaks for students from across Canada.

I would point out to them all that nobody speaks for students across Canada better than this government has.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. McDougall: I want to point out that a good part of what is happening in the stay-in-school initiative and in the Challenge program is that it is going to be very much a hands-on program. It is going to be an extension of some of the things that we have been doing now, which includes things like co-op education and other things that I think the hon. member would approve of.

It is very important for our young people that they stay in school throughout high school or they will never get to the post-secondary level. The extra education they get by staying in school, particularly in the less developed regions of the country, will help us in terms of our regional development as well.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister.

I would like to ask the minister why the report by her advisory committee entitled Regional Unemployment in Canada—A Nation out of Balance, which was completed in November, was not tabled and presented to the Canadian people until February of this year.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is up to the advisory council to publish the report whenever it chooses. I was presented with the report last week. It has some interesting ideas in it. When I have had a chance to examine it further, I will be happy to report to the House.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the minister's senior officials were involved in this study. They knew last November how the VIA cuts, the unemployment insurance cuts and the post-secondary education cuts were hurting Canadians. Why was that kept a secret from Canadians?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that sounded like the same question to me. Let me see if I can phrase my answer another way.

The report that was developed by the advisory council and presented to me last week was in the hands of the advisory council. I would hate to think that it was in the hands of my officials because it is an independent council. I think the hon. member would agree that that is the way it should be.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the farm debt review boards which have been performing a very valuable farm debt intermediation service, but whose mandate is scheduled to expire at the end of March 1991.

Noting this date, a number of valuable farm debt review board employees and counsellors are naturally concerned about their future employment. Given the ongoing need for the farm debt review boards and the expertise of the personnel, can the minister indicate his intention to extend the mandate of the farm debt review boards past March 1991?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the farm debt review board has been a very successful concept. I believe something in the order of 70 per cent-plus of all the applications that were brought before the farm debt review board have been resolved. I believe something in excess of 8,000 different applications were brought before it.

On the basis of the success that the program has had, we would be very supportive of its continuation.

I have to advise my hon. colleague, as he is well aware, that there is a major review of agriculture policy being undertaken. One of the areas in which we are engaged in the review of is with respect to farm management and financing.

• (1450)

We would ask the task force which is looking at this particular issue in detail to look also at the issue of the farm debt review boards and whether they should play a permanent role in the future.

Having regard to the success and the very comprehensive review that is being undertaken, I can only say that we will make a decision in the best interests of the agricultural community. I hope that will meet the concerns of the hon. member.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, on January 29 the Minister of Finance said in this House, and I quote: "About one half of the $18 billion in federal sales tax revenue currently comes from the taxation of business inputs."

My question for the Minister of Finance is very simple. It requires just a yes or no answer. Will he agree that the change from the manufacturers' sales tax to the goods and services tax represents the single largest reduction in tax burden at the corporate level in the history of Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is playing with words here because he knows that any consumption tax is always paid by the final consumer.

What we are trying to do is ensure that the amount of that tax is the same for all products, rather than having some products taxed at an effective rate of 1 per cent or 2 per cent and other products taxed at an effective rate of up to 13.5 per cent. That is the precise reason why we are moving to a goods and services tax.

The hon. member is trying to be just a little too cute with the question that he has just asked.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, you might say that that was a bit of a cute answer.

The minister cannot have it both ways. Either the reduction tax in business inputs is going to increase the money available for capital investment, which he has been claiming is one of the benefits of the tax, or it is going to be passed on to consumers. It does not work both ways.

[Translation]

So I will repeat my question, and it is as simple as this: Does replacing the manufacturers' sales tax with the GST represent the biggest reduction in corporate tax in Canada's history, yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that sounded very much like the same question. The answer is still the same.

Taxes that are consumption taxes are paid, ultimately, by the consumer. Businesses are collectors of taxes along the way. They pass those taxes on through their price to the consumer. In that way the consumer ends up paying.

That is precisely the problem with the existing tax because, depending on the method of distribution and depending on what the tax rate is on the basic product, there may be a tax rate of 2 per cent, 5 per cent, 7 per cent or 13.5 per cent. In some cases I have heard of tax rates at 19 per cent.

What we are trying to do through this GST reform proposal is to ensure that all products are taxed at the same rate of 7 per cent where they are taxable.

JUSTICE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

We all know that one judge in this country called a three-year-old girl sexually aggressive. We all know that another one said that sexual assaults against native women were not so serious. We all know that a third said that rules like women were made to be violated.

We all know, too, that Madam Justice Wilson at Osgoode Hall last week called for education of all judges on gender issues.

Will the Minister of Justice assure this House that such programs will immediately be undertaken? Will he personally oversee this small step on the road to true equity?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will know that in the previous administration of this government we set up the Canadian Judicial Centre to provide courses and training for the judiciary.

I should point out to her that a course in sexism is being presented this summer.

She will also know that this government has far exceeded the numbers of the previous Liberal administration in the appointments of women to the bench.

She will know that there are now three women sitting on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada.

We are making every effort to tackle this problem. If my hon. friend has any suggestions I would welcome them.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it sounds good and the government likes to talk numbers, but let us talk percentages.

Given that only 9 per cent of federally appointed judges in this country are women, can the minister give a commitment that this government will significantly increase the numbers of women judges within its purview and do it soon?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, since my hon. friend brought up percentages, I would suggest to her that 16 of the 66 judges elevated to higher office, or 24 per cent of the elevations made by this government, were women.

Also, 16.7 per cent of the total appointments have been women. My hon. friend will know but will not admit it on the floor of the House that that is much better than the previous Liberal administration.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE BUDGET

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Canadians outside of Ottawa are incensed that budget documents will not be made available to them as traditionally done on budget day, but will only be made available in Ottawa.

