With all due respect, contrary to the minister's statement that all reports that had come out indicated it was time to remove the at and east, that is not true. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission has in fact issued a number of reports. It has concluded that the at and east has had a significant impact on the ports of Halifax and Saint John.

I would point out to the minister that in 1988 some 338,000 tonnes of export grain and 183,000 tonnes of export flour moved through the port of Halifax. Tonnage for Saint John in 1988 was approximately 246,000 tonnes of export grain and 1,200 tonnes of export flour. This represents approximately 90 per cent of the total tonnage that was moved out of the at and east program in 1988.

It is a maritime program. These figures represent almost all the grain handled at the Saint John elevator and approximately 60 per cent of the volume handled at the elevator at Halifax. Now that the program has been implemented, despite not being passed by Parliament, the elevator at Saint John is now going to be closing because it cannot receive grain by water. It can only receive grain by rail, and nobody is shipping grain by rail to Saint John now that the program is gone. So it is costing jobs.

The loss of this program is going to affect more than grain elevators. Port employment will be affected, railway employment will be affected and there will be negative effects on flour millers, particularly Dover Mills in Halifax. I would like to quote from a report that the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission submitted in September 1989. Obviously the minister has not seen it.

In the report it is stated that an analysis by the commission of the regional impact of the program showed that approximately $14.4 million in economic activity will be lost to the region due to the termination of the subsidy. However, should both grain elevators in the region at Halifax and Saint John be unable to continue operations, the negative impact would amount to approximately $27.6 million. These amounts do not include any economic activity generated by the program which occurred outside the Atlantic region such as railway employment, inland elevators, lake vessels, et cetera. It has affected ports in the Ontario region as well.

It goes on to state in the second paragraph on page 3 of this report that the importance of maintaining the Halifax grain elevator as a viable operation is of critical economic importance to the entire Atlantic region. As well as the activity generated by the movement of export grain to the facility, the elevator also plays a vital role in the storage and handling of domestic feed grain and milling wheat.

Local pork, poultry and egg industries and to a lesser extent the beef industries would be seriously affected should the Halifax elevator be unable to remain in operation.

In addition, the Halifax elevator is utilized as the only means of storage for milling wheat by the only Atlantic region flour mill, Dover Flour Mills. If the elevator should close in Halifax, Dover Flour Mills will probably close as well. If the minister does not have all three reports, I will be glad to provide them to her because they are very interesting reading. They provide a good insight into the importance of this program to the maritimes.

The fact that 250 direct jobs will be lost and $27 million will be lost is only one part of it. The secondary impact is going to be just as devastating. I was in the maritimes last fall and had occasion to speak with some farmers in Prince Edward Island. Prince Edward Island has a lot of family farms. There are good family operations which grow potatoes and hay or raise hogs.

These people indicated to me that they rely on western grains because, although they grow about 80 per cent of the feed grains that they use on the island, they still need the high quality grains which come from the west.

I talked the President of Dover Flour Mills a number of times. He indicated that business has dropped some 20 per cent. In fact, Dover has lost all the competitive markets in the world in the face of the loss of this subsidy and because of the high dollar. Dover Flour Mills is simply left with CIDA projects. Canada is reducing subsidies at the same time that the U.S. is putting on subsidies.

According to the government, the free trade agreement was going to be of benefit to Canada because it would open up agricultural markets for Canadians. Although Americans have been talking of no subsidies in public, certainly officials have been telling me in private—and I am sure the government—that subsidies will remain high and perhaps get even higher.

We have seen the attack that the U.S. has levelled against Canadian agriculture. It used GATT to obtain entrance for its dairy products into Canada. It countervailed and is using harassing tactics to keep Canadians hogs and pork out of the U.S. It is threatening an attack on the use of the Western Grain Transportation Act, that is if this government does not remove it first.

What have we done in response? What did Canada do when George Bush put forward a budget calling for some $900 million for export grain subsidies and attacked our conventional markets? The U.S.S.R. has indicated it is going to buy some 12 million tonnes of grain this year and the United States has announced that it will subsidize up to three million tonnes which go to the U.S.S.R. That is a direct effect on Canada's market. What has this government done? Nothing. The government is monitoring the situation.

What is the possible logic behind this? There is no logic, if you believe in fair opportunities for Canadians in all regions of the country. There is no logic, if you believe in maintaining and promoting viable communities with viable industries in all areas of Canada. In fact, the direction this government is taking is purely and simply counterproductive to a viable, healthy economy.

It is a joke that this is supposed to be a government and a party which has the answers to the economic problems of this country. The government's answers may be beneficial for the Conrad Blacks of the world in assisting them to devour more and more of this country's wealth, but they certainly do nothing for the average Canadian.

In fact, I find it insulting and I am sure many Canadians find it insulting when the finance minister says that we have just come through good times. I think most Canadians will agree that the success of a nation is not measured by how many millionaires we have, how many domed stadiums we possess or how many Canadians can afford to travel to exotic places.

Rather, I believe that most Canadians would measure this country's success by how few homeless we have, how few people we have living below the poverty line and how few people need to use food banks. That is how success ought to be measured. In using this measurement for this government, it is quite clear that the government has failed and it has failed very badly, not for the Conrad Blacks but for average Canadians.

Yet this government is not reluctant to remove some $27 million annually and some 250 direct jobs from the maritimes. The indirect impact, as discussed earlier, will have a much broader impact to all corners of the maritimes. In addition, I have been advised that CP Rail line which goes to Saint John may no longer be viable now that the Saint John elevator is closed and the tonnage will no longer be coming.

Not only will the maritimes suffer, but this bill will have a ripple effect right across the country. Port McNicoll, Ontario, has been shut. In talking with the Canadian Wheat Board the other day they indicated that they used to send some 300,000 tonnes of grain every year through the port of Halifax alone. Now that has been reduced to something like 100,000 tonnes a year, and it may disappear altogether. They have a concern because if the port of Halifax closes—now that the port of Saint John has closed—there will be no ice free ports on the eastern seaboard in Canada. There will be none.

The Canadian Wheat Board has indicated that some purchasers of grain do not want to come into Montreal, even though it is kept open during the year, because of the ice. In fact, Cuba is a good example. Presently Cuba is buying some grain from Canada and is using Halifax port to pick up that grain.

The Canadian Wheat Board has indicated to me that all things being equal, if the Halifax port is no longer there Cuba may go somewhere else. We will be losing grain sales which we can ill afford to lose, which we are losing at a high number right now and as a result of which we are threatened in our traditional markets. We are going to shoot ourselves in the foot by closing these two ports.

The people in the maritimes have long appreciated this program. They have also been concerned about the cost of the program and ensuring that the federal government was receiving its money's worth. In fact, in 1985, as I indicated earlier, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission presented two briefs to this government. It outlined an alternative to the existing program.

Contrary to what the minister says, there have been briefs presented that do not want the program removed. They outline an alternative to the existing program. They did not propose to cancel the program but proposed changes to the program that would cut the cost of the program in half.

They volunteered this in 1985 when the program was costing between $34 million and $40 million. They presented a proposal that would save the government $20 million a year. The government ignored it. There were changes that they said would cut the program in half without eliminating any aspect of the program while maintaining a vital maritime economy. What do you suppose was the government's response to this well thought out proposal? What do you suppose the government said to the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission?

I and my fellow colleagues have been reminded numerous times by various ministers of this government's commitment to consultation. I and my colleagues have been told in sometimes not very flattering terms that when we have accused the government of not only not consulting with Canadians but not paying attention to Canadians, this government does consult. They point out that this government is one that pays attention to Canadians' needs, that it defines and develops programs for the benefit of all Canadians. Therefore, I would assume that it would at least take this proposal seriously.

The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission is not a fly-by-night group. It is a longstanding, very well respected organization representing a cross section of Atlantic Canada. It presented not just one brief in 1985, but two well documented, well thought out briefs in which it outlined how the government could change the at and east program and save $20 million a year.

What sort of response did it get from this considerate government? It could be summed up in one sentence from the third report that it submitted last September. The APTC, the commission, has never received a response to the proposals from the federal government. It never received a response, not even a peep, not so much as a whisper.

It is not that the government read the report and called representatives in to explain the proposal in detail, that it asked them to make changes, or that it acknowledged that it received the report and would be considering it. They never received a response, not even a thank you letter.

The minister has indicated that there has been no proposal that the At and East program remain. By not repsonding to these well thought out presentations, the government is displaying its arrogance. It is displaying the fact that it has lost touch with the real people of this country. In short, this government is displaying the fact that it simply does not give a damn for anyone or any group that does not agree with this government. It does not matter if you are a potato farmer in P.E.I., it does not matter if you are a lawyer in Halifax or if you are the president of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission.

Not only is this government arrogant to the people of Canada, it has been disrespectful to Parliament, disrespectful because it has already enacted Bill C-26 without the approval of Parliament. That is nothing new, it has already invoked closure 11 times, more times than any other government in the history of this country.

By taking this most unfortunate step the government has almost guaranteed that there would be no changes whatsoever to this bill at any stage. The reason is very clear that if Parliament should decide not to enact this bill or to enact another bill that would maintain the program, the government may well find that it is liable to the tune of millions of dollars for the way that people have been responding given the de facto actions of the Department of Transport.

On May 4, 1989, Transport Canada officials held a meeting with shippers and the railways to advise them that the at and east program rates would terminate effective July 15, 1989, and that on all contracts commencing on July 16 they were to charge compensatory rates.

Parliament has not passed any such legislation. In fact if any interested parties should decide to challenge this decision, I am quite sure now that they would be successful and could force the government to actually follow the law. Fortunately for this government no challenge has come forward.

If it should ever come to pass that Parliament should enact the law that is different than what is proposed in Bill C–26, then we may find that an at and east program still exists. If that should come to pass and certain businesses take this government at its word—which is a mistake—and found that they had relied on false assumptions and as a result have suffered significant losses, I suggest that the Department of Transport would find itself in a severe legal position.

As such the government is, to say the least, going to be extremely reluctant to amend any aspect of this bill. The government will argue that there is a retroactive clause and that Bill C–26 can pass validly. It is not uncommon to have retroactive legislation. These, however, are usual with respect to tax matters which are often made retroactive to budget night in order to prevent avoidance by taxpayers during the period between the budget and the date of the enactment of the law.

It is held, however, that this power to enact retroactive laws must be exercised with appropriate restraint. It is unfortunate that this government is acting with reckless abandon. I would suggest that a distinction can be made between the tax legislation which is by its nature subject to ongoing modification and a situation such as that represented by this bill before the House today. Termination of a longstanding subsidy program is having a serious economic dislocation for the affected areas, namely Saint John and Halifax.

As well, this government has been further inconsiderate of Parliament as an institution by not bringing this matter before Parliament before now. It has been eight months since Bill C–26 was given first reading and seven months since it was enforced de facto.

I believe this government has displayed a callous disregard for Parliament. As a result of this action the work of the legislative committee will be very difficult. It could well be that once the alternatives suggested by the commission are looked at and given serious attention, which they obviously have not been given until now, there may well be alternatives forthcoming to this present bill. If the government agrees to these changes it will be difficult to enact them because of the action it has taken to date.

In conclusion, this is a bill that displays the government's lack of commitment for regional development. If the government did consult, if it was considerate, it would be having serious discussions with these groups. It would be having discussions with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission.

There are other groups which it should have consulted in considering its program. There is Dover Flour Mill in Halifax, the port of Saint John, the city of Saint John, the Canadian Feed Industry Association which is going to be affected by this bill, the Halifax grain elevator, the Halifax Port Commission, the Nova Scotia Grains Commission, the Nova Scotia Grain Marketing Board, the Nova Scotia Federation of Agriculture, and the Maritime Farmers Council. They are all very concerned about the loss of this program because it is very likely going to mean the loss of the elevators at Halifax and Saint John.

As the Canadian Wheat Board indicated, the elevator at Halifax, which can receive grain by water, will have difficulty bringing out a shipload of grain because it cannot buy a full allotment at one time. At Halifax the elevator has been buying feed grain and the Canadian Wheat Board has been topping this up in order to get a full shipment out. If the Canadian Wheat Board should decide not to send grain to Halifax that will be the end of the Halifax elevator, it will be finished.

The Dover Flour Mill uses the Halifax elevator as a storage facility for the grain used for its flour. If the elevator closes, the Dover Flour Mill will be unable to take over the Halifax elevator because it would not be economically viable, and mill will close. The Dover Flour Mill is the only flour mill that exists in Atlantic Canada because of this program. It has now been placed in jeopardy.

As well, the ripple effect through the whole agricultural community in the maritimes is devastating, not to mention the dock workers who are employed for the movement of flour, but also the rail crews that are now being eliminated. There are 250 direct jobs and numerous indirect jobs which will be lost.

This bill will rob the maritimes of at least $27 million and 250 jobs directly, not mention the spin-off affect. It is tragic, that this government did not take the time to consult with the people of the maritimes. It is tragic that it did not consider the proposal of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission five years ago. In 1985 it presented an alternative that would save the government $20 million a year, which would have amounted to a $100 million now. It is unfortunate that this government did not consider that report some five years ago.

I call upon the government to stop its actions, to announce that the at and east program will continue and to take a serious look at the commission's reports. It put together not one but three reports. It called for this government to make changes. It volunteered changes to the at and east payments. The commission said that changes should be happening and suggested how it should be done.

This bill makes it very clear that the government has no regard for the average people of this country or the constitution of Parliament. It is a government that has lost touch with the people. There is a good news and a bad news aspect to this whole thing. The goods news is that the people of Canada realize that this is the kind of attitude this government has taken and they are going to toss this government out on its ear. The bad news is that we have to wait two and a half years. The good news is that tonight in the riding of Chambly we are going to start that process by electing our first New Democratic member of Parliament in the history of the province of Quebec.

I call on this government to reconsider its bill. I call on this government to look at the commission's report. I call on this government to take seriously the issues that are of concern to the people of the maritimes, such as economics. I call on this government to look seriously at this bill and to make some real changes to the at and east program so that we can maintain a viable economic situation, so that we can maintain the viable infrastructure that has existed for 25 years in the maritimes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Under Standing Order 74 the first three speakers had 40 minutes for debate. There were no questions or comments. We are now entering the period when there will be 20 minute speeches with ten minutes for questions and comments. The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to rise and comment on Bill C-26, the bill which gives effect to the cancellation of the at and east program announced in the April 27, 1989 budget.

May I echo, as an Atlantic Canadian, the words of those who have spoken before me, at least the two members who come from the opposition side of the House, that indeed the cancellation of this program is yet another blow at the fragile economy of Atlantic Canada. It is a blow that is being delivered at a time when our people and our economy lay shattered from one bad news scenario after another.

We had massive route abandonment on the railways in Atlantic Canada. The loss of the at and east contributes even further to the lack of viability of the railways in Atlantic Canada. Our fishery has been under incredible, heretofore unimagined assault. Individuals, fishing communities and, indeed, the economy indirectly all the way back to the major suppliers at the major centres are reeling under that blow.

We have had a 39 per cent reduction over the last five years of regional development spending in Atlantic Canada, an abandonment of the principle of combating regional disparity. In the agricultural sector, which is perhaps in some respects most fragile in all of Canada in the Atlantic region, we have had the cancellation, completely without consultation, completely without discussing the impact with anybody, of the at and east program, a program that has been around for approximately 25 years.

A program, yes, with faults, but one that has been very successful in contributing to the orderly marketing and export of grains in the region. Perhaps most frustrating is not that this program was cancelled completely without consultation with anybody in Atlantic Canada, or with anybody in the agricultural community across this country, because it impacts very directly on the farmers of Ontario and western Canada, but the fact that, although notice was given last April 27 of the cancellation of this program, it is only today, February 12, 1990, that the legislation giving effect to that cancellation is before the House.

Most Canadians who are not familiar with the at and east are saying, "Well, at least you had all that notice to get ready for the impact of the loss of that subsidy. At least you had time to contemplate it, time to make your case and time to prepare for the bill going to a legislative committee of Parliament, the Standing Committee of Transport, time for the people of Atlantic Canada to lobby their MPs and ministers of the Crown, time for Atlantic provincial governments to make their case and to come to Ottawa and ensure that their voices were heard". That is what the average Canadian watching these proceedings believes to be the case.

The reality is that Parliament is only today, for the first time, debating the ramifications of this bill and the loss of this program. The fact is that the cuts have already been put in place by the railways, that the impact of the loss of the at and east has been factored into the pricing arrangements of the railways for the last number of months. It is a fait accomplis. It has happened.

This Parliament is not even a rubber stamp under this government's administration. This Parliament has become a joke. It is irrelevant. Is it any wonder that people are screaming for a different kind of system, a different kind of Parliament, a Senate where every province is equal, a Senate that has the capability, when rights have been crushed, to veto the actions of the elected Parliament in a substantial and meaningful way.

This system has made a mockery of the notion that the people of Atlantic Canada have democratic rights. We had an announcement in April of 1989, we had immediate implementation, and seven or eight months later we are asked to consider it in Parliament. This Parliament, with its stained glass windows, its rich decoration and its wonderful ornamentation is nothing but a farce in so far as the people of Atlantic Canada are concerned when we have before us a bill for consideration that has already been implemented months ago.

We have not even put it to committee yet. Parliament has not said whether it favours or does not favour the bill. Parliament has not yet said whether this bill ought to be amended, changed substantially or passed exactly as it is. Parliament has made no comment. Yet, the at and east is gone. The new rates for grain have already been implemented and like a crowd of fools, every single one of us, without exception, stands here today and wastes the time and money of the people of Canada.

This Parliament has degenerated into farce under this administration. This bill is the latest example of that contempt for democratic norms being exercised by this government.

You have before you, Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege, a suggestion by a member of this place that the privileges and the rules of this institution have been breached by having this bill come for consideration after the fact.

Mr. Speaker, I respect the position of the Chair. I always, even on those days when I am disappointed with the ruling of the Chair, adhere to that ruling. I submit to you with great respect, Mr. Speaker, that you have before you a question of privilege which we in this party shall support. It is a question of privilege that will not only answer the question of whether or not the government has proceeded properly in bringing us a bill, looking for our approval after the fact, but will determine, in the final analysis, whether the people of Canada should have any respect for this institution whatsoever. It will tell us whether this is nothing but a glorified showcase for partisan points of view on both sides.

It will tell us whether or not, in the last analysis, there is taxation with representation in this land, or whether we have evolved into a presidential style of government where the Prime Minister deigns from time to time to come here and answer a few questions in Question Period. But, otherwise, we have a dictatorial majority government operating with contempt for the views of the people of Canada and contempt for the properly elected representatives of the people of Canada.

If you listen carefully, Mr. Speaker, you can hear in the silence in this place on occasion when none of us are present, the sound of jackboots.

There is an old saying that Canadians ultimately get the government they deserve. I think Canadians deserve better than this government. Ministers opposite may laugh.

Mr. McDermid: Well, you're being so foolish.

Mr. Tobin: As they drive around in their chauffeured limousines, and as they leave this place and have their coats passed to them and their boots slipped on by their assistants, and as they are carried off to their offices and told: "Yes, minister, no minister", and brought their cup of tea, and as their hats get increasingly too small and require ever larger pieces of felt to cover their brains, they may believe that they have some divine right to rule unimpeded without the difficulties of dealing with parliamentary tradition and without having to listen to the little people of Canada, who from time to time like to comment on what is happening to them. They may believe that but the people of Canada do not believe that and the people of Canada are not going to stand for this dictatorial politburo-like approach to this country.

It is an incredibly sad day. We have in eastern Europe great reform taking place. We have in eastern Europe celebration of the notion of a multi-party state. They are celebrating the possibility of having governments that are accountable to the people whom supposedly they serve. They are celebrating the possibility of governments which actually may be elected by the people they serve. While no less a person than the Prime Minister celebrates, in his deep melodious tones, this great evolution in eastern Europe, here in this Parliament when rights are squandered, ministers opposite laugh.

Ministers opposite would like to say this is exaggeration. But was it not the Speaker of the House of Commons who was forced to rule only a few months ago that advertising conducted by the government saying: "This is your GST, here is what is going to happen, save this ad" was in contempt of Parliament? Did not the Speaker of the House of Commons say that that was contemptuous of Parliament and of the people of Canada? Of course he did.

What is the difference between advertising the GST as being passed before it was considered by this place and not just advertising, but implementing, a cancellation of at and east before we have ever seen the bill? The contempt is equal. For the people of Atlantic Canada the ruling of the Chair is fundamental.

It is not fundamental to whether or not Atlantic Canada is going to be treated properly, not to whether there is a sensitivity to the devastating impact of this bill on the region, indeed on farmers in Ontario as well, but to whether this Canada, this federation of peoples and provinces, this experiment in democracy, this lesson to the world of how a nation should govern itself, is as pristine and as pure we would like to believe it is.

Let the government be put on notice that this bill will get no easy ride in this Parliament or in committee. We, in the Liberal Party of Canada, the Official Opposition, I hope joined by my colleagues in the other opposition party, will do everything in our power to ensure that justice is not only done but is seen to be done and that the people of Canada know we will stop this meltdown of our democratic institutions by the government opposite.

What has happened as a result of this bill? First, there was no consultation with the region or with agricultural organizations right across Canada. None whatsoever. What has happened? The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission recommended changes to the bill, as was pointed out by the member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre. It made recommendations as to how the at and east could save up to 50 per cent of the cost of the program and got absolutely no response from these great believers in democracy opposite. Nothing but the sound of silence followed the recommendation and representations of the business community as represented by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission in Atlantic Canada. What a singular act of contempt to not even bother to write back and say: "No or yes, bad idea or good idea". There was absolutely nothing. What has happened?

Mr. McDermid: He's choking on his own words.

Mr. Tobin: No, I'm not choking on my own words, I'm choking at the spectacle of the minister opposite sitting there with a sly grin on his face assuming that the pain, passion, frustration and anger of the people of Atlantic Canada is nothing but a joke on a Monday afternoon.

Mr. McDermid: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Tobin: He has come awake, Mr. Speaker. He has risen from his slumber.

Mr. McDermid: I am sure the hon. member would not want to impugn motives. The minister was not smirking or smiling or making any gestures at the time. The hon. member has the habit of, shall I say, expanding on some of his comments in the House of Commons. All I ask is for him to be fair and honest. He knows full well that the minister at whom he was pointing and the other ministers in this House were not smiling or smirking at anything that was going on in Atlantic Canada. He knows that and I ask him to be fair and honest in his debate in this House.

• (1650)

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, for a good part of my speech the hon. minister opposite more resembled a jackal than a member of Parliament, in terms of his response to what I was saying. In the interest of being fair, it is passing strange that the minister, because he is here, has the right to stand, defend himself, and put forward another point of view, but the people of Atlantic Canada, whose representations were not even acknowledged let alone responded to, are at home today having still not received a response from this minister's government to their proposals which are now four years old. This goes back to 1985. They received not a word, Mr. Speaker.

It is not the people of Atlantic Canada who are ignored, it is not the 250 workers who are going to be laid off, it is not the grain elevator lost in Saint John, it is not the grain elevator that is now closing down in Georgian Bay, Ontario, it is not the loss of a fragile agricultural community that is offended; it is the minister opposite who is offended. He has been terribly offended. How dare we, in the name of democracy and the people of Atlantic Canada, toss insults his way.

What kind of priority does this government have? One lays out the case and states the facts, which the minister has not denied. But the minister does not get up and say: "I have news for you, we are going to consult", or "I have news for you, we are going to withdraw this bill because the process was not right", or "I have news for you, I agree it is a contempt of Parliament to implement the bill before it was even introduced. We are going to do something. I am on my way to Atlantic Canada. I have arranged meetings. I have booked the airplane". He gets up and says, "I want the member to be fair and not say nasty things about me". Well, I have to tell the minister opposite that in the list of people for whom I have compassion, the minister is very close to the bottom.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: Now they are waking up, now they are coming alive, now they are pretending they are members of Parliament and not trained seals.

What has happened as a consequence of this government's bill? What has the government done? We now have the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission making recommendations. It is saying that it has accepted that the government is not going to talk to it. It has accepted that the government is not going to listen to it. It has accepted that the government is not going to withdraw the bill and it has accepted that the government, like a bull in a china shop, is going to destroy everything in its wake. It asks that the government now at least consider proposals it has made to be implemented after the fact.

What are those proposals? The minister is shaking his hand at me. He has his finger out and is pointing it. He is gritting his teeth. Is there something you want to say?

Mr. Belsher: He's not doing any of that.

Mr. Tobin: He certainly was doing that. If the member opposite was not asleep he would have seen it. If the minister wants to get to his feet and say something, I will cede my time.

Mr. Andre: You're such a fool, Tobin. Quit embarrassing yourself. You're embarrassing yourself and this chamber.

Mr. Tobin: Oh, Mr. Speaker, we have that other great friend of Atlantic Canada, the minister of postal closings, now joining the fray. The minister for privatization and postal closings has just come awake.

Mr. Speaker, what recommendations have been made by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission? It recommended the use of unit trains from Thunder Bay or direct from prairie origins to move export grain to both Saint John and Halifax. It has asked that the government permit the use of water transport to Halifax and Saint John for Plan C feed grain.

Now get this, Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission has asked for the elimination of the countervail duty on U.S. corn. Canada has imposed countervail on U.S. corn coming into Canada because that corn is subsidized and we have said that if it is subsidized we are going to put a countervail on it. One result of the actions of this government is there is now an agency in Atlantic Canada lobbying the Government of Canada to take a countervail off U.S. corn, putting our own farmers at a disadvantage as a result, because they are desperate to survive, given the cancellation of the at and east.

What else have they been forced to ask for? They have asked for the provision of permits allowing the importation of feed grains from foreign countries. Atlantic Canadians have been forced, number one, to ask their government to take the countervail off U.S. corn coming into Canada. That is sad, because the at and east is gone. Second, Atlantic Canadians are now asking their government to allow the import of foreign grains into Canada. The government has made the possibility of continuing to be served in Atlantic Canada by Quebec and Ontario so uneconomic, so enviable that we now want to put Canadian farmers out of business by importing foreign grain.

Is that what we want in this country? That is not what we want in Atlantic Canada. Atlantic Canada wants to remain a part of this country and wants to continue to do business with the farmers of Quebec and Ontario. It does not want to lobby for countervail being removed from U.S. products and does not want to import products from outside this country when we can get them right here. When you take a region and cut it off at the knees, when you eliminate a subsidy that makes business possible between Quebec and Ontario, and Atlantic Canada, you cannot expect people to lie down and play dead. You actually force them to ask for measures that are not in the best interests in the long term of Canada.

I ask this government, for all the reasons I have mentioned, to reconsider this bill, to reconsider the impact on the region and, indeed, on farmers in Quebec and Ontario. I ask this government to withdraw the bill, to have a proper consultation process. I serve notice that failure to do that will meet with an extremely rough ride for this piece of legislation in the appropriate legislative committee, in this case the Standing Committee on Transport.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I must say that I agree entirely with the position taken by the member from Newfoundland. Talk about kicking a victim when it is down. In relation to the real impact of this change, I wonder if the member would comment on the two or three areas he mentioned that are really going to be impacted by the imposition of this change in the at and east rates, and also on the effect of it, not only on the elevators and the flour mills but on other parts of the maritimes as well as the west and Ontario.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. I think we could remind ourselves of the stated purpose of this bill when it was introduced by the Hon. Jack Pickersgill, then a Newfoundland member of Parliament, in 1966. He said that the purpose of the at and east was to ensure that eastern Canadian ports could compete with U.S. ports, to enable the ports of Halifax and Saint John to compete with Montreal and other St. Lawrence River ports and to provide for the orderly marketing of grain.

Mr. McDermid: It's a subsidy.

Mr. Tobin: The minister opposite says that it is a subsidy as though "subsidy" were a dirty word.

The reality is that in addition to the loss of the elevator at Saint John, which has already been announced, and the loss of the elevator on Georgian Bay at Port McNicoll, it has called into question the continued viability of the elevator and flour mill at Halifax. By extension, it probably will result in increased input costs for farmers in the Atlantic region who, in many instances, are completely on the edge of viability. Farmers who, with any substantial increase whatsoever, are going to be out of business. Hence the ability of the Atlantic region, in some measure, to maintain an agricultural industry and to feed itself.

Another impact that I am sure is not unknown to the government is that with the loss of the at and east subsidy and subsequent loss of business, it is not only probable but likely that we are going to see additional pressure brought to bear by CN and by CP, but primarily by CN, for additional rail line abandonment in Atlantic Canada. With the exception of a couple of runs we have totally lost the VIA Rail traffic. Over the years we have seen the loss of many of the CN freight routes. Newfoundland and P.E.I. are gone entirely. CN has indicated that it wants to abandon more routes.

The loss of the subsidy will increase pressure in that regard as well. Fundamentally the transportation infrastructure of the region, which is sparsely populated but relatively large, is being torn away. Frankly we all know the backbone of any economy, in particular a rural economy, has got to be good transportation infrastructure. That is being destroyed, and this bill contributes significantly to that destruction.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my colleague if he has looked at the principle behind this particular bill as being closely related to the Western Grain Transportation Act. Of course in a country as huge, beautiful and diverse as what we have here, the corollary is the huge transportation and shipping costs. Ever since Confederation, and even before that, we have always worked as Canadians to build this country from east to west and to bring in programs that would make one section available to another section. In this case it is to make western grain available to eastern Canada.

I wonder if he sees this particular bill as another move by this administration toward a north–south relationship and to cut Atlantic Canada adrift from the rest of Canada and make it rely on imported grain from the United States or other countries.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex said it very well. The fact of the matter is that we have had the movement of western and central Canadian grain into Atlantic Canada. From the west Ontario is the east, but from where I live Ontario is the centre. The loss of the at and east is going to cause that movement to subside substantially.

I do not blame the organization in question. However, I think it is sad when the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission is reduced to petitioning the Government of Canada to remove a countervail that properly has been placed against U.S. corn. It is being done not because there is any desire to replace U.S. corn with Canadian corn, but because the underpinnings, the infrastructure in the region, has been stripped away by this government and the region is desperate.

It is equally sad when the commission, seeing the ability to move western grain into eastern ports being destroyed, is forced to ask the Government of Canada to allow the import of foreign grains over Canadian grains, thus displacing Canadian farmers. It is not done out of any lack of loyalty to the country or out of any lack of desire to continue the trade and commerce between the regions. It is done because there is no choice. Of course we are seeing powerful forces working to increase the north–south pull in the Atlantic regions. There are powerful forces at work in eliminating the east–south trade in the Atlantic region. That cannot be good for national unity.

When we have one region of the country as a consequence of the policy of the government being forced to petition the Government of Canada to remove a countervail on U.S. corn, at a time when another region of the country, in this case Ontario farmers, have successfully made a case for that countervail in the first place, then government policies are not contributing to national unity. They are contributing to a set of circumstances which are eating away at the glue that holds the country together and rending the fabric that holds this country together.

What is tragic is that those policies and the effect of those policies are probably not even by design. They are by accident. The government has no idea what it is doing, beyond being concerned about the bottom line and saving, relatively speaking, a pittance. Beyond the bottom line there is no understanding of what the consequences are for Canada and what the impact is on the notion that we live in one country and that we share trade, develop common values, and find ways to bind us together.

This bill contributes toward the destruction of national unity in this country.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to join in the debate this afternoon on Bill C-26, an act to amend the Railway Act, which really boils down to the destruction of the at and east rail freight rate program.

The members who have spoken before me have outlined some of the problems with this bill, especially with respect to how it impacts on the farmers in Atlantic Canada, on grain elevators in the Georgian Bay ports, and so on.

We have to look at this bill in terms of what the government is doing, that is doing away with unilaterally support programs for agriculture in Canada. That is the genesis of the bill.

The bill really results from a budget last spring which essentially said "we are going to cut government support programs to agriculture". We did not know at that time how devastating those cuts would be because it seemed like the government was talking about $500 million over the next two years. In fact it is much more than that if we count the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Special Canadian Grains Program, which are needed just as desperately today as they were in the past two or three years. We see that the government is really withdrawing from agriculture to the tune of some $2.5 billion.

This bill before us today is part of that act of withdrawing some $500 million. The actual cost of the support program for grain and flour transportation under the at and east is some $60 million.

If we look at our competition, the people with whom we compete in the world, we see the United States increasing its support programs for transportation, loan rates for grains and so on, but most of all support programs for exports. Some $900 million will be provided in support programs to take away markets from Canadian producers in Russia, China, the Middle East, Africa and so on. The United States is continuing to wage war on Canadian agricultural producers. This support program is only one small part of that withdrawal by the government, but it is certainly important to our producers. It is extremely important to Atlantic farmers and to the Atlantic economy.

This is at a time when the Atlantic economy is being slaughtered not only by government programs but by the government's maintenance of the fishery. We see nightly on television those programs being withdrawn. We see whole communities being destroyed. If we look at the response of groups like the Atlantic farm organizations, we see that they are certainly not pleased with this action by the government.

As I said, this measure involves only some $60 million, but it is a very important support program. It is part of that $500 million that was withdrawn which involves crop insurance, $200 million; the rail branch line rehabilitation program, $48 million; grain and crop advance payment program, for which we fought hard in the House last fall; the dairy export program; the commodity based loan program; the Canadian Dairy Commission program; and the rebate on fuel tax for agriculture amounting to $500 million over the next two years.

We keep hearing that the incoming budget is to be even more Draconian than the one we have seen so far.

• (1710)

After I read this in the budget I had an opportunity to hear representations from the Maritime Farmers Council. The council wrote a letter to me in June of this year in which it estimates that the additional cost for livestock and poultry milling wheat will be some $9,120,000 or $21 per tonne for the 400,000 tonnes of prairie grain and Ontario corn which is imported into the Atlantic region each year.

I wrote to the Minister of Agriculture to ask him to withdraw this action in view of the very adverse impact it would have on Canadian agriculture, especially in Atlantic Canada. It was very interesting that the minister took several months to reply. When he did he simply said that the program was not necessary any longer and that it no longer serves its original purpose. Thus the decision was made to conclude it as of July 15. Several members have already argued strenuously that that is a unilateral decision. The legislation is there. The government has no authority to withdraw its legislation on the books. It should not be withdrawn.

Interestingly enough, I wrote back to the minister and said clearly that one of the original purposes of the program was to assist Atlantic farmers in having a more realistic price for their livestock feeds. The minister wrote back and said he recognized that the maintenance of water transportation of feed grain in the Atlantic region was crucial and that the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds would be announcing measures to that effect in the near future. That was in a letter from the Minister of Agriculture on December 13.

I wrote immediately to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds to see what he was going to be announcing to assist these producers in Atlantic Canada. So far we have heard nothing. One begins to wonder whether there is anything there. Clearly there does not seem to be any action by the government to support Atlantic agriculture even though the maritime farmers group has outlined the extremely adverse impact that the removal of this support program would have on their industry.

We only have to look from there to the figures that point out the economic impact of the removal of the at and east program. A statement provided to members gives an outline of what the impact will be at the Halifax and Saint John elevators. In the grain elevators and flour mill the impact in dollars is some $5,446,000. This includes the wages and benefits paid to elevator employees in Saint John and Halifax, local goods and services purchased by elevators, and the capital cost of storage facilities of the flour mill.

It is my understanding that already the Saint John elevator has signalled its closure. One wonders whether Halifax can be far behind.

With regard to additional costs of livestock and poultry feed, I have already mentioned that the impact of that is outlined by the farm groups in Atlantic Canada at some $9.12 million. That is a major new cost to those producers. The minister has said: "We are going to announce some program to compensate for that". He has turned that over to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds and so far there has been no announcement in that regard. Not only do we see a reduced economic impact in Atlantic Canada, but we see hardship for the agricultural producers there.

The third item is the economic impact of this bill. As outlined, it is on the estimated cost of ports and railways. Based on the data supplied by Ports Canada for wages of longshoremen, train crews, switching crews, freight handlers and ports costs, it is estimated that those costs will be $13,084,000. This is an area that has not only been hard pressed by cut-backs in fishing quotas but also cut-backs in VIA Rail and the removal of Department of National Defence installations. The total economic impact of this support program is some $27 million, which is an estimate by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission.

We see a Draconian measure here that not only has an extremely adverse impact on agriculture in Atlantic Canada but on the general economy in the port cities of Saint John and Halifax.

This is a general withdrawal by the government of its support programs. I do not think there has ever been a time in our history when agriculture has faced such dismal prospects in terms of net farm income or uncertainty due to the government's actions.

If we look at the net farm income for the prairie provinces, we see that next year Saskatchewan faces a negative net farm income of some $9 million, down from over $1 billion in this past year. The government, in its Green Paper on agriculture, has said that its policy is to remove support programs. We have seen this in the budget. This measure is part of the program to open up markets and to destroy marketing boards.

Interestingly enough, the government talks about regional sensitivity. Nothing could be further from the truth. If we destroy marketing boards, as is certainly in the cards judging by the way the government is moving, the dairy and poultry industries in Atlantic Canada will surely be destroyed. The same is true if we take away support programs like the at and east rate which is so helpful in terms of transportation.

This bill is part of an over-all scheme of the government as outlined in its Green Paper, which will be extremely harmful to all parts of the country.

Today in the House the Minister of Agriculture was talking about what action he would take under the free trade deal. Clearly the relationship with the United States, our largest trading partner in agriculture, has never been in such a deplorable state. We have the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Yeutter, providing some $900 million in the export enhancement program to steal away markets from Canadian agricultural wheat and grain producers in western Canada. He is providing subsidies of $20 a tonne and more to those markets in China and Russia which are our traditional customers.

If we look at Article 701.4 of the free trade deal we see that it states:

> Each Party shall take into account the export interests of the other Party in the use of any export subsidy on any agricultural goods exported to third countries, recognizing that such subsidies may have prejudicial effects on the export interests of the other Party.

That is what I am talking about.

The U.S. is putting in place a $900 million export subsidy program while we are removing support programs for our industry. What could be more absurd than the actions we see? Clearly the government is unilaterally pulling away the underpinning, the support programs, while at the same time the Americans are dramatically reinforcing and increasing their programs over the next seven years to the tune of almost a billion dollars.

We do not only have to look at the grain industry which includes wheat, barley and other grain commodities for which our markets are being raided by the United States. Let us look at the arrangement we have seen in the pork countervail case of last September. The Prime Minister promised that the United States countervail law, the dumping duty law, could not apply to Canada, period. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Last September the United States imposed a countervail duty which in 15 months' time could be increased dramatically from 8 cents a kilo to two or three times that as a result of our support programs in Canada. We see an industry which is in very severe decline because of the threat of that countervail. The Prime Minister's promise that the United States trade law could not apply to Canada, period, is really hollow to those producers.

In the Green Paper the minister talks about regional sensitivity and about maintaining a viable agricultural industry in Atlantic Canada. If the decision on ice cream and yogurt brought down by the GATT panel last November and accepted by this government is implemented at the end of the GATT negotiations this year, clearly our whole market for processed dairy products—some 60 per cent of our entire production—will be open to imports from the United States. This will have a very adverse negative impact on regional agriculture, especially in Ontario and Quebec but just as much in Atlantic Canada.

The Minister of Agriculture in a speech he made last week complained about harassment by the United States of our beef industry and our exports to the United States. The U.S. government has dramatically increased the number of inspections of our exports. He talked about increasing the inspection fees in the U.S. from $100 to $700.

The free trade deal was supposed to solve the problems caused by non-tariff barriers, export enhancement subsidies, and pork countervail. It was supposed to preserve supply management and marketing boards. Clearly none of that has happened.

Our trade problems in agriculture have increased dramatically. The United States is demanding total access to our markets, for example in the area of ice cream and yogurt, markets to which it has not had access before because of tariffs. Those tariffs are coming off. At the same time the U.S. is restricting access to its markets, whether it is in pork, beef or whatever.

We have a government that is unilaterally cutting its own throat, cutting the throat of agriculture in Canada, by reducing support programs while at the same time the United States is dramatically increasing its support programs. It is little wonder that agriculture in this country is facing the greatest uncertainty that it ever has in the past.

The government has fumbled the ball in the free trade deal. Everything is falling apart under that arrangement—the marketing boards, the countervails on pork and the export subsidies on grain by the U.S. The bill before us tonight is part of a decline in support for agriculture at a time when the industry desperately needs the support. While we are cutting back unilaterally the United States and other countries are maintaining their full force in support of agriculture.

The disturbing part is that this comes at an adverse time both for our exporters and for Atlantic Canada. While they are facing perhaps one of the worst economic crises in their history, the government is withdrawing its support not only in economic terms for the grain industry and flour industry in Saint John and Halifax but as well for the agricultural producers.

We are opposed to this legislation. We intend to oppose it in every way possible. It is unilateral action which is not being matched by our trading partners, by the United States, even though we have signed a free trade deal which is supposed to guarantee that we will co-operate. We are co-operating. We are unilaterally removing support programs while at the same time the U.S. is increasing its support programs to take away world markets and to support its own producers.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the at and east rate is relative to the freight rates to some extent from Boston east. It was brought in, in 1959, to make sure that grains used by the flour industry, and to some extent by the people involved in the movement of flour, and the poultry and hog industry as well, be bought through Canadians instead of Americans.

The reason given by the minister today for bringing in this bill was that this was no longer a problem. However, one of the suggestions of the Atlantic Provinces Transport Commission was that it buy grain from the U.S., if the countervail were taken off corn, or from Europe because it was cheaper to ship it from there.

I would like the member to comment on whether or not this is really any different from the original need, which was to get the eastern provinces to buy Ontario and western grain for their needs.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt. Clearly, as he mentioned, this support program is very important to Atlantic Canada. The Maritime Farmers Council has suggested that the additional costs to Atlantic Canada will be some $21 per tonne for some 400 tonnes of prairie grains and Ontario corn.

As I mentioned, the Minister of Agriculture admitted in a letter to me dated December 13 that this would increase the cost of grains to Atlantic Canada. He said that the maintenance of the Halifax elevator is part of a broader set of issues related to the feed cost problem in Atlantic Canada.

In the current federal-provincial agriculture policy review, the Atlantic livestock producers will have the opportunity to bring forward ideas to help improve the viability of their industry. In the interim, I recognize that the maintenance of water transportation of feed grain in the Atlantic region is crucial and the minister will be announcing a measure to that effect in the near future. That letter was written December 13.

I wrote to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds immediately. So far there has been no indication. If the Minister of State for Transportation was suggesting that this was no longer necessary, she should check with the Minister of Agriculture because he says that it is necessary, that there is some program coming forward.

It seems to me when this budget statement came out last April that Atlantic Canada and the producers indicated that they were facing a $21 per tonne increase in the cost of feed. Almost a year later the government still has not responded as to what support will be provided.

The Hon. Member for Saskatoon—Humboldt has raised an important question. If the government does not come through with whatever this new program will be, we could face the situation in Atlantic Canada of using American grains or off-shore grains to provide feed for the Atlantic Canada livestock producers rather than use our own grain from Ontario and western Canada ports.

The government does not have its act together. It is just like the way the Prime Minister negotiated the free trade deal where essentially you give everything away and then you trumpet what a great deal you got. If people do not believe you, you spend a few million dollars telling everybody what a great deal you got.

That seems to be what is happening. We are moving a support program which makes our industry in Atlantic Canada less competitive and, while the Americans are increasing their export enhancement program by some $900 million, the Secretary of Agriculture is saying that that is only the beginning. He will put more in if necessary.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, we have a need for regional development in this country. It has been a history of past federal governments since Confederation to promote regional development. In the past few years we have seen some real difficulties. Certainly from Saskatchewan's point of view, we have seen programs suffer and unemployment go up. In fact, Saskatchewan now has the second highest number of people living below the poverty line, second only to Newfoundland.

I would like to ask the hon. member his thoughts with respect to the maritimes and the need for regional diversification. The fishing industry is suffering in that area of the country and there is a need to maintain a viable agricultural community. I would like to ask the member what his thoughts are with respect to the need to maintain regional diversification, not only in the maritimes but throughout the country.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I think that is extremely important. If free market forces solve regional development problems in this country, they would have been solved already. Clearly they cannot be solved by free market forces. They have not been solved in the last 120 years and they will not be solved, in my opinion, in that way. That is why I believe that the minister's green paper on the future of agriculture is really unbelievable. He says that we are going to remove support programs unilaterally. Whether or not the Americans or other countries do, we are going to become market sensitive and open our markets even though the Americans are closing their markets to most of our commodities. When you do those two things, you destroy marketing boards.

If you go to Atlantic Canada and look at the agriculture there, because of marketing boards and the system of support programs, they have a viable agriculture industry, whether in the production of potatoes, dairy and poultry products or processed foods in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

During the free trade debate there were hearings in Fredericton, New Brunswick. If you want to see what free trade will do for Atlantic Canada and New Brunswick, walk over to the state of Maine. They have had free trade with the rest of the United States for the last 50 or 100 years. The dairy and poultry industry and other industries hardly exist there because there is no system to encourage them to produce and be viable.

I think one of the most important tools of regional development in at least three and to some extent the fourth Atlantic province is maintaining a viable agriculture industry. The first two tenets of the Minister of Agriculture's policy remove support programs unilaterally, whether our trading partners do or not and throw markets wide open to imports which will destroy marketing boards. This will destroy much of the regional economy in Canada which is doing quite well because of the systems of marketing we have. They are superior to what they are doing in Maine and in most of the northern tier of the United States.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time I have had to speak on transportation programs such as the at and east rate for various regions in Canada. History tells us that the reason it is called the at and east rate is that it is based on what the American railroads were doing from Buffalo east to the Atlantic coast ports in the United States. Hence their name "at and east", the ports from Lake Huron, Georgian Bay, the upper and lower St. Lawrence and the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I want to submit to you, Sir, and I hope you will raise this matter in consultations that will go on, that this should not be dealt with in this House until the Speaker of the House of Commons and the National Transportation Agency have ruled on the action of the government. This would be a ruling by the Chair. The action of the railways should be the subject of a ruling of the National Transportation Agency, before which there is now an application on the implementation of the Railway Act.

Since last summer, the government has disobeyed the law of the land. The railways have ceased collecting and the railroads have been charging those who formerly got the benefits of the at and east rates, that is the full commercial rate in violation of the Railway Act. The government has ordered the railroads to do that. The government has not put up a single nickel since last summer. The legislation has not passed second reading, let alone receive Royal Assent. If there was ever a travesty of the parliamentary and democratic process, this is another one.

The Chair ruled recently about government advertising of legislation that had not passed Parliament. That was to spend money. This time the government is breaking the law of the land to save some money at the expense of western grain producers, the Atlantic provinces and Great Lakes ports. In my opinion, there can be no doubt the Chair must rule that the government must cease and desist in implementing what this bill requires before it becomes an act of Parliament. If we have to take the National Transportation Agency to court for not implementing the Railway Act, so be it. We will see this government in court because it is that serious.

I hope, Sir, that you will ask your colleagues, the Clerk and Clerk Assistants, to take this into consideration. I have been here for the same length of time as you have, Mr. Speaker, quite a while, and I do not recall the government implementing a law before it has been passed by Parliament. No money has been paid under the at and east rates since last summer. The government has become a little worried about it and has requested the railroads to keep track of it all, just in case it is found to be like a sick bird, illegal.

I know, Mr. Speaker, you would like to bring in a substitute but I wanted to get that word in to you before you did.

My final point on this is that the government in fact has advertised this legislation by ordering it to be carried out before it was passed.

Another point I want to make is that the bill is wrong in principle because it flies in the face of what this country has done since before 1867. Our forefathers took into account the whole settlement of the nation. They took into account our geography, our climate and where our people were located and where they produced and processed their goods. That is why there was the Crow's Nest Pass agreement of 1897.

That is why there were subsequently programs such as the bridge rates to get goods across northern Ontario where, at that time, there were very few people living. The trains did not need to stop and start up very often. There was no St. Lawrence Seaway. Subsequently, there was the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and the at and east rates which are now almost one-quarter of a century old. All of these programs should be looked at every five years or so and assessed as to how well they are doing and what improvements might be made. Nobody is suggesting they are perfect. The problem is, whenever a government says it is time to review something, it sure as heck does not review it to improve it. It reviews it to get rid of it and the government does not consult with the people who depend on that program.

Another reason for these programs was to protect ourselves from what the Americans were doing, then and now. Halifax and Saint John are two of the very few ice-free ports that we have. I guess one could add a couple or three more such as Vancouver, Prince Rupert and New Westminster. We could add Saint John, but they took away the railroad. You do not truck grain that far for export, milling wheat or flour. You cannot count Saint John. So Halifax and Saint John are the only two that are ice-free.

The Americans will be increasing the Export Enhancement Program from approximately $530 million to $900 million in their next budget. What does the government do to protect Canadians in a region of Canada that has already suffered too much? It cancelled one of the few remaining programs they have. It means something to the ports of Halifax and Saint John, to the feed grain producers in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and to the milling industry in Halifax and Ontario.

We used to have half a dozen or more flour mills in the prairie provinces and we have lost all but one or two of them. We should be processing our production right where we produce it. We send it away because of some misbegotten principle that an end product costs more to move than a bulk product. I have never believed that even from my first days on the railroad and neither did my father before me.

I remember receiving a cabinet document in a plain brown envelope in 1981. I had a press conference in Regina and one here in Ottawa. This document outlined a long term policy. That was under a Liberal government, but it outlined the long-term policy that over a number of years, the government would get out from under every single transportation assistance program. It has continued in progression ever since then.

When we were in the Atlantic provinces dealing with deregulation and some of my colleagues were there dealing with the free trade deal, and when we held hearings on the Crow rate debate in 1982 and 1983, we warned the people of the Atlantic provinces. I am sad to say, too many of them did not believe us. They believe us now.

I am not going to fault members of the Official Opposition because most of them were not here. When Otto Lang made his famous speeches in 1974 and 1975 that it was time to review the Crowsnest Pass rates, and all the other transportation programs, you sure as hell could bet on it, he was not going to review them up. So I am not faulting my colleagues in the present Official Opposition. Most of them were not here. I think they have repented the sins of their predecessors and have learned better.

What staggers me are the Conservatives who were present then and fought along with us as the Official Opposition, bitterly, tough and hard. It did not matter whether it was the Crow rate or branch line abandonment. They fought along with us as hard as they could.

I suppose one of the saddest experiences I have ever gone through in the House of Commons is seeing the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture. He and I sat together hour after hour, week after week, and year after year fighting together against what he and his government are doing now. He is a good friend and another member of the class of 1968. I say to myself in sadness and sorrow: "Where the hell is he now?"

There is more to this than the government saving an average of $32 million a year. That is what the average cost of the at and east rates has been. It has to do with our whole nationhood. It has to do with the west and it has to do with the Atlantic provinces. When one of us gets hurt, all the rest of us get hurt either then or later. It has happened ad nauseam over the last 20 years. To rebuild the economy in the Atlantic provinces and on the prairies, we have to keep the present programs, improve them and enlarge them. The principle is that the nation as a whole shares in the cost of our nationhood. We do not victimize one province or one region because we have to reduce the budget and the deficit.

We will oppose this bill in principle because it has no principles. It flies in the face of the principles of our nation and our history. The government thinks it is going to save $32 million a year. What it will cost in unemployment insurance, severance pay and a host of other things for the 500 or 600 people who are employed directly or indirectly in Halifax and Saint John, plus the cost to the railroads, intermediate ports and terminals—Midland, Ontario, for example—western grain producers and how much more it will cost the Canadian Wheat Board to export our milling grain and flour will be more, much more than $32 million. It is a false economy and it hurts Canadians. It hurts Canadians in the areas who have already been hurt too much.

The Crow's Nest Pass and bridge rates are gone. The government has been niggling away at the Maritime Freight Rates Act and the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act. We have lost more than 3,000 miles of branch-lines and now it is hitting Quebec, Ontario and the Atlantic provinces. Two provinces, Newfoundland and P.E.I., will have no railroad at all. We lost the two-price wheat. We lost interest-free cash advances. And the government brags about how much it has done for agriculture. With friends like that, I wish they would go away.

There used to be a three-way deal. The Soviet Union would sign a contract for one, two or three million tonnes of Canadian grain. It was assisting Cuba. It asked Canada to mill a certain portion of that grain into flour and ship it to Cuba. The Cubans, who did not have dollars or roubles, sent the equivalent value in sugar and rum to the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union paid us in cash. It worked for several years as a beautiful three-way deal. Dover Flour Mills in Halifax milled a lot of that flour. A lot of it was milled in mills in Ontario and in Montreal. We even shipped some from Saskatoon. That is gone. It is down the drain.

Then one hears about the additional subsidy and export enhancement which will bring the American subsidy up to as much as $30 a tonne depending on the kind and quality of grain. One hears about people in Atlantic Canada saying in desperation that it would be cheaper for us to import seed grain from Europe. My God, what are we doing? We are debating the same nonsense we started with the unlamented Otto Lang, only these guys are doing it in spades.

There is the other problem called harmonization. The government is so desperate to make sure that the United States is happy with us under the free trade agreement that we do not want to hurt their feelings. It considers the Canadian Wheat Board, the at and east rates, and our standards on plywood to be unfair. As a result this government is bringing in legislation and regulations, not to benefit Canada, but to bring us into line with the wishes of the United States government and United States Congress. There can be no doubt about that.

It used to be a firing-squad offence things for traitorous behaviour and for cowardice in the face of the enemy. In this case they talk about the economic enemy and, for that matter, a social enemy. In other ways they are good friends. The Americans are angry at us for one of the rare occasions we put a countervail on U.S. corn.

It is coming into Ontario mainly, and a little into Quebec, at outrageously subsidized prices and they are complaining.

I urge the Chair to say this bill cannot be dealt with until the government enforces the law this bill is trying to change. One cannot make the law and a bill like this retroactive. It is rare when that happens and budget bills are among the few in which it does happen. We also have to wait until the National Transportation Agency rules on their jurisdiction being usurped, preventing them from implementing the Railway Act, enforcing the Railway Act on both Canadian railways.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, back in the early 1970s and the late 1960s a group of farmers and transportation people took the government department to court regarding the temporary reserves act and won that particular case. Would the Hon. Member for Regina—Lumsden, who was in the House at that time, comment on the circumstances under which that case was brought to court and what happened.

Mr. Benjamin: I am glad my colleague for Saskatoon—Humboldt reminded me. It was in 1970 or 1971 that the then minister brought in a bill called, "Lower Inventories for Tomorrow". Imagine paying farmers not to grow food, if that was not stupid enough. In the bill was a clause that repealed the temporary Wheat Reserves Act retroactively for 18 months. So that is not the first time I have seen this retroactive nonsense. We checked with some legal eagles and we were told that I could not take the government to court, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the farmer's union could not take them to court, that it had to be somebody who had a direct interest in the matter.

The temporary Wheat Reserves Act was a measure whereby, if there was more that a certain amount of grain in store at the end of a crop year, and I think the ceiling was 175 million bushels, for anything more than that the federal government paid the storage costs. It was not the farmer's fault that the Seaway was frozen. It was not the farmer's fault that international markets had gone to hell. The government protected them. They tried to retroactively cancel the temporary Wheat Reserves Act, and the government had not sent a nickel to the Canadian Wheat Board for 18 months. It came to nice tidy figure of a little over $96 million that the government of day owed to the Canadian Wheat Board.

We did some more inquiring. I got a well-to-do farmer and a poor farmer and a couple of middle-sized farmers in my hon. friend's constituency that used to be called Assiniboia, in the area in Milestone, and we took them to Federal Court. The Deputy Minister of Justice, the judge, the interpreters, the whole works had to be flown to Regina. God knows what that cost. The Minister of Justice of the day, the most recent leader of the official opposition, and the Minister of Finance of the day were ready to shoot one Otto Lang, only nobody would let them have a gun.

We not only won the $96 million, we won $1.7 in interest charges. Then we won another $2,700 in court costs. I was a little worried about who was going to put up the court costs, but we won it. Why? Because the government of that day attempted to retroactively prevent their agencies from enforcing the law that the Parliament of Canada had passed. That is exactly what is being attempted now. By the way, we did not get an injunction. We applied for and got a writ of mandamus, which is the opposite of an injunction. An injunction states that you cannot do something. A writ of mandamus states that you must do something. In that instance it was: "You must obey your own law". Mr. Speaker, this government must obey its own law.

It is bad enough that they bring this bill in to take effect today without royal assent. But to bring it in retroactive for 18 months—and it will be that much, at least—but if it ever gets through here, it is the same principle. That flies in the face of a democratic system. It flies in the face of the principle that the first one to obey the law is the government itself.

I always thought that might be a lesson for years to come for any government of any political stripe. Obviously, it has not been. If we have to go through that exercise again, so be it.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on Bill C-26, an act to amend the Railway Act, regarding grain and flour subsidies.

This legislation proposes to eliminate the at and east subsidies for the transport of export grain and flour through eastern Canadian ports. The elimination of business for our ports is the last thing Atlantic Canada needs in these difficult times.

The at and east program has been in effect since the 1960s. It was intended to offset some of the economic advantages that the U.S. eastern ports had over Canadian ports in terms of proximity to the sources of grain supply, larger facilities, and better transportation services.

Under the program, a fixed rate level for the movement of grain and flour from western Canada by rail to eastern ports was established in order to encourage the use of the eastern ports. Because the rail rates were frozen by statute, the railways were reimbursed by the federal government for the difference between the fixed rates charged to grain and flour shippers and the actual rates normally charged by the railways and set by the National Transportation Agency.

The at and east program has had far-reaching and beneficial effects on eastern ports, especially those of Halifax and Saint John and, therefore, on the regional economy. Almost 100 per cent of all export grain tonnage shipped through Saint John, and approximately 60 per cent of tonnage by way of Halifax, moved under the at and east rates. The direct and indirect benefits of such a huge amount of tonnage moving through our eastern ports are vital to the region's economy. The loss of this business will be devastating.

In its budget of 1989, the federal government announced the intention to eliminate the at and east grain and flour subsidy. The government's rationale for killing the subsidy was that the cost of shipping by rail to the U.S. ports is now considerably higher than it was at the time of the program's initiation, and that the railway costs were higher than those of shipping by water through the St. Lawrence Seaway. Also, the government stated that the subsidy created distortions and inefficiencies in the movement of grain and that the subsidy is: "Inconsistent with the government's market-oriented transportation policy."

We in Atlantic Canada know all to well that this government is market-oriented rather than people-oriented. The elimination of this program is going to have a devastating effect not only on the ports of Halifax and Saint John, but on the entire maritime region. The first to suffer will be the workers whose jobs depend on the grain and flour that moves on Canadian railways and through those ports.

We in Atlantic Canada have suffered through a year of negative government policies which are already having a devastating effect on the Atlantic economy, policies such as the closure and reduction of Canadian Armed Forces bases, the ongoing crisis in the Atlantic fishery, the gutting of the unemployment insurance program, and the cut-backs in VIA Rail. As if this were not enough, the government is now going to ruin the vital Saint John and Halifax ports which will have terrible direct and indirect consequences.

An analysis by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission estimated that approximately $14.5 million in economic activity will be lost to the Atlantic region by the elimination of the at and east rail rates. If the Saint John and Halifax elevators were to close, the cost could reach approximately $26.5 million. The region cannot bear this kind of blow, especially now with a terrible year behind us, an even a worse one to come, and a recession looming.

The impact will be felt by the ports and by other sectors of the economy that depend on the movement of grain through the ports such as the activity in the grain elevators in Saint John and Halifax, and employment in the ports and on the railway. Indeed, the effect is already being felt. Even though this House did not pass the legislation, the National Transportation Agency has, without the approval of the House of Commons, raised the rates charged on export grain and flour moving on Canadian railways to eastern ports. It is no coincidence that the grain elevator at Saint John is slated to close this month, and that is only the beginning.

What would happen if the elevator in Halifax were to close? Beside its role in the movement of export grain, the elevator plays an important role in the storage and handling of domestic feed grain, and milling wheat. The elevators' inability to store and handle these grains, or even a rise in costs, would seriously damage the Atlantic pork, poultry, egg, and beef industries.

In addition, the Halifax elevator is the sole means of storage for milling wheat for the only Atlantic regional flour mill. The loss of the Halifax storage facility, which would result in large increases in freight rates and major capital expenditures for new or upgraded facilities,

As if the effect on the ports, elevators and mills is not bad enough, the maritimes would face the abandonment of much more of the rail network in a region which depends on the movement of grain and flour to the ports. It is painfully obvious that the elimination of the at and east transport subsidies would have a devastating impact on the economy of the Atlantic region which is already reeling from the effects of other government policies.

Employment will feel the pinch. The people who depend on a healthy, viable port industry will be among the first to suffer as jobs begin to disappear in the ports, the elevators, and the railways.

After the government announced that the at and east subsidy would be eliminated, the president of the Halifax grain elevator estimated that several hundred jobs could be lost at the port of Halifax as a direct result of this decision.

The estimate did not include the number of jobs lost in related sectors. Industry and labour officials all predict the major loss of business and jobs in the ports, elevators, and related industries as a result of higher transportation rates.

The Atlantic region cannot bear this loss of yet more jobs. How many times do we have to tell that to this government? When will it begin to understand the ultimate cost of its negative, short-sighted policies? Atlantic Canadians want to work. They need to work. They do not want to depend on unemployment insurance, or what will be left of the program if the government gets its way. Hundreds of jobs depend directly and indirectly on healthy, viable ports, elevators and grain transportation systems. The long-term costs of the loss of these jobs and of the damage to the Atlantic economy caused by an under-utilization of these systems and facilities will be enormous.

It is only logical that if there is a loss of government support for the transport of grain and flour along Canadian railways to eastern Canadian ports, less grain and flour will move through the ports. The Atlantic region already suffers from inherent disadvantages in competing with the U.S. ports which enjoy better shipping connections, not only with the American grain producers, but to the Canadian producers as well.

It is an age-old problem for eastern ports. The at and east helped us to remain competitive with the U.S. I should note that the at and east not only helped the eastern sector of grain and flour movement, but the western sector as well. Wheat boards need the fixed rates to move grain during the winter months to offset the higher costs of rail movement after the Seaway navigation closes. They need the fixed rates in order to sustain shipment to customers on a year-round basis.

By the elimination of the subsidies, the government manages to hurt both the eastern and western economies. If the government is truly concerned about reducing the amount of money it pays for the subsidies, while allowing the ports to remain viable, why has it not even responded to the positive proposals put forth by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission?

As long ago as 1985, as was mentioned earlier this afternoon, at the invitation of the Minister of Transport, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission submitted proposals to make the at and east more efficient. The commission acknowledged that the program, as it was originally planned, did eventually create some distortions in the movement of grain by discouraging the use of least cost routing.

But the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission believes that it is possible to be cost efficient, while still meeting certain objectives. Those objectives are to maintain the grain elevators at Saint John and Halifax, to maintain the commercial viability of the Halifax flour mill, and to maintain a constant flow of grain by rail through the two ports.

The APTC proposed that the frozen rates to the St. Lawrence ports be raised to compensatory levels and be held at such levels by the NTA. At the same time, the rates to eastern ports would be set at a fixed differential over the compensatory rates which would maintain the competitive relationship between the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic ports.

Finally, the APTC recommended that the fixed rates to Atlantic ports also apply to water transport, which is the most cost-efficient method of grain movement, and that the federal government fund a marine receiving facility at Saint John. The port currently has no such facility and can therefore handle only rail deliveries.

It was estimated that the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission proposal would have resulted in government savings of some $22 million in transportation subsidies per year, which is about one-half of the total cost of the at and east program. But the Atlantic Province Transportation Commission never received a government response to its proposals. It seems that the efficient movement of grain to eastern ports, with the least amount of damage to western and eastern economies, is not the government's primary concern. Well, the government is once again bowing down to its idol of market-oriented policy while disregarding the human costs.

Atlantic Canadian workers asked the government to reconsider its short-sighted decision to completely eliminate the at and east program. They asked the government to consult with groups such as the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission so that the current distortions in the system could be eliminated without destroying the viability of Atlantic ports. With effort, ingenuity, and some will on the part of the government it can be done.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to say that it is a pleasure for me to take part in this debate today because it is not. The debate should not even be happening, if the government had any sense of justice or any sense of fairness. I am going to put forth a few ideas, most of which are not mine, but which come through my reading of the brief prepared by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission.

According to APTC, the termination of the at and east rates will have serious economic consequences for the maritime ports, as well as certain activities that depend on the movement of export grain and flour through those ports. Based on an estimate made by the commission, the economic impact of the at and east rates program on the Atlantic provinces, based on 1985 data, was close to $35 million annually.

In addition to this, several studies have shown that the at and east structure, in its present form, creates certain distortions and inefficiencies in the movement of export grain and flour. In recognition of possible distortions, in 1985 the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission proposed certain modifications in the program to first reduce the demand on the federal treasury, second, lessen or eliminate distortions and inefficiencies, and third, to maintain movement of export grain and flour through Atlantic ports. The objectives of the proposed modifications were the maintenance of the grain elevators as viable units at Halifax and Saint John, the maintenance of the commercial viability of the flour mill at Halifax, and maintaining a flow of export grain and flour through Atlantic ports.

The specific proposal of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission was that the rates be frozen at the present level, and the St. Lawrence ports be allowed to raise to a compensatory level and be held at a compensatory level on an annual basis by the national government. The economic impact of the government proposal on the Atlantic region will be in excess of $34 million.

An analysis by the APTC of the regional impact of the program showed that approximately $14.4 million in economic activity will be lost to the region due to the termination of this subsidy. However, should both grain elevators in the region at Halifax and Saint John be unable to continue operations, then the negative impact would amount to approximately $27.6 million. These amounts do not include any economic activity generated by the program which occurred outside the Atlantic region, such as railway employment, inland elevators, lake vessels, et cetera.

The maintenance of the Halifax grain elevators as a viable operation is of critical economic import to the entire Atlantic region. As well as the activity generated by the movement of export grain through the facility, the elevator also plays a vital role in the storage and handling of domestic feed grain and milling wheat.

Local pork, poultry and egg industries and, to a lesser extent, the beef industry, would be seriously affected should the Halifax elevator be unable to remain in operation. That is very dicey. In addition, the Halifax elevator is utilized as the only means of storage for milling wheat by the Atlantic region flour mill. The use of the Halifax elevator for domestic feed grains represents the only competitive alternative to the use of the railways as a means of obtaining the required feed ingredients for the local livestock and poultry industries as well.

The use of lake vessels to Halifax with truck delivery beyond is the only competition faced by the railways for the amount of domestic feed grains into the maritimes. Without this alternative, rail rates for the domestic feed grains would be higher than presently is the case. As evidence of this fact, one has only to look at the historical record of feed grain rates to the maritimes to see that a significant drop in the rail rates took place when the water route to Halifax and the Halifax elevator began to be utilized for the handling of domestic livestock feed grains.

The local livestock and poultry industries in the maritimes face a tremendous disadvantage in terms of feed costs versus their competition in Quebec and Ontario. Any feed cost increases would place these industries in jeopardy. Local feed grain production in the maritimes meets approximately 20 per cent of requirements in Nova Scotia, from 35 to 40 per cent in New Brunswick, and up to 80 per cent in Prince Edward Island. The flour mill at Halifax faces intense competition in the Atlantic provinces market from competitors located in central Canada. It is totally dependent on the Halifax elevator for storage of milling wheat. The loss of that storage facility resulting in large increases in freight rates and capital expenditure to construct alternative storage facilities would seriously erode the competitiveness of the local mill. Local milling wheat producers would be faced with the loss of their only market should the flour mill at Halifax be abandoned or unable to continue operations.

In addition, the only source for mill feeds within the region would disappear resulting in higher procurement costs for the feed industry and higher feed prices. The Saint John grain elevator serves only the export market, however, the rail traffic provided by the movement of export grain over that portion of the rail line from Montreal to Saint John was an important contribution to the viability of that line. The maritimes is dealing with the abandonment of approximately 50 per cent of the rail network in the region. Any loss of traffic which will affect the viability of remaining lines is viewed as a very serious matter.

The shipment of export flour through the port of Halifax contributed significantly to employment at the port. It also played an important role for the railways in the positioning of boxcars within the maritimes for domestic use as the cars utilizing the shipment of export flour to Halifax were then positioned within the maritimes for the shipment of domestic cargo such as newsprint.

In 1985, in response to an invitation from the Minister of Transport, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission developed and submitted specific proposals designed to make the at and east subsidy program more effective and efficient, while at the same time ensuring that the program responded to three regional economic objectives. These objectives were to maintain the grain elevators at Halifax and Saint John as viable units, to maintain the commercial viability of the flour mill at Halifax, and to maintain a constant flow of export grain and flour by rail through the ports of Halifax and Saint John.

The APTC proposal called for the rail rates on export grain and flour to St. Lawrence River ports to rise to compensatory levels. Rates to maritime ports would then be maintained at a fixed differential in relation to the St. Lawrence ports to allow the maritime ports to continue to participate in the movement of this traffic. The subsidy would maintain the fixed differential in rates. The proposal also called for the application of the program to include the use of water transportation to the maritime ports, and for the federal government to provide funding for a marine receiving facility for grain at Saint John to enable the use of water transportation to that port and to reduce the level of subsidy that would otherwise be required to support the use of higher cost rail transportation.

It was agreed by all parties that steps must be taken to ensure that the grain elevators at Halifax and Saint John are able to continue as viable operations, and that export grain and flour continue to move through the ports of Halifax and Saint John. They have put forward proposals with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission to minimize harmful effects. The problem is the government does not listen.

The use of unit trains from Thunder Bay, or direct from prairie origins, to move export grain to both Saint John and Halifax is viable. This would allow both railroads to establish rates based on their most efficient method of operation. However, to become a viable alternative, this would require the full support of the Canadian Wheat Board and a commitment to provide existing government-owned covered hopper cars under the same terms as they are provided under the Western Grain Transportation Act. Wouldn't that be terrible!

To permit the use of water transportation to Halifax and Saint John for Plan C feed grain would allow the most economical mode of transportation to be utilized for grain movement under Plan C pricing. The elimination of the countervail duty on U.S. corn would allow the elevators at Saint John and Halifax the opportunity to utilize existing back-haul vessel capacity to receive U.S. corn from Atlantic seaboard ports. The local livestock industry could then have the option of securing its corn requirements from either Canadian or U.S. sources, depending upon market conditions, and providing throughout at the local elevators.

The provision of facilities to receive grain by water at the Saint John grain elevator is currently unable to function due to the lack of necessary marine unloading equipment. Imagine how long they would put up with that in one of the Great Lakes seaports. The provision of equipment to allow for the receiving of grain by water would give the elevator the opportunity to solicit business, which it is not able to accommodate at present, such as U.S. corn or shipments of Canadian export grain directly from lake vessels.

What of the continued use of Halifax for the shipment of export flour? The natural advantages of Halifax for the handling of this type of cargo should be promoted and fully utilized. Another proposal is the provision of permits allowing the importation of feed grains from foreign countries. This would allow the grain elevators at Halifax and Saint John to increase the volume of grain handled, should opportunities arise in this market and contribute to the over-all viability of the operations.

The at and east export grain and flour subsidy program had important implications for several domestic industries in the Atlantic region, including local livestock producers, flour milling and the railways. With the cancellation of this program, the continued viability of grain elevators at Halifax and Saint John is definitely in jeopardy.

It is vital that these and other alternatives put forth by other interested parties be examined and a solution found to guarantee the continued operation of the grain elevators at Halifax and Saint John.

Despite the woeful contempt of this government for Parliament, I am making this proposal developed by the APTC in the vain hope that this government may listen to reasonable and thoughtful alternatives. However, these are the same people who have not listened to any other proposals that have been put forward. I ask, indeed I plead with the government to listen and seriously consider the well-being of Atlantic Canada. We are still a part of this nation. We have not been cut adrift yet, although the government has worked very hard at doing that.

While the Prime Minister, the Minister for International Trade, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and the Minister of Finance are all busy trying to savage our social programs, our military bases, our fisheries and our way of life, what are our Atlantic Tory members doing? Where is the Minister of Veterans Affairs hiding? Where is the Minister of Regional Development? What is he doing?

What can we expect of these people who have betrayed their mandate and their people? These are the same people who silently allowed the government to savage Atlantic Canada after we had the Wilsonian restraint. These are the same people who have allowed our military bases to be savaged throughout Atlantic Canada and elsewhere.

These are the same people who silently allowed Canada Post to ride roughshod over the will of the people. That is another dictatorship in this country.

The clock is ticking and Atlantic Canadians have long, long memories. I say to my colleagues opposite that the time is running out for them. It is time to start fighting for your region, for the infrastructure, what is left of it and, most of all, for your people.

Atlantic Canadians are getting very fed up with this government. They are sick and tired of being betrayed. Every promise that was made to Atlantic Canadians has been broken. I cannot think of one promise that was made, and there were a lot of them in the last couple of elections. I cannot think of one that has not been broken. It is time members of this government started to be a little sensible and a little sensitive to the people of Atlantic Canada. If they are not they will pay the price, because Atlantic Canadians have very long memories.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member aware that the federal government, through the Atlantic Opportunities Agency, has spent over a billion dollars and that there will be new co-operative agreements emerging? Is he aware that since 1984 the federal government has spent $540 million in Cape Breton alone? Is he aware that unemployment in the Atlantic provinces since this present government has been in power has fallen enormously from 1984? Is he aware that unemployment has fallen in every province of Atlantic Canada since this government has been in power, compared to the previous government?

Is he aware of these very important facts which indicate the strength of commitment, resolve and the practical contribution that the federal government has exhibited toward Atlantic Canada right from the first month of its mandate?

Mr. Dionne: Now, Mr. Speaker, that is what you call looking at the world through rose-coloured glasses. As a matter of fact I would say blue-coloured glasses.

Let me tell the hon. member what I remember. I remember the betrayal of CFB Chatham and the directorate of pay services. I remember the betrayal of myriad promises that were made throughout Atlantic Canada. I can see what is happening to CFB Summerside: another betrayal.

I can go on and on, but you have the picture, Mr. Speaker. You can talk about CN shops too, if you want. You can talk about the refusal of this government to enter into a cost sharing agreement with the Atlantic provinces to maintain their infrastructure.

Mr. Hopkins: That is nothing new.

Mr. Dionne: No, it is nothing new, but the government had been out of power so long that we forgot how very bad it could be.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Miramichi has made an excellent speech to the House and I commend him for it. In preparation for this speech did he consult with his constituents and those in Atlantic Canada who are interested in this issue? I wonder if he has had any consultations with farmers in the region on what they might think of this bill?

Mr. Dionne: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the proper noun that could be used with regard to the views of farmers in the region is anger or despair, but it is one or the other.

I can tell the hon. member that farmers are totally fed up with the way in which this government is conducting its affairs with the obvious—

An hon. member: And not only the farmers.

Mr. Dionne: —attempts that were made during the campaign to deceive the public. Knowing that they have been deceived, they have no faith left in the government.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thought my friend for Miramichi answered the question of ACOA even before the minister rose. Although I am sure it was unintentional the minister did mislead the House just now. ACOA was funded for a five-year period. These guys and gals have the brain-child that they should spread the five years over seven years after half the money was spent.

If the minister is going to participate in this debate in any fashion, he should at least tell the truth to the House. I am sure my friend for Miramichi would agree with that, if he had the time. Perhaps we should give him, by leave, a little extra time to deal with the ACOA question, because I would not want him to leave on record that mischievous misinformation of the minister of tourism about ACOA.

The idea is that somehow in Tory terms a cut-back is an improvement for people. The minister and his government should be the people on the other end trying to buy the groceries, trying to get ACOA grants, when there is not as much in the pot spread over a larger period. I am sure my friend would want to endorse that.

Mr. Dionne: I certainly would want to endorse that. I would want to say as well that Atlantic Canadians, certainly Canadians in my riding, are very disappointed with the Government Canada and regional development.

• (1840)

As my colleague said, the government has spread the money over more years than it promised and it has devastated regional economic development. As a matter of fact, most people I know are very suspicious now that many of the ACOA grants are given out on the basis of patronage rather than on the basis of proper assessment. Certainly, I think a very strong case could be made for that in the way that the largess was heaped upon certain areas of New Brunswick during the last campaign.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise yet again in this House more in sorrow than in anger, yet still in disbelief. Perhaps after 14 months in this House my disbelief should be tempered with knowledge of the activity and agenda of the other side.

I speak particularly as a member from the beleaguered region of Atlantic Canada. I listened today, and I listened proudly, to the words of my colleagues from Lambton—Middlesex, from Miramichi and from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, as well as others who spoke eloquently and long on the subject of this government's particular agenda.

I listened and I listened proudly knowing that my colleagues speak out for all regions this country which are suffering at the hands of this government. But, as an Atlantic Canadian, I suppose you can call this a special pleading because I think there is not another region that suffers quite so badly at the hands of this government.

We have seen it day after day in this House, in bill after bill, in policy after policy. The Atlantic fishery is in crisis, no matter what the right hon. Prime Minister might say. VIA Rail has been cut to pieces. Atlantic Canadian students, seniors and the sick are unable to depend on the transportation lifeline that they have relied on for so many years. We have seen another nail in the coffin of our economy.

I listened with interest to the comment of the minister, who appears to have gone somewhere, regarding the so-called wondrous gifts of ACOA. Those of us in Atlantic Canada, those of us who sit here and represent our fellow Atlantic Canadians, know the myth of that kind of talk. As my colleague from Miramichi said, we will not forget. We will remember.

Last June, many of the same people who rose today to speak on the issue of the at and east subsidy rose then as well to talk about the devastation the passage of this bill will create in our region. We talked about it then because of the effective date in the legislation, the fact that before the bill had been presented to this House the word was already out in the Atlantic and elsewhere that July 16 would be the effective date of the cancellation of the subsidy.

It is more than just a coincidence. It is the fulfilment of yet another piece of the agenda of this government. Those of us duly elected by our people from coast to coast are irrelevant to the workings of this government. The subsidy is cancelled on July 16 and the bill comes into this House on February 12—seven months later. It is not only not good enough. It is an insult to the people who represent Canadians on both sides of this Chamber.

My colleague from Kingston and the Islands asked my colleague from Miramichi what the farmers in Atlantic Canada think of the cancellation of this subsidy. The hon. member for Miramichi said that they thought it was disastrous. I think that he was being kind. In truth the response, should you ask Atlantic Canadian farmers what they think of the cancellation of the at and east, is simply unparliamentary. I cannot tell you what that response is but I can leave it to the imagination. I hope the imaginations of my friends opposite are fairly vivid. Atlantic Canadian farmers are in distress. They are going to be in more distress because of the cost of feed.

I represent a riding that is urban. There are no agricultural holdings in my riding, but every Atlantic Canadian suffers when one sector of the economy is attacked. When every sector of our economy is under attack, as it has been since the disastrous budget of 1989, then all Atlantic Canadians, urban or rural in whatever jobs they have left, are in difficulty and will continue to be in difficulty.

I go back to the purpose of the program. According to the then Minister of Transport, the Liberal Minister of Transport, the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill, in 1966 there were two major purposes for the at and east. The first was to ensure that eastern Canadian ports could compete with U.S. ports and to enable the ports of Halifax and Saint John to compete with Montreal and other St. Lawrence River ports.

The cancellation of this subsidy is a microcosm for the long-term policies of this government vis-à-vis our nation. To ensure that eastern Canadian ports could compete with U.S. ports, I am afraid we have seen over the last 14 months just how keen this government is to have any industry in this country compete too heavily with our American friends.

I am afraid that when it comes to a choice between struggling industry and workers on the east coast of Canada and American business, in the minds of this government American business will win out. There are many benefits to this program.

The program has caused the railways to earn gross revenues averaging $33.5 million over the period from 1971 to 1981. Georgian Bay ports and transfer elevators earned revenue averaging $1.4 million per year and maintained about 75 jobs as a result of the program. Halifax and Saint John earned revenues averaging $1.6 million per year and maintained about 85 jobs.

That may not sound like a lot but believe me in the Atlantic Canadian economy it is major and important. The loss of those jobs and others relating to this subsidy will cut and cut deeply into a section of the country that is already battered and bleeding.

In anticipation of what we will be receiving at the hands of the government on the night of February 20, when the new budget comes down, some of us in Atlantic Canada have looked at each other and said: "Well, maybe we do not have a lot to fear". The reason we may not have a lot to fear is because there is practically nothing left that can be taken away from us, unless the government decides to fire bomb our cities, which may be the next step. I should probably not issue that challenge; God knows what they might come up with.

The milling industry benefits significantly from the subsidy program without which the export flour trade might become extinct. Between 1976 and 1985 the flour industry exported 406,308 tonnes on average annually under the program. Approximately 70 per cent of the flour shipped for export was milled in eastern Canada.

In 1985 the industry received about $16 million in subsidy payments compared to about $9.7 million in 1976.

Much of the decrease in Canadian export flour trade can be attributed to the significant market share captured by the EEC. The EEC members have been heavily subsidized under the common agricultural policy. This financial assistance has enabled them to increase their share of the world flour market from about 8 per cent in 1970–71 to 58 per cent in 1984–85. Yet this government has something against subsidies that might do the same thing for eastern Canadian industries and might see us add a little to a much beleaguered economic situation.

Grain producers in eastern and western Canada benefit through freight cost savings and shipments made under the program and the realization of higher average returns by spreading out marketing quantities of grain throughout the year. This is particularly true of Ontario grain producers.

The Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board exports about 450,000 tonnes to 600,000 tonnes of grain, of which about 150,000 tonnes move under the at and east subsidy program. The existence of the Georgian Bay—Great Lakes transfer elevator facilities enable Ontario producers to store their crop and market it over an extended period of time, thereby yielding producers the best average return.

The railways, CN and CP, received the subsidy for the transportation of grain and flour at the frozen rate. They also gain from the handling of grain at railway owned and/or operated elevators in Georgian Bay and Saint John, New Brunswick. In 1985 the railways received average subsidies of $23.40 per tonne for grain and $63.58 per tonne for flour. As noted earlier, a number of old Ontario elevators and the elevators in Halifax and Saint John owe their existence to the at and east subsidy.

It is conceivable the Port McNicoll, Midland and Owen Sound would not exist as transfer facilities without the subsidy. The same is absolutely true of the maritime elevators. Those maritime elevators, and the one I know most particularly, the one in Halifax, mark a part of our skyline and they show us in the city of Halifax that people are working. This ideal is becoming less and less true as we drive around Atlantic Canada. This ideal has become untrue for the people of Lockeport. It has become much less true for the people of Canso. It has never been true since this government came in for the people of Cape Breton, in spite of the words of the hon. minister.

Bay port elevators provide maritime elevators with most of their at and east grain traffic. This traffic, subsidized by the at and east, accounts for 95 per cent of total receipts at Saint John and 70 per cent of total receipts at Halifax. We have been discussing, debating, complaining and asking the government to change its mind about this for over a year. There has been no response.

It is interesting. It is not all cakes and ale on the Conservative side of the fence as far as this goes. There are even some Conservative members who are not terribly happy about this decision. Even an hon. Tory, the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants, is on record as supporting offsets to help grain growers in the region. I think it would be interesting to know how he really feels about the cancellation of the at and east subsidy.

Halifax is a city that depends on its ports. The grain elevators, the activity produced by the grain elevators, and the jobs created thereto are a part of the relative economic health of the city of Halifax. I say "relative" because it is relative to the ill health of the rest of the region. That ill health in the rest of the region has been caused by the poisoned dart of government policy.

There is no particular reason, other than a government devoted to a Canada that does not exist outside the very central part of our geography, to see our regions die, and yet they are dying. They are dying from a lack of interest. They are dying from an interest that can only be described as poisonous and that can only be described as anti the best interests of large numbers of Canadian citizens.

If the regional elevators lose the grain exports from the at and east subsidy and somehow on their other business manage to remain open, $14.4 million in economic activity will be lost. But, if both regional elevators shut down, loss of economic activity will be in excess of $27 million. Local livestock and poultry industries in the maritimes face a tremendous disadvantage in terms of feed costs versus the costs in central Canada.

Again, another hit below the belt. Another damaging blow to a small but viable industry in the Atlantic region. It almost gets to the point where Atlantic Canadians look around and say: "What did we do to deserve this?". Some may respond that what Atlantic Canadians did to deserve this was send too many people to this Chamber, to sit on my side of the House. I look at my colleagues from Atlantic Canada who sit on your side of the House. I look at the member for South Shore, possibly the second most beleaguered riding in Canada, which is home to Lockeport and home to Barrington and used to be home to a VIA Rail route.

I look at the member for Cumberland—Colchester. I look at the member for Halifax West and I look at the Minister from Central Nova, and I want to say to them: "How can you live with this specific policy that points a gun at the heart of your region, and daily sees the people you represent, your fellow Nova Scotians, losing their jobs, losing their livelihood, but worst of all, losing their hope".

That is the ultimate terror and the ultimate disgrace of the policy of this government, of this anti-national government that looks at people in a region and says that because they live in the Atlantic, or because they live in the north, or because they live in the west, they are not full-fledged Canadians and do not deserve the same benefits that other Canadians enjoy. They do not have a right to stay in their towns and villages and cities to bring up their children and buy their houses and live a decent Canadian standard of living.

I will never ever forget sitting in Halifax with the committee on the UI changes. I heard an hon. member opposite say to the President of Fédération acadienne de Nouvelle-Ecosse that if young Acadian Nova Scotians could not find jobs, they had an easy option. They could move or they could starve. Well, we do not accept that. We do not accept it in Atlantic Canada and we will not accept it. This government had better realize it now, and realize it fast.

Mr. Kempling: She is threatening us now.

Ms. Clancy: Yes, she is threatening, Bill. Indeed, there are a lot of other people who are threatening, right behind me. There are 800,000 people in the province of Nova Scotia. There are 500,000 plus in the province of New Brunswick. There are 150,000 in Prince Edward Island. Small, I admit. But we are there and we are vocal. The members who have been elected to represent those people will continue to be vocal.

You can make your policies. You can practise your scorched earth policy, your search and destroy missions on the Atlantic. But we survive. We survived John Diefenbaker, and we will survive you. The sooner you are aware of that and the sooner you start thinking about what that is going to mean for you and all your friends in 1992, I think the happier you may be. Believe me, we were here before you got here and we will be here long after you have gone.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Ms. Clancy: We are tough.

An hon. member: You had better find a leader.

Ms. Clancy: My dear, we are burdened with a plethora of leaders. You should only be so lucky.

In answer to this obvious desire to change the subject by my less than learned colleagues across the floor, may I merely state that it is only typical of the tunnel vision of my hon. colleagues that they cannot see the forest for the trees.

However, back to the issue at hand, the issue of the at and east. The cancellation of the subsidy is a disgrace and it is one that will long, long be remembered.

I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:

That Bill C-26, an Act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1900)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on December 13, 1989, I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration whether she would immediately discontinue the Immigrant Investors Program which allows wealthy people to buy their way into Canada by investing $250,000 or, in the case of the prairie provinces or the maritimes, $150,000. I also asked whether she would take action to ensure fairness in Canada's immigration policy.

The success of this buy-a-passport program is questionable. There are many reports of investors losing their money in government-sanctioned immigrant investor funds. At least five such funds in B.C., including three that were controlled by the Merbanco Group of Calgary, Pinetree Software Canada and New Canada have been called failures. Investors who had deposited money in EdmontAsia Capital Corporation, an Alberta-based investment fund that was also managed by the Merbanco Group, have been told that at least half of their money was gone. The failure of these government-sanctioned immigrant investor funds not only gives Canada a bad name, it also gives bad publicity to other investment funds which are reputable.

There are also complaints that the money from some of these immigrant investor funds are not used for economic development and job creation. Money invested in Pinetree Software Canada has been tucked away in a trust company collecting interest. In the meantime the company has been declared a failure. The Canadian Maple Leaf Fund has invested $581,000 in real estate development in Whistler. Yet, under federal guidelines this immigrant investor money cannot be used for real estate ventures. These kinds of investments do not contribute to creating permanent jobs or economic wealth which might have been a value of this program.

Everyone knows that this program is out of control. Nobody knows how much money has been properly invested, how much money sits collecting interest and how much money has been lost. Until last August this program was not even monitored by the government.

I oppose the business immigration program in principle. It creates two classes of immigrants, an elite group and a non-elite group. It allows wealthy people to buy their way into Canada while those who are not wealthy find it very difficult to immigrate. Many persons are excluded. I know many in my riding who would be good Canadian citizens, bringing energy and skills and hard work, but they are excluded because they cannot make enough points or do not have enough capital to buy their way in. Incidentally, the new fees for sponsors are not helping either. Many sponsoring relatives work at several low-paying jobs to try to bring relatives over and they are very hurt by long delays and frequent refusals, while others can buy their way in in very short time.

Business immigrants are given second highest priority in processing after the family class immigrants and refugees. They only need to receive 25 points to have their applications approved while 70 points is normally required by other immigrants. It is proof that money is power according to this government, it allows people to buy their way into Canada. It also gives the wrong message to newcomers about Canadian values which I had hoped would be based on fairness and equality.

There is also a huge backlog of refugee claimants here in Canada who are still waiting for the decision as to whether or not they are going to be allowed to stay as landed immigrants. At the end of 1988 there were over 107,000 in this backlog, approximately 100,000 of whom had not even been given the initial interview. This is our new streamlined procedure.

In 1989, when the new refugee determination system was implemented, the government said there would be no further backlogs, yet 7,000 of the latest claimants are in a new backlog still waiting for a decision. Under the new system refugee claimants have had to wait up to four months for the credible basis hearing, which is only the second stage in the refugee determination process. What does the government intend to do to expedite this process?

We must also give refugee claimants work visas and language training while they are waiting so that they will have some security, and their children must have schooling.

Around the world thousands of refugees wait in refugee camps for a country to accept them, particularly in southeast Asian countries and in Hong Kong. There are many living in overcrowded living quarters with poor sanitary facilities where contagious diseases and outbreaks of violence are common. The daily arrival of more refugees is causing great strain on the limited facilities, particularly in Hong Kong, which is a very small place. And yet, while Canada openly criticizes the Hong Kong decision to repatriate these refugees, we have not opened our doors to take them in order to both help the refugees and alleviate the situation in Hong Kong.

New Democrats believe in a fairer immigration policy which considers family reunification as a top priority. In many cultures "family" has a broad meaning. It includes an extended family and this should be considered in our immigration policy. In a multicultural Canada we believe the family should include extended family members in the family unit.

Immigrants in Canada face a very difficult time adjusting to their new environment and to the values of a new society, and yet the government is cutting back on the settlement language program. This is a good program but because of the lack of continuity in funding, it results in an ineffective program for many, women in particular. That should be changed.

We also have objected many times to the cut-backs in the Citizen Instruction in Language Training program, which will be cut out entirely by this government. This means that newcomers, particularly women and people who are not in the workforce, will not be able to get the kind of settlement services which they need.

I call on the minister once again to review and withdraw the Immigrant Investor Program and to reinstate the CILT program so that entry to Canada will be fair and equitable and new Canadians will have the assistance they need to settle quickly in a multicultural Canada.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to expand upon the reply given by the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration to the hon. member for Vancouver East on December 13 concerning the Immigrant Investor Program.

In 1989, investor immigrants, their spouses and dependents accounted for 1.1 per cent of total immigration. Since its introduction in January 1986, approximately 3,000 investor immigrants, including spouses and dependents, have been granted landing. In that same period, the total immigration has exceeded 550,000 people.

Investor immigrants increase investment funds available for small and medium-sized businesses across Canada. The investor program itself is supported by all provinces and provides a meaningful and growing support tool to enhance regional and professional economic development in Canada. Immigrant investors' funds are intended primarily to increase and maintain Canadian employment. Nevertheless, the investor program is relatively new and has to be refined further. The government has recognized this and has implemented measures to improve the administration of this program.

For example, on May 2, 1989, the minister announced the creation of the Business Advisory Committee to advise the minister on issues relating to business immigration. A business immigration unit has been established within Employment and Immigration Canada to concentrate on the effective operation of this program. An investor monitoring system has been developed and new regulations have been put in place. All of this has taken place in the context of ongoing negotiation and co-operation with the provinces.

Preliminary reports indicate that since 1986 this program has produced or maintained over 11,000 Canadian jobs with more to come. This is a program which not only creates jobs, but brings people, skills and capital to all parts of Canada. In short, the investor program benefits all regions of Canada. It is the intention of the government to continue working with its provincial partners to improve the program and to continue to attract investor immigrants to this country.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question this evening relates to an article that appeared in The Globe and Mail on November 29 of last year. I asked a question in the House on that same date and I will refer to that in a moment to refresh Your Honour's memory of the occasion.

The article of November 29 read in part as follows:

> Internal Conservative Party documents reveal a proposal that, in certain circumstances, Tory fundraisers would remind potential corporate donors of federal government contracts they have received.
> But documents obtained by The Globe and Mail show that there were detailed plans within the Progressive Conservative Canada Fund to set up a computerized system in which the file on each corporate donor would include a list of the number of government contracts, grants or policies that have benefited that corporation.

The Globe and Mail reporters did some interviews. They interviewed one Nicolas Locke, executive director of the PC Canada Fund. The article goes on:

> Nicolas Locke, executive director of the PC Canada Fund, the party's fundraising arm, confirmed in an interview last week that the party has computerized files on each corporate donor, and that the files were updated in 1986 after an internal review.
> But Mr. Locke denied that the files contain information about government contracts, grants or policies beneficial to the company—
> Mr. Locke also strongly denied that party fundraisers ever mention government contracts or grants when they discuss a donation with a donor or prospective donor.
> "They're clearly directed not to do that," he said. "Some people in this world have gotten into trouble doing things like that, but they have not been associated with the PC Canada Fund."

Well, as a footnote, Mr. Speaker, they certainly were not but they were clearly associated with the PC Party of this country.

Then he went on:

> Mr. Locke said that he suspects that soliciting donations from donors by reminding them of government business they have received would be not only improper but possibly illegal.

Imagine. He really thought about that one before he spoke. Then he went on:

> "Our canvassers are told in no uncertain terms not to get involved in that sort of thing," he said. "If anybody started soliciting that way, they'd be drummed out."

Well, we know what happened to some of the cabinet ministers. Ten of them have been drummed out and we know that two of the Conservative back-benchers have been accused of illegal activities in connection with fundraising. One has been convicted and one is currently facing a host of charges.

We have evidence of impropriety in the Oerlikon land deals that seem to have been forgotten. While the story in The Globe and Mail may be of some interest, it only touches the tip of the iceberg. We can see how big the iceberg is when we look later in the story. In the third column it says:

> Last year, the Conservatives dramatically outstripped the two major parties in raising money from the business community, collecting $14.3 million in corporate donations, compared to $8.4 million collected by the Liberals and $262,000 received by the New Democrats, according to public election records.

I would not want to suggest that the New Democratic Party is immune to this sort of thing because, after all, their fundraising is done through the unions and they pay for that in the way they are required to follow the dictates of the union bosses. We hear about that in the spats that arise between the government members and the New Democrats from time to time in the House.

As a result of all this I put a question to the Deputy Prime Minister on November 29. I asked him if he would tell the House whether in fact the government sent lists of persons who received government contracts to anybody, and specifically to the PC Canada Fund. The Deputy Prime Minister, in his first answer, said that I was referring to a discredited story and I need not worry about it. He did not answer my question. I then asked him if he would tell us whether he would instruct his bagmen to appear before the Election Reform Commission that he has established to reveal their practices and their lists. He sloughed off the question by saying, as reported at page 6374 of Hansard:

> —if the hon. member wants to make reference to the commission about who should appear or who should not appear, he can make that representation directly to the commission.

It is my submission, first, that the Deputy Prime Minister has an obligation to answer my question, and I hope when we hear from the parliamentary secretary, although I am sure he is reluctant to get to his feet on this one, that he will tell us that these lists are not forwarded to the PC Canada Fund and that there are in fact no such lists.

But I suspect that there are such lists and I would like to know to whom they are made available. Certainly the lists could be compiled from answers we can put on the Order Paper in this House and certainly they come out in press releases. I think that members of this House should know whether in fact these lists are prepared by the government and forwarded to the PC Canada Fund so they can be put on this computer.

If they are, it supports the story in The Globe and Mail. It gives evidence of potential risk of wrong-doing and I think we ought to take steps to see that that sort of risk is minimized.

After ten resignations from the cabinet, and I can think of only two prosecutions under the Criminal Code for offences relating to fundraising, I think it is time that the government took stern measures, and I think that is putting it mildly, to ensure that this kind of conduct does not continue.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is a member of the second oldest profession in the world, that is why they are sometimes called solicitors. That is what he was going through today.

I believe the hon. member's question stems from newspaper articles which appeared in late November of last year. Those articles referred to a draft report dating back to 1986, which report was never adopted. Indeed, I understand that the lists of government contracts are not and never have been used by PC Canada Fund. I hope that puts the matter to rest.

The hon. member has also raised questions with respect to the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Finance. The government's intention to establish this commission of inquiry was announced in the Speech from the Throne to open the second session of the Thirty-fourth Parliament on November 15, 1989. The Prime Minister announced the establishment of a commission to inquire into and report on the appropriate principles and process that should govern the election of members of the House of Commons and the financing of political parties and candidates' campaigns.

The Prime Minister further indicated that this study would include an examination of the practices, procedures and legislation in Canada; the means by which which political parties should be funded, the provision of the funds to the political parties from any source and the limits of such funding and the uses to which such funds ought or ought not be put; and the qualification of electors and the compiling of voters' lists, including the advisability of the establishment of a permanent voters' list.

I understand that in mid-January the chairman of the commission, Mr. Pierre Lortie, wrote to various people, including all members of this House, inviting them to participate at public hearings. I am sure the hon. member received the letter as I did. I hope he will make his submission. In addition, public notices were published in newspapers across the country requesting all those who wish to express an opinion to provide relevant information and to submit a written brief to the commission by March 9, 1990.

I understand that the commission plans to begin public hearings in the spring. The government has long recognized the need to amend and improve our electoral laws. Indeed, many important amendments were introduced in the last Parliament in Bill C-79. Unfortunately, the government was not able to secure the co-operation of the Liberal and New Democratic parties to allow passage of even those portions of the bill to which all parties had agreed.

• (1920)

The government hopes that the important work undertaken by the commission will help develop a consensus on many complex issues. The commission is uniquely qualified to provide advice on the principles and the process that governs elected representatives and their respective political parties. The government looks forward to receiving that advice.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when I rose on December 8 in this House, the nation was stunned and sorrowing because of the horrific slaying of the young women students in Montreal.

At that time I asked the Prime Minister a series of questions, questions to which he and the Minister of Employment and Immigration made some response. My questions were simple. First, I asked the Prime Minister whether he would agree to the appointment of a joint House of Commons and Senate committee to seek solutions to the all-pervasive problem of violence against women in Canada.

Second, I asked whether the Prime Minister intended to consult with representatives of women's groups in order to take advantage of their particular expertise and wipe out violence against women.

Third, I asked whether the Prime Minister would undertake to restore funding to the women's programs, at least those dealing with violence against women that were slashed by 15 per cent.

At that time the Prime Minister and the Minister of Employment and Immigration who, of course, as we all know, is also the minister responsible for the status of women, made a commendable effort to demonstrate how appalled this government was by the events in Montreal.

The Prime Minister stressed that he had met the students from the University of Montreal and that this government is using any number of means to wipe out such violence. Unfortunately, this is just another example of how words come more cheaply than actions.

The depth of the problem has not lessened simply because time has passed since the massacre in Montreal. However, this government's commitment to eradicating violence against women has not only lessened, it makes most of us think that it is non-existent.

The fact remains that no joint House of Commons and Senate committee has been appointed. Women's programs across the board have been slashed by 15 per cent and, if the Prime Minister has met on any form of official basis with groups committed to erasing violence against women, he certainly has not told us about it. I suspect that if he had, he would have.

What will it take for this government to finally open its eyes and recognize that it must do something. Yes, the situation in Montreal was horrific because of the circumstances and the number of young women who died. But every day in Canada women are beaten, women are abused, and women die. Action is needed. Action is needed now. It is not enough just to recognize that the problem exists. We all recognize that the problem exists. The time has come to do something, to say something, and to act.

On one hand the Prime Minister claims that this is one of the most serious problems in our society, but it seems that this is the extent to which the Prime Minister is prepared to go. Programs are underfunded. Women's groups have not been called upon to assist in the creation of a strategy to remedy this situation and, most absurd, the Prime Minister has not utilized the resources at his disposal to appoint a House of Commons and Senate committee which could hear the immediate responses of many groups across this country with good ideas as to how we stem the tide of violence against women.

So what do we have? We have a government that is committed to inaction. I do not for a moment suggest that the horrific events that occurred in Montreal and the day-to-day violence against women do not touch members on the government side as much as they touch members on the opposition side. But I do suggest that there does not seem to be a political will on the other side to act.

I have asked questions in this House before, relating to the special initiatives program to stem the tide of violence against women, as it pertains to transition houses. The answer I get is that less than a quarter of the money has been spent. What do I hear from women's groups across Canada involved in transition houses? I hear that when they contact the federal government they do not get a response, they do not hear, they do not know how to go about accessing the money that was promised over 18 months ago.

I certainly hope that the hon. parliamentary secretary has some good news for us on this issue. It is time for the government to act and make a legitimate effort to end violence against women. The fact of the matter is that if he does not act, then the Prime Minister does not see this as one of the most serious problems in our society.

Fifty-two per cent of the population of this country has reason to fear more than the other 48 per cent of the population of this country. It is wrong. We all know it. But it does no good to stand in this House and pontificate. It does no good to say yes, we care, if we do not act, and action costs money. The only thing that is going to save the lives and the sanity and the dignity of Canadian women who are daily in jeopardy is government action and government money and it has to start now.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, members on both sides of the House have rightly expressed their indignation about the tragic events that occurred last December. In our efforts to understand what lay behind the horrifying massacre of 14 young women at the University of Montreal, we have tried to find reasons and explanations for the senseless and inexplicable act of a profoundly disturbed individual. Marc Lépine acted alone. However, his actions have shown to what extent violence can permeate society.

Our government is now making a concerted effort to reduce the manifestations of this violence. Through measures announced last year to fight family violences, $40 million is being spent on protection, treatment and prevention. The federal government is also working very closely with the provinces and the non-governmental sector on developing a comprehensive national strategy to fight family violence in this country. In fact, the forum on family violence held last June was a very important part of this process, as the hon. member should know. We expect to be able to announce a national strategy next spring. I hope it will be a satisfactory response to her request that we create a special joint committee of the House and the Senate, which I don't think would be the answer and would not produce the results this forum will provide for the government and, of course, for women and children who are victims of violence.

I would also like to recall that in 1987, this government passed legislation to deal with child sexual abuse. We will be talking about this very shortly.

Mr. Speaker, violence is not some impersonal force like wind or rain. Violence exists because people are capable of violence. Governments cannot legislate attitudes. However, we can introduce programs and take measures that promote changes in attitude. That is what we have done with our measures to combat violence, and that is why many of these measures support the efforts deployed by non-governmental organizations to improve people's perceptions and relationships with each other.

Mr. Speaker, we all, and I am sure the hon. member will agree, want to put an end to violence towards women, children and the most vulnerable in our society. It is the most earnest wish of this government and your humble servant.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.29 p.m.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

FILING OF PETITIONS

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Last October, I filed a petition signed by my constituents with the Clerk of the House, as prescribed by the Standing Orders. A month later, two other ministers did the same.

In an article in La Presse, an employee of the House of Commons was quoted indirectly as saying that filing a petition directly with the Clerk instead of presenting it in the House might indicate that we disagreed with the position defended by the petitioners. The same employee also said there was nothing to compel us to act as messengers for groups with whose views we disagreed. For instance, a member opposed to abortion would probably not table a petition in favour of abortion.

Mr. Speaker, these comments are inaccurate. As you know, Canadian citizens have always had the right to petition the Crown and Parliament for redress of what might have been perceived as a grievance. I quote Beauchesne's, our authority on parliamentary procedure:

> Although the House of Commons is a representative institution, it only considers questions submitted by its elected Members. Therefore the ordinary citizen has no right to appear personally before the House of Commons. If he has a grievance, he may present a written petition through a Member within the conditions laid down in the Standing Orders of the House.

The only elected representative in the House who is excluded from the responsibility to present petitions from his constituents is the Speaker, the reason being that he might be called upon to rule on the irregularity of petitions.

Beauchesne's tells us in citation 689 that when the Speaker's constituents ask him to present a petition in the House of Commons on their behalf:

> —he must avail himself of the services of another Member.

Beauchesne's indicates no other exceptions to the rule, whatever the responsibilities of the member, minister, backbencher, or Leader of the Opposition. It is his duty, as an elected representative, to present the petitions of his constituents. It is a duty, not a choice.

The personal beliefs of the member have no connection either with the principle or the practice. If a petition is duly certified by the clerk and signed by the member, it may, pursuant to the Standing Orders, be presented in the House during routine proceedings or filed directly with the clerk. In either case, the presentation is recorded in the Votes and Proceedings.

I and other members presented these petitions to discharge our duties to our constituents, whether or not we agreed with the content and irrespective of what is said when presenting petitions under Routine Proceedings or when filing them "by the backdoor" with the clerk of the House.

• (1110)

Mr. Speaker, an article in this morning's La Presse quotes the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier):

> It shows lack of courage on the part of these ministers to table petitions in the House by the back door, without commenting publicly.

Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 36(7) allows no debate when a petition is presented. The article in La Presse continues:

> Mr. Gauthier still wonders whether there are links between these ministers and APEC.

I reject the suggestion that a member shows lack of courage by choosing to submit a petition to the clerk of the House.

In fact, the quickest and most effective way is clearly to use a letter, instead of rising in the House. No one can question my courage on language rights. As Minister of State for Treasury Board, Deputy Leader of the Government in the House and Member of Parliament, I worked hard to pass Bill C-72. Many of my constituents criticize me for this active role. I am proud of it.

I support the linguistic duality of this country. I support it unequivocally. I do not belong to APEC. Furthermore, I deplore their opinions and everything they represent. However, as a member of Parliament, I must represent my constituents. Some members of APEC who live in my riding asked me to table their petition in the House. I did so and this gave the government an opportunity to answer them clearly and precisely.

I do not agree with APEC's opinions, but they have the right to have them presented in the House. And I have the right to decide how to do it without being accused of lacking courage.

I therefore ask my hon. friend to apologize to me and my colleagues.

[English]

Finally, in English, just in case I missed something. I want everyone to know something, and I mean this. WASPs have fought for minorities for centuries. We are going to continue that fight. We reject intolerance wherever we find it and we are always going to be there to preach tolerance and to protect the rights of minorities.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments following that statement, which I accept and feel should perhaps have been made some months ago. The whole matter raised by the minister is very important for the House and Canadians who respect not only our Constitution but also this country's official languages. I recognize that the minister has always been honest in dealing with this question and I also acknowledge his ability to rise in this House and maintain his position on official languages.

I must nevertheless tell the House that when a journalist calls us to ask, further to some items published in the press, why a minister did not comment or publicly table a petition, it is a known fact, Mr. Speaker, that in this House—and I am not saying it, it was said long before I did—some hon. members, on fundamental issues affecting them, like official languages in my case or abortion for others—perhaps I should mention capital punishment or other similar subjects that are difficult for many members. These subjects require many of us to make painful decisions that are at times extremely difficult.

I think that the petition's authorship, even if it is signed by members of Parliament, is not the issue. We all know the Standing Orders. We know very well that petitions are usually a collective effort. In this case, the petitions had been organized by APEC, which is known as an extreme right-wing group on official languages and has long been dedicated to eliminating respect for both official languages, French and English, from this country, and making Canada unilingually English. I will fight that concept and I think that the minister will join us in that fight.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, whether we are talking about a petition by APEC or about the goods and services tax, or a petition for or against abortion, I don't think a minister who represents a cabinet that upholds cabinet solidarity, ought to or has the right to say: I am going to file this particular petition with the clerk as provided under Standing Order 35(6). I think the minister made his point, and perhaps when I said manque de courage, I was describing what I see as one of the problems some members have with rising in the House and saying: I condemn this policy aimed at killing the concept of official languages, but I table this petition as the member for a riding that contains certain groups which promote certain principles from which I wish to dissociate myself. It takes guts to do that, Mr. Speaker. I have done it before in the House, and the minister has done it often enough on other topics; today, he did it on the official languages issue. I respect him for that because he condemned, before this House, the APEC and what it represents. I am grateful for that, and I think all Canadians owe him a debt of gratitude for this important statement.

However, Mr. Speaker, with the kind of procedure we have in the House of Commons, it is sometimes difficult to keep up with the opinions expressed in petitions that are tabled through the clerk. When a petition is tabled openly in the House, everybody knows about it. It is in Hansard the next day, and everybody knows that petitions were tabled. In fact, members on all sides of the House have tabled petitions on the official languages issue, APEC and Bill 178 in Quebec. However, I feel that the minister, as the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, did not entirely discharge his duties as a member of cabinet when he omitted to mention, although he was acting within the Standing Orders, that he was not at all associated with this petition. I agree the minister had the right to lay the petition on the Table of the House. However, I also feel that the minister should, from time to time, rise in the House and condemn this group that wants to destroy my country. I say this very seriously, Mr. Speaker. This group should be condemned by all members of this House. This is important to me.

To get back to the question of our parliamentary democracy, it is true that our system allows any group to table petitions in this House. It is a right that Canadians have had for many years. I don't contest that. However, a petition always contains a prayer, and that prayer reads as follows: "The petition of the undersigned, residents of Canada, who avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance common to your petitioners, in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefor provide a remedy".

Mr. Speaker, the petitioners, the people who signed the petition the minister tabled, have the certain assurance that the government or Parliament will provide a remedy for their problems. What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? It means abolishing official languages in this country. It means proclaiming this country to be a unilingual, English-speaking country Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to do that. And I don't think the minister is either. That is why I said that this roundabout, under-the-table way was not the right way, and I condemn the APEC. In concluding, I would like to repeat that if the minister felt hurt because I said that he lacked guts, he and his colleagues, I maintain this is not unparliamentary. Guts means rising in the House like he did today, and I thank him for it. It meant rising and condemning the group on whose behalf he tabled a petition in the House.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to add a few words to the comments made by my colleague, the Minister of Justice.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the two articles in question have raised considerable concern for a number of us. The first appeared in La Presse on Saturday, the second appeared today.

The clear implication of those articles was that members of Parliament, in exercising their right and their responsibility to table petitions on behalf of their constituents, in the act of tabling those petitions, somehow indicate that they support the content of those petitions. Nothing could be further from the truth.

I think it is appropriate that we should use the vehicle of the question of privilege to, first of all, make it clear that those of us who have tabled these petitions in no way endorse their contents. I am not a supporter of APEC; I have not been a supporter of APEC in the past; I will not be a supporter of APEC in the future.

I would think that in 17 years in Parliament one develops a record which can be consulted by anyone who wishes to do so, in terms of the votes that one takes in Parliament, in terms of the positions that one takes in one's constituency and across the country. I think that, in the course of those seventeen and a half years that I have been privileged to serve in Parliament, I have developed some reputation for a belief in the preservation of rights across Canada, the belief that we should all fight against intolerance in whatever form, and the belief, as well, that all Canadians are entitled to the right of freedom of speech.

My practice, during the years in which I have served as a member of Parliament, has been to table petitions in the House of Commons which are presented by my constituents with the request that they be passed on to Parliament. I fully concede this fact up front; nothing in the rules requires that a member of Parliament discharge that moral responsibility anymore than anything in the rules requires that a member of Parliament vote in this place, or that a member of Parliament speak in debate, or that a member of Parliament discharge the many other responsibilities that he or she has. One of the most basic and fundamental rights for which people have fought and died is the right of freedom of speech. And the right to petition Parliament is a direct extension of the right of freedom of speech.

I do not believe that any of us has to say that we endorse everything that is said whenever someone exercises his or her freedom of speech. But, I think everyone in this House must surely accept the principle of freedom of speech as being sacrosanct. The principle of the right of citizens of this country to petition the Parliament of Canada must also be sacrosanct.

In the article in La Presse the journalist takes a good deal of time speculating as to whether those members of Parliament who table petitions support the contents of the petitions. The reporter had lots of time for doing that. What he did not have time to do was to bother to ask any of the members of Parliament in question what their position was.

I received no telephone call from that journalist before he wrote his article. Had he called, had he asked whether I supported APEC's petition, the answer would have been unequivocally "no". But, the journalist did not take the trouble to bother to find out. Instead, he simply speculated.

In the Saturday article there was a disturbing, unattributed quotation referring to fonctionnaire de la Chambre des communes, saying that members of Parliament typically would not table petitions with which they disagree. The individual who is alleged to have made that quote is not identified and I do not think any purpose is served by our trying to search him or her out. But, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate for you—

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, but the hon. member referred to an apparently unidentified functionary of this place. I just want to tell the House that that person has not been identified and that person may not exist.

Mr. Beatty: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think it is appropriate that you should put that on the record. I think it is also appropriate that when you give your ruling with regard to the question of privilege of my colleague, that the issue of whether or not there is any implication of support for the contents of petitions in the process of tabling petitions on behalf of one's constituents, that that issue should receive a clear decision by you and a clear guidance for the people of Canada as to whether any such implication is correct or justified.

The member of Parliament for Ottawa—Vanier attacks the Minister of Justice or attacks the Minister of Energy or attacks me for a lack of courage in tabling these petitions and not getting up on the floor and saying, "I'm tabling these petitions, Mr. Speaker", and then breaking the rules by saying, "However I do not agree with the content of the petitions that I am tabling".

He was mute with regard to the petitions that were tabled by members of his own party. The documents of the House show that similar petitions were tabled by all three parties, as is their right and, I believe, their responsibility on behalf of their constituents. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier made no effort to address that fact or to speak to the members of his own caucus if he believed that there was some grave lack of courage involved here.

The hon. member for Leeds—Grenville is listed in the records of the House as having tabled some petitions, as are the hon. members for Prince Edward—Hastings and for Northumberland, among others. Members of all three parties have tabled similar petitions. In no way does the act of tabling a petition imply that the member of Parliament who allows his or her constituents to petition Parliament necessarily supports the contents of a petition which is tabled in Parliament.

What particularly concerns me about these articles which were exceptionally unprofessional, and that by implication suggested things which were simply untrue, is that this is a time of considerable linguistic tension in Canada. All of us in Parliament on all sides of the House and outside of Parliament have a responsibility to foster tolerance and understanding. All of us have an obligation to try to promote the unity of Canada. All of us have a responsibility to try to ensure that when we make allegations or suggestions that they are well-founded and based on fact. These two articles in La Presse did not meet that test. What they did was divide Canada at a time when Canadians should be united.

Finally, I would make two points with regard to the practice that is followed here. The first is that had the journalist in question bothered to check the record he would have been able to check other petitions that I have tabled during my time here in Parliament. He would have found, for example, that I have tabled petitions on abortion, an issue on which I hold very strong views and on which there is a bill before Parliament at the present time. I have tabled petitions which do not necessarily accord with my point of view on abortion.

I have attempted as well to table a petition in opposition to the goods and services tax. My support of the goods and services tax is well known. I am a minister of the Crown and my very membership in cabinet requires full support of all of the government's programs. Yet I sent to the clerk of petitions, as I believe is appropriate, a petition drawn up within my own constituency in opposition to the goods and services tax. It was rejected by the clerk of petitions because it was not drawn up in the right form. But the intention was there to allow my constituents to petition Parliament whenever they believe that they have a grievance that should be redressed.

The Minister of Justice and government House leader on behalf of the government responded, rejecting APEC's petition. That point should not be lost on anybody here—the government made a formal response to the APEC petitions rejecting the petitions. The La Presse article says that when the government House leader responded to it, he tabled the response in an equally discreet way, ostensibly one assumes to avoid anybody noticing that he had tabled a response. That is the only way in which a response can be given to petitions. It is the way in which a response is given daily to petitions. To suggest that there is something surreptitious or sneaky about tabling a response to petitions, which is the only way in which it can be done is simply a perversion of the facts.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I detest intolerance in whatever form it comes. I have no affiliation and will have no affiliation with a movement that promotes intolerance and fear.

• (1130)

That is my policy in French and it is my policy in English. It is the responsibility of every member of Parliament. As long as I am privileged to serve in this place, my policy will be to promote tolerance and understanding and not fear and intolerance. As long as I serve in this Parliament, my goal as well will be to ensure that the rights of freedom of speech of all Canadians are fully respected.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a few points on the record today with respect to the issue to which my colleagues the Ministers of Justice and National Health and Welfare have referred. The point that has to be mentioned here is that one has as much credibility in this House and in the country with respect to national leadership as the integrity with which one's words are taken and respected on both sides of the House.

We have partisan differences in this House, that is what this place is all about. On the other hand, there is always a deep understanding, which I have always appreciated in the 17 plus years that I have been here, that we respect the manner in which members deal with tough and difficult public issues and also their attempts to forge national unity.

Having said that, I want to make a couple of points. I will not repeat the legal arguments that my House Leader put before the House. I think those are quite clear. We understand them also from the House rules.

Second, we all recognize that since the earliest days of Parliament, going back to King John, the people had the right to petition the King, or as our modern expression is, the Parliament, and in our case the Parliament of Canada. That is my responsibility as a member of Parliament.

Having said that, and as the Minister of National Health and Welfare also pointed out, in fact, there have been petitions presented to me on the pro-choice side of the abortion question. I do not think I have to convince anybody in this House of my position on that issue, that being pro-life. But I had a responsibility in respect of the people in my riding, who do not universally hold the view I have on that subject, to present the petition.

I want to go back just a bit to the time, Mr. Speaker, when you and I came into this House in 1972. In 1972, we had a minority. There was a difference of two seats in 1972. There was a resolution on reaffirmation of the Official Languages Act of 1969. I know the House Leader of the Liberal Party will recall that period. Those were periods of fairly difficult tension in respect to language. I remember the then Minister of Transport, the late hon. Jean Marchand, making a very impassioned speech from his seat in regard to the need for parties from both sides of the House to always keep in mind that our single responsibility, regardless of our partisan differences, was the unity of the country. That was a speech that obviously left an impression on a very young member of Parliament over all these years.

There was a vote in this House at that time on a resolution. If memory serves correctly, there were eight members from my party, from my province in this House. It was the only province from which the majority of members from one party, from one province, voted against the resolution. I voted for that resolution in 1973.

In fact, if I can be very personal for a moment, because of the minority situation at the time there was a member of my party whom I will not name, who later became a member of the Liberal party, who came into my riding to try to find a new member to contest the nomination, because of my support for bilingualism and for minority language rights in the province of Manitoba.

I say that simply because I think it is sometimes important to have the historical record in terms of continuity in respect of this issue. This is an issue which, I believe, goes beyond partisan differences.

I think we in this House all recognize that when we have petitions to present it creates a difficulty, not only for a member of Parliament but particularly for a cabinet minister, because you are both a member of Parliament and a cabinet minister. You have to respond to both roles and both functions.

With my staff in my office I looked at this petition and discussed whether I should present it in the House and make a statement and whether, in so doing, I would give this group in my riding the very publicity it craves, publicity which I was not going to give them. That was one issue I had to deal with and it was for that reason the petition was presented that way.

I would like to make one last point, Mr. Speaker, or perhaps two if you allow me the time, because I know you take this issue very seriously. I was first made aware of this on Sunday through an article in La Presse and there is an article today in The Sun chain by Michel Gratton. He makes the statement:

> They seem to think it was their democratic duty to their constituents.

That is to file petitions. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is my democratic duty. Not only is it my duty, it is my responsibility even if I disagree with what is in the petition. More important, he says:

> I fail to understand what pushing something you don't believe in has to do with a politician's duty.

My second point is that all of us have presented petitions in this House signed by constituents, with which petitions we fundamentally disagree.

> As a matter of fact, there seems to be a contradiction there. We don't elect fax machines or mailmen. We like to believe we elect people who stand for something and are not mere vehicles for what any extremist pressure group wants them to do.

We also do not elect writers, we do not elect editorial writers, we do not elect people who can get on television or, for that matter, who have licences from the CRTC. We have public responsibility through that licensing process. We have another responsibility as members of Parliament to present the views of our constituents no matter how wrong we believe those views are.

I would like to take just another moment. I went to my records this morning because I wanted to see whether I had been true to the words I was going to use in the House of Commons. I have a letter dated November 24, 1989, which is signed by my special assistant in the riding that was addressed to the people who had demanded that I make a public statement in the tabling of this petition. I am willing to table these letters. I have as well the record of the House of Commons which, of course, everyone can read. More important, there is a letter dated October 5, 1989, and, because this matter has become public, I will do something that I do not do very often. I will make public a letter between a member of Parliament, a cabinet minister, and a constituent.

It is addressed to Mr. and Mrs. Tom Joyce, R. R. 1, Steinbach, Manitoba, R0A 2A0. In fact, the irony of this thing is that while that is an address in my home town the community that they live close to is a place called Giroux in the rural municipality of Ste-Anne-des-Chênes. That may gives members of this House a little glimpse of what we all face in our own constituencies.

I will not go into detail. He and she go into the matter of the CF-18 and the CF-5. I know members of the House know about that. They write about VIA Rail. I would like to read selective paragraphs only for the purpose of this debate and if people want to see this letter they can do that, even with the conditions I made earlier. I said this:

> VIA Rail is a prime example of Quebec not being favoured when hard decisions must be made. There will be 227 people laid off in Manitoba because of VIA cuts. The province of Quebec will lose 1,000 jobs with 631 lay-offs in Montreal alone.

Then it goes into the Manitoba issue and the last part of the petition:

> In your letter you accuse the government of not only giving lip service to the issue of minority rights but specifically in Quebec. The Prime Minister has objected to Bill 178 in terms as strong or stronger than Alberta and Saskatchewan and passed legislation affecting francophone rights in those provinces. In your letter you called for less talk and more positive action. In my view one positive step that can be taken on a personal level is learning more about the situation on minorities and the history of francophone rights in Canada. This would lead to greater understanding and reduced linguistic tensions. As you are not satisfied with the position of the Government of Canada I am asking for your suggestions as to what positive action should be taken. What would you like to see done? When answering this question keep in mind two key points: One, I do not consider a boycott of Quebec products to be positive. Traditionally the federal government does not punish provinces, fiscally, financially or legally, for passing legal legislation the government does not support. Two, the actions of Quebec, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, while regrettable, were legal. The Canadian constitution has a notwithstanding clause that allows provinces to override the Charter of Rights when deemed necessary in the provinces view.
> In conclusion the federal government continues to oppose the violation of minority rights everywhere in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot put it any clearer in the House today than I did in that letter of October last.

• (1140)

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I want to intervene briefly in this matter. I want the House and all of Canada to know that this matter goes beyond the case that has caught the attention of the House and extends to the manner and circumstances in which petitions are presented to the House of Commons.

I want, first, to draw your attention to an incident that took place in the House last Friday, February 9, 1990, and involved the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and the member for Calgary Southwest. I am sorry, in view of the discussion today, that I did not rise on a point of order at that time. As became apparent as reported at page 8144 of the official report, Hansard, the exchange speaks for itself, but it bears repeating.

The member for Juan de Fuca said, and it was later apparent that he meant the member for Calgary Southwest:

> You cannot even accept the fact that some people who wear turbans are Canadians. I find that disgraceful. I will not even deal with that.

The member for Calgary Southwest denied emphatically that she had ever indicated that that was her view. It appeared then that the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca was relying on a petition that the member for Calgary Southwest had presented on another occasion, and an argument ensued about presenting petitions.

Once more, we are the author of our own misfortune in the House of Commons. We have enacted and passed rules that are difficult to interpret, and I can understand why the media has some difficulty.

Members of Parliament have been presented with a form emanating, I understand, from the clerk of petitions. That form states very clearly in the notations that a member of Parliament cannot be compelled to present a petition. The form further notes that the fact that a member presents a petition does not imply that he or she endorses its contents. I think any member who reads that form is entitled to rely on that statement but, notwithstanding, that statement is contained in a form issued by the clerk of petitions of this House of Commons.

The rules of the House state, and I refer to Standing Order 36(3):

> Members presenting petitions shall be answerable that they do not contain impertinent or improper matter.

A member is required to endorse his or her name on a petition. So, we create a confusion as to what is the status of a member when presenting a petition. On the one hand, there is no endorsement of the contents. On the other hand, it is said in the Standing Orders of the House that a member is responsible for improper matter in a petition.

I think we have created this difficulty, because the nature of a petition and the right to petition belongs to the petitioner, the Canadian subject, the citizen. The member of Parliament is only the instrument for the presentation of the petition. I do not see how any common sense can be made of requiring a member to endorse the contents of a petition. It takes away from the right of Canadians to petition the House of Commons if you make it a condition of that presentation that the member must, somehow, connect himself or herself to the contents of the petition by way of endorsement or otherwise.

I hope you will take this matter carefully under advisement, review the form that has been provided by the clerk of petitions, and review Standing Order 36 and particularly subsection (3) in the context not only of the case that is presented today but the context of the allegations made by the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. And I am sure other members have made similar allegations.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, in considering the rules and the forms that have been presented to us that you will come down on the side of the citizen and say that there does exist an inherent right of all Canadians to petition Parliament and that the role of the member of Parliament should simply be that of presenting a petition without comment, endorsement or otherwise.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to take only a few minutes to add a few words on the very important point that was raised this morning.

First, Mr. Speaker, I guess you will be called upon to decide whether the issue should be referred to the parliamentary committee in order to determine whether changing our Standing Orders would be necessary in order to clarify what, in fact, the duty of the member is in such instances.

Our rules at the present time are somewhat vague in that regard. Perhaps that is the strength of the rule that exists. It allows members of Parliament to make a decision according to his or her own conscience whether or not they will present a petition with which they agree, present a petition with which they disagree and believe in their own conscience it is their duty to do so, or feel so strongly opposed to the subject matter in question as to refuse to present the petition altogether.

I suppose each and every one of us has to make those kinds of decisions all day long when we are defending constituents, be they constituents with an unemployment insurance problem or any other kind of problem that we are called upon to rectify from time to time for those who have sent us here on their behalf.

In similar manner, rules are designed, I would argue, to reflect that in regard to petitions. In other words, we can make those kinds of decisions of conscience to which I was referring a while ago.

Our petition form, Mr. Speaker, which our rules provide for us, refers to the ancient and undoubted right to petition Parliament. Clearly, what is insinuated here is if a person has a right to petition Parliament, obviously Parliament has an obligation to receive the petition, and in order for Parliament to have that obligation to receive it, I think one can safely deduce that the parliamentarian in question has the same duty to present the petition in question.

I have in the past presented petitions with which I disagreed. In the Ontario legislature, where I had the honour and privilege of serving prior to coming to this House, I have upon occasion stated publicly while presenting a petition, albeit briefly and without presenting argument, that I was presenting a petition signed by so many constituents with whom I disagreed, and so on, and described the petition. I did not make an argument as to why I disagreed with it but merely stated so in one or two words. The point is that I felt this was a happy medium between my fulfilling my duty as a member of Parliament on the one hand and, of course, making it quite clear that I did not necessarily endorse the petition that I was presenting.

That, I believe, is the issue before us today; whether or not it is our duty to present petitions. I do not suppose we will solve that situation today, but I would argue that perhaps we should not, perhaps that issue should be left to the conscience of individual members.

I would argue, though, that all members of the House should reflect upon whether or not it would be appropriate for them to state briefly, and in the manner that I have indicated before, at the time they are presenting petitions, that they do not agree with the petition if they feel that the disagreement is so profound that they must say so. Of course, they would do that without presenting argument in order not to deviate otherwise from the rules at our disposal.

The fact that Mr. Speaker himself cannot present a petition but can ask a colleague to do so, I believe, is a demonstration of the fact that if the Speaker is presented with a petition the rules indicate that it would be Mr. Speaker's role to ensure that the petition is presented. By extension, it would be, I believe, the duty of the parliamentarian who was requested by Mr. Speaker to do so himself or herself after having received that request from the Speaker. That is a further illustration of the fact that the parliamentarian does not necessarily indicate support for the petitions.

In regard to presenting petitions, perhaps our role, to a degree, is that of a messenger. It is said that we should not shoot the messenger because the messenger does not necessarily agree with the message that he or she carries. Perhaps this is an example of that.

However, because of our duty of leadership in this House, as well as our duty as representatives, I think it would be important if we were provided with some mechanism by which we could, without debate, when we disagree with an issue to such a point that we feel it is in our interests, in the interests of this House and that of our country, I would argue in the present case, make that case very briefly.

Perhaps the other lesson to be learned from all of this is that in an issue as fundamental as this one we all, collectively and individually, should use every occasion to indicate our support for the linguistic duality and the national unity of our country. It has been said that all that is needed for evil to triumph is for good people to do nothing.

I am not suggesting that the three cabinet ministers in question failed to do something which they should have known to do. Rather, sometimes as parliamentarians we seem to take things for granted such as the recognition of that linguistic duality and other privileges and rights that we enjoy as citizens. Maybe we should never take those privileges and rights for granted.

I am not sure whether all of this constitutes a question of privilege but I want to leave you with one last remark. Perhaps I could get the attention of the three ministers in question. There may be something in the article signed by Mr. Michel Gratton that has been missed in all of this. The last line of the article reads:

> Well, all I have to say to this timorous trio is: Next time, if you really want to hide, put some hoods on.

I feel that that is a very offensive comment and if anything in this constitutes a question of privilege, that is probably the statement, more than anything else that has been said this morning.

This is not attributed to anyone else. I am saying that references which I interpret to be to the Ku Klux Klan are very offensive to all of us. Notwithstanding partisan disagreements which we may have, I invite colleagues to think about that particular statement in the article in question because I think it is more offensive than anything else that has been discussed in this debate.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words on this very important issue. I have asked myself why we have taken nearly an hour of time this morning to reflect on this issue. I think it is important. I have listened with interest to all the interventions and I find myself agreeing with most of the comments made today.

I must say that one of the times that I feel best in this House is when we are discussing, either in this way or in some other way, what this country is all about, the need for all of us to work together to preserve the unity that we know can exist in our country and to speak out against forces that cause rifts regionally or between cultures and peoples and, in this case of course, linguistic minorities.

I am pleased to listen to the elevated debate taking place today on this point of privilege. I am pleased that you have allowed us to go on at some length on this most important matter. That is the reason we have gone on. I do not have much to add to the points made by my distinguished colleagues other than to say that when I read both of those articles over the last few days, I was disgusted with the tone. I reflected back, when I read the articles, on others in the House who have raised similar petitions, exact petitions in terms of the source. I suppose the fact that most people dissociated themselves with the theme of the petitions rescued them from this particular journalist's wrath.

We all recognize that we can file petitions which indeed we have a right to do, and which the ministers referred to in the article did. Or we have the right to present petitions and most often petitioners from my constituency ask me to present their petitions in the House of Commons. Most of the time I do that enthusiastically because I agree with the thrust of the petition. However on occasion I have not. At that time I have simply dissociated myself with the point or points being raised in the petition and went on to present it. Surely, as a previous minister indicated, one of the most fundamental rights of a citizen in our country is to have his or her view presented on the floor of the House of Commons when the request is made to the member of Parliament.

Earlier some comments were made in then House by the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. If we are to pursue I would certainly ask that we do it when the hon. member is in his place, to allow him to respond. I was here and I do not believe that what the hon. member indicated took place actually took place at all. However, that is for another time.

I simply would like to conclude by saying that we must uphold the right of all citizens to present petitions through their members of Parliament in the House of Commons but also to guard against using these times, when we are dealing with such sensitive issues in terms of nation building, to allow our partisan instincts to come to the fore. I have deep concerns over the points being raised by my hon. friend, the government House leader, on this case. However I suspect that you have heard enough now, Mr. Speaker, to make a ruling as to whether or not this is a question of privilege.

I would simply like to add that we have taken an hour of the time of an opposition day. I would like to think that we can at least add this hour to the end of the day. This is an extraordinary question of privilege and I would ask that at some later time that point be considered.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: First, I am in total agreement with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lewis), the other minister, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) and other members that the subject considered today is very important. It is not only important for the procedure of this place; it is also very important for our country's unity. Again this morning, we heard statements about this House and against some attitudes that we have today and we also had in the past from some citizens in our country.

I greatly regret the situation, but it is clear that this House is unanimously against such statements and there is consensus to take the leadership positions required for our country to continue, to maintain Canadian unity, an attitude, a place where the rights of all Canadians are respected.

[English]

Having said that, I am going to take under advisement some of the issues that are raised here. I am mindful of the request of the hon. member for Kamloops that I consider carefully the matter raised by the hon. member for Halifax West. I will do that.

I want also to note, in addition to what I have said about the declarations on both sides of this House, that our colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, has today saluted the courage and the forthrightness of the ministers who were the subject of these articles.

I am concerned about the articles, and I am going to be very careful before I return to the House with some comments which will probably have to be made. I will try to do everything I can to put them in a way which will be helpful to the challenges that we face in trying to keep this country together. I thank hon. members for their interventions.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 151 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

MINING

MINERAL RIGHTS OF YUKON LANDS

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there has been a challenge to the effectiveness of certain land withdrawals in the Yukon which could seriously undermine the government's ability to manage Yukon lands.

Consequently I am announcing today that the government is bringing forward legislation to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act. It will firmly establish the Crown's right to prohibit disposition of mineral rights on Yukon lands which are required for a purpose that the government believes to be in the public interest.

This legislation, if passed by Parliament, will be retroactive to this day. The government's action will assure that withdrawn lands, including lands identified as being of interest to Yukon Indians, will not be open for location of new mining claims.

I am making this announcement to ensure that the mining industry clearly knows which areas are open for staking and exploration.

The mining recorders in the Yukon maintain records of the areas withdrawn from disposition. Persons who intend to stake mining claims in the Yukon should first contact the mining recorders to determine the status of the lands. I am directing the mining recorders to refuse any application for claim which has been located in an area withdrawn from disposition.

These changes will deal only with withdrawal of lands. There is an urgency to make these technical changes in order to confirm the government's authority to manage Crown lands in the Yukon. This however will not preclude making other changes which have been identified by various interest groups and acknowledged in the northern mineral policy. It is certainly not my intention to introduce significant policy changes without full consultation with all interested parties.

In addition, I wish to make clear that the statements I am making today do not affect the current action in the Federal Court of Canada, namely, Halferdahl v. M. A. Fish in his capacity as the mining recorder, et al.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, as I was called upon to answer the minister's statement, I want to express on behalf of the Opposition how offended we are that the usual courtesy was not extended in this case. However, we understand that the minister has been under considerable pressure. We know that he is usually very forthcoming in advancing copies of these statements to us in the Opposition in advance of their being made.

Our critic in the mining area is unable to be here this morning, and the notice was only given to us about 15 minutes ago. All I can say is that we will withhold our comments until we see the bill that the minister will be introducing, which I gather will be in the next couple of days.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I too am in a similar situation. I acknowledge the fact that the minister did not have an opportunity to extend the usual courtesy of providing opposition critics with his statement. However, I appreciate that he at least is of the opinion that he had to act expeditiously this morning before the claims offices opened in the north.

I simply want to make two or three cautionary comments. First, we appreciate the role that mining plays in the Yukon, as does the minister. In his statement he indicated that the purpose of this initiative was to recognize that the government believes there are certain lands that must be protected for the public interest. That is a principle which I and all others in this House would support.

However, not defining what the public interest is and not defining explicitly what is implied by this raise some concerns. I flag those concerns now. I was encouraged when the minister indicated that there will be full consultation with all parties, which of course would include the Government of the Yukon in terms of its reaction, as well as the major players affected by this statement, the citizens of the Yukon, particularly the native people of the Yukon, as well as those involved in the mining industry.

I too would like to withhold further comment until the minister introduces the appropriate legislation, at which time I suspect we will have lots to say.

VICTIMS OF THALIDOMIDE

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, nearly three decades have passed since the tragedy of thalidomide claimed more than 8,000 victims around the world. In Canada, a special commitment was made to thalidomide victims by the government of the day. Much was done by both federal and provincial governments to help meet their needs.

The thalidomide victims have faced a courageous struggle since birth, trying to adapt to and overcome disabling birth defects. Some cannot work or have problems finding jobs. All are reaching an age when they must establish their independence from parents who are growing older. They need extra funds to help pay for special transportation, housing or other needs not covered by provincial assistance programs.

At the time the tragedy occurred, two separate inquiries, a special parliamentary committee and a committee of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, provided recommendations that enabled the government to assist these people and to prevent further such tragedies. This was on the basis of compassion or understanding and not liability. The commitment made by the minister of the day was unique. No similar commitment had ever been made to other groups.

Thalidomide victims have to face great challenges and they do so very courageously. For me and my colleagues in Cabinet, there is no doubt that we must help them improve their quality of life and plan their future.

[English]

I am pleased to announce today that the Government of Canada will fulfill its commitment made to the thalidomide victims in 1963 by providing a total of $7.5 million to an estimated 75 to 100 people living in Canada who were affected.

[Translation]

The $7.5 million will be divided equally among those who suffered injuries due to Kevadon or Talimol, the forms of thalidomide prescribed to their mothers during pregnancy. Payment will be made to each eligible recipient in two equal annual tax-free instalments. Those concerned will have one year starting today to prove their eligibility.

[English]

I would like to assure everyone that the funding I am announcing today is over and above the settlements the victims received from the manufacturer of thalidomide and will not be taken from federal-provincial programs which help these disabled Canadians.

Canadians are proud of our social programs. They are proud of the fact that we try to care for those who are less fortunate, and they see it as one of the elements which distinguishs us from other countries. I believe that by announcing extraordinary assistance for people who have faced a genuine hardship, this government is showing that it supports this tradition.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I begin by congratulating Mr. Randy Warren as well as Cliff Chadderton of the War Amputations of Canada, as well as the gentlemen who headed the task force on thalidomide victims. These individuals and their organizations have exhibted over the years great enthusiasm, as well as providing hope to their members.

Today, what I think we see is a realization of that particular objective in that the Government of Canada has accepted in whole the principle of compensation for these particular victims.

I am sure that the minister would want to join with me in congratulating the organization and all those individuals who have worked with him over the years in order to arrive at this particular day in terms of accepting of the principle of compensation.

The amount of money which has been put forward, amounting to $7.5 million, has not been fully accepted by the thalidomide victims and their organization. The Minister is well aware of that. I believe, and I am sure the Minister would want to echo my sentiments, that this is certainly a good starting point in terms of further negotiations which will take place over the next number of months. I am sure if there are any ways in which things can be changed to better the victims and their plight in life that the minister would want to co-operate in whatever that might be, for example, monthly payments as opposed to annual payments, or whatever.

This particular issue has been around for almost three decades. It is ironic that last February 14 a report was tabled with the minister recommending compensation for these particular victims. I am happy to see that the Government of Canada has responded, not as quickly as I had hoped, but has responded favourably in terms of recognizing the principle of compensation.

I hope that it will proceed forward and meet with those representatives and meaningfully discuss ways to ensure that the compensation goes directly to the victims in a way in which they believe to be appropriate and responsible.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I respond to the minister's statement today with mixed feelings. I wish to recognize the fact that the minister has indeed made an offer after three decades of lobbying in a courageous struggle on behalf of those people who suffer the ill effects of thalidomide. The War Amputations of Canada has represented these people in their lobbying efforts.

Finally, today, we have the beginning of a resolution. I applaud the minister for taking that initiative. I want to emphasize that while we in the New Democratic Party join with the War Amps people and all those involved for so many years in welcoming the news today, we recognize that it is still an offer. We recognize that there is still lots of work to do. The minister, I am sure, will now go back to the task force to seek further refinements on how the money will be most appropriately disbursed.

I ask the minister to bargain in good faith with the thalidomide task force that is seeking these refinements. We all appreciate what people have had to experience for so many years. Now is a time to show good faith and a strong will to end this process expeditiously and to determine a final resolution to this long-standing grievance as quickly as possible.

While we welcome the news today, we recognize that we still have work to do. We join with the others in recognizing the legitimacy of the claims, which has been an important step taken by the minister. To recognize that appropriate redress made on behalf of the thalidomide victims, as argued by the War Amputations of Canada, is an appropriate initiative now. We join with the minister in urging an expeditious end to this long, difficult and courageous process.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for London—Middlesex on a very short statement.

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I too want to congratulate the government on finally addressing this issue.

I want to congratulate Randy Warren on his efforts as a thalidomide victim. Through first-hand experience Randy has fought for this and I would like to congratulate him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that I cannot allow the hon. member to make a statement.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is signed by a number of Canadians who want the Government of Canada to withdraw its proposed goods and services tax.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to present to the House of Commons today a petition concerning the Rouge River Valley in Scarborough, part of metro Toronto. It is a beautiful 10,000 acres of land with respect to which the petitioners are calling upon Parliament and the Government of Ontario to preserve as a park.

The Save the Rouge Valley Organization, a volunteer organization, is holding its annual meeting tonight in the Civic Centre in Scarborough. I will be there, as will hundreds of others, to give the message that the Government of Canada and all members of the House of this great Parliament have endorsed the preservation of this valley. We are waiting on the Province of Ontario to come to the same conclusion.

I am pleased to present this petition today concerning the preservation of the Rouge Valley.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Pont Lafrance in New Brunswick. The signatures on this petition have been collected by my colleague, the hon. member for Gloucester, and Pont Lafrance is in his constituency.

These Canadians join millions of others who are outraged at the government's proposed goods and services tax. They have taken the trouble to sign this petition to call upon Parliament to reject the tax.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present to this House. One is signed by a number of Canadians who are opposed to the GST. They call upon the government to withdraw this unfair tax immediately.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition presented to me by a number of farmers from Saskatchewan who are very concerned over the future of the Canadian Wheat Board.

They indicate that they are very upset and dismayed that the government did not consult with them concerning the removal of oats from under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

They call upon this government to replace oats under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and to give oats the same protection that wheat has under the Wheat Board Act.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition once again, for I don't know how many times, against the government's goods and services tax.

Its signatures were collected by constituents from Heffrey Creek, Raleigh, Dallas, Barnhartvale, Rosehill and Valleyview.

The petitioners point out that the goods and services tax is grossly unfair, particularly to western Canadians where transportation costs are built into the cost of virtually every good that they purchase. They list a number of services that will now be taxed at 7 per cent which are presently untaxed.

They make the point that they simply cannot go on paying taxes at this level and ask that the Parliament of Canada try to convince the government to back off with this very punitive, cruel, mean tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to table in the House a petition that has been certified correct by the clerk as to form and content.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Sainte-Cécile, Petite-Rivière-de-l'Île, Shippegan, Lamèque, Inkerman, and hundreds of residents in my riding strenuously object to the goods and services tax and ask the government to withdraw this disastrous proposal that will have a negative impact on the economy of the Acadian peninsula in the riding of Gloucester.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my understanding that there were to be arguments today with regard to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre. Is the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. parliamentary secretary ready for their arguments?

PRIVILEGE

REMOVAL OF AT AND EAST PROGRAM

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, in his very ably argued question of privilege yesterday, raised a matter which has been before this Parliament before. Because of the adjournment of the discussion which was sought and obtained yesterday by the hon. parliamentary secretary, I was able to review some of the precedents that I think are relevant to assist Your Honour in reaching a decision on this important matter.

It may be that we could obtain the agreement of the House on it. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary, when I have completed my remarks, will find unanimous agreement to treat this as a breach of privileges of the House and to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business with a view to having it discussed and settled there.

The point raised by the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre deals with the fact that a bill has been introduced in this House which purports to be retroactive in its application, but the government has proceeded to treat the bill as passed and has refused to pay out money it could pay out under the existing legislation, under the Railway Act, to persons who apply for this subsidy or payment for the shipment of grain to eastern ports.

A similar situation arose in 1971. Mr. Stanley Knowles, who was then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, raised a question of privilege on September 13, 1971 in relation to a government bill which dealt with the matter of the Canadian Wheat Board. The Wheat Board was doing the same thing that the government is currently doing with this legislation; that is to say, a bill had been introduced in Parliament that was to be retroactive in its effect, but the Wheat Board treated the bill as passed and was refusing to make the payments.

The hon. member as he then was raised this question of privilege and said, as reported on page 7737 of Hansard:

> My question of privilege relates to the non-payment of moneys which it is specified in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act are to be paid by the Minister of Finance to the Canadian Wheat Board; and, more particularly, the action of the government in telling this House that the reason it is not carrying out the provisions of the law is that it has a bill on the order paper.
> I submit that anything which in a court would be regarded as contempt can be regarded as privilege in this House. I further suggest that when the government admits to Parliament that it is not carrying out the law and tells Parliament the reason it is not carrying out the law is that it has a bill on the order paper to rescind that law, a bill which has not yet been passed, then the rights and privileges of Parliament are being affronted.

On page 7738 he went on to state that the bill had not been passed and said:

> One other point I cite in the list of facts is that Bill C-244 has not been passed and therefore authority to act on that basis has not been established by Parliament.

That is exactly the situation we are facing today in this House. He went on to state:

> The point I am making is that the place for us to deal with a matter like this and what has been done to us is here on the floor of Parliament. What has been done to us is that we have been told that, although we have passed a law and although it is there and is clear, the government feels it does not have to carry it out because of this other provision, an unpassed bill which it has on the order paper.

What Mr. Knowles described was exactly the situation that we are faced with today. The Speaker on that question of privilege made a ruling. I will invite you later,

Mr. Speaker, to consider that ruling. He ruled against Mr. Knowles' question of privilege, but I shall return to that later.

Subsequently, because of this outrageous conduct on the part of the then government, the hon. member for Calgary North sought and obtained leave to have an emergency debate on this issue.

If the Chair feels this is significant, I am quite prepared to bring an application for an emergency debate tomorrow to discuss this matter further, subject to what we hear today from the parliamentary secretary.

Clearly the complaint today is as outrageous as the complaint. I know that the Speaker would want to follow the ruling of the previous Speaker in this respect and permit an emergency debate should it be necessary. I hope it will not be.

Mr. Woolliams, the hon. member for Calgary North at the time, said, and I quote from page 7890 of Hansard for September 16, 1971:

> This debate poses the rhetorical question: Is this institution of Parliament, which includes the House of Commons, the Senate and all the law-making processes, to be one that will be controlled by the executive?

That is the point of our question of privilege today.

That emergency debate revealed the most amazing speeches. I have found a veritable gold mine of assistance for Your Honour in it. Probably the most important statements were those by the now Minister of Agriculture who was then the hon. member for Vegreville. I gather he is still the hon. member for Vegreville, but he is now the Minister of Agriculture and Deputy Prime Minister, and a very distinguished member, one whom I know on procedural matters Your Honour would take as a great authority.

I would like to read from page 7902 of Hansard because I think his words are extremely helpful in considering this point today:

> Mr. Speaker, in this debate we have a very basic and fundamental issue to consider. That issue is the deliberate and calculated failure of this government to carry out its administrative responsibility pursuant to Canadian law.

He went on to state:

> If a question involving the administration of laws created by parliamentary democracy cannot be properly debated, it will be a sad day for Canada, for Parliament and for the system of parliamentary democracy.

Then he went on, and this is great:

> Never have I seen, and never did I expect to see, a government so blatantly and contemptuously refusing to carry out its administrative duty, a duty which is imposed by Canadian statute passed by Parliament, a law which remains in force and will continue to remain in force until Parliament in its wisdom sees fit to rescind it.

These words apply four-square to the situation we are faced with today. I know that if the Deputy Prime Minister were here now, he would stand up and agree with everything that he said in 1971.

Then he went on to state:

> That fact is so elementary that one could never have conceived that this situation could occur. It is a disgrace and a shame. After all, if governments cannot conform with the law, how in heaven's name can anyone else in society be expected to do so?

Imagine, the wisdom of Solomon uttered by the Deputy Prime Minister who went on to state:

> How can society be expected to abide by laws if the government will not live up to them? This fact is so elementary, basic and fundamental that it is completely beyond my comprehension to understand the government's attitude.

Surely in light of those statements, the Minister of Agriculture who is really affected by this bill because it does deal with the shipment of grain and grain products to eastern Canada and clearly falls in part under his departmental jurisdiction would not want to retract those statements made in 1971.

I know that my colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, has probably discussed this matter extensively with the Deputy Prime Minister. I think I know what he is going to propose, and I want to say that I quite agree with him.

The ruling of the Chair in 1971 suggested very strongly that this was not a question of privilege then. I say to Your Honour that times, I hope, have changed. Notwithstanding the very able and capable decision from, I believe it was, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, and notwithstanding the great esteem in which he is held by all members and the authority that his decisions have, perhaps he erred on this occasion.

I would invite Your Honour to so find and in fact find that there is a question of privilege here. It may not be necessary because I know that the hon. parliamentary secretary, in his discussions with the Deputy Prime Minister, will recognize that the New Democratic Party believes there has been a breach of the privileges of the House in this case.

We on the Official Opposition side will concede that there has been a breach of the privileges in this case. I know that the Deputy Prime Minister agrees, from his statements that there has been a breach of the privileges of this House. He has said that this is a breach, and he knows it is a breach.

I am sure that what we are going to hear from the Parliamentary Secretary is that he in fact agrees with the Deputy Prime Minister, with us, and with the New Democratic Party. By unanimous consent perhaps the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre could propose his motion to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business where it could be discussed. Perhaps a little report could be prepared condemning the government for its improper abuse of the laws of this country, and its arrogant and very high-handed approach to this problem could be discussed, voted on in the committee and returned to the House for unanimous approval.

I know that the parliamentary secretary, having read the authorities and having read the arguments advanced by the Deputy Prime Minister at an earlier day, and having recognized that the government has acted in complete contempt of Parliament in this matter, will want to agree. The Deputy Prime Minister's words were: "Never have I seen and never did I expect to see a government so blatantly and contemptuously refusing to carry out its administrative duty".

This situation cannot be distinguished from the earlier case. I submit to Your Honour that the Deputy Prime Minister was right then, and I am sure if he was in his place today, he would agree that he was right. We are taking the same position, so there appears to be unanimous agreement on all sides of the House on this issue. I should say that had I been here in 1971, I expect I would have chastised the government, as did the hon. member for Vegreville at that time.

The point is a very clear and simple one, and that is that the House could proceed unanimously on this item.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to my hon. friend with great care and I must say that I was almost persuaded by his rhetoric. It was very persuasive and a very well put argument. Unfortunately, once again the rhetoric is very distant and 180 degrees opposed to the facts. He did present an excellent argument. I thank him for that. It was very entertaining and very persuasive. Nevertheless, I know that the Speaker must look at the facts and not the rhetoric.

As I understand the argument of the hon. member from the NDP yesterday, he said that essentially it is unconstitutional for us to cease a subsidy before the appropriate legislation has received Royal Assent from the Governor General. In fact, what is happening in this case is that this particular bill is a direct result of budget measures. It has been done according to a very common practice used by this government and previous governments. It is nothing unusual.

In this particular case, the Minister of Finance announced the end of the at and east grain and flour subsidy when he tabled his budget paper on April 27, 1989. So it was part of the budget process. It was announced at that time. On June 16, 1989, Bill C-26 was introduced and read a first time.

What is really important here is what happened then. The House went on to approve the budget in principle. The House voted on it, made a decision on it, approved that announcement of the minister and what we have flowing out of it is the enabling legislation. That is very simple, very much a fact and not rhetoric. What we are dealing with in Bill C-26 is simply the legislation flowing out of that budgetary decision made by the House of Commons several months ago.

Once again I want to bring to the attention of the House that we have seen the demonstration we see so often in this House, that the hon. member representing the Liberal party has managed to stand on both sides of the equation, but of course at different times.

If we look back to a very good example of a similar piece of legislation, it would of course be the ruling of 1971 which the Speaker made at that time. However, even as recently as the budget debate of June 28, 1982, there was introduction of an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada. It was acted upon, the budget was passed, and later on the legislation was passed.

Let's go back to the facts and not to the very amusing and entertaining rhetoric. The facts say very clearly that, as persuasive as the hon. member's arguments were, it is not a case of privilege. The actions taken on Bill C-26 are in keeping with the House of Commons practice and traditions, and I might say have been acted upon in the most proper fashion by this government, as is our usual standard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair has taken note of the rhetoric of hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, and also the rhetoric of the parliamentary secretary. The Chair will assess all arguments and return with a ruling. I believe we should end it there and move to Orders of the Day. If the member for Regina—Lumsden has something to add to the argument, I will be glad to listen.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to take up the time of my own party on our opposition day. I will be brief.

I remind you, Sir, of remarks I made yesterday on Bill C-26. With reference to the question of privilege raised by my colleague from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, I know the Chair will examine the precedents with care.

The Chair ruled against the question of privilege raised by the then member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Knowles in 1971, and subsequently the issue was taken to Federal Court. I was very closely and heavily involved with that. In the preliminary hearing before the Federal Court judge in Regina, the Deputy Minister of Justice made his pitch and the lawyer for four farmers who had a direct interest in the matter made his pitch. The judge, in the process of setting a trial date said to the government representative, the lawyer for the Crown, that the government should seriously consider paying its bills. The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act said that the Minister of Finance shall pay to the Canadian Wheat Board such and such moneys for grain in storage in excess of a certain amount.

The government ceased paying those moneys for 18 months. No legislation had been passed. The bill was before Parliament. It was a bill called Lower Inventories for Tomorrow, Operation Lift. Attached to the bill was the repeal of the Temporary Reserves Act.

When the court reconvened for the trial, the attorney for the Crown rose in his place and said that the government had withdrawn the legislation. I was here that night when the then minister rose and withdrew the legislation.

The Government of Canada and the Minister of Finance had to pay almost $100 million owing to the Canadian Wheat Board, which was money that belonged to the farmers of western Canada.

The courts have set a precedent in spite of the ruling of the Chair prior to that occasion. I would ask, Sir, that in arriving at a decision on this, the Railway Act provides for the payment of certain moneys under the at and east freight rate subsidy program. Those moneys have not been paid since last July. This situation, if not identical, is so close to it that it is not worth arguing about.

I would hope in light of what happened in the Federal Court that the Chair will recognize that and rule that the government can continue with its legislation which can take effect on the day set for proclamation or at the time of Royal Assent when it is signed by the Governor General, but it cannot be retroactive, and the government must pay the moneys owing under the at and east freight rate subsidies in Atlantic Canada back to last July. The government owes the money, it should pay its bills.

One correction, Mr. Speaker. My colleague from the Liberal party stated in his remarks that the Wheat Board had refused to pay over the money. That is not correct. The Wheat Board did not refuse to pay over the money. It did not have the money. The government refused to give the money to the Wheat Board so it could pay it out in a final payment to the grain producers. That is the history of that matter. I think it is a precedent.

The only exception would be a budget bill that sets a tax rate starting January 1 and passed in June. That is a precedent that has been long established in Parliament. Therefore, this situation is identical to the one in 1971 and has nothing to do with the budget.

Therefore, I submit that the Chair should rule that the government should pay its bills and that the bill is not in order although the government is acting as though it is already in force, retroactively to last July. Surely there must be something that we can do in this House, that the Chair can do, to make sure that the government obeys its own laws. If we cannot do that, we have anarchy. If we have to go to court every damn time the government disobeys its own law, what is Parliament here for?

I put that question rhetorically and I urge you, Sir, to give this matter most serious consideration, which I know you will, and I hope rule that the government cannot act as though the bill has been in force since last July, and that it must proceed in the normal way before it can cease any payments under the at and east freight rates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I want to thank the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden and all other members for their arguments. We will take note of all arguments and bring back a ruling as soon as possible.

I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 11 minutes, beginning at one o'clock p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—REGIONAL TENSIONS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair) moved:

That this House condemn those policies of the government which, having bred a sense of insecurity, powerlessness and doubt among Canadians, are a cause of the recent increase in regional tensions and incidents of racism and bigotry in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt on a point of order.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would seek the unanimous consent of the House for the time for this debate to be extended approximately one hour, relative to the question of privilege that was raised by certain members this morning.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are you suggesting that we go then until two o'clock for debate?

Mr. Hovdebo: That the time be added on at the end of the day, Sir.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there consent? The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I will have to converse with some of my colleagues concerning that topic. We had a situation that did bear some similarity a week ago and no extension of the hours was provided during an opposition day at that time. I know that what had caused it was somewhat different from the cause of the delay today. Notwithstanding that fact, there were delays which had nothing to do with those who wanted a motion discussed last week. As such, I will converse with my colleagues and report to Mr. Speaker later on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent at this time. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, on a further point of order. I would like to raise a concern I have with this particular motion. In reading the motion, it is not very difficult to make the assumption that it accuses this government of increasing regional tensions, increasing incidences of racism and increasing incidences of bigotry.

The point that I would like to raise is that if this particular motion referred to an hon. member the motion would be out of order because it would be making an accusation that would be considered unfair, unparliamentary and totally out of order. I feel the same way about this particular motion. I think that it is the kind of motion that is argumentative, abusive and casts aspersions on the government and therefore on members of this House. The motion should be seriously examined by the Chair because it is certainly bordering on poor taste, at the very least.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a brief word in opposition to the point of order being made by my friend across the floor. It is very clear that the intervention of the member shows a lack of understanding of what racism is about and how it works. Certainly the government is not being accused of being racist or of being bigoted. The problem is that the policies of the government are resulting in helping the cause of racism and bigotry. It does not have to be intentional and the resolution does not say it is.

