STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

PANAMA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have been very disturbed by the dictatorship of General Noriega and his continued refusal to acknowledge the results of the democratic elections that were held this past May. Our party has supported any international efforts toward a peaceful transition for Noriega for the rightful government.

Nonetheless, as Canadians we cannot accept the use of force by an outside party to change circumstances internal to a country. Canada is a signatory to the United Nations and as such we have always embraced the United Nations charter that explicitly prohibits the use of military force by one state against another.

To defend Canada's support for the U.S. invasion of Panama, the government has argued that in this particular case the lives of American citizens are at stake. We must remember, however, that a large US military presence already existed in Panama which could arguably have handled the situation without an outright military onslaught.

At both emergency sessions of the Security Council and of the OAS, I call on the government to state categorically that it cannot and will not support any violation of the principle of non-intervention which would include military invasion of Panama by the United States.

THE WORLD FREE-STYLE SKI CUP

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House that the beautiful riding of Laurentides will once again host an international event.

World Cup free-style skiing will take place at Mont Gabriel, in the municipality of Mont-Rolland, on January 5, 6 and 7, 1990, and will include three sections: ballet, moguls and jumps. Athletes from more than 20 countries will compete in a very high calibre event, during which the talents and skills of competitors will be stretched to the utmost.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, free-style skiing is attracting an increasingly large following, both in Canada and abroad. It is a very demanding sport that requires steady nerves, daring, flexibility, agility and determination.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my appreciation for the work of our volunteers and wish the athletes the very best during this competition.

THE SENATE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal senators are at it again. They are attempting to delay Bill C-21, the unemployment insurance bill which this House passed six weeks ago.

They are doing it for purely partisan reasons. They are the same people, the same group of hacks, that refused to back Bill C-103. Remember that one, Mr. Speaker, the ACOA act back a couple of years ago? They nearly succeeded in killing that one, but they are not going to succeed on this one. Clearly, the Liberal senators care little for the men and women—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a point. However, I have to point out that it is not appropriate in this place to cast aspersions on the other place, and because I am bound by the rules I have had to interrupt the hon. member and I will have to go on.

THE SENATE

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, several months ago, the Liberal party, assisted by a non-elected Senate and for strictly partisan reasons, blocked the passage of Bill C-22, so that hundreds of Canadian researchers were unable to develop new drugs for the well-being of Canadians and thus create thousands of new jobs in research.

Today, we see the same scenario: the Liberals, with a Liberal non-elected majority in the Senate, have decided to block Bill C-21 and keep $800 million from being spent on much needed manpower training programs.

Mr. Speaker, are we really in a democratic country when this is the result of Liberal arrogance? Mr. Speaker, I deplore this perverse exercise. It is time it was stopped.

THE SENATE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in the past I have spoken in favour of the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C-21, and how they affect my riding.

Now Senator MacEachen and that Liberal bunch in the other place are denying my constituents those benefits. To the unemployed in my riding requiring retraining so that they can get back into the workforce, Liberals are saying: "wait". To those mothers who are experiencing problems during pregnancy and could use some additional benefits during the difficult times, Liberals are saying: "Keep working and suffer". To those families who want both mother and father to enjoy the birth of their child while allowing the mother to return to the workplace sooner, Liberals are saying: "Too bad". To the displaced older worker, who needs assistance to re-enter the workplace, Liberals are proving they really do not care. To parents who have waited a long time for the opportunity to adopt a child, Liberals are saying: "You are not entitled to parental benefits".

I call upon the Senate to show some caring and compassion for those in Canada who truly need help.

THE LATE DR. HELEN CREIGHTON

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the late Dr. Helen Creighton, a native of Dartmouth and one of the most outstanding Nova Scotians of her generation, who passed away last Tuesday at the age of 90.

In her early years, during the 1920s, she worked as a social worker and as a teacher before her love of music and folklore became her vocation. Starting in 1928, Helen Creighton became a familiar figure throughout rural Nova Scotia, bouncing down gravel roads, arriving at isolated homes, and chronicling the songs and stories of the people who had passed them down from generation to generation.

Throughout her lifelong pursuit, Dr. Creighton gathered and recorded over 4,000 songs in English, French, Gaelic, Micmac, and German and she wrote extensively on her maritime heritage. As testament to their worth, her works can be found in the Library of Congress in Washington, the National Archives and, most important, the Public Archives of Nova Scotia.

Dr. Creighton was a prolific writer and a great listener, but most of all she was a visionary who saw the value of the treasure of Nova Scotia's music, culture and heritage.

Mr. Speaker, colleagues, probably the best known song of Dr. Creighton's collection is Farewell to Nova Scotia. Today, on behalf of all Nova Scotians, I say farewell to her. Our generation and future generations will enjoy her remarkable legacy of music and folklore for she has truly given us a record of our history.

On behalf of the people of Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, and Canada, I say farewell and Godspeed to Dr. Helen Creighton.

SENATE REFORM

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, as we look around us this Christmas, we must not forget that there is still an overabundance of war and hunger and disease in the world. Yet, this is also a special year.

This year, as never before, we are seeing freedom and democracy and hope lit in the politics of many countries where there was none before.

Unfortunately, this spirit has not made much of an impression on the Government of Canada. Unreformed politics remain part of our own political system, particularly in our Upper House. Senator Murray, on behalf of the government, travels from provincial capital to provincial capital, a living insult to Senate reformers, urging premiers to ignore the Canadian public's rejection of Meech Lake.

And what of the Senate? When the Senate uses its constitutional power, the Conservatives cry that it is undemocratic. When an attempt is made to democratize the Senate, the Conservatives then say that it is unconstitutional. Now the Minister of Justice has openly mused that maybe the Senate should be abolished, saying in the Vancouver Sun, "I have to be convinced of the need for (any) Senate".

The P.C. government has still not tabled its position on the Senate, as it said it would. But Canadians are certainly beginning to see what the agenda really is.

PAY EQUITY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, for another year in a row Statistics Canada reports that the pay gap between women and men is as wide as it was a decade ago.

The government says it wants full equality for Canadian women. But what does this government mean by "equality"? Equality means earnings which are only 65 per cent as much as men but paying 100 per cent of the grocery bills, 100 per cent of the rent, and 100 per cent of the cost of child care.

Equality means watching the government talk about pay equity and fair employment practices, but legislating its own female hospital workers back to work because they asked for pay equity with men doing similar work. When will this government realize that equality means paying your own women employees at 100 per cent of the rate that male employees receive? When will this government realize that equality for women has to be real, direct and complete?

S. O. 31

ROMANIA

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to denounce the recent actions of the dictator of Romania, Nicolae Ceausescu and his henchmen.

As a Canadian of Hungarian ancestry, I have a special interest in Hungary, and in particular the brutal repression of the Hungarian minority of Romania, the largest ethnic minority in all of Europe. Ceausescu's terrorist police have persecuted Reverend Laszlo Tokes, about whom we have already heard in this House, and have now massacred people who have been caught up in the euphoria of freedom flowering in eastern Europe. Romania's actions are an affront to human rights, glasnost, and the very real thaw in the cold war. We must do more than protest on paper. I call on the government to immediately review our economic relations with the butcher of Bucharest. Let us do the right thing and back our words of protest with appropriate actions. Further, I call on the House to unanimously condemn the heinous actions of this political dinosaur.

FAMINE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, famine looms again for millions of people in Ethiopia, Eritrea and Tigré. The United Nations has announced a 100 per cent crop failure in the region where food production has long been disrupted by war.

The majority of those affected by the famine live in areas beyond Ethiopian government control, areas I visited in 1986. Ethiopia has been thwarting the international response to this situation. In November, diplomatic negotiations for safe passage agreements broke down.

This is no time for diplomatic niceties. Canada is moving too slowly to meet this challenge. Quiet diplomacy has become silent complicity as millions of people face death in the region today. CIDA has approved only half the food aid committed last year, which was a non-crisis year.

The worst fears of those of us who spoke out against the government cuts to development assistance are being realized. The result of Tory deficit reduction is indeed people dying in Africa. Canadians opened their hearts in 1984. We must respond with equal urgency and generosity now.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the riding of Cumberland—Colchester, Nova Scotia is not an area of high employment and, in fact, has much seasonal work. Through the successful efforts of many groups of municipal development officers, provincial agencies, ACOA and other federal programs in co-operation with the private sector, this spring and summer we experienced the lowest unemployment rate in recorded history.

However, due to the seasonal nature of many of our jobs, it is absolutely essential that Bill C-21, now stalled in the Senate, be passed immediately. I call on the retiring Leader of the Opposition, as well as all the new prospective leaders, and all the Atlantic opposition members, to apply pressure on their colleagues in the Senate to quickly pass this legislation.

The senators involved need never worry about being out of work and requiring unemployment insurance, but the people in my riding do. A quick passage of this bill would provide a sigh of relief and a merry Christmas for the people of Atlantic Canada.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, there is considerable evidence out there to prove that the government has not been listening before or since making its cuts to VIA Rail.

A retired military man and his wife phoned VIA Rail in April, 1989 to reserve seats from Petawawa to Calgary to visit their daughter. They were told that VIA Rail through Arnprior, Pembroke, Petawawa, North Bay to western Canada was all booked up.

The Governor of Rotary International for District 704, who lives in Montreal, phoned VIA Rail about six weeks ago to make reservations two weeks in advance for a Paul Harris Fellow Night to be held at CFB Petawawa. He was told he would not need a reservation. Two weeks later when he showed up at the train there was no room, so he had to cancel his visit and his speech.

The VIA Rail passenger service through the Ottawa Valley is so filled at times that people have to sit in the bar car because there are no other seats. The Ottawa Valley will be without passenger rail service because the government is cutting it out as of January 15, 1990. This is yet another cut to eastern Ontario. The Prime Minister said: "Use it or lose it". The fact is that it does not matter whether VIA Rail was being used or not, the government simply had it in its mind to cut. A public hearing into this issue must cover all these facts, because they have been unreal in many instances.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, low income, middle income Canadians and small business will be the victims of the goods and services tax. They are going to pay the price, and now they know just how much they are going to pay. Canadians are faced with high interest rates, a high Canadian dollar, lower consumer spending and a disaster in exports.

Is the Minister of Finance prepared to tell the bare, unvarnished truth to Canadians? Is it the policy of the Minister of Finance and the government to drive Canada into a recession to ensure that there is high unemployment to satisfy the insatiable appetite of the Governor of the Bank of Canada for zero inflation? Is that what your policy is?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): The only straight answer I can give to that question is no, Mr. Speaker.

I do want to comment on what the member said in the preamble to his question. He said that low income Canadians were going to be the major people suffering from the goods and services tax. I do not know how he can say that when it states on pages 33, 34, 35 that a single individual over age 65 will be $139 ahead after the goods and services tax. A one-earner couple, with two children, earning $25,000 will be $395 ahead. A two earner couple, with two children, earning $30,000 will be about $300 ahead. A single parent, with two children, earning in the $25,000 to $30,000 range will be ahead $267 to $346.

How can the hon. member stand up in the House and utter that nonsense when he knows that the statements in this document are saying exactly the opposite.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Finance is such a good reader, perhaps he would be so kind as to answer this question.

The minister told us yesterday that the deficit for this fiscal year should be about $30.5 billion, right on target. However, the minister did not produce figures on the deficit for the years to come. Will the minister confirm to the House today that the deficit for the current fiscal year will be maintained at $30.5 billion, and second, will he look in his book and tell us what is going to happen to the deficit in the years following the introduction of his GST?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm what I have said on a number occasions that the deficit for this current fiscal year is on track. I also said yesterday in my remarks, that the deficit next year is under some pressure, and it will probably require some expenditure reductions in order to bring it on track. That information will be made available to the public at budget time.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had the spectacle of seeing the Minister swallow himself whole. He bit the bullet, he back-peddled, he listened to the pollsters, and he set a GST rate at 7 per cent. Now, I wonder if the minister is going listen to the consumers of Canada, to business, to bankers, to the unanimous recommendation of the finance committee—he often refers to the work of the finance committee—and to the recommendations of the ten premiers across this country.

Will the Minister of Finance, for the benefit of Canadians and in the spirit of Christmas, eat crow and reduce the interest rates in this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can see that my hon. friend from Gander—Grand Falls is not here because I think he might be able to coach the hon. member a little bit better for his questions.

The hon. member refers to the work of the finance committee. I have a summary here which shows that the most common recommendation or statement that was made during the course of the finance committee hearings was that we should have a change from the existing 13.5 per cent federal sales tax to a goods and services tax. We have listened to that.

The hon. member makes these comments criticizing me for listening to Canadians. When I listen he says I am swallowing myself, and when we do not listen he says why are we not listening. We are listening, we have listened, and we are going to continue to listen.

I am not going to answer the question that he has just asked. I have answered that about half a dozen times over the course of the last three or four days. If he wants to get together with me, I will explain it to him chapter and verse. But I have given the House that answer many, many times.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance promised Canadians with tax reform a fairer tax system. Yesterday, he announced that he was at least temporarily setting the rate of the GST at 7 per cent. When he did so he asked large corporations and high-income Canadians for only $400 million while he was asking for $5.5 billion from everybody else including the lower-income Canadians, students, the elderly and small business.

Given that the sales tax is inherently regressive, especially since the credits to the poor are not indexed, would the minister please explain to Canadians what is his concept of fairness?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks—

An hon. Member: Page 12 of the book?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Friends across the way wonder what page of the book I am reading from. They have not read the book because if they had read the book they would not be asking the questions.

The hon. member is being misleading—I am not going to say deliberately misleading, I am going to say misleading—in the way that he expresses his question. He knows that as we have dropped the rate by two percentage points, obviously we are able to reduce the amount of protection that we are providing for people who want to buy a new home or people who are in low-income brackets, and we can also remove the middle-income tax rate reduction because people in low and middle-income brackets are going to be good beneficiaries of the drop in the rate.

If we had just left it at that, he would have had a reasonable question because the major beneficiaries would have been people in upper-income brackets. That is precisely why we brought in the upper-income surtax so that people throughout the country, whether they are low, middle or upper income, are all treated in approximately the same way, and in many cases better than they were, but very close to the way they had been treated under the 9 per cent proposal.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): We continue to see the inherent regressivity. I notice the minister did not address that one, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the minister also promised a sales tax that would be simple and straightforward, but he plans to increase the number of businesses that are to collect and pay the sales tax from 75,000 to more than one million. Furthermore, he intends to impose a sales tax at two levels of government. Despite the changes announced yesterday, it is still a nightmare: too complex and too difficult to administer.

Would the Minister explain to Canada's small businesses what he means by simple?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that I did not address his point about being inherently regressive. What was inherently regressive was the sales tax that we inherited in 1984. There was no refundable sales tax credit to offset the impact of sales tax in the hands of low-income Canadians. We introduced that in 1986. We have increased it twice, and we are increasing it again in a goods and services tax credit which is a rebate, a cheque paid to low-income Canadians four times a year. Seventy-five per cent of people who are in seniors' families and families led by a single parent will be better off.

• (1430)

How can he continue to utter that nonsense about this being an inherently regressive tax? We have changed that. It was inherently regressive. It is now a progressive tax.

PANAMA

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Early this morning we learned of the American invasion of Panama. We understand that President Bush telephoned the Prime Minister after the invasion was under way. I feel that Canadians have the right to know whether the Prime Minister expressed any objections to the President regarding that military invasion.

The Prime Minister stated this morning that in the OAS, Canada would not support any kind of action to condemn the invasion of Panama. Does the Prime Minister not think that the time has come when Americans no longer have the right to expect that they can intervene militarily in Latin America whenever they choose?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. McLaughlin: Is this the way for a civilized government to act in a civilized world? When is the Prime Minister going to communicate to the American government that Latin America is no longer the private backyard of the United States?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, indeed I received a telephone call early this morning from President Bush in respect of the actions in Panama. Following immediate consultation with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Government of Canada issued a statement which says in part:

> The Canadian government regrets the use of force by the U.S.A. in Panama but understands and is sympathetic to the American action in the circumstances, particularly given their concern over the escalating threats to American citizens in Panama.

If my hon. friend believes that Canadians and/or Americans should be indifferent to a declaration of war against the United States by Mr. Noriega, by the murder of American citizens by Mr. Noriega and by his security threats, and if my hon. friend, the leader of the NDP, believes that Canadians ought to remain indifferent to this callous abuse of liberty and life, the Progressive Conservative government is not among her supporters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it is not Canadians who are indifferent to what happens in Central America. Canadians want to see peaceful solutions in Central America. They want to see us use the United Nations, the Security Council and the OAS for those purposes.

Mr. Speaker, we too find Noriega reprehensible. We too feel concerned that international efforts have to be made so that democratic government can be restored in Panama.

We also recognize that Noriega was a creation of the American government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. McLaughlin: Surely, it was when Mr. Noriega decided not to agree with the American government he became the object of the excuse for an invasion.

I wonder if the American government's actions indicate that this government believes that the U.S., or that any other country, should feel free to invade a country at any time when it disapproves of a government.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the sentiments expressed by the Leader of the New Democratic Party are so far removed from the mainstream fundamental values of Canadians, that she has just indicated why they will never, ever, be called upon to form a government in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Has the hon. leader forgotten that there was a democratically elected government in May of this year that was abused, beaten and terrorized by General Noriega and his thugs?

Has the hon. member forgotten that General Noriega is under indictment for drug running and corruption in the United States?

Has the hon. member forgotten that General Noriega authorized the issuance of a declaration of war against the United States, and subsequent thereto American citizens were killed?

The United States of America acted to protect the interests of its nationals. Its conduct is governed by international treaties in respect of Panama. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said many times that intervention ought to be at all times as a last resort. We believe that in these particular circumstances, the United States of America and the President of the United States acted properly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, if Canada supports the actions of the American government, does this mean we believe the United States or any other nation is free to use force when it disapproves of a government? What is Canada going to say to the Organization of American States and the UN Security Council about these issues? What about the role of intermediary power that this government wanted Canada to play within the Organization of American States?

This government refuses to condemn U.S. support for the military in Salvador, and it refuses to condemn the American invasion of Panama. Does this mean it has no independent foreign policy?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my answer to the leadership of the New Democratic Party is the same in French.

General Noriega declared war against the United States. A U.S. citizen was killed by the general's forces and his wife was threatened. The United States intervened following this declaration of war, to protect American citizens living in Panama, and it did so legitimately, by virtue of an international treaty concluded many years ago.

But the New Democrats think there is something repugnant about this, even though the Secretary of State for External Affairs clearly said that this action was taken as a last resort—However, if after a declaration of war and the shooting of a foreign citizen, the leadership of the New Democratic Party still thinks the U.S. reaction is excessive, this government and this country will never be able to support her arguments or external policies.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify a point that the Prime Minister is making. But first of all I would like to make it perfectly clear that on this side of the House we do not like Noriega.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1440)

Mrs. Stewart: However, Canada has always supported the fundamental principle of non-intervention as enshrined in international law and the UN charter.

In response to questions regarding Canada's position on the invasion of Panama, the Secretary of State said intervention by force in Panama by U.S. forces is a dangerous precedent. My question is to the Prime Minister.

Do we or do we not support the principle of non-intervention without exception? If we make an exception for the U.S. now, how can we expect to be credible when, in the future, some other country invades a sovereign territory on the same pretext?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite vital on this important matter that the House recognize the unusual circumstances that exist in Panama.

There are some 12,000 Americans in Panama by right of treaty. Those people have been directly threatened by a declaration of war by General Noriega that was then followed up by the murder of one of those troops and threats against the wife of that person.

As a student of affairs in Latin America, the hon. member would know there have been extensive efforts made to try to resolve this question by negotiation. Those efforts failed.

When I spoke this morning to the President of Venezuela, he made the point that one of the reasons that this action occurred was because Venezuela, and for that matter Canada, and other nations involved in the Organization of American States who sought to resolve the problem by negotiation were unable to resolve it. It could not be resolved by that means.

We had a situation where there were Americans in Panama by right of treaty. They were threatened. War had been declared against them.

My statement was very clear. We believe that that kind of intervention creates a dangerous precedent. It should only be resorted to when all else fails and when the circumstances are unique. The circumstances were unique. All else had failed. In those circumstances we think it was a justified action for the President and the Government of the United States.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the minister responds with his justification, good intentions for the U.S. invading Panama but can I remind him that the road to hell is paved with good intentions.

Canada is a new member of the OAS and has an important voice both in that forum and at the UN. Both organizations are convening emergency meetings today to address Panama. Will Canada make it clear that at these meetings we will abide by the principle of non-interventionism?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at those meetings we will abide by the policy that has been enunciated by the Government of Canada today in the aftermath of those events and, indeed, by principles that have been enunciated by former governments of Canada.

Let me quote from Hansard, October 25, 1983, as reported at page 28311. The Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau responding to a question stated:

> —there were American nationals there. The United States was certainly entitled to attempt to protect those nationals.

That had to do with a situation where the nationals were not present by right of treaty, as they were present by right of treaty in the circumstances in Panama. That happened in a situation where there were not the extenuating circumstances of extensive attempts to try to resolve this situation by negotiation, extensive attempts that had failed.

A number of countries that are members of the Organization of American States have responded to these events. The Foreign Minister of Costa Rica earlier today said, as we had, that they regretted the actions but that they would not enter into condemnation. There are other members of the Organization of American States as, indeed, there are countries around the world that are not about to take this opportunity simply to condemn the United States perhaps for other reasons.

Mr. Speaker, if you want to look at a list of those whose reaction was simply unqualified condemnation of the United States in this case that list involves Libya, Nicaragua, Cuba, Iran, the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

This government's excessive, compulsive fixation with high interest rates is choking exports, it is stifling investment, it is driving up our deficit and it is costing Canadians jobs.

On top of all this, yesterday the Conference Board announced that Canadian industry plans a major cutback in research and development. Canadian business is losing confidence with this government's monetary policy. For Canadians high interest is not a level playing field, it is a quagmire of quicksand.

Will the minister admit to the House today that these cuts in R and D prove that his policy just does not work?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this government is very much aware of the importance of low interest rates. We ensured during the earlier part of the last Parliament that we would push very hard for low interest rates because we thought it was appropriate at the time. But we have seen in the last year and a half some upward inflationary pressures. Those pressures are still there.

If the hon. member wants us to ignore those pressures, then we will be right back to the late 1970s and early 1980s when we were in that huge recession which did such damage to the economy, to investment, and to research and development—all on a permanent basis.

An hon. Member: There is no comparison.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Hon. members say there is no comparison. I would just like to remind them that in 1976, I think, the inflation rate was about 5.5 per cent, about what it is today. About four years later it was 13 per cent.

An hon. Member: Internationally.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Internationally, he says. If hon. members want to look at what is happening in other countries, they will see that inflation is creeping up in a number of other countries. Interest rates in Japan have been moving up. Interest rates in Germany have been moving up. Interest rates in the U.K. have been moving up. So they are up in a number of countries in the world.

If we do not want to avoid this problem getting worse and prevent getting into a repeat of 1981–82, then we can follow exactly the course that the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party want to follow which will lead us into inflation at much higher levels and cause a permanent loss of the competitive position that is so important to this country.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. During the Finance Committee hearings, it was clearly shown that the GST will be an administrative nightmare for small business. My question is very simple: Why did the minister yesterday abandon small business when it will have difficulty collecting a consumption tax in Canada, which is the only country in the world to have 10 consumer tax systems? Why does the finance minister want to kill the entrepreneurial spirit of small business in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where this hon. member has been. He has been in the House since 1984.

During that time he has seen the number of things that we have done for small business, to encourage the small business community. These have been systematically opposed by the Liberal Party. First, there was the $500,000 capital gains exemption. Second, there is the substantial increase in the small business loan authority. Third, there is the increase in the refundability of research and development credits that are there only for small business—again, a very strong encouragement to the small business community.

In this particular GST proposal we have brought in a number of measures, streamlined accounting, a low-income threshold for those who do not have to report and just two weeks ago tomorrow I met with—

Mr. Gagliano: Can you define what is "streamlined accounting"?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member cannot keep his mouth shut while someone is speaking.

• (1450)

Mr. Speaker, it is a lot easier to hear if you keep your ears open and your mouth shut.

In addition to that, Canada has the lowest corporate income tax rates for small business. We reduced those in income tax reform in 1988.

The hon. member is shaking his head. These are all precise examples of how we have helped small business. If the hon. member keeps shaking his head he will not be able to hear anything and he will not be able to learn anything.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The members of this House are aware of a bill passed in the other place yesterday concerning the unemployment insurance program. The deliberate delay of Bill C–21 by an appointed body is an unacceptable frustration of the democratic process.

This government has put forward changes which will make this country more competitive and will give unemployed Canadians better access to job training. All reasonable Canadians will see that this game must not continue.

Could the minister advise the House of how the government intends to respond to this legislation?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to treat what has gone on in the other place as a frivolous and silly interference with the good policies of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. McDougall: Let me point out to the hon. members opposite, including those who were on the legislative committee, that the members of the Senate committee are now studying Bill C–21. They are studying it one word at a time. We are not sure when they will finish.

The legislative committee heard 200 witnesses in four weeks. The committee in the other place has heard 15 witnesses in six weeks. This is not serious study as far as I am concerned.

What this bill that they have passed over there does is ignore all the other benefits, not just the variable entry requirements, but the benefits for older workers and the benefits for women. You hear the women over there all booing and hissing. What about the extension of maternity and adoption benefits?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. McDougall: For the rural areas of Canada, what about the fact that our bill does away with the penalty for seasonal workers who repeat on unemployment insurance? They are going to be penalized.

PANAMA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Crosbie: The Noriega lover is up.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona has the floor.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the military action by the American government in Panama is a very serious matter. It is taken seriously by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, even if it is not by some of his back–benchers. It is taken seriously by the opposition.

It seems to me that there is a great deal of room for legitimate criticism of what the Americans have done and that is what we are engaged in here. It is not a question of anybody being a Noriega lover or any of the kind of heckling coming from members opposite.

No one approved of the Noriega regime. It is a question of whether the end, which we all shared in this case, the restoration of democracy in Panama, justified the means in this case.

We are suggesting that what the American government has done sets a dangerous precedent, as the minister himself said. We are asking the government, the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State, to say whether or not they appreciate the full extent of what the American government has done at a time when the other superpower has been relinquishing the view that what happens in geographical proximity to it gives it this arbitrary right to intervene. What happens to the overall relationship between east and west when the United States seems to be going forward into the past and using the same sort of doctrine that it has been employing for decades in Central America?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I agree that it is an important issue. I agree that it is one that deserves to be examined with some care. As the Government of Canada said in our official statement, we are worried about the precedent. We think the precedent has to be very strictly contained.

The hon. member surely understands that it is inaccurate to describe this as an arbitrary action or, indeed, to make an equation with other things that might have been done by other countries in other places. What happened here had to do with a country in which the United States had 12,000 troops present by agreement, present by an international treaty. Those people were threatened by a deliberate declaration of war against their country that was then made more personal by the murder of one of those troops and threats posed against members of that person's family.

The other factor which the hon. member has followed with some care has been that the Organization of American States, and other organizations, over the last several months have been working extensively to try to find a peaceful resolution to this question. The Americans co-operated in that process.

As the President said early this morning, "There comes a time when enough is enough". They faced a situation where a declaration of war had been made against their citizens present in Panama under the protection and cover of international treaty. It was not an arbitrary act. We believe it does not create a precedent, but we certainly want to ensure that it is not seen as creating a precedent.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, when the Special Committee on the Peace Process in Central America was in Central America we found that people on both the left and the right of the political spectrum were very suspicious of the view that the Americans took of their own role in Panama. I would be very surprised if in the following days we do not see a similar concern expressed by member states of the OAS.

I think the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State are very mistaken if they think that Canadians do not share a general view of the way in which the Americans are very selective in their outrage about the deaths of Americans.

I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he recalls, for instance, the death of four American nuns at the hands of the regime in El Salvador, which did not provoke the same kind of outrage, did not provoke the same kind of military action. The problem here is that the rhetoric which surrounds the American invasion in this case is rhetoric which is not lived up to in many other circumstances.

I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs this. Is he at least prepared to acknowledge that there are many other instances in which regimes attack Americans, attack their own people, attack their clergy, attack their human rights activists and yet Washington does nothing? If he would at least acknowledge the hypocrisy of American rhetoric in this case, he might have more credibility with the American people.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is well acquainted with the revolutionary changes that have been brought to eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, by the determination of Mr. Gorbachev, very eloquently, very persuasively, to encourage people to turn to new thinking and not to be the captives of old images of a former time.

We have had this discussion before. I suggest to the hon. member that it is time for him to put some of his prejudices against the United States aside, to judge what is done on the basis of the circumstances in a particular case. He should indulge in a little new thinking.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Bill S-12 which was passed by the Senate yesterday would extend the qualification period for unemployment insurance for 10 weeks into 1990 in those areas of the country where there is high unemployment.

This bill, S–12, is virtually the same as the Conservative government's bill which it introduced and passed in 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988. The Official Opposition is ready to give unanimous consent to pass this bill today without any debate.

Earlier this week the Prime Minister said that he did not want to hurt the unemployed in the high unemployment regions of this country. Will he agree to pass this bill today without any debate, immediately, and we will give our co–operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is the hon. member and his colleagues in the other place who are hurting the people who are unemployed in this country. It is not 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987 or 1988. It is 1989. It is time to make some changes in this country. It is going to be better for workers across Canada in the future. It is going to give them jobs for the 1990s. It will do away with the repeater provisions for seasonal workers. It is going to help women with maternity benefits and sickness benefits at the same time.

If the hon. member would take his head out of the sand, we could get somewhere on this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the government knows that Bill C–21 is not the answer. Bill C–21 cuts $1.3 billion from the unemployment insurance benefits. Bill C–21 terminates the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund which last year was $2.8 billion. Bill C–21 is not the answer to the unemployed. Over 200 witnesses—

Mr. Speaker: Given the time, I ask the member to put his question.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, over 200 witnesses want to be heard on this bill in the Senate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: My question is the following: If the government is sincere in not wanting to hurt the unemployed, will it not agree to pass Bill C–12 today? We will give it our full co–operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is saying that Bill C–21 which was very thoughtfully put together by this government and very thoughtfully developed as a policy for the 1980s—

Mr. Wappell: We are going into the 1990s.

Mrs. McDougall: It had hearings across the country and heard 200 interventions in four weeks. What the hon. member is now saying is that that which solves the problem is not good for them. It is their fault that the people are going to have 14 weeks instead of 10 weeks.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, on December 11 the Minister of Finance stated: "I think I understand the tax". He may understand how the tax is constructed, but he does not understand how Canadians will be penalized by it.

The minister has been convinced by his own propaganda. All Canadians will pay more. They will pay a tax on distance and on transportation costs. They will even pay a tax on heating costs.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Ms. Marleau: Absolutely nothing in the proposed changes addresses the regional impact of the GST. Why has the minister once again ignored the needs of Canadians? Why has the minister again ignored the needs of the regions of this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not ignoring the needs of the regions of this country. That is one of the key benefits of the goods and services tax. Over–all, the regions of the country are the major beneficiaries.

If she looks at the economic data that is in the technical paper she will see that in those regions of the country where they have resource development, major capital intensive industries or industries that are export–oriented, similar to the industries in her home town, they are the ones that will benefit from this because the tax is removed from exports. It improves the ability of new mines to be opened. It will ensure that old mines which might be closed are kept open a little bit longer to allow for them to continue employing people in her own backyard.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I think it is safe to say that the people, particularly the unemployed in Atlantic Canada, are not interested in the spitting match between this place and the Senate. They are not interested in the lover's quarrel between the Conservatives in the government and the Liberals in the Senate. What they are really interested in is being able to collect their unemployment insurance benefits under the variable entrance requirements.

The unemployed in the Atlantic are not statistics. They cannot be played with in politics. They are human beings, flesh and blood and bones.

Why are you using the Liberals to play politics on the backs of working class people who are unemployed? Why do you not extend the variable entrance requirements now?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if there are any lovers in this House, it is between the two parties on the other side.

Let me just say that in terms of the workers of Canada, the workers of Canada deserve better than an old-fashioned unemployment insurance bill which does not help them prepare for the future. What they deserve is training money. What they deserve is the repeal of the repeater's provision. What they deserve are sickness benefits, along with maternity provisions, all that and the variable entrance requirements. The variable entrance requirements in our bill are much more sensitive to the workers in his region than is this bill. I will wait for my bill, thank you.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to respond to a point of order that was raised by the member for Lambton—Middlesex, as reported at page 7060 of Hansard for December 18. He was asking Your Honour to make a decision about withdrawing a remark that I made when I indicated that he was misleading when he suggested that the projected drop in farm income was the deliberate result of government policy. I indicated that that was not the case. I used the word "misleading". I did not use the words "intentionally misleading", which I know is unparliamentary.

He also indicated that the government was responsible for the drop in the price of grain since we came into office. I indicated to him at that time that we were concerned about the drop in incomes in 1990, that we had a process in place to review some of the existing policies, that we were monitoring the situation, and that if there was need for interim assistance as the situation unfolded we would be prepared, as we were in previous years, to look at the situation.

The government has no control over the price of commodities established in the international marketplace nor do we have any significant control over rainfall. Under these conditions we always monitor the situation and respond. I would simply say, in response to your indication that you wanted assurance that implicit in my answer was not the intention to accuse the member of deliberately misleading, that that was not the intention. I used the word "mislead". I think it is parliamentary. I did not use the words "intentionally misleading", therefore I do not believe it would be appropriate to have the word withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. minister. I shall consider it and report back to the House if appropriate.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS – FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and in doing so, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make the following remarks about this report.

The public accounts committee today tables a report dealing with a serious problem in the management of the tax system. Substantial losses in revenues—$2.4 billion from the federal sales tax—have been incurred because of a tax avoidance procedure involving marketing companies.

The problem has become much more serious since 1986 when a court decision struck down earlier applicable tax rulings which had limited the avoidance activity. The committee pointed out that the leakage of taxes was and is continuing.

Although two complex proposals were developed by the Department of Finance to deal with the problem, neither proposal was implemented. The committee noted the effects of tax avoidance on the integrity, equity and effectiveness of the tax system and recommended that the government act expeditiously to deal with tax avoidance problems.

Other key recommendations in this report call upon the Department of Finance to monitor tax avoidance closely and to develop quickly workable remedial measures based on a careful analysis of costs and benefits.

The Minister of Finance has been requested to respond to the committee's recommendation by March 31, 1990.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS – SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee of External Affairs and International Trade regretting and condemning the death threats received recently by the family of Miss Karen Ridd, condemning in the strongest possible language we can muster the introduction of death squad activities exported from El Salvador to this country, and requesting immediate government intervention in this matter and a report to the House.

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS – INTERIM REPORT

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, an interim report from the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs.

This interim report is aimed at ensuring Canada's Armed Forces have the ability to monitor and to respond to threats to our maritime sovereignty. Although tensions between east and west have subsided dramatically in recent months, it should be borne in mind that Warsaw treaty nations retain a formidable military capacity and that Canada remains committed to collective security with our North American ally and with other members of NATO.

Just as important, our Armed Forces are essential to protect against contemporary and increasing threats to Canada's sovereignty. We must defend against the traffic in illegal drugs that weaken the fabric of our nation. We must assure the security of our fisheries and other ocean resources. Canada must protect against foreign and domestic polluters who disregard Canadian environmental regulations and we must have a capacity to defend Canada from illegal immigrants.

We should note and be prepared for the fact that most international terrorists are trained in military procedures and use military equipment. Canada must always have a capacity to undertake surveillance of these activities and respond in the name of sovereignty.

Some of these challenges are new. Nevertheless they threaten our sovereignty and Canada must have a capacity to respond effectively.

To counter these threats and others that may emerge in the future the committee believes that Canada should have the capacity to monitor and react to incidents on our coasts, not just with surface ships and helicopters now being acquired, but also with underwater detection capability and a sufficient number of maritime patrol aircraft to provide adequate coverage to our vast ocean territories, the world's longest national coastline.

The committee firmly believes that the dedicated men and women of our Armed Forces should have the tools to do the job Canadians expect of them, protecting our national sovereignty, thereby securing our future which is an essential role of our Canadian Armed Forces.

Finally, all members of the committee—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has certainly made the point that the committee wished to make, and probably has said it in a longer way than is usually needed in the House.

PRESENTATION OF FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON MULTICULTURALISM AND CITIZENSHIP

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the first report of the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism and Citizenship concerning the 1991 census.

PRESENTATION OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON COMMUNICATIONS AND CULTURE

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): I also have the honour to table, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

The committee's unanimous report recommends adopting legislation on the status of the artist. The legislation would give associations of performing artists such as ACTRA, Actor's Equity and the Union des artistes the right to negotiate collective agreements on behalf of their members.

This report was prepared by the Sub-Committee on the Status of the Artist which I have the honour of chairing. I would also like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to thank all members of the sub-committee and those of the standing committee for their totally nonpartisan co-operation. I would also like to include the staff by whom we were so well seconded.

[English]

The committee requests that the government provide a comprehensive response to this report in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 109.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in response to remarks made a moment ago by the chairman of the public accounts committee in presenting his report. He suggested that two complicated solutions had been put forward and not been acted upon by the government. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the reason they were not acted upon is that another committee of this House, the finance committee, found them to be unworkable and reported that back to the House and that view was shared by all three parties and it is a misleading—

Mr. Speaker: I am not so sure that is a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, this bill asks the government to consider entering into negotiations with the international community to bring it to enter into an agreement prohibiting drift-net fishing in international waters and to impose sanctions against any country which refuses to enter into such an agreement.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: First reading of Senate Public Bills.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I wish to advise the House that the government will be voting against first reading of this bill. It offends Section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The Standing Orders state that:

> The House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue that has not been first recommended to the House by a message for the Governor General, that is, a royal recommendation.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. I think that I should have had the opportunity in the first place to move the first reading of the bill as you called it on the Order Paper.

I would so move first reading of Senate Public Bill S-12.

In response to the minister's statement, if you wish to hear argument, there is considerable argument that the Senate, as the House of Lords in England, can introduce such bills. They were in fact introduced under previous Conservative governments under the government of the right hon. member for Yellowhead. The hon. Senator Flynn introduced a similar type of bill and in the 1920s when the Meighen government was in power similar bills were introduced.

We put to the House Bill S-12 as sent to this House by the Senate which will extend the variable entrance requirements for unemployment insurance in high unemployment regions.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace has made a point of order. I shall proceed with that, of course. The Speaker is in a position where I recognized the Minister of Justice who made a statement, not an argument.

I now must put the motion by the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace to the House.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SITUATION IN ROMANIA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations among the parties and I think you would find that there is unanimous agreement for the approval of the following motion which I would move, seconded by my colleagues from Northumberland and Winnipeg Transcona:

That this House, noting that:

—authorities in Romania have directed their armed forces and police to attack the unarmed civilian population of Timisoara in contravention of all humane principles of conduct,

—the citizens of Timisoara were peacefully advocating democratic principles and human freedoms, as is the right of all peoples of the world and —hundreds of citizens of Timisoara have been killed and injured as a result of the immoral attack, unequivocally condemns this brutal use of force against the population of Timisoara and other Romanian communities and calls upon the authorities of Romania to cease this senseless killing and violence and to begin to respect the human rights of all its citizens.

These immoral attacks have killed and injured hundreds of people.

It unanimously condemn the excessive force used against the people of Timisoara and other Romanian communities.

It insist that the Government of Romania stop this massacre and this senseless violence immediately and that it respect the rights and freedoms of all its citizens.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to just add to the words of my colleague across the floor in the condemnation of Romania for its actions in that country of late, particularly as against the citizens of Timisoara.

Canada has had trade relations with Romania in the past. I think that these trade relations must be reassessed in light of what is happening to these people. Romania has signed a human rights convention with the Community of Economic and Development Co-operation in Europe but has taken every opportunity to personally abstain from abiding by the convention which it has signed.

I think that this government, and we as a nation, should do everything we can to approach the governments of the region in a bilateral fashion including trying ourselves to negotiate with the Government of Romania to try to bring to its attention that we disapprove of what it has perpetrated against its own people and that we ask it to change its ways.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, last night, members of all three parties had an opportunity to participate in a vigil held outside the unfinished human rights monument in front of the courthouse on Elgin Street. At that time we had an opportunity to meet with members of the Hungarian community here in Canada. One of the things they very strongly desired was that the House of Commons might find a way to express unanimously its condemnation of the actions of the Romanian Government, and I am very happy that the House has been able to do this. I hope that it has the desired effect on the Romanian government.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Minister have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I believe you will also find consent for the following motion as there has been discussion among the three parties. I move:

That, immediately following the vote on Bill C-28, the Right Hon. Secretary of State will make a statement concerning events in Panama and that his statement shall be followed by one speaker from the Liberals and one speaker from the NDP; that both speakers from these two parties will be given adequate time to respond to the statement and will not be restricted by the usual restrictions which apply to ministerial statements; and that, following these three statements, the following adjournment motion will be deemed adopted:

That, when the House adjourns today it stand adjourned until one o'clock p.m. on Monday, January 22, 1990, provided that the Speaker may recall the House at anytime before that date for the sole purpose of Royal Assent; and that, the number of allotted days in the period ending not later than March 26, 1990, be reduced from nine to eight; and that, the mid-winter break week for 1990, when the House will not sit, be from the time of adjournment on Friday, February 23 to one o'clock p.m. on Monday, March 5, 1990.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the House. If I could ask consent, there is a further motion regarding the sitting hours for Mondays. Unfortunately, the House leader has that motion with him and I do not have a copy. If we could have consent later in the afternoon to come back to that, I would be happy to move the motion at that time.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of the House that the motion that we adopted to adjourn the House later this day states that when the House adjourns today, it stands adjourned until 1 p.m. Monday, January 22, 1990. I take it that the House knew what it was doing then and that we would not have to come back and do anything else but comply with the adopted motion as agreed.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. The motion as I read it was passed to the table officers. I do not have a copy in front of me to verify the wording. Of course, what we were looking for was to come back at the usual time on Monday, January 22, 1990, for the usual procedures.

• (1620)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for the confusion. It may have something to do with the Christmas recess that seems to be coming upon us and certainly has come upon me.

It may help if I also move the following motion:

That, effective on the first Monday the House sits in January, 1990 and on each subsequent Monday until further Order, the hours of sitting and the arrangement of business for Mondays be as follows:

1) The House to sit at 1.00 p.m., with Private Members' Business following Prayers, until 2.00 p.m.;

2) Statements by Members at 2.00 p.m.;

3) Oral Questions at 2.15 p.m.;

4) Routine Proceedings at 3.00 p.m., followed by Government Orders until 7.00 p.m.;

5) Adjournment Proceedings at 7.00 p.m.; and

That the appropriate changes be made to the next printing of the Standing Orders by the Speaker and the Clerk.

I believe that takes care of all of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there agreement to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition with some 100 names. This petition, however, represents petitions with some 25,000 names from all parts of Canada collected by the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation. Once these other petitions are certified, they will also be tabled.

The petition I am presenting today, like these other petitions, calls upon the government to abandon its clawback of the old age pension and the family allowance and I hope the government will listen to this plea of tens of thousands of Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition here from many people throughout the Ottawa valley who protest the removal of the train travelling from Montreal through Ottawa to Arnprior, Pembroke, Petawawa, Chalk River, North Bay and on through to western Canada because this train has been proven to be widely used. In some cases passengers have been put in the bar car because there were no seats left, and the Prime Minister said use it or lose it. These people are saying that the service is being used and that it should be kept on and they want this passenger service to continue. They are very upset and they also feel that when VIA Rail is phoned for reservations it is not giving the truth to the Canadian public. VIA Rail is saying that the train is overbooked and it is turning down bookings, then it turns around and says the service is not being used. As a result, the train is being taken off as of January 15. I strongly protest on the petitioners behalf the removal of this train and I strongly protest the kind of information that VIA Rail is giving out to potential customers—

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member has made his point.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under Standing Order 36 to present petitions on behalf of a number of people, well over 200, from the lower mainland of British Columbia, New Westminster, Burnaby and Surrey.

These petitioners are upset about the cuts in VIA passenger rail service and they say that passenger rail service is essential for many Canadians and has been a part of Canada for well over 100 years.

They feel that these cuts will result in serious reductions in the passenger rail service and threaten maintenance, safety and jobs. They are asking this Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, to upgrade the VIA equipment and to guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its real mandate to provide passenger service for Canadians on trains.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of the constituents in my riding of Lambton—Middlesex, particularly constituents in the Park Hill and Nelson Craig area, who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

I also have two more petitions from people from other parts of Ontario that I wish to table at the same time.

POLLUTION

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured once again to rise in the House pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of several hundred Chippewa and Patawanamee natives of the First Nation and other residents of Kent who are agonizing over the government's blatant disregard for their rights. I call upon Parliament to fulfil its responsibilities to hundreds of thousands of Canadians and Americans living along Lake St. Clair and stop the dredging off Seaway Island and dumping the potentially hazardous sediment into the open waters of Lake St. Clair pending the findings of a full and public environmental hearing.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today as I have many times before with a petition given to me by a number of farmers from the province of Saskatchewan who are concerned about the removal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board by this government. They feel that there was not prior consultation with the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee or major farm organizations in western Canada. They feel that farm marketing boards are essential to the orderly marketing of farm products in this country and should not be weakened but be strengthened. They call upon this government to replace oats under the Canadian Wheat Board and to give oats and barley the same protection that wheat has under the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to stand before this House today. Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have before me quite a number of petitions signed, and for the sake of saving time, I shall not present them one at a time. I will present them as a lot.

There are some 3,305 signatures from the residents of my riding of Timmins—Chapleau who are absolutely appalled at the government's proposal for this goods and services tax. They are asking that the government reconsider this goods and services tax and abolish it; to go back to the drawing board and start again, not lower it, as was proposed by the government, but to scrap it and start over again. The message from the constituents of Timmins—Chapleau is very clear. They are saying, "Ebenezer Wilson, it is not too late, change the tax".

OPPOSITION TO RECOMMENDATIONS OF TASK FORCE ON TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am today tabling three petitions which reject the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas. The signers, from the isolated community of Lebel-sur-Quévillon in Abitibi, are concerned about the recommendations of this as yet unfinished report.

Mr. Speaker, the final report of this task force makes no mention of the Cree-Naskapi James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement and the final report on regional disparities of isolated posts made by the Government of Quebec in October 1989.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, today I have the privilege and duty to present petitions signed by over 11,000 residents of Hamilton Mountain adding to the total of more than 20,000 from Hamilton Mountain that we have already presented.

These petitioners have spoken out overwhelmingly against the proposed goods and services tax. They believe that the tax is unfair, that is places an unnecessary additional burden on low and middle-income Canadians. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon this House to reject the goods and services tax proposal.

CFB LONDON

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the First Royal Canadian Regiment celebrates its one hundred and sixth regimental birthday. CFB London has been the home of the first RCR for 106 years. It has been an integral part of not only this country but our municipality for 106 years.

The petition is from some 5,000 people from all ridings in London. This is in addition to the 7,000 who have already petitioned this government to change its mind with respect to moving one RCR and closing CFB London. The costs have moved from $30 million to $110 million to essentially move those troops and I suggest that the government rescind its action.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition with some 5,000 names from people throughout southwestern Ontario, in addition to the 10,000 I previously submitted from London and southwestern Ontario, calling on the government to rescind its actions with respect to the cutbacks on VIA Rail which will be initiated and instituted on January 15, 1990.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present 93 petitions containing the names of 2,675 residents of Stormont—Dundas who oppose the Conservative government's goods and services tax.

They believe that the GST is totally unacceptable as it would cause serious and unfair hardship for low and middle-income Canadians and create an onerous burden for small businesses in Canada.

The petitioners therefore call upon this House to reject this tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to table ten petitions containing the names of 300 residents of Stormont—Dundas who are opposed to the GST because it unfairly hits popular and affordable recreational sports in Canada. They believe that taxing participatory sports is a basic mistake because it places an unfair burden on working men and women, seniors, young people and the disabled who participate in recreational sports on limited incomes. They therefore urge the House to reject this insidious tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 36, considering that this is the last opportunity to address this matter in the House of Commons before the closure of the VIA Canadian line on January 15, I am pleased to present the last in a series of petitions. These two petitions, signed by 108 constituents from the city of Revelstoke in British Columbia, point out that the city of Revelstoke will become a truly isolated community should VIA Rail passenger service be discontinued because the Trans-Canada Highway experiences winter closures due to avalanches and there is no scheduled to air service to the community.

They further point out that this discontinuance of rail passenger service will put more vehicles on the Trans-Canada Highway through the Rogers Pass. The highway is already close to capacity in the summer months and will require twinning at great expense to the people of Canada.

They also point out that the discontinuance of rail passenger service will put more vehicles on the highways passing through Glacier and Mount Revelstoke National Parks causing greater environmental damage to these ecological reserves.

Finally, they ask Parliament to proceed in such a way that passenger service will not be discontinued through this community and, before any such service cut takes place, that public hearings be held across Canada to investigate ways in which passenger rail service can be preserved and enhanced throughout the country.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present, on behalf of a number of citizens, ten petitions signed by citizens of my riding of Saskatoon—Humboldt and the riding of my colleague from Saskatchewan, the Minister of National Defence.

These citizens call upon the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to reform the taxation system to make sure that it is a system which is not regressive and does not harm the ordinary Canadian.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition that is signed by about 200 residents from such places as Ottawa, Nepean, Sault Ste. Marie, Richmond, Kanata and Calabogie. These people are concerned with the proposal to discontinue so much of the service of VIA Rail which will injure small towns, youth and senior citizens.

They therefore ask Parliament to reject any proposed reductions or eliminations of VIA Rail, to modernize the existing equipment and to build a high-speed passenger train between Montreal and Windsor.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition from 100 residents of Toronto and Vancouver concerning the low-level flights being conducted in eastern Quebec and Labrador and the proposal for a NATO-NORAD base there. They ask Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing the use of their lands for NATO-NORAD attack training.

They demand that the low level flight training cease and that the government cease to ask for a NATO base in Labrador and that the funding for the Canada's NATO-NORAD operations be redirected to enable Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and for promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege today to present a large number of petitions—so large that I can hardly hold them—from residents of my constituency, all of which I want to draw to the particular attention of the Minister of Finance.

The petitions are signed by 1,763 residents of this area, including the communities of Beauval, Dorintosh, Goodsoil, Loon Lake, Makwa, Pierceland and Rapid View. Included in that number are 1,137 residents from the community of Meadow Lake alone.

The petitioners note that the report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas fails to recognize the higher cost of living affecting residents in these northern designated areas and, therefore, call upon Parliament to reject the recommendations of the task force on northern benefits and call on the minister to develop a fair and equitable tax benefit program recognizing the financial needs of people in northern and isolated areas.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present a large number of petitions on two subjects this afternoon. First of all, I have 1,445 signatures of people from the Ottawa area, mostly from my riding of Ottawa South, objecting to the imposition of the goods and services tax as proposed by the minister at 9 per cent, and even at 7 per cent.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): In addition, I have a collection of petitions from residents of Canada from places as disparate as Regina, Yorkton, Moncton, Prince Albert, Creston, British Columbia, Kitchener, Kingston, Winnipeg and Windsor, all objecting to the pernicious clawback tax on family allowances and old age pensions.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present eight petitions containing 287 signatures of residents of the Similkameen Valley and the boundary area of the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. In addition, I wish to present a further 658 names from throughout British Columbia, from Edmonton and from Saskatchewan. These people are petitioning Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax and to bring in a tax fair and equitable tax Canadians.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege, under Standing Order 36, to present petitions from 54 residents of Elliston. The first signature is, I believe, that of the mayor of that town. The residents of Elliston are very, very concerned about the effect of the goods and services tax. They note that the government, in saying it is going to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, has raised it from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent in its time in power. They are also cognizant of the other hardships imposed upon them as a community and as Newfoundlanders as a result of other measures taken by this government.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to please reject this proposed goods and services tax at any percentage, nine or seven. They want it at zero.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I too rise pursuant to Standing order 36 to present a petition on behalf of a number of British Columbians. I wish I did not have to present this petition. I was hoping that the government would have announced before Christmas that it planned to abandon the goods and services tax. But, alas, it has not. So I must read the petition and hope for more sense in the new year.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the government a list of reasons why they believe the goods and services tax is a cruel and mean tax that discriminates against low-income families and against those people living in western Canada due to the tremendous cost of transportation. They are asking the government to reconsider proceeding with the goods and services tax.

LOSS OF FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise the fact that in Swift Current, Saskatchewan, a mailbag containing family allowance cheques was lost today. People are being asked to reapply for those cheques. I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader if he could look into the matter and see if there is something that can be done for those many families who are going without those cheques before Christmas. Many of those families are dependant on those cheques to make their Christmas.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for her representation. I can assure her I will bring it to the department's attention and to the minister's attention to see what can be done, taking into consideration the Christmas spirit and the concerns that I am sure all members and these families will feel.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today; Nos. 130, 143, 158, 172 and 173.

SUPPLY OF RADIATION EQUIPMENT OR MATERIALS TO DELMED, IN EL SALVADOR

Question No. 130—Mr. Caccia

1. Has Nordion International or its corporate predecessor supplied radiation equipment or materials to Delmed, a company located in El Salvador and, if so (a) what (i) kinds (ii) quantities (b) on what dates (c) has Nordion International monitored, inspected or serviced this equipment or material and, if so, (i) on what dates (ii) what is done on such occasions?

2. Is the government aware of any accidents at Delmed involving radioactive material and, if so (a) on what dates did the accidents occur (b) what happened at each event?

3. Has Nordion International accepted any legal or contractual responsibility for the safe operation of equipment it sells to foreign operations?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In 1975, the predecessor to Nordion International Inc., Commercial Products Division, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, supplied a Cobalt-60 medical products sterilizer to a firm in El Salvador. The present owner is Delmed SA. An equipment failure in 1975 resulted in the supplier returning to repair the facility. No injuries or radiation exposures occurred. Normal procedure is for the owner to request the Cobalt-60 source to be renewed every few year, at which time Nordion checks and refurbishes the equipment where needed. The civil war in El Salvador prevented this. Nordion did keep up telephone contacts with Delmed over the years and issued them product bulletins as they were produced. The Government is aware of an accident at Delmed on February 5, 1989 in which the radioactive source became jammed. Three Delmed staff members entered the irradiator contrary to all procedures. To do so, they had to override safety features and systems. The operators in fact, had modified the plant so the built-in safety features did not prevent their entry. They received serious radiation over-exposure resulting in one death and the serious illness of two others. Nordion was called on February 10 and rendered the plant inoperable. Immediately upon learning of the injury to the operators, Nordion notified the appropriate authorities. The safe operation of the facility is the responsibility of the operator subject to any applicable governmental requirements in El Salvador. Canada has no authority over the plant or its operation. There is no fault or liability to Nordion, which has acted as responsible supplier throughout the history of the plant and the incident.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Question No. 143—Mr. Boudria:

At the present time, in the National Capital Region, is the government leasing any office space for the administration of the proposed goods and services tax and, if so (a) what is the number of square metres leased by each government department (b) for each building containing such space (i) what is the address (ii) what is the number of square metres leased (iii) what is the cost of leasing the space (c) what is the total estimated cost of preparing the spaces for occupancy, including (i) design and building improvements (ii) installation of furniture and office equipment, including any computers purchased, leased or rented (iii) any other expense incurred?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue):

Taxation

No, at the present time Public Works Canada is not leasing any space on behalf of Revenue Canada Taxation for the administration of the proposed goods and services tax in the National Capital Region.

ACCOMMODATION COSTS

RE: PLANNING FOR THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX (NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION)

Yes, the government is leasing limited office space in the National Capital Region to be used in planning for the administration of the proposed goods and services tax. (This space also conforms to a long-range plan to consolidate excise offices, currently located in five sites throughout the city.)

a) Public Works Canada has leased for Customs and Excise 11,447 M2 which is currently being prepared for occupancy starting in January 1990. Temporary accommodation has been provided through short-term leases and previously leased space.

b) i) All the space is located in the Place Vanier Office Complex at 25 McArthur Avenue, Vanier, Ontario.

ii) 11,447 M2.

iii) Annual rental cost of the leased space is $2,209,271 (subject to final confirmation upon occupancy).

c) i) Design and construction contracts awarded by Public Works Canada total approximately $1,542,381 (including approximately $192,341 funded by Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise for data cabling installations). PWC estimates that it will incur additional costs of approximately $1,855,960 (excludes Customs and Excise telecommunications costs, furniture, equipment, etc.).

ii) Estimated costs for furniture and office equipment (including computers) $2,698,473.

iii) $45,000 for telecommunications.

ACID RAIN DAMAGE

Question No. 158—Mr. Caccia:

For each province east of Saskatchewan, what is (a) the economic loss, on an annual basis, attributable to acid rain damage for (i) commercially logged tree species (ii) maple syrup production (iii) agricultural crops (iv) salmon spawning grounds (b) the effect of acid rain damage on growth rates and productivity for (i) commercially logged tree species (ii) maple syrup production (iii) agricultural crops (iv) salmon spawning grounds (c) the effect of acid rain on the annual growth rate of major tree species?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Departments of Agriculture, Fisheries and Oceans and Forestry as follows:

(a) i) Trees that are currently being harvested have matured in a relatively pollution-free environment and, therefore, are only slightly affected by acid rain. Annual losses are estimated at $2.5 million (1983 dollars) for Quebec and Ontario and about $.5 million for the Atlantic provinces, accurate estimates for Manitoba do not exist but it can be predicted that they will be less that $10,000.00 a year.

ii) iii) Direct effects of acid rain have not been demonstrated. For provinces east of Saskatchewan, there is no specific economic data available for economic loss, on an annual basis, attributable to acid rain damage for maple syrup production and agricultural crops.

iv) Based on the biological assessment, the annual impact of the reduced salmon stocks on the economy of Nova Scotia is $190 thousand in terms of net foregone expenditures by salmon anglers.

(b) i) Commercial logging is carried out in mature or overmature stands, in which growth potential is very limited. Young stands and those in the development stage are most seriously affected by acid rain, but will not be logged for several years. Therefore, current commercial harvests are affected very little by acid rain. However, it can be anticipated that future harvest will decrease, as a result of acid rain damage.

The most sensitive species, in order of importance, are: Eastern White Pine; Silver Maple; Red Spruce; Black Cottonwood; and Beech.

ii) iii) There is little conclusive data on the effect of acid rain on growth rates and productivity for mapple syrup and agricultural crops.

iv) Nova Scotia: 13 rivers in which native salmon runs are extinct;

18 rivers in which salmon populations are considerably reduced;

13 rivers in which salmon still live but in which reduction in populations has been noted; some of their tributaries no longer support salmon populations;

16 rivers in which salmon populations are not affected by acid rain.

Nova Scotia has a total of 38.7 sq km of accessible (to salmon) habitat. Of that accessible salmon habitat, 20.5 sq km are considered to be vulnerable to acid rain.

Acidification of habitat has caused an estimated 50 per cent decline in Atlantic salmon production in 22 rivers for which good angling statistics are available; the decline in all of Nova Scotia has been 33 per cent.

New Brunswick: There are 134.9 sq km of accessible Atlantic salmon habitat and none of that habitat is considered vulnerable to acid rain.

Prince Edward Island: There are 2.8 sq km of accessible Atlantic salmon habitat and none of that habitat is considered vulnerable to acid rain.

Newfoundland: There are 211.1 sq km of accessible Atlantic salmon habitat and 25.6 sq km of that habitat are considered vulnerable to acid rain.

Quebec: There are 319 sq km of accessible Atlantic salmon habitat on the North Shore and 113 sq km of that habitat are considered vulnerable to acid rain.

(c) There is no scientifically proven relationship between acid rain and annual tree growth. The best estimate of growth losses comes from a scientific opinion survey which states that atmospheric polluants are reducing the rate of annual growth by 5 per cent in Quebec and Ontario and by 3.5 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and they have no effect in Manitoba.

Experts believe that within thirty years, forest productivity will decrease by 11.5 per cent in Quebec and Ontario, 8.4 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and 1.6 per cent in Manitoba. However, control measures that reduce air pollution by 50 per cent in terms of 1984 levels could increase forest productivity in the long term by 1.7 per cent in Quebec and Ontario, and by 1.2 per cent in the Atlantic provinces.

PLANNED PARENTHOOD CANADA

Question No. 172—Mr. Kilger:

1. Has the government provided federal funds, by way of sustaining grants, to Planned Parenthood Canada in the fiscal year 1989–1990 and, if so, what amount?

2. Since 1969, has the government given grants to Planned Parenthood Canada and, if so, for all types of grants, what amount?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Canadian International Development Agency and the Department of National Health and Welfare as follows:

1. In fiscal year 1989/90 the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) has provided a contribution of $95,000 to the Canadian Planned Parenthood Federation to support delegates from developing countries to attend the International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF) Members' Assembly.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has provided a sustaining grant to the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada for the fiscal year 1989–90 in the amount of $146,000.

Since 1969, contributions by CIDA to the Canadian Planned Parenthood Federation have totalled $936,422.

Health and Welfare Canada made the following contributions

Health Promotion Contribution Program (1983/84–1991/92)	$ 519,872
Family Planning Division (1972/73–1985/86)	$5,976,200
Sustaining Grants (1986/87–Present)	$ 738,200
TOTAL	$7,234,272

INTERNATIONAL PLANNED PARENTHOOD FEDERATION (IPPF)

Question No. 173—Mr. Kilger:

1. Do government funds go to the International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF) through (a) other federally funded agencies that are involved in Third World development (b) United Nations family planning programs (c) unilateral or multilateral agreements and, if so, what amount?

2. Do government funds go to population and "reproductive health centres" in China and, if so, does the IPPF have any involvement in these programs and, if so, are government funds made available to the IPPF either directly or through other agencies such as the United Nations Fund for Population Activities and, if so, what amount of funding is directed to such activities through these agencies?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister of External Relations): 1. a) Government funds go to the World Bank for their development programming. The World Bank has, in the past given contributions to the International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF) based on agreements between the World Bank and IPPF.

b) Government funds go the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA) for their development programming. UNFPA has undertaken joint programming with IPPF.

c) Government funds have contributed and are contributing to IPPF directly via the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA). In fiscal year 1989–90, the approved grant totalled $8.2 million.

2. On a bilateral, or government-to-government basis, CIDA does not provide funding to the population sector in China.

The China Family Planning Association, an autonomous, non-governmental organization (NGO) is a member of IPPF. In 1988, IPPF contributed US $920,000 towards the programmes of its China affiliate, most of which was spent on audio-visual equipment and information/educational materials of the Association's information activities.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING DEBATE ON BILL C-28

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon I had the privilege of rising in this place to address a motion which would have deleted the clawback provision of Bill C-28. In the course of my speech, which dealt with a very serious matter of great concern to thousands of my constituents, I was repeatedly interrupted by the hon. member for Burlington who used expressions that I trust Your Honour will find unparliamentary.

They can be found in the Hansard of yesterday, Tuesday, December 19, on pages 7216 and 7217. Even if the Chair were to find these expressions permissible, I feel that they have impugned my seriousness as a member of Parliament and prevented me from properly representing the legitimate concerns of my electors. I would ask that the member for Burlington do the honourable thing and withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member for Burlington, maybe we could ask that you reserve on this. We will speak to the member for Burlington and see what can be done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes. Usually when we have a question of privilege raised, the members involved are in the House. I realize this could be the last sitting day for another month and I know the member was anxious to get it on the record. I am sure the parliamentary secretary will bring it to the attention of the hon. member for Burlington.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, I want to make the Chair aware that all parties were aware of my intention to raise this matter. Notification was given. Due, I suppose, to the various happenings between three o'clock and the present time, the hon. member for Burlington may have been unable to attend due to other duties, but he was aware of it, as was the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Burlington is on the Board of Internal Economy and I know they are meeting.

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): I have been informed that there have been discussions among the three parties concerning the Standing Committee on Justice and that there would be unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General be authorized to travel to Washington for the period from Sunday, January 21 to Thursday, January 25, 1990, in order to participate in an international conference on criminal code reform and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before we carry on with further business, Mr. Speaker has advised me that he would like to have all hon. members join him at 6.30 p.m. in Room 216 for his annual reception.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-9, an act to amalgamate the two corporations known respectively as the Governing Council of the Salvation Army Canada East and the Governing Council of the Salvation Army Canada West, and to make necessary provision regarding the charter of the amalgamated corporation to which the concurrence of the House is desired.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I sent notice to you earlier today that I would rise under the provisions of Standing Order 52 to seek leave to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent and pressing concern.

We have every indication now that the Senate will not pass Bill C-21 before the new year, and the government has not indicated any willingness to pass the annual variable entrance rates bill, as we have seen earlier today. As a result, in a few weeks, when the House is not sitting, the unemployed in depressed regions of the country will suddenly become ineligible for benefits. This means that the battle between the government and the Senate over the unfortunate amendments to the UI act will have significant civilian casualties, namely, the unemployed in the most hard-pressed economically hit areas of the country.

I believe it is our responsibility to ensure that unemployment insurance is provided in a fair and equitable way throughout Canada. I find it totally irresponsible for the government to engage in this game of brinkmanship with the Senate when the consequences will be felt, not by the members of either of these chambers, but by the thousands of Canadian families who will be deprived of the benefits to which they would normally be entitled. For that reason, I am asking for an emergency debate on this later in the day.

Mr. Speaker: First of all I want to apologize to the hon. member for Kamloops for not being in the House. I was watching his presentation and I understand fully the content of it and, of course, have considered his application in writing which was given to me and was procedurally sound.

The matter is, of course, an important matter but I must advise the hon. member that, at least in my view, it does not meet the requirements of the Standing Order. It is an important matter and I thank the hon. member for bringing it to the attention of the Chair.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related act, be read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on third reading of Bill C-28. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in the spirit of parliamentary co-operation and also in keeping with the holiday spirit, I will not take up too much of the House's time so that other members will also have a chance to make their comments. Besides, I made a fairly elaborate presentation on this bill on second reading.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, Bill C-28 arises from the budget brought down last April by the Minister of Finance and is in response to the objectives pursued by this government.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that this country's national debt is a major problem. When we were elected in 1984, it was nearly $200 billion.

Thanks to the budgetary and monetary policies that have been part of the Conservative government's economic policy since 1984, we have been able to reduce our deficit each year, but nevertheless, we are still struggling with the problem of a growing national debt.

Mr. Speaker, during the past five years, spending has been cut back, and last week the President of the Treasury Board announced spending cuts totalling nearly $1.4 billion.

Mr. Speaker, if we want a healthy Canadian economy, we must bring our national debt down to acceptable levels and our revenues or income must be commensurate to those levels.

The April budget introduced additional taxes on individuals and, more specifically, a surtax on individuals with higher incomes. Mr. Speaker, as we saw yesterday in our discussions about the goods and services tax, when we have spending commitments, we must also have the income to balance our budget. And where do we get that income? We get it from higher income tax payers, from corporations, and also through a tax that will replace a federal sales tax that no longer reflects the economic realities of 1989 and that next year will be replaced by the goods and services tax, a modern tax that will reflect the competitive spirit Canada has and indeed must have at the international level.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C–28 also contains a measure which provides that certain payments received by Canadians 65 years old and over with a gross income of $77,000 or more—-this means that all Canadians who age 65 who are listening and whose annual incomes are below $77,000 annually are not affected.

Mr. Speaker, according to this provision, part of the old age security pension payment they receive will be paid back in income tax to the federal government, again, provided their gross annual income exceeds $77,000.

Mr. Speaker, on the other side of the House, they are criticizing this measure because according to them, this is going to eat away at people's incomes every year and because of inflation, the net incomes of individuals with a gross annual income of $77,000 will go down. In that regard, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to you the comments made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), one of the best finance ministers Canada ever had, who has said several times that if indexing should be reviewed, it would be done in due course to ensure that the taxable level, which is $77,000 gross annual income in this case, would retain its value in real terms.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is important for the economy and the finances of the country. If we want to continue the excellent work done since 1984 in terms of revenues and expenditures, we must pass Bill C–28 as soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

So, Mr. Speaker, I ask all hon. members of this House, in the co–operative spirit of Christmas, to make their speeches short and of course in support of Bill C–28.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on this legislation which is a very comprehensive piece of legislation touching on many aspects of the Income Tax Act.

I come to this third reading debate having participated in the legislative committee and having been a witness to the very arbitrary process that was applied at the legislative committee stage of this bill. Two factors caused that arbitrariness. The first factor was that the government did not want to hear witnesses who had views to express on the key elements of the legislation that is contained in Bill C–28. That process, the opportunity for Canadians to be heard, was thwarted by government members who consistently refused to expand the number of witnesses that could be heard.

The other way in which that process was arbitrary was the manner in which the government, in, I believe, a rather incompetent fashion, introduced the notice of Ways and Means that gave rise to this piece of legislation. By including the bill as part of the Ways and Means motion, the government made it impossible for amendments which were in order to be made. Early in the committee process we had presented to us a package of amendments. Many, many provisions in Bill C–28 were attempted to be amended, not by the opposition but by the government, by representatives of the ministry of finance. This package of amendments, which is as thick as the bill itself, was found to be entirely out of order. They were entirely rejected.

As they say, this is no way to run a railroad. If the government cannot introduce a bill that covers the points that are necessary, surely it is incumbent upon it to withdraw the bill, and start over and do it properly. What we have in this case is a very important piece of legislation, tabled and debated in the House of Commons, which needed, according to the government and the departmental officials themselves, many amendments to it.

Either these amendments were superfluous and did not need to be presented in the first place, in which case they should not have been, or they were necessary, in which case the bill should have been removed from the list and reintroduced in the proper form. I think it is a demonstration of the incompetence of the government that it would present such an important piece of legislation in such a shoddy fashion.

The fact that we have spent this time debating it without having these amendments is a shame. What is going to happen, of course, is that these amendments are going to be presented in a new bill early in the new year and the only beneficiary of that process is going to be the publishers of income tax acts who publish them in great quantities every time the act is amended.

The bill presents many points for discussion. The most important for many Canadians, of course, is the proposal contained in it to claw back family allowance and old age security benefits. But there are other things, things that came up very briefly in correspondence received by members of the legislative committee and otherwise. I will refer to a couple of these.

We received very strong and worth-while submissions from representatives of the leasing industry on the adverse impact that provisions contained in this bill and which are proposed for regulations under the Income Tax Act will have on the leasing industry. It was pointed out to us that the government's approach to leasing as a business under the Income Tax Act is totally at variance with the way it intends to treat leasing under the new proposed goods and services tax, an inconsistency which should not exist.

These matters could not be discussed or considered in the committee. They were out of order. For that matter, the very fact that so many important items are proposed to be changed by regulation 1100 in the Income Tax Act, instead of putting it in the act itself where it can be fully considered and debated in Parliament, is wrong in principle.

We had submissions on the government's large corporations' tax, which the government takes such pride in flaunting, which is a minor variance of the income tax system to try to ensure that at least some taxes are paid by Canada's largest corporations. Even in doing that, they could not get it right.

Representatives of the large corporations came to us and said that the tax, as proposed, unfairly benefited the revenues of foreign governments because Canadian large corporations were not going to be entitled to a foreign tax credit in foreign jurisdictions for their large corporations tax. A minor change could have corrected that, but such amendments were not in order because of the way the government had presented the bill. Foolishness and incompetence.

There is the matter of the surtaxes. Bill C-28, which should remove the surtaxes that the Minister of Finance told us were temporarily awaiting the imposition of the goods and services tax, makes them permanent.

Yesterday we were told in this House that not only are the surtaxes being made permanent, but they are being increased. This kind of lack of honesty in the presentation of financial matters to the country as we have had in the presentation of phase 1 of tax reform, followed by Bill C-28, which makes that surtax permanent instead of removing it, can only lead to the discrediting of members of Parliament on all sides and politicians in general.

The principal points to be made about Bill C-28 relate to the issues of the clawback of family allowance and old age pension benefits.

The government would have us believe and has tried to convince Canadians that what is happening in Bill C-28 is not anything to do with universality. Universality has been the basis in many ways of our social programs in this country. Universality is based on the concept that all Canadians, wherever they live, whatever their status in life, whatever their income may happen to be, are entitled to some basic minimum level of social programs.

Today we are talking about old age pensions and about family allowances. We could equally be talking about education. We could be talking about medicare. These are things that we in Canada recognize should be for the benefit of all Canadians.

The government has recognized this in some of its own work. A consultation paper issued in January 1985 by the then Minister of National Health and Welfare stated on page 5:

> The concept of universality is a keystone of our social safety net. Its integrity must not and will not be called into question.
> The concept of a means test to determine eligibility for selective benefit programs is not appropriate. Eligibility for these programs, such as the child tax credit and the Guaranteed Income Supplement will continue to be determined on the basis of taxable income.

He talks further about an approach to reform in Chapter IV entitled "The Government's Current Approach to Reform" where he states:

> A special surtax on Old Age Security payments to recover more of the benefit paid to upper income pensioners would seriously disrupt our retirement income system, both for current pensioners and those now planning for retirement, and would unduly penalize those most affected by reason of retirement income resulting from private savings in earlier years.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in January 1985 the Minister of National Health and Welfare had it right. He was dead right. Why the government is now reneging on this commitment to Canadians is a mystery to me. Of course, the government does not admit that it is reneging. It says that this is not touching universality. If we put the old age pension into the right pocket and then fish it out from the left, we have not affected universality. We have just taxed it back.

At least somebody over there is willing to call a spade a spade and as usual that is the hon. member for Mississauga South. He is quoted in The Ottawa Citizen on September 23, 1989, as saying this:

> We have decided to eliminate universality and we do that in a sense by the clawback in both family allowance and the old age pension.
> As you know, it has been a Conservative philosophy for some time that distributions from the state ought to go essentially to those in need. While the clawback may be unfair and sneaky, it is there.

At least he tells the truth.

If we are going to change that principle of universality, at the very least Canadians should be able to participate in a discussion of the policy underlying it. Surely if we have had the principle of universality for many years in our country and we set about changing it, we ought to do it through a consultative process and not as part as a budget bill.

This point has been made by the Canadian Council on Social Development and others who have looked at this and said that surely we should have a discussion in Canada on universality. The time has come. Instead of doing that, this change is put in sneakily through the back door, through an amendment to the Income Tax Act, without hearing Canadians across the country on the issue that it is raising. Here we are under time allocation being forced, as a gift to our seniors and to our families in Canada, to see the adoption of this retrograde measure without full debate and consultation with Canadians.

The process that was started in January 1985 by the government across the way is one that should have been followed and should have been applied. This consultation paper ought to have resulted in a thorough study of the principle of universality so that Canadians could say what they thought. It is an important principle. It is important for a number of reasons.

It is important because of the nature of the programs that we have in Canada. Surely we do not want to move to a system where our social programs are only targeted to the poor because then they become poor people's programs. If we have a system of health care for the poor, the rich will buy the good health care and the poor will have what is left. If we have an educational system that is for the poor, then the rich will pay for a good education and the poor will get what is left.

When we start to whittle away at universality, where we end up is a system where our social programs are only for the poor because they are the only ones that have to accept them and the wealthy can buy what they want. Universality is also a reflection of the collective responsibility that a society assumes for its members. Old Age Security and family allowances are not meant to be transfers from the rich to the poor. They are meant to be transfers to those who are working and to those who are retired. They are meant to be transfers from those without families to those with families. They recognize the fact that our collective needs must be taken care of by everyone in Canada.

What many seniors find most objectionable about the clawback of the old age pension is the fact that this is something they feel they paid for over the years. I have gone back in Hansard to see what was being said in this Chamber in the years in which the old age pension was being implemented. In Hansard on October 25, 1951 the Minister of Finance, when talking about the legislation that created the old age pension for the first time as something that could be paid without a means test, stated::

> The legislation to be introduced will establish—a special fund to be called the old age security fund. Pensions will be charged to this fund and the revenue from certain taxes will be credited to it. The taxes in question will be specifically levied in the old age security legislation rather than in the ordinary revenue acts which authorize the raising of funds for general governmental purposes.
> Perhaps it would be useful in order to avoid any possible misunderstanding if a few words were said about the basic principles on which the Canadian plan as set up will operate. It has been described as a universal pay-as-you-go system as distinct from old age assistance such as we now have, or from a system of old age insurance such as has been adopted by some other countries. The plan here proposed has also been described as a contributory system in the very real sense that certain special taxes are to be imposed and earmarked to support the fund.

That is the principle upon which the old age pensions were established.

In 1971, when it was proposed to simplify the income tax system and eliminate the special old age security tax, the concerns about whether this would lead to the end of universality were expressed very eloquently by a number of members at the time. For example, the then member for Winnipeg North Centre, the Hon. Stanley Knowles said in the House on December 20, 1971, and by coincidence, today is the anniversary of that date:

> There are one or two further points I should like to make. The minister states he has no intention of getting away from the present practice. I wish he would confirm the statements which have been made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Does the right of entitlement, which has been based on the taxes the way they were, still hold? The Minister of National Health and Welfare has declared that it was because the taxes were earmarked there was a right which people could assert. Will that still hold?

The then Minister of Finance, Mr. Benson, responded:

> The right is given to the pensioner by Parliament. The only way of changing this would be for the government to amend the Old Age Security Act in order to change the amount paid to people. I can assure the hon. member that we have no intention of changing the universality of the basic pension.

Here we are, 18 years later, faced with this legislation with time allocation ending that right of senior citizens.

The 1971 T1 General Tax Guide, at page 17 states:

> (3) Old Age Security Tax—All taxpayers whose "Taxable Income" is over $500 are subject to the Old Age Security Tax. The tax is 4 percent of "Taxable Income"—maximum $240.

These people have bought and paid for their old age pensions. They do not deserve to be treated as they are by this government having them clawed back, taxed back, whatever their income level is. This tax is a discriminatory tax, a tax based on age. No other group in this country is going to be asked to pay a tax rate of 100 per cent on any kind of income, but the seniors of this country who bought and paid for their old age pensions are being asked to pay a tax rate of 100 per cent of their old age security, if they are in the category that it applies to, and it is totally unfair.

There are other problems with it. The superannuates came to the committee and they reminded us of how they had negotiated in good faith with the government of the day the amendment of the provisions of the Superannuation Act for federal public servants at the time that the Canada Pension Plan was being introduced. They told us of the discussions that went on at that time when they were promised that their old age pensions would not be affected. For that reason, they agreed with the integration of their superannuation benefits with the Canada Pension Plan.

Is this government offering to go to the federal superannuates, to the unions that represent them today and renegotiate the superannuation so that it could be done on the terms on which it was introduced those years ago? I think not, regretfully.

We heard about those who benefit from defined benefit pension plans whose pension plans provide that the amount they receive will be reduced by the amount of their old age pension. What this ridiculous clawback system, which is a badly disguised version of an assault on universality, says to those people is: "First you get your pension, reduced by the old age pension because you get that as well, but then we are going to tax back the old age pension. Sorry, but your pension plan does not provide for your defined benefit plan to come back into full operation."

Therefore, those people are clawed back twice. The government did not really have time to think about any of those problems. They did not even want to hear about them. They did not even want witnesses to come to the committee to talk about it. When they did talk about it, they could not fix it because of the incompetent way in which they had presented the bill. Then some of them have the incredible audacity to come into the House of Commons and try to tell us that the seniors really don't mind. The seniors don't mind.

They do mind. I have in front of me a number of press releases and other items issued by groups like One Voice Seniors' Network where they talk about how their views were represented to the people of Canada.

On May 16, 1989, One Voice Seniors' Network released a statement which stated:

> Seniors Deplore Ministers' Remarks
> Monique Vézina, federal Minister of State for Seniors, raised the ire of the powerful seniors' movement with comments she made last week concerning their reactions to Michael Wilson's budget.
> "We don't appreciate having our views taken out of context and distorted to suit the government's public relations machine," said Jean Woodsworth, President of One Voice—

That rebuke was not enough. Earlier this month in this House the Minister of Finance tried to suggest that One Voice Seniors' Network supported the clawback. Again, One Voice had to issue a press release dated December 6, 1989:

> Seniors were appalled yesterday to see their words twisted to support the government's controversial clawback legislation. Jean Woodsworth, President of One Voice, the Canadian Seniors Network, claims that their pre-budget brief is being used against Canadians in an underhanded way.
> "Mr. Wilson invited us to consult on the budget while it was in preparation. At that meeting, he specifically promised us he promised us he would not touch universal social programs, but then he went ahead and proposed this awful clawback. That was a real betrayal. But now he's taking our own words out of the context of our brief to make it look as though we agree with the clawback. This simply is not what we said. Mr. Wilson has aggravated the anger and mistrust seniors are already feeling".

This was raised in the House of Commons, and a response was made by the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs. He had to receive a letter then from One Voice Seniors' Network. This is what they said to him:

> Your reference to our organization and to my supposed comments in particular as supporting the clawback have created a mistaken impression in the House.

That had to be raised and the minister confronted with it. Mrs. Woodsworth had the following to say:

> It has been the consistent position of One Voice that the clawback is a serious threat to universality of Canada's social benefit programs, and we have never supported the measure. I know that I personally never made such a comment.
> We have contacted the Economic Council of Canada and they have been unable to locate any report which makes a reference to the clawback or the $50,000 threshold.
> What concerns us more is that the clawback was not announced until the budget was released in April. We wonder how discussion of the clawback or the $50,000 threshold could have taken place in February before it had been announced in April.

That is what this government has been doing to distort the words of seniors, and they will not even listen to these people. That is why they closed the hearings on universality and on the clawback.

• (1720)

I would like to suggest that we have been listening. We, on this side of the House of Commons, have been listening and we have been hearing a lot. I have heard members on the other side say in this House that nobody out there was concerned. I cannot believe that they are not getting some of these same letters.

The following letter comes from one of my constituents, Normand Anctil who states:

> I retired from the Public Service last month after over 31 years of service in the public sector including over 24 years in the Navy. I have been working hard and looking forward to this time in life for many a year.
> Throughout my service I have accumulated some savings in the form of RRSPs which coupled with my superannuation, CPP, OAS and good health I felt would provide me with the means to live with dignity, independence and a good quality of life.
> But, what do I see on the horizon? More increases in taxes and the one thing I have been paying for during my service to my country, in fact during all of my working life, the one thing I considered as part of my security for the future, "My"—YES—"My"—Old Age Security benefits are jeopardized. The OAS is mine, I paid for it, I count on it, it is part of my rights and the government is stealing it from me.

Another constituent, Mr. Lloyd from Featherstone Drive in Ottawa wrote and stated:

—as a retired senior and as a veteran who served with Bomber Command during the Second World War, I am appalled by the threatened attack by Mr. Wilson on the financial stability of my retirement years by his planned tax-back proposals on our old age pensions.

Although not a wealthy individual by any means, I do receive in addition to my OAS and CPP a superannuation for 27 years of Air Force service—and I can already envisage that eventually the cut-off level for pay-back will reach me, as it is not fully indexed to inflation—

Mr. Hibbard from Fox Run Lane, and Captain Small who lives on Willowdale Avenue have written. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you have seen some of these letters yourself, again and again, people feeling that they have been attacked unfairly. This one was received by my colleague, the hon. member from Belleville and Picton, from Mr. Cundy, at "Leeside Retreat", Sheba Island, Picton, who stated:

I feel that I have been betrayed by the Finance Minister, Michael Wilson and would like to convey to you my utmost disgust. I look back at the time his so-called leader Brian Mulroney lied to his own mother, stating on national television that seniors would never have their social benefits touched while he was in power. How despicable. How despicable can a son be.

It took me over 40 years to achieve my retirement aims. To establish a good pension, I worked hard and turned my back on many tempting luxurious items. At the same time I paid many thousands of dollars in taxes which I assumed would have a bearing on my old age pension.

Now, on the eve of Bill C-28 being passed, I will have all of my old age pension taxed back.

Over the years, my family have voted Conservative, however, I can assure you that we will all turn to Liberal at any future election.

At least there is some good news in this.

I do not want to miss the opportunity to speak a bit about the family allowance as well and still afford some time for my colleagues to speak.

The family allowance is a different matter in a sense in that it in no way has been a contributory scheme and no one receiving family allowance disputes the fact that they receive it out of the consolidated revenue fund and have not paid for it.

What is of concern is the fact that over the years of this government being in office the tax burden has more and more been imposed on families in Canada. According to the Canadian Council on Social Development the net tax increase—and this does not take into account the goods and services tax, nor does it take into account the clawback—for a one-income family with two children, those at the poverty line of $23,639 since 1984 has been 61.3 per cent; for the average income at roughly the $45,000 level, an increase of 29.3 per cent; for the upper income of $100,000, a net tax increase of 7.7 per cent. It is clear that there has been a shift in the burden of taxes to families.

The Vanier Institute on the Family wrote to the legislative committee on Bill C-28. Even this prestigious organization was denied the opportunity to speak before the legislative committee on these important measures. It wrote to the committee and pointed out that the burden has been shifted more and more to families.

The government party in election campaigns certainly in my area made much of family values. The Conservatives talked about family values, but when the rubber hits the road, when it comes to dealing with support for families, that is where they look to cut. That is where they look to hurt people.

I do not think anyone can satisfactorily explain to me why in imposing the clawback on family allowances the government refused to index the threshold fully. No one on that side has been able to explain to me why the clawback is to be calculated on an individual's income and not on family income. Two individuals with children who have a combined income of as much as $99,000 will not face the clawback, whereas the single income earner supporting children will face the clawback starting at $50,000.

Furthermore, what do members of the government propose to do with the savings it will gain from the clawback? They do not propose to use them for social programs to redirect them to low income people. They propose to add them to government revenue so that they can waste them, spend them. That is what they propose to do with them, and the Vanier Institute points out the difficulty that will be felt by families across Canada and the failure of this government to make adequate social policy provision for support for families at whatever level of income.

What concerns me most of all—and I wish to give others an opportunity to speak—about this bill is the essential dishonesty that underlies it: dishonesty in presenting a change in social policy, the most important in a generation in the context of an income tax bill where it cannot be debated or discussed as it should be; dishonesty because it represents as complete turnaround by a government that went forward in the election campaign and promised not to touch social programs.

The Prime Minister stood on an election platform and asked in the company of his mother whether anyone would believe that he would cut benefits to her. The Prime Minister stood up in one of the hardest hit areas of our country in Nova Scotia and said that as long as he is Prime Minister benefits for the elderly would not be reduced but would be improved. The essential dishonesty has to cause revulsion in Canadians across the country, and it has to cause them to think of all of us. Who can we believe when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance can glibly make promises like that and within a few short months of being re-elected turn their backs on them and tear them up? Who can we believe?

This is a sad day for Canada. This is the day that universality ends.

• (1730)

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I promised my colleague from the Liberal party some time at the end. I was hoping that the time allotment would be shared somewhat more equally, but I guess those are the breaks of the political scene.

I should comment on the amendments at first, the 125 that my colleague has mentioned. I have good reason to believe after some searching that there are consequential amendments included in these government amendments to the bill which indicate indeed that the bill is flawed with the amendments and without the amendments.

The government should have done the honourable thing and brought back the bill in the new year with the appropriate amendments. They are consequential. There is something really unusual going on behind the scenes with these amendments. As has been indicated to me, there is something rotten in the state of Denmark. This is unprecedented. I cannot find any precedents for this kind of action having taken place. It is indeed sad. There is something seriously wrong within the system. Perhaps it will be addressed once again in the new year.

This is the final discussion on clawback, Bill C-28, the end of universality, a concept of caring, something with which our country identifies, a watershed of social policy. The government has changed the watershed. Social policy has been swept away. It is a sad day for Canada. This is a debate that has focused on clawback, seniors, family allowances, and $50,000 thresholds.

Every once in a while when I am looking for enjoyable reading I turn to one of my books written by the hon. Prime Minister before he was Prime Minister. I understand that that is a big mistake. Never write a book until you are finished your political career; never before. I quote the Prime Minister:

> When I look at Canada today, there is nothing I see that is more painful to me, as a citizen of one of the most blessed nations on earth, than the continual fighting and bitching that is going on among and between just about every major group in our society.

I will skip a few lines:

> It is a continuous fight card in which it is difficult to find winners and easy to identify the loser—Canada itself. It seems the phrase "the common good" has been struck from our vocabulary.

That is what universality is all about. The common good has been struck. How prophetic the Prime Minister was. He was ahead of his time.

He has been the author of the end of universality and this will breed cynicism among Canadians. I received a call not two hours ago from a constituent saying: "I just do not believe this. I don't think we want to participate any more in the system simply because if we are going to contribute and not receive, why participate?" We have been saying this all along. Canadians will begin to become very cynical and say: "If we cannot participate in the end, then why participate during the process?"

As to the consultative process of the government and the committee, it is well-known now. It has been well documented. There was consultation beforehand, but not consultation during the process at first and second readings, report stage and third reading. I will not repeat what my hon. colleague said, but I would like to read from the consultation paper dated January 1985, specifically the third point found at page 6 which states: "Any savings which may result from program changes will not be applied to reduction of the deficit".

That is exactly what the government has proffered as the reason for this movement. "We can reduce the deficit with these $300 million that we will realize". One can read all through this consultation paper and see that the whole thing has been scrapped. Once again, Canadians will become cynical and say: "Why consult us, because you will not listen anyway? You have betrayed seniors. You have betrayed young families across this country. You have betrayed all Canadians in the country".

This country is fragmented, fractured into winners and losers. Acrimony has never been at a higher level. We are becoming leaner and meaner. We are emulating our American neighbours. We are harmonizing not only our laws but our social programs. We are going to become less caring for one another. We are overrun with the big devouring the little. We see our national dreams fading.

The sad part of it is that it is part of an over-all agenda. I think a lot of members do not understand that there is an agenda in place because they do not feel that they are active participants. By their passiveness they are participating in the end of Canada as we know it.

The spectre of free trade hangs over our heads on each and every day. Even members of our party and I sometimes say: "Well, let's not mention it because they will bring out the old sparrow routine". Every sparrow that falls will be blamed on free trade. I am suggesting we are not talking about sparrows, although I am sure the government could care less about sparrows. This is about people.

The suggestion was that if I were to vote for free trade the jobs in my community would be preserved. The biggest employer said that as part of the over-all agenda. They got the free trade and they are being laid off with great regularity.

The Americans talk about free trade and protectionism. They said: "Don't bite the hand that feeds you". That is what they told me when a group of us went to Washington. "You people keep quiet in Canada. You have got all you are going to get from us".

With respect to social programs there is no secret. We have to harmonize, they suggest, but the better word is compromise. This government is compromising us to our knees, be it in terms of UI, GST or universality. It is part of a much larger agenda. If any of the members really cared, they would have accepted just one of those amendments that we proposed yesterday, the one that would tie the $50,000 threshold to inflation, but they totally ignored that.

The reality of what they are after here is to get their foot in the front door. Just give them a little leverage and they will continue to attack social programs. They did not dare make it a frontal attack because they would not get away with it. It is an around about approach.

I want to wrap up so as to allow my colleague from Windsor to finish up. The opposition to this bill is growing by leaps and bounds each and every day. It is most unfortunate that probably much of the opposition will not be recognized or heard.

As far as the level of threshold, the Minister of Finance says that it will be reviewed periodically and adjusted as appropriate. We do not believe that for a moment. It will not be monitored. It will not be adjusted. If it is monitored and adjusted the same way the free trade agreement is monitored and adjusted, we do not want it. It is not a monitoring process at all.

I will end by again reading from the government's consultative book with a chronology of social programs and in particular old age security programs. It is a glowing report starting in 1927 with the introduction of the old age Pensions Act which provided for cost sharing with the provinces of a means tested pension for residents of Canada 70 years old or over. It was improved in 1948, 1951, 1966, 1967, 1971 and 1972. The improvements continued in 1978, 1979, 1985 and 1989. That is where it ends.

This has not been written in the book yet but I think the epitaph should be written and will be written. It will state: "1989: The day universality in this country was removed by the Conservative government".

• (1740)

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, we are coming to the end of a debate that has been all too short, in view of the way the government has intended to make fundamental changes to the social security system of the country.

Surely a debate of this importance should not have been brought to this abrupt conclusion by the imposition of time allocation by this Conservative government. The fact that this has been done by this government shows a fundamental lack of confidence by it in the validity of its ideas which underlie the proposal in this bill to claw back the old age pension and the family allowance from increasing numbers of Canadians.

In a few minutes the House will be compelled to vote on third reading of the legislation. I call upon the Conservative members to give serious thought to the implications of voting for this measure, to search their hearts and consciences and to decide, at least this once, not to vote with their party.

If Conservative members do not want to listen to me, perhaps they will at least listen to their own Prime Minister who said on November 8, 1988 in Sydney, Nova Scotia:

> As long as I am Prime Minister, social programs, especially those for the elderly will be improved, not diminished.

If Conservative members do not want to listen to me, I hope they will listen to the words of their own government in its consultative document. In it, in the case of seniors, according to the National Council on Welfare the federal government publicly rejected the idea of a clawback or surtax on old age pensions as late as January 1985 on the grounds that it would, and I quote:

> —seriously disrupt the retirement income system—the clawback changes the rules of the game without their consent. The elderly have already paid for their old age pensions through a lifetime of paying income taxes.

Earlier today I tabled the first of a large number of petitions from The National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation. This group represents some 500,000 retired Canadians. These petitions state:

> WHEREAS the federal government in its April budget, has proposed to tax back Old Age Security and Family Allowance benefits in part or in their entirety, depending on the recipient's income, and
> WHEREAS this tax, in the opinion of your petitioners, would undermine the principle of universality of Canada's social programs and will, as a result, create a potential threat to the income of future pensioners,
> WHEREFORE the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to abandon this proposed measure,

Again I say to Conservative members: if you are not going to listen to me or members of my party or members of the party of the spokesman for the NDP who has just had the floor, at least listen to the voice of 500,000 retired Canadians from one end of the country to the other. Their president, Les Batterson of Windsor, in a letter to the Prime Minister on June 23 wrote:

> —our position is that the tax back is age biased, grossly inequitable and has serious implications with regard to universality.
> We view this proposal as a serious breach of faith by our government and an insidious effort to undercut the Social Security Programs that you have on numerous times stated are a sacred trust.

The number of people represented by The National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation demonstrates that opposition to this measure is not simply opposition on behalf of a relatively small number of well-off Canadians. The number is going to grow to millions because of the lack of indexing of the $50,000 threshold.

I regret that the choking off of debate by the Conservative government means that I must end now by once again by making a fervent plea to the hearts and consciences of the Conservative members to ask them to vote against this measure to protect the interests of senior citizens and of people with families.

Please, I ask the Conservatives, have some feeling for the families and the seniors of this country. If you do not, they will not forget you in the next election and you will not be back again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5.45 p.m., pursuant to Order made Monday, December 18, 1989, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

FINANCE COMMITTEE

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order pursuant to Standing Order 108. I will be very brief.

My point of order is to the effect that the Standing Committee on Finance this afternoon passed a resolution:

> That a subcommittee of five members be struck to conduct an inquiry and hold hearings early in 1990 into the question of government spending and measures to control its growth.

I humbly submit that this action by the Standing Committee on Finance is ultra vires its mandate and I would respectfully request direction from the Chair with respect to this matter.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I think I am obliged to deal with the matter. The hon. member has raised a point which is certainly of interest and it goes to whether or not the sub-committee which the committee has appointed today has embarked on a study of something which is beyond the mandate of the committee.

That is an interesting point but I have to come back to what I have had to say in the past. It is that the committee is the master of its own affairs and I think the hon. member will have to refer back to the committee to deal with it. If the committee should deal with the matter in such a way that it was appropriate that it be brought back to the House as a question of the committee, that is something else again, but at the moment the matter is in the committee's hands.

I appreciate the hon. member's intervention.

PANAMA

STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there was agreement among members of all parties earlier this afternoon that it would be appropriate for the three parties in this House to have an opportunity to express their position on the events in Panama.

I have the honour to present a ministerial statement which is a little untraditional. I apologize for not having circulated advance copies to my hon. colleagues in the House but they will understand the circumstances that prevented that.

I thought I would try to do three things. First, report upon the situation in Panama as we know it at this stage; second, review the chain of events which led to the American decision last night; third, present to the House some observations about Panama. That includes the possibility of developing a stable, democratic system in that country, a country and a region which, with less drama than we see in eastern Europe, is setting a remarkable example of democracy and of economic courage. It is important that parliamentarians in this House and countries like Canada help Panama assume its rightful place in that invaluable process.

First I will deal with the situation in Panama as we know it. The House will perhaps know that there are 131 Canadians who are registered as resident in Panama. Some of those are Canadians of dual nationality. We have been in touch, or sought to be in touch, with all of them by telephone, either through our honorary consul in Panama City or through the embassy headquartered in Costa Rica. To the best of our knowledge and our most recent consultations all Canadians are safe. None is in danger.

An official of the embassy based in Costa Rica will be going in to Panama as soon as conditions allow that to be done effectively. Fighting is falling off in Panama City, although there has unhappily been an outbreak of looting now. Perhaps that is a natural consequence of the kind of disorder that can arise in those circumstances. Forces loyal to General Noriega have moved into the countryside. Noriega himself has not been captured.

If there are further developments I will try to have them brought to the attention of members who are interested or will establish a system over the period of the recess in which either members of Parliament or certainly Canadians who have family or interests in Panama will be able to be kept informed.

As a founding member and signatory of the United Nations Charter and as a recent signatory of the Charter of the Organization of American States, Canada fully and unreservedly subscribes to the principle of non-interference in the domestic affairs of States. The use of force is clearly a very serious matter. The Canadian government has already clearly expressed its regrets with respect to the U.S. intervention in Panama. However, we must not forget the pressing reasons that forced President Bush to authorize the intervention of U.S. troops.

[English]

Over the past two years the world has been witness to one of the most systematic betrayals on record. It is a betrayal in Panama of those democratic values which we hold dear in this House and, indeed, which are respected by most of our neighbours in Latin America and in the Caribbean. Even before that, the governments of Presidents Barletta and Del Valle were very much subject to the whims of General Noriega as commander-in-chief of the Panamanian Defence Force.

Canada has not traditionally maintained the most cordial relations with those successive regimes, which we regarded as being democratic in name only, but we were able to carry on correct business-like relations with them based on mutual interest. In 1987, when General Noriega was indicted by an American court on narcotics trafficking charges and the United States imposed an economic embargo, we did not follow suit.

When the May 1989 elections were called, we held out some hope that the Panamanian people would be permitted to express their democratic will at the polls. When, however, it became obvious that those elections were going decisively against Noriega's chosen candidate, the regime abruptly had the process declared void.

Canada condemned that denial of free elections. All of us were shocked by the images of the violent public beatings of the leaders whom the people of Panama had chosen to govern them. It was a temptation then to respond with violence. That temptation was strong and outspoken among some in the United States. It was resisted, it was resisted everywhere including, principally and most importantly, by the United States administration.

Various efforts were launched to achieve a peaceful solution to this very difficult problem. Some of them were bilateral, some of them were individual efforts by leaders of other countries. One of the most important was through the Organization of American States. On July 20 of this year, the Organization of American States passed a formal resolution which called for a transfer of power, taking effect on September 1 this year, from the Noriega regime to the people who had been elected in the May elections.

The OAS also launched a diplomatic mission headed by the foreign ministers of three of its member countries who travelled extensively and worked hard to try to find a peaceful way in which this transfer of power could be achieved. What is lamentable, but evident, is that that peaceful solution did not work.

There was, as we all know, recently an aborted coup. In the past week there have been developments that were particularly alarming, would be to anyone in this House and were to many of us, including the statement by General Noriega that Panama is in a "state of war" to us his words, with the United States.

That declaration unilaterally by General Noriega was followed by harassment of Americans stationed, by treaty, in Panama. Indeed, it was followed by the murder of an off-duty member of the American services and threats to the family of that individual.

It is important here, Sir, to emphasize two facts which distinguish the situation in Panama from that which might exist in other parts of the world. One of those facts is that the United States presence there is a result of a treaty. It is not a presence that is the result of an occupation. It is not a presence that is the result of an uninvited presence by the United States in that country. The American troops are there as the result of a legal agreement. They are there as the result of an international treaty. They have a right to be there and they have a right to be protected while they are there. That is one distinguishing factor and feature about the situation in Panama today.

A second fact that I want to underline is that peaceful solutions had been sought and peaceful solutions had failed. In fact, what was remarkable for so long was the willingness of the Bush administration to put its faith in mediation, to put its faith in negotiation, to put its faith in peaceful processes. The response to that was the declaration by General Noriega, unilaterally, of a state of war. The response to that was the murder of an off-duty American stationed there. The response to that was threats to Americans who had a right to be there and who had a right to be protected while they were there.

The Government of Canada today, in my name, issued a statement that made essentially two points. The first is that the government regrets the use of force by the U.S. in Panama, but understands and is sympathetic to the American action in the circumstances, particularly given the legitimate American concern over the escalating threats to American citizens in Panama. People have a right to be there and had a right to be protected.

Second, we made the point very clearly that intervention by force is a dangerous precedent and we note that the United States relied on force only in the last resort, only after the failure of attempts to resolve the situation in Panama peacefully.

The question is: What now? What now occurs? What now should be done? I want to mention three things that I think should be on our minds as we try to look forward. One is that we have to work and use all of the influence and standing of Canada to ensure that intervention not become a precedent. There were unique factors here and if they can justify actions that were taken early this morning by the United States, it is the uniqueness that justifies them. There is not a precedent established here that this Parliament or this country would approve in other circumstances.

I think that, Sir, is a particularly important assurance to be given to the people and to the Government of Nicaragua, where elections are imminent and where every effort must continue to make those elections free and make those elections fair.

Second, we believe it is important that we help the government that was elected in May in Panama to establish stability and democracy in that country. That was the theme, I can tell members of the House, in many of the consultations I had today by telephone with Latin leaders of the Organization of American States. They are interested in taking advantage of the opportunity that has been created now to try to sink some of the roots of stability and a democracy that will be important if Panama is to assume its place of significance in a region where those qualities have come to be more evident and more valued.

We intend to send a team of Canadian officials to Panama as soon as that would be productive to see if there are specific ways in which Canada can contribute to that process.

Third, I think there is a lesson here of the real need to strengthen the regional institutions in Latin America, particularly in Central America. It is clear that the Organization of American States, despite its efforts, did not work in Panama. They were not able to achieve the peaceful solution that they sought and that others sought.

But I think it important to note that the OAS made a serious attempt to succeed and that, Mr. Speaker, was a change in itself. It demonstrates a new resolution among members of the Organization of American States that Canada can push forward and, in our judgment, must push forward.

The point to underline, Sir, is that Central America is not anybody's backyard. Central America consists of sovereign countries, with ambitions of their own, histories of their own, qualities of their own. It is a region which is remarkable for the will that has been demonstrated by its leadership, particularly in the last two and three years, the will to work together and the will to work together against quite extraordinary odds, including the pull of their own history in that region.

Traditionalists have asked, why would Canada want to focus on Central America, why would we be in the Organization of American States, why would we play the active role that we are in ONUCA, the United Nations Peacekeeping and Verification Agency, that is playing a potentially critical role in the region, why would we maintain our aid and development assisted relations with the five countries involved in the Esquipulas arrangement? We do that, Sir, because Central America and Latin America as a whole are changing, changing by their own will.

Carlos Andrés Perez, the President of Venezuela, repeated again to me this morning when I spoke to him to talk about the events in Panama, his profound belief that Canada has a crucial role to play in that region, both because of who we are and because of who we are not. The role, in his judgment, can be critical if the institutions and the instinct to reform that had been evident there are to become as effective as they can be.

We have a role to play in helping to prevent Noriegas. We have a role to play in helping to provide alternatives to intervention because our presence can strengthen initiatives and institutions like the Organization of American States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): In a calmer part of the Question Period today, I had the opportunity to say to my friend from Winnipeg Transcona that I think it is time for all of us to engage in some new thinking about international events, and I meant that. I think he shares that view, as do others in the House. That means that we have to move away from stereotypes, whether those stereotypes are about the Americans and their motivations or whether they are about proud countries which we cannot dismiss simply because they are small.

For anyone interested in the future of Central America, interested in the principles of democracy, this has been a hard day for anyone concerned about this hemisphere. It involves a situation which we in the government believe is unique. We think, Sir, that we Canadians have a responsibility to make the most of the new situation which has been created by events in Panama, and that is the intent of this government.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, when a country holds an election and its leader is chosen by the will of the people, that leader must be recognized and respected as the people's choice because that leader was elected by the most powerful authority, the authority of the secret ballot. Unfortunately, General Noriega refused to acknowledge the results of the democratic elections and the direction in which they were going in Panama this past May.

Our party did not recognize General Noriega as the leader of the Panama and we supported any international efforts toward a peaceful transition from a dictatorship to a democratically elected government.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned in his comments that efforts were made through the OAS toward a peaceful resolution to this problem and we applaud those attempts. I think this perhaps highlights why our Prime Minister should not have rushed into joining the Organization of American States. Maybe we should have listened to the Canadians who put more stringent conditions on becoming a member of the OAS, because when one member of OAS attacks another member of OAS without consulting with its members, what is the point of having such an organization?

Canada's foreign policy must be based on certain principles. One of those is upholding the principles of the United Nations charter, especially the article of non-intervention. No country has the right to change circumstances internal to another country by military force without the consent of that country.

Guided by this principle, we expressed our strong disapproval of the United States invasion of Grenada in 1983. The Prime Minister of the day, the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, in response to a question posed by the then Leader of the Opposition, underscored a very important question which I wish to highlight with a quote from Hansard of October 25, 1983. The Prime Minister of the day then said:

> The United States was certainly entitled to attempt to protect those nationals. Whether it used the only available means and the proper means to protect them is something that we do not know the answer to, because we are not in possession of the facts.

Did the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs obtain facts to determine whether this invasion was the only means to protect the American nationals? Had President Bush called our Prime Minister before the invasion, the Prime Minister would have every right to ask as a member of OAS whether the United States used the only means and the proper means to protect American nationalists in Panama.

Did the killing of one soldier warrant killing dozens of others? We hope that in the future, the President of the United States will consult with its closest neighbour and ally prior to taking drastic action rather than placing a call after the fact.

In the Grenada situation, Canada was allowed to evacuate our nationalists. In the Panama invasion, our neighbour did not give us that courtesy. In his comments today the Secretary of State said that intervention by force is a dangerous precedent, and we note that the United States of America relied on force in the last resort. We on this side of the House agree with the right hon. member's statement. The question that analysts and historians will want to answer is, was this the last resort.

The Secretary of State quotes President Bush as having said that the United States had to ensure the safety of the Americans in Panama. That is not grounds for us to justify or condemn the action. Were there other ways of ensuring the safety of the Americans other than by invasion?

Again I quote the former Prime Minister of Canada from Hansard of October 25, 1983, when he says:

> I do not know why invasion was necessary. The Leader of the Opposition goes on to quote President Reagan as saying that the invasion was also intended to maintain the democratic system. The Leader of the Opposition said that should suffice for me. Obviously it is sufficient for him. I would ask him what would happen if the United States gave itself authority to invade any country where the democratic system did not exist?

The Secretary of State said that the Latin American countries are no one's back yard. Congratulations for making that statement in this House.

I would like to ask the Secretary of State, considering that Nicaragua now has its troops on full alert, what will his response be if tomorrow morning the United States decides to move into Nicaragua's back yard?

Unless the United States provides information which will demonstrate that this invasion was necessary to protect the safety of American nationals and unless there was no other means of doing it, then the intervention would seem unjustified. Let us remember that prior to the invasion, the United States had 12,000 troops in Panama. Could 12,000 troops not protect themselves and other American nationals?

I go back to the comments I made earlier in this House today and I call upon the government to use our membership in the Security Council, use our membership in the OAS to categorically state to our American friends that we cannot and will not support any violation of the principle of non-invasion, as the Secretary of State himself said, so that this incident is not precedent-setting.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the day when I thought that the Secretary of State for External Affairs might not be making a statement in the House, we filed for an emergency debate. It was on the basis of an understanding reached between the parties that the minister would be able to make the statement he just made that we withdrew that request for an emergency debate.

I am glad that we had an opportunity to push the House toward an occasion like this one in which the minister was able to give the government's view and we are able to say what we have to say about the situation in Panama.

I would like to begin by referring to the language of precedent. This could be a dangerous precedent. The problem, as we see it from our side of the House, is not that this is a precedent—never mind a dangerous precedent—but that it is more of a continuation of a way of relating to Latin America that the United States has had since the establishment of the Munro doctrine in 1823. Since then there have been many precedents, almost all of them dangerous, of American action in Central and Latin America. It is to this American tradition of intervention in Central America that we feel compelled to address ourselves in this situation.

Despite its arguable uniqueness, it has a lot in common with many other American actions in that area of the world. Of course every situation has its uniqueness, but there is a thread which runs through all of them, that is the persistent view held in Washington that when push comes to shove, when the United States cannot get its way and if it feels that it can be militarily successful, this is an option which it reserves to itself and which it expects its allies if not to approve of at least not to condemn.

Over the years it has been a problem, it seems to me, for Canada and for many other allies of the United States and NATO in other ways, that this expectation to be allied with the United States in one context is to be expected to approve of its actions in every other context, and this has brought discredit on a great many multilateral institutions, this American expectation.

The minister started out by saying that Canada supports non-intervention. You either support non-intervention or you do not support non-intervention. You cannot just support non-intervention and then when the United States decides that, in its judgment, the time has now come to violate this provision of the UN Charter and other accepted norms of international law that Canada will respect that judgment. I do not know if I would approve, but I would certainly have felt much better if the United States had sought the opinion of the international community or the United Nations or someone else as to what should be done about this situation.

The fact of the matter is that we do not have a mechanism in the world for dealing with the existence of corrupt and undemocratic regimes. We need that kind of mechanism and we are not going to get that kind of mechanism until we have a reform of the mandate and the authority of the United Nations, which is something that Canada should be seeking, to get over this problem that presents an opportunity for superpowers to act in the way that the United States has just acted. It is not the right way to deal with these problems, to have the United States or, for that matter, any other superpower decide that they shall take the law into their own hands, which is exactly what the United States has done here. They have taken unto themselves the right to break international law when they so judge.

If we are trying to move to a world where we operate with any sort of genuine sense of international law, these kinds of things are more dangerous for that notion than they are for anything else. That is why so many of us over here are offended by it. We are not offended that General Noriega is no longer in power in Panama. We have had no use for General Noriega or his regime, or for that matter many other regimes that have existed down through the years in Central and Latin America. We have a record of opposing and being critical of those regimes which is second to none in this House. It strains credibility, frankly, for Conservative back-benchers today and indeed for the minister, unfortunately, to suggest somehow that because we have questioned the American action in this case, we are supporters of Noriega or this sort of thing. I would put the New Democratic Party's record of opposing undemocratic military dictatorships up against the record of the Conservative government, or for that matter, Liberal governments, any day of the week. We have nothing to apologize for.

I think it was Franklin Delano Roosevelt who said something with respect to some tinpot dictator somewhere that the United States was supporting. In answer to one of his advisers who said that this guy was a real son of a bitch, FDR replied: "Well, he may be a son of a bitch, but he is our son of a bitch".

What happened in Panama was that there was a son of a bitch who decided that he was his own man. This was not part of the plan. This has not been part part of the American plan for many years.

Did we hear whining and see crocodile tears about democracy in Panama for the 20 years of the military regime that preceded the elections that everyone is so concerned about now? Did we hear anything about that? Did we hear whining and see crocodile tears about democracy when the Somosa regime was in power for decades in Nicaragua? Did we hear about Duvalier in Haiti? The list goes on and on of military dictatorships which the United States has actively supported through military and economic aid and political comfort for many years.

That is the problem with this invasion. It is not that General Noriega has been removed from power. It is that we are asked to believe that the United States is acting out of some high morality in doing this. It is the rhetoric that surrounds the event which is as offensive as anything else.

What is truly offensive or disappointing, I guess, is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not seem to have a sceptical bone in his body about this. Perhaps he should have given just the slightest hint that maybe he does not believe everything that he is told and that maybe the United States does not have a record in Central America that deserves the kind of credibility which he has given it by his comments on this action.

The minister said that we need to have new thinking. I agree. I do not think that we can always be captive to historical events. It is not always a question of trying to assign blame for things that happened a long time ago. You give that up when you feel that the people who have been part of that history have changed their thinking. You do not just give it up for the sake of having a new thought. You give it up when you think that the people who have a record of acting in a certain way have changed their behaviour.

Frankly, it is very difficult for us here and for a great many Canadians to think that the Americans have changed their way of thinking about Central America when we have been treated over the last little while to American indifference to human rights violations in El Salvador, for instance.

Just today we tabled in this House a report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade which abhorred the threat which has been made on the family of a Canadian aid worker in El Salvador, Karen Ridd from Winnipeg. Just today we tabled that report which abhorred not just the threat but the reality of assassinations, murders, bombings and everything else that goes on in El Salvador and yet the Americans do not seem moved by this. They say this is all part of the struggle for democracy, to speak of democracy in a way that I cannot fully comprehend.

Our point here, which I think is shared by a great many Canadians, is that there is an overwhelming sense of hypocrisy that sweeps over us when we listen to the American justifications for these actions. This is not to diminish the life of the American serviceman who was killed, or the value of his family or anyone else's family. People are being killed in Central America all the time, but they are not Americans. Even when they are Americans, they do not seem to count.

I recall the murder of the four nuns in El Salvador. This did not provoke an invasion by the United States. I am not saying it should have. I am just saying that there is a selectivity in the outrage that Washington displays from time to time with respect to human rights violations that is hard for us to swallow and hard for a great many Canadians to swallow. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be well advised to show that he shares some of that skepticism. I do not know why he cannot do that.

The minister mentioned Nicaragua, and I am glad that he did. In committee a couple of weeks ago we asked him questions about Nicaragua. We asked questions about why the Canadian government had not spoken out against American funding of the opposition in Nicaragua. Certainly we would find it offensive if we knew, or if we could prove, that American money was being funnelled in to support opposition, or government, or anyone else for that matter, in a Canadian political election. Yet this is the kind of thing that the minister is not prepared to criticize and condemn.

We line that up alongside the government's unwillingness to show the same kind of courage that Canadians like Karen Ridd have shown in El Salvador by putting its political and diplomatic weight between the United States and the people of El Salvador. We get the sense that the government is reluctant to speak the truth about what is going on in Central America. It is not because we are anti-American. I know the minister likes to say this, but it is because we share the views of a great many other Americans about the role of their government in Central America.

Perhaps the minister wants to maintain that a great many of the churches in the United States are anti-American, that a great many other non-governmental organizations, trade unions, members of the House of Representatives who have criticized American policy in Central America are also anti-American, that the minister knows more about being American than they do.

It is a very simplistic, childish and offensive claim that people who make these criticisms of the United States are anti-American. We are not. As Canadians we are friends of the Americans and as the country of Canada and we have a responsibility as their friends to tell them the truth about themselves and what they are doing in the world. That is what friends are for. You expect that it will be your friend who tells you the morning after the night before that you acted like an idiot at the party, or that you were rude to someone, or that you should improve your behaviour with respect to this or that element of your personality. That is our obligation to the United States. It is not our obligation to keep letting them think that they are doing okay when we know full well that they are not. That is the definition, at least in my judgment, and I think in the judgment of a great many other people who know something about friendship. That is what friends are really for and that is the role that we ought to be playing with the United States.

The minister mentioned the Organization of American States. I think in a way he was saying that it was the failure of the Organization of American States to arrive at a negotiated settlement which set the context for the Americans having to do what they did.

There may be a grain of truth in that. The grain of truth is, of course, if the OAS had succeeded in reaching a negotiated settlement, then there would not have been the context in which the Americans could have decided to do this.

But it seems to me that one of the things that Canada could have done in its new role as a member of the Organization of American States was put off this situation by becoming more actively involved in trying to reach a settlement. But I do not expect the minister to work miracles overnight in the Organization of American States. We thought it was an organization in which we are not even sure ordinary things can be worked, never mind miracles. That is why we were skeptical about Canada joining. I think that many of the members of the Organization of American States may be more skeptical about Canadian membership after this when they see the uncritical attitude taken by the minister.

It may also be the case that they will be muted in their criticism of the United States because of a sense that they failed to solve the situation. I would not be surprised if publicly they were muted in their criticism of the United States, whether this would come out of a sense of their not having dealt with the situation properly or out of a sense of what we have always said about the Organization of American States, that in the end it was an organization dominated by the Americans. This is a judgment one will have to reserve as we hear more from the leadership of the OAS and as we learn more about the situation.

I regretted the view that was taken earlier in the day by the minister and by some of his colleagues, many for that matter on the other side, who tried to caricature the debate as us being somehow pro–Noriega. Nobody in his right mind thinks that this is the case. What we are debating is whether the end in this case justifies the means, whether the means has significance far beyond Panama and far beyond Central America, whether or not it might for instance damage the process of the improvement in east–west relations. I hope it does not. I hope that the Soviets will have a bigger picture of what is going on and that they will not let this get in the way of the steps that they are taking.

I hope that the Americans will show a similar attitude toward their geographical back yard, so to speak, that the Soviets have taken toward theirs, and relinquish the view that in the final analysis, everything that happens there is something that is their business in a way that entitles them to intervene. That is really what is at stake.

Finally, what is at stake is the need for the world to develop a way to get beyond the United Nations Charter, as it now stands, so that the internal affairs of corrupt and undemocratic regimes is something that is within the reach of the international community. We need to get beyond the notions of national sovereignty that protect nations which violate the human rights of its citizens, and the way to do that is not to approve and justify the licence of superpowers. The way to do that is to work a real reform of the United Nations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being seven o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, this House stands adjourned until Monday, January 22, 1990, at one o'clock p.m., providing the Speaker may recall the House at any time before the date for the sole purpose of Royal Assent.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of entering into negotiations with the government of Ontario to establish a wilderness reserve or heritage park to protect the environmental uniqueness and importance of the Rouge River Valley system in Scarborough.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am proud and honoured to introduce this motion today on behalf of the people of Scarborough and indeed all Canadians. I want to thank the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River for seconding this motion.

It is fitting that an environmental issue is debated as the first order of business for this House at the start of the 1990s. This motion signals, as the beginning of the debate for this year, the importance that Canadians have placed on the preservation of our environment.

This votable motion calls on the Government of Canada to enter into negotiations with the Government of Ontario to establish a wilderness reserve or heritage park to protect the environmental uniqueness and importance of the Rouge River Valley system in Scarborough.

The Rouge River Valley has a great history which dates back to the ancient Indian tribes that first settled in the valley some 2,000 years before the birth of Christ. The first European settlers explored what was then called the Ketchie Sepee or great river in 1793. The river was later renamed the Rouge River because of the colour that was added to the water from clay deposits along the shoreline. Today, the Rouge River Valley system is about 10,000 acres of wilderness reserve in the midst of the largest city in Canada, metropolitan Toronto.

Many questions have been raised about the Rouge and its significance to our community and to our country. As the member of Parliament for Scarborough Centre and one of the first members to have become involved in this issue I want to take this opportunity to respond to the questions and explain why this is such an important and significant national issue.

First, where is the Rouge River Valley? The Rouge River and its water system are located in the north eastern part of the metropolitan Toronto. The watershed begins north of Richmond Hill and Whitchurch—Stouffville and flows through Markham and Pickering and Scarborough before emptying into Lake Ontario. The system's many tributaries make up three main water courses: the Rouge River, the Little Rouge River and Petticoat Creek.

The most environmentally sensitive area of the Rouge is located in north eastern Scarborough. Anyone who has ever visited the metropolitan Toronto zoo has seen a very small part of the Rouge Valley and can appreciate its size, its beauty and indeed its uniqueness.

Why is this area so unique and worthy of preservation? The Rouge River Valley system is an incredible natural resource. The valley contains three areas of Carolinian forest designated by the World Wildlife Fund of Canada as critically unprotected. The area also has over 70 different native tree species which is more than can be found in British Columbia's South Moresby Island.

Among the over 40 varieties of fish in the Rouge River two are rare nationally. Of the over 70 bird species the red-shouldered hawk and Cooper's hawk are nationally endangered. Among the over 400 different kinds of flora in the valley 12 are nationally rare, 11 are provincially rare, and 92 are regionally rare.

The forests in the valley are inhabited by deer, bald eagles, foxes, coyotes and 16 other kinds of mammals. In addition, over 63 archaeological sites have been discovered in the valley, some of which are over 9,000 years old.

And all of this, Mr. Speaker, is less than a 40-minute drive from the corner of Bloor and Yonge Streets in downtown Toronto.

Why and how has the valley remained in this natural state? It is mainly through chance that the Rouge Valley has been spared the fate of the Don and the Humber valleys in Toronto.

A great deal of land in Scarborough and Pickering was acquired by the provincial government around 1972. In fact about 80 per cent of the lands in the Rouge system is presently under the jurisdiction of the Ontario Provincial Government. About the same time the federal government acquired land for the proposed Pickering airport. I understand that the Rouge area had always been intended to be a green space between the city of Scarborough and the proposed airport. When the airport plan was shelved by the federal government the Rouge area continued to remain in its natural state ever since.

This has now given us the opportunity to have the entire Rouge River Valley system preserved.

What are the threats against the valley today? It is incredible to think there are those in our community who would rather use the Rouge as a garbage dump, a freeway, or as building lots for million dollar mansions. The threats to the future of the valley are very real, growing, and very disturbing.

The Metropolitan Toronto Council recently approved the use of the Rouge as a potential dump site. The Province of Ontario is considering using the area as a throughway for an eight-lane freeway. The recent leaked provincial cabinet document has called for further development in the valley. Developers in the city continue to push for the construction of million dollar mansions in some of the most sensitive areas of the Rouge.

The Peterson government has failed to come forward to save the valley system.

What alternatives have been proposed? Due to the outstanding work of the Save The Rouge Valley System organization, a proposal has been put forth to preserve the valley as a 10,000-acre park.

Save the Rouge Valley System is a remarkable community based volunteer organization. Started over 17 years ago, SRVS has become one of the largest environmental groups in metro Toronto providing extensive information and education on environmental protection and conservation. SRVS has been awarded the Scarborough environmental award in each of the past five years and its efforts to save the Rouge Valley have gained national recognition.

I have been pleased to work with Jim Robb, president of the Save the Rouge Valley System, Glen De Baeremaeker, Kathy Gregorio, Gloria Rezler, and Lois James. Ron Moeser, who is now a Scarborough city councillor has also worked tirelessly with SRVS as the chairman of the Coalition of Scarborough Community Associations. The mayor of Scarborough, Joyce Trimmer, has also been actively involved in efforts by the SRVS to save the Rouge.

Each week the SRVS conducts walking tours through the Rouge. The Scarborough Board of Education has established an outdoor education centre in the Rouge, where thousands of school children visit and appreciate the beauty and the mysteries of nature. It is a tremendous place for families to be, to explore and to appreciate. Speaking of families, I am pleased that my two sisters, Lettice McKenzie and Shirley McAllister, have travelled some distance to be in this chamber gallery today to witness this debate.

There are alternatives to the development projects that threaten the valley. Recycling initiatives have been proposed as an alternative to the metro dump site. Improved recycling could reduce the amount of waste generated in metro by up to 25 per cent, but it is unthinkable to put garbage in this magnificent tablelands that would destroy the ecosystem of the Rouge. We want this magnificence preserved.

The SRVS has also presented the province with an alternative to the government's freeway proposal. SRVS has suggested that instead of destroying the Rouge Valley with an eight-lane freeway a number of existing roads could be expanded to ease the traffic problems in eastern Metro. For example, the extension of Morningside Avenue to link in with Markham Road and the widening of Highway 48 farther in Pickering, Brock Road and County Road 23 in Durham region are appropriated for expansion.

There are real alternatives which need to be acted upon. The park concept proposed by the SRVS would not only protect the Rouge as a wilderness area, but it would also create new recreational and tourism opportunities for the area. The proposed park would also preserve a number of farms and agricultural areas within the valley system. Some of these farms, such as the one owned by Russ Reesor, have been part of Scarborough's history for over 100 years. The historical buildings that are there are worthy of preservation.

However, most important of all, a park in the Rouge would provide millions of Canadians with a wilderness reserve that is accessible by city transit. Where else in the world could residents of a city the size of Toronto take a bus or a subway to such a huge wilderness forest?

You may ask: Why should the federal government be involved in this issue? The Rouge River Valley represents a truly unique environmental challenge. The federal task force report on the Canadian Parks system entitled "Our Parks, Vision for the 21st Century" called for the establishment of "national heritage parks" to protect wilderness areas that would not normally fall under the criteria of a national park. The Rouge Valley fits perfectly within the heritage park concept. The national Minister of the Environment recently called for a huge expansion of the national parks in Canada, and he included the Rouge Valley in his announcement as an example of an area of national environmental significance that should be protected.

But, is a park in this valley a feasible concept and who supports it? Yes, saving the Rouge Valley as a park is feasible and the support for this concept is overwhelming.

Over three-quarters of the land in the proposed park area is already owned by the people of Ontario through the provincial government. The plan put forward by the SRVS blends existing development with protection of the wilderness uniqueness of the valley system and the recreational uses.

• (1320)

The municipal councils and those that border the Rouge have endorsed and voted for saving the valley as a park. Two of those communities, Scarborough and Markham, which contain the majority of the proposed park area, have also amended their official city plans to accommodate the proposed park.

The Royal Commission on the Future of the Toronto Waterfront, chaired by the former Toronto mayor and federal cabinet minister, David Crombie, has fully endorsed the park proposal. I was pleased to make a presentation to the commission and bring to Mr. Crombie's attention the importance of including the Rouge Valley within the scope of his study.

Last summer Mr. Crombie released his interim report of the commission, and I would like to quote from it: "The Rouge Valley is a unique resource for the metropolitan area, the last opportunity to preserve a significant urban wilderness in the heart of the greater Toronto area. Accordingly, the royal commission recommends that the Rouge River Valley be protected as a natural heritage park. Therefore, the province should co-operate immediately with the federal government in establishing such a park as outlined in the proposal of Save the Rouge Valley System group." That is a significant recommendation and I commend the royal commission.

In addition to the royal commission, over 50 local and national organizations have added their support to saving the valley. Those groups include the World Wildlife Fund of Canada, the Western Canadian Wilderness Committee, the Canadian Nature Federation, the local chapter of the Canadian Auto Workers, the Scarborough

Chamber of Commerce, and the Chiefs of Ontario, all of which support the creation of a park in the valley.

Perhaps most significant of all for this chamber is the fact that the federal government, under the leadership of the former Minister of the Environment, the Hon. Tom McMillan, has made a $10 million commitment to the Province of Ontario to help establish a park in the valley.

I want to read briefly from a letter that Mr. McMillan sent to the Premier of Ontario the day after I hosted the minister on a tour of the valley. He states in this letter: "Other cities of the world have preserved some of their most expensive real estate in parks despite development pressures. Central Park in New York, Hyde Park in London are but two examples. Such green spaces have attracted and delighted generations of visitors and residents, to the lasting credit of the governments that assure their preservation. For the benefit of Toronto residents, other Ontarians and all Canadians, I urge you likewise to place environmental values ahead of short-term economic gain and to put an end to any possibility of development in the Rouge."

A year after Mr. McMillan toured the valley the present Minister of the Environment also visited the area and restated our government's commitment. During that visit the minister called the area "a miracle" and stated that a dump or a freeway in the valley would be completely unacceptable to our government.

Just 14 months ago the Prime Minister of Canada reiterated his support on his visit to Scarborough. The community was most appreciative of his enthusiastic endorsement of the park and you, Sir, the Speaker of the House of Commons, joined me on a tour of the valley last fall and added your very strong support for the preservation of the this unique area.

So you ask, Mr. Speaker, why then hasn't the future of the Rouge been secured? The fate of the valley rests with the Ontario Government and Premier David Peterson. Last fall, the legislature of Ontario gave unanimous approval to the Progressive Conservative Party motion to save the valley. However, to date no concrete action has been taken and the province has still not accepted the federal government's offer.

As members of Parliament representing all Canadians, we have an opportunity to join the thousands of people from across Scarborough and Canada who are fighting to save the Rouge. This is an urgent issue. This is not a time for half measures. This is the time for the Rouge Valley system to be saved in its entirety. It is time that the provincial Government of Ontario understood the importance and the urgency of the Rouge being preserved. Saving the Rouge Valley system is an opportunity to put talk into action because once an area like the Rouge is lost it is gone forever. As the World Commission on the Environment said: "We have not inherited the earth from our parents; we have borrowed it from our children".

I urge all members of the House of Commons to come together, united, to support this significant environmental issue. As we begin a new year and a new decade, let's prove to Canadians that we are ready to take action to save the Rouge Valley for our children and for generations to come.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, since my election to the House of Commons about 14 months ago there have been many issues on the Order Paper of significance to the people of my riding, Scarborough—Rouge River. Today, the issue we debate deals directly with a large portion of land in our riding. The people of my riding recognize that the particular challenge of preserving the Rouge Valley lands is multi-jurisdictional and thankfully non-partisan.

This is not the first nor the last debate on the issue of setting aside lands for parks or conservation. All levels of government have learned the need to set aside space for recreation and parks. We have in this country a stunning array of national parks from Signal Hill to Pacific Rim, from Pelee Island all the way up to the new park on the tip of Ellesmere Island.

More recently we have had the successes of South Moresby in which our Speaker took a keen interest and other initiatives currently in relation to the Carmanah forest and Temagami in Ontario. Although each of these areas has its own special character, the Rouge Valley is in one way different from all the rest. Unlike these other areas, the Rouge Valley lies within a major growing metropolitan area and is now lying in the path and face to face with the concrete steel and asphalt of urban development.

There are at least two major categories of reasons why the Rouge Valley must be preserved. The first has to do with the intrinsic value of its natural attributes. The second category relates to where we stand in time and in relation to man's future and his ability to grow and develop.

On the first count, the Rouge Valley is the last significant wildlife area remaining in metropolitan Toronto. As my colleague from Scarborough Centre has reviewed, it is home to approximately 78 species of birds, 35 species of fish, and 63 identified archaeological sites. It has metro's last Class II wetland and its largest continuous forest. There are many, many cogent reasons for preserving the Rouge Valley.

In relation to the second class of reasons I would like to start by saying that historically the presence of a natural environment or a vulnerable species has rarely stopped man before from plundering what stood in his way. The list of endangered and extinct species is long but, more important, the list can start right in our own backyard.

They include the whooping crane, the bison, the Labrador duck, whales and many others.

However, we have reason to believe that we are capable of continuing to grow and develop without degrading, killing and adulterating everything that stands in our path; that we are capable of pursuing long run development in a manner that is compatible with our global environment and the interdependent ecosystems which comprise it. We call that sustainable development.

In the early years of this century, in Toronto, there was no need to distinguish between the Don River, the Humber River, Etobicoke Creek and the Rouge River. We had lots of clean rivers, lots of ecosystems intact, but when only the Rouge River is left, maybe we can understand that if this one goes like all the rest, then there will be none left.

These are some of the reasons why the Rouge Valley must be saved, not just because it is the last chance to preserve a river valley in metropolitan Toronto, not just because of the natural assets contained in it, but also because we must prove to ourselves in North America that we can pursue a sustainable development process, that we are in fact in control of our destiny and that we are in control of our planet's future.

We have here an opportunity to make that statement. Standing face to face with one of the hottest, most expensive, aggressive and possibly the meanest urban development market in North America, I want that statement to be made by my city, by my province and by my federal government.

There is another facet of this initiative that cannot be overlooked. The Rouge is not just a piece of real estate or a greenbelt. It is an ecosystem. Every facet of life within it is affected by what man does nearby. The headwaters must be protected. The table lands are also an integral part of that same ecosystem. That is why there is opposition to the provincial proposal to build an expressway over these lands and across the valley, when an alternative is available.

That is why there is opposition to the construction of housing on these lands. As if to create a theatre of the absurd, metropolitan Toronto recently proposed that a portion of the Rouge lands be dedicated as a new dump site.

If the Rouge Valley ecosystem is to be saved, it must be protected from all of the man-made, adverse environmental threats surrounding it. The initiative to create a park and preserve the Rouge Valley is now in the hands of government which already owns about 80 per cent of the involved land. The federal government has made a financial commitment. The city of Scarborough has imposed compatible zoning criteria. It is now up to the Government of Ontario to take the necessary steps to achieve that objective. Block the expressway and the housing, abandon the dump, dedicate the necessary land to the park and commence the planning and implementation.

I urge this House to adopt this motion.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to offer my appreciation and congratulations to the hon. member for Scarborough Centre for giving us an opportunity to debate this issue. Several weeks ago, the hon. member for Scarborough Centre, the member for Scarborough—Rouge River and myself had an opportunity at the initiative of the hon. member for Scarborough Centre to host a gathering here on the Hill for those residents who are very concerned about what is happening to the Rouge River Valley and to allow other members of Parliament to meet with those individuals who were concerned.

I want to say that the presentation they gave at that time was very impressive. I do not think there was a member of Parliament who left that reception not thoroughly convinced that governments had to act to protect this ecosystem.

I want to assure you at the beginning of this debate that my colleagues in the New Democratic Party caucus fully and unconditionally support this motion. We urge that there not be a prolonged debate, that the matter is so urgent and so apparent and so obvious that it could be dealt with prior to two o'clock this afternoon. We would be prepared to give it that kind of support today.

I find, for the very reasons that the two speakers before me made in their speeches to the House, that what we are debating here today is unacceptable. If the developers and those who wish to destroy this valley manage to accomplish their intentions it would be obscene. I cannot find language to use that would be any less strong than that. It would be an absolute obscenity to allow developers to build a highway through this valley, or to build multi-million dollar homes in this valley. The final obscenity would be to place a garbage dump in this valley.

The Rouge River Valley on its own is a wondrous thing. It is the only natural wildlife area in a place like metropolitan Toronto. It has wildlife and fauna that cannot be found anywhere else in Canada. Yet there are forces out there which wish to destroy it, all in the name of development.

Next month I will celebrate 10 years of being in this House. In that 10-year period I have seen a new awareness in Canada and, indeed, globally and a growing and grave concern for the environment. After all that has been said about the greenhouse effect, about what we do to rivers and lakes and our air, when we use them as garbage dumps to dispose of our waste, we find ourselves standing here today debating this very matter.

We are debating it because we have a provincial government in Ontario that campaigned in two elections on environmental matters, made itself out to be the protector of the environment and yet is prepared to listen to arguments such as we have heard here today that would destroy a natural habitat right in the centre of the major metropolitan Toronto area. It boggles the mind. Any way that one looks at this it presents at best a puzzled kind of rash reasoning. It defies normal human behaviour.

I do not want to take up too much time because I think both members who spoke before me said as much as I could possibly say. I do want to say that this matter is so urgent that the federal government has recognized and, indeed, has made a proposal to the Government of Ontario to start negotiations on how to save the Rouge Valley system.

All I can say here is that I urge the Ontario government and people in this Chamber who have any influence with members of that government to urge them to sit down with their counterparts at the federal, municipal and regional government levels to come to a sensible solution to save the Rouge Valley system.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and support this Private Member's Motion introduced by the member for Scarborough Centre on the advisability of entering into negotiations with the Government of Ontario to establish a wilderness reserve or heritage park to protect the environmental uniqueness of the Rouge River Valley system in Scarborough.

Although I wholeheartedly support this motion, I want to stress the importance of not confining the debate to the geographic area of Scarborough. Half a mile south of the village of Vandorf where I live lies the most northerly headwaters of the Rouge Valley system. Indeed, nearly half of the Rouge River Valley system is in my riding of Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville. The Rouge watershed stretches from Richmond Hill and Stouffville in the north through the town of Markham and south into Scarborough where the Rouge River empties into Lake Ontario.

Like any chain, the Rouge system is only as strong as the sum of its parts. When one link in the chain is threatened, the survival of the entire system is threatened. The question we must ask ourselves then is: can we preserve a healthy river system within a growing urban area? This presents a great challenge to all politicians, planners, developers and residents. The key is to ensure that all development activity is kept well away from all environmentally sensitive areas, particularly the network of water courses and their supporting table lands. With wise planning and buffer zones around all rivers and tributaries, we will ensure that towns like Markham retain their environmental quality and natural heritage.

The park proposal put forward by the Save The Rouge Valley System organization is based on proven environmental planning principles that must be respected if the Rouge Valley System is to be maintained as a healthy and productive ecosystem.

The proposal encompasses 4,338 hectares of watershed area. This 4,338 hectares encompasses only 12 per cent of the entire watershed area. Of this 12 per cent, well over 75 per cent of the land is owned by the Government of Ontario. Most of the remaining lands are flood prone and therefore appropriate for acquisition by the Metro Toronto and Region Conservation Authority.

I recently spoke with Stephen Marshall of the Save The Rouge Valley System in Markham. Mr. Marshall feels that the proposal put forward by his organization could best be achieved through a joint federal–provincial effort. He also said: "A provincial or joint federal–provincial park would really put Markham on the map. As Markham grows this park with increased protection of other significant natural areas will ensure that our community will continue to be a liveable healthy and beautiful community".

Never before have I witnessed such widespread public concern over an environmental issue as I have with this one. It is obvious that people are aware of what is at stake here. To lose this beautiful gift from nature to a garbage dump or another subdivision or a major highway would be criminal. It would not be an admirable legacy to pass on to the next generation of Canadians.

In September 1988 the federal government offered to contribute $10 million toward saving metro Toronto's Rouge River Valley as a provincial park or ecological reserve. At the time former environment minister Tom McMillan nicely summed up the situation when he said: "It would be a major achievement for our generation to ensure that it (the Rouge) survives forever". That was in The Globe and Mail on September 16, 1988.

The rate of urbanization and development is accelerating in the Rouge Valley and has far surpassed any meaningful progress by any one level of government to provide environmental protection. Stream bank erosion, illegal dumping and sewers channelled directly into the water courses have degraded the Rouge River substantially. If this abuse is allowed to continue much longer, it will be too late to save the Rouge from gradual destruction. As more and more precious farm land is converted into housing projects and as the habitat of wildlife grows smaller and smaller, the time to make a difference and stop this madness grows shorter and shorter. We need urgent action and we need it yesterday.

To this end, Mr. Speaker, I commend the member for Scarborough Centre for introducing this motion and I urge all members to support it as a positive first step toward saving the entire Rouge ecosystem from harmful development proposals.

Our ultimate goal for the rouge must be a park of the kind advocated by the Save The Rouge Valley System group which, as I mentioned earlier, is based on environmentally proven standards.

The 4,338 hectares of parkland envisioned, most of which is publicly owned land, constitutes all of the ground over which the Rouge River drains. This relatively small tract of land is vital to the preservation of the Rouge River ecosystem.

This proposed national heritage park envisions four broad management areas with complementary objectives. First, a natural reserve to protect and enhance all animal and plant life; second, passive recreation to provide high quality, low-impact outdoor education and recreation opportunities; third, a historic reserve to preserve the cultural heritage of the Rouge Valley system, including all archaeological evidence of native cultures; and finally the development of secondary tourism attractions that complement the exceptional natural and cultural assets of the area.

In its interim report of August 1989, the royal commission on the future of the Toronto waterfront recommended that the Rouge River Valley be protected as a natural heritage park. Spurred by thousands of phone calls, letters, and a record-breaking attendance of hundreds of Save The Rouge supporters at public meetings, Scarborough council decided on July 11, 1988, to zone 5,000 acres around the lower Rouge River for natural environment and rural uses.

Although the Government of Ontario has stated its intentions to save the Rouge ecosystem, the province has yet to act on the federal government's year-old offer of $10 million toward the establishment of a natural heritage park. The will is clearly there to save the Rouge. What is missing is co-ordination and direction. I therefore feel that it is essential that this House offer its unconditional support to this motion to enter into negotiations with the Province of Ontario. The metro area land was originally acquired to create a regional park. In late 1989 the provincial legislature endorsed the creation of a provincial park.

The federal government has offered financial support. What we need now is action. The motion that is before us today for debate recognizes the urgency of the situation and calls for decisive action. It is a small miracle that the Rouge River Valley system has survived this long. If we want to ensure that it continues to survive then a logical first step would be to support this motion.

In closing, I am hopeful that these negotiations will lead to the adoption of the proposal advocated by the Save The Rouge Valley System organization. This would ensure that the entire system, not just part of it, is inherited by the next generation.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as you probably know from your own experience, whenever it comes to the allocation of land or the setting aside of land for purposes other than transportation or construction of highways and highrises, it becomes an extremely difficult experience. The Rouge River Valley is no exception to that experience.

Usually we know and we hear that there are important conflicting interests that have to be dealt with and there will always be when we come to the pressure of putting land aside for this type of use, either recreational or wildlife. There will always be excuses put forward whereby this project cannot be implemented.

I submit that this is not a question or an issue that can be resolved on technical grounds because all the technical questions and objections will never be satisfied and answered in a satisfactory manner. This is a political decision, a decision that requires political will.

Evidently in this House today, as a result of the initiatives taken by the member for Scarborough Centre and the member for Scarborough Rouge River, there is political will being generated in this Chamber and the message in a few minutes will be loud and clear that the elected members of all three parties in this House endorse and support enthusiastically the idea of putting aside this land for recreational and wildlife purposes for future generations.

That ought to be registered very clearly and firmly at Queen's Park. We cannot resolve this matter on questions related to transportation, hydro transmission lines, you name it, because we will be involved in this type of exercise for years to come without finding a satisfactory solution.

The point related to political will is therefore of paramount importance. It is important, therefore, in that context also to say a word of appreciation about the role that has been played in highlighting and promoting this issue by the Save The Rouge Valley System association which has not only produced interesting and intelligent material but also has advanced the issue by way of presentations to various groups across metro in a relentless manner over the last two years. Great merit has to go to this particular group if this project ever becomes a reality.

What we are talking about here is the quality of life in metropolitan Toronto. We already missed a golden opportunity with the harbourfront lands which were set aside in 1971. Because of mindless political decisions and poor leadership, they no longer were the object of what was originally intended to be an urban park but became gradually what it is now, namely an almost fully developed piece of real estate.

We have had that experience and we are tired of that type of drifting that has taken place when there was a golden opportunity for the people of Toronto to re-establish contact with its major geographic asset, namely its own Lake Ontario. Now we have another opportunity. We do not want to miss it. It is located perhaps not as ideally as harbourfront but nevertheless it is located close enough to the population concentration of 2.5 million, as others have already said, to make it an extremely worth-while concept for recreational purposes and for the enjoyment of future generations.

Having missed on harbourfront we do not want to miss on the Rouge River Valley. Therefore we support fully this motion today in the hope that similar momentum will be generated in the Ontario legislature so as to bring this matter to its final and happy conclusion once and for all.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to join with my colleagues today in full support of the motion which has been presented by the hon. member for Scarborough Centre. Even though I am a rural member and some 150 miles from that very wonderful area, the Rouge River Valley, I certainly support this and I am delighted to hear that from all sides of the House there is unanimous support. We hope that this message will get to the Ontario government and of course to the Premier of Ontario.

The Rouge Valley certainly is worth protecting and, as has been mentioned by previous speakers, particularly because of its unique situation so close to a great metropolitan area such as Toronto. The Rouge, where the river flows into Lake Ontario, is one of the few Toronto beaches that has managed to stay open for swimming in recent years. Of course, I think we are all aware that when the summer heat comes along, signs go up prohibiting swimming in this part of the metropolitan Toronto-Lake Ontario beach area, and I am delighted to know that this is one that is still reasonably clean.

Of course it has also been mentioned that the Rouge Valley is a naturalist's paradise. There are more different kinds of trees in the Rouge Valley, for example, than there are in South Moresby, one of Canada's most ecologically diverse areas. The Rouge Valley has been designated as one of the 36 most important remaining examples of the Carolinian Life Zone in Canada by the Wildlife Fund of Canada, the Nature Conservancy of Canada and the Ontario Heritage Foundation.

The Rouge Valley is a treasure, made all the more valuable by the fact that it is located within or adjacent to the borders of the largest and greatest city in Canada, Toronto. Toronto is Canada's most heavily populated and definitely economically advantaged city.

Like modern cities the world over, Toronto can be a bustling, noisy place where fumes and soot from automobiles bring tears to the eye and where the hectic pace of life sometimes makes residents long for a place where they can find a little peace and quiet, a place where they can get in touch with nature and restore themselves to tranquillity. How fortunate the citizens of metro Toronto are to have access to just such a place, located right on their doorstep. The residents of Toronto, the people of Ontario and for that matter all Canadians can take advantage of this opportunity to save a magnificent pastoral park for urban dwellers if, and only if, the Rouge Valley is preserved.

Vancouver is already blessed with just such a park. The existence of Stanley Park goes a long way toward explaining why Vancouverites consider their city to be the most beautiful in Canada. New York City has Central Park, located right in the heart of Manhattan. Londoners can enjoy Hyde Park, Parisians the Bois de Boulogne.

All are vast reserves, located at the centres of vast metropolises. All are monuments to civic foresight in preserving land that could otherwise have been developed.

I would like to sit down at that this time, and trust that the House will pass this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

It being very close to two o'clock the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

PARKS

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that on this day I refer to a very historic program put forward by the World Wildlife Fund last fall. This book, Endangered Spaces, which was circulated to all members of Parliament, all members of legislatures, provincially and in the territories, is a very cogent plan produced by 22 authors to complete in the course of the next decade the national parks system and the provincial parks system so that we may have a complete representation for all time to come of the historic areas, the natural areas of this country.

We are in a position federally where about 50 per cent of our park system has been completed. Some very encouraging leadership has come from the Minister of Environment with respect to pursuing the completion of that plan over the course of the next decade. We also need the full and active support of provincial governments as was indicated here today. It is my hope that with the kind of all-party support and agreement on the Rouge just a moment ago, we may see this as a logical extension to adopting the plan and program of endangered spaces that is so important for the future of this country.

TRADE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the Mulroney trade deal has done it again. There have been more factory shut-downs and more employee lay-offs. It hit home for me last week. My father, a dedicated employee of IBL Industries, located in the Conservative held riding of Burlington, received his pink slip. An official with the company states that the trade deal is largely to blame in the decision by the company to lay off employees permanently and to enter into receivership.

The irony is that while promising secure access to the U.S. market, the Conservative government actually managed to have tariffs imposed on some Canadian companies where there were none before the deal came into effect. Prior to January, 1989, IBL Industries had free and secure access to the American market, but because the Conservative government did not stand up to American negotiators, their products became reclassified and they now have to pay duties.

Many Canadian firms have already moved south of the border. Canadian companies like IBL have lost important contracts to competitors in the U.S. Thousands of jobs, including my father's livelihood, have been lost in the shuffle. The trade deal is a misdeal and the Tories should fold.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, January 20, 1990, a derailment occurred in the municipality of Val d'Or, Quebec, at mile 36.1 of the Val d'Or subdivision. This derailment, which involved 11 cars, including four carrying gas and heating oil, made it necessary to call in CN's emergency teams, local firefighters and officers of the municipal police force and the Quebec Provincial Police.

One of the cars lost its cargo of 78,000 litres of gasoline while 150 gallons of heating oil escaped through the valve of a tank car. The remaining cars that went off the track contained copper concentrate.

CN experts quickly arrived on the scene and established a safety perimeter.

Mr. Speaker, CN's directors in Montreal have cut the number of sectionmen in Abitibi during the past few years, and the Canadian government should follow the recommendations given in the National Transportation Agency of Canada's report, released on January 4, 1990, on causes and circumstances connected with defects in U.S. tank cars.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge the Minister of the Environment to do his job properly. I am not the first person with this request. On December 28, the Hon. Justice Muldoon also ordered the minister to follow the law and to conduct a real environmental assessment of the Rafferty and Alameda dam projects.

This is the second time the courts have ruled against the government on this project. The minister still has not announced an independent panel to study the environmental impacts of the Rafferty–Alameda dams. He has eight more days to do so.

When he announces the panel, the minister should also revoke Saskatchewan's licence and stop construction on the dam. The Devine government in Saskatchewan continues to build a dam 24 hours a day, weather permitting, and has now completed some 16 per cent of the project.

What will happen if the panel finds the project to be environmentally unsound? Will the Minister of the Environment travel to Saskatchewan and tear down the dam? I doubt it.

Surely the minister can see how ludicrous is his situation. The people of Saskatchewan and Manitoba care about their environment and will not give up until the minister can prove, without a doubt, that the project is sound. Two courts have ruled against the minister. Why does he not use this opportunity to get it right?

UKRAINE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, today marks the seventy–first anniversary of a very special event in Ukraine, the creation of a united Ukrainian National Republic. However, the decades following that event were tragic ones.

But today we are witnessing an unprecedented revival of independence in Ukraine. So it is a particularly fitting time for everyone to celebrate with special optimism one of the great moments in the history of that country.

To commemorate that event, Ukrainians formed a human chain between Lviv and Kiev. Also yesterday, Canadians of Ukrainian origin formed a similarly symbolic human link by the eternal flame on Parliament Hill to reaffirm their quest for independence for their country of birth and heritage.

Today I call on the Prime Minister and his government to commemorate this special Ukrainian day by taking bold and determined steps to sustain the progress of freedom in Ukraine. We in Parliament shall help keep the flame of that great national event forever burning in the hearts and minds of all freedom loving Canadians.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, even though the wording of the Meech Lake Accord states that the words "distinct society" do not give the government of the Province of Quebec additional authority, these words still concern many Canadians. In fact many areas and sectors of Canada already have distinct needs and solutions designed exclusively for their own regions.

For example, in Atlantic Canada we need a distinct economic development agency and we have it, ACOA. In western Canada, their needs are different and they have a distinct program called the Western Diversification Fund. We call for distinct approaches to help the prairie provinces' wheat producers and another for the Atlantic fishery. We have a distinct program for freight transportation in Atlantic Canada, and on and on.

My point is that all regions of Canada already have distinct solutions to meet their needs and the words in the Meech Lake Accord do not change the situation for any part of Canada. I respectfully urge those dissenting provincial premiers to actively make every effort to resolve their concerns and pass the Meech Lake amendment as part of our Constitution.

FIREARMS

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, a young woman was murdered in my constituency last week. There was no apparent motive behind the killing; she was just gunned down. The suspect in the case has been described as depressed and suicidal.

This raises serious questions about the way firearms acquisition certificates are issued to purchasers of restricted weapons in Canada. When a person applies for a firearms acquisition certificate, he is asked whether he has had a mental disorder. If he replies "no", there is no way the police can confirm it. They have no right to demand to see his medical records.

The process needs fixing. Police should not be sent snooping into medical records but persons wanting handguns and semi–automatics should be required to produce a medical certificate that, in effect, says he has no mental problems. After all, a medical certificate is needed before getting a Class 1 driver's licence in my province.

I appeal to the Minister of Justice to act now. It is just too easy to buy a restricted weapon in Canada. Let us act now, before more lives are lost.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what Canadians and foreign tourists might believe after listening to the media and the oppositions critics last week, VIA Rail is still running passenger trains in Canada.

The first Canadian train run only began in the 1950s and, like most things with VIA Rail, it ran late. Its cancellation was late, years and hundreds of millions of taxpayers' dollars late.

The last Canadian—it sounds like a title from some Harlequin Romance—was full. It was full of so-called train buffs who admitted they had not ridden the train for years and it was full of the media. The media had not used it for 30 years but took a free ride to write or report a story.

What is in store for Canada now that we have experienced the last Canadian media rail circus? Real train buffs will still be able to travel the rails, only this time the trains might be full and taxpayers will not be forced to pay for the train buffs' nostalgia.

The media and a few of the opposition members across the way can resume travelling by air as they have for years. Not for them, the slower romantic clickety-clack of the passenger train.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in 1983 the Liberal government recognized the necessity of a national water policy and launched an inquiry. It produced in 1985 a report called Currents of Change.

In 1987, this government released a paper entitled Federal Water Policy, a weak document which had little effect on government policy. Although it promised that international water projects would be subjected to environmental assessment and review processes, the environment minister had to be taken to court twice to make him enforce his own law in the case of Rafferty-Alameda dam project.

That paper also promised a legislative framework for water in Canada. Yet today, seven years later, after launching that inquiry, despite copious rhetoric on sustainable development, this government has no national water legislation, no national standards, and no legislative commitment against diversions and export of water.

We therefore must call on this tired government and urge it to introduce into this House meaningful and substantial water legislation.

CANADA POST

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, there is a serious deficiency in the federal heritage buildings' legislation under the jurisdiction of the Minister of the Environment. That legislation is being taken advantage of by the Minister of Public Works and the minister responsible for Canada Post.

Federal heritage policy requires a degree of maintenance and protection for identified federal buildings in Canada, some of which are currently owned by Public Works and leased to Canada Post.

While Canada Post continues to withdraw its commitment to operating post offices, particularly in rural Canada where the only federal presence in the community is the federal post office, the Minister of Public Works, through a loophole in existing legislation, allows Canada Post to operate outside compliance with the heritage buildings legislation. As a result, heritage structures like the post office building in Wilkie, Saskatchewan are left in need of maintenance and restoration and identified for sale to the private sector.

It is time to renew our commitment to postal service in rural Canada and through the Minister of the Environment to strengthen heritage legislation and prevent the loss of even more heritage structures across Canada.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, as we get down to business on the opening day of Parliament 1990, I thought it might be helpful to members to provide an update on just what the issues are, and for the viewers at home where each party stands.

First of all, on the GST, nobody likes it, not even Mike Wilson. But he has the guts to do what is right for the country.

On the Meech Lake Accord, the NDP members like it so much they want two. The Conservatives support bringing the country together and, as Liberal Premier Peterson says, "It really does not matter what the federal leader thinks".

On leadership, the Tories are happy, the NDP have elected their interim leader and the Liberals continue the search.

HARBOURS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, Canadians and in particular Atlantic Canadians are painfully aware of the devastating impact that this government's economic policies have had on the Atlantic economy over the past five years. Today I wish to bring to the attention of the House another problem that is hampering the economy of my own riding of Hillsborough in Prince Edward Island, that being the lack of a ports and harbours authority for Charlottetown Harbour.

The federal government is responsible for appointments to the ports and harbours advisory committees which monitor the daily shipping activities of this important harbour. To date, my constituency is still waiting for the federal government to announce such appointments. The Charlottetown Chamber of Commerce and numerous other organizations continue to wait.

The names of qualified individuals have been submitted but these initiatives have fallen on deaf ears. Today I call upon the government to expedite the process so that the Charlottetown Harbour can return to full capacity, benefiting all our farmers, fishermen and the local business community.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, last week VIA Rail announced 40 per cent fare reductions on some of its Ontario and Quebec routes. One week earlier, VIA announced a 40 per cent fare increase on the Vancouver Island passenger service of VIA Rail. At the same time, the Minister of Justice announced that he would appeal a Supreme Court decision which obliges Canada to continue to operate the Vancouver Island service under the conditions of the terms of union by which B.C. entered Confederation.

I call on the Minister of Justice to withdraw his appeal of that decision and to stop conspiring with the CPR to relieve them of their responsibility to provide passenger rail service on Vancouver Island. I call on this Tory government to remember that the terms of union by which B.C. entered Confederation are not like Tory promises that can be forgotten after the next election. They are the glue that holds this province as part of Confederation and extends this dominion from sea to sea. Finally, I call on the government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I recognize the hon. member for Halifax.

FISHERIES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic fisheries are continually being victimized by this government. In its disregard for the Atlantic region, the government has opted to ignore legitimate requests and is not even bothering to construct its usual lame and inane excuses.

Last month, the Jessie & Shelly II, a $2 million fishing vessel, burned causing $1 million in damages. While under refit, the owners of the vessel have sought to lease a replacement vessel from the United States. Their request is legitimate and has received the approval of all levels of government and is in compliance with the temporary vessel replacement policy of Canada. However, the process has been stalled by the Minister of Fisheries.

The request has awaited the minister's signature for a week and inquiries as to the status of the request have been ignored and phone calls not returned. The minister's indifference to the plight of the crew and the owner is intolerable. Already $30,000 has been spent preparing the replacement vessel and each day that the minister stalls costs an additional $8,000.

A crew of nine is now collecting unemployment insurance for the first time ever. Why? Because the minister has been sitting on this request rather than approving it.

I have a message for the minister and this government. The people of Atlantic Canada are sick and tired of having to swallow this government's indifference. At least show some semblance of responsibility and approve this request.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, coastal Atlantic Canadians anxiously await the government's aid package. Recent press attention has focused on the town of Canso, but let us not forget that the Canso plant has not yet closed, while people in communities like Port Mouton, Lockeport, Port Le Hebert, Bear Point, Shag Harbour and Woods Harbour have already seen their plants close and their people laid off.

The South Shore has also been hit by lay-offs at plants and from trawlers in Lunenburg, Clarks Harbour, Southside and Port La Tour, not to mention the closure of boat yards up and down our coast, and the closure of CFS Barrington.

Coastal Atlantic Canadians are in need of assistance, short-term relief for families, communities and for municipalities who have seen their tax bases eroded and their social budgets increased. Funds are badly needed to support and encourage economic diversification and a reduction of our dependence on the unpredictable fisheries resource.

Let the aid package come soon. Let it be comprehensive and let it not forget the communities of southern Nova Scotia.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

[English]

The fisheries crisis in Atlantic Canada is going from bad to worse. Every sector of the fisheries is affected, be it groundfish, lobster, snow crab or herring.

The government knew this crisis was brewing and had promised general and generous programs, to use the Prime Minister's words. We now hear from different ministers that there will be no special aid package for the affected communities. Whatever aid there is will be from existing programs and existing funds.

Can the Prime Minister explain to the thousands of workers in Canso, in Gaultois and the other affected communities just what is going to happen? Is the Prime Minister once again backing away from his statement that his government would come to the aid of the fishery in the same broad, generous way Ottawa has helped drought-stricken western farmers? Is he going to back out on those words?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are deeply concerned about the problem of the fishery in Atlantic Canada. Unfortunately it is not one that can be solved overnight. It is structural.

There are the problems of overfishing by foreigners. There has been undue pressure in terms of inciting people to join the fishery. There has been overfishing by some Canadians.

In many ways there has been an absence of planning that has come to bear on the entire fishery with unfortunate consequences for fishing communities and for people engaged in that occupation.

My hon. friend who has a degree of expertise in this knows that it is not a problem that can be readily solved by slogans or simplistic proposals. It can, however, be solved in the longer haul by earnest co-operation between federal and provincial governments, the communities concerned, the unions and all members of this House.

I indicated to my hon. friend that it was our intention to co-operate with the provinces and all concerned to develop a comprehensive program that would be sensible, thoughtful and productive, that would help resolve—

An Hon. Member: It's none of those. Where's the money?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, this is typical of the Liberals. They ask a serious question about the Atlantic fishery. When I try to provide a serious answer, all we get from the Liberals are cat-calls. This government is going to bring forward programs. We are going to leave the cat-calls and the denigration to the Liberals.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, all we hear right now from the government is that there will be no new money. We are willing and are waiting to co-operate, but we would like to have the means to co-operate and do things that are of value.

• (1420)

In the case of communities affected by cuts in the groundfish quota where entire communities will be wiped out, everybody knows that existing programs are not sufficient to respond to the extraordinary needs of these communities. Already, provincial and municipal governments have reacted negatively to this government's response, or lack of response.

These communities ask, when will they receive assurances that new programs with special funds will be made available to see them through the storm. That is all they ask.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wrote, as my hon. friend knows, in the strongest possible terms to Jacques Delors, President of the European Community, and received a response offering to deal with this problem at the highest levels. The government is going to take advantage of that and there will be announcements made in this regard.

The government announced a substantial package of immediate assistance for those affected by the National Sea closures last month. This package includes programs of industrial assistance, a special program for older workers, and a community development fund. That was our immediate response. But for many months a special cabinet committee has been developing a substantial package for the restructuring of the northern cod fishery. This will be carried out in conjunction with the provinces and the communities affected.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration is finalizing details on the application of the Community Futures Program which will provide—and this is very important to my hon. friend—substantial moneys to the communities affected. These funds can flow immediately.