Does the Minister understand that individuals and small corporations will be at a disadvantage because they will not be able to act with the same speed as large corporations which have a presence in Ottawa? Does the Minister realize that this decision is unfair and places Canadians not residing in Ottawa at an economic disadvantage?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern that is expressed by my hon. friend. We have revised the processes for the distribution of documents this year. I am sure he is aware that at the opening of business the next day people across the country will have the budget documents and will be able to work from those in a very short period of time after the budget is brought before the House.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has simply confirmed that people across Canada will not have the same opportunity as those residing here.

Can he explain this to the House? The budget leak took place in Ottawa—not in Montreal or Vancouver. Why is he punishing the people in Canada rather than those responsible in Ottawa?

Mr. Boudria: Ottawa is in Canada.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of punishing anybody. What we are doing here is having a slight change of the processes by which we distribute budget documents.

There will also be available the various services to which most of the law firms and accounting firms are subscribers. That is where most of the businesses get their information from.

In that way they will be able to get the same amount of information just as quickly as they were able to before. It is just that the documents themselves will be a few hours later.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister has insisted that the current MST content for new housing is 4.5 per cent of the cost of a house, while the housing industry has insisted that the figure is closer to 3.7 per cent.

The Minister maintains that the GST will have little or no impact on housing prices, but industry figures show that house prices will increase by 2 per cent.

I have been informed that Revenue Canada has done a calculation on the existing MST content of new housing and has discovered that it is considerably lower than the Department of Finance figures.

Will the Minister next week table the calculations of Revenue Canada and the calculations of the Department of Finance with the finance committee so that the public will know once and for all that the GST is bad for housing and bad for people?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1500)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have said that there is a range of effective tax rates. I have never said that it is just 4.5 per cent. In some communities it is 4.5 per cent, in other communities it is less than that. I have said that it is less than the 3.7 per cent average the building industry is saying that it is.

But when you compare that 3.7 per cent to the 4.5 per cent net GST, that is, the 7 per cent less the 2.5 per cent rebate, the difference is less than 1 per cent. That is the point that I have made time and again. The 1 per cent difference in the price of a house is not going to affect adversely the affordability of housing and that is the commitment that we made.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I find that answer quite unacceptable and so do the people who want to buy new houses in this country. One per cent on a new house in Toronto is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $8,000 to $9,000. One per cent in London, Ontario, is $2,000. One per cent in Vancouver is $6,000. One per cent in Nova Scotia is about $1,000. People who want to buy new houses do not need any additional new taxes on new housing.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my colleague says that 1 per cent is $8,000. That is an $800,000 house to which the hon. member is referring. This is another example of the Liberals standing up for their rich friends.

We do not feel that it is necessary to protect people in this country who can afford an $800,000 house. If that is the policy of the Liberal Party, so be it. It is not the policy of this government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Speaker's Ruling

PRIVILEGE

TAKING OF VOTES—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I wish to bring to the attention of the House a ruling on a question which hon. members will remember was raised by the hon. member for Calgary West on Wednesday, January 24, following several recorded divisions that day. Put simply, there was the suggestion that some hon. members may have voted twice.

Subsequently, these incidents were raised by the hon. member for Calgary West. The hon. member claimed, as a question of privilege, that contrary to the established rules and practices of this House, two members voted twice on those divisions. This charge was denied by the members involved, both on Wednesday when the issue was first raised, and again on Thursday.

The issue was extensively discussed last Thursday and I wish to thank all hon. members who made presentations.

On Friday, the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair offered an apology to the House for any unintended misunderstandings caused by his actions during the divisions in question. This apology closes the matter in so far as the question of privilege is concerned.

[Translation]

However, as Speaker, I want to make a few comments on the events that took place. It is accepted practice that when the House is considering an item of government policy that is highly contentious, members of the opposition will seek to use any means available to them to delay the proceedings. As we have witnessed over the years the ingenuity of the opposition to find ways to delay the business of government is considerable. Such dilatory tactics, are of course, an important part of the adversarial nature of this place and a legitimate tool for the opposition. At the same time, however, I must point out that any such tactics by the opposition must fall squarely within the rules or practices of the House and I would ask all Hon. Members to keep this in mind.

[English]

At no time should dilatory tactics ever detract from the authority or the dignity of the House. In the heat of the moment, members may sometimes depart from the normal courtesies, but the basic respect for our practices must be insisted upon. The Chair would be derelict in its duties to all hon. members and to this institution if it were to tolerate any erosion of that respect.

Therefore, I urge members on all sides of the House to consider their behaviour carefully, and most especially, in the heat of partisan debate in order that we may preserve and protect the dignity and respect due to this Chamber in which we have all been called to serve.

I thank hon. members for their interventions.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–286, an act to amend the Export Development Act (commercial credits).

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am proposing amendments to the Export Development Act which deal with giving the Export Development Corporation new powers to provide for the marketing of commodities from Third World countries. As we all know, this creates very serious problems right now with Third World debt. Many Third World countries have great difficulty in marketing their commodities. This will allow the Export Development Corporation to market those commodities, keep the currency in Canadian terms and then allow them to buy goods and services in Canada. I represent this bill to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty in accordance with Standing Order 36 to present a petition from 1,400 residents of Cambridge and Kitchener who support more severe criminal sentencing for violent crimes. They ask Parliament to pass legislation establishing mandatory minimum sentences for all violent crimes which would apply uniformly to all regions of Canada.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present today. The first one I have the honour and privilege to present was collected by the Mayor of the northern village of Green Lake, a Métis community in northwest Saskatchewan, a community that experiences 85 per cent unemployment and a high social assistance problem.