I support this resolution and I am going to make the point when I rise of almost the inverse of what it is the hon. member has said. It is policies that may be well meaning, an attitude that might be defensible which is causing the unfortunate consequences that are contained in this resolution. I think that this is a resolution that contains an allegation that could be made against any member of the House, if the things that they were doing, although not in themselves racist things or acts of bigotry, lent support and comfort to others who were racists and bigots. That is the point of this resolution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair and the Speaker have looked at this motion very carefully. What is coming out of the argument right now is debate. I think we should progress with debate. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair has the floor.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, there are any number of approaches that could be used in a discussion of the issue contained in this motion. This motion and a previous motion recently debated in this House cover, as I will demonstrate, somewhat different ground. Perhaps at some future date we should have a resolution on the importance of ignorance in perpetuating racism and intolerance of the sort that was demonstrated by the hon. member on the other side. The motion states:

> That this House condemn those policies of the government which, having bred a sense of insecurity, powerlessness and doubt among Canadians, are a cause of the recent increase in regional tensions and incidents of racism and bigotry in Canada.

There was a motion debated here on February 2. It was a motion moved by the hon. member for York Centre, a motion that our party certainly supported and one which elicited a good debate. That motion stated:

> That this House condemns the intolerance and prejudice in Canadian society that damages the fabric of the nation and urges the government and all members of Parliament to play a role in strengthening understanding and respect among Canadians.

That debate was of the genre which had many members condemning the increase in frequency of racist incidents and examples of intolerance in this country.

If one briefly reviews some recent articles in Canadian newspapers, the cogency of that debate is well demonstrated. For example: "Teenager charged in the beating of a black". That occurred at Nova Scotia Community College. "Sikhs warn that intolerance should worry all Canadians. The sad resolution of Sault Ste. Marie. Minister blasts Calgary pins for promoting blatant prejudice. Organized group not suspected in white power posters. Sickening handbill declares open season on native people. Students reject turbans in the RCMP", and on and on it goes.

There can be no doubt that there was a reasonable basis for the concern that occasioned the motion moved by the hon. member. What we heard there were the heartfelt views of members of this House on all sides condemning racism, discrimination and prejudice. It is that kind of leadership which has provided Canada with a fabric of legislation, a Charter of Rights, and many other measures which express the best of all Canadian desires that there should be tolerance in this country, that there should not be discrimination, and that there should be, as much as we can provide it, equal opportunity for all Canadian citizens.

The acceptance of those principles, whether in law or whatever, is only part of it. Those principles have to be accepted by the people. By and large, they have been. There used to be the argument that there was no way in which one could change minds by legislation. Well, it may very well be that you cannot change the deep-seated attitudes of people. Many of us who have been involved in the civil rights movement in this country have expressed ourselves in terms of not giving a damn whether we change their heartfelt feelings that are not expressed. What we are concerned about is how people treat other people.

It may very well be appropriate to say that the motion we have before us is a reversal, in a sense, of the wording of the motion moved and debated previously in this House which stated that intolerance and prejudice damages the fabric of the nation. I think it is an appropriate paraphrasing of my motion to say that when the fabric of a nation is damaged, then one will have an increase in expressions of racism and intolerance.

There is a very important principle associated with the issue of racism and intolerance. It is a basic principle that if a nation is a civilized nation, if a nation is to be a tolerant nation, then the people of that nation must have a sense of economic security. They must have a sense of community. They must have a sense that they are determinants, to some degree, of the direction in which the nation will go. The moment that fabric is torn, people begin to act in ways which are offensive to those of us who believe in equality among all people, no matter what their differences. The principle we are addressing really is the principle of scapegoating. When people are hurt, when they feel vulnerable, when they think that they are going to lose their jobs, when they feel a sense of powerlessness, they begin to look around for somebody to step on, to blame and to act out their hurt.

There are many examples of this. Historically, in the American south there were those who were called "poor white trash". They were impoverished and they looked around to find somebody who was worse off, somebody to whom they could be superior. As anybody who has studied the situation in the south would know, that was an example of scapegoating.

Perhaps the greatest historical example of scapegoating was in Germany after the First World War. That country was undergoing tremendous social dislocation, unemployment and inflation were rampant. There was near anarchy. A leader appeared who produced the scapegoat and we know the dreadful results of that. If one reflects on what was said in Germany at the time, we must note what is happening in our own country.

There is a book described in The Globe and Mail as the cornerstone of APEC—I like to call it APE because it is so primitive—ideology. It is written by J. V. Andrew. This book is described as detailing Mr. Andrew's reasons for his opposition to French Canadians, described as a backward race that has taken over the province of Quebec to use as a breeding pen and marshalling yard for the colonization of the rest of Canada.

We say there are those who are absolutely committed racists, that they have little influence unless circumstances are produced that create that kind of doubt and vulnerability I was talking about before.

I noticed that just this morning someone of my acquaintance seems to have pre-empted the subject of my debate. It is an article by Robert White in The Globe and Mail this morning which states: "Current climate fosters intolerance." His description of the situation is as follows:

> Increasing job losses combined with a shrinking social safety net leave people feeling less secure and more vulnerable to events over which they have no control. It becomes easier to attack the most vulnerable: women, children, people who differ from the mainstream by their race, colour, language or religion.

He also goes on to state, as described on February 2 in debate here, that the history of Canada has not provided us a solid record of tolerance and equality. However, increasingly over the years, in my lifetime, this country has become more and more civilized and more and more humane. What has distinguished us from our neighbours to the south is a sense of community responsibility, which is expressed in a variety of ways. It is expressed in the civilized way in which we have treated the question of basic language differences between the two colonizing peoples. It is expressed in an increasing concern about the status of aboriginal peoples in this country. It is expressed in the official policy of bilingualism. It also has been expressed in terms of such measures as unemployment insurance, medicare, and in so many other ways. This country has been based on the notion that there should be a mutual caring and that is fundamental in our society.

I submit to you that it is the erosion of that character of this country by the measures and policies implemented by this government which is largely responsible for what we are seeing in terms of scapegoating. One only need look at the examples in Ontario of those many municipalities that have passed resolutions declaring themselves unilingual. We know that this is in its expression racist, but what is the cause? The cause is that increasingly municipal councils are being asked to deal with problems with which they cannot fairly deal. It is part of the increasing unfairness in the distribution of responsibility for paying the cost of government. It is part of the unfairness in the tax system that the federal government fails to meet its obligations with respect to financing certain programs which evolved at the provincial level. In turn it goes down to the municipal level where the most regressive of all tax, the property tax, has to pay for it. People on the front line have to deal with these decisions for which no financial position was made.

What happens? A group of bigots give them the excuse to go around looking for a scapegoat. That is what is happening and that is what is going to happen to an increasing degree if we do not re-establish our commitment to the kind of society we want to pursue.

Increasingly, our country is a social democratic country. The reason I am a social democrat is that minority groups, linguistic groups, women, and all of those in our society who are so excluded are going to be the victims unless there is equality for all and unless there is a stake for all in the future of this country.

When we have the implementation of a free trade deal with which the majority disagree; when we have the niggardly attack on the unemployed with changes to UI; when we have a GST that perpetuates the notion that the rich should be relieved of the burden in favour of increasing the burden on the poor and the middle class; when we have increasing food lines all over the country; when we have people who are losing their jobs left and right; when we have regional disparity; when the fishermen know that their livelihood is at risk; and when farmers see their livelihood at risk, they look for scapegoats. People, having lost a notion of having any influence on the future, look around for others to blame. They are more immediate because they have a government that passes policies that are at odds with the views of the people and at odds with the view of what should be the destiny of Canada.

If one wants to look for the reason for increased racism, discrimination and violence then look for the increase in the sense of powerlessness that has been caused by a government that has ignored the people. It is committed to the powerful at the expense of the powerless.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I have listened very closely to my colleague's statements and feel very close to this subject.

I would like him to look back on some of the more serious incidents of racial problems we have had in this country. There has been the internment of the Japanese, which I am close to since my wife was interned, the Chinese who had been singled out in Vancouver for such things as a head tax, and long periods where they were refused immigration. Look at that in terms of the economic situation in the country and how people who were feeling economically disadvantaged looked to other people to find scapegoats for their own economic disadvantage.

Could the hon. member draw some insights into why people who are often poor and disadvantaged themselves look for easy scapegoats rather than looking to the system, the powerful and the people who are the real oppressors? Why do they always look to somebody else who is more defenceless than they themselves are? I think that is one of the dynamics that happens. Why do these people not insist that a government like this bring in equitable economic programs, programs that will guarantee employment, housing and all of these things, rather than simply make scapegoats of those who are less powerful than themselves?

Mr. McCurdy: I thank my colleague for that question. This is what I was saying in terms of the importance of a sense of powerlessness and vulnerability in producing scapegoats.

We all want to be able, in some measure or to some degree, to control our environment. We want to be able to work and have decent housing. When we see that that is not available or that is threatened, we have two choices. We can try to convince governments, agencies or institutions in the community, impersonal all of them, to respond to our need. If there is no response or perception that there ever can be a response, then one looks around for some means by which they can, however distorted the point of view, bring about change.

If there is a lack of housing or jobs and looking around one sees a black person, a Sikh or a francophone has a job, and he or she has not, well, since government will not respond, let us go and attack those people who have the jobs we think we should have. Never mind that they may be more qualified because there is another element in all of this. There is a message in being included in the group. It is very important for everyone to be included in the group. It becomes even more important to be included in the group when one is in the situation of feeling so vulnerable. Of course, it is nice to be in the majority. It is nice to claim identification with the more powerful because, always, a majority is more powerful than a minority. This feeds upon itself. If you are hurting, you will look for a scapegoat.

Marc Lepine looked around for a scapegoat under the same reasoning that women were depriving him of the opportunity for jobs in technology. We know the awful, brutal outcome of that perception of reality.

It is extremely important that governments at all levels have an awareness of the implications in what they do. In this country we had a sense that Canada represented a nation in which all of us were part of the community. So many measures were involved in this. Some of them I omitted in my speech. VIA Rail, for example, was something that tied the country together, something that meant a great deal to an awful lot of people. It was the tie that bound. Yet, it was smashed. The people had no influence. They could not change it.

We have a GST. Approximately 75 per cent of Canadians oppose it. It is no wonder that people feel frustrated, that things are out of control and look around for some means of expressing this.

In the case of Sault Ste. Marie there were decisions to be made with respect to costs that were passed down to the municipality. Collectively, the French-speaking minority of Sault Ste. Marie was attacked.

This entire package of actions by the government has in so many ways changed Canada and threatened ordinary people. These actions are a basis on which our commitment to equality in this country is called out of question because people look around for someone to blame and respond to as an easy target.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. When the House resumes the hon. Minister of State will be heard.

On a point of order, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, since there is only two minutes before adjournment time, I would suggest that we call the adjournment now. I have a feeling that the minister's speech will be an important one and it should not be interrupted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 1.11 o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1.11 p.m. the House took recess.

NELSON MANDELA

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, Nelson Mandela is a free man at last. Although only for a modicum of 48 hours after 27 years of political imprisonment, the impact of his freedom on the people of South Africa and indeed on Canadians and the whole world has been profound. His freedom has evoked indescribable joy world-wide.

He has come to symbolize indomitable courage and unwavering moral conviction in the face of enormous political adversity and state imposed racial discrimination, also known as apartheid. He never ceases to inspire the hearts and minds of all freedom loving peoples to his ideals.

It was with the same ideals and courage that he first greeted his people and the world just after his release: "I greet you all in the name of peace, democracy and freedom for all". No doubt he will facilitate their attainment in his country for his people.

We in Canada must remain vigilant and supportive to ensure that Mr. Mandela's freedom and his struggle for his people shall not be a fleeting moment in history and that what we have seen in South Africa is the real beginning of the triumph of human dignity and the end to racial bigotry.

OPEN SKIES CONFERENCE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, 1989 was marked by spectacular events and spontaneous national movements that brought about a revolution in Eastern Europe.

A new era of liberalization, unification and openness is unfolding.

As part of this historic process, Canada is now hosting the first international "open skies" conference, attended by foreign affairs ministers of 23 NATO and Warsaw Pact countries, the purpose being to negotiate a treaty authorizing both blocks to conduct unarmed surveillance flights over each other's territory.

Other aspects of European security including the use of conventional weapons are being discussed. It was even suggested that the "open skies" concept be expanded to include surveillance of oceans and space.

This is the first major East–West meeting in the 1990s, which will help set the tone for the new decade and new East–West relations on security matters.

Mr. Speaker, once again Canada plays a leading role in ending the cold war, once and for all, and promoting more peaceful relations between countries throughout the world.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, today the Innu nation announced that if the Government of Canada does not halt its low level destruction of their homeland in eastern Quebec in Canada, they will ask the Federal Court to stop the flights, as in the Rafferty dam case.

The government is destroying the Innu land and their hunting. It is claiming that no one lives there permanently. That is a lie. The Innu have lived there for 9,000 years, much more permanently than recent European visitors.

The government claims its environmental impact study proves no serious damage. That is a lie. Two groups of international experts have condemned the government's study as a worthless cover-up.

The government says it does this training to protect us and western Europe from Russian invasion. That is a lie. No one believes the Russians will or can invade us. Therefore, Poland, Germany and other European countries are reducing their low-level flight training. However, this government expects $2 billion worth of economic benefits to Canada from low-level flying.

I call on the people of Canada to demand that this government stop this shameful and greedy destruction of the Innu nation.

TOURISM INDUSTRY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, tourism is an $800 million industry and growing in Nova Scotia. The industry wants support from government by way of marketing and other assistance. Most important, the industry wants a government that listens. This government listens.

Earlier this year the minister of tourism announced welcome federal support for Sea Sell '90, Nova Scotia's national award winning tourist promotion.

I wish to share with the House a letter I received this week from one of South Shore's major tourist operators referring to the minister's decision. He writes:

> The decision is important for two reasons. It supports the efforts of the private sector who are committed to the success of this project. And, as important, the decision reflects that government is listening.

I commend the minister for his prompt, considerate action. I know our tourist industry can count on his energetic and committed leadership and this government's full support for our tourist industry.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the tourist industry is twice as important to P.E.I. than it is to any other province. It represents 10.5 per cent of our gross provincial product. Nova Scotia is second at 5 per cent.

In addition, tourism is the largest employer in P.E.I. The GST will, according to the Canadian Tourist Research Institute, harm P.E.I. more than any other province. For example, if an American comes to Canada, as an individual he or she can apply for a rebate of GST paid in Canada. This in itself will be a nuisance factor and a deterrent to the industry. But if the same person comes to Canada on a package bus tour, he or she must pay the GST to the tour operator who forwards it to the government. However, neither the tourist nor the tour operator can apply for a rebate.

Jim Larkin, executive director of the Tourism Industry Association in P.E.I. says the GST will hurt in many ways but will be especially damaging for American bus tours. The tax will make destinations to P.E.I. in Canada too expensive for Americans. These groups will look elsewhere in the U.S.

In 1989, 1,062 buses brought 41,213 American tourists to P.E.I. They contributed almost $5.5 million to the Island economy. When reductions like this are added to the reduced rail service, reduced Tourist Canada promotions and a high Canadian dollar, one can see that a major Canadian industry will be in difficulty and another major source of income to the people of P.E.I. will be jeopardized.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Brampton—Malton): Mr. Speaker, faster than a speeding bullet, able to fly at twice the speed of sound: "Look, it's a bird, it's a plane"—no, it is the Concorde and it's flying into Pearson International Airport this summer at an ear-splitting velocity.

The arrival of the Concorde proves that Pearson is an airport of international proportions. However, we cannot overlook the fact that the airport lies beside residential communities which are affected by airport activity. This must be considered every time a change is made at the airport.

When the Concorde begins to fly into Pearson let us ensure that this is done under strict guidelines relating to curfews and noise levels. Otherwise, we may have to follow the example of other North American airports and ban the Concorde from flying into Pearson altogether.

As in all things at Pearson International, this situation calls for compromise and the assurance from our government that a balance is maintained between the demands of the airport and those of the residents of Brampton—Malton.

OPEN SKIES CONFERENCE

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in this House the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Yukon revealed that they are still captive of the outdated imagery, the outdated rhetoric and the petty partisanship of years past.

Canadians are hosting a landmark conference on building confidence between NATO countries and Warsaw pact countries. No less than 23 nations are here in Ottawa seeking to reduce international tensions, all within shouting distance of the two opposition parties. Canada is taking an aggressive leading role in building peace. The opposition parties are taking narrow partisan cheap shots from the sidelines. Perhaps that is where they belong, there on the sidelines. Shame on them. This government is working for open skies, what the opposition needs is open eyes.

RIDING OF CHAMBLY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, last night the people of Chambly in a historic vote chose Phil Edmonston as the first New Democrat elected in Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nystrom: With 67 per cent of the vote, Phil Edmonston crushed the Conservative candidate, who got only 9 per cent. The message is clear. It is a statement against this government's Conservative policies. The message is clear. Chambly voted against the GST. Chambly spoke for all of Canada. It was a referendum on the GST and on Conservative policies and 90 per cent of the people said no!

I ask the government, Mr. Speaker, when will it listen to the voters of Chambly? When will it listen to all Canadians? When will it withdraw its GST Bill? When, Mr. Speaker?

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, our neighbours to the south have again taken a slam at the Canadian farmer. The expansion of the export enhancement program by President Bush victimizes farmers in Canada by effectively pushing world grain prices down. The 60 per cent increase in the program further proves that the Canada-U.S. trade deal is a farce.

This government continues to remove all protection from Canadian farmers while American protectionist activity continues to increase, in violation of this agreement, and to the detriment of our Canadian producers.

The only give and take in this agreement is the Americans taking and the Canadians giving.

When will this government stand up for Canadian farmers?

WILDLIFE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, at the most recent meeting of Canadian ministers responsible for wildlife, held in Quebec City, the Minister of the Environment presented his provincial counterparts with a new action plan which the Environment Department is carrying out. This plan gives considerable importance to wildlife and its habitat, a subject in which all Canadians are particularly interested. The investigation which was done on this subject clearly shows that wildlife is a significant economic resource and it is interesting to note that 91 per cent of Canadians take part in wildlife-related activities, for which they spent over $5 billion in 1987.

Mr. Speaker, in Abitibi, we firmly support measures to conserve wildlife and its habitat.

TRADE

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw attention to this government's lack of effort in promoting Canadian seafood markets and export markets.

In 1983-1984, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans spent some $4.5 million on marketing. Since then, most of the responsibility for marketing has been transferred to the Department of External Affairs. The result has been that in 1989, $1.9 million was spent on seafood promotion under the program for export development. Not a very good record. Not only has the budget been reduced, the effort has been diffused within the much larger trade development program.

By its own account, the government has caused the current crisis by over-estimating traditional fish stocks. If the industry is going to successfully expand into the under-utilized species, the primary responsibility for market development must be returned to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Only as a result of a focused and a well-financed program within the responsibility of that department most clearly related to fishery will this difficult transition be accomplished.

FORESTRY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, reforestation is an urgent issue in Atlantic Canada, both to protect the forest industry as well as to sustain our wildlife habitat and environment. The challenge is to produce more wood in less time while maintaining our way of life.

Small woodlot owners are urging governments at all levels to participate in long-range programs to guarantee a future industry. As well, major corporations such as J. D. Irving have recently called for expanded research into forest protection with long-term strategies. The industry is encouraged by the 1986 study by the province of Nova Scotia that established the goal of doubling forest production by the year 2025, while ensuring protection for the environment by new methods and good management practices.

This week, the federal Minister of Forestry stated that all sectors must co-operate to ensure the survival of our forests for future generations. The commitment by provincial and federal ministers to sustainable development at a recent national forum in Halifax is important and appreciated by the industry, and gives the problem the focus it deserves.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, yesterday 250 construction workers from across southern Ontario protested in Windsor against the way this government is letting free trade take away their jobs.

Canadian immigration officials are allowing U.S. construction workers into Canada to install equipment in Canadian factories. The Minister for International Trade has already said that free trade was not supposed to permit such hands-on installation, but immigration officials are still permitting it. This has to stop. Canadians are perfectly capable of doing equipment installation work, work which they have done for years. U.S. immigration officials stopped Canadians from doing this kind of work. Why is this government failing to stand up for Canadian construction workers? It is time this government stood up for Canada.

TOURISM

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, today the Tourism Industry Association of Canada, representing an industry which employs hundreds of thousands, in fact almost a million or more Canadians, is meeting in Ottawa. This government has ignored this key industry's warning about the disastrous effects on it of the proposed goods and services tax.

If this government is unwilling to take the word of people in the Canadian tourism industry, perhaps it will listen to what Americans have to say. For example, the National Tourism Association of Lexington, Kentucky, says: "The net effect of the new tax will be a decrease in U.S. travel to Canadian destinations". Circle America Tours of St. Louis, Missouri, in a letter to the Prime Minister, says that the GST "will make Canadian tours non-competitive with tours to American and other destinations".

In other words, the Americans are telling us that if the government persists with its new goods and services tax, they will not come here as tourists. How can the government insist on imposing a tax that will seriously damage the Canadian tourism industry which is responsible for more than one million jobs in this country? How can the government persist in such a foolish and senseless measure?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I find it interesting that the hon. member would take the word of Americans before he would take the word of anybody else.

Some hon. members: You listen.

Mr. Hockin: The National Tourism Association did not say that the GST was going to drive tourism away. What they want to have in place is a proper rebate system. There are a number of things we can do to make more flexible and effective this rebate system which we have put in place for tourists from abroad who want to come to Canada. The National Tourism Association is going to work with me in order to help that happen.

In addition to that we have just unveiled today some brand new advertisements for the United States market, based on focus groups and research which is highly potent for increasing our appeal to the American market. These advertisements have been very well received.

We have also decided to spend more wisely. We are not going to waste our money through advertising but we are going to focus it carefully, based on strong research. That, together with a good rebate system, will keep our position strong in the American market.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, no wonder this government is in trouble. It is supposed to be business-oriented and it ignores the requirements and demands of its customers. No wonder it is in such a mess.

The government's rebate scheme is a farce. It requires detailed paper work to be submitted to the Department of National Revenue before anybody gets a nickel back. A tourist has to spend $300 before he can even make a claim, and it will not apply to meals, gasoline, and alcoholic beverages. There can be four claims a year.

This is something that will be especially damaging to border areas where tourists make many short trips, coming over for meals and entertainment. These areas have already been seriously damaged by this government's high dollar policy. The government's goods and services tax will provide another devastating blow.

When will the minister listen to the people in the Canadian tourism industry and withdraw this damaging tax?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, we have consulted the tourism industry in the most intensive way of any government in the last 10 years.

The Leader of the Opposition should know that the rebate system that has been proposed by the Minister of Finance is the most accommodating and the most expansive of any country in the OECD. It will give rebates, for example, on accommodation. That is not done by any European country or any Asian country under the GST or the VAT. It will also give a rebate on goods that are purchased by tourists in Canada. This is a system which is extremely generous, but it must be made to work simply and that is what we are consulting about.

More important, this is not a time to denigrate tourism. This is a time to boost tourism.

The Leader of the Opposition comes from Windsor. It is a border community. That community, and all communities in Canada that depend on tourism want to make sure that we spend smart and that we base our strategies on good research. This we are doing, and we are going to work with the industry to make sure that the rebate works well.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, border communities like Windsor say that the proposed goods and services tax will be disastrous for their tourist, restaurant and hotel industry.

If this minister was truly the voice of the Canadian tourism industry he would not be trying to make excuses and defend this awful tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Minister undoubtedbly knows that many Americans visit Canada every year. He must also know that the Americans revolted against because they refused to pay more taxes, but still, the government keeps on repeating that the new goods and services tax will have no negative impact on the number of American tourists in Canada. How can the Government believe that American tourists will keep on coming in droves just for the fun of paying that new 7 per cent tax? Will the government finally admit that that new tax will have disastrous consequences on the tourist industry which generates $24 billion in revenue. Mr. Speaker, when will the Prime Minister start listening to the people from the tourist industry and give up the idea of a tax that will have disastrous consequences for our country?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is reading a script. He is not listening to the answers.

Ms. Clancy: There aren't any answers.

Mr. Hockin: There will not be tax on American tourists buying accommodation in Canada. They will be able to get a rebate as well for goods they purchase. Read my lips. They will be able to get rebates.

The American market is changing. The tourism industry here in Ottawa today has made it very clear in my meetings with them that we are developing a different American market for Canada. We are developing niche markets, markets that are very different from the previous market which was, essentially, a rubber tire market.

What we have to do with this niche market is have strong research, and have advertising and marketing that fits that research. That is what we are doing.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The North American Association of Tour Organizers warns that the GST favours Canadians travelling outside the country over those who travel in Canada. The tax will make Canada too expensive for foreign visitors and for Canadians.

Canada used to get three out of five visitors to North America. Now it gets one out of five. Does the minister realize that his GST can price Canada out of the market? Is this what he means by making Canada more competitive in the world economy?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would benefit from reading the Conference Board report on tourism prospects. That related to the 9 per cent GST. Now we have a 7 per cent GST and they are revising the report.

The Conference Board said that the rate of growth for tourism, which is growing and has been growing every year for the past five or six years, will not shrink but continue to grow at a slightly slower pace over the next two years and then, guess what. Three years from now the growth will be stronger than it would have been—

An hon. member: Why is it slower?

Mr. Hockin: —if we did not have the GST. The GST, after three years, will be a positive factor for tourism, rather than a negative one.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Tourism. The government claims it recognizes the importance of tourism in Canada. Yet, in the last budget, cuts were made to the ERDA programs for tourism and marketing. Now the GST threatens to cause a major downturn in the tourism industry in Prince Edward Island.

What specific programs will he announce to offset the major burden the GST will place on the tourism industry?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the first fact to realize is that we are not talking about a burden when it comes to the cost of running a tourist establishment.

For example, let us take look at a tourist establishment in Prince Edward Island. I will be there on Thursday consulting with the industry. The GST, which is rebatable, virtually instantly, will lower the cost of running a tourist establishment, be it a restaurant or hotel. It will lower it somewhere between 2 and 4 per cent. So the GST, which is an instant rebatable input credit, will lower the cost of tourism. That is the first point.

The second point deals with the 7 per cent that is being added to the customer's bill when he goes to a hotel or a tourist enterprise in Prince Edward Island or anywhere else in Canada. We are not discriminating against tourism. That tax will be applied against all services and goods in Canada. But there is a bias toward tourism because we are going to have a rebate for foreign visitors. Of all the industries that have had special treatment under the GST, tourism is at the top of the list.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

As we have heard today, tourism contributes some $24 billion to the gross national product of this country and creates some 10 per cent of the workforce. Yet, last March, seven of the 12 tourism agreements between the federal–provincial–territorial governments expired and were not renewed and another five are soon to end, despite the fact that tourism is fundamental to regional development in this country.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister explain to the House and to the thousands of Canadians working in the tourism industry why the government has failed to make tourism a priority?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should understand that the regional development programs in Canada have a tourist component. They are eligible under ACOA, they are eligible under western diversification. They are eligible under FEDNOR in northern Ontario.

I announced just three weeks ago an additional component for tourism under FEDNOR. I find it astonishing that the leader of the NDP could ask any questions at all on behalf of the tourism industry. I will tell you why. This leader wants to make sure there is no longer any deductions for entertainment expenses.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hockin: That would devastate the hospitality industry. It would devastate the tourism industry and we do not believe in that.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister says that tourism can look for funds along with everybody else from ACOA and the Western Diversification Fund. The minister says that tourism funding will be drawn from the budget of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, known as ACOA. In fact, he has offered half the money he has offered in the past. He does not see tourism as a priority.

• (1430)

The minister has said today that the GST will be good for tourism. Well that will be interesting because the Prime Minister received a letter on January 19 from the Tourism Industry Association of Canada, which has suspended its support for the GST because of the potential it sees for more paperwork, price hikes, $1 billion a year in lost revenue and the loss of 25,000 jobs.

Canadian tourists already spend $3 billion more outside of Canada than within Canada. We have a $3 billion tourist trade deficit. Another 7 per cent is going to make it even harder to compete. What is this minister saying to the tourism industry?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the NDP reminds the House that TIAC has withdrawn its support for the GST. I would like to tell the hon. Leader of the NDP that TIAC also, I am sure, would withdraw its support for the NDP suggestion that we have a minimum tax on small businesses, most of which are tourist establishments.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister answers that he said the GST is good for seniors as well.

Last week I asked the Minister of Finance to join me at a meeting with seniors because they are concerned about the GST and the budget. The Minister of Finance rejected my request, yet he should be listening. Once again I ask the Minister of Finance if at last he will agree to meet with these elderly people? He has to hear their concerns.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. member is going to be honest with herself and with this House, she will remember that when she asked the question last week she asked if I would meet with a group of seniors at a meeting in Winnipeg the next day, which was last Tuesday, and I said at that time that that was not possible to do, and she knows that.

Now she is talking about seniors. There is a brochure which I hope she is going to pass out to seniors organizations with which she meets. It contains a list of things that are exempted from the goods and services tax, things that are designed to help senior citizens. They include things like basic groceries, meals on wheels, meals served in nursing homes, dental care, health care, hospital and nursing home care, prescription drugs, eye glasses and hearing aids. No tax will be charged on residential rents, on municipal transit, on passenger ferry service, on legal aid and other financial services.

These are the things that we have exempted from this tax precisely to help senior citizens in the country to cope with the tax.

In addition to that, the GST credit ensures that 75 per cent of seniors will be better off. I see that my hon. friend is finally nodding. I am glad to see that she does agree with what I have to say and I hope that she will tell senior citizens in this country exactly that.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for tourism. In his remarks a while ago he said that they are going to do better research. Can the minister tell me if he can do better research than the studies done by the Tourist Industry Association of Canada?

Second, he said we are consulting them. Well I would ask the minister to stop the consulting and listen to them. The minister is making allegations of all kinds. If tourism is in such good shape, how does he explain that they are going to lose 25,000 jobs in the next two years in this country?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, this gives me the occasion to summarize for the hon. member all the things that this government has been doing for tourism in the past year. I am sure he will want to hear every single one of them.

Let me start with the most important. We have talked about the GST rebate. It is the most expansive and most efficient system of any country with a VAT or a GST.

Second, we are listening to the tourist industry and we have put together the largest trade exposition in the history of Canada for the Pacific Rim. The Pacific Travel Association, for the first time ever, will be coming to North America, not to the United States but to Edmonton and Vancouver. That has been sponsored by Tourism Canada.

Third, we are also just finishing the biggest survey of the American market ever conducted by a Government of Canada. We have made over 9,000 contacts in order to identify these new niche markets in the American market.

We are also doing a price-value study of the American market to find out what their perception is of the value of their travels to Canada.

Finally, and most important, we are working with the industry to make sure that we do not waste our money but spend it smarter than our competition.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister did not explain the loss of one job let alone 25,000.

[Translation]

Canada's tourist industry is deeply worried about the current situation in this country, and we have heard that it is experiencing its most severe crisis in 25 years. Is that clear? The worst crisis in 25 years! In the midst of such a crisis, how can the minister reduce the Canadian tourism marketing budget by almost half?

An hon. member: Shame.

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I can only respond to the hon. member the same way as the Conference Board did. The Conference Board indicates that after three years the tourism industry in Canada will be stronger and more jobs will be produced than if we did not have the GST.

Second, the tourist operators in this country today made a very eloquent plea to make sure that the spending for marketing in Canada is not separate all the time, with the provinces going one way, the federal government another, the hotels, restaurants and tourist operators another, but that we get together and co-ordinate and co-operate. This we are doing.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Once again an outstanding Canadian is being denied entry in the United States under the provisions of the McCarren-Walters legislation which has been in force in that country since the onset of the cold war. And, as we know, for every blacklisted outstanding Canadian, there are quite a few ordinary Canadians.

In answer to my question last week the minister undertook to make representations to the Americans about this matter. I want to know what he has done since he made that commitment. If he has no significant results, would he be prepared to launch an advertising campaign to warn Canadians, particularly seniors, about the risk involved if they go to the United States and the measures they can take to clear their reputation in the eyes of the Americans?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there are millions of Canadians who travel to the United States every year and they do not experience any risks in doing so.

With respect to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he is presiding over a very important conference that is being held in Ottawa, Canada, today with great success and distinction.

With reference to the case of Mr. Hunter, to which I think the hon. gentleman is referring, we are now advised by the U.S. Embassy that his case is being reviewed by the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service in Buffalo and it has determined that he is free to enter the U.S. without applying for a waiver.

With respect to American legislation, that, of course, is a matter of domestic business of the United States. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is bringing to the attention of the Americans our views on the matter and our hope is that they will proceed quickly with the implementation of amendments which have been proposed so that their legislation will be less onerous and more fair.

BLACK LISTING

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. This is not a time for wishful thinking on this particular issue.

In 1981, the U.S. Government agreed to destroy its lists of the names of possible Canadian security risks, which lists had been supplied by the RCMP years earlier. But the record shows that hundreds of law-abiding Canadian citizens on those lists are still labelled as subversive by the Americans.

Just what is the Solicitor General and this government doing now other than wishful thinking to rectify this injustice and require the U.S. to clean up its records in compliance with the 1981 agreement?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, so far as I know the United States is a sovereign country and has to determine itself what its legislation, rules and regulations will be.

We can pass on to the United States our views with reference to U.S. legislation or regulations that might affect our citizens, and we are doing so. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is encouraging the American government to have a generous interpretation of recent amendments so that Canadians would no longer be inadmissible on ideological grounds and so that any Canadians who appear on "look out lists" for inadmissibility on those grounds will be purged.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs is doing all that this government or any other government, other than the U.S. government, can do. It is up to the U.S. government to act with respect to its own domestic legislation, and that would be no different if any other party in the House formed a government.

TOURISM

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Tourism. The minister has stated in the House, both today and previously, that the GST is going to lower the cost of operating a tourist establishment by 3 per cent to 4 per cent. The tourist industry representatives I have spoken to, of whom there have been quite a few, frankly do not know what the minister is talking about and they do not agree with his basic position on that.

Would the minister not agree that what he is talking about is capital expenditures only and does not involve the service component which is a major cost in the industry?

Second, does he not recognize that his statement is at least misleading and contrary to findings that the GST will cost tourism $1 billion a year and 25,000 jobs?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, we can continue to cast assertions across the aisle, but I have to tell the hon. member that a very in depth study has been done by the Conference Board. It has taken a look at the very parameters that the hon. member is interested in, which is the growth of the industry.

This is the fastest growing industry in Canada with 3.7 per cent average growth in the past five years. We want to see that continue.

The hon. member would like to work with the industry to make sure this happens. So do I. One thing they do want is lower cost of operation. The reason that the GST allows a lower cost of operation for almost every tourist establishment is that the establishments immediately get back, within three weeks after they remit any of their sales tax, the money from the government, even before they have a customer walk through the door. That means they have more cash flow and lower costs of operation.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the minister has based his entire argument on the Conference Board report. I just want to point out that it is based on two false assumptions; one, that there will be no wage response to any inflationary impact on the GST and, two, that the MST will be completely removed before the GST is applied.

We have been dealing with international tourism, but what about our own Canadian tourists? Does the minister not recognize that 83 per cent of our tourists are Canadians travelling at home who cannot apply for the rebates? Does the minister not understand that the GST will discourage travel at home, that the GST will encourage Canadians to travel abroad and, last, that the GST will add to Canada's record tourism deficit which already tops $3 billion a year?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend now criticizes the Conference Board report. Two months ago he and his colleague quoted the Conference Board report when they criticized the tax when it was at 9 per cent.

More fundamentally, Mr. Speaker, let us take a look at an objective study that compares American tourism with Canadian tourism. The Runzheimer Index does this study of middle-level prices for hotels, accommodations, restaurant meals and air travel within the United States and compares them to Canada. Guess what. Canada is more competitive in all three dimensions than the United States.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, but I do not want to be negative like our colleagues opposite here.

It has been noted that the goods and services tax will have a major impact upon the tourism industry. We all know that the provinces currently apply sales taxes on the industry. A good example is the 5 per cent hotel room sales tax imposed by the Government of Alberta. Can the minister tell the House, first, what other specific measures have been made in the design of the GST to safeguard those hundreds of thousands of jobs across this nation. Second, what is the impact of those provincial sales taxes on the tourism industry?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the House must be grateful that we finally have a sensible question on tourism.

The situation is that the provinces do apply sales taxes on hotel accommodation. The states in the United States apply tax on hotel accommodation. In fact, in New York City there is a city tax, a convention tax and a state tax.

We in Canada are not only setting the tax at a very low rate, but we are going to rebate it, as I have said many times in the House today, to foreign tourists. More important, the GST exemption is not only on visitors' accommodation. It will also be on exported goods that they purchase and air travel into the country.

When one compares any other country with a GST or a VAT with Canada, one sees that ours is the most expansive and the most efficient rebate system in the world. That is our way of operating. We are not going to use the approach some provinces do, such as Ontario, which is to give a rebate but to make it so difficult to get that nobody applies for it.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, in response to a question, he stated that there was a clear misinterpretation by the market of a very limited edited version of what the Prime Minister said when the Prime Minister was referring, allegedly, to the fact that interest rates would drop after the budget was brought down on February 20.

I want to provide the opportunity to the minister today to explain exactly what the Prime Minister said. Did he say that the interest rates would go up or did he say they would go down?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what I said yesterday was that the market responded to a one-sentence report that came out of the Prime Minister's interview some time before the full transcript was made available. When one looks at that one sentence and compares it to the transcript made available at a later time, one sees that the context and the meaning of the sentence were quite different. That was the point I was making in response to the question yesterday.

As far as the question of my colleague on what the policy of this government is, we have made it very clear. We are determined to get inflation out of the system. We feel it is very important that we avoid the problems that we got into in the late 1970s and early 1980s. Until we see some reduction in the inflationary pressures in the economy there will not be a meaningful reduction in interest rates.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I think it is very important, since yesterday the Minister of Finance was adamant in saying we should read what the Prime Minister said.

I will repeat my question for the Minister of Finance. The Prime Minister certainly did make a statement about what is going to happen to interest rates after the Budget is brought down on February 20.

Could the Minister of Finance tell the House today exactly what the Prime Minister said about interest rates in Canada? Will they go up? Or will they go down?

• (1450)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would encourage my colleague to read the full transcript of the Canadian Press report of the interview. Let me comment, if I may, on the article of Jack McArthur in The Toronto Star today. He is referring to the Prime Minister. He said: "Yet his comment was quite cautious, possibly even a bit wise."

I think it is important for my colleague to understand that these things cannot be given one-word answers. I think he does understand that and that is why I am sure he would find it quite useful if he would read the full transcript of the Canadian Press interview.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the illustrious Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, I have a question for my fellow Newfoundlander in exile, the Minister for International Trade.

I have just spent a week on the southwest coast of Newfoundland talking to hundreds of inshore fishermen, hook and line people, from Harbour Breton to Port-aux-Basque. Everywhere the story is the same. These people are not catching enough fish to pay their expenses. Therefore, no net income, no money for groceries, no chance of qualifying for UI or the special response programs.

What is the Minister and the government going to do for those people who do not even have the minimum income requirements to qualify for the established programs?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the honourable gentleman knows that every year, including this year, there has been a program to look after fishermen who are in the unfortunate position that they were not able to catch sufficient fish to qualify for UI. I assume that he is now referring to the winter fishery which is taking place along the south coast.

If the fishery is so bad that fishermen are unable even to qualify for UI, every consideration will be given to a special program.

I might say, in connection with the 3PS fishery off the south coast of Newfoundland, that in 1989 the fishery was improved as compared to the year before. The catches for vessels of less than 100 feet reached 21,916 tonnes, a 25 per cent increase over 1988. That was last year in 1989, so that was a bit of good news. I hope the trend continues and that the fishermen in the hon. gentleman's district will find that they have a better season as time goes on.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the minister may have statistics about 3PS. I talked as recently as Sunday with 300 fishermen who have seven, 10 or 12 tubs of gear. That should, with 5,000 or 6,000 hooks, as he knows, catch 4,000 or 5,000 pounds of fish a day. They are catching a half dozen tom cods and a sculpin on a day. They are not getting enough to pay their expenses.

I am asking the minister, not what he is going to do maybe when the winter fishery is over at the end of March sometime, but what is he going to do now for people who have been fishing for as long as 14 months and have not been able in any way during that 14-month period to get enough income to qualify for a UI stamp or buy groceries?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman understands that we have had the special response program this year and that, if further special response programs are required, they will be provided.

With respect to 1989, I am correcting the figures because some of the hon. gentleman's colleagues gave an unfortunately false, distorted picture of what the fishery had been.

Mr. Simmons: Not I.

Mr. Crosbie: I know the hon. gentleman would never distort anything. That is quite obvious.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Twenty-two technical experts hired by the federal government to review the Canadian military environmental impact statement of low-level flights on the Innu and the environment of Labrador and Quebec have given the study thumbs down describing it as "inadequate by all conceivable standards of assessment" and "some sort of cover-up".

Since holding public hearings on such a document would be contemptuous of these expert findings and confirm a cover-up, will the Minister of the Environment instruct the Department of National Defence to prepare an entirely new environmental impact statement because the present one is not salvageable?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can give the House the assurance that my department is working closely with all government departments, including National Defence, on the environmental assessment process. We have always said, in this House and elsewhere, that the government has made commitments it intends to respect concerning the implementation of environmental assessment studies. The same applies to this particular case.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister acting on behalf of the Government of Canada. Today we have learned that 25 international experts who reviewed the study for the Innu have now also given the study thumbs down. One internationally respected scientist describes it as the worst impact statement he has ever seen.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister show some courage and sincerity about the rights of the Innu and the environment of all Canadians and order an entirely new environmental impact statement?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, with regard to this assessment, this project, the government has undertaken to follow exactly what is required in terms of environmental evaluation. We are aware of those comments. We know that the process is in place and the government will fulfil its obligations completely.

AIRPORT SECURITY

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In 1987, this government brought in a $60-million program to strengthen airport security. Under this program 80,000 workers at Canadian airports were subjected to background checks and fingerprinting. A judgment released yesterday by Madam Justice Barbara Reed, ruled that this program was illegal and must be discontinued.

Exactly what can the minister do and what does the minister plan to do for the protection of the Canadian travelling public?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was advised of Judge Reed's decision this morning. First, I would like to give Canadians the assurance that all this does not affect the security system in our airports which is operating normally. We intend to look at various possible responses to Judge Reed's decision.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Last week the Canadian Council on Social Development fired all of the staff of the Court Challenges Program. This program has and should continue to play an indispensable role in clarifying and defending minority language and equality rights of all Canadians before the courts.

Last week in this House the minister expressed his dismay and disapproval of the firing of the Court Challenges staff.

What action has the minister taken since then to assure the staff that their positions will be reinstated and that the Court Challenges Program has the ongoing commitment of this government?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I did indicate to you that after a very thorough examination of the program and some very good recommendations that were brought forward by the standing committee, my officials and I have been meeting with the Minister of Justice and his officials and we are now advancing with a process seeking further consent of our colleagues.

As far as the specific action to which the member refers, I had indicated that my under-secretary had immediately called the executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development. Unfortunately, a death in his family prevented him from being available for an immediate response, but we would expect to be able to report shortly on what further action has been taken.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Court Challenges Program has been in effect for 11 years. The Minister knew that on March 31, 1990, the program would end unless it was renewed. Could the minister inform the House he has at least raised the issue in cabinet? Does he have the support of members of the federal cabinet? And is he able to meet the pressing needs of language minorities and give those who want to avail themselves of section 15 of the Constitution the assurance that on April 1 of this year, there will still be a Court Challenges Program? Or can we expect the Minister of Finance, who is going to cut everything, to tell us this program will be cut as well?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I have explained that I found the program very beneficial. We have had a chance to examine the program, suggest a number of changes and improve it. We have been able to examine recommendations made by the Standing Committee of the House, and with my colleague, the Minister of Justice, we are making progress in this respect.

I have done my best to give some very positive indications that we are trying to do everything we can to make some progress, but right now, I am waiting for the approval of the government and my caucus colleague.

PRIVILEGE

SMOKING IN GOVERNMENT LOBBY

Mr. Speaker: I have received notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege concerns smoking in the government lobby of this House. I must say, first, that I have never risen on a question of privilege before.

While privilege in the United Kingdom has always been based on common law, it has never been transferable to the colonies except by statute. The right of Parliament to establish its privileges is guaranteed by the Constitution Act, 1867. The most recent time that this was done was in 1985 when Parliament passed the Parliament of Canada Act in 1985.

I raise this question simply because I believe that in this House we are trying to set an example for Canadians, particularly young Canadians, and we are trying to establish a smoke-free environment for future generations of young Canadians. I believe we are falling down in that regard.

I point out that this House passed an amendment to the Non-Smokers Health Act in 1989. That act clearly requires that the House of Commons provide a non-smoking atmosphere for its employees. Because we are the employers of a number of individuals in this House, including clerks, young pages and the personnel of all members of Parliament, I believe that we have a responsibility to ensure that the environment is maintained smoke-free.

The act defines "employer" this way:

> "Employer" means a person who employs one or more persons in employment described in subsection 123(1) of the Canada Labour Code—

Under the definition of employer it states:

> (c) the Senate, House of Commons or Library of Parliament, in relation to employees thereof or employees of a committee of the Senate or House of Commons, as the case may be, or
> (d) a member of the Senate or House of Commons, in relation to employees on the staff of the member, including persons employed in the office of a Minister, or in relation to employees on the staff of a political party housed in accommodation provided by the Senate or House of Commons who are under the direction and control of the member;

In terms of our precincts—and I believe that I am absolutely correct in this regard—I wish to quote from Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, page 31, Citation 93(2):

> Control of the accommodation and services in that part of the Parliament Buildings (the Centre and West Blocks, the Confederation Building and other buildings occupied on behalf of the House) and its precincts occupied by the House of Commons is vested in the Speaker on behalf of the House.

I also submit that the work and the performance of members of Parliament are being jeopardized because we are not adhering to that policy. Again I wish to quote from Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 16, which states:

> The distinctive mark of a privilege is its ancillary character. The privileges of Parliament are rights which are "absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers". They are enjoyed by individual Members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its Members; and by each House for the protection of its members and the vindication of its own authority and dignity.

To me, this is a very important matter. I know we are attempting to clean up the environment of this country. I do not think there is any better place to start than right in this House. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that you have set the example since I have been in this House by bringing to the forefront for Canadians the attention that the environment very clearly needs.

I am not doing this for vindictive purposes. I am a non-smoker. However, there are many members in this House who are attempting to give up smoking. It is very difficult for them under these circumstances. There are very many members of Parliament in this House who have respiratory problems, and they have real medical concerns. It is very difficult for them to function in the lobby which is an extension of the office of a member of Parliament.

In the government lobby there are a number of telephones and desks from one end to the other. When members are present on duty in this House, many of their hours are spent in that lobby working on behalf of their constituents. I contend that their ability to work and act on behalf of their constituents is impeded simply because of the environment in that the lobby does not allow some individuals to sit there and work on behalf of their constituents.

I take this matter very seriously. I believe that we too in this House have to set an example for all Canadians. Again I say "young" Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, you are very cognizant of this fact and have brought it to the attention of the House many times. When we members of Parliament get out of hand from time to time, you are always the first one to stand and remind Canadians from coast to coast, the people back home are watching us, that we are clearly under their scrutiny.

I believe that if we are going to honour the traditions of this House, then we have to do it by honouring a bill that was passed in this place by us. I believe that we have to do it in fairness to all members of Parliament. I believe that we owe it to ourselves to make sure, if we are attempting to bring in a bill all Canadians have to live by, that we as members of Parliament are willing to live by it ourselves.

Accordingly, should you find that a prima facie case of privilege does exist, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I just want to share with the House some of the experiences in the other lobby, that is the opposition lobby.

Since the adoption of the law I must say categorically that I have received absolutely the co-operation of all members in our lobby. There has been no smoking in the opposition lobby since the end of December 1989.

I have not seen one member smoking. As a matter of fact, today I had the pleasure to hear the member for Halifax tell me that she has quit smoking because of the interdiction to smoke. I encourage her to continue in that respect.

If the member has a grievance—and I doubt very much that it is one that touches privilege—then I think he should bring it up in his own caucus as a serious matter of discussion for them to decide. What happens in that lobby is their business. If he has a grievance with them, I think he has to take it up with his own Whip or somebody else.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, maybe we could all help each other and contribute to solving this difficult situation by kindly asking the hon. member if he would, for a time, suspend his desire to have you rule on his question of privilege.

In the meantime, I would respectfully ask Your Honour to write again to all members of Parliament, as you do from time to time, to remind them of the new rules that are in place. I am of the opinion that many members are still of the opinion that they can smoke in certain places and not in others.

I would suggest the hon. member suspend his request until Your Honour has had a chance to look into his question of privilege, as is his right. In the meantime the Chair can remind members of exactly what the law means and, if there is an exception, then you, Sir, will let us know. If after that time members do not abide by that reminder, then at that time I would imagine he would be more than anxious to rise again on the same question of privilege. At that time I am sure there will be many other members who would love to get up and participate in the debate that the hon. member may raise.

Of course I am in your hands, Mr. Speaker, with respect to whether or not you find my suggestion acceptable. I am also in the hands of my hon. colleague to know if the suggestion I just put to the Chair is acceptable to him.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I sympathize with all those people on the other side who wish to smoke.

I would say that this is the first time I have ever seen any regulation come in when there has been no opportunity for people in a federal agency—and Parliament is a federal agency—who do smoke to receive any advice or counselling.

I am sure that soon the freight entrances will not even be available for some of the people to smoke in because it will be banned there too. There is absolutely no place on Parliament for a person to smoke.

I do not smoke any more, but I can certainly appreciate the plight of those who do.

I think this is a question of privilege that should be looked at from the point of view of there being nothing provided for people who do smoke.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I know that this is an opposition day and that we do not want to prolong this matter for too long.

I was surprised that my friend raised this question of privilege because I know he is such a clean liver who has never been overexposed to lung problems, I guess, through smoking.

There is a problem here. We all know people should not smoke, but I quite agree with the hon. member for South West Nova. I did not hear all the remarks of the hon. member for Saint-Denis. However, I hope he was saying that the committee which he chairs ought to look into the matter. I think he is chairman of the members' services committee which quite frankly, and with all respect to my great friend, has been the most inactive cobweb committee around here for the last several months. It has not looked after the rights of members.

I quite agree. I think this is a classical situation. I used to be a practising lawyer, as I used to be a sometimes smoker. I never smoked cigarettes; I sometimes took a puff of a cigar.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Having been in both of those areas, Mr. Speaker, as you yourself once used to be a practising lawyer, you and I know that there is an old maxim which applies in this case. I will not say it in Latin because when I use Latin around here people think I am being racist. I like Nova Scotia as Nova Scotia. I do not like it as Nouvelle Ecosse or as New Scotland. But in Latin there is a good old maxim which when translated means that the law is an ass many times when it does not have basic common sense. You can say that in Latin but it sounds better in English.

I can say to you, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness—and I have written to you on this matter before—that I knew this regulation was coming in on January 1, 1990. I do not think a lot of members around here did. Frankly I do not think we appreciated the stupid law that we passed which did not give rights to both smokers and non-smokers so that those who serve us have a place to smoke somewhere in this institution. There should be a place in all other federal buildings under our jurisdiction. The blanket, unilateral approach which has been taken makes all sorts of deceit possible.

In answer to the rhetorical question from the member for South West Nova, even now you get the ridiculous situation exposed to me and experienced by me on Friday of last week when I was smoking in the freight entrance with several other good colleagues and employees of the House. Some commissioner felt duty-bound to send his lower sabaltern in to tell the hon. member and all the other employees that, "Gentlemen, I hate to do this but you are not supposed to be smoking in there. Would you please take a step and go out into the pouring rain and keep puffing out there?"

In answer to my friend, who is relatively new to this place, lobbies used to be the place in the whole institution where members on all sides and/or your own group would sometimes lobby, sit around, converse, socialize, meditate and think about some problems of state. Sometimes if they had the odd hiccup or had some social juice and/or sometimes puffed away, that sometimes helped in the meditation process so that some problems of state would be resolved.

I can tell you this, Mr. Speaker, and I am not trying to be too facetious or too humorous: the atmosphere around this place has changed, and not just because of no smoking. It has changed because of computers and fax machines and the personality of the whole political process now.

But when you add all those things together in the mechanical world and take away some of the companionship that some of us enjoyed in meeting with our fellow members in the lobbies, we do not do that any more. I want to raise as a question of privilege some day the fact that we should have a bell or a flashing light at the entrance way of all doors so that if we are puffing back there we can find out when the bell stops so we can get back here and vote.

Seriously, Mr. Speaker, I really think this matter should be discussed by the members' services committee, not just by the members of Parliament and our staff, but perhaps hopefully by House leaders to show that if the regulation is in stone for all federal employees then something can be done so that there can be some smoking spot. The thing has gone too far. I understand the respiratory situation, health and all that.

But, goodness gracious, there is something else in Latin, caveat emptor, let the buyer beware. Let the smoker beware. With all the advertising through the federal government and everything else, we know smoking is not healthy.

When are we going to get away from big brother always telling us what to do and let individuals start to make up their minds? Let us give an area for those who do want smoking. For those who sometimes do want to partake in a bad habit, let them continue to partake in the bad habit on their own without big brother telling them what to do.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I just want to respond to some of the comments made here today. In particular as an aside at the beginning, if I may, I want to say that it is a wonderful picture the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants paints of this place in times past—no women, lots of men, everyone sitting around drinking and smoking the day away.

However, I would like to say that if my hon. colleague from Saint-Denis and his committee go forward with some recommendations on this matter, we cannot see these recommendations go forward merely for this sacrosanct institution of the Commons. The public servants of Canada who work and live in their environments around us, both here in Ottawa and across the country, would hardly be edified if there were special places for the employees of the House of Commons to smoke in comfort and not such special places for other public servants of Canada to smoke.

Having recently joined the ranks of the converted—and this is the second time I have done this on television, so I hope it works this time—I can say that these stringent laws have made it a little bit easier for those of us who want to quit. We also have to remember that in so far as smoking in the lobbies is concerned what we are doing is infringing on other people's air space, if you will.

I think a separate place where people could go of their own accord—and I think the legal term is volenti non fit injuria—is something that could and perhaps should be done. Certainly it should not just be for the House of Commons. It should be something that is done for the Public Service generally.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I just want to spend a moment or two on this topic which has nothing to do with government legislation, as some of our viewers might feel it does, namely, Bill C-51.

I remind hon. members that the Speaker is obligated to follow the law. The law that was passed was Bill C-204, a private member's bill. Under a private member's bill, members of Parliament had to decide individually as to whether or not he or she would support that bill. There were no government Whips on that legislation. It was every member who decided for himself.

It was the former member for Broadview—Greenwood, Ms. Lynn McDonald, who brought in that legislation. I think viewers should be reminded and we should remind ourselves that it was not government legislation. It was the House of Commons deciding on a vote by each and every individual whether or not Bill C-204, which was a private member's bill, should be passed.

Additionally, what we should now keep in mind is that the Speaker by action of this Parliament is obligated to obey the law and to enforce the law here.

• (1520)

We know my good friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants well. We will not go into his personal views. He can say whatever he wants. He as a legislator as well is obligated to follow the law and expect the officers of this House to follow the law. It is for that reason I do not think the Speaker has any opportunity other than to follow the law set out in Bill C-204.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak very briefly on this matter. I agree with what the minister has just said.

I supported the law. I think the law has done a marvellous job in helping to discourage Canadians from smoking. However, as we pass laws in this place we have more of a responsibility than others who are affected by it to look at some of the impacts that the law is having.

For my part I prefer a smoke-free environment, and I am glad to have one provided for me. I have been trying in my own mind to come to grips with the problems of passionate smokers, committed smokers, people who seem unable—even knowing all they know about the dangers of smoking—to give it up.

I would commend to hon. members to think of committed smokers who are unable to give it up as people suffering from a form of handicap. Being addicted to tobacco is a form of physical handicap, whether or not it is significant that they are the authors of their own misfortune that they became handicapped through decisions that they made themselves.

I do not think their situation is really much different from other people who are handicapped and in a lot of cases may also be responsible for becoming handicapped. They may have driven in a way that led them to becoming blind, paraplegic or something like that. We do not make a moral judgment about handicaps. At a certain point we have a responsibility and the Charter of Canadian Rights and Freedoms requires us to accommodate their problem.

As we begin to see some of the real suffering that people are feeling and the terrible inaccommodation that they are subject to, these people who cannot give up smoking, I commend hon. members to think of their plight and to try to find some other solution than to force them in a cold Canadian winter, as I saw this morning, to have to stand outside to be able to smoke.

I do not agree with smokers. I like sending a positive message and a bit of a kick in the pants to people who insist on smoking, giving them, as my colleague from Halifax noted, a real incentive to try and give it up.

But there is a limit. Now that we in this House are starting to see it among our colleagues and staff, I think we ought to try and think of a way of learning to live with what I hope is a dying handicap, one that 10 years from now will not be among us.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief comment. I hope we will all remember this moment as we pass other laws. It may be one of the few occasions on which all of us sitting in this House have occasion to live with the results of the laws we pass in a very real and personal way, whether it be as smokers or as people seeing our colleagues suffering through the problem of addicts deprived of their drug.

We imposed this requirement well over a year ago on every person who works for the Government of Canada. I doubt anybody in this House at that time considered the effect on those people, smokers or non-smokers, or on their productivity. This debate did not occur in this House until we ourselves were affected by it.

I hope we will remember this moment and with every law we pass think about how we would like to live with the impact of that law.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I listened with considerable interest to the interventions that have been made. I just want all hon. members to know that except when there is a tie, the Speaker cannot vote and of course the Speaker did not vote on the bill which came before us.

Second, I should tell you that not only with the Speaker but with members of the Board of Internal Economy, the hon. member for Saint-Denis and other members of the committee on privileges, there have been considerable concerns discussed as to the applicability of the law and to the extent and whether it should be applied or not, or whether there should be any exceptions by way of special premises in order to allow smoking to take place should be provided.

The hon. member who just spoke made reference to the regulations that now bind the Public Service. Hon. members will know that it would have been a matter of severe criticism if in this place we collectively had decided to make exceptions to the law for ourselves that were not permitted by others who were members of the Public Service and serving our country and in many respects serving us.

The hon. member for Saint-Denis has made a sensible suggestion. I do not intend at the moment to rule whether this is a question of privilege. It may be and it may well not be. It is a matter of obvious concern to members.

But what I do want hon. members to realize is that the administration of this place is in the hands of the Board of Internal Economy which your Speaker chairs. I am bound by the law and so is the board. Further than that, so is every member of this place and everybody who works here. Until some change is made in that law or the application of it, and if there is a change in the application that change must be lawful, we who insist that all Canadians live by the rule of law must also live by the rule of law. The law may be, as the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants said, an ass. Well we passed it.

Mr. Nowlan: I wasn't here.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants puts forward a plea of mitigation. That also is a legal term. I will not put in in Latin.

I will take the matter under advisement. I ask that before I have to return to the Chamber perhaps representatives of both sides of the House might consult with each other as to just how some of the complaints that have been brought forward today might be resolved.

I would prefer that this matter was resolved among members speedily and with a sense of responsibility and self-discipline rather than have more severe measures taken. I thank hon. members for their contributions.

PETITIONS

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that during the question of privilege today in respect of language I cited a letter from a group of letters I had in respect to a constituent. I do not think there has been a formal request for the tabling of that letter, unless it has come to you directly. If it has, I have those letters. I leave it in the hands of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the hon. minister that I heard the offer this morning that the hon. minister was prepared to table it.

Under the rules the hon. minister does not have the authority to table correspondence to which he makes reference. However, the hon. minister can make it available to any member. I take it that that is the word of the minister and hon. members can obtain copies from the minister's office almost forthwith.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—REGIONAL TENSIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McCurdy:

> That this House condemn those policies of the government which, having bred a sense of insecurity, powerlessness and doubt among Canadians, are a cause of the recent increase in regional tensions and incidents of racism and bigotry in Canada.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I cannot begin to express to you and the House my outrage on seeing the thrust of this motion which has the gall to accuse the government of pursuing policies that have contributed to the creation of racism and bigotry in the country. This is the government which had the courage to address an incident in our history which scarred our nation. I refer to the Japanese-Canadian Redress Agreement. This is the government that established the Deschênes commission. This is the government that enacted the world's first multiculturalism act which recognized our rich cultural diversity as a fundamental characteristic of this society. This is the government which is establishing the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship to promote a vision of full equality for every single Canadian, and this is the government which recently introduced Bill C–63, an act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

I am outraged, Mr. Speaker, and so are all those Canadians who are contributing to make this country a better place in which to live. While I do not like the motion, I am certainly pleased to be able to speak to it.

When I saw this motion, two things came to mind. One is the chance to inform Canadians of what this government has done to combat racism and bigotry in this country. The Prime Minister has made it clear that they have no place here. I could stand here for at least an hour or more and recite a list of the positive achievements in this area since 1984, but that would give this motion more credence than it deserves.

For me, this motion has no focus; it has no substance, and it has no sense. These are empty and meaningless words. The hon. Member for Windsor—St. Clair has put everything but the kitchen sink into the motion. There are statements here that must be addressed. Let me say that I welcome this chance to set the record straight today. I welcome this chance because the hon. member who put forth this motion is himself among the many hon. members who just last week sent back to my department a coupon asking for copies of all the materials about eliminating racial discrimination recently published by my department.

These materials are in the process of being distributed to our regional offices, institutions, government officials, leaders in the field of race relations, concerned citizens, individuals of all ages, backgrounds and origins throughout Canada. They know we care about this issue and they know we are doing something about it. Maybe the hon. member who proposed this motion could learn something from their example.

Since 1984, this government has worked to make this country a place where social justice, equality and national unity prevail. The Canadian Multiculturalism Act, which became law on July 21, 1988, responds directly to this essential challenge.

The Canadian Multiculturalism Act states that, in harmony with the recognition of Canada's two official languages, the multiculturalism policy must preserve and enhance Canadians' multicultural heritage and seek to achieve equality for all Canadians in the economic, social, cultural and political areas of Canadian life.

As we know, Mr. Speaker, the Act commits the Government of Canada to an active, energetic multiculturalism policy making our diversity and the challenges and opportunities it presents an integral part of the process of building our country.

[English]

The Canadian Multiculturalism Act takes us a step beyond the establishment of equality rights. It actively promotes equality. It strengthens our sense of the distinctiveness of the Canadian identity. It contributes to our better understanding and acceptance of each other. It commits the Government of Canada to ensuring that all Canadians can participate fully and without discrimination in defining and building Canada's future.

The policy and the ideals of the act unite Canadians because they have great hope and great aspirations for this country. Those are the people who have this great hope in it. They believe that we can have an even better and fairer country. So do I. Canadians are not afraid to meet the challenges of our society today. They do not agree with the negative and destructive picture presented by the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair. They have a different vision of what Canada is and can be.

I am fully aware that we do not yet have a perfect society. In spite of progress there are still danger signals when we take stock of where Canadians are right now in their relationships with each other.

We are all aware of overt incidents of racial intolerance, prejudice and bigotry in our country. We have seen the headlines about the report on the Donald Marshall Inquiry, about a racist pin and the creeping incidence of anti-Semitism, the blatant hatred of the Jim Keegstras and others whose names are less well known.

I am not new to the issues, the concerns, the facts and the statistics and I do have a sense of urgency about what needs to be done. I have felt the stinging barbs of intolerance and ignorance myself, but at the same time I have a sense of optimism and hope that Canadians are at their core decent and caring people who want nothing less than a society of true equality. That is why my department immediately worked to build upon the equality provisions and promises of the Multiculturalism Act, by making race relations and cross-cultural understanding a priority program.

In September 1988 I first announced a framework for national action in the field of race relations, a framework for change and for progress. This national plan defined six fronts for positive action. Many of you are familiar with them already. Let me share them with you again: public education, changing our institutions, helping voluntary organizations, generating more research about racism and racial discrimination and how to fight it, setting an example at the federal level, and getting governments to work together.

Changing public awareness is a major task. There are many activities in this area, but our most significant work in public education is centred around March 21, the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. I know many of you are familiar with this date and with its fundamental objective, namely to raise public awareness of equality issues and to get Canadians on side in the fight against racial discrimination.

[Translation]

For the first time in 1989, we had a large public awareness campaign for March 21, the International Day for the Elimination of Racism and Racial Discrimination. Many activities were held with the support of Multiculturalism and Citizenship Canada, as well as other governments, community groups, human rights groups and various other institutions.

[English]

Approximately 52 municipalities throughout the country participated in our first major March 21 campaign. I am very optimistic about the growing profile of this effort. March 21, 1990, promises to generate even greater public attention and I see it as a most effective way of circulating our message in schools and communities throughout Canada.

We have clearly stated our purpose: Promote appreciation and acceptance of the principles of equality and multiculturalism among Canadians and in federal institutions and develop the will to implement them.

We recognize that, within our social structures, institutions have tremendous power. They can share in the life and work of every one of us.

To overcome racist attitudes, we must make structural and institutional changes.

The department which I head helps Canadian institutions adapt to the cultural diversity of our country. Thus, we encourage institutions to examine their structures and policies to detect obstacles to full equality of rights; these obstacles are not always obvious to those who run these institutions.

[English]

To that end, my department supports institutional change related to education, policing, the media, health and social services, labour and municipalities. Of course we recognize that in many of these areas, provincial and municipal governments are on the front lines. No real change can take place without their active involvement and so we are working closely with them.

I would like to mention a few of the key projects we have recently undertaken in partnership with others. We have been working directly with the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police to promote the development and use of cross-cultural training within police forces. Our efforts in this area, and in encouraging the recruitment of visible minorities, are essential if we are to make authority figures more representative of our multicultural reality.

This past summer a pilot project was established for visible minority youth in Vancouver who are interested in careers in policing. I met with some of these young men and women and I can say with confidence that this project was a great success.

In October I convened a national consultation on policing in a multicultural society. Federal and provincial officials from across Canada met with police chiefs and officials, along with representatives from visible minority communities. Together, we are finalizing a national action plan to strengthen police minority relations.

There is no room for racism in our places of work. Yet, all too often, the doors of our institutions are closed to some because of discriminatory attitudes. In addition to our ongoing efforts in the area, I am working to develop a national anti-racist education program with the Canadian Labour Congress. Together we are developing a three-year plan to provide training and education materials for the thousands of union shop stewards across the country.

It has been said that if Canada is a microcosm of the world, then municipalities are our neighbourhoods. It is certainly true that municipal governments are most in tune with their own local conditions.

[Translation]

That is why my department is working closely with municipal administrations across the country. We support the Federation of Canadian Municipalities through its race relations program. We have helped establish a national action committee on race relations. We have also helped to develop a series of practical guides on race relations.

I believe these publications have already had a positive impact.

We have made a major contribution to the second national seminar of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities on race relations at the municipal level, a seminar held in March 1989.

Another very productive federal-municipal initiative was the founding of the Hasting Institute in Vancouver. This agency will help the city adjust to the changes taking place as a result of the increasing impact of visible minorities, women, native people and the disabled.

[English]

Last year, Toronto City Council declared 1989 as the Year for Racial Harmony in an effort to sensitize the people of Toronto about issues of racial discrimination. My department also provided support for this very worth-while municipal initiative.

We are working directly at the community level, but we are also involved with the gathering of better knowledge and information to help combat racism more effectively. Much has been done to achieve this objective, and much more will be done.

The government announced in the last Speech from the Throne that legislation would be tabled to create a Canadian Race Relations Foundation. That promise has been kept. The legislation is now tabled and we will be moving ahead as soon as possible to create a centre for research and action in this vital area; a centre which will work to help eliminate all forms of racial discrimination.

I have mentioned just some of our government's achievements. While it is clear that we have broken new ground and set new standards in certain areas, it is also clear that there is still much to do and we cannot do it alone. Government leadership is vital. But to achieve real progress, an entire society must be mobilized. A co-ordinated, co-operative approach must be put into place. We see today how the call for reform by people like Lech Walesa and Nelson Mandela has had a profound effect.

This kind of broadly based social action could not have been achieved without a groundswell of support at many levels. Real change is not achieved solely through individual gestures. It is realized through partnership. Here in Canada the federal government has assumed a leadership role in the area of race relations. But the actual effects of our efforts would be limited only to our government offices if we ignored the need for partnership.

"Racism" and "bigotry" are ugly words and their reality is uglier still. They are not things we as Canadians like to accuse one another of. We do not want to think of our society as discriminatory or intolerant. The fact of the matter is, however, that racism and bigotry are part of the fabric of Canadian society and have been for a long time.

In the past, to our shame, we have too easily and too often side-stepped or simply ignored these issues. To our credit, I believe that those days are over. At the same time, however, I believe all of us involved in the elimination of racial discrimination must be very clear about what it is we are trying to achieve. We are not trying to achieve a tolerant society. Tolerance is putting up with something, accepting it, living with it because there is no alternative. We have to move beyond tolerance.

Racism is not going to disappear overnight just because we recognize and comprehend that it is offensive to the dignity of all human beings, but we must expose prejudice for what it is, the act of bigotry, pure and simple, and once so isolated, we can and will eliminate it with every resource available to us.

As I have said in this House on previous occasions, the issues of combating racism, prejudice and bigotry are ones in which I have a deep personal involvement. In my youth, I felt the weight of that oppression and I resolved to fight it. I have done so in my community, in my neighbourhood, and now, here in Parliament. That fight is not over. It will not be over until we have eliminated racism, bigotry, and all forms of racial discrimination in Canada. We must do this task together. We must do it now, because together we are better.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister. I do not want to take anything away from his commitment to fight racism. I also do not want to take anything away from the list of measures he has put forward as achievements on behalf of his government. However, I wonder if he agrees with me, as does the member from Windsor, with the sense that we have that for everything the government says it is doing, things seem to be getting worse on the racism front and one does not have to look very far for examples.

There is a question I want to ask him. I will have an opportunity to speak, and I would like to be pointed about it, because I really think input on this subject could be valuable. More than action, there is a responsibility on people of good will and on governments to react to things when they happen. Something important happened in April 1988 as an example to which the government has failed to react to this day. A reaction by the government would have measurably supported harmony across our country, certainly in the part of Canada where it arose.

I am referring to the efforts that have been made by the Sikh community to get their religious artefacts and obligations recognized and accepted as part of the fabric of Canadian society. I am talking about Canadians here who have a right under the Charter to practise their religion, a right which is protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

They appealed to the RCMP to allow them to wear their turbans on the job and in their dress uniforms. If the answer were no, they would not be able to serve in the RCMP.

Religious obligations have to be tested in the institution against the practical requirements of that institution. The RCMP made that check and they could not come up with a practical reason why Sikh religious observers should not be allowed to wear their turbans. They looked at it and could not find a reason. They could not say safety considerations, environmental considerations. There is no reason why those individuals who profess the Sikh faith should not be entitled to wear a turban in all aspects of the performance of their duties in the RCMP. Commissioner Simmons came forward in April 1988 and said that there was no practical reason why a turban should not be allowed as part of the daily uniform, as part of the dress uniform.

The government has not responded. They have not said, as the Solicitor General is supposed to do: "We will go along with your interpretation of the law. We will make this contribution to understanding and harmony within Canadian society." They have been silent for 1988, silent for 1989, and silent until today, except that a few days ago I heard the Solicitor General saying that he was looking for a compromise. I would like to know what he meant by that.

However, more important, I would like the minister for all of the goodwill and all of the good things that have been done to recognize a substantial failure by this government, by members of the government, by the Don Mazankowskis of the world, to stand up in western Canada where they are respected, and in other parts of the country where they are respected as well, and stick up for a decision such as that which would have done a great deal to promote better harmony and better understanding among Canadians.

Mr. Weiner: Mr. Speaker, the issue is certainly one that I am very familiar with. I have had a very active and ongoing relationship with members of the Sikh community of the Sikh faith, as I do with all cultural communities. I certainly have an understanding of our rich ethnic and cultural diversity, and all the benefits that are accrued to our society.

I have a sense that this type of episode, much as other types of episodes that have been occurring far too frequently across the country which my hon. friend is indicating are bothersome to him as well, are part of an over-all crisis. The crisis is one of national identity.

Mr. McCurdy: Exactly. That is the argument.

Mr. Weiner: There is some difficulty in Canadians understanding what our fundamental characteristic is. There is the linguistic duality of the country, of course; our protection of minority rights and how that harmonizes with our multicultural reality. I have certainly spoken to how that diversity strengthens and unites us.

There is a lot of work that we have to do in helping Canadians understand what we have become. I said that I cannot do it alone. I said that the government is committed, physically and personally, with this very strong cross-government commitment to examine how every one of its departments and institutions can better reflect our diversity. I have been building partnerships with other levels of government. Indeed, I have been reaching out for partnerships in the labour community, in the business and non-voluntary sector, in the health and social services, among others. It is quite obvious that all of our institutions do not reflect to any great degree the rich diversity of our nation, so a lot of work has to be done.

There are a lot of people of goodwill and understanding out there. It is an issue where we have to be generous and bring a lot of understanding. Last Friday I brought forward a committee of very distinguished Canadians who represent the different walks of life to help advise on how the Multiculturalism Act could be better implemented, to provide public accountability in a very open manner to Parliament and to advise me on what we are doing. All those representatives will help within the sectors they come from so that their own sectors can better reflect our diversity and allow us, once and for all, to have full equality and full participation, which is the minimum we can expect for our citizenship.

With regard to any specific incident that takes place, I have developed initiatives to address those concerns in a very proactive manner. The situation that the member has raised is one that I have certainly discussed on numerous occasions with my colleague. I have even heard the minister respond that—maybe he said it in self-reflection—perhaps the delay has not been helpful to what he had hoped would be necessary in his resolving the issue. I did what I had to do to be helpful and now we are looking forward with anticipation to the minister making his decision, which he said he would do some time this month.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am really quite shocked at the distortion that was contained in the argument of the minister with respect to the motion before this House.

I was quite clear, but of course the minister wrote his speech before he listened to the debate, that there was no criticism contained in the motion about those specific measures and the will of the leadership of this country in respect to legislation and any number of acts that are intended to attack discrimination directly.

If the minister does not understand what was contained in the argument this morning then he ought to be ashamed of himself. The classic source on prejudice in Canada, The Vertical Mosaic, pointed out the importance of scapegoating to the question of racism and discrimination.

I should also point out to the minister that this motion has to do with something else besides racism and bigotry. It has to do with regional division. The minister may not agree with me, but he has no excuse to distort my argument. The argument is quite simple. It is the position of the New Democratic Party and of a great many thinking people in this country, and he came close earlier when he made reference to the sense of lack of control that is growing in this country, that this government, by its policies, has attacked the very fabric of a country that has had a sense of community out of which has come that legislation that bans discrimination, that is intended to discourage prejudice.

No amount of legislation in the world will prevent the acting out of racism, if the people acting out their racism have not got a sense that the country belongs to them, that the country cares for them, and that the government cares for the country. If there is a feeling out there that that sense of community is being lost, that there is more generosity to those who are already rich at the expense of the poor, if there is a sense that the regions are suffering at the expense of the more prosperous regions, if there is a sense that government is acting on behalf of some at the expense of others, if those who are vulnerable are threatened with lack of housing, lack of employment, by God, my God, Mr. Minister, you bloody well ought to know by now, if you know anything about the issue, that scapegoating will result. That's the argument that we should debate.

Mr. Speaker: Questions and comments are now terminated.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex—Agriculture; the hon. member for Essex—Windsor—Fisheries; and the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina—National Defence.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us today focuses on the same issue in a way that I raised on behalf of my party in a resolution on February 2. It calls on the House to condemn those policies of the government which have bred a sense of insecurity, powerlessness and doubt among Canadians, are a cause of the recent increase in regional tensions and incidents of racism and bigotry in Canada.

In the resolution I put forward a little over a week ago, I laid a responsibility on all Canadians and on Parliament to take stronger measures to combat racism. This resolution focuses particularly on the responsibility of the government and that is exactly what I would like to do in the course of the opportunity I have to make some remarks today.

We are fortunate, in looking at the problem of racism, in that Canada is not a racist society. We have racism here, but we also have a great well of decency across Canada and we have the willingness which we have expressed time after time after time as a nation to combat racism when we see it. We have passed laws. We have established commissions. We have set up the Court Challenges Program, which I hope will continue to be funded, although the government has not indicated that it will. We have people in the field, we have resources from the private sector, all devoted to trying to eliminate racism from Canadian society.

The main way in which racism can be eliminated in Canadian society, and the sense of it that I want to bring to government responsibility, is the responsibility to exercise moral suasion as individuals, as decent people in the society, and for the government, on its behalf, to try to fight racism and counter it when we see it.

My contention is that for all the lists of achievements of the government, for all the programs and so on, they are not providing the kind of moral leadership that would make a difference in Canada today if they would provide it. It can sometimes be expressed in terms of race or nationality. Sexism, it seems to me, is often an expression of that same phenomena of hatred, fear, anger and contempt.

In the sense in which I have just defined it, what has been happening more and more in Canada is a small group of racists, whether it relates to language, sex, race, or whatever, has seemed to develop an evil genius, a kind of a génie du mal, de la destruction which leads them to develop the capacity to animate a large group of Canadians who do not have that characteristic and who are not racist in the sense that I just defined but who are disgruntled. There is a lot of disgruntlement in Canada now. There is a great disappointment in this government and I do not say this to members opposite in a partisan sense. It is a simple fact drawn from statistics and reactions to the programs and policies of the government. There are disgruntled people out there. There has been disgruntlement expressed with provincial policies in some parts of the country. All of that together provides a pool that the evil genius of racism has been able to animate and mobilize to lead to attitudes that are very destructive to the essential fabric of Canada.

Our country is more vulnerable to that type of attack than other countries because we are not the monolithic expression of one culture or one language. We are a mosaic, a patchwork, a quilt, to use Jesse Jackson's expression from the United States, of a lot of different groups. Cement to keep those groups together is a vital necessity in our national life. As groups that are motivated by racisms of one kind and another attack the fabric, we need to respond and react.

As I said a moment ago, when I was talking to the minister, it is not only actions. The minister piled up a large list of impressive things that the government has done to combat racism. The main thing that needs to be done is to stay in touch and in tune with that fabric and movements that are going backward and forward which are threatening it in one way or another and to respond to them. It is urgent in this fabric of Canada that there be that kind of response whenever it is needed. Leadership needs to be provided.

I will digress for a moment to make the point that the government does know what leadership is. The government has shown leadership. It has shown it in the economic area. No one can say that it does not have an agenda, that it is not serving certain interests, that it does not have certain goals. I do not agree with it. My party does not agree with it. I do not think most Canadians agree with it. But the government knows what it is doing over there. It knows who it is working for and what it is trying to achieve. The government does not do it just by bringing in legislation. There are speeches, the government has programs, and it is back and forth across the country talking up economic policies which it has. But when it comes to the area of moral or social leadership, that is where the leadership that we see them capable of giving in some other areas is not given. To that extent, although I am showing some differences with my colleague from the New Democratic Party about the way I see the problem, the leadership that could be provided to help keep the fabric of Canada strong is simply not being provided.

I want to make my point by talking about the language issue. The language issue is a tough, tough issue for Canada. What is often not mentioned in debate is that our country was founded because we were able to make an agreement that accommodated French and it would not have been founded without it. We made a commitment to the survival of French in Canadian society. It is right there in the British North American Act of 1867.

Some people say, "Well, we made a deal in 1867. We will stick to that deal, but don't ask for more". That is not good enough. I think most Canadians know that, because unless there is more and we have richer programs and responses to the French fact in Canada, it will not survive. The commitment that we made in 1867 was to the survival of French and in one way and another the official languages policy——is a reflection of our commitment to accommodate and ensure the survival of the French fact in Canada, not just in Quebec but in Canada. And I think that is what should be the basis of our response.

[English]

I sometimes listen to the phone-in shows on the radio. You hear people saying "Well, there are more Italians in our town". Or "There are more Germans in our town than French. What are we talking about the survival of French for?" I would like to hear people reply more forthrightly that Canada exists because of the commitment we have made to French.

This is not to say that Italian is not an important and interesting language. I speak it, I enjoy it. It is a very big part of the cultural life of my city. But it is not in the same category of national commitment as our commitment to two official languages. I wish that was realized more across the country when people look at the methods that have been devised with great consensus in this House to support bilingualism across our country.

A few Ontario municipalities, too many of them, have gone unilingual, to coin a phrase. This is very disturbing because it sends a bad signal. It shows you the kind of evil genius that is behind it, although I am certainly not critical of everyone who supported it. I think a lot of them were in the category of groups animated by a cause that gave them an opportunity to express their disgruntlement. At the heart of it is something very evil.

This APEC, the Association for the Preservation of English in Canada is meant to give a kick in the head to the concept that the survival of French is a valid concern. The people who thought that up are saying, "You want French to survive. Well, we want English to survive and here is our association to do it". There is a very big difference between these two causes. One makes absolutely no sense. There is no basis on which one can argue that the survival of English is in doubt in Sault Ste. Marie, Thunder Bay or in any municipality in Canada or anywhere in Canada. English is a language which is surviving and thriving.

When you look at the issue of French survival I think it is a different story. A small island of six million on a continent which is vastly anglophone, little communities across the rest of Canada outside Quebec where in their daily life French speakers cannot operate in French only.

This is a real problem. When APEC comes along with that wonderful name, Association for the Preservation of English in Canada, it is the most terrible insult to concerned francophones who legitimately want to see their language preserved. We are talking about something valid compared to this idea that the survival of English is somehow threatened by any of the bilingual policies that one has in place in Canada or that you could think of. To me, it shows the nature of the source of that movement across Ontario.

I think we should fight it. You hear some saying that they are doing it because of what is happening in the province of Quebec and they are coming to the aid of the poor anglophones in Quebec who have had their rights limited by Bill 178.

[Translation]

I have already condemned Bill 178. The use of the notwithstanding clause was something to be deplored. I think we had to make this eminently clear, and we did so. Perhaps we should look at what Quebec Anglophones have to say.

[English]

I have a letter which was sent out. It is addressed to the citizens of Sault Ste. Marie and sent by Alliance Quebec. Do you think that Alliance Quebec is saying "Thank goodness you are finally giving those francophones in Ontario terrible treatment". That is not what they are saying in this letter. They are saying the opposite. The Alliance Quebec people, who speak English themselves, want the Association for the Preservation of English in Canada to stop.

• (1610)

I would like to table this letter. First, I would like to read a part of it:

> I urge you, as citizens, to put pressure on your elected officials to reverse their decision. In doing so, you would be honouring the past of your community, which as its name implies, is built on the site of an old French trading post. Sault Ste. Marie is a reminder of the pioneering spirit of our French and English forebearers who built this country together.
> At a time where relations between English- and French-speaking Canadians are strained, you have an opportunity to make a gesture towards greater harmony. I hope you do not let this opportunity pass. Ask your City Council to reconsider this matter now.

That is how the anglophones in Quebec, who have suffered to the extent that they have—

—with Bill 178. This is in reaction to those who seem to help by denying, at least symbolically, the rights of francophones outside Quebec.

[English]

This is a wonderful kind of Canadian gesture by Alliance Quebec. It is signed by Robert J. Keaton, President. I would like to commend them for doing that.

I want also to deplore the developments of last week in the House of Commons on this very subject. My former leader, the Right Hon. John Turner, on his last day as the Leader of the Opposition, brought forward a simple, straightforward resolution which I have here and which I would like to read.

I would have thought in the light of Sault Ste. Marie, and in the light of Alliance Quebec, with the Thunder Bay vote coming on and with the need, as I mentioned, for cement for national unity within the Canadian mosaic to be provided in a reactive way when it is needed, and not just when it is time for the Speech from the Throne.

The leader brought forward this motion:

> That this House reaffirm its commitment to support, protect and promote linguistic duality in Canada.

Now there was a resolution that should have whistled through at two o'clock. I spoke to the mayor of Thunder Bay, Jack Masters. He told me, and maybe we need to be told this in the House of Commons, that it would have made a difference across our country if the House of Commons had passed a resolution on that subject. People care what we think in this place. They are affected by the kinds of ideas, exchanges, the things we come to terms with here and the resolution that we make of them as members of Parliament.

That simple resolution did not get through because the Prime Minister of Canada chose to play politics with it a few days before the by-election in Chambly. I would be happy to discuss this further. I see members opposite thinking I am being unfair. I am not. Instead of adding to the resolution in a way which would have reinforced it, the Prime Minister of Canada added some baggage to it, acceptable to many members of Parliament, including myself, but as he well knew, not acceptable to many others.

I talked earlier about another example where the government should have come forward. I had a chance just a moment ago to ask the minister about it. I am referring to the Sikh turban in the RCMP issue. I do not want to repeat what I said a few moments ago, but I cannot help but reflect on the quality of the hand-ringing answer that I just got from the Secretary of State on why it is that when the Commissioner of the RCMP made the statement, which was really a legal declaration in April of 1988, that there was no basis in law for denying the religious expression to the Sikh community.

There were many ways it could have been looked at. Many arguments could have been made. Do you need a turban for safety reasons, or the helmet, or whatever? He went through all that because our Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not give a person the right to express every right when it is not reasonable in a free and democratic society.

So the commissioner was looking at what are the reasons that we can say; "You cannot wear your turban". He could not come up with a reason. So he said; "Okay, you can wear them". But then it fell to the Solicitor General to give a simple order and I have had the honour of having that office. If he had given the order at that time, "I approve of the use of turbans by religious Sikhs in the RCMP", I think the atmosphere in western Canada would have been very different. I do not think the button campaign would have been launched if people like the minister from Winnipeg, the minister from Calgary, ministers from Edmonton, members from every community, had stood up and said that there is no way we can or should stop the Sikhs from wearing their turbans in the RCMP. If that type of animation, leadership, and moral suasion had been exercised, Canada would be stronger today. That is why I agree with this resolution and that is why I join in condemning the government for its policies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before questions and comments, the hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

BROADCAST OF MEETING OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt at this point but I think it is a good time, rather than going halfway through question period or another speech.

There have been discussions among House leaders and I believe that you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

That this House authorize the broadcasting, by the electronic media, of the meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade, Thursday, February 15, 1990, at 10 a.m.;

That such broadcasting be at the discretion of the chairman of the committee and under the following conditions:

a) That the camera positions be fixed;

b) That the cameras not be permitted to enter or leave the room except during suitable breaks in the meeting;

c) That existing room lighting be used;

d) That the existing audio system be used;

e) That the appropriate pooling agreements be arranged;

f) That the format and coverage used for the House of Commons broadcast be adhered to;

g) That the decorum of the meeting be preserved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I just want to confirm with my hon. friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader, that we have had consultations. We have had extensive consultations, but this is a very historic moment and, for that reason, we believe that this special privilege of televising it so that the people of Canada can also see all or parts of it is more than appropriate. But again, we look forward to an expansion of the television coverage of the House of Commons as per the report and, hopefully, the government will bring that in soon. On this particular initiative, we give our enthusiastic support.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, we concur and on behalf of our party agree with the motion as proposed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—REGIONAL TENSIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McCurdy:

> That this House condemn those policies of the government which, having bred a sense of insecurity, powerlessness and doubt among Canadians, are a cause of the recent increase in regional tensions and incidents of racism and bigotry in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments? The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend brought up the issue of Sikhs in the RCMP wearing turbans. I would like to pose a question to him because a lot of people in Alberta are struggling with this very concept.

One hears a number of arguments. Some of the arguments are that it is heritage, custom and so on. I do not agree with that personally. Another which is also put forward is that the reason police officers wear uniforms is to distinguish them and in no way should uniforms show or point out a religious position of the individual wearing the uniform. There would be situations where an officer of the law could be arresting an individual of a different faith and there could be real animosity on religious grounds between the individuals. If a change in dress of any officer points to the fact that he follows a certain faith, whether it be Sikh or Muslim or whatever, this could cause problems for the officer and also problems for the individual.

If the police officers in Ireland were identified by religious differences that could cause a lot more turmoil than really exists. I would ask my hon. friend, through the Speaker, if he would consider this a valid argument.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I do not consider it a valid argument, although I know a lot of people feel that way. To me there is enough uniformity left with the rest of the dress when the headgear is changed. A person with the uniform would be clearly identified as a Mountie. The Mounties have very high standards. They do not pick just anybody to join their force. I believe that the public would know when approached by a turbaned Sikh wearing a Mountie uniform that they were dealing with an individual who met the high standards of the RCMP and not someone who was inclined to be prejudiced in any way.

I make a counter-argument to the member. That argument could be used for arguing that blacks or Indians should not be allowed to be in the RCMP. Although their distinctiveness is not expressed by clothing, it is expressed by characteristics and colour of their skin. All of the arguments you made about what kind of prejudice might be assumed could be tied to the colour of their skin as well. So, let us not have it one way and let us not have it the other way. The Mounties have high standards. They are not going to hire people who do not share their high standards. I think the public will accept a member of the RCMP with black skin, with Indian racial characteristics, or with a turban on, and they will accept him up to the high standards of the force.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I have heard the hon. member speak in many areas of the country on the issue of human rights. He is, without a doubt, one of the leading exponents of this issue. Given that, I wonder if he would comment on the Marshall report within the context of his earlier remarks.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member. I know he has shown in all of his public career a great concern for issues relating to native justice and aboriginal rights. He raised the question of this report with me when it came out. I want to tell him I feel I could have used that as an example just as strongly as the other matters I mentioned.

When the Marshall report came out, I got up in this place to ask him for action, the Minister of Justice said: "We are waiting for the Province of Nova Scotia to take action". I would have liked to have heard a different answer from the Minister of Justice. In the context of social activism and leadership, the right response would have been: "This is a devastating report and here is what the federal government is going to do on its side of it". The Marshall recommendations were there and there were a number of them that the federal government could have implemented.

We have had the reaction of the Government of Nova Scotia for one week, and one could say a week later: "You said you were waiting for the Province of Nova Scotia to respond. Now can we hear from you?" Another week has gone by and we have not heard.

Leadership and reaction are extremely important ingredients to fighting this war on racism which every society has to fight but even more in a multicultural society. I rate the government very lowly on reacting to these issues and I think observant Canadians do also.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comment? Debate. The hon. member for Scarborough Centre. It is my understanding that the hon. member will speak for ten minutes, plus five minutes, splitting the time.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, has the time for questions and comments expired?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are still two minutes more for questions and comments. The hon. member for Athabasca on a question or comment.

Mr. Shields: I would just ask my hon. friend about his response to the hypothetical situation I posed to him. He indicated that it could be colour, or along the same line. I would answer that by saying that colour does not determine a man's religion. Religion, as you know, can become very emotional.

There is a case in Edmonton of the city fathers wanting to put a cross at intersections, a painted cross on the pavement where someone had been killed in a traffic accident. Because this had religious significance, other religious groups became very emotional about this and said: "No, we will not allow this. It is not right, because it is a religious symbol." The city of Edmonton had to change and not put a cross, but now paint a coffin. I am putting it in that context.

These are the arguments that many of my constituents and many of the people of western Canada are making. It is not just changing the headgear. The headgear in itself becomes a religious symbol. That is where the problem arises, not because of heritage. I personally do not care if they change the headgear. But the headgear itself is a religious symbol in the same way as a cross would be a religious symbol. This is the problem that people are discussing and one that I think we should address.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I think the city is wise to use another symbol than the cross to signify where people have been injured in traffic accidents. I know this was the policy in Belgium and in Europe. What they had was just an outline of a person on the sidewalk. This, to me, is an area where there is no religious requirement, that you use a cross to make that symbol on the road. You can do anything. But with observant Sikhs they cannot, consistent with their religious principles, go out without the turban on.

The question is, are we going to accommodate their clear and demonstrated religious observance or not? We have a law on the subject. The law says that we recognize it unless, in a free and democratic society, there is some reasonable basis on which we should not. And there is not, so far as wearing the Sikh turban is concerned.

I was on some hotline shows in Alberta and I know the kind of concerns people have who are not racist. I hope the member noted in my remarks that most of the people who are behind these causes are motivated by others. I feel that at the centre of it, there are people who are animating others because of fear, hatred or contempt which leads them to animate others to take positions on some issues that are very divisive of a multiracial, multicultural society like Canada.

I ask the member, when thinking about the issue, to distinguish what is essential to religious observance and what is not, because the essentials are protected by our laws.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in this debate today. I will be sharing my time with my hon. colleague from Burlington.

I am pleased we are discussing this issue today because it gives me an opportunity to set forth the actions our government is taking to promote freedom, opportunity and tolerance in Canada.

The motion put forward today by the New Democratic Party does nothing to enhance that cause. In fact, it is a motion designed to promote discord and dissension. I find it disturbing because I believe, and this government believes, that it is up to all members of Parliament and all Canadians to do whatever we can to bring Canadians together. Indeed, it was the former member of Parliament and Prime Minister, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, who introduced the Canadian Bill of Rights nearly 30 years ago.

The Bill of Rights begins with five simple yet powerful words: "I am a free Canadian". It is those words that must and do guide the actions of this government. Our programs and our policies reflect the fact that all Canadians share the same rights, the same freedoms and the same opportunities. That is what makes this country so different from so many other countries around the world.

We have all watched incredible changes in the world over the past year. But the underlying feature in nearly every event in eastern Europe and in many other countries is the triumph of freedom. People from around the world are experiencing for the first time freedoms that Canadians have enjoyed for over 120 years.

When our government came into office in 1984, we committed ourselves to putting an end to the bitterness and pain all too many of our fellow citizens endure. We have dedicated ourselves to finding new ways to stop the process of polarization among our own people and to end the senseless divisions that are perpetuated every day based on the arbitrary notions of superiority and inferiority, replacing them with the healing wisdom of compassion and understanding.

Since this government has assumed office we have come to appreciate the dimensions of the problem, and I can say with great confidence that the personal effort on the part of the Prime Minister and all of his cabinet colleagues is testimony to our efforts to end the vicious cycle of racism.

We have provided not only a leadership of ideas, we have backed them up with concrete programs and federal initiatives. I can also say with pride that our government has done more to fight racism than any other in our history. All hon. members should be joining with us, working with us, in that great struggle. Racism is inexcusable. It is the policy of our government to work constructively with all Canadians to eliminate these evils.

Our record is one to be proud of. The Minister has pointed with justifiable pride to initiative after initiative of the anti-racism front. I would be glad to file with the House of Commons the press releases of those initiatives that have taken place in the last few months.

I underline the importance of those initiatives. Of course, we all have to be resourceful and tireless. In the Secretary of State and Minister of State for Multiculturalism, we have a tireless champion for equality and fairness for all Canadians. His personal record is clear and his commitment to combat racism and prejudice is solid.

The fight against racism is part of our government's policy of multiculturalism. In 1988, Parliament unanimously passed the world's first Multiculturalism Act. This act clearly states that multiculturalism is a fundamental characteristic of Canadian society and that cultural diversity will be considered in all aspects of the decision making of government. It points the way to a Canada of equality, a Canada where understanding and acceptance is the basis of our relations as a people, in which the government is committed to ensuring that all Canadians can participate fully and without discrimination in defining and building our country's future.

Multiculturalism, for our government, is a policy that has solid programs and services. It is pro-active, anti-racist and is in keeping with the objectives of the act.

But our government has moved beyond simply enacting the legislation. We have been actively working to ensure that the principles of multiculturalism are applied to the policies, programs and practices of all federal institutions. The elimination of intolerance and discrimination is today one of the highest priorities of Canada's multiculturalism policy and, indeed, will remain so.

The government and the members of Parliament cannot do it alone. It can, however, help bring together individuals, organizations and institutions to create a positive partnership to build understanding and equality. Through those partnerships we can meet the participation and service needs of ethnocultural and visible minority community Canadians in special need of assistance. When they have to deal with institutions and practices they do not know or understand or when they have to communicate in a new language, we will be there.

At heart multiculturalism is about recognition that this society is for all the people who live here, all Canadians. That participation and opportunity must be equal in this pluralistic society.

The Multiculturalism Act itself is a central element in our striving for equality. Its fundamental aim is building co-operation and developing support for the equality objectives which are set out in our Constitution and human rights laws.

Multiculturalism seeks to preserve, enhance and share rich cultural diversity. We have established chairs of ethnic studies, and encourage various artistic and literary expressions as well as programs of fostering cross-cultural understanding. We are working to integrate Canadians of all background into the common life of our country, its institutions, its cultural vitality, its media, its political groups and its movements. This government has had the courage to tackle the sensitive, complex issues of Canadian identity and partnership and tried to lead all Canadians of goodwill to a better understanding of each other and their aspirations.

Our Multiculturalism Act is a symbol of that commitment to bringing Canadians together on a basis of justice and fairness. Canadians recognize that our diversity of traditions and insights brought together in our neighbourhoods, our schools, our businesses and in our civic forums is the rock solid basis of our strength. I am pleased that the Scarborough Chamber of Commerce has recently set up a multiculturalism committee in this respect.

Of course we still have much to do, and safeguarding equality for all will be with us for a long time into the future, and that of the generations to come, but we are indeed making progress and it is this government that has led in facing up to the problems and pointing the way to overcome them.

Mr. Speaker: Questions or comments? Debate. The hon. member for Burlington.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond today to the rather serious accusations by the hon. member from the New Democratic Party. I regret that I have only a short time to argue against his vague criticisms.

I would like to refute the hon. member's motion with particular reference to the immigration program by arguing that the government is innocent of the charges we face today. Our immigration program engenders fairness from its very foundations.

When we talk about bringing people to our country and helping them settle, this government is guilty only of promoting equality of opportunity, justice and racial harmony. Entrenched in Canada's immigration law is the complete ban of discrimination on the basis of race, colour, national or ethnic origin, religion or sex. Section 3 of the Immigration Act requires immigration rules and regulations for admission to reflect standards consistent with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

From the beginning, those people who wished to come to Canada are granted the same treatment throughout and fairness is guaranteed from the moment that anyone puts his or her foot in the door of the immigration program. At the same time, this government realizes that many of the new immigrants are personally disadvantaged when they first arrive in our country. They may not speak the language or understand their rights. New skills and understanding must be conveyed so that they have the same opportunities as all Canadians. They need assistance in adjusting to this new and foreign society so they can begin to contribute what they have to offer.

Most important in fitting in to a new community is the ability to communicate. That is why Employment and Immigration is spending $77 million this year for language training for new immigrants destined for the labour market. Furthermore, the minister has committed $2.5 million for language training for women who do not intend to enter the labour force. It is precisely these language skills which will pave the way for successful integration by these immigrants.

Besides language training, Employment and Immigration Canada assists some 130 volunteer organizations to counsel and support immigrants in adjusting to Canadian society. This can include anything from learning how to fill out a job application to understanding our laws and our government.

This year some 13,000 immigrants will benefit from the $56 million in funds for these programs. We should note that such programs often teach Canadians as much as they teach new immigrants. By working with people of different cultures, Canadians gain increased understanding and tolerance. Our host program is one such example where Canadians give of their time and understanding to help refugees settle.

Accepting people from vastly different backgrounds is indeed something to which Canadians have become accustomed. In recent years we have seen more and more people coming from countries in eastern Asia and Africa. Furthermore, in this year's immigration plan the minister has allowed for the resettlement of 26,000 refugees in line with our international obligations.

Canadians will continue to welcome the world's disadvantaged. While their backgrounds are foreign to those of many Canadians, their presence provides us with an appreciation of our life as well as an insight into the plight of the refugees abroad. Indeed, as the composition of our society changes Canadians have had to adjust their picture of what Canada looks like. As they tune into reality they discover that, as always, immigrants offer much to the quality of life and the culture of this country.

Everyone in Canada has the right to equal treatment and the opportunity to contribute. Through our programs and laws immigrants to Canada are assured those same rights that we have. By the same token, Canadians themselves are guaranteed equality of opportunity through our immigration policies. They are guaranteed equality of opportunity to work and opportunity to receive proper health care, education and countless other benefits.

One need only think of the scientists and the physicians and business people whose choice of Canada as a home has provided so much in view of the background from which they came. In view of the fact that we want immigration to continue to meet the needs of Canadians, the minister is now engaged in an extensive cross-country consultation on immigration levels. Through discussion with sectors such as business, labour, health and social services and education, the minister will be assisted in setting the country's immigration levels for the years 1991 through 1995.

The House should note that these consultations serve a great educational purpose in themselves. Many Canadians who have never discussed the issue are now actively engaged in the dialogue. It is our hope that a more understanding public will emerge through these consultations.

Canada has earned a global reputation as a country that treats its new citizens fairly and justly. That reputation was recognized when the people of Canada were awarded the prestigious Nansen Medal. Our immigration program has a unique give and take nature. While immigrants are granted equal rights and opportunities, Canadians benefit from their presence in countless ways. It is the openness and generosity of the program and people that have allowed a vast mixture of cultures and races to exist peacefully in one country. We are the envy of the world in that regard. Levelling ambiguous charges towards the government's efforts as the hon. member has done today is entirely unproductive. The hon. member himself has done a great deal to foster racial understanding and better equality of opportunity.

Canada's immigration policies have been scrupulously careful about the need to promote racial harmony, equity and justice for everyone. I would ask the hon. member to recognize that fact.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Vancouver East, I would just like to indicate that because it is the NDP's opposition day the rotation of the order is NDP, P.C., Liberal. There were two 10 minute speeches by the P.C., then the NDP, then the Liberals and it goes back to P.C. so that we can get as many speakers in as possible.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, by law Canada is a multicultural society with a charter that guarantees fundamental rights and freedoms. The present government which was supported by all parties in the House reaffirmed multiculturalism policy in a Multicultural Act a couple of years ago. This act, of course, promotes multiculturalism and equality for all Canadians particularly in regard to federal institutions.

In light of this unanimous support within the House for multiculturalism it is rather sad to read a recent article by Maclean's magazine which shows that the popularity of this policy is declining. We hope this will be temporary. I would like to quote a couple of paragraphs:

> —Prime Minister Mulroney—reaffirmed Ottawa's commitment to the multicultural mosaic—in a 1987 pamphlet that Canadians should have the freedom 'to retain their respective identities while joining one another as equal partners in a united country.' But the Canadian reality has clearly fallen short of the ideal. In fact, recent opinion polls show that, far from living up to the principle of ethnic harmony, a growing number of Canadians express intolerance not only of identifiable minorities, but toward the idea of ethnic diversity itself. The mosaic is under siege.

They mention also that polls show that when Canadians are asked specifically whether they support official multiculturalism most, about 63 per cent, still answer in the affirmative. However a Maclean's Decima poll shows that fully 61 per cent of Canadian respondents, including a majority of every income and education level, says that immigrants should change their culture in order to blend with the larger society.

Clearly this means that we must have a fairly aggressive program to develop equal opportunities in the real meaning of multiculturalism that will be accepted by and for all Canadians.

Not only is enthusiasm for ethnic diversity waning, but racism continues to be a disease of our society, as many people have pointed out today. Studies show that racism indeed is on the increase. In 1988, 70 per cent of people who were surveyed said they thought immigrants bring discrimination on themselves.

Although we have legal protections under the Charter and employment equity laws, systemic discrimination continues even in our own public service. It is appalling to think back to the past year when we witnessed the controversial killing of two blacks in Toronto, the racist theories of Philip Rushton, the 15-year cover-up of the murder of Helen Betty Osborne in Manitoba. We know that injustices against Donald Marshall cannot be wiped away with an apology.

In Vancouver feelings were inflamed against immigrants from Hong Kong, and skinheads have reappeared. Two years ago backlash was strong against boat people who sought refuge in eastern Canada, and I must say that some of the government policies did not alleviate that.

Here in the House of Commons we have had many petitions presented opposing the wearing of turbans by Sikhs in the RCMP. Our party believes that the Solicitor General has exacerbated this problem by delaying a decision which in very simple terms should be in favour of a policy which must conform to the religious freedoms which are guaranteed under our Charter of Rights. There should be no debate about that.

Racist pins in Alberta have promoted opposition to visible minorities, immigration and multiculturalism. Now we find this is spreading to anti-turban T-shirts and calendars which are being sold. Why can the Minister of Multiculturalism and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who lives in the city of Calgary, not have some influence and give some leadership to discourage this kind of trend? I think it is incredible that even the Chair of the justice committee has taken a stand against our Charter of Rights on this matter.

A more subtle form of systemic discrimination is evident within the government itself. The Canadian Human Rights commissioner a while ago strongly criticized the low proportion of visible minority workers that are employed in our own federal Public Service. Only 1.58 per cent of civil servants are visible minority people, compared to 6.3 per cent in the general workforce.

The government targets have not been reached at all. Government policies which established low targets and budget cuts certainly will curtail new hiring opportunities. We can predict that this kind of systemic discrimination within the Public Service against people of colour will continue.

It is absolutely essential that the government take leadership to establish a fair target for employment and promotion, not only of visible minorities but of natives, disabled persons and women. The Treasury Board should be setting the example within our own Public Service.

I want to give two examples of public servants who have had experiences of racial discrimination. They are Canadians whom we as members of Parliament have hired. I am ashamed to have to give these examples. Mary Pitawanakwak, an Ojibway Indian woman, worked for the Secretary of State. A human rights investigator confirmed that a public official had called her a "God damn Indian". She was fired in 1986, two years after filing complaints of racial discrimination and sexual harassment on the job. This matter is still being contested.

A second example is the Canadian Alliance for Visible Minorities claim that Mr. Idris Ben-Tahir, a career public servant since 1963, has been a victim of racial discrimination. Although he is highly qualified, he was relegated to a position requiring Grade XII education, and was dismissed from his job as a senior technical editor with the Canadian Forces. After being exonerated by the military and Pubic Service investigators, he returned to employment and has continued to face harassment, and has become ill as a result.

The Canadian Alliance for Visible Minorities has recommended several points that they asked us to raise very strongly in the House of Commons. I do this on their behalf today. They have recommended that Ben-Tahir be appointed to a position in the Public Military Service of Canada befitting his qualifications and experience. Second, they recommend that Ben-Tahir be financially compensated for mental anguish, humiliation and harassment. Third, they recommend that an impartial inquiry be initiated to investigate the discriminatory practices directed against public servants from visible minorities, such that it may result in the development of an integrated strategy that would effectively identify and eliminate racial and cultural discrimination within the Public Service.

I repeat that this is our own Public Service and our own government which is condoning this kind of discrimination. The Alliance also states that this case is in direct contravention of statements made by the Prime Minister in a speech called "Racism is a Moral Enemy of Justice", in which he professes stringent actions are needed against racism in Canada. He stated:

> If we fail to accept our individual responsibilities as citizens of Canada, we fail democracy itself.

I could not agree more.

I ask the Prime Minister and the government, why he does not insist that action be taken to remove systemic discrimination in the Public Service of Canada.

What is the cause of these increasing tensions and the increasing incidents of racism and bigotry which are symptomatic of a sick society, as well as of sick people? We believe it is government policies to a large degree, as stated in this motion, that contribute either directly or indirectly. The cumulation of regressive, harsh policies has placed an increasing burden on individuals and families in various groups and regions in our society.

This is the kind of atmosphere that sets the stage for hostility, intolerance and for scapegoating of powerless people, as my colleague has said. We have layers of regressive and stressful policies which this government has imposed. We have yet to suffer the goods and services tax and an even tougher new budget. We are developing a society that favours the powerful and exploits the powerless. This is the natural breeding ground for racism and scapegoating and intolerance.

Free trade threatens our sovereignty, our Canadian way of life and our jobs. Interest rates are rising. Our dollar is fluctuating and business and consumers are suffering. Lack of affordable housing and high rents are a problem in many areas, certainly in my region of Canada, and people tend to blame and resent newcomers as a result rather than resenting the lack policies that should be solving that problem. Cuts to unemployment insurance and the erosion of social programs, family allowance, pensions and our health care system are government policies that are creating insecurity about the future.

Families need child care, and single parents and children are suffering from poverty. Many people in Canada feel that their children will not have a future as the costs of education rise and employment prospects are diminished. As a result, they often resent newcomers.

Privatization, deregulation and anti-union policies also are negative forces. Regional tensions are growing. The west feels isolated and left out. Eastern Canadians are struggling for survival. Northerners have been denied a say in our Constitution. Quebec wants acceptance as a distinct society. Growing reaction to the Meech Lake Accord and minority language rights is largely a result of an insensitive government approach.

Yes, Canadians feel a lack of confidence in this government, a lack of stability and a worry about the future. This can be translated into anger and resentment that is projected in many directions. When people's security and livelihoods are threatened, when they face increasing debts and financial burdens, when they worry about their kids, and cannot find a decent job or affordable housing, the frustration and bitterness can turn to rejection and intolerance of those round them. I see it in my riding of Vancouver East every day.

Increasing waves of immigrants from Third World countries become an easy scapegoat, particularly in our large cities. Instead of blaming the government for high interest rates and inadequate housing programs, people often scapegoat the new immigrants, some of whom seem to be able to afford expensive homes.Inadequate public education is another very real cause of misunderstanding and prejudice.

I particularly want to praise Black History Month, which I think is something we should be sponsoring with all ethnic communities so that we have the true history, in a positive sense, of the contribution from various ethnic communities in Canada. It should be part of school curriculum.

The Multiculturalism Act requires participation of visible minorities in all federal institutions yet, unfortunately, Bill C-18 has not even mentioned this as a function of our new Multiculturalism Department.

I want to mention visible minorities on TV. There has been a positive increase in this policy, as commentators and talk show hosts and actors project a positive image which somehow infiltrates into the psyche of viewers. I think this is a very positive trend that should continue, and the CBC has a special responsibility.

Let me summarize several government policies that have a particular impact on ethnocultural communities and which are not helping the whole problem of respect for ethnic minorities.

Disadvantaged people need a voice and an advocate to speak for them in Ottawa. This is why advocacy groups like the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, NAC, NAPO and other groups are so important. Yet, last year the government cut funding to advocacy groups by 15 per cent, and over three years this will be up to 50 per cent.

Again, this is really taking a voice away from powerless and disadvantaged people. These deep cuts seem to be especially targeted to limit the power of groups who speak out for change and represent the views of those disadvantaged people. It is an attack on the powerless in society who are struggling to achieve greater equality and therefore it is a blow to democracy.

Termination of the Court Challenges Program is another very serious problem. The government must continue this program so that the Charter cases involving discrimination against ethnic minorities and disadvantaged people can be heard.

Settlement and adaptation of new Canadian programs are essential for promoting racial harmony, as well as for helping immigrants themselves. Language classes and pre-employment programs should be expanded, not cut. I want to mention particularly the cancellation of the Citizen Instruction and Training Program in April which will make it very difficult for immigrants to get language training. In B.C., 83.3 cent of immigrants have used this program.

Without these programs new immigrants are prone to isolation, ghettoization and racism because they will not have the language skills and understanding of Canadian values to help them participate fully. Backlash from Canadian born citizens is more likely to occur the more that newcomers remain isolated.

This is an example of another policy where the Government of Canada bears a direct responsibility if this trend continues, and I urge it to finance programs adequately. It is an investment that is well worth it in terms of our future.

I could mention many other programs, and I did last night in the late show. There are concerns that our immigration policy is not fair, that it establishes two classes of immigrants: those who can pay to invest money and buy their way into Canada and therefore require fewer points, and those who have to wait for a long time and often cannot get into Canada.

Economic insecurity is one of the major causes of racism and intolerance in Canada. Government policies which will impose a 7 per cent goods and services tax on all Canadians and which will introduce a tough new budget will add to the anxiety and hostility of Canadians. We can predict that regional tensions will increase and racism and bigotry, unfortunately, may continue to grow. Of course race relation programs are important and needed, but the government also must look at the basic cause and its role in creating an economy and a society that contributes to it.

We call on the government to consider very seriously the lack of confidence that Canadians have in this government in all regions and the negative trends that are growing in Canadian society. We urge the government to ease the burden on Canadians and to bring in a budget that is adapted to the needs of ordinary Canadians and disadvantaged people.

We particularly demand that citizenship and settlement programs, programs that promote multiculturalism and advocacy and those that eliminate racism and inequality, be adequately funded.

Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make a brief comment to which the member may want to respond.

I listened carefully this afternoon to the first speech from the member for Windsor—Lake St. Clair and also to the member for Vancouver East. There are some things being said that I take great offence to being a member of the government, and I want to mention a few of them because I think it is very important that they be brought forward.

First, it would have been much more beneficial had the original motion been phrased in a much more positive tone. I think the very fact that the motion is worded the way it is turns it into a very partisan matter, and the issue is far too important to be dealt with in a partisan manner.

The member for Vancouver East, as well as the member for Windsor—Lake St. Clair in his speech, talked about the free trade agreement threatening our sovereignty. That is a subject of debate. I do not feel that way.

Members opposite perhaps feel that way. I do not. I do not think it threatens our sovereignty, and I think it is outrageous to say that the free trade agreement somehow breeds racism and bigotry. It is absolutely outrageous. I certainly do not feel that way. I will not take a back seat to any member of this House in supporting minority rights and visible minorities. I just will not accept the suggestion that since I strongly support the free trade agreement I am somehow a racist and a bigot.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms was mentioned by both of the NDP speakers as well. One thing I did not hear them mention was that the Constitution currently has an override clause. Neither one of them mentioned the notwithstanding clause which threatens the rights of Canadians to freedom of expression, freedom of association, freedom of assembly, freedom of religion, freedom from unreasonable search and seizure, freedom from arbitrary arrest, and freedom of equality. Those rights are all threatened by the notwithstanding clause in our current Constitution. In my opinion that is a much greater cause of concern.

To conclude, the member mentions the funding cuts to different advocacy groups. Of course, for every dollar that the government has to spend there is probably $20 or $30 in demands from different groups that want funding. There are difficult decisions that have to be made. It is easy as an opposition member to say: "Yes, we will fund every single organization that wants money from the government", but there simply is not money there.

To criticize the goods and services tax in the next breath does not make sense. We cannot have a tax on one hand to raise funds and on the other hand say that we cannot cut spending anywhere else. There is only so much money out there for the public to pay.

In conclusion, I agree totally that ignorance does breed racism and bigotry in Canada. It is there. It has perhaps gone underground because Canadians will not tolerate open bigotry and racism any more, hopefully.

Ignorance also applies to government programs. There is great ignorance out there about government programs and policies. A recent poll commissioned by The Globe and Mail and CBC concerning the Meech Lake Accord is a perfect example. Some 71 per cent of Canadians do not know what the Meech Lake Accord is or what it stands for.

It is very difficult for me, as a Meech Lake Accord supporter, to defend the accord when ignorance exists. I think it is incumbent upon myself and all members of this House to explain programs like that.

Many of the things the member for Vancouver East and her colleague, the member for Windsor—St. Clair, say are subjects of debate. I feel quite differently about these things. I do not think the free trade agreement, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Meech Lake Accord and the goods and services tax breed racism and bigotry. I would be interested in her comments. I feel one way; she feels another. I am not a racist and a bigot because I support these government programs.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I know the member is very sincere because I have worked with him on committees. I would like to thank him particularly for mentioning the notwithstanding clause. That was an omission in my remarks, and I think a very important one. It is one that minority groups, certainly in British Columbia, are concerned about and have formed a coalition to rescind Section 33.

The member is absolutely right. The danger is that any province or government using this clause could in effect veto the rights under Section 15 of our Charter. I agree with the hon. member completely, and I am very glad he mentioned that point.

As to the other points, what the government members have not heard or maybe do not want to hear is that we are saying there is a whole combination of repressive measures which have put a great stress on this country and are making people feel very unsure of themselves as Canadians.

Free trade is one of them. It is not that it specifically promotes racism. I do not think I said that. It is a combination of things that is changing our country. The free trade deal is promoting in my view the kind of dog-eat-dog society where competition and profits are the main motivation. We are in danger of becoming Americanized and losing many of the things that are a part of our Canadian value system. That is really why I mentioned that.

The member mentioned the Charter of Rights. Of course I did not say that the Charter of Rights contributed to racism. I think the Charter of Rights, on which I worked very hard with a lot of groups, is a very important step forward in Canadian society. However it does not mean anything as long as civil servants face discrimination as our own employees and as long as we have people experiencing racism in other ways. It is nice to have it on paper, but that is all it is for the people who are involved in those incidents.

With regard to cuts to advocacy groups, I would like to point out that the groups I mentioned are long-established coalitions that have the support of affiliate groups right across the country. They are vital in my view and in the view of most Canadians that know about them in presenting the views of the powerless people. They have been very useful, I know, in some of our committees in helping us to understand the impact of proposed legislation. It is very important that they be sustained. It may be even more important than building new bureaucracies like the Department of Multiculturalism.

We do not have money for everything. Let us put it into community services so people can speak for themselves, rather than bureaucrats in increasing numbers.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I see that my colleague has a lot of interest in minority groups, but I was very disappointed when she started to mention the GST and such things.

I must bring to the attention of my colleague that I was an immigrant in 1953. If she compares where we were in 1953 and where we are after the progress of the last five years, she will see that we are in paradise here in Canada.

The hon. member talks about the GST. All immigrants from around the world know about the GST because this was not invented in Canada. It exists in all these foreign countries. I feel sorry that she has to mix partisanship in this issue.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that there are always exceptions as my colleague mentioned earlier, because somebody got such and such a thing. She must know that exceptions happen every day. We, in the Italian community, have just been involved in a specific case. It does not mean that the laws are bad. In the yellow pages published by Télédirect, Platon College in Montreal had substituted the word "mafia" for "Italian" in a list of 22 languages taught. If this is not discrimination, what is it? But one such case does not mean that the laws are bad.

So, even with free trade and the GST, I can testify today in this House that it is a privilege to be a Canadian or an immigrant in Canada. I would like to mention it to my colleague because I am one of them.

[English]

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege to live in Canada. I think we have one of the best countries in the world and we are very privileged to live here.

However, that does not mean that there are not negative things going on and that we as Canadians do not have an obligation as the Prime Minister said—and I quoted him—to do something about this, every one of us.

As far as the GST is concerned it is not only my partisan position. Millions and millions of Canadians across the country, everybody we talk to, are concerned about GST and the impact it will have on them. As I pointed out, this is one of many programs that puts great stress on people, particularly lower income people, and that really does promote negative feelings in society.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, today we debate the NDP motion:

> That this House condemn those policies of the government which, having bred a sense of insecurity, powerlessness and doubt among Canadians, are a cause of the recent increase in regional tensions and incidents of racism and bigotry in Canada.

I can certainly personally testify that I have seen a tremendous increase in regional tensions and incidents of racism and bigotry in this great country, Canada, of which I am so proud to be a citizen.

I do sense increased insecurity, powerlessness and doubt among many Canadians, but I question whether it is necessarily the policies of the government that have contributed to this, but rather the attitude and the lack of commitment to principles underlying many policies, not just this present government but previous governments have brought into being, which are at the source of the tensions, racism and bigotry in this country today.

In my own riding I have seen doubt rising over the English-French issue in our country. Anglophones are being talked to about a French threat and the division, the dissension, the bigotry and the tension have risen alarmingly and are of great concern to me because I see them not only in my own riding but reflected across this country. I consider that our country is in considerable danger and its very existence is threatened because this particular tension has arisen.

Because of the international debt that we have in this country we have seen many changes to programs, the drawing back of programs that have brought security and freedom to people. As those programs are withdrawn and new taxation programs are imposed upon the people making life more difficult and more painful for Canadians, I believe we that we are seeing a lashing out by the Canadian people against this pain. It is expressed very often in xenophobia, a fear which increases tension and ultimately leads to racism and bigotry.

The bigotry, however, does not refer only to issues of racism. I am thinking, particularly, of the problem of poverty in this country. I recognize a lot of bigotry that surrounds the issue of poverty. As has been reiterated so many times we have one million children in this country living below the poverty line. We have many single parents with children. We have many working families with children who are living at or below the poverty line for whom life is very, very difficult and becomes increasingly more so every day.

As we have heard before in this House, now in the great city of Toronto, Canada, central Canada, the rich part of Canada, we have more food banks than we have McDonald's outlets. This is a disgrace for this nation. I was involved in establishing and working with a food bank program in my own riding some years ago. It was alarming to me to see the bigotry which was expressed in my community against those who were poor.

Much of that bigotry was expressed by some although not by any means by all of the volunteers who were there to serve the poor. The poor were criticized for smoking. They were criticized if they had a glass of beer. They were criticized if they took their children to a fantasy farm for some enjoyment where it cost a few dollars to enter. There was a lot of bigotry expressed against the poor.

I feel that because of a lack of commitment to principles in this country, principles of equality, freedom, understanding and tolerance, these people are experiencing increasing bigotry because of poverty.

The government has failed in speaking out on principle on many of the issues of tension within our country. I felt that the response by the government to the French–English problem was much too late. I personally addressed letters begging and imploring our Prime Minister, our Secretary of State and other members of Parliament to say something, to speak out about the benefit we have in our country through our bilingual policy. It contributes immensely to our country that we have a bilingual and a multicultural policy. We cannot let those policies sit on paper only. We must constantly safeguard those policies, speak out to defend them.

I am very concerned about what has happened to our Court Challenges Program. I sit on the Standing Committee on Human Rights that reviewed the Court Challenges Program. I was one of the authors of the report of that committee which recommended that the Court Challenges Program be continued, not curtailed as has happened so suddenly and unexpectedly during the last few weeks. Our recommendations were that this program be given sufficient funding to carry it through to the end of March 31, 1990, this year, when its mandate terminates. In addition, we recommended that more funding should be found for the program to carry it through to the year 2000.

The Court Challenges Program allows groups and individuals in this country to address minority language and equality rights issues before the courts of this country. It is a program that is essential at this point in time as our new Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which came to this country in 1982, is addressed and implemented.

It is most alarming that the Secretary of State, when questioned about this program, said that he could not convince his government, members of cabinet or his caucus to agree to the recommendations of the standing committee. It sounds as if we are to wait for a budget. The budget for the Court Challenges Program is certainly not enormous, but the benefit of the Court Challenges Program addresses every individual in this country. It is a basic right in itself at this point in time in assuring that people in fact know what their rights and privileges are as citizens of this great country.

I was very alarmed today to read this article in The Ottawa Citizen which to me again testifies to a lack of commitment to principle. It represents an attitude of the government which I think is at fault. I believe this is the source of the problem, perhaps more than the policies of the present government. This article is entitled "Advocacy groups fear they're being muzzled". The article says:

> Public servants at the National Council of Welfare were recently silenced with strong hints their $310,000 budget was in jeopardy, according to sources, after they made negative comments about government policy—staff at the National Council of Welfare were told by—deputy minister for Health and Welfare, that the council's budget could be in jeopardy if they continue to criticize publicly in a time of restraint.

This, Mr. Speaker, in a country where freedom is a basic liberty for all of us, a basic right. It continues:

> Council staff director Ken Battle has frequently criticized the "clawback" of family allowances and old age pensions as the beginning of the end of universality of social programs.
> Andrew Cardozo, executive director of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, believes his outspoken criticism of the government's employment equity programs may have deemed his group "unreliable" in ministerial circles.
> The council, which represents 38 ethnic organizations across the country, receives $200,000 a year from the federal government. Cardozo is braced for a cut this time around and fears the government will only finance projects it approves.
> "This means the government decides what issue you can speak out on and which issues you can't."

I say that this again is indicative of a non-commitment to the principles of freedom, equality and justice in this country, the freedoms that underline our Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I would like to challenge the government to change its attitude and to take advantage at all times of opportunities to speak out and defend our basic rights and freedoms to make this a country that all Canadians can take pride in and maintain in good order for future Canadians.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak to the motion that was introduced by the member for Windsor—St. Clair. It reads:

> That this House condemn those policies of the government which, having bred a sense of insecurity, powerlessness and doubt among Canadians, are a cause of the recent increase in regional tensions and incidents of racism and bigotry in Canada.

Racism affects everyone, not just the new immigrants and the visible minorities. Although they are affected most directly, racism affects everyone. It leads to hatred, discrimination and tensions which in turn leads to violence whether physical or mental.

Racism is a force which destroys the very fabric of any society. It divides communities and prevents friendships. It is inimical to a democratic society like ours, yet it does exist in Canada today. It exists in our schools and in the workplace. It exists in small towns and cities.

Fortunately we can still say that equality of opportunity, social justice and tolerance and understanding are accepted as hallmarks of our Canadian multicultural society, but unfortunately injustices and intolerance still exist in the form of racism.

I recall the Betty Osborne murder in Manitoba which went unsolved for over a decade and the Donald Marshall wrongful conviction which again went undetermined for more than a decade.

Acknowledgement that racism exists in our country will enable us to work together to solve the problem. When racism is eliminated Canada will be a better place for everyone.

I would like to cite some recent examples of racism in our country. I cite the case of Mr. Idris Ben-Tahir, a visible minority who started his career as a public servant in 1963. Since his wrongful dismissal in 1978 he has been subjected to harassment. Although both military and public service investigations where he had worked have found that he was dismissed without cause, today the Department of External Affairs has not yet made any concrete efforts to move him to a position that is in keeping with his academic background and practical experience. What a waste of talents we allow to happen. Despite his impeccable credentials, Mr. Ben-Tahir is relegated to a position requiring a much lower level of education.

Turning to my second example, I am appalled at the racist reaction toward the Sikh community that has occurred as a result of the positive efforts of the RCMP to allow Canadians of Sikh origin who are members of the RCMP to wear their turbans. Canadians of Sikh origin should not have to abandon the religious tenets that are the cornerstone of their way of life to serve the people of Canada in the role of an RCMP officer.

The RCMP and other police forces have recently recognized the need to be more responsive to the communities they are charged with policing, including our ethnocultural communities. That is why efforts are being made to recruit officers from the different groups, and for this I would like to laud the government. This is a progressive step. Without it, charges of racism and discrimination against the RCMP like those levelled against some provincial police forces could occur.

The government, by its inaction on the RCMP recommendation to allow Canadians of Sikh origin to wear their turbans in the force is in effect refusing to allow Canadians of Sikh descent to wear their turbans in the RCMP and therefore we are discriminating against their religion. We are not allowing unlikes to be unlike and yet to be equal before the law. We are forcing unlikes in terms of religion to conform to likes or else to suffer negative consequences.

Turbans and ceremonial daggers are obligatory tokens of the Sikh faith. Any baptized Sikh would not be able to join the RCMP if he is not allowed to wear the turban. The existing dress code is an infringement of their rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The government must accept the recommendation of the RCMP, and soon.

I now come to the issue of discrimination against our aboriginal people. The 1988 annual report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission stated that the situation of the aboriginal people in Canada is in many ways a national tragedy. I quote from that report:

> The grand promise of equality of opportunity that forms the central purpose of the Canadian Human Rights Act stands in stark contrast to the conditions in which many native people live.

This assessment is at once obvious when we examine our justice system and the representation of natives in the workforce. Native Canadians are over-represented in our prisons, but under-represented in the workforce. This situation is ugly at best.

A 1988 Canadian Bar Association report shows that slightly over 10 per cent of the inmate population in federal penitentiaries comes from the native community. Yet natives make up only about 2 per cent of the population. It is therefore apparent that the general legal system is heavily weighted against the native population. The bias in the system must stop.

The almost uniformly non-native face of our police forces must be changed. Even if this is changed, there will still be non-native officers dealing with native citizens. Hence the entire police force must understand the context of native culture and the concerns of native Canadians. It is necessary to help ongoing cross-cultural training programs at the policing level. They are also necessary in the court system and in correctional institutions.

Natives do not just face discrimination with the justice system, they are also discriminated against in the field of employment. Employment equity reports confirm that native peoples are drastically under-represented in employment in almost every industrial sector and occupation. This is the case even in places such as Winnipeg where there are large native populations. Sadly, even within the federal government where programs to promote native hiring have been in effect for some time, the representation of native peoples is unacceptably low.

There are other areas of federal responsibility in which the government could do more, not less, such as has been stated. Our Court Challenges Program should ensure the pursuit of minority rights and equality for all. Language classes should ensure the participation of new immigrants and citizens in social and economic spheres. Citizenship classes should be made available so that immigrants can apply for full citizenship so that they feel fully part of our country.

The government could do more in the area of ethnocultural groups which could advocate the rights of new citizens and immigrants, as well as in the area of settlement programs, loans to small businesses and in the non-uniformity of action on the part of the government to deal with minority language rights issues from coast to coast. The government could do more, not less dismantling of social programs.

All of these factors contribute to the tensions that exist in our society. When these programs are not there, the very first to be excepted are the most vulnerable groups in our society, the new immigrants and the new citizens.

The underpinning, as has been said by my colleague, of any good programs and policies were they to succeed would be philosophy—the philosophy that we believe in individual freedom and initiative, that we believe in equality for all. But then, that principle without the concomitant principle of social conscience is not complete.

In conclusion, I would like to cite a description of discrimination given by Justice McIntyre of the Supreme Court of Canada. Justice McIntyre said:

> Discrimination may be described as a distinction, whether intentional or not, but based on grounds relating to personal characteristics of the individual or group, which has the effect of imposing burdens, obligations, or disadvantages on such individuals or groups not imposed upon others, or which withholds or limits access to opportunities, benefits and advantages available to other members of society. Distinctions based on personal characteristics attributed to an individual solely on the basis of association with a group will rarely escape the charge of discrimination, while those based on an individual's merits and capabilities will rarely be so classed.

When we sincerely and seriously understand this message in our hearts and minds, then there will no longer be any need for this type of motion in the future. Today we remain challenged as Canadians to ensure that racial harmony prevails.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am proud and honoured to stand in this House today to discuss the motion put forward by the New Democratic Party.

I would like to share 10 minutes with my colleague from Delta.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like today to share with the House my thoughts on a minority that is a very small but very significant percentage of the Canadian population and by that mean natives and the issue of native inmates.

Although natives account for 2,5 per cent of the Canadian population only their proportion is much higher in our inmate population, especially in the Prairies. They come from various language and cultural groups; some are status Indians, others are not. They include North-American Indians, Inuit and Metis. The native culture of course has its very own values and tenets. By reasons of those values and tenets, native inmates have little understanding or interest for Correctional Services Canada's programs and services.

However, they participate fully in those activities that are organized by other natives or filled with native culture.

Native inmates account for some 10 per cent of the total inmate population. In some Prairie institutions, their proportion nears 50 per cent. They are not a homogeneous group, in the sense that they come from a variety of language and cultural nationalities within Canada's native population. As inmates, they do not participate in mainstream programs and services as much as non-native inmates, which restricts their eligibility for early parole. They are however attracted to activities in which other natives take part, that are introduced by natives or that have a native cultural content.

Generally, native inmates come from socially and economically under privileged communities. Drug and alcohol abuse often is a problem and seems to be a significant factor in offences, involving violence which are more common among natives than non-natives. Poor community conditions also make it difficult for native inmates to develop plans that would allow parole.

Native inmates have special needs and programs should respond to those needs. Although there is no national program that specifically addresses their culture, the Correctional Services have chosen the objective of providing services geared to their native inmates.

The Correctional Services' objective is to offer to native inmates programs and services that conform to their cultural and spiritual needs, in order that they may derive maximum benefit from the correctional process.

On February 15, 1989, my colleague the Solicitor General of Canada approved the Correctional Services' mandate. Strategic objective no 2.2 in the mandate includes the duty to:

> Ensure that the special needs of native offenders be met—

• (1740)

Native spiritual programs have been developed since 1972 and are now available in most federal correctional institutions throughout the country.

The commissioner established a native advisory committee in 1974 to pave the way for discussions on correctional issues concerning native people. More specifically, the terms of reference of the committee include sharing information about native offenders and providing advice on matters related to the services available to and correctional programs for native people.

The committee is made up of Correctional Service Canada staff and representatives of major organizations which are responsible for keeping in touch with the native community and providing spiritual services to native offenders.

Correctional Service Canada officials consulted with spokesmen for the native people to set up programs and services to meet the needs of native inmates. This is why native liaison officers have been appointed in most institutions. They make sure that individual cases are handled in keeping with the cultural aspirations of native inmates so they will have ready access to treatment and social development activities tailored to their cultural background.

Native Elders also go to the institutions to offer spiritual guidance and officiate at sacred rites. Various other activities specifically intended for native people have also been planned in institutions where these people make up a high percentage of the inmate population.

Among such activities I might mention counselling by Elders, reading and writing lessons given by monitors, the temperance groups of the Sacred Circle, programs for re-integration in active life, drug addiction programs, traditional craft, and cultural events. Native fraternities or sororities organized and administered by native inmates operate in many correctional institutions. These group meet regularly, sometimes in the presence of a liaison officer and an Elder, to hold discussions, engage in cultural activities and attend ceremonies.

At the present time the wardens of institutions housing native inmates must make sure that, within the limits of institution security and order, religious programs are made available to the native people. They must see to it that such programs are consistent with native customs, including those which call for the use of traditional objects.

Correctional Service Canada provides services and programs for native offenders like Elders spiritual services. Elders perform traditional religious ceremonies, such as the pipe-smoking and fasting rituals, and act as spiritual advisors throughout the country.

In addition, the native liaison officers program has been extended. Under this program, native officers help native offenders prepare a discharge plan and establish contacts in the community. Special detoxification programs have been put in place and cultural activities have been organized in several places.

Halfway houses for natives, managed by native agencies and subsidized by Correctional Service Canada, offer post-release case management and support services in British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario and Nova Scotia.

Academic upgrading programs for natives have been put in place in our penitentiaries. Native instructors prepare native inmates for life on the outside and give academic upgrading classes.

Making staff more sensitive to natives allows them to become familiar with their culture and more aware of their needs.

Native private agencies have been contracted by Correctional Service Canada to supervise native parolees. In some cases, community discharge programs for native inmates have been made possible by residential and parole supervision services provided by natives.

A training program in native values is offered to Correctional Service employees throughout the country, regionally or locally. There are native friendship groups supported by native liaison officers or elders. These self-help groups stress social, recreational, cultural and spiritual activities in institutions, or most institutions.

Corrections Canada offers a training program in traditional or contemporary native arts and crafts, drum-making and native traditions.

Mr. Speaker, I would have a lot to say and I have a great deal of pleasure in talking about minorities in our Canadian prisons or penitentiaries, for, as my colleague was just saying, everything is difficult for an immigrant, but I think that this government and the minister have done much in the last five years, making the task easier and more culturally feasible.

In conclusion, this government and Corrections Canada work continuously with community interest groups to ensure that native offenders have programs and services that meet their cultural and spiritual needs.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I would just like to make a personal statement. If we go back 30 years when we became Canadians, you and I, and compare the hell then to the heaven now, as I was just saying, it is a privilege for everyone in Canada to be known as Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a brief question of the hon. member with respect to the immigration aspect.

As the hon. member knows, family reunification is a fundamental basis of our immigration policy. For that we can all be proud. The government announced recently that it would increase the sponsorship fee from $125 to $250. We know that this type of government service affects only a particular portion of our citizenry, new immigrants and new citizens.

How does the hon. member look upon this increase? Can he tell us why there has been such an increase? Would he recommend to the government that this increase be rescinded and removed altogether?

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise today in the House to deal with this issue and I am grateful to my honourable friend for providing me with the opportunity to do so.

People are aware that there are several ways to become an immigrant in Canada, but there are two I should like to describe to my honourable friend, because we are all getting applications. As a matter of fact, we are getting them not every day, but sometimes by the hour. And when they show up in our constituency offices, it is because they are in a mess. People who want to enter Canada may do so legally, illegally, or again by claiming rightly or wrongly a refugee status.

Therefore, I say to all these so-called refugees who are still abroad to stay away; yet, once they are here, I feel we should help them. As to the $125, it is true that $5 or $10 would be less of a burden, but when we realize there are people who are paying up to $5,000 to enter

Canada under false pretenses and who are coming forward once they are here, people who have to return to their own country, like some Turks or others had to do some time ago. I say that $125 is not that much, although some people may find that a lot. But if it were free, I should like my honourable friend to tell the House where the government would get the money, for Canadians know that now is income tax return time.

By the way, I saw my accountant yesterday. They must be aware that we can no longer increase the taxes, for they have reached the top. That is the reason why Canada must do as other countries are doing. Now, is $125 too much? Would $10 be the ideal amount? I do not think that we could answer this question now, but I am sure that, if there are immigrants who can afford to pay $5,000 to enter Canada illegally— At any rate, for all the files I have in my office, $125—

[English]

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity this afternoon of taking part in this very significant debate. It is unfortunate that the debate is in such a negative tone. I think that we in Canada have made real progress in the last few years in our racial relations. I say that coming from the west coast where we have had in the past very severe problems with our native Indians, the Chinese, the Japanese and the East Indians. I think matters have improved considerably, something which has been largely due to the policies of this government. However, we recognize that in Canada we still have significant problems with prejudices against minorities, whether they be racial, religious or whatever.

I would like to spend the few minutes that I have this afternoon to comment on the relationship with our native minorities. I believe that we just need to look at the Manitoba justice inquiry and also the Marshall inquiry to recognize that natives all over the country do suffer from the effects of ignorance and misunderstanding on the part of many Canadians.

We need to recognize also that these prejudices are rooted in hundreds of years of history and that to expect legislation to remove them in very short order is unrealistic. I think that it is worth while to look at some of the things that this government is doing and has done to correct that situation. We recognize that many of the problems that natives face are as a result of poverty and other social problems which our native population has to struggle against. Much needs to be done, both for our native Indians and also the Inuit.

I recognize that both of these groups of people have real hopes and ambitions just as the rest of Canadians have. The Ministers of Indian Affairs over the years have made many changes and changes will continue to be made as policies are required.

One of the major government policies that we are working on at the present time to allow the Indian population to take its rightful place in Canadian society is the promotion of self-government. We have seen, particularly in the last 10 to 15 years, the growing responsibility of the First Nations to assume responsibility for their educational, judicial, social and economic life.

Many of the disadvantages such as poverty are diminishing. As self-reliance and independence become the norm for our native people and the Inuit of Canada, Canadians are seeing the emergence of strong, dynamic partners in our economy, our cultural diversity and prosperity. Much evidence of our efforts to assist the native people can be seen and is becoming more obvious each year.

For example, there is the native justice system. As I mentioned earlier, this is a question which preoccupies all of us in the light of recent events in Canada. There was a federal task force conducted just recently on the question of reserve policing services. It has been shown that native communities are better served by law enforcement based on an understanding of the traditions and culture of these communities.

Administering the law at any time is not easy. It is important that those who are administering the law understand the cultural background of the people they are assisting.

Traditional Indian ways and practices increasingly enhance the peace and the harmony in our native communities. It is the goal of this government to enhance and increase the representation of native Canadians in the judicial system, as well as in the policing and legal professions. We have an example of that in our own party here in the House.

In many places in the country the number of native Indians in the prison population is entirely disproportionate to the general population. This would indicate to us very clearly that something is indeed wrong. Yet Canadians as a whole are developing a much greater awareness of the problems which our native Indians face.

Just last September there was an Angus Reid poll conducted in Canada. More than half of those polled believe native people were not treated fairly by the courts; and 70 per cent believe that native people have more difficulty getting hired for good jobs than do white Canadians. Most feel that aboriginal people deserve to be a lot better off financially than they are. It was not natives who said that but a cross-section of all Canadians.

Canadians in this same poll also said they are much more likely to support rather than to oppose aboriginal self-government. Over half of those surveyed agreed with the statement that the Canadian Constitution should specifically recognize the right of Indians to govern themselves on their own lands without interference from white society.

These are very encouraging opinions. We need to recognize that in spite of all the bad stories, there is a large reservoir of goodwill and understanding out there. These are the types of things we need to work with to culture and develop.

There have been many policies put out by Indian Affairs to do this in working with the native organizations. This bodes well for our growth as a tolerant and caring society.

I would like to thank the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair for giving us this opportunity today to confront the fact of racism and bigotry in Canada and to consider our response as individuals, as members of Parliament and to renew our resolve as good men and women to do something about it. We know we must continue to ensure that the government carries out its duty to continue a relentless effort to eliminate racism and bigotry wherever it arises.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been made moved.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, on October 23, I asked the Minister of Agriculture to stand up for the Canadian farmer rather than continue to stand idly by as the United States Secretary of Agriculture fulfilled his words with additional disciplinary action being taken in the area of Canadian farm subsidies.

At that time I pointed out that the government had already allowed the United States to discipline our pork industry and our milk producers and that it appeared that the United States wanted to discipline our Canadian Durum wheat producers. Although the Durum wheat producers had not yet been disciplined at that point, they were sending shipments of Durum wheat into the United States.

I note that at the present time they are not permitted to compete with the United States in that market as permits for export are no longer being issued by the Canadian Wheat Board. When the United States threatens to discipline us, the Canadian government does it for it by refusing to issue those permits.

The minister talked tough on that day, as he did recently in Toronto, but little or no action has been taken since that day in October.

In Toronto he said he might test Article 701.4 of the free trade agreement to see if it has any teeth. Clearly, as those in the fisheries know, the free trade agreement is all bark and no bite. If the free trade agreement had any bite, surely the government would have used it long ago.

On October 23, I asked the minister to start disciplining the United States for its use of the Export Enhancement Program. The minister told Canadians on December 20, 1989, that the Bush administration wants to ratchet down export enhancement. The budget for the Export Enhancement Program is $566 million U.S. for the year 1990. For 1991, the budget has been ratcheted up, rather than down, to $900 million.

On October 23, the minister dismissed the Durum farmers' concerns saying: "It demonstrates to the people of Canada and the world that Canada can compete with the best of them".

How is the Canadian farmer to compete with a $900 million United States subsidy that is stealing their markets away? How is the Canadian farmer to compete against American subsidies that Mr. Yeutter admits run at a level of $21,000 U.S. per farmer, $5,000 more than Canadians receive?

The minister told the House on October 23 that United States Durum producers receive subsidies of $40 to $50 a tonne more than Canadian producers of Durum wheat.

In the week of September 21 the United States sold 22,000 tonnes of Durum wheat under the Export Enhancement Program at a subsidized rate of $6.48 a tonne.

In October the United States sold hundreds of thousands of tonnes of grain to Egypt, Algeria and the USSR under an Export Enhancement Program of $8 a tonne.

On January 8, 1990, the United States sold 300,000 tonnes of grain to China under the Export Enhancement Program; and on January 10 it followed with a sale of up to 500,000 tonnes of wheat to Russia, subsidized at a rate of $20.50 a tonne, or 56 cents a bushel.

Now the minister is having a study done to determine the level of subsidies to United States farmers. Well, we on this side of the House have called on him to do that for almost a year. Has the minister looked into those subsidies? Can the minister not see the effects of the Export Enhancement Program? Perhaps he should read the farm income levels that his office issued in December.

What is our government doing to defend our farmers? What bold initiatives has the government undertaken to secure our world markets to ensure the viability of our farmers? The government cancelled $399 million worth of agriculture programs in the last budget so that it can claim to be the Boy Scouts of international trade.

Mr. Yeutter told the United States Senate in April of last year that "if the Geneva negotiations are successful, we will be writing a segment of the European communities 1991 farm bill in Geneva rather than Brussels. That is obviously one of our objectives. We will also be writing a major segment of the farm bills of Canada, Brazil, Argentina, Australia and seven other countries in Geneva and we want to do that too".

If we look at our budget in Canada in the 1989 period, and he did just that, the budget added $60 million a year to farm costs, and increased the costs of the average prairie farmer by $1,000 per year. How is the Canadian farmer is to compete with the $900 million United States export enhancement program?

The list of items cancelled in the last budget is incredible in the face of the escalating trade war. Crop insurance was cut by $200 million, the at and east grain and flour subsidy was cut by $60 million, the rail branch line rehabilitation program was cut by $48 million, grain and crop advance payments were cut by $54 million, the dairy export was cut by $12 million, commodity-based loans were cut by $15 million and the Canadian Dairy Commission was cut by $10 million. There were total cuts of $399 million.

I ask the government what it intends to do to counter the Export Enhancement Program while there still is an agricultural industry left in Canada, based on the concept of the family farm that has served us so well for so many years in this nation.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has put on the floor of the House a technical and complex question, and I will attempt to respond on behalf of the minister in those terms.

American Durum growers are wrong to complain continually about our exports of Durum for pasta and noodles, and they are wrong to threaten countervail action. American millers buy Canadian Durum because of Canadian quality and Canadian reliability. The U.S. Durum wheat industry and elected officials from North Dakota have alleged that prices for U.S. Durum have declined because of these imports. These concerns are not well founded.

Canadian Durum sales have developed since late 1986 to supply growing U.S. demand for high-quality Durum wheat which U.S. growers are unable to meet because of short-falls of U.S. supplies. U.S. farmers reseeded a reduced acreage to Durum in 1988 which happened to coincide with drought-reduced yields 40 per cent below 1987 levels and more than 50 per cent below yields earlier in the decade.

The result of the reduced acreage, plus the reduced yield experienced in 1988, was that U.S. production declined by more than 50 per cent from the previous year to 45 million bushels, while the total supply declined by 28 per cent to 141 million bushels.

At the same time, domestic consumption increased sharply from 50 million bushels to 61 million bushels. In other words, production was not even sufficient to cover domestic needs. Even though U.S. exports declined from 62 to 20 million bushels, U.S. stocks had to be drawn down from 80 to 60 million bushels to make up for the production shortfall. Imports increased to 13 million bushels from 7 million the previous year in response to the drought-reduced supply.

U.S. stocks have dropped steadily despite marginal imports of Durum. Also, exports including subsidized exports of U.S. Durum have on average exceeded total domestic value. It should be noted that the U.S. subsidized the export of 7.3 million bushels of Durum exports at a total cost of U.S. $4.1 million to Algeria in 1988-89. This Durum was delivered during the period November 1988 to April 1989 when it was clearly apparent that U.S. production was insufficient to cover even domestic consumption.

Apparently production in 1988 returned to pre-drought levels and USDA forecasts that imports will decline by almost 25 per cent to 10 million bushels. Domestic consumption is expected to decline from earlier levels but still exceed pre-drought levels. Export levels are also expected to be near pre-drought levels. Our exports of Durum to the United States are normal commercial sales by the Canadian Wheat Board. There is no intention to artificially limit these sales, particularly when there is continuing demand for high-quality Durum.

Therefore, there is this explanation of the existing import-export. The suggestion the minister wants to make is that before U.S. authorities continue to make unsubstantiated claims that our exports are the cause of price declines in Durum that they take another look at what is going on within their own borders, and more specifically at their Export Enhancement Program. There is action today in the United States and our government welcomes the investigations which we are confident will show that any problem faced by U.S. Durum wheat producers are not caused by Canada.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, when I asked a question of the Minister of National Defence on November 28, my question to him concerned the low-level flight training in Nitassinan. I asked if the minister would consider responding to these confidence building measures and peace moves by the Warsaw bloc to the Canadian women's groups, native groups, church and other groups which today were present in his office by restricting the low level flights and other training over Goose Bay and Nitassinan instead of increasing them from 7,000 to 40,000 according to the outdated NATO plan. Those are excerpts from my question.

His answer was:

> The hon. member puts forward a suggestion that would mean that Canada would act unilaterally as a member of NATO.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, it would not be unilateral. Poland and other members of the Warsaw Pact had already been reducing their low level flights, and for Canada to respond would have been a bilateral response. So the minister's response was patently false. Therefore, there is a need to look at what is the basis of his answer. That is to say the basis of his answer is clearly suggested in the news release of October 31 which states:

> The environmental impact statement concludes that increased low-level flight training and a NATO Centre hold the potential to secure the future of CFB Goose Bay and bring up to two billion dollars in economic and employment opportunities to Labrador, Newfoundland, and the rest of Canada.

In other words, the falsity of the minister's answer was clearly related to the claim of $2 billion potential benefit made in the environmental impact statement put out on behalf of the Department of National Defence.

This statement has been attacked by several dozen experienced and expert researchers on the environment, one of whom, a Dr. Bargen stated that he had examined about 150 pounds of such statements and this was the worst one that he has seen.

One thing they have done is to ignore the human problems that are now being caused by these flights. I refer to the study done by the experts hired by the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office from which I quote some of their remarks as reflected in today's The Globe and Mail:

> High rates of alcoholism, suicides and teen-age pregnancies in the Goose Bay area of Labrador were ignored in an environmental impact study of the low-level flying done for the Department of National Defence, groups, representing doctors, lawyers and women say.

These are based on the study itself and on their critique of the study.

> Marion Keran, spokesman for the Canadian Voice of Women for Peace, said the study has failed to examine the effect on native women of the proposed influx of 60,000 military personnel, most of them young men, if a North Atlantic Treaty Organization base for tactical low-level flying is established at Goose Bay.

She is quoted as saying:

> There is no mention of the increase in alcoholism, sexually transmitted diseases, illegitimate babies, the housing crisis, social disruption and other issues pertinent to women and communities.

• (1810)

Another commentator, Marion Mathieson, spokesman for the National Action Committee of the Status of Women, said there is evidence of women living near military bases in Cold Lake, Alberta, West Germany and the Philippines being victims of sexual assault and suffering sexually transmitted diseases after contact with military men.

She went on to say that the consultants who drew up the impact—and this is quite serious, Mr. Speaker—study also ignored federal regulations requiring them to examine any impacts of a project because of the age or sex of the people affected. In other words, they did not look at the special effects of noise on children, and they did not look at the special effects of those military men, 60,000 of them, on the women of the neighbourhood.

The study was also attacked by Health Professionals for the Prevention of Nuclear War who stated that "the over-all scientific quality of the information presented is poor and the amount of information relating to health issues insufficient to support meaningful discussion."

The government hired three reviewers to look at this statement and one of them, Sheila Zurbrigg, said that it is unconscionable that the review did not examine predictions of increases in sexually transmitted diseases because of the increase in military personnel at the base.

Another matter that was improperly done was the study of the noise effects that the low-level flights would have. The study claimed that they would be negligible, but Doctor Zurbrigg said that the study did not examine the West German studies and the one done by the Canadian Public Health Association in 1987 which suggested that loud unexpected noise could cause physical and psychological problems, particularly for young people.

It is also pointed out by the Halifax chapter of the Lawyers for Social Responsibility that the study made a fundamental error in ignoring the land claims of both the native Innu and Inuit groups in Labrador. Both of these groups oppose the low-level flying because it disturbs the game on which they depend for hunting.

There are a number of other faults as well which are pointed out by an independent group of experts that reported yesterday. For example, they point out that the EIS from the Department of National Defence fails to properly assess the economic and social costs of the project. In fact, they say it is grossly inadequate in its assessment of the economic benefits. In other words, the $2 billion, according to these experts, ain't there. The $2 billion, which is obviously the motivation, is an exaggeration, not to mention the social costs.

They also point out that there is failure to include a specific plan. They talk about monitoring. They say that monitoring will fix it all up. They will monitor where the flights go and make sure there is nobody there, but they do not give any monitoring plan. The Innu have told us that in fact even when they have given them the co-ordinates and say they are going to be camping next week in such and such an area, the flights continue to over-fly them.

Finally, there is inadequate assessment of past, present and future impacts of fuel dumping. Fuel is dumped in the rivers and lakes and has a poisonous effect on the fish.

All in all, the study has about 100 major flaws according to these experts. Yet today the government refused to give any serious response to the questions of the hon. member for Skeena as to whether that faulty, entirely inadequate study is going to be used as the excuse to go ahead, notwithstanding the severe environmental impacts.

• (1815)

I call on the Government to reconsider the whole environmental study, to start a new one and in the meantime, as the Innu had asked, to stop the low-level flight training until that new study has been completed.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to make a preliminary remark to my colleague. In my answer, I will deal mostly with the first part of the question raised by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), in which he had asked supplementary questions. After that, I will be pleased to come back to the question of low-level flights, like he just mentioned, to give a more complete answer.

[English]

Even with the normalization of political and military relations in Europe, Canada will continue to require a modern, capable armed forces for air defence, for the defence of Canadian territory, for the defence of Canadian maritime interests and for participation in peacekeeping operations.

The hon. member will recognize that the changes that are taking place in Europe have the potential for changing not only the military threat in Europe, but the whole spectrum in east/west military balance.

As the Prime Minister has already stated to the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party, progress has been made in the last number of years and it has been remarkable in the last few months. Indeed, this progress has been brought about in large measure by the solidarity of NATO, and we propose to keep it that way.

Given the enormous changes that are taking place in eastern Europe on an almost daily basis, any changes to the current structure of the alliances could be destabilizing with respect to the initiatives that are currently under way.

The hon. member will recognize that we have made a series of recommendations for building bridges of friendship, including programs of talks and expanded military contact which reflects the dramatic improvement in east/west relations and contributes to the process of confidence-building in military affairs.

The hon. member will recall that in recent months, members of the Canadian Forces held meetings with their counterparts in the Soviet Union. Let me emphasize that their goal was that of confidence-building, of reaching understandings with one another and being able to bring about a climate of peace and security to the world. However, Mr. Speaker, differences that are recognized by both sides remain and we should continue to be prudent. We consider that a cohesive and strong NATO alliance remains vital for both political and military consultation and for managing the transformation of east/west relations.

FISHERIES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the question which I raised had to do with the very serious problems which are affecting Atlantic Canada around the reduction of activities of National Sea Products. In the questions that I raised, I was particularly concerned with the results for the community of Canso and for the workers of National Sea within that community. There were essentially three questions which I raised.

The first question was to ask the government what it was planning to do for the future of those workers who would not benefit from jobs under the so-called saviour plan of National Sea. There was no answer to that question.

The second question was why the trade union involved representing those workers had been left out of the negotiations which had taken place. If those workers had been represented and able to put their point of view in the negotiation process, I would have thought that a much better result could have been expected. But they were not represented. I raised the question, and once more no answer was given by the government.

Finally, I asked the government when it was going to protect workers in Atlantic Canada—and one could make the same point for workers across the country—from arbitrary plant shutdowns on the part of companies that do not take into account the serious detrimental impact on local communities which results. To that as well there was no answer provided.

The reality which results for the community of Canso, for the plant operations in that community, can be summarized in the following terms: the trawler fleet itself of National Sea has been taken out of the community, 120 jobs permanently lost; the marine division, 70 jobs permanently lost; the outside wharf work, 100 jobs permanently lost; the night shift, 175 jobs permanently lost; the meal plant, 50 jobs permanently lost.

Employees will not be entitled to severance pay because the company does not consider this a plant closure. When the plant reopens, a maximum of 150 jobs will be provided in a plant where 750 people once worked. It is true that these jobs will be shared so that there might be perhaps 300 people who benefit from the jobs themselves and the UI benefits which result from them, but there will only be 150 jobs left and fish will be trucked into Canso from other National Sea facilities in Lunenburg or Louisburg.

There is no guarantee of how much work per year will be available. For the community, this will be devastating with 600 people no longer earning an income. The result, as the union put it this proposed saviour plan, is nothing more than a band-aid resolve to a situation which required major surgery. The life of this community will be slowly sucked out.

I come from the community of Windsor, Ontario, in which the same kind of detrimental impact hit our major employer, Chrysler, in the early 1980s. The government of this country provided help. As a result of that help Chrysler revived and now provides tremendous employment possibilities throughout the community.

The community of Canso and the Atlantic fisheries communities in general deserve the same kind of generous response from the Government of Canada. It is with great disappointment that I see this government's failure to provide that kind of generosity and care for the people of the communities of Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by reminding the hon. member for Essex—Windsor it was National Sea that made the decision to close the fish plant in the town of Canso.

It was when the Government of Canada and the Province of Nova Scotia prevailed upon National Sea Products to review their decision that the board of directors of the company met on February 6 to approve a plan which was intended to help safeguard the future of the town of Canso.

National Sea Products Canso plant and trawler port were scheduled to close permanently on April 2, because the company did not have enough fish to process, having lost 159 million pounds of fish quota since 1984. I do not have to remind the member of the difficulties, the crushing problems, that have been created by the depletion of the fish resource.

After extensive discussions with the Government of Nova Scotia and the federal government, the company decided that the plant in the town of Canso would remain open and would provide 300 time shared jobs on a long-term basis. The trawler port of Canso will close as scheduled on April 2, 1990. However, subject to the collective agreements in place at other National Sea trawler ports, the company expects the 128 trawlermen employed at Canso to have employment opportunities at those other ports.

This decision is made possible by National Sea's increased processing of fish from the pool of underutilized species, as identified by the federal government in the 1990 groundfish management plan and utilization of other fish available to the company in 1991.

In addition, the company has made application under generally available programs from federal and provincial government funding to replace the plant's refrigeration system for environmental reasons. The plant is expected to close as scheduled on April 2 to begin the replacement of the refrigeration system which will allow for the projected future work. Because of the environmental sensitivity and scope of the project, the plant is expected to reopen by December 1990.

I want to assure the member that the Government of Canada, the Minister of Public Works and the ministry generally are working with ACOA, National Sea Products and the Government of Nova Scotia to provide whatever assistance can be made available so that this package will be provided to the company in order to keep the Canso plant open indefinitely.