In addition, $50 million more will be directed to the Community Futures Program by the unemployment insurance bill which is presently stalled in the Senate. I have held meetings—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Fifty million dollars more is available for Community Futures, and if my hon. friend wants to do something, tell the Liberal Senators to pass the bill.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Prime Minister.

All we hear about is recycled or reprofiled sums of moneys just like we did with ACOA.

[Translation]

In addition to the crisis in the groundfish fisheries, there are also enormous problems which are in fact reaching crisis proportions in the lobster, snow crab and herring fisheries. Plants have already closed down, and several thousand people have been laid off. Is the government aware of the crisis that exists in New Brunswick, Eastern Quebec, and Prince Edward Island, or does the government intend to ignore the problem as it did in the case of northern cod and is it going to let the people in the Atlantic region slowly starve to death?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are not only very much aware of the problem, we are working extremely hard to try and deal with it. We are also counting on the co-operation of the hon. member and his party to help us in this respect.

The hon. member referred to a crisis in the Atlantic region. He is a member from the province of New Brunswick. It is true that we have a very serious problem in the Atlantic fisheries. I think that, before sounding off in a way that might affect investment in his native province, the Hon. Member should realize that since 1984, 39,000 new jobs have been created—

Mr. Robichaud: Oh, come on! The situation is worse than it ever has been!

Mr. Mulroney:—in New Brunswick and that investment—Now listen! Instead of shouting slogans I think you all should listen! And if you don't want to listen to me, New Brunswick, I think you should at least listen to the Premier of New Brunswick, Mr. Frank McKenna. This is what he said in a statement published in the Financial Post on April 21.

[English]

I quote: "According to Statistics Canada, New Brunswick will lead the nation in capital spending growth in 1989, up a whopping 24.1 per cent. Business investment will increase an astonishing 37.7 per cent in 1989".

Listen to what the Premier of New Brunswick says. "With a world class port, a first-rate work force and our strategic location in light of the Free Trade Agreement, New Brunswick is fast becoming known as the smart place to be. We think investors and business leaders should know this information, but if we don't tell you, who will?"

That was Frank McKenna, Premier of New Brunswick. Stop bad-mouthing New Brunswick. Stop bad-mouthing Atlantic Canada and help us build a stronger Atlantic Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I tell him that the people are saying that all that guff he just got on with will not put any—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister recognizes the crisis and is at least half a step ahead of the Minister of Fisheries.

It is an unfolding national tragedy and it is a disgrace of international proportions. What the people, the fish plant workers, the fishermen want to know from this Prime Minister, what they desperately need, is a clear signal from him that he understands the dimensions of this tragedy, that he cares about them and that he is prepared to put it as his first order of business.

I ask him, would he now give notice that he is prepared to stand up to the European Community, to take definitive action to stop the over-fishing in order to protect the jobs and the way of life being jettisoned by his callous inaction up until now?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister indicated, there is of course an international dimension to this and it involves dealing effectively with the European Community.

I think the hon. member, if he is serious about solving the problem, would know that there are no gunboat solutions available here. There are none and anyone in this House who pretends that there are gunboat solutions is simply misleading the people who already have problems enough in Newfoundland and in Nova Scotia and elsewhere in Atlantic Canada.

The only way this can be solved is by tough-nosed negotiation with the European Community. We have begun that and have already made some progress. Not enough progress—and we are the first to admit that—but much more progress than there had been before when people dealt only in rhetoric and were not prepared to be involved in serious negotiations.

The Prime Minister has been in touch with the President of the European Community. The response of the President of the European Community has been more constructive than we had thought it would be. We intend to follow that up. We intend also—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Well, hon. members opposite can belittle the progress that is being made and they can pretend that there is some way that we can threaten the Europeans into line. They know that is false. We are not interested in dealing with falsity. We are interested in trying to restore stability and some prospect of growth to the fishery of Atlantic Canada.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister claims progress. I would say to him that after five years of silence, of using the Atlantic fishery as a pawn at best, the government began to pay lip-service and the minister got his answer from the Spanish and Portuguese a month ago on that. Despite all the lip-service, they are going to take four times the quota assigned to them in 1990. The minister calls that progress?

I say to the minister, talk is not working. It is not working. Would he now take some definitive action? Would he take some trade action? Would he take some diplomatic initiatives? Would he stop the cheap lip-service which is getting us nowhere? Would he start the process?

Mr. McDermid: What would you suggest, Roger?

Mr. Simmons: I suggest that he start the process to extend jurisdiction to the nose and tail of the Grand Banks for a start. That is what I would suggest. What does the minister suggest?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, were the issue cheap lip-service, no one in the House could compete with the hon. member who just spoke.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, the issue is not that. The resolution clearly lies on diplomatic actions. We have already been able to get some reductions in the quotas established by the European Community, not enough, but some movement. We have had some response by the president of the commission. We expect to have a visit here in Canada soon, within weeks, by the European commissioner responsible for fisheries, at which time we will have the opportunity to discuss those matters with him directly and can bring to his attention some of the problems that are being faced.

• (1430)

He talks about trade measures. He comes from the Province of Newfoundland. He knows that the Province of Newfoundland is the province that would suffer most if we got involved in a trade war with Europe because they would respond by going directly at Newfoundland and other Atlantic Canadian exports to Europe.

We have problems enough in the Atlantic fishery now without embarking on gunboat diplomacy, the certain consequence of which would be to do damage to other parts of the Atlantic Canadian economy that are strong now and that we intend to keep strong. We intend not to engage in these kinds of rhetorical flights of fancy that only harm Atlantic Canada.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has said that he does not want simplistic slogans, he wants programs. He has told us that he is waiting for the cabinet committee to come forth with some programs. He has removed more people from the unemployment insurance program on the east coast but he has put $50 million into Community Futures which requires the applicant to be on unemployment insurance. So he takes people off the program on the one hand and puts more money into a program for people on the other.

Mr. Epp: It does not.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has told us what may be, but people in the Atlantic region, families, are wondering what the future is going to be for their children. People are being laid off now. Communities, school boards and corner store businesses cannot even plan because of the instability that is created by the lack of proposal of specific programs for the Atlantic region.

Will the Prime Minister tell this House what specific programs he is prepared now to implement for the Atlantic region?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member clearly does not even understand how these existing programs work. Community Futures is a program that is designed for communities that have very specific problems. They are designated. There can be funding for these communities depending on the unemployment rate—not because of individual unemployed—that help them build a future. And that is what is being held up in the other place right now, an additional $50 million for those communities. That program is a program that works. It has been proved time and time again that it works in communities all across Canada and particularly in Atlantic Canada.

I will be making an announcement later today about three new designated Community Futures areas, but for all the Community Futures there is $50 million more, but that money can start to flow right now.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I redirect the question to the Prime Minister.

We talked about programs and possible programs. It is reported that the U.S. Department of Commerce is threatening to examine any assistance package to fishery products by the Government of Newfoundland in view of whether there might be unfair subsidies. We know, based on past experience, that the U.S. fishing industry believes that essential Canadian social programs are unfair subsidies.

Will the Prime Minister tell this House what specific programs the government has considered but may have felt could not be put into place because of threatened retaliation under the free trade agreement?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we know of the hon. member's intense interest in this issue because she flew into Newfoundland for a photo opportunity for a few hours and flew out again around a week ago, so we know the intensity of her interest in this issue.

With respect to the question of countervail, there was already a countervail investigation in the United States which held that social programs such as unemployment insurance, as they were applied in the fisheries, were not subsidies and not countervailable. So the hon. member is barking up the wrong tree again as she does so often.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, we have heard so far today a number of very sensible questions about the future of the Atlantic region and I think all members of the House are concerned about that. I ask once again, given the crisis in the Atlantic region, given the need for assistance now—not a rejigging of old programs, but real assistance, assuring that people can remain in their communities in the Atlantic—is the Prime Minister personally prepared to take action on this issue and to become personally involved in ensuring that this crisis can be dealt with now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to my hon. friend is that, of course, I have been deeply involved in trying to resolve what is a very major problem in the Atlantic fishery.

I take exception to my hon. friend's contention, and I will resist it there or anywhere else, that there is a crisis in Atlantic Canada. There is no crisis in Atlantic Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: There is not.

Mr. Simmons: Where you been, boy?

Mr. Peterson: John, do you agree? Do you agree, Crosbie?

An Hon. Member: Where have you been, in Florida?

An Hon. Member: Wake up and smell the coffee brewing.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: What's he smoking, John?

Mr. Mulroney: There are important areas in the Atlantic economy—particularly the fishery, which is in a state of crisis. That we recognize and have said it many, many times—that are going very strongly. Premier McKenna pointed out in an advertisement in The Financial Post, which I have just read, in August, that investment growth in New Brunswick led Canada in 1989.

If you do not heed the cries of gloom and doom which undermine investor confidence I believe there is a possibility that New Brunswick and other Atlantic provinces can lead Canada again in investment in 1990. The elements are there, notwithstanding the fact that there is, indeed, as my hon. friend points out, a very serious crisis in the fishery.

I ask my hon. friend to consider the fact that throughout Atlantic Canada total business investment in the economy was projected to increase almost 17 per cent last year.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Mulroney: The centres of excellence for research and development, so important to Atlantic Canada—

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps we will move on. The hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I find it absolutely incredible that the Prime Minister would say that there is no crisis in Atlantic Canada. Not only is fisheries a major industry, but it is the only industry in a vast, major portion of Atlantic Canada. There will be communities completely wiped out if something is not done.

What are these people going to do? Why is the government allowing these communities to die?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there again is distortion. We have acknowledged that the Atlantic fishery is in a state of crisis and we are co-operating with provinces, communities and other national governments to make sure that we deal with that crisis. But we do not want the international investment community to believe that because there is this serious problem in the fishery that the economy of Atlantic Canada is to be scorned because it is a basket case. It is not a basket case. The economy of Atlantic Canada shows areas of important strengths. There is an economic future in Atlantic Canada. We do not want doom and gloom. We want to bring about greater prosperity.

Some Hon. Members: What are you doing?

Mr. Mulroney: I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, where there was a basket case. When we came into power, the Liberals had unemployment in Newfoundland at 23.5 per cent. We brought it down 7 percentage points. We brought it down 3.5 points in Nova Scotia and 3 points in New Brunswick. The economy of Atlantic Canada was a basket case and we are improving it.

• (1440)

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I hope the Prime Minister will not be surprised if the people in towns like Canso are not dancing in the streets.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLellan: The Prime Minister shows an abysmal ignorance of Atlantic Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, if the fishery is in crisis, the economy is in crisis. It is not only the major stupidity of the fishery policy but ACOA's negligence and deficiencies, free trade and the VIA policies have all devastated Atlantic Canada.

This government is not only widening the disparity in this country, but this government is sentencing thousands of people in Atlantic Canada to abject poverty.

Why is the government not able to tell us what it is going to do for Atlantic Canada right now if it is going to do something? Why can it not do that right now? Why has it not come up with a policy? It has known long enough about the problems.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Clancy: Tell us!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not need any lessons from a Liberal on how to help Atlantic Canada because Atlantic Canada is doing infinitely better today than it ever did under a Liberal government. You should be ashamed of yourself for raising these problems that only damage investor confidence.

Some Hon. Members: Oh come on!

Mr. Mulroney: With regard to Canso, my hon. friend does himself and the House a disservice by suggesting that anybody is dancing in the streets. I have acknowledged that the Atlantic fishery is in a state of crisis. I have acknowledged that it requires special programs to help it. I have told the House and the country that with regard to the fishery we have and will continue to bring forward the same kinds of generous programs that we brought for the western farmers. I have already told my hon. friend that. We have done some things and we have much more to do.

What I am saying to my hon. friend, and what I am saying to the Liberals and the NDP, that with respect to Atlantic Canada there is trouble enough with a very genuine, fundamental structural problem in the fishery. Do not extend that to every area of economic life in Atlantic Canada. It is not true, it is not fair, because there is a very good economic future in Atlantic Canada and we want to work to make it better.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it is really incredible to hear someone say that a crisis in the fisheries industry in the Atlantic Provinces does not constitute a disaster for the entire economy in the Atlantic region.

Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, because Canadians are also worried about another issue of national importance. Is the Minister of Finance now prepared to admit that Canadians across the country still massively reject his proposal for a new 7 per cent tax on practically every single item and service they use?

Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Finance is this: Since all his colleagues have now had a chance to hear what their constituents had to say during the holidays, is he now prepared to withdraw his proposed GST?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the hon. member suggest that we withdraw this proposal a number of times in the past. If he is so drawn to this as an option, could he tell us what he would put in its place as an alternative to the GST proposal, because I have not heard a thing yet from the Liberal party as to what it would put in its place.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has now set a precedent where he has indicated that he is prepared to change his mind from time to time. We had the premiers of the ten provinces ask for a reduction in interest rates and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business asking for a reduction in interest rates and a lowering of the Canadian dollar. They are now joined by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Through all of this, the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada said no.

Now we see a bit of movement. Has the government finally given up on its policy of maintaining high interest rates and a highly valued Canadian dollar? Has it finally seen the light over the Christmas vacation?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear from the response of the associate critic for finance for the Liberal party that he does not have an option to the GST because the silence that I took from his question demonstrated clearly the Liberals do not have an idea in the world about sales tax reform.

The hon. member has referred to unanimous points of view. Let me remind him of the unanimous point of view taken by the provincial premiers in August of 1988: Knock interest rates down by 2 per cent. Since then, we know interest rates have gone up by 2 per cent. At the same time we have seen increasing inflationary pressures during that period.

So if we had taken the advice of the premiers—the unanimous advice of the premiers at that time—we would be in a jackpot by now. We would have rip-roaring inflation today, different from the signs that we are now getting inflation under control. We have seen some first signs of that. We are not out of the woods yet but the fruits of the policies that we have been following over the past couple of years are starting to appear and with some patience and some appropriate decisions on the part of various people in the private sector, we hope to see some progress in that. But we are not there yet. We still have to bear with this policy to assure ourselves that we are going to get this inflation problem beaten.

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As he knows, and as the whole world knows, for the last many months we have been witnessing the grinding down of the cold war in central and eastern Europe and even in the Soviet Union. For example, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary are presently negotiating to get Soviet armed forces entirely out of their countries, and we should welcome this.

Therefore, why is it that he, his department and this government insist upon clinging on to that old relic of the cold war, cruise missile testing here in Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been dramatic developments in East-West relations. There have been dramatic changes which are evident and, to some degree, surprising to all of us in their extent in eastern Europe.

There is no doubt that there were several causes of that. One of them, of course, was the reform initiative undertaken by Mr. Gorbachev. But, there is also no doubt that one of the reasons for those changes was that at times when parties like his were suggesting that the West should take positions that were divided, governments like ours decided that it was in our interest to maintain the solidarity of the western alliance.

That solidarity led, in the first instance, to the reduction of a classification of nuclear weapons. We believe it had contributed substantially to the dramatically new atmosphere that now exists in East-West relations. We have followed the practice in the past of taking major decisions of this kind in consultation with our allies. Often we propose things, as we have done with the open-skies conference, that become the policy of the whole alliance. But we do not propose to act unilaterally and, by acting unilaterally, undo one of the forces that has led to the progress we all celebrate in this House.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, why is it that the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary are prepared, each in their own way, to take unilateral action to bring down the cold war and to eliminate it when we don't have the courage to promote it ourselves?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): How can we justify encouraging the super powers not only to put the cruise missiles on the bargaining table at the START talks but to try to get the cruise missiles eliminated when we are, at the same time, promoting the development of yet a more deadly cruise, the stealth cruise, right here in our own country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps in the NDP, where there is no prospect ever of achieving power, you can try to have things both ways. But in the real world you cannot have things both ways. You cannot, on the one hand, say that we should act unilaterally and on the other hand say that we should negotiate reductions.

We believe that the way to proceed is by negotiating reductions. That is a policy that has led to the present situation, to the present decline in tensions and that has contributed significantly to that. We believe that kind of solidarity which has worked and brought us to this stage in world events should be continued and we intend to continue to do that, through open skies and through carrying out other obligations that we have undertaken.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Last Saturday, a derailment occurred in the municipality of Val d'Or, in the course of which an American tank car spilled 78,000 litres of gasoline on the ground. On January 4, 1990, the National Transportation Agency submitted a report on defects in U.S. tank cars. Will the Minister consider the recommendations of this report with respect to American tank cars that are a hazard to Canadians and the environment as soon as possible?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we did in fact receive the report to which the Hon. Member referred. Officials at the Department of Transport are now discussing its contents, and discussions are underway with the people responsible for the cars in the United States. Obviously, Canadian regulatory review will make it possible to tighten up regulations for both American and Canadian cars.

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right Hon. Prime Minister. As we move away from the cold war era and enter a new decade of East-West relations of collaboration and co-operation, Canadians are getting very excited about the opportunities that present themselves in areas of mutual interest, including the protection of our fragile Arctic.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister why, on the one hand, we are taking progressive steps such as hosting the open skies conference and yet, on the other, clinging to the past and indulging in regressive policies by allowing the continued testing of the cruise missile over Canada's north?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that question was just raised and answered and our view is quite clear about the question of the importance of maintaining an approach that has worked among western nations. There are a variety of other challenges that we now have to face, particularly challenges of helping the nations of eastern Europe, which have had the courage to make these dramatic reforms, to find the way in which those reforms can be made more permanent.

With respect to the north, there are obviously some possibilities that there can be progress made in terms of negotiations, alliance to alliance, with respect to developments in the north. We are prepared to look at those. Mr. Shevardnadze and I began the discussion of that kind of option. The Prime Minister did with Mr. Gorbachev in meetings in Moscow last year. Mr. Shevardnadze will be here again in February. I intend to carry on those discussions with him to see if there are some proposals that the Soviets want to put to us. We will consider them bilaterally but we will only, as we have made clear, negotiate them on an alliance to alliance basis.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The Secretary of State for External Affairs told the press last week that he will be undertaking a major foreign and defence policy review and that he will have a report to cabinet within about three weeks.

Will the minister make a commitment today to consult with Canadians through the parliamentary process during this review and allow Canadians to tell the government whether or not they approve continued cruise missile testing, or is the minister afraid that Canadians will tell his government that its foreign and defence policy is inconsistent, contradictory and hypocritical?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, two little matters of historic note; first, it was a Liberal government that brought in the cruise; second, for years and years and years the Liberal party refused to have any kind of public consultations on foreign policy. It was this government when we came to office that published a paper that was the basis of foreign policy discussions around the country.

Now, to be precise, what I indicated in comments last week was that because of the dramatic changes in eastern Europe I have instructed my officials, working with officials of other departments, to undertake a major review of our policy in Europe. I think that is urgent. I think that any prudent country taking a look at the dramatic changes that have occurred, particularly in eastern Europe in the last several weeks, would want to do that. That is what we are doing. I expect to be able to take the review to some of my cabinet colleagues in the next three to four weeks.

Certainly, I think it would then be useful for me to come before the standing committee of the House of Commons and discuss the results of that review with my colleagues in Parliament. If there are some constructive proposals, as often there are, from those kinds of parliamentary consultations, I would certainly welcome that.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade who is playing a key role in the Atlantic fishery.

A few minutes ago the Prime Minister said, "There is no crisis in Atlantic Canada." I want to ask the minister, if he does not agree with this statement what does he intend to do about it? Or, does he agree?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I just said—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Muzzle him.

Mr. Fulton: Watch that nose. It's going to grow.

Mr. Mulroney: Inasmuch as the House Leader seeks to distort what I have just said, it is incumbent upon me to deal with it.

I indicated that there is a crisis in the Atlantic fishery. It is deep seated and it is serious. It requires not catcalls and slogans, it requires mature co-operation between governments, both nationally and internationally. It requires an infusion of capital. It requires restructuring. It requires assistance from employment and immigration, from international trade, from external affairs and all of these measures are in train to deal with a genuine crisis in the Atlantic fishery.

What I indicated to my hon. friend is that he ought not to jump from a genuine crisis to besmirch other areas of activity in Atlantic Canada where there is growth and growing prosperity. As Premier McKenna said in New Brunswick, New Brunswick leads Canada in investment. There are jobs and prosperity in many important areas. Let's recognize that to make Atlantic Canada better and prosperous while at the same time dealing in a mature, thoughtful way with a genuine crisis in the fishery.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I think that I quoted the Prime Minister verbatim when he said, "There is no crisis in Atlantic Canada." I want to ask the Minister for International Trade again, does he agree with this statement and, if he does not, what does he intend to do about it?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I agree with every word, every syllable, every comma and every full point of the Prime Minister's last answer.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: Bye-bye, Johnny.

Mr. Crosbie: And the hon. member does not do Atlantic Canada any favours by trying to pretend that Atlantic Canada has no present and no future. It has a present and it has a future. It has a crisis in the fishing industry which we are going to help overcome. It has a bright future as well with Hibernia, with all its potential. The kind of remarks made by the hon. gentleman opposite are doing nothing to help Atlantic Canada.

TRADE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The Minister also knows that there is a crisis looming out in British Columbia. Zodiac Hurricane Marine, a manufacturer in Richmond, B.C., has been told by the U.S. Navy that it will no longer purchase Zodiac vessels built in Canada.

It is because of an unfair U.S. protectionist ruling that the company must now close down its operations in British Columbia and relocate to the United States. At least 100 Canadian jobs and millions of dollars to the Canadian economy are going to be lost if this company closes down.

I want to ask the Minister if he would agree with a statement that is right here in this document that he helped draft, the free trade agreement. Chapter 5 states that once goods have been imported into either country they will not become the object of discrimination. In light of that ruling in the free trade agreement will the Minister now launch an appeal for a ruling of the bilateral panel on trade, or through GATT, to turn back this unfair, protectionist measure that the U.S. Government has imposed upon this Canadian industry and save these Canadian jobs?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear that the hon. gentleman has a somewhat belated interest in this matter. It was brought to my attention by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans at least several weeks ago.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fulton: That's a big help.

• (1500)

Mr. Crosbie: You are not interested at all in having your colleague's question answered. You are just going to bellow, roar and bawl so that he does not receive any answer.

Two weeks ago the minister of fisheries brought this to my attention. We are pursuing the matter with the Americans to persuade them to change the interpretation they have now put on their domestic practices. The ambassador in Washington is apprised of it. We are doing everything we can to have this changed.

I hope that in Canada we will not do anything ourselves to deliberately flout the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement, such as adopting protectionist amendments like some other provinces that I could name have done.

I hope the hon. gentleman will do all he can to see the U.S.-Canada agreement is observed in Canada so that we have a good example for them down in the United States.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the minister that if this House had been sitting two weeks ago, you would have been given the question in plenty of time to respond.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the same minister that last year the U.S. Navy was awarded 274 contracts worth over $312 million in Canadian purchases, while in Canada we are prohibited from making a comparatively minor sale of Zodiac vessels to the United States.

The free trade agreement was supposed to open up U.S. government—

Mr. Speaker: Given the time, I would ask the hon. member to complete his question.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the minister that the free trade agreement was supposed to—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rosedale.

PARKS

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Earlier today the House unanimously approved the motion of the member for Scarborough Centre with respect to the Rouge River and its preservation of the valley as a natural resource.

In light of the earlier campaign by the World Wildlife Fund to preserve the endangered spaces of Canada, both provincially and federally, and the commitment of the minister with respect to 22 or 23 more spaces federally over the course of the next decade, could the minister indicate what action plans will be formulated both federally and in concert with the provinces to achieve this before the end of this century?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I strongly believe that our goal must be to complete the network of our parks by the year 2000. We still have 18 ecological regions to be represented in the existing network.

I have instructed my officials to work on a plan to include in the global action plan of the government a strategy to complete this network by the year 2000, with a clear commitment for the establishment of certain number of parks within the next five years.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TABLING OF STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to table the Standing Orders of the House of Commons dated December 1989 reflecting the changes adopted by the House on Wednesday, September 27 and Wednesday, December 20, 1989.

The complete edition, including an index, will be published in the forthcoming weeks.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I want to ask the government House leader if he can give us some idea of the business he intends to call for the coming week. I apologize for not giving him notice. I realize the question is ordinarily asked on Thursday, but I thought that since this is the first day we are back it might be helpful to members on all sides of the House if he has any additional information.

I repeat, I am not trying to put him on the spot. I recognize I have not given him any notice. If is there is anything he can tell us formally which could go on the record of the House, it might be helpful for all sides.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's question. Today the House will be dealing with Bill C-52, as we indicated to the offices of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party.

We intend to follow that up with Bill C-51, the Garnishment Act, which is also a finance bill.

I would expect that we will have our normal House leaders' meeting tomorrow at 3.15, shortly after Question Period at which time—and I will instruct my office to have contact with both of the other offices to see if we can get any preliminary discussions out of the way—we can discuss a reasonable timetable for the rest of the week.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to give notice of a Ways and Means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Income Tax Act and other statutes of Canada.

I ask that an Order of the Day be designated to debate the motion.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS AND REFERENCE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

TRANSPORT

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I gave notice to the Table of my intention to move concurrence in the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport presented to this House on November 8, 1989.

I move that the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport, presented to the House on November 8, 1989, be concurred in.

Normally or traditionally in situations where a member of this House is moving concurrence in a report of a standing committee, particularly one that has received support from all parties, one would work out in advance with both the government members of that committee and the official opposition members of that committee the scheduling of this kind of debate. I regret that I was not able to do that because today is the first day of the House coming back from its Christmas recess.

I felt, in consultation with my colleagues, that the events of this preceding week necessitated debate in this House on the very important matters considered by the Standing Committee on Transport.

As members will realize, the second report of the standing committee dealt with VIA Rail and the future of rail passenger service. The committee held hearings in the fall after the Minister of Transport announced to a press conference the decimation of about 51 per cent of the rail passenger system in this country.

The committee met with a number of organizations which had specific concerns about the impact of those cuts, gave consideration to the matter and issued a report which was tabled in this House on Wednesday, November 8.

The committee examined a number of the areas of concern and made some recommendations. One of the recommendations was that the cuts not be proceeded with, that there needed to be further study and further consideration by the government. Since the government had put in place a Royal Commission on Passenger Transportation, which was also to be charged with the matter, the committee felt that it did not make sense to proceed with the cuts and then the study.

That is the rough background to the committee's report. I am sure the question in members' minds is: Why today?

Given the outpouring of support for VIA Rail that we saw in the final three or four days of its cross-Canada elimination—and there were not just hundreds of people but thousands of people who came out to indicate their support, whether it was at rallies or as individuals just being there by the tracks as the last Canadian went through—we have a responsibility once again to express to the Government of Canada our desire, even at this point in time, to reverse the decision. It is entirely possible to do that.

Until such time as the tracks are removed—and I realize that as we speak that is happening not too far from this House—and until the equipment is sold there still is an opportunity to reverse the decision of the government and to put VIA Rail back on track, not just in half of the country but in all of the country.

As part of this process, and having been to those rallies in Guelph, Toronto and Thunder Bay, and having seen the thousands of people who came out to show their support, I felt that we had to continue the fight.

Earlier today I wrote to the Right Hon. Prime Minister and to the Minister of Transport. The letter reads as follows:

Dear Sirs:

On January 15, your government's cuts to VIA Rail went into effect.

The cuts were carried out through an Order in Council, circumventing any need for public hearings. When the federal Liberals used that procedure in 1981, your party and ours condemned them—quite rightly—for trampling on Canadians' right to be heard on a vital national matter.

Many Canadians have decided that, hearings or no hearings, they will speak out against the cuts. Rallies across the country attracted thousands; in my home of Thunder Bay alone, over one thousand people turned out to support VIA Rail.

Hundreds of thousands more have sent letters, cards and petitions to my office and those of my New Democrat colleagues. Eighty-nine per cent of Canadians want VIA's service maintained or expanded. The cuts are opposed by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, whose town and city governments speak for 17 million Canadians.

I urge you to consider the effects these cuts will have on remote communities, on seniors and young Canadians, and on the millions of people who cannot afford air fares. I urge you to consider the effects on entire cities that have lost VIA service.

And I urge you to consider this alternative: a moratorium on the cuts, at least until the Royal Commission on a National Passenger System for the 21st Century makes its report. Put VIA back on track now—and do not sell any rolling stock.

Such a moratorium would be consistent with the all-party report of the House of Commons Transport Committee, and would allow the Royal Commission to truly examine all options. It would provide badly needed public debate on the future of passenger transport.

You have described your desire to ignore the will of the vast number of Canadians as "courage". I respectfully suggest that you have confused courage with conceit. Real courage demands the admission your government may not have all the answers. And democracy demands that Canadians at least have their fair say in the changes that will deeply affect them.

I hope you will find that courage.

The letter is signed by myself as member of Parliament for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

The government would like to suggest that the outpouring of support for VIA Rail in the final days of its service across Canada, whether it was The Canadian or whether it was the regional services or the commuter services, was nothing more than romanticism, that people were shedding a tear for something that no longer mattered and they were sorry to see it go. That is not what I heard from them.

I heard students telling me about the impact it would have on their ability to keep in touch with their families. These are students attending university or college who would go home for Thanksgiving or Easter, in some cases for the weekend. They will no longer be able to do so because that cheap method of transport will no longer be available.

Seniors who for some reason cannot fly, who do not own their own vehicle and who really do not enjoy travel by bus are without the ability to travel now. Even by the government's own estimates there will be 125,000 people every year who will no longer travel because of the elimination of VIA Rail services.

If you take the price tag of an airplane ticket for a family of four from Thunder Bay to Toronto, you are talking in excess of $1,500 to $1,600. For them to go by train will take a little longer, but it is a lot saner kind of trip and it certainly has a lesser impact on their pocketbook.

Let us look, too, at who pays the price, which has been one of the arguments. The argument has been that there are only 7 million people who are using the trains and so many more are using planes. However, studies have shown that the vast majority of people who ride airlines either have their tickets paid for by somebody else—and I include members of Parliament in that group—or are businessmen who write off the total amount on their taxes, or are consultants who are being paid by their clients, or are civil servants. I am told that 80 per cent of airline travel is in that category. This leaves 20 per cent who pay their own way, who do not get a tax break. The exact opposite applies to rail. Some 80 per cent pay for their own tickets.

We can play the subsidy game, but I say that air is subsidized to as great an extent as rail has been subsidized. To say that one is more appropriate than the other is a false economy, to say the least.

There is also the environmental question. My colleague, the member for Skeena, our environmental critic, will address it in much more detail than I will, but I want to walk you through some of the aspects.

We had handed down in this House a week after the decision—a week after the Minister of Transport announced to the country that here were the cuts, here were the routes we are going to eliminate—a four-page preliminary environmental assessment. There are those of us who are suspicious of a document that is handed down a week after the decisions are announced. As I understand it, any proposal, any project done by the Government of Canada, is supposed to adhere to the EARP guidelines, the Environmental Assessment Review Process guidelines. It has to be tested; and the initiating department, in this case transport, was to take a look at it to see whether it felt there were any impacts on the environment.

They did do something. There is no question about that. We know that the final decisions on the routes to be saved and the routes to be cut were not made until the night before the order in council was passed, so there is no way under that kind of scenario that a proper testing could be done even on a preliminary basis. Then we found out that it was an economist and a transportation specialist who did the environmental assessment. It was not done by an environmental scientist. It was not even an environmental engineer. There was no contact with the Minister of the Environment who has officials who one would assume would understand the process.

They did not even do the proper environmental assessment, even though the Prime Minister in the election of 1988 said that every major economic decision made by his government would be tested for its impact on the environment. As members know, we did not stand idle when the government made the decision to cut VIA. Nor did we stand idle when we saw the four-page phoney environmental assessment.

We took action elsewhere in this city, action which resulted in a full day of hearings before the Federal Court. The government lawyers came in and said: "Hang on folks, the EARP process does not apply to the cabinet. They are above it. They are above the law."

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what decision made by the Government of Canada is not implemented through Order in Council? Then they said: "Transport was not the initiating department. It is the Minister of Finance who initiated it because it was a budget decision".

My colleague, the member for Regina—Lumsden, argued before committee time and time again: "What are we doing here? What are we doing having the Minister of Transport making fundamental decisions about the kind of transportation system that we have in this country," or, as we find out, that we do not have any more.

The government put forward that argument and said: "We are above the law". I would really like to hear from the government, to have it justify to this House and to the people of Canada why it believes that cabinet should be above the law, why cabinet should not have to adhere to an environmental test on decisions it makes. It would be very, very interesting to hear that response.

Canadians by the thousands have indicated their support. It was not a case of the media riding the train for the first time in 30 years. The people I talked to—and they were from age 5 to 85—have a keen sense of how important rail passenger travel is to this country. It is not a thing of the past. The equipment that we have been using is outdated.

Seven Ministers of Transport have recognized that, including some in this government, and have promised to replace the equipment and to do what other countries around the world have done, that is invest. But, no, they never followed through. One time it was an election promise. Another time is was an election commitment. Both parties failed to follow through on that.

Yet if they had given VIA Rail the kind of rolling stock that does not break down in 40 below weather in northern Ontario or northern Manitoba or in the rain in B.C., rolling stock that is attractive, that has increased capacity, we could have turned things around.

Compare VIA to Amtrak in the United States. They get a return of about 74 cents on the dollar, and they use new double-decker transcontinental rolling stock. They are even getting support from this government across the way in the form of export development loans to Bombardier—$100 million last year, $200 million this year—to supply rail passenger equipment to the United States.

Let me look at the comparison. Amtrak is at 74 cents on the dollar. What do we do in the corridor where we have a density and a potential utilization that is beyond a lot of the other parts of the country? We are already making 71 to 72 cents on the dollar there, and we are making it with junk. If we could increase the car capacity by 80 per cent with new head-end equipment, new marketing techniques, expanded schedules, I can guarantee that we would not even have to go to high-speed electric on the corridor to break even. We could do it with a good investment in some new equipment.

This is an important issue. It is one that people will not forget. The government thinks it will go away as the people stop seeing the trains. One of the Liberal members from Manitoba was on Newsworld with me back in November. He was a member in this House prior to 1984 and was defeated in 1984. He said the reason he was defeated was that people had long memories and they remembered what the Liberals did to rail passenger services in 1981-82.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that whether it is in Atlantic Canada, in western Canada, in southern Ontario, in northern Ontario, or on Vancouver Island—even though there they have a court decision that protects their railroad, and I give credit to those people who took it to court—people will remember. They will make sure that the next time around they will not be voting for anybody who cut their trains.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, this issue is certainly an issue that is important to the Canadian public. It is important to this House and to this government. In fact, this House has been seized with the issue a good deal of time in the last few months.

As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of questions in Question Period. There has been debate on the issue. Of course, the committee itself has put a great deal of work into looking at the question of rail passenger service within our country. Members of the committee looked at a number of issues, all of which are very important. They looked at the question of the environment, the question of services in remote areas of Canada, the question of a legislative mandate of VIA Rail, equipment and productivity. They looked at all of those questions that we believe are very significant and very important as they relate to passenger rail service in this country.

We as a government take that issue very seriously. That is why we have taken in this report that has been filed by members of the transport committee, a report that we know they put a lot of work into and a report that we as a government are treating seriously.

Under our particular rules this report will be responded to by the minister in question. In fact the Minister of Transport, under the rules, has an opportunity to respond up until April 29 of this year.

What we are faced with is an opportunity for the minister to look at the report, a report which was detailed, a report which brings up a number of issues and questions. He is looking at that and will respond to it.

I do not think it is necessary for us to take up the time of the House today since we have taken a great deal of time on the issue in the past. The report will be responded to. I can assure the House of that. Therefore, I move:

That this House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to the following division:

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Don Mazankowski (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-52, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of Bill C-52. The improvements in tax assistance for retirement saving that it provides are an important part of a major series of pension reforms that have been introduced in recent years. All are aimed at improving income security for Canadians in retirement.

The improvements in the tax assistance removes serious shortcomings in the present system, which penalize some taxpayers and give undue advantage to others. Canadians will find that the new measures improve their ability to plan their financial future and assure a reasonable level of income security in retirement.

Tax assistance for pension and retirement savings is based on a simple principle: within clear limits, income set aside for retirement should not be taxed when it is saved. It should be taxed only when it is received as a pension. By allowing taxpayers to defer tax on savings and on the growth of those savings in the years before retirement, the tax system provides a valuable incentive for Canadians to arrange for their financial security in later years.

New limits in the tax assistance system will give millions of Canadians a better opportunity to attain income security in their later years. The reform introduces a uniform limit on the proportion of earnings that are eligible for tax deduction when they are saved for retirement. This will give all working Canadians, regardless of their employment situations, equal access to tax assistance.

The system will become more flexible. For example, taxpayers will have up to seven years to make up their allowable contributions for any one year. New provisions will also guard against unintended or excessive use of the system particularly by higher income individuals. This will strengthen control of costs to the public treasury.

These improvements constitute another important step in the government's pension reform program, which has enjoyed support in its broad principles and provisions from most members of this House. It is a program that has moved forward steadily with the co-operation of the provincial governments in a process involving extensive consultations with business, labour groups, the pension industry and individual Canadians.

The importance of pension reform has become increasingly clear in recent years as the baby boom generation advances towards retirement age. In coming years, the proportion of retired people in our population will greatly increase.

Members will recall the main pension reforms already adopted to meet this challenge and deal with shortcomings in the pension system. These reforms include improvement of benefits under the Canada Pension Plan and the Spouses Allowances Program, changes in contribution rates to make the financing of the Canada Pension Plan secure, and important improvements and minimum benefit standards of private pension plans.

The tax assistance system is one of the three building blocks in our retirement income structure. The first block, which assures all senior citizens a minimum income, consists of an old age security pension and the associated guaranteed income supplement and spouses allowance. The second block, which guarantees a basic level of earnings replacement after retirement, is made up of the compulsory Canada and Quebec pensions plans, to which all employers, employees and the self-employed contribute. The third block consists of individual and employers' sponsored provisions for retirement income. Tax assistance for retirement saving helps Canadians increase their retirement income to the level needed to avoid disruption of living standards when they retire.

The basic way in which tax assistance works remains unchanged. Tax is deferred, both on the contribution to a registered plan and on investment income earned within the plan, until income is paid out on retirement.

These tax advantages are no small matter. Today, they cost the federal government $5 to $6 billion a year in foregone tax revenue; they cost the provinces an additional $3 billion. Canadians strongly approve of tax assistance, however, because nothing is more important to individual lives or to the social fabric than income security in retirement years. At the same time, Canadians want the system to do the job fairly and effectively.

The tax advantages provided to retirement saving should be designed to complement public pension programs by assisting Canadians to build the target level of pension income that will permit them to maintain adequate living standards after retirement. Since work-related expenses, income taxes, and saving requirements all usually decline at retirement, earnings need not be fully replaced. A pension of 60 per cent to 70 per cent of pre-retirement earnings is generally considered to be enough to avoid serious disruption of living standards.

The present system of limits on tax-assisted savings is not well structured to help Canadians build target pensions. It provides widely different savings limits for individuals in different employment situations; it provides few opportunities for individuals to make up for saving shortfalls in prior years; and it provides some taxpayers the ability to obtain excessive tax deferrals by using various tax planning techniques.

In short, the existing limits are both unfair and inflexible. The result is that they deny many Canadians reasonable opportunities to build a target pension while permitting others to enjoy excessive tax benefits.

Just to demonstrate how the proposed changes will introduce a fair system of limits in place of an unfair one, I must first explain one or two things about retirement savings plans and the existing limits that apply to them.

There are two basic types of plans. Most pension plan members belong to the defined benefit plans. These plans are subject to limits on the benefits they can provide, but no direct limit on their contributions which can vary from year to year depending on investment returns.

The other basic type of a plan is a money purchase plan which has a defined level of contributions, but no fixed level of benefits. Some pension plans, all deferred profit-sharing plans and all registered retirement savings plans, RRSPs, as we commonly refer to them, are money purchase type plans. These plans are subject to contribution limits.

One of the main problems with the existing tax assistance limits is that the contribution limits on money purchase plans do not correspond at all closely to the benefit limits on the defined benefit plans.

As an example, consider the limit of $7,500 on RRSP contributions for someone who has no pension plan at all. In terms of the pension that this level of contributions will buy, it is less than half as generous as the $60,000 limit on pension benefits under a defined benefit plan. Moreover, for anyone with earnings above about $40,000, a lifetime of contributions at this RRSP limit will not be sufficient to build the target pension.

Thus, the current limits place many Canadians at a serious disadvantage in savings for retirement. This includes many of those who are dependent on RRSPs, a group that includes the self-employed and employees without pension coverage.

For employees covered by money purchase plans, the situation is no better. For these plans, a limit of $7,000 applies to the total of employer and employee contributions including supplementary RRSP contributions. In contrast, a high income member of a defined benefit plan yielding a pension of up to $60,000 can supplement this pension by making annual RRSP contributions of up to $3,500. And, as I will elaborate in a moment, some taxpayers have been able to do considerably better than this.

A second key problem with the limits is that individuals with low levels of saving in employer-sponsored plans, whether they be money purchase or defined benefit type plans, often have little opportunity to compensate by saving more on their own behalf. Where an employer contributes only $500 to a money purchase plan, for example, the employees total contribution limit becomes $4,000 instead of $7,000.

The way to overcome these problems is obvious: put everyone on an equal footing. That is what the new system does by establishing uniform limits on tax assistance, whether pension saving is measured in terms of contributions or promised benefits and whether it takes place in one plan or more than one.

Over a career, the saving of 18 per cent of earnings a year should produce a pension equal to 2 per cent of earnings for each year of pensionable service. Over a full career of 30 to 35 years, that level of saving—free of taxation—will therefore build the target pension of 60 to 70 per cent of earnings. Accordingly, the new system limits retirement savings and tax assistance plans to this level, 18 per cent of earnings.

Just as important, the new system ensures that the 18 per cent limit is available to Canadians regardless of their employment situations or employer-sponsored pension arrangements. It does this by setting annual RRSP limits equal to 18 per cent of earnings minus the level of saving in employer-sponsored plans. In this way it permits taxpayers to use RRSP contributions to supplement pension savings up to that uniform limit of 18 per cent.

A fair system also requires consistent dollar limits on saving in different plans. To match the existing pension limit of $60,000 on defined benefit plans, this means a contribution limit of $15,500. Thus, it is proposed to raise the dollar contribution limits to this level to provide comparable tax assistance to those saving through different types of plans.

However, to limit tax assistance to high income earners, the contribution limit increases will be phased in over a transition period to 1995, and the maximum pension limit will be frozen during that period of time. As a result, the maximum earnings eligible for full tax assistance at the 18 per cent rate will fall from 3.5 to 1.5 times the average wage. Members may note that this change is very much in line with a recommendation made by the Parliamentary Task Force on Pension Reform in 1983. I might say at this point that most of the changes to the pension system came from the recommendations of that committee which was chaired by a friend of mine and former colleague, the Hon. Doug Frith, the then member for Sudbury, who spent a considerable amount of time on pension reform in the early 1980s. I think the House should recognize the contribution made by Doug Frith and his colleagues from all parties to the legislation that we are debating today in the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: Now he is in the private sector making money.

The phasing-in of the new contribution limits will start in 1991 and be completed by 1995. For money purchase plans, the maximum contribution will be increased to $12,500 in 1991 and by $1,000 a year thereafter until it reaches $15,500 in 1994. The RRSP contribution limit will be increased to $11,500 in 1991 and will also increase by $1,000 a year reaching $15,500 in 1995. Once this phase-in period is complete, the dollar limits will be adjusted by increases in the average industrial wage in the same manner as the maximum covered earnings level is adjusted under the Canada Pension Plan.

Another major shortcoming of the existing system is its inflexibility. Individuals cannot make up for missed saving opportunities. As we all know, it is not always possible to put aside a set proportion of earnings for retirement each year. Another element of inflexibility is the absence of opportunity for employees to make up for loss of benefits upon job termination, a serious shortcoming in our mobile society.

The first of these problems will be met by a new carry-forward provision. Taxpayers will be able to take advantage of unused deductions for up to seven years. This is very important for the small business person who may be starting out in business and does not have moneys that he can contribute to his RRSP in the early years of establishing his or her business. However, as they progress and the business becomes profitable, they may have extra funds to establish a retirement program for themselves and will have that carry forward from the years when the earnings were lean and they did not have that opportunity.

This would also apply to young families who are starting out and buying homes and perhaps devoting a lot of their money at the beginning to purchase the home and get established but in later years have some money to invest for retirement income. This carry-forward program is very important. It also applies to farmers who may have lean years and good years and will have that carry-forward program on the RRSPs. We believe that this is a major plus for the pension reform.

The second problem will be addressed by providing special additions to the RRSP limits of those who lose benefits on termination from a pension plan. The extra contribution opportunities will help them make up for such losses. If they had a pension plan that was very good in one company and went to another company where it was not as good, they can now make up the differences with the RRSP. This is a much fairer system.

I have already noted that we have proposed to restrict tax assistance to high-income earners by freezing the maximum pension limit until 1995. The reform of the contribution limits also eliminates a variety of opportunities that have permitted taxpayers to obtain excessive tax deferral advantages. Let me point out a few of these.

First, the codification of the maximum pension limits in the Income Tax Act will bring an end to a growing number of exceptions that have been made to the limits.

It is important to note that the purpose of the new rules is not to limit the pensions that employers can provide.

• (1630)

Rather, it is to limit the benefits that can be provided on a tax assisted basis. The limits will apply to all tax assisted plans in Canada. This means, for example, that modifications will be required to federal public sector pension plans, including plans for MPs and Senators to bring them in conformity with the tax assistance limits.

Second, the rules will eliminate opportunities to double up on the tax assistance limits. Under the existing rules individuals have been able to make additional contributions for years of past service even though full RRSP contributions have already been made or full pension benefits have already been credited in those years. The existing rules have permitted taxpayers to make excess contributions of hundreds of thousands of dollars in this way.

Third, an important part of the reform already implemented in 1988 eliminates opportunities for taxpayers to obtain full tax deferral benefits on saving outside RRSPs. This change addressed a weakness in the tax rules that permitted employees of non-taxable employers to contribute unlimited portions of salaries to plans that provided the same tax advantages as RRSPs.

Fourth, taxpayers with sufficient resources to enable them to defer receipt of their pension incomes have been able to generate pensions well above the pension limit by transferring pension income into an RRSP. For example, by rolling ten years of pension payments into an RRSP someone entitled to a maximum pension of $60,000 at age 60 could produce a pension of $120,000 at age 70.

All these loopholes chiefly favouring high-income taxpayers will be closed by the uniform limits and the codified rules that will be included in the Income Tax Act. The rules will require tighter accounting for pension contributions than in the past. Tax free transfers and rollovers that would effectively violate the new tax assistance limits will no longer be allowed. The proposed changes in tax assistance limits will be of particular benefit to the self-employed and to employees who are either outside employer sponsored plans or belong to plans with low-level benefits.

The changes will also benefit those whose plans cover only a part of their earnings or who have part-time jobs. Many Canadians, especially those starting out in employment or facing fluctuations in earnings for any reason, will find the seven-year carry-forward of unused RRSP contribution room a great advantage.

The federal revenue costs of the change in the RRSP limit is expected to be $300 million to $350 million a year. But this will be offset by gains from the removal of the excesses in the present system. The reform should not result in any net revenue costs for the federal or the provincial governments.

Employers will bear some additional costs for the accounting required to make the new system work. In view of the importance of retirement income security to Canadians and the significant revenue costs of tax assistance, the government believes that this burden is reasonable. Once the system is in operation the compliance costs will be only about one-sixth of one per cent of the total federal and provincial tax expenditures on assistance for retirement saving.

Since taxpayers will not improve their tax position by saving through one type of plan rather than another, their choice of plan will depend on questions of merit and suitability rather than the best way of minimizing taxes.

These changes crown a program of pension reform in which Canadians can take comfort and pride. They represent our Canadian belief both in sharing burdens for the common good and making sure that individuals have had the opportunity to look after themselves. The new system of limits on tax assistance for retirement saving is a step we must take so that Canadians can, with confidence, look forward to providing adequately for themselves in the years ahead.

I might say as I mentioned earlier that the committee in the House of Commons in 1983 made a report. Since then there has been a great deal of consultation on pension reform. This is a combination of that consultation. We believe that it is a very good bill. We believe that it is a thorough bill.

It is fair, it is flexible and we are hoping that we can get this bill to committee as expeditiously as possible. It is a technical bill, containing many, many pages. We are hoping that it will be examined in committee in great detail, so that we may assure ourselves in the House of Commons that we have done the right thing and that this pension reform will be in the long term of great benefit to all Canadians.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournement are as follows: The hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn (Mr. Fisher)—Public Service Alliance of Canada; the hon. member for Burin—St. George's (Mr. Simmons)—Fisheries; the hon. member for South West Nova (Mrs. Campbell)—Fisheries.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-52, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act and related Acts be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, we just want to take a few minutes to discuss this bill at this stage in the parliamentary process because, as is well known to the minister—and I listened to his presentation with a great deal of interest—this legislation is extremely complex. We believe it is imperative that we take all the time required in committee to hear representations from experts.

I understand and agree to some extent with the minister's comments that this is an attempt to put to rest some inequities in the existing system and to try to make it easier for some people to participate in this type of savings program. However, I am not sure that that is going to be the result. But I think we would be well advised to listen to those people who are going to be in a position in a very professional way to look at Bill C-52, all 100 pages of it.

There is an aging population in this country and many people are aware of the need to prepare themselves as adequately as they can for their old age. We know that these issues are becoming extremely complex when a piece of legislation such as this is brought forward and includes a guide. It is not a guide for applying the bill or describing the very technical nature of how best it can be applied, but a guide for ordinary Canadians. It is some 60 to 70 pages long. I think that demonstrates the complexity involved in the legislation.

I would suggest that we will all be looking forward to the opportunity to be provided to us in the finance committee of listening to people from various walks of life, such as accountants. I think it is fair to say in looking at the legislation that although the minister may be well founded in his optimism that this is simpler, I suspect that when you have legislation this complex that accountants will discover loopholes that will provide some opportunities for people to achieve what perhaps the government has been trying to prevent.

I suggest that since the legislation has been brought forward that there have already been some presentations made by people who suggest that there may be some problems with the legislation with respect to equity. But I prefer to take the time that is required to listen to what people who have vast experience in this field have to say.

It seems to me that there are basic questions that have to be addressed. For example, what will it cost? If there are savings for some segments of society, so that they can set money aside and it is protected in terms of tax impact, what is it going to cost Canadians in terms of tax loss, if in fact there will be any?

I am sure the government will have some statistics in addition to the short term figures which we recognize have been provided, but what happens after 1995? Is there any indication as to what it will cost? At the same time, who will benefit? Who will be able to take advantage of the changes that are being brought forward, and is that in the general public interest?

Obviously, there were inequities, there were people who were benefiting from the existing system. Will they be hurt? Are we bringing everybody up to a level or are we taking some people backwards? Are we making it more difficult for some and easier for others?

Obviously, there has been some talk that some people will be favoured, the self-employed and people who are not presently in pensions. The raising of the limits will provide some opportunities for people who have sufficient funds to be able to take advantage of those new limits.

I am concerned about whether the reform to the RRSPs is consistent with other reforms that are being proposed by the government. For example, let us look at the GST situation. There has been a great deal of concern about the lack of indexation for credits to low-income families. Once the indexing system with respect to the RRSPs is implemented, how does that fit into our system of fairness and equity as we try to reform a number of these elements of our financial support structure in this country?

The GST comes up even when we are talking about RRSPs. We are looking at some changes that will come into effect at the same time. What will the impact be of allowing people an opportunity to set more money aside, thus reducing their disposable income and consumer spending at the same time as we bring in the GST? Has the department of finance or the government looked at what kind of impact this could have on our economy in 1991? What I am suggesting is that we will look forward with a great deal of interest to a very open and thorough hearing about all of these aspects from people from across the country who will want to deal before committee with this legislation.

I am sure the minister understands that the committee will have to take a substantial amount of time in order to cope with the various elements that have been raised in this bill. There is a great deal of concern among public sector employees as to whether or not there is going to be some negative results for them as a result of this reform.

We in the Liberal Party are looking forward to an opportunity to listen to Canadians. We hope that people with the expertise will come forward. I especially hope that senior citizens and senior citizens groups and people in the public sector as well as the private sector will make certain that before we deal with this piece of legislation again that they will take the opportunity afforded to them to come before the committee to make their arguments.

I would heartily recommend to anyone who has any feelings about the impact of reform of the Registered Retirement Savings Plan legislation to make sure their MPs are aware of them. If people have specific questions, they should make sure they bring them before the House of Commons and are heard because those people coming before committee tend to have a very particular perspective. They are dealing with specific issues of importance to them and the rest of the Canadian public have to take care of themselves. We do have the time to deal with it adequately.

It is going to require a great deal of homework on the part of many people because accountants, financial consultants and financial advisers have had enormous difficulty with the existing legislation. Many people suggest that although there may be the resolution of some inequities with this legislation that, in fact, it is becoming more complex rather than more simple.

In closing, I would suggest very strongly and urge Canadians who are concerned about roll-over provisions and how they are going to respond to this new legislation, to get in touch with their Members of Parliament and write letters to them as soon as possible. They may have some special quirks or specific circumstances that they are aware of that we could overlook.

Hopefully, after the process in committee we will be able to come back to the House with some very specific recommendations. I would be very surprised if there are not a number of amendments to the legislation. I think it is a little early to discuss that yet because certainly my feeling is we should be listening to Canadians and providing them with an opportunity to be heard before the Standing Committee on Finance.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, in looking at Bill C-52 it is fairly apparent that this is a bill with which I personally have some difficulty in my experience as one who invests in Registered Retirements Savings Plans. It also causes concern when one considers it from the perspective of where we, as Canadians, should be going and looking to the future and making sure that all Canadians, as I believe this government has stated in some of its material, are looked after in their golden years.

In looking at the bill and analysing it and looking at the broader perspective, I cannot help but wonder whether this is the thrust that we should be taking. I wonder whether we should be concentrating a little more on the broader perspective.

I find it very interesting that the minister who is shepherding this bill through is the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs. If we look at the agenda that we have had before us over the last year in Parliament and as far back as 1984 with this particular government, the fact that this minister is the one shepherding this bill one can say it is a comment on where legislation is going. A lot of this can be tied into the privatization thrust and the government's broader agenda. I would like to come back to this later.

First, let us look at what has been happening over the last year. We look at the free trade agreement and some of the forces of harmonization that have already started occurring. I would suggest that this move toward the further privatization of pension funds is another step away from Canada Pension and Old Age Security. Canadians have looked on these plans with some favour for a good number of years, ever since the original Canada Pension Plan and since 1926 when the original Old Age Security came in.

Look at what happened in the past term with the unemployment insurance bill. Again, we see a move away from public sector into privatization and harmonization with the free trade agreement. We see the clawback bill, Bill C-28, that we just finished debating prior to Christmas. Once again, we see the start of that breakdown of universality, the move toward privatization.

Now we have a Registered Retirement Savings Plan bill that, on the surface, appears to be for those in the upper-income levels or upper middle-income levels. It appears to be a bill that is innocuous, and something that perhaps we need, but if we take in in the over-all plan it seems to fit in a mesh with that thrust toward privatization and harmonization that I predict we are going to see more and more in the coming session through the upcoming budget and into the next few years under this particular government.

Let us look for a minute at exactly what the bill is proposing. The government tells us that it is going to be a new system. When one looks at the the proposed legislation we can see that it is a complex bill, one difficult to understand even after reading some of the explanatory notes given to us by the government. My friend in the Liberal party who just spoke mentioned the loopholes. There is a reason why the tax lawyer's dog is called Loophole and that is because that is the job of tax lawyers. It is to look for exactly those types of loopholes that we, as Canadians, who can afford to pay for them, can use. The more complex the legislation, it seems to me that there are more and more loopholes that we will be able to use within the legislation.

The key element of the reform in this particular manner, of course, is changing the limits. Presently, it is $7,500 per year to scale up ultimately by 1995 to $15,500, while we lower the limit to 18 per cent from 20 per cent. Who, in fact, does that help? Dropping on the one hand the percentage and increasing on the other the maximum, we see that the maximum works out ultimately to somewhere in the area of $86,100 at 18 per cent. That makes up a very small percentage of Canadians which this bill will help.

Let me look at figures of those who has been using the registered retirement savings plans in the past. The government has admitted as much in some of the materials it has put out when it asks its own members in one of its documents whether this is a help to the rich and another slight to the poor. The answer, of course, as the government has recommended to its members is that, no, in fact, those who are less well off do not use registered retirement savings plans.

I think the figures bear that out. But the government has missed the point once again. Let us go through some of those figures. All are based on the number of tax filers contributing to the registered retirement savings plans. If we look at those between $10,000 and $15,000, we find that 11.2 per cent of those who file tax returns, in fact, contribute. If you go lower, $5,000 to $10,000, only 3.7 per cent actually contribute to registered retirement savings plans. In the $20,000 to $25,000 range, it is 26.6 per cent, with an average contribution of $2,060.

Then we see it start scaling up until we reach in the $50,000 plus range, 57.8 per cent of those tax filers purchase into registered retirement savings plans with their average contribution being $4,700. It is obvious that first of all, those with less income have to use that income to live on and do not have the ability to pay in toward a registered retirement savings plan, but they can and should be able to pay into a Canada pension and old age security.

Under this new plan in the first year, at $11,500, the minimum income required for that is $63,888. Now, very few of our people have that kind of money. It is interesting to note that the figures show that 5 per cent of the population have 20 per cent of all of the income. They derive 27 per cent of the benefit of tax deductible contributions to RRSPs. It seems to me there is an unfairness built into the registered retirement savings plan system. Something more has to be looked at. In our society it seems that through legislation and other measures like the proposed goods and service tax there is a greater split developing in Canada between two groups. We are having two groups; the split away from the middle income earners toward a rich society and a very poor society with few in the middle.

All of the legislation we have seen seems to go this way. The goods and services tax, for instance, has been proposed in order to get rid of the manufacturers' sales tax. As we go across Canada and hear submissions in the finance committee, we hear that the ones who are going to be hurt by this tax, because it is a regressive tax system, are those in the lower and middle-income areas.

Those who are going to benefit again are the large corporations and the wealthier in society. The argument is that the wealthy consume more and therefore they are going to be taxed more. The fact is that they spend much less percentage wise of their income on consumable goods and services than those with lesser incomes. That is the regressivity of this.

Everything, I would suggest, points to a total ignoring of those who are most in need. Should we not be looking at a system, through our systems that we have already set up, in Canada Pension and old age security, where we know regardless of our income levels that we can live above the poverty line in our golden years? Those are available to us now.

Through the amendments in the registered retirement savings plan we know now that it will cost the government $300 to $350 million in the first year for these extra tax breaks to the wealthy, because they are the ones who are going to benefit. Let us be honest about it, it is the wealthier person in the Canadian society who will benefit by these tax breaks. Might not we be better off using that $350 million in insuring an extra $30 to $60 per old age security earner to ensure that they have a little more comfort.

When you look at that $350 million that on the one hand is going out and you recognize the hypocrisy of this government, that on the one hand says: "Well, we are going to claw back from those with the higher incomes over $50,000 who get old age security, because they do not need it". On the flip side, we give them more tax breaks through registered retirement savings plans and we whittle away at our universality and our universal programs. Again, where is the fairness?

It is interesting in looking through the government's pension reform communications book for members and looking at some of the communications messages that they are telling the members to send out to note some of the key things of pension reform. The existing system is unfair and needs replacing. I agree totally. It is unfair and, yes, it needs replacing. But where do we look in this legislation? Well, obviously it is unfair to those with the most money. And it needs replacing because the people in power who have the money want it replaced. They want a bigger benefit.

Well, I suggest that we are looking in the wrong place for that fairness and the wrong direction in the replacement. I have given an idea that perhaps we should be increasing our Canada pension, our old age security, so that we do not have the need as we do now, of a guaranteed income supplement.

Let us go on with these communications messages. The new rules will ensure fairer, more flexible and more cost effective tax assistance. Again, fairness. Where is the fairness for those in need? Yes, there is flexibility again for those with the money.

Is it cost effective tax assistance? It certainly fits in with the agenda of this government toward privatization and getting away from universality of our social programs like old age security and the Canada Pension Plan, but again it does not help those who need the help.

We do not need to make the rich richer, but it would be nice to be able to help those who need the help. We see further that the new rules will enable more Canadians to achieve income security in retirement, thus helping to meet the challenge of an ageing population. Once again, who does it help? The people in the lower income brackets cannot afford to pay into these plans to get the tax benefits. When they reach 65 years of age and retire, they are doomed to poverty.

We have less than 25 per cent of their income now covered through the Canada Pension Plan, et cetera. Would it not be nice to be able to look forward to knowing that you would get 50 per cent of your income replaced through a Canada pension system, to know that you would be living above the poverty line instead of in abject poverty?

Further, the government goes on to say that the new rules complement measures the government has taken to strengthen Canada's retirement income system. We have seen how strong our retirement income system is as far as the old age security goes. The strength simply is not there.

We have started now by kicking the door open to the total disintegration of universality in our old age security system. Are we starting an attack now on the Canada Pension Plan? I hope not, but I wonder, is this part of the Conservative agenda for the future of Canada? To encourage us to invest in our golden years is one thing, but to cause us to live in poverty for the majority of us is totally another.

I go on in this brief and it becomes the pattern that I was talking about. The puzzle, the key pieces all start fitting together. We turn to the next page and we see the existing system is flawed and in need of reform. Where have we heard that before? I seem to remember, since the last budget, hearing about this flawed system. It is a pattern of this government to try to convince us, the average Canadian, that what we have and have had in the past is flawed and then to start just destroying it.

Yes, many of our systems are flawed but they need to be strengthened. They need to be renovated. They need to be built up. They need to be improved. They do not need to have the very foundations that hold the structure eroded. That is what is happening with this government in many of the pieces of legislation that it is bringing forward.

We talk about some of the various systems that we have. We know that they are not going to be in existence for long if this government remains in power. The start was with the clawback. The original start was in 1985 with the original attempt to deindex pensions. We know what happened there. The government backed off because of major pressures.

I am not saying that we should not have a registered retirement savings plan. What I am saying is that plan should in fact be as the government says, a fair and flexible plan but not a fair and flexible plan for those in the $80,000 and $87,000 brackets. It should be a fair and flexible plan for everybody with the opportunity to live as you age in dignity, to have the opportunity to know that you are going to put three meals a day on your table when you are a senior, to have the opportunity to look forward to some degree of comfort in your declining years. That is not what we are seeing here.

Some of the provisions of this bill are reasonable provisions but they also are flawed. An example of this is the seven-year carry over. It is a provision that in some cases makes sense if we heard what the minister of privatization said in his speech. It gives the opportunity, if you have had added expenses one year and cannot afford it, to carry it forward. It makes sense to be able to do that and appears to be a little fairness.

There is also a twist to that that we have to be careful of. It can lead to abuses again by those most able to afford to fluctuate where they invest their money.

Let us look again at some of the other things this bill offers. It offers, I would suggest, a problem to some of the small and medium sized businesses which presently have pension plans for their employees. Because of the nature and the complexity of this, it has been predicted that some of these people will leave their present plans in droves because they can no longer fit within these and will simply collapse them and go to a group RRSP as opposed to some other method of deferred profit sharing or registered pension plans.

There is proposed a problem in terms of matrimonial breakdown. I have dealt in the past with matrimonial problems in my professional capacity. I know that one thing some people who separate have to deal with is the division of assets and pension plans. One proposal that could cause some problem is the one under subclause 146(16) to prohibit the transfer of retirement income under an RRSP unless it was amended before 1990 to provide for the transfer.

Those in wedded bliss at the present time might not necessarily recognize that there is a potential problem for them in the future and that in three to five years after 1990 there may be some need to look at where we are going. We have closed that door, so I am simply flagging that a bit to show that there are problems within the bill.

If we are going to keep the registered retirement savings plan bill I would suggest that the levels be lowered to make it fairer and easier for middle income and lower income Canadians to invest. We should be looking at a tax credit system instead of at a tax deduction system as we have now.

Who does that benefit? That tax credit system will benefit the poor or lower income earners, but it is not a desirable thing for those with upper incomes because in a tax deduction system they get a lot more benefit for each $1,000 amount they invest in a registered retirement savings plan.

In 1983 the parliamentary task force on pension reform recommended the conversion of deductions to credits. It noted in that report a most important fact, that the tax benefit is worth more to those with higher incomes, which means that its effectiveness in encouraging people to save for retirement is strongest in the upper income groups and much weaker in lower and middle income groups.

We do not believe that government need concern itself with the adequacy of replacement incomes for those in the upper income groups. We believe that substituting a tax credit for the current tax deduction would serve to retarget tax incentives toward those in the lower middle income range, thereby providing the means to meet one of our major concerns regarding coverage.

It also appears that the Canadian Labour Congress, the National Council of Welfare, the Canadian Council on Social Development and the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women strongly support conversion of RRSP tax deductions to tax credits. I suggest that is something which should perhaps be looked at.

When this bill was originally brought by the government before Parliament back in 1986, it was in essence in the same form that it has been brought in this time. In an editorial on October 16, 1986 in The Toronto Star it is interesting to note that it was said that if the Minister of Finance had $300 million to spend, he would do better by putting that amount in the guaranteed income supplement which tops up old age pensions for the needy. An injection of $300 million into that program would enable the government to pay an additional $30 a month to more than 600,000 elderly single women who have no source of income and who are now living below the poverty line.

Another point is that the Minister of Finance calls this proposed tax break a key element in the government's plan for comprehensive pension reform, but in enriching tax deductions for the wealthy he mocks the government's stated commitment to provide more for those in greatest need and at the same time has pre-empted his promise of meaningful tax reform.

I think those comments made in October, 1986 are very true. Today, in 1990, things have not changed. We still have problems within the system and there still are ways of getting around some of these problems.

I look further at the bill and I wonder to whom can we look? Who needs to be helped in this pension reform? I have talked about the needy, the poor, the middle income earners, but what I have not spoken about is women. I think it is very important to note that over the last few years there has been a continued feminization of poverty, that more and more of our population of women are falling further and further behind.

Again, when I speak of poverty and we think of a broad spectrum, in fact what I am speaking about to a great extent are women and children. With the agenda that we have seen before us over the last few years those people sink further and further into desperation.

It is interesting to note that in 1986 women made up 56.1 per cent of all low income Canadians, compared to 57.3 per cent in 1981, emphasizing what I have just said: the feminization of poverty.

It is also interesting to note that only 16.5 per cent of female taxpayers or approximately 1.3 million women contributed to RRSPs in 1987, compared to 24.1 per cent of male tax filers or approximately 2.1 million. So there is a two to one ratio in this situation. This figure actually inflates the number of females who contributed to RRSPs because it is based on women who actually filed tax returns.

Women represented 39 per cent of the total number of RRSP contributors in 1987, contributing 32.8 per cent of the value, while men made up 61 per cent of contributors and held 67.2 per cent of the value of all RRSPs.

We know that women continue to earn considerably less than men. I think the figures show somewhere in the area of two-thirds of what a man makes and they cannot afford, in many cases, the luxury of contributing to a registered retirement savings plan.

Where is the fairness for women? It is a problem. I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the government that that problem could be partially solved by more fairness in the Canada Pension Plan and the old age security.

In a political context, let us look back at what has happened in the old age security bill, the clawback bill that I have referred to. I have also referred to the hypocrisy of the clawback.

A representative of the Canadian Council on Social Development said that we are starting to replace a progressive and visible benefits system with hidden subsidies that are in fact regressive. For example, we may eliminate the OAS, the old age security benefits, among higher income people but for the generation who will be seniors when this measure has its full impact, we are more than replacing them by increasing the limits on RRSP deductions and by putting in place a capital gains exemption. These kinds of measures provide high levels of subsidy, higher than the cut in old age security to high income people.

Once again I emphasize that we are not looking at solving the over-all problem. This government is reacting to political pressures of those who brought them here. It obviously goes by the adage: "You dance with the one what brung ya". That is what is happening. The government is dancing to the tune played by those wealthy Canadians and wealthy corporations on an agenda that is bound to increase the problems within Canada as far as income levels go. As I said, the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. That is what we are bound to if we continue down the path we have started with this government.

I cannot see that we have accomplished anything by helping those with higher incomes live beyond the wildest dreams of those with lower income levels in their retirement. That is what we are looking at in this particular bill. We are assisting those people with high incomes to continue to live in a style and in a manner that could not even be touched by most Canadians. That 5 per cent or less of Canadians seem to be controlling what is happening in Canada.

In conclusion, I simply say as a member of the New Democratic Party that I can see the value of registered retirement savings plans in the over-all scheme of things. I fully believe that we should be looking at what was fought for in 1926 with the old age security and the later Canada Pension Plan debates. We should be looking at a system that is fair for all Canadians, not just the Canadians who can afford to purchase that fairness. I believe that the government should look at that when it talks about fairness, flexibility and expansion of systems.

As this bill sits before this House I cannot support the it.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill which is being called part of a pension reform package. I think the New Democratic Party has an honourable tradition in Canada of being the party that was probably the most instrumental in ensuring that pension schemes for the elderly were brought in. I would like to refer to one of the most distinguished people who worked for Canadians, who was talking about his hopes for the Canadian pension system.

What I like most of all about the Canadian pension plan, about the two-stage plan which we are now deploying for Canadians in their years of retirement, is that we are trying to reach a position where we are providing pensions that are adequate. I do not suggest that the levels which will be achieved by combining the Canada Pension Plan at its best with old age security at its present level are really the last words in adequacy. At least we are talking about pensions of quite a different order than that which seemed to be accepted a few years or decades ago.

I hope that having accepted the principle that retirement security should be based on adequacy we would go on to improve that basis and find ways and means of raising the level of our pensions so that all Canadians can look forward to retirement in decency and dignity. Of course this was the Hon. Stanley Knowles who was speaking in 1964.

I think that his hopes for adequate universal pensions have not been fulfilled and this bill is nothing but a travesty when compared to what was intended. This bill has nothing to do at all with providing adequate pensions for ordinary Canadians. This bill is designed solely to help the rich. I think it is interesting that it is not only supported by the Conservatives, but it also is basically the same types of proposals the Liberals proposed in 1983.

As most of you are aware I am a social worker by background. I work with people on the lower end of the income scale. Canada has a large number of elderly even today in spite of our pension plans who are living in poverty, particularly women. This is going to escalate dramatically in the next two, three or four years for two reasons: first, the cost of housing has become intolerable in Canada, particularly for people on fixed incomes. The elderly on minimum pensions, old age security, GIS and minimum company pensions simply cannot afford the housing costs that are now developing in Canada. They are also going to be hit with the new GST.

This bill is not about designing a universal, guaranteed level of income for all seniors. Let us look at what it does. What it means is that by 1995 people who earn $86,000 will get a tax benefit of $15,000 and, in reality, a cash payment of $7,500. Right now—and it is not progressive—at the same time it is being increased for people on high incomes it is being decreased for people on low incomes because of dropping the percentage.

Let us take a look at what happens as you change from the 20 per cent to the 18 per cent by various income brackets. Right now if persons on a minimal income of $20,000 could afford it—and not many of them can—they could contribute $4,000 into an RRSP. In 1995 when it is 18 per cent, they will no longer even be able to contribute that amount. They will only be able to contribute $3,600. At the same time persons earning $86,000 today can contribute only $7,500. In 1995 they will be able to contribute $15,000.

What are we talking about here? We are talking about diminishing the opportunity for saving for retirement years for those on low incomes while at the same time increasing it dramatically for those on higher income. In 1995, with this tax system a person earning $20,000 will get a tax-back credit of $1,200. But the person with an income of $86,000 is going to get back $7,500. What kind of a country is this that gives the wealthy $7,500 and the poor $1,200? Obviously, it is Conservative country.

It is not now equal if you contribute to RRSPs. If you are in the highest tax bracket, for every $1,000 you contribute you get $450 back. If you are in the lowest tax bracket, if you can afford to contribute, you get $264 back. Who can afford to contribute? We keep talking as if this is going to help, in some mystical way, the person who is on a middle or low income. That is absolutely nonsensical because people on middle and low incomes do not have the cash to put away.

Right now only 20 per cent of all Canadians are using RRSPs. We have here a bill that is talking about a tax benefit for 20 per cent of the people, but really it is not 20 per cent of the people because only 5 per cent of people earning under $15,000 use RRSPs, but 57 per cent of people earning over $50,000 use RRSPs. What we really have is a bill aimed at helping people who are earning over $50,000. If that is the best way the Conservatives feel they can provide adequate pension programs I am utterly stunned.

This is a bill that favours men. Women are the group that face poverty in this country the most. In my work I have seen women who are financially unable to maintain themselves in the community by paying rents and are desperately trying to get into care facilities because their food and shelter will be paid for there. They cannot afford to rent an apartment in Vancouver or Toronto.

They cannot afford to buy food so they desperately try to get into a care facility.

It is a most pathetic thing to see a woman who could maintain her independence in the community, who could have a quality of life, being forced to humiliate herself by trying to get into an institution because it will look after her.

We have to remember that it is women who earn minimal wages in Canada. In 1967 women earned only 46 per cent of what men earned. It 1986 it had gone up to 57 per cent. That is an improvement. The women are not the $86,000 wage earners, they are the $15,000 wage earners, so they are automatically put at a disadvantage with this type of system. They are not going to be the beneficiaries of this.

I think we have to look at alternatives. My colleague has already mentioned one. The government is going to blow another $350 million on this to help those rich, $86,000 people have a nice holiday in Dominican Republic or Jamaica or Florida or wherever they go. Why not use that $350 million and add it to the Guaranteed Income Supplement? Let us give those 600,000 women in Canada, who now have no other income other than Old Age Security and GIS, $30 a month more. Do you not think that they deserve the $30 more than the person who has an $86,000 income deserves another vacation in Hawaii?

This bill is also about the privatization of Canada's pension system. Increasingly companies are abandoning company pension plans. There has been a reduction from 1984 when coverage in the labour force by company pension plans was 39.9 per cent. That is a bloody low percentage as it is, but by 1987 that had been reduced to 36 per cent.

Part of the reason is the costs. It has been estimated that there is going to be a $60 million to $70 million initial start-up cost for employers in initiating this bill. According to the vice-president of the Canadian Life and Health Association, small businesses are fleeing pension plans in droves. They can afford a pension plan, but in the new pension environment why would they put up with the hassles of a pension plan when the federal government has offered a perfectly viable, less demanding alternative; group RRSPs. The new tax rules with the pension adjustments and pension adjustment reversals seem likely to be another administrative nightmare which will squeeze more pension plans out of the system.

It is not accidental. I think there is an intent to privatize the pension system, and part of it is that RRSPs are a big source of investment capital. Really what the Conservatives want to do is give the wealthy a tax break, a tax loophole where they can accumulate investment capital, whether that is investment capital that is lent to corporations or whether it is RRSP self-administered investment capital. It is simply a system through which the Tory government, with the passive support of the Liberals, is saying that it is okay if the wealthy increase their wealth.

Let us look at a few of the alternatives. We have $350 million extra to spend with this. It has been estimated that this year alone RRSPs will cost $10.8 billion of government money in lost taxes. Remember, most of that is going to people earning over $50,000, it is not going to the people earning minimal wages.

Let us do two or three things in the area of pensions; let us look at changing the rules and let us make it a tax credit system so that if the wealthy contribute $1,000 and the poor person contributes $1,000, they both get the same tax relief, they get the same tax money back in their hand. Why shouldn't the poor be allowed to accumulate more money? In fact, I would even go so far as to suggest that what we really should do is reverse it. In 1995, if the person who earns $86,000 makes a contribution they should get a tax benefit of $4,000 and the poor person should get a tax break of the $7,500. Let us reverse it. Let us reverse it. Instead, make it that the poor or the minimal income earner is given money back rather than the wealthy. That is the first thing. Let us at least make it a tax credit system. If not a tax credit system, let us be bold enough to go even further and make the benefits to the low and middle income person more.

Second, let's increase our Canada Pension Plan. This is the universal program that is designed to ensure adequate universal pensions for all Canadians. It is only because the rich do not want it that we do not have it. We could be doubling and tripling our Canada pension plans. It would certainly make some of the big life insurance companies a little uneasy because they would not have all these private pension plans floating around.

Let us also look at programs that allow people who are not in the conventional labour market to contribute to pensions, including the Canada Pension Plan. There have been discussions about making it possible for women who have chosen to stay home to be part of our pension plan system on a systematic basis, something which they cannot now do.

I see that the Speaker is indicating that my time is up. I would therefore like to sum up by saying that I cannot support this legislation. I think it is a piece of legislation that the Tories have concocted to pay off their wealthy friends handsomely. It is not pension reform. It has nothing to do with guaranteeing adequate levels of income so that people may live in dignity when they retire.

We have to go back to the words of Stanley Knowles and bring in a true pension reform program.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I was listening to the hon. member's speech and I wondered if he was speaking on the same bill as is before the House. I must say that I see all sorts of areas here where loopholes have been closed in this tax reform. He mentions it benefiting the rich. It seems to me that the tax assistance to high income people will be curtailed by this bill. I wonder if perhaps the member could point out to me where he sees that benefit to the rich. It seems to me it is quite the other way around.

I look at the area of assistance for young families who now, when buying a new home, would not have an opportunity to make the maximum contribution to their pension plan because all of their cash is going into the purchase of a home or savings for a home. Today that opportunity is lost. With this tax reform such a young family, or a young woman going out on her own, or a separated family that needs that extra cash, rather than losing that opportunity to put money into a pension, they have a seven-year carry forward which gives them that opportunity. That is only one aspect as I read through this bill.

It seems to me that many loopholes for high income earners have in fact been closed. This new tax reform in this pension bill makes it much fairer for all Canadians right across the board.

I enjoyed the nostalgia trip back to 1964 with Stanley Knowles, but I wonder if the member might want to talk about this bill in 1990.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, not only would I like to talk about in 1990, I would like to talk about it in 1995 and all the years in between. Does the hon. member really believe that he can hoodwink the Canadian public by saying that we are going to give a $1,000 tax credit to people earning under $20,000 and a $7,000 tax credit to people earning over $86,000? That is money back. That is the same as the government taking it out of its pocket and sending them a cheque. That is what this bill is all about. That is what this bill is all about. It makes it possible for the wealthy to avoid paying their fair share of taxes.

The member talks about the young couple buying a house. This government has made it impossible for young families in this country to buy housing. The high interest rate policy that it has continued to carry on means that families who are earning even $30,000 and $40,000 cannot afford to buy a home. The government did away with the RHOSP which at least enabled people to save a little money for a downpayment.

The member stands up and talks about these people who are buying a house. If they are buying a house in this country they probably are earning over $50,000 or $86,000. They are not the single parent on a wage of $18,000 a year. What do single women in this country earn? They do not earn $86,000. They are the ones who are working at the $5 and $6 an hour jobs. That is not going to get them into the tax brackets that this piece of legislation is intended to benefit.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Surrey North for his comments with respect to this legislation and for putting it in the context of our approach to the whole question of tax reform in this country. As the hon. member has noted, the 20 per cent of Canadian families with the highest incomes ended up with 41.8 per cent of the total income pie and the 20 per cent of families with the lowest incomes got less than 5 per cent.

What this legislation would do, of course, is make that even worse. An individual who earns $20,000 a year would get an annual tax break of about $1,200 but someone who is making more than $86,000 a year would get an annual tax break of $7,500 a year. So this is regressive tax reform.

I must say that I am disappointed in the Liberal Party. It is not surprising, I suppose, that they are standing with the Conservative party on this legislation since, of course, it is very similar to legislation that they tabled in 1984. We had hoped that perhaps on this policy, as on so many other policies, we might have seen a change of heart by the Liberal party.

We remember that it was the Liberal party, for example, that was responsible for the testing of cruise missiles in Canada. Somewhere along the way they changed their position on that. I had hoped that perhaps on the question of tax reform they might have had a change of heart as well. But no, they still remain the captives of the corporate elite in this country. I challenge the Liberal members in this House to stand up and defend tax reform which gives more to a person making $86,000 a year than it does to a person who is living below the poverty line. Is that really Tory and Liberal tax reform?

I want to ask my colleague from Surrey North if he might just elaborate on the whole question of equity in the tax system. In fact, we are talking about $350 million of income that we are forgoing. There are merchant seamen who served this country with distinction during World War II who have been denied a fair pension plan. The Speaker is aware of this as are members in this House. If we have $350 million to deal with a fairer taxation system, why do we not finally start treating our merchant seamen with some dignity and some respect? Why do we not start treating our railway pensioners with some dignity and some respect and bring in a much fairer system of pensions for railway workers?

I commend the member for Surrey North for bringing to the attention of the House, and through the House all Canadians, the silence of the Liberal party with respect to this tax reform and their complicity with the Conservative party. Also, I would ask the hon. member if he would elaborate on his views with respect to equity in the pension system in this country and on what he might do, and what we as New Democrats would do for a fairer pension system that would benefit those who are struggling below the poverty line today.

Mr. Karpoff: The question of equity is a major one. The vehicle we should be looking to is not tax loopholes through RRSPs but the whole issue of the adequacy of our two basic pension programs; the Canada Pension Plan and Old Age Security. What we should be doing is increasing those, not bringing in such nonsense things as clawbacks. We should be increasing the universal portion and broadening the base on which Canadians can contribute to the Canada Pension Plan, increasing the benefits under the Canada Pension Plan for employees and employers to contribute. We have to find mechanisms by which people who are not in the conventional workforce are able to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan.

Equity is a major issue which is developing in this country, not only in terms of adequacy of pensions, but in terms of taxation. Repeatedly we see the government bring in programs that reverse the equity of taxation.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate and I want to comment on the remarks of the member from Burnaby. Some people are very short-sighted in this world. Short-sightedness seems to come in different things. Often people listen to others before they comment on what they have said or what they are going to say. It would do the member for Burnaby good to listen rather than to speak about what the Liberal policy or position is.

When I look at Bill C-52 I find that there are many areas of it that raise concerns among my colleagues. When I look at goals of pension reform plans I have to think about what the object is. When we look at pension reform we have to look at a program that would bring dignity and comfort to those in their senior years in any country and any civilization. That really has to be the ultimate of where we are heading with this reform or any pension reform.

The government has the challenge to provide legislation which will be fair, which will provide an equitable situation for all Canadians and which will treat all Canadians equally. I believe that to be a very important part of the challenge the government must put forth in legislation.

The pension plan today needs reform. There is no question that there are many difficulties that many senior citizens are experiencing. The National Council on Welfare has stated that 600,000 senior citizens today in Canada live below the poverty line. Many senior citizens live many thousands of dollars below the poverty line. We not only have 600,000 below the poverty line, we also have senior citizens who are as much as $3,000 and $4,000 below.

They are experiencing difficulty today because of inflation. We have gone through many years of high inflation. We have experienced all kinds of inputs from government expenses and from business sector profits, all of which have created a larger need for dollars to be spent in our society. Many of our seniors are definitely having their incomes eroded through inflation. Therefore, the legislation presented should give comfort and dignity to seniors and should meet the needs of our senior citizens fairly and equally.

I believe that Bill C-52 does not meet those needs. I do agree with some of the speakers who have said that the bill seems to give benefits to the rich. It does not address the problems that the low and middle-income people are experiencing and it does not address the needs of many future situations that we will find in Canada.

Approximately 40 per cent of our workforce are not able to receive money from registered pension plans. Certainly we have the Canada Pension Plan, we have support programs, but in reality those programs do not give our seniors enough to live well on after retirement. Certainly the need for other support programs is there and we must look at that very carefully through any legislation that we bring forward.

We also know that 40 years from today the number of people over 65 will have doubled from today's figures. Because people are living longer today and because we have gone through the baby boom and the baby boomers will be retiring, we are going to have a much larger population of seniors and we are going to have a proportionately much lower number in the workforce. The result is that there is going to be a tremendous stress for dollars some place along the line to make sure that there are programs in place to support all of those who will be retiring today and in the future. If we do not come up with proper planning and proper programs today, then I think the future does not look good for low and possibly middle-income Canadians.

Bill C-52, a bill for pension reform, leaves open, I think, three questions that one must answer; what is being proposed in the bill, who benefits from the bill, and does that bill meet all the needs of our Canadian people.

On close scrutiny I think the bill is to raise certain amounts of money that are set aside through contributions by people in today's workforce and going through 1995. Today's limit of $7,500 will increase so that people in the specified income brackets will be able to contribute $15,500 to pension plans by 1995 or, the other restriction that is on that, 18 per cent of their income, whichever figure is less. My mathematics seems to be correct. As many others have pointed out this afternoon, if you can put $15,500 into that fund, and if it is put in on the basis that it is 18 per cent of your income, the upper limits of the program are allowing people with $86,000 a year incomes or more to contribute to the fund at full tax rebate when they put the money in.

It is clear then that it is people who are making $50,000, $60,000, $70,000, $80,000 who are getting the large benefit of the $300 million to $350 million that the government is setting aside because of the tax losses it will have when the program is instituted. We are not only talking about people with $60,000, $70,000 and $80,000 incomes. If they have those kinds of incomes they must also have 18 per cent of that income to put into a pension fund, which means that they really need to have an excess of many thousands of dollars that is not spending money that they put out each and every day.

It was questioned a little earlier whether a young couple starting out will be able to put money into those funds as the limits go up to $15,000. I think about a young couple working in Toronto. With the types of mortgages they have to acquire and the expenses they have to pay, I cannot see that young couple having $15,000 or $16,000 to put into an extra fund in a few years.

I also have to point out that not only is it a problem for young couples living in Toronto, but any young couple with today's living expenses would have to make a tremendous income to have one-fifth of its income set aside to go into a plan.

I look at average Canadians as their children get older and start to school. School expenses and other expenses having to do with having a family are again going to stop the average Canadian from participating in this major benefit.

It is not a benefit for the average Canadian. It is a benefit for those with very high incomes who are not spending it all. They have extra dollars.

With respect to the seven-year forwarding of the plan, a person right at the maximum of that seven-year forwarding is making $86,000. He could, over a seven-year period, be in a position of being able to have $100,000 in one year dropped into a pension fund and avoid taxes on that completely.

People with huge business deals who are getting tremendous profits from certain investments, and having all of this money coming in at one time are able to dodge the taxes on it. I think that is a major loophole. I think it is a loophole in this proposed legislation which is not going to be shared by the average Canadian. It is only going to be shared by the very wealthy.

The people at the other end of that scale, the low-income Canadian, is restricted to 18 per cent through Bill C-52. Today, he can invest 20 per cent. The fellow who really worked hard and got all the RRSP investment that he could will be cut back by $500 at the low level. He will be cut back 2 per cent and not be able to invest the same dollars as he could have the year before.

What we are seeing is a program that will aside more for the wealthy, more tax gains for the wealthy, but lower tax benefits for the less privileged, those with lower incomes.

Indexing is another point that has been brought forward. We have heard enough about indexing. We heard about indexing with the GST. According to the government it was not fair to totally index or fully index tax credits. It was not fair to fully index the tax thresholds. Thus the lower-income people get only partial indexing for the benefits they are going to receive.

However, on the other hand, the benefits that the very rich will receive in this particular bill are going to be fully indexed. It really is a mistake to give full benefits, full indexation to the very rich from 1996 on, while the poor will only receive partial indexing in the other programs.

We hear about the clawback system. There is a clawback because when somebody gets up to such and such a level we are going to take back some of the benefits that we are giving in old age security and family allowance. Why are we clawing this back if we have those extra dollars that we can fully index when very well off people get tremendous tax benefits out of this legislation? Why is it that the government treats low and middle-income families in a much different way than it seems to treat upper-income families and yet at the same time claim the treatment is fair? I have a major problem with that.

Talking about tax brackets, if one makes a very high income and is in a high tax bracket, each tax dollar that one contributes to a fund will in fact bring higher returns than if you are in a low tax bracket. The difference has been spoken of again today several times. I believe it should well be reiterated.

For every $1,000 a person in a high tax bracket puts into this program he will receive a tax benefit of $450. However, for every $1,000 the low-income people put into it, they will only receive $264. There is a real disparity here of close to $200 per contribution.

I think if we are going to be very fair we should consider one of the strong proposals that did come forward in 1984. It was that we have a tax credit system. Through that credit system we would make certain that all of those benefits would be averaged evenly. So when the low, middle or upper-income person puts dollars into an RRSP they would get the same benefit back. I believe that equal treatment for all Canadians is extremely important and very fair to our system.

We talk about costs. The government estimates from $300 million to $350 million. I have heard some estimates as high as $500 million for this program. Certainly, the experts will be able to give us the background and information on that.

But it is still a problem. In the last six months we have heard about our deficit and our debt. We have been told that we are going $300 billion or $350 billion in debt. We have been told we have to cut back. We have been told that we cannot fully index programs because of the extra costs. At the same time, we are going to fully index tax benefits which I see would go the wealthy. We are going to put out $350 million to help very well-off Canadians with their tax supports.

At the same time I would also point out that our government in the last year has come up with 31 tax increases. The GST is on top of that.

Why penalize low and middle-income people, lower their benefits from what they could put in now at 20 per cent to 18 per cent and at the same time increase the amount of money that well-off Canadians can put in?

Another point that I think is reasonably important as I look through the legislation is that it really does not take into account many of the people in our population today who have part-time jobs who are coming into a social situation where the dynamics of jobs is changing. More and more people are on part-time incomes. I think that is a reality within our whole structure. I believe that any pension legislation should address those particular types of questions.

We have a workforce that is very mobile. Workers move from one area to another. They work in different locations. Why did we not address portability of pension plans from one employer to another to another?

We have a new terminology that has come into the legislation called "pension adjustment". That pension adjustment will be either calculated by Revenue Canada, which tells people how much they will be able to put into the plan, or it will be calculated by the employer. It will be given to the employees or the workforce at the end of the year when they are paying into these plans. But the problem is if you run into a difficulty or a dispute about how much you can put into a program you are certainly going to be in a very difficult situation. I say that because I do not know of Revenue Canada ever holding up any time and letting people file later. You will be into a situation where you have a pension adjustment that you do not even know about when you start into the year that you are paying the taxes.

The correlation of times when we are putting the GST into place while at the same time bringing this into place will drain many dollars from our economy. It is going to create more of an impact. It will pull our economy down more, slowing it down. Everybody in this country is really concerned about the slow down in the economy presently.

I have heard too from the minister that our goal is pension income between 60 per cent to 70 per cent for the average Canadian. If we stop and look at the figures, we realize that many low-income Canadians do not have that extra cash to participate in RRSPs. If they do not have that extra spending power to become involved and do not work where pensions are offered, then we encounter another dilemma.

We have the dilemma that the only pension benefits they will be entitled to in the future in many cases is what they get from the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan and from the supplementary benefits. Not having other pension plans they will be the ones who are stressed in the future. They do not have the capital to buy into programs today.

Again, I do not think that we are dealing with the really crucial issue that is facing our pension system, and that is the dilemma faced by low and middle-income families who do not have that extra dollar.

To illustrate that point further, in 1986 we talked about people with $15,000 incomes, only 5 per cent of whom could contribute to RRSP programs. However, at the same time in the same year those with $45,000 incomes 61 per cent could contribute.

I will run that by hon. members again. Only 5 per cent of people with $15,000 incomes could contribute. Out of those with $45,000 and above incomes, 61 per cent of the people contributed. That is a real disparity in ability to pay and to buy into plans. We know that exists from the dollar and cent discrepancies and free cash that people have to spend.

I would like to wrap up my thoughts with a couple of points that were brought out by the government.

The current RRSP contributions as stated by the government are somewhat unfair. But our government continues to treat people equally unfairly. It seems to me that the policy here is more a policy not to help the poor and those who need extra support on retirement but to help the more wealthy.

People need fair treatment. I believe it is very important in our society and that should be the goal of pension reform. I do not believe that this bill brings that fairness to bear. I do not believe that this bill really deals with the major problem, that is, those with low and middle-incomes and their retirement years.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the comments of the hon. member for Essex—Kent. They were certainly a little different than what we were led to believe was the position of the Liberal party.

My first question to him would be this. Were his remarks representative of the Liberal party and in fact will the Liberal party be opposing this legislation?

One has to keep in mind that the government claims, and it appears now to be correct, that many of the proposals in this legislation originated from the pension reform proposals of Mr. Marc Lalonde, the last Liberal minister of finance.

If the hon. member's comments are indeed representative of the Liberal party, then the Liberal party has changed somewhat in its position vis-à-vis pension reform.

My second question to him is this. While he very eloquently exhibited the unfairness of the system in terms of tax benefits, that because it is a tax deduction rather than a tax credit, those with higher incomes will of course receive much greater tax benefit from their pension contributions than those in the lower-income brackets who are paying a lower rate. I did not hear him talk about the importance of a universal pension program.

We know that with the Conservative agenda, part of the privatization agenda is also the privatization of the pension fields. Our speakers and our position has always been that we need a public pension system that provides an adequate pension for every man and woman in this country when they retire. I would really be interested in hearing the position of the Liberal party on that. Can we hear from them a reaffirmation of the importance of a public pension system, rather than relying on the trickery of the new right agenda?

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I do appreciate standing and being able to answer the questions that have been brought forward.

My comments were very much directed toward inadequacies that I see in the legislation. The Liberal party, being the open party and the straightforward party it is has very clearly decided as well that we would like, as Mr. Young said, experts to come in and look at these very specific points that are being brought up. We would like to examine all of that legislation very carefully.

Without question, it is so important that we state the viewpoints, the concerns we have, and then be willing to listen to the experts and their comments with regard to those problems.

So my viewpoint very clearly is the viewpoint of the Liberal party, and the Liberal party wishes to have those issues brought forth to the Canadian public. But I think it is also in part a responsibility of any opposition party to point out where they feel there are weaknesses and concerns, and let those concerns be heard.

I feel that, yes, I am very consistent with the viewpoints I have and my colleagues have with regard to this legislation.

Second, you bring us back to 1984, and ask that we visualize things in 1990 the way they were in 1984. When we talk about the disparities that I see here, I realize that my colleague, Mr. Lalonde, brought forward legislation that would bring the levels of taxation contributions up to $15,500. As well, that was good in 1984. However, in 1984, we were not facing a $350 billion debt. We were not facing huge government cuts. We were not facing the policies that we are facing today. As a result, I would say that you cannot compare oranges to oranges over time. Things do change. I believe that in this particular case things have changed.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, certainly the opportunity of asking questions gives one the ability to get more revealing statements on the record. Of course, what is unfair today, certainly was not fair back then. To be sure, I really do not believe what the hon. member is saying about back in 1984. He said that the country could afford unfairnesses more then than it can now. That is what the member is saying.

The member, in essence, in his remarks stated the unfairness in the proposed changes. He stated the unfairness in having a tax deduction rather than a tax credit system that allows those in the higher income groups to benefit more than those in the lower income groups. Of course, those who pay no tax at all are not going to benefit at all. They are not going to get any tax benefits out of these proposals.

His remarks were very much to that point. Unfortunately, I also find that he was unable to clearly tell the House that his remarks really represented the Liberal party and that the Liberal party will be voting against this motion and against this bill when it comes up.

We are certainly watching with great interest to see how the Liberal party will vote when it comes time to do so. When everything has been said and done and all their rhetoric has been given, it is how we vote that really indicates where we stand on this issue.

The other point I want to make is that the hon. member did not respond to my third question. It was with respect to his position on the need for a universal public pension system as the basis of the pension system in this country, as opposed to the privatization of the pension system. If he would care to, I would certainly like to hear his comments on that topic as well.

Mr. Pickard: I really appreciate standing up and answering the member from Regina, Mr. Speaker. I found it fairly significant that the member stumbled over this tongue several times as he was talking about fairness and unfairness. Maybe part of what he was saying was not quite accurate.

If you recall the legislation and look carefully at it you will see that a tax credit system was suggested in 1984. That was a clear point that I brought forth today and that you said was not. That was the 1984 position.

As we look at the programs, we see that there are times when things look very prosperous from one perspective. However, what I pointed out were very clearly examples of direct unfairness in the program. I feel they are there. I am not saying the legislation in 1984 was perfect, but it was not the same legislation that is being brought forth today.

I do not know that you can ask me to comment on the 1984 legislation and today's legislation and compare the two. That is not the point that we have here. The point is what is fair, and I mentioned the tax credit system in my words. 1984 brought that forward. I see no inconsistencies in what is being said today.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in this House and make my first speech of this decade. In this context I just want to explain the political context in which I am doing that. This bill, Bill C-52, which amends certain provisions of the Income Tax Act governing tax assistance for retirement savings, sounds quite innocuous. But we must look at it in the whole political context.

For instance, in December, on the last sitting day of the House, we saw the clawback of old age pensions. We saw the clawback of family allowance. This suddenly takes on a more sinister appearance. That is what I want to address my comments to this evening. I think all of us in this House have to look at the long view of where this government is going. What may seem to be somewhat innocuous on first reading is in fact a very complex bill. So you have to be very firm minded even to attempt to read through the bill. That it is the political context.

I think it is quite stomach-churning to think of the hypocrisy of clawing back old age security, a measure which we passed in this House on December 22 in the name of deficit reduction while increasing tax deductible contributions to RRSPs. This will be done at a cost of $300 million to $350 million of taxpayers' dollars. It is clear the hypocrisy is quite enormous. It confirms the view of the clawback as a device to eliminate universality and not simply as a mechanism to reduce the deficit.

This bill cannot be seen in isolation. It is all part of the plan. As my colleague for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt pointed out, the minister who is shepherding this bill through the House is not the finance minister. Nor is he the Minister of National Revenue. No, he is the minister responsible for privatization. That kind of gives you a little clue as to the intent of this bill.

What we in the New Democratic Party are doing, and I think increasingly so, is demonstrating that we are the real opposition. Not only are we opposed to this government's legislation, which is our duty as an opposition party, but we also have the alternatives. I think that that is clear on this first day in this new decade. We are on our feet in the House demonstrating again that not only can we oppose this government, we can propose alternatives.

The alternatives proposed are not new. They are ones that are consistent with our principles. Unlike the Liberal party, we do have principles by which we live. That is how we distinguish it. The Liberal party has a very interesting persona. It is a chameleon-like persona. When members of that party are on this side of the House they become very progressive. They take on our hues because of their proximity to us. However, I think this bill demonstrates, because of its similarity to the Liberal bill which was introduced in 1984, the same intent. That is to say, it makes sure that the big spenders and the big income earners get protection so that they can save money and not contribute to the tax system. It is the lower and the middle-income people who pay the burden of the taxes in this country. There is no justice in that.

We in the New Democratic Party are firm in our principles that we are opposed to that kind of tax reform.

Mr. Milliken: They don't buy RRSPs in that party.

Ms. Hunter: I can hear that the Liberals are getting a little antsy because we really do have the alternatives. All they have is the rhetoric. As my colleague for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt has just pointed out, it was the same with the GST.

I want to talk about our alternatives because we have some. It is that pension coverage provided by RRSPs is offered by the universal, fully indexed and fully portable Canada and Quebec pension plans. The money being spent on the changes in Bill C-52 would be much better directed toward a significant expansion of the public pension system, thereby ensuring that those low and middle income people do have security in their old age.

That is what this is supposed to be about. That is what those of us on this side of the House—at least at this end of the House—believe the tax system should do. The tax system is a means of redistributing wealth so that those people who have the most can contribute the most to the welfare of us all.

Bill C-52 certainly does not do that. It protects those people. It shelters their money so that they do not have to pay their fair share of the tax burden.

I think we also have to understand the kind of paranoic concern that has been generated by the government on deficit reduction. The minister responsible for privatization stood in the House today and gave his reasons why this is such a good idea and why we should all go along with this. We should consider that $350 million is not going into the tax system because of this measure.

Why is this government using the bureaucracy of government to protect those income earners in the $60,000, $70,000, $80,000 or $90,0000 a year bracket? Why are we using the mechanism of government to protect people who can look after themselves very well? If they believe in the free market system, then let them look after themselves. Let the tax system provide benefits for those who have more difficulty in looking after themselves.

It is somewhat curious that when we are talking about deficit reduction and how we have to be really hard nosed about government spending, that they are using tax dollars to shelter the wealth of those high income earners. I say tax dollars because it is the government bureaucracy that must do this.

We need a fully public pension system that does protect people. Bill C-52 does absolutely nothing to eliminate poverty among our seniors. What we are really about is providing good government. It should be good government, minimal government, so that it is not protecting those people who can protect themselves very well. It is protecting minimal government so that we are talking about not encouraging people to get involved in government. I am talking like a Conservative. I am just pointing out the hypocrisy of this bill.

I would be very interested in hearing the responses of government members' to my criticisms. I am hoping that they will be up on their feet and asking me questions afterwards. They seem to want to do it now rather than later.

• (1830)

I want to point out what has been pointed out by other members. This Bill does increase the polarization between the rich and the poor. This is going back to the political context in which I started my address this evening. It fits in. This is what the government is doing. It is increasing that polarization so that that shrinking middle class is going to be under attack more and more. The middle class are either going to have to find some means of getting into the higher income bracket so they can be protected by this government or, more likely, they are going to sink into the lower income brackets. It is happening with the GST and this bill is absolutely consistent with that.

We have to ask ourselves as politicians why there is that sinking element of public trust in what we are doing here when you see this kind of hyprocrisy that we are faced with on the first day of this sitting of the House of Commons in this new decade. It makes me quite angry.

When I came here as a Member of Parliament I had very high ideals about the kind of work we were here for. I still have those ideals, but I have a growing sense of cynicism about the intent of many others in this House.

I want to close off my comments on the subject of how this bill relates to women. At its annual general meeting in May, 1988, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women endorsed a resolution to support, upon divorce or separation, the mandatory and automatic equalization of all pension credits and RRSPs between spouses for their years of cohabitation. I am going to refer to my colleagues at this end of this side of the House consistently. I think we have to do that because the liberals in their chameleon-like pose are trying to move over, if not literally, at least philosophically when it is convenient for them to do so.

The continuing feminization of poverty is something that has to be addressed. This bill does nothing. How many women do any of us know who make $86,000 a year? I challenge members to name or even to think in your consciousness how many women you know who make $86,000 a year. It would be an interesting statistic for someone to look and and see how many women do earn that. In, contrast, I can think of many women who earn $15,500, which is the amount which would be sheltered if this bill is passed. I think members could think of many who earn that much or less.

It is good for the public to know, whenever a bill comes before the House, just who benefits and who loses. It is very clear from this bill who is going to benefit. It is also very clear who is going to lose. Those people who are already over-taxed are going to have to pay in order that those in the very high income brackets can shelter their money. It is almost disgusting what this government is about with this bill. But it has a beautiful unity with everything else it has achieved since it was elected. It does have a consistency and it is something that I know that we at this end of this side of the House will be opposing with all our might in the months to come in this decade.

In conclusion, I hope that the Liberals in their chameleon-like stance will oppose this bill.

As an aside, I also want to talk about listening to the experts to whom the Liberal member from Essex—Kent referred. The experts are not those people who are going to be appearing before the committee. The experts are those people who are trying to live on $15,000 a year, the amount that would be sheltered if this bill comes into force.

I encourage that committee to bring in those people to talk to committee members so that they can really understand what real reform of the tax system is about.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask my hon. friend a question. I agree with the designation of the Liberal party as a chameleon-like entity, but the hon. member's argument was somewhat ostrich-like in the sense that she was putting her head in the sand on three absolutely essential elements of any pension regime for any country.

Let me just ask her this so I can make sure that I understand her policy. Is she saying that under no circumstance should we have tax assistance for pensions in this country? That is my first question. If she is saying that, is she then denying the inflationary effects that this would cause, because as you know tax assisted pension planning is deflationary in a major sense and if you tried to do it without some tax assistance you have a major inflationary push in the country?

Third, if I understand her correctly, is she saying that all pensions should be provided through the public purse for Canadians under a certain level of income? Is that her position?

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to see that a member of the government is in the House and is willing to ask questions. I think that the questions which have been posed to me are somewhat mischievous in nature. I think he knows very well what I was intending to say.

Of course we believe in tax assisted pensions. But as I pointed out at the very beginning of my address, the real intent of the tax system and the pension system is to assist people in their old age. The tax system is a means of redistributing wealth.

Excuse my naivete, but I thought it was to redistribute the richer income to the lower income. I did not think it was the reverse. That is what this bill will do. Those people who cannot afford it, who do not have the kind of capital that they can shelter, who do not have the means to be able to shelter their money are the ones who are going to have to be paying to make up the gap. The sum of $15,500 will be lost to the taxpayers. Where is that going to come from? It is going to come from the lower and middle-income people in Canada.

Of course the Liberal government and Conservative government have made it very clear throughout, consistent once again—I do have to admire that they are consistent—

Mr. Milliken: More than you can say for the NDP.

Ms. Hunter: There seems to be a lot of raucous comment back here, Mr. Speaker. Obviously we are a little fractious on our first day back in the House. You will have to forgive us.

There has to be a good pension scheme. We have a universal pension scheme, thanks to the New Democratic Party and its urgings over the years, but we also now have a big problem with poverty among seniors. As I pointed out, this bill does absolutely nothing to address that. I would like to remind the minister that if we are talking about the role of government in society and what that should be, it should be to help those who can least help themselves, rather than helping those who are doing quite all right already.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments? The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a question or comment.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I was amused to hear the hon. member's speech because I know the New Democratic Party's penchants for pensions. It is not long ago that Mr. Stanley Knowles who sits at the table in this House was on his feet daily asking about pensions. Here we have the New Democratic Party taking this new view about pensions. After all, the purpose of registered retirement savings plans is to encourage people to provide for their retirement, to provide pensions for themselves. Mr. Knowles was always in favour of increased pensions for everybody. He wanted everybody to have more money on retirement. The purpose of this bill is to ensure that people save money so that they have generous pensions at the time they retire. Here we have the New Democratic Party apparently opposed to this scheme, and it is a pension scheme. This very much surprises me.

Mr. de Jong: Are you in favour of it?

Mr. Milliken: I am trying to talk about logical consistency here, because we heard that we were inconsistent in some way. We are consistent throughout. It was the New Democrats that were inconsistent and I want to go back to that.

The other thing is the New Democratic Party spokesman who was just speaking said that the $7,500 limit apparently was satisfactory, it was the increase of the limit that was causing offence.

Ms. Hunter: I can't recall saying that.

Mr. Milliken: Well, if one is going to be logical in dealing with the pension issue, if these tax deductions are the problem, if that is the difficulty, why are we allowing these deductions at all? If it is all to be in a public pension that is to be paid out of taxes, then let us say so.

Here we have:"Well, this bill is bad because it increases these limits", and yet leaving things as they are apparently is all right. No, she did not say that. I agree, she did not say it, but it was implicit in the criticisms of the bill.

If the whole idea of RRSPs is bad, let us say so. I do not think it is a bad thing. I think it is a good thing. I am sure that the former leader of the New Democratic Party who is gone and has taken a very nice job where he earns a substantial salary is pleased at the idea of an RRSP. I am sure he would find it most attractive. He is not yet at the age where he cannot contribute and he might find it a bonanza. If the members of his party are going to be consistent they have to be ever so careful about criticizing the notion of registered retirement savings plans. I invite the hon. member, perhaps, to address the issue of what her former leader is now doing.

Ms. Hunter: My former leader is also very consistent. He is continuing his work in human rights and democracy development in the world. He is also very firm in his desire for real reform of the tax system so that his income will be taxed to the greatest extent so that he can contribute to real tax reform. I would say that does distinguish him from other former leaders from both the Conservative and Liberal sides of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Willowdale.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker and colleagues, let us have no illusion about what this bill is about. It is a tax bill to help the rich.

This bill means if you have an income of over $86,000 a year you will be able to deduct from your income in any one year $15,500. That is a saving to you as a taxpayer of about $7,000 to $8,000, depending on the tax bracket you are in.

Now, does this bill benefit the poor? Mr. Speaker, patently it does not. A person who is earning $25,000 a year today can deduct up to 20 per cent of their income or $5,000. They do not get a big tax saving. It is not 50 per cent because they are not in a 50 per cent bracket. Under this bill their deduction would be cut back to $4,500. They would be able to contribute less on a tax-free basis or a tax deductible basis to their pension plans than they can today. That is one way in which the rich are benefiting immensely and the poor are being cut back by this particular bill.

If people such as those to my left in the NDP look on this bill as a panacea to pension reform, or if any member of this House believes that this bill is an attempt at pension reform, lest any Canadian think that this is an attempt at pension reform, this bill does not meet any of the criteria set out by Mr. Douglas Frith in a 1983 task force report on pension reform. It does nothing for portability of pensions. It contributes very little to the indexing of pensions. It does nothing about the 93 per cent of the private sector pension plans which do not have indexing provisions. It does nothing about homemakers' pensions.

We know there are many Canadians who have to stay at home either to look after a spouse, a child who is under 18, or a relative who is disabled or ill. There is nothing in this bill which allows contributions toward a pension plan for that person who has to stay home to look after these relatives or family members.

What is so anomalous in this bill is the government's attitude toward retirement income for Canada's seniors. We know that one-sixth of Canadians live below the poverty level. The first biggest group living in poverty is children and the second biggest is single senior citizens.

How do we go about encouraging Canadians to provide for their own retirement during their working productive years, if they have sufficient incomes to set aside any money for savings at all? In other words, they are above the level of the working poor. How do we encourage these Canadians through the private sector system of pensions to set aside enough money so that they can provide for their own retirement without depending on the public purse?

Let me tell you what this government is proposing with this bill. If, for four years consecutively, persons earning the $86,000 put aside the $15,500 at a 10 per cent interest rate, which is fair today, and did nothing more with that money, in 30 years they would have $1 million to retire on. If instead of doing it for four years they did it for eight years, that person would be able to retire and have the income from $1 million worth of capital in about 25 years' time. For such persons to become millionaires, it does not even require that they put away for more than four or eight years, and one can take the combinations down from there.

That is fine for the rich. What is it doing for middle and low income families? It is not helping them. It is working against them. What is also anomalous is if you do save during your working productive years, if you do have enough money to put aside for your retirement, if you scrimp and save and do not take vacations or buy luxuries, if you do not consume your income but you put it away and save, you are frugal, parsimonious or prudent, this government is saying to you the moment your income hits $50,000 this year or about $35,000 in the year 2000, it is going to take away your pension under the old age security. It is going to take away your entitlement. In other words, this government is saying: "Don't bother saving, spend it now, because if you save, we'll get it back from you".

This is in addition to the fact that in terms of hitting the poor, we have seen a consistency on the other side of the House. We have seen cut-backs in unemployment insurance, cut-backs in the time that a person is entitled to payment for UI, an increase in the time that they have to work in order to become eligible. We have seen them taking some $2 billion of government contributions out of unemployment insurance and imposing this burden on the backs of the workers and of the small business employers.

We have seen a government that does not fully index its own provisions in the Income Tax Act. We know that it has not fully indexed the clawback provisions for senior citizens who are receiving the Old Age Security. The goods and services tax credit that they are proposing is not even fully indexed. As that tax applies, we all know that inflation will deteriorate year after year the position of the poorest Canadians.

They have not fully indexed the refundable child tax credit. Again, in conception, a good tax measure designed to help the families who need it most. Again, it is being eroded by inflation because this government does not have the compassion or humanity to fully index it.

Yes, let us be very clear. This program will help the rich and the almost rich to achieve self-sufficiency in retirement if they do not squander their money. As indicated, in only 25 to 30 years, a person having taken advantage of the maximum contributions, be it for four or eight years, can have $1 million in capital and live off the income. It is doing nothing for Canadians at the lower end of the totem pole, for the working poor, for those in poverty, and for those who do not have the money to put away.

When you are in a lower than 50 per cent tax bracket and you put money away for your retirement, as frugal, prudent Canadians will do, the government does not contribute 50 per cent through tax savings for the poor. It might contribute 20 per cent, 25 per cent or 30 per cent. It is only when you are in the upper class tax brackets, the rich tax brackets, that the government is contributing a full 50 per cent.

I wish, in retrospect, the government had considered in this time when we must be prudent with taxpayers' money the real needs of Canadians who are retiring. The real needs lie not so much with the rich and the well-to-do, they lie with those living in poverty. That is where their priorities should have lain, in fully indexing pensions, in making pensions available to homemakers, in providing for rollovers, so that pensions can be transferable. This is the question of portability. Even more so, addressing the retirement needs of our seniors who are living in poverty or the people tomorrow who will be our seniors living in abject poverty if this government continues.

I would like to make one more point, Mr. Speaker. This government is fond of saying that they have no money for any public purposes in Canada. This is the government that is prepared to see Lumonics sold to the Japanese and to see Connaught sold to the French government. This is the government that is cutting back on research and development, that is cutting off grants to our best doctoral and post-doctoral students in the sciences. It is cutting back money to the NRC. This is a government that has even cut back tax advantages to small Canadian corporations that might want to undertake research and development. They do not have the money, they said, to help a key company like Connaught stay Canadian. They are happy to see it go into the hands of the French government.

We have in Canada over $25 billion in registered retirement savings plans and pension contributions, all of which have been partially paid for at the expense of the taxpayers. Surely some of these funds could be put to valuable public work. Surely some of these funds could be invested in Canada's technological and economic future. Surely, because these funds are tax paid, we could insist that just a small portion of them every year, maybe 1 per cent or 2 per cent, be directed to help struggling Canadian companies, threshold firms, become world players. These are some of the things that we should be thinking of.

In conclusion, let me say that this bill does deal with the real problem of poverty in retirement. This bill helps the rich. It helps the almost rich, but it does not address the true retirement needs of Canadians.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Willowdale is well known for his erudition on matters relating to pensions and the speech we have just listened to is an excellent example of his fine presentation and clear thinking. I know he has listened patiently to some of the speeches made this afternoon, particularly by members of the New Democratic Party who seem to get very confused on the issue. Has the member done any studies on the various attitudes of the New Democratic Party toward this kind of bill?

Mr. Peterson: The member for Kingston and the Islands touches a sore spot. I have undertaken hours and hours of diligent research in the libraries, in dusty tomes,, I have sought for their rationale, I have sought for their wisdom and 'ere I searched all day, it was as if I had searched all day for two grains of wheat hidden in two barrels of chaff, and 'ere I found them, it was not worth the search.

Mr. Gauthier: I would like to join with my colleagues in the House in congratulating my friend from Toronto for making this very great contribution to this debate. I just want to follow up on the question put by the member from Kingston.

I was here and I heard the great presentations put forth by our socialist friends concerning RRSPs. I am just wondering if, in his search for the truth, the member from Toronto has found out if members of the New Democratic Party have given up on RRSPs and that they are all going to cash them in and turn them over to the charities of their choice so that we are sure that indeed their principles are that they will not save any money for their retirement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On that note, we will call it seven o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, my purpose for being on the late show today comes out of a question I had asked in the House on November 24.

The question was directed to the President of the Treasury Board who happened not to be in the House that day. It was answered by the Minister of Finance who assured me that some time during the following week the President of the Treasury Board would get back to me with an answer to my question.

The substance of my question was: When would the government, particularly the Treasury Board and the good offices of the President of the Treasury Board, be used to bring fairness to the ongoing negotiations with respect to hospital services people, members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada and civil servants of the Government of Canada on the question of parity between workers on the east coast and those on the west coast as it affected ships' crews so that on both sides of this great country of ours they would be able to get the same wages for doing the same work? I asked whether or not the Treasury Board would use its offices to expedite the proceedings, get on with the bargaining, get the striking ships' crews back to work and try to make sure that the hospital services people were negotiated with fairly as well.

The President of the Treasury Board did not get back to me the next week and he did not respond in any way to the employees either. I guess the answer that came back was: "No, he was not willing to use his offices to try to prevent any further strife within the Public Service and to alleviate the problems which had arisen with respect to the hospital services workers". The hospital services workers went on strike, and I would suggest they were probably forced to strike because of the inactivity of the Treasury Board and the President of the Treasury Board in exercising his responsibility.

I would like to point out that prior to November 24 and my questions in the House I had written a letter to the President of the Treasury Board with copies to the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of National Defence because these different departments were involved. In that letter I pointed out that I had four major concerns. The first one was that of designation. What we were dealing with in this case were employees of the Public Service of Canada, members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, union members who from the time they were able to belong to unions had been prevented from going on strike on the basis that the government—not just the Progressive Conservative government but its predecessor Liberal government as well—had designated them as essential services.

That may strike some people as being not all that bad, but when one considers that in the case of these two groups of people as many as 110 per cent of their total numbers were designated as essential, one gets some kind of an idea of the lengths to which the government was willing to go to treat these people badly.

In this letter I also asked the minister to use his services to expedite the bargaining situation and to get on with it. The striking ships' crews were providing emergency services, yet the government was trying to intimate that these people were behaving in a irresponsible manner. I would like to point out that the hospital services workers, subsequently having offered to provide services during the strike, were turned down. This brought great distress particularly to people in veterans' homes.

I would like to point out that even though the government did not avail itself of the offer, those people who later went on strike went to the different hospitals in the communities to succour veterans and inhabitants of these homes in order that the distress which they experienced because the government had moved them out of their homes was not too severe. This was much appreciated by the families of the veterans involved, I would point out.

I certainly did not receive any answer from the minister, and I still have not received an answer. I asked for many other things as well with respect to that whole bargaining. We have received very, very few answers other than the back to work legislation brought in by closure.

I see my time has expired.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to put my hon. friend out of his misery.

The government has been engaged in collective bargaining for the ships' crews group for approximately two years. From January 1988 until March of 1989 many bargaining sessions were held both directly with the union bargaining team and with the assistance of mediators appointed to assist the parties.

In March 1989 the ships' crews group as well as 26 others reached agreement with the employer. These settlements were reached voluntarily and were submitted to the union membership for the ratification. Unfortunately, despite the fact that the union bargaining team voluntarily accepted the settlement, the ships' crews membership did not. Since the spring of 1989 the parties have met on many occasions in an attempt to reach a settlement on the outstanding issues, but all to no avail.

In October and November of 1989 the ships' crews group was engaged in conciliation efforts with an independently appointed conciliation board. This conciliation board could not bring about an agreement between the parties and in fact made no recommendations for a settlement because the parties were so far apart.

In addition to the aforementioned efforts further mediation attempts were made in December, 1989. The Treasury Board, for example, offered a comprehensive settlement position but the union bargaining team rejected this offer and continued to demand a settlement that would be far too high for any reasonable and responsible employer to accept.

It is important to note that the employer's settlement position in December rejected by the union included parity of wages for eastern and western based ships' crews effective the date of signing of a new collective agreement. This delivered on a commitment made in the House by the President of the Treasury Board to provide wage parity for this group of employees. In addition, this commitment of the employer has been confirmed in writing to the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board for use in the forthcoming conciliation board process.

Despite the employer's undertaking to achieve wage parity, the union continued to insist on substantially greater monetary improvement. This is precisely why Bill C–49 was required. It put into place a fair and equitable process for resolving the outstanding issues. The parties will have an opportunity to present their respective positions to an independent conciliation board that will have the authority to render a binding decision to resolve the outstanding issues should that become necessary.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, when I first raised this question and then gave notice that I was not satisfied with the answer, I had no idea that the Prime Minister this very day in this House would help me demonstrate just how dissatisfied I was and why I am so dissatisfied.

People around this country by now have seen that answer from the Prime Minister. There is, he says, no crisis. He says that the people in Atlantic Canada ought to be grateful. Grateful? Grateful for what from this particular government? For shutting down communities? For gutting UI? For gutting job creation? For allowing overfishing to go on five years without a peep from this Prime Minister, and five years later he can stand there and say there is no crisis?

I hear the neat little distinction he makes. There is a crisis in the fishery but there is not a crisis in Atlantic Canada. Where does he think the fishery is? Who does he think shipped 80 per cent of our groundfish, caught it and shipped it before he wiped it out by letting the foreigners walk all over us?

• (1910)

Of course any crisis in the fishery is a crisis in Atlantic Canada. The problem is that he is not here. I understand that. He is a busy man.

The Minister for International Trade should be here responding to this issue. Where is the gentleman from St. John's West? The member for Winnipeg South is going to respond to this fishing issue, this overfishing issue? What an insult to the people of Atlantic Canada.

Where is the parliamentary secretary for fisheries? Where is the minister of fisheries? Where is the Minister for International Trade and all the other people who have the solutions to this terrible problem? Are none of them here to tell us what the Prime Minister means when he says there is no crisis?

I will give the member for Winnipeg South some idea of the dimensions of this particular tragedy.

In one area of the zone that is controlled and monitored by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, NAFO, that organization recommended no fish be taken this year. Yet, the Spanish and the Portuguese, realizing just how cowardly and how spineless this government has been so far in dealing with foreign overfishing, have continued their pillage of fish stocks even when they were told that no fish should be taken. Do you realize that according to DFO figures last year that in 1989 there was a quota of 13,000 tonnes of cod set for them and they took 63,000 tonnes? They took almost five times what they were supposed to take.

Why is it that everybody except the Prime Minister knows there is a crisis? I will tell them why. It is because they are living through it: they in Gaultois, who are under threat of losing their homes, communities and their loved ones, not to mention their jobs and their livelihood; they in Grand Bank; they on Shea Heights near St. John's; they in Trepassey; they in Canso, Nova Scotia; they in Lockeport, Nova Scotia. They know there is a crisis and all the bafflegab and words from the Prime Minister today and all the fine written speeches like the one which I am sure we will hear in a minute, when I sit down, will not put groceries on tables in Gaultois, Grand Bank, Shea Heights and Trepassey.

Two of those areas are in the jurisdiction of the Minister for International Trade, the member for St. John's West. Why does he not convince his people that there is a crisis? I say to him that it is not for the lack of trying. I understand, John, you have done the best you can, but that is the real tragedy: nobody is listening to the junior minister for trade, nobody is listening to the member for St. John's West. Perhaps that is why they are not here. Perhaps they have given up altogether. That is the word back in Newfoundland and that might be the honourable thing for the gentleman for St. John's West to do.

More to the point, this is an unfolding national tragedy. This is a disgrace of international proportions that we should stand idly by as a Canadian government and allow the Spanish and the Portuguese, aided and abetted by the French, to wipe out entire stocks of groundfish and other species. They will not be there for future generations. They will not be there to be caught by the Spanish or by the Portuguese or by anybody. They will be gone. Why? Because this government, through its silence and lack of action, has stood idly by and aided and abetted that raping of our fish stocks, wiping out jobs in plants and wiping out jobs in boats.

I appeal to the government not to respond with another pre-scripted few words but to say to Atlantic fishermen and plant workers: "We hear your plea at last. There is a crisis and we are going to rise to it". If the government will say that and do that, I will be the first to rise and applaud government members.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would just say to the hon. member opposite that the parliamentary secretary for fisheries has asked me to respond to this question because the parliamentary secretary was tragically forced to return home to his riding this evening to attend a funeral.

• (1915)

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans informs me that he has not yet received the final report from the independent review panel created to assess the new scientific information on the northern cod stock. The interim report was received mid-May.

Early in 1989 there were serious changes in our view of the northern cod resource. New scientific data and more sophisticated assessment techniques led the Canadian scientists to believe that the total cod resource available was significantly smaller than previously thought. Although we still believe that the stock increased in weight between 1976 and 1986 it tripled rather than increased five-fold as had been estimated by the Canadian Atlantic Fisheries Scientific Advisory Committee in 1987. This is also a slower increase than estimated by the task force group on the Newfoundland inshore fishery in 1987.

In response to this unexpected information the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans revised immediately the 1989 total allowable catch down from 235,000 tonnes as a precautionary measure from the preliminary figure of 266,000 tonnes. This level ensured for 1989 the conservation of stock at its recent level.

The conclusions of our scientists and of Dr. Harris' panel will have a significant impact on management measures in the future. Northern cod is vitally important to the livelihood and future of thousands of fishermen and plant workers and to the viability of the Atlantic groundfish industry in general. It is for that reason that a comprehensive examination of all possible facts which may affect the state of the northern cod resource is very important at this stage. We cannot afford leaving any stone unturned at such a crucial time.

The independent review panel which is chaired by Dr. Harris from Memorial University of Newfoundland was instructed to conduct a comprehensive examination of all possible factors which may affect the state of the northern cod resource, of the data used in establishing scientific advice and of the methods used to determine this advice. The panel was given a broad mandate to ensure that reliable scientific advice will be available to manage the fishery in 1990 and beyond.

As members will be aware, the interim report of the panel was delivered on May 15, 1989 and confirmed the lower size of the stock. During the summer the panel received submissions from the public and held public hearings. This public debate was an important element of the review and the panel is now finalizing its report. The final report from the panel will be made public after a review by the minister and appropriate consultation. Also, as is normally the case, consultation with the fishing industry will take place at a special meeting of the Atlantic Groundfish Advisory Committee and a meeting of the Atlantic Council of Provincial Fisheries Ministries.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that frustration was felt by the Liberal member who spoke about there being no Atlantic representative here for the government to answer. I appreciate having heard on northern cod but my colleague from Newfoundland spoke on foreign overfishing.

I am speaking on an area that I think has to be answered. I asked in October what kind of help there was going to be for the communities of Lockeport, Digby, Argyle and the many thousands of people who are out of work since last June. The minister at that time has no response.

He says there will be assistance coming and it has not come. There is no direct assistance that I have seen come into Nova Scotia in the form of helping the community. It is not financial assistance that people want. They want to fish in Nova Scotia. Those coastal communities want a living. It is not like the Prime Minister said here in the House today, that the future in Atlantic Canada is bright. Perhaps the future in Atlantic Canada is bright, but I have lived by the sea all my life, and fish are a natural resource that this government will deal with to come forward with a plan of action that will secure the prosperity of the Atlantic coast.

There are three areas where this government fails. One is a management plan.

• (1920)

In my supplementary question to the minister in October, I said please transfer from the offshore some of the species that they will not use in those coastal communities near Lockeport, Digby, and Argyle, all are 4BWX and 5. He said no at that time. Yet his own official in reporting on December 20, 1989, to the fisheries committee said he did not like to see fish left in the water.

There was 5,000 metric tons: 1,000 metric tons of haddock, 3,000 metric tons of pollack, and the rest in cod that was left in the water by the offshore as of the middle of December. Yet this government would not allocate in September, October, November or December to the inshore communities that were so dependent on that fish. That is one area.

The management plan incorporated in 1990 the same errors that were there. The second thing that management plan does is allow a boat allocation. That does not make any sense. Most fishermen who have not fished for six months are only going to go after their 20,000 pounds per trip or 10,000 per trip for the best of the fish. They will have to do that in order to survive the year that the management plan proposes again for this year. That deals with the management plant.

The second area the government is not able to deal with is marketing. We have nothing from this government except its allocation of 100,000 metric tonnes of underutilized species for development purposes. Since 1985 there has been a decrease in any marketing ability for the Department of Fisheries, except as it relates to providing intelligence for shaping the minister's policy.

There is no new incentive for helping the firms that do not have the resources to conduct market studies in the underutilized species. In fact, with the free trade agreement we cannot even do that or we might offend the U.S. For our natural resource that is in trouble, we have no backbone as it stands in a market development strategy for fish in Canada. One only need to look at the lobster fishery. We have to watch what is happening with no assistance directly related to marketing for fear of offending the Americans down there.

I have looked at what the Americans are doing. They are talking about our fish as if we do not have any health inspection or any other inspection. They have ads that say: "You would not want to eat this fish". Our government is not doing a thing to counteract billions of dollars in an industry that we have in existence.

We in the opposition see no one over there taking the initiative to go ahead and countervail that. I am saying to you, Mr. Speaker, that this government has got to look at who is presently fishing underutilized species. It is a European market that is using that. Well, why can we not develop that market? Why do we have to see foreigners here as an irritant to us when we have the capacity offshore.

We have the capacity onshore to go out and fish and process the underutilized fish. If there was any incentive as has been in the past to develop markets in this area, you would not have the present situation in communities like Lockeport. You would not have us begging the Russians who are within our 200 mile limit to land their cod, their haddock and their pollack to our plant. We would be fishing those underutilized species as the Russians are here fishing. Sure, we have to develop markets. Yes, we may offend Americans.

I just want to say that I have seen the hardest of hardships as as result. I cannot stand to see a Prime Minister of this country take a natural resource like fish, a renewable resource like fish, and say to the people in the east that we have nothing to look at except the bright side of what else there is on the east coast. There are whole sections in Atlantic Canada that are hurting, that are not able to sustain the direction of this government's policy. Yes, I say to the farmers out west, you may have $1 billion of financial aid to help you but I do hope that at the end of your drought that it won't be the big companies that will provide the direction to this government as we are beginning to see happening in the east at the sake of all those coastal communities and those fishermen.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the hon. member's question. As the hon. member is well aware, this government is very concerned about the people in Atlantic Canada. The Prime Minister is very concerned about the people in Atlantic Canada and their well-being.

To this end the Prime Minister created a special committee of cabinet to address exclusively the problems particular to Atlantic fisheries. The committee has in turn convened two task forces, one for northern cod and the other Scotia-Fundy groundfish, to take stock of the resource situation and the impact of diminished supply on the people who make their livelihood from it.

The scope of their investigations is broad enough to address alternatives within the fisheries and the regional socio-economic settings in which they take place. The task forces will be reporting their findings in due course and any subsequent measures this government may implement will take their advice into consideration.

Of course we are concerned about the impact of reduced groundfish availability on fish plant workers in the Scotia-Fundy region. This comprises a major part of the work of that the task forces are undertaking. It is also why we are encouraged by the way the larger companies have cushioned the impact of this situation by spreading the work around several plants in the region.

Private sector firms are showing that they understand their responsibilities and that the responsibilities are fundamental to the operation of the free enterprise system. As a consequence, the number of outright plant closures for the remainder of the season in 1989 in the Scotia-Fundy region has been kept to a minimum. Plant closures in other communities have been, by and large, intermittent, temporary, and very much in keeping with the pattern of seasonal activity typical of the Scotia-Fundy groundfish fishery. Most workers will qualify for unemployment insurance to supplement their earnings as they usually do in a normal year.

National Sea Products closed its Lockeport plant for a number of reasons. In addition to the publicly stated concerns that the corporation has made about the impact of inadequate groundfish supplies on its business, the company has been taking measures to improve its overall operating efficiency. A reduction in the company's quota is only one explanatory factor. The closure was a business decision which the government cannot second-guess.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government responses to 16 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise today, at the beginning of this continuing session, to present petitions again dealing with the GST, the goods and services tax, which is rejected by most Canadians.

• (1110)

These petitioners would like to tell the House of Commons how strongly they feel about this imposition of an additional tax on goods and services. This tax will be hidden from Canadians and it will be applied to virtually everything they buy.

They say that the imposition of this new goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians, that the imposition of the tax will create an onerous burden on small business. This is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians that will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest and higher unemployment.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject this proposed goods and services tax at 7 per cent or at any percentage.

BILL C-21

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by 70 people in the towns of Bonavista, Elliston, Melrose, Middle Catalina, Catalina and Port Union.

These people are very concerned about Bill C-21. Specifically in their case it is taking $1.3 billion from the unemployment insurance business and taking it away from job development strategy programs which in fact provide infrastructure for the communities. As well there is the $2.9 billion the government is taking out. It really is getting out of the unemployment insurance business altogether.

They are concerned about the weeks that they will have for benefits. They are concerned about what is estimated to be the $112 million that will be taken out next year if this bill goes through.

The petitioners humbly pray that Bill C-21 will be withdrawn.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would also like to present a number of petitions today concerning the proposed goods and services tax, which should appropriately be called the grief and suffering tax.

This petition is signed by a number of citizens of the great community of Windsor, so ably represented in the House of Commons by my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Windsor West.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition to present under Standing Order 36 on the goods and services tax, signed by a number of people in the country.

What they are saying is that we have an unfair tax system. We should have a fair tax system based on the ability to pay, where wealthy people pay their fair share and where corporations pay their fair share, not where ordinary citizens of this country pick up the entire burden.

I am very pleased to table, under the provisions of Standing Order 36 and on behalf of these people, the petition in opposition to the goods and services tax.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition that has been brought to me by small business people in my community.

They are very upset about the goods and services tax. They say that it forces small business to carry a disproportionate share of the tax burden in Canada. They also say that its implementation will be a nightmare for small business in Canada and that the offsetting is not adequate to support them in their businesses when they must change their computer programs and their cash registers. They say that this tax does not address the concerns of small business in this country.

The petitioners call upon this government to reject the goods and services tax and to consult with labour and consumer groups to reach a broad consensus on tax reform.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a pile of petitions from people from Blue River, Birch Island, Vavenby, Vola, Clearwater, Blackpool, Little Fort, Barrièr, McClure, Hempley Creek and many other centres in the North Thompson Valley.

They point out their concern with the government's decision to pursue the 7 per cent goods and services tax. They basically cannot believe it and point out a whole list of reasons for it adversely affecting the residents of the North Thompson Valley.

The petitioners ask the government to come to its senses, to back away from this tax, to return to the drawing board and come up with real, comprehensive tax reform.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I have a petition, Mr. Speaker, again on behalf of a number of people from the Kamloops region who point out that they are interested in the government maintaining a national rail network for passenger service.

They are asking the government to consider investing in new equipment as has been done in other western industrialized nations in terms of rail passenger service and to consider introducing a VIA Rail bill that would give the government an opportunity to see proper passenger rail service introduced in Canada and not close that southern route across the country.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, the following petition is presented to the House by hundreds of residents from the communities of Tracadie, Sheila, Pont-Lafrance, Petite-Rivière-de-l'île, Sainte-Cécile and Rogersville, and your petitioners are very much concerned about the fact that the federal Conservative Government is going to impose on Canadians a new, universal 7 per cent tax on goods and services. They are well aware of the disastrous impact a tax like this will have on the economy of northern New Brunswick, and they ask Parliament to reject the new goods and services tax which has been massively rejected by Canadians across this country.

[English]

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition regarding the proposed goods and services tax. It is signed by concerned Canadians who strongly oppose this tax. They feel that it will cause serious and unfair hardship on low and middle income Canadians and that it will cause higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject this proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from quite a number of constituents from Paris, Dunnville, Waterford, Woodstock and Brantford.

They are opposed to the goods and services tax and recognize that the government is now trying to tax reading materials, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels.

They humbly pray that the government reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and that taxation be reformed so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition signed by a number of constituents from Winnipeg, Dryden, and Saskatoon, to name a few, who are opposed to the VIA Rail cuts that are taking place.

They are asking the Parliament of Canada to maintain and to upgrade VIA Rail's present national network, not take away from something we already have.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present two petitions to the House, both certified under Standing Order 36.

The first one is regarding VIA Rail. Petitioners from all across the country call upon Parliament to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment, to introduce a passenger train bill giving VIA Rail a firm legislative mandate and to develop a revised costing arrangement with the railroad companies whose track VIA uses.

I think we all know how much Canadian National and Canadian Pacific have ripped off VIA Rail.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the second petition ties in with the debate in this House now for a fairer tax system across the country, not the grief and suffering tax being introduced by the Conservative government.

This is in the regard to the report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas released on Friday, October 27.

• (1120)

These petitioners primarily from Crescent Spur and the Prince George area call on Parliament to reject the recommendations of the report and to develop a fair and equitable tax benefit program which recognizes the financial needs of the people in northern and isolated areas.

We trust the Minister of Finance will hear their words.

EL SALVADOR

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present petitions under Standing Order 36. The first petition relates to the situation in El Salvador and calls on Canada to utilize its membership in the Organization of American States to pursue independent diplomatic policy leading to the full protection of human rights and a peaceful resolution to the conflict in El Salvador.

It is signed by many hundreds of my constituents.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the second petition I am presenting under Standing Order 36 relates to the cut-backs to VIA and the joining of efforts of the Transport 2000 and Rural Dignity in order to obtain justice and satisfaction to the reinstatement and enhancement of passenger rail service in Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the third petition relates to the goods and services tax. There is, as you are well aware, broad rejection across this country to this kind of tax reform. These petitioners come from Manitoba and from Ontario.

The final petition is also against the goods and services tax. It relates to the petitioners' awareness that the tax burden is being shifted to ordinary Canadians and is not any semblance of real tax reform.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under Standing Order 36 to present four petitions today from people from Ontario, central British Columbia and Saskatchewan who are like minded in their opposition to the goods and services tax. They express in their petition that a tax on goods and services is a regressive tax which hits low and middle income earners the hardest and that Canadians are already overtaxed.

This further tax burden could and would adversely affect the economy. They call upon this House not to pass the goods and services tax and, based on broad public consensus, to replace our current sales tax proposals and our manufacturers' sales tax with the kind of tax that would be progressive and would be in the interests of all Canadians, not just those Canadians who have a high income.

They view this as a massive tax grab and I am privileged to table these petitions on their behalf.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions today on a number of subjects.

I have a petition signed by many senior citizens from my constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway who express serious concern about the clawback on old age security benefits to pensioners. They suggest that the taxing back of old age security is a direct threat to the principle of universality which is at the core of the Canadian social system.

They urge that Parliament reject the government's policy to initiate an inequitable and unjust clawback of old age security benefits.

POVERTY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition which has been signed once again by residents of Burnaby and Vancouver which points out that one-sixth of all Canadian children live in poverty. The number of children living in poverty in some provinces is as high as 26 per cent. It is particularly high in the Atlantic provinces where there is a crisis, whether or not the Prime Minister recognizes it.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to support private member's motion No. 254 initiated by my very distinguished colleague from Mission—Coquitlam.

They call upon the government to negotiate with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have petitions signed by hundreds of residents from across Canada including my own constituency. They are signed by many artists and actors from the Shaw Festival in Niagara-on-the-Lake who point out that railway passenger services carried on by VIA Rail is essential for many Canadians and has been a part of Canada for more than 100 years.

They express concern about the cuts in VIA Rail service and they call upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger rail service across this land.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Finally, Mr. Speaker, along with many other members of this House, I am sure from all sides, I wish to table petitions that have been signed once again by hundreds of Canadians, including particularly constituents from Burnaby—Kingsway, as well as seniors from the Bonsor Senior Centre, and members of the Construction and General Workers Union, Local 602.

These individuals express concern about the proposed goods and services tax. They point out that it is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for the taxpayers' ability to pay.

They call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to bring in meaningful tax reforms so that there is in fact an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations. They urge the government to reject this massive tax grab.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition to present under Standing Order 36 signed by 136 residents of Nanaimo and the neighbouring community.

Petitioners argue that the enforced pay back of old age security benefits by pensioners with incomes over $50,000 taints the legitimacy of social security benefits as income. Moreover, it is a threat to the principle of universality, which is the core of the Canadian social system.

The petitioners humbly pray and ask Parliament to reject the government policy to initiate this inequitable and unjust clawback of old age pension security benefits.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AREAS

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, today I wish to present a petition that rejects the recommendations made by the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Isolated and Northern Areas. Your petitioners, who represent the isolated community of Lebel-sur-Quévillon in Abitibi, are concerned about the report's recommendations which will cause a number of workers to be laid off. They believe that the Government of Canada refuses to make adjustments to reflect the fact that life in the North is hard, isolated and expensive.

Mr. Speaker, according to the disparity index for the 84 isolated communities designated by the Government of Quebec in October 1989, Lebel-sur-Quévillon ranks seventieth.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition which has been certified by the clerk. It is from residents of Calgary Northeast who are opposed to the goods and services tax. Those residents feel that even reducing the taxation to 7 per cent is not acceptable. It is a discriminatory tax, hurting the consumer as well as hurting our trade ability with other countries.

I have a total of 11,000 signature and here are 1,011 more.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in presenting a petition which calls upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax. These people, in this case from the great province of New Brunswick, are like Canadians all over this country, including those from Alberta we just heard from and others we have heard from this morning and for the last many months.

They are saying one and the same thing: "Government, go back to the drawing board. We believe in tax reform, but we believe it ought to be in a form that does not sock it to poorer people".

That is what the goods and services tax is doing, and they are appealing to the good sense of the government back-benchers to reject this particular tax.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 149, 180, 190 and 195.

[Text]

PENSION REFORM—COSTS OF ADMINISTRATION

Question No. 149—Mr. Whittaker:

Has the government any projections of the costs (both personnel and equipment) of administering the changes to the pension adjustment (PA), past service pension adjustment (PSPA) and pension adjustment reversal (PAR) reporting contained in the draft amendments to the Income Tax Act and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Pension Reform will be implemented in stages over a two-year period, provided Parliament approves the handling of PA, PAR and PSPA reporting. The estimated costs for personnel, capital acquisition and operating expenses based on the premise that all facets of Pension Reform become operational by January 1, 1990 are as follows:

(a) Person Year Costs	151
(b) Capital Costs ($000's)	4,814
(c) Operating Costs ($000's)	7,857

STUDIES DONE BY THE DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE REGARDING VIA RAIL

Question No. 180—Mr. Benjamin:

Is the government aware of the studies done by the Department of Finance regarding VIA Rail and referred to by the Minister of Transport during Question Period on June 6, 1989 and, if so (a) what are their titles (b) what was their purpose (c) what conclusions did they reach (d) what methodology did they use?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): The studies referred to by the Honourable Benoît Bouchard, Minister of Transport, on June 6, 1989 are those that were conducted as part of the Budget preparation exercise. Both the studies and methodologies were tabled and released publicly during the last week of April as part of the Budget documents.

They include a five-year fiscal plan and a detailed fiscal strategy for bringing the public debt under control and raising the living standards of Canadians.

The conclusion reached in regard to VIA Rail was that VIA should be expected to adopt a more commercial approach and to operate in a more cost effective manner. VIA was asked to bring forward a business plan which would achieve the objectives set by the government and respect reference levels.

NCC TENANT NAMES AND RENTS CHARGED

Question No. 195—Mrs. Gaffney:

1. Are there tenants leasing public buildings within the National Capital Commission's purview and, if so, what are their names?

2. Are rents charged on public buildings or other space within the National Capital Commission's purview and, if so, in what amounts?

Hon. Elmer MacIntosh MacKay (Minister of Public Works): The Commission's total tenant list, and all rents charged, are not releasable to the public* due to the following:

The names and addresses of residential tenants, and rents paid by these tenants, fall under the definition of personal information under the Privacy Act. This matter has been referred to the Federal Court.

The Commission is of the opinion that disclosure of rents paid by commercial tenants could prejudice the tenants' competitive position and the Commission's negotiating ability. The Information Commissioner's recommendations on this matter are currently under review by the Commission.

The Member may wish to exercise her rights under the Access to Information Act.

*The Access to Information Act does not differentiate between Members of Parliament and the "general public".

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, if Questions Nos. 177 and 179 could be made Orders for Return, those returns would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Questions Nos. 177 and 179 be deemed to have been made Orders for Return?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning the Order Paper Questions. This is an issue that has been brought to the attention of Mr. Speaker before, but unfortunately I must bring it to the attention of the Speaker today.

• (1130)

I have a question on the Order Paper that dates back to October 30. I recognize that it is a rather lengthy question. Nevertheless, the 45 days permitted under the rules, because this is a 45-day type question pursuant to the Standing Order, have now extended to close to 90 days; in other words, double the length of time. I look for some guidance from the Speaker and the parliamentary secretary to getting a commitment for an answer from the government.

I also bring the following to your attention. Question No. 182 dated November 9 also standing in my name is a relatively short, concise and I think simple question to answer. I think even the government would recognize that it is a very uncomplicated type of question. It has been on the Order Paper since that time.

One of the side effects of this—I draw this to your attention—is the fact that Standing Order 39(4) says that no member shall have more than four questions on the Order Paper at any one time. Because of the fact that we cannot get responses to these questions, I am prevented by the rules of the House from asking new questions. In other words, I cannot place questions on the Order Paper because my spaces are all taken up. They are taken up because the government is not answering the questions that I placed already and which have been there for some time.

The Clerk of the Journals Branch could easily inform you, Mr. Speaker, that I have a backlog of questions resting on his desk right now. I am waiting for these questions to be answered in order to be able to pose those new questions which I believe to be of public interest and, in any case, which are my right to ask as a Member of Parliament.

Again, I hope that you would look into the matter, Mr. Speaker. I am looking for your guidance as well as the co-operation of the parliamentary secretary so that we can get answers to these questions and any others that have been on the Order Paper, clearly marked under the 45-day provision, and which have been there for a considerable period of time.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to call upon the parliamentary secretary because I am sure hon. members would not suspect for one moment that he had dreamed up this elaborate plan to keep the hon. member from putting questions on the Order Paper.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the House that I did not do any such thing. I certainly would not want to in any way impinge on the member's rights and in fact responsibilities and obligations to ask questions.

I do, however, want to say that we have had so far 145 priority questions asked and we have been successful in answering 82.8 per cent of those. Those are the priority questions. With the regular questions, we are presently sitting at 88.7 per cent. We certainly are doing our best to make sure that we answer those as close to the deadlines as we can and, if possible, to exceed them.

In the particular question that my friend refers to, I was not able to lay my hand on that question. If I am not mistaken, it is a very serious question that the member has asked regarding one of the trips that the Prime Minister took. What the member would like to know, among other things, is how many pieces of luggage each member who went on that trip took.

In all fairness, it does take us a fair amount of time to track down individual people to ask them how many pieces of luggage they took, what they took and whether they put it on the plane or whether they carried it on board with them. If the hon. member thinks that is a serious and important question, then I am sorry, but he is just going to have to wait for us to take the time to dig out the information that he requests.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, that was not the question that I was referring to. I was referring to Question No. 182. I referred to Question No. 162 as well. It is the one that is 90 days. Question No. 182 has been there for more than 45 days.

I have just noticed that another question standing in my name has been there since December 6. This one is merely to ask the names of the notaries working for the Federal Business Development Bank. That list should be available in something like 15 minutes. The question has been on the Order Paper in excess of 45 days.

The government has now confessed that one out of every five priority questions is not answered in accordance with the rules. They are deficient close to 20 per cent of the time by the government's own admission. In my case, all of the questions that are on the Order Paper in my name except one have exceeded the 45 days and none of them have been answered yet.

Mr. Cooper: First, I want to correct a couple of things. I did not say that 82.8 per cent of the questions were filed on time or responded to on time. I said that 82.8 per cent of those questions have been responded to. There are at the moment a few late and I am quite prepared to concede that. We are on top of those on a regular basis.

If the hon. member is referring to question No. 197, he did not simply ask for the names of the lawyers and the notaries for FBDB, he wanted to know all the fees paid to them and that does take time.

In all fairness, we on this side our best to answer these questions on time. I personally try to make sure that they are answered on time, but when members continue to ask questions that require very detailed responses, that require checking and verifying with a number of individuals and offices, it becomes practically impossible for us to meet the 45 day deadline. We will continue at every occasion to do our best.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the difficulty faced by the parliamentary secretary. I know he has trouble sometimes with the questions asked of him, but he has some statistics. He told us what percentage of questions he had answered. I wonder if he could also tell us the number of 45 day questions that were answered late; in other words, the percentage of the 82 per cent that he has answered that were in fact beyond the 45 day limit. Is it 90 per cent of them or 95 per cent of them? Could he give us that breakdown as well?

Mr. Speaker: I do not of course want to bring this brilliant debate to a close because these are matters of importance and the number of questions that a member puts on the Order Paper often reflects the diligence of that member. The rule is there to be followed unless there is very good reason why the government cannot manage it in the time.

I appreciate the comment of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that he appreciates the position in which the parliamentary secretary finds himself. I think that the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has made a point and the parliamentary secretary knows that he is being pressed. I am sure that he will pass that message on.

If it is of any help, the parliamentary secretary could also remind those who have to get these answers that the rule, as I have said before, was not put in the book to lie in abeyance or to exist in a vacuum. It is there as a direction to the government and to the bureaucracy to respond as adequately and as quickly as they can to questions which must be deemed serious.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands asks another very detailed and complicated question. I would hope that he could handle that issue on a matter of personal negotiation with the parliamentary secretary because it might take quite a long time to find the answer to the question that he has asked.

I think I will leave it with the parliamentary secretary to do everything he can to obtain from others the kind of co–operation that is in keeping with the spirit of the rule.

Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

STANDING ORDER 52

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I just noticed that you skipped over the routine proceedings that call for applications pursuant to Standing Order 52. You were right in calling orders of the day but I would like to make the point that some of us in this House feel that because of yesterday's proceedings, the privileges of some of the members in this House have not in my view been protected by the Standing Orders as they exist today.

The argument that I am going to make is that you received on January 18 last a letter, signed by the hon. member for Beauséjour, asking for an emergency debate on the fishing situation, the escalating crisis in the cod, lobster, snow crab, and herring roe fisheries in Atlantic Canada, characterized by numerous shutdowns of fish plants, loss of jobs, and essentially closing entire communities.

That, Mr. Speaker, to us on this side of the House is a very important and very difficult question. We thought at the time that the request under Standing Order 52 was appropriate and should be given due consideration.

Of course we realize that in using Standing Order 52, which is a complex Standing Order, the discretionary decision was yours and we abide by that all the time.

The difficulty yesterday was that the government, in its resistance to having VIA Rail discussed on a motion moved by my friend from Thunder Bay—Atikokan to concur in a standing committee report, had the same parliamentary secretary who a few minutes ago said that he would never infringe upon the rights of members of the House of Commons move a dilatory motion.

I put it to him that yesterday he did infringe upon the right of some members of the House of Commons to debate a very, very serious matter, not by his own will or by his own design, but nevertheless the rules are made that way. When he moved that we proceed to Orders of the Day, he thwarted every effort of this House to try to discuss a very serious and deep concern of many Canadians about the fishing industry in the Atlantic provinces.

The arguments that I would like to put to you deal with Standing Order 52 pertaining to emergency debates. I do not want to read the whole section because it is quite extensive, but I want to ask that you consider Standing Order 52(15). I will read that clause which is the last clause of that Standing Order, because I think it is important. It reads this way:

> The provisions of this Standing Order shall not be suspended by the operation of any other Standing Order relating to the hours of sitting or in respect of the consideration of any other business; provided that, in cases of conflict, the Speaker shall determine when such other business shall be considered or disposed of and the Speaker shall make any consequential interpretation of any Standing Order that may be necessary in relation thereto.

That, Mr. Speaker, is my point. Yesterday the government decided that in its judgment it did not want to proceed with debate on the motion moved by the member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan concerning VIA Rail. The government moved what I would call a dilatory motion. The government short-circuited the whole system. We did not get a chance to reach the point in Routine Proceedings that call for your decision upon an emergency debate asked for in good faith by the member for Beauséjour. Therefore, today I thought you would call that item.

You have had the motion since January 18. There is nothing in the Standing Order which says that you had to call it yesterday or today. If something happens, within the rules, that prevents it from being called, we take it then that the Speaker will call it the following day. Now today we find that you did not call it.

I know you did not call it because I was told by the Table that we would have to retable or resubmit the letter. That to me is a bureaucratic decision which I cannot accept. Nothing in the Standing Order says that we must do that. Nothing in the Standing Order says that you must resubmit an emergency debate request.

An emergency debate is something that happens that day or happens that week or happens in that period. The emergency is still there. Why do we have to go through this rigmarole repeating the process of resubmitting a letter which calls for an emergency debate when indeed section 15 of Standing Order 52 gives it, in my judgment, authority to decide any interpretation of those rules.

I appeal to you, in the interest of parliamentary order and in the interest of getting this debate before the House, that you reconsider the decision not to go to Standing Order 52 today, as is called for in our Standing Orders on Routine Proceedings.

I would like to state in conclusion that my fear is that the government with its majority could at any time that it knows that there is an emergency and that there is likely to be a debate, because we sometimes advise the government that we are going to want to discuss a specific issue, could render this Standing Order absolutely useless when, during Routine Proceedings a member of the government has the floor and moves that we proceed to Government Orders. I find that a bit difficult to accept.

The government will use its majority to prevent debate on a very important question put to the House by a member of this House. In other words, any time the government wants to use its majority to thwart the process and avoid discussing an emergency, it could move that we proceed to Government Orders. In my view, that would not be in keeping with what I would call democratic process and I would object strongly to that procedure.

Therefore, I plead with you to reconsider the decision not to call motions under Standing Order 52 in Routine Proceedings as is normally done and to ask that the letter tabled by the member for Beauséjour be considered today and a judgment made on his request for an emergency debate on the fisheries situation in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to be very brief on this issue. I think it is an important issue. I think all members of the House would recognize that members have a right to raise an issue that they feel is an emergency requiring a special debate and I think we ought to keep in mind, too, we are just returning for a session of Parliament and in that spirit, I think we want to maintain as co-operative and friendly an atmosphere as we can.

I think we all appreciate the government's decision to call for a vote as a result of a concurrence motion yesterday. The government had two choices as I see it. One was to move that we proceed directly to Government Orders, which the government did. Another alternative would have simply been that the present debate now adjourn and we move back into Routine Proceedings.

We had some discussion, as a matter of fact, between myself and the parliamentary secretary and we recognized that these were two options. The government chose one. As a result of that action, we were not able to get to the point in Routine Proceedings where hon. members could raise their cases calling for emergency debates on the Rafferty-Alameda Dam environmental situation, the situation in Ethiopia and the crisis in the east coast fishery.

Rather than argue whether or not we can interpret Standing Order 52 in such a way that would permit us to raise those questions now, could we not simply agree unanimously in the spirit of co-operation that at this point we allow those members who have submitted letters indicating their intention to rise and make a case for an emergency debate to have an opportunity to do so and get on with the agenda and the business of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I know that other hon. members may wish to rise. Perhaps I can keep them from going through extensive argument by commenting on the application.

First of all, this matter may be resolved very easily today. Because we have to make a decision about this quickly, I do not want to give an incautious response.

Without definitively saying what the rule calls for, we should remember we have on the floor of the House now notice of only one application. It is the custom of the Chair not to comment on any other applications that the Chair receives until the member filing the application actually rises in his or her place. I know hon. members will understand that. In view of the fact that both the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and the hon. member for Kamloops have indicated that there were a number of applications yesterday, I think I can refer to those applications as the applications that I received yesterday.

As it turned out, the government did move for Orders of the Day so it was not possible for me to rule on those applications. That could have been easily remedied perhaps without any need for argument if the applications had been refiled today.

In the event that there is some concern among members as to just exactly how this rule ought to be interpreted, I will go away and give it some consideration. In the meantime, it may be that as the hon. member for Kamloops has suggested that I deem the applications to be in front of me, I can only do that, of course, with the consent of the House.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, may I make a couple of points, the first one being that when I moved the motion yesterday, and I did move the motion that we move to Orders of the Day, it was not in any way my intention to cut off emergency debates. In all fairness, had the opposition advised me that they had made an application for such a debate, I am sure we would have been able to co-operate and to accommodate them in some fashion.

I want to say also, without in any way establishing a precedent, I have no problem and on our side we would be willing to accept the recommendation of my hon. friend from Kamloops, the House Leader of the NDP, in that those notices which were given yesterday, notice or notices, I am not sure what you are dealing with, being treated as though they were refiled again today, as long as that does not establish a precedent, and also does not in any way reflect on the government's opinion as to whether or not those particular issues in fact do represent an emergency.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell may have a point that I have omitted, and I will hear him.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to make just a brief point to add to something that has been said, to ask the Speaker to consider one other element when Mr. Speaker makes his definitive ruling on the interpretation of Standing Order 52 and it is the following.

My colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, has described to Mr. Speaker why he believes that indeed today or at the immediate opportunity on the next day, there should be no need to refile and I accept that point. I wanted to make one further point. I wonder if the Speaker could consider as well whether it would have been appropriate yesterday, as a matter of fact immediately after the vote to move to Orders of the Day, to deal with the issue.

I say this for the following reason, Mr. Speaker. I am not saying it was the motivation this time, but any government could in the future, if the Speaker's ruling today remains unchallenged, utilize the procedure of moving to Orders of the Day in order to stop the opposition from proposing to Mr. Speaker that pursuant to Standing Order 52, we have an adjournment debate. In fact, the government may have developed this tool now by accident. I am not saying it will use it, but the precedent would nevertheless be there.

If the Speaker could consider that immediately after such a vote were taken, if there were a similar vote taken in the future to move to Orders of the Day, that that vote not prevent the Speaker from ruling immediately after on the application under Section 52. That is the point that I wanted to make.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the comments of hon. members. I think we have an arrangement in the House, at least at the moment, and I will deem that the applications are in front of me and I will deal with them at three o'clock this afternoon.

I want to say to hon. members that whatever remarks I have said or any remarks that anybody else has said here today do not stand as any kind of a precedent. I will consider the issue and come back to it. But I think it is fair to comment, and especially for the public watching, that if this were a skilful ploy, the House Leader has made it very clear today that he is not proceeding with that intent. I think the public should know that this matter at least for today has been resolved by agreement between the parties and I thank the hon. member for Kamloops for his suggestion.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed from Monday, January 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-52, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act and related Acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to participate in the debate on Bill C-52. I I suppose when you are looking at legislation and who benefits from the legislation you should send a very clear message. Those people whose incomes are in excess of $85,000 a year and those people who have $10,000, $12,000 or $15,000 cash at the end of the year to set aside for whatever reason ought to be very happy with this government at this point because this legislation is tailored for all of those people whose incomes are in excess of $85,000 or those people who have $10,000 to $15,000 cash lying around at the end of the year to invest in some way.

We are talking about a very select group of Canadians. This legislation is aimed at probably less than 1 per cent of Canadians. The government plans that in its concerns with everything happening in Canada, we now should spend some weeks in the House of Commons debating how to assist those in the upper-income brackets whose incomes are $85,000 and more.

This is occurring at a time when in excess of 1 million people are living in poverty and nearly 1 million people are jobless. There is also an unquestionable crisis in Atlantic Canada and a farm bankruptcy crisis throughout the whole country, particularly in western Canada. There is also a collapsing west coast fishing industry and there are plant closures in all parts of the country, particularly in the industrial heartland of Canada.

In spite of all these issues that are crucial, which in some cases we have all agreed are actually in a crisis situation, the government says it wants to spend some time and help those people who need special assistance, those whose incomes are in excess of $85,000 per year. It reminds us of what the Conservative government's agenda is all about.

We do not spend any time talking about the forest industry. With all due respect to my friend, the minister of forests, who is in the House today and is very concerned about forestry, his cabinet colleagues may not share his same devotion and interest. Do we talk about forestry and the concerns of forestry? No. Do we talk about the concerns of the mining industry? No. Do we talk about the crisis in agriculture? No. Do we talk about the crisis in our export trade? No. Do we talk about the plight being faced by native peoples? No.

We do not talk about the issues facing this country. We are going to talk about assisting those people whose incomes are in excess of $85,000 a year, as if they needed any help. This is absolutely incredible and very embarrassing. I do not know how there are any government members sitting here today who are not just running out and having a cup of coffee to get of here so they do not have to listen to this. How can they seriously proceed here knowing what is going on? Let me get into some details.

Let me first make a slight comment about this legislation that is going to assist the wealthy in the country.

In 1982, the Liberal government carried out a task force on pension reform. It was very critical, very important and was done very seriously. It went across the country, had input and came up with a reasonable report, up to a point. We had to submit, of course, a usual minority statement because there were many parts of it that we did not agree with. The one part we did not agree with most emphatically is what we are dealing with today.

The report suggested that the government introduce legislation as it has done today. But the government has switched from being Liberals to Tories.

In the budget of 1984 introduced by the finance minister of the day, Marc Lalonde, he introduced legislation at that time which is exactly the same as the legislation we are debating today. Perhaps the Liberal mindset has changed since 1984. Perhaps the Liberal view of pension reform has changed. When listening to some of the speeches yesterday, that is one conclusion that I must draw. I can draw others but let us forget that. It is history now. It looks like the Liberals have changed their tune and are also now concerned with what this is going to do in terms of being unprogressive legislation in this country.

This is an appropriate time to deal with so-called pension reform because we all recognize that the population of Canada is aging, that there are problems in terms of people having adequate incomes in their retirement years. We recognize that many senior citizens in this country find themselves living in poverty, in many cases very serious situations of poverty, particularly elderly single women of which there are literally hundreds of thousands living in poverty. Yet this legislation does absolutely nothing that is going to be of any help, assistance or encouragement to those people.

If you are a wealthy senior citizen, or a wealthy person who will soon retire, this is great news because this bill is going to help the wealthiest in Canada at the expense of the poorest. This is dastardly legislation when you consider that fact. Not only is it going to help those who are very wealthy, it is going to harm those who are at the lower end of the income scale.