The petition calls on the Parliament of Canada to reject the recommendations of the report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas released in October. It calls on the government to recognize the financial needs of the people in northern and isolated areas. This is signed by 197 people in the northern community of Green Lake.

• (1510)

The second petition I have is signed by residents of the community of Pierceland, another community in northwest Saskatchewan in my riding of The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. The petition recognizes that residents of northern Canada need a real tax benefit which recognizes the high cost of living and working in areas prescribed as northern and isolated, and calls on the government to reject the recommendations of the task force on northern benefits and declare an equitable and fair tax program for residents of the North.

Mr. Speaker, finally, it is my pleasure and privilege to present a petition signed by an additional 114 people in the town of Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan. The petition also recognizes that the report of the task force on northern benefits released in October, fails to address the realities of the economy of northern Canada, and calls upon Parliament to reject the recommendations of the task force report and to develop a fair and equitable tax benefit program, recognizing the financial needs of the people in northern and isolated areas.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present two petitions. The first one is from a number of Canadians who are very disturbed that the GST has been introduced in this House. They call upon the government to take actions to withdraw this tax immediately.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is from a number of Saskatchewan farmers who are concerned with respect to the future of the Canadian Wheat Board. They are concerned that oats have been removed from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and that wheat and barley may also be removed, completely removing the necessity for a Wheat Board.

They call upon the government to reinstate oats to the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and provide oats with the same protection that barley and wheat have under the Wheat Board Act.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Nova Scotia. These residents petition the Minister of Finance against his proposed goods and service tax, saying that it is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for the taxpayer's ability to pay. They ask the minister and the government to cease this proposal to shift the tax burden onto ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax, instead of through real tax reform.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from University of Ottawa students in my riding of Ottawa—Vanier. These students wish to voice their strong opposition to the imposition of a 7 per cent goods and services tax and join with the hundreds of thousands of citizens opposing this very regressive and unwanted tax.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I herewith table one petition from Matagami and one from Lebel-sur-Quévillon, arising from recommendations made by the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Your petitioners who represent these isolated communities are very concerned and reject the report's recommendations, one consequence of which would be that many workers would be laid off.

They believe that the Government of Canada refuses to make adjustments to reflect the harsh realities of life in the North.

[English]

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great honour to table a petition signed by nearly 200 people in the community of Dubuc in my riding of Yorkton—Melville. The petitioners call upon the House to keep the post office in Dubuc open. Canada Post is in the process of trying to close that post office. In fact, last week Linda Ungar and Daphne Hedstrom of Dubuc were down here and spent an hour before the Consumer and Corporate Affairs committee explaining that they wanted to save the post office as is and that they did not want to have a retail postal outlet in the town of Dubuc.

With 200 signatures on this petition, almost everybody in the village and the surrounding farm area have signed the petition. I think you can see how serious they are. I hope the House will take it as such.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present petitions on behalf of 200 or so constituents of Saskatoon—Humboldt and of the constituency of the Minister of National Defence.

People in places like Wakaw, Cudworth, Birch Hills, Alsask, and Kerrobert call upon the government to reject their current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so that there is a maximum tax on wealthy corporations and individuals, and to ensure that a regressive tax not be put on but that tax reform be dealt with so it is of value to all Canadians.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I rise to present two petitions on the subject of the goods and services tax, signed by some 150 Canadians from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

The petitioners point out that since September 1984 this government has imposed at least 31 new tax increases on Canadian taxpayers and suggest strongly that the imposition of the new goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians, and will create an onerous burden on small business.

For those reasons they call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table nine petitions representing hundreds of Canadians in my riding of York West who indicate through their signatures their disapproval for the government's goods and services tax.

Not only will it place an unfair burden on those low and middle income earners in York West but, as well, deliver a crippling blow to the extensive small business sector that forms the backbone of this community and indeed Canada.

I urge this government to reject its goods and services tax and provide Canadians with serious and genuine tax reform.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have petitions to present today from residents of my constituency who have great concerns about the proposed goods and services legislation.

Besides these petitions that I have in my hand, I have received thousands of signed petition forms from my constituency from people who did not address me through petitions on the correct form. Many of the people who have presented these petitions to me represent lower income families in my riding for whom the child tax credits and the credits suggested by the government will simply be insufficient to cover the costs of the goods and services tax for them.

They simply cannot bear the burden of this added taxation and ask the government to repeal this proposed legislation.

[Translation]

PROTECTION AND REGULATION OF ATLANTIC FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, it is also my duty to present in the House a number of petitions from people in my riding, residents of Cap-Pelé and Petit-Cap. Your petitioners humbly state that Canada's sovereignty has been violated and its resources plundered, and that the fisheries are at the very heart of the Atlantic region's economy.

Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to extend its jurisdiction to include the entire continental shelf, so that Canada can protect and regulate the fish resources that are vital to Atlantic fishermen.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a total of 16 petitions from various parts of Canada, including many from the riding of my friend, the Leader of the Opposition, in Windsor, Ontario.

People in my riding and people all over this country by the hundreds of thousands, and particularly lower income people and those people who now have no income because of the collapse of the fishery of Atlantic Canada, are calling upon the government to withdraw the goods and services tax which is being proposed.

They appeal to the government to rethink, review and take this tax back to the drawing board. The tax will not work and this is just the first signal of a growing, all-out tax revolt. I have pleasure in tabling the petitions.

PRIVILEGE

REMOVAL OF AT AND EAST PROGRAM

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to your attention a matter which I feel is a contempt of Parliament. It deals with Bill C-26, commonly referred to as the at and east program. I believe the action taken by Transport Canada and the Minister of Transport have usurped Parliament and in so doing have impeded the House in the performance of its function in respect of Bill C-26.

I propose very briefly to outline the relevant facts and state why I feel that a contempt of this House has been committed.