At the same time, I want to respond to one or more other comments that the member made, because he should know that other programs will be made available to workers. The Older Workers Program will be one of those that can be applied in this case. He mentioned the involvement of the trade union and the workers of the plant. Of course, the Minister of Public Works and the government are well aware of the role played by workers. Indeed the whole purpose of the exercise is to ensure that whatever work can be made available to the workers is made available.

I hope the hon. member and the people of Canso will not take the attitude taken by Mr. Jim Sorrell of the Canadian Auto Workers, as reported in the February 7 issue of the Halifax Chronicle Herald, because he said that "the town is history" according to that media report.

We are all trying with all the resources at our disposal to ensure that the plant is kept open and that there is as much work as possible for the plant workers and the trawlermen. In that way we hope to preserve the town of Canso.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to remind hon. members that tomorrow is February 14 and that they should remember their loved ones.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

HEALTH

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, there are large numbers of tin cans held together by lead solder in our grocery stores. The poisonous lead from these cans is absorbed by the food we eat. In small amounts it can cause loss of intelligence in children.

A study of cans purchased in Canada showed non-lead soldered cans with lead levels of 17 parts per billion, but the lead-soldered cans averaged 227 parts per billion. In one case the levels for one serving for a child had three times more lead than allowed by the World Health Organization.

Not all companies use lead solder and these companies must be congratulated for their concern for the consumer, but this government cannot be congratulated. It is the job of Health and Welfare to monitor lead levels in food, but the department's regulations cover only eight products, and allowable lead levels range from 80 parts per billion to 15 parts per billion.

Experts say that these standards are 20 years out of date. When this government says the lead levels fall below the acceptable amounts, we know that they are using meaningless standards.

What will this government do to assure people like Meagan Walker and other Canadians that they are not eating food with unacceptable high levels of lead contamination? Will this government set new standards that protect the Canadian consumer from domestically produced and imported lead-soldered cans?

GERMAN UNIFICATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the Open Skies Conference, while a good idea and successful in itself, was also a timely opportunity for ministers of NATO and Warsaw Pact countries to sit down at the same table with a common purpose and, in so doing, to prefigure the Europe of the future.

In this respect, I think it is important that the debate about German unification not be captive to the language of the cold war era now ending. We must go beyond debate about whether the new Germany will be part of NATO or whether it will be neutral. Both these ways of looking at the issue presuppose the continuation of a Europe divided into two camps.

Instead, we should be talking about a new common security system for a Europe that extends from the Atlantic to the Urals, a common security system into which NATO and the Warsaw Pact must be absorbed and joyfully disappear.

Common security in Europe must be accompanied by common security elsewhere, particularly in the Arctic, and in this Canada has a special role to play. Perhaps NORAD should also be absorbed some day soon into a common security regime that involves Canada, the United States, the U.S.S.R. and, indeed, other circumpolar nations who share the goal of a demilitarized, non-nuclear zone of peace in the Arctic.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to make you aware of the great benefits the goods and services tax will bring to those parts of Ontario that are industrial areas. Notable in those areas are the automotive centres of Oshawa, Oakville, St. Catharines and Windsor.

When the existing 13.5 per cent federal sales tax is removed from the price of an automobile, domestically produced cars will go down in price, making them more competitive with imported cars. That means more sales of cars produced in Canada with a direct benefit to the communities where those cars are produced. More production means more jobs.

The MPs of the Oshawa area, as well as those in the Oakville and St. Catharines areas, understand this significant benefit for their constituents.

With such a positive result on the economic health of their constituencies, what is wrong with those MPs who represent the Windsor area? Why are they not standing on their desks in this place admonishing those in opposition to the GST to get on side?

I hope the people of the Windsor area remember that their MPs are not willing to allow their constitutents to benefit from the GST. Fortunately, they are a small minority in this place and those with a vision for Canada will decide in the end.

TRIBUTE TO ÉDOUARD JANNETEAU

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today on behalf of all those who knew him, I wish to pay special tribute to an extraordinary man from Rivière Héva in Abitibi, Édouard Janneteau, who died on February 11, 1990 after a long illness. His career was long and impressive, so I will mention only a few of his many contributions to the well being of his fellow workers and the community. He worked at Noranda Mines for five years, was group leader for the union, and from 1964 to 1990, was the United Metal Workers of America union representative for Abitibi, Témiscamingue and James Bay. He helped establish credit unions in Val d'Or, Rouyn-Noranda and Malartic, and one that will open shortly in Rivière Héva. He was concillor for two years and then mayor of Rivière Héva from 1985 to 1989.

Mr. Speaker, Édouard Janneteau was known as a man who listened to what people had to say and gave good advice. Personally, I will never forget the advice he gave me when I was a member of the metal workers union in Matagami and recently as a member of Parliament. I wish to offer my sincere condolences to his wife, Anita, his children and his family.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the students of this country deserve better than they are getting from this government. First of all, the government takes away a lot of the equalization payments, thereby reducing the funding for education. Now the Minister of Employment and Immigration has said that she is going to cut the SEED program to make funding for a program to keep young people in school.

She says that the cost of providing jobs for students during the summer months has been taken over by the private sector and does not need to be financed anymore. That may be the case in Toronto, but it is cold comfort for students in Atlantic Canada. As a matter of fact, this is going to run contrary to the intention of the minister because students who find that they do not have summer jobs when they go to university are not going to stay in university.

Why is this government taking from one needy program to give to another? When is the government going to live up to its responsibility to the students of this country?

OPEN SKIES CONFERENCE

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, the broad agreement for the Open Skies treaty announced yesterday by the 23 foreign ministers from the Warsaw Pact and NATO nations is truly a revolutionary achievement in international arms control.

The holding of this historic conference at Ottawa reflects the long-standing commitment to world disarmament by our nation, our Prime Minister and our Secretary of State for External Affairs. This Canadian advocacy is exemplified by such commitments as our leading role in seismic detection of underground nuclear tests.

It is singularly appropriate that our non-militaristic nation should host this landmark meeting which not only paved the way for aerial surveillance of disarmament but also provided a forum in which superpowers could achieve breakthroughs in troop reductions. This is a week when the entire world hears good news from Ottawa.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pride in my hometown that I stand in this place today to report to this House the decisive step taken by the city of Hamilton in reaffirming minority language rights.

Last night city council overwhelmingly re-affirmed its commitment to respecting minority language rights in Hamilton. The message is clear and echoes the words and beliefs of the commissioners of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism who, in 1967, stated in relation to bilingualism: and I quote:

> The history of countries with more than one language and culture shows how often rigid attitudes held by majorities have made common life difficult, if not impossible. For the majority to hold back from acts within its power or to allow events it would be able to prevent, out of respect for the minority, is not a product of weakness but a step forward in civilization.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of British Columbia ruled last month that rail passenger service on Vancouver Island was a condition of B.C.'s entry into Confederation.

As a result, Vancouver Islanders have managed to defeat the government's destructive policy and to keep their passenger trains operating. Unfortunately, what the government could not do legally it is now trying to do through the back door. It has increased fares by 32 per cent, downgraded the service and has not maintained the cars to proper standards. In short, it is sabotaging the service.

Last week I filed an appeal against VIA's fare increase on Vancouver Island and my colleagues and I are asking municipalities, chambers of commerce, labour councils and individuals on the Island to support the fare appeal and to call on the federal government to change its policy.

If VIA's passenger service on Vancouver Island is properly maintained and properly marketed with appropriate schedules and fares, we on Vancouver Island will prove to Canadians that not only can VIA reduce the need for subsidies, it may even make a profit.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the latest attempt by the Mulroney government to fill the Prime Minister's promise of generous assistance to the Atlantic fishery would be laughable if it was not so cynical. After mismanaging the fishery into a state of collapse, the government has the audacity to come in and announce a rescue plan which will effectively close the port of Canso and cut the workforce in its fish plant by up to 70 per cent.

Where is the generous aid package promised over and over again by this Prime Minister? What about the people of Lockporte and Port Mouton who lost their plants last spring and have watched their communities slowly die while the Tory politicians from Atlantic Canada twiddle their thumbs in Ottawa?

The Deputy Prime Minister has stood in his place and bragged about the $21 billion given to western farmers over the past five years. How does that compare to the east coast fisheries? We have yet to see one red cent or one new program. So much for the Prime Minister's rhetoric for equal and generous treatment.

We may be plain folk who fish by the sea, but this government should not mistake our sincerity for stupidity, for we will continue to stand and stand together in demanding that this government come up with the programs and funds necessary to save our communities which face extinction because of this government's indifference.

Mr. Prime Minister, do the right thing, treat Atlantic Canada as an equal partner in this confederation of ours and do so today.

ETHIOPIA

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago people around the world were very appreciative of the efforts of the Archbishop of Canterbury when he was able to announce that there was a relief corridor agreed to by the government of Ethiopia that would allow relief supplies to those who are in the principal province of Tigray to receive assistance during this critical famine period.

Unfortunately, during the past few days, war has again taken over and the principal port of Massawa has fallen. There is a threat to the other port of Asab, and it appears quite likely that relief supplies may again be constricted.

It is to be hoped that both peoples, governments and organizations will use every effort to persuade all the combatants that these relief corridors be opened up in order to save the lives of millions of innocent civilians.

NATIONAL PARKS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, this government may be on the verge of making one of the largest wildlife management decisions in the history of this country. Agriculture Canada has recently put forward an unrealistic proposal calling for the complete eradication of bison herds affected by brucellosis or tuberculosis in Wood Buffalo National Park.

While perhaps satisfying the concerns of ranchers encroaching on the park, this recommendation ignores the fact that large questions remain about the geographic occurrence of the diseases, the genetic significance of the bison and the ecological impact of such a policy of eradication.

Yet despite these important deficiencies in the Agriculture Canada proposal, this government has refused to fund research into alternative resolutions to the problem. There is almost no federal funding available to look into alternative policies such as herd control or vaccination programs. Moreover, the aboriginal peoples of the region affected have not had the opportunity to participate effectively in the environmental assessment process.

Therefore I urge the Minister of the Environment to implement a six-month extension on the public hearings looking into the issue of the Wood Buffalo National Park bison herd and further, to provide intervener funding so that all interested groups, and especially aboriginal peoples, can participate effectively in managing this important wildlife resource.

THE FLAG

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, not only is 1990 the beginning of a new and exciting decade for Canada, it also marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of our Canadian flag. On February 15, 1965, the distinctive red and white maple leaf flag was raised over Parliament Hill for the first time. Since that historic moment, the flag has truly become an emblem of our nation. When the people of the world look upon it, they immediately think of Canada as the land of opportunity and as a caring and compassionate country.

We must not overlook the importance of our flag. It is symbol for each of us, one which portrays the peace and justice that all Canadians share. Future generations will be able to look proudly upon our flag as the embodiment of Canadian ideals and of the country, and honour it in a variety of ways as unique and colourful as Canada itself.

I urge all hon. members to do their utmost to participate in the events of February 15 and to promote our Canadian flag throughout the whole year. Together we must inspire our fellow Canadians to join us to honour and celebrate our flag and to be always aware of what it represents to each of us as members of Parliament and as proud citizens of Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr, Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Ministre. The minister knows that the Fédération de l'âge d'or du Québec which represents more than 200,000 people, has submitted a brief to all parties, describing the disastrous impact of the government's policies on senior citizens. The federation has asked the government to withdraw its proposed goods and services tax. This new tax, as the federation so accurately said, will cause unprecedented hardship for senior citizens, especially those on fixed incomes.

Will the government listen to our country's senior citizens and drop its GST proposal? How many times will we have to ask this government to drop this unfair tax proposal?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister responsible for Seniors, I met the Fédération de l'âge d'or du Québec yesterday, and this was only one of many meetings we have had during the past year. I would urge our opposition colleagues to support the GST bill, Bill C-62. If you have a heart for seniors as you seem to have for so many things, please support our proposal because it respects Canada's senior citizens.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the minister had really listened to the demands of Quebec seniors as stated in this brief, she obviously would not give such an answer.

Mr. Speaker, the 200,000 members of the Fédération de l'âge d'or du Québec are in a good position to know that the GST is not the only bad government project affecting them. They also denounced the planned clawback of their pension cheques by the government, which calls into question the universality of pensions. They feel betrayed by a government and a prime minister who called social programs a "sacred trust". So I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Will the government finally listen to seniors and today abandon its plan to claw back pensions, which is a very unfair measure?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I find it regrettable and very serious that seniors are given such misinformation. I have met seniors, I repeat, and as my colleague the Minister of Finance has said so well many times, the measures we are proposing with the GST are part of tax reform, and this government's philosophy is to respect people who need support. As a minister and Cabinet member, I support this measure we are proposing and, please, let's give seniors the correct information so that they can make the right decisions.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we in the Liberal caucus also received the Quebec seniors and I again repeat that they obviously do not accept the minister's answers. One may also ask why the minister does not have enough respect for the intelligence and judgement of the seniors from her own province.

[English]

The minister is not telling the whole story. Why did she not tell Canadian seniors about the flaws in the clawback provisions of her legislation and the negative impact of its sales tax project on seniors in this country? It is absolutely shameful that the government is deliberately taking from seniors the pension benefits they deserve and have a right to expect. It is doubly shameful that the government—

Some hon. members: Order.

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. gentleman to complete his question.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the government is also bringing in a sneaky hidden sales tax.

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. gentleman to complete his question.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Why will the government not scrap its new sales tax? Why will the government not claw back its clawback of seniors' pensions? Why will the government not stop picking on senior citizens?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no lesson to learn on my ability to listen to seniors in this country. I listened to them. We explained our measures and I will always support a fair and equitable social and economic measure that will enable us as a responsible government to maintain our social programs, to improve them and especially to allow room for new measures for seniors who really need them. I repeat, if you care about seniors' interests so much, please support the GST!

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Will the minister and his government continue to insult the intelligence of the senior citizens of this country who are very well organized and who are telling the government that the GST is an unbearable burden for people living on a fixed income?

Are you going to listen to the senior citizens who are very well organized and who understand perfectly what the GST means, and are you going to respond to their claims?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on many occasions in this House, we have listened very carefully to senior citizens and we have designed this tax having in mind the interests of senior citizens and the position that they are in. As I have said, 75 per cent of senior citizens will be better off after sales tax reform than is the case today.

I will take the hon. member through the figures again. A single senior citizen earning $25,000 will pay $220 more GST than FST, that is before the rebate. There is an increase of $81 in the indexing on their old age security, then there is an increase in the credit of $278, a difference between the GST credit and the credit that is being paid to them today for sales tax. The net difference is that they will be better off by $139.

These facts have not been prepared by me. They have been prepared by the experts in the Department of Finance. If my colleague disagrees with those figures, let him put on the floor of the House exactly how he disagrees with them and if he cannot, then he should stop misleading senior citizens.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, if it was just a question of a disagreement between the Minister of Finance and myself that would be one thing.

Does the Minister of Finance really believe he is doing a service to the country when anyone who questions the goods and services tax is practically insulted by being told they do not understand it; whether it is small business represented by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, senior citizens represented by organizations across this country, the Canadian Labour Congress, students or the Treasurer of the Government of Alberta, where we will be next month.

Is it just a question of stonewalling no matter what is said by anyone? Is the Minister of Finance the only person in Canada who understands the goods and services tax? Why does he not understand that Canadians do recognize that the goods and services tax is unacceptable?

Mr. Speaker: I think the question has been put.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that I am insulting Canadians when I explain the specifics of this tax. It is quite clear to me that there are many Canadians who have not had the opportunity to go through the information that he and I have. That is why we are providing this information, the brochures and pamphlets that we have been sending out to Canadians.

The only reason I am making this point in the House is because I would expect my hon. friend to have the honour to either disagree with the specifics of what I have to say or not go on repeating things that he knows are not true.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. I am sure you are aware that no Minister of Finance in the history of this country has increased taxes by as many millions of dollars as the minister who is sitting across the way. In fact there have been some 31 or 32 separate tax increases in the last four and a half to five years.

• (1430)

In response to this, back-benchers and his rich business friends are going across the country saying: "Cut back on social programs. Cut back on government spending".

What I want to know from the Minister of Finance today is whether or not he can assure us that not one single dollar will be cut back from social programs in his budget on February 20. Can he make that assurance and make it now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. member that no Minister of Finance was presented with such a large fiscal problem than we were on this side of the House on September 4, 1984.

There were things that we had to do. I have never denied the fact that we have had to increase taxes, but I have also said that we have to cut spending. About 70 per cent of what we have done in dealing with the deficit problem has been cutting program spending. We are going to continue to do this because we know we have to get rid of this problem.

Members of the New Democratic Party have their heads in the sand. They say: "There is no deficit problem. Ignore the fact that we have got a debt which is too high". They go on pressing, pressing, pressing to continue to increase spending.

This cannot go on. Under this government it will not go on because we must get this deficit and debt problem under control—and we are going to get it under control.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just referred to his problem with the deficit.

If the minister has so much difficulty dealing with this problem, why did he make a $160 million present to his Boeing friends and why is he also wasting $14 million in advertising costs to push his GST? Why is he playing Santa Claus with his rich friends here in Canada? Why is he spending so much money trying to sell his GST, instead of reducing the taxes for ordinary people?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon member still has not come to terms in his own mind with how this government should deal with the deficit and the debt problem. There has never, ever been any reasonable discussion from that part of the House as to how we are going to deal with the deficit and debt problem.

We are committed to doing this because we know it is absolutely the right thing for the country. It may not be popular, but it is the right thing for the country.

Members of the New Democratic Party continue to bury their heads deeply in the sand. They ignore the problem that is there. They come up with these shibboleths as to how the deficit can be dealt with when they know in their hearts that that is not true, that it will not happen the way they would like it to happen.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it has been reported that the National Council of Welfare, a citizen's advisory body, has been told by the deputy minister of National Health and Welfare that its budget is in danger in next week's budget because of critical comments made about government policy. The staff of the council have been directed not to speak publicly on any issue. How truly horrifying. What happened to freedom of expression? This is censorship of an advocacy group.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Can he assure this House today that advocacy groups in Canada will not be the victims of budget cuts just because they do not agree with the Tory government's policies?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can be permitted to respond to the hon. member's question in view of the fact that she alleges my deputy minister made such a suggestion to the national council.

Any such suggestion is false. If the hon. member had bothered to listen to the radio this morning, for example, when my deputy minister was interviewed, she made it abundantly clear that no such suggestion has been made.

REAL WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, one year ago REAL Women received more than $20,000 in funding from the federal government. This year they are looking for more than $400,000 in funding from the federal government.

Today, REAL Women filed a formal complaint against Madam Justice Bertha Wilson with the Judicial Council of Canada because she had the nerve last week to suggest that judges in Canada might be sexist.

Would the Secretary of State stand in this House to assure the women of Canada that no more federal moneys will be forthcoming for REAL Women?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, we have a very effective program that promotes equality and social justice. The Women's Program has participated very actively. We know there are still many areas of inequality in the country.

The program that I partly funded last year was one of thousands.

Requests are made to fund projects that meet the criteria as established by the Women's Program. What will happen once the budget is announced? We will have to wait for that to take place first.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the cabinet ministers are talking to each other because the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the minister responsible for the status of women agreed with Madam Justice Wilson.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Justice. Since his colleague failed to answer the question, could he reassure Canadian women? Will the Minister of Justice refuse to financially support the REAL Women organization?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, we have implemented a program to promote equality and social justice. In the past, we subsidized a number of organizations. There are a great many other organizations whose projects we have supported, and I suggest that as soon as the Minister of Finance announces the government's program, I will do everything in my power to work with these groups to promote equality and social justice.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, today the Canadian Federation of Students, representing 400,000 post-secondary students throughout Canada, is holding rallies and information sessions under the theme, "If you love education".

The Minister of Finance must agree that education, research and development are crucial to Canada's future.

Why has this government decided to cut back almost $7 billion to post-secondary education funding?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again I think this is an indication of how the Liberals are twisting figures. My colleague knows full well that we have been increasing substantially the funds that we transfer to the provinces for post-secondary education and health care.

We are very committed as a country to the principles of improving education and improving our commitment to research and development. This is something that has been well known across this country in the number of policies we have followed.

My colleague should understand that we have cut back on the growth in transfers to provinces for a very simple reason. We have a serious deficit and debt problem.

I think this is an example of Liberal party members burying their heads in the sand ignoring this basic problem. If we do not deal with this problem and continue to ignore it, the people who will be the most affected are the very people for whom the hon. member is purporting to speak today—the students of today who will pay more taxes in the future if we do not get this problem under control.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, even on Valentine's Day this government has no heart for the students of this nation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bevilacqua: Last week, 24,000 summer jobs were affected by cuts to the SEED program. At a time when 88 per cent of Canadians believe the government should not cut its payments to the provinces for education, will the minister for once listen to what Canadians are saying and abandon this regressive and parochial vision of nation-building and restore sufficient funding for post-secondary education?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to my vision as being parochial and narrow-minded. What we are trying to do is broaden the horizons of this country by getting us out of the mountain of debt we have which has been growing in recent years.

The only way that we can get the burden of debt down is to get the deficit down. The only way that we can get the deficit down is to spread the burden of controlling that deficit as broadly as possible.

I for one believe that that should involve the students of today because they are going to be major beneficiaries of the improvement in our fiscal and economic positions as we do this. That is why in recent years we have cut back on the growth in transfers.

We have not reduced the transfers, as my colleague has said, by $7 billion. In the last five years there has been a $25 billion increase in the transfers for health care and post-secondary education, and at a growth rate of 6.5 per cent per annum.

If that is a reduction my friend, you have got to go back to school and learn some arithmetic.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

At this time 2,000 residents are being evacuated in southern Ontario because of a massive tire dump fire which is spewing benzene and other cancer-causing agents into the air.

What is this government doing to respond to what experts have called an environmental disaster?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I will respond on behalf of the Minister of Environment.

Two thousand people have been evacuated. From what I understand the fire may burn for a week or maybe up to three weeks. There is a waste tire problem.

We have significant research to which the department and the Minister of the Environment has contributed which is examining new technologies.

I understand the situation is under control. We have officials on the scene offering assistance to the provincial ministry. We are very comfortable at the moment that everything that can be done is being done. We will continue to monitor the situation.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that this government says it is comfortable facing this kind of situation. We have here a case of somebody who was told three years ago to clean up his operations, and not a single bit of work has taken place since that date. That is shameful.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Langdon: I want to ask how the minister can possibly explain that we as a country should be so spineless, so powerless in the face of a work order like this that it can simply be ignored.

Is it the case that two years after Saint-Basile-le-Grande this government has still not learned a blessed thing about protecting the environment and protecting people?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, as in both cases, this is a provincial matter. The storage of tires is within provincial jurisdiction.

We are doing all that we can to be helpful. We do know that there are some 25 million tires, only about five million of which are recyclable.

We are looking at newer technologies. Some $2 million were advanced.

This type of experience has happened in the United States, without any significant dilatory effect, without any damage. We are consulting the Americans.

At the same time, the provincial ministry is taking samples to confirm that all is quite carefully being handled in a way to limit danger.

Let us be very clear. This is within provincial jurisdiction. Our officials and staff are on the scene to provide all the assistance we can to make sure everything is being done to be helpful.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State.

I was wondering if he along with the Minister of the Environment would cause persuasion to take place amongst environmental ministers of the provinces so that we might have an example such as is now being undertaken in the Province of Alberta, specifically in the community of Trochu. All used tires are brought to a central place where they are ground, reused and put into new products to develop energy by heat systems that will come from it.

Would he and the Minister of the Environment undertake to put that pressure on to make every province in Canada get rid of what is potentially a very serious problem for all Canadians?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): The member certainly has an excellent idea. I will be sure to discuss it very carefully with the Minister of the Environment shortly.

FIREARMS

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. A vast movement is building in this country against the possession of automatic and semi-automatic weapons. In fact, today, Mr. Speaker, Alain Perreault, President of the Association des étudiants de l'École Polytechnique de Montréal, released the results of a campaign to petition for changes in the current legislation, in the course of which 300,000 signatures were collected.

Could the minister inform the House whether he intends to table legislation to change the present situation very shortly? And what would these changes involve, besides reducing violence?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, a few months ago, I announced that I intended to table amendments to the provisions of the Criminal Code with respect to firearms. We are faced with a very serious situation. I have also looked into certain aspects of the administration of firearms acquisition licences. Most of that work has now been done, and I hope to be able to table legislation very shortly.

FOOD BANKS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I have in my hand correspondence from the Daily Bread Food Bank, one of 11 such food banks in my riding of Parkdale—High Park.

According to this correspondence, the greater Toronto area now has more than 84,000 people turning to charitable food programs for emergency assistance each month. The executive director goes on to say that one child in seven in Metro Toronto belongs to a food bank family.

Nationally, on an annual basis, it is estimated that 1.4 million different people, including 560,000 children, use food banks.

In light of these shocking revelations does the minister not realize that it is his government's policies that are driving more and more people to use food banks on a permanent basis? What will he do to reverse this trend?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am rather pleased that the hon. gentleman has given me an opportunity to say exactly what is being done to reverse the trend.

Since his party was voted out of office, some 760,000 Canadians have escaped from poverty. That is what we are doing to reverse that trend.

• (1450)

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, if they have escaped from poverty why are they lining up more and more for food banks? Since the minister does not even know what a food bank is, Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

He knows that his government has approximately three years left in its mandate. Can he give assurance to Canadians today that at the end of three years there will no longer be any need for food banks anywhere in Canada?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as long as there is any Canadian who lives in poverty it is unacceptable to this government.

Mr. Peterson: Do something about it!

Mr. Beatty: The hon. gentleman opposite says do something about it. Taking some three-quarters of a million Canadians out of poverty is something pretty concrete that has been done about it.

Members opposite cannot have it both ways. They attack any attempt that is made by the government to restore Canada's economic health. They pretend, on the other hand, that they are concerned about the plight of the poor.

These statistics show that we are on track. We are continuing to make progress in terms of fighting poverty. We will not stop until we have made further progress in fighting poverty in Canada.

TOURISM

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for tourism.

Yesterday, the minister responsible for tourism criticized the Leader of the Opposition because he cited American tour organizers' warnings of severe reductions in the numbers of American tourists visiting Canada. Mr. William Duron, president of the Metropolitan Toronto Convention and Visitors Association, has stated: "If United States convention organizers have to live with an additional tax they will close the door on Canada".

In view of the overwhelming evidence that has been given in the last few days by the tourist industry of Canada, I would like to know from the minister why and how he can continue to say that the Canadian tourism industry will not be hurt in the years to come.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is important that we listen closely to all the tourist organizations in Canada when we bring in a replacement tax.

It is very important too that we realize this is not an additional tax. I wish members of the opposition would get this through their heads. It is a replacement of an old tax.

The National Tourism Association of the United States is going to put together a suggestion and a mechanism on rebates that it would like to recommend to the government. That would not have been possible unless the Minister of Finance had said—and this is unique among countries with a VAT or a GST—that we are going to have a special rebate on accommodation for visitors to Canada.

Other organizations in Canada that are concerned with convention centres are putting together some proposals as well, which I hope to take to the Minister of Finance, to help with the rebate in that dimension.

All of this is progressing. It is progressing with a replacement tax, not an additional tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, if this is a replacement tax, what about a statement by the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Dodge, who said, and I quote:

[English]

"Ordinary Canadians travelling on holidays will face higher prices, no question".

[Translation]

If it is true that Canadian tourists will have to pay more to travel in Canada, how does the minister explain his statement that this will be a replacement tax? The Minister of State (Finance) says it will cost more. Do you agree with that statement or could you explain why the situation is so complex?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, there is a two-part answer to the hon. member's question.

First, something that we did not mention yesterday when we were discussing the whole tourism question is the question of business travel. When a business person travels after the GST is in place, the GST they pay for accommodations, restaurants and other things of that sort will be virtually immediately rebatable, something that is not the case now. That is very good news for the tourist industry and very good news for the hospitality industry.

In terms of the cost of running a tourist establishment, the hon. member constantly talks about the 7 per cent tax. What he forgets is the fact that the input tax credit will diminish that by 2, 3 or 4 per cent. So we will have a slight increase. The Conference Board tells us after this tax is digested in two years we will have a net increase in tourism in three years, a greater increase than we would have had if we never had the GST in the first place.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Yesterday, Bombardier announced that it would seek federal assistance to start up a high speed passenger train between Quebec City and Toronto. It says such a service would be profitable with 5.3 million passengers a year. It says that it can still charge less than airlines.

Bombardier has just confirmed what we have been saying all along. Passenger rail is the way of the future.

If the private sector has that kind of confidence in passenger rail, why doesn't the Government?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the decision made in October, 1989, was a good decision. I believe that Canadians understand that we did what we could afford.

If the private sector can put $3.5 billion into a high speed train, then it is up to the private sector. Obviously, the government does not have that money to put into such an option.

I said yesterday that we will listen to what the private sector has to say about what it can do. We are interested by the proposal. However, once again, we do not have the money today to put $1.7 billion into any kind of train.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the minister will remember that VIA Rail made a similar proposal last year for such a system. The minister's response was to cut VIA's services in half.

Given the comments the minister just made, that if the government at some point is prepared to consider financially supporting this particular proposal, will the minister give his assurance that instead of giving Bombardier—a private sector company—the funding, that he will invest that money in a public system so that all Canadians can share in the profit instead of just a few?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will not give any assurance to anybody. I will just wait for the royal commission to provide a few recommendations about passenger service in this country.

It is absolutely normal that we wait for the proposals to be made. That is why I think it would be wise for everyone to wait for the recommendations of the royal commission.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard) Mr. Speaker, the report, which was presented last November by the Committee for the Economic Recovery and Revitalization of Employment in Southwest-End Montreal, asked for a major contribution on the part of the federal government to play a major role. So far, the government hasn't done anything; it has not even revealed its intentions.

My question is this: Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us when we can expect a reply from this government.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as soon as we received this report in mid-December, we advised the authors that we would be responding around the end of March, and that is what we intend to do, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, this report establishes two very important precedents. The first is in the amount of self-help which it calls for. The second is in the degree of local control over financing. Both of those depend enormously on morale, morale which is being sapped by the stall to which it is being submitted.

The only thing that CREESOM has received is an acknowledgement, nothing else. There have been no further discussions or negotiations, something which was promised.

When will the government sit down with CREESOM?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat the answer that I just gave in the other language.

We have informed the author of this report in December that we would be responding around the end of March. We have already done so.

A similar report was presented to the government in the past concerning the east end of Montreal. We have responded to this report so well that all the people who formed that group have expressed their great satisfaction.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Brampton—Malton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

As he will know, an environmental assessment is currently under way at Pearson International to determine the impact of additional runways on surrounding communities. Recently doubt was placed on the assessment by a December 14 column in The Toronto Star which suggested that the Minister of Transport had indicated there was no way the environmental assessment would prove unfavourable for expansion.

Would the Minister of Transport rise in the House today and assure us that this assessment is without influence and that its integrity is still intact?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Of course, Mr. Speaker, I will. I wrote to the chairman of the environmental assessment review panel to say that I never said that.

Second, I consider that the processes is moving along normally. We should have the results in due course. Once again, I never said that there was any influence on the panel, and it will not have any influence on the panel.

BOEING CANADA

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, with Canadian taxpayer assistance de Havilland developed the Dash-8 and was producing it in Canada for some 14 months before de Havilland was privatized to Boeing. As the government admits in its press release of February 9, the Dash-8 is "the most advanced regional turbo-prop in the international market-place".

I have a question for the minister of industry. Since the Dash-8 is such a world leading aircraft, why must we the Canadian taxpayers pay Boeing over $100 million just to take it off our hands?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, in 1984, when we took over government, one of the things we inherited was de Havilland, into which the taxpayers of Canada had poured $800 million and were looking at another $300 million at least before it could approach some sort of viability.

We had a choice of continuing that kind of contribution of taxpayers' money, closing it down for a cost of $300 million, or selling it to a private sector operator that could do a better job.

At the time, if the hon. member will take a look at the press releases, there was unconcluded liabilities that had to be met to the tune of $63 million. We have used DIPP to help fund the next generation of Dash aircraft. The plant has 1,000 more employees.

The taxes of those employees who are now working as a result of what we did will more than make up for the extra contribution. The hon. member should be applauding us, not criticizing us.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-287, an act to amend the Criminal Code (order restricting the publication of the identity of the accused).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to introduce this bill.

The purpose of this bill is to prohibit any publication or broadcast of the identity of a person charged with theft when the value of goods stolen does not exceed $100.

We have seen the harm which becomes an accused of prominence when identity before conviction occurs. The effects can be even more devastating when the accused is a small town ordinary citizen whose accusation is published by small town media.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have petitions on three different subjects which have been sent to me by people from my riding.

The first petition calls upon the government to abandon its proposed goods and services tax. It proposes that the government reject the GST, cancel tax breaks for rich individuals and corporations, apply the present tax on goods manufactured in Canada equally to imported products, reduce the need for a sales tax by reducing the bank interest rate by 2 per cent, and increase employment in such useful work as protection of the environment, restoration of needed roads, sewers and bridges, air traffic control, VIA services, and industrial research and development.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I also have a set of petitions from people in the riding who call upon the government to support VIA Rail, to abandon any plans for further cuts to VIA's budget, and to provide the necessary resources to allow VIA to operate as a modern effective transportation company rather than as a museum.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the final petition is addressed to the government and is opposed to the government's proposed tax back of old age security and family allowance benefits.

The petitioners call upon the government to abandon this proposed measure which singles out old age security and family allowance benefits as a tax source tied to the level of income.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 and certified correct by the clerk of petitions. It is from a large number of constituents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior, more specifically from the towns of Longlac, Smooth Rock Falls, Val Rita, and Geraldton.

These residents are very concerned about a task force report on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas. This task force would see 37 communities in my riding no longer eligible for the tax benefit, thereby draining $2.5 million from the economy of Cochrane—Superior.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the task force report in its totality.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the responsibility to table three petitions signed by residents of metropolitan Toronto surrounding Pearson International Airport.

As Your Honour knows, there has been much controversy in respect of the government's action on Pearson Airport, particularly with the continued expansion of the airport to the detriment of residents, their livelihoods and their investments in and around Pearson International Airport.

These petitioners who number in the hundreds, suggest and demand that the Government of Canada come down with a policy on three issues specifically.

First, that all aircraft must climb to 4,000 feet before banking over residential areas.

Second, that there be a strict enforcement of the night guidelines so that aircraft do not come in at all hours of the night and the morning as they do now and that they only permit emergency flights to do so.

Third, that they do not build an additional runway which will cause havoc in the surrounding areas, but rather that they suggest alternative airports be utilized in order to make passenger flights more comfortable and convenient for Canadians and that there must be a sensitivity to those surrounding communities.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, signed by several hundred residents of my constituency from the communities of Courtenay, Comox, Cumberland, Port Alberni, Coombs, Errington, Parksville, Qualicum Beach and Royston, among others.

They request the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and to cease with a proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

I also have a petition which was put together by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, through one of its associate members, Clarence's Brake and Repair, in my riding. There are several hundreds of names attached to this petition, but unfortunately it is not in a form that could be certified.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition from my riding which was circulated by the seniors organization One Voice. It calls on the government to scrap its proposal to claw back pensions and family allowances and begin to treat seniors and family members fairly in the tax system.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to rise in the House to present a number of petitions from British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario.

The petitioners voice their opposition to the goods and services tax proposed by this government. They petition the government to ensure that, if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition according to the Standing Orders from a number of residents of the province of Ontario who oppose the government's proposal for a goods and services tax. They ask for a tax system that will give an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and ensure that there is no taxation on goods and services such as haircuts, fast food, piano lessons and other non-luxury items.

The petitioners wish Parliament to cause the government to cease the proposal that will tax diapers and coffins, taxing Canadians from the cradle to the grave.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition from a number of residents of Toronto who are concerned with the government's proposed increase of low-level flights in Labrador over the land of the Innu.

The petitioners ask that this Parliament join with the Assembly of First Nations and the Innu people in demanding that the Canadian government end NATO-NORAD low-level flight training, oppose the establishment of NATO operations in Canada such as at Goose Bay, redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood, and promote sustainable development for all Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I also have petitions from a number of residents of Ontario in Stratford, Hamilton, Chatham, Sudbury, Timmins, Orillia, Brampton, Windsor, Belleville, Toronto, Downsview, Cayuga, Westhill, Barrie, Ottawa, Welland and Kitchener.

They are concerned with the government's proposal to reduce VIA Rail service. They ask this Parliament to reject all reductions, to modernize existing equipment so that VIA Rail can provide a world-class service and to build a high speed passenger train between Montreal and Windsor.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions from people of my constituency representing various groups: farm and ranch groups, hotel and motel operators, restaurants, fishing and hunting resorts, a variety of small businesses, arts groups, student groups, environment groups, bowling associations, A&W and McDonald's patrons.

They point out the unfairness of the goods and services tax. They feel that it is an unfair tax and simply make the point that the government should go back to the drawing board, try again with real fair tax reform and stop proceeding with this 7 per cent goods and services tax.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I also have two petitions with quite a number of signatures. Some of them are from people in southern Ontario and others are from citizens of British Columbia.

I think they epitomize the fact that people right across this country are asking the government to reject the proposed goods and services tax, to reform the tax system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and to cease with a proposal that will shift the burden to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

• (1520)

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I too have the privilege of rising under Standing Order 36. Many residents within my riding of Essex—Kent also suggest that the goods and services tax is inappropriate and one that is going to cause them difficulty with their way of living.

They humbly ask the government to withdraw its proposed goods and services tax.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present petitions on behalf of my constituents from the riding of Mississauga East who are outraged at this government's heavy-handed manner in imposing additional runways at Pearson International.

My constituents are concerned that this action will have negative impact on their quality of life. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to start heeding their concerns.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition signed by a number of British Columbians, including a number of residents of my own riding of Surrey North.

It states that the government has not addressed the unfair tax system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax, while forcing low and middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax. They call upon this government to institute genuine tax reform.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise today, under the provisions of Standing Order 36, to present a petition concerning the government's proposed goods and services tax.

The petition is signed by concerned Canadians who feel that this tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to lower and middle income Canadians.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I have to rise again to bring this matter to the attention of the Chair.

Question No. 162, standing in my name, has been on the Order Paper, not for 45 days but since October 30, 1989, which is against the rules of this House. Your Honour will note that the question is properly identified as being one of those it is compulsory for the government to reply to within 45 days.

I want further to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that there is another question in exactly the same situation, that being Question No. 197 in my name, which was placed on the Order Paper on December 6, 1989.

In fact I have four questions on the Order Paper in my name, all requiring answers. Because the government is failing to respond to these questions I cannot place new questions on the Order Paper. In other words, I am prevented from doing my work as a member of Parliament because of the inaction of the government.

I alert the Chair to this issue. I have brought it to the attention of the Chair before. This is a new Standing Order. It has only been with us for a few years now. The government just cannot say that it answers appropriately a certain percentage of the time. This rule is quite clear. It must do so 100 per cent of the time.

I asked the parliamentary secretary to bring this matter to the attention of the officials in question, to make sure that they get off their duffs, or however the Minister for International Trade refers to it, and attend to these replies in the manner they are required to according to the rules of this place.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the hon. member had to stand again today. I must say, as I have had to say before, in this particular case the hon. member has asked some detailed questions that require detailed work. I have been doing my absolute best to get those questions answered on time.

At the moment there are four questions that are running late. We have been averaging about 91 per cent return on the regular questions.

I have a dilemma. I can give the member an answer tomorrow, but it will not be as complete and as detailed as was his question.

I beg the indulgence of the House and of the Chair. We are doing our best to answer these questions seriously and in what we think is the very serious spirit of the member who asked the question. We are going to do our best to make sure he gets good answers to those questions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all the Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, for weeks and weeks Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers have been stood, and there has been no explanation offered as to why the government takes this attitude.

I noticed that one of the motions has been on the Order Paper since April 4 of last year. One of mine has been on it since October 25 and another since November 24.

I do not understand why the government is so reluctant to produce the documents that have been requested. These are simple questions. This is a simple stonewall.

I invite the parliamentary secretary to indicate whether or not the government is going to produce these documents. I think it is a simple request. If the parliamentary secretary stands up and says "no, we decline to produce certain of these things", members have a remedy. However, instead of that, the parliamentary secretary simply says he wants everything to stand. It is a stonewall, and I respectfully request a response.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I think the member has made a reasonable request. I will investigate to make sure that my hon. friend gets a very decent answer to his question, and I will get it for him as soon as is possible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the Notices of Motions for the Production for Papers stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

STUDENT EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has received a notice for emergency debate pursuant to Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 52, I rise to request that the House engage in an emergency debate. The issue is one of the substantial reductions that the government has proposed in the SEED program for employment of students during the summer months.

Representing as I do a constituency which has two universities in it, I am particularly mindful of the cuts that have in fact taken place in this program, not just this year, but in past years. The cuts this year have been a further erosion of the funds available for students. I believe it is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The government's announcement came on Friday. So far nothing has been done on this matter.

I would request that Your Honour consider permitting a debate this evening on this important matter so that it can be discussed for the benefit of all Canadians.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I said earlier, the Chair has received the proper notice from the member for Kingston and the Islands. The Chair recognizes it is a most serious matter. However the Chair does not believe that it meets the requirements of Standing Order 52.

Therefore I must refuse the request.

DESIGNATION OF ORDER OF THE DAY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing 83(2), I ask that you designate an Order of the Day for Tuesday, February 20, 1990, to allow me in my position as Minister of Finance to present the Budget.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lewis: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House that tomorrow the business of the House will be to deal with report stage and possibly third reading of Bill C–38. This may sound like I am going to deliver a lot of legislation, but there have been discussions between myself as Minister of Justice and the critics on the bills.

That will be followed by a reasonable short debate on the B.C. court reform bill, the Ontario court reform bill, the amendments to the Criminal Code on arson, and the amendments to the Divorce Act vis–à–vis the Jewish Get.

• (1530)

In the afternoon, after Question Period, it is the government's intention to call the motion on the Order Paper as item No. 2:

> That this House reaffirm its commitment to support, protect and promote linguistic duality in Canada, as reflected by this House in the Constitution Amendment, 1987 and the Official Languages Act, 1988.

Mr. Gauthier: I can confirm that indeed there have been negotiations concerning the work of the House tomorrow. I take it we are going to proceed with Bill C–52 this afternoon. That is the only business today. Having settled that, I give the minister my undertaking that this party, on the question of Bill C–38 and the other four bills, is disposed to pass those bills after reasonable debate and without holding up the House on them.

As for the resolution, I think the minister knows that I had a letter delivered to him today suggesting a compromise solution that possibly the House would like to address in due course.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we are looking forward to beginning debate on Bill C–52 later today and we will see how progress is made for tomorrow. There have been discussions and like my hon. friend the House Leader for the Official Opposition, we too will attempt to expedite this legislation which we support in terms of needed legislation. I want to make that clear. Whether we can deal with all the legislation in that short period in the morning remains to be seen, but we will endeavour to co–operate on this legislation which we feel strongly about.

However, now that the government House leader has given notice that in fact we will be proceeding with the debate on the motion tomorrow, I want to say on behalf of the New Democratic Party that we recognize the important principle involved in that motion. I am not convinced in my own mind that there is a need for a long debate. I am not certain what it is we are debating. If there is some question on the government side of where it stands on this issue, I can understand that in terms of the need for debate, but as far as my party is concerned, there is no need for a lengthy debate. We would be anxious to get into the debate and to the motion itself in terms of a vote if the government would like to see that.

I realize that the government House leader did not suggest that we were going to be having a lengthy debate but he did not say we were not either. I want to make it clear that on this issue, as far as we are concerned, our position is clear and I am concerned that a lengthy debate would simply fan the fires that we are now seeing burning in various place across the country. I do not think we want to be throwing gasoline on fire at this point on this incredibly sensitive issue. I want to make that point clear. We are anxious to begin whenever the government decides.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to add that since the House leader of the New Democratic Party made some comments on the proposal to begin debate on the government's resolution dealing with linguistic duality, we in this party also think that in the public interest, it would be better if a firm commitment of this House were clear and precise and adopted quickly, so as to turn back the tide of intolerance which seems to be sweeping the country now and show the real leadership of this House by passing this motion speedily.

[English]

Mr. Riis: I do not want to prolong this but I think it is important that the government House leader recognize that as the House leader for the Official Opposition indicated, he had been in communication with the government in terms of a suggestion on how to proceed most appropriately tomorrow on this critical issue. We too have been part of that communiqué and we feel very strongly that this be approached in the most serious manner possible, dealing with one of the most sensitive issues that our country has always faced and faces today.

I simply want to associate myself with my hon. friend, the House leader for the Official Opposition, and we too have joined in a communiqué with the Government House Leader in an effort to resolve this in the most appropriate way for our country.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, these are negotiations which naturally take place at House leaders' meetings. I would be glad to convene a House leader's meeting with my hon. friends.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMITTEE ATTENDANCE

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a point of order in reference to a statement that was made in the House of Commons on February 8 by the hon. member for Ontario who stated that members of the Liberal party were consistently not at the finance committee meetings.

I went through the records to check the attendance of all members at the finance committee hearings on the goods and services tax. I found that the average attendance of Liberal members was well over 80 per cent. This was a better ratio than members on the government side.

I realize the member did not wish to mislead the House, so I am presenting a correction on the facts of the attendance records of that committee.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, January 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-52, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join with my colleagues in the New Democratic Party to oppose second reading of Bill C-52.

Bill C-52 is fundamentally a bill to make changes in the RRSP legislation and other similar tax assistance schemes that have prevailed in this country for almost 20 years. The bill increases the current limits under which Canadian taxpayers can get tax assistance or reduce their taxes by virtue of investments in RRSPs and provides that the increased limits will be indexed over a period of time.

The current limits for RRSPs are about $7,500 or 20 per cent of income. The proposed limit would increase over a period of time. Starting in 1991 the limit would go to $11,500; in 1992 to $12,500; in 1993 to $13,500; in 1994 to $14,500; and by 1995 the limit would reach $15,500. After that period these limits would be indexed to increases in wages and salaries. The bill also provides for what is called a "carry-over" provision so that in a given year those who cannot contribute or choose not to contribute to an RRSP can pick up that difference for a period of time.

This bill affects a transfer of tax money in the order of $5 billion to $6 billion yearly, when it comes into full force, from lower and middle-income taxpayers to the wealthy and better off income tax payers in this country. It undermines the possibilities of improving the Canada Pension Plan, the Quebec Pension Plan and the Old Age Assistance Program.

It undermines the possibility of developing a proper public pension plan system in this country to provide fairness and equity to the people of Canada. It encourages the development of privatization of pensions and contributes to a tendency which appears to be the underlying philosophy of this government; to make the rich richer and the middle and low-income groups poorer.

Let us take a step back in the history of the development of public pension policy in this country. We in this party are proud of the role played by our predecessors in this House, starting with J. S. Woodsworth in 1926 who used his position in Parliament to force out of a reluctant Liberal government the first old age pensions in Canada.

Canadians will be familiar with the long battle led by the former hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Stanley Knowles, to make old age pensions universal and to eliminate the means test. That battle was won.

Then there was the battle to develop a proper Canada Pension Plan into which employers and employees would contribute and which would provide a further basis for a secure future for seniors in this country. This was achieved in 1964.

Then, in the early seventies, came the first RRSP program. Originally the RRSP program was designed to provide opportunities for those who were not covered by employer sponsored programs, the normal pension programs that employees could participate in to provide those people with an opportunity to build their own pension plans and their own economic security in addition to the Old Age Security system.

It was also expected that those who had employer sponsored programs could use the RRSP program to supplement further their retirement income because at the beginning, and as presently prevails, the Canada Pension Plan together with Old Age Security still does not meet the full retirement needs of Canadians. It only brings the retirement income up into the order of 40 per cent to 50 per cent of pre-retirement income. All those who have studied this field say that a good system would provide closer to 75 per cent of pre-retirement income as the basic level of retirement income that would provide for a secure future for senior citizens.

The RRSPs had these two objectives: to provide an opportunity for those who are not covered by employer sponsored plans, and to provide for a supplement to the Canada Pension Plan or Quebec Pension Plan in the event they were insufficient which, of course, has happened and was predictable.

Those at the lower and middle income levels whose incomes are barely sufficient and in some cases insufficient to meet their daily, weekly and monthly income needs do not have any money left over to respond to the myriad of ads that we now see on television and in the media encouraging Canadians to invest in RRSPs. It is only those with extra income, the upper half of the income group, who can begin to think of taking advantage of the RRSP provisions in the Income Tax Act. As a result the experience has been that the benefits of RRSP programs go in the largest measure to the top 5 per cent of the income groups in Canada.

This bill will make that inequity even worse. Under the provisions of this bill the single mother on welfare can, if she chooses, contribute $11,500 of her income every year to an RRSP. Her income does not even meet $11,500 a year. Therefore, it will come as no surprise that what we have here is a bonanza for the financial institutions in this country and a bonanza for those in the upper income group who can afford to take advantage of this tax assistance scheme.

The government is introducing legislation which is a benefit for the rich and is simply not available to the poor and middle income groups in this country. It is going to cost the Canadian taxpayers $5 billion to $6 billion a year to implement this scheme.

Next week we are going to hear from the Minister of Finance—we have already seen the balloons go up—that this budget is going to be a Draconian, cut-back budget. It is going to cut again at public services to this country. Yet merely a week before the budget the government is persisting with a bill which is a $5 billion to $6 billion give-away to the upper income group in this country. This bill must be defeated.

It is important for this House to understand as well that the way this bill is structured, the government is persisting in using the device of tax deductions rather than tax credits. The $11,500 under the RRSP that is included here becomes a deduction from income. The government is not using a tax credit system. Most Canadians will now understand the significance of that difference. A tax credit system means that regardless of income the benefit of the particular provision is equalized. A tax deduction system benefits, again, those at the higher income levels.

Once again, the provisions of the bill in keeping with the reactionary philosophy of this government assists those in the highest income groups.

Let me refer the House to an editorial from The Toronto Star which commented when this bill was first floated on October 16, 1986, that: "The distribution of income in Canada is highly unequal. In 1981, the 20 per cent of Canadian families with the highest incomes ended up with 41.8 per cent of the total income pie. By contrast, 20 per cent of the families with the lowest incomes get less than 5 per cent."

The editorial goes on to state: "Under Wilson's new proposals, Ottawa would provide tax assistance to all employed Canadians to create a nest-egg that would allow them to maintain their incomes in retirement, up to a pension limit of $60,000 a year. To do so, he would provide the greatest assistance to those at the upper end of the income scale. Someone earning $20,000 a year, would get an annual tax break worth about $1,200, compared to a break of about $7,500 for those earning more than $86,000 a year."

I may add that the break for the person earning $20,000 a year is only available, of course, if that person has the spare cash at the end of the year to contribute toward an RRSP or one of the other plans covered in this bill.

In a fair and proper pension system, instead of investing the $5 and $6 billion that this government is prepared to give away to the top income groups in this country, this money would be used to strengthen the Old Age Security system and the Canada Pension Plan. In 1983, there was a parliamentary task force on pension reform. It became very clear from that task force that the real reform in this country needed to be the strengthening of the Canada Pension Plan. Virtually every member of the paid workforce, with earnings from employment or self-employment, is covered by the CPP, in contrast to those who can afford the benefits under RRSP provisions.

Many witnesses before the task force, including those representing workers and women, recommended a doubling of Canada and Quebec Pension Plan benefits to 50 per cent of pre-retirement earnings, up to the annual amount allowed. This increase, of course, has to be phased in over a period of time. But if we have those kind of changes, we would be spending public money in accordance with proper principles of public policy. A pension program in this country should produce a fair and equitable distribution of income at retirement. It should produce a satisfactory level of income and should be contributed to in a fair and just manner.

In this case the lower and middle income taxpayers who pay the largest portion of taxes in this country are contributing to the ultimate income advantage and short-term tax benefit of the highest income groups in the country.

The parliamentary task force noted that only half of men and fewer than one third of women who are in the paid workforce are covered by the Canada Pension Plan. That should be changed. They note that when people change jobs it is difficult to get the additional coverage because of long waiting periods.

Benefits in the private pension system are barely covered by inflation. The real reform in this country should come in the area of the Canada Pension Plan. That is the policy of this party and that is the policy that we urge upon the House.

My closing remarks will deal first with one other specific problem with this legislation, and that is its complexity. In May 1988 the joint committee on taxation of the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants described these amendments as "perhaps the most complicated tax rules ever devised".

These provisions will employ chartered accountants, any who are left over after the GST, in years and hours of complex analysis because of the complexity of the new rules. In fact most individual taxpayers will not be able to calculate the allowable RRSP contributions. At the beginning of each tax year the federal government will provide to each taxpayer a statement of available RRSP contribution room. To determine this amount, pension plan administrators will be required to submit a detailed report of each plan member's earnings for the year and the amount of the plan member's pension adjustment.

Revenue Canada will use this information based on previous contributions to calculate the following year's RRSP contribution availability. This situation makes it virtually impossible for individuals to engage in any kind of long-term financial planning. In addition, the rules will make it extremely difficult for small pension plan administrators to function without hiring additional staff solely responsible for pension adjustment reporting.

The Canadian Council on Social Development has stated in respect of a predecessor to this bill:

> We are starting to replace a progressive and visible benefits system with hidden subsidies that are in fact regressive. For example, we may eliminate the Old Age Security benefits among higher-income people—

That is the clawback:

> —but for the generation who will be seniors when this measure has its full impact, we are more than replacing them by increasing the limits on RRSP deductions and by putting in place a capital gains exemption. These kinds of measures provide high levels of subsidy, higher than the cut in the Old Age Security to high-income people.

Bill C-52 allows high income earners whose Old Age Security will be clawed back to more than compensate for the lost income by making increased contributions to RRSP. Meanwhile, because of the lack of inflation indexing in the clawback, future pensioners will see their Old Age Security clawed back at lower and lower income levels.

These policies, when fit together, spell the true intention of this government. It is to serve the better off in this society. This bill does not meet the test of what it will do for the least of these in our society. This will provide no assistance for the least of these in our society and therefore this bill is wrong in principle, wrong in practice, and must be opposed.

I would like to move an amendment:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting therefor:
> "This House declines to give second reading to Bill C-52, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act because:
> (1) the full benefit of the increased registered retirement savings plan limit will accrue only to the less than 1 per cent of Canadian taxpayers who earn more than $86,000 annually;
> (2) it fails to include provisions which would assist middle and lower income Canadians to provide for a stable income in retirement years.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the member for Victoria. I am sure he was here for Question Period and undoubtedly heard the Minister of Finance and other ministers and members on the government side state over and over both on and off the record about how we have to "get a handle on the deficit". They were accusing the NDP and the Liberal party of not caring about debt, of not caring about deficits and of being financially irresponsible. They said we have to wrestle this whole deficit problem to the ground and so on.

I am in a bit of a quandary and somewhat puzzled about that. I have a hard time understanding how anyone can square that kind of lecturing about financial responsibility and the importance of reducing the deficit and debt while at the same time coming before this House this afternoon with a proposal which in effect will increase the deficit by some $5 billion or $6 billion. I would ask the member from Victoria how he would square this posturing with the government's action in this bill. Does the government really care about the debt?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it will not come as any surprise to my friend that I have great difficulty squaring the circle that he has identified. In fact, far be it from me to try to explain the approach of this government, except to say that if one looks for a logical, fair and reasonable analysis of the fundamentals of this government's policy, it ultimately becomes clear that this government is not concerned about the deficit. This government is not concerned about reducing government expenditures generally. If it were concerned about those matters, it would be reducing interest rates, which is the largest expenditure the government has. It would not be putting forward this bill at this time, because this bill will cost the Canadian taxpayers between $5 billion and $6 billion annually.

Instead, the government is picking the kinds of expenditures which it wishes to cut because of its philosophy and its point of view. This government does not favour public expenditures for transportation; this government favours the use of the automobile which is, of course, environmentally damaging compared to other forms of public transportation, rail in particular. This government does not favour public broadcasting. It cuts back on the CBC. This government does not favour the public pension system, it favours the private pension system in this country. The government's works are to be judged by what it does, and in this bill it clearly demonstrates where its preferences are.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member say he would like to get interest rates down. I appreciate that that is a very worth-while objective. How would he do it?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the government has the fundamental direction of the economy of this country, including the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Thacker: Let's hear what you would do.

Mr. Brewin: You make it very clear to the Governor of the Bank of Canada that interest rates in this country must be dropped. Interest rates in this country are not governed by the market-place, they are governed by the Bank of Canada and it is the responsibility of this government to be concerned—

Mr. Thacker: Then what happens?

Mr. Brewin: And then what happens? Then we find that first of all, instead of a deficit of monumental proportion, the deficit begins to come down, business confidence begins to return to this country, investment begins to happen again, we avoid the recession, and revenues from salaries and from other sources improve so the deficit comes down. The economic encouragement for this country improves and the world is a better place.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, the particular bill which is before the House raises the limits to $15,500, which means that people on the upper end of the scale get the benefit of this. It appears to be a fact that there is a continuing feminization of poverty within Canada. This trend, I believe, has continued over a good number of years. It seems to me that the thrust of this bill has done nothing to assist women to ensure that they will have adequate pensions or retirement savings because usually women are paid at the lower end of the scale, some 65 per cent less than men. Would the hon. member comment on the feminization of poverty and the impact of this registered retirement savings legislation has on that aspect of the women's lives.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, my friend makes a good point. The fact is that poverty is a particular problem for women in our country. In 1986 women made up 56.1 per cent of all low-income Canadians, compared with 57.3 per cent in 1981. All indications are that the percentage is even higher today.

Only 16.5 per cent of female taxpayers, or 1.3 million women, contributed to RRSPs in 1987, compared to 24.1 per cent of male tax filers, that is, 2.1 million men. That actually inflates the number of females who contributed to RRSPs because that is based on women who actually filed tax returns. It also does not take into account income splitting where it is legitimate and possible under current regulations. While women represented 39 per cent of the total number of RRSP contributors in 1987, they contributed only 32.8 per cent of the value. Men made up 61 per cent of the contributors, holding 67.2 per cent of the value of the RRSPs.

The fact is that it is the women who are most seriously disadvantaged under the present system of pensions in the country. It is senior women who suffer the greatest impact from a lack of an adequate pension system in this country. Many women do not obtain even the benefits of Canada Pension Plan or, if they do, they obtain minimum benefits.

This particular bill offers no assistance to women and the increasingly distressing trend under which women are disadvantaged.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): The amendment put forward by the hon. member for Victoria is in order.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I feel fortunate to be able to speak on the amendment which the hon. member has moved. I think it is important for us to take a look at its contents. The amendment clearly gives reasons as to why we do not want this bill to be read a second time at this point. It states that the full benefits of the increased registered retirement savings plan will only accrue to less than 1 per cent of Canadian taxpayers who earn more than $86,000 annually and that it fails to include assistance to middle and lower-income Canadians to provide stable income in their retirement years.

We have to recognize that there are a couple of trends relating to the elderly taking place in this country. I have had the opportunity in the last several weeks to attend hearings of the health and welfare committee. This committee is studying the question of aging in Canada and health services as they relate to the elderly.

The first thing that comes from all demographic information is that the number of people living to an old age in Canada is increasing dramatically. The percentage of elderly people in this country is also increasing dramatically. There are many reasons for this; improvement in health care, improvement in the workplace and changes in nutrition which have lead to an increase in the life expectancy of people. There are also some things that have not changed dramatically. One of them is the number of elderly women who live beyond the age of 75 far outnumber the males.

I am quite interested in the question of services for the elderly because I come from a family which lives a very long time. My grandmother lived to 96, my great-aunt was 94, my mother is in her mid-eighties and has seven sisters, all of whom are alive. The youngest sister is in her late sixties and the oldest one is approaching 90 years of age.

In my father's family, my father passed away a year or two ago at the age of 93. One of the myths in the family, which we are having difficulty documenting because records in southern Russia are hard to come by, is that my great grandfather lived to be 109.

So I am vitally interested in what kinds of services are going to be available for the elderly not only in the next 20 or 30 years, but in the next 40 or 50 years. The position of the elderly in Canada has improved, particularly when it comes to income and financial security. It has improved mainly through the introduction of old age security and the Canada Pension Plan. Those are the two vehicles that Canada has used to provide universal and equitable pensions.

The only problem with the Canada Pension Plan and old age security is that initially it was intended to be extended. In the last number of years the scope of the Canada Pension Plan and the contributing factor has been diminished and the government has more and more looked on private pension plans, whether they are run by unions, by corporations and upon the RRSP program to allow the elderly to look after themselves in their old age. That is fine for people in the unionized workforce where they have good private pension plans. It has not worked for those who are in non-union or service jobs where there is no company or government-sponsored pension plans.

The RRSP has been nothing but a tax grab for the wealthy. It has nothing to do with providing universal high-calibre pensions for all Canadians.

If we look at the whole question of who contributes to RRSPs, one of the first things we will find is that not all Canadians are involved. Those on very limited incomes do not contribute. In fact, those with total incomes of less than $5,000, only .9 per cent contribute; those with incomes of $5,000 to $10,000, 3.7 per cent contribute. When we get up to those earning $25,000 nearly 33 per cent of taxpayers contribute to RRSPs. Those with incomes up to $50,000, 57 per cent contribute to RRSPs. So there is a disproportionate rate of participation in RRSP programs based on the level of income.

It is very simple. There is nothing mystical about it. The family man earning $25,000 does not have additional money that he can put in the bank for his old age regardless of whether there is a tax break or incentive to do that. The person earning over $50,000 has disposable income and he puts it aside for his old age. But he does not do it on an equal basis as the person earning $25,000. He does it with tax incentives that are much greater.

One of the real anomalies in the question of RRSPs is that if a person in the lower tax bracket of $20,000 makes a contribution of $1,000, he gets $264 back in a tax break. But if a person on a low income can afford to contribute, he or she will get $264 back for every $1,000 contributed. If a person in the highest tax bracket contributes $1,000, he or she gets $450 back. What kind of system gives the wealthy twice as much cash back as the poor?

That is the whole structure of the RRSP program. It is really an incentive for the wealthy to put aside money for their old age so they can have their retirement in comfort in Hawaii, Florida or the Bahamas. It is not designed to ensure that women who have worked all their lives at jobs paying $15,000 a year can afford to have adequate housing, food, clothing and transportation when they reach an elderly age. That is why it is so unfair.

I do not know why the government, if it is going to continue with an RRSP program, does not turn it into a credit system so that the person earning $20,000 a year gets the same benefit as the person earning $50,000 a year. If we really believed the Conservatives wished to do away with poverty in this country, particularly poverty for the elderly, they would reverse it. They would give twice the tax credit to the person in the lowest income level than to the person in the highest income level. Unfortunately, I do not see that in the proposal.

The other thing I want to discuss are the proposals put before the House by the Conservatives. Basically, there are two. There are a number of technical ones which are of benefit and some which are not. One is to lower the rate from 20 per cent of earned income to 18 per cent of earned income and to increase the ceiling from a maximum effective earning power of $37,500 up to something like $86,000.

In this amendment the Conservatives are reducing the amount of RRSP contributions and, therefore, tax rebates for people earning less than $37,000 or $40,000. For people earning over $45,000, the contribution and, therefore the tax refund, cash in hand, is the same as writing them a cheque for $7,500. This has been increased for those earning over $50,000.

Today the person earning $20,000 can contribute $4,000, 20 per cent. Under the new proposal they can contribute 18 per cent which is $3,600, a reduction of $400 that they can contribute to RRSPs. In other words, the ability of that person to contribute to RRSPs and to shelter their tax or to get a tax rebate is lessened.

A person earning $86,000 today can contribute $7,500. Under this proposal they would be able to contribute $15,000, an increase of $7,500. So what is happening is the government is reducing the amount people with low incomes can contribute, thus reducing the tax rebate and giving a windfall to those earning between $37,000 and $86,000. I do not know why I am surprised by what this government does. I make enough that—

Mr. Thacker: How much do you make?

Mr. Karpoff: —if I were not paying pension plans, I would contribute to an RRSP. If this government would bring in the same pension program for all Canadians that they made sure they brought in for the members of this House, I would be most pleased.

The reality is that this is an incentive for those earning between $37,000 and $86,000. At the same time it is punishing those earning below that amount by reducing the amount they can contribute. This is going to cost us another $350 million to $400 million.

The Minister of Finance stands over there and says we have a debt problem. Well, there is $400 million he can save today by simply withdrawing this bill. Withdraw this bill.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): You are wrong. Read the bill.

Mr. Karpoff: It is an additional $350 million to $400 million which will bring the total to over $10 billion for tax incentives for the wealthy in this country.

I say to the Minister of Finance if he has that extra money I have some better suggestions relating to pensions and income, particularly for the elderly. The minister could save $350 million and increase the monthly income of the 600,000 women in this country who rely solely on old age security and GIS. He could increase it by $30 a month. That is $360 a year. That is a lot of money. That is nothing compared with the extra $7,500 he is giving the person earning $86,000 in a tax incentive program like this RRSP proposal. If he has this extra $350 million to spend he can put it in the pension program to guarantee that Canadians can have dignity in their old age and afford to live in some comfort. Do not put it into a program which will make sure the wealthy are holidaying in Hawaii while women with minimal incomes are living below the poverty line.

• (1620)

Myself and the New Democratic Party are in favour of pensions. We are in favour of pension reform but we are not in favour of another tax grab for the rich.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I think I distinctly heard the member make a case against RRSPs. Is it the New Democratic Party's policy to do away with registered retirement savings plans in the nation?

Second, he argued against the tax deduction and in favour of a tax credit. Does that mean the NDP now realizes and accepts that the earlier tax bills that switched from deductions to tax credits were good bills?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, let us look at the difference between a tax credit and a tax deduction. If the Tories are really interested in whether this is a tax reform or helping people save for their old age, why do they not give at least an equal break to those earning $20,000 and those earning $86,000? Right now, the government is giving twice the amount of tax back to the person with a high income as to a person with a low income.

One of the things we have to look at in our whole tax structure is what are the tax advantages for tax credits? That is one of the reasons why the NDP is calling for a royal commission on taxation in this country. Repeatedly the government has taken steps which have increased the tax burden on the low and middle income and have decreased the tax burden on the wealthy. The NDP is saying: "Look, let's quit playing piecemeal games with tax reform. Let's throw out this GST. It is not a sustainable tax reform program. Let's not play around with Mickey Mouse juggling of changing RRSPs here and there. Let's look at real tax reform. Let's have a royal commission on tax reform".

We oppose this legislation that increases the tax write-off for the wealthy at the expense of those earning less than $37,000. I would ask the Conservatives: how do you go back into your ridings and explain to the person earning $30,000 that next year their contributions are going to be less, while at the same time saying that their friend down the road who is earning $86,000 is going to get a tax credit of $7,500. The government is going to give him cash. That is the same as $600 a month back in his pocket. How do you explain that?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the hon. member did not reply to my colleague's question. I assume that the policy of the NDP is that RRSPs are bad, as he clearly stated in his speech, and that if it was in government it would scrap RRSP legislation.

The second point I would like to make is that the member refers to only one-half of the bill. He has not made any comments on the substantial closing of loopholes that the existing pension legislation has provided in a number of areas. These are very clearly set out in the notes describing the bill. I ask the hon. member whether he is not in favour of this when he says they want to scrap this bill? Is he saying let us leave those loopholes open or is it again a question of the NDP closing their eyes to loopholes and not giving the government the opportunity to close these to make for a fairer tax system?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, if all it did was close loopholes I think you would find our party supporting it. This bill is creating a bigger loophole, the biggest loophole you can, by giving a tax incentive of $7,500. This is not an incentive but cash in the hand for someone earning $86,000.

The NDP position on RSPs is very clear. We would freeze the program at its level and put it into a credit program so that people on low incomes would have the same tax advantage as people on higher incomes. Personally, I would like to see our party go further and make the tax credit twice that for the person who earns $20,000 than for the person who is on an income of $50,000.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify something for the information of the House. When we heard the family history of the hon. member, it may have sounded as if he had a vested interest in this program. I assure the House that he has a very long experience and is an expert in the field of social services, particularly in administrative and policy matters.

He referred to older women and I could not agree more and support him in that the real tragedy still faces older women in the country. He pointed out very clearly the unfairness of the present RRSP in this bill as it impacts on older women.

Our leader heard from seniors in Toronto who, of course, were very concerned about the impact that the GST will have on them and she heard from seniors in Quebec and their concerns about the clawback.

He has mentioned other things. I also want to refer to the fact that very few older women in Canada are eligible for the Canada Pension Plan because many of them have been homemakers or they have come into the labour market very late. They have not been able to build up sufficient points for adequate income from that source.

I cannot recall myself, but I wonder if he would clarify that the GIS is not indexed. I think that is correct. Certainly, the Conservatives tried to deindex the old age pension itself and seniors said they would not have that.

The other thing perhaps he might comment on is the fact that, and this is an item he is quite an expert in, we hear very worrisome rumours that the federal transfer payments for the Canada Assistance Plan are likely to be restricted. This will have a tremendous impact on social services of all kinds and, particularly, income support programs for older people. I wonder if he would comment on those items.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, the hon member for Vancouver East has raised a number of very critical questions in areas that I could spend another half-hour discussing.

I want to comment on the last one particularly because it is going to be one of the major issues that this House has to deal with in the next period of time. It is the rumours that the Canada Assistance Plan, which has been an open-ended, cost-sharing program with the provinces, is somehow going to be limited.

The people who are going to be hurt are those on various types of social assistance programs or those who are on supplementary programs for the elderly. The provincial governments can and do supplement through the Canada Assistance Plan types of income support and care programs for the elderly. I keep coming back to the fact that one of the things that we still have not fundamentally addressed in this bill is the discrepancy in income security between men and women in this country, particularly over the age of 65.

I would just like to point out a couple of figures. In 1971, the average income from all sources for men was $12,500. For women it was $6,183. By 1986, for men it had increased to $16,700, which is getting up to $1,500 a month. For women it was still just over $10,000, which is $800 a month. You cannot live in metropolitan areas and pay rent, buy food, have transportation and medical care on that level of income.

Mr. Atkinson: Mr. Speaker, in the member's comments he referred to benefiting the rich in our society and hurting the lower income people. I wonder if he would comment on the fact that there is a seven-year carry forward in this particular act resulting in a young family, or someone going into the labour force, having this seven-year carry forward of an unused contribution. As well, the limits will be frozen until 1995. If you look at 1995, it is interesting to note that the $15,500 limit in that year will be the same fraction of the average industrial wage as the limit of $4,900 in 1976 when the limit was $5,500.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, the member raises a point of this carry-over. That is all very nice. The trouble is that if you cannot afford to do it this year, you cannot afford to do it next year or the year after, the likelihood that in seven years from now when you are still supporting your family and still on an income of $27,000 that you could then afford to do it not only for that year but for the past ten, seven or five years is just nonsense.

All it is going to do is make sure that the wealthy, who maybe for some reason this year have a little problem with cash flow because they bought another investment or they put money into an apartment block, can pick up on it next year.

I do not see it as any incentive for the poor, or even the people on middle incomes, I see it just as another give-a-way for the wealthy to make sure that their cash flow is not hurt when they invest in RRSPs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): The time for questions and comments has expired. On debate, the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on the amendment. I think it is a valid amendment in that it points out with some clarity the New Democratic Party position on this particular bill. I would like for the record to read again, for emphasis, the two points that are made:

> (1) the full benefit of the increased registered retirement savings plan limit will accrue only to the less than 1 per cent of Canadian taxpayers who earn more than $86,000 annually.

I will comment on that in a minute.

The second point:

> (2) it fails—assist middle and lower income Canadians to provide for a stable income in their retirement years.

Now, I think the first point is the crux of the whole problem with this government's thrust toward tax reform, toward many of the programs that we have seen instituted over the last five years. Whether it be the Unemployment Insurance Act changes, free trade, or the clawback, it emphasizes to all Canadians what is happening.

The program that we see before us, as was emphasized to me as I travelled across Canada with the finance committee, emphasizes the polarity between the rich and the poor. This is of major concern to me and the New Democratic Party and to many Canadians to whom I and others have spoken with regard to the direction in which this government appears to be going.

The government should be ensuring for future generations some balance in the incomes of Canadians, an equality of life for Canadians, whether in their own homes, their communities, their provinces or their regions. Canadians should be able to hold their heads high with the knowledge that there is economic and environmental equality. Instead, we are seeing this polarity.

The rich appear to be getting the benefit. As my grandfather used to say, "Them what has gets". I think that is exactly what is happening here. The rich are getting richer, the poor are getting poorer. If we continue with this particular agenda, fewer and fewer middle-income people will to be able to live with their heads high. By this type of legislation we are forcing those who are a little less fortunate into becoming poverty stricken and increasing the distance between the middle income-earners and the rich, those who have.

The major thrust, I would suggest, to the New Democratic Party's position is not to increase or expand upon this polarity, but to move toward the equality that we in Canada have come to expect of each other and of our governments. The thrust in any legislation, whether it be social or pension legislation, should be a thrust of equality, a thrust of fairness, something that people can look to and say: "That will help all Canadians, not just a limited few".

The suggestion of the New Democratic Party is that we should not be looking at the upper end of the scale. We should be looking at the over-all picture of universal pensions for women, for men, for rich and for poor alike, something portable, something that we can hold on and look forward to so as to ensure that we can live comfortably in our golden years. We do not have to live with all the baubles, bangles, gold and silver and all that glitters. It is a matter of comfort and having what is necessary or essential to be able to carry on and live in dignity in those retiring years.

I would suggest the way to do that is through our Canada Pension Plan system, ensuring that that plan is portable and adequate and treats men and women alike with equality. We have seen for too long all the problems which women have run into with husbands' pensions.

As I said earlier, women make 65 per cent of what males make on average. I would suggest that this in itself shows the inequality within our system. We must strive for greater things than simply looking to a small section with blinders on. It is a broader perspective. It is something that we should be working toward together too ensure the equality and fairness that I spoke of earlier.

At present, under the proposed legislation, at the end of 1995 those who make $86,111 will be able to put in the maximum $15,500. This scales up over a five-year period. Again, it emphasizes that those who will be able to use the upper limit are those with the higher incomes, those who probably already have other investments, who have put money away in other things, who are looking after themselves and have the maximum Canada Pension Plan.

I am not saying that they should not put money away for their future in Registered Retirement Savings Plans and the New Democratic Party is not saying that we are against Registered Retirement Savings Plans. We have never said that. We are saying that we are looking in the wrong direction. We should be looking at the area of universality of our pension plans.

There should be a cap placed on those pension plans. I do not think the dropping from 20 per cent to 18 per cent of earnings assists the middle and low-income earners. That, it seems to me, tends to hurt the low and middle-income earners and assists those in the upper-income area.

I would suggest that the seven-year carry-forward contained in this legislation again, as has been emphasized by my friend from Surrey North, is more an advantage for those people with higher incomes and the ability to invest. Yes, from the perspective of a small business person who one year, if the economy picks up, may have a little bit of extra money, it has a certain flavour of advantage.

But if we look at who uses the Registered Retirement Savings Plan area, I think it becomes fairly clear that those who will use the seven-year carry-forward provision are in fact those who want to use their money for some specific tax advantage investment one year and then pick it up a year or two later when they reap the benefits of that investment. But the low-income earner, unless he wins a lottery, is not going to have the money that is required to take advantage of that seven-year carry-forward.

So while I am saying that the carry-forward will assist some of the middle-income earners in some way, it is going to be a small percentage of those earners. The rich, again, will be the ones taking advantage of it.

I have referred to the number of tax filers who contribute to RRSPs in trying to emphasize my point of the carry-forward. In 1987, the last year for which I have figures, 57.8 per cent of those with incomes of $50,000 and over made an average contribution was $4,700. If we look at the other end of the scale, 3.7 per cent of those who earn from $5,000 to $10,000 contributed to RRSPs. Let us take a look at the middle incomes, $30,000 to $40,000. The proportion of tax filers who contributed to RRSPs in that tax bracket was 40.4 per cent, contributing an average contribution of $2,480. The maximum in 1987, of course, had just gone up to $7,500, so that is well below the average. It is apparent that these people are not going to be able to afford to use the seven-year carry-forward.

There are other problems in this bill. This is a complex bill and I do not pretend to totally understand everything about it. I do not pretend to know all there is to know about Registered Retirement Savings Plans as I am sure the Minister of Finance, who is working in this area constantly, would not claim to know everything about it.

The minister points out that the government is trying to cover loopholes. That could well be, but I am sure the minister knows as well as most lawyers, that as soon as you change any legislation there are minds out there that are quick and sly like the fox, able to ferret out and find loopholes. Being a lawyer I can confirm that every time new legislation comes up it leads to a wide range of new technical arguments. The tax area, which is one of the most complex areas of law in Canada, I would suggest, certainly leads to that.

In May of 1988, the joint committee on taxation of the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants called the amendments perhaps the most complicated tax rules ever devised. In order to calculate tax-free Registered Retirement Savings Plan contribution limits for those who are members of retirement savings plans, the legislation establishes a formula. You take the Registered Retirement Savings Plan limit, which is 18 per cent or the dollar maximum, and subtract from it the pension adjustment. In the case of the money purchase plans, the pension adjustment is simply the annual total of the employer-employee contributions. For defined benefit plan members, which are 90 per cent of those covered by private plans, the pension adjustment equals the annual benefit earned multiplied by a factor of nine minus 600. Clear to you, Mr. Speaker? And that is the simple part of it.

I would suggest that because of the complexity of the new rules, most individual taxpayers will no longer be able to calculate their allowable RRSP contribution room. At the beginning of each tax year the federal government will provide to each taxpayer a statement of available RRSP contribution room. To determine this amount, pension plan administrators will be required to submit a detailed report of each plan member's earnings for the year and the amount of the plan member's pension adjustment. Revenue Canada will use this information, based on the previous year's RRSP contributions, to calculate the following year's RRSP contribution.

This situation makes it virtually impossible for individuals to engage in any kind of long-term financial planning. In addition, the rules will make it extremely difficult for small pension plan administrators to function without hiring additional staff solely responsible for pension adjustment reporting.

We are asking the government to take the blinders off, to quit looking through this limited vision tunnel and to look at the broader expanse of where we are going in this society in this country. Let us get some real reform. Let us get proper pension reform so that, as I said earlier, people can feel there is equality and fairness in Canada for all Canadians, regardless of how they have made out income-wise in their younger years, so that they can live adequately in their golden years, with respect and dignity. Let this government hear the people of Canada. Let this government recognize that the future is not in this narrow vein. The future for Canadians, as has been set out by our forefathers, is one of assistance and equality for all.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, the NDP often speak as if there is a huge group of people in this country who make vast amounts of money and are very rich. I would refer him, as a new member, to the income tax statistics. They are exactly the same, percentage-wise, over the years. If a Canadian makes $30,000 total income, not net, that person, in terms of taxpayers, is already just over the 85 percentile. So less than 15 per cent of Canadians make over $30,000 gross income.

If a person's income is $50,000, that person is at 98.15. So less than 1.5 per cent of taxpayers make more than $50,000. That tells you there is not some huge number of vastly rich people out there. We are they. We make $60,000, and we are 99 per cent. Nobody makes more than us. So this whole pension plan is to let people like us take a deduction during our working years and build up a pension. If that does not work we will have to be content with the Canada Pension, for what that is worth, and the Old Age Security and the GIS.

My specific question is this: Is it NDP policy to be opposed to the RRSP? That is a major policy change. I admire them, but I want to be able to go up to the doorsteps and say: "Is it your policy, or is it not"?

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, even though my friend was there, I think what he has emphasized to the people of Canada, what we have been telling them in the House of Commons and what the people of Canada have been telling them ever since I was elected here in 1988 is: "You are listening, but you do not hear". If the hon. member had not only listened but heard, he would have heard me say that it is not the New Democratic Party policy to do away with Registered Retirement Savings Plans.

It is obvious that the hon. member has done exactly what the Minister of Finance has been doing, what the Minister of Employment and Immigration has been doing and what the Prime Minister and his party have done in the free trade debate. They have listened and they have listened well, but just like the dopes that I believe they must be, they have not heard. I would suggest to those members that they should take out the earplugs, open their ears, quit sitting there in their fog and listen to the people of Canada and hear what they are saying.

I would like to turn for a minute to something this hon. member has told us. I think he has made the point very well, that is, this government is controlled by 1.5 per cent of the people of Canada, those higher income earners. It is the other 98.5 per cent to whom this government should start listening. They have been ignored for too long. People can only be pushed so long before they revolt. This government more and more is heading for that revolt.

That is the case not only in taxation but in other areas such as racial discrimination. This polarity is pushing people into economic hardship. As the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair said yesterday in his wonderful speech, this government's policies are causing problems across Canada and it is time that it started hearing the people.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, on rising to speak in opposition to Bill C-52, which would raise the limits for RRSP purchases to $15,500 over a five-year period, I could not help but think that politics is about making choices.

We are constantly lectured by people on the other side that we on this side of the House do not give a damn about debt, do not give a damn about deficits. That is not true. If anything points out the reality, if there is anything in this House which does not take deficits and debt seriously, it is this bill proposed by that bunch over there.

What is the impact of this legislation in terms of cost? Currently tax assistance for retirement savings costs the federal treasury an estimated $5 billion to $6 billion each year in foregone tax revenues. This new legislation will cost an additional $300 million to $350 million in 1991-1992 alone. That does not seem like a lot of money to some people in accordance with the size of the entire federal budget. However, to give an example, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety is being junked by this government to save $10 million a year. That serves millions of working Canadians and their employers and is one thing that this government is shoving into the garbage can, along with the lives of thousands of Canadian workers, all for a measly $10 million, while here it gives $300 million to $350 million a year to people in our income category who do not really need the extra help.

Politics is about making choices. The title underneath this bill should be a paraphrase of the old quotation that the law in all its majestic equality provides that rich and poor alike may put $15,000 a year into RRSPs in order to avoid paying taxes. That would be just as hypocritical as the original saying that rich and poor alike are forbidden to sleep under bridges. It is exactly the same message.

This government is scrapping the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety to save $10 million a year. It has, to save some $500 million to $600 million a year, just about double what it is throwing away by this mechanism, ditched a rail system from one end of the country to the other. This has ended up effectively isolating many small resource communities in areas that do not have other effective means of transportation. Despite what the government says about some of those communities, they do not.

The government would not listen. It said that we have got to save the money. Yet here it is giving away half that amount of money because people in our income categories need its help so much. Like hell we do. We don't need that kind of help.

At the same time the government has sabotaged the UIC system to increase premiums for employers, whether or not they are making a profit, and employees alike, supposedly to save money, thereby creating another total aberration and turning upside down any idea of a progressive tax system. Withdrawing any support of the UIC system from general revenue has removed any incumbency upon the government to keep employment levels high and removed the incentive to keep employment levels high, because the government wants to save money. And then it gives away $300 million or $350 million a year to people like us who do not really need the additional help.

There is one last thing I want to mention because it really draws some of the priorities of this government into question. The government has recently imposed increases in municipal radio licence fees from one end of the country to the other.

In my community alone volunteers in fire departments and individuals who sacrifice a lot of their time, money and effort in order to provide emergency services to their neighbours find that their municipal, regional or county governments are being slapped with increased radio licence fees to provide for those basic emergency services that are health providing and life saving.

For a small community like my own in Nelson, British Columbia, that increase is 1,200 per cent this year. For the city of Trail, it is a 970 per cent increase in those radio licence fees. For the regional district of Kootenay boundary, it is a 1,789 per cent increase.

It is not enough for people on the government side to say: "Oh yes, but we have to encourage people to save a little more". Politics is about making choices. The government is constantly preaching that. This is one of the choices it has made.

The government has said that those who provide basic emergency services in local communities can go out and hang themselves. They do not count. They can pay extra. It is telling the workers and small employers of Canada who need information on health and safety that their problems are not important, that they ought to pay for their own health services and for their own health information.

The government is telling the unemployed and small employers across the country that they can afford to pay more in UIC premiums, and that people in our income category can have extra incentives to help ourselves at the expense of the general public.

I for one cannot buy that that is an intelligent political choice, a rational political choice or a moral political choice. It is immoral, it is impractical and it is wrong. Members opposite are making the wrong choices. We believe that there are better choices in maintaining and building an improved public pension system in Canada.

We are not talking about scrapping RRSPs. They are now an integrated part of the Canadian pension system, and it is appropriate, but the extent to which the government is going to increase their availability is damaging. Many people within the pension and insurance industry are telling them and have told them that they are damaging the very public and private pension system in this country upon which thousands and millions of ordinary Canadians depend.

Their choice is wrong. It is wrong headed. It is immoral. That is why we oppose this bill. I would ask members opposite to remember why they are here, who they ought to be representing, and vote accordingly.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the member. In 1983 Doug Frith was the chairman of a task force that looked very extensively at pension review. Would the hon. member let us know what aspects of this bill are in accord with the recommendations of the Frith commission and which ones are not?

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I was here in 1983. A number of years has gone by since, including four years off for good behaviour during which time I had other priorities.

I am afraid I cannot recall the provisions of Mr. Frith's proposals in order to be able to answer the question clearly as to whether or not this falls within that ambit.

Mr. Peterson: I suffered the same fate for four years.

It dealt with the portability of pensions. It dealt with the indexing of pensions. It dealt with tax credits for pensions, particularly for the low income pensioner. Were any of these provisions included in this bill?

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, from my perusal of this bill the answer would be no.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I find it odd that we should be debating this bill. That is to say I find it odd that this measure should have been a priority of the government, when I remember the Conservatives in opposition making political careers, some of them, out of promising various groups of pensioners in Canada that once they came to power they would address the needs that had gone unmet under a Liberal administration.

The group of pensioners that I am thinking of in particular, probably because I have so many of them in my riding—indeed, I probably have more of them than any other member of Parliament, I would be willing to bet—is CN pensioners. Perhaps some of them now live in the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. I know some of them like to migrate out there in order to escape Winnipeg weather.

The fact remains that many promises were made to the CN pensioners by the Conservatives leading up to the election of 1984. The only thing that happened was that in the early years of the last Parliament in 1985 there was a special subcommittee which concerned itself with CN pensions. It made a number of recommendations. The report as a whole was not exactly what the various CN pensioners associations and advocates like Earl White and others wanted. Nevertheless had the recommendations been approved it would have been an improvement on the situation.

It is now six years since 1984 and not a blessed thing has been done about CN pensions. We do not even hear anything about it any more. It is like it is a dead issue, something that belongs to prehistoric political time. It is not because CN pensioners are all gone. They are still out there watching their pension incomes, their retirement incomes, progressively decline because their pensions are not indexed.

This problem is understandably more severe for those who retired a long time ago and whose retirement incomes have been progressively eroded by inflation and the rising cost of living. Yet nothing is done for these folks, unless one is able to imagine that the majority of people on CN pensions are in the category of people who would be able to take advantage of the increase provided in this bill vis-à-vis money that may be used for RRSP purposes.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, there are very few CN pensioners in my riding—in fact it would be difficult to find any—who would say: "Oh, boy, I can put up to $15,000 a year now in RRSPs, so I don't have to worry that there is no improvement in the CN pension plan and that the Conservatives haven't lived up to their promises to CN pensioners. I can now take advantage of the provisions in this particular bill".

You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that those kinds of CN pensioners do not exist. They are only a representative sample of many other working people who have worked for other companies, private or public, and who have pension plans that need to be improved and also need to incorporate indexing which has not happened to date.

The government has not moved on that broad front of pension reform on which, I must say, in the early eighties there seemed to be some momentum toward doing. We had the report of the task force mentioned by a member just a few minutes ago. Doug Frith, the former member for Sudbury, was the chairman of that task force. We had a number of other commissions and task forces. In fact, we were buried in these kinds of reports and analyses. A great deal of good work was done at that time by one of our own colleagues, the hon. member for Beaches.

It seemed that we were at the point where we were going to have some genuine pension reform and that some of the problems that had been accumulating and worsening in the seventies and early eighties were going to be addressed. Then what happened? It is clear what happened. The Tories were elected in 1984. They made Liberal stagnation with respect to pension income look like movement.

The whole question of pension reform simply dropped into the political Bermuda Triangle called the Tory right wing agenda. Never again did we hear anything about comprehensive pension reform. Never again after the subcommittee report on CN pensions did we hear anything about reforming the CN pension plan or any other pension plan of that sort.

Instead, we had the Minister of Finance saying things like: "The problem with Canada is that we do not have enough rich people". Do you remember when he said that, Mr. Speaker? It is not that we have too many poor people. It is not that we have a massive problem with child poverty. It is not that we have the feminization of poverty in elder years with respect to elderly women. It is not that any of the problems that have been pointed out by so many people with respect to the problems of ordinary Canadians are our greatest problems.

No, as far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, the problem with Canada is that we do not have enough rich people. I will never forget what I think was the most revealing moment, the moment that in a way will never leave me.

I saw clearly into the consciousness of the collective Conservative mind, and it was a dark thing to behold. It was the night of the first budget of this particular government when the Minister of Finance announced the $500,000 lifetime capital gains exemption. For the first time that evening all members of the government rose as one and gave the Minister of Finance a standing ovation because he had finally done the thing that would be so beneficial to the kinds of people who really run the Conservative Party.

I did not see any standing ovation in Transcona. I do not know anybody that was yearning, that felt punished by the fact that there was not a $500,000 lifetime capital gains exemption.

Mr. McKnight: Check with the member for Humboldt—Lake Centre.

Mr. Blaikie: There is no one there who would be in a position to benefit from such a measure. Yet that was the high point for the Conservatives.

The member for Kindersley—Lloydminster brings up the old Conservative bug-a-boo about capital gains with respect to farmland. He knows, as well as I do, that we have always said that that falls into a different category.

Mr. McKnight: How is that different?

Mr. Blaikie: But the Conservatives make no distinction between that and flipping condos in Florida, which is regarded by Conservatives as useful economic activity. When humans are at their best is when they are flipping condos in Florida and making money without doing a damn thing. That is what Conservatives live for.

Ordinary folk who are working eight hours a day, nine to five, doing the things that make the world go around, do not count. It is the people who are flipping condos in Florida and making big money. They are the people who have to be protected by capital gains tax exemptions. They are the people who have to be protected so that they can take what they make and put it away in expanded RRSPs. They are the people who have to be protected by the whole tax system. That is why we have a deficit in this country. It is not because of social spending or health care or education. It is because that for too long the whole tax system has been a big scam. The real impact of RRSPs, if you ask me, Mr. Speaker, has been to cut elements of the middle class in on the scam and, in so doing, hopefully silence them about the whole system. The problem with the deficit is tax expenditures, not government spending.

When I was elected in 1979 the Conservatives, under the right hon. member for Yellowhead who had the integrity to live up to one of the promises made by his party, released what was called a tax expenditure account. In that the government did what many people have been requesting for years. They said it is not just a question of taxes collected and money spent. There is also this third element, this unseen element in our finances. It is what money is out there that we could have collected, but we did not what is technically called tax the expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, you remember; you were there. The Conservatives brought out this tax expenditure account, to their credit. The tax expenditure account, if I remember correctly, for that year showed that in that year the Government of Canada forfeited in the form of tax expenditures $32 billion. In that same year the deficit was $14 billion.

In that same year, when people were hysterical about the deficit even then, the fact remained that what the government did not collect in the form of tax expenditures was more than twice the annual deficit. It is not to say that all tax expenditures are wrong. For instance, the child tax credit is not. This is not a blanket condemnation of all tax expenditures.

But we know that many of those tax expenditures have taken the form of various kinds of incentives for business. At that time there was a lot of money being spent in terms of super depletion allowances, depletion allowances, write-offs, you name it, in the north to get oil companies to go around making the Arctic look like a pin cushion. They were getting $1.10 for every dollar that they spent. They could not lose, whether they ever discovered any oil or not.

Those kinds of things continue. A Conservative government might come along and clean up a few things that the Liberals were doing, but with the other hand it would create other opportunities for the corporate community to farm the tax system, to farm the taxpayers' pockets, to farm the pockets of ordinary Canadians so that their position, whether it be individual or corporate, could be enhanced.

What are we faced with? At the same time as the government is enhancing a provision that already costs the government $5 billion to $6 billion a year, ordinary Canadians, like a lot of the CN pensioners in my riding, cannot even get to their cottages any more because they cut the train. Ordinary folk cannot take the train any more because even on the trains that are left the fares have sky-rocketed.

All this is done in the name of fiscal restraint, while with the other hand we need to make life a little easier for those who might have $15,000 to put aside in an RRSP. It makes you want to puke, Mr. Speaker. It absolutely makes you want to puke when you think about the priorities of this government.

What are we going to see in the budget because the government has to give away more money in the form of RRSPs? We are going to see, we are told but we hope not, cut-backs to Established Programs Financing, transfers to the provinces, which are transferred to the provinces for the financing of health care and post-secondary education. The health care system is already strained to the absolute limit. The federal government is being criminally irresponsible with the medicare system by constantly, budget after budget, unilateral decision after unilateral decision, putting more and more of the burden on to the provinces. At some point the system will break. It will be these same people the government likes to cater to through the tax system who will be the first ones to call for a private health care system alongside the public health care system.

Who will be on the losing end of that? It will be the people who will have to use the public health care system, the people who do not qualify for RRSPs, the people who like to use the trains, the people who are not part of all the frequent flyer clubs with everybody going back and forth to Singapore and everywhere else because they are part of the aircraft culture that leaves people who use trains in a hole somewhere.

They ask what this is all about. It is a totally misguided and immoral direction that this government is taking the whole country in and the middle class, what is left of it, will be eliminated. The upper middle class might survive, but the middle class will be eliminated. We will all be running around cutting each other's throats for jobs that are paying less and less.

The kind of people that this country has been built on—decent, hard working, honest, organized people—who have managed to make a good living because they have strong trade unions and have worked in traditional industries actually producing something, are the people who are on the hit list of this government. These are the people who have to disappear because of international competitiveness and because of the free trade agreement, because of privatization and all of the other things that this government has visited on the Canadian people like an affliction. It is similar to the way the Egyptians were afflicted with the seven plagues. We have been afflicted as a country with the various plagues that this government has brought down on us.

Just the other day I learned that Varda Batteries, a company in Winnipeg, was closed down because Investment Canada approved its purchase by an American company. Five days after the purchase was approved the battery plant shut down. That is what I call real good policy on the part of the Conservative government.

The other day I heard that Air Canada, now privatized, is going to contract out its commissary services, its food service industry. The jobs of 450 people are threatened because Air Canada has to be like everybody else. They have to contract out here, contract out there, and contract our there.

Do you know what it is, Mr. Speaker? It is all just union busting. It is nothing else other than union busting, taking people who have been able to make a decent living because they have been paid a decent wage and putting them in a position where they go from $12 to $6 an hour or $18 to $9 an hour, or whatever the case may be, and that is called progress. We in this party call it despicable.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentioned the seven plagues in Egypt. I thought that the Conservative attitude was much more that they expect the taxpayer to be like Job and suffer repeated humiliations.

I want to ask about RRSPs as they relate to capital investment funds. I wonder whether one of the motivations behind this move is not that the Conservatives have been told by their friends in the investment business, particularly those in mutual funds, life insurance, and all those types of financial organizations that are using the pools of RRSP money for their investment purposes, to make sure that there is this pool of investment. The person gets such a great tax benefit from it. It gives all this amount of captured money which can then be spent in investment. This is opposed to what they really should be doing, which is to increase dramatically the contributions to the Canada Assistance Plan. That would, then, give the government a pool of money it could use for capital investments which would benefit all Canadians, not just the ones who had control over pools of capital investment.

I remember talking with a person in the life insurance industry. We were talking about private life insurance programs, many of which are pawned off as pension plans by the private industry, and the business about the Canada Assistance Plan. He said: "They are going to make sure the Canada Assistance Plan is never going to be adequate, because if it is it would mean the death of private pension funds, life insurance programs and that they could not raise the money to liquidate if they had to".

I am wondering if the hon. member has any comments as to how much of this is part of a structure simply to make sure that mutual funds and other life insurance companies, particularly American ones, have an adequate pool of investment capital at their disposal.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member points out is that this is part of an ongoing struggle between those who would like to see investment decisions in Canada be part of a larger public decision–making process and those who feel that investment decisions are purely a private matter that should be in the hands of insurance companies or the corporations, or whatever. That is why there is so much resistance to accumulation in the public sector of funds that might actually be used in some intelligent way, according to some rational plan about what the Canadian economy might look like.

They hold to the view that the best form of plan is no plan at all, that all the random individual and corporate decisions are cumulatively the invisible hand of Adam Smith which will look after everyone in the final analysis.

Tell that to the thousands of homeless in Canada. Tell them that Adam Smith's invisible hand has looked after them.

Tell that to the hundreds of thousands of children in this country who are in poverty. Tell them that Adam Smith's invisible hand has looked after them. It has not been an invisible hand; it has been a mailed fist.

One of the things that has always amused me with respect to investment capital is many of the countries which free enterprisers across the way have always held up as examples of economic productivity. I would not want to hold them up that way, because I have other criticisms to make of them.

Take Japan, for instance. One of the reasons it has been as successful as it has is that it has influenced investment, because there has been a political will on the part of government to make collective decisions about investment vis-à-vis a long range plan for the country. What happened in Japan in the last 30 or 40 years was not the result of a whole bunch of individual investment decisions. It was the result of government influencing investment decisions.

In Canada this has always been regarded as Communist or Bolshevik, or whatever. That is why in both Canada and the United States we are going down the tubes economically because we do not have the political will to have an industrial strategy, or even a post-industrial strategy, or any strategy at all like they have in Europe or Japan or in other places. We are going to pay a price for not having that political will.

We have tied ourselves to a falling star called the United States of America, which has even less political will to have such a strategy. Until the people of Canada say to the Canadian government that they want some sort of political accountability for investment decisions, we are going to continue to have the kind of problems we have and the kind of pension system we have.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, it was interesting to hear the speech of my hon. friend from Winnipeg—Transcona and hear the more particularized aspect of some of the other things. When I spoke, I spoke on a more broad perspective. I would like to refer briefly to the hon. member's comments about CN pensions and the particularization of that. I note that two members from our party, the member for Burnaby—Kingsway and the member for Nickel Belt have not forgotten, as the government has, about CN pensions and the problems with them. I point out and ask for the comments of my friend as to whether the following motion put forward as Motion No. 427 by the member for Burnaby—Kingsway would do something toward fixing the ills this government has been ignoring in so far as CN pensions are concerned for the last six years. The motion states, in part:

> —the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation concerning the pension fund of Canadian National Railway, which:
> (1) would provide that pensions be indexed to the extent that such indexation is actuarially viable with the funds that have been paid into the plan, the unfunded liabilities of the company, and the funds that are being paid into the plan on a current basis; and that, in any event, the minimum indexation to be paid should be indexation to the consumer price index commencing on the retirement date of each pensioner, including those currently receiving pensions; and
> (2) would provide that excess earnings on money contributed by employees and former employees must be distributed on an equitable basis to employees and further employees only, and not go into corporate coffers.

Would this go some way in assisting my friend?

• (1730)

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, it certainly would. What the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen has outlined, as part of a motion submitted by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, is precisely the kind of measure that the government should be taking in respect of CN pensioners and also with respect to many other pensioners.

Here we are again talking about people who can take advantage of this expanded RRSP limit. If they have $15,000 a year they can put it in an RRSP. Yet all the employees of Route Canada ended up with no pension at all. No pension at all, after some of them having worked 20 years or 30 years, because this government privatized CN Route. It sold it to one of its buddies who turned over some of the assets and made a lot of money in New York somewhere. The people in Transcona and elsewhere in the maritimes who worked for Route Canada were left with absolutely zilch. That is the definition of justice for pensioners that we get from this government.

Looking after pensioners like the people who lost their jobs with Route Canada and looking after the people from CN is the type of action that we need, and it is the kind of action that we have not been getting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): The time for questions and comments has expired.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am not pleased to participate in this debate today, but I feel that I must because there is something very sinister going on in this House today.

I have just come from the Standing Committee on Finance where members of the New Democratic Party said that since most Canadians do not understand the details of the proposed goods and services tax and they cannot get answers when they phone the GST hotline, they thought it was appropriate to travel so people could express their views and ask questions about matters which concern them, whether they be ranchers, community groups, native people, small business organizations or simply individuals. It would appear that the committee is going to say no, that it does not want to have any more input into this. Although 80 per cent of the people are opposed to it, the committee says: "That is okay, we are just going to ram it through the House of Commons by ramming it through the committee first".

That exposes what is really going on in here. The government is of the mood that since it has the majority, in terms of the last federal election, it can do anything it wants and it gives them carte blanche to just do whatever it wants, whenever it wants and in whatever way it wants.

Mr. Speaker, you are sitting in the chair today, and government members largely sit on that side of the House and the opposition members sit on this side of the House. It is a balance, and that is our parliamentary system. The government expresses its views on certain pieces of legislation or motions that it puts before the House. The opposition has an obligation and a responsibility to provide an opposition viewpoint to critique legislation or motions in a positive way or, in some cases, to congratulate the government on certain initiatives and vote with the government to send a message out to the people of Canada, such as the message on linguistic duality. We feel strongly about that. I hope that the motion comes before the House tomorrow and we rally around and say that this is something we believe in, that it is important and we unanimously support this motion. What a wonderful message that will send to people who are perhaps wondering where members of the House stand, where certain political parties stand or where certain individuals stand. We will send a clear message.

We could have a whole list of areas where the government has simply said: "Listen, we are the boss. We are big brother. We know what is best. We know what taxes to introduce. The fact that 85 per cent of people do not agree with the goods and services tax, that is okay. We will just ignore that. We are going to use closure, time allocation, cut off debate and curtail debate because we are the government. We can do anything". Well, we are about to see that that is not the case.

I know the government does not think that that can be done. Let me put the government on notice right now that we believe it can. We believe that when the rights of the opposition are trampled upon and ignored, when the rights of the opposition are simply laughed at by the government, it is going to be in for a major surprise. We will have to wait for a day or two to find out what that surprise is, Mr. Speaker, but I think the government is going to be very surprised that it simply cannot act in this big government way.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, what this goods and services tax is going to mean. Thousands of new tax collectors are going to be hired, not 10, not 100, not 1,000, but thousands. John Bulloch, the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the person who has studied this legislation from one end to another says that probably, in the end, 25,000 new tax collectors will have to be hired. For every tax collector there will have to be secretaries, researchers, filers, and so on, so we are not talking about 25,000, but maybe 50,00 to 70,000 or more bureaucrats, plus their offices, jet fares, and travel allowances. My goodness.

However, this is not a discussion of the goods and services tax. We are discussing something equally silly. Those people who are watching on television, whose incomes are $85,000 or more annually, are sitting on the edges of their chairs because this legislation is for them.

If you are an ordinary working person, retired person, or a person on an old age or disability pension, this is not for you. This is for an upper income earner in our country. If your income is in the $85,000 bracket, finally you have some good legislation coming your way, because who is going to benefit from this? When you look through the list, the main beneficiary are those folks who are providing for their retirement whose incomes are $86,111.

When I think of all the letters I get from people who are concerned about their pension incomes, I hardly get any letters from people whose incomes are $86,000 plus a year who are worrying about their pension. As a matter of fact, I do not know if I get any letters. I do get a lot of letters from people who are unable to live a dignified life on their existing pensions. I am serious. I get a lot of letters. I am sure all my colleagues in the House get letters from people living in major metropolitan areas whose only income is Canada Pension and the OAS and who just cannot get by. They have to rely on other sources of income, relatives, friends, the food banks or thrift houses just to get by.

What does the government do? Do they bring in increases to the old age security? No, no. Do they bring in an enhanced CPP? No, no. Do they bring in more support for people on veterans' pensions and disability pensions? No, no. They want to help those people whose incomes are $85,000 a year so they can provide for their pensions years.

We have got everything really haywire here. On whose side is the government? This is not pension legislation, it is tax legislation. What this is going to do is enable people to avoid paying income tax now, set aside thousands of dollars and the idea is that they pay it later. Mr. Speaker, you and I know that that is not necessarily the case, because later means that you will be paying it at a much lower rate. Many people, particularly those people whom this legislation is aimed at, will move to a tax haven in their retirement years. They will move to one of the Caribbean Islands where they do not have to pay income tax. They take their money and they do not pay taxes on it there. The old argument that they would eventually pay tax does not hold water. For some, yes, but for many that is not the case.

What does this legislation do for the problems of portability of pensions? Absolutely nothing. What does it do for the 90 per cent of people on private pension plans with no indexation to combat increasing inflation? Absolutely nothing. What does it do to for people who have been waiting years and years for homemakers' pensions? Nothing. There is no mention of homemakers' pensions for those who stay home to care for an ailing family member or relative or a disabled person in their home. There is no concern for those people who need a homemaker's pension. However, for those people watching whose incomes are in excess of $86,000, this is for you. This is the government's pension scheme for you, because presumably those people are in desperate need.

This is going to cost the government millions of dollars. We do not know exactly how many hundreds of millions. What I have here in terms of some of the early analysis is that somewhere between $300 and $350 million will be lost next year. In other words, these people are not going to pay taxes. If they do not pay their fair share, we know who is going to be paying more than they should. It is the ordinary working people of the country. The small business people and the farmers will be paying more than they should. This is really a tax dodge in many respects for upper-income people. We are going to lose from the federal treasury about $300 or $350 million a year.

If we are going to wilfully lose that, rather than give it to those whose incomes are in excess of $86,000, it would enable the government to give a $30 a month increase to the 600,000 elderly single women who have no other source of income and who are now living below the poverty line. Is that not interesting? If the government would amend this legislation, we could assist 600,000 elderly single women who are living below the poverty line by giving them an extra $30 a month. Perhaps to many people that does not sound like a lot of money, but for a single elderly woman living below the poverty line an extra $30 a month would go a long way. The government states that we cannot afford that. We cannot afford to consider a homemaker's pension. We cannot afford to look at portability. We have to help these people in the upper income brackets. That is what the Conservative government does.

There is another creeping bit of hypocrisy in this. I remember the Minister of Finance standing up not long ago saying: "Listen, you know those wealthy people who presently get pensions, we should get some of that back. They do not need the pension." So the government introduced legislation that the Minister of Finance called clawback legislation. I thought that was an appropriate name. If you earn a certain income and receive the old age security, the government claws back either all of it or part of it. In other words, the government said that upper income people do not need any pension plans, they can deal with it on their own.

Then along comes Bill C-52 which states that people in the upper income brackets need help, they need to have tax incentives to provide for their retirement years. There seem to be some double standards and a certain amount of speaking out of one side of your mouth one day and the other side another day. There does not seem to be any consistency here, unless the government is trying to fool people into thinking that they are actually doing something worth while.

I have been sitting here for a long time listening to the Conservative members explain one aspect of this legislation. Today, if your income is $20,000 and you want to set aside money to contribute to an RRSP, you can set aside $4,000, if you have the $4,000. However, in 1995 when this legislation kicks in at the most advantageous level, if your income is $20,000 you cannot contribute $4,000. You can contribute only $3,600. In other words, if you earn $20,000 this legislation is going to penalize you in terms of RRSP accessibility. It penalizes people at the low income level, while at the same time at the upper income level one can now contribute $7,500 and in 1995 will be able to contribute $15,500. The lower income earner is going to be penalized by this RSP legislation.

I have been listening carefully to hear from hon. members why the government is doing this and so far I have not heard any reasonable explanation. It puzzles me why we would be making it more difficult for low income people to set aside money via the RRSP programs.

There are whole other sets of reasons here that various researchers have indicated why this is bad legislation. My colleagues before me have explained that at some time, but perhaps I should mention one small thing. I notice my good friend from Toronto is here. He has been a good friend for many years. He gave a very elegant and eloquent speech against this particular initiative. As a matter of fact, it was one of the better speeches I have heard and I applaud him for those remarks.

However, I want to remind my hon. friend that I remember in 1984, and I am sure he does too, that there was a Liberal government at that time. Marc Lalonde was the Minister of Finance. He said that we have to help these upper income people save for their retirement years. We have to bring in changes to the RRSP.

In the Liberals' green paper on pension reform of 1982 they recommended what we are essentially doing here in Bill C–52. In 1984 the Liberal government introduced legislation that was essentially the same as what we have here today. Even my friends opposite on the Conservative benches went on for days and days against this Draconian measure that was helping the most privileged in the country at the expense of those at the low income level.

At that time the Liberals thought this was great legislation. We have now flipped across the way and the roles are reversed. We now have my hon. friend articulating very well all of the down sides of this legislation and wondering why on earth why the government would do this, and those members now on the government espousing the advantages and the need to help those in the upper income brackets with their pension savings.

I mention as a point of interest more than anything how people can change their views on things whether they are on the opposition benches or the government benches.

Let me summarize by suggesting that this legislation is not going to help many people at all. As a matter of fact, only a certain portion of Canadians take advantage of RRSPs. Today, 20 per cent of Canadians use the RRSP in terms of a method of postponing paying taxes and/or providing money for retirement years later. Naturally, this is largely a result of the tax planning of people in the middle or upper income brackets.

When one looks at the number of people in the very low income brackets who file for RRSPs, less than 1 per cent actually file RRSPs, virtually no one. When one gets up into $50,000 and plus incomes, the number of tax filers contributing to RRSPs is nearly 60 per cent. In other words, the overwhelming majority of people in those brackets find that to be a useful way to defer taxes to some time later, if at all.

Let us recognize what we are doing. The government is asking us to pass legislation that will benefit those in the upper income brackets. It will cost the federal government about $350 million a year in lost taxes and this is all happening on the eve of the budget. People are fanning out across the country to try to put a certain spin on the public mindset about what is going to happen. They are saying that the deficit is too large and we must curtail a whole variety of social programs.

One of the toughest days I have had lately was in my hometown of Kamloops. The Y in that community asked the federal government for support to enlarge and expand the women's shelter in our community. There was a long list of people requiring shelter because of various forms of abuse. I do not want to go into the details, but it is a very tragic situation. The government said it was sorry, but it does not have any money, those hundreds of women and those hundreds of families each year will just have to be on their own and find some way to deal with their very serious abuse problems.

All that was sad, Mr. Speaker, but I find it rather odd if you cannot have a few thousand dollars to help a community group establish a women's shelter in the community of Kamloops, and the same argument could be made in many communities across Canada, and in the same breath say that we are prepared to forgo $350 million in income because of the changes to the RSP program to help those people in the upper income brackets. I just find it rather disgusting. If people knew this and understood what is going on, I do not think they would feel good about this at all. This is the kind of thing that makes the people of Canada curious about what this government is doing.

On the one hand it seems to be trying to curtail expenditures and on the other hand providing handouts and financial bonanzas to a very select, privileged few in our society. I guess, without being simplistic, Mr. Speaker, that is what one would expect from the Conservative government. That seems to be the basic theme that one hears whenever there is a Conservative government in office.

In conclusion, there is no question that we have been taxed too much. This last year has seen the thirty-second tax increase initiated by this federal government. In other words, in five short years this government has increased taxes 32 different times with the GST.

When people write to me they say that we cannot take it any longer, we pay so much tax. The government slaps another one on, and 32 tax increases in five years is too much. I just want to make the point that there have been 32 tax increases in the mandate of this government to date. I cannot imagine what the mandate is going to result in if we have another two or three years of this government left. In conclusion, let me say that I am against this RSP legislation.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, just a quick comment and a question for my colleague from Kamloops. He is probably aware that in response to our allegation that this will cost some $300 or $350 million a year in terms of loss to the public treasury, which could be used in alternate programs, the government has suggested that that is not really accurate. That has not been suggested today because government members are noticeably absent from this debate this afternoon, as is the Official Opposition, but they have said on other occasions that this will be mitigated in part at least by the fact that it will plug up some of the loopholes in the system.

When I heard that I could not help but think of an old Donald Duck or Goofy cartoon that I read when I was just a little tyke about three feet tall. Donald Duck or Goofy was out in a boat on the lake and it had a leak in the bow. He thought he could stop the boat from sinking by chopping a big hole in the stern and letting the water that was coming in in the bow out the aft end, but it did not work. A government that says it is as concerned about deficits as this one is going to find out that chopping another hole in the other end of the boat does not work either.

My colleague may also be aware that Frank Speed, vice-president of the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association states: "The new tax rules with their pension adjustments and pension adjustment reversals seem likely to be another administrative nightmare that will squeeze more pension plans out of the system."

Also, in May 1988 the joint committee on taxation of the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants called the amendments: "Perhaps the most complicated tax rules ever devised."

It seems obvious to me at least that if you are creating that much more gobbledegook and complications around the tax system, with any loopholes you are plugging on the one hand you are probably kicking more holes in the system on the other. My recollection is, and perhaps my colleague from Kamloops will clarify it for me, that this is the same party that said in 1984 and in years before and since that one of their major crusades was to simplify the tax system.

The question I want to ask my colleague is in light of both of these, does he think that the members opposite simply do not care about tax simplification? Were they not telling the truth at that time, do they not care about debt reduction or are they just misled?

Mr. Riis: There are a lot of questions in there, Mr. Speaker, from my hon. friend for Kootenay West—Revelstoke. Let me begin with his reference to the fact that there were no Conservative members speaking on this RRSP legislation. I am dismayed and a bit disappointed in that because I would have liked to have heard their explanations, particularly because of the fact that those in the $20,000 bracket will actually lose as a result of this legislation in terms of the amount of money they can set aside for their pension years.

I am not surprised, but I do hope when we pick up this debate first thing in the morning that we will hear a number of Conservative members. If nothing else, I can ask them some questions. It is hard to get at the people over there when nobody speaks.

With reference to the complicated tax rules, I tried to make the point that with 4,000 new tax collectors, and perhaps that will be up to 6,000 or 7,000 with all of the other people, it is going to be a red tape nightmare that will descend on this country and on an already over-complicated tax system. This is tax filing time. I sat down to begin the process the other day and got totally depressed. I do not know if anybody has started their tax filing yet. I try to do it without an accountant and I blow it every year. I end up going to the accountants. I just cannot do it myself.

Going back to the question, is the Conservative government serious about deficit reduction? My hon. friend, who is the chairman of the finance committee, was here a moment ago and I see one of his colleagues from Edmonton is with him. Perhaps we can set aside some time in the finance committee to go through all the corporate tax expenditures and evaluate those expenditures on a profit and loss basis to see if we get the financial bang for those bucks that we lose. In those cases where we do, we can even enhance some of those tax exemptions. On the other hand, if we cannot demonstrate clearly that we are not getting good return for that tax loss, then we should shelve the whole thing. We have got to go through that step by step because if we do that, I think people in the country will have a lot more faith in some of the cuts that are being touted by the government.

Until we go through that process, and all the people of Canada know that there are literally billions of dollars, not millions but billions of dollars lost every year to the federal treasury because of corporate tax exemptions and various other exemptions, and I am just talking about the corporate taxes because that is where the big losses are, there will never be support for any tax reform in this country because they know who is going to lose and who is going to gain.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kempling): Order please. It being six o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24 (1).

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay upon the table the report of the Parliamentary Librarian for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1989.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

STATUTES OF CANADA

TABLING OF PROPOSALS AND REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a copy of the government's proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, certain archaisms and errors, and to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Statutes of Canada.

There have been consultations among the parties and I think you will find, Mr. Speaker, that there is the traditional unanimous consent to refer this draft bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in giving the unanimous consent of the opposition to this matter, I would like to make one brief point, if I may.

A number of the amendments contained within the bill are amendments which have come to the House from the Joint Standing Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations. I was a former chairman of that committee, and it is my hope that the government will consider enlarging the criteria that are used in agglomerating amendments inside that bill.

I consider it a very useful device for achieving necessary changes in the laws of Canada of a non-controversial nature and also reflecting legal advice and second thoughts about certain clauses of the legislation. I have always regretted that the miscellaneous amending process is not used more openly and more generously than it is.

I am offering my consent to seeing this bill referred. I think it is a very useful decision. I am looking forward to the work of the committee.

I hope that the government will review, and I regret not seeing the minister nodding, but I hope he will at least think about a process to be developed whereby more advice can be taken more directly from this all-party committee, which is usually unanimous and which makes recommendations for amendments which sometimes take years instead of months to find their way into miscellaneous amending packages.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise just briefly to indicate that certainly we agree with this process. This is the traditional method of proceeding with these amendments.

I wish to urge the government to continue a process which it started in this miscellaneous statutes amendments process, that is, to ensure that all statutes in Canada use non-sexist language. This is an area in which the government has been moving, but there are certainly far too many statutes which reflect sexist language. Hopefully, this process of statutory amendment is one of the means that can be used to make those important changes.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the proposition of the Minister of Justice. There seems to be consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Speaker: Statements by Ministers.

THE FLAG

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, under Statements by Ministers, I want to ask the government House Leader a question.

This is the twenty-fifth anniversary of our flag, a flag of which we are all proud, a flag which represents the compassionate tolerance, political, social, religious and economic freedoms that we have come to enjoy in our country.

I would assume that someone from the government would want to speak on this today, recognizing that during the flag debate itself there were 180 speeches against the flag given by Conservative members over a seven-month period. After 180 speeches, most of which were 40 minutes in duration, the government of the day brought in closure to end what was obviously months and months of debate against the flag.

I assume with that interest in the flag, some minister would want to say something about that final vote, particularly in light of the fact that it took seven months of debate before we got to that point.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would tell my hon. friend that he is probably well aware of the fact that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State have arranged a celebration on the front lawn which will enable all Canadians to participate in the twenty-fifth anniversary of the flag.

I note my hon. friend's comments in the spirit of national unity in respect of the flag. I tell him that we did want to do that, but we did not want to do it before the hon. member for Chambly had a chance to give his comments.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, I have had the pleasure of examining the exhibition in the Hall of Honour dedicated to the celebration of this important anniversary of our flag. I feel, as does my friend from the New Democratic Party, that we are witnessing something of a rewrite of history when we consider the enthusiasm with which the entire House greeted the flag 25 years ago in a way which does not correspond with today's reality.

However, no one is more proud of the flag today than the Conservative party and its members, and no one is more proud than the Liberals and the New Democrats. I think those of us who track the Conservative party should recognize that they eventually bring themselves on to the right side of history.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a recommendation to the House dealing with this issue of the twenty-fifth anniversary of our flag.

I think it would be appropriate at three o'clock that we revert back to Statements by Ministers for a statement in the House. We would agree to give unanimous consent to do that if the government feels that this is appropriate today.

Mr. Speaker: It is not the place of the Speaker very often to express a view, except to say this. There is going to be a very significant celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the flag of our country which is going to commence in just a few minutes.

Hon. members will know that I have been invited to take part in that event. I will be speaking along with others. I will have to leave the Chamber, I am sure with your agreement and your encouragement, to take part in that celebration.

Second, those of us who have memories will also understand the necessity, in the interest of that unity which the flag symbolizes, to bear gently in remarks with respect to the long and tumultuous debates that took place. I am sure that all hon. members would want me to keep in mind the sensitivities, the history and also the hopes that were brought about by the acceptance of the distinctive Canadian flag, which I think has been supported over the decades now by the vast majority of Canadians. That is what I am going to be saying in a few minutes on behalf of all hon. members.

A suggestion has been put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

[Translation]

—to revert to Statements by Ministers at three o'clock this afternoon. I would also like to give other members a chance to speak.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I will take the matter under consideration and give it every thought. However, I think it would be more appropriate if we did not have too much of this spur of the moment comment on the floor of the House.

Today we have a very important debate that we want to go forward with on the motion of the Prime Minister. We think it will be a good debate.

I certainly will take the request under advisement and get back to the House.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I like the idea my hon. friend from Ottawa—Vanier has put forward.

When I think through the rest of the day and consider the very important motion and debate which will occur, it seems to me to make perfect sense that at three o'clock we have an opportunity to make comments about the unity that has been created in our country as a result of our flag and all that it symbolizes.

I would say on behalf of the New Democratic Party that we would certainly give our consent to the notion that we might have a minister making a statement and equal responses by representatives of each of the opposition parties.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I listened carefully to what was being said by hon. members, but I think the comment made by the Minister of Justice is well taken.

[English]

I am going to leave it to hon. members to discuss this among themselves. If members have a direction for the Speaker at three o'clock, of course I will accept that direction, keeping in mind the rules that there must be unanimous consent.

Routine Proceedings

BROADCAST OF MEETING OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, this may be the most appropriate time to inform the House that a motion was passed earlier this week vis-à-vis televising the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

Some difficulties arose as to providing appropriate television coverage. I asked the New Democratic Party and the Liberal party to attend with me at the committee prior to the meeting starting.

We discussed the matter with the media and the chairman of the committee. The three parties agreed that the proceedings of the external affairs committee today which will hear from Mr. Shevardnadze of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is so important that it get proper television coverage.

We discussed it with the media. There was an agreement among all three parties that what are called conference rules would be used rather than the perhaps more restrictive rules of the House for televising committees. It was agreed that for this particular event that would be done.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. members in just a moment on this matter.

In view of the fact that your Speaker has been asked to preside over what I think is a significant ceremony in just a few minutes, I would ask your indulgence to excuse me for the ceremony with respect to the twenty-fifth anniversary of our flag. I will ask my colleague to take the Chair.

• (1120)

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief comment to make on the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade being authorized by all parties to televise its proceedings today.

I just want to ask this. Perhaps the House of Commons facilities for televising our proceedings could be equipped in the future to televise committees rather than depend upon ad hoc arrangements on the day that it happens. I think it would be appropriate that we look into this to make sure that we do have the equipment, the necessary logistics and the technical requirements to cope with the increasing need to televise committee proceedings.

This morning I have to agree that, indeed, if we had proceeded as agreed it would have been very restrictive. I am one who believes that we should expand and I would like the government to consider some of the possibilities available to our staff here on the Hill to broadcast these proceedings.

I am just making the point that I do not want this morning to be a precedent, that is that every time we decide to broadcast a committee the House leader and a representative of every party have to go to make sure that everything is in order. I want to make sure that we broadcast in an appropriate manner and in the usual and correct manner.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm the decision by my caucus to allow for the use of conference rules vis-à-vis the televising of the very important occasion in Room 200 of West Block today.

In response to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, I wish to point out that there is a committee report which has yet to be considered by this House which concerns this very point. I refer to the very important report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business vis-à-vis televising and the rules of televising not just this House but the hearings of committees.

I think it would be appropriate in the very near future for the House to be seized of this report in order to give consideration to it. I would encourage the approval of it.

In the meantime, the decision that we took today and the fact that we are ensuring that there is a record of it is not to be seen as a precedent for future coverage on future occasions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to add that it would be a good topic for the internal economy committee to discuss further.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, to return to a subject not yet entirely forgotten, at least not by the people of Canada, I would like to present three petitions featuring the signatures of a total of 332 people.

These people are calling on the government to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network—I should point out that when these petitions were signed the national network was somewhat larger than it is now—to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

A good 200 of these signatures were collected from passengers on one of the supercontinental trains last fall.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present petitions against the goods and services tax primarily from students from Clearwater High School, Barrier High School, Logan Lake High School, Kamloops High School, North Kamloops High School, Westside High School and Chase High School who point out the unfair nature of the goods and services tax as is presented. They point out that there will be a tax on reading material for the first time in our history, as well as taxes on a variety of other areas of interest to students, namely, the renting of videos, buying records, concert tickets and the like.

The petitioners ask that the government reconsider its decision to proceed and that it go back to the drawing-board and attempt real fair tax reform as opposed to proceeding with the 7 per cent goods and services tax.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition that rejects the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Your petitioners, who represent the isolated community of Lebel-sur-Quévillon in the Abitibi region, believe that although isolation is mainly a psychological factor, it can nevertheless be expressed in dollars and cents. No library, no movie theatre, no exhibition hall, no swimming pool, no art gallery, no velodrome, no subway, and so forth.

Mr. Speaker, the residents of Lebel-sur-Quévillon believe that the task force failed to allow for the realities of life in the North and the near North in Abitibi.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from the citizens of Red Rock, Ontario, a small community in my riding, about 50 miles east of the city of Thunder Bay. They to a person oppose this government's imposition of a goods and services tax upon this community. They pray that this government reconsider its position and do away with the goods and services tax.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by hundreds of residents of my constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway expressing their concern about the proposed goods and services tax.

They point out that it is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for a taxpayer's ability to pay. They call upon the government to bring in tax reform that would ensure that those who are in a position to pay, including the corporate sector and upper-income earners, pay their fair share. They point out that the government is now trying to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels.

Therefore they strongly urge the government to cease the current proposal for a goods and services tax which would in fact shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

I might note that this particular petition is signed by hundreds of bowlers from my constituency who have expressed serious concern about the impact of the goods and services tax on bowling in Canada.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present two petitions signed by some 200 residents of Ontario, particularly the communities of St. Thomas and Mississauga, Ontario, which I am sure will cheer the heart of the chairman of the finance committee.

The petitioners point out that the proposed goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for a taxpayer's ability to pay and urge that the House of Commons reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise in the House to present a petition under Standing Order 36 on behalf of the people of the city of Windsor who are appalled by the arrogance of this government and humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition signed by many Canadians who are appalled at the government's proposal to introduce a goods and services tax and who call upon Parliament to reject this proposed goods and services tax which is unfair and discriminatory.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of people in Windsor and London, Ontario who are concerned about the impact of the goods and services tax which will create a burden on themselves and the people in their communities. In particular, Mr. Speaker, I am sure as a former athlete you will realize the impact this measure will have on minor sports, minor hockey, minor football, minor soccer and so on. They reject this tax on that basis.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of constituents from the great riding of Windsor West so ably represented in this House by my very distinguished colleague.

• (1130)

The petitioners are very upset with the GST, the grief and suffering tax of the Government of Canada. They are asking for the intervention of the House of Commons to ensure that this tax does not proceed.

Given that I have now tabled a large number of petitions, I hope I have convinced the government to withdraw the tax immediately.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present on behalf of Canadians who wish to express their opposition to the goods and services tax that the federal government wants to impose on Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to present a petition on behalf of constituents of Burnaby—Kingsway as well as from a number of communities in British Columbia. The petitioners point out that the railway passenger service as carried on by VIA Rail is essential for many—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would request that the next time the hon. member presents petitions, he present both petitions at the same time.

I regret the hon. member's petition has been interrupted. He will have to present it tomorrow or the next time petitions are called.

I want to draw your attention to Question No. 225 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands, because I would like to give a verbal answer to that question.

The question is:

> During the period since January 1, 1989, has the government or any agency thereof retained the services of Mr. Lee Milteer or of Lee Milteer Inc. and, if so (a) at what rate—

The answer is I do not know.

> —(b) for what purpose—

The answer is I do not know.

> —(c) what departments or agencies retained the services?

The answer is I do not know.

I believe this particular question to be a fishing expedition. The hon. member tabled it earlier with the name of Mr. Peter Milteer. When we did investigate a certain amount, we found out that no one knew anything about this individual. The hon. member then changed the name to Mr. Lee Milteer.

The bottom line is that we have to go through some 230 boards, agencies and Crown corporations to try to get this information. If the hon. member would like to be more specific, I can give him more specific answers, but I cannot go on a fishing expedition like this and be expected to complete that plus all the other questions on the Order Paper within the 45-day time limit that has been requested.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary might want to know that the question was put because of information I received that this individual or this corporation had been retained.

The fact that it stated Mr. Peter Milteer on the first occasion it was printed on the Order Paper was an error made by someone in the Journals Branch. I submitted the question with Lee in the name and I think the person who transcribed it for the Order Paper read my signature underneath and mixed up the Lee and the Peter and put it in incorrectly.

It was not my fault. I had nothing to do with it, and the Table is well aware of that fact. As soon as I saw the error on the day it was printed, I went to the Table and indicated it was an error. It was not the question I had submitted. I do not want the hon. member to suggest that I changed it in an effort to go on a fishing expedition. My question was very specific. I am sorry he is unable to answer it. I will endeavour to get more information and file another question on the Order Paper.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I accept that explanation. I certainly was not aware of it. I want to apologize to the hon. member for the implication in my statement. However, my answers do stand for the same reasons as I described. To go after 230 departments and agencies at this point, I think would be a little much.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on a point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have been complaining as of late because of the fact that two questions on the Order Paper standing in my name have not been answered when both of them are well beyond the 45-day period.

I note that the Parliamentary Secretary, I am sure through his very special efforts, did succeed in getting the answer to one of the questions. However, my complaint is still there.

The other question which is dated December 6, as you will obviously recognize since today is February 15, is well beyond the 45 day deadline set by the rules of this House under our Standing Orders. Considering the fact that the question was tabled with the Clerk of the House on December 6, perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary could give us some indication as when the government will attempt to follow the Standing Orders of this House in relation to Question No. 197.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond to the hon. member's concerns, and that is precisely why I have answered Question No. 225 in the manner that I have.

In Question No. 162, which I answered a few moments ago, we were asking officials in several government departments to spend several hours of their time and, therefore, our tax money, to collect and provide critically important information, such as the number of pieces of luggage of each person on this trip, or how much gas was used by the Prime Minister's car. Getting that kind of information from a delegation that involves several people, obviously takes time.

If members insist on asking those kinds of questions and putting them on 45 day time limits, I am going to have difficulty answering them and I will have to revert to the type of answer I have just given to Question No. 225. However, I can assure the Speaker that I will continue to do my best.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On the same point of order, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to start an argument with the hon. member. However, in the case of Question No. 197, which has not yet been answered, I am asking for the names of the notaries and legal agents acting on behalf of the Federal Business Development Bank, the date of their appointments, and how much money they have received from the federal government.

Except for the current year, that information should be available by the government just reviewing the reports of previous years that it tables in the House. The only portion that has to be researched is the present year. The rest should already be available to the government without doing any research.

I will agree that the questions be allowed to stand. But the House should understand that these are rules, they are not merely suggestions for the government to observe if and when it feels like it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

PROCEEDINGS IN COMMITTEE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have received a request for a point of privilege from the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. Does it arise out of what has happened here this morning?

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): No, Mr. Speaker, I need your guidance on a question of privilege relating to a threat to a member. I know that matters of committee cannot come to this House, but a member was threatened with bodily removal from the committee this morning, without access to being able to put a motion to the committee, or access to deal with it in committee. I find it necessary to get your guidance to deal with this matter because there is no recourse within the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the hon. member should put in a written order of privilege so that he can be heard at 3 o'clock.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, thank you for you guidance. I wanted to raise it at the earliest possible opportunity.

POINT OF ORDER

THE BUDGET

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a short point of order I would like to make. I have circulated some information to my friends in the government party as well as to the Official Opposition and the Chair, which I would like to comment on at this point.

I rise to ask you to review the rules governing the presentation of the budget and consider whether or not those rules provide for a 10-minute question and comment period to follow the delivery of the budget in the House by the Minister of Finance.

I would like to bring to the attention of the House, a few brief rulings done on previous occasions regarding the questions and comments, in hopes that you would find it is the clear intention of the House that such a question and comment period be held when the relevant Standing Orders were adopted.

Standing Order 84(7), governs time limits and comments on speeches during the budget debate. It states:

> No Member, except the Minister of Finance, the Member speaking first on behalf of the Opposition, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, shall speak for more than twenty minutes at a time in the Budget debate. Following the speech of each Member a period not exceeding ten minutes shall be made available, if required, to allow Members to ask questions and comment briefly on matters relevant to the speech and to allow responses thereto.

The wording of this Standing Order is virtually identical to that of Standing Order 50(2), which governs another special debate in the House, the Address in Response to the Speech from the Throne.

In considering then whether there can be questions and comments following the Budget speech, it is quite pertinent to look to rulings regarding the nearly identically worded provisions for the Address and Reply.

For example, on December 9, 1983, the then Leader of the Opposition, who is currently the Prime Minister, replied to the Throne Speech. Following his comments, my colleague, who is currently the member for Transcona, rose and attempted to direct a question. The then government House leader interjected and asked the Speaker whether a question period was in order.

As reported at page 45 of Hansard for December 9, 1983, we find:

> As the Leader of the Opposition and the Right Hon. Prime Minister may speak for an unlimited time I should like you to make your position clear on this issue, that we may know where we stand in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member in his presentation, but I think that his presentation should come up when the budget debate is in progress. He should either discuss it with the House leaders before we get into the Chamber, or make the presentation to the Speaker. However, I do not think that this is the time for him to make the presentation. Therefore, we should get into Orders of the Day.

Another point of order. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Just to seek clarification, Mr. Speaker. I certainly accept your ruling on this. It is something that I do not think we can resolve by discussions between the House leaders because it really requires a decision of the Chair.

Are you suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that I raise this point of order just prior to the Minister of Finance presenting his budget, or just following it? I seek some guidance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will take it under advisement and I will get back to the hon. member, but I think that what he wants to change is Standing Order 84(7), which relates to the debate and the 10-minute questions and comments after the three speakers.

However, we will discuss it later. We will take it under advisement and we will get back to the hon. member.

The Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make it clear that before any ruling is handed down on this subject, some of us might want to intervene on the submissions made by the hon. member for Kamloops.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No ruling will be made until we have submissions from everybody on all sides of the House.

Orders of the Day.

FEDERAL COURT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-38, an Act to amend the Federal Court Act, the Crown Liability Act, the Supreme Court Act and other Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before we go into debate, there are three motions on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-38, an Act to amend the Federal Court Act, the Crown Liability Act, the Supreme Court Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands are in order. They will be debated together but voted upon as follows:

An affirmative vote on Motion No. 1 obviates the need for a vote on Motion No. 2. A negative vote on Motion No. 1 necessitates a vote on Motion No. 2. Motion No. 3 is admissible and will be debated and voted upon separately.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-38 be amended in Clause 23

(a) by striking out line 22 at page 16 and substituting the following therefor:

"within thirty days after the claim arose,"

(b) by striking out lines 33 to 35 at page 16 and substituting the following therefor:

"opinion that to bar the proceed-"

That Bill C-38 be amended by deleting Clause 23.

He said, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could start out by saying that I was a member of the legislative committee that studied this bill. I want to say that I thought the committee was conducted by the government members on it, as well as the chairman, in a way that was very fair. In moving this amendment, I am not seeking to do so in a particularly partisan way because I recognize the government agreed to many worth while amendments to this bill. I felt that all the members of the committee co-operated very well to do the best they could to make this bill a better bill than it was when it left this House at second reading, and I think there have been some significant improvements.

However, one of the improvements that did not get made was the one to Section 23 of the bill which is a relatively minor but still an important item in the bill. Perhaps it would be clearer for Your Honour if I read Section 23 which amends Section 12 of the Crown Liability Act. The section states:

"12. (1) No proceedings lie against the Crown by virtue of Paragraph 3(b) unless, within seven days after the claim arose, notice in writing of the claim and of the injury complained of has been served on a responsible official of the department or agency administering the property or the employee of the department or agency who is in control or charge of the property.

My objection to the current wording is the requirement that seven days' notice of claim be given. Part of the purpose of the act was to treat the Crown more as an ordinary person. No other individual or corporation in Canada, and I am using the word "person" here in its legal sense, is subject to this kind of protection.

For example, if a person is driving along a road owned by the federal Crown in the Northwest Territories and his car falls into a large hole caused by excavation by the federal Crown employees maintaining the road, that person would have to give notice within seven days after the claim arose of the injury complained of, or he might find that his claim is out of time, in other words, that there was a bar to his proceeding on that claim.

In my view, no other "person", no other corporation has such protection. If CPR happened to own a road somewhere in Canada and somebody drove into a hole on its road, no seven day notice requirement is there. The lawsuit could commence in the usual course of things within six years after the claim arose. Therefore, there is a a six-year limitation period that applies to CP, that applies to me, any member in this House, or any individual in Canada where the Crown has this special deal of seven days.

The parliamentary secretary, who I presume will be answering for the Minister of Justice in this matter, will say: "Well yes, but you must read subsection 2," which states:

(2) Failure to give, or insufficiency of, the notice required by subsection (1) is not a bar to the proceedings if the court in which the proceedings are taken is of the opinion that the Crown in its defence was not prejudiced by the want or insufficiency of the notice and that to bar the proceedings would be an injustice, notwithstanding that reasonable excuse for the want or insufficiency of the notice is not established.

There are two proposed amendments, as Your Honour has indicated.

The first one is to change the seven day period to thirty, which is not much of a concession but it is some. I invite the parliamentary secretary to consider that.

The second amendment would be to take out the provision in subsection (2) that would require the plaintiff in an action to show that the Crown was not prejudiced by the want or insufficiency of the notice. In other words, the question of prejudice to the Crown is not the issue. The question really is would it be an injustice to prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with his claim, and only that issue, not the question of whether the Crown was prejudiced by the notice. Because if the Crown states that it has nobody around who can say whether or not there was a hole in that road on that day, the Crown is going to say it is prejudiced because its witness is dead, its people have left the area, or there is no one who worked in that area left in its employ and it cannot find them.

It seems to me that that ought not to be the test, because that defence is not available to anyone else. Although in the case of individuals, it may be possible for an individual to remember a hole in his driveway on a particular day, it will not be for a large corporation and why should the Crown be placed in a better position than a large corporation?

I have put that amendment as one of my amendments. The second amendment is to get rid of the clause entirely. I invite the minister to consider that possibility. If he really wanted to treat the Crown as an ordinary citizen in this instance, and I invite him to do so, he could simply delete the entire clause. If that is unacceptable, then I would request that he consider the other amendments I have proposed which would extend the notice period by 30 days and take away the requirement that prejudice to the Crown or non-prejudice to the Crown be shown by a plaintiff before he is allowed to proceed if he has missed the time period specified in the section.

I hope that the parliamentary secretary will consider my remarks in the spirit in which they are intended. They are not intended as a criticism of the bill as drafted. I recognize that this is a relatively standard type of limitation clause protecting Crowns. But I do think in this day and age the Crown in right of Canada, and certainly in right of the provinces, does not need this kind of protection, in my submission.

The answer given in committee when this issue was raised there was that this was exactly what was done in Ontario under the Municipal Act, for example, so why should we not follow the same procedure. What I am saying to the parliamentary secretary is let the House be a leader in this regard and let us start changing some of these archaic rules that, while protecting the Crown, harm our citizens. They lessen the rights of the citizens of the country. Surely the Crown as a representative of the citizens, as it is coming increasingly to be, and after all Parliament is its representative, ought not to be looking at itself to be protecting itself from its citizens but in fact to help the citizenry. If it is going to give rights to citizens to sue one another or other corporations without a 7, 10 or 30-day notice period, surely it does not need to insist on such notice for itself as against its own citizens, which is exactly what Section 23 is doing.

I ask the parliamentary secretary and the minister to consider removing this particular section from the bill altogether and, if that is not acceptable, to agree with my other amendment.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on Motion No. 1, and indirectly on Motion No. 2, I would like to echo the comments of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands about the spirit with which the legislative committee approached this bill. Certainly, there were significant improvements to the legislation in a number of areas. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands played a very distinguished role in the Chair. He was certainly very vigorous in that role on a number of occasions. I think that we came out with a better bill as a result of that process.

There were a number of areas in which I sought improvements to the legislation by amending the bill, in some cases successfully and in other cases the government defeated those amendments. Clause 23 was one of those clauses in which I did seek an amendment very similar to that which is proposed by the member for Kingston and the Islands. There is absolutely no reason to maintain this seven-day notice provision. I fully support Motion No. 1 which would extend that period to 30 days and which would also make certain changes in the second part of it.

I must say that I am astonished at the suggestion of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that if that fails that we should repeal Clause 23. What the Liberal member is suggesting is that we move backward to the status quo and that the current provisions of Clause 23, although limited, would in fact remove the requirement in the existing subsection 12(1) that a copy of the notice of claim be sent to the Deputy Attorney General of Canada. In addition, the new Clause 23 would remove the exception in subsection 12(2) concerning the failure or insufficiency of notice.

Clause 23 is a step in the right direction. It does remove a couple of barriers that now exist for the citizen seeking justice before the Federal Court. I am very disappointed at the suggestion of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that he wants to go back to the status quo. That is exactly what he would be doing by repealing Clause 23 in its entirety. He would be going back to the existing provisions of the Code.

I do not know whether it is the position of the Liberal Party that these barriers, which now exist in Clause 12 with respect to the notice, and the exceptions remain.

I would call upon the member for Kingston and the Islands to reconsider Motion No. 2 and to recognize that certainly there are improvements that can and should be made to this clause, but in the event that Motion No. 1 is not successful, I would suggest, with respect, to the member for Kingston and the Islands that proceeding with Motion No. 2 would be a step backwards. I am not at all sure that he would want to take that step which would in fact weaken the rights of the citizen in litigation against the Crown.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to echo the comments of my colleagues that this bill is a step in the right direction and that there were significant improvements that were made at the legislative committee. The member for Burnaby—Kingsway pointed out the role the member for Kingston and the Islands played in this. I am very pleased to have beside me the member for Red Deer who also was a very significant and helpful individual part of that legislative committee.

I have, as have the members of the government, considered very carefully the motions proposed by the member for Kingston and the Islands. While I always strive, if possible, to agree with a fellow alumni from Queen's University it is not always possible. I notice he is wearing his Queen's crest today on his jacket. I do not know if that was a coincidence, but nonetheless I think that we are going to have to agree to disagree on the two motions that he has proposed to the House on Bill C–38.

I would suggest to the House that a seven–day notice for a proceeding against the Crown is not an unreasonable notice. I wanted to correct an impression that may have been left by the member proposing this, that we were doing so on the basis or our justification was the limitation period within the Ontario Municipal Act. I do remember making the comment and I said I thought it was a 48 hour notice, but regardless I think there is far more to this than the fact that the provinces or the municipalities across this country may have a shorter notice period of time.

The member talked about the Crown and the prejudice to individuals. I agree that this bill has gone a long way to putting the Crown on a more equitable footing with those who seek to bring an action against the Crown. But the Crown is not exactly like another individual in this country. The Crown should be equated with the public interest in Canada. The public interest in proceedings against the Crown is, of course, the Canadian taxpayer. I do not think it is unreasonable to ask those who have an action to be brought against the Crown to bring that within seven days.

I can tell the hon. member that, yes, I had a look at that. I had some of the same concerns that he did, that that is a very short limitation period. He anticipated the argument that I would make. There is a saving provision in the second part of that that gives relief to those who bring an action or who give notice to the Crown outside of the seven–day period. The wording is "the relief can be granted if there is no prejudice to the Crown." I think that is reasonable and I have to disagree with him that the only basis for relief is if there is an injustice to the plaintiff. These are proceedings against the Crown, they bind the Canadian taxpayer to pay if there is a successful lawsuit. So I cannot agree that we should remove the clause that protects the Crown nor should we remove the clause that is the saving provision on this.

The hon. member pointed out that if we abolish the clause altogether, and it was quite correctly pointed out by the member for Burnaby—Kingsway, that that would be an intolerable position. The member said that there would be a six–year limitation period under tort law. That is too long for a number of reasons. As you know Mr. Speaker, the Crown controls and owns millions of acres across this country. If there is an accident on Crown land that gives rise to an action, we should be notified immediately for a number of reasons.

First, it allows the Crown to decide whether an action should go forward. Nobody wants to prolong litigation. Everyone wants to settle litigation as quickly as possible. With a seven–day notice period, the Crown is able to assess what it is that has gone wrong on Crown land and then make a determination as to whether a settlement should be made. That is in the interests of all parties.

As well, and I think the hon. member should have brought this to our attention, if there is something on Crown land that is a danger to the public, the Crown should be notified. That is in the public interest because the Crown wants to correct that situation. To let a hazardous situation continue indefinitely—

Mr. Milliken: That is a bit unctuous.

Mr. Nicholson: I did not quite catch what it was the member said, but he seemed to disagree with what I was saying.

If there is a problem on Crown land, the Crown should be notified of it immediately so that steps can be taken to protect other members of the public.

Mr. Fee: More sensible.

Mr. Nicholson: The member for Red Deer says that is sensible, and I believe it is. We have considered it very carefully and I think, in the best interests of the public, that these two motions should be defeated.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to answer two points. First, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway in his very kind remarks suggested that by moving my second amendment I was seeking to destroy citizens' rights. I think he knows that that is not quite accurate.

I think he knows that I was trying to take this clause out of the bill entirely so that the Crown would be in the same position as any other defendant in such an action. If I have misunderstood the situation and that is not so, for he may have sought advice from legal minds and in places that I would not even dream of finding advice, he may know better than I do. I bow to his superior judgment, if I am wrong in that, but my intention was to do that. I think he knows that that was my intention.

Frankly, I think he was being a little naughty in suggesting that I was trying to take away citizens' rights.

Second, while the parliamentary secretary's arguments all make great sense, the same arguments can apply to any of the very large corporations of Canada that own millions of acres in Canada.

I chose the Canadian Pacific Railway very specifically as an example because CP owns millions of acres all over Canada. It faces exactly the same difficulties that the Crown does. It wants to correct problems on its property if it hears about them. It wants to settle litigation as well, because it is the shareholders of CP that end up paying, and many of them are citizens of Canada. For the parliamentary secretary to suggest that he is protecting the Canadian taxpayer by this amendment, I agree that is a worthy and laudable—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have given the hon. member an opportunity to speak a second time, but really this is not possible at this stage. I thought it was a point of order.

Is the House ready for the question.

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 1.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

I declare the motion lost.

Motion negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

I declare the motion lost.

Motion negatived.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (for the Minister of Justice) moved:

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-38 be amended in clause 31 in the French version by striking out line 32 at page 21 and substituting the following therefor:

"ments rendus contre l'État dans les cas où un fait".

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, this is a technical amendment to make sure the versions in both official languages are as identical as possible. It would more accurately reflect what we are trying to do to use the term contre l'État as opposed to visant l'État.

The use of contre l'État would make it correspond with other references to the interests of the Crown.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Lewis moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

BRITISH COLUMBIA COURTS AMENDMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): moved that Bill C-59, an act to amend various acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the courts in British Columbia, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada I have the honour to speak at second reading of Bill C-59, the British Columbia Courts Amendment Act. This act would amend the Judges Act as well as a number of ancillary clauses resulting from the changes in court structures in the province of British Columbia.

The Government of Canada is committed to making the judicial system in Canada more efficient. To that end the federal government is co-operating with the provinces to improve the administration of justice throughout the country.

One example of that is the government's policy of responding positively to the initiatives of provincial governments to reorganize the Provincial Superior District and County Courts to better suit and improve the administration of justice in the provinces.

The amendments contained in Bill C-59 will give effect to the decision of the province of British Columbia to merge its county courts into the British Columbia Supreme Court. Legislation to effect the merger of the County Courts with the Supreme Court of British Columbia was adopted by the province of B.C. in June, 1989, to come into force July 1, 1990 or such earlier date as might be fixed by proclamation.

Bill C-59 would enact the complementary amendments to federal legislation in consequence upon the merger of the courts.

In addition to changing the name of the court where it appears in federal statutes, this legislation will make the changes in the Judges Act necessary to reflect the new organization of British Columbia's courts, including their creation of a new position of Associate Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

This bill is neither major nor complex. All of its provisions might be described as technical, yet it contributes substantially to the more effective functioning of the legal system in British Columbia by making the necessary amendments to federal statutes to permit the court merger in that province.

In addition, this bill represents another example of this government's commitment to co-operating with the provinces and territories to the benefit of all Canadians. I would ask the support of all members in ensuring speedy passing of this bill.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, our party supports the position of the government. We see this legislation as something that should probably happen in B.C., but in part it is up to the people of B.C. to make this decision. I believe there are about seven or eight provinces across the country that now have a unified court system. Obviously for B.C. to move in this direction is a positive statement.

We in New Brunswick went through this process about eight or nine years ago, and there is always some hesitation and concern, particularly among conservative barristers who are reluctant to change and reluctant to go through that process.

If the New Brunswick experience is any indication, the process works well and was an improvement. One is not faced with trying to decide in which court to proceed because there is only one court. We think this is a move in the right direction.

We would urge all those people in British Columbia who have concerns to come before the committee studying the legislation to make sure that their views are heard. We agree with the parliamentary secretary that it is more technical in nature than substantive, but the effects can be substantive. That is why these groups, organizations and individuals should come forward.

Perhaps, once all the courts are unified under one system, we should be considering specialization as far as judges are concerned. That is a choice we may want to look at some time in the future, where you have family law judges, criminal law judges and judges of civil matters.

We on this side of the House are supportive of the general direction of this bill and look with interest to the submissions that will be made.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this legislation. As a member of Parliament from the province of British Columbia, I am particularly pleased to note that in effect this proposal of the government would implement legislation that was adopted and supported by all parties in the British Columbia House in June of last year to effect the merger of the county courts with the Supreme Court.

I believe this leaves only one province with split jurisdiction. I believe Nova Scotia retains the split jurisdiction. Hopefully, it too will move under Premier McDonough in the very near future to achieve that important advance.

It has been indicated that the legislation is largely technical in nature, and that is quite accurate. I do want to take this opportunity though, since the subject of this bill is the courts and the merger of the courts, to take a couple of minutes to talk about the important question of access to these courts.

While it is important that we move forward in ensuring the courts are efficient in the administration of justice—and this bill will certainly be a small step in that direction—there are still serious concerns with respect to access to justice in British Columbia in particular but also in other parts of the country.

One of the important elements of justice and access to justice in this land is the ability of those without resources to have access to the courts, whether it be district courts, county courts, the Supreme Court or higher courts. For that reason I want to take this opportunity to express my deep concern and that of my colleagues about the cut-backs in legal aid.

I have the most recent annual report of the Legal Services Society of British Columbia, which is the body responsible for ensuring access to the courts and the provision of legal aid in British Columbia.

In this most recent annual report the chairperson of the board of directors of the Legal Services Society states:

> In B.C., legal rights are empty rights. Rights conferred by the Charter of Rights are rights without remedies because the province is not providing adequate funding for legal aid services.

Mr. Henderson points out that this is an essential element of a system of justice which is accessible to all citizens. He goes on to point out that some of the particular areas of concern are the low level of tariff paid to lawyers who take on legal aid cases, the absence of adequate resources to provide assistance to people involved in debt litigation, hearings before administrative tribunals in workers' compensation matters, welfare appeals, and refugee claims.

As well, on the question of access the board points out that it is essential that steps be taken to ensure the justice system is responsive to the needs of native people. We have seen a number of inquiries, whether it be the Marshall inquiry in Nova Scotia, the inquiry currently under way in Manitoba or in other jurisdictions which have pointed out serious problems with the accessibility of the justice system to native people in Canada.

The justice reform committee report in British Columbia stated:

> Our legal system falls short of providing equal access to all citizens.

I would hope the federal government would accept its responsibility for far more adequate resources to legal aid across this country. I recognize that the federal government does make a significant contribution to legal aid through cost sharing agreements. There is still far more that can be done, and I hope that the government will move in that direction.

On the question of access to justice, particularly under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the minority languages provisions of the Constitution, I want to ask that the Minister of Justice move very quickly to implement the unanimous recommendations of the Standing Committee on Human Rights to fund the Court Challenges Program fully.

This legislation before the House now deals with the efficiency of the courts and an important element of that whole question is the question of access, whether that be through legal aid or through funding under the Court Challenges Program, to make the rights which are on paper a reality to all Canadians.

The unanimous report of the standing committee on the Court Challenges Program pointed out that access to the courts is integral to the effective implementation of constitutional rights. As the Minister of Justice is well aware, this program is struggling. At this point the executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development has given lay-off notices to the staff of the program. I hope the Minister of Justice in his concern for access to the courts would move very quickly to ensure that steps are taken to fund this important program fully.

Finally, I want to take this opportunity to raise concerns on legislation which is largely technical in nature but deals with access to the courts and the efficiency of the court system. Concerns have been raised recently by a number of my colleagues dealing with the whole question of sexism in the courts. This particular legislation deals with courts in British Columbia, but it is not restricted to British Columbia. I regret to say it was a judge in my province who referred to a three year old child as being sexually aggressive.

[Translation]

Recently, Mr. Speaker, we had a judge in the province of Quebec, Judge Denys Dionne of the Quebec Court in Longueuil, who said in one of his judgments: "As they say, rules are like women: they were made to be violated."

• (1220)

[English]

That belies the grim reality of violence directed against women in the country: the fact that a women is raped every 17 minutes in Canada; the fact that one woman in four will be raped some time in her life, most often by someone that she knows; the fact that one in eight girls is sexually assaulted before the age of 18, usually by a male family member; the fact that 54 per cent of women living with men will be struck at some time during the relationship; the fact that 60 per cent of rapes reported and most battering and child sexual assault take place in the home; and, finally, the fact that some 90 per cent of women are sexually harassed on the job at some time in their work life.

I would hope that the minister, in moving forward in this area of improving the efficiency of the courts, would also take steps to ensure that our judges are educated as to the reality of violence against women.

We recall the comments of Madam Justice Bertha Wilson recently and too many other judges: the Quebec judge to whom I have just referred and the Northwest Territories judge who said sexual assaults are less serious there because most occur when the woman is drunk and passed out and, to quote the judge, "The man comes along, sees a pair of hips and helps himself". There is also the Nova Scotia judge who told women that they should obey their husbands and go back to them.

I would join in the call by many women across Canada and all those concerned about equitable justice for a national task force to examine sex discrimination in the Canadian legal system. I take this opportunity to urge the Minister of Justice to strike a national task force to look into this very serious problem of sexism on the bench.

I just might add that I know there is a recently founded Canadian judicial centre, and I would hope that this centre would play a leading role in helping to educate our judiciary.

There have been more women appointed to the bench recently and certainly the minister is quite accurate in noting that. It is a welcome change from former Conservative governments. Up until 1979 no Conservative government had ever appointed a woman to the bench at any level in the country. We certainly welcome this change as an important step forward.

In conclusion, I support the legislation which is before the House and hope that the government will take note of the concerns I have raised with respect to access to justice in the area of legal aid, the renewal of the Court Challenges Program, and, particularly, the importance of educating our judges about the reality of violence against women in Canadian society.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway in his remarks on Bill C-59 made reference to the fact that Nova Scotia does not have a unified court system. He indicated his wish that that would occur in the near future.

I join him in seeking that end, but I do take exception to the fact that he referred to Premier McDonough. I am afraid that if we wait for McDonough to be elected Premier of Nova Scotia it will probably be a grandchild or great-grandchild of the current leader of the New Democratic Party and well into the next century, perhaps the year 3000.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

ONTARIO COURTS AMENDMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-60, an act to amend various acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the courts in Ontario and to provide for other related matters, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, I have the honour of speaking at second reading of Bill C-60, the Ontario Courts Amendment Act.

This bill will provide the complementary amendments to the Judges Act and other federal statutes necessary for the implementation of court reform in Ontario.

That province recently enacted legislation to merge the District Court of Ontario with the Superior Trial Court, the High Court of Justice.

The merged court will become the General Division of the Ontario Court of Justice, a comprehensive name to be given to courts of trial jurisdiction in that province. In addition the Court of Appeal, as is the High Court of Justice, a branch of the Supreme Court of Ontario will be constituted as a separate court. The Ontario legislation therefore marks a significant departure from the traditional court structure in that province, virtually untouched since 1881.

The new Ontario Court General Division will be organized on a regional basis. A regional senior judge will be appointed to administer the court in each of the eight regions under the over-all direction of the chief justice and the associate chief justice of the court.

When the Attorney General of Ontario announced his proposals on May 1, 1989 they were met with varying degrees of acceptance by the legal profession and the public at large. Over the past several months several aspects of these proposals have generated representations to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada from groups and individuals concerned with their effects upon the independence of the judiciary in Ontario.

The hon. minister has therefore been required to take a much closer interest in these proposals than a federal minister would ordinarily accord a province's plans for court structure. On a number of occasions the Minister of Justice has discussed the legislation directly with Mr. Scott. The hon. minister agreed to make a number of changes since incorporated at the committee stage and in an amending bill enacted in December. I think you will find, Mr. Speaker, that these amendments fully meet the concerns which have been expressed.

Bill C-60 itself is largely technical in nature and is designed to reflect in federal statutes changes to the names and structures of Ontario courts. Upon its passage the judges of the existing High Court of Justice and District Court of Ontario will be reappointed to the Ontario Court of Justice General Division, while courts of the present appellate branch of the Supreme Court of Ontario will be reappointed to the separate Court of Appeal.

A number of transitional provisions have been included in this bill. One which I would bring to the attention of hon. members affects the chief judge and the associate chief judge of the District Court of Ontario. On the merger of the High Court of Justice and the District Court, the positions of chief judge and associate chief judge of the District Court will lapse. For reasons of fairness Section 46 of the bill will continue the salary of the chief judge and the associate chief judge at their present level until such time as the salary annexed to the offices they will hold on the new court equals or surpasses it.

Both Chief Judge Lyon and Associate Chief Judge LeSage have occupied their present positions with great distinction for a period of years that would, were it not for the abolition of their court, permit them to take the benefits of Section 32 of the Judges Act.

This section allows a chief justice or chief judge who has served in that capacity for a minimum of five years to step down to a temporary puisne position on the court. By virtue of Subsection 43(2) of the Judges Act, a pension to which a judge would thereafter become entitled will be calculated on the basis of the salary annexed to the office of chief justice or chief judge at the time he or she finally retires or leaves the bench.