Let me be specific. By 1995, when the full force of this legislation will be in effect, those people whose incomes are $86,000 will get a tax benefit of $15,000 and a cash benefit of about $7,500. That is a super deal, using the tax system to avoid paying taxes. Of course, when the wealthy do not pay their fair share, we know who has to pay more than their fair share and it is the average working people in this country, once again.

This becomes interesting. Today, if your income is $20,000, you can contribute up to $4,000 to a registered retirement savings plan. However, when this legislation takes effect, by 1995, if you are earning $20,000, you cannot contribute $4,000 into the RRSP, you can only contribute $3,600. This means that those people at the lower end of the income spectrum will be receiving less benefits than they do today and those fortunate folks at the upper income levels will be receiving a much greater benefit than they do today under the present legislation. It just adds to the old theme, the rich get much richer under the Conservative government, and the poor and the middle class gets squeezed once again.

How often do we get squeezed? There is a lot of talk today about this goods and services tax that is going to literally rip the life out of a good part of the country and a good part of Canadians. The other day I went through the list of all the federal tax increases. In the last 12 months the Conservative Government of Canada has increased taxes in 31 different areas, to say nothing about the big goods and services hammer that is about to fall. In 12 months they found 31 different areas where they have raised federal taxes.

That is the theme, but now they say that somebody has to get a tax break in this country. Someone has to get some benefit from the Conservatives being in office. Someone has to get a tax benefit, and who is that going to be? Is it the poor and the lower income people? No. Is it the middle income earner? No. Is it the very wealthy? Ah! That's it, the very wealthy in Canada are going to get a real tax bonanza as a result of this.

This really has nothing to do with pension reform. This has more to do with the Conservative tax reform package because this is all about allowing upper income earners, if you like, to avoid paying income tax. It has nothing to do with helping people with pensions.

If we were serious about helping people with their pensions, we would have introduced legislation that would assist the portability aspect of pensions. Does this legislation have anything to do with pension portability in this country? No, it does not. Does this legislation have anything to do with the fact that 90 per cent of the private pension plans have no indexation built into them? No, it has nothing to do with that.

Does this have anything to do with homemakers' pensions? No, it has nothing to do with that. Is there any element in this bill that would allow those men and women who must remain at home raising children or perhaps caring for elderly or disabled to have a chance for a pension upon retirement? No, not a word.

The only word is that if you are wealthy in this country, you are going to get a tax break on top of all of the tax breaks you already get. That is what this is all about. This is Conservative tax reform, reform of the tax system to help those in the upper income brackets. That has become perfectly clear.

This is going to cost the Canadian government a lot of money. When you give tax breaks to upper income earners, tax money does not come into the federal treasury. That means working Canadians will have to pay more tax. But when you add it up, how much is it going to cost? It depends on which witness you listen to. Some say $500 million a year, some say $350 million a year. The lowest figure I have heard is that it is going to cost $300 million a year. I think the short and long of it is that no one knows for sure, so it is somewhere between $300 and $500 million. That is half a billion dollars that it is going to cost the people of Canada to assist these people in the upper income brackets.

Mr. Speaker, knowing the kind of person you are, I would suggest that it would make more sense to you, if we are going to lose at least $350 million, to take that money and give it to those people, particularly those single, retired elderly women, most of whom are living below the poverty line. We could give every one of them an extra $30 a month.

It may not sound like much to some people, but when you are on that kind of pension, living in poverty, an extra $30 a month would be very welcome. It would make a tremendous difference in the the kind of lives that they have. But, oh no, the government cannot afford that. The government cannot afford to give poor, elderly, retired women an extra $30 a month. But it can afford to give a nice little windfall by allowing those whose incomes are in excess of $86,000 to avoid paying tax on $15,000 or, in other words, a cash benefit of about $7,500. That the government can afford.

Therein lies the Conservative government agenda. Therein lies the theme of what it means to have a Conservative government in Canada. The very wealthy and privileged benefit, the poor become poorer and the middle-class become squeezed more and more in terms of taxes that they must pay and, as a result, their earning power is lessened.

Not only is this unfair to working Canadians, and particularly those Canadians who are at the lower income levels, but it is also unfair to women directly. We recognize from the statistics now available that in 1986 women only earned 57 per cent of what men earned. In other words, on balance women are paid a lot less, which means they have a lot less money at the end of the year to set aside to put into an RRSP, if they have any in savings. I wonder how many people who might be watching or listening today or reading Hansard know of women whose incomes are in excess of $86,000 a year. I think you would have to look long and hard to find those few select women in the country whom this is really going benefit.

I see my friend of long-standing, the chairman of the finance committee, is here. I suspect he is going to stand up shortly and explain why it is so important that those at the upper-income levels receive more tax benefits. He will tell us that if they do not have to pay any income tax, then they will invest in more things and they will buy more and they will help the economy. Well, that is his view of the world, it certainly is not mine.

Let me go on and show you how this is unfair to women. Of those contributing to registered retirement savings plans last year, it turned out that 61 per cent were men and 39 per cent were women. In other words, almost twice as many men take advantage of this rather lucrative tax loophole. Again, obviously there is a bias against women. Sixteen per cent of women tax filers use the RRSP contribution option and 24 per cent of men tax filers use the RRSP contribution. Statistically it becomes clear that it is men, upper income earners, that take advantage of this tax provision, significantly more than women. In a very indirect way there is a real bias against enabling women to provide for their retirement years.

Also in many cases this is biased against small and medium-sized businesses that are trying to establish company pension plans for their employees, because many of them see these now rather lucrative opportunities in terms of the tax loophole system that the Conservative government has introduced and prefer to remove themselves from company pension plans and take advantage of these lucrative opportunities, making it difficult for the small business sector to provide for the employees' retirement.

It was rather funny and I guess we all had a laugh when the government introduced this legislation yesterday. We expected the Minister of Finance to stand up and introduce it because the bill is obviously a piece of legislation to change the tax system to benefit upper income earners. But who was it who introduced the legislation and represented the government? The Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) introduced the legislation, which again betrays the real agenda which is, rather than focus on the Canada Pension Plan and improve that, rather than focus on old age security and improve that, the government is moving towards more privatization of the pension system.

Why would this surprise anybody? We need simply recall that not too many years ago the very first thing the Conservative government tried to do when it became the government was to reduce pensions. That is the very first thing it tried to do. Remember that? I know the chairman of the finance committee remembers those days.

Mr. Boyer: Partial deindexing is not a reduction of pensions.

Mr. Riis: My hon. friend is yelling at me. Let me be more precise. The newly elected Tory government of Canada decided that rather than allow seniors to keep up with inflation, rather than allow seniors to get their regular annual increase, it was going to cap it. In other words, it was going to stop senior citizens from getting what they rightfully deserve each year. They are going to fall behind in terms of purchasing power which is a very real way of cutting the pensions that they would normally have received.

Pensioners across the country rose up and said, "We're not going to take this nonsense from a cruel, abusive government." Enough of them contacted members of Parliament so finally the Prime Minister said, "We can't take this heat. We're going to back off." Then they came in and said, "Listen, we can't have all the senior citizens in Canada getting old age security. If you have saved and planned ahead and scrimped your whole life and planned well for your retirement years, we're not going to give you any pension. We're going to claw it back." That is the terminology that the Minister of Finance used; "We're going to claw back pensions from senior citizens if you provided thoughtfully for your retirement years." They said, "We've got to do this because of the deficit problem."

If the government is going to do that because of the deficit problem, why is it going to give half a billion dollars to the upper income earners of Canada through this legislation? We have to think, "Why are they doing this?" Obviously, the government does not really care about the deficit or else it would not be giving away this freebie to upper income earners.

There was something else and, of course, it was an abandonment of universality. If we can abandon universality when it comes to pensions as they abandon universality when it comes to family allowance, we can then turn this country into a charity country where people have to come and make the case if they are poor enough to get a pension, that they are poor enough to qualify for family allowance. That is the kind of charity, on your knees begging society that we associate with the Conservative government. That is where we are moving.

If the deficit is so serious I hope that the members opposite, when they make their speeches in the next few days on this legislation, will explain why they feel we should be sending $1 billion to the most wealthy of Canadian citizens.

There is so much more to say. Let me simply conclude by looking at statistics that the government has provided about those people who file for RRSP deductions in their tax returns. Hardly any of those people who are low income earners making $10,000 to $15,000 a year in total income use RRSPs. I would say virtually none. However, most people in the $50,000 to $60,000 bracket use RRSPs. Of those who are earning well, particularly the upper income earners, almost all use this tax loophole. Of the low income people, virtually no one uses the tax loophole.

Let us be honest now. This legislation is designed for a very select, specific, privileged group in our society, those people who earn good incomes, and particularly those people earning incomes over $86,000 a year.

I rest my case, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the House leader of the New Democratic Party has given us a number of reasons why this bill ought to spend some considerable time being studied by committee; because of the tax deferral nature of the bill and because it is probably one of the most complicated pieces of legislation to come before the House for as very long period of time.

In that regard he will know that both the Liberal party and the government wanted the matter to come to the finance committee but for some reason the New Democratic Party decided it would like the matter to be filibustered in the House for awhile and then go to a legislative committee where there really would be no opportunity, under the rules, for a complete analysis of the nature and quality of the tax deferral system.

I was wondering why he would want to handle the matter in that fashion. Would he not agree with me that this bill ought to have very thorough consideration and ought to be subject to witnesses from various associations such as the Canadian Teachers' Association who are upset about the nature of this kind of legislation because, as he may know, it minimizes their potential pensions.

Would he not be interested in the problem that this legislation minimizes the transfer from one tax deferral scheme to another? Would he not want that very complicated financial legislation analysed in such a way where the committee could employ independent actuarial help? It cannot do that under the standing orders governing a legislative committee.

I was wondering why he had in mind taking the position he has taken so far in this debate.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, that is a very thoughtful question by the chairman of the finance committee.

He said at the beginning of his remarks that the opposition is filibustering this debate. We have had five or six speeches, from 295 members of Parliament, on what he describes as incredibly important legislation that has financial implications that are very significant and that will touch the lives of millions of people. He is saying that we are filibustering because five members of Parliament have wanted to discuss this matter.

That betrays an attitude that concerns me. It betrays an attitude of the government that says that any debate, any discussion, any examination, any analysis is too much, and for most of its policy I can understand why it would not want any examination or study. We saw that with the goods and services tax. They went to my own province of British Columbia and said, "This is going to affect the lives of every British Columbian for years and decades and we are going to allow about eight hours of hearings in British Columbia so that a handful of people could appear before the finance committee." That is their idea of input and discussion and consultation. It is an abuse of this place and the traditions associated with it.

Having said that, I am just registering my concern because we have seen this from time to time. When a matter is referred to a committee the government uses its muscle in terms of its majority and we see the tyranny of the majority say, "We don't need any witnesses, we are going to ramrod this legislation through and we will use our majority muscle to do that", and the opposition parties are simply cut out.

That is not the way Parliament is supposed to work, but unfortunately that is the way the Conservative government has worked too often.

My hon. friend has indicated today in the House of Commons that if this matter is referred to the finance committee it will have an opportunity to hear an appropriate number of witnesses, that it will take considerable time to analyse all of the implications involved. That probably takes a number of days of discussion beyond the witnesses. And my hon. friend nods in agreement.

I realize that a considerable amount of expertise exists on the finance committee. I recognize that my hon. friend for Yorkton—Melville has worked on that committee and on this piece of legislation. My hon. colleague for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt will be participating. I feel confident, recognizing their contributions to this legislation and to the debate so far, that their contributions, along with those of appropriate witnesses, would be best. I am certainly prepared, on behalf of my caucus, to say that with those assurances of adequate witnesses, adequate time spent and adequate resource people being involved, we would have no difficulty in seeing this go to the Standing Committee on Finance.

I want to make it clear that I understand that my hon. colleague for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt has communicated with my hon. friend, the chairman of the finance committee, and indicated our concerns and I understand that he is prepared to agree that all of these terms be met. If that is the case, we would have no hesitation in sending this piece of legislation to the appropriate committee which is the finance committee.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kamloops has made a very able speech and I congratulate him on his presentation. He speaks with great clarity and obviously he feels strongly on this subject. But I want to give him a chance to correct something on the record because I know he would not want to mislead either the House or Canadians by his suggestion in his speech dealing with the tax bonanza that he suggests is reaped by those who take advantage of the RRSP deduction, even in its existing form, let alone in the expanded version that the government is proposing in this bill.

I think he is aware that registered retirement savings plans represent deferral of tax. The person who makes the claim for the deduction pays no tax on the money but the money then goes into a special fund and is taxed when it comes out of that fund and is received by the person who put it in. In other words, it is a deferral of tax on that income which is allowed to grow in that fund. The depositor is hopeful that by retirement the fund is quite large. As the money is paid out to the recipient, the person who created the fund, it is then taxed in that person's hands.

I would not want the hon. member to suggest that this is a complete tax bonanza for the well-to-do. The money will be taxed eventually, I think he will admit that. I just did not want to leave the record blemished in that respect. I know that the hon. member was not trying to suggest that this was a complete saving of tax. I think he is, in effect, acknowledging it is a deferral and I just want him to clarify that.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am not certain that there is a point there to clarify. Let me make it very clear that when you have a tax concession that benefits fewer than 1 per cent of the people of Canada, who happen to be the most privileged group in the country as per our tax system anyway, perhaps tax bonanza is not the best term. I suppose "an exceptionally good deal for the wealthiest of Canada" would be a more appropriate phrase.

I think that if my hon. friend was to ask his tax accountant or his tax adviser, having deferred all of these taxes for perhaps many years, at a time, I might add, when your income will probably be less than it is today and consequently you would be paying tax at a lesser rate—

Mr. Milliken: Unless I am clawed back.

Mr. Riis: Unless you are clawed back, yes. There are ways and means of perhaps moving to a different jurisdiction for your retirement years. Having deferred taxes for a number years you might find that a relocation for your retirement years to a certain country would enable you to not only receive the income which you have deferred, but pay no taxes on that income as well.

I am just saying that by using creative accounting and creative tax planning those people who are most able to afford that kind of advice may find ways and means of actually avoiding paying tax completely. I think the point is well taken. Perhaps it was not as clear as I could have made it, but I am glad to have had a chance to clarify the point I was making; perhaps not a tax bonanza, but an incredibly good tax deal for those who need it least.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bird): The hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bird): The hon. member for Mississauga on a point of order.

Mr. Blenkarn: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Normally, the opposition speaks, then the government speaks. The government has not had an opportunity to speak on this bill for some time. The bill has been carried by the opposition. I was wondering whether my hon. friend would allow me to make a very short intervention right now, largely so that the members of the New Democratic Party would be able to ask me some questions in the ten-minute question period allowed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bird): I do not consider that a point of order and I call on the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James on debate.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, normally I would have acquiesced, I would have acceded to that request, but I am already late for lunch with a certain gentleman from the Montreal area who has great aspirations for this country. I am going to have to try to explain why I am already late for lunch. But normally I certainly would have acceded to the request.

I am delighted to take part in this debate on Bill C-52. I particularly enjoy rising after the presentation by the hon. member for Kamloops. After all, he is very articulate and very good on his feet. He is a smart fellow and I particularly enjoyed the exchange between the hon. member for Kamloops and the chairman of the House of Commons finance committee.

I must say that I was taken aback a little by the chairman's comments about desiring further examination, a detailed analysis of Bill C-52. I think that is a very good idea because, after all, this is an extremely complex bill and it will have an impact on thousands and thousands of Canadians. But I am compelled to ask whether some kind of a change has come over the chairman of the House of Commons committee and all government members? They have not exhibited a great desire in this Parliament for a detailed analysis of anything. In fact, what government in the history of Parliament has used closure more than this government? What government has used the time allocation measure more than this government? What government has choked off public hearings, presentations and briefing on certain issues more than this government?

Right now we have a committee of the Senate visiting Atlantic Canada. It is doing that because this government has not allowed public expression and presentations with respect to the unemployment insurance issue. So I must say that I am a little surprised when I hear the chairman of the House of Commons finance committee making this strong pitch for analysis. But maybe it is a genuine change and if so I welcome it.

I do want to see Bill C–52 go to a committee, be it a legislative committee or a standing committee. I want it to go to a committee as soon as possible because there is a lot of work and study to be done here. This is a very complex and technical bill. As I said, it is going to have an impact on thousands and thousands of Canadians. We need the public input.

I got some idea of how Canadians feel about this when we Liberal members from Manitoba held day long hearings on proposed possible pension reforms last summer. We were deluged. People really care about this kind of an issue because it permeates our lives. We work for a certain time and then, if we are lucky and if we have good health, we retire and go on pension. We need a kind of income that will support us with some kind of dignity. Hopefully, most of us will have a standard of living that is not that far removed from the kind of standard of living we had when we were working.

I want to see this bill examined as thoroughly as possible. I would hope that if it does indeed go to a legislative committee, as I would expect, that the government majority would not use its majority to choke off briefings, to choke off presentations. Let us get a good airing out of this issue. Let us hear from Canadians because I know that they have a lot to say.

I would like to enter into the record in a few minutes a letter that I received from a constituent which deals with a particular provision in Bill C–52. But I will get to that in a moment.

I think that what I want to say now, and it is all part and parcel of this particular debate on Bill C–52, has to do with how Canadians feel about their federal government right now, how Canadians feel about their country as a whole. You know, Mr. Speaker, I, like the rest of the 294 MPs in this House, have just come off the Christmas–New Year break, if you can call it a break. I think most of us worked out of our riding offices.

During that break we had the opportunity to listen and to hear from a lot of constituents. The message that I get when I talk to constituents is that something has gone wrong in this country, something is amiss. They use that old expression, "There is something rotten in Denmark". You can change the name Denmark to Canada.

I think that there is a growing number of Canadians who are feeling and saying that there is something wrong in this country. We are on the wrong tracks. We are going in the wrong direction. Things are beginning to unravel. They are coming apart. We are beginning to lose the institutions that we worked so darn hard for some many years to build up, institutions that have served this country for so long and so well and we now see them coming apart at the seams.

Canadians are not stupid. They are not stupid. They are very astute. They can see it. They tell us that over and over again. They have not got a full grasp of it all yet, but they are getting there. I think they are getting right down to the nub of it.

I say to the members on the other side, if they are not listening, and listening very closely, they are going to find themselves in deep, deep trouble. Maybe a lot of us would not really care about those people on that side being in deep, deep trouble, but we all care about our country.

This government was not elected to carry out some kind of revolution, and I mean that sincerely. This government was not elected to carry out a revolution. But what do we see?

We see the decimation of VIA Rail. Were the government members elected to decimate VIA Rail? Not on your life, Mr. Speaker. I do not remember them saying much about doing away with 51 per cent of the routes. They did not say anything like that back in the 1988 election campaign.

What did they say about the GST? They did not say a heck of a lot, did they, back in the election campaign? They talked about what? The second phase of tax reform. Some tax reform! It is not tax reform at all. It is a tax grab. Do you know what, Mr. Speaker? This government was not elected to impose this kind of monstrous tax grab. It was not elected to bring in the clawback. It was not elected to attack seniors in that particular way.

Its members did not do it. They did not say that during the election campaign, but they have done it.

They were not elected to make those changes to the unemployment insurance scheme, those changes which are going to have such horrendous effects on Atlantic Canada in particular.

This government was not elected to wreck the fishery, despite the fact that the Prime Minister says there is no crisis in Atlantic Canada. Well, there is a crisis in Atlantic Canada. You cannot separate the fishery from the rest of the economy in Atlantic Canada. If there is a crisis in the fishery in Atlantic Canada, then there is a crisis right across Atlantic Canada. It is as plain as the noses on our faces.

This government was not elected to unravel or to tear apart rural Canada. All you have to do is go back to my home country, whether it is the province of Manitoba, or the province of Saskatchewan or Alberta and you can see how rural Canada is coming apart. This government has to address many of those issues.

As I said, this government was not elected to carry out some kind of a revolution. It was elected to be pragmatic, realistic and responsible and to deal with the issues of the day and not to proceed along some right-wing agenda, to proceed along some ideological path. That is not what this Conservative government was elected for. Canadians are practical people. They are realistic people. They are pragmatic people. They are responsible people. That is what they want the government to do, not this silly nonsense the government has embarked on ever since the beginning of this Parliament.

I want to deal with a couple of provisions in Bill C-52. I think that the complexities and the technicalities of the bill should be left to the committee. I think we MP's should be dealing with the politics of the bill and the politics of the issues around this bill.

There is the matter of the roll-over of pension income into RRSPs that will not be allowed any more under this bill. This is going to have an impact on a number of senior citizens. It is something that they have become accustomed to over the past few years, and now they are going to lose it. They are going to feel it. I have had a number of calls and a number of letters with respect to this particular provision.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read into the record one of the letters that I received just the other day. As I say, the letter is from a constituent. It goes like this:

> Dear Mr. Harvard:
> I would like to bring to your attention a predicament that the recent legislation prohibiting monthly pension payments to be transferred to RRSP's has put me into. I am now being forced to withdraw my Federal Government pension allowance (at age 57) when the intention was to withdraw my pension funds at a pensionable age. The situation is as follows:

I want to read this letter because I think it pretty well sums up the kind of predicament this gentleman is in. I am sure there are a lot of other Canadians who find themselves in the same kind of situation. The letter continues:

> In July 1962, I joined the Department of Veterans' Affairs, Treatment Branch as a Clinical Chemist—at Deer Lodge Hospital in Winnipeg.

That is in my riding, by the way.

> Negotiations to transfer the hospital from Federal to Provincial jurisdiction were completed in 1982 and the transfer was effective April 1, 1983. In preparation for the transfer all positions in the hospital were reviewed to determine whether the new facility required all these positions to carry out its objectives. Positions no longer required were termed "surplus" and my position as clinical chemist became "surplus".
> In the months preceding transfer, all employees were counselled by Federal Government Employees from Ottawa as to their rights and advised regarding any decisions to be made. In my case, the major decision was what to do with my superannuation. I was aged 51 years at the time, too young to receive an annuity (an unreduced pension) and had to choose between receiving an allowance (a reduced pension due to age or length of service) or deferring my annuity until of pension age. Upon the advice of the counsellor—

• (1240)

I should add the interjection that this counsellor worked for the federal government.

> Upon the advice of the counsellor I chose to receive the allowance (with a 45 per cent reduction due to my age) and transfer it directly to an RRSP. The reason for doing so was that a deferred annuity while not increasing would pay only 6 per cent interest while RRSP funds would probably grow at a higher rate of interest and not be subject to tax as income until retirement age. I have continued to transfer my monthly pension allowance to RRSP until now when I am being forced to withdraw it, add it to my current income and pay a high income tax rate on it.

I will not read the other paragraphs of the letter. I think you get the gist of the man's grievance.

What the man in effect is saying is that he sort of bought into a deal. He bought into a deal or a bargain. He negotiated with the government and thought he was doing it honourably. He decided that it was in his best interests to retire early, take an early pension and roll over the pension moneys into an RRSP. That was the plan.

The other party to this deal, if I can call it that, was the federal government. He finds now that the federal government, in essence, has decided to unilaterally change the deal. He will not be able to do this any more. This constituent feels aggrieved. He feels that something is just not right. I think it is an issue that the committee is going to have to look at very seriously. It is a microcosm of the larger issue, the larger issue being whether government can change some of these schemes after certain solemn promises have been made in years past.

For example, many Canadians back in the fifties and sixties were contributing to the old age pension plan. You will recall contributions to the old age pension plan came directly out of your tax payments. I think at that time Canadians thought that by paying into an old age pension plan they would get it all. They felt that was part of the bargain. It is similar to buying life insurance. If the life insurance company promises you $1,000 a month, that is what you are going to get. The value of $1,000 may not be as much when you finally get the money but it will be $1,000.

I think there are Canadians who feel that something has gone wrong with the system. I think this issue in particular has to be looked at very seriously when this bill goes to the legislative committee.

Another thing I wanted to mention was the other provision which reduces the amount that can be contributed to an RRSP. Up until now it has been 20 per cent of earnings. Now that is going to be reduced to 18 per cent. Take the ordinary working person who may be making $25,000 a year. It is going to hurt that particular worker. This is another provision of Bill C-52 which should be explored very seriously when it goes before the committee.

I hope the Conservatives listen to the chairman of the House of Commons committee very seriously when he says that he wants a detailed and comprehensive analysis. That is exactly what this bill will get because it needs it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bird): Are there questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Malpeque.

Ms. Callbeck: Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with interest to the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James. I was particularly interested in a letter which he read into the record that he received from one of his constituents concerning the roll over of monthly pension into the RRSP. I am just wondering how widespread this problem is in Canada. I would like to ask the hon. member if he has heard from other constituents on this matter. I would like him to comment on that.

Mr. Harvard: I thank the hon. member from Malpeque for that question, Mr. Speaker. I say that because in my opinion this problem is quite widespread. I have heard from a number of constituents on this very issue.

Let me just tell you about one particular call I received from a woman who identified herself as 66 years of age, single and on pension. I do not remember how long she has been on pension, but she has had this privilege of taking the pension money and rolling it over into an RRSP. Now she cannot do that.

I asked her the question: "You are a woman of 66 already on pension, why would you want to roll your pension money over? Why would you not just want to spend it? Why would you want to put it into an RRSP which is a form of saving?". I thought her answer was quite revealing. She said: "I want to put it into an RRSP. I want to save it. I want to put it away for the future because I do not know what the future holds. I do not know whether the pension benefits I now receive will be good enough to meet the cost of living five or ten years down the road". She asked the question: "What if I live to age 80 or 85, will my pension be good enough? Will it be plentiful enough to meet the cost of living when I reach that age?" I think that is a very legitimate concern on her part.

These people do not want to go on welfare. They do not want to be a burden on anybody else. They want to stand on their own two feet. If that means that they can put a little bit of money aside now, even if it is pension money, they want to do that because there is that so-called rainy day. They want to be ready for that rainy day. I think that woman is typical of responsible Canadians who are thinking about the future, who are thinking about tomorrow. We should have a lot of time for people like that.

When Bill C-52 goes before the committee those are the kinds of issues we should be addressing. These people are not crackpots. These are solid Canadian citizens with legitimate concerns. They are not greedy. They are not self-centred. They just want to conduct their lives in a very responsible way. Of course, and it is understandable, they do not want to see their standard of living decrease. All they have to do is look around and see the cost of living, inflation and the rise in taxes. The cost of living is going up all the time. It is a legitimate concern they have.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, just a comment on the reference that the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James made to the way in which the government is breaking the deal which was implicitly struck with many pensioners who retired with a certain understanding of what would be available to them when they retired, whether it was in the way of RRSP options, or for that matter the OAS.

I rise to comment on this because I recall when the Conservatives were in opposition they made a very big deal out of any actions by the Liberal government of that day which, in their judgment, were seen to be unilateral changes in what they understood to be agreements between the business community and the government.

I remember a great many Conservative members of Parliament being exceedingly indignant about the fact that the Liberal government of the day would abrogate certain tax agreements or other agreements that might be in place. This was regarded as a heinous crime by the opposition Conservatives at that time. Yet, in government, they seem to have no qualms whatever about breaking unilaterally longstanding agreements, longstanding understandings, that have existed between Canadian citizens and the government with respect to old age pensions, with respect to RRSPs, with respect to unemployment insurance, with respect to federal support for health care and post-secondary education—with respect to any number of things that affect the lives of average Canadians. This government has had no qualms in acting unilaterally to violate longstanding agreements between the Canadian people and their government.

I find it hypocritical in the extreme that the government members should be so willing to do this while not so long ago they made a career out of criticizing unilateral government action.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bird): Do I have unanimous consent to call it one o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bird): It being 1 p.m., I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 12.51 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. 0. 31

[English]

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, today another American cruise missile is being tested in the Canadian north. Northerners have repeatedly expressed their opposition to this testing. We protest again today.

Northern opposition to these tests is long standing and consistent. Both the legislatures of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories have passed resolutions opposing continued cruise missile testing over northern lands, waters and communities.

A growing number of Canadians view the continued testing of these missiles in this country as being inconsistent with recent improvements in the climate of international peace and security.

Positive developments in central and eastern Europe have opened up opportunities for western peace initiatives. Canada can make a valuable contribution to steadily improving east-west relations by rejecting further cruise missile testing over our north.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, every year since 1985 this government has been promising a disaster program for farmers. There is no mention of such a program in the crop insurance legislation that was introduced last month. There does not seem to have been any serious discussion with the provinces. Ad hoc programs have been used recently for drought and flooding.

I urge the government and its Alberta counterparts to provide assistance immediately to farmers with snow covered crops in the Peace River block.

I realize this will cost money and Conservatives want to cut their spending on agriculture. Cuts have been made to fuel tax rebates, research and crop insurance. There is no more two-price wheat or interest-free cash advances. There is no more special grains program, even though U.S. efforts to force down world grain prices are being stepped up.

About 300,000 acres of crop lie under the snow in northern Alberta. Some may yet be salvaged, but all farmers will lose a great deal of money due to the rain and snow during harvest. These farmers need action from this government now.

THE CHILDREN'S WISH FOUNDATION OF CANADA

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, last November I had the pleasure of visiting the well-known Children's Wish Foundation in Quebec City, whose headquarters are located in my riding.

Mr. Speaker, I must admit I was very moved to see how some people were able to make dreams come true for children who are terminally ill, doing so with minimal financial resources.

Fulfilling these dreams is not easy. It takes a lot of love, dedication and determination, and it is being done by volunteers who work very hard for these children who are becoming increasingly helpless. Mr. Speaker, we all have basic needs that must be met, children most of all.

The two people who started this dream project, Edith and Pierre Letarte, deserve our admiration for the warmth and comfort they offer the children and, through them, their parents.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I would urge people who have a few hours or a few dollars to spare to give generously and make this dream part of their lives as well.

ROMANIA

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have recently returned from a trip to Romania sponsored by the Unitarian Universalist Church. We found there a courageous people who are determined that the thousands who have martyred themselves to overthrow the vicious and sadistic reign of Ceausescu shall not have died in vain.

Romanians need our help to re-enter the world they had been shut out of. No other East Bloc nation has suffered so much or been so sadly deprived of basic human rights.

I strongly urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the cabinet to offer generous support and assistance to the Romanian people and to the interim government in the implementation of their 10-point program.

We should also clearly indicate that long-term aid and trade relations will be subject to the implementation of democracy and the adherence to international human rights treaties.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, last evening I met with 75 Iranian exiles currently participating in a world-wide hunger strike protesting human rights violations in Iran, this at a time when the United Nations representative, Mr. Pohl, is presently in Iran to investigate charges of widespread torture and execution of political prisoners.

Reportedly more than 90,000 Iranian political prisoners, including juveniles, have been executed in the past eight years. Last year alone one mass execution claimed the lives of 12,000.

Amnesty International wrote in its Iran briefing that "Iranian courts impose amputations and floggings as punishments—punishments which contravene human rights standards by their cruelty and inhumanity."

Over the past year, the advancement of personal rights and freedoms has been at the forefront of world news.

The 75 Canadian citizens of Iranian origin are pointing out that Iran is a country where human rights are virtually non-existent. They are in solidarity with political prisoners and the oppressed people of Iran. Their action should be commended, while at the same time the Canadian government must express in the strongest terms possible our grave concerns over the human rights violations in their homeland.

POLITICAL SITUATION IN HAITI

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, we heard with some consternation about recent events in Haiti. Political leaders, party leaders and journalists have been brutalized and deported without any regard for the most basic human rights and their rights under the Haitian Constitution. We are particularly concerned about these events because this government, coming after previous governments that had been compromised by acts of repression, had promised on a number of occasions that it would not only respect human rights but also work towards establishing a democratic government in this country by holding honest and free elections.

Mr. Speaker, our relations with Haiti and the size of the Haitian community in our country require us to be particularly attentive to developments in this country. That is why we appeal to the Canadian government to do everything in its power to ensure that minimum standards of safety and democracy are restored in Haiti as soon as possible.

FISHERIES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I stated in this House that an Atlantic fishing company faced economic disaster because the minister of fisheries delayed authorizing the company's application to lease an American vessel.

Today the news is even worse. The unofficial word—and we have had no official word—is that the minister has refused the application.

Also, today, Mr. Jim Redmond, a representative of S. Stewart Fisheries, the company attempting to lease this American vessel, flew to Ottawa to speak with the minister. His efforts have proven to be as fruitless as getting the lease authorization.

Every level of government has approved the lease, including the minister's own department, but the minister turned it down. The minister has approved the use of Soviet vessels to fish Canadian quotas but will not approve Halifax fishermen. He has approved Cubans and Russians to fish Canadian quotas but will not approve nine Canadians to fish their own quotas.

The word to Mr. Redmond and his crew is that they should get a Newfoundland longliner when what they have is an enterprise allocation for a dragger.

This minister's lack of understanding of the east coast fishery is beyond belief. It is not something that Nova Scotians and Atlantic Canadians can take any longer. We need some action, we need it today, and we need to send Mr. Redmond and his crew back to work.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the prairie grain sector continues to suffer as a result of the ongoing subsidy wars between the United States and the EEC.

Projections now indicate a negative net income for Saskatchewan grain farmers this year. In other words, producers will not even have enough money to pay for the costs of operating a farm, let alone meeting their own family living expenses.

There is no cash flow in the grain growing areas at the present time. Many businesses in the villages, towns and cities which rely on farm customers are closing their doors.

Prairie farmers can compete very well against the rest of the world. They cannot compete against the treasuries of the governments of the United States and Europe.

Prairie grain farmers must have help in two ways. They require cash now in order to be able to seed a crop this spring. In the longer term they need a contributory long-term income assurance plan.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday at McGill University in Montreal over 150 business, academic and political leaders attended a colloque to express support for the Meech Lake Accord.

From the opening remarks of Bob Rae to the closing speech of Bob Stanfield, those present heard strong pleas for active support. Roy McMurtry spoke of the need for understanding and collaboration. Ed Broadbent recalled the 1980 to 1982 constitutional debate with all the concessions which were made, except to Quebec.

Gilles Remillard, Quebec's intergovernmental affairs minister, expressed the need for a strong, federal government. My colleague, the member for Shefford, spoke passionately of the importance of the accord for Quebec and Canada.

I was very encouraged and impressed by the commitment and the constructive approach taken by all participants.

The all day event ended with an unanimous resolution urging the first ministers and all governments of Canada to take the necessary steps to ensure the passage of the accord and to commit themselves formally to a process for further constitutional renewal.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, 20 years ago as a young law student I was privileged to take VIA's train, The Canadian, westward to Vancouver to start a new life. Last week I was also privileged as a member of Parliament to be on the last Canadian to come east.

The Canadian has been running since 1955. It is the direct successor of the first transcontinental which pulled into Port Moody in July, 1886. It takes the southern route through Banff, Calgary, Regina, and back east. It is gone now. I have 40,000 petitions collected by passengers and workers on VIA Rail. I propose to give them to the Minister of Transport later this week.

I want to thank Jerry Doyle, MLA; Ed Tchorzewski, MLA; Gary Doer, our leader in Manitoba; and my colleague, the member for Winnipeg—Transcona for piggy-backing these petitions across the country.

It was a magnificent run—to wake up in the Rockies, to see the quiet, calm Canada. Our young people are going to miss that. This government has taken us from the last spike to the last straw. We have to start this train up again for young Canadians, not just for rich tourists.

ALITALIA AIRLINES

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to condemn Alitalia, which as a result of administrative restructuring and financial problems, may have to close shop in Montreal, transferring all its business to Toronto.

Thirty-two years after coming to Montreal, Alitalia may cancel its only weekly flight out of Mirabel and concentrate exclusively on its Toronto customers, which also means it might close its head office on Peel Street in Montreal, which has a staff of 100 employees.

This means Alitalia will abandon Quebec, Mirabel, Eastern Canada, the Quebec business community and an Italian community that is 325,000 strong, a community that is very active and has been loyal since the very beginning when there were up to seven flights weekly.

After a meeting in Rome with Alitalia executives and the survival committee, I realized that Alitalia sees Canada the way Jean Chrétien does: a Canada without Quebec! We won't stand for that!

I want to ask my colleagues, the Ministers responsible for External Affairs and Transport, to immediately review our bilateral agreements, which go back to 1972, and see whether Alitalia has always respected these agreements in the past, in Canada, and ensure that it undertakes to do so in the future.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, two months before the last election the West German firm Thyssen AG announced plans to build a $58 million manufacturing plant at Bear Head in Cape Breton.

This plant was to produce armoured personnel carriers and environmental equipment. Some 500 people would be directly employed and another 800 indirectly employed at this facility. What the company needed and was encouraged by the federal government would be forthcoming was an opportunity to bid on a contract to build armoured personnel vehicles for our Armed Forces. They are still waiting for this opportunity.

Meanwhile, skilled workers from my riding where the unemployment rate in 1989 was 17.7 per cent are forced to leave Atlantic Canada because there are no jobs for them; 17,346 Atlantic Canadians lost their job or suffered a work reduction since the November 1988 election. Defence cuts in Atlantic Canada alone mean that as many as 1,700 jobs could be lost.

Yet, while promising to slash defence spending in order to reduce the federal deficit, this government awarded last summer a $110 million contract sole source to General Motors in London, Ontario to build light armoured vehicles. The unemployment rate there was 4.4 per cent.

Where is the economic justice? When is the Prime Minister going to wake up to the fact that there is an economic crisis in Atlantic Canada and it is one of his government's own making? If his government is going to—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, throughout the Christmas recess I talked to a number of my constituents in Sarnia—Lambton about the proposed goods and services tax.

For example, on January 9, I met with an attentive and inquisitive group of municipal contractors and suppliers. When the meeting began, the mood was one of simple opposition and a little apprehension.

Yet, as we talked and I answered a number of general and technical questions, the mood changed drastically. These representatives of both small and medium sized business developed a better understanding and appreciation for the GST system. Most now knew what would be taxed and what would not, what input tax credits could mean to their business in a positive way, what their filing requirements might be, and how the GST package minimizes their administration and compliance costs.

This is the type of discussion which should be occurring all across the country. The replacement of a tax system is not simple or straightforward.

Therefore it is essential that all members of the House, including those opposite, present their constituents with as much unbiased and pertinent information on the GST as possible. It is only from this type of knowledge base that Canadians can form a rational and informed opinion.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

On December 18 last in this House, the Prime Minister said that his government—and I am using his words—"would be assisting the Atlantic fishery and the communities affected as vigorously as we intervened on behalf of the prairie farmers". Those were his words at that time, just before Christmas.

No such program has been announced. All there has been is a certain recycling of money that would have been spent in any event had there been no crisis at all and no lay-offs.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister led everyone in this House and in the country to believe that there would not be any such program when he said that "there is no crisis in Atlantic Canada".

Why has the Prime Minister not kept his commitment to Atlantic Canadians? Why does he continue to break his promises to the less favoured areas of our country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend, I am sure, would be aware that with regard to the crisis in the fishery in Atlantic Canada we responded immediately to the lay-off announcements last month and earlier this month.

We brought forward a package valued at $130 million which includes programs of industrial assistance, a program for older workers and a Community Futures program. Areas selected for the special programs include Grand Banks and Trepassey in Newfoundland and Guysborough County, Nova Scotia, including Canso.

Among the available options in regard to the $130 million are small business development assistance for new entrepreneurs, skills training and relocation assistance. A Community Futures committee is to be set up in each community to assess their needs and select from an appropriate range of program options.

This is the first step in a series of initiatives that are required both internationally and domestically in co-operation with provincial governments, the unions and the industry to make sure that the crisis that does exist in the Atlantic fishery is dealt with in a comprehensive and I think a generous manner. That is what we did in other areas of the national economy such as agriculture, and we will do no less for the Atlantic fishery.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, why does the Prime Minister not recognize, as his Minister for International Trade has already admitted, that any subsidies accorded to the fishery in Atlantic Canada to meet this crisis would be countervailable as an unfair trading practice under the terms of the agreement signed between him and the President of the United States?

Will the Prime Minister explain to the people of Canada why and which subsidies are no longer possible as a result of his having signed that agreement with the United States?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the subsidies to which my right hon. friend refers have absolutely nothing to do with the free trade agreement. My right hon. friend knows full well that the reference is made to the GATT, which itself has the kinds of rules and limitations with which the right hon. gentleman ought to be familiar.

I point out to him, in regard to the kinds of initiatives that can be taken throughout Atlantic Canada that, for example, since February 15, 1988, ACOA has approved in Atlantic Canada 6,966 projects. It has committed $670 million in federal support and leveraged $1.8 billion in total investment, creating 18,000 new jobs in Atlantic Canada.

That is perhaps why this morning Premier Frank McKenna, the Leader of the Government of New Brunswick, said this, which I would like to put it on the record for my right hon. friend. I quote: "New Brunswick's economy is not in a crisis. Certainly we are having some short-term difficulty with the fish industry particularly and it's slightly softening the economy but it's not in a state of crisis".

This is the point that I have been trying to make. I believe it is a legitimate one. There is a very serious crisis in the fishery. There are other areas of Atlantic Canada where the progress is strong and certain. Let us keep building on those areas of strength and let us work with all to make sure that those in the fishery come out of this crisis.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that kind of smug talk is no consolation to the fishermen of Atlantic Canada.

I would like to quote another premier and his own Minister for International Trade when they ruled out government subsidies for fishing plants in Newfoundland because any such deal could be challenge by United States fish companies as unfair competition under the free trade agreement. Mr. Speaker, I continue in this vein.

One of the consequences of the Free Trade Agreement with the United States is that we can no longer ensure that the fish we catch are processed in our own plants. By giving up our right to levy an export tax, we have also given up our right under GATT to protect our processing plants. Will the Prime Minister finally admit that is the case?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is barking up the wrong tree. We are not talking about the Free Trade Agreement, we are talking about a regulation under the GATT. When it suits the Liberal Party, they tell us to follow GATT. When it doesn't suit them, they tell us to set aside the regulations of this international body. And I would like to conclude with this morning's CBC commentary on this particular point. I am quoting the CBC and not Premier McKenna. The CBC said this:

[English]

"Premier Frank McKenna says New Brunswick's economy is far from being in a state of crisis. He was responding to comments made during a debate in the House of Commons yesterday. Opposition MPs said the Atlantic provinces were in an economic crisis because of the collapse of the fishery. McKenna says there are problems but describing the situation as a crisis is going too far".

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Prime Minister and the Premier, Mr. McKenna, that the ground fishery is in trouble and it is critical. It is a major problem of this government's making.

How can the Prime Minister stand there when 46 per cent of the value of a billion dollar industry is in trouble and this government does nothing? How can he say there is no crisis in the Atlantic provinces when so many people are out of work because the policy has not changed and the direction that he is giving Atlantic Canada has not changed? There is a crisis in the ground fishery.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made precisely the point that I sought to make yesterday. I was being howled down by her members, but now she agrees that indeed while there is a crisis in the Atlantic fishery, as I said yesterday, there is as Premier McKenna said no crisis throughout all of the other areas of industrial endeavour in Atlantic Canada.

It is important that Liberals stop saying there is a crisis, trumpetting gloom and doom thereby driving away investment that is coming to Atlantic Canada.

New Brunswick, for example, led all of the Canadian provinces last year in growth in investment, with a 24 per cent increase. There were substantial increases elsewhere.

Prince Edward Island has a balanced budget. There are good areas of economic growth throughout Atlantic Canada. Let us work together to make them better and let us resolve in a very serious and thoughtful way the crisis in the Atlantic fishery.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. I say to him that this is a crisis in one sector. It is a renewable resource. This government has not improved on it since 1981. It was a $1 billion industry then, and it is still a $1 billion industry. When is he going to intervene and say that the policy he has taken on, that the private sector can handle this problem in the industry, is not effective? There has to be government intervention instead of whitewashing it and saying there will be help. This government is doing nothing.

There is no food on the table for people who are unemployed in Atlantic Canada. Come to Digby and talk to the people who were laid off last week because of this government's policy. Go to Lockeport. Go talk to the people.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there have been many improvements with respect to the Atlantic fishery since 1984, including the fact that the giveaway—

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Name them. Name them in the ground fishery. Talk to the lobster people.

Mr. Riis: She said '81, John.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member believes that the Liberals have been out of power since 1981. Actually, it is only since 1984, although to them it appears like 1981.

One of the improvements made in the Atlantic fishery since 1984 has been the decision of the government to end the European communities taking 9,500 tonnes of northern cod from the area known as 2J3KL which was terminated. This giveaway of fish by the previous Liberal government has been stopped. That is just one of the many improvements made since 1984.

There is now a $130 million program in effect to assist those who may be laid off by the closure of plants in certain communities. As the hon. member will know, some of those communities have been given the notice of a year and a half in order to try to get ready for the consequences of a close down, including community development funds and assistance for those who are over the age of 50.

An Hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Crosbie: I could go on, but somebody calls out "order" in the NDP. They never want to hear the good and positive side of anything.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister suggested that vocal concern about the economy of the Atlantic provinces was undermining investor confidence in the region. That is not the case. This government could not care less what happens to the people in the Atlantic region. As plants are closing down, these people are losing their paycheques, but what does the government do? It cuts unemployment insurance and regional development programs!

When will the Prime Minister go and see for himself what is happening and announce aid programs that will give these people a better future?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government, as the minister indicated, has already announced a support program for workers in the Atlantic region. This is the first action we have taken, but we are talking about a $130 million program with several components providing direct aid to workers and their families as well as to the affected communities. There are other possibilities, both nationally and internationally, that the government can consider to improve the situation of fishermen in the Atlantic region.

In the weeks to come, we will probably be announcing a number of initiatives to improve the circumstances of these fishermen.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Leader of the New Democratic Party said that the Atlantic region was in a state of crisis, which was categorically denied this morning by the Premier of New Brunswick, Mr. McKenna. I urge those deploring certain economic situations to avoid generalizing so as not to disturb investor confidence. We want to protect investment in the Atlantic region. We don't want to cause a panic.

I would ask the Leader of the New Democratic Party to help us create more jobs in the region instead of scaring away investors.

• (1430)

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that there is a panic situation for the workers in fish plants, for the fishermen, for the families in the Atlantic region. There is a crisis in the Atlantic region.

I remind the Prime Minister of a letter which he received from the Premier of Nova Scotia on December 22, 1989 where the Premier of Nova Scotia said on the first line: "The Atlantic fishery is in crisis. The fishery sector here is equivalent in economic importance to the auto industry in central Canada."

I visited Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

Mr. Crosbie: Four hours.

Ms. McLaughlin: I talked to people in the fishing industry. I spoke to those families. Those people in Atlantic Canada have ideas. They have solutions. They have hopes and dreams, but they need help. I ask the Prime Minister to show that he cares. Is he going to go to the Atlantic and talk to these people in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia? This week or next week? These people want to know when the Prime Minister will show a personal interest in their future.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I often go to Atlantic Canada where I had the privilege of being educated and first elected to this House. On one of my many trips there I announced the creation of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, one of the most important instruments of growth and prosperity.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: On another trip to Atlantic Canada I announced the awarding of the frigate contract to Saint John shipyard, the largest federal contract awarded to Atlantic Canada since Confederation. On another trip we signed the Hibernia agreement which the Liberals and the NDP had opposed for 15 years. On another trip there I signed an agreement for the clean-up of the Halifax harbour. I will be going there again and again. Every time we go to Atlantic Canada we bring something constructive and helpful. It costs the taxpayers but we believe in fairness and social justice. We will continue to do a lot for Atlantic Canada.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, we have one region in crisis on the east coast and others are beginning to crumble.

On January 18 Cominco announced the closing of the Sullivan Mine at Kimberly, British Columbia, leaving a town of 6,000 without a future. Cominco received $79 million in federal funds. Canadians want to know why their tax dollars are being given to corporations that turn around and give workers a pink slip.

What steps will the government take to ensure that Cominco is accountable for these public funds and how will it assist these workers who are out of a job today?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that when she refers to the Cominco smelter in Trail and the agreement that was signed between this government, the province of British Columbia and Cominco, that the NDP, including the unions, were saying that that deal was absolutely essential for the maintenance of the Cominco operations in the interior of B.C.

That Cominco smelter had one of the highest costs of production prior to that investment. Today it has one of the lowest world-wide costs of production. The situation now is that when you look at zinc prices, when you take a look at the ability to maintain jobs, that plant in Trail has been guaranteed into the next century.

With respect to the Sullivan mine, a meeting was held yesterday. All of us recognized that the Sullivan mine was going to close some time in the 1990s because of the ore body. Yesterday, as a result of the meeting which took place, and obviously it is regrettable in respect of Sullivan, the mine will be maintained in the sense that if zinc prices go up, Cominco can consider its reopening at a later date. If you keep on opposing the Trail smelter and the investment by this government in the future of B.C., those jobs will be lost as well. You should reconsider the policy which you have.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister who yesterday indicated that he had received from the President of the European Community an offer which would deal with the Portuguese and Spanish overfishing. Will he now agree to table his exchange of correspondence with Mr. Delors? Can he tell us how the government plans to respond to Mr. Delors' offer? Does he have an undertaking that the European Community will abide by the NAFO quotas while Mr. Delors' offer is being pursued?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the very encouraging development that was referred to yesterday was that, breaking from past practice by the European Community, President Delors responded in a way that made it clear that there is the possibility of further progress to be made through negotiation.

As one more indication of the willingness of the commission, as a result of diplomatic activities undertaken by my colleague the Minister for International Trade and others to move forward on some of these issues, the Community is sending its commissioner responsible for fisheries, Mr. Marin, to Canada in the next several weeks. We expect to discuss matters with him then. Undoubtedly there will be the opportunity and there may very well be the necessity for a meeting between the Prime Minister and President Delors. If that is necessary to move forward Canada's interest in the fishery, the Prime Minister will certainly meet Mr. Delors and make our case very vigorously.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister. As he will know, this problem of foreign overfishing began in 1985. The figures will show that it is a matter that got out of hand since this government came into power because the Prime Minister refused to stand up to the Europeans. He let them walk all over us as a consequence.

Will the minister give a commitment? He is talking in fairly positive terms. Can he be specific and give a commitment to the fishermen and plant workers that as a consequence of this new dialogue with Mr. Delors, the foreign overfishing will be eliminated in the foreseeable future? If he cannot give that commitment, there will be no future for those plant workers and those fishermen.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly our objective and that is certainly the position that we are putting to the Europeans in trying to get them to respect reasonable international regulation of fishing. We have made some progress on the matter.

I point out to the hon. member that developments that led to the movement of Spanish and Portuguese fleets into waters where they had not been before were not developments that occurred in Canada. They had to do with the decision of those countries to join the European Community and some of the consequences of that decision. I also want to make the point that one of the very positive decisions that was taken by this government was to stop the Liberal giveaway of 9,500 tonnes of fish.

YOUTH PROGRAMS

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for youth. In the minister's absence, I will ask the question of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The question concerns the future of this country, and in particular Canadian youth. It has been reported that this government will cut summer employment programs for students by almost 50 per cent. As the minister knows students' fees and costs have increased. How can the minister justify this action and block the major artery to Canada's future?

• (1440)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to note that the components of the Challenge program and its objectives are reviewed every year. The minister of state for youth and myself, and other members of this government, have been focusing on and have been very sensitive to a specific problem and that is the problem of high school dropouts.

As a result of that, the work orientation component, which is a program designed to address that particular problem, was increased by $8 million over 1988. When the minister of youth returns, he will have a definitive statement on the whole Challenge program for this year.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if she can confirm or deny that this government plans to reduce the SEED program by approximately 43 per cent and funds allocated to the CECS by 30 per cent.

If that is true, how can the minister morally justify it? The students of this country would like an honest answer.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the honest answer is that the unemployment among youth has gone down very significantly under this government, and is certainly much lower than it was under his government.

I would also like to point out that the kinds of training programs that we have for young people are much more effective in terms of their skill development and their ability to get jobs. With the government focusing on the high school dropout rate which is very significant, particularly in Atlantic Canada, the hon. member should be applauding.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries.

In 1989, Canada's quota for North Atlantic cod was set at 225,000 tonnes, almost double what was recommended by Canadian scientists.

For 1990, Canada's quota has been set at 197,000 tonnes, 1.6 times the level recommended by our scientists. In the name of sustainable development of our cod resource, did the minister have any evidence to support these higher quotas, other than what the Minister for International Trade described as his "firm belief". Anything more than a hunch?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Indeed I did, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member knows that the methodology for determining the recommended allowable catch has a great range of uncertainty and the lowest level recommended by scientists has to do with the maximum rebuilding rate of the resource.

Dr. Les Harris, who has not yet given me his final report, suggested a quota for 1990 be nominally set at approximately 190,000 metric tons, and that represents a 26 per cent quota reduction from the quota I set only a year ago. As we can see in terms of the unfortunate events unfolding in Atlantic Canada, we have to be gradual, but we have to move toward the desirable conservation objective in these matters.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the minister discredits the evidence from our own scientists. Is he the least bit embarrassed about criticizing Portuguese and Spanish fishermen for overfishing quotas established by NAFO reps who are advised by our Canadian scientists, whose recommendations this government is so blindly ignoring?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the two situations are quite different. In the case of the overfishing by Spain and Portugal on the nose of the Grand Banks, they are fishing at a level 32,000 tonnes higher than the quota in that region, which was set by NAFO at zero.

When significant changes are required in Canadian quotas, with the full support of industry in the Atlantic provinces, we often cushion those changes over a period of one or two or three years. The hon. member is suggesting that we should have thrown thousands more workers out of work by closing the half dozen or dozen additional plants. This government is not prepared to take such a heartless decision.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post Corporation.

In October 1989, northerners obtained from Canada Post a three-month moratorium on postal rate increases of 32 or 40 per cent or more for commercial shipments to the North. These increases were originally to take effect on November 13, 1989; the moratorium ends on January 31, 1990.

Last Friday, Canada Post Corporation announced, before the end of the moratorium, that a reduction of only 5 per cent would be allowed for foodstuffs and drugs sent to the North.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Can the minister confirm to me today that in so doing, Canada Post Corporation is not respecting its moratorium and that northerners will have no more fresh bread in the coming months?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as a result of representations from interested parties, including the hon. member last November, the post office indicated a 5 per cent decrease in the planned schedule for the northern air stage rates and promised a freeze until February 1.

My information is that that remains in place. In the meantime, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is undertaking to study the issue. It will be considering suggestions from all interested parties and by February 1 the following year, we will have appropriate policies in place. In the meantime there is a freeze in place.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last week the Chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission was critical of the Employment Equity Act and said that the results were far from encouraging. These remarks were repeated by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and the Canadian Ethnocultural Council.

The Employment Equity Act was supposed to bring fair play in the market-place and in the labour force for visible minorities, women, disabled people and aboriginal people of this country. It has not been doing this. Under the circumstances, is the minister now ready to bring in amendments to the Employment Equity Act to ensure effective sanctions and to provide an enforcement agency for that law? Will she do that immediately?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, we implemented a law that had never been implemented before 1984. We received the reports for the second year and we all know that the legislation is to be reviewed in 1991.

I am following progress very closely and I intend to make any amendments that may be required during the year.

I must add that we have excellent co-operation from most companies with whom we work. Needless to say, changing attitudes takes a lot of time. Progress is gradual. This is an incentive. We strictly and scrupulously respect the sanctions provided and we will apply them.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, according to the government's own report, some of the worst performers under the Employment Equity Act are prominent national firms such as the CBC, Air Canada, the Royal Bank, the Canadian Ports Corporation, Imperial Oil, Bell Canada, the Canada Council and many others which have made no progress.

I want to ask the minister if she is happy with this record. If she is not, what is she going to do about it?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I repeated that I was not satisfied with the progress made and that I find it is still not enough. I also reiterated our intention to monitor the progress very closely as we are in the third year of the program. Major changes must occur; otherwise, political action will be taken.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. For several months, observers of the political scene in Haiti have been warning Canadian authorities about General Avril. After a series of murders and basic rights violations, we now have a proclamation of a state of siege. Has the minister decided to ask the Haitian Ambassador to his office, to express the indignation of thousands of Canadians who have an interest in what is happening in that country, and what steps does the government intend to take to further progress already made towards democracy in Haiti? Will this government let itself be fooled by General Avril as it was by General Namphy?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all Members of this House are concerned about the situation in Haiti. As you know the government has suspended all bilateral discussions with the Haitian government on development aid, and it is now time for non-governmental organizations to step in. We are monitoring the situation in Haiti very closely. We shall be talking directly to the ambassador, to determine whether there are any options for Canada to do more than just express its position and whether we could in some way influence the situation in an effective manner.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): I want to thank the minister for his answer, and in the light of what he just said, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to order his Minister of Employment and Immigration to cancel all planned deportations to Haiti and legalize the status of hundreds of these citizens who are now living in Montreal, not knowing whether tomorrow or the next day they will be deported to Haiti or if they will finally get landed immigrant status in a country where they were seeking a peaceful life?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the House that no one has been deported to Haiti since November. I agree the situation is very sensitive. I am monitoring the situation daily to determine what is best for Canadians and for Haitians in Canada. Our next step will be to review the situation with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and determine what our future course will be.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, I would like to address my question to the Prime Minister.

On December 28 last year the Federal Court, for the second time, instructed this government to follow the laws of the land and conduct the proper environmental review process as it relates to the Rafferty Alameda Dam Project. While the government dithered, construction continued on the project. In fact, it is some 60 per cent completed now. Does the government not understand that the environmental review process was put in place in order to assess projects before they begin?

I would like to ask the Prime Minister this. When is this government going to take its own law seriously, revoke the licence and not allow any construction until after an environmental review has finished its inquiry?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister, may I reply to the hon. member. As he knows, the report has been given to the minister. The government has a period of 30 days within which to consider the report and to respond. This process is presently under way and due consideration has been given. I am sure the hon. member will be pleased with the government's response.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, when the government finally decides to act, most probably the project will be finished. The Saskatchewan government is laughing at the federal government. The provincial minister responsible has said they have no intention of making major changes to the dam regardless of what the panel's findings are. In fact, the operating plants for the project call for indirect diversion of groundwater which is a clear violation of Section 12 of the federal licence.

Again I ask the minister if he is going to proceed with an environmental review panel. Will he tell the Saskatchewan government to cease construction until the panel finishes its report.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, intends to proceed in the exercise of his responsibility and will make his views and decision known. When he exercises this responsibility it will, of course, be implemented with the full force of his mandate and that of other departments of the federal government.

ROMANIA

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Although the situation in Romania has improved considerably, there is still some important issues that need to be addressed.

Canada has sold, through the AECL, the Candu nuclear power reactor to Romania. Canadians are appalled to know that ethnic Hungarian Romanians were forced to labour under dreadful deprivation at the Candu sites. Their human rights were deprived. How long has the Secretary of State been aware of this offensive situation and what steps have been taken to ensure that these human rights abuses have ended?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member, I was very disturbed when I first saw those reports and have asked that officials look into the matter and report to me. The initial reports talked about slave labour. Subsequent reports talked about the use of military conscripts. I am continuing inquiries into the matter to find out exactly what was happening. I think it is quite appropriate that the government and Parliament know how long what was happening was known by officials. I am inquiring into that as well and will keep the hon. member advised.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Thank you for the response. However, there have been numerous reports that the breach of construction standards at the Candu sites have resulted in serious potential safety hazards and that on occasion Canadian supervision has been blocked. Should not Canadian support of this project be discontinued until a report addressing the labour and safety conditions at the Candu sites is provided to the Canadian people?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the suggestion put forward by the hon. member, it is that in this time, shortly after a dramatic change of regime in Romania when that country is struggling not simply to open its way to democracy but also to put its economy on a strong base, we should act on the basis of reports that we have not been able to confirm or to deny, that we should act to cut off some of the economic development that is under way now. I think that on reflection the hon. member would agree that that would be an unfortunate way for Canada to proceed.

What we are doing is seeking to gather information that is reliable as to what went on, what safety standards there are now and as to what options are open to us. I am concerned about the matter. I was concerned about it when it came to my attention. We began inquiries and we are continuing them. As soon as we have information which merits action, we will take that action. I will keep the member informed.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. The recent U.S. decision under its Export Enhancement Program to subsidize American wheat sold to the Soviet Union flies in the face of Article 701(4) of the free trade agreement, which states that the Americans will take our export interests into account when deciding whether to subsidize exports to a third country.

Has the minister informed the United States government that it considers this undercutting of traditional Canadian export markets a violation of the free trade agreement?

• (1500)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have informed the United States on many occasions that we believe this policy is counterproductive, not only contrary to the spirit of the free trade agreement though not contrary to any particular clause of the free trade agreement, but disruptive to the whole world trading system for wheat and grains. We have protested on many occasions. This is why we are supporting negotiations of the FTN to include agriculture under the FTN.

We are working on behalf of the Canadian exporters of grain so that these practices in the future will be blocked under the GATT. At the moment they are not. The United States says they are in competition with the European Community and they are determined to continue on until they persuade the European Community to drop their subsidy practices.

So, these two giants are clashing. The rest of the world is suffering. That is why we hope we will have the support of the members of the Official Opposition in our efforts to gain a successful Uruguay round of the GATT negotiations.

Up to date, all we have had is short-sighted criticism and picayune plucking away at our negotiations.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I know the minister did not read the free trade agreement. I wish he would read Article 701.4 which clearly states that this is in violation of the free trade agreement.

The government said that the free trade agreement would go beyond GATT. It would give Canada special consideration by the Americans. This latest U.S. export subsidy will likely drop the world price of wheat by 56 cents a bushel.

Will the minister not agree that his special relationship with the Americans is meaningless when it comes to protecting Canadian export interests? Will he not stand up for Canadian wheat farmers and demand that the U.S. withdraw this unfair trade practice—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has put his question.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement applies to exports from Canada to the United States and exports from the United States to Canada. These wheat sales are exports from Canada to other countries in the world or exports from the United States to other countries in the world.

The Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement does not apply directly to those exports. They come under the GATT. Our hope to stop these dangerous subsidy practices lies in the GATT. That is why we are members of the Cairns group. That is why we are fighting for the Canadian farmer to achieve a successful resolution in the Uruguay round.

FISHERIES

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on December 8 last year, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs to assist two Canadian fishermen whose boats were seized by the U.S. Coast Guard in Canadian waters south of the AB line on the Alaska boundary.

In my discussions with the minister's office, they have recognized that there is some Canadian obligation to assist these fishermen but because the message was relayed by Fisheries, that that obligation is shared by the Department of Fisheries.

These fishermen are facing the loss of the $50,000 bonds they posted with the American government, they are facing the loss of the value of their catch and they are facing an expensive legal process in Alaska.

My question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. When is he going to accept his responsibility to assist these fishermen and when is he going to make the announcement that that support is available?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the petition raised by the hon. member on behalf of the two fishermen, the owners of the Fonzie and the Viscount, which were apprehended by an American Coast Guard vessel for an alleged infraction north of or within the U.S. coastal waters, outside of the recognized Canadian boundary.

There is some ambiguity as to whether the vessel was beyond Canada's jurisdiction. However, I continue to work with my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and other colleagues in cabinet, to seek some form of restitution or assistance in aid of these fishermen.

STANDING ORDER 52

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise hon. members that pursuant to a discussion earlier today, commenced by a point of order by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and followed by interventions on both sides of the House, it was agreed that the House would deem certain applications for emergency debates which came to my attention for consideration yesterday and which were not heard because the government had moved to Orders of the Day, to be in front of the House today and I, as a consequence, am responding to them now.

I point out to hon. members that this was done by arrangement and whatever was done is not to be taken as either a judgment on the point that the hon. member for Ottawa Vanier raised or a precedent. I will deal with the intricacies of the procedural matter that the hon. member raised at another time.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

RAFFERTY–ALAMEDA DAM PROJECT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 52 to seek an emergency debate on a matter of pressing concern, namely the Rafferty–Alameda dam project in Saskatchewan and the disregard of environmental guidelines as found in the Federal Court decision of last month.

The court ruled that the environmental impact study ordered by the environment minister last year was flawed and incomplete. The judge ordered that the minister name a new panel to study these projects within 30 days. That has not been done. Meanwhile, construction continues, in some cases on a 24–hour per day basis, changing forever the landscape of Saskatchewan. The dam is now 60 per cent complete.

When the minister allowed construction to continue last August, he did so on the basis of a flawed study, yet he has not stopped construction. I submit that here we have an emergency not only in terms of substance, that is to say that the environment of Saskatchewan is being forever altered, but also in terms of environmental procedure; that we are in danger of setting a precedent that a project can proceed to completion while a review is going on. That is an emergency with respect to environmental due process in this country and we are entitled to debate it.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is the first of one or two requests for an emergency debate. I would request that the Standing Orders be enforced and that the submission be made and that there be no debate. Otherwise, we are at a complete disadvantage on the government side. We may wish to respond. We do not. We respect the rules and we ask the hon. member to respect the rules.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice raises a matter which has been raised before. Hon. members know what the practice is and as your servant, I must apply it.

The matter the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona raises is clearly an important matter. That was evidenced earlier today by questions put by the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle and the answers by the minister who was acting today for the Minister of the Environment.

I say it is an important matter for some of the reasons that the hon. member put forward but I am not satisfied that today is the day to proceed to an emergency debate.

ATLANTIC CANADA FISHERY

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52, I too ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a very urgent and serious matter, namely, the escalating crisis in the cod, lobster, snow crab and herring roe fishery in Atlantic Canada, a crisis characterized by the numerous shutdowns of fish plants, loss of jobs and the subsequent closing of entire communities.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that the government has not yet understood the real dimensions of the crisis, and we would like to have—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to consider his remarks carefully. I think this was the very objection that was taken. There is no need for an argumentative presentation. I have the facts. I also thank the hon. member for presenting me with a very clear letter indicating the situation. If the hon. member would like to close off his remarks, I will hear him.

[Translation]

Mr. Robichaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We would just like to have an opportunity to raise the issue and show the real dimensions of the crisis and its effects on families and communities in Atlantic Canada. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Again, the issue is very important. Of course, all hon. members in the House of Commons are well aware of the serious crisis affecting Canadians who live in the Maritimes. Yesterday and today as well, there was much discussion on it and probably there will be even more in the coming days. However, I do not think it is necessary today to decide on an emergency debate. I would remind hon. members for their information that immediately before the Christmas break, there was an emergency debate. It may not have dealt with all the subjects raised today by the hon. member, but it certainly touched on the overall situation.

I will follow developments every day this week and also in the weeks to come, but for now, I do not see the need to accede to this request.

• (1510)

[English]

FAMINE IN ETHIOPIA

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask for an emergency debate on the situation in Ethiopia.

The famine in Ethiopia is again reaching crisis proportions with an estimated four million people at risk of starvation and the effects of the drought in Eritrea and Tigre are daily growing worse.

This situation is aggravated by a long-standing war in the region. The severity of this famine is not well understand in Canada, and perhaps for this reason, Canada has not yet provided its characteristic ready response to this international distress.

For this reason, I am asking for an emergency debate so that the Canadian public can once again be informed of this situation and the political and environmental aspects of it so that the Canadian public will be educated and will then be able to respond.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands has raised a matter which of course is a serious matter internationally and for Canada. However, there may well be opportunity for the hon. member to raise the matter further within a short period of time, and without taking away for one minute the seriousness of the matter, I find that it would not be appropriate to proceed today with the debate.

FISHERIES IN THE ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Pursuant to Standing Order 52, I, too, ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a very urgent matter.

The deteriorating fisheries industry on the east coast has created a serious economic crisis in that region.

[English]

There is every indication that further reduction in fish catches may be required, a reduction that will result in even more lay-offs, more plant closures, and greater unemployment, especially in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Coupled with other recent cut-backs to employment programs and unemployment relief, this surely will result only in a further decimation of the Atlantic community.

For that reason, I would respectfully request the adjournment of this House to have an emergency debate on this important issue.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the Hon. Member for Yukon and Leader of the NDP (Ms. McLaughlin) for her comments, but I believe I must give her the same answer I gave the Hon. Member for Beauséjour.

[English]

In saying that, again I remind hon. members and the public watching that this entire subject is obviously one of very grave importance to the country and to the region. It is presently being debated, yesterday and today, very vigorously, and again I remind hon. members that there was an emergency debate immediately before Christmas.

However, I say to the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party that, as I assured the hon. member for Beauséjour, I shall of course pay attention each day and be watching events carefully.

WAYS AND MEANS

MOTION RELATING TO A GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Otto Jelinek (for the Minister of Finance) moved that a Ways and Means motion relating to a Goods and Services Tax, laid upon the Table on Monday, January 22, 1990, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish first to advise the House that there have been discussions among the three parties and tomorrow will be designated as an allotted day.

Further, I believe Your Honour would find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That the order for second reading and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-52, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts, be amended to read "second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have leave to introduce the motion by unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-52, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts, be read a second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address the House on Bill C-52, the retirement savings legislation.

I believe in pension reform and I strongly believe that older Canadians who have contributed to Canadian society through their hard work and child-rearing should have the best pensions that our society can afford. However I do not see any progress toward that kind of pension reform in this legislation. I have read it, and it is complex. One thing is clear, though: it does benefit only the wealthy.

This is a bill that rewards upper income Canadians. What we want to see is pension reform that benefits all Canadians. This bill proposes to provide the greatest assistance to those at the upper end of the income scale. Someone earning $20,000 a year would get an annual RRSP break of about $1,200. Someone earning $86,000 a year would get a tax break of $7,500.

One clever newspaper editorial in a Toronto paper said:

> We agree that everyone should be treated equitably, but we don't accept Wilson's fundamental premise that the taxpayer has an obligation to help the wealthiest Canadians maintain their lifestyles in retirement especially since they have the means to do so without government help.
> Wilson's proposal, when fully implemented, would drain an estimated $300 million a year from the federal Treasury, which Wilson has previously said, on numerous occasions, is stretched to the limit.

This piece of legislation will cost the public Treasury $300 million. At the same time the finance minister keeps whining about financial restraint. He uses financial restraint as the excuse to attack our social programs.

If he suddenly found $300 million kicking about, why not put it into the Guaranteed Income Supplement? That would allow Canada to give $30 a month more to the more than 600,000 elderly, widowed and single women who have no other source of income and who are living below the poverty line. Thirty dollars a month does not sound like much, but it can mean the difference between having to rely on charity and being independent for many widowed and single older women.

This legislation has serious consequences for those Canadians who were unable to save for their retirement because of other spending commitments such as raising children or simply because they could not afford to put money away.

Taxation statistics show us that a majority of people making over $50,000 a year contribute to RRSPs. The percentage of tax filers who do contribute to RRSPs is shown to be directly proportional to their income levels. RRSPs can provide a supplement to retired incomes, but we cannot rely on RRSPs alone to provide an adequate pension income for most Canadians.

The route the government is taking on pension reform is really very disturbing. It is leaving those who are most needy out of this discussion altogether. It is ignoring middle income earners. This is the third step this government has taken after attempting to deindex pensions, after the successful clawback of pensions, toward the privatization of our pension system.

This move will leave poor seniors, and especially older women, with even less income than they currently have. It is no coincidence that the changes dealing with the tax treatment of retirement savings were introduced in conjunction with the proposal to deindex Old Age Security. The deindexation would have cost Canadian pensioners $255 million in 1986 alone.

What the finance minister is attempting is to privatize our pension system completely. This government has already tried to deindex pensions. It failed because of overwhelming opposition from seniors working actively in lobby organizations and groups right across this country, and from the opposition of the New Democratic Party in the House of Commons. That was the first attack this government made on our pension system.

The logic behind that, and this move that we see before us today, is to force Canadians to rely solely on their own savings for their retirement. There are many seniors, women who have spent most of their lives as homemakers, who do not have such savings. This does not make their contribution to Canada any less.

Canada owes them a decent standard of living in their old age. Many of these women are from a generation where the most common thing was for a woman to stay and work in the home. These women come from a generation in which there were more children per family. It was hard work, especially without the kinds of services and amenities that we have today. It is unfair to turn our backs on these women now and say: "You are on your own".

Canadians who have worked all their lives at low wage jobs do not have much savings or opportunity for savings. It is hard enough to live on the minimum wage, let alone put money away for a retirement savings plan. Any savings that middle income earners and lower income earners have go into their children's education. These hard working people are not going to benefit from this legislation at all, whereas the finance minister himself will. He already has a fat pension and wants to see it grow even fatter.

I am horrified to see what this government is doing to our country. It is even more horrifying to note that these same pension amendments were first proposed by the Liberals in 1982. It shows us that the Liberals have no alternative vision of the pension system in our country. They really are just Conservatives dressed up a little differently.

The wolf in sheep's clothing can fool some of the people some of the time, but sooner or later people are going to examine the Liberal record and discover a mirror image of the Conservative plan.

A real alternative to relying on RRSPs as pension income is an expansion of the public pension system. We need to provide an adequate retirement income for all of those who have salaries too low to tuck away $15,500 a year every year into an RRSP. That is the total salary for the year for some people.

In the retirement years there are also additional health expenses. With this bill, wealthy Canadians will be better able to meet those additional expenses. Poorer older Canadians will be left on their own. Where is the pension reform that will benefit all Canada's people equally?

RRSPs can be an unreliable source of pension income. They are vulnerable to stock market fluctuations. People could be putting hard earned money aside each year only to have its value decrease. Most people cannot afford to put aside the amount of money from their salaries into an RRSP that it would take to guarantee a totally adequate pension income.

Wealthy Canadians use RRSPs mostly as a tax shelter. It really has very little to do with retirement. Already a tiny minority of people in this country own 20 per cent of all the income in Canada, they derive 27 per cent of their taxation benefits from tax deductible contributions to RRSPs. They do so at the expense of middle and lower income Canadians who pay for these deductions through higher and higher taxes. Is this part of what the GST is meant to compensate for? Only a Conservative government could come up with pension legislation that increases ordinary people's subsidization of the lifestyles of wealthy Canadians.

There are people in this country who are sleeping on the streets and who have to rely on food banks to sustain themselves. This government proposes not to help them get back on their feet, but to ensure that the rich can afford to maintain a Mercedes until they are 90. This government's priorities really are ludicrous.

How does the finance minister sleep at night knowing that the pockets of ordinary Canadians are being robbed to support the wealthy? I am starting to believe that having your soul removed is a prerequisite to joining cabinet.

New Democrats believe that all Canadians should have equal opportunities to plan effectively for their retirement. In my constituency seniors are an active and important part of the community. Century House is a centre for seniors that puts on innovative programming and reaches out into the seniors community and the community as a whole.

Some seniors find themselves hindered from full participation in the community by poverty. This bill will not help them or other middle or low income Canadians when they become seniors. This bill does not address the pension-related concerns of people in New Westminster and Burnaby.

My constituents of pre-retirement age want to know that they will have enough to live on comfortably when they retire. Older constituents want to know that now. They do not want to subsidize the lifestyles of rich Canadians. They want a good, fair and equitable pension system.

I have serious concerns about the implications of this bill for women. This legislation does not address at all the pension needs of women. This bill just gives rich people a bigger tax break for contributing to an RRSP. Only 16.5 per cent of female taxpayers contributed to an RRSP in 1987, compared to 24.1 per cent of male tax filers. This figure even misrepresents the number of women who contributed to RRSPs because it only counts women who actually file tax returns. Poor women who do not file tax returns are not included in these figures. The vast majority of women, even the vast majority of women who do file tax returns, do not contribute to an RRSP.

If one looks at the gender distribution of RRSP contributors, a significant inequality emerges. In 1987, 39 per cent of the total number of RRSP contributors were women. They contributed 32.8 per cent of the total value of RRSPs. In the same year, men made up 61 per cent of the contributors and held 67.2 per cent of the value of all RRSPs.

Not only are most RRSP contributors men, but as contributors they are able to contribute more. Conservatives say: "Well, why don't women just get their act together and contribute more?" The answer is they cannot. Women make up the majority of the poor in this country. Women cannot take the food out of their children's mouths in order to put money away for an RRSP.

As usual, this government is trying to put legislation in place that benefits only the rich, and in this case rich men. This new legislation places restrictions on the splitting of RRSPs by disallowing the transfer of RRSP retirement income to a spousal RRSP or RRIF upon marriage breakdown, except where the annuitant's RRSP was amended before 1990 to provide for the transfer.

This bill includes no regulations to tighten the rules governing spousal RRSPs so that women will actually see these funds at retirement. Spousal RRSPs are often simply used as a tax shelter.

The 1983 parliamentary task force on pension reform was told by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, by the Fédération des femmes du Québec, and the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, that the most important reform for older women of the future would be to expand the Canada and Quebec pension plans. The task force report ignored this good advice. The New Democratic Party minority report agreed with the women of Canada.

Contributing to an RRSP is a luxury that most women cannot afford. Instead of having poor women subsidizing rich men with their taxes while rich men get huge tax breaks, the New Democratic Party proposes a freeze on existing RRSP contribution levels, a major expansion of the Quebec and Canada pension plans and a significant boost to the universal pension system.

A disproportionate number of native people live in poverty. Elders who have spent most of their working lives outside the cash economy do not have CPP or private pensions to fall back on. They did not have money to put aside in an RRSP. They rely on the public system, one that is failing them.

We must enact alternatives to this bill now. We must have real pension reform now. It is economically unsound to keep handing money to the rich. It is morally unsound to make ordinary Canadians subsidize the rich. I urge all members to engage in discussion about real pension reform and leave this bill in the back room where it was created.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Mackenzie—Agriculture; the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby—Emergency measures; the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon—VIA Rail.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the introduction of this bill by the minister. I noted that in his presentation he made a point of saying that it could be or should be—I am not sure which he said now—revenue neutral. I do not know if he used those words, but his point was that he hoped it would not cost the government anything nor would it bring in any extra revenue.

We are faced with increasing concerns from individuals and from organizations clear across this country. The GST legislation has increased the concern about this. With the other increases in taxes there is a feeling that governments have to start controlling their expenditures.

For the government to bring in a measure such as this and say that after all this work, after all this effort, we are going to be revenue neutral is not what the people of the country are looking for. The arguments have been made by my colleagues and by others in the House that it is helping the relatively well-off, compared to those who are not well off, to those at the bottom of the income scale or even those with no income at all.

The government may argue that that is not the desire, not the intent, not the plan, but it is not able to argue with the figures that are being presented by the members of the opposition, members of the New Democratic Party in particular, that it is helping those who are well off at the expense of those who are not doing well at all.

That is not good enough either. Whether they are totally correct is not the point. The point is the public perception right now. The public perception right now is that the government should be cutting down on expenditures. Whether they are direct expenditures or whether they are indirect, forgoing revenue does not really matter to the public. They want the government to show some example. If the deficit has to be brought under control, the government has to take charge of things. To bring in a program such as this one, which as I said earlier is revenue neutral, is certainly not doing the job.

The government is saying that it is closing doors so that people who have been able to take undue advantage of the RRSP program will not be able to do so any more. That is one of the purposes of this legislation. I am not sure whether the government has done that job well or not, but had it done that job well and stopped there, it would have done something that from the point of view of public perception would be progress. The government would, according to its own figures, be saving a revenue expenditure of some $350 million. That may not be much in the terms of a $35 billion deficit, but it is nevertheless going in the right direction. I think this could have been applauded by the public as a whole.

At the same time to bring in a new giveaway program that is not helping those at the bottom of the scale, that is not helping those in the low and middle areas of the scale but is helping those above that, is again going against what I feel the public, certainly the voters in my riding, want. It is going against, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, what the voters in your riding want.

They want us to be helping those who are most disadvantaged. They want us not to be increasing the deficit. They want us to take control of the deficit and indeed reduce it. They want us not to bring in programs that are revenue neutral, but programs that will be revenue positive at the expense of those in our country who are most able to pay the costs of it rather than try to get more out of those who are least able to pay the cost.

People have been saying that you would have to earn $86,110 or at least have that amount of income related to the RRSP before you could claim the maximum of $15,500. That is all very well, but it is indexed. This is one place where it is going to be fully indexed to increases in wages and salaries. In all other programs through which the government is giving money to those least able to survive in our country, it is only partially indexed. I do not know of another program that is indexed so closely to increases in wages and salaries as is the program being described in Bill C–52.

Once again, I would suggest, we are going contrary to the wishes, the desires, and the hopes of the people that we are supposed to be looking after in this country.

We are limiting the assistance to high income taxpayers. That is not what we should be doing. The existing dollar limits are being increased. That is not what we should be doing because it is costing the government revenue. It will eliminate opportunities for excessive or unintended tax deferrals. That is a move in the right direction, but we should not have found some way of giving the revenue that the government is getting by eliminating these schemes to those who need it the least.

The reform should result in no net revenue. On the contrary, the reform should bring in more revenue and that is what the program should have been designed to do.

I suppose the real quarrel we have with this is that it is pushing people into the laps of those who are providing private pension plans as opposed to government plans. We have argued for years that the old age assistance plan is not sufficient. We should be putting more money into that. We have argued for years that the guaranteed income supplement is not sufficient.

The Canada Pension Plan, which is contributed to by workers, employers or by self-employed individuals, is a good plan from the point of view of where the money is being invested. It is a good plan from the point of view that it is building up pensions for people in Canada, but it is deficient in that the amount of the pension is insufficient to maintain people at any kind of standard of living afterward.

Why not beef up the Canada pension program available to everyone in Canada who has any kind of an income from their places of employment? That is a direction the New Democrats could have and would have supported quite willingly and happily.

I think it is a program that the people of Canada would have supported. It would have been revenue neutral as well, but it would have been bringing the money in from the people of the country, from their employers and from self-employed individuals. It would be building up a fund that in turn would be invested in Canada in projects under the control of governments in Canada, as opposed to encouraging people to invest in shares in trust companies or insurance companies which might be investing the money anywhere in Canada, or indeed might be investing some of it outside Canada in projects that the people of Canada might not be happy about and might not support at all, but certainly projects beyond the control and influence of the federal government or of any government in Canada.

Once again, we are pushing people into supporting and participating in private plans rather than Canada or Quebec Pension plans which have had a long period of time to show how good they are, how well they are managed and how successful they are. We have not been improving those, beefing them up or putting more money into them so that all people would have a pension plan from which they could draw when they started drawing their pension and to which they may contribute while they are working, which is the proper way for Canadians to have been accumulating pension plans and for the government to have been controlling them.

Instead an editorial entitled "RRSP changes benefit wealthy", which goes back to the first announcement of the changes to the RRSP program, says that the program is so complicated that people will have to wait until Revenue Canada tells them how much they can actually put in.

We are supposed to be simplifying the tax system. Well, come on. The last time we simplified it a couple of years ago, the percentage of people who were going to professionals to get their tax returns completed increased by about 20 points, as I recall. Each time we simplify it we seem to push people into the hands of professionals. I have nothing against professionals doing income tax, but obviously we are going the opposite direction from that of simplification.

The government itself admits that we will have to wait for it to tell us what our maximum contribution to RRSP can be. There is no way we can figure it out ourselves. We have to wait for the government computers to get around to doing it and to get around to letting us know, when they they are able to, just how much of a contribution we can make.

Simplification? It is the very opposite of that. A fair pension plan? It is the very opposite of it. A fair way of taking money out of the economy, by taking it from those in the lower income brackets and giving it to those in the higher brackets? It is the very opposite of a fair plan in every way imaginable except that the government is continuing to look after the needs of the most well-off in our community, as it has with many other programs and most other pieces of legislation the government has been bringing in.

In every way by which a fair system can be measured and in every way by which we can be properly looking after the needs of the people in our country and being fair to the people of our country, this government is failing the people of Canada. This government does not deserve the support of the people of Canada.

There can be little doubt that the public opinion polls we have seen on many issues are totally correct when they say that the government has lost a significant measure of the support that it had just 16 months ago from the people of Canada as evidenced by a general election. The government has lost that. It has thrown it away, frittered it away, and it is continuing to do so by bringing in programs that are contrary to the needs, wishes and desires of the people of Canada.

There is no way that New Democrats can support the legislation in its present form before this House.

• (1630)

Mr. Fisher: I would like to congratulate the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan for a very fine speech and an extremely good analysis of the situation as it seems to be developing in respect of the government's programs. It does not seem to matter which program you talk about because, for the ordinary people of Canada, these programs have nothing but negative connotations.

There were some references to privatization, and I thought they were most apt, especially in light of the fact that the minister who was described yesterday as shepherding this legislation through the House is also the minister responsible for privatization.

One of the previous speakers mentioned the number of homeless people in Canada. I would remind members of the House and all Canadians that it was this very same gentleman who, a couple of years ago when he was Minister of Housing, said that the homeless in Canada were homeless because they wanted to be and that if they really wanted shelter, they would certainly be able to find it. If they did not have shelter, it was their own fault.

The question I would like to ask my colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan is something along these lines. He made reference to government revenue and said that whether it is given away in grants, gratuities or not collected it is still lost revenue. I wonder if the member could expand on the idea of revenue not collected contributing just as much to the deficit as money which is given away.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, if I may just say to begin with, when the minister spoke about this and said that it could or should be revenue neutral, he was certainly falling far short of saying that it "would" be revenue neutral. He obviously does not know at this point in time. On previous occasions we have had the Minister of Finance tell us that certain legislation was going to be revenue neutral only to find out that by his own calculations he was out about 25 per cent. Thus I have no confidence at all in this particular piece of legislation being revenue neutral.

The legislation before us talks about the different ways in which the government is closing loopholes. Every time it closes a loophole which would allow someone to get away with putting more money into an RRSP than the legislation originally intended, what the government is doing is allowing that person to reduce his or her taxable income and thereby reduce his or her income tax for that year.

The government might say later on that it is going to catch up, when the person starts drawing the pension he will pay tax on that income that was deferred and on anything that the deposit has earned in the meantime. By then, in all likelihood, the person will have retired or at least be in a low-income position. The person might through some adversity have to start drawing those RRSP funds out earlier. A person would not do that unless he was in a lower-income position, at which time he would have to pay tax at a lower rate.

The GST might catch up with him and the government might get back at him through that method. But I do not think the plan for the GST was to catch up on people who are avoiding paying income tax at lower income tax rates in earlier years. Some of the loopholes are described in the papers that I have before me, but in general that is it. Whatever the scheme, whatever the method, it is to reduce taxable income by putting money into an RRSP in one year and then reporting that income some year down the road, hopefully at a lower income tax rate for the person involved, and hopefully by sharing it with others. There are various methods of paying it. It is to reduce that person's income tax rate in the current year and that costs the government money.

Anytime you reduce a person's taxable income by allowing him or her to get away with paying less on income that year, both the federal and the provincial governments lose tax revenue for that year. According to the government's own figures, and it has talked about a difference of $350 million, it says that people have been avoiding paying income tax to the extent of $350 million because there have been these tax expenditures that they have been able to push ahead for future years and have put into RRSPs, thus avoiding paying tax to the extent of $350 million. That means revenue in the neighborhood of $1 billion, if they are able to push into future years. That is the kind of thing I was talking about with tax expenditures.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Beaches—Woodbine.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. You may not be aware of this but the hon. member was a Minister of Finance in the New Democratic Party Government in British Columbia a few years ago. Listening to his speech and the responses that he has given to the questions, his expertise in this area shows very clearly.

I want to follow up on the previous question and the response. We have known for years that there are kinds of money charged to middle and low-income earners every time a tax break is given to the well-off. We made as a major issue during the 1984 election campaign and also the last one the need for real tax reform.

It is very difficult for average Canadians, let alone parliamentarians, to grasp the complexities of the pension system. It is even more difficult to grasp the complexities of the tax system. When people take a look at the Income Tax Act I have heard many of them say that you have to be a Philadelphia lawyer to understand it. Even then, many of those have difficulty understanding it.

The question I want to ask is this. Surely to goodness in being fair to Canadians the government should clearly show how much it is costing middle and low-income taxpayers by making these kinds of tax benefits available to the wealthy in society. Surely it is time again to produce as a part of the financial documents that we receive from government a tax expenditure account, the item that was referred to by the hon. member.

I wonder if he could explain in the few minutes we have left exactly how that would show average Canadians how much it is actually costing them in increased taxes because someone else is not paying their fair share. Perhaps he could take a few minutes to tell us about that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has two minutes in which to respond.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, that is one of the things that the provincial ministers of finance are very interested in. Every time the federal government involves itself in another tax expenditure and reduces the income tax revenue it is also reducing it for the province since the province gets a percentage of the federal tax revenue. It is a real concern.

I can recall one budget in British Columbia where the Minister of Finance did introduce budget papers that showed the cost to the government in forgone revenue for many different programs in which the government was involved. I have only been here one year and I have not had a chance to find this out, but for all I know the federal government may also have such documents available. It is one of the things I have been intending to look at for quite some time. Perhaps it has documents, for example, that would show what it is actually costing us every time we grant another exemption or create another loophole, loopholes that allow people to avoid their fair share of income tax by putting excessive amounts of money into RRSPs.

I hope those papers are available at the federal level. I am looking forward to seeing them. I know that they have been produced provincially and cannot help but believe that they would be available federally.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to say a few words today on Bill C-52. I have listened fairly closely to the debate as it has proceeded through the House. Nearly every one of the speakers has pointed out the figures that were referred to by the previous speaker. In fact, while I was sitting here listening to the debate I looked over the debate that took place in the House yesterday on this bill. I saw that one of my caucus colleagues, the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt in his speech to the House, made this reference to the bill before us.

He said:

> Through the amendments in the registered retirement savings plan we know now that it will cost the government $300 to $350 million in the first year for these extra tax breaks to the wealthy, because they are the ones who are going to benefit. Let us be honest about it, it is the wealthier persons in the Canadian society who benefit by these tax breaks. Might not we be better off using that $350 million in insuring an extra $30 to $60 per old age security earner to ensure that they have a little more comfort.

It is not necessarily that there is a split in the NDP caucus. I think that when we talk about the government being deprived of some $300 million to $350 million in the first year because of the measures contained in this bill, that is somewhat in error. It is not the government per se that is being denied these additional tax revenues. It is Canadian taxpayers. If these wealthy Canadians are not paying their share, someone else is picking up the cost. That someone else happens to be middle and low-income earners.

When you compare what this government is proposing to do for those people who have salary ranges in the $100,000-a-year-bracket—and that is what we are talking about—and if you look at the background papers that the government supplied with this bill, you realize that to take advantage of that legislation and the provisions contained therein you must have an annual salary of around $80,000 a year and upward. You cannot possibly take advantage of any of the provisions in this legislation unless you have a disposable income of around $80,000 a year.

If you are earning $20,000 a year, you cannot take advantage of anything in this legislation. You will continue to rely on old age pensions and the Canada Pension Plan. If you are fortunate, if you happen to be one of those Canadians covered by a private pension plan, and only about 50 per cent of Canadians are, then you are out of luck. You would be out of luck in providing yourself with a decent source of income upon retirement. That is what RRSPs are. They are a personal saving vehicle for retirement.

We find that the government is bringing in this kind of proposal when what is sorely needed in this country is reform to our pension system, not this kind of reform, not reform for people making $100,000 a year, but reform for people in the low and middle-income levels on salary scales.

When you look at our pension system you realize that something like four out of every ten elderly women over the age of 60 are living in abject poverty because there is not a decent retirement income replacement system to help those people in the so-called golden years of retirement. They are not golden years for many of those people. They are years of misery when the worry from day to day is whether to spend $2 on going to visit grandchildren or whether to buy a pork chop to provide a meal for themselves. That is not decent retirement. We have a responsibility to people who have contributed in many cases 50 and 60 years of their lives to growth in the economy of Canada to provide the kinds of benefits that I, and young people as you look around the room, the pages and others, expect.

The standard of living we enjoy today did not just come about. In many cases the standard of living that we enjoy today was provided by the sacrifices of the elderly several years ago. Many of these elderly brought their kids up through the Depression, through very difficult economic times. They looked after the family during world wars that Canada participated in. Many of them lost children and loved ones, husbands and wives, in those conflicts.

Surely to goodness we have a responsibility to at least say to those people: "You have given your all for this country. You have given your all for future generations. Now it is time we gave you something back." What this government has done is to bring forward this kind of legislation which, in the context I am talking about, is absolutely obscene. It is doing that and at the same time it is proposing to claw back pension benefits that have been bought and paid for. It is not some largesse that a government has handed out to these elderly Canadians. It is something they bought and paid for. They bought and paid for it through contributions to the income tax system.

Just to spend a minute on old age security and whether or not this is some kind of largesse from a benevolent government, which it is not, up until a few years ago Canadians had a surtax on their income tax specifically to provide the funding for old age pensions. They paid for it. It was an additional amount on top of their income tax that they paid for to provide adequate pensions on retirement. That changed, of course, a number of years ago when that surtax was just buried into the income tax system. Now everybody is paying it, and nobody is complaining about that.

I think most reasonable Canadians have accepted that there are some responsibilities in society that should be shared by all of us if we want to live in a caring and humane society. It is a part of the social contract that the vast majority of Canadians recognize, except if one happens to be a Tory government member. Then it is different. Then it is largesse. The government gives and the government takes away. We have seen that since 1984.

Since the members of this government were elected in 1984 the first thing they did in their budget was to go after old age pensions to try to deindex them so that they would not be protected against the ravages of inflation. When pensioners and every decent thinking Canadian across this country said: "You ain't going to do that to my mother or my grandmother or my great grandmother, " they backed off. They realized that they had made a serious political—and I would argue moral—mistake.

It did not take them long before they were at it again when they went after spousal allowances under the Canadian Pension Plan. They want to attack them. They figured that the women should provide for their own retirement. So do women believe that, if they are given the opportunity. But they certainly do not want to be attacked because of some perceived notion that under the policies of this government women no longer need that kind of pension or retirement income.

Since then, as recently as a year and a half ago, the Minister of Finance floated a White Paper proposing legislation that would have gutted private pension plans at the federal level across this country, if he had a chance to enact it. He did not get away with it because there was such an uproar among employer and employee groups across the country. He decided to back off, especially since it was just prior to an election campaign. He re-examined his options. That White Paper is still sitting there, though. I would put money on it, Mr. Speaker, that before we see the end of this government we are going to see legislation based on that White Paper. I say that because it has something against pensioners. I do not know what it is. Freud could have had a ball with that kind of question in examining the relationships of members opposite with their parents. But the government seems to have a problem with pensioners and pension plans.

We saw again in the last budget the clawback of pensions for anyone making $50,000 a year. "Anybody making $50,000 a year does not deserve to receive the OAS". The government tries to leave the impression and make the argument about why bank presidents should receive old age pensions. That argument does not wash. Bank presidents are entitled to old age pensions because they paid for them.

In any event, if the government is concerned about bank presidents receiving old age pensions, the way to deal with that problem is not to grab the pension. It is to deal with it through the income tax structure. If people are earning too much money, whether that money includes salaries earned, pensions earned through the bank, stocks that the guy has earned through the banks, old age pensions and the Canada Pension Plan, and if you combine that and say that this individual is not entitled to receive all that money on retirement, then change the Income Tax Act—reform the Income Tax Act. Say that if you are earning $100,000 a year, then you pay your fair share of taxes. We could care less where the earnings come from, whether it is a pension system or anything else. But you do not attack the program that is universal, that everyone accepts and supports because everybody receives the same benefit.

If you attack that, you attack the program. That is exactly what the government has done. When it went into that clawback it did something against what was sacrosanct up until that point, that is, against the universality of social programs. The government ended universality of old age pensions when it did that.

Today, it is talking about someone earning $50,000 a year. Ten years from now about a quarter of the Canadian population—by all forecasts that I have seen—who would otherwise have been entitled to old age pension benefits will not get them because of the way that this government has structured and formulated the tables on that clawback system.

While it looks like relatively few people today would be affected by the clawback, in 10 to 15 years from now 75 per cent of pension recipients will be affected by that clawback provision.

It was not only pensions the government went after, it went after family allowances. The government has ended universality in that area as well, at a time when we all know—if anybody wants to take a look at the facts, and certainly the government has a responsibility to do that—that there are literally exploding numbers of kids in Canada who were relying on food banks in order to get a meal.

If that is not enough, the government is proposing to introduce a GST, a sales tax, initially of 9 per cent, now reduced to 7 per cent. Whether it is 9 per cent or 7 per cent, to those parents whose kids are now having a hard time finding meals and who are trying to put clothes on their kids' backs and shoes on their feet that 7 per cent represents a reduction in their ability to do that. Very many of these parents are single parents headed by family members who happen to be women. It is a direct attack on the disposable income of another 7 per cent. If that is not enough, they will have to go on the unemployment insurance program.

They say: "If you have not had enough pain and suffering, then we are going to make sure that if you become unemployed there ain't going to be any safety net for you". I suppose it is Tory philosophy to force people to be self-reliant, to teach people to be self-reliant and look after themselves.

That is the argument they used years ago when they opposed the introduction of old age pensions. If you give anybody $50 a month old age pension, went the argument at that time, they won't save for their own retirement. They argued that in a very real way, not only on the floor of the House of Commons, they even went so far as to take a delegation over to the Privy Council in Westminster, London, in the United Kingdom, to argue that what the federal government was trying to do at that time was unconstitutional under the British North America Act.

Mr. Fisher: The Tories did that?

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): The Tories did that. They have never supported pensions. They have never supported that kind of decency that other ordinary Canadians accepted years ago. They are still working at it.

I think it is totally unacceptable. I and other members of my caucus agree that there has to be pension reform. But it has to be real pension reform, not for those people in the $100,000-a-year bracket. When you bring in this kind of pension reform that we see here today what the government is asking low and middle-income Canadians to do is to pay for it once again. I think that is unacceptable. We will not be supporting this legislation for that very same reason. I understand why many Canadians would be attracted to RRSPs. It is because there is an inadequate private public pension system to provide them with adequate pensions on retirement. I can understand that, and I have some sympathy for them.

I would make the argument that they would be far better off by putting pressure on that gang over there to bring in proper pension reform, to provide every Canadian with a decent level of retirement income at age 60 or age 65, or in many cases now as a result of the attacks of this government against VIA Rail, those older workers who may never find another decent paying job because of the kind of community they live in, very many of which are remote. Because of that they may never again be employed. That is a terrible thing to say in a country that is as rich as ours.

We may have to take a look at reforming the public pension system to provide for earlier retirement than at age 60, to provide for retirement at the age of 55, if you happen to be an older worker in that kind of community where the government has deprived you of a job in order to provide that individual with an adequate support system.

I can see you are indicating to me that my time is up, Mr. Speaker. You have been extremely generous.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 10 minutes in questions and comments if he would like to take it the next time the bill comes up in the House.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

INDUSTRY

IMPORT-REPLACEMENT PRODUCTION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consult with industry and trade unions to develop measures to increase import-replacement production in Canada, particularly in the higher-technology sectors such as machinery production.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will start out where my colleague has just finished in some senses, that is to point out that as we start the 1990s this country is facing serious economic problems. We are facing the problems in Atlantic Canada with a special force. We are seeing it in our fisheries with tremendous shut-downs of fish processing plants. These problems are not just in the fishing industry. The Prime Minister yesterday tried to suggest that it was only in the fisheries that Atlantic Canada faced serious problems. I have talked recently with steel producers in Cape Breton, in Sydney, who have told me that their workforce has shrunk in the past eight years from close to 4,000 workers to about 700 workers. It is likely that we will see significantly further increases take place. The same thing is happening in the coal industry, not just in Cape Breton but elsewhere in Atlantic Canada.

Not only the Atlantic provinces are facing the economic problems I just mentioned. We see the same thing happening in the province of Quebec. There are some very serious problems in the shipbuilding industry. Today for instance, there is a report in the paper about members of the Quebec Conservative Caucus who asked the government about support for shipyards in the province of Quebec, and it is clear that the industry cannot count on that support.

[English]

One can see the same thing in Ontario and in parts of Quebec in the major problems which exist in both those provinces in the automotive industry. Certainly I see it in my home constituency. I also see it in the city of Windsor itself. I see it in St. Catharines, in Toronto, in Oshawa, in Ste. Thérèse in Quebec. Right across the whole of industrial Ontario and Quebec one sees that this industry, which has been the engine of economic progress and growth for Ontario and Quebec and to a significant degree for the entire country, has been hit with lay-offs, some of them temporary, but far too many of them permanent. These lay-offs are hitting workers in General Motors in their van plant in Toronto, lay-offs which are hitting workers in St. Catharines that are permanent, lay-offs in Ford in its engine plants in my constituency, lay-offs in Ste. Thérèse which I fear may turn out to be permanent.

These same economic problems exist across the prairie provinces. Earlier this past year when I was in Portage La Prairie, one of the largest employers, Campbell Soup, was shutting down its operations and consolidating its operations as a consequence of the free trade deal.

One can see the farm economy right across western Canada being hard hit directly and, therefore, the offshoots of that farm economy itself being very, very hard it, for example, food processing, machinery manufacturing that contribute to inputs to the farm economy itself.

We have just heard that this sense of serious problems in the Canadian economy is reaching British Columbia. The resource sector is being especially hard-hit. The west coast fisheries are being hit with serious threats to processing plants as a consequence of GATT decisions.

As well, some of our mining and mineral industries such as Cominco in Kimberley, B.C. in the Kootenays are telling 700 plus workers and another 200 or 300 staff people that their jobs are being eliminated. That is in a town of 6,000 people, so we are looking at devastation for that community.

We can see many changes in economic policy which are required in the face of some of these serious problems. We see, for instance, the need to cut interest rates in this country to a sensible level. Historically, we have never had a gap of 4.5 percentage points between interest rates in Canada and the United States. Yet that is what this government continues to support.

We can see the immense importance of serious rules to govern plant closings so that a company cannot simply decide that because it can make more money in the United States, it can shut down its operations in Canada and transfer production to the United States. There has to be a possibility for workers in communities that are affected to be able to examine the books of companies in those situations, and if those companies are making money to be able to take those operations over with the support of community development funds to make sure that jobs and communities are preserved.

We need the development of regional development banks which will be able to see that in poorer parts of Canada that assistance in the form of capital, at lower interest rates, is available to help small producers, to help new businesses establish new jobs.

We have to see the potential for a general system of variations in interest rates so that poorer parts of the country suffering much less from any inflationary pressure are able to have access to capital at significantly lower rates of interest. They have done this in Japan for many years. It is something that we could do in Canada quite readily.

We have to put much more emphasis on research and development, not just in the industrial sector of our economy, but right across our economy.

However, and this is what the motion deals with, we need a bottom-up approach to industrial planning for the future of this country so as to make much more use of the skills which we have here in Canada; to be able to use the resources which we have in this country in a way that will see to it that the many Canadians who are out of work are combined with the resources which exist in this country to produce new items which we have been importing, and in the process produce jobs to save communities and give many Canadians a future.

We have to look especially at some of our key industries in the higher technology areas. We have to use models which have already been used in this country. We have to look at some of the things which were attempted in the early part of the 1980s in the automotive sector. For instance, in 1983 a report was produced entitled "An Automotive Strategy for Canada" which came from a federal task force established to look at the problems of the automotive industry. It was a task force which was co-chaired by the president of the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association, somebody from the employer's side in short, and by Bob White, the then director for Canada, now president of the Canadian Autoworkers. It included as members the president of Chrysler Canada, the president of General Motors of Canada, the director of research for the Canadian Autoworkers Association, and the vice-president of planning for Magna International. Therefore, it included a number of parts producers, a number of vehicle manufacturers and some trade union input.

We can look as well at the 1986 report when this government itself saw fit to establish a task force. This was an even more widely-based task force which was co-chaired by the president of American Motors, by the president of the Automotive Parts Producers and by the president of the Canadian Autoworkers. It included representatives of the federal government, provincial governments as well as representatives of the vehicle manufacturers, of parts manufacturers and key people from different trade unions.

From these two reports ideas have emerged of building up the capacity to produce in this country more of what we consume in this country. There were commitments and suggestions for better training, so that we do not again reach a situation such as that which emerged a couple of years ago in the auto industry in my community. It was then necessary for some of the big auto producers to bring into Canada skilled workers from Europe because these skilled workers were not available in this country.

It was absolute nonsense that at a time when unemployment was so high in this country, instead of being able to recruit skilled workers who had been trained in this country, these companies had to go overseas on special recruitment drives to bring in skilled workers from abroad. The task force report suggested we had to establish the support in this country for serious effective training, something which my colleague for Saskatoon—Dundurn is responsible for talking about in our caucus. We put forward a good many ideas for improving training right across this country, but the suggestions made specifically with respect to the automotive industry were set out in these reports.

It was also suggested, however, that we had to use trade policy so that these industries employed more Canadians. It was suggested that we needed commitments from some of the new companies that were setting up production facilities such as Toyota, Honda and Hyundai, commitments that they would meet the same level of Canadian content in their sales in Canada which the American based automotive producers have to meet, 60 per cent Canadian content targets.

It was also suggested that some incentives be provided to improve Canadian production in the parts sector. It was suggested that once we had all automotive companies producing on the same basis that those companies should have to gradually increase their commitments so that, for instance, they might reach the level of Britain. Britain requires that companies that sell major output to the British market in the automotive sector have to produce 80 per cent of their output, 80 per cent of what they sell has to be made up by British value added.

It seems to me that there are a great many import sectors across our economy where this kind of philosophy could be put into effect. If we look only at the last three years, we can see that situation in the case of chemicals, electronic tubes, or electronic components. For instance, in chemicals there were over $7 billion worth of imports into this country in 1988, and in the case of electronic components almost $6 billion worth of imports. But the area where this import level is most scandalous is in machinery production. In 1986 there were almost $11 billion worth of imports. By 1988, there were over $13 billion worth of imports into this country compared with exports of about $4.5 billion. So there is a massive trade deficit in this area and in many cases a trade deficit in areas where we are major producers of final products using this machinery.

For instance, we import massive amounts of pulp and paper machinery. We import massive amounts of mining machinery, despite the fact that we are producers almost unparalleled in the world in pulp and paper and in the case of many mining products. Yet, we do not produce the machinery here in this country.

I very much hope that the House would eventually be able to support a motion such as mine before us today which says that we should get serious. We should set up task forces of employers, of workers, of communities, of governments to work together to plan ways that we can see to it that we produce the machinery, the other specialized hi-tech imports which can give us the jobs for the future which we need in this country, which our people right across Canada desperately need, and which will be a solution to the economic problems that are so serious from Atlantic Canada right to the west coast of British Columbia. I urge this House to support this kind of motion for our economic future.

• (1720)

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the motion of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor and I believe I can offer some useful insight on this subject. I will try to respect my notes because I think my hon. colleague went a little bit outside of his motion.

In Canada, industrial development has so far been based mostly on our abundance of natural resources and easy access to markets. However, in today's global economy, our success will depend increasingly on our scientific and technological capabilities and appropriate macro-economic policies.

If we want to maintain our position as one of the great industrial and economic powers, we must improve our industry's competitive position on international markets by integrating our efforts in science and technology. We must consider the future of Canadian industries within the context of world markets and acquire competitive edge based on the excellence of our products and processes.

In its first term which started in 1984, this government recognized the importance of a competitive industrial economy, whose growth was based on the private sector, when it made a commitment to Canada's economic renewal. To that end, it took a number of macro-economic initiatives. These included tax reform, designed to stimulate consumer spending by reducing taxes on individuals and to increase business confidence by reducing corporate income tax. They included as well adopting a science and technology policy that provided for a substantial increase in public funding to encourage research and development in industry as well as other scientific activities.

The creation of Industry, Science and Technology Canada was another initiative taken by the government in response to growing international competition and the rapid pace of technological change affecting products and manufacturing processes.

Up until now the Canadian economy has adapted remarkably well to the trade liberalization triggered by the series of GATT rounds. Our industries have progressively increased their operations, their specialization and their effectiveness. This government firmly believes that free trade between Canada and the United States will pave the way for Canadian industries to improve their performance and compete not only on the American market but also on world markets.

The first priority of Industry, Science and Technology Canada—and of the government, for that matter—is to make sure that we as Canadians can compete on the international scene. Indeed my colleague referred to that earlier when he spoke about Quebec's shipyards. Mr. Speaker, I simply fail to see how the NDP Members can talk about Quebec's shipyards, for we can always encourage— There is a will to support industries, as my colleague pointed out, but we know they are not always competitive. A good example would be the Hon. Member for LaSalle—Émard (Mr. Martin), a leading businessman. He established his own multinational corporation and seldom misses an opportunity to brag about that in his campaign, but we happen to know that he bought his last seven ships in Brazil. What a way to encourage Quebec! We can also encourage our industry, but when we no longer build ships— My colleague is probably not listening to me but he ought to seek more information. Supporting labour unions is fine, but so is promoting productivity.

I am pleased when people talk about car manufacturers because I happen to live next door to Sainte-Thérèse, as you know, and Windsor is not the only place where people can make cars. I listened to the NDP Member brag about talking to the labour unions and helping them, yet, Mr. Speaker, we know that their own candidate in Chambly, listen to this, it may be worth your while—

His own candidate in Chambly—and we know that the NDP is pro-union—named the Lada "car of the year" when he was with the APA, the Automobile Protection Association. Think of it: the Lada as car of the year! You should be ashamed to say that you represent the unions, because Lada is a Russian car made with Italian parts and as a driver I can tell you that there was no worse piece of junk!

Anyway, if members of the New Democratic Party encourage such things, they really have a nerve to talk about it in the House. I know about it because I was in the car business and close to the candidate who is running in Chambly. You always have to look at yourself in the mirror.

He then talked about the problem of the fisheries and he probably does not even know the real problem with the fisheries because I just spoke with the minister and it seems that it is not quite as he said.

He talked about Sainte-Thérèse. Certainly the government is proud that it can say today in the House that we supported the auto industry, whether in Sainte-Thérèse or in Bromont. We saved Sainte-Thérèse and with it, over 3,000 jobs. So I think that the government has fulfilled its responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the NDP often boasts of being more Catholic than the Pope, but sometimes I have serious doubts when they encourage sales of Ladas, which are not even made here. You could buy one for $6,000 and two weeks later, if you wanted to return it, it was worth only $400. I have serious questions. The candidate running in Chambly did that. The hon. member—the candidate in Chambly. He is not a member of Parliament and I hope he never will be. In any case, that is what you are doing, and it must be hard to convince people you are pro-union, when you urge people to buy a car made in Russia that was a complete disaster. So let's be realistic!

Mr. Speaker, we are trying to improve our competitive position internationally by taking a specific approach that consists in: defending the needs of industry, as we have done, to ensure it is not overlooked when setting essential, macro-economic policies; conducting joint initiatives with industry to help it improve product quality and increase market share within a reasonable length of time, as we did with General Motors in Sainte-Thérèse; ensuring that government aid is compatible with our international obligations and treaties; providing increased aid and services for industry to promote development and dissemination of strategic technologies, market development and other innovation-oriented activities; providing less financial assistance for manufacturing facilities and more for research and development and technological development—as the hon. member said earlier, we need people with better training for certain industries.

These objectives and the focus of ISTC were established following close consultations in early 1988 with the provinces and representatives of national organizations as well as with people from the business, scientific and academic communities. These groups generally supported the mandate and direction of ISTC and helped us determine which initiatives should be a priority.

One of ISTC's major new initiatives has been to promote the development of strategic technologies that are essential to enhancing the competitive position of a wide range of industries, and I am referring to advanced industrial materials, biotechnology and information technology.

Today, the focus is on three main objectives: to support the creation of research and development alliances between business and universities in order to develop and disseminate new technologies; to support the creation of alliances focussing on technology applications in order to promote risk-sharing in connection with research and development projects and certain feasibility studies; and to promote technology management in a joint effort by ISTC, industry and universities.

Under the Technology Outreach Program, we are trying to improve productivity and competitiveness, especially in small businesses, by accelerating the acquisition, development and dissemination of new technology and essential skills.

• (1730)

Mr. Speaker, I could also talk about advantageous initiatives and sector competitiveness, but I am running out of time.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to inform the House that two major objectives underlie all ISTC initiatives, and these are to defend the interests of business and the scientific community in cabinet, in areas such as taxation, transport and energy; to provide businesses with support and information to help them market their products and acquire new technology; and to increase competitiveness and adapt to the new business climate.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to thank my hon. colleague from Windsor, Ontario for raising this motion in the House today. It is a timely and extremely important issue which deserves our attention and our action.

As we can see from the headlines in the daily newspapers, our world is changing. We are facing lay-offs in the forestry industry. In Bas-Caraquet the fish packing plant is closed. In Shippagan the plant is in receivership. In Canso, North Sydney, Lockeport, Wood Harbour, Port Medway, Port Mouton the plants are closed. Small towns across the country are boarding up windows and closing down.

Obviously we simply cannot rely on our fishery, our forests and our farms to provide jobs and wealth in this country. We are now emerging from a global round of competition which, by all reports, indicate that we must re-evaluate our economic and political priorities. In this highly competitive and creative world our traditional policies are just not good enough any longer. We have to alter our course.

The second half of this decade has been characterized by the restructuring, on a global scale, of companies trying to adjust to the new international environment.

Before setting our goals, we must know our roots. History shows that most firms base their economic and social policies on their national culture.

Ironically, Canada's problems derive from its strengths. Our natural resources have always provided us with a high standard of living. But, even though we cut down more trees than any other country, we are still importing chain saws. In 1987, the value of imported manufactured goods in Canada exceeded that of exported goods by $24 billion, which represents $460 million a week.

For example, we are importing 76 per cent of our machinery, 40 per cent of our electrical appliances and 80 per cent of our medical equipment.

[English]

Trade in advanced technology has grown almost twice as fast as trade in general. By 1995 trade in computers, aerospace equipment, electronic machinery and pharmaceuticals will account for one-quarter of total world exports. But Canada is largely missing out on this growing opportunity. For example, in 1980 our trade deficit in high-tech products totalled $4.6 billion. By 1987 this deficit increased to over $7 billion.

Recently we were told that Canada has experienced its first monthly merchandise trade deficit in thirteen and a half years. It is particularly noteworthy that this deficit included a sharp increase in imports of machinery and equipment during that month.

As the Premier of Ontario told the National Forum of Science and Technology Advisory Council this past June:

> Increasingly, we are exporting yesterday's goods, and importing tomorrow's technology.

We are currently putting 1.3 per cent of our Gross National Product into research and development. Our competitors are doing twice that much. For example, 7 per cent of Ontario manufacturing industries do not have even one engineer on staff. So what can they do but import products, technologies and the very knowledge needed to put them to use.

If we want to win in the international arena and thereby protect and enhance the quality of life of our citizens we must set our sights on competing with the very best. In an article published by The Globe and Mail last March Dr. Larkin Kerwin, President of the National Research Council wrote:

Canadians face some very unpleasant facts. Among the world's industrial nations, we rank as technological illiterates; we have become incompetents in the unfolding scientific civilization.

So what can we do about that? To start, we have to work together. Internationally speaking, Canada is simply too small to risk diluting its strength by each of us moving in different directions. We must work together and mobilize all of our sectors in a national effort. We must address this problem on a national scale.

This is not an issue which can be resolved in isolation of a federal, provincial or municipal government or by industry and labour alone. This is a problem which requires the collective effort by all elements of society. For example, in Ontario the government has brought together some of the finest minds from the world of business, labour, the academic community, and government and established a special council. This premiers' council was set up to develop an internationally competitive economy. Basically, its goal is to produce a game plan for building on existing strengths and creating new ones.

The council is working to restructure core industries and to invest in high gross and emerging industries. It is also addressing the need for investment in people through education and skill training. Sub-committees of the council hold public forums in schools, factories and union halls.

The concept for the council was borrowed from the Japanese who have a council which is chaired by the Japanese Prime Minister. Clearly, this is the kind of co-operative constructive action that we need on a national level. But there is something else we must consider.

New industries and new technology is vital but if we are to take full advantage of it we must have the skill, the entrepreneurial people to use it, transfer it, and ensure that it benefits all.

Along with government incentives to manufacturers and technology—based industry, we must work together to create a well educated and highly skilled workforce. All the incentives and all the investment in the world will be useless unless we have a workforce with the ability to adapt and learn the constantly changing skills of the modern workplace.

Interestingly enough, the Southern Literacy Study estimates that as many as 5 million Canadians are functionally illiterate. Although it is very difficult to estimate the cost of illiteracy, a Woods Gordon study conducted for the Business Task Force on Literacy put the cost to Canadian business in the range of $4 billion per year due to lost productivity, increased training costs and industrial accidents. The estimated cost to Canadian society as a whole is as high as $10 billion per year.

The problem is getting worse. Increasing technological sophistication in the workplace and in society generally has raised the level of reading, writing, and number skills required to be functionally literate.

An article in The Globe and Mail this fall indicated that 50 per cent of factories use high technology. This is the technology that is necessary to lower costs and make these companies more competitive. The article also indicates that in 53 per cent of the plants, managers encountered problems trying to hire skilled people to work with the advanced technologies. Obviously, efforts to increase the proportion of our economy involved in the manufacturing industry will be for nothing unless we have prepared our workforce to perform these new tasks. It is therefore absolutely vital that any effort between the government, industry and trade unions to increase domestic productions in high technology sectors must also include a commitment to work together to combat illiteracy and to increase the skill level in our workforce. Therefore, there is no doubt that focusing on the high technology manufacturing sector will pay off richly in terms of jobs, trade balances and the economic well-being of Canadian communities.

For example, a recent consultant report indicates that the city of Kanata, known as "Silicone Valley North" will see huge growth in the next 10 years. In fact, they estimate that employment in the high technology sector which now employs 7,000 people in this city will quadruple by the turn of the century.

Around the world we are seeing a new spirit of co-operation between government, businesses and people. That same spirit must be represented here in Canada amongst all the various sectors of our nation if we are to ensure that the step into the next century will be alongside the economic leaders in the world.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment as I begin. I believe the opportunity to speak during Private Members' Hour on Private Members' Bills and Motions is very important. I believe some of the most meaningful debate actually takes places here. I am pleased to have the opportunity and I thank my colleague for Essex—Windsor for introducing the motion today.

I suggest there is very little difference among people in all parties on many items when it comes to developing our industries, especially our high-tech and advance industries on which our future will depend. I think all members will agree that there should be more R & D. There should be more development and co-operation with industry, with the universities, with unions and with all parties that can work together to forge success in this area.

However, there may be many differences as to the approaches we take to achieve those priorities. I would like to refer to one example that was used by the Member for Essex—Windsor. It is one that is near and dear to my heart. When it comes to the forest industry in Canada no one in the world can produce lumber like we can. When it comes to the technology surrounding it, although we have many of the fresh ideas and new thoughts, the blooms of this new technology, we really have not been as successful in the development of that industry.

I would concur that that is an area in which we should be working with the universities for their R & D, and with small business and large business to try to encourage that development. It is extremely important that this business, when developed, is good sound business that can survive.

The member for member from Essex—Windsor gave us the example of pulp and paper equipment as something that we should be developing ourselves. I would be the first to say "Good. Let's get at it." Let us see if we can be competitive.

It would not be very realistic to think that we could develop equipment strictly for the use of Canadians. If we develop something in pulp and paper technology it has to have a wider economic base than just Canada and would obviously have to be successful world-wide. We cannot just close our border for our own use of all the pulp and paper equipment or all electric motors that we use.

In order to develop this new technology, our priority should be to focus on international competitiveness. That is one way we can make that development work.

Any effort by Canada in the past to look inwards has not worked. Import replacement policies, as it is referred to, involves a number of practices that do not sit well with the economic realities of today's competitive world, nor do they accord well with the views of the present government on how best to achieve sustained economic growth.

In the past some industries were often selected by the government of the day as having growth potential. They were then given support and this support usually meant putting up trade barriers or non tariff barriers for the import of goods from other countries in the hope that the essential ingredients for sustained commercial success would be achieved by these industries.

These so-called infant industries were supposed to grow big and strong and stand on their own feet. In many cases, this did not happen. Those infant industries just did not grow up. The end result was that we were forcing on our own economy higher prices and inefficiency. It is that type of inward looking growth that we must try to avoid.

These approaches were inappropriate for the 1950s, 1960s, and even the 1970s. In some instances they led to the establishment in Canada of successful industries, but very few. In a world now that requires intense competition and rapid change, that is not the direction in which I feel we should be going.

One of the keys on which we have to focus in Canada if we are going to achieve that success, and one on which this government has been focusing, is the program of excellence, whether it be in industry, in our universities or in small business.

We must be able to produce and supply what the markets demand and, most important, at the right price. We must be competitive. This requires the right combination of up-to-date technology, the right mix of inputs, good delivery and servicing, flexibility and just plain old fashioned good management. We cannot hope to do everything well. We must find a niche in which we can succeed, where we can take competitive advantages and build on it until we are successful.

Another area to which the government is giving greater consideration is the removal of some our interior barriers. It is not enough to take down the barrier in trading between here and the United States because in many cases inter-provincial trade is very limited. We should be addressing that question and I am glad to say that the provinces and the federal government are co-operating in this area.

I am proud to be a part of this government which I believe is taking some very commendable steps through the Department of Industry, Science and Technology for initiatives that will go a long way toward achieving many of the successes that we have been talking about here today.

There is much more I would like to say on this topic but the time is short. In conclusion, it is obvious that the aim of the government is to create in Canada a program of excellence for industry on a world class science and technology base. The government has renewed and strengthened this commitment to R and D and to co-operative efforts with industry. It is the task of this new department to translate this commitment into action.

The key today is global trading. In Canada especially, we know that we can succeed, but there is a real risk of failing if we look too much inward. There are prime examples of this around the world. China has been an inward looking economy and government, surrounded by smaller, but so much more successful centres of economic excellence. Singapore, Taiwan, Hong Kong, these are all peoples of the same nationality with great success because they look to the world for their market.

There is a similar example we see in Europe, with East Germany and West Germany. One is looking inward and the other is looking to the world markets, building on their successes, building their technological excellence. Why should we in Canada do anything different?

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my thoughts to those of my colleagues, especially the member from Cariboo—Chilcotin who gave an excellent speech. I would like to add my thoughts on the motion put forward by my hon. colleague the member for Essex—Windsor, who proposes that the government develop measures to increase import replacement production in Canada.

Import replacement is a somewhat archaic concept, since it takes us back to the notion of small, inefficient industries protected by high tariff walls. In today's global economy, a company cannot rely on servicing only a small captive market. Successive trade liberalization efforts under GATT have progressively lowered the tariffs since the end of World War II.

Combined with the increasing output of newly industrialized countries, it means that our industries are facing increasing competition at home and abroad and are themselves challenging others in an international marketplace. Given the dependence of our economy on international trade, inward looking protectionist measures are not the road to survival and success. The key is to enhance the competitiveness of Canadian industry.

At the time of the Depression tariff walls were 80 per cent higher than they are today. As we have lowered them, Canada has become increasingly competitive and we should only seek to do more of this in the future.

It was in this spirit that the Prime Minister announced in August, 1987, the creation of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology and charged it with the mandate of building up Canadian industry's international competitiveness with all sectors and with both overseas and home markets in mind.

We need world-class industries to create and maintain a world-class economy. Import replacement is not a viable development strategy. Canadian companies must develop innovative technologies and products and achieve sufficient scale in production to address the world market. Only then can they sustain the continuous reinvestment that is required to generate future generations of products. The Canadian market is simply not big enough.

For example, Canada is a world leader in telecommunications. This industry is the engine that drives all our high technology sectors. With global sales of over $8 billion, it employs over 150,000 highly skilled, knowledgeable workers. Our world strength in telecommunications has come about because of a coincidence of geography and government policy. Our country is so vast, the communication challenge is so great that we had to become world leaders. We had to break new ground.

Today this industry is responding to the challenges offered to it by nations all around the world.

The rapidly growing companies that make up this industry must expand into new global markets to ensure their future. More generally, ISTC consultations with industry have pointed out that unless we respond quickly as a nation to build on our successes and develop our comparative advantage in areas like information technologies, we will be rapidly surpassed by the newly industrialized nations like Korea, Taiwan, Singapore and the others that my colleague from Cariboo—Chilcotin mentioned.

These countries are making investments necessary to emerge as the tigers of the 21st century. As they make these investments and as their economies grow, wages increase and the standard of living increases. It has increased rapidly. Many of these countries are what I would call economic miracles.

The appropriate role for government is to encourage Canadian industry to become and remain competitive. For example, through establishing appropriate macro-economic and other policies, disseminating information on changing domestic and international circumstances and market opportunities, and providing specific services where needed. We must examine new ways of doing business. We must explore new options.

One of the most important advantages that any Canadian manufacturer in whatever sector, for example, machinery or textiles, has over a foreign competitor is time. What every customer seeks is the right product at the right place and perhaps more importantly at the right time. This is why officials at ISTC are spending considerable effort to encourage Canadian industry to put in place and use more efficient and speedy communication linkages between raw material suppliers, equipment suppliers, manufacturers, retailers and consumers. Such linkages are facilitated through encouragement and support to industry associations and councils.

Through sector competitiveness initiatives, ISTC works with selected industry sectors as well as other government departments and agencies to identify constraints and opportunities, define industry-wide needs and put together in co-operation with industry a fully integrated and complementary action plan to realize these opportunities. This comprehensive approach will help to ensure the future strength of those industries in the market-place.

Another positive, forward-looking initiative to which the government has devoted a lot of time and energy is that of encouraging the development of Canadian suppliers, particularly small business, to the federal government. In collaboration with the Departments of Supply and Services, Transport and National Defence, Industry Science and Technology has worked on the source development program. Source development is a concept designed to provide industry with historical market information on federal purchases, particularly by National Defence and Transport, Transport currently contracting outside of Canada or having low over-all Canadian content.

This is particularly important to us in western Canada where historically the federal government has purchased few products. This is gradually and slowly working. We are optimistic that it will continue.

Tax reform, strengthening international partnerships, deficit control through spending restraint, and good management all contribute to the government objectives of building a strong and fully competitive economy. Innovative and forward-looking industrial strategies are also essential. That is why the ISTC is working with industry and universities to bring about a greater and more effective integration of our scientific, technological and industrial activities to improve commercial competitiveness.

In conclusion, it is not by imposing trade barriers but by improving our competitive strength on a continual basis that we can effectively forestall excessive import penetration. Indeed, increased imports are not a cause for concern if they are a reflection of increased rationalization and specialization by Canadian producers on fewer but highly competitive products which are successfully exported.

• (1800)

Such trends are evident in a number of areas. In some sectors of machinery, aerospace and other industries, while imports are still substantial our exports in these sectors in niche products and niche markets have been improving significantly for over two decades.

These challenges and choices we face as a nation can best be addressed by outward looking policies focused on being internationally competitive rather than by backward and inward looking protectionist policies.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, on December 5, I stood in the House to ask the government to explain its agricultural program cuts in light of the negotiations that are ongoing with regard to subsidies in the GATT round of negotiations.

I posed this question in part because a few days before, on the weekend, the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds had been speaking to the Alberta Wheat Pool in Calgary and he was quoted as saying in the Calgary Herald of Saturday, December 2, that he was assuring the Pool delegates that Canada is not about to make changes to its agricultural subsidy programs during the current round of international trade negotiations without similar moves by other nations. He was quoted as saying that we have no intention of getting into a situation where we give up some of our support unless other countries are doing the same thing.

It was very hard to understand how the minister could say that with a straight face after having been in the negotiations for three or four years. During that time, Canada has given up the two-price wheat system. We have given up interest free cash advances to farmers. We have virtually given up tax rebates for farm fuel to farmers. They have been cut another 65 per cent as of January 1 of this year. We knew the cut was coming when I asked the question.

Research funds have been cut or frozen, meaning that there are less funds to do the same amount of work next year because of the inflation that exists in research. Crop insurance funding carried by the federal government dropped from 45 per cent of the total cost to something like 25 per cent of the total cost.

There are probably even more programs that I could have listed in Question Period at the time. It is obvious that the government is not following the policy that the minister outlined in Calgary. I wanted to get some of the ministers to explain why they were, in fact, giving up what the U.S. considers to be subsidies under their producer subsidy equivalent program that they are touting in these international talks when none of the other countries are.

We gave up interest free cash advances while the Americans continue their advance program. We have given up our two-price wheat program which had the effect in low markets of paying the farmer more money for his wheat that was to be consumed domestically while the Americans continue a massive subsidy program to their farmers.

Since that time, the Americans have also continued and stepped up their export enhancement program, a program that raised the ire of this House on all sides when they began paying from $7 to $12 a tonne to customers to take their grain from them. They are now up to $20.95 a tonne on the last major sales to China and U.S.S.R.

The U.S. continues to increase its aid to farmers with the money it is pouring into agriculture, while this government responds by reducing the amount of aid, even though the talks are ongoing. This concerns me, my party, and farmers as well because when this kind of negotiation is going on, ultimately at the end of the round all sides are asked to lay their cards on the table, so to speak, and name which programs they are going to cut. While there is a clause at the beginning of this round that says that cuts made during the program should count at the end of the day, they really do not. In all previous negotiations what normally counts is what is put on the table at that particular time and that is what the Americans and Europeans will demand again this time.

In my supplementary question I raised concerns about how these program cuts were harming existing programs and I referred to a copy of a memo that I had received from the agriculture research branch, namely, the Animal Research Centre, whereby the director notifies all staff as follows:

> We have now put together a clearer picture of the Animal Research Centre's financial situation. As a result, I must advise you that there can be no further purchases of supplies or services from now until March 31, 1990. This includes travel, rentals, stock from B.R.C. stores, etc.
> Steps have been taken to ensure that our livestock and poultry will have all basic requirements met. We are currently reviewing all avenues to determine whether any research activities can be continued. However, until further notice, no expenditures will be approved.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, we have this great research centre sitting there unable to conduct any research and concerned that it may not even be able to feed the animals that it has.

I did not get any response from the Minister of State for Agriculture on that issue and I would hope that today the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture will be able to shed some light on these cuts and try to justify why his government persists in cutting back funding to agriculture and reducing the research impact that the department has.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this government certainly has supported the needs of the Canadian agri-food industry and it has never wavered here at home or internationally.

The hon. member for Mackenzie is taking us to task for adjustments that have been made to our agricultural programs over the last year. Of course we have had to make adjustments; the changes taking place in agriculture demand it. And I can assure the hon. member that we will continue to respond to the changing agriculture environment. These adjustments to our policies and programs have been consistent with the objectives outlined in the national agriculture strategy signed by federal and provincial agriculture ministers in 1986. They are consistent with the national policy review we are currently leading.

The hon. member has suggested that our agriculture policy is authored by our international trading partners and that they are GATT driven. This is simply not the case. The government has and will continue to develop agriculture policy that meets Canadians' needs and conditions.

Yes, we have adjusted our programs in a way that also reflects our goal and approach in the MTN. This does not mean we have softened in the defence of our agri-food industry. We firmly maintain our right to design programs that suit Canadians' needs but are also consistent with our international obligations.

That is why Canada is working hard with other countries for international trade reform through multilateral trade negotiations. We expect all countries will agree to adjust their policies consistent with the new rules that are being negotiated. This will reduce trade distortions and lead to a fairer and more open international trading system.

I also want to assure the hon. member that this government remains committed to agriculture research in Canada. Agriculture Canada is a leader in this area with an annual research budget of $250 million. We will continue to support this activity to meet the needs of the agri-food industry.

In fact, research at our Central Experimental Farm here in Ottawa is being enhanced and refocused to reflect industry concerns. This is also happening at the Animal Research Centre in Ottawa because industry has picked up long-term animal breeding technology developed at the centre. The arc is now moving toward the development of new technology to improve animal production. The centre is reorienting its research programs toward the key areas of safety and quality of food, animal bio-technology, animal behaviour and environmental quality. However, the centre is moving in these scientific directions at the same time as existing programs are being completed. Because of this, the centre was heading toward a serious budget overrun in this transition period and extra controls had to be imposed.

Funding to the centre has not been cut and frozen, as the hon. member has stated. Rather, expenditures are being managed and controlled within the existing budget for the remainder of the fiscal year. This is not only ensuring that the centre can continue to provide essential services but also that it has this flexibility to meet urgent needs and maintain ongoing research programs. We are trying to do the maximum research with the resources available.

This government is committed to providing the sort of agricultural policies and programs that are in tune with the needs of our agri-food industry and we will continue to adjust these policies and our programs.

Adjournment Debate

EMERGENCY MEASURES

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today during today's adjournment debate to speak on an issue which is of great importance.

On October 18 of last year, one day after the devastating San Francisco earthquake, I rose in the House to ask the Minister of National Defence about the government's lack of support for programs relating to emergency preparedness. The Minister of National Defence is the lead minister responsible for emergency preparedness and I regret to say that I was less than satisfied with his response. I appreciate the opportunity to further discuss this issue as several months have now passed. I would hate to think that the government has forgotten this whole issue.

As the House knows, this government made severe cuts to the earthquake prediction research program of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is indeed unfortunate as Canada is susceptible to earthquakes. Near Newfoundland, Yukon and Baffin Islands, high risk zones exist. As well, Vancouver Island and the lower mainland of British Columbia, where my riding is, are also at high risk. There is a high population density in these latter regions. If a serious earthquake should occur, and experts agree it is just a matter of time, the damage to property and the loss of life will be stupendous.

Last October, we saw the graphic and heart-wrenching images from the San Francisco earthquake. We were all relieved to know that the death toll was not as high as it might have been. It was thanks to improved preparedness that the city of San Francisco was able to cope. Would the people of southwest British Columbia be as fortunate?

Let us look at the reality of the situation. Each year Japan spends $100 per person on earthquake preparedness. San Francisco alone spends $19 per person. In Canada, we spend 29 cents.

Our Constitution outlines disaster response as multi-faceted. Municipalities are the first to respond in a disaster. As they are financially unable to carry this out, they must turn for funding to the provinces who must turn to the federal government for financial assistance. This is not an alien concept. The federal government has had the revenue raising system in place designed to pass along needed funds to the provinces and to the municipalities.

This issue is of great importance in the lower mainland of British Columbia. Experts say two possibilities face this region: a major quake of up to 7.5 on the Richter scale will occur every 30 to 50 years or a catastrophe quake of more than 8 will occur every 500 years.

I am concerned about this because I believe we face several risks. Many Vancouver area highrises were built before 1975's building codes came into effect. Vancouver's airport is only three metres above sea level and the earth under its runways could liquefy, rendering the airport useless. Two major dams, the Cleveland and the Seymour Falls dams, need further investigation into their ability to withstand a quake.

Last fall in the Vancouver area, thousands of parents were alarmed to find their children were attending schools which would likely collapse in the event of an earthquake. If we happen to get an earthquake which measures 8, a catastrophe, cities would be devastated and comprehensive damage would occur from Seattle right to Prince Rupert. Experts in B.C. have repeatedly stated that emergency planning is hampered by a lack of support by the federal and the provincial governments. The Greater Vancouver Regional District has told the province that a hazard analysis needs to be done on the major lifeline systems, hospitals, roads, bridges and pipelines. The province has yet to fund this.

Furthermore, the province has suggested that after a major earthquake we would have to wait 24 hours before the province would provide assistance. I do not know what the provincial government believes, but if it thinks that the injured and the dying could put everything on hold for 24 hours before needing support, it better think again.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, let me make one point perfectly clear. Experts have said time and time again that southwestern British Columbia is a high risk earthquake zone. They have said that the loss of life would be extremely high should a massive earthquake occur. They have also said the best way to prevent such a tragedy is to prepare for an earthquake.

We all know the most important first step in preparedness is prediction. Why, then, Mr. Speaker, did this government cut back the earthquake prediction program? Why has the government jeopardized the entire earthquake preparedness program by attacking its very foundation?

I would like to remind the minister of what he said in this House on October 18, as found in Hansard at page 4810. In commenting on the role of the federal government to the two other levels of government he said:

> We co-operate with them as a national government. We provide the expertise that we can provide.

I think it is past time that the minister acted on his own words. It is time to co-operate. It is time to provide that much needed expertise. The minister has a choice in this matter. He can restore funding to the prediction program, thereby enabling scientists and the Emergency Measures Organization to have fair warning of earthquakes, or we can all wake up one morning to find that an earthquake has devastated British Columbia and perhaps killed hundreds and destroyed millions of dollars worth of property.

The choice, Mr. Speaker, is the choice of this government. It is the choice of the minister.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have directed her question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Epp), since seismic research is his department's responsibility. However, as parliamentary secretary to the Minister responsible for emergency preparedness, I am quite interested in the issue of earthquake prediction. For this reason, I tried to find out the reason why budgetary cuts were made in that area. It is simply this: Budget cuts were made in this particular program as part of the effort the government is making to curtail federal program spending generally, as recommended by the Nielsen Task Force. It was simply a matter of budgetary priorities.

This year, the credits allocated to the Earthquake Prediction Research Program were increased by $400,000. They will provide better means to monitor earthquakes in Canada as a whole and in Vancouver Island in particular and to seek evidence of earth's crust tension associated with earthquakes. They will help also develop new seismic hasard analysis methods and determine their degree of reliability for the purpose of updating our building standards.

Mr. Speaker, I must remind you that the federal government has initiated a serious disaster response planning to meet the needs of all Canadian provinces and territories in case of earthquakes, for it is first and foremost a provincial and territorial responsibility.

In reply more specifically to my honourable colleague who claimed just now that it was strictly to send money, I just cannot understand why the federal government is always being asked for new funds to carry out provincial responsibilities when the provinces and municipalities have just as much taxation powers as the federal government.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me to come back and re-ask a question that I asked in this House in October of 1989. The question was with respect to VIA Rail and the announcement made by the Minister of Transport in that time period when he told us that the business plan called for the elimination of certain routes in this country and that the transcontinental train service, VIA passenger train which travels from coast to coast in Canada, was going to be reduced to three days a week from seven days a week. For the train to get from the east to the west, it must go through northern Ontario from Sudbury or Capreol through to the Manitoba border.

• (1820)

In that area of our country and part of the riding I represent, there are two rail lines what are commonly referred to as the northern line and the southern line, which follows Lake Superior. They are known to be competitive in scenic beauty with the trip from Calgary to Vancouver through the Rocky Mountains. I was on the last train as it went through this beautiful area of the country. Having been on both those lines, it is hard to imagine that this government would make that move to eliminate the southern route through northern Ontario.

It defies logic in as much as the line that was chosen to continue the transcontinental train across Canada is a line that only services 14,000 people in its northern route as against in excess of 256,000 people through the southern route of northern Ontario. The figures are based on actual accounts of Statistics Canada, using the 1986 census.

The reality of the matter is simply this. In the VIA cuts that were announced on that date by the minister, cuts which have met with so much opposition from coast to coast, there are many areas that have to and will experience from January 15 onwards a very reduced service of passenger rail service. The reality that we face in northern Ontario is the fact that we do not have a reduced service. As of January 15, 1990, we no longer have passenger rail service through northern Ontario in the communities of Marathon, Terrace Bay, Shreiber, Nipigon, Red Rock, Kirkit, Dorion, Thunder Bay, Ignace, Dryden and Kenora as it goes up into Winnipeg.

These areas just mentioned enjoyed passenger rail service in this country for over 100 years. It is doubly difficult to accept that move by the government because in this particular area we do not have the infrastructure that many other areas of our country have with respect to roads. Some of the communities that I mentioned have alternate bus service or adequate roads or airport terminals.

The very logical question I asked the minister is how he could make that decision. The response I received was that in the decision, we considered it was better at the time to keep the service for what is called the remote communities rather than for Thunder Bay and Sudbury which have better modes of transportation.

After making those statements, I invite the minister to visit Thunder Bay and Sudbury. Perhaps he would like to tell the people directly that he figures it would be better to provide a service where there are no people than to provide a service in Sudbury where there are approximately 125,000 people and also in Thunder Bay where there are 125,000 people.

I do not question that there may be some remote areas in Canada which do not have access to other modes of transportation. However, I assured the minister on that date and subsequent to that that the line he cut, the line from Sudbury or Capreol through to Thunder Bay and on into Winnipeg was not a remote route any longer, nor did it test on all the communities on that route, nor did it pass the test of remoteness.

What is the critical test of remoteness? It is whether any of these communities have any other means of transportation. I showed in explicit form, based on the statistics already mentioned that the communities, although perhaps remote at one time, within the 12 years since VIA has existed, were now accessible by a fair quality of highway. They were accessible by bus or a combination of bus–highway or an adequate airport. So the test of remoteness did not apply in this particular area from Capreol or Sudbury through the southern route to Thunder Bay, Ignace, Dryden, Kenora and on to Winnipeg.

Both of those arguments were not only made in this House, they were made in committee and in personal meetings with the Minister of Transport and in personal meetings when the mayors and reeves of all of these communities in northern Ontario came to Ottawa to meet with the minister to see if they could get a change of mind.

The minister responded to my supplementary question by saying that it has been a scenario we have used for the whole country. We have people in this country who do not have any other mode of transportation. As I have said, I do not disagree with this. What I object to is the government labelling the CN line as remote when it is actually not, and it does not present a factual, logical conclusion to the argument I have just made.

I see that my time is running short. Let me just rephrase the question for my hon. friend. I appreciate him being here to reply.

It still does not make any logical sense that the northern route through northern Ontario was chosen rather than the southern route. If he can explain to me, through you, Mr. Speaker, why it is better and more economical to service 14,000 people rather than to service 256,000 people with passenger rail service in this country, I would like to hear his answer.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity to respond to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon about his question on the selection of which northern route to take in the reorganization of VIA's transcontinental service.

I am sure that in the next few minutes, I will not convince the hon. member that they have made the right selection, because he obviously has a bias in this. He comes from Thunder Bay—Nipigon, and that is one area not represented by VIA to the fullest extent that it has been in times past.

As part of the government's announcement of a national, affordable and sustainable network, the minister indicated that VIA would continue to provide service to truly isolated communities with no alternative means of transportation.

Back in October when the hon. member raised his question, he said that the communities from Sudbury to Chapleau, White River, Marathon, Nipigon, Thunder Bay, Dryden, Kenora and on to Winnipeg will lose their rail service link along CP's line in northern Ontario. In making that statement, I think he was playing around a little bit with his geography. He knows the area well, far better that I do. But in making his statement, the hon. member has overlooked the fact that VIA's Sudbury–White River service on the CP rail line continues in place under the government's decision.

It may be that the hon. member has overlooked these communities in making his statement. I can assure him that they were not overlooked when the decision was being made about what lines would have to be cut in order to fit within the framework of the money that we wish to expend in the subsidies to VIA Rail.

Similarly, the truly remote communities of the Winnipeg–Capreol portion of CN's line will be covered by operations of VIA's new restructured transcontinental service. For the communities between White River, Thunder Bay and Winnipeg, my information is that the total population of that particular area is only about 150,000 and not 350,000. We will have to sit down together and go through these numbers.

We also know that these communities are all served by the Trans–Canada Highway and all have high frequency bus service. In conclusion, the choice of routes reflects the government's intention to strike a balance between the transportation needs of Canada and the fiscal realities. The government's decision is not only financially responsible, but it meets the needs for a sustainable, national network.

I can also say in all truthfulness that the decisions were very, very difficult to make when it was decided what would be kept and what would be dropped. There is no way that you can satisfy all of the needs and what people would like to have through the rail passenger service.

AZERBAIJAN

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, the progress that the world has made in the area of political rapprochement over the last eight months appears to have stalled in the Soviet region of Azerbaijan. It is regrettable that the spirit of glasnost, the openness and acceptance of other ideologies, religions, values and peoples seem to have failed to bloom in a territory where ethnic differences have escalated to frightening levels.

Conflict is leading to oppression, violation of human rights and murder of ethnic Armenians in Azerbaijan. In this context, the military intervention of the Soviet Union, regrettable as any military intervention is, might in fact cause a stay in such conflict.

We call on the Secretary of State for External Affairs to seek assurances from the Soviet Government that the Soviet Union will seek a peaceful resolution to local difficulties, a solution which will protect the human and political rights of all Soviet citizens in Azerbaijan and that such a solution strive for the goals of peace and stability, making future Soviet military intervention unnecessary.

NATIONAL ILLITERACY STRATEGY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, nearly one in five Canadians cannot read and close to one-third of all high school students in Canada drop out before graduation. An illiterate adult will earn 42 per cent less than a high school graduate during his or her lifetime. Those statistics point to the alarming human and economic toll illiteracy is taking in Canada.

Over one year ago the federal government launched the National Literacy Strategy to help address this very serious problem. This strategy focuses on both remedial help for illiterate adults and the promotion of reading among children. Working with the provinces, businesses, labour and volunteer organizations, we are providing Canadians who have a literacy problem with the assistance that they need.

Mr. Speaker, 1990 has been designated by the United Nations as International Literacy Year, and thanks to the National Literacy Strategy millions of Canadians are being given an opportunity to participate more fully in our society.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to comment on a new set of circumstances for the Liberal Party of Canada.

As we all know, the Liberals looked high and low but they could not find a western leadership candidate. The member for Winnipeg South Centre wanted badly to run, but he could not get the megabucks needed to run for the leadership of that party.

Now that the Liberals have publicly stated that they will be flip-flopping on the trade deal, the rest of the candidates are in a bit of a flap over western support.

To the rescue sails the member for LaSalle—Émard. Much like you would advertise for a used car when you need one, this leadership candidate is advertising in Vancouver papers for Liberal supporters. This notion has a lot of possibilities. Will the Liberals be offering membership on a buy one get one free basis? Is there room for commission sales people to earn some extra income?

This seems like a very unusual development. Evidently the Liberals had to try something. Their policies certainly do not garner new members.

The Liberals are just full of surprises. After seeing this new advertising ploy, we are all looking forward to the day when the Liberals start recruiting on game shows.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, a recently leaked cabinet report revealed that the introduction of legislation to create a central environmental assessment body for the review of all federal policy initiatives is being stalled.

Why is our government hesitating at a time when Canadians and international organizations are calling for stronger action on the environment?

The cancellation of VIA Rail service is a perfect example of federal government policy decisions which will seriously impact on the environment. The government has promised Canadians over and over again since 1984 that it will introduce this environmental legislation. Where is it?

The people are calling on the government to live up to its commitment. The environment is a priority for Canadians and must be a priority for the House as well.

CANADIAN FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS AND THE GST

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, for a number of weeks the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has been using a recorded telephone message to urge Canadians to call their member of Parliament and object to the goods and services tax.

My staff and I take the time to answer each of these calls and explain what the GST is, why it must be introduced and what its impact will be on the caller and the Canadian economy.

When these people hear that a visible, 7 per cent GST will replace a hidden, obsolete and regressive 13.5 per cent tax, when we tell them that we must have the courage to take specific measures to clean up our public finances and reduce the debt and the deficit, and when they realize that this sales tax reform is essential to maintaining our social programs, they are very supportive and tell us to keep up the good work.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Canadian Federation of Independent Business to stop using scare tactics in their telephone campaign, especially where senior citizens are concerned. If it has any guts at all, the Federation should be able to make its point directly, not through other people as it is doing now. And it would be making a far more useful contribution to the debate.

SPORT

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Superior Court has ruled in favour of Daniel Saint-Hilaire, the Quebec track and field trainer, who summarized the ruling handed down by Judge Yvan Macerola as follows:

First, he said: It has been successfully argued that any athlete may take legal recourse against the Canadian federation in a provincial court.

Second: From now on, sports federations will have to publish the criteria they use to select athletes and trainers for international sports competitions.

Before this ruling, the three trainers for jumping events selected by the Canadian association were all from Toronto. The Canadian federation determine, over a beer, who will be selected, and we saw what happened to Denis Julien from Abitibi-Témiscamingue and a number of other athletes and trainers in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, justice has finally been done. Three cheers for Daniel Saint-Hilaire and many thanks to Judge Yvan Macerola for his intelligence and skill!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on November 28, 1989, Mr. Yih-Sheh Leo, a Canadian citizen of Taiwanese origin, was upon his entry into Taiwan arrested by the police, jailed, beaten and denied bail. To date he still remains in jail.

Mr. Leo was initially charged with illegal entry and sentenced to 10 months in jail. He was subsequently charged with sedition, a charge that carries a maximum penalty of 10 years. I have learned from his wife, Mrs. Leo, that his trial date has not as of yet been set.

I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs first, to increase representations on behalf of Mr. Leo through appropriate channels; second, to ensure that a Canadian representative is present at his trial; and, third, to impress upon the officials of Taiwan that in light of our increase in commercial relations with them we expect at a minimum a respect for the fundamental rights of our citizens.

Finally, all members of our party urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if all else fails, to intervene directly with the appropriate authorities and secure the release and safe and speedy return of Mr. Leo to Canada.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are encouraged to see Bank of Canada Governor John Crow hinting that he may be easing up on his high interest rate policies. Last week Mr. Crow allowed the bank rate to drop by 29 basis points to 12.14 per cent, hopefully the beginning of a trend.

We all know that Mr. Crow has been keeping interest rates high to fight inflation. We also know that inflation has been dropping steadily since last summer.

Mr. Crow, you have done a good job. Now ease up.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was wrong when he said that there is no crisis in Atlantic Canada. There is a crisis caused by mismanagement of the northern cod resource and by government financial hand-outs to corporations which have exhibited absolutely no sense of responsibility to communities, plant workers and fishermen. The question will not be resolved by fiddling with quotas while the cod stocks disappear.

The coal miner's canary is sick in the Atlantic provinces and near death in Newfoundland. We need a Marshall type plan to fill in while the cod stocks rebuild. There is municipal infrastructure work that needs doing in every community in Atlantic Canada. Programs announced by the government providing for a year by year decline in cod stocks and the redirection of government spending are not good enough.

Give the fish a chance. Get out of the water. Work on land. We cannot wait for the next election. Act now to fight the crisis.

NORTHERN TAX GUIDE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, for the third year in a row, the general tax guide is being mailed to northern residents without the northern tax guide or form. As in past years, taxpayers in the north cannot do tax planning as they are kept in the dark about when they can expect to receive the guide and claim their tax benefits.

For trappers who work in the bush and other workers in the bush who only come into town every two months, this is an extra trip. Individuals who want to file their returns early in order to get back the money the government owes them have to wait until next year until Revenue Canada gets around to them.

The minister promised a simplified tax system. Is this the simplified system we can expect, a system that costs twice as much, takes twice as long and is double the trouble?

I call on the minister to ensure that the northern benefit tax guide and forms are sent immediately to eligible residents and to ensure that next year they are included in the general tax guide.

TOBACCO SMOKING

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, on this designated Weedless Wednesday it seems appropriate to review some of the statistics relating to tobacco smoking.

As an incentive to encourage ourselves, our friends and our loved ones to avoid the smoking habit like the plague, we note that fully one-quarter of all adult deaths occur as a result of smoking. Some 35,000 deaths annually are attributed to tobacco. Of 100,000 15 year olds who currently smoke, 18,000 will be killed through the use of tobacco by the age of 70.

As a physician who has witnessed the tragedy and agony of smoking related illnesses and deaths, I want to commend our government for the progress made. We note with encouragement that the percentage of teenagers using tobacco dropped from 25 to 20 per cent last year. I am hopeful that the government's continuing efforts will result in a substantial drop in illness and deaths related to smoking.

Most of our government workers now enjoy a smoke-free environment, and what better gift can we give those within our own families than a smoke-free home environment. We applaud the many Canadians who have successfully kicked the habit and offer encouragement and support to those who are attempting to do so. The results are well worth the struggle.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this government's support of the OSLO oil sands megaproject in northern Alberta is criticized, and rightly so, by those who take global warming seriously. Each barrel of oil thus produced will release four to five times as much carbon dioxide into the atmosphere as a barrel of conventional oil. The oil industry also criticizes the oil sands megaproject on economic grounds.

However the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources continues to defend the oil sands project which will cost taxpayers a fortune. He thinks it is necessary for energy security. He is wrong. Douglas Stoneman, senior vice-president of Shell Canada, told the energy committee that the OSLO oil sands project is not necessary for energy security. Mr. Stoneman added that subsidizing conventional technology for an uneconomic project is simply a burden to the taxpayers.

We say to the minister: "Don't aggravate the climate warming problem. Come to your senses at last and practise sustainable development."

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE JUDICIARY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The independence of our judiciary has been fundamental to our parliamentary system since the Settlement Act of 1700.

That independence of judges was reconfirmed by two Acts of the Union Government of this country in 1843 and in 1867. Sections 96, 99 and 100 of the British North America Act, reconfirmed in 1982 by the Constitution Act, established completely the independence of judges in Canada. The rule is clear. Members of a government, members of the cabinet, cannot pick up the telephone and call a judge about a case that is being considered by that judge.

The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport did just that. He has now confessed that yesterday he did indeed telephone Mr. Justice Macerola of the Quebec Superior Court about a case then under consideration by that judge just before the judge was due to render a judgment.

Has the Prime Minister, in these circumstances, asked for and has he received the resignation of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport has been and continues to be a very honourable member of this House of Commons with a very substantial respect for its traditions. Because of his respect for that and his great regard for the independence of the judiciary he communicated with me and offered to submit his resignation, and I accepted it.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know that that weighs on the Prime Minister's mind, and I am satisfied with that particular response.

• (1420)

Earlier today two of his ministers, one being the minister of industry, said that the rule only applies to criminal cases and not civil cases, that there was no evidence that the minister of state called to influence the outcome of the judge's decision and certainly he did not try to gain a benefit in any way. That was the minister of industry's comment.

[Translation]

The Minister of State (Finance) said: "I would have done the same, in the circumstances."

[English]

On March 12, 1976, Prime Minister Trudeau laid out the rule clearly for members of a government, I believe. Mr. Trudeau rose in the House of Commons and said, as reported at page 11771 of Hansard for March 12, 1976:

> —in future no member of the cabinet may communicate with members of the judiciary concerning any matter which they have before them in their judicial capacities, except through the Minister of Justice, his duly authorized officials or counsel acting for him—

Will the Prime Minister communicate to the ministers I have cited and any others the rule set forth for members of the government, and will he tell the House whether the rule and guideline set forth by Mr. Trudeau in 1976 still applies to his administration?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend refers to some historical precedents. There is indeed reference in Hansard to a call made by the then President of the Treasury Board, I believe, Mr. Chrétien, to a judge which was referred to in an inquiry. There was a call made by Mr. Drury to a judge.

The Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec investigated and indicated that it was a grave breach of convention and propriety. Notwithstanding that, I understand that the Prime Minister of the day indicated, and I quote from page 11771 of Hansard of March 12, 1976:

> But the associate chief justice clearly was of the view that the call from the Minister of Public Works did not warrant formal protest.

A minister of the Crown had called a judge of the Quebec Superior Court. The Prime Minister then went on and said:

> I do not excuse the minister's lapse of judgment in this matter. I sympathize with his good intentions, but I do not condone what he did.

Then the Prime Minister said, notwithstanding what took place:

> —I have come to the conclusion that I should not accept his resignation.

We had a situation where ministers of the Crown communicated with judges and the then Prime Minister decided that he should not accept their resignations.

I have come to the conclusion, a minister of the Crown having in good faith communicated with a judge, that I will accept his resignation because I believe that that is part of the finest traditions of this House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has in no way commented on the statements made by his two ministers.

To be fair, Associate Chief Justice Deschenes examined the issue involving Mr. Chrétien and two other ministers at the time and found that they had been satisfactorily dealt with, so the Prime Minister is not fairly quoting from Mr. Deschenes' reply. Frankly, I do not think there is any reciprocal evidence that is valid before this House of Commons.

I want to ask the Prime Minister one further question. Now that he has accepted the minister's resignation from New Zealand, has he recalled the minister since he no longer has any role to play at the Commonwealth Games?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKnight: What's your continuing function, Turner? Still drawing a salary?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps given the gravity of the matter that is being discussed, members, including ministers, on both sides could refrain from comment unless they have the floor. The right hon. Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend refers to the report by Mr. Justice Deschesnes. Page 11777 of Hansard for March 12, 1976 reads as follows:

> Mr. Justice Aronovitch has provided me with the following description of the event which he has authorized me to transmit to you:
> Some time in October 1971, Mr. Jean Chrétien, whom I did not (and still do not) know, telephoned to find out when I would render judgment. He identified himself to me, not as a cabinet minister, but > as a member of Parliament interested in the people in his riding or constituency where apparently the petitioner was operating.

Those are the facts that took place.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Table the whole letter.

An Hon. Member: Yes, table it.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: The reference to that was made by the Leader of the Opposition. I would just point out to him that I believe that most members of the House, if not all, would agree that irrespective of those precedents with which we may or may not agree, the action of the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport was the proper one.

This is why today I said in a communication which I would be happy to table that I accept his resignation with a genuine sense of sadness. His communication with the court was clearly motivated, not by any desire for gain or favour but rather in the clear belief that he was acting in the best interests of the Canadian sporting fraternity. That he should have offered to resign in these circumstances is an indication of the high regard in which he holds both Parliament and his responsibilities as a minister.

I believe the action of the young Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport is a great tribute to his character. I salute him for it, and I know all members of the House will.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, Canadian fishermen do not want to be retrained. They want to fish and they want to know why this government is giving this year, in 1990, not only cod quotas to France but also red-fish quotas to the Soviet Union and to several other foreign countries and Greenland halibut quotas to several foreign countries, all within Canada's 200-mile zone licensed by this government.

Is the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans aware that in the plant which is closing in Trepassey in the minister's riding they process mostly flatfish, things like Greenland halibut, not codfish, and that in Gaultois in the hon. member's riding where the plant is closing they process all red-fish, not one ounce of codfish.

We want to know why this government has agreed in 1990 to give to the Soviet Union, in zones 3-N and 3-O on the east coast of Newfoundland within 12 miles of our shore, the entire east coast, the NAFO quota, 10,900 tonnes of red-fish, and to give Canadians 300 tonnes less than what the Soviet Union is getting. Canadians want to know why.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the member for Gander—Grand Falls knows full well that Canadians are welcome to all of the fish stocks within our Canadian 200-mile economic zone that they can harvest on a first priority basis and that fish outside the 12-mile limit do not belong to Canada but are entrusted to our use only when we can use them.

• (1430)

The hon. member is again crying wolf, and as was so aptly pointed out the other day in The Chronicle-Herald:

> Meanwhile, Mr. Baker's habit of reducing complex problems to the single issue of foreign fishing is neither credible nor useful—no matter how much people in his riding are suffering.
> This industry has enough real problems, without inventing new ones.

That is the opinion of The Chronicle-Herald, and that is the opinion of many Atlantic Canadians.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that this minister probably believes that because it is called "red-fish" it belongs to the Soviet Union; and that because it is called the Greenland halibut it belongs to Greenland; and that American plaice belongs to the United States. There is one fish name that belongs to this cabinet; it is called yellow-tail flounder.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: It has not a fillet of sole in it.

I want to ask the minister this about zones 2G and 2H, which as you know, Mr. Speaker, the majority of which lie on the Labrador coast. It is the Hamilton Banks, the spawning ground for our northern cod. All of it lies within the 200 mile zone. Why has this government allocated a foreign quota of codfish which increased 11,400 tonnes for this year, up 1,000 tonnes to foreign nations and the Canadian quota down 1,000 tonnes to 8,600 tonnes, with a footnote which states: "For bilateral commitments"?

What bilateral commitments does the minister have in mind? The chief bilateral commitment is to the people of Canada. Why is this minister giving favouritism toward the foreigners?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can engage in his fishy business on and on as he always does. But, as I will show in a moment, it is the Liberal party that is very much floundering around on this issue. This government has Canadianized the Canadian fishery and reduced foreign quotas within our waters to very low levels compared to what they were under the Liberal government.

In fact, we have ended some 25,000 tonnes of fishing effort on our primary codstocks by the European Community and France as a result of conscious decisions taken by this government.

It is passing strange that the hon. member's colleague from Halifax would urge me strenuously this week to allow an American fishing vessel to be allowed to fish in replacement of a Canadian vessel on codstocks off Newfoundland. Yet this member has the hypocrisy to condemn this government when he should be looking at himself and his colleagues in the face in the mirror.

THE JUDICIARY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the resignation which was the honourable course of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport in light of the many precedents which were established by Messrs. Chrétien, Lalonde, Drury and Munro in this House.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will clarify whether or not it is the policy of this government, and particularly of this Prime Minister, that it is essential to establish firm, unequivocal standards relative to the absolute independence of the judiciary of Canada and absolute restraint from any kind of involvement or intervention by ministers of the Crown with any court anywhere in the country.