In last year's budget, it was announced that the at and east program would be eliminated effective July 15, 1989. This program is found in Section 281 of the Railway Act which provides a subsidy to railways that are hauling grain and flour to eastern ports, mainly Saint John and Halifax, provided certain conditions are met. This program has been in effect for 20 years and in fact a whole economy has been built up in the maritimes around this program.

First reading of Bill C-26 took place on June 16, 1989 and since then the bill has not seen the light of day in this House until today. In the meantime, a series of moves by Transport Canada have, in effect, eliminated this program. This started with a meeting held on May 4, 1989, by officials of Transport Canada. That meeting was confirmed in a letter to myself from the Minister of Transport in which he states, and I quote:

> On May 4, 1989, Transport Canada officials held a meeting in Ottawa with representatives from affected organizations to provide information on the decision.

This was followed by correspondence from Mr. C. McElman, Director of Rail Freight Programs with Transport Canada. This correspondence discusses the removal of this program.

As a result of this meeting, correspondence and other discussions, both CP Rail and CN Rail stopped hauling grain and flour pursuant to this section. This was confirmed, first of all, by letter from CP Rail on September 22, 1989. It states:

> By letter dated June 27, 1989, Mr. McElman replied that the grain must be loaded in a railway car at an inland point on or before July 15, 1989 to be eligible for subsidy. Mr. McElman's reply confirmed the budget speech of the Minister of Finance.
> In a further letter dated June 29, 1989, Mr. McElman again confirmed the demise of the At and East rates, when he stated, in part, that the rates and subsidy program are cancelled on the dates specified, even if Parliamentary approval comes at a later date.

A letter from CN Rail on December 13 confirms the same thing. It states: "CN has effectively cancelled certain provisions of Tariff—as they apply to the movement of grain in bulk and of flour for export".

This initiative is directly related to information provided by Mr. C. McElman of Transport Canada who clearly stated to the industry that even if parliamentary sanction was to be received at a later date, the rates and subsidy program would disappear on July 15, 1989.

How is this contempt of Parliament? In referring to your order of October 10—and I am paraphrasing—I believe a number of authorities have indicated that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its function could well be contempt.

Mr. Speaker, in paraphrasing your words, also any act that has the effect or tends to diminish the authority of the House in the eyes of the public may well be contempt.

I believe this has happened with this bill and that this House will now be impeded in dealing with Bill C-26. This happened in two fashions: first of all, by the actions of Transport Canada and the Minister of Transport, as I have just outlined, and second, the fact that the bill has not been back in this House for seven months since the removal of this program. In fact, it has not been in the House since this program has been removed de facto. This has had a major effect on certain regions of the maritimes, particularly in Saint John, New Brunswick and Halifax, Nova Scotia.

I believe that the matter hinges, to some extent, on the fact that the bill is retroactive. I want to make it very clear that there is no dispute that bills can be retroactive. That is very clear. If, in fact, this bill passes this House, it will be good law. However, it is submitted that there is a need to be reasonable with this type of legislation.

Professor Hogg, who is one of the country's leading constitutional experts discusses this in the second edition of his book on constitutional law. On page 776, he states:

> The power to enact retroactive laws, if exercised with appropriate restraint, is a proper tool of modern government.

But he stresses "appropriate restraint".

I think that also has to be considered in light of your ruling, Your Honour, on October 10, in which you stated at page 4461 of Hansard:

> I expect the Department of Finance and other departments to study this ruling carefully and remind everyone within the Public Service that we are a parliamentary democracy, not a so-called executive democracy, nor a so-called administrative democracy.

I am concerned about the period since Transport Canada effectively removed Bill C-26 as it now stands drafted. What authority does Transport Canada have to make such an implementation? I think none. Only Parliament can enact or change legislation. Although we must be flexible, cabinet does not make the laws in this country, nor do departments. We are not in an executive or administrative democracy. If we are, why do we have Parliament at all? Surely there must be a role for parliamentarians to play in this country. If it is not the case, maybe we should all go home.

Mr. Speaker, unlike the GST which was referred to in your ruling on October 10, this is not something that will happen. It is something that already has happened. Already rail grain shipments have stopped to Halifax and Saint John, the elevator at Saint John has announced it will be closing at the end of February, the Halifax elevator is in trouble and Dover Flour Mills in Halifax is suffering. It is estimated that this is going to cost the maritimes some $27 million annually along with some 250 jobs. It is already happening because of an executive or administrative decision, not because of any act of this Parliament.

If Parliament should decide to leave the at and east or make any modifications, it may be too late because, as I said, already the elevator at Saint John is closed and this whole infrastructure that has developed around this program is being dismantled. The bill was introduced in June, the program was eliminated in July and it is only now that the bill is coming before Parliament.

In summary, there are two reasons for contempt today. First of all, that this bill is going beyond convention and historical practices of retroactive legislation. A distinction must be drawn between tax legislation which is, by its very nature, subject to ongoing modification and a situation such as represented by Bill C-26 with a termination of a longstanding subsidy program has caused serious economic dislocation for the affected regions and industries in Saint John and Halifax.

Second, this bill was on the Order Paper for seven months before it was brought before this House and there has been serious economic upheaval created in the maritimes by a de facto decision of a department of this government. This was done not because of any instructions, order or decision made in this House. If Your Honour so finds that there is a prima facie case, I would be pleased to make the appropriate motion.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest and I am a little disappointed that the hon. member did not give us an advance warning that he intended to raise this question of privilege. That would have given us a chance to look at the arguments he wanted to make and the issues he wanted to address.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Chair can assist the hon. parliamentary secretary. The hon. member has raised an interesting and complex argument. He has argued it in a very succinct fashion and I thank him for it.