In the interest of fairness, subclause 46(2) of this bill will extend the same right to the chief judge and the associate chief judge of the District Court who have held their respective offices for seven years, and in the case of Chief Judge Lyon, for an additional five years as associate chief judge of the court, by deeming them to have made an election under Section 32 of the Judges Act effective upon the merger of the court.

I will note here that it is intended to introduce a number of amendments to this bill in committee to take account of additional purely technical changes required to federal laws. They do not however affect the salient points of Bill C-60.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the principle of shared jurisdiction as provided under the Constitution, the provinces and the federal government are bound to work together to ensure the proper administration of justice in this country.

An Act of Parliament and decision by the executive authority are necessary to give full effect to the measures being considered by the province with respect to the Constitution of the courts as provided under Section 96 of the Constitution.

[English]

Bill C-60, the Ontario Courts Amendment Act, will allow the province of Ontario to institute reforms designed to improve the administration of justice in that province to make the courts more accessible and more responsive to the imperatives of contemporary litigation.

I hope that the spirit motivating these reforms will be accorded the approval of all hon. members.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the official opposition I want to welcome the reform of the Ontario system of courts to Parliament.

The relatively modest effort which is before us is really part of a very large parcel of major reform of the court system of the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario is under the leadership of the Attorney General, Ian Scott. This is phase 1 of a two phase project. Phase 1 is already described, discussed and settled. Phase 2 is in the process now of being described. I am looking forward to seeing Parliament play its part in carrying this reform forward.

It should not be surprising, as the earlier discussion revealed, that Nova Scotia, British Columbia and Ontario are the last provinces of our country to be looking to reorganization with a view to greater efficiency of their court system.

I recall from my days of reading history the difficulties that the Fathers of Confederation faced in trying to bring this country together. We have talked in this House very often, and will be talking again this afternoon, about the problems that relate to our language issue, the English and the French.

The resolution of those problems by the Fathers of Confederation was relatively easy compared to the problems that they faced in trying to bring together the original colonies that formed Canada as each had, for long periods of time, an already mature system of justice and courts somewhat similar, but none of them wanting to yield anything to the establishment of the new country of Canada which emerged from the work of the Fathers of Confederation in 1867.

The pressure to maintain the prerogatives of the then existing system were a heavier burden on the Fathers of Confederation than the problems of accommodating English and French within the new country. We see that even today the challenge of modernizing the court systems with a view to greater efficiency and greater comprehensibility by the people of the province is still a task that causes a lot of concern.

I am looking forward to seeing the bill go to committee following second reading. I hope there will be briefs put forward by the various interest groups that are affected, which groups I want to talk about in a moment. I hope we will have some hearings because I do not agree with the government that, as was indicated by the parliamentary secretary, our role is derivative or—he did not use the words "rubber stamp", but he gave the clear impression that our responsibility in this place is to rubber stamp what the provinces have decided to do.

I think we should try to be true to the vision of the Fathers of Confederation in 1867 who wanted to see something of a national system of justice emerge from their work. We must make sure that we do our job and that here in the Parliament of Canada we make a contribution to the work.

In saying that, I think we have also to recognize that a tremendous amount has been done and that the problems and the conflicting and competing interests within the justice system have been addressed by the attorney general. He had numerous meetings with all concerned.

I ought also to pay tribute to Mr. Justice Zuber and to the enormous effort that went into his report which forced the entire community involved in the justice system in the province of Ontario to think again about the system they were living with and about the improvements that could be possible.

Certainly efficiency and comprehensibility were not objectives of the Fathers of Confederation when the system was put together. In those days it was just a matter of trying to get approval and support for Confederation. We began with a system of justice, if one can call it that, which really has no central management. It depends on the working together of four systems, each of which has by tradition, by law, by our Constitution, certain prerogatives and a certain independence.

We are all very aware of the independence of the judiciary, an independence which the system of justice, before its reorganization and when we are finished with its reorganization, must continue. Otherwise, the democracy of Canada will have lost something.

Second, the Crown attorneys have by tradition, by law, certain recognized prerogatives which also have to be accommodated within this so-called system. There is the bar which represents the public, the litigants who come to court to defend themselves, to make claims against fellow citizens, against the government and so on. The whole prerogative that the bar has enjoyed for decades and is a hallmark of our system needs also to be accommodated within the system which is before us to revise.

Finally, and by no means least important, there is the court system of Ontario which administers the system; the officials, the people who build and manage the court houses with their timetables, the process servers and the paper handlers within the system, all of whom have a responsibility to represent the taxpayers of the province with a system that is efficient and modern and in which things happen and are understood.

Those competing interests, all of which need to be accommodated by the new system, have been broadly involved and are very aware of the implications of the system before us which we are being asked to consider, to look at in committee and to validate by the legislation that the minister has introduced.

I am looking forward very much to our work. The court system faces challenges today that could not even have been dreamed of back in 1867. The fact that the four independent systems have been able to work together and make a system, even though it needs the changes we are considering, is one that we are very proud of. It is a tribute not so much to the structure as to the people who have worked within it, who have recognized each other's role, each other's need for independence, and have done their best to accommodate that. I think it is appropriate to pay tribute to them.

It is taking nothing away from any of them or the role they have played in making the system work so far, to recognize, as seven other provinces have done, including Quebec which has done so from Confederation, that a unified system has considerable advantages.

When I was discussing this bill with some of my colleagues in my caucus who are not members of the bar, they were all delighted to hear, for themselves and on behalf of constituents, that there was going to be a system which would be more comprehensible to them. When the Supreme Court has done something, they will understand more clearly what that means.

At this time we have a Charter, which we did not have, we have a legal aid system, which we did not have, and we have complicated family relations which, more often than they should and certainly more often than in the past, bring members of families to court. We have had a tremendous population growth and one which is very uneven. Some parts of our province have huge populations, others have grown much more slowly, and all of that has had to be accommodated within a system designed in 1867 and revised in a very significant and important way in 1881 and 1882, but really not in any significant way since then.

So I congratulate my colleagues and counterparts in the province of Ontario for the work they have done. I congratulate the Attorney General, Ian Scott, for bringing forward this major initiative, and the Minister of Justice across the floor and his parliamentary secretary for giving us the opportunity now to deal with this bill and to see it carried to committee.

I noted in reading the papers from the process at Queen's Park that it was the hope of the Attorney General that this reform and unification might be in effect by January 1990. That would have been okay with us in the Official Opposition, but it was not presented for second reading until today, which is already after January 1, 1990. I regret that, for whatever reason, the package did not reach us in time to meet the Attorney General's desired target of January 1, 1990, but I hope that we can still make this happen very soon, certainly before the end of 1990, if not months and months before that.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise very briefly to indicate that we in the New Democratic Party do indeed support this legislation. Many of the arguments that I made with respect to the preceding bill, the bill that would effect the merger of courts in British Columbia, apply of course to this legislation as well. They include the comments I made with respect to access to the justice system, the funding of legal aid programs and the concerns about the importance of educating the judiciary with respect to sexism in our society and, unfortunately, on the bench.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I also mentioned that extending the Court Challenges Program was important in order to promote access to justice across Canada.

In fact, extending the program is important, not only for equality rights but also and above all for the purpose of promoting and defending the rights of language minorities in this country.

Mr. Speaker, the Court Challenges Program has been in existence since 1978 for cases involving official languages. The fund for this program was established because the government at the time, and in fact all members of Parliament, thought it was important to obtain a court ruling that would specify to what extent the Constitution protects official language minorities.

Mr. Speaker, in 1982, when the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms came into force, the federal government decided to provide for a renewed and expanded program that would finance court challenges by Canada's language minorities.

Mr. Speaker, this program is an important tool for promoting official languages and language rights in this country.

Mr. Speaker, since 1978, the program has funded a number of challenges in our major courts. For instance, the right to be educated in the minority language, as stated in section 23 of the Charter, was the subject of most of the challenges funded by the program.

Last December, the Standing Committee on Human Rights unanimously recommended that the government renew and even expand the Court Challenges Program, both with respect to equality rights and language rights.

I therefore want to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lewis), since we are talking about the courts in Ontario and especially, Mr. Speaker, in recognition of the fact that there are more than one million Francophones in the province of Ontario, to respond—

Mr. Boudria: There are 426,000!

Mr. Robinson: One million! —to respond positively to this very important recommendation that is supported unanimously by the Human Rights Committee.

Mr. Speaker, without funding for court challenges, language minorities will be deprived of their rights.

Mr. Speaker, we support the bill before the House today. However, I want to take this opportunity once again to ask the government to respond positively and very quickly to the recommendations made by the Standing Committee on Human Rights.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak for only a few minutes on this bill. I want to do so from the perspective of a non-lawyer to express to you and to other members of this House just how hopelessly complicated the existing system was and is.

Perhaps to people who are learned in the law it is simple to understand that in the Supreme Court of Ontario there is a Court of Appeal, a High Court of Justice, a District Court, a Surrogate Court, a Unified Family Court, the court Masters and the family law commissioners. Maybe that makes a whole lot of sense to the people in the legal profession, but to the rest of us this is very complicated. For our constituents, those whom we are charged to represent in this House and those whom our colleagues represent in the legislative assembly of our province, it is certainly high time that we make this system a little bit easier to understand.

The bill proposes to do so in two steps. This is not the first attempt at simplifying the court system. It seemed that for the three and a half years that I sat in the Ontario legislature every time we talked about the courts of justice in the Ontario House, it was always for the purpose of making it simpler to understand. It never did get much simpler.

To add to the existing structures I talked about only a moment ago, in the provincial court of Ontario, as opposed to the Supreme Court of Ontario which should be distinguished from the Supreme Court of Canada which we have not talked about, there is the family division, the criminal division and the civil division. Imagine the average Canadian trying to figure out how all of this is supposed to work.

We know that the ultimate objective is to have only two structures, the Court of Appeal and the Ontario Court of Justice. It would seem to me that that would be so much easier to understand and to explain to those we are representing. The old adage that justice delayed is justice denied is not only true. Using the same analogy, you could debate whether justice that is not understandable to the average person is justice at all when it is beyond reach and comprehension of so many people because it is so hopelessly complicated.

To add to this very complicated structure, we have all the tribunals and quasi-judicial organizations that exist both provincially and federally. I think, for instance, at the federal level of such organizations as the Immigration Appeal Board, which is very structured. The justices, if that is what they call themselves, or panel members, walk into the room and everyone is expected to rise as if you were appearing before the Supreme Court. There are other organizations which are a lot less formal. However, as far as I am concerned, those boards and tribunals act in a way which is far too formal.

I know that some people would say that some of them should be changed into courts. I happen to disagree with that proposition. I think there is a need for these quasi-judicial bodies to operate in a less formal manner so that the average constituent can go there with his friend or neighbour and express his point of view.

I do not want to take much more time. I recognize that we want this bill to proceed today. I think you will hear in a few moments of the co-operation that our party is willing to provide in order to enable that to proceed.

[Translation]

I therefore want to congratulate the Attorney General of Ontario on this excellent initiative. It was high time something was done in this respect, and I am very pleased to see this kind of co-operation between the federal government and the province. I think the Liberal minister from Ontario is to be commended for his progressive attitude and his desire to make the justice system more accessible to Canadians.

[English]

Of course I want to offer as well my good wishes to the minister across who has co-operated with the provincial Liberal minister who has all the foresight. I am glad that the federal Minister of Justice took heed of the foresight of his provincial Liberal counterpart.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for York Centre on a point of order.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, there has been some consultation. When this bill has been disposed of I think you would find agreement to deal with the next two bills on the Order Paper in order to see them referred to committee this week, namely the arson bill and the divorce bill dealing with Get.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the two items of legislation, particularly the latter one on which we have been urging government action for some time, I am pleased that the member for York Centre accepted my earlier suggestion that we sit past the hour of adjournment on this legislation.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, naturally the government would be prepared to not see the clock.

I might also suggest, in the interest of our colleagues who perhaps have other engagements, that we could agree not to call quorum. Therefore, just the members who are interested in the bill would be required to stay in the House, if that suits everybody else's position.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-53, an act to amend the Criminal Code (arson), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on a subject of concern to many Canadians. I think all of us know what a terrible destructive force fire can be when it occurs. Fires cause death, injury and property damage every day in this country. Most are the result of accident or carelessness, but some are deliberately, recklessly or negligently caused by someone. This was the case in over 10,500 fires in 1988. This was a 17 per cent increase over 1987.

Arson is a major crime in Canada and statistics illustrate its seriousness. Arson accounts directly for at least 13 per cent of all reported fires. In 1988 arson was the cause of 42 deaths and injuries to 456 civilians and fire-fighters, many of the latter being volunteers. In the same year the value of insurable losses caused by arson and other set fires was more than $198 million. The actual economic loss is estimated to be four to five times that amount.

In Canada many of the original arson provisions of the Criminal Code have not been amended substantially since the Code was implemented in 1892. The present provisions are contained in Part 11 of the Code which deals with criminal acts with respect to certain property. Sections 433 to 436 provide for several offences of arson including setting a fire by negligence. As well, they contain a presumption of fraudulent intent on the part of a beneficiary of an insurance policy.

The present law on arson focuses on property. A distinction is drawn as to the types of property that are covered by the crime of arson. However, Bill C-53 focuses on the danger that fire poses to the life, health, safety and property of all Canadians, and particularly to fire-fighters.

Since 1975, the Canadian Association of Fire Chiefs, the Association of Canadian Fire Marshals and Fire Commissioners, and the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police have repeatedly called for amendments to the Criminal Code provisions respecting arson.

The resolutions adopted at their annual meetings recommend that the scope of the crime of arson be extended to cover all property, that explosion be included as means to commit arson and that possession of an incendiary material in suspicious circumstances be made a crime.

In 1975, the Uniform Law Conference passed similar resolutions and recommended that the Department of Justice review the sections of the Criminal Code dealing with arson.

[English]

In 1984 the Law Reform Commission of Canada published its Working Paper 36 on arson. It stated that the law is both archaic and inadequate. It made five recommendations which called for significant simplification of the law. Following publication of that working paper the Department of Justice studied the Law Reform Commission's recommendations as well as the proposals of various concerned groups. Consultations were also carried out with representatives of the prosecution and defence bars, law professors, the police, fire chiefs, fire marshals and the fire insurance industry. The present bill incorporates many of the recommendations which were voiced in these consultations.

I am not going to go into a great amount of detail but there are some points that I want to make with respect to the bill. First, there is the modernization of the definition of the crime; second, the reformulation of the crime of negligent arson; third, the reformulation of the present presumption in Sections 435 and 436; and fourth, the creation of a new offence of possession of incendiary materials.

At present arson is defined as wilfully setting fire to specific types of property. The Law Reform Commission proposed to redefine arson as any conduct which causes an explosion or a fire which results in the destruction of or damage to property. We have adopted virtually all of these elements in the definition of the offence of arson. First, explosion as well as a fire is a means of committing the offence. Second, damage to property is a necessary element of the defence. Third, the distinctions which exist in the present law as to types of property which may be the subject of an arson are eliminated.

I want to address these changes.

• (1300)

It is increasingly common in the investigation of arson cases to find that a deliberately set explosion was used to start a fire or that a fire was deliberately accelerated by an explosion.

In investigations, it is often difficult to determine which occurred first—the fire or the explosion.

This difficulty poses a problem for the prosecution when laying a charge in such cases for, at the moment, there are two separate sets of offences in the Code: those relating to causing an explosion (Ss. 79 to 82) and those relating to setting a fire (Ss 433 to 436).

There is always a risk that if the prosecution alleges that the fire was the initial event and the explosion followed and the evidence is to the contrary, the accused will be acquitted.

By providing that the offence is committed by either causing an explosion or setting a fire, this risk is eliminated.

[English]

The courts have interpreted the phrase "set fire to" in the present Section 436 somewhat narrowly. Case law has determined that the phrase requires that there be actual combustion to commit arson. Mere scorching, for instance, is not enough even though it may constitute significant damage. Accordingly, to date some individuals who have set fire wilfully have been acquitted owing to the fact that the damage to the property had not reached the degree of combustion required by the case law. To rectify this the definition of the offence has been amended so that any damage to property caused by fire or explosion would constitute arson. This change will ensure that whether or not combustion actually occurs, arsonists will be called upon to account for the damage they cause.

The Law Reform Commission has recommended that arson cover the destruction or damage to all property or real property without distinction. Under the current legislation, setting fire to a vegetable stack is arson while setting fire to someone's car is not. The proposed definition eliminates anomalies such as these by making no distinction among the types of property capable of being damaged.

I also point out the effect of the present Section 436 of the Criminal Code is to deem it to be arson committed by negligence where a loss of life, bodily harm or property damage results from a failure to comply with fire prevention laws by an owner, an occupant of property or person who has control of the property.

The Law Reform Commission recommended that no offence of negligence be retained in the Criminal Code in which the harm caused can only be damage to, or in relation to property. However, many of those consulted argued forcefully that too many owners are lax or negligent in maintaining residential rental units, particularly in disadvantaged areas. Given the destructive nature of fire once it started, it was important to emphasize the fundamental duty of care with regard to fire by clearly warning those who might be inclined to be negligent that they may be charged and convicted before a criminal court.

Even though it is important to retain an offence of negligent arson in the Code, it was important to reformulate it and the presumptions which underpin it so as to minimize any possibility that the offence might be found contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We have done that in Section 436.

The present provisions on arson contain two presumptions. Under Section 435 the fact that a person holds a fire insurance policy relating to property wilfully set on fire is, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, proof of intent to defraud. Section 436 provides that a person is deemed wilfully to have caused a fire if it is established the fire would not have occurred if the fire prevention by-law had been complied with. We believe that both presumptions are open to challenge under the Charter.

Bill C-53 will amend the present mandatory presumptions to permit permissible inferences. That is, the trier of fact may, not must, infer an intent to defraud from the fact that an owner intentionally caused an explosion or fire to property that was insured. In practice, the proposed permissible inferences should be as effective as the present mandatory presumptions in helping to convict the fraudulent arsonist without, at the same time, infringing on the charter of rights of the accused.

The present Criminal Code does not contain any provisions covering cases where someone is caught with accelerants, gasoline or other similar substances in circumstances indicating that they have these items in order to set a fire. Because mere possession of such materials is itself not a crime, the police must wait until a suspect has taken some substantial step toward setting a fire before making an arrest. By that time it may be too late as the fire may have already begun to burn. To deal with this omission the bill creates a new offence of possession of incendiary materials for the purpose of committing an offence.

In conclusion, a number of representatives of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police and the Canadian Association of Fire Chiefs have already endorsed these amendments, including the North York City Council, which my hon. friend represents.

The fire chief in my constituency in Orillia has been urging action on this issue for many years. I am pleased to advise Chief Shropshire and all fire chiefs and fire-fighters in Canada that the government has taken action. We want to send a very clear message that arson is a very serious crime. Canadians, especially fire-fighters and innocent bystanders must be given the fullest possible protection from today's sophisticated arsonists.

I ask that the House support these amendments.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak very briefly on this matter. I had no idea that a learned discourse had been prepared on the subject by the minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River does have a short discourse. We will listen to him on debate.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, this is not really a legal discourse. I did look forward to addressing the introduction of this bill and its second reading.

What the legislation does signal, of course, is an incredibly large need for reform, not just of this section of the Criminal Code, but many parts of the Criminal Code.

What we have in the old arson sections of the Criminal Code are some very outdated terms. We can see by looking at them just how far the Criminal Code and these provisions have drifted out of date with reality. The old section refers to setting fire to military or public stores. Well, I do not know what public stores really are. In Nova Scotia where I was born, I think a public store was a liquor store. It refers to timber for fitting out a ship. I have not seen that concept in quite a while. It also refers to stacks of vegetable produce. This is not just a question of cosmetics or the law looking dumb and inexact. It is actually much worse than that. The terms the way they are expressed now provide pitfalls, booby-traps and ambiguities for police and Crown prosecutors right across the country.

For example, with reference to stacks of vegetables, I wonder whether burning a stack of tomatoes would constitute an offence. I suggest that it may well not because tomatoes are not vegetables, they are fruit. The way the old section reads: "Everyone who wilfully sets fire to a stack of vegetable produce, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment". That is all it says. I question whether or not the simple lighting of a cigarette or several cigarettes is a stack of vegetable produce. These are examples of the difficulties with the old legislation. All of this has implications for cost-effectiveness and efficiency in law enforcement and judicial procedures.

We would probably embarrass ourselves if we looked at the costs of mistrials and dismissals as a result of unnecessary loopholes and technical deficiencies in our laws. That is why I am pleased to address these today.

I would add one caution. That is the adoption in the new statutes of the crime of arson by negligence. It is something that the Law Reform Commission has referred to in its previous studies. I am not so sure that we should be creating an offence that is fuzzy or ambiguous in terms of definition and one where society is capable of off-loading its anger or revenge for a destructive fire, a fire that may have caused the loss of life, to someone who may have inadvertently failed to live up to some aspect of a municipal by-law. I think in terms of criminal law for all of our benefit we look for precision and the removal of ambiguity. I hope that the legislative committee will address this issue at the legislative committee stage.

Therefore I would signal our support in principle for adoption of these reforms. I ask the legislative committee to exercise some caution in its meticulous review of Section 436.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in view of the hour I will abandon my lengthy learned discourse on this bill and merely take a couple of minutes to indicate that certainly we support in principle the changes which are being proposed to the Criminal Code in the area of arson.

As the minister indicated, there have been no substantive changes to this section of the Criminal Code since 1892 when the Code was enacted. The statistics are clear. In 1988 approximately 10,500 cases of arson or suspected arson took the lives of 42 people and caused more than $198 million in insurable losses. Of course the actual economic loss is well beyond that. One of the areas I would hope we could look at is the extent to which arson laws in fact are being effectively and vigorously enforced.

This causes particular difficulty to firefighters, many of whom are volunteers and at special risk. I would note that in 1987, for example, some 257 firefighters were injured on the job. I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to firefighters across the country who have done such an outstanding job on behalf of the communities in which they work.

Canadians have lost homes, schools and workplaces to arson. For example, in 1987 in my own province of British Columbia, an elementary school in New Westminster was damaged to the tune of nearly $2 million. There have been losses of that nature across the country.

The minister indicated that there had been extensive consultations on this legislation. One of the groups that does not appear to have been consulted, at least there is no reference to it, is firefighters themselves. Sometimes we forget the people who are on the front lines. I am not talking about the fire chiefs but the International Association of Firefighters. They are the men and women who are in the front lines and I think they deserve to be heard in this area. If they are interested I hope that we could hear from them in the committee. It is not a lengthy process I am talking about but let us give an opportunity to those who are in the front lines. In some cases they have been injured or given their lives.

I would like to make one other comment with respect to this legislation in the context of criminal law reform. This is a rather piecemeal approach to criminal law reform and I would hope that there could be a more comprehensive approach. The Law Reform Commission of Canada has in fact done some important and, indeed, pioneering work in recommending changes to the Code. They have adopted a report on the general part and I know the minister recently indicated in a speech that he is prepared to move forward in this area. Let us hope that at last that movement does come about. The Criminal Code was first adopted in 1892 and it would be appropriate as we near the one hundredth anniversary of the adoption of the first Code to make a commitment on all sides of the House to try to work toward comprehensive reform instead of reform in bits and pieces.

Certainly there are a number of areas that have to be dealt with on an urgent basis. The report of the Marshall inquiry on native justice pointed to a number of areas of concern in terms of criminal law reform and practice. The practice of full disclosure by the Crown is strongly recommended by the Marshall inquiry as a means of helping to avoid the kind the injustice that took place there.

I hope that the Minister of Justice will look very seriously at the necessary amendments in order to achieve full disclosure in the criminal justice process.

Finally, I want to come back to the question of a comprehensive approach to the criminal law and to note in examining the criminal law that the minister should pay careful attention to a study commissioned by the Secretary of State, the minister responsible for the status of women in 1986.

The working group came up with a study entitled "A Feminist Review of Criminal Law". It made a number of excellent recommendations and in the context of comprehensive criminal law reform I hope the government will look at them very seriously.

We have heard from Madam Justice Bertha Wilson on this important question of changes, particularly in the area of criminal law. She said, and I quote, "Some aspects of the criminal law in particular cry out for change since they are based on presuppositions about the nature of women and women's sexuality that in this day and age are a little short of ludicrous".

As well, she pointed out that in some areas of the law a distinctly male perspective is clearly discernible and has resulted in legal principles that are not fundamentally sound and should be revisited as and when the opportunity presents itself. This is a clear invitation to the government to move forward in this important area of criminal law reform and to deal with sexism in the criminal law and in our society.

I hope the minister will move in one particular area, the whole area of sexual assault and the honest belief defence which is clearly susceptible to abuse.

On behalf of my party, I support in principle the legislation we are now dealing with to bring up to date the law on arson in Canada. I want to pay tribute to those groups across the country who have been responsible for bringing this important legislation forward and certainly, as always, to commend the Minister of Justice for bringing forward this legislation in response to the Orillia fire chief as well as fire chiefs and men and women across this country who do such an outstanding job for our communities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

DIVORCE ACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-61, an act to amend the Divorce Act (barriers to religious remarriage), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have another short learned discourse that I want to make. I think it is important to say that I do appreciate the spirit of co-operation this afternoon. One might be tempted to shorten one's speeches—and I have somewhat anyway—but it is important that in the future when somebody says, "Well, why did the government move and why was there not much debate?" I think we could be held accountable for not at least putting on the record why we are going things. So, if I may, I would just like to set out a few thoughts.

The bill before us today is an amendment to the Divorce Act which would provide a court with discretionary powers to preclude a spouse from obtaining relief or proceeding under the Divorce Act where that spouse refuses to remove a barrier to religious remarriage and where the power to remove the barrier to religious remarriage lies solely with that person. Where the court is satisfied that the spouse who refuses to remove the barrier has genuine grounds of a religious or conscientious nature for doing so, it need not exercise its discretion to grant the remedy provided for in this legislation.

Two reasons have prompted the government to present the amendment. First, the Jewish community led by B'nai Brith and the Canadian Jewish Congress, supported by major Jewish organizations, has requested such an amendment to remedy a situation it considers to be unfair. A spouse should not be able to refuse to participate in a Jewish religious divorce—called a Get—in order to obtain concessions in a civil divorce. The Get should not be used as a bargaining tool for child custody and access or monetary support.

Second, I am concerned about protecting the integrity of the Divorce Act and preventing persons from avoiding the application of the principles contained in the act. For example, a wife may feel compelled to agree to custody arrangements which are not truly in the best interests of a couple's child in order to obtain a Get.

I want to take a few minutes to describe briefly the dilemma certain Jewish persons face because of their religious divorce procedures. In the Jewish religion divorce is accomplished by the delivery of a Get from the husband and its acceptance by the wife in the presence of a Rabbinical Court. According to the Jewish religious traditions, the procedure cannot be changed. Without a Get, a Jewish woman cannot remarry in her own faith. Children of a subsequent civil marriage suffer religious disabilities. While difficult remarriage within the Jewish faith for a man in the same circumstances is not impossible.

In a study conducted by B'nai Brith, husbands were twice as likely as wives to refuse to participate in the Get procedure in order to obtain concessions in a civil divorce. The Jewish community has attempted to solve this problem, but unfortunately they have not been successful.

I just want to say in response to earlier comments by my honourable friend—and I appreciate his comments and compliments—that the government is moving where it can and where it is brought to the government's attention to eliminate sexism and gender bias in the law. I think we have to do it not only in the stated law but in the way the law is applied. It is not perfect.

I say to you as the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada that I think the attention focused on the bias when found in the application of the law is important. That helps us to bring forward changes not only in laws but in people's attitudes, and that is important. While it may be difficult to get the questions in the House, I think it is helpful in that it focuses attention on the issue. I welcome the assistance of all members in dealing with that very important problem.

In preparing for Bill C-61 I had two major concerns to resolve. First, the impact on other religious groups and, second, the consistency of the amendment with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I did not wish this Bill to affect unintentionally the rules pertaining to religious remarriage of other remarriage of other religious groups in Canada.

Thus, I consulted the leaders of fifty religious groups in Canada, described the elements of the proposed amendment and solicited their comments on the impact of the bill on their respective religious practices. Of the fifty religious groups consulted, nineteen responded with substantive comments.

Mr. Speaker, this consultation process was extremely valuable. It provided us with the opportunity to carefully consider and discuss a number of the important issues this proposed legislation raised.

You will be interested to know the Roman Catholic, Presbyterian and Anglican churches agree with the purpose of this legislation.

[English]

I believe that Bill C-61 is consistent with the guarantees of freedom of religion and equality contained in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms for three reasons.

First, pursuant to the case law developed by the Supreme Court of Canada, subsection 2(a) of the Charter respecting freedom of religion is not necessarily infringed by a law that has a religious dimension, if that law does not interfere with the freedom of individuals affected by it to act on conscientious or religious grounds. The proposed amendment will apply only to the situation where a Get is being refused in order to give the party to a divorce an additional bargaining tool for the civil divorce, not because the person is refusing on religious or conscientious grounds. In Judaism there are no religious grounds to refuse the Get.

Second, Section 15 guaranteeing equality of persons does not require that all members of society be treated identically if their needs require otherwise. In the present circumstances, although the Jewish community is the group primarily affected by the proposed amendment, this is because of the particular problems that it has experienced. Specifically, it has no recourse to a religious tribunal as do all other religious groups canvassed that have religious divorce proceedings.

Third, even if a prima facie case were made for a breach of the freedom of religion, I believe the proposal is still defensible under Section 1 of the Charter as a reasonable limit. Such a limit would ensure, for example, that custody decisions were made according to the child's best interest as required under the Divorce Act and not as a result of concessions in exchange for a Get. While impact on other religions and Charter implications were major concerns, I would also like to address two other considerations.

[Translation]

First, I have encountered on occasion the view that this amendment may set a precedent regarding other difficulties of other religions. No one, however, has actually been able to point to any situation similar to that of the Get.

It is the case that in some religions, the Roman Catholic, Greek Orthodox and Islam, annulment or divorce may proceed more easily and faster if the couple agree.

However, in all these cases, the authority to grant the annulment or divorce rests with the religious tribunal, not the couple.

An un-co-operative spouse may delay a decision, but ultimately he or she cannot prevent the religious tribunal from rendering its decision.

In these religions, the spouse initiating the action can ask the religious authorities to deal with this problem.

The Jewish spouse does not have that recourse.

[English]

Second, the current provisions of the Divorce Act were examined thoroughly to determine if they provided a remedy. The conclusion was that they did not.

I say in conclusion that Bill C-61 can accomplish three objectives. First, it answers the request from the Jewish community for legislative support to rectify a situation it considers unfair. Jewish persons who wish to remarry within their faith will have a greater opportunity to do so.

Second, it protects the integrity of the government's own legislation, the Divorce Act, by ensuring that concessions are not made on support, custody or access in exchange for religious divorce.

Third, the amendment does not appear to have an impact upon other religious groups. National Jewish groups have already indicated their support for the proposed amendments. The B'nai Brith made this comment in a communiqué on the day we introduced it: "Canadians should be proud that their government is prepared to make its multiculturalism policy a living reality by undertaking actions as this." The Canadian Jewish Congress commended the federal government for introducing the legislation.

I would ask all members of the House to support this bill.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also welcome this important amendment to the Divorce Act and I want to commend the minister for bringing it forward.

It is a bill that means a great deal in the Jewish community of which I am a member. I have been part of the process over the years of looking for solutions to a situation in Halachic law, which is the Jewish traditional law that puts women at a very considerable disadvantage when civil divorces are granted. I am happy that the minister has brought it forward today. I was very glad that we were able to sit through the lunch hour in order to get this bill through, together with some other justice bills.

I must confess to be dazzled at the display of learning about Jewish traditional law that the minister has just shown, and I am look forward to the bill going to committee. I do not think this is a controversial bill. I know it is a bill with all-partisan support.

I want also to express some appreciation for the consideration which this bill was given and for the positive support which it received from the other religious and ethnic communities of our country that were approached for comment about this bill. None of them, as we anticipated, would find that this bill made life more difficult for them, nor does this bill entrench in any way on civil or religious freedom in Canada. However, it would not have been difficult to imagine obstacles being put forward just for the sake of making life difficult. I think it is a tribute to the good state of relations among the various groups which proudly make up the fabric of Canada that no such obstacles emerged.

We are faced with a situation in which we can look forward to an accommodation. In a country which is pluralistic, bilingual and multicultural, a measure like this, the result that it has achieved and the support that it has received so far is a good sign of the accommodations that Canadians are prepared to make to reinforce and strengthen the national fabric.

Many people, as do I, visualize lots of possible and potential tensions among the various groups within Canada. Multiculturalism and pluralism is a new kind of national experience. Canada is not a country that has the benefit of a monolithic, racial, religious, cultural group which views the nation as an expression of its identity. Most countries are like that. By contrast, our country is a country whose most basic identity comes from the accommodation of minority groups, from the tolerance of differences and from respect for differences, something which is even better than mere tolerance.

We are making our country work when we accommodate legislation like this. We are helping to set an example for others in the country. I want to express the pleasure that I feel at seeing this important step, demonstrating again the openness of this great country of ours.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House was able to agree unanimously to extend the hours to deal with this important legislation. I want to pay tribute to all members of the House who co-operated in this regard, particularly the member for York Centre who was instrumental in achieving this.

This legislation is legislation for which on behalf of the New Democratic Party I have called for some time. I welcome the government's decision to move forward on it at this moment.

I recall, as I am sure my colleague from York Centre will recall, and indeed I believe my colleague from Niagara Falls was in the House and the committee at that time as well, that during debates on the Divorce Act in 1985 and 1986 there were discussions on this subject. At that point I made it clear that certainly in principle we supported this amendment.

On January 23, 1986, the then Minister of Justice, the member for St. John's West, said this: "I have instructed my officials to establish an expeditious process of consultation with representatives of all the various interests in order to resolve these outstanding issues".

Four years later that expeditious process has resulted in this legislation. I think it is not a minute too soon. I am going to give a couple of examples of the practical effect of the absence of this legislation on women in this country who have suffered as a result.

I want to pay tribute to the many groups and individuals across Canada who have played such an important role in this historic legislation. Those groups include B'nai Brith, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, and a broad range of others.

I want to single out in particular the contribution of a lawyer, John Syrtash, who has done an extraordinary job on behalf of the coalition that has been seeking changes in this law and, in many ways, who was instrumental as well in achieving changes to provincial legislation in the province of Ontario in 1986.

Following the decision of the Minister of Justice to look into this matter, B'nai Brith Canada conducted a comprehensive study on the use of the Get as a bargaining tool in Jewish divorce proceedings. That study pointed out, and it has already been noted, that Jews who are loyal to the teachings and practices of their faith are not free to enter into a second marriage unless the prior marriage has been terminated either by the death of the spouse or by the execution of the divorce procedure recognized by Halacha, which is Jewish law.

This study documented that in some 311 cases the refusal to issue a Get resulted in very substantial pain and difficulty to one of the spouses. The vast majority of those spouses affected—in some 202 of the cases—are in fact women who were affected by their husband's refusal to grant the Get. There were certainly as well some instances of women who refused to consent to the Get. The reality is that it is primarily Jewish women who have been hurt by this requirement.

I want to spend just a couple of minutes in terms of the background of this. I think it is important that we recognize what has led to this legislation because I believe it is the first in the world at the national level.

One of the commentators on the subject, a woman named Norma Joseph who participated in a forum in Montreal in October, 1988, gave some of the background. She pointed out that mutual consent constitutes sufficient grounds for a Jewish divorce; and that if both parties agree they appear before three rabbis who constitute a Beth Din, or Jewish court.

The fact is that the process in the Beth Din was supposed to set both parties free, but in fact in some cases there are partners, particularly women, who are unfree, who are chained, Agunot, Jews who are divorced who cannot obtain the Get. The definition of Agunah or Agun is someone who is tied, chained or anchored to an absent spouse.

I mentioned that this can theoretically affect both men and women, but because of the structure of Jewish law the victim in fact is most frequently a woman. Since a man must give the Get she is left dependent upon his action.

Rabbinical law was amended to include her acceptance of the document but in fact the Beth Din or the rabbinical court can act in a way to release the man without her co-operation but never the other way around.

I mentioned that I wanted to give some practical examples. I think it is important to do that so Canadians who are not familiar with the implications of the Get, as certainly I was not before this was brought to my attention, will realize the significance of what Parliament is doing. I want to thank Norma Joseph for the work she has done in bringing this matter to the attention of parliamentarians and the public.

These are some examples. The first involves an elderly woman, divorced 35 years in Quebec. Finally, she falls in love. She finds someone to take care of her, to share with her, to live with her but she has no Get. She raised her children alone. She did not ask for money and she did not in any way bother her first husband. All she wanted was to be free, to end her days in companionship and love. But without the Get she cannot remarry.

Another example involves a young woman who had no children but who had a business. Her ex-husband said: "Okay, I will give you the Get but you renounce your share of our business".

There is the case of a professional, a social worker, who would not give the Get out of revenge because, he said, his wife did not deserve it.

One of the most frequent abuses of this Get procedure is the husband who says: "Sure, I will give you the Get. You just give me $35,000, or $50,000, or $75,000". That is extortion, and that is exactly what this legislation is attempting to deal with.

What about the young woman whose husband has disappeared? She cannot obtain the Get.

One other example involves a woman who married an immigrant. She was to sponsor him in Canada. Things went sour. She instituted divorce proceedings and he said: "No. I will refuse to co-operate with the Get". The social worker who was called in to help advised that she be co-operative and not vindictive: "Sign his immigrant papers. Show him how nice you can be". It was bad advice. He is now a landed immigrant and she is an Agunah, chained, denied that divorce.

It is precisely because of that abuse, the potential for extortion, that this legislation is so important.

I recognize the argument that has been made that we have to very jealously guard the division between church and state. I strongly support that.

As well, I recognize there are some who suggest, including some within the Jewish community, that this is not a matter that should be dealt with by means of legislation. They believe that it is something that should be worked out within the Jewish community; that it should be worked out by the rabbis. Some people say: "If Parliament acts, then that removes the pressure on rabbinic leaders to amend religious law to give women equal status in Jewish divorce proceedings".

Certainly, I fully agree that Jewish lay and rabbinic leaders should be taking steps to reconcile the fact that Jewish women outside Canada will remain disenfranchised with their support for this legislation. I hope that that will happen.

In fact, one of the suggestions that has been made is that an international panel of rabbinic authorities confront this religious law which is so clearly in need of change. That would help to ensure that Jewish women everywhere, not just in Canada, would be treated with dignity and respect as they are entitled to be.

The Halachic solution, the solution within the Jewish community, is an important solution. I note that steps have been taken in that regard already.

I want to pay tribute to the Rabbinic Council of Canada, Quebec Region which, with the approval of the Vaad Harabonim, have instituted a pre-nuptical agreement. Hopefully, these will not be necessary any more. But they did show leadership and I want to pay tribute to them for doing that. I hope now the community will move to deal with this injustice, hopefully on an international scale.

In conclusion, we in the New Democratic Party support this important legislation. We have urged its adoption for some time. I know my colleague for Vancouver East in her capacity as the spokesperson on the status of women has dealt with this important question. My colleague for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, who in particular wanted to be here for this debate but because of the scheduling was unable to, wanted to speak to his support for this bill. Indeed, he, along with the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam and my other colleagues have worked hard with me to bring this legislation about.

This legislation is legislation that is overdue. It will help to ease the pain and the anguish of people who have been denied the Get. We welcome it. We pay tribute to those organizations and individuals who are responsible for bringing it about, for making us the first country in the world to adopt this legislation.

I hope that the legislative committee will move expeditiously to ensure that this becomes law so that no other woman or man will be denied the Get.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 1.45 p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1.45 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF CHILD HEALTH

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the report released by the Canadian Institute of Child Health is a voice for Canadian children. It is a documented cry for help and the government of Canada must react, and react immediately.

The health care of our nation's children is being neglected. The situation is not going to change until some very progressive moves are made in the areas of social and economic development and, just as importantly, social and economic equality.

We have the best hospitals in the world, the best doctors in the world, but until social and economic concerns are addressed, the health of Canadian children will remain as shameful as reported by the Canadian Institute of Child Health.

We need some answers to some very important questions. For example, why do we have so little data on mental health? Why are so many young people committing suicide? We have to look at why our young people are feeling so lost, what is happening out there that is destroying all of their dreams and their aspirations.

In 1986, the death rate for poor children was 56 per cent higher than those of higher income children. The mortality rates for our native infants are twice the rate of the total population. Health care does not just mean medicine. Health care is integrally linked to social and economic conditions.

Children are our guarantee of a future. We are relying on them for tomorrow, just as much as they are relying on us today.

THE FLAG

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, today is a proud one for Canada as we celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of our flag.

However, last Tuesday our country's image was disrespected by a motion placed before this House about racism and bigotry, the very wording of which was mean-spirited, intolerant and insensitive.

It is constructive to make objective criticisms and to propose effective new initiatives to combat racism and bigotry in Canada. It is quite a different matter, and it is destructive, to use these sensitive and critical issues, as that motion did, in sweeping generalities about the character of our country for purposes of political gain.

The political unity and social integrity of our nation are goals which transcend partisan considerations, and every member of this House should feel a sense of partnership in our common effort to make this country whole.

Certainly, we must all do better and we must all do more. But let us recognize that much has already been done to build a unique and enriched society in Canada of which all Canadians should be justly proud.

Let us not in this House be found to be found to be the cause of racial and linguistic division in Canada. Rather, let us always strive to represent together the true course toward complete Canadian unity.

FUR INDUSTRY

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was most disturbed to learn yesterday that Harrod's of London, after 15 years of selling Canadian fur products, is closing its fur salon because of declining demand.

This comes on the heels of the Hudson Bay Company moving its European auction house to Helsinki, ending a century old presence in Britain.

These events should concern all Canadians. The Canadian fur trade contributes over $1 billion to the national economy and well over $300 million is brought into the country through fur exports.

As staunch supporters of the Canadian fur industry, this government recognizes that our fur exports to the United States and to Europe are significant to the health of the industry. The announcement of Harrod's is not good news for Canadian fur exporters.

I call upon my colleagues in the House to work closely with the fur industry, the fur association, and hundreds of northern communities where fur is the economic lifeline to overcome this temporary situation in the market-place. Our continued support for Canadian quality fur products will ensure that there will be no further unwelcome news from Europe and abroad.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, once again Canadians are being subjected to Conservative warnings to "prepare for a tough budget" consisting, no doubt, of even deeper cuts to once sacred social programs and more unfair tax hikes.

This year something new has been added to a tired script: an obsession with secrecy. The Minister of Finance says he is too busy and he is refusing to hold his usual pre-budget consultations and delaying the distribution of the budget until after it has been tabled. This flies in the face of the opinion of his Prime Minister regarding budgetary reform. In his book, Where I Stand, it states: "In an age when we know that government works best when it builds a consensus of public understanding"—I repeat, Mr. Speaker, a consensus of public understanding—"the budget is dropped out of nowhere one night with virtually no effort having been made to achieve agreement or even understanding of its principal goals." The Prime Minister continues: "No process in the world will prevent bad decision-making, but the present budget-making process itself contributes to bad decision-making and therefore to bad government."

New Democrats could not agree more.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the constitutional debate and language issues are now attracting a lot of national attention. I would like to draw heavily on an editorial in this morning's La Presse by Pierre Gravel to urge Canadians to be calm and moderate in their statements and discussions. Relations between anglophones and francophones are becoming increasingly vexed these days. The slightest initiative looks like a declaration of war, bad faith sets in and barriers go up between different groups in our population.

Many in our country are on edge at a time when it is more important than ever for cool heads, the editorialist reminds us. I therefore suggest that Canadians try to deepen the language debate and make an effort to better understand the whole philosophy behind the Meech Lake Agreement. We will really understand each other, Mr. Speaker, when we each put good will in our contacts, dealings and discussions. It is certainly possible to discuss and express opinions with as much dignity, respect and equanimity as possible.

TRIBUTE TO GEORGES FOREST

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we were very sorry to learn this morning of the death of Georges Forest, a great Canadian and great Manitoban. As you may recall, Georges Forest became known for his tireless efforts to defend the rights of linguistic minorities in Manitoba.

In a spirit of openness and tolerance, Georges Forest relentlessly pursued his cause to the Supreme Court of Canada, which ruled in his favour. By this historic act, he corrected 100 years of injustice to Manitoba's francophones. Mr. Forest was not a vengeful man. Mr. Forest was a great Canadian who believed in the principle of linguistic duality and respect for minority rights.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to him today and I ask this House to join me in extending our sincerest condolences to his family. This great patriot has made his mark.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we all know that across Canada there are very strong feelings and loud opinions being expressed about the proposed GST. I am concerned that there are some irresponsible people advising others to protest the tax by not submitting their applications for the GST credit included with the 1989 income tax form.

Next year, a family with two children and $20,000 net income who would have received a $10 FST credit in 1988, will be eligible for a GST credit of $580. A senior with a net income of $20,000 is eligible for a GST credit of $290 in 1991.

This credit is designed to assist low-income earners. Most of the irresponsible advice to boycott the rebate form is coming from those who, by virtue of high income, would not be eligible for it. I would urge those who are eligible, whether they support the tax or not, to complete the form and take advantage of the credit.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare responded to my question about the muzzling of government advisory groups with the threat of budget cuts, by saying that if I had bothered to listen to the radio, his deputy minister had made it abundantly clear that no such suggestion was made.

I suggest that the Minister might want to read today's Citizen where his deputy minister is directly quoted as saying:

> It's like having the heads of one of my departments, or indeed me, saying this is a crummy piece of government policy—

I remind the minister that the National Council on Welfare is a citizens' advisory body and has included, among its members, not only welfare recipients, public housing tenants and low-income citizens, but lawyers, professionals and social workers. The executive director is accountable to the council, not to the minister, and the council has a mandate to advise this government on poverty and social issues.

Ministers muzzling advisory bodies who tell it like it is does not make crummy policy good, it makes crummy policy crummy law.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, the fire now raging in a stockpile of discarded tires in Hagersville, Ontario, has revived fears about the hazard posed by these sites.

I think it is absolutely essential and urgent that measures to get rid of these stockpiles be taken as soon as possible. That is why we would like to bring the following to the attention of the House. Dr. Christian Roy, an engineer at Laval University, has been working for several years, with the support of the federal Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, on a technique called pyrolysis under vacuum, which can be used to recycle old tires.

The tires are burned in lead tanks equipped with a vacuum pump to draw off the gaseous products, thus preventing contaminants from entering the atmosphere.

With this process, practically the whole tire can be recycled, 65 per cent as oil and 25 per cent in the form of carbon black, which products can then be sold back to the industry.

Every year 25 million tires are produced in Canada. Clearly, we must stop stockpiling these discarded tires and start using other methods to get rid of them.

Personally, I think the vacuum pyrolysis technique developed by Dr. Roy might be the answer. That is why the government should make this new technology one of its priorities.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, after having incurred the wrath of nearly every Canadian taxpayer through his proposed goods and services tax, the Minister of Finance has sunk to a new low.

Indeed, 20 years after the proclamation of the Official Languages Act, that minister has the temerity to insult my constituents by providing them with brochures in only one of the official languages, extolling the dubious virtues of his infamous GST.

Need I remind the minister that the riding of Restigouche—Chaleur is composed of a bilingual population and that New Brunswick is the only officially bilingual province in Canada.

My constituents expect to receive bilingual services and the government has the obligation to provide them.

[Translation]

The people of St–Quentin are upset because of this brochure, and rightly so. They asked me why, in 1990, Francophones still have to ask to get information in French, even when it comes from the seat of government of a bilingual country. They also wonder whether the GST is something only Anglophones have to understand.

At a time when there is a real language crisis in this country, the minister should have avoided aggravating the problem and made sure that information on the GST was distributed in both official languages.

TWENTY–FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that this century would be Canada's. We are now in the century's last decade, and I think can say that our country did in fact, reach maturity during the second half of the twentieth century.

Our flag, whose 25th anniversary it is today, testifies better than any other emblem to the maturity of our country. Drawing from the traditions of people from all over the world, as well as from our own experience, we have become mature as a nation worthy of the name.

Our flag is a precious part of our heritage. Its symbolism goes deep into our collective soul and has hepled to promote our identity as a people.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I would like to quote what was said by the hon. Maurice Bourget, Speaker of the Senate, on February 15, 1965: "The flag is a symbol of the unity of our country, since there can be no doubt that it represents all citizens of Canada, regardless of race, language, creed or opinion".

[English]

THE FLAG

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, today marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Canadian flag.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jordan: It was 25 years ago that our distinctive red maple leaf flag was raised over this building for the very first time.

John Matheson, a former MP from Leeds was credited at that time by Prime Minister Pearson as "the one man who had more to do with having a Canadian flag than any other."

Today, we salute John Matheson and all proud Canadians as we celebrate the silver anniversary of Canada's very own distinctive red maple leaf flag.

MEMBER FOR CHAMBLY

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand an incredible article which begins with the headline: "Edmonston does flip-flop: Now he's opposing Meech". I want to quote from the article which states:

> During the Party's leadership convention in December, Edmonston reacted bitterly to a compromise resolution seeking changes to Meech.
> Delegates accepted it in an effort to reconcile supporters of the accord and members who wanted major changes.
> "You can't have your cake and eat it, too. I'm not saying that to be menacing or to blackmail you," Edmonston warned the convention, saying the resolution was a vote against Meech and Quebec.

The article further states:

> During the by-election campaign Edmondston simply pretended the NDP's position didn't exist, campaigning on a platform of total acceptance of the deal without amendments.

The article further states:

> He turned his back yesterday on the no-compromise, pro-Meech position that helped him win a stunning landslide victory in Monday's Chambly, Quebec, by-election.

He says: "I support the party (position) entirely". Cynical? You bet. I will bet you the poor people of Chambly are scratching their heads today.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, a few years ago I fought to save The Friendly Giant from budget cuts at the CBC. Well, last week was like a replay of a bad dream. It started with the cancellation of Switchback, a wonderful regionally produced youth services on CBC television. It ended with the news that Conservative policies, including the GST and cuts to postal subsidies may kill off Owl and Chickadee magazines, this at a time when we want to encourage reading and environmental awareness among our children.

This governing is slamming the Polka Dot Door on children's entertainment. What is next? Contracting out Casey and Finnegan's jobs to a pair of non-union Smurfs?

The issue is more than just entertainment. The shaping of young minds will happen whether we act or not. All we can influence is who does the shaping and how.

It can be done by Nintendo, Rambo and G.I. Joe, or it can be done with a view to the future, with intelligent media programming and rich, valuable reading. The choice is ours.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the pigeons have come home to roost. The Bank of Canada interest rate is at 13.32 per cent, an all-time high since the recession of the early 1980s.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Will he acknowledge that his prediction in the budget last year that we would be enjoying rates around 10 per cent at this stage of the game, was a total and unmitigated failure? The Minister of Finance has to tell Canadians and the money markets, investors and business people what is the policy of this government on interest rates in Canada.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have made it abundantly clear what the policy is, not just yesterday, not just the day before, but for many months now.

With the instability and the volatility in the markets today, our first objective is to gain stability in those markets, and second, on an ongoing basis, to reduce the level of inflation so that we can get interest rates down.

I acknowledge what my hon. friend has said. Interest rates have stayed up longer than we had anticipated last April. The reason is that inflationary pressures have been stronger and the economy has been stronger than we had anticipated in April. I might add that they are stronger than many other economic forecasters had anticipated last April.

Once we get inflation under control, we will be able to see some easing in interest rates. But until we see some real progress in getting inflation under control, we will not be able to see any meaningful reduction in interest rates.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, is the minister prepared to at least admit that the contradictory statements made by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, Conservative backbenchers and the Governor of the Bank of Canada contribute to the uncertainty among Canadians and investors here and abroad? My question for the Finance Minister is: Do Canadians not deserve a coherent, comprehensible policy from this government after five years in power? Is he prepared to articulate such a coherent policy in order to reassure investors that the Government of Canada knows where it is going?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, above all, what investors, whether they are Canadian or foreign, have received over the last five years is a coherent economic policy. This coherent policy was first set out in November 8, 1984 in the Agenda for Economic Renewal where we stated clearly the two prongs of our economic strategy: first, to get our financial house in order, and second, to deal with some of the structural problems that were causing inefficiencies in our economy. We have followed what we set out to do in November 8, 1984 in a very careful, consistent and coherent way.

• (1420)

The results have been very clear. In Canada, we have had economic growth only a small margin behind that of Japan. We have had the best job–creation record of any of the major industrialized countries through that period, and precisely because Canadians and foreign investors could understand exactly where we were going as a country because it was all set out in that document of November 8, 1984.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, interest rates are going up, the dollar is going down, the government is going where even angels fear to tred.

The question that the finance minister has to address and that I put to him today is that just last Friday the Prime Minister was saying after the budget is introduced next week, the interest rates are going to go down. Interest rates today are up to an unparalleled height since the Minister of Finance came into office. The rates are going up this week. Are they going to go down next week? Does the minister have a policy, and how is he going to explain to Canadians that he is saying one thing and the Prime Minister is saying another?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely wrong and he knows that he is wrong. If he had taken the time to read the transcript of what the Prime Minister said, he would have seen that it was exactly what I have been saying over the past number of weeks. I say to him, read it before trying to sow this uncertainty in the minds of Canadians.

I have made it very clear that if people want to see lower interest rates then we have to see lower inflation. Until we get lower inflation, we are not going to see lower interest rates. It is as simple as that. That is what we have been striving to do with our interest rate policy, and that is what we have been striving to do in our fiscal policy.

Every time this government has tried to do something to get our expenses down, to get the deficit down and to get the debt problem under control, every time we have put something on the table that party, as well as the New Democratic Party, have fought tooth and nail to try to stop us doing these things. These are the things that we are committed to do. We are going to do them because they are right for the country and they are going to result in a much healthier economic environment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, this government's high interest rate policies are hammering Canadian exporters. It means that they have to pay more to modernize and be competitive. It means that the artificially high dollar created by this government is a far greater burden on our Canadian exporters than the U.S. interest rates were that this free trade deal purported to eliminate.

Let us look at the results of this government's coherent economic policies for the last five and one-half years. When this government took office the government's current account surplus with other nations was $3.1 billion. Today, we have a record deficit of $20 billion. When will this government realize that its high interest rates have straitjacketed Canadian producers, that they are costing us exports and that they are costing us jobs?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member fails to point out that one of the reasons for that current account deficit is that companies have been investing in the future because they have confidence in the future. When they invest in the future they buy that machinery and equipment in large part from other countries. That is one of the major reasons why our current account deficit has increased over the past few years because we have had record investment in Canada reflecting the confidence that people have had in the future of this country and in the policies that this government has been following.

I understand some of the concerns that the hon. member has mentioned about high interest rates and about the level of the Canadian dollar. I understand the impact that this can have on Canadians, but I ask him to consider the alternative.

If we let interest rates go down in an unnatural way and fire that over-heating inflation, what is going to happen to the inflation rate in this country? What is going to happen to the permanent, competitive position of the very people for whom he purports to be speaking? It will be damaged on a permanent basis and we will have interest rates that are permanently too high. That is what we had in the seventies and early eighties. That brought the most serious recession this country has seen since the thirties and that is what we are going to avoid.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, our producers cannot compete when their interest rates are over 14 per cent and the Japanese producers are paying less than 5 per cent.

My second question involves our second deficit, the budget deficit. By increasing interest rates in Canada last year, in one year alone the government added $6 billion to our national debt. With our twin deficits, a record current account deficit now, and our record national debt, these are a direct result of this government's economic mismanagement.

When will the government stop sacrificing Canada's economic future on the altar of high interest rates?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know who the hon. member is trying to impress, but I can tell him one group of people he would not impress is international investors. If he were standing in my position making those same comments, he can be sure that the dollar would be falling through the floor and we would see interest rates go up further. That is what we are trying to avoid.

The hon. member talks about deficits. Let me remind him that the operating account of the government, that is revenues less program spending, was in a deficit position when we were elected in 1984. In other words, we were spending $16 billion more on government programs than we were taking in. That has now reversed itself. It is a $9 billion surplus. We are making good progress and one of the reasons why we have made good progress is we have controlled government spending.

I say to the hon. member, has he or has his party given us one place where we could reduce program spending in the last five and a half years? I do not remember one.

[Translation]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Finance.

The Bank of Canada has just raised the interest rate to 13.32 per cent, an increase of 53 basis points, Mr. Speaker. That is incredible!

I think that we are almost on the verge of a monetary crisis in this country. For that reason, I would like to ask the Finance Minister this question. Yesterday, he told the House that there would be cuts in social programs such as education, health and transfers to the provinces because of the Canadian deficit which is too high.

Mr. Speaker, given the rise in interest rates this afternoon, I would like to know whether the Minister of Finance can now explain exactly how much will be cut from social programs next week in Canada.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think there is a very substantial distortion by the hon. member of what I said in the House yesterday, but I guess that is not surprising. That usually comes from that hon. member almost every time he asks a question.

He has asked me to say to him what would be in the budget next week. He knows that it is not possible for me to comment. What I would say to him is if he has some ideas on how we can cut government program spending in a sensible, sensitive way, as we know we must in this country, then I would welcome his suggestions. But again, I have not received any suggestions from him or his colleagues on that score for the last five and half years.

• (1430)

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, we have told the Minister of Finance a number of times he can cut out some of the grants to his corporate friends in this country and save billions of dollars.

I do not know if the Minister of Finance realizes that we are almost in a very serious economic crisis in this country. The bank rate has jumped .5 per cent today, by 53 basis points.

The Prime Minister predicted just last week that the bank rate in this country would be down before Christmas. I want the Minister of Finance to tell the House today how he is going to bring down the bank rate in this country without cutting back on social programs, programs for the poor, or health, education and transfers to seven provinces of this country. How is he going to do that without hurting the ordinary people?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that we should cut subsidies to business, grants to business. I would like to draw to his attention that those grants, those subsidies involve subsidies for agriculture, social housing, regional development, research and development. That amounts to the vast majority of what he would classify in the government expenditures as subsidies to business.

Which ones of those subsidies is he saying we should cut, because they are not easy to cut? Each one of those is important. They are important objectives of the Government of Canada, and I believe of his party as well. So come clean, let us know which one of those subsidies you would like to see us cut.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): The Minister must recognize that his high interest rate policy has created the problem in agriculture. If you compare the government's intervention to hold up the value of the Canadian dollar through the Bank of Canada's high interest rates with that same government's instructions to farmers via FCC, to "Face up to the market realities in assessing their viability", I have to ask the Minister of Finance to explain why he has not faced up to the same market realities he espouses, permitting the Canadian dollar to fall, thus reflecting its true unmanipulated market value and allowing farm prices to rise?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, these are all very worthy objectives that the hon. member would like to see happen. We would all like to see lower interest rates. But we on this side know that you cannot just snap your fingers and make it happen.

The only way it can happen is if the fundamentals of the economy will support a lower level of interest rates. The extent of inflationary pressures that are in the economy today simply do not support that.

The hon. member is telling us to bring down interest rates in an unnatural way, stoke up the fires of inflation, go right back to what we had in 1982. If he is saying that his farm friends in Saskatchewan are saying they want to have the 20 per cent plus interest rates that we had in 1981–82, I think he is wrong. We do not support that. We are doing everything we can to get inflation down so we can get interest rates down in a permanent way, not the "pie in the sky way" that the hon. member would like to see us have.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. On page 2 of its pre-budgetary brief to the Minister of Finance concerning the GST, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business states that the small grocery stores will be especially affected and will experience tremendous enforcement problems which will compell a great many of them to close.

How could the minister claim in his Information for Convenience Stores bulletin that the necessary paperwork will be kept at a minimum, when in his brief John Bullock says it will not? Who knows small business better, John Bullock or the Minister of Finance?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member is distorting what was said in that brochure. We have said right from the start that we are happy and are working with members of the small business community to address this concern. We understand the concern. We understand that they do not want to have any unnecessary complexities as a result of the GST.

We have said that there are two ways of simplified accounting, and that there are more ways of developing simplified accounting systems. We are quite happy to consider those ways to help those grocers and the retailers he talks about.

Over the course of this year we will have representatives from National Revenue, as my colleague, the Minister of National of Revenue has said, to meet on a one-on-one basis to help the members of the small business community understand what is required of them and how the GST will affect their purchasing and pricing so that they can have an easy transition into the new system and avoid the problems that we know they are concerned about. That is why we are going to this extent to solve those problems.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about a simplified accounting system. How can he simplify an accounting system when, if you sell yogurt or pudding on an individual basis, it is taxable? If you sell the same products in a group or package, where there is more than one, then it is taxable. What kind of an accounting system does he believe a small cornerstore will need to meet his proposal? Why will the minister not withdraw the measure and make it simple for everybody?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that that is one of the difficult borderlines between what is basic groceries and what is taxable foods.

I do not think the hon. member would like to see us tax basic groceries, so we have to draw the borderline somewhere.

One of the objectives of the simplified accounting system is to allow the retailer to account for those without having to calculate each item on an individual basis as they go by his cash register. The purpose of the simplified accounting is so that he can step back and look at the over-all books of accounts and, in that way, have a much simpler way of calculating what tax is owing.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Dozens of protesters gathered in sub-zero temperatures in Brandon, Manitoba, yesterday to tell the Prime Minister exactly how they feel about the GST. Apparently the Prime Minister was not in any mood to listen. He and his entourage just sped by.

One protester was heard to say, "It is a crime that we elect these people, then we have to have demos like this to get our message across". The message is quite clear. They do not want the GST and they are fed up paying Tory taxes.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance today whether he can assure Canadians that come next week's Budget there will be no new taxes and no increases in existing taxes?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we acknowledge that there are people in the country who are opposed to the GST. We also know that at the Prime Minister's dinner, there were 450 people who listened attentively to what he had to say about the GST.

As a result of the Prime Minister's speech, they realized the benefits of the GST and how it will improve our ability to export, and how it will put Canadian producers on a level playing field with importers. Importers now have one-third less tax to pay than the Canadian producers. Also, they learned how it will help the farm community by giving them a full rebate on tax on all farm inputs. These are the benefits that are going to be gained by various sectors in the economy.

I will always come back to the same point. I have listened carefully to what hon. members in the Liberal Party have to say about the GST. They are full of complaints, but they do not have one alternative. They do not know where to go. If we said today, "No GST", they would have their mouths absolutely wide open with nothing to say because they do not know what the alternatives are.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, the minister says there were 450 at the meeting. Yes, but they were all carefully selected.

The Minister of Finance will be debating the GST with our finance critic in Edmonton on March 5, but the tickets are by invitation only and they are going to cost $100. That, to me, is an outrage.

• (1440)

I want to ask the finance minister whether he would consider attending another meeting in Edmonton the same day, where the admission price might be free so that ordinary Canadians do not feel locked out of the process and where they can put their questions and concerns directly to the finance minister? It seems to me that if the finance minister wants to elaborate on the GST this will be an excellent opportunity for him.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the thoughtfulness of the hon. member. He should know that that particular debate is going to be on national television. Surely that is going to give Canadians from coast to coast an opportunity to listen and see the nature of the debate.

Mr. Harvard: Another selected audience.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Hon. members would like me to respond to questions. I have been on many, many open line shows, coast to coast. The week before I am going to be on three open line shows in British Columbia. I believe I am going to be on an open line show in Edmonton the same day as the debate on March 5. I am happy to do this on an ongoing basis because I have confidence that the GST is right for this country. It is going to put our country in a more competitive position. It will also avoid $2 billion worth of tax avoidance.

Now if the Liberal Party of Canada is in favour of $2 billion of tax avoidance, it is great to hear it because these are the things that we have been trying to stamp out for the last five and a half years, and we have been making good strides in doing so.

INDUSTRY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. I met today with workers from Varta Batteries Investment Canada. Some 175 workers face job losses in Winnipeg because of the U.S. takeover and shutdown at Varta.

Investment Canada admitted that its review had not taken account of the spin-off job losses at Canada Medals and Reliance Plastics. I want to ask the Minister how he can possibly justify a decision which did not take into account these important points in terms of economic impact.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, this particular company was losing substantial amounts of money and it was simply a case of their going bankrupt if we did not allow someone to purchase them. I suppose we could have nationalized them, but if that is what he is advocating we will take a look at it. The alternatives were very limited because of the financial situation of that company.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in fact, the Manitoba government claimed that some workers from Winnipeg would be transferred as part of this takeover to the remaining St. Thomas plant which was going to be kept in operation. But this week we learned that 35 workers at the St. Thomas plant have also been given layoffs.

Why has the minister approved a takeover and a shutdown which has lost us one plant in the west and is losing us jobs here in Ontario? Is this not simply a case of a company taking over a Canadian firm, shutting it down, piece by piece, in order to benefit from free trade?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as I explained in answer to the hon. member's first question, the company was losing business.

I think the hon. member should be aware of the fact that during the 1980s, on average, 130,000 new corporations were created each year and 100,000 went out of business. Every year four million Canadians change jobs. The hon. member talked about 35 jobs in St. Thomas, and that is regrettable. But I am pleased that Freightliner is building a new factory in St. Thomas that will pick up that 35 and about 1,000 more. I think that on balance St. Thomas is well looked after.

The point is that change occurs. The New Democratic Party would like to stop all change. That is not wise. It is nonsensical.

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The February 6, 1990 issue of the Val d'Or L'Écho newspaper referred to a statement made by Mr. Raymond Savoie, the Quebec Minister responsible for mining, and then added:

> The minister also confirmed the rumours to the effect that the PSEC would be phased out by 1991 because of budgetary cuts.

My question is this: Could the minister confirm that Minister Savoie consulted him or his department before announcing that the PSEC for mining exploration would be phased out by 1991 in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm anything relating to either conversations that have been alleged or that might have been mentioned in newspapers, or any speculation on any budgetary matter.

THE WORKFORCE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Yesterday the Economic Council published its report, Good Jobs, Bad Jobs, in which it indicated that 70 per cent of Canadians are now employed in service industries and that there is a growing polarization between the good jobs and bad jobs in this sector, with the result that there is a declining middle-class in this country. The report said that this was due to the fact that between 1980 and 1988, half of the jobs created were part-time, temporary, low-paying jobs with low benefits.

When will the government implement the recommendations in this report to better protect these workers and to give them adequate compensation? When are we going to see some action in respect of this report?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the report which was tabled yesterday. We have started reviewing it. I am very pleased to inform the hon. member that the Minister of Employment and Immigration in her Labour Force Adjustment Program has forecast $100 million specifically for older workers to get retraining. If his friends in the other Chamber can let Bill C-21 go, we will have $800 million to retrain people in Canada, precisely to occupy these new jobs.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21 is not doing this in the way in which the Economic Council recommends. If the minister reads the report he will notice that the council states that the growth of these low-paying jobs is undermining the economic security of a significant and growing portion of the workforce. That is an alarming indictment of the government's policies in the employment and labour area.

Will the minister on behalf of the government make a commitment to report soon to this House what the government's response will be to this report, to deal with these workers, the one-half of Canadian workers who are being left out of this growing Canadian economy?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell once more to my hon. colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that this government has been involved for many years in setting up programs for preparing Canadian men and women in the labour force to occupy the jobs which exist now or will exist in the future in the new technological industries.

I suggest however that he would do a favour to the Canadian public generally if he managed to convince his non-elected colleagues in the other place to adopt as soon as possible Bill C-21 which is now before the House, thereby making available to us the money we need to provide Canadian men and women with the necessary training to fill up the new jobs of the 1990s and the 2000s.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Over the past few days the minister has been floating trial balloons about possible changes to the ACOA program. The last time the minister took such flights of fancy ACOA suffered a 20 per cent cut and its program criteria was dramatically altered.

Now that the minister has seen the error of his ways, will he give Atlantic Canadians an assurance that his so-called impending changes are not just code words for further gutting of the only regional development program in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I received my colleague's letter yesterday, delivered to my office, in which he earnestly requested to be kept very closely informed about any such changes so that he could adequately respond. I will keep that in mind.

In so far as detrimental effects, I want to point out to the member again that in his constituency alone he has had over 600 jobs created under the auspices of ACOA, at estimated total costs of $42 million. I think that perhaps it would be in order for him to wait and see about the changes because ACOA is the best thing he and other members in Atlantic Canada have going.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for his compliment about my competence as the member for Dartmouth.

I would like to read from the Conference Board of Canada report today which states:

> The Maritime provinces will have to weather a storm front of economic uncertainty as major problems in the fisheries adversely affect their economic performances in 1990 and 1991.

It has been confirmed that a part of the proposed fisheries assistance program will be delivered through the ACOA budget. But what we do not know is how much the program will cost or where the money is going to come from.

Will the minister confirm that any fisheries assistance program will be funded by additional new moneys, or is the minister finally admitting that the promised generous assistance is nothing more than a deceitful reshuffling of an already gutted and battered ACOA budget?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is disappointing to see that my colleague opposite has joined the legion of the perpetually indignant, Mr. Speaker. I can only say to him that the assistance that will be allocated to help the town of Canso and other disadvantaged areas in Atlantic Canada will be real assistance and whether he wants to quibble about old money or new money is up to him.

THE LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, in a recent article in The Citizen the Canadian Lumbermen's Association president has noted that the jobs hundreds of people across Canada who work at 40 distribution centres for the lumber area where wood is unloaded at warehouses and reloaded in different packages for American customers will be lost as a result of the goods and services tax. They say that to avoid the high cost of financing the tax the reload centres will just simply move across the border.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister finally hear the cries of the lumber industry and Canadian workers and finally give the industry and the people of Canada a break?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those industries that is a major beneficiary of the goods and services tax. The hon. member should realize that included today in the price of fuel, computers and telephones, of building materials, of office equipment, and a range of things are existing federal sales taxes.

As a result of the GST all of that sales tax will be removed from the costs. It will make industries more competitive. It will put them in a better position where that particular industry will be able to sell into their major market, the United States, in a much more competitive way than it can today. That is why the GST is going to create jobs. It will create more wealth for the province of British Columbia. That is why we are in favour of the GST.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Minister of Finance thinks that if he continues to tell a lie often enough, or tell his story often enough—

Some hon. members: Order!

Mr. Whittaker: —that finally the people of Canada will believe that story.

An Hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian lumber industry is still reeling from the 15 per cent tax imposed on it for export to the United States. Will the minister recognize that even this industry does not want the GST? Will he axe the tax now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the member from Victoria was distracting you, but when a member says that I have been telling a lie many, many times, then at that stage I draw the line and say no answer to that type of question.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. member to withdraw the remark.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I would be most happy to. I tried to correct the error in my original summation by changing it to story. I am very pleased to withdraw the allegation that there was a lie by the minister. I withdraw that allegation.

CFB CHATHAM

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. I would like to ask about the Tracadie at CFB Chatham. For several years now, negotiations have been under way between the federal government and the Province of New Brunswick for additional lands for the Tracadie range associated with CFB Chatham. What is the status of these negotiations at the present time? What will be the extent of the utilization of that land, and what is the environmental impact?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks several questions. In 1985, the Government of Canada started negotiations with the government of New Brunswick to use New Brunswick Crown land to provide low level air defence training. At the present time those discussions are going forward. At the present time there is a joint environmental impact study being done by the province and the federal government.

The land would be used less than 70 days a year for low level air defence training. The very important consideration is that unless that land can be provided by the government of New Brunswick, either at Tracadie, Kearns or Dungarvon there will not be an opportunity to have a low-level air defence training school in Chatham, and we will have to consider closing that base.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF SOUTHWESTERN MONTREAL

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. The minister knows that one of the major recommendations of the southwestern Montreal employment and economic recovery committee (CREESOM) was to favour local solutions and community organizations. The minister said recently, and I quote: "—it is not up to the federal government to be in charge of Montreal's economic recovery; it must come from the community."

Can we conclude that his government accepts the philosophy of the CREESOM report and that the government will financially support RESO, the southwest Montreal local economic development corporation?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to repeat the answer I gave yesterday to a similar question: the CREESOM report was given to us in late December and we then told its authors that we would answer them by late February or early March, and that is what we intend to do in the next few weeks.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer is disappointing. He must know that the people of southwest Montreal are eagerly waiting for the government's answer. I am not asking him to give exact figures; I am just asking him to confirm whether he accepts the basic philosophy of the report, which is to encourage community organizations and local solutions, because that seems to tie in with his own philosophy? Yes or no, does he accept this philosophy?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat it again.

[English]

I will repeat it in the other language to make sure that my hon. friend understands. We have said to the authors of this report that we will provide our answer by the end of February or beginning of March, and we intend to respect that deadline.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Now that the Open Skies Conference is over, we have seen the superpowers come to an agreement on troop reductions in Central Europe and we have had a first-hand experience of glasnost internationally, will the minister commit to conduct a reassessment of Canadian foreign policy?

Will that reassessment include and be accompanied by a new defence policy which will focus on Canada's role in the areas of arms control, disarmament and peacekeeping internationally?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the recent success of the Open Skies Conference is, among other things, an indication of the success of Canadian foreign policy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That open skies proposal was very strongly and early endorsed by Canada. I think we can claim some of the credit for having persuaded the other 22 countries to gather here for the discussions.

I indicated in response to a question a couple of weeks ago in the House that we are in fact undertaking a fairly substantial review of our policy respecting Europe because of the dramatic impact upon Europe and the world of the changes occurring there. I undertook at the time to bring that report to the standing committee of the House of Commons. After I have had a chance to have it discussed by my colleagues in cabinet, I will do that.

Mr. Speaker: That closes off Question Period.

I understand that there may be some disposition in the House. Perhaps I could hear from the Hon. Minister of Justice.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I think you would find that there is agreement in the House to revert to Statements by Ministers in order to allow for a statement on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Canadian flag.

Mr. Speaker: That is the proposition being put forward by the Minister of Justice.

I must advise the House that I have received notice of certain questions of privilege. I am mindful of the rule that a question of privilege takes precedence over all other matters, but I want to assure those who have given me notice of questions of privilege that if consent is given, as the House leaders seem prepared to do, the questions of privilege will be heard immediately after the statements.

Is there agreement for the proposition of the Minister of Justice?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CANADIAN FLAG

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, as I said at noon at the ceremony on Parliament Hill: In the life of a country, symbols are an important visual manifestation of a nation. They embody a feeling of identity, pride and harmony that transcends all divisions. They are a force that unites citizens as members of one big family.

[English]

Today we celebrate perhaps the most visible and beloved symbol of Canada, our national flag. As we mark the twenty-fifth anniversary of the distinctive maple leaf flag we can't help but think back to what we have accomplished together and the heights we have reached since 1965 when the new flag was first raised over Parliament Hill.

The maple leaf flag will always symbolize a united and confident bilingual and multicultural nation at home and around the world.

Today, as we celebrate the historic anniversary of our flag, we celebrate our citizenship and our pride in belonging to a country that we cherish. Canadians from Newfoundland to British Columbia love their country in ways as diverse as their geography and often uniquely personal.

Let us celebrate today the anniversary of this flag that is a matter of personal and common pride, and let us keep building a just and compassionate society that can be a model to the world.

[English]

I urge all hon. members to join me in saluting our Canadian flag and the country for which it stands.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the new Leader of the Opposition for allowing me to take his place temporarily on this occasion.

Those of us in the Official Opposition who 25 years ago were on the government side and who followed this debate with great diligence cannot but rejoice in today's great celebration.

[English]

We all met earlier this morning a lot of young Canadians. They could not believe that we had a debate. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we had a long debate, a very long and very difficult debate. At long last we agreed with each other; agreed to disagree maybe, but at long last we gave Canada and Canadians a new Canadian flag.

A very few days after the debate was over, Canadians from every region and province of the country, as well as people from outside Canada, accepted what is so natural for a country—to have its own symbol.

—a symbol of pride. A symbol of pride is always something that does not denigrate others but gives us who call ourselves Canadians a symbol of our belonging to a country. And that is our flag, the Canadian flag!

On behalf of my party, on behalf of all my colleagues, and on behalf of three members who survived that time, the Right Hon. John N. Turner, the Hon. Herb Gray, our new Opposition Leader, my new Opposition Leader—

[English]

On behalf of my new leader and on my own behalf I want to say that it is a great day for us to celebrate 25 years.

We know that 25 years later we are going into some other debate, but we know that people of good faith will find a solution for Canada.

I could not conclude and take my seat without at least giving an extract of a speech that taught me what politicians should be: people of courage. I was very honoured as a young, new parliamentarian to be invited by the right hon. Mr. Pearson to go with him to Winnipeg—yes, Winnipeg—for an address by him as Prime Minister to the Twentieth Dominion Convention of the Royal Canadian Legion at the Capital Theatre on Sunday, May 17, 1964.

It was for me an event that I will never forget. It is a lesson I will teach young Canadians, that when you have strong beliefs you must express them. Mr. Pearson did not choose to go to Quebec City where it would have been very well received and highly popular to say: "We have a new Canadian flag". No, he chose the place where he knew they were the most reluctant.

If you watched TV last night, you will know that he was completely booed by the attendees. I think there was Mrs. Pearson, Mary Macdonald his secretary, myself, and a couple of people somewhere who applauded. You saw that on TV last night. Yet, a few days later he started the debate.

I would like all of us to reflect on this quote in these so-called difficult times that our country is going through on another issue. He said: "We who are elected to serve Canada in Parliament owe all those who elect us more than the advocacy of non-controversial ideas. We owe Canada our best judgment and we fail Canada if we fail to exercise that judgment or if we pass our responsibility for judgment back to the electorate who send us to Parliament."

I would like us to reflect on that. I would like to pay tribute to the right hon. Mr. Pearson and to all those who accepted that it was in the best interest of Canada at that time, since today we all agree that it was the right decision. Young Canadians from all parts of Canada are proud.

Just travel across Canada, in all our provinces, and you will see the pride of our young people when they show they are Canadians by waving the Canadian flag.

Thank you for this occasion! I say to young Canadians: Do not lose hope. We have a great country to build, a country that is growing every day. We will keep building it, but we must not abandon our youth which was our hope, 25 years ago, when we chose this flag.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate together the twenty-fifth anniversary of the raising of the first national flag of Canada, the Canadian maple leaf flag.

As we stood today in front of the Peace Tower in a bitterly cold blizzard, I recalled the tremendous struggles and the many achievements of the people who have gone before us to build this great nation from sea to sea to sea: the aboriginal peoples who have protected this land from its beginnings; the explorers and early settlers in Upper and Lower Canada who spoke English and French; the Fathers of Confederation who met in Charlottetown; the influx of the European immigrants who homesteaded and settled the west; the Chinese workers who built our railroads and the many immigrants who joined them to settle in B.C. Our country and horizons expanded as Newfoundland joined the Canadian family and our appreciation grew with the vast and exciting northern territories.

Many of the pioneers in our history books are men, but the women who also homesteaded raised large families, suffered loneliness and hardship and often died young. They also are the heroines of our history.

My thoughts as we faced the blizzard also went back to my own first experience overseas as a Red Cross worker with Commonwealth forces in Japan and Korea. The maple leaf flag was our rallying point, and we were one Canadian family regardless of our home province or language.

When we travel away from home we realize how fortunate we are to be Canadians and live in a land that is so vast and beautiful and resourceful. We give out our flag pins proudly and usually receive a warm response around the world.

As we stood in the snow today, the hon. Stanley Knowles reminded me of the bitterness and partisanship that preceded the final acceptance of our red maple leaf flag 25 years ago. I could not help but think that watching high over us silently from his permanent place on the Hill was the Leader of the Opposition of that day. I wondered what he was thinking as he looked down on today's proceedings.

Our flag is our symbol of Canada. It symbolizes our love for this beautiful multicultural country and our distinctive Canadian values. We pass on this flag to our children to symbolize unity and peace and respect for our varied peoples and varied regions. We want it to fly over a land whose beauty and richness will be protected, to be enjoyed by future generations.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. Speaker: On a question of privilege, the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Gauthier: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I indicated that those who had questions of privilege put them aside on the clear undertaking that I would hear them immediately after the tributes to the flag. I think I am bound by that.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given you notice. It arises out of a meeting of the finance committee this morning. With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I would like to present the evidence, very briefly, for why I think there is reason to rule that there is a prima facie case of a breach of my privileges as a member of Parliament.

This morning the finance committee met to consider Bill C-62, the proposed GST legislation. At the sound of the gavel the chair of the committee, the member for Mississauga South, recognized the member for Edmonton Northwest, who moved that we go immediately to orders of the day.

At this point my colleague, the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, and myself protested. We called for points of order and, when these were ignored, I asked to be recognized on a question of privilege. I tried to get the chair's attention but the chair ignored my request to be recognized on a question of privilege. Instead, the chair moved to a clause by clause examination of the bill.

I continued to protest and the chair then asked one of the clerks of the committee to get the Sergeant-at-Arms to have me removed from the committee. I am not privy to what the clerk told the chair, but the request was not carried through and the chair then suspended the meeting for a break. After a 15-minute break, the chair reconvened the committee and I asked to be recognized on a question of privilege. Again the chair refused to recognize me and said that he had something to say and adjourned the meeting.

I feel that my privileges have been breached on two counts. First, Standing Order 48(1) states:

> Whenever any matter of privilege arises, it shall be taken into consideration immediately.

According to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 81:

> By its nature, a question of privilege is of such importance that it may be raised at any time and S. O. 17—

Standing Order 48 as well.

> —makes provision for the precedence of a question of privilege over all other business of the House. A question of privilege arising out of proceedings in the Chamber, during the course of a sitting, may be raised without notice.

I think my privileges as a member were breached on numerous occasions as the chair of the finance committee refused to recognize me when I asked to raise a question of privilege. Second, the chair of the committee threatened to have me removed from the finance committee without having the power to do so. I cite Standing Order 117 which states:

> The Chairman of a standing, special or legislative committee shall maintain order in the committee, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the committee; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the House, on receiving report thereof.

And Beauchesne's, Citation 609, states:

> A committee has no authority to punish one of its members or other person for an offence committed against it, as by disorderly words or contemptuous conduct; for example, when a witness refuses to testify, or prevaricates. The committee may only report such offences to the House for its censure.

I think the chair did not have the power to threaten to have me removed. That is a decision that could only be decided by an appeal to the House, and only the House can censure me.

In conclusion, the bill that was before the committee is one of the most sensitive that has come before this House and this country. With the extensive use of closure, committees are one of the few places left where members of Parliament can call the government's actions into account. Even this is now being undermined by the authoritarian actions of the chair of the finance committee.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that you have often said in the past that what goes on in committee is the committee's business, but if a member of Parliament cannot appeal to the highest Chair in Parliament, where does he seek justice if he cannot get it from the chair of the committee of which he is legally a member?

I humbly submit then that there is evidence of a prima facie breach of my privileges and that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Elections and Privileges.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Gloucester also has a question of privilege. It seems to be very much on the same point. It might be better that I hear his point before hearing any response.

• (1520)

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. My point of privilege, as I indicated under Standing Order 42, is based on the fact that this morning we were convened to a meeting of the Standing Committee on Finance to deal with matters referred to us by this House.

I want to explain that under normal circumstances when a meeting is convened, as it was, for the hour of 9.30 a.m. we should be there. The events of this morning that have been described in some part by my colleague from Nickel Belt took place without my being present, and I want to explain why I believe there is a question of privilege involved.

This morning the West Block of the Hill was very much a buzz of activity as a result of His Excellency, the Secretary of External Affairs of the Soviet Union being present in that building to address another committee. I left a meeting being held at the Centre Block and walked over to the building. It was difficult, and understandably so, to get access to the committee room. I arrived at 27 minutes before ten o'clock. I see my hon. friends who cooked up the scheme that they were part of this morning shaking their heads. Most of the time they are not there at all, much less on time.

We walked in and already the event described by my hon. colleague who raised the question of privilege had taken place. I do not want to comment on the events that took place this morning as it applies to the question of privilege raised by hon. friend, but certainly it seems to me that, in keeping with the traditions and customs of this place, it was not necessary, although the activities that took place yesterday may have caused some embarrassment to members of government, to try to push through the reading of a certain number of clauses in the legislation that had been referred to us.

I am suggesting that even if the government is exasperated with the activities of certain members, it still seems to me that given the situation of what was going on in the West Block this morning and the difficulty that we had to arrive there, it was not courteous to members of this House that we had to play the political games that were being played there this morning.

I humbly suggest that my privileges as a member were breached by the lack of understanding exhibited by the committee at the time, by convening it at 9.30 a.m. and by concluding its activity minutes later.

When I did arrive, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance indicated that there had been some deliberations take place of a very, very short nature and that the meeting was adjourned to the call of the chair.

Given the fact that members are in different parts of the complex here, whether at the Wellington Building, Confederation Building, Centre Block, or West Block, it seems to me that we do need to respect the rights of members of this place. Functioning on a committee such as the Standing Committee on Finance requires a great deal of time and a great deal of effort. It does not serve the purpose of this House, when it refers matters of such importance as the goods and services tax to the committee, that these kinds of things take place.

I respectfully submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that in operating as they did this morning in that committee my privileges and the privileges of my colleagues, the Liberal members of the finance committee, were breached. I bring to the attention of the Chair and to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance that if we are going to deal in a meaningful and constructive way with important measures that are brought before us, we might want to start to behave the way I think most Canadians expect parliamentarians to behave in such circumstances.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief on my question of privilege. I do not wish to repeat what my colleagues have said. I do regret, though, that the meeting was called so abruptly without giving all members time to be there. I know the Liberal members made a valiant attempt to be there but something else took place.

My concern is about the public right to be heard which is a debate between the parties. My concern is about a member's right to be heard. We can have fights in committee, Mr. Speaker. I know how difficult this is for you, and I know you will rule on this.

My particular area of concern was the threat to my colleague, and implied to myself, that if we did not shut up we would be thrown out of the committee. I tried to raise a point of order on that threat, suggesting to the chair of the committee that he had no such authority to do such a thing and, second, that he had no such authority to threaten.

I am not frighten of threats and my colleague is not frightened of threats, but they have no place in that committee. To suggest that bullying from the chair is a method of conducting the business of this House is grossly mistaken and against all the traditions of Parliament.

That is why I am taking this opportunity to raise it on privilege. I refuse to be threatened by anybody and this House shall make judgments on the behaviour of members, no other member, regardless of what situation. I just wanted to point that out.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I am a bit surprised that my friends from the New Democratic Party would raise the issue in this Chamber the way they have this afternoon, particularly after the way they were put on the committee yesterday and spent the whole day arguing a motion, refusing to allow the motion to come to a vote.

However, I did talk to parliamentary counsel, I did get the advice of my clerk and my deputy clerk, and I was advised that a motion to move to orders of the day was appropriate. The motion was made to move to the orders of the day. I called for a vote on that motion and that motion was carried.

There was no request for a poll and I proceeded to call clause by clause. I called Clause 1 on the order of the day. I asked for a vote on Clause 1. There was no contrary on Clause 1, and I called Clause 1 carried. And the same occurred with every clause to Clause 11. At Clause 12 one of the members, the vice-chairman, asked that Clause 12 be deferred. There was no comment from the other side about the clause.

We went then to Clause 13 and Clause 13 was carried, again in the same fashion, and Clause 14 and Clause 15 and Clause 16 and Clause 17.

Mr. Rodriguez: That's not the truth.

Mr. Blenkarn: I then suspended the hearings of the committee to see what we could do to work out something. All of the time my colleagues from the New Democratic Party were screaming, yelling, pointing, and standing up almost on their chairs. I did speak to my clerk about how to retain order. He said that I would have to report so I said we would go ahead with clause by clause. We did so.

I think I have followed the requirements of this House. I have run this committee, as you know, Mr. Speaker, as chairman, elected unanimously at every occasion for the past five years. I have enjoyed the support of the regular members of the committee, but I must say that when new members are suddenly imposed in a committee without knowledge of the committee's background sometimes things do not work in the normal fashion.

The committee did have a complete meeting lined up to analyse the way we would proceed, and we proceeded agreeably with the permanent members of the committee, but when we came to public hearings the matter was altered accordingly.

I must say the witnesses who were called for the day were all there. There was a quorum of the committee there. Unfortunately, Liberal members did not show up in time.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to three members who have raised the question of privilege and I have listened to the chairman of the committee. I also have here a transcript of the proceedings.

I am going to do an unusual thing. I am going to reserve on this matter and I will return to the Chamber as quickly as possible. I do not think there is any need for me to hear further argument. I have the point and I also have the transcript, and I will return to the House as soon as is appropriate.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I too attempted to attend the finance committee this morning on time. I arrived and the door was locked.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. I have already given this an extensive hearing. My usual ruling would be that it is completely improper for the Chair to consider what goes on inside the committee. I have listened carefully to what has been said. I am going to consider it. I am going to look at it. I do not need to hear any further comment. I have the transcript and I hope the hon. member will co-operate with me.

Mr. Skelly (Northern Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, if I might for one minute—

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has another point of privilege, I would ask him to bring it to my attention.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday, I would like to ask the government House leader what business he will bring to the attention of this House today, tomorrow, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, if he can.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will begin debate on the Prime Minister's motion respecting linguistic duality, Meech Lake and the Official Languages Act.

I would like to indicate now that the government is prepared to extend hours this evening with the provision that there be no dilatory motions in order to allow as many members as possible to speak on the motion, and with the proviso that when the last speaker seeks the floor, has it and then sits down, that the debate would automatically be adjourned until tomorrow. There would be no vote obviously.

We would also call the motion for debate tomorrow and again on Monday. I would make the same offer on behalf of the government with respect to debate on Monday, that in order that as many speakers as possible from all three parties may be heard, that we extend the sitting in the evening on the basis that there be no dilatory motions and no vote.

If that does happen, by the end of the evening on Monday we would be in a position to determine just how much time is needed to continue the debate and we could fix a vote at a time which (a) has enough notice as possible for all members; and, (b) is at a time convenient to the members. I would suggest, perhaps, some time Wednesday or Thursday.

I have not settled on business for Tuesday morning at this time, nor Tuesday afternoon. But at 4.30 p.m., we have the budget presentation of the Minister of Finance. The House and the members will know that it is important that we have a fixed time for this statement by the Minister of Finance. We will be presenting the usual motion to the House tomorrow to tie down all the details on that.

Wednesday would be day one of the budget debate. Thursday would be day two. Normally there would be a vote on the NDP subamendment on Thursday at 5.45 p.m. if in fact they feel they have to amend the budget statement.

I would also indicate to the House that the Main Estimates for the 1990-1991 fiscal year will be tabled next Thursday, February 22.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, it is pretty vague as far as Tuesday is concerned. I would ask the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons to be more specific about the business for Tuesday. It is very important for us to know what he intends to do on Tuesday. He said that tomorrow we might have more details, but I would like to know about the day the Budget is brought down and whether he will tell us what the business of the House will be for that day. We have to know.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that. I will have my office get in touch with my hon. friend. As I said, we may continue the debate on the motion. In any event, I can assure my friend because all members want to be au courant on the affairs of the budget and be in a position to comment to their constituents as soon as possible. The business of Tuesday morning and Tuesday after Question Period will be of such a nature that it should not cause great difficulty to the people who will be involved in the lock-up and that type of business. We will make sure we coordinate with the other two offices to see that we have something that is convenient.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the House leader for the government providing us with the agenda for the next few days. It is not clear to me yet about the additional hours today and additional hours again on Monday to allow all members a chance to participate in the debate. How long will those extended sittings be? He then made reference to a vote that may take place. Since the government has introduced the motion, I am assuming they are in support of it unanimously.

My friend, the House leader for the Official Opposition, has indicated its intention to support the motion. We have indicated our intention to support the motion. Right now we presume it has unanimous support of the House of Commons. Normally we would have discussions as to the details. Are we just going to leave it open-ended in terms of how late we go in the evenings and when the vote may take place, if there is a need for it? It seems to be a rather awkward and peculiar way to arrange the business of the House.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, discussions did take place among the House leaders vis-à-vis the extended hours and they are exactly as I related them on the floor of the House just a minute ago. The debate will continue tonight with 20 minute speeches until such time as the last person speaks. When the last member is finishing speaking we would simply adjourn until tomorrow. That same arrangement would take place on Monday.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I apologize that this is a long debate and for negotiating on the floor of the House, but I have not given my consent to sit tonight at all. I do not want the minister to think for one moment that we want to extend or prolong this debate indefinitely. I have told you, Mr. Speaker, and I have told the members of this House and the people of Canada that we are supporting this resolution, but we would like to have some order. We are asking the minister what time does he have in mind for ending the debate so that people can be here to vote and approve this motion? That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my question to the government House leader is the same. He is indicating that the government for some peculiar reason wishes to have a vote on something that we all unanimously support, but he does not say when the vote will take place. He leaves some open-ended arrangement. Could he be explicit as to when the vote will take place on this resolution?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I can be very explicit on when the vote will take place: with enough notice that every member will have an opportunity to be here and vote.

Mr. Gauthier: No way. That's nonsense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We have had enough negotiations. I think what the House leaders should do is have their negotiations and we should carry on with Orders of the Day.

I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended 12 minutes, therefore, Private Members' Business will begin at 5.12 o'clock p.m.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

LINGUISTIC DUALITY

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister) moved:

That this House reaffirm its commitment to support, protect and promote linguistic duality in Canada, as reflected by this House in the Constitution Amendment, 1987 and the Official Languages Act, 1988.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise on this, the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Canadian flag, the universal symbol of Canada, to speak of national unity and linguistic duality.

Just before I do, Mr. Speaker, I think it appropriate that all members of the House on an occasion like this recognize the presence and participation of those members who were here a quarter of a century ago and who participated in that historic debate. I think it would probably be appropriate as well if I took the liberty of paying a special tribute to the Prime Minister of Canada at that time, the Right Hon. Lester Pearson, who was responsible for managing the debate, conducting it and for the tremendous result that we see flying over the Parliament Buildings today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1540)

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I understand that that debate was not unanimous, which is a sort of break with the tradition we have known here for a number of years in the House. Every Parliament since Confederation has had to confront the question of Canada's linguistic duality. The members of every Parliament have had to stand up and declare themselves on this very fundamental issue.

These debates are in fact sometimes painful and divisive. But they have also given this country some of its finest moments in this the highest court of the land.

In 1969, the Hon. Robert Stanfield and the late David Lewis stood with Prime Minister Trudeau on the Official Languages Act; in 1973, they did so again, on a resolution of this House reaffirming linguistic duality.

In 1983 and 1984, Mr. Broadbent and I, together with the Trudeau government, supported the rights of the francophone minority in Manitoba when the Prime Minister of Canada presented a similar motion to this House.

In 1987, Mr. Turner and Mr. Broadbent stood with me in support of the Meech Lake Accord. In 1988, they did so again in passing Bill C-72, the new Official Languages Act.

It is in this spirit of co-operation that I have the honour to present this resolution before the House today for your consideration and for a debate which will no doubt be true to the great traditions of our Parliament on the most burning current issues, as in decades past.

[English]

It is time for all of us to stand up for Canada again because in recent days we have witnessed regrettable denials of some of Canada's fundamental values. Debate over language has been almost as frequent and fundamental a characteristic as the history of Canada's duality itself. But, with tolerance and respect for one another, we have built a country that has not simply acknowledged its own diversity but thrived on it.

Confederation was the coming together of English and French-speaking Canadians whom Wilfrid Laurier was later to characterize as the "marble and the oak" of this remarkable home that we now call Canada.

The Fathers of Confederation never suggested in 1867 that building a country in which English and French would both be spoken would in any way or at any time be easy. In fact, they often referred to the difficulties that they knew awaited successive generations of Canadians. They called upon them even then for the foresight, the openness and the tolerance that would be required to bring this great Canadian experiment forward and to enrich it generation after generation. They also understood that this was a fundamental characteristic of the new nation that they were building for a people searching for a new home from countries around the world.

Sir John A. Macdonald said in the Confederation debates in respect of the concept of duality, to paraphrase him in that particular debate in February 1865, 125 years ago just about today, he acknowledged that the easiest and the most efficient way to run Canada would be with a unitary state with one language. He acknowledged that that brought with it great advantages. But as he indicated, the only problem with it is that it would not work. If you adopted that view, there would be no Canada because, as he said, "any proposition which involved the absorption of the individuality of Lower Canada, Quebec at the time, would not be received with favour by her people".

In 1865 he was speaking of the notion of individuality of Lower Canada. Today, the same fundamental meaning finds usage in the word "distinct". It is as true today as it was when Sir John A. Macdonald and Etienne Cartier began the nation-building work of binding this country together with their own hands.

That duality was something that just did not happen. It was acknowledged, reflected upon and deemed by everyone involved as absolutely indispensable, not only to the functioning of Canada, but to the existence of Canada. Macdonald acknowledged time and time again that Canada could not come together without a fundamental acknowledgement of that linguistic duality.

That duality was enriched and strengthened over decades by wave after wave of immigrants from eastern Europe, central Europe and elsewhere, who caused the prairies to bloom and the sovereignty of Canada to extend to the farthest reaches of this continent. It is a safe statement to make today when I say that if Canada as we know it was begun essentially by Scottish Protestants from Ontario and French Catholics from Quebec, it has been immeasurably enriched by people from every country of the world who have now made of Canada a truly modern, tolerant society.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, few subjects have so aroused public opinion and stirred such individual passions as the debates over language.

But some of the finest chapters in our history were written by those who made the voice of reason prevail, who made tolerance triumph and who wrought the necessary accommodations.

[English]

Linguistic duality and the protection of minority language rights are not abstract concepts. They are given life by legislative enactments such as the Official Languages Act. They are given permanence and protection by the Constitution and they are given meaning by the national will of a generous and a tolerant people.

[Translation]

The rejection of minorities is an attack on the nature of Canada. When language becomes a motive for exclusion and fear, it is time for all Canadians who love their country to speak up and speak out.

There is no place in Canada for intolerance—although no one would suggest that Canada, or any other country, is absolutely free from it.

The resolution now before the House is an opportunity for all members to speak up and speak out, again, for what is best about Canada.

It is an opportunity to send an absolutely unequivocal message, again, of unity and mutual respect.

The issue before us is not bilingualism or even, despite claims to the contrary, the expense of bilingualism.

The issue before us is simple and important—the will of English- and French-speaking Canadians to continue to live together with mutual respect and fraternity, while honouring our original undertakings to each other and to the whole nation.

[English]

It is time to refer back to some of our fundamental values and I think it is also time to try to put this entire issue in some perspective. This is not the first time nor will it be the last time that there have been misconceptions and misrepresentations on the government's policies regarding official languages.

This is not the first time nor will it be the last that certain voices have been heard alleging that the policy constitutes enforced bilingualism. Something is being "rammed down people's throats". Surely that phrase and that expression had to arise in Canada. Only in a country this prosperous and this magnificent would people have the time to worry about expressions like that. Nothing is being forced down anybody's throat, although the concept of enforced bilingualism or a double standard, one for Quebec and another for the rest of the country, has been alleged in this country from the days of the Confederation debates. There have always been voices, fortunately few and far between. But there have always been voices who have tried to trade on this kind of falsehood and distortion that fortunately has been repudiated time and time and time again by this Parliament, regardless of its composition and regardless of the government that happened to be sitting at the right of the Speaker.

There is no better way to bury these damaging misunderstandings than to recall the words of one of the original architects of the original Official Languages Act. In 1974, the Hon. Gerard Pelletier, then Minister of Communications, spoke as follows, and I quote:

> —some people were surprised recently by my statement favouring the promotion of an intensely French Quebec. They thought they saw a contradiction with the federal government's official languages policy. But the efforts of the federal government in linguistic matters has always been subjected to the most absurd interpretations, the most frequent being that the ultimate objective of the Official Languages Act is to make each and every Canadian citizen bilingual. The facts are diametrically opposed to this fable: one of the effects of this law is to permit anyone to remain unilingual, if that is his wish, in all of his relations with the Government of Canada.

If you want to be bilingual, terrific. If you want to remain unilingual and deal with the Government of Canada, the law was designed in such a way as to make sure that both sides of this great national debate and these two perceptions could be accommodated equally.

What is more appropriate for a country that values its linguistic duality and protects its linguistic minorities in an imperfect nation such as ours? While we have many advantages and many accomplishments, our imperfections show every day of the week. What would be more appropriate than to proceed on a sensitive and delicate issue along the lines that Mr. Pelletier suggested in 1974.

[Translation]

It is time, Mr. Speaker, to remind ourselves what it is like to be a minority and to treat minorities with the same tolerance and generosity of spirit that we would want to be treated with, if our situations were reversed.

[English]

How else would you treat a minority, except to ask yourselves what would it be like to be a minority and to treat the minority in exactly the same way that you would want you and your family to be treated if the situation were reversed. Surely that is a fundamental concept of social justice in this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: While we happen to be talking about linguistic minorities, the principle holds true for visible minorities and every minority in Canada who is entitled to be treated with justice and equity and equality at all times and in all circumstances in this country of Canada.

It is just these values of tolerance and generosity that will help us face an increasingly competitive and interdependent world.

Mr. Speaker, it is such an obvious advantage, and not a handicap, for Canada to speak the world's two leading languages. Our competitors in Europe often speak three languages fluently and four or even five quite well. Today some Canadians say they are disadvantaged because they want to preserve the integrity of one language. But please, never prevent our young people from learning two languages, because that enriches the whole nation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Linguistic duality lies at the foundation of our country and must be constantly preserved and promoted if we are to progress as a nation.

The British North America Act established rights and obligations respecting the use of English and French in Parliament, the Quebec Legislative Assembly and all the courts of Canada and Quebec.

Three years later, these same rights and obligations were extended to the new province of Manitoba.

Section 94 of the BNA Act provided that Parliament could make provision for the uniformity of court procedure in Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—but not for Quebec whose system of civil law was distinct.

English and French were entrenched as the official languages of New Brunswick in 1982.

In 1988, we adopted a new Official Languages Act to bring our fundamental language law into line with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In adopting the Official Languages Act in 1969, Parliament had recognized the importance of our linguistic duality. But the 1969 Act, in spite of its achievements, had other shortcomings because it focused on the individual's right to obtain services from the government, not on the vitality of minority communities—and thus was not able to halt the erosion of minorities throughout Canada.

The lesson we have learned over the past twenty years is that the strength of the community is critical and must be fostered if linguistic minorities across Canada are to retain their vitality. This is what inspired the major changes supported by all, or almost all, members of this House barely a year and a half ago.

That is why we gave a community orientation to our official languages policy when we adopted the new Official Languages Act.

[English]

Alliance Quebec said in respect of precisely that initiative, Alliance Quebec representing effectively and well the interests of the English-speaking minority in the province of Quebec, and I quote:

> —the legislation adopted by the House of Commons represents a significant act of leadership by the federal government—We particularly welcome the Government of Canada's eloquent commitment, contained in the preamble of Bill C-72: "—to enhancing the vitality and supporting the development of English and French linguistic minority communities—".

[Translation]

The Fédération des francophones hors Québec said:

> We support this new and improved legislation which is a very important development tool for francophones outside Quebec.

The House of Commons of Canada and the three main parties that sit here in the House have been presented with a problem; they have dealt with a solid major piece of legislation, which was endorsed by almost all hon. members. This is to the credit of the House and all hon. members who sit there.

[English]

The federal government has been active over the past years in promoting linguistic minorities. We give considerable financial help to provincial governments to provide minority language education and second language education training and facilities. We assist provinces to make possible a wide, indeed a vast range and array of other provincial services to minority language communities.

• (1600)

In 1988, for example, we signed agreements with the Saskatchewan government to give the Fransaskois greater control over the education of their children.

We entered into an agreement with Prince Edward Island on services in French, and another on a school and community centre in Charlottetown.

We concluded a Memorandum of Understanding with Nova Scotia on the College de l'Acadie.

We reached agreements with New Brunswick on school community centres which provide a focal point for the education and cultural activities of the minority community.

We arrived at a framework agreement with Ontario on the promotion of official languages. In 1989, we signed an agreement with Ontario on a Francophone college network, something that the French-speaking Canadians in the province of Ontario had requested for decades.

In co-operation with the government of the province of Ontario I was delighted that this Parliament and this government were able to finally meet an historic need which helps build Canadian unity and which represents the very best elements of our society which must be encouraged if Canadian unity is going to be strengthened.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: We concluded an agreement with the Yukon on French language services.

We entered into an agreement with the province of Quebec, a very important and substantial agreement, on the provision of health and social services to the English-speaking population of that province. On February 2, this year, we signed an agreement with Quebec on official languages and education.

As one can see, there is symmetry and there is balance. There is fairness. There is not a double standard by this Parliament in respect of the application of bilingualism, or in the application of the official languages law. There are imperfections, obviously. But each and every member of this House seeks to eliminate and minimize those imperfections and from time to time as we proceed with improvements and amendments we make it better. When we make it better, we make life a little better for minority communities across Canada.

That, surely, is the principal objective of a sensitive and thoughtful approach to bilingualism and to the fundamental rights and values of minority language communities across this country. They must be able to turn to the Parliament of Canada when in moments of difficulty; and the Parliament of Canada should be able to respond with as much generosity and leadership as this country is capable of.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, while we have made important progress over the years to uphold this fundamental characteristic of our nationhood, our history has been marred by troubling and divisive linguistic disputes. We will not tell each other scare stories. These events did not just begin a few weeks ago, in northern Ontario. One has only to recall the controversy over the closing of Catholic schools in Manitoba in 1890, Regulation 17 in Ontario in 1912, which had a devastating effect on that province's francophone community, and the Gens de l'Air dispute of 1976.

In 1905, Prime Minister Sir Wilfrid Laurier decided that language rights in Alberta and Saskatchewan, in contrast to the situation in Quebec and Manitoba at that time, should not be entrenched in the Constitution but rather left within provincial legislative jurisdiction.

It was, Mr. Speaker, therefore open to Alberta and Saskatchewan in 1988 to override a Supreme Court decision and abolish certain language rights and obligations that they had inherited from the Northwest Territories.

[English]

But in 1981, another significant decision was taken, obviously not with this in mind. No one can foresee the future with accuracy, but another significant decision was taken. It was to entrench in the Constitution a notwithstanding clause which permits legislatures to override many of the basic rights and freedoms of Canadians. Because of that clause it was open to Quebec, in enacting Bill C-178 respecting external, commercial signs in 1988, to override freedom of expression provisions of the Canadian Charter.

In all three cases the provincial legislatures used existing powers to limit rights that had been confirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada. In each case the government and, I suppose, most if not all members of the House of Commons and I personally deeply deplore the actions taken. But as has happened over history, it is now left for another day to try and remedy the situation and improve upon minority rights and the status and the state of our bilingual nation and all of the challenges and opportunities it gives to all of us.

We need today through our attitudes, our statements and our actions to arrest this trend and to return to the fundamental concepts as best we can that built this nation.

[Translation]

Our country, which at various times in its history was thought to have been weakened by division and misunderstanding, was in fact strengthened by the common will which always arose at such times to overcome these threats to our unity. The forces of reason, fairness and generosity must again be mobilized. Let us do so always keeping in mind the future of young Canadians, our children. Our greatest responsibility is to leave them the united and prosperous country which our parents dreamed for us.

[English]

If there is an obligation, perhaps in a pyramid of obligations in this regard, that takes a predominant place, of all the obligations that we have, and we have many, surely few can be more compelling than to make sure as best we can that this country which we did not build—it was built for us, it was given to us—this magnificent, wealthy, prosperous, admired, envied nation which has made our lives so complete and so productive, surely our fundamental obligation must be to take every action we possibly can to pass this country on undiminished to our children and then to their children. That is what it is all about.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I say, not in any argumentative way whatsoever, but simply because the reasons I have tried to explain, and as a fundamental bearing on the nature of linguistic duality in Canada and this matter before the House, that for this reason and this reason alone I submit respectfully that I believe in many ways, but not in any perfect way, that the Meech Lake Accord has an important role and that it fulfils many of these responsibilities. It reaffirms our national identity by recognizing in the Constitution Quebec's distinctiveness and Canada's linguistic duality.

In 1982, a similar recognition was properly given to our multicultural and aboriginal traditions. In the same way the courts were instructed to interpret the Charter in light of these provisions.

In the words of the joint parliamentary committee that carefully studied the accord, the addition of the linguistic duality and distinct society clause "will better reflect Canada as it is".

The Meech Lake Accord is for all of Canada. It brings Quebec back into the Constitution voluntarily and on terms that are reasonable and may never come again.

Meech Lake ensures that all provinces will have an equal say in the reform of national institutions, including the Senate. There will be no winners and losers. Most of all, there will be no second-class provinces.

Meech Lake gives provinces a say in the appointment of Supreme Court Judges and Senators. Why would this be a source of astonishment in a federation? What could be more normal than to consult on questions like this, on federal institutions that need the legitimacy and the participation, as does the Senate? These are not offensive or original notions; they have been debated exhaustively in the past in different circumstances in Canada. All of them have much to suggest that they are worthy of careful consideration.

• (1610)

The Meech Lake Accord also promotes the development of new shared cost programs in a manner that, as Mr. Broadbent said in different circumstances, is sensitive to local needs.

Its ratification will establish a favourable climate for investment and economic growth. Most fundamentally, its ratification will promote national reconciliation.

It is not an argumentative or adversarial comment to say that any Constitution that is truly a Constitution which should unite all peoples will never be complete until the province of Quebec has been brought back to the family.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Meech Lake places the co-existence of English and French-speaking Canadians in a pan-Canadian context, which is exactly what this country requires and exactly what the Accord does.

Lest there be any confusion on this matter, and because there has been confusion, let me read directly from the Meech Lake Accord the provision on linguistic duality. It is precisely the reason why it has a vital bearing, an absolutely indispensable bearing on this resolution and on the concept of minority rights and on the concept of linguistic duality in Canada. Let me read textually:

> 2. (1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with
> (a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada;

What could be clearer than that? It is not a legal definition. It is a statement of reality. Yet some people persist in suggesting that this will describe a Canada of two linguistic enclaves. In fact it does precisely the opposite and brings Canadians together and makes sure that Canadians are at home right across Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: It is a statement of the situation of the English-speaking minority in the province of Quebec and its access linguistically of course to the rest of Canada, and the inverse being the presence of French-speaking minorities across the country, with a French-speaking majority centred in Quebec, as being "a fundamental characteristic of Canada". Not only is it a fundamental characteristic of Canada, if it were not a fundamental characteristic of Canada this country would not have survived since 1867 because, as Sir John A. Macdonald said in 1865, the individuality of Lower Canada is something that must be respected in a new confederation, failing which there would be no Canada.

It is simply because Sir John and Cartier recognized that 125 years ago that Canada grew and prospered. It is because this House acknowledged it 100 years later that this country will continue to grow and prosper as one strong, united Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: For the first time in our history, 11 governments committed themselves to preserve linguistic duality. Mr. Speaker, the Commissioner of Official Languages, the individual responsible not to a government but to this Parliament, a dispassionate, sensitive and objective observer of linguistic matters in this country, carefully analyzed every provision of that Accord. He said that this represents "a net gain" for linguistic minorities.

This debate today on this resolution is about linguistic minorities and it is about fairness. The Commissioner for Official Languages says that in the documents submitted to him this represents a net gain for linguistic minorities—the English-speaking minority in the province of Quebec, and French-speaking minorities elsewhere. That is what we sought to do.

I was honoured by the fact that one of the most important observers in Canada's national life agreed and stipulated very clearly that this was a net gain for all of Canada's linguistic minorities. Its ratification is the best guarantee that minority language communities will flourish in Canada.

Ten provincial premiers representing four different political parties from British Columbia to Newfoundland and Labrador supported the Accord. All three federal leaders in the House of Commons strongly endorsed it. In politics in Canada this is about as close as you are ever going to come to a miracle, Mr. Speaker.

The Meech Lake Accord was inspired by the same insight and realism which motivated Sir John A. and Sir George-Étienne Cartier a century ago. "We are a great country", Sir John said, "and shall become one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve it; we shall sink into insignificance and adversity if we suffer it to be broken".

[Translation]

Here is what Georges-Etienne Cartier said about the 1867 Constitution. Some time later, Cartier said, "I hope that if this grand project of Confederation must be amended, it will not be to narrow the principles of fairness on which it is founded, but rather to enlarge them even more."

Ratification of the Meech Lake Accord will allow us to address an agenda of importance to all Canadians: Senate reform, aboriginal rights, minority language rights and improving the Charter. Those are critical matters for all governments and all legislators to consider as we approach the June deadline for ratifying the Accord.

Some would say, Mr. Speaker, that we have come a long way since 1867, and we have, certainly. But in my view, all the reforms we have instituted in the past quarter century do no more than ensure that the concept of partnership is brought up to date with changing times and circumstances.

Without such reforms, the splendid concept, the uniquely Canadian concept, could wither and die, and with it the essence of Canada and the core of Canadian values.

[English]

Twenty-five years ago today a new Canadian flag was raised for the first time on Parliament Hill after a long, raucous and emotional debate across the nation and in this House of Commons. The flag too, as some members will recall, was the subject of very substantial and prolonged disagreement and, indeed, division.

Many felt strongly that the red maple leaf was not the right flag for Canada. But 25 years later every single Canadian rejoices in our flag's distinctiveness. It is celebrated as perhaps our most important symbol of unity. There is not a single Canadian who has travelled across this country or elsewhere in the world who on seeing the Canadian maple leaf flag flying does not look at it with pride and joy and says: "There is our flag and I am a Canadian."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: So may it be some day with the Meech Lake Accord and documents designed to unite Canada to bring us together to make sure that the vision of the Fathers of Confederation is respected and honoured and that this country becomes effectively what it was always designed to be—one Canada.

• (1620)

The breathtaking pace of international events, the tremendous development of technology and the vast trade opportunities opening up in the world urgently remind us that we cannot condemn another generation to sterile and interminable domestic quarrels.

We have had our fill of constitutional conferences!

[English]

We are the international experts in the cottage industry of commas, colons, paragraphs, notwithstandings and constitutions. We could give advice to anyone in the world on how to do it, but unfortunately we have not completed it ourselves.

I think Canadians call upon us in the same spirit of openness and generosity to recognize those values that moved the Fathers of Confederation and who look at us today, 125 years later and say: "Surely the time has come". That is said in the context of the continual respect of that individuality of which Macdonald spoke in 1865, of the respect for minority rights which has now extended to respect for all minorities across the country, respect for bilingualism and the tremendous value, the magnificence that it brings to our citizenship and the pride and the joy that it gives us in being Canadians.

Let us adopt this resolution which speaks to some fundamental values that have been the source of great pride for all Canadians from the very beginning of Canada. Let us adopt this resolution loudly and clearly and, hopefully, with one voice. In the process of doing that we do honour to Canada and we do honour to this House of Commons. Perhaps even more important we do honour to our obligations to each other.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this debate gives this House to send Canadians a positive message in support of bilingualism in our country.

I think members on both sides of this House understand that there is an urgent need to send a clear and unmistakable message to the country in support of linguistic duality, of bilingualism. Therefore we will support this resolution because, above all, it calls for the reaffirmation of the importance of bilingualism as, what is, and what should be a fundamental characteristic of this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): In short, I see this resolution as a vehicle which enables parliamentarians of all parties to send this positive message to Canadians.

[Translation]

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not enough for us as parliamentarians to pass a motion showing our support for bilingualism to fulfil our duty to promote and encourage bilingualism.

We must show our support for it. And I sincerely hope, as do my colleagues, that the government will not stop with this resolution and that it will launch a dynamic program in its wake to encourage bilingualism. It is up to the Prime Minister and his government to set the tone on this issue.

My predecessor, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Turner), sounded a warning note a few months ago here in the House. He said > —that if the federal government did not act as soon as possible to promote linguistic equality, there would be serious consequences.

Mr. Speaker, he was right.

[English]

I believe that the current wave of English-only municipal resolutions in Ontario has a lot to do with a lack of federal leadership. There is a perception on the part of some Canadians that their federal government is sending out conflicting signals, that it says one thing to people in one part of the country and another thing to people in other parts.

This government must change its laissez-faire attitude and become more active in the promotion of bilingualism. If it does not, many people will continue to hold the misconception that bilingualism is just an expensive luxury that this country does not need.

In fact, it is the duty of all of us to work diligently to dispel that myth and to convince Canadians that official language equality is one of this country's most distinctive and positive feature. That misconception, that myth I have just outlined, is not only wrong, it is also dangerous. It is wrong because it denies our history and dangerous because it could deny us our future.

It is dangerous because, if taken to its extreme, it will have us ignore the fundamental nature of this country, namely, that we are a country whose history has given us two languages, English and French, as part of our basic national fabric. If we reject the fundamental nature of this country, then we are rejecting the kind of Canada we have been building here for the past 123 years. A Canada that rejects this principle is not the kind of Canada I want to see in the next decade and the next century for my children and their children.

I believe that if we reject this principle, Canada will not survive as an independent, distinctive and united country. I do not believe a Canada that rejects the principle of language equality is the kind of Canada the majority of Canadians want to see either.

Members will no doubt be aware of a new poll completed by the respected firm Environics Research Group and released today by the Canadian Parents for French. It shows that nearly three-quarters of all Canadians are in favour of having the children of their province learn the other official language.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): These figures represent an increase in favour of second language training over a similar poll six years ago. They show that in all parts of Canada a majority supports second language education.

Referring to the survey, Kathryn Manzer, the president of Canadian Parents for French stated:

> These findings affirm my faith in Canadians and in the future of our country. It's good to know that Canadians really do share a desire to understand and communicate with one another.

I agree with these sentiments.

[Translation]

We have built a strong and unique democracy, founded on justice, tolerance and understanding. True, we have had the occasional set-back, but I believe we have made considerable progress in building a society that gives equal opportunities to all citizens, regardless of language or origin.

• (1630)

I would like to quote my predecessor who said last year in the House of Commons, on April 5:

> The whole history of Canada, since the very day it was founded, reflects the fragile balance between the two founding peoples and the two language communities. It is the duty of all of us here in the House, the elected representatives of the Canadian people, to work zealously, carefully and generously to cement the links between these two language communities.

[English]

My background is neither French nor English. My parents were Jewish immigrants from eastern Europe who became proud Canadians, as I am. Today, I have the honour to stand here as a member of Parliament and, even if for a limited period, as the Leader of the Opposition. I am proud to work for our country, to speak for Canada in both official languages.

I believe that if we begin to undermine the concept of bilingualism, we are also beginning to undermine the concept of multiculturalism. After all, if we cannot recognize the value of having two official languages in this country, can we long continue to recognize the value of the many non-English and non-French cultural heritages of some one third of Canadians?

I believe, and I hope all Canadians will agree with me, that you do not build yourself up by tearing someone else down. In the long run, you do not increase your rights by attempting to take away the rights of others.

More than that, diminishing the rights of Francophones outside Quebec does not increase the rights of Anglophones inside Quebec, just as limiting the rights of Anglophones inside Quebec does not increase the rights of Francophones elsewhere in our country. If anything, actions such as those we have seen in recent months only serve to make matters worse for minorities in all parts of Canada.

The English-only municipal resolutions we have seen recently represent a very backward step. They are based on misconceptions and misunderstandings about the financial implications for municipalities of Ontario's Bill 8. As I understand it, that bill does not require municipalities to spend any money. It does not require their citizens to pay more. It also does not require municipal governments to do anything they do not want to do. But, unfortunately, French language rights and services have become the undeserving scapegoats for concerns about municipal taxes and services.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when I sat in the House of Commons for the first time in 1962, we were just starting to provide services in both official languages. I want to pay tribute to all members of the House of Commons who pursued that objective. Under the Pearson Government, the Laurendeau-Dunton report on bilingualism and biculturalism was published. The result? Under the government of Pierre Elliott Trudeau, we tabled the official languages bill.

[English]

The task of winning acceptance of that legislation was not small. My predecessor, the member for Vancouver Quadra, played a leading role in that process. As Minister of Justice in 1969, he criss-crossed the country consulting with provincial governments. He negotiated with the attorneys-general of the four western provinces because there were objections. He appeared before provincial legislative committees throughout Canada, because, as he told this House last April: "As in all cases involving language, this law to legitimize equal status for our country's two official languages was hard to accept in some parts of our country. We needed great patience and determination to reach our goals". Then he went on to make this important point: "But we did it, thanks to Canadians' tolerance, generosity and goodwill".

We are today asking Canadians to regenerate that same spirit of tolerance, generosity and goodwill in the face of the challenges now before us. We are asking Canadians to put aside narrow concerns and reject the temptation for the kinds of answers that seek to divide. We are asking all members of this House to take an active role in achieving that renewed consensus because, as my predecessor went on to say in that same speech, "We must also, all of us, do our best to rekindle the bonds between our two linguistic communities to encourage and revive the spirit of harmony and tolerance which is lacking today".

I think that today, when we are celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of our Canadian flag, we can find some parallels in the current friction over language. I am one of only three current members who were in the House during that period. I participated in the debate over the flag and that debate was marked with division and acrimony.

Earlier today, I took part in a celebration of that anniversary which was organized by a government, formed by the party, many of whose members at the time, led the opposition to our new flag. Yet today, all parties in this House and indeed all Canadians look upon the flag with pride.

Many people thought, at that time given the bitterness of the flag debate, that this could never happen. But, Mr. Speaker, it did happen. It happened because people came together, built understanding and consensus. I sincerely hope that we can, as parliamentarians and as a country, do the same over the matter of bilingualism. Surely this is something we must do.

I believe, as my predecessor said only last week: "Canada's potential fragility is language, but Canada's potential strength is language".

I urge all members to support this motion. Let us make today the day we begin to build on that strength and turn the tide toward a more tolerant, more compassionate and above all, a stronger and more united Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Coquitlam—Unemployment Insurance; the hon. member for Saint-Léonard—Small Business; and the hon. member for York Centre—Justice.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, before I begin the formal part of my remarks, I want to inform the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in the House that my leader would have liked to have spoken today but she has other commitments. I think the government was aware of that a few days ago, but I want to make it very clear.

In the beginning, I want to say that we support the resolution before the House today. I do so personally, and my party does so with a great deal of pride. We hope that the resolution before the House today will help unify this country and bring Canadians together.

I also rise as a western Canadian who has never hesitated to speak out in favour of bilingualism in this country and the equality of our two languages no matter where I go, not only in my constituency, but indeed anywhere across the west, or anywhere across Canada.

The debate today is a debate about linguistic minority rights. It is a debate about justice and about fairness. It is a debate about the future of our country.

I think that our party throughout its history, going back to the CCF and then the NDP, has had a very proud history of fighting for linguistic equality in this country.

[Translation]

I know the Prime Minister is a friend of Robert Cliche, who was the leader of our party in Quebec. Mr. Cliche worked very hard for the equality of our two official languages in this country, and I am very proud of his contribution, not only to our party but to the entire country, and I know the Prime Minister will agree.

• (1640)

[English]

I also remember when I was first elected in 1968 that one of the first pieces of legislation we dealt with that year was the Official Languages Act. I remember that David Lewis, Tommy Douglas, Stanley Knowles, and yourself, Mr. Speaker, were all in the House. We had a good debate and it was with a great deal of pride that we passed the Official Languages Act back in 1968 to establish in law the equality of the two languages in this country in terms of the interaction of citizens with the Parliament of Canada and the institutions of this great Parliament of Canada, the institutions of the federal government.

What we are doing today is reaffirming, very importantly, our belief in the duality of this country that it must be protected, enhanced, and promoted.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is a fact of life in Canada. We are a country with two great languages. We have two founding peoples: the English and the French. In Canada's history, we read about an agreement between the two founding peoples on English and French.

At the time of Confederation, 125 years ago, it was agreed that the Civil Code would prevail in Quebec and Common Law in the rest of the country.

Mr. Speaker, besides two founding peoples, we also have a very important group, the pre-founding people: the aboriginal people of Canada. There were many Indian, many aboriginal groups in this country before the others arrived.

And subsequently, Mr. Speaker, a fourth dimension was added to our country. With a name like mine and a name like yours, Mr. Speaker, we and our fathers came from other countries. In my case, it was Sweden, and in yours it was the Ukraine, a long time ago. Another part of Canada's fourth dimension is our visible minorities. The result is that we have a country that is quite different from our neighbours to the south.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say it in French. I know I speak with an English accent, because I learned French as an adult, but I would like to say something personal in French to our Francophone listeners. I remember that when I was elected—I was only 22—the House was considering the official languages bill. There had been a negative reaction in Western Canada from a large part of the population. I also remember Mr. Alex Kuziak, the first Canadian of Ukrainian descent to be appointed a minister here in Canada, and it was Tommy Douglas who appointed him when he was Premier of Saskatchewan. In the autumn of 1968, he told me that we had to pass the official languages bill for two important reasons. First of all, because it was a just cause. Here in Canada we had a french-speaking minority representing 30 per cent of our population, and it was a matter of justice for the French language and that part of the population that spoke French. But there is another reason, Mr. Speaker, and I remember it well, as a member of the fourth Canadian dimension. He said: Because of the French fact here in Canada, we have a tolerance for the other ethnic groups and for our natives. In this country, because we are tolerant with the French and the English, we are also much more tolerant than in the United States with the universities and with multiculturalism. It is also for this reason that he said we had to support this bill in 1968.

[English]

Those are great reasons that we should favour promoting and protecting the two official languages in this country.

This afternoon I want to speak about something else that is important, namely, the question of leadership. I think it is very important that this House take a very firm stand, and a very quick stand in support of duality in this country. Regardless of whether or not some people are in opposition to what we are saying, it is very important that we do what is right. It is very important that, as politicians, we do what must be done for the future of this country. It is very important that we not stick our heads in the sand, or try to forget that this issue exists, or not talk about it because it is not very popular in certain parts of the country.

My riding of Yorkton—Melville probably has fewer Francophones in it than any other riding in western Canada. I believe in the last census there were fewer than 100. But I have found throughout the years that if you speak openly, directly and honestly about the importance of linguistic rights in this country, the people of my riding and people across this country respect that and support me and support us for doing so.

That brings me to the second point about leadership. Here I think is where a lot of us have failed this country quite badly. Many of us have forgotten that we have to educate people as to why we are doing certain things in this country, why we have passed certain laws, why we have created certain institutions. For example, in the province of Ontario, and I am not going to be critical at all of my Ontario colleagues in the provincial Legislature or the Premier of Ontario, but politicians in all three parties should do more to explain what Bill 8 is all about.

From my understanding, and I am not an Ontarian, Bill 8 provides French language services at the provincial level only where numbers warrant. In other words, where 10 per cent of the population is of the Francophone expression or if there are 5,000 Francophones in one community there will be certain French language services for those people in places like Sudbury, Hawkesbury, or Nickel Belt or the city of Windsor, the city of Ottawa and so on.

It seems to me that some of the opposition to what is happening in Ontario is there because certain politicians have not played a leadership role in explaining what Bill 8 is all about, or in explaining what official bilingualism at the federal level is all about. Some people are in opposition to that today because they do not have the information that they should have about their country its laws or its institutions.

Often western Canadians ask me why I support bilingualism. They say, "When my kids or grandchildren grow up they will have to speak French to have any federal job here in Saskatchewan or Alberta or Manitoba." Little do they realize that very few jobs in the federal Public Service in western Canada are designated bilingual. People do not realize that because we have failed collectively to do our job in educating the people of this country.

One of the consequences is that some people have a fear of what they think is going to happen. Let me tell the Prime Minister that one of the best speeches I have heard in this House was one of his back in September or October of 1983. He was then Leader of the Opposition and he spoke on the question of Francophone rights in the province of Manitoba. I was proud of him as the Leader of Opposition at that particular time for having had the courage to stand up at a very sensitive time in our history and speak out in favour of Francophone rights in the province of Manitoba, rights that Premier Pawley, who was the leader of the government from our party in Manitoba, was attempting to negotiate at that time.

I remember the Prime Minister saying then—and I have not had a chance to reread his speech so I hope it is not out of context—that we should not condemn most of the people who were in opposition to the rights that Premier Pawley was trying to give to franco-Manitobans that were theirs because of a constitutional agreement many years ago. I remember the Prime Minister saying that we should not condemn those people, that many of them were fearful and did not understand the situation, that what we should try to do is educate them about why this had to be done.

I do not rise today and say that all people in Sault Ste. Marie are racists or bigots. They are not racists or bigots. I do not rise here and say that everybody in Thunder Bay, because of the resolution passed, are racists and bigots. They are not racists or bigots.

[Translation]

And that is exactly the same thing in Quebec, Mr. Speaker. I know a great many Quebecers who are against the development of the English language in that province. But most Quebecers are not racists, Mr. Speaker.

• (1650)

[English]

But at the same time, I also do not hesitate to condemn some of those people who are intentionally trying to stir up trouble in this country, who are anti-French, who are anti-Indian, who are anti-English, and some of them circulate petitions and try to raise fears. When we run across those people we should call a spade a spade and condemn them.

We are very lucky in Canada that we do have two official languages. The English language and the French language are the two greatest languages in the world. I think that we should celebrate that fact. It should be a fact that unites this country and not tears this country apart.

It is part of the richness of Canada. It is part of what we are blessed with as a nation. Most Canadians who have a sense of fairness and justice agree with that vision of Canada, that we are indeed very fortunate and indeed very aware.

At this time in our history we should not forget the philosopher who once said that you judge a society by how the society treats its minorities. We must judge our country by how generous we are to our minorities.

We cheer at the tearing down of the Berlin Wall. We cheer Mr. Gorbachev, and yesterday we all cheered when the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stood up here in the gallery. We cheer the Soviets for opening up their society. We encourage them to have more human rights. We pull for the openness in their society and the democratization of their society. We cheer Nelson Mandela being released from jail in South Africa, and we hope that the minorities, in that case the majority, will be treated more fairly and more justly. However, it strikes me as very strange that there is still in this country a small number—and I stress a small number—of very narrow-minded Canadians who want to turn back the clock and deny minority rights to English-speaking minorities in Quebec or French-speaking minorities outside the Province of Quebec.

I want to close by expressing a worry and a concern. I have watched what has happened in this country over the last number of years. I know an important part of the agenda of the Prime Minister has been what he calls national reconciliation. We all want national reconciliation. We all want unity in this country. But as I travel across it and as I travel in Quebec and outside of Quebec, I sense that more and more Canadians are starting to give up. I sense in Quebec a bit more of a drift to Quebecers going on their own, to doing things their own way. There is a feeling in Quebec among more and more people that English Canada does not really care, and if English Canada does not really care, let us, Quebecers, start doing more things in our province in our own way and assert more and more sovereignty right here in Quebec. Outside of Quebec, we have seen in places like Sault Ste. Marie and Thunder Bay the exact opposite reaction where people are saying, let them speak French in Quebec and we will speak English here. We will start going our own way as well.

I really fear that in some ways maybe the country is beginning to slip away. That is why it is so important that we not play politics with this issue. That is why it is so important that the three national political parties remain firmly and solidly united in terms of promoting duality in this country and recognizing the fact that we do have two official languages, that we stand up for minority linguistic rights, we stand up for fairness, we stand up for justice, we stand up for the multicultural diversity of our country, and we stand up for the native people of our country as well. I think that is very, very important.

We adopted the Official Languages Act in 1968. We had amendments to it in 1988. We had the patriation of the Constitution in 1981–1982. We are now seeing an attempt to amend the Constitution in 1987 in terms of the Meech Lake Accord.

I hope all of these these will unite us, that all of these things will bring us together and help make this country a stronger, more fair, and more positive place in which to live.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we have a great country. I am proud to come from Western Canada. I am proud to say that nearly 30 per cent of my countrymen speak French. I am very proud of that. That is something which makes Canada different from the United States. It makes Canada a country unique in the world, Mr. Speaker. I know that most of the people in Western Canada support the Canadian duality. They agree with Quebec being a distinct society. Most Canadians accept the five pre-conditions which Quebec insisted on during the constitutional debate a couple of years ago.

Mr. Speaker, it is such a positive element. As a representative of Western Canada, I am proud to see French immersion schools everywhere. I know that even in Calgary and Edmonton, a great many parents register their children with French immersion schools because they realize how important it is for their children to be able to speak both languages. That is something very positive.

[English]

It is important that we reaffirm once again that not only do we want to protect duality in this country, we want to preserve duality and we want to promote linguistic duality in this country. In doing so, we promote Canada. We stand up for Canada and make this country a much fairer and richer place in which to live. Let us celebrate that fact. Let us be proud of that fact. In showing generosity to our linguistic minorities, we show generosity as well to our native Indian people and generosity to people who come from many other lands and cultures. With that, hopefully, we can build a much more united, strong and prosperous country in the years that lie ahead.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Caccia: No.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry but I cannot recognize the hon. member. He is not properly dressed.

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the government has no intention of calling any further business until 5.12 p.m. I wonder if the Chair might suspend the sitting until 5.12 p.m. to allow Private Members' Hour to start then. However we can start now; whatever is the wish of the House.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the wish of the House to suspend the sitting until 5.12 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 5 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5.12 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5.12 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

BILL OF RIGHTS

SUGGESTED CHILD PROTECTION COMMISSION

The House resumed from Tuesday, December 12, 1989 consideration of the motion of Ms. Langan:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of negotiating with the provinces to provide a comprehensive Bill of Rights for children which would standardize laws through the country, and that this Bill of Rights include a child protection commission and an emergency hot line which children could contact in times of crisis.

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to be the lead-off speaker in this fourth hour of debate on Motion M-254, suggesting a bill of rights for children.

Again I wish to thank the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam for placing this motion before the House, a motion which focuses on protecting the rights of our children. No one can deny they are Canada's most important resource.

As I alluded to in the debate last December, a number of developments have taken place with regard to families and children since the hon. member initially tabled her motion. Most important, of course, is the recent adoption of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

The convention covers a wide spectrum of children's rights and as such fully satisfies that part of the motion before the House which speaks to the need for a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

In this regard this convention is intended to establish a modern, international standard for addressing the social, economical, political, religious, cultural and civil rights of children all over the world.

As well, the convention provides for the protection of children from abuse, neglect and exploitation, and the protection of children with disabilities and the protection of children without families.

The list of possible initiatives deriving from the convention are many and would include, for example, support for an emergency hot line for children which was mentioned in Motion M-254 and which in fact has been the object of a recent federal grant for start-up costs. In this regard last fall the federal government pledged $1.3 million toward the start-up costs for an emergency hot line, the Kids' Help Line, which offers counselling information and if appropriate referral service to Canada's seven million children.

Since May of last year, the Kids' Help Line has received over 70,000 calls. The convention, through Article 27, also speaks to the rights of every child to an adequate standard of living and calls on state parties to take appropriate measures to assist parents in fulfilling this right.

Members will therefore have to examine issues like financial deprivation among children, something which we in Canada call child poverty, and to assess the need for action. In Canada there is the need to alleviate the problem of poverty among children. This is an issue which has quite rightly attracted increasing attention, including in this House.

As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, last November the House unanimously supported the motion by the former hon. member for Oshawa with regard to child poverty. A subcommittee of the House is presently studying child poverty and it is expected that it will present the report in November 1990.

Clearly, addressing the rights of Canadian children in very many instances would require provincial action. Moreover, formalizing the convention in Canada and thereby furthering the aims of a bill of rights for children will require a co-operative effort between the federal government and the provinces, given that many of the obligations in the convention fall within provincial and/or shared jurisdiction.

To this end the federal government is now seeking the support of the provinces and territories for signatures. Efforts are also currently under way through federal-provincial consultation on the question of ratification of the convention.

We on this side of the House very much wish to support a motion on this important subject, but an amendment is required to highlight the important role of the UN Convention and the federal-provincial co-operation needed to secure its ratification.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am most pleased to be able to rise today to speak on this motion.

It is important to put on record some of my personal background because a great deal of my adult life has been spent in working with children who are in a state of either neglect or crisis. Of course my background is as a social worker.

I started out initially in juvenile and family court working with children who were before the court on charges of delinquency and children whose families were before the courts because they had been unable or unwilling to care for them properly or had abused or neglected the children. I have seen a lot of what happens to children when we as a society do not provide them with the kinds of resources necessary to ensure that they mature, that they are nurtured, given adequate health care and education and a stable home living environment.

I have had the opportunity or the misfortune to work on the streets in Vancouver with runaway children, to be involved with one of the very positive and experimental programs, the Senator Hotel, when it had an outreach program on the streets. It was reaching out to young teenage children who were involved in the street scene.

It is not a pleasant scene. It involved drug abuse and sexual exploitation, including prostitution and other forms of sexual exploitation.

I have also seen other things that we sometimes do not like to admit happens in Canada. There is an increasing use of child labour in this country. All we have to do is go into any big apartment block or any big office building at ten o'clock at night and see who is cleaning it. More and more they are being cleaned by families, including eight year old kids, nine year old kids, or twelve year old kids. Because the family is the contracted unit we say there is not child labour going on. That is simply not so.

I have seen in government buildings that house child welfare offices children of eight and nine years old working at ten and eleven o'clock at night.

• (1720)

One of the things that we talked about in this House in the last week is the question of literacy. We know the high correlation between unemployment, poverty and illiteracy. While we may talk about adult programs, we are unwilling to face the reality that most of these problems could be solved if we provided the resources to our children.

The time to attack illiteracy is not when the person is 25 years old. The time to attack illiteracy is in Kindergarten or in Grade 1. That is where we need to put our resources. That is where we need to put the resources of special educators. Most Grade 1 teachers can identify on day one the child who is going to fail in Grade 9. Yet, we are so short-sighted we do not put the resources there.

In the area of corrections we talk about the problem of criminality and repeat offenders in our prison system, yet most Grade 1 teachers can identify the children who are going to have behaviour problems in Grade 5, who are going to be delinquents when they are 12 years old and who are going to be serving time in federal penitentiaries when they are 20 years old. We are unwilling to put in the kinds of resources necessary to see that that does not happen.

One of the proposals in this motion is for not only child protection services but an emergency hot line. It says that we should standardize our laws across this country. I think that is important, particularly as those laws relate to protection services, but I am also concerned that we must do more than standardize laws.

I want to emphasize how many of the problems we see in terms of the welfare of children and of adults are related to poverty. The government is proud that there has been a slight reduction in poverty in the last year. Poverty had gone up steadily since 1984, but in the last year it has gone down. Obviously this is related to employment rates. If unemployment goes down, poverty goes down.

However, we still have 1.2 million children who are living below the poverty level compared to countries like Sweden which has approximately 5 per cent. Even the United Kingdom has only 9 per cent.

The only country in the western industrial world that may have more child poverty is the United States. It is not just a matter of poverty, but it is how poverty correlates with other circumstances that put children at a disadvantage. The birth weight of babies born to families who are living in poverty is low. According to the Quebec Corporation of Physicians babies born in certain Montreal and Quebec City neighbourhoods are as likely to be underweight at birth as those in developing countries.

What an indictment of Canada when we have neighbourhoods that are poor and the standard of health of babies born in those neighbourhoods is no better than that of babies born in developing countries.

We know that the mortality rate of children born with low birth weight is twice that of other children. We know that there is a growing problem of hunger among children in this country. I was involved with the Vancouver school board in its attempts to get both the provincial government and this federal government to assist it in developing programs to feed school children who had come to school without having had breakfast, who had not had supper the day before, and probably some of them had not eaten for one or two days. Unfortunately they got no help from either the provincial government or the federal government.

Income assistance rates, according to studies in British Columbia, provide only enough money to feed children for two and a half weeks out of the month. What do you say to a hungry child? It is all very nice to pretend that you are going to be able to educate that child. The government talked this week about reducing the drop-out rate among school children, and the best way to do that is to ensure that every child belongs to a family that has an adequate level of income. The drop-out rate is well over twice, in fact nearly three times the rate for children from poor families compared with rich families.

Sometimes we think it is mystical but what about a 13 year old who is going to school and trying to compete with other kids, where they have money to go on field trips, money for new running shoes, money to buy school lunches and they have nothing? They soon get discouraged and simply withdraw from that situation where they are perpetually embarrassed because they cannot participate in the life of the school the way their peers can.

Among the other factors that are creating poverty in this country for children is the housing crisis. Increasingly, families are being driven into poverty, particularly in the metropolitan areas like Vancouver and Toronto, because once they pay for their housing they have no disposable income left over to feed the children.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that I have run out of time. I will close with this one remark. Canada is a wealthy country. There is no excuse for child poverty in Canada. Eradicating poverty is one of the best ways we can ensure the protection of children in this country.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by extending my thanks and encouragement to the member for Mission—Coquitlam for bringing before this House the subject of children's rights. Canadians are fond of saying that children are our most precious resource in Canada. Having said that, we do very little to ensure appropriate development of children not only in our social structures but especially in our legal system.

As you may know, Mr. Speaker, I have had special interest in the subject of missing children. I want to speak mainly about that particular interest. I am able to confirm many of the remarks made by my colleague from Surrey North who just spoke with respect to the plight of children finding themselves on the streets and highways of Canada without help, without parental help or assistance of any kind.

It is essential and necessary that we have in Canada some legal means to protect children, some constitutional base between the federal government and the provinces to enact appropriate child protection law.

At the heart of the problem is the divided jurisdiction between the Parliament of Canada and the provinces of Canada. Children's rights basically are a provincial matter. It would be difficult, and I have experienced this difficulty in attempting to draft legislation, for the Parliament of Canada to intervene in what is basically a provincial jurisdiction. Resolutions can be found for that aspect of the problem, whether it is through constitutional change or simply federal—provincial co-operation. But if we are to give meaning to the statement that children are our most precious resource, then we should be looking, not only once and from time to time at this matter but on a continuing and continuous basis.

• (1730)

By way of confirming the remarks made by the member for Surrey North about missing children, I must say that children who leave home at an early age, teenagers, and who find themselves on the streets of Canada are outlaws. They are outside the law. There is no question of protection of the law, they are without legal rights.

This leads to prostitution in a very broad sense. It is not simply sexual abuse, it is abuse in the labour force, in the kinds of jobs and benefits that a child labourer receives. In many cases, employers take advantage of their situation by employing them at less than minimum wages without any other employment benefits. The member is quite correct. You will find them in the worst kinds of labouring positions, in the kitchens of the worst restaurants, in the basements of the worst hotels. It is not difficult for anybody to find proof of this accusation. I am sure they walk the streets of Ottawa and find this very situation existing here in the nation's capital.

It is discouraging to raise this matter from time to time and find out that nothing changes from year to year. I know in 1985 and before, I brought before the House of Commons the missing children's legislation, which was basically to give a legal technique for apprehending—I hate that word—missing children in order to get them back them off the streets and thereby allow some socially beneficial action to be taken.

Even in that small initiative you meet with opposition, technical arguments that it is not the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, that this cannot be done. There is no attempt to resolve the problem, simply another obstacle in the way of resolution.

At least in 1985, as a result of the efforts some of us made, the Solicitor General of the day did respond in part to the problem of missing children and has created some techniques and institutions that have had a beneficial effect in attempting to resolve the problem of missing children. However, it was a relatively minimal effort. I do not say that in any critical way. I mean that it was only the beginning of a program that, frankly, has not been implemented in the way I would have hoped. So we still have to this day in the national capital and the larger cities, and even in the rural areas of Canada, this enormous problem of missing children.

The answer is often given that we do not have the resources to deal with it, the finances in the country are strained. I understand that, I know about the national debt, but it is very clearly a proposition of pay now or pay later. If we do not take the actions to remedy the situation now, we are going to have enormous expenses later.

It is almost unbelievable that we Canadians would not provide a home simply on the basis that a child is missing and on the streets of Canada. We would not pay for hotel bills or apartment rental. We would wait a few years until they are in a penitentiary and then pay all the expenses, the enormous expenses of maintaining a young person in an institution.

I do not know what it takes to awaken Canadians to this issue but we have to start with Parliament and it is for that reason I congratulate the member for Mission—Coquitlam. The more we bring this matter to the floor of the House of Commons, the more interest it will generate and then maybe some action will be taken. In the meantime, children are being exploited, children are outlaws on the streets of Canada and not enough action is being taken.

You can ask the question: What action can be taken? Well, first we have to identify the problem very clearly. Many people know about it. There is not a social worker across Canada that has not had specific experience. The problem is to gather all this information together and utilize the information to establish a program of action.

Just by way of demonstrating in a graphic way the nature of the problem, there is an organization called Victims of Violence. Gary Rosenfeldt and his wife are very much involved in it. They have been before committees of the House of Commons time and time again to push this matter.

I remember them pointing out that in Canada, about four or five years ago, we had a registry system for missing automobiles and vessels, but we had no registry for missing children. In other words, we in Canada were concerned with vehicles that were stolen and missing but had no concern about the children who had been reported missing.

At least we solved that problem. We now have a registry of missing children. We also have alerted police forces, which at times have not been as co-operative as I would have liked them to be in this area, to the fact that they have a role to play. They cannot ignore missing children. They should not wait for them to steal or commit some other criminal offence before they take some action.

Sharon Rosenfeldt wrote to me in October 1985 and said: "This country has foundations for women's rights, human rights, save baby seals and whales, but there is no help for missing children from their parents". As I said, some steps have been taken to remedy and rectify this situation, but a great deal more action is required.

I want to say in closing that I recognize and realize that the motion that has been put forward has in mind a bill of rights for children. I think that what is at the heart of that motion is the demand for federal-provincial co-operation in this area so we can have a legal basis to deal with the problem and then the contribution of public resources, private resources and any other resources to resolve this problem. As long as we have missing children on the streets of Canada, we will have people outside the laws of society and they will suffer, and all society will suffer.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to rise today in support of the motion of my colleague for Mission—Coquitlam that, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of setting up some sort of a grand alliance with the provinces to deal with the issue of a bill of rights for children.

This motion indicates a vision of a lot of the problems that relate to children in Canada, but it also relates a vision of the way Canada could be seen as an example internationally. The way that we treat our children and the kind of resources that are allocated for children can be seen as an example internationally.

As you are no doubt aware, Mr. Speaker, Canada has agreed to co-host or sponsor the Summit on World's Children which will be held September 29 and 30 in New York city. Canada, along with Egypt, Mali, Mexico, Pakistan and Sweden, has agreed to sponsor this Summit on World's Children.

If the House agrees to pass this motion, I think that it has implications for Canada's international reputation. I would like to at least begin my remarks on that international perspective because passing this motion would send a signal to the world that we care about our children.

Much of the evidence, as has been stated in earlier addresses, would not indicate that we care. There is a lot of talk and very little action as regards the state of Canada's children.

Children are seen and not heard in the political context. Children are not voters. Children do not have political power. I think more and more Canadians are finding out what it means to be politically powerless. It is a sad statement of our own lack of resources that this country has allocated to much of the problems of Canada's children.

This is not to be just heart-wrenching. We can wrench a lot of tears from people by telling sad stories, but I think that we in this House have a duty and obligation to try to do something about this.

• (1740)

This motion attempts that beginning, that a bill of rights be established, that children do have a place, do have a voice, will have some protection through a child protection commissioner, and that an emergency hot line be established. Rather than just nice words strung together in this House, we need something tangible to come out of this.

I would like to turn now to the international aspects of that. In my critic area of international development and in my role on the subcommittee on international debt of external affairs, we hear much about structural adjustment and the kind of effects that structural adjustment has on the developing world. International debt is a major crisis and yet the people in the corporate board rooms of the banks do not seem to understand that the decisions that are made in those boardrooms have an effect on the most disadvantaged in the world, particularly the women and children. The heaviest burden of the debt crisis is falling on the growing minds and bodies of children.

This motion to support a bill of rights that my hon. colleague has put forth would indicate Canada as an example. We are willing to do something in our country and we care about the children internationally.

We also have to indicate that structural adjustment does not just occur in the Third World where certain policies are taken in order to address a particular debt problem. We now have in our own country a debt crisis that has evolved over the years. Now those same politically powerless people are the ones who are paying the major burden of that debt through cuts to social programs and the things that are going on with health care. We have to understand what structural adjustment is. It is two nice words put together and yet it has very negative consequences for children here and internationally.

We are coming up in the next week to a budget. We are all waiting on tenterhooks to learn where the cuts are going to come. We have been told by the finance minister that there are going to be major cuts. We can only hope that some of those cuts will come in defence spending. We have heard a lot about the peace dividend and what will happen with the peace dividend, that the money that will be hopefully reduced from defence spending will be allocated to social programs.

I caution you, Mr. Speaker, that it be not just social programs here. We seem to have achieved a global consciousness environmentally and yet we have not yet achieved that global consciousness socially or politically. We cannot see those things as mutually distinct. We are all on this planet together and we are interdependent, not just environmentally but socially and politically. What happens in Columbia, El Salvador and the Sudan has an impact on our lives. We are talking about political destabilization, a growing militarization in the face of that destabilization. The statistics of the resources that are allocated to the military are shocking.

Developed countries on average now spend 5.4 per cent of their gross national product for military purposes. Canada only spends .43 per cent on overseas development assistance. In the Third World three in five governments spend more on their military than they do on health care. It is a shocking statistic when you realize that the cost of three hours of arms spending would pay for the entire World Health Organization $260 million annual budget. We talk about what we value in our society and about children as our treasure, and not just a national treasure but an international treasure. I think that these statistics put the lie to that.

We have to do a major reassessment of our values and a reallocation of our resources if we are going to really address the situation of children, and not just in Canada which this bill of rights would do. This bill of rights for children, this commissioner for child protection and an emergency hot line would be an important symbol that Canada does care for its own children, that we value our children and that our whole community values reflect that.

In conclusion, I want to urge the government and the members of the Liberal party to support this motion unanimously.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address this motion on the advisability of a comprehensive bill of rights for children which would standardize laws throughout the country and which would include a child protection commission and an emergency hot line for children.

The protection of children is one of the foremost duties of any society. We can only be as strong as our weakest members. I, therefore, laud the member for Mission—Coquitlam for the concern she has shown for all children in Canada in her motion on this matter.

Having said that, I would now like to turn my attention to some of the real difficulties faced by this motion. Canada is under a federal system of government with both levels of government, federal and provincial, having certain areas of responsibility under the Constitution.

Provinces have been allocated power over much of family law, including the welfare of children under section 92, subsection (13) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which gives to provinces the right to legislate with respect to property and civil rights in provinces. In the adoption reference of 1938, the Supreme Court of Canada determined that the welfare of children was a matter of provincial responsibility.

We have in Canada two basic types of legislation which afford protection to children, the criminal law which deals with the physical and sexual abuse of children and child protection legislation which deals with the involvement of the state where a child has been abused or neglected. The federal government has constitutional jurisdiction over the former and provincial governments have constitutional jurisdiction over the latter.

Provinces deal with child protection in a number of ways relevant to their individual circumstances and with a wide range of statutes covering such topics as adoption, child welfare, custody and access, and education. Each province has a government recognized body which has the responsibility for enforcing child welfare laws in order to protect children and provide services to the child and his or her family.

• (1750)

Given that these services are in place throughout this country, it does not seem to be advisable or necessary to involve the federal government in a long phase of negotiations to standardize these laws, removing flexibility from provincial legislation and challenging the constitutional authority which has been in place since 1867.

Further, I am not at all convinced that a central monolithic child protection commission would or could provide better services than those that are now provided by each province and territory, nor am I persuaded that it would be constitutionally correct.

The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam has also included in her motion a reference to the need for an emergency hot line which children could contact in times of crisis. I would like to inform the House that the Canadian Children's Foundation has established a 1–800 number to serve just such a function. It is called Help Line and it is my understanding that it is enjoying considerable success. This crisis line handles calls from anywhere in Canada and refers children in distress to local authorities and services for assistance in dealing with their problems. This valuable service offers support and assistance to children from all across Canada.

Children are our most important asset, as I mentioned earlier. Our society will be judged by how well we protect them. There are, in addition to child protection laws, criminal laws which protect our children. In particular, this government can be proud of its achievements in the prevention of child sexual abuse.

In January of last year, Bill C–15 became law. This bill amended the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act to better protect children and youth from sexual abuse by enacting measures to permit more young children to testify and to provide more sensitive procedures for obtaining their evidence. In addition new offences were created and certain outdated and confusing provisions of the Criminal Code were repealed.

The Department of Justice has supported this initiative through law information activities such as the easy to read booklet for children age four to ten. It tells them to tell someone if they have been sexually abused. We also have a book for adults telling them how to proceed if a child discloses an incident of sexual abuse to them.

Concern for children is expressed not only in the Criminal Code but in the federal government's family law legislation. The Divorce Act, for example, provides that the custody of a child is to be decided upon with a consideration of the child's best interest only. This makes it clear that the needs and the rights of the child are the central and indeed the only concern of the courts when deciding the difficult question of custody of children.

The government has expressed its concern in other ways for children in situations of divorce through the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act. This act plays an important role in the enforcement of child support payments, as well as the recovery of children wrongfully abducted from the custodial parent by the non-custodial parent.

All too often, it is sad to say, the parent who is to pay support for the child, and it is usually the father, economically abandons his child by not paying or by paying late or by paying less than was ordered or agreed to. The Federal Enforcement Assistance Act allows for the garnishment of designated federal funds to enforce delinquent support payments, and I understand that program has been a tremendous success, having intercepted a total of over $6 billion in the year prior to June 30, 1989.

In many instances the debtor father chooses to disappear rather than to pay child support. In such cases the federal government will search its information banks in an effort to locate the father, thereby aiding provincial authorities in the enforcement of the support order or agreement. Information will also be released where a non-custodial parent takes a child contrary to an existing custodial agreement.

The government's work in the areas of support and custody and the Criminal Code are simply a few examples of our commitment to the protection of all Canadian children. The value of children cannot be over-emphasized. They are the future of our country. This motion, however, fails in my estimation to significantly improve the lot of children in Canada.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, the motion which I would now like to address proposes that the government enter into negotiation with the provinces with a view to achieving a comprehensive bill of rights for children which would standardize laws throughout Canada respecting children.

This government recognizes that the basic rights of children is very significant. There are many existing laws, both federal and provincial, which have a bearing on children. Examples are the provincial child care protection laws and the federal Young Offenders Act and the Divorce Act.

I remind this House that all of the rights guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms accrue to children as much as to any other person in Canada. Indeed, some of these rights relate in quite a specific way to children. For example, Section 15 of the Charter guarantees the right to equality without discrimination on a number of grounds including age, and Section 23 provides for certain minority language education rights. None of these laws sets out in a comprehensive way the basic rights of children per se.

The question that we must now consider is whether it would be appropriate to begin negotiations with the provinces with a view to achieving a comprehensive bill on this subject.

One very relevant consideration is the stage of development in the draft convention on the rights of the child. After 10 years, almost a decade of work by the United Nations working group to complete the drafting of this complex and important convention, it was adopted by the United Nations Human Rights Commission about one year ago in March 1989. There appears to be an excellent prospect that it will be finally adopted by the United Nations General Assembly later this year. That will become open for ratification by all the countries of the world.

• (1800)

This draft convention on the rights of the child is very comprehensive in nature. It includes social and economic rights, such as those relating to social health and education security, as well as the sort of rights we find in our Charter. That is the fundamental freedoms of religion, freedoms of expression, freedom of association and freedom of assembly and also certain rights relating to the criminal process.

The draft convention on the rights of the child also contains many provisions in the area of family law, dealing with such matters as adoption, the resolution of custody disputes and measures relating to family reunification where parents decide to reside in different countries.

This country has been very actively involved in the drafting of this United Nations convention. A federal-provincial working group has met every year since 1981 to determine what should be the position of Canada on many issues regarding it. Many Canadian proposals have served as the basis for negotiations by the United Nations working group. I understand that at the last federal-provincial-territorial ministerial conference on human rights, the human rights ministers recognized the active role of Canada in drafting the convention and agreed to continue their co-operation on this subject.

It is a matter of high priority that federal and provincial governments continue their co-operation on this very important convention. When it becomes open for ratification, the federal and provincial governments will all need to review Canadian legislation to ensure that Canada is in a position to ratify it. Then Canada will have to prepare an honest report to the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child on measures Canada has taken to ensure that children here have the benefit of the rights provided to them in this United Nations convention.

This future process, relating to the draft convention on the rights of the child, will be a very helpful initial step toward determining whether it would be appropriate to have a domestic bill of rights for children and just what rights it should contain. For the moment, we should focus our efforts on this United Nations initiative regarding children's rights before we consider starting on a similar idea in the domestic area.

As I mentioned earlier, the Charter applies to children and some of its provisions deal with them in quite a specific way. There are already a number of Charter cases relating to children, to such questions as the confidentiality of proceedings involving young offenders, or the various age limits that are found in the Criminal Code, especially regarding sexual offences. It is not as yet clear just what all the implications of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms will be for children. Until Canadians have a better idea of the nature of children's rights under the Charter, it would be too early to begin writing a children's bill of rights.

There is one last concern of a constitutional nature that I will briefly draw to the attention of the House. The motion does not make it at all clear who is expected to enact the proposed bill. Is it to be the federal government or is it to be the provinces of Canada? Much of the jurisdiction over children lies with the provinces. Unless a constitutional document is contemplated, I question how one comprehensive bill of rights for children could be enacted in a federal country such as Canada. As my colleague from Halifax West pointed out earlier, this is an obstacle that, indeed, we must overcome.

To summarize, considering our current commitment to ensure the successful completion, ratification and implementation of the draft convention on the rights of the child, and because of the Constitutional division of powers in Canada that I have just mentioned, it would not in my view be advisable for the government to support this motion.