Those were the words of the now Secretary of State for External Affairs which resulted in the clear statement by the then Prime Minister Trudeau with respect to policy in this area.

Is the policy statement by Prime Minister Trudeau of March 12, 1976, with respect to this matter still in effect for his government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I have difficulty understanding the question because my hon. friend refers to precedent. The fact is that Mr. Chrétien, in 1971, communicated with a judge and did not resign. Mr. Drury, in 1976, communicated with a judge and did not resign. Mr. Kaplan, then Solicitor General, in 1982, wrote to a judge and did not resign.

We have guidelines that indicate that no minister may communicate with members of the judiciary concerning any matter which they have before them in their judicial capacity, except the Minister of Justice.

The fact is that the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport communicated with a judge, even though he sought neither gain nor favour nor personal advantage of any kind, having been asked to make the intervention on behalf of the Canadian sporting fraternity as international games were opening up in New Zealand and a difficult matter had to be resolved. Even with those extenuating circumstances he did communicate with a judge. I believe that was a violation of the guidelines, as a result of which I accepted his resignation.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister indicated that the minister was asked for his intervention by the Canadian sporting fraternity, specifically, presumably, by the Canadian Track and Field Association. The minister made a similar statement.

However, in view of the fact that I spoke this morning with the lawyer for the Canadian Track and Field Association who stated categorically that neither she nor her partner had made any request whatsoever for intervention by the minister, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he would reconsider that statement and in fact agree that no such request was made whatsoever.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister has resigned. Yet the NDP, this not being good enough, continue to harass and ask me for explanations that are completely irrelevant to the subject.

Surely the hon. member is not alleging that the minister did anything with a criminal intent or sought to take personal advantage of anything. There was a technical violation of the guidelines and the minister resigned.

This should have been a precedent that was enforced throughout the 1970s; it apparently was not.

I think the minister in resigning did the honourable thing, which is completely consistent with the very impressive reputation he has acquired across Canada and the very brilliant future he has in store.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In 1976, Prime Minister Trudeau announced guidelines for contacts between members of the judiciary and members of Parliament and ministers. I again ask the Prime Minister: Are these strict guidelines still in effect with him and his government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about precedents. It is well known that in 1971, the Hon. Jean Chrétien made a phone call directly to a judge of the Superior Court of Québec. He did not resign. The Hon. Bud Drury in 1976 intervened directly with a Québec Superior Court judge and he did not resign. The Hon. Robert Kaplan, then Solicitor General, wrote to a judge in 1982 and he did not resign. The Hon. Jean Charest intervened on behalf of the sports community because of the New Zealand Games. He did not intervene for personal reasons. Technically he violated the regulation. He was honourable enough to resign. That is something that should have been done in other circumstances by others in the past.

FISHERIES

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns this government's woeful response to the crisis in the Atlantic fishery.

The Prime Minister over and over again has promised generous assistance for those communities hard hit by the downturn in the Atlantic fisheries. But all we seem to get is empty rhetoric.

• (1440)

We hear from the Minister for International Trade that it will be old programs recycled and new money.

We hear from the minister opposite who is responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency that it will indeed be recycled money from recycled programs. The same program that is expected to give the funds is a program called ACOA which was severely crippled by the axe of this government last spring.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. Why does the Prime Minister insist on robbing Peter to pay Paul instead of finding the money necessary to address this very serious crisis caused by his government's own mismanagement in the Atlantic fishery?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, it has approved some 7,000 projects in Atlantic Canada with some $600 million from the federal government which leveraged $1.6 billion to create 18,000 new jobs in Atlantic Canada. That is the kind of co-operation that Atlantic Canada has been getting from this government. I think that is the kind of co-operation Atlantic Canada wants.

My hon. friend refers to the fishery. There has been $130 million put forward already. There are initiatives internationally and nationally to deal with what is a grave crisis in the Atlantic fishery—I have acknowledged that many times.

Yesterday, as Premier McKenna indicated in an interview in New Brunswick, there is no crisis in the Atlantic Canadian economy. There are areas of strong growth. Premier McKenna, whose province led all Canadian provinces in investment growth last year, wants to do it again this year.

I suppose what he is too polite to say is that the only problem that could occur in New Brunswick is the bad-mouthing from the Liberal members of Parliament which could have a negative effect on investment intentions in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is again to the Prime Minister. It is pretty incredible that he is getting up on his feet and talking about all the good work that has come out of the ACOA program. If it was so good, why did it fall under the government's axe last spring? Why did it stretch the ACOA program from five to seven years, effectively cutting it by 20 per cent?

Will the Prime Minister now give us and the people of Atlantic Canada an assurance that the ACOA fund will not once again be attacked and ravaged by this government? Will he also give us an assurance that the additional funding necessary will be found to address the crisis in the Atlantic economy caused by this government's absolute and utter neglect?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, unemployment is a pretty good barometer to show how well an economy is doing. Unemployment in Newfoundland since we were sworn in has gone down 7 per cent from where we took it from the Liberals.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Unemployment in Nova Scotia has gone down 4 per cent and unemployment in New Brunswick has gone down 3 per cent.

Regional development programs under the last Liberal government averaged $185 million a year. That was increased in our first mandate to an average of $285 million. This mandate it is $425 million, an increase of 51 per cent. That is the kind of contribution we are making to Atlantic Canada.

It is, I am sure, depressing for Atlantic Canadians to see that they send members who do not even recognize the good areas of economic growth in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Labrador. There are areas of difficulty. We are working to improve them, but the hon. member should stop being a gloomster and a doomster and try a little nation-building for once.

SHIPBUILDING

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. We have learned that Mr. Tessier, the president of Marine Industries, suggested a three-point plan to the minister: namely, that the federal government share the accumulated losses with the Government of Quebec, that the contracts on hand be reviewed on a new basis and that the federal government ensure the future of the shipyards beyond 1992.

Mr. Speaker, we already know that the minister has already rejected these three proposals. Does he have other solutions to put forward? Is there another plan to save the disappearing shipbuilding industry in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated in a letter to Mr. Tessier and in conversations with Mr. Tremblay, the minister in the Quebec government with responsibility for MIL, we are certainly willing to enter into discussions with him to find ways in which we can be of assistance to MIL in view of its circumstances and the doubt cast on its long-term future.

We understand that, commiserate with it they are willing to participate in discussions. I will be meeting with Minister Tremblay on Friday to extend those discussions. We will see if we can find a solution.

I do not think it is useful to try to negotiate publicly, through the press or through holding demonstrations of various sorts, but we certainly are going to be co-operating with the Quebec government and MIL.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the minister that thousands and thousands of jobs have been lost in the past five years and we have almost no shipbuilding industry anymore anymore because of this government's laisser faire policies. About 2,000 jobs still remain. Will you act immediately to save the shipbuilding industry and these 2,000 jobs or will you continue to talk and, as usual, everything will disappear in Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr.Speaker, as evidenced by the over 1.5 million new jobs created by this government in the last five years, jobs are very much of interest to us. There is a surplus of capacity in the shipbuilding industry. The member for LaSalle—Émard, who is in the shipping business, is having all his ships built in Brazil.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Andre: That is one of the things that we are having to deal with, but we are wrestling with that problem and will address it.

WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Minister of Finance.

I wonder if the Minister of Finance can explain this to the House. On December 19, when he tabled a notice of Ways and Means in the House related to the goods and services tax, a very important part of that Ways and Means Motion was an increase in the surtax for wealthy Canadians, and an increase in the large corporations tax, which would have resulted in an increase in tax for those people of some $400 million per year. Can he explain why in the motion we concurred in yesterday these two items are mysteriously missing? They went up in a puff of smoke. They are no longer there.

I want to ask the minister quite bluntly, did he deliberately omit those two items in the Ways and Means Motion we passed yesterday? Can he explain why he has decided to omit this tax increase for his wealthy friends in this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it saddens me to hear this hon. member, who has been in this House for a number of years now, spread stories which he knows are not true. He knows that my assistant spoke directly to his assistant and told him clearly why those particular pieces of legislation were not covered in the Ways and Means Motion.

The proposal of December 19 still stands. The income tax amendments from the last budget are still before the Senate. As soon as those items are passed the amendments that I referred to in the December 19 statement on the large corporations tax and the high income surtax will be made the subject of new legislation.

He knows that. He knows perfectly well that he was told that by his assistant. Yet he deliberately fosters these untrue stories in order to confuse people.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: There has been a serious allegation made by the minister. It amounts to an allegation of untruth on the part of the hon. member. I would ask the hon. minister to withdraw.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the statement that I have made. But I will say, Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: No!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —that the hon. member's staff was advised of the information that I just expressed to the House today.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, in the press yesterday it was said, and I quote: "The minister's spokesman, John Fieldhouse, later said, 'The measures will be included in amendments to a tax bill currently in the Senate'."

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance to explain how he can give the Senate the new prerogative of amending a tax bill which is a bill to increase taxes on individuals and increase taxes on corporations. How can he give them that prerogative?

• (1450)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is blatant mischief-making on the part of the hon. member. I made it quite clear in my statement on December 19 and I just made it very clear two minutes ago that the large corporation tax amendments I announced on December 19 will come to pass, if passed by this House. The increase in the high income surtax that I announced on December 19, if passed by this House will come to pass.

I would appreciate it, and I think Canadians would appreciate it, if their members of Parliament would not do the things that—now the hon. member is waving about a piece of paper, a newspaper report.

Would the hon. member check with his assistant to whom my assistant spoke and to whom he gave the precise information? Would he explain to the House why he persists in leading people astray by misleading statements?

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post Corporation.

In 1986, the Canadian government advised Canada Post Corporation that it was reducing the subsidies for air transport services. Canada Post never informed the northern regions of these cuts and since 1986 has never increased its rates for commercial shipments of food and medicine to these northern regions.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Can the minister tell me why Canada Post Corporation did not increase its postal rates in 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989 for northern regions?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member indicates, there has been a reduction in the postal subsidy for northern rates. The subsidy has been reduced by $1 million a year.

For the first two or three years the post office was able to make up those reductions by various efficiency gains. Those efficiency gains are no longer possible. Thus adjustments were made this year.

As a result of discussions and representations by the hon. member and others, there has been a 5 per cent decrease in the announced rates and a freeze on those rates for the next year while the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development undertakes an investigation to see how in fact the needs of northerners can be looked after, while at the same time respecting the fact that we have a $30 billion deficit to deal with.

OLDER WORKER ASSISTANCE

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour.

Last week the minister announced that $13.1 million had been allocated to assist some 216 laid-off workers in Quebec in specific industries who may be eligible for assistance under the Program for Older Worker Assistance. Given that there have been a multitude of closings across this country, can the minister today give a detailed breakdown of the moneys from the Program for Older Worker Assistance that have been allocated to all other provinces, industries and companies?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I obviously do not have at my disposal all the details sought by the hon. member of the Opposition, but I can tell him that so far federal and provincial committees in three provinces have dealt with lay-offs in each of the provinces. We are now looking into 49 lay-offs affecting 1,200 people, older workers, whom we will help with POWA, and I will be pleased to send him details of what has been spent up to now.

[English]

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, during the briefings that I had with Labour Canada, and all through the process on the bill when it was going through the House, one of the things that was stipulated was that the numbers would not play a specific role.

Can the minister assure us that in a small community where there are 5 to 10 or 15 to 20 workers laid off, something which would have an impact equal to some areas of Canada where 200 or 300 workers are laid off, that these people will be treated in the same manner?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to confirm for my colleague that POWA has indeed been designed with the necessary flexibility to help workers 55 and older in communities and places with smaller populations.

In co-operation again with the provincial committees, we adopted rules requiring that the number of unemployed or laid-off people be proportional to the population involved in the same kind of activity in each municipality.

So far, each of these committees in each of the three provinces has performed admirably, to the satisfaction of provincial and federal authorities.

TRADE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister or to the acting Minister of Energy.

A number of companies have indicated their intention to use the free trade agreement to challenge a recent decision by the National Energy Board refusing a number of gas exports to the United States.

I want to ask the Prime Minister what action his government will take if these challenges are successful. What will he do to defend the board whose powers are under attack as as result of the trade deal that this government signed?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the House well knows the rules with respect to hypothetical questions. Naturally, the hon. member would not expect me to answer a question based upon any hypothesis, particularly one as improbable as that.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister.

As we all know, the board is publicly conducting a review of the cost benefit analysis. We also know that the U.S. government is lobbying this government behind the scenes.

The question I want to ask the minister is this. What assurances has this government offered the American government with regard to the powers of the National Energy Board? Will the board's upcoming policy review be an independent and meaningful review, or is it really a foregone conclusion?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the review is independent. It is meaningful. It is Canadian.

If the hon. member is suggesting that some other countries are making Canadian policy on these questions, then she should in the first place have the courage to state that directly and in the second know that she is wrong.

COMINCO

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The federal government invested $79 million in Cominco so that the company could upgrade its smelter in Trail, B.C. At the time Cominco said that the main supplier of the zinc to the smelter would be the Sullivan Mine in Kimberley, B.C.

Last Thursday Cominco announced that the mine would be shutting down in two weeks at a cost of 865 jobs to Kimberley. Cominco has refused to give the people of Kimberley a satisfactory explanation for destroying their community.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister this. Will his government, as one of the major shareholders in Cominco, demand that the company come clean with the people of Kimberley as to why they are now out of work while the people of Alaska will be benefiting from the shutdown?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, that mine has been there for a considerable period of time. It has been mined for years and years. They have simply reached the stage where the high cost of operating an old mine at deep depths, with lower quality ores and so on has simply made it uneconomic.

The New Democratic Party, which claims that it is looking forward, has a basic policy in all of these questions: No change. Even if you run out of ore, it would keep the mine open with people apparently digging material that is not worth the cost of operating the mine.

As is always the case, this government is very concerned about the workers. This government will bring to bear all of those safety-net provisions that are available that help those four million Canadians who change work every year in this country.

• (1500)

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. This mine made over $9 million in profit last year. It was used for getting the loan that the federal government put forward. What is the Prime Minister going to do for this community? This is a single-industry town that requires assistance. What is the Prime Minister going to do to alleviate the devastation that they have created in Kimberley, British Columbia?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in reply to the hon. member's initial question, this is not a unique event in Canada. This is a mining country, where mines run out of ore and have to be shut down; or prices change. As a result of that experience, there are a large number of adjustment programs in place, a safety net, if you will, which will be brought to bear to help the workers who are affected by this quite natural event. At the end of their lifetime mines shut down and cannot be kept operating if they are no longer economic.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. In last Tuesday's edition, the newspapers Le Soleil and Le Droit reported that Quebec had obtained only 2.2 per cent of all research contracts awarded since April 1989 by the Department of Communications, that is only $122,000 out of a total of $5.5 million. Furthermore, if we consider the total number of research contracts awarded by the federal government, Quebec, which has nearly one-quarter of Canada's population, received only 10 per cent of $158 million worth of contracts awarded in Canada. What explanation does the Minister have for this situation and what action does the government intend to take to ensure that Quebec receives its fair share of federal research contracts?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, when he mentioned 2.2 per cent in his article yesterday, columnist Michel Vastel was referring to a small fraction of the Department of Communications' research and development efforts. He was considering only those contracts that are awarded through the Department of Supply and Services. He did not include contracts, grants and contributions made directly by my Department. In fact, 33 per cent of the Department of Communications' expenditures and investments in the field of research and development go to Quebec.

AIR SAFETY

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Since December, there have been three tragic air accidents in the region, which caused the death of five people. It seems that bad weather was responsible.

[English]

Is the Prime Minister or any of his ministers aware that since October 1 weather information at Ottawa Airport is now collected by a private contractor, by employees who have one-quarter the training of environment staff who formerly did the work, that the information gets sent to Toronto then back to Gatineau where pilots have to get it by phone from Transport Canada employees who have four higher priority jobs?

Does the minister think that this absolute mess is good enough when people's lives are at stake, or will he call an immediate inquiry to ensure that further lives are not in danger?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you would allow me to answer this question. All of us in this House obviously share in the sorrow that always accompanies such tragic accidents.

However, it would be wrong to say today or at this particular moment that this accident or any other near-misses that the hon. member refers to had anything to do with weather conditions. An inquiry is obviously under way and it will be determined what the cause of this accident was.

I can tell the hon. member that the weather services which Environment Canada provides for Transport Canada and its flying constituency have been significantly improved over the last little while. We will have to await the outcome of the investigation.

WAYS AND MEANS MOTION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to the Ways and Means Motion that was tabled on Monday, January 22 and concurred in yesterday. As a result of Standing Order 83, no one in the House was able at that time to debate the motion or provide any amendments to the motion. In a sense, no one could even add any commentary. It was simply dealt with in the usual way.

Having now examined the process, to me there appears to be a very serious irregularity regarding the motion. I raise this point of order today to ask the Chair to determine whether or not it would be appropriate at this point to permit a bill to proceed which will be based on this motion.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the motion proposes that a good and services tax of 7 per cent be imposed after 1990 and that the tax be as set out as the motion indicated in two documents. One of these documents was tabled in the House just over a month ago. The other document referred to as a goods and services technical paper was issued by the Minister of Finance on August 8.

Members, most of whom I am sure went to the Journals Branch this morning to get a copy of this technical paper, discovered as I did that such a document has never been tabled in this House. It is not a sessional paper. As I am not privy to all the papers issued by the Minister of Finance in the period of the summer, I can only guess as to which technical paper the Ways and Means Motion refers to.

The process of passing motions which refer to documents that are not before this House—motions, I might add, which can result in the passage of bills imposing taxes—causes members serious concern. It raises some important questions.

The first question it raises is the general question as to whether the government is establishing new parliamentary and constitutional traditions. It used to be that money bills had to originate in the House of Commons. Now, we have budgets which originate in press conferences and tax bills which are founded, at least in part, in documents that have been released through the press. This question was raised in the House following the budget fiasco last April, and I must say, if my memory serves me, the Chair has yet to offer an opinion on that question.

The second more troubling question relates to the implications of what the House will be enabled to do to a bill which flows from a Ways and Means Motion based on a non-parliamentary document.

The twenty-first edition of Erskine May cautions that amendments to tax bills must not exceed the scope, increase the amount or extend the incidence of any charge upon the people defined by the terms of the ways and means resolutions by which the provisions proposed to be amended are authorized. It is further offered that when a tax is imposed in a bill which is less than a ways and means resolution that amendments are in order in committee on the bill to increase the tax up to the limit laid down by the ways and means resolution. This becomes very critical at this point. The technical paper referred to by the Minister of Finance in his motion that was adopted yesterday by this House referred to a 9 per cent goods and services tax. Does this mean that the House, or a committee of the House, can increase the tax up to 9 per cent, as reflected in the document referred to in the Ways and Means Motion?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I simply ask that you review this general question and rule on whether the adoption of yesterday's motion has breached parliamentary tradition as we know it in the House of Commons, rule on whether it has established a very dangerous precedent in reference to documents that have never been tabled before this House, and to rule on whether it throws into question the rights of the House over tax issues generally.

Finally, I would ask that you consider whether this imposes a very uncertain scope around this goods and services tax bill and the amendments that the House will be empowered to consider during the process of debate and the consideration of changes to the act.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am trying to check on the accuracy of what the hon. member for Kamloops has just said. The documents tabled on December 19 following my statement show that the clear intention of the Government of Canada was to reduce the rate that was set out in the technical paper from 9 per cent to 7 per cent. Nothing could be clearer than that both in my statement as well as in the documents that were tabled in the House.

My understanding had been that the technical paper itself was tabled in this House, but I cannot be absolutely sure of that. I have asked my staff to check on that. As soon as I have that information for you I can advise you.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I appreciate the courtesy of the hon. member for Kamloops and members of his staff in giving the Chair notice of this complex point. I also appreciate the minister staying behind for the argument and I appreciate that he has asked for some time to respond.

I will hear the minister further on this matter if that happens today or at some appropriate point. I should tell the hon. member for Kamloops and the minister that knowing about the complexity of the argument, it was my intention to reserve judgment until I could fully consider the argument and the implications that flow thereof, but to make sure that I would rule on the point before second reading. I want to give the hon. member for Kamloops that assurance.

If the hon. Minister of Finance wants some time to address the Chair further on this, I think that that would be agreed by all parties, but I am going to need some time to consider it.

WAYS AND MEANS MOTION

Mr. Speaker: Further to the argument put forward by the hon. member for Kamloops, I should advise hon. members that the government has moved for introduction and first reading of the bill in question.

I am going to put introduction and first reading of the bill to the House, but it must be clearly understood that I will rule on the argument raised by the hon. member for Kamloops before second reading begins. Is that clearly understood?

Mr. Gauthier: By tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: I am not in a position to say when it will be. What I am saying is that I am going to need time to consider it. I want the hon. member for Kamloops to clearly understand that except for this procedure—

Mr. Benjamin: Before any stage.

Mr. Speaker: I have examined the procedure very carefully and I think that I am proceeding properly in introducing the bill for first reading. But what I am saying is that, that having been done, nothing further will proceed until I have made the ruling.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I seek clarification. I will follow your decision, naturally, but to seek further clarification, if in your ruling you deem it to have been inappropriate for the Minister of Finance to proceed, with the assumption that he had proceeded incorrectly with his Ways and Means motion, what status then would the bill have, if you rule that what we are doing today is, in a sense, inadmissible?

Mr. Speaker: The same question of course reverts back to what status would the notice have? I have made it quite clear to hon. members that the argument has been well argued, obviously well researched, and is complex. I need time to consider it and I am sure the hon. member will understand that.

Mr. Benjamin: Before any stage of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the hon. member for Regina East has a point of view here, but I have made a ruling and I think that the ruling is appropriate.

I want to assure all hon. members that the matter will be considered seriously and will be ruled on after this stage and before second reading.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have one brief concern with the point that is under discussion and that is Standing Order 83(4) which states:

> The adoption of any Ways and Means motion shall be an order to bring in a bill or bills based on the provisions of any such motion.

Now, as I understood the argument of the hon. member for Kamloops, the problem with the motion is that it was too vague. How is Your Honour going to be able to determine whether or not this bill, in the words of the rule, is based on the notice, if in fact the motion is so vague that we cannot determine whether the bill is based on it? I think it puts Your Honour in an extremely difficult position, with respect, between now and second reading.

I would suggest that the appropriate course would be to await Your Honour's ruling to determine the limits of the motion, and then if Your Honour determines that the motion is in order and what its limits are, in other words, are one or both of the technical papers referred to in the motion included, then we can determine whether or not the bill is in order. But it is going to be virtually impossible to do that until Your Honour's ruling comes down on that first point.

I suggest there are two issues here and, with respect, I would suggest that the first reading of this bill be deferred until we have received the word from Your Honour on the validity of the minister's notice of motion.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened to the hon. member, but I think that it is appropriate to go ahead with the introduction and first reading of the bill. I shall carefully consider not only the position of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands but, as I have indicated, also the position of the hon. member for Kamloops, and of course if the hon. minister wishes to address me further.

AN ACT TO AMEND THE EXCISE TAX ACT, THE CRIMINAL CODE, THE CUSTOMS ACT, THE CUSTOMS TARIFF, THE EXCISE ACT, AND THE INCOME TAX ACT, THE STATISTICS ACT AND THE TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act, and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried. On a point of order, the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I missed the vote. Had I been here, I would have voted nay.

Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Introduction of Private Members' Bills. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to think that in order to provide ample opportunity for all members to vote that my colleagues and friends in the Liberal party would provide at least a 30-minute bell to call on members who might not be here already.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, point of order. I have already taken part in such a debate several times. I would just like to reiterate what I have already said: I find this a very bad precedent that we are setting in our political system, a political institution of British origin.

[English]

I think it is a bad move to have voted to give permission to a member to introduce a bill for first reading. I understand the reason it was done. I am not questioning their reason, I cannot question it, but I think it is a bad precedent. It is very bad, in our British parliamentary system, to vote to give permission to a member to introduce a bill because some day there will be bills that may not be acceptable to a lot of people and we could use this precedent, and those that were created before, to stop a member from even considering the possibility of discussing something that may be absolutely unacceptable to some members of the House.

I, as one who believes in freedom of thought and freedom of discussion, believes that a member should not require permission to present any bill for first reading. I think that there are other ways of doing what they are trying to do today. I leave it to them to decide how to do it, but I object very much and I will always object to having a vote in order to decide whether we will give permission to a member to introduce a bill for first reading, not in the British parliamentary system.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With respect, I have listened to my hon. colleague's intervention and I appreciate the point that he is making. He said that he thought it was inappropriate that members not permit the introduction of a bill at the first stage. Yet, I recall that he just voted against the introduction of a bill at first stage, the goods and services bill.

Perhaps he was referring to the private members' bills only, but I am somewhat confused as to the point he was making since he voted against first reading a few moments ago.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct. I said that I object to such a vote on private members' bills and I thank my hon. colleague very much for obliging me to clarify my statement. Yes, that has always been my position in the House of Commons concerning private members' bills. As for government bills, that is another matter, and I thank the hon. member for clarifying the situation.

As a matter of fact, a few minutes ago I had a long discussion with the officers of the table to make sure that I have been consistent with the past because, as you know, I am getting old and I may lack some memory. But I have been consistent. I have always stood the way I just did for private members' bills.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kamloops has a few minutes to explain the bill.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate a few moments to explain the intent of the bill. This bill, as hon. members would recognize, refers back to 1215 when King John, a very arrogant and insensitive king, had imposed a very horrible tax time and time again on the people. The people spoke up and objected to these excessive levels of taxation that King John had introduced.

It is for that reason, particularly in light of today's discussion, that I introduce this private members' bill to declare June 15, which was the day the Magna Carta was declared in 1215, as an appropriate gesture. I appreciate that with these bells the Liberals have at least assisted the New Democratic Party in sending a message to this government, that it too is imposing a dastardly, mean, cruel tax on the people of this country and it time that we send the government a very clear message.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: Just as the people said they would not stand for it during the time of King John, we are saying that the people of Canada will not stand for it at this time either.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis moved that bill be read the first time and be printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Point of order, the hon. government Whip.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I realize it is not one of those very tense situations in the House of Commons where the voting is close or there is any disagreement. But the precedents we set in this Chamber can, on another occasion, be extremely important.

For a member to stand in his place and vote twice would be a very dangerous precedent. In the calling for the yeas I heard the member from Regina's name called at an appropriate time. When you called the nays, I heard the same member called the second time. I do not think that kind of precedent can be allowed to remain on the books. It is totally inappropriate in this Chamber for members to vote twice.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. I know that the hon. new leader of the New Democratic Party has announced that from now on the New Democrats intend to be the real official opposition. I do not know if—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: Now that you are enjoying the first part I hope you will enjoy the last part.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Prud'homme: I hope she did not mean that she was to become the official opposition through trickery or otherwise by having some members voting twice on both sides of the issue.

Therefore, I suggest to you that if the hon. member has voted for and against the motion that would be quite unique in the annals of the British parliamentary system. If that is the way the New Democrats intend to run their affairs in this new leadership I would like to be on notice so we will know how to behave in the future.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I am the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden and I object to the non-point of order raised by the member who just spoke. I want to say to you, Sir, in the chair, that I did not rise on the first vote.

I will admit I lifted my backside from the chair an inch.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: Then I decided no. I don't know why I have to vote with my House Leader all the time. More importantly, the point is, I did not vote. Mr. Speaker, you and I have been here the same number of years. I have always risen and bowed to the Chair at full length—yours and mine—and I did not do that. I did not rise on the first vote. I am always respectful of the clerks at the table and I think they were in a little hurry to get the vote counted. I did not vote the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Therefore, the hon. member's vote will be registered with the nays.

Point of order, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, through you the House might be interested in knowing that the great charter, the Magna Carta, has just been brought to the Diefenbaker law library in Saskatoon for public display. It is just to show, as we have shown today, that things really have not changed much in 900 years.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I think I will voice the frustrations of many of us in this House toward the NDPs tricks and silliness today. The opposition day that the New Democrats would have had today will probably be lost if they do not stop playing games with the Parliament of Canada. I would implore them to be serious and to get to the Orders of the Day. Today an opposition day dealing with environmental matters and we would like to speak about environmental matters.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, in response to my good friend and hon. colleague, a parliamentarian whom I have respected over the years in terms of his observation as to what is going on today, let us be very clear, we are very concerned about the Magna Carta and the importance that it has been in the history of the western world.

Today this government introduced the bill concerning the 7 per cent goods and services tax. We are sending the government a message on behalf of the people of Canada. The Canadian people do not want this tax to proceed. That is what we are doing.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, while I understand that the Liberals might not like it, I want to make it very clear that they are co-operating with the Conservative government. They are not sending a message against the goods and services tax today. That is what the Liberal Party of Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Churchill on a point of order.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I think we all have our serious moments and our light moments in the House. But I do not think that the Whip of the Liberal party can get up and accuse us of stalling the House or not using our legitimate rights.

I remember when his party had a rat pack. They had no qualms whatsoever about jumping on desks, running after ministers and acting in a very inane manner.

The problem the Liberals have today is that same group is unavailable in the House. They are seeking the leadership. So the Liberal Whip is getting up in this House and complaining that the New Democratic Party has stolen the leadership of the House.

He is complaining that we are controlling the House and we are using that control of the House to oppose the government. That is our right. We are happy to do it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier for a short rebuttal and then I will recognize the hon. member for Halifax West.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to rebut anything. I just want to state the facts. They are that today this House has a Standing Order that states: "Projected Order of Business". Members of the NDP had an opposition day granted to them by the rules of this House. They are indeed breaking every rule in the book by playing tricks on this House and they are—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair has been very kind.

I would like to recognize the hon. member for Halifax West on a short point of order.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, I will try to make my statement on this point of order short. I want to assure members of the House the point that I raise is vital to the operation of this House.

There is no more serious responsibility on members of the House of Commons than to cast their votes on vital issues of the day. In registering their vote on any of these issues that are presented to the House of Commons there is a matter of honour involved. Every time a member votes, he votes in the representation of his constituency. Together, we all represent the people of Canada.

I distinctly witnessed in this House members responding to a division by yeas and nays. When the vote was actually taken, that is to say pursuant to Standing Order 45, there were no negative votes registered.

This means that obviously in this House people deceived the members of this House in their manner of voting, the most important function that a member of the House of Commons can perform.

We have before us a deception, people who voted nay then turned around and voted the other way. They are deceiving the House. They are destroying the very foundations of this institution.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If you would cool it a little bit, I would like to hear the hon. member for Vancouver East on a point of order.

Ms. Mitchell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is on a point of privilege that I rise.

I am sure that you, in listening to the last speaker, realize that he was really infringing on the privileges of all women parliamentarians in this place. He referred, as some members are wont to do, as members of this House being "he". He completely excluded all members of Parliament who happen to be of the female sex. I would ask that he withdraw his statement.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure the hon. member for Halifax West realizes that. I know that as a great colleague in this House he will do the same.

Mr. Crosby: I certainly recognize the presence in this House of Commons of men and women, but let me remind the member that honour is the same for both sexes. I am talking about the honour of the members of this House, not the sex.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do have a couple more bills to introduce for the hon. member for Kamloops, if I may. If there is still time, we will get a few more points of orders in.

AN ACT TO AMEND THE NATIONAL HOUSING ACT (LEASES FOR LOW-RENTAL HOUSING PROJECTS)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce a bill, an act to amend the National Housing Act (leases for low-rental housing projects).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

After the taking of the vote:

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I hope we are checking the voting record to make sure that members only voted once because I think for the second time in my 11 years in Parliament we really have something going on here this afternoon that is very, very unfortunate for the democratic system. To attempt to vote twice in this Chamber or in a ballot box in a general election is totally unacceptable; totally unacceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to ask the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair whether he is opposed or in favour of this bill.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I thought it was really quite clear that I stood fully erect against the vote. I thought that was pretty clear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is all I wanted to know.

I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I just wondered due to the interest of my colleagues in this House for environmental matters—I take this seriously—would you seek unanimous consent to proceed to Orders of the Day?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker. First, on the request from the Liberal Whip and Deputy House Leader we are certainly not going to give the government one more day to impose the GST. For five minutes we would have an Opposition Day. If we gave today as an Opposition Day that would give the government one more day to make it easier to pass the GST.

I asked for the floor because the Government Whip rose and complained about the antics of the Liberals and various members of the New Democratic Party.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure you do that one of the worst nights we ever spent in the House of Commons was when certain Conservative members stormed in and put the Deputy Speaker at threat. I believe the Government Whip was one of those members.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to hear the hon. member for Churchill finish his remarks, please.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, when the Conservative members in opposition in those days did that, they took a physical, aggressive act against the Chair of this House. Nothing can be more against the whole principle of Parliament than that.

For the Conservatives to get up at this time and complain because we may perform a little antic which is not threatening to the Chair, and certainly not threatening to this institution, something to protect the people of Canada, there is a heck of a difference. I would think that before we have any challenges by the Government Whip, he should think back to his own actions and the actions of his colleagues.

He will argue that he felt strongly about that bill. He will argue that the Tory members had a right to charge the Chair, raising their fists, shaking their fists, because they felt strongly about a piece of legislation.

We are not threatening the Chair. But we do feel strongly against this legislation and we will use every legitimate means we have to fight it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to clean up this item today. The hon. member for Kamloops has an opportunity to say a few words about his bill and then I can put it for second reading.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat perplexed by the way you decided that some members points of orders can be accepted at any time, while other members calls for privilege are not accepted. There seems to be quite an editing processing going on here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the hon. member going to speak on his bill?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the point of this bill being introduced today is twofold. First, it looks like the New Democratic Party is the only party sending a clear message to the government today that to proceed with the goods and services tax is an inappropriate act and flies in the face of 80 per cent of the people of Canada. That is one of the points.

Mr. Arseneault: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Riis: If you want to recognize the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I will sit down because I do think that a point of order or point of privilege ought to be heard. I am prepared to sit down and complete my remarks in a moment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will just say that the hon. member will not have time to complete his remarks if he wants to get this put through. Otherwise, I will recognize the hon. member from Restigouche—Chaleur.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I just want to set the record straight. It seems as if a wrong impression is being given. I want it categorically stated to the Canadian people that the Liberal party is against the GST. Today we were supposed to debate environmental matters. The NDP has always claimed a monopoly on that. Now we know words are cheap over there. We have the monopoly on the environment. We are the party of the environment, not the NDP.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I want to register a point of privilege. I rose on several occasions to stand in this House to register my point of order. You chose to ignore me. I rose on a point of privilege that I understand takes precedence over points of order, and you still refused to hear me, Mr. Speaker.

I first and foremost wish to register my complaint at not being recognized on my point of privilege.

The second point is on the point of order that I wish to present to you and to this House. I first would like you to rule on my point of privilege, that you did not hear me, while I understand that points of privilege take precedence over points of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I did not hear the hon. member because there was too much noise. If he does not complete his remarks right now, I will call it six o'clock.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, the remark I wish to make is that we have seen this government choose every means available to it to push through legislation. This government has used closure more than any other government. At times it has ripped up the Standing Orders in order to allow the free trade agreement to go through. It is the job of the opposition to use every means available—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being six o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

Therefore, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

POINT OF ORDER

STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to see whether at this juncture you would seek the consent of the House to permit the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make a brief statement on Canadian foreign policy relating to Cambodia. It is a statement of which the opposition critics for External Affairs are aware and would be able to respond to in the normal fashion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On the same point of order, first the member for Ottawa—Vanier followed by the member for Kamloops.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have two points. On the first point, Routine Proceedings calls for Statements by Ministers to be made in that time. The government shot itself in the foot, moved that the House proceed to Government Orders and, of course, did forgo its right to make a statement.

The second point is that we have committees sitting at this time. I do not think it is proper to have committees sit when this House votes on important matters such as we just did. I would like to have a ruling from the Speaker. If committees must continue to sit then we must have a ruling from the Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On the first point, the member for Kamloops.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I do not quite understand what the request means. Under the daily routine of business, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader responded to the call for Tabling of Documents. The next order of business was Statements by Ministers. I realize that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was in his place ready to make a statement. It came as a surprise to all of us that the parliamentary secretary decided to introduce a dilatory motion to move directly to Government Orders which would sabotage the Secretary of State for External Affairs' intention of making a statement.

I would like to seek clarification before we proceed further on this point of order. I would like to know why the government did what it did if it was going to actually make it impossible for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make his statement.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, if I may respond to the comments by both members of the opposition. Number one, we, as a government are very much interested in debating the legislation in the House of Commons at any time. Yesterday the NDP hijacked Parliament, wasted an entire day. When we could have been getting on with the serious issues of the day they were playing games.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Cooper: As long as they continue to behave in that childish fashion and continue to make public statements that they are going to tie up this House of Commons and refuse proper debate in this House, we are going to continue to move, by whatever means we can, to assure this House and its members the opportunity to debate the legislation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cooper: With that in mind we make a very simple request; that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be allowed to make a reasonable statement with the appropriate time for the opposition members to follow if they choose to do that. It is a simply request; a yes or no from them will suffice.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I just want to pursue my point. When I said that the government had a chance during Routine Proceedings to have Statements by Ministers, my critic, the member for Papineau, was not in the House at that time. He is now here. He was in a meeting with NGOs. The government knows that. Everybody knows that we are meeting today with the NGOs across Canada. That is an important meeting for us. I do not know why the government cannot get its act together and co-ordinate things so that we can have an organized day and a fruitful meeting with people who are very important to us.

The member for Papineau is here now and he agrees that it is so important to Canada that we could probably, by unanimous consent, go to Statements by Ministers and have a response from all sides.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can be helpful and resolve this impasse. To be fair, let me first of all say that the parliamentary secretary was accurate in his comments and I have to take that criticism, we did oppose the government's initiative to introduce the goods and services legislation yesterday.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: I cannot apologize for that, that is a fact. I appreciate that the Secretary of State for External Affairs wants to make a statement today on what I think we all agree is an important matter.

Let me suggest this: We will certainly give our consent to proceed and to agree that the minister should make his statement at this point with the understanding that at the conclusion of the minister's statement and response from both opposition critics, we would automatically revert to Routine Proceedings and proceed as we would normally do during the day.

I am prepared to say that to allow the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make his case.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona on the same point of order.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, if the government regarded the ability of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make his statement—which in any other context I would welcome, and I have often welcomed the willingness of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make ministerial statements—then it could have moved to Orders of the Day after the minister made his statement. That was the next item under Routine Proceedings, and the government did not do that. The government itself has brought about this situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The parliamentary secretary asked for unanimous consent. I gather that there is consent from the official opposition. There is, in a sense, a conditional consent from the New Democratic Party, so I would ask the parliamentary secretary to respond to the conditional consent from the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the very reason I moved the motion to proceed to Orders of the Day was to prevent what happened to this House of Commons yesterday happening again today. So we asked to move to Orders of the Day. We have asked for consent, without condition, for the minister to make his statement and the critics from the two parties to respond. They can simply say yes or no. Let it be on their heads.

Mr. Riis: I am prepared to make it simple, Mr. Speaker. No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Let me just understand this, Mr. Speaker. I am asking clarification from the House. Do I understand it that it is now the position of the New Democratic Party that when the foreign minister of Canada wants to come into the House of Commons to bring the House of Commons up to date on developments in Cambodia, on matters of Indo-China, indeed, on other questions of foreign policy, that for reasons of procedural, petty politics by the NDP, they deny Parliament the opportunity to discuss parliamentary and foreign policy business?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, this is a very important issue and we have to understand what is happening here.

I appreciate the kind gesture of the Secretary of State for External Affairs early this morning. He notified both opposition parties that he was prepared to make a statement in the House today on Cambodia, an issue that we all agree is very important.

At that time, as House leader for the New Democratic Party, I alerted our external affairs critic that this was happening, enabling him to prepare his remarks. This was the plan.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have a point of order from the member for Montreal—Saint Denis. Of course I will give the floor back to the member for Kamloops.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I would like some clarification from you on the Standing Orders. Permission was sought for unanimous consent, which was refused. I do not see what we are discussing now. It is a debate that is continuing. If we want to debate the question, I would really like to participate. But permission for unanimous consent was refused by one of the parties. I am not going into their reasons; I am saying that permission was refused. So let us go on to what we should be doing now, because we are getting into a debate between the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) and the NDP. This is not a procedural issue. It is a debate we are getting into. If you want to allow a debate, I intend to take part in it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Denis is right when he says that unanimous consent was sought and refused. I saw the Secretary of State for External Affairs as perhaps trying to make another attempt to obtain unanimous consent, and that is why I intend to allow the hon. member for Kamloops at least to say what he has to say following the representations by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

• (1200)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that we did appreciate the gesture of the Secretary of State for External Affairs this morning alerting the opposition parties of his intention to make a statement.

We prepared ourselves to respond accordingly in the usual traditions of the House. That is why we were quite taken aback. I must give credit to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader in that he may have been anticipating that the New Democratic Party might do something today to frustrate the government's efforts to discuss the goods and services tax. Having made that assumption, there are a number of other places during Routine Proceedings when he could have moved the motion that he did to go directly to Orders of the Day. He chose not to.

As a result of his decision he sabotaged the efforts of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In other words, he made the decision that we would not deal with this statement today. I regret that decision. We were prepared to respond to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We were anxious to respond to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but the government itself made it impossible for us to do that.

GENEVA CONVENTIONS ACT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill C-25, an Act to amend the Geneva Conventions Act, the National Defence Act and the Trade-marks Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to speak in favour of Bill C-25, an Act to amend the Geneva Conventions Act, the National Defence Act and the Trade-marks Act, and to offer a few comments on the importance of this legislation for Canada.

Fifty years ago, Mr. Speaker, the world entered a period of armed conflict. The Second World War caused destruction and indescribable suffering in many parts of the globe. Atrocities were committed against the weak and defenceless, and the war affected even the most helpless and the most innocent. This terrible experience proved once more that the concept of total war is intolerable.

Certain forms of protection, which previously had received only formal recognition, were now given very serious thought and considered to be important principles of international humanitarian law.

In the immediate postwar era, codifying humanitarian principles consisted basically in developing concepts that were to become part of the international law that is binding on all States. The so-called Principles of Nuremberg became a statement of standards that all States and all individuals were to observe at the outbreak of war.

Important as these principles were, they only touched on basic humanitarian problems and did so in a rather general way. It was acknowledged that more specific rule applying to specific situations were necessary and that these rules should be codified in a treaty that would enable all States to ratify their acceptance of these obligations. This development was to lead, in 1949, to the adoption of the four Geneva conventions.

The Geneva conventions are a major step in the development of humanitarian law, in that they provide significant new forms of protection for those who are most vulnerable during periods of armed conflict. They have now been ratified by most countries, including Canada.

Although these instruments were considered very important, the search continued for even more effective forms of protection.

In 1977, after four years of intensive negotiations, two additional protocols to the four Geneva conventions were adopted.

Like the conventions, the protocols clearly define how the signatory States must act during periods of armed conflict, in order to protect as much as possible those persons who are unable to provide for their own defence.

The fundamental and comprehensive nature of the obligations and form of protection set forth in the protocols make these instruments as important as those to which they are attached.

[English]

But Canada has not yet ratified the two Geneva Protocols of 1977. A Canadian delegation participated very actively and effectively over the years 1974 to 1977 at the diplomatic conference which adopted these instruments.

Indeed, at the conclusion of those conferences the Canadians present signed the protocols thereby committing us to consider seriously the possibilities of ratification.

Certainly the process of ratification is a lengthy one. It includes the stage we have now reached today with Bill C-25 coming before the House of Commons for second reading. It is a stage that requires careful consideration of the obligations which are set out in the protocols.

It may seem strange at a time when peace is breaking out all around around the world that we would be busy with the rules that govern the protection of the innocent and the civilians in times of armed conflict. Yet we are also mindful of the need both to preserve international norms and standards that can protect human rights, and to ensure that we carry out our obligations and anticipate the darker side of what may yet happen from time to time.

In looking at these protocols and the changes which they require us to make in existing legislation, Bill C-25 represents the next important step that must be taken for Canada to ratify the 1977 protocols. Perhaps the most important provision in Bill C-25 is in respect to the amendments to our own Geneva Conventions Act passed by Parliament in 1965. That act was the implementing legislation necessary for Canada to ratify the important Geneva protocols that had been developed in 1949.

In the 1965 statute, one of the important obligations that Canada assumed related to grave breaches, or war crimes. When drafting the Canadian implementing legislation, the question of Canada's obligations with respect to punishing grave breaches was viewed as having a fundamental importance.

The approach that was agreed on in the Geneva Conventions Act in 1965 was called the double criminality test. This is important to understand in light of legislation just recently passed here in Parliament relating to war criminals.

Let me explain the way the double criminality test applies. For an act or an omission to be punishable under this regime of international and domestic law it had to constitute both a grave breach of the Geneva conventions and a corresponding offence under Canadian criminal law. When consideration was first given to ratifying these protocols it seemed that the implementing legislation could simply take the same form as the 1965 Geneva Conventions Act.

However, there was a problem with this double criminality test. Thus that approach was found not to be feasible. For example, the different kinds of problems that arose can be seen in some of the newly defined offences, such as launching an indiscriminate attack which would affect civilian populations. This does not correspond to any provision in existing Canadian criminal law.

It was therefore decided in preparing this legislation for the consideration of Parliament that the grave breaches of protocol should simply be made direct offences under Canadian law. In one or two instances that approach would have created some anomalous results because of different standards. To avoid that this legislation, Bill C-25, simply proposes to amend the Geneva Conventions Act, the earlier 1965 statute, in a manner which will provide that all grave breaches, including those defined in both the conventions and the protocols, will now be direct offences under Canadian law.

The result is that the double criminality test will be eliminated for convention grave breaches.

Bill C-25 is not only concerned with the concept of grave breaches under the convention and the protocols; it also deals with the full question of the war crimes legislation. I want to touch on that briefly because that was legislation passed in the Thirty-third Parliament, and many members present recall the debate at that time. One of the important differences to bear in mind is that the legislation passed by Parliament dealing with war crimes would apply not only as all other criminal law does to crimes committed henceforth, but it also has retrospective application.

The grave breaches of the Geneva conventions and protocols on the other hand can only apply to crimes committed from here on out. That is a point that Canadians feel is very important, as reflected in the hard choice that this Parliament made when dealing with the criminal law to deal with war crimes.

The other aspects of the protocols that are touched by this bill relate for example to the matter of the Trademarks Act. This simply has to do with the importance of protecting international emblems that are worn to identify, in this case those who bear the distinctive emblem which is the equilateral white triangle on an orange background.

I pause to point out that recently we heard allegations coming from the Middle East where there is continuing conflict about soldiers using the outward appearance of being representatives of the news media. At other times we know of soldiers pretending to be representatives of the Red Cross and using the Red Cross emblem to get passage to areas from which they would be excluded as military personnel.

For example, that is why the international emblem of the Red Cross is likewise protected under our Trademarks Act. It is one of the ways in which we can use our law, as other countries who are parties to this same convention can use theirs, to do all we can to see that these important international emblems that give safe and neutral passage to those who are trying to protect innocent civilians and to preserve humanitarian conditions in times of conflict are not victimized by having the military interests on either side use these designations to gain passage to where otherwise they would not. It is important for the integrity of the Red Cross or, in this case, the emblems that are worn by those who carry out the provisions under the Geneva protocols.

In the changes proposed to the Geneva Conventions Act, which I referred to earlier, we find that there is also an amendment to the National Defence Act. The code of service discipline under the National Defence Act currently provides punishment for a number of offences corresponding to grave breaches of the conventions and protocols.

However, this code which applies to Canadian Armed Forces personnel contains a statutory limitation on the prosecution of offences under its purview. Of course, members realize that such limitations are not contemplated in either the Geneva conventions or the protocols. Those are the kinds of offences against which the clock never ceases to run but where justice sooner or later must be realized and achieved.

In order to be in compliance with both our obligations set out in the Geneva conventions and protocols and consistent with our own domestic provisions for armed service personnel, the statutory limitations in the code of service discipline must be amended so as not to apply to grave breaches of the conventions and protocols. That is another point I wanted to bring before members as an explanation of Clause 7 of Bill C-25.

In conclusion, I think that the 1977 Geneva protocols are fundamental humanitarian instruments. They are important for Canada, as they are for all other countries of the world, because they represent a sincere effort to create and maintain a civilized world. The imposition of order and those standards, even in times of armed conflict, might once have seemed as an almost surrealistic notion.

Yet it is by developing these conventions and protocols, having them ratified as we are now in the process of doing in Canada, that we work day by day and year by year to see that international law and order can be maintained, that innocent victims of total war will be protected to the greatest extent possible that international law can provide.

That is why I am very happy to have had a chance to address a few remarks to the subject matter of Bill C-25. I look forward also to hearing the remarks of other members of Parliament on this legislation as we give it second reading and as it completes its way to Royal Assent. Another important stage will have been completed. It will then permit Canada to ratify these protocols and fulfil our international obligations.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to rise and speak generally in support of Bill C-25. The context of the bill would be very hard in principle to deny. It is a context which, in light of the suffering that those of us in this generation know, is something that is still very near and dear to our hearts.

The thread of my address will essentially be a few general comments on the impetus of the bill. I would then like to respond to some of the comments made by my colleague in introducing the bill, and then perhaps some detailed comments on the specifics of Bill C-25. I would then like to indicate what it means to us in the longer term and where we would expect to go in respect of any approval that we may give this particular piece of legislation.

I would begin by saying that we have to face as a hang-over, if you like—and I hate to use the term—the past sins of our forefathers. But in this day and age when we are indeed looking at a more peaceful world in the 1990s than we were in the 1980s, it is a grim reminder that war has been with us since civilization has been around. We are probably looking at one of the more peaceful interludes, in the promising sense of peace, than we have had for some time.

But, in juxtaposition to that, it is incumbent on me to remind the House that the military casualties during the Second World War are well known to many, not just the military historians or the boffins who are interested in the details of World War II. Most of us in the House are of the generation that has read books about it. We have been subjected to it and are aware of the atrocities on the military aspect.

The civilian casualties in the Second World War alone are staggering. These are the numbers of those who were wounded or killed. In Canada, for example, in the Royal Canadian Air Force, the Canadian Army, the Royal Canadian Navy and the auxiliary forces, we lost 42,000 people.

The figures are broken down. I think it is worth while to look at them. In the Canadian Army, 23,000 killed, 58,000 wounded; in the Royal Canadian Navy, 1,600 killed, 400 wounded; in the Royal Canadian Air Force, 17,000 killed, 1,400 wounded; casualties listed in statistics, 42,000; 59,800 were also wounded, which gives us a total of 100,000 before we even consider the casualties of the families of the relatives. I dare say, Mr. Speaker, you could multiply that at least by tenfold and perhaps even by twentyfold which, when you think of it, has a pretty big impact on the population of Canada in World War II between the years 1939 and 1945.

We were at war but not in the midst of the war. The war did not take place in our country. Canada was not a battleground. Even so, such a large percentage of our population could be considered to be casualties in addition to those 100,000 who were killed and wounded.

I am not going to rhyme out a litany of other countries and their statistics. The crux of this bill and what it pertains to, and why in my heart of hearts I would find it difficult to do anything but support it, relates to these kind of numbers in World War II.

Let us not forget that what comes out of Bill C-25 has been a very long time in the making. As we are all aware, it takes a long time to get people to agree in these conventions on exactly what has to be included. Every sentence, every word, every bit of punctuation, every parenthesis has to be agreed upon. It is not too hard to understand the reason for that kind of detail when we look at these figures.

I am talking about a period of 2,160 days during which the Soviet Union suffered losses of 20 million; China, 10 million; Poland, six million; Germany, four million; Japan, two million; Yugoslavia, 1.5 million; Romania, 660,000; Greece, 620,000; and so on. I note again that the official statistic given for Canadian war dead is 42,042, when in fact the casualties go far beyond that.

If you add up the total statistics of the war dead in World War II, you are looking at close to 90 million people. You can take that to its second and third order and include those who were physically wounded, those who were wounded in mind and then those casualties of the statistics. In looking at this bill we are into another realm, another extent, another dimension, another derivative of the terrible aspects of war. These are the civilian populations, the women, the children, mothers, fathers, the people whose lives have been torn apart by the savageness, the viciousness and sometimes the inconsiderateness of war.

Even war must be civilized. Even war should be civilized. We as civilized people in this country, in this part of the world, the western hemisphere, the North American continent, should be seen as very active supporters and enthusiastic champions of this kind of cause. In a general sense I think we have to be very careful that in any note of proposing a sentence, a fraction of a word, a nuance, an extension of a verb or the parsing of a phrase that we do not lose sight of the over-all support that should be considered for this bill.

I want to take this opportunity, in as non-partisan a sense as I can, to make a comment like that which I made at the beginning of my presentation. I believe my hon. colleague from across the floor also suggested that it is almost a paradox that we are now looking at these conventions that pertain essentially to the concern and care for civilians and civilian casualties in time of war.

At first, second and maybe even third glance, peace seems to be breaking out all over. I could talk a long time on that subject. I just left the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs. We had two presentations made to us. While it would be inappropriate for me to try to include even parts of what both witnesses had to say at that committee, I do believe that I should make some comment with respect to this aspect of the bill. I have a piece of paper here in small preparation for this presentation this morning with a quotation given to Plato, that only the dead have seen the end of war. I would suggest that some greater men living in our time right now may be believing that and they may not be, I am not sure, but I would like to look at that for a while.

We are beginning a new year and a new decade and when I compare it to 1980 there is quite a comparison. I recall in another incarnation sitting in essentially a war room, a headquarters centre, worrying very much about the state of the world. The strategic assessment in January 1980 was far different from the strategic assessment of today. The Afghans had been attacked by the Soviet Union and the situation all over Europe was very bad.

We have ushered out these events to a large degree from the 1980s. We have a foundation now in the 1990s that would lead us to believe that maybe we should concentrate more on the dimensions of the civilian aspects of defence and perhaps denigrate, reduce, give less emphasis to, and be fairly lenient in budget cuts in trying to get our expenditure under control in defence matters.

In a general sense, I, and I am sure many of my colleagues on both sides of the House, have read what we know of the strategic situation right now. If there is anything that can be said in a general sense it is that the situation is dynamic, fluid and in some ways, if you use the definition of stability, essentially meaning you know what is happening. I would suggest there might be a good argument for believing that there may be more instability and more change at this point in time in our history, especially the history of those of us in the House of Commons today, than there has been at any other time in our lives.

We have a change in the world's economic, political and social structure. These are the products of decades and products of things like the Second World to which I made reference a few moments ago, and even centuries in creating for us an environment of perceived instabilities and indeed the structures that pertain to them. Perceived instabilities bring with it hostages, fear and insecurities. In turn, instability and insecurity lead to an even faster change of pace as governments scramble to try to meet the change, respond to the change, try to amend their policies and to make statements in their respective Parliaments and their Houses of Commons, to reflect how they plan to cope with these changes.

If there is any statement that I have made since I have been in the House of Commons, I will make one now that I am very sure of. I am usually sure of the statements that I make in the House of Commons but I do not always have agreement from my colleagues. In this one I know some of my hon. friends would agree when I make the statement that never before in our lifetime have the changes in the international scene been so vivid in their effects as in eastern Europe during the final weeks and indeed the opening months of this decade, 1990. People in the satellite nations of the Soviet Union have been struggling to throw off their oppressive chains. That gives us a great feeling. It makes us believe and it makes us perceive that they are coming around to our way of living. They are coming around to our beliefs, to accepting our values, and wanting to do things our way. I am one of those who is slow in perception when it comes to those kinds of things.

So dramatic and unpredictable are these changes that the NATO Alliance—it is not in disarray but I can assure you if I were given the list of the top 10 items of discussion in the NATO forums, in the passageways and in the private offices among the ambassadors nationally and internationally, I would say that in that top 10 it would certainly be how are we going to reorganize.

Military planners, external affairs planners and people who write white papers are asking what is the future of military organizations. What is the future of Canada's military force in this new decade? I am not going to take this opportunity to give my views on the dishevelled, out of date, and inappropriate white paper. I must say in all fairness I have a certain sympathy for the Minister of National Defence, his planners, writers and strategists in producing a white paper today that will be valid in a couple of days time.

I could not get off this platform now without commenting equally that even before the situation in the world changed, there were many pieces of evidence to indicate that even as the white paper was written and the strategic assessment, as it pertained at the time, the resolve to discharge the promises to Canadians, to those military people in uniform who believed that some of their problems in the previous few years were finally going to be redressed were not. There was a great disappointment which I believe has not been overtaken by events but made even more complex and disconcerting by the international situation that we find ourselves in today.

It is really a poignant comparison when I look at this legislation as it affects and involves civilians in those areas where there are wars and compare it to the situation where civilian lives are lost in Canada and the military has an involvement in the saving of these lives and the possible avoidance in the loss of some of these lives. I speak with a certain amount of experience, happy experiences in some cases and sad experiences in other cases.

I make reference now to the over 9,000 search and rescue incidents that take place in Canada almost on an annual basis. It varies plus or minus 10 per cent but the going average is 9,000. These are marine incidents, air incidents and incidents of other kinds. In addition, of course, there are the mercy flights that almost inevitably involve the men and women in the Canadian forces that in many cases are very much instrumental in saving lives, in relieving grief, suffering and pain and, indeed, in the ultimate case, in saving lives.

We should remember when we are putting our back to the wheel in this kind of a bill, when we are looking at the concerns of humans, human dignity and human rights in other countries, that we not forget that we have first and foremost a commitment in our own country to make sure that we do whatever possible and to the optimum extent to shape our forces, the force structure, and the basing of these forces. That should be a major concern. It should supersede and take priority over budgets, dollars, politics and, yes, Mr. Speaker, over everything, because it concerns people and living in Canada in peace now, today.

It is in that context that I would once more ask the Minister of National Defence to make sure that the decision that was made with respect to the demise of the tracker aircraft and the rebasing of search and rescue forces out of the Summerside area be done in a very measured sense, and to make sure that the margin, whether it is 1 per cent, 2 per cent, 5 per cent or even a quarter of a percent of saving one life in those 9,000 incidents be scrutinized again and again to its fullest.

I have spoken on the international scene and I suppose, in that sense, the likelihood of war, as we see it. I have spoken on the need for concern with NATO in Canada. I have spoken on the need to ensure that our search and rescue forces policies, dictums, methods and basings be done in such a way that under scrutiny it can be shown that there is no better way to do it, that we will have the best that money can buy.

I want to go back to the beginning of my statement with respect to the international scene and the relationship of the international scene to our defence policy right now. I look very simplistically at the defence policy as an insurance policy. If you go to a doctor and say: "Thank you doctor, I have just been told that I do not have cancer, but I still think I am going to die. I have this inscrutable pain. I do not know what is causing it. Now that you have diagnosed what it isn't, please tell me what it is", you do not on the same day run downtown or get on the telephone and tell your lawyer that you want to cancel your insurance policy because you are hedging, and that is essentially what a defence policy is.

If we have the right defence policy, we will never have to go to war. If we never have to go to war, we will not have to worry about Bill C-25 because we will not have the casualties to which great reference is made in this bill.

A defence policy is more than an insurance policy. A defence policy, no matter how it is written, no matter how long it is, how short it is, is essentially designed to do a number of things. It is designed to protect Canada, to protect Canadians here and abroad, and to protect our maritime interests, air interests and surface interests. If it is looked at in an implementation type of way, unless we have forces of any kind mobile enough to be able to be dispatched in the three dimensions of our country, be it on the land, on the sea, and in the air, our defence policy is not working.

We must bear that in mind so that we will prevent anything from happening in our country which will allow us to make a contribution to the international scene which, hopefully, will help us prevent war and the indescribable casualties that are involved. This is a terrible expression to use, Mr. Speaker, but I just made reference 15 minutes or so ago to 100 million people in World War II.

A speaker at a conference which I attended roughly eight or nine years ago made a comment that I did not particularly like, but I found it very comparative. He said that if it were ever to happen again between the superpowers, or even not between the two superpowers, it would make World War II look like a picnic. That is a frightening statement. It is one that causes me to concern myself with how we perceive the future here in Canada.

I would hasten to add that the direction of change is not premeditated. There could be setbacks and there could be U-turns. I remind everyone about the night that we sat in this House and talked about Tiananmen Square. Mr. Gorbachev is not out of the woods. He may fall from power. There may be some reversals in the nationalistic trends that we have seen.

I am not suggesting for one minute that the Soviet Union will never again engage in military action in central Europe. But in the future it would be, perhaps, as a belligerent confronting another national army or perhaps as champion of a new European order. Who knows?

These changes happen to be centred in Europe right now, but let us not forget about the Third World and other parts of the world that do not even have to be named in this House. I think there is a minimum line that Canada could take and that it should be taking. I would certainly urge my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, as soon as he can—although I understand the difficulties he has in coming up with something at this particular point in time, but even if it is an interim policy—to give us a statement of where National Defence is going in Canada. I can assure him and his colleagues across the floor and my colleagues on this side that there are a lot of people who are confused, dismayed and whose morale is kept as high as it is only by the outstanding leadership shown by our senior military personnel and, indeed, our senior civilian personnel in the Department of National Defence, and that flows all the way through.

I think this is a fantastic bill. It talks about human dignity. It talks about human life. It talks about human rights. Who in this House is not for human rights? It is not a question of whether one is for it, but to what degree is one for it? When is one prepared to compromise something that may take a tinge away from human dignity, from human rights? When is responsibility more important than human rights? These are interesting questions. Indeed, I have seen examples in the relatively short time I have been in the House where I found it interesting how three philosophies could essentially agree with the principle of human rights, but at the same time the deviance could be perhaps seen as differences in policies.

This bill is an act to amend three acts: the Geneva Conventions Act, the National Defence Act, and the Trade-marks Act. I am not going to talk too much about the Trade-marks Act. The protocols here are the protocols to the four Geneva Conventions. We are going back now to August 12, 1949. We have a preamble, legal status, and definitions which are very important, field of application, who is involved, and then we get into some of the details that I believe should be noted here.

Article 12 talks about the protection of medical units. Despite the many wars we have had and despite the difficulties we have had in centuries, there has always been a fragment of civilization that causes survival to be there. In my time there has been the rebuilding of Germany after World War II, the rebuilding of Japan after World War II to the point that today those countries not only take their place with the rest of the world powers but are seen as our competitors in the all-important field of economics. I do not object to that. As a member of civilization, God help us if we stop having those kinds of attitudes.

Parallel with that has been the tremendous concern that civilization has always had for medical units. I am a great supporter of the medical fraternity and I am delighted to see that Article 12 talks about the respect and protection that will be accorded to medical units at all times and specifically that they should never be the object of attack. That is very important and I am delighted to see it here.

In reviewing this bill, I went on to see other areas that perhaps deserve comment. I was particularly heartened and encouraged to see the part on civilian population where it talks about the general protection against the effects of hostilities and such things as indiscriminate attacks against the civilian population when it is not required and is a violation of those principles. This is a code of civilization. This is something against which we would be very ill-advised to have serious objection.

In going over this bill there are certain aspects that if debated in a committee sentence by sentence, I would have some difficulties with. In one section, Part III, Article 7, we are talking about the wounded, the sick and the ship-wrecked. It was not too long ago that we stood in this House and talked about the rigours and the difficulties faced by those who go down to the sea in ships and do their business in great waters. Bill C-25 has a separate section which deals with ship-wrecked personnel and how they should be dealt with. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, as a sailor that particular part of the humane treatment and aspect of this bill is one that I am very much in favour of.

I think one aspect of this bill, and I am just about to wrap up—

An hon. member: Don't do that, you might as well go to one o'clock now.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I enjoy wrapping up because I usually have to put my act together when I am told that my time is up. I find it is a great position to be in when my colleagues say that I have lots of time to wrap up. Perhaps I should take advantage of that.

Mr. Benjamin: Go to one o'clock.

Mr. Ferguson: It's not often we have such enlightened speakers.

Mr. Mifflin: The hon. member is very kind in his comments.

My party's position on this is that in principle we support the bill. I suppose we would be open to the suggestion as to whether or not we would want to cross every "t" and dot every "i". The important thing to remember is that we are dealing with an aspect of human rights that has taken a long time to put together. This is a piece of legislation that I just would not even begin to have some feeling for the detail of the work involved. I hope to God it will never have to be applied. But if it is, I would like to think that our country, with the compassion we have for human rights and the belief we have in the fundamental principle of individual freedoms, would be seen as Indeed, as we have shown in our aspect of peacekeeping in military forces throughout the world, a history that started back in the late 1940s, we would be seen as a champion of the bill as it goes from approval in our country to Royal Assent to whatever happens from here on in.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to make my views known on this subject and perhaps to speak on some other peripheral subjects that while not directly pertinent to the bill certainly are involved in the sense of cause and effect.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair would offer the floor to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Transcona, with the consent of the House, of course, either to start now or after Question Period.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, if other members agree, I will call it one o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 12.55 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. 0. 31

[English]

PENSIONS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask the government again to amend the pension legislation and stop the blatant discrimination against ex-spouses of deceased federal public service employees and armed forces personnel.

On January 6 the CBC news report quoted the President of the Treasury Board as saying that the appropriate amendments would be brought before this House as soon as we resume in January.

On January 8 I contacted the minister's office and was told that no such legislation was being drafted and that no such recommendation had gone before cabinet. In short, nobody in the minister's office had any idea what the minister was talking about.

These Canadians feel that they have been betrayed by this minister and they are fed up with this empty rhetoric and broken promises. As a result the Canadian Pensioners Concerned and the Organization of Spouses of Military Members are now preparing to go to court to fight for fairness and equality with other Canadian men and women under this government's pension laws.

I now call upon this government to treat this matter with the urgency that it deserves, to introduce this legislation to get rid of this discrimination and to do so immediately. Enough of the rhetoric, now is the time for action.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my frustration and anger with this government and in particular Canada Post. Main-a-Dieu, Cape Breton is a small fishing community in my constituency. It is presently awaiting the closure of its post office. It is a post office that has been in their community for 150 years.

Canada Post is neglecting to recognize the important role the post office plays in our rural communities. The post office has served as more than an avenue for postal service. It has served as an important element in our rural communities' social fabric. It is a meeting place and a sharing place for young and old.

I would ask the Minister responsible for Canada Post to change this particular decision and keep the Main-a-Dieu post office in operation. The post office is a valuable part of this community's identity and should not be dismantled. The people of Main-a-Dieu demand better of this government. They wish to have their post office maintained for years to come.

CELEBRATION OF YEAR OF THE HORSE

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, this Saturday, January 27, marks the Chinese New Year and Vietnamese New Year, Tet. May I take this opportunity to extend my very best wishes to the Chinese and Vietnamese communities in Rosedale riding, across Toronto and indeed throughout Canada as they celebrate the beginning of the Year of the Horse.

The Chinese community is one of the oldest and most distinguished in Canada. Throughout the years they have made an invaluable contribution to the building of Canada and to the cultural mosaic of our country.

The Vietnamese Canadian community has more recently settled but is also a vital part of the cultural life of this country. The Vietnamese have become full and active participants in Canadian society while maintaining the vibrant traditions of their past.

While China and Vietnam have had differences as countries I know that Canadians of Chinese and Vietnamese origin have and will find more that brings them together as Canadians than divides them. Best wishes for a happy and a prosperous new year.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, a recently leaked document from the office of the Minister of Employment and Immigration reveals that $51.8 million is being cut from the Summer Employment Experience Development Program. That is a 44 per cent cut in the federal government's commitments to student summer employment opportunities.

The Prime Minister has committed himself to making education a priority of his government but the government's commitment to education and its rhetoric are billions of dollars apart. The Minister of Finance has cut $7 billion in transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education over the next eight years and plans more cuts. He has added a 3 per cent administration fee for student loan applications and hit Canada's universities and colleges and their students with the goods and services tax. Students' fees are being increased across the country while the Secretary of State defends his government's devastating policies.

On top of this high interest rates hurt hundreds of thousands of Canadians trying to pay off huge student loans. All those involved in post-secondary education and concerned about the future of Canada and its young people call upon the Prime Minister and this government to stop the cuts and give Canadians a chance to get the education they need and deserve. The government should be helping, not devastating our post-secondary education system.

FISHERIES

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about the Atlantic Canada fishing crisis.

We must acknowledge the serious economic problems caused in many areas of the Atlantic region by the sharp decline in fish stocks in Canada's east coast fishery. However, it is equally important to recognize that solutions to those problems will probably not be found in some miraculous revival of the fishery resource. In fact, we may just be stopping in time to avoid incurable depletion.

The first important step toward solutions may well be to reluctantly accept that our fisheries have now reached and exceeded their limits of sustainable development. By so doing perhaps we can better turn our minds and our energies to finding real and lasting answers for present circumstances.

The immediate priority, of course, is to ensure economic support for people in those communities who have critically and unfortunately lost their livelihoods. We probably have the best unemployment insurance program and over all social safety net in the world for those purposes.

The ultimate priority though is to create new economic activities which are sustainable long term. We have good programs for these purposes too, better than ever before with ACOA's mandate, that are already paying major dividends in our Atlantic economy which is still a good one despite the fisheries crisis.

Our most valuable assets always are the traditional capabilities of Atlantic Canadians to cope, to create and to overcome. There is plenty of evidence in the Atlantic regional economy today to prove that. Our most compelling need now is to fully use all of those capabilities and to get on with the job.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I rise to protest again this government's callous treatment of its northern citizens. Under a program begun many years ago under a different administration, Canada Post has been shipping food to northern Canadians at special mail rates. The program's special social objective is to reduce regional disparity by enabling northerners to purchase fresh food at relatively affordable prices.

This government, however, has decided to eliminate the program and is phasing out its funding. Canada Post, as a result, is increasing the food mail rates to northern communities. Last October, Canada Post proposed to increase the food mail rate by 32 per cent. After protest by northerners and northern MPs this enormous increase now will be reduced by a minimal 5 per cent. This is small comfort.

My constituents in the eastern and central Arctic already shoulder the highest cost of living in this country and many are on fixed incomes. Because of the government's action many of my constituents will go without certain basic foods just so the government can increase Canada Post profits.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it has been a long time since Canadians have had an opportunity to witness a spectacle of hypocrisy to match the visit earlier this week of the committee of the other place on Bill C-21 to the town of Canso.

The message I understand that the committee did not share with the people of that fine town who have been so troubled is that right now, today, this very week, the number of weeks required to qualify for UI is double that which would be required if Bill C-21 were law. It is ten weeks plus four weeks because the other place has stalled the VER, plus six weeks penalty from the existing repeater provision.

Under Bill C-21 Guysborough County, including the town of Canso, will move to the Cape Breton UI district. The repeater provision will be gone. The number of weeks required will be ten weeks, not the current 20.

Senator Hebert, why did you not tell them the whole story? Let C-21 pass into law.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, during this one-year assessment of the free trade deal, the Minister for International Trade stated that Canadian border communities should get off their duffs and promote our business advantages here in Canada. The city of Cornwall has lost several industries recently with 550 workers losing their jobs. These closings and the ripple effect they produce have shocked this community. However, the workers of one plant, Marimac Inc., are trying to purchase their former employer's business rather than give up.

As well, 150 workers of BASF Cornwall are doing everything possible to save their plant, including calling upon the Prime Minister for assistance. This should tell the trade minister something about the determination of Canadian border towns to stay alive under his government's trade deal.

I believe it is the Minister for International Trade who should get off his duff and deliver to Canadian workers and industries the increased access to U.S. markets which he has been promising for so long.

RESIGNATION OF MINISTER

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Canada's amateur sports community was shocked to learn that it had lost a leader. The hon. member for Sherbrooke had always carried out his duties with honesty and openness. Unfortunately, due to a minor technical violation of the ministerial code of conduct, he has chosen to resign his post as Minister of Sport.

This was of course an honourable action by an honourable man. In offering his resignation the member for Sherbrooke was upholding the honour of this noble institution. He realized that the principle of judicial independence must be maintained even though others may not. He did what was right, not what was convenient.

• (1410)

I know that all members of this House salute this man of honour and I look forward to the return of this great friend of Parliament.

ILLITERACY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, today the International Book Voyage sponsored by the movement for Canadian literacy is being launched. Representing B.C. is Larry Loyie, a native Canadian who attended literacy programs at Carnegie Centre in Vancouver East.

Two years ago Larry was functionally illiterate. Now, due to his persistence, he is a creative writer who is helping others. This morning the minister said over four million Canadians are functionally illiterate. This wasted potential has serious personal, social and economic consequences. Yet literacy programs in Vancouver, and I expect elsewhere, accommodate only 2 per cent of illiterate persons. Language and literacy needs of many immigrants are being ignored.

I call on the minister to ensure ongoing funding for literacy programs so that the International Year of Literacy will not have been in vain, and so that Canada will benefit from the expanded potential of our people.

THE MINISTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the sports community is deeply saddened by the resignation of the Hon. Jean Charest, rightfully acknowledged as the best Minister of Sports Canada has ever had. At the Saskatoon Games as well as at the Quebec Games in Val-d'Or I was able to see for myself just how simple and human the Hon. Jean Charest, Member for Sherbrooke, was with athletes and organizers who approached him to discuss various issues.

The Hon. Jean Charest has also earned the full respect of the international constituency both for his position on drug use by athletes and for his strong defence of Canada's sports policy at the Jeux de la francophonie. He was also deeply concerned over other issues such as the predicament of young secondary school drop-outs in Canada and the integration of the handicapped in the Commonwealth Games.

Mr. Speaker, what I have just said gives us every reason to deplore the minister's resignation.

[English]

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans again showed his lack of understanding of the fishery. When mentioning the 200-mile limit, he said that the zone was "entrusted" to our use.

According to International Law of the Sea, Canada has complete management rights within the 200-mile exclusive economic zone. Moreover, the agreed rights of foreigners to catch surplus stocks is subject to our control and regulation.

In short, the minister has it all backwards. It is we who entrust our surplus stocks to foreign fishermen, only after we have determined that doing so is not against the interest of the Canadians. Our authority within the 200-mile limit is unquestioned and without limits. It is not entrusted to us.

Has the minister forgotten that we declared the 200-mile limit because it was clear that we could not trust foreigners to care about the long-term sustainable development of our fishery? Maybe he has not forgotten; maybe he was announcing a major change in policy. Maybe the government has decided that it is the foreigners out of the goodness of their hearts who have given us the right to fish within our 200-mile limit.

Actually, this might explain much of what the government has been doing to the Atlantic in recent months. I would ask that the minister give the House more warning in future, when he is planning such major announcements that so affect the east coast. Maybe we could take him on a long walk off a short pier, or take him out to the 12-mile limit and show him that it would be a Canadian boat that would have to rescue him.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, last night and this morning I witnessed a total contempt for this Chamber and for the Speaker by the NDP.

Canadians will want to know that the New Democratic members of Parliament have no guts to stand in their place and debate their position. Canadians should know that the New Democrats are making a mockery of the purpose of this Chamber. Their games played here belong in Romper Room. The New Democratic Party has demonstrated again that they have made a complete farce of their own principles.

It is a known fact that the big winners of the GST are low and modest income Canadians and the biggest losers are the rich. What a shameful demonstration by Wonder Woman and her romper room brats.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: In the event that a similar statement is made by any hon. member, I just want to give notice that the last comment was pretty clearly directed at an individual, and I know that hon. members would know that that is not acceptable in this House.

CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Institute of Child Health released a report on the health of Canadian children today that is a national tragedy. This report found that our children are at the bottom of the priority list of both the federal and provincial governments. Without the political will for immediate action our children will continue to suffer.

Figures show the death rates for poor children are 56 per cent higher than those for higher-income children. Native infant mortality rates are twice the national rate. The economic level of families can determine the health of our children.

Poverty does not mean that a child will necessarily have health problems, but poverty does mean children in poor families are at greater risk of illness and death. Poverty often means a child plays on the street or comes home to an empty house because parents cannot afford adequate child care.

The Tories, by shelving a national child care program, have done nothing to reduce the risk. The Tories have ignored this risk. The Tories have failed our children. Canadians must demand that we increase the value we place on the well-being of our children. It is their right and it is an investment in the future of our country. I support the Canadian Institute of Child Health's recommendation and call on this government to create a national child health policy.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce has given us, as government members, and the Canadian people a very clear message: cut federal spending.

Mr. Speaker, the deficit is eating into the government's financial resources, threatening the very existence of our social programs, and exerting enormous pressure on the Canadian economy by depriving it of the capital needed to ensure the smooth operation of this country's businesses.

The solutions are difficult but obvious: a three-year freeze on government operating expenditures; saving programs which contribute to economic growth and provide for the security of the various classes; and further substantial cuts in the public service.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns the economic rationale of his new goods and services tax. Everyone, even his Minister of Finance, is predicting that the country is now entering a period of slow growth. The Prime Minister chooses now to introduce a massive new sales tax. The Prime Minister says that he will not bring interest rates down because he has to fight inflation. Indeed, the bank rate went up again this morning. At the same time the Prime Minister is introducing a brand new sales tax.

The Prime Minister claimed this week in the House of Commons that he is committed to the less favoured regions of the country, yet he introduces a brand new sales tax which will hurt and inflict the most hardship on the regions of the country.

If he is so concerned about inflationary pressures, if he is so concerned about slower economic growth, if he is so concerned about aiding the less favoured regions of the country, why does he, at this moment, introduce a massive regressive, inflationary sales tax that risks the economic future of the country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think most people would agree that the idea of introducing or changing taxation measures is for any government neither pleasant nor easy. Canadian Parliaments have considered the problem of the manufacturers' sales tax for decades. There has been general agreement in this Parliament under different governments and across the nation that the present manufacturers' sales tax places a severe penalty on Canadian manufacturers and favours importers over those who create jobs in Canada. We are the only industrialized country left with that kind of pernicious tax on our own domestic manufacturers and producers. Forty-eight of our leading competitors around the world have adopted a tax similar to the goods and services tax that is now being proposed here.

• (1420)

I draw to my hon. friend's attention that all of the analysts of substance indicate that while there will be a modest initial increase in inflation, in the longer haul the structural reforms that will be brought about by the introduction of a goods and services tax will be beneficial for the entire nation. It will increase our competitive position, it will help our exporters and will create new wealth and new employment in Canada.

As I conclude—

Some hon. members: Order!

Mr. Mulroney: I draw to my friend's attention that this is a replacement tax. We are getting rid of a 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax and substituting for it a 7 per cent goods and services tax. I believe that is in the interests of consumers and producers alike.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): I would think that after that answer we all have as much latitude as we need.

I draw to the Prime Minister's attention that the two largest trading nations in the world, namely the United States and Japan, have no such tax as his Minister of Finance has just introduced. It is no accident that they are the strongest trading nations in the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the economists tell us that the government should do everything it can to spare Canada a recession. The Prime Minister and his government, however, are doing the exact opposite of what has to be done. After reducing funding for the social programs that might have helped us in these difficult times, the Prime Minister is dead set on introducing his goods and services tax, which will aggravate inflation and cause more unemployment.

Could the Prime Minister explain to the House why he is going to introduce the goods and services tax although he knows perfectly well that in the present circumstances, this tax may well bring about a recession?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party has criticized the present tax system. The Liberal Party said that the present tax was pernicious and that we had to get rid of it. I think the Liberals would do well to consider defining their tax alternatives. They are against the GST, but they have nothing positive to offer.

I think the Liberal Party has a moral obligation, if it wants to be taken seriously, to identify for the purposes of this debate the exact nature of its tax proposals.

The Leader of the Opposition said in his preamble—

[English]

That our two leading trading partners do not have the equivalent of a GST. He is quite wrong. Japan has introduced the equivalent of a GST. While the United States does not have a GST, it does not have medicare either. Canadians will decide Canadian policies.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, let us consider the consistency of the Prime Minister. Apparently we have the current version of the goods and services tax which was introduced in this House yesterday. It violates all of his election promises relating to such a tax. It violates the election promise he made for provincial participation and it violates the election promise for simplicity. It violates his election promise for visibility. It violates his election promise for fairness and it violates his election promise for revenue neutrality.

If this is the final version of the Prime Minister's goods and services tax, why is it 100 per cent the opposite of what he promised during the last election? Has he got to the stage now where he no longer feels any personal obligation to fulfil his promises and commitments to the Canadian people?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have demonstrated clearly that we have fulfilled our promises. I want to take the leader of the opposition through what he has just said, point by point. On the question of provincial participation, we said at the time—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Unworkable without it. That is what you said.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, if I might have the opportunity to refer the Leader of the Opposition to the white paper back in June, 1987, we said that there were three options. What is being proposed in legislation now is precisely one of those options. We tried to get provincial participation. It was not possible.

Second, on simplicity, perhaps the hon. member would like to compare the manufacturers' sales tax and its 22,000 exemptions out of 75,000 taxpayers with this particular tax. If he looks at that tax where one out of three taxpayers has an exemption and some sort of special deal on it with Revenue Canada, surely the Leader of the Opposition will understand that it is a very complex tax.

The third point is visibility. How can the hon. member say we are not moving to a very visible tax? By changing from an existing tax which is very deep in the price of anything that is purchased in this country to one where the cash register receipt will show how much tax is paid, that is visibility.

BORDER CONTROL

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Yesterday, Montrealers were dismayed to learn that the Miron quarry had become a dump for waste from New York.

I would like to ask the minister what concrete and practical measures he has taken since his colleague from the Environment and he assured this House in December 1988 that they were taking measures to control the Canada–U.S. border? What has been done? How is it that today, 14 months later, we find ourselves with a situation like the one at the Miron quarry in Montreal?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that we have entered into agreements with the Department of the Environment for the Province of Quebec to monitor the borders on illegal solid waste coming into this country—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Check it off as it comes in.

Mr. Jelinek: The Leader of the Opposition just doesn't want to listen, does he? We have been very successful in the last 14 months. The hon. member has just pointed out the time frame.

However, a few days ago solid waste was hidden in recycled paper as a new method of trying to move solid waste into Canada. A shipment did come in. A shipment came in because it was impossible for our customs officers to know that it was being hidden in the recycled paper. We took immediate measures to utilize our new automated computers, our Customs commercialized systems, to have an input into the system. As a result of that, as recently as yesterday our customs officers stopped another illegal shipment with waste hidden in the recycled paper and the U.S. Customs were able to seize it as a result of the positive steps taken by Canada Customs. So, our system is working.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The minister tells us about a truck that was blocked. But he is silent on the dozens of trucks carrying thousands of tons of waste from the United States which are dumped here in Canada. We are indignant about this silence on these trucks coming from the United States.

Does the minister know that Quebec has a law making this American waste illegal? When will he reach an agreement with U.S. Customs to stop this American waste at the U.S. border?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that there are some liquid and other wastes that are not dangerous to our environment and society that are allowed to move on both sides of the border. Those illegal wastes, solid wastes, which are not allowed to come into this country are being monitored. Agreements have been made not only the Department of the Environment from the Province of Quebec, but with U.S. Customs and other agencies. We are working very closely with the Department of the Environment and my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, and we are satisfied that there is no negative effect as a result of the position that this government has taken.

• (1430)

What has happened in recent days in Quebec proves that the system is working and that illegal waste is not entering Canada from the United States.

TAXATION

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Groups opposed to this government's goods and services tax are springing up across the country. This week, senior citizens in Montreal said: "This is a regressive tax that causes severe hardship for those who are in greatest need, the poor and the elderly". And the government answers that it has no other option. My question to the Prime Minister is as follows: How can he keep saying that all Canadians must pay more tax on all the items they buy, when tax loopholes for the rich, the people who make thousands of dollars worth of profits on the stock exchange or in real estate, continue to exist?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is mistaken. We do have a very regressive tax in Canada at this moment. I am referring to the manufacturers' sales tax, that will be eliminated when the GST is introduced. We must remember that under this program, Canada will eliminate the existing 13.5 per cent tax and replace it with the 7 per cent GST. We must not forget that this tax measure contains tax benefits that will help the neediest, the less fortunate in our society. This means that the GST will be applied far more progressively than the present tax that will disappear as a result of this new measure.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister says that the manufacturers' sales tax is not fair. I would ask the Prime Minister why his government raised it not one time, not two times, not three times, but four times since his government has been in office.

The reason Canadians are opposed to the goods and services tax is that they recognize that the tax burden is not being shared fairly in this country. Will the Prime Minister confirm that the tax deduction which allows businesses to write off 80 per cent of their entertainment expenses costs this government approximately $1 billion per year?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asks why the taxes were raised. The taxes were raised by this government for the same reason they are raised by other governments here and around the world: to pay bills, to pay the cost of increasing demands of society for everything from health, education and welfare to research and development.

In all of those areas, this government has increased the federal commitment dramatically over the last five years, and all of those have to be paid for. They can be paid for either by raising taxes, cutting expenditures or printing money. There was too much money printed for too long around here, the consequence of which was rising inflation, sky-rocketing unemployment and a burden of debt which we inherited from the Liberals and are now trying to get rid of.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party has provided a number of alternatives to the goods and services tax.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Ms. McLaughlin: Will the Prime Minister commit to a fair tax system to raise revenues by ensuring that businesses do not receive a particular benefit that ordinary Canadians do not receive? I ask the Prime Minister again, will he confirm that the 80 per cent tax deduction for businesses on entertainment—we are talking about entertainment—costs this government about $1 billion a year which could go to provide for those programs that the Prime Minister speaks of.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, both I and the country will remain transfixed as we await the presentation of the options for taxation from the NDP.

All our measures will be announced in the budget, but if my hon. friend is interested in equity, the fact is that once the GST is in place, lower and modest-income seniors will pay less tax under the GST than they do today.

I think this will be of interest to all senior citizens. This will be accomplished through the GST credit which will be paid by cheque four times a year to 84 per cent of the senior citizens in Canada. As soon as the House passes the GST, 84 per cent of senior citizens four times a year will receive a very substantial cheque directly from the federal treasury to make sure that they are kept whole and that they come out of this ahead.

This is what social justice is all about. The NDP should be supporting it.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Environment Minister. In December 1988, the Minister of the Environment made commitments in this House when American construction waste was being imported. A little later, it was contaminated oil. Then the Americans sent us their old household appliances, making Canada their dump, and now they are sending us their medical waste, making Canada the Americans' toilet.

Mr. Speaker, my question for the Environment Minister is this: Since that commitment was made in December 1988, what concrete action has he taken to stop this intolerable situation for all Québecers and Canadians?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of irresponsible question that is sometimes asked about the environment. It is irresponsible because it refers, for example, to traffic in contaminated oil. We know very well that we conducted a thorough investigation, involving over 1,000 samples. We never found a drop of contaminated oil at the border since last year. Secondly, refrigerators were mentioned, for example. We know that chemicals to replace CFCs now exist. But will we require their introduction when we still do not have the information to know whether or not they are more dangerous than CFCs? We are waiting for reports; specialists are looking into it. One must be responsible, Mr. Speaker, and we are!

Something we are now doing is that in June we will publish new regulations in the wake of the Basel Agreement which will forbid international transportation of toxic substances within a very precise framework and will also include regulations banning the import of scrapped construction materials from the United States. We are beyond reproach on this score, Mr. Speaker, and I want to denounce this kind of untimely initiative.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the minister never spoke so truthfully. Indeed, he is responsible for the mess Canada is in. The reality is that the Province of Quebec has done its job and passed very specific regulations on waste. I am waiting for the minister to act. Minister Paradis is waiting for the federal government to act. The City of Montreal is waiting for the federal government to act. Wake up! What concrete action will you take so that we stop being the Americans' laughing stock?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member just referred to my friend, our friend, the Minister of the Environment, Mr. Paradis. First I note that Mr. Paradis put me as well on his hit list, in good company with Mr. Bourassa, his deputy minister and officials.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest in a very friendly way that my friend Mr. Paradis adopt more coherent regulations on importing such material. For example, it costs $100 a ton to bury this kind of dry material in New York and only $12.50 in Quebec. Perhaps Quebec should change its regulations, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for External Relations. Today we had the opportunity of meeting with several members of the Canadian Non-Government Organization Community who work in overseas development.

Last May the minister gave a firm commitment that cuts in foreign aid would not be repeated in this year's budget, and that in fact, in terms of dollars, there would be an increase as well as an increase of ODA as a percentage of GNP.

Will the minister today categorically reaffirm to me and the Canadian NGO community that her word is good, and that she can be relied upon?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that although this government is intent on reducing the deficit and, as a result, there have been cuts in the aid budget, the government's commitment to international development has not changed. I think our credibility is more important than the amounts allocated for the aid budget, and since 1984, there have been many initiatives reflecting the Canadian government's commitment to Third World countries.

As for the meeting to which the hon. member referred, this morning the Secretary of State and I also had the pleasure of meeting representatives of the various NGOs. I think all parties agreed it was necessary to make the public more aware of its role in supporting development aid.

As for our position, we maintained the government's commitment to help the poorest countries.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same minister. I do not feel that I got an answer to my previous question.

Last May the minister said in the House of Commons: "As soon as next year, we will increase aid funding which will grow by $800 million over the coming year, and this, Mr. Speaker, is a firm commitment".

Poverty in the Third World has a direct negative impact on Canada's economy, environment and security. Why can this government not assure us that it will live up to its commitments to the Third World today for our sake and theirs?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to something I said last year. Perhaps I, in turn, may refer to what was said on January 19, 1981 by the Liberal Prime Minister at the time, in answer to a question—

An hon. member: Promises, promises!

Mrs. Landry: —don't you want to hear what I have to say?

—to a question put by the hon. member for Oshawa, who asked the Leader of the Liberal Party about that party's commitment with respect to .5 and .7, and I quote the Prime Minister at the time, who said:

> The hon. gentleman says that from 1975 on we have not progressed in proportional terms toward the goal I had set, and he is right.

Mr. Speaker, I don't think the Liberal Party has a monopoly on compassion.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, in her answer to the previous question, the Minister for External Relations referred to Canada's credibility. I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question about Canada's credibility and about his own credibility.

It seems to me that what is at stake in whether or not there are further cuts to overseas development assistance funds in Canada is the credibility of Canada as a country seriously committed to international development and the credibility of the Secretary of State for External Affairs into whose safekeeping that reputation is given.

I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he will rise in his place now and say that he will not give in to the dictatorship of small minds coming out of the Ministry of Finance and that he will stand up for Canada's reputation as a country committed to overseas development assistance?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while we are talking about the credibility of Canada in foreign policy, I must make reference again to the shameful display this morning by members of the New Democratic Party when, for simple partisan reasons, they prevented the discussion in this House of Commons of an important foreign policy statement with regard to Indo-China and Cambodia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The hon. member will well know that of the major industrialized countries, the G-7, Canada is second only to France in terms of the proportion of money we make available to official development assistance.

The member will know that in terms of forgiveness of debt, in terms of moving to an all-grant basis, in terms of taking initiatives whether they are in Indo-China or in Central America or in Africa or anywhere else, this government has very often and consistently taken the lead in the world. We intend to continue to do that and we intend to maintain the capacity to do that.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the minister does himself a disservice by misrepresenting what happened here this morning. He knows that it was a motion moved by his colleague which prevented him from making the statement that he wanted to make.

Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs not realize that the very reputation which he referred to in his answer, without answering the question that I asked him about the cuts, is the very thing that all of us want to preserve? I ask him to answer the question. Will he stand up to the pressure that is being put on his department to cut back funds to overseas development assistance? Will he get up in the House today and say that there will be no cut-back and that if there is, he will have the decency to resign in protest?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not come through so clearly since he stopped wearing a microphone.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The Official Opposition today was prepared to let me make the statement on Cambodia. I wonder if I might have the unanimous consent of the House, specifically the New Democratic Party, to table and have appended to Hansard the statement that I would have made today about Canada's initiative, including an aid initiative in Indo-China, an opportunity that was lost because the New Democratic Party wanted to play politics rather than get on with the foreign policy of this country.

Some hon. members: No!

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment.

The proposed fixed link crossing, the bridge to Prince Edward Island, would be a major infrastructure investment of almost $1 billion, one which a majority of Islanders and most other Canadians feel would be a big boost to both Prince Edward Island and to the Atlantic region. Certainly if it were feasible to do, it would be a most timely investment for all concerned in present circumstances.

I understand that the project as proposed would be self-financing over 35 years and in fact would eventually eliminate even the federal ferry subsidies which currently exist. Of major concern to all is that the crossing structure project be environmentally sound. It has been under study by an environmental review panel whose report I understand was supposed to be with us by September 1989.

My question is this: What is the present status of that review, when will it be received and can it be intensified and accelerated in light of current economic needs?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for his excellent question.

Mr. Speaker: We were all anticipating that start to the response.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1450)

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): In a nutshell, the panel has been struck. The panel has requested further information from Public Works. They were provided with information last December and public hearings should begin in March. By the end of July, we should be provided with a final report.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, the members of the non-governmental organizations who are here today will be very disappointed that the minister is breaking her promise for $800 million which she made last year. My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the dramatic developments that are taking place in Europe today and in view of the fact that these eastern European countries are going to need moneys to rebuild their economies, my question to the Minister is this: Will moneys that have been allocated for Third World countries be redirected to help these European economies and countries and cause insufferable hardship on the Third World or will new moneys be allocated for this purpose?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, earlier today the Deputy Prime Minister and I had the opportunity to meet with Mr. Wojcik of Poland who has been in the country leading a Polish economic commission holding seminars across the country trying to find practical ways in which Canadian entrepreneurs and others might take part in the dramatic changes in Europe. That is certainly one kind of aid that Canada can extend.

Another kind of aid has been announced by my colleague and by other ministers of the government in a $42 million package that is available to Poland and other countries. We are, of course, participating in the formation of a new eastern European development bank.

As the hon. member would know, the only way that funds to eastern Europe could be eligible as official development assistance would be if that were so agreed by the Development Advisory Committee of the OECD. They have not agreed and that settles the question.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): We are happy to hear that these moneys will not be redirected.

My second question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

Third World poverty is the most extreme on this planet. If there are any cuts in aid programs for the Third World, the ensuing destruction of forests and the effects of famine will affect the environment of Third World countries and the entire world.

My question is this: Can the Minister promise the House that he will speak to his colleagues to ensure that Third World Aid funding will not be cut?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention a personal experience I had, and I do so with a great deal of pride. I had the privilege of attending the conference at the Francophone Summit in Quebec City where the Prime Minister was the first to announce that Canada was cancelling all debts of African countries. I still feel very proud of the fact. This decision has enhanced Canada's international reputation, and I don't think we need any lectures from anyone on the subject.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. The minister knows that after much effort by Canadians in processing, harvesting and marketing, redfish has become an important species in Atlantic Canada. For National Sea Products it is now their second largest catch. Yet in a letter dated January 9, to the minister, the president of National Sea expressed shock that without prior consultation or discussion, redfish was being included in a program for under-utilized species and National Sea's allocation was to be reduced below projected catch levels for 1990.

How does the minister justify giving this species away as under-utilized when National Sea wants to harvest it and fish plant workers in Canso, Gaultois, Trepassey and elsewhere face the loss of their livelihood?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might understand that tens of thousands of tonnes of surplus species, including redfish, have been left uncaught by the Canadian fishery in recent years. I believe that in these times where Atlantic communities are facing great hardship because there are fish unavailable from our primary cod stocks, we should take advantage of this uncaught surplus through a pooling arrangement to make it available to firms that will indeed harvest it, process it and market it to create additional employment in Atlantic Canada.

I have made that opportunity available to the established redfish users by giving them a 20 per cent cushion over and above the redfish they have used during the past four years and offered to supplement it on the basis of viable enterprise proposals which they will put before the Ministry of Fisheries and Oceans. Other parties can at the same time put forward bids to turn this unused resource to the advantage of Atlantic communities.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries repeatedly said in the House that Canadians are free and in fact encouraged to go out and fish these so-called under-utilized species. Why is it that when they do and when they invest time and money into developing them, he calls them under-utilized and gives them away at the same time as these fish plants in Atlantic Canada are being allowed to close?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, we make surplus fish stocks available on a priority basis to any Canadian venture and to any Canadian fisherman who wishes to go out and harvest that stock.

The decisions on which these quotas of surplus and non-surplus stocks are based are taken after extensive consultation with all of the interested parties in the Atlantic groundfish fishery. I must repeat the point I made a moment ago: There are tens of thousands of tonnes of redfish which have been left uncaught in the water and I intend to make those available to the large companies and to others who bring forward viable propositions to land them in Canadian plants and create that economic benefit for Atlantic communities.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, outside the House, the minister said that support was growing for his GST proposal.

Was the Minister of Finance referring to the fact that the provincial Liberal government in Ontario has enthusiastically jumped on his bandwagon by agreeing to collect the federal tax? Can he also confirm that a second provincial Liberal government, namely that of the province of New Brunswick, led by Frank McKenna, is about to jump on this Liberal-Conservative bandwagon of the GST? Can he confirm those facts?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there is growing all-party support, and I am sure that if there had been a provincial NDP government, it would also be offering to participate in what I think are useful discussions which we initiated as a result of the federal-provincial Finance Ministers' meeting in early December to review different ways that we could co-operate, between the two levels of government, to reduce the compliance burden and to find ways that could simplify the operations of the tax, particularly as far as small businesses are concerned.

I did not imply that the provincial governments were coming on board in support of this particular proposal, but I do want to say that I am very encouraged by the positive attitude on the part of the provincial governments to look for ways of simplifying the operations of the tax.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Finance can explain something else. We learned yesterday that three polls done last year on the GST cost the taxpayers some $290,000. I wonder if he would agree that this is a waste of money. Why spend that kind of money on polling? I wonder whether or not he will also agree to tell us how much more money they are going to spend on polling on the GST and whether or not those polls will be made public without going through the process of access to information.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that this was a Canadian pollster that we used, not like the American pollsters that are used by the New Democratic Party of Canada.

• (1500)

The hon. member knows that it is useful and helpful in the course of policy development to have a sense of some of the attitudes and the directions of Canadian thinking so that we can better reflect in the decisions that we make the attitudes that Canadians have. That is one thing that members of Parliament do, they try to assess how people are thinking about particular issues. This is just further development along those same lines.

EXTERNAL AID

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In 1984–85 thousands of Ethiopian Jews were airlifted to Israel to escape the persecution and famine in that country but, unfortunately, thousands more were left behind. Of these, 1,500 were children, many of whose families had been transferred to Israel.

In light of Canada's good relations with Ethiopia over the years and in light of the fact that there is evidence that the famine is recurring, what is Canada prepared to do to bring about the release, emigration and reunification of these unfortunate people?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my department and I have been involved in this issue for some years and will continue to do what we can to bring about the reunification of families of Ethiopian Jews.

Of course, what is easiest for us to do is to encourage the reunification of families which have connections in Canada. We make regular representations to the Government of Ethiopia to facilitate that process and will continue to do that. If there are particular cases which the hon. member or anyone else has to bring to my attention, I would like to receive them and I will pursue them.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, a single question.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. As he well knows, the western Canadian farmer is undergoing a real crisis. It is estimated that his income for the coming year is going to be 10 per cent of what it was last year. The Canadian farmer will be making the same as he did in 1941.

I have a specific question. The Americans are saying they will go after any market that they have to, and they will pay anything to protect their market. That is the same market we have. They were willing to pay $20 a tonne in their latest grain sale with the Soviet Union. What is the minister doing to respond and to protect the Canadian farmer?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, 1988 was a record income year for farmers across Canada. In 1989 it dropped slightly but was still about 15 per cent above the five-year average.

The 1990 projections do not look as promising and, accordingly, the federal government and the provinces have established a committee to assess the problem; to assess the drought, the cash flow problems and the over-all finance problem. I expect to get a full report back by the end of February.

As the hon. member knows, the preliminary crop data will not be available until some time in the early part of February. It will be assessed to see whether in fact the programs that we now have in place will be able to be applied effectively or whether in fact there will need to be further assistance which we will develop together with the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brant, a single question.

CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week I put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs with respect to ending the cruise missile testing in Canada. In response to that question the minister said that it was Canadian policy to follow in step with NATO and to work in concert with NATO with respect to arms build-down and bringing to a conclusion the cold war.

We find out today that Belgium, a member of NATO, has called for the withdrawal of some 26,000 troops from West Germany. The Minister of Defence in Belgium said that NATO was not responding fast enough to changing events in Europe.

I now put the question again to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he also show courage and creativity in attempting to bring about the end of the cold war by announcing that not only will cruise missile testing come to an end in Canada but they will not continue with the designation of Goose Bay as a low-level training flight facility?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was naturally intrigued when I saw that report. I have checked into it. I understand that Belgian officials say that the Minister of Defence in that country was misreported by his media. That, of course, would never happen in this country. I am looking to determine exactly what was said and I will naturally bring it to the attention of the hon. member whose interest I understand.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise hon. members that we will take, I understand, a very short point of order from the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs followed by the usual question on business matters by the hon. member for Windsor West. Then we will have a question rising out of yesterday by the Minister of Finance followed by the member for Calgary West.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I have two separate points of order which I would like to pursue separately with your agreement.

The first is that I misled the House and falsely accused the member for Winnipeg Transcona of wearing a microphone at the New Democratic Party convention. That was inadvertent. I was wrong. I apologize to him and I apologize to the House for misleading it.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During question period, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) suggested that, with the unanimous consent of the House, the statement he wanted to make this morning could be tabled and appended to Hansard. I only want to say that we agree as long as the official opposition is also allowed to table its response.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): If I can speak for my government, we agree. I have the honour to table, in both official languages, a copy of my statement.

[English]

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, I would like to draw your attention to comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

In the heat of debate he called the right hon. gentleman an idiot. Sir, I believe that is language unbecoming a member of the House of Commons. I believe that he would do the honourable thing at this time and apologize.

Mr. Speaker: I must say that in all the years that I have been here, of course, I have never heard anyone called an idiot in this place. I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona may have thought that. If he uttered it, of course, I think it would be appropriate if he withdrew. But I, of course, will hear from my friend.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, only those things which are on the record and which Mr. Speaker hears are the things that people normally withdraw. But I did say what I said and I said it after the minister said what he just withdrew.

And so, having withdrawn it, I will do likewise.

Mr. Speaker: I am compelled to return to a matter of a minute or so ago. I would ask that the Secretary of State for External Affairs just remain for a moment.

I must ask the House if there is agreement that the Right Hon. Secretary of State table his comments. Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: On the other hand, it seemed to me that that consent was given with a condition on the part of the Official Opposition at least.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, my recollection is that we are allowing the Secretary of State for External Affairs to table his statement in the House immediately. We will have up to six o'clock to table our own because I was to respond spontaneously to the minister. I now have to draft my response, which I do not mind, but normally I speak with just a few notes. So it is subject to this condition that we will agree.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: I want to say to the hon. member that I have a secretary that takes dictation very well. I make the facilities of the Speaker's office available to hon. colleagues.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, I think that since the Secretary of State for External Affairs has requested unanimous consent to table the remarks that he would have made in the House had his party not short-circuited his opportunity to make the speech, I think it is only fitting, if there is an agreement, that the two opposition parties are also able to table their responses. With that understanding, I give my consent.

Mr. Speaker: I take it also that consent is given that they will be appropriately printed in Hansard?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See Appendix.]

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday, I want to ask the representative of the government House Leader to give the customary statement of government business.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow being Friday, we intend to call Bill C-5, which will be followed by Bill C-34. Then, if we have further time, we would call again the bills that are on the Order Paper for today. I should also say that on Monday, January 29, we expect to proceed on Bill C-62 and we expect, further, to call that on other days in the same week.

Points of Order

WAYS AND MEANS MOTION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Chair for its indulgence in allowing me to spend some time considering the issue that was raised by the hon. member for Kamloops yesterday in relation to the tabling of Bill C-62 and the Ways and Means motion preceding that.

I should start by noting that the August technical paper was not tabled in the House. I said I wanted to check on that when I stood yesterday, Mr. Speaker. However, I did table the draft GST legislation on October 13, 1989, which, as I stated at the time, and I quote, "fully reflects in draft bill form what the August technical paper would look like if it were put into bill form". That is a clear reference to the technical paper.

I would like to go back a little bit further, however, because I think it is important to look at the process that sales tax reform has gone through to reach the point where yesterday the GST bill was introduced.

Sales tax reform was first mentioned when I tabled the agenda for economic renewal in November of 1984. In June of 1987 the white paper, which included extensive comments on sales tax reform, was issued. In November of 1987 and March of 1988 the finance committee tabled its studies of sales tax reform. In April of 1989 the goods and services tax reform paper was issued with the budget. In August of 1989 I issued the goods and services tax technical paper. In October of 1989, as I indicated earlier, we tabled the draft GST legislation. In November of 1989 the finance committee tabled its report on the technical paper on the goods and services tax.

Clearly, there would have been no committee hearings or committee report without the study of the technical paper. The sole purpose of the hearings undertaken by the finance committee was to study the technical paper and the proposals that were in that paper.

Finally, on December 19, 1989, I tabled a document entitled "The Goods and Services Tax" which superseded the August technical paper.

These are the documents that have been issued or tabled since our government started with the process of sales tax reform. I point out that none of these documents were required documents for the development of the legal authority to implement the GST. They were all useful documents from a policy development perspective but they were not necessary within the formal legislative process by which this House operates.

The Ways and Means motion that was tabled on Monday of this week, and was concurred in on the following day, is a different matter. It was, as members know, the first step in the legislative process of seeking legal authority from Parliament to implement the GST.

The Ways and Means motion adopted by this House on Tuesday of this week stands on is own as the first step in the legislative process, and it does not derive its authority from documents previously issued by the government or tabled in this House.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. colleague's concerns about the implication of "a Ways and Means motion based on a non-parliamentary document" are misplaced. Policy development documents or discussion papers that precede the tabling of Ways and Means motions are often not formally tabled. I think the mistake that my hon. colleague makes is in confusing the policy development process with the process by which legislation derives its legal authority.

The truth of the matter is that, having come to the end of such a long process of policy development, the government did not wish to table a Ways and Means motion without providing the context. In short, we made reference to the August technical paper as a historical milestone of the GST policy development process in an effort to be helpful to members of this House.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that our efforts in this regard were very clear. We listed the titles of the significant policy documents, their dates and how they were issued, either formally tabled or issued outside the House. Again, all of this to be helpful.

In closing, I would again submit that the Ways and Means motion tabled on Monday of this week stands on its own in providing the scope and the legal authority for the GST legislation, with or without the reference to the August technical paper that my hon. colleague has referred to.

It follows from this that the scope of the Ways and Means motion is clearly defined, and that the rate of the GST cannot be amended to exceed 7 per cent. I can assure you that there was never any intent to forge new parliamentary traditions, and I do not believe that that has been the result.

With that said, Mr. Speaker, if it would be helpful to the Chair, I would certainly be prepared to table the August technical paper. I would like to thank the Chair for its indulgence in this matter and hope that the ambiguity perceived by my hon. colleague has been laid to rest.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary on the same point.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I wish to enter into this discussion for a few moments this afternoon. I would like to make two arguments. The first one is that I think this is totally frivolous and that we should not be treating this point of order seriously. Second, I would like to put on the record for future reference, and I emphasize future reference, some of our comments on the process of Ways and Means motions.

Let me review the situation as I see it. The minister gave notice of his Ways and Means motion on Monday. On Tuesday the House voted and concurred in the Ways and Means motion. Yesterday, the GST bill was introduced and read the first time.

After reviewing the member's arguments, I cannot understand what point it is that he is really trying to make. If he or anyone else had a problem with the Ways and Means motion, why did they not express their concerns in the same way, for instance, that members do at the report stage on amendments placed on the Order Paper for debate, that being that any objections are presented before the item is moved and disposed of, or, as should have been the case here, before we voted to concur in the Ways and Means notice.

Raising his points now, after the House has decided by way of a vote on the Ways and Means motion, a vote that he took part in, is ridiculous and raises my concern that perhaps the member did not understand what he had in fact voted against.

Is he saying that Your Honour should rule the process invalid due to a reference in a Ways and Means motion that was put there to provide context and information in relation to an exhaustive and detailed public examination of a government proposal? How can the bill that we introduced be declared invalid simply by what has happened here in the past couple of days?

We do not believe that in any way any changes to the Ways and Means motion would affect one comma of this bill. Taxation bills are based on, and not identical to, Ways and Means motions. We would ask if this House is now to swallow itself by giving weight to documents issued, tabled or whatever during a five-year process of study by the public, the government or the committees of this House.

Is the member seriously suggesting that somehow overnight the Ways and Means process now must include technical papers as a formal and interpretative part of the process that will extend or restrict the scope of whatever bill it is that the government is planning on proceeding with? Surely not. The Ways and Means is the first step in the process of bringing forward a taxation measure. That is pure and it is simple.

I am not sure what this game of procedural brinkmanship is all about but I suspect it has more to do with simply stalling a measure that he and his party do not support and it really begs the question, "Whatever has happened to the old-fashioned way of getting at issues called debate?"

Having said that I believe this whole process is frivolous, I do want to, for the future, put a few thoughts on the record. I emphasize again, for the future, should a question on another Ways and Means motion come up at another time.

The member has stated that the whole process of the Ways and Means tabling, concurrence and, finally, the GST's introduction is invalid because the August 8, 1989 technical paper referred to in the GST Ways and Means was not tabled when released by the minister, and further, that this government is somehow embarking on a new procedure of basing finance bills on technical papers that have or have not been tabled in this House.

This is simply not the case. The August 8, 1989 technical paper was not tabled at the time of its release simply because the House was not sitting in August. The Ways and Means motion states that the August technical paper was issued and not tabled. Documents for which no statutory requirement for tabling exist do not have to be tabled.

Standing Order 32 deals with documents that should be tabled and I quote Standing Order 32(1):

> Any return, report or other paper required to be laid before the House in accordance with any Act of Parliament or in pursuance of any resolution or Standing Order of this House may be deposited with the Clerk of the House on any sitting day, and such return, report or other paper shall be deemed for all purposes to have been presented to or laid before the House.

Standing Order 32(2) says:

> A Minister of the Crown, or a Parliamentary Secretary acting on behalf of a Minister, may, in his or her place in the House, state that he or she proposes to lay upon the Table of the House, any report or other paper dealing with a matter coming within the administrative responsibilities of the government, and, thereupon, the same shall be deemed for all purposes to have been laid before the House.

If documents are tabled for which no statutory requirement exists, it is simply because the minister wishes to do so as a courtesy so that the public and Parliament can be informed of government initiatives. This August 8 technical paper, while not tabled, was in fact distributed to all members of Parliament following its release and was in fact the only document released by the Department of Finance on August 8, 1989, as was stated in the Ways and Means motion relating to the GST.

What could be more specific than that? How could the member end up still being confused? The hon. member is trying to give formal parliamentary weight to a document which, all along, was meant only to inform the public as part of the government's ongoing process of consultation and information. In short, the minister is being taken to task on the floor of the House of Commons because he was being helpful in providing context to where the Ways and Means emanated from.

I think if we go through all of the documents, the Ways and Means motions, it becomes very clear that everything that was done in this five-year process is a consistent step-by-step process. The Ways and Means motion refers to a 7 per cent GST. It does not pick up a theme that was mentioned in the earlier technical document of 9 per cent.

So in fact we believe that in this case it is a very frivolous point of order simply because the House had decided, the member had an opportunity, if he chose to, to get up and make his objections to the Ways and Means motion before the House decided on it, before he in fact and his party got up and expressed their opinion that Ways and Means motion. So we believe that it is frivolous.

Second, we do believe that should this question arise again it is very clear that the Ways and Means motion is the only part of the formal process that begins the financial process. It is not the documents that are referred to in that Ways and Means, whether they be technical documents, documents tabled in this House or documents not tabled in this House.

The bottom line is that we believe this is a frivolous point of order. We believe that the House should not be held up in any way while this issue is considered because we do believe that the raising of the point of order was totally out of place and is simply being used as a disruptive tactic to delay dealing with a very important piece of legislation which is central to this government's program for this particular Parliament.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments of my hon. colleagues. I respect their views and simply want to say at the outset of my comments that in no way was this meant to be a frivolous point of order.

The arguments have been presented to you. I do not have much to add to what I raised yesterday but I would like to repeat two small sections.

First, I would like to reply to my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary, regarding why I raised it when I did. When I read the notice of Ways and Means motion I read that a tax in this motion referred to as a goods and services tax would be imposed after 1990 under the Excise Tax Act at a rate of 7 per cent as set out in the documents entitled, and so on and so forth.

In other words, when I saw the words "as set out" I must admit I made the assumption that they were documents, papers that had been tabled in the House of Commons. That is the way we normally do business to my understanding, that is the way I have always done business. And it was not until I went to the Journals branch to receive a copy of the technical paper to familiarize myself with the contents that I was made aware that it had never been tabled, that this document on which the Ways and Means motion was based was not a document that had been tabled in this House and made available to members of this House, but was a technical document that a minister had issued some time in the past.

Without going over the arguments, I do hope that we are not entering an era where significant tax changes will be based primarily on documents issued by some one, some place, somewhere, and not here in the House of Commons.

I reiterate, however, that the question that I posed to you yesterday and asked for a ruling on, that is, whether or not the adoption of this Ways and Means motion had breached parliamentary tradition, I still think is a very valid question. And asking you to review whether we are not establishing a very dangerous precedent is still a very reasonable question to ask.

As well, I believe that whether this imposes a rather uncertain scope around the goods and services bill and the amendments the House will be empowered to consider is a question on which you ought to rule.

So while I respect the views of my hon. colleagues, I do think that we are trying to offer you views to enable you to make a decision so that this type of question never comes up again in the future. We will have some very clear guidelines spelled out as a result of your ruling when you make it. I do not think that the arguments put forward today detract in any way from the questions that I posed yesterday.

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. Minister of Finance for taking the time to give the Chair his views on this matter. I also want to thank the parliamentary secretary. Again I want to thank the hon. member for Kamloops for responding.

I must say to all hon. members, as I said yesterday, that of course the Chair takes this matter as a serious question. I shall return to the House with a response as soon as I am able. I thank hon. members.

The hon. member for Calgary West on another matter.

PRIVILEGE

TAKING OF VOTES

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a question of privilege which arose from the objections I made yesterday when it appeared to me that one or more New Democratic Party members of the House had voted twice on a single formal division taking place in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you now, after having looked at the television, our electronic Hansard tape of those divisions, that two members did in fact vote twice, and that such actions constitute a prima facie case of privilege. If you so find, Mr. Speaker, I will be prepared to move the usual motion for referral of the matter to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business.

I cannot imagine anything that is more serious to the rights and privileges of members. It begins with the electoral process where it is against the law for citizens to attempt to vote twice in a single election. Certainly in this chamber it is against our traditions and against our privileges.

I think the grounds for this question of privilege are indisputable and pure. I cannot do my job as a member of this House. I cannot vote and be unimpeded in having my vote lead to a legitimate decision if any or several members vote twice on a single question.

The highly unusual nature of such actions probably makes them a contempt of Parliament rather than a breach of privilege, but that is for the House to determine at a later point.

The television tapes will show that in the recorded division on the motion of the member for Kamloops for first reading on his Magna Carta day bill, the member for Regina—Lumsden voted twice, first in the affirmative and then in the negative.

On page 7438 of Hansard you will find, Mr. Speaker, that this problematic behaviour was further compounded when the member stood in this chamber and clearly denied having voted twice. That was in this chamber where we take the word of a member on important issues. He clearly denied it.

The Lord gives us eyes to see and ears to hear. Mr. Speaker, if you review the tape you will find that the member's name was called in the affirmative and called in the negative. You will see, Mr. Speaker, that the member rose in his place in the affirmative and was recorded in the negative.

Later in the recorded division on the motion of the member for Kamloops for leave to introduce his National Housing Act amendment bill, the member for Windsor—St. Clair voted twice: first in the affirmative and then in the negative. His name was called in the affirmative. When you view the tape, Mr. Speaker, you will see him rising in the affirmative and again in the negative.

I cannot state more emphatically the unacceptable consequences for all members if such actions are not stopped. Every member's vote here would become devalued without their being able to do anything to stop the debasement.

The consequences to each and every member's right and duty to make a decision on questions are unthinkable and unacceptable. This is a profoundly basic matter of privilege.

I refer you, Sir, to Maingot's Parliamentary Privilege in Canada at page 199 where the privilege grounds of intentional misleading are discussed. He states: "It must be shown that the member was obstructed in his work relating to a proceeding in Parliament".

At page 205 in the section dealing with raising complaints against members in the House of Commons, he states: "A member of the House of Commons who, for example, has admitted to have deliberately misled the House would probably forthwith be the subject of a motion for contempt".

He also states that simple justice requires that no hon. member should have to submit to investigation of his conduct by the House or a committee until he has been charged with an offence.

I have indicated to you already, Mr. Speaker, that I am herewith making the charge with the television tapes as evidence.

Further I point you, Sir, to page 194 under the heading "Member Gets Benefit of Doubt" where a 1978 precedent of ruling is cited to indicate that if the member making the claim to privilege or objecting to a possible contempt has an arguable point and the Speaker feels any doubt on the question, then he should leave it to the House. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you might want to do that.

Finally, as I suggested earlier, the offence in question is probably a contempt rather than a breach of privilege since I do not think that voting twice is in our traditional codified limits or list of banned practices. Why would it be since it is so unthinkable?

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to intervene in this point of privilege.

The accusation I do not understand at all. Early this morning, having heard the comments of the government Whip last night, I looked at Hansard and read it clearly. I noticed on both occasions to which he refers that when the actual vote was taken it is very clear who voted in support of the motion to declare a Magna Carta day and who voted against it.

Not only is it clear in Hansard, which of course is our official record, but the Speaker indicated some concern and the member for Regina—Lumsden got to his feet to clarify the situation. He stated: "I did not rise on the first vote." That was the vote in favour of the motion.

"I did not rise on the first vote," he repeats.

Third, he stated: "I did not vote the first time."

In other words on three different occasions, in case there was any element of a doubt, he rose and indicated that he did not vote in the affirmative.

I cannot imagine how much clearer one could get, both in terms of how the vote is recorded and on three occasions the comments of the hon. member.

Turning to the second point regarding the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair, again, at the time the Speaker asked: "I would like to ask the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair whether he is opposed or in favour of this bill." He asks that because there had been some heckling from the government side at the time in terms of whether he had voted in favour or not.

The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair then rose in the House and said, again, to clarify very, very clearly: "I thought it was really quite clear", he said. "I stood fully erect against the vote."

Again, it was recorded in Hansard that he voted against the motion and stated clearly in the House that the hon. member voted against the motion.

Then the Acting Speaker of the day said: "That is all I wanted to know." It was clarified.

Normally, we do not have to stand up and clarify how we vote as a response to some heckling from the government members. But because of the seriousness of the vote, because it was looking at the pros and cons, presumably, of declaring June 15 Magna Carta day for Canada, recognizing that this was a day in our history when a very cruel king imposed taxes that were unfair, and so on, the people had risen against that particular initiative. Whether that was an appropriate thing to do or not, it encouraged the members to take their—

• (1540)

Mr. Speaker: I heard the hon. member with his usual learned appreciation of history yesterday. The issue here is not whether the king had risen; it is whether the members have risen. I would ask the hon. member to keep to the point.

Mr. Riis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do take this matter very seriously. I suspect my hon. colleagues take it seriously as well.

I simply want to conclude by saying that yesterday we went to extraordinary lengths to ensure the voting practice of certain members both in terms of how Hansard records it, as it always does, but, more appropriate, the fact that the two hon. members in question actually stood in the House and on a number of occasions made it very clear how they had voted.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments regarding the suggestion that some members of this House might have voted twice yesterday, which is against the rules and, in my opinion, shows a certain—

[English]

I guess the better word to use is the word "contempt" for the House, if they did in fact vote twice.

I have some difficulties with the argument put forward by my colleague on the government side. I must share with him some of my concerns.

Yesterday's events were the results of a procedure, the government having introduced a GST bill which we have fought, as you know, Mr. Speaker, continuously since it was suggested to the House some months ago. Liberals will continue to fight that bill, but we will do it within the rules. We will do it within the spirit of the rules. We will do it to try and get the government to withdraw that proposal, but we will always abide by the rules.

Normally the claim that a member voted twice—and that is the claim, I think, that is being made by my friend and colleague, the government Whip—would be dealt with, I suspect, as a matter of order rather than as a matter of privilege. No reasonable member, and I suspect that we are all reasonable members here, would try to accelerate this accusation into a claim of contempt unless—and I underline that—there was ample evidence that this behaviour was an intentional, calculated effort to impede the work of the House. If that can be proven, then there may be reasons for contempt.

But if any member choses to accuse another member of contempt on that basis in such circumstances, he or she must be able to support that accusation with facts.

Let us look at the Hansard of yesterday. I know it is going to be difficult because what I have to say is pretty touchy in the sense that I was here. I heard the Clerk call the name of the member for Regina—Lumsden. I saw the member for Regina—Lumsden attempt to rise and point his fingers, making a sign, I thought, that he intended to vote. It could be—and I am going to give him the benefit of the doubt—that he had a cramp in his hamstrings, that he had a sore back, or something, or that he made a mistake and sat down. He admitted himself: "I will admit I lifted my backside from the chair an inch", so I have to give him the benefit of the doubt on that one. It is my only way of looking at a gentleman's word.

In the other case, I was here again.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member is suggesting that sometimes hon. members rise with no consequence at all.

Mr. Gauthier: Sometimes they do that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cooper: Don't take that personally.

Mr. Gauthier: I am not taking that personally, don't worry.

In the other case concerning the member for Windsor—St. Clair, I was here, Mr. Speaker. I saw and heard the Clerk call the name of Mr. McCurdy. Mr. McCurdy, when the member was challenged by the Chair, or asked by the Chair, he said this, as reported in yesterday's Hansard at page 7441:

> Mr. Speaker, I thought it was really quite clear that I stood fully erect against the vote. I thought that was pretty clear.

The only conclusion I can draw—and I am being very fair here—is that members of the NDP have difficulties standing up for anything.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier: They do not know when they are standing or not standing.

Mr. Speaker: We ought to confine our argument to the physical act of standing, not to matters of great principle in a general sense. I know that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier would want to assist the Speaker.

Mr. Gauthier: That is what I am doing, Mr. Speaker.

Again, Sir, you were invited to look at the transcripts of the videos of yesterday's deliberations. If you do that, Mr. Speaker, you cannot draw any other conclusion but that indeed they tried to stand. One said: "I stood erect". In both cases they either have not got a backbone in their back and thus they cannot use it, or they have had some kind of difficulties asserting whether they were sitting or standing—and I am being fair; I am being very fair here.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is a professional man. I would think that I could almost take judicial notice of what the hon. member says about whether or not there is a backbone. However, I am still concerned about whether or not, backbone or not, the body belonging to the hon. member got up.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I shall leave you to decide that. In your great judgment, knowledge and wisdom you will have to decide whether they did stand or not—and they possibly did. I will leave that to you.

The Chair will also have to decide whether the Clerk saw them stand, yes or no. We all saw the Clerk, heard the Clerk acknowledge the person. I am not going to question the Table's vision or how it interprets people standing or sitting.

In any case, to allege that there has been contempt is pushing things a bit too far, if in my view I want to pay very much attention to the hon. member's intention to either rise or sit. I cannot judge that and will leave it to the Speaker to come back and tell us that in his view the member was either standing or sitting. As I said before, NDP members always have difficulty standing up for anything, so I have difficulties deciding whether they were standing or not.

If you decide, Sir, that there is a prima facie case of privilege—and by the way contempt is privilege or privilege is contempt—then any motion accusing those two members of voting twice would have to bear some kind of proof that indeed they did it deliberately. That I am not qualified to judge, as I think I made clear in my remarks.

I am not sure whether they intended to obstruct. I am not sure whether they wanted to vote. All I know is that the facts, since that is what you are looking at, Mr. Speaker, are there. They are on tape. We all saw them. We were here. I am witness to something that happened.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, I will go with the decision one way or the other. I hope that you have a lot of patience, Sir, a lot of vision and a lot of judgment. It is going to be difficult.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues, I was a witness to the events in this Chamber on January 24, 1990. I think that this was a dark day for the House of Commons. I think all members will recognize that for various reasons.

The dark part of the day that I want to point out in support of my colleague and his representations to the Chair is recorded in Hansard and is beyond dispute. I registered this complaint, and it is recorded in Hansard as well.

I said then, and I will repeat it today: there is no more serious function of a member of this House of Commons than registering a vote. I say that because when they register a vote in this House of Commons they do so on behalf of their constituency, and together we vote on behalf of Canada. To jeopardize the purity of voting in this House of Commons is one of the most serious contempts of Parliament that can take place.

You only have to look, Mr. Speaker, at page 7436 of Hansard to see the contempt printed on the permanent record of this House. What is printed there is the fact that on a division, on a voice vote, the Speaker heard and registered yeas and nays. Then, at least five members of this House of Commons stood up and asked for a recorded vote.

I am looking at the proceedings with respect to a bill concerning Magna Carta day. When the recorded division was called, notwithstanding the yeas and nays on the vote, notwithstanding that five members of the House of Commons stood up and asked for a recorded vote, there were no nay votes registered. There was no negative vote. Nobody in the House of Commons was against that measure.

There was something going on in this chamber. I will not say what it was. I will tell you if you ask me what I think was going on. What I think was going on was obstruction of the business of this House. In my view that is what was going on. I suspect, Mr. Speaker, but it is up to you to find out, that there was unjustifiable obstruction of the business of this House contrary to the rules of this House.

The rules of this House are based on honour. Voting is based on honour. That honour was breached because members of this House stood up, asked for a recorded division, and then did not vote against the measure.

Somebody in this House is deceiving the House. Mr. Speaker, you have to find out who that person is.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair on the same point.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to say that we have had garbage in and garbage out—garbage in from the government side and garbage out from the Liberal side.

I find the discussion that is occurring now really quite outrageous. We have people who in a less self-righteous incarnation stormed the Chair now talking about propriety in the House. We will leave that alone.

What we have at issue is the accusation that this member and another member are in contempt for having voted twice. We have launched into a discussion of whether one is standing or sitting. If there is any contempt in this House, it is contempt for the truth.

I am sure that my colleague for Regina—Lumsden will defend himself. But I am here to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that any video tape or any other evidence will show that in the midst of a great deal of heckling and a vote going on I was engaged in a conversation with my colleague right here. In respect to which and in order to pursue it I moved myself in her direction. I may indeed have raised myself an inch or two from my chair. That did not, in my mind, constitute a vote.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCurdy: I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, if the member is doubtful about what erect is, what standing is, then that member should review all the tapes and look at the way in which this member has consistently voted ever since he has been here. It is to stand erect and to bow his head at every occasion. That did not happen yesterday.

We have had the Liberal proponent of the Conservative point of view suggesting that my name was called by the Clerk. The Clerk generally assumes that every one in a row is going to vote either in the affirmative or the negative, whether that member stands or not. Very often, as you know, Mr. Speaker, names are called before people have even contemplated standing up, or long afterward, so it is patently ridiculous to use that as a criterion.

I am here to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and this House that it was perfectly clear that I did not stand, did not intend to stand. I think it can be no more than an excruciatingly childish malevolence that would have any member in this House accuse me of acting in an improper way. I have not done so. I am not doing so. I will not do so. I resent the accusation.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, the first point I want to make is that the point made by the hon. member from Halifax is well taken. Hansard shows no recording of anyone saying: "Nay". Yet there were some hon. members who voted nay. So what?

Second, I believe the government Whip made a point about how members voted on a voice vote of yeas and nays. I defy that hon. gentleman—and I know that the Chair would not even attempt, nor would the Clerk—to pick out every hon. member present in the House who said "yea" and every member who said "nay".

The Speaker goes by the number of decibels or the amount of volume from the "nays" and from the "yeas". I have often thought that I would like to get a left-eared hearing aid for the Speaker. I thought that the "nays" had it, but he said they did not. That is beside the point.

If the member were recorded as having voted twice on the recorded vote, then one would obviously be in contempt, although no Clerk of any competence—and our Clerks possess the highest possible competence—is going to put a member's name down each way on a vote. They are just not going to do it. They will draw the matter to the attention of the Chair. The Chair will ask the hon. member for clarification, which he did in the case of my colleague from Windsor—St. Clair, and which he did in my case. I replied, as quoted by the Liberal Whip who quoted Hansard accurately, making it plain that I was voting "nay". That was the end of that.

The government Whip now tries to make a federal case out of it. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, if you ruled I voted "yea" and not "nay" I could not care less. Everybody here knows that we were working within the rules of Parliament, within the rules of this House, to do what we could to prevent the government from calling the bill on the goods and services tax. That is perfectly in order within the rules. Should we choose to divide in one party two ways on a bill from a member of that one party, surely that is up to us and to the individual members. I am certain that it would be of no concern to the Chair.

I stated that I thought I gave what certainly was a satisfactory explanation to the Acting Speaker who was in the chair yesterday as to clarifying where my vote was to be cast. He so ordered and the results were announced by the Clerk. I assumed that that was the end of that.

I agree with my colleague who said that he did not see anything here about a question of privilege. It may be on a point of order. Points of order were raised yesterday and were answered to the satisfaction of the Chair. I am assuming that that would have been and should have been the end of that.

Mr. Speaker, I will leave it to your good judgment. Whichever way you say that I voted and whichever way you say that the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair voted, we will abide by what you say. I hope that will put an end to that.

Also, I want to express my gratitude to the government Whip for helping take up government time.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief contribution to the discussion because I think the principle that has been raised by the government Whip is an important one. Certainly it is not the practice of this House that members vote twice. Indeed, I would like to refer your Honour to citation 223(3) of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, page 76, which states:

> If a Member who has heard the question put should inadvertently vote contrary to his intention, he may not be allowed to correct the mistake; but his vote must remain as first recorded.

• (1600)

If you look at the Clerk's record for yesterday's votes on the three votes that are in dispute today, Mr. Speaker, I think you will see that the Clerk's record indicates that both the hon. members who have just spoken voted yea on the first occasion and then the mark was removed after the members explained that they were voting nay and that they had only voted once.

I suggest the citation that I have referred to in Beauchesne's indicates that the vote having once been cast by the member rising in his seat, and his name being called and no correction being offered at the time indicates that that vote cannot subsequently be changed, even if the member seeks to vote a second time.

In support of that the learned author of Beauchesne's refers to a debate of July 1. In fact it was in the early morning hours of July 2, 1926, and it was a most famous occasion in this House. The vote was won 96 to 95 votes. As a result of that division on that day, my hon. friends opposite will recall the Meighen government came crashing down. The House was dissolved the next day and it went out in an election—a good thing for Canada!

What happened was that one of the members of the House, Mr. Bird, voted inadvertently. He was paired and he was not supposed to have voted. He rose after the vote and made this statement as recorded at page 5311 of Hansard for July 1, 1926. He said:

> I wish to explain to the House, and with extreme regret, that I was paired with the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) who had retired from the House on account of indisposition, and I cast my vote inadvertently.

He at least voted inadvertently. He did not vote twice. The Speaker went on and stated:

> —The rule is that when a vote has been recorded, when the result has been proclaimed, and when the motion has been declared carried or lost, that expresses the judgment of the House. This principle is to be found in May, who says at page 343 that a vote once given cannot be withdrawn.
> With regard to the claim made by the hon. member for Nelson that he was paired, May, at page 336, says:
> There cannot be any parliamentary recognition of this practice (pairing) although it has never been expressly condemned and it is therefore conducted privately by individual members or arranged by gentlemen known as the whips, who are entrusted by their political parties with the office of collecting their respective forces on a division. Therefore, the hon. gentleman having voted in the House, the vote must stand as it was proclaimed by the Clerk.

There was a considerable argument following, a brief but considerable argument, because clearly this vote had very profound implications. Yet, on that occasion, the rule was stated. It is restated in Beauchesne's. It has clearly been the rule in this Parliament for as long as anyone here has been around, and I suggest that once those votes were recorded for the yeas yesterday, the hon. members ought not to have been permitted to vote or to change their vote or to indicate that their vote was any other way. Having been recorded once they were stuck with it. If they chose to move in their seats when a vote was being taken I suggest that is their funeral.

The hon. member says he was going to speak to his neighbour. The rules provide that during the taking of a vote no member shall make any noise or cause any disturbance. The words are very clear in the Standing Orders. If the hon. member wants to rise in his seat, if he wants to move about the House during the taking of a vote, I say it is contrary to the rules, and if his or her vote gets recorded in a way he or she does not want I suggest that is the hon. member's own tough luck.

I say that to have allowed the change yesterday in those votes was improper. To have allowed the second votes I say was improper, and my submission is, Mr. Speaker, that the member's vote must stand as recorded. The precedent in 1926 has to be one of the strongest possible precedents because it brought down a government. It was a vote of confidence in a government, a three-day old government. That precedent stands and has represented the law of Parliament throughout the period since, and probably for a good long time before. I invite your Honour to so rule.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona on the same point.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, as much as I would love to get on to Bill C-25, I have listened with care to the arguments that have been presented. I was not here yesterday when these events took place. I have looked at Hansard, I have listened to the arguments, and I must say that this whole exchange drives me to abject despair about the House of Commons and where it might be headed. I say this with respect to the fact that Hansard shows how people voted and how they did not vote. Obviously this was sorted out at the time.

What the government Whip appears to be doing is suggesting that hon. members from Regina—Lumsden and Windsor—Lake St. Clair in some way or another attempted to deliberately sabotage the voting process or mislead the House with respect to how they voted. I think it is clear on the face of it that that is not what they were about. It was clear on the face of it yesterday or Hansard would not record what it records.

The response of the government members is to the tactic of forcing a vote on a matter on which there is no dispute in order to delay, a tactic they do not like but it certainly is a tactic that they would have had no qualms about employing themselves if they felt strongly enough about things.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but this House has had many years of experience of tactics to delay. Hon. members on one side or the other may not like those tactics, but provided they are within the rules I have no power, authority or inclination to limit them. What the Chair is faced with here is a question of whether members rose both for the yea and the nay vote. It is that simple. I will have to draw what conclusions I must draw as a consequence.

I do not want the argument to get off into the question of whether or not delaying tactics in the House of Commons are right or wrong. They are used and as long as they are used within the rules, as I have said many times, they are accepted. We understand that. It is part of the tactics of this place.

The statements on the part of the hon. member for Calgary West, and we have just heard from the hon. member for Halifax West, are very clear. The allegation is that the members rose for both votes. That is what I have to decide. If that is physically so then I have to decide, I suppose, what inference I draw from that.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief and to the point. I think what we have here is not a point of privilege at all but a form of character assassination that I think is unworthy of some of the people that I know on the other side of the House. Frankly, I am quite disappointed by that.

• (1610)

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Cambridge on the same point.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I will indeed be brief. I was here yesterday. After the vote took place, what I heard was the Clerk of the House rise and state quite clearly that the results of the vote were 24 to one. I reviewed the tape this morning and if my memory serves me correctly, the videotape also recorded a 24 to one vote.

My question is that in Hansard on Division No. 173, the vote is recorded as 23 to one. As the Speaker reviews the comments over the last half hour, could you take into consideration that once the member from Regina—Lumsden had indeed clarified his vote, the vote count changed in Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Windsor—Lake St. Clair on a further intervention.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I think that my colleague from Winnipeg—Strathcona has well characterized what is at issue here. I would also like to refer to other participants in this argument about how many angles there are on the head of a pin.

First, the Liberal member has indicated that if there was an inadvertence in voting, in this instance yea when the intent was to vote nay, then the effect of that is to cancel the intended vote and let the first vote stand. That seems to suggest to me that there is an assumption that inadvertence is at least possible. Inadvertence, not only on the part of a member but inadvertence or an error on the part of the Clerk.

I want to re-emphasize the pattern of voting in this place. It is generally assumed that members of a particular party are all going to vote the same way. Once the process is in train, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, on the part of your own observation, that it is very likely that no matter what a member might have done, the probability is high that his or her vote would have been recorded consistent with that of the pattern of voting of his or her party and not reflect any dissent that might have been there.

It is perfectly clear on the evidence that there was no standing upright on the part of this member on the yea vote, that there was indeed a clear standing, erect and upright with a bowing of the head in the affirmative with respect to the nay vote. It was subsequently questioned by the then Acting Speaker what the intention was.

Now, for anyone in this House to suggest that he or she saw or heard whatever the person may claim to have seen or heard which was inconsistent with what actually happened is absolute garbage. It is even worse for someone who was not here to have launched into a tremendous analysis on the basis of no evidence, on the basis of deductive reasoning. What is involved here is inductive reasoning. What is seen should lead to the conclusion not what is thought leading to the conclusion.

I think what we have here is an example of the Government Whip shooting himself in the foot because what his concern is really all about is that the New Democratic Party in this House yesterday used every tactic conceivable within the bounds of the rules in order to impede the introduction and the debate on a piece of legislation which gives offence to 80 per cent of the population of this country.

Mr. Speaker: That may or may not be the case. But that is not the argument that has been brought to me this afternoon. I, of course, will hear the hon. member's conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. McCurdy: Let me just finish, Mr. Speaker. There is no recorded vote in Hansard that indicates that I voted any other way than what I acted to vote or what I have claimed to vote. I think it is just patently ridiculous. It is malevolent, childishly malevolent, to have introduced this discussion at this time. I think the appropriate ruling is to look at—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. Hon. members have risen and said that from what they saw and what they saw on tapes other hon. members voted twice. They have put that matter to me and the question of whether it is a breach of privilege or contempt or both. That is the issue I have to decide. I do not want to have the argument move away from that particular issue. I do not think that the argument is advanced on one side or the other with any vituperation with respect to the motivation of any particular member in the chamber.

Unless we have further interventions, I am going to look very carefully at what has been said. I have to tell the House that I cannot ignore this point that has been raised and I must deal with it. I will return to the House as soon as I can. I can only say that I regret that this issue has arisen, but it has and I will have to deal with it as adequately as I am able and in the interests of the House. I will return as soon as I can. I thank hon. members for their interventions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: one, the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James—Agriculture; two, the member for Saint-Laurent—Solicitor General; three, the hon. member for Fundy—Royal—Acid Rain.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

GENEVA CONVENTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) that Bill C-25, an Act to amend the Geneva Conventions Act, the National Defence Act and the Trade-marks Act be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I was beginning to believe that I would never get to speak to this bill today. I am glad that the opportunity has finally arisen. I find it unfortunate that it did not come earlier, not just because it was a personal inconvenience, but because of the nature of the controversy that prevented us from getting to this matter earlier.

Bill C-25 before us is an Act to amend the Geneva Conventions Act, the National Defence Act and the Trade-marks Act. The purpose of the bill, as I understand it, is to ratify two protocols to the 1949 Geneva Convention which were agreed to in 1977. This tells us something about how slowly the mills of the gods grind with respect to international law, the fact that in January 1990 we are only now proceeding to ratify a protocol that was agreed to in Geneva in 1977.

The Geneva Convention that we are talking about here refers to the law applicable in time of armed conflict, humanitarian law or rules of conduct in war. The protocols serve to broaden the scope of the conventions. For instance, they include additional protections for prisoners of war and rules regarding children in armed conflict. The Geneva Conventions Act is amended so that its language is consistent with that of the protocols. The National Defence Act is amended so that there are no statutory limitations on the prosecution of grave breaches, again consistent with the protocols, and the amendment to the Trade-marks Act introduces legal protection for the new international distinctive sign for civil defence.

On the face of it, from the point of view of the New Democratic Party, there seems to be nothing particularly objectionable about this legislation. It merely ratifies what was agreed to in 1977. If there is anything objectionable, and perhaps there are some reasons for this but I cannot imagine that there is a good reason, it would be why something should take 13 years to be ratified. There are other countries, of course, which have already ratified the protocols.

I understand that the sole controversial feature of the protocols is that it extends the rules of the Conventions beyond international conflicts to cover civil wars or national liberation movements and the governments which they oppose. If my information is correct, I understand that this is giving our American friends some problems as they are leery about giving POWs of national liberation movements a recognized status. I am glad to see that the government, in bringing this bill before Parliament, is not itself participating in that cautiousness and is willing to proceed with the ratification of the protocol.

This particular bill also gives us an opportunity to talk about international law in general and the over all approach of this government to existing international law as well as to the need for international laws which do not now exist or which could possibly come into existence very quickly if the government were more active in this respect. When I speak of laws that could possibly come into existence, I am thinking of the fact, for instance, that we have not as a country ratified the Law of the Sea.

Here we are in the middle of an ecological crisis of major proportion on the Atlantic coast with respect of the fishery in which almost everyone agrees that one of the causes of that ecological crisis has been overfishing and the role of foreign fishermen and foreign trawlers in our waters. This situation would seem to me to point to the need for stronger international agreements with respect to the oceans and with respect to the seas and yet we have not had any attempt made by this government to ratify the Law of the Sea Convention. Why, Mr. Speaker? The only reason I have heard is that there is reluctance in Washington to ratify the Law of the Sea Convention because there are things in the Law of the Sea Convention with respect to the sharing of mineral rights on the ocean floor that offend the entrepreneurial sensibilities of the American administration.

Therefore, here we are, in many respects, victims of our own reluctance on the east coast to bring into force, because in order for these things to come into force there is a requirement that so many nations ratify the Convention. That requirement has not been met and Canada has not done its part to help that convention meet that requirement by ratifying the Law of the Sea Convention.

Canada, with respect to existing international law, does not exactly have a perfect record either. We could talk about the fact that the government of El Salvador, headed by the Arena Party, recently prevented the evacuation of FMLN soldiers needing medical aid, in contravention of the protocols. There was no Canadian protest with respect to that or, for that matter, with respect to other violations of human rights by the Arena government which, as we all know, derives its political sustenance from the fact that it is supported by the United States and through its relationship with the military in El Salvador which is supported by the United States to the tune of $1.3 million a day.

There we have an instance where existing international law has something to say about something which is actually happening. It is very fine for the government to be acting finally with respect to international law as it affects something which is not happening in many respects, that is to say with regard to some future war although wars are going on in the world, but where we have an opportunity to comment on the enforcement or the appropriateness of existing international law, we have passed up those opportunities.

We have passed them up with respect to El Salvador, which I have just mentioned. We passed up the opportunity to show our respect for international law when the United States invaded Panama in contravention of a considerable body of international law. Yet the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that although they regretted the use of violence, they were not willing to condemn that particular violation of international law.

We show contempt for international law in our continuing silence about what is being done to the formerly separate country of East Timor and its people by Indonesia, because we regard our commercial relationships with Indonesia as more important than the fate of the people of East Timor.

I was very disturbed to learn just the other day that Australia has entered into a contract or an agreement with the Indonesian government with respect to a body of water that formerly seemed to be part of East Timor, and therefore our Australian colleagues are giving credibility to the Indonesian claim, a claim which stands over against the obvious case of East Timor with respect to the UN Charter and the whole matter of the right to self determination.

It seems to me that the government's record with respect to international labour law is also suspect. It has come to our attention in recent weeks, as a result of events in Romania, that the CANDU reactor which was being built in Romania was being built by what can only be described as slave labour.

Now, Mr. Speaker, does the government really intend to have us believe that the people in AECL and the people in the appropriate government departments did not know that this was going on? Or was it, in fact, a willingness on the part of the government to turn a blind eye to the violation of international labour law in the interests of promoting the agenda of the nuclear industry in this country? It certainly seems to me that the latter interpretation is the one that has the most probability of being true.

Violations of human rights in the context of wars continue. Yet what does Canada do to prevent these kinds of conflicts from occurring around the world, which conflicts these protocols to the convention rightly address? It seems to me the main thing that Canada could be doing would be acting to prevent these conflicts in the first place. Instead, Canada, to our shame, has a record of contributing to these conflicts by being a country which sells arms to many of the countries involved in the very kind of conflicts that these protocols now try to address.

I have here before me the most recent edition of Ploughshares Monitor for December, 1989. It has a handy list, if you like, of all the countries in which there are now armed conflicts proceeding in which there is documented direct Canadian arms sales and documented indirect Canadian arms sales. I am relieved to see that there are some conflicts going on in the world where are no documented direct Canadian arms sales or, for that matter, indirect Canadian arms sales. Let me mention the ones in which there are documented direct arms sales. In Columbia there is a record of documented indirect Canadian arms sales. There is documentation of direct Canadian arms sales in Peru, in Israel, in Northern Ireland and Turkey. There is documentation of indirect arms sales in Western Sahara, Sudan, Chad, Uganda and Angola.

There is a record of indirect Canadian arms sales in the Iraq—Iranian conflict. In India where there is conflict between the government and separatist ethnic and religious rebels, there is direct Canadian arms sales; in Samolia, indirect Canadian arms sales; in Mozambique, direct Canadian arms sales; in Sri Lanka, direct Canadian arms sales; in Indonesia, direct Canadian arms sales; in Malaysia, direct Canadian arms sales; in the Philippines, indirect Canadian arms sales.

Finally, in the conflict between the Chinese and Vietnamese governments since 1979, there is record of direct Canadian arms sales. This is evidence compiled by Project Ploughshares for the most current, comprehensive sources.

It is one thing to pass protocol. We will be co-operative in passing these protocols. It is another thing to work in the international community around the world for those things which will actually prevent the situation to which these protocols address themselves.

Unfortunately, as far we are concerned, the Canadian government's record in that respect is not one that Canadians should be as proud of as they sometimes are. There is no question that the average Canadian feels good about Canada's role in the world, and so they should, in many respects. They need to be reminded, not just from time to time, but consistently that our hands are indeed dirty with respect to a lot of these armed conflicts that are happening around the world.

It is about time we did our part to move the world toward a new concept of security that is not based on military arms, the kind of security which is sought by all the people to whom we now sell arms, but the kind of security that could come from a real attempt to build a just and sustainable international economic order. It is a concept of security in which environmental damage would come to an end, in which children would not be dying at the rate of one every two seconds, and which deals with many of the things the non-governmental organizations concerned with international development are concerned about.

They were here today to protest the possibility of further cuts in Canada's overseas development assistance. That is where matters of real security come in. Yet this government appears to be on the brink of pulling back even further from its responsibilities in that regard.

I believe there is a need for new strength and new concepts in international law to deal with human rights violations within countries and to deal with environmental violations. We need to find a way for the United Nations to escape from its captivity to the notion of national sovereignty so that nations which are abusing, torturing, murdering or committing genocide against elements of their population can no longer hide behind the notion of national sovereignty. We need to find a way, as a world, to transcend that notion, because we have become that global village in which everyone's business is everyone else's business, whether we like it or not. It would be a simple world if that were not the case, and an easier world in many respects, but it is not that kind of world. What happens anywhere in the globe is indeed the business of everyone else on planet earth and it is about time we had international institutions which were trying to reflect that reality.

That is true with respect to human rights violations. It is also true with respect to the environment because, as we found out, it is not just in the context of human rights violations that we need to transcend notions of national sovereignty. It is in the reality of nature and transboundary pollution that we find the real limits to national sovereignty. Pollution does not know borders. It is a bit like money in that respect. Pollution can transcend national sovereignty in a way which is often very damaging, as we know only too well here in Canada as a result of transboundary air pollution coming from the United States in the form of acid rain.

We are becoming even more aware of it as a result of evidence that our oceans, particularly our east coast, it appears has been used as a toxic dumping ground by various and sundry ships, either by way of disposing of their own waste or perhaps even waste they deliberately intended to dump in Canadian waters.

We are not in a position to do anything about that nationally or internationally. We have not signed the Law of the Sea, and we are not pressing for tough environmental action. Nationally, we have a couple of tracker planes still operating out of Prince Edward Island. The government is not willing to guarantee their future.

The other night I saw on television that apparently we have a plane which keeps an eye on the Great Lakes for toxic dumping and recently it made a flight over Newfoundland. But this is something it can do only every once in a blue moon.

Are we about to become the garbage dump of the world or are we going to do something about this? We need to act in at least two different ways. We need stronger international laws with respect to the environment, and we need the self respect to have the capacity to monitor at the basic level at least what is going on in our own territory, particularly in our own waters. Yet that is something that the government has chosen not to do.

I am always saddened by the language of security and its obvious inadequacy. How many times recently have we witnessed on the national news stories about beaches being destroyed by oil spills. We wonder how we are going to clean up the beaches and save the sea birds, the fishery, maintain the scenery for the tourist potential and all those things.

In the meantime, while the very foundations of life in the sea are being threatened, navies all over the world with their submarines with sea-launch cruise missiles, destroyers, cruisers and aircraft carriers cannot do anything against what is really now threatening the planet, now threatening the human prospect, and against what is really threatening creation.

How pathetic is the human consciousness when we consider all the money and effort which is put into preparing to kill each other in such a variety of phantasmagoric ways. Yet nature itself is poised to render us extinct because we do not have the common sense to act together to defend ourselves from this common threat to human security, the environmental threat.

That is why we need to show more respect than this government has for the whole notion of international law for those laws which exist now, for those laws which are waiting to be ratified and for those laws which have not even been written. Only through developing that kind of global consciousness will we be able to save ourselves, if we can save ourselves. What does Canada do?

There is a convention of the International Labour Organization with respect to asbestos and the occupational health and environmental human health consequences of the use of asbestos. What does the Canadian government become noted for in international circles? Ignoring that convention. Ignoring that conclusion of the ILO.

Canadians like to pride themselves as being a bit ahead of the Americans on some of these issues. We are even at odds with the United States of America. When it comes to asbestos we have been absolutely shameful. We have been participating in campaigns of disinformation with respect to the records on asbestos and encouraging countries to ignore the ILO Convention, encouraging countries to ignore the record with respect to asbestos in countries like Thailand, for example.

What does this do for our international reputation? What does this do for our ability in the councils of the world to argue for stronger international law? Is it just so we can selectively disobey it when it suits our purposes? I hope that is not the case and yet in so many ways that appears to be the case. Time and time again we have appeared to be willing to turn a blind eye to what is going on with respect to the environment or with respect to the record of certain governments in order to pursue the economic self interest of our country.

One is reminded of the fact that not far from here at this very time there are a number of people in the city from Iran who are on a hunger strike to call attention to the massive human rights violations which continue in Iran despite the death of Ayatollah Khomeini and the coming to power of the new Prime Minister, Rafsanjani. These people are doing their best to call attention to the fact that from the way that regime treats its own people it clearly deserves to be isolated by the international community and clearly deserves to have some action taken against it, such as a boycott of arms sales or a boycott of oil imports. Yet what did the Canadian government do? It resumed diplomatic relations with the Iranian government on the basis that it wanted to encourage the moderates. These people are the moderates. This is like the moderates that the government talks about who are in charge of El Salvador.

I have taken the opportunity in the context of this bill to say not only that we support the coming into force of these protocols and Canada's contribution to that by ratifying them as we are in the process of doing here today, but also to say that we would support the government if it moved to be much more creative and much more courageous in attempts to prevent the kinds of situations which these protocols address in attempts to create a world in which our concept of security is much broader and deeper and takes into account the environmental and social dimension.

We would support the government if it moved to incorporate those insights into its entire foreign policy which it clearly did not do when the hon. member across the way was the Minister of Defence. It brought in a white paper which, even at that time, was colder than the cold war and which now has fallen into complete and utter disrepute. We cannot find anybody in the country who would be willing to say a good word about it.

There is an opportunity as well as a necessity for the government to rethink its foreign policy and to begin to ask serious questions about how Canada can live up to its new responsibilities in this new situation. How can Canada live up to the responsibilities that it has in its unique geopolitical context, being situated between the superpowers.

How can we move in the Canadian Arctic to establish principles of common security and confidence building and various other arrangements which would assure the superpowers that the Canadian Arctic was not being used in a way that threatened either of them. We have an opportunity to break new ground as to how the superpowers will relate to each other.

Obviously both superpowers, in differing ways, are coming to the end of their tether. They are coming to the end of their hegemony over their respective spheres. It is coming more quickly in the Soviet Union. The United States still likes to think that Central America belongs to it as the Panamanian invasion shows so clearly. Whether it likes it or not, even it is coming to the end of the day when the world is divided into these two camps.

We are going to be living in a multi-polar world, for better or for worse. It is in that multi-polar world that Canada will have an opportunity to practice what it is best at. That is the kind of peacekeeping, constructive, mediatory role that Canadians have fashioned for themselves over the years and which will become even more important in this multi-polar world. There is an opportunity here for the government to do some creative thinking. I am glad to have had the opportunity, in the context of the this bill, to encourage it to do that.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I am going to follow to some extent upon the dissertation of the member for Winnipeg—Transcona on the responsibilities of Canada in the kind of situation in which we are finding ourselves. We in the New Democratic Party have no difficulty in supporting this particular bill and we intend to do so. It is an act to amend the Geneva Conventions Act, the National Defence Act and the Trade-marks Act.

The bill itself is the incorporation of the two protocols that were signed in 1977, Schedules 5 and 6, into the present bill, the Geneva Conventions Act. These are the portions of this bill which we accept. We have signed these protocols as a country and we depend upon our experts to make sure that we have not put ourselves in a difficult position. Therefore, we welcome the bill and we will support it.

There is a rub in this kind of bill, as far as Canada is concerned in the world, in what has been historically a very aggressive approach to the world, with the requirement of forced views to dominate and to control.

This type of bill is setting the rules for war, and by doing so we are having the tendency to legitimize war as a method of solving problems between countries or within countries. One of the measures in the bill extends the Geneva Convention to human rights and the protection of prisoners, and children in countries where there has been insurrection, where there is a kind of war which some people will call war for freedom and others would call a revolution.

The very fact that we need such a convention is a statement to some extent of the continuing barbarism of humankind. War has often been described as the legalizing of devastation of humanity, the legalizing of killing. Those conventions are part of the rules under which war is supposedly to be conducted. I suppose it is better than having no rules, no convention, but it is a bit hypocritical on our part as Canadians, and I guess on the part of other nations of the world which proclaim that they want peace and work for peace and still find it necessary to put in place rules which make war less barbaric than it would be without those rules.

It is hypocritical too in the sense that it has a tendency to promote war, in the sense that if you conduct war within these rules you are not going to be condemned quite as much as in other circumstances.

As my colleague for Winnipeg—Transcona indicated, we have in Canada, and I guess in the world, a very difficult kind of definition of security. Preparations taken and made by countries in the name of security often have the opposite results. If you think of security as being security of the individual, the country, production ability of the country, the movement of goods and so on, to continue in a normal way, then the preparation for what we at times call security often has the opposite results with the fact that we have situations where the security forces dominate. In the cases of Romania and Panama in the last little while, the security has had the opposite effect.

Rather than securing people, jobs, the economy, it had the effect of limiting growth and freedom.

This kind of security produces refugees, it deprives people of the basics in education, of health care, housing, and employment. People find themselves living in fear, even in fear of their own government. Many die unnecessarily. Far from being a convention that will that ensure security forces do not impinge upon freedom of the individual, the security forces are assisted in doing so.

In Canada there are things that we could do to assist the world in becoming secure for the individual. There are things that we could do to make war less possible and, in the eyes of some, unnecessary. That is the direction that the foreign policy of Canada, the foreign policy of the nations of the world who considered themselves peace–loving should be moving.

We cannot expect Canada to fully address the situation but the government can do everything possible to help build an international order in which all can live in peace, freedom and with economic justice. We have within our House of Commons a group of parliamentarians who call themselves the Parliamentarians for World Order who have as their aim an internationalist approach which would allow the world to proceed from now on with a minimum or, hopefully, without any wars.

In proposing this kind of action for the government, or asking that the government spend more time on pursuing this kind of a goal, there are many areas which we could define specifically. I will mention a couple. The first one is the Third World situation. Over two million people died in wars in the Third World in 1945. Every hour the world spends $130 million on armaments while 2,000 children die of starvation and disease. The transfer of arms to Third World countries has risen from $5 billion per year in the 1970s to $35 billion in the late 1980s.

Many arms transfers are sales on credit which then add to the already great debts which these governments are forced to pay. These weapons do not have the effect of calming the situation in those Third World countries. Instead, they have the effect of adding to the tension in those countries and making it less possible for there to be positive development since the money is being spent on arms and not on development.

Canada's record with development aid, peacekeeping works and so on is good but it is not having the kind of impact in the Third World countries which it should. Yet the government is withdrawing from that kind of support and that kind of aid in those countries. That is only one, and in the further opportunities that I will have, I would like to present more of these kinds of situations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I gather the hon. member had not finished his speech. The reason that he sat down was because it was five o'clock. Right?

Mr. Hovdebo: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan–Shuswap (Mr. MacWilliam) has given me written notice that he will be unable to move his motion during Private Members' Hour on Friday, January 26, 1990.

Since it was impossible to arrange, in accrodance with Standing Order 94, for an exchange of positions in the order of precedence, I hereby order the clerk to drop this order to the bottom of the order of precedence.

The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business is therefore suspended, and pursuant to Standing Order 94, the House shall revert to the business before it prior to Private Members' Hour.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SECURITY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast) moved:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Excellency praying that she will cause to be laid before this House copies of the government's files on the nature of the relationship between Herbert Norman and any of the state security organizations of the Soviet Union or any other Warsaw Pact member.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my motion, Sir, is with respect to certain papers involving the late Herbert Norman which was to be debated during the next hour. There have been discussions, Mr. Speaker, of which the other parties have been made aware, and I am extremely pleased that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has appointed the academic and former diplomat Peyton Lyon and contracted with him to look into this matter and to attempt to put to rest any lingering doubts about the late Mr. Norman, and I very much hope he succeeds.

The only concern I have, Sir, is that Mr. Lyon must be permitted to have access to the RCMP, now CSIS, documents in making his inquiry which is to be completed by March 15. I hope the parliamentary secretary will rise in a moment on this point of order, and I am hoping that there is unanimous consent that, subject to the remarks that he makes, the motion might be withdrawn.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, following on the suggestion by the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast that the motion now before the House be withdrawn, I would like to simply assist members of the House with some information confirming what the hon. member has stated, and that is with respect to the action which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has initiated in response to the questions which the hon. member previously raised in the House relating to the seemingly never settled question about Herbert Norman, a one-time foreign service officer of this country.

I would confirm to members of the House and particularly the member for Edmonton Southeast that, under the direction of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Peyton Lyon has been retained by the department on a three-month contract to review all the files which the Government of Canada has relative to this matter in order that the situation can be put to rest and finalized.

The terms of reference established for Professor Lyon are such that they directly address the questions of last May 5 posed by the hon. member in that, for example, he is to examine the nature of Mr. Norman's relations with spies, the significance of testimony of E. Bentley and the nature of Norman's relations with security organizations of the Soviet Union and other states.

Professor Lyon has a three-month assignment to do this work. He has completed one month of the task so far, having already looked at the files at External Affairs and the National Archives and will complete that process by looking at all other files which the Government of Canada has, which would include CSIS files. This will enable a report to be made by March 15, so I would believe that by the end of March, a report can be laid before members of this House, in Parliament, on this matter.

For that reason, I think it is appropriate that the hon. member has suggested that we not debate the matter further at this time, but consent to his request that his motion be withdrawn so that toward the end of March, we can hear fully the results of this methodical review that is being carried out by Professor Peyton Lyon, whom I fondly remember as having been one of my professors when I was at Carleton University.

On this side, we have complete consent to the suggestion by the hon. member.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we have been approached by the member for Edmonton Southeast, relating to this disposition of motion P-8, which is a Notice of Motion for Production of Papers.

We agree that since the government has taken the route of having Professor Peyton Lyon look into this question, it would possibly be redundant for us to discuss it at this time. We would unanimously agree to have the motion withdrawn from the Order Paper.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, we would also agree with the withdrawal. My particular concern had been trying to balance between the freedom of information and the use that can be made of this kind of request for papers by parliamentarians which other people in Canada do not have. Under the circumstances, I see no problem in agreeing to the withdrawal of the motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I gather there is unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast to withdraw his motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise at this time and speak for the next six or seven minutes about a very serious matter that relates to many sections of this country. In this particular case I am talking about agriculture.

I could start off by asking the question: How many of us in this Chamber, how many Canadians would like to lose up to 90 per cent of their income in the year 1990? In some cases, there will be 100 per cent losses of net income. That is exactly what prairie farmers are facing in the year 1990. In my home province, it is estimated by Manitoba government economists that net farm income will drop 87 per cent. In Saskatchewan, it will drop 101 per cent.