If the hon. parliamentary secretary would like to adjourn this over until tomorrow afternoon, I would be very pleased. I notice the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is rising. Given the argument that has been put forward, it might be appropriate. If so, I certainly will do so.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, in fact, that is what I was going to request, that we be given some time to look at the hon. member's arguments and to consider our own so that we can properly address the issue.

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker: I have to say that whatever my ruling on the application might be, it would not interfere with debate continuing on the bill. The hon. member has made it very clear that the complaint is in terms of the action by the two railways and the department before this bill became law. Whatever happens in the debate takes nothing away from the argument that the hon. member has put forward.

I see the hon. member is indicating his agreement, as is the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, to put the matter over so that the Chair can hear further argument tomorrow. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Shirley Martin (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to open the debate on second reading of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Railway Act. This government is committed to building a strong economy, an economy encouraged by incentive and opportunity, an economy which is competitive with the world's trading nations.

In order to fully achieve this goal we must create a solid base which will allow our economy to flourish in coming years. Measures which seek to control the deficit and reduce the national debt are an essential element of this foundation for the future. Equally, measures which seek to establish a sound fiscal framework to sustain a continued economic development are also essential to our purpose.

These objectives are reflected in this government's commitment to a sound transportation policy. Transportation is and always will be at the heart of our nation's economy. That is why we have undertaken to provide Canadians with a safe, efficient and effective transportation system. This commitment is the core around which our policy of economic regulatory reform was built.

With the advent of the free trade policy and the role played by transportation in our economic development, it is becoming increasingly vital as we enter this new decade and in the next century. A cost effective transportation system is essential if Canada is to preserve and enhance its position in world trade. Therefore, the bill now before this House seeks to eliminate a subsidy which has outlived its original purpose and has become a burden on the public purse.

By way of background, Bill C–26 deals with a transportation subsidy which is commonly known as the at and east subsidy. This rather odd name evolved from an attempt to counterbalance American freight rates which would encourage the movement of western Canadian grain between Buffalo, New York, and the port of New York City during the winter freeze up on the Great Lakes; in other words, movements at and east of Buffalo. The subsidy which was introduced in an effort to counter this U.S. initiative and to keep our winter grain movements on Canadian soil quickly became known as the at and east subsidy.

The subsidy gave shipping rail rates to eastern ports which were frozen at the 1960 rate for grain and the 1966 rate for flour. The government then paid the railways an amount equal to the difference between the frozen rates and the actual cost of the movement. The level of the subsidy was independently determined by the National Transportation Agency.

The amounts of grain which move under the at and east subsidy represent less than 3 per cent of our total grain exports in a normal year. Various impact studies have been done on this subsidy in the past 15 years. They have all acknowledged that the at and east subsidy no longer serves the purpose for which it was originally intended. Canadian ports and railways can now compete effectively with their American counterparts for eastern exports of grain and flour.

Canadian taxpayers cannot afford to pay subsidies based on a 1960 policy which is no longer required. Savings are expected to be about $20 million in the first year and some $35 to $40 million annually thereafter. The subsidy was terminated on July 15, 1989.

However, the legislation stipulates that all inventories of grain and flour which were held by the railways on that date would be delivered at the subsidized rate, provided they reach the eastern port for export on or before January 31, 1990. This sixth–month period allowed for a smooth transition thereby minimizing the impact on the users.

Pre–confederation Canada had to struggle constantly to meet its transportation challenges. This rugged land of vast spaces needed unifying bonds. Our early needs for unification were met through the realization of Sir John A. Macdonald's grand dream of a transcontinental railway. The openings of the St. Lawrence Seaway and the Trans–Canada Highway in 1959 and 1962 had enormous positive impacts on economic development and transportation. With new and ever growing technology, our expanding airwaves and communication have reduced the size of this country, and we are all now truly neighbours in this great nation.

Transportation must continue to play its vital role as we enter this new decade and the next century. In looking forward I see a transportation system with at least four essential elements: first and foremost, it will be safe; second, it will be efficient and effective, that is, it will make the best use of each mode of transportation, be it air, rail, marine, car, truck or bus; third, it will be responsive, that is, it will meet the needs of shippers and travellers; fourth, it will be innovative, both in the use of technology and in the services it offers.

The bill currently before us is one step in that direction. It will stimulate creativity and innovation. It will allow the industry to take advantage of unanticipated sales opportunities, no longer constraining potential cost savings.

Direct federal government expenditures associated with the grain transportation are very large. It must be remembered that the Canadian grain industry faces severe competition in world markets. A cost effective transportation system is essential, if Canada is to preserve its position in the world of grain trade. We must face the realities of our economy and our transportation system. Bill C–26 does just that. Therefore, I invite all members to give this legislation their full support.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to this bill today as a member of Parliament, as one who has spent a lifetime in the agricultural industry, and as one who recognizes the benefits that came from this particular bill, not just to farmers in Ontario but farmers all across western Canada.

It shocks me that the government would be withdrawing this at and east legislation at a time when the minister's own figures point out that for the coming year farm income will drop in Canada by 39 per cent: 101 per cent in the province of Saskatchewan and 87 per cent in Manitoba. Literally thousands of farmers across this nation are losing their farms, partly because of the callous disregard for their industry by this government and partly because of the cut–backs in funding. The cut-back for the coming year will see the income drop by $2.6 billion, a drop of 64 per cent. We see these cut-backs taking place at a time when our neighbours to the south with whom we have that free trade agreement are gearing up to increase their export enhancement program for next year. This year the export enhancement program will see at least $566 million pumped into their export programs.

• (1540)

When the minister said that they are building a better, stronger economy, an economy that is competitive, I must ask: how do we compete with the subsidies of other countries when we are cutting ours out? Who is bearing the burden? The farmers are bearing this burden on their shoulders. It is coming to the point when they can no longer carry that burden and carry the rest of society.