• (1805)

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): I welcome this opportunity to make my contribution as did those who spoke previously on the very important subject of rights for children in Canada. I want to thank the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam for presenting this motion. In the course of this debate on providing a comprehensive Bill of Rights for children, a number of members mentioned developments on the international scene. In fact, several members suggested that instead of drafting a Bill of Rights for children, Canada should concentrate on the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. I support this suggestion which, I think, is a realistic approach to enhancing the protection of children's rights in this country.

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this debate, when we heard references to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, we knew the General Assembly had not yet given its final approval. That important step was taken on November 20, 1989, when the General Assembly adopted the Convention on consensus. As a Canadian, I am proud of the leadership shown by my country in drafting and adopting this very important instrument. Now that the Convention has been adopted, the matter of signatures and ratification by Canada can be considered.

As the debate on the motion before the House progressed, it became increasingly clear that many, if not all aspects Canada intends to cover in the Bill of Rights for children had already been covered by the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. Members who raised this point mentioned a number of major problems that made it necessary to improve child protection, including poverty, mistreatment, needs of disabled children and children suffering various forms of mistreatment or abuse. All these problems would undoubtedly be given considerable emphasis in the proposed Bill of Rights.

However, the United Nations Convention already deals with this aspect and with many others, and it sets standards for the States that become signatories to this instrument. For instance, it contains several provisions relating to poverty, including article 27 which acknowledges the right of a child to a standard of living that is sufficient to provide for physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development. The same article asks States to take the appropriate steps to help parents and other individuals responsible for the child to implement that right and in case of need, to offer material assistance in acquiring food, clothing and shelter. The general question of poverty arises in other articles of the Convention relating to the health, education, survival and development of the child.

Mr. Speaker, child abuse has to be one of the most prevailing and tragic problems encountered by underprivileged youngsters these days. In that respect the convention sets standards designed to protect children who are victims of abuse and holds governments responsible for intervening on their behalf. More significant still, the convention requests that signatory governments take all appropriate steps to ease the child's physical and psychological rehabilitation as well as his return to society. The rehabilitation programs advocated in the convention are not designed only for children who are victims of violence and sexual abuse, but also for those who are subjected to other forms of abuse, negligence, economic exploitation and drug use.

In addition to these articles of a general nature which apply to handicapped children as well, the convention includes specific provisions aimed at offering better opportunities to these children. Article 23 spells out the role governments are expected to play to ensure that handicapped children benefit from, in the words of the convention, "as complete social integration as possible and their personal development".

Mr. Speaker, the debate on the motion introduced by the Hon. Member for Mission—Coquitlam and the special debate on child poverty in Canada which was opened by the former leader of the New Democratic Party have made it possible for all Members of the House of Commons to reaffirm their commitment with repsect to the need to uphold the rights of children in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(3), the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedents on the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 is deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the adjournment debate on the question that I put in the House on September 28, 1989.

The question was as follows:

> Since last April the government has been telling Canadians that not many people would be hurt by the unemployment insurance cuts. They said only 30,000 people would be unable to obtain benefits. Statistics Canada has contradicted the government. It says that 130,000 people will lose all of their benefits. Thirty times more people will be hit in Newfoundland alone than the government had admitted to.

I went on to say:

> My question was for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister confirm that by Statistic Canada's own analysis there will be 130,000 Canadians who will lose all their benefits. And would he also confirm that his government's own stats have been a dramatic understatement.

The Minister of State for Employment and Immigration and Minister of State for Seniors responded by saying:

> I am pleased to tell my colleague that since our government took office we have created 1,500,000 jobs including 878,000 for women.

She went on to repeat that what they were trying to do with unemployment reform was to make the system fair and equitable.

The minister did not respond directly to my question and that is why I feel very strongly about coming before the House and putting the discussion on the table.

My supplementary question was to the minister. I asked her if she was telling us that she was really not aware of the horrible impact these measures would have on the unemployed and, if she was aware of them, did the government still allow incorrect numbers to be released. The minister responded by saying that she personally was responsible for the department that oversees Statistics Canada and she has confidence in Stats Canada's data. That was not what I had asked her. I had asked her if in fact she had allowed incorrect numbers to be released.

She said:

> I also know that the data I just quoted you truly reflect the job creation situation.

It seems that this government is so enamoured with the McDonalds burger type of jobs they create that it becomes impossible to get them to speak about Bill C-21, the Unemployment Insurance Amendment Act. It is impossible to get them to talk about the impact of this act on the unemployed in the country. Indeed, what we find is that we are constantly being told about how many jobs have been created in Canada. When we try to talk about the Unemployment Insurance Act nobody is saying that there have not been jobs created in Canada. We might argue the degree or the quality of jobs, but we are not arguing whether or not jobs have been created. What we are arguing about is unemployment insurance and trying to get this government to talk about and think about the impact of the changes of Bill C-21, the impact on people in the country, men and women. I have all kinds of statistics I can throw out here today, but throwing around statistics does not address the issue of the man who is unemployed in Newfoundland, the woman who is unemployed in the Northwest Territories or the family with both adult workers unemployed in British Columbia, or in my own riding of Mission—Coquitlam for that matter.

• (1815)

I would like to address the question of an interim report called: Regional Unemployment in Canada: A Nation Out of Balance. That report came from the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council. It was completed in November 1989 and released by the minister in February 1990.

I want to speak to this report because prior to this life as a member of Parliament, I sat for two terms on the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council. The council is made up of 21 members. There are seven representatives from labour, seven from management and seven NGO representatives. I have sat through many a long meeting on that advisory council where we knocked heads and came out with a common theme representing the views of the labour movement, the corporate community including the Chamber of Commerce and bankers, and the views of the non-government organizations.

That advisory council came out with this report that was critical of the way in which the Department of Employment and Immigration addresses the problem of regional unemployment. The report states that decisions on behalf of communities are usually made in larger centres by people who are not familiar with the local needs and conditions. Regional development programs in particular have a dismal record of failure. But the effectiveness of federal training programs has also left the regions with large accumulated training needs.

The report goes on to say that for regions to assume greater responsibility for their own development, it will involve not only the efforts of the community but those of the three levels of government and other major institutions. This process will demand a devolution of power and decision making from the centre to the communities. This will probably encounter considerable opposition from an entrenched bureaucracy but it is a necessary step toward local revitalization.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a situation where yet another advisory council of the government is being muzzled but in fact a situation where a very thoughtful group of senior Canadians is taken seriously about the effects of unemployment, its impact on average, ordinary, working people who want to work and who do not want to be displaced or reconditioned and indeed, who do not believe that this country owes them a living. They want to work for that living.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on April 11, 1989, the government released a policy paper entitled, Success in the Works outlining a labour force development strategy for Canada. This paper announced a number of changes in the unemployment insurance program. In August 1989 the Department of Employment and Immigration announced the financial impact of these changes.

The analysis revealed that the reallocation of $1.2 billion within the UI program represents less than 10 per cent of the current UI program expenditures. In addition, it was shown that only 30,000 claimants out of a total claimant population of 2.7 million are expected to be unable to meet the new entrance requirements. In a province like Newfoundland, very few people will be unable to meet the new entrance requirements. This reflects the fact that the changes were so designed as to concentrate the impact on the relatively buoyant regions.

What has happened is that Statistics Canada produced some numbers and those numbers were taken by the CLC and other people and interpreted. We had the representative from Statistics Canada, Mr. Petrie, and Mr. Carin from the Department of Employment and Immigration before the committee. I have several pages of the committee's Hansard showing the hon. member trying to get the department officials to agree with the analysis of the CLC. Time after time they said: "No, that is not the interpretation that we put on those numbers at all".

It should be noted that these impacts do not include the positive effects of the increased expenditures on training and re-employment measures. The hon. member accuses the government of understating the effects on Canadians, and she quotes other impact studies that are more to her liking since they overstate the impacts.

The figures released by Employment and Immigration Canada are the most reliable and accurately reflect what Canadians can expect from the structural changes in the UI program.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, if I rise tonight to take part in this adjournment debate, it is further to the question I directed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) on December 20, 1989 concerning of course the small business and the GST. It is a major issue of great concern for many small businessmen who will certainly be faced with a nightmare when the times come for them to try and deal with the Minister of Finance's new tax which comes into effect on January 1st, 1991.

As a member of the Finance Committee, I had an opportunity to travel everywhere in Canada and to listen to the various Canadian organizations which made representations to us concerning the various problems associated with GST.

Mr. Speaker, one of the areas which will truly be a source of nightmare is that of food because there are stores which serve coffee, biscuits, donuts and so on. Therefore, it will complicate things. We had insisted with the Finance Department people that something had to be done to remedy the situation.

Tonight, during the short time at my disposal—as a matter of fact, I spent the day trying to make the Minister of Finance understand, but I suggest he is not willing these days to listen to what Canadians have to say.

In the technical paper entitled Goods and Services Tax which he tabled in the House on December 19, 1989, the minister recognized the existence of this problem and stated that two changes would be made to the GST legislation to eliminate these competitive imbalances.

First of all, yogurts, pudings and drinks other than unflavoured milk, sold in individual portions will be taxable. However, when these same products are sold in a package containing several individual portions, they will remain non taxable, because they will resemble more basic groceries.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you have convenience stores in your riding. Think of the little corner stores. How will they deal with the accounting aspect of this problem? I am sure also that you remember the commitment the government had made that this tax reform would simplify things. I have just referred to this technical paper to show you that it will only complicate them.

When I hear the government suggest that small businessmen agree with the minister—-an honourable member opposite may say: If you are against, it is because you sit in the Opposition. He should talk to the people. Personally, I have in mind the pre-budget brief which John Bullock submitted to the Minister of Finance. Mr. Speaker, you will admit with me that this gentleman strongly defended in the past certain economic policies put forward by the Minister of Finance.

This is not someone who always speaks out against the Minister of Finance. I might say he is nearer your right than your left.

Yet, in his brief, he submits that it will be necessary to keep a purchase record for each bill to be able to distinguish between the provincial sales tax and the federal sales tax. Do you realize that small businessmen will be compelled to have sales records simply to identify their goods. They will have to keep purchase journals, cash payment journals, revenue journals, a whole accounting systems they could certainly had done without, Mr. Speaker.

• (1825)

Now, things are getting increasingly complicated. The same organization refered to the GST in this brief to the Finance Minister. In the part which are quoted today, he foresees that the small foodstores will have to close because it will get too complicated.

But the central issue in this report has to be the survey conducted among small businesses after the rate was reduced from 9 to 7 per cent. That is what carries weight, Mr. Speaker. Down from 9 to 7 per cent, yet it did not solve the problems of small businesses. Indeed one such survey indicates that 68 per cent are against the GST. I am referring to an Angus Reid survey carried out on behalf of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. And even when they point out that the tax rate has been lowered from 9 to 7 per cent, Mr. Speaker, 83 per cent still cry foul. Just changing the rate does not mean anything, because we know this government very well. Even the federal sales tax which was supposed to be killing jobs went up 4.5 per cent over the past five years. Small businesses obviously did not swallow that.

Mr. Speaker, you are signaling that my time is up. In conclusion I want to tell the House and all Canadians that 83 per cent of small business operators are against the GST, and my hope is that when the Minister of Finance wakes up tomorrow morning he will decide to repeal this tax.

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the GST is not an administrative nightmare as the member alleges and the government has not abandoned the small business community. For most businesses the GST is a straightforward system similar to that used by small businesses in almost 50 countries in the world, including England, Japan, West Germany, France and New Zealand.

Mr. Gagliano: They don't have nine provincial sales taxes.

Mr. Kempling: In fact, of the world's 24 most industrialized economies, the OECD nations, 19 already have a sales tax system of this kind.

The GST will replace the existing federal sales tax which has been in effect since 1924, which is now outdated and harmful to to the Canadian economy. The purpose of this change is to stimulate economic growth and foster an environment which will benefit every sector and every region of the country.

Mr. Gagliano: Why don't you check how many have a provincial sales tax?

Mr. Kempling: You might learn something if you listen.

The existing tax is not a tax on manufacturers, but is a tax on manufactured products. As a result, it impacts on every business in the country, large or small, because businesses buy manufactured products to produce the goods and services they sell. Under the GST the cost of doing business will be less because, while most businesses will charge tax on the domestic sales, they will claim a credit on the tax paid on all their business inputs, the goods and services used in the course of doing business. On the whole, documents used to support input credit claims will be virtually the same receipts and invoices currently retained by businesses for income tax purposes.

As a result, there will be a minimal number of changes in existing business practices for most businesses and the GST will be straightforward, simply the subtraction of tax paid on purchases from the tax charged on sales.

However, the government recognizes that many small businesses have limited administrative resources. Consequently, a number of special measures will be adopted to further minimize the overall compliance burden for them. These measures include a sales tax threshold below which vendors will not be required to register, collect or remit GST; optional annual reporting to reduce the frequency for GST remittances; government assistance to upgrade cash register systems for automatic calculations of GST and provincial retail sales taxes; streamlined methods of accounting to simplify check-out counter procedures for retailers who sell a combination of taxable goods and tax free basic groceries; and a transitional credit of up to $1,000 to help ease the transition of the new system.

• (1830)

I might say, if the hon. member wants to look into it, the procedure required by small business to claim federal sales tax today, the manufacturers' sales tax, is an absolute nightmare. I know. I have run businesses, and I have had to do it for years. I know what you go through. You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Gagliano: I have been doing their books for many years.

JUSTICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary is having a bad night.

Mr. Kempling: I'm having a good night.

Mr. Kaplan: He is getting good questions, tough questions, but he is not giving good answers. However, I would like to give him one more chance by referring to the question I asked the Minister of Justice as long ago as October 2, 1989. October, November, December and January have gone by.

I will refer to a portion of the answer of the Minister of Justice in a moment. I think it is at least time to get an update on the action promised by the minister in the answer he gave me to my original question.

I was talking about the lack of a sense of urgency on the part of this government in dealing with the drug problem in our country. It is a problem which, at the level of rhetoric, has attracted a lot of government interest, but at the level of action has attracted a lot less.

I was asking about measures the government brought forward, which we gladly assisted in putting into the law of our country, to permit the law to pursue the proceeds of crime into whatever apparently honest dealings or honest forms they might have taken after the crime was committed.

The legislation went through but I think the government has gotten cold feet. I say that because the legislation has been used very little, and necessary amendments recognized by the government and supported by us have not been brought forward to make the legislation stronger.

We learned, and I think the minister was one of the first to comment publicly, that a lot of municipal police forces are refraining from using this section of the Criminal Code because, as they say, it is an expensive procedure for them to use. If they result in nailing some criminals and extracting the proceeds, those proceeds have to be turned over to the federal treasury.

I rose and asked the minister about the idea of allowing the municipal police forces who get the proceeds, who go to the expense, or the provincial governments behind them that go to the expense of expropriating these proceeds, to keep them. He said: "That is a good idea". And it was a good idea.

Then he added, and this was last October:

> As I said, we are looking into the matter. As soon as we have established the rationale on what action could be taken we will take that action.

[Translation]

Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister did promise to follow up on this. And now, a few months after he made that commitment, I am asking him what have we got? I am aware that no legislation has been proposed, but is he going to take action soon? In a spirit of co-operation, will he tell the other government levels that they can expect to keep the proceeds of crime, in accordance with the law and Bill C-61?

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying that I am not an enthusiastic admirer of the American administration, not really. But they did experience a drug crisis and take action. Right now the President of the United States is risking his life to go to Cartagena in Columbia where he is not particulary welcomed, just so he can keep up the fight against drugs. Whether you approve of his policy or not, you have to admire what the president is doing. I am not suggesting that the Minister of Justice should court danger. No, but I expect him to act on the the promises and commitments he made.

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, or Bill C-61, came into force in Canada on January 1, 1989.

The law is based on the premise that the best deterrent and punishment for profit-motivated offences associated with organized criminal activity is the confiscation of the illegally acquired assets.

As a result of the amendments, the courts have been empowered to order the forfeiture to Her Majesty of certain proceeds derived from crime.

• (1835)

It should, however, be pointed out that only that portion of forfeited proceeds that exceeds the amounts that may be ordered returned to any victims of the offence, actually accrue to the government since priority will be given to use the property of an offender to make restitution to the victims of the crime.

Under the Criminal Code the surplus portion of the proceeds goes to the provinces under section 723(1) for Criminal Code offences whereas drug proceeds go to the federal government.

Municipal officials have expressed their concern over the disposition of the forfeited proceeds of designated drug offences. They have asked that the proceeds accruing to the federal government be directed to the municipally-controlled police force that assumed the expense of enforcing the law under which the forfeiture was imposed. The Minister of Justice has asked his officials to examine these questions, and they are doing that. The minister assures me he will be reporting in the very near future.

What must be emphasized, however, is that the basic philosophy and deterrent effect of the law, which is to remove the incentive of committing profit-motivated offences by depriving the offender of the proceeds of such an offence, will be maintained. The impact of the law on the accused will not be influenced by who will receive the benefit of the forfeited proceeds.

The strength of this legislation must not be measured merely by its profitability to one authority or by its global impact on crime. Our government will surely guide its actions on this basis.

I would also like to mention other important facets of the law.

In the absence of the proceeds or where they have been commingled with other property, sentencing courts may impose a fine in an equivalent amount in lieu of the forfeiture. The court will impose in default of payment a term of imprisonment related to the amount of the fine. This period of imprisonment will be served consecutively.

As a protective measure the courts also have the power to order the pre-trial seizure or restraint of proceeds of crimes. Access to income tax information can be made available for drug proceeds investigations.

Protection from civil or criminal liability is extended to persons who disclose to authorities their reasonable suspicion relating to the commission of enterprise crime offences or of designated drug offences.

A new offence of laundering has been created and applies to any person who knowingly deals in the proceeds of specified crimes with intent to conceal or to convert them.

As you can appreciate, Mr. Speaker, this law not only has a practical impact on offenders but also serves as a deterrent to potential offenders. Due consideration will be given to measures likely to improve its implementation.

POINT OF ORDER

HOUSE OF COMMONS PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Speaker: I have a point of order from the hon. member for Beaver River.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to express great disappointment over the events in this Chamber yesterday.

I spoke with the government House leader yesterday about the timeframe for the debate on linguistic dualities and the Meech Lake Accord which the government had put forward. He assured me the debate would be going on for three days because it would not be democratic not to let everyone have his or her say. I agreed, and asked him to let me and my office know if there was any change, and he said he would.

After Question Period yesterday the government House leader reiterated in the Chamber what he had told me earlier. The only question was when would be the appropriate time for the vote, so that all members could be present to get their names on the record. In regard to the timeframe, I refer to yesterday's Hansard at page 8400, where the government House Leader said:

> The debate will continue tonight with 20 minute speeches until such time as the last person speaks. When the last member is finishing speaking we would simply adjourn until tomorrow. That same arrangement would take place on Monday.

Of course, I believed that. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the debate ended almost as soon as it began. After one speaker from each of the three parties, the motion was immediately put and passed. I had left the Chamber shortly before that, as I was due to catch a plane to my riding. I was prepared to speak and could easily have been here when the debate ended. In fact, I arranged and now, again, have rearranged my travel schedules to accommodate that timetable.

Unfortunately, what we saw yesterday was a sad display of gamesmanship. I find it appalling that an issue so sensitive, so necessary to be looked at in an objective manner, could be scornfully dismissed by three carefully orchestrated speeches.

The issues in the motion yesterday are divisive and are tough issues for all of us as parliamentarians. There is dissent on Meech Lake and linguistic duality in the House and the public knows it. That is why these matters must be debated here.

The real danger to a democracy is when legitimate dissent becomes restricted to only extreme groups far removed from legitimate institutions. That, I believe, is a real danger in the country today, as illustrated by the events of yesterday. I want to put on the record that I am displeased with what went on, and I am sure the Canadian public who watched this on television was equally appalled.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a brief intervention. Acting on my party's behalf yesterday morning, I met with the government House leader and the House leader of the Official Opposition.

At that time I raised the proposal that the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party had put forward to the government to have an identical motion and, in effect, to have the leaders of each of the three parties speak to the matter and then proceed to other business. I was advised that no, the government was continuing with their efforts to schedule the debate over the next period of time and not just yesterday.

I so advised my leader who had been prepared to cancel her travel plans in order to be here. When I advised her that there would be further opportunities next week to participate in the debate, she decided to go ahead with her plans to travel into Quebec, and did leave, which was an interesting feat given the weather yesterday. That is why she was not in the Chamber yesterday for this very historical debate. I know that she would want me to indicate to the House and to citizens watching that it had been her intention to speak on this matter.

I regret that events unfolded as they did, with the government deciding to shorten the debate, keep it at a high level—which I think is something we all should be pleased with—and have the vote yesterday afternoon, which we did.

I regret the way events proceeded. It is an indication of how we are not really negotiating the way we should on a number of matters to make sure that the House operates smoothly.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I just want to be very clear on what happened yesterday.

The House will know I went on the record during what is known as the business statement immediately after Question Period. I suggested at that time that we were prepared to have an extended debate, with the proviso that there be no dilatory motions and that when the last speaker finished speaking on Thursday night, the debate would adjourn to Friday and Friday's debate would adjourn to Monday. We were prepared to extend the hours on both evenings. Both the Liberal Party and the NDP refused the offer for extended hours and I see no difficulty in that. The offer was made in good faith and accepted by the House in good faith. That was the basis on which we were going to call the debate.

The leader of the Opposition stated very clearly, as reported at page 8408 of Hansard

> —we will support this resolution because, above all, it calls for the reaffirmation of the importance of bilingualism—

That is on the record.

When the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville spoke on behalf of the New Democratic Party he said, "We support the resolution before the House today".

We had a debate joined by the representatives of all three parties in which it was made very clear that all three parties in the House were going to support the debate. I do remember speaking with my hon. friend from Beaver River. She asked me in my position as Government House Leader how I thought it would work. I said here is what we are proposing to the other two parties. I said I did not know whether they would accept it or not. As it turned out they did not accept it.

Now this is the situation. The House will know, members who are here will know that when debate collapses on a motion a vote can be called by the Chair. I suggest that is exactly what happened. The three parties had discussions. The House will know there was excellent attendance in the House yesterday for a major speech. As I told my friend, during the speech of the leader of the Liberal party the Prime Minister and I discussed it with the Deputy Prime Minister and other colleagues. We decided that since there was a good tone coming from the Liberal party's speech that we would see if there was a disposition at that time to have a unanimous resolution of this House for all three parties to enjoin and speak out for Canadians on this very important principle.

I guess I have to say that a lot of hours go into this job from everybody. Being a member of Parliament means that you have to be on top of what is going on in this House while the House is open and sitting. If you cannot be there yourself then you have party people who keep you advised as to what is happening and what your responsibilities are. If you do not want to go through your party officials you can always ask the Table. The officers would have told you that if debate did not go until 5.12 yesterday that the question could be called. That is what happened. It was done with the unanimous endorsation of the leaders of the three parties who represent some 294 constituencies in this country. We spoke out on this very important principle affirming that this is a bilingual country, supporting Meech Lake and the Official Languages Act and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that any elected MP who wanted to be here to speak on that issue knew it was going to be called—it was very clear—and should have been here to make his or her speech and support the resolution.

We have done that. I believe we are fully on the record as to what we were trying to do at the time we were trying to do it. Events changed. Everybody who is here knows that this is a very fluid place and that things happen. Sometimes things look like it is impossible that they will take place and suddenly you have consensus. Yesterday we had that consensus among the three major parties in this country. We reaffirmed a very basic principle which is fundamental to this country. We did it unanimously and I think we can all be proud of it.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the comments of the Government House Leader. I must say I find it ironic that yesterday in the speeches we heard about tolerance for minorities. Certainly sitting as one member representing the Reform Party in the House of Commons found that it turned around and this minority was not respected.

We all know that I have every right to be consulted about unanimous consent in this House. I have tried to be very fair- minded in my tenure here, that I would not try to cause problems and hold up the proceedings of this House. However, I do have to say it was amazing that all that happened as soon as I left the Chamber.

I will also say in response to the Government House Leader's comments—and I will finish with this because I know we have other business to get on to—that the Government House Leader has just said that debate collapsed yesterday. Mr. Speaker, you know that the deputy House leader was here. I refer to page 8414 of Hansard yesterday where the Acting Speaker did not even call for further debate. I know that he generally says "resuming debate". He immediately asked: "Is the House ready for the question?" We see another member screaming "no". The Acting Speaker said: "I am sorry I cannot recognize the hon. member. He is not properly dressed." That is fair enough. That presents another problem here.

I think what is so appalling and many Canadians also find appalling is that no chance was given. I have heard from several of my friends on the other side that they were very surprised at what happened. I want it clearly on the record that Canadian people are seeing this, expressing frustration and in fact shrugging their shoulders saying: "There they go again in the House of Commons".

• (1020)

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments by the Government House Leader. I just want to correct the record slightly. The minister left the impression that the House Leader for the Liberal Party and the House Leader for the NDP categorically rejected any extension of hours. I refer you, Sir, to page 8400 of Hansard of February 15 where the member for Kamloops, the NDP House Leader, said:

> It is not clear to me yet about the additional hours today and additional hours again on Monday to allow all members a chance to participate in the debate.

Further on the same page the member for Ottawa—Vanier on behalf of the Liberal Party said:

> I do not want the minister to think for one moment that we want to extend or prolong this debate indefinitely.

The inference in both cases, Mr. Speaker, and in fact if you look at the comments from the Chair the Acting Speaker said:

> We have had enough negotiations. I think what the House Leaders should do is have their negotiations and we should carry on with Orders of the Day.

This clearly infers the tradition of this House that the House Leaders will meet behind the curtain to work out the process. We were quite prepared to go along with extended hours.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I was involved in discussions. There seems to be some reaction from across the floor. We had not said no and we were quite prepared under reasonable circumstances to go ahead with extended hours but we wanted to know how long, how many speakers, all of those kind of things which we normally try to determine ahead of time. We did not want an open-ended situation where we were having speakers at three or four o'clock in the morning. That is just to add that, Mr. Speaker, to your considerations.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Beaver River has risen and has expressed what I must accept as her very great concern at for whatever reason not being able to take part in the debate yesterday. She has eloquently put her position. I have listened to the Minister of Justice. I have also listened to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Even if it was my intent to do so, there is nothing that the Speaker at this point can do to undo what took place yesterday. I know all hon. members will understand that. In any event, I think that this exchange indicates the necessity at all times to have the clearest understandings between members and among members and certainly among party Whips and party House Leaders. It is also, I think, incumbent upon all members of the House to realize that consent is not found always just by the three House Leaders. The hon. member for Beaver River is a member of this House and when consent is being sought in the normal circumstances the hon. member should also be consulted.

I do want to deal with one thing here because hon. members no doubt might be concerned and so might the public. I am looking at the Commons debate for yesterday and I should say that I was in the chair during most of that debate. I had to leave at the latter part of it for other duties on behalf of all of the members of the House. But in any event, the Speaker who was in the chair was in this position. The debate ended and except for one member—and I will come to that, and I may have to deal with it at another time—who the Speaker did not recognize because he was not properly dressed, there were no other members rising. The Speaker said: "Is the House ready for the question?" There was no vote. It was a unanimous reaction from the House and the debate was closed.

The Hon. Minister of Justice has said that things happen in this place sometimes very suddenly, and they do. I would urge all hon. members that when discussions take place to try to keep in mind that if what seems to be certainties are changed, hon. members will have to keep that in mind. At the same time, as much as is possible, let us try to remember that if understandings are reached or apparently reached and then events change, it can lead to disappointment and sometimes complaint.

I thank the hon. member for raising the matter. I thank the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. I must also keep in mind what the Hon. Minister for Justice said. This House can act sometimes very quickly if there is a consensus to do so. That is what happened yesterday. I regret, as I am sure other colleagues in the House do, that if there were members who wanted to be in a debate later on and now find that because of what the House did by unanimous act they are precluded, that is regrettable. But, again, the House does sometimes move very quickly, especially when there is unanimity in the House.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GENEVA CONVENTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Doug Lewis (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill C–25, an act to amend the Geneva Convention Act, the National Defence Act and the Trade–marks Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Lewis (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of our party to address a few remarks on Bill C–25 before it receives final approval by the House.

Bill C–25 is an act which will amend technically the Geneva Conventions Act, the National Defence Act and the Trade–marks Act. But the effect of the act is to bring the statutes of Canada into conformity with the protocol signed by the Government of Canada as part of the Geneva Convention process.

In 1977 in Geneva, two protocols to the 1949 Geneva Conventions were achieved. This bill seeks to ratify the two protocols.

Canadians will be familiar in general terms with the Geneva Conventions. These conventions provide a framework in international law for the conduct of affairs between nations, particularly in time of armed conflict. It is a development and codification of humanitarian rules and principles and rules of conduct in war.

• (1030)

I suppose many Canadians would appreciate that in some sense there is a contradiction in terms. The idea of humanitarian rules applying in war would seem to jar the ear. Yet, throughout history states have developed ways of dealing with the atrocities and excesses that occur in war. In a sense until recently the human family has understood that war sometimes occurs and there needs to be constraints and rules even in the conduct of armed conflict.

Over the centuries these rules have developed into a formal body of international law which was well respected. During the Middle Ages, for example, so powerful was the understanding of the needs to abide by what was understood to be God's law, the sides would have an automatic truce on the Sabbath or would stop fighting on Christmas Day. These ideas have even persisted into the current times.

In this century we have seen a change in the approach to war which has virtually obliterated some of the constraints that have applied. Perhaps out of what has happened in this century will come what we all hope to achieve, which in the final analysis is the end to war and armed conflict in itself.

What we have seen in this century is the increasing involvement of innocent civilians in armed conflict and in war. This was one of the provisions of international law which was thought to be clear. War which involved innocent civilians was illegal in international law and could not be pursued by states and subjected those states that went after innocent civilians and involved them in war to liability after the war was over.

We also had rules which dealt with the impact of war on prisoners of war and on those who were caught up in the conflict in that fashion. Those rules emanated from an entirely sensible understanding that there would be prisoners on both sides. Both sides in conflict understood the need that if their prisoners were to be treated humanely, the prisoners of the other side had to be treated humanely. There were efforts during periods of peace and sometimes even during periods of war to work out the details of that conduct. Those details and that conduct were codified in the Geneva Conventions which prevail today as a fundamental bulwark of international law.

As I mentioned, in this century what has happened is that the power of science applied to war has almost inevitably caught up innocent people in the impact and the ferocity of war. We have seen not only in the First World War the use of chemicals and the devastation caused to communities in Europe and to those who participated in war. We began seeing in the period after the First World War the terrible consequences on wide sections of the population even in civil wars such as in Spain, or on the impact of prisoners in many other areas, in the brush fires that took place and the more geophysically limited wars that took place before the First and Second World Wars.

Of course in the Second World War we saw and understood the horrors of the Holocaust, the devastation and the obliteration of whole communities on both sides by bombing, the terrible impact on prisoners of war, and the widespread effect that new methods of destruction wrought on the world community.

That led in the period after the Second World War to a renewed look at these conventions. It was out of that process that the protocols which are considered part of this bill and are adopted by this bill were developed. Canada was quite properly a signatory to these protocols and because of that the protocols have for practical purposes been part of our law ever since.

This bill would take those protocols and now make sure that the statutory law of Canada conformed with the protocols in the Geneva Conventions. While the bill in its particular language is relatively short, while it has only nine sections, it adopts protocols which are schedules to that act.

The protocols have two specifics. The first deals with the impact of protection of prisoners of war; the other with rules regarding children in armed conflict.

It is important that this Parliament pause for a moment as it moves toward passing this legislation to reflect on the issues which are addressed by the legislation in a broader sense. We should pause for a moment and consider where this country stands and where it is going on the issues of the impact of international armed conflict on humanity and the role that this country is taking in the broader question of trying to end armed conflict at all.

I should also say that it is important to understand that these protocols extend the rules of conduct in international conflict to civil wars, to liberation wars, and to the impact of battles in El Salvador, for example on civilian populations, and to prisoners of war taken in those conflicts.

It is important to note that there are now indications that the American government is having second thoughts about these protocols for the very reason of their impact on civil wars in Latin America. It is important that this government make it very clear to the American government that we expect the American government to continue to comply with the protocols and to insist that clients of the American government comply with the protocols.

I have to say that as we look at the protocols, it raises the question of the extent to which Canada has insisted upon compliance by other states with international conventions. It is not enough to adopt law. It is not enough to adopt conventions. It is not enough to adopt these protocols, but we must insist that the protocols, the conventions and the law be complied with.

One of the great difficulties at the international level in developing a body of international law is the enforcement of international law. There is no equivalent of a national or local police force as we have in our communities that has the responsibility to intervene when there a perception that the law has been broken and to ensure that the law breakers are brought to justice. There is no equivalent of a comprehensive court system that has the power to sanction illegal conduct and to impose sanctions on those who were found to be in breach of the law.

Internationally we are at a very primitive stage in enforcement of compliance with international law. The only way at this stage that we can begin moving from the primitive level to a more sophisticated level is through governments insisting with other governments that the law be complied with; that the diplomacy, if I can use the term in the used classic sense, be used to encourage an instinctive compliance with the law and that the international community act to impose sanctions when there has been a breach of international law. In that regard I point to the most recent vivid example of a clear breach of international law by the actions of the American government in Panama. Even this week we hear the President of the United States purporting to justify the American intervention in Panama, a clear breach of international law, by saying to the Soviets: "Come and look at what is going on in Panama. The people of Panama accept what we have done". That is simply western American, Texas-style justice which has no place any longer in the international community.

The consequences of a breach or a breakdown of international law now are so serious for humanity that we cannot accept that approach to the justification for a breakdown or a breach of international law. The United States government clearly broke international law when it sent its forces into Panama. It is simply not good enough to justify that on the basis that the population presently is pleased with the result.

First, we have had no clear statement by the people of Panama that that is what they wish to have happen. Second, there is no evidence that the armed intervention by the United States was the only route to achieve the desired result. Third, there was no consultation through the proper international channels to justify or attempt to develop any international law justification for the unilateral action of the United States.

In that context it becomes critically important for the Canadian Government, instead of saying ready aye ready to the Americans, to say to them very clearly that we expect the American government to comply with international law if we are to have any level of civility in international arrangements and if we expect to have the necessary moral authority in future to enforce the very protocols that we are here asking this House to adopt.

If these protocols are to have meaning they must be enforceable. If they are to be enforceable, the leading powers in the world must be prepared to commit themselves to comply with international law; not just to say we will comply only when it does not matter to us, but to comply when in fact it does matter. That must be the principle that this country stands for in the international arena.

There are other examples that this country must have of grave concern with the level at which international law is being complied with even by those we say are our friends. In El Salvador, for example, ARENA recently prevented the evacuation of FMLN soldiers who needed medical aid, in direct contravention of the very protocols that we are here asking this Parliament to adopt.

I have not heard the Canadian government say anything about that. The Canadian government, as far as I know, has been silent about that action on the part of ARENA. As far as I know, the government has not taken up with the Americans who have a very significant and powerful influence in El Salvador that particular breach of international law and the general persistent abuse of human rights by ARENA and the continued American military aid to that regime in El Salvador. If the government asks us to adopt this bill, it must come before this House and indicate what steps it is taking to ensure that the international law it is here asking us to endorse is being complied with at all levels internationally.

Let me speak of another area in which international law is suffering and that is in East Timor. The United Nations charter recognizes the right of people to self-determination which I may say makes it part of international law and the body of international law. The Canadian government has again, from what I hear, completely refused to state as clearly as it must the right of self-determination in East Timor. East Timor has been occupied by the Indonesian government since the late 1970s. Canada has accepted that occupation and continues to assist the Indonesians in removing that issue from the international human rights agenda.

It is a matter of deep shame to Canadians that the government has been complicitous in this matter. At least a third of the East Timor population has been massacred under the regime that has taken over their country and denied them the rights guaranteed them under the UN Charter.

I recently received in the mail correspondence from a group of parliamentarians in East Timor. A number of members of this House are participating in that. Let me indicate to the House the affirmation of the parliamentarians for East Timor, led by Lord Avery of Britain:

> Parliamentarians from East Timor affirm that the negotiations in respect of East Timor will not lead to a just settlement unless
> 1) they involve representatives of East Timorese people including those who resist the present occupation,
>
> 2) secure an end to hostilities which prevent the people of East Timor and their representatives from contributing freely to negotiations leading to self-determination,
> 3) provide internationally acceptable conditions of access to relief and development agencies and independent visitors, journalists and diplomats, and
> 4) include an act of self-determination which is free from interference and verified by international observers acceptable to the East Timorese people.
> The parliamentarians commend all international initiatives which observe these principles and call upon governments to support actively a process of negotiation conducted on such terms.

I for one would call on the government to do that. I know there are members of all parties who share in this cause. I think it is an important one that we should record in the record of Parliament as this bill proceeds toward its final approval.

Let me refer to some other areas that are of concern such as Romania and the effect of the Canadian sale to Romania of Candu reactors and the new nuclear proliferation.

We have seen this week in Ottawa the Open Skies Conference and the continued movement toward some rationality in the area of arms control and disarmament. There is an improved atmosphere under which all sides will begin to negotiate a reduction of arms and a movement toward a new concept of security. That security will not come from more arms but from less arms.

It must be clear to all Canadians that the proliferation of nuclear arms and a capacity for the military use of nuclear power is in itself a breach of international law because of the risks which that impose, not just to innocent populations but to the future of the planet.

Any government that is complicitous in the expansion and development and the potential threat of nuclear destruction to whole populations may well stand in the court of history convicted of a breach of principle of international law. We have seen from Chernobyl the terrible impact of nuclear disaster, even when nuclear power is used peacefully.

This government continues to contribute toward the development of a Candu reactor in Romania. We have seen what has happened there in terms of labour standards. This government apparently stood by quietly when forced labour was being used in the construction of the Candu site there. The House will want to consider as well a series of themes as it proceeds toward the final approval of this bill. While I urge the House to adopt the bill, I would ask members to take a moment to understand the critical role that Canada has in the development of a true body of international law.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise to very briefly express support for this bill on third reading. I spoke in the House when it was here on first reading, as did members of other parties, to explain and express the views of parties as to why it is important for Canada now, many years after the protocols to the Geneva Conventions were adopted, to ratify them. The legislation that has been reported back to the House this morning for third reading is part of the process of ratification.

I had hoped that we could get this bill through the House this morning because it is important. We heard from the official spokesman for the New Democratic Party about the importance of getting this ratification. That is why I will be brief. I simply express our party's support for this and to note that when this bill was before the legislative committee earlier this week, with all three parties present, there were no amendments and the bill was reported back very promptly.

I cannot let pass without comment the fact that in his remarks just delivered in the House, the member for Victoria spoke about moral authority in the role of international law. That is precisely what this legislation is all about. It goes a long way toward Canada's moral authority and our support for the role of international law to get on with the ratification of this bill, something that he and other spokesmen for his party have urged.

In the course of this we are hearing discussion about CANDU reactors in Romania, discussion about self-determination in East Timor and other very valid and important contemporary issues, but issues which I submit, Mr. Speaker, are not central to the legislation before the House.

I would express the sincere hope to other colleagues in this place that in the remaining seven minutes those parties represented here could express their support for this bill so that we could complete third reading this morning before Question Period at eleven o'clock. We can then get on with putting our own House in order and completing ratification through third reading.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be perhaps more in the nature of a comment than a question, although I will perhaps finish with a question. The hon. member has suggested that we should pass this legislation in a hurry so that we get it over with before the end of the morning.

If we were absolutely clear as to what was coming later, that somehow by addressing this so quickly will then free some parliamentary time for matters which are more important, perhaps I would have at least some willingness to comply with the point made by the hon. member.

In the absence of that, let me suggest that this is a particularly useful opportunity to raise the very issues that I know the hon. member has been interested in over the years and to provide an opportunity to raise in this House questions which we do not under a normal day get an opportunity to raise. One thing I have found as a member since coming here is that there are relatively few opportunities that this House provides for discussing major international issues and issues of Canada's obligations internationally and how we are exercising them. Occasionally we have an opportunity during Question Period, but many of us do not get an opportunity to get in on that. We occasionally have other opportunities, but some of us not on the external affairs committee do not have that opportunity.

Frankly, I and I know other members wish to take this opportunity to address some of the issues which are of concern to us and to our constituents. As I said before, these protocols have already been in force. I am sure the member will agree that the adoption of this bill does not delay the coming into force of the protocols or the law and that what we are engaged in here is an opportunity to raise some of these very important issues.

It is in that context that I ask the member if he would comment on the level of Canada's activity in encouraging governments, particularly those which have been involved in the issues which I raised, to comply with international law. I would be interested in hearing the member speak about the issue of East Timor, for example. It is an issue I know he is concerned about. There are also the issues of El Salvador, Panama and Romania.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, if the subject of this bill dealt with those other important issues of international law, I think this would be both the time and the place to address them. But in answering the member for Victoria, it is neither the time nor the place.

I pick up the point that he raised when he said that since coming to the House of Commons he found that there were rare opportunities to address important issues of international affairs. I remember sitting in this very seat just days ago when the Secretary of State for External Affairs wished to make a statement in the House concerning foreign policy and a change in Canadian foreign policy, about which notice had been given to the official critics for the two other parties. Unanimous consent was not provided by the House because his party refused to give it. The Secretary of State for External Affairs had to leave the House and go to a press conference to announce Canadian government policy.

So when the hon. member speaks to me about the rare opportunities to debate foreign affairs issues on the floor of the House of Commons, I think he ought to turn the mirror toward himself and examine his own conscience.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would hate to leave the record as unclear as the hon. member just stated. The matter which he raises with regard to the inability of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make a statement in the House occurred because the government House leader moved that we proceed to orders of the day, bypassing the opportunity. It was the government which cut off the right of the right hon. member to speak, not the opposition.

An hon. member: The truth comes out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary may complete his remarks.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. Since this has now got into the recent history of procedural debates and contentions in the House, this effort to stand up and clarify the record, if it is to be a sincere effort to clarify the record then I think the member who just spoke owes it to the House to say that as he described what happened came in the context and as a culmination of several days of deliberate procedural slowdown by his party in the House.

Canadians know when there are issues of substance to be dealt with and they know when procedural ploys are being developed in the House to prevent that. Today, on the third reading of this bill to ratify the Geneva Protocols, I regret to see that the same thing is happening once again.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being eleven o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the government again of a few facts about the GST which it finds difficult to accept.

The government claims that this tax will be anything but resoundingly opposed by small businessmen is not true. I have spoken to a large number of businessmen in my riding of Prince Edward—Hastings and each has offered nothing but doubts as to whether any form of common sense has been put into the drafting of this legislation.

A good example of the effects the GST will have on small business, as has been demonstrated time and time again to the government, is the cost of upgrading computer software to accommodate this tax. I have heard quotes as high as $15,000 to upgrade a small businessman's computer. How does the government expect small business to cope with that kind of expense? I plead with it to withdraw the legislation and do something positive.

CHILD HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like today to do something I am not accustomed to doing, and that is to congratulate the Prime Minister on his initiative.

The Prime Minister recently announced that Canada would join other countries in sponsoring the United Nations World Summit for Children to be held next September.

S.O. 31

As the Speaker may recall, last April, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, I urged the government to consider this sponsorship. The Prime Minister's press announcement states: "The quality of human society is in large measure reflected in the priority attached to child health, education and nourishment."

Given the recent report of the Canadian Child Health Institute showing the high levels of infant mortality among poor Canadian children and the unacceptable poor health of Canada's native children, given that 40 per cent of food bank users in Canada are children, given the government's cuts in transfer payments to the provinces for health and education, and given the lack of a national child care program, I would hope that our representatives attending this conference could take this opportunity to develop concrete solutions to our problems regarding children, so that we can meet the Prime Minister's commitment to children in Canada.

COMMONWEALTH GAMES

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay tribute to two athletes from Sept-Iles who turned in outstanding performances at the Commonwealth Games in New Zealand. Guillaume Leblanc, who won a gold medal in the 30-kilometre walk, was born and grew up in Sept-Iles. The people of Sept-Iles saw him train there for many years. Roger Côté won the bronze medal for judo in his category, a reward for the many hours of training and hard work. The men and women of Sept-Iles are proud of their success and I ask all hon. members to join me in paying them well-deserved tribute.

ACHIEVEMENTS

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, we see increasing evidence every day of the welcome and important participation of women in the public affairs of Canada, a reality which has been inadequately recognized for far too long.

In no community has this advancing role by women been so clearly demonstrated than in my own constituency of Fredericton—York—Sunbury, where at this very time three different women are leading national Canadian organizations devoted to significant public purposes.

Mrs. Doreen Kissick is President of the National Council of Women of Canada, so called the Parliament of Women, which was founded almost 100 years ago by an Act of this House in 1893. Annually, that organization presents a comprehensive submission to our government, not just on women's issues, but on a broad range of public concerns for all Canadians.

Mrs. Joan McFarland is President of the Canadian Congress for Learning Opportunities for Women, which is a national body to promote learning opportunities at all levels for women in Canada, and having networks in every province and every territory.

Mrs. Flora Dell is National Chair of the Canadian Hunger Foundation, which pursues the cause against poverty both in this country and throughout the world.

In recognizing the contribution of these three women today, I not only want to share pride that their roots spring from Fredericton and New Brunswick, but also to pay tribute and to remind this House about the broader role which they represent for women working everywhere in Canada as full and equal partners in the affairs of our nation.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): A month ago the headline in Frances Russell's Winnipeg Free Press column warned, and I quote: "Ottawa is killing medicare, quietly and deliberately."

In 1986, this government capped its financial contribution to health care at 2 percentage points below the growth in the economy, and in 1989 the government further lowered the ceiling to 3 percentage points.

With this current trend, it will not be long before this government ceases to pay a single cent for medicare.

Simultaneously, this government is continuing its assault on the education of our youth. President Claude Lajeunesse of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, warns that universities will suffer if Ottawa makes further cuts to transfer payments to any of the ten provinces or to the three national research councils which grant research funds to universities.

Health and education are vital necessities, yet the Minister of Finance has warned the provinces of further cut-backs to these twin social programs come next Tuesday. Mr. Speaker, budget day should help add on to what we have built and not destroy what we have. I urge this government to safeguard our future.

AIDS

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House to urge the Minister of Justice to end discrimination based on sexual orientation by tabling the long awaited amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act. The governments of Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and Yukon, have already recognized that discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation is not justified.

The existing federal legislation fails to ensure equal rights to same-sex couples as it does to heterosexual couples. This is clearly illustrated in medical matters, for the consultation paper, "A Working Document for the Development of the National Strategy on HIV Infection in AIDS," which was initiated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, recognizes this very point.

It argues that an effective AIDS strategy and elimination of discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation are inter-related. Persons with aids involved in same-sex relationships do not have the same legal status and as a result the same legal rights as persons in heterosexual relationships. Quite clearly, this is unacceptable in a society that adheres to a belief in tolerance of all minorities. This issue must be addressed at the earliest opportunity by amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

COLOMBIA

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, yesterday President George Bush visited Colombia for talks with Andean leaders on the drug trade. This summit represents the world's most costly photo opportunity. Although it was heartening to hear the U.S. President's brave words, they will do little in the short term to improve the condition of the majority of Andeans.

Appeals to Colombian farmers to grow alternative crops have a hollow ring when one considers the recent fall of international commodity prices. Multinational corporations encourage monocropping in the developing world, and then dictate the prices these farmers can charge, condemning Andeans to subsistence farming. With the price of coffee dropping like a stone is it any wonder that impoverished farmers are convinced to grow coca instead?

And what is the Canadian response to the drug problem in South America? This government has chosen to beef up technological transfers to assist policing in the region so that local governments can track down the drug runners. Although this cops and robbers approach to development has some validity, it does nothing to address the fundamental needs of the Andean farmers who are compelled to grow coca.

I urge the Minister of Finance to consider the complexities of this isolated development problem when he is formulating his pending budget. Further cuts to development assistance will contribute to the drug problem that affects us all.

INGLIS

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, Inglis, a company in the riding of Cambridge, announced it will begin production at the end of July of household trash compactors at the Cambridge plant for Whirlpool Corporation.

Inglis' Cambridge plant will have the exclusive North American mandate for producing trash compactors. To accommodate the new production Cambridge plant production of dishwashers will be transferred to the Findlay, Ohio plant.

No jobs will be lost as a result of this decision. In fact, Inglis expects to create an estimated 50 new jobs at the Cambridge plant. Employees involved in the new production will be trained. The Cambridge plant will be retooled for the new production over a ten-week period. During this time employees involved with the new operation will be temporarily laid off. However, to minimize the number of lay-offs Inglis will be increasing dryer production where possible. In addition Inglis will maintain employee group insurance benefits at the company expense. All employees involved will apply for UI during this period.

This new production will ensure the continued viability of Inglis' Cambridge plant.

AIRLINES

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, in the days leading up to a federal Budget no region of Canada has as much at stake as the national capital because of the importance of the federal government presence to the economic health of this region. What we do not understand is why the federal government would prevent the national capital region from diversifying its economic base by refusing to permit the establishment of non-stop air service between the national capital and the United States mid-west.

The national capital is the fourth largest metropolitan area in Canada and is unique among Canadian cities in that it lacks service to a hub in the central U.S. It lacks single airline services to most large points in the central and western U.S. There is an airline ready, willing, and able to develop a route to the mid-west, and it is the only major city for which a non-stop route to Chicago is expressly precluded by the air bilateral agreement.

To diversify, this region needs high tech and tourism. Government science policy and the GST will not help but better air services will. When is this government going to stop acting as a puppet of the airlines and start caring about the people of this region. The government talks free trade but in this case is a co-conspirator with the Canadian airlines in the suppression of competition to the detriment of the national capital region.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had an important debate in this House in which Parliament unanimously passed a motion reaffirming its commitment to support, protect and promote linguistic duality in Canada.

There was also an important debate at the Metropolitan Toronto Council at which that council, representing 2.2 million people, declared itself bilingual, in a 28 to 2 vote.

The Globe and Mail and The Toronto Star covered both these news items and gave them some prominence, but the CBC, our national broadcasting service, had nothing on the national news last night, and only a brief mention of the parliamentary debate on The Journal.

Why does the CBC give so much prominence to those minority views held by little places, with people with little minds and so little coverage to the Parliament of Canada and the largest municipality in Canada, when they say yes to Canada, and yes to bilingualism.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the CBC is intended to be a unifying force in this country, helping us to better understand each other. But The National's coverage of the language issue makes you wonder if the program staff have forgotten CBC's mandate.

When city councils in Sault Ste. Marie and Thunder Bay declared their cities English only, both The National and The Journal carried extensive, in-depth coverage. Yesterday, members of this House voted unanimously to support a resolution reaffirming our commitment to linguistic duality in Canada. It was a rare moment, a healing moment, yet The National virtually ignored it, giving this event only a brief mention in last night's news.

The CBC should not be a propagandist for any point of view, but balance is important, especially now when emotions are running high and the strains on unity are building. I hope the producers and editors at The National will take a fresh look at this issue and give at least as much coverage to unifying positive actions as it does to negative devisive ones.

MEMBER FOR CHAMBLY

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, during the recent election campaign in the riding of Chambly, the NDP candidate promised voters that he would defend Quebec, that he would defend their interests and support Meech Lake, and would do so although his party had unanimously rejected the Accord a few weeks earlier. Well, Mr. Speaker, forty-eight hours after he was elected and safely removed from his constituents to whom he referred as nationalists, the newly-elected member for Chambly conveniently forgot his promises, betrayed his constituents and did an about-face when, without the slightest hesitation, he supported his party's anti-Meech position. Mr. Speaker, this gentleman who said he was elected to defend the interests of his constituents, who said he understood Quebecers and was going to explain Quebec to the New Democrats, this gentleman now tells us he is proud that his leader understands Quebecers.

The hon. member for Chambly not only broke his word, he also changed his mind in record time. The people of Chambly believed in him. I imagine they now regret they did. The people of Chambly thought he did not have the same poor opinion of Quebecers as the rest of his party. Clearly, Mr. Speaker, the new member for Chambly has the same outlook as his socialist friends, the same forked tongue and the same bad habit of using double talk. He could at least have waited until he was sworn as a member of Parliament.

ATLANTIC FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, for several months now, the Prime Minister and his cabinet have been talking about a program to help Atlantic fishing communities. We were even given to understand that the government would find more than $1 billion to help them through these difficult times. Today, however, we know the government has no strategy, does not intend to look for additional funds and will rely solely on existing programs.

The Prime Minister did not keep his word. Once again, people in the Atlantic region are not treated the same as other Canadians. He promised to help us, he raised our expectations but it all boils down to the same old story. This is intolerable, and families in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Eastern Quebec, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Labrador won't stand for this.

SENATE REFORM

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important issues in Canada today is Senate reform. The results of the last federal election were in part a reflection of Canadians' displeasure, disappointment and disapproval of Senate obstructionism.

Canadians will not tolerate a Senate that obstructs the will of a democratically elected Parliament. Political games played by Liberal Senators have caused Canadians from sea to sea to rise up and call for Senate reform. I urge the Canadian Senate to get on with the nation's business and pass the important unemployment insurance legislation before it so that the workers of this country can get on with their business.

The Canadian government must develop a long range plan for improving our Senate. The people of Elk Island want an improved Senate, the people of Alberta want an improved Senate and the people of Canada want an improved Senate. Let's work together for a better Senate and a better Canada.

JUDICIARY

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, over the last few months we have seen startling examples to demonstrate that there is a clear lack of sensitivity toward women and children in Canadian courts. Now the Canadian Judicial Council has concluded that no investigation was warranted of the judge in British Columbia who stated that a three-year-old girl was sexually agressive. The council stressed that the judge's words were unfortunate because they were capable of misinterpretation.

This incident, coupled with comments of a Quebec judge that women, like rules, were meant to be violated, and comments of another judge in the north that sexual assault is not as serious there as it is in the south, shows that our courts must be more sensitive to women and children. It is not good enough to say that judges use poor wording. It must be clear that such wording is completely and unequivocally unacceptable. Judges, at least, must recognize that sexual aggression and three-year-olds are mutually exclusive.

Indeed, these incidents are isolated and are by no means characteristic of the judiciary as a whole. But if they continue to use such aggressive language, our courts will carry the badge of intolerance and ignorance and women will not feel that their interests are being met.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Today Statistics Canada released the latest figures on Canada's export trade. In the report it said that merchandise exports fell 4.9 per cent in December, the lowest monthly level since July, 1988. Statistics Canada said: "The Canadian dollar appreciated once again in December in relation to the U.S. dollar, thus making Canadian exports less attractive in the American market."

Why are the minister and the government persisting in their high dollar policy which is evidently so harmful to Canadian exports and the Canadian economy.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, less than 24 hours ago we had comments from the member for Gloucester and the member for Willowdale critical of the policy of the government that resulted, they said, in the fall of the Canadian dollar. You cannot have it both ways. It is the same old story we get from the Liberals; sucking and blowing.

On the question of the Canadian dollar and our export performance during the past year, I recognize that a higher Canadian dollar does have some impact on our ability to compete. We are not following a policy which is deliberately designed to increase the level of the Canadian dollar. We are following a policy which is deliberately designed to get inflation under control.

I ask the hon. member what he would be saying to me if we had followed the policies that he and his party have been endorsing of having low interest rates. Just this morning we had some confirmation that the level of inflation is too high and that we must continue to follow the high interest rate policy. If we had followed his policy of having low interest rates, we would have runaway inflation today and that, I am sure, would be something he would be critical of. Again, they are sucking and blowing.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister says he is worried about inflation. Why is he persisting in policies of high interest rates and a high dollar which directly contributes to that inflation?

[Translation]

I again ask the minister: Even if he is following a policy by accident, why is he pursuing such a policy which raises the value of the Canadian dollar and is so harmful to our export industries? Mr. Speaker, his accidental policy is worse. Instead of a well-considered policy, it is one which hurts our export industries.

• (1120)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has said: "Why are we persisting in a high interest rate policy and a high Canadian dollar, both of which contribute to inflation?" I do not know from where he is getting his advice.

A high Canadian dollar means that our imports cost less, which means tht our inflation would not be as bad with a high Canadian dollar.

High interest rates contribute to lower inflation because they reduce the amount of money that is in the system and therefore reduce the upward pressure on inflation.

Both of these things would contribute to a lower level of inflation. We have been following them. We have seen some signs in the last three or four months that inflation has been getting less, although we had a disappointment this morning.

Surely, that should be confirmation to the Leader of the Opposition that we must continue with beating our inflation problem or else we are going to get back to exactly the same problems that the Liberal party in the 1970s and the early 1980s presided over. At that time inflation got to 13 per cent; interest rates got to 20 per cent and 25 per cent; and unemployment averaged 13 per cent and ranged up to over 20 per cent in some parts of the country.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, speaking of disappointments, this government is a disappointment to Canadians. It is time to recognize that.

David Simpson, Executive Director of the Consumers Association of Canada, speaking of the recent increase in interest rates said: "The economy is on the precipice of a recession and this will dry up consumer spending which is needed to turn the economy around.

John Bulloch, President of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, commenting on the same increases said: "It's a kick in the—" and I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, I cannot use the last word because you may say it is unparliamentary. But members of Parliament can read the words of Mr. Bulloch in the daily press.

If both consumers and business are joining together to speak about the minister's interest rate policy in that way, why is he persisting? Why is he refusing to listen? Why is he continuing to do things which make this government such a disappointment for Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we continue to do these things because we believe they are the right things to do for this country.

We know that people want to have lower interest rates. We know that the exporters would like to have a lower Canadian dollar. We also know providing that might mean some very short-term benefits for the economy, which is exactly what the Liberal party did in the middle seventies when it swept the inflation problem under the carpet and said: "Nothing is wrong with the economy. Everything is going just right". Then we had the 5.5 per cent level of inflation of 1976 grow to the 13 per cent level of inflation in 1981.

That surely is a lesson that even my friend opposite should not have forgotten. It is the lesson that we are trying to remind people of today as why we must continue with this policy of getting inflation down.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, since June of this year the minister's high interest rate policies, high dollar policies have deliberately cost 77,000 Canadians their jobs.

How many more Canadians must lose their jobs, their homes, their businesses, their farms before this government comes to its senses? What is killing Canada's economy is not the disease that the minister calls inflation, it is the minister's medicine called recession.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I remind my hon. friend that 227,000 jobs were created last year. Surely, that is not the doom and gloom that he would like to have Canadians believe by the preamble to his question.

The job of government today is to deal with the problems as we see them and deal with them head on. We are doing that.

As I said yesterday to my hon. friend, I have yet to hear an alternative. It is easy to criticize. It is easier to say what we would like to see.

The point that I have to remind my hon. friend of is if he has another way of doing it, if he would like to get interest rates down, then tell me how he would do it. He is nodding his head. I presume that in the preamble to his next question he is going to tell us how he is going to get interest rates down in a meaningful and permanent way.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I think this government's resignation might be the answer.

Yesterday, when confronted in the Chamber, the Minister of Finance in talking about Canada's record current account deficit of $20 billion with other nations explained as follows. He said it is because of investment. He said: "Companies have confidence—in the policies that this government has been following".

If this is the case, why did the Conference Board of Canada's survey indicate that business confidence in this government's policies is at a record low since 1984. Was this just a typographical error, or was Mr. Karl Beigie correct yesterday when he said: "The economy's headed for the toilet"?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member say that the way we can get low interest rates is for this government to resign. That is the sort of flip answer which is going to give Canadians all sorts of confidence in the ability of the Liberal party to come up with the real answers to the problems we are facing today. Surely, my hon. friend can do better than that.

There is no way that we can get interest rates down without getting inflation down. That is a fact of life.

The only way we can get inflation down is by getting less money in the economy today. That is done that by keeping interest rates high—a simple economic fact.

That is the policy that we are following. We are going to continue to follow that policy until we can get inflation down.

My hon. friend shakes his head. He is saying this is not the way to go. He has yet to tell us which way he would go.

Is he going to get interest rates down by printing money, leading to permanent inflation, a more permanent loss of competitive position in the economy today? That may be his policy. He is nodding his head that that would be his policy—

Mr. Peterson: Lower interest rates.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He says: "Lower interest rates," and by printing money. That is the only way you get lower interest rates.

Printing money leads to permanent inflation. Permanent inflation leads to higher interest rates on an ongoing basis and a permanent loss of competitive position, a permanent loss of jobs in the economy.

That is the type of policy that the Liberals followed before. We learned from that. We are not going to follow that in this government.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, what we are seeing is the same old movie. Why does not the Minister of Finance get serious or join his buddy MacEachen in the Senate?

We now have the highest bank rate since the early 1980s. We have an inflation rate that has gone up from 5.1 per cent to 5.4 per cent.

Does the minister now admit that he is getting reckless and irresponsible with the economy? Will he admit that a major cause of inflation today is his high taxation policy and the Governor of the Bank of Canada's high interest policy? Will he admit today that that is a major cause of inflation in this country?

If he will admit that, why does he not bring down taxes? Why does he not roll down the bank rate and stop hurting the ordinary Canadians from one part of this country to the other? Why does he not do that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hear again that my hon. friend does not like high taxes. He would like to see taxes lowered.

My hon. friend has criticized us time and time again for cutting government spending. We have a difference of view here again.

If my hon. friend wants to see taxes down and a maintenance of high levels of spending, then, by definition, the deficit is going to be high. Surely, he has paid attention to the markets over the last few weeks and can understand that if we are going to see high levels of deficit, considerably higher than what we have now—which is exactly where my hon. friend's policies would lead—then we are going to see higher interest rates than we are seeing today.

• (1130)

Those are facts of life in economics today. My hon. friend can put his head in the sand and ignore those facts of life but there is no one who has any sense in this world who would agree with him.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, talk about sense and friends. Doug Peters, the chief economist with the Toronto Dominion Bank, is now saying that the likelihood of a recession is astronomical. I think he is a friend of the Minister of Finance. We also have Mr. Rutley, from the Canadian Manufacturers Association, saying today that a recession is very, very likely. Those are friends of the Minister of Finance.

Why does he not admit to the House here today that a major reason why this is happening is that the Minister of Finance's high tax policy has been inflationay, that the Governor of the Bank of Canada's high interest rate policy has been inflationary, and that those are major reasons why this country is on the brink of a recession and on the brink of an economic and monetary crisis like we have not seen since 1981?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I heard anything different from the hon. member than I have heard many times in the past.

Mr. Nystrom: Answer the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He says: "Answer the question". He wants to see interest rates down. The question that must be asked is how would my hon. friend get interest rates down. I have heard him say: "Pick up the phone, call John Crow and say, John, put interest rates down". There is only one way—

Mr. Nystrom: We told you that in June. The finance committee told you in June.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that he told me in June. He told me a year ago too, and a year and a half before that. The problem is that if we had taken the advice of the New Democratic Party and followed a low interest rate policy, the inflation number that was released this morning, which has inflation running at 5.5 per cent, would be a good deal higher because there would be more money in the economy today, more money chasing after the same number of goods. That automatically pushes up the price of products. That automatically pushes up the level of inflation. That automatically pushes up the level of interest rates that Canadians would be willing to pay.

That, Mr. Speaker, shows the disastrous depth of ineptness of the New Democratic Party in their understanding of economics today.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, the minister talked about sucking and blowing. Those were his words. We certainly heard a lot of it today from the minister. Interest rates are up, inflation is up, the deficit in terms of balance of payments is down two months in a row, the impact of the GST is pending and the free trade agreement.

You say that you are on a course of correcting the problems. The defict is higher, the debt is higher. You are a disaster as the minister and you say that everything is in order.

Some hon. members: Order!

Mr. Barrett: If that is what you call order, Mr. Minister, I want to know what the hell disorder is in this country.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me be quite clear with my hon. friend. He has said that I have said everything is in order. I have not said everything is in order. I have said quite clearly that we have a level of inflation that is too high and that we must get that down. I have made it very clear, in my previous answer, that the way the New Democratic Party would have us get the interest rate down would compound the inflation problem.

Mr. Barrett: Nonsense, absolute bloody nonsense.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend is saying that it is nonsense, absolute bloody nonsense. It is clear that my hon. friend was a social worker and a radio announcer before he got into this House, because he sure as hell was not a economist.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Quebec coalition against the GST yesterday officially launched its campaign to protest this highly regressive tax which the federal government intends to impose starting January 1, 1991.

Has the minister considered the loss of 25,000 jobs in Quebec and that unions are already asking for cost-of-living increases in their negotiations to reflect price rises due to the GST?

Will the minister take account of the coalition's demands to withdraw this tax immediately?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we listened very carefully to people over a two and a half year period on the question of the GST. We put out a White Paper. We put out a technical paper. We have put out legislation. We have listened continually.

We have also listened to people such as John Bulloch, who is on record as saying that he does not know an alternative to a value added type of tax.

We must replace the existing federal sales tax. The Liberal Party of Canada has not put up an alternative to the goods and services tax. It also is on record as saying that the existing federal sales tax must be replaced.

Until my hon. friend is able to put up an alternative, he does not have the credibility to make the statements that he has just made in this House.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, this minister does not listen to John Bulloch. John Bulloch also told him to scrap this tax and start all over again.

Why does the minister not listen to the Coalition of Quebecers Against the GST, a coalition of people from all walks of life, such as single parents, consumers, women and seniors? They are all saying: "Stop the tax!"

Why does the minister not listen and stop this tax before it is too late?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have listened. The hon. member has mentioned two groups, single parents and senior citizens.

Both of those groups will be better off after the GST has come into place. Some 84 per cent of them will receive the goods and services tax credit, and 75 per cent will have more money in their pockets after the GST is in place than they did before.

Mr. Barrett: What a pile of b.s.!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hear the howls from the other side of the House. They say they do not agree.

Mr. Barrett: You're unbelievable!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): These are not my numbers. These are numbers provided by the experts in the Department of Finance.

I have said on many occasions that if hon. members would like to dispute any of those numbers, show me where they dispute them. If not, stop misleading Canadians.

TRADE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade and concerns one of our most important export industries, auto parts manufacturing.

I have a letter here from Versatech Industries of Weston, Ontario, producers of gaskets, plastic products and sealing products for the auto industry. The letter states:

> Since August, 1989 we have been mercilessly harassed by U.S. customs at border crossings, sometimes having our truck seized and impounded.

The letter links this harassment to the introduction of the harmonized system which has clouded the issue of the free trade agreement implementation.

My question is this. When is the government going to get tough with the U.S. on border harassment, before Versatech is obliged to join other Canadian exporters and move to the U.S.?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman mentioned that the United States has adopted the harmonized tariff system and this has caused some problems as it has been implemented over the last year. I am glad that he did not repeat the mistakes that the Leader of the Opposition and other members often make. I was surprised he did not decry the free trade agreement when he brought this point up.

I am sure the hon. member realizes—he seems to have a higher intelligence level than most of his colleagues—that the auto parts and the automobile industry, of course, is dealt with under the Auto Pact and the free trade agreement has nothing to do with it. Nor does the harmonized tariff system have anything to do with it, as the harmonized system that the United States is implementing is a general system. Wherever there are problems, we are prepared to help the companies who are involved and do all we can to assist and make sure that they are worked out. But these are matters that have to be worked at in co-operation with the U.S. when we have these kinds of problems at the border, or when they have problems with us.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his compliment but I do not think any more of the free trade agreement than my colleagues.

My supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Before the election the government promised that the free trade deal would guarantee Canadian exporters secure access to the U.S. market. Why, now, are firms like Versatech facing this harassment? Will the minister admit that his government sold out the auto parts industry with his trade deal, just like it sold out the Canadian farmer and the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, just when I was starting to think that this hon. gentleman was a little more intelligent than his colleagues, he referred to the auto parts industry again, and said that the free trade agreement had something to do with it. Of course, it does not.

We have had free trade in auto parts and automobiles with the United States since the early 1960's under the Auto Pact. That has not changed. I recommend that the hon. gentleman look at the report by the Institute for Policy Analysis at the University of Toronto. A group of university research economists said that the Canadian economy is looking good in the 90's, thanks to free trade and to the GST. They forecast, "An investment boom triggered by free trade with the U.S., tax reform and energy projects will make the 1990's a good decade for the Canadian economy." They say the good news will continue.

That is from the Institute for Policy Analysis at the University of Toronto. It is not the think tank of the Leader of the Opposition. That has a hole in its flue. To continue with the report. "The good news continues for the later 1990's. Major productivity gains engendered by the free trade adjustment continue to push growth just as the investment boom fades. In effect, free trade first pushes the economy to potential, to investment demand, and then acts to boost potential to productivity improvements."

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. The toxic tire blaze in Hagersville has now been called one of the most severe environmental episodes in North America.

We talked with the control centre there this morning and they dealt with only 18 feet of the 13-acre blaze yesterday. Water bombers cannot climb because of freezing temperatures and fog, and dangerous toxins are pouring into the environment.

I want to ask the minister what urgent action he is prepared to take to put this fire out?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the government of Ontario, which is responsible for this, is taking all the measures it can to control the situation.

We all know that it is a major issue and that there are not many things that the government in Ontario can do to control the fire as of now.

This morning the Ontario government requested us to assist them in terms of analysis and sampling of smoke and toxic air related to the disaster. We have dispatched this morning a team of specialists from Environment Canada to take samplings. We are monitoring the situation through advice and expertise in terms of atmospheric information and forecasts. As of now we stand ready to give the utmost assistance to the province of Ontario.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the minister in terms of what his ministry can do. But our party believes very strongly that federal emergency preparedness should be offering all possible personnel needed for rapid, urgent action. As of this stage this morning, only 30 firefighters are fighting on each shift.

I want to ask if the government has learned from the Saint-Basile-le-Grand disaster and will take this kind of swift action to offer emergency preparedness help right now to the province of Ontario?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we are now doing everything that has been asked of us by the Govenment of Ontario.

We all know that the solution lies in major global solutions in terms of storage and destruction of tire depots all across Canada. We are concerned about this depot. There are many other ones in Canada, and we are concerned about them.

The government has funded research at a cost of $2 million to establish and develop a recycling process for tires. Three projects are presently going on. Three recycling facilities have been built. Three more are under construction. We will control the situation.

ETHIOPIA

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It relates to the threat of famine situation in Ethiopia.

As the minister is well aware, in recent weeks there has been particular concern about the threatened population that was cut off because of the internal conflict. That has been exacerbated because of the attack and the apparent dislocation of the seaport of Massawa and the cut-off of the main supply lines, particularly for the churches to fulfil the obligations that the Archbishop of Canterbury announced a couple of weeks ago.

Since the government's special representative, the Senior Vice-President of CIDA, Mr. Doug Lindores, has just returned home, can the minister indicate what special measures we can take to assure Canadians that all of their efforts to meet the famine threat again in Ethiopia will be satisfactorily met?

Second, because it now appears more than ever that conflict is the ultimate cause of this recurring famine situation, what measures would Canada take in concert with others to try to find peace where it is very much needed in the Horn of Africa?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are very concerned about the impact of conflict upon people already struck by famine. The Port of Massawa is to all intents and purposes now closed. We have diverted a ship bound for that port with food and supplies from Canada to Port Sudan where there is a better prospect of getting that cargo delivered.

The hon. member is correct in identifying the source of the problem to be the conflict. We have delivered the strongest possible requests to the governments of both Ethiopia and Sudan, and indirectly to rebel leaders, urging them to go back to negotiation.

We are working with all of the international organizations involved in delivering emergency assistance and co-ordinating it, trying to find some way to deliver help in the context of conflict.

Obviously, what has to happen is an agreement by all sides for a cease fire, an agreement to return to negotiation. We are using every means open to us to urge that course upon all parties.

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

According to the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council disparity between Atlantic Canada and the rest of the country is growing at an unprecedented rate. The Atlantic fisheries has been mismanaged into a state of utter collapse.

According to the Tourism Industry Association of Nova Scotia the new 7 per cent goods and services tax will devastate the tourism industry in Atlantic Canada.

Yet with the full knowledge that our regional economies are the last to recover from but the first to slip into a recession, this government has recklessly pursued a high interest and high dollar policy.

Will the minister now finally admit that he has lost complete control and credibility and step aside before he causes a complete collapse of the fragile Atlantic Canadian economy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the hon. member said, that people in the country today are apprehensive about what might happen in the economy. That is understandable in view of what has happened in recent years. I refer to the recession of 1981-82. There is no one calling for a recession of that order of magnitude.

There is still a balance of opinion today. Some say we may be heading for a recession, some say we are not heading for a recession, but clearly we are in a period of slow growth.

• (1150)

The reason this is necessary is to allow us to get inflation out of the economy. That inflation is affecting the economy of Atlantic Canada as it is affecting other parts of the country. I would say to my hon. friend that if we let the problem of inflation get out of control in the country it will have a more profound effect on the economies of the Atlantic provinces because they do not have the same economic strength as southwestern Ontario, for example, would have to withstand that pressure.

That is why we must deal with that. At the same time as we do that we have allowed for an increase in funding for Atlantic Canada, through the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency—

Mr. Robichaud: You are joking.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend says that we are joking. The level of funding in Atlantic Canada, I believe, is 35 per cent in this five-year period relative to the first five years of our mandate. A 35 per cent increase is an increase, even with the arithmetic that my hon. friend wants to use.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, a few more answers like that from the Minister of Finance and they will be guaranteeing that not one Conservative candidate in Atlantic Canada gets their deposit back after the next federal election.

My supplementary question is to the same minister. Yesterday the Conference Board of Canada predicted an economic stormfront for Atlantic Canada. The minister should know that his fiscal policies, coupled with this government's mismanagement of the fishery, has pushed Atlantic Canada to the brink of a full-blown recession.

What action is this minister prepared to take to ensure that his policy of high interest rates is not the final nail in the coffin of the fragile economy of Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend does not do justice to the strength of the economy in Atlantic Canada today. We acknowledge there is a serious problem with the Atlantic fishery, but there are other parts of the economy in Atlantic Canada which are not suffering as is the case with the fishery.

I made it quite clear as far back as the April, 1989 budget that we must deal with the problem of inflation. If we do not deal with the problem of inflation the people in Atlantic Canada will be more severely hurt than other parts of the economy, such as southwestern Ontario, that are stronger. That is why we must do that.

But there is an offset here in the increase in the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency funding. There is an increase of funding there that will help offset the impact of higher interest rates and that is how we are dealing with the problems as it relates to Atlantic Canada.

TRANSPORT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The Ottawa-Carleton business community has finally given up trying to reason with this government to get direct non-stop air service to Chicago. This is the nation's capital, the fourth-largest region in the country, and the only major city in Canada denied direct services to customers and markets through Chicago.

When a major carrier is ready to provide this service four times a day, when the business community needs it, why is the minister saying no?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sensitive to the request by the Ottawa-Carleton corporation but there is a problem. My hon. friend knows very well that the routes between the United States and Canada are controlled by a bilateral agreement. If we make a decision to re-open the bilateral agreement we have to consider not only Ottawa. We have requests from Edmonton and Halifax for other routes and those requests will have to be dealt with at the same time.

There is another reason, as she knows very well. The company which is interested in serving Ottawa is an American company. Normally if this company wants to re-open the agreement it should address the American government to do that, then I could defend the interests of Canadian companies.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows very well there is an easy way to solve this problem without reopening bilateral negotiations. So does the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Pearson International Airport is a mess with near misses in the air up by 64 per cent. It will not cost the government one red cent to let Ottawa travellers by-pass Pearson and also to help local businesses compete internationally to bring tourism and conventions to the nation's capital.

Why is the government protecting private airlines from competition in this new free market? Why is it putting its interest ahead of a dynamic business community and safety at Pearson?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not see the relationship between the first and second questions. I hope there is not.

First, Pearson is not a mess. Since December, 1989, there has been a cap on flights at Pearson. With 20 million passengers a year I think my colleague will understand that it is different to manage Pearson than it is any other airport in the country. Pearson is safe.

I would like my colleague to realize that for her to say it is a mess and unsafe is very dangerous in terms of the credibility of air transportation in Canada.

Second, I will repeat what I said before. To reopen the bilateral agreement with the United States is something which cannot be done only with Ottawa. I understand that the hon. member serves Ottawa. However, I have to serve Halifax and Edmonton, too. This is the way it should be done. I will not reopen the bilateral agreement just for Ottawa. I am sorry, but it cannot be done.

ATLANTIC ECONOMY

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the senior minister from Atlantic Canada, the Minister for International Trade.

My colleague and I have just got back from visiting fishing communities in Newfoundland and heard first-hand about the crisis in Atlantic Canada.

Newfoundlanders think the Prime Minister does not listen and that the government does not care. We heard over and over that Newfoundlanders think that the Prime Minister sees them as expendable.

What the Prime Minister needs is an education on the crisis in Atlantic Canada. There is no point in sending the Minister for International Trade down there because he is just led down the garden path too easily.

When is the Prime Minister going to go to Trepassey, Grand Banks and St. John's to find out for himself what is going on in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is very much involved in and concerned about the problems in the Atlantic fishery area. In due course he will be dealing with the question himself.

When he will be visiting Newfoundland will depend upon his schedule. He is visiting various parts of the country and receiving a very enthusiastic welcome wherever he goes.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: With reference to the Atlantic fishery, hon. members might be interested to know that there has been a Canada–U.S.S.R. bilateral fisheries consultation, something which takes place annually, and several agreements have been reached with the U.S.S.R. that will be helpful to Atlantic fishermen, including an agreement for them to land and sell to Canadian plants the small volume of their by-catches of cod, haddock and pollock caught incidentally in the U.S.S.R. silver hake fishery, provided that commercially viable arrangements can be made. This will provide fish plant workers with additional weeks of employment as a result.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: In addition, they have agreed to provide more cod for the Canadian fleet by transferring a portion of their southern Grand Bank cod quota in 3N0 to us that they receive from NAFO.

Some hon. members: Order!

Mr. Crosbie: You are either interested in the Atlantic fishery or you are not—obviously you are not with all of these interruptions.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): So, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is going to go to Atlantic Canada to look at the crisis when he feels like it. Atlantic Canadians want him to go there now. When he goes there he will get the same response he got when he was in Brandon.

On December 13, the Prime Minister made a commitment to put $1 billion into Atlantic Canada. He repeated that commitment on January 22.

The Prime Minister is preparing us for deep budget cuts, as is the Minister of Finance. Atlantic Canadians have seen the attack on UI, the GST and government inaction on the fishery.

When is the Prime Minister going to come clean on his commitment to Atlantic Canadians? When is he going to keep his promise? When is he going to do something about the crisis in Atlantic Canada?

• (1200)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in all of the history of Canada the NDP has never done one single thing for Atlantic Canada, not one, except to send itinerant pedlars down to have a quick look around for a photo opportunity and then to come back and pretend that they know everything about Atlantic Canada. The hon. gentleman knows nothing about Atlantic Canada.

The Prime Minister does not need to visit Atlantic Canada because I visit Atlantic Canada, my colleague visits Atlantic Canada, other ministers visit Atlantic Canada. For example, when he visited to announce the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, he announced over $1 billion worth of assistance to Atlantic Canada. This year is the historic high in the payment of regional development assistance in Atlantic Canada, $500 million.

That is the kind of thing that the Prime Minister is doing for Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will close Question Period with one question from the member for Miramichi and one question from the member for Don Valley North.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I want to ask the minister if he is prepared to guarantee to Canadians today that, having decimated VIA Rail, this government will not reduce further the mandate of passenger rail service, particularly in view of the fact that the NTA is considering rescinding Order R–38,000 which in effect would be the first step in deregulation of rail passenger service.

Will the minister give us the commitment now that there will be no further reductions in rail passenger service?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my friend knows very well that the initiative taken by the NTA has nothing to do with the Department of Transport. It is their own initiative created by the investigation they had on the prices of VIA Rail last year. They decided to go to the public to ask particular questions on the deregulation of rail.

I believe it would be appropriate to wait to hear what the public will say about those proposals and to see exactly what the NTA will do.

In the meantime, I think the role of the Minister of Transport is to wait because NTA, as my friend knows very well, is an independent body that the Minister of Transport has no authority over.

POLAND

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I understand that, along with other western governments, Canada has agreed to provide a comprehensive rescheduling for Poland in the Paris Club. Would the minister confirm the agreement to ease Poland's heavy debt burden?

Business of the House

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that today in Paris a debt rescheduling agreement was concluded between the representive of the Government of Poland and the representatives of the Paris Club of official creditors, including Canada.

While, we do not have all the details yet, I understand that the agreement reached will reschedule Polish payment obligations due during 1989–90 and the first quarter of 1991.

Under this agreement, Canada expects to reschedule 100 per cent of the payments of principal and interest due during this period totalling more than $1.2 billion. This represents approximately 10 per cent of the $12.2 billion total rescheduled by all Paris Club creditors.

In this way, Canada is making a major contribution to easing Poland's balance of payments in support of its difficult and important economic stabilization program.

Mr. Robichaud: Why don't you do the same for Atlantic Canada, Joe?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in light of the co–operation shown in the House last evening, I wonder if the Minister of Justice could indicate for us the business of the House for Monday and Tuesday. I believe that that may have changed.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in view of the quick progress that we made yesterday and the adoption of the motion of the Prime Minister, I wish to advise the House that on Monday we will continue second reading of Bill C–52. On Tuesday, we will start with resumed debate on second reading of Bill C–26, an Act respecting the Railway Act.

On Tuesday, in the afternoon, as I indicated, the House will break at 4.30 for the Minister of Finance's budget statement.

Wednesday will be day one of the budget debate, Thursday will be day two of the budget debate.

Friday's business we will set out later next week.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Beauséjour made a suggestion across the floor. I wonder if he wants to rise on a point of order and put that observation on the record of the House of Commons.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT—TABLING OF SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Marcel Danis (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the Second Report of the Special Committee on the Review of the Parliament of Canada Act.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, some time ago, the committee received from this House the mandate to examine the Parliament of Canada Act. We tabled our first report a few days ago, and the House has been pleased to extend our mandate until June 29.

I therefore welcome this opportunity today to table the second report, and with your leave, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention, for the benefit of the members of this House, the general principles that guided this report.

The Committee recommends, in this report, that the House of Commons reaffirm the following principles that apply to its members:

a) that the Board of Internal Economy is the authority which determines how the financial resources and administrative services provided by the House are to be applied and adhered to;

b) that in the performance of a member's activities and functions, a member is entitled to financial resources and administrative services provided by the House, subject to the statutory authority of the Board of Internal Economy;

c) that partisan activities are an inherent and essential part of the activities and functions of a member;

d) that a member has the constitutional rights and immunities applicable to that office and independence in the performance of the activities and functions of that office free from interference or intimidation; and

e) that a member is allowed full discretion in the direction and control of the work performed on a member's behalf by the member's employees or independent contractors and is subject only to the authority of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons in the exercise of this discretion.

BILL S-9

TABLING OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the Report of the Legislative Committee on Bill S-9, an Act to amalgamate the two corporations known, respectively, as—

[English]

—the Governing Council of the Salvation Army Canada East, and the Governing Council of the Salvation Army Canada West, and to make necessary provisions regarding the Charter of the amalgamated corporation with one amendment.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was pleased to hear the presentation of the two reports, in particular, the one from the special committee which outlines some of the principles. Having worked on that report, I think it might be wise to say to the Canadian people and to members of Parliament, they really should read those principles in the two languages that are in the report itself. I am sure the wording came as a surprise to the translator. The wording is very precise, and it was a very rough translation that we heard over the House of Commons system. In this particular area, the precision of language is extremely important. I simply wanted to bring that to the attention of the House. If you were so inclined, Mr. Speaker, it might be useful for the presenter to read those principles in the other official language of the country, English, so that we have both going across our telecommunication system. I see nods from members of both the Liberals and the NDP, so perhaps we might take a moment to do that because of their importance.

• (1210)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member kindly for his statement, which was in impeccable French, the language of Molière. Perhaps it might also be made in English.

[English]

Mr. Danis: The particular section in the report referred to by the Chief Government Whip concerning general principles states:

> The committee believes that it is important for the House of Commons to reaffirm certain general principles that have traditionally governed the activities and functions of its Members and that have been central to the deliberations and conclusions of this Committee. These are consistent with the rights and immunities acquired by parliamentarians under the Constitution and the law of parliamentary privilege, and are necessary for the proper functioning of a parliamentary system.
>
> The Committee recommends that the House of Commons reaffirm the following principles that apply to its Members:
>
> a) that the Board of Internal Economy is the authority which determines how the financial resources and administrative services provided by the House are to be applied and adhered to;
> b) that in the performance of a Member's activities and functions, a Member is entitled to financial resources and administrative services provided by the House, subject to the statutory authority of the Board of Internal Economy;
> c) that partisan activities are an inherent and essential part of the activities and functions of a Member;
> d) that a Member has the constitutional rights and immunities applicable to that office and independence in the performance of the activities and functions of that office free from interference or intimidation; and
> e) that a Member is allowed full discretion in the direction and control of the work performed on a Member's behalf by the Member's employees or independent contractors and is subject only to the authority of the Board of Internal Economy or the House of Commons in the exercise of this discretion.

CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise an item of business under the heading of "Motions" which I believe will commend itself to the House.

As hon. members may know, Mr. Jean-Marc Hamel will cease to hold office as Chief Electoral Officer on Monday, February 19, 1990.

The Canada Elections Act requires that the Chief Electoral Officer be appointed by resolution adopted by the House of Commons.

There has been consultation with the Opposition and I believe you will find unanimous agreement to the appointment of Mr. Jean-Pierre Kingsley as Chief Electoral Officer.

Therefore, I am pleased to move the following resolution:

> WHEREAS Mr. Jean-Marc Hamel will cease to hold office as Chief Electoral Officer on February 19, 1990;
> AND WHEREAS subsection 6(2) of the Canada Elections Act, Chapter E-2 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, provides that in the event of a vacancy in the office of the Chief Electoral Officer, the vacancy shall be filled by resolution of the House of Commons;
> BE IT therefore, resolved that Mr. Jean-Pierre Kingsley is hereby appointed Chief Electoral Officer effective February 19, 1990.

Mr. Speaker, if I may, I would like to break with tradition at this point and suggest that because of the importance of this particular resolution, and that Mr. Kingsley will become an officer of Parliament, the motion be seconded by the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan and the member for Kingston and the Islands in order to indicate that there is unanimous agreement and that all three parties concur in this particular motion.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to put on the record a few words regarding the new appointee, Mr. Jean-Pierre Kingsley.

[Translation]

Jean-Pierre Kingsley is a graduate of the University of Ottawa. He has held several positions in the Public Service and the private sector. From 1977 to 1981, Mr. Kingsley was President and Chief Executive Officer of the Ottawa General Hospital. From 1981 to 1984, he was Assistant Deputy Minister in the Department of State for Social Development. Later, he was Deputy Secretary of the Personnel Policy Branch at Treasury Board, until 1987.

[English]

That, Mr. Speaker, is the area where I had the pleasure of working with Mr. Kingsley, who I see in the gallery today. I want to say personally that this is a very fine public servant who will do the position of Chief Electoral Officer and the country proud.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Lewis: Canada is fortunate to have this great administrator as Chief Electoral Officer.

[English]

I also want to place on the record a word of appreciation for the retiring Chief Electoral Officer. For some 24 years, Mr. Jean–Marc Hamel has been the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada. He undertook those responsibilities on June 6, 1966, and was responsible for the administration of the act during the last seven general elections, since 1968.

Mr. Hamel has always undertaken his work with a thorough understanding of the basic requirements of the position. I am quite sure that many hon. members here who have had the opportunity to come into contact with Mr. Hamel will agree that he possessed the fairness and the impartiality that has been traditional in this office and which is greatly desired and indeed necessary in the proper administration of the functions of the office.

I am sure all members will agree that Canada has been well served by Mr. Jean–Marc Hamel during his tenure as Chief Electoral Officer.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the motion that the Minister of Justice has placed before the House is one that I am very happy to support on behalf of the members of the official opposition in this House.

I am also pleased to say that we are delighted with the appointment that the Minister of Justice has proposed.

[Translation]

Mr. Kingsley is without doubt a very distinguished Canadian public servant. His career has been remarkable and we are very proud to have him as Chief Electoral Officer of Canada.

[English]

We look forward to working closely with Mr. Kingsley in his new office. We hope that we will establish with him the normal lines of communication that are so important between the political parties of Canada and the Chief Electoral Officer.

Speaking personally as the election critic in our party, I have worked with Mr. Hamel, and I look forward to working with Mr. Kingsley in the same way.

I must also say that on behalf of the opposition that Mr. Hamel has performed an outstanding service for Canada as Chief Electoral Officer for the last 24 years. In the short time that I have been able to work with him, I have found his knowledge of his office outstanding, his knowledge of the electoral law of Canada outstanding, and his ability to work with members from all parties outstanding.

I reflect the views of all hon. members when I say that he has been an outstanding public servant and an outstanding officer of Parliament, which, of course, is what the Chief Electoral Officer is.

The unusual part about today's appointment is the fact that this position is appointed by a resolution of this House. The position of the Auditor General of Canada and this position may be the only two appointments made by resolution of the House of Commons.

The fact that we are able to agree on an appointment of this kind is an indication of the co–operation that exists between all parties, and also because of the outstanding qualities that the new office holder has which have commended him to all members of this House.

I thank you for the opportunity to second this particular motion, Mr. Speaker.

• (1220)

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I also want to say a few words, both about the new appointee, Mr. Jean–Pierre Kingsley and the outstanding Mr. Jean–Marc Hamel.

Over the last couple of days, I had the privilege of working on behalf of my leader in the consultations to reach this point today, working in a fashion that we should do more of, particularly when it comes to either by statute or by process that we consult for these kind of appointments.

Mr. Jean–Marc Hamel is an individual who has developed a great amount of respect within my party over the 24 years of his service. We have had any number of senior members of the party who have worked directly with him both during and between elections, and they all speak very highly of his approach to a very, very difficult job.

We thank him for those years of service and wish him well. We hope he appears before the Royal Commission to pass on his final thoughts as a private citizen as opposed to the Chief Electoral Officer. However, we do wish him well and I know he will find that there is life after elections, as all of us find out sooner or later.

I am pleased to second, on behalf of my party, the resolution appointing Mr. Jean-Pierre Kingsley as Chief Electoral Officer. We learned through our consultation process of his vast experience in the public sector, both in terms of government and the voluntary sector such as hospitals. In consultation with my colleague, the member for Nickel Belt, who has had occasion to sit across the table with Mr. Kingsley on matters dealing with conflict of interest, his most previous post, he indicates that Mr. Kingsley is extremely fair, straightforward and comes to the point. That is the type of individual we need in this office. It is a very delicate office. One could ask why Mr. Kingsley would even want the job, given the nature of it, but we look forward to working with him. Perhaps he may not be here for 24 years, but neither will some of us.

I congratulate Mr. Kingsley on what will almost immediately be his appointment after we pass this resolution. I and members of my party look forward to working with him in the years to come.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I will not prolong this, but I just want to endorse all the remarks that were made, especially by my House Leader, as well as those made by the spokesman for the official opposition and my friend, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Having shared with Mr. Hamel almost the 20 some years that he has held that position, and I do not want to go through all the elections we have shared together, but I just want to endorse, in a very personal way, all of the constructive comments that were made.

Jean-Marc Hamel, whom I got to know in those seven elections he held office, is the personification to me of the type of public servant this country has been blessed with. He had duality in both languages and he also shared duality in the practical problems of a politician along with the problems of interpreting the Canada Elections Act. In those few times during a campaign one had to phone the Chief Electoral Officer, whether it was Jean-Marc Hamel or someone in his office, the information came back and it really helped in those difficult times. As the deadline for the election day got closer and the tenseness thereby of the campaign got a little more heated, there was always the calmness and the commonsense of this office.

I wanted to say—and this may save me from writing a letter to Jean-Marc Hamel—these few words of encouragement for his tremendous service to the country, and for Jean-Pierre Kingsley, who I do not know as well but know about, I certainly hope that in his days as he gets initiated into this most fascinating world that he will obviously consult from time to time with Jean-Marc Hamel to see how you go about discharging such an important duty that affects us all in this land.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, like my colleague from Kingston and the Islands (Mr. Milliken), I would like to support the appointment of Jean-Pierre Kingsley. I know Mr. Kingsley; he is a dedicated, honest, down-to-earth man who is devoted to the community. I knew him on the board of directors of the Montfort Hospital in the region. I know that Jean-Pierre Kingsley will be an excellent Chief Electoral Officer for Canada.

I must also thank Jean-Marc Hamel for his work. I ran in only one federal election under Mr. Hamel and I hope to have the opportunity to run in many under the very capable direction of my friend Jean-Pierre Kingsley. Congratulations and bravo!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I am also going to break with tradition and say something as your Speaker with respect to our retiring friend who is an Officer of Parliament, Mr. Jean-Marc Hamel. Not as often as my honourable friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants, but for some time now I have gone through a number of elections under the very competent guidance and administration of Jean-Marc Hamel. I want to join my honourable friend and others in expressing on behalf of others our very, very sincere regards and thanks—

[Translation]

I thank him for his dedicated work and I appreciate the efforts he has shown in performing his duties and obligations as an officer of Parliament. Because it was sometimes very easy for us to take for granted the efforts of a person like Jean-Marc Hamel.

[English]

It is an extremely difficult task. The fact that he has been able to do it——again and again, election after election, with no problems and no complaints from members of Parliament.

[Translation]

For me, that is an example of someone who has served the House of Commons and the Parliament of Canada with total enthusiasm, loyalty and devotion.

[English]

I think that I say those words on behalf of everybody to Jean-Marc Hamel. I will take especially the remarks of my honourable friends and other honourable friends with me in a few minutes because I am very privileged to be having lunch with him. I assure you I will give him your very fondest regards and we wish him very well in the future.

I also want to say to our incoming friend, Mr. Kingsley, I met with you, Sir, a few minutes ago in my office and I said: "Why did you want to do this?" I notice that the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan asked the same question.

You are taking on a very serious responsibility, not only for us but for all those who put themselves forward to serve our country in the electoral process of our country. We want you to know that you start these serious endeavours with our best wishes. We wish to welcome you as an Officer of Parliament. As I said to my colleagues, I am going to break with tradition and ask you to stand, Sir, while we recognize you as our servant.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Welcome and good luck!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Government House Leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (1230)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I am going to revert to motions. The hon. member.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I really rose on two things. I am glad we are going to revert to motions, because I think there are some things that need to be done.

In my previous intervention on a point of order, I may have left the impression in the public domain that I was not happy with the translation. If I did so, that was accidental. It is my feeling that sometimes very technical, very precisely legal documents are read in the Chamber and I do not expect any translator, regardless of experience and skill, to be able to operate in a second language with technical precision. What I was really implying is that when we receive technical committee reports, which are always presented to the Chamber in both languages, it might be wise to automatically provide our translation booths with a copy of those technical documents, prior to their presentation in the House. Then translators in the booths can aid our listeners and members of the Chamber with very precise translations, which can only be done from written, prepared text. Maybe Table Officers could consider a way of making those texts available to those in the translation booths on a more automatic basis, and thus help us all out.

ELECTIONS, PRIVILEGES, PROCEDURES AND PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

CONCURRENCE IN TENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Tenth Report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business, tabled in the House on Monday, February 12 of this year, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move this motion?

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege, the responsibility and the honour to present petitions to the House of Commons from the residents of Hamner, Capreol, Lively, Naugton, Chelmsford, Onniping, Cartier, River Valley, Skead, Sudbury, Azilda, Val Caron, Coniston, and Levack, all in the province of Ontario, and also from Cranbrook, British Columbia and the following places in Nova Scotia, Greenfield, Bridgewater, Lunenburg, Annapolis Bay, Chester Basin, Halifax, Shelburne, Mahone Bay, Dartmouth, Blockhouse, Windsor, Liverpool, Sackville, Caledonia, Lockeport, New Germany, Bedford, Barrington, Digby, Port Mouton, Brooklyn and Dayspring, Nova Scotia. And, in New Brunswick, Chatham and Oromocto.

All of these petitioners point out that the government's proposed goods and services tax does not respect the consumers' and the taxpayers' ability to pay and that it is a regressive tax. They further point out that it is an unfair tax because there are very many wealthy Canadians and corporations who pay very little or no tax at all. They also point out in their petition that the tax is moving into areas that were not taxed before, such as haircuts, reading matter, diapers, coffins and home heating fuel. They have called upon Parliament to reject the current proposal and, secondly, that Parliament ought to undertake a study of the tax system to make it fairer. They call upon Parliament to reject with the proposal and not proceed with the goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on the cancellation of VIA Rail. Even though this Parliament has cancelled it over the objections of the members on the opposition side of the House.

These petitioners deplore the cancellation of VIA Rail in Canada. They feel the people of Canada deserve a high quality passenger rail service including modernized equipment.

These petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to reconsider and allow the reinstatement of rail traffic in Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICE TAX

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to present a second petition on the goods and services tax.

Petitioners have continued to sign petitions with regard to the possible imposition of this tax. These are from people in my riding of Nepean who are very much opposed to this imposition. Lowering the percentage rate has not appeased these constituents. They continue to oppose the tax that will increase inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment. They implore the Parliament of Canada to not impose this unfair tax.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36, to present petitions from people across the country who work full-time in the area of child care, certainly in the training area, from the University of Lethbridge and from the Association of Professional Educators.

This group of people sent me a petition that clearly states that the petitioners urge the government to honour its commitments to child care and to provide a comprehensive, quality, accessible and affordable child care program for Canada.

The fact that these people are early childhood educators and understand first hand and close up the need for that kind of child care speaks volumes. I also have a petition from farm women on child care. These are women who live in my riding of Mission—Coquitlam in the rural areas of the riding of Pitt Meadows, Abbotsford, Maple Ridge, Mission and the surrounding areas who believe and feel very strongly that for rural women to be able to play the kind of role that is needed in the farming communities and on their farms, there is a desperate need for accessibility to child care.

THE PRESERVATION OF THE CARMANAH VALLEY

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House nearly 10,000 names of petitioners on an issue of great importance to Canadians from coast to coast but of particular importance to those of us on Vancouver Island, British Columbia.

The petition relates to the Carmanah Valley and the earnest desire of the petitioners to do what must be done to preserve that valley. In particular, the petitioners ask for a full assessment of the ecological significance of the Carmanah Valley, including the merits and value of the Carmanah as a tourist attraction with extended trails to and from the west coast trail.

The petitioners ask, pending the results of that study, that the federal government enter into negotiation with the provincial government to protect and preserve the valley as an extension of the Pacific Rim National Park.

The petitioners, as I indicated, come from not only Victoria and Vancouver Island but from right across Canada. I notice a few names sneaked in here from Australia. There were a number of petitions from the United States which were not accepted but it does indicate the broad interest and concern in this issue.

I should just say in closing that the Western Canada Wilderness Committee and AWARE are to be congratulated for the effort they put into collecting these petitions and forwarding them to the House.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today from some 35 Canadians who have joined the hundreds and hundreds of thousands of Canadians who object to this government's imposition of the goods and services tax.

Like the hundreds of thousands of others, they recognize that the tax is unfair and unreasonable and call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

• (1240)

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to present this petition under Standing Order 36. The petition is against the goods and services tax.

[Translation]

—federal government's proposed consumer tax, something Canada has never seen before, as a result of which Canadians' incomes will be consumed like a candle burning at both ends: at one end will be the usual income tax, and at the other, this consumer tax, and a two-tier tax at that, Mr. Speaker at the provincial level, in many provinces, and at the federal level.

GENEVA CONVENTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) that Bill C-25, an act to amend the Geneva Convention Act, the National Defence Act and the Trade-marks Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to Bill C-25, at third reading stage, and have an opportunity to express a few views and opinions on this whole matter of the Geneva Protocols. In 1977, in Geneva, two protocols to the 1949 Geneva Conventions were achieved. Bill C–25 simply seeks to ratify the two protocols and to codify them in Canadian statute law.

In a general sense no one would object to the Geneva Protocols. However, I do have some reservations on some aspects of them. First of all I would like to talk about the general impact that such protocols have. The Geneva Conventions referred to law applicable in time of armed conflict, humanitarian law or rules of conduct in war. The protocol served to broaden the scope of the Conventions. For instance, they include additional protection for prisoners–of–war and rules regarding children in armed conflict.

In addition, the Geneva Conventions Act is amended so that its language is consistent with that of the protocols. The National Defence Act is amended so that there are no statutory limitations on the prosecution of serious breaches, again consistent with the protocols. Moreover, the amendment to the Trade Marks Act introduces legal protection for the new international distinctive sign for civil defence.

In the past, the Geneva Protocols and the Geneva Conventions were drawn up and adopted by various international governments, primarily in the western world, largely as a result of the slaughter that took place in World War I, in western and eastern Europe. It was an attempt to set forth rules and regulations and, indeed, laws of an international nature with respect to the treatment of combatants, both on the battlefield and upon being taken prisoner–of–war. Certain decent humanitarian provisions were set forth whereby prisoners of war, combatants in uniform, would be treated with decency and respect, not as a defeated mob but as soldiers, sailors, airmen, officers and other ranks. They would be treated according to a protocol that was already set forth in the various militaries prior to their going to war and prior to their being captured.

There is a certain amount of irony. This is one of the points I want to make. There is a certain amount of rather bitter irony attached to the Geneva protocols. What the protocols say is simply this: If you volunteer or if you are drafted and you go to war and you shoot and kill because you may be killed in return, you attempt to destroy your enemy, his munitions and his supply, total war, in other words, and if you are captured in doing so, coming out of a rather uncivilized, almost dehumanizing experience, and put into a prisoner of war camp, then you have to be treated in a certain civilized way. You have to be provided with clean, warm bedding, with meals that are nutritious, and to be treated in such a way that you are not tortured, hurt or harmed and you do not endure any physical or mental pain. If you are an officer, under no circumstances are you to be billeted with the other ranks. That was simply a throw–back to the class system that was prevalent in Europe in the 1920s. It was a reflection of the nineteenth century. There is a bitter irony here.

The protocols said that after you engaged in war, destruction and death, pillage and carnage and the destruction of all kinds of property of a military and non–military nature, you were to be treated with common decency. Moreover, if you were an officer, you were to be treated even better. You were to have better accommodations. You were not to be forced to do manual labour. But if you were a captured officer, you could, under orders from those who held you prisoner, order your other ranks, the privates, the corporals, the sergeants and so on, to do manual labour.

While this is extremely ironic, I am not arguing that prisoners of war should not be treated humanely. Of course they should. What I am saying is that while the protocols lay down certain rules of decency for combatants, we have no laws nor international conventions as to the treatment of innocent civilians. We bomb their homes, we bomb the factories, we flood the mines when the workers are in them. I read enough about World War II to make me as sick as anybody else. The allies who sent their bombers out day after day and night after night over Germany and other occupied countries in Europe for what they called precision bombing. When they discovered that we were no good at precision bombing and that, given the technology we had at that time, precision bombing was virtually impossible, we changed its name to saturation bombing. That way the bombardiers did not have to worry about hitting the target; a 1,000 planes instead of 100 were sent to wipe out whole sections of cities. Both sides indulged in this kind of carnage.

While we spent a lot of time in the 1920s drawing up the Geneva Protocols as to the treatment of combatants taken prisoner, we totally ignored those who suffer the most in war—the innocent, the elderly and the children. We still do. The ultimate desecration of humanity in the name of war and victory was the dropping of the atomic bomb in Hiroshima in August, 1945. We were not satisfied with the block–busters wiping out whole blocks of innocent people. We were not satisfied with saturation bombing that wiped out whole sections of cities. We had to go to total destruction with the atomic bomb at Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

As we ponder this afternoon—and we will be supporting this legislation—humanizing the behaviour of combatants with respect to children and extending this treatment to combatants involved in civil insurrections and civil wars as this bill does, we should pause and think about how we can put into force international law with respect to the treatment of the innocent during times of conflagration. We should be spending far more time in attempting to bring about the end of war itself and building up statutory law of an international nature that would prevent or act as a severe sanction against any nation state precipitating a war. That is the thrust of our thinking.

I was very pleased to be a very small part of the Open Skies Conference this week. I had a chance to spend some hours at the conference centre. I congratulate the government for sponsoring this conference. Today, men and women of good will are coming together, both east and west, in an attempt to work out differences and put in place various protocols that will build confidence and establish a lasting peaceful order in Europe. A lot more has to be done in terms of the Third World and other flash points on the globe.

This legislation should be looked upon in a broader sense but also in another sense. We and the government have come out strongly in favour of extending the protocols to revolutionary movements, civil insurrection, where groups are fighting for democracy, freedom, and so on. But by the same token we find it very difficult to become involved in, or critics of, various incidents and events that are going on around the world that are contrary to peace, stability and the furtherance of democracy and liberty. I have several in mind but one would be the whole question of El Salvador.

I know that our Secretary of State for External Affairs has a different view with respect to El Salvador than does his counterpart in Washington. I am not trying for a moment to link the government with Washington on the El Salvador issue. But I honestly do not think that our government is doing enough to drive home to President Bush that the number one reason for fighting, killing and destruction in El Salvador today is the financial aid given by the United States to the Salvadoran government. If that financial aid were withdrawn tomorrow that entire struggle would come to an end in very short order. We are not doing and saying enough. We are not publicizing the wretchedness of the Cristiani government.

President Bush looks upon President Cristiani of El Salvador as that "beacon of light and hope", I think he called him, "for democracy in Latin America". Just a few weeks ago I had the privilege of listening to a young lady by the name of Miss Ridd in my constituency on a Saturday night who described to me the horrors of the justice system in El Salvador. Anybody who is thought to be working against the interests of that awful government of Cristiani is arrested and thrown into jail. One of the most popular kinds of torture in that country is to put a gunny sack around a suspect's head; tie it at the neck but before doing so throw in a handful of lime; and then beat the person so that when they hyperventilate and breathe in the lime, it burns their lungs. It is only a matter of months before they expire after they have been released. That is the beacon of hope for democracy in Central America that Mr. Bush refers to, the ARENA administration under President Cristiani.

So, I call upon our government to be more forceful and public in its condemnation of that regime.

Another area where we have totally walked away from protocol and international law and turned a blind eye was the American invasion of Panama. With the information we have, one can only conclude that former General Noriega is involved in illicit drug traffic. Obviously, he is a thoroughly disreputable individual and he should have been captured, arrested and brought to trial, et cetera. But just because an international criminal of great infamy is at large in a country does not lend any credibility or justification to the United States—a country that purports to be a democracy—to invade that country with military force to overthrow its head of state.

We have international police forces, international law, custom, jurisprudence, rules and regulations and protocols to deal with that in a civilized way. Yet, it is little wonder that the President of the United States ordered that invasion. He had read the polls and had been told that he had a sort of wimp image and that he had to get tough. He had to present himself to the public as a Rambo and that is why it was done. Within a day or two polls were taken and some 80 per cent of the American people backed him. And this government backed him. That is what I find despicable at this moment. Without any reservation the Government of Canada stated that it was regrettable but it supported the President of the United States and his invasion of Panama.

There are other places where we are not doing enough to bring into focus and observation assaults against democracy, liberty and human rights. I refer, of course, to East Timor. Despite the UN Charter's recognition of the right of a people to self-determination, the Canadian government refuses to recognize this right in practice when it comes to the case of East Timor.

East Timor is occupied by the Indonesian government following an invasion in the late 1970s. Canada has accepted the occupation and even engaged in efforts to have the issue removed from the UN human rights agenda. That is not acceptable. If we really believe in decency and humanity in international protocols, if we really believe that we have to treat people in a humane, decent and fair manner in time of war, civil insurrection and civil war, then we have to be consistent and support human rights and civil liberties throughout the world regardless of political ideology.

I can refer also to the situation in Romania as it existed before the violent overthrow of the Causcescu regime. We have been involved in that country for a number of years with respect to the construction of a Candu reactor. Surely, there must have been some Canadians attached to that project who were aware of the wretched, inhumane working conditions by which the Romanian people had to labour. It was nothing short of slave labour camps, working on starvation diets. Our hands are not clean. If we did not know, we should have known. When we found out, as I suspect we did months before, we should have cancelled the project at that moment and dismantled what we had done rather than adding more to that wretched inhumanity to the slave labour workers by continuing to construct the CANDU reactor.

There are many other examples of human rights being denied and Canada doing very little about it. I will refer finally, and there are many others, to the West Bank and Gaza—to the Middle East. As I have said on many occasions in this House the problems of the Middle East will not be addressed and peace will not come to that tortured part of the world until the Palestinian cause is addressed and settled. I do not care what has been argued and said in the past by members of all parties, the fundamental fact remains that the Palestinian people have been denied a homeland. They have been denied that homeland for over 40 years. It is their land, their buildings, their farms, their orange groves.

It is rather interesting that the State of Israel today can say, "The reunification of Germany is up to Germans. As long as they promise to be democratic, law-abiding it is not going to be a bad thing, it is not going to hurt us." I agree with that argument. But when it comes to re-establishing a homeland for the Palestinians, when it comes to Palestinian rights, human rights and liberties, somehow Israel cannot apply the same measure of honesty and decency. With wave after wave of Soviet Jews now emigrating from the Soviet Union, no doubt for many good reasons, and going to the Middle East, going to Israel, this powder keg is going to blow up. There is no other way of putting it.

Why is the Canadian government not taking a more active role? I know the Secretary of State for External Affairs has come out as a much stronger defender of the Palestinians and the Palestinian cause than any of his predecessors. I congratulate him for his courage. But I call upon this government, that if it really truly believes in the protocols that are going to be passed into statutory law later today through third reading vote that it also adopt the same humanitarian approach to all of these other examples where human rights are being violated, whether it is in El Salvador, Panama, East Timor or as they were in Romania and as they have been for 40 years in the West Bank and Gaza.

I want conclude by simply saying, yes, we will accept this third reading. We will support Bill C-25. But I hope that this government will expand its thinking and will expand its work in the field of human rights bringing a sense of humanity to international protocols and bringing justice to down-trodden people such as the Palestinians in their valiant struggle to establish and re-establish for themselves their homeland. So we in the New Democratic Party support Bill C-25 at third reading and I suspect that it will be given that third reading in due course this afternoon.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support Bill C-25, an Act to amend the Geneva Conventions Act. I want to address my comments on this important bill. It governs the laws applicable in time of armed conflict and it serves to include the additional protections for prisoners of war and the rules regarding children in armed conflict. This is to be applauded although as my hon. colleague has pointed out that being the last decade in this century it seems somehow anachronistic that we are still making rules to govern behaviour in time of war.

There are a number of wars going on in the world currently. These protocols are expanded to the rules not only in international conflicts but to cover civil wars. When I was in Africa, in Eritrea, in 1986, during a civil war, there was no UN observation of the prisoners of war in the region in which I was travelling. Fortunately, I can report to the House that the 10,000 prisoners of war in an open camp, helped by the Eritrean Peoples Liberation Front, were being fairly treated in spite of the aerial bombardment of their former comrades in the Ethiopian air force. The Eritrean people managed to try to keep them safe in spite of the ongoing war. The extension of these conventions to include victims of civil war is an important amendment that should be applauded.

I want, in my address this afternoon, to pursue two themes regarding Bill C-25. The Canadian government supports international conventions, and this particular international convention, but there is an inconsistency here with the application to those conventions that Canada has already signed. Previous speakers have addressed a number of examples. I would just like to reiterate a few as well as add a couple.

Second, while working not only to develop rules of conduct for wartime, we should be putting additional resources into the prevention of wars. I have some suggestions on how that can proceed.

Let me turn to my first theme, namely, that there is an inconsistency of Canadian government policy with regard to the application and respect for international conventions.

As this House knows, I travelled to El Salvador last spring during that country's elections. Subsequent to that the ARENA government came to power and we have seen massive violations of human rights under the ARENA government. We have seen the bombing of the civilian population which is in absolute disregard of the UN declaration.

As we have seen on our television screens, there is the kind of mistreatment or lack of treatment accorded to FMLN fighters in the city of San Salvador, where they refused treatment to those wounded in wartime. Yet Canadian silence has encouraged the ARENA government. If there are these international protocols, why do we not speak out more forcefully when they are violated so blatantly as the ARENA government in El Salvador has done?

We cannot do more than pay lip service to these conventions. It is all very well but the signing of them means something more than a just a piece of paper. We have a responsibility to make sure that they are respected.

Then there is the issue of Panama. The Canadian government's support for the American invasion of Panama, I think, has received the kind of reaction from the Canadian media and the Canadian people that it deserved, that it was a direct contravention of the international principles of national sovereignty. This kind of excuse that the Canadian government has given that, "Oh, this was a special case, and that we have to make sure that the Americans are supported in this very special case", is absolutely utter nonsense. If there are international conventions we have to respect them and there are can be no special cases for the violation of national sovereignty. We are talking about the kind of chipping away at what the United Nations is about by that kind of support for such blatant American expansionism as I would like to term it.

There is another example of ignoring an international body's rulings—and I would like to expand on that—and that is the whole issue of asbestos. Canada has ignored international labour organizations restrictions on the sale and use of asbestos. We are selling tonnes of it to Thailand. I think this kind of contradiction of international convention is most despicable. When we sign a convention we have to live up to its terms; that is why we sign it. The tripartite agency of the United Nations had been concerned with the hazards of asbestos in the early 1970s.

Canada regarded a number of the proposed provisions of the code of practice of the United Nations dealing with this issue as serious threats to the asbestos industry.

Canada undertook a world-wide embassy by embassy diplomatic offensive in Third World and East Bloc countries. Most of these governments guaranteed that all the delegates sent to Geneva would be pro-asbestos. This is not an inconsistency; it is an outright contradiction to what Canada said they were for. Despite this concerted action to defeat the International Labour Organization's recommendation, the UN convention did pass narrowly.

In another little side bar to all of this, Canada which normally rails against South Africa's blue asbestos came to its aid saying it should not be there because it was irreplaceable. This convention on asbestos was to try to obtain substitutes. It did narrowly pass. As soon as it did, Canada being a signatory opened a disinformation campaign to try to lessen its effects. This is shameful behaviour of a supposedly responsible, well developed western nation. Canada blatantly ignored clear International Labour Organization directives and put together a sophisticated marketing package. It now fully intends to offset its dwindling sales of asbestos in western Europe and North America by turning to the underdeveloped countries of the Third World for markets.

This is the kind of outright contradiction to international conventions that is totally unacceptable. If we are signing these things we have to be able to respect them. We have to stand as an example that it is not just a piece of paper, that it has to be respected.

I point out that we are in favour of signing these conventions. The conventions on conduct are important examples and symbolic gestures during the time of war. Because it now extends it to prisoners of war in civil wars, there is a recognition that the kinds of wars which are sometimes the most brutal are those that are not international in nature but are civil. There are national liberation fronts which are also worthy of our concern to ensure that the rules of war are respected.

I am told that the Americans are having second thoughts about ratifying the protocols which we are speaking about this afternoon for that reason. They have some concern about respecting prisoners of wars of national liberation movements and giving them a recognized status. Canada's ratification of this bill this afternoon will be an important symbolic gesture that Canada sees the importance of addressing the concerns of prisoners of war of national liberation fronts.

My second theme is about the whole situation of preventing wars. We have the rules for conduct of war, but we have to give resources now to preventing wars to make them an obsolete form of conflict resolution. There is a number of ways that we can do that. First, we have to improve the resources to the United Nations. The United Nations is an international body that has always been zapped of resources and has been trying to play the peacekeeping role, the conflict resolution role and all such things with very limited resources.

We have seen the kinds of examples when it does work such as in Namibia, which gives us great hope that this is the kind of expanded role the United Nations can play.

We also know that Canada has allocated its armed forces to take place in the peacekeeping observation role in Central America. This is something that should be applauded. These are where our resources are. It is a good investment. It is an investment in peace. Not just an expansion of the United Nations role is necessary, we have to ensure a more equitable distribution of the world's resources.

As a member of the subcommittee on international debt, I am acutely aware of the kind of conflicts that result because of poverty. That is something we as Canadian citizens have to be concerned about. It does affect us. Those conflicts in El Salvador, those conflicts that I have witnessed in Africa and Eritrea, affect us because those people are at war. It is not just the horrible human costs, but it is threatening to us; international security is threatened when there are conflicts.

We have a role to play in international development assistance. I hope the finance minister is watching this afternoon and hearing this debate. When he is considering the budget that will be coming down on Tuesday, he should realize that international development assistance is something that should be increased, not diminished. When we are increasing international development assistance we are making sure that wars can be prevented, giving people an option or some hope that they can develop their own resources and their own autonomy.

In conclusion, I say again that we approve of Bill C-25. We are happy to give it approval at third reading which I understand will happen later on today.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. My hon. and gallant colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception spoke at second reading of this bill and indicated the full support of our party.

He said that it was a fantastic bill. He said that it talked about human dignity, human life, and human rights. All those things we support, and we think the bill is a good one. I will not go into detail. He gave a lengthy speech at second reading indicating the reasons for our support. I agree whole-heartedly with what he said and commend his speech for reading by hon. members. I think it was an excellent speech on Canada's external relations and on peace and war in this century generally.

We will support the bill at third reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

• (1320)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Government Orders

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR MANAGEMENT DEVELOPMENT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, December 4, 1989, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-34, an act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying back on December 4 when I started to speak on this bill, I have to judge it in the context of what I believe the role of the Public Service of Canada is and whether this is or is not supportive of that role.

I was saying that no program we mandate or fund in this House is delivered without the Public Service employees of Canada. They are our eyes and ears on the front line of service to the public, feeding back to us, if we are wise enough to listen, the changing needs of Canadians and the world we live in. The role of the Public Service and how best to support the further development of competence, excellence, creativity and commitment to the nation and to service to the public depends on how one views the role of government. There is a huge myth that if only government worked like the private sector, God would be in Heaven and all would be right with the world.

There is a very clear and different role for the two sectors. The bottom line of the private sector is profit and the bottom line of the public sector is service to people and to the future of Canada. Both have to operate efficiently and effectively but each has a different reason for existing. That means they exist and operate in different ways.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is the biggest employer in this country. There are one-quarter of a million public servants working directly for Canadians. Another quarter million work in Crown corporations and more or less independent but federally regulated government agencies.

[English]

This, in my view, gives the Parliament of Canada tremendous responsibility to ensure that government leads by example, to be on the cutting edge of new approaches to developing the most important resource any nation has the talent and the ability of its people. The people resource becomes even more important as we head toward an economy where 70 per cent of the economic activity will not be in resource development and manufacturing but in services and information. Who should know better than government the ethic of service and the importance of information to the setting of future direction.

[Translation]

The workplace faces many challenges. Technological change requires us to consider human resources in a new light and realize that young people will no longer be schooled and trained in the expectation that for the rest of their lives, they will have a relatively stable occupation. It is essential to provide for on-going renewal of workers' skills if we are to avoid constant disruption of people's personal and professional lives.

It will be extremely important to have a good idea of employees' abilities so as to maximize their development. We must get rid of our prejudices about who is the best equiped to exercise a given profession and about the value of work which, for many years, was evaluated according to the social groups that were traditionally responsible for certain tasks.

[English]

If justice and fairness and equity were not compelling enough reasons, making the best possible use of every bit of talent this nation possesses requires that old biases and barriers be stripped away. The government must ensure that minorities, women, disabled persons and aboriginal peoples are given an equal opportunity at employment and advancement in the Public Service.

The workplace of the future will require flexibility to change. Old ideas about hierarchy and top-down management, every old concept about organizations and reporting structures will need to be re-examined. The pace of change will be too fast to rely on the old models of reorganizing massive structures to respond to new needs. Working relationships will need to become more important than reporting relationships, or the structures in which they operate.

[Translation]

On big issues like the environment, the old procedure of determining who is responsible and who is liable and who must make decisions will just not work. New relationships will have to be established in a spirit of partnership between decision-makers, managers and workers. The government must show the way in this regard.

[English]

I have examined the milieu of the Public Service and I have been struck by the lack of any cohesiveness in setting policy and direction for the most important tool of government. The Public Service is responsible for advising on policy, for delivering services and for managing the fiscal and physical resources of the people of Canada. I am amazed that there is no committee of this House that routinely calls to account the Treasury Board, the Privy Council Office and the Public Service Commission for their management of a work force of 250,000 people, 10 per cent of the national expenditures.

[Translation]

It is distressing to note that the right-wing policy of contracting out, privatizing and dismantling government institutions, the means by which public policy is carried out, is being applied without any consideration of its effects on the professionalism and dedication of the Public Service, on the quality of public services, on the protection of public health and safety and on the costs of government.

[English]

People are being hurt in the process. Careers are being interrupted in mid-stream. Staffs have been downsized to the point of exhaustion, families are being devastated to the point of instability and uncertainty about their future. Whole communities are being decimated. Morale is down, people are stagnating in their careers, the Public Service is aging, its international reputation for excellence is being lost. Yet, there is no mechanism for holding the government accountable for its actions.

That is the context in which I examine the bill. Will it improve accountability for the functioning of the Public Service? Will it better prepare the Public Service to meet the challenges of the future with creativity, competence and optimism? Will it reinforce or damage the commitment of the Public Service to the future of the nation and to service to Canadians? Will the centre encourage the partnership of all employees in achieving those objectives?

[Translation]

Will it help or hinder the development of the talents of all those who work for the people of Canada? Will it help all public servants, regardless of their sex, colour, ethnic origin or handicap, give their best or prevent them from doing so? Will it better prepare the Government of Canada to show initiative and set an example of enlightened human resource management?

[English]

There is a desperate need for revitalization of the public sector for restoring pride and commitment to service to the public, and for restoring confidence that the importance of one's work is understood and valued. That has been seriously undermined in recent years. The rebuilding needs to be a joint effort, drawing on the knowledge, experience and dedication of all Public Service employees. Yet, I have serious concerns about the potential for the Centre for Management and Development to further isolate management from the shop floor, so to speak.

I have some serious concerns that the bill and the centre itself isolates management from the very sources of renewal, the people on the front lines, in the labs, out there serving the people of Canada from coast to coast.

• (1330)

The management structure of the centre ensures that only the upper echelons will have any say in how the centre functions, how management functions and ultimately how the Public Service functions. It further isolates management from accountability to Parliament and, therefore, to the people of Canada by concentrating power, control and decision-making in the Privy Council Office.

It has the potential, if it is not properly structured, to further block entrance to management by groups that have traditionally been excluded, to set up an exclusive management cadre of people who belong to the same clubs, went to the same schools, go to the same dinners and live in the same neighbourhoods. That is not what the Public Service of Canada needs. It makes no provision for linking management training with training throughout the Public Service.

The legislative committee on Bill C-34 and Parliament will have a unique opportunity to examine the results of the bill before it is passed because the centre has been operating for over a year. It will have the obligation on behalf of the people of Canada to find out why a budget of $4.5 million for executive training has jumped to an extravagant $11.5 million for this centre. It will have to take the time to find out whether this expenditure is improving the management and functioning of the Public Service of Canada or only preserving the turf of the management category.

I am happy to support this bill in principle. I think an initiative is needed. I look forward to a legislative committee where some needed amendments to the bill will be introduced to overcome some of these problems I have mentioned and to make sure the bill accomplishes its mission. This is no time for luxurious, over-funded, self-serving elitist institutions. It is time to get down to the hard work of preparing the Public Service of Canada at all levels to meet the challenges of the future with creativity, daring and innovation. It is time to win the confidence of every employee and to reinforce their ability to contribute to the building of a nation which has just begun.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is a bit of a shame that this bill has not come forward for debate a little sooner, or a little more often, or we had talked a little less often so it could have gone to committee. Then members would have a chance to scrutinize it thoroughly to see if it meets the goals and objectives many of us think it is designed to meet.

We think it is good for the country. It will enable our civil service to exercise a leadership role on behalf of young people today and on behalf of the future of the country. Good management and utilization of taxpayers' dollars and resources are very important principles. It is very important. We have a long, honourable and very positive tradition in that regard with the civil servants of this country.

A lot of people did not see the recent comments in the Auditor General's report about how the civil service in 1990 is producing better quality and more goods and services with the utilization of fewer resources. That is a trend line over the last five years.

As politicians and a new government we would like to take some credit for it. But in the final analysis, it is the people in the workplace who deserve the credit. As politicians we help set goals, give direction and objectives, but that is as far as we can go. If the spirit is willing and the skills are there, then the people who manage the resources on a daily basis are the ones who make it happen on behalf of Canadians.

It is the government's wish that we conclude debate on second reading so it can go to committee. We did spend some time earlier on committee reports that ate up a little bit of time. Therefore, with that in mind, to make sure that members who want to speak have a chance to do so but so that we finish second reading stage today and get it to committee I would move:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of second reading and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-34.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by the hon. member for Calgary West. The motion is in order and as hon. members know, after the question is put, the Speaker shall ask the members who object to rise in their places.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There not being 15 members rising, the motion is deemed to be carried.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to support Bill C-34, an Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.

[English]

The legislation establishes the Canadian Centre for Management Development as a departmental corporation focusing on the training, orientation and development of senior managers in the federal Public Service. The centre will also conduct research into issues directly related to public sector management and develop teaching materials related to its mandate.

The bill will retain the features of the previous bill, C-148, but establishes the centre as a departmental corporation rather than as a department. As a department corporation the centre will come under the direction of a board of governors composed of chief executive officers from the private sector, senior members of the Canadian academic community and deputy heads of the federal government departments.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to pay tribute to John L. Manion, the first "Principal" of the Centre.

[English]

Mr. Manion, the first principal of the Canadian Centre for Management Development served in various functions in the Public Service for the past 37 years. As a dedicated public servant he deferred his retirement to set up this centre. His dedication included his love of helping others and of training people. He served 10 years in Manpower and 15 years in Immigration to rise to the position of Deputy Minister. It is a rare occasion indeed when a deputy minister rises from within staff. In 1979 he moved to Treasury Board before moving on to the Privy Council as senior personnel advisor. It was very fitting that John Manion be appointed as the first principal of the Canadian Centre for Management Development.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to add that Mr. Manion was named an Officer of the Order of Canada in 1984 and that he received the Public Service Outstanding Achievement Award in 1986. Moreover, in 1989, the Public Administration Institute of Canada awarded him the Vanier Medal in recognition of outstanding achievements and special leadership in public administration in Canada.

I would also like to pay tribute to the person who I think first had the idea of a Canadian centre for management development, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

• (1340)

[English]

It was the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier who, in 1974, had the original idea. On October 31, 1977, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier introduced Bill C-304 in the House. He is the one who proposed this initiative.

In 1977, my colleague moved two motions in the House for discussions of this matter, one on May 6, and the other on October 31, 1977.

In 1981, he moved a new motion which was debated in the House. Finally, in 1987, he once again had a motion put on the Order Paper to establish a national school of government administration.

On behalf of my colleagues in the Liberal Party, I wish to express once again our support for this initiative to establish a Canadian Centre for Management Development, an initiative that was first brought before this House by a Liberal member, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, in 1974.

The centre replaces the former Centre for Executive Development in Tourraine operated by the Public Service Commission. The 1989–90 estimates for the operation of the centre are $9.6 million compared to $4.5 million in 1988–89. The centre is operating both at Tourraine and in the de La Salle Academy building on Sussex Drive.

Bill C–34 is a revised version of Bill C–148, and proposes that the CCMD be established as a departmental corporation with a board of governors rather than a department and an advisory council. The mandate of the centre includes the orientation, training and development of senior management in the federal public service and in the public sector, as well as in research into improved public sector administration.

Through training, orientation and development, the centre is designed to ensure that the senior public service managers improve the analytical, creative, advisory, administrative and other managerial skills and knowledge necessary to develop policy, to respond to change and manage government programs and services efficiently and effectively.

The centre will focus on attracting high–calibre candidates to the public service. It will conduct research into theory and practice of public sector management. The bill will also provide for co–operation between the centre and other institutions involved in management development and for the delivery of programs outside the public service.

The objects empowered to the centre are as follows: To encourage pride in the management of Public Service and to foster among Public Service managers a sense of purpose, values and traditions of the Public Service; > to help ensure that managers in the Public Service have the analytical, creative, advisory and administrative and other managerial skills and knowledge necessary to develop policy, respond to change and manage government programs and services efficiently and effectively;

>
> to encourage and facilitate, through its programs and studies, the attraction of persons of high calibre to the Public Service, and to support their growth and development as public sector managers committed to the service of Canada;
>
> to develop and provide training, orientation and development programs for managers in the public sector and particularly for senior managers in the Public Service;
> to study and conduct research in the theory and practice of public sector management; and
> to encourage a greater awareness in Canada of issues related to the public sector management and the process of governance and to involve a broad range of individuals and institutions in the centre's pursuit of excellence in public administration.

[Translation]

We agree with the objects of the Centre for Management Development, which includes the object to help ensure that managers in the Public Service have the analytical, creative, advisory, administrative and other managerial skills and knowledge necessary to develop policy, respond to change and manage government programs and services efficiently and effectively.

We agree with its object to attract through its programs and studies persons of high calibre to the Public Service, and to support their growth and development as public sector managers committed to the service of Canada.

We agree with its object to formulate and provide training, orientation and development program for managers in the public sector and particularly for senior managers in the Public Service.

We could not agree more that we need a centre that will develop management skills, and improve the productivity of public sector employees and the quality of services offered to Canadians.

However, a number of reservations were expressed by my colleagues from the Liberal caucus. One of my colleagues from the other place was concerned that the government would be competing directly with the universities and their public administration programs. I share his concern, but I am confident that academics on the board of directors will ensure that the centre complements courses offered by various Canadian universities but does not try to take their place. Briefly, the centre will offer a wide range of courses, seminars, conferences and development workshops for managers. To do so, it will need many case studies as well as a wealth of documentation, most of which does not exist at this time, either in the public sector or our universities.

Other colleagues were concerned about hiring procedures, powers and accountability of the board of directors, and the need to ensure the centre remains sensitive to the needs of the public service. Finally, there were concerns that the centre would become an elite club for senior executives. I must admit I share some of these concerns, since there is no mention of ways of increasing the number of Francophones at senior levels or of providing for equitable representation of women, visible minorities, aboriginal people and the disabled. However, my greatest concern would be to see a stagnating public service.

I would like to mention the Corporate Management Strategy, as presented by the Canadian Center for Management Development. On the title page we see the theme:

[English]

"Excellence in thought and and action to overcome today's problems and to meet tomorrow's challenges".

The Statement of Mission and Vision is extremely admirable:

> The mission of the Canadian Centre for Management Development is to strengthen the management capacity of the public sector, and particularly of the senior levels of the federal public service, with a view to improving the quality of government and enhancing the service to the people of Canada.
>
> This mission will be accomplished, in full co-operation with Canada's best in the public, private, and academic sectors, by extending the frontiers of knowledge in the practice of public sector management and by developing in public servants the knowledge, values, and skills critical to overcoming current and future management challenges.

[Translation]

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize that I am delighted the centre will take up residence in the historic Académie de La Salle building, located in the National Capital Region. I hope the University of Ottawa will also be involved. This location witnessed the earliest beginnings of the University of Ottawa, at the turn of the century. Several years ago, the federal government renovated the premises, and it has given us a building that makes us proud of our heritage. The architecture was well preserved throughout the renovation of a building that was originally a French Canadian institution.

The University of Ottawa was founded at the turn of the century, and I myself had the honour and the privilege of graduating from the university in the 50s, with a master's in administration, majoring in education.

[English]

I hope the centre will be open and accessible to both public and private interests, includng MPs and their staffs, to promote understanding of government. The centre will be a benefit to small government agencies and scientific establishments that previously had no place for developing and fine tuning management skills.

INCOME TAX ACT

NOTICE OF MOTION PURSUANT TO S.O. 57

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the Order of the Day is called for resuming the debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance of Bill C-52, and on any amendments proposed thereto, the government House Leader will move that the debate shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On another point of order, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

HANSARD "BLUES"

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a very important point of order. I have been advised by Hansard that they are unable to provide members who have spoken today with the traditional "blues" for correction purposes. I understand that they have a computer problem, not related to the flu that has been going around in the other offices.

I would ask Your Honour to give consideration to some temporary revision of the rules as it relates to making corrections. This is Friday. The House at some point this afternoon will adjourn for the weekend. Normally we would have had the "blues" before we left the Hill. That is obviously not possible today.

Normally when we arrive in the House on Monday we have the white copy of Hansard. In this particular case it may not be in the final form in which we usually receive it, only because members have not had the opportunity to correct the "blues". So I would ask Your Honour to give consideration to this and to indicate to the House on Monday, when you return, the process that will be used to allow members to make legitimate corrections in the Hansard record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will look into the matter and will report back to the member and the House at one o'clock on Monday when the House reconvenes.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR MANAGEMENT DEVELOPMENT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–34, an act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand here and speak on Bill C–34, an act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof.

In 1977, my esteemed colleague, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, proposed, as a Private Members' Bill, the establishment of, in his words, "a sort of College Canada for the administration echelons of the Government of Canada whereby the excellent reputation of the Canadian Public Service known throughout the world would be honed, polished and made even more ready to serve not only the federal government but all of the people of Canada".

The bill tabled, which would have established such a centre, died on the Order Paper at the end of that Parliament.

On April 15, 1988, Bill C–148 was first introduced to Parliament. The bill, which received unanimous approval by the House of Commons on August 25, 1988, proposed to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development. Unfortunately, the thirty-third Parliament was dissolved before the bill was sent back to the House for final approval. Therefore, Bill C–148, too, died on the Order Paper.

Legislation has once again been introduced in the House of Commons that would establish this centre. The bill is a revised version of Bill C–148 and proposes that the Canadian centre be established as a departmental corporation with a board of governors rather than a department with an advisory council.

This latter fact brings up an interesting point, one that came up during the space agency centre discussions. The revised proposal would have a board of governors rather than a department with an advisory council. Whenever this happens, the fundamental issue becomes whether this type of structure undermines the accountability of the centre to the government and to Parliament.

Furthermore, the responsibilities of the proposed board of governors are not clearly defined in this bill and thus raises many questions that should be thoroughly studied. For example, what kind of power will the board be given? The principal is an ex officio voting member of the board. Does this mean that the principal can, at the same time, report to and be accountable to the board of which he or she is a member?

Because there are no selection requirements, can the governors be selected without due regard to equitable representation of women, visible minorities, aboriginal people and persons with disabilities? There is no limit of renewal of appointments to the board by the Order in Council. Could this not lead to the institutions becoming more insular and self-perpetuating?

I am very pleased that the proposal for the idea that the member for Ottawa—Vanier made over 10 years ago looks as if it may actually have time to possibly work its way through the system. The establishment of such a centre would provide for the orientation, training and development of senior managements in the federal Public Service and the public sector, as well as research into improved public sector administration.

The establishment of the centre goes a long way to correcting some of the problems in the Public Service that were pointed out by the Auditor General this past October. In his report the Auditor General said that the management of Canada's Public Service needs a new and creative outlook, one not concerned with vicious slashes, but rather a better management. The future holds new challenges and the Public Service needs to adapt to these challenges.

Through training, orientation and development the centre will be designed to ensure that senior Public Service managers improve the analytical, creative, advisory, administrative and other managerial skills and knowledge ncessary to develop policy, respond to change and manage government programs and services efficiently and effectively.

If this is to work, it is essential that we study whether the goal of the centre is to adequately prepare persons throughout the Public Service for management, including meeting employment equity objectives, and reflect adequately how management affects excellence, pride and Public Service attitudes at all levels.

I found it interesting to note that nowhere in Clause 4, which is where the objects of the centre are discussed, is there any reference to promoting the equitable representation in management of women, visible minorities, native persons and persons with disabilities. Nor does the clause refer at all to the relationship of management with employees at all levels or to the responsibility of the centre and the management category to encourage pride, excellence and service to Canada and Canadians by all Public Service employees. It is this excellence, pride and service that the Auditor General was referring to in his report.

In conclusion, the discussion of this bill is long overdue and I am very pleased to be speaking on it. The creation of this centre will go a long way in helping our public servants maintain that excellence. The creation of the centre would enable the Public Service to recruit and maintain highly qualified individuals. At the same time the centre would enable the Public Service to address some of the problems outlined in the Auditor General's report.

The Public Service is an essential part of the functioning of this nation. I am proud to represent a riding where there are many, many public servants. All too often this government forgets or misunderstands just how important the Public Service is. The creation of the Canadian Centre for Management Development would allow the Public Service the support it requires in order for its efforts to be more effective in maintaining that excellence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

TEST BAN TREATY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government, as a signatory to the 1963 partial test ban treaty, should support the recent initiative made by 39 signatory countries to convene an amendment conference of all signatory countries to the treaty to convert the said treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty which would prohibit the testing of all nuclear weapons.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion before the House asks the government to support the conversion of the partial test ban treaty for nuclear weapons into a comprehensive test ban treaty and to do so at an amendment conference which is to be called late this year or early in 1991.

• (1400)

Some members of this House and some members of the public might not be familiar with this issue, so I think I should explain what the partial test ban treaty is and why it is so important.

The partial test ban treaty was signed in 1963 by President John Kennedy and Secretary Nakita Kruschev of the Soviet Union, and originally it was a treaty to deal with radioactive fallout. It was also seen as a means to stop the development of new nuclear weapons. According to the partial test ban treaty, the countries that signed the treaty pledged themselves not to test nuclear weapons in the atmosphere, under the sea, or in outer space. This meant that the only place left for the testing of nuclear weapons was under ground. Of course, since the signing of the treaty, all testing of nuclear weapons has taken place under ground.

That does not mean that testing has not taken place, as most of you know. As a matter of fact, there have been over 1,000 tests of nuclear weapons since 1963, all under ground. Unfortunately, these tests have led to the proliferation of new types of nuclear weapons.

In the 25 years or more that have passed since the treaty was signed, there have been over 1,000 under ground nuclear explosions. Through that testing, the superpowers developed the hydrogen bomb in the 1950s, which increased by ten times the power of the the original nuclear weapon. Through this kind of testing they have also reduced the size of the warheads so that one missile now can fire 14 warheads at one time. China and India have developed their nuclear weapons underground and so on.

In 1963, with the partial test ban treaty testing was abolished in the atmosphere, under water and in outer space. By leaving that particular avenue open, testing nuclear weapons underground, we have had a massive proliferation of nuclear weapons.

In this motion we are asking the government to support an amendment to the partial test ban treaty, which would make that treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty and consequently ban the testing of all nuclear weapons. This is extremely important not only for the environmental consequences of testing but also to stop the development of new nuclear weapons. It is concluded by experts throughout the world that, if you could stop the testing of nuclear weapons, you could stop the development of nuclear weapons. This becomes an extremely important step in bringing about the end of nuclear weapons.

I want to point out that when President Kennedy and Secretary Kruschev signed the partial test ban treaty in 1963, their intention was to pursue a comprehensive test ban treaty. The partial test ban treaty in 1963 was all they could agree upon at that time. But if you look at the preamble of that original treaty in 1963, it said it was a first step toward the discontinuance of all test explosions of nuclear weapons for all time. That is in the preamble of the 1963 partial test ban treaty. They foresaw that one day they would end all nuclear testing. That was the goal of all United States administrations from the Eisenhower administration in the 1950s up until the administration of President Reagan. Unfortunately, under the presidency of Mr. Reagan, negotiations toward a comprehensive test ban treaty were halted in 1982. Nevertheless this has been the ongoing goal of many governments throughout the world, churches and peace groups who have been working for years to get a comprehensive test ban treaty.

When many peace groups saw how little progress there was in moving toward the comprehensive test ban treaty contemplated in 1963, they began to look for other methods of achieving that goal. It was Parliamentarians for Global Action who, a few years ago, noticed that in the Article 2 of the partial test ban treaty there was a provision for amending that particular treaty. This organization went about to try to get enough countries which were signatories to the treaty to activate the amendment process. Their purpose was if they could get an amendment conference called under the partial test ban treaty they would then propose that certain clauses of the treaty be amended to make it into a comprehensive test ban treaty. They decided to take this route because they had been so totally frustrated over 25 years in getting a new treaty which would be called a comprehensive test ban treaty.

According to the rules set up in the partial test ban treaty, it required one-third of the signatory nations to activate the amendment process. Parliamentarians for Global Action went about the world seeking countries that would meet that standard and they did that. There were 116 signatories to the partial test ban treaty. With hard work they were able to get 39 countries to sign a request demanding an amendment conference and that was accomplished a few years ago. As a result of those 39 countries making that request, later this year we will have an amendment conference to consider transposing or converting the partial test ban treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Why is this so important? What is the state of military power and nuclear power in the world today? In 1989, the last year for which we have figures, the countries of the world spent over $1 trillion on arms of all kinds. The nuclear weapon states have accumulated approximately 60,000 nuclear weapons. Those 60,000 nuclear weapons have one million times more power than the bomb dropped on Hiroshima in 1945. There are 4 tonnes of TNT for every man, woman and child on the face of the earth—4 tonnes of TNT for every individual on the face of the earth—and are capable of destroying 800 million people in 12 hours. The more recent nuclear weapons are more accurate, faster, more concealable, and more mobile than ever before. I suppose the most dangerous of them are those that are found on the nuclear submarines because the nuclear submarines can travel the oceans of the world, always changing their positions. A single U.S. Trident submarine or a single Soviet Typhoon submarine has the power to destroy between 100 and 200 cities. A single submarine with its nuclear weapons can destroy between 100 and 200 cities. Together, the United States and the Soviet Union have 100 of these submarines.

These submarines can stay 100 miles off the coast of New England and hit almost any target in the United States. The same thing can be said for the American submarines in the Baltic Sea or in the Mediterranean. More troubling, these missiles carrying nuclear warheads can be launched by error and technical breakdown. The system is so decentralized and so operated by electronics that such errors and technical breakdowns can take place.

• (1410)

We just have to look at what happened to the Challenger spacecraft in the United States, which is not a nuclear spacecraft. Despite all the technology in the United States when this spacecraft was launched a few years ago, it exploded in air and all the Americans on that spacecraft were killed.

There was a similar occurrence in the Soviet Union with all its technology. Despite that technology there was the terrible accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant.

It is estimated that there have been 151 false alarms with respect to the launching of nuclear missiles in recent years.

We are confronted with a very serious situation, although there has been some progress in the last two years. In fact there has been some very encouraging progress since Secretary Gorbachev came to power in the Soviet Union a few years ago.

Since Mr. Gorbachev's coming to power and the more flexible response by the United States and NATO, we have had the conclusion of the intermediate nuclear forces treaty in 1987. We have had the recent treaty to ban chemical weapons. We had the Open Skies conference which was held here in Ottawa last week where agreement in principle was reached on the surveillance of NATO and Warsaw Pact countries by the aircraft of the other countries. We have the agreement for troop reductions in Europe to 195,000. We have the progress being made at the Geneva Conference and the Vienna Conference.

It is interesting to note that the Geneva talks, which have been going on since 1962, made virtually no progress whatsoever until about two years ago. Those talks went on every year since 1962. These were talks to deal with the control of strategic nuclear weapons. There was hardly any progress until Mr. Gorbachev came to power in the Soviet Union and now we see some progress.

As a matter of fact Mr. Gorbachev has proposed that all nuclear weapons be eliminated from the face of the earth by the year 2000. The United States for its part has proposed that they be cut in half as a first step in proceeding toward that goal.

The talks at Vienna are with respect to conventional armies in Europe. Again, substantial progress is being made. Those talks have been going on since 1973, although very little was done until recently.

We have had progress in the talks that I have referred to in recent years. We have had the conclusion of certain treaties, such as the intermediate nuclear forces treaty.

However, there is still a substantial amount to be done. As a matter of fact, we can be lulled into a false sense of security by what has been done already. If we look at the INF treaty, it simply provided for the destruction of 1,100 intermediate nuclear weapons out of a total of 60,000 nuclear weapons. That is simply a drop in the bucket when we consider the destructive power of those weapons.

It is extremely important to make progress because all of this is related to the further proliferation of nuclear weapons to countries which now do not have those weapons. In other words, progress on such matters as a comprehensive test ban is extremely important, if we are going to continue with the non-proliferation treaty which was started in 1970.

Let me say a word about the non-proliferation treaty. The non-proliferation treaty provides that those countries which signed it renounce the right to develop nuclear weapons. There were 124 such nations. Canada is one of them. Three of the nuclear weapon states out of five nuclear weapon states also signed the treaty.

According to the treaty those who did not have nuclear weapons pledged that they would not develop them. It is significant that from the implementation of that treaty in 1970 not one of the countries that signed the treaty that did not have weapons has proceeded to the development of nuclear weapons.

On the other hand the quid pro quo in that treaty was that the nuclear weapon states that signed the treaty—the United States, the Soviet Union and Great Britain—would pledge to reduce their stockpiled nuclear weapons, according to Article 6 of the non-proliferation treaty.

But they did not do that. As a matter of fact, the Soviet Union and the United States had 6,000 strategic nuclear weapons in 1970 and those increased to 20,000 last year. So while all the other countries that signed the nonproliferation treaty obeyed the provisions of the treaty, the nuclear weapon states did not do that. That is one reason given—although I do not accept it as being substantial enough—by countries like France and China that did not sign the treaty. They said, "Why should we sign this treaty when the United States, the Soviet Union and Britain are being hypocritical and not obeying the provisions of Article 6."

There are 15 states which are called threshold states, and they include India, Pakistan, Brazil, Argentina, Israel and South Africa, that did not sign the nonproliferation treaty and they did not sign it because they doubted the sincerity of the nuclear weapons states that signed the treaty. They had some reason for their doubt, as I pointed out. Those three states increased their stockpile of nuclear weapons from 1970 to the present time by four times.

Those 15 threshold states are developing the capability of producing nuclear weapons. The only way we are going to get them to reverse that trend and stop doing what they are doing is by proceeding and showing progress with respect to the control of nuclear weapons and the destruction of nuclear weapons by the nuclear weapon states.

It is important because the nonproliferation treaty comes to an end in 1995 and the last review conference with respect to the nonproliferation treaty will take place in August of this year in Geneva. These 15 threshold states and others will be watching to see whether they will become signatories of the nonproliferation treaty and whether that treaty will be renewed in 1990 for another period of time.

What about the Canadian government? Well the Canadian government of the day has a mixed record in this respect. It did an excellent job last week at the Open Skies Conference. It took a very strong position and progress was made. It is also a signatory to the Intermediate Nuclear Forces Treaty. All of that is good.

However, on the negative side, we see that the government is still testing the cruise missile which is outdated and completely contrary to the other negotiations which are taking place. We see that the government is about to establish a NATO base in Labrador. While the superpowers are agreeing to withdraw their troops from Europe this government is establishing a new NATO base in Labrador which is objected to by the aboriginal people of the area. And we see that the government is still clinging to the rhetoric of its White Paper of 1987 which is really a cold war type document not in tune at all with the reality of today.

In conclusion let me say that never was the time better to push ahead with treaties and procedures to eliminate and control nuclear weapons. The door is open today for agreement in many areas with respect to the destruction and control of nuclear weapons and it may not be open for too long.

I plead with the government to support this motion. I have heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs speak on this on several occasions. He says he supports a comprehensive test ban treaty but he has doubt about the method by which we are proceeding under the amendment procedures in the nonproliferation treaty.

Those of us in politics know that if you want to accomplish something, use any method available to you because if you do not, time will pass you by. Here is an opportunity this year to bring about a comprehensive test ban treaty. The Soviet Union has already said that it favours proceeding under this conference and concluding a comprehensive test ban treaty to transform the partial test ban treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty.

To many Canadians and many peace activists the conclusion of the INF treaty gave the impression that everything was going very well and they did not have to do very much anymore to press ahead with the abolition of nuclear weapons. That is not the case. I pointed out that we have only dealt with 1,100 out of 60,000 nuclear weapons. Here is an opportunity this year to have a comprehensive test ban treaty.

• (1420)

I hope that the entire House will support this motion and that the Canadian government will go to that conference and support the comprehensive test ban treaty.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member opposite for raising this issue of the greatest importance, that of nuclear disarmament.

For over 40 years the world has been faced with the potential of nuclear war, a horror which Canada has worked tirelessly to eliminate. Yet this threat remains with us still. In fact, despite the point of the member opposite that the cold war is over, I noted yesterday in The Ottawa Citizen that only one in four Canadians believe that the cold war is over.

Despite the very real improvement in east–west relations which we have witnessed over the past few years, we must not fail to recognize the continued danger, just as we must not lag in our efforts to combat it. We must continue to strive in every way possible for a free world or a world free of nuclear weapons or a world free from which the nuclear threat of holocaust has been banished forever.

As the hon. member has pointed out, and he has my full support in this regard, the realization of a comprehensive test ban treaty would constitute a major step toward realizing this goal. A comprehensive and effective ban on all nuclear testing, including the so–called peaceful nuclear explosions in all environments and for all time, would complete the work undertaken by negotiators in drafting the threshhold test ban treaty in the peaceful nuclear explosions treaty. It would effectively initiate a process of suffocation of nuclear weapons both as concerns their readiness and their development.

This is a goal of great importance to this government. In fact, in 1985 the Prime Minister listed the negotiation of the comprehensive test ban treaty, or the CTVT, as a key goal in a list of six primary arms' control and disarmament objectives.

Today, the realization of such a treaty remains a fundamental Canadian foreign policy objective.

Canada has been a supporter of the comprehensive test ban treaty ever since the concept was introduced in the 1950s, both in encouraging negotiations among the parties directly concerned and in supporting a pragmatic step–by–step approach at the multilateral level.

Canadian support for the comprehensive test ban treaty has taken a number of practical forms. Canada plays a leading role in the work of the conference on disarmament in Geneva in the development of a global seismic monitoring system which will be required to verify an eventual comprehensive test ban treaty.

Canada continues to play an active role in the United Nations General Assembly in seeking to secure broad, political support for the comprehensive test ban treaty and in support of efforts to establish an ad hoc committee on nuclear testing in the CD.

I must disagree, however, with the hon. member opposite in his suggestion that a partial test ban treaty is the appropriate vehicle for furthering our pursuit of comprehensive test ban treaties. This is clearly not the case.

The PTBT is a treaty which was negotiated at a time when the atmosphere surrounding arms control agreements was very different from that which we experience today. It was negotiated largely as a good intentions treaty without, for example, provision for the rigourous verification we would consider today so essential for a CTVT.

As well, two of the nuclear weapons states, China and France, are not even parties to the treaty.

In addition, it must be borne in mind that no amendment to the partial test ban treaty can come into effect without the approval of the original depository states, and here there is clear opposition. Canada has long recognized the futility of holding a special conference or a negotiation on a CTVT in the absence of support of the parties most directly concerned.

Meaningful arms control, including the progress on the comprehensive test ban treaty, requires that issues be approached in a forthright manner. In this case, however, proponents of the comprehensive test ban treaty are taking advantage of a legal loophole, the prescribed partial test ban treaty amendment procedure, to pursue an objective which they have been unable to achieve directly.

A partial test ban treaty amendment conference, instead of focusing on ongoing efforts where real prospects for real progress exists, runs the risk of wasting both time and resources. To some, it represents an irresponsible misuse of multilateral arms control and disarmament mechanisms. Its failure could undermine the confidence in the multilateral ACD process itself.

Indeed, the use of the terms of the partial test ban treaty to try to achieve the comprehensive test ban treaty, a procedure the original parties in the partial test ban treaty are not prepared to support and which was never the intent of the partial test ban treaty, could well lead some nations to be even more skeptical of our future multilateral ACD treaties for fear they might be similarly misused.

There is a further danger in the approach advocated by the hon. member. There are states which consider progress toward the CTBT objective to be an integral element of the non-proliferation treaty, or the NPT. Several countries have indicated their intention of linking extension of the NPT in 1995 to the successful outcome of the partial test ban treaty amending conference.

Under these conditions, the holding of a partial test ban treaty amending conference prior to the next NPT review conference would threaten to politicize consideration of the NPT related issues, including the CTBT objective. Its failure might be used as a justification by some to weaken the NPT, or even pull out. Efforts to link the extension of the NPT in 1995 to the successful conclusion of the partial test ban treaty amending conference could pose a serious threat to the continuation of international support for an effective nuclear non-proliferation regime.

Of course, I well understand the reasons why many states have been moved to call for the conversion of the partial test ban treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty. Their frustration at the modest progress achieved in recent years toward the comprehensive test ban treaty objective at the political level is one I share. However, this is not the approach needed in moving toward our goal of a comprehensive test ban. It is an approach I do not support.

It is the position of this government that nuclear disarmament efforts should focus primarily on a negotiated, balance reductions of nuclear arsenals. Progress in that direction, including the realization of a comprehensive test ban treaty, requires a step by step negotiation of concrete and realistic measures, based on a foundation of confidence and security.

Fundamental in this regard are U.S.A./Soviet bilateral negotiations on nuclear testing which have focused, as a first step, on the development of improved verification provisions for the threshold test ban treaty and the peaceful nuclear explosions treaty. We have been pleased at the recent progress achieved in this regard, and hope this will lead to early ratification of these treaties and, following their implementation, the subsequent elaboration of further limitations on testing.

Fundamental, too, are multilateral efforts in support of the realization of a comprehensive test ban at the Geneva Conference on Disarmament. Consideration of this subject in the CD for the past four years has been constrained by a disappointing failure to reach agreement on the establishment of an ad hoc committee, the major issue of contention being whether an ad hoc committee on nuclear testing should have a mandate to negotiate. However, it is here that we find the optimal multilateral vehicle for moving the process forward in the direction of a comprehensive ban on nuclear testing.

The Conference on Disarmament represents the best vehicle for long-term consideration of nuclear weapons testing. Although this issue remains stalemated in the CD, Canada will make every effort to break the current impasse over the establishment of the ad hoc committee, perhaps based on a modification of the East Block compromise proposal put forth by Czechslovakia's former representative to the CD, Ambassador Vejvoda.

In any event, we are pleased at the technical progress already achieved by the CD group of scientific experts relating to seismic verification to which Canada has contributed.

This does not of course mean that Canada will play a role in the upcoming partial test ban treaty amending conference that is in any way less than constructive. Canada was opposed to the convening of such a conference, for reasons which I have outlined here today, and which we have made clear to the superpowers in different multilateral fora. However, as this conference will take place, Canada will attend and endeavour to contribute to a realistic outcome.

Canada will not, as the hon. member has suggested, support a partial test ban treaty amendment attempting to turn the partial test ban treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty. However, a partial test ban treaty amending conference which helps clear the air regarding a comprehensive test ban, and which represents no threat to the non-proliferation treaty, could have a beneficial effect in paving the way for a mandate in the Conference on Disarmament. This is a worthwhile and realistic goal, and one which Canada will strive to realize.

In closing, we believe that the government in order to achieve genuine progress in the area of arms control and disarmament should pursue energetic initiatives that have a realistic potential to foster progress toward our goals.

Our strong and active support for negotiating an open skies regime, which has been considered at the Open Skies conference in Ottawa, demonstrates this government's energetic and determined efforts to seize the opportunities that arise for real progress.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the motion of the hon. member for Notre-dame-de-Grace for opening a debate that is very rarely heard in this House, not just the immediate subject, but the whole subject of nuclear disarmament.

His motion states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government, as a signatory to the 1963 partial test-ban treaty, should support the recent initiative made by 39 signatory countries to convene an amendment conference of all signatory countries to the treaty to convert the said treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty which would prohibit the testing of all nuclear weapons.

This move has the support of 116 countries, which is a good majority of the United Nations. Unfortunately, some of the heavyweights have not supported it. The point of such a conference as is being proposed is to bring the public opinion of the whole world, or of two-thirds of the world or more that are represented in these countries, to bear on the heavyweights that are resisting the idea of a comprehensive test-ban treaty.

It has been the dream of hundreds of millions of people around the world that we would arrive at a reasonable decision to stop the use of nuclear weapons, to decide that we will never use them and, therefore, to decide that we will never produce them, to decide that we will never research their production, and to decide as a key decision, that we will never test the production of any new nuclear weapons.

When I was a soldier in the Canadian Army at Barriefield in August of 1945, being reorganized to go to the Pacific, as we thought, we heard about the bomb dropped on Hiroshima and then the bomb dropped on Nagasaki, then, of course, we heard about the peace which was coming anyway without those bombs. They were not directed so much at Japan as they were directed at the Soviet Union. The Japanese happened to be the target, that is all.

We have heard a great deal more in the last 40 years about these bombs almost always in the context of a grim threat of World War III. We have been told by our side, the NATO side, that these bombs will protect us from World War III. The Soviet people have been told by their side that these bombs will protect them from World War III. I do not think that anybody really seriously believed either claim.

For the first five years after the United States dropped the bomb on Hiroshima, the United States had the monopoly. It was the sole country that had a nuclear weapon that it could use. Then in the early 1950's, the Soviet Union developed its nuclear weapons, then the race began so that now we have 60,000 of these. We do not know what we would do with more than about 1,000 of them because there would be nobody left to do it with.

The arms race has not only threatened the future, but it has actually killed people in the present. One researcher, Rosalie Bertelle, a Canadian scientist, estimates that one million people have already died in World War III. She is speaking of the people who have been contaminated by the radiation the radioactive substances spread into the air over the last 40 years by these tests, and spread into the Pacific Ocean where they cannot possibly be contained.