Put in terms of figures, after taking into account living expenses such as food and clothing, the average return to a farm business in Manitoba will be just a little over $1,300 in 1990. That is compared to over $10,000 last year. To use an aggregate figure, net farm income in Manitoba will drop to a paltry $37 million in 1990. That compares with $285 million in 1989 and $364 million in 1988.

In the face of those dreadful figures, those frightening figures, what has gone wrong? Why this terrible forecast? Well, first of all, the grain market around the world is not very strong. Again, Manitoba farm economists predict that wheat prices will drop 10 per cent this year; oats, 28 per cent; barley, 20 per cent; corn, 15 per cent and canola, 6 per cent.

Also, when it comes to special crops, there will be a decrease in prices; canary seed, 17 per cent; mustard, 8 per cent; lentils, 6 per cent; field peas, 5 per cent. Livestock prices, at best, will be stable or will experience slight increases.

On one side of the ledger, we have a soft world market, particularly in grains. But that is only part of the story. The major reason for this dreadful forecast, this drop in farm income in my province and other provinces in this year, 1990, is because of the reduction in farm supports from the federal government.

It is estimated that government support in the farm sector this year will drop 70 per cent. No wonder farmers are facing a crisis. No wonder the agricultural community is in disarray, because it is this government which claims that it is a great friend of the farmers. The fact of the matter is that this government has abandoned the farm community on the prairies.

Let us look at what this government has done. Take, for example, the budget of a few months ago. What did the budget do when it came to farmers? I will tell you: crop insurance, slashed $200 million; grain and flour transportation, slashed $60 million; rail branch line rehabilitation program, cut $48 million; grain and crop advance payment programs, slashed $54 million; dairy export program, cut $12 million; commodity-based loan program, slashed $15 million; and the Canadian Dairy Commission, cut $10 million. That is a grand total of $399 million. No wonder the farm community is suffering and it is because of this government.

But the situation gets even worse than that. For example, the excise tax rebate on farm fuels has been cut as of the beginning of this year. That is going to cost perhaps as much as $900,000 extra in farm fuels to the farmer. You know, the farmer is already down and out and he is having to face this extra cost of as much as $9,000 in farm fuels.

The farmers just cannot take it. On the one side, the market is soft, they are losing support. But on the other side, they are having to face higher costs and they are having to face higher taxes. Take, for example, the GST. It is going to take millions and millions of dollars out of farm pockets. It is a sad story.

Mr. Cardiff: That's not true.

Mr. Harvard: Yes, it is true. It is true not only for farmers, it is true for almost every Canadian in this country. The hon. parliamentary secretary is denying the comment. All he has to do is ask Canadians. Look at the polls and we will find out who is speaking the truth, and how Canadians feel about the issue of the GST.

Supply management is under attack in this country because of the government. It is possible that in one, two, or three years, the the grain farmers on the prairies may be thrust into what is called a continental domestic market. They have not asked for it but they might get it. The question is: Has the government really addressed this issue? Does it really know the consequences? Does it know the ramifications? Does it know what it is doing to the farmers? No, it does not know what it is doing to the farmers. It has no idea. All it knows is how to tax. That is what it knows how to do. It knows how to tax and it knows how to cut, but it does not know anything about policy, not one little thing.

Do you want to hear something about supply management? I will tell you. This comes from a farmer, as quoted in the Winnipeg Free Press the other day, under the heading of "Supply Management". This is what the farmer said. "It is working well for me. You know what you are going to get before you even start, but free trade has hurt all supply managed farmers of milk, eggs and poultry. Just the mention of free trade and the value of turkey quotas dropped from $1 a pound to 70 cents. For 100,000 pounds of quota, you pay $70,000. At the farm gate, the actual turkeys are selling for 65 cents a pound".

You do not have to listen to me, you might construe me as a little partisan. Just listen to the farmers. They are telling you that the government is absolutely wrong. The farmers are also telling the government that they feel abandoned. There is a crisis out there and the government is not recognizing it.

It reminds me of what the Prime Minister said about Atlantic Canada the other day. "There is no crisis in Atlantic Canada". That is what he said. Oh, I know he tried to explain it by saying that there is a crisis only in the fishery. But we all know that if you have a crisis in the fishery in Atlantic Canada, you have got a crisis right across those provinces. It is the same thing when it comes to the prairie provinces. If you have a crisis in agriculture, you have a crisis everywhere.

It is time that the government listened to farmers. It is time that it put its ear to the ground because there is something terribly wrong going on in the prairie provinces and other agricultural sectors of this country.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will stick to the topic as closely as I can and not deal with some of the rhetoric that we have just heard. It is important to keep the farm income situation and outlook in perceptive.

In 1989, there was a record high for realized net farm income and the final figures for 1989 are expected to be 13 per cent above the average of the last five years.

Even the prairies' 1988 realized net income was a record high and 1989 income should equal the five-year average. True, the outlook for 1990 is not encouraging, but we must keep in mind that the forecast is very preliminary at this stage. The 1990 crop is not even in the ground at this point.

International grain markets are particularly volatile these days due to low world stocks. Conditions could change dramatically over the next few months. If we look back over a number of a years with similar predictions, it has often been the case that it has changed.

The 1990 farm income prospects serve to underline the purpose of the work that has been under way for some time to develop a new long-term predictable stabilization program. This is one of the government's top priorities for this winter.

This government, when it came into office in September 1984, recognized the seriousness of the financial difficulties in the agricultural sector, the complexity of the problems and the need for a number of different assistance measures. At that time many farmers were starting to deal with the impact of the high interest rates of the early 1990s which had risen to unprecedented levels. At the peak in August 1981, the prime rate reached 22.75 per cent.

In the face of high interest rates, those farmers who were highly leveraged found themselves unable to meet their debt obligations. These high interest rates were followed by declining market returns, especially for grains and oilseeds where an international price war intensified the existing market difficulties. Widespread droughts in the mid to late 1980s created additional financial problems for many farmers, not only in the west but right across Canada. They all had to face that problem.

Recognizing the serious financial difficulties facing farmers, this government took action. We established the Special Canadian Grains Program and the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program that I know that many farmers appreciated that this government was there to respond to their needs.

Farm debt review boards were set up across the country to help farmers reach arrangements with their creditors. Three hundred and sixty million dollars was also made available to enable the Farm Credit Corporation to enter into arrangements with farmers in the same way as other creditors. From the beginning of the program to the end of December, the farm debt review boards have completed 8,253 cases and in 6,356 of those cases, arrangements have been identified between farmers and creditors, a 77 per cent success rate.

The hon. member suggested that 8,000 farmers in Saskatchewan are facing foreclosure. In fact, the estimate is closer to 7,700 farmers, based on accounts in arrears to major lenders. A year ago it was estimated that there were 8,200 and the trend is therefore positive and is declining.

But one must remember too that most of the loans that are in arrears do not always result in foreclosure. Often the loan is only in arrears due to a short-term cash flow problem and is brought up to date once the funds are available. In the serious cases, farmers can turn to farm debt review boards and very often financial restructuring can help farmers service their debts. The success of this program has already been noted.

In the short term, the federal and provincial governments will be monitoring the farm income situation carefully. We have set up a federal-provincial committee to provide essential information vis-à-vis income difficulties prior to the development of a long-term safety net program.

The government recognizes that there are cases where restructuring of debt and arrangement are not possible. In those cases, and when the family so desires, there is assistance available to help with adjustment out of the industry.

This is not an easy time for many farmers, their families and their communities, and there is no quick-fix solution. But we are on the right track with the income adjustment assistance which we have provided and we will provide in the future if conditions warrant.

At the conclusion of the Agri-food Policy Conference in Ottawa this past December, it was announced that we were establishing an industry-government task force on farm finance. This task force will examine a number of farm finance issues including the particular needs of beginning farmers. It will report to the meeting of the federal-provincial agriculture ministers in August of this year. Based on the recommendations of the task force, the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, will be in a position to take whatever action is most appropriate for the industry.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, when I rose in the House on October 3 last year, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Beatty) when Child Find would be advised whether or not it would get the funds it needed to continue to exist. Since that date, I have been informed that the organization received $15,000 to help write a book on missing children. This miserly gesture on the part of the federal government is a clear indication that the minister and his colleagues do not seem to care about dealing with the problem of missing children in Canada.

As you know, Child Find is a non-profit organization with headquarters in my riding, Saint-Laurent—Cartierville. Its purpose is to reunite missing children with their families.

The group has been asking for government assistance since April 1989. I have written to several members, urging them to support this group by providing substantial financial assistance.

[English]

In effect, the grant from the Solicitor General's office will provide the Missing Children's Network with enough funds to hire a single individual to work for three months to contribute to a book project. What should be done is to provide a sufficient level of funding that will ensure the network's ability to actively and without restriction pursue the cases of hundreds of missing children and broken families that each day look forward to reunification.

The Minister of State for Employment and Immigration provided for three UIC recipients to work in their office from September to December of 1989. However, this does not address the issue of continued government support that this organization needs to perform its task.

It is of the utmost importance that the network receive the kind of support that will give it a real chance in helping to reunite missing children with their families.

Unfortunately, it remains painfully clear to me and the rest of Canadians that this government is simply unconcerned about the problem. Instead of demonstrating leadership in the area, this government has given in to bureaucratic pigeon-holing that cannot decide whether the issue of missing kids should be handled by the Solicitor General, the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Justice.

It is clear that instead of passing responsibility from department to department, this government should be co-ordinated and unwavering in its support of organizations such as the network that actively try to combat this national social problem.

By collaborating with this group, the government would acknowledge that the problem of missing children is a social rather than a criminal one. It is not a straightforward crime that we can hand over to the police to solve. It is a problem that should be acknowledged as arising from family violence. Not until the government realizes this will we, as a society, be able to deal with the problem of missing children.

Mr. Speaker, why does the government refuse to see the problem of missing children as an aspect of family violence? By doing so, the government is depriving the organization of funds that could be provided by the family violence prevention unit at the Department of National Health and Welfare. This is intolerable.

[English]

I say that it is our collective responsibility to protect the needs of Canadian children and families to ensure that every possible resource is allocated to combat this problem.

Let us put this into perspective. The federal government will spend nearly 100,000 of our tax dollars to look into such socially relevant issues—and I am being very sarcastic—as the role of the fool in history or the social significance of lawn ornaments. I am naming just two. It is willing to spend nearly $25,000 on any one of these issues while it refuses to spend as much in addressing parental abduction and runaways as a result of abuse.

The Missing Children's Network has successfully reunited 60 families across Canada. With adequate resources one could only speculate on the number of successful reunifications that this group could facilitate.

The Network has been able to operate until now, thanks to the unceasing work of its staff and volunteers. It has managed to keep financially afloat and thus carry out its tasks and meet its objectives. However, financial resources from the private sector are not unlimited. The government must now do its share and provide a level of funding which will enable the Missing Children's Network to continue its good work and thus give missing children a real chance to find their parents again.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the government's giving the Missing Children's Network $15,000 is just a drop in the bucket. After waiting over six months for an answer from the government to find out if it could continue with its noble work, it is only being given this trifling sum. We will long remember that this Conservative government was only willing to give $15,000 to an organization which has already saved 60 children.

[English]

What the Tories are actually indicating is that they are only willing to spend a miserly $10 for each of the children on the RCMP missing children's registry. How can we take the Solicitor General's initiative seriously? How can we explain to the nearly 1,700 children and their families out there that they are worth only $10?

[Translation]

In summary, my question is the same as last October 3: When can the Missing Children's Network expect to receive the necessary funds to maintain an adequate level of service for the Canadian people? Why is this government so reluctant to provide the funds which the agency needs? And when will this government adopt a positive and modern attitude to the Missing Children's Network and stop looking away from the problem, as it did in the past?

[English]

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for the strong humanitarian commitment she has shown in this area by raising this issue today and previously in this House. However, I would also reject the facile analysis that we have just heard relating to spending, and the seriousness of the problem, and her contention that this government does not care or is not aware of this problem.

Before when she raised the question with the minister in the House she had been pushing very hard on behalf of an organization, the Missing Children's Network, for an amount of $150,000. The fact is that the government and that department is not able to provide sustaining funding for organizations. Yet the government did want to provide assistance. It did contact the network and provided $15,000 for the conference that was held. It is currently working with the network in Montreal, and others, to develop very important pamphlets that will be of guidance to parents, teachers, community groups and others to bring to light some of the information that we have learned in this country, sometimes with difficulty and sometimes with sadness, about the social problems that give rise to missing children. This is an effort to get this information out in pamphlet form which involves another $15,000.

When the hon. member contends that this government is unaware of the problem she is in fact herself unaware of the fact that in 1985, within months of forming the government of this country, the seriousness of this problem became very clear to the government, as it did to all Canadians. The government at that time announced plans for a national forum on missing children, created a missing children registry within the RCMP, and initiated much of this important research into what is really the cause of missing children.

The fact is that in most of the cases the police are normally the lead community agency in responding to a missing child incident. It is not a matter of just spending a lot more money. It is a matter of improving links and understanding, information and communication among the police, schools, parents, courts, social agencies, and members of Parliament—all organizations involved—because there is in fact much more that can be done through effective co-operation than simply spending more money on the problem.

The creation of the RCMP missing children registry way back in 1986, which did predate the hon. member joining the House of Commons, has been the single most important contribution of the Ministry of the Solicitor General to the missing children issue. I am not going to give the statistics now because the member did so in her remarks.

There is a tremendous challenge here. It is not one that can simply be answered by putting money to it. It is one that is very serious. The research that the federal government has been carrying out has shown that the majority of the missing children incidents reported to the police involved children running from their home or from an institution. Many of the incidents of running away involve children who run more than once during the same year. After runaways, parental abductions constitute the second largest category of missing children incidents that are reported to the police. Abduc-tions by strangers constitute a very small but extremely important number of cases.

As we are beginning to understand more about this problem we are becoming better equipped to deal with it. It is a sincere initiative by this government to address a very real problem. The hon. member does us all a service by keeping this issue in the forefront of our concerns here, but I do not accept the criticisms that she has made of the government's initiatives in this area. They are initiatives of which all members of this House, in a non-partisan fashion, ought to be very proud.

ACID RAIN

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, in June of last year President Bush announced his intention to transmit a bill to Congress which would, among other things, reduce emissions causing acid rain. Specifically, the bill would amend the Clean Air Act by inserting a number of sections that call for nitrogen oxides to be reduced by 2 million tons and sulphur oxides by 10 million tons relative to their 1980 emission levels by the year 2000.

It was clear that President Bush recognized acid rain as a serious environmental problem and one that demanded immediate action. The time had finally come for concrete action rather than more study.

At least 50 per cent of Canada's acid rain, and as much as 70 per cent in some areas, has its origins in emissions of sulphur dioxide and nitrous oxide from heavily industrialized regions of the United States. Canada's contribution to American acid rain, in retrospect and in comparison, amounts to 10 or 15 per cent of their total.

My purpose in quoting these figures is not because I want to point fingers but to illustrate that while there is a movement of airborne pollution across the international boundary in both directions, there is an obvious imbalance in terms of contributions to the problem. This imbalance accounts for Canada's determination to work with the United States to deal with our common problem.

As a member of both the subcommittee on acid rain and the special committee on acid rain, I can report that we recognized that the only way we could convince the American government that it should take steps to reduce that problem was by taking the necessary steps to reduce acid rain in our own country. We could hardly go to the United States and demand that costly pollution controls be implemented if our own domestic controls were lacking.

Significant steps have indeed been taken in Canada which demonstrate our resolve. For example, agreements to fight acid rain have been reached between the federal government and the seven easternmost provinces. Some $150 million dollars has been provided to help companies lower sulphur dioxide emissions by 50 per cent 1994. This will significantly reduce the amount of acid rain that we export to the United States. The maritime provinces are currently participating in three pilot projects worth $50 million to develop cleaner, more efficient methods of using coal.

Stricter standards have been in effect since September 1987 to reduce motor vehicle emissions by 45 per cent. In March 1986, the government established a new program to eliminate the hazards posed by the presence of lead in gasoline. As a result, leaded gasoline emissions will be virtually eliminated in this country by 1990. Clearly there is a lot more that we can do, but I think that at the very least we have demonstrated a willingness to do our part.

That is why it is particularly distressing to hear the American justice department's views on the issue of acid rain. In a written brief submitted to the U.S. Court of Appeals, the department states that a number of reports, both in Canada and the U.S., document the existence of acid rain as a problem, but argues that important scientific questions remain unresolved concerning acid rain deposition effects on forests, lakes, crops and building materials.

This sounds all too familiar. When I asked the parliamentary secretary on December 19 what steps the ministry of the environment was taking to impress upon the American government the seriousness of acid rain, he indicated that a January meeting was planned between Canadian and American officials to discuss a bilateral accord on acid rain.

I would like the parliamentary secretary responsible for reporting to the House this evening to comment on the results of that meeting.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by paying tribute to the work of the hon. member for Fundy Royal. He has worked over the years on the important issue of acid rain and keeping this issue very much alive before the House.

I should say, in a preliminary way, that during the time a couple weeks ago when this House was not in session, I went south from my constituency, not very far south into the United States but as far south as the state of Ohio, to be the keynote speaker there at a conference on the environment.

Ohio is right in the heart of the valley where soft coal is mined and much of it burned, thus a contributing factor. There I was able to see—and I would like to report it to the hon. member—that now within the United States the issue of the legislative and legal response to this problem in President Bush's legislation which is now before Congress and the other bills before Congress dealing with acid rain has now unfortunately gone beyond the point at which for too many years the Americans were stuck, namely, the point of whether acid rain was even a problem, to the next stage where they are debating among themselves as to who is to pay, how much, and how they will work this out.

With respect to the issue in the United States it is also important to report to the hon. member that just at the time I was there 10 leading environmental groups of the United States had sent a letter to Secretary Baker criticizing the United States government for not having moved quickly enough to fulfil its commitments on environmental issues in and around the Great Lakes and on other issues such as acid rain.

Happily, as a result of initiatives taken by this government and by the hon. member for Fundy Royal, the issue has now moved to the stage where it has become an issue being debated within the American political system. That is a happy day for all of us because for so long it was simply lobbying by our government of the United States government. Due to the good relations that our Prime Minister has developed with the Americans, we were able finally to see something accomplished.

On the specific point, my information is partial and I do not want to mislead the hon. member into believing that I have the benefit of full information this evening to completely answer his question. I do know that when Ontario and several of the U.S. states petitioned the U.S. Court of Appeals last year to require the international air pollution provisions of the existing U.S. Clean Air Act to be used to implement a U.S. acid rain control program, it gave rise to a legal issue, one of them being certainly the one to which I think the member is referring.

The precise legal question at issue is the interpretation of that narrow administrative matter. U.S. administration officials have argued that there is insufficient scientific information available to proceed as the petitioners have requested and that the President's comprehensive acid rain proposal would provide a more effective and efficient solution.

Our view is that there is ample evidence for the administration to use its existing authorities and we will continue to press this as a friend of the court, amicus curiae, in the proceedings that are now taking place.

In conclusion, media reports that have portrayed the administration's position as backing away from its commitment to acid rain controls are simply not giving a full or complete picture. Indeed, earlier this month President Bush admonished the United States Congress to get on with passing the new Clean Air Act.

I hope that that is at least a partial response to satisfy the hon. member. If this is not adequate information I am sure that he will continue, both during the Question Period and at other opportunities, to raise the issue. I would be happy to get any further information that he might require.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock.

The House adjourned at 5.41 p.m.

APPENDIX

CANADA AND INDOCHINA

Statement tabled in the House of Commons by the Right Honourable Joe Clark, Secretary of State for External Affairs and replies thereto by the Honourable André Ouellet and Mr. Bill Blaikie.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I want to provide a progress report to the House on international efforts to end the violence that has gripped Cambodia for fifteen years. The Cambodian people have suffered greatly from invasion, unparalleled abuses of human rights, and civil war. We wish to ensure that Canada does its part in helping to break the cycle of suffering in Cambodia.

There are measures Canada can take to address the suffering of Cambodia, and which will contribute to the building of a lasting peace.

The recent history of Cambodia is a saga of unending war, turmoil and death. During the Vietnam war, approximately 600,000 Cambodians were killed.

At war's end, in April 1975, the Khmer Rouge forces overthrew the Cambodian government of Lon Pol. The criminal acts perpetrated afterwards by the Pol Pot régime between 1976 and 1979 were condemned by the international community and by Canadians of all walks of life.

The expulsion of the Khmer Rouge by the Vietnamese in 1979 resulted in a long civil war opposing three Cambodian parties to a government put into office by the Vietnamese army. Eleven years later, despite diplomatic efforts, the war is still raging on and more Cambodians are dying. The limited resources of Indochina are tragically wasted on the battlefront.

In September 1989, Vietnam withdrew its troops from Cambodia. Since then, the civil war has intensified. The front lines have changed somewhat, but, in general, have remained the same as those drawn up eleven years ago. In many instances, military solutions have been sought instead of political solutions.

The victims remain the same: the people of Cambodia, and indeed all of the people of Indochina who have borne too long the burden of protracted military struggle.

From the beginning of the war, Canada has helped fund the efforts of the United Nations and its agencies to care for the 300,000 Cambodians seeking refuge on the Thai-Cambodian border. Our commitment continues to these people, and this fiscal year it will amount to $3 million in food and other aid.

We also recognize the need to assist the 8 million Cambodians still living in their country whose lives have been disrupted by the armed struggle. Their needs are immediate and real. A response to their suffering must not be held forever hostage to progress towards a political settlement.

With that in mind, the Government is now in the process of re-establishing the eligibility of Cambodia, Vietnam and Laos, the three countries of Indochina, for official Canadian development assistance.

The exact nature of this aid is now under study by CIDA. As part of that process, an officer from our Embassy in Bangkok is currently in Cambodia with representatives of Canadian non-governmental organizations to examine how best to resume an aid relationship there.

In the short term, these programs will be small scale and focussed on humanitarian needs. Over the longer term their expansion will be predicated on progress towards peace and the political realities in the areas affected. We will not have Canadian aid channelled into the military efforts of any group. Nor will we permit it to be used by groups or governments whose records demonstrate a fundamental disrespect for basic human rights. We will, for example, insist that no Canadian aid be distributed in areas controlled by the Khmer Rouge. The central problem in the Cambodian conflict remains how to deal with the Khmer Rouge in an eventual settlement process. The reign of terror of the Pol Pot régime was one of the most brutal chapters in human history. Each position we, as a government, have taken on the question of Cambodia has been grounded in a determination never to allow the Khmer Rouge back into power.

We have called upon the Chinese, Soviet and other military suppliers to the Cambodian parties to cease their support. There is no benefit to Cambodia to be found in the further import of weapons. The people of Indochina have seen enough implements of war to last for all of history.

Two major developments broke the old impasse respecting Cambodia. The first was the recognition by the Parties themselves, and countries close to them, that war would yield no winner, but would hold back the development of Cambodia and its neighbours.

The second was the decision to treat the search for peace as a regional responsibility and lift it beyond the immediate combatants. Seminal to that process were the Jakarta informal meetings which brought the six nations of ASEAN directly into the process, working with the Cambodian Parties, Vietnam and Laos.

The next step was to make that search for peace a genuinely international preoccupation, moving beyond the region, to involve permanent members of the Security Council, and other countries with a particular interest or contribution. The Paris Conference was convened. Canada was invited because of our unique experience in peace-keeping, our extensive relations in the region, and our acknowledged reputation as a trusted and moderate nation.

The Paris Conference succeeded in getting the agreement of all parties to involve the offices of the United Nations, in the form of a fact-finding technical mission sent to Cambodia. It also made substantial progress in the design of an international control mechanism and in refining the complex of tasks that such a mechanism will have to address.

Canada co-chaired that Committee with India, and Parliament can take pride in the skill and effectiveness of the officials in the Canadian delegation. That first Committee produced the agreement that could well be the basis of further progress now.

The Paris Conference may resume, and Canada and other countries may be called upon to participate in UN-led peacekeeping and transitional arrangements. It is important that potential participants be adequately prepared. As part of this process, officials from my Department and the Department of National Defence are reviewing Canada's recent experiences in Namibia and elsewhere. Lessons learned there can be applied to improving the planning and organization of future peacekeeping operations such as in Cambodia. The collection, exchange and assessment of peacekeeping information with both existing and potential peacekeepers, as well as with the UN itself, can only serve to strengthen the UN's effectiveness and reputation as a peacemaker.

In October, I dispatched a mission to Indochina led by Ambassador Alan Sullivan, Head of our delegation for most of the Paris Conference, to explore and encourage the resumption of negotiations. One of the major messages delivered by Ambassador Sullivan in Hanoi and Phnom Penh was that of the importance of accepting a major role for the UN in any settlement.

In November, the Government of Australia proposed the establishment of a UN interim administration for Cambodia. That proposal has Canada's full support. It overcomes the problem of how to share power between the Cambodia parties, by delegating to the UN the responsibility for administering the country in an interim period prior to elections.

Like the UN-based settlement recently achieved in Namibia, this proposal would effectively guarantee that no Cambodian party would retain or acquire political power sufficient to disrupt the process leading to free and fair elections. That is the most flexible and reasonable proposal currently in play.

It has been welcomed by all the key players in the dispute, with the exception of the Khmer Rouge.

Indeed it is becoming increasingly clear that the Khmer Rouge and its two non-communist coalition partners no longer speak with a unified voice.

At the same time, Canada and other countries recognize that the current régime in Phnom Penh—the Hun Sen régime—is more than simply one of the four factions. Over the last few years it appears to have provided adequate government, and its record in most areas is far better than that of the Khmer Rouge Government which preceded it. Nowhere is this more evident than in the field of human rights and in basic respect for human life.

The peace process was moved forward in Paris last week in a meeting of the five permanent members of the Security Council. The meeting resulted, for the first time ever, in a significant level of agreement between the mentors of Cambodia's warring factions.

Their views were summarized in a 16-point communiqué highlighting an enhanced UN role in the resolution of the Cambodian problem. China's decision to agree to the communiqué represents a significant concession and suggests that China may move away from its long-standing insistence that the Khmer Rouge have a major role in the interim government. Such flexibility from the Chinese, who are the principal backers of the Khmer Rouge, is an important ingredient in ensuring the cooperation of the Khmer Rouge in the peace-building process.

As I have said in the past, we all wish that we did not have to deal with the Khmer Rouge. Unfortunately, the Khmer Rouge remain a major military reality, the strongest among the three resistance factions. To exclude them a priori from the peace would leave them no option but to continue fighting a civil war. We must instead find a way to include them in the process of peace while removing their ability to either wage war or to seize power and return Cambodia to the living hell it experienced under Pol Pot.

The next weeks will be crucial as details of the potential UN role are further discussed, and as options for resolving other key questions such as a cease fire and transitional arrangements are explored. Canada will be active in that process.

Should the Cambodian Parties return to the negotiating table with the kind of flexibility and commitment demonstrated by the permanent five in Paris, it is probable that a resumption of the Paris Conference will follow as a next step.

As a co-chair of one of its key committees, we expect to be closely involved in the preparations for a new Paris Conference. We will continue to work closely with our friends in Asia and elsewhere to help create the best possible environment for peace-building.

We will stress that a new window of opportunity to build a lasting peace has been opened, and that all the Parties to the conflict must approach the upcoming discussions willing to seek and make the compromises which will be required if Cambodia's long nightmare is to come to an end, and peace is finally to be brought to this one gentle and tranquil land.

Peace for Cambodia must become a priority for the world community. Canada has the experience, ability and commitment necessary to play an important role in the peace process. I can assure the House that we will do so.

Adjournment Debate

Honourable André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel)

I want to thank the minister for his courtesy in giving me an advance copy of his statement.

The minister's description of the horrors of the war in Cambodia dramatically highlighted the suffering of the Cambodian people.

I welcome Canada's decision to re-establish Cambodia's eligibility for official development assistance provided by Canada.

I wonder, however, how the minister will be able to meet these pressing needs at a time when his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) is talking about spending cuts. The budget envelope of the Canadian International Development Agency has already been severely affected, and many people are afraid there will be further cuts in the next Budget of the Minister of Finance.

At a time when the minister is talking about a full-scale review of Canada's foreign policy in connection with the political changes that are occurring throughout the world, he chooses to raise the subject of Cambodia. And why not? But when is he going to talk about East-West relations and how his government intends to meet the new challenges facing us as a result of the extraordinary changes that have taken place in the Warsaw Pact countries? When will the minister consider North-South relations worthy of a minister's statement in this House? We are very anxious to know how the Conservative government intends to deal more compassionately with the debt of Third World countries and how it will try to resolve a problem that is taking on alarming proportions.

The situation in Indochina deserves our attention, but I really wonder why the minister was so anxious to make this statement today. I am concerned about his priorities. The Conservative government already has a reputation for making pretty speeches. Unfortunately, its reputation for concrete action falls rather short of the mark.

The minister tells us that a Canadian official is now in Cambodia with representatives of Canadian non-governmental organizations to try and find the best way to resume an aid relationship there.

We are still at the stage of good intentions. No definite decision has been made, and we don't know whether the government will make a significant contribution that will justify today's statement or whether that contribution will be negligible, as has often been the case after pompous statements made by the Prime Minister or a member of cabinet.

Today, we in Ottawa are being visited by several representatives of Canadian non-governmental organizations concerned about the budget cuts. They have come to tell us that if CIDA again reduced their grants, some of them would have to give up their work and close down.

At a time when the Canadian government calls on these organizations more and more for its foreign aid program, it would be regrettable if the government's left hand, represented by the Finance Department, strangled the agencies which the government's right hand, represented by the Canadian International Development Agency, is reaching out to.

I therefore say to the minister: If you want Canadian non-governmental organizations to do your work in Cambodia, keep funding these agencies generously right here in this country.

In his long statement, the minister finally admitted that the crux of the Cambodian conflict remains the participation of the Khmer Rouge in any settlement. We think that the minister is taking a very great risk by putting so much trust in them and including them in the peace process, when they could again take power for themselves alone and reimpose their reign of terror.

What guarantee does the minister have that the Khmer Rouge are no longer able to make war and again plunge Cambodia into the hell it went through under Pol Pot?

I also wonder why Canada supported the Khmer Rouge's request for United Nations accreditation. It seems to me that this group should not at this time have the prestige and credibility that go with such accreditation. Has the minister had guarantees that he did not tell us about?

I hope so, because there is no doubt that peace in Cambodia is most desirable.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona)

I welcome the opportunity to reply to the Secretary of State today on this government's change of policy with respect to Indochina.

We in the New Democratic Party are pleased at the government's decision today to extend development assistance funding, through CIDA, to Cambodia, Vietnam, and Laos. This is a positive move, one which will be welcomed by the non-governmental organization (NGO) community which has long been calling for an extension of aid to the region.

We are also heartened today by the Canadian government's acceptance of the Hun Sen government as legitimate and significant participants in the Cambodian political process. The recognition of the dramatically improved human rights situation in Cambodia since Hun Sen took power is also a new and positive step in Canadian policy towards Cambodia.

I feel it necessary, however, to comment on some of the revisionism that the Secretary of State for External Affairs appeared to be indulging in today. In particular, Mr. Clark stated the following, and I quote,

"Each position we, as a government, have taken on the Question of Cambodia has been grounded in a determination never to allow the Khmer Rouge back into power".

This is a difficult assertion to accept given the fact that this government has recognized the Khmer Rouge-Led coalition as the legitimate representatives of Cambodia at the United Nations. This government's diplomatic support of the reprehensible Khmer Rouge has been, in a word, immoral. It's refusal to deal with the Hun Sen government during this period has been very regrettable.

So, much as we appreciate the government's moves today, I also feel compelled to ask the question, why did it take so long? Why did it take so long to accept the Hun Sen régime—it had been receiving reports for some time about the popularity of the régime and its positive record in government. Why did the Canadian government wait so long to give humanitarian aid to Cambodia and Vietnam—these countries have long been facing a desperate economic situation and have been in urgent need of humanitarian assistance.

On the point of assistance, given the extensive economic crisis in the region, we hope the aid is substantial and that it moves from humanitarian aid to also include long-term development assistance programs.

With respect to Vietnman, it is now time to work to reintegrate Vietnam back into the international community. The Vietnamese withdrawal from Cambodia last year procedded as promised, and this has certainly earned it some international good will.

The New Democratic Party is pleased by the recent diplomatic progress internationally regarding Indochina. The Australian proposal is a promosing one, China's acceptance of a process which involves the UN is also much welcomed. Perhaps we can replicate the Namibian process—one which has proven to be a major success in terms of UN involvement in bringing about peace and democracy.

I urge the Canadian government to support its rhetoric here today, and to show its commitment to peace by playing an active and positive role in the peace process, to ensure that the people of Cambodia, so deserving of peace, have the opportunity to experience it in the near future.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 26, 1990

The House met at 10 a.m.

Prayers

PRIVILEGE

TAKING OF VOTES

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has received a notice of question of privilege from the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I employed near orbital oratory condemning those who accused me of deliberately and in contempt of this House voting twice on a motion.

I have since viewed the pertinent videotapes of that vote. Clearly during that vote there was a great deal of perhaps inappropriate levity and jocularity within our caucus surrounding my intentions, although I for quite serious reasons intended to vote nay and so indicated to my colleagues and mockingly feigned rising to vote in the affirmative.

It is clear from the tape that while not aware that I did so I rose in my seat to a sufficient degree to give a reasonable person the impression that I had in fact voted aye. While that was not my deliberate intent it did lead to confusion which required subsequent clarification and resulted in sharp words being exchanged in this House.

For that I apologize, as I apologize to the House through you, Mr. Speaker, for any misunderstanding that my actions however unintended might have caused.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Right Hon. Joe Clark (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C–5, an act to amend the Railway Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on behalf of Bill C–5 before us today.

• (1010)

It is unfortunate that it is necessary for us to do so today because of the very fact that this House passed back in 1987 the National Transportation Act. When I look across the way I see members with whom I spent long, hard, arduous hours working together on the National Transportation Act. I think the number of that bill was C–18.

Nonetheless, Sections 158 and 174 of the National Transportation Act brought to light the fact that where short–line railways come into existence they will no longer be under the authority of the National Transportation Act but under provincial authority.

This bill is necessary because there was once such a transportation company, namely, the Central Western Railway out in Alberta which came into being in 1986. It had been overlooked that it was falling outside the jurisdiction of this act.

What we have before us here this morning, early in 1990, is a short bill of one essential clause which makes it abundantly clear that the Central Western Railway should be brought into line with the present government policy, as reflected in Sections 158 and 174 of the National Transportation Act.

This back dates that particular section in the National Transportation Act to July 1, 1986.

What we have here is essentially a housekeeping bill to regularize an anomalous and undesirable situation which has a bearing on the Central Western Railway that purchased a section of the CN subdivision at Stettler, Alberta.

I am sure that members opposite wish to rise and speak to this bill. They are familiar with what is taking place. I know that the people of the Central Western Railway have actually been talking to each one of us on both sides of the House concerning this piece of legislation.

I ask for the co-operation of members opposite in making sure that this bill gets speedy passage.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place and respond to the remarks of the parliamentary secretary on Bill C-5.

I respond quite openly and quite honestly in saying to the parliamentary secretary, and indeed to the minister who has just come into the House, that up until very recent days it was the perception of the Official Opposition that Bill C-5 is as the parliamentary secretary describes essentially, in parliamentary language, a housekeeping measure, one designed to bring the CWR into a position in legislative terms equal to that of all other short-line railways in the country.

I have to point out to my colleague opposite, and I do so in good faith, that in very recent days we on this side of the House have heard from the representatives of workers at the CWR. They have expressed some concerns about this bill, concerns that heretofore we were not familiar with. In fact I hold in my hand copies of some correspondence that was written to the Minister of Transport on May 30 by the United Transportation Union.

This letter points out some concerns about Bill C-5 and the impact of its passage on the position of that union which is now for various and sundry reasons before the courts in terms of determining the proper jurisdiction of the railway and of the union with respect to CWR.

It is for that reason that we in the Official Opposition, because we are interested in ensuring that every voice that should be heard is heard, cannot give approval today to the passage of Bill C-5 at all stages.

What we would petition the government opposite to do, as well as colleagues in other parties, is to support the motion to send this bill to a legislative committee so that all of us in this House—in particular all those on the transport committee, my colleague for Kenora—Rainy River, our labour critic, and others—can participate in an examination of the bill and give those most directly affected by the bill, in this case the employees, an opportunity to be heard.

I say to my colleagues opposite that having provided that opportunity and having given everybody a chance to be heard on this bill then certainly we will co-operate to see its passage if there are not significant problems. On the other hand, if there are problems that we ought to be aware of I hope this House and the transport committee in their wisdom will deal with those problems and that the minister will respond in an appropriate way.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today and speak on Bill C-5, an act to amend the Railway Act.

This legislation that we are dealing with has far more reaching consequences than what my hon. colleague on the government side would lead us to believe. This bill deals not only with providing a private company, the Central Western Railway Corporation, with a clean legislative bill of health but, more important, with the future of all railway workers who would find themselves in a situation where private interests would purchase short-line railways from transportation companies such as the Canadian National.

I dare not treat this matter lightly, no matter what the arguments from the other side may be, for many reasons. First, the government's track record when it comes to railways leaves a lot to be desired. We have witnessed that just lately with the types of cuts that have taken place to the VIA Rail lines and the kind of service that is left.

Some areas are being left out in the cold with secondary type service and with the likes of a bud car, particularly in my riding which is supposed to run on a three days in and three days out per week basis. In December we saw that it ran six times in the whole month. It kind of makes one wonder just exactly what this government's intention really is vis-à-vis railroads.

It was only a few weeks ago that we witnessed the death of one of Canada's great traditions. I am speaking about the end of The Canadian. We have heard reports that a private group wanted to take over this route but at a price that few, if any, Canadians would be able to afford, especially if you tag on the GST—and God knows at what per cent it will be by then—to the price of the ticket.

I wonder if my colleague on the other side who spoke on this matter will be able to keep a straight face when he tells the workers at CN that deregulation, privatization and a deeper concern for the bottom line are to their benefit. I bet he would not be able to say that to all the laid off workers from VIA Rail.

CN employees are probably feeling pretty nervous right now wondering if they are going to be next. I wonder about a lot of workers along the rail lines who would be feeling nervous when we consider all the changes that are taking place these days to UI as a result of the free trade agreement and the changes to our tax structure when we talk about the GST. There are many things going on in this country that introduce a sense of nervousness for just about all of us.

When the bill was introduced in April of last year the United Transportation Union sent a letter to Minister of Transport expressing its concerns. It points out in this letter some background information that I would like to quote for the record:

> The United Transportation Union represents train and yard service personnel on the Canadian National Railway (CNR). The CNR sold a portion of its line (approximately 106 miles in south central Alberta) to the CWRC, a provincially incorporated company in November of 1986. The United Transportation Union and other unions, brought certain applications against the CNR and the CWRC to the Canada Labour Relations Board to preserve our bargaining rights and the jobs of our members. A critical issue was whether labour relations on the CWRC fell under federal or provincial control.

• (1020)

The Canada Labour Relations Board, in a decision dated February 27, 1987, held that the CWRC was a federal work, undertaking or business. The CWRC appealed that decision to the Federal Court of Appeal. The appeal was dismissed on January 28, 1988. The CWRC has now appealed these decisions to the Supreme Court of Canada. I must point out that that decision has not been handed down as yet. It is pending.

I would like to quote something from the bill under the heading "Continuation of Existing Corporations":

> 3. The company incorporated under the name of Canadian National Railway Company by an act to incorporate Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways, chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919, the company formed by the amalgamation of Canadian National Railway Company and The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, and the Canadian National Railway Company referred to in The Canadian National–Canadian Pacific Act, 1933, chapter 33 of the Statutes of Canada, 1932–33, are hereby declared to be and to have been one and the same company, and the said company is hereby continued under the name of Canadian National Railway Company.

The purpose of reading this part of the bill is to indicate that in 1919 the government of the day saw fit to incorporate and nationalize our railroads. Today, we see a government which is somewhat insensitive to our national system. It seems to be quite content with the beginning of dismantling not only our passenger rail service but now it is headed toward dismantling our freight rail system.

Quite frankly, I find that appalling. I reiterate what I said earlier. With all the changes that are taking place in our country we see that now the government is supporting a bill that in essence allows for the dismantling of our national institution, the railroad. The very fibre that joined this country is now being dismantled. That is only one of the reasons I am opposing this bill.

I quote further from the letter to which I referred from the labour group which states:

> We oppose any legislation to benefit one company, particularly where the matter is pending before the court.

I happen to share that opinion.

I would like now to introduce a bit of history to these proceedings and to read some remarks made in December 1986 by the then Minister of Transport, the hon. member for St. John's West, on the motion for second reading of Bill C–18, an act respecting national transportation:

> As Minister of Transport, my responsibility, in addition to providing an efficient transportation system, is to provide a safe one. Our first priority will always be safety.

When we speak of safety and we talk about separating branch lines, abandoned lines if you will, from the main line and not allowing them to be part of the federal unit for the purposes of the protection of the workers, we are just tearing the whole system apart. It just seems to me that there is safety in groups. When you break away from the main body, your bargaining powers are limited and safety is sometimes set aside for the sake of operating the business. We cannot allow that to happen.

For a moment I would like to go back to the future—no pun intended, and I am not referring to the movie either—and remind hon. members on the other side that if Bill C–5 is passed, it would in effect allow the Canadian Western Railway Company to disengage itself from the provisions included in Bill C–105, an act that was passed in May 1988 to ensure the safe operation of railways and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof. That is exactly what I was referring to a few moments ago.

Bill C–105 ensures that the Governor in Council may make regulations respecting engineering standards governing the construction or alteration of railway works and such engineering standards may embrace both physical specifications and performance standards.

It also ensures many other safety measures and states in a section devoted to acts applicable to Canadian government railways that:

> Notwithstanding anything in the government Railway Act or any other act of Parliament, the provisions of the National Transportation Act, 1987, of the Railway Act, other than sections 156 to 184, and of the Railway Safety Act, in so far as those provisions relate to the construction, maintenance and operation of a railway, apply in respect of any Canadian government railway that would but for the passing of this Act, be subject to the government Railway Act, but only for the period during which the management and operation of that railway is entrusted to the national company.

In other words, once the company is declared outside of federal jurisdiction it does not have to conform to the act. Is the current Minister of Transport in the mood to allow different legislation to apply on a provincial level to various railroads, and in the matter of safety, no less? This concerns safety not only for the workers on these freight trains but for those who have to travel over railway crossings.

It seems to me that this government is intent on washing its hands of a whole lot of issues. The government would rather leave workers twisting in the wind when it comes to bearing the brunt of regressive taxes such as the GST. It would sacrifice Canadian workers on the altar of the mighty American dollar when it comes to free trade. Just after it put the lives of train workers on the line with cuts to VIA, the government wants to continue this trend for freight trains and jeopardize the livelihoods of these workers as well by washing its hands of the whole business.

I share the concerns of the United Transportation Union when it states:

> We strongly oppose the principle that federal regulation of railways, including matters of safety as well as labour relations, could be avoided by the transferring of a part or parts of a national railway to a provincially incorporated company. We consider this prospect to have serious consequences for the future of railways in Canada. We are completely at a loss to understand why Parliament should be promoting this prospect.

Frankly, so am I. I have yet to hear any arguments from the other side as to the rationale behind this. Maybe I have an idea about what this bill is all about. It is that the federal government would rather wash its hands of the whole thing. It intends to get rid of all the trains and leave it to private industry altogether.

I would just like to touch on the financial aspect of these abandoned lines for a moment. When we consider the amount of money in Canadian tax dollars that the government has spent over the years to build our national rail lines, we see that the amounts are phenomenal.

We are now in a position where our freight trains are giving us a return on that investment, yet we see this government abandoning lines and allowing them to be picked up for next to nothing with interest–free government loans. It is allowing them to go to private enterprise which is now showing a profit three times that of the government's.

When I see this I kind of wonder just what kind of management there is by the government when it comes to railroads. If a private company can do it, why cannot the national railways do it? Why are we abandoning these lines when they are in fact profitable, when they could and do return a profit, and when that profit could be returned to Canadian people, people who have invested in this company?

I just wonder what the government's response would be to such a question, a question as to why it is so willing to abandon these lines when they are profitable. My colleague from the other side has argued that Bill C–5 will only put the CWR on an equal footing with any future short-line railway.

• (1030)

How can I approve of such legislation when I see this erosion of another train company and the consequences that this could have on its workers? My colleague will also argue that a parliamentary committee approved the concept that short-line railways will be under provincial jurisdiction when it approved the National Transportation Act in 1987. I would like to remind this House that the NDP did not approve of this Act and that we certainly do not approve of it today. In fact, this is one argument that convinces me to be of a different opinion than that of my colleague on the other side.

In conclusion, I strongly support that this bill be recommended to the legislative committee so that we can hear from the various people concerned. I am sure that the owner of the CWRC would like to make a presentation to that committee, and I am absolutely sure the unions involved would like to make a representation to that committee. Perhaps we could even hear from the workers who are being affected by this legislation.

It seems to me that this bill is not as clear-cut or as simple and straightforward as it would appear. When you look at changing a word or a paragraph of legislation, you have to consider all the aspects and ramifications. Once we get into committee we will see that it is not all that clear-cut. I support the motion that this bill be forwarded to the legislative committee.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, as the labour representative for the Liberal Party of Canada, I too would like to voice my opinion in this matter as it relates to Bill C-5. Bill C-5 as it stands does not seem to people on this side of the House to have as large an effect as might be imagined. One of the problems with it that we on the labour side would like to take a look at, the ramifications it would have to the workers themselves. That is the most important part of this bill which needs to be looked at in committee.

As the labour representative for the Liberal Party, I think it would be to our benefit to send this legislation to committee and to look at the effects on the workers. We do not believe as a party that Bill C-5 truly will affect the aspects of safety as it relates to the rail line itself, but it is imperative that we look at the effects on the workers. I think it would be imperative for us as members here today to be prepared to let it go to committee, to have people on all sides of the issue come forward with their presentations so we can make a decision based on all the facts and not only based on the fact that the government feels it is such a small bill it has no consequence to Canada.

Therefore, I recommend that we send this bill to a legislative committee.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, ever since this bill was first presented to the House, I believe last April, I have had mixed feelings about it. My definition of "mixed feelings" is watching a Tory and a Liberal going over a cliff in my new car.

It is a short bill, one long paragraph, but it cannot be maintained that it is a very simple, straightforward bill because its ramifications are an extension of the ramifications that we in this party warned about when we dealt with the National Transportation Act. More particularly, it is a ramification of what happened over the year and a half of debate and struggle we had about the statutory grain rates, the Crow rates. I warned then that doing away with the statutory grain rates would lead to more rail line abandonments, more lost jobs and higher costs for grain producers to get their grain delivered.

The previous government and this government have consistently followed a policy that has led to the continuous downgrading of our national railway system. It has led to the breaking up into little pieces here and there all over the country of our national rail system. It has led to the handicapping of our railways to function at more than a break-even position. For example, the railroads are required to pay a tax on diesel fuel.

The railroads have to build, maintain and operate their own right-of-way. They are the only transportation mode that has to do that. For all other modes the rights-of-way, the airways and whatnot are made available through the public purse. Of course, when they have to pay a diesel fuel tax, tens of millions a year, it is nothing more than a subsidy to the highway users. That is an example of the handicapping of our national railway system.

I do not like saying "I told you so", Mr. Speaker, but I am going to anyway. When the statutory grain rates were being debated and being repealed, we were told that the railroads were losing so much money under the statutory grain rates they could not function, they would have to abandon railway lines and they would need assistance to fix up other railway lines in order to move our grain.

We were assured by the ministers of transport of those days, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, that if we were to do this, and the railroad said if we were to do away with the statutory grain rates and the railways were fully compensated for their costs of moving grain, all would be heaven. The railroads would be making money hauling grain, there would be no more branch line abandonments, or darned few, railway lines would be fixed up and the farmer's grains would be moved more efficiently. I predicted then and I have been proven right since that the opposite has been the case.

Even with the railroads getting full compensation for their costs of moving grain, they continued to make application to abandon thousands more miles of railway lines. Over the last year or two it has not just been in western Canada, but also Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic Provinces. We now have two provinces with no railway, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

It would seem that the only thing the railways want to do is operate a main line. That is all they want. They would get rid of everything else if they could get away with it. Well Sir, something they conveniently forget to tell people is that all of those tens of thousands of miles of branch lines and secondary main lines are feeders to the main line, delivering traffic to the main line so that the main line can be operated at a profit. There is nothing new about feeder lines or branch lines losing money, nothing new about that at all; it goes back to the first days of the railroad. However, they were built for several reasons. One was to provide that feeding of traffic to the main lines to be carried on to its destination, and then there was the matter of national policy.

• (1040)

Unless we get a fundamental change in the current national policy on transportation, this is going to continue and it is going to happen at a greater rate than ever before. It is immaterial whether transportation is privately owned or publicly owned, unless and until it is treated as a publicly utility and operated in that manner, and not just from the bottom-line syndrome, there will continue to be a denigration of our transportation system, particularly the railway lines, and the ones who are going to pay for it are the taxpayers and the ones who are going to suffer for it are the consumers of transportation.

In spite of all those assurances about how glorious it would be when the railroads were collecting full compensation for their costs of moving grain, it has got steadily worse. All that means to me is they are just keeping the money.

In the matter of the Central Western Railway, I can sympathize with what can happen if a new short-line railway were to start up tomorrow. If they are wholly within the boundaries of a province, they will have the benefit of the new National Transportation Act and will not be considered under federal jurisdiction. established before the new National Transportation Act, is not subject to the provisions of the new National Transportation Act. Hence this bill.

The Canada Labour Relations Board has ruled that it is a federal railway and subject to federal law and regulations. The Federal Court of Appeal ruled two to one that it is a federal works and subject to federal law and federal regulations. Now it is before the Supreme Court. I am of the view that this matter should not be brought to Parliament until the Supreme Court has ruled. Then the government can decided what it needs to do, if anything. If the Supreme Court rules that the Central Western Railway is federal only because of the Section 92 declaration, then the combined effect of Section 174 of the National Transportation Act and Bill C-5, if passed, would be to place all short-line railways, locally and wholly within one province, under provincial rather than federal jurisdiction.

On the other hand, if the Supreme Court held that the CWRC, the Central Western Railway Company, was under federal jurisdiction for the reasons referred to by Mr. Justice Marceau of the Federal Court of Appeal, then similarly situated short-line railways would be under federal jurisdiction. fill declarations. It does not exclude railways that would otherwise be within legislative authority of Parliament.

Of course, it is open to the Supreme Court to conclude that CWRC is not under federal jurisdiction at all, in which case similarly situated short-line railways would fall into the same category and be under provincial rather than federal control for labour relations purposes. It seems to me a bit unseemly to be attempting to act in this matter until the Supreme Court has ruled. I understand they will be ruling later this year.

While all the rest of the industrialized world and even some developing countries are making massive investments into modernizing and re-equipping their railway systems, Canada is going in the other direction. One has to only look at the recent economic, social and transportation tragedy in the case of cutting VIA Rail's operations in half. Even the Americans to the south of us have recognized the need for an upgraded, modernized and efficient national rail passenger system. They have ordered new rolling stock, new locomotives. They just recently placed more orders for new rolling stock, some of it went to Bombardier who manufacture railway passenger cars. It seems strange that we can make railway cars for the United States and other countries—they have also had contracts with African countries and West European countries—but we are not making them for ourselves, which tells you something else about the present policy of this government.

Something like a national rail passenger system, something like a national system of branch lines can be made to operate at full cost recovery or better. It can be made to succeed. From looking at some numbers, it is my opinion that the Western Railway is doing a better job of moving grain than the CNR ever did. Aside from any legitimate worries that the railways unions have, the fact is that they are doing a better job and they are making it go. Now they have some real problems. They are going to have spend millions of dollars yet rehabilitating that line. They still have a fair mortgage to pay off to CNR. It will take another year or two before they have that mortgage paid off and then they are going to have to go into many millions of dollars to rehabilitate the line, including some heavier steel rails, so they are not out of the woods.

With what they have had to operate with, they have done a credible job of moving grain. That was the reason for its coming into existence since the government was prepared to let CNR abandon it. The government should have been kicking the CNR around and making them do it efficiently. We are in a real conundrum.

As I said at the outset, we have mixed feelings about this. On the one hand, I do not want to see the Central Western Railway be disadvantaged when other short-line railways will inevitably start up because the government is frantically trying to find buyers and so are the railroads, so they can abandon lines. That is the problem on the one hand. On the other hand, the whole matter of jurisdiction, whether federal or provincial, is something that has to be decided by the Supreme Court.

Surely it makes sense to continue what has been our entire history, railroads under federal jurisdiction, and for the works, the benefit, general welfare and good order of the nation as a whole no matter where they are located. That should be put back in place instead of this ad hoc operating from day to day, month to month, abandonment here, cancel the rehabilitation program. It was cancelled a year before it was supposed to run out. There is still about 1,000 or 1,200 miles of track to be rehabilitated. That was cancelled. All that does is make it all the easier for CN or CP to abandon them because they become in such disrepair that you cannot operate on them any more. Obviously, if they are not going to be repaired, they will be abandoned.

I think it is important that this legislation receives a thorough examination before the committee and that we call witnesses, any and all who wish to appear. My colleague mentioned some that should appear, the Central Western, the Railway Brotherhood. I think CN should be called. The National Transportation Agency should be called. Obviously, the minister should be called, although getting anything out of him is like trying to nail jelly to the wall.

I cannot support legislation that does not need to be dealt with until after the Supreme Court rules. I do not think it is necessary. I do not believe there will be any other short-line railway starting up this year. I have not heard of any developments anywhere in the country of that happening. There will be some people trying to start up a luxury, elite tourist passenger train from Toronto to Vancouver. If you have anywhere from $1,500 to $3,000 you will be able to get on that four times a month during the summer, which is called some kind of a replacement of the Canadian. It is a replacement for the rich but it is no replacement for Canadians. You will see more of that sort of nonsense. If there is anybody damn fool enough to pay $4,000 to ride a train to eat some caviar and drink some champagne, well, if they can afford it, if somebody can con them out of their money, I suppose that is okay. You won't see any ordinary Canadians riding it.

I hope the government will take another look at this. I hope it will decide that the committee should go into this quite extensively, agree to hear witnesses and take all the time necessary and, more important, not do any finalizing on it until after the Supreme Court of Canada has made its decision.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak on this bill, but at the moment I would like to ask a question.

The member for Regina—Lumsden is a well-versed member of the House with a lot of experience in transportation and transportation policy. I would like to ask two questions really but one initially.

This particular railway is being established to move grain on a particular branch line which was up for abandonment. Would the member tell me where the money to operate that particular railway is coming from under the present structure of payment for the movement of grain under the Western Grain Transportation Act?

Mr. Benjamin: When the Central Western Railway was being organized, their banker, upon looking at an obscure clause in the Railway Act, said that any revenue the company gets should go first to operating expenses and then to debt reduction. So the banker backed out.

Under the Western Grain Transportation Act, under which the government paid 80 per cent at that time of the cost of transporting grain, the partners of the Central Western Railway got a prepayment on those costs of moving grain, a grant against tonnage to be subsequently hauled. After negotiating with Canadian National, they got CN to agree to carry better than half of the $2.7 million price-tag they owed. That meant the Central Western partners owned a railway.

I spoke about a mortgage. I believe that is the one they are now paying back to Canadian National, something in the order of $1.5 million. The money was obtained under the Western Grain Transportation Act initially as a prepayment. I suspect that they are now getting money in the normal way. I am not certain, but I believe they could be getting money under the Western Grain Transportation Act, getting paid in the normal way as and when grain is hauled and delivered, and then making payments on their mortgage to Canadian National.

One other way in which they make some revenue is a steam locomotive and three or four heritage-type passenger cars which they run up and down that line in the summer. They haul people who want to ride a steam train. I do not know why the CNR did not think of that. That is about the only two ways in which they derive revenue.

I may say also that they have anywhere from 18 to 25 employees, depending on the time of year. Most, if not all of them, are shareholders in the company and most, if not all of them, used to work for a railway somewhere else in Canada or the United States such as CN or CP. I believe one or two are Americans. They are people who took early retirement, or got laid off indefinitely. They could see the handwriting on the wall, so they quit. As far as I am aware, they are all experienced railroaders, which is probably the main reason for whatever success CWR has had.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is approximately one minute left for both the question and the answer.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the member who is an expert on rail transportation. If there is not time, perhaps we can give notice and debate it a little later.

What things does the hon. member think are needed in order to upgrade, improve, modernize and make more efficient the connections between the transportation of grain into ports such as Vancouver to make us competitive with the American transportation system where, of course, they have double-decker trains and many more efficient methods of transport? As a result, this is taking business not only from rail transport in Canada but also from our Canadian ports.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will allow the Hon. Member for Regina—Lumsden to answer after question period if we are still on this bill.

It being eleven o'clock the House will now proceed to statements by members.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

SENATE REFORM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the voters of Alberta, I take exception to the recent Senate election in that province. In general, it just cannot be correct that each province determine the method of selection of Senators. One province, such as Alberta, may have all the voters vote for all the candidates, another province may choose to have Senators elected by ridings or by counties or by population distribution. In any case we would have chaos across Canada.

In the particular case of Alberta, the method used to elect a Senator could result in Senators coming from only one town or city. Under this system in Nova Scotia most or all of Senators would end up coming from Halifax. That system is hardly effective representation for Alberta, Nova Scotia or any province.

Such an important issue as Senate reform must result in a uniform system by agreement with all governments involved and under the rules of our Constitution. Senate selection cannot be haphazard and inconsistent across Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's statement by the member for South Shore on Bill C-21 cannot go unchallenged. The minimum number of weeks to qualify for UI went from 10 to 14 weeks in Guysborough, not because of the Senate but because on December 20 the government he supports voted down legislation in this House which would have maintained the minimum entrance requirements at 10 to 14 weeks for another year.

The member should know that if Bill C-21 is passed, unemployed workers in his riding will require not 14 weeks to qualify for UI benefits but 15 weeks if they live in Lunenburg County and 18 weeks if they live in Queens or Shelburne Counties. Furthermore, UI benefits to his fishermen will be made more vulnerable as they will be no longer financed out of general revenues.

Rather than accusing the Senators of hypocrisy, the member would better serve his constituents by calling on his Minister of Employment and Immigration to withdraw this bill and return the minimum weeks to qualify for UI to 10 to 14 weeks as we on this side of the House have been urging her to do.

CHINESE NEW YEAR

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this past year has not been an easy one for many Chinese Canadians. The massacre in Tiananmen Square shocked the world. Loyalties to the homeland were mixed with concerns of new repressions. Uncertainties increased in Hong Kong and many people made plans to emigrate to Canada.

In British Columbia tensions increased as new immigrants were unfairly blamed for rising house prices. The Canadian Government sold entry tickets to Canada to rich investors, while poorer relatives were refused admission. Racism surfaced; most recently a racist pin circulating in Alberta which denigrates visible minorities and multiculturalism.

Chinese Canadians are contributing in all walks of Canadian life, in business as workers, in professions as judges and as a Lieutenant-Governor. Immigration has reunited families who are helping each other to become established. Their children are among our best students. Our economy and communities are strengthened and our culture enriched as a result. I know all parliamentarians join me saying "Gung hai, fay choy, happy Chinese new year".

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, as we approach the critical deadline for adoption of the Meech Lake Accord, I wish to clearly reiterate, as I have previously expressed on several occasions, my personal strong support for this constitutional amendment. For me the overwhelming imperative is my confidence in the future destiny of Canada and in the role which we have to play in the larger world.

I do sincerely believe that Canadians must and will rise to this highest goal of strengthening the very unity of our nation in the months which lie ahead. Only in such national strength and unity can we help to lead the countries of the world in confronting the truly global challenges of our time, both economic and environmental.

ENERGY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of this House the fact that the price of propane fuel has sky-rocketed by 50 per cent over the last month. Since the beginning of December bulk propane has increased from approximately 19 cents a litre to 30 cents a litre throughout all of eastern Ontario. One feed mill in my constituency has estimated that the cost of operating its boilers would increase by $20,000 this year if that price remains the way it is. An owner of a grocery store and bakery in my riding which utilizes propane has also stated that his costs would increase by over $8,000 this winter alone.

I call upon the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to immediately contact the officials of the large oil producing companies and tell them that the price increase in propane is totally unjustifiable. In a rural area such as the one that I represent, propane is a fuel of necessity. We need it in order to run many of the businesses in my riding. I hope that the government notices this issue and reacts immediately.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, everyone admits that the greenhouse effect responsible for global warming is a major environmental challenge.

On January 16, 1990, the Horne Division of Noranda Minerals in Rouyn-Noranda reported on the concrete action taken in recent years to fight the greenhouse effect.

In 1980, over 15 million Imperial gallons of heavy oil were burned, but in 1989, they only used 166,000, a reduction of 98.9 per cent. The tonnage of coal used went from 32,350 in 1980 to 10,539 in 1989, a decrease of 67.4 per cent.

Noranda Minerals attributes these successes to the building of two air separation plants in the last few years at a cost of some $16 million. By thus reducing its use of heavy oil and coal very significantly, the Horne Division of Noranda is reducing its CO2 emissions by 4.2 billion cubic feet a year compared to 1980. To give some idea of the size of such a reduction, it is equivalent to the annual emissions of 23,000 single-family homes heated with natural gas.

Mr. Speaker, clearly the federal government's environmental leadership is bearing fruit. I would also like to ask all my colleagues—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

HEALTH

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the American Lung Association recently released a study showing that air pollution from automobiles causes between 50,000 and 120,000 deaths in the United States each year. It is costing the health system over $40 billion annually. These deaths are a result of low emission standards and the continued reliance on so-called dirty fossil fuels.

The report also states that automobile fumes are responsible for devastating large tracts of valuable agricultural and forest land. These startling conclusions must be of equal concern to Canadians. They send a clear warning that this government should begin to take seriously the need to encourage and promote the use of alternative fuels.

Groups such as the Canadian Renewable Fuel Association have pointed out that vehicle conversion to other forms of fuel, such as natural gas, propane and ethanol are clean and financially viable alternatives to gasolines.

The U.S. Congress is currently debating amendments to the Clean Air Act which addresses the issue of emission levels. This act will implement sweeping environmental standards far exceeding anything that we have in Canada. This government must stop posturing on environmental issues and start to encourage the use of cleaner fuels in the millions of vehicles on the road in Canada.

INFANT MORTALITY

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): While watching television yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I heard the distressing news that Canada ranked first among all developed countries as far as the rate of infant mortality is concerned. This is disturbing news indeed when we realize that our young people are the real wealth of this country. I wonder what the Government is prepared to do to remedy this afflicting situation.

Mr. Speaker, the sad truth is that infant mortality is the highest among the poorest families. I have already mentioned in the House the need for the government to grant financial support to the poorer families, including a salary to homemakers. Mr. Speaker, our government should keep this in mind as it is preparing its forthcoming budget.

I urge again the government to seriously consider the possibility of granting a salary to homemakers, especially in the case of the poorest families.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the Williams Lake area of B.C. the military's Nordic Warrior exercises ended this week. These exercises involved some 1,600 troops, 350 army vehicles and low flying military jets and helicopters.

• (1110)

Upon the departure of the troops their garbage and waste was deposited in the Williams Lake city dump. The waste included such items as boxes of T-bone steaks, prime smoked beef and canned foods, all in extremely large quantities; batteries and equipment still in its plastic wrappers. There were truckloads, according to the MLA for the area, Mr. Zirnhelt.

The Minister of National Defence should launch an immediate inquiry into this gross waste of food and equipment; apologize to the people of Williams Lake in British Columbia, and the people of Canada.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): On April 11, 1989, Mr. Speaker, the President of Treasury Board promised the House that the government would table before the end of 1989 the regulations concerning the Official Languages Act. Nineteen months have elapsed since Bill C-72, an Act respecting the status and use of official languages in Canada, was adopted on July 7, 1988, and over nine months have elapsed since the President of Treasury Board promised the House to table the said regulations.

Including its public consultations and the study by the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, the government will have needed three years before taking action.

I am flabbergasted by this Tory Government's irresponsibility in this area. Having failed to deliver, the President should at least try to save face by tabling immediately and in its entirety the draft regulations with respect to the Official Languages Act, so that Canadians may know what direction where the government stands as far as its official languages policy is concerned.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important issues in our great nation today is the state of the Canadian economy. Despite difficult international economic circumstances, Canada has placed second only to Japan in terms of economic growth among industrialized nations of the world.

In the past five years Canada's over-all unemployment rate has dropped from 12 per cent to about 7.4 per cent. This is solid evidence that real progress is being made toward the goal of strengthening our economy.

In spite of recent successes, however, more work has to be done. Canadians from sea to sea have pointed to the federal deficit as a major economic concern. The upcoming federal budget must reflect Canada's concern for the deficit. Responsible and reasonable expenditure restraint must continue. Taxation systems must be reasonable and fair. We must all work toward deficit reduction to ensure that the next generation of Canadians can work and live in a better Canada with a stronger economy.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, events of this week have proven once and for all something I have long suspected. The New Democrats are the only party opposing the GST. We are the only party that Canadians can depend upon to stand up and fight for what Canadians really want.

Eighty per cent of Canadians do not want a goods and services tax. At the same time, the Conservative government seems determined to ram this goods and services tax down the throats of Canadians and we learned this week that the Liberal Party is not going to do very much to stop it.

Why is this? Now we know. Mr. Chrétien, one of the leadership hopefuls, has said on national television this week he really does not know what he would do about the GST. What are the 30 Liberal MPs who support Chrétien supposed to say? The Liberals are not helping us in our campaign to stop the GST because the Liberals do not know what they believe, and they do not know what they will do if they were ever elected.

Let me say again that 80 per cent of Canadians do not want the GST. The Conservatives are not going to listen to them. The Liberals do not know who to listen to. We in the New Democratic Party are going to do everything in this House of Commons that we can legitimately do to fight the GST. We are going to do it in the regions, the communities and the constituencies of Canada and we welcome all the help we can get.

THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gilbert Chartrand (Verdun—Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely shocked and disappointed by the resignation of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport because for once we had a minister with a fresh outlook and a challenging year 2000 action plan for Canadian athletes and all Canadians actively engaged in sports activities. I think it is quite discouraging.

But why was he so badly advised? I for one believe the blame rests primarily with the unelected leaders of amateur sports who gave very misleading advice to the minister because this time around they were concerned they would lose control over amateur sports in Canada. They had to deal with a minister who was not afraid to voice his opinion, to work closely with the Canadian people and, on behalf of amateur sports and especially the athletes, to express challenging ideas likely to propel Canada on the international scene.

I would suggest that criticism be aimed, not at the minister for his technical mistake, but indeed at his advisers, those people who preside over amateur sports in Canada. We serve them notice that for once the government is monitoring their performance and will assume full responsibility for amateur sports with a view to providing proper guidance to our athletes and help them to achieve and to carry Canada's colours on the international scene.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, Canadian dairy farmers take pride in maintaining the safest products in the world and yet the United States is using sanitary regulations to restrict the entry of Canadian yogurt into the United States.

The Minister of Agriculture told dairy producers in Moncton that Canada was going to start actions against the United States, after the dairy farmers did their homework.

It is now time for the minister and his government to begin their homework by taking inventory of these American non-tariff barriers that are harassing Canadian farmers so we can launch a GATT panel hearing to protest these American actions.

Canadian farmers are fed up with the United States clawing to get into our markets while restricting our entry into the United States.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the Prime Minister, who is probably holding some hands with the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Communications, although we see the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his seat this Friday morning, I will put my question to the Minister of Finance.

There is yet more evidence this morning that the Canadian economy is entering a period of slower growth. The deputy chief economist for the Royal Bank of Canada adds his voice to others who predict a recession. You do not have to be an economist to know that this is not the time for any government to be bringing in a new, massive, regressive, hidden sales tax in the form of the GST.

The new sales tax will add to consumer costs, fuel inflationary pressures and choke off investment. Why does the Minister of Finance still insist that now is the time to slam the economy and all Canadians with this massive, hidden, regressive sales tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first let me say that the slowing in the growth of the economy is something we have been expecting. I spoke about it in my last budget—

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): It was caused by your budget. You admitted it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): As colleagues will recall, I said it was important that we see some slowing in the growth of the economy because we needed some relief from the inflationary pressures that have been causing the high interest rates that we have been living with now for over a year.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): You are causing the high interest rates.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The House leader for the opposition says that we are causing the high interest rates. The high interest rates are there because we have a high level of inflation and have had for some time. We are learning of the damage that was done in the late 1970s and the early 1980s, because the government at that time ignored the inflation problems and let it get out of control. That led to the high interest rates, high inflation, and high unemployment that were so serious in 1982 with the recession that we had. This is precisely what we are trying to avoid.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition says again that this is a hidden tax. It is not a hidden tax. If the hon. member looks at the tax we have today, it is absolutely hidden. There is no way that people can tell what the existing federal sales tax is, but if people look at what will happen when the GST comes into place, they will see it is a very visible tax. There are very few people in this country who are not aware of the GST.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): From the way the minister is talking this morning, he is going to be his own self-fulfilling prophecy in terms of the future of the economy.

The Prime Minister is not here, but I wonder whether the Minister of Finance could give him a little arithmetic lesson. The Prime Minister is telling the country that because the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax has been lowered to a 7 per cent retail goods and services tax, this is less of a tax.

• (1120)

Would the Minister of Finance be good enough over the weekend to take the Prime Minister aside and tell him that this new tax will be $7 billion more? Will he take him through the calculations which show that a tax on a retail price takes far more out of a consumer's pocket than even a higher tax way down the line at the manufacturer's sales level. Perhaps he will be good enough to illustrate that to the Prime Minister and get him off that particular argument.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Do you have a question?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): On top of that the minister was giving us a lecture this morning, a kind of diluted Economics 100-1/2.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Is this a farewell speech or a question? Do you have a question, John?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The Secretary of State for External Affairs asks me whether this is my farewell speech. I will yield the floor right now to hear his farewell speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): He wanted unanimous consent yesterday so that we would adjourn the business of the House to hear his statement on Cambodia. We were agreeable, but I am sure I could persuade even the NDP to adjourn the House this morning and listen to the farewell speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The Minister of Finance quietly raised the old manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to 10 per cent to 11 per cent to 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent. Yet he is trying to tell the country that 7 per cent is going to be a real break. Why does the minister not bite the bullet, come clean with the Canadian people and tell them what is in store for them after he insists on imposing this tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition has demonstrated—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The temporary Leader.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —the temporary Leader of the Opposition, thank you—has demonstrated quite clearly why there is less than perfect understanding on the part of Canadians of the impact of the GST.

He has just talked about a $7 billion additional impact of this tax. I do not know where he got that figure from.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Your numbers.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He says it is my numbers. Where are those numbers drawn from? Did he ever take the time to read the December 19 statement? He says that it is not less of a tax. It is less of a tax for some products. We made that clear. The price of an automobile will go down $500 or $600 as a result of this tax. Some products will go up in price. But the over-all impact on inflation, as I indicated on December 19, is about 1.25 per cent.

These are misstatements of fact on the part of people like the Leader of the Opposition. People look to him and say, "Surely I can listen to this man with some degree of trust." Obviously, they cannot because those statements of fact are simply wrong.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is the Minister of Finance who described this new tax as not adding one single cent of additional tax to the Canadian people. It is going to be a licence to print money and he knows it.

[Translation]

Thirty-one times in five years, Mr. Speaker, this minister raised taxes on Canadians. This minister now wants to hire 3,900 new tax collectors whose only job will be to collect this new tax.

The minister had promised small businesses in Canada that every year he would pay them a given amount of money to help them offset the cost involved in collecting the TPS, but now the minister is backtracking.

Would the minister agree that this tax, which the government claims to be a simple levy, will in fact prove to be an outright administrative chaos, a case of administrative anarchy for over 1,250,000 businessmen in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asked whether I would advise the Prime Minister of certain details of this tax. I would like to offer to the Leader of the Opposition that if he would like a briefing on this tax I will give it to him personally. Clearly he does not understand anything that he is talking about. How about five o'clock tonight? Tomorrow morning at nine o'clock? Any time the Leader of the Opposition would like to have a briefing on this tax I would like to do it.

Mr. Gauthier: Who briefed you, Michael?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the member for Ottawa—Vanier is one of the best known supporters of a change from the existing sales tax. He said that quite clearly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): But again he has never made it clear what he would replace it with. Is he going to replace it with a value added type of tax? Is he going to replace it with an increase in the deficit? Is he going to go back to the drawing board and keep the existing tax in place which he says is such a terrible tax. This is the depth of understanding, the depth of commitment to policy development in this country by the Liberal party.

Let me comment on the substance of the question that the hon. member raised.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Oh, come on.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): After about a 20-minute preamble on the part of the Leader of the Opposition, he is telling me he does not want me to respond to the specific things that he raised in his preamble. He should be patient.

What I am saying is that we have taken a number of steps in the design of the goods and services tax to help the small business community. We have streamlined accounting procedures which are far simpler for them to comply with than the larger corporations.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Why don't you explain that to Mr. Bulloch.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member just keeps blabbering away here. I think the Leader of the Opposition should understand that he cannot listen when his lips are flapping as quickly as they are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I think he has opened up an avenue that may be very helpful to him, in his offer to brief the Leader of the Opposition on the goods and services tax.

Is the Minister of Finance prepared to come with me and with other members of this House, perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to Edmonton, Alberta, to brief Albertans on this goods and services tax as opposed to sending the chairman of the finance committee out to Edmonton, Alberta?

Would he like to undertake today, at his convenience, to attend upon the people of Alberta and to brief them on the goods and services tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been in the province of Alberta and talked about the goods and services tax. I have made a number of speeches there. I was on a nation-wide open line cable television show which included Calgary, Medicine Hat and other communities in that area. I am happy to go anytime, and I would be happy to do it with the hon. member. We can then compare just what the truth really is about this tax because I think the hon. member for Gloucester probably would be a little straighter with people than with the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we can make those arrangements and I will look forward to doing that.

I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Since he seems to be ready to damn the torpedoes and full speed ahead with the goods and services tax, I wonder if the Minister of Finance today would indicate what is the policy of the government, in view of the fact it is insisting on bringing in the goods and services tax which everybody admits will be inflationary. There is some discussion as to how much.

What is the policy of the government with respect to the high interest rates? Is it against the fact that the dollar dropped in the last week to help Canadian exporters? Is it your intention to maintain high interest rates and a high Canadian dollar no matter what damage it does to the Canadian economy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have heard from both the Leader of the Opposition and the assistant finance critic for the Liberal party on the damage that they say will be done by the GST to the economy.

It is quite clear on the part of a wide range of analysis that the GST will be good for the economy. It will help our exporters. It will put Canadian domestic producers on a level playing field with importers. Importers now pay one-third less federal sales tax than Canadian producers do. It will help investment. The Leader of the Opposition said it will kill investment. On the contrary, it will reduce the cost of investment, equivalent to a 4 per cent investment tax credit. All of this is going to help the economy.

The hon. member has asked what our policy is on interest rates. Our policy has been designed to get inflation down. We are seeing some signs that that policy is starting to bear fruit. We are not out of the woods yet.

• (1130)

Now, the hon. member has asked what our policy is on interest rates. Our policy has been designed to get inflation down. We are seeing some signs that that policy is starting to bear fruit. We are not out of the woods yet. We know that we still have some real problems on inflation, but we are seeing some progress and hopefully we will be able to see a continuation of that progress, and as that happens, yes, we will be able to get interest rates down.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The government has already cut transportation subsidies to the Atlantic region. It has cut back unemployment insurance benefits and now wants to introduce a new 7 per cent goods and services tax.

Both producing goods and purchasing them is going to be higher. In fact, recently the tourism association of Nova Scotia has withdrawn its support which it had previously given for the goods and services tax saying: "There is no question the GST will be devastating to the tourism industry."

Given the devastating economic situation facing Atlantic Canada, will the Minister not admit that imposing the goods and services tax will only further accelerate the situation in that region?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition—I guess she will be the Leader of the Opposition the way this party is going.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I notice the members opposite did not like that suggestion. There is just a little bit of sensitivity on the other side of the House.

There have been a number of quite selective comments made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party on the impacts of government policy. One of the things she talks negatively about is the unemployment insurance system changes as they relate to Atlantic Canada. Those changes are going to be very good for Atlantic Canada relative to the impacts on parts of the country like southwestern Ontario where there are changes that will bite. This is not the case in Atlantic Canada and the New Democratic Party persists in fostering that misleading statement.

We have put a great deal of effort into regional development which includes the moneys that we have put toward the tourism industry. As the Prime Minister noted the other day, we had a 50 per cent increase in regional spending in our first mandate compared to the previous four or five years, and in this mandate it will be about 35 per cent higher. That includes ACOA, that includes the tourism industry, that includes the tourism industry in Atlantic Canada.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance wants to tell the people of the Atlantic region that unemployment insurance cuts are not going to happen to them, he should go there and tell them personally because I think he will hear what they have to say about it.

The Atlantic region is not the only region that is going to suffer under this new goods and services tax. I want to point out to the minister that he should go to the regions of this country and see what is really happening. For example, a snowsuit for a two-year old child in Yellowknife, Northwest Territories, costs about $140. If you go to Sparks Street, it costs about $50. A 7 per cent tax on $140 is considerably more than a 7 per cent tax on $50.

With the goods and services tax, I think the minister has to realize that it is going to hurt the regions of this country. Does the minister think this tax is fair to northern Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, these statements that are quite far from the truth must be addressed head on. The goods and services tax will not hurt the regions of the country.

The goods and services tax will improve the position of the resource industries of Canada. It will help them invest. It will help them keep marginal mines open. It will help them export. These are all very important elements to the health of the northern parts of the country as well as the other regions of the country that are reliant on that type of industry.

The goods and services tax will improve, as I said a minute ago, the opportunities for new mines or new paper mills or new logging operations to go into place because the costs of bringing those in will be less, on average, by about 4 per cent than is the case today. Surely the hon. member can understand that it will improve the capacity of the economy to bring those in. That, Mr. Speaker, is why we say that the goods and services tax will not be harmful to the regions of this country.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest the minister, as well as going to the Atlantic regions and the north, should also go to the prairie provinces. Agriculture Canada projects that Canadian farm incomes will drop by 40 per cent this year. High interest rates as well as the proposed goods and services tax is only increasing the burden.

There are an increasing number of farm foreclosures, and the minister knows this. But the government insists on proceeding with this new tax which will drive up prices to consumers and drive down prices to farmers.

Will the minister now recognize that he cannot reduce the deficit by throwing farmers further into debt? Do farmers have to turn themselves into corporations before they can be heard by this government?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague says, the Leader of the New Democratic Party does not know what she is talking about. I will make the same offer to her, namely, would she like a briefing on the goods and services tax so she will understand the things that she has just stated now are simply not true.

The tax on inputs to farmers will be totally removed. There are taxes on inputs today. Therefore, the farmers will be better off from that standpoint.

The cost of food to all Canadians, because there will be a removal of all the input taxes on packaging, on transportation, on fuels, and so on will be reduced and the costs for those people who are producing food will be reduced. Again, that is something helpful to the farmers.

Those farmers who export today are carrying an indirect tax, a hidden tax on the exports that they make. The goods and services tax will remove that tax on the export sales that they make, so that again, in the third way, the tax will be beneficial to those farmers who are exporting. Surely, if the hon. member would take the time and be honest with herself, she would understand that she is spreading mistruths about the goods and services tax.

LAY-OFFS

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. The Minister must be aware of the fact that General Electric will close its light bulb plant in East Montreal on July 13. I would like to know what action the Minister has taken or intends to take, to persuade the company to reverse a decision that will do away with about 200 jobs, mostly held by women with over 20 years of seniority, who have little or no hope of retraining for new jobs.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I don't think the Department of Labour has been officially advised of this plant closing but, as soon as we are, we will ensure there has been compliance with the regulations under the Canada Labour Code. We will also ensure that those responsible for the plant closing take steps to apply under POWA, a program for older workers.

As far as relocating these people to other jobs is concerned, I can inform the hon. member that for the past year, we and our colleagues at the municipal and federal level have been working with a very active organization in East Montreal, the Association Pro-Est, whose activities include ensuring that workers who have been displaced can find work in another plant.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed in the Minister's reply, because what is needed is not an attempt to provide compensatory programs or unemployment insurance for these workers who are going to lose their jobs. We need action by the Minister himself, who is supposed to be responsible for the economic sector in Montreal. These workers want to keep their jobs. They want to stay at the plant. Is the Minister prepared to approach the company and persuade it to keep its plant open in Montreal? That is the kind of action we would like to see by the Minister. I am sure he is aware, and I will ask him outright, does he know that most of these jobs will be transferred to the United States? Is he prepared to let Canadian jobs be transferred to the United States and let American garbage come in Canada? Is that the kind of free trade the Minister has in mind?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel, who lives in Ottawa, is not very knowledgeable about what is happening in East Montreal. The government I represent has provided more than $13 million worth of investment in new industries and of existing industries through its industrial revitalization program for East Montreal during the past year. The program has also attracted investment by the private sector totalling more than $70 million. I think it makes much better sense and is much better for a region's economy when a government helps thriving businesses come in instead of trying to support businesses that cannot pay their way.

BURIAL OF U.S. WASTE

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Minister of the Environment accused his provincial counterpart of being inconsistent because it only costs $12.50 to bury a ton of garbage in Quebec compared with $100 in the United States. Do the government and the Minister of the Environment suggest increasing the cost to $100 so that Quebec municipalities will pay the same as in the United States? Is he serious? That statement is outrageous. Therefore I call upon the Deputy Prime Minister to ask the Minister of the Environment to withdraw that absurd statement, because his proposal would increase taxes to a level unacceptable to Quebecers. Mr. Bouchard, are you listening to me?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague announced yesterday that he would review a ban on the importation of garbage and any dangerous substances that have crossed the border. My colleague, the Hon. Minister of National Revenue, announced in a departmental co-operation the development of a memorandum of understanding that will allow us to strengthen our monitoring procedures to stop these waste substances coming from the United States. That is all I heard my hon. colleague say yesterday, and I think it is in the spirit in which the hon. member wishes us to proceed.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Deputy Prime Minister. When will the federal government start doing its job instead of always making absurd demands on the Quebec government. We have been told that legislation and regulations will be forthcoming. When? When will he really understand that American waste is not welcome in Canada? If you truly intend to introduce a bill, when can we expect it?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, let me provide my hon. friend with some startling facts. There have been movements of garbage, not just from the United States to waste sites in Canada but the other way around as well. As I have told the hon. member, it is the intention of the federal government to work co-operatively with the provinces which have, after all, the regulatory authority.

I understand that the province of Quebec has banned all the importation of waste substances to that province. I would assume that other provinces will follow, and when they do, they will, of course, have to desist from moving their own garbage across the border to sites that are more convenient and perhaps less costly in terms of transportation of these materials.

We intend to co-operate with the provinces to catch any rascal that will continue to do what is not acceptable to us in Canada.

TOXIC WASTE

M. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The people of Saint-Basile-le-Grand, a community that was so tragically affected by the PCB disaster on August 23, 1988, are still living with 130 containers of toxic waste in their environment, at this very moment.

Mr. Speaker, on November 15, 1988, the town council of Saint-Basile-le-Grand, in a letter addressed and delivered personally to the Minister of Transport, requested that the government in Ottawa use federal land to dispose of this toxic waste.

Saint-Basile-le-Grand is still waiting for a reply from the government. Could the Prime Minister or the Deputy Prime Minister inform the House when the government will be able to respond favourably to the request from Saint-Basile-le-Grand and what it intends to do?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must know that disposing of the PCBs at Saint-Basile-le-Grand is basically the responsibility of the government of Quebec. The federal government is willing to respect that fact but, nevertheless, has been working, and I am thinking more specifically of my colleague at the Department of the Environment, with the government of Quebec. It will continue to do so, and depending on what the government of Quebec decides to do and what its demands are, the federal government will act in terms of these respective jurisdictions, especially at the Department of Transport, because, I repeat, transport is one thing, while where the PCBs are stored is a provincial responsibility.

M. Cid Sampson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is again directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

According to reports published in Chambly area newspapers shortly after the disaster, the Minister of Transport promised, on behalf of the Prime Minister, that the government would provide financial assistance to the municipality of Saint-Basile-le-Grand, matching any amount paid by the government of Quebec. I may add, Mr. Speaker, and I will quote from a report in the newspaper:

"The Prime Minister also announced that he was prepared to double provincial contributions according to the formula provided in the federal Emergency Measures Act, as the government did in the case of the tornado that struck Edmonton in 1986".

So far, Quebec has paid Saint-Basile-le-Grand $658,607, the total bill being nearly $2 million.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister inform the House why he did not keep his promises to the people of Saint-Basile-le-Grand?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a few hours after the disaster at Saint-Basile-le-Grand, I went there, on behalf of the government, to give the people guarantees that the federal government would be directly involved with the government of Quebec in this matter.

My colleague ought to know, if he bothered to get the information from the government of Quebec, that my colleague at the Department of the Environment specified what the federal government's participation would be in terms of compensation—

Some hon. members: —oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard: —yes I know, the Leader of the New Democratic Party wrote to the government. The matter is being discussed with the government of Quebec, but we must tread carefully.

Meanwhile, I think the people in the riding of Chambly would rather hear what the Leader of the New Democratic Party has to say about her position on the Meech Lake Accord.

TRACKER AIRCRAFT

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. The government is in the process of tendering the mid-range tracker surveillance to the private sector at a stated cost of $28 million over five years, a tender which people in the industry say will cost as much as $60 million.

Why is the government going to tender at all when it already has a proposal which can do the job for $14 million? In fact, why is the government closing CFB Summerside if it is prepared to pay private industry $50 million to $60 million for a job that DND now does for half that amount?

• (1150)

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that some months ago, the Department of National Defence decided to decommission the Tracker patrol aircraft from service. These aircraft are very old and will in time be replaced by appropriate and more modern aircraft. They are not nearly as suited to fisheries patrol work as modern pressurized aircraft with proper up-to-date electronic gear for identification, localizing and helping in the apprehension of fishing vessels that violate our fishing regulations.

For all these reasons, we have gone through the normal tendering process to seek public tenders for a service which we estimate will cost some $28 million over the next five-year period to replace those Tracker aircraft. We believe that we will get the best service money can buy for that amount.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. There are people in the industry now doing the Tracker refits who say that with the Tracker air frame, the Tracker is by far the most superior aircraft that can do the job.

The minister has received a proposal from the IMP group which would see the Tracker squadron taken over by that company, crewed by an air reserve squadron and operating out of Summerside at a cost of $12 million to $14 million. That proposal was sent to the minister last December and the proposal has not been responded to.

Why has the minister totally ignored this proposal from a company that is expert with the Tracker aircraft and whose proposal would establish the foundation of an aeronautical industry for Summerside? Or is Summerside being blacklisted by this government?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I understand the concern that the hon. member and all members of this House have for the circumstances in Summerside which result from the closing of CFB Summerside. However, the hon. member should not pretend or lead his constituents to presume that we could replace the closing of that base by mere maintenance of the fisheries patrol activity from Summerside.

The specifications for the modern patrol service that we require, not a 1960s style patrol service but a 1990s style fisheries patrol service, have been drawn up to take into account the best aircraft capability including pressurization, on-board radar and other equipment that will be required to do a good job.

I have every confidence that the service which is successful in winning this tender will be the very best we can find in Canada.

CFB SUMMERSIDE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Last Tuesday, the Prime Minister told this House that every time he visits Atlantic Canada he commits this government to something constructive and useful for Atlantic Canadians. It is apparent that the Prime Minister has not visited Prince Edward Island for some time.

The people of my province have waited since the April budget announcement for this government to take responsibility for its decision to close CFB Summerside. Last week, the Prime Minister's inner cabinet met to discuss alternatives for CFB Summerside.

When is this government going to make an announcement of a firm commitment of jobs for the Summerside area?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member should be reminded that CFB Summerside is not yet closed. It is still in operation. She should also be reminded to listen to her Premier who announced yesterday how pleased he was with the co-operation he received from the federal government in helping to bring about the announcement by Cavendish Farms in that region of the province which will be very important.

She should also be aware, as the Prime Minister has indicated and as she alluded to in her question, that there is a committee of cabinet looking at what can be done to ease the changes occurring as a result of the DND decisions. She will, I am sure, when she sees the whole picture be very pleased with the result.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly well aware that the base is not closed. We all hope that it will not be closed, but this is a very serious matter on Prince Edward Island. If it is closed, it means we will lose $60 million from the economy and 1,300 direct jobs.

My supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The town of Summerside has been waiting for nine months for this decision. The business and investment confidence in that whole community is dropping every day because of a lack of commitment from this government.

Will the government make a firm commitment today, assuming the base is closed, that it will restore the economy of Summerside to where it was dollar for dollar before that announcement of April 27?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the announcement yesterday by Cavendish for an investment of up to $80 million without any federal or provincial contribution is an indication that those who are investing their own money have tremendous confidence in P.E.I. and in the economy there. I do not understand why the opposition finds it so useful to continually talk doom and gloom when those who are investing their own money do not have that same view at all.

Second, change is regrettable but change is inevitable. Every year in Canada, on average 100,000 corporations disappear and 130,000 new corporations are created. Four million people change jobs. Those things happen.

For the opposition to continue to say, "Please prevent any change from occurring ever in our areas. Please step in and stop change," is for us to stand still in time and that is impossible as well as being a silly thing to do.

We are addressing the situation there. We have extensive programs to help people who are ill-affected by change. We have extensive regional development programs. We have an agency in Moncton newly established. It has a tremendous track record of helping Atlantic Canada. We are paying attention to the problem.

We would ask the opposition to co-operate to see that we make the change beneficial instead of saying at all times, "Stop all change." That is not possible. It is not wise.

TRANSPORTATION OF TOXIC WASTE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we learned of the illegal waste imports into Quebec. Today I have to report to the House that I have learned that a U.S. company is once more planning to ship toxic material to Detroit and across the Detroit River to Windsor.

The Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Transport have both written to me indicating they have no jurisdiction in this matter. I want to ask the Minister of Transport how this can possibly be true when these barge operations will take place across a busy international waterway and when, in fact, the guidelines for environmental assessment indicate that these guidelines are to be applied in the case of anything in which the federal jurisdiction, that is, international waterways will be affected.

How can this be true that this ministry and the Ministry of the Environment have no jurisdiction in this serious matter?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if I well understand the question, my friend talks about planning to do something. I am sorry, but I do not believe that either the Minister of the Environment or myself could deal with something which could be a possibility. I would prefer if my friend could give me some certainty at a time when, along with the Minister of the Environment, I will be able to deal with that.

• (1200)

The way I heard and understood the question, it is a possibility the American company plans to do something. I would prefer to have more certitude before answering that kind of question.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in this case the company has already had informal discussions with the Department of National Revenue and the Customs people about the shifting of Customs officers to this new private dock which they intend to use for these cross river shipments.

We are talking about something which is very much in the works. I want this government to make a commitment that it will not be prepared to simply let this happen, that this environmental danger, especially to people down river in my constituency, will be forced to undergo environmental review procedures such as any significant project that people in federal jurisdictions should have to face.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not say that the question is not relevant. I say that the question is premature. The government will consider very seriously that kind of matter.

My friend said that they started with informal discussions. As far as the government and I are concerned, it is not sufficiently specific to be able to give the appropriate answer. As soon as the company will be more specific, I believe the Minister of the Environment and myself will be more able to answer what I consider to be a relevant question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the House would not want to close Question Period before hearing from the member for Gander—Grand Falls.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has decided to hire American air traffic controllers not only at Pearson International but at other centres throughout Canada.

In Newfoundland, according to the internal memo that I have here, the government is going to hire 20 Americans with fat contracts paying them more than Canadian controllers get to go our job starved province of Newfoundland.

Because the memo says that they are going to be hired next week, will the Minister of Transport intervene and cancel these contracts to Americans who are taking highly paid Public Service jobs that Canadians want and need? I have met with the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association. It says we can solve the problem here.

Why is that under this government the Americans are always flying high while Canadians are grounded?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to my friend that I am aware that the Gander centre for air traffic controllers is understaffed. We are taking that into very serious consideration. As a matter of fact, we have 18 students on site training in Gander; 10 from Newfoundland and 8 from the other Atlantic provinces.

I also met Mr. Fisher from CATCA and he is supposed to provide me with a list of 52 people who are ready to move from Atlantic Canada and elsewhere to Gander. If I can get that list we will consider that very seriously.

In the meantime, my friend knows very well that safety is the priority of the department and we have to staff Gander in any event. Of course we will give priority to Canadians, but we will also give priority to safety.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the solution that the minister just mentioned is the solution that I have been suggesting for a long time. It is not only Gander. It is Vancouver and Montreal, if they could get away with it, but in Montreal you have to speak French as well as English.

[Translation]

Montreal now needs 30 more bilingual controllers.

My question is for the minister responsible for the decisions to hire Americans. What will the government do in Montreal now? Will they look for Cajuns from Louisiana?

[English]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to compliment my friend on his French. He is so good that I will recommend him for a job as an air traffic controller in Montreal.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the situation in Montreal is different from Gander, because we are now able, within the resources we have in Quebec, since no control tower is short-staffed, to find enough controllers from among Quebec applicants to meet Montreal's requirements while the students are in training. The group which starts training in Cornwall this spring is francophone and while these young people are being trained, we will have enough people within the Province of Quebec to satisfy—

Once again, this time in French, I would like to compliment my colleague for learning French. I think it is extremely important. Again, we appreciate it a lot.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period today when our leader, the hon. member for Yukon, was asking a question about the devastating situation with regard to the farming industry in western Canada, I distinctly heard the Minister of Supply and Services use the words "bullshit" and "lie" with regard to her remarks.

I recognize that from time to time in this House we disagree with the veracity of a statement or we disagree with the interpretation of an economic situation in this country. That is certainly within the bounds of Parliament.

However I think there has been a rising level of heckling taking place over the last few weeks with regard to our leader in the House. I believe that the Minister of Supply and Services has overstepped the bounds of parliamentary dignity.

I quote from Citation 320 at page 105 of Beauchesne's that the word "bullshit" is not acceptable. That is with regard to Debates of September 19, 1973, page 6736.

Mr. Speaker, when you have the time and if you wish to refer to page 107 of Beauchesne's, you will see that the word "lie" is mentioned. The use of the word "lie" is listed on page 108. For your edification, Mr. Speaker, the references refer to Debates, April 23, 1959; Debates, May 27, 1959; January 5, 1960; March 1, 1960; June 1, 1960; June 10, 1960; August 5, 1960—a very active year—February 20, 1961; June 26, 1961; September 14, 1961; February 22, 1962; November 15, 1962; October 18, 1963; October 7, 1964; November 3, 1964; December 4, 1964; December 10, 1964; December 10, 1964 again—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I get the point of the member's invention. Does the minister wish to reply?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has adequately proven to me that these words have been used frequently in the House of Commons. I do recognize, though, that under Beauchesne's they are deemed as being unparliamentary.

I guess I was driven to using the point of using this unparliamentary language by the complete inaccuracy of the statements put forth by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. Its members did that in the last election campaign. They were roundly defeated when they said that about medicare and about social programs under the free trade agreement. They persist on using inaccurate, fallacious information which absolutely devastates any arguments they are trying to make.

I do recognize that those words may have been out of order in the situation. I would withdraw them, but I would hope that the hon. leader would try to learn something about the GST.

• (1210)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The member has withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have received a written notice from the hon. member for North Island—Powell River that he is unable to move his motion during the hour provided for Private Members' Business on Monday, January 29, 1990.

[Translation]

Since it was not possible to switch places on the priority list, pursuant to Standing Order 94, I order the Clerk to move this item to the bottom of the priority list.

The time for Private Members' Business will therefore be cancelled, pursuant to Standing Order 94.

[English]

Since there will be nothing before the House at one o'clock, the sitting will have to be suspended after prayers until two o'clock. Does that pose a problem for the House?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the member who was to move a motion under Private Members' Business on Monday cannot attend, I think that you would find there is consent for the following motion:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order of the House, on Monday, January 29, 1990 the House meets at two o'clock p.m. for "Statements by Members", followed by "Oral Questions" and the remaining order of business as provided for Mondays.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Regina—Lumsden on a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

REMARKS OF MINISTER

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the precedents and the requirements for any kind of withdrawal or apology to the House of Commons must be unequivocal and straightforward with no qualifications. I do not believe that the remarks of the hon. minister who just tried to make some kind of an apology and withdrawal meets those requirements.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I thought I was very clear in withdrawing those unparliamentary words which have been so frequently used in this place and at the same time pointed out that perhaps they should speak the truth fully.

Mr. Benjamin: That's a qualification.

Mr. Murphy: That's not acceptable.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair accepts the words of the minister.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with what I know will be welcome news for all those members of this House who share this government's commitment to the principle of equal pay for work of equal value.

As members may recall, in the Speech from the Throne in 1984 the Prime Minister committed this government to achieving equal pay for work of equal value in the federal Public Service as an integral step leading to the full economic equality of women.

[Translation]

In line with this objective, the government has already introduced many measures to achieve employment equity, such as increasing the percentage of women in the federal government and its agencies, boards and commissions, and ensuring that women are involved in decision-making at all administrative levels.

Equal pay for work of equal value is also an essential condition if the government is to manage its operations more effectively. To do so, the government must acknowledge the contribution of public service employees. It must treat them fairly and promote a high level of job satisfaction and a healthy team spirit, if they are to serve Canadians with the requisite professional expertise and dedication.

This new decision will reinforce the project referred to as "Public Service 2000", announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) last December. Its goal is to ensure that Canadians have the best-managed public service there is.

Mr. Speaker, we have made great progress in achieving our employment equity objective. We have launched a program aimed at streamlining administrative procedures and letting managers manage the resources at their disposal. The government has agreed on a host of other measures to manage government more effectively and reduce social and economic inequalities.

[English]

Today, Mr. Speaker, I want to describe our actions to implement equal pay for work of equal value in the federal Public Service. In practical terms, equal pay for work of equal value means the elimination of inequities in pay between workers in female dominated occupational groups and workers in male dominated groups.

In March 1985 I established a joint union-management committee to look at the means through which gender based equities in pay could be corrected. The objective was to develop a methodology to identify and quantify those inequities and to make recommendations on how to redress them in a proactive manner throughout the federal Public Service.

At that time all 13 Public Service unions accepted my invitation to participate with Treasury Board officials on the committee and worked co-operatively toward that common objective. In addition, officials from the Canadian Human Rights Commission participated as observors.

As this House can appreciate, assessing gender based inequities in pay across the entire federal Public Service is a very complex task. There are some 220,000 federal public servants in addition to the Canadian Armed Forces and the RCMP. They are 70 different occupational groups, 53 of which are assessed by the committee as being male dominated and 9 as female dominated.

[Translation]

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I am told this pay equity study is the largest of its kind ever conducted anywhere in the world. Obviously, it was not possible to assess every position in each of these occupational groups. Through the efforts of the committee and the assistance of independent consultants, a methodology was established that all agreed would be statistically sound and produce valid results.

In total, 4,419 employees were surveyed and 3,200 positions were analyzed by nine evaluation committees against the criteria established by the consultants selected by the Joint Union-Management committee. These consultants have participated in all aspects of the committee's work. Their work is now complete, although they have identified continuing apparent gender bias in some of the job evaluations.

[English]

Treasury Board and the Canadian Human Rights Commission have concurred that some further analysis is required to clarify these situations, but these adjustments are not of a nature or scope that would justify further delays in government action. Since the government believes that the public interest will be best served by moving forward, I am announcing today that the federal government will implement equal pay for equal value adjustments immediately.

These adjustments will come in two phases and affect approximately 70,000 federal public servants. The first phase has an immediate cost to the federal government of approximately $317 million in retroactive lump sum payments to those affected by past and current inequities. These retroactive payments will be made to all affected employees as quickly as possible.

The second phase involves about $76 million in annual salary adjustments in order to equalize pay rates between persons in female dominated occupations and those in male dominated occupations. These adjustments will be effective April 1 of this year.

As I indicated earlier, the process involved in identifying and analysing pay discrimination within the Public Service has been a lengthy and a complex one. When we started the process we had hopes that we could complete it in a relatively short period of time. While this did not prove to be the case, this government does not believe that those public servants affected by pay discrimination, male as well as female, should be forced to shoulder the burden of any further inevitable delays.

• (1220)

Therefore, I am announcing today that the lump sum settlement payments will be made retroactive to March 31, 1985, the month in which I announced the establishment of the joint union–management committee. I believe this is fair to the employees concerned and consistent with the spirit of natural justice to which our government is committed.

In real terms, this represents a retroactive payment that averages approximately $4,800 per person affected, and these employees reside in communities from one end of the country to the other.

[Translation]

That is just an average, and does not reflect individual circumstances in specific positions. All levels of each occupational group will receive the same amount, and we will make strenuous efforts to deliver back pay cheques as soon as possible in the next few months. This means, for example, that a secretary working in a point-of-entry customs office could receive up to $5,900 or a clerk working in an Environment Canada district office could receive up to $3,500.

Decisions being announced today will involve adjustments for four of the nine female-dominated groups. The 70,000 employees belonging to these four groups represent more than 90 per cent of all employees in female-dominated groups. It appears that the work of a fifth group, data processing, was not under-valued. The four remaining groups have already received equal pay for work of equal value adjustments.

Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out earlier, although a number of lesser points remain to be settled before the committee can finalize its work, there was obviously a case for immediate action.

I want to give the House the assurance that although we are acting now, this does not prejudge any conclusions that might be reached by the Canadian Human Rights Commission on matters that are pending.

I want to make it very clear today that I am announcing entitlements based upon an independent assessment of what these jobs are worth, in relation to other jobs of equal and similar value. They reflect the law of the land and our commitment to applying fairly the principle of equal pay for work of equal value.

[English]

It is my belief that all members of this House will applaud the initiative that I am announcing today. I am convinced that this demonstration of our commitment will send the right signal to all employers across this country, whether or not they fall under federal jurisdiction. We are serious about equal pay for work of equal value and we will continue to do our utmost to improve the economic equality of women in this country.

Implementing equal pay for work of equal value in business, in industry and in government is necessary for economic progress. But, more than that, it is a critical social issue of national importance. We cannot move forward as a nation unless we are willing to move forward together as a nation of equals.

Economic discrimination between men and women cannot be tolerated. It is an affront to the value that we as Canadians espouse; it runs contrary to the goals that we all share; and it limits the ability of every Canadian to give what they have to offer to build a future for the nation as a whole.

As I said earlier, ending economic discrimination and ensuring the full participation of women in Canadian society have been basic goals of this government since 1984. Because of this commitment I believe that it is incumbent upon this government to demonstrate leadership and make progress wherever possible, and it is in this spirit that I am making this announcement today. To delay any further, to wait until all the i's are dotted and the t's crossed, does not demonstrate that spirit and does not demonstrate leadership.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I believe this settlement is a reasonable one based as it is upon a statistically-sound methodology and will be welcomed by those affected, especially women in the public service. Public servants, no matter what any group might say to the contrary, are committed to serving the nation. In return, the nation must treat public servants with fairness, with equity and with the same respect for the law which the government demands from all participants in our society.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, while I do indeed applaud the minister's words, as I have many times in this House, I regret that the actions do not always match the words. Certainly we support and welcome any initiative toward economic justice, equal pay for work of equal value, employment equity, and, as the minister said, basic equality in our society and marching forward into the future on a fully equal basis between men and women.

Nonetheless, I welcome this first hopeful, if tentative, step toward finally paying 70,000 people who work for the people of Canada what their work is really worth.

It has been a privilege to stand in this House half a dozen times since last spring and raise the long outstanding promise and the failure of this government to implement pay equity. On virtually every occasion that I have spoken in this House on any employment or human rights issue, the government has been taken to task for its failure to bring its treatment of workers into conformity, not with some ideal principle but with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of this country.

My colleagues on numerous occasions have reminded the government of its obligation to pay people an income that matches the value of the work they do, not based on their gender.

Through this fall we have seen three strikes with horrendous economic and human costs because the government has treated basic justice as something to be used as a bargaining chip at the negotiating table. We have seen contempt for a decision of the Human Rights Commission. We have seen the withholding of money to which people are entitled until they are forced into a settlement of a contract the government has been unable to negotiate in two years.

Even today, in this action which is justice delayed and finally under way, we see a unilateral action and a failure to make a commitment to proceeding to implement fully the results of the study to date.

I suspect that once again, although I welcome the specifics of the announcement, the government is acting not out of a commitment to fairness and justice but out of a very realistic recognition that the major union involved in the study of pay equity has withdrawn out of frustration and in fact intends to take several cases back before the Public Service Staff Relations Boards and the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

I suspect that with the suspension of this action cases now before the Human Rights Commission that were simply suspended in action while the study was going on may be reactivated. I remind the House that we are talking about 50,000 underpaid workers who launched the case with the Canadian Human Rights Commission several years ago and a thousand or more nursing employees who have a similar case before the commission.

Having let the talks lapse, having failed to come to some agreement and some commitment as part of that joint union–management study that the results of the study would be accepted and there would be a short timetable for implementation, the minister is now arriving like Santa Claus and handing out goodies as if they were some kind of largess from the government, when really all these hundreds of millions of dollars represent is injustice that is finally starting to be righted, money that they were entitled to for many, many years.

I want to look at this announcement very carefully and compare it with what in fact has been coming out of the study of positions. If we go back to the Human Rights Commission case of the hospital workers we find that each hospital worker was entitled not to something in the neighbour of $3,000 or $4,000 but on average to $10,000 each over the period of time.

• (1230)

Estimates have been made that implementing the employment equity study would cost in the neighbourhood of between $200 million to $300 million annually, not retroactively over five years. Thus I want to have a very close look at this. I want to assure the minister that the pressure is still on to make sure that full and complete pay equity throughout the Public Service is implemented, that this is an interim step in the right direction but that until people have a wage classification that reflects the value of their work we do not have justice in the Public Service of Canada.

Let the minister be under no illusion. The people who receive this cash will welcome it. They need it because they are among the lowest paid employees of the Government of Canada in many cases.

Let there be no misunderstanding that that will not dampen their fervour for full justice in the pay cheques they receive, not token equalization payments but full justice in their salaries and in their classification, a full recognition that their work has value to the people of Canada and that it will be paid for equitably.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I too welcome the statement of the President of Treasury Board today. It is certainly a step in the right direction. I am fearful that it does not go far enough. It sounds like a lot of money when we hear the figure $76 million. But we all must remember that this is money that these women have earned over the years. In fact, because of the lack of pay equity it is money out of which they have been cheated.

I would like to ask the minister a couple of questions about what he said today. I will just present them and see if we can follow up on them later.

Will these equalization payments be taxed at a higher rate? Some of the undervalued occupational groups will not receive these equalization payments, if I understand what the minister said. He indicated word processors. This is undervalued women's work. It sounds like it will continue to be undervalued. Equalization payments should be reflected in salaries that women receive and not a separate payment.

This week the Public Service Alliance of Canada withdrew from the joint union–management pay equity study. Reports on the news indicate that they felt that they had struggled for five years. The Public Service Alliance Vice-President said that the study was becoming a farce.

In the face of a major public campaign by the alliance for pay equity there was a possibility that 80,000 complaints would be filed with the Human Rights Commission. I wonder if this is why the government is now responding. Is it fearful of those complaints being raised with the Human Rights Commission? Women have experienced pay discrimination within the Public Service of Canada ever since the Public Service was first formed.

Pay discrimination exists in every occupational group that is made up mostly of women. The government is proposing retroactive payments to March of 1985, but I do not see any time frame in the statement by the minister.

When will they receive this money? Will it come this month? Will it come next month? Will it come next year? The record of the government has not been good on this. The minister said that there are still some minor issues that are yet to be resolved. What are these minor issues? Are they really minor issues?

This is the same government that has legislated female hospital workers back to work instead of dealing with their demand for equal pay for work of equal value, which is their right.

I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board, what about these workers? Are they going to be dealt with? When are they going to benefit? When are they going to be treated equally, fairly and equitably on their demands for equal pay for work of equal value?

The Minister mentioned progress toward employment equity. Employment equity is not pay equity. His own colleague in the House of Commons, the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration, said in the House just this week that there has been very little progress made toward employment equity, which is a separate matter from pay equity.

The women in Canada make up the majority of the poor. If the minister is really serious about improving economic equality for women in this country, and if this government were really serious about improving the conditions and the equality of women in Canada, it would reindex family allowance which has been deindexed. It would raise old age security benefits for all older Canadians, as well as the guaranteed income supplement. Women make up the majority of the poor in this country. Elderly women make up the majority of the poor elderly.

I agree with the statement of the minister that we cannot move together forward as a nation unless we are prepared to move forward together as a nation of equals. I appreciate the minister's comments. It is very true that we must all work toward this goal. To become a nation of equals we must really believe in equality. We must act on it always, not just when we are forced to.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask for unanimous consent of the House to ask a related question of the minister.

I want to commend him for some of the steps that have been taken today, while I also support very strongly the position raised by my colleague.

The question I would like unanimous consent to ask has to do with systemic discrimination that continues in the Public Service against the employment of visible minorities. I am sure the minister knows that his government target for hiring minorities is far below the rate of participation of such people in the regular workforce. Even with such a low target, only a little over 1 per cent of federal employees are people of colour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the question involved is not directly related to the subject.

My second concern is that the longstanding tradition of the House concerning statements is a very important one. To have us add to a statement a period for questions would be a very unusual precedent, one that I am sure most members in the House would not want to accept. So we would decline.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order.

The request is highly unusual and, I think, highly unfair to the House. There is a period set aside every day for questions to the minister. If we want to enter into debate there is a way to have a debate, one in which all parties can participate.

I really must respond to the point raised by the member opposite who thinks that employment equity is a separate issue from pay equity. I am afraid he is quite wrong. He had better get himself a little better informed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That sounds like a matter for debate.

Routine Proceedings

STRIKING COMMITTEE

TWENTY-NINTH AND THIRTIETH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the twenty-ninth report of the Striking Committee.

While I am on my feet, I have the honour to present the thirtieth report of the Striking Committee.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in the report later this day. I would ask that we dispense with the reading of the report by the Clerk at the table as that report concerns only membership changes to committees.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I move concurrence in the third report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts presented to the House.

Under ordinary circumstances the tradition has been to notify those members of the Public Accounts Committee that I was going to move concurrence in this particular report. However, the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia and the member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke are not in the House—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member.

The hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt has the floor for a motion to concur in the third report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Is there agreement that the House will concur in the thirtieth report of the Striking Committee presented by the hon. member for Peace River?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hovdebo: The member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia and the member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, who are the two members of the steering committee, were not in the House this morning so I was unable to contact them. I am proceeding with this concurrence motion in the hope that should they want to put remarks, they may do so at some time in the future.

The third report of the Public Accounts Committee deals with the Auditor General's comments on the agricultural report of 1988 regarding the development of a number of issues on which he felt, or his office felt, the effectiveness of the Department of Agriculture needed to be questioned.

Since I have spent a considerable amount of my life and my time here in the House dealing with agricultural issues, I want to move concurrence at this time. I do so because there are a number of issues dealing with food safety, the disease of animals and pesticide control. The information that is given to Parliament and which is discussed in this particular report are going to make or can make a difference in what happens relative to the agricultural industry in the next little while.

I think everybody in this House recognizes that the agricultural industry across Canada is feeling the effects of a recession which is not necessarily felt in many other parts of the economy. It is a recession which indicates that during the next few years, or the next year alone, we will have in Saskatchewan a 101 per cent reduction in income. For the first time since the 1930s the farmers of Saskatchewan will receive less income than they will pay out in costs. In other words, they will have on a general basis a negative income. Very few farmers will make more than they will pay out in costs of operation.

There is a need to bring this matter to the attention of this government. I am doing that by asking Parliament to concur in something which would assist in having the limelight focused on the difficulties of agriculture in the next year or at present.

The Auditor General in his report called upon the department to strengthen the food inspection practices. The theme of his audit findings was the need to assess the risks. He felt and expressed very articulately that although there was a considerable amount of money being spent on food safety, there was no priority to make sure that those items which were the most dangerous to the safety of the people of Canada were getting the kind of priority that they should.

As many of you will know, in 1984, 1985 and 1986, after the Nielsen report to this House, this government reduced the number of inspectors. It left the responsibility for the inspection and safety of foods more to those companies that are producing or processing the foods, especially in the case of meat but in other foods as well. The cost is now borne by the processor. Consequently, unless the specific requirements are stated and recognized as being needed, there is a danger of moving away from that. The Public Accounts Committee made reference to that but did not make a recommendation in that particular area.

Another area which is very close to the hearts of most Canadians these days is the area of pesticide regulations. You may know, Mr. Speaker, that there is a tremendous backlog of pesticide testing requests. These are pesticides which pose a threat to human health and the environment.

The process by which the government registers pesticides, although it is fairly adequate, has been backed up to such an extent that many pesticides are registered on a temporary basis to be allowed for use in the short term. It takes about three years for a pesticide to go through all the registration processes. Often, when they are renewed they are not put through the same level of testing as they were originally.

Quite often the impact of pesticides in our environment is cumulative. We do not know too much about them when they hit the environment. We find out later. If you look at the number of pesticides that were once quite common in our environment you will see that at the moment they are now banned because we did not really know what their effect was. Again, the committee concludes that there is a need for continued progress in addressing the backlog in pesticide testing, but also a need for the establishment of a workforce which will allow these testings to be completed more quickly.

The basic concern of this report and the part with respect to which the Public Accounts Committee made the most far-reaching recommendations dealt with the information which was available to Parliament as well as to people who are conscious of agricultural development. It is information relative to the Estimates.

In 1980 when the Part IIIs were first brought in I was on the Public Accounts Committee. The members of the committee and the House had hoped that the Part IIIs of the Estimates would put before the people of Canada and Parliament in concise, practical and straightforward terms the kind of information which would allow Parliament to know exactly how the money estimated would be spent. The Part IIIs for each department and for each agency were to give that kind of information to the people of Canada and to this House.

• (1250)

The committee expressed some concern and made some specific recommendations regarding the Part IIIs. Although we at the time were dealing with the Part IIIs relative to agriculture, this terminology, these concerns, these recommendations could be taken to heart by almost every agency and every department that presently produces Part IIIs, which is every department and every agency in the government.

Those Part IIIs, when they came out, fulfilled the requirement to a certain extent. As the people within the departments and the agencies became more used to writing them and found that they were being used to look deeper into the operations of the department or the agency, they had a tendency to write a little more obliquely. Consequently, it was to the point where the committee felt that Part IIIs, particularly these agricultural Part IIIs, did not give the kind of information which we should expect them to have.

The committee presented its twelfth report which was tabled on December 17, 1981, in the Thirty-second Parliament. A motion for concurrence in that report was brought forward and passed by this House. At that time the Public Accounts Committee noted the need to provide procedures to ensure that the integrity, accuracy and consistency of information in Part IIIs was preserved and maintained.

In the same report the committee recognized the role of the Comptroller General in responding to these concerns. As you will know, Mr. Speaker, the Part IIIs are not the responsibility of the Auditor General but basically come from Treasury Board and the Comptroller General. Their quality is vetted by those departments.

The committee was told that more resources had been allocated to the highest priority areas, notably meat hygiene, pesticide control, control of plant and animal diseases and labour relations.

The committee then expected that it should be able to go to the Part IIIs and find out what was in them. That turned out to be almost impossible. What was actually in the Part IIIs was quite often less than was available before. Expenditures that appeared in one year did not appear in the next. Expenditures that were explained vaguely were not clarified in the next year, even if the clarification seemed consistent with understanding.

With the shift of resources there was not a parallel change in clear, consistent data. Expenditures and person-years, together with appropriate explanations in the text, identified the difference between one fiscal year and the second fiscal year. Sometimes we found that the amount put into the Estimates had been reduced considerably or increased considerably with no parallel indication of how those changes were going to affect the operation of the department.

Consequently, the committee made a number of recommendations relative to the Part IIIs. This I suppose to a certain extent is the basis for the belief that concurrence makes a certain amount of sense.

These are the recommendations. First, the committee recommends that the department ensure that the 1990-91 and future Part IIIs of the Estimates contain accurate, clear, consistent and complete information, notably in relation to the resource allocation and program results. We asked the department, in the case of agriculture, to give us information, a written progress report as soon as possible.

We also called upon the Comptroller General to respond to the problems raised by the committee and the Auditor General with regard to the Part IIIs and the Estimates in 1989-90 and earlier Parts IIIs.

We recommend that the Auditor General assess the responses to recommendations (b) and (c) above and report the findings to the committee.

The process of this committee delved into agriculture very seriously, but it was a process which I think and the committee thinks should be extended to as many departments as possible. This is a direction, I suppose, that we are suggesting be picked up by every department and every agency which finds itself required to put before the public and before the House of Commons information regarding their programs in the Part IIIs of the Estimates.

The Part IIIs are well done. They are a great improvement over the huge blue book which you, Mr. Speaker, would have had when you first came to this House of Commons. However, after a while they have a tendency to disintegrate to a certain extent.

We made another series of recommendations in which I think this House should concur. Those recommendations relate to the control of animal and plant disease. These recommendations are mostly relative to export, but they could go much further than that if it was required by the Department of Agriculture.

At the moment, as far as the environment is concerned, we are being faced with a need to have very specific recommendations relative to the health of animals and animal disease. If you have been watching the news, you will have seen that there have been recommendations that the bison herd in Buffalo National Park in northern Alberta be slaughtered to ensure that there will not be a spread of brucellosis.

That is internal. We made recommendations in this report which I think should be concurred in, that the government give early consideration to the introduction of amendments to be sure that the imports of animals and plants be controlled better than it is. In the last little while I have had a lot to do with the importation of goats from Australia and I have found that you cannot bring goats into Canada from Australia because the regulations for such a procedure are not in place.

• (1300)

What we were talking about or recommending in this particular report is that those regulations to be put in place, reviewed, and brought up to date.

I call on the House to concur in the recommendations in this report that the Public Accounts Committee put before this House in the third report.

Mr. Riis: I, too, would like to support the suggestion that we concur in the report. It is an important report, as the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt has outlined.

There are two points that I would like to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Cooper: I am not certain, but the way that the hon. member began his remarks led me to believe that he was entering into debate rather than questions or comments.

He is asking questions or making comments. That is fine then, Mr. Speaker. I just want to signal my intention to enter the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair gave the floor to the member for Kamloops on questions and comments.

Mr. Riis: Perhaps my opening comments led my hon. friend to believe I was launching into a 20-minute speech. Such is not the case. However, I have two questions, one regarding sheep from Australia and another regarding deer from New Zealand.

Some time ago there was a project where people from Australia were intending to bring live lambs from New Zealand to the coast of British Columbia. At that point, they would be off-loaded on the coast of British Columbia and then fattened and raised in B.C. for eventual slaughtering and market.

One of the problems that this group faced was the whole matter of inspections and the fact that the lambs would be quarantined presumably for some time, and I am not certain of the details and that is part of the question to my hon. colleague.

This, I must say, caused a negative reaction from a number of the western sheep growers because they thought that this was a way of importing cheap lamb from Australia and would really provide some unfair marketing, as far as their own products were concerned.

I have a question for my hon. friend for Saskatoon—Humboldt first of all. Does he feel that the regulations, as they presently exist when it comes to sheep being imported into a country, need to be updated and brought into a more modern context to recognize the more recent diseases and some of the problems faced with increasing importation of live animals? Are there any special problems that people who are interested in raising deer, fallow farms I think they are called, experience, particularly bringing in does and bucks from New Zealand?

Mr. Hovdebo: Part of the recommendations which the public accounts committee put before this House deal exactly with that question or are relative to that question, the need to amend the present regulations. We all agree that we have to be absolutely sure that no disease is brought in which we do not understand or recognize here, or any other disease that we have in this country. For instance, there are different kinds of brucellosis in Australia than there are in Canada.

At present the regulations for importing goats, sheep, and so on are specific, the idea being to keep them in quarantine long enough so that we can be sure that they are not carrying a disease. Even then it is a dangerous procedure. When an animal is brought in, it may have developed resistance or even be immune to certain kinds of diseases because it has been with a particular herd which has developed this immunity. The moment it is put with other animals, the disease then breaks out and you have it within your herd. There are intermediate quarantines which allow the animals to be put with the kinds of animals they are going to be living with after they are brought into the country so that if there is any possibility of the spread of disease it will be recognized.

The answer to the question is basically that it is not as simple as just saying we need new regulations. It is much more a matter of knowing for sure that we are not bringing in any diseases and knowing how to control those situations. It is a very complex structure.

[Translation]

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, it is mostly a comment that I would like to make, since I am on the Committee.

Since we have very little time left for this question, I would like to raise the matter of the——third report of the Public Accounts Committee. I have grave concerns, as the report states, regarding the inspection of food.

[English]

One concern that I would like to add that is not written in the report is the fact that the government is now going to be permitting food irradiation, especially in the poultry field. With free trade in place we will see now the dismantling of the management of that particular industry and we will be getting poultry from the United States.

More importantly, I am concerned that there will be no labelling of food that is irradiated. I believe the consumer community should have the right to have food that is going to be irradiated labelled properly so that people may make a choice as to whether or not to buy irradiated poultry from a particular food chain. They should have a choice.

The government has assured me that there will be no health problems with food irradiation. However, I believe very strongly that we should label that part of the food so there would be a choice made by the consumer.

The recommendation in the report that more inspectors be hired is extremely important, again as it relates to food. We are responsible for the safety of our communities, and by constantly cutting the public service, the risk of having less inspectors is putting our communities at risk.

The previous speaker mentioned control of animal and plant disease. There were recommendations that we give early consideration to the introduction of amendments to the import control provisions of the plant quarantine and animal disease.

For example, in labour relations we need more training for inspectors. The committee was very concerned by the Auditor General's findings on employer–employee relations regarding the Food Inspection Branch.

[Translation]

Your Committee also noted the need to improve the training of food and plant inspectors at border stations. The Auditor General discovered, for example, that the veterinary technicians who perform the inspections do not receive thorough training in food science. The Department informed your Committee that it is allocating more resources for the technical training of inspectors and the further training of supervisors in surveillance techniques, which the Auditor General will mention in his follow-up report on this subject.

It is therefore important for the government to have the good sense to limit the cuts in its next budget and to ensure that we have adequate inspection for the protection of consumers.

• (1310)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The member for Saskatoon—Humboldt has the floor and may reply to the comment.

Mr. Hovdebo: The member for Carleton—Gloucester has expanded on one of the concerns that the committee had at that particular time. If he has an opportunity to debate a little later on, I would appreciate hearing his views.

Things have changed considerably. Fifteen years ago, you could bring a bird into Canada by taking it into an agricultural station and having them look at it and they would accept it into Canada if it looked healthy. We have come a long way from that time and it has been very necessary in order to protect the health of our animals and birds.

But the idea of food inspection at the border is something which has not been dealt with particularly well in the free trade agreement and is being used against us when we ship food to the States. We are much more lenient with food coming into Canada, although we had the case of cyanide in the grapes which caused a considerable to-do in the past. Those kinds of things are in the regulations, so there is a real necessity to review and look at the control of food coming into the country and of live animals and plants coming into the country as well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Murphy: Point of order. Point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the member for Kamloops be now heard.

Mr. Kempling: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Murphy: Yes, it is. It's the only way you can do it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I think there is some question as to whether that point of order is receivable. I would ask the Chair to take it under advisement, to render a decision later this day or next week, and to allow the business of the House to proceed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will give the floor to the member for Kamloops.

The procedure in a matter such as this is the following, and if I am not right I am sure members will correct me. Two members stood at the same time, the member for Peace River and the member for Kamloops, and the Chair did recognize on debate the member for Peace River. The matter that the Chair has to take into consideration is whether the member for Peace River started his speech, even with one or two words. Once that is done, and if that is done before the member for Churchill seeks the floor on a point of order, then the member for Peace River has the floor.

In this particular case, the Chair heard the member for Churchill yell "point of order" shortly before the member for Peace River said "Mr. Speaker". That is the interpretation of the Chair. That is why I believe the motion is in order.

In defence, of course, of the member for Peace River, I must say it was probably a split second. The member for Peace River.

Mr. Cooper: I would claim that this is discrimination because of my height. My problem is that my voice, even though I know I began speaking before the hon. member for Churchill, did not project up to the ceiling and back down to the Chair in the same time. So, Mr. Speaker, this is discrimination. I was speaking. I should have the floor.

Mr. Murphy: On the same point, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I am not that much taller, but since the microphones are below our heads, I would assume that he was actually closer to the microphone and that you had more chance to hear him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The House divided on the motion which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to state for the record that the Liberals were in the House but, indeed, we did not want to participate in this little spat going on between the government and the NDP.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, did you hear my voice this time? I have to be careful. I am doubly handicapped when it comes to the member for Churchill. First, I am shorter and second, I have more hair and I know it absorbs the sound. That is why my voice did not project toward the Chair. I am not going to make the same mistake this time.

I want to enter into this debate but I want to enter into the real debate. The real debate that we are talking about here has nothing to do with the report that my hon. friend referred to earlier. It is really about the childish games of the NDP continuing once again today instead of allowing us to get on with an issue that is very important.

Bill C-5 is very important to a very small group of people in Alberta, twelve men who work for a small railway. What did the NDP want to do? They want to play games. They brag to us constantly that they stand up for the little people. We know that is not true. We know, in fact, who pulls their strings and it is not the little people, especially little people like me. It is the unions of this country and, in fact, it is not even the union membership. It is the leadership. Whenever the phone rings, these guys rush out to make sure that it is not Bob White or Shirley Carr calling to know what the marching orders will be for the next few moments.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I must remind my colleague who was speaking and also members of the House that we will not tolerate this continuing sexist language. We are not all guys in this House. We are men and women parliamentarians.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I apologize. I was only referring to the phone call and I assumed it would be the House Leader who would take the call. Therefore, I think "guy" does fit.

My point is that in fact what we have once again are New Democrats responding to the concerns of the union leadership in this land. We saw it demonstrated at their convention. We saw it demonstrated before Christmas because every time the phone rang—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I know this is a very partisan place and sometimes we make those comments but at some point I would hope that the hon. member would be relevant to the committee report.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I will be relevant and short. I will continue to be short.

In fact, we are very concerned about Bill C-5. That is why this government called that issue today. That is why there has been co-operation to a certain degree between the Liberal Party and ourselves. We have agreed that because it is so important an issue it should be referred to a committee where the Liberals can make their point on that issue, where we can make our concerns known but the NDP would rather filibuster and fool around here in the House of Commons.

Therefore, while I am on my feet, I move:

That this House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Government Orders.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Before the debate on Bill C-5 continues, Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order.

Two days ago, the Chair gave notice that it would look into the whole question of whether Bill C-62 imposing a regressive 7 per cent sales tax on Canadians—a bill based on a ways and means motion—is in order. The Chair told the House that it agreed to a recorded vote on first reading and that it would render a decision before second reading of this bill began.

We know that the government announced that on Monday, after oral question period, debate would begin on this bill imposing a 7 per cent goods and services tax on Canadians.

I ask the Chair to allow me to ask the government the following question: If the Chair decides that the bill is not in order, which is possible, can the government tell the House what bill it would have us consider in its place?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This may help the House. I am informed that the Speaker intends to make a ruling on the matter raised by the member for Ottawa—Vanier on 3 p.m. on Monday.

Mr. Gauthier: That is my point, Mr. Speaker. There are two possibilities. It is either going to be correct for the House to proceed to second reading, or not correct.

In the event that it is not correct. I am asking the government to tell us right now what the back-up legislation will be.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am sure if the hon. member had listened carefully to the arguments as put forward by the Minister of Finance and myself yesterday, he would recognize that we are very confident that we will have an affirmative ruling and we certainly feel, after listening to those arguments, that they removed all shadow of doubt.

I can assure the hon. member that because we, as a government, are always prepared, we do have another bill, Bill C-52, which in that very, very unlikely event after those stunning arguments we do not have an affirmative ruling, we would be prepared to pick up that bill.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) that Bill C-5, an act to amend the Railway Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended today by 23 minutes.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I interrupted this morning at 11 a.m. when the member for Vancouver East asked a question. The member for Regina—Lumsden was going to answer. I will allow the member for Vancouver East to summarize her question to the member for Regina—Lumsden.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, it was a while ago, but if I recall correctly, I was asking my colleague who had been speaking on this bill to explain some of the difficulties and some of the solutions to an improved and expanded railway system, particularly as it connects with the ports. I am thinking particularly of the Port of Vancouver and the necessity to compete with the American system which has such things as double decker trains and much more efficient services and, therefore, is causing shipments of grain and other things often to go through the American line, through the Port of Seattle and Tacoma, rather than through Vancouver.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. At 11 o'clock, she called me an expert, although she did not this time. But I do not want to be called that.

My hon. colleague is perfectly right. There must be a massive public investment in the infrastructure of railway lines not only in Vancouver, but in many other ports, such as the infrastructure in every city across Canada, whether it is rail line relocation, grade separations, overpasses or underpasses. If you are going to raise the clearances on railway lines into a port like Vancouver to allow for higher railway cars, you are looking at a lot of money. When you have to raise bridges or lower roadways, you are looking at a lot of investment.

Obviously, the private sector is not going to invest in that. It is like the streets, sidewalks, sewers, water systems and whatnot. If the government thought it could privatize those, it would, but nobody would buy them in a month of Sundays.

The same thing applies to something like the railway system, which is a public utility. You have to treat it that way. It is not an expense. It is an investment because, as my colleague intimated, Burlington Northern is now attracting plywood, grain, and a host of other products across the border from New Westminster or from Lethbridge, and hauling it on Burlington Northern and Conrail at the expense of the Canadian railway system. Because of things this government agrees with, like confidential contracts, faster tax write-offs for American railroads than Canadian railroads have, our railroads are working at a disadvantage.

The government is not about to invest in the kind of rail line improvements that have to take place. It is going to require further public investment. It is rebuilding and modernizing of a system that is 20 or 30 years out of date. It requires, I would estimate, something in the order of $4 billion to $5 billion over the next 10 years to get it done.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into debate on Bill C–5, an act to amend the Railway Act. All members realize that the purpose of this bill is to add a subsection to Section (6) of the Railway Act that allows a province to assume jurisdiction over the interprovincial rail lines.

I think it is appropriate that we recognize what is going on here today. I want to make it clear that the New Democratic Party is not in a position to stop this legislation from moving into committee. Nothing of the sort. We indicated that we wanted to discuss bills thoroughly and we look forward to getting this bill into committee at some point in time, and seeking the appropriate witnesses to respond to see if, in fact, this is the direction the Government of Canada ought to be taking. I mean that with all sincerity.

On the other hand, I think it is clear that what we are also doing as a result of this is sending a signal to the government. The Prime Minister, on many occasions, in reference to the goods and services tax indicated that he does not like this tax and the people of Canada do not like this tax, but it is the right thing to do.

I want to say, on behalf of my colleagues, that we do not enjoy the kinds of things that we have had to do in the last number of days. We do not enjoy frustrating the government at every turn. We do not enjoy making life miserable for the government in terms of its punitive agenda and so on, but it is the right thing to do and we have got to do it.

When 89 per cent of the people of Canada call us and ask us to do what we can to give them time to apply more pressure on the back-benchers on the Conservative side so that they can realize what this goods and services tax is going to do to them and to the country, we have an obligation to do just that.

I know that we have tried our best in the last few days to bring the government to its senses. We have tried to send a message to the government that at least this party is not going to co-operate with the government. In that tradition, I think it is only appropriate that I move:

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was negatived on the following division:

ABORTION

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, yesterday was the second anniversary of the Supreme Court striking down the abortion law. The Supreme Court ruled that Canada's abortion law was unconstitutional.

Today we find ourselves with another unjust abortion law before us. I urge members to vote down this unfair law. Let us not wait for the Supreme Court to do it later, after much pain and publicity to the women who will be dragged before the courts. Let us not deal with unwanted pregnancy by threatening doctors with jail.

Over the past two years women and doctors have shown themselves responsible for making moral and medical decisions. We are entering the third year without an abortion law, showing clearly that we do not need one. What we need instead is family planning education and progressive social programs to support pregnant women and families. On this second anniversary let us all make a commitment to uphold women's right to decide for ourselves what we will do with our own bodies and our lives.

SPORTS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of all of Canada to indicate our support for our athletes in Auckland.

I particularly want to congratulate Curtis Hibbert of Mississauga of our gymnastics team who has won five gold medals, a silver medal and a bronze medal. We have a tremendous team in New Zealand. These young men and women qualified after rigorous hours of training and dedication. Our athletes are participating in virtually every sport. We have won medals, and the winners are to be congratulated. As of yesterday, we had 58 medals and were running second in the games.

For those who have not yet won a medal, we hope they will win some. For those who do not make to the podium, they are still winners as far as we are concerned, and they are to be congratulated.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it is with great interest that I listened to the President of the Treasury Board in the House last Friday make his surprising announcement of equal pay adjustments. I welcomed the news that discrimination in the federal public service would soon come to an end. I have always fought against such discrimination which has been aimed primarily against women. The government is finally moving toward the principle of equal pay for work of equal value after five years of study.

[Translation]

I am proud to say that many of my constituents in Carleton—Gloucester are federal public servants, and I intend to make sure that the adjustment is carried out expeditiously.

[English]

The Treasury Board decision is just one small step toward a complete end to discrimination in the workplace. I urge the government to demonstrate leadership by acting quickly to ensure that all Canadians work in an environment of fairness and equity.

COMMONWEALTH GAMES ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, last week the Quebec Superior Court ruled in favour of coach Daniel St-Hilaire, ordering him to be reinstated as coach.

As ordered, the Canadian Track and Field Association submitted St-Hilaire's name to the Commonwealth Games Association of Canada.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, the latter association decided, on the basis of a time technicality, to ignore St-Hilaire and deny him accreditation to the Commonwealth Games in New Zealand, leaving this national coach to sleep in a car across from the stadium and denying him access to the stadium where the games are held.

Mr. Speaker, I deplore the lack of courtesy shown by the executive of the Commonwealth Games Association of Canada, and I see this situation as humiliating for all Canadians. In the circumstances, I hope that the Association will soon take steps to remedy this intolerable state of affairs, which would be in the best interests of amateur sport in this country.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Minister of Employment and Immigration to help the refugee claimants who are in the so-called backlog, who came to Canada because of its good reputation, yet find themselves caught up in an inhumane Kafakaesque system.

I have met with many of these people. Their situation is desperate. Their lives are on hold. They wait, and they wait and they wait.

A Canadian citizen who befriended a young Iranian family put it this way: "They are treated by our society as less than second-class citizens; they work at underpaid, unstimulating jobs; they cannot study or take training programs; they do not qualify for family allowances; they have absolutely no control over their own lives; and they have virtually no hope of improving their future prospects. I anguish for them and must ask whether Canada cannot do better.

Canada owes it to these human beings and to herself to hasten the refugee claimant process".

That is what I ask the Minister of Immigration to do—

Mr. Speaker: I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance on devising what must be the most popular tax in Canadian history.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Casey: The media is saying that according to a recent poll, 19 per cent of Canadians are in favour of the GST. I find that incredible.

• (1410)

If Canadians were polled on whether or not they wanted to pay income tax I think 100 per cent would be against it. If Canadians were asked if they wanted to pay property tax or provincial sales tax I think 100 per cent would be against it, but 19 per cent of Canadians are in favour of GST. This is a compliment to the Minister of Finance but also an indication that people are beginning to see that the FST must go and that the GST is necessary to ensure that Canadian business is competitive in a global market that is becoming even more competitive every day.

The GST is not the ogre it is being made out to be. Neither will it perform miracles. But it is just one piece of a puzzle that will help us maintain our economy and, perhaps, recapture some of the manufacturing we have lost over many years.

THE HOMELESS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this winter we have seen pictures of Canadians sleeping on a bench, on the ground, over grates, in cities from coast to coast. The sight of the homeless is shocking. It makes us realize that something is wrong with our priorities. There are people in our midst who are not able to look after themselves. Society as a whole must look after them.

They need a roof. They need care. They need support and not just food.

So long as there are homeless Canadians sleeping in the streets we cannot consider ourselves a civilized society. Some people are doing something about it. In my city of Toronto, a hostel called Street City is just about to be opened by the Home First Society.

By contrast, the federal minister has no money, no projects, no programs. When will this government awake to the fact that there could be more than 10,000 Canadians homeless this winter? When will Ottawa help to house the homeless?

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate all those concerned Canadians who have worked so hard for our environment.

The federal government, the federal environment minister and the government of Saskatchewan have finally halted construction on the Rafferty dam. Over the last two years I and my colleagues on this side of the House, especially the member for Winnipeg Transcona, have worked closely with the people who are sincerely concerned about the environment of Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

All we wanted was an independent panel to study the impact of this project, but what a mess the minister has created. An independent panel inquiry should have been conducted when we first called for it. It should have been conducted before the projects began, before the Federal Court spent time and money ruling on two challenges, before 60 per cent of the dam was complete, before the Minister of the Environment had to commit $10 million to the Government of Saskatchewan.

I wish we knew how the $10 million is going to be spent. I commend the Minister of the Environment for his decision. I just hope it is not too little too late.

TRIBUTE TO ANDRÉ BOUCHER

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Voyageur bus accident on January 11 in the Annonciation area in Quebec might have been a disaster, but for the heroic behaviour of one of the passengers, André Boucher of Val d'Or.

Witnesses stated they would never forget what this young man was able to do during the initial moments after this terrible collision. With great calm and courage, he took charge of the situation and kept people from panicking. He used an extinguisher to put out a small fire and gave first aid to the driver who was seriously hurt.

Unassumingly, André Boucher said: "I didn't do anything special."

Mr. Speaker, I for one think André behaved like a hero and that he deserves all our admiration and respect.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, on September 26 the Minister of National Defence told this House that the moving of the 414th Squadron from North Bay would be cancelled because: "There was an additional cost for infrastructure which was not identified at the time of the budget." We concurred with that decision.

The government originally said the cost of moving the Royal Canadian Regiments to CFB Petawawa was $30 million. Now it looks like the real cost might be closer to $110 million.

In light of these additional costs, will the minister now acknowledge that the closure of CFB London will not save the taxpayer any money? Will he submit all the costs to the committee on defence?

The Minister of Defence has tried to persuade the city of London that rough estimates exist that demonstrate there are sufficient cost benefits to closing CFB London. Where are these mythical figures? If saving the taxpayer money is the main justification for the base closure, why will the minister not release this key information?

Although no one expects initial estimates to be perfect, yours is simply incompetent. Since when did the government give you a blank cheque to spend whatever you want to close CFB London and expand CFB Petawawa? Will the Minister rescind this action and put it on hold—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it was with an enormous sense of pride that Saskatchewan people this morning viewed the swearing in of one of their own as Canada's twenty-fourth Governor General.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia) Canada's new Governor General is a son of Saskatchewan. He is a graduate of the University of Saskatchewan who distinguished himself as a lawyer, as a member of Parliament and as a minister of the Crown. Indeed, this Governor General and his wife have dedicated the better part of their lives to distinguished public service.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure I join all of Saskatchewan and, indeed, all Canadians in extending sincere congratulations and best wishes to Their Excellencies, the Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn and Mrs. Gerda Hnatyshyn.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

We are entering into a new phase of the goods and services tax. One of the criteria that he put forward for the goods and services tax was that it be simple. This is just part of the simplicity that he is going to perpetrate on Canadians, over 300 pages. I quote from page 112, just one of the simple calculations the Minister is going to inflict on Canadian business:

(A + B) + (C x(100 percent)—B)

This is the kind of thing that the Minister is putting forward. Is the the minister convinced that small business in this country believes that his proposal is going to be simple? Is he still adamant about putting forward the GST regardless of what it is going to do to small business in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is well aware we have put a number of features into the GST system so that it will help small business comply with the tax and help them in their business practices. One of these is the simplified accounting procedures we have provided for, but we have indicated that if there are any other proposals as to ways that the accounting systems can be simplified we are quite willing to look at that.

We have provided for a less frequent payment period for small businesses. Small businesses can pay either four times a year every three months or, if they are quite small businesses, they only have to do their tax calculation once a year.

There are ways in which we are reaching out. There are ways that we are listening to small business. Finally, we have embarked on discussions with the provinces to find ways whereby we can co-ordinate our activities with the provinces, with the prime objective of reducing the compliance burden for small businesses.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): The Minister insists on continuing his attack on small business in this country. Instead of letting small businesses get on with their work and create jobs in Canada, the Minister of Finance is raising a small army to collect his GST. Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Finance is this: Does the government still intend to raise an administrative army of about 4 000 new employees, with an average annual salary of between $37,000 and $40,000, to collect the proceeds of the GST that will come out of the pockets of Canada's taxpayers?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe that my friend is very much aware that one of the outcomes that we hope will happen as a result of our discussions with the provinces is some combined effort so that we can reduce the number of public servants needed.

An hon. member: You don't know?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says "don't I know". We just started the discussions with the provinces within the past couple of weeks. That arose out of a decision taken at the finance ministers' meeting in December, so we have been moving fairly quickly in order to try and identify ways that we can work together and minimize this compliance burden. As we minimize the compliance burden we will be saving costs both for the business community as well as for governments in general.

• (1420)

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, as we discussed in this House, the minister and other members of the government have indicated that Canadians do not understand the goods and services tax. I think that is becoming obvious because opposition continues to increase to the goods and services tax, although the rate has been lowered in the latest proposal of the government.

Does he not understand that after all of the effort that has been made by the government to try to convince Canadians to accept the goods and services taxes, he has failed and that a basic tenet of the parliamentary system is that you need to have acceptance on the part of the people for these kinds of onerous tax measures?

I want to ask the finance minister if he is prepared to undertake again today, as he did on Friday, that he is personally prepared to travel—I understand he cannot go to every nook and cranny of the country—at least to four or five major centres in this country where he can explain to Canadians what the goods and services tax is all about and to allow for conflicting views to be heard? Is the minister prepared to sell what the chairman of the finance committee has not been able to sell, and that no one sitting next to him or behind him is prepared to even discuss in public?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentioned a number of things during the course of that lengthy preamble to his question. First of all, I have made a number of trips to different parts of the country and I intend to do this on an ongoing basis. This, I believe, is part of my responsibility as Minister of Finance. Other colleagues on this side of the House will be doing exactly that as well.

The hon. member could assist the effort to improve the understanding of Canadians by not distorting what the GST does. He has just called it an onerous tax. It is a very simple tax in relation to the existing federal sales tax which was brought in some 65 years ago.

We will have a one-page tax return so that businesses will be able to pay their tax based on calculations put on one page. That demonstrates the ongoing commitment that we have to the small business community, a commitment that is clearly characterized by specific actions, including the $500,000 capital gains exemption, and the refundability of research and development credits for those small businesses which are not in a profitable position at the point that they undertake that research and development effort.

We have reduced the tax rate on corporate income tax for small businesses, and in a number of ways over the course of the last five years we have clearly demonstrated a commitment to and understanding of the position that small business is in. We have done things in order to try to assist their ability to work to create jobs to generate wealth for this country.

MINE CLOSINGS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last Friday Rio Algom Mines in Elliot Lake announced it will be shutting down two of its mines, laying off some 1,600 workers. This represents some 70 per cent of the workforce of this company and is a devastating blow for the community. I wonder if the minister can tell the House, those families and the community of Elliot Lake what action the government is specifically prepared to take to assist them in this devastating news. We are not only talking about the 1,600 miners here but we are talking about thousands of people in the community, their livelihoods, their families and their homes. They are all involved in this devastating news. I wonder if the minister could tell us what specific action the government is prepared to take.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the closure of this mine, which has been a primary source of income and employment in that area, one which I have visited, is quite a blow to the community. Our Industrial Adjustment Services are already working with the company, with the United Steelworkers and with the province to try to determine what programs will work the best. This is a Community Futures area so we will be putting our resources to work behind the workers. I understand also the indirect impact on some of the local businesses and I think the Community Futures Program and the council that they have in place there will be able to help with some of that.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. While I am encouraged by the minister's response, I wonder if the minister could be more specific and say that she will give us a specific allocation for the industrial adjustments program, not only to help the workers but to diversify the economy and to assist the community at large.

In some cases, in communities facing extreme hardship and layoff, the government has been willing to allocate a specific amount of funding under the community initiatives fund, such as Sault Ste. Marie a couple of years ago. I wonder if the government would be willing to give a commitment to a specific amount of funding under the community initiatives fund for economic diversification and job adjustment as well.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think until the Industrial Adjustment Service has been in there and been able to assess the extent of what the community is facing, it would be early to do that. I would advise the hon. member to speak to his colleagues in the other place, because in the Labour Force Development Strategy there is more funding for both the Community Futures and for the IAS. The sooner we get that bill, the sooner I can help communities like his.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I understand that today a Canadian Forces CF-18 plane crashed. Can the Minister tell us anything about the status of the personnel, whether indeed that crash did take place and whether that plane was taking part in the cruise missile testing?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I regret to inform the House that there was a crash of a CF-18 operating from a forward operating location in Inuvik. It crashed some 2.5 miles from take-off. It was taking part, along with other aircraft, in an intercept exercise. They were controlled from the regional operations control centre at CFB North Bay. It is believed that the pilot was able to eject. There has been a civilian plane with military personnel at the scene and at this time we can only pray that the pilot has survived. I cannot inform the House as to the accuracy of that.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Minister of National Defence. I would appreciate it if perhaps the minister could make a statement later in the day as more facts become available. I am sure all Canadians are concerned about this tragedy.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I would like to turn to another matter. In the absence of the Prime Minister, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Last week the Prime Minister said in this House: "Both I and the country will remain transfixed as we await the presentation of the options for taxation from the New Democratic Party". Well, for the information of the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister and for all members across, I have sent a copy of the New Democratic Party's "Alternatives to the GST", in both official languages, to the Prime Minister. I should be happy to do so to all of those Liberal members who are looking for an alternative to the goods and services tax as well as to the government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: Let me also say that I am sure the country will remain transfixed as we await the truth from the Prime Minister about where our tax dollars are really being spent.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister confirm that with just one tax break, that is the 80 per cent deduction for business meals and entertainment, the government is losing revenue of approximately $1 billion per year and will he agree that this deduction should be eliminated before children, seniors and other Canadians are asked to pay 7 per cent on every cookie and muffin they eat and movie that they see?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, both the Prime Minister and I are aware of the proposals that the New Democratic Party have put up. They are not realistic proposals, though. They—

Mr. Riis: Explain yourself.

Mr. de Jong: You think yours is?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If the hon. members at that end of the House would like me to explain why I do not think they are realistic proposals, I would be happy to do so.

Mr. Riis: Where is the minimum corporate tax, Mike?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Well, the hon. member does not want to learn about the nature of the proposals and why they do not work.—

• (1430)

The essence of the proposal is to tax the corporations in a major way. This can be done, but I think if the hon. member is realistic and reasonable in her assessment she will see that by doing the things the New Democratic Party would have us do in taxation of corporations, we would drive a good deal of corporate investment out of Canada, creating jobs—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. minister is getting well into debate.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. When the Minister of Finance introduced his tax reform proposal in 1987, he promised that all corporations would pay their fair share of income tax. Is the government prepared to introduce a minimum 20 per cent tax, on corporations like the United States, so that all profitable businesses will pay their fair share of income tax?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and her colleagues have raised the question of a minimum tax for corporations on a number of occasions in the past.

The point the hon. member misses when she makes this proposal—and it is a very important point—is that those corporations which are profitable today and are not paying tax are corporations that have lost money in previous years. They may also be corporations that are a conduit for dividend payments, so that a minimum tax of the kind she is proposing would result in double or triple taxation of corporations. I do not believe this is a fair way of dealing with it.

The effect of what she would propose is that a number of small companies in communities right across the country would be hit with tax, would not survive and we would see jobs lost.

The other point which I should also make is that there are about 3,500 companies that pay the large corporations tax. She and her colleagues talk about 90,000 corporations that are not paying tax. Therefore, there are a very large number of those corporations that she would hit that are small businesses. This is not the way we believe the corporate tax system should be structured.

MINE CLOSINGS

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, in northern Ontario first we had the 15 per cent surtax on softwood lumber. Second, we had the cut-back in VIA Rail and Air Canada service. Third, we have had mines closing one after the other. We have had Virginia Town. We have had Kirkland Lake. We have had Cobalt. We have had Temagami, and now we have Elliot Lake. These shutdowns are nothing short of disastrous.

Are these places going to become the Schefferville of northern Ontario? What is the government doing right now? What is it prepared to do right now to create jobs, not retrain but to create jobs? The people of northern Ontario want to work.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put her question.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I guess I am going to have to make up their minds. The hon. minister.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, let me answer the question although the hon. member for Temiscaming knows these facts as well. The question is very pertinent.

First of all let me tell the hon. member about Elliot Lake. The FEDNOR program under the federal government in the last year has put 10 different projects into Elliot Lake. We are redoubling our efforts there.

There are 40 other projects for the Algoma region. Kirkland Lake, the whole Temiscaming area which the hon. member represents, has had over 34 different projects announced there in the last year and a half. Just last week we announced the third biggest project under FEDNOR. We are redoubling our efforts under FEDNOR to target those two regions, and we are very proud of what we have been able to accomplish so far.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a feeling that maybe we should send government members some press releases. They are not aware of what is going on in our country.

Would the minister get real? FEDNOR just is not enough. CEIP is not working. Most of the grants in northern Ontario are going to tourism, and we know what the GST is going to do to tourism in northern Ontario. It will be gone.

What is the minister going to do today? What statement is he going to make at three o'clock, right now? Tell the people of northern Ontario what you are going to do.

You are going to say to them: "Retrain them". Retrain them to do what?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put her question.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member wants a mega-answer to a specific region in northern Ontario. What is developing is a whole series of initiatives that the government is taking in concert with the province of Ontario in a number of areas.

In addition to FEDNOR, we have the Native Economic Development Program, now the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Program, which is putting projects into northern Ontario at the rate of about 20 or 30 a year in those particular regions, plus tourism.

As we know the GST is going to lower the cost of operating a tourist establishment by 3 per cent to 4 per cent. That is a new dividend for them. Plus we have a series of joint agreements on tourism that have already helped them.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I would like to direct a question to my good friend, the Deputy Prime Minister, who I am sure will agree that the Prime Minister last week put on a fairly shameful display when he tried to blame fishermen for the current fisheries problems.

The Deputy Prime Minister may know that there is only one—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Simmons: They cannot take the truth. My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who knows that the only villain in this, domestically speaking, is the Prime Minister for trying to blame the fishermen in the first place.

My question is this: Can he tell us—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: This House can of course take a lot of latitude in questions, but pejorative questions are going to invite that kind of response. The hon. member will put his question directly.

Mr. Simmons: Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether he sees foreign overfishing as a problem?

If so, what is the government doing about it? Are we making any progress, or has he thrown up his hands like his friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, did last week who said: "There is nothing we can do. We have got to let the Spanish and Portuguese take all our fish"?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has put on the record so many—I cannot say falsehoods because the rules do not allow me—inaccurate statements that I do not know where to begin.

The Prime Minister did not blame fishermen, and the government certainly has not suggested there is nothing we can do about foreign overfishing. Obviously foreign overfishing is a contributing factor to a very serious problem facing the fishing industry and also, as importantly, facing the many individuals and businesses which depend upon the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada to survive.

What can we do about it? We have already had some movement from the European community; not enough but some. We are pressing for more. The Prime Minister has been in touch with President Delors. Delors has written a response that is more forthcoming than we had expected before. The Prime Minister has indicated that he is prepared to meet with Delors.

The Community Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Marin, has agreed to come to Canada in the next several weeks to talk to Canadians about what we can do to have a more effective regime with respect to foreign overfishing. We are going to follow that up. We are going to follow up every reasonable lead we can to ensure that we solve that part of the problem and others that are creating so much distress in Atlantic Canada.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Now the minister talks about falsehoods. I ask him, when he gets up the second time—

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. The hon. member has taken some time in his first question. There are other hon. members who are waiting to be heard. I ask the hon. member to direct his question and to do it quickly.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can tell the House what specific progress there has been. He keeps talking about some movement. I ask him: Does he suggest to the House that the Europeans plan to catch four times as much fish as the quota allows? Is that what he is calling progress?

Would he also indicate while he is on his feet if he is going to increase the monitoring? There is one boat out there trying to chase down all those foreigners. Is he going to do something about that?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as a representative of an Atlantic constituency which involves the fishing industry and industries affected by it, I assume the hon. member has been following the announcements that have been made by the European Community.

He will know that there were recommendations made to the community with regard to the amount of fish they would take in waters in the high seas where there is a dispute about the applicability of the NAFO quotas. He will know that they have come closer to our view with respect to some stocks than they had before. He will know that they have not come—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Hon. members opposite who were part of a government that gave away quotas to foreign fishermen that showed the basis of the problems that our industry now faces are—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: You're lying now. That's a falsehood.

JUSTICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the Donald Marshall inquiry has found out what this government has been told for years, that the Canadian justice system is racially biased against native Indians and that there is an urgent and pressing need for change.

The inquiry recommends a native court system for Nova Scotia, a native justice institute, a tripartite forum to resolve outstanding issues between the Micmacs and the governments and a system of native court workers.

Will the Minister of Justice start consultations now, not only with the government officials he has consulted in the past but also with native groups that are suffering these injustices, in order to implement the recommendations of the Marshall inquiry?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the federal government welcomed the results of the Marshall inquiry as a very legitimate effort to review a problem in this country.

The provincial government has asked for I believe a week to 10 days to review the findings of the commission. We intend to take a relative amount of time in order to apprise ourselves of all the recommendations in an effort to review the matter and come up with the best solutions that we can as a government to integrate our solutions with theirs and find whatever answers we can to this problem.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, given the increasing manifestations of racism that we are beginning to see with increasing rapidity around the country, and given the concern about the delay that has been taking place in the Solicitor General's office with respect to changing uniforms in order to accommodate visible minorities in the police force, will the Solicitor General implement recommendation No. 28 of the Marshall inquiry report which calls for immediate recruitment and immediate hiring of native RCMP officers?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we have had a committee for some time now in the RCMP which is busy speeding up the recruitment process for minority groups across Canada. The system is working well. We have been able to attract an increasing number of people from various ethnic groups, including Canadian native groups. I think it all takes time. The important thing is that we have a system that works, and so far, we have every reason to be satisfied about the increasing number of people from various ethnic groups who have joined the RCMP. This should be a source of great satisfaction for everyone.

JUSTICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Justice and it is also about the Marshall inquiry.

In the answer the minister just gave he made it clear that as far as the federal government was concerned they were going to wait for the province to react to the Marshall report before doing anything. I would like to ask him to reconsider that.

The federal government has a Minister of Justice and this minister is the Minister of Justice. I would like to ask him what steps we can look to the Government of Canada to take in the light of the findings of the Marshall inquiry about the extent to which racism underlies the system of criminal justice in Canada for which he has the major responsibility as Minister of Justice.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear that I am going to correct the incorrect impression that my hon. friend left. I made it very clear that this government and this minister is going to read the report before we react. We will read it. We will consider it. We will react.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am looking forward, then, to the minister reading the report. I would like to ask him about federal government policies.

Is the minister prepared to recognize the extent to which racism denies fair treatment to members of minority groups? Is he prepared to promote and achieve a workable native justice system? Will he undertake today to review the procedures of the federal agencies which have been criticized by the report? Also, will he in general use the occasion of this sad report to provide some leadership in moving the system of criminal justice of Canada forward?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we could start with a little history and remind my friend that these problems took place while his party was in power. Let us just start with that.

I would hope that now he will join with this government which has appointed native people and increased our efforts in this area. I would hope that now the Liberal Party will join with us in eliminating this kind of discrimination.

YOUTH

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, after turning its back on Canada's elderly, unemployed and low-income families, as well as Atlantic fishermen, the government is now turning its back on our country's students.

The government intends to reduce by nearly $52 million the assistance it had promised to provide to create summer jobs for students.

My question is for the minister responsible for youth. With a recession that seems imminent, how can the minister justify this kind of drastic cut?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, there has been no announcement as yet on what the program will be in the summer. I will be making an announcement on that fairly shortly, and I would suggest that he wait to see what it contains.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I see that the minister is not denying those cuts at all. In fact she is prolonging the agony and sowing mistruths out there. As far as I am concerned, when we look at the policy of this government it is intentionally leaking information.

How can the minister stand in her place and claim that her programs are helping students, while on the other hand her government is slashing $7 billion on transfer payments to post-secondary education, is imposing a 3 per cent administration fee on student loan applications and wants to apply a GST on books and all learning materials?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that the youth unemployment has fallen by 6.6 per cent since this government was in office, so we must be doing something right.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. McDougall: In terms of the Challenge program and the other things for which I have assumed responsibility, the hon. member will just have to wait for the policy to see what it is going to entail.

I would remind him of the very fine work that this government has done with regard to the pilot project with students staying in school. It is a very important part of the thrust of what we must do for our young people.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of Mr. Richard Nerysoo, Speaker of the Northwest Territories Legislative Assembly.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. I do not know why democracy comes with such a high price tag for some people.

The minister has established seven action groups to discuss and establish agricultural policy for the future. He is to be commended for inviting the farm groups to be part of this discussion.

However, although the farm groups have been invited, they have been invited to participate only if they pay their own way. These costs could range from $5,000 up to $30,000, depending on what the groups are going to discuss. Did the minister make the cost so high to eliminate some of the farm groups? How can he justify this cost of devising policy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, of course we are interested in the views of all farmers and farm organizations. Generally, the farmers' views are heard through the auspices of their respective organizations. They have been involved in the process up until now. They have been involved in the national conference that took place. They will be involved in the various task forces and action groups that we have established.

We have no intention of eliminating anyone. I would suspect that there will be the opportunity for these groups to meet in the various regions of the country. We will do everything that we can to facilitate their being involved at the lowest possible cost to them.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers Union, and other groups of that calibre feel that they will not be able to take part and be at the table in these groups if they are not given some assistance.

Could the minister give the criteria by which he eliminates some groups and pays for the expenses of other groups if they appear or are part of the discussion?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are not eliminating any group. We want to hear from every group and every individual farmer, either through telephone or through letter.

The fact of the matter is that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture is a national organization. The National Farmers Union is a national farm organization. I meet with them on a regular basis. My deputies and other officials meet with them on a regular basis. I will be speaking at the Canadian Federation of Agriculture annual meeting in Halifax next month.

Mr. Hovdebo: Can I be at the table?

Mr. Mazankowski: The door is wide open.

The hon. member asks: Can he be at the table? Our door is always open. As the hon. member knows, even if the hon. member has something constructive to offer he can come into my office and see me any time.

AIR SAFETY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Transport. It concerns the Gander air crash of December 12, 1985.

Yesterday new information came to light concerning this tragedy, as the minister will know. This information says, and I quote: "that the plan was carrying a member of a clandestine Delta team force that had been bloodied in a failed attempt to free U.S. hostages".

Would the minister explain to this House why two U.S. private investigators came up with this vital information when the minister's own government officials and the Canadian Aviation Safety Board failed to do so after four years of investigating? What is the reason we did not get that information before?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the investigation is being conducted in the United States at this point in time.

Mr. Justice Estey, a well known and well respected former judge of the Supreme Court, has reviewed the Gander crash here and all the documents that went it. We have followed his representation to us that no further investigation was necessary.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the minister should know a little better than that. She should know that the judge in question only reviewed the existing information and was not permitted to review any additional information. I was not even permitted to provide him with the information that I had.

[Translation]

I would now like to ask the minister a supplementary question. With these new developments, in light of these new facts, is the Conservative government opposite now prepared to set up a royal commission of inquiry as we have been asking for four years? Yes or no? If not, why not?

[English]

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): No, Mr. Speaker, we will not.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In light of the report on CBC News World today that the plane which crashed earlier near Inuvik had exploded in mid-air, and in light of the fact that National Defence had not confirmed whether the pilot was dead, would the minister inform the House as to the fate of the pilot, as reported by CBC News World?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to an earlier question, I informed the House that there had been the loss of a CF-18 operating from an FOL in Inuvik. I cannot confirm the outcome of that crash or the fate of the pilot at this time.