They say that it is to reduce the deficit. The increase in taxes in the last budget on alcoholic products and tobacco was $475 million. The moneys spent on the at and east are a drop in the bucket compared to that.

We hear that free trade has made it vital to develop a cost effective transportation system. I would like to know how we can move the grain through the Seaway system with the winters we have in Canada, whereas the Mississippi waterway largely stays open for most of its length during the year. It seems very strange indeed that while we are cutting back on subsidies here in Canada, our neighbours to the south with whom we are competing for world markets are increasing theirs.

The at and east legislation was brought in, in the 1960s, not just to help the western farmers or the Ontario farmers. It was brought in for a very specific reason based on the fact that we needed a place to consolidate our grain shipments for export. We had flour mills in Atlantic Canada that needed a steady supply of grain over the winter months. Consequently the grains eligible for at and east rates included wheat, wheat flour, oats, barley, rye, corn, buckwheat and soybeans. For bulk grains, the subsidy applied for rail shipment from Georgian Bay in Ontario. This is where I as a farmer was able to make use of that program through our marketing boards that stored the grain in those Bayport elevators for shipment later on during freeze up to the Atlantic coast to supply those flour mills and those ports by rail, for export.

Last winter the Canadian Wheat Board moved only 202,730 tonnes of prairie grain under the at and east rates, with 25,192 tonnes going to Quebec City and the rest to the Atlantic ports in Halifax and Saint John. On average, the rail shipments by the Canadian Wheat Board have been more like 400,000 to 500,000 tonnes per year.

What we are doing here is withdrawing the subsidy. Those markets in Atlantic Canada will now be available for imported grain out of the Texas gulf coast or other countries. Again Canadian producers will be deprived of another market. It is also interesting to note that local feed grains produced in Atlantic Canada only account for 20 per cent of Nova Scotia's requirements, 35 to 40 per cent of New Brunswick's requirements, and 80 per cent of Prince Edward Island's requirements.

That is going to cast an additional burden on the livestock and poultry producers of Atlantic Canada, as well as put a burden on and take a grain market away from farmers in the west.

I look at the amount of the United States grain that has been sold under the export enhancement program with subsidies that range from $6.48 a tonne back in September 21, to the most recent sale where they sold almost half a million tonnes of wheat to Russia with subsidies of $20.50 a tonne. I would ask the government to reconsider what it is doing by way of throwing these markets open to the vultures of the market-place and depriving them of Canadian grown grain of higher quality that can fill those markets.

In the budget that was leaked last April there was a total of $399 million listed that would not be available to the farmers of Canada. For example, a $200 million cut in crop insurance, $60 million for the at and east legislation before us today, rail branch line rehabilitation of $48 million, the grain and crop advance payments of $54 million, dairy exports of $12 million, commodity based loans at the Farm Credit Corporation of $15 million, and the Canadian Dairy Commission of $12 million.

When I see programs like that being discontinued, apparently under the guise of cutting back the deficit, I wonder how much of this was cut back in order to conform to the free trade agreement. Then I read where the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States told the United States Senate last April 19, that he intended to write agricultural policies not only for the United States but also for the European Common Market, Canada, Argentina, Brazil, Australia and so on.

I have to wonder if this legislation is some of his handiwork and if he has convinced the government to cut back on these and leave our producers out hanging in the breeze to wither and die when their subsidies are cut off. These subsidies have enabled them to compete very effectively over the years with the large geographical expanse that we have in this nation, to make their products available at the seaports on either side, east or west, and to provide jobs to the Canadian people.

In terms of the loss of jobs, according to the report of the Canadian Transport Commission on the at and east the following direct job benefits to the program were identified: 320 jobs connected with transport, 295 jobs in milling in western Canada, 75 jobs in the Georgian Bay ports, 85 jobs in Halifax and Saint John, and milling in central Canada was 402 jobs. Almost 1,200 jobs are connected to this piece of legislation.

The downturn in the economy in Atlantic Canada, and the disastrous impact resulting from the closure of the fish plants, is an equally hard blow to those people in Atlantic Canada. This program that served them so well should be continued and enhanced to make our milling companies, flour mills and ports competitive with those of our neighbours to the south.

The benefit of utilizing the at and east route for the Ontario wheat producers, for example, is very clear. It enables them to average export sales over the winter months. They have a system of pool pricing whereby they are able to do this, but they are providing importing countries with a continuous supply of grain, while yielding the producers the best average return.

The importing countries that are mentioned are buying this high quality wheat from Canada, the pasta wheat, and the at and east legislation allows the Wheat Board to keep a portion of the total volume of Ontario export grain temporarily off the market and spread those sales throughout the year to act as a hedge against a drop in price.

However this government does not think that way. It is quite content to sell it to the very large multinational grain companies and let them have control of it at harvest time and then reap the benefits of any price increases. Typically, under this system that we have at the present time, if the price is not acceptable to the Wheat Board it will choose to stay off the market and eventually move the grain by at and east, if necessary, when the price is more favourable, and since this route is subsidized, the Ontario wheat producers can use it with little financial penalty.

They say that in due consideration of the economics associated with the at and east program as applied to the total marketing system, the Ontario Wheat Board considers the program to be invaluable to its operation and to the interests of all facets of the industry. For the amount of dollars expended on the subsidy program it may be the best and least expensive insurance plan available to the eastern marketing system. That not only includes the Wheat Board. It also includes the elevators, the flour mills and the ports that I mentioned earlier.

Already the impact of this is showing up in the Bayport elevators in Georgian Bay. One of them is slated for demolition this year because of the loss of this legislation. This is another blow to the economy of those ports. I hesitate to say: "Forgive them Lord for they know not what they do".