People finally mounted enough pressure that we got the partial test-ban treaty in 1963 at least to stop poisoning the air that blows all around the world and that all of us have to breath. This was to stop poisoning the air, and we thought to stop poisoning the sea, although the American tests violated the principle of that bill because their tests on the Atolls of the Southwest Pacific have contaminated the sea around them and the contamination is spreading. The British, not so much with their bomb tests, but with dumping waste from the production of bombs into the Irish Sea has also been contaminating the Irish Sea and the Atlantic.

Therefore, the idea grew that we might discourage the great expense of developing new weapons by prohibiting the testing, since there comes a point, so we are told, when it is not credibly worthwhile to go on with research unless you can test at least the preliminary result. The idea was to stop the testing, not only in the air, not only in the water, not only in space but also underground, because there also the poisons do not necessarily stay where they are originally put.

Since 1963 and before, there has been continuing proliferation. We now understand that China and India have nuclear weapons. We are not quite sure how many, or of what force. We are almost certain that Israel has 100 or so nuclear weapons. There is a strong probability that South Africa, Taiwan, Pakistan, and, maybe, Iraq either have them or are close to having them. A small country that no one though very much of in this game was Romania. Canada has provided CANDU reactor technology to Romania and even signed a secret deal to allow Romania to sell CANDU technology to Third World countries with whom, so the story goes, Canada finds it hard to deal. Now whether that means a country with which Canada has no official recognition, such as North Korea, I do not know. In letters to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I have not been able to get any further information on points like that.

A story in The Toronto Star on December 30 from Southam News suggests that one of the countries that Romania might have sold that technology to was Iran. In other words, even Canada has not taken any serious measures to restrict the proliferation of the technology for producing nuclear weapons. Yet, I think a huge majority in Canada, as in other countries, would say that a future nuclear war, a future nuclear exchange to use the more technical term, cannot benefit us because there will be no winners. It will not be a question of winning that war as we believe we won World War II and we won World War I. There will be no winners. There will only be losers and that will include us.

For these four decades it has seemed impossible to get agreement because the political difference between Moscow, Washington, London and Paris seemed so great. In the last few years that political distance has shrunk. Yesterday we had Mr. Shevarnadze speaking to a large gathering of members of the House and speaking peace and drawing a peace response from those in the House who had the opportunity to question him. We had a year and a half when, under the Gorbachev administration, the Soviet Union stopped all testing of the bombs. Now we have the possibility for moving toward a total test ban treaty, a comprehensive test ban treaty. The hon. member who spoke from the other side claims that is not the right method but so far nobody has found any better method. At least we got part way with a partial test ban treaty and there is an obligation written into that. He calls it a loophole. That is a silly word to use. It is not a loophole but an opportunity that a 116 states of the world have undertaken to use.

I believe our government should support not just the meeting of that conference, but the intent of that conference. I appeal to the government to reconsider its negative attitude on this subject and I appeal to the people of Canada to urge this government to do the same. We do have a chance to end the bomb testing.

• (1440)

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the motion the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has put forward regarding a conference to convert the partial test ban treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty.

As the Prime Minister said this week at the Open Skies Conference, the cold war is over. We all welcome the major shift and major developments that have been made possible by massive changes in attitudes in eastern Europe during the past few months.

As my colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland—Colchester has stated, Canada intends to contribute to this conference in a very constructive fashion. This House may therefore be interested in recent developments in this regard. The questions of timing and venue of the partial test ban treaty amending conference are currently being considered at a series of meetings in New York. Canada wishes to see these disagreements over administrative questions resolved in a manner that is satisfactory to all partial test ban treaty members.

Canada, despite its serious reservations over the usefulness of the amending conference, has already demonstrated its flexibility and willingness to compromise on the dates of the conference. Our preference is to hold the conference in January 1991 as proposed by the depository states. However, in a statement at the UN General Assembly our Ambassador for Disarmament, Peggy Mason, expressed Canada's willingness to support a short organizational first phase of the conference in 1990, followed by the substantial phase in 1991. This format represents a reasonable compromise and one that would appear to be gaining widespread support.

It is the government's hope that all members will demonstrate flexibility and a spirit of compromise in order to reach an early agreement on this and other administrative arrangements of the conference.

Although the amendment conference will be held in the near future, it is clear that the proposed amendment does not enjoy the support required in order to be adopted. We believe however that the conference need not be a failure. The Canadian delegation which will be headed by Ambassador Mason will work toward an outcome that will move the process forward to a comprehensive test ban treaty goal. More specifically we would hope that this meeting will give impetus to ongoing efforts at the conference on disarmament in Geneva, toward the realization of a comprehensive test ban treaty including as a first step the establishment of a mandate for an ad hoc committee on a nuclear test ban. If such a result is achieved—and we believe that it can be achieved—the amendment conference will have been a useful exercise.

Today there has been concern expressed here by members opposite about the commitment of the United States and the Soviet Union to the bilateral talks on nuclear testing. Canada strongly supports the bilateral U.S.A.—U.S.S.R. stage by stage negotiations on nuclear testing and welcomes progress on a revised verification protocol for the threshold test ban treaty that will permit the early ratification of both the threshold test ban treaty and the peaceful nuclear explosions treaty. We are encouraged by this progress and by recent U.S.A. statements confirming that a comprehensive test ban remains the long-term objective of the United States of America.

We will continue to press for an early agreement by the nuclear weapons states to move to the next stage of negotiations on nuclear testing and the ultimate goal of a comprehensive test ban treaty. We have been in touch with U.S. officials regarding recent claims that there has been a shift in U.S. policy on nuclear testing and that the U.S.A. would no longer be prepared to proceed immediately to the next phase in the negotiation of the comprehensive test ban treaty.

We have received assurances that there has been no change in U.S. policy on nuclear testing. The confusion seems to lie in a change of wording regarding when the U.S.A. would envision moving to the next step in negotiations on nuclear testing. The United States sees itself moving to this step not immediately but following ratification of the threshold test ban treaty and the peaceful nuclear explosions treaty, after a brief period of observation of the effectiveness of the verification provisions agreed upon for these treaties.

I would like to repeat that. The U.S.A. sees itself moving to the next step not immediately following the ratification of the TTBT and the PNET but after a brief period of observation of the effectiveness of the verification provisions agreed upon for these treaties.

One very important point I want to emphasize here in the House is that in a joint communiqué issued after the Moscow meeting between Secretary of State Baker and Foreign Affairs Minister Shevardnadze, the United States and the Soviet Union reaffirmed their commitment to the 1987 agreement which set the step by step process in motion.

The prospects for a successfully amending the partial test ban treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty are virtually nil. At least two of the partial test ban treaty depository states, whose votes are required for the passage of any binding amendment, have already indicated their strong opposition to the proposed amendment. In our search for a comprehensive test ban, let us focus on the ongoing efforts where real prospects for progress exist rather than concentrating our efforts and our hopes on a conference that will not achieve its stated aim.

In conclusion, there is no fast track to disarmament as much as we may wish otherwise. A negotiated step by step approach that has the support of all parties is the only way toward an effective and lasting comprehensive test ban treaty.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to deal with the motion moved by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) and calling for a comprehensive nuclear test ban which is one of the long-standing objectives of the Canadian policy in the area of arm control and disarmement. There exists already a partial test ban treaty which prohibits testing everywhere except underground. Although Canada has never possessed nor tried to possess nuclear weapons, it has actively participated in the negotiations which resulted in 1963 in the partial test ban treaty of which it remains a faithful supporter. Moreoever, Canada is involved in the continuing consultation within the disarmement conference aimed at developing a mandate for those who will be responsible eventually to negotiate a nuclear weapon ban treaty. Canada is actively seeking a treaty prohibiting the use of all nuclear weapons, for it feels that a comprehensive test ban could seriously interfere with the development of new and more sophisticated weapons.

• (1450)

A comprehensive nuclear weapon ban treaty, however, could not be achieved simply by signing it. The ability to monitor the true application of such a treaty would go a long way to help negotiations progress in that area, because no nuclear power would seriously consider renouncing its right to test and improve nuclear weapons unless it were fully convinced that the other powers respect a similar commitment. The monitoring of a possible ban on underground nuclear testing will be mostly based on seismic verification techniques which could be used and which would call for more stringent verification measures if there were any doubts as to the respect of the treaty.

Seismology studies the vibrations experienced by the earth's crust as a result of the quakes, both perceptible and imperceptible, which are felt in a great many parts of the world. When a seismic phenomenon occurs, shock waves spread through the ground. These seismic waves can be detected and analysed by apparatus up to 10,000 kilometres from the place of origin. Any earthquake produces two types of wave: body waves, which spread quickly through the earth's mantle, and surface waves, which move more slowly in the earth's crust. By comparing the readings for each group of waves and the differences between their times of arrival, seismologists can often determine very accurately where the phenomenon occurred and whether it is an earthquake or an explosion.

Mr. Speaker, advanced research is going on in the world now to determine the effectiveness of an international seismic detection system that could verify a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty. In keeping with our long-standing desire to conclude a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty, Canada is playing a major role in this research. Canada's international efforts to establish the reliability of seismic techniques for possible verification of a future comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty have been led by the Verification and Research Section of the Departments of External Affairs and International Trade and by the Geophysics Branch of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The most important international forum for discussing seismic verification techniques is the scientific experts' group established in Geneva in 1976 at the Disarmament Committee Conference. The group's mandate is to define the technical specifications of a future international seismic data exchange system, to establish the facts and to provide analysis of data exchange methods. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the scientific experts' group is not to design or develop an international system for enforcing a comprehensive nuclear (test) ban but rather to discuss the various aspects of such a system and to test its components. Canada has supported the scientific experts' group from the beginning.

Among the various initiatives taken by the scientific experts' group to date, the international seismic data exchange experiment in 1984 was the most important. The purpose of this experiment was to assess the effectiveness of the present world data exchange system when many countries simultaneously provide large amounts of data and to identify the parts of the system that need to be improved. Rapid international data exchange will be a key element of the effective enforcement of a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty, if one is ever concluded.

Furthermore, seismic stations, even the remotest ones, must be able to communicate rapidly with each other for the purpose of collecting and analyzing information.

Canada's contribution to the experiment amply demonstrated the importance of our seismic stations. In fact, among the 70 stations throughout the world that took part in this experimental exchange of information, the three Canadian stations provided about 15 per cent of all raw data collected during the experiment. Canadian scientists took an active part in the post-test analysis, the results of which show that although during the decade preceding the experiment, substantial progress had been made with computerized transfer and analysis of data, we will need even greater capacity if we are to process efficiently the tremendous amount of information that would be generated by a world seismic monitoring system.

At a workshop organized by the scientific experts group last September and hosted by the Canadian government in Yellowknife, there were discussions about the possibility of conducting a second, similar experiment which, considering the progress made in recent years, would offer more stringent testing of the international seismic data exchange system. The fact that far more detailed data, in the form of waves, will be exchanged by participating stations, is an extremely important factor for the second test. The Yellowknife seismic station, which has just been revamped at a cost of $3.5 million, is one of the most advanced stations in the world and will have a decisive role to play in this new experiment.

Mr. Speaker, the government believes that it is research and preparations as advanced as these that will help it achieve its goal, which is a comprehensive test-ban treaty.

In any case, even if the proposal to amend the partial test-ban treaty, to make it a comprehensive one, may seem attractive because of its simplicity, the present government will continue to support the efforts of the scientific experts group in which Canada plays such an active role.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, nuclear disarmament will never be truly possible unless we realize that our common security requires verification of all arms control treaties. There are no shortcuts in an enterprise as vital as this one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Because of the number of members who wish to speak on this issue, if the House will grant unanimous consent, I would like to recognize the member for Waterloo for three minutes, the member for Eglinton—Lawrence for three minutes and then we will call it three o'clock and go on with the business of the House.

Is that agreeable.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the members of the House. The member for Waterloo.

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to enter this debate, particularly as chairman of the Canadian group of Parliamentarians for Global Action who have been introducing this motion for serious discussion in Parliaments around the world. I want also to commend the executive cross-party lines who have been encouraging a discussion within the foreign policy initiatives of the Canadian government on this issue. Let me also thank the hon. member who is the international president for introducing the motion and speaking to it today.

In the two minutes that remain let me suggest to you, Sir, that this motion comes at a time when we have had an historic week in Ottawa. It could not be more appropriate to the changing times. Here we had Minister Shevardnadze before the Standing Committee of External Affairs and International Trade who said specifically that the Soviet Union supports the ending of underground testing. He reaffirmed the Soviet position in support of a total test ban.

• (1500)

Here we have a motion which encourages the Canadian government to give leadership and to find new ways of leadership. The Prime Minister has said the cold war is over, but I believe that the cold war cannot end until we have stopped the international situation where one nation seeks to move ahead of another in modernizing nuclear weapons.

Even after the superpower pledge in 1987 to gradually reduce testing schedules to zero, they have reneged on even this slowest of motions. The suggestion that somehow the comprehensive test ban which we are encouraging our government to support might be a final test does not ring true to Canadians who in recent polls have said by some two-thirds majority they want some leadership in peacemaking. They want to see defence expenditure directed to peacekeeping and peacemaking.

In thanking the member for introducing the discussion, I encourage our government and our officials to renew a determination to stop modernization and to press at the same time as we echo that concern for a comprehensive test ban.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we have new common ground. Open Skies is also an opportunity for open communication on these subjects. We are on the verge of a new day, and I trust that Canada can give renewed leadership in this area.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise on this issue and to show appreciation as well to the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace for introducing such a motion and to those speakers who have spoken on behalf of this motion. It is certainly most momentous in terms of where this country is going to set a direction for not only its foreign policy, but for a policy that is integral to the way that we see ourselves and in the way that we see Canada's role in the world.

In that context, it is a little disappointing to have had to listen to some of the members opposite address the issue in a way that suggested there was something wrong with the method that was being employed to achieve a most notable and most honourable objective, an objective I might add that this country has supported since 1963. Twenty-five years later, we are on the verge of being able to accomplish a comprehensive test ban and we see that the government is becoming intransigent in the face of an opportunity that shall not and should not be allowed to pass.

I regret that members opposite appear to be favouring a position of waiting and seeing, of waiting and abiding by the decision of the American government and not taking a look at that which is before us right now. We have an opportunity to turn a partial test ban treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty by simply indicating that we too want to show leadership and we too have learned something from the events of this last week.

I know that it is not yet three o'clock. I will resume my seat and allow the rest of the time for the calling of the vote, if that is appropriate.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR MANAGEMENT DEVELOPMENT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-34, an act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a very brief contribution to the debate taking place on this important bill.

As you have heard from the previous speakers from our side, we support this bill fully in its principle on the establishment of the Canadian Centre for Management Development. We believe that the centre is and will be a worth-while venture.

My only reason for rising and saying anything today is to put on the record my objection to the way in which the government has proceeded with the establishment of this centre. It is typical of the arrogance of the government in dealing with Parliament. I have in my hand a copy of the 1989-90 estimates for the Canadian Centre for Management Development.

This centre was established by Order in Council because the government failed to get a bill through Parliament before the last general election. Now we have the spectacle of the government introducing a bill to do what it has already done by Order in Council. It has been funding this organization for over a year. The centre has been operating. I am glad, in a way, that it is operating. Nevertheless, this is a high-handed and arrogant approach to Parliament, to establish a body by Order in Council and then march into this House with the bill and say; "Now we would like you to pass a bill to establish what we have already established".

I want to put on the record my profound objection to this procedure. The hon. member for St. John's East is wagging his finger. He should be wagging it at the Minister of Justice and the other ministers who came up with this bill. I want to state my objection for the record. If it happens again, I will make a longer and more protracted contribution, chastising the ministers for this kind of high-handed approach.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend opposite was going out to do me a favour and I did not want anything untoward to happen while he was in the lobby.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 3 p.m., this House stands adjourned until 1 p.m. Monday, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

PRIVILEGE

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday in the debate on government motion No. 2 on language rights in Canada, I was denied the opportunity to participate. Since I was not recognized, the question was put to the House. Other members missed the opportunity to debate as well. In other words, the debate collapsed.

If you look at Hansard, page 8414, you will find the following:

> The Acting Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?
> Mr. Caccia: No.
> Mr. Speaker: I am sorry but I cannot recognize the hon. member. He is not properly dressed.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the motion was subsequently carried without further debate.

My question of privilege today is the fact that I was not recognized for such debate. Might I add that my question of privilege is rooted on one basic question: Is our parliamentary institution well served when dress is more important than debate? In other words, is a tie more important than a message?

Mr. Speaker, under your leadership we have made great progress one step at a time. A balance has been struck between the individual rights of members in this Chamber and collective rights of the House so as to make this institution function and carry out the nation's business. We all appreciate that fact.

In the realm of individual rights, women in this Chamber can dress in a variety of ways according to fashion and changing trends. I am glad of that fact and support it. The question now is whether the same flexibility can be extended for men as well. In making the case for modernizing the dress code for male members, may I quote the Deputy Speaker from page 6908 of Hansard of December 14, 1989, when he said:

> I think most members are aware of the way members should dress in the House. It is stated quite clearly in Beauchesne's that the dress of members should be conservative, contemporary dress. That is the rule.

He added:

> It does happen, when we have votes, that members may come in at the last second and may not technically fit the criteria set out in Beauchesne's. It is for that reason that in the past we have allowed those members their voting privileges. However, if the time came for the member to speak in the House then the decision of the Chair could be different.

Clearly the Deputy Speaker with his ruling left the door wide open, I submit. You will also find that last Thursday, at page 8399 of Hansard, the government house leader stated that debate on government motion No. 2 would continue for several days. Because of his assurance several members of the House, myself included, were taken rather by surprise when no member in the customary round of speakers rose to continue debate following the conclusion of the first round.

• (1310)

Therefore, at the last second I had to rise in order for debate to continue. My situation was therefore comparable to the one the Deputy Speaker described last December. Might I stress, Mr. Speaker, before concluding, that the only rule of the House that refers to members appearance is Standing Order 17. It states:

> Every member desiring to speak is to rise in his or her place, uncovered, and address the Speaker.

I conformed with such rule last Thursday. While it is true Beauschene's is often quoted in the matter of member's dress, I think it is important to remember that Beauchesne is an interpretation of the rules, not the rule itself. The rules of the House are set out in the Standing Orders and I fully complied with Standing Order 17.

To bring this Chamber into the 20th century you may want to address this question today: what is more important, jacket and tie or message and debate? Would you consider therefore, Mr. Speaker, referring this matter to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure while at the same time providing us with your ruling for our guidance until the committee has reported?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a matter which has been raised in this chamber a number of times before. The hon. member is an experienced member and he puts the point with a certain eloquence.

I am of course concerned that the complaint that is brought in front of us is that, because of his dress, the hon. member was not able to enter into a debate which was at that moment about to collapse. It may well be that hon. members will want to change our present practices but I must be cognizant of what they are. In view of the circumstances, I will reserve my ruling and report back to the House and to the hon. member as soon as it is appropriate. I thank the hon. member.

FEDERAL PENITENTIARIES

LITERACY PROGRAMS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of expanding literacy programs in federal penitentiaries.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to ask the House to endorse the motion I placed on the Order Paper calling on the government to consider the advisability of expanding literacy programs in federal penitentiaries.

This of course is International Literacy Year and I am rising to ask the House to address itself to a particular aspect of the problem of illiteracy in Canada, the quality of our programs in Canada's federal prisons.

We in Parliament have a special responsibility for the level of programming in Canadian prisons. We have no excuses in this House if the job is not properly done. We cannot blame the provinces, school boards, colleges, universities, municipal governments or the general community. We have only ourselves to hold responsible for the fact that our programs are not adequate.

It is important at the outset of Literacy Year that we in this House call on the Correctional Service of Canada, the Solicitor General and the government to address this and that we in this House focus our attention on this particularly sensitive and difficult problem.

Let me say at the outset that I acknowledge the Correctional Service of Canada is working at the problem. It has had in place for some time a literacy initiative program. The issue is whether the program is satisfactory and sufficient to deal with the problem. I hope that members of the government will rise today and tell us in detail and in specific terms that that is exactly what is happening. The information I have indicates that the programs are lacking, and this is expressed in statistics and in human suffering. A survey in 1989 demonstrated that 65 per cent of our prison population is functionally illiterate. This means that 65 per cent of the people in our prisons cannot read simple instructions on a cough syrup bottle, cannot fill out simple forms, cannot understand sections of the Charter of Rights, or pick out correct numbers from a list or page of numbers. In the general population, there are in the area of 22 per cent to 24 per cent who are functionally illiterate. That in itself is a scandal in this country, but 65 per cent of our prison population is currently illiterate and we must do something about it.

The federal government program presently in place is called the Adult Basic Education Program. This program is, to the extent that it is in place, attempting to come to grips with the problem. I want to pay particular tribute to the previous Solicitor General, Mr. Kelleher, who actually convened a national conference in 1987 on offender literacy. Unfortunately, the current administration appears not to be following up on the concern and initiative shown by the previous Solicitor General. I may add that even that Solicitor General neglected to invite those most directly concerned with the program, the prisoners and ex-prisoners.

In 1989, a special study funded by the Secretary of State was undertaken by the John Howard Society. The researcher involved with the society was Kimberley Pate and her report was filed in August, 1989. This report reviews thoroughly the adequacy of the literacy programs in our prisons and I rely heavily on that for the comments and criticisms that I have.

In addition, as critic for the Solicitor General for the New Democratic Party, I have received probably a thousand letters from prisoners in our institutions. The recurring theme in these letters is the inadequacy of the programs in prisons. I hope this debate will focus some attention on the problem and perhaps start some action on it.

The first problem is that the program is compulsory. Prisoners are forced to take it if, after a test, they are demonstrated to be "functionally illiterate". The compulsory element of the Correctional Service of Canada program was trashed by the conference in 1987, yet it continues to this day. The element of compulsion flies in the face of every pedagogical understanding currently at hand. It simply does not and cannot work. The John Howard Society report of 1989 confirms that.

Let me refer the House to some of the comments made by inmates who were interviewed in that study. One said:

> It is really stupid, you know. They (the CSC policy developers and program ministers) cannot really believe the old saying about how you can take a horse to water and it will finally drink once it gets thirsty. Forcing people who are already embarrassed and have been taught to keep all your weaknesses hidden in places like this, in jail, to then sit in the beginning classes where everyone can see you are dummy—man, that is just plain stupid. The only reason most of us say we want to learn stuff is to play the game and get out. We waste everyone else's time, for them who really want to learn. Know what I mean? Maybe if they stop forcing the issue we might really go on our own.

The second problem is that in developing the program there was no consultation with the users of the program. It is hard to imagine, but it is true. There was no discussion with prisoners or inmates about the nature of the program. There is no ongoing effort to evaluate with them what kind of program should be undertaken.

Third, the program resources have been stolen from other educational programs, contrary to the clear commitment of the Solicitor General at the time the program was instituted. Instead of taking the program from research, travel, consultants, where they said they would, they have taken it from the other educational programs in the institutions.

That reduces those programs to a new level of inadequacy and removes the incentive for proceeding into the higher levels that really count in the final analysis, getting a job once the inmates are out.

Another problem is that the testing on this program is completely inadequate. The test program was developed over 20 years ago in California. It is denounced in every review of the literacy program, and as I understand it, the Correctional Service of Canada has already conceded that the testing program is inadequate. I want to hear today that there in fact has been a change.

Although it is an unwritten rule, there are targets or quotas established for the institutions in order that the Correctional Service of Canada can look good when asked questions in Parliament about this program. There are a number of problems with those targets. First, they are easy to manipulate. Even more important and more significant is that the targets encourage the staff to work with the students who are up to a grade 6 to grade 8 level. That means they are ignoring the students at the lower levels, the students who most require the kind of help that an effective literacy program can be.

Let me refer again to the Pate study, page 16:

> If this is indeed the case then the ironic result of the CSC ABE initiative may be that proportionately less time may now be being devoted to working with this group than was the case prior to Kelleher's program announcement in 1987.

The tutoring, according to the study, is inadequate and is not trusted by the participants.

The program is simply not reaching the targeted prison population. At least half of the prison population who need the program are not taking any program at all, notwithstanding the compulsory nature.

Finally, there is no follow-up. Once the prisoners leave prison no facility is provided through the Correctional Service program in which they can maintain, increase and improve any progress they have made while they were on the inside.

This is a program that is improperly and inadequately funded, has not been thought through, that is developed without consultation with the people who are taking the program. The tutoring and teaching is below standard. There is no follow-up, and the very foundation of the program undercuts its effectiveness. This is taking place in a section of our population where the pay-offs for an effective literacy program would be most significant.

What do we do about it, Mr. Speaker?

First, there is client involvement. Obviously there has to be some thorough discussion with inmates in developing the program.

Second, we have to end the mandatory requirement.

Third, there should be the provision of financial incentives to take the program.

Fourth, community and volunteer teaching needs to be written into the program so that there is seen within the institution to be some level of independence by the teachers. As well, it can form part of a program of increasing the ability to relate to those who are on the outside and in the general community.

Fifth, we have to improve the peer tutoring that has apparently shown some positive signs. It has also shown some negatives. Those negatives need to be addressed.

Sixth, there has to be an improved information network across Canada to know what is working and what is not working.

Seventh, and perhaps most important, there must be an integration of the literacy programs with other life skills programs in our prisons. It has to be part of a package that will assist those who need the benefits that a good literacy program can bring. It has been said that literacy has a certain political attractiveness. It is easy for a minister to institute such a program in that area.

We need to focus on genuine life skills and the literacy program needs to be seen as part of that. That may also help to undercut some of the stereotypes within the prison that seem to be undercutting the program.

Eight, there must be some effective follow-up with some programs designed for that purpose.

With those remarks, Mr. Speaker, I ask the House to give positive consideration to this motion. I appreciate that under the practice of this House, it is not likely today to come to a vote, but I hope it will have the support of members. I hope the Correctional Service of Canada is listening and that the Solicitor General will give his undertaking to this House that there will be in this literacy year some very specific personal attention from him to this important program in Canada's prisons.

Let me conclude by putting this in the larger context, and if I may be permitted a mild partisan note, to put on record the position of the New Democratic Party at its most recent convention in Winnipeg on the issue of literacy. At that convention the New Democratic Party adopted the following resolution:

> That the New Democratic Party supports the development and implementation of policies to ensure every adult full access to and participation in adult literacy programs which would be developed in co-operation with the provinces, the literacy community and the trade union movement. Such policies would:
> 1. include all the necessary types of funding mechanisms at levels adequate to allow adults to exercise their right to participate in free adult basic education;
> 2. assume the involvement of large numbers of literacy workers in recognition of the fact that the volunteer sector cannot meet all the needs of illiterate adults;
> 3. recognize the need for a range of programming options including community-based programs and on-the-job programs sponsored by trade unions which respond to the needs of individuals and groups;
> 4. assume the provision of adequate facilities, relevant learning materials and related services such as child care, transportation and counselling;
> 5. be part of a larger policy initiative to attack the economic and social conditions which contribute to the continued existence of adult illiteracy;
>
> 6. direct funding to Indian and Northern Affairs to improve basic education on reserves and ensure access to a grade 12 education on reserves; and
> 7. expand literacy programs in federal penitentiaries.

I commend this program and the resolution to the House and I ask for your support.

• (1330)

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is to consider expanding literacy programs in federal penitentiaries. The federal government and Correctional Service Canada support this motion, as do I. The federal government and the CSC have already taken measures required to deal with the problems posed by illiteracy among inmates in federal penitentiaries.

The dignity of the individual, the rights of all members of society, the potential for personal growth, and the development of human beings are essential considerations in the effort to help offenders to become law-abiding citizens. The CSC initiative is in response to the Throne Speech of October, 1986, in which the federal government committed itself to co-operating with the provinces, the private sector and voluntary organizations in developing ways to allow Canadians to acquire the degree of literacy required to take full advantage of the benefits of an advanced society.

Following a series of visits to several penitentiaries, the then Solicitor General assessed the extent of the problem and decided to tackle the problem head on. The Solicitor General declared that improving basic adult education programs was a priority for Correctional Service Canada. As a result, the CSC launched a three-year program to reduce functional illiteracy among federal inmates by 5 per cent annually between April 1, 1987, and March 31, 1989.

It is important to note that my hon. friend criticized the program because there were quotas imposed. There has to be an objective in place. The CSC used the definition of functional illiteracy adopted by UNESCO, and that is the equivalent of a grade eight education. Because of the various educational systems that exist in Canada, the CSC uses the completion of grade eight in language and mathematics as a standard for purposes of comparison.

According to the mission statement of the CSC, Correctional Service Canada, as part of the criminal justice system contributes to the protection of society by actively encouraging and assisting offenders to become law-abiding citizens while exercising reasonable, safe, secure and humane control.

The CSC knows how illiteracy affects inmates. An inmate who can neither read nor write is ill equipped to face the demands of everyday life or to find a job. Even though it has not yet been possible to establish a direct correlation between illiteracy and recidivism, the correlation between unemployment and a lack of basic education and technical skills cannot be disputed.

According to Statistics Canada unemployment is highest among those with less than a grade eight education. Standardized tests have also shown that the illiteracy rate among inmates is more than twice that of the general Canadian population. When considering the many factors that contribute to crime, we must recognize that illiterate people have fewer options, less choice and greater difficulty in improving their lives than those who can read and write.

In practice only 150 inmates were able to complete grade eight in 1986-87. It was decided at that time that the objective for 1987-88 would be to have five times as many inmates complete the basic adult education program, for a grand total of 750. The objective for 1988-89 would be 1,200 more inmates, and for 1989-90, 1,800 more. The over-all objective of CSC was therefore to have in excess of 4,050 inmates complete at least a grade eight education during this three-year period. I think my hon. friend will have to admit that that is a very worth-while objective.

This ambitious initiative was intended to demonstrate the firm commitment of CSC to combating illiteracy among inmates. It is vital that people understand that the vast majority of inmates incarcerated in our penitentiaries will be released some day. They will be released on parole, under mandatory supervision, or simply because they have completed their sentence. To be a capable member of society they must have an improved education.

The National Parole Board takes the inmate's participation in the basic education program into account before making a decision on parole. My hon. friend talks about incentives. I think that would be incentive enough to get people to take this program. Perhaps more than anything else this makes inmates understand how important the ability to read and write is in being able to function properly in the outside world.

In 1988 the average inmate, or 57 per cent of the prison population, was serving a sentence of less than six years. During the first year of this initiative, that is during the 1987-88 fiscal year, 1,042 inmates or 139 per cent of the objective completed grade eight. In 1988-89,

1,446 more inmates completed grade eight, with the objective being 1,200.

During the first two years of this initiative the CSC has achieved 118 per cent of its objective. The third year appears to have started well since roughly 80 per cent of the over-all objective had been obtained by the end of the second quarter. The CSC certainly hopes to be able to meet its over-all objective.

To achieve this end, the CSC budgeted 100 per cent more in 1987-88 than in 1986-87 for basic adult education, an increase from $2.5 million to $5 million. In 1988-89 the over-all budget for adult basic education was roughly $6.4 million. I should stress that the CSC maintained all the other educational programs it offers to federal inmates including secondary, post-secondary and college education programs. Vocational training also continues to be a crucial component of the program offered since it allows inmates to learn a craft or skill directly.

The service has also established standard mandatory testing to identify functionally illiterate offenders and thus be better able to integrate them into the adult basic education program. Since commencement of the initiative close to 8,000 inmates entering the correctional system have undergone testing. To date, about 65 per cent have scored at lower than the completed grade eight level. The rate of refusal—and I think it is important to say "refusal" because my hon. friend said that this program was mandatory—to undergo testing has decreased from 16 per cent to 8 per cent in two years. The tests used are currently under revision in order to improve further the service's effectiveness at identifying illiterate inmates.

During the course of 1988-89 the correctional service set up a new system to manage data on inmate education, thus enabling the service to monitor the fulfilment of its objectives even more closely. For example, it was noted, with the help of this new system, that the average national success rate in relation to the number of inmates registered dropped from 2.99 in March of 1988 to 2.59 in April of 1989, a significant drop.

This demonstrates better case management and more careful follow-up of students who withdraw or fail. In fact the service has set in motion an entire process aimed at assisting these students with problems and encouraging them to return to the program by modifying for them the traditional approach to teaching. The cost per successful case has decreased from $4,650 in 1987-88 to $4,189 in 1988-89. This accomplishment greatly surpasses the initial objective of $5,000 per case.

Correctional Service Canada now uses innovative teaching methods to help inmates surmount perceptual problems and identified learning disabilities. The service has expanded the adult basic education program and will continue to make improvements to increase participation and effectiveness. Also, inmate involvement in this program must henceforth be taken into account when considering the inmate for certain jobs in the institution. In some cases the inmate's participation is a condition for obtaining special privileges within the institution.

Training sessions on learning disabilities have been offered to teaching staff in order to improve their ability to assist inmates with these problems. All staff have been made aware of the importance of basic education in order that a concerted movement be established throughout the correctional service to combat the problem of illiteracy.

• (1340)

In addition to ensuring that adult basic education programs are accredited, the service has adopted a multitude of techniques and methods aimed at facilitating adult learning. These include small group or individual instruction if necessary, computer assisted teaching, the use of tutors from within the prison population, as well as more effective use of community volunteers. My hon. friend spoke about the use of peers and community volunteers, integration with other life skills programs and follow-up. I want to point out to my hon. friend that these are all things that are being done. In fact training programs have been given to these volunteers in some regions.

Adult basic education does much more than teach people the three r's. It provides offenders with the opportunity to feel better about themselves and experience personal growth, which will assist them when they are released. As with the general public, however, education of offenders does not end with grade eight completion. On the contrary, offenders who successfully complete the adult education program are encouraged to continue with their studies in secondary, college level and post-secondary education.

To emphasize the importance that education plays in everyone's life, a communications strategy will be developed that explains to all offenders the importance of education to their successful reintegration into society.

Literacy programs already in place in our federal penitentiaries have turned out to be very successful. CSC is working to co-operate with the provinces to maintain course quality and to obtain provincial accreditation. It must be understood that inmate literacy should lead to job training or a pursuit of higher levels of education.

In this regard the CSC also plans, in coming years, to emphasize inmate participation in obtaining a grade ten education while continuing to promote the achievement of grade eight as a priority. In addition, the service will establish a global strategy of surmounting the learning disabilities of inmates.

In conclusion, I therefore believe that the federal government, through the intervention of CSC, is promoting the social reintegration of inmates through adult basic education. The results are a clear indication of the efforts that have been made in this area. I can assure you that the correctional service will continue its work in this regard.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support the motion proposed by my hon. colleague. I would initially like to review the problem of literacy quickly.

Many will recall that literacy has been noted by Southam and a number of other researchers to affect roughly 25 per cent of Canadians. We are told that there are approximately five million functionally illiterate Canadians today. It is important to spend a few seconds on what is meant by functional illiteracy. It means that a person is unable to read, write or compute at a level satisfactory to be able to give all himself or herself to society or to take away from society, from his or her community, as much as he or she would if the literacy rate were higher than it is now.

As I indicated we have roughly five million functionally illiterate people in Canada. They come from a variety of groups. For example, there are older Canadians who are involved in a disproportionate number because they did not have the same kinds of opportunities that we had. They were needed to go to work earlier than we were.

There are also aboriginal people who have not had the same opportunities as other Canadians, and of course that situation is being corrected rather rapidly.

There are new Canadians, some of them already literate in a language other than English or French and some of them who need special assistance in this area.

There are people with learning difficulties and learning handicaps. There are also Canadians who at one time in their lives were functionally literate, but because society has changed so rapidly and there are more demands being made in the field of reading, writing and computing, they are no longer considered functionally literate. However, today we are talking specifically about our inmate population.

I want to say a few words about this particular population. According to certain media reports there are roughly 12,000 people in our federal penitentiaries, and the rates of illiteracy vary according to the source. I have read that it is from 40 per cent up to 75 per cent. I have heard today 65 per cent. In other documentation I have seen 50 per cent. I think we could agree that it is a high rate, higher than the national average, and clearly we need to do something special about it.

I have also been told by these same sources that only 500 people a year were participating in literacy programs a few years ago and perhaps 150 of those 500 had completed the programs. Those numbers have improved during the last few years, but there is still a lot of room to move.

Let me quote from a special report about literacy entitled "Breaking Down Invisible Walls":

> In a society where non-readers are on the fringes, unable to participate fully, literacy training can go a long way in keeping ex-inmates out of prison.

We have to realize that literacy is one thing that can contribute to rehabilitation. It cannot do it all, but clearly it can contribute.

Literacy is not only reading, writing and computing. Those are important by themselves obviously in a society such as ours, one which is changing remarkably quickly and where those demands are in fact increasing on a daily basis, but we are also talking about life skills:

learning how to live out of the penitentiary environment, learning how to live within the whole of society.

We are also talking about restoration of self-respect. Without that restoration of self-respect there can be little gain made in this area. There can be little hope to reintegrate successfully in society. We have to remember as well that literacy for people who are incarcerated is a toe-hold for further education and training. It is absolutely critical to have a certain degree of literacy in order to be able to profit fully from it.

Some will know that the correctional service is organized into seven major categories. I want to quote one section because I think it is particularly relevant. It is the section entitled "Education, Training and Employment of Inmates". It reads as follows:

> To maximize employment, training and educational opportunities for all offenders in preparation for their reintegration into society as productive citizens. This is achieved by increasing the Correctional Service's capacity to provide meaningful work and training opportunities; by increasing, where appropriate, the emphasis on work programs that will generate revenue to help offset the operating cost of their Service; and by effectively supporting the efforts of released inmates to find gainful employment.

We have here one particular sector devoted almost entirely to ensuring that our inmates are given those kinds of opportunities educationally and in related fields to ensuring that they can integrate fully into Canadian society. The emphasis placed on literacy is one of critical importance.

[Translation]

I will give a brief summary in French. As I said earlier, there are roughly 12,000 inmates in our federal penitentiaries. A few years ago, only 500 inmates were involved and perhaps 150 actually completed literacy programs. Those figures are much higher today, but we still have a long way to go. We have to realize that literacy is not only reading, writing, and arithmetic. We are also talking about developing self-respect and learning how to live outside the penitentiary.

[English]

I believe that we need to do everything as a society to ensure that inmates do not return to prison. Thousands of dollars—there are large figures which indicate in excess of $50,000 per year to keep someone incarcerated—are in fact being spent with increasing frequency. I would suggest that we need to invest in literacy and other related programs.

My colleague has documented rather well some of the inadequacies of the program. Let me briefly repeat those that I support. It is compulsory, and this is causing certain difficulty. Surely there are ways to bring about greater participation rates without mandating it. We need to have programs that are brought forward in consultation with particular individuals involved in a significant kind of way. We need to ensure that the learning materials are the most appropriate. We need to make certain that the test programs are the most adequate possible.

• (1350)

The targets may in fact be inappropriate. We need to review that as well. It is important to recognize that one of the effective ways is through tutoring. We recognize as well that tutoring has not always been as successful as it might have been. Perhaps the greatest inadequacy has been in the follow-up, what happens after the individual leaves the penitentiary.

We must first respond to the criticisms that have been made. We just cannot take them lightly. They are valid criticisms and there are ways of counteracting them.

There are incentives that could be brought forward, monetary and other. We need to explore that and see what might be done in order to get larger participation rates. We need to improve our methods of instruction, and we need to look very closely at tutoring and how it can be improved to make a greater contribution. As I indicated before we definitely need to ensure that the follow-ups are adequate.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I want to ask the government to ensure that the necessary funding is provided so that our inmates can take full advantage of these literacy and education programs and be intergrated into Canadian society.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the motion of the hon. member for Victoria. The Secretary of State has stated that the Government of Canada has two goals for this year, which is International Literacy Year. The first is to prevent illiteracy; the second is to help those who have fallen through the cracks.

Today I want to talk about one group that has fallen through those cracks, and those are people who are currently residing in federal penitentiaries. In 1981 nearly 40 per cent of inmates of federal penitentiaries had less than a grade nine education, nearly 10 per cent higher than the general population of Canada. Only 2 per cent of those who need to improve their literacy skills are currently enrolled in programs.

We need to reach out to those people and find ways to make them want to enrol in literacy programs. The inmates of our federal penitentiaries should receive no less than what we wish for others in our society, especially where literacy programs are concerned.

There needs to be provision of literacy services which are flexible enough to fit the individual's need. They should also have policies to take into account the diversity of the background of the individual and his or her learning experiences prior to being incarcerated.

However I agree with previous speakers that they must be voluntary programs. No one should be forced to participate in a literacy program because they happen to be behind bars. It must be the individual's choice, but it must be available and not only while the inmate is in prison. If the course is not completed when the inmate leaves prison, he or she must be able to continue it.

The causes of literacy are many, but the majority of learners had negative experience with formal education and require a comfortable learning environment. Literacy programs must be creative, must be interesting, and must meet the needs of those who in fact dropped out of school because the programs failed them.

All human beings, according to the UNESCO international conference on adult education in 1985, have the right to learn and read and write in their native language. It is an objective to which Canada should be aspiring.

In September 1988 the Prime Minister said: "We are placing literacy high on the national agenda. We want one Canada united, prosperous, with equal opportunities for all of our citizens."

Those in federal penitentiaries already have barriers they need to overcome. We must make certain that in this International Literacy Year the lack of literacy skills is not one of these barriers. We must do this because the costs are enormous not only in business terms but in human terms as well and, most important, because of the cost to the functionally illiterate individual in a literate world.

One learner said: "No one knows the anger that people who can't read go through. We're living in a different world."

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to take part in this debate. Clearly members on all sides of the House very much support its intent. As my colleague, the member for Mississauga West mentioned earlier, the federal government, the Correctional Service of Canada and the Solicitor General very much support this motion.

Correctional Service Canada has already taken the necessary measures. The adult basic education program this department offers has been a priority since 1987, and the program has had considerable success. Since this initiative was begun, 3,200 inmates have completed grade eight courses in language and mathematics.

Before making one or two other comments I want to say that I had an opportunity many years ago while working as a chaplain in several prisons to realize the direct relationship between illiteracy and crime. It perhaps is stating something that is obvious to those who have had anything to do with our criminal justice system, but there is a very high correlation between people who have had an inadequate or non-existent education and those who get in trouble with the law. It seems to me to be abundantly obvious. I am sorry it has taken us so long to begin the sensible programs that are very much needed while people are incarcerated to ensure that they have the opportunity to make a different life for themselves when they are finally released.

This year, 1990, has been declared International Literacy Year by the United Nations General Assembly. To celebrate International Literacy Year, Correctional Service Canada will launch a book voyage in conjunction with the project of the International Task Force on Literacy. The idea is to get learners involved in International Literacy Year.

A committee will travel from institution to institution collecting stories, poems and other forms of written expression which adult basic education students have written. Other similar books are being prepared around the world. At the end of the year, a giant book with selections from all those submitted will be translated into other major languages and will be presented by the International Committee of Learners to the Secretary General of the United Nations at a ceremony at the UN headquarters on December 10, this year.

Another way in which Correctional Service Canada will celebrate this year is to co-host an international conference, entitled "Freedom to Read", an international conference on literacy and corrections with the United States Department of the Attorney General. Delegates representing nations from around the world will be invited to participate in the conference scheduled for October 15 to October 17, 1990, providing an opportunity for correctional educational professionals and administrators to share ideas and experience regarding methods, standards and services related to literacy and offenders.

I believe this kind of initiative speaks well not only for the Government of Canada but certainly for this Parliament which has clearly demonstrated in these past few minutes, with the initiative of the member for Victoria, how important it is to get at the underlying causes of criminal activity and continuing criminal activity in Canada. I welcome and support it very much.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the chairman of Noranda and MacMillan Bloedel is quoted as saying that dioxins are an inevitable by-product of the pulp and paper industry and that nothing can be done to prevent such pollution. Fortunately not everyone in the pulp and paper industry shares his opinion.

An Edmonton based company, Millar Western Industries, is planning to build a pollution-free pulp mill in Saskatchewan. Mr. Mac Millar, president of the company, is quoted as saying: "It's the first of its kind in the world, and the first zero-effluent pulp mill in North America". Mr. Millar says it will recycle waste, water and chemicals so as not to discharge pollution material.

Canadians are wondering when MacMillan Bloedel and other pulp and paper companies will follow Millar's lead and become a clean and environmentally responsible industry.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, all too frequently we hear opposition members stating that Canadian agriculture cannot compete with producers in the United States. Fortunately the facts indicate differently.

• (1400)

In evaluating our degree of competitiveness it is important to be aware of comments made by representatives of our competitors. Recently, an official of the North Dakota Wheat Growers was speaking about exports and was quoted in an agricultural news-letter as having said: "We are going to have a problem with the Canadians. They are now in the Philippines where they have never been before. Also, they have made inroads into Venezuela".

With markets for grain and grain products expanding and the likelihood of world trade in red meat to double in the next decade, the question is not: "Can we compete?" The question is: "Will we be ready with the wide range of quality products necessary to exploit the new markets?"

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on April 19, 1983, Vancouver City Council representing the citizens of the city of Vancouver, declared the city to be a nuclear weapons free zone. Despite that fact, the Government of Canada continues to invite nuclear-armed U.S. ships into the harbour of Vancouver.

Recently, a group of courageous Greenpeace protesters were acquitted on mischief charges for having spray painted peace symbols and radio activity warnings on visiting U.S. warships in August of last year.

The learned trial judge, Wallace Craig, said he found it "remarkable that the government sees fit to invite this type of equipment into Vancouver in view of the serious concerns people have about it. It almost invites protest".

In June of last year the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in this House: "When there are nuclear weapons there are going to be accidents".

I call upon the Conservative government to respect the wishes of the people of Vancouver and to refuse to allow any more nuclear weapons equipped ships in our harbour, to take a strong stand for peace and a clean environment.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the worst tax fraud of the century was mentioned again in an article in the Globe and Mail on February 7, 1990, reminding Canadians that the Liberals made them lose billions of dollars in 1983-84.

Under the Scientific Research Tax Credits Program introduced by Marc Lalonde, in 1983-84, a Mr. Kenneth Ford managed to swindle the government out of several million dollars which he was then able to invest, without penalty, in Costa Rica.

The former Liberal government had calculated that the program would cost the government only $200 million. However, fellow Canadians, if you want to hear the truth again, this program cost us $3.5 billion, of which up to $1.9 billion has disappeared as a result of fraud.

Mr. Speaker, the opposition recently demanded an investigation in connection with a loan of $2 million. Does it now have the guts to demand a royal inquiry into the theft of the century in this country?

MEMBER FOR CHAMBLY

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, the day after his election victory, the new member for Chambly already reneged on the promise he gave his constituents when he declared he now supported his party's resolution requesting immediate changes in the Meech Lake Accord.

Betrayal and disloyalty to the people of Chambly, those are the words that come to mind when I think of the gentleman who, in the middle of the election campaign, declared that he supported the Meech Lake Accord and, as recently as the evening of his victory, declared that he was leaving for Ottawa with a clear message from the people of Chambly supporting the Meech Lake Accord. And now this about-face!

Considering that during the election campaign, the credibility of the hon. member for Chambly raised serious doubts and that as a result of his recent change of heart, his credibility has plunged even further, I would like to remind him that people who play this kind of game often end up losing their credibility altogether, and that we do not forget easily in Quebec!

MILITARY EXPOSITION

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the merchants of death who have brought us ARMX in past years are planning another military arms show in Ottawa in May.

This year they will exhibit their wares on private property. These are the folks often financed by federal government grants and subsidies who continue to invent 101 new ways to kill people. Often the weapons they manufacture are sold to countries that abuse human rights.

Is it not about time that the new global realities become recognized by these arms manufacturers? Is it not about time that this government scrap its Defence Industry Productivity Program?

The challenge is for the arms industry to convert to manufacturing goods that will help to preserve our planet and not destroy it, to use advanced technologies to prolong life, not kill it.

The government should boycott this year's ARMX show and should instead immediately advance a strategy that will assist in the conversion of the arms industry from war to peace.

Failure to convert soon will mean that these industries will also go the way of the dinosaur.

TRIBUTE TO GEORGES FOREST

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) told the House on February 15, one of the great defenders of language rights for Franco-Manitobans, Georges Forest, died on February 14 in St. Boniface. The funeral will be held today.

Monique Hébert, a journalist for CKSB in Winnipeg, described Mr. Forest well in her reports. Here is some of what she said.

Mr. Forest aroused much controversy in 1975 when he refused to pay a ticket that was in English only. It was the beginning of a long fight for the recognition of Franco-Manitobans' rights, a battle which is still going on today. Mr. Forest believed that people must be interested in the survival of the language not for purely folkloric reasons but rather for the role it must play in the evolution of so-called French Canadian culture towards the Canadian culture of the future. The role Mr. Forest played in the history of Manitoba will not soon be forgotten. The Franco-Manitoban community has just lost one of its great defenders. What I appreciated the most about him was his dynamism, energy and creativity. He was a good friend and I will miss him greatly.

COPYRIGHT

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I am increasingly disturbed by our predicament as members of parliament and, indeed, that of teachers, business people, owners of VCRs and all persons affected by Canadian law.

Newspapers, publishers, broadcasters and others throughout the country think that they, under copyright legislation, have the right to approve, refuse or charge whatever fee they like for photos, speeches—any material, even material given in a public forum.

Recently, The Toronto Star denied me use of a photo of myself, my daughter and my constituents even though I was prepared to pay a reasonable fee.

In addition, having made a deputation at a public hearing of the CRTC, I was told that a private company had the copyright to the transcripts of the public hearing and that I was required to pay whatever fee it wanted for a copy.

Law professor Yves Boucher of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada advises me that under this legislation an accused person could prevent evidence he or she has created from being presented in a court of law.

In a free and democratic society there are reasonable limitations to protect our system of justice and our rights to freedom of speech and communication. Members of parliament and members of the public must have the right to access information and communicate.

Who is in charge here, the media and other copyright holders, or Parliament?

HERITAGE AWARDS

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, since 1978, the Canadian Parks Service Heritage Awards have been presented by the Minister of the Environment to individuals and groups in recognition of their outstanding contribution to the preservation of our heritage. The awards recognize and publicly honour people whose efforts help Canadians to appreciate, enjoy and protect our heritage.

Today, 10 awards will be presented by the minister to those who have made noteworthy contributions through achievements in policy development, research and education, resources management, public awareness, understanding and appreciation, responsible action and stewardship.

I am pleased to draw to your attention the presence of the recipients in the gallery, Mr. Speaker, and to remind all members here that they are welcome to attend the awards ceremony today at four o'clock in Room 200 of the West Block, at which time the names of the laureates will be announced.

THE BUDGET

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow will be another dark day for Canadians when this government announces its new economic forecast.

All of Canada will feel the effects of the new budget, and I would suggest none more so than Atlantic Canadians. This region of Canada has already been devastated as a result of the government's cut-back agenda and tomorrow it is highly likely that Atlantic Canadians will be hammered even further.

The budget of April, 1989, resulted in cuts to Established Programs Financing, that is, transfer payments. In Atlantic Canada these cuts amounted to over $17 million, resulting in reduced funding for medicare, universities and hospitals for the fiscal year 1990-91. To Prince Edward Island, the net loss is some $2 million.

• (1410)

Reductions in transfer payments for health care and post-secondary education squeezes provincial budgets that are already tight.

Given the economic disparity already existing in Atlantic Canada, provinces can ill afford to increase provincial taxes to offset federal cut-backs. Atlantic Canadians need increased economic development policies from this government.

Our region of Canada cannot give any more. We need to hear positive initiatives from this government if that is possible.

FRIENDS OF MUSEUMS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians mark today as Heritage Day, a day when we take stock of our collective history.

[Translation]

More than 2,000 organizations and institutions are now working to preserve Canada's cultural heritage and to help us understand it. About 30,000 volunteers represent our museums to the public, by acting as teachers or guides, by providing or obtaining financial assitance or by offering for the enjoyment and edification of all Canadians valuable objects and works of art that they have collected over many years.

[English]

These thousands, each contributing in his or her own way, are known as "friends" of museums. The president of the Canadian Federation of Friends of Museums is Mrs. Carol Sprachman.

Her efforts and those of her organization enrich all our lives, whether it is the activist petitioning city hall to prevent demolition of an interesting old store, a scholar researching collections of sacred works, a committee collecting decorative quilts, painted Easter eggs and household artefacts or the senior executive twisting arms to save a French impressionist painting for a public gallery. Mrs. Sprachman and all who work in support of museums and of heritage organizations are the faithful stewards of our Canadian inheritance.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in spite of having had plant breeders' rights legislation since 1970, U.S. industry has not succeeded in serving the breeding needs of some of its more northern farmers.

According to a study by North Dakota State University, Canadian commercial varieties of wheat, oats, Durum, fall rye, barley and flax tended to outperform most American varieties in trials across this state. It was our specialty crops, lentils and faba beans, which were the big stars, far outranking other U.S. varieties.

Farmers in North Dakota find our publicly-bred varieties more suitable to their climatic and soil conditions than anything developed by U.S. agribusiness.

Bill C-15 introduced by the Tory government and now supported by the Liberals has finished the legislative committee stage. Its passage will mean that Canadian farmers who farm under unique soil and climatic conditions will lose the advantage they now enjoy with public plant breeding and will be forced to depend on the same so-called world scale profit oriented research that has proven so inadequate in the Dakotas.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this past week has seen considerable media focus on the plight of the town of Canso.

Government bashing by the CLC, the CBC and the NDP have provided considerable entertainment, but little by way of constructive solutions to the difficulties faced not only in the town of Canso but in places like Port Mouton, Lockeport, Shag Harbour and Woods Harbour.

In 1983, when Atlantic Canada faced its last major crisis in the fishery the Liberal government of the day chose not to face the growing capacity problem if it meant some plants might close. Instead, it threw money at the problem—$138 million to be exact—and bought the people's silence, though not as it turned out the election of 1984.

We need a responsible response to the current crisis. This means proper resource-recovery measures, rationalization where there is over-capacity, development and further value-added processing where there is underutilization and assistance and incentive for economic diversification.

Let's leave the rhetoric to Bob White and Shirley Carr. I look to this government for a responsible program of response measures developed in consultation with those who are affected. I call upon the government to bring forth these measures soon.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, about a year ago this government commissioned a study to address public concern respecting the foam-coated breast implant called the Meme which was earlier marketed in Canada without the required compliance notice from the Health Protection Branch.

The Réal Laperrière Company of Montreal, which has marketed the device in Canada since 1984, has used the government-funded report as part of its marketing promotion since June 1989.

In June, 1989, Dr. C. Kerrigan reported that the said implant is not unsafe. Yet, public doubt remains.

Apparently, Dr. Kerrigan received a total of $45,000 for her report, but only $15,000 came from the department of health.

Moreover, Dr. Kerrigan's report made apparent use of another report, that of a plastic surgeon who was under contract with the company that produced the implant to begin with.

I urge the minister of health to inquire into and reveal who aided Dr. Kerrigan in the preparation of her report to assure the Canadian public that no one had a prior or a continuing business relationship with the Réal Lapierrière Company of Montreal and to explain where the other $30,000 which helped pay for the Kerrigan report came from.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the statement made by the President of Ford Canada, Mr. Ken Harrigan, with reference to the automotive industry and the GST.

The statement was published in the St. Thomas Times Journal last week and quoted Mr. Harrigan as saying: "What a lot of people have overlooked is that many consumer goods, including cars, will be lower priced under the GST than they are with the existing manufacturers' sales tax. So the GST is not all bad—in fact, in the long run, it will improve Canada's competitiveness in world markets."

I believe this reaffirms the decision of this government to implement the goods and services tax. With an industry that is temporarily suffering, the statement by Mr. Harrigan is encouraging.

Furthermore, despite the condition of the industry Mr. Harrigan goes as far as to forecast recovery for the automotive industry as early as next year, assisted in part by the implementation of the GST.

Despite the doom and gloom predicted by those opposite, it is reassuring to have someone of Mr. Harrigan's stature reaffirm that this government is, indeed, on the right road to economic—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANSO, NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

On Saturday, 5,000 people came to Canso, Nova Scotia, to say that this government was doing nothing for Canso and communities like it. Today, a task force from Canso, Nova Scotia is in Ottawa to plead for real help for that community.

A few weeks ago the Prime Minister said that there is no crisis in Atlantic Canada, that there is only a crisis in the Atlantic fishery, as if the two were not really intertwined.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this: What real help will the government announce for Canso today? Or is it sticking to its fatuous answer that there is no crisis in Atlantic Canada? The people of Atlantic Canada deserve better than that.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is, of course, a crisis in the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada, as the Prime Minister said in this House some days ago.

The Government of Canada is working with the industry and with communities involved to try to find the best way to respond to that crisis in terms that will provide some kind of durable, long-term solution to that problem, that will not simply involve demonstrations expressing the outrage of the moment, such as was taken advantage of by the New Democratic Party members and their shadow in Canso on the weekend.

There is a task force here. That task force will be meeting with representatives of the Government of Canada.

We are continuing work on the long-term response to serious problems that face the fishery of Atlantic Canada. We intend to follow actions that will lead to a situation where the fishery too is healthy in Atlantic Canada as we have been able to contribute to the health of other sectors of the economy of that important part of the country.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, why does the minister not realize that the 5,000 people who gathered in Canso last Saturday were not simply expressing the outrage of the moment, as he put it, but their deep despair over the lack of action by this government?

The Prime Minister told this House last month, and I quote: "We have and will continue to bring forward the same kinds of generous programs that we brought forward for western farmers." The government still has not done this. I ask the minister again: When is the government going to deliver the same kind of program it brought forward for western farmers for the fishermen of Atlantic Canada?

Is the government going to give the same kind of fatuous answer with respect to outrage that the minister just gave, or is it going to do something meaningful to produce for Atlantic Canada the same kind of program it produced for the farmers of western Canada? If so, why will it not announce that today when the Canso task force is here in Ottawa?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition will know, if he is seriously concerned about this issue, that the result of consultations between the company and the federal and provincial governments is that an arrangement has been reached to provide for the establishment of 300 time-shared jobs in Canso.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We recognize that that is short of what the people of Canso would like to have achieved. We are working seriously on a series of programs designed to deal with long-term problems in the Atlantic fishery, not designed to give answers and to announce policies simply because a concerned group is in the gallery of the House of Commons today.

Surely the Leader of the Opposition understands that these are important problems that have to be considered seriously and that have to take account of the international factors, of manpower programs and other programs that we are putting in place in the Government of Canada. We hope that with the co-operation of people in the industry, communities affected and provincial governments that we will be able to provide some long-term relief to an industry that is now in crisis.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the minister has shown today that his government deals only in illusions.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore ask the minister: When will the government offer the people of the Atlantic provinces a real program to revive the Atlantic fishing industry, not a retraining program, but a program that will really provide dignity and employment for the people of the Atlantic region? When will the government offer a real recovery program for the people of the Atlantic provinces?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows that there have already been talks between the Government of Canada, the Government of Nova Scotia and the industry concerned. The result was a program that can give 300 jobs to the people of Canso. That is not all that Nova Scotians want and the government is now examining all aspects of the problem to try to find a long-term solution, not like the solutions in the past which overlooked or aggravated the problem.

[English]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The more than 5,000 people who gathered in Canso on Saturday condemned this government's cynical rescue plan with National Sea Products, a plan which offers destitution to more than half of the workforce and a grant-pogey cycle for the rest.

The mayor and the members of the Canso Community Survival Task Force have travelled to Ottawa to seek a solution that will save their town. The whole country is watching.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister assure them that they have not travelled here in vain? Will he commit his government today to working out a plan for them that will see their trawler port maintained and a viable fish plant in Canso secure?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what we can commit to the task force and the people of Canso is that ministers of the government will meet with them as they have requested and that we will consider seriously the proposals that they put forward. We understand their grave concern at the situation in Canso. We are looking for a response that may solve that problem.

They will be having meetings with at least two of my colleagues tomorrow, and will have the opportunity to put forward proposals that they think may be realistic and may in fact help to resolve the problem.

We will assess those recommendations with the utmost seriousness because we share with the people of Canso a determination to try to find a long-term, durable solution to this difficulty that will allow as much as possible the community and the industries involved in that community to survive and to thrive.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

What the people of Canso want is simple. They want their jobs and dignity.

If National Sea Products will not land a reasonable share of their allocation to their plant in Canso and keep their trawler port open, will the minister exercise his responsibility under the Fisheries Act and reserve an allocation for the community of Canso that will keep that plant and that trawler port open?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated in this House on repeated occasions, we are deeply concerned about the troubles that people in communities such as Canso are facing. For reasons relating to the lack of abundance of the northern cod resource we have had to reduce the northern cod quota by about 70,000 metric tonnes in the last 12-month period.

It has never been the policy of the government to force fishermen, trawlermen or fishing companies to land catch at specific communities for a number of very good reasons relating to the viability of the fishery and which would ensure that all communities in Atlantic Canada would be faced with misery rather than just those about which we are deeply concerned and which we are trying to help.

We will be happy to listen to the representatives from Canso and hear any good ideas they may wish to propose.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The acting Prime Minister and the Minister of Fisheries have talked about solutions, but they have known about the problem for a number of years. Solutions should have come forward long before today.

We are here today to join that united voice of those 5,000 supporters of Canso and residents of Canso. Canso has become the symbol for people across this country who are saying that they will not quietly lay down and die; they want this government to do something.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this: Will he pledge today the programs and the additional funds committed by the Prime Minister which are absolutely necessary to see Canso and other fishing communities remain productive?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I understand that Mr. Bob White was in Canso and had the Leader of the New Democratic Party in tow with him for a public demonstration indicating the attention of the CLC and the New Democratic Party to a problem that has been of deep concern to this government since it arose.

The hon. member will understand that a demonstration is not going to solve this problem and that we have very serious problems in the Atlantic fishery.

It is not simply Canso that is affected. It is Lockeport and a number of other communities in Newfoundland and in Nova Scotia that are very directly affected by this problem. We are seeking to find solutions that will be durable solutions.

Some of these issues, as the hon. leader will learn if she stays longer in her job, require more than a demonstration to resolve them.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

If this government and its members cared about the people of Atlantic Canada, if they cared about the community of Canso, they would have been standing at that meeting in Canso telling the people of Canso their solutions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, on February 11 a fisheries official indicated that community-based quotas are being considered by the federal government.

Principle three of the 1990 Atlantic Groundfish Management Plan states that allocation of fishery resources will be on the basis of equity, taking into account closeness to the resource, and the relative dependence of coastal communities upon a given resource.

Will the minister listen to the supporters of Canso and the Atlantic communities? Will he commit himself today to bring forward community-based quotas?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the official quoted was responding, I think, at a special seminar organized by the Maritime Fishermen's Union, to a question about community quotas among a variety of options for dealing with this problem.

• (1430)

I believe it was the ADM for the Atlantic region who indicated that if this option were to be considered, a number of factors should be taken into account. He explained why community quotas lead to a less economic, less competitive fishery and more hardship and suffering for all those who rely on this industry because, in fact, plants are operated at very low levels of their optimal capacity.

We have to look at such proposals in the context of our historical policy which is not to allocate specific quantities of fish to specific communities.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

It is this government's responsibility to represent the people and not National Sea.

Shameless waste of perfectly edible fish has gone on for years. It is thrown back in the sea. Our resources and our environment must be treated with respect.

Mr. Speaker, this scandalous waste must stop. Can the minister guarantee that starting today every fish caught will be used?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the federal government represents all the people in the Atlantic region and not only those who have interests—

[English]

On the question of fish that are wasted at sea, this is a despicable practice. In some cases in the fishery there is an unavoidable by-catch of undersized fish because fish are caught with nets and fish tend to gather up in nets.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Siddon: I think all members of the House recognize that fact, Mr. Speaker.

We take every measure management-wise to minimize the waste of fish by all sectors of the industry. In regard to the offshore sector, it is recognized that this practice does occur and that is why we have observers on these vessels to minimize and prevent these kinds of wasteful practices.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the long awaited Harris report on the northern cod stock was delivered to the Minister of Fisheries today. According to the scientific evidence and the testimony given by experienced fishermen before the Harris panel, today the northern cod stock is involved in that very delicate pre-spawning activity that is so vital for the actual spawning itself.

Will the Government of Canada now take the advice of these experienced fishermen and cancel the licences of every foreign trawler licensed by this government inside of our 200-mile zone for 1990, foreign trawlers that outnumber the Canadian offshore fleet two to one, trawlers that are three and four times the size of our Canadian boats?

Can the minister assure us that he will put an end to this foreign disruption of the pre-spawning process of the northern cod stock and cancel every licence?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that when foreign vessels fish inside the 200-mile economic zone, it is because Canada is obliged to make surplus stocks available to the vessels of other countries that belong to the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization outside the 12-mile limit.

Those stocks do not belong to Canada, although we are given first opportunity to use them for the benefit of our fishermen and communities such as Canso. That is why we have made 100,000 tonnes of those surplus stocks available to our own fishermen on a priority basis.

Scientists advise me there is no recorded evidence in the scientific literature or our own research which states that fishing on the spawning grounds does measurable damage to the cod stocks. I have had private confirmation of that from Dr. Harris. We will be doing additional research on this question, but I should point out that where fisheries have been conducted in the North Sea and in Canadian waters in the 1960s, on the spawning stocks, we have seen abundant production from those resources in subsequent years.

So this question can in no way be answered in a simplistic fashion as this member is often wont to do.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago in the House the minister told us that the food of the cod fish that is being given to the foreigners is under-utilized species, that food has nothing to do with the weight of the codfish.

Today he is telling us that according to his advice the disruption of the spawning ground has nothing to do with the spawning process. He must be getting his advice from a ouija board.

How can the government ignore the fact that the deepest nets and the largest nets used in the Atlantic Ocean are the nets of the over 100 foreign trawlers licensed by this government, not the 60 Canadian trawlers in our offshore fleet, and that if the spawning grounds are disrupted, a codfish will not spawn.

How would the minister like it if he had a Soviet trawler barging through his bedroom? Cancel the licences.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is obviously a great expert on spawning, although I do not know how much he knows about bedrooms.

The hon. member is well known to spawn a great deal of subterfuge in these matters, but I should point out again that foreign vessels fishing for under-utilized or surplus stocks, which Canadian fishermen are not interested in harvesting, do not fish where cod are spawning. That is why their incidental catch of cod is minuscule, small enough to be barely measurable.

Once again the hon. member is floating a red herring in this House.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. The minister knows that around 14 million tires are now on fire in my riding, and I, along with close to 1,000 of my neighbours, have been evacuated from our homes.

Unless something is done, experts say that the fire could burn for some time releasing toxins into the air and water. People in my riding want to know what resources this government has available to extinguish the fire and monitor the health and safety effects. When will this government appoint a minister responsible for this?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, although this fire is a provincial responsibility, this government has provided the Ontario government with information to help with the monitoring of the smoke fumes and to assist local firefighting on the Hagersville scene.

I informed the House on Friday morning that we had received a request that same morning from the Ontario government to help in the analysis of air quality. A few hours later that same day, at about 3.30 in the afternoon, the Ontario environment on-scene commander called back to advise that Environment Canada assistance was not immediately required. So we did not dispatch the team and the equipment.

This morning, I phoned Minister Jim Bradley to inquire about this. He told me that we could send our team and equipment. I also extended to him, on behalf of the Government of Canada, an offer of assistance in terms of all the resources we have, such as equipment. The army is standing ready to go there, if necessary, and we are waiting for an indication of any specific requests that Ontario might have.

• (1440)

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): I would say to the minister that he is about a week late in doing this.

Mr. Mazankowski: Didn't you hear the answer?

Mr. Epp: Try Jim Bradley.

Mr. Della Noce: You are not a good member asking a question a week later.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Speller: I will tell the member that I have been on the scene since day one of this disaster. I have been monitoring it from there. Where has the Government of Canada been?

My supplementary question is for the Minister of National Defence, the minister responsible for Emergency Preparedness Canada. He is aware that one of the functions of Emergency Preparedness Canada, and I quote from the act, is: "To monitor any potential, imminent or actual civil emergency and to report to the minister on the emergency and any measures necessary for dealing with that emergency".

I contacted Emergency Preparedness Canada today. They told me that, yes, they were monitoring the situation through the media, and that Emergency Preparedness Canada is not on site.

Is the minister prepared to fulfil his mandate and the government's mandate to get Emergency Preparedness Canada down there to monitor the situation and to determine what steps, if necessary, the federal government can take in that area.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, provided the hon. member with a short lesson in the Constitution of Canada. The Government of Ontario, through Emergency Measures Ontario, must request assistance. We have been standing by waiting for that request.

I would like the hon. member to understand that not only was there some confusion by the Government of Ontario in requesting assistance last Friday and then withdrawing the request, but to this point there has not been a request for assistance from the Government of Ontario, either to Emergency Preparedness Canada or the Department of National Defence. Both of the departments under my responsibility and the full resources of the Government of Canada are available. We wish to help, and when requested we will respond as rapidly and as efficiently as possible.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Over 1,000 people in Hagersville met yesterday to voice their need for answers, their need for urgent action. The water table is being destroyed. We have a situation where cancer causing fumes are going into the air.

Why has it taken until today for that minister to offer the use of the armed forces of this country, despite the fact that minister was asked twice last week to take immediate, urgent, fast action to deal with that situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we sympathize with the people of Hagersville, and we understand their concern in the circumstances.

That is why last week, people from my department offered their services to those who are fighting the fire. We provided information, expertise on predicting air currents.

On Friday, when we received a request from the Government of Ontario, we immediately gave an affirmative response and took steps to send staff from my department, including experts and equipment.

However, late Friday afternoon, we heard the request was cancelled. This morning, I wanted to check the situation with the Ontario Minister of the Environment. He told me—and I saw there had been some confusion about the messages sent by the Government of Ontario—that we could now send the team of technicians and the team of experts.

I also said, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of Canada was offering the Government of Ontario all its resources to fight this fire. I added that the Minister of National Defence had authorized me to offer sending in the Canadian military to fight this fir, with all the necessary equipment.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I think it is shameful that this government should attempt to put its responsibilities off on the Province of Ontario. It has responsibilities to this country as a national government. The minister can sit there and laugh but the people in Hagersville are not laughing.

I ask this minister who has ignored these questions so fully up to this point—

Mr. Speaker: It is a serious matter. I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Langdon: Where else across this country are there similar dumps? How many hundreds of large dumps of tires like this, that threaten people, exist across this country which this minister has done nothing about?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by answering the first part of the question. This government respects the Constitution and the jurisdictions of the provinces, and we cannot intervene in this case if the province of Ontario does not ask us to do so. We have done everything we could do so far, and we are now waiting for specific requests. We said that we were ready to help. National Defence would like to help. We have the army. We have the equipment. We have what is necessary. We want to go, Mr. Speaker, but we are not going to invade Ontario with Canadian troops.

Second, we have made an inventory of federal dump sites, and we know that as far as federal sites are concerned, there are no dangerous stockpiles. Tomorrow, in Toronto, we will have a meeting of Deputy Environment Ministers from across Canada, and we will establish a set of conditions for stockpiling this kind of material.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General of Canada. Since 1987, L'Actualité, La Presse and the Globe & Mail have reported many times that individuals cheated the Liberal government of $1.9 billion in 1983-84 through scientific research tax credits. My question is: Can the minister tell us today whether the RCMP is now investigating a certain Kenneth Ford of Costa Rica who cheated the Canadian Government of $6 million and whether it is investigating other individuals and/or groups who defrauded the Canadian Government through this tax program the Liberals had in 1983?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, this situation does go back several years and we must all deplore it. Obviously, when other departments ask us for RCMP assistance, we provide it. However, in the specific case mentioned by the hon. member, he knows very well that legal proceedings are now under way and that it would be difficult for me to comment in this House, under the circumstances.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. All week Canadians have watched the burning of 15 acres of tires. These 14 million burning tires will produce 42 million litres of toxic oil run-off. What has been collected to date represents only one-half of 1 per cent of the potential oil run-off. If the oil toxins enter the groundwater it will contaminate the drinking water for both people and livestock. This is a major environmental catastrophe.

When will the federal government act and not wait on the province. I have felt for years that this law should be changed.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): It's the law. It's your law.

Mr. Crawford: Well then we should change it, sir. Are there any federal plans to aid this area?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Environment does not have the power to change the Constitution of the country. We must respect the Constitution. This is the truth, it must be said.

Although this is a provincial responsibility, we have been very active monitoring the situation, sending people down there, and providing the Ontario Minister of the Environment with information on weather forecasts. We have also said that we would like to be invited to step in with resources, with the army.

On Friday morning we received a request. We immediately took measures to dispatch people and equipment, but a few hours later we received a cancellation of that request. This morning I checked with the minister himself as to why this was happening and he told me that we could send in our specialists. I also added that the Government of Canada would be very happy to be there. I offered him the full assistance of the federal government in terms of equipment, troops, people and everything. We stand ready to help.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. A renowned chemical engineer at Laval University has called the tire fire a more serious environmental threat than the 1988 PCB warehouse fire in Saint-Basile-le-Grand, Quebec, because of its potential to burn for months.

What are the federal plans to deal with the long-term effects after the fire is over while we have not acted with the province?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this is a most relevant question. We have not waited for a disaster to act. We have implemented research projects across Canada to develop new recycling processes for used tires. These research projects have resulted in the construction of about six new recycling facilities either being built or in operation.

However, it is not enough. We must do more than that. At the level of the federal and provincial Departments of Environment, there will be a meeting tomorrow of deputy ministers concerning this question. We are considering new requirements for the proper and safe storage of used tires in Canada.

In this case in Hagersville, the provincial government knew that this was dangerous and it issued instructions to ask the owner to change the storage and distribute the tires into smaller piles. The owner decided to challenge this direction in court and this case is pending now. That is the reason for this huge pile of tires. The hon. member is right, we must make sure it does not happen again in Canada.

HEALTH

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. We learned this morning that the Department of National Health and Welfare waited nine days before notifying the Canadian public that carcinogenic substances had been found in a dozen brands of fruit juice, including Bright's, Martins, A&P, Dominion, IGA, Food City, Cavalier, Timothy's, Calbeck's, Pantry Shelf, Sunshine and Libby's Pineapple Juice.

Canadians of all ages drink these juices. These juices are part of the basic diet of young infants.

Mr. Speaker, why did the minister risk the lives of Canadians by waiting for nine days before notifying consumers?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, precisely because we care about the health of Canadians, we conducted a serious investigation and waited for the results. The company removed its product and a press release was issued to that effect.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I see several Conservative members smiling, but this is an extremely serious subject and I wonder if they gave this juice to their children.

[English]

Does the minister realize, and is he conscious that these reconstituted juices contain 40 times the acceptable level of cancer-causing chemicals?

This morning an article in The Ottawa Sun states: "Health and Welfare Canada and Sun D'Or both knew about the contamination when production was halted on February 7 but it was not announced to the public until last February 16".

Furthermore, the Health Protection Branch did not believe that the risk was great enough for a public announcement, said a Health and Welfare spokesman. "We reserve the public announcement for when a situation is life-threatening."

I would like to ask the minister, is this how the ministry addresses food consumption? Is this their response to consumers, senior citizens, young children and babies? Is this a sense of responsibility, waiting nine days, knowing that a product contained cancer-causing agents?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has put his question.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, again, we are concerned about the quality of life of Canadians and about consumers having a quality product, and that is why we shall continue to monitor the quality of this product. We intend to ensure that existing measures can remedy the situation and that this will never happen again. Before a press release could be issued, a serious study was necessary to prove the product could have serious consequences. The company has acted responsibly, the product has been withdrawn, and we shall continue to monitor the quality of this product very carefully.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of the Environment on another issue where he seems to be completely out of touch with his provincial colleagues.

On December 21, Cameco Limited pleaded guilty to two charges under the Atomic Energy Control Act for dumping 440,000 gallons of contaminated mine water into Wollaston Lake. They were given the maximum penalty under that act, $5,000 each, which is half of what you get for smoking on Parliament Hill.

On February 8 the Government of Saskatchewan brought charges for which the maximum fine is $1 million. Now Cameco is challenging the Saskatchewan charges in court saying they do not have jurisdiction over the uranium mining industry.

Will the minister support the charges being brought by the Saskatchewan government, will he bring in his own charges, or will he finally agree to an inquiry to straighten out the mess that the uranium mining industry in this country is in?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the AECB examined the situation of Cameco. He also knows the AECB laid charges. He also knows that there were fines levied.

In respect to his specific question relating to a challenge in the courts, it is before the courts and that is where it will stay.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of the Environment. The Minister of the Environment has not shown that he even knows that an issue exists at Wollaston Lake. We have not heard at all whether he supports an inquiry into that situation where there are issues pertaining not only to the environment but to benefits to the local community and to the whole future of the uranium mining industry and how it relates to local communities.

Is the minister going to take action? Is he going to take a close look at what is happening, or is he going to be caught out to lunch on a Saskatchewan environment issue again like he was on Rafferty–Alameda?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member adds anything to a case which is serious when he gets personal.

Mr. de Jong: Why don't you sit down and let the Minister of the Environment answer. You have a conflict of interest.

Mr. Epp: Simon, get wired, and when you have the answer you can answer it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister could answer the question.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the AECB situation and Cameco at Wollaston Lake, I think the hon. member should recognize, as I thought he had earlier in earlier questions and conversations I have had with him, that this falls under the jurisdiction of the AECB for which responsibility is invested in this minister. The Minister of the Environment, his officials and officials of AECB have been in contact on this issue.

The hon. member and all viewers should understand that there is a regulatory process and it was that regulatory process which investigated and laid charges for which fines were paid. If there is a legal challenge in the courts, I think hon. members and you, Mr. Speaker, know that there is a right to follow the judicial course of action. The case is there and I do not think I can make any comments about it.

ETHIOPIA

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On Friday of last week I was asking about the worsening crisis situation in Ethiopia. The minister responded by mentioning that at least one ship had been diverted to Port Sudan. The minister will know that last week his colleague, the Minister for External Relations, referred to the threatened famine situation because of the deterioration in Ethiopia to at least two million people.

In view of the fact that the government of Ethiopia had agreed to some safe corridors that could be manned by the churches for the distribution of relief, and those safe corridors are now totally unusable because of increased rebel activity, can the minister assure us of two things? First of all, since we do provide assistance to all sides, that we can use our efforts to try to open up those international relief corridors again. They are essential to saving the lives of at least two million people.

Second, since former Presidents Jimmy Carter and Julius Nyerere have been chairing some peace negotiations, will the minister contact in particular former President Carter to see if we can have some acceleration of those peace talks? Without peace there can never be a hope of overcoming the famine situation in Ethiopia.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a tragedy that is getting worse for reasons to which the hon. member has referred. We are working with the United Nations, with other countries that are involved and with NGOs to try to open corridors that can stay open to try to bring relief to trapped people. We are also seeking to identify alternative routes. I think the realistic conclusion is that unless there is a ceasefire or some agreements to suspend hostilities, all of this will be in vain. We are nonetheless working vigorously with others who are concerned to try to achieve some means of getting food to entrapped people.

I have signed a letter today to former President Carter offering Canada's full and continuing support and, indeed, suggesting some actions that might be helpful for us to take if the peace negotiation succeeds in the hope that perhaps the prospect of that action may strengthen the hand of former President Carter and President Nyerere.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I have just returned from Clyde River in my constituency where I bought some groceries. A dozen apples cost over $8, a dozen eggs cost $5, a five-pound bag of potatoes cost over $9 and the average income is $10,000.

The Minister of Finance wants to limit that northern purchasing power by putting a 7 per cent goods and services tax on almost everything my constituents need for good nutritional value. How can the minister—

An hon. member: Not eggs.

Mr. Anawak: The hon. member says "not eggs".

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member and others would allow the hon. member who has been given the floor the right to ask the question, keeping in mind the time, the minister could respond.

Mr. Anawak: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I must advise members that when you limit the purchasing power for other goods, people will not be able to buy as many groceries. I should inform the hon. member.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance to justify his claim that the north will be better off with the goods and services tax. Where are the studies he said in October he had to back up his claim? Will the minister reassure northern parents and families by recognizing the higher cost of living and exempting northerners who are already paying $4.29 for one litre of milk from this unfair tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would like to acknowledge to the House that apples, eggs and potatoes are not subject to the GST.

An hon. member: Transportation is.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member over here said that transportation is subject to the GST. That is wrong. Any tax on transportation is credited out so that there is no tax on transportation as part of the cost of food.

I think it is very important for the hon. member to understand that. I think that all in this House understand the level of the price of food and other commodities in the north but that looks at only one part of the impact of the GST. The GST is very positive for the industries of the north, particularly the mining and the oil and gas industries. Those industries will receive credits on all the taxes they pay. It will make them more competitive. It will allow for mines that might otherwise be closed to stay open for a longer period of time and that will provide employment. That will provide the wherewithal for northerners to pay for the goods that my colleague has referred to. So I caution him not to be too narrow in his analysis of the impact of the GST.

POINT OF ORDER

BUDGET STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. There have been discussions among the parties and I seek your indulgence to put the following motion, which I hope will be adopted without debate. Therefore, I move:

> That, notwithstanding any Standing Order or special order of this House, at 4.30 o'clock p.m. on Tuesday, February 20, 1990, the Speaker shall interrupt any proceedings then before the House, and such proceedings shall be deemed forthwith adjourned, and the House shall proceed forthwith to the consideration of Ways and Means Proceedings No. 13, for the purpose of the budget statement of the Minister of Finance.

That, immediately following such budget statement, the Speaker shall recognize a member of the Official Opposition in debate on Ways and Means Proceedings No. 13; and

That the House shall not adjourn until the adjournment of the debate by the above-cited member of the Official Opposition on Ways and Means Proceedings No. 13, following which the Speaker shall adjourn the House until the usual time of meeting the next sitting day.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, just to seek clarification, is the hon. House Leader for the Government seeking unanimous consent at this time to present this motion?

As members are well aware, we have been very concerned about what is happening in the finance committee regarding the goods and services tax and the fact that the government is not even entertaining a motion to travel. At this time I am afraid I have to say to my hon. friend, the House Leader for the government that I am unable to give unanimous consent.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I understand there have been some discussions among the parties. I presented you with a letter to give notice that I wish to raise—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can save the hon. member some time. The hon. member is absolutely correct. He has filed an application, as he is explaining, for an emergency debate. I think under the circumstances the Speaker is required to proceed with Routine Proceedings.

It may well be that I will have a chance in a few minutes to hear the hon. member further.

NATIONAL HERITAGE DAY

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-288, an act respecting National Heritage Day.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I rise today on this third Monday of February, which is National Heritage Day in this country today, to present a private members, bill which would, if passed, have the support of our colleagues in the Liberal party and the governing party to pass this bill which would make the third Monday of every February National Heritage Day.

This day, known to members in our caucus as Stanley Knowles day, is known by many others as a day to develop and encourage the cultural heritage of this country. While we are a young country, it is important that we start early in understanding what makes up our country.

I hope in the debate we will have the support of all parties and have this bill passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

FINANCE—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville) moved that the first report of the Standing Committee on Finance presented to the House on Thursday, June 22, 1989, be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to spend a few moments this afternoon moving concurrence in the finance committee report. You will recall that last June 19 the finance committee issued a unanimous report chastising the Governor of the Bank of Canada for its high interest rate policy and for its tight money policy. The bank rate at that time was lower than the rate today.

I say that the time has surely come when this House must speak in a firm, solid and unified way by saying enough is enough. Interest rates in this country are now much too high. Interest rates are hurting the ordinary Canadian citizen and it is about time we brought them down and brought them down now.

I appeal to the government back-benchers. I appeal to the government ministers across the way that they take the lead from the finance committee and say to the Minister of Finance, with a budget coming down tomorrow, that the bank rate in this country is much too high and it is hurting ordinary Canadian citizens.

In the last three weeks we have seen a jump in the bank rate in this country of one full per centage point. I suggest that the interest rates in this country now are out of control. The Bank of Canada has lost any meaningful control it had on monetary policy in the country. Instead, monetary policy is now being controlled by the international investors and exchange markets around the world.

Going back a few weeks to January 18, the Bank of Canada dropped the interest rate by 29 basis points. It went down to 12.14 per cent. A lot of people were optimistic, saying that the bank rate in this country would be going down. Perhaps it was a signal of positive things to come in the economy and perhaps we were getting back to a more sane monetary policy once again.

That optimism was short-lived. One week later on January 25, the bank rate jumped by some 15 basis points. Another week later on February 1, it took another jump of 30 basis points to 12.59 per cent. On February 8, it jumped again to 12.79, an increase of some 20 basis points. Then last week, in a skyrocketing of the bank rate, it went up by 53 basis points, a full one half per cent.

I think that is shameful coming from a government that pretends to be responsible when it comes to the economic and monetary affairs of Canada. Now the bank rate is sitting at 13.32 per cent, the highest level it has been since the early 1980s when this country was in the depth of a great recession that was, in many ways, a depression to many parts of the country and many, many Canadians.

I appeal to the government and to colleagues across the way to concur in the finance committee report that calls upon the Governor of the Bank of Canada to stop intervening in the market-place to push up the bank rate and, indeed, do whatever he can to bring down bank rates immediately so it helps each and every Canadian from coast to coast.

I wonder if the Minister of Finance realizes what high interest rates are doing to ordinary Canadians. I ask the Minister of Finance: When is enough going to be enough? How much higher do those interest rates have to go in terms of the farmers, fishermen, homeowners and small business people before he is finally going to come to his senses and bring down interest rates?

I remember the budget almost a year ago on April 26 when the minister stood in his place and predicted that by 1990 the bank rate would be 10 per cent. Mr. Speaker, do you believe that? He was predicting a 10 per cent bank rate last year for the spring of 1990. Instead of 10 per cent, it is over 13 per cent.

What does it mean to the ordinary citizen? I will give a couple of examples. If a person has an $80,000 mortgage and the mortgage rates go up by 3 per cent, 3 per cent on $80,000 is $2,400 a year or $200 a month for a person with an $80,000 mortgage. A high interest rate policy to ordinary Canadians is a tax increase. It is a tax increase for ordinary people who have to renew their mortgages.

Just today I talked to a couple of people who have to renew their mortgages in the next few months. An $80,000 mortgage with a 3 per cent increase will mean an extra $200 a month for someone in that position, or $2,400 a year or almost $10,000 over four years, if they sign a four year term. I say that is shameful. I say that enough is enough. It is about time the government came to its senses and rolled back interest rates in this country.

An hon. member: Right on.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I wonder why government back-benchers across the way are quiet and why they are not getting up and saying to the Minister of Finance in Question Period, in statements and speeches in this House that they were elected to run a fiscally responsible government back in 1984.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I wonder how the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Saint-Julien) can sit calmly on the government backbenches and watch the Minister of Finance who, just like Mr. MacEachen, is stuck with his policy of interest rates that are too high. Why does he keep silent? Why does he let himself be manipulated by the Minister of Finance and Mr. John Crow, the Governor of the Bank of Canada? Why is he keeping quiet?

Mr. Speaker, it is time to act, and enough is enough! It is time to act now!

• (1520)

Interest rates are at about the same level now—

Mr. Saint-Julien: You never came to Abitibi! We never saw you in Abitibi!

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I have not been to Abitibi, but I have travelled a great deal in the province of Quebec. I know that Quebecers are hit just as hard by interest rates as people in western Canada, and I am sure that his constituents will agree.

Mr. Speaker, why do we have these sheep on the government side, from the province of Quebec, from Alberta, from all over Canada, who support and who are afraid to say anything in public against this government's monetary policy, and the monetary policy of John Crow, Governor of the Bank of Canada, although that policy is hitting average Canadians very hard?

Take, for instance, a farmer in Quebec or a producer in my own province, in Saskatchewan, who are now facing a bank rate of 13.32 per cent! Mr. Speaker, it is going to be very hard for farmers in my area and yours.

Mr. Speaker, this is the Parliament of Canada. Why are Conservative members keeping quiet? Why are they afraid to speak publicly, openly and strongly against this monetary policy that is dangerous to the country and dangerous for Canadian voters? Why, Mr. Speaker?

I hope that in a few minutes, the hon. member for Abitibi and perhaps others with him, will speak to this matter. I hope the answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

It affects ordinary Canadians in a very negative way. Someone might buy a car and borrow about $12,000. When the bank rate goes up by 3 points, the cost of borrowing that money goes up by 3 per cent. That is an extra $360 a year or $30 a month. I think of farmers in Saskatchewan or anywhere else in the country as Farm Credit Corporation loan rates will surely be going up very shortly or other money they must borrow to keep their farm operations going. Once again, where is the Conservative party when it comes to farmers in terms of protecting them from the vagaries of the international market-place?

I cannot understand why the Minister of Finance is sitting by idly, watching the interest rates go up and up to a level where they are now 5 per cent higher in our country than they are in the United States. Their inflation rate is around the same level as ours. In fact, there are seven or eight industrialized countries that have an inflation rate as high or higher than ours and have a bank rate that is lower than ours. Explain to me why our inflation rate can be about the same level as the American inflation rate and yet our bank rate now is over 500 basis points, or 5 per cent, higher than the bank rate in the United States. I believe the historical high was about 6 per cent in terms of the GATT. We are almost at that historical high today.

We have a government elected back in 1984 that criticized the previous government for high interest rate policies and yet we have history repeating itself with Mr. Wilson compared to Mr. MacEachen back in early 1981. I say that is not good enough from the Government of Canada.

What does he do to the country? A high interest rate policy in this country will drive the country into a recession. Already we have friends of the government such as Mr. Peters from the Toronto-Dominion Bank, for example, saying that the possibility of a recession is very great. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association's chief economist said last Thursday that the possibility of a recession now is very real. These are friends of the government. They are all warning the Minister of Finance and the government that the chance of a recession in this country is very real and that if we do not change monetary policy then it becomes even more likely that we will have a recession in 1990.

What does it do to debt? I remember over the years the Conservative party used to say: "Look, elect us and we will bring down the deficit. Elect us and we will bring down the debt in this country because the deficit and the debt are too high." Yet, what has happened since 1984? Exactly the opposite has happened. Back in 1984 the national debt was $170 billion. Now in 1990, we will see in the budget papers tomorrow night that the national debt is around $354 billion. In five and a half short years the Conservative Party of Canada has more than doubled the national debt of Canada. With one Minister of Finance, it has run up the national debt by some $180 billion extra. In the first 117 years of Confederation our national debt was $170 billion and in five and a half short years an extra $180 billion has been added so that the national debt is now about $350 billion.

An hon. member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Across the way, one of the ministers is saying it is all in interest. That is what this debate is about, that interest rates are too high, that the cost of servicing the debt is too high and that every time the Bank of Canada increases the bank rate by one per centage point, the government has to spend a few billion dollars paying off the services on the debt of $350 billion. In fact, in the Minister of Finance's budget tomorrow night, we can expect an item of around $40 billion to pay the service charge or interest on the national debt, $40 billion.

The people of Canada now spend more money paying interest on the national debt than they do on old age pensions, family allowances and hospitalization and medical care. Why is the Conservative party doing it? It has done more in five and a half years to increase the national debt than all the other governments before them in the past 117 years.

Those are the facts and there is no denying those facts. They will be stated very clearly in the budget that comes down tomorrow.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: They are laughing across the way but in 117 years of history the national debt was about $170 billion. In the last five and a half years it went up by about $180 billion. That means that it costs about 30 cents on the dollar when someone is paying taxes to pay off the interest of the national debt.

We care about the deficit, Mr. Speaker. What we are saying today to the government is that if it cares about the deficit it will concur in the finance committee's report and ask John Crow to do what he can to bring down interest rates in Canada.

If the minister across the way from Toronto cares about the deficit, he would be up on his feet saying the same thing that I am saying, that the interest rates in the country are too high and let us bring down the bank rate so we can bring down the debt service charges to the Government of Canada and to the provincial and municipal governments.

Mr. Andre: You want us to spend more and more.

[Translation]

An hon. member: What is the inflation rate?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the minister is talking about the rate of inflation. This year, inflation is now at 5.5 per cent, more or less the same level as in the United States. There is a 5 per cent spread between our bank rate and the U.S. bank rate, however, although we have the same rate of inflation. How come, Mr. Speaker? We have practically the same rate of inflation, but the spread between our bank rate and that in the United States is 5 per cent. The problem is not inflation, because the rate in Canada is about the same as the inflation rate in other industrialized countries. The problem is the bank rate.

[English]

I do not believe that the government really knows or understands that a high interest rate policy is going to throw people out of work. It increases the cost of housing. In fact, I have a clipping here from Ottawa's The Sun quoting the former president of the Canadian Homebuilders' Association, Mr. Tom Cochren as saying: "Each 1 per cent rise in interest rates knocks 100,000 potential first-time home buyers off the market".

Every time the bank rate goes up by 1 per cent and mortgage rates follow by going up 1 per cent, about 100,000 potential first-time home buyers are knocked out of the market.

• (1530)

How many will be thrown out of work if 100,000 people who were going to buy homes are no longer in a position to afford to buy them?

Construction workers are thrown out of business. We have furniture makers thrown out of business. We have metal workers thrown out of business. We have all kinds of people thrown out of business. Maybe even the odd lawyer here and there is thrown out of business. That is what happens when the economy slows right down. It slows right down to a halt.

What we have is a government induced recession. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have intentionally increased interest rates in this country, have intentionally cut back on corporate taxes and have intentionally cut back on taxes for their wealthy friends because they wanted more investment. The price of desire for more investment now is a high bank rate, high interest rate, higher unemployment, a greater national debt, and a deficit that is basically out of control.

It is time to tell the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada to let us concur in the report of the finance committee and say the time has come to lower interest rates. Let us do it now. Let us do it in a solid united way.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in the approach taken here. I know that farmers, house builders, consumers, workers, and even the cost of living all suffer under high interest rates. I just wonder if the member would give us any indication of who really profits from high interest rates. Who are the people or the groups that really profit from high interest rates? If it is not the government, the country, and a very few citizens, who does?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, a few wealthy Canadians with a lot of savings would profit from high interest rates, but the overwhelming majority of the citizens of the country do not. Those who benefit from high interest rates are some of the big financial institutions which can make all kinds of money on foreign exchange markets. Big corporations often do not suffer from high interest rates because they reinvest, retain earnings, or can go offshore and borrow money at a lower rate than can than the ordinary citizen. Only some of the wealthy people in this country can benefit.

The people who do not benefit are the farmers, the ordinary citizens of this country, people trying to build a house, raise a family, or buy a car. Those are the people who suffer because of the high interest rate policy in Canada.

About a week ago the Prime Minister made a prediction that interest rates would be lower by the end of 1990. We should be telling the Prime Minister today, the day before presentation of the budget, to ensure that we take action to bring down interest rates quickly because the only people who benefit from high interest rates are the extremely wealthy: the Conrad Blacks, the Bronfmans and people like them who are friends of the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. member for the NDP. We all know that in 1984, we received a legacy from the Liberal party. The deplorable state of affairs we see today is mainly due to the previous Liberal government's administration. We in the Progressive Conservative party have been in power for five years and have tried all possible means to correct the situation in Canada. I may remind the hon. member that the Minister of Finance has worked very hard to reduce the debt. In 1981-82, under the Hon. Allan MacEachen, the budget deficit accounted for 21.7 per cent of federal expenditures; in 1984-85, under the Hon. Marc Lalonde, the proportion was 35.1 per cent. In other words, when the Minister of Finance was appointed in 1984, the 1985–86 budget deficit took up 30.9 per cent of federal expenditures, and since then, it has amounted to 26.3, 22.4, 21.6, and 21.3 per cent this year. So much for the budget deficit. That was my first question.

My second question is this: I would like to know what the New Democratic Party did in 1983–84 to stop the hemorrhaging from the $1.9 billion hole in the budget as a result of the scandal, the theft of the century that the Liberals "programmed" for scientific research, a problem you are familiar with. I would like to know your position what the NDP did. Did you ask for a royal inquiry on the theft of the century, on this scandal?

Mr. Nystrom: First of all, Mr. Speaker, to answer the second question, we asked questions in the House. We talked about the situation and we helped the Conservative party beat the Liberal party across Canada.

As for the first question, the hon. member for Abitibi referred to a situation we had five and a half years ago when the Liberal party was in power. For the past five and a half years, his party has formed the government, and it has had a lot of time to do something positive. History repeats itself. We had a Conservative government in the 30s, when we had the Great Depression here in Canada. Five and a half years ago, the national debt was $170 billion, and it has now more than doubled.

I remember clearly when Mr. MacEachen brought down his budget in 1981; his policy was very similar to that followed by the Minister of Finance today. He said we had a problem with inflation, that we had a problem with the deficit, that we had to raise the bank rate, and after he did that, we had a big recession here in Canada. The Conservative Minister of Finance is taking exactly the same position as Mr. MacEachen, eight years later. Exactly the same!

Mr. Speaker, the figures do not lie. Five years ago, the national debt was $170 billion. Today, five and a half years later, the national debt has more than doubled, rising to $350 billion. It took only five and a half years for the Conservative party to add $180 billion to the national debt. It took the governments that preceded this one 117 years to accumulate a national debt of $170 billion. And now we have a Minister of Finance and a Prime Minister who have given us a debt more than twice that in just five and a half years. A record and a disaster! I am sure the hon. member for Abitibi is not proud at all of this record.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate today on the subject of interest rates here in Canada, especially on the report to the House by the Finance Committee on April 14, 1989.

[English]

The important point to make first is that the report we are discussing is not an opposition report. It is not a report of the Liberal Party or the New Democratic Party. It is a report of the finance committee of the House of Commons. Not only that, it is an unanimous report.

With all due respect to some members opposite who have made some very critical remarks about the recommendation that this report be adopted, I suggest to them that what they have first and foremost on their hands is a problem to be resolved within their own caucus. I suggest to them that if they are unwilling to support this recommendation, if the Minister of Finance is content to toss it aside, why do they not remove all their members from the finance committee?

Why not see if they can find within their caucus as honest a man as the current chairman and replace him with somebody who will follow their line on interest rates? This is an all–party, unanimous report of the finance committee of the House of Commons, recommending that monetary policy in Canada be relaxed and that the rate of interest be reduced.

It is very interesting. I was refreshing my memory by looking at the report a few moments ago. It comments in the introduction that at the time of writing the bank rate was nearly 400 basis points above rates prevailing in early 1988 and at its highest level in five years. In the introductory paragraph it also observes: "The surge in interest rates was particularly sharp in the four–month period between end of November 1988 to the end of March, 1989, when rates jumped nearly two full per centage points".

If I am not mistaken we had a general election in this country on November 21, 1988. Does it not strike one as being somewhat odd that starting the end of November 1988, just after the general election, until the end of March, 1989, rates jumped that high, that sharply? I suppose it could be argued that right after the election Canadians went on a spending binge and a credit binge and that all of a sudden the Governor of the Bank of Canada discovered there was rampaging inflation and that "we had better wrestle it to the ground and we had better do it right now".

It strikes me as being just a little odd that none of this was foreseeable during those weeks of campaigning across the country when the Minister of Finance was happy to tell everyone that things were just great. Then, as soon as the election had been won, interest rates surged upward. That was not the end of the surge. They have continued to surge from 8.63 per cent in January, 1988, to a little over 12.5 per cent when this report of the finance committee was issued. On February 15 they were at 13.32 per cent.

Another aspect that is very concerning to all of us is the difference between the Canadian rate and the U.S. rate. In April when the finance committee issued its report and was concerned we had a spread of 2.75 per cent. It expressed its concern that it was historically very high. As I stand here today, we are looking at a spread of over 5 per cent between Canadian and U.S. rates.

Mr. McDermid: Short term.

Mr. Manley: Over 5 per cent on short-term rates, as the Minister of Privatization is anxious to point out, which of course is where the Canadian government has been borrowing most of its money.

What is the economic policy of the government? That is what my constituents wonder when they call and ask about what is happening. They ask why the government is not doing something about high interest rates. It does affect them. It does affect ordinary Canadians who are buying houses or cars or renewing their mortgages. It does affect Canadians who have farms and those who have small businesses. They are concerned about these rates. They wonder why the government is not doing something about high interest rates.

Imagine the difficulty I have explaining to them that the government does not consider high interest rates to be a problem. The government considers high interest rates to be the medicine to solve the problem. This is very hard to convey to people who are having trouble figuring out how to meet their payments on their houses or how to stay in business.

The economic policy of the government is not to enhance the possibility of Canadians creating wealth and creating jobs. The economic policies of this government are not directed to encourage entrepreneuism or to encourage people to go out and invest and do new things. The policies of this government are not intended to help small business. The policies of this government are not intended to encourage research and development.

This government has two policy objectives in the economic sphere: first, it is fixated on the deficit and thinks it wants to reduce it or says it wants to reduce it. Second, its monetary policy demonstrates that it has a fixation on inflation and it wants to eliminate it.

I do not think anyone would quarrel with the idea that we should have lower deficits. We do not want inflation, but I think it is legitimate to ask whether or not there are some other policy objectives the Government of Canada ought to make priority in dealing with the important economic problems facing us.

Why is it that the government has decided inflation should eliminate concerns about employment from the economic agenda? Why is it that the deficit has taken control of all aspects of government policy? At a time when we need economic growth in Canada, when we need to address the problems that we have in regions like the Atlantic, the prairies, the north, and at times when we have to deal with high unemployment, sometimes we have to readjust the economic priorities as we see them.

We have had some seven years of sustained economic growth which began in 1982. We have a government that was twice elected to reduce the deficit. By the time of the next election, three-quarters of the national debt will have been accumulated by government elected on a mandate of reducing the deficit.

When we look at the financial statements the government will present to us tomorrow, we know roughly what the figures are going to be. We see the problem in the annual deficit is not so much the level of the debt. Although it is huge and it is a problem, the difficulty is in the level of interest rates.

The biggest borrower in Canada, the entity that is absorbing so much of the debt, is the Government of Canada. As we raise these interest rates a point here and a point there, from 8.63 per cent in January, 1988, to more than 13.25 per cent now, we see the deficit gets out of control. Not only that, these monetary policies are going to cause a major recession in Canada with the result being higher unemployment, greater demand on our social benefits, lower tax revenue, and higher deficits.

Each 1 per cent increase in interest rates increases the annual deficit in Canada by $1.6 billion and therefore adds, year after year as that amount is added to the total debt, to the burden that all Canadians are going to bear in the future.

The result of this monetary policy that is being pursued by the government at the present time is first of all recession. It is higher unemployment. It is a higher deficit, and it is a higher Canadian dollar in terms of international currencies. This in itself has a negative impact on our exporters and makes it more difficult for them to sell into foreign markets.

When we look at the strange coincidence of interest rates rising immediately after the election campaign, we also have to think back to those days of October, 1987, when the government opposite was signing the free trade agreement with the United States. At that time the Canadian dollar was trading at about 76 cents U.S. They entered into an agreement to eliminate tariffs between Canada and the United States. Last spring when the agreement was being implemented, the Canadian dollar was trading about 10 cents higher or at 86 cents. It is now down around 83 cents.

The entire benefit to Canadian exporters of trading into that larger United States market without tariffs was eliminated and frustrated by an exchange rate that had totally eclipsed the value of the tariffs that were being eliminated. What a strange coincidence that these things happened all at the same time.

It has to be of concern to all Canadians that this government seems to continue along with a policy of bankruptcy. Other than its fixation on inflation and deficits, what else is it thinking about? How else is it addressing the problems of inflation? Where is the inflation? Down in Toronto? Is it in the highly charged economy of southern Ontario as the finance committee was told?

Why can this government not get its mind on policy initiatives that would address inflation where it exists, regionally and sectorally? Why is it that in its unwillingness to act it has cast the entire burden of fighting inflation on to the Bank of Canada which has to use the one tool at its disposal, the interest rate policy and the monetary policy, to fight a problem that is at best regional and sectoral? It is a policy of bankruptcy on the part of the government.

Then of course there is the ineptitude that has been demonstrated in recent weeks in the area of monetary policy. First, we had a sudden reduction in interest rates by the Bank of Canada. The bank is known to have many fine technical economists, but their reduction of interest rates was rapidly reversed a week later after the Canadian dollar took a fall.

Where, I ask, was the Bank of Canada when it should have been indicating clearly, signalling to the market that its reduction was intended to be a technical adjustment? Where are the market economists within the bank, the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance, to calm the concerns of the markets when adjustments occur?

I suggest that whether we agree or disagree with the policy of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, he has until this recent move always demonstrated competence in administering the policy option he had chosen. I think the mistake that was made was very damaging to Canada and to the flexibility of the country in exercising further monetary policy.

That damage was only made worse by the Prime Minister of Canada who was willing to say in an interview that after the federal budget on February 20 interest rates were to come down. Now we really wonder who is making up the monetary policy of Canada. Is it the Governor of the Bank of Canada? Is it the Minister of Finance? Is it the Prime Minister? Do they talk to each other? We know that by statute the Governor and the Minister of Finance have to meet regularly. What about the Prime Minister? When is he to learn that glib promises like that have an effect on our currency?

What does the bank have to do? First, it had to compensate for its own failure to signal to the market what a reduction in rates meant. Then it had to turn around and compensate for the Prime Minister's own incompetence in making a statement in public. The Minister of Finance then had to stand in this House and correct it by covering up for a Prime Minister who should learn how the markets function.

In addition to his ineptitude in making comments on what interest rates are likely to do, one is forced to wonder where the Prime Minister gets the idea that even if the Minister of Finance could reduce the deficit that interest rates would come down. The Governor of the Bank of Canada was asked that specific question when he appeared before the finance committee. He said that there was no guarantee the deficit being reduced would lower interest rates. That has nothing to do with it.

The United Kingdom has a surplus budget and it has interest rates that are higher than those of Canada. The problem is not one of deficits per se. The problem is the Tory philosophy: "We don't care about recessions and unemployment. We care only about one thing. Our blinders are fixated and we are going to wrestle inflation to the ground. That is the problem that we want to fight." The fact that that happens to benefit lenders and hurt borrowers is incidental.

The facts speak to themselves. In Canada we are facing a real interest rate significantly higher than those we have known for many years. It is a real rate as opposed to the nominal rate that we must be considering, the difference between that rate and the rate of inflation. We are looking at a spread between Canada and U.S. rates that is driving an artificially high currency exchange rate.

We need a government with some policy initiatives. It has to be willing to take some ideas other than those of the current Minister of Finance which will approach the real and definite problems in Canada.

One suggestion came forward from the House of Commons finance committee. Again I say that it is a committee composed of a majority of members from the other side, chaired by the member for Mississauga South, a man I know all ministers on the opposite side respect and admire greatly. He is one who speaks his mind, yet they sit in intransigence and say that they will not listen. If they tear up this report and are unwilling to apply its simple principles that interest rates need to come down in Canada, let them do what they should and eliminate from that committee all members who signed and agreed to this report and replace them with the kinds of sycophants they need if they want to bring about the policies they seem intent on following.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa South (Mr. Manley) for his comments.

On rereading the first report of the Finance Committee—a unanimous report, as he said, tabled by members on both sides of the House—I wondered whether he could tell us if the government's tight money policy, which has greatly slowed the growth of total demand in our Canadian economy, is not, in his opinion, leading us to a possible recession in the next few weeks or months.

Would he share his opinions on that with the House: Does he agree with me that we are now on a dangerous course and will have a very serious recession in Canada if we continue with this over-all restrictive policy?

• (1600)

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the views of the hon. member. The problem of high interest rates is not only related to the demand for credit; we must also ensure that in all regions of Canada, small and medium-sized businesses have enough credit to grow.

[English]

In other words, we do not have a highly unified economic situation in Canada. We have five or six major metropolitan areas in very diverse regions of the country facing very different economic circumstances.

We have the problems and concerns of homeowners, not only those attempting to acquire homes but those whose mortgages are due to be renewed. We have the cyclical problems of farmers and businessmen who need to meet the demands for credit that the cycle their farms or businesses go through generates.

The difficulty the Bank of Canada has when it is forced to respond, as the only instrument to fight inflation, is that its monetary policy necessarily applies across Canada. We have one currency and we have one central bank. So the bankruptcy policy that exists in this government that leads the Bank of Canada to use a high interest rate policy thereby restricting the credit available to farmers, to small business, and to people in regions where inflation is not a problem but credit is needed to go through cycles is a crucial one.

By failing to seek out the root causes of inflation and to develop other policies to address those inflationary pressures, and using the blunt instrument of interest rates, the answer to the question put by the hon. member for Ottawa–Vanier is quite clear. We may be in a recession now. Certainly, business confidence is at an all-time low. However, the need to respond to the crisis that is developing is clear and the government has tied its hands and eliminated its ability to respond in any kind of positive and creative way.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I will pose one question to the hon. member. I happen to have The Economist magazine here. He reminded me of an article in The Economist three or four issues ago which looked at expected corporate profits for the leading western industrialized nations and predicted that for 1990 the corporate profits in Canada would rise higher than in any other nation, followed by Australia and so on.

How does he reconcile that prediction by The Economist, which I think the hon. member would agree is a reputable magazine as are the economists who put that prediction together, with the statement he just made—which he pulled out of thin air I am sure—that confidence is at an all-time low, if in fact the outside world is looking at Canada and saying that we are going to do better than anybody else in terms of corporate profits? Admittedly, that is only one measure of economic growth, but a significant one, I am sure the member will agree.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I must say that I have not seen the edition of The Economist to which the minister is referring, but I have seen the report of the Conference Board of Canada on the effects that the implementation of the goods and services tax will have on the Canadian economy.

One of the predictions that the Conference Board made is that corporate profits would rise in 1990–91 by $6 billion a year. I have asked the Minister of Finance this question repeatedly and he has refused to answer. He will not answer frankly to the people of Canada on this point.

The move from the manufacturer's sales tax to the goods and services tax means that the entire consumption tax imposed at the corporate level will be passed on to consumers. That is the design of the goods and services tax. That is why the government likes it. The manufacturers' sales tax is no more passed on to consumers than the corporate income tax.

Mr. Andre: What?

Mr. Manley: It is not passed on any more than the corporate income tax. It may be absorbed in prices, it may also be absorbed in profits.

Mr. Andre: Oh come on.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, the Tories do not like to hear this. I do not think they understand corporate finance over there. They certainly do not like to tell the people of Canada what it means. The corporate income tax is partly passed on to consumers in prices. It is also absorbed in lower profits. It can also be absorbed in other ways by, for example, lower wages. The manufacturers' sales tax absorbed at the corporate level is no different in its effect than the corporate income tax.

With the goods and services tax the entire tax is absorbed at the consumer level rather than being partly absorbed at the corporate level as is the case with the manufacturers' sales tax. The Minister of Finance, in his speech in introducing Bill C-62 at second reading, said that the manufacturers' sales tax on business inputs amounts to about $9 billion a year. I leave it to the Minister of Finance to stand in this House and deny that that is the case. It is a $9 billion corporate tax reduction and that, Mr. Speaker, is why corporations in Canada are going to be so much more profitable without any increase in economic activity in 1990.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38, I must inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: the hon. member for St. Boniface—Education.

[English]

Resuming debate with the hon. Minister for Privatization.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the debate this afternoon, to both my friend from Saskatchewan and my friend from Ottawa South, and I found their comments very interesting and informative.

The first comment I would like to make is on the committee system in the House of Commons. When the Liberals were in power the committees could not undertake any study or project at all unless the government gave its blessing.

When the Prime Minister announced that he wanted to change that to allow the committees to be masters of their own house, if you will, and to operate independently to study those subjects which they felt it necessary to study and to make their report, he said that the government probably would end up doing things that committees did not recommend. He also said at the time, I believe, that governments could end up with egg on their face from time to time.

That is fair ball. That has given the back-benchers in this House who actively participate in committee work an opportunity to participate in many studies and make reports that they heretofore have been unable to make.

Having said that, it is not incumbent upon the government to adhere to every recommendation that does come from committees. There are extenuating circumstances when governments have to make decisions that may not be along the lines of thinking of a parliamentary committee.

• (1610)

Such is the case at the present time with the report from the Standing Committee on Finance. The recommendations to relax the stance on monetary policy is one to which the government feels it cannot adhere at the present time. I want to remind those who were in the House between 1980 and 1984, and those who were not here and may not have experienced what we experienced at that time, that the government of the day ignored the inflationary pressures in this country. The government of the day decided to let inflation run, not pay any attention to it and try to keep interest rates down.

At that time inflation got up around 13 per cent, as I recall. The government then all of a sudden had to lay on the Canadian people some very, very heavy medicine, medicine that was bitter to take because interest rates rose to the 23 per cent range.

I listened to my hon. friends talk about mortgages and so on today. I had whole families come into my constituency office in Brampton, father, mother and children who had just walked away from their houses. They had walked out the doors and turned them over to the mortgage company, lock, stock and barrel.

Mr. Jordan: I know some farmers who are doing that.

Mr. McDermid: Farmers too, absolutely. Absolutely they had to do that.

Mr. Jordan: They are doing it now.

Mr. McDermid: They had to do that because they had to renew mortgages, which had been at 10 or 11 per cent, at 23 per cent and they just could not handle it.

That was all because a government ignored the inflationary pressures of a country. So when people say that inflation and these interest rates do not help the homeowner, the farmer or the small business person, that is not entirely accurate. The worst enemy that we can have in this country is inflation. For the wage earners, for those on fixed incomes and for those in small businesses high inflation is a killer.

We see today that inflationary pressures in this country are still there, there is no question about it. It is not a central Canada phenomenon as my friend from Ottawa South would have people believe. It is not a metro Toronto phenomenon as my friend from Ottawa South would have you believe. If you take a look at the inflation rates in January, you will see that they range from 4.8 per cent in Quebec to a high in Alberta at 6.5 per cent followed by Ontario and then British Columbia.

The inflationary pressures are there right across this country from coast-to coast: PEI at 5.1 per cent; New Brunswick at 5 per cent. The national average is 5.5 per cent. The pressures are still there. We need only take a look at the wage settlements that are being made to see that. We are very, very concerned because wage pressures have risen to worrying levels. Wage settlements are now averaging almost 6 per cent and have risen in most regions of the country. These are all inflationary pressures and when the dollar goes down, for every four cents it drops inflation rises 1 per cent. That is another inflationary pressure because we import 35 per cent of all we consume in this country. When the dollar goes down imports become expensive and the inflation rate goes up.

As one can see, it is a very fine balancing act that the Governor of the Bank of Canada has to do on a weekly basis. We cannot bring down interest rates artificially. If we did, it would do more damage to the economy and we would then have to do what the Liberal government did back in 1980, 1981, and 1982, and pour that heavy medicine on to slow down inflationary pressures. That is very obvious.

Actually, over the last year or year and a half interest rates have been relatively steady as have mortgage rates. I have followed these very closely over that period of time. However, as was alluded to in both speeches, in the last three or four weeks we have seen tremendous volatility in the market-place. When the Bank of Canada lowered interest rates the dollar dropped rather dramatically and there has been an increase in interest rates over the last three weeks. The market is very volatile causing nervousness in the market-place.

Inflation is increasing in Germany and in Japan at present and both countries have increased their interest rates to dampen inflationary pressures. We are not the only country in the G-7 following this path and keeping a very close eye on things. Among our competitors in the G-7 the average inflation is 3.9 per cent. We are still well above our major competitors in the G-7. We must get a hold on inflation and squeeze it out of the economy at all costs. It is most important. The ultimate objective, I believe, of any monetary policy is to have a stable price level. Only in this way can the value of money be preserved and not destroyed by inflation. I do not think anybody wants to see that. Even my friends in the opposition who tend to criticize understand that inflation is a very, very dangerous thing to have in an economy.

With the strong growth in demand in recent years inflation pressures and the inflation rate in Canada have increased. To remain competitive it is necessary to reduce that rate of inflation. We believe that this is accomplished by slowing the growth of demand in the economy to a rate that is consistent with the economy's capacity to produce goods and services. Canada was going at full tilt. We could not produce the goods and services required and because of that heated up demand prices increased. In the longer run this means constraining the growth in bank loans to a rate that is consistent with the growth of the economy's potential to produce. Despite the widespread view that monetary policy has been tight, bank loan demand has been growing at double digit rates. So it has not entirely slowed down, as some would have us believe.

My friend from Ottawa South says business confidence is at an all time low, but none of the reports show that. They do show a slowing down of the economy. However, the confidence of the business community is still very high in this country. As a matter of fact, records will show that there is going to be record investment this year, both by Canadian companies and by offshore.

I believe that we are on the right track. I do not think any of us like high interest rates. We would all like to see them much lower. We would also like to see inflation lower. That is what we are working on with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. That is the policy of the Government of Canada. We believe that we will be successful in wrestling this problem and getting interest rates and inflation down on a permanent basis. That is the goal of the government, with which I think everyone agrees.

This has been a great debate this afternoon. I have enjoyed it and I appreciate it very much. I think now, however, that we should get on with the business of the day so I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Earlier today the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk wrote to you asking for an emergency debate tonight. I wonder if you, Sir, could find out if members of the House would give unanimous consent to revert to applications pursuant to Standing Order 52, allowing you to make a decision on the requests you have received, at least the one from the member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will give the floor to the hon. member for Essex—Windsor on the same point of order. The government house leader will no doubt reply after.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I would like, if I could, to support the point which has been made, but to make as well the point that we earlier today communicated with the Speaker about the seriousness of this problem. We see the importance of an emergency debate. I hope that it would be possible to see unanimous consent on the part of the House to accept the need for such a debate at this stage.

Mr. Lewis: I am pleased on behalf of the government to grant our consent. I can assure the Chair that if Mr. Bradley, the Minister of the Environment for Ontario, were here he would refuse unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On the matter of unanimous consent, the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I heard the intervention by the government house leader, the Minister of Justice. I must say I did not understand the point he was making. I wonder if he could elaborate on his point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the two members to move their motions?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The first motion received by the Speaker is the motion from the member for Essex—Windsor.

S. O. 52

MOTIONS TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

HAGERSVILLE FIRE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have communicated with you today to indicate my intention to move under the provisions of Standing Order 52 a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent and pressing concern.

I will just note very briefly the key points that we see that justify this as perhaps one of the most legitimate emergency debate requests which has been brought before this House. They are the following:

First, for more than one week 15 million tires have been blazing out of control in the Hagersville area. This fire continues to produce undetermined quantities of highly toxic substances.

We see as well that the implications—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The member should read the letter that he sent to the Speaker. In no way should there be any attempt to debate the matter while the request is being made.

Mr. Langdon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was attempting to summarize it so that it could be somewhat shorter.

Let me continue with the significance of this matter as an emergency.

My second point is that the failure to quench this fire will result in substantial contamination of the land and water in the region, as well as the spread of airborne contaminants to outlying areas.

The long-term effects on plant and animal life are not yet known. Certainly, there are serious and substantiated concerns for the water table, the source of drinking water for a larger population base.

To date, as I indicated in the letter, the government has not responded—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will not entertain comments like that.

I will allow the member to complete his statement. The member is getting into debate, which is not the purpose of his request.

Mr. Langdon: I simply wish to make the point that the reason for an emergency debate includes the need to discuss the degree of response and the rapidity of response which has come from the government with reference to what is clearly an urgent issue.

For this reason I submit that an emergency debate is required to provide adequate discussion of the hazards posed and the options available to government and the public in the face of such an emergency.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I too communicated a letter to you under Standing Order 52. I will be brief.

As you know, I have been an evacuee. I have been out to the site in the last week to look at the situation. I requested this debate because of the seriousness of the situation there.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, there is an impending environmental disaster in my riding.

I strongly feel that there is a need for an emergency debate to determine the role of the federal government in this crisis situation. It is important to determine why the federal government has not acted to date, and what it is going to do about this catastrophe.

This calamity has been full of misinformation, created not just by certain media reports. It is now being known as the worst environmental disaster in North America.

The people of Canada need to know the facts. Is Environment Canada able to handle such disasters? Is everything possible being done to protect the people, livestock, and the environment in the Hagersville area due to these tires which are burning out of control?

I feel that it is imperative that Parliament immediately debate this issue and resolve the uncertainty regarding this disaster.

My remarks have set out the contents of the letter I sent to you, Mr. Speaker. I hope you will rule in our favour.

The people of Haldimand—Norfolk and, indeed, the people in all of Canada need to know what this government is prepared to do in this area.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair received earlier today notices under Standing Order 52, one from the member for Essex—Windsor and shortly thereafter one from the member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

• (1710)

The Chair has considered what is a most important and serious matter which concerns the Chair and, in particular, the Deputy Speaker since in my constituency we have the same type of problem that could occur.

However, after having considered the matter very carefully I do not believe that at this time it meets the requirements of the Standing Order.

I must thank the members for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. Again, as I have stressed, at this time I do not believe it meets the requirements of the Standing Order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I realize the point that the Chair is making and we certainly accept the point that in your estimation this matter does not qualify for an emergency debate.

However, after hearing the views put forward by my hon. friend I wonder if we could ask for unanimous consent to have a special debate later in the day on this emergency. While it does not meet the specifications of the Standing Order, if the members of the House of Commons unanimously agree that it proceed then perhaps we could do it that way.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend that this is a very important matter. I do not think we should get into a position of, in effect, not directly but indirectly overruling the Chair when the Chair considers the business before the country and before the House.

I think we should save the Liberal party any further embarrassment by not having this debate at this time.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I want to say this slowly. We are not embarrassed in any way, shape or form.

As a matter of fact we, the Liberals, represent an area which is at this time subject to a catastrophe. We asked for the debate and we would be happy to have it at any time.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-52, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance; and the amendment of Mr. Brewin (p. 8329).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the House last debated the bill there were four minutes left in the question and comment period on the speech of the hon. member for Kamloops. If there are members who wish to ask the House Leader for the New Democratic Party questions on his speech, they are welcome to do so at this time.

Since there are no questions, the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca on debate.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on this bill.

This bill falls into the same category as other legislation that this government has introduced that is of benefit to the rich with very little concern for middle-income earners or low-income earners.

Mr. Speaker, I want to refer you specifically to the opinion of one of the major newspapers in this country. It is an editorial in response to this bill which I think is appropriate.

I refer to an editorial in The Toronto Star of April 16, 1989, relative to the RRSP changes. The title of the editorial is: "RRSP changes benefit the wealthy". It states in part: "The distribution of income in Canada is highly unequal. In 1981 the 20 per cent of Canadian families with the highest incomes ended up with 41.8 per cent of the total income pie. By contrast, the 20 per cent of families with the lowest incomes got less than 5 per cent".

That puts into perspective what the problem is now and how it has been exacerbated by the Conservative government. The rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer and the middle class are paying for both ends of it.

The editorial states: "By and large, the unequal distribution of income is the outcome of the market. But to preserve the advantage of upper-income Canadians in retirement, finance minister Michael Wilson thinks the market needs some help, so Wilson tabled new legislation to increase the allowable tax deduction on registered retirement savings plan to a maximum of $15,500 per year."

I would suggest that 40 per cent or more of the income earners in this country do not even earn $15,500 a year, let alone having the opportunity to eventually put the amount allowed under this bill aside for their retirement.

There are a significant number of single parents struggling to survive on minimum incomes with the absence of day care and other services, and trying to avoid going on welfare. They know very well that at the same time money is being taken out of circulation by way of general revenue to benefit the rich and they, the single parents of this country, have to support not only their children but the rich as well through this kind of legislation and they become cynical about government.

All governments have a mandate to serve the people, but this government thinks it has a mandate to serve the rich and to hell with the rest.

Mr. Boyer: That's nonsense.

Mr. Barrett: My friend says it is nonsense. I have the Tories interfering again when I point out that only 1 per cent of the population of this country can take full advantage of this legislation. The other 99 per cent are told to look in the window and see the Christmas lights and some tinsel.

My friend says it is nonsense. I do not think 99 per cent of the people of this country being shut out is nonsense.

Mr. Boyer: Your analysis is wrong.

Mr. Barrett: When I point out that in the long run wealthy people will be able to put aside $15,000 of their income to escape tax, let us understand what is happening here. Those people who can afford to put aside the $15,500, if they are paying income tax, are in the 50 per cent bracket. If they put aside the $15,000 eventually allowed, $7,500 of what they were putting aside would have gone into general revenue to pay for services and to pay down the debt.

As of 1988 there existed in registered retirement savings plans in this country $71 billion. Only half of that money is in self-directed programs. The other half is in the banks and trust companies of this country, and that money which has been saving the wealthy a tremendous amount of money is then loaned out as mortgages to working, middle-class and lower-income people. Not only are the wealthy getting the benefit of the tax, but they get the benefit of the earnings in the RRSPs that the banks are getting fat on at the expense of the middle and lower income people.

Never was there a system designed to benefit the wealthy as clearly as this one. Thirty-five hundred dollars is the maximum contribution for somebody who is on a wage or a payroll deduction. My good friend says what a crock that is, and I agree with him that it is a crock. Why should the wage earner be confined to $3,500 maximum, but the independent wealthy person allowed ultimately to deduct $15,500? Why indeed, you could ask. It is a crock. The crock is broken by this government along with its broken promises and not providing equality to ordinary people in this country.

If you are in a registered retirement plan and you are on a payroll deduction, that limit is $3,500.

Mr. McDermid: You are allowed up to 18 per cent.

Mr. Barrett: If he wants to change that, get up and make an amendment to this bill. But the fact is while you are working for wages you are confined to a $3,500 deduction. If you are a professional or if you are a super wealthy coupon clipper, you can ultimately deduct $15,500.

Mr. McDermid: They have no pension plan.

Mr. Barrett: My good friend says that they have no pension plan. Let us take his logic further because it is important to debate this.

• (1720)

Let us assume that they have a generous employer who matches the $3,500. Their maximum contribution under a pension plan is $7,000 per year.

Mr. McDermid: You got it wrong.

Mr. Barrett: I have it wrong. Name one employer who puts in more money than the employee does.

My good friend, you can say those things but the Canadian taxpayer is beginning to understand that this government is by the rich, of the rich and for the rich. There is no other piece of legislation that clearly points this out.

The editorial in The Toronto Star further states: "Under Wilson's new proposals Ottawa would provide tax assistance to all employed Canadians to create a nest egg that would allow them to maintain their incomes in retirement to a pension limit of $60,000 a year. To do so, he would provide the greatest assistance to those at the upper end of the income scale. Someone earning $20,000 a year would get an annual tax break worth about $1,200 compared to a break of about $7,500 for those who earn more than $86,000 a year."

Think about it. It is the point that I have been making. If you earn more than $86,000 a year you are in the 50 per cent tax bracket. But if you reduce your income by buying $15,500 worth of RRSPs that you will ultimately be able to, you save $7,500 in taxes. You are not just putting in $15,500 in the bank. You are putting $23,000 in the bank because the impact is the $7,500 that you are saving as well.

In a time of high interest rates, who is getting wealthy as a consequence of this type of plan? You lock in your RRSP into which you put $15,000 a year at a minimum of 11 per cent at today's market and you are looking at doubling your money within five years. If you are rich, you are laughing. If you are poor, and have a job that pays you $10, $15 or $20 an hour, you end up subsidizing this because the tax collected off the rich is not there, it is going into the $71 billion that we already have in RRSPs.

Why not use the money in RRSPs? If the government is going to shelter it for the wealthy, why not use it for good social and economic purposes? Why do we not establish municipal bonds that would permit municipalities under the aegis of both the provincial and federal government to loan money out up to a maximum of $50,000 from an RRSP, pay a 5 per cent return for a 10 year guarantee on the use of that bond, and allow the bond holder at the end of his or her RRSP to take it out with 50 per cent value of the capital they put in plus the total amount of tax they earn and use those bonds for municipal renewal right across this country? It could be used for affordable housing, restructuring roads, bridges, sewers, and sidewalks across this country. If we are going to allow the wealthy to have these huge tax benefits, the other side of morality suggests that at least we have a right to put that money to work for social and economic purposes right across this country.

Five years ago, the Canadian Association of Municipalities suggested that at that time there was 15 years work in the renewal of roads, sewers and sidewalks in this country. For rural and small town Canada suffering the ravages of a centralized economy under a mindless, uncaring, unthinking, monetarist, right-wing government, one of the things that could be done is use this RRSP money for social purposes that would be paid back in terms of good structures in already existing towns.

Why should we not make some of this money available for low-cost mortgages? We could loan the money out. Before anybody gets carried away with the idea that this suggestion is too radical, in the United States both the Republican and Democratic administrations have endorsed government secured bonds at 5 per cent for municipal purposes. Even the Reagan administration that succumbed to the myth of monetarist theories never touched what was a democratic administration's proposal for the use of this kind of municipal bond.

What I am suggesting is a special aspect of it that would permit people to make a decision on their own to redirect their RRSP funds. What I am suggesting also would not make the wealthy wealthier in their RRSPs. I am suggesting a $50,000 maximum of purchase in a RRSP fund of those municipal bonds. Not that I approve of these changes, not that I think they should pass the House, but I know that the unthinking majority of the Conservatives who are mindlessly going to pursue this have no sense of the damage that it is doing psychologically and fiscally to the economy with all of that money sitting there in retirement funds that we have to borrow back at 13 per cent and 14 per cent.

The Minister of Finance asks about our alternatives. We hear that plea all the time. There are two aspects of that plea that I find distasteful. First, the government was not elected to stand up and defend itself by demanding other members tell it what to do. If it is that weak then the best the minister can offer is to resign. If he has no plans of his own and asks the opposition "what are you going to do" then he has given it up. Pack it up, call it quits and leave.

One of the things we can do in this country is to use indigenous funding, our own country's money to supply that part of the capital pool that is necessary for long-term jobs; not welfare and the waste of welfare, not handouts, not megaprojects, but useful long term jobs that keep men and women in their own communities.

When I talk about restructuring our urban communities, I would moderate my criticism of this method of fund-raising if I could see this money being seriously and thoughtfully used for a social and economic purpose.

The government members stand up and lament what is happening in Atlantic Canada. I lament it, too. However, if we were to turn $35 billion of that $71 billion of RRSPs that is non-directed into municipal bonds, there would be $5 billion available tomorrow for Newfoundland and $5 billion available for the other Atlantic provinces. That would create a heck of a lot of jobs in a hurry, with pride, with self-respect, and with decency.

Is there a community in this country that is looking for low-cost bonding to keep their tax base down but cannot find it? There are plenty of them. The impact of high interest rates and lack of indigenous capital in this country is forcing municipalities and school boards to raise taxes right across the board.

The minister wants a way to avoid it. If he is going to benefit the rich by this kind of amendment let him have the moral courage to also direct the money into the economy because the money is there.

How many times do we hear the argument of keeping interest rates high to attract off-shore investment, or we do not have enough indigenous capital of our own? What a falsehood that is, when you examine the fact that the RRSP funds that this bill will allow the rich to benefit even more from are there and could be used, if this government had the will and the wit to do it.

• (1730)

I know that I am speaking to an entranced Chamber and that I have the attention of all the members in the House of Commons. Every one of the cabinet ministers is listening intently and closely to my suggestion about the use of indigenous capital.

Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that the government would say to those people who are allowed to store vast sums of money in protected and sheltered pension funds that it can guarantee 5 per cent, plus half their capital invested when they draw out the plan, if they put the money into municipal bonds? Is there anyone in this chamber who finds ideologically that the use of indigenous capital somehow is a betrayal of Conservative positions, Liberal positions or New Democratic party positions? No one. I will ask any member to say nay to the idea of using indigenous capital at a low cost bonding level, as is done in the United States, to start paying for long-term debt investment on roads, sewers and sidewalks. We can do it as the Americans do it at 5 per cent bonding. Is there anyone over there against it?

Ms. Mitchell: Is there anybody over there?

Mr. Barrett: Is there anybody over there? There are a few there and for those few I have this message: let me point out that this is a great potential vote-getter. This is an idea that transcends all political parties. This is an opportunity for the government to provide indigenous capital at low cost to those municipalities that wish to build homes for the homeless and subsidize low cost mortgage rates. I am not talking about massive public housing that has been socially destructive. I am talking about individual choices for ordinary citizens, particularly single parents who are struggling to meet high rental costs in urban areas right across the country.

Where will the money come from? I repeat, $71 billion exists as of 1986 in RRSPs and half of it is undirected. That half, $35 billion, goes into the private banks. The banks are using that vast pool of wealthy taxpayers' savings for private investment of their own.

The more I repeat this idea, the more converts I get. What will happen sooner or later is that they will start attacking me, but not the idea. I recall that this same proposal was made for socialized medicine. When my party suggested socialized medicine every single Liberal and Conservative at that time attacked the idea. As more and more people began to understand that the idea made sense, they began to see that they could get elected on the idea so they stole it.

I want to make clear that there are very few members in this Chamber who are able to steal my idea, but those of you who put your mind to it are welcome to the happy theft. Think what we could do with $35 billion at 5 per cent on municipal bonding out of RRSPs in the same way the Americans finance major reconstruction in their country with low-cost, solidly safe, Moody's rated AAA, 5 per cent municipal bonds.

An hon. member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Barrett: I expect the member who wants to interrupt me to be the first on his feet to say: "I think you have a germ of an idea here. We might change it a little bit here, tinker a little bit there, call it a Tory idea and sell it". That is all right with me.

It has been a masterful plan for the Americans and it has made good use of social capital out of those indigenous savings. I do not agree that the wealthy should be given a $15,000 write-off. I do not agree that they should get a $7,500 a year tax saving. I repeat, if they are going to get this kind of benefit then the Canadian people have a right to expect an alternative.

Municipal 5 per cent bonding to provide long-term jobs in Atlantic Canada, on the prairies, and in British Columbia would be a useful device. We do not need outside capital. It is indigenous capital created by wealthy people who get a tax benefit according to the belief of this Tory government that the rich should not suffer because they were born rich and the poor should suffer because they were born poor. One of the ways I suggested to mitigate this makes a bit more sense than just giving massive tax write-offs.

Some people by their abilities, talents and skills are in the professions. They earn a vast amount of money and want a tax shelter. I am not one of them. If they were told they had access to this kind of tax write-off they would reject the idea of directing $50,000 of their RRSP funds into a municipal bond earning 5 per cent.

I would make the formula very clear. They would be allowed to take their $50,000, plus half of that capital, plus all interest earned out of their RRSP after a minimum of 10 years of allowing that money to be used as a municipal bond. The more I explain this to the members over there, the more I get their attention, although for some of the members I have become a substitute for Sominex. For those members all the logic in the world and all the reasonable arguments about social responsibility has no effect whatsoever.

I do not believe the government will move into that municipal bonding. I want to make it perfectly clear that my colleagues do not approve of this idea of further tax shelters for the wealthy. Allow anyone to deduct the amount they are paying into their pension plan, plus a maximum amount open to them in the same way that is available to the wealthy. Why should a woman, or a man, who has a permanent lifetime job be allowed to deduct only $3,500 when they may have put aside another $1,000, $1,500 or 2,000? Out of love for their children and for a secure future, why should they not be allowed to take advantage of this tax dodge as well? Why do the rich get all the benefits? My question is: Why should the rich get all the benefits? Let the middle income earners have some too.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, the member of parliament who just spoke wondered if any of us would rise to our feet to pick up the idea that he was preaching here, and I am on my feet for that express purpose.

I heard him mention the example of using these funds for municipal bonds at 5 per cent interest seven times, four of which included references to the way they are doing it in the United States. This was an idea he was preaching and getting converts every time he advocated it. He is a powerful and persuasive speaker.

Mr. Barrett: Thanks very much.

Mr. Boyer: I wish he had been a little more powerful and persuasive recently in Winnipeg because then the message might have gone even further.

The idea of the member advocating the use of funds for municipal projects is borrowed from the United States. That is advocated by a party very concerned that we not imitate anything American, which talks about the evils of adopting anything from south of the border and states that no good could ever come from there, especially in the period after the implementation of the free trade agreement where we were to see all kinds of harmonization and change in Canada making Canada more like the United States. Has he been so successful in persuading members of his own caucus as he has been in persuading some of us across here about the efficacy of this American idea?

Second, if he has been so successful, could he then go on and give us some examples of how this program is working, not just in redirecting funds in the United States but actually achieving results in municipal restructuring, for example, in cities like New York, Chicago, and other cities that find their municipal infrastructure broken down beyond the point of repair?

• (1740)

Mr. Barrett: I am pleased to have this opportunity, however brief, to disabuse the hon. member of some concepts about my attitudes to the United States and my party's attitude to the United States.

I had the privilege of taking seven years of post-secondary education in the United States. In the last two years I had the privilege of teaching at Harvard University as a socialist. I found that a great experience.

In the United States during the 1936 election campaign when capitalism ran to a dead end and the country went into a massive depression, the idea of a mixed economy was spawned, a mixed economy which by the way both Liberals and Conservatives subscribed to in one way or another in Canada until the free trade agreement. All the Liberal administrations and the administration of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker adopted the concept of a mixed economy.

It was under either Liberal governments or Conservative governments that Crown corporations had their inspiration and their role, love them or hate them. There was a consensus in this country that the Crown corporation played a part in the economy.

The first lesson we learned in Canada about the role of government intervention in a mixed economy was during the Roosevelt administration which I admired. The Roosevelt administration saved capitalism in the United States by bringing pluralism into the economy. If the Roosevelt administration had not moved to using public sector funding at that time, capitalism and free enterprise would be dead and Canada would have been in another form of authoritarian extreme right or extreme left wing government.

I would advise my friend to counsel himself by reading casual history of the growth of extreme right wing movements in the United States from 1935 to 1939. Some of these movements even sucked in major religious figures such as Father Coughlin and major public heroes as Charles Lindbergh. Many of them moved to what was known as the German bunde. They were attracted to the Nazi idea that a single effort economy at the private sector with no public enterprise would be the way to go.

If we examine the Nazi response it was a monetarism of its kind. It went into the private investment sector, into monopoly, Krupp Enterprises and I.G. Farben Enterprises. In both instances it was the private sector that benefited from privately directed public money. I am not espousing that nor do I suggest that my group or I have the Holy Grail on ideas.

It is true that the Roosevelt administration brought in North American economic pluralism. It has been a consensus regardless of what party is in power at any given time to use the public sector for some common good. In the United States they have public highways and public bridges. They even have the state telling one what side of the road to drive on. If that is not interference with private decisions I do not know what is. In the United States the government not only tells one what side of the road to drive on, but it builds automobiles to accompany that legislation.

If one wants to raise a shibboleth of the private sector being free and roaming in the United States, forget it. There has to be some order. There is order on highways and there is order in financing.

The municipal bonding program in the United States has been successful for over 50 years. If my good friend would address himself to Moody's or to Standard and Poor's, he would discover that the highest rating bonds consistently in the United States are the Fannie Maes, the euphemism for the American municipal bond. They range at 5 per cent and 6 per cent. They are not directed out of pension funds. They are shelters of capital that already exist.

What I and my colleagues are suggesting is a new idea. They find it interesting. It is an idea I have put to the Liberals and to you. If we have an indigenous pool of capital that presently amounts to $71 billion as of 1988, half of which is freely and legally self-directed investments, the other half sits there as revolving deposits in the bank.

What I am suggesting will help capitalism. I confess, if you are madcap to save the wealthy more money, one of the consequences that allows you to sell that madcapness is a moral responsibility to redirect that $35 billion sitting there in the bank. It is not offshore money. It is not debate with the Minister of Finance suggesting that we do not have any money. It is there. I am saying: direct it into the economy for social and economic purposes, rebuild our cities and towns, and maybe the rich can sleep a little more comfortably as they rip off the system.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in speaking briefly to this question of reform of the RRSP, I think it is important that we recognize that many people in the country have invested in registered retirement savings plans and are very much aware of the benefits that can accrue to those who can afford them.

We want to go on record this evening as stating unequivocally that there are some problems with the proposal put forward by the government. We recognize that. There are also some points in the legislation that are very beneficial. As is often the case in matters such as these, the avenue that is most appropriate is to allow a committee to review the legislation, to listen to the interested parties that have a good and thorough knowledge of what is proposed, and to make certain that we listen to both the pros and cons.

I have listened with a great deal of interest over some time now to the debate that has taken place with respect to the government's proposed legislation. What strikes me is that although there has been a great deal of rhetoric from my friends to the left about RRSPs, they do not seem to grasp that for most Canadians the notion of being able to provide for their retirement is a very interesting one. They want to make sure that the proposal made available to them by the government is fair and equitable to everyone.

There are some inequities for low income people and the threshold has been changed. We want to address that in committee and see to it that when we come back to this House appropriate amendments have been made.

I am very concerned about the approach taken by the NDP on some of these matters. It applies to Bill C-52 as well as to other matters that have come before this House and will continue to be considered by Parliament. It is the approach by the New Democratic Party to stifle debate rather than encourage it.

The Liberal Party is as concerned as anyone else with these measures. As we went through the debate on the goods and services tax everyone on the Liberal side of the House wanted to participate in that debate and put forward concerns as to why they believed the goods and services tax was not good for the country. They were not given that opportunity because the New Democratic Party insisted, through procedural matters, in not allowing the debate to go forward. Of course as often happens the government imposed closure. That meant that no one was heard. As opposed to elected members who are paid to express themselves having the opportunity to do so, practically no one was heard. It was very frustrating for a number of members in the Liberal Party.

We are looking at the registered retirement savings plan. No doubt there will be amendments brought when this bill is referred to committee. We want to state as clearly as we can that we believe this bill should move to committee, and all members of Parliament who want may join in unfettered discussion, be able to present their views and call witnesses. Those who oppose the bill will be more than welcome. Those who support it will be welcome, particularly those who have constructive suggestions as to how the bill could be amended to better serve Canadians who want to provide for their retirement.

I always hesitate to pre-judge what is taking place, but I have to look at the tactics used in recent weeks and what we see happening in committee at this stage. Although I want to give the benefit of the doubt that the motives are correct and that my friends in the New Democratic Party are opposed to the goods and services tax, they have serious reservations about RRSP legislation. That I recognize and respect.

Surely at some point parliamentarians have to debate these issues and oppose them as strenuously as they can. I am concerned about what will happen with the GST legislation. Rather than being able to oppose it in committee, question witnesses who come to seek better ways to avoid the impact of GST and ask them why they do not oppose it as they should, we will have a situation where debate will be ended. The bill will be reported back to the House, and people who have been elected to represent their constituents will not have been heard as thoroughly as they should.

I totally sympathize with those people who want to use every means possible to try to block legislation, but in this place the majority eventually will gets its way. I am one of those who believes that before the majority gets its way the minority must have its say. That is not happening at this point.

In closing, I hope that when these matters of dealing with changes in the RRSPs, how they are administered, how the thresholds are set, how people can take advantage of them and whether they favour some people more than others come before committee we will have input from Canadians generally. I hope parliamentarians who are interested will come forward and provide constructive amendments as to how best we can serve the people we are elected to represent.

In the context of the goods and services tax which is still very much on everyone's mind, let us consider the impact of this change on Canadians who are able to provide for retirement, how we should be helping those who cannot use this mechanism, where this mechanism is unfair, how it can be improved, how tomorrow's budget will affect Canadians, and how we must oppose any propositions in that budget that are contrary to the best interest of Canadians.

Although it is cumbersome and sometimes minorities feel terribly oppressed by majorities, I hope we will have an opportunity for full and open debate, at least in this place. We have very little control over what goes on in the country. That is becoming more and more evident as the reaction to the goods and services tax continues to grow. Surely we have a responsibility as well to speak out on these issues and go on record as to what we disagree with, what we agree with, and how we think we can improve proposals put forward by the government. If those constructive suggestions are not accepted by the government, it would obviously be our duty and our responsibility to vote against the government proposals. We have no reservations about doing that unless the problems with the proposed legislation by the government are resolved by amendment.

I look forward to this matter being dealt with in committee. I am hopeful that all members of the House will allow for open debate, come forward with suggestions, and make sure that all of us work together to try to make this legislation as effective and as useful as possible to all Canadians.

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, that was rather curious debate on this particular bill. It sounded like a rationalization for a failure to have real alternatives to the GST. It seems rather curious that the member focused the majority of his comments against the New Democratic Party, which is not the party that has put forward this bill. It is a rather strange way of proceeding.

I can understand the kind of motivation that has propelled this member to make his speech in this manner, because we in the New Democratic Party do have alternatives to the GST. The kind of alternatives that we have and the kind of opposition that we have exercised in the finance committee have been very strenuous. That is because we are absolutely opposed to the GST, unlike the Liberal Party. The Liberal Party thinks that in the next election it will win by default and that by not proposing real alternatives it is going to sneak in because of the unpopularity of the Progressive Conservative government.

We should make it clear that we are firm in our opposition to the GST and to this RRSP legislation, that we have the courage of our convictions, that we are not prepared to debate these things, and that we are opposing them. That is the route of real democracy. Our constituents right across Canada are telling us that they want this bill stalled by whatever means. Even this afternoon in the finance committee witnesses told our members that they appreciated the role they were playing in stalling this legislation and to continue it with all their energy.

I would like to ask a question of the member who has just spoken. Why has the Liberal Party not posed real alternatives to the GST?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the question of proposing an alternative to the GST is falling right into the trap of the government. My friends to the left never really get too interested in what they would do as a government, because as the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca knows it is only a fleeting fancy. It is not the kind of thing the NDP enjoys for very long.

Mr. Gardiner: It did well in Chambly.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I just heard someone say that it did well in Chambly. I cannot wait for the new member of the New Democratic Party to come into the House. What is going to happen—and most people are speculating on it now—is that we will have another leadership campaign in the NDP in 18 months. That is something to look forward to. It will be a lot more entertaining than the last one.

Ms. Hunter: We are very pleased with the leader we have, just like the Liberal Party.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Going back to the question put by the hon. member, one of the reasons we are not prepared to stall the legislation on the registered retirement savings plan is that Liberals support registered retirement savings plans. I want to make that very clear. I am very proud to support registered retirement savings plans.

Ms. Hunter: Especially if they benefit the rich.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): We are suggesting that there are some problems with this legislation, and we want to deal with it in committee where we can move amendments and make suggestions. The NDP obviously does not like registered retirement savings plans.

That is its their problem. If they are against people being able to save for their old age, that is up to them.

Ms. Hunter: We didn't say that.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): If they are opposed to RRSPs, they should say that. What we are saying is that we support registered retirement savings plans.

Ms. Hunter: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member should speak for his own party rather than our party. I think we can speak very well for ourselves.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): With respect to the RRSPs we want to go on record as supporting RRSPs. We want to make sure they are fair and equitable, and we want to make sure we bring forward constructive amendments in committee.

With respect to the GST I want to say that one of the things we will never do in committee or in this House is send surrogates to do the dirty work. That is what has been happening in the finance committee. The member of the finance committee who is the supposed finance critic for the New Democratic Party has not been part of it. The members for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and Nickel Belt have shown up in the finance committee to play their silly games, which they are very good at.

I respect my hon. colleague from Saskatchewan who is the finance critic and my hon. colleague who was a very strong contender in the leadership campaign for the NDP. They appear on a regular basis when we are doing business in the finance committee. They are two gentlemen who know how to present their party's point of view and do it appropriately, but what we have been exposed to is the absolute stupidity of a spectacle of two members, one of whom had never been to the finance committee before, coming in and playing silly games.

If members of the NDP are interested in playing silly games with registered retirement savings plans, that is up to them. If they do not want people to speak in the finance committee and be able to present testimony, that is up to them.

One thing for sure is that we will oppose the goods and services tax as we have since last August while the NDP was going back and forth across the country trying to find a leader. The alternative, and I will close on this, is to make sure that we do not fall into the government's trap. What Canadians are saying is no to the GST, not yes to something else still unheard of. Better the devil you know, which is the existing federal sales tax.

• (1800)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker, because if the New Democrats want to scrap both the federal sales tax and the GST, they would put another $18 billion onto the deficit. They probably do not know that that is what would be the result, but that is what they would be suggesting.

What over 600,000 Canadians who signed petitions that we have presented to the Clerk of this House have said, is,"no", to the GST. They have not said that they would like to take up the NDP's alternative because the NDP's alternative is unthinkable.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to speak on Bill C–52. Canadians probably shudder every time the government and the minister bring in a bill that is usually entitled, "an act to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts".

We know they shudder because we either get legislation that is going to ensure that middle class Canadians are taxed more or, as in this particular case, legislation to amend the Income Tax Act that is going to continue to protect their wealthy friends.

I think in the debate we have had on the grief and suffering tax, and now this debate on RRSP legislation, that it is very interesting to note the role of the Liberal party, as we just heard in the exchange with the Liberal member, in changing our Canadian tax structure. It is interesting to see the Liberals' role and compliance and their unholy alliance with the Conservatives. It is passing strange to see that kind of co-operation from the Liberal Party.

The Liberals have some honourable history. But this alliance that they now have with their friends in the Conservative party, protecting the rich and the wealthy, as they are doing with RRSP legislation, will make Canadians question what the Liberal party is trying to present in this House. When we ask the Liberals about their alternatives, they say they are not sure.

The Liberals then arrogantly preach to us about how we have to debate in committee and in the House and pay attention to all of the debating rules. Canadians are starting to see through that charade. It is a Liberal charade that is really evident in the debate on the goods and services tax.

Sometimes people get a little overconfident when their standing in the they polls go up. They tend to think it will be a nice, easy walk into office. I wonder if the Liberals are beginning to think that. My hon. friend, one of the Cabinet ministers is nodding. He thinks that way. I think the Liberals would probably be dumb enough to do that.

I think the point was well made at a convention I attended in British Columbia. We are going to fight the Conservatives all the way on the goods and services tax. That is our job. The Queen asks us to do that. She wants to be here to fight that unfair tax and to present alternatives like we have done, unlike, as I mentioned, the Liberal party. We are going to continue doing that.

Mr. Horner: What are your alternatives?

Mr. Gardiner: The member opposite wants to know what our alternatives are. We will send some extra copies over so he can circulate them to the seven or so Conservatives that are here. If we called a vote now, we would probably win it. Let us see if they have the courage to adopt those alternatives and replace the goods and services tax.

Let me say what will happen to them if they are successful in bringing in the tax. The deal is, if you do get to bring in the goods and services tax in about 10 months time, you lose the next election. I hate talking about politics in the House, as I have said, but when we are out knocking on doors and our supporters are out canvassing undoubtedly we will be talking about the GST—

Mr. Kristiansen: Not politics.

Mr. Gardiner: Not politics. This is not politics. We are talking about the GST. When the Conservatives come calling I think Canadians should ask for their money back. When you have a lousy product you get your money back. Even the president of The Bay goes on TV now to say he will give your money back, no questions asked. So when the Tory canvassers and telephoners come by in the next election campaign, ask for your money back. That is what Canadians should do.

What is the purpose of the legislation? It is an attempt by the Conservatives to really restructure our tax system in this country and to protect their friends. Bill C–52 is such legislation.

Of course, we are all getting calls now from members of the pubic and the media asking what is going to be in the budget tomorrow. What is the speculation about what is going to happen. The Minister of Finance has been on the road talking about how tough times are. He says that we are going to have to cut back and it will really hurt. The minister says the Conservatives do not like being unpopular but it is their mandate and they must take these steps.

I think it was about this time during the last budget when word started to get out that the budget was out all over the place. But assuming that the budget is not out all over the news while we are speaking here, the government is bringing in legislation that is going to expand the amount wealthy Canadians can contribute to RRSPs.

The Liberals are hurting dramatically over their lack of opposition to the GST and are beginning to realize that Canadians now recognize that they are playing a shell game with their opposition. The Liberals try to play a few games by saying the NDP are against RRSPs and who knows what else they are going to do. That is not our position.

Mr. Mills: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have to bear with me for a second because this is the first time that I have ever stood in this House on a point of order and you may rule me out of order. But I have been listening to the NDP for the last three hours in here and at a finance committee meeting.

They keep mentioning that we do not have alternatives on this side of the House. I want to be on the record that that is not the case and the New Democrats know it because I personally sent all the NDP members in the last two weeks a copy of one proposal in this party called the single tax. So I think that the record should stand corrected. It is one of many that are being worked on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tremblay (Québec Est)): The hon. member from Prince George has the floor.

Mr. Hockin: On a point of order. I do not believe that it was a point of order but I would like to know whether or not the single tax is party policy.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I started off by saying that this is not party policy but we are working on many ideas. Members should not say that we as Liberals are not working on ideas and that we are not proposing alternatives. This is one of many that are being worked on which I presented to the Department of Finance. We have worked on it for nine months and we have yet to have a single response from the Government of Canada on this one idea. I know many of my colleagues have many other ideas, but there has been no response.

Mr. Horner: Was that the Pocklington proposal?

Mr. Mills: Was that a question? Is it the Pocklington proposal? I should tell you absolutely not.

Some hon. members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tremblay (Québec–Est)): Everything that I have heard is, as I see it, matter for debate and I give the floor again to the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley (Mr. Gardiner).

[English]

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I know that from our knowledge of the rules it would be a good guess that interventions were probably not points of orders, but that is okay. I will accept that because I know from time to time the Conservatives probably do the same thing.

New Democrats would never rise on a point of order and try to make debating points. I appreciate my hon. friend from the Liberal Party and his nice, fancy tax proposal that I have received. It is in the pile to read at some point.

The Conservative member is correct. As far as we know it is not Liberal party policy. I think the hon. member who rose in his place was considered at one point to perhaps run for the leadership of his party.

I guess the fact that he could not raise the money, the $1.7 million that the Liberal party says you need to become the leader of that party, prevented him from doing so. He cannot afford it. He had to step down. That shows how much support his idea has in his own party. He could not sell enough books. It is a real comment on the sins of the Liberal party and on how the party treats some of the members of its own caucus who are trying, I think, to make a serious effort with some honourable proposals. But I wonder if the associate finance critic of the Liberal party is aware of this proposal, and what does he think about it.

I wonder if he is prepared to take it to the convention. With the shell game that we are seeing by the Liberals and Conservatives on the GST, we are never sure what to expect.

Mr. Mills: Alberta endorsed it.

Mr. Gardiner: A member said Premier Getty. That is really something. That is a real plus. Premier Getty has endorsed it. This is the premier of Alberta who is being ridiculed for Family Day today by the Liberal Party.

Mr. Mills: The Liberal Party.

Mr. Gardiner: That is even more serious than Premier Getty. Do you want to add to the list? Pretty soon Premier Vander Zalm will declare the Liberal flat tax policy as a distinct tax policy for Canada.

It is probably in the dinosaur museum already. After hearing the hon. member from the Liberal party who has clearly indicated such a responsible group of people who have endorsed his tax proposal, I suppose we will see where it will go in the future.

What is the purpose of Bill C-52? An article in the Toronto Star deals the distribution of income in Canada. It is a very important issue for us to deal with because when we talk about RRSPs we are dealing with the distribution of income. We are talking about what measures a government implements to either raise funds or not raise funds.

Some years ago the Liberal government at the time was taking anything that was not currently being taxed that should be taxed and considering it as a loss to the government. One would either be taxed for parking a car, or the government considered it lost tax revenue. That is the kind of thinking you get from the Liberal party.

Let me refer to this important editorial. The distribution of income in Canada is highly unequal. In 1981, the 20 per cent of Canadian families with the highest incomes ended up with 41.8 per cent of the total income pie. By contrast, the 20 per cent of families with the lowest incomes got less than 5 per cent. What does the Conservative finance minister try to do? He takes a look at this problem. He takes a look at poor people in this country. I think it is an obligation and a duty that members of Parliament become aware of the concerns and the needs of people who are less fortunate, probably than most of us in this House. What does he do? He brings in Bill C-52, an amendment to the Income Tax Act.

This editorial in not NDP propaganda. It is an editorial commenting on the minister's proposals.

Under the finance minister's new proposals, Ottawa would provide tax assistance to all employed Canadians to create a nest egg that would allow them to maintain their incomes in retirement up to a pension limit of $60,000 a year. To do so, he would provide the greatest assistance to those at the upper end of the income scale. That is very important.

Someone earning $20,000 a year would get an annual tax break worth about $1,200, compared to a break of about $7,500 for those earning more than $86,000 a year.

We do not know yet whether the Liberals support this bill. They want to go into committee. Knowing the Liberals, they will make it even better for the wealthy, knowing their style.

The finance minister says the change is necessary to restore equity to the way in which our tax system treats retirement savings. A high income earner working for a corporation with a pension plan of its own, for example, currently gets more tax assistance than a self-employed person with the same income or a person who works for a company with no pension plan.

This is the point I was mentioning about the lost revenue to government. The finance minister's proposal, when fully implemented, would drain an estimated $300 million a year from the federal treasury, which the finance minister has said on numerous occasions, as we have all heard in this House and in the news across the country, is stretched to the limit.

Mr. Kristiansen: I thought they had to cut back.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member says he thought they had to cut back. Let us refer to the comments made by the member from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, about the kind of revenue and capital that is available in the country.

What would $300 million do? I can give you an example from my own province. It is something I have spoken about a lot and something we hope to hear about in the budget tomorrow night. That $300 million would nearly fund the federal—provincial forest agreement in British Columbia. I have talked about this before. This is an example of the different ways funds can be used. In this particular case, the funding of that forest agreement with that $300 million, one should consider this investment for the long term benefit of this country.

The points we are making about Bill C-52 are not that we are against RRSPs. It would be good to have an RFSP, a registered forest saving plan. My friend from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca talked about municipal loans infrastructure in Canada. We have examples in the United States where municipal infrastructure is falling apart. In Canada, municipalities put together infrastructure programs. But they were rejected out of hand by the government.