As the hon. member knows the area is very difficult. It is very difficult to search because of lack of light. We cannot inform the House, unfortunately, as to the outcome. We can only hope it has been successful.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, in light of this accident, in light of the gradual easing of the global cold war and in light of the very strong northern opposition to cruise missile testing, will the minister reconsider and cancel cruise missile testing?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the agreement under which Canada allows for the testing of the ACM-86B is an agreement that was signed and supported by the previous administration—and he is a member of that party at this time—and supported by this administration.

I believe it is an important part of the defence of North America. We are part of an alliance.

Mr. Benjamin: The defence of missiles.

Mr. McKnight: The Leader of the New Democratic Party asked a very important question about the concern for a pilot and about concern for an aircraft. I am sure her colleagues would like me to be able to answer the hon. member.

No, at this time, the testing will take place. The testing is part of the contribution that Canada can make to security for North America. I would suggest to the hon. member that what we see taking place now in Europe is part of the reason for NATO to exist. NATO will continue to exist and Canada will exist as a part of NATO.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. On Friday, the minister made a first tentative step toward pay equity in the Public Service.

Ever since the Public Service was established women have been unfairly paid. If the government really proposes to rectify this injustice, why then is it paying these women back only about one-quarter of what is actually owed to them?

If this government were really committed to the concept of pay equity, it would do better than two bits on the dollar.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the announcement I made on Friday was based on the results of a joint union-management study that has been ongoing now for five years. The methodology that was retained for use in this study is methodology that is defensible and recommended by outside experts, reviewed by consultants retained by the joint union-management committee and reviewed by the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

All I can to my hon. colleague is that we stand by the numbers we have put out. We believe this is a very important step in achieving equal pay for work of equal value and that people who have been discriminated against unfairly are now finally getting recognition from this government.

• (1500)

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the Human Rights Commissioner has already indicated that this proposal certainly in no way really addresses the issue of pay equity in the Public Service.

Studies have shown that women in female-dominated occupations are due about $1.2 billion in retroactive payments, not $317 million as proposed by the government. Women are owed $200 million in equalization payments, not $76 million. This is money which these women have earned over the past five years, money that has not been paid to them by this federal government. This is money that men have been getting for the same work over the same period of time.

When is the government going to pay these women the money that they have already earned and the money that they deserve? When will this government truly implement fair pay equity for women in the Public Service?

[Translation]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, to answer the question, I would like to quote an editorial published in Le Droit. It says: "The Public Service Alliance of Canada can keep on shouting murder, the retroactive salary adjustments of $317 million for 75,000 federal public servants announced on Friday by the President of the Treasury Board are an important victory for the principle of pay equity for federal employees." The editorial continues: "They are a model and a basis for negotiation not only at the federal level but also at the provincial level and even in the private sector, where in most cases pay equity remains only a fine principle which is still not honoured in practice."

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the editorial very well expresses this government's commitment to pay equity, not only in the federal public service but throughout the country.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: In view of matters that are taking place a little later on this afternoon I want to announce that there will be shuttle buses provided for members from the west door of the Centre Block commencing at 1745 hours and continuing through to 2100 hours. If there is need for any further information I ask that hon. members phone my office.

POINT OF ORDER

WAYS AND MEANS MOTION—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: There is agreement in the House, I understand, that I render a judgment now on a point of order raised by the hon. member for Kamloops a few days ago rather than wait until the completion of Routine Proceedings. I am prepared to do that.

On January 24, 1990, the hon. member for Kamloops rose on a point of order to contest the procedural acceptability of a Ways and Means motion in which there had been concurrence the previous day. While the Chair allowed the bill, which was based on this motion, to be introduced and read a first time, I indicated to members at the time that I would not allow second reading debate on the bill to begin until the procedural arguments raised by the hon. member for Kamloops had been considered and a decision rendered. I am now ready to rule on this matter.

Before entering into the case itself, I would like to address a technicality on the timing of the member's point of order. The member for Kamloops explained that he did not raise his point of order on January 23 because Standing Order 83(3) states, "a motion to concur in" a ways and means motion "shall be forthwith decided without debate or amendment".

The Chair would like to point out that the practice and rules of the House would not preclude a member from raising a procedural objection to the admissibility of a Ways and Means motion when it is called.

Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, citation 235, states:

> Any Member is entitled, even bound, to bring to the Speaker's immediate notice any instance of what he considers a breach of order—He should do so as soon as he perceives an irregularity in the proceedings which are engaging the attention of the House.

The Chair simply wants to point out the difference between the restriction against debate on the motion of concurrence and the raising of a point of order. I am quick to point out that while I have made these remarks in the interests of clarification, it makes no difference to the ruling I will make and in no way was the hon. member for Kamloops prejudiced against putting his point of order and arguing the matter. In short, the member could have raised his procedural arguments on January 23 but could not have debated the subject matter of the motion.

[Translation]

Let me now proceed to render my decision. On January 24, the hon. member for Kamloops pointed out that a phrase in the motion of ways and means moved by the Minister of Finance referred to a document which had not been tabled in the House of Commons. Specifically, the importnt passage read:

[English]

> That a tax—be imposed after 1990 under the Excise Tax Act at the rate of 7 per cent—as set out in the document entitled "The Goods and Services Tax" tabled in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance on December 19, 1989 and "The Goods and Services Tax Technical Paper" issued by the Minister of Finance on August 8, 1989.

[Translation]

It is the second document referred to in the motion which at that time had not been tabled in the House.

[English]

The member for Kamloops claimed that a tax bill had been founded in part on a document released through the press and not tabled in the House. And this, he contends, challenges the age-old practice that money bills must originate in the House. Furthermore, he asks whether amendments can now be proposed to the bill increasing the tax to 9 per cent since the technical paper referred to in the motion outlined a plan for a 9 per cent tax.

[Translation]

The Chair acknowledges that these are serious questions worthy of careful consideration and a full explanation.

[English]

Before proceeding, it might be appropriate to explain briefly the significance of the Ways and Means motion, especially to our listening audience, but I suspect sometimes it might be of great help also to hon. members.

Our parliamentary procedures are based on the premise that before a government imposes any new tax, or before it seeks to continue any expiring tax, or before it increases the rate or scope of an existing tax, the government must table a notice of a Ways and Means motion in the House.

"Ways and Means" is the expression used to describe the process by which the government obtains the resources necessary to meet its expenses. In other words, how it raises taxes. Therefore, our practice requires that a notice of a motion outlining the proposed changes in taxation law be tabled in the House and that this motion be adopted in priority to first reading of a tax bill.

This motion of Ways and Means does not have to be identical to the subsequent taxation bill. In some cases, this motion is almost a word-for-word version of the subsequent bill, but in other cases it may be simply a one-paragraph statement generally explaining the proposed changes.

Hon. Members can be forgiven if sometimes they are in a state of perplexity as to just what exactly is appropriate to include or to leave out of a Ways and Means motion because there has been a very great variety of forms, wording and structure of Ways and Means motions over the many years of the history of our Parliament.

In some cases this motion is almost a word-for-word version of the subsequent bill, as I have said, but in other cases it may be simply a one-paragraph statement generally explaining the proposed changes. Our Standing Orders specify that the bill must be, and I quote, "based on the provisions" of the Ways and Means motion. Many of my predecessors have explained in rulings that the words "based on" do not mean "identical to".

I would now like to return to the case presently before us.

When the member for Kamloops argued that the ways and means motion contains reference to a document not tabled in the House, he raised a number of important issues. First, the Chair has been asked to pronounce on whether it is proper for a ways and means motion to refer to a document not tabled in the House.

[English]

In considering whether a Ways and Means motion should only refer to documents tabled in the House, the argument appears to hinge on whether the House and members had access to the documents and that these documents were public in nature. The need for such access is obvious. However, I hasten to add that there is nothing in our Standing Orders or in our practice to restrict all references in Ways and Means motions solely to documents tabled in the House.

• (1510)

The particular document in question, the technical paper issued on August 8, 1989, has an interesting history. As the Minister of Finance himself pointed out on January 25, 1990, the technical paper was the subject of a self-initiated committee study which resulted in the presentation of a report to the House on November 27, 1989. This technical paper was also the subject of a supply motion moved by the member for Yorkton—Melville on October 12, 1989, and I quote from page 4578 of Hansard where the member, when he commenced debate on the part of the New Democratic Party, said:

> I rise today to ask the House to reject this proposal in the technical paper on the goods and services tax.

He was there referring to the technical paper which I have just mentioned.

There is ample evidence that this particular document was well known in parliamentary circles and that copies were readily available to members from the distribution office. Therefore, in terms of members' access to this paper, the Chair must conclude that there is no problem. Furthermore, in making his argument on Thursday, January 25, the minister offered to table the August 8 technical paper and, indeed, did so on Friday, January 26.

On strictly procedural grounds, I wish to repeat again there is no requirement that motions only refer to documents tabled in the House. Unless required by statute or our own Standing Orders, documents are tabled in the House as a courtesy for information purposes.

Far more problematic to the Chair is the ancillary question raised by the hon. member for Kamloops concerning the possibility of amendments to the bill based on the Ways and Means motion. This turns, of course, on the relationship between the motion and the taxation bill. The member argues that the motion imposes an uncertain scope around the goods and services tax bill. Specifically, he points to the contradiction between the 9 per cent tax as outlined in the technical paper and the 7 per cent tax as set down in the December, 1989 document and the motion.

In the event that hon. members or the public are wondering how this contradiction could be there, it is clearly there because the technical paper was written and made public some time ago and, of course, mentioned 9 per cent and the December document reflected changes in government policy. That is why the document refers to a 7 per cent tax.

On the strict matter of the rate itself, I should immediately say that the specific terms of the motion refer to a 7 per cent tax. When I say "the specific terms of the motion", I am talking about the the specific terms of the Ways and Means motion which refer only to a 7 per cent tax and the bill and any proposed amendments would therefore have to be limited to that rate as an upper limit.

On January 25, 1990, the hon. Minister of Finance also spoke to this point of order. He stated that the reference in the Ways and Means motion to the August 1989 technical paper—that is the one that spoke about 9 per cent, the first one—and the December 1989 document tabled in the House had been made to be, in his words, "helpful". As he explained on page 7470 of Hansard, and I quote the minister:

> In short, we made reference to the August technical paper as an historical milestone of the GST policy development process in an effort to be helpful to members of this House—In closing, I would again submit that the Ways and Means motion tabled on Monday of this week stands on its own in providing the scope and the legal authority for the GST legislation, with or without the reference to the August technical paper that my hon. colleague has referred to.

[Translation]

The Chair will accept the explanation given by the Hon. Minister that the reference to the documents in the ways and means motion is peripheral to the expression of the financial initiative of the governement.

[English]

There would be very real difficulties in basing a tax bill on documents which were part of a consultative process, not least of all because those documents are not congruent one with the other. Each of the documents details different areas of concern on the general issue of the goods and services tax.

I must say in passing that I and others have examined both of these documents. They have been reviewed very carefully by the Chair in the preparation of this judgment.

In terms of proposing future amendments based on these documents, the Chair could be left in the unenviable position of reconciling the contradictions in these documents, trying to determine what constitutes the four corners of the bill and the scope of the intended tax.

I think hon. members, and I am sure the minister, would agree that this would have been an intolerable procedural situation and one causing the Chair and the House some considerable difficulty.

[Translation]

In this regard, the Chair is reminded of a statement made by one of his predecessors, Speaker Jerome, when he had to decide on the relationship between a ways and means motion and the subsequent bill. On December 18, 1974, Speaker Jerome said:

[English]

> —the terms of the Ways and Means motion are a carefully prepared expression of the financial initiative of the Crown and frequent departures from them can only invite deterioration of that most important power.

As presently worded and distanced from the August and December technical documents, the Ways and Means motion declares simply that a goods and services tax will be implemented after 1990, calculated at a rate of 7 per cent:

a) of the value of the consideration in respect of taxable supplies, on recipients of such supplies made in Canada;

b) of the aggregate of the duty paid value of the goods and any excise tax imposed under the Excise Tax Act in respect of imported goods, on every person who imports goods into Canada; and

c) of the value of the consideration in respect of taxable supplies, other than goods, imported into Canada, on recipients resident in Canada.

I think it should be noted that, in short, this particular Ways and Means motion presents a very broad statement of the financial initiative of the government vis-a-vis the goods and services tax and so would appear to permit considerable scope for amendments to the bill within, of course, the 7 per cent rate ceiling.

The terms of the motion itself which I have just outlined must serve as a beacon to guide members in drafting any amendments. Consequently, in view of the minister's explanation to the House that the motion stands on its own and does not derive any authority from documents previously issued by the government, the Chair concludes that Bill C-62, which is based on the Ways and Means motion concurred in on January 23, may now proceed for second reading.

I want to say in addition that the argument put forward by the hon. member for Kamloops was obviously extremely well researched and was very succinctly presented. I hope that hon. members will be satisfied that in this judgment we have dealt adequately with the matters raised.

I thank the hon. minister for assisting the Chair in the clarifications contained in his statements.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, during the heat of Question Period I and several of my colleagues heard my friend from Burin—St. George's say that I was lying. That is both untrue and unparliamentary and I wonder if he would take the opportunity to withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member responds, I want to assure the right hon. gentleman and other members that I did not hear that, but the matter is now between the two members. I am guided by their responses.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, certainly if I said anything which was unparliamentary I would withdraw it without any equivocation. I indicated to the right hon. gentleman that, as he had indicated that I uttered some falsehoods, I thought that in the same vein he might have done the same thing. I used the word "falsehoods" and proceeded to say that if I could call it something else I would. But if something was heard that was deemed to be unparliamentary, I withdraw without any qualification.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. Hon members will, of course, keep in mind that the enthusiasm which is sometimes engendered at Question Period can create problems for the Chair and, of course, problems for other members who are waiting to raise important matters and ministers who, no doubt, would want to respond to those matters. I do want to stress the importance of hon. members in these exchanges keeping in mind that their colleagues are also waiting to be heard. I thank hon. members.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8) I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government responses to 18 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Routine Proceedings

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I think you would find that there would be unanimous consent for the following motion to be put and voted upon without debate. I move:

That, immediately after the completion of Routine Proceedings, the House will proceed to Orders of the Day for debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-62; and

That, following the speech on the said motion by the Minister of Finance, further proceedings this day on the said motion and any amendment thereto be as follows and in this sequence:

—a speech (without time limit) by both of the Leader or designated spokesperson of each of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party;

—a period of one hour for questions and comment, directed to the Minister of Finance, along the format used in Question Period;

—a deemed adjournment of debate, without further debate or question put, on the said motion and any amendment thereto;

—a deemed adjournment of the House until eleven o'clock a.m., Tuesday, January 30, 1990, without further debate or question put on such motion for adjournment; —Provided that, for the remainder of this day, no dilatory motion shall be receivable by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. government House Leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to miss this occasion to do my duty and present to this House a petition which strongly opposes the government's intentions to impose upon Canadians this very unjust and unfair GST at 7 per cent.

These people believe strongly that the imposition of the 7 per cent tax will be unfair to Canadians, that it will impose hardship on low and middle-income Canadians and that the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small business. They therefore strongly oppose the GST which is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit all of us not only with higher taxes but higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

These people humbly pray and call upon parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I, too, have the honour of tabling petitions on behalf of the people of Parkdale—High Park. The petitioners are not fooled by the government's proposed reduction of the GST to 7 per cent from 9 per cent. It is still an increase from 0 per cent to 7 per cent on many items which are not taxed now. The petitioners call upon this House and the government to scrap the proposed goods and services tax at whatever rate.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have additional petitions from Prince Edward—Hastings to add more names to the thousands I have already tabled in the House of constituents in my riding who are violently opposed to the goods and services tax that the government seems bent on legislating.

[Translation]

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting to the House two petitions addressed to the Minister of Finance which concern the Report of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

The petitions are from Mattice and Valrita, and your petitioners ask the Minister of Finance to unconditionally reject the report's recommendation that this program be abolished.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table today a petition rejecting the recommendation made by the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Your petitioners, representing the isolated community of Lebel-sur-Quévillon in Abitibi, are concerned about the report's recommendations that will cause a number of workers to be laid off. They believe the federal government refuses to consider the fact that life in the North is harsh, isolated and expensive.

Mr. Speaker, according to the disparity index for the 84 isolated communities designated by the Government of Quebec in October 1989, Lebel-sur-Quévillon ranks seventieth in Quebec.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to rise under Standing Order 36 and present petitions signed by many people who are strongly opposed to the government's goods and services tax. They feel that this new tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians, that it will create an onerous burden on small business and that not only will it create higher taxes but higher inflation, higher interest and higher unemployment. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under Standing Order 36. I have signatures here that add up to 30 but all in all I have close to 9,000 petitioners who are against the goods and services tax. These people note that in the last five years personal income tax collection has gone from $39 billion to $59 billion practically and that represents a very large increase in personal income tax, close to 90 per cent.

The petitioners are concerned about the 31 new tax increases. They are concerned that the government in power has taken the manufacturers' sales tax up to 13.5 per cent over stages from 9 per cent. They are concerned about the effect this will have on low and middle-income families. They are concerned about the effect it is going to have on small business and the extra administration that will be involved and, indeed, the wherewithal for some of the businesses, in fact most of the businesses in my riding to cope with this. Those who are so close to the margin are scared out of their minds.

These people humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject this proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition which I would like to table pursuant to Standing Order 36 of the House of Commons. This petition is signed by a number of Canadians who are opposed to the government's plan to impose a goods and services tax, or a GST, which should properly be called a grief and suffering tax, at any per cent. These people are humbly praying—they really mean it—and calling upon Parliament and the Government of Canada to reject the goods and services tax at any per cent.

• (1530)

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, it is also my duty to present in the House a number of petitions from residents in my riding of Beauséjour. Your petitioners wish to express their opposition to the government's tax proposal and they humbly pray Parliament to reject said proposal.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 171 revised, 186, 191, 192, 193, 194, 199 and 200.

THE VOLUME OF WATER PER MONTH REMOVED FROM LAKE MICHIGAN THROUGH THE CHICAGO SHIP CANAL

Question No. 171—Mr. Milliken:

For (a) 1985 (b) 1986 (c) 1987 (d) 1988 (e) 1989 to date, what is the volume of water per month removed from Lake Michigan through the Chicago Ship Canal?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): The Chicago Diversion, initiated in 1848, removes water from Lake Michigan at Chicago for the purposes of domestic, sanitary, navigation and hydro-electric power in the Illinois Waterway. The waterway connects with the upper Mississippi River. Diversion prior to 1900 averaged about 500 cubic feet per second (cfs). Upon completion of the Sanitary and Ship Canal, diversions progressively increased to a maximum of about 10,000 cfs in 1928. Due to challenges from other states (mainly Wisconsin), there have been several U.S. Supreme Court decrees issued (1922, 1925, 1930 and 1967). The 1967 decree limited the diversion to an average of 3,200 cfs effective March 1, 1970. A 1980 court amendment allows the use of a 40-year period in calculating long-term average diversion for compliance. Lake Michigan is located entirely within the United States territory and is not considered as "boundary water" according to the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. However, it is connected to, and flows into Lake Huron and downstream, thus affecting the rest of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence River System. The present diversion rate of 3,200 cfs causes reductions in the flows in the Niagara River by 1.5 percent, and in the St. Lawrence River by 1.3 percent.

The 3,200 cfs is equivalent to 7.8 billion litres per day, or 1.7 billion imperial gallons per day.

With regard to the specific amounts of water diverted through the Chicago Diversion in each of the years and months requested, please see the attached tables.

CLOSURE OF CANADIAN FORCES BASE PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE

Question No. 191—Mr. Harvard:

1. Have the Department of National Defence's projections of a cost saving of $529 million over 15 years as a result of the closure of Canadian Forces Base Portage la Prairie accounted for inflation or the time value of money and, if not, for what reason?

2. What is the net cost to the Treasury of closing CFB Portage, taking into account costs which will not be borne by DND but by other departments, such as the Department of Transport?

3. Has the government estimated the cost for the continued operation of CFB Portage and, if so, what is it?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Department of National Defence and the Department of Employment and Immigration as follows:

1. The time value of money has two components, changes in price levels or inflation, and opportunity cost or cost of capital. The total net savings for the CFB Portage la Prairie closure are a fifteen year total for the period 1989/90 through 2003/04 taking into account the impact of inflation. The figures have not been adjusted for the opportunity cost component, nor is such adjustment appropriate in the context of this internal reallocation of DND and federal government expenditure.

2. The total cost for the closing of Canadian Forces Base Portage la Prairie is $93,140, distributed as follows:

Industrial Adjustment Service ($25,000 used for an Economic opportunities Study	$30,000
Community Futures—Impact Study	$25,000
Project Coordination
Salaries	$22,000
Operations and Maintenance	$ 7,500
Office Rental	$ 8,640

These funds are part of Manitoba's normal regional allocation under the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

3. It is not clear under what scenario the question of the cost of continued operation of CFB Portage la Prairie is being posed. If none of the current activities are ceased or moved, then the cost of continued operation remains as it is now, and all forecast savings are lost. If the pilot training activities are removed as envisioned, then there is no longer a requirement for a base of any size, and any attempt to retain the facility would entail a waste of funds.

CFB PORTAGE

Question No. 192—Mr. Harvard:

1. What is the actual cost of (a) relocating personnel from CFB Portage to other military bases (b) the physical closing of CFB Portage (c) relocation, retraining and severance pay for civilians now employed at CFB Portage?

2. Does the government foresee a reduction in air force personnel equivalent to all positions being transferred from the closed base and, if not, will the expenses associated with some of the personnel be transferred elsewhere?

Hon. William Hunter McKnight (Minister of National Defence): 1. (a) The Regular Force manpower ceiling at CFB Portage is 499. The current manning level is 480 military personnel and is likely to remain at that level due to military personnel shortfalls. The average cost of relocating a military member is estimated to be $10,400. The total cost of relocating all personnel is $4,992,000. However, approximately 30 percent of military personnel would be moved to new assignments annually for service reasons. Thus, the relocation costs attributable directly to the closure of CFB Portage is $3,494,400.

(b) The costs of closing CFB Portage la Prairie are unknown at this time as it will depend upon the re-use of the facilities. Costs could range from a minimum if the entire site is taken over by another agency to a maximum should the site have to be totally demolished. It is anticipated that the costs will be near the lower end of the scale.

(c) The following costs are anticipated for civilian employees at CFB Portage:

relocation—$781,000;

retraining—$148,000 (includes tuition and travel); and severance pay—$434,000.

2. Of the 499 established positions at CFB Portage, 95 positions associated with the Flying Instructors School and the Basic Helicopter School will be transferred elsewhere. The remaining 404 positions will be eliminated, resulting in an equivalent reduction in air force personnel.

BASIC FLIGHT TRAINING FOR THE MILITARY

Question No. 193—Mr. Harvard:

1. Does the government support the contracting out of its basic flight training for the military and, if so, for what reasons?

2. Does the government consider private training more viable now than when it was tried in 1964-65 and, if so, for what reasons?

3. Did the government state that only 142 pilots are trained per year at CFB Portage and, if so, was this statement correct and, if not (a) what is the correct number (b) what number of the figures on which the decision was based were calculated using the incorrect number?

Hon. William Hunter McKnight (Minister of National Defence): 1. The government supports in principle the contracting out of some elements of military flight training as a measure which has the potential to contribute to the governemnt-wide effort to reduce the deficit. In this respect, the Department of National Defence is currently investigating the feasibility of contracting out its Primary Flying Training to coincide with the scheduled closure of Canadian Forces Base Portage la Prairie in 1992. Responses to the Department's Solicitation of Interest have reflected a satisfactory level of interest and potential and DND officials are now addressing how best to structure such a contractual arrangement. The results of these deliberations will be reflected in the Request for Proposal scheduled for release early in the summer of 1990.

2. The Department of National Defence has sponsored certain civilian-based flying activities by military aviators in the past as continuation flying programs. The Department is not aware of any such programs which constituted or substituted for basic flight training. The viability of contracting out elements of military flight ttraining at this time will be confirmed during the evaluation of the Request for Proposal.

3(a) No, the government has not stated that only 142 pilots are trained per year at CFB Portage la Prairie. A study conducted in 1988 reflects that 145 pilots graduated from the Primary Flying School. In addition to this, some 44 helicopter pilots graduate each year, and a further number (which varies annually) undertake training at the Flight Instructor School at CFB Portage la Prairie. The total number of candidates entering pilot training could be nearly double these figures.

(b) Calculations for the contracting out of Primary Flying Training were based on a range from 145 to 280. These figures were not used directly in the calculation of savings to accrue from the closing of CFB Portage la Prairie.

FLIGHT TRAINING ESTABLISHMENTS

Question No. 194—Mr. Harvard:

1. Has the government changed the reasons it used in locating flight training establishments and, if so (a) what are the new reasons (b) is CFB Portage judged unsuitable according to the new criteria and, if so, in what ways?

2. Has the government decided on the sites to which the remaining flight training schools will be relocated when CFB Portage is closed and, if so, to which locations and, if not, to what extent can it accurately project costs or personnel requirements?

Hon. William Hunter McKnight (Minister of National Defence): 1. The criteria used to select locations for flight training establishments have not changed. DND continues to look for geographical and meteorological characteristics which will ensure that such training is conducted in the most cost-effective manner possible. Canadian Forces Base Portage la Prairie remains quite suitable in this respect. In fact, please note that several respondents to the Solicitation of Interest have proposed locating their contracted facility on that site, in the context of an industrial park of which primariy flying training would be one of several activities. Nevertheless, there are other factors which might render other locales more cost-effective; a possibility which will be addressed during the Request for Proposal evaluation.

2. The Department is evaluating other Canadian Forces Bases, including those at Edmonton, Moose Jaw and Winnipeg, as possible relocation sites for the remaining flight training schools. Detailed cost and personnel data are not expected to be available until the first quarter of 1990.

LEGISLATION TO COMMIT FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS TO REINVEST A SIGNIFICANT PERCENTAGE OF STUMPAGE AND TAX REVENUE IN THE FOREST RESOURCE

Question No. 199—Mr. Gardiner:

Has the government taken any action to follow up on the recommendation of the 1988 1st Annual Progress Report on the National Forest Sector Strategy that legislation should be enacted committing federal and provincial governments to reinvesting a significant percentage of stumpage and tax revenue in the forest resource and, if so, what action has it taken?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): No legislation has been enacted to commit federal and provincial governments to reinvest a significant percentage of stumpage and tax revenue in the forest resource. No such legislation is envisaged to be enacted by any government.

However, it should be noted that on a national basis, provincial forestry expenditures exceeded the provincial forestry revenues collected during the last two fiscal years of 1987–88 and 1988–89, as identified in the table below:

PROVINCIAL BUDGET INFORMATION	FISCAL YEARS
	1987–88	1988–89
Forestry Expenditures for all provinces ($,000)	1,216,690	1,398,570
Forestry Revenues for all provinces ($,000)	1,120,700	1,009,100

FUNDING TO THE NORTHERN INTERIOR VEGETATION MANAGEMENT ASSOCIATION

Question No. 200—Mr. Gardiner:

Has the government provided funding to the Northern Interior Vegetation Management Association and, if so (a) what amount (b) is a departmental official responsible for receiving funding requests from the Association and, if so, which one (c) has the Association applied for funds for the fiscal year 1990–91 and, if so, in what amount (d) have any progress reports been filed with the government with respect to any spending?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): The federal government has provided funding to the Northern Interior Vegetation Management Association.

(a) The federal government has provided a total of $20,000 to the Northern Interior Vegetation Management Association through the federal component of the Canada-British Columbia Forest Resource Development Agreement (FRDA); $10,000 were provided in the 1988-89 fiscal year and $10,000 were provided in the 1989-90. In addition, the cost-shared research program of the FRDA funded a $7,500 project to support the association in collecting and collating information on vegetation management trials in the northern interior.

(b) The responsibility for funding requests rests with Dr. T. John Drew, Regional Director General, Forestry Canada, Pacific and Yukon Region. Funds provided to the Northern Interior Vegetation Management Association to date have been approved under the auspices of the Research and Demonstration component of the FRDA, and are associated with an aggressive program of forest research in the northern interior of British Columbia.

(c) The association has not applied for funding in the 1990-91 fiscal year.

(d) Funds provided to the association by the federal component of the FRDA were used for the formation and operation of the association, which distributes a quarterly newsletter to its members and to Forestry Canada. This newsletter lists the association's current and planned activities and usually includes a summary of expenditures. In addition, a detailed summary of expenditures and accomplishments/projections is provided at the regular meeting of the association's Advisory Council for comments and approval.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, if questions Nos. 178 and 198 could be made Orders for Returns, those returns will be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that questions Nos. 178 and 198 be deemed to have been made Orders for Returns?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

EMPLOYMENT OF VISIBLE ETHIC MINORITIES

Question No. 178—Ms. Mitchell:

For 1987, 1988 and for each month in 1989 to date, in the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, what were (a) the titles and pay grades of the (i) clerical and manual (ii) lower, middle and upper management occupational categories (b) the number and percentage of jobs held by visible ethnic minorities in clerical and manual positions in (i) permanent, temporary and acting capacities (ii) full-time and part-time capacities (c) the number and percentage of jobs held by visible ethnic minorities in lower, middle and upper management positions in (i) permanent, temporary and acting capacities (ii) full-time and part-time capacities (d) the turnover rate for each position covered by parts (b) and (c)?

Return tabled.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Question No. 198—Mr. St-Julien:

As of December 1, 1989, are there areas in Canada designated "isolated areas" under the tax benefits plan by which taxpayers are eligible to receive the tax deductions provided for in section 110.7 of the Income Tax Act and sections 7302 and 7304 of the Income Tax Regulations and, if so (a) which areas (b) since what time have they been designated "isolated areas" (c) in each case, what is the total amount of tax money refunded per year?

Return tabled.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

CLOSING OF MINES IN ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52, I wish to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of giving urgent consideration to a pressing matter, namely, the announced closing last Friday of the Quirke mine and the Panel mine owned by Rio Algom Mines in Elliot Lake, Ontario, which will result in the loss of some 1,600 jobs, or 70 per cent of the workforce of the company in that community. It will have a devastating impact on the community.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will give permission for an emergency debate on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Algoma has raised a matter of serious concern, especially to part of the country, and I think also to hon. members of this House.

However, I think perhaps the hon. member may be able to make representations in the coming days. In the meantime I do not think it is appropriate to accept the motion.

I thank the hon. member for raising the matter. It is an important matter.

ATLANTIC FISHERY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I also rise pursuant to Standing Order 52 to request permission to put down a motion to adjourn the House to discuss the matter of the deepening crisis in the Atlantic fishery. I am aware—

Mr. Speaker: My concern is that, for whatever reason, and the fault may lie with me, I do not seem to have any notice of the hon. member's application.

Can the hon. member help me with respect to the question of notice?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I wrote on January 25. I would be happy to furnish the Chair with a copy of the letter.

Mr. Speaker: If I understand, notice was given a day or so ago. I wonder if I could ask the hon. member under the circumstances if he could consider his position tonight and if he is so disposed perhaps give me notice in the morning when I can deal with the matter.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-62, an Act to Amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a strong sense of accomplishment that I stand today to open this debate on the goods and services tax, accomplishment because with this bill we have succeeded where no previous government has in putting together a comprehensive, balanced and fair reform of the federal sales tax system. This is indeed a milestone for Canada. With this bill we have finally moved from rhetoric to action in reforming our antiquated and seriously-flawed federal sales tax.

We are proposing to establish a federal sales tax system which will strengthen the economy and improve the fairness of the tax system. Canadians have been discussing, analysing and proposing alternatives to the existing federal sales tax for half a century. Royal commissions and committees have all documented the flaws and glaring inequities of our existing system.

The Rowell-Sirois commission in 1940, the Carter commission in 1966 and the Goodman committee in 1983 all concluded that our federal sales tax fails to serve the interests of our economy and of our people.

For half a century our industrialists, our entrepreneurs, our exporters and the workers they employ have had to compete with one hand tied behind their back. For half a century Canadians in every province, city and town have paid billions of dollars worth of federal sales tax without knowing it.

The tax system we have endured for the past 66 years has been hidden, fundamentally unfair and damaging to Canada's economic interests at home and abroad. It has cost Canadians many, many jobs.

Now, more than ever, it is time that we listen to the lessons of history. Now, more than ever, it is time for a federal tax system driven by a bold vision of the future and not by one mired in the inertia of the past.

When you look at what we have been doing in a broad way, our vision of Canada is a challenge to the bold. It is a vision of opportunity, fairness and compassion for Canadians and their families. It is a vision of strength, moderation and peace for Canadians through the international councils of the world. It is a vision of conservatism at its best, which is to preserve what is good and to leave a better quality of life to those who follow us in terms of both a higher standard of living and a healthier environment. Perhaps most important, it is a vision deeply rooted in reality and expressed through decisive action, not empty rhetoric. The key to achieving this vision is a strong, prosperous and dynamic economy. That is what our agenda for economic renewal is about.

It is a comprehensive plan, a plan that we have been following assiduously since November, 1984. Our initiatives in areas such as investment, international trade, privatization, competition policy, patents and copyright, deregulation, pension and income tax reform and the labour market development strategy are all designed to lay solid foundations for long-term sustainable growth and productive jobs—jobs for Canadians in a world where competition is unforgiving and change is fast becoming the only constant.

The goods and services tax is a vital component of our agenda to reform the economic structure of our economy. At a time when a new highly-competitive Europe is emerging and when Japan and several other nations of the Asia Pacific are occupying an increasingly large place in the landscape of trade and investment in the world, we cannot afford a tax system that punishes our domestic producers and our exporters and gives a cost advantage to their foreign competitors.

Helping our exporters to compete internationally was a major reason why we negotiated the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement. Removing the federal sales tax will make our exporters even more competitive, not only in the United States but in all the markets of the world.

Competitiveness is not just a matter of economic policy. It is also crucial to social policy objectives. There is a good reason for that. For a trading nation like Canada, we must be able to sell our goods and services around the world so that we can generate the wealth and resources required to pay for our social programs and services.

• (1540)

The problems with our existing sales tax have been well documented, progressively since 1940. Under the current system, the existing tax applies to sales of manufactured goods. As a result of that, a significant amount of tax is paid on the materials, plant production costs and equipment used in the production of all goods and services originating in this country, goods and services that every Canadian buys every day.

In fact, about one-half of the $18 billion in federal sales tax revenues currently comes from the taxation of business inputs, materials and supplies used in the production process. This also raises the cost of capital to our own producers, discouraging investment for modernization and expansion.

Because these taxes on business inputs do not apply to foreign producers, the ability of Canadian exporters to compete in global markets is hampered. Our analysis shows that the tax on business inputs often exceeds 10 per cent of the profit margin of our exporters.

Furthermore, the existing system taxes our own products more heavily than imported products—on average about one-third more. We are the only country in the world which has a tax system which favours imported products over domestic producers.

While Canadians have dithered over 50 years about how to change our self-destructive federal sales tax, 48 other countries have already opted for tax systems along the lines that we propose in the goods and services tax.

In today's highly integrated world economy, countries which rely on trade for their prosperity cannot allow their tax systems to get out of line with those of their trading partners. Canada is no exception. We must understand once and for all that Canada must compete on the world's terms because the world is not going to compete on Canada's terms.

Meeting successfully the challenges of the world economy means that we must, from time to time, make major structural improvements to our economy in areas such as taxation. To do that most effectively requires detailed and extensive consultation with Canadians. That is exactly what we have done in the process leading up to the presentation of the goods and services tax bill.

In November, 1984 we indicated that we had begun to study the possibility of replacing the current sales tax with a value-added sales tax system.

In October, 1986 the government set out basic guidelines for its approach to comprehensive tax reform; and in June of the following year we announced plans to replace the existing tax in a white paper on tax reform.

I announced plans to introduce the GST in last year's April budget, and provided detailed information on most aspects of the new system in the technical paper released last August. The technical paper that I tabled in August was followed up with the draft legislation which I presented to this House in October.

After releasing the technical paper in August, the government canvassed a wide range of views on virtually every aspect of the GST. We discussed our proposal with groups and individuals represented in every province and region of the country and virtually every sector of the economy.

Literally hundreds of groups and individuals have given us their views, shared their insights and explained their positions in detail on this issue.

I have travelled across the country meeting groups and individuals, participating in open-line shows, addressing gatherings of business people and other meetings in communities, large and small. What I have discovered time after time was that when the time was taken to explain the problems that we face, Canadians understood the issues. In fact, not only did they understand but they made valuable and constructive suggestions which have helped us to improve the package that is now before the House.

From the summer of 1987 until the spring of 1989 we undertook detailed discussions with the provinces about the feasibility of an integrated national sales tax. While it did not prove possible to reach agreement on such a national sales tax, these discussions contributed substantially to the federal government's elaboration and design of the goods and services tax.

As I indicated in December, I find the tone of the recent discussions we were having with the provinces most encouraging in helping us find ways that we can eliminate or minimize the compliance burden of the new tax on Canadian businesses, both large and small.

The House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance examined the technical paper proposals in detail and held extensive public hearings on the proposal. Under the very able leadership of its chairman, the committee gave individuals and representatives of a wide range or interest groups the opportunity to air their views in a formal and detailed way. The committee's report made a substantial contribution through its analysis and recommendations to the ultimate framing of the proposal contained in the goods and services tax bill.

Canadians spoke loud and clear, and we listened. Better still, we used the many constructive and useful suggestions that we received from Canadians to improve the proposal.

Canadians told us that the rate was too high and that they were concerned about the impact on inflation. We listened, and after some tough choices, we reduced the rate from 9 per cent to 7 per cent, and thus reduced the potential one-time inflationary impact to just a little over 1 per cent. At the same time we succeeded in maintaining the fundamental balance in equity among the various measures within the package, especially the protection that it provides to low and modest income Canadians.

Canadians told us to use greater spending restraint. The measures which the President of the Treasury Board announced in December were important steps in that direction. But, as he and I both indicated, we still have further work to do in that regard.

We have also acted to meet concerns expressed about the burden of complying with the GST. For example, we will provide a one-time transitional credit of up to $1,000 for small businesses.

In addition, we have exempted electronic point of sale and related inventory control equipment from the existing sales tax. This complements the 100 per cent capital cost allowance for this equipment which we announced in August. Together, these two measures will reduce the effective after-tax cost of this equipment by about 20 per cent.

Furthermore, we have also made a number of technical improvements designed to simplify the operation of the tax, to establish greater equity among competing businesses and to improve the operation of the tax in a number of sectors.

I know that nobody likes taxes. I understand that. Neither do I. But I know that most people feel uncomfortable when they must face significant change, and I understand that too. So, combining the two, major change and taxes, is bound to upset a lot of people, at least in the short term.

We know that changing the tax system, especially when it involves making previously hidden taxes visible, is not what most people would consider a fast track to popularity. Politically, the expedient thing would have been not to proceed with the GST—the expedient thing for the government, but the wrong thing for the country.

The goods and services tax will help our deficit reduction efforts and ensure that we can continue to afford the programs and services which Canadians value. It will strengthen our industries in a significant and direct way, because a central feature of the GST, the input tax credit, will allow them to compete free of tax in markets abroad and put them on an equal footing with imports in our own market.

Eliminating the existing tax will remove tax-induced distortions in the price of goods and services, and will lower the cost of capital to produce long-term economic benefits. The GST output will increase by close to 1.5 per cent, or about $9 billion a year. There will be gains throughout the economy, in all regions of the country.

We also expect the new system to lead to the creation of some 60,000 new jobs by as early as 1992. How quickly the economic benefits of sales tax reform are realized depends to a large extent on prices and wages. It is essential that savings from input tax credits and the elimination of the existing federal sales tax be passed on to consumers.

• (1550)

Competition will provide the most important incentive for firms to reduce prices. In addition to that, to help consumers, the government will establish an office to provide consumers with information prior to the implementation of the GST. In this way consumers will be able to find out what impact the GST is likely to have on the price of key goods and services.

I also want to take this opportunity today to encourage companies and unions to follow responsible and moderate approaches to price and wage decisions. Because if they do, the transition will be smooth and jobs will be gained as early as 1991.

As I said earlier, a major reason for introducing the GST is to improve the fairness of the tax system. We have achieved this through the refundable GST credit, a unique feature of this tax.

The credit reflects this government's firm commitment to maintaining a caring and compassionate society. The credit will be paid by cheque four times a year to some 8.7 million Canadian families and individuals. In fact, the first payment will be made at the end of December of this year so that Canadians with lower modest incomes will have the money in their pockets before the GST is implemented in January of 1991.

With the GST credit, three-quarters of families headed by seniors or single parents will have more after tax income than they do under the existing system.

Another benefit which few people have considered is that the GST will end the error of the hidden federal sales tax. Under the existing system any government can raise the rate of the federal sales tax without many Canadians noticing, but under the GST Canadians will not only know they are paying a federal sales tax, they will be very, very much aware of any change that any future government might want to make.

This greater visibility of the tax will make governments much more accountable to Canadians than ever before. In fact, the GST will be a more visible tax than the provincial sales taxes. The provincial sales tax today applies to many business inputs, such as building supplies, computers and telephones. The result is that about a third of provincial sales tax revenues are from these sources. As a result, the tax that you see is applied on a price which already includes a hidden provincial sales tax, but if that hidden tax were removed, the provincial tax rates would have to increase by about a third to a half. Those hidden taxes are removed in the GST system so that the 7 per cent that you see is all that you are paying.

The goods and services tax bill is more than a question of balance sheets and bottom lines. It is more than a simple matter of dollars and cents. Thanks to the refundable sales tax credit and the visibility of the tax, the GST will also make a substantial contribution to social justice and ongoing political accountability.

I believe that in the months following January 1, 1991 when the cut and thrust of partisan debate on this issue has calmed down, when the controversy has subsided, when Canadians can see our economy even more vibrant and growing, they will conclude, as I have, that this is the right policy for the right reasons at the right time.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, today we have not only the introduction of legislation for a new massive regressive federal sales tax, we also have the introduction of a new national guessing game.

The questions Canadians will put to themselves will be these. How long will it be that this new tax will stay at the rate of 7 per cent? How long will it be before the minister raises it to the 9 per cent he originally wanted, or to 10 per cent, 11 per cent, 12 per cent, 15 per cent?

My guess is that he will do that sooner rather than later. After all, this is the same minister who never ceased to call the existing manufacturers' sales tax a hidden killer of jobs. Yet this was the minister who, in five short years, silently raised that silent killer of jobs from a rate of 9 per cent to 10 per cent, 10 per cent to 11 per cent, 11 per cent to 12 per cent, and 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent.

So the guessing game begins. Even if we Canadians guess right, we lose, because we will all pay more. This is a no win situation for the Canadian people.

One of the finance minister's main arguments today—he makes it when he is attempting to respond to questions in the House—is that without this tax Canada just will not measure up. It will not measure up to dozens of other countries that have a similar tax. It is a case of "Me too! We have to go along. Since over 40 other countries have this tax, we Canadians should have one too".

The minister is deeply concerned that he will not be able to hold his head up at international conferences. Now that he is the chairman of the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund he wants to be one of the boys. He wants to have a similar tax. Never mind that our largest trading partner, the United States of America, does not have that tax. Never mind that the Japanese will be fighting an election, and are fighting an election, over the attempted imposition of a 3 per cent tax. He completely overlooks that.

The minister says that he wants to be one of the boys in Washington as he travels around now as the chairman of the interim committee of the International Monetary Fund. He wants his tax in his pocket. He wants a tax like the progressive economies he has cited. Let us take a look at some of these countries.

Uruguay has a tax like this. They brought it in at 14 per cent; it is now 21 per cent. The Ivory Coast brought it in at 8 per cent; it is now 25 per cent. He points to Sweden. Sweden brought it in at 11 per cent; now that tax is 23 per cent. Nigeria brought it in at 12 per cent; now it is 25 per cent.

I wish the Prime Minister were here. Ireland brought it in at 16 per cent; and now it is 22 per cent. Austria brought it in at 8 per cent; and now it is 20 per cent. This minister can hardly wait. He has two thin lines of drool down his chin. He can hardly wait to get this tax in and then raise it notch by notch at the expense of the Canadian people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, does the minister really think Canadians will have the impression they are out front with this new tax? The minister may think he has shown all these countries what he can do. However, they have only one sales tax, while Canada will be the only country in the world with two: a federal tax and a provincial tax, except in Alberta. Does the minister think he will be able to strut and swagger in international financial circles? I can tell him right now he will be laughed out of town. He will look silly because he will be the only minister with two taxes. How will he explain that to his colleagues around the table in Washington? This total anarchy, this administrative nightmare for Canadian business! With this double tax, some provinces will have a tax situtation similar to Uruguay's. Adding the federal tax to the provincial tax, Newfoundland will pay 19 per cent; New Brunswick, 18 per cent; and Nova Scotia, 17 per cent. Does the minister really think Canadians don't know he will do what all other countries have done with this tax, namely, raise it at the first opportunity? Canadians are not fools. The Minister's sales pitch is hollow, because every time the subject is mentioned, he absolutely and categorically refuses to exclude the possibility of an increase.

• (1600)

[English]

When you hear some of the arguments that he and his cabinet colleagues are making in order to sell this tax, you have to wonder what goes on at those long, protracted meetings in luxurious surroundings, those luxurious government retreats where ministers put on their cardigans and try to adopt the guise of thinkers.

I cannot resist the suggestion put to us by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Edmonton a couple of weeks ago. We offered to adjourn the debate the other day to hear him make his resignation speech. He is having some trouble with the Minister of Finance. At any rate, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was in Edmonton on January 10. We all know he is not good with numbers. We all know that a crucial moment in Canadian history he could not count. However, his contribution to this debate will be remembered for its creativity, if nothing else. He told his audience in Edmonton that Canadians should accept this new tax not for anything it will do for or against the country, but to set an example for the reform movement in eastern Europe.

Mr. Edwards: Read the speech, you might learn something.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I think the parliamentary secretary probably had the honour of introducing him. I did read the speech and I want to quote from the speech.

Mr. Edwards: Read it again.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Reading it once is about all I can stomach, but I am going to read it for the House of Commons. I will quote the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He rented the suit for the day so he is going to wear it for the day. He said: "For decades we have been telling the peoples of eastern Europe that our way is better, that democracy and capitalism work. What does this say to the people who have risked their lives in Romania and in Poland and in Czechoslovakia and people who are trying to bring through fundamental changes if we can't find the courage in this most remarkable of countries to move to a reform that everybody agrees needs to be accomplished?"

Those were the minister's words. I really do not think that the Romanians are watching our every move on this particular tax. I would not think that the people of Romania who have suffered under dictatorship for almost 50 years and who are wrestling with the worst oppressive dictatorship that this world has seen since the last war are really wondering whether or not we are going to pass this sales tax.

My friend, the member for Parkdale—High Park, and I had the great honour of meeting Lech Walesa the other day. I wonder if Lech is staying up nights wondering what is going to happen to this sales tax, or if we pass it here whether or not it is going to abort the movement for reform and democracy in Poland. I do not think so. I have got more faith in the Polish people.

What about the Czechs? Do you think every member of the Czechoslovakian Federation is beaming on short-wave every night, wondering whether or not the Minister of Finance is getting this tax through? At any rate, I think if they were watching, they would be watching the kind of example that this government is providing for the reform movement of eastern Europe. This is a reform movement that kicked out a whole series of repressive, dictatorial, non-responsive governments, one after the other. Do you know why those governments were kicked out? Those governments refused to listen to the people. Do you know why this government is going to get kicked out on this tax? Because it is refusing to listen to the people.

What would they see? They would see a government imposing a devastating new tax on everything, a tax on everything that moves, in spite of the fact that Canadians from Vancouver to St. John's are telling this government not to do it. They would see a government that has refused to listen to the people. They would see a government that now refuses to consult with the people in preparation for the next budget.

Canadians are against this tax. Canadians are fighting this tax. They have written letters against this tax. They have asked members from all sides to present petitions against this tax. They have said no to this tax in a thousand different ways. If we had a democracy this government would be listening to the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the government is as cold and unfeeling as a block of marble. It won't listen to Canadians. The minister is insensitive to the concerns of Canadians. All he wants to do is sell his proposal, no matter what it takes. If the government was at all concerned about our fellow citizens, it would have approached this concept in a straightforward manner and it would have invited Canadians to consult.

However, the government hid the truth from the very beginning.

The minister started off by saying that the tax would be revenue neutral, that it would not be a bigger burden that the existing federal sales tax. He said this time and time again, so there would be no impact on election results. However, by constantly raising the federal sales tax, he turned revenue neutrality into a budgetary offensive.

After the election, however, the minister said the tax would be used to reduce the deficit. He took the offensive. He became more honest, which means Canadians had been sold a bill of goods.

The new tax will take several billion dollars more out the pockets of Canadians than the tax that was in place when the government was sworn in.

[English]

The minister said that he would never bring in such a tax without provincial co-operation. He told the House, the country and the Canadian people that without such co-operation such a tax was impossible. Such a tax was, and I use his words, "unworkable". However, the provincial governments have unanimously said no, they will not co-operate because they think this new massive tax is unfair.

I remember when the minister responded to me, as well as on television, constantly we heard in the House of Commons that behind the whole thing the provinces were really for it. Two days later every provincial leader was meeting with the Prime Minister of Canada and we couldn't find one who would admit supporting this tax because they all know it is an unfair tax. The minister is going to impose the tax anyway, even though he said it would not work without provincial co-operation.

The minister said that the tax was going to be simple. He said it would not be complicated. Now we learn that the Minister of Revenue is going to hire 3,900 new tax collectors, a veritable army of tax police, a whole new army of snoopers just to administer this new tax. Over 1 million small-business people in this country are now going to have to collect this tax for the government under the supervision of this new tax army. They are going to have to keep two sets of books, one for the provincial tax and one for the federal tax. They are going to have to fill out endless forms and do endless calculations to satisfy the minister's new tax police.

Simple, Madam Speaker? Have you taken the time to read this document? Take my advice and don't bother. This is a simple document 323 pages long. My colleague from New Brunswick, the county of Gloucester, the associate critic, and I have had to go through this document. That is what we get paid for. It is not a joke.

I want to draw to the House's attention one small piece of simplicity. I hope that the taxpayer who has to line up to buy a new house does not have to try to fill this out with his bank manager. I am referring to page 116 of this bill where tax is being calculated. Then we came to an exemption. I am looking at proposed section 207.(1), paragraph (c). Here is just one of the simple calculations that the minister is asking of the average business person and average person who is entitled and responsible for collecting the tax:

> (c) except where the supply is an exempt supply, to have collected, at that time, tax in respect of the supply equal to the amount determined by the formula
> (A x B) + [C x (100percent−B]−D
> where
>
> A is the tax calculated on the fair market value of the property at that time,
>
> B is the percentage that, immediately before that supply, the use of the property in commercial activities of the individual is of the total use of the property,
>
> C is the lesser of
> (i) the tax calculated on the fair market value of the property at that time, and
>
> (ii) the total of the tax that was or would, but for section 167, have been payable by the individual in respect of the acquisition of the property and the tax that was payable by the individual in respect of improvements to the property or, where the individual was deemed under subsection 208(2) to have received a supply of the property at an earlier time, the total of the tax deemed under that subsection to have been paid by the individual at that earlier time and the tax that was payable by the individual after that earlier time in respect of improvements to the property, and
> D is the tax, if any, that the individual is deemed under section 190 to have collected at that time in respect of the property.

I would say to the prospective homeowners in this country: Holy mackerel! Not even first year algebra is going to help you through this one.

• (1610)

The minister offered to give me a briefing. I am going to take him up on it. I want a blackboard. I want the minister to bring the blackboard into the House of Commons. I want him to explain this formula to the members of Parliament and to the people of Canada.

I once had the honour of representing one of the ridings in this area. Some former colleagues and new colleagues are here. I am going to take the minister to a remedial class in mathematics at one of our high schools and see whether they can put some sense back into his head and return some simplicity to his mind so that he can go back to the drawing board and redraw this complicated nightmare of a tax.

After promising small businesses in this country that at least they would be entitled to a small yearly payment for doing all this work for the federal government, the minister has now reneged on that commitment. He is now going to provide a one time only payment that will not nearly cover the increased costs faced by small businesses in collecting this new tax.

It is no small wonder that, in these circumstances, the Minister of Finance refuses to meet John Bulloch of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I have never refused him.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): He refuses to meet anybody in consulting his new budget.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I have never refused them.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Do we now hear from the minister that he is willing to meet with Mr. Bulloch and other representatives who want to meet him before he draws his new budget? Do I hear that from him?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Bulloch has never called me.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I want to suggest to Mr. Bulloch and anybody else who wants to make a representation before the minister before he brings down his next budget that the minister may have relented. Mr. Bulloch, get on the phone, talk to the minister, if you can. I say this on national television and I say it within the House of Commons.

[Translation]

The minister had said that the tax would be visible. He had said that the exact amount of the tax would appear on every bill. He changed his position. Today he says that it might be visible. We will wait and see. We are not at all sure. Will it have to appear on the bill? We will wait to find out. The minister had said that in implementing the new tax, he would reduce the taxation rate on middle incomes. He also went back on this promise. The minister had said that in implementing the new sales tax, he would eliminate the 3 per cent surtax on middle–income Canadians. Instead of eliminating it, Madam Speaker, he raised it to 5 per cent.

The minister had said that the new tax would not be inflationary. Today he admits that the new tax will drive up the rate of inflation. Furthermore, Madam Speaker, the new tax will be an engine of inflation. Is the minister naïve enough to have us believe today that businesses, business people, entrepreneurs will not try to recover the tax by passing it on to consumers, by transferring the tax to consumers? That is naïve! This is not a minister who understands the collective psychology of Canadians and consumers. Is the minister naïve enough to pretend as well that unions and workers will not seek to protect themselves by demanding pay raises throughout the country?

Shirley Carr and other labour leaders have already warned the minister. Mr. Minister, they are unanimous in saying that workers in Canada will bear the brunt of this tax.

It shows monumental naïveté on the part of this minister. Everything will cost more, much more! The minister had said that the new tax would be fair. Madam Speaker, it is totally unfair. His new tax will be regressive and will hit the poorest very hard. The minister thinks that he has sweetened the pill by proposing a 7 per cent tax instead of 9 per cent, but Canadians will not swallow it. The minister has engaged in a little mathematical game, which is really a big fraud. He reduced the tax rate, but to make up for it, he raised the taxes on individuals.

[English]

It is an unfair tax. The credit will not come near to covering it. It hits the lower and middle-income groups most severely. I heard the minister in an unprecedented moment of frankness, and I caught his words and could not believe them, say: "This is a vision of Conservatism at its best". It surely is. It is conservative, regressive, unjust, and hits the lower-income groups at the expense of the average consumer. That is Tory vision all right. That is the myopic type of vision that is tearing this country apart and Canadians cannot wait to get at this minister, this Prime Minister, and this government.

What about food? Originally the government said the tax would apply to food. We protested on this side of the House. Canadians protested across the country. Canadians everywhere said: "We don't want a tax on food". Then on September 2, 1987, the Minister of Finance stated in this House, as reported at page 8700 of Hansard:

> Let me make it absolutely clear. There is no proposal in this document or any other document in Canada to tax food. That is a fact.

Those were the minister's words. That turned out not to be a fact. That was pure fiction, pure deception, another example of not coming clean with Canadians. The minister was not misunderstood because that afternoon and the next morning every headline in the country stated "no sales tax on food".

What is the situation now, as we find it in the bill? All food in restaurants will be taxed. All food in cafeterias, snack bars and a large percentage of grocery store purchases will be taxed. In other words, over 50 per cent of the food consumed by Canadians, of all food in this country, will now be taxed under this bill. That is the fact. That is not what the Minister of Finance told us a year and a half or two years ago.

To add insult to injury, the Prime Minister is trying to sell this as a tax cut. He is going across the country and he is saying: "You know, it is very simple. We got this manufacturers' sales tax of 13.5 per cent. We are coming in with a new sales tax which is going to be 7 per cent. From 13.5 per cent down to 7 per cent, you have never had it so good, you have never had it so lucky. We are reducing taxes for you". That is a dandy. That is the most unbelievably fraudulent way to treat Canadians that I have heard for some time.

I brought this to the minister's attention the last time we stood in the House on a similar occasion. I have not yet heard him play this particular game, but I wish he would take the same blackboard and explain it to the Prime Minister. It does not take a mathematical genius to figure out that with a new 7 per cent retail sales tax on any retail item, for instance furnishing for your home, an armchair at $300, a 7 per cent tax on that $300 for the armchair is $21. Right? If you go down to the wholesale price of that armchair, it is $100, because markup works that way. The wholesale price is about $100 while the retail price is about $300, and 13.5 per cent on $100 is $13.50, and 7 per cent on $300 is $21. Anybody who understands the market at all knows that a smaller tax at the retail level is bound to be a heavier tax than a larger tax at the wholesale level.

Last week the minister offered me a briefing. I suggest that I can arrange with one of the local high schools, perhaps Rideau or Laurentian or perhaps I can work it out with one of my colleagues here who had the honour of representing 19 high schools in his riding at one time, to give the minister a remedial course in basic mathematics. We may have to get into second or third-year algebra and maybe a little trigonometry to help take us through this particular document.

This tax does not meet any of the criteria that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance set out for the country during the election campaign and during the discussions when they set forth their original documents.

The tax is not yet visible. It is not simple. It is not fair. It does not have the co-operation of the provinces, and it is certainly not revenue neutral. I say to the minister, who keeps asking us for alternatives, that we set forth our alternative posture in the minority report. I am saying to the minister that this tax cannot be rescued. It cannot be salvaged. It does not meet any of the principles that he set forth as the basis for a fair tax of this style at the consumption level. It does not meet any of the criteria that the Prime Minister promised the country. This tax is nothing but a licence to print money for the Government of Canada and it is a licence that Canadians want revoked.

This tax will be coming out of everyone's pocket or purse. It will be coming out of our savings accounts, pension cheques, family allowance cheques, unemployment insurance cheques, budgets for clothes, shoes and food. It is going to come on top of our rental payments, mortgage payments and utility bill payments.

For the first time in the history of Canada, for the first time in the history of most countries, including the European countries that he sets forth as an example for his tax, we are going to have a tax on books, on learning, a tax on literacy. The Prime Minister in a hypocritical fashion talks, as we have talked, about the one million adult Canadians who can neither functionally read nor write in this country. We back him on this. Now there is going to be a tax on the books and material to overcome this scourge in our country.

We were a frontier people. The Governor General was sworn in today, and I am not bringing the Crown into this. He came from frontier stock, homesteading stock. At night under coal and kerosene lamps they attempted to educate themselves with any book they could buy, borrow, and sometimes they had to borrow it for some length of time before returning it. This tax puts a tax on learning, literacy and education for the first time.

It is also a tax on pollution control equipment. We talk about pollution, about our environment being a priority. It is a tax on sickness. It is a tax on housing. It is a tax on raising children. It is a tax on the necessities of life and, this minister is relentless, it is even a tax on death.

Why did we get here? We got here because of the government's own mismanagement. This is a tax to pay for the government's own incompetence. Even the minister's own business supporters confirm that he has not done the job he said he would do. He has had a strong economy in this country for most of his term, in fact for all of his term. Despite that economy with vastly increased government revenues, he has raised taxes on 31 separate occasions against Canadians over the period in which he has held office. They are unprecedented high revenues, 31 increases in taxes from all sources.

This same minister inherited a public debt about which he complained, but he has doubled the public debt of Canada, the whole cumulative debt incurred since Confederation in five short years despite those strong revenues, those tax increases. Canadians are saying: "That is not the custody we asked of this minister or this government. That is not the fiduciary way to handle the moneys of Canadians. We will not take it any more. You have not done the job. If you are trying to bail yourself out with this tax, no, sir, we do not want it. Scrap it." The people are saying scrap this tax and scrap this minister.

This minister and this government have made a complete mess of the fiscal situation. Now that they have botched it, they want Canadians to try to rescue them and pay the price. Apart from anything else, the timing could not be worse. The minister admits to the House of Commons and to the country that we are entering a period of slower growth. Recent analyses by financial institutions, the Bank of Commerce and the Royal Bank, most recently, indicate that we are in a period of slow growth.

The timing could not be worse. The timing of any tax and the timing of any expense is vital. It is crucial. This minister will throw us into a recession if this bill goes through the House of Commons.

Therefore, I say to the minister that we cannot help him rescue it. It cannot be rescued. This tax cannot be tinkered with. It is so fundamentally flawed that it has to be scrapped. The minister has to go back to the drawing board and withdraw the tax. It is a bad tax.

Canadians are fed up with the phoney rhetoric, with the breach of promises, the fact that it is a different style of tax than was promised. Canadians are fed up with a 7 per cent tax and they are fed up with this government.

I am saying to the Prime Minister and his minister that they better listen to what the people of Canada are saying to us and to your members. It is coming in loud and clear whether it is from Whitehorse, Vancouver, Saskatoon, Toronto, Corner Brook or Trois Rivieres. It is coming from the elderly, it is coming from students and single mothers, it is coming from the handicapped, it is coming from the old age pensioners, that's for sure. It is even coming now from the business community, and it is virtually unanimous.

Canadians are saying to this minister: "Scrap this tax. No more double-talk. No more extravagant newspaper ads. No more phoney sales pitches. No more of this tax.

Scrap it. Get rid of it. Bring us back something that makes sense."

Madam Speaker, to fulfil the force of what I have been trying to put to you in the House and through the House to the country, I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "that" and by substituting the following therefor:
>
> Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate on the motion and on the amendment.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to add the voice of the New Democratic Party to those 74 per cent of Canadians who have said that this unjust, unfair tax must go and it must go now.

The minister spoke about the fact that this is tough medicine but he has to do it. In my remarks today, I would like to suggest to the minister some of the real tough medicine that he might take in order to implement a real equitable fair tax system in this country that is not borne on the backs of the middle and lower income Canadians, but is shared fairly and equally in this country.

• (1630)

The goods and services tax is unacceptable because it rejects the fundamental principle upon which tax policy should be based, that those who have the means pay it. The principle should be that people should not be paying more than they are realistically able to pay and those who can afford to pay have a responsibility to do so.

The goods and services tax represents one of the most significant in a long line of Tory tactics which has meant a dramatic shift of the tax burden away from the corporations and the rich of Canada to the low and middle income Canadians, the unemployed, families living in poverty, seniors, working men and women. All these people are already struggling to make ends meet.

The goods and services tax is not only unjust; it is unnecessary. The message that I want to bring to the government today is that we in the New Democratic Party have concrete, realistic alternatives to this tax policy.

We cannot talk about the goods and services tax in isolation from the other economic and fiscal policies this government has put into place. It is an intrinsic part of the corporate agenda of this government. We have seen the U.S.–Canada trade deal, high interest rate policy, the clawback on pensions and family allowances, destruction of the unemployment insurance programs, and now the goods and services tax. They have all been part and parcel of that agenda, and Canadians are beginning to realize what this means for their daily lives and for the future of themselves and their families.

The fact is that the government's economic record is a record of economic mismanagement. Let us look at what happened in 1989 alone: There were massive lay-offs—the Canadian Labour Congress estimates some 70,000 jobs lost as a result of the trade deal—interest rates out of control; growing regional disparities; devastation in the Atlantic region; deepening poverty; food banks and homelessness.

Again just last week the Institute on Child Health pointed out that poverty has increased to the extent that there are certain regions, and it names specifically Newfoundland and Saskatchewan, where infant mortality up to one year is far higher in those provinces that have a higher rate of poverty. The link is very clear.

What does the government have to show for its efforts? An increasing gap between the rich and the poor, increasing poverty, and now a 7 per cent goods and services tax. Even in the years when our Gross National Product increased, the question arose as to who benefited from it?

It was not the people of Canada. They faced more tax increases than ever before. Their wages remained the same while their standard of living declined and they saw unprecedented reduction of crucial government programs and services. Now the minister is saying that he wants to see the workers of this country increasingly bear the burden of this tax.

In his remarks he pointed out that he does not want to see the workers asking for increases in their wages to compensate for this tax. Once again, the Conservative agenda is to ensure that it is borne on the backs of those who can pay the least.

While this government talks about different statistic trends, the working men and women of Canada have been asking when the government is going to start to improve the well-being of working people in this country.

The fundamental problem remains that this government believes that economic development means creating more wealth for those who already have wealth in this country. That is what it has done and that is what it is continuing to do with this new proposed tax policy.

[Translation]

Let us take a closer look at this goods and services tax. First of all, consider the whole process.

Madam Speaker, during the 1988 election campaign, the Conservative Party told Canadians the economy had never been in better shape. The impression it gave was so optimistic even the brightest experts were fooled.

It promised billions of dollars. The government kept saying these dollars were available thanks to its excellent financial management. Of course, they would introduce a goods and services tax, but not to worry. It would merely replace the manufacturers' sales tax. It would not generate new revenues.

During the election campaign they never talked about rising interest rates. They never talked about cutbacks in social programs. And they never said one word, Madam Speaker, about the deficit.

[English]

We all know what happened. About 30 seconds after the vote was counted, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and all of the Tory revisionists started telling us that everything was not so great after all. We were told that Canada was facing a deficit crisis, one that was threatening the very economic foundations of our nation. They did not say, of course, that this deficit was doubled by this government.

Suddenly the government said that it could not afford to fulfil spending promises it had made weeks before. And what followed, all in the name of reducing the deficit, was an unprecedented attack on the social programs of this country. All of a sudden, the goods and services tax was going to involve a whopping tax increase and GST revenues were to be used to fight the deficit.

At the same time we were told that the goods and services tax was revenue neutral.

[Translation]

The promise that the new tax would be revenue neutral was the first promise they broke, but many more followed.

The government promised that the GST would be visible. It promised that the GST would be easy to administer. It promised that the provinces would be consulted to ensure that the tax would be fair. It promised that the price of housing would not affected. It promised sufficient credits for low-income families. It promised that essential goods would be exempt. Promise after promise was broken, and in the end, Canadians were taken for a ride.

[English]

What are the implications of the goods and services tax? What does it mean for Canadian nurses, miners, teachers and taxi cab drivers? What does it mean for families in the Atlantic, seniors in Quebec, youth in the west, women in the north? It means, of course, that Canadians will be handing over more of their earnings to the government. Those who earn less will be paying a bigger portion of their income through the goods and services tax than those who make more.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Wrong.

Ms. McLaughlin: The goods and services tax is a regressive tax. What that means in plain and simple terms is that it makes the poor pay a bigger slice of their income in tax than the rich. It does so because those Canadians with lower incomes spend virtually all their income on necessities.

The minister has said I am wrong. Let me illustrate. According to Statistics Canada, Canadian families with incomes between $10,000 and $15,000—and there are many of these—spend 92 per cent of their income on purchases, on current consumption. It is that consumption that is taxed by the goods and services tax. They are paying 92 per cent of their income just on essential purchases and now they are being asked to pay, should this bill pass, another 7 per cent.

Families with incomes over $50,000 spend on average only 56 per cent of their income on current consumption.

The remainder, any savings or investments, is free of the goods and services tax. That simply is not fair.

• (1640)

We have families who are spending virtually all their income simply to purchase those goods and services they require to live. We have others, and that includes the members of this House, who statistically spend about 56 per cent of their income on consumption and are in a much more advantageous position than those with lower income. This just simply is not fair.

The minister I am sure is saying that he will compensate those low income Canadians through tax credits. The government is not compensating low income Canadians for the inflationary effect of this tax. Indeed, with the reduction of the proposed tax from 9 per cent to 7 per cent those tax credits were reduced as well.

Who are these Canadians who will be paying and suffering from paying this goods and services tax? What about the single mother who has just lost her job at National Sea Products? She will be paying an extra 7 per cent on her children's clothes and on her children's shoes. The line worker recently laid off from Gillette in Quebec will be paying GST on his purchases. Thousands of workers laid off from VIA will be paying the GST on school supplies and on every purchase and service that they make. Seniors hit by the government's clawback will now have the GST to contend with when buying non-prescription drugs and other purchases.

The regional effect cannot be overlooked. The minister will try to counter these effects by his proposals, but we on this side of the House do not buy it. Canadians do not buy it. There is no trust that this government will in any way be able to make this tax fair for the real people across Canada, the people who this government does not want to talk about, the people of Canada who have suffered most because of this government's regressive policies.

Something must be said, as I said earlier, about the tax credit which the finance minister talks about, the tax credit that he says will mean the poor will not be paying more under the goods and services tax. Yes, it will help some Canadians, but I emphasize only some. Millions of Canadians who live below the poverty line will be hurt by the goods and services tax. Their taxes will go up and they will simply have less money to meet their needs.

Second, the tax credit is not indexed to inflation. This means of course that each year fewer and fewer low income Canadians will actually qualify for the tax credit.

The Pro-Canada Network has probably described it best:

> Like an umbrella that shrinks in the rain, the GST credit will soon shrink to allow the GST to soak millions of dollars from people who are too poor to pay.

Let me make one final point on this supposed protection. When this government decided to change the goods and services tax to a rate of 7 per cent, it made several adjustments to meet the difference in revenues it anticipated. But where did those reductions come from? It is not hard to guess. They came, of course, not from corporate Canada, not from high income Canadians. It was small business, and it was poor Canadians.

Nothing illustrates better this government's attitude to the poor. It treats them with contempt and scorn, and this government's record has been disgraceful. It has institutionalized poverty in one of the most generously blessed countries in the world.

We on this side of the House want to see a country where poverty is eliminated, where we can work toward doing that. The former leader of our party spoke eloquently and passionately about this matter on his departure from this House and set for us a goal that all Canadians should embrace. We ask and we plead with this government to embrace the goal that we must reduce poverty in this country. We must not add to it as this government is doing.

I talked earlier about the regional effect of this tax. All regions of this country will suffer under this tax, but nowhere will the suffering be worse than in the Atlantic provinces that have been so hard hit by this government's policies.

First, there is a tax on freight transportation, making it even more expensive for people in the Atlantic region to ship goods to the populous markets of Canada and the United States and making it even more difficult to compete with industry in central Canada.

Second, employment in the Atlantic region is heavily dependent on the service sector. Services account for some 79 per cent of the region's Gross Domestic Product. According to the Conference Board of Canada, any region dependent on the service sector "would be relatively more adversely affected by the goods and services tax than a region that is less heavily dependent on services".

I mention also the Nova Scotia Board of Tourism which initially supported the concept of the goods and services tax but has withdrawn its support saying that it will devastate the tourism industry in that area.

We in the New Democratic Party say it is time to stop punishing the people of Atlantic Canada. It is time to introduce reforms that will revive their economy, not tax measures that kick them while they are down.

[Translation]

What does the GST mean for Quebec, Madam Speaker? It means that goods that previously were not taxable, such as furniture, clothing, textiles and shoes, all essential goods, will be taxable under the GST. It means an increase in the price of new homes and in rental costs, as well, since landlords are obviously going to pass on the tax to their tenants. I may add that 75 per cent of Montreal residents are tenants. Like everywhere else in the country, the GST means inflation, a headache for small business and inequity for the poor.

That is why the Confederation of National Trade Unions, the Federation of Co-operative Family Economics Associations of Quebec and the national federation of Quebec consumer associations are against the GST.

[English]

I have two final points on the goods and services tax. First, in addition to its direct damage it brings with it many side effects. Items that are not themselves taxed will eventually end up costing people more.

I would like to give just one example. Child care is not going to be taxed, as we know, but child care costs are inevitably going to be higher when the child care providers have to pay taxes on all supplies and services that they buy. Again it will be the parents who will have to pay that additional cost.

In short, the GST introduces a dangerous inflationary effect into the economy. This inflation will affect everyone: farmers, fishers, forestry workers and family physicians. While prices go up, wages will be suppressed and the real standard of living of millions of Canadians will decline.

If this government thinks that pushing the goods and services tax from 9 per cent down to 7 per cent will be met with shouts of joy from the mountain tops, it can forget it. The polls indicate that and, as we have said before, this party is going to express the voice of Canadians inside this House and outside this House.

The minister mentioned the manufacturers' sales tax, that silent killer of jobs. When I was a member of the finance committee I asked officials how many jobs this silent killer killed. They were not able to say. When it was decided by this government to augment the manufacturers' sales tax, not once, not twice, not three times, but four times, I asked how many jobs it had estimated would be lost by this move. Obviously, the silent killer of jobs was so silent there were absolutely no figures to prove that assertion.

We know that the goods and services tax will not stay at 7 per cent and will be right up there at 9 per cent next year or the year after. It will keep going up in order to pay for this government's wasteful and inefficient economic policies.

• (1650)

This tax is opposed by more Canadians than any other policy in the history of this government. It is opposed by labour unions, women's groups, farmers' associations, senior citizens' groups, and small business people. Never before has such a coalition been formed. Can this government not hear that message? The message is that this tax must go.

Let us put the tax in the context of the government's economic agenda. First, let us look at the goods and services tax and high interest rates. Nothing demonstrates more graphically the consistency and coherence of our finance minister's approach to the economy. The hon. Leader of the Opposition talked about bringing a blackboard in to explain some of the convoluted instructions around the collection of the GST. We would like to see what the government's economic agenda looks like when it is really explained in simple terms.

As all the members of this House know, the government has been deliberately pursuing a policy of high interest rates. Never before has there been such a gap between the Canadian rate and the American rate. The stated goal of the policy is to keep inflation down. What better way to keep inflation down than to introduce a tax which is universally recognized as inflationary?

What does the goods and services tax mean, therefore, in terms of interest rates? It means inflation, resulting in the government jacking up interest rates even further, according to that logic if we can call it logic.

Let us look next at the relationship between high interest rates and the deficit. We must recall that this government is "dead serious about reducing the deficit" and that we have often proposed that one of the best ways of reducing the deficit is to bring interest rates down as was proposed by the all-party finance committee.

By the finance minister's own calculations a 2 per cent reduction in interest rates would bring the deficit down by $3.2 billion in the first year alone. Let us make sure that we all fully grasp the logic of all this. The government claims that its No. 1 enemy is the deficit. The government is deliberately implementing an interest policy that pushes the deficit out of control and, to complete the circle, the government is imposing a goods and services tax which will add to inflation according to its own assessment.

We then have a goods and services tax which raises inflation and puts pressure on interest rates. What then is going to happen to the GST rate if interest rate pressures on the deficit grow? Of course it is going to go up.

I think Canadians know the process without being told, but I do not think the government knows this. It has a goods and services tax that leads to inflation. Inflation according to this government leads to high interest rates. High interest rates lead to a huge deficit, which leads to an increased goods and services tax.

There is a simple lesson which Canadians have learned long before, without it being pointed out by me. That is why 74 per cent of Canadians are saying that this tax must go.

[Translation]

Perhaps we should tackle this issue from another angle. How will the GST contribute to spur the economy and create jobs?

Allow me to give you some of its effects. Basically, the more heavily one is taxed the less money one has left to buy goods and services. Since they already have a limited budget, the workers will have to make fewer purchases.

High interest rates and a lower standard of living will reduce demand for consumer goods and lead to smaller wages and lay-offs. High interest rates mean an inflated Canadian dollar.

As we saw last year that translates into fewer exports and a good many plant closures.

Small and medium-sized businesses are the main source of new jobs in this country and, by forcing them to administer this tax, the government will create serious problems for thousands of such businesses. So much so that they no longer will be able to create new jobs. On the contrary, they will have to eliminate existing jobs.

[English]

All this compounds an already intolerable situation caused by this government's trade deal with the United States. I along with millions of Canadians heard the Minister for International Trade say last week that it is really too early to tell about the effects of the trade deal. I say that it is too late for those workers at Inglis, at Outboard Marine, at Dominion Glass Plant in Redcliffe, Alberta, the Campbell Soup company workers in Portage la Prairie or thousands of Canadians working in the fisheries.

I want to say a few words about alternatives. While the hon. Leader of the Opposition spoke eloquently against the goods and services tax he did not in reality offer real alternatives. I want to say that we have presented to this government alternatives, alternatives which I am happy to debate with the minister. There have been dozens of alternatives proposed in hearings across this country on the goods and services tax.

First, most people understand that we do not have a fair tax system. It is not that people do not want to pay their fair share; it is that we do not have a fair system. It is that increasingly individuals have paid the largest tax burden where in the past it was corporations. This government has done nothing to redress this imbalance. It has only increased it by reducing the general federal corporate tax rate from 36 per cent to 28 per cent in 1988. The corporate share of the tax burden has declined consistently and substantially under this government.

We know that it was Liberal governments which started the trend. It was they who began shifting taxes from the business community on to working Canadians.

The New Democratic Party's corporate tax proposals are reasonable and prudent. I am going to outline these briefly. First, as I mentioned earlier today, we are calling for the introduction of a minimum corporate tax. Thousands of profitable corporations are not paying their fair share. This is not a radical idea; it is not even a new idea. The United States has a minimum corporate tax as do many other countries.

Let us think of this. While families living below the poverty level are paying taxes, some profitable corporations are paying none. This is not acceptable to Canadians. What we are saying is that a corporate minimum tax at a rate of 20 per cent should be introduced.

Our second phase of corporate tax policy is related to deferred taxes. Each year corporations in Canada defer roughly $2 billion in taxes. These deferred taxes act as a permanent source of funding without interest. We are saying that there should be interest charged on these deferred taxes.

Certainly, if Canadians across the country borrow money, they have to pay interest on that money. We are simply asking that that be done for corporations.

Another suggestion is that the government should clamp down on corporate cheaters. Revenue Canada's auditing of corporations has declined dramatically over the last decade. Yet for every dollar Revenue Canada spends collecting corporate tax returns it recovers $17. Surely, more funding should be put into that area so that we can recover the taxes that are rightly owing.

Finally, I would like to say something about modifying the system of taxation. The government said at one point that all of its policies would have an environmental review. What about the effect of this tax on environmental matters?

First, there is no incentive for people to buy more environmentally friendly products under this kind of system. Surely, this should be fundamental to the kind of tax reform that this government undertakes, if it cares about the environment and if it cares about making a truly fair tax system.

• (1700)

Therefore, the final tax policy proposal I will put forward is that a royal commission on taxation be established. There has not been one, Madam Speaker, as you know, for about a quarter of a century and we are sorely in need of genuine tax reform.

I am suggesting that the commission's mandate should be manyfold. It should determine how the government can best attain stable revenues through the tax system, determine how the tax system can be used to promote full employment, and determine how the tax system can be used to promote a more equitable society.

Finally, the royal commission must be charged with creating a tax system that takes into account the environmental aspects of our purchases and, indeed, of our system, a system that recognizes that the protection of our natural environment is the most fundamental issue facing Canadians and all humanity today.

I would conclude by saying that this goods and services tax must go. This is an unfair tax and an unjust tax. What this country needs more than ever is a tax system that is progressive, equitable and just. What this country needs is a reduction in interest rates, a full employment policy, an enhanced trading relationship with Europe and Asia, a strong system of social programs to serve the needs of Canadians.

As Leader of the New Democratic Party, and on behalf of millions of Canadians from all walks of life and from every region of this land, I urge this government to scrap the goods and services tax and to introduce genuine, sound and equitable tax reforms so that we can meet the needs of the people and the challenges which lie ahead.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): According to the order made earlier this day, the House will now proceed to a one-hour question and answer period.

I am told, and I realize that there are quite a few members who are prepared to ask questions of the minister. I think if preambles were kept as short as possible, it may allow a greater number of members to ask questions of the minister.

I will recognize first the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Madam Speaker, after that impassioned and resolute attack on the GST, it is difficult to have a very long preamble. Certainly the NDP has taken over the issue with a great amount of gusto and verve.

My question for the Minister of Finance arises from his speech to the House today, particularly his comment with respect to the monitoring that is going to take place on the information that will be available to Canadians.

The Minister of Finance will know that many, many Canadians, 74 per cent, still oppose this tax. Although it is alleged that it is because Canadians do not understand it, can the Minister of Finance tell us how Canadians can depend on this monitoring system that he well knows will not have any teeth, or any enforcement function? Can he tell us how he sees this monitoring agency defending the interests of Canadians and ensuring that the 13.5 per cent alleged saving by the dropping of the manufacturers' sales tax is, in fact, passed on to the consumer? How exactly does he see his monitoring system work?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I am curious when I hear the hon. member saying that he wants an agency with teeth. What he means when he says that is he wants to set up an anti-inflation board type of bureaucracy so that on the one hand he is saying, set up this great big bureaucracy, but on the other hand, do not go ahead and hire 3,500 new people to administer the system. He cannot have it both ways, but this is symptomatic of the way the Liberals are dealing with this issue. They are sucking and blowing. Canadians are not going to fall for that.

In response to the specific question, how will the monitoring agency operate? First, it will be in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It will provide information to individual Canadians so that they will know how much existing manufacturers' federal sales tax is in the price of various products and what they can expect will happen as a result of the introduction of the GST to the price after tax of various products.

This information will be made available subsequent to the introduction of the GST, then they will help companies ensure that they do pass through to the maximum extent possible.

We have started this process. I indicated in the paper that went out earlier this year that the price of a car will go down about 3 per cent or 4 per cent.

Mr. Benjamin: You want to bet?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says, "You want to bet?" The car companies have said that they are going to pass this savings on to their retailers and if the hon. member had any sense as to what is going on in the car market today, he will know that there is tremendous competition. There is cutting of interest rates. There is cutting of price. There are $1,000 rebates that are promised for the full year by some of the companies.

Surely, the member understands that there is a great deal of competition to maintain market share. On that basis, I am confident that the market system will work. That, I think, is probably the best answer that I can give to my friend from the county of Gloucester.

[Translation]

Mr. Young (Gloucester): How interesting it is to see that our socialist NDP friends have now recovered their energy, for they had precious little to rave about when their leader had the floor of the House.

I want to direct a supplementary to the Minister of Finance. Should companies fail to make sure that the 13.5 per cent is no longer tacked on to production costs, and when your agency responsible for monitoring the implementation of the GST sees what is going on, in other words the money supposedly saved by consumers is not readily apparent in lower retail prices, just what will happen then? Will the agency to which you referred in your remarks be empowered to force these producers to roll back their prices, or is that simply something which will provide you with an opportunity to draw the consumer's attention to the situation?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think that the English translation of what the hon. member said was would the monitoring agency oblige. In other words, I take from that that he is asking whether the monitoring agency would force a rollback. No, they will not be able to force a rollback. Constitutionally, there has to be a national emergency before there would be that sort of power. That is why the previous Liberal government with the six and five program did not have the full force that could have come from that type of program.

I want to underscore the point that I made just a minute ago. I get this question a lot from Canadians. How can we be assured? It is not possible for the government to give an absolutely precise guarantee.

What people who ask that question are saying, if they want to have a rollback, is that they want to set up the establishment of a large bureaucracy for basically what will be a six-month to a one-year problem, which is something that we would not be prepared to do.

We believe that the market will resolve the problem as was indicated through the experience of other countries, particularly New Zealand. We heard in the finance committee hearings that companies which tried to get too much by way of price in the implementation were forced to roll back their prices not by government decree but by the power of the marketplace because someone down the street kept their prices down, started to get market share and, as they started to get market share, the competition worked and prices were rolled back.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, in his remarks, the hon. Minister of Finance stated that this tax and I quote his words, "is deeply rooted in reality." I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he really understands the reality of low income.

• (1710)

Does he really understand the reality of a single mother trying to house, clothe and feed herself and her family? Does he understand the reality of a 7 per cent increase on the cost of heating their homes, especially for people who live up north where cold is very much an every day fact of life?

Does the minister understand the reality of adding a 7 per cent tax to the cost of transportation? What does the minister plan to do about these realities?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer to the question is yes, I do. I do understand the reality of people who are on low incomes. That is precisely why we introduced a refundable sales tax credit in 1986 and have increased it on two occasions since then. That is precisely why we have placed such a level of importance on the goods and services tax credit, precisely so that we can put Canadians who are in low-income brackets in a better position than they are after sales tax reform than is the case today.

Some 84 per cent of senior citizens and single-parent families will be better off as a result of sales tax reform. Surely that tells the hon. member that we do believe in this and that we do understand its significance. We want to move ahead with sales tax reform so we can make that major change in the position of people who are on low incomes.

I have listened very carefully to the Leader of the New Democratic Party who said that Canadians in low-income brackets would be paying more tax after sales tax reform. That is simply not true. She does not understand the impact of the goods and services tax credit.

I listened to my colleague on the other side of the House, also from the New Democratic Party. She said that 92 per cent of their income is paid on the necessities. What are two of those necessities? Rent and food. Those are not taxed. She gave the clear implication that they were taxed, and I would expect that she would withdraw that implication once she gets on her feet.

An hon. member: Order!

Mr. Speaker: There is a very great temptation under the arrangement to enter into lengthy debate. But I would ask the minister to try to confine his answers to the question that is put.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance is so understanding of the realities of his tax on poor and low-income Canadians, then why has he only partially indexed his tax credit? Why has he not regionalized his tax?

The reality of his partially indexing this credit is that within five years, half a million Canadians will no longer qualify for his refundable tax credit. What does he plan to do about that?

The minister certainly understood about indexing when it came to RRSPs. In his latest proposal he will fully index the range of amounts of moneys that rich people can invest in RRSPs.

Will the minister understand the realities and scrap this tax? There is nothing good about it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we get the same old rhetoric from the Liberal Party. I have listened to the leader's speech, and not once was there any suggestion, any hint that there was one idea of what alternatives would be.

I have listened to two questioners now, the junior finance critic and the hon. member who spoke most recently, but I heard not one suggestion as to an alternative. I listened to the six would-be leaders of the party last Sunday afternoon and again heard not a whisper of an alternative. They simply do not have the alternatives.

On the question of partial indexation, yes, the tax system is partially indexed. Let me go back to the refundable sales tax credit because that is a very good example of how we have adjusted upwards the thresholds to reflect changing circumstances. We started at $15,000, we moved that up to $16,000, then up to $18,000, and now with the goods and services tax credit, it is $25,000. Surely that is an indication of our good faith here in responding as things change.

We have done the same with other parts of the tax system, for example, in 1988 when we had personal income tax reform. So, therein two very clear examples is an indication that we are sensitive to the concern that the hon. member has expressed.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance claimed earlier that to introduce a corporate minimum tax would be to send business investment fleeing from this country. If this is the case, I would ask the minister how he can explain the fact that in the United States, which introduced a minimum corporate tax in 1986, the rate of business investment since the introduction of that tax has grown at an annual rate of 6 per cent, almost triple the rate of the previous five years.

I ask the minister, given this evidence, would he not consider the imposition of a 20 per cent corporate minimum tax so that corporations are paying their fair share?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me ask the hon. member a question. The corporate income tax rate for small business is 12 per cent. She is saying that she wants a corporate minimum tax of 20 per cent. Is she proposing the increase of the—

Mr. Barrett: Graduated. Don't twist it, graduated.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Well now, we have some adjustments here that the hon. member from Victoria would have us use.

Is the hon. member suggesting a minimum tax of 20 per cent on small business? Is she suggesting companies that are basically conduits for dividends, holding companies, where the dividend income is paid with respect of income where taxes have already been paid should be taxed twice or three times?

Mr. Barrett: Well, come on.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says, "Well, come on". Let us have some explanations as to what the New Democratic policy is going to be.

There are 3,500 or 3,600 companies which are paying the large corporations' tax. Those companies are paying about $1.25 billion in large corporations' tax. That is levied on companies which have capital of over $10 million.

She is saying that there are thousands of companies which are not paying tax. I think the NDP has put a number on that of some 90,000 companies or thereabouts. That, by definition, means that 85,000 small businesses would be paying this minimum tax. Is that what the hon. member is saying that her party supports?

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, of course that is not what I am suggesting. It is this government which is penalizing small business, not the New Democratic Party.

I point out to the minister that of the $27 billion in profits which went untaxed in 1987, 84 per cent of that $27 billion in untaxed profits was held by companies with profits over $1 million. That is not small business. The biggest winners were the top 145 untaxed corporations which have average profits of over $106 million each. They did not pay one cent in tax.

If the finance minister is concerned with small business, as he suggests and as this party is, will he then reconsider and assist small business to reinstate the administrative assistance that he took away on reducing the GST from 9 per cent to 7 per cent, reinstate those administrative funds for small businesses so that they can survive this tax?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member is pointing to is what was one of the quite difficult decisions of moving the tax rate down from 9 per cent to 7 per cent. How were we going to treat the assistance that we were providing small business?

We looked at different options here but we felt, as a trade off, in getting the rate down from 9 per cent to 7 per cent that we could afford to pay an up-front transitional payment to small businesses to help them get through those one-time costs but that we could not do on an ongoing basis because then we would not have been able to get the rate down to 7 per cent. I think that the small business community was quite anxious to see us come in with a lower rate.

• (1720)

The hon. member keeps talking about a corporate minimum tax. One of the things that we have done is cut back on the loopholes that were in the tax system that corporations were taking advantage of as well as some of the tax benefits that were there over a number of years.

Mr. Riis: Who put those loopholes in there?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Liberals. I think the hon. member knows that. The scientific research tax credit, limited partnerships, carve-outs, capital trusts, collateralized preferred shares, a preferred share dividend tax, a general anti-avoidance rule, new rules on leasing, on dividends, on rentals. We eliminated the investment tax credit, the inventory allowance, earned depletion. We capitalized real estate interest expense. We reduced a number of reserves for banks, trust companies and insurance companies.

In many ways, we have broadened the tax base for corporations so that they are paying considerably more tax. Banks, as an example, are paying over $500 million this year in tax. Two or three years ago, they were paying nothing.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, in his remarks today, the minister made a great deal of the fact that the move from the MST to the GST meant the elimination of tax on business inputs, as he called them. I think he agrees that the design of the system is to move the tax from the manufacturers' or the business level to the consumer level.

Given that that is the plan of this tax, will the minister admit to Canadians that the move from the MST to the GST represents the single largest reduction in tax payable at the corporate level in the history of Canada?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is quite aware that any consumption tax is ultimately paid by the consumers. It is there in black and white. What we are doing is making sure that consumers see the tax they are paying so that it is not a hidden tax.

Some hon. members: How, how?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. members ask, "how". It will be very clear on the cash register chit so that people will see how much tax they are paying. As I said in my speech, the GST will be a far more visible tax today for the consumer than are the provincial retail sales taxes.

Mr. Fontana: Big deal, you see it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It is a big deal. On the one hand, we have the Leader of the Opposition saying: "Make it more visible". On the other hand, we have the member from London East saying: "Big deal". Again we have the Liberal Party talking out of both sides of their mouths.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad if the minister answered the question out of either side of his mouth.

One of the things he said just now, and he said it in his speech earlier today, was that the move to the GST was going to make it more difficult for governments to kind of sneak in tax increases. He said it is all going to be visible. He is nodding his head. He agrees with that.

Well, he also said some pretty extreme things about the manufacturers' sales tax, describing how bad it was. We all know that in the five years he has been in office he has raised that tax from 9, to 10, to 11, to 12, to 13.5 per cent.

Will the minister not admit that the reason he raised this terrible tax so many times was precisely the reason he gave in his speech, so that he could sneak it past Canadians? Will he not admit that this change is the biggest reduction in tax payable at the corporate level in the history of Canada?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will answer the question exactly the same way as I did before. Any tax on consumption, which is what a sales tax is, whether it is a federal sales tax at the manufacturing level or a provincial sales tax at the retail level or the goods and services tax, any tax on consumption is paid by consumers. Consumers are individuals.

An hon. member: Is it regressive?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member asks another question: Is it regressive? I say to the hon. member that the existing sales tax is a regressive tax. I think we would both agree on that.

With the introduction of the goods and services tax credit so that Canadians in low-income brackets, after sales tax reform, will be paying less as a percentage of their income than people in upper-income brackets makes it a progressive tax system. That is not the case today. It was not the case when we came into office in 1984.

We did this principally because we wanted to improve the fairness of the tax system, particularly for those in the low and middle-income brackets. As I said, 84 per cent of seniors and single-parent families will be paying less sales tax, including the effects of the GST, than was the case before.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, across Canada the average price of a new home is expected to reach $151,900 in 1990. That means the average family would need an annual income of some $65,000 or more to reach for the Canadian dream of owning a home. But in 1988, the average family income was only $46,185. That means family incomes and salaries must increase by 41 per cent by the end of this year before the average Canadian family can own the average Canadian home.

My question to the minister is this: These figures are a clear indication of Canada's growing housing crisis and rather than addressing the problem, why is the federal government adding to the problem with the 7 per cent GST and inadequate rebates for housing?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me explain for the hon. member how the rebate works and speak about the tax on new housing. I should just make it very, very clear because both the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party left the impression that there would be a 7 per cent tax on the whole price of the house without the rebate.

There will be a rebate so it is 7 per cent less the 2.5 per cent rebate for a net of 4.5 per cent. We agree on that. I think the hon. member is nodding his head.

Today there is a tax at either 13.5 per cent or 9 per cent on building materials, plumbing supplies, windows, rugs, wallpaper, a large number of things that go into a new house. The effective tax rate of all that, in relation to the total price of the house, is somewhere in the 3 per cent to 4.5 per cent range depending on the place in the country. I think in his community of London it is in the order of 3.5 per cent or 3.75 per cent.

So the impact on the price of a house may be zero or it may be as much as 1.5 per cent, which is the case in Metropolitan Toronto. I think by bringing in the rebate of 2.5 per cent, we have been able to address the problem that he and I are both concerned about and the impact it can have on the housing market. I believe we have done this in an effective way.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, the minister will know and understand that there is no tax on land and there is no tax on housing under the current MST. He has now admitted that even after his complicated formula—the rebates and what have you—that the net increase is still going to be as much as 2 per cent across this country on prices of housing which are already too high.

Now that he has admitted to the fact that there is going to be at least a 2 per cent increase on new houses, the industry says that is going to affect existing housing to the tune of about 2 per cent to 3 per cent. How has the minister answered the question of affordability by adding even after the rebates another 2 per cent to housing for Canadians?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, like his leader, is distorting things again. He just said 2 per cent is what I said. I did not say that. I said it could be up to 1.5 per cent, but it could be zero. In some communities it will be zero. We have some examples where there will be an actual small reduction in the over-all cost of a house.

I have heard this distortion today from the Liberal Party and what the tax is applied to. The Leader of the Opposition said it was applied to education. Wrong. It is not applied to education. It is applied to rental housing. That is wrong. It is not applied on rental housing. The member quite distorted what I have said on food. I have indicated all along that take-out food, restaurant food from his favourite restaurant, Winston's and places like that, will be subject to tax.

• (1730)

I think it would help the understanding of this particular proposal if we dealt with the facts and not with the distorted imaginings of hon. members opposite. It is those distortions which are a great frustration to Canadians who are trying to understand what it is all about, what the tax will do, how it will improve the economy and how it will affect them in their day-to-day lives.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has been talking about distortions. I want to ask him about one of his favourite distortions which is telling the Canadian people that the existing MST, or the existing FST, which in 1991 will total about $18 billion, according to the Department of Finance, will be passed on in its entirety to the consumers of this country.

Will the minister tell us today what kind of evidence or proof he has that the existing manufacturers' sales tax will be passed on to the consumer; that the existing FST will be passed on to the farmer, the worker and the old age pensioner? What study does he have that says that that will be the case? I have not talked to any business people in this country or any manufacturer in this country who believe for a minute that the entire existing $18 billion will be passed on. Instead, there will be a further price increase for the consumers of this country.

Will the minister tell us what study and what empirical evidence he has that the existing federal sales tax will be passed on? Is it not the truth that we are going to keep the major part of the existing tax and add a 7 per cent tax on top of that, and the whole thing will be inflationary and hurt Canadians from coast to coast?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was doing just fine until he threw in that last one. He knows perfectly well that what he just said was a gross exaggeration, a gross distortion of what will happen. I answered that same question from the member for Gloucester. He can check Hansard, I guess he was out of the House. But in the interest of saving time for other people who want to ask questions, I will not repeat what I said in that previous answer.

It is that distortion, the things that the hon. member just said at the end of his question, which cause people in this country to lose confidence in their political representatives.

Mr. Nystrom: Talk about losing confidence, Mr. Speaker, I want the minister to answer the question. What guarantee can he give the people of Canada that the existing manufacturers' sales tax will be passed on to consumers of this country? What guarantee is there? What study does he have to back up the fact that he keeps repeating and repeating in this House that the existing tax will disappear?

I need some evidence of what he is basing that statement on because nobody believes him. Even his own back-benchers do not believe him. Answer that question and cut out all the rhetoric.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was trying to save House time so that other people could ask questions. I have responded to that precise question from the hon. member for Gloucester.

What I have said continually through this whole debate on sales tax reform is that it is very important for businesses and labour to conduct themselves in a way that will allow the maximum amount of savings of that $18 billion. No guarantees can be given, unless the hon. member wants to have an anti-inflation type of board, a bureaucracy and machinery established. That is the only way that that guarantee can be given.

But it is quite clear from what has happened in other countries that the power of the marketplace, the power of one company, one retailer down the street trying to get some market share out of someone up the street will result in the vast majority of those savings being passed on to consumers.

What I am hearing from both the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party is quite the opposite of what they should be saying. They should be encouraging business and labour to ensure that the right actions are taken so that we do not have that inflationary impact.

By taking the line that both parties have taken in this debate this afternoon, it is encouraging people to try to get a little bit of savings.

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, since the Minister could not come to an agreement with the provinces, small businesses will have to deal with complex administrative problems because Canada would be the only country in the world with two different taxes on goods and services. How can the Minister claim to have come up with a simple tax system when small businesses will have to deal with multiple rates and exemptions, as well as different audit systems and penalty structures?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, it has always been my first choice to have a national sales tax, a joint tax with the provinces. I understand the desire and the need of the small-business community to have only one tax system. Unfortunately that was not possible at this time. Possibly and hopefully, some time down the road we will achieve that but it will have to be, at this point, a two-step process.

However, in order to eliminate or minimize the complexity and the compliance problems of having the two systems in place, we are having extensive discussions with the provinces now. We are doing it province by province on a bilateral basis. We had a full meeting with the representatives of all the provinces about a week and a half ago and we are having another meeting, I believe, some time next week.

The objective of this is to try to harmonize systems, to try to see where we can do things together in such a way as to reduce, and hopefully in some cases, eliminate, the problems we are facing. That is the best that we can do at this point. We are very sympathetic to the point of view that the hon. member expresses and that is why we are approaching these meetings in a very positive way.

[Translation]

Mrs. Maheu: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Why won't the Minister make a commitment today to make good on his promise of a simple tax and to withdraw the GST so that he can start talking seriously to the provinces about a real tax reform?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that we get on with the job of sales tax reform. As I have indicated in the House on a number of occasions, including today, there have been five different studies since 1940 stating that the existing manufacturers' sales tax is a bad tax, it is holding back our economy and putting Canadian producers at a disadvantage relative to their international competitors. So we feel it is important that we get on with this tax.

The provincial governments do not have the same problems. They have some problems with their existing taxes but not to the same extent that we have at the federal level. That is why we feel we must move ahead with it. We are trying to do this in a way that we can deal with the problems the hon. member has raised in as effective a way as we can.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, last fall the department of the Minister of Finance paid a sum of roughly $1 million for a one page ad, and in some cases a two page ad, in Canadian newspapers to inform Canadians to save the notice in regards to the 9 per cent goods and services tax that he was proposing at that time.

Can the minister assure the House today that not one red cent, not one golden loonie, will be spent to advertise Bill C-62? Can he make that commitment to the people of Canada now?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I will tell the hon. member that we are proposing to have an extensive information campaign of brochures, booklets and other things Canadians can read so they can understand the GST. There will be a brochure going out to all small businesses in Canada some time next month. We will have other pamphlets for people who are in the retail business, for senior citizens, and for low-income earners so that they can understand what the tax is and how it will affect them.

• (1740)

I will recall for the hon. member the conclusion that the finance committee came to in the last Parliament after their trip to New Zealand. They felt it was very important that the government exercise responsibility in getting information out to Canadians so that they would have a broad understanding of this tax and therefore be able to draw their own conclusions as to the impact that it would have on them but also to understand that there are benefits.

With the opposition that is present in the House and from other Canadians, people must think that if there is all this opposition there has to be a good reason for the government to proceed with it. And that certainly is going to be made clear when they see how the tax will affect them.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I want to make something clear. Did the minister just confess to the House that his campaign is propaganda to counteract the opposition of members of this House? If that is the case, will the minister now commit himself not to spend one red cent until such time as the bill is passed? After it is passed—heaven forbid that it would ever pass—at that time I suggest that the minister could spread whatever information he needs to spread.

Meanwhile, will he admit to us that he has just told us this is a propaganda exercise destined to counteract what opposition members are doing in this House, nothing more?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I didn't say that at all. I said that it is important for people to get the information. Let me quote to you from the fifteenth report of the finance committee to the House in March, 1988. It said that if the government proceeds with the tax it should establish a private sector advisory committee to develop practical rules for the new tax and to publicize the details of the new tax.

Now this was a unanimous report of the finance committee, an all-party report. I think it is very clear.

My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has important information to give to senior citizens and people in low-income brackets to advise them how they should apply for the GST credit. It is very important that they put themselves in a position so they can receive the GST credit in December of this year, and clearly we have to make those arrangements at this time so that people can put themselves in a position to gain one of the benefits of the tax in December of this year.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the speeches today in the House by both leaders of the opposition parties and they relate to many of the concerns about which I get calls in my riding. Many questions concern the distribution of information, what is taxable and what isn't, and the sales tax credit. For example, here I have a brochure put out by the One Voice seniors' network listing some of the things that are taxable including water, insurance and some transportation costs. We know, according to the legislation, that that is not the case.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a question about the credit itself. I have listened to the opposition talk about those low-income Canadians and people across Canada who are losing their jobs and asking whether they will have access to the credit.

How will Canadians get this sales tax credit and when? Can the minister advise us just how many Canadians are going to be eligible for this tax across Canada?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is a very pertinent question because at this time people are receiving their income tax forms for taxation year 1989. In it there will be an application form for those people who are eligible for the GST credit. It is important that they complete it with their 1989 tax return because eligibility for the credit will be based on their income in 1989.

• (1745)

That is why we must proceed with getting this information out now so that they can be eligible and receive that first cheque in December of 1990. I believe something like 8.4 million families are involved. Some 84 per cent of seniors and families that are headed by a single parent will receive this particular benefit from the GST system. As colleagues opposite have just reminded me, the GST credit will be paid by cheque in advance four times a year so that people will have that money in pocket before they make their acquisitions.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great curiosity to the positions given by the Leader of the Opposition and by the Leader of the New Democratic Party in response to this tax. If I may make an observation before my question, the reason the Liberals have not proposed an alternative is that they intend to keep the tax if they are elected to government. That is all there is to it. They will not stand up in this House and pledge that if they are elected they will remove the tax. We have seen this before.

My question to the two governments, both supporting the tax, through you, Mr. Minister, is this: Have you received support for this tax and its implementation from any provincial government and are you now in discussions with any provincial government that would allow you to integrate the two taxes?

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put the question, not through the minister but through the Chair, and I am sure he would like to do that. The question is there and the hon. member will have a supplementary.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I did not know whether I would get this question because of the lovers' quarrel between the Liberals and the NDP.

The answer to the hon. member is that we are having discussions, as I have indicated, on ways that we can minimize or eliminate some of the compliance problems, some of the complexities of having both the federal and provincial taxes in place. As far as any discussions on total integration of the national sales tax, I think that is quite premature.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister specifically whether he has the support of any provincial government at this point for the GST.

I would now like to ask my supplementary. You did not answer that part.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member certainly has questions, but I would ask the hon. member not to refer directly to the minister.

Mr. Barrett: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, would you be kind enough to direct the minister to my question? If he is hard of hearing I know your assistance would be welcome.

I ask the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, whether or not he had the support of one single provincial government. He did not answer that. Second, through you Mr. Speaker, would you ask the minister kindly, through you back to me, whether or not he, the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, is prepared to forward the correspondence that he has received on this from any provincial government and table it in this House through the Chair?

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. I just want to say to the hon. member that that, of course, was a superbly appropriate procedurally put question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, through you, I will respond to the two questions of the hon. member. To the first, officially we have not had any provincial government which says it supports the tax. They have indicated that they see some problems with it. We have addressed a number of those problems in the course of the December 19 decisions that I put before the House at that time. Most particularly they were concerned about the economic impact and therefore, through that, the impact on their fiscal positions. I think that bringing the rate down from 9 per cent to 7 per cent has gone a long way to address those concerns, but I would imagine that they are there to an extent already.

• (1750)

The hon. member has asked whether or not I would be prepared to table all correspondence that provincial ministers have with me. I think that that would be inappropriate. Provincial ministers and the federal minister have a good working relationship where we talk frankly and openly with each other. Some of these positions are put to the Minister of Finance and I respond to them in an open and frank way. If I were in the position of having to table all correspondence, I think that frankness and openness would break down.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, through you I would like to ask the minister to comment on some of the myths that were raised this afternoon by the leaders of the opposition. I do not think they were trying to be helpful to the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. That is pretty close to saying something that might cause a motion later on. I am sure the hon. member would not want to impute the motives of other hon. members. Would the hon. member put his question please.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to ask the Minister of Finance to answer some of the questions that real Canadians have been asking who really want to know about the GST, the kind of questions that I was asked in my constituency this weekend.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Manley: The ones that agree with you?

Mr. Gauthier: What are you talking about? I'm a real Canadian.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, if I could ask questions to benefit the people of Canada rather than for whatever reasons these people have asked questions today. One, what about the complexity for small business and the expense to administer? Two, will the GST, as the NDP leader claims, make life more difficult for the poor or for senior citizens? Finally, through you Mr. Speaker, a question that I could not answer for my constituents this weekend, will the minister raise the rate of the tax over the next few years?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I dwelt a fair bit on the question of complexity during my comments earlier today. We recognize that there is something clearly new about this tax which will cause companies to have some problems in the early stages in developing their understanding of how it is going to affect their accounting, how it is going to affect their pricing, how it will affect their purchases.

One of the things that my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, will be doing is having the national revenue people working with individual companies on a one-on-one basis to help them understand and answer their questions on how the—

Mr. Boudria: Tax police.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Now, the hon. member says "tax police". How can he possibly—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. minister to direct his answer to the member and I would ask other hon. members to refrain from asking questions until they are recognized. The hon. minister.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, your wisdom is always overwhelming. I appreciate you bringing me back to the question.

This visit will be on a basis where we will do everything we can to help these companies understand the system and in that way minimize the degree of complexity that might be there.

On the second point, the hon. member asked what we are doing to help the poor and the senior citizens, people who are concerned about the possible impact of the GST on their standard of living and their way of life. I would like to point out the range of families in the Atlantic provinces that will be eligible for the GST credit. In Nova Scotia, 74 per cent of families will be eligible for the GST credit and 85 per cent of those in Newfoundland will be eligible. It is lower in other provinces. In Quebec it is 73 per cent; in Ontario, 58 per cent; and in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, 64 per cent. So there are a large number of families who are going to be in receipt of this.

• (1755)

The third question my colleagues has asked is as to what assurance we can give him that the rate will not go up. I think the greatest assurance I can give to him and to all Canadians is that if governments continue to control spending, and we have been controlling spend very tightly in recent years—

Mr. Gauthier: Nonsense. Sit down, Michael.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is provocation. There is a 3.6 per cent growth rate in our program spending. To continue that is the best way we can ensure that not only is this tax not raised but that other taxes are reduced.

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, on behalf of some real Canadians. Be they somewhat frozen today at 48 below, they are real Canadians.

On October 2, 1989, I asked the minister what the effect of the GST would be on the north since that information was absent in any of the documents on regional effects. He said, "It will improve the economic fortunes of the north by 1.5 per cent".

I would like to ask the minister, now that he has received submissions from many northern groups, including the Government of the Northwest Territories, stating that the tax will cripple the north, whether he can tell us today what measures he proposes to compensate the residents of the Arctic for the extremely high prices northerners will have to pay?.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I simply do not accept the rhetoric that the hon. member has used that it will cripple the north. I simply do not accept that.

Ms. Blondin: These are not my words.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): But it is the rhetoric that the hon. member is using.

The point which must be made is that this tax is very good for businesses that are in the north and other regions of the country. It is the businesses that create the jobs. Because the tax will be taken off the exports of the mines, some mines will be kept open that might otherwise close. In addition, because there will be no tax on the capital investment in a new mine or a new forest products project, it will be cheaper to bring these projects on stream. Again in that way they will create jobs for people in the north and other regions of the country.

The taxes on transportation that add costs to food, as another example, will be removed so that the costs of food provided to people in the north will also be able to be reduced. In a number of ways here—

Mr. Speaker: I think the minister has answered the question. The hon. member from Western Arctic, a supplementary.

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. I cannot believe my ears. The rhetoric I am accused of using are the words of my constituents who are concerned, gravely concerned.

Mr. Speaker, through you to the Minister of Finance, I say that the goods and services tax is going to have an extremely negative effect on the cost of living in the north, on transportation, on the small businesses he refers to, on the tourism industry, on mining, and all at a time when the federal government has reduced its transfer payments to the Government of the Northwest Territories by $110 million.

What does the Minister of Finance propose to supplement the financial burden now being faced by the territorial government? They are being asked to increase personal and corporate income taxes in the north, which they cannot afford because the cost of living is so high and the cost of operating a business is so abominably high it is unacceptable.

• (1800)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I understand and appreciate what the hon. member is saying.

We had negotiations with both the government of the Territories and the Yukon government concerning the transfer payments. I think the two governments understand the nature of the fiscal position that the Government of Canada is in. It requires us to take some steps that we are not too happy that we have to take. But we know that we must get this deficit down. We must get the debt under greater control.

If we can get that debt under greater control, then we can get interest rates down. I think that will be helpful to the people and to the businesses which my hon. friend talks about in the north. That is the direction that we are following.

[Translation]

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, can the Minister tell me if he intends to exempt from this tax agreements between municipalities covering water sales, as well as engineering planning, fire-fighting and police services? Can the Minister tell me whether he intends to exempt municipalities from this tax?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the principle that we are following in the treatment of the GST as it relates to municipal services is to impose no greater burden on them than is the situation now with the federal sales tax, the manufacturers' sales tax.

There is tax today on a number of things that municipalities purchase. We have said we are not going to increase that burden.

Exactly how we will do this can go one of two ways. We put one proposal in the technical paper, and subsequently in the December 19 statement.

Following that, we have had some discussions with the provinces to discuss a proposal that Mr. Nixon of the province of Ontario has put forward to see whether there is another way of achieving that same objective. Those discussions are proceeding. I am not in a position where I can say anything more than that, except to underscore the basic principle that they will not have greater tax to pay.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt, but given the time I can take a single question from the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, under the present tax regime the Minister of Finance's friends from Bay Street can deduct their three-martini lunches. They can deduct their escort services. They can deduct their lunches at Winston's.

Mr. Speaker, last year that cost the Canadian taxpayers $1 billion. Now he is putting on a 7 per cent tax, which means that they will be able to write off even more.

How does the Minister of Finance justify this to all the millions of Canadians who are looking for justice in the tax system while he allows his rich friends to write off more of their luxury and high living? How does he justify it?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, if we had not allowed any write off of business and other forms of business development expenses the hon. member would be hearing from the business community.

Mr. Rodriguez: Other countries have limited the tax.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He would also be hearing from the restaurant association, the hotel association and other organizations like that, which gain a significant amount of their business, including in Sudbury—

Mr. Rodriguez: You have no control over it, so just do it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It is important that we make sure that this is not excessive. That is why we cut back—

Mr. Rodriguez: Poor people pay the tax on the basics.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am trying to provide an answer to the hon. member but clearly he is not of a mind to listen.

We cut back from a 100 per cent deduction to an 80 per cent deduction to reflect concerns that I think the hon. member and I would share.

To go further than that, it can do some damage to the tourism industry in this country. I believe that that is something the hon. member has ignored.

Mr. Speaker: I remind hon. members that we are all bound by the special order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Just before you end off the afternoon, I want to say on behalf of the New Democratic Party, and I suspect that others will want to say something too, that as a result of the special order we departed from the traditional way we handle the kick-off of important legislation. I simply want to say how much we have appreciated the chance to raise questions at the end of the three leading speeches from the three political parties.

We appreciate the Minister of Finance making himself available for this hour to enter into this exchange. I think it has been helpful and useful. I think those viewing would agree.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his comments. We on this side of the House very much appreciate this kind of constructive debate, the opportunity to genuinely explore an issue because we are confident that we can win the debate.

I want to say that I hope this is a signal from the opposition parties that they will sit down and seriously debate the issue rather than engaging in the games which wasted so much time last week.

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker appreciates the complimentary comments back and forth across the chamber.

I should say to the public watching that a great many members have stayed until now to take part in this debate. Not all have been able to be recognized.

I would indicate to House leaders that the Speaker would be prepared to take that into consideration at Question Period tomorrow so that those who did not have a chance to rise might be considered tomorrow.

Pursuant to the order made earlier today, the debate on second reading is adjourned. This House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

While I am on my feet I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen.

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

PRIVILEGE

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from the vote we have just taken. I want very quickly to refer to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition and simply remind the House what parliamentary privilege includes.

Section 16 reads:

> Parliamentary privilege is the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions and which exceed those possessed by other bodies or individuals.

It goes on:

> The privileges of Parliament are rights which are "absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers". They are enjoyed by individual Members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its Members.

Having said that, for many days now my colleagues and I have had petitions that we have been asked by our constituents to present in the House of Commons. Petitioners make it very clear both in their presentations to myself as a member—and I am sure I am speaking on behalf of most members of the House, including members of the government—that they want us to present their views in the House of Commons.

This is a right that goes back many hundreds of years, the right of a citizen to petition the Parliament of Canada. The government, as a result of this motion and previous motions, is making this responsibility that a member takes on impossible.

That is why I really believe that our rights as members are being breached and our privileges as members are being breached. We are not able to serve our constituents as we ought. One of the most fundamental rights has been denied, not only us as members but the constituents we represent.

That is only one aspect. There are also—

Mr. McDermid: You stop the work of the House all the time. What are you talking about? You are being silly. You stop the work of the House all the time.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I hear an interjection. Somebody is simply saying that we are stopping the work on the GST from time to time. That has nothing to do with the rights of the members of the House of Commons.

We have a right to present petitions on behalf of our constituents. That is simply part of the argument.

The other part of the argument is that there are many members who have been asked by constituent groups to present private members' bills and private members' motions on their behalf.

We have gone to the legal departments and asked the legal clerks to assist us in creating and developing private members' bills that reflect the views of our constituents. Most recent, on behalf of a group of cattlemen from western Canada who are concerned about the cattle rustling that was going on in all parts of Canada, and because the government had failed to act in ways that various cattle organizations had requested, I was asked as a private member if I could introduce the issue via a private member's bill.

Cattle rustling is a very serious issue in all parts of Canada, particularly western Canada. Hundreds of head of cattle disappear each year as a result of rustlers. We were asked and we acted accordingly.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, from looking at the Order Paper today, I have a whole list of private members' bills which I ought to be introducing. However, as a result of the government's very undemocratic motion that denies every member his or her rights, I am now unable to introduce my private member's bills on behalf of constituent groups across Canada.

For that reason I really believe that my rights as a member have been breached. Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to rule on the appropriateness of the government to take steps day after day after day which make it impossible for members of Parliament to do the jobs that we were sent here to do and whether it is appropriate that the government has the right simply to ignore the Routine Proceedings of the day, within which we are able to carry on the duties and responsibilities we were elected to do.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join this debate. Indeed what we have just heard sounds to me like a crying over spilled type of approach.

Last week and this week, the House has seen the New Democratic Party do certain things to procedures that frustrated the Orders of the Day, that is, the Routine Proceedings and the calling of business for debate by the members of this House. We did not complain about that being an attack on our privilege at the time, and I do not think it is today, although I did, as all of us on this side in the Official Opposition did, vote against the motion put by the government that we proceed to Orders of the Day.

We feel as strongly as anybody about our right to table petitions, and indeed we have proven that over the months. Since last August Liberal members of Parliament have tabled over 60,000 names and over 1,500 GST petitions here in the House.These are in addition to the 250,000 petitions delivered to the Minister of Finance in September of last year which were gathered by the Sun newspaper chain.

We still have hundreds of thousands of petitions to table in this House. We will table them some day and Canadians will have a chance to have recorded in the proceedings of that day that they objected to this drastic tax, this unjust and unfair sales tax which the government is proposing.

I object to anybody saying that my privileges in this House have been impeded today because the government went to Orders of the Day. I think that is within the rules.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I associate myself with the remarks of the previous speaker, and rather than participate in this filibuster any longer, I would ask that you rule immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to thank the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and the House leader for their interventions.

I would like to say that the motion to proceed to Orders of the Day is an age old motion. As far as petitions are concerned the member can file them with the clerk at the table. On private members' bills, there will be future opportunities. Therefore I have to rule out the question of privilege.

I believe there has been consent to have the hon. member for York Centre present his motion.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

REPORT ON CONVICTION OF DONALD MARSHALL

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the decision of the House taken by this vote to proceed to Orders of the Day, I believe you will find unanimous consent to permit me to press the matter of the emergency debate of which I have given the Chair notice as required under Standing Order 52.

I move and request that the report just released of the Royal commission established by the Government of Nova Scotia to investigate the conviction of Donald Marshall, Junior, a Micmac Indian, and the implications of the findings for the national government in areas relating to justice, racism, native justice and self-government, police conduct and the Correctional Service of Canada, be considered by the House on an emergency basis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will look at the matter, and I am sure the Speaker will rule on it later this day.

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, January 29, 1990, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 7569)

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I want to take a minute to indicate that the procedure yesterday wherein there was an opportunity to question the Minister of Finance for an hour at the end of the interventions of the Minister of Finance, the Leader of the Official Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party found some favour in that it gave members, who might not normally get a chance to participate in Question Period but were interested in the debate of the day, an opportunity to question the Minister of Finance.

I would point out to the House that we have looked at this and the Minister is prepared, should the House so wish, to do the same thing today for half an hour. This would give all members who participated in the debate and others an opportunity to question the minister. Our proposal has been made to the Official Opposition and to the New Democratic Party. It would be based on the same understanding as yesterday, that is, that there would be no dilatory motions during the day and also that there would be no effort on either side to extend the hours.

We have put this proposition to the opposition parties with the interest of furthering debate. It does impact on the minister's time but he wants to make himself available for this type of questioning. If my hon. friends have had an opportunity to review our proposition and it finds favour with them, we are prepared to put the motion immediately.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, indeed the proposal was put to us and we on this side, at least, the Official Opposition, the Liberals, would take this proposal very seriously. There are some questions and clarifications which we would like to pursue before we give our consent to the motion. Such questions could be resolved this afternoon when the House Leaders of all parties meet for our regular Tuesday afternoon House Leaders meeting.

I would just like to give notice that we, for example, would like to question whether that half hour should be within the eight-hour debate allocated at second reading. We could possibly come to a conclusion on that one. We would prefer that it would not be within the eight hours of debate but, rather, excluded from that.

We would like to know who will answer questions. I just heard the minister say it would be the Minister of Finance. Well, the Minister of Finance would be here, I take it, in the last half hour of the day, or the Minister or State for Finance as his replacement. That satisfied that concern.

We would like to be assured that this proposal in the motion not yet put, but if adopted, would follow a certain procedure of advising the opposition that indeed the government would call Bill C-62 on a specific day. We would like to be sure, even though the notice paper says "subject to change" that that bill and not something else would be called on that day.

We have other small concerns which we would like to raise at that meeting. If the government is willing to consider further discussions and clarifications, that is fine with us.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have to hand it to the government House Leader. This was a very interesting and creative proposal. I think it grew out of a reflection that was shared by all members of the House yesterday that the exchange which occurred late in the day with the Minister of Finance was a useful discussion. I think that we saw the Minister of Finance unable to respond to the questions on a number of points, which I think is useful to identify those areas where the government has no idea what the implications of the GST will be and so on. I think that clarification is useful and I think we felt it was a useful time.

However, I want to make it perfectly clear, in case there is any element of doubt in anyone's mind, that we in the New Democratic Party oppose this GST completely and totally.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: We have no inclination to assist, encourage, work with or co-operate with this government, as presumably the Liberals have, under any condition. There is no willingness to co-operate.

My good friend, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, did not say whether they were supporting this. He said they had some questions, to be fair. We have seen the co-operation. As a matter of fact, we just saw it earlier today. I tried to argue that what the government was doing was inappropriate but my friends, the Liberals, were saying that was a spurious sort of argument and that they would like to support the government once again. This is getting to be a boring repetition, the Liberals supporting the government from time to time.

However, just in conclusion, because I think it is appropriate that I give a clear signal to the Government House Leader, I am prepared to discuss anything. If we can find a way in this motion that would not be, in any way, co-operating with the government on its GST initiative, but would in fact permit a more open and useful debate to identify the pros and cons as different groups see them, that is something that I want to consider seriously.

I understand the House Leaders will be meeting later today to discuss a variety of issues. I suspect that hon. colleagues would say this ought to be one of them in terms of procedure. I am certainly willing to entertain that discussion at that point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Well, I surmise that there is no consent right now but you will have discussions.

Before I recognize the hon. member from Trois-Rivière for debate, there is a point of order from the hon. member for Surrey North and also from the hon. member for Ottawa South. On a point of order, the hon. member from Surrey North was rising first.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak to Bill C-62.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry. The hon. member for Ottawa South on a point of Order.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, while I obviously will support the position of my whip on the matter raised, I would like to observe that yesterday I was one of those members the government House Leader referred to who had an opportunity to put questions to the minister. I was very grateful for the opportunity to put questions, but I put the same question two times and the minister made no reference to the substance of the question in either of his answers. I would like to suggest that if the minister is kind enough to come that he answer the questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has the floor and he has spoken. The hon. member for Trois-Rivière.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate on the goods and services tax bill. Thanks to this legislation, we will be able to strengthen our economy—

[English]

Mr. Riis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rodriguez: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member from Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that you can selectively decide if you hear a point of order or not. I clearly rose on a point of order at the beginning of debate and I would like to make a motion. The motion is:

That the member for Surrey North now be heard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am afraid the hon. member is just a little late. The hon. member from Trois-Rivière has the floor.

Mr. Riis: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rodriguez: You're pulling that stunt again.

Mr. Angus: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I recognized the hon. member for Trois-Rivière on debate and he has started his debate. Therefore, I cannot recognize the hon. member's point of order, unless it has something to do with anything in particular.

Mr. Riis: You don't know what it has to do with.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Well, all right. I will recognize the hon. member on his point of order. The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: My point of order was simply this, Mr. Speaker. At the beginning of the debate I sought to be recognized on a point of order. It was that the hon. member for Surrey North be now heard. That was my point of order. I am quite able to present that motion. Now, whether you accept the motion, Mr. Speaker, is for you to decide, I acknowledge that, but not to simply rule my point of order out of order.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, we are now gaining a certain amount of experience when it comes to these issues, after the games the NDP have played last week and again this week.

The bottom line of our understanding of this procedure is that once an hon. member rises and begins to speak, if the Speaker hears him begin to speak, then that particular motion is out of order. It was very clear from where I sit, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member who you recognized had begun speaking and therefore the motion by the hon. member for Kamloops is out of order.

• (1210)

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, when you called Government Orders the member for Surrey North was clearly standing in his place. No other member of this House was standing. I watched carefully, Mr. Speaker. You did look to the member for Surrey North. You did see him—or at least you gave the impression of seeing him. I would ask that you consider the motion by the House Leader of the New Democratic Party as one that is quite in order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I was also present during those deliberations. The way I recall it, which may differ from other people, is that indeed you did recognize the member for Surrey North. At that time you had not called debate and he said, "I want to speak on debate".

The member for Ottawa South was on a point of order and you did say you were going to recognize points of order. The point of order made by the member for Ottawa South was recognized, then you called for debate. I heard the member being called take the floor at the time. Whether the point of order was heard by you before he took the floor or not, Mr. Speaker, is for you to decide, not for me.

The only motion that we can make on a point of order, I think, is that so and so be heard instead of another member. I would leave it to you, Mr. Speaker, to decide whether the member had the floor. And if you gave him the floor I think it is very clear in the rules who has the floor at this time.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it might be useful for the House to take a five-minute recess to allow the Chair to go through the record rather than us having this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I really do not need a five-minute recess for this purpose. I recognized the hon. member for Trois-Rivières on debate. He started to speak before the hon. member rose on a point of order. Therefore, on debate, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, at the risk of repeating myself, I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate today on the goods and services tax bill.

Thanks to this bill, we will be able to strengthen our economy, reduce the deficit and make our tax system more equitable.

I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) on this excellent initiative. Actually, Mr. Speaker, when you think about it, the job of Minister of Finance has never been an easy one. The situation has not improved today, now that we are facing problems that are both extremely urgent and complex. The world is economy is changing quickly in a host of different ways.

Since he was appointed, the Minister of Finance has shown that he is intelligent, responsible, effective and a man of great courage.

It would be so much easier to reduce taxes, to offer new services and to develop all kinds of programs. In fact, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly how governments proceeded from the end of the sixties up to the early of the eighties. They were the big spenders. Public servants were hired in the tens of thousands. New programs were being introduced daily. Crown corporations were created in every possible sector, for every possible reason. In a word, Mr. Speaker, they were living in a fool's paradise.

The balance sheet was not a priority. If they ran out of money, no problem—they just borrowed a few billion more.

Mr. Speaker, the government we had in the seventies and the early eighties promised Canadians the moon. We know what we got: a national debt of nearly $320 billion.

Mr. Speaker, today we have to pay the bill. It hurts when we have to cut spending. It hurts when we increase taxes. However, we have to do this in 1990 if we want to correct the excesses of the past and offer the programs and services Canadians will need in the future.

When introduced, a measure like the GST is never very popular. However, when Canadians see the positive results on our balance sheet and in our country's economy, I am sure the majority of Canadians will understand that the tax reform proposed in this bill is both necessary and salutary.

The GST bill is part of a series of measures aimed at strengthening the Canadian economy and reducing the deficit. I think it would be useful to review the main characteristics of the GST.

It will apply to the majority of goods and services, with the exception of the following: basic groceries; medical devices; prescription drugs; residential rents and existing housing; loans, mortgages and life insurance premiums; health and dental services, including hospital and nursing care; most education services; day care services; legal aid services; municipal transit services and passenger ferries.

This means we did not accept the recommendation that favoured applying the tax to all goods and services. I must admit, Mr Speaker, that I am very pleased with this decision because it would have been brutal to apply the tax to such necessities as basic groceries, prescription drugs, existing housing or day care, just to reduce the tax by one or two percentage points. In fact, we managed to reduce the rate to 7 per cent without resorting to this radical application.

For businesses, the amount of GST they pay will be the difference between the tax they collect on their sales and the tax they pay on their purchases. If the tax they collect is less than the tax they pay, the government will refund the difference. To claim a refund or pay the tax due, most businesses will have to complete a one-page form, I repeat, one page. There are prophets of doom and gloom in the House and outside who would have Canadian businesses believe they will have to complete endless forms. No, Mr. Speaker, just one page!

Thanks to the input tax credit, businesses will receive a full refund of sales tax on their inputs, which will reduce operating costs in Canada and make all sectors of our economy more competitive. This measure will have the effect of reducing the price of capital goods by an average of 4 per cent. Lower costs will increase incentives to invest, resulting in an increase in productive capital stock and a significant increase in production in most sectors throughout the country.

One of the major concerns about the GST, mainly among small businesses, was the administrative burden that the GST would impose. We intend to introduce a number of simplified accounting procedures. The government will provide a measure of sales tax and income tax relief for small businesses that purchase cash registers to help them apply the GST. The government, together with small business, will also look at other ways to simplify administering the tax.

Mr. Speaker, we are also co-operating closely with the provinces in the area of sales tax administration. Recent statements by the Minister of Finance of Ontario give us hope that we will have a period of co-operation between the two levels of government in this field, which would be positive and much appreciated by business people, Mr. Speaker.

Most sales by charitable organizations and many sales by non-profit bodies will be exempt. Furthermore, charities and agencies largely funded by the state will be eligible for a 50 per cent refund of the GST paid on their purchases for exempt activities.

To protect low-income Canadians, a refundable GST credit will be paid four times a year to nearly 8.7 million families and individuals. The credit will be $190 for adults and $100 for children. Single parents will be able to claim an adult credit if they have a dependent child. Unmarried adults, including single parents, will be able to claim an additional credit of up to $100. The first GST credit payment should be made in December 1990.

Again, Mr. Speaker, you know that it was this government that established a refundable credit, payable in advance. This is excellent for low-income families and I think that the Minister of Finance should be congratulated for this initiative.

With this refundable credit, families whose income is less than $30,000 will pay less income and sales tax than at present; I repeat, Mr. Speaker: families whose income is less than $30,000. Just this morning, I saw an article in the local Trois-Rivières newspaper saying that seniors would be adversely affected by the GST. Mr. Speaker, this is absolutely untrue for all seniors whose income is $30,000 or less.

• (1220)

I think it is important to say it and to put an end to the scare campaign currently being waged. Three quarters of households headed by a senior citizen or a single parent will see their after tax income go up, Mr. Speaker. The GST proposal calls not only for certain initial benefits for farmers and fishermen but also includes a list of important tax-free items.

As far as housing is concerned, the GST will only apply to new construction and major renovations. The modified housing rebate will represent 2.5 per cent of the purchase price up to $350,000. This rebate will be gradually reduced for homes worth $350,000 to $450,000, and I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I will not have any problems with that in my riding.

On December 19, the Minister of Finance announced major changes to the GST which are included in this bill. The most important change was the reduction of the GST rate to 7 per cent. This lower rate, in conjunction with other changes, meets certain objectives: to benefit quickly and smoothly from the economic spin-offs of the GST, to protect low-income Canadians, to minimize—

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Nickel Belt on a point of order.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Trois Rivieres has been here since 1984. There is a longstanding tradition and practice in this House that members do not read their speeches. We are not interested in what the Ministry of Finance thinks about the GST. We are interested in what the member thinks about the GST. In fact, he is reading a speech. If you want to do that, you go to the other place. But in here you are supposed to be able, after five and a half years, to make a speech without having to read it verbatim from some prepared speech from the finance department.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the hon. member was referring to his notes. This is a very important debate and I just think that this is what the hon. member is doing. I am sure he as is capable, as any other hon. member in this House, to debate without notes. But I guess when you are debating finance even the hon. member for Nickel Belt might have to refer to some calculations or some figures or something. The hon. member has made his point of order and I am sure the hon. parliamentary secretary will take heed.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, you are probably right. In 1972, for the first three months, I may have read a speech, but I cannot remember ever taking a speech and just reading it verbatim. People are watching on TV and they know that he is not just referring to notes. He is reading verbatim. I have never read verbatim from any speech in this House since 1972.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, I realize the hon. member is never short of words. I do appreciate what he is saying. The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam on a point of order.

Mr. Waddell: In spite of what you said, Mr. Speaker, you have to lay down the rules clearly. The rules of the House are that you cannot read your speech. I think you have to tell the hon. member that those are the rules of the House and you have not done that, with respect.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Trois Rivieres on debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, when one is in the House representing the government and the Minister of Finance one tries to give Canadians the best information available, but as usual Members opposite are having difficulties understanding such a significant issue as the GST. Sure enough, Mr. Speaker, I did refer to my notes and I will continue to do so if only to make it that much easier for NDP Members to grasp the reality of life, at last!

You know, Mr. Speaker, they do not understand Meech Lake, they do not understand that Quebec is a distinct society, except that they are for it when they are in Quebec but against it anywhere else in the rest of the country. They do not understand the GST except perhaps when they are somewhere else in Canada, and even then so far they seem to be against the GST wherever they are. Some NDP Members are in favour of Meech Lake, others are against—

Mr. Nystrom: That is better.

An hon. member: Keep it up.

Mr. Vincent: See, Mr. Speaker, they get upset when we tell them the truth. But I want to go on with my remarks.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I think that is much better from the member for Trois Rivieres.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: We are not angered by that.

An hon. member: We are proud.

Mr. Rodriguez: We are actually very pleased that he is finally being himself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate. The hon. member for Trois Rivieres.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Talk about a problem, Mr. Speaker, if the NDP sides with me I am in deep trouble.

Some hon. members: Ah, ah!

Mr. Vincent: I will have to be careful, Mr. Speaker, I do not like it when they are on my side.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to check my notes and point out that one of the advantages of the GST will be to reduce—

Mr. Nystrom: Watch it, you are reading!

Mr. Vincent: —reduce the deficit and, as you would know, Mr. Speaker, Canadians have made recommendations concerning the GST and there was a national debate on the issue when all Members and all interest groups had an opportunity to air their views. When the GST is implemented on January 1, 1991, when 8.7 million Canadians will have received their first tax credit instalment, and when Canadian companies and particularly small- and medium-sized businesses realize that all they need do is fill in a single 8 1/2 by 11 sheet of paper, sales less purchases, Canadians and perhaps NDP Members, I repeat, perhaps—

Mr. Pronovost: Impossible!

Mr. Vincent: My colleague from Saint-Maurice (Mr. Pronovost) says it is impossible. I am inclined to think he has a point, but perhaps the NDP Members will indeed understand the GST.

I know that some Liberal Members of the Official Opposition understand the GST and they are supportive. There are some, not many but a few.

Mr. Nystrom: Like who?

Mr. Vincent: The Liberal Finance critic was in favour of the GST. Maybe that is why he is no longer the Finance critic. He was turfed out. He was in favour of the tax, but that's nothing to be ashamed of!

Comments from associations and from the opposition were sometimes valid but sometimes, unfortunately, based on premises that did not reflect the real situation. After listening to Canadians, after listening to associations and the Opposition, we tried to come up with several amendments, tabled by the Minister of Finance, that would reflect the Canadian reality and would better serve the interests of Canada. Mr. Speaker, you know we could have done what other governments have done: change nothing.

When I was studying for a master's degree in tax law at the University of Sherbrooke in 1978, the professor who explained the federal sales tax said: "The present federal sales tax does not make sense". The federal government at the time had appointed a committee. My professor said: "I hope the committee will act on the recommendations and do something about this tax". That, Mr. Speaker, was in 1978. The Conservative Government has made its position clear. It wasn't easy. We know Canadians do not like to pay taxes. Nobody likes paying taxes. However, we made it clear we intended to change a system that was not good for Canadian business, for our economy or for anything in general. We are going to tax goods and services, which is not exactly pleasant, but it is necessary. We are not in the business of passing out goodies, we are governing a country. We were elected to govern, and that is what we are doing.

The opposition was also elected to govern. I think we should remember that it was elected to govern with the party in power, and I think it should sit down and give the subject some serious thought and make concrete proposals instead of just being negative. Not just proposals, but concrete proposals.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress, and this is important, that most Canadians on low incomes will not be affected by the GST.

• (1230)

I include the elderly, and I do so because scare tactics are being used against them, similar to the scare tactics used during the last election campaign on the free trade issue. Unfortunately, the opposition seems very fond of using these tactics. Instead of being realistic and getting their facts and figures straight, they use scare tactics.

An hon. member: Oh, oh! Not so!

Mr. Vincent: And that, Mr. Speaker, is wrong. I don't see why a member of Parliament should try to scare the elderly when he knows perfectly well that the GST will not have an impact on elderly Canadians on low incomes.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I support this bill, and I hope it will be passed as soon as possible.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, in the course of his speech, the parliamentary secretary said, and I quote:

> —the main objective of the GST is to reduce the federal deficit.

However, during the election campaign, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) said: The tax reform will be revenue neutral.

Is the parliamentary secretary telling us, does he admit, that the minister did not tell the truth during the election campaign and that his objective always was to reduce the deficit?

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I must admit I like the opposition member's question, but I also realize that notes come in very handy. This is what I said: The GST bill is part of a series of measures aimed at strengthening the Canadian economy and reducing the deficit.

That is what I said, Mr. Speaker. To answer the hon. member's question, the GST will not necessarily raise more revenue, if we consider the current situation. However, the GST will benefit Canadian businesses, because at the present time, importers are in a better position than our own Canadian businesses which are at a disadvantage because of a hidden, 13.5 per cent federal manufacturers' sales tax. Importers do not have this tax. A Canadian business that exports to other countries has the same 13.5 per cent cost, which does not exist in any other country. We are the only country in the world that still has a manufacturers' sales tax. It is important for us to change our tax system, to make our businesses competitive, and yes, they will make more money, and yes, they will pay more income tax, and yes, the economy will be better off, and if the economy is better off, yes, Mr. Speaker, we will continue to reduce the deficit as intended and as we should!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Vincent).

According to a Gallup poll published two or three days ago, 75 per cent of Canadians are now opposed to the GST. I also saw the poll showed that opposition in Quebec is almost the strongest, with 77 per cent against the GST. Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Trois-Rivières: We are in a democratic country here and it is now clear that most Quebecers are very opposed to the GST; why is he, as a member from Quebec, in favour of it? Why does he not represent his constituents at all? Most people where he comes from are against this federal government measure, because the Finance Minister's (Mr. Wilson) bill will take a lot of money from ordinary people—it is regressive.

And as I said, more than 70 per cent of Quebecers are against it. So why does he pay no heed to those who elected him fifteen months ago?

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I must point out to my colleague that in a poll, when people are asked if they are for or against the GST, it is normal for them to be against taxation, be it the GST, an income tax increase or any other change. If I ask the hon. member himself whether he is in favour of any tax, he will tell me no. No one likes to pay tax!

I would also point out to him that a poll was taken in my riding and 77 per cent of the people were not necessarily against the GST. Organizations like the Chamber of Commerce were in favour of the GST at 7 per cent.

Mr. Manley: No, that's not true!

Mr. Vincent: The Trois-Rivières Chamber of Commerce is active, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Manley: No, that's not true!

Mr. Vincent: It is active. The Chamber of Commerce—

An hon. member: That's false!

Mr. Vincent: If the Opposition would let me finish! They are for the GST at 7 per cent—

Mr. Manley: Six per cent with provincial participation!

Mr. Vincent: —as a first step and they would rather have the provinces with us. I told them to convey their message to the provincial governments. We should like to have the provinces with us too. We have no problem with that.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to my hon. friend that we have been elected as a Government to administer this country. To administer a country means that you may have to make decisions which are not necessarily easy or popular.

You must have faced this problem, I am sure. When an organization in your riding applies for a subsidy, although your constitients are all for it, you may have to refuse for one reason or another, including the fact that there is no money, or that there exists no single program to fully meet the needs. It is not because you are not providing your riding with the money your constituents are anxious to get that you are not a good representative doing your job properly and protecting the interests of your riding, your province or your country.

Mr. Gagliano: In his speech, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance indicated that the GST legislation would be introducing a new simplified accounting system. Having listened to him carefully, I wonder if his departmental officials have explained to him what this new simplified accounting system is all about.

As members of the finance committee, Mr. Speaker, we have travelled everywhere in this country, and among the hundreds and hundreds of witnesses which we heard, not a single one of them was in favour of this simplified accounting system. They felt that the whole system was ridiculous and would only complicate things. President Bullock of the Canadian Federation of Independant Business, for one, has totally rejected the system. As a matter of fact, he has also rejected the GST outright.

So, when the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary insists that there are business people out there who understand and support this legislation, I just do not know who he has in mind, because to date, a number of organizations, especially small and medium-sized businesses, have even used paid announcements in newspapers to denounce this tax.

I should like him, therefore, to mention the names of these people we do not know yet who support this legislation.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to my friend from Saint-Léonard because in fact, before the Christmas recess, I spoke to the Laval Chamber of Commerce, the second largest Chamber of Commerce in Quebec, I think, and the hon. member for Saint-Léonard will correct me if I am wrong. After my speech, the chairman of the Laval Chamber of Commerce said: "The Laval Chamber of Commerce supports the GST if at 7 per cent". That was the second largest Chamber of Commerce in Quebec, Mr. Speaker.

In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member for Saint-Léonard, which is in the area of Laval, so to speak, should do his homework and perhaps get out and look at the real world around him.

Mr. Speaker, to answer the specific question put by the hon. member, I would like to ask him if he thinks that an act with 22,000 exemptions, because as we know the federal sales tax currently has 22,000 exemptions, is something that can be called simple? Is this something the Canadian people, Canadian business people can like, an act with 22,000 exemptions, with some 150 pending cases and 150 new cases coming up each year?

I remember, Mr. Speaker, last year the hon. member for Saint-Léonard put questions to the Minister of Finance, asking him when he would get rid of his sales tax because it was destroying jobs in Montreal. We told him we would change it as soon as possible. And now, because we are changing it, he wants us to keep the old system and go on destroying jobs: That, Mr. Speaker, is the Liberal Opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret but the period allowed for questions and comments has expired. Debate. The hon. member for Ottawa South (Mr. Manley).

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Taylor: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I could not help but notice when you called for debate and looked around the chamber, as previously you did not recognize a member from the back benches of our party. This time a member from the front benches of our party stood. Therefore I wish to move:

That the member for Yorkton-Melville be now heard.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have a point of order from the hon. member for Ottawa South.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, we have fought this tax tooth and nail across the country. We are here to fight it now in the House of Commons.

I would like to point out that, conscious of the fact that more dilatory tactics were about to take place by the NDP the moment you recognized that we were to resume debate, I started talking as I got to my feet. I would like to say this. Rather than wasting half an hour or eight hours of debate we should be here to debate this and not to waste time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The floor having been given to the hon. member by the Chair I have to put the question.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

The hon. member for Ottawa South.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): I would like to begin by expressing my disbelief at the fact that the NDP would try to silence me in making the deeply felt objections that I have to the goods and services tax.

I would like to say that I travelled across Canada with the member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Rodriguez: Point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nickel Belt on a point of order.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that it is a well known practice and rule that no member can reflect on a vote. I think that what the hon. member is doing is reflecting on a vote which has been decisive and has been taken.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. My colleague is right.

Also, the NDP was not trying to silence the member. We are trying to hear another member, a member who is opposed to and not for the GST. That is what we are trying to do. We are not like the Liberals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ottawa South has the floor on debate.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, their intellectual bankruptcy is only exceeded by their arrogance.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Manley: I am here not to talk about that left wing rump, what is left of them down there as they recede into irrelevance. I am here to talk about the government and what it is doing to the people of Canada with this regressive tax.

I have a question that I would like to ask of government members who are here. Who is in charge over there? Yesterday we saw in the polls that not only are most Canadians opposed to the GST, not only do we see that Canadians from all regions of the country are opposed to the GST, but 56 per cent of people who identify themselves as Conservative supporters are opposed to the GST. Who over there is in charge? Who is listening?

Maybe I have an idea about that. We know how much the government likes the corporate model. We know how it thinks that the private sector is really the model for everything. I think that the Prime Minister considers the Government of Canada to be just kind of like the Iron Ore Company. I think that he figures he is the chairman of the board of a great big corporation.

We all know in the corporate structure there are different groups, especially in big corporations. There is this group, that group, the finance group. There is the production group. There is the human relations group. There are all the different sections of a corporation. I think what has happened in the Prime Minister's board of directors is that the finance group has gotten control. I think those who are in charge of human relations in the corporation of the Government of Canada have been shut out.

Those people are listening to the bean counters and they are not concerned about the people. That is what has gone wrong. They do not care about the people. They have the bean counters lined up. They have the economists lined up and they are saying: "Well, we have devised a method to reform the old manufacturers' sales tax, that old tax that we have wanted to reform for so long. And here it is, the streamlined system. Look how neat it is on paper. You can draw a flow chart for it and you can put it on an overhead projector. You can run pictures of it in the boardroom. You can use multicolour, overlapping slides to explain how to do it. It looks terrific". But nobody is asking the people how it is going to affect them. All the government is doing is looking at these numbers.

So who is in charge? Who is listening to the people of Canada? Who is listening to the Conservatives of Canada? Their members of Parliament are not.

I think the question that the government has to ask itself before it proceeds any further with this tax is whether it has any remaining credibility, whether the Minister of Finance has sufficient remaining credibility to put this tax into effect.

There is a big problem lurking here for the people of Canada and for the Government of Canada. What happens if there is a massive tax revolt? What is the government going to do when the people of Canada finally say: "Enough is enough. We are withholding our taxes"? What is it going to do? Unless the government has the credibility, and unless its Minister of Finance has the credibility to put this tax into effect, then they enact it and implement it at their peril, and at the peril of order in Canada.

What about fiscal responsibility? We heard one of the Conservative members speak just a moment ago on how this tax was really being brought in to solve the deficit. I think in fact he said the main objective is deficit reduction. Of course, that flies in the face of promises made before and during the election campaign that this was going to be a revenue neutral reform.

I have been digging around in the library and I came up with a document called: "Economic and Fiscal Statement". It was delivered in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance on November 8, 1984. That was just two months after the election.

The Minister of Finance had some pretty grim news for Canadians. He told them that if they had not had the good fortune to elect him, that Canada was going to be in pretty desperate straits by the end of 1989 or 1990. He said that if his new policies were not put into effect then, under the old government's policies, federal revenues in 1990–91 were going to reach $100 billion.

He said that federal spending by 1990–91 under the old government's policies was going to reach $137 billion. He said with respect to the deficit that when he enacted his policies by 1990–91 he was going to bring it down to $18 billion a year.

What is the reality? After this great change of course and of direction what has this fiscally responsible Minister of Finance done? Instead of the projected $100 billion in government revenues by next year we now expect it is going to be $120 billion—more than he had said in his worst case scenario. Instead of spending of $137 billion, which he thought was going to be such a gloom and doom situation, we are now projecting $149 billion—$12 billion more. Instead of having an $18 billion deficit, we all know he is going to come in in excess of $30 billion.

These are the facts that the Minister of Finance has to bring to the people of Canada in asking this essential question. Does he have the credibility to bring in the most significant change in taxation in Canada since the introduction of the income tax in 1917?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 13 minutes left in his debate plus 10 minutes questions and comments when we return to Government Orders.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

SPORTS

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the fine young athletes representing Canada—in particular those from northern Ontario—in Auckland at the Commonwealth Games.

Whether it be France Gareau from Verner or the fine young boxer Domenic Filane from Schreiber, our athletes from northern Ontario are proving that they have the commitment and ability to compete with the best in the world.

In fact, northern Ontarians are very proud of the efforts of Kenora's Michael Smith who captured the gold medal in the most difficult test in the sporting world, the decathlon.

In performing his personal best in four events and in setting a new Canadian decathlon record, Michael Smith scored an impressive 8,525 points to win the Commonwealth gold.

I am sure that all members would want to join with me in congratulating Michael Smith on his Commonwealth achievement and wishing him the best in his future pursuits in the world arena. Congratulations, Michael.

EL SALVADOR

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, after I left El Salvador, three men leading a Bible study class in a Baptist church were arrested by the Treasury Police who notoriously mistreat political prisoners. They seem to suspect church people of being allies of the rebels, simply because they help the poor.

One of the prisoners, Innocente Garay, had been chased by a death squad last June. He escaped, was designated a refugee by the UNHCR and sponsored that same month by Emmanuel United Church in Ottawa. He is still in prison, even though his companions, Mr. Fuentes, a government-sponsored refugee, was released yesterday, along with the third man, Carlos Avalos.

When Jesus was born in Bethlehem, the death squads hunted for him, but his parents took him for safety to Egypt. If he came today to El Salvador, the death squads would hunt him again.

I call on our government to intervene with the Salvadoran government for Mr. Garay's release, and to move quickly with visas and minister's permits to bring these men and their families to Canada.

ENERGY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, with the next federal budget only weeks away, I want to remind the government of promises it made to the alternative energy and conservation industry in this country.

In October 1987 the then minister for energy told an audience in Prince Edward Island: "I will continue to provide my enthusiastic support of these Island projects for a long time to come".

The same energy minister told an Energy Options conference in Montreal last December: "I am committed to seeing the momentum toward greater energy efficiency continue".

Yet, less than 18 months later, the government announced that it was closing its regional conservation and renewable energy offices across Canada and committing less money to federal-provincial agreements for alternative energy.

Canadians must learn to use their energy more wisely, and the federal government has a leadership role to play here. The government must start promoting alternative energy and conservation with actions, not just words.

S. O. 31

JUSTICE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, after two and one-half years of exhaustive study, the Nova Scotia Royal Commission investigating the wrongful conviction of Donald Marshall has come down with a thorough, multi-volume report. Not surprisingly, the bottom line of the report is the conclusion that institutional racism was the root cause of Marshall having been mistakenly sent to prison for 11 years for a crime he did not commit.

Most Canadians openly disavow racism and discrimination as acceptable practices in our society. Most adhere to the desire and intention not to be discriminatory in their own actions and behaviour.

Relatively few understand the concept of institutional discrimination or adequately recognize the degree to which it exists in many if not most of the institutions of Canadian society, be they federal or provincial, public or private.

Some have already reacted with cynicism to the Marshall report and its findings. None among us should; nor is there room for smugness on the part of persons of other institutions or other jurisdictions.

All Canadians and their governments should recognize the report as an iceberg symbolizing conditions below the surface in our society. Much work remains to be done before ours is truly a society in which equity and fairness are fully recognized and accepted as the cornerstones and foundation of Canadian society.

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, all of Atlantic Canada welcomes the announcement of Cavendish Foods expansion near Summerside, P.E.I. This project is the beginning of the turnaround for Summerside after the negative effects caused by the winding down of CFB Summerside.

The next project that must be addressed is the construction of a fixed link to P.E.I. from the mainland. As I have said before, this engineering marvel will create hundreds of jobs during construction and add almost $1 billion to the economy of Atlantic Canada.

Every area of the region will feel the economic benefits from this giant project and many new industries and services will be generated.

On completion, the fixed link will be one of Canada's major tourist attractions. The fixed link will also remove trade barriers between the provinces and create a whole new era of interprovincial co-operation.

This privately funded project will be the focus of the Atlantic and its potential. It will give all Atlantic Canadians a sense of pride and provide a very tangible turnaround for the region after a serious of setbacks.

I call on the Minister of the Environment to ensure that the current study is expedited and completed as soon as possible. Finally, I call on the Minister of Public Works to warm up his bulldozer and let us get this show on the road.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, during one of the two Nepean town hall meetings held on the goods and services tax, a resident presented a brief outlining the effects the goods and services tax had on the country of New Zealand.

He told the meeting that in 1985 the New Zealand Government began the move to free trade and free market policies.

The New Zealand dollar was devalued, controls on interest rates were abandoned, tariffs were reduced, restrictions on foreign investments were lifted, banking and finance were deregulated. Almost all supports for agriculture were removed and even marketing boards were under attack. Transport was deregulated. User fees were placed on all government services. Universality was ended for all social programs. Regional development stopped. The national energy plan was scrapped. No government services were to be guaranteed even for public utilities. A total of 432 rural post offices were closed. State enterprises privatized included Air New Zealand, Petrocorp and the Development Finance Corporation. The result of all this led to a depressed and stagnated economy.

Isn't it frightening that we see the same thing happening here in Canada today?

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the people of Calgary southeast know our country must eliminate our massive debt. They are even prepared to pay more taxes to cut the debt. But they are only prepared to do so if the government also cuts back on wasteful and inefficient spending.

Before Christmas the President of the Treasury Board announced a series of spending cuts. Those were by no means the first cuts. This government has saved billions of dollars by cutting programs, privatizing Crown corporations, including Air Canada, and reducing the civil service the level it was in 1973.

The Minister of Finance has done a tremendous job in bringing spending under control, As he prepares for a new budget, I encourage him to continue his worthy efforts to cut costs.

REGULATORY REFORM

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the government announced its intention to reform financial regulation in this country in November, 1984. Five years and four ministers later, the government still has not ended the regulatory uncertainty and confusion.

Regulatory reform in Canada is lagging behind profound changes in the financial sector. Failures, takeovers and mergers in this sector have continued. Canadian financial institutions are falling behind their competitors in both domestic and international markets. Now the government appears to be ready to allow American Express to set up a bank in this country before appropriate legislation is put in place.

The government must ensure there is a level playing field in Canada before opening up the financial sector to foreigners.

Committee reports and vague promises must turn into concrete action. I urge the government to act soon to establish national policy and a regulatory framework for financial institutions.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, as community, government and indeed our world continues the vital struggle to protect our environment, I was pleased to note projects approved under the New Environmental Partners Fund. My constituency of Delta is the recipient of a $5,000 grant shared equally with a funding partner, the British Columbia Conservation Foundation, a non-profit group dedicated to preserving and increasing wildlife populations.

The Boundary Bay Raptorial Bird Habitat in Delta puts into practice what many of us teach in encouraging, preserving for future generations and making available to the public many of the wonders of creation, particularly relating to natural habitat and a variety of bird species which might otherwise face extinction.

The $50 million Environmental Partners Fund announced in June 1989 covers a five-year period and provides funding for up to 50 per cent of a project's total value. Our Environment Minister's goal is to tap the creative talents of Canadians and establish community oriented environmental projects. It is encouraging to see co-operation between government and community resulting in the protection of our increasingly valued natural environment.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the GST is now the most important issue in Canada. As you know, the government proposed a 7 per cent tax on goods and services and the Canadian people are against it. The NDP has a very clear alternative, but the Liberal Party has none. This is the situation two months after the Finance Committee tabled its report.

Mr. Speaker, on Sunday in Toronto, there were six candidates for the leadership of the Liberal Party. Everyone was against the GST, but no candidate proposed an alternative to the system put forward by the government. The public has a right to know the policy of the Liberal Party of Canada. Please, Mr. Speaker, an alternative!

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has many reasons to change the present federal sales tax. We know very well that the present tax is old, it is hidden in many cases, it hurts many categories of our manufactured products, it gives goods made abroad an advantage on our domestic markets, it is discriminatory and it has too many exemptions.

The goods and services tax now being debated in the House of Commons corrects all of this. It favours our industry; it will benefit the auto trade. It provides assistance to Canadian small and medium-sized businesses in adjusting to the new regime and gives generous refunds to people on middle incomes and to seniors.

It is our responsibility, Mr. Speaker, to put Canada in step with the world economy by passing Bill C-62 quickly.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, the United Fishermen and Allied Workers annual convention in Vancouver gives all Canadians the opportunity to witness the demise of the fish processing industry on the west coast.

Union officials are saying that the herring processing industry is completely exposed by the recent free trade panel ruling. Processing employs about 10,000 people, jobs have already disappeared and there is a possibility that 80 per cent to 90 per cent of these jobs leave Canada for the U.S.

In Atlantic Canada, free trade did not protect our lobster industry; some of our lobsters are now excluded from the American market. On both the west coast and the east coast Canadians have been abandoned by a government more preoccupied by trade theories than by the well-being of its people. Jobs are being exported to the U.S. along with our herring. The Americans are building a processing industry using Canadian fish because this government has failed to protect Canadian processing jobs.

MINING

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the minister responsible for energy, mines and resources of the crisis Canada might face in the mining sector. I know that this government is allergic to the word "crisis" but nevertheless it is time we faced reality.

Over the last two weeks we have heard of the closure of three mines; one in Kimberley, B.C. and two in northern Ontario, my very own region.

We have also heard of the plight of fishermen and workers in the fish processing plants on both coasts. Canada still relies heavily on its resources to maintain its economy. There are about 4,000 single-industry towns in Canada and the industry is usually resource-based, be it forestry, mining or even fishing. These towns produce $55 billion in annual resource exports. I urge the minister to examine the situation of the mining industry in Canada before it is too late. Long term plans and rational thinking are needed.

As a former health minister, surely my colleague understands that you do not put a band-aid on a wound that requires stitches.

IRAN

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, not much has changed in Iran since the departure of Khomeini and the installation of the new president. Human rights abuses continue. In fact, there has been a dramatic increase in the abuse of human rights and in prosecutions for ordinary offences.

Today marks the end of a visit to Iran by the United Nations special rapporteur, Reynaldo Pohl. Mr. Pohl will be presenting a report on human rights abuses in Iran to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights meeting this week in Geneva.

Serious violations have been reported by Canadian friends and families of prisoners in Iran, as well as by over 1,000 Iranian exiles world-wide, who today terminate their hunger strike held in solidarity with the prisoners. Seventy-five of these protesters were Canadian.

We hope that the Canadian government will carefully consider Mr. Pohl's report in Geneva and take leadership for the first time in denouncing these persistent abuses which are intolerable and unacceptable to all Canadians.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Canadian consumers will have to dig more than $23 billion out of their pockets just to pay the goods and services tax. For the past two years the Minister of Finance has been trying to convince us that consumers will recoup most of that money as a result of the repeal of the manufacturer's sales tax.

However yesterday in the House he finally admitted that he cannot give any guarantee that companies will pass on to the consumer the savings they make as a result of the elimination of the manufacturer's sales tax.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us why the government failed to get from Canadian business spokesmen the assurance that such savings will be passed on to the consumer? If the Minister of Finance can promise that Canadians will pay the new tax, why can he not promise that in turn they will benefit from the repeal of the old tax?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): What my colleague the Minister of Finance said, Mr. Speaker, is that he was convinced the tax would be levied but that he could not give absolute guarantees. I would suggest nobody can offer this kind of guarantee in a market economy and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition agrees with that. But the fact is that competition rules do apply in a market economy. Were only one company involved it could fearlessly pocket the 13.5 per cent and add the 7 per cent, but that is impossible because it is already in no position to beat its competitors because of this regressive tax we have, but it is not the only one— We already have good indications. We will do our best to keep consumers well informed and tell them what kind of impact to expect in every sector. In light of what happened wherever this has been done, I am sure Canadians will be well protected and benefit from the withdrawal of the regressive tax we now have.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Finance is just as naive as his boss the Minister of Finance. Indeed, yesterday the Minister of Finance finally admitted that despite his budget forecasts he was not in a position to guarantee that the Canadian consumer would benefit from the removal of the old tax.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, don't you love it? The Minister of Finance and his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, are going to hire 4,000 new tax police to police this new sales tax, but they will not hire anybody to make sure that the consumers of Canada get the benefit of the old tax.

Let me ask the minister about another aspect of this absurdity that he has brought before the House of Commons. The Minister of Finance, yesterday, claimed that he needed a massive advertising campaign, paid for by the very taxpayers who are going to be hit by the sales tax, to justify his new goods and services tax. He claimed yesterday that he needed this propaganda campaign, "so that Canadians would know the truth" and I am using his words, and "so that they would know all the facts".

• (1420)

Let me ask the Minister of State for one simple fact and one simple piece of truth: exactly how much is this propaganda campaign going to cost? Does the Department of Finance really intend to spend $9 million plus in a propaganda campaign because of the failure of the Minister of Finance, of his colleague the Prime Minister and the rest of the largest cabinet in Canadian history? They can't sell it in Parliament. They can't sell it in the country. Now they are going to spend taxpayers' dollars to try and sell it by an advertising campaign.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, it is incumbent upon the government to inform the Canadian people of the new system. This government intends to do that in the most economical way possible.

I cannot give the right hon. Leader of the Opposition a dollar figure right now, but I can assure him that the information that will be provided will be factual information, the type of information that the Canadian public is demanding and, as a matter of fact, the type of information that the Standing Committee on Finance said should be forwarded to the Canadian people.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Let's start focusing on Brampton, Mr. Speaker. The Minister says that it is going to be factual information. Will these truthful ads say that Canada will be the only country in the world with two separate retail sales taxes? Will these ads say that the new GST will break every one of the commitments and rules set forth by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister during the election campaign? Will the ads say that the consumers won't benefit from the suppression of the old manufacturers' sales tax? Will the ads say that the government is hiring 4,000 new tax police to administer and monitor and gouge the Canadian people through this tax? Is this what these ads will say?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Most of what the right hon. Leader of the Opposition said is just not true, and he knows that full well. As a matter of fact, during the last campaign this government tried to debate sales tax and the right hon. Leader of the Opposition said we are trying to avoid the free trade debate. You cannot have it both ways. That is exactly what he did during the campaign and he remembers that very well.

The information that will be provided will be factual. It will not be the glory advertising back in the halcyon days of the Liberal Party when we had geese flying across the television set.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell the House and the Canadian people whether he was aware that last summer the acting chairman of CNR, Mr. Brian Gallery, a personal friend of the Prime Minister and also president of the Tories exclusive fund raising operation, was in a position of conflict of interest?