Removal of the program would also reduce the income of the grain producers of Ontario in the amount of $3.60 a tonne, according to a Department of Agriculture working paper. They went on to make the statement that combined with the lack of transportation facilities and inadequate storage capacity the cost increase would have been more adversely affected across the country.

This attack on the maritimes too cannot be condoned. It may result in even less rail service, for if grain is no longer shipped by rail by the Canadian Wheat Board and the Ontario Wheat Growers Marketing Board the viability of several lines is put in question.

In 1988, according to the National Transportation Agency, 722,000 tonnes of export grain and 222,322 tonnes of export flour moved under the at and east rate structure. Atlantic ports represent 90 per cent of the total tonnage. If the program terminated and the elevators remained operational, $14 million in economic activity will be lost and the loss of feed costs would be $222,000. Local milling producers would be faced with a loss of their only market should the flour mill in Halifax be unable to continue. It would result in a higher procurement costs for the feed industry and higher feed prices.

The maritimes are dealing with abandonment of approximately 50 per cent of the rail network in the region. Any loss of traffic which will affect the viability of the remaining lines is viewed as a very serious matter.

Canadian flour exports will be practically non-existent without the subsidy. This is a statement made by the Canadian Transport Commission. In the case of the flour milling industry it is likely that the size and scope of this sector will be greatly reduced. The export market might well disappear unless the government introduces some sort of assistance. Fred Hanson, flour co-ordinator of the Canadian National Millers Association, said that Halifax will lose business to Montreal and other western Canadian ports. I think the ports of Halifax and Saint John will be hard pressed to remain competitive.

The government looks upon the at and east as a subsidy. We should look at it rather as a positive effect on exports, yet here we are removing it. As I mentioned earlier, the export enhancement program in the United States is being maintained and increased. Indeed the government's and the minister's own Green Paper laments the lack of exports from Canada of highly processed agri-food products, noting that only 2 per cent of our total food exports are processed. Yet one hand does not know what the other hand is doing, because they are taking away this subsidy and then complaining about the fact that we do not have enough processing in Canada.

Similar to the advance payments for crops, The Budget Papers only identify partially the purpose of the program to rationalize the removal of the interest-free payments. This itself put the farmers of Canada under a further burden, and yet piece by piece we have seen the support systems of Canadian agriculture taken away at a time when we have to be competitive in world markets. We are playing the Boy Scouts while all the other countries are getting behind their producers and assisting them to be competitive, whether it is through subsidies or export enhancement programs that we see here in North America or some of the subsidies of the European Common Market.

This program was brought in, in 1966, by the the hon. John Pickersgill. He stated that according to the Board of Transport Commissioners these rates were already unremunerative. We decided to keep those rates at the present level and pay compensation for doing so because we felt there was an obligation in the east with regard to the Crow's Nest Pass rate. The purpose was to ensure that we would have rates that would provide some inducement and incentive to shippers to use the facilities of the Atlantic ports.

Even 24 years ago the administration at that time realized full well that we had to have some assistance to those Atlantic ports to ensure a flow of product to the east that provided jobs and opportunities and the continuity of product to keep those mills running over the winter months.

Cancelling this program will only reduce the federal deficit by approximately $40 million. It cannot be said that cancelling a program contributes in a meaningful way to reducing the deficit. I referred to this a moment ago, that it is piecemeal at the very least.

The current tax paid by the agricultural industry is far greater than the total expenditure of the agriculture budget. Agriculture not only pays its way, but it contributes to the fiscal budget in a very positive way and contributes to the balance of trade. We have seen our trade surplus plummet this last fall. I would have to suggest that with the withdrawal of the at and east subsidy it is going to plummet even further.

The government talks about an economy that is competitive. Our producers are competitive here in Canada. We are among the best in the world, the most competitive in terms of productivity.

For example, milk production per cow has gone up 70 per cent in Canada since 1971. During the same period in the United States it rose by only 46 per cent. If we want to judge efficiency by price we look at poultry. We see that while the real farm gate price of poultry has dropped by 30 per cent since the 1970s, the retail price has just dropped by 10 per cent over the same period. Who is the most efficient? Is it the farmers or the food processing industry?

In terms of the farm gate chicken price in 1982, it represented 48 per cent of the final cost to the consumer. Now it accounts for only 38 per cent of the cost. Clearly these figures demonstrate that orderly marketing is efficient and contributes to the financial well-being of the Canadian agricultural industry.

Part of the efficiency that we saw here is through the orderly marketing and the ability to move products to market over the full 12 months of the year. That is why this legislation was put in place in the 1966 era.

It served us well and we certainly saw the advantages of it, not just for Ontario or Atlantic Canada.

• (1600)

We saw it for the Canadian Wheat Board. We saw it for the creation of jobs on the prairies. When I consider that it is going to cut this back at a period when our agricultural industry in the prairies perhaps is in a more difficult position that it was in the 1930s, it is unconscionable that we should have cut-backs of this magnitude to a program that has served us so well.

I call on the government at this point to withdraw this legislation and reconsider what it is doing. It has been seven months since the budget and this is the first day that this has been introduced into this House. It has caused pandemonium not only in the transportation industry but in the Canadian and Ontario Wheat Boards which are trying to sell their products not knowing whether or not it applied. It is a piece of legislation that was made retroactive and was followed by a drop in price. It was compounded by another drop in price some six or seven months later when the United States made that huge sale of grain to Russia that was subsidized to the tune of $20.50 a tonne or 56 cents per bushel.

I have to question the wisdom of this move at a time of severe financial difficulty across this country in the rural areas. There are whole communities in western Canada, particularly in Saskatchewan, where businesses are closing because they depend on the agriculture industry. They are the main businesses in those towns and as the agriculture industry faces hardships, those businesses are forced to close as well.