The government should put the effort it is giving to the goods and services tax into a fair tax system, into helping those sectors of our economy that are in need, whether it is cleaning up pulp mills, planting more trees or helping diversify some of the economies.

Just think about that. If it had put that year-long effort into helping poor people and giving young people jobs and education, planting trees and cleaning up the environment, think how much better this country would be, rather than the havoc it is going to wreak on the economy in the early part of next year. Bill C-52 simply offers ongoing protection to the wealthy.

With the alternatives our party has talked about and the message we use in this Parliament to get it across, people will start to see through the shilly-shallying of the Liberals and Conservatives on the GST and Bill C-52. They are going to see a clear message coming from our party. I know they will support that.

• (1820)

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from the NDP seems to say that he is supporting RRSPs but he does not want to increase the level and he wants to use the socialist ideal of socializing everyone into the poverty level. These ideals have been rejected around the world. They have been rejected in eastern Europe and they are being rejected again and again. It is obvious that the NDP does not understand the importance of investing in your own country.

Why is the member opposed to Canadians investing in their own country, for the good of Canadians? I think he should rethink the whole idea of the NDP policy. There has been a love affair going on here between the NDP and the Liberals. They get to spatting over who is the opposition but they really have not explained what direction they would take in regard to creating some investment capital in this country.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, an hon. member suggested that the question was not worth an answer. It is not fair to treat the Conservatives that way. Even Conservatives deserve an answer.

The hon. member touched on a couple of points in his question to me. He referred to the rejection of the ideals of the NDP in Europe and so on. The fact of the matter is that it is quite the reverse. People in Europe are rejecting the extremes of the right and the left and the strategy of social democracy and a mixed economy is becoming more accepted all over the world than ever before. I think it is ridiculous for members on the opposite side to suggest that people are jumping on the capitalist train. Whether that exists nowadays or not, I do not know. We all know about the efficacy of social democracy, about the mixed economy, something for which this party has stood for years.

The member also made comments about the poverty level as though under the New Democrats we are all going to wear grey jackets and what have you. Well maybe the hon. member was right, maybe the question was not worth answering, but I can refer the hon. member to some good background reading. On this particular point there is one particular group of people who have got together in this country and other countries, including some European countries the hon member has talked about, who have helped people struggle out of poverty.

I speak of the trade union movement in this country. We make no apologies for working closely with people in the trade union movement. The trade union movement has fought to ensure that people have had fairness and equality, good wages and good working conditions, not like the party opposite that uses every opportunity to drive down and beat up unions whenever it has a chance. Those members will take all the benefits of working in an organized work site, just as they will take all the benefits of socialized medicine.

As my colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca always says so clearly, if they don't like it they can rip up their medicare card anytime. You know they are not going to do that, Mr. Speaker.

We have said clearly that this legislation helps the wealthy. We are going to slow down this legislation coming from this government just as we are fighting the GST because it is the Conservatives and Liberals protecting their wealthy friends once again.

Mr. Kristiansen: I would like to ask my colleague to elucidate a little further on some of his comments.

Is it not true that the members opposite in the Conservative Party have continuously been saying that we have to change all our spending priorities because we are short of money and that we should eliminate those programs that help people who are better off in order to help those people who are really in need?

That seems to be totally in conflict with what the government is doing in this case, which is turning $300 million to $350 million a year over to the people who need it least when tomorrow in all likelihood it will take away money from the people who need it most. It seems to me that that is a bit of a conflict.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, in the interest of saving time, I think you would find there would be a disposition to apply this vote to the main motion, but in reverse.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I notice that the House leader for the New Democratic Party agrees with that. On a point of order, the Secretary of State.

Mr. Weiner: Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably detained and would have voted, of course, with the government on the last vote. I would like to be recorded as doing so on this vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I accept the hon. minister telling us what he would have done if he had been here, but I think that he wants to have his name and the names of all the others who were absent added for the second vote we are now taking and not for the first vote.

Mr. Darling: Like the minister, I also would have voted with the government on the previous vote, and would like to be recorded as doing so on this one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the proposal made by the hon. house leader for the Official Opposition and the agreement of the House, I declare the main motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

Adjournment Debate

POINT OF ORDER

BUDGET STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among the parties and I think you would find consent to approve the motion with respect to the budget which was read into the record immediately prior to Routine Proceedings today.

I understand that my hon. friend for Kamloops has a point of order with respect to questions and answers vis-à-vis the minister's budget address which he wishes to raise at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

In the event that Mr. Speaker agrees with my hon. friend for Kamloops, we would agree to the order being amended to take into account any such ruling.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the government's request earlier today to present the budget tomorrow at 4.30 p.m.

Given that this budget will be predicated on the revenues expected from the goods and services tax, given that 80 per cent of Canadians have expressed their concern about this tax and rejected this tax, and given that the government has decided to ignore the voice of Canadians, my party had to seriously consider the legitimacy of introducing such a budget.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party has the floor.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I understand that my comments could give the government some anxiety but I would say to the government that people of Canso, Nova Scotia, know about anxiety and what is happening to them. People on fixed incomes and the farmers of this country know about anxiety.

Given the high inflation, the increasing unemployment and the high interest rates, we are prepared to give the Minister of Finance the opportunity to show some economic leadership in the country. Should the government introduce a motion to introduce the budget at 4.30 p.m. tomorrow, we are willing to give our consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion proposed by the Minister of Justice and government house leader. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, members will recall that on November 9, 1989, the Canadian Federation of Students visited Ottawa to protest against the government's handling of post-secondary education in this country.

They had identified the massive slash in transfer payments to the provinces, roughly $24 billion fewer dollars for health and education over an eight or nine fiscal year period. They understood, as well, that there would be less funding for training and retraining. They knew that the government had removed almost $700 million and then had added another $800 million without making any adjustments for student growth, without making any adjustments for inflation, and without making any adjustments whatsoever either for new programs that were needed.

They were alarmed at the government reneging on its commitment to double its investments in research and development. We had been at roughly 1.4 per cent of gross domestic product, that is in terms of investments, which is roughly one half of what is expended in the United States, Japan, Sweden, France and West Germany, and that has slipped. In fact the Prime Minister had asked the provinces and the private sector to contribute more. The provinces have contributed 21 per cent more during the last five years. The private sector has contributed 19 per cent more, while the federal government has contributed 9 per cent more. Its contribution has not even kept up with inflation.

They were concerned as well about the weak commitment to literacy. I refer to the $110 million that has been announced so often that people are starting to think, as the government would want them to think, that it is new money. But $110 million over five years is $22 million a year for the roughly five million functionally illiterate Canadians. That works out to $4.50 per student per year.

They were angry at the fact that student aid criteria have not changed since 1984, that they are now paying much more for their education. Their parents are paying more, and so are their guardians. In fact, tuition fees are going out of sight. There is massive student debt. Students are really quite concerned as to whether or not they will be able to continue their studies.

Of course, most recently, there was the addition of the 3 per cent administrative fee, which is a cruel blow because it is added on to those individuals who need funding most. Now, not only does one have to borrow if one is poor, but one also has to pay an additional penalty of 3 per cent.

These students are well aware of the hidden taxes that have been brought forward by the government. A couple of examples would include the goods and services tax which will impact negatively upon the education of students in this country—post-secondary, elementary and secondary. They were angry as well about the cancellation of the postal subsidies for scholarly and academic journals.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that on November 9 I had asked the minister responsible these questions. What is the government going to do to counter these problems? What is the government going to do to protect our quality of life? What is the government going to do to enhance our competitiveness with the United States, Japan, Europe—our major competitors? What is the government going to do to make this nation become a nation of leaders and not followers?

The cuts that the government has undertaken in transfer payments and the reductions in other sectors of the educational pie will have a negative impact on the small and poorer provinces. Let me just briefly state why this is so. They are, in fact, a grant that is transferred to the provinces. When the province is poor and small, it has less ability to maintain the infrastructure that it has had in place for health, education and other services.

In fact, I have almost completed a cross-Canada tour on which I have been talking to people in universities, colleges, school systems, and to parents and students. One of the factors that has been identified for me recently as being particularly critical is in Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. In those provinces the elementary and secondary school programs are starting to suffer because there has been a massive drain on the resources of those small, poorer provinces to try to maintain what they have in place.

When we think of Canada as a country that is committed to the sharing of resources so that every man, woman and child will have access to those basic necessities of life—health, education and other related services—we shudder. We are concerned and many people are frightened.

As well, during this tour I have talked to people who were responsible for minority language education, French outside of Quebec and English in Quebec. They are concerned that the reductions and the cuts will have a negative impact upon them.

I talked to people in the native education sector, our aboriginal people. They are angry at the capping of education, particularly when at this particular point in their evolution there are more and more of their peoples who want to benefit from post-secondary educational opportunities.

I talked to new Canadians who were annoyed. Frankly, some of them were terribly angry that certain programs for the learning of English and French had been removed.

The government will counter by saying that it spent $240 million on the Centres of Excellence. But you have to look at that in terms of the total massive retreat of the federal government. We are talking about billions of dollars—not millions but billions of dollars—of retreat from post-secondary education in which $240 million is a lot of money. At the same time if you look at it in juxtaposition to what has been removed it is not a great deal, of course.

• (1910)

With respect to the Centres of Excellence, what is alarming is that not one single study was undertaken in the area of social sciences and the humanities. One would think that in an era such as ours, in a country such as ours, where increasingly society is making greater demands upon us and when we are accelerating into a highly technological society, that someone would have thought to ask some basic fundamental questions.

Where is this technological society taking us? What impact will it have on me, on you, and on Canadians generally? One would have thought that that would have been something which the government would have wanted to fund.

The questions that are being raised today are these. Are there any other massive cuts coming? Will there be other reductions? Will the pain be even worse than it has been? Will our young Canadians suffer? Will they be unable to be competitive with young people from other countries?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I just said very briefly that when I raised the question in the House on November 9, I received a reply that I thought was incomplete and I therefore gave a summary of the massive government cuts and tried to show the negative impact on every region and all the people of this country.

I therefore ask the minister now to try to elaborate, to tell me exactly how they will proceed to offset these cuts.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State, I would like to take the opportunity to provide further information in answer to a question raised by the hon. member for St. Boniface on November 9 concerning the funding of post-secondary education.

As the Secretary of State—who is right next to me—said recently, education is a national priority for our government. We have an explicit commitment to co-operate with the provinces and territories in funding a post-secondary education system based on excellence and equal opportunity.

At the First Ministers' Conference last November, the Prime Minister proposed setting up a national task force on developing human resources for the year 2000. This task force would be particularly concerned with identifying the problems of human resources, examining the results obtained by the present education and training systems and formulating recommendations on the desired changes.

[English]

The Prime Minister's representative, Dr. Douglas Wright, President of the University of Waterloo, is working closely with the Council of Ministers of Education to develop the proposal. The Prime Minister confirmed that the federal government will "carry its fair share of the burden to ensure that all young Canadians receive a first class education as they confront a world-class challenge".

Currently, the largest single element of federal support is the Established Programs Financing, EPF, arrangements. Under this program the federal government transfers cash payments and tax points to provincial governments for post-secondary education.

In 1989, the program demonstrated strong growth despite financial constraint. That does affect the level of increase in EPF. The program provided $5.4 billion last year. It is providing $5.7 billion this year. This is a 6 per cent increase, not a cutback.

Combined with other forms of more direct support, total federal support to higher education is around $7 billion of the total $12.5 billion to be spent this year.

[Translation]

Access to post-secondary education for all Canadians is a priority for both federal and provincial governments. The Canada Student Loans Program, together with provincial programs, has helped over 1.5 million Canadians continue their studies. This year, more than $400 million will be spent on financing loans to a quarter of a million students, twice the amount spent five years ago. The loans program is now being reviewed in order to balance present and future needs of both students and governments.

• (1915)

With the implementation of the new Canada Scholarship Program, the best students will be able to earn degrees in natural science, engineering and related disciplines. The Centres of Excellence Program will give some of the best researchers of this country a unique opportunity to work together on projects that are vital to our future. Good news for our future engineers, scientists and researchers.

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the achievements that testify to our serious commitment to post-secondary education in Canada. Our future economic and social development depends on our ability to co-operate with provinces and territories, universities and colleges, teachers and students.

[English]

We need to take another look at the education systems of Canada to find ways to use existing education and training resources more effectively and efficiently. It is not enough simply to demand more resources. Canada's spending on education per capita is second only to Sweden. We must work together and demand excellence and high quality results from the investment we already make in our education and training systems.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The house adjourned at 7.17 p.m.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's responses to eight petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PETITIONS

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table two petitions, one from Matagami and one from Lebel-sur-Quévillon, which reject the recommendations of the Tax Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Your petitioners, who represent the isolated areas of Matagami and Lebel-sur-Quévillon in the Abitibi area, feel that although isolation is mainly a psychological factor, it can be expressed in dollars and cents.

Mr. Speaker, the residents of these communities believe that the task force has failed to allow for the daily realities in the North and the near North in the Abitibi area.

[English]

CHILD CARE

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to table two petitions which have been signed by my constituents of Brandon—Souris. The first petition is from members of the Brandon University community, faculty and students alike. They call upon Parliament to urge the government to honour its commitment to child care and to provide a comprehensive quality, accessible and affordable child care program for Canada.

RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from a number of my constituents who indicate their support for Parliament enacting legislation which will protect human life from conception to natural death.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to table a petition which has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions.

This petition on budget day brings to the attention of this House the grave injustice that will be put on Canadians with this 7 per cent tax on goods and services. These petitioners would like to make sure the House knows that they object to this hidden tax, that they think this will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians, that the imposition of the GST will create an onerous burden on small business and that this is indeed an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians that will not only mean higher taxes but will bring in higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

• (1110)

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present to the House with your indulgence today.

The first one is signed by 31 members of the child care faculty of the University of Victoria. It is signed out of concern for the federal government's lack of initiatives in child care. These are professionals who are very concerned and aware of the vacuum in Canadian policy. On this day that the budget is to be presented, I present this petition signed by professionals in the field who know very well the kind of harm that comes from having that vacuum in Canadian policy.

FISHERIES

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): The second petition I would like to present is signed by 75 of my constituents, particularly from the Gulf Islands, Salt Spring Island. It relates to the whole problem of driftnet fishing. The petitioners ask that all possible means be used to stop the use of driftnets in the north Pacific, including the institution of economic sanctions against the offending countries and the placing of prohibitive tariffs and duties on imports to Canada from those countries.

INCOME TAX

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the third petition I have is signed, once again, by my constituents and talks about the relation of the tax system to Canadian women who file tax returns. Fifty per cent of Canadian women have incomes of $10,000 per year or less, compared to only 23 per cent of men.

Whereas thousands of Canadian women living in poverty pay income taxes the petitioners ask that the government introduce a tax system that is simpler and fairer to average Canadians and which establishes a better balance between corporate and personal taxes. They ask that the government restore indexation to the child tax credit.

Once again, on the day the budget is going to be coming down, this is a very important message to the government.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the next petitions I have relate to VIA Rail. They contain 250 signatures of people from my constituency who talk about the lack of federal resources to VIA Rail and the importance of a passenger rail system to Canada. They say that the government should be working to upgrade VIA Rail equipment and give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, the next petition I have is signed by over 300 of my constituents and relates to the goods and services tax. The petitioners ask that the government cease this proposal that will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through this regressive, consumptive tax instead of real tax reform.

EL SALVADOR

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Finally, Mr. Speaker, this petition has upward of 250 signatures of my constituents and talks about the situation in El Salvador. As we heard in the news yesterday, the Government of El Salvador is once again bombing civilian targets in the city of San Salvador.

These petitioners ask that the Government of Canada utilize the full potential of Canada's position at the United Nations and as a member of the OAS, to pursue an independent diplomatic policy leading to the full protection of human rights and a peaceful resolution of the conflict in El Salvador.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, there are many petitions against the goods and services tax and I am pleased to have the honour to add another one from the Kamloops constituency.

With these petitioners' signatures there are a total 17,257 from the Kamloops area alone. Today's petition is signed by representatives of the Kamloops and District Teachers Association and the Caribou College Faculty Association, as well as the communities of Westwold, Dallas, Valleyview, Monte Lake, Pritchard, Barnhart Vale, Turtle Valley, Highland Valley, Deadman's Creek and Monte Creek.

They have a long list of grievances with reference to the goods and services proposal and are asking that the Parliament of Canada do whatever it can to stop the tax from becoming a reality.

FORESTRY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition on another issue from the residents of Little Fort, British Columbia, who are concerned about the federal-provincial forest resource development agreement that has yet to be signed.

I am pleased to see that the minister is here. I will direct this point to him. The petitioners point out that the forest industry of Canada is Canada's pre-eminent industry in terms of export earnings. They point out the advantages of the present agreement in terms of providing employment as well as regenerating our forests and they ask Parliament to renew this important agreement with British Columbia and thereby provide for a renewed commitment to restocking our forest land, advancing forest research, promoting silviculture and assisting the forest industry in developing the new products and markets that will provide us with forestry jobs in the future.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I also am honoured to present a petition which expresses the views of many Canadians opposing the goods and services tax because it is an unfair form of taxation which disregards the taxpayers' ability to pay. The government has not addressed the unfair tax system which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax. It is taxing a number of things such as reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels.

Therefore, the petitioners call on Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax and to bring in a tax system that is more effective, including a minimum tax on wealthy individuals. They say that this reform must not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition approximately 1,600 signatures from all parts of my constituency and a number of adjoining constituencies, all making the case that the current proposal for a goods and services tax is not acceptable to them.

In their view, reform of the tax system to provide an effective, minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations is more important and if there is a change in taxation there should be a broad public consensus with respect to such change. In this case, the only consensus is a consensus in opposition to this government's changes.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is signed by 632 constituents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior and, more specifically, from the town of Manitouwadge.

These residents are very concerned about a task force report on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas. This task force would see some 37 communities in my riding no longer eligible for the tax benefit.

Manitouwadge is 45 miles north of Highway 17 and well over 400 kilometres from the town of Thunder Bay. Therefore, the petitioners from Manitouwadge call upon Parliament to reject this task force report in its totality.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty to present to this House a petition from my constituents. It seems most appropriate on this budget day that the citizens of Canada from London are asking this government to scrap the proposed goods and services tax which will cause undue hardship to small business, seniors, students and people in lower income groups. They ask the government to rescind its action on the GST.

• (1120)

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions to the House today, one from Saanich in the Victoria area and another signed by residents from all across British Columbia who, on this very important budget day, are also asking the federal government to ensure that the federal-provincial forest agreement between this Parliament and the government in Victoria is signed to ensure that we can get the replanting that is needed in our deforested lands.

The minister is here today. He knows our concerns and he knows what we are looking for in the budget tonight to ensure that agreement is signed.

Point of Order

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from my adopted city of Windsor. It is properly certified.

The citizens of Windsor pray that the government will reconsider, reassess and rethink its position with respect to the imposition of the goods and services tax that it plans to put in place on the backs of the Canadian people on January 1, 1991.

These people pray that the government will reconsider its position and assess a different type of taxation rather than a consumer tax.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I also have a number of petitions against the goods and services tax from a number of different provinces and a number of different cities including Winnipeg and Selkirk, Manitoba, Comox, B.C. and many places in Alberta.

In the various petitions these citizens explain that they are concerned with the goods and services tax proposed by the Minister of Finance. They believe it is an unfair form of taxation because it lacks any regard for the taxpayers' ability to pay. They believe that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while forcing lower or middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

Therefore, these Canadians humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject this tax and call upon the federal government to institute a regime of fair taxation.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from a number of residents of Ottawa West, primarily senior citizens, who are concerned about the impact of the new goods and services tax on their ability to enjoy their retirement years in reasonable comfort and financial independence. They pray that Parliament reject the proposed goods and services tax.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the parliamentary secretary knows, before the Christmas break I asked if I was going to get an answer to my question with regard to moneys that the government has given to various corporations that have Senators as members. He at that time explained that it was a complicated issue. However, it has now been approximately four months since that question was given to the government. I would certainly like to know if we are going to get that information.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, if I am correct I think the hon. member is referring to Question No. 169. Answers have been drafted to that question. It is just going through the final translation and approval stages.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

BUDGET STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a short point of order regarding the budget presentation for later today.

Mr. Speaker, I would request that you review the rules governing the presentation of the budget and consider whether those rules provide for a 10–minute question and comment period to follow the delivery of the budget in the House by the Minister of Finance.

I would like to bring to your attention a few brief previous rulings on questions and comments in the hopes that you will find that it was clear in terms of the intention of the House that such a question and comment period be held when the relevant Standing Orders were originally adopted.

Standing Order 84(7) governs time limits and comments on speeches during the budget debate. It says:

> No Member, except the Minister of Finance, the Member speaking first on behalf of the Opposition, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, shall speak for more than twenty minutes at a time in the Budget Debate. Following the speech of > each member a period not exceeding ten minutes shall be made available, if required, to allow Members to ask questions and comment briefly on matters relevant to the speech and to allow responses thereto.

Mr. Speaker, the wording of this Standing Order is virtually identical to that of Standing Order 52 which governs another special debate in the House, the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

In considering then whether there can be questions and comments following the budget speech, it is quite pertinent to look to rulings regarding the nearly identically worded provisions for the address in reply.

For example, on December 9, 1983, the then Leader of the Opposition, who is currently our Prime Minister, replied to the Throne Speech. Following his comments my colleague, who is currently the member for Winnipeg Transcona, rose and attempted to direct a question. The then government House Leader interjected and asked the Speaker whether a question period was in order. He said:

> As a Leader of the Opposition and the Right Hon. Prime Minister may speak for an unlimited time I should like you to make your position clear on this issue, that we may know where we stand in the future.

The Deputy Speaker was quite clear on this point when he said:

> I shall quote from (the) Standing Order—which reads as follows:
>
> Following the speech of each Member a period not exceeding ten minutes shall be made available—
> That is strictly according to the rules. There has, however, been a practice of extending a courtesy which has normally been extended and the question period has been waived. However, according to the rules, the Hon. Member has the right to pose a question.

Following this clarification my colleague, out of courtesy, deferred his question. Nonetheless there was a clear ruling that according to the rules there is a right to pose a question.

So well understood was this right that when Journals branch published a chart of the time limits on speeches and debates in June 1984, it included on the chart the clear indication that questions and comments could be asked following the speeches of the Minister of Finance, the minister speaking first on behalf of the opposition, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

I have circulated to my hon. colleagues, the government House leader and yourself, as well as the House leader for the Official Opposition, the diagram that was submitted in 1984 by the Journals branch which makes it very clear that under the budget debate, whether it is the Minister of Finance or the minister speaking first on behalf of the opposition, the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition, while they have no time limit on their speeches, very clearly there is an opportunity to ask questions or make comments on their presentations.

You probably recall, Mr. Speaker, that that Journals publication of 1984 followed the 1982 report of the Special Committee on Standing Orders and Procedures. The Minister of Justice, the Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, the member for Burin—St. George's, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the member for Winnipeg Transcona and the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace are current members in the House who served on that special committee. After examining the proceedings, it is perfectly clear that their recommendations intended that the 10 minute question and comment period follow the lead addresses of the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Official Opposition and so on.

Apparently this new interpretation that people have followed is based on a ruling given on June 7, 1985. During the debate on the Meech Lake Accord on that day, following the comments of the then Leader of the Official Opposition, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, the then Minister of Justice rose and asked if he could ask a question. The Acting Speaker ruled that a question could not be put. He ruled as follows: "The first three speakers have unlimited time and I believe those who have unlimited time do not have a question or comment period, in accordance with Standing Order 35(1)."

Standing Order 35(1) is now found in two Standing Orders, Standing Order 43 and Standing Order 74. Standing Order 43 begins: "Unless otherwise provided in these Standing Orders—" and proceeds to define the question and comment period that follows speeches during motions.

As I have just explained, it is otherwise provided in the Standing Orders that such a provision is made for the budget speech specifically.

Point of Order

• (1130)

I am not certain it was the intention of the House in adopting the changes which created comment and question periods that ministers of the Crown, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Official Opposition would be protected from any rebuttal in the House. Certainly the first comments of a Speaker on these changes made no such clarification or qualification.

The Speaker of the day, Madam Speaker Sauve, said on January 17, 1983, as the rules were adopted on a one-year experimental basis only:

> The first—is a fundamental one which will directly affect the debating practices of the House. The introduction of a 10-minute period during which questions may be asked and comments made concerning the speech of the hon. member who has just spoken is likely to bring about a radical change in the way in which our debates are conducted. The 10-minute periods will be available to members during most key debates, including those on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the budget, allotted days and the second and third readings of bills.

Madam Sauve in her position as Speaker referred to no qualifications on the ability to pose questions following the speeches of our House's most important and prominent members.

In conclusion I would like to address why such questions should in fact be permitted.

First, it is a question of accountability. In the British Parliament there is a tradition of giving way which allows members to gain the floor briefly and rebut misleading or ambiguous statements in one another's speeches. This giving way has its own protocol but is extended to all ranks in the House; front benches as well as back benches.

Second, there is the question of fairness. Under the current interpretation there is no rebuttal to the speeches of the leaders or the first speakers of the government and Official Opposition, but other opposition members are quite properly held accountable through a question and comment period. We accept that minority parties are deprived of many of the privileges of the other two parties, but I ask whether this is a justifiable inequity.

In conclusion, I ask that you review, Mr. Speaker, my comments and then inform the House before the delivery of the budget later today whether or not questions will be permitted as provided for in Standing Order 84(7).

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has raised an important point of order. I think that it would be best to consider carefully the points the hon. member has made.

Is the hon. parliamentary secretary seeking the floor?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, we on the government side did wish to intervene, but I will yield the floor to my hon. friend from the Liberal Party to give him a chance to make his argument.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, since we had notice of the intention of the hon. member for Kamloops to raise this matter, I have had an opportunity to review some of the authorities, some of which he cited and other which appear in the Annotated Standing Orders, to assist the Chair in making a ruling on this point.

Without reviewing in detail the precedent raised in the 1983 Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne debate raised by the hon. member for Kamloops, I want to deal with the more recent precedents. There are four I have been able to find that deal with this issue.

The first was on March 27, 1985. In looking at this I ask Your Honour to bear in mind that Standing Order 84(7) is virtually identical in its wording with three other standing orders: Standing Order 43, Standing Order 74 and Standing Order 50(2) in so far as they deal with the question of questions and comments following speeches.

The words of the rule in my submission are quite clear. I think that the four precedents I am about to cite support the interpretation. I stress the words, particularly in French, because perhaps they are clearer than they are in English. If you do not mind, Mr. Speaker, I will quote the French reference in Standing Order 84(7), which states:

[Translation]

> No Member, except the Minister of Finance, the Member speaking first on behalf of the Opposition, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, shall speak for more than twenty minutes at a time in the Budget Debate. Following the speech of each Member—

[English]

Tout député, in other words refers to those members who are included in the rule, not the ones excluded. The reference to aucun député at the beginning of the rule and tout député afterward in my submission means those members included in the rule, not those excluded by the words. Every one of the rules I have cited, that is Standing Orders 43, 74 and 50(2), are written in the same way in English and in French. However, the use of those words in French, I submit, bears out the interpretation I think is intended to be given to the English rule; that is to say, the rule applies to all those members except the ones excluded. That interpretation has been followed through in my submission very consistently, aside from the 1983 precedent.

I refer Your Honour to March 27, 1985, as reported at page 3423 of Hansard for that day. The question under discussion was second reading of a bill under what is now Standing Order 74.

The question arose as to whether any questions could be asked of a person who had made a 40-minute speech permitted under that rule; one of the speeches usually made by the mover of the motion, the first person speaking on behalf of the Official Opposition and the second person speaking for another party in opposition. The Acting Speaker on that occasion, the hon member for Edmonton North said:

> Under Standing Order 35(2) you are entitled, if you are going to be speaking for the party, to speak for 40 minutes. There are no questions for the first three speakers.

Subsequently, on June 7, 1985, as reported at pages 5550 and 5551 of Hansard, there was a debate proceeding on a motion to amend the Constitution. I think my hon. friend from Kamloops has referred to this already.

On page 5551, following the speech of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, there was a question raised as to whether or not questions and comments could be put to him. The Acting Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton North, a member of this House today and also one of our Acting Speakers, said:

> May I just have the floor for a minute? The first three speakers have unlimited time and I believe those who have unlimited time do not have a question or comment period, in accordance with Standing Order 35(1). After that, there are 20-minute speeches plus the question and comment period.

It so happened that there was a continuing discussion among the members at the time, but that was the ruling of the Chair, however brief, on June 7, 1985.

Following that, on April 9, 1986 the Competition Tribunal Act was under discussion in the House. The question of questions and comments came up again following the speech of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. The Speaker said, as reported at page 12053 of Debates for that particular day:

> It is entirely up to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, but our practice has been that those speakers who have unlimited time have not been subject, under the rules, to the 10-minute question and comment period.

Subsequently on June 22, 1987, as reported at pages 7477 and 7478 of Hansard, there were further comments made in respect of this matter following a speech by the right hon. Prime Minister during the debate on capital punishment.

The hon. member for York Centre rose on a point of order and said:

> Every member who speaks on this resolution is subject to being questioned by other members of the House after he concludes his remarks. I realize that under the rules the Prime Minister is exempted from that requirement. However, he is participating in this debate, which is not a government measure and which requires a free vote. He is participating as a private member.
> Therefore, I wonder if he might agree and there may be unanimous consent to have the normal question and answer period that is applied to all other members.

There was not unanimous consent. The Speaker went on to comment on that intervention and he said, as reported on page 7478 of Hansard:

> I think in the interests of informing all hon. members and the public which is watching and listening to this debate, that it should be made very clear that under the rules, for party leaders and the right hon. Prime Minister, there is no mandatory provision whereby the usual following 10 minutes of questions and comments would be directed at the right hon. Prime Minister, unless of course it was with the unanimous consent of the House. I think it is quite clear that there is not unanimous consent.

Those are the precedents which I think support the proposition that what we have in the argument put forward by the hon. member for Kamloops is an argument which might be better put to a committee studying the rules.

Point of Order

• (1140)

While it may have been the intention of the framer of the rule to have it interpreted this way, it certainly has not been so interpreted in accordance with these four authorities. It certainly has not been interpreted that way during this Parliament since the election of 1988. Indeed in my experience the interpretation has been consistent with the authorities I have cited.

It seems to me that what the hon. member for Kamloops is asking the Chair to do is to change the interpretation of Standing Order 84(7) to make it at variance with the interpretation of all the other similarly worded rules in the Standing Orders without going through a change to the rule. I am not sure that such a change would in fact be agreeable to members of this House.

Speaking for the Opposition, I suggest that the consistent practice has been not to permit questions and comments following the unlimited speech times provided for in the rules or after the 40-minute speeches provided for in Standing Order 74 on second reading of a bill.

Given the consistent practice in that regard, I suggest that Your Honour ought to continue to follow that practice for the budget debate that will be starting presumably tomorrow, if not later today, depending upon when you consider it to have begun.

I would ask that Your Honour rule that there are no such question and comment periods following the unlimited times, and that if the hon. member for Kamloops wishes to pursue the matter further he should raise it with the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to spend a great deal of the time of the House in going through this point of order. I have listened with care to the arguments made by the hon. member for Kamloops and the member from Kingston.

I think most of the precedents, if not all of them, that I would have referred to in my argument have been covered. The precedents are very clear. Certainly the most recent precedents under which we have been operating for the last five or six years are very clear that there is a pattern in this area. That pattern is that the first two speakers, those who are exempted from the 20-minute rule, are not subject to a question and comment period to follow that speech without the consent of the House.

There are two points that I wish to make in that regard. First, in looking at the Annotated Standing Orders we see that they are a summary of the Standing Orders with some explanatory notes. Those explanatory notes are a collection of experiences and applications of those particular Standing Orders. Reading from page 270 of the Annotated Standing Orders, we see that the last paragraph in the explanatory notes regarding Standing Order 84(7) states in part:

> This section also provides for a 10-minute question and comment period, which has been interpreted to mean that no questions may be directed to the members who have been exempted from the 20-minute time limit.

The Annotated Standing Orders, which as I say are a summary not only of precedent but of practice, are very clear that the practices and methods we have used in the House on this question have very much set a pattern which says that there should not be questions after these two major speeches.

The second important point is that on looking through the precedents which have already been described it is very clear that the patterns and the habits which have been emerging are that in cases where this matter has come up there has been a request for unanimous consent.

I would argue that when there is a request for unanimous consent it is because the Standing Orders we are operating under do not provide for that particular action. In other words, we have to go outside those rules in order to accomplish what the particular individual would like to accomplish at that moment. That is why someone has to ask for unanimous consent.

That pattern has emerged so clearly over the years that it once again demonstrates very forcefully that Standing Order 84(7) does make it clear, has been interpreted as such, and has been practised as such that the Prime Minister and the first member speaking on behalf of the Opposition are exempted from the question and comment period.

As I said, I do not want to go through the precedents. They have been well put forward by the hon. member from Kingston. I do not need to repeat them.

The practice is very clear. Our Annotated Standing Orders are very clear. As a result the practices we have been using for the last five or six years which have demonstrated a very clear pattern are the practices that we need to continue in the future.

I would like to refer to the Lefebvre committee which was the committee that first started this process of having questions and comments. I was a member of that committee in 1983–84 when the practice was first introduced. Very shortly after we found that there was a habit developing in the House of not applying the questions and comments to the speeches made by the Prime Minister or the first speaker for the Opposition.

I mention that because following the Lefebvre committee very closely was the McGrath task force which made major recommendations in terms of changes and reforms to the House. I also served on that committee. As I recall—and I am going from memory and not from a document that proves my case—the McGrath task force did not in any way try to change that practice which was already emerging at that particular point.

I think we have precedent and practice. There have not been any changes recommended by either the McGrath task force or the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business. It is very clear that we should continue with the practice we now have, that is if someone wishes that to happen they should ask for consent. Then the government, the Opposition or the individual member speaking, at that point has the option of whether or not to accept it. It is not, as I believe is the very clear practice of this House, to allow those questions and comments under the present rules.

Mr. Speaker: Is there any further reply from the hon. member for Kamloops?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the case has been well put by my hon. colleagues. I ask however, as I pleaded in the latter part of my presentation, that you give some thought to equity, fairness and justice in the House, particularly as reflected in the Mother of Parliament where front-benchers and back-benchers are treated in a similar fashion. There are no privileges extended to selected members of the House, but those same privileges are extended to all members.

Mr. Speaker: As I said a few minutes ago, it is a very interesting point the hon. member for Kamloops has raised. I have listened carefully to his comments. I also listened to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. parliamentary secretary.

The argument put forward is such that I think it is appropriate to reserve on it. I shall try to return to the House with some guidance for the House at three o'clock.

I want to thank the hon. member for Kamloops for presenting an argument which was extremely clear and well enunciated. I thank other members for their interventions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Ms. Clancy (p. 8227).

• (1150)

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to join in this debate today on Bill C-26 and to speak to some of the comments that have been made previously. The member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, a member of our caucus, has done an outstanding job on the debate on Bill C-26.

I would like to review some of the arguments that he has presented and talk about the impact that this legislation is to have on Atlantic Canada. It will compound the problems that exist in the fishing industry there, as well as add to all the problems that this government is causing for that region of the country.

Just before getting into my comments I want to survey some of the research I have done on this matter and to refer to some of the reading I have been able to do. I really wish to compliment again the member of our caucus who has really led the fight on this particular legislation.

I would like to take a look at some of the work that has been done in this regard. Madam Speaker, I know that you would be most interested in doing that. In particular I would like to refer to the headlines, which is I guess how Canadians find out about what we are doing in this place. One headline in referring to the National Transportation Agency states "NDP Critic Asks the Agency" to review this matter. He caught them off guard. That is the kind of good work we are doing in this area.

Another headline states "Subsidy Being Cut and Elevator Closing". Here is a good one. Like all members in this House we like to have stories like this one written about us from time to time: "The MP from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre is making waves in New Brunswick".

The reason he is making waves in New Brunswick is that once again this government is bringing in the kind of bottom line mentality legislation that is having an impact on the Atlantic Canadian region, as well as on other areas.

We can put this matter back to back with the debate we had just last night on legislation that is going to help the wealthy. It is interesting as well to see the position that the Liberal Party takes on this matter. As you know, Madam Speaker, it would appear that it has given up on the fight on the GST. Liberal Party members have no position. They are not even sure what that is.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gardiner: It will be interesting to see just what position they take on this particular legislation.

We have them excited again, as we did yesterday. We woke them up. The Liberal Party as we know has been following the practices that the Conservatives are now implementing.

Let us take a look at what Bill C-26 is all about. First, I would like to give a little background. This bill is commonly referred to as the at and east freight assistance program which pays a subsidy to the railways on export grain and flour moving via specified routes through eastern Canadian ports. The rates paid by the shipper have been frozen since 1960 with respect to export grain and since 1966 with respect to flour.

The notes are very interesting. If members need them after to do some work on this subject I would be pleased to provide them with a copy. Let us look at the history of this legislation, Bill C-26.

When the railways wished to increase their rates in the 1960s, it was then argued—I bet it was even argued by the Conservatives at that time—that increased rates would price Saint John and Halifax out of the market. It was thus felt important to maintain rates at a fixed level so that eastern rates would remain competitive.

The beneficiaries of this particular legislation were Halifax and Saint John. Here are some interesting statistics concerning this matter. Of all grain moved from Saint John, 95 per cent moves under Bill C-26, the at and east program, while 67 per cent of grain moved through Halifax moves through the at and east program as well.

With respect to flour, virtually all flour moved through the two ports moves at the at and east rates. Flour amounts to approximately one-third of all general cargo handled at Halifax and 7 per cent of general cargo at Saint John.

What is the cost? It is a subsidy, and we all know what the Conservatives think about subsidies. They will cut them wherever they are needed and then, as the member from Kootenay West said so clearly last night in the debate on Bill C-52, they will argue: "We have to make things fairer. We have to do away with that evil universality. We must take from those people who do not need it, and let us make sure that the people who are poor and are in need get some kind of assistance".

What do they do? They introduce Bill C-52 which helps the wealthy. Yet, what are they doing in this case? They are cutting a subsidy which costs about $32 million a year as calculated by our researchers who have spent a considerable amount of time looking into this matter. In Bill C-52, the bill we debated last night, what are we giving to the wealthy? Hundreds of millions of dollars.

Let us see who depends on this subsidy for help in this particular market area and in terms of these transportation costs.

The Halifax—Darmouth Port Development Commission stated: "The economics of grain traffic at the port in 1988 amounted to $25.9 million in revenues and 263 jobs while flour traffic resulted in $28.4 million in revenues and 220 jobs".

The Saint John Port Corporation states that the movement of bulk grain through its port in 1988 under the program amounted to $8.5 million, along with 90 direct jobs. In addition to the 573 direct jobs lost at these two ports, another 250 indirect jobs may be lost as well.

What will this mean? It will compound the problems that this government is already adding to Atlantic Canada: the fisheries problem, VIA Rail cuts, ACOA's shuffling of money and the shim-sham there.

The loss of the at and east program likely means the closing of the elevator at Halifax and almost certainly the elevator at Saint John meaning further jobs lost. The reason the loss of the program is so devastating to Saint John is that its elevator can only accept grain from railway cars and has no facilities to unload ships. It is going to worsen the situation already existing at Saint John.

If the elevator in Halifax closes, it threatens the future of the Dover Flour Mills. It is the only flour mill in Atlantic Canada. The Conservatives think that nobody knows what Bill C-26 is. They say: "We will sneak that one through". What usually happens is that the people who are directly involved in any of these particular industries or the supporting infrastructure quickly learn just what the impact is of a sneaky bill like this.

It is only through the diligent work of members of this side of the House, especially the member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre who has really been leading the fight against this legislation, to stop it that we can bring to the attention of this House all of the problems involving the resulting gains and losses if in fact it gets through this House.

Who are the winners? With the Tories and the Liberals it is always the wealthy, the better off, those corporations that can afford to pay $1.7 million for their leadership campaigns.

The winners in the loss of the at and east are central Canada, primarily Montreal, as well as the ports in Ontario.

There is a question here that was raised in previous meetings I have had. It is: Let us take a real look at the subsidies. We are not suggesting that you shut the St. Lawrence Seaway down. But if they are talking about subsidies, let us see what goes into keeping the Seaway going. It is the same kind of argument that supporters of VIA Rail have made.

• (1200)

The government states: "We are subsidizing it to the hilt. We can't do this. We'll do a lousy job just like the Liberals did and we'll shut it down". Of course, if you take a look at the subsidies to airlines with airports and maintenance at airports, then you have a true picture. That is the same situation that we are going to get with this particular legislation.

This government, and I am also familiar with our provincial government in British Columbia, would be satisfied to shut almost everything down, put an 800 number in and run the country from Ottawa, or in the case of the Social Credit government in British Columbia from Victoria.

That is the kind of bottom line mentality that you end up with with these types of governments. I do not know if they really and truly understand the effects of the legislation that they try to get through this House from time to time. They should spend more time talking to constituents, the people who work in the jobs in the resources and in the industries in this country to get a better understanding of the impact that they are having.

The removal of at and east likely means a loss of elevators at Halifax and Saint John. They are all-season ports in eastern Canada. We know how important that is to our trade in this country. It will have an effect of further crippling the regions of Canada to the benefit of central Canada. We should try to ensure in this House that we spread those benefits a little further. There is not a region that I can think of that is probably in more need of attention now than it has ever been, namely, Atlantic Canada.

It also shows that Canada is really quite spineless in international trade negotiations. While the U.S. is increasing agriculture subsidies in order to corner some traditional Canadian markets, we have moved toward unilateral disarmament by cutting subsidies to the regions that need them the most. Canada has yet again knuckled under to U.S. and European pressure. It is another example of the failure of this government in its trade and economic policies.

As the debate continues on this legislation, my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, will bring this issue to Parliament to the attention of all Canadians. He will be working hard, as will all members of this caucus, to ensure that the issues are brought forward, that we do our best to bring some equality to this country and help to those regions that need it. It helps to develop our resources and our industries.

Certainly our caucus will keep up the fight on Bill C-26. We will see whatever the Liberals do on this. We are not sure, given whatever kind of strategy they have right now on the GST and Bill C-52 but we are trying to get a reading of it. I hope they will join with us in fighting this legislation.

Mr. Harvard: I find the remarks of the hon. member from British Columbia very interesting. He seems to be very concerned about what the Liberals might do. The Liberals have been fighting for this country a lot longer than the New Democrats. When it comes to cutting regional programs in Atlantic Canada, central Canada, western Canada you can be sure that the Liberal Party will be there. We do not have to be concerned about the NDP. I can assure the hon. member for British Columbia that he does not have to go through any sleepless nights. The Liberal party will be here standing up for the regions of the country.

Despite the fact that the member has made some irresponsible remarks, particularly with respect to the Official Opposition, I do have a question for him and I hope that he has an answer.

He has been expressing concern about the effects of the at and east subsidy elimination. I would like to know from him—because the NDP is always concerned about workers and jobs—what effect this might have on jobs in Atlantic Canada, in western Canada and in central Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: Madam Speaker, I have enjoyed the debate of the last couple of days because the Liberals to our right are very testy these days. I appreciate the opportunity to respond to some of the questions that they have.

Mr. Gauthier: We are 51 in the polls. You are only 21. Who is testy?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, let me respond in detail. I think that proves my point about who is being testy and who is not.

I enjoy sitting beside the member from Winnipeg from time to time on our flights to the west. He talked about regional programs. Well, let me tell you, Madam Speaker, about one regional program and where the Liberals do or do not stand, depending on the time of day. For example, forestry. In the 1984 election campaign, the Liberals then Leader, the one who just resigned, came to the minister's and my home town in northern British Columbia and said that he was absolutely against a full-fledged department of forestry. Then he tried to make a landing during the last campaign and of course he was fog-bound like the Liberal Party usually is.

If we are going to talk about regional programs, let us talk about something critical. Let us talk about education and post-secondary education. Which government was it that through its six and five program lifted the requirement that spending money on education, post-secondary education and health care had to be spent on that matter in the provinces which received those funds? Ultimately, it is the Liberals who are responsible for letting Socreds pave the Coquihalla Highway with money that should have been spent on education and health care in B.C.

The concerns that we have with Bill C-26 are the obvious loss of jobs that have been outlined by our critic. He has now listed the number of jobs in Atlantic Canada that will be lost. Through a coherent transportation policy adopted by New Democrats, we can ensure that jobs in Atlantic Canada are preserved and that we have a rational shipping policy that equals all of the concerns across the country.

Mr. Milliken: I am provoked by the hon. member's comments to participate in this debate and make a comment to him.

I am delighted to see the New Democratic Party, which has no representation whatsoever in Atlantic Canada, taking this new found interest in the eastern part of our country. I think that it is fair to say that the members in the New Democratic Party represent a western rump. It is a well-known fact that their inability to get seats in Atlantic Canada is reflected in the fact that they now stand here trumpeting day after day their concerns for the problems that are besetting that region of the country, thanks to the hon. members opposite who have botched their attempts to salvage what they can from the financial and economic mess they have created in eastern Canada.

Having said that, I think that what we need to look at is the fact that the voters of Atlantic Canada are extremely astute. If the hon. member would take the time to look at the polls, he would see that the voters there have indicated a preference for the Liberal party. That was reflected in the last campaign and no doubt will be reflected in the next campaign. The Liberal party was paced at 47 percentage points ahead of its nearest rivals, the Conservatives. The New Democratic Party is trying to jump on this Liberal bandwagon. It feels that by opposing these bills to which we have already announced our opposition that it can benefit somehow from the phenomenal rise that the Liberal party is experiencing across Canada.

We in the Liberal party are delighted to have the support of the New Democratic Party in our opposition to government measures. We recognize, as they do, that the voters would not normally bother to elect them if they had a reasonable choice. We know that the hon. member who just spoke, and to whom I address my comments, is elected from the province of British Columbia. He was just citing to us the difficulty the electors of British Columbia have. They elected a Social Credit government. Well, it is the only province in Canada that made such a silly mistake.

We in the Liberal party offer an alternative across the country. The hon. member is an example of the problem that the electors of British Columbia have in saying they always want to jump on the Liberal bandwagon but do not quite manage to do it when it comes to votes. I know that the member would want to invite them to vote Liberal the next time so that they can get in the true opposition spirit to oppose Conservative government policies. He knows that we have opposed those policies. He knows that we are leaders in opposing those policies and Canadians know it too, as reflected in the polls. I invite the member to comment on that.

Mr. Gardiner: I appreciate the question from my hon. friend on Bill C–26. First, what is it that is an indication and a sign to Canadians in any part of the country that a political party in this House is concerned about a particular issue? What do we do within our own caucuses? We try to work within our caucus to convince our leader to know and get to understand those issues. Which leader was in Canso just a few days ago expressing the concerns of Atlantic Canadians? Audrey McLaughlin, the Leader of the New Democrats was there recognizing the importance of that issue.

The Liberals do not have a leader. The hon. member is so confident. Those who live by the polls die by the polls. We will see in the next election campaign just where the polls are sitting when Canadians finally see just what the Liberal party's position is on the GST, on Bill C–26, on helping the wealthy with Bill C–52, really what their position is on free trade.

This debate and the news this morning really struck a chord with me. The lead item on the news was how a baffled Liberal MP wandered into a finance committee meeting last night. Where is their participation? If that keeps up, we know where they will be in the polls very shortly.

I cannot sit down without making the comment to friends in my party and members of the public that Atlantic Canada has been kicked around by Liberals and Conservatives year in and year out. People ask me why do they still vote for Liberals and Conservatives. I think a change is in the wind. We are going to see a change. In the next election campaign, the people of Atlantic Canada will know who their friends are. They will know who is fighting the GST, they will know who is fighting the VIA Rail cuts and they will know who is taking a leadership role on Bill C–26, Madam Speaker, and you will see what the results are in the next federal election.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, after listening to the nonsense from the hon. member from British Columbia the last few minutes, I wish to heaven that the New Democrats would come to realize who the political enemy is in this Chamber and in this country. They are not on this side of the House, they are over there and Canadians well understand that. All you have to do is look at the last poll. The Liberals are over 50 per cent in popular support, and there are the New Democrats down with the Tories at 22 per cent and 21 per cent. Canadian people understand that but certainly the New Democrats do not.

It is indeed an honour for me to take part in this debate to address the matter that is before us, Bill C-26. I must admit that I feel some unease, I feel considerable trepidation because what we are dealing with here is Tory legislation. We know what Tory legislation has come to mean. I shudder to think what is going to be coming down the pike this afternoon at approximately 4.30. After five and a half years of Tory mismanagement, I can just imagine what is going to be in the budget document. But we will leave that for another moment.

I will not go into the history of the at and east subsidy at this particular time. Other members have done a very good job of that. The at and east subsidy had the effect of freezing rail shipping rates for grain at and east of Buffalo, New York and to eastern ports at 1960 levels for grain and 1966 levels for flour.

However, I think it is noteworthy to mention something that was said by the hon. Jack Pickersgill in 1966 when this particular legislation was under consideration. The then transport minister stated: "One of the aims of the subsidy was to ensure that we will have rates which will provide some inducement and incentive to shippers to use the facilities of Atlantic ports."

This is significant because it was seen then for what it really was and that is a regional program—and I want to underline that—a regional program. It has served the regions of the country well, not just the Atlantic region, although I would say particularly the Atlantic region, but also parts of Ontario as well as the grain growing areas of western Canada.

Despite the success of the program, despite the fact that regional programs in Atlantic Canada have already been cut 39 per cent in the past five years, despite the fact that Atlantic Canada is going through some very, very tough times right now, especially with respect to the fishery, despite the success of the at and east program which has been very important to the agricultural industry of this country, like so many other programs it has to be sacrificed.

Why? Because it does not fit the Tory agenda. It does not fit the Tory right wing economics. It does not fit the Tory market economy. It does not fit the Tory law of the jungle, and it does not fit the Tory withdrawal from almost everything that has made this country great. So the at and east subsidy has to go because Tory theology says it must go, and so it goes.

It really does not matter what Canadians might say. It certainly does not matter what farmers might say or what port workers, mill workers or elevator workers might say. They really do not count. It only matters what Tory ministers say. The Tory ministers say that the at and east must go. In fact, the Tory ministers do not give a hoot about what is said in this House. The minister who opened second reading debate stated: "The subsidy was terminated on July 15, 1989." That is a direct quote from Hansard. How do you like that? The purpose of this Bill C-26 is to end the subsidy, but the minister says it was terminated last July 15.

Therefore, I ask the question, why are we here today? Why are we wasting our time? The government has already decided the subsidy is already terminated. We have been presented with a fait accompli. That to me is disgusting, for this is the purest form of contempt, contempt for Parliament, contempt for members of this House, contempt for the democratic process, and contempt for the Canadian people. The subsidy was terminated on July 15, 1989. I want to repeat that so that it really sinks in: the subsidy was terminated July 15, 1989.

It takes a particular brand of arrogance to say something like that, to do something like that. But of course we already know that Tory arrogance knows no bounds. There is really nothing new about it.

I want to remind you, Madam Speaker, of something else that this government did back in August, 1989. The Department of Finance placed two full page ads in major newspapers across the country which stated: "On January 1, 1991, Canada's federal sales tax system will change. Please save this notice."

• (1220)

Without a word of formal debate in this House, the government had the arrogance to tell the country that Canada's federal sales tax system will change. "Please save this notice". That, to me, was arrogant. It was in contempt of this House and it drew a rare rebuke from the Speaker of this Parliament.

But this government, it seems, Madam Speaker, never learns anything. This time it tells us that, as far as the at and east subsidy is concerned, the subsidy was terminated July 15, 1989.

I want to pick up on something else the minister said, referring to the bill. "It will stimulate creativity and innovation. It will allow the industry to take advantage of unanticipated sales opportunities, no longer constraining potential cost savings".

I would like the minister to tell that to the 1,200 workers who hold jobs connected with this legislation. Tell that to the 320 transport workers and the 295 who hold milling jobs in western Canada, the 75 who hold jobs in Georgian Bay ports, the 85 who hold jobs in Halifax and Saint John, and the 402 who hold jobs in central Canada. Maybe the minister would like to tell her story face to face to these workers. I am quite sure that she would get an earful.

Why should we believe anything that this government tells us, for nothing ever works. Nothing it promises comes true. Remember all the big talk when it came to power nearly five and a half years ago. It was going to clean up the economy, and of course it promised not to touch any social programs. But here it is 1990, and the country, particularly its economy, is in a mess. Inflation is on the rise, unemployment is on the rise, interest rates are shooting through the roof. Never before have we seen such a spread in interest rates between Canada and the United States. The debt has doubled in five and one-half years. Our trade surplus is the worst in 10 years, and we are taxed, taxed and taxed. Come 1991, if the Tories get their way, we are going to get hammered again with the so-called goods and services tax.

The Tories have hacked VIA Rail. They have privatized unemployment insurance, and they have ended universality through that iniquitous thing called the clawback.

The government says it will save $40 million or $60 million by killing the at and east subsidy. I submit that this cannot be seen in isolation. I must remind members of other cuts in last spring's budget. I know it is painful for the Tories to hear, but I think it bears reminding. Two hundred million was cut out of crop insurance, $48 million cut out of rail line rehabilitation, $54 million cut out of advance payments for grain, $15 million cut out of the Farm Credit Corporation, $12 million cut out of the Canadian Dairy Commission. Cut, cut, cut and cut some more; $399 million in all in farm support programs gone. Just like smoke in the wind. It could not come at a worst time.

Farm income is expected to drop 39 per cent across the country this year. That old saw about Tory times are tough times comes particularly true in the year 1990. It seems that the Tories are bound and determined to keep on hacking, slashing and cutting, even if it does not make any sense.

Look, if you will, at their priorities. They want to kill at and east and save a few million dollars, after raising the alcohol and tobacco taxes $475 million in the last budget. In the meantime, they will not go after over 100,000 corporations which do not pay income tax at all, corporations which earned in total $25 billion. One really wonders where their priorities are.

However, the Tories will ride herd on farmers, port and mill workers. Under the at and east rates, the Atlantic region has proven to be a good market for western producers. Look at the figures. Last winter, the Canadian Wheat Board moved more than 175,000 tonnes of grain to ports in Halifax and Saint John, but it is more like 400,000 tonnes a year.

With the at and east subsidy gone, Atlantic Canada will have to look elsewhere for its purchases. It does not have a choice, for what we are talking about here is a matter of survival. Producers in Atlantic Canada cannot supply their own market. They account for only 20 per cent of Nova Scotia's requirements, 35 per cent to 40 per cent of New Brunswick's, and I believe it is about 80 per cent for Prince Edward Island.

The withdrawal of the at and east subsidy will place an enormous burden on livestock and poultry producers in Atlantic Canada and, of course, it will rob western farmers of one of their traditional markets.

Atlantic Canada cannot be expected to take this lying down. They are tough people there and they are not going to take it lying down.

Consider, if you will, what the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission is proposing. It has come up with three possible options to offset the effects of the loss of the at and east subsidy.

First, importing barley, wheat and oats from France and other European countries. These countries would be able to supply the east coast at cheaper prices than those from domestic sources. That is certainly not good news for western Canada. The second option proposed by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission is asking the federal government to drop its countervail on American corn. The third option is the use of unit trains to move grain directly from the prairies to the ports of Halifax and Saint John.

In the perspective of the Atlantic provinces, I am sure those proposals make a lot of sense, but from a federal perspective they show just how foolish the federal government is in cancelling the at and east subsidy. Why would anyone want to drive Atlantic Canada to the European markets to buy supplies when those supplies are already available right here in Canada and that has been going on for years and years? Why would anyone, through government policy, want U.S. corn to be bought which would only place farmers at a disadvantage in this country? There is something terribly wrong with this. It makes one wonder whether the government has gone completely mad. It is as if the government has taken a huge knife and cut the country in half. It is as if it wants to break the bonds that tie our regions together and drive them into the arms of our competitors.

There is nothing in Bill C-26 for national unity. There is nothing for Halifax, nothing for Saint John, nothing for any part of Atlantic Canada. There is certainly nothing for anyone except ideologically driven Tory ministers who are hell-bent on wrecking venerable Canadian institutions and venerable Canadian programs, programs which over time have proven their worth and value, but they have to go. That is what Tory ideology says and that is what Tory theology says.

Let me point out that these cutbacks, and this one in particular, are coming at time which could not be worse. It is a time when the Americans, our competitors, our adversaries in the marketplace, are putting in place a $900 million export subsidy program. That will not help us. That will help American farmers. Can you imagine how absurd the situation is. We are going absolutely in the wrong direction and farmers are left completely vulnerable because of government policy.

When you think about it, it all fits a pattern. The Americans raid our traditional grain markets and make it more difficult for our pork and beef producers to gain access to the U.S. market. On the other hand, the Americans are demanding that they flog their ice cream and yogurt in our markets.

What does our government do to counteract this? It cuts farm support programs by $399 million in the budget of last spring. It takes oats away from the Canadian Wheat Board. It has threatened the supply-management system in the country and those of us who are most pessimistic, particularly if this Tory reign goes on much longer, believe there will not be a supply-management system left in this country.

Is it any wonder that we are deathly afraid of what might happen in the subsidy negotiations in the next few years? Will there be anything left? Can you imagine a worse fate than leaving subsidy negotiations in the hands of the people over there? Their idea of negotiation is to give things away. If an agreement is consummated that way, then it is a success. That is not success, unless success is measured in destroying programs and destroying institutions.

The Tory approach to tackling problems raises fundamental questions. What will they do when they finish selling off the family silverware? By that I mean, what will they do after removing the underpinnings of the farm community? What will they do after they finish privatizing unemployment insurance, decimating VIA Rail, closing rural post offices and ending universality? What will they do after their wrecking job?

When they discover after this decimation that there are still problems of disparity, of poverty, of inflation, and still problems of unemployment, what will they do then? What will the Tories do when they have given away the store completely?

Madam Speaker, there was a report in one of the weekend papers that in the coming budget—which will be delivered in this House in approximately four hours—the Minister of Finance would announce a sell-off of about $1 billion in federal properties.

I do not know if that is going to happen. If the government were to do that, it would suggest to me that Tory economic policy is just one step away from rigor mortis. We know that when the fellow begins to sell off properties, everything in the house and in the garage, and sell off all the tools, you know he is just one step away from bankruptcy. That is the status of Tory economic policy right now. After five and a half years of Tory rule, there is total and complete economic mismanagement.

I hope that the government of the day will rethink this position, particularly with respect to the at and east subsidy, go back to square one and consult Canadians, because they have some good ideas. We do not have to go through with this. I hope the government will consider some amendments when this bill reaches committee.

Mr. Laporte: Madam Speaker, I appreciated the hon. member's speech. In fact, it sounded like it was written by a social democrat.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Samson: That's the way they are. They campaign like New Democrats and govern like Tories.

Mr. Laporte: Madam Speaker, I would like to make a comment and then ask the hon. member a question.

I appreciate his quote from Minister Pickersgill, who pointed out that contrary to the government's statement that this bill was originally put in place not so much to help Halifax and Saint John compete with American ports, but to aid those ports in competing with the St. Lawrence ports. That was the original purpose of this bill.

Early this morning the transport committee, of which I am a member, met with members from the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission. The government has ignored this bill for some eight months. This is only the second day of debate on it. I find it quite insulting that it would bring it up on the very day when the transport committee is meeting with people from the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission. We had to cut our meeting short in order to come to the House to debate this bill. It is just another example of how this government really does not give a damn about the maritimes or the at and east bill.

Some excellent presentations were made to the committee today. One of the presentations was by Dover Flour Mills, who are very concerned about this bill. John Doering pointed out on behalf of Dover Flour Mills and the milling industry that their concern with respect to this bill is not about competing with the Americans, it is competing with the St. Lawrence ports. Their problem in dealing with the the Americans is the enhancement program to which the Americans are contributing this $900 million. In light of that, I would like to quote from Mr. Doering's brief.

He does not even call it the free trade agreement, because they know there is nothing free in that agreement. He states:

> In light of the Canada–U.S. Trade Agreement we have agreed to move away from subsidies, but the U.S. agricultural sector which includes agri-business, will continue to be subsidized and benefit from a continuation of the Export Enhancement Policy which, more than anything else, has been and will continue to be the instrument of the destruction of the Canadian milling industry. That policy allows mills in the U.S. to run at full capacity while we languish at two-thirds capacity. Investment in production efficiencies or upgrading is unlikely to be considered attractive in the Canadian milling industry and, in this weakened state, we are asked to move aggressively toward competing for business in the U.S. against a very strong U.S. milling sector, who already have much lower wheat costs.
> Added to this, the U.S. mills have a transportation advantage as U.S. railways have a less restrictive tax regime and lower operating costs for fuel taxes.

That is an example of how the free trade agreement affects the maritimes. During the campaign and again in his speech, the hon. member has made some very interesting comments and has been very vocal against the free trade agreement. There is some concern with the Liberal leadership these days because of rumours that not everybody is opposed to the free trade agreement.

I would like the member to reconfirm that he, in fact, is opposed, if not to free trade itself, certainly to the free trade agreement, and that he will oppose this bill and any measures that are going to limit real free trade in this country.

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre. I can say to him and to this House, unequivocally and categorically, that I was against the free trade agreement in the election campaign and I remain against the free trade agreement.

Our former leader, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, has said several times that when it comes to the free trade agreement he is on the right side of history. After only a year of that agreement in place, I believe he has already been vindicated. As time goes on, there will be more and more evidence that the free trade agreement is going to harm this country irreparably.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre asked whether I was against the bill and if I would continue to be against the bill. The answer is yes.

I want to point out something that I did not mention in my speech a few minutes ago. It has to do with proposals put forward by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission.

• (1240)

The commission has put forward a number of proposals. I will not go through them at this time, but it has been estimated that in totality the proposals put forward by the commission would have resulted in savings to the federal government of about $22 million in transportation subsidies each year, which by the way represents about half the cost of the at and east subsidy. One would think that the federal government, given its bent and penchant for savings and so on, would favour such a proposal.

The wringer here is that the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Committee has never received a formal reply to its proposals. Never. It makes one wonder. It seems that this government is more interested in just hacking and slashing as opposed to listening and responding to responsible proposals like, for example, those from the APTC.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James (Mr. Harvard), who earlier referred to our government's poor management—

Mr. Gauthier: He is right!

Mr. Saint-Julien: I have to tell Canadians that we received this legacy from the previous Liberal government.

I would like to ask him the following question: Further to the Scientific Research Tax Credits Program which was—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saint-Julien: —introduced by former Minister Marc Lalonde—

Mr. Gauthier: Change your question, you asked that yesterday!

Mr. Saint-Julien: I would like to ask him the following question: The program is yesterday's news, but I want an answer today—

An hon. member: He didn't get the right answer to his questions!

Mr. Saint-Julien: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask him the following question: This program was supposed to cost 200 million dollars but ended up costing 3.5 billion. Furthermore, it ended up being—

Mr. Duhamel: The Conservatives took advantage of the program—

Mr. Saint-Julien: —1.9 billion in the red, because of funds that completely disappeared, both in Canada and outside the country.

Is the hon. member aware of this fact, Madam Speaker, and if so, is he prepared to table a motion in the House to ask for a royal inquiry on the program introduced by the Liberals which ended up with a 1.9 billion loss? We could have built 50 hospitals in this country for that amount.

Is the hon. member prepared to table in the House a motion requesting a royal inquiry on Marc Lalonde's program, Canada's theft of the century?

[English]

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question.

Show me a government that never made a mistake and I will show you a government that has never done anything. The fact of the matter is—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harvard: Do the Tories want the answer or not?

The fact of the matter is that yes, previous Liberal administrations tried things and they did not always work out to the best. Anybody who is honest will admit to it.

I will tell you one thing, Madam Speaker. Liberal governments never went out and deliberately destroyed a program. Liberal governments never went out and deliberately destroyed institutions, and that is exactly what this government has done for five and a half years.

If the government wants to hear the litany of programs and institutions that it has destroyed, I would have to be here all day. I just remind those members that they have decimated VIA Rail. They have gone after social programs despite the Prime Minister's solemn promise during the election campaign of 1984 that he would not touch social programs. He was not going to touch social programs. Was he in office two months or three months before he tried to get his hands on old age pensions? Canadians slapped his wrists, and he stood back.

When the Tories were re-elected in 1988 they could not wait and brought in the clawback which ends universality, which will cut back and shrink old age pensions and family allowances.

I just want to remind the hon. member that yes, every government makes a mistake but the Liberal government never went out and deliberately destroyed programs and institutions that served this country well.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-26, a bill which amends the Railway Act by eliminating the at and east grain and flour subsidy programs. The intention to eliminate this program was indicated in the budget of April 27, 1989. The program was scheduled to end July 15, 1989.

I find it somewhat ironic that it is now February 20, and we are in debate on second reading of a bill which in reality has become law already. Second reading has not been completed. There has been no committee study. There has been no third reading. There has been no Senate approval. There has been no royal assent. Yet, Madam Speaker, the program has been eliminated, retroactive to July 16, 1989.

Unless I misunderstand the process, this current exercise is a charade. Parliament has been subverted by this government once again. However, since the question of privilege raised by my colleague in the NDP, the member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, is not yet ruled upon, I want to take this opportunity to add my comments to those of my colleagues who oppose this bill.

Since the budget of April 27 last, this government has launched an insidious attack on Atlantic Canada. Whatever the motivation or rationale, be it the infamous level playing field, or the free trade agreement, or some other matter, there has been a steady stream of measures which has laid waste the Atlantic Bregion of our country.

The litany includes the closure or reduction of six military bases. This has affected almost half the bases in the entire country. The worst incident, of course, is the closure of Summerside which killed 1,300 direct jobs, 1,300 indirect jobs, and is affecting one-third of the economic activity of the entire region of the province of P.E.I.

There are the changes to the unemployment insurance system. The increased number of weeks required to qualify will force many people on to the welfare rolls and the burden on the provinces will be increased.

The decision by the federal government to opt out of UI funding also raises a question of what will happen to the fund if a recession should occur and there is a need to increase available moneys as there was in the early 1980s. At that time the federal government kicked in the required money. What is the answer to this problem if it occurs in the 1990s, which is very likely to happen?

In addition, the unemployment benefits for self-employed fishermen are not protected by the UIC act changes. The government has the power to alter the benefit package or even eliminate the whole fishermen's program without consulting Parliament. The fishermen of Atlantic Canada, particularly those of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, must find the situation very disconcerting.

Our fishery is in a state of crisis. When this major industry suffers it impacts seriously on the economy of the entire Atlantic region, but for towns like Canso, Nova Scotia, it is catastrophic.

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague from Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso for the excellent work he has been doing with the people in Canso and with the organization of the tremendous demonstration of Saturday past. The Friends of CFB Summerside were proud and happy to be able to participate and contribute to that success. I also offer him a word of encouragement from the people of Egmont and Summerside. If our experience can be of any assistance, we offer it to him with our full support.

Our railway services have also been abandoned. Prince Edward Island and some areas of the mainland have suffered a total loss of rail service, both passenger and freight. Rail service in other regions has been drastically reduced. This will have a crippling effect on our transportation system and will make it increasingly difficult to attract industries to Atlantic Canada.

To these and other problems in Atlantic Canada, this government has added the cancellation of the at and east grain and flour subsidy programs. This program, which has been in effect since the 1960s, was basically instituted to encourage exporters of grain and flour to use eastern Canadian ports. Grain shipped by rail from ports on Georgian Bay, Lake Huron, Lake Ontario and the upper St. Lawrence, as far as Prescott, to any port on the St. Lawrence from Montreal eastward, or to Saint John or Halifax is charged 1960 rates.

Flour shipped through the same ports from any port east of Thunder Bay is charged 1966 rates. The railways are reimbursed by the government for the difference between these rates and the actual present day cost of shipping the grain and flour.

• (1250)

The government estimates that by simply scrapping the at and east subsidy program it will save $40 million. I contend that this is a false sense of economy. Instead of being a legitimate deficit reduction measure, it is an effort to further placate the Americans by eliminating a program which for 25 years has contributed to the reduction of regional disparity in Canada. The fact that grain elevators in Saint John and Halifax and a flour mill in Halifax have flourished the past 20 plus years is due largely to the existence of the at and east program.

A 1984 Canadian Transport Commission report concluded that Canadian flour exports will be practically non-existent without this subsidy. This, of course, begs the question: what will the fate of our flour export industry be? What will be the fate of Dover flour mills in Halifax? What will be the fate of the mill workers whose jobs will disappear?

While I speak as a member for Atlantic Canada I want to point out that the at and east grain and flour subsidy contributes much more to the Canadian economy than simply jobs in the Atlantic area. Initially the program applied only to grain from western Canada. However, since the mid-1970s, Ontario export grain also qualified as long as it was received by water from Georgian Bay ports.

What has evolved is an integrated system of transportation and storage facilities as well as an efficient and orderly marketing process. The Canadian and Ontario Wheat Boards have worked together to provide both of these. Now the government has thrown out an efficient, functional operation. No thought has been given to the problems this would cause. No thought has been given to replacements or alternatives. This method of operation is consistent with other government activities.

I can give two examples. When military bases were closed, the government admitted no studies had been done to determine the social and economic impact of the closures. No studies were done to determine whether the decisions were militarily sound.

When the government passed its Advance Payments for Crops bill, which was supposed to do great things for Canadian farmers, it proved so unattractive in Prince Edward Island that the government could not find an agency willing to administer the program for the potato growers. By early January only two Canadian farmers had shown even a passing interest in the program.

We are well aware that the St. Lawrence Seaway does not operate year round. Consequently storage facilities are a problem. At present there is insufficient farm storage capacity. Country elevator storage is short term only. Lakeside elevator storage is short term. Since wheat harvest is completed in about four weeks, the first half of the crop must move to make room for the second half. Where will it go? Where will the second half of the crop be stored? Loss of the at and east subsidy will mean that storage at Georgian Bay terminals for future export will not be viable. Closure of the elevators at Port McNicoll and Georgian Bay have already been announced.

Saint John and Halifax are the only two ports in eastern Canada that can operate 12 months of the year. At present, at and east grain movements account for about 70 per cent of the grain exports from Halifax and almost all the grain and wheat exports from Saint John. Cancellation of the subsidy will kill this export trade as well as the 250 accompanying jobs.

The Canadian Transport Commission has stated that in the period of 1971-1981 the railway grossed an average of $33.5 million per year and maintained an average of 263 jobs. Cancellation will reduce revenues accordingly and cost the country at least 263 jobs. During the same period Georgian Bay ports earned average revenues of $1.4 million and provided an average of 75 jobs. As well, these will be lost. It is obvious at this point that termination of the at and east program will also cost millions of dollars because of loss of jobs and spin-off benefits. Without adequate storage facilities the producer must sell all his grain at harvest time. This kills the concept of orderly marketing, lowers the return to the grower and diminishes farm profit margins.

I want to re-emphasize the detrimental effect this program will have on Atlantic agriculture. Feed costs are already considerably higher than those in central Canada. Any further increase will seriously jeopardize the viability of the livestock and poultry industries. My home province of Prince Edward Island grows 80 per cent of its feed grain requirements because it is part of the normal rotation of potatoes, grain and hay. New Brunswick, on the other hand, produces only 35 per cent to 40 per cent of its grain needs; Nova Scotia a mere 20 per cent.

We have a great need for reasonably priced Ontario or western grain to meet our requirements. At present we are legally obliged to buy our grain in Canada from Ontario or the west. Does the loss of the at and east subsidy foretell the end of freight rate assistance? Will we then have to buy our grain from other countries because it is cheaper? And will we be allowed to do so?

No one has claimed the at and east program to be perfect. Five years ago the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission proposed modifications. They did not even receive the courtesy of a reply.

I believe the whole problem of at and east comes back to the question of subsidy. What is a subsidy? Does subsidy mean one thing in Canada and something else in the United States?

Madam Speaker, the answer is obviously yes because the word subsidy is not in the American vocabulary, except when they are talking about Canada and when they are talking about the European Common Market. When are we going to know exactly what subsidy means as it applies to the free trade agreement? Does the so-called level playing field mean something different in Canada than it does in the U.S.? Obviously it does.

Our Minister of Agriculture went on record earlier this month saying that Canada does not like the U.S. decision to step up export enhancement subsidies aimed at getting American products into the European market. He also said, "We had hoped that the U.S. would not have had to employ the export enhancement program and that we could have scaled down the level of warring. But with the latest U.S. budget calling for an increase in the level of export enhancement, we know that this is a signal that the war might intensify." The minister is finally catching on.

In the same speech the minister expressed concern about the problems encountered with export of Canadian beef to the U.S. He also expressed concern about the difficulty of getting reliable information on the level of U.S. agricultural subsidies and indicated that the government has hired a consulting firm to do research in this area. This is something he should have done in 1986-87. Now that the free trade agreement is signed we are now trying to find out what level of subsidies the Americans are giving to their farmers.

On behalf of the grain growers, the beef producers, the hog growers, the dairy industry, the potato industry, the egg and poultry industry, in fact the entire agricultural sector, I encourage the Minister of Agriculture and this government to act in a most expeditious manner and resolve this question of subsidy before more farmers fall victim and rural Canada suffers further devastation of its population.

Cancellation of the at and east subsidy is one more blow to Atlantic Canada. It is the parting shot of the old 1989 budget. I sincerely hope that this evening's budget will be one which will be more beneficial to all of us in the east who have been so brutalized during the past year.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair would like to suggest to the House that we call it one o'clock and when the House resumes after Question Period we could proceed to the period of questions or comments after the hon. member for Egmont's speech. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

LINGUISTIC DUALITY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarrry—Prescott–Russell): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the town council of Hawkesbury, the largest town in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, voted unanimously to declared the town officially bilingual. The council also passed a resolution supporting Canada's linguistic duality.

On behalf of all my colleagues here in the House of Commons, I wish to congratulate Mayor Yves Drouin and the Hawkesbury council for their wisdom, their civility, and the respect they have shown their fellow citizens.

A so–called language crisis is now rampant in Canada, mainly owing to the intolerance and bigotry of a small group of people. Honourable men and women every where have a duty to speak out and ensure that the rights of each and everyone of us are respected. I hope that the action taken by the town of Hawkesbury, and last night by the towns of Trenton and Belleville, will be an example to other Ontario municipalities.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the Atomic Energy Control Board is imposing new cost recovery licence fees on both high schools and universities for the use of radioisotopes in research and teaching.

Dr. A. H. Warner, Chairman of the Radiation Safety Committee at the University of Windsor, writes that the new fees amount to nearly one and one–half times the cost of all radioisotopes used there. One two and one–half hour engineering laboratory exercise will now cost $2,000. Since university operational budgets and most research grants cannot sustain such cost increases, the use of radioisotopes will have to be curtailed or eliminated. Both research and teaching will suffer.

Herman Bruckman of Sandwich Secondary School, also in Windsor, has written to the AECB for advice on disposing of his very modest holdings of three microcurie standard radiation sources because his teaching budget cannot sustain the $625 cost for a class demonstration of radioactivity.

Thus does this government contribute to the enhancement of research and science teaching in a country so desperately in need of both.

ROMANIA

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, the world is slowly coming to understand the tragedy of the Romanian people enslaved under the Ceausescu regime. The legacy of the tyranny remains today in a broken economy which spawns hunger and disease.

This is most painfully evident in the orphaned Romanian children. Thousands of children are facing malnutrition and disease. The St. George Romanian Orthodox Church in the Romanian community of Regina, with the help of the government of Saskatchewan, has sent a fact–finding mission to see what can be done to help these children.

I would like to call upon all members of the House and the people of Canada to open their hearts to the children of Romania and do whatever they can to help. I would also call upon the government to see if there is a way to utilize military transport to move the much needed supplies of clothing and medicine to Romania.

KINSMEN CLUBS

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, today marks the seventieth anniversary of Kinsmen in Canada. National Kinsmen President, Brian Thompson, who lives in the riding of Elk Island, leads an organization that was founded by Harold A. Rogers on February 20, 1920.

For 70 years Kinsmen have been serving our community's greatest need through commitment to Canada's war effort in wartime and in times of peace through funding for recreational facilities, medical facilities, emergency equipment and by support for cystic fibrosis research.

With the combined Kinsmen-Kinette membership of 17,000 in almost 1,000 clubs, the association of Kin last year raised $23 million in cash for community service. As well, during its 25 year partnership in the fight against cystic fibrosis, Kinsmen have raised over $15 million for CF research. The recent discovery of the CF gene was made possible by assistance from the family of Kin.

As a former Kinsmen Club president, it is a privilege to pay tribute to 70 years of Kinsmenship in Canada and I offer my sincere best wishes for a Kin future filled with success.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, co-operative housing programs help those Canadians who are in greatest housing need; the disadvantaged, the handicapped, seniors, and low and middle income Canadians squeezed by the housing crisis.

Federal co-operative housing programs have been cut again and again by this government. In last April's budget federal funding for co-operatives was cut by 25 per cent.

The Conservative government has broken its promise to put 5,000 new co-operative housing units onstream each year. In 1989, only 1,700 units were produced. There are huge waiting lists in every province for co-operative housing. Canada Mortgage and Housing is presently undertaking an extensive review of the federal co-operative housing program.

The minister of housing should wait on CMHC's review before cutting any more money from this program. There must be no cuts to co-operative housing in the upcoming budget. Canadians have been waiting too long for a coherent, long term solution to Canada's housing crisis. Co-operative housing meets the very real needs of Canadians waiting for shelter.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, yesterday representatives of the Canso council were quoted in newspapers as saying that their town and other towns should fight together for their survival.

Today, the finance minister is preparing a speech that will probably cause more consternation in small towns. Taxes will probably go up. The GST is coming down to the line despite massive protests and the price of a lot of goods will probably go up also. We have been warned that this budget will be tough.

Single industry towns all over Canada and small communities like Summerside in Prince Edward Island face a scary future. In Kimberley, B.C., 800 miners have been told they will be out of a job. In Virginiatown, a small northern Ontario community, more than 300 workers lost their jobs without notice when the town's only industry declared bankruptcy. Now, the only remaining bank in that community wants to close. Sometime in the first half of next year, 1,600 employees at Rio Algom Limited are to lose their jobs as two mines will close.

This government does not have a national vision. It is time it wakes up and listen to the people of the small towns across Canada. Perhaps it is time for the finance minister to put on his running shoes and jog across the real Canada. He has been clearly staying put in Ottawa too long and lacks a clear vision of what this country really needs.

FORESTRY INDUSTRIES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the forestry industry is a major resource in the Abitibi area, and I am very pleased with the announcement by the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion regarding the new program for the forestry sector.

The program, which is funded through the ISTC's sectoral budget, will provide Canadian forestry industries with more than $30 million, of which $18 million, spread over three years, will go to the research, development and innovation component, while the remaining 12.2 million will go to market development and diversification.

Mr. Speaker, our thanks go to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology and to the Minister of State (Forestry), who have shown they understand the needs of our forestry industry. This initiative will help our forestry sector strengthen its competitive position on the international market.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, at a time when language relations in this country are strained considerably, intolerant Canadians can certainly take a lesson from students in my riding.

On last Friday, February 16, I had the opportunity of speaking before students at the Dalhousie Regional High School. Fifty-one of those students signed and presented me with a letter which reads as follows:

> We the Grade 8 social studies classes at D.R.H.S. support bilingualism in Canada and we are proud to be Canadians.
>
> Northern New Brunswick is truly a bilingual area and we would like to say that bilingualism works here.

[Translation]

These students gave me a similar letter, to be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister. These young people have demonstrated their courage, tolerance and good will. We cannot say as much for all Canadians.

Our government leaders ought to show their support for bilingualism in order to stop linguistic intolerance and ensure that both official languages continue to be part of a heritage that makes Canada unique.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, discontinuing the service of The Canadian on January 15 has had a disturbing effect on the tourist industry in Alberta, especially in Banff National Park.

VIA has received many proposals for the privatization of a system to supply rail services between Calgary and Vancouver with a possible decision being arrived at around the end of March. Tourism is our third largest industry in Alberta and an emphasis must be placed on the transportation system needed to encourage this industry. The Rocky Mountaineer which now operates one round trip per week from late May to early October does not provide the service which is required to enhance the tourist industry.

• (1410)

When VIA is making a final decision on the privatization of this line it must emphasize affordability and sustainability but, above all, it must ensure to the travelling public the same level and reliability of service that rail passengers have experienced in the past.

VICTIMS OF THALIDOMIDE

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I call on the Minister of Health and Welfare to reconsider his decision of last February 13 and upgrade the compensation package of $7.5 million to Canadian thalidomide victims.

While it was encouraging to see the government finally acknowledge some responsibility with this package, the minister fell far short of the recommendations proposed by the Thalidomide Victims Association of Canada. The $7.5 million is an unrealistically small amount to be distributed equally among the roughly 100 victims whose degree of illness and disability varies greatly.

Rosaria Molisse, one of my constituents, for example, requires 24 hour attendant care as a result of her multiple developmental and physical disabilities. Her share of the package, even if invested wisely and administered properly, will only net her some $600 a month in the current money market. This comes nowhere near what will be required to meet the costs of accommodation, living requirements, assistive devices and appropriate qualified help to permit an integrated lifestyle.

Her parents are near retirement and on the brink of physical and economic exhaustion. The Thalidomide Victims Association of Canada has proposed a package that would meet the needs of Rosaria and others like her. I urge the minister to do the right thing and to upgrade the amount and the method of distribution of the compensation package.

CANADA POST

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, last week Canada Post officials met with the residents of Westfield and Fundy Royal to announce changes to their postal service. The meeting was well attended by the residents of the community and they clearly expressed their extreme and deep concern about the continuing closures of post offices in rural communities across the country.

On behalf of my constituents, I will be forwarding to the minister responsible for Canada Post and the Prime Minister petitions containing the names of over 800 persons who are opposed to this closure. I trust their views will be given the utmost consideration.

BROADCASTING

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in 1988 as part of the broadcasting policy the government funded satellite transponders which improved the distribution of native broadcasting in the north and other parts of Canada. We have invested in a technical capacity to broadcast.

In today's budget we are faced with cut-backs in native broadcasting. Two programs are affected: First, the native communications program, which has to do with newspapers and some Trail radio and, second, the northern native broadcasting access program, which is TV and radio. These programs funded by the Secretary of State have been critical to the development of native media which can reflect native values, reinforce a positive native identity and, in particular, protect and enhance native languages.

During the UN decade of literacy, illiteracy among aboriginal people runs at an incredibly high rate. Native media are trying to do something about that. We are speaking about 11 aboriginal newspapers reaching one in four native households and 5,300 hours of radio and 750 hours of television programming and it is going to be cut back.

We in the NDP feel native people need the ability to broadcast in their own language. Here is another cut in the very fabric of Canada. There is more to Canada than the business agenda. These cuts are going to affect the native people and once again we are losing the glue that holds this country together.

VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on this important budget day, I wish to pay tribute to all of the voluntary private sector organizations that contribute so significantly to the national debates about public economic affairs in Canada.

As we all know, the practice of democracy cannot and should not be confined to government in isolation from the real world. The process of consultation is especially important in terms of the financial integrity of our country.

In particular, at the considered risk of omitting others, I would like to single out those hundreds of economic groups to be found in virtually every Canadian municipality generally identified as chambers of commerce or boards of trade. They constitute an inherent and important component in the structure of our society, providing a format for public expression and debate which is ordinarily as objective and constructive as any to be found.

It is in that context that the Fredericton—Oromocto Chambers of Commerce have joined forces to sponsor a public information meeting tomorrow about the 1990 budget at which I shall be a participant.

This event, which I feel sure is being paralleled in many other Canadian communities, is but one demonstration of the continuing role of these organizations in providing relevant and timely public service in vital national issues.

FUR INDUSTRY

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, representatives of the Canadian fur industry have repeatedly drawn the attention of the government to problems they are currently facing.

I congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs for last week bringing in clothing with fur on it for our foreign visitors. It is more of that action that we need from the government.

However, since 1987, when mink prices reached an all-time high, the industry has been undermined by the actions of both the anti-fur lobby and especially the expansion in the Scandinavian countries. The result is an over-supply of pelts that has pushed the mink industry to the brink of complete collapse.

This is a solid industry. It possesses top quality pelts and a well trained labour force of farmers. It has been profitable and, with government attention, it will remain so. In order to ensure the Canadian mink farmers can survive this rough period, I call on the Minister of Agriculture to support the industry's request that mink be immediately added to the list of eligible commodities under the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

Time is growing short for these farmers. Many of them exist in Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia and they have had a very difficult year. I ask the Minister of Agriculture to take it under consideration.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

It is now more than a year that the government has known about the fishery crisis in Atlantic Canada. Since then, the government has been promising action, but these promises have turned out empty. The promised $1 billion response program has melted to $130 million.

The long term response and new programs have disappeared and have been replaced by existing programs. Most Canadians agree that where the government has rightfully offered aid to the western farmers, Atlantic Canadians have been left on their own to deal with that crisis.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister take the opportunity to announce immediately what aid he intends to give in order that Atlantic Canadians will feel that they have been treated fairly and that they will be able to face their future with dignity and not despair?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member acknowledged in his question, there has already been the announcement of $130 million assistance to some of the people affected by the obvious crisis in the Atlantic fishery.

We are looking at other programs that might be made available to help people who are affected by this crisis. As part of a program by the Government of Canada, and we very much hope in concert with the provinces of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and we certainly expect in concert with the fishing industry, we hope to try to establish the long term viability of the Canadian fishing industry on the Atlantic coast, having regard to the fact that there has been inadequate planning in the past. There have been decisions taken in part by provincial governments that in hindsight were not intelligent decisions. We have had a very serious problem arise with respect to the northern cod stock. The hon. member will know that Dr. Harris, who was asked to look into the question of scientific assessments, has made his report available to my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who is looking at that report now.

On the basis of that evidence and other, we will be announcing further programs in keeping with the commitment to treat the crisis in the Atlantic fishing industry with the same priority that we have treated the crisis in agriculture in other parts of the country.

Mr. Simmons: Explain that to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also to the Deputy Prime Minister. All we hear are words, words that mean nothing at all. Up to now all the government has offered to Atlantic Canadians affected by the crisis is a recipe of rehashed programs with no new funding. The existing programs were in place to deal with a normally bad situation. They were not made to deal with a crisis situation like the one we have now. Furthermore, these existing programs, as the minister knows, have been reprofiled, reduced and extended over a longer period of time. They did not and do not meet the needs.

• (1420)

How can the minister and the government justify abandoning Atlantic Canada, or is this lack of action consequent with the Prime Minister's words that there is no crisis in Atlantic Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made it very clear that the government by its actions believes there is a serious crisis in the Atlantic fishery. We are dealing with that problem.

The member makes the distinction between old money and new money. That might make sense to him but it does not make much sense to the people in Atlantic Canada who were the beneficiaries of the expenditure of some $130 million by this government in response to some of the problems that are part of the Atlantic provinces' fishing crisis.

With respect to Atlantic Canada generally, he need not take my word for the track record of this government on this matter. Liberal Premier Frank McKenna, of his province of New Brunswick, has said that ACOA, created by a Conservative government, is perhaps the best tool for regional development and diversification ever seen in Atlantic Canada.

That is part of the response of the government to ensure that Atlantic Canadians can play a full and equal—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. members: Order!

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I remind the minister that Premier McKenna is a Liberal premier who cares a lot about people, which is a lot more than the government does for Atlantic Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in response to a question by the hon. member for Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans tried to evade the issue of community quotas.

Canadians in the Atlantic region want to know whether the minister will exercise his authority and let communities like Canso keep their trawlers to maintain their fishing capacity until such time as the fish stocks return.

The government must chose between the survival of these communities or company profits. The fate of Canso will be that of all other fishing communities on the Atlantic coast. I ask the government and this minister: Whose side are they on?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the government is very much on the side of the people, fishermen, plant workers and residents of the communities of Atlantic Canada.

The government is committed to the survival of these communities. That is why the minister responsible for ACOA and I have just come from a meeting with Mayor Ray White and a delegation from the community of Canso. We are exploring every viable option with the community of Canso and all Atlantic Canada communities so they can have a bright, prosperous and secure future.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I would like to address a question to my good friend the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday I was in St. John's to attend a meeting convened by the Federation of Labour and Municipalities to deal with the mounting crisis in the offshore and inshore fisheries in that province. The consensus shared by plant workers, fishermen, community leaders, labour leaders, politicians of all stripes, including three of his friends from the Senate of Canada, overwhelmingly agreed that fish plant closures are not the solution to the current problem. There was another consensus, too, that the Prime Minister has not yet seized with the urgency of this important issue.

Will the government and the Prime Minister undertake to meet with the organizers of yesterday's meeting with a view to keeping those inshore and offshore plants open until such time as the stocks rebuild?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if the closings of fish plants are not the solution to the problem, I hope the hon. member will deliver a message to Premier Wells of Newfoundland who has clearly and explicitly stated that the fish plants involved in Newfoundland are going to be closing next year and that there is no alternative to their closing. His policy is that these plants have to close, although the government provided some assistance to see that the notice period was extended from three months by an additional year. The clear policy of the Government of Newfoundland, led by the hon. gentleman's friend Premier Wells, is that the fish plants have to close because there is no alternative. I trust his message will go forward to the premier.

In the meantime, we intend to do whatever we can to see that every possible plant continues to stay open, including the utilization of the unallocated quotas for underutilized species which the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has arranged. We intend to do everything we can to see that they survive.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister and the conference sends their love to him. They missed him yesterday.

My supplementary question is directed to the minister. He can try all he wants to slough off the problem onto Premier Wells, whom he has also psyched out on the countervail issue. The minister will be aware that back in 1987 when FPI was privatized the government of which he was a part entered into an agreement whereby the government can oppose the closure of fish plants such as Gaultois, Grand Bank and Trepassey, the three mentioned in the FPI closure announcement. Has the government exercised its option in that agreement to protect those three plants and the 1,500 workers involved? If it has not done so, why has it not done so and will he now undertake to do so to protect those 1,500 jobs until the stocks rebuild?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is referring to an agreement under which either the Government of Canada or the Government of Newfoundland have an option if Fishery Products concludes that it has to close a fish plant. It has to notify both governments and either government has an option to advise Fishery Products Limited that it is not to close some particular plant. The government, whichever government it is that exercises that option, will put up all necessary moneys to see that the plant runs and that any losses are met. That of course would be an action that would result in a countervailable situation in the United States or elsewhere where the country has laws with respect to free trading and with respect to fair trading.

Mr. Simmons: Why did you sign it then?

Mr. Crosbie: That would not be an option. Even in the medium or long term, that would not be an option that one would want to pursue. There have to be other methods found for plants to continue to operate other than direct subsidization by the government.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

When the minister appeared before the Senate committee examining Bill C-21, she said the following:

> The worst misconception of all is that there are no jobs available. The fact is that studies, surveys and our own experiences tell us that there are jobs available, that jobs are available all across Canada, and that given active rather than simply passive support, the unemployed are better able and more likely to take advantage of these opportunities.

Appearing before the same committee the Deputy Minister of Labour from Newfoundland said:

> The evidence from Statistics Canada publications indicates the desire to work exists, but the jobs are not there right now—To put it bluntly, then, there is simply not enough work to go around.

My question to the minister is this. The minister tells us that she has studies that show that there are jobs everywhere in Canada. Will the minister stand up now in the House and tell us where the jobs are in Quebec with unemployment at 10.5 per cent and in Newfoundland where unemployment is 16.7 per cent? Can she stand up and tell us where are the jobs specifically in Canso, the Burin Peninsula, and Belle Isle? Specifically, we want to know that. No mussing, no fussing.

• (1430)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the hon. member has been reading the debates, but I am sorry that he did not read them quite closely enough.

I acknowledged that there were more jobs in some parts of Canada than there were in others, but then I went on to say that part of the problem in all parts of Canada is that there is a mismatch between the skills of workers and the jobs available. That is true even in areas where unemployment is higher than we in this government would like it to be. The surveys of the people who we serve through unemployment—

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): The people don't want to hear that any more. They want action.

Mrs. McDougall: Maybe the hon. member would like to listen to the answer.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, the people whom we listen to are the people we serve through unemployment insurance and through our own offices across Canada. They themselves are telling us that they believe they are unable to get the jobs that are available because they do not have the skills. That is why this bill is important, because it is going to give them the skills.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. I would like to say to the minister, in all sincerity, that people in Atlantic Canada do not want any more surveys. They do not want her personal experiences. They do not want StatsCan statistics. What they want are jobs. That's what they want. Jobs.

In light of the fact that the minister has admitted that there are no jobs in Newfoundland, that there are no jobs in Nova Scotia, and that there is no industrial infrastructure there, will the minister agree that she will withdraw Bill C–21 rather than exacerbate an already deplorable situation?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the man is misquoting me right in front of my very eyes. Let me point out to him that in 1989 over 8,000 jobs were created in Newfoundland outside the St. John's metropolitan area. That is true in every region of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. McDougall: The workers of Canada do not want more rhetoric and more shouting about this bill when they know that this bill is going to provide them with the skills and training that they need, to say nothing of the other benefits in this bill which include women in Canada who are expecting babies who are asking for parental benefits and people over age 65 who are looking for their benefits.

All of that is in this bill, and I am surprised the hon. member is not ashamed of himself for paying no attention to them.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is for the same minister. The people in Newfoundland are now trembling in anticipation. They are really fearful that with the fish plant closures and the cut-back in the quotas for fishing about 4,000 people will be added to the unemployment rolls.

Will the minister not admit that in fact there is high unemployment in Newfoundland and that there are not the jobs in Newfoundland for these people to take? Will she not admit that putting Bill C–21, the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, into effect will exacerbate an already serious situation? Will she not take the advice, dare I say it, from the other place and withdraw the bill?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I will not withdraw the bill. He is failing to notice that in the higher unemployment areas of Canada this bill is very sensitive to those needs.

One of the things that we do for people involved in the fishing industry is that we remove the penalty for seasonal workers who repeat through the system. That is good for the people of Newfoundland as they are going through a difficult time. It will help us in terms of both training and regional development, which go together. You cannot have one without the other.

That is what this government recognizes, and that is what the NDP always fails to recognize.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

Electricity is vital. Its uses and users are limitless. The minister was sent a resolution from the municipality of Nepean which outlined the injurious effects a GST on electricity would have on the poor, on industry, and on the economy.

Given that taxing electricity is inconsistent with the government's own stated objectives of exempting standard municipal services, how can the minister justify taxing this essential service, yet another blow to the poor in this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the hon. member and her colleagues on that side of the House that they should make maximum use of the recess we are going to have next week to study very carefully the technical documents that we have produced, because day after day we get questions.

Yesterday it was on transportation when we know that companies can get a full tax input for their transportation. Today it is on electricity when we know that lower income people will have more money in their pockets after reform than they had before.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, it is a pity that that information would not be readily available on the minister's own GST hot line.

According to the Municipal Electrical Association of Ontario, on hydro utilities costs from the manufacturers' sales tax are less than 1 per cent of purchased goods. In Ontario alone, 1991 electrical sales will be $8 billion.

The difference between a minus 1 per cent MST and a plus 7 per cent GST on service is astronomical and is yet another indication of this government's lack of concern for the people of Canada. Where is the conscience of this government that it will overcharge on a very essential service to Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, once again, I wish to inform the hon. member that we have done some very accurate studies on the impact of tax reform, particularly on low-income Canadians. We are prepared to guarantee our findings to the effect that a family with an income below $30,000 will be better off after the tax reform. If the hon. member is able to produce figures that indicate the opposite, she should do so.

1991 CENSUS

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Statistics Canada.

The 1986 census contained four questions concerning disabled Canadians. These questions have been used by Statistics Canada to produce data for the government and private sector to ensure that services are provided for disabled Canadians.

Will the minister tell the House if he intends to include questions regarding the disabled in the 1991 census, and what will these questions be?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the precise questions for the 1991 census have not yet been put together. Discussions are under way with all of the users of StatsCan data.

The questions in terms of disabled Canadians and so on will be included if that is the recommendation that comes back after discussions with the people who would use this data.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the minister would not tell the House what questions concerning disabled Canadians will be on the census. Statistics Canada will not tell us what questions will be on the census, and the minister's staff tells us that it is top secret. Why all the secrecy?

My supplementary question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Is the government afraid that the questions it intends to include in the census will not satisfy the concerns that disabled Canadians want addressed in the census? Is this another example of this government's back room, closed door decision making?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right. I cannot tell her the questions that will be on the 1991 census for the very simple reason, as I explained in my first reply to her, that the questions have not been decided upon yet. They will be decided upon after full discussion with all of the users of the data.

The hon. member has been watching old films of the rat pack. Why this accusatory tone in her questioning? This is silly.

FISHERIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, despite denials by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans about the secret Pacific fisheries policy called Vision 2000, his department continues day by day to implement its key recommendations.

I would like to ask the minister of fisheries if he would confirm that Vision 2000 states that under current Conservative policy B.C. native claims will not be settled for 50 to 100 years, one-half the commercial fishermen will be forced out of the industry, pollution and habitat destruction will be allowed to dramatically increase, and what is left of the fisheries will be turned over to a few large corporations?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Of course none of that is true, Mr. Speaker. Three years ago I created an advisory group to advise the ministry and the government on west coast fisheries policy. It is called the Pacific Regional Council, and that body comprises broad representation within the industry, although the fishermen's union chose not to participate as part of that group.

That group suggested that the department embark on a project of looking into the 1990s with a view to deciding what options we had for guiding the fishery into the 21st century. That process is called Vision 2000. An internal working document has apparently been made public. I have not read it, but that document lays out a number of options.

I have indicated to the industry, in meeting with it last week in British Columbia, that this is strictly a discussion paper and full consultation will precede any changes of policy which might flow from such a process.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister should read it. He in fact appointed the members of this committee who have apparently produced it along with his own officials. I spoke to some of his officials, and they have been participating in this. It seems that the contents of it are only secret to the minister, because it states on page 1: "To ensure that this vision meets political values—Pacific fisheries policy must result in a long-term real decrease in the commitment of government resources to Pacific fisheries management".

Would the minister confirm to this House—and I think he should be able to because I raised it with him privately yesterday—that this month, for the first time in history, B.C. fishermen are being required to hire and take aboard private sector police as observers at a cost of $3,500 per trip?

Does the minister not understand what has gone on in Atlantic Canada? We do not want that virus on the west coast. Will he scrap the policies proposed in Vision 2000 and admit that enforcement is a federal government responsibility and applying these kinds of charges will drive B.C. fishermen out of the industry and into bankruptcy, or is that part of his plan?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is remarkable that the one political party that is forever talking about improving things is unprepared and afraid to look into the future and to plan for the future. In fact they are more conservative than the Progressive Conservatives themselves.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Siddon: They are afraid of change.

Mr. Peterson: That's the worst indictment you could impose on them. It's a terrible indictment.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking the government and the minister of fisheries to condone wasteful overfishing and dumping of fish at sea. Where observers are required to effectively police the fishery, those observers shall be provided on vessels whether they are sailing along the Atlantic or the Pacific coast.

SENIOR WORKERS ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, on February 16 this year, we heard that an agreement had been concluded between the Government of Quebec and the federal Minister of Labour, providing that $13 million will be paid to 233 older workers involved in major lay-offs by Quebec companies, and this as part of the Older Workers Adjustment Program. My question to the Minister of Labour is as follows: Will older workers laid off by companies in my riding also benefit under this agreement?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the hon. member for Mercier shows an active concern for older workers who have been laid off in her riding and I can confirm that on February 18 this year, we signed an agreement with the Quebec Labour and Income Security Department to designate eight companies in Quebec where older workers had been laid off and allow the application of the Older Workers Adjustement Program, adopted in this House during the past year. For the benefit of the hon. member, I can confirm that one of the industries in her riding, Canadian International Paper, was on the list, and that 30 older workers will benefit under this program.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and is with regard to the tire fire in my riding.

While the federal government should not be interfering unless asked with provincial and municipal attempts to extinguish the fire, the federal government has the mandate through Emergency Preparedness Canada and the responsibility to monitor the fire, to be there, to know what is going on. The minister does not need a special invitation from the province of Ontario to do this. On Friday we saw a communication foul up between Ottawa and Toronto, wasting time and effort.

Would the minister not agree that these problems could be overcome if federal officials responsible for co-ordinating the federal response were on site so that these problems do not continue to happen?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we have not waited for the member's comments to do that. We are doing exactly that now.

We have three scientists on the site now monitoring and analysing the air quality. We have people from Environment Canada on the site as well. There is a representative of the Canadian army there also monitoring the situation and getting ready to step in if we are requested to go there. We have also set up a task force at the federal level to co-ordinate the federal response to this disaster.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I am saying that there should be somebody there from the federal government co-ordinating its response.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister should be aware that both the Six Nations and the Mississauga of the New Credit reserves are close to the fire. In fact they were one of the first areas evacuated.

What is the federal government's responsibility to federally regulated reserves during an environmental disaster such as this one? Why haven't federal officials from the minister's department been to the Six Nations to evaluate the situation there?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am told that our officials have been in communication with the chief of the Six Nations. We are well aware of the environmental difficulty there, and we are monitoring the situation very carefully.

JUSTICE

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and concerns a very serious question of racial discrimination which affects everyone in this House.

Yesterday B'nai Brith released its 1989 audit report indicating an increase in anti-Semitism in Canada. In fact it estimated by the number of reported cases that anti-Semitism has gone up by 57 per cent. There is also a great deal of acrimony that it has not seen before.

I would like to ask the minister what his ministry and members of this government are doing to help the association end the perception that those disseminating messages of hate need not fear prosecution. Can he not improve Canadian law to fight such outrageous behaviour?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend will know the Criminal Code prohibits the wilful promotion of hatred against identifiable groups. I am not trying to slide off the issue by suggesting that the attorneys general of the various provinces are in charge of prosecuting that under the Criminal Code. They have the full co-operation of my department wherever it occurs.

• (1450)

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I respect the constitutional niceties that the Minister of Justice finds himself in, but Canadian society is changing and many groups are facing racial discrimination. For example, in addition to the group I mentioned in my previous question, the Sikh community is facing the problem of racial pins and anti-Sikh calendars.

What specific measures is the minister taking? Is he initiating federal-provincial conferences? Is he reviewing the Criminal Code? Is he meeting with the attorneys general across the country? Is he doing something to help Canadians feel they are not being discriminated against?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend knows that my colleague, the Secretary of State, has several programs under way with respect to this matter.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Money.

Mr. Lewis: You don't throw money at everything and fix it that way; you've to get to people's minds.

I would also point out that the Supreme Court of Canada presently has the hate propaganda legislation before it. It would be premature to make any changes in the law until we see what the Supreme Court of Canada suggests.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of Jana Petrova, member of the Federal Assembly of Czechoslovakia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

INVESTMENT CANADA

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Investment Canada.

In a letter from the Deputy Minister of Industry and Trade in Manitoba dated December 22, 1989, bearing the wording "Confidential—Privileged Information" with regard to the Johnson Controls takeover of Varta Batteries Ltd., the Deputy Minister stated:

> I strongly object to the acquisition unless there are commitments to maintain or to enhance the Manitoba employment base.

The letter goes on to say:

> The Winnipeg plant of Varta Batteries Ltd. is a significant and important component of the Manitoba economy, and closure is not an acceptable course of action.

Why did neither the federal government nor the provincial government inform the workers that their jobs were being sacrificed in this American takeover? Further, why did the federal government completely ignore the secret pleas of the Manitoba government to keep this plant open?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the Varta plant that was taken over was in financial difficulties and in fact was on the verge of bankruptcy. Had that occurred of course the jobs would be lost, but lost in a circumstance where there would not be severance packages available and the kind of assistance that is available under a more orderly shutdown.

The purchase by Johnson Controls provided for a more orderly shutdown. There was an offer of jobs, admittedly in another province, but nevertheless for some of the employees there was that offer, and there were the usual reasonable accommodations made for the employees who were leaving.

Any time Investment Canada is faced with a merger situation it consults the provinces affected. It consulted, not in any secret way, the province of Manitoba. If there were significant reasons given by Manitoba why this should not be allowed to go ahead or if they had alternatives then those would be listened to, but I am not aware of any such thing having occurred.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I again refer the minister to the letter which was sent in confidence—it was privileged information—to Investment Canada on December 22, 1989.

In addition to that, when the sale finally became public in February the company said that it cost too much to send 400,000 batteries to eastern Canada. Was the government aware that that same company is now going to have to send 400,000 batteries to western Canada? That information was not available because the workers were never consulted. Why were they not consulted?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, obviously that privileged, confidential letter was not considered that way by whoever sent it, having given a copy to the hon. member.

The hon. member is talking about the operations of the company in terms of whether it is more economic to make the batteries here and ship them there or vice versa. I know he has a great belief in decisions about the operations of companies being made by politicians as being superior to those that are made by the marketplace.

The fact is that this company was going bankrupt. The managers were not able to operate it in a financially viable way. It is possible; there have never been any examples on earth, but we have to admit the theoretical possibility that had the company been run by somebody like the hon. member perhaps it would have made a profit. In the circumstances there was no other alternative.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and it is with regard to the fire in Hagersville as well.

It is my understanding that at Camp Borden, which is about one and a half hours away from the fire, a fire-fighting school already exists. In view of the short distance involved, why have those resources not been used in fighting this fire?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's information is correct. There is a Canadian Forces fire-fighting school located at Camp Borden.

I also would like to inform the hon. member that earlier this day an offer was made by the Department of National Defence to provide fire-fighters from that school and other military personnel to the Emergency Measures Organization of Ontario and to the municipality.

Before two o'clock this afternoon that offer was rejected. We were informed that the Government of Ontario and the Emergency Measures Organization felt that they had the equipment that was necessary, that they had the capability and that they had the problem under control.

I would also inform the hon. member that there is at present a liaison officer of the Canadian Forces in Hagersville to monitor. I can also inform him that the fire-fighting school and CF personnel are on 24-hour standby and would respond to a request.

BILINGUAL LABELLING

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Canadian manufacturers must spend substantial sums of money to conform to the standards for bilingual labelling. Meanwhile, Americans export tons of items to Canada with labels in English only. This puts our manufacturing sector at a disadvantage and is a threat to bilingualism, which goes against the government's commitment to Canadians during the last election campaign.

What does the minister intend doing to remedy this unacceptable situation?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as we announced last October, we have in co-operation with Customs and Excise and the Department of National Revenue stepped up inspections at the border of goods coming in to ensure they are properly labelled.

We have, in addition, got together with the association representing 90 per cent of the food retailers in this country to get their voluntary co-operation to ensure that goods on their shelves are properly labelled.

We are taking the necessary action to that ensure Canadian law is fully complied with.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, they cannot possibly be taking the necessary action because there are only 160 inspectors across Canada to police the language regulations of the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act and the Food and Drug Act, which is woefully insufficient. The minister knows that complaints against illegal labelling of American goods coming into Canada has increased by four times in the last year.

What is the minister to do to protect the manufacturers of this country and the linguistic duality of our nation?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, there are 3,000 Customs officers at the border performing this function of enforcing Canadian laws, as well as the inspectors.

Basically we have a law that is proper and we enforce it to the best of our ability, much the same as the police enforce speeding laws. We cannot guarantee that every single product will be properly labelled without putting in a huge number of inspectors at huge costs and putting a huge bureaucratic burden upon the very manufacturers about whose prospects he is concerned.

• (1500)

I am sure the hon. member would not want me to go out and hire the thousands and thousands of label cops necessary to ensure that every single product at all times is properly labelled. We do an excellent job and Canadian manufacturers have their interests fully protected.

TOURISM

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism), my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Does the minister responsible for tourism realize that current economic pessimism, combined with unprecedented tax increases and disastrous interest rates, threatens the survival of many small businesses and tourism? In the circumstances, could the minister explain why he cut the budget for tourism marketing at a time when we need it more than ever?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of State for Small Business and Tourism, let me say that both he and I and the hon. member would love to have more money to invite and advertise to the entire world the tremendous beauty of this country and the fact that they are missing a great experience if they do not come here as tourists.

What we are doing, given the limitation of a significant deficit and the fact that the taxpayers are already burdened, is spending smarter. We will see tourism continue to grow in this country as a result of the initiatives of my colleague.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, a single question.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I would rather you had called Orders of the Day but I will take the question.

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. member that it is very tempting. Perhaps a short question.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I only get one once every two or three months, now I have five of them.

My question is for the Minister of Transport. The National Transportation Agency has served notice of its intention to remove regulations over passenger rail service in this country. This includes rescinding the declaration that VIA Rail services are passenger train services, and allowing VIA Rail to make its own decisions on routing and frequency of routes even though the royal commission appointed by the minister has not had a chance to give an interim report.

Will the minister request the National Transportation Agency not to proceed with this until the royal commission has issued an interim report and will he ensure that the eight protected routes are kept in place regardless of what the National Transportation Agency does?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think with the experience my friend has, he knows very well that the agency has decided itself to take this initiative. It is not coming from the Department of Transport.

I think it is a fair concern when he raises the question of VIA Rail services, remote services and the royal commission. Obviously we will consider the process used by the National Transportation Agency. The government will consider the proposals but he knows very well that it is the agency's own initiative and the Department of Transport or the Minister of Transport does not have the authority to stop the NTA in that kind of investigation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk, on a point of order.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, as you know, this morning at eleven o'clock I was not in my seat. As you also know, I made a request under Standing Order 52 to be heard by you for an emergency debate on the very crucial situation in my riding regarding the Hagersville tire fire. I am wondering if we might find unanimous consent to revert to S. O. 52s, because at eleven o'clock I was in a very important discussion regarding this matter and I was not able to hear your decision on that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member seeks to revert to Routine Proceedings. The hon. member was very frank with the House. He was not in his seat when the matter ordinarily would have been called. I had notice of it, of course. I am in the hands of the House.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, for our part we understand that from time to time members cannot be in their place to make applications under Standing Order 52. In view of the importance of the issue, we are prepared to hear the application now.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): I rise on the same point, Mr. Speaker. The New Democratic Party would be only too pleased to allow the member to proceed.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

HAGERSVILLE FIRE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I will not indulge the House, and I thank all parties for allowing me to do this.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, you received a letter from me today regarding the very crucial situation in my riding concerning the Hagersville tire fire.

As the minister knows, I specifically requested a debate on this issue to let Canadians and, indeed, the people in my riding know the government's response to this matter.

HAGERSVILLE FIRE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. member from the New Democratic Party for extending the courtesy to the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk who naturally is extremely concerned about the matter, as are all hon. members.

This is not his first application, as hon. members will know, nor is it the only application that I have had for an emergency debate.

However, I have to say—and I say this specifically to Canadians living in that area—that the whole House, and it has been made very clear treats the matter as very, very serious indeed. There has been extensive discussion in the House over the last several days with respect to the situation and with respect to what, if anything, this House could do to expedite the solution of the matter or to encourage assistance to be given.

There have been comments on the government side and on the opposition side which indicate a sense here in the House that any help that could be given would be given.

But I must say that serious as it is, with respect to the exchanges and possible exchanges we may have, it would not be appropriate to adjourn the proceedings of the day and move to an emergency debate.

I do want to say to the hon. member and to other hon. members who have raised this matter that I treat it as serious. I think that there can be some assurance to the public that the House has treated it as very serious indeed.

I thank the hon. member for bringing the matter to our attention.

BUDGET STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: This morning the hon. member for Kamloops raised a point of order concerning the budget presentation which will be delivered later this day. He wished to obtain clarification as to whether or not the questions and comments period which generally applies to members speaking for 20 minutes should apply to the upcoming speech by the Minister of Finance on the budget.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands addressed in some detail specific recent precedents and examined carefully the text of the relevant Standing Orders. The hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader reviewed recent interpretations given to the standing orders on this issue, as did the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I want to thank all hon. members for their contributions.

After considering the issue, as I said I would this morning, the Chair is now ready to render a decision. Since hon. members did present such detailed arguments, I will not review again in detail the precedents cited.

• (1510)

[Translation]

As most hon. members will be aware, the standing orders of the House of Commons concerning the period of questions and comments were first adopted in November 1982, following recommendations by the Special Committee on Standing Orders and Procedure, commonly referred to as the Lefebvre Committee. The committee suggested that "the amendments to the appropriate standing orders be as simple as possible, but that the new debating process be controlled by the Chair", according to certain guidelines.

[English]

The House subsequently adopted amendments to its Standing Orders to incorporate this new procedure. The operative sentence in present Standing Order 84(7) reads:

> Following the speech of each Member a period not exceeding ten minutes shall be made available, if required, to allow Members to ask questions and comment briefly on matters relevant to the speech and to allow responses thereto.

While it is true that when this new rule first came into practice in late 1982 it was unclear as to whether or not the question and comment period should apply only to 20 minute speeches or to the longer speeches as well. There is the precedent in December 9, 1983, where the Speaker stated that according to the rules the 10-minute period could be allowed following the unlimited speeches in the Address debate.

Just so that all hon. members will understand that, as well as the public that is listening, it has been the custom to have unlimited time for the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Official Opposition and, out of courtesy, others.

As a courtesy to the Prime Minister and Leader of the Official Opposition, however, the 10-minute period was not used on that occasion. Several subsequent incidents in the House show members seeking unanimous consent to allow a question and comment period, implying that such consent was a requirement in order to allow this period.

On June 7, 1985, the Chair was called upon to interpret whether this 10-minute questions and comments period should apply to members who were entitled to speak for more than 20 minutes. The Acting Speaker stated that those who have unlimited time do not have a question or comment period.

No instances could be found in our practice where the question and comment period was allowed following a budget speech. Indeed, our practice since 1984 has been consistent in not allowing a question and comment period following anything but 20 minute speeches, except by unanimous consent. This interpretation of the rules is now regarded as a practice of the House and the occupants of the chair have conducted themselves accordingly.

I thank the hon. members for permitting the Chair to clarify the current practice in this matter.

However, the hon. member for Kamloops presents a valid argument about the fairness to a third party of this and other rules governing speeches. The suggestion has been made, however, that these issues be examined by the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business. This might be a course that hon. members will wish to pursue.

I might also add that I am indebted to the hon. member for Kamloops for a very succinct argument this morning. If it had not been for the clear evidence of a continual practice in this matter, looking at the words of the order itself and other similar orders that were referred to in the Standing Orders I might well have, if I had been making this decision some years ago, come to a different decision. Perhaps the wording ought to be looked at.

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bouchard (Roberval), that Bill C-26, an act to amend the Railway Act (grain and flour subsidies), be now read a second time and referred to a Legislative Committee; and on the amendment of Ms. Clancy (p. 8227)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): When the House rose at one o'clock we had just concluded hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Egmont. I see that it is not possible now to proceed with the question and comment period.

We will then resume debate with the hon member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, it is quite clear that there is a crisis in Atlantic Canada, particularly as a result of the decline of its main industry, the fishery. Under the circumstances one would expect the federal government to be supportive of that region, to assist in economic development and social adjustment and to assist in efforts to build the economy.

As the Atlantic economy has gone from great difficulty to crisis this government has watched and waited. Like Nero who fiddled while Rome burned, this government has sat on the sidelines not helping the region in its time of need.

We have seen large numbers of government programs and amendments to government policies which have worsened the situation in Atlantic Canada. Today, we are discussing one further negative implication for that region, Bill C-26.

These policy alternatives of the government have continued to make an already grave situation worse. We have seen VIA Rail cuts which have hurt the region. We have seen amendments to unemployment insurance which have hurt the region. We have seen cuts to regional economic expansion programs which have hurt the region. We have seen high interest rates and a high dollar which have made it more difficult for that region's products to be competitive. We have seen cuts to the provinces for health and post-secondary education. As well, we have seen the beginnings of the introduction of the goods and services tax.

These are all policies of this government which further harm the economy of Atlantic Canada and further hurt Canadian families in that region. Of course, the approach of the Progressive Conservative government to the regions has been its typical, obsessive, philosophically driven, free enterprise mentality. Pragmatism and common sense are thrown to the wind, as are Canadians and their families thrown on the scrap heap.

The government appears to have forgotten, or it does not care that vicious budget cuts throw people out of work and take food from the mouths of their children and themselves. People suffer from these PC policies, and suffer dearly. Tory times are indeed tough times for ordinary Canadians and their families.

This is not so for the wealthy and for large corporations, or for the economically strong regions of Canada. The less well off regions and middle and lower income Canadians suffer greatly. Neo-conservatism and this Progressive Conservative government on the one hand and the less well off on the other hand clearly do not mix.

Today, we are considering Bill C-26, a further blow to the Atlantic Canadian economy. The at and east program which is being eliminated by Bill C-26 pays a subsidy to railways on export grain and flour moving through eastern Canadian ports.

This program was introduced in part to ensure that the ports of Halifax and Saint John, two important ports which are ice-free in the winter, could handle grain effectively and efficiently. The program has proved very beneficial to Halifax and Saint John. Almost a million tonnes of grain and flour were moved through these ports under the at and east program.

The elimination of this program will take about $30 million and 573 direct jobs, as well as 250 indirect jobs, out of the Maritime economy, an economy which is already suffering greatly from the decline of its main resource.

Further, the elevators at Halifax and Saint John will almost certainly close, meaning further job losses. If the Halifax elevator closes the only flour mill in Atlantic Canada will close, causing even further job losses. Livestock producers in the Maritime provinces will suffer too, as will local breweries as their supplies become more expensive.

The elimination of the at and east program will constitute a major blow to an Atlantic economy already reeling from high unemployment, high interest rates and a high dollar. This is just one more attack on Atlantic Canada and reflects the uncaring and callous approach of this Conservative government to Atlantic Canada and to the less well off regions of Canada generally.

We have heard a great deal of the $130 million which have been set aside for Atlantic Canada in its time of crisis. This $130 million is merely money which was already set aside for Atlantic Canada prior to the crisis and constitutes no help for that region at all.

It is time the government stopped attacking the less well off regions and the less well off Canadians and started helping them. What Canadians need is a helping hand, not an iron fist. They need a leg up, not a kick in the teeth.

• (1520)

The government should listen to those who care about the regions of Canada, who care about Atlantic Canada and who care about Canadian families. It is well past time that this government started listening and acting on behalf of what ordinary Canadians suggest to it. It should not just follow blindly the agenda of the big business community.

For example, the government could listen to the suggestions of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission which has already suggested that serious economic consequences for these maritime ports will take place as a result of the removal of the at and east program and will adversely affect the movement of export grain and flour through these ports. In addition, as I have suggested, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission has indicated that grain elevator operations, port and railway employment and flour milling will all suffer as a result of the cut back in this program.

As a result, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission proposed certain modifications to the program which would reduce the demand on the federal treasury, would lessen or eliminate distortions and inefficiencies and would maintain the movement of export grain and flour through the Atlantic ports. In particular, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission was concerned to ensure the maintenance of the grain elevators as viable units at Halifax and Saint John, to ensure the maintenance of a commercially viable flour mill in Halifax and to ensure a flow of export grain and flour through the Atlantic ports.

This recommendation was presented to the government. The government did not even respond to it. The government is not listening to those in the region who are suggesting alternatives which can help that region and respond to the government's concerns.

The government should reconsider its approach. It should reconsider its bill. It should pay attention to the advice it gets and take seriously the concerns of the people of Atlantic Canada.

This bill was brought in with no consultation. Those who are affected by this bill did not have the matter discussed with them, and certainly did not suggest to the government any support for this proposal. As I said, it follows on the heels of other major attacks on the economy and social fabric of Atlantic Canada.

One last point which should be brought to bear on this point is that the CP line joining Montreal to Saint John may have to close due to reduced tonnage should this subsidy be removed. This would prevent VIA's Atlantic Limited from plying that route, a VIA Rail line which so many maritimers have fought so hard to keep.

Atlantic Canadians deserve better than this from this government. Atlantic Canadians deserve to be listened to. They deserve programs which help and assist them in their efforts to maintain a viable economy.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the member's remarks and remarks that were previously made in the House.

I hope the member recognizes the position taken by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission. That position does not in any way support the continuance of the at and east subsidy. Everybody associated with the port of Halifax, with the agricultural industry and all other segments of industry involved with at and east recognizes that it is a poor kind of subsidization, that it does not give assistance to those who should receive assistance. Nobody has ever suggested that the at and east should be maintained, as far as I am aware.

I would like to ask the member this question. Is his position that the bill before the House should not be passed, that the at and east should be retained and another $40 million should flow into the coffers of the railway company with very marginal benefits to the agricultural industry in Nova Scotia, to the port of Halifax, to the port of Saint John? Or would he prefer some other kind of method to assist those valuable sections of our economy—the port trade, the agricultural industry and so on?

Is he saying that he wants this anomaly that it no longer has the basis that it had when it was first introduced in 1961 to continue? Is that his idea of progress? Is that what the member wants to maintain, the status quo regardless of the advantages of maintaining the status quo?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for his question.

If he had listened carefully to the point that I had been making with regard to the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, he would have known that I was suggesting that the government pay attention to the recommendations of that commission and that the government reconsider its proposals in Bill C-26 and make real changes to the program which can ensure the economic viability of both the ports of Halifax and Saint John and preserve the jobs and the contribution to the economy which the program has provided.

There are 500 jobs at stake in an already fragile economy. It is important for the government to respond positively to those workers and to respond positively to the need to ensure that maritime farmers, the maritime brewing industry and the local economy be supported as much as possible.

What I am suggesting is that the government reconsider this bill and consider changes which will make the at and east program one which deals with the problems which are at stake. To discard it altogether, throwing 570 people on the scrap heap, along with their families, as well as a couple of hundred indirect jobs is simply not acceptable.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, I am sure if the member examined the situation he would very quickly discover that the difficulty with continuing the at and east is that it was intended to make competitive the east coast ports with ports in the United States of America. That situation no longer exists with respect to the movement of grain and flour traffic.

The competition is between St. Lawrence ports and east coast ports. If the at and east is removed the east coast ports would require some assistance to remain competitive. But all the jobs and all the money will stay within Canada in any event.

I take it the member is suggesting that the St. Lawrence ports should lose their advantage over east coast ports. I agree with the member if that is his position. I agree that there should not be special advantages to St. Lawrence ports or with the east coast ports. I hope he will make that position very clear and bring with it the support of his party for this disadvantage that has been retained over the last few decades in favour of St. Lawrence ports.

The difficulty is that in order to right the advantages and to make both east coast ports and St. Lawrence ports competitive we on the east coast need some further competitive edge. That competitive edge can be delivered if ice-breaking charges are imposed with respect to movements flowing through St. Lawrence ports.

I would like to ask the member if he is so interested in the at and east and he is so interested in the welfare of east coast ports—and his party backs him—why did they not act in this House to ensure that charges would be made against vessels using the St. Lawrence ports. Why did they fail to back that measure when it was before the House of Commons?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of changes which can be made to the at and east program to ensure that the Halifax and Saint John ports remain viable in terms of exporting grain. We should take every effort we can to ensure that that is the case.

I think by removing the subsidy which this bill attempts to do we do indeed favour central Canadian ports. We should be ensuring that those Atlantic ports, the two which are open throughout the winter, are indeed given the preferences they need in order to sustain themselves. We should be looking at the total support program which is represented by at and east to ensure that that continues.

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, first, I would like to compliment the member on his expertise in this area. He obviously has done his work. I would like to pick up on something that he said. It is about this Conservative party that is so hard and harsh on the people in the regions. Those from the Golden Triangle feel that everything they have they are going to keep yet those in the regions are being hit harder and harder.

I spoke to a woman from Newfoundland this morning. She talked about the GST and some of the attitudes of this government toward small business and others in Atlantic Canada. I am from the west, as is the member who was making comments, and he should know also that those of us in the regions and not in the Golden Triangle of central Canada realize that this government is on a strange journey that is going to hurt those of us in the east and west.

• (1530)

This woman in Newfoundland pointed out that one of the things missing from this government to those of us outside central Canada is communication. This government has let communication break down a substantial amount. It keeps throwing money and saying it is communicating, but in fact it is trying to send its agenda out and sell it.

What we have run into in the finance committee and every committee that sits is how to sell our programs. The government spends millions and millions of dollars in this way instead of actually listening to the people.

The member mentioned the goods and services tax, cuts in regional programs, cuts in VIA Rail, high interest rates, health and post-secondary education cuts. Can he make a comment to this House as to how he sees the lack of communication between government and the regions?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his comments. Perhaps "expertise" is a little strong, but I did live in Halifax for nine years prior to moving to Saskatoon. Therefore I have some understanding of the issues there. Unlike the Prime Minister, I have been to Newfoundland and to Atlantic Canada in recent months to assess the situation there.

Clearly the situation is an extremely grave one. The government is not paying attention to Atlantic fishermen and their families. It is not paying attention to those in that region. This point was made to me on many occasions during my recent visits through the outports of Newfoundland.

It is time the government paid attention to these concerns. It is time the government listened and acted in a way which is necessary in this case, that is, it recognizes the magnitude of the problems that Atlantic Canada is facing.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, I rise today to debate Bill C-26 and to argue against the principle of this legislation and against the principles the government has embodied not only within this legislation, but the very manner in which this legislation was brought forward.

The change to eliminate the at and east grain and flour subsidy, a program that has assisted in the orderly marketing of grain and assisted in providing the impetus to create a milling industry for exports since the 1950s was cancelled in the budget, as was the Advance Payments for Crops and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments programs. Its role and purpose in the budget papers has been intentionally obscured.

The actual purpose, according to the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill, the Liberal Minister of Transport who introduced the program in 1966, was to ensure that eastern Canadian ports could compete with the U.S. ports, and to enable the ports of Halifax and Saint John to compete with Montreal and other St. Lawrence River ports.

Further, as the minister stated then: "According to the Board of Transport Commissioners these rates are already unremunerative—We decided to keep these rates at their present level to pay compensation for doing so. This is because we feel there is an equal obligation in this field to the obligation with regard to the Crow's Nest. The purpose of this is to ensure that we will have rates which will provide some inducement and incentive to shippers to use the facilities of the Atlantic ports." This was was from Hansard committee report, transport and communications, 1966, page 1669.

However, since the budget papers fail to mention the second and third reasons, should we assume that this is because they will be eliminated in the next budget and are no longer relevant, or is the minister attempting to hide the real reasons behind the elimination of this and other agricultural programs?

I would also point out that this program was cancelled without warning, without consultation. Certainly, in the preceding election the Prime Minister or his cabinet failed to mention plans for cancelling this or other agricultural programs, undermining orderly marketing.

It was cancelled despite the fact that three government reports—and I will be fair about this, these reports did point to some structural inefficiencies in the at and east, as there are bound to be in all programs—stated in one manner or another that if the at and east was cancelled, alternative programs to encourage export milling and alternative storage facilities would need to be introduced to protect the integrity of our orderly marketing systems.

So when the government says that it is not undermining orderly marketing by cancelling the program, one really has to wonder if it has even read its own reports.

Further, if it does tend to undermine orderly marketing, has this government introduced any alternative programs to meet these goals, and will it? What the government has done is cancel the interest provisions of the Advance Payments for Crops and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments which it knows will have serious consequences on the storage situation in Canada.

Every farm group in the country attempted to tell the government to leave that program alone. The government ignored them. The implementation of the changes in that program were so bungled and dragged out by the government for so long that the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds has since admitted that not issuing advance payments for crops and prairie grain advance payments was a mistake.

At that time we were in the opposition. We repeatedly asked the government to do what the minister now admits he ought to have done. But now he calls it a mistake. A mistake for him, or a mistake for the Canadian farmers who voted for this government thinking it would act in a manner beneficial for agriculture.

Did the government learn from its mistakes? Will the minister now recognize that leaving this program in a similar legislative limbo is likewise a mistake, or will we hear so three months down the road again how the minister regrets the mistaken manner in which these changes were handled?

The government has introduced what it calls a discussion paper on the future of agriculture. A discussion paper, when after the proverbial thief in the night, it has cut this program, the at and east, drastically altered crop insurance, and eliminated the excise fuel tax rebates all in a budget costing the average farmer $1,000 a year.

Did the government consult with the producer organizations before it cancelled the programs in the budget?

You do not have to take my word for it, Madam Speaker. Listen to what the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said before the legislative committee studying Bill C-36, which is clearly true for this bill as well: "Certainly the CFA had no consultation. It was a surprise to see that particular item in the budget. I had not anticipated that item being there."

Yet the Minister of Agriculture in his green paper bemoans that there has developed, he says "an uncertain environment in which it is difficult for farmers to make long-term plans." Well perhaps instead of writing a green paper, he would have better spent his time consulting with farmers and defending their views from the knife of his colleague, the Minister of Finance, a minister who one can tell from reading his budget paper, has no idea of the purposes of the programs he is cutting.

You may very well be wondering yourself what is the principle behind this onslaught against agriculture, Madam Speaker, what principle guides it. It is a hidden agenda that is hidden no more. We have seen many of the masks this government holds, drop. Universality was the first to go, quickly followed by an Americanization of the unemployment insurance program.

In agriculture, the groundwork has begun to dismantle orderly marketing in Canada. Weak arguments and defences have been offered at the GATT to allow the government to create a defence for its lack of action, a defence that these changes are being made by a force of international sanction, that their hands are tied.

The truth is that the government is not defending the interests of Canada's producers. If it was, it would not be cancelling programs such as this which help maintain our export markets in the face of continued use by the U.S. and others of programs like like the Export Enhancement Program which funded grain exports to the tune of $1.5 billion in 1988, $0.7 billion in 1989, $566 million this year, and over $900 million proposed for 1991.

A month ago, the Minister of Agriculture might have looked on these statistics as some kind of victory. He might very well have said of these statistics: "Look, the Export Enhancement Program has been cut. U.S. subsidies are declining." But only because the U.S. felt its markets could be defended at that rate. The U.S. doubled it for 1991 and, if they thought tomorrow that they would need to double again to maintain their markets, they would double it again. If they had the grain to export, they would double it.

The Canadian Wheat Board is no longer issuing permits for Durum exports because of charges that the U.S. importers were exporting Canadian grain under the U.S. export enhancement program. With regard to subsidies, did the Government of Canada say to the United States: "No, we won't do as you say, we will do as you do"? No, they didn't. They said: "Sure, we will do as you say, we will cancel our export assistance programs, and you just go ahead with your export enhancement program and commodity loan programs." And the government still has the nerve to say it is defending Canada's interests at the GATT.

The government chose to accept the report on ice cream and yogurt at the GATT. It could have refused to accept that report. It could have used that refusal to defend the interests of the dairy farmers of Canada. It could have used the refusal to negotiate a strengthening of Article 11, but it did not.

To this government the GATT is not a place of tough negotiations. It is not the GATT, it is the "GIVE". That is how the government negotiates for agriculture, by giving up our rights and our programs.

However, this point might be moot, for by 1992 when the latest GATT round of negotiations is complete, Canadian agriculture will have nothing left to negotiate with, if the next three budgets are like the last one. There will be no government agricultural programs left and no orderly marketing left to defend.

What is happening must be clear to members opposite. If you have no storage capabilities, you cannot operate an orderly marketing system. By removing all the programs that allow producers to be able to afford to store crop, you force all the product on the market at once. You create a glut and orderly marketing is finished.

In 1980, there were 3,324 grain elevators in western Canada. Now there are only 1,619. Storage capacity in western Canada has shrunk from 8.76 million tonnes to only 7.1 million tonnes. The government has eliminated assistance in storing costs provided by the Advance Payments for Crops and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments. Now the at and east. What is left?

The Toronto Star reported that the elevators at Port McNicoll in Ontario will be blown up this spring, lessening storage facilities in Ontario by over 300,000 tonnes because of the cancelling of the at and east. It is not critics blaming the loss of the facilities on the cancelling of the at and east but the company that owns the elevators. One hundred jobs in Port McNicoll will be lost, a third of the town's tax base, let alone the damage that this will inflict on the orderly marketing of grain in Ontario.

A Minister of Transport report described the number one benefit of the program to the Ontario Grain Producers as "The at and east route helps to more efficiently utilize the limited storage and elevator space in the Georgian Bay–Great Lakes Region." Cancelling this program has already only further diminished the existing elevator space.

In the minister's green paper, he mentions the need for agriculture to be sustainable. In order to have sustainable agriculture, that literally means production within reasonable limits of what the environment can sustain over an indefinite length of time. There must be a system of orderly production and to have that you must have a system of orderly marketing.

You must have a pricing mechanism that provides a reasonable return for the producer and which allows the producer to use the land and the environment in a sustainable manner, not in an exploitive manner.

By removing the programs that assist in meeting storage needs, you undermine both of these things because they are interdependent. Gluts cause unreasonable returns which encourage the exploitation of the environment because greater resources must be exploited in order to achieve that reasonable return.

It is simple, and because it is that simple, I do not understand why the government is acting in the manner that it is. I ask anyone who thinks otherwise to ponder these figures.

Canadian farmers are efficient. Canadian farmers are the most efficient in the world. I ask anyone who thinks otherwise to ponder these figures.

For example, milk production per cow has gone up 70 per cent in Canada since 1971. During the same period, milk yields rose only 46 per cent in the U.S. That is creating sustainable agriculture.

Or if one wants to judge efficiency by price, if we look at poultry we see that the real farmgate price of poultry has fallen by 30 per cent since the 1970s. The retail price has dropped just 10 per cent over the same period.

In terms of chicken, in 1982 the farmgate price of chicken represented 48 per cent of the final cost to the consumer. Now it accounts for only 30 per cent of the cost. Clearly, these figures demonstrate orderly marketing efficiency.

Members opposite might think that by piecemeal cutting of small useful programs the deficit and national debt can be reduced.

However, if that is really the case, then I suggest they read the 1989 Auditor General's report, pages 92 to 93. Encourage your Minister of Finance to close that $300 million loophole that benefits only large corporations. The minister says he will close it with the GST. By then, $1 billion will be lost. That $1 billion would pay the interest of the APC and PGAP for 37 years, or conversely, it will take 25 or 37 years without those programs to make up for that giveaway. The difference is that these programs provide a tangible, intentional benefit, while this tax giveaway only serves to line the pockets of large corporations in an unethical manner.

Further, I would suggest that destroying the orderly marketing will not eliminate the national debt, so why attempt to justify its destruction as debt reduction, unless you are trying to hide the fact. Is that what you are doing?

In conclusion, I just want to say that Canada has one of the greatest agricultural systems in the world. It is criminal what this government is doing to it in the name of debt reduction. Clearly, that is not what it is actually attempting to do, which is to dismantle orderly marketing.

Mr. Duhamel: I do have one question for my colleague. I want to have him confirm, if I have understood correctly, that there was no consultation, no warning, no discussion prior to or during the election that this attempt to remove this particular program would be undertaken? I want to make sure I have that correct.

Second, if I am correct, this is very similar to what has been undertaken with the goods and services tax, the transfer payments to health and education to provinces, and the reduction in agricultural subsidies. I was wondering if there were other examples that come to mind of this particular approach to government.

• (1550)

Mr. Crawford: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for St. Boniface for his questions. There was absolutely nothing mentioned about cuts before, after, or during the election campaign. If we get into that issue I would need another hour.

There was no mention of cuts. Also, in relation to the hon. member's second question on education, the GST, agriculture, VIA Rail, there was absolutely no mention of VIA Rail cuts during the election campaign, and the devastating removal of jobs for many people. Other countries are now getting into rail transportation. Also, the government did not mention one thing on the environment. There was no environmental study on the elimination of rail transportation compared to the infrastructure of trucks and automobiles. There was one page which they called an environmental statement, which it was not.

Another thing is agriculture. In my riding during the campaign the Minister of Agriculture stated that we had a $3 million grant to clean up the Sydenham River basin. For over 13 months I have been fighting to find out what happened to the $3 million.

Mr. Walker: They stole it.

Mr. Crawford: Well, they have stolen many things.

The plans they said they had, the cuts that were never mentioned are things I find hard to believe. But I do thank the hon. member for the question. I would like to compose myself as I became a little excited over the many things this government has done wrong, the promises broken.

Mr. Arseneault: I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Kent on his fine speech. He really set out some of the problems and the impacts that cutting back this program will cause not only in Atlantic Canada but in central Canada.

As the hon. member probably knows, the provinces in Atlantic Canada are now suffering severely. There is a fisheries crisis not only in the offshore but inshore as well. There is high unemployment, we have cut-backs in ACOA, we have a problem with VIA Rail, where the Conservative government has shown no heart and has cut back. We had a recent announcement by the minister regarding cut-backs in summer training programs for university students. Again, there is the threat of cuts in transfer payments. I would like to ask the hon. member to confirm that this program will have a very negative impact, not only on the Atlantic provinces but on central Canada as well.

Mr. Crawford: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. For the farmers of my area of southwestern Ontario, which I have referred to as central Canada, this will be devastating. We like to think of our area, and especially my own riding, as the garden valley of Canada. It has the richest land, and great weather, for Canada.

Almost every day in my area, as in the eastern provinces, farmers are going bankrupt because they cannot compete with programs such as this. Yesterday, the market for corn was $2.66 a bushel and it costs $2.82 a bushel to grow. How can they survive? And then these programs are cancelled. Interest is now being charged on the advance payment for crops program. If a farmer cannot afford to store his crop, he cannot afford to pay interest. If he is going to pay interest, the bank wants the money. How can he afford to put up storage bins? I have neighbours who are in the business of building storage bins. They are losing this run-off from the one point of cutting back and amending the act to say we have to pay interest on the loans. It mushrooms for people. They are losing their living through their agricultural losses.

I do not believe there will be any agricultural grants left after the budget today. The farmers now pay gasoline taxes. We are competing under the free trade. I have not even got into the free trade issue. My riding is on the border and I know what free trade is doing to us in our area. The city of Chatham has over 12 per cent unemployment so we are starting to equal the Atlantic provinces. We are supposed to be one of the richest areas of Ontario and yet we have over 12 per cent unemployment.

We are so close to the border the companies that are owned—and they are 90 per cent owned by American firms—are taking their companies back, laying employees off here and upping production in the States. All this around the agriculture industry and the grants that the government has dropped.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I would like to place on the record a few brief remarks concerning Bill C-26 and the action taken under that bill to remove the so-called at and east subsidy. Being a representative of the port of Halifax I think it is particularly fitting that I add my comments because it is the port of Halifax and the farmers in the agricultural industry of Nova Scotia that are primarily affected by the divisions of this bill.

Of course, there is a profound effect in the port of Saint John and other areas of Atlantic Canada, but I think the very specific effect of this bill falls within the port of Halifax and the agricultural industry. It is important that the person representing some of those interests express a view in the House of Commons.

Bill C-26 is reality. We on the government side are facing the realities of our economy in Atlantic Canada. I am sure even the member for Kent recognizes that when subsidies are utilized, there is a distortion that takes place that can have an undesirable effect. That is exactly what has happened over the past 25 years and more with respect to the at and east subsidies.

The at and east subsidy was initially conceived as a method of allowing east cost ports within Canada to compete with ports on the east coast of the United States. The purpose of the subsidy was to balance the cost of grain and flour shipments eastward primarily for the export markets. Nobody would deny that it was an important measure at the time and it had a desirable effect. However, it does not meet the realities of the economy or the transportation system as we approach the decade of the 1990s and the 21st century. If we are simply going to continue these subsidies without taking steps to remedy the economic difficulties that they are designed to offset, then we are not going to make any progress either in terms of the Atlantic economy, the port of Halifax, the agricultural industry, or any other aspect of our national or regional life.

In very specific terms, the at and east subsidy on an annual basis poured $40 million into the coffers of the railways of Canada. The expenditure of funds was directed at the railways of Canada, even though the intention was to assist east coast ports at the time the subsidization was established. Because of the operation of the subsidy over a long period of time, there was substantial benefits to the agricultural industry particularly in the area of feed grains and related matters.

• (1600)

There was also a substantial benefit to the flour milling industry. In fact, a flour mill, Dover Flour Mill, was established on the east coast and is still there. We can see how subsidization not only accomplishes the goal that perhaps was intended in the original inception of the subsidy, but it creates other situations which have to be addressed. In particular the at and east was the basis for assistance to the agricultural industry, particularly in Nova Scotia, because it allowed feed to be delivered at a lower cost to those involved in the raising of livestock. It benefited the port of Halifax and supported the grain elevator there as well as the grain elevator in the port of Saint John.

As it is often said, that was then and this is now. We find now that the public funds that come from the taxpayers of Canada are being directed to the wrong source. The value of the at and east subsidization in the 1990s and beyond is the assistance that it provides for the agricultural industry, for the livestock sector of the agricultural industry as well as the port of Halifax and other ports, and the flour mills that have been established because of the existence of the source of supply.

If members opposite were being realistic and honest about this situation they would allow Bill C-26 to pass, end the at and east subsidy, and then lobby, argue and present a case for direct assistance to the farmers who were affected and have been receiving an indirect benefit, assistance to the port of Halifax, to the operators of the grain elevator in the port of Halifax and in the port of Saint John, and to other segments of the industry that might be adversely affected by the withdrawal of the at and east subsidization. I do not think any member of this House of Commons would stand up and demand the continuation of subsidization to the railways of Canada simply because the railways carry flour and grains eastward from the place of production.

Let me focus on that point because we just had a member from Ontario get up in the House of Commons and argue in support of the at and east and against the passage of Bill C-26. If that member wanted to help farmers in Nova Scotia and in the Atlantic area, he would be arguing in favour of the withdrawal of the countervail on corn. Then farmers on the east coast could get their feed cheaper because they would not have to honour the existing countervail which is in place to protect Ontario producers.

The member could also argue in favour of special permission to import into Canada other feed grains, oats and wheat, for use in the agricultural industry. There are all kinds of solutions beyond the at and east, but members never mention those solutions. They will not deal with the problem, and that is very much the problem with opposition members when a proposition is presented to the House of Commons. They simply argue against the proposition. They try to defeat it. They do not try to resolve the problem.

I hope the people of Canada, particularly the people in Nova Scotia and Halifax, will realize that the withdrawal of the at and east subsidy is the first step to trying to address the problems that are now allowed to fester because of the existence of at and east. In other words, redirect government funding to the proper source. As I said and I repeat, that source is not the railways of Canada. That source is the port facilities, the agricultural industry, the milling industry and particularly the milling of flour which is indirectly supported at the present time by the at and east.

There is no question that if the problems in the agricultural industry and in the port facility are not addressed there would be a loss of employment. But if action is taken to provide assistance in other ways, other than through an uncontrolled subsidy like the at and east, those kinds of problems can be resolved. In fact, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission has proposed a number of measures that could be taken to offset any harm caused by the at and east. Members opposite should direct their minds to those proposals as I am sure members on this side of the House will do.

The vital point is that even the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission recognizes that a first step is the abolition of the at and east. I think it is unfortunate from the point of view of those involved in the port facility and those involved in the agricultural industry that we do not have side by side with Bill C-26 a proposal to address some of the items that have been brought forward by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Committee and others. Surely that will come in time.

As long as the at and east subsidization is in place, nothing is going to change. Persons who raise livestock in Nova Scotia and other Atlantic provinces will not know what the future holds because nobody has supported the at and east subsidization as the proper resolution of the problem.

There are at the present time, and I want to be quite frank about this, real dangers to the continued existence of the grain elevator in the port of Halifax and the port of Saint John. I am sure all of us on the government side will call upon the ministries to recognize that problem and to take appropriate action. I think everybody on the government side recognizes the problem faced by farmers in Nova Scotia with respect to the raising of livestock and the fact that they are not in a competitive position.

I want to remind the House of what took place prior to the April 1989 budget. At that time there was considerable concern among members of the agricultural community that feed freight assistance would be eliminated. Members of the agriculture industry made it clear that they wanted the feed freight assistance to continue. As a result of their representations the feed freight assistance program was continued. But everybody, including government and industry people and everybody else concerned with the problem also recognize that the solution to the feed problem is self-sufficiency. If the industry could become self-sufficient with respect to feed grains the problem would be removed.

What the government has put in place is a program to foster self-sufficiency in feed grain for the east coast livestock industry. I think everybody recognizes that the solutions lie in that direction. In a similar vein, the solution to problems for mills on the east coast, particularly the existing mills and the grain elevator that is associated with the transportation of grain and grain products and flour, lies in other programs and other forms of assistance.

Why members would continue to block passage of the bill and seek ways to prevent its passage is beyond my comprehension. I do not see anybody in industry or any other place telling us to keep the at and east in place. If the motion before the House of Commons to give Bill C-26 a six-month hoist were passed, the at and east would continue and nothing would be resolved.

I want to stress again the fact that Bill C-26 is about reality. It is about the realities of the agriculture industry, the realities of the port industry and the realities of the milling industry.

Mr. Laporte: What is your alternative?

Mr. Crosby: If you are not willing, as a member of the House or Commons, to face reality, then you are not going to help the people of Canada resolve any problems. We have seen that time and time again in this House of Commons.

The New Democratic Party and every one of its members will not face reality. They want to create a panacea. They want to pretend that there are simple solutions to complicated problems. They want to nationalize poverty and make it an asset available to them because they know that only poor people will support their policy. If they were to create wealth across this country, they would lose their support. Their support lies in the welfare programs. Their support lies in the government assistance that they want to give to people. That is the way they attract their support.

• (1610)

I do not think everybody in this House of Commons realizes that that is not the way the Progressive Conservative government attracts support. We attract support by recognizing the economic realities of a nation by moving to resolve the problems that exist and in that way create a future.

We are not ashamed to create wealth. We are not ashamed to give the poor people of Canada an opportunity to better their position. We do not want to keep them in their state simply so they will provide a voting base for our party.

The future of this country lies in creating wealth. The first step in creating wealth is to recognize the economic problems that exist. Bill C-26 recognizes the problem that exists. It is a first step to remedying it. I hope every member of the House will recognize that and not hide behind some alleged solution which they know does not exist that will allow the problem to continue and that will have a "crass appeal to their own electorate".

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, for the party that has created a lot of poverty and which is in the process of institutionalizing it, it is good to hear the hon. member talk about wealth.

Concerning the record of consultation of this particular government, and in particular the consultation on this particular issue, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission put before the government an alternative approach which it thought would ease the situation. It said: "This is what we can do with at and east when the time comes". It has put before the government other alternatives in terms of what needs to happen to keep them in a survival mode if the government does pass this bill.

The impact of the proposal to terminate the at and east rates would be against the farming community, both in the Atlantic provinces and elsewhere. What is being talked about here is the importation of barley, wheat and oats from France and other European countries that can supply the east coast of Canada cheaper than domestic suppliers.

These are the kinds of solutions that are going to have to be put in place if alternatives to the at and east are not established. We in the west and in central Canada cannot supply from central Canada and from the west those products which are needed in the east.

The alternatives mean an impact on the west and central Canada. It is too bad that the reason for this particular change of direction by the government is based on ideology alone because when the at and east was established originally it was not entirely to keep the grain going to Buffalo and New York. It was intended to keep the facilities along the Atlantic coast operating.

In fact Jack Pickersgill said that it was to ensure that we would have rates which would provide some incentive to the shippers to use the facilities of the Atlantic ports.

Does the hon. member not recognize that even his own port is going to be affected negatively by this bill and that Saint John is going to be affected more so?

Mr. Crosby: This is a great example of House of Commons debate. If the debate goes on long enough, the truth emerges.

The members on the other side who are standing to oppose Bill C-26 are not trying to help Atlantic Canada. They are not trying to help the port of Halifax or the agricultural industry in Nova Scotia. They are trying to help their own self-interests. They are trying to help western farmers. They are trying to help corn producers in Ontario. That is perfectly legitimate, but stand up and say that. Do not pretend you are helping the port of Halifax if you are from Saskatchewan. Do not pretend you are trying to help the agricultural industry in Nova Scotia if you come from the corn production belt of Ontario. Tell the truth. That is all anybody wants. Just tell the truth.

Let me deal with the point about consultation. It is strange the member would suggest there was no consultation when I have here before me a paper from the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission detailing their lobbying on the Atlantic region freight assistance program. They say it is safe. They say they have consulted with the government and the feed freight program is safe. They talk about the at and east. They mention that it is terminated and that it will produce some economic difficulties.

How about this for consultation? They say right in their paper that their concerns will be followed by an early meeting under the auspices of Transport Canada at the regional level to evaluate the impacts and seek out possible means of minimizing the negative impacts on the Atlantic region. That is what is all about. Get rid of the at and east and then remove the damaging impacts, if any, by other programs. That is simple enough.

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, the convoluted speech we heard was only matched by the convoluted answer to the preceding question. Let us see if we can bring some logic to bear, though it might catch the member off guard at this time of day.

I do not mind people flacking for a minister, but when they read from a press release, then all logic is lost. It is very interesting that the NDP and the Liberals have to defend the maritimes. One reason we are defending the maritimes is that the members on that side of the House who were elected from that area have walked out on them. This is a perfect example. The government has taken away another benefit from that area, as it has taken away so many benefits in the last five years.

The hon. member stands up and says: "If it is good enough for the Prime Minister, it is good enough for me and it is good enough for my people. I do not care about all the downsides."

I would like the hon. member to describe in a sentence or two exactly what he believes is the way the federal government is helping these people in the maritimes. All we see from this side of the House is the removal of funds from regional economic development, the loss of transportation subsidies and all the infrastructure help that used to be given under previous governments. There is nothing but taking away.

Just before we hear the budget in 10 or 12 minutes, we have seen that back-bencher give a perfect rendition of what everybody on that side is going to have to go through for the next couple of weeks. Perhaps he could just give us a little insight as to what he thinks this government is actually doing for the maritimes.

Mr. Crosby (Halifax West): Apparently the member thought my presentation was convoluted. I do not have a blackboard, but let me try to make it as simple as I can. Write $40 million. It is hard for a member of the Liberal party to understand dollars and cents, but just take that $40 million and give it to the railways of Canada. Then figure out what the railways of Canada are going to do for Atlantic Canada with the $40 million. The answer will come back very quickly; nothing. The facilities have been in place for a hundred years. They do not spend a nickel or a dime of that subsidization on facilities.

We want to take the $40 million and apply it in some other way, or some part of it. I do not mind if some of it goes to reducing the deficit, because that is what is creating the economic problem in the first place. I do not expect members of the opposition to understand that.

Let me give a concrete example in case the member did not get that first exercise. The Atlantic Farmers' Council say there are one million tonnes of feed grain per year utilized by livestock raisers in Atlantic Canada. Now, 500,000 tonnes is for local consumption. Approximately $20 a tonne is saved by farmers because of the at and east. We only need to subsidize the purchase of the feed grains by that amount and we will have satisfied the farmers in their difficulty. I hope that is understood.

We do not even need to do that. If we do not protect Ontario corn growers, we can remove the countervail. If we do not protect other segments of the industry in other parts of Canada, we can allow for imports. But the member from Saskatchewan has already said no to imports. Do not import feed grains into Atlantic Canada, make them pay the heavy price they have to pay for getting western grains. That is why he wants the at and east subsidy, because he wants to sell grain. I do not blame him for that. But do not pretend you are trying to help Atlantic Canada.

• (1620)

Mr. Crawford: Madam Speaker, I have a question for clarification. I believe I heard the hon. member from Halifax state that they are trying to help the eastern farmer by being more efficient. I will be quite honest with the hon. member. If he helps the eastern farmer, he will help farmers in central Canada because we are both going under. I want him to clarify his statement that there is a plan to help the farmer become more efficient. Right now our inputs are more than we get for our crops. If the member can explain it to me, maybe I can support the bill. I doubt it but you explain it to me.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, apparently the member is not aware of the assistance now provided to the livestock industry in Atlantic Canada through the Feed Freight Assistance Program, which also involves subsidization. In that case, however, the government subsidization is between the persons who receive the subsidization, the industry people, and the government.

We just do not funnel funds out according to some formula introduced by the Liberal government 30 years ago, which we are supposed to continue just because Mr. Pickersgill or somebody put their name to it.

Times and circumstances change. The subsidization is not accomplishing the desired effect. It is not realistic, as I said at the outset. I can do no better than to repeat it. Bill C–26 is about reality. If the hon. member does do not want to face reality then I can understand why he will not support Bill C–26.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to listen to the comments from the members opposite about the benefits of Bill C–26 for Atlantic Canada.

When we analyse what this government has done over the last few months, we have to wonder what will happen to us in Atlantic Canada.

Bill C–26 is a clear example of how this government treats Atlantic Canada. I listened to the hon. member for Halifax West tell us that we should give up on this particular subsidy and this particular grain handling bill. In the meantime we can wait to see what happens and maybe argue for something else.

Atlantic Canadians are fed up with giving up. We have given up our VIA Rail system. We have given up almost every type of support mechanism that has been available to Atlantic Canadians over the years. The hon. member for Halifax West tells us to continue to give up. Quite frankly, Atlantic Canadians are fed up with giving up.

It is interesting to listen to government members and their code words. They talk about the bottom line, market forces and subsidies. In the final analysis, we see they are caught in the dilemma of the free trade agreement. They have to abandon the unemployment insurance program that involved government participation because of the free trade agreement.

Now, Bill C–26 forces the government to give up support to the grain handlers in Atlantic Canada, to the railway industry and to all the other support industries because in part the free trade agreement was poorly negotiated and left Atlantic Canadians in the lurch.

As the government proceeds step by step with its agenda, we realize that it is tearing apart the total infrastructure that has functioned well in Atlantic Canada. Consider, for example, the lack of support for the Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick, and the dismantling of all of VIA Rail except for the mainline. With the removal of this at and east subsidy, we will see more CN and CP lines abandoned.

The government states that it is doing this for Atlantic Canada, and is behind us 100 per cent. It is all nonsense, it is not behind anyone.

The purpose of the program was to allow the Atlantic Canadian ports an opportunity to survive and compete against the Americans and also the Upper Canadians in Montreal. The government wants to take that advantage away. It is telling Atlantic Canadians to sink or swim on their own. What it will do is is cut off all the life supports now, and then ask the goverment to come back and try to negotiate after they lost everything.

That is totally unacceptable to us in Atlantic Canada. The problem is that when you only deal with bottom lines and with numbers, statistics and data like that, you forget that there are people involved. There are people who have jobs. There are people who have families and children going to university. Where are they left when this government is through taking away every type of support mechanism that is available?

Members opposite often tell us solutions. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission offered solutions. It put a proposal on the table a year ago, and the government simply ignored it and brought in Bill C–26. It did not listen to the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission. It did not listen to anybody. It just went ahead and did what it felt was right, which turns out, as usual, to be wrong.

It is no wonder, when you look at the polls that were released today that in Atlantic Canada the government is down to about 20 per cent in popularity, with the Liberal party at 67 per cent. It is because it has destroyed the confidence of Atlantic Canadians in their government and what it is doing. While the government talks about regional disparity and trying to hold this country together, at the same time it dismantles everything which Atlantic Canadians hold dear in all of their structures.

The government has botched its handling of the fishing industry. It has botched the railway industry. Now it has botched its handling of this issue.

This is a critical aspect of development in Atlantic Canada. The program has been in existence since the 1960s. It has been beneficial to Atlantic Canada. I believe that as this government adopts a very callous attitude, the alienation of Atlantic Canadians, of the people in the north and in the west toward the central government will have nothing but an adverse effect on Confederation and on how we as a country see ourselves.

I know that my time is waning because we are going to hear of more cuts, more hardship, more havoc on all the citizens of Canada—not just Atlantic Canada—coming up in about a minute and a half. I will defer any further comments. I want to hear what the Conservative government is going to do for us. It has done so much to us so far that I cannot imagine that there can be anything left that it can take away from Atlantic Canada.

It is a continuing drama of cut-backs on the basis of bottom line. The government is suffering from that rare disease called "deficititis". It plays the smoke and mirrors game of adding on here and changing the funding there. The net effect is that Atlantic Canadians lose. They have lost before, and they are losing now with this bill.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: Since 1984, this government has been following a consistent and comprehensive plan to ensure that Canadians can benefit from a rising standard of living and a quality of life second to none in the world.

As a vital part of that plan, we have been striving to gain greater control over our nation's finances.

We have attached a very high priority to this objective. Because as we achieve it, we will gain greater flexibility and independence of action to meet the priorities of this government and of Canadians.

Last year I set out a five-year deficit reduction plan to achieve this objective. It was, and is, the right course to follow.

The deficit for this year is on track at $30.5 billion. But our future progress is endangered by deeply entrenched inflationary pressures.

Today I am asking Canadians to join in a broadly based program to reinforce our efforts to control government spending. This program will keep us on a track that will allow us to achieve the goals that I set out in my last budget: We will reduce the deficit to $28.5 billion this next fiscal year; We will cut it in half to $14 billion in three more years; and, We will reduce it further to $10 billion in the year after that.

This will mean that within five years the government will begin to buy back its bonds and Treasury bills. The country will be on a clear path of substantially reducing the burden of debt.

Last year I said that for every dollar the government collects, the interest on our debt was 35 cents and rising. That is money we can not use now to get taxes down or to address priorities such as environmental protection, research and development and skills training. We must pay those interest costs. In this budget I will show how, over the next five years, we can reduce that 35 cents to 26 cents—and keep it going down.