Mr. Speaker: That seems to me, with respect, an assertion, an allegation, and a serious one. I would ask the hon. member to keep in mind that if there is a charge to be made, it must be done in a proper way. The hon. member may have facts upon which he wants to ask the question, and that of course would be understandable, but that seems to be an allegation hanging in the air. I would ask the hon. member to rephrase his question.

Mr. Dionne: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the minister this question. Was the minister aware that the gentleman in question, Mr. Gallery, was, while in the position of acting chairman of CN, at the same time selling advertising to CN or buying advertising from them?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I indeed read today the allegations in the Globe and Mail concerning Mr. Gallery and I have personally asked the corporation's chairman to report to me. I will decide what to do in due course depending on the report I will receive from him.

[English]

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister take immediate action to bring about a full and complete investigation of what would appear to be a brazen and cynical conflict of interest to the benefit of a personal friend of the Prime Minister?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague, the Minister of Transport pointed out to the hon. member in answer to his earlier question, he has asked for a full report on the issue which was brought to his attention as a result of The Globe and Mail article and he will report back to the House in due course. Of course, it would be premature, Mr. Speaker, and I know the hon. member to be a very fair-minded person, and inappropriate, to make any quick decisions without ascertaining all the facts.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister, who will know that Albertans have led the way in this country in the fight against the GST. In fact, he will know that of the entire Conservative benches, the only two who have thus far publicly declared their opposition to the GST are Albertans.

In response to the remarks made by the finance minister in this House last week, several Albertans have asked to debate the Minister of Finance. They include Mr. Jerry Doyle, the MLA for West Yellowhead, Mr. Ace Cetinski and the Sherwood Park Chamber of Commerce, one of the Minister's own back-benchers, and probably thousands of Albertans who would just love the chance to discuss the GST with any minister of the government.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, will the government accept any of these offers to debate the GST in Alberta with Albertans?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, several members on this side of the House have debated the issue, have appeared on public platforms and have spoken to the issue. The Minister of State attended a mass rally in Calgary not too long ago. The hon. member for Athabasca has been there. The Minister of Finance indicated in an answer yesterday that he will be going all across the country, including the province of Alberta, to talk about the issue, to debate it, and to appear on phone-in shows.

If the hon. member has not seen a copy of the speech that was delivered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs a couple of weeks ago, I will see that he gets it because it was a very good speech that laid out the facts.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that apparently the government has turned down all of the requests handed to it from Albertans to debate the GST—not to read a speech, not to attend a meeting, but to debate the GST.

Mr. Boyer: How about the floor of the House of Commons? We will debate it here.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): This being the case, Mr. Speaker, might I offer the Deputy Prime Minister or any other government front-bencher right now this challenge: Will any of you debate the GST with me in Alberta?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I will now alter my planned question. I will alter it by simply saying to the Deputy Prime Minister, since you will not respond to my colleague from Alberta, is there anyone over there who will debate the GST in British Columbia?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all the hon. member should honour the Speaker's ruling. If he would be fair and truthful to the House, he would recognize that I was prepared to answer the member for Edmonton East, and I am prepared to answer now.

• (1430)

Yesterday hon. members opposite wanted to debate with the finance minister on the floor of the House of Commons. They debated and they lost.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence, the person who occupies that position for the time being. He stood idly by during the presentation of the last budget and saw Canadian sovereignty eroded severely on both coasts.

For example, the Tracker aircraft which protected Canadian coasts against illegal fishing, illegal drugs and illegal pollution was scrapped and the fisheries portion was given to the private sector at twice the cost.

At a time when the fishery is in crisis, how can the minister stand by and see Canadian sovereignty taken from the Armed Forces and given to mercenaries?

Will he guarantee that this time around he will stand up to the Minister of Finance and say there is no way he will take Canadian sovereignty off the east or the west coast from the Armed Forces and that he will protect our coasts against illegal fishing and against illegal pollution? Will he do that?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I encourage my colleague's new-found interest in his critic's responsibilities. It is nice to see him back.

The decision to remove the Trackers from service was taken because Canada has interest in security. If we are not able to bring about the economic security this country needs to continue to grow and to provide the dollars so we can have military or defensive security, we will be in a much worse position than we are today.

The opportunity to provide a commercial outlet or operation with the surveillance under the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is not new. It is something that we have used to add to the surveillance. There has been additional money provided to fisheries and oceans so that it can provide surveillance on both coasts. It is not as the member would attest.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the argument that the deficit is somehow fought by spending twice as much on the private sector as on the Armed Forces does not hold water with me or with any other Canadian.

In addition, four frigates are now going to be cut from the frigate program at a time when we need increased surveillance. The Atlantic fishery is in crisis. We need ships. We need patrol ships to protect against illegal fishing, against illegal drugs and against illegal pollution. How can the minister justify this kind of cut at a time when we need those ships most?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is aware, but the government is proceeding with the construction of 12 frigates. It has been announced and we are proceeding with them.

We are proceeding with the update of the Tribal class. We are proceeding to put those vessels into retrofit and to create new vessels, some 12 new frigates. I am not sure where the hon. member has been when he talks about cutting four frigates.

Oral Questions

CLOTHING INDUSTRY

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister and a fellow westerner.

The clothing industry employs 90,000 Canadians. Over 7,000 are employed in my home province of Manitoba. In the four western provinces alone the value of goods produced by this industry is set at over a half billion dollars.

This industry is in jeopardy because of the trade deal and now the government wants to kill the industry with the GST. The clothing industry is exempted from the manufacturers' sales tax, so the GST is a totally new layer of taxation for the industry.

Will the minister tell the workers in this industry how they are to survive both the free trade deal and the GST?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, first, my hon. friend from Winnipeg is factually incorrect. The clothing industry is subject to the manufacturers' sales tax in many areas such as communications equipment and so on.

We could go through a whole list of taxes which that particular industry pays that it will not pay after the GST comes in. That will benefit the industry.

As far as the free trade agreement is concerned, we are working very closely with our Canadian manufacturers when it comes to the types of materials they can use and the tariffs that they are paying on them. I have great faith in our clothing industry and our fashion industry.

They are making great inroads into the United States. As a matter of fact the other day the vice-president of Cambridge Clothing was telling me that he is making great inroads into New York and selling Canadian fashions made in Canada there. I think they have a bright future.

Mr. Harvard: Maybe the minister would like to tell those facts to Canadians at axe the tax rallies in the country.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I will direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister this time. It is about the GST but it has to do with agriculture.

This year, 1990, could be a year of disaster for farmers. This government has slashed farm support programs at the worst possible time. When many markets around the world are soft and prices are low, the government comes along with the GST, the worst blow of all. This could be the coup de grâce.

How can the government proceed with this vicious tax at a time when the Canadian economy is slipping into recession and the Canadian farmer is in such tough shape?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member might do himself and everyone else a bit of a favour and bring himself up to date with the facts with respect to the GST as it applies to agriculture. As he knows or should know, agriculture is exempt.

Mr. Harvard: Farmers are consumers.

Mr. Mazankowski: As a matter of fact, it will have a positive effect upon the cost of farm inputs. Farm input costs will come down with the application of the 7 per cent GST because—

Mr. Harvard: What about consumer prices?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, if he would just shut his mouth for a few minutes, I will give him an answer.

An hon. member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I did not mean that in an offensive way, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister, and I would hope that the remainder of his answer does not strain credibility.

Mr. Mazankowski: I did not want to miss the opportunity to enlighten the hon. member about some facts. At the present time, if a farmer buys a half-ton truck, he pays a 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax on it. If he buys a three-ton truck, there is a 13.5 per cent sales tax on it.

Under the new provisions a 7 per cent sales tax will be refunded. There is a whole host of items upon which the GST is applied, such as hydraulic jacks, post hole awls, barbed wire, fertilizer and chemicals. All those things will be exempt.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of the hon. John Reynolds, Minister of Environment for the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Also I wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of Mr. Rostyslav Bratun, People's Deputy of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. and member of the Committee on Foreign Liaison.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As every reader of Seaports and the Shipping World knows, CN has been one of the regular advertisers in a document which is produced by Gallery Publications owned by Mr. Brian Gallery who is also a member of the board of Canadian National.

• (1440)

The minister commented earlier that he is to investigate, but given the fact that there has been an ongoing financial relationship between CN and Gallery Publications for a number of years since Mr. Gallery became a member of CN, will he take his responsibilities under the Canadian National Railways Act and remove Mr. Gallery from the board?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to reiterate what I said earlier. I did not say I would investigate. I said I read the allegations in the Globe and Mail. I also said that I had asked the corporation's chairman to report to me and that I will take action depending on the report I will get from him. That is what I said and what I am repeating.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Minister of Transport is aware that Section 117 of the Financial Administration Act requires directors of Crown corporations to declare their interests in a contract with the corporation or risk it being declared void.

I want to know if Mr. Gallery declared his interest in the contract for advertising to CN and, if not, will the minister remove him from the board of directors?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, once again, CN is a Crown corporation headed by a board of directors and, when a Crown corporation is the subject of allegations, it is customary for the Minister responsible to ask the chairman of the board to report on these allegations. That is what I said and what I will repeat over and over again in answer to questions that are all the same, Mr. Speaker.

CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Over the last year or so we have seen some very serious allegations, as well as some outright violations of the rules and regulations governing charitable organizations in Canada. The current climate has seriously damaged the reputation of charities in general but would also suggest to us that perhaps the government may no longer be able to monitor and control the activities effectively.

What is the minister doing to clean up this situation which has such a negative impact on charities and the excellent work that they are doing across Canada?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there are some 60,000 charitable organizations across this country, the great majority of which are very legitimate organizations and benefit society as a whole tremendously.

The hon. member is correct in saying that over the past months and the past couple of years there has been a few who have taken advantage of some loopholes and have abused the system at the expense of the majority of the others. Therefore, as recently as last November, I advised my officials to begin a comprehensive review of this system.

We are now in the process of consulting with interested individuals and organizations across the country, with a view to eliminating the abuse and coming down with the bottom line objective to make the system fairer, simpler and better for the majority of legitimate charitable organizations in this country.

Changes will take place. They will be very effective and powerful to make the system better and fairer.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Communications, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Since 1984 this government has presided over $280 million in budget cuts to the CBC. Now the minister is presiding over the dismantling of the national headquarters.

Can the minister give the assurance that those regions of Canada other than Montreal and Toronto will have sufficient resources to fulfil their national mandate?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very clear that the government has shown its support for the CBC by granting it numerous increases in the past few years.

In 1987–1988 the government granted an annual increase of $20 million over a 10-year period in order to enable the CBC to replace its outdated equipment.

In 1988–1989 the government gave the CBC some $65.5 million in new appropriations for the carrying out of its broadcasting centre project in Toronto, and in 1988–1989 the government gave the CBC nearly $130 million for the period from 1989 to 1990 and 1992 to 1993. Then of course there was a new appropriation of $81 million to meet unanticipated costs.

The member's question relates to the regions outside Toronto and Montreal.

In answer to that question, that is a matter for determination by the CBC's board of directors that directs an arm's length organization.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Edwards: The announcements made today decentralize the decision-making processes of the CBC so that the needs of the regions can be recognized.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the member.

Mr. McDermid: You are a centralist.

Mr. Mills: Yes, I am somebody who believes in strong national institutions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mills: I must say that this member cannot stand up and give us an assurance that there will be no CBC budget cuts in western Canada, in Atlantic Canada and in northern Canada.

Can he stand up and give us assurances that there will be no budget cuts?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, lest there be some misapprehension on the part of the House and the nation, the budget cuts that were dealt with today by the CBC president were the result of the April 1989 budget announcements.

They impact largely upon the administrative overburden of the CBC. President Veilleux went to some length to stress that he is trying to preserve the core programming, and especially the regional strengths of the CBC.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary is right. I am afraid my colleague over there is wrong.

The parliamentary secretary was chairman of the communications committee. The fact is that the government's goal of 95 per cent Canadian content in broadcasting is fundamentally at odds with the $20 million cut-backs today, to be followed by another $15 million in programming. The government cannot have it both ways, can it?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I should stress to the hon. member that there were no new cuts today. The CBC simply announced its plan for dealing with budget cuts that were part of the April 1989 budget.

Those plans include an acceleration of the four-year plan proposed by the government to deal with those cuts over a three-year period.

MINES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Last week, Rio Algom mines in Elliot Lake announced they were going to be laying off some 1,600 employees. Today, press reports suggest that Denison mines will likewise be laying off 700 employees this year.

Is the minister prepared to put in place a plan of action by the federal government, in co-operation with the municipality, the unions and companies involved, to minimize the adverse impact of the loss of these jobs in the uranium mine industry?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is disappointing when mines are closing. In fairness to what has been happening in Elliot Lake, the community, the workers and the company, as well as the hon. member, have been trying to work with the provincial and federal governments in reducing the impact. I think we all recognize that in terms of nuclear generation those mines have suffered, both from new contracts not being available and also the price of uranium having dropped below the $10 mark.

Having said that, my colleagues, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, responsible for FEDNOR, have given their good offices in whatever way they can to help in the adjustments. There are Community Futures programs available.

All of us recognize that this will not replace the 1,600 jobs, but we are going to be as helpful as we can to the people locally, as well as to the provincial government, to try and ease that reality and see what adjustments can be made so that Elliot Lake can not only survive but can also have a future.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. minister's words. The minister knows that with the magnitude of this loss of jobs we are not only talking about the miners who are laid off themselves but we are talking about the very viability of the whole community, including small business, schools, churches, and hospitals.

• (1450)

Is the minister willing, at an early date, to visit the community of Elliot Lake to meet with the community action committee there to ensure, in co-operation with the unions, companies and the municipality, that every possible resource of the federal government is brought to bear to try to reduce the adverse impacts of the announcements which have been made in the last couple of days?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned yesterday in the House, the Industrial Adjustment Service and the Community Futures, because this area is designated as a Community Futures area, is designed to deal with just that kind of problem in terms of the over-all impact on the community and other opportunities.

I may say, on behalf of my colleague, the minister of energy, that I know several of us including myself have been in the hon. member's region. We sympathize with his concerns.

There are three or four ministers involved in the solutions, including the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism with the responsibility for FEDNOR, which has already brought new activity to many parts of northern Ontario, as the hon. member knows. All of us take a personal interest in what is happening and will continue to do so.

JUSTICE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the Marshall report was strongly critical of the behaviour of two federal judges. One judge was found to have persuaded then Liberal Justice Minister Chrétien to limit the scope of Marshall's appeal reference. Another judge should never have been appointed to the appeal panel in the first place because as Nova Scotia's Attorney General he was responsible for Marshall's original defective prosecution.

Since the minister has had this report in his hands for four days now and the jurisdiction over the federal judiciary is entirely within the responsibility of his ministry, will he immediately use his powers under Section

63(1) of the Judges Act to refer this matter to the judicial council for investigation and possible disciplinary action.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I indicated in the House yesterday and I reiterate today that my officials and I intend to review the Marshall inquiry report thoroughly and only at that time, after the review is completed, am I prepared to comment on what action will or will not be taken.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, Donald Marshall spent part of an 11-year sentence in jail. That is a long, long time to be in jail for a crime of which he was not guilty.

The essence of this matter is the speed of the government's action. The report has now been in the minister's hands for four days. This matter is entirely within the minister's jurisdiction. Donald Marshall has been failed at every level of the justice system: the police, the courts, the justices. Is this minister going to add to that failure by failing Donald Marshall himself?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think I am safe in saying that no member of this House and no member of the public can condone any injustice that was done to Donald Marshall.

There is no question about that from the government side. I do not think there would be any question about that from the opposition side. We intend to do justice in this matter to all those involved. That means taking a very reasoned look at the report, coming to conclusions and making those conclusions public. I undertake to do all those things, and I undertake to do it in the interest of justice.

PULP AND PAPER

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Forestry.

This question impacts both on the environment and on forestry. One of the major policy directions being taken on behalf of the environment throughout the world and one which also relieves the pressure on our forests is the increased production of pulp and paper from recycled raw materials.

What proportion of Canada's total pulp and paper production is presently obtained from recycled waste? What is Canada's targeted proportion, and what is the Government of Canada doing to influence increased pulp and paper production from recycled waste in this country?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, that is a very pertinent and excellent question. It may well be that in this critical area the industry may be leading because in excess of 25 per cent of all paper consumed by the Canadian public is already recycled in Canada.

The problem is that some of this paper comes from foreign suppliers. This would indicate that there is a need to inform the public and to bring about a greater public consciousness so that we will all collect our paper and make it available to the industry which is anxious to use it in the process.

In that particular case, again industry is leading public opinion and is leading government in this area.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs in the absence of the minister responsible for Canada Post.

Starting tomorrow, because of Canada Post's food mail rate increases and the decrease in subsidy by the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, Baffin Island residents will have to pay $4.20 for a dozen eggs. In this capital city, people pay $1.09. Starting tomorrow one litre of milk will cost people in my constituency $4.50, compared to $1.29 for people in Ottawa.

How can the minister justify imposing these food price increases on northern residents, many of whom are on fixed incomes and make less than $10,000 a year? How can he justify making food more expensive, when the recent report of the Canadian Institute of Child Health has reminded the government, once again, of the tragic health conditions of Canada's aboriginal children?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one correction before answering the question. It is not a decrease by DIAND of the subsidy that is involved because DIAND was not subsidizing that particular operation.

As my hon. colleague knows, there has been consultation in the past two or three months with respect to this particular issue. It has been undertaken that the proposed increase will be reduced by 5 per cent. There will be a freeze on any other increase until next year, while all departments under the direction of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development undergo a study in order to assess the situation and bring forth corrections for the next year.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. A 5 per cent decrease is a small comfort when the average price increase will be 32 per cent.

This morning, after hearing northern Inuit and Indian people explain how devastating the impact of these rate increases will be, the consumer and corporate affairs committee of this House passed an all-party resolution requesting a nine-month moratorium on the proposed increases.

Since the increases are schedule to take effect tomorrow, will the minister relieve the anxiety of northerners now and tell us whether he will ask or order Canada Post to institute a nine-month moratorium immediately, as requested by the committee?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have been made aware of the committee's recommendation this morning. As my hon. colleague knows it is addressed to Canada Post, and I will transmit it to the appropriate minister.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa South on a single question.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. It concerns the Statistics Canada report issued yesterday on federal scientific activities.

That report indicates that science and technology expenditures in Canada have fallen significantly from 3.9 per cent in 1980 and 1981 to 3.5 per cent in 1989 and 1990.

I would like to ask the minister if he believes his own rhetoric about science and technology. Is he willing to take the kind of stand that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has taken and offer his resignation if the government continues its cut-backs in science and technology spending?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I think the figures that have been cited may be a little misleading. I think it makes a little more sense to look at S and T expenditures on program spending. Let us take the debt payments out and look at program spending.

• (1500)

I think the House would be interested to know that in 1980–81 those figures were 4.65 per cent. They went down in 1984–85 under that government to 4.46 per cent. Under this government, taking out the debt, they have increased to 4.89 per cent. That is how we treat S and T, not like the Liberals did.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance has stated that Canadians surviving on incomes below the poverty line will benefit from the goods and services tax. In fact, Canadians and their families on social service will not be better off. The province of Saskatchewan deducts 100 per cent of family allowance from welfare cheques.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister promise this House that he will work with the Minister of Finance to ensure that Canadians on welfare will not have their rebates deducted from their welfare cheques?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that the federal government is always concerned when we increase benefits to recipients that the provinces step in and take those benefits away in one form or another.

The answer is yes, we will work very closely with the provinces to try to ensure that this does not happen.

POINTS OF ORDER

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I think my point of order may be a bit of a hybrid between privilege and order but I will leave that up to you to advise the House.

At 12.43 p.m. today, the bells in the chamber and throughout all the buildings on Parliament Hill began to ring. As members would know, in the upper left-hand corner of the television sets both here and in the lobby, in members offices and in other areas of the precincts of the Hill, there is a digital clock which gives members and the public some idea of how long the bells are going to ring before a vote is taken.

I was, in fact, when the bells began to ring, in the middle of a conversation with representatives of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. I turned on the television, saw that there were 29 minutes and something available and carried on with the conversation only to find that the bells stopped. I subsequently saw a voting procedure begin.

The reason I think that there is clearly either a point of order or a question of privilege and that we have some options is that if we are going to continue having that digital display advising members how long it is until we vote, there will have to be a clear procedure as to whether or not it is a 15-minute bell, a 30-minute bell or something else.

Why I say it is possibly a hybrid between a question of privilege and a point of order is that perhaps there was what might be described as a hybrid political relationship between the Liberal Whip and the Government Whip in this situation in their joint desire to quickly pass the GST legislation.

If you could give me some idea as to whether or not that digital clock is going to continue to be there, perhaps we could add a little red or green light so we will know what has been agreed to by Whips. If there is agreement, then a green light would come on. If it just sort of a loosey-goosey situation, perhaps a red light or a blinking light or an orange light could come on so the members have a better idea of what is happening.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I am not convinced that a legitimate vote was taken just prior to one o'clock because members who were in committee or elsewhere on the Hill were, to the best of our knowledge and ability, determining when to come to the House based on that digital clock. I think my privileges and the privileges of other members were damaged and perhaps usurped, and I look forward to your ruling.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard such nonsense in my life. To re-establish the facts, the facts are that when the House is in debate, we get eight hours of debate at second reading before we revert back to 10 minute speeches.

What the NDP was doing this morning was trying to cut honest debate, good debate, opposing debate on GST by having the bells ring for one-half hour when, indeed, the floor had been given to the Liberals and should have been given to the Liberals because it was our turn. We want to debate this bill. We do not want to waste time as the NDP are doing.

Second, I take strong exception to the New Democrats not getting their act together and not operating within the rules of this House. We will continue to want to debate this bill to the utmost and to defeat this bill, if possible, but we will not play without rules, we will play within the rules.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I think the issue is really quite simple. If the NDP and the member who spoke and brought this to our attention would read the rule book, they will find that the rules are expressed in terms of the maximum amount of time until a vote. The clock on the television reflects the maximum amount of time available until the vote. The rules do not deal with minimums. We have had several votes in this session of Parliament already where we moved rather quickly, within a minute or two from the commencement of bells, for the kinds of reasons which the Whip for the Official Opposition lays on the table.

This is supposed to be a place where great debates take place on the great issues of the time and the dilatory $5-million waste last week of taxpayers' money in this Chamber by the NDP is just something that responsible members of Parliament will not tolerate any more than they have to.

I suggest to the member that he read the rules and look at the screen. The screen is in accord with the rules. This is another example of wasting the time of the House with a nonsensical point of order.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a short intervention. Methinks the opposition Whip protest too much.

The point of the hon. member for Skeena was that we have all come to accept the fact that the little digital clocks on the television screens indicate the time intervening until the vote. Otherwise, there would be no point in having it on the screen. I guess what we are saying is that from this point on, that clock and the time down to the vote is meaningless, irrelevant and should be struck from the television screens because it has, obviously, misled a number of members. That is the point the member for Skeena was trying to make. This is a legitimate point of order. The member wanted to vote against the GST and because of the Liberal-Conservative co-operation on this matter, he was unable to do so.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about this so-called point of order. The hon. member who raised it said it is a hybrid. I can think of another word to apply to it, but I do not think you will accept it as parliamentary.

I think that in so far as the hon. member wants some clarification of the significance of the digital clock on the screen, that is a question that should be clarified and he has received clarification. But I do not think that the government House Leader should, I am sure inadvertently, create the wrong impression about what the vote was all about.

It was not a vote against the GST or for the GST. The motion, as I understand it, was that the Liberal member for Ottawa South not be allowed to speak. The NDP moved that another member, other than the member for Ottawa South, be heard. The hon. member for Ottawa South had the floor and was on his feet to oppose the GST and was ready to speak for 20 minutes and then have a 10-minute question and answer period. The New Democrats got up and tried to muzzle him, tried to prevent him from speaking against the GST, and that is all that happened.

I conclude by saying that the point of order, or whatever you want to call it, deserves to be raised in terms of clarifying the use of the clock, but I do not think it is correct for the New Democrats in their desperation over being left out of the debate on the GST, to try to misstate what the vote was about. It was about trying to prevent the member for Ottawa South from having his say against the GST.

I do not think NDP members will ever be able to explain why they tried to prevent a member of this House from opposing the GST if they are really against it.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam in a moment.

I think perhaps it might be helpful to members and to the public to understand exactly what has taken place here.

The hon. member for Skeena has risen and explained to the Chair that watching the television set, which is available in the offices of all hon members, he noticed a vote was about to take place. There is for the convenience of members a digital clock that appears on the face of the television set. It is there for convenience only. I am prepared to certainly consider what might be done in order to make sure that no hon. member is misled by what the television screen shows.

However, I want to explain to hon. members and to the public, that when the bells ring, in most cases unless there has been some arrangement otherwise, they are either what is called a 15-minute bell or a 30-minute bell. There is also a long convention in this place that if the two Whips walk back in the Chamber and take their seats earlier than either 15 minutes or 30 minutes, then we are bound to proceed with the vote. Now that is a rule of the House and it is an old and long-time tradition.

The only thing that I am concerned about at the moment has nothing to do with why the bells rang. If hon. members are interested in why the bells rang or if members of political science classes or the public want to know why the bells rang, they can look at Hansard and see that a motion was moved. Upon that motion being moved, and it has been moved many times by all parties in this place upon occasion, there is a vote called.

It is not for me in listening to this point of order to comment whatsoever on the tactics used, the whys or the wherefores of it. What I am applying my mind to is solely the question of television coverage, and once the vote is called, that is end of the coverage of the Chamber. All we have is the ticking clock. Perhaps the solution might be to have television coverage of the Chamber. Hon. Members could see Whips come in. However, that is not for me to say.

I will look at the question of the clock. I have some indication that members other than those of the party of the hon. member for Skeena may have also found themselves in some difficulty today. But that is the sole issue and I want it clearly understood. I will see if something can be done to convenience members, but I point out the reason the clock is there is a matter of convenience only.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise just so that the House is not inadvertently misled by some of the gratuitous remarks made by the opposition House Leader. I was here. I do not believe he was here for the vote. I voted and it was not to stop an hon. member from speaking. I would not vote that way. It was to hear our finance critic, the member for Yorkton—Melville.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I would invite hon. members to consider what has been said in what started off as a point of order, and if they are still convinced after having looked at Hansard that the matter has to be brought to me further, I will of course hear them. But I am not at this point entertaining argument on why the vote was called or what the purpose of it was.

I will, of course, hear the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I know he will take into account what I have just said.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, you have convinced me. I rest my case and I will refer to Hansard.

However, since you alluded to the fact that the Whips may be the ones to whom we should be looking to decide when a vote will take place, short of doing a dance with my colleague from the government side, I am ready to look at that whole problem, especially in this regard.

It has been a tradition of this House that when the Whips walk into the House, members give way and clear the aisles. That has not been our experience in this Parliament and I would like to ask members of this House, in an effort to be co-operative and to show some respect for the Whips coming in for the vote, that maybe they clear the aisles so that the Whip and I do not have to wind down the aisle through all kinds of opposition.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca may want to assist the Speaker.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, not on the merits of the particular case, but the mechanics of the case, there is another question I would ask the Chair to consider, namely to notify members of committees who also must look to that clock for guidance. Members in committee are also placed in the invidious situation of not knowing that that time frame will not be met. There may be an occasion where there are far more serious events and members of committee will miss that opportunity to vote.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am prompted by my good friend from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca to suggest to him and his colleagues that since the New Democratic Party has indeed entered the age of technology and discovered the benefits of hidden microphones, perhaps the NDP Whip could get himself a walkie-talkie to keep the boys and girls of the NDP informed so that they can get here to the House on time for votes.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I suppose gallantry imposes upon me the obligation to let our hon. friend from Nickel Belt at least have his say.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I was here when the motion was put. I heard the Whip from the government side say that 30 minutes and 15 minutes on the television screen monitor is really a guide and there is no minimum time.

In fact, I was here. That bell rang for about two minutes, so even if members had to come from the Confederation Building by bus—I am corrected, the bell rang for three minutes—it is possible they could have missed the vote.

That was a recorded vote, and members do have a responsibility to be here. We cannot be held responsible if the Whip from the Liberals and the Whip from the Conservatives cooked up this deal to get this thing put through. And we know why they wanted it pushed through. We know why! After all they have—

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure hon. members I have heard the point and I will consider it and see if there is something that can be done to convenience members. I do not think there is any need to extend this discussion.

Is the hon. member rising on a different point? I recognize the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on another point.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, this morning I, and I am sure all hon. members, received a notice from the Clerk advising of a draw to be held pursuant to Standing Order 87(2) for Private Members' Business on Thursday, February 1.

Members will know that the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedures and Private Members' Business had the honour to submit its seventh report to the House a few weeks ago—in fact some months ago now—in which it recommended some changes to the Standing Orders relating to Private Members' Business that will expedite the disposal of this kind of business in the House. It provided for additional hours, it provided for a revised system of draw and so on.

I am wondering if I might request of Your Honour that the draw to be held on February 1 be deferred to a later date so that the motion standing in the name of the chairman of our committee could be debated and approved by the House before the draw occurs.

• (1520)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on the same thoughtful point of order, I want to reply on behalf of the New Democratic Party. We spent a lot of time as members examining the whole process of Private Members' Hour. At the beginning of that process I suggested that we look at it in a more comprehensive way and not simply that the New Democrats had been particularly ambitious in presenting various motions and various private bills when the Liberals had presented a handful and I think the Conservatives had presented virtually none. But that is beside the point. That is not the issue.

On the other hand, we recognize that perhaps by backing off and introducing some changes, it would be to the benefit of all members. That is certainly our main motivation in considering this.

I want to say that we are in the process right now as a caucus of examining the very important report. It was a good report. The members on it obviously worked hard on behalf of all of the members of the House. But I think, rather than take this what I believe is a premature step, I would rather hold off for a day or two. The caucuses will meet tomorrow, I understand, at which time I think all the caucuses, if they have not already, will have a chance to deliberate on this important issue.

So while my inclination is to give consent, I think in the spirit of the value of the private members' work in this House, it deserves another day or two of reflection, consideration and thought.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, in light of the hon. member's comments, which I think are very valuable, perhaps what we could do is just ask that the draw be delayed until the parties have had an opportunity to have discussions on this particular subject which I think is very important for private members of this House, and we could ask for the consent of the House to do that perhaps.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I realize that my hon. colleague is going to soon ask for unanimous consent from my hon. friend in the Liberal Party. Our rule as a party, that is the New Democratic Party, has been to completely and totally not co-operate with the government because of the GST fight that we are waging.

Mr. Epp: This is Private Members' Business.

Mr. Riis: Let me get to it, Jake. I know you are anxious about that GST, but let me finish this conversation.

Because we are dealing with Private Members' Business—this has nothing to do with the government's initiative, it has to do with Private Members' initiatives—I would be quite prepared to agree to put off the draw until we have had a chance with each of the caucuses to examine the situation, deliberate further among the House Leaders and come forward hopefully with a standing order which we would all agree with, as opposed to the report. The report includes many items with which I have difficulty but I am sure that for 90 per cent of it we can agree upon and perhaps we can proceed in that fashion.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their contributions. I should explain that under the rules, the Chair has no power to unilaterally postpone the draw. I am sure hon. members know that.

There seems to be a general disposition to postpone it pending discussions between all three parties. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C–62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p.7569).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the House recessed for the lunch hour, the hon. member for Ottawa South had 13 minutes left plus 10 minutes for questions and comments.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, again we have had lengthy argument over the NDP wishing to interfere with the delivery of this speech. I can well understand when they elect a new leader and immediately drop five points in the polls why they would not like to have anyone else get up and give a reasoned and detailed explanation of objections to the GST. I can certainly see why they do not want 20–minute speeches. They do not have too many members that are capable of giving a 20–minute speech on the GST.

I would like to refer you, Mr. Speaker, to a white paper that the government put out back on June 18, 1987, in which it set out the objectives of tax reform. It states:

> The tax reform proposals have been designed to meet five broad objectives: fairness, competitiveness, simplicity, consistency, reliability.

This is the objective of tax reform. The question I have for the government is how can it come before the House and suggest that the goods and services tax proposal that is before us for consideration meets those five objectives. I suggest that there is absolutely no question that it does not.

What about fairness? I do not know what fairness means to you, Mr. Speaker, but we have an idea based on what the minister said yesterday of what fairness means to him. Reading from page 7559 of Hansard yesterday, the Minister of Finance described the vision of Canada that he is putting forward. I quote:

> It is a vision of conservatism at its best, which is to preserve what is good and to leave a better quality of life to those who follow us in terms of both a higher standard of living and a healthier environment—it is a vision deeply rooted in reality and expressed through decisive action, not empty rhetoric.

What I agree with in that is that his vision of Canada as evidenced by the goods and services tax is a vision of conservatism at its best. It is conservative. It is a conservative view that says that we do not need to care about the poor. We do not need to care about the illiterate. We do not need to care about students. We do not need to care about the people who live in the disparate regions of this country. We do not need to care about the north.

The seniors of this country, those who are living on fixed incomes, who are surviving and making do, are the ones who begin to be hurt first by this measure. Government members have told us, and we have raised this point many times, that there is a refundable sales tax credit for the poor and they pontificate as the minister did yesterday saying, "We have raised it in the past. Of course, we'll raise it in the future."

Let me tell you what the government really thinks about the elderly. At least one of its members speaks openly and says what he thinks. This is the Chairman of the Finance Committee, the member for Mississauga South, commenting on the elderly which was printed in the Toronto Star of September 27, 1989, and I quote:

> They live at a slower pace and they don't spend money in the same sense that you and I do. Older people don't wear out their clothing. They don't wear out their furniture. They don't run around and all of that costs dough.

There is compassion for you, Mr. Speaker. That is why the elderly do not need to worry about the goods and services tax. They do not run around.

What about the students? We raised the issue of education yesterday and the minister denied that education was affected by this tax. Does he not realize that, for the first time in Canada, we are going to be taxing books? We are going to be taxing reading.

The member for Calgary down at the far end of our side, yesterday, said, "Well, can't they borrow them from the library?" It is hopeless!

The regions of this country, those that are away from the central manufacturing districts of Ontario and Quebec, are desperately concerned about the effects of this tax. They are concerned because, once again, they are going to be excluded from those good manufacturing jobs that have always been central in Canada.

What happens with this tax is that for the first time there is going to be a tax imposed at the federal level on the costs of transportation. It is going to mean that to live in the regions will be even more expensive than before.

To try to put factories in the regions and export things to central Canada to be sold is going to be ever more difficult than it was before because not only will transportation costs be a factor but the tax is going to be imposed on top of transportation costs at the consumer level. The government members don't care about that. In fact, what they see in this tax is the fact that the regions in western Canada will be ever better able to send their goods south of the border. They are looking to the north–south connection. They are not worried about tying this country together as they should be.

There are lots of sectors that are affected badly by this tax. I know my colleagues will be raising many of them in the hours of debate that still remain.

Tourism is important. Tourism has never been taxed at the federal level, other than indirectly to a very minimum extent. Now all tourism services are going to be taxed. There is going to be a disincentive for tourists from other countries coming to Canada where they will be subject to that tax. I know the government is going to say, "Oh, but they can get a refund. All they have they to do is keep all their receipts and send us a nice letter when they get home and we'll send them the money back". That is wishful thinking. I think we would be better to get the tourists here and let them spend their money and keep their 7 per cent, and encourage them to do that.

As for Canadians, is there an incentive to travel within Canada as a result of the GST? No. Why not go south of the border where they are going anyway to do their shopping, because of the government's monetary policy, and not face a 7 per cent tourist tax. Three million dollars a week is being spent in the United States by Canadians who cannot afford our high dollar.

Other sectors include the independent insurance adjusters, just as an odd example. They will be wiped out by this tax. The incentive for insurance companies to do all of their adjusting in–house will be irresistible. A whole entrepreneurial, small business sector of our economy will be wiped out in one move with the imposition of this tax.

Then there is the objective of simplicity. Mr. Speaker, my leader yesterday did some reading from the act which illustrated the lack of simplicity. I have my own favourite section though. He read the part on housing. The one that I like is Section 148, "Small Suppliers". The reason I like that one, Mr. Speaker, is because the GST is not supposed to be too onerous for the little people, you know, the ones that have gross revenues from their businesses of less than $300,000. They are really at the low end so they are exempt from this.

They are the music teachers, the people who do hairdressing in their homes and that sort of thing. One of them might want to know for sure that they are exempt so that they do not have to collect the tax. My advice to them, if they are listening, is get your copy of Bill C–62 and turn to page 1990, Section 148. Read this section and figure out if you are one of the small suppliers that is exempt from the tax. Here is what it says:

> 148. (1) For the purposes of this Part, a person is a small supplier—

So far, so good.

> —throughout a particular calendar quarter and the first month immediately following the particular calendar quarter if

(a) the total of all amounts each of which is the value of consideration that became due in the four calendar quarters immediately preceding the particular calendar quarter, or that was paid in those four calendar quarters without having become due, to the person or an associate of the person at the beginning of the particular calendar quarter for taxable supplies, other than supplies by way of sale of capital property of the person or of the associate, made by the person or the associate in the course of commercial activities does not exceed the total of

(b) $30,000, and

I will not read paragraph (c). It is just as long as paragraph (a). Then in (2), there is an exception to that definition which is equally as long as the first part, including the part I did not read.

Now that is the lowest end of the scale on this tax. These are the people to whom it does not apply. How would you like to explain it to the people to whom it does apply? Good luck music teachers.

In the short time remaining to me I would like to raise a matter that I think is of very fundamental importance because I think there is some smoke and mirrors going on across the way on this issue. I raised this question yesterday. The Minister of Finance was good enough to come here for an hour yesterday, as the Minister of Justice said earlier, but not in order for us to debate with him. There was no opportunity for debate. He was here for us to ask questions. He was not here to give answers.

In fact, the House leader of the NDP got up at the conclusion of the exercise, if you can believe it, and said in a very pontifical way, "We appreciate the Minister of Finance making himself available for this hour to enter into this exchange. I think it has been helpful and useful". I do not think that the House leader of the NDP was even listening to what was going on, either that or he did not understand it.

I asked the Minister of Finance whether this was not the greatest single corporate tax decrease in the history of Canada. Did he answer it? No. No.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would not normally interrupt my hon. friend's speech. He had an odd good point in it. He referred to the House leader of the NDP and the fact that I drew attention to the fact that the Minister of Finance had stayed in the House an extra hour to respond to questions. That was one of the first opportunities we had, in a sustained way, to not only question the Minister of Finance but to get him on record saying certain things. He said, for example, that he assumes that all of the savings that manufacturers will have when the manufacturer's tax is reduced from 13.5 per cent to 7 per cent will be automatically passed on. Of course, that is an assumption that he makes. I do not think there is a single other Canadian who makes that assumption. It was important to get the Minister of Finance clearly on record.

If I may while I am on my feet, it is clearly on record on a number of occasions that we have seen this co-operation, that the Liberals have actually supported the government's efforts to introduce the GST.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ottawa South on debate. There will be an opportunity for questions and comments within the next three minutes.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion that we support the GST is so ridiculous as to fall of its own weight.

In the smoke and mirrors yesterday I would like to point out what I think to be a contradiction in what was said. The House leader of the NDP brought out the point that the minister tried to say to us that all of the manufacturers' sales tax is going to be passed on. That is what he said. He said that in answer to questions. But in his speech yesterday, as reported at page 7560 of Hansard, he stated:

In fact, about one-half of the $18 billion in federal sales tax revenues currently comes from the taxation of business inputs, materials and supplies used in the production process.

He said that in the context that the savings of this business input tax was going to be available to broaden the capital investments in the country. He cannot have it both ways. Either it is available for business to invest or it goes through to consumers. The reality of this tax is that in a massive degree tax is being shifted from corporations to individuals, and that in the face of the minister's promises that corporations were going to bear a larger share of the tax burden in this country.

I do not know why the minister is not willing to be forthright on this. Twice the question; no answers. I challenge the government to come forward and say "Yes, we admit it. Because we believe in the corporate model, we think it is best that individuals pay tax and not corporations". Therefore we have, by the minister's own admission, moved at least half of $18 billion from the corporate level to the individual level.

I know that my time is up and I appreciate your indulgence, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief comment and a question for the hon. member for Ottawa South (Mr. Manley). Earlier, he was poking fun at the text of the bill as he quoted a few passages. I may remind the hon. member that any text about taxation will inevitably contain indications that, on the face of it, may seem overly technical and sophisticated. However, I may remind the hon. member that this tax bill is supposed to replace the present legislation which contains 22,000 exemptions that could fill a dozen volumes. I am sure that if he played fair ball and quoted the exemptions that have accumulated over the years, it would be a very entertaining experience.

I have only one question for the hon. member. I think the GST has both interesting and difficult aspects. It is a revised form of an existing tax. Part of the good news, as I told my constituents, is that I am going to wait until the GST is introduced to buy a new car, because as of January 1991, we can expect to pay between $500 and $600 less for a car that costs between $15,000 and $16,000. That is what I tell people. This is very good news.

Am I to understand the hon. member for Ottawa South is against reducing the federal tax on cars? How will he explain to his constituents, who will be glad at the news, that he is against the tax? How can he argue against this price reduction?

• (1540)

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I have two things to say, first, on the subject of simplicity. The hon. member will have to admit that the minister, not I, said that one of the objectives of tax reform should be simplicity. So my question was: Does this bill reflect the government's desire for simplicity? I haven't read all the difficult parts, the technical parts that apply to the oil sector, for instance. I looked up the parts that apply to music teachers, but if they don't understand the parts that concern them, we have a problem, if simplicity is what the government wants.

Now about cars, obviously the Conservative Member and his friends always buy new cars. I am just your average Ottawa lawyer, and I usually buy used cars. The hon. member will have to admit there will be a sales tax of 7 per cent on used cars, although at the present time there is no 13.5 per cent sales tax on used cars.

[English]

I want to make the point for my constituents in Ottawa South as well, who I know do not always get the translation on this. Yesterday the Minister of Finance tried to make the point that there is going to be great savings on cars. Well, it may be, because we are dealing with an oligopoly and because we know that the big business community is supportive of this tax, whereas the small business community is grossly opposed to it, entirely opposed to it, that there will be a small reduction in the price of automobiles. That happens to be one of those sectors where it is a very short trip from the manufacturer's level to the retail level.

But as the member should know, the manufacturers' sales tax does not apply to the resale of used cars. The goods and services tax will apply to the sale of used cars. So any benefit in the car market to be gained by the goods and services tax is going to be gained by those fortunate Canadians who are still able to go out and buy a new car. We would all love it. And the bigger car they buy, the more they are going to save. But when those little Canadians, like myself and my friend from Gloucester, go and buy a used Chevy, we are going to have to pay the 7 per cent which we did not have to pay before.

Mr. Waddell: I am tempted to tell the hon. member for Ottawa South that he might consider a bicycle or something like that as he becomes a smaller and smaller little guy or whatever.

He did well to use the example of the music teacher and the details of the tax to show that in fact it is a very complicated tax. That is part of the reason for the great opposition in the country. Certainly amongst the small business community that is one of the main reasons for the opposition.

But I thought he was rather gratuitous in his snide remarks about the NDP. We have been trying to lead opposition to the GST. Rather than being snide about it I think he should join it, as he has in his speech, and remember who the enemy is.

As I understand the government's line, the Conservative's line is basically that we have had Liberal governments in this country for almost as long as we can remember except for the last five years, and those Liberal governments ran up a horrendous deficit by mismanaging the Canadian economy, by staying in power, by giving lots of grants, by printing money, spending money, and pretty well spending their way into continued power and eventually it caught up with them.

So there is an allegation of mismanagement by the Conservatives, who have done some mismanagement of their own to the economy. They have basically just continued the program. They are saying to the hon. member that the party which he represents has some responsibility for this GST because the government has to raise money to deal with that past deficit. I would ask him to deal with that.

Second, I would ask him to suggest some alternatives. The Liberals are a funny group. They are like mugwumps. A mugwump is someone who sits in the middle of a fence with their mug on one side and their wump on the other and you never know which way they are going to fall. You do not really know what the Liberals stand for. They can articulate an opposition to something like the GST but they do not know what they stand for. My question is, what are your alternatives to the GST?

Let me ask you more specifically: Would you favour getting rid of the $100,000 capital gains exemption, not on houses and on farms but on stock markets and so on? This would save the government $1.5 billion. Would you be prepared to decrease interest rates by 2 per cent which would save the government $3 billion? Would you consider bringing in a corporate minimum tax like the Americans? This would save another $2 billion. Would you consider a wealth tax in which you could really redistribute some income? You could save $1 billion to $2 billion there.

In other words, you could pick up the money that the government is getting through the GST, which is basically a tax on middle-income families. In my riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam taxes on middle-income people earning from $25,000 to $40,000 have been increased by 60 per cent by this government. People earning over $125,000 a year have actually decreased their payment of taxes.

We are clear in the NDP what we stand for. We have proposed all these alternatives. What are the alternatives of the Liberal Party to the GST, or are they going to continue to be mugwumps?

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I think when the hon. member began he asked me to remember who the enemy was, suggesting that it was not he.

After that long oration I would like to go back to the question of tax reform in general. In fact, I spoke on this on an NDP motion day back in the fall. At that time we debated the issue of tax reform on the basis of their motion. I think I was very clear in stating that I believe that general tax reform was necessary and that the goods and services tax reform was not one that represented a meaningful improvement.

I think that is the message that we tried to deliver in preparing the Liberal minority report from the finance committee on the goods and services tax. What we have before us is a proposal by the government to bring in an alternative to the existing manufacturer's sales tax.

Unfortunately, we are not in an election campaign. I wish we were. If we were I would say that our party, as well my friend's party, should be bringing forward specific alternatives to say what we will do if the people elect us. Unfortunately we are not in an election campaign and therefore what we need to do, as opposition, is to focus the debate in the country on this prime question: Is the government's proposal a measurable improvement over the status quo? That is the debate.

I believe that it is not. I believe the people of Canada agree that it is not. But as soon as we start to debate some other scheme of tax without having a good hearing of what the people of Canada think and what they believe that tax reform should look like, we let the government off the hook. We let them try to beat a straw man over the head, some alternative that my hon. friend and his research department have cooked up or what we have tried to put together with the minimal resources that are available to us.

I believe Canadians need to be heard on the issue of tax reform. I do not believe that this government is interested in listening to them. I think if we form the government the next time we will listen to them and tax reform will follow the wishes of the people of Canada.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time for comments has expired. Debate. The Hon. Minister of State for Finance.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on the Goods and Services Tax Bill. This debate is all the more important in that it involves the future of the country, one might say. We are indeed faced with a difficult and complex problem today, because our national debt is about $320 billion. For ordinary people, $320 billion is an almost inconceivable amount, almost unreal and unimaginable. Nevertheless, the effects of the national debt are very real and extremely serious.

To give you an idea of the size of this debt, consider the following: the government must spend 35 cents of every dollar in revenue to repay the debt. The government spends twice as much in interest on the debt as it does on senior citizens. The government spends 15 times as much on interest on the debt as it does on family allowances. Everyone will agree that this situation is not only deplorable it is unacceptable.

Even worse, despite all our efforts in the last five years to reduce expenditures, to improve the management of federal programs and services and to increase tax revenues, the national debt continues to grow. Any increase in the national debt inevitably results in higher interest payments on the debt. Well, Mr. Speaker, to use a famous phrase heard in Quebec in the early 1960s: It's got to change! We must end this vicious circle.

Replacing the present manufacturers' sales tax with the GST is an essential part of the government's program to build a stronger economy in an increasingly competitive world. We want to build a Canada that can meet the demands of the 1990s and the next century, a Canada where the quality of life will improve all the time, a Canada that will be better able to protect the environment and to provide advanced health care, satisfactory social security and quality education. But to reach our objectives, we must have a dynamic, competitive economy. I think that we must pursue two main thrusts. First, we must continue to work to eliminate the deficit and growth in the public debt.

Second, we must pursue our efforts to achieve fundamental and consistent economic renewal, so as to give private initiative a free rein and limit government intervention.

During the past years we introduced a policy designed to promote job creation and the kind of investment that brings in new technology.

We have freed key economic sectors like transport and energy from a regulatory nightmare. We have improved patent and copyright legislation so that Canadian investors can obtain fair compensation for their ideas and efforts.

We negotiated a wide-ranging trade agreement with our most important trading partner, to provide our businesses with freer and more secure access to the richest market in the world.

We have played a major role in multilateral trade negotiations under GATT, and we have deployed a strategy for developing trade with the triumvirate formed by the United States, the European Community and the Pacific Rim.

We privatized Crown corporations whose mission no longer responded to the goals of public policy. Most of these corporations have added significantly to the number of jobs in this country and are expanding their operations.

The Canadian Jobs Strategy made it possible to restructure the government's employment programs, with major emphasis on training and preparing Canadians for steady, durable jobs.

We are helping to build the Canada of the twenty-first century. All the measures I have just described will help lay the foundation for durable growth that will generate productive jobs in the future.

The GST is essential to the success of our economic program. It will be a more reliable and more predictable source of revenue and, by stimulating growth, will help reduce the deficit. It will also eliminate the tax on exports, putting Canadian goods on an equal footing with imported goods on our domestic markets.

Implementing our economic program has made it necessary for a number of Canadians to make some adjustments which were not always easy, I agree. It is not always easy to cope at a time when the economy undergoes profound changes. Our efforts, since 1984, to reduce the deficit were necessary to correct the mistakes of the past.

Since 1984, we have reduced the deficit by nearly $8 billion, from $38.3 billion to $30.5 billion this year. In 1984–85, program spending was about $16 billion more than the government's revenue. This year, thanks to improved expenditure management and increased revenues, budgetary revenue exceeds program spending by about $9 billion.

We will continue our efforts to reduce the deficit. According to the plan the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) tabled last April, 1993–94 will be the last fiscal year in which the government has to borrow new money on the financial market.

The bill before us today faithfully reflects the revised GST we revealed in December.

The 7 per cent rate will help bring in a climate of lower inflation, interest rates and deficits and help stimulate economic growth in the coming years.

However, with the GST at 7 per cent instead of 9, it will bring in nearly $6 billion less each year, money which was needed to reduce the deficit and maintain essential services for our fellow citizens' welfare.

• (1600)

The measures announced by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) will contribute $700 million a year to financing the lower GST rate.

We also made some changes to income tax provisions.

The lower GST rate enables us to reduce the GST credit and still keep our commitment to protect Canadians of modest means. Families earning up to $30,000 a year will pay less in income and sales taxes thanks to the GST. Three quarters of families headed by an elderly person or a single parent will have more after-tax income with the GST.

The refundable GST credit which will be paid four times a year to 8.7 million families and individuals will protect people on low incomes. The credit will be $190 for adults and $100 for children. Single parents will be able to claim an adult credit for one dependent child. Unmarried adults, including single parents, will be able to claim an additional credit of up to $100 and the first GST credit should be paid in December 1990.

Since the 7 per cent GST is less of a burden on middle-income Canadians, it is no longer necessary, as we had originally thought, to reduce the income tax rate. Even without this income tax reduction, middle-income Canadians will pay less tax.

Mr. Speaker, we also announced that the surtax on high incomes would be increased and that it would be extended to the basic federal tax on $12,500.

We have also asked companies to carry their share of the load. For example, corporate taxes will go up and the annual fees that were to be paid to small businesses to administer the GST have been eliminated. However we want to help small businesses adapt to the new system, so they will be entitled to a one-time credit of up to $1,000.

Sales and excise taxes on alcohol, tobacco and fuel will be readjusted to maintain them at their current level.

With respect to housing, the GST will apply only to new houses. The GST housing rebate has been readjusted to take the lower rate into account and will enable the government to honour its commitment to give Canadians ready access to houses at affordable prices.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know anybody who likes taxes. The introduction of a new tax is never popular even if the new levy replaces so ridiculous and destructive a tax as the current manaufacturer's federal sales tax.

Of course this initiative is not aimed at pollsters.

Its purpose is to make Canadians more prosperous and the tax system more equitable. It will eventually rid Canadians of the ever heavier public debt burden and put Canadian companies on the same footing as their competitors in this country and abroad.

Mr. Speaker, now more than ever before is the time to take action.

A modern country such as ours whose economic growth depends on international trade cannot afford the luxury of maintaining a tax system designed for the conditions and circumstances which prevailed in the 1920s. On the eve of the 21st century, how can we possibly hope to stay competitive with a regressive and harmful 66-year-old sales tax!

Look around you, you can always find people in favour of the status quo. Either they fail to understand, or they are not unduly concerned over the national deficit and the problems related to the current federal sales tax.

Others will concede that the GST should indeed be adopted, provided some major changes are made to our project. The problem we are faced with stems from the fact that there is no consensus on the changes to be made, each interest group having its own homemade solution to propose.

The Official Opposition was satisfied with playing hide and seek with Canadian taxpayers over this issue. Its representatives have stated that they are unconditionally against the GST project, without suggesting any acceptable alternative. In existential terms, we find ourselves on this issue in what I would call the Liberal void.

The New Democratic Party, on the other hand, has proposed several measures, including the possibility of setting up a Royal Commission of Inquiry. What an original and radical solution, Mr. Speaker!

As you know, people have been looking into the problems associated with the manufacturers' sales tax for the past 50 years, but the NDP would like them to continue for several more years. Also, the NDP proposes to reduce by 33 per cent the manufacturers' sales tax. Yet, it makes no effort to explain how we are going to replace these millions of dollars, except by increasing corporate and individual income tax. The NDP proposes a minimum tax of 20 per cent on corporate profits. According to its estimates, this would bring in $5.4 billion, based on the total benefits of $27 billion reported by the corporations over the reference year. Simple, is it not? But look out! These $27 billion in alleged profits are misleading data. This figure is the total of a double accounting resulting in an inflated base for a minimum tax. This figure includes a substantial amount made up of already imposed inter-corporate dividends.

Moreover, this figure reflects in part the incidence of accelerated depreciation which, to a large extent, is being eliminated as a result of the tax reforms adopted in 1988. Finally, a significant part of this figure is related to various incentives for research and development, as well as regional development, measures which the three parties, including the NDP, consider important for the future of Canada.

These figures apply to the tax year 1987 and do not take into account the fact that the tax reform on large corporations has already increased corporate taxes by $2 billion. Moreover, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) announced in December a new increase in tax on large corporations.

In this respect, Mr. Speaker, it must be kept in mind that only 3,500 large corporations are subject to the large corporation tax. When the NDP referred to tens of thousands of profitable businesses that do not pay tax, the large majority are small businesses. Small businesses would be the hardest hit by the 20 per cent minimum income tax proposed by the NDP. Do the NDP propose that the government add an extra 20 per cent to the 12 per cent income tax already paid by small businesses? That party claim they support small businesses. They are strange bedfellows Mr. Speaker! The NDP claim they are the small businessmen's friends. What is an odd kind of friendship, Mr. Speaker! As they say in English with friends like the NDP, who needs enemies?

That kind of proposal, Mr. Speaker, brings nothing but serious trouble for the Canadian economy, especially for our regions, quite apart from its negative impact on small businesses.

After 50 years of studies and discussions on the federal sales tax, after two and a half years of review and debate on the concept and the details of the GST, after months of hearings and discussions in committee and a detailed committee report, the time has now come to proceed with our sales tax reform proposal.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us is the result of a long process of reflection and consultations with every walk of life and every region in the country. This proposal is essential if we are to have a healthy Canadian finance, a strong and growing economy, a fairer tax system.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am proud to support this legislation because it is one guarantee of a prosperous and dynamic future for every Canadian man and woman.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I note that the motion on the floor right now is for a six-month hoist which has been put forward by the Liberal party. Although the minister spoke strongly in favour of the goods and services tax, he did not really address the matter of postponing the introduction of the tax or the implementation of debate on the goods and services tax for six months.

I am wondering if the minister is aware of this. I know that ministers are often busy and do not have a chance to read the newspapers as regularly as some of those without as much responsibility. He may be aware that a Liberal leadership race is on in the country and that there is a considerable amount of assistance in moving this legislation through the House by the Liberal Party. Yet the Liberal Party continues to express a considerable amount of verbal opposition to the goods and services tax.

With that said, may I ask the minister if he thinks the Liberals may have proposed this motion for a six-month hoist at this time because they are looking forward to the conclusion of the leadership race after which, under a new leader, they can change their minds and support the goods and services tax?

Mr. Loiselle: Like all ministers, of course, I never read the newspapers. I say that as a former newspaper reporter. I know that one edition frequently erases the previous day's edition. I do not take it as seriously as some of my colleagues.

I am also aware that there is a Liberal leadership convention to be held. It is a very good democratic exercise. I follow it with care because I think it is important for the opposition to organize itself. So far it has not proven to be very well organized.

In its opposition to the GST in particular, I have heard a lot of—I would not say nonsense because I suppose the word would not be welcome—views put forward even today which are far from the reality of anything we have in mind or anything we are doing.

I refer to the elderly and tourism. I am more convinced than ever that a major effort to provide information is required. We have a responsibility to provide that information. We will, of course, make every effort so that our friends across the floor will understand what we are doing.

It is a modern tax. What they call a tax grab is something that 48 countries have implemented as a mechanism to address government revenue. So it must not be so out of this world. Yet, on every aspect of it, we hear opposition.

We have had a white paper, technical documents and debate. We will have more debate. We will discuss this at length with our friends in the House and we will go ahead with it. The GST is needed. We must make sure that the present manufacturers' sales tax, the greatest disaster as far as fiscal framework is concerned, is removed so that our industries can develop, so that jobs can be created and so that we can compete in this very difficult world.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments of the minister on the goods and services tax. I am surprised at the suggestion that maybe the opposition is not well organized in terms of how we are dealing with the GST.

I would suspect that the minister would be impressed by the fact that after dropping the rate from 9 per cent to 7 per cent opposition in the country has increased. I think what the minister fails to understand is that the people of Canada are leading the fight against the GST.

It is all well and good for politicians on all sides of the House to have their views. They perhaps may not share all the same views. But the Canadian people have decided that they are opposed to the goods and services tax.

I would like to ask the minister if he is satisfied that the government is well organized in putting forward its tax reform dealing with the GST and the supposed reform of the income tax side of the equation. We were supposed to see the disappearance of the surtax on income tax. We were going to see a reduction in the rate for middle-income earners.

Is the minister as pleased with the over-all effort that has gone into the GST as he is with his reform of financial institutions?

One has to be very careful about suggesting that the opposition is not getting its act together in terms of proposing alternatives when the minister in his own responsibilities is sitting back while the institutions involved in the financial sector in this country are hanging by their very nails. They are grasping for some legislation, something that has been promised for at least a year or a year and a half. I want to hear from the minister about getting acts together.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has covered a lot of ground in a very little time. I quite see his point.

As far as financial institutions are concerned, I will not go into that. I am still committed to introducing such legislation. I must tell him that we have already moved in many areas, areas such as the securities area and so on and so forth. This is where we are way ahead of other countries. I would not say that all of the institutions are waiting and hanging on by their nails. That would be far too strong. I know that they are anxious to get our legislation, and they will get it. I hope to be able to table it shortly.

As far as the Canadian people are concerned, I, like the hon. gentlemen in this House, am frequently in touch with the population. That is why we are in politics. I meet them frequently. Obviously, in my capacity as Minister of State for Finance I deal with the GST all over Canada but particularly in Quebec. I have met dozens and dozens of groups which at the outset, after having listened to the messages that come from the other side of this House, have a very negative approach.

In any case, a tax is never popular. Tax reform is never very popular. Everybody sees the government putting its hand deeper and deeper into your pocket.

When you speak with them and calmly explain to them why you are doing it, my conclusion is that they understand very well. Of course it would take a long time to go around meeting small groups of 75, 100 or 200 people, so you need to use a better means of stating what you are going to do. Very often the opposition is based on false information.

I am confident that gradually, slowly, the over-all situation is changing. I will not say that it is a popular subject. I personally share the view that taxes are not necessarily a pleasant thing to discuss.

As far as getting our act together, we know what we would like to do ideally. I think we have taken very strong measures over the years, and we are taking one now. Nobody will suspect that we are doing this for electoral reasons. We are doing it because we are deeply convinced that it is good for the country. Nobody would claim that we would do it if we were convinced that it would, as members of the opposition say, throw our economy into a turmoil. How can we at the same time gouge everybody, make a lot of money and then throw the economy into a turmoil?

We are convinced that this is a very good way of proceeding. It is very good reform. It is good for the economy. It will create jobs. It is a modern way of arranging our affairs so that we can free the forces of our industry which are there waiting to prosper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Riis: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member on a point of order after I announce the proceedings on the adjournment motion.

[Translation]

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan (Mr. Angus)—VIA Rail; the hon. member for Ottawa South (Mr. Manley)—Social programs; the hon. member for London East (Mr. Fontana)—Proposed goods and services tax.

• (1620)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. friend, the minister, who is I must say a very experienced politician and parliamentarian. He had some very interesting comments to make. I enjoyed his speech.

I know that we cannot refer to the absence of members in the House, but I would think that there would be more members of his own party interested in what he had to say. I was going to call quorum, but I think that since there is now just a bare quorum I will not do that.

On a second point of order, the minister referred on a number of occasions to documents from which he quoted. I wonder if he would be interested and prepared to table those documents that he referred to during his intervention.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I do not know which document the hon. member is referring to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There does not seem to be any documents.

The hon. member for Sudbury has the floor on debate.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I speak today against Bill C-62 which is an act to implement the goods and services tax.

The hon. member who just spoke, the hon. Minister of State for Finance, used the term "reality". Yesterday in his speech the hon. Minister of Finance said that this tax was based on a vision, and I quote: "—a vision deeply rooted in reality". I say to you that the assumptions which the government uses for its projections are not based on the economic realities of day-to-day life in Canada.

The Government of Canada has based its arguments concerning the GST on certain assumptions. The first assumption is that the Governor of the Bank of Canada will not raise interest rates when faced with the inflation that will be caused by the application of this tax. Even the members on the government side agree that there is going to be inflation with the introduction of this tax.

We all know that the Governor of the Bank of Canada hates inflation and is purposely, right now, keeping the interest rates high to battle that inflation. When the GST is imposed there will of course be a dramatic rise in inflation. What do you think the Governor of the Bank of Canada will do? All indications are that he will raise the interest rates. That is reality.

The second premise is that workers in Canada will not ask for wage increases because of the advent of this tax. I do not know where the hon. Minister of Finance and his workers live, but I know one thing. It is an automatic response of people who wish to keep up with the cost of living. Not only is it an automatic response, it is a necessity. Of course every employee in Canada will try to keep up with the cost of living and will ask for a raise. That is reality.

The third premise that is used with the projections is that all manufacturers will remove the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax from their prices, this same manufacturers' sales tax which is buried in their prices right now.

The government puts great trust in the theory of free market economics and competition, believing that firms will be forced to pass their savings on to consumers in order to keep their prices competitive against the price of competitors who use the opportunity to lower prices. This may occur in those markets which are perfectly competitive, but reality shows us that most markets here in Canada are not perfectly competitive.

Indeed, many representations were made to the finance committee to the effect that that would not be the case. Mr. Mezon of the Automotive Industries Association told the committee in October of 1989:

> —it is going to be very difficult for most manufacturers to pass that along. It is an opportunity to pick up some profits and that is exactly what is going to happen—I think most manufacturers will look at it as a windfall, and that will add to the inflationary effect.

The Montreal Board of Trade also told the finance committee in October 1989 that faced with rising costs due to the sudden increase in inflation, firms would choose not to pass along savings to consumers. That was taken from an article printed in The Gazette of Montreal.

Indeed, past experience in Canada indicates that the inflation rate of the price of manufactured goods and all items increased after the manufacturers' sales tax was reduced by 3 per cent in 1978. This would suggest that consumers did not receive all of the savings.

Consumers will be left unprotected,. Canadians have absolutely no assurances that they will not be overcharged when they purchase a good after the application of the GST.

They tell us that they are going to set up a mechanism as sort of a watchdog. However, this watchdog will have absolutely no powers to stop gouging. All they can do is report. What use is it six months down the line to find out that you were overcharged? We want to make sure that we are not.

Not only will prices remain high and not decrease in the fashion predicted by the Conservative government, but the 7 per cent will cause an increase in the final price to the consumer. That is reality.

The other reality which this government seems to forget is that this country is a vast and very different country. It has many regional areas that are cut off from the major centres. There are great distances that one must travel. One must transport goods. The GST gives absolutely no notice to these distances or these regional differences.

Take the fact that the GST will apply to the cost of heating your home. Cold is a reality in this country. The GST will cause a significant increase in the heating bills of Canadians. It impacts far more severely on those Canadians who live in the north or on Canadians who live in some of the Atlantic provinces where the cost of transporting fuels adds greatly to the cost of heating homes.

I have before me a Statistics Canada report. It is a family expenditure survey of selected cities. This was done in 1984.

This survey states that in 1984 the cost of heating the home of the average Canadian family in St. John's, Newfoundland in one year was $1,522. That was in 1984. Realize that this is 1990 and it is much more expensive today than it was then. These are the figures and the year that I have for them.

It costs the same average household in Ottawa or Toronto approximately $825 to heat their home in 1984.

If you take 7 per cent and add it to that cost of heating the home for one year in 1984, for the people who live in St. John's, Newfoundland it means an additional cost of $107. For the people who live in Toronto and Ottawa it means an additional cost of $58.

You can see the impact of this tax. It is far greater for those areas such as St. John's, Newfoundland—and we have not even touched on areas like Yellowknife, Whitehorse and Iqaliut. Those people spend three and four times what we do to heat their homes. That is reality. No one has taken that into consideration. What is that going to do to families in those areas?

• (1630)

The tax does not take into consideration the kinds of discrepancies which occur normally in this vast land of ours. Is there not a method, some kind of mechanism to equalize the burden across these regions of our land?

Is the government forgetting the outlying regions of our country? Home heating in a country such as ours is a necessity. It is as much a necessity as basic groceries, and yet this government has zero rated groceries. Is there not some way that this government could consider zero rating the heating fuel which is so necessary to each and every one of us?

Another consideration is the imposition of the GST on transportation costs. That will hurt every outlying region, every region that is removed from the major centres. It will hurt progressively; it will hurt more as one moves away from the centres. Those who are the farthest will be hurt the most.

Distance is a reality in this country. Size and geography have always made transportation of goods and people a challenge for Canadians and therefore is a major consideration in the economy of our nation.

Transportation is a lifeline for outlying regions. These outlying regions must ship products and raw materials to markets in the populated areas and receive supplies and manufactured goods from the same populated areas. The cost of living in outlying regions is higher than the cost of living in major population centres because of the need for transportation of food and manufactured goods.

The people in Sudbury understand what the cost of transportation means. The people of Canada understand what the cost of transportation means. According to the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, the imposition of the GST is contrary to one of the sections of the national transportation policy. It appears as if this government has totally overlooked the kinds of policies that are already in place. Perhaps the government should go back and check the national transportation policies and find out whether this particular GST conforms to the policies of this government.

The proportionately higher transportation costs in regions located farther from the major markets and sources of supplies will mean that goods manufactured in these regions will be less attractive because of the higher costs involved in shipping a product from a remote area to the market centre than the cost of purchasing a product manufactured within the major market centre. What that means to regional development is a terrible blow. How can we expect industries to locate in these regions if we are now going to add a transportation cost tax which will make their goods less competitive?

Some will say to me that they can bring in their transportation tax and get a refund on the input and so on. What it happens, though, is that additional cost of transportation gets added on to the final price of the good and the good is more expensive because it must be taxed at full retail value. Not only is the good taxed at retail value in this case, but nine out of the ten provinces will turn around and tax it with a sales tax.

I really wonder what is happening. Are people from this government forgetting that there are many regions in this country in desperate need of regional diversification? The Atlantic provinces are having some problems. Northern Ontario has a number of mines closing down. How does the government expect these regions to come through if every time they turn around they are being hit by an additional tax?

The GST, as far as the people of Sudbury are concerned, and I am sure the people of the other regions of the country agree, will become a tax on distance. That is reality.

We have talked a little about simplicity. The government had said that this tax would be simple. I have news for this government. When flying to Ottawa the other day I looked at a magazine on the plane and saw an advertisement. The ads are already starting to appear in which a major accounting firm is saying: "Come on in so we can help you plan for the complexity of the new sales tax that is going to be put into place".

Everyone else understands the complexity and the difficulty that people will have in adhering to this tax. Why can't this government understand it? It is certainly clear to everybody else. How can it be more simple when we are going to have a tax and then another tax.

The government says that it is going to be visible. If there is a little sign somewhere in a store that says "the price includes the goods and services tax", is that visible? You are really going to know a lot about the tax! Ask the small business people in your communities what that will do.

I walked into a men's clothing store not long ago and the people there were appalled at the amount of extra work that it would cause them. This store is not computerized. It is just a normal store and people do not buy computers for a normal store. The work is done by hand.

These people are going to have to add the goods and services tax to the price, and then they will still have the sales tax to deal with. The owner of the store said to me: "What happens, Diane, when people have less money? The first thing they stop buying is suits and then I stop making money. Then I have problems and I have to start laying off some of my people because I cannot keep them employed", and so the story goes on. That is the reality of what is going to happen with this goods and services tax. The tax will impose further hardship on low income Canadians. There is no getting away from that. When you do not have any money and you have to pay more, it is bad.

Government members are trying to lull Canadians into believing what a bunch of good guys they are: "We are going to give you a tax credit". What they are forgetting to tell Canadians is that they are not fully indexing this tax credit. Therefore, after five years, many of the 500,000 Canadians who did receive the tax credit will no longer qualify, and those who do will have a much reduced amount of benefit.

I will state one thing: when the government brings in this new law in regard to RRSPs, it is planning to index fully the amount of money that rich people can invest in RRSPs. Therefore the government understands the reality of fully and partially indexing. If that reality is understood, perhaps the government would consider changing that portion and fully indexing the credit to low income Canadians.

I ask this government to scrap this bill, go back to the drawing board and come up with a whole new plan. The government's assumptions are flawed. The people of Sudbury and indeed the people of Canada ask the government to get in touch with reality, the realities of this country, and come up with something that will help the people of this country.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, it gives me a bit of pleasure to be able to stand and ask the member a question. I was quite taken with the speech that she made opposing the goods and services tax. I am certainly very appreciative of any words that are spoken in this Chamber, particularly for the government's benefit, when they are spoken against the goods and services tax.

The New Democratic Party has stated quite clearly that we as a party are opposed to this tax. We understand that Canadians are opposed to this tax. The polls are very clear on this point. Canadians are also opposed to the damage that this tax is going to do to our economy in the long term, which is something that this government has failed to address.

We in the New Democratic Party have informed the members of this House and Canadians from coast to coast that we are not going to co-operate with this government in any way to help it, using its majority in this House, to implement this horrible and regressive tax without concern or regard for the well-being of our country.

My question to the hon. member who just spoke is essentially to do with that matter of co-operating with the government to ensure that this goods and services tax somehow gets implemented. Canadians are frustrated. They want members of Parliament to be able to stop this tax. They do not trust this government any longer, and they want this tax stopped at all costs.

• (1640)

Could the hon. member tell me why is it that the Liberal Party objects to what might be the only way to stall the implementation of this tax until the Tories across the way start listening to Canadians? Why is it that the hon. member does not join in this fight to stop this tax instead of helping the government get its way and get this tax implemented sooner than Canadians would want, if at all?

Mrs. Marleau: It is very obvious that the hon. member to my left has been reading the polls and it does my heart good. They have been reading the polls where they have dropped 5 per cent. We are way up there and they realize that we are the enemy. I really thank him for giving us all of the credit. I love it. Keep up the good work.

As far as we are concerned, we are opposed to this tax, but we are very prepared to have good, constructive debate. We want to tell the people of Canada just how bad this tax is. We do not want to play little games so that we do not get a chance to make our speeches and inform Canadians of what we really feel.

All members to my left want to do is delay and delay, and we know what will happen. After a certain number of hours the government will call the vote and bring in closure, and we will not have had a chance to give the Conservatives a run for their money. It is important that the people of Canada have us stand up for them and put forward very reasonable, rational arguments for the government not going forward with this goods and service tax.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague and friend from Sudbury, not only for laying out so well and so articulately our position against the goods and services tax, a speech by the way that she should mail to every Canadian who did not have the good fortune to be watching when she was speaking today—

Mr. Rodriguez: Save the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Simmons: And still NDPers mumble. They are frustrated, Mr. Speaker, and I come to my second point.

Mr. Epp: What was the first one?

Mr. Simmons: My first one, and I challenge anybody over on my left to disagree, is that the member for Sudbury has just put very forthrightly the case against the goods and services tax. Her speech was much better than any tantrums, any bell ringing or any stomping out of here can ever achieve.

Mr. Epp: We will keep you to those words.

Mr. Simmons: Second, I say to the gentleman from Provencher who was party to that despicable 15-day bell ringing some years ago that he too could take a lesson from what the member for Sudbury said in her response to the gentleman in the NDP.

We in this party intend to oppose vociferously at every turn this goods and services tax. I am with her 100 per cent on the tactic that she advocates and we are following. We are going to do it by standing here in this Chamber, until that crowd over there cuts us off, telling the story of why we are against the goods and services tax.

If his question to her and to us is: "are we going to throw childish tantrums" the answer is no. I rise to compliment my friend for saying that and saying it so well, we will keep up the fight. We will not throw childish tantrums.

Perhaps the member would like to comment on my comment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Maybe she would. The hon. member for Sudbury.

Mrs. Marleau: I certainly would because I feel that the government members have to face reality.

I do not know what kind of lives they have had before, but I can tell them about my past experiences. I was raised by a single mother. I know what she went through to make sure that I had clothing and shoes. I also know what will happen now when a single mother goes to buy a snowsuit or a pair of shoes for her children. She will have to pay more because of this tax. Even more so—and I know because I was born and raised in the town of Kirkland Lake which is far from major centres—we paid more for goods. They still pay more for goods because they are away from a major centre.

I have lived in Sudbury for the last 27 years of my life. We have lived through some ups and downs. When it comes to regional development, we care very deeply about what happens. We care because transportation is key to our regional development. We do not want to see a tax on transportation because we understand that it will make life more difficult for us.

We also know that it costs a lot of money to heat our homes because it is cold in Sudbury. People in Sudbury understand that kind of thing. Perhaps hon. members on the other side of the House should come and visit. Perhaps they should go a little farther north to Kirkland Lake, Moosonee, or Iqualuit and find out what it is really like to be cold, and then return and tell those people that they are going to love this tax, that it is so good for them. Come on, get your head out of the sand. Go on a tour and find out what people really think about your tax.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Sudbury. It was all very negative. It all outlines what the Liberals are against. All I have been hearing from the Liberals is how terrible the GST is.

A party like the Liberal Party owes it to Canadians to tell them exactly what they propose to put in place of the unfair manufacturers' sales tax. We agree that the manufacturers' sales tax is unfair and discriminates against Canadian exports. We have no problem with that.

In order to fulfil our responsibility and always to give options to Canadians we tabled a minority report. It is not a question of hooking the government. It is a question of laying before the people of Canada an alternative if we are opposed to it: why we are opposed to it and what we propose to put in its place. This is what we have done on this side of the House.

All I hear from the Liberals is the same nonsense I heard from Pierre Trudeau when he argued against Robert Stanfield's wage and price controls, until he got into office and then he put them into place. I say to Canadians: "Beware of members of the Liberal Party. They are wolves in sheep's clothing".

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member to my left has obviously stepped into the trap and is prepared to debate his alternatives rather than keep that particular government, the Conservative government, on its toes defending what it proposes. I intend to keep after the government until the next election.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise today and am pleased to join in this debate on the goods and services tax.

A headline in The Toronto Star of November 30 probably outlined very well some of the concerns I have heard expressed today and on previous occasions. This is from The Toronto Star, a well-known newspaper that is known for its support of many good Tory policies. It states: "A lot of nonsense is being spouted against the goods and services tax".

I have listened to the debate, not just here but in the finance committee of which I am a member. I must concur that sometimes The Toronto Star states its view very eloquently on the issue and did so very well on that particular instance.

The reason I start out with that particular point of view is that one of the problems the government is having in trying to convince Canadians of the value of the goods and services tax is the misinformation that is being disseminated. Maybe it is not purposely, but somehow it does get out.

• (1650)

For example, One Voice, the Canadian seniors network, sent an article out to its members which it kindly provided me a copy of. On page 9 it lists some things that might be taxable under the GST legislation. It lists water. It lists the telephone bill but does not talk about the removal of the telephone or communications tax. It lists transportation but does not talk about the input tax credits on fuel costs. It lists insurance and a whole series of other things, many of which are not taxed at all. It is no wonder that Canadians are somewhat confused when they get information of that nature.

A communiqué released on January 22 by the New Brunswick Senior Citizens Federation states: "Axe the tax Boycott G.S.T." On page 4 its lists some of the things that are taxable. Under utilities, it talks about water.

The legislation is very clear. Water is not taxable. It also talks about music lessons. Very clearly, music lessons are not affected. It talks about insurance. Very clearly, insurance is not taxed. It talks about the price of a $10,000 car but does not mention at all that with the removal of the existing federal sales tax that $10,000 car will cost less. It simply adds the GST to the existing $10,000 price.

With erroneous information like this being disseminated across Canada, I do not wonder that a lot of Canadians are opposed to it. If I received information like that from people I trusted I would be upset too. Now I know that they are wrong and I hope that Canadians who are listening will in fact get the correct information.

Not all Canadians are spouting negatives. There are some who are very positive. I have here a September editorial from Business News which was distributed in the Oshawa area that has been traditionally known as NDP country. It states:

> Go for it, Mike.
> And if there must an increase, then a sales tax seems as fair a way to implement it as any. All the necessities will not be taxed—food, rent, day care and health services will all escape the tax—so those who are just getting by will not be affected much, if at all. Instead, it would appear, those who consume the most will pay the most. Isn't that the ideal for taxation—

This is from an editorial in a newspaper distributed in Oshawa.

I might add that recently I spoke to the Oshawa Chamber of Commerce. Oshawa is not my particular riding. It is a vacant riding at the moment in that it is not represented by a member of Parliament. At the Oshawa Chamber of Commerce where I spoke there was a poll taken of all the members who were present. I did not choose the members. I know that many of them came to oppose the very thought of my speaking on the goods and services tax, yet 43 per cent of them were in favour. My caution to the NDP and their colleagues is that pretty soon there is going to be a by-election. We will take 43 per cent in Oshawa any time, thank you very much.

Having said that, I would like to get on to the issue of the federal sales tax. We seem to be ignoring the whole concept of the fact that the federal sales tax is there and that it is being eliminated. Many of the speakers we have heard in the House of Commons, particularly in the Opposition, talked about the impact of the GST and totally forgot about the elimination of the existing federal sales tax.

Let me tell the House what some people who appeared before the finance committee have said. Many of these presentations would not necessarily be talked about in public, at least not by the Opposition.

For example, when the Metropolitan Montreal Chamber of Commerce appeared before us on October 11, it very clearly said, and I quote: "We would first like to reiterate that we support the elimination of the present federal sales tax which is probably one of the worst taxes in the world. It promotes imports and impedes exports."

One has to acknowledge that the National Chamber of Commerce appeared in front of our finance committee hearings and said something somewhat different. As we travelled across Canada, whether in Vancouver, Edmonton or Manitoba, as we travelled west and went down east, it is noteworthy to recognize that individual chambers made the point very clearly. They agreed with the elimination of the federal sales tax. They also agreed with the implementation of a value added type tax like the goods and services tax.

So that you do not think we only had business speak to us in favour of the elimination of the federal sales tax, Mr. Speaker, we also had some friends of the NDP appear before us. In fact, on October 10 the National Director of the United Steelworkers of America appeared before us. Here is one of his comments which I will quote verbatim: "We support the elimination of the manufacturers' sales tax. In a country whose manufacturing economy is under constant pressure, it makes no sense to have a tax system that biases the internal economy in favour of service providers. And, in an economy as heavily dependent on trade as Canada is, it makes no sense to impose what amounts to a tax on exports or manufactured goods."

That is what we have been saying on the Conservative side. That is what the finance minister has been saying. I find it rather disturbing that here is a major industrial sector across Canada, literally in every province, represented by a very large international union saying: "Get rid of the federal sales tax" but I have not heard a word, not a peep, from the NDP about the fact that one of their supporters is in favour of the elimination of that tax.

There are a whole series of other reasons why we should eliminate the tax. So far I have addressed comments from people who are not predominantly present in my riding. I do not think that the message of the diversity of people across Canada who agree with what we are doing is getting out. For example, we had appear before us Mr. Allen Hills of the Canadian Federation of Farm Equipment Dealers who stated: "A tax system that involves exceptions and exemptions, based on government definitions of who is and who is not, will quickly degenerate to the same situation we have today as we try to administer the current federal sales tax mess. That is part of the reason I say the current system is a mess or a nightmare."

He goes on rather extensively describing the problems of the existing federal sales tax. He also says that the worst thing we could do with the new goods and services tax is implement as many exemptions as presently exist under the federal sales tax.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been listening to the hon. member go through his speech. He mentioned the National Director of the United Steelworkers and read statements from Mr. Docquier with respect to the manufacturers' sales tax.

I thought maybe I had not got it right so I went to check on this matter. Mr. Docquier agrees with us that in fact the manufacturers' sales tax is unfair. He did not read into the record the conclusion of Mr. Docquier which is that he does not agree with this regressive, mish-mash tax that the government has put forward. Why did the member only quote part of the presenter's statement? Why not state the whole story, that he does not agree with what the government has proposed? That is why we have proposed alternatives.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 10 minutes left plus 10 minutes questions and comments the next time the bill comes up.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills without amendment: Bill C-4, an Act to amend the Energy Supplies Emergency Act and to amend the Access to Information Act in consequence thereof; Bill C-12, an Act respecting Museums; Bill C-13, an Act to authorize the divestiture of Nordion International and Theratronics International Limited; and Bill C-31, an Act to amend the Governor General's Act.

Also, I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-11, an Act to restructure the Eastern Canadian Synod of the Lutheran Church in America under the name of Eastern Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Rideau Hall

Ottawa

January 30, 1990

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable John Sopinka, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 30th day of January, 1990, at 5 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,
Jean M. Sévigny
Deputy Secretary, Operations

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

SALVATION ARMY ACT, 1989

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe) moved that Bill S–9, an Act to amalgamate the two corporations known, respectively, as The Governing Council of The Salvation Army, Canada East and The Governing Council of The Salvation Army, Canada West, and to make necessary provisions regarding the charter of the amalgamated corporation, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to sponsor the Private Member's Bill S–9, which will amalgamate the two governing councils of the Salvation Army, Canada East and Canada West, in order to streamline their corporate operation. At the present time there are two separate corporations, each administering the property, business and other affairs of the Salvation Army in Canada.

The original governing council of the Salvation Army in Canada was incorporated in 1909. In 1916, the governing council was separated into an eastern and western corporation. At that time it was appropriate for separate corporations because transportation and communication was not as simple or as convenient as it is today.

They have now reached a point where the sophisticated advances in telecommunications and the improvements in transportation make the administration of two corporations unnecessary. The most efficient and convenient way to administer the affairs of the Army is from one central point. Currently, Winnipeg is the home of the Canada West governing council or the legal head office of the Army, while the affairs of both governing councils are administered from the head offices in Toronto.

The proposed legislation would amalgamate the two corporations in the same manner as that provided for in the case of corporations incorporated under general corporate legislation by amalgamating them and continuing them as one corporation. Actually, the legislation will simply give what is a reality now a legal entity.

Currently each corporation has five designated officers of the Army as its members, who are the same people in each case. The only identifiable difference between the corporations is their geographical location. The process of amalgamating the two corporations will be relatively simple, given that no new corporation will be formed. There is no transfer of property and the corporations are identical in nature.

In order to ensure their ongoing governance, Bill S–9, provides that the original act of 1909 and the act of 1916, which applied to the governing council of the Salvation Army, Canada East, as well as the by–laws of the governing council of the Salvation Army Canada East will apply to the corporation once amalgamated. The separate statute which incorporated the governing council of the Salvation Army, Canada West, will be rescinded.

As the law requires, notice of the intention by way of a Private Members' bill in Parliament to seek this one continuing corporation has been published in The Canada Gazette and in the appropriate provincial gazettes. It has also been published in two national newspapers, one in each official language.

This bill, therefore, seeks to give legal substance to something that has been an operational fact for some time. I would like to stress the importance of the support of members in this House for the bill. In doing so I would like to take a few minutes to speak about the Salvation Army and what it means to our Canadian community.

I have always marvelled at the selflessness of these men and women of the Salvation Army whose entire careers are devoted to making life more liveable for others. They seek not glory nor attention. Theirs is a hands–on ministry. They minister directly to those in need and they minister to the needs of the whole person.

What exactly is this movement; a church, a denomination, a charitable enterprise, a social service agency with paramilitary structure? It is all of them and it is none of them. It is, as Arthur Meighen once described it, "a vital, spiritual force with an acute social conscience".

In this day and age of super sophistication and cynicism, it is good to find that there are still those whose real reason for being is to help their struggling neighbour.

The Army has changed quite significantly in its 107-year existence in Canada, as it has elsewhere. Yesterday's Army was small, struggling and evangelical. Today's Army is something quite different, but the zeal has diminished not one iota. The desire and determination to make a difference for the better are as alive as ever.

But the Army today is apolitical and conservative in nature. It takes no sides, endorses no candidates and refrains from attacks on the status quo. Nevertheless, governments at every level are pleased to be able to work closely with the Army on social work projects that benefit every segment of society. They realize the efficiency and effectiveness of this operation and they appreciate the devotion, determination and commonsense of the Army.

These are not social scientists with grand schemes to solve all the problems of mankind. These are not social workers with files and programs to minister to people's needs. These are not specialists who will only look to one area of hurt. These are the practitioners of a holistic medicine of the soul. They seek to help the whole man; body, mind and spirit. They are down-to-earth, well trained men and women who lead exemplary lives themselves. They prefer to deal directly with human suffering, treating each case individually and tailoring the help to the problem at hand.

Little do they care if a particular problems fits into a special category for which there is a prescribed program. They are not big on sending those in need to a variety of offices to fill in a multiplicity of forms. They, in fact, live the great commandment, to love God and to love thy neighbour.

I strongly believe, Mr. Speaker, that we as parliamentarians can do a small service to this very worthy group of people by passing this bill, a bill that simply helps streamline their corporate administration so they can continue to devote their time to helping others.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

• (1720)

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-3, An Act to establish the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, to repeal the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion Act and to make consequential amendments to other Acts—Chapter No. 1

Bill C-4, An Act to amend the Energy Supplies Emergency Act and to amend the Access to Information Act in consequence thereof—Chapter No. 2

Bill C-12, an Act respecting museums—Chapter No. 3

Bill C-13, An Act to authorize the divestiture of Nordion International Inc. and Theratronics International Limited.—Chapter No. 4

Bill C-31, an Act to Amend the Governor General's Act—Chapter No. 5

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

SALVATION ARMY ACT, 1989

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cole that Bill S-9, an Act to amalgamate the two corporations known, respectively, as "The Governing Council of The Salvation Army, Canada East" and "The Governing Council of The Salvation Army, Canada West", and to make necessary provisions regarding the charter of the amalgamated corporation, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to support the passage of the bill that the hon. member for York—Simcoe has proposed to the House. I want to say first how thankful Canadians are for the excellent work carried on by the Salvation Army across our country.

Indeed, I am pleased to say that during the break that we had over Christmas when Parliament was not sitting I had the opportunity to tour some of the facilities of the Salvation Army in Kingston, including the Harbour Light facility in particular and the new citadel that had been built at the north end of the city, to see what excellent work is being conducted by the Salvation Army in my community. I know the work that that body does is multiplied across Canada in hundreds of Canadian centres where the excellent social work and work for assistance with people in need is carried out on a daily basis by the Salvation Army.

I am pleased that we in this House have an opportunity to record our appreciation and the appreciation indeed of millions of Canadians for the work that is carried out on an annual basis by this group and to pass a bill that deals with changes they desire in our corporate structure.

I have read the proceedings in the other place concerning this particular bill and have read the proceedings in the committee in the other place. I am satisfied with the opinions expressed there that the bill will accomplish the objective. I believe the objective is a sensible and worthy one and I believe that the bill therefore should enjoy the support of all members of the House. I am happy to rise to support it and make my speech very brief on that point, Sir.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I also rise to support the passage of this Private Member's Bill so that it can be referred to committee. I think the work of the Salvation Army in Canada as it is in most of the western world is well known. It certainly pioneered in the field of health care, social services, corrections and in child welfare. We wish to facilitate the continuation of the excellent standards and work that the Salvation Army has started.

The Salvation Army, however, is like many other organizations. It has grown dramatically in size. Its complexity has increased. It now has to deal with such complex things as detailed programs, government funding, properties that are immense, mortgages, cash flow, and a whole series of business and organizational problems that it initially did not anticipate in 1909 and in 1916 when these bills were initially passed.

The reasons we would like this matter to go before a committee to examine the bill are several. First, the other place did pass the legislation. It did have a committee. But it made no attempt to find out what were the implications of those bills. In fact, the committee hearing was one page in which the committee basically complimented the Salvation Army on its good works with much justification, but did not look at the technical details of what was happening with this legislation.

Second, there is a letter from Consumer and Corporate Affairs that says one of the things which this bill is intended to do is to remove the $350,000 limit on land value, a limit imposed in 1916. I read the 1916 legislation. There are two pieces of legislation in fact. But this section was repealed in 1957.

So we have Consumer and Corporate Affairs saying this is the intent of the legislation, and I read the legislation in 1957 that the parts referred to were repealed.

We have a letter from the minister raising an issue that the bill expresses no charitable intent for the Salvation Army. If you look at the 1916 legislation it is very clear that many of the activities that were contained in those pieces of legislation were of a charitable nature.

The legislation proposed that the Salvation Army, East be the continuing corporation and its by-laws be the ones that continue and the Salvation Army, West sort of fade out, which some people in western Canada would say is the intent of most easterners on all things.

When we read the two pieces of legislation and the 1916 piece of legislation, the Salvation Army, West is very detailed and sets out what the Salvation Army is going to be able to do. It can manage and operate hostels, places of rest, homes for women, and homes for children. When we look at the Salvation Army, East legislation, the by-laws make no mention of those things.

It also raises the whole issue of the transfer and handling of Salvation Army properties. I have sent a letter to the Salvation Army and I am going to refer to parts of it because I think it is important that these questions be answered.

Do the proposed changes, particularly the removal of the $350,000 limit on real estate, and the amalgamation allow the Salvation Army to transfer property held by registered charities?

Each of its facilities is a registered charity in its own right. Can that be transferred to the corporation such as Grace Hospital, House of Concord, Mainwood Home, child welfare facilities?

Could profits from the sale of these properties legally then be used by the corporation for other purposes? In other words, for non-child welfare or non-medical purposes?

Could the properties be transferred and sold in spite of provincial government wishes and the fact that the provincial government may have advanced funds on those properties or held liens such as under the Community Facilities Funding Act.

Could the assets or value of properties be transferred from one province to another province in spite of provincial government source of funding?

Has the Salvation Army communicated with provincial governments its request and obtained their concurrence?

• (1730)

As the Salvation Army is not a registered charity, can it hold properties that are used for charitable purposes? Does the Salvation Army now hold real estate in excess of the $350,000? I believe it does because since I wrote the letter, I found out that section was—

Mr. Milliken: They are a registered charity.

Mr. Karpoff: They are not a registered charity. The Salvation Army Corporation is not a registered charity. They have a number of registered charities held at provincial levels.

As I stated previously, I want to indicate to the Salvation Army that we would like this matter referred to a legislative committee so that these matters can be dealt with. We feel strongly that it would be a disservice to the Salvation Army if this House simply rushed through the legislation in a manner that would at some time in the future lead to the embarrassment of the Salvation Army.

The Salvation Army is known for its good works. It is known for its dedication to humanity and we feel that it deserves that this legislation be examined in detail by a committee, and we support approval at this stage and referral to a committee of this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to further continue the debate on VIA Rail. A question was put by me in this House back on December 6, with an unsatisfactory answer, I think it is safe to say.

It has been an interesting experience, working with the transport committee, railway unions, Rural Dignity, Transport 2000, Greenpeace, and the city of Thunder Bay, all in the aid of promoting a modern, efficient rail passenger service.

What we got from this government was not a step into the future, but a leap into the past. The Government of Canada cut the funding to VIA Rail which forced VIA to slash its system by approximately 51 per cent. Whole areas of the country lost their rail service. Northwestern Ontario in particular lost The Canadian. Atlantic Canada saw its service reduced to the point where it is almost impossible to go from Atlantic Canada to central Canada. The international and regional transportation networks were decimated.

This government argues that the fiscal necessities of our time forced it to do that. It also argued that the people were not using VIA Rail. It was saying that 3 per cent of Canadians travelling from one city to another city were travelling by rail.

Well, Mr. Speaker, you know that you can use figures in many different ways. That 3 per cent represented 6.5 million to seven million people, and it was growing. More and more people were using it every day. We are seeing two to three million people directly disenfranchised as a result of this government's decision.

We have argued all along that what the government should be doing is what they promised to do and what the previous government promised to do. In fact, I have said it before. Seven ministers of transport promised to invest in VIA Rail. They started. They bought some new locomotives but, unfortunately, because they did not go the next step to buy the new passenger equipment, they had to attach the old locomotives to the new locomotives just to provide the heat for the trains behind them. That is not exactly the height of efficiency.

The government also said that there would be no impact on the environment, that shifting that many people from the trains to planes, cars and buses would have a negligible effect. It is obvious that if you add a million more car trips per year to the roads—and those are the government's figures concerning cars which will spew out that much exhaust into the air and contribute to that degree to the degradation of the environment—then there is no way that the government's figures are correct.

We have taken this battle to the courts and to the streets. We will continue it because we recognize that once before train services were cut in this land. That was back in 1982–83. I think, Mr. Speaker, that you were part of a very valiant effort to convince the government of the day to change that decision. Very clearly in 1982 it was wrong to cut VIA by 20 per cent, which is what the Liberals did, just as it was wrong in 1989 to make the decision to cut the system by 50 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you and to the Government of Canada that a fundamental error has been made. It is an error that will return to haunt government members, particularly in two or three years from now when we will go to the polls and the people of Canada will have an opportunity to pass judgment on the government of the day. As we know, governments tend to be defeated and not elected in this country. The Conservative Party will join the ranks of the opposition once again to be replaced, I hope, by a party that truly believes in rail passenger services, not one that just says good things about it in opposition but attacks it in government.

I look forward to the response by the hon. parliamentary secretary. He is fighting a losing battle on this one, the political battle, but I wait with interest his comments.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am so glad that the member opposite from Thunder Bay—Atikokan is so concerned about the welfare of the government throughout this situation in which we have found ourselves.

Really, it was a very difficult decision we had to make in terms of trying to bring some fiscal reality back into the system. Back in November when the hon. member opposite raised the issue it was in light of the standing committee's recommendation to the government that it put a moratorium on the changes that had been announced to take place on January 15.

In reflecting on the recommendations which the committee made, it was interesting to note that there was no mention that if the House and the government were to accept the recommendation, how we might continue to pay for the tremendous expenditures that flow out of the federal treasury on behalf of VIA Rail in order to keep VIA Rail afloat. That is what this is all about. Lofty ideas do not require financing—reality does.

In deciding upon this new network, the government had to balance fiscal reality with the actual usage as well as transportation needs. We are trying to build for the future here so that we will have a VIA Rail in the future.

Despite the more than $5 billion spent on VIA since 1977, subsidies to VIA have continued to rise. They are not going down, they are continuing to rise, even after $5 billion of expenditure.

In 1988 they reached an unprecedented level of $644.8 billion. Yet the passenger levels were 20 per cent lower than they were in 1981.

Our decision preserves the historic transcontinental service and service to remote communities solely dependent upon rail for access. It continues to provide a number of daily services in the Quebec–Windsor corridor which generated more than 70 per cent of VIA's 1988 ridership. In other words, we were looking at something that was affordable but we also needed something that was sustainable. That was the challenge that was put to VIA management.

• (1740)

In order to mitigate the effects, the government directed VIA to treat affected employees with concern and compassion in full compliance with all of the collective and special agreements. VIA's five-year plan provided for separation benefits totalling more than $140 million. Given these factors and the need to reduce the deficit, the government stands by its decision to restructure VIA.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this adjournment debate with respect to a question that I raised in the House of Commons on December 7, 1989. I was asking the government about some aspects of its proposed clawback of social benefits and in particular the way in which it had presented this clawback tax to the people of Canada.

An exchange arose with the Minister of Finance in which he referred to some pre-budget consultations with the One Voice seniors network. As a result of his reference to that pre-budget consultation, the One Voice seniors network issued a press release in which it stated that the minister was twisting its words. Their press release stated: "Seniors were appalled yesterday to see their words twisted to support the government's controversial clawback legislation".

I asked a question about this in the House. In the absence of the Minister of Finance the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs took the floor. He made matters worse. He decided to try to quote something that was said by Mrs. Woodsworth of the One Voice seniors network.

The Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs said, as reported at page 6615 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the hon. member who is twisting the words of the Minister of Finance. It is very plain exactly what Mrs. Woodsworth, who was representing that group, said. She said it, and I will read it to you again. I will do so slowly.

I might say there was some sarcasm in his voice when he said that.

> —we agree with the Economic Council that people with over $50,000 of income should have their OAS taxed back.

That prompted a letter from Mrs. Woodsworth in which she referred to that quotation. She stated the following:

> It has been the consistent position of One Voice that the clawback is a serious threat to universality of Canada's social benefit programs, and we have never supported the measure. I know that I personally never made such a comment.
> We have contacted the Economic Council of Canada and they have been unable to locate any report which makes a reference to the clawback or the $50,000 threshold.
> What concerns us more is that the clawback was not announced until the budget was released in April. We wonder how discussion of the clawback or the $50,000 threshold could have taken place in February before it had been announced in April.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to belabour this. The Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs clearly was anxious to make his point and he did it with perhaps a touch of emphasis which he later regretted. The point very clearly is that the government, in introducing the clawback of old age security payments and family allowance payments, did so in what I describe as an under-handed and sneaky fashion.

These benefits were referred to by the Prime Minister prior to both elections as "sacred trusts". He did not ever suggest to anyone that he was about to cut into these social programs, and yet, when the first budget came out after the last election, there it was.

The process—well, there was no process. The process was that it was announced in the budget and enacted in income tax legislation.

Whether you agree with universality or not, that is not the point here. The point is this; universality has been recognized as the cornerstone of our social programs in Canada, be they family allowance, old age pensions, or medicare. Even education, in a sense, is a social program, and universal access has been regarded as the cornerstone of that.

If you want to end that, if you want to change the basic structure of our social programs, surely the way to do it is to announce the intention to have a full and open public debate on it, in which the case for and against universality is made, not only by those who are concerned with fiscal aspects of it but by those who are concerned about the social aspects of it. Once that debate has occurred across Canada then we proceed with the will of the people in mind.

There was no debate. There were promises made, promises broken. Debate did not occur. It was introduced in a tax bill where it could not be fully debated and forced through by the government using time allocation. The universality of those social programs has ended without full debate. For that I think the government must be held to account.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think we should put the problem into perspective. This means realizing the fact that we have a national debt that has now reached $320 billion and is a threat to Canadians. Mr. Speaker, $320 billion isn't peanuts. It's a major problem.

That being said, if we look at what the situation was in 1969, Mr. Speaker, 12 cents of every tax dollar was spent on paying our debt. This year, it is 35 cents. Out of every tax dollar collected by the Canadian government, 35 cents goes to pay Canada's debts, debts that were accumulated during the previous administration. If we want to go on having social programs in the future, if we want to ensure that Canadians will have the social programs they want and to which they are entitled, I think that at a time when we are talking about budgetary restrictions, we must consider those Canadians who have high incomes and who can help the Canadian government pay off this enormous national debt.

Mr. Speaker, we are saying to the 2 per cent of Canadians with a gross annual income of more than $77,000 that they are going to pay back part of the old age security pension they receive at a rate of 15 per cent. Only this group of Canadians is affected by this measure. Mr. Speaker, I think that if we asked Canadians over 65 with a gross annaual income of $77,000 if they were prepared to give a little more to their country than a person who has a much lower income, they would have to admit, although perhaps not willingly, that they don't need an old age security pension from the Canadian government.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I must say I am surprised that I should have to explain all this to my Liberal colleague. It seems that only two days ago, at a Liberal orientation conference in Toronto, they recommended removing social programs and introducing instead a guaranteed annual income. Implicitly, this means doing what the present government will do by taxing high-income Canadians at a somewhat higher rate.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are telling me that my time has expired. Thank you.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to further inquire of the Minister of State (Housing) about the effects of the GST on housing affordability.

I said on November 28, 1989 that if the goods and services tax is applied to a new home, it is not a tax on consumption. It is a tax on a dream. It is a tax on savings and it is a tax on a basic essential of life, shelter.

This government has reneged on its promise to mitigate the negative repercussions of the GST on the affordability of new home ownership, on housing. The result will be reduced accessibility to home ownership on the part of Canadians, especially those who live in high cost markets such as Toronto and Vancouver.

The government promised to ensure that there was no negative impact on housing affordability from sales tax reform and that the new tax would not be allowed to prejudice the reasonable opportunity for home ownership that Canadians would otherwise have enjoyed. In other words, the new system will not pose a barrier to the affordability of housing.

A rebate of 2.5 per cent of the GST is payable on new homes that are principal residences priced at less than $350,000. The rebate then declines sharply to nil for homes above $450,000.

The average home priced at around $150,000 in this country will be taxed at a rate of 4.5 per cent after the rebate. The Conservative government has assured the people of Canada on numerous occasions that the rebate guarantees that the GST does not pose a barrier to the affordability of new homes in Canada. I disagree and I have the figures and calculations to back me up.

This rate of taxation will have an average inflationary effect on the price of new homes of some 2 per cent nationally and this could rise to as much as 3 per cent in metropolitan centres where the cost of land is very high. I am aware that the Department of Finance does not agree with these figures but the average 2 per cent inflationary increase on both new and existing homes is one that is widely accepted by housing organizations such as the Canadian Home Builders' Association.

The figure is calculated to factor in the current effect of the federal sales tax and compare it to the new goods and services tax. The assessment of the effect of the GST on housing affordability cannot be done in a vacuum. Actions by provinces and municipalities which have resulted in added financial obligations on the housing sector through land transfer tax, lot levies, processing fees and other means are also reducing the affordability question. The government promised to bear these factors in mind but it obviously did not.

The rebates that are being offered are not only insufficient to counter the inflationary impact of the goods and services tax, they are also inherently inequitable to Canadians who live in high cost areas who must pay higher prices not because the houses are luxurious but because the land costs are expensive.

The government is not acknowledging these facts. Instead, the government is clinging to its conclusion that the GST will only have a slight increase of .3 per cent on the average, to be exact, in the price of new housing. Why is this government ignoring housing organizations which claim that this government has over-estimated the burden of the existing federal sales tax on a typical new home?

The government insists that the effect of the FST on a new house is about 4.2 per cent. Other figures show that the net effect of the FST is only 3.7 per cent. This lower rate is documented and calculated in great detail.

The Department of Finance has not released any of the calculations behind its estimates. Why will the government not show how it arrived at a 1.6 per cent effect on the GST on new home prices in Toronto? Detailed calculations have been given to the government to show that the effect of the GST on home prices in Toronto is actually 3 per cent.

How democratic is this Tory government when it tells the people of Canada, "We are right and you are wrong." The Conservative government is telling Canadians it does not have to be accountable for its decisions.

The entire existing federal sales tax will not disappear entirely as of January 1, 1991, as they would have us believe. This government insists on clinging to its unrealistic assumption that all the existing FST will disappear on New Year's Day. A more reasonable assumption would be to assume that one-third of the existing FST will remain in the cost structure of new housing over the foreseeable future.

I ask this government to table the figures on the effect of the GST on housing because people want to buy homes. They need the shelter but they cannot afford to buy the homes if, in fact, the GST is having an adverse and negative effect on affordability.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, time and time again I have told Canadians, and I want to re-emphasize this evening to the hon. member, that my primary goal is to ensure decent affordable housing for every Canadian. That is a goal, not only of me personally, but of the government. For that matter, although it may surprise the hon. member, it is a goal of the Minister of Finance as well.

Housing affordability is something that the Minister of Finance spoke about back in the fall of 1988. He indicated at that time that with the imposition of a goods and services tax efforts would be made to protect affordability for low and modest-income Canadians.

As a result of that undertaking by the Minister of Finance, his officials and my officials at CHMC have had numerous discussions over many months. I have personally had many discussions with the Minister of Finance on this very vital issue.

Those discussions took place against the background of the whole question of introducing a goods and services tax in place of the present federal sales tax, a tax which penalizes our exporters, benefits importers, penalizes jobs in this country and reduces the gross income of Canadians as a whole.

The first goal was to get rid of that tax. The second, of course, was to find a way to protect affordability of housing against a background of discussions wherein people were saying that we should tax everything, not just new housing, and that there should be no exemptions. The proposal at that time was for a 9 per cent goods and services tax, and that there should be a 5 per cent goods and services tax on all housing, existing as well as new housing.

The result, of course, is what we have before us now. The House is debating Bill C–62, which deals with the goods and services tax as presently put forward.

In examining that tax we have to bear in mind first, that at the present time there is a federal sales tax of 13.5 per cent on all building supplies. As well, there is a federal sales tax on many other inputs that go into the building of a new house, whether it is the machinery or the tools that are used in the building of that new house, or whether it is the office supplies or the printing materials that are used with respect to it. Whatever it is, there is at the present time a federal sales tax of 13.5 per cent that goes into the building of that new house.

What we are talking about now is taking that off and putting in its place, first, a 7 per cent goods and services tax with a rebate of 2.5 per cent on homes of up to $350,000. The net impact of the goods and services tax on new housing is a 4.5 per cent tax on all parts of that new house. That compares with the present federal sales tax that impacts on new housing at the rate of 4 per cent. That means what we are talking about with the goods and services tax is really a one half of one per cent increase of the total tax that is imposed on a new house under this system.

What the impact of the goods and services tax with the rebate means is that there will be, in many cases, no increase in the tax, or in some cases a modest increase in the tax. In all cases there will be a rebate on the tax up to the $350,000 cost of housing.

I think it is important that I point out as well that over the last two years housing prices have increased dramatically without any tax changes whatsoever over and above what the impact of the GST will be. For instance, in Canada last year the price of a new house increased by 13.2 per cent; in Toronto, by 19.2 per cent; and in Vancouver, by 30.7 per cent.

It is quite clear that there are other factors going into the cost of housing and new housing other than and separate and apart from any taxes whatsoever. That is why I and the government have been working to put surplus government land on the market to increase the supply of housing. That is why we are looking at the possibility of a 5 per cent down payment. That is why we have instituted co–operative committees, provincial, federal and municipal, to make sure that we can accommodate affordable housing.

With all of these things, I am sure it is clear to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the hon. member that the government is dealing with this question of housing affordability and that we will continue to deal with it until we have ensured that each and every Canadian has a decent house at an affordable price.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, leaked reports abound that senior cabinet ministers may resign because they can no longer stomach their government's undermining of Canada's social and economic infrastructure with its cuts to VIA Rail and the unemployment insurance system, its withdrawal of commitment to foreign aid and its mismanagement of the fishing industry, tax reform and the economy in general.

Now the CBC is implementing the government's imposed cuts of $140 million ahead of schedule. The policy of stripping $280 million from the CBC since 1984 is undermining that corporation's ability to promote a distinctively Canadian identity, to foster culture and arts reflective of Canadian values and the various cultural communities that make up those values. It is indicative of this government's misplaced priorities.

The CBC is increasingly less able to promote Canada's two official languages, to promote a mutual appreciation of Canada's multicultural communities, to mitigate the influence of television media from south of the border and to sustain communication services to those living in northern and regional communities.

If the Minister of Communications cannot defend the CBC from his government's distorted priorities, perhaps he should follow the lead of his colleagues on other issues and threaten to take his questionable talents elsewhere.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Toronto City Council for taking a leadership role in developing a blueprint to save the environment.

Yesterday, Toronto City Council endorsed in principle a report prepared by the city's special advisory committee on the environment. The report will lead to an action plan to slow down the greenhouse effect and combat global warming.

Toronto is the first city in the world to take such action. The report has called for a cut in CO_2 emissions by 20 per cent by the year 2005, the encouragement of public transit, alternative fuels and energy conservation, improvement of bicycle paths, extensive tree planting as trees remove CO_2 from the atmosphere, a $23 million atmospheric fund and the pursuit of a 10 per cent carbon tax.

Our government, provincial and municipal governments, and governments around the world should applaud Toronto's initiative and look to Toronto as a world leader in the fight against global warming and the greenhouse effect.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, during The Week Starts Here program on CBC Newsworld last Sunday the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance stated, in response to a question about ending universal funding for medicare, that if we want to keep social programs in 10 years wealthy people should start to pay for them now. His approach was to suggest that the same clawback approach used for old age security and family benefits be considered for medicare.

As well, a number of business groups have called upon the government to make drastic cuts to social programs. In his statements this week the Prime Minister has willingly agreed to accept the position as chief executioner of Canada's social programs. As well, the chairman of the finance committee stated that this government has decided to eliminate universality of social programs.

One by one, members of this government, like rats boarding a sinking ship, are voicing their support for this unwarranted and vicious attack on medicare and social programs. Canadians well remember the Prime Minister's promise that social programs were a sacred trust.

Surely this Prime Minister can't expect ordinary Canadians to believe him and his government any longer. This is clearly a matter of trust and Canadians no longer trust this Prime Minister, and rightly so as one election promise is broken after another.

FIREARMS

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, since the tragic events at Montreal's École Polytechnique, when 14 young women were killed by a man carrying a powerful weapon, there has been a major movement across the country against the use of semi-automatic weapons.

Thousands of Canadians are demanding changes in the existing legislation in order to limit the sale and possession of such weapons in Canada. People across the country, especially in Quebec, urgently request that the Minister of Justice amend the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I imagine there are enough competent people around the Minister of Justice to clarify, in a bill, the difference between weapons used for hunting and combat weapons.

I may remind the House that what is important for a hunter is accuracy, not the number of bullets fired.

Mr. Speaker, our government must act and make appropriate amendments to the present legislation, in the interests of protecting Canadian citizens.

[English]

CANADA POST

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the post office is an integral part of community life across rural Canada. In many cases the rural post office is the only federal presence in a community.

Last week a message was published in the local Island newspapers on behalf of a number of municipalities and organizations. It requested that the federal government maintain post offices as a government service and completely stop the closure and privatization of post offices on Prince Edward Island.

Today, representatives of the West Prince Chamber of Commerce and the President of the Prince Edward Island Federation of Municipalities will express their concerns before a standing committee of parliament looking into Canada Post.

I hope that this government will be listening to what Islanders are saying, to what Canadians are saying and that it will protect and maintain rural post offices in Canada.

TRADE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, over the past month and the month before we have been hearing a great deal about the free trade agreement. One of the things we have not been hearing is that 99 per cent of our trade with the United States is now dispute free. I know that this positive trading relationship is a disappointment to our left-wing friends across the floor, but Canadian manufacturing exporters are continuing to take advantage of the free trade agreement.

• (1410)

Just last week Sweeprite Manufacturing, a Regina company, was awarded an $18.5 million dollar contract to supply mechanized sweepers to the United States Department of National Defence. This is the kind of contract which has been made possible by the climate created since the signing of the free trade agreement and the development of the level playing field.

The export of manufactured goods from the prairies to the United States is a real indication of the growing diversity of our economy with increased economic stability and jobs, jobs, jobs.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the free trade agreement and the Western Diversification Program are working and I congratulate Sweeprite Manufacturing and its staff on their success.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, for the past six months the people and workers of Trail, B.C., and the surrounding area have been told by Canada Employment and Immigration officials that as of this March 1, most unemployment insurance functions of their Canada Employment office will be terminated and transferred to Nelson, some 80 kilometres away. Ten employees will have to move or quit their jobs and claimants with difficulties will have to travel an extra three hours for service.

This unemployment insurance agency amalgamation is being carried out in the name of a dubious and unsubstantiated claim of "improving services" in Trail. In 1987 this unemployment insurance office received the PEP award as the most productive and efficient UI office in B.C.

A delegation from the city of Trail and the regional district of Kootenay-Boundary will be meeting with the Minister of Employment and Immigration this afternoon on the need for enhanced UI services in the Trail area in the months and years immediately ahead due to a myriad of impending construction projects and major labour force dislocations within the immediate area, including those caused by the recent Sullivan mine closure in Kimberley, which will require improved and expanded UI services in Trail, not less.

I ask the minister to listen carefully to these facts, of which her officials may initially have been unaware, and to seriously review the earlier decision of her department in light of these new facts.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow morning, the Canada Post Corporation will introduce an outrageous increase in postal rates for air stage services.

The consequences for northern regions are easy to predict. The cost of living will go up, people's health will be at risk and the gap between rich and poor will become even wider.

Mr. Speaker, I have reason to believe that employees of Canada Post and a number of other government organizations in the north do not have to pay freight costs on food they order from the south, thus enjoying a benefit not available to people who have to buy locally.

RACIAL AND CULTUTAL DIVERSITY

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, information is the key to knowledge.

Information about our ethnic differences is the key to understanding, tolerance and harmony. In Canada, the media are in an excellent position to further this concept.

The Canadian Ethnocultural Council has suggested creating a multicultural media institute. Its plan includes a basic strategy, at regional and national levels, to make the media more aware of the importance of being objective in their presentations in order to avoid creating cultural and racial stereotypes in this country.

[English]

I urge the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship to reconsider his decision to not assist in financing this program when the funds become available. Sensitization of the media is an important element for promoting harmonious relations among all Canadians.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Tatamagouche Recycling Committee for its fine work in planning and organizing an innovative plan to resolve the waste disposal problem in their community.

This local group headed by Dr. Pippa Moss, with Tina Harriot and Bill Campbell serving on the executive, have raised funds and services from many local individuals and businesses. They then successfully applied to Environment Canada for matching funds through the Environmental Partners Fund. This is not a giant project, but still a very important one and done completely by volunteers interested in reducing pollution and encouraging recycling.

The original survey that determined that 92 per cent of the residents in the area would support the local project clearly indicates how important this issue is to the people of Tatamagouche. They have a beautiful place to live and are fully prepared to put forth a great deal of effort to maintain it.

Clearly, the Environmental Partners Fund is properly named because it is a partnership between the people and the government which will result in a better environment for everyone. Congratulations to the committee for this ambitious endeavour.

BRAZIL

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians should be concerned about the survival of the Yanomami people in Brazil.

Last week, the Brazilian Government violated a court order and indeed violated the Brazilian constitution in refusing to evict 45,000 gold panners from the State of Roraima, a territory in which the Yanomami people have lived for generations.

Twenty years ago, the Yanomami had only sporadic contact with the outside world. With the arrival of the gold panners has come disease, pollution and violence. The Brazilian government's decision to allow continued mining and colonization means an exacerbation of these problems and poses a real threat to the tropical rain forest so crucial to the global environment.

Hundreds of Yanomami deaths have been related to their new contact with outside peoples. With the persistence and augmentation of this contact, these people face a real threat to their survival as a people.

I call on the Canadian Government to express its disapproval of the Brazilian government's decision and to work through international financial organizations to ensure that a sustainable natural environment takes precedence over reckless development.

LAW OF THE SEA

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, what a contrast between the Prime Minister's pledges of support for sustainable development and Canada's inaction. At the United Nations, Canada has not ratified the Law of the Sea, which would help protect and properly manage the oceans of the world. To come into force, 60 nations must sign and ratify it. Only 43 nations have so far ratified the Law of the Sea, but Canada is not among them.

When will the Prime Minister match his rhetoric with action? When will he instruct Ambassador Fortier to ratify the Law of the Sea? When will Canada start advocating at the United Nations the ratification of the Law of the Sea, thus playing a positive role in the implementation of sustainable development in the oceans? The goal is within grasp and yet still elusive because of lack of political will.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming) Mr. Speaker, I am most disturbed by recent statements made in the riding of Timiskaming against the Meech Lake Accord.

Liberal leadership hopeful Jean Chrétien, who recently came to northeastern Ontario, is speaking out against the Meech Lake Accord. Now he and the local Timiskaming Liberals are barking and clapping like trained seals: "Meech Lake is dead and happily so".

Allow me to respond to Mr. Chrétien and his supporters. Canadians who are concerned with the future of our country, who are concerned with national unity and cultural tolerance, find these doomsayers' statements irresponsible and divisive.

There was an agreement among all premiers at Meech Lake in 1987. Canadians are wanting to see the agreement again in 1990. Our Prime Minister should be commended and supported for successfully building our country's strengths and uniting Canadians. Jean Chrétien and his Liberals could not do this in 1981, and obviously they cannot do it today.

I say there is no room for those Liberal undertakers of yesterday who are ready to bury Meech Lake and the future of Canada at the same time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I have now had an opportunity, as several Members of Parliament have, of reviewing some of the technical language in the legislation on the goods and services tax which the minister has produced in this House.

Luckily for the minister, most Canadians are not in a position to have read the legislation. According to pages 312 and 313 of the legislation, the situation is that seven-year-olds who want to set up a Kool-Aid stand on the corner will pay the goods and services tax—

Some hon. Members: Oh come on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peterson: Just keep laughing all the way to defeat in the polls.

• (1420)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, there is a lot of nervous twittering from the government benches.

The kid who wants to set up a Kool-Aid stand will pay 7 per cent goods and services tax on the Kool-Aid that he purchases from the corner store. A multi-millionaire who wants to serve his friends caviar at $311 a pound will not have to pay a cent of tax under this legislation.

Could the minister explain how he could possibly have come up with such stupid legislation? Millionaires will not pay a cent on luxury gourmet foods but kids will have to pay 7 per cent on lemonade.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. Leader of the Opposition could not see it, but there is a four-year old up the gallery who was yawning while he was asking the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, he is not in my riding association.

The hon. member has pointed out a difficult area of borderline in the goods and services tax. We have acknowledged this. If the hon. member is suggesting that we tax food, let him say so. That is not the position of the government. It is not the position of this party. If it is a position of the Liberal Party of Canada, then say so.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is a breach of the rules, but if I were sitting in the gallery and had to watch the Minister of Finance, I would be yawning too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Nobody who is watching this House of Commons will be doing anything but laughing when we finish with this goods and services tax.

I do not know whether the minister has read the legislation, but how can he justify that under the goods and services tax a cookie is taxed, paté de foi is not taxed; pretzels are taxed, smoked salmon is not taxed; sherbet is taxed, filet mignon is not taxed; a grilled cheese sandwich is taxed, imported French Brie is not taxed; cold cuts are taxed, oysters are not?

I also want the minister to explain why, according to Schedule VI, Part III, section 1, subsection (m) of his legislation, muffins are taxed but English muffins are not taxed. Why does the minister not admit food is food, tax is tax. Withdraw this stupid legislation and take tax off food altogether.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the right hon. Leader of the Opposition was reading from the most recent menu at Winston's, but I presume he is going there more frequently now.

The right hon. Leader of the Opposition is pointing out what is a difficult area of the tax, the borderline between what is taxable and what is not taxable. We made a fundamental choice that we were not going to tax basic groceries. We said that in December 1987. Because of that, you have to decide what is taxable; processed foods, things like that, and what is not taxable; basic groceries. Where that borderline comes together is difficult.

We have asked the finance committee to review this. We have asked members of the Restaurant Association and the food industry to provide us with advice on this. The borderline that we have today is the fairest borderline that we have been able to come up with, based on the advice we have been provided.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): I think that Members of Parliament, and what restaurants we have still open, ought to tax Wilson's cooked goose.

[Translation]

Let's make this clear, Mr. Speaker. On September 1987, the minister said before the House: "This booklet is very clear. There is no proposal to tax food. That is very clear." Those were the minister's words. If what the minister said is true, our conclusion must be that in his bill, hamburgers are not food, hot dogs are not food, soft drinks, dried fruit, ice cream, salads, fried chicken, pizzas, pies and cheese platters are not food, according to his definition, since the goods and services tax will apply to each of these items. Every week, millions of Canadians buy take out meals or eat in cafeterias. However, according to the Minister, what they are eating isn't food. My question is this: If these items are not food, then what are they?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I refer the right hon. Leader of the Opposition to my statement in December 1987 where I said that basic groceries—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): You said food.

Some hon. Members: You said food.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The statement that I made at that time was that basic groceries were not taxed. I said we are going to have to find the basis of drawing the borderline between what is basic groceries and what is restaurant food.

Is the hon. Leader of the Opposition saying that a meal, which is food, at his favourite restaurant, Winston's, is taxable or not taxable? What is his position on that?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): You said you weren't going to tax food.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Again, I am getting no answer from the Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Opposition is totally devoid of ideas on this matter. The New Democratic Party, to its credit, has at least put up some suggestions as to alternatives. I disagree with those alternatives but I have yet to hear one idea—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): That's absolutely pathetic.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says it's pathetic. It's pathetic that the Liberal Party of Canada has not put forward one proposal, one thought, one original idea on the goods and services tax.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it is further to questions asked yesterday in this House about the conduct of Mr. Brian Gallery, vice-chairman of CN.

I have in my hand a copy of a letter dated July 5, 1989 from Mr. Brian Gallery, Acting Chairman of CN, to Brant Ducey, vice-president of public affairs and advertising, CN, in which Mr. Gallery, in the words of an editorial in today's Montreal Gazette:

> —threatened that if CN did not continue placing the ads in his (Gallery's) magazines, he would intervene to block two lucrative contracts that CN was seeking at the time.

Does the Prime Minister not agree that Mr. Gallery, Acting Chairman of CN on July 5, 1989, appointed by the Prime Minister and his cabinet, and President of the Progressive Conservative 500 Club fund raising organization, acted improperly in putting his private interest ahead of his public responsibility as Acting Chairman of CN?

Will the Prime Minister announce today the resignation of Mr. Gallery as vice-chairman of CN and will he assure this House that a complete and thorough investigation into Mr. Gallery's activities at CN will be conducted by an independent organization and made public?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question yesterday. The reference was to allegations reported in one of yesterday's papers. The hon. member says he has a letter. They always have letters, and obviously, a decision is not going to be based on those papers. I said yesterday—–I asked the Chairman of the Board of Directors of Canadian National to send me information concerning to the question raised by the hon. member, and until such time as I have received that information, Mr. Speaker, I have no further comments to make.

• (1430)

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the minister that the quotations in The Globe and Mail yesterday and in The Gazette today are absolutely correct. I have the letter in my hand. I will send a copy to the minister. It bears Mr. Gallery's signature.

Now let's not play games. Mr. Gallery is no stranger to the government opposite. He was appointed by the Prime Minister as acting chairman and appointed by the Prime Minister as the lead fund raiser of the Progressive Conservative Party. He is not a stranger to the government opposite.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, not the Minister of Transport: will he take his responsibility and seek the resignation of Mr. Gallery?

Further, will he give this House an assurance that at no time was CN's private dining car used by Mr. Gallery in his efforts as chief fund raiser for the Tory 500—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I doubt very much whether that suggestion has surfaced in any of the letters.

The hon. minister has the floor.

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, once again, these are accusations and allegations, no matter how they are qualified, and any information on Mr. Gallery. That I receive from the Chairman of the Board of Directors of CN, Mr. Brian Smith, will be considered. But until such time as I receive that information, any assessment will be based on information produced by the Chairman of the board.

FISHERIES

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The real tragedy of the east coast fishery is that the crisis was foreseen. The government knew that the resource was being depleted. The government knew that new resource management measures were needed. The government knew that foreign fisheries were taking far too many fish. Yet this government did not listen. Now we see the enormous human and economic costs to the Atlantic region.

If the long-term survival of the east coast fishery demands further cuts, as it may, to the cod quota, is this government prepared to do that? At the same time, will the government put programs in place to ensure that Atlantic Canadians can survive yet another crisis?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, there is not a member in this House who cannot feel compassion and concern for the families and communities of Atlantic Canada affected by unforeseen developments in regard to northern cod stocks off the coast of Newfoundland.

It is not correct for the Leader of the NDP to suggest that these matters could have been foreseen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Siddon: In fact, the projections of abundance on which the quotas were established were made many years ago using inadequate scientific processes in full consultation with all sectors of the industry, provincial governments, under the leadership of a Liberal government of the day and the guidance of Senator Michael Kirby in his capacity as task force commissioner.

Whatever decisions are required in the interest of preserving the resource and ensuring a long-term stable fishery in Atlantic Canada, this government is prepared to take those decisions, to show the human compassion and to provide the appropriate programs and assistance to those communities which are absolutely necessary and to which this government is fully committed.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the residents of Atlantic Canada know that the reports on the fisheries that have taken place year after year are much more concrete than this government's promises about what it is going to do in Atlantic Canada.

Increasingly Canadians on the west coast involved in the fishing industry are wondering if the same kind of neglect we have seen on the east coast is going to take place on the west coast. There are 10,000 British Columbian jobs that depend on fish processing.

Will the minister indicate how the federal government intends to protect those jobs and ensure that the salmon and herring fishery is protected? Can the minister explain to this House how he can exercise effective resource management when his department does not even know now how many fish are being caught and sold directly to the United States?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, with all due regard for the sincerity of the Leader of the NDP in posing the question, the government and the department of fisheries know very accurately how many fish are being caught and processed in British Columbia and in Atlantic Canada.

What is not always known with great certainty is how many fish remain in the water, because over the years there have been improvements and changes to scientific methodology which give us, as a result, the most abundant salmon and herring fisheries that have ever been seen on the Pacific coast in this century.

It is a fact that more fish were imported raw from the United States in 1989 than were exported to the United States. It is a fact that there are more processing jobs in the British Columbia fishery today than there were in 1984.

The hon. member should do her homework because, if she did, she would find those facts to be the absolute truth.

AGRICULTURE

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Deputy Prime Minister is obviously aware that President Bush has just announced an increase to the American export enhancement program and that this increase in subsidies on American grain exports will give Americans a further advance in pursuing traditional Canadian grain markets.

What is the government prepared to do to respond to this new threat? Will he announce concrete and specific measures to help Canadian farmers keep Canadian grain export markets?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the proposal is for the 1991 fiscal year and it is a proposal by the President to Congress asking for $900 million in the export enhancement program.

I would like to draw to her attention that in the year 1990 the President asked for $1 billion and Congress granted $566 million. That is really what we are dealing with today.

What this brings to light in a very dramatic fashion is the need and the urgency for making progress at the MTN negotiations. Quite frankly, it is Canada that has been at the forefront, along with other exporting grain countries like Australia, in dealing with this issue.

I might remind the hon. member that what we are seeing here is a signal by the United States that it is not going to continue to tolerate the trade distorting practices of the European Community which, by the way, has become the second largest exporter in the world. It has displaced Canada as the second largest exporter of grain in the world.

It is the Europeans who are really the culprits in this issue. What we are seeing is the response by the Americans. What we have to do is bring about a gradual reduction of the trade distorting subsidies so that we can have once again a level playing field.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who is the administrator of our conflict of interest rules for the government.

Order in Council appointee Brian Gallery has sent a letter in reference to his publications from which I would like to quote. I quote from page 2 that refers to actions "which would be a serious blow to the financial success of Gallery Publications." That is in reference to a contract that that company had with CN.

Given that Section 116 of the Financial Administration Act states that an officer of a Crown corporation who has an interest in a contract with that Crown corporation must make a disclosure in writing to the corporation, is the Prime Minister now ready to table that document, the document concerning his appointee, Mr. Brian Gallery? Or, will he not admit to the House that five minutes ago the corporate secretary of CN was unable to ascertain that such a document had ever been filed?

• (1440)

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is referring to the same sources as his colleague from Newfoundland, and I will repeat what I told his colleague.

Mr. Boudria: No!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, he is arguing on the basis of documents, and so forth. Once again, elementary decency demands that the minister responsible to the government for a corporation should ask that corporation to provide, through the chairman of the board, any information on a question of this kind. That is what I have asked the chairman of the board of directors to do. And once again, until such time as I have received this information, I have no further response to give to the House.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, let the record show that Mr. Don McKinnon, the corporate secretary, was unable to find that information as of five or ten minutes ago.

I want to ask the Prime Minister the following question. This time it is about the conflict of interest code which he himself tabled in the House on September 9, 1985. The code states very clearly under Section 7:

> (d) on appointment to office, and thereafter, public office holders shall arrange their private affairs in a manner that will prevent real, potential or apparent conflict of interest—

The code also states that they:

> —shall not solicit or accept transfers of economic benefit—

Does the Prime Minister feel that Section 7 of the code has been observed by Mr. Brian Gallery. Is he prepared to say that here and now?

Mr. Benjamin: One Brian deserves another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what is so funny?

Mr. Boudria: Nothing.

Mr. Mulroney: I have been asked a simple question. I agree with my hon. friend, but the NDP seems to think it is a jocular matter. It is not.

I have been asked a question. My hon. friend is seeking information. Surely, he would not want me to express a value judgment of any kind in the absence of all relevant facts.

The Minister of Transport has explained that the chairman of the board of the CNR, Mr. Brian Smith, is in the process of ascertaining all relevant data that will be—

Mr. Boudria: Under the code the responsibility is with you.

Mr. Speaker: A question has been asked. The right hon. Prime Minister is attempting to answer it. I would ask for the co-operation of members.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, when that data has been assembled by the appropriate officer of the Crown corporation, as indicated yesterday a report will be made to the Minister of Transport. It is very clear.

Mr. Boudria: You are responsible for the code.

Mr. Mulroney: It is very clear that irrespective of what those facts might be the Liberals are not seeking justice. They want a lynching. They are not going to get it in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want the Prime Minister to take this matter seriously.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): This is a letter. The Minister of Transport has now had over 24 hours to investigate it, and he has not given us an answer.

This letter is dated July 7, 1989 from Brian Gallery who was then the acting vice-chairman of Canadian National Railway, to Grant Ducey, who is vice-president of public affairs and advertising. He complains that Seaports, Mr. Gallery's magazine, has lost a contract from Canadian National.

Here are some of the words he uses to Mr. Ducey who is an employee of the company:

> As you are aware, CN is actively asking to recapture Cast's business. Klaus Glusing, the President, is a personal friend of mine and of "Seaports" and has been one of our strongest supporters for many years.
> CN is also seeking to obtain the Maersk business. Barry Olsen, the President, is a long-time friend of mine and supporter of "Seaports" as well.

Does the Prime Minister agree with these implied threats directed by a senior member of the board of CN, appointed by the Prime Minister, to an employee of the railway suggesting that he had better restore that advertising or else?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated yesterday that the chairman of the board of the CNR is in the process of assembling all the relevant data in an objective and, I suppose, on a very fair-minded basis.

Surely nothing untoward will happen between now and the time that Mr. Smith reports.

This is not a matter of life or death. We can wait for the appropriate time for Mr. Smith to assemble the information.

Concerning whatever is in the letter which I have not read, surely my right hon. friend would not want to judge Mr. Gallery or anyone else in a peremptory and unfair manner. The request has gone to the chairman of the board of the CNR. He will assemble the data. He will make a value judgment and make a report to the minister of the Crown.

Surely that is in keeping with the traditions of this House.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am doing nothing but reading from Mr. Gallery's letter. Mr. Gallery was an Order in Council appointee at the direction, presumably, of the Prime Minister. Mr. Gallery is also involved in political activities for the Conservative Party. That is fine.

I am saying to the Prime Minister that he is responsible for conflict of interest guidelines. He has said on several occasions in this House that he takes personal responsibility for them. He does not need much investigation here. We have already given the government 24 hours notice on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, surely the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada is not suggesting that appointment by Order in Council of someone associated with the Liberal Party in the future ought to be precluded from public service.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): No, I am not saying that.

Mr. Mulroney: If the right hon. gentleman is not saying that, then he should not by implication impugn the integrity of Mr. Gallery without a verdict having been arrived at.

There is nothing unreasonable that has taken place in the procedure. It is an appropriate procedure. The minister, upon being apprised of this, asked the chairman of the board to get the necessary facts and to make a recommendation to the minister.

We too are subject to the conflict of interest guidelines that apply to public servants and to the various Crown corporations. I am not suggesting that anyone is immune from them in the least. Indeed the new legislation before the House will apply to all members of the Opposition as well. I look forward to its implementation.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture who has just told my Leader that what the country's farmers need is an international agreement.

That was the same message that was told to farmers several years ago prior to the signing of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement in which Article 701 was supposed to make certain that the U.S. did not subsidize sales into our markets. We made a similar commitment as well. Yet since that signing the U.S. has increased its export enhancement program payments into our markets from below $7 a tonne to past $20 a tonne.

Could the minister explain to us what he thinks signing yet another piece of paper is going to do to correct the U.S. actions?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, with respect, the hon. member is wrong, because the export enhancement program has been reduced from $770 million in 1989 to $566 million in 1990.

What we have today is a proposal from the administration to increase it to $900 million in fiscal year 1991. I think it clearly demonstrates a signal that is sent to the European Community that if in fact there is not an agreement made to reduce in a very substantive way trade distorting subsidies as it applies to agriculture, the trade war will indeed escalate. This is not aimed at Canada. This is aimed at the European Community.

Lest there be any doubts about the ability of this government and the record of this government in responding to these kinds of situations, I would like to remind the hon. member once again, as well as the Leader of the New Democratic Party, that this government over the past five years has provided some $21.7 billion in direct and indirect assistance to the farmers of Canada. That is a record that has never been exceeded by any government in the history of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1450)

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, this government has reduced the powers of the Wheat Board, done away with the two-price wheat system, done away with interest-free cash advances, made the Western Grain Stabilization Program inoperative and reduced crop insurance dollars, all in the past year.

What weapons are they giving farmers to stay alive in this trade war? What are they doing to keep Canadian farmers alive?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will tell them what kind of weapons we are giving. We have before a legislative committee right now improvements to the crop insurance program that will see an aggregate increase in support by the federal government for the crop insurance program.

I might remind the hon. member that in this same budget, to which they have attracted a fancy in the United States, the United States has proposed to withdraw its support in subsidizing the crop insurance program in that country.

It also provides for a $1.5 billion reduction in price and income support for agricultural products. We have not done anything of that sort of magnitude.

As a matter of fact, the last fiscal year, 1988-89, saw some $4.8 billion poured into agriculture right across the country by this government. That clearly demonstrates our commitment to the farmers of Canada.

HOUSING

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Housing.

Yesterday, two Montreal city councillors presented a petition to the Minister of State for Housing, asking him to reactivate the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program (RRAP) for rented accommodation.

Since this program was used largely by Quebec, it seems to have been unfairly affected when this program was abolished.

Would the minister be kind enough to say how he intends to deal with this unfortunate situation?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the Province of Quebec, especially Montreal, is most affected by the abolition of RRAP for rented accommodation. We have set up a tripartite committee composed of representatives of the federal government, the Quebec government and the cities of Montreal, Verdun and Quebec to find a solution to this difficult problem.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Last month he met with the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Yeutter, in Washington and announced that the United States government would be ratcheting down the export enhancement program which has been so harmful to our Canadian farmers and to the world price of wheat.

Could the minister explain just what happened with that ratcheting down? In fact the budget brought forward this month was to increase the budget of the export enhancement program to $900 million from about $566 million last year, of which only $334 million was spent.

What happened? Did Secretary Yeutter mislead the minister, or was the minister misleading Canadian farmers when he told them in December that the U.S. export enhancement program would be ratcheted down in this coming fiscal year in the United States?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in this fiscal year, 1990, the export enhancement program has been ratcheted down from $770 million to $566 million. That is this year, 1990. What the hon. member is referring to is fiscal 1991. That is next year. That has to be ratified by Congress.

If we get agreement in a comprehensive way on agricultural issues during the MTN negotiating process, Mr. Yeutter has made it very clear that that will be withdrawn.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the 1990 budget has been known for quite a while. Clearly the minister or the Secretary of Agriculture was misleading Canadian farmers back in December.

A month ago the United States provided some $20 per tonne for 500,000 tonnes of wheat to Russia. In March, the government is supporting exports of another 500,000 tonnes of wheat to Russia at almost $19 a tonne.

With this kind of subsidy provided to American grain producers, how does the minister expect Canadian wheat producers to survive fighting against the United States Treasury, which is in violation of Article 701.4 of the free trade deal?

How does the minister expect our farmers to survive with this kind of competition, this kind of unfair subsidization?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we certainly are not supportive of the ongoing massive subsidization by the European Community and by the United States. The price war has affected Canada very directly. This government has responded in assistance to keep our farmers whole during that period of time.

With the drought situation and the progress made at the MTN, we had expected that there would be some relaxation of the subsidies being provided. Unfortunately that is not the case.

We will continue to work very hard at trying to resolve this through the ongoing multilateral negotiations. We are certainly making representations to the European Community and to the United States of America to slow down the pace and to stop the escalation of the price war because it is hurting the total world market.

We will continue to work at the MTN, showing leadership within the Cairns and on a bilateral basis to bring about stability and order to the market-place.

Once again, I repeat, at one time in 1977-1978 the European Community was a major importer of grains and oilseeds. Today, it has become the second largest exporter of grains and oilseeds. It has achieved that market through huge subsidies. The United States has been responding in kind.

If there is not progress during the MTN negotiations, I suspect we can only look forward to an escalation of that price war. That would be disastrous.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

For the purpose of calculating the goods and services tax, universities and colleges will be treated as one sector and a Canadian average will be calculated. These universities and colleges will be dependent on how each compares to the Canadian average and possibly might not receive full compensation for any tax changes.

How can the Minister of Finance justify placing an additional financial burden on educational centres already strapped with limited cash resources?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that we have established an important and a generous principle. We have said that this sector, in aggregate, will not pay any additional tax over what it is now paying through the federal sales tax, the existing manufacturers' sales tax. That is something that we are discussing.

The means of implementing it is currently being discussed with the provinces to see whether there are ways we can simplify it or ways that we can utilize some of the existing relationships among provinces, universities and colleges.

I believe the approach we are taking is a realistic one. It is one designed to reduce complexities.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, every academic administrator right across this country has indicated that the Minister of Finance is wrong.

The response to me would also indicate that the government is not seriously committed to the education of our youth.

Would the minister not agree that to restrict or to hold back GST rebates to our educational institutions will ultimately transfer their cash flow problems on to the backs of the students of this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think hon. member listened to the answer I gave. She wrote that question before I gave the answer.

• (1500)

However, the point I want to make to her is that we are very much committed by the principle that we have established of not adding to the sales tax burden of this particular sector, so that what she is saying right now is incorrect. We are not doing this in a way that will transfer the burden to the students, because the burden will not be increased.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister who has in the past taken an interest in the topic of my question.

On the eve of a very critical session of the South African Parliament, South Africa is once again in turmoil because of a visit of British cricketers. Renewed demonstrations have taken place and the demonstrators have been confronted with violent and brutal activity on the part of the police because of concern about the potential release of Nelson Mandela.

My questions to the Prime Minister are the following. What representations has the Canadian government made with respect to these developments? What action does the government propose to take if there is a failure on the part of President de Klerk to announce specific action, such as the release of Nelson Mandela, and establish the conditions for appropriate negotiations to progress in the ending of apartheid?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the Commonwealth Declaration put forth in October of 1985 was the basis on which the Commonwealth and other nations took actions against apartheid, involving as well a call for the release of Nelson Mandela. That appears now, after some period of time, to be imminent.

Events of the last number of days have been very troubling because they indicate that President de Klerk might have another agenda in mind. The government of Canada has communicated not only directly with the government of South Africa, but with appropriate leaders of the members of the ANC, both in South Africa and outside, including leaders of frontline states, in respect of developments. We have received communications in response and I will be happy to keep my hon. friend apprised as developments unfold.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, is the government prepared to indicate a specific deadline beyond which the Canadian government would impose additional sanctions? For example, would the government be prepared to respond to complaints from the Black United Front of Nova Scotia that the importation of T-shirts from South Africa constitutes an insult to the black community and impose, at least, a ban on the further importation of those T-shirts and other manufactured clothing goods from South Africa?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has taken just about every conceivable sanction possible in respect of South Africa, but as the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated in Langkawi, reflected in the Commonwealth Langkawi Declaration we are, of course, ready to do more.

As my hon. friend will remember, I indicated to the United Nations that we were ready to impose comprehensive sanctions and to break off relations completely. We were persuaded by leaders of friendly nations in Southern Africa that the events had been brought to such a head in the spring, that worth-while developments were anticipated in the autumn and indeed that has, in large measure, come to pass. We are monitoring it extremely carefully.

While in Kuala Lumpur, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I met with the heads of governments of the frontline states together with some leaders of the ANC who visited with us. They are extremely supportive of the action that Canada has taken now over some four or five years, appreciative of the leadership that Canada and the Parliament of Canada has manifested, and encouraged as well by our indication that should there be a relapse in the progress taking place that the Parliament of Canada and the government of Canada stand ready to take further action to bring about justice and the abolition of apartheid in South Africa.

Mr. Speaker: A final single question from the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

AIR-INDIA

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I will direct my question to the Prime Minister.

The Air-India bombing took place over four and a half years ago and hundreds of Canadians were victims and suffered losses as a result of that crime. To date, there has been no public resolution of that crime and a delay of this magnitude constitutes a real affront to the Canadian victims of that crime.

The Solicitor General has to take responsibility for law enforcement delivery mechanisms in this country, and five years is too long. I want to know, and the families of the victims want to know, when will the investigation be completed and when will we have a public commission of inquiry into this matter?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Solicitor General, I am sure the House is aware that the government takes this to be a very serious matter. That investigation is ongoing, and as soon as we have results which can be made public, they will be made public.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

REPORT ON CONVICTION OF DONALD MARSHALL

Mr. Speaker: I must bring to the attention of the House that on another occasion I received an application from the hon. member for York Centre under Standing Order 52 asking that I adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter related to the report of the royal commission on the Donald Marshall case. The hon. member has given his statement to the House. I have given it, of course, serious consideration. It is a serious matter but I think it can be dealt with, at least at the moment, in another way and it would not be appropriate to proceed at this time. I thank the hon. member.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion carried. Orders of the day.

On a point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I was inadvertently delayed, but for the record I want to indicate that had I been here for the vote I certainly would have voted against the government, against anything to do with the imposition of the goods and services tax.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I just wish to note that I was unable to make it into the Chamber for the vote. However, had I been able, absolutely I would have voted against any co-operation with this government and its misguided goods and services tax.

Mr. Peterson: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I was in the House, I did fulfil my parliamentary responsibility to be here, and I did vote against these measures on the GST.

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, regrettably I was unable to be in the House at the time of the previous vote because we were busily engaged in deliberations on how we can continue the fight on the GST.

Mr. McDermid: You were out standing in the lobby, you phoney.

Mr. McCurdy: Had I been in the chamber, I would most unambiguously voted with my colleagues against the motion.

Mr Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I was inadvertently delayed in planning a strategy to try and derail this government's GST tax. Unfortunately, I could not be here. But if I had been here I would have voted against this attempt to hijack Parliament which is what the Conservative government is doing.

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I was delayed from registering my vote, but I think that our position in this party is unambiguous in opposition to the goods and services tax and I wish to register that my vote would have been against the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I thank the hon. member for making her point but I do not think we should get into debate right now.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I was unable to attend at the vote, but had I been able to attend I would have voted solidly against this government and its GST policy.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. Riis: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I have recognized the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca on a point of order. Is that not why you rose? The other member is now relinquishing being recognized. I will now recognize the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I want to move:

That the hon. member for Kootenay East be now heard.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Unfortunately the motion moved by the hon. member for Kamloops is not receivable.

The member can move a point of order that another member be heard but only while we are in debate. We are not at this time. I refer the hon. member to a decision made by the Speaker on November 7, 1986 when such a motion was refused, as I will have to refuse it right now.

Mr. Hicks: Madam Speaker, at this time of great co-operation in the House, I wonder if I could seek the unanimous consent of the House to table the eleventh report of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Obviously there is not unanimous consent for the hon. member to present his report.

Mr. Flis: Madam Speaker, notwithstanding the obstructive tactics of the government and the NDP, I seek unanimous consent to table petitions on the GST.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I think the hon. member knows that he can file this petition with the clerks at this time.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, I am sorry that I was late but I welcome this opportunity to inform this House and all Canadians who are interested in this issue that I would have voted against this move by the government to rob the people of Canada of their hard-earned earnings. I say this is an opportunity—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member has made his point.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, I was advised yesterday that there would be an in camera meeting of the steering committee with regard to the RRSP program. I was delayed for the vote and I want to express my desire that had I been here I would have voted against this legislation in the very strongest terms.

If I may, Madam Speaker, I would like to bring up a question of privilege at this time. Yesterday, I got up in this House on a point of order. I was not recognized while all other members were being recognized. Finally the Speaker ruled that that would be all that would be debated on that issue. I feel that I have been neglected and have not been given my opportunity to speak. I would like to know why I am not being recognized in this House.

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is a very important one. I received back from the legal clerk of the House my private members' bill which I entered to be on the Order Paper and I wanted to enter it today in the House so it could be in the draw which takes place tomorrow.

This government has been using the tactic of moving to Orders of the Day, which does not permit a member to introduce his bill into the House so it can be eligible for the draw. I have two very important bills. One deals with bank service charges, which is extremely important to consumers of Canada, and the other one deals with class actions. If there is ever protection that consumers need, it is certainly through a class action process. Surely, it is part of the privileges of members of Parliament to enter their bills so that they can participate in the democratic process.

• (1600)

What has happened is that this government—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. I would like to remind the hon. member that it was the unanimous consent of the House yesterday to postpone drawings of private members' bills. Henceforth, I would imagine that the hon. member will have another opportunity to present his bill. Orders of the Day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, January 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 7569).

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I would like to—

Mr. Karpoff: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I want to inform the House that I was delayed in coming in for the vote. I want to inform the House that I certainly would have been expressing my opposition to the motion proposed by the Tory government. It is too bad that so many Tories not here to hear how strongly Canada opposes this—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate with the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, I would like to continue the debate that I was involved in rather extensively yesterday.

Mr. Harvey: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I was most taken with the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay East a little while ago. I would like, therefore, to move that the member for Kootenay East be now heard.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In order for this motion to be acceptable, the member for Kootenay East would have had to be rising and seeking the floor, which he was not. As well, it would have had to be moved before the hon. member for Ontario had started to speak, and the hon. member already had the floor. The floor belongs to the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Soetens: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is a pleasure for me to return to this debate. I was involved in it extensively yesterday. I know that at the end of the sitting yesterday, members of the NDP rose to challenge some of the comments I was making. I guess they did not like to hear all the positive things about the GST. I note today that there was an extensive effort to delay my presentation somewhat, but I am pleased to carry on with it at this point.

Yesterday I spent a considerable amount of time talking about the need for the elimination of the existing federal sales tax. I quoted some very interesting presentations made by witnesses who appeared in front of the finance committee. Some of those people who, of course, are not supporters of the party that I represent, made some excellent presentations as to why the manufacturers' sales tax should be eliminated.

I realize that caused some concern, but the problem I think is the concern existing within one of the parties that the people who supported the elimination of the federal sales tax are their supporters. I note in the finance committee report that did come forward, even the NDP did not want to eliminate totally the manufacturers' sales tax, a tax that has been very detrimental to many of their clientele.

What I would like to do, Madam Speaker, for your information, is carry on with some of the things that did happen during the hearings on the goods and services tax and some of the questions that were asked, so that maybe we can clarify a little further for Canadians just what will happen when the GST is implemented.

The member for Yorkton—Melville repeatedly during the hearings asked questions of witnesses as to what would happen when the manufacturers' sales tax was eliminated. Would those companies in fact reduce their prices?

I would like to quote a very direct question that the member asked of Mr. Snyder, the Canadian Appliance Manufacturers Association representative. The member for Yorkton—Melville asked:

> Is there a possibility you may keep some of the existing FST?

The answer was:

> I would doubt it. I think if you look at the history of the appliance business over the past 20 years, our prices in real terms have declined 65 per cent. I think we offer one of the best consumer values around today. So I would say that those competitive pressures will continue. I do not see any change as a result of the tax.

You do not hear it expressed too often by members of the opposition that in fact there will be some savings passed on to consumers.

When he was pressed a little further to comment on that by the same member, he came back with a further comment. He said:

> I believe in our industry the competitive nature is such that if there is a cost reduction as a result of the GST it will end up in the consumer's hands. It is as simple as that.

I realize that it is not popular for those who oppose this implementation of the GST to talk about those areas where in fact consumers will benefit, but there are many of them.

On another occasion when we had a witness in front of the finance committee, the same member asked of the representative of the Canadian Federation of Farm Equipment Dealers just what would happen. Mr. Hills who was speaking on behalf of the dealers association replied with this comment:

> In a piece of equipment with a 13.5 per cent current federal sales tax rolled in, when that 13.5 is removed, our customer will see a direct benefit by the reduction. If that effects a $10 reduction, we will probably reduce our price by $11—it is that competitive.

I realize again that is not something that the people in opposition to the tax want to talk about, where in fact there will be savings.

Not only did that group comment that there would be savings in their industry but they also commented in conjunction with the Canadian Farm and Industrial Equipment Institute on the whole concept of the goods and services tax. Mr. Frank Pickersgill, director, on October 23 in front of the finance committee, said:

> We do not like the existing tax system. As manufacturers, we find it difficult and we do not like it. Conceptually, a value-added tax like the GST to a manufacturer has some attraction.

The same thing was said by the vice-chairman of the Canadian Appliance Manufacturers Association. I quote his comments made on October 23:

> The Canadian appliance industry believes that the proposed GST is a positive move towards the establishment of a fairer and more equitable taxation. It is a vast improvement on the current FST, a tax we have opposed.

Of course, it is a tax that both opposition parties in this House would just like to hire a bunch of bureaucrats to do a study on, but we have made some very clear decisions. There are businesses and industries out there that are very supportive of it.

Yesterday we had an interjection during my presentation from a member from northern Ontario who has a considerable representation of people active in the primary industry, particularly the mining industry. I thought he would go back to his riding and discuss with people in the mining industry exactly what they think. Here is what they said in front of the finance committee.

This is the Mining Association of Canada, and Mr. George Miller, its president, appeared on October 16. I would like to quote what he said:

> Our brief mentions that the industry supports the replacement of the present manufacturers' sales tax by the goods and services tax. We have a number of reasons for that which are covered in the brief, but basically they boil down to the fact that we think it is good tax policy. It eliminates a tax which has many faults—The big benefit from the replacement of the present tax is that it will help to make Canadian exporters more competitive and will help us to survive in the bad times—

I would have thought that members who have a lot of mining constituents in their riding would be interested in making sure that jobs were secure. That is what we are doing with the goods and services tax. We are securing jobs for Canadians throughout Canada.

I should point out that I do not have an appliance manufacturer in my riding. I do not have any mines in my riding, nor do I have any agricultural implement manufacturers in my riding. What I am talking about are benefits that are being spread across Canada and that is really what this GST legislation will do. It will help Canada extensively.

We do have some advanced technology groups that will also benefit. I would just like to mention exactly what these people said on October 16 in front of the Standing Committee on Finance hearings. Mr. Roy Woodbridge, president of the association, appeared and made the following statement:

> With respect to the goods and services tax, we are philosophically attracted to the concept. It is certainly an improvement over the existing federal sales tax system. It eliminates biases in imports that have harmed Canadian advance technology industries in the past, particularly in the computer field—I think, Mr. Chairman, if I could I would like to respond to that because we have been tracking this goods and services tax since the early days when tax reform was first tabled as a concept. We have run workshops, seminars, we have had individual company visits, we have had questionnaires out to our membership and I can tell you pretty categorically that if you have got a roomful of our members and ask them how many regard—take the good and bad altogether—how many are in favour of this? You would have about 98 per cent of them raising their hands being in favour.

• (1610)

We do not hear that from those in opposition. We do not hear them saying that there are industries throughout Canada that are very positive and supportive of what we are doing. It is industry that creates jobs. That is what we are talking about.

There is another group, the Canadian Farm and Industrial Equipment Institute, and its comment is:

> While we are philosophically opposed to increases in taxation, as an institute we recognize that a consumption tax is preferable to the existing federal sales tax.

The list goes on rather extensively of people who have come out publicly in support of this legislation. I find it disturbing that in all of the rhetoric that is used by the opposition, they do not seem to mention that their constituents, the people who employ their constituents, are so tremendously in favour of the goods and services tax.

I have an article that was published in The Windsor Star this past week. Windsor is not known for the number of Tory members that it has sitting in the House of Commons today. I thought this would be a rather interesting article. It is dated January 23 and is rather extensive, dealing with a number of issues. I quote from that article the paragraph dealing with the GST:

> On the GST, I find it difficult to understand not only Henderson but CWA leaders like Gary Parent and others fighting the removal of the 13.5 per cent federal sales tax. Why should the workers of our manufacturing industry carry the burden of this tax on their shoulders? Why not lower the tax to seven per cent and let those who make a living off the people who work in manufacturing industries share the burden. Windsor is a manufacturing town and lower prices on manufactured goods will benefit everyone in Windsor—yes, even the restaurants.

I do not represent Windsor. My riding is not anywhere near Windsor, but I can tell you that the same attitude prevails in my riding and I would hazard to say that on the recent occasion when I visited the riding of Oshawa, there were many people saying the same thing: why should the manufacturing sector of Oshawa carry the burden for the rest of Canada? There is absolutely no reason why it should.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce, in its submission to the finance committee came out with the statement:

> We do not favour the maintenance of the current manufacturers' sales tax. Its serious flaws have been well documented and need not be repeated here; and we do support the concept of a value added tax as a vehicle that could serve as a best replacement mechanism.

The reason I mention that is because the Chamber of Commerce, along with other business groups, has really been in favour of the concept of a value-added tax like the goods and services tax. Some of them have been saying, however, broaden the base and get rid of some of the exemptions. I know that there are members in this House who have some sympathy for that. Fortunately, the government in its wisdom has decided that food, basic groceries in grocery stores, should not be taxed.

I support that theory but there are members in this House who do not support that theory. I would like to quote what one of them had to say on May 11, 1989. It is recorded in Hansard and speaking is the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, not a Conservative, I should point out. I quote:

> I urge the government to correct the discrepancies by providing a larger tax credit for the poorest people in the community.

He goes on to talk about the reasons for it:

> It is easy to identify them, to know how much income they are getting and how much they are spending. It would be much easier to determine the size of the credit they should receive. Exemptions would only make the process much more difficult.

He also said that exemptions will not make it more fair, exemptions will make the tax much more difficult to administer, exemptions will be of greater benefit to those who have more money than to those who have less money.

This is a presentation by an NDP member of this House. Here we have the Chamber of Commerce and the NDP saying there should not be any exemptions and yet the Conservatives showing at least that they have some heart and that they do care for low and moderate-income Canadians, first by not taxing the basic food commodities that they need and second, by providing them with a very enriched tax credit to make sure that they are in fact able to overcome the added cost of the tax in some of those areas where they are affected.

The distribution of the tax, of course, goes to Canadians in need. I have seen some reports dealing extensively with just who does get the benefit of the federal sales tax credits. In fact, 64 per cent of Canadian families will receive the benefit of a sales tax credit commencing in 1991. If they file their returns this year, they will receive their first cheque in December 1990.

It is significant that 64 per cent get the credit. It is even more significant that in those parts of Canada where the assistance is most needed, families will get a sales tax credit. For example, in those parts of Canada where some of the opposition members seems so intent on stirring the opposition they do not mention to the people of Newfoundland that 85 per cent of Newfoundland families will be getting a sales tax credit. They do not mention in Prince Edward Island that 78 per cent of Prince Edward Island families will be getting the sales tax credit. I have not heard them mention in Nova Scotia that 74 per cent will receive the sales tax credit.

As you can see, I could go on with a whole series of issues. At this point, my time is really wrapping up. Very clearly, this is excellent legislation and I think it is time the opposition started telling everyone the facts, rather than what they are saying.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to advise the House that tomorrow will be an allotted day.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Mr. McCurdy: Madam Speaker, I was up in my office when the member for Ontario had the unmitigated nerve to mention Windsor in the same breath as the GST, citing in support of his argument The Windsor Star, which criticized the president of the local labour council, Gary Parent, and Gord Henderson, one of the most popular columnists in The Windsor Star, on the basis that that would support the notion that people in Windsor somehow had gone completely crazy and have now switched sides and are supporting the GST.

I have in my office between 8,000 and 9,000 protests against the GST that were gathered within the city within a matter of 10 days in response to an ad in the newspaper placed by a group of people who in other jurisidictions would be stupid enough to be Conservatives. There is a good reason for this.

In the city of Windsor, all one has to do is go up and down Ouellette Avenue, a reminder of the historic French connection of the city of Windsor, and one will see a great many restaurants and stores which are closed because they no longer have the significant American clientele that they previously had, primarily because of the increase in the value of the dollar. But every one of them anticipate that with the introduction of the GST, there will be a further erosion of the attractiveness of Windsor as a place where Americans will shop and entertain themselves.

If one stands at the entrance of the Detroit—Windsor tunnel or if one stands at the entrance to the Ambassador Bridge on the weekend, one will see thousands of Canadians going across the river to make their purchases. Because our dollar is so high in its value in equivalence to the American dollar people can save a great deal of money going across the river. Many Canadians are losing business. Now they have to anticipate the GST.

I would tell the member for Ontario that in Windsor 80 per cent of the population is against this tax because they understand this tax. I myself am involved in a coalition with labour and most of the significant business leaders in Windsor in opposition to this Conservative inequity. To have the member for Ontario stand up in this House and suggest on the basis of an editorial from The Windsor Star that somehow we have seen the light that would have us enter into hell and support this GST is to abuse this House and abuse the truth in a fashion that is beyond toleration.

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, it really is a pleasure to see that there are some members in Windsor who understand that manufacturing is important to them. Unfortunately, it is not the members who have been elected to serve in this House because I have just listened to that rhetoric.

My riding is right beside Oshawa, and Oshawa has a very heavy automotive presence much like Windsor. I can tell you that in my constituency, they understand the benefit that the manufacturers will gain out of the elimination of the federal sales tax. They understand that the price of automobiles in Canada will come down because of the elimination of the federal sales tax. They understand that when the price of cars comes down in Canada, more jobs are created in Canada.

I find it disturbing that members here in this House do not fully understand that. And because someone in Windsor has seen the light, I guess all I would encourage this member to do is to read the article. It states very clearly:

> On the GST—Why should the workers of our manufacturing industry carry the burden of this tax on their shoulders? Why not lower the tax to seven per cent and let those who make a living off the people who work in manufacturing industries share the burden.

I think it is time that you people from Windsor got with it and let the manufacturing sector in this country do what it is supposed to be doing.

Mr. Althouse: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Ontario would just go over his argument once again please.

It seems to me that he has just told us that the manufacturing sector in Windsor will be a beneficiary of the sales tax. I cannot understand how that will happen unless it raises its prices.

By the time that new car gets out to my particular part of the country—we have had automobile dealers work out the actual figures, if they take the same mark-up for handling and selling that automobile that they are used to—the price to the consumer stays exactly the same if the manufacturer does not increase his price. So if the manufacturer does not raise his price as the car leaves the factory, how is he going to be better off? If the consumer in my part of Canada has to pay at least as much for the car under GST as under the manufacturers' sales tax, why will there be more customers and where will there be more customers? How can they be better off if the price stays the same and the demand stays virtually the same?

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, I would be happy to answer that. In fact, we had lots of witnesses appear in front of the finance committee representing Canadian automobile dealers and they very clearly talked about the reduction in the price of cars. Those dealers do not represent just dealers in Oshawa or in my constituency of Ontario, they represent dealers across Canada. Simply put, the price of a car leaving the plant will have only a 7 per cent tax on it versus 13.5 per cent. In any mathematical system that is a 6.5 per cent improvement.