We should be going in the opposite direction. If we are going to compete with our neighbours to the south, the government has an obligation to put the money forward to assist the farmers to move that grain to market. It should not be left to the primary producers to carry this burden. It is an obligation of the government to assist them. It is an obligation of society because a lot of this product is moving into export, and every export dollar earned contributes to our Canadian economy.

In conclusion, I would ask that the government reconsider this legislation. It should reinstate this program and enhance it to a level that would make us competitive with Americans programs which they are utilizing and are using to steal our markets.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vancouver East, Immigration; the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, Canada Elections Act; the hon. member for Halifax, Violence Against Women.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): The at and east program has been in existence for almost a quarter of a century and in fact has been an important element of the maritime economy. Bill C-26, which will remove the program, means a potential loss of over $27 million to the maritimes and over 250 direct jobs to the economies, primarily of Saint John and Halifax. Not only is it tragic that this program is being removed formally but the way in which the government has handled Bill C-26 reveals a more fundamental principle. The way in which this government has handled the bill displays an arrogance, a conceit and a self-centredness of the PC Party and this government.

Through this bill they have displayed a disrespect for this institution of Parliament. That is simply by the fact that they have implemented this bill, de facto, before the bill has actually been debated in this House. The legislation for at and east is found in the Railway Act. It is a program that encourages export shippers of grain and flour to use eastern ports.

This is a program that affects grain and flour somewhat differently. With respect to grain, the program is applicable to export grain that is shipped by rail from points at lake ports on Georgian Bay, Lake Huron, Lake Ontario and the upper St. Lawrence as far as Prescott and if the rail destination is any port on the St. Lawrence from Montreal east as well as the ports of Saint John and Halifax. With respect to flour the program is applicable if flour is shipped by rail for export from Thunder Bay east, again to the same ports.

This program has evolved so that shippers of grain are charged rates that were in effect in 1960 while flour shippers pay the rate that was in effect in 1966. The difference between those rates and the compensatory rates are paid to the railways by the government.

The hon. minister indicated that the reason for enacting this program was that initially there had been worry about competition from the United States. I can point out to the minister that that is only part of the case. In fact, the Hon. G. W. Pickersgill who was then the Minister of Transport stated when the legislation was under consideration back in the 1960s that it also meant: "To ensure that we will have rates which will provide some inducement and incentive to shippers to use the facilities of Atlantic ports."

In other words, in addition to ensuring that eastern Canadian ports could compete with U.S. ports the at and east rates were also intended to enable the ports of Halifax and Saint John to compete with Montreal and other St. Lawrence River ports. This had the effect of creating and maintaining jobs primarily in the Maritimes. In other words, it was a good regional program.

There is another aspect with respect to the American angle, that is the program offset a geographic advantage that the U.S. has because of shorter hauling distances to ports. With the removal of the at and east, this advantage is gone. There is a real irony here. This government talks so much about creating a level playing field that the term is rapidly becoming a cliche. Yet the government and the PC party seem to have completely forgotten about the level playing field concept with respect to this bill and with respect to regional programs throughout the country.

It may well be that the at and east needs some revision and should be looked at, but by simply cancelling the program the government has forsaken the notion of a level playing field in the maritimes. There seems to have been somewhat of a change of attitude by the government in that it has talked before about creating level playing fields in order to create equality and fairness for Canadians. It is very clear by this and many other examples that this government has no intention of creating equity and fairness or level playing fields for average Canadians at all.

The government's politics are very transparent. It is purely and simply promoting a 19th century laissez-faire economy—today it is called neo-conservatism—which is simply a philosophy that will allow the rich to stay rich and in fact become richer by stealing more of this country's wealth.

It is a philosophy that benefits the few at the expense of the majority. It is a philosophy that did not work in the 1800s and a philosophy that does not work today in spite of the fancy packaging that this government employs.

The at and east program has become an important part of the diversification of the maritime economy. Any region of the country that depends on one industry is in a very tenuous situation should that industry fail. Although the fishing industry is not the only industry in the maritimes, it has played a vital role in a viable maritime economy.

We all know that industry is now in a very bad way and although the Prime Minister assures us that there is no crisis in the maritimes, I would suggest to the Prime Minister and to the minister that they are trying to ensure that if in fact the maritimes are not quite over the edge, yet they will provide that little extra push with the passage of this bill.

There is a need to encourage and promote diversification in all regions of this country. That has been a fundamental plank of virtually every federal government since Confederation up until the present one. The Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet today have abandoned this fundamental principle, this basic building block to our nation's economy.

• (1610)

I am from Saskatchewan where we have witnessed and felt the cold, harsh reality of PC politics. We in the west have much in common with folks in the maritimes. In our rural communities we have seen our economic base undermined. We have seen our post offices disappearing. We have seen VIA Rail abruptly removed. We have seen services removed for seniors in communities where they can no longer remain, where they have lived all their lives, as in the maritimes. We have seen unemployment figures rise. We have seen people leaving our region of the country and we have seen the growth of food banks and record numbers of people living below the poverty line. In fact, in Saskatchewan now there are more people living below the poverty line than anywhere in Canada, except for Newfoundland, and that is with two Tory governments, federal and provincial.

At the same time, we have been forced to listen to a finance minister who tells us that we have had good economic growth for the last few years but now we have to tighten our belts. I would like to tighten something as well. It would not be a belt, it would be a political noose around the political neck of the government. However, I think the government is doing a very good job of tightening its own noose these days.

The minister may want to tighten our belts, but for the maritimes the government is simply shutting the door with this bill. Without a doubt, this bill hits the maritimes very hard. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission has completed several studies into the impact of the at and east.