[Translation]

Reducing the share of revenues we pay out in interest will increase our capacity to meet the aspirations of Canadians.

That is one important reason for reducing our deficit. There are other important reasons.

Every additional dollar of deficit we incur today means an increased burden of debt for future generations. We have a responsibility to our children and grandchildren. To build for them, not to borrow from them.

[English]

Reducing the federal deficit will help ease inflationary pressures. That will help reduce interest rates.

Reducing the federal deficit will reduce Canada's reliance on foreign lenders. It will strengthen our sovereignty as a nation.

These are all powerful reasons for holding to the plan we started in 1984.

Much progress has been made since then. We have significantly reduced the burden of government. The growth of spending on all government programs and services has been well below the growth of the economy and even below the rate of inflation.

We have reduced the size of the public service by 12,000. The public service today is the same size as in 1973, despite the fact that Canada's population has increased by about one-fifth. Overall, spending on government operations is less now than it was in 1984.

When we first came to office, the federal government was spending $16 billion more on programs—everything except our interest costs—than it collected in revenues. Today our program spending is $9 billion less than revenues. We have turned an operating deficit into an operating surplus—a turnaround of $25 billion in just five years. And 70 per cent of this progress results from expenditure restraint. To achieve that progress, we have reduced program spending as a share of the economy to the lowest level in almost 20 years.

Canadians know that this progress has been hard-earned. They have felt the impact of the tough but necessary decisions to protect and strengthen Canada's future. While our actions have meant difficult adjustments for many Canadians, the economic results have been good. The economy has expanded for seven consecutive years. Employment has grown strongly. After-tax incomes have risen. Economic opportunities have been increased. Poverty has been reduced by the best kind of social policy—more jobs.

[Translation]

The actions in this budget will ensure that we make continued progress in the years ahead by facing squarely the twin problems of high deficits and high inflation.

I am proposing a two-year expenditure control program that will affect all areas of government spending with the exception of income support programs for seniors, families and veterans, unemployment insurance, as well as the equalization program and Canada Assistance Plan payments to lower-income provinces.

[English]

A number of programs will be limited to 5-per-cent annual growth for the next two years. Others will be frozen at their current levels. Some will be cut or eliminated. Government operations will be tightened further.

There will be no new taxes in this budget.

• (1640)

The spending control program, together with the restraint measures announced in December, will save $3 billion in the first year and close to $4 billion in the following year. The savings will total well over $19 billion over the next five years. Our operating surplus will grow from $9 billion today to $31 billion in 1994-95.

Implementing the expenditure control program this year will require the patience and understanding of Canadians.

In my budget last year, I spoke of the importance of easing the inflationary pressures that have been building in most parts of the country. Only by easing demand and cooling out these pressures can we re-establish a solid track of sustainable non-inflationary growth.

The economy is in a period of slower growth. This is not surprising. Nor should we try to avoid it.

This will not be an easy year. But as we move through it, let us not forget what we learned together in the early 1980s when inflation got out of control. Let us not relive the sense of despair, the sinking confidence and the personal hardship that resulted from the 20-per-cent-plus interest rates brought on by soaring inflation.

Let us instead remind ourselves of why we must solve our deficit and inflation problems now. To do so will allow us to build a secure and rewarding future on a solid foundation: a responsive government with the financial room to manoeuvre to maintain valued services and tackle new challenges; a dynamic economy that provides rising living standards and growing opportunities to build full, satisfying lives; a confident, economically sovereign country that is competitive abroad and in control of its destiny at home.

This is the future we have been building since 1984.

The way to achieve it is to follow a clear plan of responsible fiscal and economic policies to reduce inflation and create a better climate for lower interest rates; policies that increase our ability as a nation to earn our way in the world and to pay our way at home.

This government will continue to do, not what is easy or popular for itself, but what is right for the country.

BUILDING THE FOUNDATION FOR A BETTER FUTURE

To ensure a strong economic foundation for the future, we are moving forward with the broad plan that we set out in November 1984.

The plan has two main thrusts: to put the government's financial house in order; and to foster a dynamic, innovative and competitive private sector.

Our actions have challenged Canadians and encouraged them to change their ways of doing things.

But let's be clear about the real source of pressure for change. It is not the government. It is the rapidly evolving and increasingly competitive world in which we must earn our way.

The pace of international economic change has been accelerating during the past decade as more and more of our trading partners have implemented major economic reforms. The adjustments that we and others have been making have been spread over many years. By contrast, the adjustments faced now by those in Eastern Europe are daunting in their speed and scope.

The powerful combination of political and economic freedom will increasingly unleash the creative energy of individual initiative, and bring more and more countries into the competitive mainstream of the world economy. We, as individuals and as a country, must be ready to deal with this and take advantage of the opportunities it presents.

[Translation]

EXPANDING OUR ECONOMIC POTENTIAL

In this changing world, Canada needs a dynamic, flexible economy that responds quickly and effectively to new challenges and opportunities; a more open and market-oriented economy that brings out the best of our competitive abilities.

Toward this goal, our economic plan has proceeded with many initiatives designed to strengthen the basic structure of the economy and provide a better framework to allow our economy and Canadians to adjust to change. These structural reforms will increase our competitiveness and expand our potential for growth and job creation. They encourage private initiative, remove obstacles to economic growth, secure access to markets, increase investment and improve efficiency. They contribute to a more productive and prosperous Canada.

The Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement is opening up new opportunities in the large American market. This initiative alone will lead to an ongoing 3.5 per cent increase in our economic output. These gains will be shared by all regions.

[English]

Scrapping the National Energy Program and deregulating the energy and transportation sectors have reduced government interference in these key parts of our economy.

The reform of the income tax system lowered tax rates and eliminated tax breaks and loopholes. It has increased economic output by increasing the incentive to work, save and invest.

The new Labour Market Development Strategy will upgrade the skills and increase the flexibility of the work force. Better training means better jobs for Canadian workers. It helps them adapt to new technology and change.

PRIVATIZATION AND CROWN CORPORATIONS

Our program of privatization and improved management of Crown corporations is contributing both to greater economic efficiency and deficit reduction. Since 1984, the government's holdings in 18 corporations have been sold or reduced. Eight others have been dissolved. The number of Crown corporation employees has been reduced by 75,000 partly through privatization and partly through rationalization and the elimination of waste and inefficiency.

The financial health of many Crown corporations has substantially improved. Canada Post has turned a $400 million deficit into a profit and is continuing to improve its service. Canadian National has reduced its long-term debt from $3.5 billion in 1986 to less than $2 billion in 1989. To ensure a better return on the public's investment and to contribute to deficit reduction, profitable Crown corporations will return more to the government as shareholder in the form of dividends.

We will continue to privatize Crown corporations and sell investments where government ownership is no longer needed to meet public policy objectives.

In 1984, Petro-Canada was mandated to operate as a commercial corporation in a competitive private sector environment. Further expansion of Petro-Canada depends on having access to the full range of financing opportunities available to private sector corporations.

Following consultations with senior management of the corporation, the government has decided that the time has come to allow direct public ownership of Petro-Canada. The Minister of State for Privatization will provide further details in the near future and legislation will be introduced later this year. The government is confident that a privately owned, Canadian-controlled Petro-Canada will play a strong and growing role in Canada's energy sector.

• (1650)

We intend to sell the government's shares in Telesat Canada, which has now achieved commercial success as a satellite communications carrier. This sale will help encourage even greater innovation in a key high-technology sector of the Canadian economy.

We are also winding up a number of Crown corporations and other agencies whose functions can be handled effectively by other organizations.

SALES TAX REFORM

The replacement of the existing manufacturers sales tax with the Goods and Services Tax is a key part of our economic plan. It will strengthen economic competitiveness, contribute to deficit reduction and lead to a fairer sales tax system.

Replacing a hidden tax with a tax which will be visible and comprehensive is difficult. It isn't popular, but it is necessary.

The existing tax destroys jobs. It makes our exports less competitive and favours imports over Canadian-made products. It costs Canada $9 billion in lost annual output. The GST will unlock that potential for new growth and jobs. The benefits will be felt in every region of Canada.

The existing federal sales tax is subject to significant tax avoidance. By replacing this unreliable tax, the GST will put our deficit reduction plan on a stronger foundation.

[Translation]

Through the GST refundable credit, the fairness of the tax system will be improved. Families with incomes up to $30,000 will be better off than under the existing system. Three-quarters of all families headed by seniors and single parents will have more after-tax income under the GST.

In response to concerns expressed by the small business community, the government is continuing to work with the provinces to seek ways of minimizing the compliance burden of the tax.

[English]

REALIZING THE POTENTIAL

Taken together, all of these reforms will significantly increase the capacity of the Canadian economy to produce goods and services. They raise our potential sustainable growth from an average of 2 3/4 per cent annually to more than 3 1/4 per cent. Achieving that growth will mean more jobs and a higher standard of living for Canadians. Over a five-year period, it will lead to a gain of about $2,500 for a household of four.

The challenge we face is to realize this higher potential for growth so that we can achieve those benefits. The record shows that Canadians have responded well to the challenge of change and adjustment since 1984. We have an outstanding record of growth and job creation. Almost 1.6 million more Canadians have a job today than in 1984. Average incomes have steadily increased, not just in total dollars but in real, after-tax income. This means there are now 750,000 fewer Canadians exposed to poverty.

GETTING OFF THE DEFICIT TREADMILL

To achieve our potential for greater economic growth and job creation, we must build on the hard-earned fiscal progress we have made.

Let me explain clearly the deeply rooted nature of the problem we are facing, and why it can be solved only with patient, determined, year-by-year effort.

In a real sense, we have had to fight not one deficit, but two.

In 1984, the federal government was living far beyond its means. It had to borrow $16 billion just to cover the difference between spending on programs and services and the revenues it collected. That was the first deficit—the operating deficit.

At the same time, a $200 billion mountain of debt was generating more than $22 billion in annual interest charges. Every penny of this interest was paid by additional borrowing. This was the second deficit.

Before we could even begin to deal with this second problem, we had to eliminate the operating deficit that was caused by too much program spending and eroding revenues.

REDUCING GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

As part of a measured, long-term plan to restore a better fiscal balance, we immediately launched a broad and sustained effort to reduce expenditures.

The first priority was spending on government operations—the cost of running the government. In 1984, this cost $17.4 billion. We have cut this to $16.8 billion in spite of a larger workload.

In December, the President of the Treasury Board announced further steps to eliminate waste, improve efficiency and save $1.4 billion over the next three years. We have imposed a freeze on federal government construction in Ottawa and travel restrictions on Members of Parliament and public servants. We are closing some parliamentary restaurants, selling two government jets and amalgamating or closing some government agencies.

Waste is being eliminated. Productivity has been improved; it will be further improved by measures in this budget. We will continue to seek out ways to eliminate waste and inefficiency in the months and years ahead.

We also eliminated outdated programs and restructured or restrained others. We eliminated energy subsidies, closed heavy water plants, reduced the VIA subsidy and eliminated the Canadian Exploration and Development Incentive Program. With tight discipline and good management, the program spending that amounted to 19.5 per cent of the economy in 1984 has been reduced to 16 per cent this year. That is equivalent to a $22 billion reduction in spending.

But the problem we faced in 1984 was not just too much spending. Federal government revenues had been declining as a share of national income since the mid-1970s. This happened for a number of reasons, including the growth in special tax breaks and the flaws in the federal sales tax. We eliminated those breaks, closed loopholes and increased revenues. Revenue, as a share of national income, is now back to the average level of the 1970s.

In 1987-88, we reached the first major milestone in the battle against the deficit when we turned the operating deficit into a surplus which now stands at $9 billion. This is major progress. It is a fundamental structural change in the balance of spending and revenues.

SOLVING THE DEBT PROBLEM

Because we now have an operating surplus, the total deficit today is less than the borrowing required to pay the interest on the debt. The reason for the rapid increase in borrowing costs needs to be better understood.

Compound interest—the interest paid on interest—is a great friend when you have money in the bank. Money invested at a compound rate of 10 per cent doubles in about seven years. It quadruples in about 14 years and grows to almost eight times its original size in 21 years.

But the same thing happens in reverse when you have to keep borrowing to pay the interest on a debt. In the time it takes a newborn child to reach the age of 21, a $200 billion national debt at a compounded rate of 10 per cent would grow to almost $1.5 trillion, all on its own.

Despite the fact that we have cut the annual growth of the debt from 24 per cent to less than 10 per cent since 1984, the debt is still growing faster than the economy—faster than our ability to pay.

• (1700)

[Translation]

Our public debt has grown from $200 billion to $350 billion in five years. Fully $120 billion—more than 80 per cent—of this increase consists of the compounding interest on the original $200 billion. That shows dramatically how important it is to get off the treadmill of borrowing money to pay interest on the past debt. It also helps to explain why the deficit is still at $30 billion in spite of the reduction in spending and increased tax revenues over the past five years.

[English]

This year alone, interest payments will cost us close to $40 billion—equal to $1,500 for each and every Canadian. That is ten times higher than 15 years ago.

A public debt growing faster than national income does more than feed on itself. It consumes more and more of the dollars we need to maintain existing programs, meet new priorities and keep taxes down. Ultimately, it consumes the hope and the opportunity that should be the legacy we pass on to our children. Instead, a runaway debt becomes our legacy.

The children of today and tomorrow do not have a vote in this matter. We do, and with it comes the responsibility to protect their future from a crippling burden of debt.

With the expenditure control actions in this budget, we will ensure that our operating surplus continues to grow. This is essential. But we also need to ease the burden of rapidly growing interest payments. And to do this effectively we must continue to deal firmly with the greatest single threat to our continued fiscal and economic progress: high inflation.

CURRENT FISCAL AND ECONOMIC CHALLENGES

After seven years of strong economic growth, the economy has exceeded its productive capacity. This has fuelled inflation. The current slowing of the economy is helping to ease the strain, but underlying inflationary pressures remain too high. We must lower inflation as quickly as possible. This is the only way to get interest rates down so that we can put the economy back on a sustainable path of expansion and make further progress on the deficit.

The prospects for lower inflation and interest rates depend crucially on keeping costs under control. If we try to take more out of the economy than it is capable of producing, our inflation problems will worsen and the economy will suffer. Responsible price and wage behaviour will speed the process of getting inflation down.

Federal government wage increases have been below the inflation rate and below the pace of wage increases in the private sector since 1984. The government is today reaffirming its commitment to wage restraint. I have asked my provincial colleagues to join me in that commitment.

This will be a testing year for the Canadian economy. The economic news will not be encouraging in the months ahead. Growth will be slow. Employment is expected to continue growing, but not as quickly as the labour force, and the unemployment rate will rise.

In these circumstances, we can expect to hear increasing demands for quick-fixes, particularly for sharp, sudden reductions in interest rates. The frustration that people feel about the persistence of high interest rates is understandable. I feel it too. But experience makes clear the futility and the danger of trying to solve economic and fiscal problems by dealing with the symptoms rather than the causes. Experience also supports the need for the kind of firm, inflation-fighting monetary policy that the Bank of Canada has been following.

I want to underline the point: High interest rates are the symptom, inflation is the cause. A firm monetary policy helps to ease the demand that is straining the capacity of the economy and creating inflationary pressure. It is dealing with the cause of the problem. Premature easing of credit would lead to an increase in borrowing and demand pressures. This would make the inflationary problem worse, and lead to even higher interest rates in future.

• (1705)

The measures in this budget will work with monetary policy to ease inflationary pressures. They will help to harness the benefits of lower inflation, lower interest rates and lower deficits. They will reinforce each other and lead to a smooth return to strong, sustained growth and job creation. They will help ensure that the greater economic output made possible by our structural reforms will in fact be achieved.

[Translation]

REINFORCING EXPENDITURE CONTROL

The expenditure control measures in this budget are tough. They reflect the fact that after several years of restraint, there are no painless ways to cut spending. The notion that spending can be substantially reduced without having a real impact outside of government simply does not fit with the reality of how government spends the taxpayers' dollars.

[English]

EXPENDITURE CONTROL PLAN

Our two-year expenditure control plan will have a major impact on program spending. All areas of program spending were reviewed and a wide range of programs is affected. In designing the measures, we were sensitive to the financial circumstances of individual Canadians as well as governments.

We have exempted major transfers to persons. These include elderly benefits, family allowances, veterans' pensions and allowances and unemployment insurance benefits. We have also exempted the equalization program and Canada Assistance Plan transfers to those provinces receiving equalization.

We have capped the growth of a number of programs at 5 per cent per year for the next two years. These include Canada Assistance Plan payments to the fiscally stronger provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta; and certain expenditures for science and technology, and Indian and Inuit programs. In the 1989 budget, defence and foreign aid expenditures were substantially reduced. In view of the tight fiscal situation, their growth will also be limited to 5 per cent from this lower expenditure base.

We have held a number of programs at their 1989–90 levels for the next two years. Total per capita cash and tax transfers to the provinces under Established Programs Financing will be held constant. These transfers will continue to grow with provincial populations.

We have reduced or eliminated a number of programs. In light of the economics of the project and the present fiscal environment, the government will not proceed with the offer of assistance for the construction of the OSLO oil sands project. The Canadian Exploration Incentives Program is cancelled effective midnight, February 19. The government will not proceed with the Polar 8 icebreaker project, due to significant increases in the estimated costs, delays which have contributed to these increases, and changes in the international environment.

We are taking a more businesslike approach to assistance to business. With limited exceptions, grants will be eliminated and financial assistance will be repayable on more rigorous terms. This will place the emphasis more clearly on investing in economic development rather than subsidizing the private sector.

[Translation]

We are implementing a wide range of other measures to increase efficiency and reduce the cost of government operations. These include the privatization and Crown corporation measures that I dealt with earlier. The 2-per-cent annual limit on the growth of government operations and maintenance budgets, which has been in effect since 1986–87, will continue until 1994–95.

• (1710)

[English]

It is clear that with these measures the federal government has tightened its belt; we have restrained our own costs and we will continue to do so.

Total expenditures on programs other than those that are exempt or capped will decline over the next year to a level $800 million below that of the current year. Total federal program spending will grow by 3 per cent next year, well below the expected rate of inflation. Total entitlements for the major federal-provincial transfer programs are expected to grow at about the same rate as federal program spending next year. They will average about 2.3 per cent for Ontario, Alberta and B.C. and 4 per cent for the Atlantic provinces. The lower-income provinces will continue to receive proportionately more federal support than the higher-income provinces.

The deficit is a national problem. It demands a national solution. If we are to restore health to the nation's finances, provincial governments must do their part, just as they too will reap the rewards of lower inflation, lower interest rates and sustained economic growth.

SUSTAINING FISCAL PROGRESS

These measures, with the expenditure restraint of previous years, have made it possible to restore the deficit to a downward path without increasing taxes in this budget. With the Expenditure Control Plan in this budget, we are taking the actions now to ensure that the government's fiscal position in the 1990s can support the priority programs Canadians value.

I have stated on many occasions that it would be irresponsible of our generation if we took the easy option of simply passing our deficit burden to our children. It would also be irresponsible to leave them a legacy of environmental neglect.

In Canada and abroad, we are witnessing a major change in peoples' attitudes and actions towards the environment. My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, is currently engaged in an extensive dialogue with Canadians on the steps we must take to address the difficult problems related to the pollution of our land, air and water and to deal with the protection of our ecological resources. Later this year, he will table before Parliament, "An Environmental Agenda for Canada: Implementing Sustainable Development."

[Translation]

Canadians want action to protect our environment. The Agenda will be comprehensive and substantial and will demonstrate the government's commitment to action. It will be introduced in a fiscally responsible manner.

IMPACT OF BUDGET MEASURES

The decisive actions in this budget bring us back to the fiscal track set out in the 1989 budget. We will cut the deficit to $28.5 billion in 1990–91. This deficit includes the impact of the one-time transitional cost of sales tax reform, including prepayment of the Goods and Services Tax Credit, the transitional grant to small business and the rebate of federal sales tax on inventories.

[English]

The measures in this budget ensure that the deficit will be more than cut in half to $14 billion by 1993–94. By the following year:

The deficit will be further reduced to $10 billion.

The government will begin to pay down its bonds and Treasury bills.

Program spending will fall to 14.2 per cent of national income, the lowest level since the late 1960s.

The surplus of revenues over program expenditures—our operating surplus—will reach $31 billion.

• (1715)

The burden of debt will be reduced as the public debt shrinks relative to our national income.

As a direct result, the portion of every revenue dollar that today goes for debt interest will be reduced from 35 cents and rising, to 26 cents and falling.

In short, we will regain the flexibility needed to make real choices about the kind of country we will pass on to our children. And we will be able to make those choices in a climate of lower inflation, lower interest rates, durable economic growth and more jobs and opportunities in every part of Canada.

I am tabling the budget document including Notices of Ways and Means Motions. Details of the measures are included in the document.

Tomorrow I will introduce a bill seeking borrowing authority for the 1990–91 fiscal year.

I am asking that an order of the day be designated for consideration of those motions.

CONCLUSION

A nation's true sovereignty is determined by the ability of its people to shape their own future.

In today's world, our sovereignty is not threatened by military force or aggression. Our freedom and opportunity to realize our dreams for ourselves and our children rest on our response to the challenge of a more competitive world in the throes of economic change.

[Translation]

There can be no turning inward from this world. Canada is a major trading nation. We depend on international trade for one-third of our national income, millions of jobs and a substantial part of our ability to pay for important public services.

These benefits do not flow to Canada by right; we have to work hard for them. And when the economic world changes, we have to keep pace. To master our future in a changing world, we must expand our capacity to produce and sell Canadian goods and services at home and in markets around the world.

[English]

Canada has the natural resources, the capital and the people with the ingenuity to prosper in a competitive world. The very fact of Canada's existence is a tribute to its adaptability. Our ancestors built this country against formidable odds. Canadians have stuck together through testing periods by reaffirming, time and again, their ability to build on the rich diversity of the nation with realism, determination, foresight and understanding. That was the spirit of Confederation; and it must be the spirit in which we face every challenge to the building of a better future for Canada and Canadians.

Our ability to keep our economic future in our own hands is being challenged by the closely linked problems of inflation and growing debt. The economic plan that I have described, and the firm actions we have taken as part of that plan, have brought us to a clear prospect of relief. But let it not be said that we lost the battle by abandoning it before it was won.

Indeed, if we maintain our resolve, the prospect of lower inflation is within sight and we will have the deficit under firm control. By persevering, we will attain greater control over our destiny, and greater ability to devote our resources to investments in a rising standard of living and a better quality of life for all Canadians: in research and development, education and skills training, and environmental, social and cultural programs.

We must not fail in our resolve. We must continue to face our problems squarely. We must grasp the opportunities that are at hand to build the Canada that we want for ourselves and for future generations.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech made by my colleague, the Minister of Finance. I will not take much of the House's time today, but I feel obliged to respond very briefly.

The hon. Minister of Finance stated in his speech today that there are powerful reasons for holding to the plan that the government started in 1984. I believe that if ever there was a time for us to be conscious of the need to try to thwart the devastation that has been levelled on this country since 1984 it is after this speech.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, one of the most dangerous things in society is the big lie. We are going to read the numbers as time goes on. Always, always in a democracy you have to be careful of the big lie. Today, and I want to quote from the document—

Mr. Masse: Sit down!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I see the hon. member responsible for Academy Awards is speaking out today, one who spent a lot of money that is being wasted and trying to be recouped by this budget.

The big lie is that there will be no new taxes in this budget. That is the lie that must be debunked—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): What a cheap trick—a cheap trick from a cheap man.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is getting very close to making it personal. I would ask him to keep in mind the rules. There is lots of room for disagreement without using words that are pejorative.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the fact that Canadians have been told that there will be no new taxes is absolutely false because this budget will result in new taxes in British Columbia, in Alberta, in Saskatchewan, in Manitoba, in Ontario, in Quebec, in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia, in P.E.I and in Newfoundland.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): What this budget does to Canada is to say that debt is not debt unless it is owed by the Government of Canada. Debt is debt is debt is debt, whether it is provincial debt, municipal debt or federal debt. We will have a great deal to say about shifting the burden of debt in this country from one level of government to the other.

The challenge for Canadians will be to see that in fact this government's mismanagement of its own affairs has resulted in it having to shift the burden to Canadians across this country at the provincial and the municipal levels. That is the truth of the matter.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's budget really reaffirms to all members of the House our government's unabridged commitment to building a strong economic future for Canada.

As part of this vision, Canada requires a dynamic and flexible economy, one responsive to the many new challenges and opportunities fostered by an intensely competitive and restructured global market-place.

Central to this economic foundation is a highly skilled and flexible labour force. We as a nation depend on our international trade. To do that, we must invest in our human resources and meet the demands of economic and technological change.

In a leadership role the new Labour Force Development Strategy clearly demonstrates our government's commitment to do just that. It reinforces private sector training and provides significant additional funds to our unemployed, social assistance recipients and displaced older workers.

I believe that this labour strategy, coupled with the unemployment insurance reforms, as well as the economic safety net we have developed, strongly demonstrates a commitment by the government to all Canadians to develop a better framework for both them and our economy to adjust to change and to new prosperity for Canada.

THE BUDGET

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, among the many victims of yesterday's budget was a once proud, but now embattled entity called Canada.

Over the years we have seen the independence and sovereignty of our country whittled away by the continentalist philosophy of the present government.

Yesterday, this Americanization of Canada took giant strides forward with the proposed sale of both Petro-Canada and Telesat. The sale of these Crown corporations eliminates the presence of a public interest in the direction and future of this country. It eliminates the opportunity to maintain Canadian ownership and control over vital resources. It eliminates the opportunity for Canadians to plan for their future alternate energy and national communications policies.

Let us remember the spirit of 1979 when the Canadian people rose up and fought the plans by a Conservative government to get rid of Petro-Canada. Let us have the spirit of 1979 re-enacted today so that Canadians will once again fight for the right to stay free and independent.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): The budget decision to axe construction of the Polar 8 ice-breaker is a betrayal of British Columbians and the future of the north. Three years ago the government signed an agreement committing itself to a B.C. contract while frigate contracts went to Quebec.

Axing the Polar 8 means a loss of over 1,000 direct jobs in Vancouver and Victoria, as well as many spin-off jobs. It means the end of our shipbuilding industry in B.C.

A Polar 8 class ice-breaker would have been much more than a proclamation of our sovereignty in the Arctic. It is essential for northern development, Arctic search and rescue, scientific research and to keep northern seas open year round.

This government has betrayed British Columbians and northerners by reneging on a signed deal that was reaffirmed repeatedly by senior ministers.

B.C. Tory MPs have failed to represent British Columbians. I call on the junior Associate Minister of National Defence, who repeatedly confirmed Polar 8 would go ahead, to resign.

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am one of the members who worked to set up the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program in 1987-88. On December 11, 1989, I said in this House: "The CEIP expires on December 31, 1990, and today I am worried about the survival of this program."

Yesterday, we learned in the Budget that this program was cancelled as of midnight February 19, 1990. We lose the contribution equal to 30 per cent of the cost of mining, oil and gas exploration financed by flow-through shares.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it clear that we are maintaining the resource deduction. Flow-through shares will continue to help mining companies that are starting up to attract investors. The tax system for expenditures makes it possible to recover all pre-production costs before a new mine starts to pay tax, and I am really disappointed about losing this program.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, a most distasteful measure in the Wilson budget yesterday was the so-called management initiative to take away $35 million from Canadian veterans.

Five thousand of them under chronic care will have to pay $3,000 each, and a total of $17.3 million for their care as part of what the government euphemistically calls updating the lodging program.

In another initiative, 60,000 living at home will lose help provided for heavy housecleaning because of an $18 million cut for this key program to aging veterans to which the government refers as streamlining.

• (1410)

This government action flies in the face of a Remembrance Day statement by the Minister of Veterans Affairs which he opened by emphasizing "just how much is owed to those who did their duty for their country in war". Is this another sacred trust gone astray?

This is not what I call a management initiative. It is a shameful and disgraceful way to shift the burden of deficit reduction on the backs of those who can least afford it, and in this case, most specifically on the backs of those who have already more than paid their dues.

Veterans deserve better. They will fight back once again.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the soothsayers of gloom and doom are already criticizing the federal budget, but then that was predictable.

Let's face it, if this government brought rain to end a drought, the Liberals and the NDP would complain about it.

The fact is that the Minister of Finance has done his job and done it well. Seventy per cent of the spending cuts are consumed within federal spending. Provinces whose spending growth has far exceeded that of the Government of Canada are being asked to pay their share. After all, if you are part of the problem, shouldn't you be part of the solution?

Atlantic Canadians should be pleased to see that this budget recognizes regional differences in Canada and, accordingly, has shielded Atlantic Canadians from the toughest aspects of a needed tough budget. A province like Nova Scotia need only restrain its spending in line with federal restraint and there will be no need for increased taxes at the provincial level or program cuts to go with no federal taxes.

Congratulations, Mike, on a job well done.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, health care and post-secondary education are the highest priorities of Canadians. Eighty-eight per cent of Canadians told this government not to cut funding to these programs. Yet yesterday's budget cut $7.6 billion from health care and post-secondary education funding anyway. The finance minister is paying for his high interest rate fixation on the backs of the sick and the students of this country. He is slashing social programs as his big business friends have told him to do. If you are sick in Newfoundland, this government is saying you do not deserve the highest quality health care. If you are a student in Saskatchewan, this government is saying you do not deserve a high quality university or college education.

The dream of equal treatment for all Canadians regardless of where they live and regardless of their financial resources is dead.

The options available to the provinces, especially the less well off provinces, are very limited. They can increase their deficits, raise taxes, cut health and education programs or privatize services. None of these options are desirable. They are the deliberate consequences of the federal government's actions in this "pass the buck" budget.

This government is cutting off funding to what it says are its own priorities. It cannot have it both ways. It is high time it came clean with Canadians.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the Canso Community Survival Task Force left Ottawa yesterday empty-handed and bitterly disappointed after their fruitless meeting with three members of this government: the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the minister responsible for ACOA and the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The government which had promised a program of generous assistance to communities affected by the crisis in the Atlantic fisheries had not one dime of support for a community facing economic ruin. The task force suggestion that Canso receive its fair share of available fish quotas either through a community quota or a requirement that National Sea allocate some of its fish to Canso was greeted with cold stares and deaf ears by the Minister of Fisheries.

As a further kick in the shins, the budget which the Minister of Finance read later on that afternoon, had not one word to say about the crisis-stricken Atlantic fishery.

The people in Atlantic Canada can draw only one conclusion from this pitiful display of neglect. This government has written off Atlantic Canadians and it is time for Atlantic Canadians to write off this government.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to express my sincere thanks but also my deep sympathy to our parliamentary pages for a devastating loss to the members of Parliament in last night's annual hockey game.

It was a sweet victory. The hon. members from Kitchener, Victoria and Notre-Dame-de-Grâce led off in a pummelling of the pages, and it was smooth-sailing from then on. Although the pages persevered, they were no match for the hon. members who were simply too fast and furious.

Even though the pages had youth on their side, it was nothing compared to the experience and the athletic bodies of the smooth skating members. The House should know that the members' team was a tremendous credit to the world of sport, hockey in particular, as they displayed sportsmanship throughout, even allowing the page from La Passe, Ontario, to score a goal.

To conclude, I have been but one thing left to say. As sweet as the victory was, hon. members look forward to next year's challenge when we will do it all again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

WILLIAMS LAKE CANADA EMPLOYMENT CENTRE

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, it is far too often that loyal and dedicated public servants bear the brunt of much public and political criticism. This is why it is such an honour to announce here in the House that the Williams Lake Canada Employment Centre in my riding of Cariboo—Chilcotin has been awarded the outstanding team award by Employment and Immigration Canada.

The staff of the Williams Lake CEC was chosen as having the best record in providing quality service from among the 41 centres nation wide that were nominated for the award.

Williams Lake CEC has been honoured twice in the past for awards of excellence in claims processing.

I would like to say this to Irene Ainley and her staff in Williams Lake that we always knew you were good. Now the whole country knows.

MARINE ATLANTIC

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we learned that the subsidies to Marine Atlantic would be frozen for the next two years. This freeze will amount to a $9 million reduction to Marine Atlantic.

In addition, since 1985, this government has cut Marine Atlantic's budget by $52 million.

This Crown corporation operates on subsidies and fares, which means that if subsidies are reduced, Atlantic Canadians are faced with increased rates or decreased services. Adult ferry rates have already increased 44 per cent since 1985.

In a province like Prince Edward Island, higher transportation costs mean more expensive consumer goods and less competitive exports.

Islanders may not experience direct tax hikes from this budget, but the pain of budget cuts will dig deeply into everyone's pockets.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, in the wake of the excellent budget presented by our finance minister yesterday, the expected bluster and hypocritical statements of the provincial finance ministers are not surprising. I refer specifically to Ontario and British Columbia.

The B.C. finance minister has shouted loud and long that the federal government should control our spending and, of course, when we do it, he is the loudest crier.

Federal program spending was restrained to 3.6 per cent over the last five years. That is well below the rate of inflation and it beat Ontario's 9.5 per cent and B.C.'s 6.2 per cent.

The fact is that the federal payments will continue to increase for British Columbia at 2.5 per cent a year. The effect of the change is only .8 per cent to the B.C. budget.

It has been very easy for the provinces to balance their budgets when the feds pay the mortgage.

As our finance minister has stated: "The provinces are part of the problem: The provinces must be part of the solution".

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, some months ago the premier of British Columbia, Bill Vander Zalm, called for a 25 per cent cut in federal spending. Last night he almost got his wish.

That budget hurt families in British Columbia and elsewhere in Canada. The best example of that is in housing. The Canadian federal government last year funded the production of 16,000 social housing units at a cost of $100 million. Yesterday's budget contains a cut of 15 per cent—$51 million over the next two years.

This is disastrous for families in Canada in the big urban centres. They cannot get housing. It is a double whammy, because no one believes the 11 per cent rate of interest. My constituents are paying 13 per cent to renew their mortgages.

When the electors get to Bill Vander Zalm and Brian Mulroney, they are going to give them a choice of housing. They are going to send them back to Fantasyland.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have questions for the Minister of Finance.

Canadians are coming to see that yesterday's budget is a fraud and a farce. The minister says that he has his deficit under control. That is not true. He simply transferred it to the provinces.

The minister says that there are no new taxes. That is also not true. His cuts in payments to the provinces for health and education mean that there will be higher taxes in every province for every Canadian.

• (1420)

Canadians will see that the minister's budget will mean shutdowns of hospitals and hospital beds, higher tuition fees, and fewer university spaces.

I want to ask the minister what assessment he has done of the impact of his budget on the number of hospital beds, the effect on tuition fees, the effect on university spaces? Or is it that the minister simply does not care what damage his budget does to Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me make some comments in response to the Leader of the Opposition.

First, the transfers to provinces are unconditional transfers. They can go for post-secondary education and health care, or they can go to highways or pay wages and salaries of public servants.

Since 1977 there has been no relation to what the transfers have been made for to how the transfer moneys are spent. They just go into the general revenues of the province.

The second point I would make in relation to the hon. member's question is this. Let us put the whole matter into perspective.

What we are saying to the provinces is the reduction in the growth rate of the transfers—because the transfers will continue to grow next year by an average of 3 per cent—is equivalent to a little over half of 1 per cent of provincial spending in year one, and a little over 1 per cent in year two.

Against that perspective the adjustment that the provinces are going to have to make is not a major one. For them to be a part of the solution to a major national problem, we believe that they should share some of that burden.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is still a reduction of $7.3 billion in transfers to the provinces for projects like health and education, no matter how the minister slices it.

The minister has also admitted in effect that he does not know how many hospital beds will be closed and how many university places will be lost because of his budget.

The minister will be hearing from the premiers. The minister will be hearing from student leaders and health care professionals. I would like to ask him a question about a group that does not usually have access to the minister.

The minister says that there are no tax increases in this budget. What does he call forcing sick and elderly veterans to pay a new fee of $3,000 a year for the care they are receiving from the Department of Veterans Affairs? Is this not typical of the damage and the burden the minister is placing on Canadians who can least afford it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again let me put this into perspective. I do not think that there are many Canadians in this country who do not believe that we have a major fiscal problem that we must get under control, and that we are getting under control. But we need this further action to complete the job.

We have held our program spending to 3 per cent. The average increase in transfers to the provinces will be 3 per cent. The transfers to the provinces are $34 billion this year. That is in relation to our total program spending of over $100 billion. We have asked the provinces to accept one-third of our spending control program as part of their responsibility.

My friend makes some comments about the treatment of veterans. I think the veterans of this country have been treated extremely well over the years by this government and by previous governments. They will continue to be treated that way because they have given so much to the past of this country, to fighting for the freedoms, to doing the things that we respect very much in this country. We will continue to do that in a sensitive way and in a way that respects the interests of the veterans in Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister says that the veterans have given much to this country. He does not explain why he is asking them to give even more—$3,000 a year—for the care they are getting from his government.

Some hon. members: Shame!

[Translation]

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to quote from page 3 of the Budget papers:

> The economy is in a period of slower growth. That is not surprising. Nor should we try to avoid it.

The minister seems to enjoy the fact that he is forcing the economy into a recession. He has announced increases in interest rates and in the unemployment rate. My question is, why doesn't the minister admit he is forcing our economy into a recession that Canadians do not want?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is again demonstrating that he has his head in the sand.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We feel that it is important to be frank with Canadians, to be realistic about the economic outlook and to recognize that we must go through a period of slower growth, but a period of growth nonetheless. There will be a continued growth in employment during this period ahead.

We believe that it is important, though, for us to have this period of slower growth in order to get on top of the inflation problem that we have been suffering from for the last couple of years. My hon. friend probably disagrees with that because that is exactly what the government which he supported in the late 1970s did. It ignored the problems of inflation and the deficit.

What happened? We had unemployment of 13 per cent. We had interest rates of 20 per cent plus. We had inflation of 13 per cent plus. It was a disaster for the country.

Surely my friend can understand from the lessons of the past and remember the lessons of the past. These are the things that we are trying to avoid, and we are going to avoid them with the policies that we are following.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I want to assure him that Canadians are not going to forget the lessons of the past.

In the last election campaign the Liberal party said that if re-elected the Conservative government would cut health care, cut education funding, cut regional development and increase taxes.

The Minister of Finance was pushed before the cameras during the election to call the Liberal leader of the day and this party liars for scaring Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the truth is in this budget document. The Minister of Finance is closing hospital beds, is increasing tuition fees, is terminating regional development programs—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: —is forcing tax increases on the provinces.

Why does the Minister of Finance not admit that this budget, this betrayal of Canadians, is not a blueprint for prosperity? It is a battle plan for war with the provinces and the victims are going to be the sick, the elderly, the unemployed, shamefully our veterans, our native people, our nation's youth and Canadian taxpayers.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the elections of 1984 and 1988, Canadians did not forget the lessons of past, and that is why they elected this party as the government of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): They elected this party as their government because they could trust this government to face up to the problems and not try to shuffle them aside the way my hon. friend says we should do it.

We are being realistic with Canadians. We are not hiding from the fact that we have problems, but we are facing up to those problems in a realistic, open and honest way.

I have said many times in the past that members of the Liberal Party of Canada have no ideas on how to deal with these problems. They have no alternatives to the policies that we are putting forward. They are totally bankrupt of ideas.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, this Minister of Finance is bankrupt of integrity. He stole the last election.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, for 123 years this nation has strived to build on the principle of equality of opportunity for all Canadians. We have always believed that no matter where we live in Canada, no matter what our circumstance, we are entitled at least to equality of service in fundamental areas like education and health care.

With the stroke of a pen the Minister of Finance shattered that dream and vision yesterday.

My question is the following. Why is the Minister of Finance today telling Canadians that quality education and quality health care in future will only be available to those wealthy and privileged few Canadians who can afford it?

• (1430)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member forgot one thing in his comments about equality of opportunity. He forgot to say that the Liberal Party of Canada believes equality of opportunity to mean bearing an increasing burden of debt year after year after year. This budget is going to stop that.

This party also believes in the highest quality of health care and the highest quality of education that we can have in this country, but we also understand that if we have 35 per cent of every revenue dollar going to pay our interest costs, and that amount is rising, then we will not have the money. We will not have the money to spend on health care, on post-secondary education, on the environment, on native affairs, or on any of these policies. What we understand is that if we can get that 35 per cent figure down to 26 per cent, which is in our plan for the next five years, it will mean that we will have billions of dollars more money either to cut taxes, look after maintaining and improving these programs, or look after new initiatives such as the environment.

[Translation]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday, the Minister of Finance stated there were no tax increases in his Budget. What an odd thing to say, Mr. Speaker, when Canadian men and women still remember the de-indexation of family allowances; the threshold for the child tax credit; higher unemployment insurance premiums and, of course, the sales tax announced several months ago.

Mr. Speaker, this is only the beginning. Will the Minister of Finance rise in the House today and say that his Budget will not force the provinces and the territories to raise taxes because otherwise, health services and postsecondary education will suffer?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when there are no new taxes in the budget, does the hon. member suggest that I say that there are new taxes in the budget? There are not new taxes in this budget.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): She has held out all sorts of doom and gloom scenarios in the preamble to her question. What I say to her is: look at what we have done in the context of the transfers that we are making to the provinces. The transfers will continue to grow next year by 3 per cent. Federal program spending will grow by 3 per cent. We are not asking the provinces to do anything more than we are willing to do ourselves as a federal government.

Let us also recognize that the impact of the changes, the reduction in the growth rate of the transfers to the provinces, amounts to a little over half of one per cent of the provinces' program spending in year one and a little over one per cent in year two. In the context of the adjustments that have to be made today, that is certainly an amount that the provinces can easily adjust to without the doom and gloom scenarios as my hon. friend is saying.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Obviously the Minister of Finance has not been talking to his counterparts in the provinces and the territories. Clearly it is going to be a tremendous burden, especially in those areas of Canada where it is more difficult to raise additional revenues and services are going to have to be cut, and the minister knows that.

It is not a small amount. If we look at the cuts to health and to post-secondary education, the accumulated cuts come up to some $11 billion. Now the provinces and territories have to shoulder those burdens.

My question to the minister is this: Would he be brave enough now to go today and explain to students who will be denied post-secondary education, explain to seniors who will not get a hospital bed and explain to children standing in line at a food bank what these cuts are going to mean and what this budget is going to do for them?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether my friend can see from that far away, but I have a headline here which her House leader would probably recognize. It states: "Cut transfer payments to reduce federal debt Vander Zalm urges".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the point that Mr. Vander Zalm makes and the point that has been made by other provincial treasurers is that they have a stronger fiscal position than the Government of Canada.

Mr. Crawford: Better management.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My friend across the way, old fog-horn, says: "better management". Better management grew a debt that was $18 billion in 1968 to $200 billion at the end of 1984-85. The interest payments on that $200 billion worth of debt accounts for 80 per cent of the deficit this government has incurred in the last five years. That is the management that got us in the mess today.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, we have seen a lot of accusations about this budget, but to see that Fantasyland is moving east will come as a surprise to a lot of Canadians.

On a more serious note, on February 21, 1945 there was the battle of the Siegfried Line during the closing days of the Second World War. It was when the Canadian Army cracked the Siegfried Line, the last major line of Nazi resistance. Unfortunately a lot of our forces perished at that time but many survived.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. As we heard, the minister has increased fees to veterans living in long-term care institutions, people who have served their country. He is asking veterans to pay more for their meals, more for their lodging and, on top of that, he is taking another $18 million away from those veterans who want to live independently.

This minister calls this a management initiative. I would like to ask the minister if he would not take a different management initiative, cancel his $14 million GST propaganda campaign and give it to the veterans.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that we explain what has been done in the changes here. Obviously two or three issues have been misinterpreted.

First of all, none of the disability pensioners who are in hospitals or any type of institution will lose or have to pay any additional dollars because of this change.

• (1440)

It is important to recognize that there are 1,300 veterans in Canada who are not paying anything while all the rest of the veterans in Canada are paying. Obviously we are going to correct that inequity. The veterans agree with that, that they cannot be seen not to pay the $240 while all the rest of the veterans are paying. Veterans understand that. They do understand fair play.

The changes we brought in will bring this in line over a period of two years to what is being charged in the lowest rate of all the seniors in Canada, that is $420 a month.

Just let me explain what they charge in Saskatchewan. It is not $420 a month but $616. In the province of New Brunswick they charge $4,770.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure these facts are important. Perhaps they should be delivered to the House in another way.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Hospitals and emergency wards are overflowing, patients have to sleep in corridors, and waiting lists are becoming alarmingly long in Quebec. The Minister of Finance, and this includes last night's Budget, has cut $5.7 billion from payments to Quebec for health services and $2.3 billion for education. Before letting the provinces shoulder the responsibilities he has as Minister of Finance of Canada, has the minister considered the patients who have to sleep in hospital corridors, the students who will not be able to continue their studies and those who will keep going into debt in order to go to university?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, those figures are gross exaggerations, unless they came through incorrectly on the translation.

I would say to my hon. friend that I am sure he recalls over the past couple of years, from time to time, the provinces unanimously saying to this government that they wanted interest rates down. Getting the federal government deficit down will help us get interest rates down. If the provinces want to address this problem of high interest rates, they have to be a part of the solution, and part of that solution is getting the federal deficit down.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance does not resolve the problem. He is reducing the federal budget and increasing the provincial budget, so interest rates will continue to go higher.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, why should Quebecers have to pay an extra $2 billion in taxes, according to last night's Budget, in addition to the GST that will come into force on January 1, 1991? He said there were no new taxes. Did he forget the GST?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I still have a hard time with the arithmetic of my hon. friend.

The total savings from the change in transfer payments amount to some $600 or $700 million. How is it that the province of Quebec is going to be affected to the extent of $2 billion? It does not add up.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister will know that the situation in the health care field is of particular importance not only to the provinces but to caregivers in the system and of course to the patients who utilize the particular system.

In British Columbia where the health system is strained, 200 heart surgery patients are being diverted to Seattle, Washington.

Could the minister explain how cutting $800 million for health and education in British Columbia will enhance the health care system in British Columbia? Or, is the minister really saying but afraid to tell Canadians that these cut-backs are the beginning of the privatization of medicare in Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend still does not understand the message of the budget. The budget takes the steps which continue the programs we have been following over the last five years that will allow us to preserve medicare, that will allow us to preserve a strong education system, and that will help us to preserve strong regional development.

If we continue as my friends across the way would have us do to ignore the deficit problem, just shove it aside and say "let's forget about deficits", we are going to see not just 35 cents of every revenue dollar being used to pay for the interest on the debt, but that is going to go up to 40 cents and then 50 cents. Where is that going to leave medicare? Where is that going to leave post-secondary education? That is a danger of debt. That is a danger that we are trying to avoid with this budget.

I am sure I am not going to live long enough to hear one suggestion from the Liberal members opposite as to how we can cut government spending.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has not denied that this is a real attempt to privatize medicare in Canada. It is very clear.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare stated on April 7, 1989, and I quote:

We are proud of the fact that we have one of the finest health care systems anywhere in the world. We see the excellence of this system as one of the features which distinguished us from our neighbours to the south.

At a time when our health care system is financially strained, I ask the Minister of Finance why he has gutted health and education budgets in Newfoundland of $162 million; Nova Scotia, $250 million; Prince Edward Island, $37 million; and New Brunswick, $206 million. Why has the Minister of Finance done this? He is exacerbating the regional disparities in this country.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a twisting of facts and a distortion of figures. What I am hearing today takes me right back to the election campaign and the scare tactics the hon. members opposite used.

My friend talks about regional disparities. Surely he understands what we have done in this budget. We have cut back on the growth rate of the transfers to provinces, but for the larger provinces like Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta, the transfers will grow at 2.25 per cent. The transfers to the Atlantic provinces, one of which he represents, will grow at a rate of 4 per cent. That compares to the growth of program spending of the Government of Canada of only 3 per cent.

Surely he can understand that we have not done things that will aggravate any regional disparities as a result of this budget.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, not the Minister of Veterans Affairs, because the Minister of Finance is responsible for the budget. I want to know if we heard the government correctly.

We know in the budget there is no cut-back on the size of cabinet. There is no cut-back in the government advertising for the GST and other programs. Yet, the government is asking veterans who are sick and lying in hospital beds to pay an increased fee for room and board. These are people who fought for this country and were prepared to die for this country.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance where are his priorities, where is his sense of fair play when he asks people who fought for this country and were prepared to put their lives on the line to pay an increased charge for room and board. Yet, the government is not downsizing the size of the cabinet or cutting back on government advertising. Where are his priorities?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member cares to look back over the last five years, he will see very clearly that on a number of occasions we have enhanced the programs in support of our veterans, because we believe in giving our veterans the best possible support they can receive.

We know we have a major debt to our veterans who fought for us during the last war, fought for our freedoms, and we are continue to meet that debt.

My colleague has just said that there is some rebalancing within the support we are providing to our veterans so that that support can be provided to our veterans in the most equitable way possible.

• (1450)

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I think the whole credibility of the government is in question here.

I would like the minister to confirm the fact that the calculations in the budget he tabled yesterday in the House of Commons were made before the end of January, before the bank rate in this country had jumped by over 1 percentage point.

Since those calculations were made before the end of January, could he now confirm that if he were to update his calculations in a fair and honest way the deficit would be over $30 billion, that the unemployment figures would be higher, and that the inflation rate would be higher?

Will the Minister of Finance confirm that those calculations were made before the end of January? Will he update the budget forecast to include the new Canadian reality of even higher interest rates in this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this budget is designed to reduce interest rates and what do we have: the hon. member fighting against a reduction in interest rates.

We believe that the projections provided in this budget are sensible, realistic projections. As I indicated in The Budget Papers, there was a survey done of private sector forecasters which came up with an interest rate average of 11.0 per cent. Our projection is 11.1 per cent, a shade above the private sector forecast.

The hon. member talks about January. A survey was done just last week which confirmed that private sector forecast. I should remind my hon. friend that back in 1986 when we had similar circumstances, we had the same sort of bleating from the opposition benches saying that the projections were way out of whack. The projection we put in for the interest rate at that time was 9.5 per cent or 9.6 per cent. What did it come it at? It was 9.2 per cent, .4 per cent or .5 per cent below, in face of the bleating from hon. members that our projections were way out of whack.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Events in East and West Germany have been developing at an extraordinary pace in the past few months. Last week the Foreign Minister of West Germany, Hans Dietrich Genscher, was in Ottawa for the Open Skies Conference and met with both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Many other meetings occurred concerning the future of Germany at that time.

Could the Prime Minister inform the House if there have been further developments since those meetings in Ottawa last week?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for the question. There were important discussions last week between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Foreign Minister Genscher from the Federal Republic of Germany.

I take the opportunity on behalf of all members to issue genuine congratulations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for his excellent chairmanship of the Open Skies Conference last week.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Further to the conversations and meetings between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Minister Genscher, I had a telephone call this morning from Chancellor Kohl. He reviewed with me the intentions of his government in respect of unification, his views on the monetary initiatives that he feels must be taken in the relatively near future to strengthen unification, plus the role that countries such as Canada will be called upon to play as the talks in respect of unification follow their important course.

I thank my hon. friend for the question. I will be happy to report back to the House further developments on this important initiative.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In June 1989 the Prime Minister stated, and I quote: "In our second mandate we will concentrate on long-term investment in people, skills, skills training, education, strategic technologies, research and development."

Will the Prime Minister agree with Pamela Smith, President of the Canadian Association of University Teachers, when she says: "This budget makes a mockery of the federal commitment to young women and men and to the future of this country"?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course not, because the truth is quite the opposite.

My hon. friend will know that in respect of the EPF transfers to the provinces, the restraint measures do not apply to the main federal programs providing direct support for Canada's educational objectives. Granting councils funding will increase from $673 million to $734 million, over 9 per cent. The Centres of Excellence will increase. Canada Scholarships will increase. Official languages in education, literacy, and education programs for native people will increase.

There will be increases in the system because this government is indeed committed not only to improving education and research and development but to doing so while containing interest rates and providing for sustained economic growth.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised that the Prime Minister did not refer to the $31 billion in fewer funds that will be transferred to the provinces between 1986 and 1995.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. Before cutting funding, did these gentlemen consider how many courses will be cancelled, how many classes will be cut, and how many staff members will be laid off? How much will registration fees, and thus student debt, increase? How many students will be unable to continue their education?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is again another one of the scare tactics hon. members opposite are dreaming up.

On the question that my hon. friend mentioned, the transfers to the provinces under Established Programs Financing are unconditional. They do not have to go to any particular use. It is the option of the provinces to use them as they may.

As the Prime Minister has indicated, our direct funding will continue and it will not be affected. However the hon. member must understand that the transfers to the provinces have been going up and will continue to go up each year. They are going to be going up on average by 3 per cent.

Ms. Clancy: There will $80 million less in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my friend from Halifax says that there will be $80 million less. If she would check the numbers she would find that the transfers to the province of Nova Scotia next year will go up in excess of 4 per cent.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Aboriginal people across Canada are shocked and appalled with the decision of the federal government to cut Indian and Inuit programs by $100 million and the Secretary of State by $44 million. This is truly a shame when throne speeches and glossy government publications brag about the federal government's commitment to self-determination of native people.

Why did the Minister of Finance impose such an unfair burden on Canada's native people? Why is the Minister of Finance punishing the native people of Canada for his own incompetent economic management?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is exaggerating what we have done in the budget. A number of native programs will not be affected by the budget. There are some that will be limited to a 5 per cent growth rate.

Ms. Clancy: Answer the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend from Halifax cannot contain her mouth. I am answering the question.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. member for Western Arctic.

• (1500)

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same Minister of Finance. On February 9, the government claimed it supported International Literacy Year. It was full of rhetoric about taking a leadership role and addressing the challenge of literacy. But yesterday it cut all the northern broadcast access programs by 16 per cent and completely eliminated the native communications programs and all the native newspapers. Why has the Minister of Finance abandoned his government's commitment for native Canadians? Why is the minister being so deceitful and unfair to native Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me be quite precise for my hon. friend. Funding of $24 million per year will be maintained. It will not be affected by the budget. Education programs for native peoples will not be affected. There will still be $736 million per year.

Ms. Blondin: I asked about this program.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It is easier to listen when you are not talking. There will be $736 million per year spent on education programs for native peoples. We are maintaining our commitment there because we understand the needs of the native peoples for education.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance knows that Petro-Canada was established in 1975 to serve a definitive public policy objective, building energy security for Canadians. That is no less important today than it was in 1975.

My question is directed to the Minister of Finance who yesterday announced an ad hoc privatization of this successful and necessary corporation. Can the finance minister tell us who is running the government's agenda? Why is he so determined to take this regressive step that will allow foreign-dominated huge multinationals to once again dictate the future of Canada's energy resources?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend's imagination is running a little wild here. Petro-Canada is a successful company but it no longer serves a public policy purpose.

We believe that Petro-Canada can be a stronger, healthier, more vibrant, more productive company in the energy sector in Canada if it has access to private sector investment. With that private sector investment it can build and grow. It will still be Canadian controlled but Canadians will be able to have a direct investment in it. That will help Petro-Canada in developing further a market for its products. Surely my hon. friend would not want to hold Petro-Canada back because it doesn't have the money to grow. This way Petro-Canada will have the money to grow and be a thriving giant in the Canadian petroleum industry.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton East, a short question.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, under its expenditure control plan, the government says it is going to cut $2.1 billion in five years—not in constrained growth, not in frozen expenditures but in actual cuts and eliminations of programs and projects. Of this $2.1 billion, more than $850 million, 40 per cent—almost half—is going to be cut in Alberta.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Didn't any of the Alberta Tory MPs, including the Deputy Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, object to this incredible singling out of and attack on Alberta? Or were they just ignored?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let us look at the items in the expenditure control plan individually. We have treated Alberta the same way as Ontario and British Columbia.

There are three provinces in the country that are not receiving equalization. It was on that basis that we made the distinction. If we had not made that distinction I am sure that my hon. friend would be up on his feet saying that we have been hurting the weaker provinces of the country, so we made that distinction.

As far as OSLO is concerned we will continue with the engineering phase of that project but after that, because of our financial position and because of the economics of the project, we believe it is not wise for us to continue to support that project in providing substantial amounts of taxpayers' moneys to proceed with it.

We believe that the over-all program that we have followed, government-wide and Canada-wide is a fair and balanced program.

PRIVILEGE

RESPONSES TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I gave notice to the Chair earlier today that I intended to rise on a question of privilege immediately after Question Period in relation to a response given to the House, and to myself, regarding Order Paper Question No. 162, standing in my name.

I have also indicated to the Chair in writing—and I am prepared to do it again—that if you deem I have a prima facie case of privilege, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion and send the issue to a parliamentary committee.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that some time ago, on April 27, 1987, the Government of Canada, in replying to an Order Paper question, had at that time provided information to the House which was inaccurate. It was also in relation to a question that I had asked at the time and it referred to an individual by the name of Giovanni Mowinkle concerning his invoices with the Government of Canada.

The response at that time from the government was that Mr. Mowinkle had not been hired. On April 27, 1987, the government finally admitted that, in fact, it had made a mistake or, in any case, had provided wrong information to the House.

I accepted the minister's apology and the Chair said:

> I want to thank the hon. minister for being frank. As well, the House is indebted to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for accepting the explanation, and accepting it in good grace.
> I am sure the hon. minister will carry the message back to those who are charged with the responsibility to answer written questions, with the request that, as the hon. member for Windsor West has indicated, they read the questions carefully before providing an answer.

It was clear at that time that there was an admonishment and that the government and the officials who prepare the answers for the government were to do so in a manner which was more accurate than it had been in the past.

Again today, Canadians realize that information that had been given to this House only a few days ago in relation to expenditures on travel by the Prime Minister were inaccurate. Indeed, Order Paper Question No.162, when answered in this House, stated that the cost of the trip in question to southeast Asia was in the amount of $544,000 approximately.

Today, Mr. Ross Howard of The Globe and Mail reported, and I verified this with him, that the access to information register confirmed to him that the actual amount of the expenditure was $670,000, an amount which is over 30 per cent higher than what was provided to me in terms of the Order Paper question response.

We have already been through some debate in this House as to the obligation of the government under Standing Order 39(5) to reply promptly within the 45-day limit. That, of course, was not respected. It took over 90 days for the government to provide information which has now proven to be inaccurate, but I shall not dwell on the matter of the government taking too much time to answer the question.

Instead, I want to ask for the assistance of the House, because I do believe that the privileges of all members of Parliament are affected when the government fails to provide proper information to us. Erskine May has defined the following on page 69 of the Parliamentary Practice, Twenty-first Edition:

> Parliamentary privilege is the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House individually,—

The next portion is what I feel is really relevant here:

> —without which they could not discharge their functions,—

In order for us, as parliamentarians, to discharge our functions appropriately, surely it is incumbent upon the government and upon officials working for the government to provide not only the questioner, in this case myself through the Order Paper question, but the House with accurate information.

• (1510)

There is a further incident I want to bring to your attention which, I submit, clearly demonstrates not only the obligation that the government and officials of the government have in providing accurate information to the House, but the case has been raised in the past that failure to do so on the part of certain individuals constituted contempt of Parliament.

I draw to your attention Maingot's Parliamentary Privilege page 198, in which Maingot states:

> Similarly, should any person present documents to a committee of the House of Commons which have been forged, falsified, or fabricated with intent to deceive such committee or the House, or, to be privy to such forging or fraud, will constitute contempt of Parliament—

This was in reference to actions by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which the House determined had acted in a manner which constituted a prima facie case of contempt when the RCMP had failed to provide accurate information to the House in an incident involving the Hon. Member for Northumberland—Durham on December 4, 1973. At that time, it was clearly demonstrated that the actions of the officials of the RCMP were in contempt of this House.

In summary, I want to indicate that I am prepared to move the appropriate motion to refer this matter to committee. The House will be aware that members are desperately trying to find out quick, timely and accurate information pursuant to the rules. The information that was provided to me was not provided in the appropriate time according to the rules, and it has now been proven beyond a shadow of a doubt, according to the access to information laws of the country, to be inaccurate.

I want to reiterate that I am prepared to move the appropriate motion to refer this matter to committee so that we can hopefully improve upon the procedure of obtaining this information so that all members and, indeed, Canadians can be properly served by this process in the future.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, when I saw the article in the newspaper this morning I decided myself to look into why there would appear to be some discrepancies.

I want to say that it is very simple. If one looks at the questions asked by the hon. member, questions about which you know I have complained on several occasions regarding the detail, trivia and silly pieces of information that I felt the member was looking for, such as: "Did the Prime Minister visit Malaysia and Costa Rica in October, 1989 and, if so—" and so on into considerable detail down to how much gasoline was utilized, what the approximate number of kilometers were and how many pieces of luggage were carried along on the trip. There were some very specific questions and we answered them in a great deal of detail.

I want to add that when we compare that to the access to information request, there is a significant difference between the two.

Mr. Boudria: Yes. One is the truth.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Put that on the record.

Mr. Boudria: I am. One is the truth.

Mr. Cooper: Let me just quote from that request: "the itemized costs incurred by the department relating to the Prime Minister's trip to Los Angeles, Singapore, Kuala Lampur and Costa Rica..". Already, Mr. Speaker, you can see a difference in the type of information sought. This one is much more detailed than the question put by the hon. member. It also went on to say that in addition to itemized travel expenses abroad related to this trip, please itemize other costs where possible, such as costs of advance preparation.

Neither myself, the departments nor the huge number of people involved in answering the hon. member's questions have in any way misled him or the House. I want to make the case once more that we have been down this garden path with this particular member before. He continues to ask questions that take a great deal of time to answer and a great deal of people's work and taxpayers' money. In fact, I am now working on another question for the hon. member that is already made up of over 1,300 pages of material.

The hon. member has the audacity to stand up in the House and complain because the information he gets is a little different from another request. What he has is not a question of privilege. The matter is totally out of order and it is consistent with his behaviour on other questions.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have submitted to you that there is here a prima facie case of privilege. The member opposite has made all kinds of disparaging remarks. Of course, he has not in any way claimed that there is no question of privilege. I believe what I have submitted to you is accurate. I am comparing the information I received with the access to information registry.

The members across may make all kinds of accusations. That is their privilege. They may not like the questions I ask but, I am not asking the Speaker to rule as to whether or not my questions are likeable. That is an issue to be discussed at some other time. What we are discussing here today is whether or not members can be expected to obtain accurate and prompt information from the government, not information that I like or anyone else likes, but information in accordance with the rules and traditions of this House. That has not been provided in this case.

Finally, the member opposite says that the question was incomplete. I want to remind you, Sir, of my question. I asked: "What was the total cost of the trip?" Total cost includes everything, Mr. Speaker.

The member opposite cannot say that my question was not specific enough. I asked for the total of the cost. I suggest that is quite specific. I do not want to debate that point at any great length.

The Speaker should be interested as to whether or not there is a case of privilege here and whether the rules either need to be qualified or the government held to account for the fact that it cannot provide information pursuant to the rules that we already have.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we have some kind of a dispute here. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has indicated that in his view the answer was inaccurate. The parliamentary secretary has given an explanation as to why the answer pursuant to the Access to Information Act was different than the answer given to the hon. member.

The rules of this House are very clear. The information to be provided to the House must be accurate and must not mislead the House. There is a suggestion that that may have happened in this case.

Given the explanations tendered by both sides, and subject to Your Honour reviewing the remarks that both members have made, it seems to me that it would be an appropriate case to refer to the committee so the committee can investigate to see whether, in fact, the answers appear to be in accordance with the rules.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, once again, I want to renew my offer. We are quite happy to have this issue go before the parliamentary committee on privileges and elections as long as it includes the types of questions that we are going to be asked to answer and the kinds of time frames that we will be required to meet. We have discussed that before. Any time the members want to have that motion, we will be happy to take it.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the parliamentary secretary and the helpful comments of the Hon. Member for Kingston and The Islands.

What we have here is a proposition put to the Speaker on a set of facts which are literally as follows: the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell put a question on the Order Paper some long time ago. After a period of time which exceeded the time in which the rules ask that the government provide an answer, an answer was obtained and the sum total of money with respect to the voyage of the right hon. Prime Minister and others was given at a certain amount.

Later, apparently a journalist applied in whatever form the journalist chose to put his question, but he did so under the Access to Information Act. The answer came back showing a total cost exceeding that which was given to the hon. member earlier.

• (1520)

The hon. member has quoted some precedents. If one takes a look at the precedent which the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell indicated was apposite to this problem I believe the question of intent was mentioned, if my notes are correct. The Parliamentary Secretary rose, and after debating for a moment or two with the hon. member on another matter which I do not have to decide, has indicated that as far as he is concerned, that in both the answers, the government was proceeding and doing the best it could to make those answers.

The two answers have come out differently. As the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has been quick to point out, there is a difference. It is hard for me to find that the cause of that difference is such as to justify my moving the matter as a prima facie case of privilege. There is no indication that there was some intent to deceive the House. If that were the case then I might have a very different view of it.

The Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands has made a suggestion which might, indeed, be helpful. It is not for me to follow up and order that because I do not have the power to do so. But, if there has been a legitimate difficulty in obtaining the answer to two questions which as the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell says—even if he concedes the questions were not phrased in exactly the same way—strove to obtain the same answer that may be something the committee would want to look into. All hon. members are affected by the accuracy of information given by the House. But that, I think, is something which the committee itself has every power to consider.

I understand the complaint brought by the hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, but I have to also accept the hon. parliamentary secretary's explanation. If that is not satisfactory in terms of giving accuracy to the House then, of course, the committee is free to have a look at it and see whether accuracy can be improved.

While there is a complaint and a difference in answers, I do not find it is a question of privilege. I thank the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for putting his argument in a clear and succinct way and for giving me adequate information beforehand which enabled me to reply quickly to the House.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, it would not strike anyone as surprising that different questions would elicit different answers. The point I wanted to make is that at the end of his exchange, from his seat, the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said that one of the answers was the truth. That indicates a very clear allegation that one of them was a falsehood. I would ask him to stand in his place and withdraw that.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if one was the truth, obviously the other was inaccurate. Maybe that should be explained to the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps his colleagues can do so for him, slowly.

Mr. Speaker: Truth is often an elusive thing. Perhaps we can agree that there were two different answers and the truth lies somewhere in between.

PETRO-CANADA

PRIVATIZATION OF COMPANY

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, yesterday my colleague, the Minister of Finance, announced that the time had come to allow direct public ownership of Petro-Canada.

I am pleased today to give the details of the government's decision to offer the shares of Crown-owned Petro-Canada to the Canadian public. These are very important times for Petro-Canada.

[Translation]

The industry, including Petro-Canada, has worked together in exploration efforts that have resulted in the discovery of more than one billion barrels of estimated reserves. And today, with excess international oil supplies and more stabilized prices, the industry must look at ways of financing the development of Canada's massive reserves.

[English]

In order for Petro-Canada to be a full and participating member in the development of these reserves, it must improve its debt position to more manageable levels and it must have the financial flexibility to compete alongside its private sector counterparts.

Petro-Canada is clearly at the crossroads.

Today, Petro-Canada is an integrated oil corporation that this government directed in 1984 to operate and compete as a private company. What Petro-Canada needs today is the same ability that its very competitors do to finance its own growth.

In last April's Speech from the Throne, the government announced that it intended, and I quote: "To further privatize those Crown corporations which no longer serve a public policy role".

The future of this industry in Canada depends on the development of our vast reserves. To be a partner in these initiatives, Petro-Canada needs equity capital and financial freedom. In consideration of this, and in consultation with the management of the corporation, the government has decided to offer the shares of Petro-Canada to the public so that this Crown corporation can continue to grow and serve Canadians while remaining Canadian owned and Canadian controlled.

Legislation will be tabled later this year to permit the sale of Petro-Canada shares to the public. Once legislation is passed and appropriate financial and regulatory steps are taken, and with market conditions permitting, the board of directors of Petro-Canada will be asked initially to offer a treasury issue of about 15 per cent of the company to all Canadians. On completion of the initial offering, the government's holding will be reduced to about 85 per cent of the shares of Petro-Canada.

[Translation]

One only has to review Petro-Canada's original mandate to understand why this is the right time to give Petro-Canada a secure future as we approach the year 2000.

Many here will remember its original mandate: to engage in state-to-state trading, to give the government a window on the industry and to contribute to energy security in Canada.

Well, Mr. Speaker, in the past 14 years, Petro-Canada entered into only one state-to-state deal and it is very evident that these arrangements are no longer an important component in today's world oil market.

As for the window on the industry issue, the government understands and has available to it all the information it requires in order to provide safe and secure energy to Canadians today and into the future.

And finally, if one is concerned about Canada's energy security, they would naturally support a decision which would allow Petro-Canada to participate and develop the reserves that have been discovered in cooperation with other private sector partners.

[English]

Now is the time to give Petro-Canada the financial freedom to participate in securing Canada's energy needs into the next century and beyond. In fact, only blind devotion to state enterprise would be a reason for denying the company, and its employees, the chance it wants and has earned, to be Canada's independent, world-class integrated oil corporation and a source of national pride.

Full details of this initiative will be contained in the legislation and will be developed in consultation with the board of Petro-Canada. I would, however, like to inform the House today of some of the more important provisions under which this initiative will proceed.

• (1530)

First, legislation will allow for the sale of all Petro-Canada shares. They will be offered in a manner to ensure broad-based participation in the ownership of the company.

Second, the board of Petro-Canada will develop an employee share ownership program as part of the initial offering.

Third, no one individual will be permitted to hold more than 10 per cent of the publicly-held shares and there will be a 25 per cent restriction on the cumulative foreign ownership of publicly-held shares.

Fourth, the Minister of Privatization will retain the government's holdings and arrange a shareholder's agreement with the company indicating the government's intention to manage its shares as an investment.

The overriding principle will be that the company will operate based on sound business objectives in the same manner as any private sector company. Under this arrangement there will clearly be an arm's length relationship between the government and the corporation.

Fifth, through either the provisions of the legislation or the articles of incorporation, Petro-Canada's headquarters will remain in Calgary and the company will continue to adhere to the Employment Equity Act. Employees of the company can be assured that Petro-Canada's policies governing salaries, pensions, benefits, relationships with the unionized workforce and official languages will be continued.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since 1984 the government has adopted a more market-oriented approach to energy policy with the dismantling of the National Energy Program. Oil and gas markets have been deregulated, special taxes on the oil and gas industry have been lifted and the Petroleum Incentives Program has been phased out.

[English]

The government today is empowered with all the necessary legislation it requires to provide Canadians safe and secure energy into the future.

State ownership and state control no longer makes sense in this important sector.

Petro-Canada's time has come and it has earned the right to be an independent, Canadian owned, Canadian controlled national corporation without the state in the middle.

I can only say to the company and its dedicated employees who are capable and eager to meet this challenge: "You have earned and deserve this opportunity and Petro-Canada's future has never been better. Good luck. Bonne chance.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the minister for giving me a copy of his statement a little earlier today so I had an opportunity to have a look at it. I guess my first question to the minister, on behalf of all of us on this side, is why. Why take this marvellous instrument of national policy which has served us so well for the last 16 years, and dismantle it?

Probably I have just answered my own question. That is probably why the government is doing it. One of the blind obsessions of this particular administration is to do away with anything, good or bad, but particularly if it is good, that reminds it of a past when we had sovereignty, when we were masters in our own house.

The minister says: "Sell the shares to Canadians". Who in this House is against motherhood? Of course, sell the shares to Canadians, but there is something redundant about all that. Why sell it to people who already own it?

Mr. Epp: When were you ever at a shareholders' meeting?

Mr. Simmons: As your Minister of Finance says, you learn a lot more if you listen.

Mr. Epp: But not from you.

Mr. Simmons: You could try. How would you know?

Lest it sounds like my good friend the Minister of State for Privatization and I are singing from the same hymn book when we talk about selling shares to Canadians, let it be clear what I am saying.

At the moment all Canadians own Petro-Canada. Let us be clear what he is saying. He wants just a handful of Canadians to own it, as in the case of Air Canada, the Pierre Jeanniots, the Claude Taylors of this world. That is what he has in mind. That is who he has in mind when he is talking about Canadians. So he and I are not singing at all from the same book on this one.

There is no economic purpose here. If only one could see some rhyme or reason to this. If the government is going to rush out and pay off a massive debt with the proceeds of this sale, one could begin to understand, even if one did not agree. But there is no rhyme or reason other than that blind obsession to separate themselves from everything that a Liberal government had to do with, even the good things, and they were mostly good things, as you know, Sir.

What are we talking about here? Are we talking about market driven decisions or public interest decisions? I believe the time has come for us to assess the future of Crown corporations such as Petro-Canada in terms of whether it serves the public interest. On that issue there can be no doubt. The public of Canada spoke loud and clear back in 1979 on that and many times since in polls. But in 1979, they gave the boot to an administration led by the gentleman from Yellowhead because it was about to tamper with an instrument called PetroCan.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: Why, Mr. Speaker? The answer can be found in the Air Canada transaction. Who made the money off Air Canada? I will tell you who. The brokers on Bay Street made $32 million, that is who made the money. This scam today is a broker's dream. It is a boon to the business community, to the Bay Streets of this world.

We need this instrument of national policy in the oil area. After all, let us not forget that oil is still our most important energy commodity and will continue to be so for many years ahead.

We need it down the road for frontier development. What instrument will form that particular role if PetroCan is not there? With the dismantling and selling of PetroCan, the elimination of the incentives in yesterday's budget, what hope is there for the east coast development, for frontier development generally?

I suppose, in fairness, it should be said that one of the very few good ideas in this announcement is that the minister talks about employee participation. If it does come to privatization, I commend him for having that one good idea hidden away in the centre of what otherwise is a terribly bad idea.

We are losing our control in this area. We are losing our ability to effect energy supply down the road. We are losing our window on the industry. Now he has scorned that, but it does not become a bad thing just because he scorns, you see.

The Minister of Finance, during Question Period today, said: "The company no longer serves a public policy purpose". He is right, and for a very good reason, because this government would not let it serve a public policy purpose. If this government would only put its money where its mouth is when he talks about arm's length relationships, if it would only allow the instruments that we have put in place over the years to work effectively for the purpose for which they were designed, we would have less of this muddling.

If I had time, which I do not, I would talk about the government's lack of any clear policy in terms of privatization generally. It is all over the map in its mad rush to get rid of everything that the Liberal government put in place.

This is not the time for dismantling, not the time at all. This company still has a downstream role in terms of ensuring proper competition but, more to the point, it has an important upstream exploration and development role. It is a role that can only be performed by a company that is in the public domain. It has a function to serve, as I have said, as an agency of the Crown, continuing to encourage frontier petroleum exploration, development in the east coast offshore and in the north. Petro-Canada can still be a stimulus to activity in those areas.

In conclusion, there is a whole area pertaining to the question of foreign ownership. I heard what the minister said about the 25 per cent limitation and we went down that road with Air Canada until we looked at the fine print. We were told by the regulatory agencies of the government that there was nothing they could do. They had no monitoring process and they really had no way of determining or policing the question of 25 per cent maximum ownership.

No matter what the minister says about the headquarters remaining in Calgary and all those things, it is only a matter of time once it becomes privatized before a bunch of the boys down in Cleveland or Texas will have the final say rather than Canadians. It should be Canadians, and we plea to the government to desist now. Stop destroying a good instrument of national policy. Tell yourselves you were wrong on this and undo it. When the legislation comes in we will have more to say about this.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister whose statement we just heard. The fact that he brought his statement into the House I think shows his respect for this place.

Canadians, however, will lose their last major element of corporate control over their strategic energy resources if the government succeeds in selling Petro-Canada to the private sector.

Canada is a northern, sparsely populated country that endures a long cold winter. It is essential that Canadian governments play a key role in safeguarding our energy future. The public ownership of a Crown corporation making decisions about strategic natural resources is fundamental to the management of our economy. Privatizing Petro-Canada continues what the free trade agreement began last year, giving up the public's right to influence the development of our economic future.

Petro-Canada is a crucial player in the Canadian energy sector, especially regarding the energy potential in frontier areas. It has endured numerous attacks by the Conservative Party since its creation in 1975. Even if it can be maintained, which is doubtful, control of Petro-Canada by the Canadian private sector is not good enough. There is simply no substitute for Canadian public control with accountability through Parliament.

The government has learned little about our energy resources from the experience of the seventies and eighties. The move to encourage public control over our valuable energy resources with the formation of Petro-Canada was a response to the absolutely unacceptable levels of foreign—primarily U.S.—ownership and control over Canada's energy resources.

In the mid-seventies New Democrats fought hard to make Petro-Canada a Crown corporation. It was a move widely supported by Canadians then and, I believe, now. The reasons for making Petro-Canada a Crown corporation are as valid today as they were in 1975; that is, increased Canadian owned and controlled supplies of oil and gas, increased knowledge of the federal government in the crucial areas of oil and gas and increased Canadian participation in these domestic sectors.

On August 23, 1985, the Prime Minister stated: "It is the Conservative policy to maintain Petro-Canada." He was reacting at the time to the mood and feeling of the country, which has not changed.

It is unacceptable for this government to now proceed with the selling off of the public's oil and gas corporation. Since the Prime Minister's comments in 1985, Canadian ownership has already declined from 47.9 per cent in 1985 to 42.11 per cent last year. The target of Canadian control has been all but forgotten.

This is a free trade sell-off of the Canadian control of our gas and oil. The Canadian people do not want to give more control of Petro-Canada to the United States. Our cold climate and sparse population demand a publicly controlled presence in our energy sector.

Only Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation can ensure that jobs and sourcing go to Canadians, that security of supply is maintained for all Canadians, that profits are reinvested in Canada to benefit all Canadians and not just the shareholders, that Canadians be able to maintain equity participation in the sector now that the National Energy Board has been stripped of its regulatory powers, and that the Canadian government continues to have a window on the industry so Canadians never again have to rely exclusively on the private sector and multinationals for vital energy security.

I would like to pose a few questions which I know will be answered when the legislation is tabled and we have an opportunity to question the minister further.

What is the motivation of the government in selling off Petro-Canada? Obviously it has made its mark on the energy sector. It has made its mark on the industry and it is an influence on the sector and the Canadian population. It is a profitable, successful corporation that is doing its part within its mandate.

What is the impact on the budget announced yesterday in this House by the Minister of Finance? There was not a penny noted in the budget. No information was available in that budget on what effect this announcement would have on our budgetary situation in Canada. Obviously the inclusion in the budget was simply an opportunity to put some comments on record. When we have an opportunity to look at the impact I think we could see a further increase in the deficit. What preparations have been made in preparing for the sale of the Crown corporation?

We noted a few things in the media. Yesterday President Hopper said the move was a surprise, not unexpected but a surprise nonetheless. Departmental officials in the lock-up yesterday said that the inclusion in the budget was hastily put together, that it was a last-minute decision.

Last night in the lobby outside the Chamber after the budget was introduced I said to the minister of privatization: "I am looking forward to seeing the legislation". He smiled at me and said: "So am I".

I would like to make two suggestions on the minister's statement. He talked about the removal of the public policy role for the Crown corporation. We recognize that the energy sector in Canada has a great need for public policy direction and that Canadians will demand that in the future just as they did in 1975.

I want to talk briefly about the financial flexibility of the corporation and the sale of shares. This can be done from the public sector. We have to recognize that the Canadian taxpayers are already the shareholders of Petro-Canada and they demand the return on their investment. If Petro-Canada is to succeed further, Canadians collectively have to benefit from the success of the corporation. The return of benefits only to those who can afford to buy the shares is totally outside of the collective need of the country. We need the benefits of the profits of Petro-Canada to help finance the shortfalls in education, health care and all those other items that this government is attacking in this budget, including the loss of environmental matters.

They talk about no profits. A return on an investment to the shareholder is obviously a picture of profitability. If there is any return on the investment, it has to go directly to the benefit of the Canadian people who own the resource that we are using in the public sector.

New Democrats have no confidence in this government's intentions. We serve notice that we will fight this legislation to sell all or part of this important Canadian corporation.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1990–91

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Jake Epp for (the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–65, an Act to provide borrowing authority.

NATIONAL SYMBOL OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–289, an Act to provide for the recognition of the dress uniform of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as the symbol of the sovereignty of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Sparrow: Madam Speaker, I rise today today to introduce this Private Members' Bill and thank the hon. member for Simcoe Centre.

The RCMP represents part of the basic fabric, foundation and formation of Canada. This establishment, first known as the Northwest Mounted Police, was created in 1873, that is 117 years ago. It was created by Sir John A. Macdonald on strong recommendations from officials in the west and the northwest, and especially from Alexander Morse, the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories from 1872 to 1877.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mrs. Sparrow: The most important thing was, and is today, the instant and compelling impressiveness of the uniform. One of the truest reasons why the mounted police force has been so spectactularly successful is the uniform.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the Chair knows that the hon. member is permitted to give a short explanation of her bill, not a lengthy speech on the the history of the RCMP. I wish she would comply with the rules.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure the hon. member will describe what the bill is and not enter into debate at this time.

Mrs. Sparrow: Madam Speaker, I certainly do know the rules. As I said, the most important thing was and is the instant compelling recognition and the impressiveness of the RCMP uniform and what it represents to Canadians from coast to coast.

It is a national symbol and it is recognized universally. That is why the purpose of this bill is to make the dress uniform of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police a symbol of the sovereignty of Canada. I will be very pleased when this bill is drawn to explain further the full reasons for that.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: On division.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I must have missed motions. I am wondering if I can have the consent of the House to revert to motions so I can do the travel motion for some of the House's committees.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

AUTHORIZATION OF COMMITTEES TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the three parties and I am sure you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

That the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons be authorized to travel to Washington for the period from Monday, March 19 to Tuesday, March 20, 1990 inclusively, in order to meet with congressmen and staff from the relevant congressional committees concerning the Americans with Disabilities Act and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee; and

That the members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture be authorized to travel to Washington for the period of March 25 to

March 27, 1990, for the purpose of discussing trade issues; and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee; and

That the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, and necessary staff, be authorized to travel to Montreal, Quebec on March 5 and 6, 1990 in order to visit the facilities of Téléfilm Canada, National Film Board of Canada and Vidéotron Ltd.; and

That the Special Committee on the Review of the Parliament of Canada Act be empowered to adjourn from place to place and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, just to confirm that, there have been discussions as the deputy House leader has indicated, as late as yesterday, and our party is prepared to give the required unanimous consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the motion. Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move that motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I would like to apologize to the House. I skipped by first reading of Senate public bills. I realize that there were none.

Somehow in one of the Order Papers, motions was not printed. It was not the hon. member's mistake but a very honest mistake of the Chair.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS FOR THE PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Madam Speaker, in participating in this budget debate, a person always has to look for inspiration, particularly after the Minister of Finance yesterday began his remarks by telling us where he thought Canada was and where it should be going. I felt really at a loss and, search as I did for inspiration, it took some time for it to come to me. I think it will take some time for Canadians to grasp fully the implications of the budget. I noticed last evening and this morning that provincial premiers, finance ministers and treasurers are beginning to understand what is taking place.

In reviewing the Minister of Finance's approach to budgets, deficit financing and interest rate policy since this government has come to power, it came to my attention that this was his sixth budget. As things often do fall into place and as I searched for this inspiration, it came to me that perhaps there were some revelations that might be available to me that I had not discovered. I went to the Bible to see if there was anything there that might reassure me that this budget would demonstrate some vision of Canada that I had not fully understood upon its presentation. As I say, with this sixth budget, the need to understand and to seek some revelation is uncanny because in the book of Revelations, Chapter 6, verses 1 to 8, we discuss the apocalypse.

I suggest that with the death of universality, the famine that will occur as regional development is starved for funds, the kind of war that has been declared on the middle class and on small business in this country, it was nearly prophetic that in the sixth budget to be delivered by this minister those kinds of attacks, the kind of pestilence that the GST represents will be abroad in the land. I hope that Canadians will recognize that we understand the concerns that already are beginning to be expressed as a result of this budget.

Canadians want reassurance from the Minister of Finance that the Conservative government understands the economic problems facing Canada, that it cares about these problems and that it has reasonable solutions to the problems. What the Canadian people heard yesterday from the Minister of Finance was an admission that he has failed after five years of trying to manage the financial affairs of this country.

This is the wrong budget at the wrong time. The budget is a recipe for economic disaster. The budget adds to the unfairness that has been very evident in previous budgets brought down by this Minister of Finance. The budget fails to provide the strong leadership that Canadians demand as we face the financial crisis in large part created by this government.

[Translation]

Taxation policies, the government's monetary policy and the cuts we find in this Budget will plunge the Canadian economy into a recession. Madam Speaker, it is one thing to reduce the deficit in a period of economic growth, it is one thing to take such measures when job creation and investment are increasing, but it is something quite different to cut programs arbitrarily when interest rates are at their highest level in eight years, when unemployment is rising, when the regional economies are in difficulty and when our exports are declining. Because of this Budget, the fear of a recession becomes a certainty.

[English]

In five and a half years the Minister of Finance has more than doubled the public debt. When he became minister the debt was around $170 billion. Today, the public debt stands at more than $351 billion and climbing by $4 million an hour. In five and one-half years the Minister of Finance has created more debt than all the ministers of finance who came before him and all the governments that came before the Mulroney government.

Mrs. McDougall: Liberal finance ministers.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The $351 billion of public debt accumulated means that every Canadian taxpayer now has a mortgage of some $25,000, thanks to the activity of this government.

The minister's interest in the deficit tends to change as time goes by. Two years ago, in 1988, after the minister increased the deficit, he told us not to worry, that he had things under control, everything was on target and things would be fine after his re-election and the re-election of the Mulroney government. In 1989 in his budget speech the minister again painted a very rosy picture of the deficit even though he had just increased it for the second straight year. He told us not to worry about the fact that the deficit was increasing again. He had it under control. Last year, the Finance Minister told us interest rates would fall to 10 per cent by this stage of the game, and, of course, the deficit problem would lessen.

Here we are a year later listening to the same minister make the same promises he made about the deficit last year and the year before that. There is no question that the Minister of Finance may have acquired some very, very bad habits from previous governments.

Mrs. McDougall: Liberal governments.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I am not going to debate that with the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration. The fact of the matter is that two wrongs do not make a right. I think he should learn after six years to operate on his own rather than point a finger at the past.

The minister says that interest rates will decrease from the 13 per cent range they are in now to 11 per cent and the deficit will be under control next year. "Trust me", he says. I think it is clear from the reaction of the financial circles that analysts, investors and Canadians do not believe the minister will deliver on this prediction any more than he has in the past. Interest rates are not at 10 per cent, they are over 13 per cent, the Bank of Canada rate that is.

Not many people believe that he will be able to get the interest rates down to 11 per cent. They do not accept the minister's prediction that interest rates will fall 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent in the next six months. It just does not appear to be in the cards.

What does that mean for Canadians? Probably, that next year we will be hearing a Conservative minister of finance saying: "Oops! sorry, I goofed again, the deficit is not going down. We are still in trouble". But the Minister of Finance next year will be able to say: "It's not my fault, it is my predecessor's fault".

An hon. member: That is what he will say.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Yesterday in the budget speech the minister spoke glowingly of his record on deficit reduction. Let us look at that for a moment.

The deficit in 1987–88 stood at $28.1 billion. In 1988–89, it was $28.7 billion. This year it will be $30.5 billion. Now that is going down in Conservative ways of considering these things. The government has increased the deficit in the last two years, not reduced it. Those are the facts. This dismal record was achieved when the economy was still growing. Tax incomes were increased by the Conservative government in an unprecedented way. Now the minister says that next year the deficit will be $28.5 billion. That is still higher than it was two years ago. But he says: "Don't worry, we have it under control".

The minister's record does not reflect the promises he made to Canadians when he came to office more than five years ago. The minister often refers to the fiscal plan he set out in November 1984 and that he reflected in his first budget in 1985. The minister said in this this House in his budget speech in 1985— one of the problems of being around for a long time is that a lot of these things come back to haunt you—and I quote: "Our actions will directly reduce the annual deficit at the end of the decade by more than $20 billion to $17 billion".

An hon. member: Which decade?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Well, that is the problem. Which decade? Which deficit? And by how much? It is clear the minister has failed to solve the deficit problem after five years. Now the minister has another plan and he hopes this one works better than the last one because he is going to switch his deficit nightmare onto the backs of the provinces. Let us raise their deficits instead, and maybe just in passing, let us foist this very, very thorny problem onto the backs of those nasty premiers who will not collect the GST for him when he wants them to do it.

Canadians have to understand what was said yesterday about taxation in this budget. We have had new taxes and we have the GST coming down the pipe. The minister said."There will be no new taxes in this budget." Canadians were very quick to respond. They know that there will be taxes that are directly the result of what the minister presented to the House yesterday. Provinces and municipalities from coast to coast will have to deal with the reality of what the minister presented yesterday.

• (1610)

In Newfoundland the tax increase per taxpayer, if services are kept at the same level, will be $695 a year per taxpayer.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, in the province of Quebec, each taxpayer will have to pay $582 more because of the Budget tabled in the House yesterday.

[English]

In Alberta it will be $592 per taxpayer. Across the country an average of $576 will have to be paid by taxpayers to make up for the cuts announced yesterday by the Minister of Finance in transfers to the provinces. For the minister to tell us that he has followed "a sustained deficit reduction plan", that this plan is working and that all the country needs is more of the same is absolute insanity. Heaven help us if this continues.

The last thing we need from this government is more of the same policies which have brought us higher inflation, higher unemployment, higher taxes and higher deficits. The minister could have told Canadians the truth. He could have said: "I have failed. My policies were wrong. The government has lost control of the fiscal situation."

What he did say was: "You people who have done the job right the last few years in the provinces, now you take on the burden of trying to pay for what I was unable to pay for."

The people are being punished in the provinces because they kept their house in order or they got it into order. One only has to listen to the reaction of the provinces, including my province of New Brunswick where tough decisions were taken. Difficult decisions were made and the budget was balanced. Along comes the Minister of Finance and says: "No, we are going to hit you with these kinds of reductions and we will put you in the same kind of mess that we got ourselves into."

[Translation]

In his economic statement in November 1984, the Minister of Finance warned that if the government did not take action, if it merely pursued the policies implemented by the previous government, government spending would reach a new record high of $137 billion by 1990. The minister was terrified of this possibility. He said it would be irresponsible, and he suggested solutions to remedy the situation, Madam Speaker. Some solution!

In 1984 during his first year as Finance Minister, the government spent $109 billion. Yesterday's Budget sets total government spending in 1990–91 at $148 billion, an increase of $39 billion since 1984, and $11 billion more than the figure the minister found absolutely unacceptable when he came to power.

[English]

The minister says that when we talk about these things that we should subtract interest payments. We should not consider those when we compare his record on spending. I wonder why we should do that. I thought, and I think most Canadians understand, that governments have to pay interest on their debt the same as we do.

The reason the minister does not want to talk about interest charges on the debt and interest rates should be obvious. It is because he knows that high interest rates that he caused are at the root of the deficit and the budgetary problem.

Consensus is very important. The Prime Minister talks about it all the time. Mind you he has forged some wicked consensus in this country recently. He has 80 per cent of Canadians against the goods and services tax. He has the premiers of the 10 provinces against the goods and services tax. Now he has got all the premiers of the provinces and all the finance ministers and the treasurers of the province against his budget. He is succeeding, but I am not sure it is quite what he set out to do.

Believing in consensus, the Conservatives who are members of the Standing Committee on Finance, members of the New Democratic Party and ourselves agreed unanimously last spring in committee to recommend to the Minister of Finance and the government that interest rates be reduced. Everybody was in agreement. The premiers came to Ottawa and said the same thing but the finance minister and the Governor of the Bank of Canada said no. He refused to listen to his own colleagues as now he refuses to listen to Canadians. The minister's budget shows clearly that the government's problem is not only with the debt itself. It is the interest rates being charged on the debt. The minister's numbers clearly show that the Canadian government's debt is actually smaller than the U.S. government's debt in relation to the size of the economy. Yet, the Americans are surviving very nicely with substantially lower interest rates.

The difference and the reason for the pain is that Canadians are going to have to pay interest rates on our debt that are 4 per cent to 5 per cent higher than what the American government and American taxpayers are paying. Of course, these high interest rates leave the federal government with less money to spend on national priorities, if in fact they are national priorities for the government, such as health care, education, day care, the environment, and I could go on.

The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister say they support high interest rates because it is right for Canada. They say we need to get the deficit down so that interest rates will come down. Has the Bank of Canada Governor, Mr. Crow, ever said that he would move interest rates down if the deficit was reduced? What he has said over and over again is that interest rates will remain high until we reach what he calls price stability.

Mr. Crow has said many times that inflation is the single most important barometer for setting interest rates. Let us take a look at this situation, Madam Speaker.

As inflation remains above 5 per cent, why would Mr. Crow reduce interest rates even if the deficit was reduced, if we take him at his word that inflation is what is important. This government does not care how many people lose their jobs. They are talking in their budget documents that unemployment is going to go up but that is what has to happen in order to bring inflation under control. The government does not care about how many western farmers lose their land. The government does not care about small business. Did they listen to John Bulloch and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business as they pleaded for government understanding with respect to the GST?

Does the government care about how far our exports fall, what is happening to our export trade balance? The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance support the policy of the Bank of Canada Governor without reservation. That is the way it has to be. It appears that that is what they do, but every now and then on a Friday afternoon the Prime Minister forgets himself and says: "Oh well, interest rates will go down after the budget".

An hon. member: The tail is wagging the dog.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The question that has to be asked of this government is not whether Mr. Crow's policy of zero inflation makes sense at any time, but does it make sense in a period of slow growth. We would all like to have lower inflation, but achieving inflation reductions means higher interest rates, more bankruptcies, higher unemployment and lost exports. The zero inflation battle means an unacceptable level of hardship for Canadians.

We already have the highest interest rates in eight years. This is after five years of good management and good planning. They are the highest interest rates since the recession of the early 1980s and the highest inflation in six years. We have high interest rates and high inflation. It does not all fit.

Many people hear a great deal from the chairman of the finance committee. He says we should let the dollar fall to 78 cents. We have the Prime Minister saying that interest rates will fall. They should be falling any moment now, according to his statement a couple of weeks ago. In the middle of all of this, we have the Minister of Finance saying he is demonstrating good management.

We are always amazed by the creativity the Minister of Finance displays when it comes to finding new excuses for why he is keeping interest rates high and why he supports that policy. A couple of years ago when our interest rates were increasing, he said it was because the American rates were going up. A country like Canada that was intertwined and involved with the United States, through the free trade agreement and geographically, could not possibly have significantly different interest rates than those of the United States. He ridiculed anyone who suggested that maybe we should have a made-in-Canada interest rate policy. He said that an independent monetary policy was unthinkable.

Now things have changed, and the minister and the Governor of the Bank of Canada are pursuing an independent monetary policy with an enthusiasm that none of us could have dreamed possible. We do not hear the minister telling us now that we have to lower our interest rates because American rates are low. No, with Canadian interest rates now 5 per cent higher than those in the United States, the minister has adopted a policy that he said was totally wrong-headed. We are now running an independent monetary policy. Unfortunately for Canadians, it is a high interest rate policy.

The minister then went on to tell us that if we did not keep rates high, the dollar would fall. Well, last year, the dollar was up to 86 cents, so that really did not hold water too much.

He told us that inflation was out of control and he could not possibly lower interest rates then because inflation had to come down. Inflation came down from 5.4 per cent this past summer to 5.1 per cent by the end of the year.

• (1620)

He had to come up with something else so he told us that now interest rates have to stay high because it is necessary to keep foreign capital investment flowing into Canada.

This week the minister is back and he says that inflation is up again so we have to have a high interest rate. At the same, there has been a run on the Canadian dollar. They are spending like mad to try to prop it up.

Madam Speaker, is it any wonder that Canadians are confused? Is it any wonder that the money markets do not know how to respond? Is it any wonder that investors are concerned about what is happening with this government?

Statistics Canada tells us that inflation in the economy in January actually fell from 5.1 per cent to 4.5 per cent. The reason the over-all inflation rate was at 5.5 per cent was because of federal sales tax increases. We have heard about no new taxes. There was a federal sales tax increase inflicted on Canadians by the minister in last year's budget and it is pushing up consumer prices. The minister hits us with more taxes which cause inflation. Then he punishes everybody for his own actions by causing interest rates to increase to their highest point in eight years.

The recent hikes in interest rates bring up a couple of questions. First, the minister has told us that when his goods and services tax takes effect in 1991—that is a new tax, incidentally, that has not passed through Parliament yet.

An hon. member: Was that mentioned in the budget?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): No, there are no new taxes. Canadians might find themselves a little surprised on January 1, 1991 unless we are able to block the goods and services tax. It certainly is a proposed new tax.

In any event, the minister says: "Don't worry. Don't worry because interest rates won't rise when the GST comes in." He says that he and Mr. Crow understand the difference between normal inflation and inflation caused by sales tax increases. So, even though the GST will push inflation up by about 1.25 per cent according to the department's figures, he and Mr. Crow will have nothing to do with raising interest rates because the inflation caused by GST is a sales tax thing and is only going to happen once.

Mr. Crow's decision to move the interest rate to 13.32 per cent last Thursday because federal sales tax increases pushed inflation up by 1 per cent in January I think demonstrates quite clearly that Mr. Wilson may understand the difference but Mr. Crow thinks that inflation is inflation is inflation, no matter where it comes from. I think we can all predict how he will react to inflation in January 1991 based on how he reacted to inflation based on sales tax increases in January 1990.

Mr. Crow and the Bank of Canada will raise the interest rate as much as he thinks it needs to be to slow the impact of the GST-induced inflation. The Minister of Finance should stop misleading Canadians when he says that the GST will not increase interest rates. He is wrong. He knows he is wrong. The track record shows he is wrong. He should start telling Canadians what the truth is about the GST. The goods and services tax will be a new tax in 1991 that will cost Canadians money, will cause higher interest rates and will cause higher inflation. The cuts in this budget which the Minister says contains no new taxes is really in fact the price we are paying now for the GST that will come in next year. It is as simple as that. It is going to cost the government, according to its own figures, $1.8 billion just to bring in this tax.

Another question which needs to be answered is whether the tax increases which occurred in January were really necessary. According to the minister's budget documents—and this is from last year's documents—the sales tax increases on construction materials, farmers' fuel and gasoline were expected to raise about $700 million in new taxes to help reduce the deficit. The interest rate increase which was caused in part by these very same sales tax increases cost the government another $800 million in interest charges on the debt. So, overall, the new sales tax increases which took effect on January 1 of this year will actually increase the deficit by $100 million. That is Tory economics at their best; higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest and a higher deficit.

Mrs. McDougall: And more and more jobs.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Well, Madam Speaker, we have just heard from the Minister of Employment and Immigration who talks about more jobs. The fact of the matter is in the budget documents it is clear that the Minister of Finance expects fewer jobs. He is talking about an increase in the rate of unemployment in the country and says it is necessary to get inflation under control.

I do hope that the Minister of Finance has consulted at least with his colleagues on this matter because there seems to be a difference of opinion.

An hon. member: She hasn't read the budget.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): When the minister came into office in 1984 the government collected $71 billion in taxes. That is what the take was, $71 billion. Next year the Conservative government proposes to collect $119 billion in taxes. In five and a half years taxes have gone up by $48 billion. Unbelievable. The Conservative government has subjected Canadians to 32 separate tax increases since 1984, giving, I think everyone will agree, new meaning to the old saying that Tory times are tough times and Tory times are taxing times.

I kept listening to the minister in Question Period today talking about putting things in perspective. In 1984 when it came into power, the government collected $29 billion in personal income taxes. This year the Mulroney government proposes to collect $56 billion in personal income taxes, almost double what was collected in 1984.

When the government came into power, in the perspective of the goods and services tax combination, the manufacturers' sales tax, that famous silent killer of jobs, collected $7.7 billion for the government in 1984. This year, from the very same tax, the government proposes to collect $18.5 billion. The silent killer of jobs has moved from collecting $7.7 billion to $18.5 billion, two and a half times what they were collecting five years ago.

These people know how to tax us. The minister's new goods and services tax that he hopes will be passed by this Parliament, will collect gross revenues of about $23 billion or three times more than what they collected with the federal sales tax in 1984 when they came to power. So, you have to believe that this minister, who promised in 1984 not to raise taxes because they were already too high, has set quite a sad record during this period.

How they got there is interesting because it may serve as a precursor to what is going to happen when the new goods and services tax comes in next year if the government gets its way.

In 1984 the Tory regime raised the manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to 10 per cent. In 1986, a little less than two years later, it raised it from 10 per cent to 11 per cent. Later that same year, a year when they were in a taxing mood, it raised it again from 11 per cent to 12 per cent. Then, in last year's budget, the minister raised it from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent. Imagine, Madam Speaker, from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent in a little over four years. Just imagine what will happen to Canada if the same kind of thing occurs with the goods and services tax and why would it not, given the record of this government?

The government has raised sales and excise taxes on gasoline eight times since it has come to power, the last time being January 1 of this year. But there are no new taxes in this budget. It has got them all in place and it even has got the mechanism in place for the new one next year. This is a sort of a deficit reduction year through budget cuts.

In 1986 the minister eliminated the federal tax reduction for low income Canadians. He also put on what he called a temporary surtax of 3 per cent on income tax. Two and a half years later he decided the so-called temporary surtax was too temporary, so he made it permanent and raised it to 5 per cent last July.

In 1986 he decided to increase the tax on airplane flights. In 1988 he taxed cable television fees and long distance telephone calls. Now, Madam Speaker, when Bell says: "Reach out and touch someone", you know that maybe that other hand there belongs to the Minister of Finance.

In 1987 he started to tax chocolate bars because, what the heck, why leave the kids alone? When you go for it, go all the way. Now when your child reaches into his or her pocket to pay for a candy bar, guess whose hand is there? We also had the experience of the minister starting to tax soft drinks. So when your kids catch the feeling, oh, oh, you might catch the minister dipping his hand into that pocket too. They have toys since 1988, as well as paint and wallpaper.

Then, in 1989, it began to tax back family allowance and senior citizens' old age security pensions. This is a taxing government.

[Translation]

The GST is the end product of a so-called reform initiated by the Conservative Government, a reform that was supposed to increase sales tax and corporate income tax while reducing personal income tax. However, this reform has failed miserably, which comes as no surprise. Since 1984, the Canadian family's income tax has increased instead of going down, except for Canadians on very low incomes and, of course, the wealthier members of our society. Tax revenue from personal income tax has doubled since 1984. From now on, all Canadians will pay a surtax of at least 5 per cent on their basic tax bill, and in addition, the minister is now taxing family allowances and old age security benefits.

• (1630)

[English]

It is this kind of deceitful record setting out the lack of fairness in Conservative tax reform that leaves Canadians absolutely unconvinced when the minister tries to tell them that the GST will be good for them, that they will be better off. That is the message we have been hearing. It is the message Canadians have been rejecting.

He says the GST will make low-income Canadians better off. Nobody believes that. Nobody believes the rate will state at 7 per cent very long either.

The minister said the GST will be revenue neutral, and everyone knows it is the beginning of the largest tax grab in Canadian tax history.

He told us for two years that the GST would raise $18.5 billion in 1991. In yesterday's budget he now admits what we have been saying all along: the goods and services tax will raise more revenue than we have been told it would. The minister in his own document says the GST will raise $19.5 billion, a $1 billion increase. He just happened to find it and there it is already, an extra billion dollars.

[Translation]

The minister told us that the GST would be visible. We know that in most cases, it will be invisible. He said the GST would be simple. Just ask Canada's small businesses, because Canada will be the only country in the world with two systems for collecting sales tax: one federal and one provincial. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business told the government that the GST would be an administrative nightmare for small businesses.

The minister promised to abolish the temporary surtaxes on personal income tax as soon as the GST was implemented. Predictably, he has now made these surtaxes a permanent fixture and increased them from 3 to 5 per cent. He promised the GST would be accompanied by lower taxes for the middle class, but once again, he broke his promise. He promised that the government would pay compensation to small businesses who would have to collect the GST. That is not the case. He promised that the GST would not be imposed on food, but, Mr. Speaker, it will be added on to the price of cookies, pies, sandwiches and practically everything else sold in a restaurant. And we must not forget that almost half of all food product sales will be affected by the GST because the products are eaten outside the home.

For months, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) kept telling Canadians that they would never bring the GST down from 9 per cent, but a few opinion polls later, the GST rate was reduced, but not enough, because Canadians still massively reject the proposed goods and services tax.

The Minister of Finance keeps telling us that the GST will not cause interest rates or inflation to go up. Nobody believes that, and nobody believes there will be no new taxes for Canadians as a result of the Budget he brought down yesterday, Madam Speaker.

The Minister of Finance and the government should realize that all Canadian taxpayers have to pay federal, provincial and municipal taxes, and for the vast majority of Canadians, the goods and services tax is the last straw. Enough is enough. People are saying this across the country. Canadians are always willing to pay their share, but they fail to understand why they should be paying more taxes, when the Auditor General told us two weeks ago that the accounts receivable for taxes and other revenue owing to the government totalled over $7 billion.

[English]

This government strategy on taxes can be summed up very simply: high, higher and highest. Canadians are saying no to the GST. My colleagues and I have collected the names of over 600,000 people on petitions, people who are saying no to the GST. My colleague from Dartmouth is heading up an electronic petition campaign, a first in this country I believe, against the GST. That campaign will be conducted between March 12 and March 16. We hope that Canadians across this country will call in and make sure they register their opposition to the goods and services tax. We in the Official Opposition are committed to stopping the tax. We hope the government will come to its senses, listen to Canadians and axe the goods and services tax.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): What's your alternative?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I listen to my hon. friend who used to have a great deal to say about tax reform. I understand his concern about an alternative. Certainly the goods and services tax is not the alternative that is going to be acceptable.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): What my hon. friend should be asking his constituents is whether they are for this alternative that his government has proposed, rather than going to people and saying: "What's your alternative?" This shoe does not fit. Canadians are not going to wear it.

It has become absolutely clear that the Conservative government is not interested in regional fairness. We face a crisis in Atlantic Canada. The Prime Minister promised to help. He came to the House and said: "Yes, we will be generous. There will be a generous aid package." Yet in the budget there was not a word about the east coast fishery and not a word about a special aid package. The bottom line yesterday for Atlantic Canadians was that there is not a penny to help them cope.

This government is getting out of the business of regional development. That is the underlying premise in the budget yesterday. It does not have enough courage to say what it is doing. It says one thing and does another. ACOA, western diversification, FEDNOR and regional development programs will no longer provide assistance to the regions in the form of grants. Oh, no, no more grants. Now we are going to lend money. Now we are going to make sure we are going to get it back. That is fine.

If you want to get out of regional development because the Americans are telling you to do it, say so. There is nothing wrong with that, if that is what you believe in. What is wrong is saying one thing and doing the other.

We well know that when the free trade agreement was being negotiated one of the targets was grants and subsidies under regional development programs. Again the Government of Canada is sacrificing the interests of the regions and sacrificing the future of Canadians because of the free trade agreement.

Simon said: "Don't worry. They are not on the table. Don't worry about unemployment insurance. We've got that taken care of. Don't worry about regional development. Don't worry about grants and subsidies." Simon was right. The Americans did not have to worry about them because the Conservative government got rid of them. That is absolutely disgraceful.

Now we come to the decision that was amplified today by the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs: the government's last-minute decision to sell Petro-Canada. That is further evidence of the absolute disintegration of this government's will to govern in Canada as a sovereign government. It is another loss of a lever that allows us to control our economic destiny.

This is in the face of increasing foreign ownership that is coming at us from every direction. We could talk about the American Express Bank proposal. We could talk about what happened with Esso and Texaco. We could talk about so many things, but now we are talking about the ownership of a key Canadian industry, a sector that is fundamental to the survival of any country that has those kinds of resources.

The government had a chance to take a strong stand and reaffirm at least a semblance of some commitment to Canada and it said no. It was a last minute, knee-jerk decision to sell Petro-Canada.

As is clear from comments made as the minister responsible for privatization spoke today, there will not be one penny's benefit to the Canadian taxpayer. More important—and Canadians have to understand this—not one cent as we sell off one of these valuable assets will be applied to the reduction of the deficit. That is because we will be giving it away the way we gave away de Havilland and wound up paying the company that bought it more than it ever expected when it first bought it.

After five and a half years and six budgets presented by this minister, our tax system is more unfair than ever before. Basic services that average Canadians have come to rely upon over the years are being eliminated.

Canadians, including seniors, have to pay tax on interest they earn on their savings even though those amounts of interest may be less than $1,000. Canadians have had unemployment insurance benefits cut and threatened, premiums have increased and the Government of Canada has withdrawn from participating in the UI program other than to say what we can do. There is control but no money.

• (1640)

According to a study conducted by the well respected Institute for Research on Public Policy, targets for the minister's income tax reform have been low income and middle class Canadians. The only people who will be paying lower income taxes are those with incomes less than $10,000 and those with incomes over $100,000. Wealthy Canadians with incomes over $100,000 are paying $1,570 less in income tax today than when the finance minister took office in 1984.

The bottom line is that the middle class has been the favourite target of the finance minister's tax increases. The tax reform program imposed by this minister has been nothing but an all-out attack on the middle class of this country. They understand it. If members to your right, Madam Speaker, do not understand what is happening to the middle class in this country, the people who are paying the burden understand it. It is reflected every time you turn around anywhere you travel in this country.

Personal income tax revenues have increased three times faster than corporate income taxes since 1984. The Conservative government is now proposing to implement the goods and services tax which as my colleague from Ottawa South has said in this House is the single largest tax holiday afforded to corporations in the history of this country that he has been able to unearth—$6 billion in taxes being transferred from corporations to consumers.

This kind of thing is being done in this context. As the minister said today, let us put it in perspective. Some 1.4 million Canadians have not been able to provide enough food for themselves and their families in the last year. They have had to rely on food banks across this country. That is something that many of us never, ever dreamt that we would ever see again. One million Canadian children live in poverty. People know that something has to be done, but this mean-spirited budget focuses on the most vulnerable segments of our society. It does not go after the fat; it goes after the poor, the homeless, the elderly, the youth, and the sick. Even native people have not escaped the cuts in this budget.

Mr. Fontana: Don't forget the veterans.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Some 5,000 veterans, more or less, as my colleague from London East says, are being asked to make further sacrifices. I guess somebody thinks they have not done enough. They are going to have to pay $3,000 a year to lay in their sick beds.

It is a tragedy that people do not understand what the policies of this government are doing to Canadians. They seem to be completely oblivious to the economic chaos, the fiscal problems, the basic unfairness, and the human suffering that their policies are creating.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): What would you do?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The hon. member asks what would I do. I think the answer to that is that Canadian people would love to have a choice, to see what in fact we would do, if they only had an opportunity. In every poll whether it is on the GST or the budget, on every issue that is put before Canadians today the one thing that they are nearly unanimous on is that they want nothing more to do with this government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The reason for that is that this government has broken promise after promise. It has failed to meet one commitment after another. It has committed to reducing the deficit; the finance minister said it so often. Then he changed his mind and the deficit increases. He says that policies will result in lower interest rates, but they are the highest in eight years. He then contradicts the Prime Minister who said that after the budget things will be much better and interest rates will drop. The minister and his government have set an all-time record for saying one thing and doing another.

Canadians are uneasy because there are so many things about this government they cannot understand. They just cannot follow the reasoning or logic if in fact there is any reason or logic.

The economy appears to be in danger of moving into a recession, and some people would argue that we are already there. The finance minister says in his budget documents that we are going to have negative growth in 1991 for one quarter and maybe for a second quarter. It becomes a theoretical argument whether or not we are into a recession, but does it make sense to be slashing programs and imposing the goods and services tax, a brand new tax of 7 per cent, on Canadians?

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): What about the debt?

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The member talks about the debt. We know that Canadians from coast to coast are talking about the debt, a debt that went from $170 billion to over $350 billion in five years. Why would they not be talking about the debt? It is the kind of debt accumulation that has never been seen in the history of this country. That is why they are talking about it.

The alternative for the federal government to the debt in large part which it created is to turn it over to the provinces and the municipalities. The government says: "Let's not take responsibility for it ourselves. Let's not be strong enough, confident enough and forthright enough to say we caused it. We will take care of it. We will take the heat. Let's slough it off on the 10 provinces and the territories".

With the challenges facing youth today should we be cutting summer employment programs? Should we be telling the young people in this country: "Forget it, there is no job for you this summer"?

What about research and development? How are we going to compete? We are talking about level playing fields. We are imposing a goods and services tax at 7 per cent that our biggest competitor to the south does not have. We are cutting the opportunities to be able to compete on a level playing field.

What about the lack of commitment even to talk about the crisis in the Atlantic fishery? How did it come to pass that with all the members from the west who sit to your right, Madam Speaker, there was not even a passing comment on what is happening to western farmers?

An hon. member: And British Columbians.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): What has happened to British Columbians? The Polar 8 was not just an ice-breaker; it was a symbol. I know that the premier of British Columbia, his finance minister and British Columbians generally will be able to make the argument not just on the basis of economic necessity but on the kinds of things that contribute to further alienation of that great province and the people who live in it.

What about the reduction in money available to provinces for health care? When I am here in Ontario I read the press concerning what is happening with respect to waiting lists and people going to the U.S., people who can afford to pay for their own operations leaving the country because the waiting lists are so long.

Is this the time to be saying to veterans who need health care: "It is going to cost you $3,000 a year. If you have a spouse that kind of money comes out of your budget. You have not done enough for Canada. We are going to squeeze a bit more out of you"? Is that the kind of Canada that is part of the vision of the finance minister and this government?

What about small business? It has been a very dependable ally of this government for years.

What I am concerned about is the suggestion by members of the government that anyone who raises these questions does not understand. Who is a better friend of this government than the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, John Bulloch? What does he say about the goods and services tax? He says that it is a nightmare on main street.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): He likes the budget.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): The hon. member says that he likes the budget. That is not at all what he said. He does not like the budget. He likes some parts of it, but he does not like the budget.

The selective kind of response we get is that if you are against the goods and services tax, if you are against what this government does, it is because you do not understand what it are trying to do. Why does the government not give John Bulloch and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and its 80,000 members an opportunity to tell it what they really think about the goods and services tax?

Why not go to Alberta, which I will be doing on March 5 to debate the Minister of Finance, where a few hundred people will have an opportunity to sit in the public forum we will be involved in that evening? The finance minister and I are going to spend a lot of money to get to Alberta. It would be nice for Albertans to be able to get to a nice big meeting, in a nice public place where it does not cost $100 to be able to attend by invitation only.

It would be nice to have Mr. Bulloch and my hon. friend who has been interjecting attend that meeting, as well as to invite the leader of the Reform Party and some people from New Democratic Party. Mainly the people of Alberta should be invited to make sure that they understand what the goods and services tax is all about from the Conservative point of view. That would be a very helpful exercise in making sure that Albertans and Canadians generally understand what the tax is all about.

• (1650)

There are many questions that Canadians had before this budget was presented, and there are still many questions to be answered. But the hon. member has a point. What is that we must do?

I believe, as we have heard many times as we crossed the country with the Standing Committee on Finance, that we do have to get involved in real and meaningful tax reform. It is no longer a question of passing the buck. It is our buck. The buck stops here, whether it is federal, provincial or municipal.

As the mayor of Vancouver suggested at our hearing in Vancouver, we have to look at what the impact is of tax reform, not to have federal unilateral tax reform and some provincial machinations and then the municipalities pick up whatever is left as it trickles down. We need to look at what we are doing in terms of our taxation policy, our spending policy. How does monetary policy integrate into what we are trying to achieve in this country? We have to get along. We have to be able to talk. The great conciliator has blown it. Where are the premiers as we talk about economic matters in this country, never mind the other issues? On straight economic matters where are the provinces?

Are we going to have a country with 10 economies, 10 provinces, where all the provinces will be judged like this: "Are you making money this year? Do you have a budget this year? Do you have a little more capacity to pay"? Is this the kind of Canada that we are trying to develop, instead of a cohesive, national approach to our problems in our economy? Are we saying: "Let's break it all up into little pieces and let's deal with each province as a separate entity"?

We understand the jurisdictional problems that are involved. Confederation has survived for over 100 years. This is a very different kind of approach.

Too often the federal government has raised taxes and got involved in budget cuts without fully recognizing the impact on provincial governments and municipal governments. We need to get involved in a very serious reform of government activity from the point of view of taxation, spending and monetary policy.

[Translation]

When they look at the government's record. after five and half years in power, Canadians certainly have the right to be discouraged. They know perfectly well that we have to be competitive on international markets and that we have to improve job creation and the training of our workforce. They know perfectly well that Canada has to keep playing a leading role in connection with the dramatic changes that are taking place in the world.

[English]

We must be competitive. Canadians try always to be the best they can be, but we know that we cannot excel if we do not manage our economy effectively, if we do not respect the environment, if we do not make sure we have the best possible education system.

Canadians know that these goals and objectives have a price. Canadians are always prepared to pay the price when the price is fair. Canadians know that we cannot move confidently, never mind into the 1990s by trying to spread our vision into what we want to do in the 21st century, if we are strait-jacketed by a government which has demonstrated unequivocally that it is unable to manage its own affairs after having bragged about good management for years.

We believe that Canadians can achieve great things together. We can work together to try to move toward a debt-free country. Our citizens, our children, deserve a healthy environment and a healthy economy. In my view the two go hand in hand. The tragedy of yesterday is that this budget does not deliver on either of those dreams.

I therefore move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and by substituting the following:

This House condemn the government

(1) for escalating an already intolerable tax burden on Canadians, including its proposed goods and services tax, while attempting to shift its obligations on to lower income Canadians and the provinces;

(2) for its attempts to abandon its responsibilities for health care, post-secondary education, veterans and regional development, and

(3) for its continuing policies of high interest rates and slow growth that can only deepen a Tory made-in-Canada recession.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 26 minutes starting at six o'clock.

The Chair recognizes the parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, I think we should ask for the unanimous consent of the House to allow the Leader of the New Democratic Party to finish her speech, and if she needs more time, I think we can count on that unanimous consent.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the suggestion made by the parliamentary secretary. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Milliken: We are happy to co-operate and give our consent to the suggestion made by the member speaking for the government.

I may say that if the government is in a mood to hand out money we would be pleased to have it distributed equally to all sides of the House.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to speak on the finance minister's budget. I welcome it more than ever because what this country needs is a serious debate about economic policy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: From coast to coast to coast Canadians know that something has gone seriously wrong with the economy of this country. This budget represents a culmination of six years of economic mismanagement.

When we think the government has outdone itself, when we think that it will not introduce any more harmful and short-sighted policies, when we think that there will be a vision, that there will be some new ideas we see, once again, that the old party has old ideas, fighting yesterday's battle with yesterday's solutions in the 1990s.

What we need is a serious debate. Contrary to what the government would like to see, that debate must involve all Canadians. That means women's groups and aboriginal groups, environmentalists, social justice advocates—all advocacy groups. It is no coincidence that this government is cutting $23 million from advocacy groups.

This finance minister and this government are attempting each year to silence more voices, the voices of aboriginal people, the voices of senior citizens, the voices of women. The voices in society who have the most to lose are silenced by this budget.

But one voice is being heard loud and clear. That is the voice of a senior citizen, a veteran who has served his country. His voice is in response to the fact that he is going to have to pay $6 extra a day as a result of this minister's budget, $6 a day in a budget measured in billions. So what does one of those veteran residents in the Rideau Veterans Home have to say? Mr. Trailing states: "After all the boys have done for this country they get stepped on and insulted". Then he refers to the finance minister and states: "I would like to take on that guy. We are a special breed and all he gives us is a big foot on our neck".

• (1700)

That may sum up the feelings of many Canadians about this budget. So this government is going to get a vigorous debate from the New Democratic Party and I would say from Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

What we are going to be saying to this government is that we are weary of broken promises. We are weary of deception. If, for example, this government says it is going to save the environment and provide a better future for our children, then the government should do it. Do not deliver a budget reacting to yesterday. Deliver a budget that deals with the issues of tomorrow that leads us boldly into the 1990s.

The fact is that this budget is like an old grade B movie. The present finance minister has given Canadians a budget of out-of-control interest rates, escalating unemployment, a budget that is destined to lead this country into further recession. This is a budget for an army fighting a cold war that no longer exists. It is a budget that ignores an environmental crisis that very much does exist.

There is no vision here. There is no grasp of the challenges confronting us. This government is reacting to yesterday instead of building for tomorrow. There is not one new idea in this budget, not one. That is shameful because there is so much to do.

We in the New Democratic Party say it is time for this government to deal with the challenges that confront Canadians. It is time for real leadership for a change.

[Translation]

Let's take a look at the contents of the Budget, Madam Speaker. Let's see who are the losers and who are the winners. It is easy to see who the winners are. They are the corporations and wealthy citizens who do not pay their fair share of income tax. They are the companies that make profits by polluting our environment. They are the communications consultants who get millions of dollars worth of contracts from the government to sell Canadians unsatisfactory policies. They are the brokers who will make a pile of money on the sale of Petro-Canada and Telesat. The list of losers is much longer. It includes all those who use the health care system. It includes young people, the elderly, the homeless, Native people, women, Canadians in our poorest regions, fishermen, farmers, the unemployed and the children who will be left with a polluted environment. Instead of a clean environment, we now have a polluted one.

In other words, the Budget affects all low- and middle-income Canadians, whether they live in Canso or Kelowna, in Quebec City or Whitehorse. They will have to pay more taxes, while services offered by the government are gradually disappearing.

[English]

Let us make no mistake about this, taxes are going to increase. There are taxes in this budget. Canadians can read between the lines. They have not forgotten the goods and services tax. They know they could pay hundreds of dollars next year because of the new sales tax. They know that when the federal government puts in less money for health and education and for post-secondary services, the provinces and the territories have to put in more.

That translates into higher provincial and territorial taxes. Canadians can count on that. They know they cannot count on the word of this government.

The reaction from provincial premiers and finance ministers has been swift and brutal. The Nova Scotia finance minister said last night that this budget would cost his province $80 million over the next two years; Ontario $480 million. In B.C. it will cost $120 million next year alone. All the provincial governments said plain and simple they are going to have to raise taxes or reduce their commitment to medicare and education.

What this government is doing is reducing the options for Canadians for the future. Those provinces that are poorer or have smaller populations particularly simply do not have the resource base and the revenue base to compensate. It is a complete abdication of federal leadership. It is cowardly and it is shameful.

[Translation]

Reductions in medicare and post-secondary education are perfect examples of broken promises. Here is what the Prime Minister said in the last election campaign: "As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits will be improved, not diminished, by our government, which is committed to promoting social justice and equity." He did say "improved", Madam Speaker. He did not say "diminished".

Let us now take a look at the Budget. Funds to the provinces and territories for medicare and post-secondary education will be reduced by $7.3 billion over five years. This is in addition to the reductions announced last year.

An hon. member: That's incredible!

Ms. McLaughlin: Government cuts for health care are another attack on medicare. It affects millions of Canadians, Mr. Speaker. Imagine the crowded emergency room corridors, the closed hospital wards, the waiting lists for major surgery that are growing all the time. The Government of Quebec is even talking about charging for some medical services.

[English]

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, the average Canadian family since 1984 has paid 67 per cent more in sales taxes and every year the amount of income that they have available gets less and less. Imagine that average Canadian family now with the reduction in health services having to worry about whether their child can have an operation that is needed. We are getting closer and closer to the American way and we won't stand for it.

The New Democratic Party created medicare in this country. We are not going to stand by and watch this government destroy it. We are going to fight this every step of the way.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Ms. McLaughlin: I am dumbfounded, Mr. Speaker, to see the government take such short-sighted action as to reduce funding for post-secondary education. For example, the Canadian Association of University Teachers estimates that these cuts will amount to $3.1 billion.

Obviously all sensible Canadians consider our young people to be our most important resource to maintain a sound economy.

• (1710)

We must first invest in our young people and give them the training they need, if they are to meet the challenges of tomorrow. Education is the key to a prosperous and durable future.

I would like to mention one more aspect which concerns federal transfer payments to the provinces and the territories, Mr. Speaker, and it is a very important one. Cuts in government spending on health care and education will gradually create two societies: one rich and one poor. A few provinces and territories may be able to compensate for federal cutbacks, but it will be impossible for the poorest provinces and territories to do the same.

[English]

In those provinces that cannot make up the shortfall, services will suffer. Do we want to see a Canada where Newfoundlanders, for example, may have less adequate hospital facilities than Ontarians? Where Saskatchewanians will have higher tuitions, overcrowding and ill-equipped labs at their universities.

Where is the national standard here? Canada is about equality. It is about regional justice. We cannot continue to ask the poorest regions of this country to pay the cost of this government's economic mismanagement.

The creation of one Canada which is rich and another Canada which is poor is unacceptable and it must be stopped and it must be stopped now.

As we analyze the budget, we see once again that, like the goods and services tax, this budget is designed to take the most from those who have the least, from those who are the least able to speak up and have their voices heard.

These cuts, like so many that preceded them, are directed to those people in our society who need the help from all their fellow Canadians the most. Look at the hundreds of millions of dollars cut in the Canada Assistance Plan funding for Alberta, for B.C. and Ontario. The Canada Assistance Plan funds welfare, child care, and other programs to meet the needs of the poor.

The poor in these provinces need these programs just as much as the poor in other parts of the country. When you are poor, you are poor, and it does not matter where you live.

One has to wonder if any members of this government ever go and walk one of the city streets, because if they did they would see the increasing numbers of homeless in those streets. Yet, what does this government do? It cuts social housing expenditures. That is a crime.

If members of this government were to go to many of the communities across Canada they would see first hand what we should be doing. What we should be doing in this House is saying to aboriginal Canadians: "We are here to ensure that you have the power to control your own lives as first nations of this country, that you deserve our respect, and we are going to support you in your aims and objectives." What does this government do? It cuts Indian and Inuit programs by $50 million this year and another $50 million next year, just the way that last year this government cut aboriginal post-secondary education. A fact is a fact, Mr Speaker. This government's treatment of Canada's first nations is shameful.

I mentioned earlier probably the most heartless, the most insensitive and the most unnecessary cuts in this budget are the cuts to veterans, to the men and women who have served our country, cuts to their long term care and lodging, increasing the cost of every meal and increasing the cost of their rooms. This is a remarkably cruel expression of our gratitude to veterans for their service to their country.

We have to contrast the $17 million that this move will save Canadians with the $14 million that this government will spend to sell a tax with a propaganda program, the goods and services tax, that we already know 80 per cent of Canadians do not want and do not want to hear about from this government.

We have been proud over the years that we are a country that values equality in justice. But this government is even going to put the cap on that, making sure that some $86 million will be cut from legal aid, those very services that ensure that Canadians have access to having their rights addressed. Again, low income Canadians will suffer the most because often it is they who rely on legal aid.

We have had a very important inquiry in this country on native justice. This is going to seriously affect the rights of native people to access to justice in our society. So on the one hand while we are giving platitudes about how we believe in native justice and how we believe that every Canadian should have a right to fair and equal justice in this country, on the other hand we are cutting the ways for them to have those rights and this will not be tolerated.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the government has also imposed cuts on Telefilm Canada and the CBC. The CBC is one of our major national institutions, and both the French and English networks contribute to national unity by strengthening ties between Canadians. If the Conservatives want this Crown corporation to close down, they are on the right track.

A number of questions come to mind, Mr. Speaker. When will the government stop undermining our sovereignty? When will it stop destroying our cultural institutions? And when will it stop attacking the poor and the most vulnerable in this country?

[English]

This government has shown once again by this budget that it has not moved at all into the 1990s, that it has not in any way attempted to address the situation that is happening internationally by making any plans to bring our troops home from Europe. Their cold war mindset has once again prevented them from a forward initiative.

Instead, this government has axed the Polar 8 ice-breaker, which is so crucial to protecting the sovereignty of the North. The question that arises is when is this government going to stop selling our sovereignty? When is it going to stop destroying our cultural institutions? When is it going to stop punishing the disadvantaged in this country?

Just as important as what is in the budget is what is not. There is nothing in this budget for women. There is nothing for shelters for battered women. No real commitment to pay equity in the Public Service and the private sector. No program to educate police and judges on women's issues. No relief for older women living in poverty. None of it is there.

There is not one word about child care. Talk about a broken promise, Mr. Speaker. While one million Canadian children require child care, and are not able to get it, this government is silent. Women are never going to be able to attain equality until Canadians have access to affordable quality child care, and the lack of that kind of care, sadly, seems to suit this government just fine.

The minister responsible for the Status of Women should take a good look at her record. It is a miserable record. The move toward equality has been stopped and reversed and the only new initiative that there has been is the recriminalization of abortion. What this government is saying is that we will not make the effort to treat women with dignity, but we can find the time to treat them like criminals.

• (1720)

Another item in this budget which is extremely disappointing is the fact that the regions of this country have been totally ignored. Despite the debates we have had in this House about the crisis in the Atlantic region, despite the serious situation of farmers, we see nothing in this budget to help farmers, the Atlantic region and other regions in this country. This budget comes back empty-handed. There is not one new dollar in regional development money. This government has done a masterful job in creating a crisis in Atlantic Canada and doing nothing to resolve it. There is no emergency relief package for the Atlantic and nothing for workers in the fisheries.

[Translation]

The province of Quebec alone will lose $220 million in transfer payments during 1990-91. In addition to cutbacks in health care and education, Quebec will be affected by cuts in subsidized housing, in funding for the CBC and in exploration incentive programs. We also note there are is no new measures to stimulate economic development in this province.

[English]

This budget offers absolutely no relief for northern Canadians. In Whitehorse, one of the cities that is generally studied to see the cost of an average food basket, the food basket is fully one third higher than any other city in Canada. That does not tell the real tale, because if you went further north into the eastern Arctic and smaller communities north of my home community, that would be doubled and tripled. What do we see in this budget? We see cuts to Indian and Inuit programs. Cuts to health and post-secondary education. The cancellation of the Polar 8 ice-breaker. An end to the Canadian exploration initiative program. Once again, the interests of the north are overlooked.

I just learned this morning from the National Executive of the Native Communications Program that their funding is in serious jeopardy. The Northern Native Broadcast Access Program will be cut by some 15 to 16 per cent. These are programs that have been praised by UNESCO and by CIDA, known around the world for their high quality. What do these programs do? These programs give a voice to aboriginal people and they do even more.

I would just like to cite an example of a radio station serving northern Ontario, it is the Waterway Radio Service, where trail radios are used in remote communities by hunters and trappers to call for help in emergency situations. Every year hundreds of lives are saved by the trail radio service. There are 30 community radio stations that will no longer receive regular maintenance and could be drastically cut by these cuts to this budget. This is equally true for other native communications that are going to be hit by this cost reduction. It could very much affect the kinds of broadcasting, award winning broadcasting. The Inuit Broadcasting Corporation wins awards around the world. But we are going to cut it. CFWE in Lac-la-Biche, Alberta; SHON-FM in Whitehorse and CKNM in Yellowknife, among others, will be permanently crippled by these reductions.

Surely, we have a responsibility to ensure that Canada's First Nations have a system of communication, of support which will enable them to continue to advance toward their goals. I would say as well, that much of these native communications systems not just serve aboriginal people, they serve the whole community. In my community alone, this system of communication serves the whole community. So we are cutting a service to many of the northern and remote areas of this country that serves all residents of those areas.

This is a serious attack on Canada's aboriginal people and it will be devastating for many of the communities.

The finance minister, as I mentioned earlier, has also chosen to ignore the devastation facing prairie farmers. Nothing is being done to avert the farm crisis. We have family farms there that are in a situation of Third World debt. They are not going to be able to get out of it.

As we sit here today, a country that loses sovereignty over its food supply loses its sovereignty, Mr. Speaker. The family farm is threatened, rural communities are threatened. Last year 25,000 people were forced to leave Saskatchewan. For the good of this country, we must save our family farms. We have to keep our farmers on the land. It is our legacy to the children and we must do that. But this budget does not even begin to do it.

We see a budget that projects an increase in unemployment. It is almost unbelievable that we have a budget that states that there are going to be more unemployed. There is no retraining funding, no jobs strategies, nothing in this budget to help the 1.25 million Canadians who are unemployed. Not only is this government doing nothing, but as I say it is predicting higher unemployment, an unemployment rate of 8.5 per cent over the next couple of years. That is 100,000 additional unemployed each year.

This government seems to feel that work is a luxury, that somehow in hard times we just kind of do away with it. But this is about families. This is about the dignity of work, the dignity of families, people contributing in a productive way to our society. Unemployment is about causing family breakdown, social problems and losing all of the productivity that the unemployed could be giving to our society.

But to the finance minister unemployment is just another economic indicator. It is not an economic indicator. It is people. It is bread and butter on the table, it is dignity, it is respect and we owe it to this country to have a policy of full employment not a policy of high unemployment.

As an aside, whatever happened to the jobs that were to be created by the free trade deal? There do not seem to be any. The only job that this government created is one, a con job, and the biggest con job that this country has ever seen.

[Translation]

The destruction of unemployment insurance, the pressure to lower wages, the use of the unemployed to fight inflation, the lack of new initiatives in the Budget to help unemployed Canadians workall show the government's insensitivity to unemployment.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) must realize that if he wants a sound economy, he must invest in the people of this country. That means creating jobs. The NDP maintains that all Canadians are entitled to a job. An unemployment rate of 8.5 per cent is totally unacceptable. It is even scandalous!

[English]

In this budget, this government has ignored a very important crisis facing Canadians, one that over 80 per cent of Canadians have identified as a priority concern to them, to their children and to the future. That is the environment. By failing to deal in any way in this budget with the environment, this government has failed Canadians. There is perhaps nothing in the budget that so clearly represents the lack of vision of this country than the inactivity concerning the environment. Nothing shows more clearly how this government is out of touch not only with the problems in Canada, but with our commitments to the international community.

• (1730)

It is not as though this government does not talk about the environment. We have heard many promises regarding the environment. The Minister of the Environment promised a tough environmental agenda for Canada that would include concrete measures and funding to support them. The environment minister promised that it would be a green budget. My colleague says that we have word inflation, more words but no action on the environment.

There is no intention in this budget to make the condition of our environment a priority. By addressing environmental initiatives, of course, we would create more jobs. But the government plans this budget on increased unemployment, not on planning for the future.

There is not one cent in this budget for alternative energy, research into clean technologies, conservation or recycling. There is not one new initiative to deal with ozone layer depletion or global warming.

This budget demonstrates how ineffective the environment minister has been in promoting his agenda. It demonstrates how little real commitment this government has to the environment. It is a total sham when it comes to action.

Canadians who care about the future of this country and care about our environment must speak out, and write to the Minister of Finance and Minister of Environment to say they want economic planning that plans for the future, that plans for our children and our grandchildren. That is what we want to see in the budget.

[Translation]

The Minister of Finance must now recognize that the most important deficit facing Canadians is the environmental deficit. It is growing all the time. It is a threat to our children. And unlike other deficits, it cannot be repaid.

We must stop it without further delay. Now, Madam Speaker, not in ten years.

Canada has no economic future if our children cannot breathe without danger and if they have nothing to drink and eat.

[English]

In conclusion, I want to make several points. The Minister of Finance was very specific with dollar figures in his budget when it came to the kinds of cuts that would take place in social programs and health programs. We know it is going to be some $7.3 billion in five years. There will be cuts to health and post-secondary education, cuts to those things that are an investment in the future. There will be cuts to science and technology, which affects our very ability to compete in a changing world.

Those figures are very precise. There are precise figures about the kind of savings there will be by reducing programs for Indian and Inuit people, the kinds of savings there will be from a reduction in overseas development. There are specifics about the kinds of savings we will see from veterans. It is all very specific in the budget.

The budget also talks about the ending of grants to business. The government presents this as dealing with fairness and justice. It is going to end grants to business, but which businesses? Is it small businesses that create most of the jobs in this country and will feel the worst effects of the goods and services tax because of the administrative burden, and fewer purchases? This government does not say.

Is it the over 80,000 profitable corporations that do not pay any taxes? This government does not say. And how much will we save by this budgetary measure that is supposed to assure those less well-off people that the corporations will pay their fair share? Well, there is no figure.

I find that very curious because when this finance minister decides that he is going to cut services to veterans, cut social housing, cut social assistance, cut child care, he knows exactly how much. But when it comes to his friends in the corporate world we see no figures, no projections, no definition of what business he is talking about.

This is the kind of flim-flam and sham that the Minister of Finance is trying to sell to Canadians as his answer to the 1990s. Well, this is the minister's sixth budget and it is absolutely essential that we look at this budget in that context. This Minister of Finance has had six years of economic mismanagement. He has had six years to bring inflation under control. He has had six years to get interest rates down. He has had six years to plan for post-secondary education and research. But what has happened? Now we are told it just did not work.

Mr. Nystrom: We should deep six him.

Ms. McLaughlin: My colleague says we should deep six the minister. I think that may be a good piece of advice for the government.

On the one hand the government is purposely pursuing a high interest rate to bring inflation down, while on the other hand it is proposing a goods and services tax which by its own admission will increase inflation. It is pretty hard for average Canadians and maybe for average members of Parliament to follow this logic and this kind of economic management.

On one hand you have a policy to bring inflation down and another one to bring it up. That is some balancing act. I would suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that just like those statements about sacred trust of social programs, just like the statements about the goods and services tax not being hidden and that it would develop our economy, this budget simply is not describing the situation as it is. By pursuing conflicting policies, this government has led us to a debt that has doubled since it came into power. This is economic management?

In fact, the government predicts higher unemployment rates in its own budget. This should be a shame to the government, not a so-called economic indicator. History would show that this government bases its budgets on some fairly inaccurate projections. In last year's budget the minister said our interest rate this year was going to be about 10 per cent, and all of the calculations were based on that figure. Canadians who are now looking at interest rates of 14 per cent and more know how much they can trust the projections of this Minister of Finance.

They also know that the high interest rate has added billions of dollars to the deficit the minister says he wants to bring down. For each increase in the interest rate we immediately add $1.7 billion to the deficit. Again this year's budget is based on low interest rate forecasts. Given the course followed by this government, I think we can assume that it is very unlikely to happen so that we will have inaccurate projections of deficit reductions and the deficit will remain high.

In conclusion, this is truly a budget of despair and disparity. For women, for aboriginal people, for the unemployed and for the poor it holds no hope for a brighter future. It means even a larger gap between those who live in the richer provinces and those who live in the poorer provinces. It is tough times for those who live in the Atlantic, on the prairies, in the north. It is a budget totally without vision, without new ideas, a budget that fails to deal with the challenges of tomorrow.

• (1740)

What this country needs is an end to food banks, to homelessness, to soup kitchens. We need a fair taxation system where upper-income Canadians and profitable corporations pay their fair share.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: What this country needs is a government that moves toward social fairness. There should be investment in our people through higher education, job training, employment flexibility and child care. A substantial and immediate cut in interest rates would take billions off the deficit, would assist our farmers, assist small business and get this economy moving.

We need a budget that has a plan to develop and sustain our regional communities. We need to see a budget that has a strong, concrete, specific commitment to the environment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: We need a budget that will ensure that no matter where you live in this country, from coast to coast to coast, you will have the opportunity to have a job, to have dignity, to stay in that community to build a strong country.

[Translation]

We have to get rid of the Conservative program. Cupidity is not a virtue, compassion is not a vice. We have spent too much time and a lot of effort building a just and humane society, we simply cannot let the Conservatives destroy it now.

I am saying to members opposite that Canadians from coast to coast cannot stomach the Conservative government's lack of vision. They reject free trade, they reject the GST, they reject this budget. They are tired of broken promises. They can no longer stand being losers all the time.

[English]

The voices of Canadians are going to be heard. There is a movement growing in this country. The so-called little people are standing up and they are increasingly speaking with one united voice, which is thundering across this country, where people from every background, every social group, every community, every region are getting together to oppose this government's policies. It is a united voice that is saying: "Enough is enough, we are going to take Canada back".

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: We in the New Democratic Party say it is time the voices of Canadians were heard. It is time this government listened to Canadian concerns and heeded their advice. The people of Canada can show the way. They have a vision for the future.

To the Minister of Finance, to the Minister of the Environment, to the Prime Minister, I say: Listen to the people of Canada before it is too late.

[Translation]

The Canadian people can show the way. They have faith in the future. There is one thing I want to say to the Minister of Finance to the Minister of the Environment, to the Prime Minister: Listen to the people of Canada before it is too late!

[English]

This budget is yesterday's budget. This budget presents not one new idea, not one vision for the future. Therefore, I move:

That the amendment be amended by adding the following words:

(4) for failing to protect the environment;

(5) for failing to provide support for Canada's farm communities;

(6) for failing to share the burden of taxation by closing tax loopholes which permit profitable companies to escape paying taxes;

(7) for failing to provide aid to Atlantic Canada; and

(8) for failing to provide a national program of child care.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finances)): Thank you, Madam Speaker, for giving me this opportunity to participate in this important debate.

[English]

The motion before us today to approve, in general, the budgetary policy of the Minister of Finance deserves the full and wholehearted support of all members of this House. Approval of the motion will mean acceptance of the goals set out in the budget; deficit reduction and putting the economy back on the road to sustainable growth.

The message of the budget is clear. It calls on Canadians to persevere in the battle to control spending, reduce the deficit and to fight inflation.

Moreover, it holds out the promise that its measures will put us back on the deficit track set out in the 1989 budget, which will lead to a dramatic cut in the federal deficit to $14 billion by 1993–94 and to $10 billion in 1994–95. That track will allow the burden of national debt to begin to be reduced as it shrinks relative to our national income.

[Translation]

The policies announced in the budget, Madam Speaker, will move our national finances ahead, so that spending on debt interest will shrink from 35 cents of every revenue dollar today to 26 cents and falling in 1994–95.

My confidence in the policies set out in the budget is well placed. It stems from the fact that they are the same policies this government set out in 1984 and has been following since, with positive effects for the economy. In that November 1984 Economic Statement the Minister of Finance set out a plan with two main thrusts: to put the government's financial house in order, and to foster a dynamic, innovative and competitive private sector.

Our actions since then have challenged Canadians and encouraged them to improve their ways of doing things, but the real source of pressure for change is not the government, Madam Speaker, it is the rapidly evolving and increasingly competitive world in which we must earn our way.

Our policies have really recognized this. They promote the development of a dynamic, flexible economy that responds quickly and effectively to new challenges and opportunities; a more open and market-oriented economy that brings out the best of our competitive abilities.

Let me remind you, Madam Speaker, of the major initiatives taken by the government to strengthen the structure of the economy and encourage the development of growth and job creation.

The Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement has opened up new opportunities in the large American market. This will help build a stronger, more competitive economy. It will lead to an ongoing 3.5 per cent increase in our economic output, in all regions of the country.

• (1750)

Deregulation of the energy and transportation sectors, through scrapping the National Energy Program and other initiatives, has reduced government interference in these key parts of the economy, and encouraged greater competition and efficiency.

[English]

Reform of the income tax system has lowered tax rates and eliminated tax breaks and loopholes. The system is now fairer, and provides greater incentives to work, save and invest, with a resulting increase in economic output.

Our Labour Market Development Strategy seeks to improve the flexibility of the labour force. Better training means better jobs. A better trained and more flexible labour force can adapt more quickly to new technology and change.

Privatization of Crown corporations and sale of investments where government ownership is no longer needed to meet public policy objectives has led to greater economic efficiency and deficit reduction. Since 1984, holdings in 18 corporations have been sold or reduced, and eight other corporations have been dissolved. As well, the financial health of many Crown corporations has substantially improved.

Reform of the sales tax system is a necessary further element in our economic plan. The existing manufacturers' sales tax impairs our economic competitiveness, is unfair, and does not provide a secure source of income to help control the deficit. It destroys jobs and costs Canada $9 billion in lost annual output. The GST will unlock our potential for new growth and job creation. It will be a fairer tax, because of the refundable tax credit, and it will provide a secure source of revenue to the government.

Taken together, all these reforms will significantly increase the capacity of the economy to produce goods and services. They raise potential growth from an average of 2.75 per cent a year to over 3.25 per cent. That means more jobs and a higher standard of living for Canadians.

[Translation]

I said earlier, Madam Speaker, that this approach has been successful. The proof lies in the record which shows that Canadians have responded well. About 1.6 million more Canadians have jobs today than in 1984. Average family and individual incomes have steadily increased, both in total dollars and in real, after-tax income. There are now 750,000 fewer Canadians living below the poverty line.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Loiselle: Despite these successes, more remains to be done. This brings me to the second element of our policy—gaining control of our national finances.

Let me remind you that in 1984 the government was living far beyond its means. It was spending more on programs ans services than it was taking in through taxes and other direct revenue. Because of this, it had to borrow $16 billion to cover the difference between revenues and program spending. In addition, on a separate track, the $200 billion debt was generating over $22 billion in annual interest charges.

We recognized that the first task was to tackle the deficit on program spending, and launched a broad and sustained effort to reduce expenditure. Our first priority was cutting the cost of government operations, that is, the day to day costs of running departments, including salaries, travel, equipment and maintenance.

In the five years since 1984 these have been cut from $17.4 billion to $16.8 billion. Government is functioning with less money despite a larger workload.

Thus, in December 1989, the President of the Treasury Board announced further steps to eliminate waste and improve efficiency. We are continuing with the job of lowering government's overhead costs.

We then tackled government program review. We undertook a major effort to reform and improve them. Some outdated programs were eliminated, and others were restructured or restrained.

With tight discipline and good management, program spending has been reduced from 19.5 per cent of the economy in 1984 to 16 per cent this year. That is equivalent to a $22 billion reduction in spending.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Loiselle: Obviously, our financial problem was not caused just by too much spending. We were also very much aware that revenues had declined as a share of national income. Special tax breaks and flaws in the sales tax system were contributing to this decline. By eliminating tax breaks and loopholes, and reforming the tax system, we have increased revenues. As a proportion of national income, revenues have now returned to their average level for the 1970s.

[English]

In 1987-88 we passed a major milestone on the road toward financial soundness, when the operating deficit on programs was turned into a slight surplus. That operating surplus now stands at $9 billion. It results from a fundamental structural change in the balance of spending and revenues. And 70 per cent of the progress is the result of expenditure restraint, not revenue increases.

Having a surplus on program spending means we are working our way toward also dealing with the second component of the deficit problem. Despite the fact that the annual growth of the debt has fallen from 24 per cent a year in 1984 to less than 10 per cent, it is still growing faster than the economy—faster than our ability to pay.

The deficit of $200 billion we inherited in 1984 has grown by $150 billion. Over 80 per cent of the increase has been due to the compounding interest on the original debt. This demonstrates clearly how urgent, and how difficult, it is to break the debt cycle. It also helps to explain why our annual deficit is still at $30 billion, despite the reduction in spending and increased revenues.

[Translation]

Yes, Madam Speaker, the $200-billion debt cost us $22 billion a year in interest for which we did not have the money because we had been left with a deficit that did not even allow us to pay for current expenses— We changed this negative situation—$16 billion—into a positive one, with a $9-billion surplus this year.

[English]

So 80 per cent of the increase has been due to the compounding interest on the original debt. How can you pay a debt without paying the interest on the debt and where do you take the money when you have a deficit? The growth in the public debt will ultimately consume the opportunities we seek for our children if it is not brought under control. We have a responsibility toward all future Canadians to protect their future. The most effective way to deal with this problem is to deal with high inflation. Only in that way will interest rates decline and the economy be put back on a sustainable path of expansion.

• (1800)

Inflationary pressures are strong after seven years of strong economic growth. The demand for goods and services has outpaced the economy's productive capacity. To lower inflation, costs have to be kept under control, not just in the federal government but in all areas. But there are no shortcuts or easy ways to bring down inflation. Least of all can this be achieved by arbitrary reductions in interest rates.

Experience makes clear that to run away from the problem is futile. Experience shows that the monetary policies now being followed are the ones that will work.

Let us be clear about the problem. The Liberal government demonstrated that it did not understand the problem. High interest rates are only a symptom, not the problem itself. Underlying inflationary pressures are the cause.

The key to a successful economic policy is to deal with the underlying problem. Our measures work together with the restrictive monetary policy of the Bank of Canada to ease demand and reduce inflationary pressures. They will reinforce each other and pave the way to strong sustained growth and job creation.

There is no question that the budget's measures are tough. There is no disguising that fact. This reflects the reality that there are no easy ways to cut spending after several years of restraint. There is no truth in the belief that spending can be substantially reduced without having a real impact outside the government.

Together with measures already announced by the President of the Treasury Board, the budget's measures will produce savings of $3 billion in 1990–91 and almost $4 billion in 1991–92. Over $19 billion will be saved over the next five years.

[Translation]

To achieve these savings, Madam Speaker, we examined all areas of spending. We had to make some difficult decisions. In making them, however, have been sensitive to their effect on the finances of individual Canadians.

Therefore, major transfers to persons, such as benefits to seniors, family allowances and unemployment insurance benefits will not be affected. Nor will equalization or Canada Assistance Plan transfers to the poorer provinces.

We have capped the growth of a number of programs at five per cent a year for the next two years. Such programs include: CAP payments to Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, which are fiscally stronger than the others; and spending on defence, foreign aid (ODA), native programs and science and technology.

A number of other programs have been frozen at current levels for two years. Per capita cash and tax transfers to the provinces under Established Programs Financing will be held constant, so that total transfers will grow as provincial populations grow.

Some programs will be cancelled or reduced. We will not proceed with assistance to the OSLO oil sands project, or with the Polar 8 icebreaker project. The Canadian Exploration Incentive Program has been cancelled.

We will be taking a more businesslike approach, to our help for business. Grants will be eliminated, beginning in 1990–91, with certain exceptions. Financial assistance will be repaid on more rigorous terms. This approach places the emphasis on investment in economic development, rather than on subsidizing the private sector.

As a result of this move, ongoing financial contributions to business will essentially be limited to programs for agriculture, science and technology, native economic development, social housing, regional transportation in Atlantic Canada and regional development incentives focused on small and medium-sized business.

Further measures will be undertaken to increase efficiency and reduce the cost of government operations. More Crown corporations will be privatized, and more holdings will be sold. Dividends from Crown corporations will be increased. And the two per cent annual limit on the growth of government operations and maintenance budgets will be extended to 1994–95.

• (1805)

These measures, Madam Speaker, mean that program spending will grow by just under three per cent next year, which is well below the rate of inflation. The measures in the budget bring us back on to the deficit track set out in the 1989 budget, and cut the anticipated deficit for 1990–91 to $28.5 billion.

[English]

By 1994–95, we expect the deficit to decline further to $10 billion. The operational surplus will reach $31 billion with program spending falling to 14.2 per cent of national income. The burden of debt will be reduced as the national debt shrinks relative to the national income, and we will begin to pay down our bonds and treasury bills.

In short, we will be regaining the flexibility we need to make real choices about the country we want to pass on to the future. We will be able to do this in a climate of lower inflation, lower interest rates, sound economic growth and more jobs and opportunities in every part of Canada.

The measures in our budget show that we are willing to work hard to reach our goals. If we maintain our resolve we will win through to lower inflation and a stronger economy. I invite all members of this House to join with the government in fighting this battle for the future—not just our future but the future of all Canadians to come.

Mr. Samson: Madam Speaker, I listened very closely to the delivery of that unbelievable speech from the hon. member opposite. I sometimes wonder if we are talking about the same topic.

The government said that there are no new tax increases in this budget and there was a rousing round of applause for the minister when he made that statement. I would like to point out to the members opposite, in case they missed it, that the veterans in this country who are going to be paying $6 more per day for health care services are getting a tax increase. I do not care what you call it. If it is a price increase for health care it is a tax increase, it is an increase in something that they have to pay. You can cover it up and cloud it over any way you like. The veterans who defended this country do not deserve this slap in the face and the government ought to be ashamed of itself for even suggesting it.

I would like to ask the member for an explanation. Government members talk about not having any tax increases. Yet, in the same breath, they are telling us that in this year $1 billion in transfer payments to the provinces will be eliminated. Next year there is going to be a $1.5 billion reduction in those transfer payments. Last night we heard the Minister of Finance tell us that the provinces should have no problem whatsoever in recouping this money without raising taxes.

The finance minister has all the answers. Surely he must have a plan, surely he must have an answer. Can he tell us how the provinces are going to raise $1 billion and $1.5 billion without raising taxes to anyone? I would like the member opposite who just spoke to explain to us how this is going to happen. I would be interested in hearing the response.

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that, whether he likes it or not, there were no tax increases in the budget. There were expenditure reductions, and we do not apologize for them. They are needed, because our capacity to help the veterans and the other people we care for would be considerably hampered if we were not to deal with this very real problem.

This is what our friends across the floor failed to do. They left this country with a very hard inheritance. They laugh at the debt problem. They laughed at it when they were in power and that is why we are in this mess today. We have worked at it and we are gaining over it.

• (1810)

As for the other question raised by the hon. member about the $1 billion diminution in transfer payments to the provinces, the government has been very careful over the last five years to keep expenditures as low as possible, in fact to reduce them. We have very often been accused of doing that too much. We have kept, on average, increases in our expenditure at about 3.5 per cent.

Mr. Samson: How come the deficit went up?

Mr. Loiselle: The deficit went up because we had to pay interest on the debt and we did not have the money to pay it. They will never understand this. A debt of $200 billion accumulates interest of $22 billion a year, and that is not touching the debt. We did not have the money. We had a deficit in our current operation of $16 billion. We do not print money. We have to get it. We achieved a $25 billion turnaround in our last five years. This is a great achievement.

We have cut our spending, keeping it at the rate of growth of 3.5 per cent. Meanwhile, our transfers to the provinces year after year were increasing by 6.5 per cent. Looking at the over-all situation, at the need to get this in order and to continue in our effort, we felt that we could not leave aside such a massive program. Next year in transfers to the provinces we will be spending $35 billion. This is a large amount of money. You cannot cut what you do not spend so we had to look at it and we had to do it in a very fair way.

We had been asked by many ministers of finance of the various provinces, including my own province, to be attentive to the fact that there are provinces where the inflation pressures were higher, such as in Ontario, Alberta and B.C.

We have been very attentive to make sure that we spread these necessary cuts around. In total, these reductions, not in the transfer themselves but in the growth of transfers from 6 per cent to an average of 3 per cent—a little over 3 per cent in Quebec, a little over 4 per cent in the Atlantic provinces, and about 2 per cent in Ontario—were for the very purpose of sharing together in this national problem of reducing our expenditure. They represent less than 1 per cent of the total income of the provinces.

So it is a problem that can be dealt with if the provinces agree to share in this effort. They have to, because if we do not put this problem to rest once and for all over the next few years, we will not be able to transfer anything to anybody. This is what we are doing because our capacity to maintain the programs would disappear.

Mr. Pickard: Madam Speaker, I appreciate being able to address the Minister of State for Finance with a question.

I found it very interesting that he would stand in response to my colleague's question and suggest that six years ago the Liberals had a difficult situation with a budget deficit of $22 billion. I have noticed that your budget deficit last year was $39 billion, about double.

I found it interesting that the national debt was $168 billion in 1984. It is now $350 billion. Taxes have been increased 31 times by your government and those 31 increases have brought $50 billion more revenue into your coffers, bringing the total coffers to $70 billion, which national taxes were in 1984. Today, it is $120 billion.

And you stand and brag about improving the economy in this country. There has been tax grab after tax grab after tax grab. You have changed direction now, but you have not changed in one area. You still seem to blame the Liberal party. After five years of mismanagement, five new budgets and a sixth one now, how on earth do you have the nerve to stand and blame the Liberal government for your folly for five years when you have increased the taxes 100 percent and you have doubled the debt, doubled the deficit—

• (1815)

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Fretz: Point of order.

Mr. Pickard: I can ask a question with regard to—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the hon. member for Erie.

Mr. Fretz: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The hon. member keeps addressing the hon. minister. I realize he may be a new member here but surely he knows that his comments have to go through the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It would be appreciated by the Chair if he would put his question to the minister through the Chair.

Mr. Pickard: I stand corrected, Madam Speaker. I am sorry they did not go through the Chair. I was misdirecting my comment. I was trying to deal through the Chair to the hon. minister. I was really baffled about how he directed his comments to the Liberal party. I guess sometimes things are misdirected.

I would guess, from what I have heard from the hon. minister, that there has been a tremendous misdirection about the economic woes of Canada in 1990. That misdirection has come from the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance. In all honesty, I would like to hear a justification of how he can support blaming Liberal governments when six budgets have come in, when there have been so many tax increases, and still we have an economy in a terrible state.

Mr. Loiselle: Madam Speaker, the hon gentleman said I do not understand. That is your problem. You have never understood this problem and you still do not understand it. To repay not a $100 billion debt but a $200 billion debt would mean $40 billion of repayment a year. The interest on the debt was $22 billion. In that current account there was a $16 billion deficit. You should revisit your numbers. This is the problem. To pay it back we would need to have $40 billion on top of our expenditures. This is the legacy you have left to this country and you should be ashamed of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments has now expired. I think the day should be coming close to an end when everything is going across the floor without coming through the Chair. I understand there is an agreement between the parties that the Chair should call it 6.26 p.m. Is there unanimous consent for that?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being 6.26 p.m., the House will now adjourn until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.19 p.m.