Of course, that sales tax is an input tax credit so that the dealer does not have to pass it on to his customer. The net result is that that car being sold out of the showroom—I am sorry, but I do not know the member's riding but I think it is in western Canada—will sell for less in western Canada than it does today. When they can sell more cars because the price is lower, they will employ more people in Windsor because they will be producing more cars because the product is cheaper. It is a very simple economic system. Actually first-year university students taking Economics 101 will tell you exactly how it works.

Mr. Fisher: Madam Speaker, what the member from somewhere in Ontario just said highlights precisely the problem that we have with this tax. He says that if you take the manufacturers' sales tax and put it beside the GST, then it all comes out the same. The fact of the matter is if you put the calculator to it, it does not. To simply do the calculation of the GST, it is not a saving. It comes out precisely, as the member for Mackenzie said previously, to be the same.

I would suggest that the member take that lesson to heart and see the perpetrator of this piece of legislation and point out to him that all these good things he is saying about it are not true.

It is shameful that he should stand up and say what he has about it in an attempt to make the public think that there is somehow a saving by going from this 13.5 per cent down to 7 per cent. The fact of the matter is that it is precisely the same thing and there are no savings.

The member talks about implements. It may be an advantage, and I presume if you work it out with a calculator it comes out precisely the same for the tractor as well, but it will result in the western Canadian farmer always having to beg with the federal government.

While it is true that he gets a rebate from the GST it is also true that he has to apply for it. It has certainly become evident over the last while that the government is not exactly swift in returning the moneys which the government owes him. Those farmers are going to have to sit, not for weeks, but for months while the government returns the rebate on the GST after they had to pay for it up front. This is in spite of the fact that they have asked that that not be the case, that they not be charged at the time of purchase.

Mr. Soetens: Madam Speaker, I am glad that my children will not have an opportunity to learn math from the hon. member who just spoke. Let me quote just one final comment that I think is very appropriate because The Toronto Star said it and The Toronto Star invariably must be right on this one issue:

> The new tax will mean a better allocation of resources, greater investment and more competitive exports—.The new goods and services tax should eliminate most inefficiencies caused by these often arbitrary arrangements—

That is referring to the items in the federal sales tax.

Again, I hope the members have learned something. Now they can go back to their ridings and tell their constituents about all the good things in the GST rather than what they are saying.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, in speaking to Bill C-62 I cannot help but recall back when we were travelling with the finance committee in Winnipeg. Perhaps this is a story the finance minister should pay attention to because his sleight-of-hand has been recognized all across Canada for what it is.

When we got on the bus leaving the air force base to go in to hold the hearings in Winnipeg, one of the young officers who was seeing us off the base asked if he could ask the finance committee one question. That one question was this: "Is Mr. Wilson a poker player? Is he giving us 9 per cent and in fact we are going to get 7?"

I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that this has been a plan of this government all along. Threaten to throw the people of Canada to the sharks, but in fact feed them a little bit to the piranhas. One way or the other the people of Canada will be consumed by this dreadful tax that is being proposed by the government.

During our travel across Canada many things became apparent. This goods and service tax was a tax that everybody was against. Nobody who spoke or put a submission in to the finance committee supported the goods and service in the form that it was presented. This included many people, business people, tourism operators, seniors, fishermen, fisherwomen, women, low income earners, the list goes on and on. Nobody likes the goods and services tax. It simply is not a good tax. One thing that became more and more focused as I went across Canada with the finance committee was that the 48 countries which have value-added tax are small, homogeneous countries with very few regional disparities. However, Canada is a large country. Even within each of the provinces there are huge economic disparities.

• (1630)

I would like to talk for a minute about how this tax will affect the territories. In particular we spoke with members of the Conservative Government of the Northwest Territories. They talked about their service sector providing 75 per cent to 80 per cent of the employment. It is the service sector that will be hit hardest by this tax.

They talked about the economic characteristics of the north which indicate a high operating cost for building materials and for labour. This will be shown in a cascading effect in the retail price. Those members said that the GST would have a negative impact on the machinery in the resource industry because it is already now exempt.

I think that is something that has not been taken into consideration by the last member who spoke or many of the other members. The resource industry is exempt, as is the farm industry. This puts in another level.

They also told us that increased profits to the resource sector may be a fact in some way. But they said that the money gained will not remain in the Northwest Territories because all corporations which have mines up there are multinationals with their head offices offshore or out of the country. The money will be channelled elsewhere for other development and not left in the Northwest Territories where it would be of benefit.

They said that in the short run there might be some benefit to the resource sector but that over all it will have a very negative impact on the Northwest Territories. It will hurt the tourism business. It will hurt small business.

They pointed out exactly what I pointed out earlier about the regional inequities. They said that the current manufacturer's sales tax is at least the same across Canada at source from the manufacturer, but the goods and services tax creates an inequity in each of the regions.

They point out that on average the prices are some 44 per cent higher in the Northwest Territories, with some prices going as much as 120 per cent higher. They showed us figures which indicated that in places such as Iqualuit, Baffin Island, those prices were 224 per cent higher. In Pelly Bay in the Arctic Circle those prices were 234 per cent higher.

The people of this country should know that where prices are higher the residents are paying the tax on that higher price. The good that costs $1 in Montreal costs $2.34 in Pelly Bay. One pays 7 per cent tax on $2.34 instead of on $1.

Is that fair? I suggest that it is not. It is totally inequitable. It is hurting those who already have not. It is increasingly ensuring that the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. It is putting the heel on the poor and those who are trying to develop our regions while struggling to make a living. That is one reason that I as a member of the New Democratic Party suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that this goods and services tax will not and cannot work for Canada.

I spoke to three senators from Australia a couple of months ago. They were astounded that Canada would even be looking at a value-added tax system, given the experience that they saw next door in New Zealand and the problems with economic disparities and inequalities within a country the size of Australia. They pointed out, and needed not to say it, that Canada was certainly much larger than Australia.

In the Northwest Territories they also point out that the costs of fuel, electricity and air transportation, which will all be taxed under the goods and services tax, are much higher. The people in the Northwest and Yukon Territories depend upon air transportation to get back and forth between their communities, and now they will be taxed on that. In many cases it is the only method of transportation.

A member of the Chamber of Commerce from Iqualuit appeared before the finance committee in Yellowknife. He had flown in from Iqualuit the day before. It cost him something in the area of $1,500 to fly there and back in order to make his submission. This is a small example of the costs.

If we add 7 per cent to that $1,500, we get an idea of some of the regional disparities we are seeing, not just in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory but within each one of our provinces. In some of the Atlantic provinces such as Newfoundland, which are fairly small in comparison to some of the others, there are major regional disparities. All these people will be hit with that 7 per cent tax.

I would like to turn away from the Northwest Territories for a moment and consider the south of Canada. I happen to live in the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and in the boundary country, most of which borders on the United States border. Osoyoos, Midway, Grand Forks and Christina Lake all have border crossings. There is a border crossing in Costan. These areas are all open to the American economy. There is a lot of back and forth as a result.

The Economic Development Corporation of Osoyoos and Area made a submission before the finance committee on September 15. I would like to quote from this to show the effect not just on the communities in my riding but, I suggest, on all small communities and larger communities across Canada that are anywhere within 200 miles of the U.S. border. The submission states:

> Clearly, then, one of the major concerns EDCOA has regarding the GST is the impact it may have on the purchasing behaviour of consumers in our community. It is this organization's hypothesis that the GST will significantly encourage residents to shop in the United States, therefore, significantly hurting local retail businesses and the economy.
> This organization believes that the likely scenario for the Osoyoos area, and more generally the whole Okanagan Valley for at least all of 1991, is a significant and damaging increase in the volume of consumers shopping in the U.S.

The Economic Development Corporation goes on to point out that it believes that in Osoyoos the tourism industry will suffer because of the perception created by the goods and services tax of Canada being too expensive to visit. Even with a rebate plan the tourist will tend to eliminate the destination before even finding out about the rebate provision. Further, the inconvenience of bookkeeping while on vacation may dissuade the tourist from seeking the rebate and engender a negative image of our country. This may decrease the possibility of a return visit and of the tourist communicating positive feelings of our country to others in his home community.

In closing they say that the Economic Development Corporation of Osoyoos and area can report to the standing committee that there is a growing dissatisfaction with the implications of this proposed tax in the Osoyoos area.

The Economic Development Corporation in that small community is working hard to try to get some industry going and some things happening within that community. They look at a future with problems as a result of both the free trade agreement and the goods and services tax in trying to encourage companies and corporations to come in and set up businesses in that small community.

They are not alone in their fears. A constituent in Penticton writes as follows:

> Of course, as necessary, but let's have taxes that are fair, not ones that assist the richer element of our society to get even richer at the sole expense of all the rest of us. There is absolutely no justification whatever for the Mulroney tax grab scheme.

I have a letter from Penticton, from a Joyce Armstrong, president of the New Horizon Committee of the B.C. Square Dance Jamboree. She states as follows:

> We all agree that the national deficit must be reduced but this is not the way. Why must it always be the middle or average wage earner, pensioner and poor young people who pay? Many of the young people I talked with had some very good ideas and the seniors are not without opinions. Tell Mr. Wilson not to count us out. We're not dead yet and still have a vote.

That is a caution to this government. Pay attention to what the people of Canada want, or you will not be sitting there after the next election.

I have a further letter from the very town I was earlier talking about, Osoyoos. One Norman Arnold writes about the Prime Minister as follows:

> He forgets when he hurts the little people that he is hurting about two–thirds of the voting power of Canada, because there are more of them than there are millionaires.
> When he hires 4,000 more employees to staff the offices to run the GST for him, does he realize he will have an additional payroll of about 2M per month or more? How much of this foolishness is going to come out of the GST? In one year alone is he going to reduce the national debt, going at it this way?

A resident of Summerland states her opposition and says that a letter to the editor from one Jack Phillips in the Summerland Review expresses some of her feelings on the goods and services tax.

This gentleman wrote:

> Just raise the income tax rates enough to raise the necessary additional amount. Yes, I can hear the screams of indignant rage already, but raising the extra taxes through income taxes has certain advantages; the income tax system is already in place and will require no additional federal employees since it is largely assessed and remitted by taxpayers themselves. It has already been adjusted to reduce the burden on low income taxpayers and is directly apportioned to one's ability to pay.

That is a suggestion from a person within the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

We are not without options. The finance committee minority report of the New Democratic Party has put forward some very good options to study a system that would be more suitable and fairer to all Canadians.

The first step would be to establish a royal commission, because for 25 years since the Carter commission we have not looked at the tax system in Canada and how it relates to the international market. That is what we should be looking at, not rushing headlong into some cockamamie idea this government has cooked up that because 48 other countries have it, it must be good and we should be using it. The reason that the government wants this goods and services tax is that it is a cash cow, an easy way to raise money.

The people of Canada know that even if this comes in at 7 per cent in 1991, if an election is held in 1992 and regardless of whether that party or the Liberal Party forms the government at that time, there will be an increase in the goods and services tax.

The only party that offers a proper alternative now or in 1992, I suggest, is the New Democratic Party. We have alternatives. We have set them out to the people of Canada in this minority report to the finance committee.

One of those alternatives in the short run, until we can get a full report of a royal commission, would be to roll back the manufacturers' sales tax which has apparently caused some hardships to our manufacturers and our exporters to 9 per cent, the 1984 rate that the Conservative government raised to 13.5 per cent.

Another would be to introduce a new refundable sales tax credit to compensate the poor for the burden that regressive consumption taxes have placed on them and to index the credit to the rate of inflation. It should be full indexation, not the partial indexation offered by this government. It is a regressive move. It continues the regressivity and the oppression of the poverty stricken of this country, which we and the majority of Canadians find unacceptable.

We also suggest that a green tax be imposed to gain money to reward those who use proper and environmentally clean goods and services.

I suggest to the people of Canada that they look at the New Democratic Party's alternatives. The Minister of Finance has recognized that there are alternatives today. Although he said that he does not agree with them, I think he should study them a little more carefully.

Let us be clear about what this House is debating. The government has moved that we agree in principle to a goods and services tax. The Liberals have amended that suggestion and proposed that we do not do it now but do it in six months' time.

In six months there will be a new Liberal leader and that party may have decided what is its policy. My guess is that the corporate backers of the Liberal Party and the corporate bag men of the various candidates will persuade the Liberals to accept the goods and services tax just like they now accept the trade deal.

The New Democrats want to kill the GST. In a few minutes I will move a motion which could do exactly that. I move pursuant to Standing Order 60:

> That this House do now adjourn.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion lost. Resuming debate with the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, on such short notice—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East:) Madam Speaker, I believe that when the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt moved his motion on which we have just now voted, he did so at the conclusion of his 20 minutes of remarks and thus there remains a 10 minute question and comment period on the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member concluded his speech with a motion which was non-debatable and immediately votable which I think took care of the remaining time. In any event, I was recognized for the commencement of debate. I think it is impossible to rescind that decision without unanimous consent of the House.

• (1735)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The point of order put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton East leaves the Chair in quite a quandary.

When the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt concluded his intervention to the House by proposing that the House do now adjourn, the Chair concluded that the hon. member certainly did not wish to continue debating. Henceforth, once the motion was defeated, the Chair recognized another member. I think this is the way we should proceed.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not think it is a matter of whether or not the member has a right to speak any longer. I think it is a matter that the House has the right to ask him questions. It is not that he is being denied any privileges, it is that the members of the Conservative Party, members of the Liberal Party, and New Democrats who may want to ask questions of that member are being prevented.

Since the House has voted not to adjourn, I believe that we have the right to ask those questions and to challenge some of the assertions that that member made during debate.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to show any disrespect for the Chair. I just want to make the point that, as far as the Liberals are concerned, we do not object to having the hon. member in question answer questions. We would be interested in the answers, even though we doubt if they will have any weight or substance.

If the House wishes to agree, we are not going to oppose that. Therefore, my hon. friend is wrong in saying that the Liberals are objecting to the House agreeing to allow the member to be asked questions.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would take that the Chair was offering to this House a ruling that you, as the Chair, were making for the benefit of the House. I think what is taking place at the present time is quite inappropriate because, in effect, it is a debate on your ruling.

Those who are familiar with the rules of the House of Commons would know that it is inappropriate to have any debate or discussion of a ruling once it has once been given by the Chair. I would presume that you should conclude any statement you have with respect to the ruling that you have given, and that the House ought to respect that ruling and we go forward from there.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, just a question to you of clarification. It is my understanding that in your remarks in response to the point of order raised you used terminology that could be considered as tentative and not definitive. I am asking for clarification because I do not have Hansard immediately available to me to check the "blues".

Did you, in fact, hand down a ruling on the question, or did you just indicate that you were in a "quandary" that "you think" as opposed to this is the way it is going to be? I respectfully ask that you do clarify that for us.

• (1740)

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, it is a fact that a motion to adjourn is always in order. If the motion is lost, the House automatically goes back to the business that preceded the motion. The member by rule loses his or her place in the debate once presenting the motion but the business of the House, after that motion is defeated, must go on as normally laid out. The next order of business is the 10 minutes following that member's speech. That is the way the rules should be.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In answer to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, yes, I did start answering the hon. member by saying I was in a quandary following the hon. member for Edmonton East's request that we should proceed with a 10 minute question and comment period. Yes, I did say at that time that it was my feeling that the hon. member, by putting this motion forward in the House, was at that point expressing to the House his wish that the debate should not proceed any longer today.

At this point in time, I cannot think of a precedent under which I could explain or rationalize this ruling.

[Translation]

Consequently, I think the best thing to do in the circumstances is for the Chair to undertake to make inquiries and subsequently establish a precedent, because we have no precedent at this moment to which we can refer.

Consequently, I shall recognize the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), so that we can resume debate. The hon. member has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to take the floor once again—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, on a short point of order, I must say that I reflected on an incident that occurred earlier this afternoon. While the vote was being taken I, being late for the vote, walked into the House of Commons during the vote count. I simply want to seek clarification from Madam Chair whether that is parliamentary practice, or whether that is unparliamentary, because nothing we do here would we want to be considered unparliamentary.

I am seeking clarification if the action that I carried out was in fact parliamentary, and whether it is acceptable behaviour.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, you place this House in a difficult situation. You are suggesting by your tentative, non-ruling that you are telling us that you will go and check it out and come back with an answer, but in the meantime the 10 minute question period is lost. I do not think that is adequate from the Chair and I will tell you why. We need a clear-cut ruling based on precedent right now. If it is necessary for the Chair to take a five-minute recess to get a ruling, I suggest that, rather than going on something tentative until we know what we are doing. I ask the Chair to take a recess and check it out.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca (Mr. Barrett) appears to attribute to the Chair a kind of innate knowledge it does not have.

The Chair felt that it was better not to create a precedent, and after so advising the House, the Chair decided to recognize the hon. member for Calgary West.

I can give the hon. member the assurance that once the results of our inquiries are known, if the debate is still in process, and those results prove that the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt (Mr. Whittaker) should have the benefit of this ten-minute period for questions and comments, he will then be recognized, even if it is later on.

For the time being, I think the matter is closed, and I will again recognize the hon. member for Calgary West.

• (1745)

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to begin—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I have recognized the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, I wanted to say to the Speaker that we on this side of the House do not like the GST. We are not always happy nor do we celebrate the rule of the Chair on any given day on any given issue. Frequently we are disappointed. But at the end of the day, having had a fair hearing, we expect that the rule of the Chair, whether we like it, celebrate it, or not, has to be upheld.

I would say to colleagues, whose view of the GST I share, that we have to be cautious in this place, beyond making our point, about challenging the authority of the Chair. I say this because I believe it is important. If members are to challenge the authority of the Chair, beyond making a strong case, then let it be a direct challenge. If not, let us be careful and respect the institution.

I go further, Madam Speaker. It is up to the Speaker to ensure that the integrity of the Chair is protected as well by not allowing silly challenges.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member from Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I believe that your elaboration now in terms of a decision that will be forthcoming and if you find it appropriate, you will then see the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen-Merritt as having a 10-minute question and comment period is more than reasonable and we accept that, Madam Speaker.

However, I also would remind you of the point that I raised, simply to seek clarification. During the voting I entered the House of Commons, and I am simply requesting information—

Mr. Kempling: You did it on purpose.

Mr. Riis: I did it on purpose, Madam Speaker. If it is unparliamentary, then I certainly would be the first to apologize for doing something I ought not to have done.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member has been in this House for quite a long period of time. I am sure that he does know that hon. members are not supposed to enter the chamber while a division is being taken. This has been within our rules for a long time.

The hon. member from Kamloops on the same point of order.

Mr. Riis: I just want to make it very clear. On many occasions over the years members have entered, and at the end of the vote indicated their intentions as to how they would have voted had they been in the chamber.

If, in fact, earlier in the day I entered the House of Commons at an inappropriate moment, and I accept that fact that it is a tradition that we have in this House, I for one want to apologize for doing that.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East) Madam Speaker, I am afraid that I cannot let the remarks of the hon. member from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte pass unchallenged at this time.

He said that we were challenging the authority of the Chair. I can assure the Chair that in raising the original point of order, I had no intention, none whatsoever, of challenging the Chair. In fact I do not consider that anything I said at that time could be construed as a challenge to the Chair.

If by chance the hon. member was referring to the remarks of other of my colleagues, I can only say that nothing in any of those remarks could reasonably be construed as a challenge to the authority of the Chair, especially when in the case of the hon. member from Juan de Fuca, he was suggesting that the Chair take the time of the House to—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Regina—Lumsden was seeking the floor.

• (1750)

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, it is against the rules to challenge the Chair. It has been for a number of years. We cannot challenge the Chair. Nobody has.

In light of the fact that my wife is expecting—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: —could I have the unanimous consent of the House to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Consent has not been given. The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. Benjamin: Do I have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member was not given unanimous consent to call it six o'clock. The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, I was not suggesting that the Chair knows everything immediately. What I was suggesting was a recess. Your compromise is perfectly acceptable. But I want to say that I resent the editorial comment that somehow I was challenging the Chair or expecting the Chair to know every answer.

What I said was, take a five minute recess. The suggestion you have made is totally acceptable. But I do not accept the questioning of my motives when I raise a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I had not been questioning the hon. member's motives, and I do thank him very much for finding my suggestion quite acceptable. On debate, the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, it is a very unusual period in the history of the Parliament of—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I certainly do not want to leave the remarks of the Liberal member unchallenged, because I was one of the people who rose and asked for a clarification of what the Speaker was ruling. The very fact that later on in that process the Speaker felt it necessary to withhold judgment indicates that what we were raising was quite valid. Upon hearing the arguments of members of the New Democratic Party caucus, and hearing other remarks, the Chair felt it necessary to reserve judgment. I know that the Chair also had the opportunity to have a few words with the Clerk and again it was obviously a situation where there was a feeling that the whole issue was in doubt.

I personally object to the remarks by the Liberal member who pretends that he also opposes the GST, despite what his candidate for the leadership is doing right now—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I think hon. members will agree that the Chair has been quite patient. But we should not change points of orders into debate. The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, with the full knowledge that I, as a genuine and sincere member of Parliament, this afternoon am being manipulated by my colleagues to my left, forced back on to my feet, I want to point out that this member made no reference to any member of the NDP caucus. Now, the fact that five or six felt it necessary, given their performance this afternoon, to get up and protest their innocence is an editorial comment not coming from me but from their own lips.

May I simply say that when I brought to the attention of the House that notwithstanding the strong passions in this place that the Chair and the authority of the Chair must be respected, and notwithstanding my sincere attempt to improve the atmosphere in this place, it is obvious that my words of wisdom fell on deaf ears of my colleagues opposite. That, Madam Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Churchill has a point of order.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I did not have a chance to finish my remarks with regard to the first intervention of the Liberal member. He indicated that it was the Speaker's job to maintain order in the House and to uphold the authority of the Chair. I would argue that it is the responsibility of the entire House to do so. In getting up to speak for whatever particular reason, he is misleading the House. As the Speaker likes to point out to those people in eastern and western Canada who may be watching and listening to this, it is very important that people understand that it is not only the Speaker who has the responsibility for maintaining the authority of the Chair, it is the entire House and all members of the House from all parties must maintain that role of the Chair.

Again, we do not always like the rulings of Speakers from time to time, but we recognize that once a ruling is made that that must be accepted.

• (1755)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A point was raised about ten minutes ago. I ruled on it. As well, I said I would come back to the House should there be any changes after we have conducted some research. I think we have heard many comments on that ruling, on everybody's perception of my ruling. I think this subject should be closed for tonight.

Resuming debate. On a point of order, the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, having spent 15 minutes trying to get this debate started, I was quite prepared to begin speaking when I heard a member of the opposition from the New Democratic Party shouting "point of order". My only defence in this chamber is to shout "point of order" a little louder and perhaps a little faster because I think we really do have a point of order. I think the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte put his finger on it.

The issue, Madam Speaker, that you have been asked to consider by the member is whether or not the Chair is being challenged. Is there a pattern of challenge that exists? As the former whip of the New Democratic Party pointed out, it is up to all of us to uphold the Chair.

I put my seat on the line some two or three days ago after observing tapes of debate in this House where two members of that party did, indeed—and I repeat it, did, indeed—challenge the Chair by voting twice, voting yea and voting nay on the same division which, if there ever was a classic case of putting the Chair in an awkward position, that was it.

I heard a supposedly responsible officer of this House, the House leader of the New Democratic Party, rise on a point of order and ask if his behaviour was appropriate when he walked into the House in the middle of a division. Madam Speaker, after being a House leader for as long as he has been, he knew that it was inappropriate.

The challenge is not to the government, the challenge is to the Chair. There is a pattern. There is a long, well-established tradition in this House that when a party, whether it is the official opposition, the government, any party, intends to make a creative use of the rules, they have a quiet conversation with the Chair to advise the Chair so it is in a position to make a ruling.

The opposition has a desire to stifle debate, to stifle democracy, to keep this chamber silent on the issue of the goods and services tax. They are antithetical to democracy. They do not want debate, but the official opposition does, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair has listened to quite a few points of order in the last half an hour, but I have also asked other members to keep it to a point of order and not to get into debate. I think the hon. member for Calgary West was getting well into debate at that time.

Mr. Benjamin: He was out of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member has not been given the floor.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, when the Speaker of the House of Commons has a question of privilege under advisement, it is out of order to get up and speak on it, which he just did.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I think the hon. member for Kamloops had been seeking the floor.

Mr. Riis: I must apologize to my hon. friend, the Whip for the government. I thought he was actually launching off in debate. I was going to call for a rule of relevance, but if he is on a point of order, I guess I really have not much to say.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, just on a quick point of order. As Whip of the NDP, I understand that some members are now gathering to smoke at the freight entrance of this building. The bells do not reach down there. I would ask Your Honour to investigate the provision of services to members who still insist in indulging in the bad habit of consuming the weed and to make sure at least they get the notice for any votes.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

POINT OF ORDER

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we are all aware that today is a New Democratic Party opposition day on an important environmental issue. There have been consultations among the Parties and while we were anticipating having a vote at the conclusion of today's debate, there has been agreement that the vote be postponed until Monday at six, with the understanding that we would now go through the normal Routine Proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice on the same point of order.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm that there have been those consultations and that it is agreeable with the government. I think you would find confirmation from the Official Opposition too. I appreciate that it is on the record. It should perhaps be formally recognized as an Order of the House, in whatever way the Chair wishes to formalize that suggestion and to make it official.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we would certainly concur. Given that we have new hours on Monday and people realize that the House starts at one o'clock instead of the usual 11 o'clock, we agree that six o'clock is an appropriate time for the vote, but it will be on government time, I take it, and the additional time taken for the vote will not be added on to the day. With that caveat we agree.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, to be a little more precise, is the member suggesting that the vote on Monday be at 6.45?

Mr. Gauthier: Six.

Mr. Hawkes: The normal Monday hours for government business under the new system run from three o'clock until seven o'clock. If the vote were to occur at the conclusion of government business, then it would occur at seven, with a 15 minute bell. If he is asking for it to take part of government time, then I would assume that the bells would ring at 6.45 or maybe 6.30. Is the hon. member suggesting that government business be interrupted at some other hour for the holding of the vote? If somebody wants to make a suggestion, the government would be receptive to hearing exactly when we should have that vote on Monday.

Let us remember, Mr. Speaker, that one of the reasons we changed the hours for Mondays was to allow an opportunity for members to arrive at the House for deferred votes on a Monday. That is the reason we said let's vote more often at seven o'clock on deferred votes rather than at six o'clock. Is there some desire to change that for this one occasion?

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier further and then I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops.

• (1110)

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, since I raised the issue, I would like to add this comment. The government whip and I can always ask the Chair to defer a vote. In this case, that is not allowed. However, with the assent of the New Democratic Party and with their initiative, I agree that the vote can be deferred to Monday at six o'clock. I understand that the bells would ring at 5.45 p.m., and vote taken after that.

The reason is that normally we would have the vote at three o'clock after Question Period and Routine Proceedings. That would be the normal procedure, but to give a chance to western members to be here—and I hear the government whips clearly—I think six o'clock is appropriate. I hope we understand each other. Committees sit Monday night and committees have difficulties. There are six or seven committees sitting. The difficulty I have is allowing members to be here to vote, have their supper and then get back to their committees. We would be flexible and understanding of members' obligations to be at committees and also in the House to vote. That is the only reason I am asking for six o'clock. If that does not meet with general consent then I am flexible.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the point of the original suggestion was just that, that we have taken some soundings and it would appear that all members can be here who wish to be here Monday by six o'clock in terms of flights and so on. The understanding would be that the bells would ring at 5.45 p.m. and the vote would be at six o'clock. It is as simple as that. I think it is important that we identify that the vote will take place at six and the government business of the day will be interrupted until the vote occurs and then on with the normal business.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate the Chair's concern that we seem to be negotiating on the floor of the House, which we do not normally do, but we are negotiating in good faith.

The government has no difficulty in this case taking the time out of government time with one condition, and that is if the bells ring at 5.45 p.m. and the vote is at six, there would have to be an understanding that there would be no dilatory points of privilege or order which would interrupt getting back to debate immediately after the vote.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the proposition put forward. Is it the wish of the House to agree?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for South West Nova may want to discuss what we have just done with the Speaker after and I would be prepared to see her in my chambers.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, this is a very special day for all of us who are committed to strengthening the harmony and co-operation between our two official language communities. It is the twenty-fifth anniversary of the preliminary report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism co-chaired by Davidson Dunton and Andre Laurendeau. It was an historic document for Canada.

That report presented Canadians with an exciting challenge, a challenge presented by a group of our compatriots who had spent two years listening to Canadians, reflecting on what they had heard and discussing at length among themselves what their conclusions should be.

[Translation]

As a result, measures were taken with the support of all the parties in this House to promote official language equality throughout the country.

Since that day 25 years ago, we have made progress towards greater linguistic justice. The 1969 Official Languages Act, the 1982 Constitution and the new Official Languages Act of 1988 provided a framework within which we were able to pursue our common goals.

[English]

One of the first and most important measures was to open up the Government of Canada to Canadians of both linguistic communities. We have a public service that now offers greater opportunities to English and French speaking Canadians alike, to work together in harmony and in the context of equal opportunities. As well, the government has made important strides in providing its services to the public in both official languages.

The government has also worked with all provinces and territories to encourage them to make their services available to their official language minorities in their own language.

[Translation]

In the field of education, there are tens of thousands of French-speaking children outside the Province of Quebec who are now receiving their education in their own language where before they could not. There are additional thousands of English-speaking pupils across the country benefiting from more and better teaching of French as a second language.

[English]

The English speaking population of Quebec continues to have access to a network of English language schools, colleges and universities. Furthermore, both English and French are taught extensively as second languages in Quebec schools.

[Translation]

Schools and community centres serving official language minority groups have sprung up in several provinces. Official language minorities now have their own community radio stations and community newspapers. Of course, organizations are also working hard to strengthen the ties within their communities. The most notable of these are La Fédération des francophones hors Québec and Alliance Quebec, but there are many others.

[English]

Despite the inevitable tensions that have occurred and continue to occur from time to time, the progress we have made in the past quarter century has strengthened us and given us fresh insight. We have got to know each other better. We have become more used to the process of dialogue that is so essential to our very survival.

As a member of an official language minority community, I am proud of what we as Canadians have accomplished to promote Canada's two official languages. Federal, provincial, territorial co-operation on official languages is a dynamic example of the Canadian commitment to official language equality. Through joint initiatives, substantial impetus is being given to promote minority language education and second language instruction and other services in the two official languages are being improved.

[Translation]

These forward-looking measures set the stage for a Canada that is united in its diversity and full of promise for the future.

It all started 25 years ago. That is a day to remember and a memory to cherish.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, it has been a quarter of a century since the day the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism was appointed by the then Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson. A quarter of a century may seem negligible in the history of a country, but to official language minority communities that have had to struggle to preserve their heritage, to many of us, a quarter of a century seems very long indeed.

In its report, the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission said that Canada was experiencing the worst crisis in its history. That was in the Sixties, Madam Speaker. In 1989, history seemed to repeat itself. What we are seeing is a new emergence of intolerance and misunderstanding, largely arising from ignorance and disinformation.

• (1120)

An hon. member: Deplorable!

Mr. Gauthier: Despite constant efforts, despite federal legislation passed in 1969, 1973 and 1988, and despite provincial legislation, including Bill 8 in Ontario and Bill 142 in Quebec, we still have a long way to go to ensure that our Canadian linguistic duality is approached with respect, generosity and tolerance.

Madam Speaker, although we can rejoice in the progress that has been made, we must face the facts. As they say, it isn't over until it's over.

Linguistic equity is far from being an accepted fact. In some provinces, movements and groups are sowing the seeds of disunity by refusing to acknowledge the rich resources of a country that has enshrined two official languages in its Constitution. They refuse to recognize the very foundations of our history.

To ensure that both official languages are treated the same, we must rely on firm leadership and on the understanding of Canadian men and women at all levels, whether federal or provincial, in our municipalities and our schools. That is the only way we will be able to guarantee linguistic justice in this country. We must explain to Canadians that, if we are to preserve this fundamental resource of our country, there are certain challenges to be met.

While Quebec's language minority has access to schools, to the courts, to the legislature, and a range of social services, in most other provinces the Francophone minority is still denied, in addition to the right to be educated in its own language, access to control over institutions, access to the courts, access to the legislature, to health services, and so forth. Some groups are now asking the courts to acknowledge their right to have their children educated in their official language.

Although the federal government already supports the provinces in this area, we must intensify our efforts to make Canadians understand that giving rights to a minority in no way diminishes the rights of the majority.

When we see a situation like the one that arose this week in Sault Ste. Marie, we have every right to start asking some serious questions. To deny a minority rights it was never given is like trying to cure a disease before it has been diagnosed. Madam Speaker, I think this is a deplorable situation, and I am very sorry this had to happen. How could anyone seriously think that a 4 percent of a community could be a threat to 85,000 of its members?

If we want to ensure that our country can look foward to a harmonious future, the majority must stop holding hostage the minority group. We must stop these scare tactics. Hate never brought people together. In the case of Sault Ste. Marie, the only thing they have to fear is fear itself.

[English]

Our two official languages are Canada's precious jewels. Our two official languages are the most important aspect of our heritage. Our two official languages are one of the most differential characteristics of what Canada is all about. It should not be divisive. It should unite us, because that is what makes Canada a special country. Linguistic minorities should not have to struggle to survive. Linguistic minorities should not have to struggle to get what is rightfully theirs. They should be able to enjoy and share the heritage left to them by their ancestors.

Whether we are French-speaking Canadians or English-speaking Canadians, are we not all Canadians? Does Canada not belong to all of us? If it does, why can we not live together in harmony and respect and trust each other? Ignorance and intolerance toward our minorities damages Canada. And if you kill one's language, you kill part of the country with it.

Canadians gave themselves a Constitution which recognizes two official languages. The law of the land should be respected and protected by all governments and all individuals. If we are not able to do it in our country, Canada, then Canada is nothing but a sand castle.

In order for our mutual respect to develop, we must pay attention to the important fact of Canada. We indeed must try and develop strong bonds with each other. We must compromise, we must respect our spirit, we must respect each other.

There is still hope. I hope the next 25 years show us the way with strong leadership as to how we will succeed in peace and equity in matters of language.

[Translation]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today as a member from the West and for the New Democratic Party of Canada to recognize the 25th anniversary of the Royal Commission of Inquiry on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

[English]

When the commission was established, Andre Laurendeau, a great Canadian and co-chairman said, that, as history tells us, Paris was worth a mass and Canada surely is worth a commission. What a commission it was, it had a profound impact on Canada.

[Translation]

The vision expressed in the recommendations of this report had a considerable influence on the history of our country. The key recommendations—the principle of ensuring that the official language minorities of Canada receive public services in their mother tongue, the idea that French as well as English must be a working language in Canada, etc.—were reflected in the Official Languages Act of 1969, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and more recently in Bill C-72 which was passed before the last election.

[English]

On this twenty-fifth anniversary of the "by and by" commission, I can remember the time we asked when this commission was going to report. It was a little bit of a joke, because royal commissions takes a long time. They said "by and by it would report". It was not a joking matter because it was a very serious and very important commission.

As hon. members before me have said, we have cause for both satisfaction and concern. We have more bilingual people than ever before. Recent Statistics Canada reports state that the increase has been from 13.5 per cent in 1971 to 16.2 per cent today, so we are going forward and not backward.

This reflects in large measure the desire of young people in this country, and I emphasize young people, to learn either English or French as the case may be. The young people of Canada are demonstrating their support for a bilingual country every day in classrooms, through exchanges and through travel. It is this reality we must consider when we hear noisy demonstrations, as we have recently, of intolerance toward official language minorities in Canada. Look at the pictures on the TV screens. Those are old faces that show intolerance. The young people are not showing the level of intolerance. They have a different view of Canada and that is the view that was reflected in the reports of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

There has been a lot of talk, and more than talk, of distinct societies in Canada. The Meech Lake constitutional accord recognizes Quebec as a distinct society which is a position supported by my party, the NDP. However, in my view, the accord also creates another nine distinct societies. It seems to me that one of the reasons we have been bogged down recently in constitutional change is that that view of Canada is in conflict with the view of Andre Laurendeau and Davidson Dunton in the report of the B and B Commission 25 years ago. In all this discussion of distinct societies, we must not forget that one of the major elements of Canada's distinctiveness as a country is that it is bilingual. We all, I believe, can agree to that. Compare this to California where there are moves to make it a unilingual state. We have a different view in Canada. We have a view that Canada is bilingual and that is a result, by and large, of the royal commission 25 years ago. We are not a melting pot.

For us to remain distinctive, we must continue to pursue national policies that, to the extent possible, give Canadians the chance to live, to learn and to work in either official language. Those of us who support the vision of the Bilingual and Biculturalism Commission must speak out—all of us—more forcefully than ever before for tolerance in this country.

• (1130)

I want to conclude with two quotes, one from Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the other from his rival, Henri Bourassa. Laurier said in 1897, on the occasion of the Diamond Jubilee: "If there is anything to which I have devoted my political life, it is to try to promote unity, harmony and amity between the diverse elements of this country. My friends can desert me. They can remove their confidence from me. They can withdraw the trust they have placed in my hands, but never shall I deviate from that line of policy".

Laurier's concept of Canada was to have a tolerant society but not necessarily enforced by law.

I want to end by quoting from the real father of the B and B Commission and the bilingualism nature of Canada, Quebec nationalist Henri Bourassa. I quote from page 78 of Tom Berger's book 'Fragile Freedoms. He was a former judge from British Columbia who wrote:

> Bourassa went on to describe his vision of a bilingual, bicultural Canada, an Anglo-French nation from sea to sea.
> We deserve better than to be considered like the savages of the old reservations and to be told: "Remain in Quebec, continue to stagnate in ignorance, you are at home there; but elsewhere you must become English."
>
> No, we have the right to be French in language; we have the right to be Catholics in faith; we have the right to be free by the constitution—(and) to enjoy these rights throughout the whole expanse of Confederation.
> In our own day, Pierre Trudeau has adopted Bourassa's idea of a bilingual and bicultural Canada. Trudeau is Bourassa's heir, not Laurier's. The Official Languages Act of 1969 enlarged the availability of services in English and French in federal departments and institutions, pursuant to Section 133 of the BNA Act.

A further expansion of the scope of those two official languages is now taking place under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I will conclude with the guarantee of English and French education throughout the country and with the view that young people, not the older generation, who want to see a bilingual country.

That is the real legacy that Laurendeau and that royal commission has left us. That is our view of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-63 intituled "An Act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation".

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the Hon. Minister have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): When shall the bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BANK ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-282, an act to amend the Bank Act (fair banking practices).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Rodriguez: Madam Speaker, this bill establishes certain basic banking services for which there will be no charges whatsoever. It also retroactively puts a freeze on bank service charges which have been in effect. Third, it establishes an independent ombudsperson for those Canadians who have complaints about bank service charges.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, as you can see I have a pile of petitions, but I will present them all at once for the sake of brevity.

These petitioners are concerned about the government's decision to proceed with the goods and services tax. They have a long list of concerns as to why they are against it.

These petitioners are from Kamloops, Westsyde, Brocklehurst, Avola, Westmount, Batchelor Hills, Barriere, Dallas, Valleyview, Blue River, Paul Lake, Barnhartvale, Knutsford, Chase, Clearwater, Blackpool, Birch Island, Kamloops Indian Reserve, Wells Gray Park, Chu Chua, Skwaam Bay, Black Pines, Harpers Ranch, Rayleigh, Niskonlith Lake, Louis Creek, Logan Lake, Little Fort, Heffley Creek, Darfield, McLure, Monte Creek, East Barriere Lake, Vinsulla, Trapp Lake, Tranquille Plateau, Monte Lake, Pinantan Lake, Pritchard, Savona, Vavenby, Westwold, Deadman's Creek, Lac Le Jeune and Cherry Creek.

They are asking that the Parliament of Canada do whatever it can to stop the government from proceeding with the goods and services tax.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have a petition sent to me by people from Alberta who strongly object to this imposition of an additional sales tax on goods and services.

They claim that the Conservative federal government wants to impose on Canadians a new hidden tax which will touch about everything they buy, that the imposition of the new general goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians and, further, that the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small business.

They claim that this is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians. They will be hit not only with higher taxes but higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax proposal of this government.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I have pleasure in rising to present a petition, pursuant to the appropriate Standing Order, from some people in Windsor, Ontario.

The prayer of their petition is one that will come as no surprise. They want this nefarious, objectionable, unreasonable goods and services tax done away with before it ever sees the light of day. I have great pleasure in supporting the prayer of their petition.

They are appealing to people on the government side to start listening to the real people out there in Windsor and other parts of this country.

• (1140)

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege, responsibility and the honour to present and totally support a petition signed by hundreds of residents of Val Therése, Val Caron, Blezard Valley, Capreol, Coniston, Sudbury, Garson, Lively, Naughton, Walton, Noelville, and St. Charles.

They point out that the proposed goods and services tax is a regressive tax, that it does not respect the ability of the taxpayer to pay, and that in fact the government has not addressed the present unfair tax system which permits wealthy Canadians and corporations to pay little or no federal tax at all.

Therefore they ask Parliament to call upon this government to cease the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to the backs of ordinary Canadians through this regressive consumption tax.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Madam Speaker, the first item of business in the House of Commons for the 1990s brought members of the House of Commons together in a united way in voting for the preservation of the Rouge Valley, 10,000 acres in metro Toronto, as a park.

I would like to present today names of petitioners who join with members of the House of Commons. These people are from Scarborough, Mississauga, Richmond Hill, North York, Markham and Toronto. They too wish to send a very strong message to Premier Peterson of Ontario to have the Rouge Valley saved as a park.

This is a very unique and precious natural area. It is in the national interest to preserve this wildlife and wilderness area.

The interim report of the royal commission on the future of the Toronto waterfront recommended the Rouge Valley be saved, as did the mayor of Scarborough and thousands of people in the Rouge Valley system organization.

I am very pleased to present this petition which calls on the Government of Ontario to have the Rouge Valley established as a park.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty, in accordance with Standing Order 36, to present a petition from residents of Winnipeg, Dugal, Quebec, St. Foy, North Vancouver, Canoe Bay, Roblin, Saskatchewan, Saskatoon East, Thunder Bay and Barrie who are concerned that the government ought not to cut the VIA Rail service which is so important, particularly to the smaller cities and towns of Canada.

Therefore, they ask the Parliament of Canada to maintain VIA Rail with Canada's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment, and to have a passenger train act giving VIA Rail a firm, legislative mandate.

Finally they ask Parliament for revised costing arrangements with the railway companies.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition from the residents of North York, Toronto, Thunder Bay, Middleton, Nova Scotia, Dollard, Quebec and Downsview who are concerned for the government's present action against the people of Natashquan in Labrador and eastern Quebec.

They ask that the Parliament join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing the use of their lands for NATO–NORAD attack training.

They demand that the Canadian government end all NATO–NORAD low level flight training in Canada and oppose establishment of NATO operations in Canada, including the proposed tactical fighter and weapons training centre at Goose Bay, Labrador, and that Parliament should redirect Canada's NATO–NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

[Translation]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

M. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Madam Speaker, I too have a petition signed by Ottawa area residents who are against this regressive tax on goods and services which will spell the end of thousands of jobs in the small and medium–sized business sector and which will boost inflation.

Your petitioners are urging us Liberals to resort to every means at our disposal to defeat this measure so that the tax will never be implemented.

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Madam Speaker, for over 10 days this government has denied the people of Canada the democratic right to have their petitions presented to their representatives in the House of Commons.

It is indeed a pleasure and privilege this morning to rise and present, on behalf of hundreds of people from southwestern Ontario, a petition asking this government to rescind its proposed bill respecting the goods and services tax which will be devastating not only to small business but to seniors, to students and to people in lower and middle income groups.

They want this government to listen to their petitions, to listen to their voices and to scrap this tax once and for all, at any rate.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty, under Standing Order 36, to present to this House a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions. It contains the signatures of Canadians who reside not just in my riding of Hamilton West but, as members of the ridings of Hamilton—Wentworth and Burlington might take note, Canadians who reside in the communities of Dundas, Greensville and in particular Burlington.

They strongly oppose this new goods and services tax, which they say is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to present this petition from about 24 people from Portage La Prairie, Manitoba who wish Parliament to enact legislation that protects human life from conception to natural death.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant Standing Order No. 36, to present a petition opposing the government's goods and services tax.

It is the wish and prayer of the petitioners that this government cease in its efforts to foist the goods and services tax on an unwilling and unaccepting public.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition from a great many Canadians who are very concerned about the goods and services tax and wish to express to the government their disagreement in what the government is doing.

They say that it is just going to be a tax grab and certainly will not be in the interest of Canadians. In fact it will be very damaging to the people of Canada.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to rise today, pursuant to Standing Order No. 36, to present a petition on behalf of the people who are decrying what the government has done to VIA Rail, including the $500 million cut that is resulting in decreased service and the certainty that the equipment needed to maintain VIA would not be purchased.

They are asking the Government of Canada to force VIA Rail to come up with a firm business plan to assure the continuance of VIA Rail as a world method of transportation.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, it is my duty and pleasure today, pursuant to Standing Order No. 36, to present to this House a properly certified petition from Canadians who are absolutely opposed to this government's proposed goods and service tax at 9 per cent, 7 per cent, 1 per cent or whatever.

The signatories on this particular petition are part of the 72 per cent of Canadians who are saying no, loud and clear, to any type of GST.

• (1150)

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise, under Standing Order 36, to present roughly another 300 signatures of Canadians, mostly resident in Edmonton but resident in other parts of Canada as well. They are in addition to the thousands I have already presented and are calling on Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

I am going to keep presenting these signatures as they come in until one of two things happen: either the government scraps the GST or the Canadian people scrap the government.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of my colleague, the member for Windsor West, from Canadians in the Windsor area who also are opposed to the goods and services tax.

They think that it is a regressive tax, an unfair tax, an inflationary tax and a tax which they want this government to withdraw. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to achieve that end.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions signed by a host of electors in the riding of Windsor West who object to the goods and services tax and call upon Parliament to reject this unfair and regressive tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, this petition has been certified correct under the provisions of Standing Order 36. On behalf of my fellow citizens of the Windsor and London regions I am pleased to convey their message. They urge Parliament to reject the goods and services tax because they believe it is totally unfair.

"WAGE AND PRICE MODERATION" IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR

Question No. 174—Mr. Young (Gloucester):

1. Does the government have plans to encourage "wage and price moderation" in the public sector and, if so (a) what are they (b) do they include plans to prevent future collective agreements in the federal public sector from containing clauses which fully or partially index wages and benefits to increases in the (i) consumer price index (ii) any other index, either before or after implementation of the proposed goods and services tax and, if so, in what way?

2. What number of the government's employees are presently covered by collective agreements which index wages and benefits according to (a) increases in the consumer price index (b) increases in the consumer price index less three per cent (c) no index at all (d) other indices?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): 1. The government has no plans to make changes to the way in which the wages or benefits have been established.

2. There are no provisions in any collective agreement which applies to federal public servants which establish wages or benefits according to an index.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX-BUDGET

Question No. 176—Mr. Young (Gloucester):

Has the government budgeted or spent any money to advertise and explain the proposed goods and services tax to Canadians and, if so (a) for the present and each future fiscal year, what amount (b) what amount has already been spent on (i) the operation of the government's proposed goods and services tax information telephone lines (ii) proposed goods and services tax pamphlets (iii) advertisements in all forms of media (iv) the hiring of new personnel with the full or partial responsibility for the said advertising or explaining or communications work concerning the proposed tax (v) leasing any office space and equipment for these activities (vi) any other expense?

Hon. Michael Holcombe Wilson (Minister of Finance): (a) For the fiscal years 1989–90 and 1990–91, Treasury Board has approved an operating budget of $7.661 million for the Goods and Services Tax Working Group: $5.138 million for 1989–90 and $2.523 million for 1990–91. These figures include expenditures for salaries, travel, supplies, materials and so on.

In addition, a budget of $4.5 million has been established for a public information campaign about the GST for the fiscal year 1989–90.

(b) To date:

(i) The sum of $476,200 has been spent on the operation of a toll free information line service.

(ii) The amount spent for pamphlets explaining the proposed Goods and Services Tax is $204,600.

(iii) Out of the 1989–90 public information budget of $4.5 million, a total of $2,916,600 has been spent for advertisements explaining the proposed GST to Canadians.

(iv) The amount spent on the hiring of new personnel to be responsible for communications work concerning the proposed tax is $479,900.

(v) The sum of $26,400 has been spent on the leasing of office space and equipment.

(vi) Other expenses for travel, postage, freight, furniture, and other supplies total $248,100.

ACTUARIAL PRESENT VALUE OF UNFUNDED SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS

Question No. 181—Mr. Gauthier:

Were blended interest, general wage increase and inflation rate assumptions used for 1989–90 and each of the next twenty fiscal years to produce the estimate contained in Section 7 of Volume I of the 1988–89 Public Accounts "that the actuarial present value of unfunded supplementary retirement benefits, including provision for future indexation, in respect of benefits earned or in pay as at March 31, 1989, could be between $850 million and $5 billion," and if so, respectively, what were they?

Hon. Robert R. de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Insofar as the Office of the Comptroller General is concerned:

Streamed economic assumptions were used in preparing the estimated obligations for all pensions plans as at March 31, 1989. The economic assumptions start with current salary and interest rates, and gradually blend into long term economic assumptions. In both scenarios, the assumed rate of return on the account balances reflects a 1 per cent margin over the medium term to allow for possible adverse economic situations. The specific assumptions are as follows:

	$6 billion Unrecorded Liability			$850 million Unrecorded Liability
Calendar Year	Assumed Fund Yields	CPI Increase	General Salary Increase	Assumed Fund Yields	CPI Increase	General Salary Increase

In both scenarios, the assumptions remain constant after 2010.

GRANTS

Question No. 182—Mr. Boudria:

Have any grants to the Canada Council, the Social Science and Humanities Research Council or the International Development Research Centre been spent on (a) a study of the social value of lawn ornaments (b) a study of latrines in Guatemala (c) the translation of the book If it weren't for sex I'd have to get a job (d) a study of the attitudes of Nova Scotians towards animals (e) the publication of a banana newsletter from the French Riviera (f) a study of the fool as a transitional figure in the historical development of western civilization and, if so (i) what was the total amount spent on (ii) what was the purpose of each project?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed as follows: (a) Yes—The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada.

i) $12,000 (1987–1988).

ii) This project in the sociology of culture examines how people in a society, including an ethnically, linguistically, gender—and class-divided society, experience and express their culture. The researcher focuses on a cultural symbol, the mass-produced lawn ornament, to find out how the choice and arrangement of such ornaments in a yard communicates something about how they see themselves, how they view animals (often depicted in ornaments), or about a nostalgia for the past (outmoded work tools are popular as decoration). Study of the sociology of culture is one aspect of understanding our society. To understand society as a complex whole, we need to examine the human motivations, aspirations, values, and cultural differences of individual segments of society. This is particularly true in Canada because of its multicultural makeup.

b) Yes—The International Development Research Centre.

i) $215,300 over a 36 month period.

ii) The International Development Research Centre is supporting a project titled DAFF Latrine in Guatemala. The Centro de Estudios Mesoamericano Sobre Technologia Apropriada is undertaking this project ot evaluate and provide advice on technical aspects and social acceptance of dry alkaline family fertilizer (DAFF) latrines.

The safe disposal of human waste is major public health issue in developing countries. Five million infants and children die of diarrhoeal disease annually. This project investigates the factors responsible for program failures, designs a low-cost composting latrine, assesses its technical performance and social acceptability, and is presently developing technical support materials to institutions promoting the latrine in Guatemala and throughout Central America.

c) Yes—The Canada Council.

i) $10,320.

ii) For the translation from English to French of a book titled "If It Weren't for Sex, I'd have to Get a Job". This book is the memoirs of Arnold Manweiler, a veteran canadian private investigator whose career spanned over 30 years; it recounts, often humorously, some of the cases Mr. Manweiler investigated and gives readers an inside look at the day-to-day life of a Canadian "private eye". The quality of the translation supported by the Council was such that the Governor General's Literary Awards jury named it as one of the three finalists for the 1988 translation award. The grant was awarded through the Council's Translation Program, which encourages greater exchanges between Canada's English-language and French-language communities through grants for translation of works by Canadian authors from one official language to the other. Assistance is also available for the translation of Canadian books from a language other than English or French into one of the official languages.

d) Yes—The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada.

i) $21,664 (1986–1987).

ii) Animals play an essential role in human affairs: as farm animals, laboratory subjects, game, and as pets. With wild animals we share a decreasing amount of open space as the human population grows. Important public decisions about our use of and co-existence with animals require a sound understanding of how people regard animals and such issues as animal rights. This survey of Nova Scotians by a trained wildlife biologist will allow researchers to make generalizations about the attitudes of all Canadians. (The micro/macro approach in research is effective and is commonly used by scholars and pollsters.) The results will be of use to policy planners, legislators and wildlife managers in developing programs in such areas as animal rights, wildlife preservation, commercial and recreational hunting and fishing, and environmental protection.

e) Yes—The International Development Research Centre.

i) $669,000 over a 36 month period.

ii) IDRC is supporting a project titled Banana and Plantain Information Network. This project aims at setting up an information system to support the establishment and operations of the International Network for the Improvement of Banana and Plantain (INIBAP), wich has its headquarters in Montpellier, France.

Banana and plantain are a major export crop for many developing countries. The estimated world market worth is more than $10 billion (US) a year. In addition, bananas are the staple food for millions of poor people. In many Third World countries a nutritious variety of "green" banana is boiled in soups and stews. It has the consistency and flavour of a hard potato or yam and is used more like our staple potato or rice than the fruit we are familiar with in North America.

In tropical climates, crops are constantly susceptible to insects and disease. Central America is currently suffering from a disease called black sigatoka which treatens the region's best species. The fungus is spreading quickly and relentlessly and there is fear it will spread to South America, the Caribbean and eventually, even Africa. Unfortunately, small rural farmers cannot afford the pesticides and fertilizers used by the large plantation owners. Many small producers are being forced to leave their lend.

Scientists in many parts of the world are doing genetic research to develop new species or superior bananas that are resistant to insects, disease yet produce good, nutritious fruit.

Canada, through IDRC, is playing a leading role as executing agency and along with a consortium of international donors is supporting a coordinated program of research on bananas and plantains. The international network, known as INIBAP (International Network for the Improvement of Bananas and Plantains), received 12 per cent of its funding from IDRC. Other contributors include Australia, Belgium, France, the U.S.A. and the E.E.C.

The government of France has provided facilities at the International Cooperation Centre of Agricultural Research for Development (CIRAD), in Montpellier, which is a centre of excellence on tropical fruits. The IDRC grant to INIBAP is to help establish a research network with the purpose of linking scientists in the developing countries for mutual exchange on research results. The mechanisms include a question and answer service on production and disease problems, creation of a data base and exchange of infromation in and between the developing countries themselves.

f) Yes—The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada.

i) $24,540 (1986–1987).

ii) Study of Western civilization necessitates an examination of the figure of the fool. The fool, who is known through literature and culture, questions the way people think or act. His target may be the general populace or a person with great power to help or hurt those around him. The fool's distinguishing characteristic, which gives him the possibility of being so influential, is the ambiguity about his statements—is he really foolish, or is he wise? This study concentrates on how the fool expresses the anxieties of a population during periods of social change. Because civilization is always in the process of changing, and because the 20th century has brought us even more rapid and tumultuous change, studying the fool who questions our ways remains very relevant.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE INVESTIGATION INTO THE LEAK OF BUDGET DOCUMENTS

Question No. 187—Mr. Comuzzi:

Since April 26, 1989, has the Royal Canadian Mounted Police conducted an investigation into the leak of Budget documents and, if so, what has been the total cost in (a) person-hours (b) dollars?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Yes. The primary investigation was conducted in Ottawa, however, inquiries were also undertaken in the various provinces where stock exchanges are located. In addition to the involvement of operational units, support was also provided by specialized units such as surveillance and identification services.

(a) The reporting system of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) does not allow a definitive account of the total number of hours expended on this investigation.

(b) As a rule, other than for planned operations, the RCMP does not cost its investigations. The actual cost could only be ascertained by looking at each individual's involvement, determining his/her salary classification and the hours expended. In view of the number of individuals involved at different locations, costing would be difficult to accomplish and would not provide an accurate amount.

CONTRACT FOR THE DISTRIBUTION OF BROCHURES ON THE GOODS AND SERVICES TAX.

Question No. 188—Mr. Milliken:

Did the government enter into a contract for the distribution of brochures on the Goods and Services Tax and, if so (a) with whom (b) what was the (i) date (ii) money value (iii) term of the contract (c) what was the responsibility of the contractor to pick up remaining brochures (d) was the contractor paid an additional sum to collect the brochures after October 10, 1989?

Hon. Michael Holcombe Wilson (Minister of Finance): (a) The Department of Finance entered into a contract with Infocentre Network on August 15, 1989 to distribute brochures on the proposed Goods and Services Tax.

(b) (i) The duration of the contract was from August 15, 1989 to October 9, 1989. At that time, the distributor offered to extend the contract for a two week period—a regular practice in the distribution industry.

(ii) The amount of the contract was $146,749.00.

(iii) see (i)

(c) The contractor was instructed to remove all existing brochures from its information centres beginning October 12, 1989.

(d) The contractor was not paid an additional sum to collect the brochures after October 10, 1989.

CANDU OR SLOWPOKE REACTORS

Question No. 189—Mr. Blaikie:

Does Atomic Energy of Canada Limited have a marketing plan which would include the sale of CANDU or Slowpoke reactors to Guatemala, Brazil or Colombia and, if so, have any formal or informal negotiations taken place between government officials and officials from these countries on the sale of such equipment?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows:

AECL has no plan to sell a CANDU or a SLOWPOKE to Guatemala, Brazil or Colombia. However, in the past, AECL has had discussions with Colombian nuclear authorities regarding the possible sale of a MAPLE X research reactor.

VERIFICATION AUDITS IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Question No. 202—Mr. Manley:

Since January 1, 1989, have verification audits been carried out regarding certificates of origin, in accordance with the Free Trade Agreement, by (a) Canadian officials in the United States (b) United States officials in Canada and, if so, in each case, what number?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Since implementation of the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement (FTA) on January 1, 1989, verification visits to the other country respecting certificates of origin in accordance with the FTA have been carried out by Customs officials of both countries. During the 1989 calendar year, five such visits to business firms located in the United States were carried out by Canadian Customs officials, while two verification audits of firms located in Canada were carried out by U.S. Customs officials. As of January 5, 1990, each country's Customs administration has notified the other of an impending verification audit.

ARENA GOVERNMENT OF EL SALVADOR

Question No. 203—Ms. Hunter:

Between December 13 and 16, 1989, did the Department of External Affairs hold discussions in Ottawa with representatives of the ARENA Government of El Salvador and, if so (a) at what level

(b) what was the focus of discussion (c) on whose initiative was the meeting held?

Right Hon. Charles Joseph Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs of El Salvador Ricardo Valdivieso, had two meetings with the Department of External Affairs on December 14, 1989. The first meeting was with Mr. Chrétien, Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. This was followed by a meeting between Mr. Valdivieso, his delegation of business and labour leaders and the Director General, Director and officer responsible for El Salvador in the Caribbean and Central America Bureau. These meetings were at the request of the government of El Salvador. The discussions centred on the situation in El Salvador, with particular reference to the recent hostilities. The human rights situation was discussed in some detail, as well as the prospects for negotiations and peace.

ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT ASSESSMENT ON THE EFFECT OF LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Question No. 204—Ms. Hunter:

Has the government undertaken an Environmental Impact Assessment on the effect of low-level flights brought about by deregulation of the airline industry on the bald eagle habitat of the Gulf Islands between Vancouver and Victoria, British Columbia and, if not, does the government plan such a study in the near future?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Environment Canada surveys in 1987 indicate that Bald Eagle populations in the Gulf Islands of British Columbia have increased approximately 30 per cent over an 11-year period. Populations in the adjacent San Juan Islands, Washington, have also increased.

Although no direct studies have been conducted, casual field observations indicate that normal, routine commercial airline activity does not visibly harrass nesting or feeding eagles. No further studies of eagle populations in the Gulf Islands are planned.

CN BY-RAIL VEHICLE INVOLVED IN A LANDSLIDE

Question No. 207—Mr. Saint-Julien:

On or about August 2, 1989, was a CN by-rail vehicle involved in a landslide at mileage point 106.2 of the Franquet-Chapais subdivision in Abitibi and, if so (a) what were the causes of the accident (b) what was the amount of damage to the vehicle (c) what was the cost of recovering the vehicle and of all expenses related to the accident (d) what was the cost of overtime paid to CN employees (e) when was the President of Canadian National informed of the circumstances of the accident?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): The Management of the Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

(a) Cause of the accident has been identified as human error.

(b) $7,601.81.

(c) and (d) The vehicle was retrieved by employees using CN equipment for one day, that was available at the site, including: a five-ton truck; a trailer; and an all terrain caterpillar-type tractor (muskeg). No overtime was required.

(e) The President of CN is informed promptly about all significant operating irregularities on the railway. Incidents of the kind addressed by this question are handled at the regional level. In view of the media interest in this particular incident, the President of CN was informed about it on August 4, 1989.

[English]

Mrs. Browes: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 18 minutes beginning at one o'clock.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should move to complete the national park system (land and marine) by the year 2000 and should implement the recommendation of the World Commission on Environment and Development (Brundtland Report) that Canada protect at least 12 per cent of land and marine zones.

He said: Madam Speaker, this is the first time in Canadian history that this House has taken the opportunity to debate and vote on the completion of our national parks system and also vote on the international scientific consensus obtained by the World Commission on Environment and Development, more commonly known as the Brundtland Commission, to set aside 12 per cent of land and marine zones with full protection.

Our national park system is only one-half complete after more than a century of considerations in the provinces and territories. Only 21 of the 39 natural bio-regions of Canada have any kind of representation and only two of the 29 natural marine bio-regions have any form of protection at all.

Most members of this House know that the first national park in Canada was created in Banff in 1885, over a century ago. Members are likely aware of where the 12 per cent proposal for land set aside has come from. I will spend some time this morning dealing specifically with why we have to get to at least that minimum figure of 12 per cent.

We must focus on system preservation and linkage of areas for the protection of species when we are talking about the 12 per cent. Areas must be linked whether we are talking about the flight paths of the whooping crane or other migratory birds or many land mammals. Many plant species require that kind of system linkage for their proper protection.

When we speak in this Chamber today and when we take the recorded vote on Monday, we are speaking for all of those in Canada who have no voice. I speak not only of some of the very young in this country and some of those who are unborn, but we must also realize that we speak for those many species that have no voice and yet suffer drastic harm and in many cases extinction at the hands of our species.

We need to keep in mind in this debate that 40,000 children will die today of malnutrition and disease. As the Brundtland Commission so accurately and carefully pointed out, one of the most fundamental building stones that we have to set aside on this planet are these set aside zones of 12 per cent of land and marine zones for a better understanding of this remarkable living planet.

Some 20,000 species will disappear this year, most of them in tropical areas. Some 80 per cent of our bio-diversity on this planet is in tropical areas. As I will point out in my remarks this morning a considerable number of species have become extinct, at our hands, in this country even during this century.

Between 1885 and 1929 Canada established 15 national parks at a rate of one park every three years. Sadly, in the next 20 years, only four parks were created. We have been in a bit of a stall in the years ever since; only 34 national parks have been created since 1885.

In 1989 the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources, more commonly known as the IUCN, identified only 3,500 protected areas around the world in 125 countries. I will also spend some time on why we need to complete the national parks system and to set aside the 12 per cent.

Canadians are light years ahead of the majority view which I believe is still held in this Chamber, although perhaps the vote on Monday will be a resonating, positive yes. In the most recent complete Gallup poll, the 1987 poll, extensive questions were put to the Canadian public, and 96 per cent of Canadians support strong government action to protect wilderness. In 1987 Canadians spent $5.1 billion on wildlife related activities, and existing national parks contributed $900 million to the Gross National Product and supported 34,000 person-years of employment.

It is important to note where Canada's national parks are. Let me refer to the rather excellent book called Endangered Spaces. In British Columbia there are 6,300 square kilometres of national parks, and those are six parks. In Alberta there are 54,000 square kilometres with 4.8 parks. The reason it is a broken number is that part of Wood Buffalo National Park lies in the Northwest Territories. There is also a transboundary park with British Columbia.

In Saskatchewan there are 4,700 square kilometres which make up two national parks, and in Manitoba there are almost 3,000 square kilometres with only one national park.

In Ontario there are 2,000 square kilometres with five small national parks, and in Quebec there are only 935 square kilometres with three national parks. In New Brunswick there are 445 square kilometres with two national parks. There are 1,300 square kilometres in Nova Scotia with two national parks, and in Prince Edward Island there are only 26 square kilometres and one national park.

In Newfoundland there are 2,300 square kilometres and two national parks. In Yukon there are 32,000 square kilometres with two national parks. The Northwest Territories has 3.2 national parks with 74,000 square kilometres, again that is Wood Buffalo included. In all Canada there are only 182,000 square kilometres in our 34 national parks. If we look at the add ons in provincial and territorial parks, there are 1,160 of those parks comprising 138,000 square kilometres.

Interestingly enough, in all of our great country, in terms of wilderness areas, there are only 43 comprising 8,680 square kilometres. We still have no national sanctuaries for grizzly bears, for cougars, or for a lot of the large carnivores. We have no natural sanctuary set aside for many of raptors. As many members of this House would know, some of our most remarkable species, such as some of our falcons, have become extinct at the hands of DDT and other perhaps unintended efforts of mankind.

• (1200)

In terms of areas of provinces and territories, the total in Canada is 9,922,000 square kilometres so the total area protected is 6.3 per cent of our country. But if you look at the total area of reserves with no logging, mining, or hunting it drops precipitously to 254,000 square kilometers, only 2.6 per cent of Canada.

That is really what this debate is all about. As I said earlier, the international scientific consensus is that we are still going to continue to lose thousands, if not tens of thousands, of species per year until we take this kind of collective planetary action.

The debate here today has to be about what has been recommended by scientists to government, that if we do not take the opportunity to complete our national parks system by the year 2000 we will have foregone the opportunity.

And on the issue of 12 per cent, there is increasing and growing pressure coming from mining companies, logging companies and from other resource extraction interests to try to make sure that there are no further parks; national, provincial, territorial, or ecological reserves, yet 96 per cent of Canadians want serious action taken. As you will find from my remarks this morning, many of these national parks and ecological systems can be obtained at almost no cost. It requires government leadership and some durability of will. It does not require a lot of money.

Let me quote for a moment from Our Common Future, the famous Brundtland report, the World Commission on Environmental Development. From chapter 6 called "Species and Ecosystems: Resources for Development" we find:

> 1. Conservation of living natural resources—plants, animals and micro-organisms and the non-living elements of the environment on which they depend—is crucial for development. Today, the conservation of wild living resources is on the agenda of governments; nearly 4 per cent of Earth's land area is managed explicitly to conserve species and ecosystems, and all but a small handful of countries have national parks. The challenge facing nations today is no longer deciding whether conservation is a good idea, but rather how it can be implemented in the national interest and within the means available in each country.
> 2. Species and their genetic materials promise to play an expanding role in development, and a powerful economic rationale is emerging to bolster the ethical, aesthetic, and scientific cases for preserving them. The genetic variability and germplasm material of species make contributions to agriculture, medicine, and industry worth many billions of dollars per year.
>
> 3. Yet scientists have intensively investigated only one in every 100 of Earth's plant species, and a far smaller proportion of animal species. If nations can ensure the survival of species, the world can look forward to new and improved foods, new drugs and medicines, and new raw materials for industry. This—the scope for species to make a fast-growing contribution to human welfare in myriad forms—is a major justification for expanded efforts to safeguard Earth's millions of species.
> 4. Equallly important are the vital life processes carried out by nature, including stabilization of climate, protection of watersheds and soil, preservation of nurseries and breeding grounds, and so on. Conserving these processes cannot be divorced from conserving the individual species within natural ecosystems. Managing species and ecosystems together is clearly the most rational way to approach the problem. Numerous examples of workable solutions to local problems are available.

As I am often reminded, some of the poorest countries on the globe are light years ahead of Canada. We have 2.6 per cent of our land protected seriously as wilderness. Tanzania, which is a poor country, has 17 per cent of its land set aside and, of course, a great deal of the pressure that has been exerted for that has come from communities such as Canada.

There is a new approach called "anticipate and prevent". The historical approach of establishing national parks that are somehow isolated from the greater society has been overtaken by a new approach to conservation of species and ecosystems that can be characterized as "anticipate and prevent". This involves adding a new dimension to the now traditional and yet viable and necessary step of protected areas. Development patterns must be altered to make them more compatible with the preservation of the extremely valuable biological diversity of the planet. Altering economic and land use patterns seems to be the best long-term approach to ensuring the survival of wild species and their ecosystems.

Third World governments can stem the destruction of tropical forests and other reservoirs of biological diversity while achieving economic goals. They can conserve valuable species and habitat while reducing their economic and fiscal burdens. Reforming forest revenue systems and concession terms could raise billions of dollars of additional revenue, promote more efficient long-term forest resource use and curtail deforestation. Governments could save themselves enormous expense and revenue loss, promote more sustainable land uses and slow down the destruction of tropical forests by eliminating incentives for livestock ranching.

We know all of that, Madam Speaker. Many of us in this country are fighting hard to try to protect the tropical rain forests which are disappearing at the rate of one acre every second. As David Suzuki said to our caucus last weekend, if a creature had come from outer space and was stomping its way across Brazil and the tropical rain forests of this globe, humanity as a whole would unite to try to stop that monster from destroying our globe at a rate of one acre per second in the areas that have the greatest degree of biological diversity that there has ever been on the planet in those small and localized zones. So much is to be done there, and there are recommendations here about what to do.

But let us look at our own temperate rain forests of British Columbia, 80 per cent of which are gone. This is the old growth on the coast of British Columbia. There must be more national parks. Part of those areas, part of the 12 per cent solution of land and marine areas, has to include temperate rain forests which have the same carbon fixing capacity as do tropical rain forests. A third of the forests of Alberta are about to be put before the saws of international power brokers.

We already know that in this country we could save 80 million trees a year by simply having the same recycling requirements as the state of California. That is a third of the cut of the province of British Columbia. That is all of the cut of the province of Ontario. The same people who are being laid off at pulp mills now could be working in recycling plants. Yet no one wants to bring in a regulation mandating, absolutely requiring, recycling in this country so that we can protect lands and put them into the kinds of systems that I am talking about in terms of the 12 per cent solution and national parks.

We were fortunate in that the world commission had one of Canada's greatest minds working with it, Jim McNeil, who was the secretary general. In the concluding remarks in the section, "The Need for Action", where he talks about the number of conservation organizations and members around the world, he says the following:

> All of these indicate that the public puts a value on nature that is beyond the normal economic imperatives.
> In response to this popular concern, governments have been moving to help species threatened within their borders, primarily through the establishment of additional protected areas. Today, the worldwide network of protected areas totals more than 4 million square kilometres, roughly equivalent to the size of most of the countries of Western Europe combined, or twice the size of Indonesia. In terms of continental coverage, protected areas in Europe (outside the USSR) amounted by 1985 to 3.9 per cent of territory; in the USSR to 2.5 per cent; in North America to 8.1 per cent; in South America to 6.1 per cent; in Africa to 6.5 per cent; and in Asia (outside the USSR) and Australia to 4.3 per cent each.
> Since 1970, the networks have expanded in extent by more than 80 per cent, around two-thirds of which are in the Third World. But a great deal more remains to be done. A consensus of professional opinion suggests that the total expanse of protected areas needs to be at least tripled if it is to constitute a representative sample of earth's ecosystems.
> There is still time to save species and their ecosystems. It is an indispensable prerequisite for sustainable development. Our failure to do so will not be forgiven by future generations.

There can be no more telling phrase than that. Let me repeat it:

There is still time to save species and their ecosystems. It is an indispensable prerequisite for sustainable development. Our failure to do so will not be forgiven by future generations.

There is time to act and the costs are not great. I believe very recently was the anniversary of the minister taking on the most important portfolio in the country. Shortly after he assumed his portfolio some recommendations were given to him by the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee, the Canadian Nature Federation, the Canadian Parks and Wilderness Society, the Canadian Wildlife Federation, Ducks Unlimited, the Nature Conservancy of Canada, Wildlife Habitat Canada and World Wildlife Fund Canada. They are brief but I think they are very important to have on the record.

They said:

Despite substantial contributions by many government agencies over the past 100 years, the national network of protected areas is half finished at best. Canada has dedicated 6.3 per cent of the landscape to parks, wildlife areas and other nature reserves but only one-third of this is closed to resource exploitation. This is well short of the 12 per cent recommended by the Brundtland Commission. Only 21 of 39 terrestrial natural regions are represented by national parks and 3 of 29 marine natural regions are represented by marine national parks. Of 136 "Special Areas" identified in 1982 by Environment Canada as deserving protection in Canada's north, only 19 have been acted on. Only eight provinces or territories have park system plans to guide their contribution to the national network, and only four of these jurisdictions are more than halfway toward achieving their own park system goals. Canada is in danger of being identified as the "emperor with no clothes" by the international conservation community, especially given our opportunity as one of the last nations on earth with significant remaining wilderness.

I must interject at this point to remind members of the House, as David Suzuki reminded us a few days ago, that if we do not take action in this decade, in the year 2020 there will be no significant wilderness area left on the face of the earth. That is within the lifetimes of most of us sitting in this Chamber.

Canadians overwhelmingly support government leadership to get the job done. For example, a 1987 Gallup poll revealed that 96 per cent support government expenditures for wilderness protection and a 1981 Statistics Canada survey showed that Canadians spent $4.2 billion on wildlife related activities during 1980 alone.

And that has continued to skyrocket upwards. Nine out of ten Canadians make some use of wilderness during each year for spiritual and other purposes.

This broad support also manifests itself through focused public concern about specific sites such as South Moresby, the Saguenay Fjord and Toronto's Rouge River Valley.

By the reckoning of experts worldwide, the opportunity to complete the national network in Canada will all but vanish by the year 2000 as development and land use commitments overtake our last frontiers. This concern was emphasized by the Task Force on National Park Establishment in its 1987 report to the federal Environment Minister entitled Parks 2000.

Establishing protected areas need not be an expensive undertaking, especially if the goal is to reserve lands and waters primarily on Crown land over the next 10 years, leaving any "development" of services for the future. The important thing is to state clearly the conservation destiny of such lands and waters without further delay.

I know that I am running out of time, Madam Speaker. There are many more things I would like to touch on. Let me just conclude by saying how important I, personally, and I think all Canadians, take the vote that will occur at six o'clock on Monday. The completion of the national park system is possible. It is an objective that we must move toward. Setting aside 12 per cent of Canada requires the leadership of the federal government with the provinces, with the territories, with first nations, with conservation groups, with all Canadians of good will who want to see the ecosystems and species of this part of our planet fully protected for future generations.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions or comments. The Hon. Member for Scarborough Centre.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There were discussions held earlier and I believe there is unanimous agreement in the House to hear the minister who has kindly stayed to participate in this important debate. He has another unbreakable commitment. If we could, perhaps sometime later at the convenience of the Chair have my ten-minute question period that would allow the minister to speak.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, we on this side of the House have agreed to that arrangement.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): If there is unanimous consent we will come back to the period for questions and comments later on.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, first of all I would like to sincerely thank my colleagues who have agreed to make this arrangement to allow me to participate in this very important debate.

Let me say that I agree in substance and merit with most of what has been said by the member. There are a few nuances to add and I would like to do so later on during my short speech. I would like to reserve most of my time for a question and answer period.

When I became the environment minister I was, of course, very much impressed by the importance of the burden of the portfolio. The more I studied the files and programs the more I could see that this is certainly one of the most important political challenges in the years ahead for all of us. There are days when there are negative feelings because it is very frustrating to be a minister, especially of the environment. We are squeezed between the high expectations of people and the government restraint placed on expenditures during a very difficult period.

One of the areas of the department which always gives me a lift is the parks system. The national parks, Parks Canada, are beautiful and Parks Canada is such a success that it is always encouraging for me to work in my department. When I experience a downfall I ask for Parks Canada people to come into my office and work on their programs and projects. Parks Canada is one of the country's greatest successes and is recognized all over the world. People should realize that our parks are not only beautiful for us but is an object of envy all over the world.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, Parks Canada is an agency from which we ought to draw inspiration when establishing our country's future environmental policy. During the few years since the Brundtland Report was made public a good many people have spoken with deep conviction—and they have my full support—of the new concept of sustainable development which was coined to describe our common effort to reconcile environmental and economic priorities. Sustainable development is indeed a major concept. Madam Speaker, let me tell you that primarily through Parks Canada programs our country has now been fractising sustainable development for nearly a century, without realizing it, as did Mr. Jourdain when he wrote prose. One hundred years ago, we Canadians came to the conclusion that natural expanses must be preserved, not only because they are truly magnificient but also because there is a cause-and-effect relation between our future action in that field and the environmental benefits we stand to reap. For example, a number of years ago in Canada we had to come to grips with the ever present ecological problem created by economic development and tourism development and environmental protection. We Canadians, particularly those who work for Parks Canada, have known for quite some time that we must keep unsoiled the extraordinary wealth which we have chosen as sites for public parks and which will be our legagy to future generations. Yet at the same time the present generation should be able to enjoy all this. So how do we proceed? Because today's generation is ever more concerned over economic issues, development, jobs, as well as ready and practically unlimited access to our parks, we are faced with a conflict which must be resolved. Our policy in Canada is to go ahead and develop our parks, in so far as this will create jobs and attract tourists, of course, but never to the detriment of future generations.

So we did practice sustainable development even before these words gained widespread currency, and we can indeed stand proud of this achievement.

• (1220)

That being said, after these self-congratulatory and indeed quite legitimate comments, we must realize, as the hon. member pointed out, that it is absolutely vital to determine what remains to be done, and a great deal remains to be done! The regions, for instance. Canada has 39 different bio-regions. This is a measure of the tremendously diverse resources of this country, with 39 different types of bio-regions within its borders. We should be able to establish parks representing each of these bio-regions.

Today, after 100 years and some of the most successful efforts the world has known in this area, only 21 bio-regions are represented in the 24 national parks that exist today, but we have 39 bio-regions. This means that we must create 18 new parks. We now have to decide whether we have the political will and the budgetary commitment to complete the network.

Why the rush? I agree with the previous speaker that we must set a date. We cannot put off doing so indefinitely. The situation is changing so rapidly that we will never be able to reach our goal of 39 bio-regions if we let development gradually encroach on areas that are as yet unprotected. We can defend regions that are already protected, parks that already exist, but we can do very little to defend areas where we could and should create parks and which today are very attractive to economic development.

What we must do is freeze the resources and the natural wealth of Canadian parks and make a commitment, as a government and as a country, to complete our network of parks by the year 2000. I have made this commitment, and I can inform the House that this is what the government is now working on. In my own department it is a top priority. In cabinet, it is among our three most important issues. I am referring to an environmental action plan for the next five years that will lead the way to implementing sustainable development throughout the country. One of the major components of this action plan will be to implement our commitment to complete the network by the year 2000.

Before answering any questions, I would like to say a few words about an additional commitment we have been asked to make, and that is to set aside, specifically, formally and mathematically, 12 per cent of Canada's territory for parks. This figure is taken from the Brundtland report.

I would like to point out to the House, Madam Speaker, that it is a general proposal that is in no way particularly intended for Canada and the proposal in the Brundtland Report makes no distinction between very small countries which are completely developed and where the very scarce green spaces which are in danger must be preserved immediately and a big country like ours where we have wide open spaces.

So is the 12 per cent rule binding on Canada? No, Madam Speaker! I do not know what the exact percentage is. For example, I do not know what standards my colleague is using when he says that 12 per cent of Canada's green spaces must be saved. Why 12 per cent? Why not 14 per cent? Why not 8 per cent? Why not 9 per cent? We have 6 per cent now. Six per cent of Canada is already more than many countries in the whole world.

Must we do more? I think so. I think that we should increase the percentage. But the important thing for me is first and foremost to create parks where they need to be created, to complete the system in the 39 ecological regions of the country. What percentage will this give us? We will find out as we go along. But I do not think it would be wise to set a figure like 12 per cent—that would lack the required flexibility.

Protecting the environment is not a bureaucratic operation. Completing Canada's parks system is not an accounting procedure. I think we have to be careful there! As far as I am concerned, of course, I cannot vote for the motion. It is a problem of form, which I regret, but we live in a parliamentary system. We perceive this motion as requiring a no-confidence vote. I will not vote no confidence in the government. But the basic principles contained in the motion seem perfectly acceptable to me, with the exception of the 12 per cent criterion. I think this percentage is quite debatable.

[English]

Mr. Fulton Madam Speaker, the minister seems to have confused part of my remarks. I think he understands very well where the figure 12 per cent came from. I quoted from the Brundtland Commission report. The members of the commission solicited material from biologists and others from around the world as they were travelling on the minimum level required to maintain at least a reasonable degree of biodiversity on earth. Twelve per cent was an internationally arrived upon consensus figure, that being the minimum. If we can get beyond that that is great.

I, for one, do not understand the rationale behind the minister's remarks about Canada having 6 per cent set aside in all of the possible park protection statuses that there are in this country. As I pointed out, the study done by the World Wildlife Fund concluded that only 2.6 per cent of Canada is actually really protected. Mining, logging and all kinds of other activities are allowed in that other 4 per cent, which is principally made up of provincial parks and others.

I have two questions. At the Toronto Conference it was decided to reduce carbon dioxide by 20 per cent by the year 2005. That was arrived at by consensus. In the Brundtland report 12 per cent has been arrived at by consensus. Canada is somewhere between 2 per cent and 6 per cent now and we need to get to 12 per cent or more.

Does the minister not think that it requires the leadership of the federal government to get there? We can see that for some provinces it is no longer possible. In P.E.I., New Brunswick and Nova Scotia it is very difficult to set aside the kinds of areas that are required for biodiversity. That is possible in many other areas of the country, but it requires federal leadership.

Some provinces have done nothing even on park planning for two decades. They are basically shell departments. There is nothing going on there. I plead with the minister to agree that we do need to target what the international scientific community suggests, the 12 per cent or more; not less, because we are a big country. More because we, in fact, can achieve it.

Can the minister confirm to the House that there will be targets and timetables for the completion of the national parks system by the year 2000? I think Canadians are of enormous conviction and support for all members of this House to get on with this. We have to fight the pressures of the developers to set aside these lands, no doubt about it. But that is our responsibility, not just to the present generation. We are the last generation that has the choice and I think the choice has to be to opt to complete the national parks system and to go to the 12 per cent.

I thought under parliamentary reform that a vote such as this was not a challenge to the government, that that was the whole purpose by which James McGrath conducted the hearings that he did. It is not a confidence vote. I am confident that between now and Monday night Canadians, by the tens of thousands, will be phoning members of parliament of all all parties trying to persuade them to vote in favour of this motion, the first vote that has been taken in the history of this country, on 12 per cent and completion of the national parks system. Could the minister respond on the 12 per cent, on the targets and timetables?

I must say I am dismally saddened by the minister's earlier remarks that he considers this to be a matter of confidence and that even though he supports the motion he could not himself vote for it, because if the minister votes against it, I am confident many government members will follow his lead and vote against something that is in the national interest.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, I would like to say a few words on the first question about the 12 per cent target. I will not commit myself and this government to the 12 per cent target right now because the main commitment is related to the completion of the network in terms of the 18 additional parks we have to create in Canada. This must be done before the year 2000.

The answer to the second question is, yes, there is a commitment from this government to complete the network by the year 2000. This means the creation of 18 additional new parks all over Canada. There is an additional commitment, while not so specific in terms of the number of parks, to the creation of a network of marine parks. We have many, many natural marine regions to protect in Canada and we are now in the process of conducting very intensive negotiations with the Quebec government to create a park at the mouth of the Saguenay River.

It is a very difficult negotiation because it must be completed outside the general pattern of the creation of parks because, as you know, the Quebec government is refusing to transfer ownership of the land to the federal government. We have to create new concepts with respect to the law so we will have what we need, which is a marine park. There will be many other parks before the year 2000.

I do not think that we can make a commitment to create all the parks required to represent the totality of the ecological regions of Canada as far as marine parks are concerned, because we do not know exactly how many regions there will be. It is a huge task to complete the networks of terrestrial parks, to create 18 new terrestrial parks, and at the same time, to create an unknown number of marine parks, when we do not know exactly the kind of pattern we would use.

Yes, there is a commitment for the completion of the parks system by the year 2000 with the establishment of 18 additional parks. We will make a clear and precise commitment in the action plan for the next five years. I intend to propose to my colleagues that we make a commitment for five new parks during the next five years.

Five parks are under immediate consideration. The east arm of Great Slave Lake, Northwest Territories is now being actively negotiated within the Dene-Métis land claim settlement process. Also, we have Northern Banks Island in the Northwest Territories. Consultations with the community of Sachs Harbour and the government of the Northwest Territories have recently been reactivated.

There is also Blue Nose Lake in the Northwest Territories. Consultations with the community of Paulatuk, the Wildlife Management Advisory Committee and the government of the Northwest Territories began in 1989. There is also North Baffin Island in the Northwest Territories. Consultations have been under way for the past couple of years, focusing primarily on the local communities of Pond Inlet and Arctic Bay.

The Manitoba Churchill Park working group, comprised of federal and provincial officials and local people, has been set up to examine the feasibility of establishing a park in this area. This is where most of the polar bears live and breed in Canada. I have been in touch with my counterparts about this. Those are the five parks.

I do not commit myself that these will be the first five in the actual plan, but they are certainly under consideration. Those are northern parks, and we have to do a lot more in the north. The north and the Arctic are really threatened. They are very vulnerable. We must step in and create parks there as soon as we can. I would like to stress the priority of this program.

Just as a resumé, on the 12 per cent of parks, I do not want to be misunderstood. There is no precise or formal commitment by the government to the figure of 12 per cent. Of course, the current percentage of 6 per cent will be increased when we create 18 new national parks and more marine parks, but to what percentage, I do not know exactly. We will see that as the program is developed.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, I would like to offer the minister an opportunity to explain to Canadians why he can endorse and support the Brundtland report in its totality and then refrain from supporting and endorsing one of its clear recommendations which is the subject of the debate today. How can he do that?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): The Bruntland report covers many issues and a high number of recommendations, as we all know. It has changed the environmental landscape of the world. This report is very important. I do not want to minimize or underestimate the importance of the Brundtland report.

But this debate is about the same issues, as our colleague has just mentioned, as the proposal made by the Toronto conference on climate change a few years ago when they proposed a reduction of 20 per cent in the CO_2 emissions by the year 2000. No country has, until today, made a commitment on this. I know that we will all have to make commitments when the International Climate Board files its own report later this year, probably in the fall.

It could be that some countries will make a commitment for higher reductions. Some will make a commitment for fewer reductions. For example, the French government will be in a position to make a very strong commitment for a very high reduction of CO_2 emissions. Why? Because in France there is a specific situation. They rely heavily on nuclear energy and nuclear energy does not issue CO_2 gas. In Canada, the United States, China and many other countries, it will be difficult to make a reduction of more than 20 per cent. So there are distinct and specific situations prevailing in different countries.

The Brundtland Commission was an international commission and they proposed and set a target for the whole world. We will try to do our best. In Canada in terms of absolute figures and absolute dimensions of land devoted to parks we stand as one of the best in the world, because 6 per cent of Canada is a lot more than 50 per cent of Switzerland. There is quite a difference. These things must be approached with flexibility and without losing contact with reality.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for question and comment has now expired.

Before we proceed on debate with the hon. member for Davenport, I think we should revert to the question and comment period which was to follow the speech of the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Skeena in a very good presentation made a reference to the 39 bioregions in Canada which have been identified as needing to be protected. I am wondering whether he can relate that to the decision two days ago by Toronto City Council to adopt the year 2000 as the target year for reducing emissions of carbon by 20 per cent. The Toronto City Council committed itself, according to the report, to achieving a 20 per cent reduction of the 1990 levels of carbon gas emissions into the city's atmosphere by the year 2000.

It also agreed in principle to put $22 million from the proceeds of the sale of its Langstaff farm property into an atmospheric fund for initiatives such as reforestation in Ontario and outside Canada. My question to the hon. member is, do his bioregions, by any chance, include areas in southern Ontario which would be appropriate for this reforestation project proposed by Toronto City Council?

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I have followed with great interest what has been going on in the city of Toronto through its city council. I think their ideas of reduction of pollutants, which requires some co-operation with the federal government in terms of, for example, emission regulations on motor vehicles. They have gone far beyond that in terms of parking and additional licensing fees and so on, some ideas which have been adopted out of cities that suffer really serious atmospheric problems, such as the city of Los Angeles or Mexico City.

The idea that I particularly like in their proposal in terms of the recycling of carbon emissions is that of making use of the sale of, I believe, a piece of property and taking that $20 million plus and using it for the replanting of trees, not only within the city of Toronto and its environs, but also in other areas of the world.

We in this House all know that there are areas in Central America and other tropical areas where there are sites where much more significant growth rates are possible, and in terms of carbon fixing, that is one of the reasons why tropical forests are so important. Their capacity to rapidly recycle and to fix carbon dioxide through the carbon cycle is much greater than in our northern forests and even some of our temperate forests which only have a few months of the year to grow.

Let me just touch one more moment on the replanting part of that cycle which I think is very important. The Government of Australia announced earlier this week a plan to plant a billion trees between now and the year 2000. This is really a remarkably important proposal because of the significant areas of Australia that have been deforested and the capacity of that number of trees to fix carbon.

There are 39 bioregions in the country in the area known as the Canadian Shield which is perhaps an area that Toronto city council could look at. There are 11 of Canada's 39 bioregions and I think the Canadian Forest Service might be best to advise us which would be best. They are the Tundra Hills, the Central Tundra Region, the Northwestern Boreal Uplands, the Central Boreal Uplands, the West Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Precambrian Region, the Central Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Precambrian Region and the East Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Precambrian Region, the Laurentian Boreal Highlands, the East Coast Boreal Region, the Boreal Lake Plateau, the Whale River Region, the Northern Labrador Mountains, the Ungava Tundra Plateau, and the Northern Davis Region as well as the St. Lawrence Lowlands. I think that gives the members some idea of the vast geography, the vast size of these 39 Canadian bioregions and, of course, there are indigenous species of conifers and hardwoods that might be best planted in each of those locales.

Certainly the kind of leadership being shown by the city of Toronto is something that perhaps should be ruminated on somewhat more in this chamber. I find it quite disturbing to have heard the arguments of the Minister of the Environment as to why he is suggesting the completion of the national park system and the setting aside of the designation of 12 per cent of Canada's lands for full protection is somehow a challenge or a non-confidence kind of a motion to the government. I stand to be corrected by the Table and by the Speaker, but it is very important that we know before the end of today that my understanding of votable opposition days is that they are not to be considered as non-confidence motions in the government, that members are free to vote of their own conscience and so they should.

Perhaps, Madam Speaker, you could remark on this point sometime during the day because I think Canadians would like to know whether or not that is the case. I know there are many Conservative members, some of whom are here in the House who have already spoken to me and told me that they would like to support this motion.

Mr. Fisher: Madam Speaker, I would like to commend the member for Skeena for leading off the debate today and doing it in one of the grandest styles that could possibly be attributed to a friend of the environment.

I would like to commend him also for pointing out that the Ministry of the Environment is perhaps one of the most important ministries in the government. Another very important ministry in the government is that of the Prime Minister and it seems to me, and I would like to ask the member if he could refresh the House's memory on something the Prime Minister had said in relation to the Brundtland report. My faint recollection is that he had commended it very highly and had pointed out to the House that Madam Brundtland herself had commended him for his support of it. Could you expand on that?

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I think it is an important point. It was raised by the member for Davenport with the minister a little bit earlier, but in relation to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, on behalf of Canada, did endorse the recommendations of the Brundtland report, the World Commission on Environment and Development, at the United Nations and received a resounding round of applause that rang around the world for doing so.

An hon. member: And received an award for it.

Mr. Fulton: That is right. He received an award and has spoken of the glowing terms in which he has been described by former Prime Minister Brundtland to the international community as a real leader on the issue of land and species preservation. I must say I find it quite shocking. The Brundtland report itself describes the requirement for the designation of 12 per cent of the land in marine zones of planet Earth as the absolute fundamental foundation of sustainable development and we have a government that is constantly espousing sustainable development.

If the actual locus building block is the setting aside of 12 per cent and the Prime Minister has endorsed it before the only formal international body that we know, which is the United Nations, and been given accolades from around the world for endorsing those recommendations, we cannot suddenly find the government ejecting the core recommendation of the royal commission and saying, "Well, we like everything else but the core recommendation", I think it would be hypocrisy of the very highest order.

I would hope that members on the government side think very carefully about the importance of the signal that is given to Canadians and the corporate community in this country and to the world, that we are dead serious about completing our national park system and not just the five north of 60 between now and the year 2000 but that we are going to complete in all the 18 bioregions and that might mean far more than 18 national parks.

Mrs. Browes: Madam Speaker, just to remind the member, without throwing too many accolades to the city of Toronto council, I would just like to remind the member that the metropolitan Toronto council recently voted to put garbage in the most sensitive area in metro Toronto and probably in Ontario, that is the Rouge Valley. There are other levels of government that have a lot of work to do on this.

First, I would like to compliment him on his interest in this and also the minister who responded in such enthusiastic terms of his commitment to the park system. Just a few years ago there was a task force report called Our Parks, Vision for the 21st Century, headed by Doctor Theberge. In those recommendations he talked about some new concepts of preserving significant pieces of property, the geography of Canada in terms of partnership.

I would like to ask the member to comment on this new concept, whether it is urban ecological reserves or whether it is Canadian heritage parks, but a new partnership, that we may have between levels of government dealing with preserving special pieces of property.

Mr. Fulton: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for the question because it is a very important one. There are individuals, groups, municipalities, and people all over this country and all over the world who are looking for the most proactive and most effective way of setting aside areas that are of enormous importance, either to them locally or to the world. I think there are all kinds of opportunities for partnerships. But let me start with what I would describe as the top end of the question or of the issue, the setting aside the 12 per cent of land and marine areas. The federal governments of every state around the world must take on the leadership in that role. They may not be the one who set aside the majority of that 12 per cent, but they must be the leaders because they have the majority of jurisdiction and tools in most areas around the world.

In terms of completing the national parks system, I am not one who believes in the philosophy that was espoused by Madam Blais-Grenier while she was here, which is that private Canadian citizens should be responsible for going out and fund-raising and for buying the land to create our national park system. I think that was a terribly unfortunate proposal. In terms of small ecological proposals, local and municipal, I think there are opportunities for individuals, clubs and groups to participate in buying the lands and resources—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, we on this side of the House want to congratulate the member for Skeena for his motion. We support it, of course, from this side of the House. At the same time, I cannot help expressing a sense of being stunned, shocked or dismayed by the weakness of the minister's speech today and his reluctance to give a commitment to a motion which is put forward in an honest manner which asks for a commitment by the government to move toward the year 2000 in order to complete the national park system, land and marine, and to achieve or to protect at least 12 per cent of land and the marine zones.

• (1250)

I ask myself whether the Minister of the Environment is ill-advised or is he weak or is he insecure that he cannot get up in the House today and give a more positive speech to Canadians on this matter.

What is troubling him? Is he troubled perhaps by the fact that by the year 2000 he might achieve 11.2 per cent and, therefore, be reproached for that by parliamentarians and politicians at that time? Or is he troubled by the fact that he might overshoot the target and deliver 13 per cent and he would then be embarrassed by the applause? I do not know. I am puzzled by this kind of weak attitude. Or are we facing a classic example of leadership by rhetoric, in which case the member for Skeena has placed before us a fantastic motion that is putting to the test the political will of this weak, tired, unimaginative government. Maybe that is what is happening today in this House to the embarrassment of the Tory backbenchers who themselves could not believe their ears half an hour ago when the minister was taking such a weak political stance on such a fundamental matter.

The minister and his government have endorsed the Brundtland report. The Prime Minister spoke in support of it at the United Nations in September 1988. The Prime Minister went to the Hague in March 1989 and he has again indicated the support and the endorsement of this government, the Canadian government, which includes everybody, for the Brundtland report which contains this specific proposal. Now, when it comes to the first crunch, so to speak, to the test of truth, to the litmus test perhaps, here we find the minister getting up and saying, "Well, you know, we don't want to be bound by percentages. We somehow would like to be flexible. Therefore we have to vote against this motion because it could be interpreted as a motion of non-confidence in this government." What nonsense!

The member for Skeena made it quite clear in his interventions that this is not a motion of non-confidence. The member for Skeena has made it quite clear that he is referring, in his motion, to the Brundtland report and here, all of a sudden, we have a withdrawal. I ask, where is the commitment on the government benches to the Brundtland report when it comes to cutting down CO_2 pollution? What will they say then? "Oh well, you know it is something that we cannot precisely tackle for you. It is too complex a matter." Sure it is because if they fail on a matter that is fairly straightforward as the question of achieving a certain percentage to be set aside for national parks, then we can expect attitudes like that too.

This is a political debacle for the Conservative Party to come into the House today and make a statement of such a nature which indicates that really, they support with words, with rhetoric, with declarations, particularly abroad. They are very good at that, in making grand statements. When it comes to the heart of the matter at home, then they withdraw with some kind of weak excuses. What a sham!

I am glad to say on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada that in the last election we did have a plank—and it was plank number one—a statement to the effect that we will expand, if elected to power, Canada's national park system. I am glad also to say that we did indicate directly in reply to a questionnaire that was sent to the Liberal Party of Canada during the election that we would complete this system by the year 2000. So we made, during the election, a general statement which was in the pamphlets which all of us distributed door-to-door and then a very specific statement as well by way of a communication to the Canadian Parks and Wilderness Society that we would do it by the year 2000 as recommended by the Brundtland report.

We were also the only party to recognize that, in order to achieve that goal, money must be regularly set aside. Therefore we pledged to establish a special fund, a capital development fund, which would receive an annual allocation through budgetary means and would ensure that there would be adequate funds established in order to set aside these new parks.

I am beginning to worry as to whether the Minister of the Environment today cannot give a positive answer because he is afraid of what the Minister of Finance is presently doing to budgets of this nature. He is a foreboder of bad news. Somehow the capacity to perform, on the part of the Minister of the Environment, is undermined by the budget-cutting exercise that is taking place under the direction of his colleague, the Minister of Finance. Well perhaps he should be honest and tell the House that this is why he cannot give this kind of commitment, having endorsed the Brundtland report.

We should ask ourselves why there is a rush and why, by the year 2000, because this is the heart of the motion put forward by the member for Skeena. At first sight it is hard to believe that Canada could be in danger of losing its wilderness and its wilderness heritage. It is such a heritage which is closely linked to the extent of national parks and wilderness areas that we are able to put aside. Also, we have enormous stretches of land which are unoccupied.

Appearances are deceiving. We have lost the original Atlantic hardwood forest. On the west coast only a handful of unlogged watersheds still remain. Farmlands have replaced all but .2 per cent of Manitoba's tall grass prairie land. We will never be able to have a wilderness park area, in the Canadian sense, in southern Ontario because it is too late. There is not enough wilderness left. And in Quebec, the giant James Bay II hydroelectric development project will drown a very large area forever unless this project is stopped.

Last September the World Wildlife Fund and the Canadian Parks and Wilderness Society came up with an interesting idea. They launched in Toronto—and some of my colleagues here today were present that day—an ambitious 10-year program under the title Endangered Spaces. This campaign which is now under way puts forward five good reasons why we must act in a hurry by the year 2000, as the motion tells us.

First, according to the Committee on the Status of Endangered Wildlife—and I repeat and stress the linkage between wildlife and national parks—in Canada there are 183 species that we may lose unless action is taken to protect them and their habitats. To put this in other words, to save endangered species we must save endangered spaces.

Second, if within the next 10 years, we do not make the decision of reserving natural areas, we will have lost the opportunity to do so because there is urban movement, expansion and sprawling. There are other encroaching interests on such lands. This point was made very strongly by the task force on parks establishment and it is a point that is fully accepted and endorsed by conservationists across the country.

Third, Canada is one of the few countries in the world where the opportunity of protecting wilderness, as we know it, still exists and that is why we are the envy of the world and the admiration of tourists. Anyone who speaks about Canada sooner or later will be speaking about our wildlife. We have all experienced that when we have gone abroad.

Fourth, there are already serious conflicts and even fights over what is left. For example, you have the Carmanah Valley in British Columbia, and Temagami here in Ontario. These flare-ups are telling us that so far there is no clear understanding of the significance of what we have lost and the impact in the event that additional areas may be lost in future. This is why we, who come from Metro Toronto, are having quite an intense experience in correlation with the saving of the Rouge Valley. Though it may be limited in wilderness value, nevertheless it is the last opportunity next door to a metropolitan centre. This is why we would like to see it saved by the provincial government.

There is a long list. We know that South Moresby is in the process of being saved, thanks in good part to the efforts of your colleague, the Speaker. We know there is a constant battle about the Stein Valley whose future is still uncertain. There is definitely to be added to that list the Khutzeymateen in British Columbia and the Stikine Valley. There is Manning Park in the Cascades area, also in British Columbia. There is Robson Bight, the Akamina and Kishinena area, Nimpkish Island and the Tahsish-

Kwois area, the watershed to which I have referred. Then, the Haida nation's claim on Du Guusd, which is an interesting site, Brooks Peninsula, the mid-coast, particularly Calvert, Hunter Island and Mussel and Kynoch Inlets, the Tatshenshini-Alsek area to which one might add the Kakwa scenic area in the Rocky Mountains, and finally, as far as we know at least, the Redfern Lake which is described as the Lake Louise of the north. So, we are talking of significant sites that are in this missing package which should be put aside and which we should working on in order to complete our parks system.

There is also the pressure of the marine parks system about which the present government has been strangely silent. It was a system that was launched as a concept in the early 1980s and since the Conservative Party took power we have not heard much about that potential and particular component in the totality of the plan.

The World Commission on Environment and Development recommends, of course, that all nations should try to protect at least 12 per cent of their lands and waters for ecosystem conservation. It is interesting to learn from the report entitled "Our Common Future" that some nations have already done so. For instance, Costa Rica which has already protected over 20 per cent.

At this point Canada ranks twentieth in the world in terms of protected lands as a percentage of our total land base. The total area protected by national and provincial parks in Canada adds up to about 6.3 per cent. If we subtract areas where logging, mining and hunting are permitted, that 6.3 per cent shrinks to 2.6 percent of our total land base. As you can see, we still have a long way to go.

We know Temagami and the Rouge Valley are endangered areas in Ontario. So we have some work to do, not only in British Columbia but in other parts of Canada. In the case of Temagami, it is important to know that the red and white pine forests of northeastern Ontario are anywhere between 500 to 700 years old. These pine ecosystems are some of the last of their kind in North America still in a natural state, so far undisturbed by logging and other human activities. Their cultural and emotional value is immense and unmeasurable. Dr. Peter Quinby of Sir Wilfrid Laurier University writes, and I quote:

> These old-growth pine ecosystems should be preserved for scientific study. As well, they should be protected because they maintain water quality and soil stability, they retain large amounts of nutrients, they provide valuable genetic material and they provide important wildlife habitat.

Dr. Tom Hutchison of the University of Toronto writes, and I quote:

> The global loss of old-growth forest ranks with the damage from global warming and acid rain. The long-term health of the global forest must be first addressed in our own backyard.

Time is passing and I must watch the clock in coming to a conclusion. If this government is sincere in its commitment to the Brundtland Report, the government has an opportunity to show its interest in the Temagami area. If it is involved in the Rouge River Valley, as it is setting a precedent at the present time, why not show its willingness and its propensity in the Temagami area as well? We certainly urge the Minister of State for Forestry and the Minister of the Environment to find the courage to intervene in Temagami as they did in the Rouge Valley.

We are talking about the value that the public places on nature. It is unquantifiable and yet it is very high. Not only that, but it is mounting. Evidently the lifestyle that we have adopted over decades in urban centres makes the excitement that we feel in natural parks and wilderness sites much greater than it was 50 or 100 years ago. I cannot explain this but it is a visible fact that we come across politically every day.

The public places a high value on nature. This is why we were hoping to hear a positive statement on the part of the minister on this motion. This is why we were so disappointed, stunned and shocked by the minister's reply.

It is fair to say that in the history of national parks the Conservative government has been quite good at finishing Liberal initiatives but poor at initiating new sites. The previous minister completed several national park negotiations, but he left the cupboard bare for his successor. In other words, he finished the Liberal agenda. Now we want to see progress that is under the auspices and initiated by the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada. We have not seen any progress on Mingan National Park. Actually, it has been put aside. We have not heard of any progress on the Saguenay Marine Park. We have not heard anything on the general concept of marine parks in general for a long time. What is happening? We do not know. I can tell you in conclusion that the speech today by the minister is troubling us as to the future and what Canada is in for by the year 2000 in not finding it possible to endorse such a recommendation in the Brundtland Report.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Davenport on his speech. I know his commitment over many years to questions on the environment even before he became a Member of Parliament is very firm and sincere. I would ask him if he would comment to us on the apparent willingness of the Liberal government of Ontario to allow the invasion and destruction of the old-growth forest in Temagami.

• (1310)

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, I deplore the behaviour of the Ontario government in Temagami as much as the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina. I wish they would find the necessary political courage to do what needs to be done and to set into motion the social shock absorbers that are needed for the workers affected in that area in order to carry them over. These decisions are difficult. Therefore, they require a convergence of environmental and social measures. It is the lack of social measures and this false dichotomy that it is either the environment or the economy that troubles many of us. We know that if we do not resolve politically and psychologically that false dichotomy—and in the long-term we do not see all these forces coming together—we will be left with no original wilderness and natural areas because there will always be pressure for their elimination and always for some reason. A classic example of that is what has happened to the forests in the Mediterranean area. All historical accounts and records tell us that the Mediterranean watershed was rich with forests. They began to be harvested intensively by the Venetians around the 14th century or 15th century. Those forests have not regrown.

I am sure at that time the Venetians made a very good case to exploit those forests for economic reasons. I suppose the same was the case for North Africa. The records indicate that the entire Mediterranean Basin, north and south of those waters, was richly endowed with forests. They are gone and I am sure that the same arguments are being raised these days for the cutting of Temagami and other areas that are in dispute. We must come around on that issue if we want to leave something for future generations to enjoy.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the courage of the member who has just spoken on the many issues on which we have fought together. I am still shell-shocked at the remarks of the minister this morning. I thought there was a lot more spirit in the man as a man and I thought there was a lot more energy in the man as a minister than has come through this morning.

The majority of bioregions that are still without representation are south of sixty. They are in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario, and particularly in Quebec. Quebec is the most under-represented bioregion in North America. The majority of the cabinet are from Quebec but they do not seem to understand, let alone the maritimes. It is interesting to be talking about the vulnerability of the Arctic.

I know that some time today the Speaker will remind all members of the House that this is not a non-confidence votable motion and I would like the member to touch on that. I would like the member to touch on the shock that I share with him on what I believe is the first member of this Conservative government to publicly reject the recommendations of the Brundtland report. It happens to be the Minister of Environment. It is truly shocking and I would like to quote from a very excellent article "The Upshot" to get the member to tie those three things together and respond:

> —in a 1987 national Gallup poll, over 95 per cent of Canadians voiced their approval of government spending to preserve our wilderness areas. This high level of support extended across all regions of Canada, and among all socio-economic groups. Not surprisingly, 96 per cent of those who had visited a national or provincial park within the past two or three years favoured such spending, but even among those who had not made such a visit the approval level was high, at 91 per cent. These kind of data are further buttressed by powerful Canadian opinion in favour of protecting the environment in general. For example, 93 per cent of us say we shouldn't relax environmental laws to achieve economic growth, 88 per cent say protecting the environment is more important than keeping prices down, 87 per cent are upset about the lack of action taken to protect the environment, 84 per cent participate in wildlife-related activities, 82 per cent express concern about saving endangered species, 70 per cent say we should do more to protect the environment even if it means jobs must be lost in the process, and 70 per cent believe that major spending on the environment would in fact have a positive effect on the economy.

It seems to me that the minister and his government are wildly out of touch. Perhaps the hon. member for Davenport could touch on the parks that have been proposed. If there are only five out of the 18 bioregions to be represented between now and the year 2000, that means the 13 representative bioregion areas would have to take place between 1995 and the year 2000. Would he comment also on the non-confidence matter.

Mr. Caccia: As usual, the member for Skeena asks very penetrating questions. I will try to deal with one of them at least and that is on the nature of his motion because I share his view that this is not the motion that would put the existence of this government into danger. Actually, I came into the House convinced that this would be a motion that the government and Progressive Conservative backbenchers could support with ease, in good conscience and also with a certain sense of political pride because it would reflect their own commitment. Also, no one would come into this chamber on January 2, 2000 and say "Oh, well, look. It is only 11 per cent. You have failed to deliver". I imagine the parliamentarians at that time would rejoice.

We certainly do not see this as a non-confidence motion. Even if the government were to interpret this to be a non-confidence motion, what stands in the way of them defeating it if they want to defeat it, if it is really that serious? But, it is not. If the government supports it, the government will not fall. Even if the government defeats the motion, it will have inflicted on itself a very serious political wound for the reasons we have discussed. So it seems to me that it would be a win-win situation for the government by coming in on Monday and voting for this motion. It would reinforce the political commitment and the political will that they have expressed internationally and at home, since the publication of the Brundtland Report.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the goods and services tax as proposed by the Conservative government will, among things, severely affect post-secondary education and amateur sports in Canada.

The 7 per cent tax will hit students especially hard. According to the Canadian Federation of Students, the GST will cost students approximately $200 a year. At McMaster University in my riding of Hamilton West, this will mean that a total of $2.1 million will be extracted from students' pockets by this regressive Conservative GST.

Since half of all post-secondary students earn less than $7,000 per year, students cannot afford to have the GST eat away at what little money they have left on restaurant meals, prepared foods and, yes, the very tools of education, books for their courses.

Also, many students have been very active participants in amateur sports. Like many families who have already found the cost of their children participating in amateur sports extremely high, students will also have to bear the additional burden of adding 7 per cent to the cost of memberships, equipment and travel.

Students, and 72 per cent of all Canadians, say enough is enough and call upon this government to scrap the tax.

THE QUEBEC WINTER CARNIVAL

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, under the theme "At the heart of the world", the 36th annual Quebec Winter Carnival will be officially launched tonight with the crowning of the 1990 Carnival queen.

This Winter Festival the pride of Quebeckers, has over the years ranked among the largest festivals in the world. Of course, Mr. Speaker, this success is due to top-notch people such as the president of the 1990 Carnival, Mr. Marcel Veilleux, who is also known for his joie de vivre and his tremendous vitality, as well as all volunteers who are supporting him wholeheartedly and all participants who share the same enthousiasm, whether in the wind and cold or under a spring-like sun.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend a warm invitation to all my colleagues in the House and all the Canadian people to come and see for themselves how friendly and welcoming Quebecers are.

Welcome to the Quebec Winter Carnival "At the heart of the world", which runs from February 1 to February 11, 1990.

CANADA POST

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a three-person delegation from Prince Edward Island came to Ottawa to appear before the Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations Committee to express concern about Canada Post's uncaring and undemocratic activities on the Island.

As the meeting proceeded, a Conservative party member of the committee indicated that she would no longer be able to maintain her presence at the meeting. The chairman asked opposition members to promise not to move motions that might embarrass the government because the government would not have enough members present to defeat those motions.

I objected, but to the surprise of those present, the chairman chose not to ask for a replacement of the government member and instead adjourned the meeting, sending the P.E.I. representatives home without a proper hearing and removing my right as a member to further question the witnesses or request committee support for their position.

I am deeply saddened by the actions of the committee chairman who left the people of Prince Edward Island without a proper voice on one of their strongest concerns, the retention of post offices in Island communities.

ENTREPRENEURS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report that Canadian entrepreneurialism is alive and well, despite the doom and gloom scenarios which continue to dominate the projections and statements from members opposite.

Notably absent are any acknowledgements of the Canadian entrepreneurs or companies which have taken advantage of access and proximity to the vast American market. For example, I have yet to see anyone, including the member opposite, applaud the recent accomplishment of Montreal-based Imasco Ltd. Yesterday the company announced that its fast food subsidiary was purchasing the Roy Rogers fast food restaurant chain for $365 million U.S.

Through such an acquisition, Imasco now enters into the U.S. markets where it was absent. Just think of the implications here. Roy Rogers, a name synonymous with Americanism and tradition, is now going to be Canadianized. Oh my! What have members opposite got to think about this?

Bold Canadian entrepreneurial initiatives such as this deserve due recognition and salutation from all members of this House. I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that proper assessment and developments in the North American trade and commerce requires a two-sided coin, not conveniently one with two heads.

SPORTS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to congratulate the athletes, trainers and organizers of the first world ringette championship.

[English]

These games are currently being played in arenas in the city of Gloucester. A total of eight teams are involved including representatives of Finland, the United States, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec.

I hasten to add that all games are drawing record crowds.

Together with my fellow constituents in Carleton—Gloucester, I salute the efforts of those who initiated the idea of bringing these championships here. Their countless volunteer hours of preparation have culminated in a world class event.

Good luck to all athletes!

MEDIA

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, it is with no light heart that I rise today to denounce an anti-Quebec hate campaign on which have embarked a number of Toronto media and especially Quebec city Toronto Sun correspondent Peter Stockland.

By writing that the mere mention of a so-called Quebec culture would prompt Herman Goering into drawing his 44 Magnum, the journalist who claims that the poor Quebec Anglophones are persecuted by their fellow citizens and their Government can only exacerbate the current tensions between francophones and anglophones in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, in this crucial period for national unity and the future of Canada, Canadians can do without such invitations to violence and intolerance from certain irresponsible journalists and media.

I strongly urge journalist Peter Stockland and the Toronto Sun to apoligize publicly not only to Quebecers, but to all Canadians.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION AGENCY

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): On January 31st, 1990, Mr. Speaker, the National Transportation Agency announced that the Canadian National Railways could not stop operating the Franquet-Chapais line in the Chapais subdivision.

The Agency ordered the CNR to carry out the necessary work to update the line and resume operation by July 31st, 1990. The Agency determined that the real losses incurred by the CNR in the operation of this line amounted to $590,444, which is considerably less than the $5,403,646 which the CNR had tabled for the years between 1984 and 1987.

Moreover, the Agency questioned the amount of savings in operating costs which the CNR had forcasted following the abandonment of the line. It expressed its concern about the evidence showing that the CNR was following a rail service demarketing policy on this line.

Mr. Speaker, the people in the Abitibi-Chapais area are grateful to Mr. Weinberg, who chaired the meeting, member Nicole Forget, as well as Councils Michèle Hurteau, Claude Jacques and Danielle Bouvet of the National Transportation Agency.

ITALIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, there has been a great injustice that has gone on in this country for 50 years, and that is the government's refusal to apologize to Italian Canadians for the internment of 700 Italian Canadians during the Second World War.

In 1939, Mr. Dominic Nardocchio of Sydney, Nova Scotia, was 35 years of age. He was taken from his wife, his eight children and the job that he had and was interned for two years because the government felt he committed one crime and that was being an Italian Canadian. After 50 years, the Government of Canada still refuses to apologize to these people.

The National Congress of Italian Canadians in Canada wants only one thing, an apology. That is not asking too much. I would ask the government of this country to make this apology today to these Italian Canadians.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, Manitobans are getting a hard lesson in just how little Conservatives everywhere care about the environment. The Manitoba Eco-Network, a group diligent in their defence of the province's environment, has had to close its doors today because of a lack of funding. Not only is its share of federal money inadequate, but the Filmon government in Manitoba has so far refused to even grant it enough money to survive until the next fiscal year in April. On top of this, the federal government will not grant this group charitable status.

Now we hear that the Minister of the Environment is promising the electors in Chambly a new park if they vote Tory on February 12. This is the same park that was promised to Chambly in 1988. When asked why he was repeating a two year old promise, the minister said that elections were the time to make promises.

• (1410)

We have learned that lesson in Manitoba as well. We remember that the Prime Minister promised Winnipeg the new International Centre for Sustainable Development in the 1988 election. Since that time, there has not been another word about it from the mouths of the Prime Minister or the Environment Minister, except at international conferences to brag about this non-existent centre. Elections may be the time to make promises about the environment, but for the Tories there is never any time to keep them.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, today marks the beginning of what has been designated as Black History Month across Canada.

It is appropriate that a Nova Scotian rise to draw the attention of this House to this important and symbolic observance, because Nova Scotia has long been the home of a significant and substantial black community. The first black person came to Canada as an interpreter with Samuel de Champlain to Port Royal in 1605.

Others came as loyalists after the American Revolution including, I might say, the ancestors of my black constituents in the town of Shelburne. Black immigrants have continued to come to Canada from all parts of the world.

For 200 years, black Canadians have contributed significantly to our historical development and to our culture. Much of this contribution, I might say, is celebrated at the Black Cultural Centre in Westphal, Nova Scotia. Black Canadians continue to make a significant contribution to the economy and culture of Canada.

I urge all Canadians to note and to welcome the observance of Black History Month as well as to use as an occasion to reflect upon the need and degree to which this contribution is adequately or inadequately reflected in our mainstream national institutions, both public and private, economic, political and cultural.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I commend Dupont of Canada for its recently announced pledge to eliminate toxic emissions from all its operations by the year 1995.

I note that this goal by Dupont demands a performance at levels above all legal requirements and I commend Dupont for that action.

Since Dupont received the gold medal for environmental achievement from the United Nations World Environment Centre two years ago, this new initiative will serve to further enhance Dupont's reputation for environmental awareness around the world.

ROMANIA

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, since my statement last November 29 on the situation in Romania, we have had the joy of seeing the Romanian people successfully free themselves from the yoke of Communist tyranny. But despite the appearance of a new team of leaders, the country is still desperately short of medical supplies and food. We are told, for example, that there is one syringe for 20 patients, surgical instruments are rusty and medication of all kinds is greatly lacking.

We can do something to help ease this unfortunate situation if we want to. The International Red Cross in Geneva is accepting donations to provide some of what Romanian health institutions lack. Furthermore, and to conclude, Mr. Speaker, Romanian Canadians in the riding of Outremont which I have the honour to represent may set up a local organization which could send medicine, surgical instruments and food to Romania.

RIDING OF CHAMBLY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Saint-Bruno in the riding of Chambly, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Bouchard), who is also the government's "godfather" for ridings on the south shore of Montreal, made another fine election promise to the voters in that constituency. This promise had already been made by his colleague, the Minister of Communications, during the last election campaign when the Progressive Conservative Party was doing everything to re-elect Richard Grisé. We know now where the promises made in the last election got him! The voters in Chambly also remember another promise from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bouchard) made on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) the day after the Saint-Basile-le-Grand disaster.

Once again, this government has made a promise that it did not keep. The people of Chambly deserve better than Conservative or Liberal promises. Mr. Speaker, they deserve a real member of Parliament, a New Democrat!

RIDING OF CHAMBLY

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I hope people in the constituency of Chambly have realized how much contempt the New Democratic Party has for this institution, this House of Commons.

Last night, it must have been very clear to them that, rather than work at extremely important legislation, the New Democratic Party chose to waste the time of the House of Commons and its members by shamefully challenging the rulings of the Chair.

How can people in the constituency of Chambly take seriously the comments of the New Democratic Party candidate, who wants to represent and defend them in this House, when in fact his party's ultimate goal is to prevent this institution from working properly.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude on this word of caution to the constituents in Chambly: Remember that during the 1988 election, Ed Broadbent and his gang supported Meech Lake and the "distinct society" clause.

Mr. Nystrom: Not all of them!

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): After that election, they all reneged on that Agreement, thereby refusing to recognize the historial legitimacy of Quebecers. We might expect the same from the so-called "star" candidate who quite clearly has no political clout in his own party.

Mr. Nystrom: He will be elected.

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): And, more ironic still, he has the gall to refer to honesty.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, today is the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

[Translation]

In their report, the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission suggested that Canada was going through the worst crisis in its history. History seems to be repeating itself today. Unfortunately, language equality is far from being achieved. To ensure equality between both official languages, sustained leadership and understanding between Canadians at every political level will both be needed.

[English]

This anniversary reminds Canadians of the work accomplished in the past 25 years to foster understanding and a spirit of co-operation between English and French-speaking Canadians. We must continue to promote harmony and to recognize the considerable contribution made by both linguistic and cultural groups to Canada.

Our two official languages are characteristic of Canada. Whether we are English or French speaking, we are all Canadians proud of Canada and its heritage. Happy anniversary. Bon anniversaire.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Prime Minister dismissed calls for the resignation of Brian Gallery from the board of CN by suggesting the situation was not urgent. I suggest to the Prime Minister that CN's integrity as a Crown corporation is at stake, as is the integrity of the conflict of interest guidelines authored by the Prime Minister.

Will the Prime Minister assure the House today that Mr. Gallery, the Prime Minister's appointment as acting chair, as a member of the board of CN, has resigned or has been removed effective today from the board of CN? Will he further assure the House that a thorough, complete and independent investigation into Mr. Gallery's activities at CN will be carried out and made public?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat, substantially, what I said yesterday. The decision concerning allegations reported by The Globe and Mail and other newspapers—these have been evaluated and will have to be evaluated by the chairman of the CN board of directors.

This morning, I was again in touch with the chairman of the board who is looking at the facts, and I have been informed, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Brian Gallery has resigned as vice-chairman. I think we should let the chairman of the board assess the facts and report his findings, and we will then look at his assessment and the recommendations made in his report.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport.

The minister should know that Canadian National is refusing to provide members of this House and indeed other interested parties with a copy of the logbook for the executive dining car used by the president and/or chairman and/or any of 26 vice-presidents at CN.

Since Crown corporations are not required to comply with the access to information code, the only way that information can be made available is as a result of a request by the Minister of Transport. I ask the Minister of Transport, will he direct—

• (1420)

Mr. Mazankowski: How far back do you want to go?

Mr. Tobin: —the President of CN to make the logbook on all of those eight executive cars available to members of the House of Commons so that we may ascertain, as members, that those cars have only been used for legitimate CN purposes and for no other private purpose?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am always surprised when the Liberal Party demands an explanation about rules they themselves made when they were in power. I may remind the hon. member once again that the integrity of the proceedings in this House depends basically on one thing: an assessment of the facts. The hon. member referred to reports about the use of the dining car, and so forth. I believe Canadians are satisfied when they hear that the person responsible for the corporation, the chairman of the board, is looking at the facts of the case to which the hon. member referred, and that depending on his assessment of those facts, he will report to the Minister of Transport and we will then consider what our response will be. I think everything is there, everything is opend. I hope the hon. member will have the patience to wait for the normal process to take its course.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pathetic sight to see the Minister of Transport attempt to duck, on behalf of himself and the Prime Minister, the responsibility for this mess by passing it over to the brand new chairman of CN who has only been in the job a few months and who, by the way, was appointed much like Mr. Gallery, as a consequence of his presumed ability and his affiliation with certain members opposite.

Mr. Gallery's letter of July 5, 1989 to CN is a matter of public record. It is also a matter of public record that, in addition to carrying advertising by CN, Mr. Gallery's magazine Seaports and the Shipping World also carries advertising for Government of Canada Crown corporations, including four pilotage authorities, seven port corporations and Ports Canada, every one a Crown corporation that reports to the Minister of Transport.

My question is straightforward. Can the minister ascertain whether or not any of these other Crown corporations which report directly to the minister have been subject to any of the same kind of letters or attempts to squeeze extra advertising dollars out of them for Mr. Brian Gallery's magazines?

Mr. Speaker: There is no basis for the latter part of the question and, left as it is, it stands in substitution of a charge. The hon. member knows that that is not appropriate. The hon. minister may want to reply, but I am saying that the question, as asked, is out of order.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for the status of women. In a report today to the United Nations, this government will attempt to gloss over the gross inequities for women in Canada. Will the minister admit that Canadian women not only are poorer than ever, but that the GST and UI cuts and over–all increased living costs are increasing not decreasing discrimination against women in Canada?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, far from admitting any such thing, I think the hon. member has to admit that Canadian women are better off today than they were five years ago by quite a long way, that there are fewer women living in poverty today, and that our employment equity is helping women in the workplace.

Last week the President of the Treasury Board announced the most fair pay equity plan that we have seen in this country and yes, women are better off. This does not suggest that we do not have some problems. I would remind the hon. member that her party did not bring in the kind of pay equity that we did and we are looking forward to more progress for women, not less.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how closely the minister has looked at the pay equity provisions that were announced last Friday, but they are pretty poor and they are fractional as opposed to the needs of Canadian women. The minister should know that and so should the President of Treasury Board.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my supplenmentary is directed to the same minister.

What steps does she intend to take to finance new programs designed to help women in Canada, and especially the National Day Care Program.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the government set up a day care program, and the Liberal senators blocked it! It is not our fault—it's the other place—

[English]

This government continues to be committed to women, and we have made progress continually for women. We have broadened the base of support for women, not just through the women's program but through health and welfare and our initiatives on family violence, and through the nearly $400 million of pay equity program that was announced last week by the President of the Treasury Board. The hon. member should be applauding what has been going on for women in this country instead of complaining.

BANK OF CANADA

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Today's increase of 30 base points in the bank rate is bad news for all Canadians. That increase puts us back to May 1989 levels. It hurts farmers, it hurts small business people, it hurts home buyers, it hurts the poorer regions of this country.

When is the Minister of Finance going to assume his responsibility, tell the Governor of the Bank of Canada that enough is enough, you are hurting Canada, and roll back the interest rate?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that sort of bravado simply does not work. She knows that we cannot just roll back interest rates. The primary objective—

Mr. Rodriguez: You rolled them up.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would encourage the hon. member not to take advice from the people on her left and her right.

The primary purpose of our monetary policy, supported by our fiscal policy, is to get inflation down. What we have seen in recent weeks as we tried to get interest rates down, a minimal reduction in interest rates, was an over-reaction in the exchange markets.

In the interests of getting long-term growth in the economy, it is important to achieve stability in financial markets. That is what has been happening in recent days, and in that regard I fully support what the Governor of the Bank of Canada is trying to do.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that excessively high interest rates tend to increase the deficit. The government is proposing the GST to reduce this deficit.

If the government really wants to reduce the deficit, why this contradiction between its fiscal policy and its monetary policy?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on many occasions, the best way of getting interest rates down on a permanent basis is to get inflation down. One of the ways of getting inflation down is by encouraging, through interest rate policy, a reduction in the demand for credit. That is the purpose of the policy of the Bank of Canada. As we have seen in recent days and weeks, there has been some apparent sign of success here. We want to encourage that success to continue because if it does, we will be able to get interest rates down on a permanent, long-term basis.

In the 1970s when the Liberal government ignored the pressures of inflation, we got 20 per cent and 25 per cent interest rates. If that is what my friend is striving for, she is going in the wrong direction, certainly a different direction than this government is going.

• (1430)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, Canadians know that the way to get the interest rate down is to get the Tories out.

Some hon. members: Out!

Ms. McLaughlin: The minister keeps saying that because of the deficit Canadians have to tighten their belts, that because of the deficit Canadians have to accept an insufferable 7 per cent new sales tax. The minister knows that a 1 per cent increase in interest rates adds $4.4 million a day to the deficit. What a waste, $4.4 million a day, 365 days a year.

Is it not time to cut interest rates and stop cutting programs for Canadians?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the question. Could she repeat it?

Ms. McLaughlin: Yes, I can, Mr. Speaker. I asked the minister if it is not time for the minister to cut the interest rates and stop cutting programs for ordinary Canadians.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the other side of what the hon. member has just said is: if she does not want interest rates cut, she wants to increase inflation. If she wants to increase inflation, then what she is doing is hurting the very people who she wants to help, people in low income brackets and people who are senior citizens living on fixed incomes.

Mr. Nystrom: What about the GST?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Her seat mate just said: "What about the GST?" I want to take some time here to correct the Leader of the New Democratic Party. She said that the GST is going hurt those who are on low incomes and hurt those who are senior citizens. That is absolutely wrong.

We have brought in the GST credit, as a result of which 84 per cent of people who are 65 years or more or single-parent families will get the benefit of the GST credit.

With the benefit of the GST credit they will be paying less sales tax after sales tax reform than before.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance speaks of the goods and services tax. I would like to quote Mrs. Jean Woodsworth, president of One Voice, the Canadian seniors network. She said: "The tax on goods and services means hardship on seniors. It seems that low and middle income seniors will be pushed toward poverty. The proposed tax credits do not reassure them." That is what seniors think of the minister's answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that the elderly need the services of lawyers and accountants, as well as certain general maintenance services such as plumbers, electricians, car mecanics, and also homemakers, either to do their shopping or housecleaning. All these services will be taxed under the GST proposed by the government. The minister will have 4,000 tax policemen to monitor the application of this tax.

Doesn't the minister agree that these additional tax levies are unfair to our grandparents?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will say to the hon. member and to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that we have indicated in the GST paper dated December 19 the impacts of the GST combined with the GST credit. Let me just read out for the hon. member the impact on single individuals over 65. With an income of $12,500 they are better off by $148; with a $15,000 income they are better off by $80; with a $20,000 to $25,000 income they are better off by about $140.

If the member for Kingston and the Islands and the member for Yukon disagree with these figures, they owe it to the seniors of this country to prove where those numbers are wrong, numbers that have been certified by the best in the Public Service of Canada. If they cannot prove that those numbers are wrong, they should not be misleading senior citizens.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, if the minister had listened to my question, he would realize that senior citizens are the ones who say this tax is wrong; not just me.

We have two wrong policies here: the goods and services tax and high interest rates. The minister knows that the cash payments will be inadequate to help seniors who are spending all or nearly all their income to maintain themselves. Even funerals are to be taxed.

The minister urges Canadians to buy now and beat the tax. Does the minister not realize that seniors find this pay now and die later tax policy repugnant?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is neglecting to point out to the senior citizens to whom he has been talking the number of things that are not taxed under the GST.

Rentals are not taxed. Residential rents are not taxed. Basic groceries are not taxed. Meals-on-Wheels are not taxed. Health services are not taxed. Glasses and hearing aids are not taxed. Medical devices, canes, wheelchairs, and things like that are not taxed.

A wide range of products is not taxed under the GST. Those exemptions, together with the GST credit, are what makes this tax a fairer tax for senior citizens today than is the case with the existing sales tax.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

I want to return to the matter of Brian Gallery and Canadian National. Could the Prime Minister confirm that Brian Gallery has resigned only as vice-chairman of Canadian National and remains on the board of Canadian National at the nomination of the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I was informed, Mr. Speaker, before coming into the House that he had resigned both as a director and a vice-chairman.

My understanding is that he could not hold the position of vice-chairman unless he were a director.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues just checked with Canadian National and was informed that Mr. Gallery is still on the board.

I would appreciate it if the Prime Minister or the Minister of Transport would confirm to the House, immediately after Question Period or during Question Period, whether or not Mr. Gallery remains on the board of directors. If his conduct is such that he should resign as vice-chairman, certainly he should not remain on the board of directors.

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course, if I receive this information before question period, I will produce it in the House. I simply want to inform the Liberal House Leader that he is prejudging certain events or facts, I do not want to, and I would ask him once again to have the decency to wait for the chairman of the board's assessment. I think that is a basic courtesy we owe to any Canadian before making any judgment whatsoever, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the minister himself did not take the action to remove Mr. Gallery from CN instead of waiting for Mr. Gallery to resign.

My question is for the Minister of Transport. In Mr. Gallery's letter of July 7, 1989 he makes references to two companies that have potential business with CN: Cast and Maersk.

Has the Minister of Transport entered into an investigation to determine whether or not Mr. Gallery in fact followed through with his suggestion in the document that as a good friend of these people he would ensure that CN would not get the contracts?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will just repeat what I said to his friend in the Liberal Party. The chairman of the board investigates.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Would the Minister of Transport agree to table in this House the copy of any correspondence received by him from the chairman of CN with regard to this investigation?

Furthermore, would he agree to communicate with the chairman today to insist that part of his investigation include an investigation of whether or not Mr. Gallery talked to the two individuals involved?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope my friend understands that I will not direct the chairman of the board of CN to determine what are my facts in terms of that case.

• (1440)

He will determine himself what he will investigate. He will report to me, and I will advise at that time.

Once again, it is not I but the chairman of the board who will determine which facts he will consider.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance about the goods and services tax program.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: Here it comes.

Mr. Bird: You are not going to like this question, but why not listen?

The existing manufacturers' sales tax is already prepaid primarily at 13.5 per cent on a large volume of stocks and inventories being carried by many Canadian companies, many of them in small business.

On January 1, 1991 under the GST program, the existing tax will be terminated and refunds will be made to these companies for the amount of tax then being financed on their inventories on hand.

What will the impact of these refunds be on the cash flow of Canadian companies? Will these refunds be processed and paid in a timely fashion?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has pointed out, there will be a rebate of taxes paid on inventory held by companies as of January 1, 1991. That amount is difficult to be precise about at this time, because we do not know exactly what the inventory will be. Our guess is that it will be of the order of $2 billion.

It will be paid out in part immediately, but there will be a hold back, which I expect would take about three to six months to confirm, and then that final amount will be paid.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Back in 1985 our government signed a $25 million agreement with the Province of Quebec for the construction of a highway between Alma and La Baie. Unfortunately, even after six years the government of Quebec has not managed to spend that money, so much so that the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean region stands to lose $11.2 million if nothing is done.

Can the minister tell the people of Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean whether his counterpart in Quebec City has been in touch with him to find a solution so that the region will not lose these millions of dollars and that the Alma—La Baie highway link may be completed as soon as possible?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, under the 1985 federal-provincial agreement we earmarked $12.5 million, as did the government of Quebec, for the highway referred to by my colleague.

For reasons best known to them, Quebec government officials have yet to invest more than $6 million of their total appropriation. I will soon be meeting with my colleague the Quebec Minister of Transport and I intend to raise this issue because the funds have been and are still committed by the federal government, and hopefully the government of Quebec will come up with its share of the funds allotted.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, led by the chairman, Mr. Danny Dumaresque.

HOUSING

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): My question is directed to the Minister of State for Housing. Montreal is the Canadian city to be hardest hit by the abolition of the RRAP which helped renovate rented housing and kept rents moderate, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister understand that Montreal is unique in Canada in that 80 per cent of its people are tenants and that the cuts in the last budget, which Montreal is still suffering from, will make the rent increases unafforable for the least fortunate Montrealers, because the RRAP was abolished? Will he restore housing assistance for Montreal?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, we have set up a tripartite committee composed of representatives of the federal and Quebec governments and the cities of Montreal, Verdun and Quebec to find a solution to this problem. I hope that the committee will come up with a solution very quickly.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the government should look into specific cases before abolishing the program. While the minister is studying, the number of homeless Montrealers is growing.

Will the minister tell this House, Canadians and Montrealers what measures he is going to take to help those Canadians who cannot pay the higher rents when the GST takes effect in January 1991?

[English]

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is well aware, currently the federal government assists some 600,000 households right across the country.

In this past year and in order to help those needy Canadians to whom the hon. member is referring, particularly in Montreal, the federal government participated in and assisted financially almost 2,500 new housing projects. That included about 18,000 additional housing units for needy households across the country.

In total it meant that the federal government guaranteed capital assistance to build those housing units in the amount of $1.2 billion in 1989. We are providing subsidies this year for just those new housing units in the amount of another $34 million.

There is a considerable amount being done, and we will continue to do everything we can within the resources available.

FINANCE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister has confirmed again this day that he is preoccupied with only one economic policy: inflation.

When will he look at what his high interest rate policies and his high dollar policies are doing to Canadian consumers and to Canadians who have to invest in Canada to make us competitive in global markets? The French and the Germans are paying 6 per cent interest rates for their money, and we are paying 13.5 per cent.

When will he think about what it is doing in terms of our high dollar cutting off our exports? When will he think about what our high interest rates are doing in terms of exports themselves and our manufacturers who have to compete in world markets?

When will the minister get off this monomaniacal policy of high interest rate?

An hon. member: Where were you between 1980 and 1985? Where were you, Jim?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made some valid points. I agree with him that we must be concerned about our competitive position. We must be concerned about the level of interest rates, but we also have to recognize that there is a very close relationship between the level of inflation and the level of interest rates. That is what we are trying to do, and we are trying to draw that to his attention.

Let me remind him that before he was on the other side of the House he had a somewhat different point of view on these matters. On May 14, 1981 he said this is about the whole question of interest rates and inflation: "If hon. members think there is a magic fix or a quick solution, there is not".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

An hon. member: Who said that?

Mr. Mulroney: Did you say that? Did you say that, Jim?

Mr. Lewis: It must have been David.

Mr. Mulroney: You stand up and apologize right now.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!.

• (1450)

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, how soon the hon. minister forgets.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peterson: I remember so well his words in those years criticizing high interest rates policies. He was dead set against them. We stand on principle today.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Willowdale will put his question.

BOEING CANADA

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is another matter involving economic mismanagement of Canada's affairs. It is directed to the Prime Minister.

In 1986 the government received $90 million for the sale of de Havilland to Boeing. Will he confirm today that the government is paying over $150 million to Boeing, in effect meaning that this deal will have cost Canadians over $60 million?

Will he confirm at the same time that this payment to Boeing involving a $51 million grant for the new Dash–8 has no guarantees of jobs in Canada and absolutely no guarantees that research and development and design have to be done in Canada?

In other words, Boeing could take its money, pack up at Downsview and move to Seattle. What is he going to protect Canadian jobs and to protect Canadian workers?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was not around in 1986 when the negotiated sale took place.

I want to remind him that those were the questions asked by the Liberals in those days. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for York Centre stood at the gate handing out pamphlets to the workers, telling them that they were all going to lose their jobs because of privatization.

Let me give the hon. member the facts today, and I will be very accurate with them. In 1985 employment there was 4,290. Today it is 5,813.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: They are developing new planes there. There is new technology being developed there. Their sales have doubled and their order books are full. They are doing a very fine job not only at de Havilland but in Arnprior in the Ottawa Valley and in Winnipeg as well.

It has been a good deal for Canada. Yes, we are negotiating with Boeing on cleaning up some of the final negotiations on the agreement. When they are ready and the deal is finished, we will announce it.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

In an interview with Pamela Wallin on December 20, 1985 the Prime Minister of Canada said at that time: "The Government of Canada has not run the taxpayers' business very well. Why should we be in the business competing with the private sector losing $1 billion? We want to save those jobs in Toronto. We want to protect that technology."

The Prime Minister went on further to say: "The state should not have a primary role where the private sector can do a better job. We shouldn't be subsidizing with your tax dollars a Crown corporation to compete with the private sector".

After making these statements why is the Prime Minister's government going to bail out Boeing and give it another shot at the trough after privatization, to the tune of $150 million of taxpayers' money here in Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, there is no bailing out here whatsoever.

A deal was consummated between the Government of Canada and de Havilland back in 1986. The deal at that time was very complete. Many changes were required in the operations of de Havilland to ensure that the company could become viable over the long term.

Part of that potential settlement relates to items we specifically agreed to cover, as well as other categories of potential liabilities, which is normal in any kind of a deal. That is what the negotiations are about. There is no such thing as a bail-out. That is nonsense.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Prime Minister for his answer!

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, the minister who responded to my question to the Prime Minister neglected to mention that at the current moment lay-offs are taking place at the plant. At the current time there are subcontracts and contracts going out to South Korea, China, Egypt and the United States.

Will the Prime Minister tell us and the Canadian people why it is necessary to use taxpayer's dollars to subsidize jobs in these other countries while lay-offs are taking place and money is being shoved out?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, that demonstrates why that individual was a premier of a province for three short years. The people in British Columbia smartened up pretty quickly by booting him out.

What nonsense. None of this money goes to subsidize jobs in other countries at all.

Mr. Barrett: You are contracting out.

Mr. McDermid: As a matter of fact, de Havilland is selling planes made in Canada in all those countries he talks about. There are something like 1,600 more jobs today at de Havilland in Toronto.

Mr. Barrett: They are contracting out.

Mr. McDermid: Those people are paying taxes. They are gainfully employed.

Speak to your union friends in Toronto, ask them how they like the jobs. They like it very well, thank you very much.

CENTRAL EUROPE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. President Bush's announcement yesterday of new initiatives for the withdrawal of American troops from central Europe was just the latest in a series of initiatives by both eastern and western leaders with regard to the stationing of foreign troops in the countries of central Europe.

What is the position of the Government of Canada on this subject? More particularly, what is the position of the Government of Canada with regard to the continuing presence of Canadian forces in central Europe?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the decision the President announced last night was one that Canada had been consulted on. It is one that we had had the opportunity to discuss with President Bush and with others over some considerable period of time. It is one on which we congratulated the President prior to his making it public last evening.

We think it is a very strong indication of the quite excellent reactions, both in the east and the west, to developments over the last several months. It is a very healthy and positive sign.

The Government of Canada is part of NATO. We have always indicated and conveyed our intention to act in concert with our allies. We will be doing precisely that. The Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have had ongoing discussions in a number of important areas.

When something more is ready to be conveyed publicly, we will be happy to do it.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the leaders who have taken these initiatives and the countries that have taken these initiatives have done so on the basis that the Cold War is over. Yet the white paper of the Government of Canada is still extant and the government stands behind the Cold War rhetoric in it.

Does the Prime Minister not agree that the white paper of the Government of Canada is completely obsolete and completely outdated? When is he going to offer some initiatives for the defence of Canada for the Canadian people, and particularly for members of the Canadian Armed Forces whose moral has hit rock bottom?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman identifies the white paper which was written in 1984–1985 and enunciated in 1987. The facts of that day were accurate. I am sure, as much as we would all like to be able to look forward with clarity, the changes that have taken place in eastern Europe over the last six months were not anticipated by myself, by the Prime Minister or, I am sure, by the hon. member.

I would suggest to the hon. member that the actions taken by President Bush, by NATO and by the Warsaw Pact at a time when there is great instability in the world are lending to a stable reduction in arms, bringing security to the world and peace to Canada. We all hope it works. Patience and prudence at a time like this, I would suggest, is the best course for Canada and other NATO allies.

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: There will be a single question from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, followed by a single question from the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

THALIDOMIDE VICTIMS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On January 18 of this year the War Amputations of Canada, in pursuit of its compensation claims for Canada's Thalidomide victims, met with the Department of National Health and Welfare, which indicated it would respond within two weeks. That deadline is today.

Thalidomide victims have been through a lifetime of disability and suffering. They deserve redress and they deserve a fair deadline for a response.

Could the Minister give the House today a definitive date as to when it would issue its definitive decision? Would the Minister assure the House that it would immediately conclude a compassionate and generous settlement with the Thalidomide victims of our country? Fairness delayed is fairness denied.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in December when I made an announcement to the House of Commons with regard to extraordinary assistance to haemophiliacs, those who contracted AIDS through the blood system, I indicated that the government was prepared to sit down and discuss with Thalidomide victims and others their particular circumstances. We have been continuing to have those discussions. I think it is appropriate that any answer that we have to convey to them be conveyed to them directly as opposed to being conveyed on the floor of the House of Commons.

This is a matter to which we assign considerable importance and we will do everything we can to reach an agreement which is fair and compassionate and which recognizes the needs of the people involved.

Mr. Speaker: This will be the last question. The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Contrary to all the evidence, the Prime Minister says that there is no crisis in Atlantic Canada, yet it is his government that has added to Atlantic Canada's problems by the proposed cancellation of the At & East program.

Despite the fact that this bill has not even been debated in the House, I have learned that the railways have been instructed by the government that all new contracts after July 16, 1989, would not receive the At & East rate and that all extended permits at the At & East rate were to end yesterday.

Because of this program the elevator at Saint John has announced that it will be closing at the end of February, and that is only the beginning. The loss of this program means the abandonment of railways and the possible closure of Atlantic Canada's only flour mill.

My question is very simple. Given the fact that this program has injected some $26 million and 250 jobs annually into Atlantic Canada, and given the fact that his bill has not even been debated in the House, will the Minister admit that his department has improperly instructed the railways to boost their rates on shipments of grain and flour to Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to consider the information provided by my colleague about the company and I will get back to the hon. member. Once again, I do not believe that is the fact, but I would like to check that out and I will come back to the hon. member.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Speaker: I have a point of order from the Hon. Minister of Transport.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I just want to confirm what the Prime Minister said during Question Period in response to the question from the hon. member for Windsor West. Mr. Brian Gallery has resigned from CN from both positions.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona on a point of order.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises from a claim made by the Minister of the Environment in the House earlier today with respect to the motion before the House which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should move to complete the national park system (land and marine) by the year 2000 and should implement the recommendation of the World Commission on Environment and Development (Brundtland Report) that that Canada protect at least 12 percent of land and marine zones.

The Minister of the Environment made a procedural claim with respect to this motion to the effect that it is a non-confidence motion. This motion is not a non-confidence motion. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of the changes to the Standing Orders brought in by the recommendations of the McGrath report, as it is popularly known, the language of confidence was taken out of the Standing Orders having to do with opposition days. So for the Minister of the Environment to get up and suggest that he could not support this motion because this is a motion of confidence is completely false. This is not a motion of confidence. It is only a motion of confidence in the political sense if the Prime Minister chooses to make this motion a matter of confidence, and one can only ask why the Prime Minister would decide to do that.

Did the government fall when we passed the resolution on an opposition day having to do with South Moresby? Was that a matter of confidence? The fact of the matter is this is not a motion of non-confidence. It is a motion on which members of the cabinet, government back-benchers, opposition back-benchers, everyone has the opportunity to express their support. I can only conlude that the minister is trying to hide behind a false and mistaken interpretation of the Standing Orders.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think that debate should properly take place during the debate on the particular motion. However, I want to say from the standpoint of the government that there may be a day when we do review the rules and perhaps more specifically outline exactly what could take place.

My hon. friend did not mis-state it intentionally but I think he would realize that the South Moresby motion, when debated, did not have a vote attached to it. It was not a confidence motion with a vote as today's is. It was an agreed upon motion after debate was entered into, and there is a great difference.

My hon. friend has a point but the government is of the opinion and holds the position that this is a confidence motion. I am really disappointed in the New Democratic Party. I want to make it very clear that the Liberal Party did not do this. To play petty politics with something as important as the environment is just not understandable.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a complaint on a point of order. The government has responded and I do not think it is something on which I should make a ruling.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, further to the point of order raised earlier by the Minister of Transport which arose out of questions and answers in Question Period, I want to make clear that we accept fully that neither the Minister of Transport nor the Prime Minister were attempting to mislead the House in any way. The Minister of Transport, Hansard will show, indicated that Mr. Gallery has resigned as vice-president of CN. There was no reference to his directorship.

I called CN and spoke to them directly during Question Period. I was informed directly by CN that Mr. Gallery had resigned as vice-chairman, but not as a director.

It is for that reason that we on this side put a second question to the government. I think it ought to be clear that nobody, on either side, was attempting to mislead this House today.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I just want to confirm what I said. I checked that out myself with, I believe, people who would normally receive letters of resignation. I can say to the House that Mr. Brian Gallery has resigned as vice-president of the Board and as a director of CN.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is very clear, as the hon. member pointed out, that the questions were asked on the basis of answers given earlier. I thank the hon. minister for coming into the House and clarifying the matter.

The hon. member for Trinity—Spadina on a point of order.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to commend the hon. member for South Shore on his statement drawing our attention to the fact that this is the beginning of Black History Month. However, since I know the hon. member would not wish to mislead this House intentionally, I wish to advise him of my information that the first black man recorded to arrive in Canada was Matthew De Coste, a black man of Portuguese ancestry, who, as a navigator for Jacques Cartier, arrived on the St. Lawrence in 1535.

Mr. Speaker: One of the very first Canadians. I thank the hon. member for that information.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday, I want to ask the customary question of the government House Leader to enable him to give a statement of government business to this Chamber.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House that tomorrow will be an allotted day. Monday we will continue debate on Bill C-62, the goods and services tax bill. Tuesday we will continue debate, and probably finish debate, on Bill C-62.

• (1510)

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government House Leader could advise members of the House what has happened to the environmental assessment and review legislation. It was promised in this House, in committee and publicly by the Minister of the Environment, that it would be brought before this House last fall. We are now fairly well past the fall. As a matter of fact we are almost out of winter, I think. Perhaps the government House Leader could tell us where the environmental assessment and review legislation is.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, if my hon. friend will check the Standing Orders he will find that Question Period runs from 2.15 to three o'clock and that is a very valid question to ask the Minister of the Environment during Question Period.

POINT OF ORDER

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have a question to submit to the House and hon. members. The Orders of the Day say:

> Not later than 15 minutes before the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, every question necessary to dispose of proceedings shall be put forthwith in accordance with Standing Order 81(14).

My question, Madam Speaker, is this: Since earlier today we adopted a proposal to postpone until Monday the vote on the motion before the House, would it not be possible, in order to have more debate, to have more time so that hon. members can speak on this important motion, that we agree that the bells will not ring at 5.45 but rather at 6 o'clock as usual and then we will see if there are enough votes to justify a recorded division on the question before us?

It is just a matter of adding some time, 15 minutes more today, so that we can have more debate and more members can participate.

[English]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, just for the sake of precision, I think we should try to get the extra 15 minutes for debate. Certainly we would be in unanimous agreement with the rest of the House to do that.

To be precise, I do not believe there needs to be a bell today. I think a voice vote would take place at six o'clock instead of 5.45 p.m. If the voice vote is called one way or the other and enough members stand in their places, then the deferral would be made to Monday, in which case the bells would ring on Monday at 5.45 p.m. and the vote would take place at six o'clock on Monday. I think that is the precise understanding members should have.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House had heard the suggesting made by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: On another point of order, Madam Speaker, we would like to give notice to the House that the Liberals would like to divide the 20 minute periods allocated to us on our rounds into two 10-minute periods followed by a five-minute question and comment period. That is, again, in an effort to try to give our members more time to debate this very important motion. We are very much interested in debate.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, in the normal tradition of opposition days we would certainly agree to that. We would like to keep the option open as to whether or not the New Democratic Party would follow the same course, but I understand it will be open to all parties to use, if they wish, or just to continue in the traditional way.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, certainly the government would go along with that on the understanding that the government has the option also. Any party can use 20 minutes for one speaker or divide it between two speakers.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair would appreciate it if each and every member who seeks the floor would advise the Chair whether he or she intends to take the full 20 minutes or share time with one of his or her colleagues.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should move to complete the national park system (land and marine) by the year 2000 and should implement the recommendation of the World Commission on Environment and Development (Brundtland Report) that Canada protect at least 12 percent of land and marine zones.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, one cannot help, when one begins to debate this particular motion before us today, but contrast this day with another day in the life of this Parliament some time ago when all members of Parliament joined together to unanimously pass a motion having to do with the preservation of South Moresby as a national park. That, for me, was one of the finest days certainly in my time as a Member of Parliament. The government of the day, the same government that we have now, saw no threat in the coming together of all members of Parliament behind the particular motion. That makes it all the more mysterious why today the Minister of the Environment rose and opposed the motion which we have before us.

Perhaps just for the record I will read the motion moved by the hon. member for Skeena:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should move to complete the national park system (land and marine) by the year 2000 and should implement the recommendation of the World Commission on Environment and Development (Brundtland Report) that Canada protect at least 12 percent of land and marine zones.

All that this motion would do, if it were to be passed, would be to give parliamentary approval to a goal that the government itself up, until today, had not renounced. Indeed, I would suspect that on many occasions it has indicated that this is the government's goal.

So why on earth would the Minister of the Environment not get up and say to the hon. member for Skeena, the environment critic for the New Democratic Party, that this is a motion which he would be glad to have passed. It would certainly be helpful in his relationships with his own department and his bureaucrats, in his relationship with the business community and in his relationship with environmentalists—in all those relationships that he has to enter into in order to fulfil these goals which, up until now, we thought were the goals of the government—to have the unanimous support of the Parliament of Canada in doing so.

It sort of boggles the mind to reflect on why the Minister of the Environment would be so intent on not having the backing of Parliament and so intent on destroying his own reputation. Here was an opportunity for him to shine in a way that a previous environment minister, Tom McMillan, had with respect to South Moresby when he agreed that a motion having to do with South Moresby would pass the House. Instead, we have the Minister of the Environment getting up and making a very spurious argument indeed with respect to the fact that this motion is a non-confidence motion.

As I said earlier on a point of order, although Mr. Speaker ruled that it was not something that he wanted to comment on as a point of order, this is only a motion of non-confidence to the extent that the government declares it to be so at the political level. The objective of the McGrath reforms passed in this House in 1985 was to take the language of confidence out of the Standing Orders with respect to supply motions, which had traditionally been, as part of parliamentary tradition, a matter of confidence. This was sort of a lay-over in the language, if you like, because actually opposition days had nothing to do with supply any more. They were simply an opportunity for members of the opposition to move motions. But because they were still under the rubric of supply, the language of confidence had lingered beyond its meaningfulness.

That language was taken out of the Standing Orders precisely so that Private Members, to use the language of the Prime Minister himself when he mandated the McGrath commission, would be able to vote as they chose on matters like opposition days, so that no longer would we have government or opposition members being able to hide behind the language of confidence. In the days before the reform it used to be that opposition members would vote in favour of an opposition motion even though they did not support the substance of the motion because they said they did not want to miss any opportunity to express non-confidence in the government. Of course, the reverse argument was used on the government side. As a result, we did not have an opportunity in Parliament for members of Parliament to express themselves outside this whole notion of confidence and non-confidence. That was the purpose of the reform. Yet here today we have the Minister of the Environment getting up and doing exactly what the reform was intended to prevent. Having raised it on a point of order, the Minister of Justice and government House Leader gets up and says—and I can only interpret it this way—that at the political level, not the procedural level, this is now a matter of confidence for the government. Why would it be a matter of non-confidence in the government if a motion supporting the goals that it alleges itself to have were to pass?

I rest my case, Madam Speaker. I do not want to talk about the procedural point all day because there are other things to talk about. One of the other things to talk about, of course, is what over-all context the minister's behaviour ought to be placed in today. That over-all context is getting to be an over-all context and record of disappointment when it comes to the environment.

The member for Lac-Saint-Jean, the Minister of the Environment, came to this House with a great deal of expectation held by a great many people in all parties. When he was made the Minister of the Environment there were people on all sides of the House who thought that here is a guy who might make a difference, here is a guy close to the Prime Minister, a Quebec lieutenant or whatever, maybe he can make a real difference. Instead, what happened is he had to be taken to court twice in order for the federal government to live up to its responsibilities for environmental review vis-a-vis the Rafferty-Alameda Dam. He had to be taken to court twice.

He finally did the right thing, on the last possible day he could have done it, when 60 per cent of one of the dams was already completed. Is this the great environmental hope of the Conservative government?

With respect to the international centre for sustainable development which was promised in 1988 in Winnipeg by the Prime Minister during the election campaign, have we seen anything that would give us any reason to believe that there was any sincerity in that promise at all?

I see the hon. member for Provencher is in the House. Maybe he would like to get up later and explain why we have not seen any sign at all in Winnipeg that this centre will actually ever be built. Instead, the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment will go about the globe announcing, at various environmental conferences where they get, believe it or not, awards, this international centre that they are building in Winnipeg about which they have done absolutely nothing.

How long will it be before the Canadian public wakes up? I think the Canadian public has woken up to the fact that when it comes to the environment these people are charlatans; these people are frauds; these people are tricksters; these people do not mean what they say when it comes to the environment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaikie: Shoal Lake is another Manitoba-Ontario transboundary issue. We are getting it from both sides in Manitoba. We are getting arsenic in our drinking water from Ontario and we are having the Rafferty-Alameda Dam pollute the Souris River.

What do we get from the government? The hon. member for Brandon—Souris got up, when responding to me in a late show not to long ago, and said that this is not really a matter of federal jurisdiction. And I got a letter from the Minister of National Health and Welfare the other day saying that even if he passed a safe drinking water act it would still be up to the provinces.

This is leadership? Basically it is a do anything you like to the environment scenario. These guys won't do anything unless, of course, you have enough money and enough time—and thank God the Canadian Wildlife Federation did—to take them to court and make them live up to their own responsibilities.

What we have asked for in this motion is what the Brundtland Commission asked for. We have the Prime Minister dancing all around the globe saying he supports Brundtland. He even reminded me in the House one day that he got an award from Brundtland. Yet his government is unwilling to support a motion that calls upon it to live up to the Brundtland Commission report with respect to the setting aside of natural lands, not tomorrow, not by next year, but by the year 2000, ten years from now.

This is not some ridiculous claim but simply a claim based on the scientific evidence that if we do not do this by the year 2000 we will not be able to do it ever because the very lands that need to be set aside will have disappeared as a result of development and other means of transformation.

The government opposes this motion, Madam Speaker. Surely the government is concerned, as everyone is, about the disappearance of the tropical rain forests, whether it is in Brazil, Sarawak or wherever. The government's attitude to this motion is that it has no intention of setting an example. It has no intention of being able to speak to these other countries about what they are doing to the global environment from any sort of moral high ground at all.

In fact some of these countries which are the object of global concern have already set aside more land as wilderness area, or as untouchable area, than Canada has. And yet our governments and many Canadians, in a quite self-deluding way, imagine that we are the sort of environmental good guys in the world. We are not. We have clear cut more acreage in Ontario and British Columbia than we would ever want to admit to the rest of the world. And in Manitoba now, as the result of a deal called the Repap Deal, we have ceded a fifth of the province to some entrepreneur who will turn it into disposable diapers and various other unneeded paper products. That is where we are at environmentally and yet we propose to lecture the people of Sarawak or the people of Brazil.

I think we should lecture the people of Sarawak or Brazil. But in the same way that we felt in order to make a real case to the United States about acid rain we had to have an acid cleanup action program in our own country, we need to show that we are serious about preserving old growth forests, tropical forests, whatever the case may be, on Vancouver Island and in various other parts of Canada. We have not done that. The barbarism with respect to our forestry continues. We act as if it is still the 19th century. That is what is at stake here.

I cannot imagine a more devastating argument in international circles than to have some of these countries—they have embassies here, they will notice when this is raised in international fora—say that there was a motion to the effect that Canada comply with the Brundtland Report recommendations on natural heritage by the year 2000 which was defeated in our parliament. Who are we talking to? Why should they listen to us? It was defeated by our own government. That is going to be embarrassing. It is going to be embarrassing for the government. It is going to be embarrassing for all Canadians.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Assuming the government cares.

Mr. Blaikie: My colleague from Edmonton says "assuming the government cares". I do not think the government does care, frankly. I think it sees the environment as an issue to be managed in the interests of good public relations, sort of a political problem which, if taken seriously, would be at odds with their other beliefs about the nature of economic growth and the nature of the economy. And so the government does its best to bide its time and hope to get by with the least possible environmental protection, meanwhile saying the right things, speaking to the right conferences.

This is what we have and in a way this is the downside, if you like, of everyone being concerned about the environment. As someone who has been concerned about the environment for a long time, I welcome the fact that everybody is concerned about the environment. But it makes life more difficult in a way for the environment because when everybody is for the environment, it is more difficult to tell who is really for the environment and who has just got a public relations strategy. It becomes harder and harder to discern the false prophets from the true prophets. It becomes harder and harder to distinguish the environmentalists from the ad men. That is one of the things with which we are going to have to deal. It is a necessary stage, if you like. It comes with the fact that the environment is at the top of the polls. This means that every Tom, Dick, Harry or Susan is now going to be preaching about the environment.

I think the Canadian people have to do two things; they have to ask themselves who was raising matters of the environment in this House and elsewhere across the country when everybody on this side, whether they were on this side or when they were in opposition, still thought that it was kind of a funny thing to do. They still thought that it was a kind of peculiar, hippy-dippy, left over from the sixties kind of thing to do, for back-to-the-landers and other freaks. I will tell you who it was, it was the
